Petrocelli said he didn't think the letters would help, particularly since the defense lawyers had sent witnesses a copy of Lake's May order advising witnesses that they could meet with one or more defendants and their lawyers with no worries of government repercussions.

Instead, he said Lake could order prosecutors to require those witnesses to talk to the defense teams. Lake declined.

Sean Berkowitz, head of the task force, insisted that prosecutors do not want to block anyone from talking to the defense teams.

"The government does not want any witness to not speak to the defense out of fear of retribution from the United States," he said.

At a status hearing last week, Lake told attorneys on both sides that he would do what he could to help the defendants gain access to witnesses so they could adequately prepare for trial. The judge told prosecutors last week he wasn't acknowledging that any such misconduct had taken place, but he wanted to help facilitate trial preparations to preclude any possible requests to postpone the Jan. 17 trial.

Skilling and Causey are charged with more than 30 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and other charges stemming from various alleged schemes over several years to fool investors into believing Enron was a financially solid growth machine. The government alleges in the 11 conspiracy and fraud counts against Lay that he took over the ruse after Skilling abruptly resigned in August 2001 until Enron spiraled into bankruptcy in December that year. All three pleaded innocent.

Local Lawyer Charged In Currency Trading Scheme (PALMBEACHP)

By David Sedore, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 8, 2005

A federal grand jury in Cleveland has indicted a Palm Beach County securities lawyer on charges of securities fraud in connection with a $14 million currency trading scheme.

The indictment, dated Sept. 1, alleges that Delmer C. Gowing III, 61, of Ocean Ridge helped a Cleveland-based brokerage, Capital Markets Trading Group, convince 10 investors that they could earn yields as high as 20 percent a month through a currency trading deal Capital Markets claimed it had with insurance giant AIG. That arrangement didn't exist, and most of the millions invested four years ago was either lost in trades or allegedly pocketed by Capital Markets' principals, including Gowing.

Gowing, arrested Friday by U.S. marshals, was released Monday from the Palm Beach County Jail on $100,000 bond. He faces a trial in federal court in Cleveland. A call Wednesday to the U.S. attorney's office in Cleveland wasn't returned.

DOJ_NMG_0003799

Gowing's attorney, Gary Eric Susser of Boynton Beach, said his client is innocent and denies that he had an active role in the scheme other than acting as the lawyer for Capital Markets.

"When a lawyer's client does bad things, sometime the lawyer gets sucked into it," Susser said.

According to the indictment, Capital Markets began soliciting money in early 2000 from investors by claiming it had an arrangement to trade foreign currencies through AIG, one of the largest insurers in the world.

But the indictment alleges that no such arrangement existed. Instead, Capital Markets wired the money to an Irish company called Magenta Forex Corp. Ltd., which did the trading and produced "substantial losses" that weren't disclosed to investors.

Capital Markets returned some money to investors, claiming it was their profits from successful trades, while soliciting more of their money.

The alleged scheme came to an end in 2001 when Capital Markets told the investors that their money had been stolen by a third party.

One investor, Carolyn Cline, a plastic surgeon from San Francisco who now lives in Long Boat Key, gave Capital Markets $10.6 million. Last year, Cline sued Gowing and others, accusing them of defrauding her. Susser, Gowing's attorney, blames that ongoing suit for Gowing's indictment.

"This case arises out of one person," Susser said. "I'm convinced that the criminal justice system is being used as a collection agency."

Gowing, well-known in the Palm Beach County legal community as a securities lawyer, moved to the county from Bloomfield Hills, Mich., in the late 1980s.

He worked for two large Michigan-based law firms here before forming a securities law firm with partner Lloyd Schwed in West Palm Beach.

That firm fell apart in 1997 when Schwed won arbitration awards totaling $1 million in back pay for four brokers who were stiffed by their former employer, D. Blech & Co. of Boca Raton, which was under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Schwed got caught trying to leverage some allegedly incriminating tape recordings into payment for his clients.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Boeing Could Avoid Prosecution, Pay Up To $500 Million To U.S. (WSJ)

By Andy Pasztor And Anne Marie Squeo, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

The Justice Department and Boeing Co. are negotiating a settlement in which the company could be required to pay up to $500 million but would avoid prosecution in two federal probes, said people familiar with the details.

The settlement would resolve allegations that Boeing improperly acquired thousands of pages of Lockheed Martin Corp.'s proprietary documents dealing with rocket programs, and illegally recruited a senior Air Force official while she still had oversight of billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts.

Talks are continuing and details could change, these people said, with a final agreement expected to take at least several more weeks to emerge. But the terms currently under discussion would make the pact one of the largest and most comprehensive corporate fraud settlements in recent years.

Based on the broad outlines so far, the settlement also is likely to entail the stiffest financial penalty ever imposed on a U.S. defense contractor for alleged procurement violations, said people familiar with the situation -- far exceeding those meted out during Pentagon scandals in the 1980s and 1990s, which stayed under $200 million.

The two separate, much-publicized probes, which spanned two years, sent two former high-ranking Boeing executives to jail and set off events that helped lead to the departure of two Boeing chief executives. The company wasn't formally charged in that period, but it was stripped of some important contracts, became a frequent target of Congressional critics and ended up embroiled in the most serious military-procurement scandal of the past two decades.

With the company struggling to overcome the negative impact of its ethical lapses, Boeing's management sees a comprehensive settlement with the Justice Department as an essential step in reviving its image. The latest moves partly appear to reflect the desire of Jim McNerney, Boeing's recently installed chairman and CEO, to move past its troubles and focus on Boeing's future, said people familiar with the matter.

Justice Department spokesmen declined to comment. A Boeing spokesman said the company "continues to cooperate fully with government investigators."

Under the terms of what's known as a deferred prosecution agreement, Boeing wouldn't plead guilty to any specific charges but would admit wrongdoing in both the rocket and employment cases, according to the people familiar with the matter. Prosecutors would retain the right to charge Boeing if it runs afoul of the law during the course of the agreement, said people familiar with the matter. It isn't clear how long Boeing's deal with the government would run.

As part of the package, Boeing's outside legal team has been discussing possible payments to the U.S. government of between $300 million and $500 million, these people said. Earlier this year, government officials suggested that under some legal theories, the maximum penalty could approach $700 million.

A major theme of Boeing's legal arguments has been that regardless of what comes next, it already has suffered considerable harm and been subjected to various types of punishment. Indeed, all sides, including prosecutors in northern Virginia and Los Angeles, seem eager to wrap up the long-running cases. The California team recently agreed to forego prosecuting Boeing, according to one person close to the issue. Without commenting on any specifics, Paul McNulty, the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, Va., said, "Everyone with an interest is working together on this."

After months of apparent stalemate, the prospect of a settlement is relatively good news for Boeing, which has been buffeted in recent months by a 20-month suspension from bidding on some Pentagon work, loss of existing contracts, high-profile scrutiny of ethical lapses and turmoil in its management and worker ranks. Last week, 18,300 machinists at the company's commercial airline unit, which wasn't touched by the ethics scandals, went on strike and shut down production.

For Boeing, the economic pain of a settlement would represent fewer risks than an outright guilty plea to felony charges. The company has worried that criminal charges would further tarnish its reputation and potentially jeopardize billions of dollars more in U.S. government contracts.

No high-ranking executives are expected to be prosecuted beyond Boeing's former chief financial officer, Michael Sears, who previously admitted recruiting Air Force official Darleen Druyun for a $250,000-a-year Boeing job in violation of conflict-of-interest laws. Both Mr. Sears and Ms. Druyun were sentenced to prison after guilty pleas that ratcheted up the investigation of Boeing's business practices and ethical missteps.

In an interview last week, Mr. McNulty, the top U.S. prosecutor in Alexandria, the office that has purview over the Pentagon, said, "We've held a senior, very senior officer criminally liable, and other things typically flow from that."

While Boeing initially tried to attribute wrongdoing to a few rogue employees, prosecutors discovered evidence that misconduct was more extensive. Court documents that accompanied Mr. Sears' guilty plea indicated other high-level officials knew of the company's efforts to hire Ms. Druyun, who failed to remove herself quickly enough from a decision-making role over Boeing's defense businesses. In the rocket case, only two former managers have been indicted, but other executives have been punished, reassigned or forced out.

In recent months, Boeing has undergone numerous internal and external reviews of its behavior. At the Air Force's insistence, it accepted an unprecedented level of government oversight of its corporate-ethics programs. For example, it agreed to provide the Air Force monthly reports on the status of sensitive, in-house investigations, as well as information about suspected misconduct anywhere in its army of subcontractors.

It also set up a hotline for employees to report ethical lapses. One tip to that hotline led to the departure earlier this year of CEO Harry C. Stonecipher when a caller reported his consensual relationship with a female executive.

So-called deferred-prosecution agreements have been used in recent years against roughly a dozen large companies, including Time Warner Inc., Monsanto Co. and Computer Associates Inc. The goal is to hold management liable without resorting to indictments or guilty pleas that could threaten the survival of the entire company. With the exception of Boeing, big defense suppliers haven't been a major focus of the recent federal crackdown on white-collar crime.

Write to Andy Pasztor at andy.pasztor@wsj.com1 and Anne Marie Squeo at annemarie.squeo@wsj.com2

CIA Leak Probe May Be Nearing End Game: Lawyers (BOS/REU)

The Boston Globe, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - New York Times reporter Judith Miller, locked up for refusing to reveal who told her a covert CIA operative's name in a probe that may be nearing a conclusion, works part time at the jail laundry helping clean fellow inmates' green jumpsuits and dirty linens.

Between shifts at the laundry, Miller works at the library on a card catalog of the jail's books, said attorney Floyd Abrams, offering new details about Miller's life behind bars after meeting with her on Wednesday.

Abrams, who represents The New York Times, said Miller was "safe" but that conditions in jail were "grim."

This week Miller marked two months -- 65 days as of Thursday -- at the Alexandria Detention Center just outside Washington for refusing to testify to a grand jury trying to determine who in the Bush administration leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Abrams said Miller remained "resolute" and would not reveal her confidential source to a grand jury in the case, which could shake up an administration already reeling from criticism over its response to Hurricane Katrina. The probe has ensnarled President George W. Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

But lawyers close to the investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks in a final flurry of negotiations and legal maneuvering.

Asked if talks were under way with special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, a Justice Department prosecutor, to secure Miller's testimony and release, Abrams said: "If there are any discussions, they would be private."

"She is there (in jail) for a reason. At this time, the reason is still there. She made a promise and, unless properly released from her promise by her source, she has no choice but to continue to take the position that she's taking," Abrams said.

He declined comment when asked if Miller, who was sent to jail on July 6 though she never wrote an article about the Plame matter, had reached out anew to her source for a clear release from confidentiality that would allow her to testify.

Attorney Theodore Boutrous, who represents Time magazine and its reporter, Matthew Cooper, said Miller's "standoff" with Fitzgerald may be coming to a head.

"Either Fitzgerald still needs Miller or he doesn't," Boutrous said. "It's who blinks first. ... You would think something needs to happen soon, one way or another."

Unlike Miller, Cooper avoided jail by agreeing to testify after saying he received the "express personal consent" of his source to reveal his identity. The first person to tell him about Plame was Rove, Cooper said.

Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, said the leak was meant to discredit him for criticizing Bush's Iraq policy in 2003 after a CIA-funded trip to investigate whether Niger helped supply nuclear materials to Baghdad.

FITZGERALD'S END GAME?

Several lawyers involved in the case say Fitzgerald was likely to wrap up his inquiry this fall, if not sooner, though they say they have not heard from his office in weeks.

The outcome could have political implications for Bush, whose approval ratings are already the lowest of his presidency.

After initially promising to fire anyone found to have leaked information in the case, Bush in July offered a more qualified pledge: "If someone committed a crime they will no longer work in my administration."

Prominent Democrats have called on Bush to fire Rove, the architect of his two presidential election victories and now his deputy chief of staff, or block his access to classified information.

Rove's attorneys said Rove did nothing wrong and has been repeatedly assured he is not a target of Fitzgerald's investigation.

When Miller was jailed, chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan said she must stay there until she agreed to testify or for the rest of the grand jury's term, which lasts into October.

But if no deal is reached, lawyers say, Fitzgerald could step up pressure by threatening Miller with a longer sentence. Miller's attorneys, in turn, could argue she has no intention of testifying and that her continued incarceration is of little consequence to Fitzgerald's case since others have revealed their sources.

LIVING A FLOOR BELOW MOUSSAOUI

DOJ_NMG_0003802

An investigative reporter who covers national security and foreign policy issues, Miller is one of about 440 inmates at the Alexandria Detention Center, according to its spokesman, Capt. Tony Davis.

Miller has been in a U.S. jail longer than any other newspaper journalist to protect a source, according to Abrams. The previous record-holder, he said, was a journalist from The Los Angeles Times who served for 48 days.

The Alexandria facility where Miller is being held has housed some of the nation's most notorious spies and terror suspects. One floor above Miller's cell is Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person convicted in connection with the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Like other inmates, Miller has a small cell, which gets some natural light through a window and is "locked down" for the night at about 11:00 p.m. The cell is equipped with a toilet, a sink and a bed.

Davis declined to discuss Miller's daily routine. Speaking generally, he said, inmates assigned to laundry detail help wash jail linens and blankets, as well as green jumpsuits marked with the word "PRISONER."

Judge Orders Berger To Pay $50,000 Fine (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A judge on Thursday ordered Sandy Berger, former President Clinton's national security adviser, to pay a $50,000 fine for illegally taking classified documents from the National Archives, the main repository of U.S. government papers.

The punishment handed down by U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah Robinson exceeded the $10,000 fine recommended by government lawyers. Under the deal, Mr. Berger avoids prison time but he must surrender access to classified government materials for three years.

"The court finds the fine is inadequate because it doesn't reflect the seriousness of the offense," Judge Robinson said, as a grim-faced Mr. Berger stood silently.

Earlier in the hearing, Mr. Berger expressed remorse for his crime, which he described as a lapse of judgment that came while he was preparing to testify before the commission investigating the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"I let considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material," Mr. Berger said. "I believe this lapse, serious as it is, does not reflect the character of myself."

The sentencing capped a bizarre sequence of events in which Mr. Berger admitted to sneaking classified documents out of the Archives in his suit, later destroying some of them in his office and then lying about it.

After initially saying it was an "honest mistake," Mr. Berger pleaded guilty in April to a misdemeanor of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, which contained information relating to terror threats in the U.S. during the 2000 millennium celebration.

Berger Is Fined For Smuggling Classified Papers (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

A federal judge yesterday ordered former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger to pay a $50,000 fine and give up his security clearance for three years as the penalty for smuggling classified terrorism documents out of the National Archives in 2003.

The sentence was much more severe than the $10,000 fine that Justice Department prosecutors and Berger's attorneys had jointly proposed after Berger pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge. But Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson said the punishment, which also included two years of probation and 100 hours of community service, would more "sufficiently reflect the seriousness of the offense."

She said she took into account Berger's "otherwise exemplary record" and "sincere expression of remorse" in her sentence.

Berger, who had classified documents hand-delivered to his desk when he advised President Bill Clinton, pleaded guilty in April to unauthorized removal and retention of classified documents. He admitted to stuffing copies of documents in his coat jacket as he left the National Archives and then destroying some at his office and pretending he had never possessed them.

Berger had been reviewing the records about the Clinton administration's response to reports of terrorist threats in 2000 as he was preparing to respond to questions from the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"My actions . . . were wrong. They were foolish. I deeply regret them, and I have every day since," Berger told Robinson yesterday. "I let considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material."

The disclosure of the government's investigation of Berger last year prompted him to step down as an adviser to the 2004 presidential campaign of Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

Ex-Clinton Official Draws Higher-Than-Expected Fine (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Samuel R. Berger, an influential adviser to former President Bill Clinton who helped shape American foreign policy through the 1990's, was ordered Thursday to pay a higher-than-expected fine of $50,000 but received no jail time for removing and destroying copies of classified documents from the National Archives.

Mr. Berger, 59, stood somberly before a federal judge moments before he was sentenced, and admitted that his decision to remove material on terrorism in three visits to the archives in 2003 was "indefensible." His actions, Mr. Berger said, "were wrong, they were foolish," adding, "I deeply regret them, and I have every day since."

In a plea deal reached five months ago, lawyers for the Justice Department and Mr. Berger agreed to seek a $10,000 fine as part of his sentence. But Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson of Federal District Court here decided Thursday to impose the $50,000 fine, along with 100 hours of community service and two years' probation. She also barred Mr. Berger from access to classified material for three years.

The judge said the proposed $10,000 fine failed to reflect the severity of the crime or the financial resources of Mr. Berger, who founded an international consulting firm after serving as national security adviser from 1997 through 2000.

The sentencing caps an embarrassing 14-month ordeal that Mr. Berger's lawyers acknowledge has badly hurt his reputation. His motivation in taking the documents remains a matter of fierce debate in political circles, and Mr. Berger himself did little to shed light on the mystery Thursday, except to say, without elaboration, that he had put his own "personal convenience" in reviewing the documents ahead of federal law.

But new court filings, prepared by the Justice Department and Mr. Berger's lawyers, did provide fresh details about the episode and possible explanations for his actions.

The filings suggest that prosecutors and defense lawyers believe Mr. Berger's decision to remove the documents was triggered by pressure, fatigue and confusion, rather than by any intent to hide damaging information about the Clinton administration, as Republican critics have charged.

Mr. Berger spent hundreds of hours in 2003 reviewing the Clinton administration's record on terrorism in his capacity as the administration's official liaison to the Sept. 11 commission, which investigated the terrorist attacks of 2001.

In preparing for his testimony to the commission on three visits to the archives, he came across several versions of a highly classified memorandum that he had ordered written in 2000 regarding the administration's response to the so-called millennium terror plots in December 1999, according to the court filings, and he improperly removed several sets of copies. He later destroyed some of the copies and lied to archive officials when confronted about the missing documents, the court filings said.

When the episode first became public last year - forcing Mr. Berger to step down as an adviser to the presidential campaign of Senator John Kerry - he said he had accidentally removed the documents. But he admitted as part of his guilty plea in April that he had intentionally taken the material.

Defense lawyers said in their pre-sentencing memorandum to the judge this week that Mr. Berger, in reviewing material at the archives for several days for as long as 10 hours a day, became overwhelmed.

The defense lawyers said that Mr. Berger, "weary from the document review and not thinking clearly," wanted to reconstruct events in his own office by comparing memorandums side by side and so decided to remove notes and classified copies.

DOJ_NMG_0003804

The lawyers said that "the tiring nature of the review, the burden it imposed on Mr. Berger's schedule, and the importance that Mr. Berger attached to being prepared to testify before the 9/11 commission and to prepare his colleagues" led him to a "lapse in judgment."

Prosecutors for the Justice Department, in their own memorandum to the judge, offered no evidence to suggest any ulterior motive by Mr. Berger. On the contrary, prosecutors noted that the Sept. 11 commission reviewed copies of all the documents that Mr. Berger took and that there was "no evidence that any unique document was destroyed or lost."

Instead, prosecutors said in their filing, Mr. Berger appeared to have taken the documents "for his own convenience." He "was entitled to review the documents any time he wished to, at the secure locations, but he decided that was too burdensome and so he chose to break the law," the prosecutors said.

However, Justice Department prosecutors made clear in their sentencing memorandum that no matter what may have motivated Mr. Berger, they considered his offense a serious crime.

"As a consultant to the government the defendant assumed an important task to review highly classified documents related to national security," they wrote, "and in the course of that review he breached the trust given to him by unlawfully removing, retaining and destroying classified documents."

In considering a sentence, Magistrate Judge Robinson reviewed letters of support from several admirers of Mr. Berger, including Anthony Lake, his predecessor as national security adviser, who called him "a man of extraordinary integrity," and Fred Reiner, his rabbi. But the judge also received some 15 opposing letters from members of the public and some former government employees, who urged her to sentence Mr. Berger to jail for what they viewed as a serious offense.

Ultimately, the judge said she decided that probation and community service were more appropriate.

Federal Agents Armed With Warrant Raid Melrose Park Police Station (AP)

AP, September 9, 2005

CHICAGO - Federal agents armed with a search warrant raided the police station in suburban Melrose Park on Thursday, an FBI spokesman said.

"We did have several agents there this morning," FBI spokesman Ross Rice said.

The raid, he said, was part of an ongoing investigation but he declined to give details. He also declined to say what the agents were looking for and what, if anything, they found.

"No arrests have been made and no charges have been filed," he said.

U.S. attorney spokesman Randall Samborn declined to comment.

A woman who answered the phone at the west suburban police station said that Chief Vito Scavo and his lieutenants were not immediately available to answer questions.

The suburb has figured in a number of high-profile criminal cases in recent years.

Former Melrose Park Mayor C. Augustus Taddeo pleaded guilty in 1999 to extortion and tax fraud and was sentenced to 27 months in federal prison.

In recent years, a federal investigation of illegal electronic gambling devices controlled by the mob found that many were installed in Melrose Park taverns and strip joints. And the FBI said recently that the mob has a street crew based in the suburb.

The suburb was also the site of the first raid by federal agents in October 1998 on an Illinois drivers license testing station operated by then-Secretary of State George Ryan's office. It was the beginning of the Operation Safe Road investigation of bribes exchanged for drivers licenses and political corruption in the Ryan era.

Federal Agents Raid Melrose Park Police Station (WLS-TV)

By Charles Thomas

WLS-TV, September 8, 2005

September 8, 2005 - Federal agents raided the Melrose Park police station on Thursday. They shut the building down for half a day and seized records without explaining the nature of the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0003805

The Melrose Park police headquarters is back in business after being shut down all morning and part of the early afternoon by federal investigators. Officially the feds will not say what they were looking for and village officials will not comment on the raid, referring questions to a private public relations firm.

The federal agents arrived shortly after 9:00 a.m., They were mostly postal inspectors, but a card on the dashboard of one vehicle indicated it was operated by the U.S. Department of Labor. ABC 7 has learned the investigators were searching employment records going back several years to determine on what days and at what times certain officers worked.

The headquarters was closed to the public during the four hours that the feds worked in side as citizens with routine business were turned away.

"Normally they tell me to come in and now they say to come back in a couple of hours," said Rene Morales.

Federal agents had no comment and the Melrose Park police chief was unavailable.

There have been some complaints about the private security company owned by the Melrose Park police chief, which has contracts to supply security for many bars and saloons as well as many other businesses.

Officers cooperated with federal agents. The feds apparently got everything they were looking for.

Melrose Park Police Department Shut Down For Federal Raid (WMAQ-TV)

WMAQ-TV, September 9, 2005

CHICAGO -- The Melrose Park Police Department was shut down Thursday morning as federal agents conducted a raid.

Federal agents came calling early and by 10 a.m., they had control of the building and were turning local citizens away.

City officials insisted no police calls were affected, Rogers reported.

"Those calls would come to my desk," said the mayor's assistant, Patty Dindia.

NBC5's Phil Rogers reported. The investigators came from the FBI and the IRS, as well as the postal inspectors and the U.S. Department of Labor.

The investigation has been lengthy and there are no signs it is nearing completion, Rogers reported. Melrose Park has had political turbulence in the past -- in the last election, the mayor's aunt ran against him.

Previously, NBC5 has reported that a $42 million water project in Melrose Park was under investigation, especially questions about a $432,000 public relations budget, as well as another $2.5 million for something called "program management."

But, it is believed that the federal agents on Thursday were seeking records relating to a private security firm operated by Melrose Park Police Chief Vito Scavo. Questions have been raised about what role Scavo's firm played in the water project, Rogers reported. Rogers reported that there have also been questions about Scavo's use of Melrose Park officers in his security company.

Warrants were executed separately at a Cumberland Avenue building housing a second security firm, with which Scavo allegedly has a relationship.

Mayor Ron Serpico was unavailable to answer questions about what exactly federal agents were seeking.

FBI Searches Suburban Police Department (CBS2CHI)

By Dorothy Tucker

CBS 2 Chicago, September 9, 2005

(CBS) MELROSE PARK A west suburban police department was temporarily shut down Thursday when federal agents raided the building searching for clues in an on-going corruption probe.

An investigation is underway right now in west suburban Melrose Park.

Sources tell CBS 2 News that the Melrose Park police chief is at the center of the investigation.

Federal agents from the Chicago office took over the Melrose Park police station Thursday morning, locking the doors and turning away residents.

For four hours the FBI agents, along with investigators from the labor department and the U.S. Postal Service, collected documents and information.

While authorities declined to talk about their investigation, sources tell CBS 2 that Melrose Park Police Chief Veto Scavo was the target of the raid.

Scavo is a paid consultant for a private security firm called IFPC Worldwide Inc.

According to the source, investigators are looking at a number of allegations, but the focus seems to be the Scavo was using on-duty police to work for the private firm, and possibly taking kick backs from clients.

The source said the officers were providing security for a number of businesses, including nightclubs. A nightclub manager, who declined to be interviewed, said Scavo forced bars to use his private firm and threatened not to answer their calls for help if they didn't.

The club manager believes that explains why investigators from the Department of Labor were at the police station, possibly looking at the time sheets of the Melrose Park police officers.

Late Thursday afternoon, CBS 2 contacted the police chief. Scavo pointed out that no one was arrested, but beyond that, he would not comment.

'Safe Road' Figure Sentenced In Bid-rigging Probe (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 9, 2005

Saying she regretted ever getting involved in "the world of politics and political favors," a former trusted lieutenant to one of the state's most powerful lobbyists was spared prison Thursday for lying to investigators in the Operation Safe Road probe.

Julie Starsiak, a longtime close aide to lobbyist Al Ronan, was placed on probation for 5 years and ordered to complete 200 hours of community service by U.S. District Judge Blanche Manning.

Ronan hasn't been charged with wrongdoing, but his lobbying firm, Ronan Potts LLC, pleaded guilty to rigging a bid so a client won a contract to oversee a huge expansion at McCormick Place.

In court Thursday, though, Starsiak's lawyer, Chris Gair, implicated Ronan in the wrongdoing, saying that Ronan directed Starsiak to divulge confidential details of the sealed bids to the Ronan client.

"It's just nonsense," Ronan's lawyer, Edward Genson, responded later to the accusation.

In pleading guilty last year to making false statements, Starsiak admitted she lied to authorities on several occasions by trying to shift blame in part to Ronan, even though she had been given immunity from prosecution if she told the truth.

Gair told the judge that Starsiak had been cooperating with authorities for almost two years, revealing "what she knows about political corruption in this state."

Starsiak had been a close aide to Ronan for more than two decades, including while he was a state legislator.

Starsiak's assistance led Alexandra Coutretsis to cooperate, which in turn resulted in her fiance, Scott Fawell, cooperating, Gair said. Fawell, who once headed the Metropolitan Pier and Exposition Authority, which operates McCormick Place, is expected to be the star witness against former Gov. George Ryan at his upcoming trial. Coutretsis was a top aide to Fawell at McPier.

In addition, Starsiak revealed corruption in "another public entity," Gair said.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Scott Levine called Starsiak's cooperation valuable and confirmed her help resulted in the opening of an investigation that "is bearing fruit."

Gair said Starsiak's assistance has come at a price, ostracizing her from former colleagues in the political realm and leaving her unemployed and penniless.

"There's nothing worse you can be in Chicago than a cooperator," Gair told the judge. "She's lost everything."

Starsiak, 57, of Chicago was so choked with emotion when she read from a prepared statement that her words were barely understandable at times.

Starsiak expressed remorse for ever becoming involved in politics.

"I used to be proud that from my humble background I had become professionally and in some cases even personally acquainted with the most wealthy and powerful people in the state," she said. "Perhaps I was naïve in thinking that associating with important people... I automatically assumed legitimacy and integrity."

Starsiak said her volunteer efforts for several charitable organizations "makes all the glamor of the world of business and politics seem unimportant by comparison."

Manning could have sentenced Starsiak to up to 21 months in prison, but she imposed probation, citing the "absolute toll" the case had taken on her.

"I don't think any more punishment is going to do anything more in a positive way," the judge said.

---

mo'connor@tribune.com

Lobbyist's Former Aide Gets Probation, Sorry She Got Into Politics (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

The Belleville News Democrat, September 9, 2005

CHICAGO - The former vice president of a prominent lobbying firm was put on probation for five years Thursday for lying to FBI agents about bid rigging involving the $800 million expansion of the McCormick Place convention center.

"I'm sorry that I ever became involved in the world of politics and political favors," a tearful Julie Starsiak told federal Judge Blanche M. Manning.

Starsiak, 57, pleaded guilty in February 2004 to making false statements to FBI agents who were investigating bid rigging in the competition to get the contract to manage the expansion.

She said she lied when she told them her boss, lobbyist and former state lawmaker Albert Ronan, was the one who called an engineering firm with confidential bidding information.

Starsiak now says that she made the call, although defense attorney Chris Gair told Manning that Ronan was part of the scheme.

Prominent Chicago defense attorney Edward M. Genson, who represents Ronan, immediately disputed Gair's claim.

"That's nonsense," Genson said when told about the lawyer's remark.

Ronan has been charged with no wrongdoing in the case, although his firm has pleaded guilty to mail fraud and paid a $350,000 fine.

Starsiak told Manning that with only a high school diploma she was awed that as Ronan's top aide she associated with the wealthiest and most powerful men in Illinois.

"Perhaps I was naive in thinking that associating with the most powerful and respected people automatically assumed their legitimacy and integrity," she said.

She said she wanted to devote the rest of her life to helping people and pleaded with Manning not to send her to prison - even though federal guidelines called 15 months minimum.

Manning said she thought Starsiak, who is now broke and has been jobless for two years, has learned her lesson and wouldn't commit further crimes.

"I don't think prison is the answer," said Manning, who ordered probation and 200 hours of community service.

Gair told the judge that Starsiak has done much to help federal prosecutors.

Gair said it was Starsiak's guilty plea that prompted Andrea Coutretsis to plead guilty in the bid-rigging investigation and admit that she gave the bidding information to Starsiak.

Coutretsis is the former assistant and current fiancee of former Gov. George Ryan's top aide, Scott Fawell, who is currently serving a 6 1/2-year racketeering sentence and has agreed to become the government's key witness at Ryan's upcoming trial on racketeering conspiracy charges.

Coutretsis persuaded Fawell to become a federal witness and Gair suggested that Starsiak deserved at least some credit for starting the chain of events that caused him to change sides.

Gair also said it was Starsiak who told prosecutors to investigate the Illinois Health Facilities Planning Board, which is now the focus of a major extortion and fraud investigation.

Daley Names Inspector General (CHIST/AP)

By MEGAN REICHGOTT, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 8, 2005

Mayor Richard M. Daley, struggling to clean up his administration's image amid an ongoing federal investigation of bribe-taking and political hiring, named a former federal prosecutor Thursday to be his new inspector general.

David Hoffman will take over for Alexander Vroustouris, who resigned in June amid allegations that investigations performed by his office were delayed and incomplete. Deputy Inspector General Bill Marback had been acting inspector general since Vroustouris resigned.

Vroustouris "did a good job. This is going to be a better job, simple as that," Daley said at a City Hall news conference to announce the change.

Eight members of Daley's Cabinet have either resigned or been fired since May as the mayor has worked to maintain the public's confidence. Federal investigators have been looking into City Hall for months, first examining bribes traded for jobs in a contract hauling program and most recently looking into allegations of fraud in the city's hiring practices.

Daley, who has not been accused of any wrongdoing, has acknowledged he has been questioned by federal prosecutors. Late last month, he apologized to the public and said he should have done more to prevent corruption in his administration.

Hoffman, 38, is a native of Chicago's north suburbs and has been an assistant U.S. attorney since 1998. For the past three years he has been deputy chief of the narcotics and gangs section.

"As a former federal prosecutor, David has the skills and experience necessary to root out corruption and help us maintain the highest ethical standards in city government," Daley said Thursday.

Daley "has asked only one thing of me: to take all necessary steps to find wrongdoing in city government and expose it," Hoffman said.

Hoffman has the authority to research corruption at all levels of city government, even if the inquiry leads back to City Hall, Daley said.

"Inspector General Hoffman has my full support and authority to root out and prevent misconduct, whether in hiring or contracts or wherever it occurs, so that the people of Chicago know that we are protecting them and putting their interests first," he said.

Daley said he would expand the powers and staff at the inspector general's office after Hoffman has some time on the job to make recommendations.

"The inspector general has to have sufficient staff to audit contracts, to determine compliance with the law and accountability to the taxpayers," Daley said. "And his office has to be equipped with the latest technology."

Daley Names New City Hall Watchdog (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Reports

Chicago Tribune, September 9, 2005

Mayor Richard Daley today named a Chicago-area native and federal prosecutor as his new inspector general, charged with ferreting out dishonesty and corruption in city government.

"I am confident that with our new inspector general, we will see great improvement in the ethics and integrity of city government," Daley said as he introduced David Hoffman at a City Hall news conference.

Hoffman, 38, has been an assistant U.S. attorney since 1998, deputy chief of its Narcotics and Gangs Section since 2002 and head of Project Safe Neighborhoods, a joint federal-city anti-crime initiative to keep parolees and probationers from committing gun crimes, since 2003.

He also is a former law clerk to the late U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

"The mayor has asked only one thing of me: To take all necessary steps to find wrongdoing in city government and to expose it," Hoffman said. Borrowing an oft-used phrase by U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald in exposing government corruption, Hoffman promised to "follow the evidence wherever it leads."

Eight members of Daley's Cabinet have either resigned or been fired since May as the mayor has worked to maintain the public's confidence. Federal investigators have been looking into City Hall for months, first examining bribes traded for jobs in a contract hauling program and most recently looking into allegations of fraud in the city's hiring practices.

Daley, who has not been accused of any wrongdoing, has acknowledged he has been questioned by federal prosecutors. Late last month, he apologized to the public and said he should have done more to prevent corruption in his administration.

Today, the mayor said that acting on Hoffman's recommendations, he would soon announce a series of changes that would expand the powers and staff of the inspector general's office.

Hoffman urged city employees to report wrongdoing.

"If you see corruption, if you see fraud, if you see dishonest practices, let us hear from you. Do not accept it silently," he said. "If your colleagues or superiors are using their positions corruptly or dishonestly, they are tarnishing you and the rest of city government."

"I can assure you as inspector general I will take nothing more seriously than going after those who would retaliate against employees courageous enough to turn in wrongdoers," Hoffman said.

A native of the northern suburbs, Hoffman has a bachelor's degree in history from Yale University and a law degree from the University of Chicago.

He replaces Inspector General Alexander Vroustouris, who had served in the post from 1989 until Ron Huberman, the mayor's chief of staff, requested Vroustouris' resignation in June. The former inspector general was accused of not acting quickly on cases of alleged corruption referred to his office.

Daley today also thanked Acting Inspector General Bill Marback for having substantially reduced a 3,000-case backlog since taking temporary charge of the office in June.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

Mirarchi Dodges Jail (PHI)

By BOB WARNER

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 9, 2005

A widely known defense attorney who admitted taking $7,000 in bribes in a parking-ticket scandal was spared a jail sentence yesterday by a federal judge.

Charles P. Mirarchi III, who cooperated with prosecutors and pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud, will have to spend six months under house arrest, pay a $5,000 fine and face additional restitution payments, U.S. District Judge Bruce W. Kauffman ruled.

Federal sentencing guidelines suggested an 18- to 24-month prison sentence.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy L. Kurland had urged a "significant downward departure" from the guidelines because of the critical testimony Mirarchi provided to convict a more-central participant in the ticket-fixing scam, Joseph F. Hoffman Jr.

Kauffman cited Mirarchi's "substantial and significant cooperation" with the prosecutors and wished Mirarchi "Good luck" after pronouncing the sentence.

The starting date for home detention was left to be worked out with federal marshals, who must arrange an electronic monitoring system.

Convicted in February of mail fraud, conspiracy and extortion, Hoffman drew a two-year prison sentence from Kauffman earlier this week.

Mirarchi, 54, a gregarious fixture in the city's criminal courts for the last 25 years, had functioned briefly as Hoffman's bagman, visiting the office of taxi kingpin Michael Etemad to pick up envelopes stuffed with $100 bills, a total of $7,000.

Hoffman kept $4,000 for himself and gave $3,000 to Mirarchi. In exchange, Hoffman took $47,127 worth of parking tickets issued to Etemad's cabs and reduced his fines to $3,500.

Two of Mirarchi's visits to Etemad were recorded on videotape by the FBI.

Mirarchi hovered close to tears yesterday as he addressed the judge, before the sentencing.

"I would like to apologize to this court... and to my family," Mirarchi said. "Sometimes you're asked if you had one thing to do over in your life. For some people, that's a hard question to answer. Not for me. I'm sorry for the judgment I used and the wrong I committed."

DOJ_NMG_0003810

Mirarchi was apparently relieved at his sentence, embracing many of the friends, family and fellow attorneys who had filled the courtroom to hear Kauffman's decision.

The parking-ticket scandal hung over Mirarchi's head for the past 2 ½ years, after the Daily News first reported his involvement in the Etemad payoffs.

But even after his indictment in June 2004, and his guilty plea last October, Mirarchi continued to represent criminal defendants and to draw a $37,893 city salary, as a deputy to the city's top election official, City Commissioner Margaret Tartaglione.

With the sentencing, Mirarchi is likely to lose both his city job and his license to practice law.

Lawyer Who Cooperated Is Sentenced In Ticket Fixing (PHI)

By L. Stuart Ditzen

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 9, 2005

The moral of the story yesterday in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Bruce W. Kauffman was this: He who admits his crime and diligently atones for it may hope for kindness at sentencing.

And so it was for Charles P. Mirarchi 3d, a popular Philadelphia defense lawyer who pleaded guilty to a fraud charge in a ticket-fixing scheme and cooperated with prosecutors in convicting his codefendant.

Although federal sentencing guidelines called for a sentence of 18 to 24 months in prison, Mirarchi ended up with three years' probation, the first six months to be served under house arrest.

Kauffman said he gave the 54-year-old Mirarchi a probationary sentence because of his "extremely significant cooperation with the government" in the investigation and prosecution of Joseph F. Hoffman Jr., the former head of the city parking-ticket appeals office.

Hoffman was sentenced on Wednesday to two years in prison for taking $5,000 in payoffs from taxicab magnate Michael Etemad to reduce $47,000 worth of parking tickets on Etemad's fleet to $3,500.

Mirarchi, the son of retired Common Pleas Court Judge Charles P. Mirarchi Jr., testified at Hoffman's trial in February that he acted as a go-between, carrying payoffs from Etemad to Hoffman in 2002. His testimony was supported by FBI audiotapes and videotapes.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy L. Kurland, who requested a significant sentencing break for Mirarchi, said she was pleased that he got probation.

"His information and assistance provided an inside view of Hoffman's ticket-fixing," Kurland said in a presentence memo to the judge. "And his honest and straightforward testimony at trial was essential to Hoffman's conviction."

Speaking briefly to Kauffman before the sentence, Mirarchi fought back tears as he apologized for his crime.

Martin M. Krimsky, a longtime Philadelphia lawyer who appeared as a character witness, testified: "I know of no person in the City of Philadelphia who is liked and loved more than Charles."

Krimsky said Mirarchi was generous "to a fault."

Which might be what got him in trouble.

Mirarchi testified in February that Hoffman asked him, as a favor, to pick up cash payments from Etemad and to pretend the money was a legal fee.

Mirarchi said he and Hoffman had grown up together in South Philadelphia and had been friends all their lives. So he did him the favor.

"It was wrong," he said. "I know it was wrong, and Hoffman knew it was wrong."

Mirarchi's conviction is likely to result in disbarment and the loss of his part-time city job as a deputy city commissioner. But as of yesterday, his law license was intact and he was still listed as a city employee.

FBI Removes Items From Councilman's Home (KARE-TV)

KARE-TV, September 9, 2005

FBI agents pulled up to the home of Minneapolis City Councilman Dean Zimmerman around 3 p.m. on Thursday afternoon.

Agents were executing a search warrant at the councilman's home. Zimmerman is a first-term representative for the 6th ward, which is located east of 35W between 24th Street East and Lake Street, in the Phillips neighborhood.

Neither the FBI or the Minneapolis Police, who were assisting in the removal of items from Zimmerman's home, would comment on the reason for the search warrant.

But during the three hours police and FBI officials were at the house, they were seen removing everything relating to Zimmermann's re-election campaign plus personal financial records.

The U.S. attorney's office also served Minneapolis City Hall with a subpoena for materials in Zimmerman's council office.

Zimmerman is a member of the green party. He is married with four children.

City Councilman's House Raided (WCCO-TV)

WCCO-TV, September 9, 2005

(WCCO) Federal agents searched a Minneapolis City Councilman's house Thursday afternoon, police said.

According to officials, the corruption division of the FBI searched G. Dean Zimmerman's house, in the 2200 block of Clinton Ave. S.

The FBI said they executed a "court-authorized federal search warrant as part of an ongoing federal investigation."

Federal agents left the house carrying several boxes, folders and computers containing materials related to his re-election campaign and financial records.

Zimmerman was unavailable for comment, but his campaign manager Lauren Maker said the agents spent three hours at his house.

"They took primarily, everything related to the campaign," Maker said. "The took our mailing labels, they took our voter id list."

Maker said she believed the search was politically motivated because it was so close to the election.

The search came five days before the primary elections. Zimmerman is running for a second term on the city council.

Because of redistricting, Zimmerman, first-term a Green Party member is in the same ward as council vice president Robert Lilligren, DFL.

When campaign volunteers came out to help prepare a mailing Thursday evening, an FBI agent at the door turned them away. Zimmerman was reportedly home during the search and met with his defense attorney in the evening.

He has not been charged with any crime.

Zimmerman, a retired teacher, has served as commissioner of the Minneapolis Park and Recreations Board, a board member of the Middle Mississippi River Watershed Management Organization, a board member of the St. Anthony Falls Heritage Board and a board secretary of the Green Institute.

A Top HAWS Official Pleads Not Guilty (WSJ)

By Bertrand M. Gutierrez

Winston-Salem Journal, September 9, 2005

A senior official with the Housing Authority of Winston-Salem pleaded not guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court here to three felony charges: stealing, embezzlement and money laundering.

Federal prosecutors filed the charges Aug. 30 against Kenneth Love, the assistant director of housing services for the housing authority, after a four-year investigation by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the FBI.

The same charges were filed against a Virginia businessman, Sylvester Clay, who pleaded not guilty on Tuesday.

Trials for both men are scheduled for February.

Federal investigators say that Love and Clay worked together to bid on contracts and get paid for phantom jobs through Clay's maintenance companies.

Telephone calls to Reid Law-rence, the executive director of the housing authority, were not returned yesterday or Wednesday. James Rousseau, the chairman of the board of commissioners of the authority, also has not returned telephone calls.

Sherrod Banks, an attorney representing the authority, said Wednesday that Love was on sick leave.

At the courthouse yesterday, Love said "no comment" when asked if he was ill. Nor would he talk about the case.

A spokeswoman with HUD, which determines the amount of money that the housing authority may get for projects, would not say whether the department was taking or might take any action against the local agency.

"Usually, we don't comment on ongoing investigations," HUD spokeswoman Denise Dunckel said. Later in the day, the authority issued a press release in which it never referred to the charges against Love, but only cited the allegations against Clay.

"HAWS is disturbed by these allegations. However, this is still a continuing investigation both outside HAWS and within HAWS," the press release said.

Banks said he planned to meet today with housing officials to discuss his view of the charges and any possible action that HAWS might take.

Bribe-case Builder Has 2d Arrest (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 9, 2005

NEPTUNE, N.J. - A developer accused of bribing officials in Monmouth County has been charged with threatening a 22-year-old woman at gunpoint in a community-college parking lot.

Anthony Spalliero, 63, fled when an officer at the Middletown campus of Brookdale Community College heard the woman scream about 1:30 p.m. Tuesday, college spokesman Stephen Nacco said.

Spalliero had put a gun against the woman's ribs and told her to come with him, Nacco said.

"I would say that's total nonsense," Spalliero's lawyer, Michael Pappa, told the Asbury Park Press of Neptune for yesterday's editions.

Spalliero, of Marlboro, was arrested Tuesday outside his former wife's home in Holmdel. He was charged with possession of a weapon for an unlawful purpose, making terroristic threats, and aggravated assault, the Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office said.

The weapons charge carries the stiffest penalty, up to 10 years in prison. Spalliero was released Wednesday after posting $150,000 bail.

The arrest may affect Spalliero's bail status on the bribery charges, because he was required to surrender all firearms.

In May, Spalliero was arrested by the FBI and charged with passing bribes, including offering then-Mayor Matthew V. Scannapieco of Marlboro about $143,500 from 2001 to 2003.

Scannapieco, mayor from 1992 to 2003, pleaded guilty April 12 to taking $245,000 from a developer between 1997 and 2003 in return for supporting the developer's projects.

Spalliero was also charged with paying $8,500 from 2001 to 2003 to Monmouth County's top elected official. The FBI complaint did not give the official's name, but the freeholder director then was Harry Larrison Jr., who was charged in April with taking $8,500 in bribes from developers in Marlboro.

Larrison, 78, of Neptune, retired in December and died May 29. His 39 years in office made him the longest-serving freeholder in state history.

Former Kodak Executive Charged In Bribery Probe (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, September 9, 2005

ROCHESTER, N.Y. -- A former executive at Eastman Kodak Co. on Thursday became the fourth person charged in a multimillion-dollar scheme that federal prosecutors claim defrauded the company and suburban Rochester taxpayers.

David Finnman faces two felony counts of mail fraud and one count of conspiracy to defraud. He worked at Kodak from 1970 to 1999.

The alleged fraud happened when tax assessments for Kodak's property in Greece were illegally lowered and the defendants shared the kickbacks.

The FBI said Finnman and co-defendant Charles Schwab, a former Greece assessor, created a business in the Bahamas around February 1998 to hide bribes and kickbacks paid by co-defendant John Nicolo, a regional appraiser.

Investigators claim Finnman and Schwab each admitted receiving about $200,000 and investing it in an offshore account.

The new charges said another company, Global Crossing, was the victim of fraud because Finnman worked there until 2003.

Mark Camarata, Finnman's successor, was the first person charged in the case in May. He was scheduled for a court appearance on Sept. 22.

Finnman's lawyer, Matthew Lembke, could not be reached for comment.

___

Information from: Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, http://www.democratandchronicle.com

Lt. Gov. Now Says He Never Talked To Cooper About Loan (AP)

By MATT GOURAS, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2005

NASHVILLE — Tennessee's lieutenant governor has changed his position on whether he talked to a fellow lawmaker about a bank loan now involved in a federal fraud trial.

Lt. Gov. John Wilder said Wednesday that he was incorrect when he said last week that he had talked with Sen. Jerry Cooper about getting a loan at Wilder's bank.

Wilder has been the subject of heavy criticism since he showed up last week at a hearing held to discuss Cooper and the loan.

Cooper, a Democrat from Smartt, is an unindicted co-conspirator in a federal indictment alleging fraud against two men involved in the sale of property owned by Cooper.

Wilder left the meeting of the Senate Ethics Subcommittee, which was not announced to the public, when reporters showed up and pressed to be allowed entry.

But before leaving, Wilder recounted his role in the loan to reporters, saying Cooper approached him about having BankTennessee, which Wilder partly owns, underwrite the $1.77 million loan when the deal was first going down in the late 1990s.

The resulting land deal led to federal indictments charging Anthony and Teresa Auyer of Alabama, who purchased Cooper's lumber mill property in Warren County, and property appraiser James Passons.

On Wednesday, Wilder changed his story and said he "would like to set the record straight."

"While it has been over six years ago, it is my conviction that I did not talk to Sen. Jerry Cooper about this matter," Wilder said. "I was mistaken when I said I talked to Sen. Jerry Cooper. To the extent I indicated otherwise, I was in error."

The position is a big change from last week when Wilder said he was certain he had talked to Cooper.

At that time, Wilder first told The Associated Press and others that he had not talked to Cooper. But he quickly changed his mind in the next sentence, and went on to say, "Sen. Cooper asked me if my bank would be interested in making the loan. I told him I thought it would and ... (Auyer) called my bank."

Wilder was adamant he did not influence the loan and did not pressure the bank to make the loan.

Wilder was clear that Cooper had talked to him, though, further saying "he asked me if my bank may be interested in making a loan to this person that he sold his plant to. I told Sen. Cooper it might be, and he told this gentlemen that they might be and he talked to them and that's where it started."

Wilder reiterated that position two days later, on Friday telling The (Memphis) Commercial Appeal newspaper that he did nothing more than refer Cooper to BankTennessee executives.

"My offhanded remarks simply were not correct," Wilder now says.

Wilder, 83, has served longer as the presiding officer of a state legislative body than any other person in the nation. He was first elected to the state Senate in 1959 for a two-year term, but then was out of office until winning election again in 1966 to another two-year term. Wilder, a Democrat from Mason, won his first four-year Senate term in 1968 and has been speaker since 1971.

Tennessee Republican Party Chairman Bob Davis, a Wilder critic, said the Senate speaker's latest comments illustrate the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0003814

"I guess everybody can change their mind. What's different is that this fellow is lieutenant governor, a career politician who out of convenience and habit has made a career out of covering his tracks," Davis said. "This is exactly why Tennesseans have lost trust in their state government."

It's the second time this year that Wilder has backtracked from public comments.

In May, right after the Tennessee Waltz sting that nabbed five current and former lawmakers, Wilder criticized the FBI for "entrapping" the indicted legislators. A week later, he said the remarks were meant to express only his belief that "entrapment is wrong."

PAC Linked To DeLay Indicted In Funding Probe (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — A Texas grand jury today indicted a political action committee affiliated with House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), alleging that it took illegal campaign contributions during the 2002 election that led to a historic realignment of the Texas Legislature.

The charges, which include indictments against one of the state's oldest and largest employer groups, arise out of a more than two-year probe by local prosecutors into the use of corporate money to bankroll Republican candidates for state office.

The indictments allege violations of a state law that bans corporate contributions to state legislative candidates.

DeLay, one of the most powerful figures in Congress, was not named in the indictment, although three individuals associated with the political action committee, known as the Texans for a Republican Majority, were indicted last year.

In a statement, the House leader said the allegations were "limited to a political organization," but also acknowledged that he had "voluntarily" spoken with investigators last month at the Travis County district attorney's office who are overseeing the probe.

"Mr. DeLay explained to officials what he has always said publicly: his role ... was limited to serving on the political action committee's advisory board along with other elected Texas officials and to appearing at fundraising events," spokesman Kevin Madden said. "Mr. DeLay assured the district attorney's office that he was not involved in the day to day operations ... and to his knowledge all activities were properly reviewed and approved by lawyers" for the political action committee.

The indictments unsealed today alleged that the Texas Assn. of Business and the Texans for a Republican Majority worked together in a complicated arrangement to circumvent the state's election code.

Ronald Earle, the Travis County district attorney, said "massive amounts of secret corporate wealth" were illegally funneled into the coffers of Republican candidates during the 2002 campaign. The business group was charged with fraudulently soliciting money from corporations, and making illegal contributions, in violation of state election law.

The political action committee was charged with illegally soliciting and accepting corporate contributions, including contributions from AT&T Corp. and a group calling itself the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care.

Roy Minton, an attorney for the business group, said the state was attempting to criminalize activity that is protected by federal law. According to the indictments, the group paid more than $1.1 million in corporate money for mailings to voters and television advertising.

"The indictments leave out all the federal law that there is as to the constitutional right of any business to inform the public concerning the voting record or any conduct on the part of candidates for office," Minton said. "That is not something that can be regulated by the state through its election code."

DeLay PAC Is Indicted For Illegal Donations (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

A grand jury in Texas indicted yesterday a state political action committee organized by House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for accepting $120,000 in allegedly illegal corporate campaign contributions shortly before and after the 2002 elections that helped Republicans cement their control of the House of Representatives.

DOJ_NMG_0003815

The indictment follows a lengthy investigation in Austin that previously had targeted the defunct political action committee's executive director, John Colyandro. He was indicted last year for accepting illegal corporate donations and for illegally laundering $190,000 in corporate funds through the Republican National State Elections Committee that later wound up in the hands of Texas Republican candidates.

The criminal charges are based on a Texas election law, akin to rules in 17 other states, that strictly bars political contributions from corporations for election purposes. But according to evidence submitted in a related civil trial, the committee, Texans for a Republican Majority (TRMPAC), raised and spent at least $523,000 in corporate funds -- most of which were not reported to state election officials.

The funds paid for surveys, mailings, receptions, candidate investigations and probes of Democratic candidates that helped Republicans gain control of the Texas House for the first time in 130 years, and enabled them to redraw the state's congressional districts in 2003 in such a way that Texas voters elected five more Republicans to Congress in 2004.

DeLay, who was a member of the committee's advisory board, signed fundraising solicitations and participated in at least one conference call to discuss the committee's plans, was not named in the indictment. He also has not been publicly identified as a target of the continuing investigation by Travis County District Attorney Ronald Earle.

DeLay spokesman Kevin Madden responded to the indictment with a written statement saying that it "is limited to a political organization and does not affect Mr. DeLay."

Madden also disclosed for the first time that DeLay had "voluntarily" talked to Earle's office about the investigation last month, and that DeLay said then that his involvement in the committee's activities was "limited to serving on the political action committee's advisory board along with other elected Texas officials and . . . appearing at fundraising events."

Madden said DeLay "assured the district attorney's office that he was not involved in the day-to-day operations of TRMPAC, and to his knowledge all activities were properly reviewed and approved by lawyers" for the committee.

When asked yesterday about DeLay, however, Earle said at a news conference that he was hampered in bringing charges by a provision of the election law that gives him direct authority only over residents of Travis County. He has separately said he does not face that limitation with respect to bringing new charges under the state money-laundering statute.

DeLay's residence is in Fort Bend County, where the prosecutor is an elected Republican, John F. Healey Jr. If Earle found evidence of criminal wrongdoing by DeLay under the election statute, he could only pass on the information to Healey with a recommendation that he pursue the matter.

Earle has not done so, several sources said yesterday, but has until the end of this month to decide the matter under a three-year statute of limitations.

The grand jury singled out two contributions that it said the committee illegally accepted -- a $20,000 contribution from AT&T Corp. on Nov. 18, 2002, and a $100,000 contribution from the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care Inc. on Oct. 24, 2002. The latter donation generated considerable controversy in Texas political circles after local newspapers reported that state Rep. Tom Craddick accepted it in a white envelope from the head of a large Texas nursing home chain during a meeting at a Houston restaurant.

Craddick's attorney, Roy Q. Minton, said that Craddick -- who was later elected speaker of the House and in that role oversaw the redrawing of congressional districts -- immediately passed the check along to TRMPAC. "Just because the guy happens to be speaker of the House does not mean it's against the law," Minton said.

Terry Scarborough, an attorney for TRMPAC before it formally went out of business this summer, declined to comment on the committee's indictment. Four additional indictments by the grand jury separately accused the Texas Association of Business with accepting additional illegal corporate funds and coordinating its expenditure with TRMPAC. Attorneys for the association have denied wrongdoing.

Political Committee Formed By DeLay Is Indicted (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003816

AUSTIN, Tex., Sept. 8 (AP) - A grand jury has indicted a political organization formed by the House majority leader, Representative Tom DeLay, accusing it of taking illegal corporate money as he helped Republicans win control of the Texas Legislature and keep control of Congress.

Mr. DeLay, a Republican, was not indicted by a Travis County grand jury in the charges made public Thursday, although three of his political associates were charged earlier.

District Attorney Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, said he had no jurisdiction over Mr. DeLay's personal conduct. Kevin Madden, Mr. DeLay's spokesman, said the majority leader played only a limited role in the organization, Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee. Mr. DeLay served on its advisory board and appeared at fund-raising events, Mr. Madden said.

A complaint filed last year with the House ethics committee said Mr. DeLay's activities with political action committees violated House rules, but the panel deferred action on the complaint.

The charge against Texans for a Republican Majority accuses it of illegally accepting a contribution of $100,000 from the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care and of $20,000 from AT&T. A prominent statewide business group, the Texas Association of Business, was also charged, in what Mr. Earle called an effort to funnel "massive amounts of secret corporate wealth" into Texas political campaigns.

State law prohibits use of corporate contributions to advocate election or defeat of state candidates.

No individuals in the business group were indicted.

The indictments accuse the Texas Association of Business and the political action committee of working together in a complicated scheme to circumvent state law.

Four indictments against the Texas Association of Business include charges of unlawful political advertising, unlawful contributions to a political committee and unlawful expenditures like those to a graphics company and political candidates.

The association, which is influential at the Texas Capitol, spent about $1.7 million in corporate money for mailings in 2002. The group said it was trying to educate voters on issues, which is legal, not advocate the election or defeat of any candidates.

A lawyer for the association, Roy Minton, said it acted under protections of the First Amendment, which "gives individuals and their businesses the absolute right to inform the public of the conduct of our elected officials and the conduct of candidates for public office."

Last fall, the grand jury indicted three officials of Texans for a Republican Majority: John Colyandro of Austin, and Jim Ellis and Warren Robold of Washington, D.C. All are now awaiting trial.

Texas Groups Linked To DeLay Indicted In Scandal (REU-Y2)

By Erwin Seba

Reuters, September 9, 2005

A Texas grand jury has indicted a political action committee formed by U.S. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay as well as a powerful business group on charges they violated the state's campaign finance laws, officials said on Thursday.

The indictments, five in all, accuse Texans for a Republican Majority, or TRMPAC, and the Texas Association of Business (TAB) of illegally funneling corporate donations into a 2002 campaign to win control of the Texas Legislature.

DeLay helped create the committee, but he has not been charged with any wrongdoing, and has said he was not involved in TRMPAC's daily operations.

A statement from his office on Thursday said he met with Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle last week and explained his limited role in the committee.

"Today's announcement is limited to a political organization and does not affect Mr. DeLay," the statement said.

Three men with close ties to DeLay were indicted last year for illegal fund-raising activities by TRMPAC.

In a civil case earlier this year, a Texas judge found that TRMPAC did not disclose nearly $600,000 it received from corporations.

Texas law forbids the use of corporate donations in political campaigns.

Earle has said DeLay is under investigation and a spokesman for him said on Thursday the investigation into illegal campaign finances continues.

In a statement, Earle said, "All five of these indictments involve the misuse of corporate money to influence Texas elections in 2002."

"They contain allegations that TAB and TRMPAC worked together in a complicated scheme to circumvent the election code by funneling massive amounts of secret corporate wealth into elections," he said.

TRMPAC's efforts helped Republicans capture the Texas Legislature for the first time since the Reconstruction era after the U.S. Civil War.

The shift led to a remapping of the state's congressional districts which ultimately increased the Republican majority in the U.S. House.

DeLay has been under fire over ethics questions involving fund raising, foreign travel and his relationship with lobbyists.

TAB's attorney Roy Minton said the organization did not violate the law and was merely exercising its free speech rights under the U.S. Constitution's First Amendment.

"At no time did the TAB endorse any candidate, seek any political contribution or campaign expenditure," Minton said.

Missouri Senators Want To Close Loophole For Sexual Predators (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - Missouri's senators want to close a legal loophole they say allowed a Missouri judge to throw out a conviction of a sexual predator.

Sens. Kit Bond and Jim Talent, both Republicans, introduced a bill Thursday that makes it a crime to solicit sex online from a minor even if the person solicited is an undercover agent over 18.

The move is a response to the case of Jan P. Helder, a Mission Hills, Kan., attorney accused of using an Internet chat service to solicit sex from someone he believed to be a 14-year-old girl.

A federal jury convicted Helder, 42, but U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple in Kansas City threw out the verdict last month, saying Helder could not be guilty because the person he communicated with online was actually an undercover Platte County detective.

Whipple's decision outraged children's advocates who worried it could curb the success of such Internet stings. Undercover agents typically pose as minors, waiting for sex offenders to make contact and arrange in-person meetings.

"This may in the minds of predators create a loophole and I think we should try and plug that loophole as quickly as possible by any means possible," Talent said.

Don Ledford, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Todd Graves in Kansas City, said the government plans to appeal Whipple's decision. Ledford said the office would have no other comment on the decision or the legislation because the case is pending.

At least four federal appeals courts have rejected the type of defense used by Helder, but those decisions are not binding on Whipple. The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Missouri, has not yet addressed the issue.

Under the change proposed by Bond and Talent, federal law would expressly provide that communicating with a law enforcement officer pretending to be a child is not a defense. Such language is already included in state law in Missouri.

"If there is a hole in the law that needs to be fixed in order to protect our children from predators, we must act now," Bond said in a statement.

Kansas Rep. Jim Ryun has written a letter urging the Justice Department to appeal Whipple's ruling, saying it is contrary to a number of other court cases.

"If permitted to stand, the practical impact of such a ruling would have devastating consequences for prosecutions of child predators who troll the Internet looking for children to entice and ultimately harm," Ryun said in the letter.

City To Request A Federal Audit (PSDS)

By Nelsy Rodriguez, The Desert Sun

Palm Springs (CA) Desert Sun, September 8, 2005

DESERT HOT SPRINGS - The Desert Hot Springs City Council voted unanimously to ask the U.S. Department of Justice to look into the city's accounts for the past five years.

DOJ_NMG_0003818

Interim City Manager Corky Larson said she was approached by city residents in the past month who suggested that the city - growing fast, but struggling with City Hall openness and budget issues - ask for a Department of Justice forensic audit.

"If there's a concern out there hopefully there won't be a problem, but if there is, then we'll find it," Larson said.

The council, meeting in closed session for about two hours, took the vote then and and reported it during a public session that ran late into the night.

Councilman Hank Hohenstein made the motion for the vote, and it was seconded by Will Pieper, interim city attorney Toni Eggebraaten said.

Asked what types of things the citizens asked for the Department of Justice to look at, Larson said one example might be building fees, but she would not elaborate.

Desert Hot Springs - exploding with residential growth - has in recent years been collecting millions in building fees, which are required by state law to be deposited in particular city accounts.

Any audit performed would check all revenue and expense flows for the city, receipts, contracts and ensure that any fees associated with planning and building the thousands of new homes going up in the scenic city at the base of the mountains were sent to the appropriate budget accounts.

During a break in the meeting Wednesday night, Larson said she would write the letter to the Department of Justice today.

Larson, an attorney and retired Riverside County Supervisor after whom the Riverside County Larson Justice Center is named, said she didn't know how long a Department of Justice investigation would take.

"Knowing the federal government, it could take a while," Larson said.

Larson said the citizens - not city staff or councilmembers - who approached her suggested the Department of Justice as opposed to another type of audit.

"That was their suggestion. We might as well take advantage of this service," she said.

The Department of Justice investigation vote was just one controversial issue on the agenda for the meeting, which was packed with citizens, some carrying signs demanding a recall of some city council members.

Also in the mix for the meeting were:

The planned presentation of recall papers to Vice Mayor Mary Stephens and Hohenstein, by a group led by citizen Patrick Gillespie;

An unusual vote that would make retired city manager Jerry Hanson's final contract null and void;

Discussion in closed session of two candidates for Hanson's job, known only as "Candidate A" and "Candidate B" in a Labor Day public forum for residents.

The city of 19,500 residents has been embroiled in controversy over the compensation for Hanson, who retired July 31.

Hanson questions In addition to Hanson's 10 employment contracts since 2003, which he wrote himself and which garnered him 1,700 hours of vacation and sick time compensation in 20 months, questions have been raised about his land holdings near the $1 billion StoneRidge development he negotiated for the city.

A Riverside County grand jury is reviewing testimony and has been sent three requests for investigations into city matters, including a request about Hanson's contracts, a request about Hanson's possible conflict of interest in land holdings and a request about Hohenstein's possible conflict of interest on his vote to approve StoneRidge.

If the final consultant's contract is not rejected and the benefits on the contract rack up, Desert Hot Springs would have to pay Hanson every month until 2008:

$7,725 for a minimum of 15 hours of work a week;

$1,128 for use-only vacation;

$1,030 for an additional eight hours of vacation a month;

$1,030 for an additional eight hours of annual leave a month;

$2,000 for a monthly deferred compensation;

$760 for health and dental insurance;

$675 for monthly expenses;

$265 for a 100-gallons gasoline stipend;

$578 for monthly payment on a $200,000 whole life insurance policy;

$27.27 for education and training; organization and membership fees to be paid without limit;

$850 for office supplies and equipment; and

a one-time $40,000 "golden handshake."

On top of that, the contract contains a clause that, as written, assures Hanson would receive approximately $16,320 a month for his retirement.

Worded as "All current or future PERS contributions required to provide the Employee/ Consultant his most recent PERS estimates for PERS retirement benefits shall be paid by the City."

The "most recent PERS estimate" was valued at approximately $20,000.

However, upon reviewing un-accounted for pay raises by as much as 87 percent in 2004, CalPERS determined Hanson would only receive $3,680.

Meaning, the difference "shall be paid by the City."

In a letter to CalPERS, Hanson requested the agency re-review his retirement allowance, saying his work of pulling the city out of bankruptcy, working in excess of 3,000 hours a year, holding five positions and being a licensed engineer and architect are deserving of a larger retirement.

"The majority of the City Council wanted me to continue on after my contract expiration in Feb. 12, 2005," Hanson wrote in the letter dated Aug. 15. "I only resigned as city manager due to vicious and deceptive politics in the local media damaging mine and my family's good name."

Hanson's attorney, Edward Kotkin, was unavailable for comment Wednesday afternoon.

The media scrutiny began in March when the city confirmed to all media outlets that he earned $322,809 in 2004 (the same year he drafted an 87 percent pay increase into his contract and passed it unanimously through the City Council) after his W-2 tax form was leaked to a local TV news channel.

The scrutiny continued as The Desert Sun then reported in April that Hanson bought property along a road that he later negotiated $600,000 worth of street improvements as a condition for recommending the City Council approve an upscale housing development.

Recall drive Angered by Hanson's generous contracts, especially his final consultant's contract, citizens in the city that just emerged from a three-year bankruptcy have obtained the initial signatures on formal recall forms for the councilmembers who voted for the contracts consistently.

A group of citizens led by Patrick Gillespie has promised to present Stephens and Hohenstein with recall papers. The two were among those voting to approve Hanson's final contract, which appears to guarantee that the city will pay $195,000 a year for life in retirement benefits the state has refused to pay in addition to $180,000 a year through Feb. 2006 even if Hanson performs no work.

The median annual income in

Desert Hot Springs is about $29,500 a year.

Once the recall papers are filed and initial signatures are verified, recall supporters must obtain about 1,800 valid signatures for the recall to take place.

Orange County Deputy Sheriff Arrested (ORS)

Pedro Ruz Gutierrez Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, September 9, 2005

An Orange County deputy sheriff indicted on federal embezzlement charges was arrested today by deputy U.S. marshals and relieved of duty without pay, authorities said.

Deputy Tawanda McNeil, a four-year veteran, was assigned to the agency's uniform patrol division in the agency's Sector 2, which covers east Orange County.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando said a federal grand jury indicted McNeil on Wednesday on 18 counts of embezzlement related to payments she erroneously received when the U.S. military called her up for duty.

DOJ_NMG_0003820

McNeil was not activated and was not entitled to the the payments, said Carolyn Adams, chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando.

The amounts covered by the indictment total about $23,000.

Red Lake Seeks Items Seized By FBI (MINNST)

By Chuck Haga, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 9, 2005

Red Lake's school district has gone to federal court to seek recovery of documents and equipment seized by the FBI during its investigation of the March 21 shootings on the reservation, in part to protect itself against potential liability lawsuits.

In a motion filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis, the district said it needs the return of security video footage, education records of shooter Jeffrey Weise, witness statements of district employees and computer hard drives, among other things.

Those materials are "crucial," according to the filing, for the district to evaluate its security system and procedures in effect on March 21 "and to defend against likely lawsuits."

A spokesman for the clerk of court's office confirmed that it had received documents from the district's attorney.

It had not been determined whether the motion would be filed as part of the ongoing juvenile proceeding or as a separate matter.

After seizing the school district materials, the computers and other personal possessions of some Red Lake students, the U.S. attorney's office arrested one other student -- Louis Jourdain, son of Red Lake Tribal Chairman Floyd Jourdain Jr. -- and subpoenaed other students to appear before a federal grand jury.

A judge late last month ruled that Louis Jourdain, who was 16 at the time of the shootings, should be tried as a juvenile. Prosecutors have not said what Jourdain is accused of doing, but a source with knowledge of the case has said the boy is charged with conspiracy to commit murder.

Shamus O'Meara, a Twin Cities attorney who represents the Red Lake district, said that no suits stemming from the shootings have been filed against the district, but that two law firms "representing at least 18 families and individuals" have advised it they're considering liability suits.

"The district faces the very likely prospect of being involved in litigation with multiple plaintiffs," O'Meara said.

"We are respectful of the federal role in this [case] and its investigation," he said. "But there shouldn't be competing interests here. There should be a way to balance the interests of the federal government with the district's interest in [conducting] a complete evaluation."

He said the school district "has tried on several occasions" to obtain the return of the materials, which were seized in the days immediately after the school shootings, in which Weise, 16, killed eight people, including himself. Weise had killed two others before going to the school.

The federal investigators "basically told us to seek access to the materials through the Freedom of Information Act," O'Meara said. "We did that, and it was denied.

"From the district's perspective, this is a last resort. We hope that when the U.S. attorney's office gets a chance to read our motion, they'll give us a call and work this out."

U.S. Attorney Thomas Heffelfinger said late Thursday that he had not seen the district's motion and could not comment.

A thorough investigation into the security arrangements the district had in place on March 21 "is particularly important," according to the district's filing, "because certain individuals have criticized the district's camera system in place at the time."

The district "also has been unable to investigate Jeff Weise's psychological and educational records to determine the extent of the information in the district's possession prior to the incident."

In an affidavit with the filing, Red Lake Superintendent Stuart Desjarlait noted that the FBI has returned several of the district's computers, "but without hard drives."

DOJ_NMG_0003821

Weise's student records sought by the district include records maintained during the 2004-05 school year by his instructor in a homebound program "and, possibly, a report involving Jeff Weise authored by a psychiatrist from Indian Health Services," according to the filing.

FBI Pressed To Share Red Lake Evidence (STPPP)

By JIM RAGSDALE, Pioneer Press

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 9, 2005

The Red Lake School District, facing hundreds of workers' compensation claims from employees and the possibility of multiple lawsuits, is seeking to view a complete video record of a student's killing spree at Red Lake High School as well as the killer's academic and psychological records.

Those materials, the district said in a motion filed on Thursday, were among the items seized by the FBI immediately after the March 21 shootings. Eight people died at the school, including the shooter, 16-year-old student Jeff Weise, who took his own life. Seven were injured. Weise had killed his grandfather and his grandfather's partner at home before assaulting the school.

Shamus O'Meara, a Minneapolis attorney who is representing the school district in the shootings and expected legal claims, said federal officials have declined to make the materials available, and he has failed at attempts to use freedom-of-information laws to view them.

"There is an immediate need to thoroughly review the District's security system to ensure the protection of staff and students from incidents of violence," the school district said in its motion. The district is asking a federal judge to allow the district to view the materials.

U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is leading the criminal investigation into the shootings, said he had not yet reviewed the papers and could not comment on the district's request. The criminal case against a second 16-year-old student, Louis Jourdain, suspected of helping plot the assault is still pending.

According to the district's court filings, video cameras in the school recorded what a technician described as "graphic and detailed incidents of the murder scene." The district retained a copy, but it is a shortened version without all the available camera angles, O'Meara said, and the district wants to view copies held by federal investigators.

The school district said it is also seeking access to educational records for Weise, who was at home that day on the school's homebound instruction program. Included in the district's request are records from the teacher who visited Weise at home during the school year. The district also said it believes the FBI has a psychiatrist's report on Weise.

"The district's perspective is that these are important items of information to have so that we can cogently speak to the issues of security, with the school board, with the district staff, as well as the community," O'Meara said. "Without them, we simply have not done the job we need to do to fully evaluate that system."

In the court papers, the district said "several hundred workers' compensation claims" have been filed against the district over the shootings. The papers suggested that many lawsuits are possible, and said groups of victims' families, school employees and parents of students in one classroom all are consulting attorneys.

O'Meara is also representing the Rocori school district in the aftermath of a school shooting that killed two students at Rocori High School in September 2003. He said in that case, materials were made available by the state to the school district under a judge's order, which prohibited copying or public dissemination of some documents.

The court papers filed by the school district say federal agents seized dozens of school computers and were given maps and blueprints of the school, a student directory with parents' phone numbers, attendance on the day of the shooting and locker combinations for each student.

Jim Ragsdale can be contacted at jragsdale@pioneerpress.com or 651-228-5529.

Student Jeff Weise, 16, took his life March 21 after killing 10 people in Red Lake, Minn.

Man Gets Prison Over Child Porn (TUSCCIT)

By HEIDI ROWLEY, Tucson Citizen

Tucson Citizen, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003822

A Tucson martial arts instructor has been sentenced to 2.5 years in federal prison for possessing hundreds of child pornography images.

David Michael Lader, 41 will also be fined $30,000 followed by lifetime supervised release with sex offender conditions, a U.S. Attorney's Office news release said. He was ordered to provide a DNA sample.

Lader pleaded guilty to possessing more than 300 child pornography images on his home computer. Many were acquired over the Internet and involved children younger than 12, officials said. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents arrested him in April 2004. Lader, who is not in custody, must surrender to U.S. marshals Oct. 12.

In delivering the sentence yesterday, U.S. District Judge Raner Collins noted that at the time of the crime, Lader was a registered sex offender yet was teaching children and adults.

He worked at the Tucson Racquet & Fitness Club and through The Dojang martial arts school, according to Tucson Citizen archives.

Lader has two misdemeanor indecent exposure convictions in Ohio from 1992, the Citizen previously reported.

Rural Vs. City Ways At Issue In A Wisconsin Murder Trial (NYT)

By Gretchen Ruethling

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

MADISON, Wis., Sept. 8 - A jury was chosen in this liberal bastion on Thursday for the trial of a Hmong immigrant charged with killing six hunters, causing consternation in the North Woods, where the shootings took place.

Some residents of Rice Lake, where all the victims lived or grew up, said they were concerned that the jurors from Dane County, which encompasses Madison, might not grasp the nuances of rural life.

"They are not as rural, and their culture and their lifestyle is quite different from ours up here in the north," said Renee Gralewicz, an ethnic studies instructor at the Rice Lake campus of the University of Wisconsin. "So we might have some people who really don't understand the culture of hunting and the etiquette and the ethics and how all of that plays out on the jury."

Judge Norman L. Yackel of Sawyer County Circuit Court ruled in June that the jury for the trial of the immigrant, Chai Soua Vang, would be chosen from Dane County after the defense argued that publicity and strong emotions in the Rice Lake area jeopardized Mr. Vang's chances for a fair trial.

The concern about the composition of the jury stems in part from the racial overtones of the case. Mr. Vang, 36, a refugee from Laos who lived in St. Paul, Minn., told police that he had been sitting in a tree stand on private hunting land about 25 miles northeast of Rice Lake one Sunday last November when the hunters, who were white, swore at him and used ethnic slurs.

Mr. Vang said he shot at the hunters after someone shot at him first.

"The rest of the group scramble for something at the ATV so I shot them at the ATV and ran toward them because I thought that they will get something a gun to shoot me," Mr. Vang wrote in a letter from jail to a reporter for The Chicago Tribune. The letter has been admitted as evidence in the case. "I feel that this incident is happen because people are not able to treated others with respect like they want to be treated and hatred toward other people or race."

One survivor told the police that Mr. Vang fired first.

Hmong hunters have complained of harassment from white hunters, some of whom point to a different hunting culture as the root of the problem. Many residents in Rice Lake, which is 230 miles northwest of Madison and has a population of 8,300, dispute the claim that racial tensions have been high in the area.

Larry Jarvela, 60, the mayor of Rice Lake, said he thought people from the city, especially non-hunters, might have a hard time understanding the context of the incidents and hunting culture.

As to residents' reaction to the jury selection, he said, "I don't think they necessarily like it, but I think on the other hand they understand why it had to be done."

Dan Rassbach, who is organizing construction of a park in Rice Lake in honor of the slain hunters, said there was concern about lifestyle differences between people in Dane and Sawyer counties. "The hope is that they will understand the situation," he said. "If all the facts are presented, it should come out to be a fair verdict."

DOJ_NMG_0003823

The 10 women and 4 men, all white, who were selected for the jury on Thursday will be sequestered during the trial, which starts on Saturday and is expected to last less than two weeks. Mr. Vang is charged with six counts of intentional first-degree homicide and three counts of attempted homicide. He has pleaded not guilty to all counts.

The Madison area is known as more liberal, diverse and Democratic than many other parts of the state, a reputation that comes in part from the students and faculty at the University of Wisconsin, who come from around the country and the world.

"It is indeed part of Wisconsin's general political culture that Madison is regarded as distinct from the rest of the state," said Dennis Dresang, a professor of political science at the university.

University students and faculty members were vocal critics of Senator Joseph R. McCarthy in the 1950's and also organized a strong antiwar movement during the Vietnam War.

Donald Downs, another political science professor at the university, said Wisconsinites tended to consider people in the Madison area elite and better educated than people from other parts of the state, and he said hunting was less prevalent there than in northern Wisconsin.

About 130 potential jurors came to court for jury selection on Thursday. Some 200 jurors had already been dismissed based on written answers to more than 60 questions in a questionnaire over the past few weeks.

During the process, Mr. Vang sat quietly in a dark green suit, white shirt and tie. Four of his family members were watching from a television monitor in another courtroom but would not talk to members of the media.

Judge Yackel said many jurors indicated in the questionnaires that they had heard about the case, and he asked them to put aside that information. "I guess what we're asking you to do is unring a bell," he said at the beginning of the selection. "That may be difficult for some and impossible for others."

Nine jurors were excused during the selection process because they said they had a conflict of interest or would not be able to separate prior knowledge of the case to make a judgment based solely on evidence.

Peg Lautenschlager, the state attorney general who is prosecuting the case at the request of Sawyer County, asked potential jurors about their experiences with weapons, confrontation, violence and hunting.

Jonathan Smith, one of Mr. Vang's lawyers, focused on his client's presumed innocence and asked whether jurors could be objective in light of intense media coverage of the incident.

"Does everyone agree that Mr. Vang as he sits here this morning is presumed innocent?" Mr. Smith asked. "Does anyone have a fear of turning in a verdict of acquittal?"

Mr. Smith also said Mr. Vang's race should not enter into the deliberations and asked potential jurors if that or the number of charges would influence their objectivity.

Mr. Vang's lawyers are expected to argue self-defense, having ruled out a mental illness defense, and they have asked the judge to provide the jury with a legal definition of the term.

Mr. Vang faces life in prison if convicted.

CIVIL LAW:

Bush Loses Appeal On Base Closings (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 (AP) - The Bush administration lost a last-minute bid on Thursday to persuade the Supreme Court to intervene and protect a federal panel's recommendations for the closing and realignment of military bases.

Judges in Connecticut and Tennessee had blocked the panel from recommending changes at local Air National Guard bases, and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg on Thursday rejected the administration's request for intervention. Another appeal could be filed later and handled by the full court.

Solicitor General Paul Clement said in a court filing that disorder was undermining the work of the president and the commission that recommended the closings.

DOJ_NMG_0003824

By law, the commission had until Thursday to send its final report to the president, who had pledged to send it to Congress without changes. Congress would then have 45 days to block it.

Justice Ginsburg, noting that the federal appeals court in New York was dealing with the same case, said, "This court should not short-circuit the normal review process absent a showing of irreparable harm stronger than that presented here."

Justice Ginsburg handles appeals from the New York court.

White House Gets Base-Closing Recommendations (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The base-closing commission submitted its recommendations to the White House last night after withdrawing proposed changes at an Air National Guard base in Connecticut.

What was to have been a routine paperwork delivery of those proposals to President Bush was threatened by a cross-country legal fight.

Judges in Connecticut and Tennessee blocked the panel from recommending changes at local Air National Guard bases. The Tennessee decision was overruled by an appeals court yesterday afternoon, but the Connecticut injunction stood.

Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg rejected the Bush administration's request for intervention in the Connecticut case.

The Base Closure and Realignment Commission, which was bound by law to send its report to the president by yesterday, withdrew the portion of the report recommending the realignment of Connecticut's 103rd Fighter Wing. The plan would have moved jets from Connecticut's Bradley Air National Guard Base to Massachusetts.

The commission said it would restore the recommendation if the Connecticut court's injunction "is later vacated, reversed, stayed or otherwise withdrawn."

Separately, Illinois, Missouri and New Jersey lost emergency Supreme Court appeals intended to stop the commission from sending the report to the president. Facilities in those states are among hundreds targeted by the panel for closure or consolidation in the first round of base closings in a decade.

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, the administration's Supreme Court attorney, said the court should safeguard the work of the president and a commission that has spent five months on a plan to restructure domestic military bases to save billions of dollars.

The president has said he will probably pass the commission's final report on to Congress without changes, but he still could reject it or send it back to the commission for more changes. Copies of the report will be delivered this morning to Congress and the Defense Department. After Congress receives the report from the president, lawmakers will have 45 days to block it, although they have never rejected reports in base-closing rounds.

Ginsburg said a federal appeals court in New York was dealing with the Connecticut case and "this court should not short-circuit the normal review process absent a showing of irreparable harm stronger than that presented here." Ginsburg handles appeals from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit.

The Supreme Court dealt with a flurry of paperwork yesterday, a day after the funeral for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Lawyers representing Sen. Jon S. Corzine (D) and other New Jersey officials said they wanted a reprieve to appeal the decision to close Fort Monmouth.

Missouri Attorney General Jay Nixon asked the high court to protect an Air National Guard unit in St. Louis, and Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D) challenged plans to move National Guard fighter jets.

Clement had argued for the government that a Connecticut judge was out of line Wednesday in barring the commission from recommending changes at an Air National Guard base in that state.

In other base-closing lawsuits, a Massachusetts judge yesterday rejected the state's efforts to protect the Otis Air National Guard Base. Like several other states, Massachusetts argued that changes to their National Guard units or bases must be approved by governors.

Caremark Pays $137.5M To Settle Case (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0003825

The Associated Press

AP, September 8, 2005

Sep. 8, 2005 - Pharmacy benefits manager Caremark and the Justice Department agreed Thursday to a $137.5 million settlement of lawsuits originally filed by whistleblowers claiming a predecessor company received kickbacks affecting several federal health care programs.

Nashville-based Caremark Rx Inc. admitted no wrongdoing in making the settlement, which was approved by a Philadelphia federal court Thursday.

The lawsuits were filed in 2002 under the whistleblower provisions of the Federal False Claims Act by three former executives of AdvancePCS Inc., a Texas-based pharmacy benefits manager that Caremark acquired in March 2004. The Justice Department joined the lawsuits after they were filed.

The lawsuits contended AdvancePCS took kickbacks from drug manufacturers to give their products favorable treatment under contracts with the Federal Employees Health Benefit Program, the Mailhandlers Health Benefit Program, Medicare+Choice and other government programs.

The court filings also charged that AdvancePCS paid existing and potential customers kickbacks to sign pharmacy benefits management contracts. All the allegations date to before Caremark took over AdvancePCS.

"Caremark and the marketplace were aware of this situation prior to our acquisition of AdvancePCS," Caremark CEO Mac Crawford said in a statement. "We are pleased with the settlement with the Federal Government as it allows us to avoid the expense, uncertainty and distraction of potentially time-consuming litigation."

Shares of Caremark closed down 39 cents at $48.26 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The False Claims Act allows private citizens to sue individuals and companies they believe have defrauded the government.

"Each of our clients came forward because they thought it was the right thing to do to improve the PBM industry," said W. Scott Simmer, a partner with Robins, Kaplan, Miller & Ciresi and lead counsel to the three plaintiffs. "They put their careers and their families on the line and are delighted with the result in this case."

Not dismissed by the settlement are whistleblower claims on behalf of 10 states: California, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Also pending against Caremark is a separate Justice Department and whistleblower lawsuit alleging the company did not appropriately repay Medicaid and other federal health insurance programs. Caremark has denied those claims.

U.S. Senate Panel OKs Asbestos Subpoena Power (REU-Y2)

By Susan Cornwell

Reuters, September 9, 2005

A Senate committee on Thursday gave its leaders authority to subpoena information from companies facing asbestos lawsuits as lawmakers work on legislation creating a $140 billion fund for asbestos victims.

The unanimous voice vote gave Judiciary Committee leaders authority to subpoena information about how much companies would expect to contribute to the privately financed fund.

The panel's chairman, Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), told members he did not know if subpoenas would be necessary, but he wanted "a little muscle" in case companies continued to resist producing the data.

Although the proposed bill has a formula for industry contributions, based on a company's size and prior asbestos expenditures, many companies are reluctant to discuss how it would affect them, saying the information could expose them to more lawsuits.

Specter said he hopes to bring the bill to the Senate floor the first week of October. Aides said the industry information could be used to make changes necessary to build Senate support for the bill.

Without the sought-after information, the bill is "in peril," committee Republican Texas Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record) warned as he applauded the subpoena power authorization.

DOJ_NMG_0003826

Specter and the ranking Democrat on the panel, Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, have been seeking more data from the industry for months to answer colleagues' questions about the asbestos compensation fund legislation, which they are co-sponsoring.

Some senators in both parties say they cannot back the bill unless they know how much each company would pay into the fund. Some worry the costs will be unequally distributed or that there simply will not be enough money contributed to pay claims.

"The committee has been woefully underinformed about both the costs and funding of this bill," Cornyn said in a statement. "Without the necessary information, and without the ability to meet the funding requirements, this bill is in peril."

Asbestos, widely used for fireproofing and insulation until the 1970s, has been linked to cancer, and hundreds of thousands of injury claims have bankrupted dozens of U.S. companies.

Specter and Leahy's bill, approved by the judiciary panel in May, would halt the lawsuits and pay claims from a fund financed by asbestos defendant companies and their insurers.

U.S. Prosecutors Allege Safety Violations By American Airlines (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-American Airlines put its passengers at risk and violated multiple U.S. air-safety regulations in 2003 by allowing one of its jets to fly with a leaky fuel tank, according to a civil complaint filed by the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn.

The complaint, which was made public on Thursday, seeks more than $1 million (â,¬800,000) in penalties against the airline.

Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American's parent company AMR Corp., declined to discuss the complaint, saying lawyers for the Fort Worth, Texas-based airline had not had a chance to review it.

The complaint alleges that on Nov. 17, 2003, a Federal Aviation Administration inspector was a passenger on an American flight from Orlando, Florida, to New York's La Guardia Airport when he saw fuel leaking from a wing of the McDonnell Douglas MD-82.

The inspector warned the flight crew about the leak and demanded it be recorded in the aircraft's maintenance log. However, "no such entry was made by the pilot or maintenance personnel," the complaint said.

American allowed the "unsafe and un-airworthy" jet to take 53 commercial flights over two weeks before it was repaired during a regularly scheduled maintenance check, the complaint said.

During that period, the "aircraft was operated in a careless and reckless manner so as to endanger the life or property of another," the complaint said.

Will The Supreme Court Unleash Civil RICO? (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 9, 2005

Many believe that the 1970 civil racketeering law was created to apply only to traditional Mafia-style criminals as a way to force them to pay for their criminal enterprise.

Over the years, interpretation of civil RICO (Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act) has evolved into a tug of war between the U.S. Supreme Court, which reads the law broadly to reach beyond the mob, and appellate courts, which have repeatedly curtailed plaintiffs' use of the act.

The notion that the law should only allow recovery for harm caused by organized crime members is a myth, said G. Robert Blakey, drafter of the original statute and a law professor at Notre Dame University.

"The mob was the occasion for RICO but it does not define its scope," he said. "When it was argued on the House and Senate floors, the principal spokesman said, 'No, it is not a mafia statute,'" Blakey said.

The welter of legal standards imposed by courts over the years has created a patchwork of splits in the circuits around the country. Despite this, the Supreme Court has been "vacillating in the degree to which it is willing to intervene to clarify," Blakey said.

But the new term may change that. The justices have granted review in two RICO cases, and the U.S. solicitor general is pushing for review of a third, while a fourth appeal is on the way.

DOJ_NMG_0003827

In general, the cases raise important questions for the high court of how broadly civil RICO can be applied and what the scope of remedies is, according to Erwin Chemerinsky, a Duke University law professor who will argue on behalf of plaintiffs in one of the cases granted review.

CIVIL VS. CRIMINAL

Civil racketeering is intimately intertwined with its criminal counterpart. Criminal RICO law targets organizations that conspire to commit a pattern of crimes specified in the act, from murder and arson to mail fraud. Civil RICO allows victims of criminal racketeering to be compensated for their losses, although a criminal conviction is not necessary to make the civil claim.

Because RICO was modeled on antitrust law, successful private plaintiffs in RICO suits may recover treble damages. Civil RICO has become popular with civil attorneys because it also provides a longer statute of limitations, four years, and allows discovery going back as much as 10 years.

Blakey said that while district courts seem to find any excuse to throw out civil RICO cases, they do not do the same to criminal racketeering cases. The criminal sanctions have been used more often against political corruption than the mob, he said.

"Politicians have felt the full brunt of RICO and that doesn't bother me at all. We can live with a few Mafiosi, but a crooked politician affects everything," he said.

For the 2005 term, the high court has agreed to review the appropriateness of a national injunction prohibiting anti-abortion pickets from blockading abortion clinics, Scheidler v. National Organization for Women, No. 04-1244, and the Bank of China's effort to reinstate a $132 million RICO jury verdict against defendants accused of conspiring to cheat the bank through fraudulent loan deals, Bank of China, NY Branch v. NMB, No. 03-1559.

In addition, the solicitor general has asked the court to review a recent 2-1 decision by the U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, which eliminated the government's RICO remedy: forcing the tobacco industry to disgorge $280 billion it earned through alleged fraud by lying to the American people about the dangers of smoking.

That decision, in U.S. v. Philip Morris USA Inc., 396 F.3d 1190 (2005), conflicts with decisions in the 2nd and 5th circuits, Blakey said.

Both those decisions, U.S. v. Carson, 52 F.3d 1173 (2nd Cir. 1995) and Richard v. Hoechst Celanese Chem. Group Inc., 355 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 2003), authorize equitable disgorgement as a RICO remedy, wrote Edwin Kneedler, acting solicitor general.

Perhaps the most unusual of the four cases is one expected to reach the high court by November. It springs from a split between the 9th Circuit and the 7th and 11th circuits.

The 9th Circuit held in August that a convicted murderer can sue the Los Angeles Police Department as a racketeering enterprise, alleging that he was framed and falsely imprisoned by officers in what became known as the Ramparts scandal, Diaz v. Gates, No. 02-56818.

Ramparts refers to the police division where officers were accused of stealing drugs and framing hundreds of suspects on phony charges in 2000.

Traditionally, the injury to property may come in the form of a burned-out building, but in the case of David Diaz, his alleged injury -- false imprisonment by police -- hindered his ability to earn a living. The 9th Circuit said a loss or injury in employment can be considered an injury to property for purposes of civil RICO. That runs counter to an 11th Circuit decision denying damages sought by the relatives of FBI agents killed in a shootout with criminal suspects, Grogan v. Platt, 835 F.2d 844 (1988), and a 7th Circuit decision in Doe v. Roe, 958 F.2d 763 (1992), which held that economic losses flowing from personal injuries cannot be recovered using RICO.

While Diaz may have standing to get in the courthouse door, that does not mean his RICO will survive, the appeals court made clear. Whether his racketeering allegations are adequate "is a matter on which we express no view," the 7-4 unsigned opinion stated.

To Stephen Yagman, Los Angeles attorney for Diaz, the Supreme Court declared 20 years ago that civil RICO is "wide as the earth and high as the sky," starting with Sedima v. Imrex Co., 473 U.S. 479 (1985).

DOJ_NMG_0003828

Judge Stephen Reinhardt, in a concurring opinion in Diaz, suggested that it is time for Congress to reconsider the breadth of the law. Starting with Sedima, racketeering law has been "stretched both in scope and meaning far beyond that which Congress originally intended," he said. "In my view, it is well past the time for our lawmakers to take another look at RICO and consider amending the statute so as to limit it to its original purpose."

Dissenting Judge Ronald M. Gould warned that the Diaz majority would confer standing to sue on any plaintiff RICO-savvy enough to allege lost employment.

Whatever happens to Diaz, Yagman points out that there are 150 to 200 civil suits by prisoners stemming from the Ramparts police scandal, many with RICO claims. Those defendants may now keep those suits alive.

Los Angeles Deputy City Attorney Janet G. Bogigian said the city will appeal the 9th Circuit decision by November. Although she declined to discuss the case, her papers filed with the appeals court state that Diaz tried to "fashion an obstruction of justice allegation from his evidence of fabrication and witness tampering." It does not save his RICO case, she argued.

Chemerinsky speculated that it is possible the high court would accept the Diaz case. Notre Dame's Blakey was more doubtful. He called the Diaz case "factually unattractive." Nonetheless, he said, "I think the 9th Circuit is right and the 7th Circuit is wrong."

Chemerinsky said, "The brilliance of Diaz is that it uses a broad statute to deal with the social issue of police abuse. If it is ultimately upheld it gives another tool to plaintiffs' lawyers to gain compensation for police abuses," he said.

Blakey tried to debunk what he considers another myth about RICO, that broad reading of the law would open the floodgates to a spate of cases.

In the first decade after its passage, criminal RICO prosecutions accounted for fewer than 30 cases a year and usually went after traditional organized crime such as extortion, gambling or labor racketeering, according to a Vanderbilt University report in 1990.

In the early 1980s, a U.S. Supreme Court ruling that the profits from racketeering were subject to forfeitures from businesses and labor helped produce a rise in the use of the criminal law for major mafia prosecutions in New York; Chicago; Kansas City, Mo.; Cleveland; Philadelphia; and Boston.

RICO was also used in a Chicago prosecution of corrupt judges, in Seattle against a neo-Nazi group and South American drug traffickers, and against former Panamanian leader General Manuel Noriega. Then it began to be applied to white-collar crime, including insider trading and bank fraud in the 1980s savings and loan scandals.

Civil RICO cases remained nearly nonexistent until the 1990s, when the Supreme Court ruled for the second time that civil RICO has broad application.

Blakey said RICO applies to a pattern of unlawful behavior, not simply multiple uses of the mail or phones. One explanation for the slow growth in its use, he said, is that civil litigation and RICO litigation could be compared to the difference between an internist and a brain surgeon. RICO is extremely complex, he said.

And that may also account for judges and appellate courts continuing to throw up barriers to the broad application of civil RICO beyond traditional mobsters.

The civil statute states that "any person injured in his business or property by reason of a violation of section 1962 [racketeering] ... may sue ...

"What part of 'any' don't they understand?" asked Blakey. "The myth [of mob only application] is like a vampire. It has to have a stake driven through its heart over and over," he said.

Attorneys Brace For Impact Of New Bankruptcy Code (LAW)

By Peter Geier, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 9, 2005

The bankruptcy bar is bracing for the bumpy landing many practitioners expect when the new Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 touches down next month.

DOJ_NMG_0003829

Most bankruptcy lawyers agree that the new code is highly complex and technical, that it will cause significant changes in consumer and business bankruptcy practice, and that it is so poorly drafted that it will take time for the courts to sort out its ambiguities.

Observers also warn that a law purportedly aimed at financially undisciplined consumers is sure to bear unintended consequences for entrepreneurs, independent contractors and self-employed people -- particularly innovators who use bankruptcy relief when caught in a lean business cycle.

Alan N. Resnick, a co-editor-in-chief of "Collier on Bankruptcy," a comprehensive 23-volume treatise on statutory and procedural bankruptcy law and a professor of bankruptcy law at Hofstra University School of Law in Hempstead, N.Y., said lawyers will have their hands full getting used to the changes.

"First and foremost for lawyers and practitioners is the learning curve. It's a very large bill, it's voluminous -- over 500 pages. Every time you look at the bill you see something else," said Resnick, also of counsel to the bankruptcy and restructuring department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson in New York and a member of the bankruptcy rules advisory committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He agrees with many other bankruptcy practitioners that the legislation, which becomes effective Oct. 17, is very poorly written and filled with ambiguities.

"I don't think there's any doubt that we will see a lot of litigation in the year to come over interpreting many ambiguities in these provisions. It needs a technical amendments bill to clean it up," Resnick said.

THE 'POSITIVES'

Among the "positives" of the new law are provisions protecting patients in nursing homes and health care facilities that file for bankruptcy, and a new Chapter 15 for cross-border cases based on the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Model Law on Cross- Border Insolvency, which is "a step in the right direction," he said.

Bankruptcy lawyers know that the new law will necessitate learning and improvising new strategies, but one aspect that has received little attention yet is the potential effect it will have on the practices of nonbankruptcy lawyers.

For instance, new provisions on how companies in bankruptcy must handle employee incentives, severance packages and retiree benefits are bound to influence how employee-benefits lawyers draft their clients' contracts. And provisions that make it more difficult to reorganize a single-asset real estate venture will be important to real estate attorneys, Resnick said.

John D. Penn, president of the American Bankruptcy Institute and a commercial bankruptcy attorney at Haynes and Boone in Fort Worth, Texas, said that despite heavy media coverage of the effect that the new law will have on consumers, "there are some very dramatic changes on the business side."

For the first time, goods purchased in the ordinary course of business and delivered within 20 days of the filing of the bankruptcy will count as administrative expense claims; that is, they will have a status on a par with legal fees, which generally are paid by the effective date of the reorganization plan, Penn said.

"This is particularly significant because there will be a lot of companies whose available assets simply won't support the cost of a bankruptcy and items delivered within the 20 days before the bankruptcy was filed. It means that in all likelihood, those companies will be on the auction block either right before they file or right after they file," he said.

Another significant rule change involves key employee-retention plans, or KERPs, which are financial incentives paid to certain employees to stay for prescribed time periods or events in the bankruptcy proceeding. It will result in companies no longer being able "to use financial incentives to keep employees on board, because [under the new rules] the ones who can leave, will leave," Penn said.

Commercial bankruptcy lawyers also have voiced concern about strict time limits that Congress imposed on the period during which companies in bankruptcy are allowed to assume or reject nonresidential real estate leases, as well as an 18-month cap on a debtor's exclusive period to file a reorganization plan.

"For the United [Airlines] that files after Oct. 17, if they want the debtor to remain in control [of the reorganization plan] after 18 months, they are going to have to work very quickly," Resnick said.

However, concern over such things as the new exclusivity provision is overstated in the view of Professor Robert M. Lawless, who teaches bankruptcy and corporate law at the William S. Boyd School of Law at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas.

DOJ_NMG_0003830

"Tightening [the exclusivity period] and shortening it aren't going to matter too much. I don't think it matters now. If anyone had a good plan for United, I'm sure we would have heard about it by now," said Lawless, noting that the same was true of Eastern Airlines "10 to 12 years ago."

Lawyers and the public should be more concerned with "automatic dismissal triggers on the consumer side," as well as expanded grounds for dismissal of Chapter 11s "for failure to file just about any form," Lawless said.

But the central flaw of the legislation, he said, is that while the law is aimed at making corporate restructuring more efficient and irresponsible consumers more accountable, those who take the biggest hit are small businesses such as sole and family proprietorships, entrepreneurs, self-employed people and independent contractors.

In "The Myth of the Disappearing Business Bankruptcy," a study funded by the Kansas City, Mo.-based Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation that ran in the California Law Review in May, Lawless and co-author professor Elizabeth Warren of Harvard Law School argue that the new law is based on the incorrect premise that business bankruptcies account for only 2 percent of the total, whereas the figure is actually closer to about nine times that amount.

"What we have seen is that one in 7 consumers in bankruptcy court is actually there in connection with his or her own business. These folks are being made to fit into a bankruptcy system designed to deal with consumer problems. What you've got is the proverbial square pegs in a round hole," Lawless said.

"I think [the new law is] going to be a bad thing. I have said before that it's the poster child for campaign finance reform in that it is a law bought and paid for by the credit industry," he said.

CONSUMERS HURT?

Henry J. Sommer, co-editor-in-chief of "Collier on Bankruptcy" and supervising attorney at the Consumer Bankruptcy Assistance Project, a pro bono bankruptcy legal assistance program based in Philadelphia, said that "there is no question that on the whole consumers are a good deal worse off" because the process will be "more expensive and more burdensome."

Bradford W. Botes, a partner at Bond & Botes, a multistate bankruptcy practice based in Birmingham, Ala., and a director on the board of the National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys, said that he doubted whether the new, "much more arduous, much more rigorous procedure" will provide benefits for creditors or anyone else.

"I am certain that it will make our practice more labor intensive, and that we will charge more money filing bankruptcies, which is unfortunate because most of the people who file have a hard enough time paying as it is," said Botes. He added that he expects simply "to file less cases and be compensated more for the cases we do file.

"It's ironic to me that a Republican Congress has created a lot more bureaucracy" by inserting provisions such as consumer bankruptcy filers having to undergo credit counseling before filing and credit education before a bankruptcy court discharges their cases, Botes said.

It further intrigues Botes that Congress should pick this particular time -- when the Internal Revenue Service and possibly other federal agencies "are investigating the credit consulting industry for violations of not-for-profit tax laws and using misleading language in advertising to the public" -- to include such requirements, he said, citing the AmeriDebt Inc. case.

In March, AmeriDebt, which the Federal Trade Commission had accused of misrepresenting itself as a nonprofit credit counseling organization, shut down its debt management operation as part of a settlement of an FTC civil action, which alleged that the company deceived consumers into paying at least $170 million in hidden fees.

Another irony is how a Republican Congress that is purportedly concerned about individuals' privacy and identity theft issues would include a provision that "any creditor can request tax returns from any debtor at any time," Botes said.

Richard B. Levin, a bankruptcy attorney in the Los Angeles office of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, said he that expects that in the near future the new legislation will make courts and lawyers very busy sorting out the bill's bad drafting, and "very, very busy when the next bankruptcy boom hits -- as it will, of course."

"Some people believe that the creditor lobby wanted to make war on the debtors by making war on their lawyers. What the legislation has done is make [filing for bankruptcy] more dangerous for lawyers and more expensive for consumers."

Pope Wants Head-of-State Immunity From Texas Suit (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

DOJ_NMG_0003831

Law.com, September 9, 2005

Joseph Ratzinger, a defendant in a Texas suit filed before he was elected Pope Benedict XVI, wants to be dismissed from the litigation, arguing he has head-of-state immunity.

But lawyers for the three plaintiffs, who allege in the civil suit they were abused by a former seminary student in Houston, vow to challenge any suggestion of immunity issued by the U.S. Department of State in response to Ratzinger's request, a challenge that could put the immunity argument to a test.

"This is a case of first impression," says plaintiffs lawyer Tahira Kahn Merritt of Dallas.

"We shall see what the political arm of government does," says Daniel Shea, a solo practitioner in Houston who represents one of the plaintiffs in John Doe 1, et al. v The Archdiocese of Galveston-Houston, et al., which is pending before U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal in Houston.

"It's a legitimate political question," Shea says. "I would assume that they wouldn't make a decision on that without running it by the president of the United States."

According to a status report filed by Ratzinger on Aug. 23, the request remains under review before the State Department. Joanne Moore, a press officer for the State Department, says it does not comment on specific cases.

A lawyer for Ratzinger, Jeffrey S. Lena, a solo practitioner in Berkeley, Calif., says he cannot comment on the allegations in the suit or on the request for immunity. But in Ratzinger's Amended Motions to Dismiss, filed in May, the pope alleges he should be dismissed from the suit on several grounds, including his presumed immunity.

"Because Defendant is head of a recognized state, he is absolutely immune from the jurisdiction of the United States Courts," he says in the motion.

Ratzinger also says he should be dismissed from the suit on First Amendment grounds because the plaintiffs' claims would intrude on the internal working of the Roman Catholic Church and would require the court to interpret the meaning of religious documents and resolve issues of church governance.

Merritt, of Kahn Merritt & Allen, who represents two of the plaintiffs in the suit, says the judge should not grant Ratzinger's request for head-of-state immunity because the allegations against him relate to his actions while serving as head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith for the church.

"He was the policeman that set doctrinal laws, basically, "You are bad, this is your penance,' " Merritt says.

As alleged in the complaint, Ratzinger "designed and explicitly directed" a conspiracy to fraudulently conceal tortious conduct in connection with the alleged sexual abuse of the three plaintiffs. In the complaint, the plaintiffs cite a 2001 letter that then-Cardinal Ratzinger sent to all bishops, reminding them that all proceedings against clerics accused of improprieties with minors under age 18 should be sent to the tribunal of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"It's basically all part of the conspiracy and cover up to get these files into a secret forum," Merritt alleges.

Ratzinger denies the allegations in John Doe 1 and asks to be dismissed as a defendant. So have the other defendants in the suit -- the Archdiocese of Galveston-Houston; Joseph A. Fiorenza, the bishop in the diocese; and a priest, William Pickard, who is described in the Plaintiffs' Original Complaint as a "vocational director" for the seminarian, Juan Carlos Patino-Arango. Patino-Arango is not represented by counsel, according to the docket report in the suit.

'NO PRIOR KNOWLEDGE'

In the original complaint in John Doe 1, the plaintiffs allege they were sexually abused in separate incidents in 1996 by Patino-Arango, a native of Colombia who was then a seminarian working at St. Francis de Sales Church in Houston. They allege in the complaint that after the parents of John Doe 1 reported to the archdiocese the alleged abuse on the part of Patino-Arango, he was moved to a "retreat house for abusive priests" in Houston, and later "secretly spirited" out of the country and sent back to Colombia.

Among other things, the plaintiffs bring breach of confidential relationship and conspiracy to breach a confidential relationship causes of action against all of the defendants, along with assault by offensive physical contact and conspiracy to commit sexual assault; intentional infliction of emotional distress and conspiracy to commit intentional infliction of emotional distress; fraud and fraudulent misrepresentation and conspiracy to commit fraud and fraudulent misrepresentation; and fraudulent concealment and conspiracy to fraudulently conceal.

They also bring sexual exploitation and conspiracy to commit sexual exploitation causes of action against all defendants except Ratzinger, and negligence and negligent misrepresentation involving risk of physical harm against all defendants except Patino-Arango.

They seek unspecified actual and punitive damages in the suit, which the plaintiffs originally filed in 2004 in state court in Houston. It was removed to federal court in 2005.

In the Defendants' Answer filed by the Texas defendants, they allege Patino-Arango was dismissed as a seminarian the day after the parents of one of the plaintiffs reported the alleged abuse, the diocese informed Children's Protective Services of the allegation and the diocese advised Patino-Arango that he could not leave the country while law enforcement investigated. The defendants also allege in the answer that three weeks after the initial report, in June 1996, police advised the diocese that Patino-Arango was "free to leave the country."

The diocese defendants allege in their answer that they had "no prior knowledge of any sexual misdeed by Patino and as soon as they learned of the allegation in this case, took swift, decisive action by dismissing him from seminary and all other activities in the Diocese."

Daniel Schick, a partner in Vinson & Elkins in Houston who represents all of the defendants except Ratzinger and Patino-Arango, says there was no conspiracy.

"The archdiocese did the right thing back in 1996 by reporting the allegation [from John Doe 1] to law enforcement, barring the perpetrator from any ministry and by reaching out at that time to the victim's family, and heard nothing more until the lawsuit was filed in 2004," Schick says.

Patino-Arango "was kept in Houston until law enforcement said that it was OK to allow him to return home to Colombia," Schick says.

SEPARATE COUNTRY

Schick says head-of-state immunity should apply to Ratzinger.

"There's been a long tradition in international law prohibiting suits against heads of state, and we as a matter of comity extend that to foreign heads of state. He absolutely is recognized by international law," Schick says.

But Shea, who studied to become a priest but is not ordained, contends that Ratzinger's immunity as a head of state is not automatic.

Jordan Paust, a professor at the University of Houston Law Center who teaches international law, says head-of-state immunity is not dictated by treaty.

"It's sort of a common-law notion," says Paust.

Paust says that U.S. courts, despite the separation of powers, often do follow a suggestion of immunity from the U.S. Department of State, but don't always do so. And he notes that the State Department doesn't always act on the requests for a suggestion of immunity.

"Sometimes they remain silent. Sometimes they expressly say they don't have a dog in this fight and sometimes they will file a formal suggestion of immunity with the court," he says.

If the State Department does suggest immunity for Ratzinger on head-of-state grounds, Shea says he's prepared to challenge it on constitutional grounds. He contends that the head of the Roman Catholic Church should not receive that immunity.

"This is not a suggestion of immunity [request] filed on behalf of the prime minister of Canada or the guy down in Venezuela or Tony Blair or even Jacques Chirac because there, there are no First Amendment church-state considerations," Shea says.

A lawyer for Ratzinger, Van Gardner, a partner in Houston's Hennessy, Gardner & Barth, did not return a telephone message seeking comment before presstime, and Lena, another lawyer for Ratzinger in John Doe 1, declines comment on the immunity issue.

However, a lawyer who represents the Archdiocese of Dallas says it's his view that immunity would apply to Ratzinger. Randal Mathis, a partner in Mathis & Donheiser in Dallas, says, "The Vatican is a separate country for purposes of this and the pope is the bishop of Rome and it's a separate entity from a diocese in another part of the world and a separate entity not only in the sense of church law, but in the sense of the law of any given country."

DOJ_NMG_0003833

He says arguing otherwise ignores the reality of how the Roman Catholic Church is organized.

"It's kind of like the equivalent of suing President Bush because of something the local police department did wrong," Mathis says.

Schick says it doesn't matter that Ratzinger was sued before he became pope.

But Merritt says Ratzinger isn't being sued for his actions as pope, but instead in his former role as head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Dept. Settles Charges Against DCFD (WUSA-TV)

WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC, September 9, 2005

The Justice Department today announced a settlement agreement with the District of Columbia regarding pregnancy-related discrimination in the District's Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department (FEMSD).

The complaint alleged that individuals seeking employment as emergency medical technicians with the FEMSD were required to undergo a pre-hiring pregnancy test, with subsequent employment offers contingent on a negative test result. The complaint further alleged that, once hired, emergency medical technicians were advised by FEMSD management that any technician who became pregnant during her first year of employment would be in jeopardy of losing her job.

"Using pregnancy as a barrier to a woman's entry into the workplace and continued job security is illegal and inexcusable," said Bradley J. Schlozman, Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. "Forcing women to choose between their baby and their job clearly contravenes federal law and will not be tolerated by this Administration."

The three plaintiffs, all known as Jane Does, are emergency medical technicians employed by the D.C. Fire Department. The District required the plaintiffs, along with all other female applicants, to take a pregnancy test and obtain a negative result as a condition of employment. The plaintiffs tested negative for pregnancy and were hired. Upon reporting for duty, the plaintiffs attended a training class where a management official told the women in the class that if they became pregnant during their first year of employment, they were at risk of losing their jobs. Shortly after the training class, each plaintiff discovered she was pregnant. Because they had been threatened with losing their jobs if they became pregnant during the first year of employment, each woman terminated her pregnancy by abortion.

The United States intervened in the case and helped negotiate the three-year agreement, which was approved by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. The settlement agreement requires the District to affirm nondiscriminatory employment policies approved by the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs, implement training for supervisors on the rights of pregnant employees under Title VII, and regularly provide the United States with information concerning any new civil rights complaints. Additionally, the District agreed to compensate each of the Jane Does in the amount of $101,000 plus attorneys fees.

Jurors Acquit U.S. Border Officer In Civil Rights Case Filed By Tourist (AP)

By CAROLYN THOMPSON

AP, September 8, 2005

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) - Homeland Security officer was found not guilty Thursday of beating a female Chinese tourist.

Jurors deliberated about five hours over two days before acquitting Robert Rhodes, a Customs and Border Protection officer, of a single federal count of violating the civil rights of Zhao Yan, 38, a businesswoman from Tianjin, China, who was touring Niagara Falls.

The case provoked anger in China after pictures of Zhao, her face swollen from pepper spray and her eyes and forehead bruised, were widely published after the incident last July.

Defence lawyer Steven Cohen accused the U.S. government on Thursday of prosecuting Rhodes to protect delicate U.S.-Chinese relations. Cohen said Rhodes was an easy target because he was openly gay and had complained about discrimination on the job.

DOJ_NMG_0003834

Despite that, Cohen said, Rhodes would like to return to the job he has held for 17 years.

"Rob is a patriot and he loves this country," the lawyer said.

Rhodes was not immediately available to comment because of concerns for his safety. Cohen said he received a tip Saturday from a woman of Chinese origin that Rhodes' life would be in danger should he be cleared. It was one of numerous threats Rhodes has received, the lawyer said.

"The threat was if a not guilty (verdict) was reached, interested persons would kill him upon emergence from the courthouse," Cohen said. "I don't know if the threat had any credibility but the marshals are taking it seriously."

Jurors left U.S. District Court without commenting.

Zhao, who testified during the trial and is pursuing a $10 million US lawsuit against the U.S. government, was not in the courtroom for the verdict.

Government prosecutors claimed Rhodes used excessive force by slamming Zhao's head into pavement and striking her with his knee after pepper-spraying her at a Niagara Falls inspection station in July 2004.

Rhodes told investigators he believed Zhao and two companions might have been associated with a drug suspect who had just been caught and that the women ran when ordered inside. He said he followed proper Customs and Border Protection procedure in subduing the struggling woman.

He faced up to 10 years in prison if convicted.

"The jury did a great job for their country," Cohen said. "They reaffirmed a law enforcement officer's right to protect himself and the right to be able to do what is necessary to do their job."

Cohen said border officers throughout the country had adopted an unofficial policy against using any measure of force against a suspect.

"People who don't even know Officer Rhodes would say, 'Look what happened to Rocky,'" Cohen said, using Rhodes' nickname.

Cohen said he believed the jury was swayed by the testimony of two of Rhodes' fellow border officers - who took the stand against him. Although both were critical of the level of force Rhodes used, they indicated Zhao was resisting arrest.

Also key, Cohen said, was medical evidence that showed Zhao sustained what were considered minor injuries that included no fractures or broken bones.

NAACP Calls For Action In Police Shooting Of Teen (WEWS-TV)

WEWS-TV, September 9, 2005

CLEVELAND -- Funeral services were held Thursday for a Cleveland teen shot and killed by police last week, and now the Cleveland NAACP is joining the chorus of those calling for answers and for action.

Brandon McCloud, 15, was shot by police last Thursday in the bedroom of his home.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People says the police version of what happened doesn't quite make sense, NewsChannel5 reported.

"There is no justifiable reason why a 15-year-old boy, I don't care if he's black, white, blue, green, gray should be shot 10 times in his bedroom. I cannot make sense of that," said NAACP President George Forbes.

Police were carrying out a search warrant at McCloud's Jeffries Street home when they say the teen came at the officers from a closet with a knife.

The preliminary ruling was that the shooting was justifiable.

"If that's justifiable then any shooting of a black person is justifiable in this city," said Forbes.

The investigation into the shooting is following a preset protocol. Cleveland police said they have asked the FBI civil rights team to step in and monitor their process.

But the NAACP wants specific action taken, and they want it now.

"We expect these two men to be fired, fired, fired and prosecuted, and nothing short of that is acceptable," said Forbes.

And if that action is not taken, Forbes is quick to point out to the administration that this is an election year.

"It is the season for solution and you have to be mighty dumb not to understand what I'm saying," said Forbes.

Under police protocol, the officers involved will be making their formal statements by Monday.

The mayor has said the investigation process could take 90 days.

FBI Ends Beta Bridge Probe (CHARDP)

By Melanie Mayhew

Charlottesville Daily Progress, September 9, 2005

Cryptic graffiti scrawled on the University of Virginia's Beta Bridge - including "G Wizard," "G Society," "G Bug," a red eye and derogatory images of women - was not racially motivated, the FBI has concluded.

UVa President John T. Casteen III recently asked the Civil Rights Unit of the FBI in Washington to review photos of the graffiti images to determine their meaning.

James Lamb, an FBI special agent, reported the FBI's findings to university police. "A review by agents in the Civil Rights Unit found nothing to suggest racial implications," Lamb said.

A group of UVa students called police Aug. 29 after someone defaced Beta Bridge, a popular spot where students spray-paint announcements. The controversial defacement appeared during the first two weeks of classes, which were marred by a string of reported hate incidents.

Members of two historically black organizations had painted announcements for their events on both sides of the bridge. Shortly after they began advertising their events, the graffiti appeared.

During the days following the defacement, members of the university community speculated as to the meaning of the graffiti. Some students linked it to recent racial incidents and to the Ku Klux Klan. The speculation prompted Casteen to request FBI assistance.

"I am grateful to the many people who worked overtime for several days to resolve what had become a sensitive public issue in our community," Casteen said.

At the forefront of students' concerns were five reported incidents of written or shouted slurs, three reported incidents of gay bashing, a symbolic attack on a Christian undergraduate, an incident involving a group of white students harassing a group of Asian-Pacific Americans and inappropriate behavior toward women.

The information from the FBI is one more step in quelling hatred at the university, said Leonard W. Sandridge Jr., executive vice president and chief operating officer.

"Given the fact that there have been some incidents, everyone involved with the situation wanted to be very careful," Sandridge said. "We're working very hard to investigate all kinds of incidents of this nature. It reflects the fact that we're a community that's very concerned about these kinds of issues and wants to address them."

Smuggler To Serve 3 Years In Prison (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 9, 2005

A Carmel Valley man who headed a ring that smuggled dozens of Eastern Europeans into the United States through Tijuana was sentenced yesterday to three years in prison and forced to give up his house.

Yervand Asriyants, 42, a native of Azerbaijan, didn't speak during a hearing before Chief U.S. District Judge Irma E. Gonzalez. Asriyants had pleaded guilty June 9 to conspiracy and immigrant smuggling charges.

Asriyants was arrested after an investigation by FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents into a series of smuggling attempts at the region's border crossings involving Eastern European men, women and children.

"He was smuggling aliens across the border that were not what we consider to be typical," said FBI agent Roy Lemons, who added that the case had special urgency because of security concerns after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Lemons said no terrorist links were found.

The immigrants said they agreed to pay $5,000 to $10,000 to be brought from Lithuania, Poland, Russia and Ukraine into the United States through Mexico.

Prosecutors said the immigrants were caught while crossing the border by attempting to claim U.S. citizenship and presenting borrowed or fake passports or driver licenses.

Investigators caught 43 people in the smuggling attempts, but believe many others succeeded in the operation dating to the mid-1990s.

As part of his sentencing, Asriyants was ordered to forfeit $36,000 seized from his house, a safe-deposit box and the five-bedroom Carmel Valley home he bought for $946,000 in 2003. Prosecutors say the house was bought with illegally obtained money.

Four members of the ring have been sentenced and three await sentencing, prosecutors said.

Anti-Gay-Marriage Initiative Passes Hurdle (FINDLAW/AP)

By Theo Emery, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - BOSTON-A proposed ballot initiative that would ban gay marriage passed a key hurdle Wednesday when the state attorney general ruled it would be permitted under a section of the state constitution allowing voters to overturn court decisions.

The action by Attorney General Tom Reilly, a Democrat who is expected to run for governor in 2006, clears the way for conservative groups to begin the long process of gathering signatures and lobbying lawmakers in hopes of putting the issue before voters in 2008.

Supporters now must go out and gather the signatures of at least 65,825 Massachusetts voters. If they are successful, the question then must by approved by 25 percent of two successive sittings of the 200-member state Legislature. The question would then be placed before voters again as a constitutional amendment in 2008.

The state's highest court ruled in 2003 that it was unconstitutional for the state to ban marriages between gays and lesbians. The following spring, the nation's first state-sanctioned same-sex marriages began taking place in Massachusetts and thousands of gay couples have since tied the knot.

In a letter last week, Gov. Mitt Romney urged Reilly to certify the ballot question, saying voters "should not be denied meaningful participation in the legal definition of marriage."

Backers of the proposed referendum cite the Massachusetts Constitution's Article 48, which permits the people to petition for a constitutional amendment "that overrules a court decision when the court has declared a statute to be in violation of our constitution."

Gay marriage supporters had urged Reilly not to accept the proposed amendment, saying that Article 48 applied to court rulings overturning a statute, while the court case involving gay marriage rights did not overturn an existing law.

Gary Buseck, legal director of Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, which sued the state over gay marriage and won, said the group would challenge Reilly's decision.

The measure defining marriage as between a man and a woman had been proposed last month by the Massachusetts Family Institute. The state legislature is considering an alternate constitutional amendment that also would overturn gay marriage but would legalize Vermont-style civil unions.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department Files Antitrust Lawsuit (AP)

AP, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department sued the National Association of Realtors on Thursday, claiming it unfairly limits competition by allowing real estate agents to withhold home listings from Internet-based brokers.

The antitrust lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago, follows lengthy negotiations in which the government pressed the Realtors to drop restrictions designed to protect traditional brokers.

The association announced changes to its original plan Thursday, but the new steps were insufficient to ward off the lawsuit because the organization kept in place brokers' ability to discriminate against competitors who post listings online, said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Antitrust Division.

DOJ_NMG_0003837

Internet brokerages operate in the top dozen real estate markets in the country and their numbers are growing, Justice officials said at a news conference to announce the lawsuit. The online brokers often charge lower fees and allow consumers to review listings at their own pace.

The Realtors' policy prevents brokers who rely on the Internet from being able to show customers all the houses that may be for sale in the locations and price ranges they're seeking, McDonald said. It "allows a broker to target his Web-based competitors," McDonald said.

The association said its new policy took into account Justice Department concerns. Initially, listing agents were allowed to withhold available homes from specific Web sites. The revised policy says that, when an agent chooses, listings will not be displayed on any Web site.

"The policy does not discriminate against any brokerage model, including discount brokers," said Al Mansell, president of the Realtors' association.</s! pan>

U.S. Sues Realtors, Claims Web Rules Limit Discounting (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And James R. Hagerty, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department challenged the nation's dominant real-estate trade group in a lawsuit that could lower costs of buying and selling homes.

The federal antitrust suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago against the National Association of Realtors, targets the group's bylaws, which allow members to withhold online listings from other brokers in a local market. The government charges that the rules illegally could restrict discounting and disadvantage Internet competitors.

The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission to protect competition in the residential-real-estate market. Strong sales and rising prices have been a huge boon to brokers, who despite higher prices continue to charge commissions of 5% to 6% of a home's sale price -- reaping an estimated $60 billion in such fees last year.

The association's policy "stifles competition to the advantage of some of its members, at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," said J. Bruce McDonald, the acting antitrust chief, who was nominated to the post by President Bush last month. The suit went forward despite the political power of the association's more than 1.2 million members in state capitals and Congress, and is likely to win strong support among consumers.

Mr. McDonald said online commerce brought innovation and lower fees to air travel, stock sales, insurance, music and other markets. "It offers the same opportunity for consumers buying a home," while the Realtors' rules would "lock in outmoded business models," he said. Real-estate brokers, led by the trade association, are fighting Internet-based competitors and discounters to preserve their high commissions, federal officials said.

Officials of the National Association of Realtors defend their bylaws as promoting competition, and they had hoped that a revised, less-restrictive Internet rule that was offered in settlement talks with the government might head off a suit.

The policy is "fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation," the association said. "After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action."

The association also is locked in a multistate battle with the Justice Department and the FTC over the industry's campaign to limit discount brokers on the state level.

The rule at the center of the Justice Department lawsuit involves the Internet display of information from multiple-listing services, or MLS, which are local databases, usually owned by local Realtor organizations, of homes available for sale. Under the revised rule, brokers would have a choice: They could make listing information available to the Web sites of all of their competitors or to none of them.

Under the earlier rule, proposed two years ago by the association, brokers could have denied the data to specific rival Web sites while providing it to others -- a provision that would have allowed brokers to discriminate against discounters. The association abandoned this "selective opt out" provision yesterday in hopes of settling with the government and avoiding a lawsuit.

Write to James R. Hagerty at bob.hagerty@wsj.com1

DOJ Wants Real Estate Market Fairness (REU)

Reuters, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The Justice Department asked a court Thursday to block a rule by the real estate industry's main trade group that authorities claim limits competition from Internet-based brokers.

The Justice Department said in a statement that the National Association of Realtors (NAR) rule "prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting." The government said it filed the civil antitrust lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Chicago.

The NAR said in May it would back away from the disputed bylaw that the department's antitrust division feared would allow real estate brokers to bar their property listings from being displayed by some discount rivals.

The Justice Department Thursday acknowledged that the NAR had revised the rule but said the modified version still discriminated against "innovative" brokers and did not resolve its concerns.

The rule has come under sharp criticism from Internet-based competitors such as RealEstate.com, an online brokerage and referral service that is a unit of IAC/InterActiveCorp (Research).

Efforts to reach an NAR representative for comment on the suit were not immediately successful.

Antitrust Lawyers Go After Realtors (WP)

By Kirstin Downey, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The Justice Department's antitrust division yesterday sued the National Association of Realtors, alleging that the powerful trade group is using its online multiple listing service policies to restrict competition from discount brokers offering lower prices.

"The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the antitrust division.

Discount brokerages are undercutting the traditional 6 percent commission rate that has continued to dominate even as home prices in some markets, including the Washington area, have doubled over the last five years.

The Realtors group announced yesterday that it was changing its online sales listing policy to make listings more widely available, but Justice Department officials said the changes do not go far enough.

At issue in the lawsuit are Internet listing rules adopted by the Realtors in 2003 that would have allowed real estate brokers to opt out of having their listings appear on the Web sites of other brokers. The rules were controversial from the beginning and association officials said they were never fully implemented, but Justice Department officials said at a news conference yesterday that of about 1,000 affiliated multiple listing services, about 200 adopted the restrictive policy.

In a written statement, association officials said they "were at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action. Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two-year investigation."

Association officials declined further comment yesterday. In an interview Wednesday, before the lawsuit was filed, the group's general counsel, Laurene K. Janik, said it would be a "waste of taxpayers' money" for the Justice Department to sue. The group was changing its policy, she said, and the government would be acting against the rescinded policy.

In the lawsuit, filed in the U.S. District Court in Chicago, where the Realtors have their headquarters, the government alleged that the association -- particularly its traditional broker members -- has sought to maintain a "policy that restrains competition from brokers who use the Internet to more efficiently and cost effectively serve home sellers and buyers."

According to the federal filing, when real estate industry leaders developed their policy in 2003, they talked about ways to maintain the status quo. The working group that formulated the listings policy understood that the right to opt-out would limit competition, according to the lawsuit, which alleged that two members of the group said the opt-out right would be "abused beyond belief" as traditional brokers withheld listings from competitors.

Albert A. Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute, said the Justice Department would have deliberated thoroughly before bringing suit against the politically powerful trade group, which has 1.2 million members nationwide.

"This Justice Department is not trigger-happy," Foer said. "They don't bring a lot of antitrust cases or operate in an anti-business mode, so chances are that they've thought it out very carefully."

"It's great," said Peter Sealey, a professor of marketing at the University of California at Berkeley who has followed the issue. The policies "are a clear conspiracy and restraint of trade. This is long-overdue law enforcement."

US Files Antitrust Suit Against Biggest Real Estate Group (AFP)

Agence France-Presse, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (AFP) - The US Justice Department filed an antitrust suit against the National Association of Realtors, the largest group of real estate brokers, claiming that it stifled competition in the sector.

The lawsuit filed in Chicago claims the Realtors' policies for property listings effectively blocks rival real estate brokers from accessing some computerized home listings.

The policy "prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting," the Justice Department said in a statement.

"The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," said Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Department's Antitrust Division. "Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are free to compete vigorously by offering innovative services."

Although the Realtors group announced its adoption of a revised policy, "the revised policy continues to discriminate against innovative brokers, and does not resolve the Department's concerns," the department said.

Officials said low-cost brokers may be blocked from access to the local Multiple Listing Service (MLS), which contains lists of nearly all properties for sale in the community.

The Realtor group said in a statement its new policy on listings "is fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation." "After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action. Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two year investigation," the group added.

Justice Department Sues Chicago-Based National Association Of Realtors (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, September 9, 2005

The U.S. Department of Justice filed an antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors Thursday, claiming that the Chicago-based trade group's new policy for online displays of home listings stifles competition from Internet-based discount brokerages.

The lawsuit, which has long been anticipated in the industry, was filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago one day after the Realtors announced revamped listing guidelines. An earlier version of the rules had been under investigation by the Justice Department for two years.

"The [new] NAR policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourages discounting," the department announced.

The suit is the latest chapter in a long-running industry fight over who should be able to access home listings. The earlier policy, known as Virtual Office Website, allowed brokerages that are members of multiple listing services to pick and choose which competitors' Web sites could display their listings.

Critics said VOW effectively undercut smaller, Internet-based competitors with lower overhead than traditional bricks-and-mortar brokerages. But many brokerages maintain that they spend so much money in marketing in order to obtain the listings--essentially their "inventory"--that they don't owe competitors any such access.

The new policy, called Internet Listing Display, forbids real estate agents from selecting which brokers can and can't receive their listings. However, individual real estate companies can opt out of sharing their data across the board.

"The new policy raises some of the same problems as the old one," said Deputy Assistant Atty. Gen. J. Bruce McDonald. He said the Justice Department would like to eliminate the opt-out provision entirely because consumers should have full access to online listings in order to find homes more efficiently, presumably at a lower cost.

"The way we go about obtaining goods and services on the Web is threatening to bricks-and-mortar business models," McDonald said.

Ralph Holmen, associate general counsel for the Realtors, said the group was "absolutely puzzled" by the suit.

"We came up with the new policy, which we think accommodated 90 percent of their concerns, and offered them the opportunity to comment on any other concerns," he said. "They didn't provide any comment, other than it was unacceptable."

Steve Murray, a real estate industry consultant who has been a vocal critic of the real estate group's policies, said nonetheless that he thought that the lawsuit was "over the line."

"I think [Justice] is trying to tell brokers where they can and can't market their inventory, and that is totally wrong," Murray said.

National Realtors Group Sued By U.S. Over Web Policy (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 8, 2005

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- The National Association of Realtors was sued by U.S. antitrust enforcers who accused the trade group of trying to restrain competition by restricting Internet brokers' access to listings of homes for sale.

The suit, filed by the Justice Department in federal court in Chicago, challenges the group's policy of allowing traditional real estate brokers to exclude their listings from other brokers' Web sites. It may be propping up an old-fashioned business model and harming consumers looking to lower costs, the suit says.

The association's policy ``stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's antitrust division, said at a news conference in Washington today. ``Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are free to compete vigorously by offering innovative services."

The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by U.S. authorities to open the real estate business to more competition, McDonald said. Internet brokers, who seek to cut costs by letting customers do much of the work of traditional real estate agents, sprung up in the late 1990s and now operate in all major metropolitan areas.

The Chicago-based realtors group announced a revised policy earlier today that it said responded to Justice Department concerns. The association has more than 1 million members who work in residential and commercial real estate.

Defending the Policy

McDonald said at the press conference that the revised policy is just as anticompetitive as the old one.

Responding to today's lawsuit, the realtors issued another statement saying their new ``policy is fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation" in the real estate business.

``After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action," the statement said. ``Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two year investigation."

In most markets, real estate brokers participate in what is known as a Multiple Listing Service, which allows the brokers to share information about properties that are for sale. By using the service, brokers and buyers can get listings on virtually all homes in the market.

Brokers have traditionally given their clients print-outs of the listings and haven't given them full access to the database. However, some brokerages that operate online have begun to give their customers the ability to see all the Multiple Listing Service information. The sites are password protected.

The realtors group's policy challenged by the Justice Department gave brokers the ability to withhold their clients' listings from the Web sites of the Internet competitors. The policy, which wasn't mandatory until 2006, was already followed by about 200 local Multiple Listing Services, Justice Department officials said.

To contact the reporter on this story: Robert Schmidt in Washington at rschmidt5@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: September 8, 2005 14:18 EDT

Justice Dept. Sues NAR For Antitrust (INMAN)

By Jessica Swesey, Inman News

Inman News, September 8, 2005

The U.S. Justice Department today filed an antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors challenging its new policy for online property listings display.

The Justice Department's Antitrust Division has been investigating the Realtor trade group's policies for Internet listings over whether it has been restricting competition among real estate brokers.

The complaint accuses NAR of mandating a policy that obstructs real estate brokers who use innovative Web-based systems to offer lower costs to consumers.

"We believe the new ILD (Internet Listings Display) policy is fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation," NAR said in a statement this morning. "After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action. Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two-year investigation."

Moments before the Justice Department's announcement this morning, the Realtor trade group said it had adopted a new online listings policy to address the department's concerns stemming from the two-year probe.

The old policy, dubbed the Virtual office Web site or VOW policy, allowed real estate brokers to selectively hold their listings from competitor's Web sites, a move which DOJ officials have said threatens competition in the marketplace.

While NAR's new policy no longer allows brokers to pick and choose who among their competitors is allowed to display their listings, it still enables them to withhold listings from all brokers in the MLS. The Justice Department claims the NAR policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting.

"The repackaged policy narrows the opt-out a bit, but it remains effective," J. Bruce McDonald, Deputy Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust, said this morning during a press meeting in Washington, D.C.

Allowing brokers to hold listings from the Internet "makes the online business model unattractive and tends to undercut competition by the Web-based brokers," he said.

Under the revised policy, a broker opting out can withhold all listings from the Web sites of other brokers, but they would still appear on NAR's own Web site, Realtor.com, McDonald said.

The so-called "blanket opt-out" provision provided in the new policy has been in effect by "hundreds of MLSs" for three and a half years under NAR's policy for Internet Data Exchange, according to NAR. The association has said the policy has been widely accepted by the industry and very few brokers have chosen to opt out.

The policy adopted today contains an entirely new feature that allows brokers who have opted out of displaying their listings on competitors' Web sites the opportunity to make an exception at the direction of a particular seller who wants to have his or her property displayed on the Web sites of all other members of the MLS.

"The revised policy continues to discriminate against innovative brokers, and does not resolve the Department's concerns," Justice Department officials said in a statement today.

NAR President Al Mansell contested that, "The policy treats all MLS members equally yet respects the rights of property owners and their listing brokers to market a property as they see fit…The policy does not discriminate against any brokerage model, including discount brokers."

But the Justice Department in its complaint contends the NAR policy significantly alters the rules that govern MLSs by permitting traditional brokers to discriminate against other brokers based on their business model, denying them the full benefits of MLS participation. "The Department's lawsuit seeks to ensure that traditional brokers, through NAR's policy, cannot deprive consumers of the benefits that would flow from these new ways of competing," the Department said.

According to the Department's complaint, brokers who participated in the NAR work group that formulated the VOW policy in May 2003 recognized that the opt-out right would be "abused beyond belief." The chairman of the working group allegedly admitted that the opt-out right was likely to be exercised by brokers despite the fact that "it may not be in the sellers' best interest to opt out," the Department said in its filing.

"NAR's policy denies brokers using new technologies and business models the same benefits of MLS membership available to their competitor brokers, suppresses innovation, discourages competition on price and quality, and prevents new, efficient competitors from entering into the marketplace - all to the detriment of consumers," the Justice Department said.

The complaint alleges that NAR adopted the online listings policy in response to broker member concerns over rising competition from Internet brokers.

"The chairman of the board of RE/MAX, the nation's second-largest real estate franchisor, publicly expressed his concern that these Internet sites would inevitably place downward pressure on brokers' commission rates," the complaint states.

NAR discussed its revised policy with the Justice Department before adoption, McDonald said, and antitrust officials warned the trade group that it didn't comply with antitrust laws. But the association has chosen to stand by the policy.

U.S. Fights Limit On Home Sale Listings (BSUN)

By Lorraine Mirabella, Sun Staff

The Baltimore Sun, September 9, 2005

In a move that could transform the way real estate brokers work with home buyers and sellers, the Justice Department challenged yesterday a national real estate group's new policy permitting brokers to limit the display of home sale listings on the Internet.

The government filed an anti-trust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors, saying the new rule restrains competition from Web-based, discount real estate brokers, hurting home buyers and sellers.

At the heart of the dispute over how to disseminate home sales information from Realtor-owned multiple listing services, the lawsuit charges, is resistance by traditional brokers to an onslaught of "virtual" brokers who charge less than traditional commissions.

"NAR's policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting," the Justice Department said in a statement.

The suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago, highlights the profound transformation the Internet is bringing to the housing market, just as it has changed the way consumers shop for everything from airline tickets to stocks, cars, books and music. The NAR has reported that seven of 10 home buyers turn to the Internet when buying a home.

"The Internet has brought great competitive opportunities to a lot of other industries," said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the antitrust division. "Real estate has been slow to come along to this."

The Realtors contend that brokers who work for their listings should be able to choose whether or not to help their competitors' business.

"A broker gets the opportunity to choose whether or not he wants to facilitate the business fortunes of another competitor, and he ought to have that right," said Ralph Holmen, associate general counsel for NAR in Chicago. "Real estate is unique in that competitors cooperate in the sale of property in a way you don't see in many other industries."

But one local Realtor, John E. Rawlings Jr., a Coldwell Banker agent in Owings Mills, said the Internet has already become a crucial tool for both traditional and Web-based brokers and agents.

"It's the wave of the present," he said. "Most people shop on the Internet for listings before they even call their Realtor. It would do a disservice to the seller if they didn't have the maximum coverage possible. ... A full-service company has to show the value clients are getting for the service we offer."

The lawsuit contends that the NAR rule discriminates against brokers who use password-protected Internet sites that enable customers to search for and get listings over the Internet, replacing the traditional practice of brokers searching for homes for their clients.

Such Web sites, first developed in the late 1990s, have become a competitive alternative to traditional brokers, who worried that the Internet sites would drive down commission rates, and prompted the NAR to draft its new rule two years ago, the suit said. The Justice Department launched an anti-trust investigation and warned this spring that it stood ready to file suit. The NAR delayed its rule, and the two sides began negotiations in May.

DOJ_NMG_0003843

The NAR, the nation's biggest trade group, said yesterday it adopted the controversial policy after modifying it to address the government's concerns, ending up with a policy that gives consumers more access to home sale listings than ever before.

"After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action," the NAR statement said. "Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two-year investigation. ...The policy treats all MLS members equally yet respects the rights of property owners and their listing brokers to market a property as they see fit."

The lawsuit does not attempt to open the MLS information to non-members, the Justice Department said. Listings are controlled by the more than 800 member-only multiple listing services across the country.

The rule allows a broker to withhold his own listings from all Web sites - other than his own - or to have listings displayed on all competitors' sites. It does not permit brokers to selectively choose to withhold listings from competitors, the NAR said.

The rule is meant to consolidate the formerly separate policies for Internet Data Exchanges, on which brokers advertise the listings of other brokers, and Virtual Office Web sites, or VOW, virtual real estate offices on the Web.

"We adopted a policy to bring some order to the market of how those listings would get used," Holmen said. "We disagree that the policy and the rules are unlawfully anti-competitive, and we intend to defend that in court."

Holmen said real estate is different from other industries that have been transformed by the Internet.

"Real estate is unique in that there is competitive cooperation in the sale of properties in a way you don't see in many other industries," Holmen said. The question, he said, is: "Must a broker cooperate with another competitor as fully as he is able or can he choose how much he wants to assist that competitor?"

Joseph T. Landers, III, executive vice president of the Greater Baltimore Board of Realtors, said that under current rules governing Internet listings, few brokers in the Baltimore area have opted out of online listings.

But, he added, "The broker needs to have the flexibility to be able to not display [on the Internet] if that's what their client wants."

In an industry where the MSL system works based on reciprocity, some brokers became concerned because "there are agencies out there that don't bring a lot of listings and are not posting them, but they're taking everyone else's listings and posting them on their sites. That defeats that whole concept of reciprocity. There were also some companies that were basically skimming all the information and posting it on their site."

The NAR, he said, has "tried to put in place rules or regulations to create a fair playing field when it comes to Internet advertising."

DOJ Sues Real Estate Group For Web Listing Policy (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service, Washington Bureau

IDG News Service, September 9, 2005

The U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) has filed a lawsuit against a real estate broker trade group, saying the organization's policies block competition among brokers using a Web-based property listing service.

The DOJ's civil antitrust lawsuit was filed Thursday against the National Association of Realtors (NAR) in U.S. District Court in Chicago. The DOJ accuses the NAR of allowing brokers to pull their real estate listings from the Multiple Listing Service (MLS), a joint venture among competing brokers. NAR brokers have traditionally shared listings with each other, and customers could access those listings by mail, fax or at real estate broker offices, the DOJ said.

But an NAR policy allows brokers to opt out of sharing their listings with brokers offering Web-based property search services, "effectively inhibiting the new technology," the DOJ said.

"Delivering listings over the Internet gives web-savvy consumers more control over their search for a home, allowing them to educate themselves about their options at their own pace and on their own time," the DOJ said in a press release. "This allows brokers to reduce the time that their agents spend searching the MLS database or showing homes the customer dislikes."

The NAR, in a statement, said it has adopted a new policy that addresses the DOJ concerns. "The policy will bring consumers more points of access to real estate information from multiple listing services than they have ever had before," NAR said. "For consumers, whether they are home buyers or sellers, this new policy is a win-win. Buyers will be able to find all the listings available for public display on the Web site of the broker of their choice and sellers will be able to work with the listing broker of their choice."

But the DOJ said Thursday that the NAR's new policy continues to discriminate against "innovative" brokers and does not resolve the agency's concerns.

"The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition," giving an advantage to some NAR members "at the expense of home buyers and sellers," said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the DOJ's Antitrust Division, in a statement. Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are competitive, he said.

Taubmans Give Up Control Of Sotheby's (WSJ)

By Marcus Baram

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Sotheby's Holdings Inc. announced a major recapitalization that saw the auction house's leading shareholders, the Taubman family, relinquish control and open the company to more outside investment.

As of midnight Wednesday, former chairman A. Alfred Taubman and his family and affiliates reduced their stake in Sotheby's from almost 22% of total shares outstanding and 62% of the votes to 12.4% of both. They exchanged 14 million of their special Class B shares for 7.1 million in common stock and $168 million in cash from the auction house. As a result, Sotheby's dropped its two-class voting structure involving Class B super shares and Class A shares for a single class of stock. The dual class share structure, which is rare in public companies, had been instituted at Sotheby's before the New York-based company went public in 1988.

"There are a lot more investors who will consider investing in Sotheby's when you have a single class of stock," says William Ruprecht, Sotheby's president and chief executive officer. "This will give us a degree of financial flexibility and open us up to a lot of opportunities for the future, such as equity-linked securities."

The move also represents a retreat for Mr. Taubman, a real-estate developer, who bought the company in 1983 and served as its chairman until he was convicted of price fixing in 2001. "A few months ago, the company approached Mr. Taubman and said that the two classes of stock were a problem and were perceived as a problem by investors and he thought this was a fair deal," says Christopher Tennyson, a spokesman for Mr. Taubman, who adds that the 81-year-old businessman is writing a memoir about his life in business. "He's very, very proud of what he's accomplished but things turned out to not be all positive."

Mr. Taubman will remain an investor for at least two years and his son, Robert, will remain on the board of directors but will step down as a member of the executive and nominating committees, the company said. With the Taubmans ratcheting down, the largest shareholder now is Ariel Capital Management, which currently owns 8.7 million shares. Last June, Ariel informed their investors that despite Sotheby's tough year so far, they "are confident in the long-term prospects of the business."

It has been a mixed year so far for Sotheby's -- the company took in $1.3 billion in auction sales for the first half of the year, almost the same results as their sales during the same period last year, while their competitor Christie's recorded a 32% increase in sales during that period. Last month, the company reported a slight decline in second-quarter profit although their margins on auction commissions increased during that quarter.

Sotheby's shares climbed 5%, or 87 cents, closing at $18.30 on the New York Stock Exchange. The move decreased by 11% the company's total number of shares outstanding, which now stand at 57.3 million.

"This is smart," says George Sutton, an analyst with Craig Hallum Capital Group, who has given the company an neutral rating. "It's relatively favorable versus an outright sale which would have been the most lucrative."

Taubman Family Sells Its Interest In Sotheby's (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Carol Vogel

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

A. Alfred Taubman, the former chairman of Sotheby's who was convicted of leading a price-fixing scheme, sold his family's controlling interest in the venerable auction house to the company yesterday for stock and $168 million in cash.

DOJ_NMG_0003845

The deal closes the chapter on the Taubman family's long role at Sotheby's and has already ignited speculation that the transaction could be a precursor to a sale or merger of the company, the largest publicly traded auction house in the nation.

Mr. Taubman, a shopping mall mogul who owns The Beverly Center in Los Angeles and The Mall at Short Hills in New Jersey through his controlling stake in Taubman Centers, had bought his interest in Sotheby's in 1983. The acquisition was widely viewed as a glamour purchase, giving him and his wife, Judy, an entree to the titled families of the world.

Sotheby's also became something of a playground for Mr. Taubman - an architect by training - who used the auction house to test his flair for retailing. Over the years, he helped transform Sotheby's from a sleepy auctioneer frequented mostly by dealers to a glass-fronted one-stop shopping center offering a mix of customers everything from financing to appraisals, repairs and sales.

Under the terms of the deal, Mr. Taubman will cede control of the company for $168 million in cash and 7.1 million shares of common stock in exchange for the family's 14 million Class B shares. The family's Class B shares had given it 62 percent of the voting shares, despite its ownership of only 22 percent of the company's true financial interest. The Taubman family will continue to hold a stake in the company, owning 12 percent of both shares and votes.

The deal removes one of the company's two classes of shares, potentially making it more attractive to investors or a merger partner. "The dual class was increasingly being seen by the investing public with less warmth," William Ruprecht, Sotheby's chief executive, said.

Still, he denied that the company would be put up for sale. "Is this an intermediate step on the way to putting the business up for sale? The answer is no," he said, but added, "Every company on the New York Stock Exchange at some price can be acquired."

Mr. Taubman had made no secret of his interest in selling Sotheby's. Two years ago, after an eight-month search for a buyer, he took it off the market. While the company has had several flirtations with buyers, including several wealthy Asian individuals, employees there say, nobody has been willing to pay the high price Mr. Taubman believed Sotheby's was worth.

The price-fixing scandal sent Mr. Taubman to prison for 10 months starting in July 2002 after he was convicted of conspiring to rig auction prices with Sotheby's archrival, Christie's. Afterward, employees say, he lost interest in the auction house. His son, Robert, who joined the board, had little interest in the art world and was just keeping an eye on the family investment.

The exorbitant expenses of the price-fixing scandal drained Sotheby's cash. The company became so cash poor that two and a half years ago it was forced to sell its York Avenue headquarters to RFR Holding for $175 million.

In February 2004, Cendant, the travel, lodging and real estate services company, agreed to buy Sotheby's International Realty's residential real estate brokerage operations for about $100 million. Cendant, whose brokerage operations include Century 21, Coldwell Banker and ERA, pays the auction house a fee for the use of Sotheby's name.

Sotheby's has also had to turn to wealthy art dealers to help finance several major fine art consignments in order to compete with Christie's, whose owner, the luxury goods magnate François Pinault, gives it considerable financial support.

Banc of America Securities advised Sotheby's, and Bear Stearns advised the company's special committee. Allen & Overy provided legal counsel to Sotheby's, and Simpson Thacher & Bartlett provided legal counsel to the special committee.

Goldman, Sachs and Wachtel, Lipton, Rosen & Katz advised the Taubman family.

Archaeologists And Dealers Spar Over U.S.-Italian Art Accord (NYT)

By Hugh Eakin

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Lawyers representing art dealers and Sotheby's auction house sparred with archaeologists and cultural property experts on Thursday at a State Department committee hearing on the future of a sweeping agreement banning the import of antiquities from Italy.

Known formally as a memorandum of understanding, the five-year-old agreement is intended to reduce the flow of illicitly excavated Italian antiquities to the United States in return for heightened cultural cooperation between the Italian government and American arts institutions.

DOJ_NMG_0003846

In the hearing, before the State Department's cultural property advisory committee, archaeologists argued for the effectiveness of the agreement, which is set to expire in January unless it is renewed.

"The agreement has had very significant consequences," said Malcolm Bell III, a University of Virginia archaeologist and specialist in Sicilian archaeology, citing improved policing of looting of ancient artworks in Italy and the availability of long-term archaeological loans to American institutions.

Mr. Bell's comments were echoed by Patti Gerstenblith, a law professor at DePaul University and cultural property specialist, who said the agreement helped provide a basis for a growing number of international regulations for the antiquities trade.

But William Pearlstein, a lawyer representing several dealers, asserted that Italian officials were not living up to the agreement.

"In contrast to the love fest portrayed here, there is a not-so-quiet war between Italy and American museums against which it is trying to pursue cultural patrimony claims," he said, referring to Italian action to recover some artworks.

Representatives from some museums, including one from the Metropolitan Museum, attended the hearing but remained silent. Referring to their lack of participation, Mr. Pearlstein said that antiquities curators were "intimidated" by the threat of litigation from the Italian government.

Pressed to expand on his statement, he referred to a criminal case pending in Italy against Marion True, the antiquities curator of the Getty Museum in Los Angeles. Italian officials, he said, "are discriminating against museums against which they have patrimony claims."

Stefano Stefani, deputy chief of mission for the Italian Embassy, took issue with Mr. Pearlstein's comments after the hearing.

"If curators feel constrained to avoid acquiring illegal material, then that means it is working," he said, referring to the agreement.

Ms. True has been accused of conspiring to import looted antiquities. The case is a sensitive issue for the Getty as it prepares to reopen its renovated villa in Malibu, Calif., which houses many of the museum's Greek, Roman and Etruscan antiquities. Such objects were a passion of John Paul Getty, a collector and the museum's namesake. The museum has expressed confidence that Ms. True will be vindicated.

The Italian government has recovered 185,190 looted artifacts since the agreement was signed in 2001, compared with 96,472 in the five years prior to the agreement, according to figures provided by Italian officials. Italy has also expanded the number of loan exhibitions of archaeological material to the United States under the agreement, Mr. Stefani said.

Some critics of the agreement have suggested that any renewal of it should restrict the import ban to classes of objects that are in most danger or have particular significance to Italy's cultural heritage. The United States has restrictions on the import of antiquities with a several countries, but the accord with Italy is the most comprehensive.

The 11-member committee includes art dealers, museum officials and archaeologists. The panel will deliberate and make a recommendation to Dina Powell, assistant secretary of state for education and cultural affairs, who will make the decision whether to renew the agreement or allow it to expire.

Private Investors To Buy Hertz For $15 Billion (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

In one of the largest leveraged buyouts in more than a decade, the Ford Motor Company yesterday agreed to sell Hertz, the nation's largest rental car company, to a consortium of private investors for about $15 billion in cash and debt, executives involved in the negotiations said.

Ford is expected to announce the transaction as early as today, the executives said.

The sale, to a group including Clayton, Dubilier & Rice, the Carlyle Group and Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, is the latest super-sized buyout by a team of private equity firms.

DOJ_NMG_0003847

Earlier this year, a consortium of investment firms paid $11.3 billion for SunGard Data Systems, which provides software and services to financial companies.

The largest leveraged buyout ever remains the purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company of RJR Nabisco in 1989 for $25 billion.

The deal ends a heated auction for Hertz, which started after Ford announced in April that it was considering putting the company up for sale or spinning it off. The winning investor group beat another team that included Bain Capital Partners, the Blackstone Group, the Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners.

Ford's decision to sell Hertz, which produced about 10 percent of Ford's overall pretax profit in the second quarter of this year, underscores the company's urgent efforts to raise cash as sales continue to decline. Ford is expected to use the proceeds of the sale to pay down debt.

Hertz operates in 7,000 locations in more than 140 countries. Ford acquired the company in 1994 after supplying its fleet for decades. It was unclear last night whether Ford would continue to be the company's exclusive vehicle supplier or whether the new owners would seek deals with other manufacturers.

European Corporations Catch Merger Mania (WSJ)

By Jason SingerAnd Matthew Karnitschnig

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

A sudden surge in takeover activity in Europe, with more than $70 billion of potential deals disclosed in the first several working days of September alone, highlights a new willingness by European corporate chiefs to pursue mergers and acquisitions, executives say.

The deluge of activity is also unusual in its outright aggressiveness. Several are hostile takeovers, unsolicited advances, and bidding wars, suggesting that this region -- once known for its more genteel approach to business -- may have changed for good.

The deals, taking place across European borders and venturing into the U.S. and elsewhere, involve many industries. They are fueled by a confluence of factors, from companies finishing lengthy cost-cutting programs to sluggish economies at home forcing them to look abroad.

On Monday, Gas Natural SDG SA of Spain made a $28.5 billion unsolicited takeover attempt for fellow Spanish utility Endesa SA, which was rejected a day later, sparking a fight that is expected to drag on for months. Also on Monday, German energy giant E.On AG said it is considering making a bid for Scottish Power PLC of the United Kingdom, a company valued at $20 billion. And Deutsche Post AG, also of Germany, said it is trying to buy logistics concern Exel PLC of the U.K. for more than $7 billion.

While September is typically a busy time for deals -- Europeans have just returned from lengthy August vacations -- this year's activity is notable because the deals are bigger and there are more of them. The value of announced mergers between the beginning of August and early September is $123 billion, up from $33 billion in the year-earlier period, according to Thomson Financial.

While all these deals could fall through, executives and bankers say there are signs the spurt will continue. "You don't see an excessive concentration in any one sector. It's relatively widespread across country and industry," says Gordon Dyal, global head of M&A at Goldman Sachs.

A main driver of the new deal-making is a realization that shareholders have started rewarding ambitious tie-ups, after frowning on these actions since 2000. Chief executives noticed that shares of Pernod Ricard SA of France rose after it moved to take over larger U.K. spirits maker Allied Domecq PLC in April. The same thing happened when Italian bank UniCredito Italiano SpA made a move to take over HVB Group AG in Germany in Europe's biggest-ever cross-border banking deal. Usually, acquiring companies see their shares fall on fears of the financial strain from completing the deal.

"The market is increasingly receptive of chief executives doing deals that meet strategic needs," says Paulo Pereira, head of European M&A at Morgan Stanley.

DOJ_NMG_0003848

Gerard Kleisterlee, president and CEO of Philips Electronics NV in Amsterdam, says he is "constantly" looking at expanding key businesses through acquisitions.

Across Europe, many major companies have spent the past several years cutting costs so are now leaner and have cash to do deals. Some European sectors, such as banking and utilities, are highly fragmented so companies need heft to compete globally. Growth in several key markets, such as Germany and Italy, has slowed, prompting companies there to seek sales elsewhere. And, as the healthier firms start expanding, competitors race to acquire the best targets before they are gobbled up by rivals, starting a chain reaction that breeds the type of aggressive deals seen recently.

By contrast, for more than three years, European companies have looked inward, cutting costs and improving efficiency. Instead of using cash for deals, they paid it back as cash to shareholders in the form of stock buybacks and dividends, which reached records over the past year. Private-equity funds stepped in to fill the gap, and accounted for nearly half of all M&A deals.

While nearly every country in Western Europe has seen a big deal announced in recent weeks, the trend is particularly acute in Germany. In many cases, formerly state-owned enterprises have been driving the buying spree as they increasingly look abroad for growth. Companies also face more competition in Germany's deregulated markets along with stagnant domestic demand for their products.

At German media giant Bertelsmann AG, "for two years, we concentrated on getting the business in order," says Siegfried Luther, Bertelsmann vice chairman and chief financial officer. "As a result, we've strengthened our financial situation so it's natural that we'd shift our focus outside the company."

The closely held media company's recent agreed-upon acquisitions include: DVD retailer Columbia House in the U.S., a major German-language magazine publisher, a French bookstore chain and a U.K. broadcaster. The company has spent about €2 billion ($2.5 billion) in recent months and has an additional €500 million earmarked for the rest of the year.

Deutsche Telekom AG, which nearly collapsed under a debt load approaching €70 billion three years ago, also has returned to acquisition mode. The telecom giant, which has pared its debt to €44.5 billion, agreed last month to acquire an Austrian wireless operator for €1.3 billion.

Within Europe, German companies have focused in particular on the U.K., drawn by its large market and the absence of political barriers to foreign investment in sectors such as media and energy.

Indeed, some longstanding political obstacles to foreign acquisitions remain in some major Western European markets, notably France and Italy, prompting several recent fights for companies that attempt deals there.

EU, Spanish Antitrust Watchdogs Become Pawns In Takeover Battle (WSJ)

By Jason Singer In London, Mary Jacoby In Brussels And Keith Johnson In Madrid, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Swords already are crossed in Gas Natural SDG SA's $28 billion hostile takeover bid for domestic rival Endesa SA, with the two companies clashing over who would approve any potential deal: the Spanish government or the European Commission.

Each company is arguing to have the deal vetted by the regulator it thinks will be most sympathetic to its side.

At stake is the approval Gas Natural needs to proceed with the largest takeover attempt in Spanish history. Part of Endesa's defense strategy is to push to involve the commission, which is likely to be far more critical of the potential merger of two of Europe's largest utilities, people close to the matter say.

Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said in a briefing yesterday[THURS] that it is "still unclear" whether European Union antitrust watchdogs or Spanish regulators will judge the proposed takeover.

But Gas Natural Chief Executive Rafael Villaseca said Brussels has no authority over the proposed deal because both companies have more than two-thirds of their businesses in Spain, making it solely a domestic issue to be decided in Madrid.

According to documents given to investors by Gas Natural, the Barcelona-based company expects antitrust and other regulatory reviews to stretch until March. Only then could a tender offer begin.

The European electricity market has lately seen a flurry of deal making. Earlier this week, Germany's E.On AG said it was considering a takeover bid for ScottishPower PLC.

DOJ_NMG_0003849

Yesterday, Enel SpA of Italy said it has a war chest of as much as €14 billion ($17.4 billion) for acquisitions in Europe, as it reported a 17% drop in first-half net profit. Enel Chief Executive Fulvio Conti said he is closely monitoring the Spanish market as Enel feels the heat of increased domestic competition, but he ruled out a full counterbid for Endesa. "In Spain, we are interested in buying assets from Endesa, if Gas Natural puts them on the block," he said.

Mr. Conti said Enel still wants to buy 35% of France's Société Nationale d'Electricité et de Thermique, even if Endesa -- Snet's majority shareholder -- is bought by Gas Natural.

Past regulatory action on deals offers a hint at what Endesa is fighting for. Last year, Brussels blocked a deal among utilities in neighboring Portugal on grounds that the combination of a big gas distributor and an electricity firm would squelch competition and run afoul of antitrust safeguards. That decision is currently on appeal.

Spanish authorities, on the other hand, are expected to see Gas Natural's move in a more favorable light, people close to the situation say, because the combination of the companies would create a world-scale Spanish enterprise that, by some measures, would rank as the world's third-largest utility.

Spokesmen at the Spanish Finance Ministry, which oversees competition authorities, weren't available to comment.

Lawyers who specialize in European antitrust issues say Endesa won't be able to wrest control of the approval process from Madrid. European Commission merger rules say the regional body -- which is the executive arm of the EU -- can't review deals where the companies' operations are confined to one country, unless asked by that country to do so. It can "invite" a member nation to seek its assistance but can't force the issue, lawyers say.

"The rules are very clear," Mr. Villaseca said. The commission "doesn't have a way to disturb" the deal, he said.

Endesa Chief Executive Rafael Miranda met with EU officials Wednesday, but it was a long-planned meeting in which Mr. Miranda was acting in his role as president of Eurolectric, a trade group, an Endesa official said.

Endesa believes "in the interests of transparency that it would be a good idea for Brussels to review the operation," said Guillermo Rea, an Endesa spokesman. He said Endesa hasn't asked Spanish competition authorities to formally request an EU review, though all options are on the table.

If Spain asks for a review, "we would be happy to do so," said Mr. Todd, the European Commission spokesman.

--Vittorio Alessio in Rome contributed to this article.

Write to Jason Singer at jason.singer@wsj.com1, Mary Jacoby at mary.jacoby@wsj.com2 and Keith Johnson at keith.johnson@wsj.com3

Dell To Protect E-mail, Data For AMD V. Intel (REU)

Reuters, September 9, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO (Reuters) - Dell Inc. has agreed to retain e-mail and other documents that could be used against its close partner Intel Corp. in a private antitrust suit filed by Intel rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. , court papers show.

The agreement, filed on Wednesday in the U.S. District Court in Delaware, comes as AMD presses its case against Intel, accusing the world's largest chip maker of using its market power to lock out AMD and its microprocessors from computer makers such as Dell, Hewlett-Packard Co. and others.

Dell, the largest PC maker, buys microprocessors exclusively from Intel. The Texas-based PC maker agreed to preserve relevant information and copy hard drives of employees identified as "custodians" -- those who were involved in negotiating microprocessor purchases.

Among the 28 custodians listed were Michael Dell, the company's founder and chairman. Dell Inc. reserved its right to contest a subpoena for the documents.

AMD has sought information on pricing, contracts and other information from dozens of PC makers and distributors, and virtually all companies in the United States and Japan have agreed to take steps to protect data, AMD's lead counsel, Chuck Diamond, said in an interview.

AMD began talks with companies on legal document preservation in early July, Diamond said. A process of culling millions of pages of documents will follow before the case goes to trial. AMD has already served a subpoena on PC maker Gateway Inc. , according to court papers filed this week.

ADVERTISEMENT

Dell declined to comment on the agreement. "We're just not going to comment because it is an ongoing court matter," Dell spokesman Jess Blackburn said. Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy characterized the document preservation requests as procedural.

Intel and AMD at least agree on one thing. The case is poised to become the largest-ever electronic document discovery cases ever, as dozens of computer makers, distributors and retailers in countries around the world are called on to divulge data about their business relationships with Intel.

ENVIRONMENT:

Some In Senate Seek To Change Mercury Rule (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - With a deadline for action approaching, senators from both parties rallied support on Thursday for a resolution that would kill the Bush administration's proposed rule to limit mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants.

Appearing at a midday news conference, the senators said the rule was written to satisfy the utility industry and would take too long to produce benefits, causing serious health problems for thousands of people, especially pregnant women and young children living near the plants.

The senators are trying to send the rule back to the Environmental Protection Agency for reconsideration through a rarely successful procedure known as the Congressional Review Act, which allows lawmakers to challenge agency regulations through a resolution that is guaranteed a floor vote.

The deadline for the vote is Monday, although Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said other issues might force him to extend it by several days.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said, "It is sad and it is appalling to see how the agency has been captured by polluting special interests in decisions on limiting mercury pollution."

Mr. Leahy was joined by Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Senator James M. Jeffords of Vermont, an independent who generally votes with Democrats on environmental issues.

Ms. Collins said: "We want to give the E.P.A. a chance to fix the rule and do it right."

It is doubtful, however, that their effort will produce anything more than a symbolic protest. To force a change in the rule, the resolution would have to win majority votes in the Senate and the House as well as President Bush's approval - all of which are considered highly unlikely.

Only two Republicans, Ms. Collins and Senator Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, have expressed support for the resolution, and in the 10 years since the review act has been available, only one challenge has succeeded.

Mr. Leahy conceded that he did not know how the Senate might vote on the mercury resolution, saying, "We'll have to wait and see."

Power plants are the largest single source of mercury emissions in the country, accounting for more than 90,000 pounds of airborne mercury a year, about a third of the total output.

Until 2001, the emissions were governed by the Clean Air Act, which required plants to have the best available technology in place by 2009, improvements projected to lower emissions by 90 percent. The Bush administration changed course, removing power plants from Clean Air Act jurisdiction and proposing the first regulatory effort to cut the emissions with a plan to reduce output by 70 percent within 13 years.

Republicans, in general, favor the approach because it employs the kind of cap-and-trade system that proved effective in combating adverse effects of acid rain, and it is less expensive to power plant owners that alternatives. Under this system, a plant can exceed its permitted level of emissions by buying credits from a plant in the same region whose emissions are below what is allowed.

DOJ_NMG_0003851

Democrats and many environmental and public health groups have attacked the administration rule, saying it violates the law and has the potential to lead to unnecessarily high levels of health problems because of its delayed carrying out.

Dr. Leonardo Trasande, assistant director of the Center for Children's Health and Environment at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York, who joined the news conference, said a new study by his hospital found that each year 231 children nationwide suffer mental retardation caused by their mothers' exposure to mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants.

Industry groups were quick to attack the senators' effort, arguing that the proposed rule is the most efficient and cost-effective way to reduce mercury emissions.

"The best way to address concerns about mercury emissions from U.S. power plants is to leave the existing regulations in place," said Dan Riedinger, spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, a trade group of power companies that generate about 60 percent of the nation's electricity. "Sending E.P.A. back to the drawing board would only delay regulation of power plant emissions, not accelerate them, as Senator Leahy and others claim."

Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, a trade group, accused the senators of misusing the review act and taking up valuable Senate time when more pressing issues were facing the country.

"Frankly, we are quite surprised that the Senate may make time to even consider this petition," Mr. Segal said, alluding to the mounting problems caused by Hurricane Katrina. "We can hardly think of a worse time to be doing so."

3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Law.com, September 9, 2005

It's not too often that a federal judge declares that five of the judges on her own bench were wrong about a point of law in a string of decisions spanning a decade.

What's even rarer is when that lone judge learns, just days after she sticks her neck out, that she was right to do so -- due to the coincidence of an appellate court decision in an unrelated case that tackles the same legal question.

Both decisions are sure to grab the attention of environmental lawyers because they clarify the rules courts should use in deciding when a corporation may be held liable under the Superfund law on a theory of "successor liability."

On Aug. 31, U.S. District Judge of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania Anita B. Brody handed down a 37-page decision in Action Manufacturing Co. Inc. v. Simon Wrecking Co., in which she rejected the plaintiff's argument that Marcegaglia USA Inc. should share responsibility for the costs of an environmental clean-up in Malvern, Pa.

Lawyers for Action Manufacturing had argued that Marcegaglia was also liable as the successor-in-interest to Bishop Tube Co. because it had purchased the assets of Bishop Tube in a bankruptcy court sale.

To win its argument, Action Manufacturing had to persuade Brody to apply the so-called "substantial continuity" test.

Brody said she recognized that five of her Eastern District colleagues have applied the substantial continuity test in toxic clean-up cases brought under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act, or CERCLA, in a string of decisions spanning from 1993 to 2002.

Although the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has never endorsed the test, Brody found that, in light of the 1998 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Bestfoods, it is no longer good law, and that "the national trend is to reject the substantial continuity test."

As Brody described it, the substantial continuity test "is not part of the traditional doctrine of successor liability. ... Rather, the substantial continuity test, also known as the 'continuity of the enterprise test,' is often described as an expansion of the traditional 'mere continuation' theory of successor liability."

Under the traditional mere continuation theory, a purchasing corporation is liable as a "mere continuation" of the transferor corporation if, after the transfer of assets, there is an identity of stock, stockholders and directors between the two corporations.

But Brody found that the substantial continuity test "expands the mere continuation doctrine by making a purchaser of assets liable if it is a 'substantial continuation' of the seller corporation, even if there is no identity of stock and stockholders."

With no 3rd Circuit ruling on the point, Brody looked to other appellate courts and found that the circuits are split, with four circuits -- the 1st, 2nd, 6th and 9th -- rejecting the "substantial continuity" theory and only two -- the 4th and 8th -- endorsing it.

DOJ_NMG_0003852

Forced to choose, Brody looked to the 3rd Circuit's 1988 decision in Smith Land & Improvement Corp. v. Celotex Corp. which instructed courts to "follow federal common law" when deciding successor liability issues.

In passing CERCLA, the Smith Land court said, Congress "expected the courts to develop a federal common law to supplement the statute."

Brody also found that, in determining the content of federal common law, the 3rd Circuit "emphasized the need for national uniformity and the need to consider the general doctrine of successor liability in all states."

As a result, Brody concluded that the substantial continuity test must now be rejected. "Given Smith Land's concerns with national uniformity and given that courts in the 3rd Circuit must apply federal common law which consists of the general doctrine of successor liability applicable in most states, I follow the majority of circuit courts that have addressed this issue and conclude that the substantial continuity test should not be applied to determine successor liability in CERCLA cases," Brody wrote.

"The substantial continuity test is not part of federal common law because it is not part of the general doctrine on successor liability in operation in most states. Nor should I attempt to expand federal common law beyond traditional common law rules in order to encompass the substantial continuity test."

If Brody was wondering whether she got it right, she didn't have to wonder very long. On Tuesday, the 3rd Circuit handed down its 56-page opinion in United States v. General Battery Corp. Inc.

Writing for the court, Chief Judge Anthony J. Scirica said, "we return, once again, to the difficult area of indirect liability under CERCLA."

CERCLA, Scirica said, is a "sweeping" federal remedial statute that was passed in 1980 to ensure that "everyone who is potentially responsible for hazardous-waste contamination may be forced to contribute to the costs of cleanup."

But Scirica noted that the law "is not, however, a model of legislative draftsmanship," and that "successor liability is one of its puzzles."

Most of Scirica's opinion is devoted to a discussion of whether the two appellants -- General Battery and Exide Corp. -- were properly held liable on the government's argument that, due to a "de facto merger," they were the successors-in-interest to Price Battery Corp.

Upholding a ruling by Senior U.S. District Judge Ronald L. Buckwalter, Scirica concluded that "the de facto merger criteria are satisfied."

But in a brief, final section of the opinion, Scirica effectively upheld Brody's decision by rejecting Buckwalter's alternative holding that Exide would also be liable under CERCLA on a "substantial continuity" theory of successor liability.

Scirica noted that, prior to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Bestfoods, several courts had adopted the substantial continuity test as a basis for CERCLA successor liability. The substantial continuity theory, Scirica said, "eliminates certain elements of the de facto merger analysis -- including the continuity of ownership requirement —- and in effect creates a more expansive rule of liability than is accepted in most states."

But recently, Scirica found, several of the federal circuits "have rejected the doctrine as inconsistent with Bestfoods."

With just two sentences of discussion, Scirica said the 3rd Circuit was joining its sister circuits in rejecting substantial continuity.

"Bestfoods held that CERCLA does not, sub silentio, abrogate fundamental common law principles of indirect corporate liability," Scirica wrote. "Accordingly, 'substantial continuity' is untenable as a basis for successor liability under CERCLA."

In the case before Brody, Marcegaglia USA was represented by attorneys Robert W. Thomson, C. Shawn Dryer, Steven F. Baicker-McKee and Kevin K. Douglass of Babst Calland Clements & Zomnir in Pittsburgh. Action Manufacturing was represented by attorneys Larry Silver, David E. Romine and Sandra Gibbs of Langsam Stevens & Silver in Philadelphia.

In the 3rd Circuit case, Justice Department attorney John T. Stahr argued for the government; General Battery and Exide were represented by attorneys Robert L. Collings and Carl A. Solano of Schnader Harrison Segal & Lewis.

A Light In The Forests (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003853

The Bush administration has largely succeeded in its systematic effort to roll back environmental protections for America's national forests. It has weakened agreements to protect old-growth trees in the Pacific Northwest, persuaded Congress to adopt an industry-friendly plan for fire suppression and overhauled rules governing forest management in ways that erode safeguards not only for the forests but also for the endangered species that live there.

Now, however, a rebellion is brewing where the White House least expected it. Western governors are challenging the most controversial rollback of all: the decision to repeal a popular rule approved near the end of the Clinton administration to protect nearly 60 million acres of remote national forest from commercial development.

The attorneys general of California and New Mexico and the governor of Oregon have filed a suit charging that the administration failed to conduct necessary environmental reviews before imposing the new rule. They argued further that the rule would endanger "the last, most pristine portions of America's national forests," leading to excessive logging and destroying essential watersheds.

The lawsuit followed complaints from other governors, including Republicans, that the new rule would saddle them with impossible administrative burdens. The rule would requires states to survey all roadless areas within their borders and devise protection plans, then submit the plans to Washington for approval, with no guarantee of success.

The rebellion is an embarrassment for an administration that had assumed that the governors would leap at the chance to exercise states' rights. It now seems clear that the governors prefer a uniform national approach to federal roadless areas rather than piecemeal management.

The rebellion should also improve the prospects of a bill introduced by Sherwood Boehlert, Republican of New York, and Jay Inslee, Democrat of Washington, to restore the old roadless rule. Now that the governors have spoken, there seems to be no reason to further indulge the commercial interests of a few timber companies.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pelican Bay State Prison Gang Leaders Get Life Sentences (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, September 9, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO -- Five Pelican Bay State Prison gang leaders were sentenced Thursday to life in federal prison on various racketeering, drug and weapons violations after Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger commuted their state terms.

The inmates were already serving life sentences at the notorious state prison in Crescent City that houses California's worst offenders. With their convictions, they will be transferred to separate federal prisons around the country.

"By incarcerating these defendants in federal maximum security prisons, this organization's operational capabilities will be seriously disrupted," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

Defendants Cornelio Tristan, 44, James Morado, 57, Joseph Hernandez, 55, Gerald Rubalcaba, 50, and Tex Hernandez, 50, were leaders of the Nuestra Familia prison gang. They admitted that while they were behind bars, the organization murdered two former gang members and engaged in numerous drug transactions from which they profited.

The five defendants were the last of 22 Nuestra Familia members and associates sentenced in the federal case that began five years ago.

The U.S. Justice Department's key witness in the case, former Nuestra Familia leader Daniel Fred Hernandez, will soon walk free even though he admitted to selling drugs and committing other crimes while working for the government.

Hernandez, 42, cut a deal with federal prosecutors for a reduced sentence in return for providing evidence against fellow gang members. He was arrested nearly five years ago and faced life in prison on the same racketeering charges as the others.

As part of his plea deal, Hernandez agreed to wear a wire and set up drug and gun buys for fellow gang members.

Hernandez was sentenced Wednesday in San Francisco by U.S. District Court Judge Charles Breyer to 54 months in federal custody. He has already served 49 months and has received credit for good behavior.

Nuestra Familia originated about 40 years ago within prison walls among Hispanic inmates from rural Northern California as a way for members to protect themselves against rival prison gangs.

DOJ_NMG_0003854

Gang Leaders In Federal Hands (MHCA)

By Julia Reynolds And George B. Sanchez

Montery (CA) Herald, September 9, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO - The intense federal prosecution of Nuestra Familia leaders ended Thursday with a warning from the judge who has presided over the case since 2000.

"This was a very expensive prosecution, involving millions," U.S. District Court Judge Charles Breyer said after sentencing the gang's top five leaders to life in federal prison.

Federal prison officials now, he said, need to make sure they keep the gang from spreading throughout the country the way it spread though the California prison system.

The responsibility for keeping the gang under control is now in the hands of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, Breyer said.

Chained and surrounded by nine U.S. marshals in a specially modified courtroom, James "Tibbs" Morado, 57, Joseph "Pinky" Hernandez, 55, Gerald "Cuete" Rubalcaba, 50, Cornelio Tristan, 44, and Tex Marin Hernandez, 50, were all given life terms in federal prison with the condition that if they are ever released for any reason, they will be returned to California prisons.

"At the time of the pleas, I voiced concerns" about the potential for contamination of the federal system, Breyer said. "I think what I said then is true today. It is a serious concern."

California authorities also had expressed fears that federal officials might cut deals with the quintet that would enable some or all to be freed in exchange for cooperation.

U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan praised 10 agencies for their roles in the investigation, including the Monterey County Sheriff's Office and District Attorney's Office and the Salinas Police Department.

Operation Black Widow began with the promise of crippling the Nuestra Familia. In 2000, federal prosecutor Robert Mueller, now head of the FBI, began the case in Salinas with 11 indictments, saying the arrests would have "a dramatic impact on criminal activities" in Monterey County and elsewhere.

This week, it all ended quietly and without fanfare. Only a few onlookers attended Thursday's hearing.

The case had been at an impasse for nearly a year since the men agreed to life sentences in federal custody after pleading guilty to a single count of conspiring to conduct a criminal enterprise through a pattern of racketeering.

Federal prosecutors had assumed the state would quickly commute the defendants' life sentences so they could enter the federal system.

Some district attorneys protested the commutation, fearing the defendants could enter federal witness protection programs or become eligible for federal parole if it is reinstated.

Last week, the state's Supreme Court advised Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to relinquish the gang leaders from life sentences in California as long as federal authorities provided the necessary assurances.

On Wednesday, the governor signed commutation letters for each of the five defendants.

Thursday's sentencing hearing began with a moment of tension when attorneys realized the letters from the governor's office hadn't arrived. Once the faxed letters were delivered by U.S. Attorney Edward Torpoco, the proceeding went quickly.

Through their attorneys, the defendants asked for two changes to their pre-sentencing reports, which Breyer agreed to do.

One was that they be described as "Mexican" or "Mexican/Indian" instead of "White/Hispanic."

Another was a request to strike a description of the gang's communication methods that said coded messages are delivered by the defendant's spouses and girlfriends. Defense attorneys said the defendants felt the paragraph's language might be used to keep family members from visiting them in the future.

With the federal sentences finally handed down, the five are likely to be transferred from a holding facility in Dublin to various federal prisons within a few weeks.

Many of the original defendants were serving prisons terms in California when they were indicted federally.

The "final five" leaders all had life sentences. They were locked down for 23 hours a day in the security housing unit at Pelican Bay State Prison. Despite the heaviest security of any California prison, they managed to run one of the nation's most sophisticated criminal enterprises, issuing orders for murders and other crimes on the streets via smuggled messages or through inmates being paroled.

In an attempt to "cut off the head" of the gang, federal prosecutors teamed up with state law enforcement agencies to launch Operation Black Widow.

But some gang investigators, like Al Valdez of the Orange County District Attorney's Office, say that putting the gang's hard-core leaders into the federal system may broaden the gang's reach.

"They have plans and they have connections," he said. The gang may or may not succeed in gaining a strong base in federal prisons, he said, "but they certainly will attempt it."

Attorney Ann Moorman, who represents Rubalcaba, said the sentences were the "right result for this case."

Because the case never went to trial, some questions that surfaced during the years of waiting will never be answered.

One concern is the precise role played by criminal informants, whom defense attorneys said were too active in the gang's criminal activities while working as government witnesses. One key informant, Danny Hernandez, is expected to be released from custody within weeks although he committed numerous crimes with and without the knowledge of his FBI handlers during the investigation, according to FBI reports and other documents.

Assistant United States Attorney Edward Torpoco defended the use of criminal informants during Operation Black Widow.

"Law enforcement in the past has typically used whatever means it can within the bounds of the law to combat organized crime," he said.

"The alternative was to do nothing and that was not an acceptable alternative," Torpoco explained.

Another lingering question, as some investigators suspect, is whether the five leaders played a role in the death of 20-year-old Crystal Morado of Salinas, while they awaited trial. Crystal Morado married James Morado while he was in the Dublin facility, and was found slain several months later on Hecker Pass near Gilroy.

jreynolds@montereyherald.com.

George B. Sanchez can be reached at 753-6771 or gesanchez@ montereyherald.com.

Gang Members Arrested In Major Crackdown (MH)

By Mark Sherman

The Miami Herald, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - More than 650 suspected members of MS-13 and other gangs were arrested in the United States, Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras in a coordinated crackdown on violent Hispanic gangs, officials said Thursday.

But even as a senior FBI official set a goal of dismantling MS-13 in the next 18 months, police officials from the other countries described vast challenges in quelling gang activity in their prisons and disrupting recruitment.

The roundup, conducted Wednesday by 6,400 law enforcement officers in the five countries, was run out of FBI headquarters in Washington, FBI assistant director Chris Swecker said.

"Our end game is to take out the leadership elements especially," Swecker said at a news conference. "These arrests are a means to that end."

Police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said. Thirty-two people were arrested in California alone.

Authorities also arrested 237 people in El Salvador, 162 in Honduras, 98 in Guatemala and 90 in Mexico. The arrests in Mexico all took place in the southern Chiapas state, near the border with Guatemala.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among Central American immigrants. An estimated 10,000 MS-13 members are in the U.S., with the highest concentrations in Los Angeles, New York, northern Virginia and Maryland, the FBI said.

MS-13 may have as many as 50,000 members in the other four countries, officials said.

The foreign police officials said they are all but powerless to stop gang activity in the prison population. "The gang leader must die," said Gen. Mirna Suazo Rivera of the Honduran National Preventive Police.

In El Salvador, poor areas are fertile recruiting grounds, where "10,000 gang members have 10,000 families, brothers, sons, nephews, cousins," said Douglas Omar Garcia-Funes, the country's assistant director of investigations.

ON THE NET

FBI: http://www.fbi.gov

Gang Crackdown Nets 650 Suspects (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

MEXICO CITY — More than 650 suspected gang members were arrested in a five-nation crackdown, including scores in the southern Mexican state of Chiapas, officials said Thursday.

An FBI statement said more than 6,400 law enforcement officers in the U.S., Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras participated in the coordinated crackdown against gangs, particularly MS-13.

In Mexico, Chiapas suffers most from MS-13 because the state's southern border with Guatemala is a crucial transit point for Central American immigrants.

Gang members prey on largely defenseless migrants, robbing, raping and killing them, especially along a railroad line that runs from Chiapas to the U.S.-Mexico border.

About 1,500 state and local police officers participated in the Chiapas raids, said the state public security secretary, Horacio Schroeder Bejarano. No violence was reported.

Fifty-four of the 94 people arrested there were thought to be Central Americans. The others were Mexicans believed to have been recruited by the gang, also known as Mara Salvatrucha.

Bejarano said there was a warrant for each arrest. The detainees were wanted in various crimes, including homicide.

"These arrests are a consequence of meetings between the security agencies of all the countries in the region and were designed to hit the trans-border criminal gangs," Bejarano said. "They are a problem from Honduras all the way up to the United States."

FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said at a news conference that the operation was run from Washington.

U.S. police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said. Thirty-two of the arrests were in California.

Authorities also arrested 237 people in El Salvador, 162 in Honduras and 98 in Guatemala.

MS-13 originated in Los Angeles among Central American immigrants.

According to the FBI, an estimated 10,000 members of the gang are in the United States, with the highest concentrations in Los Angeles, New York, northern Virginia and Maryland.

MS-13 may have as many as 50,000 members in the other four countries, officials said.

Associated Press was used in compiling this report.

Massive International Sting Nets 660 (CNN)

By Terry Frieden, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- A massive international sweep targeting violent MS-13 gang members in the United States and Central America produced about 660 arrests, law enforcement authorities announced Thursday.

The two-day operation, which ended early Thursday, involved more than 6,400 government agents in five countries: the United States, El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Mexico. Top officials from each country coordinated from a joint command post at FBI headquarters in Washington.

"I haven't seen anything like this in 23 years," said veteran FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker, who oversaw the operation.

Alejandro Diaz de Leon, of the southern Mexican state of Chiapas, said, "There is no precedent in our law enforcement effort."

An estimated 10,000 members are in the United States, and while they have been most active in Los Angeles, New York and northern Virginia, other regions are gaining members.

Officials say Central America has about 50,000 MS-13 members, and that the operation is an important step in their common goal of eradicating the MS-13 gang in the next 18 months.

DOJ_NMG_0003857

Taking the gang members off the street is only a first step in solving El Salvador's gang problem, said Douglas Omar Garcia Fumes, assistant director of investigations there.

"They continue to operate even after they're arrested. Orders to kill are coming out of our prisons. We have only one maximum security prison," he said.

The operation's scope and collaborative effort "sent a message to MS-13 and other like gangs that their criminal enterprise and the violence they perpetrate will not be tolerated," Swecker said.

The Mara Salvatrucha (MS) gang was first formed in Los Angeles by young men from El Salvador. Most of the members have family ties to that country or to Honduras.

The largest number of arrests -- 237 -- was in El Salvador, where the brutal gang is entrenched. Other arrests included 162 in Honduras, 98 in Guatemala, 90 in Mexico and 73 in the United States.

U.S. cities with the highest number of arrests were: Los Angeles, with 20; San Francisco, with 12; Atlanta, six; and Charlotte, five.

Carrying out the raids in 13 states were agents from the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Immigrations and Customs Enforcement; and local police.

Last month 19 suspected MS-13 gang members were charged in a federal racketeering indictment accusing them of killings and other violent crimes. (Full story)

In May two MS-13 members were convicted for the murder of pregnant federal witness Brenda Paz. (Full story)

FBI Makes Arrests Against Violent Gang Members (KNBC-TV)

KNBC-TV, September 9, 2005

LOS ANGELES -- The FBI Thursday conducted a "coordinated, five-nation law enforcement effort" against violent gangs, including the notorious Mara Salvatrucha-13 organization, which has a large membership in Los Angeles.

"These gangs are organizing internationally, and so are we," FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said in a statement.

Thursday's actions included the participation of more than 6,400 police officers, federal agents or law enforcement personnel, operating in 15 states, as well as in El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Mexico. An unknown number of people were arrested.

The effort was part of a series of actions undertaken with state, local, federal and foreign agencies, coordinated by the FBI's National Gang Task Force, which was established last year to fight gang violence.

The task force's first main target was the Mara Salvatrucha-13, also known as MS-13. The gang's presence has been identified in 33 states, the District of Columbia, Mexico and a number of countries in Central America.

MS-13's estimated membership is more than 10,000 in the United States, with the largest concentration in Los Angeles, Northern Virginia, Maryland and New York.

Swecker described Thursday's operation as "historic ... unprecedented in scope."

"By bringing together resources from the local, state, federal and international law enforcement community, all levels of U.S. law enforcement and our international partners are working together and sharing information," Swecker said.

"This represents but a beginning, another step, in an ongoing national and international effort to go on offense and to strike back against gang violence," Swecker said.

FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (OREG)

By Noelle Crombie, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, September 9, 2005

Federal agents arrested five self-described MS-13 gang members on Wednesday as part of a nationwide crackdown on the notoriously brutal street gang.

The individuals were arrested on administrative immigration violations and were picked up in Portland, Gresham and Cornelius, authorities said. They have not been charged with a crime and face deportation.

Immigration authorities would not release the names, citing their practice of not identifying individuals accused of administrative violations.

DOJ_NMG_0003858

Robert Jordan, the top FBI agent in Oregon, announced the arrests, saying authorities are "seeing the beginnings of a movement of members to Oregon, and we are very serious about making sure MS-13 can't establish a strong foothold in our communities."

The suspected gang members were identified through criminal investigations throughout the country, said Dan Nielsen, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Portland.

Portland gang detectives said Wednesday they have not seen documented MS-13 activity in the area. Gang detectives rely on residents, gang members, and police reports from Portland officers as well as those from outside agencies to identify gang members and gang-related crimes.

Portland Police Officer Russ Corno, a member of the bureau's gang unit for eight years, said competing gang members typically alert police to the presence of another gang. He said officers have encountered a few claiming to be members of MS-13, but said "as far as them getting a major foothold or doing recruiting -- I don't think that it's going on here."

He said concerns about the violent gang are valid, but said they are not having an impact on the Portland area gang scene.

Last year, the FBI set up a national task force to focus on dismantling MS-13.

Experts say MS-13 is an international criminal organization -- trafficking in drugs, arms, alien smuggling, prostitution and home robberies.

Refugees fleeing the U.S.-backed civil war against guerrillas in El Salvador created the gang in a Salvadoran neighborhood of Los Angeles. MS is short for Mara Salvatrucha: "Mara" means gang in Salvadoran; "Salvatrucha" is the word for a Salvadoran male, and was used by guerrilla fighters in El Salvador. The 13 means the gang is a "Sureno" or Southern California Latino gang.

Federal authorities characterize the gang as a soulless, tattooed army of cutthroats, audacious enough to go to war with Central American political groups and California's most infamous gangsters.

Noelle Crombie: 503-276-7184; noellecrombie@news.oregonian.com.

FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, September 9, 2005

Five people who claim to be members of the brutal street gang called "M-S-13" face deportation after they were arrested for immigration violations.

Officials say none was charged with a crime. The immigration violations are part of the administrative procedure leading to possible deportation.

Robert Jordan, the top FBI agent in Oregon, announced the arrests Wednesday as part of a national crackdown. He said the FBI is serious about ensuring that M-S-13 can't establish a strong foothold in the communities.

Last year, the FBI set up a national task force to focus on dismantling MS-13, an international criminal organization that trafficks in drugs, weapons, alien smuggling, prostitution and home robberies.

Four Gwinnett Men Arrested In Gang Sting (GWINNDP)

By Bryan Brooks, Staff Writer

Gwinnet (GA) Daily Post, September 9, 2005

LAWRENCEVILLE — Four arrests were made Wednesday in Gwinnett County as part of an international investigation into the violent street gang “Mara Salvatrucha,” federal officials said Thursday.

Nationwide, 73 individuals were arrested in the FBI-led crackdown involving local police officers and federal agents in 15 states.

Also known as “MS-13,” the international gang has been implicated here and elsewhere in a number of violent crimes, including murder, aggravated assault, rape, firearms violations, drive by shootings and robberies, according to the FBI.

Six gang members were arrested across metro Atlanta, including four in Gwinnett, said FBI Special Agent Steve Emmett.

One arrest was made in Lawrenceville and the other three in unincorporated Norcross, Emmett said.

Although the FBI identified those arrested, Emmett declined to say where each individual was taken into custody.

"We're not going to stipulate who was where," he said. "There were searches conducted (in Gwinnett) and small amounts of marijuana were seized in some instances and various fake IDs and gang paraphernalia were noted."

Arrested were: Roman Aguilar, 24, Juan Claros, 29, Walter Hernandez, 22, Juan "Joker" Maye, 25, Pedro "Mousie" Maye, 20, and Gustavo "Conejo" Martinez, 24.

Martinez is the leader of a local "set of MS-13," according to the FBI, which said all six are in the country illegally and subject to deportation.

The Gwinnett County and Lawrenceville police departments participated in the operation that included the FBI, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

MS-13 has its origins in Los Angeles and El Salvador and is widely dispersed, although there are "clear indications" some within the gang are trying to organize it into a regional and national crime organization with strengthened ties to better established and more violent MS-13 cliques in Central America, according to the FBI.

As part of Wednesday's effort, law enforcement authorities in El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Mexico conducted separate but coordinated actions against MS-13 that netted 563 arrests, according to the FBI.

Gang membership in those four countries is estimated to be as high as 50,000. In the United States it is thought to be more than 10,000, with the largest concentration in Los Angeles, Northern Virginia, Maryland and New York, according to the FBI, which has created a task force to dismantle the gang.

Police Investigate Crime Spree (WMTV-TV)

By Natalie Swaby

WMTV-TV, September 9, 2005

"$45,000 to $55,000 on an average day," says Captain Richard Bach of Madison Police's North District.

Police claim that dollar figure is what their suspects brought in by allegedly stealing over the counter medications while having ties to MS-13, a violent gang.

"They are just one part of a larger organized group, there are many of these small groups of these people throughout the country that commit these types of crimes," explains Bach.

An FBI tip brought officers to a Northside Madison motel on August 29th.

A four hour stake out brought in the two suspects, 21-year old Leonel Avendano and 23-year old Elvis Fuentes-Lazo as well as two boxes of evidence.

Bach says, "in their possession was about $10,000 worth of stolen over the counter medication that they had stolen from about 22 Walgreens in the Madison area the day before."

Detectives interviewed the suspects who are from Houston.

According to Captain Bach, they made the trip to Madison, and allegedly mapped out area Walgreens. Police say their plan was to then steal merchandise, and send it to a company in Louisville, Kentucky.

Now the two men are being held in Dane County jail in connection with felony retail theft. Detectives are also looking into possible connections with MS-13.

"We have not had any encounters or information that the violent MS-13 gang is in Madison. We're not even saying that these were gang members. We are saying they had an affiliation with the gang as far as this criminal activity," says Bach.

MS-13 is a gang that originated in El Salvador, but has spread into the United States. Members are trained in warfare and weapons. This gang is often connected to violent crimes, homicides, and drug deals.

Baggage Handlers Jailed In Smuggling Probe (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 9, 2005

The illegal drugs were transported in suitcases on American Airlines flights departing from Port-au-Prince and arriving at MIA, sources said. The baggage handlers received tips about which luggage contained the cocaine, so they could unload it to evade authorities.

Some of the defendants arrested Thursday are expected to appear today in federal court in Fort Lauderdale, the sources said.

DOJ_NMG_0003860

The unsealed indictment names 11 defendants, including one who is still at large. The investigation, by the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is targeting other suspects.

Officials with the FBI, which is leading the inquiry, declined to comment.

According to sources, the investigation of baggage handlers at MIA is unrelated to the DEA's three-year investigation of cocaine trafficking and money laundering in the administration of deposed Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, who is in exile in South Africa.

That investigation has led to conspiracy charges against at least 14 defendants. Most have pleaded guilty.

MIAMI-DADE

SEX-OFFENDER LAW VOTE DEFERRED

Miami-Dade County commissioners deferred voting on an ordinance Thursday that would have barred sexual offenders from living within 2,500 feet of a private or public school -- a distance more than twice the limit imposed by Florida statute.

"We just want to make sure this is constitutional," said Commissioner Jose "Pepe" Diaz, one of the sponsors of the proposed laws. Municipalities within Miami-Dade had expressed concern about a law that would supersede local rules regarding sexual offenders, and concerns about the legal ramifications of an overly broad law have surfaced in recent weeks.

MIAMI

TRIAL OF NFL'S TAYLOR DELAYED UNTIL OCT. 24

A judge has delayed the trial of Washington Redskins safety Sean Taylor on aggravated assault charges until Oct. 24.

The trial had been scheduled to begin Monday, one day after the Redskins open their season against the Chicago Bears. Taylor's attorney, Edward Carhart, said he needs more time to take witness statements and gather other evidence for his client's defense.

Prosecutors did not object to the delay, which was granted Thursday by Miami-Dade Circuit Judge Mary Barzee.

Taylor, a former University of Miami standout, allegedly was among a group of people who got into an armed confrontation over an all-terrain vehicle. Prosecutors say Taylor pointed a gun at someone during the dispute. He is charged with aggravated assault with a firearm and simple battery.

Taylor, who pleaded not guilty, faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted. Taylor signed a seven-year, $18 million contract after being drafted by the Redskins in 2004.

AVENTURA

CITY HALL TO TURN INTO A CONCERT HALL

With no dedicated space for cultural activities and the desire to have more events in the city, Aventura officials are getting creative with the space they have.

The upstairs atrium of the government center will be transformed into a piano concert hall 3 p.m. Nov. 6 when the winners of the Murray Dranoff International Twin Piano Competition come to play.

There are no museums, concert halls or theaters within Aventura's city limits. And a push to bring one there died about two years ago.

The concert will be the first of what they hope will be a series. Featured to play are 1993 winners, Elizabeth Laich and Marcel Bergmann and 2003 winners, Per Tengstrand and Shan-Shan Sun.

For the concert, the city will bring in up to 250 folding chairs. The concert will be free for residents, and tickets will be given on a first come first serve basis.

DESIGN DISTRICT

BENEFIT TO AID HAITIAN ORPHANS

South Floridians wishing to help the orphaned children of Haiti can do so today by bringing everything from bars of soaps to their checkbooks to an evening fundraiser at Gigi's Bistro, 190 NE 46th St. in Miami's Design District.

The charity happy hour between 6 and 10 p.m. will benefit Mercy House Orphanage of Haiti, which provides a home and schooling to some of Haiti's smallest and neediest citizens in Port-au-Prince.

Among the items the charity hopes to collect for an upcoming trip later this month: toothpaste and child-size toothbrushes, pencils and pens, nonelectric pencil sharpeners, erasers, durable color markers, pencil cases and composition notebooks.

DOJ_NMG_0003861

For further information,contact Julie Katrude, 305-803-4168.

Drug Cash Smuggling Booming On U.S.-Mexico Border (REU)

By Tim Gaynor

Reuters, September 8, 2005

TIJUANA, Mexico (Reuters) - When the Mexican customs light blinked red at the border crossing with the United States, the driver of the white Chrysler van panicked, put his foot on the gas pedal and made a dash south for Tijuana.

Stopped a few hundred yards down the road, agents found $1,023,000 dollars in $20, $50 and $100 bills crammed into the dash, glove box and even the cloth seat backs of the vehicle traveling from Los Angeles.

For decades, U.S. law enforcement agencies have clamped down on Mexican drug cartels hauling cocaine, marijuana, heroin and amphetamines north over an ever-more tightly watched border to the United States.

Now, with stricter controls on bank accounts and wire transfers, officials are concerned that drug gangs are increasingly running illicit profits back to Mexico in piles of hard cash in cars, trucks and even on foot.

U.S. authorities have seized almost $40 million in bank notes headed into Mexico since 2002 and say cases like that of the van, which was stopped at random crossing into Tijuana in June, are just the tip of the iceberg.

"Bulk currency smuggling is probably the most important part in the war on drugs, although it's not addressed as widely as it should be in law enforcement circles," said Dan Burke, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement supervisory special agent in San Diego.

"Usually when you get a million bucks there's a lot of high-fiving going on, but every single day $1-$2 million in drug money goes across the border here undetected," he added.

STRICTLY CASH

For years, drug gangs bought up houses, cars and luxury goods with cash in the United States and banked billions in profits to send back to Mexican and Colombian suppliers through electronic transfers.

But in 2000, the U.S. Bank Secrecy Act slapped reporting requirements on all cash transactions over $10,000, curtailing the cartels' spending sprees and making cash smuggling attractive for repatriating earnings, agents say.

"Wire transfers and bank accounts can be traced and assets seized, as can investments such as condos and horses and so on," said John Fernandes, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's special agent in charge in San Diego.

"The predominant method now for the cartels is to say, 'Give me the cash; I'll handle it once it's south of the border,'" he added.

Once in Mexico, where banking oversight is less strict and corruption rife, bundles of greenbacks are laundered through businesses including currency exchange houses and construction projects in cities such as Tijuana, Guadalajara and the Caribbean resort of Cancun.

Law enforcement agencies have no estimate for the amount of drug profits flowing back over the border in cash each year, although U.S. Bureau of Customs and Border Protection figures indicate that it is on the rise.

While the number of currency seizures has remained steady at around 300 in recent years along the border, the average value of each almost doubled to $38,200 in the first months of this year, up from $21,600 in 2002.

The busts are widespread at border stations from California to Texas, where agents in Laredo plucked $1.7 million in notes from the quarter panels of a southbound Honda Accord in an incident in February that set a port record.

Hard currency seizures are also vigorous within the interior of the United States, where the Federal Bureau of Investigation netted $12 million bound for the so-called Juarez cartel in just one operation last year, dubbed "Baja Kings."

THE WEAKEST LINK

Law enforcement agents working to hunt down drug proceeds say that while banking laws are adequate to crack down on money laundering in the United States, cross-border cash smuggling remains a weak link.

At present bulk currency seizures are made through intelligence tips and random outbound operations at dozens of border stations along the U.S. side of the 2,000-mile (3,200-km) border.

DOJ_NMG_0003862

In Mexico, meanwhile, searches are left to chance as cars and pedestrians are only stopped and searched if they trigger a red light, which flashes randomly, at a customs service post, either at the border or at inland checkpoints dubbed "retenes."

As the result of campaigning within the law enforcement community Burke has succeeded in getting a sign put up just north of the Mexico border near San Diego, warning drivers they must declare "currency or negotiable instruments" over $10,000, which he counts a small victory.

"The biggest problem is the lack of outbound facilities (to carry out searches) and the lack of a method to search vehicles going into Mexico for currency," Burke said.

"We get our victories here and there, we seize $100,000 or $200,000 here or there, but I know at the back of my mind that I'm not even making an impact," he added.

Drug Crackdown Nets 44 Arrests (SFC)

By Maria Alicia Gaura, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 8, 2005

(09-08) 12:25 PDT East Palo Alto (SF Chronicle) -- A crackdown on organized drug gangs in East Palo Alto has resulted in 44 arrests and the seizure of $500,000 worth of crack and powdered cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, police officials announced today.

Police are searching for another 12 fugitives connected with the case. Spurred by a rising tide of violence and homicides in East Palo Alto, which has seen 13 killings since January, local officials teamed up with an array of state and federal law enforcement agencies to crack down on drug gangs that have taken over local parks and terrified residents here.

“Our message to the community, and to the criminals not caught up in this particular operation, is that this is not the end, this is just the beginning,” East Palo Alto Mayor David E. Woods said at a morning news conference in Redwood City. “We will rid the city of this element at all costs.”

East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis said the city acted on lessons learned in the early 1990s, when gang warfare and 42 homicides in one year made the town the per-capita slaying capital of the United States.

“We made promises at that time that we would never let the violence rise as high as it was in the ’90s,” Davis said. Officials sought help from state and federal agencies in March, when the city had experienced four homicides, but observers could tell that gang violence was on the rise.

The resulting collaboration with the Mobile Enforcement Team — a special group of agents within the federal Drug Enforcement Administration — brought together officers from Palo Alto police, the San Mateo County Sheriff’s Department, the San Mateo County Narcotics Task Force, the U.S. Attorney’s Office, the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and U.S. Immigration and Customs.

In the course of serving 20 search warrants, agents seized 6.1 pounds of crack cocaine, 3.8 pounds of powdered cocaine, 2.7 pounds of methamphetamine, 3.5 pounds of heroin, five vehicles, 17 firearms and $129,113 in cash. Those arrested face anywhere from 10 years to life sentences in prison, according to DEA Special Agent Javier F. Pena.

Dozens Arrested In Drug Sting (SFE)

By Ed Carpenter

San Francisco Examiner, September 8, 2005

REDWOOD CITY — Narcotics agents Thursday announced 45 arrests in a criminal dragnet in East Palo Alto, saying the arrests were the first in an ongoing attempt to disrupt drug dealing and gang activity in the city.

More than $600,000 in drugs, weapons and cash was seized as part of a five-month undercover investigation by East Palo Alto police, the San Mateo County Narcotics Task Force, the Drug Enforcement Administration, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Eleven fugitives remain at large.

"This is probably the largest drug operation in East Palo Alto since 1992," police Chief Ronald Davis said. For many local residents, 1992 marked a low point in the city's history when it was branded as a criminal hotbed and 42 murders occurred.

East Palo Alto Mayor David Woods said the sting was the beginning of a concerted effort to take back control of the city streets and make them safe for children. "I want every citizen to know that the [City] Council is fully dedicated of ridding the city of this element and will at all costs," Wood said. "The violence is not acceptable. The drug action is not acceptable. And it will not be tolerated."

DOJ_NMG_0003863

Sheriff Don Horsley said the DEA was brought in for its Mobile Enforcement Team program, which can be deployed to a city to investigate individuals and organizations involved in drug trafficking. "We asked that the DEA come and give us a hand on this, in light of an 18-month upswing in gang violence" in East Palo Alto and other Peninsula cities." Since January, 13 people have been shot to death in East Palo Alto.

Horsley pledged to continue working with state and federal authorities to gather intelligence on the most violent gangs and those responsible for drug distribution in the county over the long term. The increased gang activity in East Palo Alto and on the Peninsula in general can be largely attributed to recruitment efforts by prison parolees looking to regain territorial control in the area, police said.

Police plan to analyze guns seized as part of the investigation to determine whether they have been used in recent shootings or other crimes. "I think this was an incredibly successful investigation," Horsley said.

San Mateo County Supervisor Rose Jacobs Gibson, who represents the area, said the arrests are the first steps in taking back street corners and park such as Jack Farrell in East Palo Alto that have been overrun by methamphetamine and cocaine dealers.

Survey Shows 9% Decline In Teen Drug Use (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) — The percentage of Americans using illicit drugs declined slightly last year, though the results were more pronounced for youths, according to a survey released Thursday.

For people ages 12-17, there was a 9% drop in illicit drug use between 2002 and 2004, the federal government announced.

"Today's survey confirms the welcome trend on teen drug use," said John P. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Overall, 19.1 million Americans used illicit drugs last year, or 7.9%. The numbers were basically the same for the surveys taken in the previous two years, when about 8% of Americans reported using illicit drugs within the previous month.

The National Survey on Drug Use and Health is an annual survey of close to 70,000 people. It measures drug and alcohol use through several categories, including age, ethnicity and type of drug.

The survey showed that illicit drug use dropped from 11.6% to 10.6% among youths ages 12-17 from 2002 to 2004.

However, binge drinking, which is defined as five or more drinks in one setting, increased in the same age group — from 10.6% to 11.1% from 2003 to 2004.

Officials with the Marijuana Policy Project said federal officials "consistently pay no attention to this alarming situation." The group seeks the regulation of marijuana in the same manner alcohol is regulated.

"Unlike occasional marijuana use, binge drinking can actually kill you," said Bruce Mirken, director of communications for the organization.

Federal officials said they are not ignoring binge drinking. The government is focused on getting the word out to young people that alcohol is not safe, said Leah Young, a spokeswoman for the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

The survey also showed that 70.3 million Americans used tobacco products, which is a slight decline from the previous two years. The percentage of tobacco users among Americans ages 12 and older dropped from 30.4% to 29.2%.

Copyright 2005 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

S.A. Couple Plead Guilty To Playing Role In Drug Ring (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff Writer

San Antonio Express-News, September 9, 2005

A San Antonio couple pleaded guilty Thursday to charges they were involved in a drug-distribution cell linked to the Texas Mexican Mafia that used a local police officer to avoid detection.

Mike Flores, 33, and his girlfriend, Toni Lopez, 35, also admitted that federal prosecutors could show at trial that they dealt heroin and cocaine and that then-San Antonio police officer Enrique Hinojosa, 32, tipped them off to drug investigations. The conspiracy is alleged to go back to at least April 2001.

Flores pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute more than 100 grams of heroin, and Lopez pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting the possession of heroin. Their pleas came just days before their trial was to begin.

Hinojosa, who worked with the San Antonio Police Department from January 2001 to March 2004, is now the only one in the case scheduled for trial Monday before U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia.

Hinojosa faces charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin, aiding and abetting the possession of heroin and two counts of aiding and abetting the possession of cocaine. He has pleaded not guilty.

The plea bargain documents said Hinojosa has known Flores since grade school and that the two were in a West Side gang as teenagers. The documents said Hinojosa would let Flores know when police units that target known drug dealers were in the area where Flores lived or operated, and that Hinojosa drove Flores to locations where Flores would make drug deals.

During the investigation, narcotics detectives raided Flores' home on Sept. 11, 2003, and found 9 ounces of black tar heroin, 1.68 ounces of cocaine, an ounce of cut heroin and $26,827 in cash. Hinojosa was in the home, the documents said, and he gave investigators inconsistent statements about his involvement.

Hinojosa was placed on indefinite suspension on March 4, 2004, a San Antonio police spokeswoman said.

The documents said investigators learned that Hinojosa also told Flores that police were after Ralph Peña, 33, who is Lopez's ex-husband and son of Heriberto "Herb" Huerta.

Law officers contend Huerta, 52, who is serving life in a federal prison in Florence, Colo., is still the president of the Texas Mexican Mafia and runs the gang via a network of relatives and associates inside and outside prison.

The documents said Lopez visited Huerta in prison during the course of the investigation. Last month, federal agents seized the $13,000 in Huerta's commissary account, alleging it is the fruits of the gang's collection of a street tax levied on drug dealers in San Antonio. A week later, Peña was arrested on a charge of being a felon with a gun.

Flores and Lopez face five to 40 years in prison when they are sentenced Dec. 8.

IMMIGRATION:

Local Police Can Enforce Laws On Immigration (DANNT)

By Chipp Reid, THE NEWS-TIMES

Danbury (CT) News-Times, September 9, 2005

DANBURY — Earlier this year, Mayor Mark Boughton wanted the federal government to deputize state police officers so they could enforce immigration laws.

As it turns out, the extra authority might not have been needed.

A recently unearthed U.S. Justice Department memo says state and local cops can make arrests after traffic stops if they find civil immigration violations, such as someone overstaying a visa.

No specific federal authority is needed for local officers to make such arrests, according to the 2002 memo, which came to light in a recent court case.

Danbury officials said the memo will have little impact on law enforcement in a city that has seen a sizable increase in South American immigrants in recent years.

At the same time, however, Danbury officials confirmed city police officers are checking the immigration status of some drivers and making some arrests on immigration charges.

They complained, however, they receive little help from the federal government in prosecuting the cases.

"The problem of enforcement is not at the local level," Boughton said. "We don't get the cooperation we need from Immigrations and Custom Enforcement."

DOJ_NMG_0003865

Boughton said he remained committed to having Danbury police enforce immigration laws as necessary. He said the arrests most often occur when a driver is stopped for speeding or other offenses and turns out to not have a license. "That immediately mean we start asking more questions," Boughton said.

The mayor emphasized police must have some reason other than the driver being Hispanic to make the stop. "These are routine traffic stops for speeding or not wearing a seat belt," Boughton said.

The Associated Press reported Thursday the 2002 memo was issued by then-Attorney Gen. John Ashcroft and his staff. It overturned a 1996 letter from Justice Department lawyers that said state and local police could enforce only criminal immigration violations, such as sneaking across a border.

The memo came to light recently when a coalition of civil rights and immigrants' rights groups sued the Justice Department to comply with a Freedom of Information Act request.

The American Civil Liberties Union, among others, has criticized the memo. The ACLU said the memo stretched the definition of the role of local police so far that it could be used to justify giving them the right to enforce the U.S. tax code, environmental rules and other federal laws.

In Danbury, there appears to be little desire to greatly expand the role of officers. Boughton dropped his proposal to deputize state police earlier this year when it found little support among law enforcement officials.

There is no support, right now, to either resurrect the plan or to use city police to conduct immigration sweeps.

"It's pointless for us to try (crack down) locally because we have nowhere to put people we may arrest on immigration violations," Boughton said.

Danbury Police Chief Alan D. Baker said it would cost too much to train the city's 150 officers in immigration law.

"We have enough to do as it is with quality-of-life issues," said Baker. "We have other areas where we need to devote our resources, which are already stretched thin."

Baker said no one knew much about the 2002 memo, and said it would likely "have absolutely no impact on what we do."

Maria-Cinta Lowe, executive director of the Danbury Hispanic Center, however, said she feared the Justice Department ruling could lead to further abuses against ethnic minorities.

"I think it's crazy," Lowe said. "In the first place, why would you put more work on the police? They already have enough to do and they are very good. But, if you give them even more power, I am afraid then that the power could corrupt some police officers."

She also took issue with city police making immigration arrests based on traffic stops. She believes that could lead to racial profiling.

"I am very concerned about this, because who are the immigrants," Lowe said. "It is the Ecuadoreans, the Brazilians, all the people like that. I think it is crazy to do this, to put even more work on the police."

Baker agreed police had to walk a fine line in enforcing the immigration laws.

"Here in Danbury we do work closely with immigration officials as needed, but we also want to keep positive relations with groups like the Hispanic Center," he said. "We don't want anyone to be afraid to work with the police."

Immigrant License Bill Is Sent To Governor (LAT)

By Robert Salladay And Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

SACRAMENTO — The fate of a bill that could extend driver's licenses to illegal immigrants remained unclear today as some Californians condemned it and others praised the measure.

The state Senate today passed the measure and sent it to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, despite signals that the Republican governor would veto it. With limited debate, the Senate this afternoon approved the bill on a 21-15 vote, the bare minimum needed for passage in the upper house.

After a late-night debate on the politically sensitive issue of immigration, the California Assembly on Wednesday passed the proposal.

Schwarzenegger vetoed a similar bill last year, but his position on the current legislation was not known.

DOJ_NMG_0003866

The measure would clear the way for California to create a distinct driver's license, with a unique design and color, for people who cannot prove legal residency in the United States. The license could be used only for driving and would not be valid identification for other purposes, such as opening a bank account or boarding an airplane.

In Santa Ana, Adolfo Sierra, president of Casa Guanajuato, a nonprofit that promotes culture of that central Mexican state, said he has mixed feelings about the proposal.

"It's not fair. We should all be treated equally," he said. "I'm an immigrant and I feel this could increase prejudice against all of us."

Pablo Alvarado, coordinator of the National Day Laborer Organizing Network in Los Angeles, said he expected Schwarzenegger to block the measure.

"I think it's unfortunate that the governor seems ready to veto a bill designed to ensure the safety of the drivers in the state," said Alvarado. "If you have a driver's license, you can insure yourself."

Andy Ramirez, founder of the citizen group Friends of the Border Patrol, said the bill is "an absolute sham."

He said he lobbied the governor's staff to urge a veto.

The driver's licenses "are de facto ID cards," Ramirez said, and the Legislature "is trying to legitimize them being here. If you give them a driver's license, you are legitimizing them and approving of what they have done, which was to break the laws of our nation."

The bill, SB 60 by Sen. Gil Cedillo (D-Los Angeles), would also allow roughly 800,000 people in California who have applied to federal immigration officials for legal residency to get a California driver's license starting as soon as March.

The bill passed the Assembly 42 to 34.

Cedillo said he included several elements in the latest bill aimed at overcoming objections from Schwarzenegger, who last year vetoed a similar bill sponsored by Cedillo. But before the state Assembly took up the bill Wednesday, there were no indications that the changes would satisfy the governor.

The governor's office has consistently said Schwarzenegger does not want to take any action until the federal government finishes deciding its requirements for state licenses -- changes spawned by concern that terrorists or other criminals could get such documents.

Congress gave states the option to create distinct driver's licenses for illegal immigrants under the Real ID Act passed in May. That sweeping law will require most states to change the information they include on driver's licenses, the documents they require to issue a license and how they store driver's license data.

Before adopting their own new laws, most states are waiting to see what regulations the federal Department of Homeland Security issues to implement the Real ID Act. Those regulations are expected next year.

At least two states — Utah and Tennessee — passed laws providing the licenses.

David Lubell, coordinator of the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Rights Coalition, said the proposed California license would be similar to his state's "driving certificate," which gives driver's rights to undocumented immigrants.

Tennessee issued 16,000 certificates in the last year.

In March, Utah began issuing a "driver's privilege card," which looks different than driver's licenses. The card is available to applicants who lack a Social Security number.

Leo Bravo, of the Hispanic Center of Cache Valley in northern Utah, said the card is helping undocumented immigrants in his state.

"We are better off than other states in the Union. People will drive even if they don't have licenses," said Bravo. "They don't have insurance. They are not protected and we are not protected. If we are worried about national security, it's better to know who we have driving on the roads."

On the California Assembly floor, Democrats argued that the bill would improve highway safety in California by ensuring that most drivers are licensed, trained and insured.

"This is a good bill because I believe it's the right thing to do because individuals are here and they're driving and that's the reality," said Assemblyman Jerome Horton (D-Inglewood).

Republicans argued that the bill would reward people for breaking the law.

DOJ_NMG_0003867

Assemblyman Doug La Malfa (R-Richvale) asked how he could teach his children to follow rules "when the California state Legislature is making rules that cause people to not have to obey the law."

But the 90-minute debate focused less on the details of the bill than on the politically sensitive issue of immigration.

"Illegal immigration is an enormous cost to this state," said Assemblyman Mark Wyland (R-Escondido). "And what this does is propose to legitimize that."

Assemblyman Alberto Torrico (D-Newark) argued that undocumented workers, through taxes taken from their wages, "put in more than they're taking out."

"The reward is not the driver's license," he said. "People come to this country because of the jobs and the economic opportunity and to get what every one of us wants for our children ... a better life."

In an attempt to head off Schwarzenegger's concern that California should wait until the federal government details the requirements of the Real ID Act, Cedillo amended his bill last week to incorporate such a delay.

Cedillo argues that his bill will help all 22 million Californians with driver's licenses by giving the Department of Motor Vehicles the authority to begin changing its procedures, computers and staffing to meet all the requirements of the federal Real ID Act by the May 2008 deadline. If California misses that deadline, its residents cannot use their driver's licenses for official federal purposes.

With his popularity eroded and polls showing voters displeased with the initiatives he has embraced on the November ballot, Schwarzenegger risks alienating loyal voters if he signs Cedillo's bill."

It would be horribly disappointing" if the governor did not veto the bill, said Mike Spence, president of the California Republican Assembly.

Schwarzenegger has until mid-October to act on the bill.

Where's The Governator Now? (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger was a profile in timidity this week when he vowed to veto a pioneering bill authorizing gay marriage in California. The bill, which both houses of the Legislature passed by narrow margins, would expand the definition of marriage to include a civil contract between two people, not exclusively a man and woman. This was an enlightened and fair-minded stand that made California's Legislature the first in the nation to approve same-sex marriages.

Too bad Mr. Schwarzenegger could not find the courage to sign the bill into law. Instead, even before receiving the bill, he announced a tortured rationale for vetoing it. For years, social conservatives have accused judges of deciding social issues that should be left to legislators. Now Mr. Schwarzenegger wants to ignore his Legislature and leave gay marriage to the courts or the voters at large to decide.

He relies on a fig leaf: five years ago, Californians voted overwhelmingly for a ballot measure that recognized only heterosexual marriages as valid. A statement by the governor's press office declared, "We cannot have a system where the people vote and the Legislature derails that vote."

That ignores the fact that five years is an eternity in the fast-moving arena of gay rights. Even though 61 percent of the voters approved the ballot measure, recent polls show that the electorate is now evenly split, with Democrats and independents favoring same-sex marriage and Republicans strongly opposed. The Legislature is hardly a renegade body if it roughly mirrors popular opinion.

Mr. Schwarzenegger also seems to have forgotten that this nation was founded as a republic, in which the citizens elect legislators to govern on their behalf. Such representative democracy is especially important when it comes to protecting the fundamental rights of minorities, who may face bigoted hostility from some segments of the electorate.

It's easy to guess why Mr. Schwarzenegger was in such a hurry to announce his veto. Although he was initially hailed as a centrist Republican superhero who could appeal to a broad range of voters, his popularity has plummeted, and polls show that most Californians are inclined to oppose his re-election. Only his Republican base continues to back him.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's own views of gay marriage are hidden beneath vague, elusive, sometimes contradictory comments that add up to ducking the issue. The former Mr. Universe who has derided political opponents as "girlie men" is afraid to say what he really thinks. He falls back on a rationale that would leave the issue to the courts or another vote of the people. Anything to get him off the hook.

DOJ_NMG_0003868

Squatter At Minn. School Ordered Deported (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - BLOOMINGTON, Minn.-A Mexican immigrant who was found living at a high school last winter must leave the country, an immigration judge decided Wednesday.

Francisco Serrano was ordered to depart within 120 days, though he plans to appeal the decision.

"It's not what I expected - I'm dejected," he said. "I just want to go to college, have a career and go back to my country ... for sure, I'm going to pray."

Serrano, who is in his early 20s, hid at Apple Valley High School, which he had once attended, and was arrested by immigration officials after he was discovered in the school's boiler room.

He has said he and his family moved to Connecticut after his sophomore year here. He said he returned to Minnesota on Christmas Eve with only $200 in his pocket.

Serrano's situation drew some support from parents who e-mailed the school after the man was discovered, though the school was also criticized for allowing someone to live there undetected.

Tim Counts, a spokesman for the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said it was a clear case of someone abusing their visa privileges.

"The circumstances of his discovery (at the school) were unusual, but the facts of the case are quite common," Counts said. "He came in on a visitor's visa and didn't leave when it expired, and therefore he was in the country illegally."

Serrano said he spent three weeks in the school of 2,300 students - though officials could only confirm he was there two weeks - sometimes sitting in on classes and sleeping wherever he could hide.

He was arrested at the school in January and charged with trespassing, then arrested again when he returned.

TAX:

'Survivor' Winner Hatch Indicted For Tax Evasion (REU)

Reuters, September 8, 2005

BOSTON (Reuters) - A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted Richard Hatch, who took home $1 million as the first winner of the CBS hit reality show "Survivor," for tax evasion, bank fraud and other charges.

The U.S. Attorney's office in Providence, Rhode Island, accused Hatch, a motivational speaker, of failing to report the $1 million winnings in 2000 and about $391,000 he earned from half a dozen other sources.

The 10-count indictment follows a grand jury investigation that began in March when Hatch backed out of a deal with prosecutors to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges that carried a maximum 10-year jail sentence and a $500,000 fine.

Hatch, who wandered around naked on the show and was once described by a fellow contestant as a "snake," said he was innocent in March. He was not immediately available for comment following the new list of charges released by prosecutors in Rhode Island.

If convicted on all counts, the 44-year-old Newport, Rhode Island, native would face a maximum fine of $1.35 million and 73 years in prison.

Eight of the charges carry a maximum sentence of five years each in prison, one has a three-year sentence and another bank fraud charge carries a maximum 30-year jail sentence, said Tom Connell, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney in Rhode Island.

A summons was issued for Hatch to appear before a U.S. magistrate for arraignment.

The first "Survivor" became a ratings sensation for CBS and helped spark a boom in reality-based TV shows.

In television and radio interviews aired in March, Hatch's lawyer said CBS should have withheld federal taxes for the game show contestant because the network should have classified him as an employee under California law.

DOJ_NMG_0003869

CBS, a unit of Viacom Inc., has said that Hatch alone was responsible for declaring his winnings to the federal government and paying his taxes.

'Survivor' Winner Indicted On Tax Charges (AP)

By M.I. Johnson

AP, September 9, 2005

PROVIDENCE, R.I. - Richard Hatch, who won $1 million on the first season of the reality show "Survivor," was indicted Thursday for failing to pay taxes on his winnings from the CBS show.

Hatch faces 10 charges, including tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said Hatch, 44, did not pay taxes on his "Survivor" prize, income from a radio show and rental income. The Newport resident also allegedly used donations to his charity, Horizon Bound, to cover personal expenses.

Prosecutors charged Hatch with two counts of tax evasion in January. He agreed to plead guilty, but backed out of the deal in March, saying he thought CBS was responsible for paying the taxes on his prize. CBS has said Hatch was well aware of his obligations to pay taxes on the money.

On Thursday, Hatch was on a plane headed for Houston to help hurricane victims at the Astrodome and could not be reached for comment, said Rod Mitchell, a spokesman for Hatch's lawyer, Michael Minns.

The grand jury, which received the case after the plea deal fell apart, indicted Hatch for filing false 2000 and 2001 tax returns, which omitted his income from the reality show, $327,000 he was paid to co-host "The Wilde Show" on a Boston radio station and $28,000 in rent on a property he owns in Newport.

The indictment said Hatch had two accountants prepare tax returns that included his "Survivor" winnings but did not file them when he learned he would owe hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes. In 2002, he had one of the accountants prepare a second return that did not include his TV show winnings. He filed that one, which called for a $4,500 refund, the indictment said.

Hatch was also accused of misusing $36,500 from a nonprofit camp he set up, Horizon Bound. For example, he allegedly kept for himself a $10,000 donation made in return for his appearance on the NBC game show "Weakest Link." He spent the money from the game show on a construction project at his house, the indictment said.

Hatch faces a maximum of 75 years in prison if found guilty on all charges. He also could face millions of dollars in fines.

On "Survivor," Hatch stood out for being a cunning and ruthless competitor, and spent some of his time in the nude. He won the show's first season in August 2000. He has since appeared on other TV shows, most recently the "Battle of the Network Reality Stars" on Bravo.

Since the TV show, Hatch has weathered a series of legal battles. He was arrested in April 2000 on a charge of abusing his then 9-year-old son. That charge was later dropped. In 2002, Hatch was found innocent of assaulting his ex-boyfriend.

ON THE NET

http://www.richhatch.com/

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Partisan Rancor Accompanies Passage Of Disaster Aid Bill (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Democrats sharpened their criticism of the Bush administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina yesterday, refusing to participate in a Republican-controlled investigative panel and displaying a photo in the Senate of the president strumming a guitar the day New Orleans was inundated.

The day's events, which included a near-lionization of the only Democratic senator from the hard-hit states, left little doubt that political reaction to the catastrophic storm will be dramatically more partisan than was the response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0003870

"We are reaching a perfect political storm," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) told reporters as lawmakers appropriated another $51.8 billion for hurricane relief but differed bitterly on how to figure out what went wrong.

Congressional Democratic leaders said they will not name members to a House-Senate commission that Republicans announced Wednesday to investigate local, state and federal government actions before and after Katrina lashed the Gulf Coast Aug. 29. Democrats said the proposed panel is unacceptable because they were not consulted about its formation and because GOP lawmakers would outnumber Democratic members.

"As it is currently described, I will not appoint members to it," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said: "If we're ever going to protect the American people, we must have an outside independent committee. Let's not have a charade about oversight."

Pelosi and Reid said Congress should appoint a panel of non-lawmakers modeled on the Sept. 11 commission that wrote an extensive report on the 2001 terrorist attacks. Congressional Republicans said they modeled the commission on House and Senate panels formed in 1986 to investigate the Iran-contra scandal during the Reagan administration. Democrats controlled both chambers then, and they outnumbered Republicans on the two committees, which were eventually merged.

"It looks like the Democrats want to play partisan political games at an important time," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). He urged Pelosi and Reid to change their minds but said the panel would go forward without Democrats if necessary.

In the Senate, Democrats rallied around Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), who returned to Washington after 10 days of highly visible and often emotional appeals for aid for her beleaguered constituents. Landrieu, who grew up in New Orleans, praised Republican colleagues from Louisiana and Mississippi but ripped the Bush administration for the federal response to Katrina.

The cost to rebuild "will be staggering," Landrieu said in a Senate speech attended by two dozen Democratic colleagues, a rare sight in the usually empty chamber. "But it will pale in comparison to the staggering incompetence of this national government [which] is responsible." When she finished, many colleagues hugged and kissed her, including Republican Sen. Thad Cochran of Mississippi, a state also ravaged by the storm.

At times, the debate was theatrical. Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) displayed a poster-size photo of Bush playing a guitar handed to him during a tour of a San Diego military base Aug. 30, after broken levees had caused New Orleans to flood.

"The president was enjoying the day, he was strumming a guitar," Lautenberg said. "I don't deny him the pleasures of office, but people were drowning."

When aides to House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) attacked Pelosi's response to the investigative commission, they illustrated it with an e-mailed photo of San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury intersection, associated with the hippies of the 1960s.

Groups and strategists on the left and right, meanwhile, debated the wisdom of the two parties' actions. Some liberals cheered Pelosi and Reid for refusing to join the investigative panel. Others warned Democrats to offer solid alternatives when they criticize.

"These debates on blame alone won't get us anywhere with most people," said Laura Nichols, senior vice president of the liberal-leaning Center for American Progress. "Complaints about 9/11 investigations fell on deaf ears."

The Republican National Committee sent allies a list of "talking points," including: "It's disappointing that while President Bush has focused his administration's entire efforts towards saving lives and helping the victims of Katrina, there are those who are using this tragedy to score cheap political points."

Republicans criticized an online petition from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee that combined a fundraising appeal with a call to oust the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. After an inquiry from the Associated Press, the DSCC removed the page and said any money it generated would go to the American Red Cross.

Bush Signs $51.8 Bln Storm Relief Bill (REU)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, September 8, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003871

President George W. Bush signed legislation to provide $51.8 billion in additional funding for Hurricane Katrina relief on Thursday, shortly after the measure was approved by Congress.

The Senate approved the bill by a vote of 97-0 after receiving it from the House of Representatives, which also passed it overwhelmingly.

"The people affected by this storm have immediate needs that we must continue to meet without delay," Bush said in a statement. "More resources will be needed as we work to help people get back on their feet."

It was the second time in a week that Congress has rushed through emergency funding for the victims of the hurricane that hit Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida at the end of August.

Congress has now approved $62.3 billion sought by Bush, who has warned that further requests will come. Some lawmakers have estimated a final price tag of $150 billion to $200 billion.

"If we were to fail to act, every relief that is going on right this very moment ... will be without money when the sun rises tomorrow," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said on the Senate floor.

Rep. Henry Waxman (news, bio, voting record) of California, the senior Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, and three senior senators from both major political parties cautioned that a provision in the legislation could open the door to fraudulent spending of emergency aid.

The provision would allow federal workers with government-issued credit cards to buy up to $250,000 in goods or services in a single purchase, up from a $15,000 limit.

A government watchdog agency has found purchases of personal items like jewelry, stereo equipment and home supplies, charged to such credit cards in the past, the lawmakers said.

John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, said the legislation would reduce delays in delivering aid and that federal auditors will review credit card purchases.

Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), whose home state of Alabama suffered in the hurricane, also feared misuse of funds and called for the appointment of a hurricane czar to oversee spending. "We have got to be careful this does not become a feeding frenzy," he warned.

'FAILURES OF LEADERSHIP'

Democrats supported the emergency aid but some accused the House Republican leadership of rushing it and blocking debate on an amendment to revamp the widely criticized Federal Emergency Management Agency, in charge of relief.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican, came to the defense of the White House. Referring to the evacuees sheltered and the food, water and equipment delivered, DeLay said: "We ought to be proud of that. But what are we doing in Washington? We're pointing our fingers."

The disaster will add to already large budget deficits this year and next. Those deficits also are being fueled by the war in Iraq that has cost about $300 billion since 2003.

FEMA will receive nearly all of the funds approved on Thursday -- $50 billion -- while the Defense Department will get $1.4 billion for its rescue efforts. The Army Corps of Engineers will get $400 million to dredge navigation channels, repair pump stations and levees in New Orleans and repair other projects in Gulf states.

Congress Approves $51.8 Billion For Victims (WP)

By Peter Baker And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

President Bush and Congress moved on multiple fronts yesterday to rush fresh relief to people afflicted by Hurricane Katrina, vowing to get cash directly into the hands of victims while enacting an unprecedented spending package to feed and house evacuees, rebuild schools and bridges, and begin clearing out the vast rubble.

Just a day after Bush's request, the House voted 410 to 11 to approve $51.8 billion for relief, and the Senate followed suit hours later 97 to 0, bringing the total approved in the past week to $62.3 billion, with more to come. With his poll approval ratings crumbling further amid a political backlash, Bush tried to unify the country by declaring next Friday a National Day of Prayer and Remembrance.

DOJ_NMG_0003872

"The responsibility of caring for hundreds of thousands of citizens who no longer have homes is going to place many demands on our nation," Bush said in a televised statement hours before he signed the spending legislation last night. "We have many difficult days ahead, especially as we recover those who did not survive the storm."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said yesterday's prompt legislative action "illustrates one thing: This Congress is serious about doing everything we can to help local, state and federal officials respond to this crisis."

As the authorities moved through flooded New Orleans to force out the remaining residents and collect an unknown number of bodies, the bipartisan consensus on dispensing federal dollars did little to obscure the growing political rift over how to investigate what both sides consider the bungled initial response to one of the worst natural disasters in the nation's history. Congressional Democrats rejected a Republican plan for a GOP-led joint House-Senate panel to look into the response.

"Despite all the talk of bipartisanship, they have just, on their own, unilaterally, put forth a proposal that will result in a whitewash of what has gone on here," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). She added that she will not appoint any Democratic members to such a "charade" panel.

The two parties likewise split over the details of the spending package they approved yesterday. Democrats said the Republican leadership wrote billions of dollars in checks without considering whether the package offers the proper help -- and proper accountability. "The unfortunate truth is, Mr. Speaker, this compliant Republican Congress has acted more like an adjunct to this administration than a co-equal, independent branch of our government," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.).

Beyond the spending package, the House approved a series of other measures to help people displaced by the hurricane, such as accelerating welfare money to affected states and allowing college students to keep federal financial aid even if their schools are now closed. But Democrats were blocked from adding provisions to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency, heavily criticized over its handling of the disaster response. Under the Democratic proposals, the agency would be detached from the Department of Homeland Security and its director would be required to have previous experience managing disasters.

On the final votes, the only dissenters were nearly a dozen House Republicans, some of whom expressed concern about accountability for the huge expenditures.

Trying to outdo the Republican rush of aid, Senate Democrats yesterday introduced a separate, more expansive package that would, among other things, extend Medicaid to survivors without health insurance, grant emergency rent vouchers to those who lost homes, and provide funds to schools that take in evacuees.

Even before the votes, Bush summoned television cameras to address hurricane victims directly, promising to provide every household $2,000 as soon as possible to tide it over and to expedite government benefits such as Medicaid, unemployment checks, food stamps, mental health services and nutritional supplements without the traditional bureaucratic requirements. The president told viewers to call 800-621-FEMA or, if they have Internet service, to go to http://www.fema.gov .

"We have much more work to do," Bush said. "But the people who have been hurt by this storm . . . need to know that the government is going to be with you for the long haul."

Bush has scrapped his schedule to focus on hurricane relief after being criticized for reacting too slowly to Katrina's devastation. A Pew Research Center survey found that 67 percent of Americans think Bush could have done more to respond to the storm. The survey placed his overall job approval rating at 40 percent, down 10 points since January. A poll by Zogby America recorded its lowest-ever approval rating for Bush, 41 percent.

In the latest effort to demonstrate commitment to improving the federal response, Bush dispatched Vice President Cheney to the region and first lady Laura Bush to other states housing evacuees. Cheney personally encountered some of the hostility directed at the administration. As he spoke with reporters on a street in Gulfport, Miss., a young man shouted at him. "Go [expletive] yourself, Mr. Cheney," the man yelled twice. Cheney smiled slightly but did not respond.

In his first tour of the damage, Cheney offered an upbeat assessment of what he called the "very impressive" current response efforts. "I think the progress we're making is significant," he said. Cheney also endorsed the Republican inquiry plan instead of the independent commission proposed by Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0003873

The details of yesterday's spending package offer a glimpse of the impact Katrina will have on taxpayers. Nearly half of the money -- $23.2 billion -- will go directly to as many as 1.1 million households in the form of housing grants and other assistance. Such aid will be capped initially at $26,200 per household.

Already, the government has spent $3.3 billion to snap up 200,000 trailers, mobile homes and recreational vehicles from showrooms across the country for the homeless survivors. Clayton Homes Inc., a Tennessee-based manufactured-home company, is trying to get 100 homes a day from its showrooms to a FEMA staging area, said Chris Nicely, the company's vice president for marketing. "We did make a profit on it," he said of the order. "It's hard to say how much."

More business will be coming soon. Included in yesterday's legislation is an additional $1.6 billion for 100,000 housing units. The package also includes $7.65 billion to repair public schools, nonfederal roads and bridges, water facilities, government buildings, parks, and public utilities. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers will receive $3 billion to remove mountains of debris. A total of $1.9 billion will be used to buy ice, water, food, tents and other materials for victims and relief workers.

The bill stirred concerns in both parties about possible fraud. Under one provision, procurement officers can use government credit cards to make purchases costing as much as $250,000, without competitive bidding and without considering small-business and minority-owned-business allotments.

Such authority has traditionally been limited to $2,500 under normal circumstances and to $15,000 in emergencies. Lawmakers gave $15 million to the Homeland Security inspector general, but that did not mollify critics.

Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) signed a letter yesterday opposing raising the limit. "We should not allow the immediate needs of this disaster to trump the need for oversight and accountability for the spending that will occur on these purchase cards," they wrote. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) agreed: "The vast majority of federal employees are honest, upstanding people, but the ability to buy up to $250,000 in any single purchase is a great temptation."

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) said that "we've got safeguards" to ensure that the money is spent appropriately. "Sure, there is going to be waste in money," he acknowledged. "You can't deal with 5 million people and not have some waste in money. But the bulk is going to go to the people and the property that deserve it."

Bush Pledges Aid For 'Long Haul' (LAT)

By Warren Vieth And Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Thursday promised the hundreds of thousands displaced by Hurricane Katrina that the government would be with them "for the long haul," and Congress voted to provide $51.8 billion in emergency funds to finance the relief and reconstruction programs.

Despite the expanded efforts, which increase total federal spending on the emergency to $62.3 billion, partisan rancor undermined attempts to project a spirit of unity. And new polls indicated that many Americans were displeased with the government's performance.

Substantial majorities of respondents in three national surveys expressed disappointment with Bush's handling of the emergency and characterized the government's initial relief efforts as too slow. Bush's job approval ratings slipped to new lows.

The dissatisfaction suggested that the White House was having trouble diverting attention from its initial response and was instead focusing attention on signs of progress.

In New Orleans, meanwhile, police tried to root out residents who, 10 days after the hurricane, still were refusing to leave their flooded homes. And emergency workers fanned out across the city as water levels continued to drop, exposing the bodies of Katrina's victims.

"We have much more work to do," the president said, speaking of assisting the residents of New Orleans and the surrounding coastal regions of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama whose lives have been upended by the hurricane that laid waste to much of the Gulf Coast last week.

In his televised address, Bush urged victims to act quickly to get in touch with representatives of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is coordinating the government relief effort.

DOJ_NMG_0003874

The number to call is 1-800-621-FEMA, Bush said. About 3,000 operators were staffing the phone lines, he said, and more were on the way. For those storm victims with access to computers, assistance is available at http://www.govbenefits.gov and http://www.fema.gov.Bush said the government aid package included an initial cash payment of $2,000 per family to help with immediate needs, such as food and clothing. FEMA representatives will help get cash into the hands of people staying in emergency shelters and other temporary housing, he said.

He told evacuees: "By registering for the first $2,000, you will begin the process of arranging for the delivery of other, longer-term assistance" — including health, welfare, housing, food stamps, school lunches, child care, mental health, foster care and job training.

One action Bush did not trumpet publicly drew a quick protest from a leading Democrat. By executive order, Bush suspended the Davis-Bacon Act in areas of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana and Mississippi, a move that will allow federal contractors to pay less than the local "prevailing wage" on construction projects.

Rep. George Miller of Martinez, senior Democrat on the House committee that oversees labor law, said the move would allow employers to pay "poverty wages" as they rebuild from the hurricane.

"The administration is using the devastation of Hurricane Katrina to cut the wages of people desperately trying to rebuild their lives," Miller said in a statement, noting that the prevailing wage for construction in New Orleans was about $9 an hour. "At under $9 an hour, workers certainly won't be able to rebuild their livelihoods."

On Capitol Hill, Democrats said they would boycott a planned House-Senate inquiry into the administration's management of the catastrophe. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) accused Republicans of trying to whitewash what she characterized as a failure of the federal government to properly respond to the ravages of the hurricane.

The decision by Pelosi and her Senate counterpart, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), not to appoint any Democrats to the hurricane investigation panel provoked a quick condemnation from Republicans.

"People can join in and help get the job done, or some people can stand aside and criticize," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "But you know, we have work to do. We can't be distracted by partisanship, by finger-pointing, by name-calling…. The American people expect us to get this work done."

In announcing the expanded government assistance, Bush said all residents of counties that had been declared disaster areas would be granted special evacuee status, allowing authorities to waive traditional requirements to verify identity and determine eligibility.

"Many of you have been evacuated from the flooded and destroyed areas and now find yourselves far from home, without proper identification or even a change of clothes," Bush said.

He promised the outreach program would provide the help they needed and "cut through the red tape" to get them that help as quickly and easily as possible.

In a brief aside to governors, Bush promised to work with Congress to reimburse their states for the cost of providing food, shelter and other services to evacuees.

"We understand this is going to strain your budget," he said. "So the federal government … will operate under this principle: You should not be penalized for showing compassion."

The administration's outreach effort Thursday included a troubleshooting tour of the afflicted Gulf Coast region by Vice President Dick Cheney and appearances by First Lady Laura Bush to generate interest in the needs of displaced schoolchildren. The president designated next Friday as a "national day of prayer and remembrance."

On Capitol Hill, it was a day of frenetic activity, political maneuvering and raw emotions as lawmakers continued to grapple with the scope of the disaster and to grope for ways to respond.

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.), returning to the chamber for the first time since the hurricane turned her hometown of New Orleans into a sodden ghost town, mourned the destruction and delivered a blistering assessment of the federal response.

"Thousands are dead, and only God knows how many," Landrieu said.

By late afternoon, the House had voted 410 to 11 to approve the emergency spending. All members of the California delegation voted in favor, except for Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana), who did not vote. The Senate followed suit Thursday evening, voting 97 to 0.

DOJ_NMG_0003875

The federal government has committed $62.3 billion to the relief effort. Besides the $51.8 billion approved Thursday, Congress appropriated $10.5 billion last week. Yet these funds are expected to last only several weeks, and reconstruction costs could rise as high as $200 billion, officials said.

Some Republicans questioned whether FEMA could manage such a massive, long-term rebuilding effort. Several leading senators called on Bush to appoint a senior official to coordinate the federal effort.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), chairman of the Budget Committee, said the government should establish "some type of structured commission, where you basically have a focus point with an individual of great ability and national recognition leading the effort."

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who lost his family home to the storm, said in an interview that he believed former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani or former Sen. John B. Breaux (D-La.) would make a good reconstruction overseer. Other lawmakers have suggested retired U.S. Army Gen. Tommy Franks, who led the invasion of Iraq.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said the president welcomed all suggestions for improving the recovery effort and would give them consideration. "This is a time for people to be offering big ideas and offering ways for us to move forward on the rebuilding and recovery," McClellan said.

But McClellan would not respond to specific proposals, including calls by some lawmakers for the resignation of FEMA's director, Michael D. Brown, or the removal of FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security.

Three national polls released Thursday showed large majorities dissatisfied with government's response to Hurricane Katrina. Disapproval of Bush's overall job performance reached the highest levels of his presidency.

In contrast to initial surveys last week that found little effect on Bush's standing, the new surveys from independent pollster John Zogby, CBS News and the nonpartisan Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found the president's approval rating sagging amid widespread discontent over his handling of the crisis.

In the Zogby and CBS polls, about three-fifths of Americans said they disapproved of Bush's handling of the response to the hurricane; fewer than two-fifths approved. In the Pew survey, 28% said Bush did "all he could" to speed relief efforts, while 67% said he could have done more. Likewise, about two-thirds of those surveyed by CBS said Bush's response was too slow.

Government at all levels fared poorly in the new polls. At least 58% of those polled in all three surveys gave the federal government failing grades for its handling of the situation, with more than three-quarters in the CBS poll expressing such negative views. State and local authorities received slightly better reviews, with 51% disapproving of their performance in the Pew survey, and 70% in the CBS poll.

Bush's Leadership Skills Questioned, Polls Show (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 9, 2005

George W. Bush on Thursday faced some of the worst poll results of his presidency, with a majority of Americans questioning his leadership skills and signs of a drop in support from core Republican voters.

While natural disasters usually boost political leaders, Mr Bush's initial response to Hurricane Katrina has led to the reverse.

According to a CBS News poll on Thursday, 48 per cent said he had strong leadership skills, his lowest rating to date, and far below his 83 per cent rating after September 11.

For a president who won a second term after campaigning on his strong leadership skills with 64 per cent approval in the election run-up the slide threatens to endanger his authority to rally voters behind unpopular parts of his second-term domestic agenda, such as social security reform.

A separate poll from the Pew Research Center also offered bleak reading. Polls have consistently shown that Mr Bush is a divisive leader, with approval falling on partisan lines. However, the September poll showed that his approval rating since July has fallen by 9 percentage points among Republicans.

Support from core religious groups also declined, with a nine-point fall in approval from white evangelicals and a 12-point drop from white Roman Catholics, a group that Mr Bush has been trying to woo.

DOJ_NMG_0003876

In spite of the fall from supporters, 79 per cent of Republicans still approve of Mr Bush. Whit Ayres, president of Ayres, McHenry and Associates, a Republican polling company, said: “That is not surprising after the roughest two weeks of his presidency. What is surprising is that eight out of 10 still approve of him.”

Addressing criticism, Mr Bush this week stepped up his public efforts with a series of initiatives, including seeking $51.8bn in disaster aid, which was approved by the House on Thursday, and giving aid to states that have been bearing the burden of the evacuees. He also announced plans to grant $2,000 in emergency relief to each affected household.

The opinion polls all showed Mr Bush at approval ratings between 40 and 42 per cent, in line with previous data. Mr Ayres said: “All presidents have had approval ratings at some point below 40 per cent except George Bush. His nadir is still higher than any other president, including his father and BillClinton.”

The Pew poll also pointed to a subtler change in voters' priorities after Hurricane Katrina. It found that 56 per cent thought domestic policy which typically favours Democrats was now their chief priority, rather than the war on terror, which had previously bolstered Mr Bush.

Andrew Kohut, director of Pew, said the poll also suggested that racial issues could become a higher political priority. “Seven out of 10 blacks say the disaster shows that racial inequality remains a major problem in the country; a majority of whites, 56 per cent, say this was not a particularly important lesson.”

Bush Suffers In Polls Post-Katrina (REU)

By John Whitesides, Political Correspondent

Reuters, September 8, 2005

President George W. Bush's image suffered in public opinion polls taken after Hurricane Katrina hit the U.S. Gulf Coast, with some finding growing doubts about his leadership and the country's direction.

After a week of criticism for a slow response to the devastation caused by Katrina, polls released on Thursday registered drops in Bush's approval ratings and in confidence in his leadership.

A Pew Research Center poll found 67 percent of Americans believed Bush could have done more to speed up relief efforts, and just 28 percent believed he did all he could. His approval rating slipped to 40 percent, down four points since July to the lowest point Pew has recorded.

The Pew poll also found a shift in public priorities after Katrina caused a jump in gasoline prices last week, with a majority saying for the first time since the September 11, 2001, attacks that it was more important for Bush to focus on domestic policy than the war on terrorism.

"Americans are depressed, angry and very worried about the economic consequences of the disaster," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew poll.

A WEEK OF CRITICISM

The new polls indicated a week of criticism and political finger-pointing over who is to blame for the disastrous response to Katrina could have taken a toll on the White House.

A CBS poll taken September 6-7 found 38 percent approved of Bush's handling of the storm's aftermath, while 58 percent disapproved. That was a dramatic shift from immediately after the storm last week, when 54 percent approved and 12 percent disapproved.

The CBS poll also found confidence in Bush during a crisis had fallen and only 48 percent now view him as a strong leader -- the lowest number ever for Bush in the poll. A year ago 64 percent of voters saw Bush as a strong leader.

Bush's approval rating fell to 41 percent in a new Zogby poll, with only 36 percent giving him a passing grade on his handling of the response to the storm.

The Zogby poll also found broad pessimism among a majority of Americans after the storm, with 53 percent saying the country is headed in the wrong direction and 42 percent saying it is on the right track.

A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll taken on September 5-6 found 42 percent believed Bush did a "bad" or "terrible" job handling the storm and subsequent flooding, while 35 percent thought he performed "great" or "good."

DOJ_NMG_0003877

A Washington Post/ABC News poll taken September 2 offered more mixed results, with 46 percent approving of Bush's performance and 47 percent disapproving.

There was plenty of blame to go around for the slow response to Katrina, with local and state governments also taking a hit.

The Gallup poll found 13 percent blamed Bush for the problems in New Orleans, while 18 percent blamed federal agencies, 25 percent blamed state and local officials and 38 percent said no one was to blame.

In the Pew poll, 58 percent thought the federal government had done only a fair or poor job after the storm, but 51 percent also thought state and local governments in Louisiana and Mississippi had done just a fair or poor job.

Americans Give Bush Poor Marks On Handling Katrina, Polls Show (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil And Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, September 9, 2005

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Two new polls show Americans give President George W. Bush poor marks for his handling of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, with one survey showing that Bush is now losing support even among his Republican base.

Both polls contain additional bad news for Bush. A poll by the Pew Research Center for People and the Press gives him an overall job approval rating of 40 percent -- down 10 percent since January -- and a disapproval rating of 52 percent, among the highest of his presidency.

Bush's job approval rating was 41 percent in a Zogby America poll, the lowest in that poll's history, and 53 percent of those questioned said the nation is headed in the ``wrong direction."

The surveys were conducted in the week following the hurricane's assault on the Gulf Coast and show that support for the president, at near-record lows before the storm's arrival, fell further amid anger over the federal government's response.

``Uncharacteristically, the president's ratings have slipped most among his core constituents -- Republicans and conservatives," Pew director Andy Kohut wrote in an e-mail.

In the Pew survey, 67 percent of 1,000 adults interviewed by telephone Sept. 6-7 said Bush could have done more to speed up relief efforts; 28 percent said he did everything possible.

`Shift in Priorities'

Hurricane Katrina produced a ``major shift in public priorities," according to Pew. For the first time since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, a majority of Americans now believe it is more important for the president to focus on domestic issues than the war on terrorism.

When asked what should be a priority for the president, 56 percent said ``domestic policy," an increase of 16 percentage points since January. Twenty-five percent said Bush's top priority should be fighting terrorism, a 19-point decline from January.

The Pew survey shows Bush's support among Republicans is strong but slipping, and since his support among Democrats and self-described independents remains consistent, Bush's declining approval is linked directly to that slippage within his own party.

The new poll shows Bush with a job approval rating of 79 percent among Republicans, down 9 percentage points since Pew's July survey. Among Democrats, his approval was 19 percent compared with 18 percent in July, and among independents it was 33 percent versus 32 percent, changes that in both cases are within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Support Down Within Party

Among those who identify themselves as ``conservative Republicans," Bush's job approval declined seven percentage points from the July survey and by 11 percentage points among those who describe themselves as ``moderate Republicans."

Bush's overall job approval rating in July was 44 percent.

The Pew poll found that blacks are more inclined to believe race played a factor in the federal response to the hurricane than whites; many of those who remained in New Orleans after the flooding were blacks.

Some 66 percent of blacks surveyed said the federal response would have been faster if most of the victims in New Orleans were white, while 77 percent of whites questioned said the issue of race made no difference in the government's response.

DOJ_NMG_0003878

Hurricane Katrina ravaged Louisiana, Mississippi and parts of Alabama and knocked eight oil refineries out of commission, leading to a surge in gasoline prices. The average U.S. retail price jumped 45 cents last week to $3.057 per gallon, according to the American Automobile Association.

The Pew survey found that seven in 10 Americans are ``closely'' following news accounts on hurricane coverage, and that 71 percent are following stories on rising gasoline prices -- the highest percentage ever in the 20 years Pew has been asking respondents whether they pay attention to energy issues.

Zogby Poll

In the Zogby survey, Bush's overall job approval rating slumped to a record low as three-fifths of those questioned criticized the government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Forty-one percent of respondents in the telephone survey Sept. 6-7 gave Bush positive marks for his job performance, down from 45 percent in a July 30 survey and 50 percent in mid- February. Bush got negative marks from 59 percent of respondents, up from 55 percent in July and 50 percent in February in the poll.

The poll showed 60 percent characterized Bush's handling of the hurricane as ``fair'' to ``poor,'' while 36 percent graded his performance ``good'' to ``excellent.'' More than half of those polled -- 53 percent -- said the country is headed in the wrong direction.

``The president has managed to do early in his second term what his father did in just one term: go from record-high approval numbers in the aftermath of 9/11 to his present numbers,'' John Zogby, chief executive of polling company Zogby International, said in a statement.

The survey of 1,157 likely voters has a margin of error of plus or minus 2.9 percentage points, Zogby said.

Bush would lose elections if he ran against the past four U.S. presidents, yet would edge Massachusetts Senator John Kerry - - his Democratic opponent in the 2004 election -- by 1 percentage point, the poll showed.

Partisan Bickering Over Katrina Escalates - To Peril Of Both Sides (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - As distasteful as it is to many Americans, the politics of hurricane Katrina have rushed in to fill the agendas of elected officials nearly as quickly as the floodwaters inundated New Orleans.

For the Bush administration, the mantra this week became "no blame-gaming, no finger-pointing" as it sought to recover from the early perception of a slow response to the disaster. The message has been that this is an administration of action, not partisan bickering, and that the task at hand is to address the situation on the ground. President Bush sent Congress a request for $51.8 billion in additional hurricane aid. Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynne, toured New Orleans and the Gulf region Thursday, talking to local officials and first-responders.

In reality, hurricane Katrina has become an anti-9/11 of sorts. Whereas four years ago people dropped their red and blue identities to rally around their leaders, Katrina seems to have exacerbated the extreme polarization of the Bush years. At his first Cabinet meeting since returning from vacation, Mr. Bush declared he would oversee an inquiry into the government response to Katrina, prompting an immediate outcry from Democrats that the government cannot investigate itself.

Republicans in Congress quickly followed by announcing an investigative commission on Katrina, with GOP members to form a majority. Democrats cried foul, arguing that the model of the 9/11 commission - made up of nonlawmakers in a balance of Republicans and Democrats, operating with a goal of consensus - would be preferable. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, widely seen as a leading Democratic hopeful for president in 2008, emerged as a chief critic of the Republicans' inquiry plan and of the performance of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Before Katrina, Senator Clinton had lain low on national issues, focusing instead on reelection to the Senate.

Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, also came out with guns blazing this week. "We must ... come to terms with the ugly truth that skin color, age, and economics played a deadly role in who survived and who did not," he told the National Baptist Convention of America on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0003879

"Politicization is very dangerous for both sides," says Marshall Wittmann, a senior fellow at the Democratic Leadership Council. "If either party is seen as obstructing results, people will blame them. Americans are pragmatic, not ideological or partisan. Clearly, the administration has bungled this, but ultimately the American people want to see a restored New Orleans and these people's lives put back together."

On Thursday, the liberal group Moveon.org organized a protest of hurricane evacuees at the White House to decry the federal response and to demand a meeting with Bush - suggesting almost a Cindy Sheehan-ization of Katrina victims. The Republican National Committee fired back in a press release, saying "Moveon.org Democrats play the blame game and politicize Katrina relief."

For Republicans, a political danger lies in the fact that they control the White House and both houses of Congress - and the public will look to them for results. "The real danger comes on the administration's side, where if New Orleans becomes a metaphor for Bush policy in general, they're in real trouble," says Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. "If it reinforces that the comfortable are safe and do well, while the vulnerable are on their own, it could be a burden for Bush for the rest of his term."

A Texas Poll released Thursday shows Bush's approval ratings in Texas, his home state, are 9 points below where they usually are, with 52 percent approving of his performance and 43 percent disapproving. Bush's job approval in Texas is typically10 points above his national average.

Generally, the partisan polarization registered by pollsters during much of Bush's presidency - abating only in the aftermath of 9/11 - continues. The latest US polls show Bush's job approval among Republicans in the mid-80s and in the low teens among Democrats - a gap of about 70 percentage points. "He's the most polarizing president we've had in the 50-odd years we've been polling the question," says Gary Jacobson, an expert on this issue at the University of California, San Diego.

This phenomenon reflects Bush's tendency to play to his base supporters, and bring over a few Democrats to his side as needed. During a major challenge, Bush's strategy of keeping his core of support on his side serves as a political protection, Professor Jacobson says.

"He's lost the Democrats, period, and the independents are now closer to the Democrats than [to] the Republicans," Jacobson says. "What's saved Bush is that his base has stayed with him."

Congress Clears $51.8 Billion Relief Bill (BSUN/AP)

By David Espo, The Associated Press

The Baltimore Sun, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Acting with extraordinary speed, Congress approved an additional $51.8 billion for relief and recovery from Hurricane Katrina today. President Bush pledged to make it "easy and simple as possible" for uncounted, uprooted storm victims to collect food stamps and other government benefits.

"We're not asking for a handout, but we do need help," said Sen. Trent Lott -- whose home state of Mississippi suffered grievously from the storm -- as lawmakers approved the bill just a day after Bush requested more aid on top of the $10.5 billion already provided. The measure includes $2,000 debit cards for families to use on immediate needs.

Bush signed the bill tonight. In a statement issued by the White House, he praised Congress for "moving swiftly and in strong bipartisan fashion to approve these additional emergency funds" but cautioned: "More resources will be needed as we work to help people get back on their feet."

The overwhelming support for the measure across party lines -- it passed 410-11 in the House and 97-0 in the Senate -- masked murmurs of concern about a rapidly rising price tag as well as a growing atmosphere of political jockeying in Congress less than two weeks after the hurricane battered the Gulf Coast.

Congressional Democratic leaders said they would refuse to appoint members to a committee that Republican leaders intend to create to investigate the administration's readiness and response to the storm.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi called the GOP plan "a sham that is just the latest example of congressional Republicans being the foxes guarding the president's hen house." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said it was like a baseball pitcher calling "his own balls and strikes." Both urged appointment of an independent panel like the Sept. 11 commission.

DOJ_NMG_0003880

Republicans said they intended to go ahead despite the threatened boycott. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee told reporters there had been a "systemwide failure" in the response to the storm. Citing problems at the local, state and federal levels, he said, "We will get to the bottom of that" in a congressional investigation.

Beyond that, said New York Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the House GOP campaign committee, "it is reprehensible that some elected officials are looking to score political points in the wake of Hurricane Katrina's devastation."

Even before Bush spoke and Congress acted, the government provided fresh evidence of the impact of the storm.

The Labor Department reported that roughly 10,000 workers filed for unemployment benefits last week after losing their jobs as a result of the storm, and said the level would rise sharply. In a painful irony, analysts said today's number would have been higher yet except that the storm forced claims offices to close and prevented more of the newly jobless from filling out their paperwork.

Bush, his poll numbers sagging and his administration buffeted by criticism of its response to the storm, dispatched Vice President Dick Cheney to the region and met with GOP congressional leaders at the White House. At mid-afternoon, flanked by members of his Cabinet, he stepped to the microphones to pledge additional help, ask for patience and announce a national day of prayer for Friday of next week.

Referring to the debit cards in the legislation making its way quickly through Congress, he said, "The first step is providing every household with $2,000 in emergency disaster relief that can be used for immediate needs, such as food or clothing or personal essentials."

Additionally, with hundreds of thousands of storm victims now dispersed to numerous states, he said the government was working to "ensure that those of you who receive federal benefits administered by the states of Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana will continue to get those benefits in the states where you're now staying."

He said the government would formally grant those victims evacuee status, meaning they would be able to register for their benefits without producing all of the normal documentation -- much of which may have been lost in a desperate retreat from storm-threatened homes. He urged storm victims to contact the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and asked them to be patient if they encountered delays.

Bush said the evacuee status would apply to "the full range of federal benefits administered by the states," including Medicaid, welfare, food stamps, housing, school lunch and more.

"In all the steps we take, our goal is not to simply provide benefits but to make them easy and simple as possible to collect," he said.

Later, looking ahead to the massive reconstruction effort, Bush quietly waived sections of a federal law that requires payment of prevailing wages on government contracts. Prevailing wages are based on surveys that take into account union and non-union pay. One business organization welcomed the move, while the AFL-CIO criticized it. Conservatives, in particular, said they hoped the government's billions would be spent wisely.

"We have all the hallmarks here of a rush to spend money," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., whose home state was damaged by the storm. "We have got to be careful that this does not become a feeding frenzy. ... This is our grandchildren's money."

Democrats, too, said they wanted the money to be well-spent. At the same time, Reid and other Senate Democrats unveiled a far more comprehensive proposal to provide health, housing, education and other benefits.

The White House said $50 billion of the $51.8 billion bill would be distributed through the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has been the subject of widespread criticism in the past week.

The official breakdown said $23.2 billion was for housing aid and grants to individuals, of which about $640 million was for the unprecedented debit cards.

State and local governments are in line for $7.7 billion in reimbursement costs.

DOJ_NMG_0003881

White House officials said the money was needed without delay to prevent an interruption in the massive operation designed to repair the damage along the Gulf Coast and bring hope to an almost unimaginable number of evacuees forced to flee.

The bill brought the total in disaster aid to $62.3 billion -- a total that is certain to rise as the full impact of the storm becomes clear. With much of New Orleans still covered by fouled floodwaters, for example, there is as yet no estimate for the cost of pumping out the city -- or rendering it safely habitable again.

Congress Approves Katrina Package Of $51.8 Billion (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A $51.8 billion Katrina relief package won quick approval from Congress even as lawmakers moved toward making billions of dollars more available for welfare and flood-insurance payments to families displaced by the storm.

The House voted to more than double the national flood-insurance program's borrowing authority to $3.5 billion from $1.5 billion to meet anticipated claims. A second measure, also approved by the House, would advance an estimated $6.2 billion to ease the welfare crunch for states as homeless families are relocated.

The Senate appears sympathetic with both initiatives, but the welfare measure could be delayed unless Republicans develop a more coordinated legislative strategy to deal with the extraordinary circumstances of the storm. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) is drafting a larger bill that would also ease the availability of unemployment and health-care benefits for those evacuated. And it is an open question as to whether the House welfare proposals would be wrapped into this bill or sent to President Bush quickly for his signature.

The $51.8 billion spending measure enjoyed a clearer path and was sent onto the White House last night -- a day after Mr. Bush had requested the money. Given the urgency of the relief efforts, Republicans brooked no changes that risked delaying passage, but the party's tactics also reflected the political sensitivity of the crisis.

Rarely has the House, for example, considered such a large appropriations bill under the strict procedures applied yesterday, which severely limited debate and permitted no amendments. In the aftermath of the storm last week, Democrats had agreed to expedite consideration of the first $10.5 billion emergency bill. But there is growing frustration that Congress finds itself in a situation where it is pouring tens of billions of dollars into disaster accounts administered by the same Federal Emergency Management Agency that many lawmakers have so roundly criticized.

On a party-line 221-193 vote, Democrats made a doomed attempt to permit a vote calling for a reorganization of the relief effort. "FEMA has been used as a political dumping ground by the White House," said Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin, ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee. "This money is being spent by a disabled agency."

Mindful of this criticism, the House modified the administration's request to provide $15 million to beef up the inspector general's office at the Department of Homeland Security to audit FEMA's expenditures. But the agency is spending money so quickly that neither the House nor Senate has held a single hearing on the requests.

Along with appropriations, the flood-insurance and welfare measures illustrate other costs for the government in the months ahead. The flood-insurance program, for example, is intended to be self-financing, so any money borrowed now would have to be repaid to the Treasury from future premiums. But the $2 billion increase now may be only the first in a series, and the strain so great that Washington will be under pressure to step in eventually to avoid sharp increases in premiums on other policyholders.

The welfare bill also increases the federal government's exposure by advancing funds early to states and freeing up contingency accounts for the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program. The federal government would absorb a greater share of TANF's costs for Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, and the bill waives rules to give all states more flexibility in enrolling displaced families.

A Compassionate Bush Was Absent Right After Katrina (USAT)

By Judy Keen And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003882

WASHINGTON — President Bush has shown that he can be empathetic, sensitive and decisive. But those qualities eluded him for days after Hurricane Katrina, and the lapse could become a defining moment of his White House tenure.

The most stirring image of Bush's presidency came when he spontaneously grabbed a bullhorn at Ground Zero and vowed retribution against 9/11 terrorists. Tears filled his eyes when he took the oath of office in 2001, and he has wept publicly when talking about U.S. troops slain in battle and his respect for his father. He has hugged countless victims of fires, hurricanes and other tragedies. During his 2000 campaign, he told recovering teen addicts, "I used to drink too much. … I want you to know that your life's walk is shared by a lot of other people."

But there's another side to Bush. He can seem detached and unaware of the messages conveyed by his words and conduct. Bush decided to see Katrina's destruction for the first time from his jumbo jet and joked on his first trip to the disaster zone about youthful partying in New Orleans. He didn't cancel his vacation until two days after Katrina struck and didn't visit the region until four days after the storm. It's not the first time that side of the president has been visible. He taped a video for a 2004 black-tie dinner showing him hunting under White House furniture for Iraq's weapons of mass destruction as the death toll there mounted. His visit to Ground Zero came three days after the 9/11 attacks.

Bush's critics say his response to the hurricane proves that he's not a leader. "Oblivious, in denial, dangerous," House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said Wednesday. White House spokesman Scott McClellan has dismissed criticism of the response by Bush and his administration as part of the Washington "blame game."

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Monday and Tuesday found that 42% of Americans think Bush has done a bad or terrible job responding to the hurricane. "He's starting to create some vision and some hope," says Christine Riordan, a leadership expert at Texas Christian University's M.J. Neeley School of Business. "But it's five days too late."

Others say he inherited from his parents a Yankee reserve that sometimes prevents him from quickly grasping the emotional requirements of pivotal events. In his 1992 re-election campaign, President George H.W. Bush seemed disconnected from the pain of persistent joblessness and glanced at his watch during a debate with Bill Clinton. Bush's mother, former first lady Barbara Bush, said Monday at Houston's Astrodome that some evacuees there "were underprivileged anyway, so this is working very well for them."

"Occasionally their New England roots make them a little embarrassed and awkward about showing that side of themselves," says Tom Rath, a New Hampshire political strategist and old family friend.

Others say that once Bush becomes engaged, he has the sort of compassion for which Clinton and Ronald Reagan were renowned. "He does have this unique one-on-one quality to relate to people," says Bill Minutaglio, author of a 2001 Bush biography, First Son. But so far, he says, "The right salve for the nation in this time of great tragedy is missing. People are thirsting for it. … It can't be orchestrated, it just has to happen."

Bush has cleared his schedule to focus on disaster relief. He has twice visited areas devastated by Katrina and is expected to return soon. During his first visit a week ago, he choked back tears after listening to helicopter pilots describe rescuing victims. On his second visit Monday, he said in Poplarville, Miss., "I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take. And we're with you."

Roderick Hart, who teaches communications and government at the University of Texas, calls Bush's initial off-key reaction to Katrina "an odd case." Bush does have "an ability to reach out to people," he says. "But the delay was so dramatic that his response now has made it seem disingenuous in some people's eyes."

But Kathryn Dunn Tenpas, a Washington University political scientist and Brookings Institution fellow, says Bush is now "empathizing and responding in tangible ways. … He will fare well if he shows that he is addressing the needs."

Bush has spoken before about the consequences of a leader's performance at moments such as this. In a 2000 debate with Democrat Al Gore, he was asked to describe how he handled crises under fire. "It's the time to test your mettle," Bush said then, "a time to test your heart when you see people whose lives have been turned upside down."

Katrina Underscores Bush's Isolated Style (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003883

WASHINGTON - As President Bush flew this week to the Gulf Coast for his second post-Katrina visit, an aide said the trip reflected Bush's usual routine of "seeing as much as possible and getting information from different places."

Not quite.

Bush did not visit with any angry evacuees in New Orleans. As Katrina approached, Bush and his top aides spent days apparently unaware that New Orleans might be flooded - despite many warnings, some from inside his own administration. Afterwards, he heaped praise on officials responsible for the slow and initially disorganized disaster-relief efforts. His aides dismiss demands that Bush hold someone accountable for failure, saying that's merely a distracting "blame game."

None of this should be a surprise. Bush has a long record of avoiding critics, rewarding loyalty even in the face of failure and shunning - even punishing - those who disagree with him. It's a management style that shapes how he governs - disdaining compromise with Democrats in Congress, for example - and one that brushes off whole sectors of the American electorate.

That could come back to haunt him, as is now evident in the two problems - Iraq and Katrina - that together have sent his approval ratings to the lowest levels of his presidency and threaten his second-term agenda.

His style of isolating himself from unwelcome voices pleases his core supporters, who don't want him to compromise, but it sacrifices the broader public appeal that helped Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton weather second-term setbacks. One new poll, from the independent Pew Research Center, suggests he is losing support even from Republicans and conservatives.

To Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., the Bush administration's response to Katrina suggested "a real sense of arrogance. Loyalty and never admitting a mistake matters more than the truth. It has a Nixon feel to me."

Bush allies insist he is engaged and pressing the government to fix all hurricane-related problems. But the public isn't much impressed, judging by his plummeting polls. One new survey by independent pollster John Zogby shows Bush would lose a hypothetical election to every modern president, including the much-maligned Jimmy Carter.

Bush's isolated management style is one factor hurting him. While his decision-making is usually cloaked in secrecy, the hurricane crisis showed some characteristic traits.

Denial of unpleasant realities, for example. On Sept. 1 Bush contended that no one could have foreseen that New Orleans might be flooded: "I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees."

Actually, a lot of people saw it coming. Three years ago, The New Orleans Times-Picayune published a lengthy examination of how likely that scenario was, and it got wide attention. In fact, Bush's own administration participated in a disaster drill for almost exactly this kind of catastrophe.

Bush himself has admitted in the past that he does not reach far for information.

"I glance at the headlines," Bush told Fox News in September 2003, but "I rarely read the stories, and get briefed by people who ... probably read the news themselves ... And the most objective sources I have are people on my staff who tell me what's happening in the world."

Inside his administration, dissenting views are often stifled, and dissidents punished.

In 2002, the administration fired the head of the Army Corps Engineers after he continued to advocate spending increases for flood control after he'd been overruled. Michael Parker, a former Republican congressman from Mississippi, wanted a 40 percent spending increase, while Bush wanted a 10 percent cut.

When Bush convened an economic summit in 2002, then-Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill later told writer Ron Suskind, the White House wanted to hear only from people who already supported Bush policies.

"A carefully vetted group of more than 240 executives, economists, and even a few labor leaders was being assembled," Suskind wrote. "They'd seem diverse and independent to the untrained eye. In fact, nearly every one would be a Bush supporter and many were major fundraisers. Attendance was, in a way, a reward for support."

While Bush likes to be surrounded by friendly faces, he avoids frowning ones. Since Katrina hit, Bush visited the Gulf Coast twice, but both times avoided angry evacuees - ostensibly so he wouldn't interfere with relief operations.

Some veteran Bush-watchers are skeptical of that White House explanation.

"They didn't want anything to be on TV showing a bunch of angry people hollering at the president," said George Edwards, a presidential scholar at Texas A&M University. "It would not have been a favorable scene unless he could handle it well, which he can't. Clinton could. He would be down there feeling their pain. But Bush can't."

DOJ_NMG_0003884

The president also has refused to speak to two major groups that represent millions of Americans, but have criticized him.

After one brief phone conversation in 2001, Bush has never met with the president of the AFL-CIO. He is the only president in the last half century who has not.

And Bush has never addressed the NAACP as president. "You've heard the rhetoric and the names they've called me," he once explained.

For more on the polls, www.people-press.org and www.zogby.com

Bush Batting Average Calls For New Coaches (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, September 9, 2005

President Bush used to be part owner of a major league baseball team. He once coveted the Baseball Commissioner's job. So, he'll understand this baseball parlance.

He has had three really big at-bats during his four-plus years in the White House. First, 9/11. Then, the Iraq War. Now, the Katrina Hurricane tragedy. His batting performance:

• One home run (9/11).

• Two strikeouts (Iraq and Katrina).

A .333 batting average is pretty good for a baseball player. But in the Oval Office, two strikeouts in three crucial at-bats is bringing boos from more than half the crowd, as national polls show.

In baseball, hitting coaches share credit or blame for the batter's performance. Coaches in Bush's big at-bats:

At the time of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, then-mayor Rudy Giuliani of New York City quickly and wisely coached Bush on what the federal government could and should do. We were comforted and united in efforts to avoid re-occurrences.

On Iraq, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld repeatedly has miscoached Bush for three years on pre-invasion and post-invasion decisions. We are confused and distressed over how and when to get out of this mess.

Local leadership was lacking in Louisiana during Katrina, by both the governor and New Orleans mayor. But Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and FEMA Director Michael Brown co-coached Bush badly. We are angry and scared of what might happen in another major hurricane or a nuclear or biological attack.

If Bush keeps his inept coaches on Iraq and Homeland Security, he may strike out again at his next big at-bat. His average will drop to .250, and the temporary boos will become irreversible jeers. From today's spectators and tomorrow's historians.

Feedback

Other views on President Bush's handling of disasters:

"In baseball, a .333 batting average is very, very good. In major political crises, it's pretty poor. In fact, I would say it's failure. President Bush's shortcomings are not the product of the advice he receives, but his deficient judgment in getting us into the Iraq war and in surrounding himself with men based not on their expertise but on rewarding political associates."

- Robert Dallek, presidential historian

"There are no footnotes from cable TV in history books. Historians will judge on the dispassionate analysis of records. Too soon to tell what they'll say."

- James Jay Carafano, historian, Heritage Foundation

The Party Of Performance (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

In the aftermath of Katrina, there's an opening for a different kind of politics in America. The new politics isn't about values; it isn't about settling scores. It's about performance. It's about putting a wounded, shaken country back on its feet, much as Franklin Delano Roosevelt did in his famous First Hundred Days.

One politician who is clearly articulating that vision right now is the recovering right-wing firebrand, former House speaker Newt Gingrich. I've always had a soft spot for Gingrich, despite his sometimes nasty partisanship during the 1990s, because he is that rare political figure who actually does think "outside the box" about how to solve problems. And he's doing that now.

DOJ_NMG_0003885

The immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has looked like politics as usual. The Democrats are in a paroxysm of righteous indignation -- much of it justified but in the long run counterproductive. When Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid proposes that the Senate investigate whether President's Bush's vacation contributed to the disaster, the public response is likely to be: Give me a break! When the Democrats focus all their criticism on the GOP-led federal government and ignore the appalling lapses of Democratic administrations in New Orleans and Louisiana, they lose credibility.

The Bush administration, meanwhile, remains in its hunkered-down defensive crouch, with White House spokesman Scott McClellan treating any demand for accountability as a partisan "blame game." It's outrageous to read that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has been telling members of Congress that media reports are overstating the problems for storm survivors -- this from a man who was denying on National Public Radio last Thursday that there was any crisis at the New Orleans convention center at the very hour reporters were finding dead bodies and abandoned, starving people there. If the administration maintains that tone, it will self-destruct.

Now listen to what Gingrich has to say about "changing the playbook" after Katrina. His comments are drawn from two memos he has circulated to Republican leaders since the storm hit and from a conversation we had this week exploring some of his ideas.

Gingrich argues that the values debate that has divided America so sharply during the past decade is over. There's a broad consensus about most issues, and anyway people realize that the country's big problems aren't about morality but performance. "We're not in a values fight now but over whether the system is working," Gingrich told me. "The issue is delivery." And that's true at every level -- city, state and federal.

Gingrich's critique of the federal response is as devastating as that of any Democrat. "For the last week the federal government and its state and local counterparts have consistently been behind the curve," he wrote fellow Republicans this week. "The American people overwhelmingly know that the current situation is totally unacceptable," and for that reason, "it is a mistake to get trapped into defending the systems and processes which clearly failed." He observes in another memo, "While the destruction was unprecedented, it was entirely predictable."

What's needed is a creative government response as big as the disaster itself. Gingrich urges in one of his memos that Bush appoint a super-manager who can oversee the rebuilding and suggests Rudy Giuliani for the job. "The former mayor has enough management toughness to force the federal agencies to actually change their behavior," he writes.

The former speaker has some classic Gingrich zingers for how to rev up the rebuilding effort. He wants to turn the Gulf Coast into a "Zone of Recovery, Reconstruction and Prosperity," by offering a 25 percent tax credit for all job-creating investment in the region over the next three years. And he wants to create a cadre of "entrepreneurial public managers" who can replace the leaden public bureaucracy and get things done on Internet time, with the reliability of FedEx or UPS.

This is the moment for the Party of Performance to take center stage. The breakdown in public life was obvious before Katrina. We have a government that can't control its borders, can't find a viable strategy for its war in Iraq, can't organize the key agencies to address the terrorism problems it has been trumpeting. The yearning in the country for something different has been palpable this year.

America faces an "extreme disaster," says Gingrich, one that will have more lasting and complex effects than any domestic event since World War II. The politicians who rise to that challenge will surge in the 2006 and 2008 elections. The ones who remain stuck in their ruts will suffer. Who's ready to sign up for the Party of Performance?

Inescapable Accountability (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The following is brought to you by the word "accountability."

Keep that word in mind whenever you hear defenders of President Bush accusing his political opponents of playing the "blame game" by daring to pose pointed questions about why so many people in New Orleans, most of them very poor, had to wait so long for relief from their suffering.

DOJ_NMG_0003886

The Bush White House must have run the phrases "blame game" and "finger-pointing" through its focus groups. In his Wednesday briefing, White House press secretary Scott McClellan used variations on those formulations eight times each.

McClellan neatly rolled them into a single sentence when he told off a reporter who had the nerve to ask whether the president had confidence in those who oversaw the federal relief effort. "If you want to continue to engage in finger-pointing and blame-gaming, that's fine," McClellan harrumphed. Nice job, Scott.

McClellan must have been unaware that the White House had been organizing a finger-pointing, blame-gaming project of its own. "In a reflection of what has long been a hallmark of Mr. Rove's tough political style," Adam Nagourney and Anne E. Kornblut reported in Monday's New York Times, "the administration is also working to shift the blame away from the White House and toward officials of New Orleans and Louisiana who, as it happens, are Democrats."

The fruits of that project were quickly visible when White House apologists went to town against New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco. Grover Norquist, one of Washington's most important conservative activists and a close Rove ally, blamed the chaos on "looting in a Democratic city run by a Democratic mayor and a Democratic governor." Surely McClellan will call Norquist to reprimand him about that awful finger-pointing.

Fox's Bill O'Reilly devoted one of his "Talking Points Memos" to denouncing Nagin and Blanco. True, he was "fair and balanced" in devoting a single sentence in his speech of roughly 500 words to Bush's role: "the Homeland Security office and President Bush were 24 hours late in taking decisive action." Thanks for that, Bill.

The White House is aghast because it is pulling levers that once worked, and nothing is happening.

To borrow one of O'Reilly's favorite phrases, New Orleans was a "No Spin Zone." Good, smart, tough and compassionate reporters gave Americans a direct view of the disaster and kept asking, with increasing urgency, why New Orleans was such a mess.

You can tell the White House knows how much trouble it is in -- that's no doubt why Bush had another news conference yesterday -- by following the Frank Theorem. "It's a rule in American politics," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), "that whichever side denounces the other for politicizing the issue is losing the argument." Bingo.

Once, the White House could use its surrogates to intimidate critics. Especially after Sept. 11, Democrats were concerned -- for both patriotic and opportunistic reasons -- that certain criticisms of Bush might be seen as "giving aid and comfort to the enemy." You can't be accused of giving aid and comfort to a hurricane.

This crisis has been an exceptionally clear lesson in this White House's overall approach: Try to get everyone to believe that any criticism of the president will blow back on the critics because Americans just don't like that sort of thing. Attack "finger-pointing," and make sure your allies madly point fingers at your opponents.

Say no one should play politics with a disaster -- and then make sure Republican leaders in Congress set up a commission to investigate the relief effort without asking Democrats for their input on how the investigation should be carried out.

Bush's critics aren't backing off, because they've been here before. Former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle, who cooperated with Bush in the days after Sept. 11 but lost his South Dakota seat after a long, White House-inspired campaign accusing him of being "obstructionist," speaks from experience.

"Democrats to this day remain outraged at the blatant efforts that Republicans, especially in the administration, made to undermine the perception of our patriotism and our motivations," Daschle said in an interview.

This time around, Democrats won't be waved off by right-wing commentators or by contrived and insincere appeals to national unity. "I don't think we should pay a whit of attention to administration criticisms," Daschle said. "Democrats need to ask the hard questions and ignore the political attacks that are destined to come when we ask them."

The sounds of contention you are hearing are the sounds of accountability in a free republic. The president may not like it, but it is a refreshing sound.

Point Those Fingers (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

To understand the history of the Bush administration's response to disaster, just follow the catchphrases.

DOJ_NMG_0003887

First, look at 2001 Congressional testimony by Joseph Allbaugh, President Bush's first pick to head the Federal Emergency Management Agency. FEMA, he said, would emphasize "Responsibility and Accountability" (capital letters and boldface in the original statement). He repeated the phrase several times.

What Mr. Allbaugh seems to have meant was that state and local government officials shouldn't count on FEMA to bail them out if they didn't prepare adequately for disasters. They should accept responsibility for protecting their constituents, and be held accountable if they don't.

But those were rules for the little people. Now that the Bush administration has botched its own response to disaster, we're not supposed to play the "blame game." Scott McClellan used that phrase 15 times over the course of just two White House press briefings.

It might make sense to hold off on the criticism if this were the first big disaster on Mr. Bush's watch, or if the chain of mistakes in handling Hurricane Katrina were out of character. But even with the most generous possible assessment, this is the administration's second big policy disaster, after Iraq. And the chain of mistakes was perfectly in character - there are striking parallels between the errors the administration made in Iraq and the errors it made last week.

In Iraq, the administration displayed a combination of paralysis and denial after the fall of Baghdad, as uncontrolled looting destroyed much of Iraq's infrastructure.

The same deer-in-the-headlights immobility prevailed as Katrina approached and struck the Gulf Coast. The storm gave plenty of warning. By the afternoon of Monday, Aug. 29, the flooding of New Orleans was well under way - city officials publicly confirmed a breach in the 17th Street Canal at 2 p.m. Yet on Tuesday federal officials were still playing down the problem, and large-scale federal aid didn't arrive until last Friday.

In Iraq the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran the country during the crucial first year after Saddam's fall - the period when an effective government might have forestalled the nascent insurgency - was staffed on the basis of ideological correctness and personal connections rather than qualifications. At one point Ari Fleischer's brother was in charge of private-sector development.

The administration followed the same principles in staffing FEMA. The agency had become a highly professional organization during the Clinton years, but under Mr. Bush it reverted to its former status as a "turkey farm," a source of patronage jobs.

As Bloomberg News puts it, the agency's "upper ranks are mostly staffed with people who share two traits: loyalty to President George W. Bush and little or no background in emergency management." By now everyone knows FEMA's current head went from overseeing horse shows to overseeing the nation's response to disaster, with no obvious qualifications other than the fact that he was Mr. Allbaugh's college roommate.

All that's missing from the Katrina story is an expensive reconstruction effort, with lucrative deals for politically connected companies, that fails to deliver essential services. But give it time - they're working on that, too.

Why did the administration make the same mistakes twice? Because it paid no political price the first time.

Can the administration escape accountability again? Some of the tactics it has used to obscure its failure in Iraq won't be available this time. The reality of the catastrophe was right there on our TV's, although FEMA is now trying to prevent the media from showing pictures of the dead. And people who ask hard questions can't be accused of undermining the troops.

But the other factors that allowed the administration to evade responsibility for the mess in Iraq are still in place. The media will be tempted to revert to he-said-she-said stories rather than damning factual accounts. The effort to shift blame to state and local officials is under way. Smear campaigns against critics will start soon, if they haven't already. And raw political power will be used to block any independent investigation.

Will this be enough to let the administration get away with another failure? Let's hope not: if the administration isn't held accountable for what just happened, it will keep repeating its mistakes. Michael Brown and Michael Chertoff will receive presidential medals, and the next disaster will be even worse.

Hughes Is Varnishing The Nation's Tarnish (WP)

By Dana Milbank

DOJ_NMG_0003888

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The image of the United States has taken a beating over the past 10 days, as foreign television and newspapers show images of death, chaos and disease in New Orleans. Even lowly Bangladesh (per capita income: $400 a year) was moved to send $1 million in foreign aid.

But Karen Hughes has another view. The Bush confidante, now undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, held a meeting with her staff in Foggy Bottom yesterday and was asked about the international ramifications of the response to the New Orleans flooding. The problem, Hughes replied, was not a failed relief effort but a foreign press that did not appreciate the federal government's good work.

"There are a lot of things being said about us around the world that aren't true," said the woman in charge of polishing the American image abroad. "We've marshaled the resources of our federal government" to help fellow Americans, she said, and if people think otherwise, "we need to aggressively challenge that idea around the world."

An hour after Hughes gave her defense, a group of liberal demonstrators assembled in Lafayette Park for the opposite purpose. MoveOn.org, which three weeks ago held a rally in the same place to protest the Iraq war, was protesting the hurricane response. This time, instead of demanding a presidential audience for anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, the group was demanding a presidential audience for three New Orleans evacuees.

The demonstrators, carrying messages promoting women's rights, labor unions and "Hillary '08" and condemning Halliburton, Karl Rove, the Iraq war and killings in Sudan, did not deny that the hurricane protest was opportunistic. "It's almost as if people are looking for an excuse to pin something on Bush that will stick," said Jerry Stein, who also marched in the Iraq rally.

Ten days after Katrina struck, the administration and its critics faced credibility challenges. On one side, Bush and his aides continued to admit what even key Republicans in Congress have said: that the response to the hurricane was a debacle. On the other side, liberals ratcheted up their criticism of the administration, giving Bush support for his accusation that they are playing politics.

Remarks by prominent Republicans have left the party on the defensive. The president's mother suggested that life in the Astrodome is "working very well" for impoverished evacuees. Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.) suggested fines for people who didn't heed evacuation warnings. And House Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) proposed bulldozing New Orleans.

Two-thirds of Americans say the administration botched the relief effort, a new Pew poll found, and only 40 percent approve of Bush's performance overall. Vice President Cheney was cursed out yesterday in Gulfport, Miss.

Yet the Bush administration, whether discussing Iraq or Katrina, remains unfailingly upbeat. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, introducing Hughes, said nothing of Katrina as she repeated the Bush mantra that "freedom is on the march."

Hughes picked up the theme. "We have to offer a positive vision of hope," she began. As if preparing troops for combat, she described her plans for improving world opinion of the United States: a "rapid-response unit," a plan to "forward-deploy regional SWAT teams" and create "a dual-headed DAS for public diplomacy."

One of her underlings rose to ask how this effort squared with the administration's famously tight control over its message. "Recently, we've had tremendous amount of difficulty in some cases getting clearance for our ambassadors to speak," he said.

Hughes replied that ambassadors are free to talk -- if they use the talking points she sends them. "If they make statements based on something I sent them," she said, "they're not going to be called on the carpet."

While Hughes told employees that America's problems could be solved with message discipline, about 10 blocks away, MoveOn was struggling to maintain its message discipline at its protest outside the White House. When the MoveOn organizers arrived, there was already a demonstration underway calling for intervention in Darfur, and the Katrina and Darfur demonstrators intermingled in an eclectic line demanding "Help Hurricane Victims" and "Stop the Genocide."

Tom Matzzie, a MoveOn official, told the cameras: "This is what government looks like when it is in the hands of people who don't believe in government."

But it proved difficult to keep the focus on the hurricane. Some of the MoveOn demonstrators surrounded a conservative heckler, who shouted: "You're a bunch of loony liberals."

"Bush dug himself a hole by going to Iraq," one of the liberals shouted back.

"What does Iraq have to do with Katrina, for crying out loud?" the conservative demanded.

DOJ_NMG_0003889

"Because he doesn't care about poor people," came the reply.

Another conservative, Clarice McMillan, blurted out: "My country, right or wrong!"

Over with the protesters, Lisa Petrovich, a systems analyst from Montgomery County, was ambivalent. She is outraged about the response to the storm: Her mother and sister lost their homes and jobs in New Orleans and are living with her. But at the same time, she said of the protest, "I think there may be some opportunism."

Senators Press Bush On Hurricane Relief Czar (REU)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, September 8, 2005

Two Republican senators pressed President George W. Bush on Thursday to appoint a top official to lead the long-term recovery from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina.

Bush, still said to be dissatisfied with the relief effort, announced measures to help displaced Gulf Coast residents obtain benefits.

"We have much more work to do," he said. "But the people who have been hurt by this storm need to know that the government is going to be with you for the long haul."

Bush earlier met with Republican congressional leaders at the White House, where Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania urged him to pick someone to lead the administration's much-criticized recovery effort in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

White House officials have not ruled out such an option, saying it is among several being discussed for confronting long-term problems in Katrina's aftermath.

Various names have been mentioned in Washington for the job, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, former Secretary of State Colin Powell and retired Gen. Tommy Franks, former head of the U.S. Central Command.

"I believe that we do need a person on the ground for a long period of time, the six- to nine-month range, who would be the person able to make decisions and cut through red tape, and I think the president agrees with that," Hutchison told reporters after the meeting.

Asked whether Bush agreed with creating the position, Santorum said: "That's up to him. He didn't say yes or no."

Vice President Dick Cheney, visiting the devastated region, was asked whether a czar to oversee hurricane relief was needed and responded by praising the people currently in charge.

"Well, I think we have got some very good people involved," he told reporters in Gulfport, Mississippi.

CUTTING RED TAPE

Bush, in a direct message to storm victims, announced measures to "cut through the red tape" to help them get benefits such as unemployment, Medicaid and food stamps.

He also said every household affected by the hurricane would get $2,000 in emergency disaster relief and that "evacuee status" would be granted to victims, many of whom no longer have documents to prove eligibility for benefits.

Bush also declared September 16 a national day of prayer and remembrance for the hurricane victims.

A day after Republican congressional leaders announced a joint House-Senate inquiry into government failures regarding the hurricane, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada criticized the approach and said the investigation should be conducted by an independent commission like the one that looked into the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Reid said Democrats would not participate in the joint committee, which they see as set up to protect the administration.

"An independent investigation insulated from politics and conflicts of interest is the only way to ensure that the American people get the answers they deserve," he said.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California said the congressional plan would "result in a whitewash of what is going on there."

Amid the partisan wrangling over the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "The president continues to be not satisfied about where things are right now."

DOJ_NMG_0003890

A CBS News poll reported that 58 percent of Americans disapproved of Bush's handling of the crisis and that only 32 percent expressed a lot of confidence in his ability to handle a crisis, compared with 66 percent approval in the weeks after the September 11, 2001, attacks.

About 300 protesters organized by the liberal group MoveOn.org, marched outside the White House carrying signs saying "Help Hurricane Victims" and chanting "Shame on Bush."

(Additional reporting by Steve Holland, Patricia Wilson)

Democratic Leaders Reject G.O.P. Storm Inquiry Plan (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Congressional Democratic leaders said Thursday that they would not appoint members to a new House-Senate committee to investigate failures in the government response to Hurricane Katrina, calling instead for an independent inquiry.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, and Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, her counterpart in the Senate, said they would not cooperate because the committee would be controlled by Republicans, would have uncertain authority and was created without consultation with Democrats.

"Despite all the talk of bipartisanship," Ms. Pelosi said, "they have just on their own, unilaterally, put forth a proposal that will result in a whitewash of what is going on here." She added, "If we are ever going to truly protect the American people, now it is clear to me that we must have an outside independent commission, as we finally arrived at on 9/11."

Mr. Reid said he would not place any Senate Democrats on the panel "as it is currently described," adding: "The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome."

Republicans said they would still move forward with the panel initiated Wednesday by the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, and Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, and would try to persuade Democrats to drop their objections.

"We hope that in the end, the Democrats will come on board," said Ron Bonjean, the spokesman for Mr. Hastert.

The Republican leaders said they saw the joint House-Senate committee as the preferable way to conduct the inquiry because it would prevent aid officials from having to appear before multiple committees. They said the panel would be structured like other House and Senate panels, with the majority Republicans having a slightly greater number of members than minority Democrats.

But Democrats suggested the panel should be evenly divided to avoid the possibility of Republicans protecting the Bush administration from close scrutiny. They and some Republicans said that in the absence of an outside panel, existing Congressional committees are able to conduct the investigation. In the Senate, the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee has already begun its own investigation and met privately on Thursday with administration officials in advance of a hearing next week.

One senior senator, John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he was awaiting more details on the organization of the joint panel but said that the public deserved a thorough accounting of the storm response.

"I think the American public deserves a very clear and forthcoming revelation of all of the facts because in the end, they are going to make the final judgment," he told reporters.

Democrats Spurn Republican-backed Katrina Probe (REU)

By Donna Smith

Reuters, September 8, 2005

Democratic leaders pushing for an independent commission to investigate the government's response to Hurricane Katrina spurned on Thursday a plan by majority Republicans for a joint congressional inquiry.

House of Representatives Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, called the House-Senate investigation announced by Republican leaders on Wednesday a "sham" and said it would not produce an objective assessment of what went wrong in the hours and days following the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0003891

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada also said he would not participate in the Republican-led inquiry.

The government's initial response to the catastrophic storm that left hundreds of thousands homeless and thousands feared dead along the U.S. Gulf Coast has come under intense bipartisan criticism.

While President George W. Bush declared Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama disaster areas days before Hurricane Katrina hit on August 29 "to avert the threat of a catastrophe," residents of the region complained there was no federal help until days after the storm.

Pelosi said on CNN on Thursday that in meetings with Bush this week to discuss the response to Katrina the president asked her "'What didn't go right last week?'"

House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, both Republicans, announced what they said would be a bipartisan investigation at an event on Wednesday to which no Democrats were invited. With their plan, aides said Republicans would have the majority of members.

"The partisan proposal that Republican leaders outlined yesterday is completely unacceptable," Pelosi said. "House Democrats will not participate in a sham that is just the latest example of congressional Republicans being the foxes guarding the president's hen house."

Both Pelosi and Reid have called for an independent commission similar to the one that investigated intelligence failures before the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Reid also declined to name Democrats to the panel saying its current structure would not yield the truth.

"The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome," he said.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said Republicans would move ahead with the inquiry and hoped "that in the end the Democrats will come around and join us for the good of the country."

SENATE PANEL FORGING AHEAD

While the joint congressional inquiry appears to be getting off to a rocky start, a Senate panel began its investigation into the government response effort.

Sen. Susan Collins (news, bio, voting record), a Maine Republican who heads the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said she is committed to pushing the inquiry forward on a bipartisan basis. She and Sen. Joseph Lieberman (news, bio, voting record) of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the panel, spoke to reporters following a closed-door committee session with officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Coast Guard.

She said her committee will continue its investigation until the joint congressional panel gets running and takes over. She will lead the Senate side of the joint inquiry.

"We're still committed to a bipartisan inquiry," Collins said. "I think that's important for the credibility of the investigation and for it to have the confidence of the American people." (additional reporting by Vicki Allen)

Katrina Aid Package Could Push Deficit To New High (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — First came the storm, then the flood, then the exodus. Now come the benefits, followed by the bills.

Hurricane Katrina has set the federal government on a spending spree. The total of $62 billion approved by Congress is already more than any amount spent on any previous domestic natural disaster. And it will be spent within weeks.

As the months pass, the government will face pressure to pay for health and education services usually rendered by states, cities and school districts. That will apply not just in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, but in states housing and caring for Katrina's evacuees.

That's likely to push the deficit for fiscal year 2006, which begins Oct. 1, beyond last year's record $412 billion. Before Katrina, the 2006 deficit was projected to be $314 billion.

Bill Hoagland, the top budget aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, agreed that the deficit is likely to top $400 billion.

“I don't think it's out of line,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003892

Leon Panetta, White House chief of staff and budget director under President Clinton, said it could hit $500 billion.

"At some point, all of that borrowing comes back to haunt you," he said.

White House budget director Joshua Bolten acknowledged the rising red ink.

"We will have a larger deficit in 2006 than we would otherwise have anticipated," he said. But because Katrina costs are temporary, the deficit should decline quickly in future years, he said.

President Bush signed the $51.8 billion bill on Thursday after quick approval was given in Congress. Bush said the federal government would compensate states caring for Katrina victims. "You should not be penalized for showing compassion," he said.

Today, the nation's school administrators will ask for $12.3 billion to rebuild about 500 schools and educate 250,000 students displaced by Katrina for a year.

Other federal costs will include paying off flood insurance policies, helping industries hit hard by the hurricane and dealing with environmental cleanup and wetlands restoration.

"This is on a magnitude we've never done before," said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis.

Cost Of Recovery Surges, As Do Bids To Join In Effort (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - With Congress primed to spend billions of dollars on the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, lawmakers and industry groups are lining up to bring home their share of the cascade of money for rebuilding and relief.

White House officials and Congressional budget experts now assume that federal costs for the hurricane will shoot past $100 billion, which itself is more than twice the entire annual federal budget for domestic security. Congress on Thursday approved $51.8 billion in spending, bringing the total so far to more than $62 billion.

The demand for money comes from many directions. Louisiana lawmakers plan to push for billions of dollars to upgrade the levees around New Orleans, rebuild highways, lure back business and shore up the city's sinking foundation. The devastated areas of Mississippi and Alabama will need similar infusions of cash.

Communities will want compensation for taking in evacuees. And there will be future costs of health care, debris removal, temporary housing, clothing, vehicle replacement. Farmers from the Midwest, meanwhile, are beginning to press for emergency relief as a result of their difficulties in shipping grain through the Port of New Orleans.

Other ideas circulating through Congress that could entail significant costs include these notions:

¶Turning New Orleans and other cities affected by the storm into big new tax-free zones.

¶Providing reconstruction money for tens of thousands of homeowners and small businesses that did not have federal flood insurance on their houses or buildings.

¶Making most hurricane victims eligible for health care under Medicaid and having the federal government pay the full cost rather than the current practice of splitting costs with states.

The torrent of money - more than $2 billion a day over the weekend, and expected to remain above $500 million a day for the foreseeable future - prompted several lawmakers to warn about the perils of an open checkbook.

"We are reaching a perfect political storm," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama. "We have all the earmarks of a rush to spend money that is very dangerous."

Mr. Sessions called on President Bush to appoint a person with significant business experience to oversee the spending. Contained within the spending measure approved Thursday is a provision that directs an extra $15 million to the inspector general's office in the Department of Homeland Security. The agency is also ordered to provide at least weekly reports to Congress on the use of the money.

Those safeguards, along with a decision by the administration to waive the federal law requiring that prevailing wages be paid on construction projects underwritten by federal dollars, were critical to persuading Congressional conservatives to vote for the money. It passed the House on 410-to-11 vote, with the only opposition coming from Republicans. The Senate vote was 97 to 0.

DOJ_NMG_0003893

But fiscal conservatives who supported the legislation on Thursday threatened to oppose future installments of money unless Congress and the administration begin to find ways to offset the spending so it is not just piled on top of the federal deficit.

"Congress must ensure that a catastrophe of nature does not become a catastrophe of debt for our children and grandchildren," said Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana and a conservative leader in the House.

"There is no sacrifice on the part of Congress," said Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, who said the decision to not cut spending elsewhere was a failure of leadership.

The emergency spending plan also drew scrutiny from some lawmakers who contended that it raised the risk of fraud by increasing the spending limit on about 250,000 credit cards issued to government workers from $15,000 to $250,000. "The use of government credit cards has a track record, and it is not a good one," Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California, wrote in a letter urging Congressional leaders to delete the provision.

But Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader and typically an opponent of increased spending for social programs, argued that Congress had no choice but to provide the financial assistance as quickly as possible.

"I know the American people, some of them are worrying about all this money," Mr. DeLay said. "Ladies and gentlemen, five million people, five million Americans, deserve us finding a way to make them whole."

House Democrats complained that they were prevented Thursday from offering a proposal to sever the Federal Emergency Management Agency from the Department of Homeland Security and making other changes before turning over so much to the agency, which has come under withering fire for its storm response. Republicans said they did not want to impede the aid by getting caught up in a legislative fight, and they said Democrats would have opportunities later to offer the FEMA changes.

Administration officials said the government spent about $2 billion a day last weekend, and the additional $51.8 billion would merely cover costs for "the next few weeks."

Joshua B. Bolten, the White House budget director, said the spending rate last weekend stemmed in part from signing big contracts for debris removal and temporary housing. The government has already bought 100,000 trailers for temporary housing and is trying to buy 200,000 more.

Of the new money, $23.2 billion is designated for temporary housing and other financial assistance to individuals. Another $11 billion is broadly aimed at "mission assignments" by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which will hire other agencies and companies for jobs like debris removal.

FEMA will receive about $4.65 billion to pay for logistical needs, supplies and search-and-rescue operations. The Army Corps of Engineers will get $3 billion, essentially to pay for repairing the broken levees in New Orleans.

But the relief money is not expected to cover any of the real reconstruction costs that lie ahead: repair of highways, bridges and other infrastructure and new projects that seek to prevent a repeat of the New Orleans disaster. Nor will it even help pay for expanded availability of food stamps and poverty programs to cover hurricane victims.

"I'm fearful that this will open the floodgates for money," said Chris Edwards, a budget analyst at the Cato Institute, a research group that supports reduced government spending. "If they spend $1 billion a day for relief, that's fine. But down the road, state and local governments traditionally issue bonds for infrastructure when they need to build."

Shortly before the House voted to approve Mr. Bush's request for $51.8 billion, it approved a separate bill to let hurricane victims get more access to the federal welfare assistance for low-income families.

Democratic lawmakers proposed a raft of their own proposals. Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, called for giving hurricane victims immediate access to Medicaid, the federal health program for low-income people, and letting victims collect unemployment payments for as long as one year.

Lobbyists Seek Leverage From Storm (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Bolstered by the shift in political winds from Hurricane Katrina, U.S. corporations are pressing lawmakers to approve a range of issues that have languished on Capitol Hill, some of which have little to do with hurricane relief.

DOJ_NMG_0003894

Major U.S. airlines are asking Congress to suspend federal jet-fuel taxes. Oil and gas companies want drilling rights in new parts of the Gulf Coast. Insurance companies want the ability to use tax-free funds to create a multibillion-dollar industry fund to cover future claims from natural disasters. Shipbuilders such as Northrop Grumman Corp. want billions of dollars to help rebuild shipyards in Mississippi. Even small chicken farmers are asking Congress for low-interest loans to fix or replace hundreds of damaged or destroyed chicken coops in Mississippi.

"Overall, we are going to be a lot more open to things now that would help keep our traditional industries chugging along," says Rep. Jack Kingston, a Republican from Georgia.

Delta Air Lines stands to be the first big winner of the Republicans' goodwill. Lawmakers in the House and Senate say they expect to approve legislation by mid-October to give the Atlanta-based carrier more time to make payments to its employee pension plan. Delta officials have told Congress they would be forced to file for bankruptcy protection if Congress doesn't lend them a hand by the time the new bankruptcy law takes effect next month. Atlanta-based Delta is the incumbent carrier in the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast.

Yesterday, senators working on a pension-overhaul bill agreed to language requested by Delta's lobbyists that would give the airline 14 years to catch up on payments to its employees' retirement plans. Currently, the Delta plans are underfunded by $5.3 billion. Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, also added a Delta-backed provision that would allow the airline to increase benefits promised to workers if the airline could offset the new costs with matching contributions to the plans.

Until Katrina battered the Gulf Coast, House Republicans were adamantly opposed to helping the airlines. But now their resistance is softening. "I'm clearly sensitive to the problem of the legacy carriers," says Rep. John Boehner, the author of the pension-overhaul legislation in the House. "We ought to do what is reasonable to keep them from dumping their pensions" on the federal government, he says.

Delta and other large airlines are also pushing Congress and the Bush administration to suspend the 4.3-cents-a-gallon tax on jet fuel, a long-sought goal. Earlier this week, Sen. Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican who chairs the Commerce Committee, asked the airline industry what Congress could do to alleviate some of the hurricane's impact, according to airline lobbyists. The industry's trade association, the Air Transport Association, told Mr. Stevens that Congress should suspend the fuel tax for one year.

Mr. Stevens has scheduled a hearing on the matter next week. Despite his interest in providing assistance, the airlines continue to face resistance in both the House and Senate. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas oppose suspending fuel taxes, because the funds are used to build highways, bridges and runways. Rep. John Mica, the Florida Republican who is chairman of the House's aviation subcommittee, says the airlines "can raise their fares to adjust for fuel costs."

A price increase is one possibility. Airlines have considered imposing a "fuel surcharge" that would be tacked on to every ticket, and some would even prefer if Congress mandated it to ensure that all carriers would boost their prices. Either way, carriers have asked the Department of Transportation to let them list any surcharge separately from the regular fare, so that it wouldn't be included in the base fare that customers are initially quoted. Rather, the surcharge would appear at the end of a purchase, along with other taxes and fees. The industry would also like Congress to exempt any fuel surcharge from the existing 7.5% passenger ticket tax.

Beyond the airlines, the energy industry is pushing to permit oil and gas drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, reduce regulatory barriers to building new oil refineries and increase federal subsidies to help low-income Americans heat their homes in the winter.

Gas companies are pressing Congress to revive legislation that would expand oil drilling in eastern portions of the Gulf of Mexico. "It's all stuff that we were talking about before Katrina, but Katrina exposed our vulnerabilities," says Darrell Henry, a lobbyist with the American Gas Association.

On a smaller scale, poultry and seafood producers along the Gulf Coast are also preparing to ask Washington for help. Laurel, Miss.-based Sanderson Farms Inc. reported that the storm killed about five million birds and destroyed nearly 10% of its coops. "Federal assistance in dealing with this type of loss would be very appropriate," said Richard Lobb, a spokesman for the industry's National Chicken Council. Mr. Lobb said chicken farmers are asking the federal government to provide low-interest loans to help rebuild hundreds of 400-foot-long "grow-out houses," which run about $150,000 apiece.

DOJ_NMG_0003895

Louisiana's oyster farmers were so hard hit that they still haven't determined what type of help they will seek. Louisiana produces more than 40% of the oysters eaten in the U.S. each year. The National Fisheries Institute, an industry trade group, estimates that two-thirds of Louisiana's oyster industry has been wiped out.

"The boats, docks, processing plants and ice housing are likely decimated," said Stacey Felzenberg, a spokeswoman for the association. "The people who have been impacted really will need some significant aid to get back on their feet."

Louisiana Lawmakers Aim To Cope With Political Fallout (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

LOUISIANA LAWMAKERS aim to cope with political fallout.

Sen. Landrieu, in spotlight now, could find margins squeezed if thousands of Democratic-leaning African-Americans don't return by her 2008 re-election. Louisiana political analyst John Maginnis says state could even lose one of seven House seats in next redistricting.

Two shaky House incumbents, Democrat Melancon and Republican Boustany, hope response to hurricane rallies voters behind them. House Republican campaign chief Reynolds touts chance to market conservative social-policy solutions; Rep. Baker of Baton Rouge is overheard telling lobbyists: "We finally cleaned up public housing in New Orleans. We couldn't do it, but God did."

Baker explains later he didn't intend flippancy but has long wanted to improve low-income housing.

KATRINA ROILS trade debate over shrimp tariffs.

The U.S. International Trade Commission next week considers whether shrimpers from India and Thailand, saddled with tariffs after complaints of unfair competition from domestic producers, still pose a threat. Last winter's tsunami has fueled calls for lifting the levies.

But now the hurricane has given the U.S. industry a new argument for retaining tariff protection: An estimated 40% of domestic shrimpers and processors suffered some Katrina damage. "It's going to take awhile for that to recover," says Sal Versaggi of the eight-state Southern Shrimp Alliance.

SPOTLIGHT ON POOR increases opposition to planned Medicaid cuts.

A bipartisan group of senators urges Finance Chairman Grassley to delay slicing $10 billion from Medicaid and other entitlement programs serving many of those displaced by Katrina. "We must remain focused on the relief efforts and ways to deliver both short- and long-term aid," write Republicans Smith and Snowe, joined by Democrats Bingaman and Lincoln.

Administration officials mull ways to deliver more Medicaid funds to states such as Texas where rolls will swell; House Democrats urge HHS Secretary Leavitt to assume all costs of the state-federal program in affected areas. But conservatives like Rep. Barton of Texas warn Katrina shouldn't become an excuse to block Medicaid overhaul.

"Let me repeat, so that everybody hears me -- evacuees from Hurricane Katrina would not be hurt!" he says.

OPPORTUNITY KNOCKS: Ten U.S. Army recruiters are offering volunteer help for Katrina evacuees at Houston's Astrodome. But the recruiters, struggling to keep enlistment up during Iraq war, are also available with options for the jobless. "Our intent is to approach the evacuees at the right time for them," says Army spokesman Douglas Smith.

PR BONANZA? U.S. adversaries draw wide attention by joining international effort to offer help with Katrina relief. The Bush administration rebuffs Iran's conditional offer of 20 million barrels of oil while remaining mum on Cuba's pitch to send 1,500 doctors and nurses. Venezuela's Chávez, deriding Bush as "king of vacations," mixes offers of aid workers with oil shipments.

DUELING CAUSES? Grass-roots charities sending items to troops in Iraq worry they'll lose out to Katrina relief. "It will be even harder to ask and receive donations when there are so many needing help," says Connie Riecke of the Oregon-based Marine Corps Family Foundation.

FAMILY TIES: Bush's Katrina performance draws fire, but Texas universities eagerly compete for his presidential library in bid process ending next week. Contenders include University of Texas, which has the LBJ library; Southern Methodist, Laura

DOJ_NMG_0003896

Bush's alma mater; and Baylor, near the Crawford ranch. Library executives say bidders must accommodate "an institute inspired by the principles of George W. Bush's administration," a museum, a cafe and gift shop.

NEW FEMINISM: Conservatives tout female court pick to block Gonzales.

Right rallies around antiabortion appeals-court judges, including Edith Jones and Priscilla Owen; Janice Rogers Brown, an African-American, would meet post-Katrina calls for Bush to appoint a minority. All are seen as more conservative than Attorney General Gonzales, who'd be the first Hispanic pick.

Some close to White House predict Bush won't announce O'Connor's successor until Roberts clears Senate Judiciary Committee. Meanwhile, liberals battle for seats in next week's Judiciary hearings, but find themselves outnumbered by Roberts backers.

The hearing will "look like a Republican town hall meeting," one activist grumbles.

MINOR MEMOS: Trial lawyers' association calls on Republican Rep. Pryce to "stop scaring volunteers" after she says some would-be aid workers feared lawsuits. ... Tom Gallagher of ISI Group says posthurricane congressional spending makes it "Katrina Bar the Door" on fiscal policy.

Bankrupting The Victims (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

Government aid is finally flowing to the most helpless victims of Hurricane Katrina, but a broader category of the dispossessed will test the government over a longer period of time. They are families with the means to flee the hurricane, perhaps even with insurance to cover some losses, but without the resources to make a living immediately. In other contexts, they would be referred to simply as the middle class.

They have lost their homes but are living off their credit cards and maybe a little savings. As those savings dwindle, however, the mortgage keeps coming due and their credit card nears its limit. Soon the paycheck may stop, and with it their health insurance.

How many of these victims exist is anyone's guess; the Congressional Budget Office predicted that the hurricane will cost 400,000 jobs nationally, and some private estimates are double that. Congress will no doubt take some steps to help victims rebuild their lives, but it also should take this opportunity to revisit the new bankruptcy law, which goes into effect Oct. 17. As the Times' Peter Gosselin reported Wednesday, the new bankruptcy law treats those affected by a natural disaster the same as the deadbeat who spent it all on luxury cars, jewelry and cocaine.

As of Oct. 17, individuals filing for bankruptcy who have income at or above their state's family median (in Louisiana, it is $51,402 for a family of four) will largely be forced to repay some or all of their debts for up to five years. Normally, such debtors would have the option of declaring Chapter 7 bankruptcy, which allows people to emerge from debt relatively quickly.

What's more, the new law calculates income by taking a six-month average, so even if someone is jobless, his income statement may not reflect it. And small businesses face a tighter 10-month deadline for coming to agreement with creditors on a repayment plan, even if snack shops and shoe stores drowned by Katrina may take years to recover. And strict deadlines and demands for stacks of documentation remain, even if the documents dissolved in a toxic stew or floated into the Gulf of Mexico.

Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) are leading efforts to delay the bankruptcy law's application to Katrina victims and grant broader exceptions to survivors of all severe disasters.

Before Katrina, supporters of the new law argued it would curb abuse of the bankruptcy code. This argument was always dubious, and in the aftermath of the hurricane, the new law appears simply callous. Does Congress really want to use Katrina's victims as test cases in some sort of grand experiment in bankruptcy reform?

The irony is that Congress has already decided that the more obviously desperate deserve relief. Federal and state officials have sensibly slashed red tape to provide immediate food stamps and Medicaid to evacuees — the poor and not-yet-poor alike. The federal government is providing debit cards to evacuees in the Astrodome.

The federal government failed its most vulnerable citizens in the days after Katrina. Unless Conyers and Feingold prevail, it may do the same, albeit more slowly, to those one rung higher on the economic ladder, as middle- and working-class families lose their foothold on self-sufficiency.

DOJ_NMG_0003897

Opinionline: Katrina Exposes America's Fragility (USAT)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

What people around the world are saying about Katrina:

Mehdi Mohammadi,

in a column in Keyhan (Tehran, Iran): "Reports come from New Orleans that show that the pitiful situation of the people in affected areas cannot be entirely attributed to Katrina. A greater tragedy that has astonished the world's people is the widespread chaos, insecurity and plundering that have been caused by thieves, criminals and murderers. ... What kind of human beings are these people who have ambushed and plundered the helpless men and women? ... Americans have created a nationwide scandal. The American government that has been engaged in the overseas mission of spreading welfare and freedom among nations of the world, with its huge resources and facilities, has completely failed to control a crisis that is not so great compared to similar events."

People's Daily

(Beijing), in an editorial: "America seems (to be) fighting a city war at home — New Orleans has become Baghdad. ... People have reason to feel disgusted: when Indonesia was hit by a tsunami last year, everybody lent a helping hand and nobody looted. But now this happened in the United States, showing people another side of this 'civilized country.' In fact, it revealed a fragility of the American society, as well as despair and disorder. ... Katrina swept away not only people's homes, but their dignity."

Al-Sharq

(Qatar), in an editorial: "The global humanitarian reaction to the victims of Katrina will pave the way for a new dialogue between the world's civilizations and religions in the interest of international security and peace."

The Korea Herald

(Seoul), in an editorial: "The U.S. media are heard wondering why the outside world is still slow to come to the aid of the country while it had always been the most generous to help other nations in natural and other calamities. Some commentators even tried to attribute it to U.S. unilateralism shown in the war on terror and the Iraqi war in particular. But world nations will certainly repay the Americans what they owed to them. If their response is not very expeditious, it must be due to the still ineffective worldwide emergency aid logistics system. The United Nations should have quickly played the leading role as the United States, the usual main provider, is now in need."

National Post

(Ontario, Canada), in an editorial: "The sense that government would be there to make everything all right — to provide food, shelter, water, medicine — is not surprising given that for so many New Orleanians, a general reliance on social assistance is a normal part of daily life. With a median household income of $31,369 and some of the country's oldest and most notorious public housing projects, New Orleans is a city that is fully enmeshed in the vicious welfare cycle that leaves the poor incapable of taking care of themselves. If there was a problem, many of the residents had been conditioned to think, then surely the same people who came through every month with money for food, prescription drugs, housing and child care would be there to take care of it."

Paul Kelly,

editor at large, in a column in The Australian (Sydney): "The U.S. has betrayed its own values and its historic role as an exemplar to the world. ... It is an American tragedy and an American failure. ... The New Orleans disaster documents the failure of contemporary U.S. leadership. It goes to competent government, adequate planning, efficient agency coordination and an effective chief executive. It betrays what many suspect about the Bush administration: that it suffers from a systemic inability to organize effective public policy responses, either in the U.S. or in Iraq."

The Straits Times

(Singapore), in an editorial: "Coping with natural disasters requires systems and the machinery to execute set procedures. But crisis situations demand leadership, above all else. The Japanese government froze for days after the Kobe earthquake of 1995. When organized help finally came, Japan — and now the U.S. — performed up to expectations. But reputations are usually made or ruined in the first critical days."

DOJ_NMG_0003898

How Reliable Is Brown's Resume? (TIME)

By Daren Fonda And Rita Healy

Time, September 8, 2005

When President Bush nominated Michael Brown to head the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) in 2003, Brown's boss at the time, Joe Allbaugh, declared, "the President couldn't have chosen a better man to help...prepare and protect the nation." But how well was he prepared for the job? Since Hurricane Katrina, the FEMA director has come under heavy criticism for his performance and scrutiny of his background. Now, an investigation by TIME has found discrepancies in his online legal profile and official bio, including a description of Brown released by the White House at the time of his nomination in 2001 to the job as deputy chief of FEMA. (Brown became Director of FEMA, succeeding Allbaugh, in 2003.)

Before joining FEMA, his only previous stint in emergency management, according to his bio posted on FEMA's website, was "serving as an assistant city manager with emergency services oversight." The White House press release from 2001 stated that Brown worked for the city of Edmond, Okla., from 1975 to 1978 "overseeing the emergency services division." In fact, according to Claudia Deakins, head of public relations for the city of Edmond, Brown was an "assistant to the city manager" from 1977 to 1980, not a manager himself, and had no authority over other employees. "The assistant is more like an intern," she told TIME. "Department heads did not report to him." Brown did do a good job at his humble position, however, according to his boss. "Yes. Mike Brown worked for me. He was my administrative assistant. He was a student at Central State University," recalls former city manager Bill Dashner. "Mike used to handle a lot of details. Every now and again I'd ask him to write me a speech. He was very loyal. He was always on time. He always had on a suit and a starched white shirt."

In response, Nicol Andrews, deputy strategic director in FEMA's office of public affairs, insists that while Brown began as an intern, he became an "assistant city manager" with a distinguished record of service. "According to Mike Brown," she says, "a large portion [of the points raised by TIME] is very inaccurate."

Brown's lack of experience in emergency management isn't the only apparent bit of padding on his resume, which raises questions about how rigorously the White House vetted him before putting him in charge of FEMA. Under the "honors and awards" section of his profile at FindLaw.com — which is information on the legal website provided by lawyers or their offices— he lists "Outstanding Political Science Professor, Central State University". However, Brown "wasn't a professor here, he was only a student here," says Charles Johnson, News Bureau Director in the University Relations office at the University of Central Oklahoma (formerly named Central State University). "He may have been an adjunct instructor," says Johnson, but that title is very different from that of "professor." Carl Reherman, a former political science professor at the University through the '70s and '80s, says that Brown "was not on the faculty." As for the honor of "Outstanding Political Science Professor," Johnson says, "I spoke with the department chair yesterday and he's not aware of it." Johnson could not confirm that Brown made the Dean's list or was an "Outstanding Political Science Senior," as is stated on his online profile.

Speaking for Brown, Andrews says that Brown has never claimed to be a political science professor, in spite of what his profile in FindLaw indicates. "He was named the outstanding political science senior at Central State, and was an adjunct professor at Oklahoma City School of Law."

Under the heading of "Professional Associations and Memberships" on FindLaw, Brown states that from 1983 to the present he has been director of the Oklahoma Christian Home, a nursing home in Edmond. But an administrator with the Home, told TIME that Brown is "not a person that anyone here is familiar with." She says there was a board of directors until a couple of years ago, but she couldn't find anyone who recalled him being on it. According to FEMA's Andrews, Brown said "he's never claimed to be the director of the home. He was on the board of directors, or governors of the nursing home." However, a veteran employee at the center since 1981 says Brown "was never director here, was never on the board of directors, was never executive director. He was never here in any capacity. I never heard his name mentioned here."

The FindLaw profile for Brown was amended on Thursday to remove a reference to his tenure at the International Arabian Horse Association, which has become a contested point.

Brown's FindLaw profile lists a wide range of areas of legal practice, from estate planning to family law to sports. However, one former colleague does not remember Brown's work as sterling. Stephen Jones, a prominent Oklahoma lawyer who was lead defense attorney on the Timothy McVeigh case, was Brown's boss for two-and-a-half years in the early '80s. "He did mainly transactional work, not litigation," says Jones. "There was a feeling that he was not serious and somewhat shallow." Jones says when his law firm split, Brown was one of two staffers who was let go.

DOJ_NMG_0003899

Democrats' Anti-Bush Petition Also Seeks Political Contributions (NYNSDY/AP)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

New York Newsday, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A new Democratic effort to whip up indignation about the Bush administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina also tried to raise money for Democratic candidates.

Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat and the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, issued an appeal Thursday urging people to sign an online petition to fire the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency over his handling of the Katrina response.

After an inquiry from the Associated Press, the DSCC quickly pulled down the page and said they would donate to charity any money raised by the anti-FEMA petition.

When recipients clicked on a link to the petition, the top center of the screen _ above the call to "Fire the FEMA director" _ had asked for a donation to the DSCC.

Other DSCC Web pages have the same appeal for contributions, but several do not.

Since Katrina, Democrats have charged Republicans badly botched the response, and some have called for the firing of FEMA chief Michael Brown.

In recent days, Republicans hit back by accusing Democrats of trying to use the human tragedy for political gain. The letter, the GOP said Thursday, was proof.

"It's a disgrace to exploit Hurricane Katrina to raise political funds," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

"They should halt this activity because it's way over the line," he said.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said: "While the content of the letter is totally valid, it should have never been linked to a Web site that asks people to contribute to political campaigns. We regret it, have removed the letter from our site and will donate any contributions raised as a result of this petition to the Red Cross."

The letter is the latest sign that more than a week after Hurricane Katrina struck, the political fight over what went wrong in the response continues to grow.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has called for an independent commission to probe government failures before and after Katrina, while House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi called Bush "oblivious, in denial, dangerous" in his approach to relief efforts.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, head of the House Republicans' fund-raising efforts, described Democratic criticism as "reprehensible," saying "this is a tragedy, not an opportunity."

The administration and Republican leaders in Congress are scrambling to launch a number of initiatives to help hurricane refugees and victims, including a new $51 billion aid package.

During the 2004 presidential campaign, some Democrats attacked President Bush for using an image of Sept. 11 devastation in a re-election campaign ad, accusing him of exploiting the tragedy. At the time, Schumer did not join in the criticism.

Advance Men In Charge (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

The Federal Emergency Management Agency announced this week that it didn't want the news media taking photographs of the dead in New Orleans. A FEMA spokeswoman talked unconvincingly about the dignity of the dead. But the bizarre demand, a creepy echo of the ban on news media coverage of the coffins returning from Iraq, is simply the latest spasm of a gutted federal agency.

It's not really all that surprising that the officials who run FEMA are stressing that all-important emergency response function: the public relations campaign. As it turns out, that's all they really have experience at doing.

Michael Brown was made the director after he was asked to resign from the International Arabian Horse Association, and the other top officials at FEMA don't exactly have impressive résumés in emergency management either. The Chicago Tribune reported on Wednesday that neither the acting deputy director, Patrick Rhode, nor the acting deputy chief of staff, Brooks Altshuler, came to FEMA with any previous experience in disaster management. Ditto for Scott Morris, the third in command until May.

Mr. Altshuler and Mr. Rhode had worked in the White House's Office of National Advance Operations. Those are the people who decide where the president will stand on stage and which loyal supporters will be permitted into the audience - and how many firefighters will be diverted from rescue duty to surround the president as he patrols the New Orleans airport trying to look busy. Mr. Morris was a press handler with the Bush presidential campaign. Previously, he worked for the company that produced Bush campaign commercials.

So when Mr. Brown finally got around to asking Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for extra people for Katrina, it wasn't much of a departure for Mr. Brown to say that one of the things he wanted them to do was to "convey a positive image of disaster operations to government officials, community organizations and the general public." We'd like them to stay focused on conveying food, water and medical help to victims.

Political patronage has always been a hallmark of Washington life. But President Bill Clinton appointed political pals at FEMA who actually knew something about disaster management. The former FEMA director James Lee Witt, whose tenure is widely considered a major success, was a friend of Mr. Clinton's when he took office in 1993, but he had run the Arkansas Office of Emergency Services. His top staff came from regional FEMA offices.

Surely there are loyal Republicans among the 50 directors of state emergency services. But President Bush chose to make FEMA a dumping ground for unqualified cronies - a sure sign that he wanted to hasten the degradation of an agency that conservative Republicans have long considered an evil of big government. Katrina has proved that federal disaster help is vital, and that Mr. Brown and his team of advance men can't do the job. What America needs are federal disaster relief people who actually know something about disaster relief.

Leaders Lacking Disaster Experience (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Five of eight top Federal Emergency Management Agency officials came to their posts with virtually no experience in handling disasters and now lead an agency whose ranks of seasoned crisis managers have thinned dramatically since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

FEMA's top three leaders -- Director Michael D. Brown, Chief of Staff Patrick J. Rhode and Deputy Chief of Staff Brooks D. Altshuler -- arrived with ties to President Bush's 2000 campaign or to the White House advance operation, according to the agency. Two other senior operational jobs are filled by a former Republican lieutenant governor of Nebraska anda U.S. Chamber of Commerce official who was once a political operative.

Meanwhile, veterans such as U.S. hurricane specialist Eric Tolbert and World Trade Center disaster managers Laurence W. Zensinger and Bruce P. Baughman -- who led FEMA's offices of response, recovery and preparedness, respectively -- have left since 2003, taking jobs as consultants or state emergency managers, according to current and former officials.

Because of the turnover, three of the five FEMA chiefs for natural-disaster-related operations and nine of 10 regional directors are working in an acting capacity, agency officials said.

Patronage appointments to the crisis-response agency are nothing new to Washington administrations. But inexperience in FEMA's top ranks is emerging as a key concern of local, state and federal leaders as investigators begin to sift through what the government has admitted was a bungled response to Hurricane Katrina.

"FEMA requires strong leadership and experience because state and local governments rely on them," said Trina Sheets, executive director of the National Emergency Management Association. "When you don't have trained, qualified people in those positions, the program suffers as a whole."

DOJ_NMG_0003901

Last week's greatest foe was, of course, a storm of such magnitude that it "overwhelmed" all levels of government, according to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). And several top FEMA officials are well-regarded by state and private counterparts in disaster preparedness and response.

They include Edward G. Buikema, acting director of response since February, and Kenneth O. Burris, acting chief of operations, a career firefighter and former Marietta, Ga., fire chief.

But scorching criticism has been aimed at FEMA, and it starts at the top with Brown, who has admitted to errors in responding to Hurricane Katrina and the flooding in New Orleans. The Oklahoma native, 50, was hired to the agency after a rocky tenure as commissioner of a horse sporting group by former FEMA director Joe M. Allbaugh, the 2000 Bush campaign manager and a college friend of Brown's.

Rhode, Brown's chief of staff, is a former television reporter who came to Washington as advance deputy director for Bush's Austin-based 2000 campaign and then the White House. He joined FEMA in April 2003 after stints at the Commerce Department and the U.S. Small Business Administration.

Altshuler is a former presidential advance man. His predecessor, Scott Morris, was a media strategist for Bush with the Austin firm Maverick Media.

David I. Maurstad, who stepped down as Nebraska lieutenant governor in 2001 to join FEMA, has served asacting director for risk reduction and federal insurance administrator since June 2004. Daniel A. Craig, a onetime political fundraiser and campaign adviser, came to FEMA in 2001 from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, where he directed the eastern regional office, after working as a lobbyist for the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said Brown has managed more than 160 natural disasters as FEMA general counsel and deputy director since 2001, "hands-on experience [that] cannot be understated. Other leadership at FEMA brings particular skill sets -- policy management leadership, for example."

The agency has a deep bench of career professionals, said FEMA spokeswoman Nicol Andrews, including two dozen senior field coordinators and Gil Jamieson, director of the National Incident Management System. "Simply because folks who have left the agency have a disagreement with how it's being run doesn't necessarily indicate that there is a lack of experience leading it," she said.

Andrews said the "acting" designation for regional officials is a designation that signifies that they are FEMA civil servants -- not political appointees.

Touring the wrecked Gulf Coast with Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff yesterday, Vice President Cheney also defended FEMA leaders, saying, "We're always trying to strike the right balance" between political appointees and "career professionals that fill the jobs underneath them."

But experts inside and out of government said a "brain drain" of experienced disaster hands throughout the agency, hastened in part by the appointment of leaders without backgrounds in emergency management, has weakened the agency's ability to respond to natural disasters. Some security experts and congressional critics say the exodus was fueled by a bureaucratic reshuffling in Washington in 2003, when FEMA was stripped of its independent Cabinet-level status and folded into the Department of Homeland Security.

Emergency preparedness has atrophied as a result, some analysts said, extending from Washington to localities.

FEMA "has gone downhill within the department, drained of resources and leadership," said I.M. "Mac" Destler, a professor at the University of Maryland School of Public Policy. "The crippling of FEMA was one important reason why it failed."

Richard A. Andrews, former emergency services director for the state of California and a member of the president's Homeland Security Advisory Council, said state and local failures were critical in the Katrina response, but competence, funding and political will in Washington were also lacking.

"I do not think fundamentally this is an organizational issue," Andrews said. "You need people in there who have both experience and the confidence of the president, who are able to fight and articulate what FEMA's mission and role is, and who understand how emergency management works."

The agency's troubles are no secret. The Partnership for Public Service, a nonprofit group that promotes careers in federal government, ranked FEMA last of 28 agencies studied in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0003902

In its list of best places to work in the government, a 2004 survey by the American Federation of Government Employees found that of 84 career FEMA professionals who responded, only 10 people ranked agency leaders excellent or good.

An additional 28 said the leadership was fair and 33 called it poor.

More than 50 said they would move to another agency if they could remain at the same pay grade, and 67 ranked the agency as poorer since its merger into the Department of Homeland Security.

Critics Maintain Drumbeat Of FEMA Criticism (LAT)

By Ken Silverstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — In the days since Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans, Federal Emergency Management Agency director Michael Brown has come under withering attack, with critics charging that his lack of prior experience in dealing with natural disasters contributed to his agency's poor performance.

But Brown is just one of at least five current and former senior FEMA officials appointed under President Bush whose professional backgrounds showed few qualifications in the area of disaster relief when they arrived at the agency.

As the administration struggles to counter negative national perceptions about its response, Vice President Dick Cheney defended the administration's FEMA appointees in remarks to reporters on Thursday.

"You've got to have people at the top who respond to and are selected by presidents, and you pick the best people you can to do the jobs that need to be done," said Cheney while touring the stricken Gulf Coast. "We've also got some great career professionals, an absolute and vital part of the operation -- couldn't do it without them. They're the ones that continue the expertise from administration to administration, who have got the experience of having been through all of this before and provide the quality service that needs to be provided."

But Democrats in Congress have attacked Brown and other top FEMA appointees.

"FEMA is an important agency and needs to be run by professionals, not political cronies," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the ranking minority member of the Committee on Government Reform. "Instead of a loyalty test, we need people with experience and competence."

More than a year before the hurricane hit New Orleans, the head of a labor union representing FEMA workers sent a letter to members of Congress charging that "emergency managers at FEMA have been supplanted on the job by politically-connected contractors and by novice employees with little background or knowledge" of disaster management."

"As . . . professionalism diminishes, FEMA is gradually losing its ability to function and to help disaster victims," the letter said.

People appointed to run domestic government agencies frequently have political connections. But for many top positions some relevant background is required as well.

Paul Light, a professor of organizational studies at New York University who has testified before Congress on FEMA's role in the Department of Homeland Security, said that for many years, FEMA was a dumping ground for the politically connected.

But during the Clinton years, Light said, FEMA director James Lee Witt "built a serious hierarchy around expertise. Somewhere along the line, FEMA has returned to being a destination of last resort for political appointees."

Brown, a career attorney who was active in Republican Party politics, was hired to be FEMA's general counsel by Joseph Allbaugh, an old friend and the agency's first director under Bush.

Before coming to FEMA, Brown had worked for nearly a decade at the International Arabian Horse Association. His responsibilities included supervising horse-show judges.

Allbaugh -- a long-time aide to Bush who had managed his 2000 campaign -- resigned as FEMA director in 2003 and opened up a consulting firm that helped companies win contracts in Iraq. Brown, who had risen to become Allbaugh's top deputy, took charge.

Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., a strong critic of Brown's even before Katrina, wants him removed from his position.

"When you're dealing with responding to a natural disaster, it's hard to do your job when you have no experience or background," said Lale Mamaux, Wexler's spokeswoman. "You can't just show up and hope everything goes all right."

DOJ_NMG_0003903

Brown is not the only official who came to the agency with scant disaster management background.

Brown's acting deputy director, Patrick James Rhode, began his professional career as an "anchor/reporter with network affiliated television stations in Alabama and Arkansas," according to his resume on FEMA's Website.

Rhode subsequently did public relations work for several state agencies in Texas before becoming deputy director of national advance operations for Bush's 2000 presidential campaign.

Before moving to FEMA in 2003, Rhode served as a special assistant to the president and White House liaison with the Commerce Department. He donated $2,000 to Bush's 2004 campaign.

Daniel Craig, director of FEMA's Recovery Division since October of 2003, "is responsible for planning and executing the federal government's recovery efforts following major disasters," according to the FEMA website.

Before coming to FEMA he worked for the Eastern Regional Office of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, where he "was responsible for Chamber-related legislative, political, and media initiatives in New England and the Atlantic coast."

Craig's previous jobs included working as a lobbyist for the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, and before that "as a campaign adviser, and political fundraiser and research analyst."

Both Allbaugh and Brown were Oklahoma natives involved in that state's Republican politics. FEMA's acting deputy chief of staff, Brooks Altshuler, also hails from Oklahoma. And like Rhode, Altshuler was an advance man for President Bush.

FEMA did not return several calls seeking comment.

In June of 2004, Local 4060 of the American Federation of Government Employees, which represents FEMA workers, wrote to members of congress to warn about alleged cronyism at the agency.

The letter said the practice initially "took place mainly at the senior levels of FEMA, but it has now entered into the mid-level and working-level" of FEMA.

"The ability of FEMA to manage emergencies and disasters is being seriously eroded," the letter said. "The American people count on FEMA to be there to pick up the pieces after a hurricane, a terrorist attack, or any type of emergency. ... (But) our capability is being drained away."

Congress Approves New Storm Aid, And Bush Pledges To Expedite It (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - President Bush said today that he would work with Congress to "cut through the red tape" and get federal aid as fast as possible to people whose lives had been disrupted by wind and flood along the Gulf Coast, and Congress responded this evening by rushing through an additional $51.8 billion in federal assistance.

But even as the president spoke, there were signs that the federal response to the crisis was hampered by confusion.

"The government is going to be with you for the long haul," Mr. Bush said in a brief speech at the White House as he and Vice President Dick Cheney tried to counter charges that their administration had reacted slowly and ineffectively to the crisis. The president said that Sept. 16, next Friday, would be designated a national day of prayer and remembrance.

Earlier, the vice president defended the work of federal agencies, including the much criticized Federal Emergency Management Agency, as he toured the Gulf region.

Mr. Bush said that $2,000 per family in federal aid would be given to each family uprooted by the flood, and that workers from FEMA and the Red Cross were working to get the money into the hands of those who needed it as fast as possible. He said some 400,000 families had already registered with FEMA for federal help, and that 3,000 people were taking calls around the clock at the agency, with the number of operators to be increased "dramatically" very soon.

But not long after he spoke, FEMA announced that it was ending, after a one-day trial, a distribution of debit cards for immediate living expenses. An agency spokesman I in Baton Rouge, La., David G. Passey, said he did not know why FEMA officials had scuttled the program, although there were problems with distribution of the cards in Houston.

Hundreds of people displaced by the storm and flooding lined up outside the Astrodome to wait for cards, but not all could get them. The Red Cross had handed out appointment slips for people to get Red Cross debit cards at certain times. But out of confusion or anxiety, people started lining up before dawn, and some were overcome by heat during the day, The Associated Press reported. The confusion was deepened as word spread through the Astrodome that FEMA was about to distribute debit cards for up to $2,000 each - but FEMA workers told The A.P. that their agency would not be ready to hand out cards for a couple of days.

DOJ_NMG_0003904

President Bush, perhaps with the Houston confusion in mind, said people who fled the storm-affected areas and consequently might have little or no identification would be given "special evacuee status" to make them eligible for the full range of federal benefits - Medicaid, food stamps, school lunch programs and aid to needy families, to name a few - more quickly and without the usual paperwork.

The continuing confusion in the federal response to the crisis could be discerned in a comparison of the president's remarks with those of Mr. Passey, the FEMA spokesman.

Mr. Bush, in speaking to those affected by the storm, said he understood that "some of you do not have access to a savings or checking account, or ways to cash a check."

But, Mr. Passey said, "as we've looked at the logistics of expanding the debit card, we believe that our normal methods of delivery - checks and electronic funds transfer - will suffice."

The president said he and Congress would also see to it that the states that took in people fleeing the gulf region would be reimbursed for the extra burdens on their budgets. "You should not be penalized for showing compassion," Mr. Bush said.

"We have many difficult days ahead," Mr. Bush observed.

In Gulfport, Miss., the vice president was asked whether agencies like FEMA should have political appointees in leadership posts or "somebody with more qualifications." Michael D. Brown, the FEMA director, has come under particular criticism for his lack of background in emergency planning and for seeming unaware of some flood-related events.

"Well, most of government runs on the basis of the combination of civilian leadership that's elected and career professionals that fill the jobs underneath them," Mr. Cheney said. "And we're always trying to strike the right balance. But I think generally that overall principle has served us well as a government over the years."

As Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney were making their case, Congress was moving on the $51.8 billion aid package requested by the White House. The House overwhelmingly approved it earlier , and the Senate followed suit later. As both the speed and the margins of the votes indicated, lawmakers of both parties seemed in agreement that the federal government should spend heavily to help the disaster victims. But they were far apart on related issues.

Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the Senate minority leader, expressed disdain for the Federal Emergency Management Agency and said that Democrats were prepared to bypass the agency entirely.

"Is there anyone - anyone - who believes that we should continue to let the money go to FEMA and be distributed by them?" Mr. Reid asked.

Mr. Reid said again that the hurricane and flood disaster, and a faulty federal response, should be investigated by an independent commission like the one that dissected the Sept. 11 terror attacks, instead of by Congressional committee, as Republicans have proposed. He said Democrats planned to boycott the Congressional committee approached pushed by Republicans.

Senator Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, a Democrat, who appeared alongside Mr. Reid, said, "There will be a lot of time for blaming in the future, and everyone will be held accountable, including us and including the president himself."

Four Years After Sept. 11, Lessons From Another Blow (USAT)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

This weekend, the fourth anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the nation is reeling from another great tragedy, a hurricane that might have claimed more lives than the nearly 3,000 taken that day.

There is much to reflect upon in that dark coincidence.Hurricane Katrina was a blow from nature, not man. But it has amounted to the first test of the new and improved security system constructed after Sept. 11, 2001.

The storm's effects were much like an assault with weapons of mass destruction, something that has long been the worst U.S. terrorism nightmare: thousands of displaced people, many needing medical help along with food, shelter and information.

DOJ_NMG_0003905

The local, state and federal officials in charge failed the test. No reassuring operation snapped into place. Amid the confusion, some still being played out on TV screens, it's fair to ask: Have the past four years, and the vast sums spent on better protection, been squandered?

By one measure, the answer would seem to be no. Since 2001, there hasn't been a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. At least a part of that has to be because of efforts taken to prevent one. Nevertheless, as Hurricane Katrina has shown, the answers to three central questions are troubling:

Are preparations in place if an attack happens? The Department of Homeland Security gives out emergency preparedness grants to local authorities, who must submit detailed plans. At least in the case of Louisiana, those plans failed reality checks. Authorities, for example, had designated the Superdome a shelter. Unlike with a terror attack, they even had notice of the impending disaster. Even so, they still failed to stock the shelter with enough basic necessities.

The attempted evacuation of New Orleans showed that plans drawn up in advance were unworkable. They failed to recognize that the most vulnerable people lacked transportation, or in some cases comprehension of the danger. That lesson should not be lost on state and local officials elsewhere, who could face a similar crisis at any time and should be rethinking their evacuation plans based on New Orleans' experience. Also needed: better oversight of those plans by Homeland Security.

What about the aftermath of an attack? Police, firefighters and emergency medical workers struggled to cope with evacuees from Hurricane Katrina. Bad as that was, it was the barest taste of what the aftermath of a nuclear, biological or chemical attack might be like. Despite four years of preparation, health systems are under-prepared. Warnings persist about insufficient medications, vaccines and distribution systems in the event of a chemical or biological attack — despite a $20 billion government investment in bioterrorism preparedness since 9/11.

Is enough being done to prevent an attack? Nothing can stop a storm like Katrina, but what about terrorism? The list of potential targets is limitless, and absolute protection is impossible. But the devastation wrought by Katrina, despite years of warnings, lends new menace to the steady trickle of reports from many sources about security weaknesses — at nuclear and chemical plants, for instance, or in inspecting cargo entering U.S. ports. The tightened security at airports is by no means representative.

In many ways, the situation is similar to when a house has been burglarized and the owner vows to buy the best alarm system, a guard dog and take other precautions, no expense spared. But as time goes by, with no new break-in, the urgency dissipates and the protections aren't all implemented.

What's most glaringly missing is the post-9/11 sense of urgency. For most people, that kind of laser focus can't realistically be sustained; everyday life simply gets back in the way. For officials charged with protecting the United States and preventing another 9/11, however, it has to be.

Where To Point The Fingers (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

In less enlightened times there was no catastrophe independent of human agency. When the plague or some other natural disaster struck, witches were burned, Jews were massacred and all felt better (except the witches and Jews).

A few centuries later, our progressive thinkers have progressed not an inch. No fall of a sparrow on this planet is not attributed to sin and human perfidy. The three current favorites are: (1) global warming, (2) the war in Iraq and (3) tax cuts. Katrina hits and the unholy trinity is immediately invoked to damn sinner-in-chief George W. Bush.

This kind of stupidity merits no attention whatsoever, but I'll give it a paragraph. There is no relationship between global warming and the frequency and intensity of Atlantic hurricanes. Period. The problem with the evacuation of New Orleans is not that National Guardsmen in Iraq could not get to New Orleans but that National Guardsmen in Louisiana did not get to New Orleans. As for the Bush tax cuts, administration budget requests for New Orleans flood control during the five Bush years exceed those of the five preceding Clinton years. The notion that the allegedly missing revenue would have been spent wisely by Congress, targeted precisely to the levees of New Orleans, and that the reconstruction would have been completed in time, is a threefold fallacy. The argument ends when you realize that, as The Post noted, "the levees that failed were already completed projects."

DOJ_NMG_0003906

Let's be clear. The author of this calamity was, first and foremost, Nature (or if you prefer, Nature's God). The suffering was augmented, aided and abetted in descending order of culpability by the following:

1. The mayor of New Orleans. He knows the city. He knows the danger. He knows that during Hurricane Georges in 1998, the use of the Superdome was a disaster and fully two-thirds of residents never got out of the city. Nothing was done. He declared a mandatory evacuation only 24 hours before Hurricane Katrina hit. He did not even declare a voluntary evacuation until the day before that, at 5 p.m. At that time, he explained that he needed to study his legal authority to call a mandatory evacuation and was hesitating to do so lest the city be sued by hotels and other businesses.

2. The governor. It's her job to call up the National Guard and get it to where it has to go. Where the Guard was in the first few days is a mystery. Indeed, she issued an authorization for the National Guard to commandeer school buses to evacuate people on Wednesday afternoon -- more than two days after the hurricane hit and after much of the fleet had already drowned in its parking lots.

3. The head of FEMA. Late, slow and in way over his head. On Thursday, Sept. 2, he said on national television that he didn't even know there were people in the convention center, when anybody watching television could see them there, destitute and desperate. Maybe in his vast bureaucracy he can assign three 20-year-olds to watch cable news and give him updates every hour on what in hell is going on.

4. The president. Late, slow, and simply out of tune with the urgency and magnitude of the disaster. The second he heard that the levees had been breached in New Orleans, he should have canceled his schedule and addressed the country on national television to mobilize it both emotionally and physically to assist in the disaster. His flyover on the way to Washington was the worst possible symbolism. And his Friday visit was so tone-deaf and politically disastrous that he had to fly back three days later.

5. Congress. Now as always playing holier-than-thou. Perhaps it might ask itself who created the Department of Homeland Security in the first place. The congressional response to all crises is the same -- rearrange the bureaucratic boxes, but be sure to add one extra layer. The past four years of DHS have been spent principally on bureaucratic reorganization (and real estate) instead of, say, a workable plan for as predictable a disaster as a Gulf Coast hurricane.

6. The American people. They have made it impossible for any politician to make any responsible energy policy over the past 30 years -- but that is a column for another day. Now is not the time for constructive suggestions. Now is the time for blame, recrimination and sheer astonishment. Mayor Ray Nagin has announced that, as bodies are still being found and as a public health catastrophe descends upon the city, he is sending 60 percent of his cops on city funds for a little R&R, mostly to Vegas hotels. Asked if it was appropriate to party in these circumstances, he responded: "New Orleans is a party town. Get over it."

Confusion On Debit Card Aid (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 8 - After a day of confusion and complaints, officials of the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Thursday that the agency would not expand a trial program to distribute debit cards worth $2,000 to victims of Hurricane Katrina for immediate living expenses.

A FEMA official in Washington said the cards would be distributed at the Astrodome in Houston beginning on Friday.

Reports that the debit cards would be distributed on Thursday morning at the Astrodome, a temporary shelter, brought several hours of mayhem to the complex, attracting a crush of cars and pedestrians that caused the police to shut the gates, locking out thousands of residents in the 90-degree heat.

Meanwhile, in Baton Rouge,David G. Passey, a FEMA spokesman, said he did not know why the program had been discontinued.

But Mr. Passey said, "As we've looked at the logistics of expanding the debit card, we believe that our normal methods of delivery, checks and electronic funds transfer, will suffice."

DOJ_NMG_0003907

Under questioning by reporters, he said he could not explain why traditional conduits of aid, which take from 10 days to two weeks to reach victims, provided they have addresses or working bank accounts, had been deemed more appropriate than the immediate relief offered by the debit cards.

He said "program specialists" had made the decision.

Announcing the debit card program on Wednesday, Michael D. Brown, the FEMA director, said it was designed to "empower" evacuees "to make their own decisions about what they need to have to restart their lives." But he did not say when and where the cards would be distributed.

In Baton Rouge, The Associated Press reported, people went to a Red Cross office believing they could get the debit cards there.

Callers to a Baton Rouge radio station from as far away as Atlanta and Houston complained that they did not know how to get the cards. One person said she had called the FEMA office in New York, only to be told that the cards were in Atlanta.

But Mr. Passey said the cards had been intended for distribution only at the Astrodome, where the highest concentration of evacuees was housed.

After the police lockdown at the complex, the order that had characterized the temporary housing situation there so far threatened to collapse, as people fainted, pushed and shoved, and complained loudly.

"It's just a hassle to get assistance," said Sparkle Stanwood, 25, an evacuee from downtown New Orleans, as she stood outside an Astrodome gate, sweat glistening on her face. "They gave us an appointment for 10 a.m. today - now they won't let us in. Some people broke a gate open. It's a lot of people, and it's hot."

Another evacuee, Eric Robertson, said: "We're very angry. We don't really know what's going on. It's so unorganized out here. There's nobody to even answer a question about why the place is on lockdown."

The Red Cross in Houston began handing out debit cards Thursday loaded with $650 to $1,600 in purchasing power.

The relief organization issued 7,000 cards at the Reliant complex around the Astrodome and will issue more Friday at the George R. Brown Convention Center. Tennessee has distributed 1,550 "electronic benefit cards."

George R. Brown Evacuees To Get Red Cross Cards Tonight (HC)

By Salatheia Bryant And Becky Bowman

Houston Chronicle, September 9, 2005

The debit cards have arrived, and with them, perhaps, the longest lines yet.

Evacuees at Reliant Center stood in line as long as five hours today to receive debit cards from the Red Cross.

On the schedule for tomorrow: debit cards from the federal government -- and more long lines as well.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said today that distribution of the $2,000 cards will begin Friday morning at Reliant Park, but only for those currently living there and only then if they've already registered with FEMA.

Most evacuees at Houston's largest shelters have already done the paperwork, and some have even received checks or aid directly deposited to their bank accounts, making them ineligible for the debit cards. Many who thought they were standing in line on Wednesday for the FEMA cards turned out to be in line to simply apply for the federal aid. By this afternoon, the federal agency was still signing up about 45 families an hour.

After seeing mile-long lines form today for Red Cross cards, authorities were urging those who aren't yet registered with FEMA to do so by calling 1-800-621-FEMA or going to the agency's Web site at http://www.fema.gov. On Saturday, FEMA will begin passing out cards at Reliant Center to evacuees who don't live in the Reliant complex.

Organizers and evacuees alike are hoping that Friday's inevitable lines won't match today's, which included elderly hurricane victims in wheelchairs and children who haven't yet been registered for school. Hurricane victims held newspapers and scraps of cardboard over the heads to shield themselves from the sun as volunteers passed out water and doctors arrived to watch for overheating or dehydration.

Police were called in for crowd control, and Reliant Park shut its gates for a few hours to those who aren't living there to limit the crowds and encourage evacuees from elsewhere to wait their turn.

"We have a very dynamic situation outside," Coast Guard Lt. Joseph Leonard, who is heading up the shelter operation, said this afternoon.

Many of those lined up for the Red Cross cards outside Reliant Center today had appointments and an electronic sign warned evacuees that "no walkups" would be accepted, but the line for getting appointments was as long as the line to pick up the cards.

One woman balancing a toddler on her hip said she'd advanced only 15 to 20 feet in 45 minutes.

"It's just so many people. A lot of people don't have appointments . . . I think this is ridiculous," said 22-year-old Chazz Tripp, who was hoping for funds to buy clothes or perhaps furniture for wherever she ends up. "It's maddening."

Relester Cain, 39, of New Orleans waited for five hours but emerged with a debit card. The wait was hard, she said, but "it was worth it."

The coveted Red Cross debit cards can be activated in eight to 24 hours, a powerful draw for the 7,188 still living at the Reliant Park shelters today. Only those stranded at Reliant Center, Reliant Arena or the Astrodome were eligible this morning and this afternoon for the cards, which carry balances of a $360 to $1,600, depending on a family's size and the age of its children.

Drawn on Chase Bank, the debit cards carry the words "Red Cross client" and "This cannot be used for alcohol, tobacco or weapons."

Standing in line for the card that could pay for gasoline and take him to his next construction job, evacuee Michael Gorman has no complaints.

"Who wouldn't want to stand in line for somebody to help you?" he said. "It's a blessing.

Shalon Matthews, 30, a New Orleans hotel worker, said the long lines are just part of her post-Katrina life.

"We are kind of used to all of the processing going on," she said. "It's second nature now. We know they can only do so much. We have no where else to go."

Yolonda Allen, 39, was ebullient to be among the lucky ones clutching a debit card before lunch. A sickle-cell patient and the mother of a teen-age boy, her first purchase is to be fresh, healthy vegetables.

"This will help me," she said. "It will help lift my spirits up. "

That was the aim of the Red Cross volunteers passing out the cards, but the length of lines were frustrating for harried volunteers as well as evacuees.

Red Cross spokeswoman Jana Zehner said organizers had hoped that assigning appointment times would help, but many people are lining up way too early or getting into the wrong line. Some people are also bringing their entire families along, even though one person can pick up a card for an entire family.

"We can't help them to stand in line," Zehner said.

Another Red Cross spokesman, Gregory L. Smith, promised everyone who needs a card will get a card, but that's going to take time.

"We knew there were going to be a lot of people," Leonard said. "We are refining our process now. This is the largest shelter operation in U.S. history. None of us have a playbook."

The lines would have been much longer if the giveway had happened earlier in the week. More and more evacuees are heading off to more permanent accommodations, and emergency officials have started consolidating the shelters at Reliant Park. They hope to have all the park's shelters closed by a week from Sunday.

Authorites began moving residents of Reliant Arena to Reliant Center on Wednesday afternoon, leaving behind only 200 patients receiving medical services. Reliant Park's medical clinic, which includes an isolation ward for those sick with the Norwalk virus, will continue to operate out of the arena.

With the transfer of evacuees complete today, the Reliant Astrodome had about 2,500 people; Reliant Center, 4,488 people; and downtown's George R. Brown Convention Center, about 1,400 people. Including the 200 patients still at the Reliant Arena, this morning's total census of 8,588 compares to a headcount of 8,066 on Wednesday and a rougher estimate of 25,400 as recently as Tuesday.

More than 17,000 evacuees have registered at the convention center. By Saturday, Red Cross officials said, a toll free phone number will be in place for those who registered at the center but who are staying elsewhere.

Frank Gutierrez, Harris County's coordinator for homeland security and emergency management, said the consolidation of shelters has been going well, with "no big glitches."

Cheney, Gonzales Tour Stricken Gulf Coast (AP)

By Tom Raum, Associated Press Writer

The AP, September 8, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday toured parts of the ravaged Gulf Coast, claiming significant progress but acknowledging immense obstacles to a full recovery.

"We can do it," he said, first in Gulfport, Miss., and then in New Orleans, where he stood on a bridge on a levee on the edge of a flooded section of the city.

The vice president said it was too early to estimate the total cost of reconstruction from Hurricane Katrina. He dismissed the idea of raising taxes to pay for storm recovery and the war in Iraq.

Standing by Louisiana's governor, Democrat Kathleen Blanco, Cheney spoke of how the flooding of New Orleans and the destruction of many communities in the region was "a major tragedy in modern times."

"The positive news is we appear to be making progress," said Cheney, who brought 800 pounds of bottled water aboard Air Force Two as a gesture of aid.

His visit was an attempt by President Bush to show an active role in the recovery effort after a slow and tentative start.

Cheney told reporters he planned to return to the area on Saturday. Bush, who has visited twice since the storm hit, is expected to visit again soon.

Seeking to counter attacks by Democrats, the vice president defended the political appointees who are overseeing the federal relief effort. Cheney also spoke of the need to address "mental health issues" among people in the stricken area; he offered no specifics.

Cheney's helicopter stayed low and close to the ravaged coastline on the flight from Gulfport to New Orleans. Later, Cheney stopped in Baton Rouge to meet with state officials in the capital.

At a briefing on the amphibious assault ship USS Iwo Jima, docked in New Orleans, Coast Guard Adm. Thad Allen showed Cheney maps and large aerial photographs.

"You can see right now that the water is staring to recede," Allen told Cheney. Allen said the next step is a door-to-door search of homes as the city moves ahead with its evacuation.

Cheney rode in a Hummer through parts of downtown. Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, the military coordinator, was at the wheel. The vice president stopped at Harrah's hotel and casino, where he shook hands with police and rescue workers.

Standing on a bridge over the 17th Street Canal levee that burst in the hurricane, Cheney could see two huge pipes pumping water out of the city and back into the canal. Flames burst into the air from a ruptured gas line nearby.

Earlier, once-stately waterfront homes, now splintered, some with off their foundations and even in neighboring yards, confronted Cheney.

"I think the progress we're making is significant," Cheney said. "I think the performance, in general, at least in terms of the information I've received from locals, is definitely very impressive."

"That's not to say there's not an awful lot of work to be done — there is," he added.

Cheney spoke to reporters along Gulfport's Second Street. Once it was two blocks from the Gulf of Mexico; now, it essentially is only one away.

Cheney walked about two blocks from the Gulf along a street littered with broken wood, downed trees and furniture. Some houses were severely damaged, some hardly at all.

One passer-by shouted the same vulgar phrase to Cheney that the vice president himself had used on the Senate floor in a celebrated and heated exchanged in June 2004 with Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

"First time I've heard it," Cheney joked with reporters when asked if he was hearing such sentiments a lot.

Cheney visited Rebecca Dubuisson, who said she spent about 18 months adding an extension on her house, only to have the hurricane wipe it away.

DOJ_NMG_0003910

The house that once stood between her place and the ocean was gone, too. "We've got a beach view now," she said, voicing a determination to repair her house.

Dubuisson said she did not want to criticize the relief effort. "I don't know that you could have prepared for it," she said.

Most of the people Cheney met with on his Mississippi stop were friendly.

Lynne Lofton was not. Her house further down the street was destroyed.

"I think this media opportunity today is a terrible waste of time and taxpayer money," she said. "They've picked a nice neighborhood where people have insurance and most are Republicans."

Joining Cheney on the trip were Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Cheney was asked about criticism that leading the relief efforts were political appointees with experience in disaster recovery — Chertoff and Mike Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The vice president said he believes Bush "struck the right balance" between political appointees and career professionals to oversee the relief efforts.

Cheney Tours Katrina Devastation, Backs Chertoff (REU)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, September 8, 2005

U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday toured the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina and expressed confidence in Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's handling of the crisis despite widespread criticism of the initial government response.

Cheney rode through the streets of downtown New Orleans in a humvee, the highest-ranking Bush administration official to visit the shattered city center, during a day-long tour of Mississippi and Louisiana to check on relief efforts.

He was the latest in a series of Bush administration officials to visit the region amid complaints from victims that bureaucracy is slowing the recovery, and he acknowledged problems in the early days of the disaster.

"I've got enormous confidence in the secretary (Chertoff) as does the president," said Cheney at a stop in Gulfport, Mississippi, where he was accompanied by Chertoff.

Chertoff and Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, have been criticized for their handling of the worst U.S. humanitarian crisis, with some Democrats and Republicans saying one or both should be fired.

Asked about problems with bureaucratic barriers, Cheney suggested progress was being made in cutting through them.

"I think the progress we're making is significant. I think the performance in general at least in terms of the information I've received from locals is definitely very impressive," Cheney told reporters in a rare question-and-answer session.

SHOUTED INSULTS

While he was speaking, a young man shouted an obscenity at the vice-president, saying "Go fuck yourself, Mr Cheney" in an outburst that reflected frayed tempers and patience in the stricken region.

Cheney later toured an unflooded part of New Orleans near the convention center, seeing first-hand the debris of chairs, empty water bottles and trash. Thousands of storm survivors pleading for food, water and care stayed several days at the center last week before they were evacuated from the ruined and chaotic city.

Army Lt. Gen. Russell Honore, commander of the military relief effort in the hurricane-hit region, drove Cheney on a tour of several blocks around the convention center.

In the back seat was Cheney's wife, Lynne, and Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Blanco, who has had some frictions with the Bush administration over the federal response. The group stopped at a casino where hundreds of rescue workers were being served barbecued food and Cheney shook hands with many of them.

"Obviously, New Orleans has been through a great trauma," Cheney said, but added there was "significant progress" being made. "We've still got an enormous amount to do," he said.

Cheney acknowledged problems in the recovery's first few days, especially the chaos surrounding the evacuations.

"There's no question there were problems," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003911

Cheney rejected the notion that tax increases were needed to pay for the longterm effort to rebuild the region, saying that would only choke off growth.

He said he would return to the region on Saturday.

In Gulfport, resident Lynn Lofton approached a group of reporters waiting for the vice president and said the visit was too late.

"I think the media opportunity right here is a complete waste of time and taxpayer money," she said. "They should have been here last week."

Relieft Effort 'very Impressive,' Cheney Says (AP)

The AP, September 8, 2005

GULFPORT, Miss. — Walking a hurricane-riddled street, Vice President Dick Cheney declared today that much progress is being made in a disaster relief effort he termed "very impressive."

Cheney's plane took him on a course over heavily damaged houses as he arrived to this Gulf Coast town destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. After meeting with state and local officials, Cheney and his wife, Lynne, toured a particularly damaged part of the town.

The vice president told reporters he was struck by the "very positive, can-do" attitude of Mississippians toward the help they are getting. In general, Mississippi officials have been much more complimentary of the federal hurricane response than those from Louisiana and, particularly, New Orleans.

President Bush dispatched Cheney to the region, amid persistent criticism of the sluggish pace of the federal piece of the response, to examine any bureaucratic red tape getting in the way of helping people and to focus on the long-term issues at hand.

"I think the progress we're making is significant," Cheney said. "I think the performance, in general, at least in terms of the information I've received from locals, is definitely very impressive."

He added: "That's not to say there's not an awful lot of work to be done — there is."

While Cheney spoke, a passer-by hurled an expletive at the vice president. "First time I've heard it," Cheney said, when asked if he was hearing a lot of such sentiments.

Cheney walked about two blocks from the Gulf of Mexico along a street littered with broken wood, downed trees and furniture. Some houses were severely damaged, some hardly at all.

He talked to a man whose house was knocked off its foundation and had extensive roof damage and two or three arm chairs sitting in the front yard. He visited Rebecca Dubuisson, who said she spent a year and a half adding an extension on her house only to see it wiped away by the hurricane. "We've got a beach view now," she said.

Dubuisson said she didn't want to criticize the relief effort. "I don't know that you could have prepared for it," she said.

Cheney said immediate needs for the victims include providing housing, supplies and clean up. He also said mental health issues need to be addressed, but he didn't know how that would be approached.

Cheney said another issue is determining whether insurers should pay for damages if their policy did not include coverage for floods. Most insurance policies do not include flood coverage.

Most the people Cheney met with were friendly. Lynne Lofton, whose house further down the street was completely destroyed, was an exception.

"I think this media opportunity today is a terrible waste of time and taxpayer money," she said. "They've picked a nice neighborhood where people have insurance and most are Republicans."

Cheney was also accompanied by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

First Lady Gives Award, Talks About Katrina's Impact (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, September 9, 2005

First Lady Laura Bush visited Des Moines today, tying her usual focus on education to her role in encouraging a nation weary from Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0003912

"As other children around the children around the country are going to school, all of us are thinking about the children in Louisiana and Mississippi and Alabama who aren't in their regular schools because their schools have been hurt," the first lady said during her stop at Lovejoy Elementary School on the city's southeast side.

Mrs. Bush announced a web site where school districts around the country could post lists of available supplies. Those supplies would be for schools receiving an influx of students displaced by the storm.

The web site is www.ed.gov and the link is "Hurricane Help for Schools."

The first lady also awarded Lovejoy math teacher Judy Kinley Iowa's American Star of Teaching, an award given to one educator in every state and the District of Columbia.

Kinley was cited for her work establishing the Des Moines Public School District's math curriculum, especially for students not proficient in English.

Mrs. Bush had traveled from Washington, D.C., Thursday morning.

The first lady, traveling with U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, toured the school before presenting Kinley with the award in a surprise ceremony.

The school stop was Mrs. Bush's only Iowa event. She left the state, headed for hurricane-ravaged Mississippi, shortly before noon.

First Lady Comforts Storm Refugees In DeSoto County (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, September 9, 2005

SOUTHAVEN, Miss. - First Lady Laura Bush visited with hurricane victims in Southaven Thursday and cradled what could be the storm's youngest refugee - a three-day old infant born to a New Orleans couple seeking shelter in Mississippi.

"Our hearts have been so warmed by the response," said Bush, a former elementary school librarian, as she spoke at Greenbrook Elementary School. The school has among the highest concentration of students in the district displaced by Hurricane Katrina last week.

Bush, who had visited a school in Iowa earlier in the day, praised DeSoto County residents and Superintendent Milton Kuykendall for enrolling storm refugees in the DeSoto County School District. DeSoto County was among the first school districts in the state to welcome students whose schools in Louisiana and south Mississippi were obliterated by Katrina.

Bush, who was making her second stop in Mississippi in less than four days, said she has been encouraged by the love and support that other children have shown toward the newcomers.

Bush and her husband, President George W. Bush, made a stop in Poplarville earlier in the week.

"Children will be very welcoming," the First Lady said. "It's an opportunity for them to meet children from another part of the country and figure out what ways they can help."

Bush was joined by Margaret Spellings, U.S. Department of Education Secretary and Gayle Wicker, the wife of U.S. Rep. Roger Wicker, and other local dignitaries.

The spotlight, however, was on Bush, who comforted families and openly embraced many in the crowd.

"We're trying to get you back in your homes," Bush told nine students and about a dozen parents assembled in the school's library, many of them from New Orleans and southeast Louisiana.

For nearly ten minutes, she cradled 3-day old Irelle Carolynn Johnson in a private meeting with her parents, Irene and Quintell Johnson, at Goodman Oaks Church of Christ.

Betty Shackleford, a volunteer with relief efforts at the church, said the infant was born at Baptist Memorial Hospital-DeSoto on Tuesday when another volunteer had taken the child's mother out to shop for clothes and food, Irene Johnson soon went into labor and delivered Irelle. Shackelford said the family has since been relocated to an apartment from the shelter where more than 164 evacuees have been helped so far.

"This whole community has come together," Shackelford said. "We've never done anything like this before."

First Lady Visits Southaven, Cheers Evacuees (CA)

By Jimmie Covington

Commercial Appeal (TN), September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003913

Hurricane evacuees at a Southaven church shelter said a visit by first lady Laura Bush on Thursday raised their spirits as they try to deal with their losses.

"It is an extraordinary thing to have her here," said Hope Thonn, 44, of Chalmette, La., who has been at the Goodman Oaks Church of Christ shelter since early last week with her husband, Davey, and six children.

"It just brought our spirits up and my family was very honored to be able to just take a picture with her."

Thonn said Bush's visit was a "little bit of good" in "all of the badness" that has occurred as a result of the storm. The Thonns' home and two commercial fishing boats were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

Shermaine Johnson, 33, of New Orleans, who is at the shelter with several family members, said, "For people at this shelter to just be thought about is just a great opportunity."

Bush drew applause from more than 100 evacuees and church volunteers when she entered the foyer of the church's education building shortly after 2 p.m.

Earlier, about 12:45 p.m., Bush also was greeted warmly at Greenbrook Elementary School in Southaven, where she visited a second-grade music class and met with nine evacuee children at the school and 12 of their parents.

Bush and U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings visited a school in Des Moines before coming to Southaven. The Des Moines visit originally had been planned as a state-of-the-school year event, but as a result of the hurricane and its aftermath, Bush broadened the visit to include Southaven.

She said she wanted to come to DeSoto County because its school district has children in it from the Mississippi Gulf Coast and New Orleans, who are now unable to attend their own schools.

DeSoto is a county where President Bush received strong support in both of his presidential races. The President visited the county in 2003 as part of his last campaign.

Spellings said that in addition to the storm-related situation, the visit here was made because "this (Greenbrook) is a great school, great school district and (you have) a great superintendent (Milton Kuykendall). ... All of the schools made their adequate yearly progress."

Adequate yearly progress is a major standard under the federal No Child Left Behind Act.

At Greenbrook, Bush, who was dressed casually in dark slacks and a blue shirt, hugged the evacuee children and parents, and praised the parents for enrolling their children in school.

She called for all parents from areas affected by Hurricane Katrina to place their youngsters in school, even though they may have to transfer the children to other schools after a short period of time as they find new places to stay.

"It is important for their children to have the structure and routine of going to school, especially since many children have seen and suffered a lot of really terrible things," Bush told reporters who had gathered at the school.

Spellings said her department is preparing a plan to submit to Congress to provide financial assistance to school districts that are serving displaced students and to districts where schools were destroyed or heavily damaged by the storm.

Meantime, some federal requirements for schools are being waived to assist districts, including the granting of flexibility in some provisions of No Child Left Behind, Spellings said.

Answering a reporter's question at the school, the first lady said she believes the federal government response to the disaster has overall been "very good."

"I think we now know that New Orleans is pretty much totally evacuated," Bush said. She said a "huge number of people" have been rescued, including many who were rescued one at a time by helicopter.

Also, shelters that have been set up all across the country are going well, she said.

"This was a huge storm, an unbelievably devastating storm, the largest probably that our country has ever seen," Bush said. "When you consider that and when you consider the number of communities, particularly in this state, that were literally washed out, I think overall you have to say it was a very good response."

Widespread criticism has been directed at the Bush administration, charging that the administration responded too slowly to the disaster.

Bush and Spellings returned to Washington after their visit to the Goodman Oaks Church shelter.

DOJ_NMG_0003914

Among politicians and other leaders who were present during Bush's visit were Southaven Mayor Greg Davis, county Supervisor Tommy Lewis. school board president Ann Jolley and Gayle Wicker, wife of U.S. Rep Roger Wicker (R-Miss.).

Davis said Bush's visit shows that the hearts of people "from the top office of the United States on down" are going out to victims of the hurricane.

Schools Supt. Kuykendall said Thursday was a "great day" for the county and the school district. He said Bush's visit shows her passion for serving children.

Wife Says Criticism Of Bush 'Disgusting' (MACT)

The Macon Telegraph, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - Laura Bush described as "disgusting" comments by rapper Kanye West and Democratic chairman Howard Dean blaming her husband for the disproportionate number of black hurricane victims.

"I think all of those remarks are disgusting, to be perfectly frank, because of course President Bush cares about everyone in our country," the first lady said Thursday in an interview with American Urban Radio Networks.

"And I know that. I mean, I'm the person who lives with him," she said. "I know what he's like and I know what he thinks and I know how he cares about people."

The president has faced sharp criticism over federal relief efforts for Hurricane Katrina victims, who are disproportionally black and poor.

On a nationally televised telethon Friday, broadcast live on NBC, West departed from the script to declare "George Bush doesn't care about black people."

Earlier this week, Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, told the National Baptist Convention of America, a black religious group, that race played a role in the hurricane casualty numbers.

Mrs. Bush said it was clear that poor people were more vulnerable when the hurricane hit.

"They lived in poorer neighborhoods. Their neighborhoods were the ones that were more likely to flood, as we saw in New Orleans. Their housing was more vulnerable," she said.

"And that's what we saw, and that's what we want to address in our country."

Political Issues Snarled Plans For Troop Aid (NYT)

By Eric Lipton, Eric Schmitt And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

This article was reported and written by Eric Lipton, Eric Schmitt and Thom Shanker

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - As New Orleans descended into chaos last week and Louisiana's governor asked for 40,000 soldiers, President Bush's senior advisers debated whether the president should speed the arrival of active-duty troops by seizing control of the hurricane relief mission from the governor.

For reasons of practicality and politics, officials at the Justice Department and the Pentagon, and then at the White House, decided not to urge Mr. Bush to take command of the effort. Instead, the Washington officials decided to rely on the growing number of National Guard personnel flowing into Louisiana, who were under Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's control.

The debate began after officials realized that Hurricane Katrina had exposed a critical flaw in the national disaster response plans created after the Sept. 11 attacks. According to the administration's senior domestic security officials, the plan failed to recognize that local police, fire and medical personnel might be incapacitated.

As criticism of the response to Hurricane Katrina has mounted, one of the most pointed questions has been why more troops were not available more quickly to restore order and offer aid. Interviews with officials in Washington and Louisiana show that as the situation grew worse, they were wrangling with questions of federal/state authority, weighing the realities of military logistics and perhaps talking past each other in the crisis.

To seize control of the mission, Mr. Bush would have had to invoke the Insurrection Act, which allows the president in times of unrest to command active-duty forces into the states to perform law enforcement duties. But decision makers in Washington felt certain that Ms. Blanco would have resisted surrendering control, as Bush administration officials believe would have been required to deploy active-duty combat forces before law and order had been re-established.

DOJ_NMG_0003915

While combat troops can conduct relief missions without the legal authority of the Insurrection Act, Pentagon and military officials say that no active-duty forces could have been sent into the chaos of New Orleans on Wednesday or Thursday without confronting law-and-order challenges.

But just as important to the administration were worries about the message that would have been sent by a president ousting a Southern governor of another party from command of her National Guard, according to administration, Pentagon and Justice Department officials.

"Can you imagine how it would have been perceived if a president of the United States of one party had pre-emptively taken from the female governor of another party the command and control of her forces, unless the security situation made it completely clear that she was unable to effectively execute her command authority and that lawlessness was the inevitable result?" asked one senior administration official, who spoke anonymously because the talks were confidential.

Officials in Louisiana agree that the governor would not have given up control over National Guard troops in her state as would have been required to send large numbers of active-duty soldiers into the area. But they also say they were desperate and would have welcomed assistance by active-duty soldiers.

"I need everything you have got," Ms. Blanco said she told Mr. Bush last Monday, after the storm hit.

In an interview, she acknowledged that she did not specify what sorts of soldiers. "Nobody told me that I had to request that," Ms. Blanco said. "I thought that I had requested everything they had. We were living in a war zone by then."

By Wednesday, she had asked for 40,000 soldiers.

In the discussions in Washington, also at issue was whether active-duty troops could respond faster and in larger numbers than the Guard.

By last Wednesday, Pentagon officials said even the 82nd Airborne, which has a brigade on standby to move out within 18 hours, could not arrive any faster than 7,000 National Guard troops, which are specially trained and equipped for civilian law enforcement duties.

In the end, the flow of thousands of National Guard soldiers, especially military police, was accelerated from other states.

"I was there. I saw what needed to be done," Lt. Gen. H Steven Blum, chief of the National Guard Bureau, said in an interview. "They were the fastest, best-capable, most appropriate force to get there in the time allowed. And that's what it's all about."

But one senior Army officer expressed puzzlement that active-duty troops were not summoned sooner, saying 82nd Airborne troops were ready to move out from Fort Bragg, N.C., on Sunday, the day before the hurricane hit.

The call never came, administration officials said, in part because military officials believed Guard troops would get to the stricken region faster and because administration civilians worried that there could be political fallout if federal troops were forced to shoot looters.

Louisiana officials were furious that there was not more of a show of force, in terms of relief supplies and troops, from the federal government in the middle of last week. As the water was rising in New Orleans, the governor repeatedly questioned whether Washington had started its promised surge of federal resources.

"We needed equipment," Ms. Blanco said in an interview. "Helicopters. We got isolated."

Aides to Ms. Blanco said she was prepared to accept the deployment of active-duty military officials in her state. But she and other state officials balked at giving up control of the Guard as Justice Department officials said would have been required by the Insurrection Act if those combat troops were to be sent in before order was restored.

In a separate discussion last weekend, the governor also rejected a more modest proposal for a hybrid command structure in which both the Guard and active-duty troops would be under the command of an active-duty, three-star general - but only after he had been sworn into the Louisiana National Guard.

Lt. Gen. James T. Conway, director of operations for the military's Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that the Pentagon in August streamlined a rigid, decades-old system of deployment orders to allow the military's Northern Command to dispatch liaisons to work with local officials before an approaching hurricane.

The Pentagon is reviewing events from the time Hurricane Katrina reached full strength and bore down on New Orleans and five days later when Mr. Bush ordered 7,200 active-duty soldiers and marines to the scene.

DOJ_NMG_0003916

After the hurricane passed New Orleans and the levees broke, flooding the city, it became increasingly evident that disaster-response efforts were badly bogged down.

Justice Department lawyers, who were receiving harrowing reports from the area, considered whether active-duty military units could be brought into relief operations even if state authorities gave their consent - or even if they refused.

The issue of federalizing the response was one of several legal issues considered in a flurry of meetings at the Justice Department, the White House and other agencies, administration officials said.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales urged Justice Department lawyers to interpret the federal law creatively to help local authorities, those officials said. For example, federal prosecutors prepared to expand their enforcement of some criminal statutes like anti-carjacking laws that can be prosecuted by either state or federal authorities.

On the issue of whether the military could be deployed without the invitation of state officials, the Office of Legal Counsel, the unit within the Justice Department that provides legal advice to federal agencies, concluded that the federal government had authority to move in even over the objection of local officials.

This act was last invoked in 1992 for the Los Angeles riots, but at the request of Gov. Pete Wilson of California, and has not been invoked over a governor's objections since the civil rights era - and before that, to the time of the Civil War, administration officials said. Bush administration, Pentagon and senior military officials warned that such an extreme measure would have serious legal and political implications.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has said deployment of National Guard soldiers to Iraq, including a brigade from Louisiana, did not affect the relief mission, but Ms. Blanco disagreed.

"Over the last year, we have had about 5,000 out, at one time," she said. "They are on active duty, serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. That certainly is a factor."

By Friday, National Guard reinforcements had arrived, and a truck convoy of 1,000 Guard soldiers brought relief supplies - and order - to the convention center area.

Officials from the Department of Homeland Security say the experience with Hurricane Katrina has demonstrated flaws in the nation's plans to handle disaster.

"This event has exposed, perhaps ultimately to our benefit, a deficiency in terms of replacing first responders who tragically may be the first casualties," Paul McHale, the assistant secretary of defense for domestic security, said.

Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, has suggested that active-duty troops be trained and equipped to intervene if front-line emergency personnel are stricken. But the Pentagon's leadership remains unconvinced that this plan is sound, suggesting instead that the national emergency response plans be revised to draw reinforcements initially from civilian police, firefighters, medical personnel and hazardous-waste experts in other states not affected by a disaster.

The federal government rewrote its national emergency response plan after the Sept. 11 attacks, but it relied on local officials to manage any crisis in its opening days. But Hurricane Katrina overwhelmed local "first responders," including civilian police and the National Guard.

At a news conference on Saturday, Mr. Chertoff said, "The unusual set of challenges of conducting a massive evacuation in the context of a still dangerous flood requires us to basically break the traditional model and create a new model, one for what you might call kind of an ultra-catastrophe.""

State Rebuffed Security Overture (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Parts of New Orleans became so dangerous last week that the Bush administration briefly sought to take control of local law enforcement to quell the violence and get help to victims.

The administration sent Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco a proposed memorandum of understanding last Friday, raising the possibility that the federal government would take command of the Louisiana National Guard to strengthen law-enforcement efforts in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, according to officials in the Bush administration and the governor's office. In a series of telephone conversations with the White House on Saturday morning, the governor's office refused.

DOJ_NMG_0003917

The memorandum amounted to a White House request for a federal takeover of local law enforcement, said Denise Bottcher, the governor's spokeswoman.

Gov. Blanco, in a letter to the White House on Saturday morning, said she would retain control of her state's National Guard troops, and requested the creation a federal joint task force that combined regular military and National Guard units. "Our response was 'no' to federalization, and let's have this instead," said Ms. Bottcher.

As the White House and state officials were discussing alternatives Friday -- the day President Bush first visited the storm-devastated Gulf Coast -- the violence in New Orleans began to subside amid a show of force by National Guard soldiers. That helped speed the evacuations of the Louisiana Superdome and the city's convention center, two sites where violence had erupted in the crowds of evacuees.

The Bush administration ultimately dropped the idea of a federal takeover of law enforcement.

By invoking the Insurrection Act, a president can use the military -- including federalized National Guard troops -- to quell civil disturbances. Under normal circumstances, regular military forces aren't allowed to engage in such law-enforcement activities. As the situation deteriorated in New Orleans last week, the White House weighed whether to use the military for law enforcement, an administration official said.

On Sept. 1, Gov. Blanco said that she needed 40,000 more troops, regardless of whether they were regular Army or National Guard troops. "I've actually asked for uniformed troops of any sort," she said. She added that she preferred to have more National Guard troops, according Ms. Bottcher.

In a letter to the president last Friday, she repeated the request. "Mr. President, only your personal involvement will ensure the immediate delivery of federal assets needed to save lives that are in jeopardy hour by hour," she wrote.

In a tense meeting with Mr. Bush at the New Orleans airport the same day, Gov. Blanco resisted the idea of federalizing the National Guard. When the president emerged from the meeting, Mr. Bush told New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin that the governor "needed 24 hours to decide," Mr. Nagin said at a later news conference. Ms. Bottcher agreed that Mr. Bush and Ms. Blanco discussed the federalization of the National Guard.

Later on Friday, the White House formalized the offer in a memo to the governor's office, suggesting the possibility of a military takeover of the security effort.

The tense and ultimately fruitless negotiations last week apparently contributed to chilly relations between the White House and the governor's office. When Mr. Bush returned to Louisiana for a second visit on Monday, Gov. Blanco's staff learned of the visit from a newspaper reporter; the White House said it had trouble reaching the governor on Sunday to let her know.

When the two leaders toured an evacuee center in Baton Rouge, they worked different parts of the room. Some Republicans say privately that continuing cool relations between Mr. Bush and Gov. Blanco have contributed to discussions of setting up a public corporation to administer long-term relief and reconstruction funds for the region.

City Had Evacuation Plan But Strayed From Strategy (HC)

By Lise Olson

Houston Chronicle, September 9, 2005

Cancer patient Earl Robicheaux, his immune system depleted by radical chemotherapy, lay in a hospital bed as Hurricane Katrina bore down on New Orleans.

Trying to leave, he thought, seemed suicidal.

But after four days in the hospital's reeking darkness, he escaped via a Black Hawk helicopter that landed on the roof of the University Hospital under heavy guard because of the threat of sniper fire.

It was not the evacuation plan authorities had envisioned for its sick, its elderly and its poor. As the floodwaters recede, serious questions remain about whether New Orleans and Louisiana officials followed their own plans for evacuating people with no other way out.

The mayor's mandatory evacuation order was issued 20 hours before the storm struck the Louisiana coast, less than half the time researchers determined would be needed to get everyone out.

DOJ_NMG_0003918

City officials had 550 municipal buses and hundreds of additional school buses at their disposal but made no plans to use them to get people out of New Orleans before the storm, said Chester Wilmot, a civil engineering professor at Louisiana State University and an expert in transportation planning, who helped the city put together its evacuation plan.

Instead, local buses were used to ferry people from 12 pickup points to poorly supplied "shelters of last resort" in the city. An estimated 50,000 New Orleans households have no access to cars, Wilmot said.

State and local plans both called for extra help to be provided in advance to residents with "special needs," though no specific timetable was prepared. But phone lines for people who needed specialized shelters opened at noon Saturday — barely 30 hours before Katrina came ashore in Louisiana.

Many people from New Orleans ended up staying home or using a "last resort" special needs shelter state authorities and the city health department set up at the Superdome. Those who made it out of town initially found limited space. The state of Louisiana provided shelter in Baton Rouge and five other cities for a total of about 1,000.

In the city of New Orleans alone, more than 100,000 of the city's residents described themselves as disabled in a recent U.S. census.

Early mistakes

Hospitals were exempted from the mayor's mandatory evacuation order. But at least two public hospitals, loaded with more than 1,000 caregivers and patients, had their generators in their basements, which made them vulnerable in a flood. That violated the state's hurricane plan but had gone uncorrected for years because the hospitals did not have the money to fix the situation, a state university hospital official told the Chronicle.

The consequences came to bear in the images hours and days later: Elderly people dying outside shelters and hospitals that were losing power and, finally, their patients. Now, hurricane evacuation experts around the country are asking why New Orleans failed to prepare for the flood scenario from a Category 4 or 5 hurricane.

"Everybody knew about it. There's no excuse for not having a plan," said Jay Baker, a Florida State University associate professor who is an expert in hurricane evacuations and is familiar with New Orleans hurricane studies.

Tami Frazier, a spokeswoman for Mayor C. Ray Nagin, currently working out of Houston, refused to comment on direct questions this week or to answer several written questions sent via e-mail. She cited the need to focus on rescuing citizens and recovering bodies.

Robicheaux, the cancer patient who was trapped in a downtown New Orleans hospital, said he thought the city "decided basically to let it ride."

"When you're in a city like New York and there's a big snowstorm, you expect them to have plows. That's not the way it is here. There are no resources to stockpile supplies."

Saturday evening, Hurricane Katrina had intensified to Category 4, with the possibility that it could strike land as a killer Category 5 storm.

About 8 p.m., Mayor Nagin fielded an unusual personal call at home from Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, who wanted to be sure Nagin knew what was coming.

Still, Nagin waited to issue a mandatory evacuation, apparently because of legal complications, said Frazier. She said the city attorney was unavailable for an interview to explain.

But Kris Wartelle, spokeswoman for the attorney general of Louisiana, said state law clearly gives the mayor the authority to "direct and compel the evacuation of all or part of the population from any stricken or threatened area."

"They're not confused about it. He had the authority to do it," Wartelle said.

The mandatory evacuation order came at 10 a.m Sunday.

Former Kemah Mayor Bill King, who has spent years trying to boost funding and organization for hurricanes planning in the Houston-Galveston area, said Nagin's decision to wait to order people out compounded the tragedy.

"To call an evacuation on Sunday morning when the storm was going to hit on Monday morning at 6 a.m. is just ... negligence," King said. "If he'd called it better than that he would have saved lives."

Special-needs evacuation

DOJ_NMG_0003919

The Chronicle reviewed Louisiana's Emergency Operations Plan, adopted in 2000. It calls for the establishment of specialized shelters for people with special medical needs. It also recommends that cities use public transportation to evacuate residents if necessary.

The city of New Orleans Comprehensive Emergency Management Plan suggested people develop their own way to get out. "The potential exists that New Orleans could be without sufficient supplies to meet the needs of persons with special considerations, and there is significant risk being taken by those individuals who decide to remain in these refuges of last resort," it says.

People who called for information on special needs shelters Saturday were directed to sites in Alexandria and in Monroe, La. — cities 218 and 326 miles away. The state scrambled to find 20 ambulances and some specialized vans to pick up fragile residents who needed rides.

"There were transportation systems in place to take people out of New Orleans, which was the preferred solution," said Kristen Meyer, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Hospitals. But she's not sure how many got out.

Some, including Lower 9th Ward resident Lois Rice, a paraplegic, became trapped in their homes when the floodwaters rose. She was rescued after using her air mattress to float into her attic.

Florida, by contrast, for two decades has required counties to establish and maintain permanent databases of "special needs citizens," and arrange rides for people with no transportation. The state also has shelters established for myriad medical conditions.

Florida emergency officials agree that last-minute planning simply doesn't work.

"Unless you planned in advance, it would be a catastrophe," said Guy Daines, a retired Florida emergency manager who is considered an expert in specialized evacuations.

In New Orleans, many people with special medical needs ended up at the last resort shelter in the Superdome.

New Orleans' own special needs evacuation plan, however, says that shelter is "NOT TO BE INTERPRETED AS A GUARANTEE OF SAFETY, and the City of New Orleans is not assuring anyone protection from harm within the facilities that are being offered or opened for this purpose."

"When I saw them loading special needs people into the Superdome the day before the storm, my heart was breaking," said Patti Moss, a Texas nursing professor who has developed a tracking system for such vulnerable citizens here. "They were in the path of the storm."

Two of the city's hospitals dedicated to serving the city's poor, University and Charity hospitals, quickly lost power, according to Leslie Capo, a spokesman for the Louisiana State University health sciences department.

After days in the dark, it took the National Guard, the U.S. Army and a Black Hawk to rescue Robicheaux.

"We had been kind of left on our own and I thought, 'This is a fine thank you,' " he said.

Planning for the poor

In storm-vulnerable Jefferson Parish and New Orleans, the American Red Cross worked before the storm to promote a "buddy system" to encourage everyone without cars to find rides through churches and other organizations.

But in an interview published July 18 in New Orleans City Business, Jefferson Parish hurricane planner Walter Maestri insisted New Orleans needed to do much more for those who didn't have cars.

"New Orleans has a significantly larger population without means of transportation, so it's a much bigger problem for the city. ... The answer is very simple — evacuation," he said.

As Hurricane Katrina approached Sunday morning, New Orleans officials advertised city buses would be used to pick people up at 12 sites to go to the "last resort" shelters.

It's unclear how many buses were used. Planners decided not to use any of the New Orleans school buses for early evacuation, Wilmot said.

Photographers recorded images of them lined up in neat rows and submerged — though one was commandeered by Jabbar Gibson, 20, who ferried 70 passengers to safety in the Reliant Astrodome.

Cut Off At Center Of Crisis, City Officials Faced Struggle To Keep In Touch (WSJ)

By Christopher Rhoads

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- For days after Hurricane Katrina's devastating rampage through this city, a small corps of city leaders holed up at the Hyatt Hotel. They had virtually no way to communicate with the outside world.

A command center set up before the storm stopped working when the backup generator ran out of diesel fuel. Cellphone towers had been knocked out by high winds. Many land lines in the area were unusable.

When emergency power finally returned to the Hyatt, Scott Domke, a member of the city's technology team, remembered that he had recently set up an Internet phone account with Vonage Holdings Corp. He was able to find a working socket in a conference room and linked his laptop to an Internet connection.

At 12:27 a.m. on Wednesday, Aug. 31, the mayor's inner circle made its first outside call in two days. Eventually, the team was able to get eight lines running from the single Vonage account. That evening, the phone rang and it was President Bush calling from Air Force One.

During the first days of Katrina, the besieged mayor's office struggled to stay connected. It was forced to rely on ingenuity and extreme methods, including breaking in to an Office Depot -- as the chief of police stood watch and chased away unofficial looters -- to obtain necessary equipment. The Hyatt group would eventually be forced to move to a higher floor as a gang intent on breaking into its stockpile of food assaulted the hotel.

The tragedy has revealed many ways that the city was unprepared for the storm, flood and chaos that followed, and its communications system was no exception. Greg Meffert, the city's chief technology officer, says that the New Orleans emergency communication plan relied heavily on basic phone service remaining intact. Cellphone backups also failed, and the few older model satellite phones lost battery power and couldn't be recharged. But under duress, Mr. Meffert and his three-member team also found creative ways to cope with the disaster.

Hurricane conditions first hit the city on Saturday, Aug. 27. Mr. Meffert -- whose hats include deputy mayor, the mayor's right-hand man and CTO -- and several of his team and their families had decided the Hyatt, which is a couple of blocks from City Hall, was the best place to hunker down and establish communications for the storm. The hotel was better served with power and food than the city command post. With the mayor and some other officials, including the chief of police, they moved into some conference rooms on the fourth floor and figured they'd be in the hotel for a couple of nights at the most.

Over the next two days, what remained of the city government that had not evacuated before the storm -- a core group of about 15 people -- steadily descended into information darkness.

By the time the eye of Katrina made landfall that Monday morning, the group had already suffered more than 24 hours of hurricane-force winds, including a tornado that ripped off part of one side of the hotel.

"When the tornado rolled over us, you could hear a weird rumbling sound," recalled the 40-year-old Mr. Meffert this week, sitting unshaven behind his desk in City Hall in khaki shorts, a black T-shirt and white tennis sneakers. Army Rangers and other troops ran through the still submerged streets below his window. "You could hear the windows popping out like gunshots," he said.

Mr. Meffert says phone service went out at the Hyatt because of power failures and water damage to the hotel's main switch. After that, the Hyatt team's only available means of communication were police radios. But those were operating at a fraction of capacity because the generator serving the main transmission site broke down. Sometimes dozens of officers were trying to use one channel.

For the most part, city officials relied on "human chains of communication," he says. "It was like: 'Go tell so-and-so if you see them.' "

The team slept on floors and tables in the sweaty conference rooms. Then they figured the worst was over and that communications -- and normality -- would soon return.

Instead, the opposite happened.

On Tuesday, the levee at the 17th Street Canal broke, and water poured into the city, raising the water level by a foot or more every 20 minutes, Mr. Meffert estimates. Within hours, nearby streets were submerged in more than 12 feet of water. Water quickly engulfed the Hyatt and surrounding government buildings. Mr. Meffert and his team spent most of this day helping with rescue efforts, mostly from boats. "We were just pulling [people] from the water," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0003921

Mr. Meffert evacuated his wife and two young boys to his parents' home in San Antonio. The evacuation party included the pregnant wife of the chief of police.

That evening Mr. Meffert realized things would get worse unless communications were restored, immediately.

That's when Mr. Domke had his brainstorm. For the next five days, virtually all communications out of New Orleans by the city's top officials depended on Mr. Domke's laptop and this single Internet phone account.

Mr. Meffert, a software entrepreneur before he joined the mayor's office in 2002, realized he needed more lines and more phones to cope with a rapidly deteriorating situation. Before dawn on Wednesday, Messrs. Meffert and Domke and some other aides drove a military Humvee into the darkness and devastation. They were accompanied by the chief of police, Eddie Compass.

Their destination was Office Depot, where they loaded up on phones, routers, printers and fax machines -- anything that was needed to support a government under siege by weather and crime. The store had already been looted of some supplies. While Mr. Meffert was looking for printer cartridges, several looters returned. Mr. Compass, the police chief, roared at the looters and chased them off, says Mr. Meffert.

Mr. Meffert told the chief he needed a large computer server for email. They found the one used by Office Depot in its backroom.

"Do you really need this?" Mr. Meffert says the police chief asked him.

"Yes, we do," Mr. Meffert says he replied.

The server was screwed into an equipment rack in the backroom. Without the use of tools, the chief bent parts of the metal rack and ripped the server out of its housing with his hands, Mr. Meffert says, adding: "I have never seen that before."

The team was sleeping and working out of a single conference room, called Burgundy D. There were enough cots for five people. Another half-dozen slept on the floor. In one corner, phones, routers, cables and other gear lay in a pile. Dirty blankets and clothes were scattered about.

On Wednesday evening, when Mr. Meffert was manning the phones, one rang. On the other end was President Bush in Air Force One. Mr. Meffert, now wearing the hat of secretary, scribbled down the number and sent someone to find Mayor Ray Nagin.

The mayor later recounted his conversation with the president in an interview with WWL-AM on Thursday. "I told him we had an incredible crisis here and that his flying over in Air Force One does not do it justice," the mayor said.

Later in the interview, conducted over the single Hyatt link, the mayor blasted the response to date. "I need reinforcements, I need troops, man. I need 500 buses, man," he said.

On Thursday morning, Mr. Meffert's team got word that 200 gang members were moving on the Hyatt, apparently aware that it still had food, drink and power. To signify that they were in the gang, members had made a distinguishing rip in their shirts, says Mr. Meffert. An elevated walkway from the Superdome connects to a shopping arcade, which in turn connects to the Hyatt.

Around 10 o'clock that morning, the team evacuated its fourth-floor command post for the 27th floor. The only equipment it brought along was a handful of cordless phones, which had a range of 300 feet. On the 27th floor, where the mayor was staying, the phones worked only if the user hung over the balcony toward the atrium inside the building.

"This was when the last parts of the government were about to come undone," says Mr. Meffert. "It felt like the Alamo -- we were surrounded and had only short bursts of communication."

With Police Chief Compass and other officers blocking the entrance, looters were not able to enter the Hyatt, Mr. Meffert says.

At the same time, water continued to rise around the building. Mr. Domke and Jimmy Goodson, an aide in charge of security for the team, realized that the electronics for the hotel -- upon which the single communication link depended -- were on the ground floor, perilously close to the rising water. They dispatched members of their group to throw sandbags around the electronics room. The water reached within three inches of the room but never damaged the electronics, Mr. Meffert says.

DOJ_NMG_0003922

New Orleans had an emergency communications plan, but it had serious flaws. The back-up communications of the city's Office of Emergency Preparedness consisted of a few older model satellite phones, but their batteries went dead and couldn't be recharged, Mr. Meffert says.

In the early stages of the storm, the city's emergency command office, on the ninth floor of city hall, got power from an emergency diesel generator. But by the time the hurricane passed, it had burned up about one third of its fuel. Fuel soon ran out completely and couldn't be replenished.

Meantime, the commercial phone systems that the city relied on blinked out during the storm and its immediate aftermath, according to Mr. Meffert. Land lines went dead in part because of switch and power failures, and city-issued cellphones stopped working after towers were blown down, he says. BellSouth Corp. says that its nearby telecom hub was operative throughout the crisis.

Mr. Meffert says the satellite phones were used in the early stages, but their batteries soon were drained. He tried to recharge one phone, but it wouldn't keep the charge, he says. "It kept flashing 'low bat,' " he recalls.

Mr. Meffert says that the city was unable to spend more on emergency communications because of a budget crisis and cuts in federal aid. But he doubts that additional money would have helped much. "Virtually no city could have ever prepared for something of this magnitude," he says.

When Mr. Meffert arrived at the mayor's office in 2002, budgets were calculated on cheap calculators, he says. Out of 70 major cities in the U.S., the New Orleans municipal Web site was ranked dead last that year in a quality survey.

This past year, Mr. Meffert's team constructed an innovative surveillance bubble over the city consisting of cameras, wireless Internet and software in an attempt to lower the city's record murder rate. Though controversial with civil-rights groups, the system has nearly halved crime in the 20% of the city where it operates, says Mr. Meffert. He distributed BlackBerrys among senior ranks in the government, devices that proved invaluable in this crisis once email resumed working late last week.

In the middle of the chaos several days ago, Mr. Meffert was notified that the city's Web site now ranks No. 1 of those 70 major U.S. cities. The site stayed up throughout the storm because Mr. Domke was able to shift it to a Dallas server.

Toward the end of last week, the "cavalry" began arriving, says Mr. Meffert, in the form of several thousand walkie-talkie phones provided by Sprint Nextel Corp. The phones operate directly between users within short distances, so they do not require cell towers to transmit.

At the same time, a team from computer supplier Unisys Corp. arrived, led by an ex-Army Ranger named Ed Minyard. In addition to providing equipment to begin constructing a wireless network in the Hyatt and City Hall, Mr. Minyard brought some other supplies: bottles of Wild Turkey whiskey.

"We had the necessary provisions," says Mr. Minyard. "These boys needed it."

La. Lawmaker Rebukes Federal Disaster Response (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — A somber “daughter of the Crescent City” returned to Capitol Hill on Thursday to defend Louisiana's response to Hurricane Katrina and chastise how Washington handled the disaster.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., speaking on the Senate floor for the first time since the disaster, dismissed critics who have blamed local officials. The floodwaters destroyed a family retreat in Slidell and damaged her childhood home in New Orleans.

“It is not true that Louisiana was not prepared,” said Landrieu, who defended Democratic Gov. Kathleen Blanco and Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, a Republican. She said both had planned for such a disaster.

“I'm angry that some people in Washington … would blame state and local governments for something that is a federal responsibility,” she said in an interview later. “For God's sake, they were trying to make decisions under 10 feet of water.”

Other members of Congress, including House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, said that there were failures across the board and that Congress will investigate. “My impression is that the whole system broke down,” he said. “While the individual efforts of first responders and volunteers and National Guardsmen have obviously been beyond heroic, it's fair to say the overall response could've and should've been better.”

DOJ_NMG_0003923

Landrieu, 49, said she returned here to provide “an eyewitness account” and to push for quick aid. She is one of five members of Congress who lost homes.

An heir to one of Louisiana's political dynasties, Landrieu is the daughter of former New Orleans mayor Maurice “Moon” Landrieu. He called her in the Senate cloakroom minutes after her speech.

Landrieu is the oldest of nine siblings. Brother Mitch is lieutenant governor of Louisiana and was with her in a Baton Rouge command center when the storm hit. Despite the pleas of his family, he spent three days in a rescue boat where “he lifted the dead and alive out with his own hands,” she said.

But Landrieu, whose husband and two school-age children evacuated unscathed, offered few personal anecdotes Thursday. She focused instead on the Federal Emergency Management Agency and its “incompetent and insulting” response.

Landrieu said the “double tragedy” of a monster hurricane and burst levees could have been avoided, or at least alleviated, if federal officials hadn't denied or underfunded years of requests to improve flood barriers and slow coastal erosion. “Washington rolled the dice and Louisiana lost,” she said.

Senator Bears Witness And Bares Emotions (WP)

By Mark Leibovich

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Mary Landrieu returned to Washington yesterday, slogging through a day of official business as if through water.

"If my heart is a little heavy today, it's because I've seen more in the last two weeks than I've seen in my entire life," the Louisiana senator said in a floor speech. She stood at her desk, with colleagues rapt in their seats -- nearly all of them fellow Democrats (on orders from Minority Leader Harry Reid) and at least one Republican (Thad Cochran of Mississippi). Sniffles were audible from the gallery as Landrieu catalogued "what I've seen." Everyone knows what she saw, at least in its wide-angle contours of aerial devastation shots and death estimates.

But there was a vivid sense of otherness to Landrieu's day at the Capitol yesterday. She had the shellshocked bearing of someone who's been in a place difficult to describe. People greeted Landrieu delicately, like a mourner.

"This is all just so surreal," Landrieu said in a brief interview after her speech. She had spent the past 10 days at an Embassy Suites in Baton Rouge after evacuating her family's summer home in Slidell on Lake Pontchartrain, since obliterated. Last she heard, her childhood home in New Orleans was filled with five feet of water. Her mother and father -- the former mayor of New Orleans -- are okay, as are her eight siblings and 44 nieces and nephews. Of the seven Landrieu siblings who live in New Orleans, four had their homes destroyed.

She was reluctant to come back to Washington, Landrieu said. Don't focus on her, she pleaded -- a rare instance of a senator saying something like that and maybe even meaning it. But of course, there was fuss everywhere Landrieu went, the clop-clop-clop of her heels echoing down hallways amid camera clicks, processions of well-wishers, trailing reporters, the whole bit.

Still, she looked strangely isolated, even while Reid lavished praise on her at a late-morning news conference. He kept referring to her as "Mary," and Sen. Chuck Schumer patted her on the back. She barely mustered a smile all day. "Really, this is not about me," Landrieu said later, walking back to her office. "This is about telling the story. The full story."

Like every public official identified with Katrina, Landrieu has had her moments, good and bad. She publicly thanked federal and local officials on CNN, and received a swift and oft-replayed lecture from anchor Anderson Cooper, who derided her as "a politician." As the week wore on, though, she was spared much of the criticism endured by President Bush, FEMA head Michael Brown, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, among others.

Landrieu managed to avoid an attention-getting outburst at least until Sunday, when she appeared on ABC's "This Week" and said that "If one person criticizes them" -- meaning local officials -- "or says one more thing, including the president of the United States, he will hear from me. One more word about it after this show airs and I might likely have to punch him. Literally."

Landrieu revisited that interview during her 26-minute floor speech yesterday. "I want to be clear for the record in that piece that you all saw with me with George Stephanopoulos," she said. "I was not crying in anguish because the home that I walked out of with my children was gone. I knew it would be gone when I left. It was an anguished plea to the only person that I thought could hear, and that was God Himself."

DOJ_NMG_0003924

"I think the last week has definitely changed her," Landrieu's press secretary Brian Richardson said after the speech. "This is probably the most important point in her career."

He corrected himself, saying that this moment isn't about Landrieu, and, of course, it's not. "This is the most important issue of her career," he said, meaning the hurricane.

Landrieu got back to her Capitol Hill home late Wednesday night, in time to take her kids to school yesterday. At 10:45, she attended a brief meeting with Democratic senators in Reid's office. Landrieu was at once gracious and defiant, thanking the president and then -- in her floor speech -- ridiculing his statement last week that no one "anticipated the breach of the levees."

"Everybody anticipated the breach of the levee, Mr. President," Landrieu said. This included the clay figurine, Mr. Bill, from "Saturday Night Live." Landrieu is a friend of Walter Williams, a native of New Orleans and Mr. Bill's creator, and he had deployed the high-voiced and squishable icon in public service announcements about Louisiana's coastal erosion problems before the storm. "How can it be that Mr. Bill was better informed than Mr. Bush?" Landrieu asked in her one hint of a laugh line all day.

No one laughed.

Troops Escalate Urgency Of Evacuation (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 8 -- Outside Kajun's Pub, between the relatively dry French Quarter and the heavily flooded Ninth Ward, bar owner JoAnn Guidos loaded up her 1991 Ford Econoline van with clothing, liquor and other necessities Thursday morning. After holding out for 10 days, Guidos and her friends were finally leaving New Orleans and heading to high ground.

The beer was still cold, thanks to a working generator, and hopes for customers were strong as the flood-ravaged city fills with thirsty soldiers and emergency workers.

But on Wednesday night, Guidos said, armed federal agents identifying themselves as U.S. marshals confiscated her weapons and ordered her and six friends to leave by noon Thursday.

"When you get 15 M-16s pointed at you and they line you up against the wall, it's kind of scary," said Guidos, 55.

With floodwaters continuing to recede and cleanup efforts beginning in earnest, police and the military set out on an aggressive door-to-door campaign here Thursday, urging remaining residents to leave or be removed by force.

The former Big Easy took on the air of a military encampment, as thousands of reserve and active-duty troops began patrolling the city and assisting police in search-and-rescue missions. Houses were marked with codes indicating whether any residents -- living or dead -- were found inside. Emergency workers intensified efforts to divide the city into grids in order to methodically retrieve an unknown number of corpses still in the floodwaters or entombed in ruined homes and businesses.

Although the mayor issued a forcible evacuation order, Louisiana and federal officials said they remained hopeful that most stragglers will leave voluntarily when faced with urgent warnings about dwindling supplies and hazardous floodwaters.

"We need everybody out so we can continue with the work of restoring this city," Vice Admiral Thad W. Allen, the U.S. Coast Guard chief of staff who has taken over the federal response in New Orleans, said early in the day on CBS.

P. Edwin Compass, the superintendent of police, said there are thousands of people remaining in the city but that authorities are determined to get everyone out. He said as little force as necessary would be used but that staying is not an option. Anyone with a weapon, even one legally registered, will have it confiscated, he said.

"No one will be able to be armed," Compass said. "Guns will be taken. Only law enforcement will be allowed to have guns."

The evacuation effort, however, appeared haphazard at best. Affluent areas that were not flooded, such as parts of the Garden District and Uptown, appear to be a low priority for mandatory evacuations.

In the dry neighborhood of Marigny Triangle, residents lounged in lawn chairs while listening to music blaring from "Radio Marigny," an impromptu outdoor music station. The area remained largely untouched by floodwaters, and residents say they see little reason to leave.

Peter and Amy Bas, who have four children ages 5 to 14, noted that they had already cleaned debris from their street. As the couple relaxed in their front yard, a Louisiana state trooper cruised by and asked if they needed diapers.

DOJ_NMG_0003925

"Where are we going to go?" Peter Bas asked. "They're going to take us and put us somewhere with 5,000 other people? We're going to stay."

Amy Bas added: "It could happen, but you think you're living in America and nobody is going to make you leave your home."

Police and the National Guard were aided by hundreds of paratroopers from the 82nd Airborne Division, who canvassed the French Quarter and neighborhoods surrounding the convention center and Superdome.

Active-duty U.S. troops such as the 82nd Airborne lack law enforcement authority in a domestic city such as New Orleans, and therefore must avoid direct involvement in forcibly evicting people. Local police warned that they expected friction with residents as they moved forcefully to pull them out, 82nd Airborne commanders said.

The paratroopers, along with other U.S. soldiers, patrolled parts of the city section by section in boats, trucks and on foot, looking to persuade more stragglers to leave.

"Hey! Evacuation!" Sgt. Geriah McAvin, 27, of Detroit yelled toward a block of red brick apartments as his 82nd Airborne platoon rolled into a flooded housing project in two lumbering, five-ton trucks. "Hey! We're here to take you out of here."

One man on crutches waved to the passing trucks from his front stoop. But when the five-ton circled around to get him, he hesitated.

"You're not taking me to the Superdome?" asked Alfred Jones, 43.

"No Superdome!" Dennison said.

Eventually, Jones gave in, wincing and moaning in pain as the soldiers lifted him onto the truck. Jones, who lived alone, has severe arthritis in his legs and said he had survived with the help of a friend who brought him food. But his friend left a few days ago, and Jones had not eaten for at least a day and he ran out of water on Wednesday. Given his leg condition, waving down a helicopter was out of the question, he said.

With major levee breaks patched earlier this week, and a growing number of pumps sending water into nearby Lake Pontchartrain, the floodwaters appeared to be dropping quickly on Thursday. Drier conditions in many areas allowed crews to step up efforts clearing branches, lumber, bricks and other debris, piling the rubble along roadsides and trolley tracks on St. Charles Avenue and other once-picturesque boulevards.

The Environmental Protection Agency also continued to monitor the foul and polluted floodwater that still covers much of New Orleans, testing for more than 100 kinds of chemicals, according to EPA Administrator Steve Johnson. The fetid water, along with the toxic sediment left behind, is one of the main reasons authorities are so adamant about a full evacuation, officials said.

"The water is unsafe," Johnson said in an interview. "This is not just putting in a couple of water bottles. . . . Ultimately we will do whatever testing is needed to assure ourselves, and the public, that the land and water is safe."

EPA officials hope to begin testing the sediment left in the hurricane's wake as early as next week, but they are waiting for an independent scientific board to approve their soil-testing plan. Johnson said he and others are "not letting bureaucracy get in the way" but are intent on devising a credible scientific approach to the survey.

As of Thursday, the official death toll from Hurricane Katrina rose to 118 in Louisiana and 201 in Mississippi. But those numbers, provided by authorities in charge of processing the dead, contrast wildly with projections and the preparations that are underway.

In Louisiana, a contractor working with the Federal Emergency Management Agency has set aside 25,000 body bags, and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin has said as many as 10,000 people could be dead in the city.

Ten days after the Category 4 storm struck the Gulf Coast, many officials said they still do not know what to expect, nor are they willing to provide projections for a final death toll.

"We're not giving estimates -- we're not looking for a body count," said Melissa Walker, a spokeswoman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, working at the state emergency operations center. "These are individual lives that are lost, and each one of them is important."

One example of the difficulty in obtaining reliable information can be seen in St. Bernard Parish, a devastated area 20 miles southeast of downtown New Orleans. Rep. Charlie Melancon (D-La.) said earlier this week that he was told that as many as 100 people died at a warehouse in Chalmette while awaiting rescue, but Melancon later said that number was incorrect.

DOJ_NMG_0003926

Police Hold Off Use Of Force (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Rescuers and police held back Thursday from their threatened use of force as teams searched New Orleans homes for remaining flood survivors and pleaded with them to abandon the stench-filled city.

Police Superintendent Eddie Compass urged residents to leave and said that at some point police and the National Guard would begin using a "minimal amount of force" to get people to leave.

"We are not going to be tough with these people," Compass said.

Mayor Ray Nagin had said he would order people out of the city if they did not leave.

Helicopters clattered overhead and National Guard troops peered into windows of homes in search of the sick or dying, the dead, and those resisting efforts to evacuate them.

"Certain people are hiding out and are not going to leave," said Adrian Tate, a carpenter with a pit bull dog. "They've got pets, and they ain't leaving them behind."

Some 400,000 homes were without power in New Orleans. Water service was restored to some parts of the city but is not drinkable. The floodwater was falling slowly as pumping continued, with waterlines more than a foot below the high-water mark.

In Mississippi, 203,000 homes and businesses were without power, down from about 800,000 after the hurricane hit. State economists pegged losses to the timber industry at $1.2 billion.

In Texas, a convoy of Mexican army troops bearing relief supplies and medical personnel arrived in San Antonio, marking the first time Mexican troops have entered the United States in more than a century.

Juliette Saussy, New Orleans director of emergency medical services, estimated that "hundreds of bodies" have been recovered.

The official death toll remained about 300.

"We saw a lot of dead people, both in the water and in buildings," said South Carolina game warden Gregg Brown, whose team scoured flooded New Orleans neighborhoods by boat.

Some suggested the final count may not be as horrific as earlier feared.

"I am thinking we are better off than we thought we'd be," said Louisiana state Sen. Walter Boasso, who represents St. Bernard Parish near New Orleans. Parts of that parish still sit under 8 feet of water.

Vice President Cheney toured Louisiana and Mississippi on Thursday. Standing by Louisiana's governor, Democrat Kathleen Blanco, Cheney spoke of how the flooding of New Orleans and the destruction of many communities in the region was "a major tragedy in modern times."

"The positive news is we appear to be making progress," Cheney said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said so far 47,300 people had been rescued and that 235,200 people were housed in 750 shelters.

President Bush declared Sept. 16 as a national day of remembrance for the dead and vowed to help states rebuild.

"The government is going to be with you for the long haul," Bush said.

Katrina Holdouts Yield To Power Of Persuasion (KRT)

By Natalie Pompilio, Susannah A. Nesmith And Martin Merzer

Knight Ridder, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Block after block, door by door, eye to eye, police officers and soldiers edged closer Thursday to extracting the last holdouts from this dying city. Authorities did not wield brute strength - yet - but they employed considerable powers of persuasion.

"The soldier talked to me, and I'm sick, and he told me it would be best if I left to get my treatment," Dale Wolfe Noel, 68, of the Algiers section of New Orleans said after rescuers brought her to a makeshift first-aid center. "They're trying to get me some place good."

DOJ_NMG_0003927

More people seemed motivated to leave, having heard the term “mandatory evacuation,” and fewer than 10,000 people remained in a metropolis that was home to 485,000 before Hurricane Katrina all but destroyed it.

But some still resisted, and their stubbornness imperiled their lives. They were surrounded by sewage-contaminated floods and sporadic fires, and they had no access to fresh food or pure drinking water.

Thousands were feared dead. Those searching for survivors often found bodies floating in the floods, lying on broken highways or decomposing in previously hidden corners of the city, adding to the health risk and horror-movie reality.

“I can tell you there have been thousands of bodies," said Dr. Juliette Saussy, director of the city’s Emergency Medical Service.

In Washington, meanwhile, lawmakers moved forward on authorizing more help for the nearly 1 million people displaced - many forever - by Katrina.

The House of Representatives approved and the Senate was moving toward passage of a $51.8 billion special appropriation for disaster relief, just a fraction of the expected ultimate cost to restore lives and rebuild bridges, highways and other vital elements of the region’s infrastructure.

President Bush pledged to help victims cut through red tape to receive governmental assistance, including $2,000 debit cards for each displaced family. He said that more than 400,000 families already have applied for federal aid.

"We have much more work to do," Bush said during a Thursday afternoon address to the nation. “But the people that have been hurt by this storm know that - need to know that - the government is going to be with you for the long haul."

His vice president, Dick Cheney, visited Gulfport, Miss., Baton Rouge and New Orleans, publicly viewing the devastation and privately meeting with managers of the relief effort.

Most of the sludge from the Aug. 29 hurricane had dried to dust by the time Cheney arrived in Gulfport, but he saw piles of debris, fallen tree limbs and concrete slabs where nice homes and immaculate lawns once stood.

Cheney said he learned during his visit that Mississippians need help with insurance issues, housing and emotional healing. Still, he said, “Everybody I've met with was upbeat" and determined to rebuild.

But he was not uniformly welcomed. During a brief press conference in the middle of a Gulfport street, a young man twice shouted obscenities at him before walking away. “Go ---- yourself, Mr. Cheney," the man yelled.

Back in New Orleans, Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said voluntary evacuations were continuing, but the department had not yet forced anyone to leave.

"Once we feel sure that all voluntary evacuations are being completed, then the forced evacuations will take place," he said.

On the streets, authorities - many on loan from distant cities - noted a change in attitude.

“Everyone we're coming across today, they've heard the mayor's announcement about the mandatory evacuation, so they're saying ‘OK’ today," said Deputy Robert Rey of the Bernalillo County, N.M. Sheriff's Department. "A lot of people are ready to go at this point."

At the same time, the urgency of official appeals intensified, often to the edge of orders to leave.

"Y’all weren’t here the day after the storm hit, don’t be rushing us now,” James Savage, 41, told National Guard troops on Chef Menteur Highway in New Orleans.

He wanted to stay and take care of his dog, Snoop, but the soldiers convinced him that they would see to the dog’s care and make sure they were reunited.

“I like the way you handle your business,” Savage told them as he agreed to leave.

In the Lower Ninth Ward, where floodwaters receded and left a foul-smelling muck, troops confronted holdouts, many of whom eventually climbed aboard military trucks, taking a few belongings. They were taken to schools and the convention center.

Many soldiers and police learned there was an art to convincing residents to depart.

As New Orleans Police Officer Anthony Pardo tried to talk an elderly woman into leaving, she bit him on the arm. The bite didn't break the skin, Pardo said, laughing, and he was able to get her in the boat and out of her flooded community.

"She was scolding me and another officer like we were little kids," Pardo said. "But we got her to safety, and that's what matters."

DOJ_NMG_0003928

In other developments:

_ Northwest Airlines flight 889 touched down Thursday morning at the Gulfport-Biloxi International Airport, sending an important message to the rest of the country. Ten days after the storm, commercial service finally was restored.

"You can now access the Mississippi Gulf Coast," airport assistant director Ken Spirito said with pride. “We are back.”

_ More than 7,000 evacuees lined up outside Houston’s Reliant Center as the American Red Cross began distributing debit cards worth up to $2,000, a program separate from the federal one. Mounted police patrolled the area.

_ More than 100 demonstrators, rallied by the political action committee MoveOn.org, picketed in front of the White House to protest what they called the inept response to the disaster.

Ann Petrobich, 61, a Katrina victim from New Orleans, walked in the midday sun, carrying a blue and yellow sign reading “Shame” and “Help Hurricane Victims Now.” “Anger doesn’t begin to describe it,” she said.

_ President Bush designated September 16 as a national day of prayer and remembrance for Katrina victims. “Throughout our history in times of testing, Americans have come together in prayer to heal and ask for strength for the tasks ahead,” he said.

Some Holdouts Leave, Others Stay As Authorities Urge Evacuation (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper And Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Weary holdouts trickled out of New Orleans as teams of soldiers, police and medical personnel continued going door-to-door to implore thousands of residents still in the battered city to leave. But receding floodwaters could make some of those hunkered down in their homes more than 10 days after Hurricane Katrina hit even more determined to stay.

Meanwhile, Federal Emergency Management Agency officials, who on Wednesday said the agency would distribute 600,000 debit cards valued at $2,000 each to help victims of Katrina buy food, transportation and other necessities, announced that the cards won't be distributed on a wide scale.

Yesterday, FEMA spokesman David Passey could not elaborate on what he called "confusion" about the debit-card program but said the cards would be given only to people in the Astrodome in Houston. He didn't know whether people there were still getting them yesterday and couldn't say how many total cards had been distributed.

"We've determined normal delivery methods would be more helpful," said Mr. Passey. This was the first time FEMA tried to use debit cards.

In New Orleans, while crews are struggling to close one levee breach that is allowing water to flow into the city from Lake Pontchartrain to the north, water levels are declining in many inundated neighborhoods, including some where houses had been submerged as high as their rooftops.

Some major streets in the Lower Ninth Ward and neighboring St. Bernard Parish, trapped between three cascades of water as the storm barreled past New Orleans, were passable yesterday, though a thick coating of mud remained.

As the floodwaters receded, they also revealed fresh evidence of environmental destruction, including a thick, oily sludge coating trees, houses and roads throughout Meraux, a working-class community just east of New Orleans that is located near oil refineries and storage tanks. Workers in yellow, body-length suits were using squeegees to push the smelly mess into dark piles and load it into tanker trucks.

Still flooded are several residential areas of New Orleans, including the Gentilly, Mid-City and Broadmoor neighborhoods. But key tourist and historic districts such as the French Quarter and Garden District, generally located near the Mississippi River, are dry, and soldiers said many people remain in those areas.

The latest evacuations came as the House and Senate approved an additional $51.8 billion to finance recovery efforts, mostly for FEMA, boosting the federal price tag above $62 billion. on Thursday yesterday. The number of confirmed deaths in Mississippi reached 201, the Associated Press reported. Louisiana's death toll is 118, but that is expected to rise, because many people remain unaccounted for.

Gen. Ron Mason of the National Guard estimated that less than 10,000 people still are in New Orleans. While National Guard troops aren't forcing anyone to leave, they are working with police to cajole stubborn residents to evacuate. Adrian Tate, a

DOJ_NMG_0003929

41-year-old carpenter, said he was told by a New Orleans police captain who showed up yesterday morning that city officials have established a jail that will be used to lock up those who refuse orders to leave.

"What we're finding out is most people are willing to leave, especially when they find out the gravity of the situation...and when they find out it will take 80 days to pump the water out," Gen. Mason said. "When they hear that message, they're inclined to leave."

City medical officials said no major health epidemics have yet emerged, but they warned remaining residents not to make skin contact with the stagnant water. Meanwhile, search teams continued canvassing neighborhoods by pounding on doors, looking in windows and yelling to anyone inside. Mr. Tate was persuaded to leave by an infected mosquito bite on his forearm. "I can't get sick, man," he said just before climbing aboard a military truck with five other holdouts.

New Orleans Police Chief Eddie Compass said even relatively dry districts of the city will be cleared at gunpoint if necessary by his 900-person force. "We will be very respectful," he said. He gave no firm date for the forced evacuation, adding that "verbal judo" was the harshest technique currently being used.

In the Lower Ninth Ward, the water seemed to disappear overnight, probably because road-grading equipment had scraped the storm drains the day before.

In Meraux, the smell of petroleum hung thick in the air. Across the highway from a refinery that is surrounded by a residential neighborhood, two men in hazmat suits drained the contents of a battered tanker truck into a canal, using a thick black hose. The canal smelled like gasoline. Asked what they were doing, the men declined to comment. "I got a family, I'm not talking," one man said. Some residential streets up to a half mile away ran about a foot deep with what appeared to be crude oil.

Police Begin Seizing Guns Of Civilians (NYT)

By Alex Berenson And John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 8 - Local police officers began confiscating weapons from civilians in preparation for a forced evacuation of the last holdouts still living here, as President Bush steeled the nation for the grisly scenes of recovering the dead that will unfold in coming days.

Police officers and federal law enforcement agents scoured the city carrying assault rifles seeking residents who have holed up to avoid forcible eviction, as well as those who are still considering evacuating voluntarily to escape the city's putrid waters.

"Individuals are at risk of dying," said P. Edwin Compass III, the superintendent of the New Orleans police. "There's nothing more important than the preservation of human life."

Although it appeared Wednesday night that forced evacuations were beginning, on Thursday the authorities were still looking for those willing to leave voluntarily. The police said that the search was about 80 percent done, and that afterward they would begin enforcing Mayor C. Ray Nagin's order to remove residents by force.

Mr. Bush, in Washington, urged the nearly one million people displaced by the storm to contact federal agencies to apply for immediate aid. He praised the outpouring of private charity to the displaced, but said the costs of restoring lives would affect all Americans, as would the horror of the storm's carnage.

"The responsibility of caring for hundreds of thousands of citizens who no longer have homes is going to place many demands on our nation," the president said in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building. "We have many difficult days ahead, especially as we recover those who did not survive the storm."

As Mr. Bush spoke, Vice President Dick Cheney was touring Mississippi and Louisiana, in part as an answer to the critics who have said that the administration responded too slowly and timidly to the epic disaster. At a stop in Gulfport, Miss., a heckler shouted an obscenity at the vice president. Mr. Cheney shrugged it off, saying it was the first such abuse he had heard.

Also on Thursday, Congress approved a $51.8 billion package of storm aid, bringing the total to more than $62 billion in a week. The government is now spending $2 billion dollars a day to respond to the disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0003930

The confirmed death toll in Louisiana remained at 83 on Thursday. Efforts to recover corpses are beginning, although only a handful of bodies have been recovered so far. Official estimates of the death toll in New Orleans are still vague, but 10,000 remains a common figure.

Mississippi officials said they had confirmed 196 dead as of Thursday, including 143 in coastal areas, although Gov. Haley Barbour said he expected the toll to rise.

"It would just be a guess, but the 200 or just over 300 we think is a credible and reliable figure," the governor said on NBC's "Today" show.

He also said electricity would be restored by Sunday to most homes and businesses in the state that could receive it.

No one would venture a prediction about when the lights would come back on in New Orleans.

The water continued to recede slowly in the city 10 days after Hurricane Katrina swept ashore and levees failed at several points, inundating the basin New Orleans sits in.

The Army Corps of Engineers has restored to operation 37 of the city's 174 permanent pumps, allowing them to drain 11,000 cubic feet of water per second from the basin. When all the pumps are working, they can remove 81,000 cubic feet of water per second, said Dan Hitchings of the engineering corps.

It will be months before the breadth of the devastation from the storm is known. But a report by the Louisiana fisheries department calculated the economic loss to the state's important seafood industry at as much as $1.6 billion over the next 12 months.

Louisiana's insurance commissioner, J. Robert Wooley, said the state had barred insurance companies from canceling any homeowner's insurance policies in the days immediately before the storm hit and afterward.

"All cancellations will be voided," Mr. Wooley said.

Across New Orleans, active-duty soldiers, National Guard members and local law enforcement agencies from across the country continued door-to-door searches by patrol car, Humvee, helicopter and boat, urging remaining residents to leave.

Maj. Gen. James Ron Mason of the Kansas National Guard, who commands about 25,000 Guard troops in and around New Orleans, said his forces had rescued 687 residents by helicopter, boat and high-wheeled truck in the past 24 hours.

General Mason said Guard troops, although carrying M-16 rifles, would not use force to evict recalcitrant citizens. That, he said, was a job for the police, not members of the Guard.

"I don't believe that you will see National Guard soldiers actually physically forcing people to leave," General Mason said.

Mr. Compass, the police superintendent, said that after a week of near anarchy in the city, no civilians in New Orleans will be allowed to carry pistols, shotguns, or other firearms of any kind. "Only law enforcement are allowed to have weapons," he said.

That order apparently does not apply to the hundreds of security guards whom businesses and some wealthy individuals have hired to protect their property. The guards, who are civilians working for private security firms like Blackwater, are openly carrying M-16s and other assault rifles.

Mr. Compass said that he was aware of the private guards but that the police had no plans to make them give up their weapons.

New Orleans has turned into an armed camp, patrolled by thousands of local, state, and federal law enforcement officers, as well as National Guard troops and active-duty soldiers. While armed looters roamed unchecked last week, the city is now calm.

The city's slow recovery is continuing on other fronts as well, local officials said at a late morning news conference. Pumping stations are now operating across much of the city, and many taps and fire hydrants have water pressure. Tests have shown no evidence of cholera or other dangerous diseases in flooded areas.

With pumps running and the weather here remaining hot and dry, water has visibly receded across much of the city. Formerly flooded streets are now passable, although covered with leaves, tree branches and mud.

Still, many neighborhoods in the northern half of New Orleans remain under 10 feet of water, and Mr. Compass said Thursday that the city's plans for a forced evacuation remained in effect because of the danger of disease and fires.

DOJ_NMG_0003931

Mr. Compass said he could not disclose when residents might be forced to leave en masse. The city's police department and federal law enforcement officers from agencies like United States Marshals Service will lead the evacuation, he said. Officers will search houses in both dry and flooded neighborhoods, and no one will be allowed to stay, he said.

Many of the residents still in the city said they did not understand why the city remained intent on forcing them out.

Holes In New Orleans Flood Walls Slowly Being Patched (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — "We need more trucks out here."

Richard Pinner drawls softly into his cellphone, but he means business. It's already midmorning Thursday, and the thousands of tons of rock he needs to block a gaping hole in the London Avenue Canal are nowhere in sight.

The Army Corps of Engineers is leading the effort to drain the vast areas of rotting water covering this city. So far, water levels throughout the city have dropped no more than a foot or two. As the corps' project manager on the canal, Pinner is a point man in the aim to get the water off the streets.

A caravan of dump trucks had made huge progress here the day before, but now the effort isn't going as fast as he'd like. "That's why we have to push … as hard as possible," he says.

Under a relentless sun and surrounded by diseased-laden waters, Pinner paced the side of the canal for about 12 hours, cajoling contractors to speed up, begging for portable pumps and solving problems.

For Pinner, the effort is personal. His home is several miles east of here.

"I've got about 8 feet of water in my house," he says. His wife and daughters have relocated to Baton Rogue. The sooner the levees are sealed and the city is pumped out, the sooner Pinner can try to salvage what's left back home.

With the closure earlier this week of a breach in the 17th Street Canal, the Army Corps' efforts to dry out New Orleans have shifted here to London Avenue. The battle was being fought on three fronts.

A crane was driving 60-foot-long steel panels into the muddy canal bottom to block additional water from entering. About 7,000 tons of stone and gravel were being dumped into a levee breach reachable via a narrow gravel road above the waters. Helicopters were dropping hundreds of 7,000-pound sandbags into the second breach, which still cannot be reached by work crews on the ground.

Pinner and Neil Hickok, project manager for Boh Bros. construction company, predicted the first of the two London Avenue breaches will be blocked by this morning. Once that's done, their crews can build a road on the levee to the second breach and close it off, too.

Across the city, crews continued to try to get giant pumps that failed in Hurricane Katrina's wake to come back to life. The corps predicts it could take up to 80 days to drain the city.

The debris clogging pumps could contain human remains, and in some cases that was slowing the recovery effort.

"This is a very deep emotional aspect of our work down there, and we need to make sure we respect as best as possible those remains," Army Corps spokesman John Rickey said.

By early afternoon, Pinner has a problem that makes him happy. A backup of more than 50 trucks snakes away from the work site, waiting to dump their loads into the breach.

"Every day we accomplish something else and get closer," he says.

Some Areas Inch Toward Normality (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 9, 2005

BILOXI, Miss. — Jarin Pepper, manager of a Firestone auto repair shop, went to work Monday to clean up the mess from Hurricane Katrina. Moments later, somebody stopped and asked him to patch a tire. Then somebody else stopped. Then somebody else.

Instantly, the Firestone shop was unexpectedly open for business and going full blast, mostly repairing tires damaged by storm debris. "Oh, man, has it been busy!" says Pepper, 24.

DOJ_NMG_0003932

The skeleton of normality is slowly returning to the Mississippi Gulf Coast, which was smashed by Hurricane Katrina Aug. 29. Vast stretches of the area lie in ruins. Tens of thousands remain homeless, many living in tent cities. The drinking water is unsafe. The grim search for bodies goes on.

In a few patches, however, civil society is being restored thanks to electricity, running water, cellular phones and the extraordinary efforts of business owners and workers. About one in 10 businesses in Biloxi and Gulfport, the area's most populous cities, have reopened. Fewer businesses have come back in hard-hit small towns such as Long Beach, Pass Christian and Bay St. Louis.

Nearly everywhere, each day is noticeably better than the last, and progress can be seen almost hour by hour. Gas lines are almost gone. Workers are locating paychecks. A few ATM machines are working. And the lights are coming on.

The backbone of the recovery is an exhaustive effort by Mississippi Power to restore electricity to southern Mississippi. After the hurricane, none of its 195,000 customers had electricity. The company promises that by Sunday, power will be available to every customer in a building safe enough to use it — about 165,000 in all.

Mississippi Power President Anthony Topazi, 55, made a bold pledge that every customer who could use electricity would have it by Sunday, the fourth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. “We wanted to make that date stand for something positive,” he says.

While government struggled to get organized, Mississippi Power deployed a repair force that exceeds the National Guard's presence here. The company recruited 10,000 workers from 23 states and Canada to do the repairs, while Mississippi Power's 1,250 workers handle logistics on their home turf.

The repair workers live mostly in air-conditioned tent cities set up at fairgrounds and military bases. They get two hot meals a day and work long hours installing poles and repairing substations.

The utility's efforts have been so successful that electricity is available in many of the most devastated neighborhoods, even though the homes are uninhabitable.

Hud Garrett, a foreman for Power Line Consultants of Farmington, Mo., watched his crew restore power on Royal Oak Circle in Pass Christian. The neighborhood of expensive homes was deserted. Boats were overturned, houses trashed. “I've never seen this much destruction,” Garrett says. But the electricity works.

Dramatic improvements in cellphone service also have removed a sense of isolation and offset the loss of many land lines, making communication imperfect but possible. Cellular South, the state's biggest cellphone company, had all but one of its 54 towers on the coast knocked out during the hurricane. Forty are back up. They handled a record 7 million minutes of use Tuesday.

The company stationed technicians along the coast before the storm and began repairs almost immediately. One technician lost his home, dropped his wife and three kids off at a shelter and fixed a cell tower within hours of storm's end.

“I used the Internet, I called my sister in Georgia and told my boss I'd be in to work tomorrow — all on my cellphone,” says Rodney Sanford, 29, a pizza delivery man living in a tent outside his home here.

As power and telephones return, the businesses opening first are the ones needed most: auto repair shops, furniture stores and lumberyards.

Twin Oaks Child Development Center is the only child care center open in Gulfport. It's in a badly damaged area, but the building survived unscathed.

“We had air conditioning and power and water. I said, ‘God, there has to be a reason,' ” says owner Susan Dosher, 51. She decided to open. She had nine kids Monday, 15 Tuesday, 20 Wednesday and 34 Thursday. The children's parents include doctors, nurses and military personnel involved in the recovery effort.

Even a few non-essential businesses are open. Mississippi Music of Biloxi opened Tuesday and has had one customer: A woman picked up a trumpet she bought for a grandson, who decided he didn't want to play.

“I think we opened just to feel normal again,” says Dave Roof, 49, a band instrument repairman. “And because I'm on commission,” he adds.

The first restaurants have reopened, causing excitement akin to a celebrity sighting.

DOJ_NMG_0003933

El Rancho Mexican Bar & Grill of Biloxi may have been the first restaurant to do so when it opened its doors at 11 a.m. Tuesday. “It was so busy we had to close early because we ran out of food,” says owner Enrique Vanegas, who has worked non-stop to save the business he acquired in November when he moved here from California.

The restaurant had no insurance to fix its hurricane-damaged roof, so Vanegas borrowed money from his employees and drove eight hours to Texas to pick up 100 bundles of shingles. The shingles so burdened his 1998 Ford F150 that he drove back on interstate highways at 45 mph, praying that his truck wouldn't break down.

Neither Vanegas nor his employees had ever been on a roof, but they fixed it the best they could Sunday. When Monday came, the restaurant had no food, so Vanegas drove three hours to Jackson, Miss., to buy lettuce, tomatoes, spices and other ingredients.

“The hurricane changed our lives for the better,” he says. “We appreciate what we have — our employees, our families, our kids — more than ever.”

A few fast-food restaurants opened Wednesday, causing a stir and long lines.

Elton Gary, 43, of Gulfport lost his job at a wax factory. The hurricane blew railroad cars into the building. But he is a happy man because he was near the front of the line when the KFC drive-through reopened.

“It was hot and greasy and tasted good!” he says of his six-piece chicken order. “You don't know how much you like it until you can't eat it.” Thursday, he had a lead on some ribs.

The post-hurricane moment Gary cherishes most is coming home late Tuesday and seeing his porch light on. He sat silently in the car and admired the light.

Then he went inside and turned on the air conditioning, as cold as it could go.

A City That Made An Art Of Funerals Now Just Makes Do (WSJ)

By Steven Gray And Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- A solemn parade of uniformed officials and horses typically marks the funeral of a New Orleans police officer.

But the funeral Wednesday of Sgt. Paul Accardo fell far short of that: No horses. No parade. Not a single uniformed member of the New Orleans police department in attendance. The flooding of New Orleans meant that Sgt. Accardo, a New Orleans police spokesman who shot himself to death Saturday, was eulogized 75 miles away, in Baton Rouge. Nor did the body then proceed to the New Orleans cemetery where Sgt. Accardo wanted to be buried. Some family members and friends wore T-shirts to the funeral because their Sunday clothes were ruined in the flood.

"This isn't his city," said Cpl. Don Kelly, police spokesman in Baton Rouge.

Few cities bury their dead in the high style of New Orleans, where funerals can last a week, feature jazz bands as well as parades and draw bigger crowds than weddings do. But those traditions are, for the time being, yet another casualty of Hurricane Katrina. The same flood that ended so many lives in New Orleans shut down most of the city's institutions of death -- its funeral homes, churches and cemeteries. It also scattered the crowds that make New Orleans funerals so extraordinary.

For thousands of survivors, this loss could complicate the effort to accept the death of a loved one. "It means the end of the world to these people if they can't bury their dead in the traditional manner," says Larry Moore, general manager of the Rabenhorst Funeral Home in Baton Rouge.

Yesterday, a woman, her daughter and son-in-law held a short funeral service for the woman's husband, a 59-year-old man who died in the aftermath of the storm. Unable to reach family members displaced in the evacuation of New Orleans, the three sat alone sobbing in a small chapel at Mothe Funeral Home in suburban Harvey, as Boyd Mothe, a funeral-home official read the 23rd Psalm. Mr. Mothe, who described the service, wouldn't identify members of the family by name.

They had held the hastily arranged service to beat the local government's order that residents leave by the end of the day.

The woman had returned to Jefferson Parish on Monday, only to find her husband dead in their home, where he had stayed behind while the others headed to Houston as the storm approached. It's likely he died of asphyxiation from the exhaust of his electric generator. "She started to cry as she was telling me she didn't want to have to cremate him because of the condition of the body," says Boyd Mothe, whose family-run company runs 13 funeral homes in the region, several of which are still flooded.

DOJ_NMG_0003934

In the end cremation wasn't necessary, and the body was interred before noon at Westlawn Memorial Park and Mausoleum.

Among the biggest adherents of the New Orleans funeral tradition are those most affected by Hurricane Katrina: impoverished blacks whose burial processions often feature parades and jazz bands. Some scholars have traced these so-called jazz funerals back to Africa. Duke University professor Karla F.C. Holloway says slaves brought to America held burial processions involving call-and-response chants and musicians beating drums and tambourine-like instruments to help the dead on their way to heaven.

"The slaves in New Orleans would always accompany the dead to the burial site with rejoicing, because the rejoice was a release into a different kind of spiritual world, an ancestral world, which mixed with the Christian idea of being released into heaven," says Dr. Holloway.

In recent years, the tradition took a turn, when street gangs adopted the ritual to bury their murdered members. Then, the tradition gained a hip-hop quality. One of the biggest jazz funerals in recent years was for James "Soulja Slim" Tapp, an up-and-coming rapper who was fatally shot on his mother's front lawn. Soulja Slim's jazz funeral in 2003 sent thousands into the city's streets.

So deeply connected are music and death in New Orleans that the Web site of the Orleans Parish Coroner features the sound of its chief, Frank Minyard, playing the jazz trumpet.

But Katrina began wrecking that tradition even before making landfall. Death notices published in the days before the hurricane arrived struck tentative notes. "The service for Jennie is contingent on the current storm conditions," read the obituary for 63-year-old Jennie Marie Latino, who was scheduled to be buried on the morning Katrina hit New Orleans.

Now, the dead in New Orleans include some corpses that were already lying in funeral homes before the storm hit. Some funeral homes are under water, says Gene Walters, executive director of the Louisiana Funeral Directors Association.

Some funeral homes evacuated their dead. The Mothe chain moved about 10 bodies to the Jefferson Parish Forensics Center, a new facility with plenty of refrigeration capacity. The center is now storing nearly 200 bodies of people who failed to survive the aftermath of the storm.

Tradition in New Orleans calls for open caskets. But the bodies still lying in the flooded wreckage of New Orleans won't be viewable.

Once rescue workers turn their attention from the living to the dead, corpses will be brought to a refrigerated warehouse put up after the hurricane by federal officials outside New Orleans. But already, coroners' offices across Louisiana are filling up with the dead from New Orleans, most of them people who failed to survive the evacuation. "We had four buses pull into town with DOA's among the evacuees," says Sherry Basco of the Rapides Parish Coroner's Office, a nearly four-hour drive from New Orleans.

Several coroners' offices are fielding double their usual number of fatalities, says Randolph Williams, president of the Louisiana Coroners' Association.

Funeral directors around New Orleans are receiving calls from coroners' offices far and wide, reporting the deaths of evacuees who had wished to be buried in New Orleans. But Mr. Walters of the state funeral directors' association says those wishes are going unfulfilled because of the flooded condition of New Orleans cemeteries which are above ground. They were designed that way because the city is largely below sea level. "We're recommending that these people be entombed in holding crypts, until the dead can return to New Orleans, he says.

Holding crypts and refrigeration could preserve not only the dead but also the tradition of New Orleans funerals, but not now. And not with the sheer number of Katrina victims.

In an average year, Louisiana buries 44,000 bodies. Nobody knows how many now lie in the waters of flooded New Orleans.

Standing In The Way Of A Good Story (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0003935

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

When NBC anchor Brian Williams and his crew were trying to take pictures of a National Guard unit securing a Brooks Brothers shop in downtown New Orleans, a sergeant blocked the footage by ordering them to the other side of Canal Street.

"I have searched my mind for some justification for why I can't be reporting in a calm and heavily defended American city and cannot find one," Williams said yesterday. "I don't like being told when I can and cannot walk on the streets and take pictures."

But he grumbled and told his crew to stop shooting Wednesday, Williams said, because "authority in New Orleans is as good as the last person to make the rule. I didn't have time to take it up the chain."

As rescue and recovery efforts continue in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, reporters and press analysts are growing increasingly critical of restrictions on media access. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, under heavy journalistic fire for its slow response to the disaster, has sparked new criticism by asking news organizations not to take pictures of bodies being recovered in Louisiana and Mississippi.

FEMA spokesman Mark Pfeifle said yesterday that the agency "has asked that those images not be shown," but that this is only a request. "Our main desire is to avoid unfortunate situations where a family member waiting for news of a loved one would find out about their passing from a newspaper or watching television," he said.

Some Louisiana officials, whether taking their cue from FEMA or not, are attempting to make the policy mandatory. Washington Post reporter Timothy Dwyer said he heard a sergeant from a state agency telling a camera crew allowed on a boat in a flooded area near downtown New Orleans: "If we catch you photographing one body, we're going to bring you back in and throw you off the boat."

The irony, Dwyer said, was that two bodies -- one in a black bag, the other covered by a blue quilt -- were visible on the off-ramp of Interstate 10 that the boats were using as a staging area.

Television networks have continued to show some bodies, as they have since the hurricane struck, but often covered or in body bags, so identification is not an issue.

There have been other moments of tension. At a fire near the French Quarter, Williams noted in a posting on NBC's Web site, a police officer from out of town "raised the muzzle of her weapon and aimed it at members of the media . . . obvious members of the media . . . armed only with notepads." He also noted that the National Guard is barring journalists from the city's convention center and Superdome, the very facilities that evacuees were barred from leaving last week.

"I saw many fingers on triggers," Williams said yesterday, producing such a sense of being in a foreign land that he repeatedly caught himself saying, "When I get back to the States."

Aly Colon, who teaches ethics at the Poynter Institute for Media Studies, said that while journalists should not interfere with rescue work, "at a time like this, the more opportunity the news media has to tell the story the better. People are hungry for information that helps them know as independently as possible what's going on."

Alex Jones, who runs the Shorenstein media center at Harvard, said that while news outlets should not show the deceased until relatives are notified, reports of limited access are "very disturbing":

"There's a reasonable belief that part of the wish to restrict access is rooted in image and public relations. The history of this administration has been very intensely to control the information and control the message. They did that in Iraq and during the Afghanistan war."

The Pentagon had barred photographs of flag-draped caskets returning from Iraq, but after releasing some under Freedom of Information Act requests, agreed last month to quickly release more in settling a lawsuit by University of Delaware professor and former CNN correspondent Ralph Begleiter.

"You cannot report on the disaster and give the public a realistic idea of how horrible it is if you don't see that there are bodies as well," Rebecca Daugherty of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press told Editor & Publisher.

Pfeifle said FEMA has barred reporters and photographers from some rescue and patrol boats, but on a case-by-case basis. "We have had to make decisions that we don't take press along because it takes up room that could be occupied by disaster workers or someone being rescued," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003936

State and local authorities have often blocked journalists from entering shelters, although interviews with evacuees often take place outside them. Pfeifle defended the approach on privacy grounds, saying, "This is their home."

Some Urge Greater Use Of Troops In Major Disasters (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The breakdown of local and state agencies that tried to respond to Hurricane Katrina has spurred fresh debate about whether disasters of such magnitude ought to be turned over to the U.S. military and other federal authorities to manage at the outset.

National plans developed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks rest on the notion that police, fire and other emergency groups are best positioned to serve as first responders. Federal agencies are supposed to function as backup to state and local ones, and military forces are meant to play a largely supporting role to civilian authorities.

But Katrina showed what can happen when the foundation of this organizational structure is quickly overwhelmed and disintegrates, according to government officials and independent analysts.

"The would-be first responders at the state and local level were themselves victims in very large numbers," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said at a news conference this week. As a result, "we had a situation that was distinctly different than in past events of this type."

Rumsfeld and other senior administration officials this week have resisted entering a public discussion of alternative approaches, insisting that the focus for now stay on cleaning up after Katrina. President Bush and congressional leaders have promised investigations into what went wrong in the response to the hurricane's devastation.

But Rumsfeld said the government would likely address again the question of "lead responsibility" for the Defense Department in disaster response. He noted that the issue was critical not only in responding to a natural catastrophe but also to a terrorist attack, because reliance on local authorities has been the basis of emergency planning in both cases.

Some homeland defense specialists have argued since Katrina struck that national plans must be revised to provide for a bigger and faster federalized effort, particularly in large-scale disasters.

"Only the federal government can mobilize a national response to catastrophic disasters," said James Carafano of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "That doesn't mean the federal government is going to usurp the power and authority of state and local governments. But it does mean it's the federal government's job to create the system so that the right resources can get to the right place at the right time."

There is no guarantee that a greater federal role would improve response. Both the Pentagon and the Federal Emergency Management Agency have been widely faulted for not grasping quickly enough the scope of Katrina's damage and not committing sufficient people, supplies and equipment early on.

Historically, practical as well as legal considerations have favored relying on leadership at the grass-roots level.

"The police and fire departments and local emergency-service people are, by definition, the first ones on the scene," said H.K. Park, a former defense official who worked on homeland security issues during the Clinton administration. "And they have the advantage of knowing their communities.

"There's also a legal dimension," he added, "involving states' rights versus federal rights."

Further, military forces remain constrained from a domestic law enforcement role by the 1878 Posse Comitatus Act. Though the Pentagon has committed more than 8,000 active-duty Army and Marine troops and about 10,000 sailors, it has made it clear that these forces will not perform police functions.

National Guard troops, now numbering more than 46,000, constitute a far larger share of the military presence in the disaster area. They bring two main advantages. First, they possess medical, engineering, communication and logistical skills required in relief work. Second, Guard units, when operating under the command of state governors, are not limited by Posse Comitatus.

DOJ_NMG_0003937

Any move to assign greater responsibility to the Pentagon for domestic emergency management is likely to face resistance, particularly since the armed forces are already strained by the conflict in Iraq. Commanders remain sensitive to the notion of U.S. troops becoming an occupying force in their own country.

When Guard forces arrived in New Orleans late last week, Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, who is overseeing military operations in the region, ordered them to point their rifles down to reinforce the message they had come to provide assistance, not occupy the city.

Politically, too, the idea of an enhanced federal role may be a hard sell to some local and state officials if it means diminishing their authority. Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco resisted a Bush administration effort last week to exert federal control over all local police and state National Guard units.

Some experts also contend that an attempt to federalize a relief effort could backfire, resulting in less flexibility rather than more.

"You don't want to federalize the Guard," Park warned. "When Guard forces are controlled by the governor, they can engage in law enforcement duties. When federalized, they are subject to Posse Comitatus."

But Carafano and others argue that major disasters require a different approach, with only the federal government able to provide the resources and coordination necessary to manage a catastrophic event.

The problem, Carafano said, is that officials at all levels of government have appeared more inclined to focus on preparing for smaller disasters. As a result, much of the increased funding for emergency-response activities in recent years has gone toward equipment useful to local agencies, such as new fire trucks or protective fencing, that are of little value when overwhelming disasters strike.

"The money should have gone towards the things that enable local and state authorities to plug into a national system -- things like communications, emergency operations centers, training," he said. "All of these would have enabled the mayor of New Orleans to better communicate his needs."

Who Should Call The Cavalry If Katrina Calls? (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

"When you fly over the Gulf, it looks like a WMD exploded," Assistant Secretary of Defense Paul McHale told me this week. "Katrina very nearly approached the operational requirements of a WMD event; this was the first test of the high-end capability envisioned by the strategy."

The "strategy" is a three-month-old document called "Strategy for Homeland Defense and Civil Support." It describes the Defense Department's plans to defend the U.S. from a WMD attack or deal with the rubble and mass casualties of such an attack. Traditionally DoD has always helped civil authorities contend with the ruin of natural disasters. That Katrina's massive scale mirrored a WMD attack, obliterating a city, is a coincidence. But it raises the question of whether the states, or relatively vulnerable states like Louisiana, are up to the job of being "first responders" to a WMD attack or its natural equivalent. If they are not, we need to change some laws.

The popular impression left the past week -- that the government was wholly unprepared for Katrina -- is not true. Significant U.S. military assistance was on alert throughout the week prior to Katrina's landfall. Why those highly trained and drilled assets did not move into New Orleans sooner is a question that should now sit at the center of a debate over who should have the authority -- the states or the federal government -- to be the "first mover."

According to accounts provided by several sources involved with preparations for Katrina, the Pentagon began tracking the storm when it was still just a number in the ocean on Aug. 23, some five days before landfall in Buras, La. As the storm approached, senior Pentagon officials told staff to conduct an inventory of resources available should it grow into a severe hurricane. Their template for these plans was the assistance DoD provided Florida last year for its four hurricanes.

And a week earlier than this, Defense Secretary Rumsfeld issued an executive order delegating hurricane decision authority to the head of the Northern Command, Adm. Timothy J. Keating. Four days later, as the tropical storm soon to be named Katrina gathered force, Adm. Keating acted on that order.

DOJ_NMG_0003938

Before the hurricane arrived in New Orleans, Adm. Keating approved the use of the bases in Meridien, Miss., and Barksdale, La., to position emergency meals and some medical equipment; eventually the number of emergency-use bases grew to six. And before landfall, Adm. Keating sent military officers to Mississippi and Louisiana to set up traditional coordination with their counterparts from FEMA. As well, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England ordered the movement of ships into the Gulf.

By the Pentagon's account, it carried out these preparations without any formal Katrina-related request from FEMA or other authorities. The personnel behind the massive military effort now on display in Louisiana -- airlift evacuation, medical, supply, and the National Guard -- was on alert a week before the hurricane. According to Assistant Secretary McHale, "The U.S. military has never deployed a larger, better-resourced civil support capability so rapidly in the history of our country."

So where were they on the two days of globally televised horror? Why, for instance, didn't DoD fly all this help close to New Orleans as soon as it saw Katrina coming? The answer, in military argot, is that you don't deploy troops beneath a bombing run; Katrina predictably would have wiped out any help put in her uncertain path, just as she rolled over the Big Easy's wholly unprotected "first responders."

Then there's American history, tradition and law. Once disaster arrives, several federal laws designed to protect state sovereignty from being swept aside by a Latin-American-style national police force dictate that a state's officials, specifically the governor, is supposed to phone the federal government and describe what they need. If asked by Homeland Security, DoD will send in the cavalry. But this is one audible at the line even Don Rumsfeld doesn't get to call.

Post-mortem investigations will surely recreate, minute by minute, how Louisiana Gov. Blanco and Homeland Security Chief Chertoff idled away their time last week. But it appears now that Gov. Blanco did not make that crucial, early, legally mandated call to the President. Absent that, FOX and CNN became the call to the White House. The media message was "do something!" In fact, the president does have "do-something" authority. It's called the Insurrection Act, which is what John Kennedy used in 1963 against Gov. George Wallace, ordering the governor's own National Guard to turn against him and forcibly integrate the University of Alabama. As to the looters, who were breaking no evident federal law, the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878 explicitly forbids using the military (unless a governor uses her National Guard under "state status") in a domestic police function.

The question raised by the Katrina fiasco -- and by the Pentagon's new Homeland Defense Strategy to protect against WMD attack -- is whether the threat from madmen and nature is now sufficiently huge in its potential horror and unacceptable loss that we should modify existing jurisdictional authority to give the Pentagon functional first-responder status. Should we repeal or modify the Posse Comitatus Act so homicidal thugs have more to fear than the Keystone Kops? Should a governor be able to phone the Defense Secretary direct, creating a kind of "yellow-light authority" and cutting out the Homeland Security or FEMA middleman? Should presidential initiative extend beyond the Insurrection Act?

Instinct says the answer is forever no. Survival suggests we had better talk about it.

A Native Son Takes Charge In Gulf Coast (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

CAMP SHELBY, MISS. - He's known for his searing one-liners; a relentless schedule that allows only two hours of sleep a night; and a growly, commanding presence. He's also in charge of the military's response to hurricane Katrina. If that superstorm now rivals the 9/11 terror attacks on the scale of national disasters, then First Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honoré has emerged as the Rudy Giuliani of the Gulf Coast.

A rough-talking Louisiana native, he is credited with changing the character of the relief effort from a mad scramble to an increasingly orderly and effective rescue and restoration. But General Honoré is also having to navigate a fine line between necessary leadership and the specter of federal troops using force against American citizens. So far, he appears to have succeeded.

"This is a particularly urgent situation and it looks like the military is the only thing that's functioned in this entire mess," says Michael Greve, an expert at the American Enterprise Institute, a Washington, D.C., think tank. "Once they arrived, things turned around."

DOJ_NMG_0003939

In fact, a SurveyUSA poll of 1,200 Americans this week voted General Honoré as the most effective leader of the relief operation, ahead of Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and, at the bottom of the list, Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).

Running on a couple of hours' sleep a night, Honoré brings an unbridled passion to his job, challenging subordinates to keep up, his aides say. "The name fits: If he's not Honoré, he's ornery," says one volunteer.

"He's less a man than a force of nature," says his battle captain, Maj. John Rogers. "He knows the way and that's why he's leading. If you wonder whether God has a role in this relief effort, General Honoré is proof: He's the right man for the job."

The general himself talks of Katrina - which caused potentially thousands of fatalities, displaced an estimated 1 million people, and wrecked at least 140,000 homes - as an enemy. "It was a classic military attack," he says here at Camp Shelby, the US Northern Command forward headquarters in the Katrina effort. "He destroyed communications and moved barges across roads. He created shock and paralysis."

Currently, the Department of Homeland Security, through FEMA, is running the operation, and the Army gets its orders from DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff. But it's the Humvees, five-ton trucks, and the spirit of the leader that are changing attitudes on the ground, and are largely responsible for bringing a sliver of hope to the shell-shocked victims of Katrina - and bolstering weary relief workers. Willing to get into even the dirtiest task, the general has, by force of personality, changed the pace of the operation as he zips by helicopter from New Orleans to Biloxi, from Gulfport to the canteen of the USS Iwo Jima tied up to the New Orleans docks. His energy is infectious. "There's hope in his message," says Lt. Col. John Cornelio.

As head of the First Army, the job fell to him. Before heading up First Army, the 34-year infantryman had done everything from commanding troops in Korea to developing readiness plans for improvised explosive devices in Iraq. The fact that he's a black Cajun, one of 11 children from Lakeland, La., hasn't hurt his efforts in dealing with the large numbers of blacks along the Gulf Coast. His daughter, out of town during the storm, and extended family live in and around New Orleans.

The general has become the man everybody wants to talk to, from Ted Koppel to Defense Secretary Rumsfeld. On Thursday morning, Sen. Trent Lott managed to secure a piece of his time for a quick debrief. But his aides say Honoré isn't immune to exhaustion, and they spend much of their time protecting him. "He can snap in a minute," one aide explained.

A man of a thousand one-liners, Honoré has told soldiers to keep their guns down: "This isn't Iraq." Aides-de-camp says he knows how to cut through the thickets of famously murky Louisiana politics. At a recent staff meeting here at Camp Shelby, he growled, "We're not stuck on stupid." It became the saying of the day, written on a bulletin board.

Sometimes the comments sting, and more than one National Guardsman - especially the men who weathered the storm with the masses in the chaotic Superdome - has bristled at his commands and wondered about the source of his authority. But most soldiers - and, in turn, the vast numbers of volunteers and rescuers - seem invigorated by his drive.

"Soldiers like to see leaders who are more 'Do as I do' than 'Do as I say,' " says Staff Sgt. Sharon McBride, who is bivouacked at Camp Shelby. "During a time like this, everybody is looking for someone who has that authority."

Still, some experts say the potential for a backlash against troops can happen if the demands of the natural disaster recede and restlessness or lawlessness rise.

The presence of an active-duty three-star general overseeing 18,000 troops inside the United States in a pocket of scattered unrest is a test of posse comitatus, or "power of the county." Congress enacted the idea after the Civil War at the behest of Southern senators to end the occupation of the South by the US Army.

"There are things that can happen that would become a real ugly picture," says Craig Trebilcock, a York, Pa., lawyer and judge advocate general in the Army Reserve. "It's a real tightrope act."

So far, Honoré has walked it, declining this week to forcibly remove the 10,000 people still in New Orleans. "That is not something for federal troops," he says. "We're doing what we can today and tomorrow to help people and save lives."

Storm Leaves Legal System A Shambles (NYT)

By Peter Applebome And Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003940

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 8 - At Rapides Parish Detention Center 3 in Alexandria, which normally holds convicted felons, there are now 200 new inmates who arrived hot, hungry and exhausted on buses this week after being evacuated from flooded jails in New Orleans.

They have no paperwork indicating whether they are charged with having too much to drink or attempted murder. There is no judge to hear their cases, no courthouse designated to hear them in and no lawyer to represent them. If lawyers can be found, there is no mechanism for paying them. The prisoners have had no contact with their families for days and do not know whether they are alive or dead, if their homes do or do not exist.

"It's like taking a jail and shaking it up in a fruit-basket turnover, so no one has any idea who these people are or why they're here," said Phyllis Mann, one of several local lawyers who were at the detention center until 11 p.m. Wednesday, trying to collect basic information on the inmates. "There is no system of any kind for taking care of these people at this point."

Along with the destruction of homes, neighborhoods and lives, Hurricane Katrina decimated the legal system of the New Orleans region.

More than a third of the state's lawyers have lost their offices, some for good. Most computer records will be saved. Many other records will be lost forever. Some local courthouses have been flooded, imperiling a vast universe of files, records and documents. Court proceedings from divorces to murder trials, to corporate litigation, to custody cases will be indefinitely halted and when proceedings resume lawyers will face prodigious - if not insurmountable - obstacles in finding witnesses and principals and in recovering evidence.

It is an implosion of the legal network not seen since disasters like the Chicago fire of 1871 or the San Francisco earthquake of 1906, events in times so much simpler as to be useless in making much sense of this one.

"There aren't too many catastrophes that have just wiped out entire cities," said Robert Gordon, a professor at Yale Law School who teaches legal history.

The effects on individual lawyers vary, from large firms that have already been able to find space, contact clients and resume working on cases, to individual lawyers who fear they may never be able to put their practices back together. But the storm has left even prominent lawyers wondering whether they will have anything to go back to.

William Rittenberg, former president of the Louisiana Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and a lawyer for 35 years in New Orleans, said he had spent the time since the storm living like a gypsy with his wife and two dogs, moving from Columbus, Miss., to Houston to San Antonio. Mr. Rittenberg said that his firm's main client had been the teachers union for the New Orleans schools, but that there is no way to know when or if school will resume this year.

"I really don't know if I have a law practice anymore," he said.

Some logistical issues are being addressed as the courts scramble to find new places to set up shop. The Louisiana Supreme Court is moving its operations from New Orleans to a circuit court in Baton Rouge. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit is moving to Houston, and electronic technology has allowed lawyers and courts to save files and documents in a way that would have been impossible in the past.

But the biggest immediate problem is with criminal courts in southern Louisiana, with thousands of detainees awaiting hearings and trials who have been thrust into a legal limbo without courts, trials, or lawyers.

So in Alexandria, a city in central Louisiana, in a scene repeated at prisons and jails throughout the state, Ms. Mann said she and other lawyers had interviewed all 200 inmates, and the criminal defense lawyers' organization was painstakingly trying to compile a registry of prisoners and lawyers. The goal is to put them together, though many of the prisoners do not yet have lawyers and many of the lawyers are scattered across the country.

Ms. Mann said that some prisoners, no doubt, were accused of serious crimes, but that most had been arrested on misdemeanor charges like drunkenness that typically fill local lockups. Most were either awaiting hearings or had not been able to make bond and were awaiting trial, which, for many, had been set for the day the hurricane hit.

"I talked to one guy who was arrested for reading a tarot card without a permit," she said. "These are mostly poor people. They haven't been in contact with their family. They have no word at all. A lot of them are pretty devastated. You had a lot of grown men breaking down and boohooing when you talked to them. The warden said they hadn't had food or water for two or three days. So a lot of them were just grateful to be out of the sun, in an air-conditioned place where they could find food and a shower and a mattress."

DOJ_NMG_0003941

In addition to the logistical problems of setting up courts, finding a place to meet, and getting judges, lawyers and evidence, a major question looms about how to pay for the defense of indigent detainees. Louisiana has been in a low-grade crisis for years over the issue, and currently two-thirds of the money to defend those too poor to afford lawyers comes from court costs for traffic and parking offenses.

But with the evacuation of New Orleans and its environs, none of that money will be available.

Legal officials say that without a quick resolution of the problem the state may be forced to apportion cases to public defenders on a level that makes adequate representation impossible or to free prisoners rather than violate their constitutional right to a speedy trial.

More than a week after the storm, not all the news is bad. Some law firms, particularly larger ones with offices outside New Orleans, have reorganized with remarkable speed, saving records electronically, finding new space and housing for lawyers in Baton Rouge Lafayette, Houston, or other areas.

Lawyers at McGlinchey Stafford, a firm of about 200 lawyers based in New Orleans and with offices in Baton Rouge and other cities, were among the lucky ones. The lawyers, support staff and their families left New Orleans in advance of the storm as partners in its Baton Rouge office worked to find them housing and office space, said Rudy Aguilar, managing partner of the firm.

After the storm, Mr. Aguilar said, the firm put two college students whose parents worked for the firm on a plane to Chicago to buy computers for the new office space. The students rented a truck and drove the computers back to Baton Rouge for the new office, which by Labor Day was up and running, he said.

Within days, Rick Stanley of Stanley, Flanagan & Reuter, an 11-lawyer litigation firm had people working in borrowed space in offices in Baton Rouge and Lafayette and at homes in Jackson, Miss., and Amarillo, Tex. On Labor Day, Mr. Stanley signed a lease for new space in Baton Rouge on the hood of his car in a Home Depot parking lot.

"The Monday of the storm," he said, "I was in a state of shock, realizing the whole way of life we knew had passed away, and Tuesday I just said we need to get back up and running, and we did."

And some say, with the perverse logic of the law, Hurricane Katrina - months from now, when people return home - will spawn an unimaginable flood of legal issues. Beth Abramson who is organizing pro bono efforts for the state bar anticipates a torrent of legal issues having to do with ruined property, insurance, environmental issues and countless other concerns.

Michelle Ghetti, a law professor at the Southern University Law Center in Baton Rouge said some courts and lawyers moved faster than she could have imagined to shift operations and resume business. On the other hand, the legal issues posed by the storm multiply almost daily.

"Someone just mentioned child molesters," Ms. Ghetti said. "There's a registry in which people are supposed to be notified where they are. But for all we know, they're in shelters or being taken into people's homes.

"New things come up every day. I think this storm is going to produce more legal issues and complications than anyone has ever imagined."

Louisiana Legal System Is Snarled (WSJ)

By Thomas M. Burton

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Hurricane damage has cast the Louisiana legal system into disarray, with courts and cases suspended or relocated, criminal and civil evidence imperiled or destroyed, and lawyers relocated around the U.S. desperately seeking work.

The extent of the destroyed evidence and lawsuit files remains uncertain, as several courts remain inaccessible or under water. But because of the damage, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco this week issued an order suspending all state civil-court deadlines, such as statutes of limitations dictating when cases must be filed, at least through Sept. 25.

Many civil and criminal trial courts have suspended operations in the parishes, or counties, in the New Orleans area. The federal district court in New Orleans says it is "closed until further notice" and that it hopes to reopen in three locations -- Houma,

DOJ_NMG_0003942

Baton Rouge and Lafayette, La. The Louisiana Supreme Court has moved to Baton Rouge, and the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has shifted temporarily to Houston.

"There could be damage to the court records or filings, but we just don't know," said Robert E. Kleinpeter, president of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association, referring to several New Orleans-area courts.

Michelle Ghetti, a law professor at Southern University Law Center in Baton Rouge, said that various Louisiana prosecutors met via conference call Thursday in part to discuss the extent of damage to criminal-case evidence. In an email to law colleagues, Prof. Ghetti recently wrote that courts "in as many as eight parishes/counties are under water, as well as three of our circuit courts, with evidence/files at each of them ruined."

As for criminal courts, most law-enforcement authorities have been preoccupied with maintaining the peace as much as they can, and haven't had a chance to focus on courts or evidence. The damage to records and briefs at many law firms is expected to be immense. Tom Alexander of CLC Inc., a legal-referral company, said, "There are a lot of large law firms that are not going to be able to recover their files."

Katrina Leaves Louisiana Criminal Justice System In Disarray (KRT)

By Brad Townsend And Lee Hancock, Dallas Morning News

Knight Ridder, September 9, 2005

DALLAS - (KRT) - Hurricane Katrina has turned Louisiana's legal system upside down.

The Louisiana Supreme Court building was flooded and many critical files and evidence boxes are presumably destroyed. City and district court buildings in neighboring parishes have been similarly hit.

Lawyers and judges alike are scrambling to answer previously unimaginable questions: What will happen to pending cases? What about the out-on-bail defendants, witnesses and even law-enforcement officials who are among the several hundred thousand evacuees sprinkled throughout the country, many in Texas?

Judge Patrick Higginbotham said his formerly New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals will be back in business in Houston by next week.

But Katrina's devastating aftermath will be "enormously disruptive" for the Gulf Coast region's state and local courts, he said.

"I don't think the tasks we face are nearly as difficult as those in the state courts in the Gulf Coast region," the Austin, Texas-based Higginbotham said.

Louisiana State University law professor John Baker said the disruption is a "lesson about what many of us take for granted, of what it takes to function every day, of what it takes to keep a society together."

Baker had just returned from a class now brimming with displaced students from New Orleans-based Tulane and Loyola universities. Everyone, he said, left the room shaking their heads.

"It's not just the evidence, it's the witnesses," he said. "Where are the witnesses? Where are the defendants? How are you going to catch them?"

The day after Katrina hit, the Louisiana Supreme Court issued an emergency order, freezing deadlines and court proceedings through at least Sept. 9. On Tuesday, Gov. Kathleen Blanco, in response to requests from the state bar and other lawyers groups, suspended all court proceedings statewide though Sept. 25.

"The destruction and disruption of services and infrastructure to our system of justice caused by Hurricane Katrina will have a profound impact on the basic rights to an untold number of persons unless action is taken," the governor's order stated.

Federal courts for the entire Southeastern region of the state issued a similar order, with no set date for reopening.

"The entire federal infrastructure has been displaced throughout the region," said one federal law enforcement supervisor, who agreed to speak on condition of anonymity. "The courts have closed down."

The FBI office in New Orleans had wind and water damage that soaked case files and other key records, federal courts were shuttered with the evacuation and all federal law enforcement operations had to move agents and operations to Baton Rouge, Shreveport and other offices across Louisiana.

Another daunting issue is trying to track people still being monitored by the criminal justice system who have been dislocated by the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0003943

"Where are the bad guys?" said the federal law enforcement supervisor. "And out of these millions of evacuees, I'm sure there are a number of them who are on parole, probation or are sex offenders who are now in the great state of Texas. What do you do about that?"

Lawyers have scrambled to recreate files, find a place to work, and help clients with problems as basic as trying to determine whether their property was still standing.

On Wednesday, New Orleans lawyer Jeff Dye brought out two pirogues, boats similar to canoes, to take three doctor clients through their flooded neighborhood in the Garden District.

Dye said he stayed in the city to deal with pending legal business. Because he has a home office and his phone worked after the storm, he was able to resume his practice.

He and others said some law firms have bought and begun shipping computers to lawyers around the country, "developing virtual offices." The state bar and other legal organizations are mobilizing volunteers to help disaster victims deal with bureaucracy and get the legal system back on track.

But Dye and others say at least one firm has had to let employees go, and another has begun downsizing its permanent staff because of income disruptions.

Still, not all of the news is dire. Higginbotham said the 5th Circuit's plan is to "reopen" next week in Houston and move to a suburb of Baton Rouge within 60-90 days.

At least one news report stated that most of 5th Circuit's files were in the New Orleans building's basement, which was flooded. But Higginbotham said it is his understanding that files were not in the basement, and that the building sustained "some seepage," but no major damage.

Outside of New Orleans, the city's dislocated lawyers began scrambling for office space wherever they had landed. Some already had offices in Baton Rouge and others quickly found space to serve as a home base for their far-flung partners.

Bob Rooth, a partner in the city's oldest firm, Chaffe McCall, said he's set up a temporary practice in a large Dallas law firm. And he's enrolled his daughter in school in Dallas and plans to stay at least through the school year.

His firm's Baton Rouge office secured space for many of the New Orleans lawyers and staff and got a caravan of cars and trucks into New Orleans earlier this week. They retrieved client files and computers from their Energy Center offices, getting through checkpoints into the city by securing passes from city officials and from clients already authorized to be in the city on emergency business.

Oil and gas litigation specialist Ralph White, who evacuated to Oxford, Miss., contacted friends in a local law firm and started working out of their law library within two days. He said he brought none of his files but was able to start reconstructing them through electronic court databases, co-counsel in other cities and opposing counsel in his civil cases.

He said other lawyers in his 55-member firm, Montgomery Barnett, are scattered across the Southeast. Though they've been unable to get back into their offices in downtown New Orleans, they've been told that their files and equipment are intact.

"I'm on top of all my files, and I'm keeping up with all my cases, but it's been challenging," he said.

Amid Barrage Of Criticism, Defending His Department (NYT)

By Jere Longman

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 8 - At 4:45 on Thursday morning, P. Edwin Compass III, superintendent of the New Orleans police, awakened a slumbering reporter at City Hall and cajoled him into an early morning trip around this devastated, increasingly deserted city.

"I've been working 21 hours a day; I have a bad back, two sprained knees, two sprained ankles, 55 stitches in my hand that haven't healed from having a cyst removed, hemorrhoids and glaucoma," Mr. Compass said. "I don't want to hear any excuses."

Wearing a back brace, he walked to a military truck and grunted up the ladder with the assistance of two National Guardsmen. But a tender lumbar region - strained in a fall from a truck several days ago - did not suppress his enthusiasm.

"Just remember," Mr. Compass, 47, said to his security detail. "You're with the chief. Nobody gets hurt."

DOJ_NMG_0003944

Since Hurricane Katrina flooded the city, Mr. Compass has been widely criticized for his inability to keep the peace as New Orleans sank into mayhem, and to sustain the morale of his officers, about 500 of whom abandoned the 1,700-member force in anger or despair.

In recent days, Mr. Compass, who has been superintendent since 2002, has returned the verbal fire with a raw, impassioned defense of his department. He pointed to those officers who stayed and helped restore order despite a shortage of manpower and ammunition, and volleys of gunshot from what he said were dozens of people trying to thwart rescue efforts.

"This is the time for men of honor, not those others," Mr. Compass said, referring to the officers who left.

While other cities may prefer a more buttoned-down, businesslike presence from their police chiefs, Mr. Compass exudes the casual, loquacious style of the Big Easy. He wants to be called Eddie, not Edwin, and he is as likely to bump fists when greeting people as to shake hands. On Wednesday, he vigorously wrestled to the ground a friend whom he thought had died in Hurricane Katrina's aftermath, and chided him for ignoring instructions to evacuate.

Responding to those who criticize his handling of the chaos, Mr. Compass said he believed that his officers did the best they could, considering that their communications system was inoperable and that the city's ammunition depot was left inaccessible beneath 10 feet of water.

"We faced the greatest challenge that any city has faced in the history of mankind," said Mr. Compass, a man who seems to regard understatement as a felony.

Some police officers, speaking on the condition of anonymity, complained Wednesday that the superintendent was largely invisible immediately after the flooding began. But others said he had maintained a strong public presence, and they praised him for supporting his officers in a department whose reputation suffered severe damage from corruption scandals in the 1990's.

"That's a cop," Sgt. George Jackson said. "He stands up for his men."

The son of a postal worker and a homemaker, Mr. Compass grew up in midtown New Orleans, attended grammar school with Mayor C. Ray Nagin and high school with Charles Parent, the city's fire superintendent. Mr. Compass said that he always wanted to be a police officer, and that in the current crisis he was relying on faith for guidance and stamina.

"We couldn't have a better policeman to deal with the pressure he's had to deal with," the Rev. Charles J. Southall III, pastor of the First Emanuel Baptist Church of New Orleans, said in a telephone interview. "But I'm concerned about his health and emotional stability. There's only so much you can give without someone giving back."

Mr. Compass said that many evacuees were so angry with him as they waited days to be rescued from the convention center that a group of them tried to grab him and take him hostage, saying, "If we get the chief, we get the buses."

While he acknowledged that murders and rapes had occurred at both the convention center and the Superdome, Mr. Compass said the mayhem at the unlighted convention center would have been worse if the police had not created a plan to capture the armed thugs who were terrorizing others. Because his officers could not risk harming innocent evacuees by returning fire in the dark, he said, they watched instead for muzzle fire and moved toward it, patting people down and yelling "gun" when they felt a weapon. Then officers converged and tackled the gunman.

"That's never been done before," Mr. Compass said. "If we hadn't extracted the weapons, many more may have died."

He defended Mayor Nagin's decision this week to issue a mandatory evacuation order. If force is required, Mr. Compass said, it will be only the minimum necessary. "We are the greatest crowd-control police in the world," he said. "We deal with Mardi Gras every year."

People must leave to allow the city to be rebuilt, and to protect themselves from disease and fires, Mr. Compass said. "When your child needs a shot, you know it's going to be painful," he said. "But if you don't get the shot, they can die."

His wife, Arlene, and children have left New Orleans, and so have 600 of the city's remaining 1,200 officers, for a few days of rest and relaxation in Las Vegas and Atlanta. Another shift will leave when the first returns. Mayor Nagin has also sought a little time off, but Mr. Compass said that he was going nowhere for the moment.

"My feet were the first ones on the battlefield," he said, "and they will be the last to leave the battlefield."

Hundreds Of Police Officers Missing In New Orleans (LAT)

By Julie Cart, Edwin Chen And Scott Gold

DOJ_NMG_0003945

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Hundreds of police officers are missing and many may be dead from Hurricane Katrina, according to a top police official, who in an interview today also said that the population of the city may sharply drop because of the storm.

Deputy Police Supt. Warren Riley said about 700 of the city's 1,600-officer force was told to stay home until the storm passed so that they would be available to be deployed wherever they were needed.

Between 400 and 500 officers remain unaccounted for and many are feared dead, though some are believed to have walked away from the job, he said.

Riley said that survivors would have likely called the department to say that they are alive or to explain their absence. He declined to speculate about how many officers may have perished: "One is too many."

"We don't know how many officers are dead," he said. "We don't know how many officers drowned. That's a fear of ours."

Riley spoke as the city continued its evacuation by trying to persuade the thousands of residents who refuse to leave their homes that the city is too dangerous for them to remain. If the stragglers insist on staying, they will be forcibly evacuated, officials said.

Vice President Dick Cheney landed this afternoon in New Orleans as part of his tour of the Gulf Coast, devastated when Katrina hit in the predawn hours of Aug. 29.

President Bush, whose popularity has been falling because of questions about the federal relief effort, briefly addressed the nation today and proclaimed Sept. 16 as a national day of prayer for the victims of Katrina.

Bush appeared on television flanked by four of his Cabinet officers, hours after Democrats in Washington stepped up their attacks on the quality of the federal response and again called for an independent commission to investigate.

No one had been forcibly removed from their homes as of noon today, Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said. Many have resisted calls to leave, but "some people just want to have someone explain to them face to face why they have to leave."

He said that officers will soon begin entering houses and removing people who won't leave. He recognized that there could be considerable tension once that starts, but he pledged to do what he could to ease any difficulties.

"We're going to be respectful," he said. "We understand it is a dramatic experience and we're going to handle it that way. We are very sensitive to the needs of our community. We are not going to be tough. We are going to be sensitive."

Officials have been emptying the city, which remains substantially flooded by waters that poured through three broken levees after Katrina landed upon the coast. In the more than 10 days since the storm began its march through the gulf, the floodwaters have become infected with large amounts of bacteria.

Hundreds of thousands of evacuees have been moved to shelters across the country, with an estimated 250,000 in Texas alone. New Orleans had a population of about 500,000, but that could decrease to 350,000 when people are allowed to return, Riley said.

There have already been reports of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people leaving out-of-state shelters, such as the Houston Astrodome, in an attempt to start new lives there.

While that could have devastating consequences for a tax base that was strained before the storm, Riley sought to find some solace.

"Some people will probably go places and live better lives," he said. "New Orleans with a smaller population may be a better city. You take away the tragic loss of life here and maybe there is a silver lining."

Fire Superintendent Charles Parent said today that three multistory buildings on the flooded campus of Dillard University, an African American college founded in 1869, were destroyed in an overnight fire.

Parent said the campus is small and he feared that the damage to the school would be substantial and lasting. But he said that because of deep-standing water, firefighters were only able to fight the blaze with helicopters and have not been able to access the site.

The buildings were destroyed in one of 11 major fires the city fought overnight, with the assistance of hundreds of firefighters who have come from other states.

In a message posted to students on its website, Dillard called itself an "institution with a rich, proud and triumphant history."

DOJ_NMG_0003946

"Our beginnings are rooted in struggle and a committed determination to overcome social, political and environmental obstacles," the statement said.

"Today, we face a formidable challenge; however, we are equally resolute in our ability to recall our collective strength. We resolve to recommit to our future with full expectation that our beloved Dillard will remain one of the nation's premier institutions of higher learning."

Dillard's campus sits amid the deep flooding in the heart of the city, north of downtown and west of the Gentilly area.

Cheney visited the aircraft carrier Iwo Jima, docked in the Mississippi River. He met with Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, just appointed as deputy to beleaguered FEMA Director Michael Brown. Cheney viewed maps and large aerial photographs of the destruction area.

"As you can see, the water is starting to recede," Allen told Cheney.

Allen said the next step is a door-to-door search of residences as evacuation of the city proceeds.

Afterward, Cheney took a ride in a Humvee to look at repairs to the levee.

Before his arrival in New Orleans, Cheney visited Gulfport, Miss. He and Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales were briefed by Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff.

After meeting with local officials, Cheney and his wife, Lynne, walked through a devastated neighborhood. He praised the first responders and pledged that the federal government would do more.

"I think the progress we're making is significant," Cheney said. "I think the performance, in general, at least in terms of the information I've received from locals, is definitely very impressive.

"That's not to say there's not an awful lot of work to be done — there is."

As Cheney toured the region, the political fallout from what has turned into the nation's worst natural disaster continued.

Democrats sharply attacked Republican plans for a congressional task force to examine the federal response and called for an independent commission. The panel was proposed Wednesday by House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) said today that she wouldn't appoint any Democrats to a panel that she called a "charade."

"I'm protesting the fact that it's not bipartisan. And we've got to work together to get this done. So let's not have a charade about what they decide is bipartisan. That's not what bipartisanship is," she said.

Pelosi and others have also said that Bush should fire Brown, but Cheney defended appointees like the FEMA director.

Cheney also backed the Republican leaders' task force, saying it was similar to the Iran-Contra committee on which he served as a congressman in the 1980s.

Criticism of the federal response has also taken a toll on Bush's poll ratings.

A survey by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found that 67% of those sampled thought Bush could have done more to speed up relief efforts, and 28% thought he had done all he could. His job approval rating dropped to 40%, with the greatest slippage occurring among Republicans and conservatives, the base of his support.

Bush took to the airwaves to explain how to apply for the previously announced program to give $2,000 in disaster assistance to families displaced by the storm. He also said the administration would continue federal benefits such as food stamps, Medicaid and unemployment payments.

He proclaimed Sept. 16 a national day of prayer for victims of Katrina.

"I ask that we pray, as Americans have always prayed in times of trial, with confidence in His purpose, with hope for a brighter future, and with the humility to ask God to keep us strong, so that we can better serve our brothers and sisters in need," the president said.

Earlier this week, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin authorized officials to forcibly remove the remaining residents, even if they didn't want to go, because the city is dangerous.

The order applies to the inundated eastern wards and the lightly damaged French Quarter and Garden District. It exempts Algiers and other communities south of the Mississippi River, known as the West Bank, which were largely spared from flooding. The mayor has said that standing water still covers 60% of New Orleans, down from 80% at its peak.

DOJ_NMG_0003947

According to Walter Boasso, a Republican state senator whose district includes the flooded St. Bernard Parish, sheriff deputies and other local officials began forcibly removing residents on Wednesday.

He said today that in at least one case a reluctant evacuee had to be restrained and tied to the bed of a pickup truck.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco has not ordered forced evacuations.

National Guard Maj. Gen. Ron Mason said today in Baton Rouge that if the order is given to forcibly remove the estimated 10,000 residents who remain in New Orleans, that task would fall to the New Orleans Police Department.

"I don't believe that you will see National Guard soldiers actually forcing people to leave," Mason said. "We think that is a police effort."

Mason said 7,000 National Guard troops in New Orleans are going house to house to assist willing evacuees. Should a forced evacuation be ordered, he said, Guard troops will drive vehicles and support the police.

"In every situation where we send National Guard soldiers, we have rules for use of force," he said. "That means these soldiers are allowed to protect themselves. That's the purpose of the weapons. The purpose of the weapons is not to be used against American citizens and force them from their homes."

Complicating the situation is that the floodwaters in New Orleans are teeming with bacteria, carrying the potential for a variety of diseases.

At least four flood victims have died of bacterial infections caused by the water in New Orleans and other hard-hit towns. They appeared to have been infected with vibrio vulnificus bacteria, a water-borne pathogen related to the bacteria that cause cholera.

The Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals announced today that 19 cases of West Nile disease had been detected.

As health authorities joined New Orleans and Louisiana officials in urging the city's estimated 10,000 holdouts to leave their homes, the House passed the Bush administration's latest request for another $51.8 billion in funding to speed help to victims of Hurricane Katrina. The Senate is expected to act soon.

Congress has already approved $10.8 billion in aid.

Ripples from the flooding, which has left as many as 1 million people homeless and untold numbers dead, continued to shake the nation's economy. The federal Labor Department said today that about 10,000 of the evacuees have filed for unemployment benefits last week.

On Wednesday, the Congressional Budget Office predicted that 400,000 jobs would be lost through the end of the year, with privately insured losses topping $30 billion.

The official death count stood at 196 bodies in the state of Mississippi and more than a dozen in other states where Katrina hit.

Juliette Saussy, director of emergency medical services in New Orleans, said today that hundreds of bodies have been removed from the city, and officials are expecting the death toll to climb.

With the increased security has come an increase in arrests. David Dugas, U.S. attorney for the middle district of Louisiana, said 223 prisoners have been processed, most coming from Jefferson Parish. They are being screened at Hunt Correctional Institute in St. Gabriel, southwest of New Orleans.

As officials struggle with how to deal with the evacuees, school officials in Orleans Parish were unsure whether any schools will open this year. Schools in Jefferson Parish are expected to open in January. In hard-hit St. Bernard Parish and Plaquemines Parish, no dates have been set for school to begin.

Gasoline tankers have become a more regular sight along the Mississippi Gulf Coast, causing lines for fuel to begin to ease. Lines that just a few days ago had stretched for several miles were cut in half. Residents outside the hardest-hit coastal towns spoke about being able to drive up to a gas station with no wait.

But as gas became easier to get and more residents who had fled the hurricane began to return, traffic on main roads throughout the Mississippi Gulf, particularly Interstate 10, has become extremely heavy.

Meanwhile, construction crews are busy repairing roads, so law enforcement officers are directing drivers through a series of detours, exacerbating the traffic snarls. There are even morning and evening rush hours — another sign of normalcy.

DOJ_NMG_0003948

Utility trucks, military vehicles and law enforcement from around the state are also clogging the roads, making commutes sometimes unbearably long.

US Watching Katrina-related Fraud (AFP)

Agence France-Presse, September 9, 2005

With billions of dollars pouring in to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, the US government has established a task force to hunt down fraud, White House spokesman Scott McClellan announced.

"Unfortunately, there are some who are intent on setting up fraudulent schemes to take advantage of the victims and the people who are trying to help those who have been affected," he told reporters.

"These are despicable acts that will not be tolerated. Those who take advantage of the situation will be pursued and will be prosecuted," said McClellan.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has created the Hurricane Katrina Task Force on Fraud "to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes including fraudulent charities, insurance fraud, identity theft and government benefit fraud," said the spokesman.

The national task force includes officials with the Justice Department's criminal division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, he said.

Katrina Victims At Risk For ID Theft, Experts Say (REU)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, September 8, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Birth certificates and other sensitive documents left among the waterlogged debris of Hurricane Katrina could put the storm's victims at heightened risk for identity theft, experts said on Thursday.

U.S. officials and consumer advocates said they had not yet heard of any cases of identity theft related to the disaster because the crime usually takes months to unfold.

But consumers should keep a close eye on their bank statements and order a copy of their credit reports once they get their lives back together to make sure they are not being victimized, they said.

"We tell people not to be alarmed but to be cautious," said Betsy Broder, an assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection.

Those who wish to contribute to relief efforts are at risk as well. Internet-security company Websense said on Sunday that it had found a "phishing" e-mail campaign that seeks to trick Internet users into providing their credit-card numbers to a Web site that looks like one run by the Red Cross.

In order to avoid such scams, donors should type the address of charitable Web sites directly into their browsers, rather than clicking on a link in the e-mail, experts said.

The FBI is investigating at least a dozen suspicious Web sites and e-mail messages for fraud, spokesman Paul Bresson said.

Similar scams emerged after the tsunami that devastated large portions of coastal Asia and Africa in December but "this is far worse," he said.

The Justice Department said on Thursday that it has set up a task force to investigate identity theft and other types of fraud related to the Katrina.

Identity theft costs U.S. consumers and businesses $50 billion annually, according to FTC estimates.

A string of computer breaches at businesses and universities has focused attention on the issue this year but those who have been uprooted by Hurricane Katrina also face risk from looters and "dumpster divers" -- those who sift through garbage looking for valuable personal information to steal -- as well.

Ruined homes and businesses are likely to contain mortgage records, Social Security cards and other documents that criminals can use to hijack an identity, said Linda Foley, co-executive director of the Identity Theft Resource Center.

"A crisis brings out the best of people and the worst of people. Unfortunately, in criminals it brings out their best skills," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0003949

Thieves also could intercept drivers' licenses and birth certificates when they are mailed to storm victims trying to get their lives back together, said Beth Givens, director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse.

"I suspect that many of the shelters are temporary facilities and do the people running them have the ability to operate a secure post office?" she said.

Mail bound for the affected areas is currently held in secure sorting facilities and will be forwarded to residents once they fill out a change-of-address form, U.S. Postal Service spokesman Bob Anderson said.

U.S. Names 5 Firms To Build Housing (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Accelerating efforts to rebuild the storm-ravaged Gulf of Mexico region, the Bush administration hired five private contractors -- including some active in rebuilding Iraq -- and took the controversial step of suspending Depression-era wage floors throughout the area.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency announced yesterday that it was awarding contracts to Bechtel National Inc. of San Francisco and Fluor Corp. of Aliso Veijo, Calif., both of which are involved in Iraq. The other companies awarded FEMA work are Shaw Group of Baton Rouge, La., Denver-based CH2M Hill, which is providing housing in Alabama, and Dewberry Technologies of Fairfax, Va., which is providing planning and reporting tools to help guide the efforts.

Later in the day, the White House said it was suspending in the disaster area so-called Davis-Bacon rules requiring prevailing wages be paid to workers on federal contracts. Republicans praised the executive order temporarily waiving the rules, which they said would fuel job growth in the hurricane region, but Democrats and their organized-labor allies accused the White House of exploiting the tragedy to accomplish a conservative goal.

The five contracts awarded yesterday are the first in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, in what is expected to be the largest and most lucrative government-funded rebuilding effort ever launched in the U.S.

Halliburton Corp.'s Kellogg, Brown & Root unit is already doing repair work at three Navy facilities in Mississippi as part of an existing contract.

Shaw Group and Kellogg, Brown & Root are clients of former FEMA director Joe Allbaugh, who has a private consulting firm in disaster relief. He resigned from FEMA in March 2003. Shaw's deal to refurbish damaged buildings and provide emergency housing could be worth as much as $100 million, the company said.

The enormous amounts of federal money beginning to pour into hard-hit areas across the Southeastern U.S. are beginning to set off a gold rush reminiscent of corporate America's efforts to profit from the reconstruction of Iraq, and many companies winning Katrina-related contracts also have multibillion-dollar contracts there. White House and congressional officials are working to finalize a new $51.8 billion aid package that would push the total amount of federal money dedicated to relief efforts to more than $62 billion.

Patti Giglio, a spokeswoman for Mr. Allbaugh, said the former FEMA director helps companies like Shaw with strategic planning but doesn't lobby FEMA or other government agencies on their behalf. She said he is traveling the region to marshal private-sector resources to support hurricane victims, not to seek work for clients. "He's down there because he feels he can help," she said. "He doesn't lobby FEMA, and he's never called FEMA."

Shaw Group's Web site encouraged would-be employees to apply for work online. "Hurricane Recovery Projects -- Apply Here!" it said, adding, "Subcontractors and craftsmen, please click here to apply for available positions."

Executives at the companies that won FEMA contracts said they had begun working on new housing for many of the hundreds of thousands of Americans displaced by the hurricane.

Officials at Bechtel and Fluor said their contracts, like Shaw's, were valued at as much as $100 million. The other two companies couldn't be reached for comment, and a FEMA spokesman didn't return calls about the value of those deals.

Fluor spokesman Lee Tashjian said the contract calls for identifying and leasing large plots of land in Louisiana that could house settlements of temporary housing, transporting trailers and prefab homes to the sites, and connecting the homes to electricity, water and sewage systems. Fluor began transporting the first 20 homes of an initial consignment of 400 units from Baton Rouge to hard-hit Slidell, La., yesterday afternoon, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003950

The government also hired Fluor to handle operations for the new Housing Area Command that is charged with overseeing public- and private-sector emergency housing issues. The organization includes FEMA, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Army Corps of Engineers, the American Red Cross and the private contractors. Its primary goal is to quickly find temporary housing for Katrina refugees, but FEMA said the Housing Area Command will also develop plans for longer-term housing initiatives.

The White House wage order, meanwhile, added fuel to the partisan tensions already raging since the storm hit. At issue are prevailing-wage requirements put into law as part of the Davis-Bacon Act of 1931, one of organized labor's biggest legislative victories.

Republicans have long hated the bill, which they say impedes the free flow of labor and adds unnecessary expense to federal projects. Shortly before leaving office in 1992, President Bush's father issued an executive order exempting hurricane-damaged parts of Florida, Louisiana and Hawaii from the Davis-Bacon regulations, a move rescinded by President Clinton. President Bush's move yesterday marked the first time his administration has suspended the rules, and was hailed by many Republican lawmakers. In a statement, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R., Colo.) said it would save "vital time and money in reconstruction efforts."

Democrats and union leaders attacked the move, with AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney saying it was "unbelievable and outrageous that the White House would lift the time-tested standard for ensuring quality work and decent living standards for taxpayer-financed reconstruction."

Bush Suspends Pay Act In Areas Hit By Storm (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

President Bush yesterday suspended application of the federal law governing workers' pay on federal contracts in the Hurricane Katrina-damaged areas of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi. The action infuriated labor leaders and their Democratic supporters in Congress, who said it will lower wages and make it harder for union contractors to win bids.

The Davis-Bacon Act, passed in 1931 during the Great Depression, sets a minimum pay scale for workers on federal contracts by requiring contractors to pay the prevailing or average pay in the region. Suspension of the act will allow contractors to pay lower wages. Many Republicans have opposed Davis-Bacon, charging that it amounts to a taxpayer subsidy to unions.

In a letter to Congress, Bush said he has the power to suspend the law because of the national emergency caused by the hurricane: "I have found that the conditions caused by Hurricane Katrina constitute a 'national emergency.' "

Bush wrote that his decision is justified because Davis-Bacon increases construction costs, and suspension "will result in greater assistance to these devastated communities and will permit the employment of thousands of additional individuals."

AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney denounced the Bush announcement as "outrageous."

"Employers are all too eager to exploit workers," he said. "This is no time to make that easier. What a double tragedy it would be to allow the destruction of Hurricane Katrina to depress living standards even further."

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, accused Bush of "using the devastation of Hurricane Katrina to cut the wages of people desperately trying to rebuild their lives and their communities."

Miller said: "In New Orleans, where a quarter of the city was poor, the prevailing wage for construction labor is about $9 per hour, according to the Department of Labor. In effect, President Bush is saying that people should be paid less than $9 an hour to rebuild their communities."

A Surgeon Caught Up In The Flooding Tells Of A Week Of Chaos, Peril And Heroism (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003951

As Hurricane Katrina wailed out of the Gulf of Mexico, Dr. Norman E. McSwain Jr., chief of trauma surgery at the New Orleans hospital known as Big Charity, relished watching what he called "water blowing sideways in big slats, like Venetian blinds," from inside his office at the adjacent Tulane University School of Medicine.

"Frankly, all my life I'd wanted to be in a hurricane," Dr. McSwain recalled in an interview. "It just goes to show how you shouldn't hope to get what you wish for."

After the storm had passed, he had time to drive over to his house on Bourbon Street and was glad to find it intact. The emergency room at Charity, a huge hospital founded for the poor in 1736, was quiet. Young surgeons joked that they would soon be busy sewing up people who had bought chain saws to clear their yards.

But within days, Dr. McSwain would become one of the hurricane's reluctant celebrities. As Charity Hospital withered around him - low on electricity, water and oxygen; its food supplies down to canned fruit cocktail; surrounded by thugs firing at rescue boats - he finally despaired of official channels and cried out to the news media: "We have been trying to call the mayor's office. We have been trying to call the governor's office. We are turning to you. Please help us."

The 68-year-old surgeon's last nights at his post would be spent sleeping in a red garbage bag, of the kind normally used to hold infectious waste, on the roof of Tulane University Hospital's parking garage, his head cradled on a pile of diapers, hiding with his staff from marauders below as security guards and a lone Marine sniper stood sentry.

What Dr. McSwain described, in telephone interviews from Nashville, where he was helping set up a center for evacuees from New Orleans, was a slow descent into chaos. The more desperate the situation became, he said, the harder it was to reach anyone in authority.

Despite the historical threat of flooding in New Orleans, he said, there was never a plan to evacuate Charity, the nation's oldest continuously operated hospital.

Nor at first did he expect one.

"Medical people don't evacuate," he said. "They stay and take care of people who weren't smart enough to leave."

In addition, he said, minor flooding in New Orleans is common.

"I've waded through waist-deep water several times," he said. "It's no big deal. The pumps take it out. People who live in low-lying areas have to put new carpet down every few years, but they get used to it."

By Tuesday of last week, however, even with the floodwaters eight feet deep, the hospital's generators running out of diesel and shots ringing out in darkened streets, it became clear that no plan was being formed.

"Nobody was in charge," he said. "I guarantee you that. I'd call the governor's office, and either they didn't answer the telephone or I'd talk to lower functionaries, and they'd say: 'The governor's too busy to talk. We'll relay the message.' "

Making matters worse, he said, someone from the state health department announced that Charity had already been emptied, when in fact 250 patients and 1,000 staff members were inside.

He was finally able to appeal to HCA, the company that runs Tulane University Hospital, across the street. HCA had hired 20 medical evacuation helicopters, which were landing on the Tulane hospital's parking garage.

"They said, 'We're not going to leave you down there,' " Dr. McSwain said of company executives. "I have nothing but praise for them."

For the next three days, beginning with the 12th-floor intensive care unit, the staff carried Charity patients down the stairs to flat-bottomed boats steered by state fish and wildlife agents. The boats were met at the Tulane garage, 150 yards away, by a truck, running on gas siphoned from parked cars, that took the patients to the garage's seventh-floor roof to be picked up by the helicopters.

"One cardiac patient was on a pump that weighed 500 pounds and had two feet of tubing," Dr. McSwain said. "We had to carry him down five flights without separating them by two feet. In the dark."

But at one point Tulane University Hospital ran out of oxygen, he said, so Charity was told not to send additional patients there until more of it could be flown in. Oily water sloshed along corridors. Confused patients languished in hallways.

The danger kept increasing, he said. A fish and wildlife sergeant stopped the boat-to-truck shuttle, calling back boats with babies aboard, after one of his men had been shot by a would-be hijacker. At a hotel across the street filled with refugees, "drug lords took command and made people buy their way in and out," Dr. McSwain said, adding that "one of our personnel who had family there was shot at twice."

DOJ_NMG_0003952

Phones stopped working. The only news from outside came from battery-powered radios. A staff member whose BlackBerry still had a signal sent out appeals for the National Guard.

On Wednesday night, two days after the hurricane swept ashore, "a helicopter came in, and this lone guy dropped out with an M-16 and said he was a Marine sniper and he'd been sent to protect Charity," Dr. McSwain recalled.

"It was really comforting to have a guy like that who was trained and had been in Iraq three times and would shoot somebody if he had to," the doctor said. "It made us feel good."

The marine stayed on Charity's roof for 12 hours, then moved to the Tulane garage parapet as the hospitals emptied and the staff retreated to the top two floors of the parking structure, barricading its stairs and ramps against looters roaming the five lower floors. Neither the marine nor the 38 hospital guards keeping watch in shifts shot anyone, "as far as I know," Dr. McSwain said.

By Thursday morning, he said, he had reached a friend with press contacts who got him in touch with reporters for The Associated Press and USA Today, to whom he made his plea for help.

The next day, with some of Charity's staff and patients remaining, he got on the last helicopter carrying out members of Tulane's staff, having decided that he could do more good by raising the alarm on the outside. By that evening, the military was rolling through the streets, and the last of the patients were out.

His house may have been looted, he said, but he is too busy to go see, recruiting paramedics for evacuee centers and trying to find new hospitals for his residents.

"I'm not interested in repeating those five days," he said. "But there were good parts and bad parts."

Even making do with his makeshift bed on the garage roof had its moments, he said, as when he saw the Milky Way above a lightless city.

"It was all awesome," Dr. McSwain said. "Awesome fantastic, awesome sad, awesome beautiful. When I was flying over Lake Pontchartrain in that helicopter, I got teary. 'My life has changed,' I thought. 'It'll never be the same.' "

HUD, VA Offer Homes For Some Katrina Victims (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, September 9, 2005

The U.S. government is making some, but not all, of the thousands of homes it owns in Southern states available to displaced victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development has taken all its homes in stricken states off the market to consider which ones can house evacuees. It has identified 1,380 homes in seven states as livable and plans to move people into them, spokesman Lemar Wooley says.

But the Department of Veterans Affairs continues to sell its homes. In some cases, wealthier Katrina evacuees are buying them.

“If there's a need for additional housing, VA houses will be taken off the market immediately. We are ready to move,” says VA spokesman Scott Hogenson. He says the VA is coordinating its efforts with HUD and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The VA owns about 5,000 homes nationwide, 2,000 of which are in Southern states most affected by Katrina. It acquires them after veterans default on VA-backed loans and banks foreclose the properties. The VA then pays off the mortgages and takes ownership.

Hogenson says the VA is assessing the livability of its homes.

Real estate agents say Katrina destroyed some homes while others were in need of repair even before the storm. Still, they say, many VA properties are habitable.

In Baton Rouge, agent Toby Babich has five VA listings, all sought after by Katrina evacuees.

DOJ_NMG_0003953

"The real estate market is amazing here at this point," he says. He has at least three contracts for one four-bedroom VA home listed at $129,900. "We're selling them to people who need homes."

Agents in other areas say they've received calls, though fewer, from people displaced by Katrina. "People who have the means are buying homes," says agent Laura Lei Bodin. She has a VA listing in Bogalusa, La., which was hit hard by Katrina. She says many people want rentals, but those are not as readily available in some areas.

Hamed Rauf, a Houston agent, says he's been approached by Katrina survivors, but his two VA properties need repairs. He says the U.S. government can use the money raised from selling its homes to help less-fortunate evacuees.

"There are two sides to this," he says. "The government will be paying one way or the other."

Yet Bob Watkins, an agent in Birmingham, Ala., says the VA homes could help needy evacuees. He has two listings in great shape, one for about $140,000 and another for about $200,000.

Watkins, who also sells about 150 HUD homes each year, says most of the HUD listings he receives are not immediately livable. "You can't put a poor person in a house needing repairs."

HUD says it owns, through loan foreclosures, 2,562 homes in Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas. Wooley, the agency's spokesman, says FEMA has yet to identify which families will move in to those considered habitable.

Airlift Of Evacuees To Northeast Is Under Way (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

Victims seeking refuge in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina were airlifted to the Northeast yesterday, arriving at Cape Cod, where they will be temporarily housed in a rejuvenated barracks at the Otis Air National Guard Base.

The trickle of arrivals - 107 people moved out of homes or plucked off rooftops and off highways in recent days, and flown to Massachusetts by the Federal Emergency Management Agency - marked the first official evacuation to New England of victims of Hurricane Katrina.

But thousands of beds in shelters, barracks and apartments have been prepared by state and local governments in the region, awaiting an influx of families from the South that has been slow to come.

Connecticut has offered to make room for 1,500 evacuees, 400 of whom would probably be expected to go to New Haven. On Monday, that city's mayor offered to take in 100 families and moved quickly to transform a cavernous $25 million athletic site from an indoor track into a welcome center, complete with cots and fresh bedding. He also offered those newcomers first priority for vacant public housing apartments.

New York State has offered to accept 5,000 evacuees, a fifth of whom could end up in New York City. Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester, Onondaga, Monroe and Erie counties have each offered to accept 150 people, state and county officials said. Rhode Island promised to house 500 evacuees at a Navy base, and Massachusetts made room for 2,500 people at the National Guard base on Cape Cod.

By midafternoon yesterday, the first inbound plane containing 107 people, including at least two infants and six dogs, touched down in the region, according to Julie Teer, a spokeswoman for Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Ms. Teer said her office understood that the passengers had arrived directly from New Orleans, where they were recently rescued or forced to evacuate homes.

Until now, the Northeast had seen only a small number of evacuees, mostly stragglers who had managed to make their way up North on their own, in most cases seeking relatives or friends.

Though state officials had announced and made extensive efforts to accommodate thousands more, Federal Emergency Management Agency officials warned state officials on Tuesday that the beds were not likely to fill up soon.

An e-mail message sent by FEMA to the office of Connecticut's governor, M. Jodi Rell, said those hurricane victims who had already taken refuge in Texas were unwilling to be relocated far from the region "as they resolve issues concerning the status of property, employment, and the safety of loved ones."

Indeed, at the Houston Astrodome, many displaced residents of Louisiana and Mississippi said they preferred to stay where they were, some merely because they dreaded the thought of moving again.

DOJ_NMG_0003954

"We've been in three shelters in eight days," said Rickey Johnson, who with his wife, Tracy, was moved to the Astrodome from New Orleans. "I can't even begin to say how I feel about moving."

By Thursday, FEMA officials appeared to have developed a system for ferrying new survivors, rescued in coming days, to states willing to take them, according to an e-mail message from agency officials in Washington. The message said that evacuees would be taken first to Michigan, Iowa and Rhode Island on Friday. Different states are listed to receive evacuees on different days through next Wednesday, according to the message.

New York, Connecticut, Maine, Vermont and New Hampshire are not listed in the message to receive evacuees, as of now.

FEMA officials did not return phone calls seeking comment or a response to criticism that agency was inefficient in evacuating people to places waiting for them. In one case it flew a group to Charleston, W.Va., instead of Charleston, S.C., which was expecting the plane.

New Haven's mayor, John DeStefano Jr., waiting on Wednesday for evacuees to fill the cavernous field house he had set up for an influx of arrivals, joked that the people meant for his city had probably wound up in the New Haven in Indiana, or any of the several other New Havens in the United States.

By Thursday, only a smattering of individuals had found their way to New Haven - mostly on their own.

Shelters Grow Empty As Apartments Open Up (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 7 - In a stunning turnaround for some of the most besieged victims of Hurricane Katrina, the Astrodome population dwindled to about 3,000 on Wednesday from an estimated 15,000 over the weekend, with many people seizing on local job opportunities and inexpensive housing.

Because of a building boom over the last few years, there is a glut of affordable housing in Houston and its metropolitan area, which includes about 4.5 million people. Hotels are also offering a 14-day stay at no charge to storm victims, with reimbursements to come from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Add the outpouring of offers of shelter across the country and an acknowledgment by the government that the original estimates may have been high, and it appears that the Astrodome might be empty soon.

Frank E. Gutierrez, the emergency management coordinator for Harris County, which covers Houston, said that Joe Leonard, the area commander for the Department of Homeland Security, had made it a goal to clear the shelter complex by Sept. 18. "Everyone was asking him, 'What if we don't make it?' " Mr. Gutierrez said, "And he said, 'Then I'll need to work harder.' "

Even though many of those in the Astrodome seem to be bracing for a long stay - and the dome is gaining the trappings of normal life, with its own post office, Internet cafe and medical center - it looks increasingly like a temporary society.

And many of the evacuees are opting to stay in Houston or nearby towns. Evacuees in the dome rejected an offer this week from FEMA to transfer 4,000 people to cruise ships in the harbor of Galveston.

"I'm taking my chances in Houston, where we've already been able to accomplish a few things," said Linda Jeffers, 55, who is on the Survivors Leadership Group, an organization of evacuees living in the Astrodome. The group persuaded the American Red Cross this week to create a play area for children and asked officials to lobby communications companies not to turn off evacuees' cellphones.

Mayor Bill White of Houston and Judge Robert Eckels of Harris County, who are leading the operations in Houston, announced that "over 150,000 people have come to our community seeking the basic necessities of life" and that they had established the Houston Katrina Relief Fund, with business leaders on the board to raise money. Asked if he had a goal in mind, Mayor White said: "Yes. As much as we can."

Bed counts by the Red Cross at other Houston shelters showed far fewer people than just days ago, with 1,800 at Reliant Arena, 2,000 at Reliant Center and 1,366 at the George R. Brown Convention Center. Earlier figures were estimates and perhaps overstated, some officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0003955

Including the Astrodome, about 8,000 evacuees were in Houston's largest shelters on Wednesday, down from a high of 24,000, city officials said. At least 1,300 people have moved into homes and apartments since Friday, and others have left with friends and relatives or on their own.

A city plan to provide 10,000 rental units to evacuees, a program that could last a year, drew more than 200 apartment operators. Houston intends to distribute vouchers and to be reimbursed by the Department of Housing and Urban Development and FEMA. City officials said landlords would waive credit checks and security deposits.

"I'm grateful to have a change," said Hope Joseph, 29, who moved out of the Astrodome on Tuesday night to a donated apartment in Wharton, a town south of Houston, together with her three children, ages 4, 6 and 9, and her mother, Lola.

"It's very quiet here, but I'm hoping for a fresh start in life," said Ms. Joseph, a former cake decorator at a Winn-Dixie supermarket in New Orleans, in a phone interview from Wharton.

Carmen Scarlett, the owner of a counseling service who will temporarily pay part of the $450 rent, met Ms. Joseph after traveling to Houston to assist evacuees.

At the Astrodome, small signs of comfort abound, like piles of donated clothing, land-line phones by SBC and a low-power FM radio station set to begin broadcasting on Wednesday, with as many as 10,000 radios distributed. There is also plenty of free food, including hot sandwiches from Chick-Fil-A, served by workers from Aramark, the food services company at the Astrodome.

FEMA plans to distribute $2,000 debit cards to each adult displaced by Katrina, sparking considerable discussion in the dome about where to place automatic teller machines. Members of the Survivors Leadership Group suggested a location outside the dome in well-lighted areas.

"There's still some agitation inside here, but it feels like it's calming down a bit," said Charles Adams, 47, a former cook at Dickie Brennan's Steakhouse in New Orleans. "It's still the old, 'You're not getting nothing unless you demand it.' "

The impression of normalcy at the Astrodome, however, was betrayed by reminders of how unstable life remains for many evacuees. Signs in the medical center alerted people about an onset of dysentery, apparently caused by norovirus, known for causing sicknesses on cruise ships.

Even though phones are available in the dome, Glenn Levy, a 16-year-old evacuee, described strong demand for a functioning cellphone. He said that he charges people three cigarettes for three minutes on his cell and had garnered as many as 50 Kool and Camel cigarettes a day.

"My minutes are not free," said Mr. Levy, who said he did not know the whereabouts of his father and mother, a sister and two brothers, though he had reached one sister in New Orleans. "I'm trying not to think they died."

Town Improvises To Absorb Evacuees (WP)

By T.r. Reid

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

ORANGE, Tex. -- Anna Rose Williams had never heard of Orange, Tex., when her tired, frightened family stopped here for dinner last week on their harried journey to escape Hurricane Katrina.

"We was seven people in one car, with the babies," the 61-year-old grandmother recalled. "A gentleman come out of the Domino Pizza and said, 'Do y'all need a place to stay?' I said, 'Honey, we don't need no place to stay. We need a place to live.' "

And that's how the Williams family of Burns Street in New Orleans became residents of Orange -- for the time being, at least. Their current home is the former fourth-grade classroom at the Community Church Youth Center in Orange, a bayou town on the Texas-Louisiana border that has seen its population swell from more than 18,000 to about 20,000 in one week as evacuees have moved in. Like the Williams family, the newcomers are wearing clothes, eating meals, taking medicine, reading schoolbooks and sleeping on cots donated by the residents of Orange.

If New Orleans has been a locus of destruction, chaos and crime, the news from Orange and numerous other small-town havens is the old, familiar story of neighbor helping neighbor.

The exodus from Katrina has filled the string of hotels along Interstate 10 at the north end of town. Beyond that, Red Cross officials say five shelters have opened in Orange, plus two more in nearby hamlets.

DOJ_NMG_0003956

Local churches have set up a rotation for meal deliveries, with a different parish responsible for each meal at each shelter every day. Merchants who have sponsored 5K runs or Little League teams are digging through their back rooms to find leftover T-shirts and sweat suits for the newcomers. Local kennels are taking in displaced pets. The West Orange-Cove school district has enrolled about 200 new students, including three of Anna Rose Williams's grandchildren.

To some extent, the aid has been coordinated by government or welfare organizations. But much of it has come about spontaneously.

"We knew there were people coming here who needed help," said Jerry Brown, music minister at Community Church, an Assemblies of God affiliate with 1,200 active members. "Well, we had room at our youth center, including a big gym. It just seemed like the right thing to do.

"So we called over to Hermann Memorial [Hospital] and got a bunch of cots and blankets. Our members brought in clothes and diapers and food. The Red Cross put our address out on the interstate for people stopping here. The word got around. Last Thursday, I think it was, the school buses started coming; we've got 67 children going to school from this facility."

People here say their geographic setting -- Orange is the first town in Texas for drivers heading west on I-10 -- made it their duty to provide a welcome. "We're the gateway," said Katherine Frey, a florist in Orange. "So we just started hauling stuff out to the rest stop [officially, it's the Texas Welcome Center] on the interstate.

"These people were getting off the buses wearing garbage bags and no shoes," Frey said. "So we started calling people and saying, 'We need footwear. We need bedding. We need two dozen Porta Potties out here quick.' " Virtually overnight, the state welcome center was transformed into an outdoor warehouse, with mountains of donated clothing, diapers, sleeping bags, food and an eight-foot tower of water bottles.

With few or no job prospects in devastated New Orleans, some of Orange's newest residents have been looking for work -- and finding it. One pastor reopened a defunct carwash to provide employment. A local maker of precision tools, Cloeren Co., sent fliers to motels and shelters looking for machinists. "We're going to hire a bunch of people," said Kenneth Cormier, Cloeren's director of human resources.

A key problem facing the shelters here and elsewhere is that nobody knows how long they will be needed. "We are seeing some people leave already," Brown said. "But we think some are going to be here for weeks or months."

To meet that need, said Aaron Thompson of the Orange County Red Cross, the school board has turned over a closed middle school, which is being cleaned and equipped this week to serve as a long-term home. "We're hoping to consolidate all our current shelters into that one place," Thompson said. "We should be able to house 600 or more people there, if that many stay."

Anna Rose Williams is one of those likely to stay. "We don't know if there's anything to go back to," she said. "And I think it must have been God that steered me to this wonderful community. We might just make this place our home."

Learning From Katrina (WP)

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Even with the evacuation unfinished and the structural damage unassessed, it is not too early to start talking about how to rebuild New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast. When residents return to their communities, many will want to rebuild everything exactly as it was. That is understandable. But lessons of the past suggest that this is exactly what should not happen.

In 1969 Hurricane Camille destroyed coastal homes in Mississippi and Louisiana, wiping out much of the area, including Biloxi. But government policy after Camille -- as with government policy after major East Coast hurricanes -- amounted, in the words of one expert, to an "urban development program." Instead of shrinking, coastal development expanded. In truth, local and federal policies, ranging from beach preservation subsidies to zoning laws, have long encouraged building homes along coasts that are unusually susceptible to flooding and wind. Even the National Flood Insurance Program, set up in 1968 to offer government-subsidized flood insurance to susceptible communities in exchange for strict zoning and construction regulations, is at fault. Over the past two decades, the regulatory force of the law has been substantially weakened. All that is left in many places is the subsidy, which thousands of homeowners collect over and over again.

DOJ_NMG_0003957

Elsewhere in the country, government programs to acquire property in flood plains have successfully persuaded people to leave them. After the Mississippi River floods of 1993, the town of Valmeyer, Ill., was moved in its entirety, away from the river and onto a surrounding bluff. After Hurricane Floyd in 1999, the city of Kinston, N.C., moved entire neighborhoods out of flood plains and revitalized the city as well. But the political power of wealthy beachfront property owners has prevented such programs from being implemented along the coasts. That must not be allowed to happen again.

The case of New Orleans is even more difficult. New Orleans is not Valmeyer, and cannot be easily moved. Nor is it Biloxi, Miss., where stronger building codes and zoning laws designed to move construction away from the shore could make the city better able to withstand hurricanes. The geography of New Orleans will leave the city forever vulnerable to catastrophic flooding. Yet the city's history and culture make it very much worth saving. As a result, the city, joined by state and federal governments, must begin to face several extraordinarily difficult and delicate issues: Should the lower, most susceptible parts of the city be rebuilt? Should other houses be constructed -- as houses in the city were a century ago -- on stilts? Should the swamps and wetlands around the city be at least partially restored? How should compensation and new housing requirements be handled? Considering the government's murky record of looking after the poor following natural disasters (as the aftermath of Hurricane Camille demonstrated), those most affected by government's decisions must be part of the discussion.

The time to start planning for a rational reconstruction of the Gulf Coast is now. Six months or more down the road, when the rebuilding has already begun, will be too late.

Insurers Are Urged To Pay Valid Claims (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Putting more pressure on insurers to pay damage claims from Hurricane Katrina, Mississippi's insurance commissioner has told carriers that they will be required to prove to both regulators and homeowners that damage was caused by water and not by wind if they deny a claim.

On Wednesday, Lousiana's insurance commissioner also urged a large group of insurers and reinsurers to pay all valid claims. In many cases, the key to deciding which homeowners recover will be whether wind or water caused the damage.

Many homeowners' and business insurance policies exclude flood damage from their coverage. Flood coverage is written by the federal government through its National Flood Insurance Program, but only a small fraction of property owners in Mississippi and Alabama have bought it.

"In some situations, there is either very little or nothing left of the insured structure, and it will be a fact issue whether the loss was caused by wind or water," Mississippi Insurance Commissioner George Dale said in a bulletin to insurers dated Wednesday. " . . . I expect and believe that, where there is any doubt, that doubt will be resolved in favor of finding coverage on behalf of the insured."

Dale's position startled many insurers and reinsurers, who are concerned they are being pressured to pay claims for damage they did not insure.

Even in Florida, with its many hurricanes, regulators "haven't ever tried to do that," said Brad Kading of the Reinsurance Association of America.

Some industry officials said they did not view Dale's action as alarming.

"I think this is just a cautionary bulletin to lay out what his expectations are," said Julie Pulliam of the Atlanta office of the American Insurance Association, a trade group. "He has been very good to work with, and we expect that to continue. We are at the very beginning of this process. There's a lot to come."

Telephone calls to the Mississippi Insurance Department did not go through, apparently because of damaged phone lines and a high volume of calls to the area.

Kading and others said that at a meeting convened Wednesday by Louisiana Insurance Commissioner J. Robert Wooley to discuss dealing with the disaster regulators were largely hortatory. Kading said they made "no specific draconian statements."

Nonetheless, both insurers and reinsurers are alarmed at the idea of being forced to pay flood claims, as some have urged.

DOJ_NMG_0003958

The industry notes that flood exclusions are long established and that the language in policies is approved and understood by regulators. More important from a financial standpoint is that if insurers pay flood claims, reinsurers' contracts typically allow them to refuse to reimburse insurers for those outlays.

"The reinsurer is in the position of indemnifying the insurer," Kading said. That means that "after paying a claim, the insurer presents evidence that it was covered [by the reinsurance contract], and proof that it was paid. The reinsurer then looks at that evidence and decides if it agrees it's a covered claim."

By some estimates, reinsurers will pay about 40 percent of insured losses from Katrina and primary carriers the rest, assuming normal treatment of flood losses. If insurers pay claims that the reinsurers reject, their efforts to spread their risk will be negated, perhaps threatening their solvency.

But much remains uncertain with regard to losses, irrespective of who pays them. "We are still totally in an assessment-type mode, of how much and where," said John Marlow of the AIA's southwestern regional office in Austin.

NATO To Help U.S. Transport Aid From Abroad (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration turned to NATO on Thursday for help in transporting to the United States a burgeoning international inventory of relief equipment that has been offered to aid the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Ninety-five countries have offered about $1 billion in cash and goods, as well as technical assistance, U.S. officials said. But some of the supplies remained abroad, where foreign officials in some instances said they had not heard back from U.S. counterparts on whether their offers would be accepted.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization told U.S. officials that its crews could transport aid to the Gulf Coast.

Eleven cargo planes landed Thursday in Little Rock, Ark., carrying aid from abroad, after 11 others Wednesday. But some countries said they still had no word on whether their offers would be accepted.

A cargo plane with supplies, including a water purification system, had been on a runway in Sweden since last week waiting for clearance to fly to the U.S.

"We've made a number of requests for clearance, and the U.S. has accepted the offer in principle," said Claes Thorson, spokesman for the Swedish Embassy in Washington. "But it remains to solve the logistical problem."

Other European countries "have the same problem," he added.

Poland, Austria and Norway are among those that have not heard back, diplomats said.

As foreign donors have expressed exasperation with the U.S. response, American officials have sought to emphasize that though they appreciate the offers of aid, not all help can be immediately put to use.

U.S. officials have been telling countries that some kinds of assistance are more helpful than others, adding that cash is the most easily put to use.

More than $400 million has been accepted, including $100 million from Kuwait, $100 million from the United Arab Emirates and $100 million from Qatar. Kuwait has also offered $400 million worth of oil.

Tons of aid has been arriving from Europe. On Thursday, relief workers and supplies arrived from Germany, which has offered a range of aid, including food rations, high-speed water pumps and forensic experts. It has also begun releasing oil from its strategic national reserve.

A French aircraft with supplies and personnel arrived Thursday, after two others that arrived Tuesday. The French have offered water treatment supplies, generators, tents, food rations and a 150-person team to help with relocation and psychological assistance.

The countries offering to help include a number of major recipients of U.S. aid, including Afghanistan, Iraq and Israel.

MoveOn.org Says It Won't Use Evacuee Images In Roberts Ad (USAT)

By Mark Memmott

USA Today, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003959

A liberal group indicated Thursday that one of its officials was wrong when he said it would broadcast a TV ad with images of poverty-stricken hurricane victims to raise questions about the civil rights record of John Roberts, the nominee for U.S. chief justice.

The statement by MoveOn.org Political Action came a day after Ben Brandzel, the group's advocacy director, told USA TODAY that such an ad would air next week, during Roberts' confirmation hearings in the Senate. Brandzel described plans for a provocative ad that would include images of African-American evacuees and question whether the conservative judge is sensitive to issues that are important to minorities and the poor.

On Thursday, however, MoveOn Executive Director Eli Pariser said the group has "no plans, and … never had plans, to produce such an ad." Pariser did not blame USA TODAY, and he said that "we regret any misunderstanding that may have arisen because of anything that our staff member might have told USA TODAY's reporter."

Conservative groups that had criticized MoveOn over the idea of using images of hurricane victims in a political ad weren't buying MoveOn's explanation. Sean Rushton of the conservative Committee for Justice, compared the episode to the flap last month over a TV ad produced by NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights group.

That spot — which NARAL took off the air after it drew wide criticism as unfair — accused Roberts of giving support to groups that advocate violence at abortion clinics. (The ad was based on arguments he made at the Supreme Court as a government lawyer in 1991. Roberts argued that anti-abortion protesters at clinics could not be prosecuted under a civil rights law; a majority of the court later agreed.)

"I think MoveOn sensed a 'NARAL moment' was upon them," Rushton said.

MoveOn's change underscores how quickly political messages can backfire if they trod too hard on sensitive issues, said Brooks Jackson, director of the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Political Fact Check program, which examines the accuracy of political ads.

Roberts' hearings begin Monday. He has appeared to be headed for confirmation. But MoveOn, other liberal groups and Senate Democrats such as Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts are pushing the White House to release more memos Roberts wrote as a lawyer in the Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations.

In memos already released, Roberts argued for scaling back affirmative action and against a program that favored minorities seeking broadcast licenses.

What A Hispanic Justice Would Mean (USAT)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

I was still a law student when I decided that the Supreme Court needed a Hispanic justice. I was scouring cases, when I came to U.S. v. Brignoni-Ponce (1975). I read the decision twice, thinking I had misread it.

In Brignoni, the court held that "apparent Mexican ancestry" alone did not constitute legitimate grounds for the Border Patrol to conduct an immigration check. Even so, the court said, "the likelihood that any given person of Mexican ancestry is an alien is high enough to make Mexican appearance a relevant factor" in an immigration stop. In effect, the court declared a form of racial profiling constitutional.

A Hispanic justice would have provided a useful perspective to the Brignoni reasoning. So here we are, 30 years later, and the nation's first Hispanic Supreme Court justice is a possibility. No, it won't be with President Bush's first opening. That went to chief justice nominee John Roberts. But Bush now has a second chance to make history. His attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, recently said, "There will be a Hispanic on the court — it's inevitable." I hope he's right.

As with African-Americans and women, Latinos deserve representation. Hispanics are the nation's largest and fastest-growing minority group. Although ethnicity should not be a nominee's chief qualification, a Latino presence on the high court is overdue and would have monumental implications for the country.

Consider Thurgood Marshall's impact. A great-grandson of a slave, he came to the bench as a renowned civil rights attorney, bringing personal insight and expertise honed in cases such as Brown v. Board of Education in 1954. Throughout his tenure, he was sensitive to racial discrimination. "Bringing the Negro into the mainstream of American life should be a state interest of the highest order," Marshall wrote in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke in 1978.

DOJ_NMG_0003960

Similarly, a Latino justice would open the eyes of justice a bit further. He would recognize that "Mexican appearance" is a flawed basis for an immigration check. He would see that English-only laws and the Real ID Act, which prohibits driver's licenses for illegal aliens, can be adversely applied to Hispanics.

The appointment of a Hispanic would be a breathtaking milestone. It's worth noting that the Supreme Court will face issues with broad effect on Latinos: bilingual education, affirmative action, immigration and workers' and voters' rights. It is imperative that the concerns of Latinos are represented. Just as Marshall served as the voice for African-Americans, a Hispanic justice could, and should, soon be ours.

Raul A. Reyes is an attorney in New York and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Hill Veterans Light The Way For Nominee (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Shortly after President George H.W. Bush nominated him for the Supreme Court in July 1991, Clarence Thomas went to a downtown Washington office to take part in strategy sessions aimed at ensuring his confirmation by the Senate.

The presiding political mind was not a top White House aide or a legal eagle from the Justice Department but lobbyist Kenneth M. Duberstein, a former Reagan administration official who was Thomas's designated "sherpa" -- his guide through the potentially treacherous process.

Duberstein, then and now, is one of a handful of Washington figures who have acquired reputations for steering top presidential nominees through a confirmation process that has grown more contentious and partisan since the unprecedented campaign that capsized Judge Robert H. Bork's Supreme Court nomination in 1987.

The role of the sherpa, named for the Tibetan guides who assist climbers in the Himalayas, is largely off camera and unpaid. It is a critical and routine part of the Washington odyssey that high-profile nominees go through on their way to the high court or top Cabinet posts.

When John G. Roberts Jr. was nominated by President Bush in July to be an associate justice, he was promptly provided with two guides: former senator Fred D. Thompson (R-Tenn.) and former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie. Both are considered savvy Washington insiders who are now comfortably on the outside. After the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist last week, Bush nominated Roberts to lead the court.

Roberts has not faced anything like the opposition Bork did. Democrats say they will press him harder at his confirmation hearings beginning Monday now that he is in line to be chief.

"There are several roles you play," said Duberstein, who also served as a guide for Supreme Court Justice David H. Souter, CIA Director Robert M. Gates and Secretary of State George P. Shultz. "You are the chief strategist for the ultimate goal of getting that person confirmed. You are also the traffic cop, because everybody wants to see the prospective nominee. You are a coach and you're also a confidant of the nominee. You are the chief liaison with the Hill, but also the chief liaison within the administration. You are an enforcer, but you are also a negotiator."

Duberstein said the job of guiding Roberts should not change because he has been nominated for chief justice. "I don't recall that there would be any distinction," he said.

The sherpa is very much the media messenger -- shaping and selling a nominee's personal story and image, devising strategies for dealing with reporters, and coordinating courtesy calls with key senators.

"They'll school you on what to say and what not to say," said Paul C. Light, a professor of government at New York University. "They are kind of a sounding board for you, and whenever you have one of those anxiety attacks . . . they are counselors for you. And if you get into trouble, you get a 'hold' placed on you, then they'll help you iron it out."

Sherpas tap their sources on Capitol Hill to learn about tough questions a nominee might face, and then drill nominees in mock confirmation hearings known as "murder boards." They even coach them on such matters as how long to pause before answering a senator's question and how to ask for a bathroom break.

But this is a complex process, and even the helper needs help. Sherpas supervise teams that vet a nominee's financial statements, personal history and professional record -- trolling for red flags.

DOJ_NMG_0003961

Light likened them to personal trainers, "somebody who is going to be there while you are doing everything and keep you from hurting yourself."

Other well-known sherpas include longtime Republican lobbyist Tom Korologos, now ambassador to Belgium, who helped Donald H. Rumsfeld (secretary of defense), Antonin Scalia (Supreme Court justice) and Edwin Meese III (attorney general), and veteran Democratic strategist Michael S. Berman, Duberstein's lobbying business partner, who assisted Justices Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Although sherpas work pro bono, the job is not without compensation. The role underscores a lobbyist's political access and clout, impressing prospective corporate clients.

Duberstein and then-Sen. John C. Danforth (R-Mo.), assisted by a team of administration insiders, helped steer Thomas through a difficult confirmation marked by law professor Anita Hill's accusations that Thomas had sexually harassed her when she worked for him at the Education Department and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, in the 1980s. Duberstein was especially influential on matters of style, Danforth wrote in his 1994 book, "Resurrection: The Confirmation of Clarence Thomas."

"As Clarence walked past banks of cameras, Ken would say, 'Give them a thumbs up,' and Clarence would comply," Danforth wrote. "When advising Clarence not to respond to press questions, Ken suggested, 'Tell them, "I wish I could answer that." ' . . . He told Clarence that when he entered the Senate Caucus Room at the start of his first hearing, he should go up and shake hands with each member. He insisted that Clarence, against his will, conclude the first hearing by complimenting the committee for being fair."

Thomas prevailed, in part, because he was able to define himself as an African American who had risen from poverty in rural Pin Point, Ga., and whose confirmation controversy represented yet another hurdle that he had to overcome. In a tactical move, Duberstein won assurances from the Senate Judiciary Committee that Thomas would have the opportunity to respond to any allegation in the same news cycle. That enabled Thomas to reclaim the offensive on the day Hill testified and Thomas responded by memorably labeling the proceedings "a high-tech lynching for uppity blacks."

When Rumsfeld was sworn in as defense secretary in 2001, Korologos was in the Oval Office with Bush and Vice President Cheney. "He is so famous for working around outside the Senate chamber that he is known by the insiders as the 101st senator," Rumsfeld said at a March 2002 award ceremony for Korologos. "But all that experience does come in handy, and it has helped me from time to time -- not least in my confirmation hearings. His advice for courtesy calls was 'Get in, listen, get out.' It worked."

Korologos has handled hundreds of nominations over the past 40 years, most of them uncontroversial. He has even helped with three or four murder boards by telephone from Brussels, he said.

"It's an arcane art," he said in a telephone interview. "Most nominees have never done this before. . . . You are not running for sheriff; you are not running for Miss America. You are running for whatever the number is, 10 or 11 votes on the committee and 51 on the floor. That's the constituency."

Carol M. Browner, head of the Environmental Protection Agency in the Clinton administration, said her sherpa's best advice was that confirmation hearings are mostly about the senators, not the nominee.

"Mike Berman said to me, 'When they finish asking that question, wait a few seconds to reflect on the question. It makes you look respectful. It makes you look thoughtful. And it takes up time,' " she said. "He had all these little tricks."

Exactly, Korologos said. "You've got to know the system, the nuances, what buttons to push up on the Hill to make them respond. That's why there aren't many of us doing it."

As confirmation fights have become in some ways proxy battles in the country's culture wars, the need for sherpas has grown. But sherpas are guides, not guarantees, and nominees occasionally fail anyway. Korologos, for all his skill, handled the Bork nomination for the Reagan White House.

"Washington is like Salem," Korologos said. "If we ain't hanging somebody, we ain't happy."

OTHER NEWS:

Gauging Katrina's Impact (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0003962

By Tim Annett

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Hurricane Katrina is likely to slow growth and boost inflation pressures in the second half of this year, economists believe. But the economy could receive a modest boost early next year amid recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast.

That's the view of economists who participated in this month's Wall Street Journal Online forecasting survey. To reflect the expected economic impact of Katrina, they marked down their annualized forecasts for growth in gross domestic product for the second half of this year by 0.4 percentage point. The survey was conducted Sept. 2-7.

These private-sector economists expect a somewhat smaller impact than what has been predicted by the Congressional Budget Office, which has said that second-half growth could be trimmed by a half to a full percentage point.

The WSJ.com survey found that economists don't expect the slowdown to be long lasting. In light of Katrina, they raised their forecasts for the first half of 2006 by 0.2 percentage point, as they see post-hurricane reconstruction giving the economy a kick in early 2006. Further, the economists say there's only an 18% probability of a recession in the U.S. over the next 12 months.

"In five years, economists with somewhat foggy memories will be asking themselves: 'Now what year was that big hurricane in New Orleans anyway?' because they will not be able to see it in the GDP or inflation data," says Donald Straszheim of Straszheim Global Advisors.

The 56 economists now expect GDP, the broadest measure of U.S. economic activity, to expand at a 3.6% seasonally adjusted annual rate in the third quarter and at a 3.2% rate in the fourth quarter. Those forecasts were down sharply from last month's survey, when the economists predicted growth of 4.2% and 3.6% in the third and fourth quarters, respectively. Forecasts for the first half of 2006 changed little, with the economists expecting growth of 3.3% on average.

These revisions reflect all factors that the economists take into account in arriving at their forecasts, not just the impact of Katrina.

Whether the economists' revised projections prove to be on the money may be another matter. Even the economists themselves aren't sure, as Katrina hasn't just made a mess of New Orleans, it has also played havoc with forecasting. On average, the economists are only 57% confident that officially reported GDP growth will fall within 0.5% of their predictions. That's down sharply from the 67% confidence level they expressed in the August survey.

Why have the economists gone wobbly?

"None of us have ever dealt with anything this large," says Susan M. Sterne of Economic Analysis Associates. She says making sense of incoming economic data will be a somewhat dicey proposition in the months ahead. "Obviously there are going to be effects in the data that may or may not be real effects."

Energy Prices Are Crucial

Ram Bhagavatula of Combinatorics Capital says retail gasoline prices, which shot up to as much as $5 a gallon in some areas last week, are the key to understanding the post-hurricane economic puzzle. "If gasoline prices go back to pre-hurricane levels, I think the economic effects [from the storm] will be minimal," he says.

Even with the big price increases seen at the pump since the storm, economists say gasoline prices haven't been high enough -- for long enough -- to harm the economy. Though the national average price for a gallon of regular unleaded stood at $3.03 a gallon Thursday, just pennies below a high reached Monday, according to AAA, economists say gasoline would need to reach $4.06 a gallon for a sustained interval in order to present a hazard to the expansion.

Ms. Sterne says she'll be keeping an eye on consumer confidence to determine whether skyrocketing gasoline prices will lead people to steer clear of the shopping mall, crimping consumer demand -- and, thus, overall economic growth. "Worrisome to me is that we were seeing some confidence weakness even prior to this. I'm not sure if it was because of gasoline prices, but it's all very much energy related. The hurricane perpetuates and possibly exaggerates the energy situation."

Impact on Inflation, Jobs

Forecasts for inflation were lifted sharply amid the dramatic increase in gasoline and other energy prices. The economists now see the Labor Department's consumer-price index increasing 3.3% year over year in November, up from an expected 2.8% annual increase that was forecast in last month's survey, and they think the CPI will increase 2.8% in May 2006, up from the 2.5% forecast increase last month. The CPI rose 3.2% in July.

DOJ_NMG_0003963

Feeding the expected increase in inflation pressures is the recent jump in a range of spot commodity prices -- from coffee to steel to crude oil -- amid concern about supply disruptions. As Katrina rampaged across the Gulf of Mexico and made landfall in Louisiana, oil rose to more than $70 a barrel, but has since retreated to around $67. The economists expect crude to slip to $61 a barrel at year's end and to fall to around $56 by the end of next June.

The economists expect Katrina to be a drag on the U.S. employment situation. They predict that over the next 12 months, nonfarm payrolls will expand by an average of 173,000 jobs a month -- the lowest forecast in more than a year and well beneath the pace of roughly 195,000 new jobs a month so far in 2005. At the same time, forecasts for the unemployment rate were nudged upward, with the economists now predicting a 5% jobless rate in November and a 4.9% rate in May 2006. Last month, the economists forecast 4.9% unemployment in November and 4.8% unemployment in May.

Katrina and the Fed

Besides stirring up trouble for economic models, Katrina has also created some uncertainty about what the Federal Reserve might do with interest rates. Since June of 2004, the Fed has brought the federal-funds rate from a 46-year low of 1% to 3.5%. After Katrina's landfall, futures-market activity revealed a growing belief that the U.S. central bank would pause its campaign of rate increases before the end of this year.

But more than two-thirds of the economists say the Fed shouldn't halt its campaign to lift rates. Indeed, this month's forecasts for the federal-funds target rate were unchanged; the economists still expect the Fed's key short-term lending rate to reach 4% by the end of this year and 4.25% by June 2006.

Paul Kasriel of Northern Trust believes that the Fed shouldn't stop raising rates as a result of Katrina, but he does think policy makers will take to the sidelines for a time. "I believe Hurricane Katrina will result in a Fed pause through the spring of 2006. By pausing in its funds rate hikes, the Fed will indirectly underwrite much of the increased borrowing by the government sector and private sector related to post-Katrina rebuilding -- borrowing and spending that will boost 2006 real GDP growth (and inflation)."

Among other findings in the survey: • Fifty-nine percent of the economists say that there is a bubble in a few of the hottest local housing markets, but only 26% say a bubble exists in a significant part of the nation. Sixteen percent say there is no bubble at all. Meanwhile, 65% say that the end of the housing boom would lead to a noticeable slowdown in economic growth. About a third say there would be little to no effect. Just two economists feel a recession would result.

• Economist raised their forecasts for long-term interest rates. They now expect the yield on the 10-year Treasury note to be 4.48% at the end of this year and 4.75% by next June. The 10-year yield closed trading Wednesday at 4.14%.

Weekly Jobless Claims Drop, But Katrina May Spur Revision (WSJ/DJN)

By Joseph Rebello And Jeff Bater, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Hurricane Katrina caused at least 10,000 job losses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama last week, although nationwide the number of U.S. workers filing first-time applications for unemployment benefits declined slightly, the government said Thursday.

Initial jobless claims declined by 1,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 319,000 in the week that ended Saturday, the Labor Department said. That decline occurred despite the filing of 10,000 disaster-related claims in the states hardest hit by Katrina. A Labor Department statistician said the claims numbers are likely to be revised upward in coming weeks.

"We understand that these states took claims over the weekend, continue to take claims from evacuees, and we expect these claims to be reflected in the numbers released next week," the statistician said.

The volume of jobless claims nationwide was larger than Wall Street had expected: Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires had predicted 310,000 claims.

Economists have begun to predict that the nation's job growth will suffer this month because of Katrina's devastation. The Congressional Budget Office, for example, has estimated that Hurricane Katrina could cause national employment to decline "significantly" in September -- by between 150,000 to 500,000 jobs. But job growth should resume after that "as workers return home and businesses reopen and reconstruction gathers steam," the CBO said in a report Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0003964

Some Wall Street forecasters, as a result, expect Federal Reserve policy makers to suspend their campaign of interest-rate increases when they next meet on Sept. 20. Since June 2004, the U.S. central bank has raised its key federal-funds rate 10 times, in increments of a quarter percentage point. The rate now stands at 3.5%.

In its report Thursday, the Labor Department said the total number of workers drawing unemployment benefits declined in the week that ended Aug. 27, the latest period for which data are available. That number -- known as continuing claims -- fell by 5,000 to 2,593,000. The unemployment rate for workers with unemployment insurance held steady at 2%.

The department didn't revise its estimate of initial claims for the week of Aug. 27. During that week, it said, Kentucky reported the biggest increase in initial claims, a gain of 3,268 that it attributed to layoffs in the manufacturing industry. North Carolina, citing fewer layoffs in construction and other industries, reported a decline of 1,937 claims.

Wholesale Inventories Fall 0.1%

U.S. wholesale inventories unexpectedly dropped in July as sales increased.

Inventories fell 0.1% to a seasonally adjusted $352.04 billion, after increasing a downwardly revised 0.4% in June, the Commerce Department said Thursday. June inventories were originally seen rising 0.7%. The last time inventories dwindled this much was January 2004, when inventories also slipped by 0.1%.

U.S. wholesale sales rose 0.5% to a seasonally adjusted $298.66 billion. Sales climbed a revised 0.5% in June; demand was originally seen up 0.6% for that month. Economists had expected inventories to rise by 0.6% and sales to climb 0.5%, according to Thomson First Call.

The inventory-to-sales ratio was 1.18 in July, down from 1.19 in June. The ratio measures how many months it would take for a firm to deplete its current inventory. Year over year, sales were up 7.5%, while inventories rose 8.2%.

U.S. business inventories had gotten heavy as the pace of production of goods eclipsed demand. Companies lightened things up in the spring, letting sales absorb stocks of goods and, as a result, inventories rose by a mere $2.6 billion in the second quarter after swelling by $58.2 billion the first three months of the year and $50.1 billion in the fourth quarter.

Inventories of durable goods -- items such as cars and appliances that are meant to last three or more years -- rose 0.3% during July, after increasing 0.7% in June. Durable-goods sales decreased 0.2%, following a flat reading in June. Auto stocks grew 0.2% as car makers extended employee discounts to all buyers, driving summer sales higher and helping unclog overstuffed car lots.

Inventories of nondurable goods such as food and clothing fell 0.7% even though petroleum stocks increased by 5.6%, a climb likely given a push by rising oil prices. Sales of nondurable items rose 1.2%.

Consumers Build Up Debt

Meanwhile, U.S. consumers continued to build up debt in July -- though by far less than economists had expected -- the Federal Reserve said Thursday. Debt growth for big-ticket items such as cars, trucks and boats overshadowed a decline in revolving credit such as credit-card debt.

Consumer credit outstanding rose about $4.4 billion to a record $2.157 trillion, the Fed reported, compared with a revised increase of $14.6 billion in June.

The July increase was less than half the $10 billion economists had expected as they anticipated a bigger rise in nonrevolving credit to finance a sharp rise in auto purchases. The consumer credit data, which exclude real-estate mortgages, tend to be highly volatile from month to month and are frequently revised.

Nonrevolving credit rose by $5.4 billion to $1.352 trillion. That followed a revised increase of $7.4 billion in June, previously reported as a $6.9 billion expansion.

Revolving debt fell $1 billion in July to $805 billion, the first decline in four months and the biggest drop since last November. The July decrease followed a revised $7.2 billion increase in June, first reported as a $7.6 billion expansion.

Total U.S. consumer credit rose at a 2.4% annual rate in July, compared with a 8.2% annual growth rate in June, the Fed said.

Trying To Absorb The Newly Unemployed (WP)

By Krissah Williams

DOJ_NMG_0003965

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

DALLAS, Sept. 8 -- A staffing company recruiter greeted Eugene Francois and his wife, Claressa, as they walked into a job fair at the cavernous Dallas Convention Center on Thursday. He shook their hands and asked what sort of employment the couple sought.

"Any kind of job," answered Eugene, a 34-year-old former New Orleans firefighter. He spent the morning filling out applications for positions at the Dallas County Sheriff's Department, a local warehouse staffing company and a trucking company.

The one-day job fair here attracted about 3,000 Hurricane Katrina evacuees settling into Dallas. It also enticed a few local unemployed residents, some of whom worry that the inflow of new workers will intensify competition for work in an area where jobs -- particularly in low-skill sectors -- are already tough to come by.

The assimilation of Hurricane Katrina evacuees into Texas's big cities and into communities across the country will be far from seamless. Almost all the evacuees are now unemployed, and many are also homeless. They are scrambling to find work so they can get out of the Federal Emergency Management Administration's massive shelters, into apartments and on with their lives.

"I'm looking for something that pays in the double digits, but I'll take $9 [an hour]. I'm by myself. I don't need much," said Theron Cosey, who is living in a shelter for evacuees in the convention center. Cosey worked in the engineering room of a hotel in New Orleans but said he also knows how to drive a forklift. He filled out an application for a position at a Dallas warehouse.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that 400,000 jobs were lost throughout the Gulf Coast due to Katrina. So far, only an estimated 10,000 workers who lost their jobs have filed for unemployment benefits, the Labor Department said Thursday. That number would have been higher, but many claims offices in the affected region were shut down. The Labor Department predicted that the number of disaster-related claims will rise sharply in coming weeks and that hundreds of thousands of displaced workers will soon be seeking benefits.

Job fairs and training programs are being offered to newly unemployed workers arriving in Dallas, Houston, San Antonio, Atlanta and other cities. This week, in addition to the Dallas job fair, similar events were held by Goodwill Industries in Shreveport, La., and Atlanta's Workforce Development Agency.

The fair in Dallas was sponsored by the Greater Dallas Chamber of Commerce in cooperation with WorkSource, an arm of the Texas Workforce Commission. Originally planned on a smaller scale at a local community college, the Dallas job fair was expanded this week, with companies coming from as far as Florida to offer evacuees jobs.

About 250,000 of those displaced by Katrina have come to Texas. While they make up a relatively small part of the state's overall population, they will be vying for a hotly contested slice of low-skill jobs, said Daniel S. Hamermesh, an economics professor at the University of Texas at Austin.

"Skilled people will certainly find jobs, [but] in terms of unskilled jobs the labor market is pretty tough," Hamermesh said.

The job fair here Thursday reflected that divide. Most of the 225 companies that set up booths were recruiting for nurses, teachers, welders, or other trades and professions that require technical expertise or college degrees. Fewer positions for general labor were available. A recruiter for $10-an-hour meat-packing positions at Tyson Foods said that he often places people in jobs at one of the company's plants in rural Kansas but that fewer positions have been open in Texas.

Over the past few years, the state's unemployment rate has remained around 5 or 6 percent, but that figure does not reflect the increasing competition in the market for low-skill jobs, Hamermesh said. In Texas, those jobs -- mainly in hotels, restaurants, manufacturing and construction -- often are filled by the state's large population of first-generation immigrants from Mexico, he said.

"In south Texas there is a large overhang of temporary and permanent immigrants, so there will be competition there," he said. "The pay level won't be as good as what [people from New Orleans] are used to," he said.

The League of United Latin American Citizens, a national Latino advocacy group, expects the damage to the tourism and service industries in New Orleans to bring greater competition for jobs in the short term but hopes that it might produce job gains in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0003966

"Hopefully we will see a construction boom in these devastated areas, and people will come in and help with that. You do see a lot of Hispanic construction workers in those types of jobs," said Gabriela Lemus, director of policy and legislation for LULAC's Washington office.

Concern over service-sector jobs was apparent at the Dallas job fair.

Ramona Rayford, 25, lives in Dallas and has been looking for retail positions for six months. She said her last job was in a clothing warehouse without air conditioning and with low pay.

"It's like [employers] push us out [of] the way. They know the Hispanics will do it and take $7 an hour or $5 an hour," Rayford said. "I know they have it hard, too."

When Dallas residents Tiffany Garcia, 18, and her friend Ricky Alvarado, 19, walked into the job fair, she looked around at all of the former New Orleans residents and poked him. "There is going to be way more competition. We ain't going to find a job."

Gas Prices Have Eased, But Other Prices Rising (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina, which has already pushed gasoline above $3 a gallon, is prompting higher prices for everything from building supplies to natural gas and chemicals.

Economists have increased their projections for consumer inflation, some significantly. Global Insight expects inflation to reach 5.7% at an annual rate in third-quarter 2005, compared with its earlier 3.4% estimate. Economy.com expects 3.4% inflation through the end of 2005, up from 2.7%.

Both firms expect the inflation gains to be transitory — oil is off its $70-a-barrel peak, though still running $64.49 — with more manageable inflation in 2006. There are questions regarding how much of the price increases will bleed through to core inflation, which excludes food and energy and is the inflation measure most watched by the Federal Reserve.

But some say price gains could last longer. “The pressing effects on the economy are more likely to be temporary, but the adverse effects on inflation are more likely to be permanent,” says Ward McCarthy of Stone & McCarthy Research Associates.

The Energy Department estimates natural gas prices could rise as much as 71% in the Midwest this fall, with heating oil up more than 30% in the Northeast. The price gains depend on how fast refineries and oil rigs in the gulf are repaired.

Kevin Swift, chief economist of the American Chemistry Council, says chemical manufacturers use 12% of U.S. natural gas and will have to pass along price increases.

“Ultimately, the consumer bears it in any good that contains chemicals,” from plastic bottles to auto parts, Swift says.

Ken Simonson, chief economist of the Associated General Contractors of America, estimates construction costs will jump 10% through 2006, rather than the already high 8% he had expected. Frank Nothaft, vice president at mortgage giant Freddie Mac, says reconstruction could add 2% to 3% to new home costs. But that could be balanced by lower mortgage rates.

Chicken prices have risen because of supply disruptions, and pork prices have moved higher as traders speculate the meat could be a chicken substitute. But the Grocery Manufacturers Association doesn't expect big price gains for food in the near term. Coffee prices are off recent highs, as firms say there is less damage to supplies than expected.

Janet Yellen, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, in a speech Thursday said the Fed's task was complicated before Katrina, as the job market tightened and the economy picked up steam. The central bank has raised its target for short-term rates 10 times since June 2004 to 3.5%.

Fed officials and other economists must now weigh the threat of inflation against the possibility that high oil prices could slow growth. Fed policymakers next meet to review interest rates on Sept. 20 in Washington.

“Our approach during this phase must be particularly dependent on information from incoming data,” Yellen said, adding that energy prices could feed into core inflation.

Also affecting the outlook is reconstruction spending. The approval by Congress of a $51.8 billion aid package Thursday brings disaster aid so far to more than $60 billion. The quick aid could stimulate the economy faster than expected and end any lingering chance that Congress will rein in deficits.

Stocks Take A Breather (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0003967

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

After two days of solid gains on Wall Street, investors stepped away from the plate Thursday, and stocks drifted lower as crude oil ticked up.

Home builders took it on the chin amid concerns that the housing boom could slow. The trigger was a lackluster earnings report by Hovnanian Enterprises, which posted net income of $1.76 a share for the third quarter late Wednesday, two cents below expectations.

The Red Bank, N.J., builder also served up disappointing guidance for the rest of the year and for 2006. Its shares slumped 6.7%. Toll Brothers fell 3.4%, KB Homes shed 2% and Pulte Homes lost 1.4%.

Bill Strazzulo, chief trading strategist at State Street, said concerns about the housing market were overblown. Treasury bonds have rallied recently, he noted, sending their yields lower. Since mortgage rates are tied to bond yields, a strong bond market should give support to housing, he said.

The decline among home builders had a ricochet effect on some banks, said Sarah Hunt, senior vice president at Capital Management Associates. Since "a large percentage of banks' earnings are related to mortgages," she said, if the housing market cools, that could put a big dent in their earnings. The Philadelphia Bank Sector index fell 0.72%.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 37.57 points to 10595.93. Intel gained 1.7% ahead of its midquarter earnings update after the bell. It gave much of that back after it tightened its revenue guidance for the quarter. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index shed 4.69 to 1231.67 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 6 points to 2166.03.

Light, sweet crude jumped toward the end of open-outcry trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, settling up 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel on news of a large decline in output from the Gulf of Mexico. Oil prices spent most of the day lower after the government reported that petroleum stocks fell less than expected last week.

The report was one of the first yardsticks of the damage done to the oil-and-gas supply system in the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina struck last Monday. It gave investors some relief that the devastation may not have been as widespread as earlier feared.

The Minerals Management Service, a branch of the Interior Department that monitors fossil-fuel production in the U.S., said the amount of Gulf of Mexico oil production shut down by Hurricane Katrina rose to 901,726 barrels a day, or 60% of total output. That was up from the 57% reported offline Wednesday, and renewed concerns that the nation could face an energy shortage in the coming days and weeks.

Investors had little hard economic data to guide them Thursday. The Labor Department reported that initial jobless claims declined by 1,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 319,000 in the week that ended Sept. 3, the Labor Department said. That decline occurred despite the filing of 10,000 disaster-related claims last week in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, the states hardest hit by Katrina. Economists had called for a decrease of about 10,000 claims to 310,000.

In major market action:

Stocks fell7. On the Big Board, where 1.4 billion shares traded, 1,205 stocks rose and 2,060 fell on Thursday. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 1,182 stocks advanced and 1,806 declined.

Bonds advanced8. The benchmark 10-year Treasury gained 1/32, or 31 cents per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.139%. The 30-year bond was up 2/32 to yield 4.419%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.9 It traded at 110.34 yen, up from 110.04 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.2427 from $1.2421.

Gulf Banks May Come Out On Top (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel, Valerie Bauerlein And James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

The bright red sign atop Hancock Holding Co.'s headquarters is illuminated again -- and that could be a good sign for investors.

DOJ_NMG_0003968

The 106-year-old bank, based in Gulfport, Miss., is one of dozens of regional and national financial institutions with large operations in the areas devastated by Hurricane Katrina last week.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. estimates that some 280 locally based institutions may have been affected by Katrina, representing $270 billion in assets and $201.3 billion in deposits. Big names in the area include Regions Financial Corp., AmSouth Bancorp, Compass Bancshares Inc. and Whitney Holding Corp.

Although the stocks of some affected banks tumbled last week when the storm's devastation became apparent, investors are betting that the area's economic recovery will generate enormous revenue and loan growth next year.

"As an investor, you can take some reassurance in the fact that after an initial period of loss of business, there will be a lot of cash and insurance proceeds flowing into the area," said James Schmidt, a portfolio manager at John Hancock Funds in Boston, which is owned by Canada's Manulife Financial Corp.

Like the banks, analysts are scrambling to determine the extent of the damage and how it will affect earnings. In addition to getting stuck with bad loans, banks are also likely to incur costs associated with repairing their own facilities and reinstating services to customers.

The storm came at a delicate time in the banking industry. In recent months, bank profits have been squeezed by a flattening yield curve -- the difference between short-term and long-term rates. The profit pinch has prompted some institutions to cut costs and free up funds that have been set aside for bad loans. Now, they may have to add more to those loan-loss reserves, which could take a bite out of earnings.

"It is unclear the magnitude of an impact that the recovery will have on bank earnings, but we believe that it is likely that results could be impacted for at least a few quarters," Kenneth Usdin, an analyst at Bank of America Corp., wrote in a report issued Tuesday. The report didn't quantify a potential impact.

Richard Bove, an analyst at Punk Ziegel & Co., estimated that Regions could face a billion-dollar loan loss from the storm, resulting in a $1.35 hit to per-share earnings. Still, "we would ignore this write-down if it occurs" due to "a steady stream of new businesses that will flow into this bank as southern Louisiana and Mississippi are rebuilt," he wrote in a report released yesterday.

"There will be credit issues," said Chris Spoth, acting director of supervision and consumer protection at the FDIC. "However, the banks were in very strong condition going into this crisis." Banks can turn to the Federal Reserve and the Federal Home Loan Banks for emergency short-term loans if they experience a shortage of cash, though Mr. Spoth said "we haven't seen" much of an increase in demand for such loans.

Still, the wrath inflicted by Katrina is far different than that of Hurricane Hugo, which ravaged Charleston, S.C., in 1989 or Andrew, which swept through Florida in 1992. Although those storms inflicted billions of dollars in damages that took years to repair, there were far fewer questions about the ability of those communities to rebuild. In New Orleans, the bulk of the city remains underwater, and it isn't clear if displaced residents -- now scattered around the country -- will ever return.

"The eventual reconstruction of the marketplace is going to be bigger [than other storms], but there will be more pain felt by the banks in the wake of this hurricane versus others," said Jefferson Harralson, an analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods Inc. in Atlanta.

Unlike some of its more diversified rivals, Hancock has a 43% market share in its namesake Hancock County, one of the areas hardest hit by Katrina. The bank has $4.7 billion in assets and 107 branches. A branch in Bay St. Louis, Miss., was one of three destroyed by the storm. Another branch located just east of Gulfport was obliterated. "What's left is the vault and the sign," said Richard T. Hill, executive vice president, based in Baton Rouge, La.

But after listening to a conference call with Hancock executives late Tuesday, Andrew Stapp of boutique research firm Cohen Bros. & Co. raised his rating on the bank to "buy" from "hold."

"We believe the market is overreacting with regard to the impact of Hurricane Katrina on [Hancock] and perhaps is underestimating the long-term benefits associated with recovery efforts over the next several years," Mr. Stapp wrote in a research report. Still, he lowered earnings estimates for the bank for 2005 and 2006 based on an increase in loan-loss provisions. The bank, for its part, thinks its exposure to bad loans "is relatively limited," said Michael M. Achary, the bank's treasurer, who is based in Gulfport but is working out of the Baton Rouge office.

DOJ_NMG_0003969

In any case, Katrina is expected to cause a surge in defaults on home mortgages. In Louisiana alone, officials have estimated that as many 160,000 homes were ruined. Insurers will bear the costs of replacing those houses in many instances. To the extent that destroyed homes aren't insured against flooding, lenders or other holders of mortgage debt will face possible losses.

But "most investors have very low exposure to the affected areas," said Peter DiMartino, a strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital, an investment-banking firm in Greenwich, Conn. That is because mortgage risks are widely dispersed among lenders and investors around the world. Most U.S. home loans are bundled into mortgage-backed securities and held by banks, insurance companies, pension funds and other investors -- and most have a small exposure to the region hit by the storm.

Most lenders will allow borrowers in affected areas a grace period to delay repayments without facing extra fees, the Mortgage Bankers Association said. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, mortgage-funding providers established by Congress but owned by investors, own or guarantee around half of the $8.3 trillion of U.S. residential mortgage debt outstanding. Spokesmen for both companies said they are still assessing the situation and can't estimate its financial effect. Based on the experience of past hurricanes, however, neither company is likely to face major losses. The credit risk on most mortgages that aren't backed by Fannie, Freddie or the Federal Housing Administration is borne by holders of so-called nonagency mortgage securities. Mortgage analysts at UBS AG in New York released a report this week estimating that less than 1% of the amounts due on loans backing such securities are in the ZIP Codes most affected by Katrina.

Four Easy Pieces (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

If the feds really want to help the economy post-Katrina, here are four words: lumber, cement, shrimp and steel. They all have prices higher than necessary because of U.S. anti-dumping trade law.

Start with lumber and cement, which will soon be in great demand to rebuild the tens of thousands of damaged homes. Prices are sure to rise as reconstruction begins, but thanks to U.S. tariffs as high as 27% on Canadian lumber, American home buyers already pay an extra $1,000 on average for their shelter. The same goes for U.S. duties on Mexican cement, which have averaged 55% since 1990. Now would be an ideal time for Washington to declare a truce in these trade spats and reduce the price of rebuilding.

Then there's shrimp, an increasingly popular part of the American diet whose prices may well rise sharply in Katrina's wake. Louisiana shrimpers represent the bulk of the domestic industry and were all but wiped out by the hurricane. According to the Consuming Industries Trade Action Coalition, shrimp as a share of total food consumption increased 45% among low-income families from 2000 to 2002. And while the U.S. shrimp industry employed 13,000 in 2002, shrimp-consuming industries employed 250,000.

So this is also a perfect time to review the anti-dumping duties the U.S. imposes on foreign shrimp. The U.S. International Trade Commission, which determines these things, is already scheduled to meet this month to consider relief for India and Thai shrimp after the December 2004 tsunami. But the ITC ought to do even more post-Katrina for American consumers and waive duties on all foreign shrimp.

And while we're at it, consider specialty steel, which depends on hydrogen gas produced in the Gulf. Steel Dynamics, a mini-mill in Butler, Indiana, has already said it will stop making cold-rolled, galvanized and painted sheet products until its hydrogen gas supplies are restored. Steel prices are rising fast in anticipation of tight supplies, which means higher prices for American companies making cars, appliances and many other products. So how about lifting anti-dumping tariffs on imported steel to ease any domestic shortages and help U.S. manufacturers trying to stay competitive?

The Beltway impulse is to assume that the only way to respond to a natural disaster is to spend more money. But these four easy trade pieces would help everyone without taxpayers having to spend a dime.

Crude Oil Supplies Overwhelm Refineries (FT)

By Carola Hoyos And Javier Blas

Financial Times, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003970

The US and Europe are releasing more emergency crude oil than refineries in the Gulf of Mexico can handle, reinforcing suspicions that governments are using the crisis triggered by Hurricane Katrina to cap record oil prices.

US refineries will on Friday begin to bid for the 30m barrels of crude oil that the US government is releasing from the its emergency reserves but, with many refineries disabled, analysts say the additional supply may not be needed.

"I will not be surprised if they don't bid for all the barrels," said Katherine Spector, of JPMorgan in New York.

Data released on Thursday suggested that, while petrol is in short supply, oil companies still have plenty of crude in their inventories. The companies' stocks fell 6.45m barrels last week, significantly less than the 13.6m barrels of production capacity lost to the hurricane suggesting that the shortfall did not warrant the scale of the governments' responses.

President George W. Bush has insisted that the US Strategic Petroleum Reserve, which holds nearly 700m barrels of crude oil, will release supplies to relieve shortages, not to depress prices.

The same line has been taken by the International Energy Agency, the industrial countries' oil watchdog, which last week announced a 2m-barrels-a-day emergency release for the next 30 days. That total of 60m barrels includes the 30m barrels from the US's SPR. Société Générale, the Paris-based bank, estimates that the emergency stocks released more than cover last week's loss of crude production and the continuing losses expected over the next 40 days.

Frédéric Lasserre, the bank's chief oil analyst, said the emergency stocks of crude released covered 154 per cent of the lost production.

The excess oil comes on top of commercial crude inventories in the US that are well above 2004 levels and the average over the past five years.

But Mr Lasserre said emergency stockpiles of petrol released by Europe only covered half the loss caused by Hurricane Katrina.

Five US refineries, with a combined capacity of more than 1.1m b/d, 5 per cent of the country's total, were still closed on Thursday.

Samuel Bodman, US energy secretary, said it would take "at least three months" to get them producing. Refineries process crude oil into petrol, diesel, jet fuel and other products, so shutting down a refinery reduces the need for crude but also curtails the supply of petroleum products.

In spite of that, more than 60 per cent of the total international emergency stocks that are being released consist of oil, with petrol accounting for 18.7 per cent. The rest is heating oil and fuel oil.

The US's SPR only contains crude oil, while European countries stock both oil and petroleum products.

Mr Bush criticised the Clinton administration for using the SPR in 2000 to manipulate markets and refused to tap it as prices reached records and pressure from Democrats grew earlier this year. But shortly before the hurricane, oil prices rose to $60 a barrel and there were signs that high oil prices were affecting the economy in the US and beyond.

Wal-Mart warned that its bottom line was suffering because record petrol prices meant its customers had less money to spend in the stores. Meanwhile Asian countries, such as Indonesia or the Philippines, began to blame the decline in their growth and the value of their currency on high oil prices. US oil prices rose 12 cents on Thursday to $64.49 a barrel.

'A Significantly Slower Recovery' (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 9, 2005

Now for the hard part.

In the first days after Hurricane Katrina, repair crews made good progress bringing oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico back to life. But restoration of energy output to pre-Katrina levels stalled late this week as industry specialists began addressing some of the worst damage to the region's sprawling energy infrastructure.

Ten days after the hurricane barreled ashore, gulf oil production Thursday was less than 40% of normal levels, down from 43% one day earlier, according to the U.S. Minerals Management Service. The lower number was because an oil company that had not previously reported finally did, says Gary Strasburg, an MMS spokesman.

Natural gas output Thursday stood at 59%, almost unchanged from the previous day.

DOJ_NMG_0003971

"This is significantly slower than the recovery from (Hurricane) Ivan," says Jamal Qureshi of PFC Energy in Washington, D.C. "The easy stuff has been brought back. … Now the tough stuff is ahead of us."

Oil prices, which had eased a bit earlier in the week, rose slightly on the discouraging gulf numbers. Light sweet crude for October delivery closed at $64.49 a barrel, up 12 cents, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gasoline futures settled slightly higher at $2.0222 a gallon, while heating oil fell more than 3 cents to settle at $1.9296.

Industry crews face several obstacles before they can fully restore production. As Katrina bore down on New Orleans, it scythed through waters thick with oil platforms and onto a shoreline hosting the heart of U.S. refining capacity. When the waters eventually crested, more than 95% of gulf oil production and 88% of gas output was "shut in," industry parlance for closed off. The region accounts for more than one-quarter of U.S. domestic oil and gas production.

Even industry veterans have been stunned at Katrina's power. "Massive waves mangled production equipment and piping, living quarters. … I've been doing this for 35 years, and I've never seen such damage," says Kenneth Neveaux of Houston-based Apache, an independent oil and gas company that lost eight platforms to the storm.

More than three dozen oil platforms were capsized by the powerful storm, says Rebecca Watson, assistant secretary of the Interior. Earlier this week, she told Congress it will take "weeks or even months before we are back up to 100%."

One big worry: A quartet of major deep-water platforms that produce 10% of gulf oil "suffered extensive damage which could take up to 3 to 6 months to bring back on line," Watson said.

Royal Dutch Shell's Mars platform, operating in almost 3,000 feet of water, is among those hardest hit. Lying 130 miles southeast of New Orleans, Mars normally produces about 147,000 barrels each day. On Aug. 31, Shell confirmed on its website that the unit "was significantly damaged in the storm." Thursday, Shell spokeswoman Darci Sinclair said no further information was yet available.

The destruction at sea was mirrored by the damage ashore. Katrina flooded refineries with several feet of briny soup, blew out windows and cut electricity. Ten refineries, which turn crude oil into products such as gasoline and heating oil, were closed by the storm; five others had to throttle back. Including some Midwestern facilities that closed because they ran dry of crude, 20% of U.S. refining capacity was affected, says Bob Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical & Refiners Association.

Four refineries, the largest a 325,000 barrels-a-day Chevron facility in Pascagoula, Miss., likely will remain closed for some time. Together, the facilities account for about 5% of total capacity — more than enough to make a difference in today's skittish market.

"The ones that are not on yet are probably the ones that are going to require more time and attention. Now we are really getting into the tougher part of the job," Slaughter says. "I don't think that people really understand the magnitude of the damage that's been done."

In some places, specialists are still trying to assess Katrina's legacy. The condition of the undersea pipelines that ferry oil and gas from the offshore production sites to land-based processing facilities is a big unknown.

And some experts are beginning to worry that the near-silence from pipeline companies masks serious trouble with the 33,000 miles of plumbing that snake beneath the gulf. "It's taking a long time to get the answer. Educated guess: No news is bad news," says David Pursell of the Houston-based consultancy Pickering Energy Partners.

Gas Inventories At A 5-Year Low (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

The nation's gasoline inventories fell last week to their lowest levels in almost five years, the government said yesterday, quantifying for the first time Hurricane Katrina's effect on energy supplies and production.

Americans bought and used about as much gasoline as they did a year earlier - 9.3 million barrels a day - in the week that ended last Friday, but gasoline inventories fell 2.2 percent from the previous week because of supply and production disruptions, the Energy Department reported.

The figures did not include the Labor Day weekend, and gasoline stocks may have declined even more since then.

DOJ_NMG_0003972

The hurricane has reduced oil and gasoline production, refining and distribution in the Gulf of Mexico region, and energy companies are still trying to recover lost capacity.

For consumers, the disruptions meant high retail prices and, in some areas, spot shortages of gasoline.

A gallon of regular unleaded gasoline was selling yesterday for an average of $3.03 nationwide, down from $3.04 on Wednesday, according to AAA. Average prices peaked at $3.06 on Monday and briefly spiked up to $4 to $5 during the last week in some cities, Atlanta among them.

Crude oil prices rose 12 cents, to $64.49 a barrel yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Up to 10 refineries in the Gulf Coast that account for 10 percent of the country's capacity were shut and two critical pipelines that bring gasoline and other fuels to the South, the Middle Atlantic States and the Northeast were not operating at full capacity for much of last week. Six refineries are still shut and about half of the gulf's oil and natural gas production remains out of service.

All told, gasoline inventories fell to 190.1 million barrels as of Friday, down 8.6 percent from the period a year earlier. Measured another way, the nation has inventories that could last 20.4 days given normal demand and no additional production.

"That's the lowest in five years," said Fadel Gheit, an energy analyst at Oppenheimer & Company.

"It doesn't matter that if I have whatever level of inventories, but I am consuming a lot more, therefore it will last me fewer days," Mr. Gheit said.

Where Do Gas Prices Go Next? (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

Gasoline prices have begun to ease, but even when all Gulf Coast refineries are running again later this year, consumers may not see a full retreat to pre-Katrina levels.

That conclusion, analysts say, stems from a simple equation involving the cost of a barrel of crude, markups by middlemen, and little margin for error in the nation's energy infrastructure. Across the country, gasoline prices soared into uncharted territory - above $3 per gallon last weekend - stunning motorists and prompting many to shorten or skip Labor Day trips.

Concerns about price gouging by gas stations are being investigated in state capitals and the halls of Congress. Prices have already begun to pull back, as some refineries and long-distance pipelines affected by hurricane Katrina return to full strength.

How far and how quickly prices fall now depend on a few critical factors: when four damaged refineries come back on line, how quickly emergency shipments of gasoline from foreign refineries arrive, and most important, where oil prices go from here.

"As long as crude is high, the gasoline price will be high, although it doesn't have to be where it was the past few days," says Ron Gold, an energy analyst at the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation.

Oil prices fell Thursday to around $64 a barrel in midday trading after Energy Department figures showed higher than expected post-Katrina inventories.

The department's Energy Information Administration said this week it expects gasoline to reach $2.60 a gallon by year end and to average $2.40 a gallon in 2006. Despite the predicted drop, that would still be above July levels, which the EIA pegged at nearly $2.32 per gallon.

Of course, as with all forecasts, actual prices - like gas mileage - may vary. But prices in the mid-to-high $2 range represent a significant shift in what is, for many Americans, the most visible gauge of energy costs.

The question for the economy is how much gas prices will affect overall consumer spending, which drives two-thirds of US growth. So far, recession is not in most forecasts, but high energy costs have been a key predictor of economic slowdowns in the past.

And gas prices are just part of the picture. Although gasoline accounts for about half of America's oil use, surging energy prices in recent months may show up most sharply in heating costs this winter. Natural gas, home heating oil, and electricity costs are all rising.

DOJ_NMG_0003973

The thought may be enough to prompt a rush for cardigan sweaters. But the price of those may edge up, too, as oil prices ripple through trucking and shipping costs.

Several factors, thankfully, could soften the shock at the gas pump and beyond.

For one thing, everything from automobiles to refrigerators to factories are more energy efficient now than they were in the 1970s. This shelters the economy somewhat from price swings.

Emergency responses to hurricane Katrina are helping as well: The Bush administration has eased regional gas-blend rules, so supplies can move freely to wherever they're needed. Strategic petroleum reserves are being tapped. Foreign supplies of gasoline are on the way. And on the Gulf Coast, which contains almost half of America's refining capacity, oil companies are racing to bring refineries and platforms back on line.

"The panic component of the gasoline prices should drop back down to something more in line with oil prices," says John Tobin of the Energy Literacy Project in Colorado.

Any price gouging that occurred in the wake of Katrina may be squelched soon, as federal and state watchdogs track down consumer allegations.

Indeed, as Katrina pushed up wholesale prices for gas by 50 cents or more overnight, America's streetscape grew surreal. In one stretch of road near Boston, retail prices for regular unleaded ranged from $3.04 to $3.69 per gallon last Friday.

"To some extent [price gouging] has happened," says Mark Routt, an analyst at Energy Security Analysis Inc. in Wakefield, Mass. "But my understanding is that it's been relatively rare and isolated."

In general, gas prices are driven by predictable economics: The price for crude oil, costs of refining and transporting, operating costs for 167,000 gas stations, and profit margins for all parties.

Prices typically drop heading into winter as driving season winds down. The gas tab also varies by state depending on tax levels and environmental regulation.

As for crude oil, it is measured in barrels that equate to 42 gallons each. "At $65 a barrel, that translates into $1.55 plus per gallon," before refining, distributing, or taxing, says Mr. Gold of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation.

Economic forecasts vary on where that base-level price heads to next.

"World oil markets are fundamentally tight," says A.F. Alhajji, an oil economist at Ohio Northern University in Ada, Ohio. He wouldn't be surprised by oil at $75 oil a barrel in coming months.

But others say the current high price could give producers an incentive to reopen wells that weren't profitable at $35 a barrel. And it gives consumers an incentive to conserve. "Demand responds to the price signal," says Gus Foucher of Economy.com in West Chester, Pa., who predicts oil will cost $50 by the end of 2006. "Once we get through the hurricane season I think things will calm down a bit."

After Buying Surge, Demand For Gasoline Eases (LAT)

By James F. Peltz And Claire Hoffman

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

Hello, tipping point? Drivers' demand for gasoline appears to have downshifted since Hurricane Katrina sent pump prices soaring above $3 a gallon across much of the nation.

Katrina initially sparked panic buying, sporadic shortages and televised images of long lines at some service stations. Then, consumers pulled back as prices hit record highs, analysts said Thursday.

"America topped its tanks, and then the knee-jerk reaction was: `I'm not going to pay $3.19 a gallon for gas,' " said Tom Kloza, chief analyst at Oil Price Information Service, an energy research firm.

Demand was likely to taper off anyway, because the Labor Day weekend marks the unofficial end of the busy summer driving season. In addition, gas prices already were at or near record levels even before Katrina hit Aug. 29.

But in the aftermath of Katrina, at least one gasoline seller reported a 15 percent drop in sales over Labor Day weekend compared with a year earlier, Kloza said.

The Energy Department issues weekly reports on gasoline demand and supplies, and many analysts expected its report Thursday to show a surge in demand during the four days after Katrina's devastation, reflecting the panic buying.

DOJ_NMG_0003974

Yet the agency's statistics arm, the Energy Information Administration, reported Thursday that in the week ended Sept. 2, gasoline demand fell 4 percent from the prior week to 9.03 million barrels a day.

Analysts promptly labeled the data as suspect, contending that reliable numbers were hard to obtain in the days immediately after Katrina made landfall.

With about 20 percent of U.S. refining capacity either shut down or operating at reduced levels last week, compiling precise data was difficult and "we question the accuracy of these numbers," analyst Jacques Rousseau of the investment firm Friedman Billings Ramsey & Co. said in a report to clients.

Meanwhile, prices of gasoline and crude-oil futures edged higher in commodities trading after falling for several days.

The U.S. benchmark grade of light crude oil for October delivery rose 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel, and gasoline for October delivery inched up 1.33 cents to $2.036 a gallon.

The upswing came after the government reported no daily progress on the Gulf Coast's overall effort to rebuild its damaged energy facilities, a stark reminder that the recovery is expected to take months and require enormous investment.

About 60 percent of the region's oil production remained shut down, up from 57 percent on Wednesday, and the amount of natural-gas output that remained offline was unchanged at 40 percent, according to the U.S. Minerals Management Service.

The average price of self-serve regular nationwide slipped to $3.03 a gallon from $3.042 on Wednesday, according to AAA.

U.S. Gasoline Use Fell 4% Last Week (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball And Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Americans used 4% less gasoline amid skyrocketing pump prices last week than they did the week before Hurricane Katrina hit, the federal government reported. But whether that indicates consumers have decided to conserve or merely that they couldn't find all the gasoline they wanted isn't clear.

The figures came amid signs that Katrina's effect on the nation's energy markets will continue to be felt in the weeks and months to come. The Department of Energy's Energy Information Administration said yesterday that stores of gasoline last week fell below the average range for the period, in a time when refineries are running flat-out to meet demand, after the hurricane knocked out Gulf Coast refineries. Meanwhile, the U.S. Coast Guard said yesterday that 52 energy-production platforms in the Gulf of Mexico were missing and 58 were damaged by the hurricane, nearly double the report of missing or damaged platforms Tuesday.

Following weeks in which U.S. gasoline use stood at more than 9.4 million barrels a day, it fell to about nine million barrels in the week ended last Friday, the EIA reported. Use fell by a similar amount compared with the year-earlier period. However, EIA officials cautioned that one week doesn't make a long-term trend.

The figures didn't include data from the Labor Day weekend or from this week. It's also unclear whether the weather simply reduced driving in the affected states, though government analysts doubted that explained the full drop. Tom Kloza, chief oil analyst with the Oil Price Information Service, a Wall, N.J., industry-research firm, said fuel retailers he has talked to have reported a particularly large drop-off in demand since Saturday. "It dropped off the table," he said -- a shift that, if true, wouldn't be reflected until the next government report, due out next week.

Yesterday's EIA numbers were the second indication in as many days that Americans might be tempering their consumptive ways in response to sharply higher gasoline prices. On Wednesday, the EIA slashed its prediction for U.S. oil-demand growth for the full year, "largely due to higher prices."

Meanwhile, the federal Minerals Management Service reported that 49.6% of combined oil and natural-gas production in the Gulf was still offline yesterday, slightly more than the 49.4% that was shut down on Tuesday. In the days after the hurricane, offshore operators were able to put workers back on numerous platforms and quickly restore about half of the daily output from the Gulf, which accounts for about a quarter of domestic oil and natural-gas production.

But since Tuesday, virtually no additional production has been brought back online. "We've restored the low-hanging fruit and I suspect there will be diminishing returns from here on out," said David Dismukes, associate director of the Louisiana State University Center for Energy Studies in Baton Rouge, La.

DOJ_NMG_0003975

Yesterday's bearish news on the pace of infrastructure repairs raised specific concerns about the supply of natural gas for the coming home-heating season. Crews are canvassing the Gulf to determine which pipelines, hub facilities and platforms require repairs.

October natural-gas futures yesterday rose 14.6 cents to close at $11.347 a million British thermal units. Crude-oil futures finished up 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel, up 48% year-to-date. Gasoline futures rose 1.58 cents to $2.04 a gallon.

Separately, British Airways and Singapore Airlines, two of the largest international carriers, raised fuel surcharges on most airline tickets.

Governor Criticizes Bush, Oil Industry Over Record Gas Prices (BJ)

By Mike Sunnucks

The Business Journal, September 9, 2005

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano criticized the Bush administration Thursday for failing to deal with the oil industry and record high gasoline prices.

Napolitano said the Bush administration has not been aggressive enough in dealing with sky high gasoline prices in recent years and in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The Democratic governor said the Republican White House has not been interested in consumers when it comes to the energy industry.

Phoenix area gasoline prices spiked after Katrina slammed New Orleans and the Gulf Coast. Valley gasoline prices are well above $3 per gallon and higher than California, which usually has higher prices.

Arizona receives more than two-thirds of its gasoline from California but prices still spiked after the hurricane. That worries state officials from both political parties.

Napolitano and state Attorney General Terry Goddard, also a Democrat, announced Wednesday they are investigating gasoline and oil companies for possible state antitrust violations and price collusion.

The governor said she met with oil industry representatives this week and did not receive satisfactory answers to why Arizona prices spiked after Katrina and why state prices are higher than California.

Napolitano said she wants the industry to show some transparency when it comes to pricing and supplies and more action out of the Bush administration.

The governor has pressed President Bush several times in recent years after gasoline price hikes, asking the federal government to investigate pricing, supply and possible antitrust issues. She said the administration has not responded aggressively to those requests.

Some Arizona Republicans favor temporarily suspending 5 percent state fuel tax to help lower gasoline prices. Napolitano said that might not have the desired impact if oil companies and gas stations opt to raise prices even more.

The Bush administration and governor have lifted Phoenix area clean air fuel regulations to allow the sale of various fuel blends in order to improve supplies.

President Bush has also released oil supplies from federal reserves in hope of bolstering national supplies and easing prices.

The governor also joined the chorus of criticism over federal handling of hurricane relief efforts, saying the Federal Emergency Management Administration is "disorganized" and that embattled agency director Michael Brown should be fired.

The Arizona Democrat also said congressional Republicans bear some responsibility for hurricane relief problems, pointing to reductions in funding for New Orleans levee systems and state emergency management programs.

Goddard and Napolitano also back a proposed state anti-price gouging law aimed at gasoline stations. That plan has failed to gain support from Republican legislators.

Democrats hope to make record high gasoline and crude oil prices and GOP ties to the energy industry a top issue in next year's elections.

Republicans, including Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, agree that there were problems with hurricane relief efforts and are concerned about gasoline price hikes.

DOJ_NMG_0003976

The GOP argues some of the hurricane blame goes to state and local officials in Louisiana. Napolitano said Thursday that Louisiana Democratic Gov. Kathleen Blanco and GOP Govs. Haley Barbour of Mississippi and Bob Riley of Alabama have done good jobs in dealing with the storm and its aftermath.

For more: www.governor.state.az.us.

Gasoline Thefts Increasing As Fuel Prices Keep Rising (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

As fuel prices rise, and the tempers of American drivers with them, so, too, has the number of people who are stealing gasoline.

From Maine to Oklahoma, gas station owners are reporting a surge in the number of drivers who pull up to the pump, fill up and drive off without paying. The incidents, known as "drive offs" - which are typically concentrated at stations near big cities and Interstates - are forcing stations across the country to adopt prepay policies for cash customers.

Gasoline theft cost the industry - made up largely of convenience stores - $237 million in 2004, trade associations estimate, and the figure is on track to double this year, said Matthew Kussman, the director of business development at GasPriceWatch.com, which tracks gasoline prices and is starting a national database of theft incidents.

"There is a direct correlation between theft and prices being the highest they have ever been," Mr. Kussman said. "And Hurricane Katrina has not helped the situation."

Station owners report that they have sometimes faced frightening confrontations with gas thieves.

Last month, a station owner in Alabama was struck and killed after he tried to get in front of a sport utility vehicle whose driver was trying to leave without paying.

"This is absolutely a concern," said Holly Tuminello, the vice president of the Petroleum Marketers Association of America. "People get mad when they fill up their car and become irrational at the person selling gas at their little store."

Store owners and convenience store managers interviewed around the country said they had gone from none to a few cases a week to several a day. The thefts began to spike, the station owners say, around midsummer, when gas prices hit $2.50 a gallon. And prices have pushed higher since then. AAA reported yesterday that a gallon of regular unleaded gasoline was selling for $3.03 on average nationwide, down from $3.04 on Wednesday. Average prices peaked at $3.06 on Monday and spiked at $4 to $5 in some cities.

"We are up to two or three a day," said Kelly Porter, a clerk at the Citgo Quick Mart in Norfolk, Va. "They pump and make sure we aren't looking and just drive off."

In contrast to heavily urbanized areas on the East and West Coasts where nearly all stations require prepayment by cash or credit card, many stations elsewhere in the nation allow customers to pump first because it is both convenient for drivers and more lucrative. People who prepay tend to put less gas in their cars. But, it allows for theft.

People who pump without paying can be seen in all sorts of cars - from late-model sedans to brand new S.U.V.'s - and include college students and even the occasional retiree, station owners said. In June members of a theft ring in Florida were arrested for using trucks to siphon off gallons of gas from stations.

Wyman Tapley, the owner of Tapley's Grill and Variety in Bar Harbor, Maine, said he was so stunned by the drive-offs that the first time it happened, he thought a customer had simply been chatting with other locals, forgot to pay and would return the next day, as happens from time to time.

"I just didn't think this could happen this far north," Mr. Tapley said. "We live on an island so it is hard to believe people think they could do that and get away with it." Arrests of gas thieves is rare, gas station owners and operators said.

In response to the wave of thefts, many individual station owners and convenience store companies who previously were more trusting are requiring customers to pay cash before they pump. That represents a sea change for stations in small towns and many American cities. Some cities have passed laws to require prepay, and others, like New Jersey, require an attendant to pump gas.

DOJ_NMG_0003977

On Wednesday, Cumberland Farms, a chain of convenience stores, reversed its position and decided that it would require drivers to pay before pumping in 140 of its 900 stations in the Northeast and Florida. The stations are in "places where the other competitors are all prepay," said Christen Graham, a spokeswoman for the company. "Cumberland farms felt it actually became a target. So they have changed the policy."

Wawa, the Pennsylvania-based convenience store chain, said last week that its 540 stores in five states would begin to require prepayment. "Drive-offs may create unsafe situations on store lots, and contribute to higher prices," the company said in a statement.

Drivers who pay with credit cards at the pump - 54 percent last year - are not affected by prepay policies.

"It is not too good for people who come here every day," said Benny Nat, whose family owns a Citgo Quick Mart, in Des Moines.

Generally, store owners selling gas are loath to require drivers to prepay. Drivers often underestimate how much it will cost to fill up, and buy less, said Jeff Lenard, the spokesman for the National Association of Convenience Stores, in Alexandria Va.

Further, prepay drivers tend to pick up fewer bags of M&M's and bottles of water, and those who are required to prepay, especially in times of high prices, may opt to do so with a credit card, which raises fees and chews at the margins of the station owners.

"Most retailers don't make their money at the pump," Mr. Lenard said. "They really need customers to get in the store."

The QuikTrip Corporation, a convenience store and gas station company in Tulsa, has come up with a solution that other companies will probably ape. Cash customers provide gas station clerks with their driver's license, who in turn give the drivers a plastic card that activates the pump, but allows them to pay after pumping. If the driver does not pay the is deactivated and the license number is turned over to the police.

"Two years ago in Tulsa we were losing $4 million a year in gas rips," said Mike Thornbrugh a spokesman for QuikTrip, which operates stations in nine states. "And since we have instituted this, you would be lucky to see losses of a couple hundred dollars a month. We love it, and law enforcement loves it, too."

US Changes Position On Cuba's Weapons (CSM)

By Tom Regan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

In 2002, John Bolton, then US undersecretary for arms control and international security (and current US ambassador to the United Nations) said that Cuba had "biological weapons capabilities" and was sharing them with "rogue nations." Mr. Bolton and the Bush administration were adamant that Cuba was a potential threat to the United States because of this.

So it came as somewhat of a surprise last Tuesday when the US retreated from this early claim that Cuba has "an offensive biological weapons effort." The new position was made public in a State Department document released last Tuesday, when almost the entire United States was focusing on the effects of Hurricane Katrina in the Gulf of Mexico region.

Knight Ridder reported that the Bush administration acknowledged in the document that 'there is a split view' among intelligence analysts on the question.

The Knight Ridder story notes that this is the first time that the US has "publicly softened" its charge that Cuba had biological weapons, which has been "controversial from the outset."

The Economic Times of India said the new position amounts to a "volte face" by the US. The new finding on Cuba is based on a US intelligence-community-wide assessment, known as a National Intelligence Estimate, completed last year. In that estimate, which is classified, 'the Intelligence Community unanimously held that it was unclear whether Cuba has an active biological weapons effort now, or even had one in the past,' the State Department report states. A senior State Department official, briefing reporters on the document, said biological weapons programs are 'some of the most difficult activities to verify' because the facilities needed are small.

The BTC News blog points out that during the Senate confirmation hearings for Mr. Bolton (who was never approved by the Senate, instead getting his job via presidential recess appointment), one of the charges leveled against him was "a substantiated accusation that he tried to have two State Department intelligence analysts reassigned when they wouldn't back his position that Cuba had an active biological warfare program."

DOJ_NMG_0003978

The US position on Cuba highlights a problem that has been pointed out by opponents of the Bush administration - that policymakers interpret the information in whatever way suits them at the particular moment, often ignoring the cautions of the intelligence community or pressuring them to change their views. David Adams, the New York Times Latin America correspondent, hits on this point in an opinion piece. Government intelligence experts 'unanimously held that it was unclear whether Cuba has an active offensive biological warfare effort now, or even had one in the past,', the report says. But, using the same information, the policymakers insist the 2003 finding 'remains correct.'

They base their concern on Cuba's 'technical capability' to pursue bioweapons thanks to the island's highly advanced biotech and pharmaceutical industry. Critics say such a hypothetical scenario is hardly the basis for making such a serious allegation.

Does the lead-up to the Iraq war ring a bell?

GlobalSecurity.org, a leading security think tank, reports that Cuba's biotechnology industry is "one of the most advanced in emerging countries." As a result, Bush administration officials, like Bolton, believe that Cuba is "capable of producing biological warfare agents, and Cuba's biotechnology industry could produce many types of toxins" although there is no evidence to suggest that this is the case.

The Associated Press reported that the 108-page document, while admitting to a "split in opinion" over Cuba, claimed that "Russia, Iran, North Korea, and Syria continue to maintain biological weapons programs," while China "maintains some elements" of a program. China denied the charge.

China Says North Korea Nuclear Talks Will Resume Tuesday (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons program will resume Tuesday, China said Thursday, but even as the announcement came from Beijing, a new player who seems likely to complicate the talks took the stage.

Jay Lefkowitz, an assertive, voluble former White House aide, was appointed last month to be a special envoy on human rights in North Korea, and made his first public appearance on Thursday. He said he planned to publicize whatever he learned about human rights abuses in North Korea, like allegations that the government holds political prisoners in concentration camps where they are "starved to death," as he put it.

North Korea typically reacts quickly and angrily to critical statements from Washington. In fact, just the announcement that Mr. Lefkowitz was being appointed to the new position was a factor in the North's decision to postpone resumption of the disarmament talks by two weeks.

President Bush was required to appoint an envoy by the North Korean Human Rights Act, passed last October. The White House waited more than 10 months to fill the post, with State Department officials cautioning that the envoy would complicate their work. But conservative Christian groups and other important supporters pushed the White House.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice embraced Mr. Lefkowitz's mission at his swearing-in ceremony on Tuesday, saying, "People all over the world have a right to live in dignity," and, "We believe the people of North Korea to be no different."

But others in the government are concerned that North Korea may use any critical statements made by Mr. Lefkowitz as a reason not to cooperate in disarmament talks. The administration acknowledged over the summer that it had made a concerted effort to tone down its comments on North Korea because, through the spring, the government there seized on each new criticism as a justification for refusing to return to the talks.

The talks resumed in August after a break of more than a year. But they recessed Aug. 7 because the parties could not agree on a statement of principles. The six nations involved are the United States, North Korea, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0003979

Mr. Lefkowitz made it clear that his work is intended to be wholly separate from that of Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief American negotiator at the disarmament talks. Mr. Lefkowitz reports directly to Ms. Rice, not Mr. Hill, and will have no role in the disarmament talks, he noted. His work and the disarmament negotiations, he said, are to proceed "in parallel tracks."

But when asked by reporters whether he was worried that his policy of publicizing North Korea's human rights problems might sabotage the talks, he said the administration supported his work, and his issues were "morally unambiguous."

Asked if he would advocate withholding food and other aid from the Korea, Mr. Lefkowitz seemed to leave the option open.

"We must be willing to look at all aspects of our relations with North Korea and our allies' relationship with North Korea," he said. Ms. Rice has repeatedly said the United States will continue supplying aid to the North Korean people no matter what the government does.

The talks are complicated in any case. On Thursday, as soon as China announced the talks would resume Tuesday, several parties restated positions that helped push the last round into a stalemate.

North Korea called it "unimaginable" that it would give up the right to pursue a peaceful nuclear power program - a chief sticking point - even if it gave up its nuclear weapons. The government also layered on a new public demand: that the United States, which has cut its troops in South Korea by a third, withdraw all its troops from the peninsula.

Japan expressed hope for the new talks but also said it would urge North Korea, again, to clear up the dispute over Japanese citizens kidnapped by North Korea decades ago.

South Korea urged the international community "to take the lead in establishing a rehabilitation program for North Korea," a senior Korean official told The Korea Times in Seoul.

Mr. Lefkowitz said he would meet with foreign governments and nongovernmental organizations to promote human rights issues - including the allegation that North Korea "holds 200,000 people in concentration camps," subject to "torture, starvation, disease and exposure."

These are not new allegations, but administration officials have seldom spoken of them in recent months.

North Korea Stands Fast On Nuclear Energy Use (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Two prominent experts on North Korea who recently made an unpublicized visit to the reclusive nation briefed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday as U.S. negotiators prepared to return to Beijing for a renewal of six-nation disarmament talks.

China announced yesterday that the talks would resume next Tuesday, after a recess of more than five weeks after the participants were unable to reach agreement on a "statement of principles" that would guide negotiations to eliminate North Korea's nuclear programs. Japan, South Korea and Russia are also participants in the talks.

John W. Lewis, a retired Stanford University professor, and Siegfried S. Hecker, retired director of Los Alamos National Laboratory, met with Rice yesterday afternoon to provide details of their talks with key North Korean officials, including the top negotiators for the North Korean side.

The two men summarized their conversations in Pyongyang, made some suggestions for bridging gaps, and provided an assessment of the chances of reaching an agreement, according to one U.S. official.

During the talks with Lewis and Hecker, North Korean officials made it clear that they intend to insist that the statement of principles acknowledge North Korea's right to peaceful use of nuclear power, according to Charles L. "Jack" Pritchard, a former State Department Korea expert, who accompanied the two men.

To varying degrees, South Korea, China and Russia have supported the North Korean position, while Japan has backed the U.S. stance that North Korea's behavior gives it no right to even a peaceful program, except for research for medical, agricultural or industrial use.

"The North Koreans saw a chink in the armor," Pritchard said. "They have concluded this is a winning argument."

Pritchard said that as a result, any statement emerging from the talks appears less likely to be as clear and definitive as U.S. officials had hoped. This in turn might drag out future negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0003980

To prod North Korea to return to the talks, Rice had declared that the United States recognized North Korea's sovereignty. From the North Korean perspective, a sovereign nation has a right to peaceful nuclear energy, and one way the United States can demonstrate that it respects North Korea's sovereignty is to support that right.

North Korea's position -- which also included a demand for a light-water reactor to compensate it for giving up its current nuclear facilities -- has led to sometimes heated discussions within the Bush administration over how to counter Pyongyang's gambit, U.S. officials said.

Some officials, such as Assistant Secretary Christopher R. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, have contended that the issue of whether North Korea has a theoretical right to peaceful nuclear energy is not as important as the main question of whether an agreement to eliminate North Korea's nuclear programs can be reached in the first place. Moreover, even if North Korea wanted to build a civilian nuclear program, none of the countries at the table now would even be willing to fund it.

"The issue for some of the partners is whether . . . North Korea could then reclaim a right to nuclear energy," Hill said last month. "If you ask me, it's not exactly a showstopper issue -- the real issue is getting rid of all their nuclear programs."

But other officials have pushed back, saying that such a concession would allow the North Koreans to chip away at an agreement, especially if they managed to hide materials or programs not discovered during the verification process.

Some of the internal debate has centered on arcane and detailed discussion over various articles of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Some argue that the first two articles support a theoretical right, but others argue that that hinges on compliance with the fourth article, which requires a country to live up to its obligations. North Korea has violated those obligations and withdrawn from the treaty.

Some conservatives in the administration, however, believe the administration has weakened its position in the North Korean talks by agreeing to support the European negotiations with Iran on its nuclear programs, and by quickly reaching a deal this year with India to supply it with civilian nuclear energy. Iran has violated the Non-Proliferation Treaty, and India never joined it.

Yushchenko Sacks Ukraine Government (FT)

By Tom Warner

Financial Times, September 9, 2005

Ukraine's President Viktor Yushchenko yesterday sacked his cabinet and appointed a loyal and moderate ally to take over as prime minister from the populist Yulia Tymoshenko, after accusing her of engaging in divisive conflicts with other members of his political team.

Mr Yushchenko said Ms Tymoshenko and his national security chief, Petro Poroshenko, who had earlier resigned, had "lost their team spirit and trust" and had forced him to play the role of arbiter between competing institutions within his own administration.

"The president shouldn't be a nanny," Mr Yushchenko said. "I'm convinced that millions of people didn't stand on the Maidan for this," he added, referring to the central square in Kiev where his supporters gathered during last winter's Orange Revolution.

The long-simmering conflict between Ms Tymoshenko and Mr Poroshenko reached crisis point after the surprise resignation earlier this week of Olexander Zinchenko, the president's chief of staff, who on Monday accused Mr Poroshenko of corruption and interference in the media and justice system.

Mr Yushchenko appointed his old ally Yuri Yekhanurov, a veteran government official with a record of avoiding direct political confrontations, to take over as acting prime minister and form a new cabinet.

The move made clear that Mr Yushchenko would take direct personal control over government policy for the next six months until parliamentary elections due at the end of March. But his dismissal of Ms Tymoshenko is likely to lead to a damaging confrontation with her and her political team that could further bog down reforms.

Ms Tymoshenko is expected to announce that she will form a separate political bloc and run against Mr Yushchenko's Our Ukraine party, of which Mr Yekhanurov and Mr Poroshenko are senior members, in the March elections.

The elections are crucial, as they coincide with the coming into force of political reforms adopted during the Orange Revolution that transfer many executive powers to the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0003981

After the elections the premier would be chosen by the new parliament and would no longer answer to the president. Mr Yushchenko's allies are expected to attempt to cancel the political reforms in court.

¦US government officials are calling for a special Nato summit to assess Ukraine's readiness to join the military alliance as well as the candidacy of other countries, it emerged yesterday.

Kurt Volcker, a European affairs expert at the US State Department, said the US wanted to hold a summit on Nato enlargement in 2008, after a smaller meeting next year focusing on the effectiveness of the alliance.

Ukraine's President Fires Prime Minister (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

MOSCOW — The pro-Western government that swept to power in Ukraine's "Orange Revolution" collapsed today when President Viktor Yushchenko fired his popular prime minister and accepted the resignations of key political allies, struggling to quell the most serious political crisis of his 7-month-old administration.

Paralyzed with savage infighting among his supporters and stung by allegations of corruption surrounding the new democratic government, Yushchenko emptied the top ranks of his rancorous administration in an attempt to reassert his leadership of the tumultuous nation of 47 million on the eastern edge of Europe.

"The team's unity, unfortunately, has become an extremely acute problem. Interpersonal conflicts have begun to affect state affairs," Yushchenko said. "It is very difficult, but today I must remove this Gordian knot."

The president said he would appoint liberal economist Yuri Yekhanurov, a longtime ally and former economy minister, to head a new government as acting prime minister. Yekhanurov, an early architect of Ukraine's post-communist privatization program, is presently governor of the Dnipropetrovsk region in eastern Ukraine.

Yulia Tymoshenko, the sacked prime minister whose popularity had been one of Yushchenko's most valuable weapons, signaled that she will join the opposition in the March 2006 parliament elections that will determine whether the pro-reform team can hold on to power and continue Ukraine's drive toward joining the European Union.

"She's not going to work with Yushchenko," her spokesman, Vasily Chepinoga, said in a telephone interview. "Because Yushchenko and Yulia Tymoshenko see the main strategic ways of developing the country in a completely different way."

The firings followed months of increasingly uneasy relations between the president and Tymoshenko, whose populist moves to raise pensions and salaries, tax businesses, reverse shady privatization deals, and control gasoline prices have been blamed for stifling economic growth and undermining Yushchenko's free-market policies.

Soaring food and energy prices have led to widespread public disenchantment, fueled by the resignation of two top Yushchenko aides who claimed the president had allowed the new government to become tainted by the presence of several corrupt senior advisors.

A recent poll of Ukrainians by the Kiev-based Razumkov Center found that only 37% of respondents believe the new authorities are better than those tossed out when hundreds of thousands of Yushchenko supporters swept into the streets last fall and demanded the new elections that unseated former Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovich.

"This research is a confirmation that our society is gradually growing free of its illusions," Yuri Yakymenko, head of the Razumkov Center's political office in Kiev, said in a telephone interview. "After the Orange Revolution, we had very high public expectations. At first, those expectations gave huge support, both to the president and to the government. But later, the activity of the government itself, and especially the conflict right in the center of power, all of this slowly rid the public of these expectations."

Even so, he said, public support remains substantially higher than it was for Yanukovich and former President Leonid D. Kuchma.

The crisis has been long in the making, emerging not only out of the widening policy gap between Tymoshenko and Yushchenko, but also from a sharp rift between the former prime minister and Petro Poroshenko, a wealthy chocolate manufacturer who resigned today as secretary of the National Security and Defense Council.

DOJ_NMG_0003982

Analysts said Poroshenko has quietly angled to force Tymoshenko out and take her place as prime minister. Meanwhile, presidential chief of staff Oleksandr Zinchenko unleashed a firestorm this week when he resigned and accused "a small group of adventurists" outside the president's inner circle, most notably Poroshenko, of corruption.

"Corruption and bribery is again escalating. In many cases, the scale of it surpasses that of the past," Oleksandr announced at a news conference Monday.

"They have set up their own clan, they have orchestrated an information blockade of the president and pushed him into a virtual, unreal world," he said. "Step by step, they are implementing their plan to use power for their own enrichment, to privatize and to grab everything they can."

Poroshenko has denied the allegations, and Yushchenko appeared to defend him today — even as he moved to dismiss the government.

The key question now is how Yushchenko will move forward to the parliament elections next year, considered crucial because new election reform laws will transfer much of the president's power to parliament. Most analysts believe the president cannot win a legislative majority without Tymoshenko's party in alliance.

"I would like them to stay in the pro-government team," the president said, referring to both Tymoshenko and Poroshenko as "friends."

Many analysts said it was too early to predict a final split between Yushchenko and Tymoshenko, and most did not rule out an election in which the two politicians would run separate but friendly campaigns.

"Without Tymoshenko's support, clearly, Yushchenko never would have become president," Yulia Mostovaya, assistant editor of the respected liberal weekly Zerkalo Nedeli, said in a telephone interview. At the same time, she said, Yushchenko has his own wide base of support.

"He has actually created his own power, building it up on a basement of wealthy, financially strong tycoons, and that's what he's going to bring to the parliament elections," she said.

Ukraine Leader Fires Cabinet As Reform Coalition Splits (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

KIEV, Ukraine, Sept. 8 - President Viktor A. Yushchenko dismissed his prime minister and the rest of the cabinet on Thursday as internal divisions and accusations of corruption splintered the political coalition that led last year's popular uprising against his autocratic predecessor.

Facing a widening scandal, Mr. Yushchenko replaced the prime minister, Yulia V. Tymoshenko, a populist reformer whose fiery oratory drove what became known as the "Orange Revolution" but whose leadership proved divisive and debilitating in government.

In somber remarks broadcast on national television, Mr. Yushchenko said he had acted to end internal struggles for power among those who rallied tens of thousands of people in protests that ultimately overturned a fraudulent presidential election last fall.

He described his decision as a reluctant, though necessary one, saying that as president he "should not baby-sit" his squabbling aides.

"Ukraine was losing momentum, including economic pace," he said in his remarks, as transcribed and translated by the British Broadcasting Corporation. "I think members of my team listened to the president but did not hear him. And today I have cut the Gordian knot, however difficult it may be."

Barely seven months after his inauguration promised a newly transparent and democratic era, Mr. Yushchenko found himself facing a political crisis that threatened to undermine the ideals of last fall's uprising. His closest aides were not only deeply divided, but also faced accusations of the sort that dogged his predecessor, Leonid D. Kuchma.

Last Saturday, Oleksandr O. Zinchenko, Mr. Yushchenko's former campaign manager, resigned as chief of staff and later accused the administration of being "even worse" that Mr. Kuchma's. That thrust into public internal divisions that have simmered for months, hindering the government's work.

DOJ_NMG_0003983

On Thursday, almost immediately after Ms. Tymoshenko was dismissed, one of her strongest allies, the chairman of the Ukrainian Security Services, Oleksandr V. Turchinov, who was not dismissed, resigned in protest, deepening the split among Mr. Yushchenko's supporters. He warned that the president's decision "threatened the national security of Ukraine," the security services' spokeswoman said in a telephone interview, citing his resignation letter.

Another aide at the center of the accusations, Petro Poroshenko, the secretary of the newly empowered Security and Defense Council, also announced his resignation on Thursday. He denied allegations of corruption, but said he would step aside to avoid the appearance of thwarting an investigation into the charges.

At the heart of the divisions - and evidently the source of the accusations of corruption - have been the government's efforts to undo some of the dubious privatizations that took place under Mr. Kuchma. Prime Minister Tymoshenko has pressed for review of dozens of privatization deals, at times contradicting Mr. Yushchenko's more modest goal of reviewing only the most egregious.

The latest conflict involved a court ruling that overturned the 2003 privatization of a big steel factory, the Nikopol Ferroalloy Plant. The new owner, Viktor Pinchuk, Mr. Kuchma's son-in-law and one of the country's richest men, appealed, but in the meantime minority shareholders elected a new management team.

Mr. Pinchuk and the plant's workers rallied last week, calling the shareholders meeting illegal and confronting riot policemen sent to enforce the court's order. Mr. Pinchuk at the time accused Ms. Tymoshenko of trying to wrest control of the plant on behalf of her allies.

In his remarks on Thursday, Mr. Yushchenko referred to the showdown, saying that while the court's order was "deeply correct," he lamented "the intrigues behind the scenes" that nearly resulted in an armed clash.

"The finale of the story had nothing to do with attempts to hand the company from a gang over to the state," he said, "but it appeared that it was handed over from one gang to another. Therefore the people had a right to protest."

He did not elaborate.

Hryhory M. Nemyrya, an adviser of Ms. Tymoshenko's, called the dismissal of the government a sign of indecision. "The decision to punish everyone does not address the question of corruption," he said in a telephone interview. "Rooting out corruption was one of the goals of the Orange Revolution."

Since taking office, Ms. Tymoshenko and Mr. Poroshenko, the secretary of the Security and Defense Council, became powerful rivals, vying for influence and political power.

Yulia Tishchenko of the Ukrainian Center for Independent Political Research in Kiev said in a telephone interview that Mr. Yushchenko's crisis was a result of a new government structure that gave officials greater powers than their predecessors had, though overlapping ones.

"Each of the members of the new team wanted to get as much authority as they could, which was not good for the system," she said.

Mr. Yushchenko appointed a regional governor and former aide, Yury I. Yekhanurov, as acting prime minister.

It remains to be seen whether Mr. Yushchenko's action will stem a slippage of popular support among Ukrainians, whose enthusiasm for his democratic, market-oriented reforms appears to have diminished in the wake of rising inflation and an economic slowdown, as well as the government's infighting.

It is not even certain that Parliament, fractured into blocs led by many of those dismissed on Thursday, will confirm Mr. Yekhanurov or the cabinet he forms.

Ms. Tymoshenko, who leads her own faction in Parliament, did not comment on her dismissal, but Mr. Nemyrya said she would address the nation on television on Friday.

Her dismissal came as Ukraine's political parties have begun jockeying for support in advance of parliamentary elections in March. Those elections have added significance because Parliament's deputies will have the power to choose a prime minister and the government.

The expanded authority is the result of the agreement that cleared the way for a rerun of November's disputed runoff in which Mr. Yushchenko won the presidency from the originally declared winner, Viktor F. Yanukovich.

DOJ_NMG_0003984

Ms. Tishchenko said Ms. Tymoshenko's parliamentary faction showed signs of winning greater support, at the expense of the party the president once led.

Mr. Yushchenko referred poignantly and personally to the country's current state, citing the poisoning that disfigured his face on the eve of last year's election, a crime that has yet to be solved.

"A year ago, I ran for president not to see key state institutions struggling to find understanding and failing to find accord and mutual trust," he said. "That is not what I sought as I have been walking for a year with a face that is not mine."

Ukraine's President Fires Cabinet (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

MOSCOW, Sept. 8 -- Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko fired his prime minister and entire cabinet Thursday after a simmering power struggle among leaders of last year's Orange Revolution erupted into very public infighting about alleged corruption in the government's top ranks.

The president appointed Yuriy Yekhanurov, a former economics minister and regional governor, as acting prime minister, replacing the firebrand Yulia Tymoshenko, and addressed the nation in an effort to calm the worst political crisis of his young term.

The mass dismissal signaled the end of the broad coalition that led a popular revolt after fraudulent presidential elections last November and brought Yushchenko to power.

Ukraine is the largest of three former Soviet republics in which a democratic opposition has taken power in this way. Western governments have been watching it closely for evidence of whether the new leadership can maintain unity and address endemic economic and social problems inherited from the communist era.

On Thursday, Yushchenko addressed the nation after a last-ditch effort to restore unity between the Tymoshenko government and his own presidential administration.

"I knew that there were definite conflicts between those people," Yushchenko said in his televised address. "I hoped that if each of them immersed himself in work, there would not be enough time for mutual intrigues." But he concluded that the government "lost the team spirit and faith."

The dismissal was triggered by a series of resignations by top officials who charged that some of the most powerful people around Yushchenko were using their positions to enrich themselves and reneging on one of the most important promises of last December's revolt, the eradication of endemic graft.

On Saturday, Oleksandr Zinchenko, Yushchenko's chief of staff, accused by name Petro Poroshenko, head of the Defense and Security Council, and Olexander Tretyakov, a senior presidential adviser, of "cynically carrying out their plan to use government posts to their own ends."

"Corruption is now even worse than before," said Zinchenko, announcing his resignation on television in a live nationwide broadcast.

As Zinchenko, a chief architect of the revolt, spoke, Poroshenko, a confectionary and media magnate who was a key financier of the Orange Revolution, stood scowling at the back of the room. Poroshenko moved to the podium when Zinchenko finished to angrily deny the accusations before reporters who were mesmerized by the verbal shootout.

"During my time in government, I did not become one penny richer or gain one share," said Poroshenko, whose candy factories have earned him the nickname Chocolate King in Ukraine. "I ask for one concrete fact that proves the accusations here today."

Zinchenko's resignation was followed Thursday morning by the departure of Deputy Prime Minister Mykola Tomenko. "I don't want to carry responsibility for people who have created a system of corruption," Tomenko said. "Today the president does not know what's going on in the country."

Poroshenko also resigned Thursday before Yushchenko dismissed the government.

DOJ_NMG_0003985

Political analysts said the crisis stemmed in large part from the political enmity between Poroshenko and the now dismissed prime minister, Tymoshenko, who is one of the country's most charismatic leaders. Last year, she galvanized huge crowds on Kiev's Independence Square, the epicenter of the mass demonstrations that brought Yushchenko to power.

Poroshenko also aspired to the prime ministership. Igor Koliushko, head of the Center of Political and Legal Reform in Kiev, said in an interview that he used the security council chaired by the president to form "an alternative government" that was in constant conflict with Tymoshenko's cabinet.

"They tried constantly to change the decisions of the constitutional government," Koliushko said. "The split reached such a pitch that they couldn't possibly be together anymore."

Whatever the truth of the allegations of corruption, the public airing of such accusations was designed to force other divisions to a climax, analysts said. Disagreement over how to investigate alleged corruption in past privatizations of state industries is a central issue.

Yuschenko's camp favors a relatively limited look, while Tymoshenko's wants a deep probe.

Svitlana Kononchuk, head of political programs at the Ukrainian Center for Independent Political Research, said Yushchenko must accept some blame for the crisis.

"The war between Tymoshenko and Poroshenko has lasted for seven months," Kononchuk said. "Yushchenko gave a lot of freedom to his partners. He assumed that these people were professionals, efficient, and they understood the importance of the situation which Ukraine found itself in. Yushchenko hasn't become a politician yet. He imagined himself a symbol, not a manager."

Yushchenko, however, said Thursday that "the president cannot be a nanny for them."

A spokesman for Tymoshenko refused to comment on the cabinet's dismissal, but a Ukranian news agency, quoting unnamed government sources, said that the prime minister felt betrayed and was likely to seek a return to office after the next election. After that vote, the prime minister and cabinet will be chosen by parliament rather than the president, as they currently are. The powers of the prime minister will also increase at the expense of the president.

The crisis is likely to deepen public disillusionment with the government's failure to deliver quickly on some of the basic promises of the Orange Revolution, particularly rapid economic improvement. An opinion poll conducted last month found that 53 percent of respondents believed Ukraine was on the wrong path, up from 30 percent in April.

Yushchenko was also tarnished by recent accusations that his 19-year-old son was leading a lifestyle far beyond his apparent means. A Ukrainian Web site reported that Andriy Yushchenko, a student, was driving a high-end BMW, had a luxury $30,000 cell phone and lavished cash on restaurants and other locations around the capital. To the fury of many people in Ukraine, he also registered as trademarks the symbols of the Orange Revolution.

Peeling Away The Revolution (WSJ)

By Robin Shepherd

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

An act of strength or sign of weakness? Actually, Viktor Yushchenko's decision to fire his entire government yesterday smacks of both: strength because it allows him to form a cabinet of allies rather than rivals; and weakness because he was all but forced to do it to answer damaging accusations that he was tolerating corruption in his own inner circle.

We may leave that debate about the position of President Yushchenko to those who believe history is the product of great men. To the rest of us, Ukraine's biggest political crisis since the Orange Revolution should be understood, to a great extent, in terms of flaws in the revolution which were apparent from the start. Yesterday's events may not have been inevitable, but a panoply of factors made some sort of crisis a distinct possibility.

The most obvious problems, of course, centered on the fractious nature of the democratic forces that took power in January. In explaining his decision yesterday, Mr. Yushchenko accused the government of losing its "team spirit," an accusation which when applied to Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko could pass for the country's understatement of the year. The charismatic, and immensely rich, premier has barely concealed her own ambitions to take the president's place as the key player in national politics and has been engaged in all-out warfare with other members of the government for months. Enter Petro

DOJ_NMG_0003986

Poroshenko, the National Security and Defense Council secretary, who has been at loggerheads with Ms. Tymoshenko over economic policy. Corruption allegations (unsubstantiated as yet) against Mr. Poroshenko, who is also immensely rich, brought the current crisis to a head, and there is now a real risk that the two will lead their respective power blocks into next March's crucial general elections as enemies rather than allies. Any such confrontation could prove disastrous for the reform movement, either pushing it out of power completely or, more likely, forcing reformists to make damaging concessions to supporters of the previous administration in order to form a new government.

To add to the difficulties, such bickering takes place amid a dramatic downturn in the country's economic fortunes. Growth in the first half of the year collapsed to just 3.7%. That compares to 13.5% in the same period last year. Sliding growth has been accompanied by rocketing inflation, which currently hovers just below 15%. In a country where many people earn less than $50 a month, rising prices can cause real social pain.

Not surprisingly against such a backdrop, public support is plummeting. A poll by the Razumkov institute in August suggested that 43% of Ukrainians believed the country was on the wrong path, a jump from 23% in April. The August poll found just 32% felt the country was doing well, down sharply from 54% last spring.

The key question now, therefore, is this: Can Mr. Yushchenko and his new government recreate unity among the country's democratic forces, or are they heading for collapse?

Much depends on the attitude of Ms. Tymoshenko. She is due to make a televised address later today and it is little exaggeration to say that the content of that broadcast could define the future of her country. If she accepts President Yushchenko's generous offer yesterday to keep her in the fold in some capacity or other, there is hope that the reformists can pull it off. But she could also cause real problems. Mr. Yushchenko already faces difficulties in parliament passing legislation aimed at joining the World Trade Organization. He also has to get approval for the new prime minister. If Ms. Tymoshenko opts for all-out confrontation, it is hard to see how the situation can be prevented from descending into chaos.

But ultimate success for the aims of the Orange Revolution has never been simply down to events inside Ukraine. The country's problems were always going to be too severe to cope with in the absence of outside help. That's why the attitude of the European Union has always been so important, and why its policy hitherto has been so disappointing.

What Ukraine needs, and needs fast, is a clear and unambiguous statement from Brussels that it will be invited to start accession negotiations with the European Union if the country's pro-democracy parties promise to work together to pass important reformist legislation and then go on to win the March elections. Such a statement would certainly be tantamount to blatant intervention in Ukraine's political affairs, but it would be no less welcome for that. There is also a useful precedent in Brussels's brilliant strategy of working with democratic forces in neighboring Slovakia in the 1990s to successfully promote unity among opponents of that country's former authoritarian Prime Minister Vladimir Meciar. Slovakia today is a reformist success story. Brussels must take note.

All this said, the big picture in Ukraine remains one of hope and progress. This time last year, the country was run by a group of people who it would be kind to describe as thugs. The country still may have a long way to go, but we are at least past the stage at which opposition journalists wandered around the streets of Kiev in fear for their lives. When President George W. Bush praised the millions of people who stood on the streets of the Ukrainian capital last year as modern-day heroes of the democratic ideal, he was right. But as in Iraq, what he and his administration may have underestimated is the sheer complexity of the task at hand and the time scale in which we expect success.

What we are watching in Ukraine are still the first tentative steps in a desperately difficult transition. We will get a pretty good idea of whether that task can, in the end, be accomplished in the days and weeks ahead.

Mr. Shepherd is an adjunct fellow of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. He is based in Bratislava.

Ukraine's Orange Flame, Dimmed (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

So ends the Orange Revolution, at least Act I. After months of increasingly nasty disputes, Ukraine's president, Viktor Yushchenko, fired his charismatic prime minister and nominated a caretaker to replace her. The fired prime minister, Yulia Tymoshenko, has said nothing - yet. But she will. Her fiery speeches and powerful presence were a major factor in the popular uprising that brought Mr. Yushchenko to power last fall, and she is certain to turn these weapons on the president and his new government, especially with elections for Parliament scheduled for March. All that is a serious blow to the hopes and expectations that had been raised for the future of Ukraine, and for reformers in Belarus and other former Soviet republics.

DOJ_NMG_0003987

Perhaps the expectations were always unrealistic. People who unite to oust one government, as the Ukrainians did with huge demonstrations, do not necessarily agree on what the next one should be, and the alliance was always shaky between Mr. Yushchenko, a former prime minister and central banker, and Ms. Tymoshenko, who made a fortune in the gas business. Mr. Yushchenko and Ms. Tymoshenko squandered the momentum generated on Kiev's streets, struggling over control of lucrative industries, over relations with Russia and over how to cope with soaring energy prices. The impression was of a government with no focus.

On dismissing the government, Mr. Yushchenko declared that his one goal was to ensure stability. But the Ukrainian protesters wanted change. If Mr. Yushchenko hopes to salvage anything of their spirit, he needs to convince his country, and a very wary West, that he not only believes in democracy, free markets and the rule of law, but is also capable of leading Ukraine in that direction.

Controversy Swirls Over Egypt Vote (WP)

By Daniel Williams And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

CAIRO, Sept. 9 -- Egyptian government officials leaked partial results Thursday of the first multi-candidate presidential election to show that President Hosni Mubarak had won at least 70 percent of the vote, but controversy still swirled about alleged irregularities and fraud in Wednesday's vote.

Senior officials put voter turnout at about 30 percent.

Ayman Nour, who ran an energetic campaign as head of the fledgling Tomorrow Party, filed complaints with the Presidential Election Commission, which rejected them early Friday. "There were violations regarding the right of the voter to cast his ballot," Nour said. Independent human rights groups said they were considering filing court cases.

Government officials worked hard to persuade the public that the vote was valid. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the former U.N. secretary general who heads the government's National Council on Human Rights, declared the election a "positive experience." Information Ministry officials urged reporters to accentuate the positive in the election and not focus on alleged violations.

In Washington, the State Department praised the vote. Spokesman Sean McCormack called it a "historic departure for the Egyptian people in holding a multi-candidate presidential election. . . . The debate during the campaign process was something, I think, that will enrich the Egyptian political dialogue certainly for years to come."

But the Mubarak government's efforts to get similar approval from Egyptians was hampered by the continuing disputes. Unlike in past parliamentary votes and presidential referendums, results were not announced at local polling stations. Instead, counts have been funneled to a central tabulation office that has until Saturday to release official numbers. "They have all the time they need to sculpt the result they want," said Enji Haddad, a member of We Are Watching, an independent group that tried to monitor voting irregularities.

Even as complaints were voiced over the vote, the first in which Egyptians were able to mark ballots with more than one choice for president, attention was quickly turning toward the next stage in the herky-jerky battle over changing Egyptian politics -- parliamentary elections scheduled for November.

Although Mubarak might have overcome months of assault from a variety of political opponents, even his staunchest supporters say they believe the battle will go on. Opposition leaders with competing visions for change in Egypt have made vast strides during the past few months, becoming more visible than at any time during the 24 years Mubarak has held power, his supporters say.

"Things can't go back," Information Minister Anas Fiki said in an interview. "The process has moved far."

This is also the hope of Bush administration officials who insist that the presidential vote was only a first step in converting Egypt from an authoritarian state into a democracy. Along with the war in Iraq and efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Egypt is a key to promoting democracy in the region, in the administration's view.

DOJ_NMG_0003988

In remarks made before the vote, however, senior administration officials emphasized the importance of the legislative elections. "For the near future, the parliamentary election is more important. It's not clear who will compete and who will end up where. But it's important to get all the public political energy into the political sphere, or it will go elsewhere," said a senior administration official involved in Middle East policy.

"We're looking at parliamentary elections as a time to bring in new faces and new political parties that will change the political landscape for Egypt," another senior official said.

Wednesday's election was a step in the Mubarak government's own plans to open up politics to some extent, albeit with the levers of power still held by the National Democratic Party, currently dominated by the president's son Gamal and a group of Western-oriented technocrats. They contend that reform in Egypt must be calibrated to avoid unrest that would upset free-market economic liberalization, another project spearheaded by Gamal Mubarak.

Mohammed Kamal, a member of Gamal Mubarak's advisory team, said reform plans include changes in the constitution to transfer some presidential powers to parliament and scale back emergency laws that have inhibited free speech for a quarter-century. "Our message is that we are creating a platform for change," he said in an interview.

It is unclear when the emergency laws might be lifted. Bush administration officials have pressed for them to be amended before the parliamentary vote, but President Mubarak has resisted, senior U.S. officials said.

As Mubarak has made gains, so have his political rivals. Nour, leader of a free-market party that was legalized only last October, has quickly became a prominent opposition force. Mubarak government officials were preoccupied Thursday with the possibility that Nour might have come in second in Wednesday's balloting. Some were openly rooting for Noman Gomaa, 71, the candidate of the established Wafd Party, to be the runner-up.

Wafd spokesman Mahmoud Abaza predicted the party would make a strong showing in the parliamentary vote. "The bottom line is that, the NDP aside, there are only two other political forces: Wafd and the Muslim Brotherhood."

The Brotherhood, which is officially banned from politics but is widely regarded as Egypt's largest opposition force, benefited from the months leading up to the election, said Aly Abdel Fattah, an official of the Brotherhood. Nour and Gomaa visited Brotherhood leaders to solicit support. The Brotherhood issued an anyone-but-Mubarak order to its followers. Members were widely interviewed on Arabic-language satellite television. "We were participants. We got our membership familiar with the workings of elections," said Abdel Fattah, who added: "The Brotherhood plans to run front candidates in the parliamentary vote."

Egypt's Unfree Vote (WP)

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Millions of Egyptians voted in a historic multi-candidate presidential election on Wednesday -- but the results will never be known. True, 77-year-old President Hosni Mubarak is widely believed to have obtained the most votes and will be duly sworn in next week for a six-year extension of his 24 years in power. But Egyptians will never learn what part of the electorate turned out to vote, or what percentage chose one of the opposition candidates who were allowed 19 days to openly campaign against Mr. Mubarak. That's because Mr. Mubarak excluded foreign monitors from the polling stations and reversed a ban on local watchdog groups only on Election Day, making it impossible for all but a handful to participate. He allowed his National Democratic Party to commit such visible irregularities as busing voters to the polls, standing over them while they cast ballots or offering lottery tickets in exchange for votes. Finally, the president decreed that all the results be tabulated at a central location by his handpicked nominees. When the totals are finally announced in a few days' time, there will be no reason for anyone to take them seriously.

The Bush administration, which cites the democratization of the Middle East as one of its top priorities, persists in describing this exercise as "a positive first step." It has some reason to do so: The election campaign, though absurdly short, resulted in unprecedented opposition rallies and criticism of Mr. Mubarak in newspapers and on television. The incumbent promised a long list of political reforms as part of his own campaign, including more freedom for the media, independence for judges, greater power for parliament and a reform of the emergency laws that have made him a de facto dictator. Still, Mr. Mubarak's insistence on heavy-handed steps to control the election's outcome -- despite his inevitable victory -- leaves the measuring glass of this Egyptian election considerably less than half full.

DOJ_NMG_0003989

It also raises urgent priorities for Egyptian reform, and the Bush administration's handling of Mr. Mubarak, in the coming weeks. That's because Egypt has another election coming this fall, for parliament, that in many ways is more important than the presidential poll. Not only is the legislature promised more power, but a recent constitutional change provides that only parties with parliamentary representation of 5 percent or more may nominate candidates in future presidential elections. If the upcoming vote is fair, it will drastically reduce the suffocating authority of the ruling party; if it is not, the election of Mr. Mubarak's successor will probably be as lopsided and unfair as this week's vote.

President Bush need not ask Mr. Mubarak for radical change -- only for steps that liberal activists in his own party favor. These begin with allowing slates of parliamentary candidates to be elected by proportional representation; the current system of more than 400 districts makes it impossible for opposition parties to compete. Next Mr. Mubarak must allow more of the real Egyptian opposition into the process; he could do this by granting the pending registration of the Center Party, a moderate Islamic grouping that would attract many supporters of the banned Muslim Brotherhood.

Most important, Egypt's next vote should be free and fair, and certified as such by both local and international monitors. Holding such a vote won't threaten Mr. Mubarak's newly extended tenure as president, but it will make it more legitimate. It won't make Egypt a democracy, but it would make it more likely that the regime's promise to gradually lead the country in that direction would be honored. Considering the billions in American dollars that continue to prop up Mr. Mubarak's government, and the importance of translating Mr. Bush's rhetoric about democracy into reality, it shouldn't be too much too ask.

Koizumi Backers Look Poised To Win In Elections (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman And Kazuko Takahashi

USA Today, September 9, 2005

Advocates for change in Japan could emerge rejuvenated from Sunday's legislative elections, thanks to Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's decision last month to wage war on obstructionist lawmakers in his own ruling party.

A poll this week by the daily Asahi Shimbun showed Koizumi's ruling coalition — his Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) and its ally New Komeito — leading the top opposition party. According to Asahi, the LDP is expected to win more than 250 seats in Japan's 480-seat lower house of parliament.

Since becoming prime minister in 2001, Koizumi — known for his unruly hair and love of heavy metal music — has billed himself as a reformer. He often has butted heads with conservative, change-resistant members of the LDP, which has ruled Japan nearly continuously for a half-century.

He took his agenda further with an internal purge of the party, replacing opponents with like-minded candidates. The fireworks started in August when rebel LDP lawmakers rejected Koizumi's pet project: privatization of Japan's massive postal system. In Japan, the post office does more than deliver mail; it also acts like a government bank, collecting trillions in deposits and doling them out as loans, often to corporate borrowers with close links to LDP lawmakers.

Defeated in the parliament when members of his own party joined the opposition Democratic Party of Japan (DPJ) to avoid the privatization scheme, Koizumi dissolved the legislature and called the election.

He threw 37 rebels out of the LDP and recruited a group of attractive candidates, dubbed by the daily Mainichi the "assassins" and "female ninjas," to defeat them in the polls. Among the hired guns are a former Miss Tokyo University, a celebrity pastry chef, former Olympians and an Internet tycoon.

"His clueless opponents thought he was bluffing. They forgot his favorite movie is High Noon," says political analyst Michael Cucek with the Tokyo-based business consultancy Okamoto Associates.

Some of the LDP rebels have joined new political parties; others are running as independents.

DPJ candidate Katsuya Okada, who left the LDP in 1993, says real reform is impossible unless the ruling party is ousted.

"The people had hopes that Koizumi would change the LDP, but he was not able to do that," Okada told Reuters recently. "Rather, domestic reform has not progressed, and foreign policy is beset on all sides."

The DPJ says reform of Japan's pension system, creaking under the burden of a rapidly aging population and falling birthrate, should top the policy agenda along with cutting wasteful public works and slashing civil servant personnel costs. The government hasn't resolved the question of how a dwindling workforce will pay benefits to a swelling number of retirees.

DOJ_NMG_0003990

Okada wants to first slim down the postal service, a sprawling giant with $3 trillion in assets, before deciding whether to privatize or abolish it.

He has also been harshly critical of Koizumi for chilling ties with China and South Korea by making annual visits to the Yasukuni shrine in Tokyo, where convicted war criminals are honored along with Japan's 2.5 million war dead.

Koizumi portrayed the DPJ as opportunists for siding with an opposition that included ex-Socialists and right-wing nationalists.

Some voters acknowledge they don't understand details of Koizumi's postal plan. “I don't really know what the reforms mean,” says Yoshinobu Okuyama, 62, an electrician. “But we need the Liberal Democrats in power.”

“I support Junichiro Koizumi,” says retired executive Katsuyuki Tokura, 63. “At the moment, there is no other politician who can change the corrupt, bureaucratic administration.”

“Koizumi needed reliable partisans for carrying out future reforms,” says teacher Yuichi Mita, 45. “This is a kickoff for reforms.”

Billions For Vaccines For The Poor To Be Raised In Bond Markets (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Britain, France, Spain, Italy and Sweden will announce an agreement on Friday to raise almost $4 billion on the bond markets for an enormously expanded use of vaccines across the developing world. The World Health Organization estimates this undertaking will save the lives of five million children over the next decade.

Commitments from some of the participating nations have been secured only in recent days.

The new funds would roughly double the resources of the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization, an umbrella group of countries, international organizations, vaccine industry representatives and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. Over the past five years, the alliance has financed the immunization of 78 million children and prevented more than a million child deaths, the health organization estimates.

The alliance's board has already approved ambitious programs for 2006 to expand measles coverage in South Asia and sub-Saharan Africa, as well as to help eradicate polio worldwide and increase the use of maternal and neonatal tetanus vaccines. These plans can go forward now that the new financing has been secured.

"We hope this pilot will demonstrate the feasibility and the power of this financing mechanism, and we look to gain more support from more countries," said Paul Kissack, a spokesman for the British treasury.

The United States has declined to join the vaccine plan. Bush administration officials could not be reached for comment Thursday night, but said earlier this year that the long-term commitment to raise money through the bond market is not consistent with the annual appropriations process in Congress. The United States provides $60 million to $70 million a year to the alliance.

"We hope if this process is successful that the United States will reconsider its position," said Dr. Julian Lob-Levyt, the vaccine alliance's executive secretary.

British officials have said they hope the new resources will help the world reach the goal adopted unanimously five years ago at the United Nations to reduce child deaths by two-thirds by 2015. More than 170 government leaders will gather in New York next week to assess progress in meeting the antipoverty objectives they set in 2000.

The pact marks the first time rich nations have used pledges of increased aid to back government bonds as a means of financing a major development program. This so-called international finance facility is the brainchild of Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the exchequer.

Under the plan, income from the sale of the bonds would be provided to the global vaccine alliance to pay for vaccinations over a period of 10 years. The five participating nations would pay off the bonds over 20 years. The two largest donors are Britain, which has pledged to cover 35 percent of the cost, and France, which is covering a quarter.

The money will be used to purchase vaccines and bicycles to transport them, as well as to rehabilitate health clinics and pay health workers to do the immunizing in remote areas. Leaders of the alliance hope the vaccine plan will strengthen basic health services in poor countries, not just immunization efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0003991

China Plans To Honor A Reformer (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 8 -- Chinese President Hu Jintao has agreed to restore the standing of the reform-minded Communist leader whose death triggered the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations, a surprising reversal of party dogma that could prompt new calls for democratic change in China, according to people informed of the decision.

Hu Jintao has approved plans for a series of events honoring the late party chief Hu Yaobang on the 90th anniversary of his birth on Nov. 20, the sources said. The activities would end more than a decade of official silence about a party leader who was sacked by hard-liners in 1987 but remained a hero to the party's reformist wing.

The government has not publicly recognized Hu Yaobang since students mourning his death on April 15, 1989, occupied Tiananmen Square and staged weeks of demonstrations for democratic reforms.

Paramount leader Deng Xiaoping ordered the military to use force to clear the square, and hundreds, perhaps thousands were killed. Any tribute to Hu Yaobang was considered taboo because it could stir memories of the June 4 massacre and renew debate about the political reforms he supported.

But last month, the General Office of the party's Central Committee issued a document outlining plans to mark the anniversary of Hu Yaobang's birth with ceremonies in Beijing as well as in Hunan province, where he was born, and Jiangxi province, where he is buried, according to two sources who have seen the document. The party will also hold a symposium to discuss his legacy, and publish an official biography as well as a collection of his writings, they said.

The sources said there were no plans to change the party's position that the 1989 Tiananmen Square protests were subversive, or to admit it was wrong to use troops to crush them. But the decision to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang, whom the party condemned for being too tolerant of "bourgeois" political views when it removed him from power, suggested such reversals might be possible in the future.

"This might be a first step, a small but important one," said one informed party member, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "If the party can change its position on Hu Yaobang, it can change its position on June 4 and on political reform."

It was unclear why the Chinese president, who on Thursday was visiting Canada, decided to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang, but a key party leadership meeting is scheduled for October and he might have been trying to expand his political base by reaching out to reformers in the party. Hu Jintao took over as the party's top leader in 2002 and as president in 2003, but many allies of his predecessor, Jiang Zemin, remain in power.

The decision to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang -- no relation to Hu Jintao -- surprised many party officials because it was out of character for the president, who has developed a reputation over a long career in the party as an extremely cautious bureaucrat unwilling to take risks. "The safe thing to do would have been to continue to do nothing," said a senior editor of a party newspaper who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Over the past three years, the president has consistently rejected fundamental political reform while leading a sustained crackdown on religion, media freedom and other civil liberties. He has also been quoted telling propaganda officials that while the economic policies of Cuba and North Korea were flawed, their political policies were correct.

But some party officials continue to hold out hope that Hu was acting as a hard-liner to consolidate his position after taking over from Jiang. They noted that he modified another major party doctrine during a speech Saturday marking the 60th anniversary of Japan's surrender in World War II. In the past, the party took credit for defeating the Japanese and ignored the contributions of the ruling Nationalists under Chiang Kai-shek. But in his address, Hu acknowledged the role of the Nationalists, mentioning several military leaders and battles by name.

In another slight departure, Premier Wen Jiabao said during a news conference Monday that China would eventually allow elections, now limited to rural villages, to expand to larger townships. "If the Chinese people can manage a village, I believe in several years they can manage a township," he said.

Hu Dezi, one of Hu Yaobang's nephews in Hunan province, said local authorities received permission recently to build a memorial park that would include a statue, a spacious public square and an exhibition hall.

DOJ_NMG_0003992

People close to Hu Yaobang's family said one important, unresolved issue was the fate of a three-volume biography produced independently by a group of former aides to the late party leader over the past 15 years. Party authorities learned of the project, led by Zhang Liqun, a former newspaper editor and party official who died two years ago, and insisted on taking control of it, the sources said.

But it was unclear what deletions and changes would be made before its publication in November. Hu Yaobang served as party chief from 1981 to 1987, and is remembered by many Chinese for overturning cases against millions persecuted during Mao Zedong's political movements and launching the economic and political reforms that ended the turmoil of the Cultural Revolution.

One of the most sensitive issues may be how to explain Hu Yaobang's fall from power amid a wave of student protests demanding democratic reform. The authors have written that Deng Xiaoping forced Hu to resign because he favored reform and resisted instructions to crack down on what the party called "bourgeois liberalization." But influential party members have objected to any account that reflects badly on Deng.

Sources familiar with the discussions said the party had not provided the authors with an edited version of the biography, despite repeated requests, and the authors vowed not to let the party publish the work if it tried to rewrite history.

Chávez's 'Oil Weapon' Is A Popgun (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Our elected representatives are guzzling publicity with their promises to criminalize high gasoline prices, even though everyone knows that such stupidity creates shortages.

But it is worth pointing out that this is only the latest display of sheer ignorance in the area of energy -- mixing dangerously with personal ambition, of course -- that threatens a policy mess. Another is the overly deferential Washington mindset toward Venezuela's Hugo Chávez, based on the myth that we need his oil.

Word out of Washington yesterday was that an arm of Congress has begun to investigate what damage would result from a "possible cutoff" of oil supplies to the U.S. by a "politically unstable" Venezuela. The study was requested by Chairman Richard Lugar of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It follows years of hand-wringing about Venezuela from a Washington establishment concerned about the Chávez "oil power."

This confluence of ignorance and commercial interest has produced a U.S. policy of tip-toe diplomacy toward the aggressive and menacing Venezuelan government. Tragically, that cost the Venezuelan people dearly in 2004, with the State Department endorsing the results of the fraudulent recall referendum. That "victory" is feeding the egomania of South America's newest would-be dictator.

In the wake of Katrina and amid fears of a U.S. energy crunch, it is high time to recognize that Chávez has no such leverage, lest he read our readiness to give him a wide berth in the interest of oil as a sign of weakness. Chávez has very little influence over how much the U.S. pays for oil, unless of course he wants to take Venezuela out of its role as a producer. That's unlikely, since he's now spending like a drunken sailor on arms and politics and relies on oil income to hold onto power.

The world oil market is a huge pool that all the globe's consumers draw from. During the Arab oil embargo, the disruptions of which were greatly magnified by U.S. price controls on domestic producers, buyers and sellers simply repositioned their relationships. There was short-term difficulty but markets adjusted as best they could, given the fact that U.S. producers as well were capping wells to wait for price controls to be lifted. Fuel prices went down, not up, when Ronald Reagan removed the last controls in 1981. Today there are more places to get oil and as the price goes up, more producers are coming online because even difficult extractions are becoming profitable.

Suppose China were to take all of Venezuela's oil out of the pool instead of oil from another country, nothing about world supply changes. If China is buying more from the pool than it did before, demand goes up and prices go up but sellers into the pool of oil cannot punish one buyer over another.

This does not mean that the U.S.-Venezuela oil trade doesn't have some special value. But the relationship is symbiotic. One reason Venezuelan oil is attractive to the U.S. is because the shipping costs are low relative to the Middle East. The U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0003993

may prefer to get its oil nearby but it certainly doesn't have to. Similarly, countries on the other side of the globe also prefer to keep their shipping costs down if possible.

Washington bigwigs may have trouble with this concept but China understands it well. Venezuela's Minister of Energy and Petroleum was in Beijing last month making a big deal out of the China market. But China's ambassador in Caracas, Ju Yigie, set him straight. Beijing, he said, "doesn't see any necessity" for China to replace the U.S. as Venezuela's largest oil buyer because "the natural markets for Venezuelan oil are North and South America."

The oil magazine Petroleum Intelligence Weekly pointed out this week that "courting China" is one way to "needle the U.S." But, it asks, "What does China's new energy relationship with Latin America amount to?" Venezuela's state-owned oil company, PdVSA, "opened a Beijing marketing office last month and has a target of selling 300,000 barrels per day into China by 2012."

China's reluctance to get close to Venezuela might also reflect a recognition that Chávez is a loose cannon and an unreliable manager and that oil investments with him carry great risk. Take PdVSA's new strategic plan for 2006-2012. According to VenEconomy Weekly, based in Caracas, it proposes to invest $56 billion over seven years to raise production to 5,837,000 barrels per day by 2012. Of that, PdVSA would pump 4,109,000 itself.

The company only produces 1.7 million barrels per day now, so the plan promises a 2.3 million barrels-per-day increase in seven years. VenEconomy says that this is highly unrealistic considering that in the seven year period from 1991-1998, when PdVSA was far more technically and managerially competent, it spent $32 billion and only raised production by 915,000 barrels per day. The weekly newsletter estimates that the plan really would need "an investment on the order of $79.9 billion."

Moreover, the same $56 billion is supposed to cover other investments in gas production, refineries, tankers and infrastructure. It also has to fund "cut-rate oil sales to countries in the region." VenEconomy estimates the government's plans are underfunded by some $72 billion.

China also seems to recognize that oil development in Venezuela will depend heavily on foreign investment and that will depend on an investor-friendly environment. The latest rash of property expropriations by Chávez does not bode well for a booming oil industry.

But what about Venezuela's yearning to cut off Uncle Sam? One reason that's harder to do than the saber-rattling Chávez lets on is the fact that Venezuela owns Houston-based Citgo. It has invested more than one billion dollars in its U.S. refineries to make them capable of processing Venezuelan heavy crude and in 1999 Citgo ranked fifth in U.S. market share. As it is now, Venezuela can only send about 600,000-800,000 barrels per day to its Citgo refineries. The rest of what those refineries need -- a total well over one million barrels per day -- is bought through third parties.

Not long ago, Venezuela was the largest supplier of crude to the U.S. Today, it may only rank fifth. With an annual 20-25% depletion rate of Venezuelan oil fields, a serious lack of investment and technological expertise and new sources of crude from other countries coming online, that number could easily shrink further. But that is something that ought to worry Chávez more than the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0003994

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

N.Va. Man Indicted In Plot Against Bush (WP) 4
Court Questions Guantanamo Detainee Issues (AP)..... 4
Guantanamo Bay Prisoners Seek US Court Hearings (REU)..... 5
Witness Testifies Under Grant Of Immunity (TAMPTRIB) 6
Muslim Anti-terrorism Ads To Coincide With 9/11 Anniversary (AP)..... 6
US 'terror Camp' Suspect Remanded (BBC)..... 6

Patriot Act:

Patriot Act Resolution Rejected (GRPRESS)..... 7

Homeland Response:

Fallen EMT Volunteer On Sept. 11 Gets Rescuer Status (AP)..... 8
Fallen Heroes To Get 9/11 Medals (NSL) 8
AP: 9/11 Loans Wind Up Far From Manhattan (FINDLAW/AP).... 9
Key Official In Clandestine Service Of CIA To Retire (WP)..... 10
Tight Constraints On Pentagon's Freedom Walk (WP)..... 11
After Four Years, First Signs Of Renewal At Ground Zero (CSM)12

War News:

Powell Calls His U.N. Speech A Lasting Blot On His Record (NYT) 13
U.S.-Iraqi Sweep Arrests 200 In Rebel Staging Area (NYT/AP) . 14
U.S. Forces Chase Ghost Fighters Amid Iraqis (WP) 15
For A U.S. Platoon In Iraq, Merciless Missions (WP)..... 16
The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)..... 19
New Orleans And Baghdad (NYT)..... 20
Saddam Aide Hired Camelot Attorney To Bribe U.N. Staff (NYSUN)..... 21
Oil For Food As Usual (WSJ)..... 21
The View From The 38th Floor (WSJ)..... 23
Taliban Kill 6 Afghan Police In Attack On Army Arms Depot (NYT) 23
"War On Terror" Saves Few Lives: Expert (REU-Y2)..... 24
Our Enemy's Face (WP)..... 24
'They Are All So Wrong' (WSJ)..... 25
9/11 Recruits: They Enlisted When USA Was Under Fire (USAT)..... 27
N.Y. Judge Who Abandoned His Post For Iraq Is Removed (LAW)..... 29
Panel Says N.Y. Judge Should Be Removed (FINDLAW/AP).... 30

Corporate Scandals:

Skilling, Lay Allege Case Misconduct (AP)..... 30
Local Lawyer Charged In Currency Trading Scheme (PALMBEACHP)..... 31

Criminal Law:

Boeing Could Avoid Prosecution, Pay Up To $500 Million To U.S. (WSJ)..... 32
CIA Leak Probe May Be Nearing End Game: Lawyers (BOS/REU) 33
Judge Orders Berger To Pay $50,000 Fine (WSJ/AP)..... 34
Berger Is Fined For Smuggling Classified Papers (WP) 34
Ex-Clinton Official Draws Higher-Than-Expected Fine (NYT)..... 35
Federal Agents Armed With Warrant Raid Melrose Park Police Station (AP)..... 36
Federal Agents Raid Melrose Park Police Station (WLS-TV) 36
Melrose Park Police Department Shut Down For Federal Raid (WMAQ-TV)..... 37
FBI Searches Suburban Police Department (CBS2CHI) 37
'Safe Road' Figure Sentenced In Bid-rigging Probe (CHIT) 37
Lobbyist's Former Aide Gets Probation, Sorry She Got Into Politics (BVND)..... 38
Daley Names Inspector General (CHIST/AP) 39
Daley Names New City Hall Watchdog (CHIT) 39
Mirarchi Dodges Jail (PHI)..... 40
Lawyer Who Cooperated Is Sentenced In Ticket Fixing (PHI).... 41
FBI Removes Items From Councilman's Home (KARE-TV)..... 41
City Councilman's House Raided (WCCO-TV) 42
A Top HAWS Official Pleads Not Guilty (WSJ) 42
Bribe-case Builder Has 2d Arrest (PHI)..... 43
Former Kodak Executive Charged In Bribery Probe (NSDY)..... 43
Lt. Gov. Now Says He Never Talked To Cooper About Loan (AP)..... 43
PAC Linked To DeLay Indicted In Funding Probe (LAT)..... 44
DeLay PAC Is Indicted For Illegal Donations (WP) 45
Political Committee Formed By DeLay Is Indicted (NYT/AP)..... 46
Texas Groups Linked To DeLay Indicted In Scandal (REU-Y2) . 46
Missouri Senators Want To Close Loophole For Sexual Predators (AP) 47
City To Request A Federal Audit (PSDS)..... 48
Orange County Deputy Sheriff Arrested (ORS)..... 49
Red Lake Seeks Items Seized By FBI (MINNST) 50

FBI Pressed To Share Red Lake Evidence (STPPP) 50
Man Gets Prison Over Child Porn (TUSCCIT) 51
Rural Vs. City Ways At Issue In A Wisconsin Murder Trial (NYT)51

Civil Law:

Bush Loses Appeal On Base Closings (NYT/AP) 53
White House Gets Base-Closing Recommendations (WP/AP)... 53
Caremark Pays $137.5M To Settle Case (AP)..... 54
U.S. Senate Panel OKs Asbestos Subpoena Power (REU-Y2).. 54
U.S. Prosecutors Allege Safety Violations By American Airlines (FINDLAW/AP) 55
Will The Supreme Court Unleash Civil RICO? (LAW)..... 55
Attorneys Brace For Impact Of New Bankruptcy Code (LAW).... 57
Pope Wants Head-of-State Immunity From Texas Suit (LAW)... 59

Civil Rights:

Justice Dept. Settles Charges Against DCFD (WUSA-TV)..... 61
Jurors Acquit U.S. Border Officer In Civil Rights Case Filed By Tourist (AP)..... 61
NAACP Calls For Action In Police Shooting Of Teen (WEWS-TV) 62
FBI Ends Beta Bridge Probe (CHARDP)..... 63
Smuggler To Serve 3 Years In Prison (SDUT)..... 63
Anti-Gay-Marriage Initiative Passes Hurdle (FINDLAW/AP)..... 64

Antitrust:

Justice Department Files Antitrust Lawsuit (AP)..... 64
U.S. Sues Realtors, Claims Web Rules Limit Discounting (WSJ)65
DOJ Wants Real Estate Market Fairness (REU)..... 65
Antitrust Lawyers Go After Realtors (WP) 66
US Files Antitrust Suit Against Biggest Real Estate Group (AFP)66
Justice Department Sues Chicago-Based National Association Of Realtors (CHIT)..... 67
National Realtors Group Sued By U.S. Over Web Policy (Update2) (BLOOM) 67
Justice Dept. Sues NAR For Antitrust (INMAN) 68
U.S. Fights Limit On Home Sale Listings (BSUN)..... 69
DOJ Sues Real Estate Group For Web Listing Policy (IDG)..... 70
Taubmans Give Up Control Of Sotheby's (WSJ) 71
Taubman Family Sells Its Interest In Sotheby's (NYT)..... 71
Archaeologists And Dealers Spar Over U.S.-Italian Art Accord (NYT) 72
Private Investors To Buy Hertz For $15 Billion (NYT) 73
European Corporations Catch Merger Mania (WSJ)..... 73
EU, Spanish Antitrust Watchdogs Become Pawns In Takeover Battle (WSJ)..... 74
Dell To Protect E-mail, Data For AMD V. Intel (REU) 75

Environment:

Some In Senate Seek To Change Mercury Rule (NYT)..... 76
3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test (LAW) 77
A Light In The Forests (NYT)..... 78

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pelican Bay State Prison Gang Leaders Get Life Sentences (AP)..... 79
Gang Leaders In Federal Hands (MHCA) 79
Gang Members Arrested In Major Crackdown (MH)..... 81
Gang Crackdown Nets 650 Suspects (LAT)..... 81
Massive International Sting Nets 660 (CNN)..... 82
FBI Makes Arrests Against Violent Gang Members (KNBC-TV). 82
FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (OREG)..... 83
FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (AP)..... 83
Four Gwinnett Men Arrested In Gang Sting (GWINNDP) 83
Police Investigate Crime Spree (WMTV-TV)..... 84
Baggage Handlers Jailed In Smuggling Probe (MH)..... 84
Drug Cash Smuggling Booming On U.S.-Mexico Border (REU). 86
Drug Crackdown Nets 44 Arrests (SFC)..... 87
Dozens Arrested In Drug Sting (SFE)..... 87
Survey Shows 9% Decline In Teen Drug Use (USAT/AP)..... 88
S.A. Couple Plead Guilty To Playing Role In Drug Ring (SAEN) 88

Immigration:

Local Police Can Enforce Laws On Immigration (DANNT) 89
Immigrant License Bill Is Sent To Governor (LAT) 90
Where's The Governator Now? (NYT)..... 91
Squatter At Minn. School Ordered Deported (FINDLAW/AP) 92

Tax:

'Survivor' Winner Hatch Indicted For Tax Evasion (REU) 92
'Survivor' Winner Indicted On Tax Charges (AP)..... 93

Congress-Administration:

Partisan Rancor Accompanies Passage Of Disaster Aid Bill (WP)..... 93
Bush Signs $51.8 Bln Storm Relief Bill (REU)..... 94
Congress Approves $51.8 Billion For Victims (WP) 95
Bush Pledges Aid For 'Long Haul' (LAT) 97
Bush's Leadership Skills Questioned, Polls Show (FT)..... 98
Bush Suffers In Polls Post-Katrina (REU)..... 99
Americans Give Bush Poor Marks On Handling Katrina, Polls Show (BLOOM) 100
Partisan Bickering Over Katrina Escalates - To Peril Of Both Sides (CSM)..... 101
Congress Clears $51.8 Billion Relief Bill (BSUN/AP) 102
Congress Approves Katrina Package Of $51.8 Billion (WSJ) ... 103
A Compassionate Bush Was Absent Right After Katrina (USAT)104
Katrina Underscores Bush's Isolated Style (KRT)..... 105
Bush Batting Average Calls For New Coaches (USAT)..... 106
The Party Of Performance (WP)..... 106
Inescapable Accountability (WP) 107
Point Those Fingers (NYT) 108
Hughes Is Varnishing The Nation's Tarnish (WP) 109
Senators Press Bush On Hurricane Relief Czar (REU)..... 110
Democratic Leaders Reject G.O.P. Storm Inquiry Plan (NYT).. 111
Democrats Spurn Republican-backed Katrina Probe (REU)..... 112
Katrina Aid Package Could Push Deficit To New High (USAT) 112
Cost Of Recovery Surges, As Do Bids To Join In Effort (NYT). 113
Lobbyists Seek Leverage From Storm (WSJ) 114
Louisiana Lawmakers Aim To Cope With Political Fallout (WSJ)115
Bankrupting The Victims (LAT)..... 116
Opinionline: Katrina Exposes America's Fragility (USAT) 117
How Reliable Is Brown's Resume? (TIME)..... 118

DOJ_NMG_0003996

Democrats' Anti-Bush Petition Also Seeks Political Contributions (NYNSDY/AP) ... 119
Advance Men In Charge (NYT) ... 120
Leaders Lacking Disaster Experience (WP) ... 120
Critics Maintain Drumbeat Of FEMA Criticism (LAT) ... 122
Congress Approves New Storm Aid, And Bush Pledges To Expedite It (NYT) ... 123
Four Years After Sept. 11, Lessons From Another Blow (USAT) 124
Where To Point The Fingers (WP) ... 125
Confusion On Debit Card Aid (NYT) ... 126
George R. Brown Evacuees To Get Red Cross Cards Tonight (HC) ... 126
Cheney, Gonzales Tour Stricken Gulf Coast (AP) ... 128
Cheney Tours Katrina Devastation, Backs Chertoff (REU) ... 129
Relieft Effort 'very Impressive,' Cheney Says (AP) ... 129
First Lady Gives Award, Talks About Katrina's Impact (DMR) ... 130
First Lady Comforts Storm Refugees In DeSoto County (BSH) 131
First Lady Visits Southaven, Cheers Evacuees (CA) ... 131
Wife Says Criticism Of Bush 'Disgusting' (MACT) ... 132
Political Issues Snarled Plans For Troop Aid (NYT) ... 132
State Rebuffed Security Overture (WSJ) ... 134
City Had Evacuation Plan But Strayed From Strategy (HC) ... 135
Cut Off At Center Of Crisis, City Officials Faced Struggle To Keep In Touch (WSJ) ... 137
La. Lawmaker Rebukes Federal Disaster Response (USAT) ... 140
Senator Bears Witness And Bares Emotions (WP) ... 140
Troops Escalate Urgency Of Evacuation (WP) ... 141
Police Hold Off Use Of Force (USAT) ... 143
Katrina Holdouts Yield To Power Of Persuasion (KRT) ... 143
Some Holdouts Leave, Others Stay As Authorities Urge Evacuation (WSJ) ... 145
Police Begin Seizing Guns Of Civilians (NYT) ... 145
Holes In New Orleans Flood Walls Slowly Being Patched (USAT) ... 147
Some Areas Inch Toward Normality (USAT) ... 148
A City That Made An Art Of Funerals Now Just Makes Do (WSJ) 149
Standing In The Way Of A Good Story (WP) ... 150
Some Urge Greater Use Of Troops In Major Disasters (WP) ... 151
Who Should Call The Cavalry If Katrina Calls? (WSJ) ... 153
A Native Son Takes Charge In Gulf Coast (CSM) ... 154
Storm Leaves Legal System A Shambles (NYT) ... 155
Louisiana Legal System Is Snarled (WSJ) ... 156
Katrina Leaves Louisiana Criminal Justice System In Disarray (KRT) ... 157
Amid Barrage Of Criticism, Defending His Department (NYT) ... 158
Hundreds Of Police Officers Missing In New Orleans (LAT) ... 159
US Watching Katrina-related Fraud (AFP) ... 162
Katrina Victims At Risk For ID Theft, Experts Say (REU) ... 162
U.S. Names 5 Firms To Build Housing (WSJ) ... 163
Bush Suspends Pay Act In Areas Hit By Storm (WP) ... 164
A Surgeon Caught Up In The Flooding Tells Of A Week Of Chaos, Peril And Heroism (NYT) ... 164
HUD, VA Offer Homes For Some Katrina Victims (USAT) ... 166
Airlift Of Evacuees To Northeast Is Under Way (NYT) ... 166
Shelters Grow Empty As Apartments Open Up (NYT) ... 167
Town Improvises To Absorb Evacuees (WP) ... 168
Learning From Katrina (WP) ... 169
Insurers Are Urged To Pay Valid Claims (WP) ... 170
NATO To Help U.S. Transport Aid From Abroad (LAT) ... 171
MoveOn.org Says It Won't Use Evacuee Images In Roberts Ad (USAT) ... 171
What A Hispanic Justice Would Mean (USAT) ... 172
Hill Veterans Light The Way For Nominee (WP) ... 172

Other News:

Gauging Katrina's Impact (WSJ) ... 174
Weekly Jobless Claims Drop, But Katrina May Spur Revision (WSJ/DJN) ... 175
Trying To Absorb The Newly Unemployed (WP) ... 177
Gas Prices Have Eased, But Other Prices Rising (USAT) ... 178
Stocks Take A Breather (WSJ) ... 178
Gulf Banks May Come Out On Top (WSJ) ... 179
Four Easy Pieces (WSJ) ... 180
Crude Oil Supplies Overwhelm Refineries (FT) ... 181
'A Significantly Slower Recovery' (USAT) ... 182
Gas Inventories At A 5-Year Low (NYT) ... 182
Where Do Gas Prices Go Next? (CSM) ... 183
After Buying Surge, Demand For Gasoline Eases (LAT) ... 184
U.S. Gasoline Use Fell 4% Last Week (WSJ) ... 185
Governor Criticizes Bush, Oil Industry Over Record Gas Prices (BJ) ... 185
Gasoline Thefts Increasing As Fuel Prices Keep Rising (NYT) 186
US Changes Position On Cuba's Weapons (CSM) ... 187
China Says North Korea Nuclear Talks Will Resume Tuesday (NYT) ... 188
North Korea Stands Fast On Nuclear Energy Use (WP) ... 189
Yushchenko Sacks Ukraine Government (FT) ... 190
Ukraine's President Fires Prime Minister (LAT) ... 193
Ukraine Leader Fires Cabinet As Reform Coalition Splits (NYT) 192
Ukraine's President Fires Cabinet (WP) ... 193
Peeling Away The Revolution (WSJ) ... 195
Ukraine's Orange Flame, Dimmed (NYT) ... 196
Controversy Swirls Over Egypt Vote (WP) ... 196
Egypt's Unfree Vote (WP) ... 197
Koizumi Backers Look Poised To Win In Elections (USAT) ... 198
Billions For Vaccines For The Poor To Be Raised In Bond Markets (NYT) ... 199
China Plans To Honor A Reformer (WP) ... 199
Chávez's 'Oil Weapon' Is A Popgun (WSJ) ... 200

DOJ_NMG_0003997

TERRORISM NEWS:

N.Va. Man Indicted In Plot Against Bush (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

An American student was charged yesterday in an al Qaeda plot to kill President Bush, with prosecutors alleging that Ahmed Omar Abu Ali and his confederates planned to use multiple snipers to shoot Bush or to blow him up in a suicide bombing.

The expanded indictment of Abu Ali, returned by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, also claimed for the first time that he proposed a plan to bring members of an al Qaeda cell into the United States through Mexico. They would then link up with Abu Ali to conduct terrorist operations in this country, the indictment said.

Abu Ali, 24, of Falls Church was first charged in February with terrorism counts that included trying to establish an al Qaeda cell in the United States. That indictment referred to the plot to kill Bush, but Abu Ali was not charged with conspiring to assassinate the president until yesterday. The case is among the highest-profile terrorism prosecutions in the United States since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The new nine-count indictment also adds charges of conspiracy to commit aircraft piracy and destroy aircraft, part of the Justice Department's allegations that Abu Ali was plotting with al Qaeda to conduct a Sept. 11-style attack in the United States that would include hijacking planes.

If convicted on the assassination count alone, Abu Ali faces up to life in prison. Earlier, his maximum penalty on all counts had been 80 years in prison.

An attorney for Abu Ali, who has pleaded not guilty, did not return telephone calls late yesterday, and a White House spokesman referred calls to the Justice Department. Prosecutors would not comment beyond the indictment.

Abu Ali was arrested by security officials in June 2003 while studying at a university in Saudi Arabia. His family mounted a highly public campaign in the United States for his release. He was held until he was flown back to the United States in February to face charges.

Defense attorneys and Abu Ali's family have contended that any statements he made in Saudi custody were obtained through torture. Two doctors who examined Abu Ali found evidence that he was tortured in Saudi Arabia, including scars on his back consistent with having been whipped, defense lawyers have said in court papers.

Prosecutors have denied that Abu Ali was tortured. But if a federal judge concludes that he was, much of the evidence against him could be thrown out because it was obtained under duress. The torture allegations are expected to play a key role in a hearing scheduled to start Sept. 19.

Law enforcement sources have said the plot against Bush, allegedly hatched while Abu Ali was studying in Saudi Arabia and after he joined an al Qaeda cell there, never advanced beyond the talking stage. The new indictment says two options were considered: multiple snipers shooting the president or a suicide operation.

The earlier indictment said nothing about snipers, only that Abu Ali would get close enough to Bush to "shoot him on the street" or would detonate a car bomb.

Several other allegations emerged yesterday about Abu Ali's alleged relationship with Osama bin Laden's organization. The indictment says he performed guard duty in 2003 for an al Qaeda cell at one of its locations in the Medina area of Saudi Arabia. It also says that in response to a request from an al Qaeda co-conspirator, Abu Ali translated from English into Arabic the audio portions of a video concerning operations by U.S. military aircraft in Afghanistan.

Abu Ali's case has generated strong interest among Muslims in Northern Virginia. The government says he confessed to the assassination plot while being detained in Saudi Arabia and admitted discussing with al Qaeda his plans to conduct attacks in the United States that included crashing hijacked planes into buildings.

Abu Ali will be arraigned on the charges in the new indictment on Wednesday.

Court Questions Guantanamo Detainee Issues (AP)

By PETE YOST, The Associated Press

AP, September 8, 2005

Sep. 8, 2005 - A federal appeals court Thursday questioned the Bush administration's handling of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, suggesting the judiciary might have authority to delve into the conduct of military tribunals which have categorized almost all of the inmates as enemy combatants.

DOJ_NMG_0003998

The two hours of arguments were in sharp contrast to those of several years ago when the appeals court suggested detainees at the Guantanamo Naval base were not entitled to have access to the U.S. courts, and then ruled against them. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed that decision a year ago.

On Thursday, a panel of three appeals court judges two appointed by Republican presidents and one by a Democratic president aggressively questioned Justice Department attorney Gregory Katsas about the possibility of court scrutiny over the detainee review process.

"There is nothing in the habeas statute that requires us to defer to a military tribunal," A. Raymond Randolph, an appointee of President Bush's father, told Katsas. The other judges on the panel are David Sentelle, an appointee of President Reagan, and Judith Rogers, an appointee of President Clinton.

The detainees are not allowed to have legal representation before the tribunals and cannot see classified information being used to classify them as enemy combatants.

Lower court judges are divided on the detainee procedures at Guantanamo Bay. U.S. District Judge Joyce Hens Green ruled that the tribunal hearings are unconstitutional. U.S. District Judge Richard Leon threw out a lawsuit by some of the detainees, saying the place for them to challenge the procedures is before the U.S. military, not in civilian courts.

Katsas said the detainees are granted many rights by the tribunals, which ruled that all but 38 of 596 detainees were enemy combatants and were not entitled to prisoner-of-war protections under the Geneva Conventions.

The government is trying to beat back challenges on behalf of dozens of the Guantanamo Bay detainees who say they are not being afforded a legally proper opportunity to challenge their status as enemy combatants.

In the nearly three years since the U.S. military started transporting detainees to the Navy prison camp in Cuba, the words Guantanamo Bay have become synonymous with the Bush administration's tactics in the war on terror: indefinite detention and no legal rights.

Evidence of detainee abuse at Guantanamo Bay has put the administration on the defensive and the government is trying to deal with the problem by downsizing the prison camp, returning many of the detainees to their home countries.

In the meantime, the government has dug in for a protracted legal battle, defending the course it set in late 2001 with Bush's declaration that all suspected terrorists are enemy combatants rather than prisoners of war entitled to protections under international treaty.

The Pentagon says it is holding 505 prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay prison compound. Many were captured in Afghanistan in the months following the U.S. invasion in October 2001, and some have been there since the detention compound was opened in January 2002.

Guantanamo Bay Prisoners Seek US Court Hearings (REU)

By James Vicini

Reuters, September 8, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Guantanamo Bay prisoners should be given the chance to prove in court that they have been mistakenly labelled as "enemy combatants" and have been unlawfully detained, their attorney said on Thursday.

"Since day one, these people have been saying you've got the wrong guys. They want a fair hearing to show that," attorney Thomas Wilner told a U.S. appeals court during more than two hours of arguments.

But Justice Department lawyer Gregory Katsas repeated the Bush administration's position that the prisoners were not entitled to any constitutional due process rights, and he defended the military tribunals set up to review their cases.

More than 500 prisoners are now being held at the U.S. military base in Cuba after the U.S. government designated them as enemy combatants. Only four have been charged with a crime.

The suspected al Qaeda and Taliban members were captured after the U.S.-led Afghanistan war that followed the September 11, 2001, attacks. Many have been held since the Guantanamo prison camp opened in January 2002.

Under the military's review process, 38 prisoners, accounting for 7 percent of the detainees, were determined to not be enemy combatants despite their earlier designation.

The appeals court considered a pair of Guantanamo cases after two different U.S. District Court judges in Washington came to opposite conclusions in January.

One judge ruled the prisoners have the constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty without due process of law, and that the military tribunals were constitutionally flawed. The other judge said the prisoners have no constitutional rights.

Wilner argued that the prisoners do have fundamental rights under the U.S. Constitution, that they also can use the habeas law to challenge their detention and they have the right to review in court.

Under that law, the government must give a legal and factual basis for the detention, he said.

All three appellate judges sharply questioned the government's lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0003999

Judge David Sentelle questioned the government's position that the prisoners have no rights because the base was outside the United States. "What does Cuba really have left in terms of sovereignty over Guantanamo?" he asked.

Judge A. Raymond Randolph repeatedly asked why the prisoners under the habeas law would not be entitled to some determination in court on whether they have been held under lawful authority.

Sentelle and Randolph both questioned whether the courts could defer to the judgments of the military tribunals.

Judge Judith Rogers questioned whether the military tribunals provided sufficient legal protections.

Lawyers for the prisoners have said the tribunals improperly denied detainees legal representation and provided no opportunity for them to rebut the allegations and evidence against them.

The three-judge panel is expected to rule sometime next year. Any decision most likely will be appealed to the full appeals court or to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Witness Testifies Under Grant Of Immunity (TAMPTRIB)

By ELAINE SILVESTRINI

Tampa Tribune, September 9, 2005

TAMPA - A witness in the trial of Sami al-Arian testified Thursday morning that Ramadan Shallah served briefly as the religious leader of a mosque in Chicago.

Mohammed Hasan, who testified under a grant of immunity, also placed Al-Arian codefendant Hatim Fariz at a 1991 rally in Chicago.

Now the secretary general of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Shallah worked at Al-Arian's think tank, World and Islam Studies Enterprise in the early 1990s and also was employed as an adjunct professor at the University of South Florida.

Fariz and fellow codefendant, Ghassan Zayed Ballut, were members of the Al Quassam mosque in Chicago, said Hassan, who lives in a Chicago suburb.

Hassan said Shallah, whom he knew as Ramadan Abdullah, served as imam of the mosque for four or five months in 1990 or 1991. He was replaced by Suleiman Odeh, brother of Abd Al Aziz Awda, the spiritual leader of the Islamic Jihad. Odeh was later replaced by Naim Nasser Bulbol.

Both Odeh and Bulbol are considered unindicted coconspirators in the case. Prosecutors have alleged in court papers that the mosque was a ``an entity we believe to be a component of the PIJ enterprise."

Muslim Anti-terrorism Ads To Coincide With 9/11 Anniversary (AP)

AP, September 8, 2005

TAMPA -- A Muslim civil liberties group plans to denounce terrorism in a paid television commercial airing in the Tampa market this weekend to coincide with the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The 30-second spot, produced by the nonprofit Council on American-Islamic Relations, features two American Muslims, a man and a woman, denouncing violence in the name of Islam and vowing to ``not to allow our faith to be hijacked by criminals."

The spot will run 105 times Thursday through Sunday on 13 cable channels in Tampa, including CNN, Fox Sports Net and the Weather Channel, according to CAIR's Florida office.

CAIR spokesman Ahmed Bedier said the spots were produced after the London bombings in July and distributed nationwide as public-service announcements, meaning stations could choose to air them or not. Research showed they were seen by as many as 5 million people.

Members of the Tampa chapter donated the money to get the ads on as paid commercials in prime time in the local market this weekend, at a cost of more than $10,000, Bedier said. He said he didn't know of any other CAIR chapters airing the ads as paid commercials.

``We're basically piloting it to consider doing it in other markets," Bedier said. ``We'll be following up and try to gauge the perception and see if there's positive feedback."

For Tampa Muslims, adding to image problems in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks is the ongoing federal trial of former college professor Sami Al-Arian, who is accused of supporting the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, an Islamic terrorist group that targeted Israelis.

Washington D.C.-based CAIR is America's largest Muslim civil liberties group with 31 offices and chapters in the United States and Canada.

US 'terror Camp' Suspect Remanded (BBC)

BBC.com, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004000

Haroon Rashid Aswat was initially deported from Zambia to the UK A British man accused of trying to set up a terror training camp in the US has been ordered to remain in custody while an extradition case is prepared.

Suspected terrorist Haroon Rashid Aswat, 30, who denies the claim and opposes extradition, appeared by video link from Belmarsh Prison.

A lawyer for US authorities told Bow Street magistrates the extradition case would be complete within 10 days.

Aswat of Dewbury, West Yorks, is due to appear again on 6 October.

'Fight jihad'

US prosecutors allege that Aswat, who was deported from Zambia to Britain in August and arrested by UK authorities, conspired to provide material support for terrorism in the US in 1999-2000.

They said he and another man helped to set up a camp in Bly, Oregon, to train people to "fight jihad" in Afghanistan.

The camp was to provide weapons training and schooling for hand-to-hand combat and martial arts for militants, US prosecutors said.

They say he flew to New York on 26 November 1999 and then a bus to Bly, via Seattle.

Two-year term

US prosecutors say he was carrying CD-ROM information on how to make bombs and poisons and on military conduct.

A second claim was that he conspired with others so that any training would "arouse reasonable apprehension" that people were being prepared to "fight jihad" in Afghanistan.

James Ujaama, 38, a Muslim convert from Seattle who has lived in Britain, pleaded guilty to involvement in a plot in April 2003.

He faced up to 25 years in prison but received a two-year sentence after agreeing to co-operate in terrorism investigations until 2013.

Family's fears for terror suspect

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Resolution Rejected (GRPRESS)

By Shandra Martinez, The Grand Rapids Press

The Grand Rapids Press, September 8, 2005

HOLLAND -- The City Council on Tuesday rejected a resolution expressing concern with sections of the federal Patriot Act.

The resolution was proposed by the city's Human Relations Commission and on put on the agenda Wednesday by Councilman David Hoekstra.

The council rejected the resolution 5-2, with only the 6th Ward councilman Hoekstra and Councilman At-Large Jerome Kobes voting in favor. Mayor Al McGeehan and 2nd Ward Victor Orozco were absent.

Both Mayor Pro-Tem Craig Rich and 5th Ward Councilman Kurt Dykstra said they felt the Patriot Act doesn't fall under the council's jurisdiction.

"I'm one of those people who don't think its appropriate (for the City Council) to take a stand on a national issue. What's next? Are we going to be asked to vote on gay marriages next week or the war in Iraq the following week?" Rich said. "We are elected to represent our constituents on local issues...This is grandstanding if we do it. That's all it is."

While he didn't agree with the HRC's recommendation, 4th Ward Councilman Bob Vande Vusse said he appreciated the work of the HRC, which spent more than a year studying the issue.

"(But) it wouldn't be responsible on my part to give the impression that the entire city shares this position," said Vande Vusse, adding that as a librarian, he has some concerns about the federal legislation.

Hoekstra, council liaison on the HRC, said after a lot of study, he agreed with the resolution and felt the Patriot Act poses a threat to civil rights.

"My fear is in our well-intentioned effort to be safe, we forget what makes us truly strong," Hoekstra said.

While the resolution drew comment from council members, no one in the audience addressed council on the subject. Hoekstra said he was pleased with the discussion council gave to the topic.

"We talked about it, wrestled with it. That's a victory," Hoekstra said.

DOJ_NMG_0004001

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Fallen EMT Volunteer On Sept. 11 Gets Rescuer Status (AP)

By MICHAEL GORMLEY, The Associated Press

AP, September 8, 2005

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — On Sept. 11, 2001, as Glenn Winuk's co-workers were ordered to run to safety from their lower Manhattan office building, he ran the other way a block toward ground zero. There he told New York City fire officials he was an emergency medical technician in his hometown volunteer fire department and wanted to help the victims.

Moments later, he died when the South Tower collapsed, the medical kit he was issued at his side.

On Thursday he was officially recognized by the state as a rescuer in the historic effort that saved thousands, rather than as a civilian casualty, a distinction his family has been seeking for nearly four years.

Advertisement

"They all ran for safety, but he ran toward the scene as he did in `93" for the first World Trade Center bombing, said Winuk's brother, Jay Winuk. "He ran toward danger because he knew he could save lives."

Gov. George Pataki called him a hero.

"His bravery, service, and dedication on that terrible day saved the lives of many, and must never be forgotten," Pataki said.

The recognition was delayed because Glenn Winuk was technically an associate member of the Jericho Volunteer Fire Department in Nassau County and was no longer an active firefighter or EMT in the department he served with for 19 years. His status changed when he moved to Manhattan and became a partner in his law firm, keeping him from being recognized by the federal government as an official rescue worker for memorials, historic records, and for a $278,658 Public Safety Officers benefit for his parents.

The federal government rejected the family's request citing, in part, the fact that Winuk hadn't even been officially recognized by the state as a rescue worker, said state Sen. Carl Marcellino, a Long Island Republican. But his bill, co-sponsored by Democratic Assemblyman Charles Lavine and recently signed by Pataki, changed that.

A federal decision is expected in 30 days.

A Justice Department spokesman didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

"We're not talking about a fortune and money is not the point," said Jay Winuk of Mahopac, Putnam County. "It's only about doing the right thing."

He said the Justice Department first supported the request, but then denied it after he passed on the good news to his parents, Seymour and Elaine, in Jericho.

"It's been a painful road for my family to pursue," he said. But, "he's my little brother."

"He stood up when it was time to stand up," Marcellino said of Glenn Winuk. "I think we should stand up for him now."

Fallen Heroes To Get 9/11 Medals (NSL)

By RON MARSICO, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, September 8, 2005

After the terrorist planes hit the Twin Towers on 9/11, Edward Calderon, a civilian employee with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, told a colleague by phone he was staying inside one of the buildings to help with evacuation operations.

"I'm a Marine and we don't leave anyone behind," snapped Calderon, a former member of the corps and a resident of Union.

James Barbella, an agency property manager from Oceanside, N.Y., led would-be rescuers up the stairs desperately trying to find a way to save people trapped in the top-floor restaurant, Windows on the World.

Robert Lynch, another property manager from Cranford, ensured that a child-care facility and bookstore were clear before heading through the plaza to help with the evacuation of a tower.

Lynch, Barbella and Calderon were killed when the buildings collapsed. Tomorrow, they will be among 13 Port Authority civilian employees given a special 9/11 heroes' "Medal of Valor" posthumously by President Bush in Washington, D.C., along with the 37 Port Authority Police officers who also died that day.

"They were true first responders that day," said Alan Reiss, who on 9/11 was director of the Port Authority's World Trade Department and oversaw the 13 employees who served as civilian emergency responders. "They just didn't wear a uniform. They wore a suit."

DOJ_NMG_0004002

Port Authority officials successfully lobbied to get the employees' families the medals because the 13 individuals provided critical electrical, structural, mechanical and operations information to police and fire officials during the evacuation that saved thousands. Officials said their role has been little known by members of the general public.

"There was a great deal of unforgettable tragedy on 9/11. One positive note, however, was that approximately 25,000 people were evacuated from the World Trade Center," the agency's chairman and executive director wrote in a June letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. "These fallen Port Authority civilians assisted all uniformed rescue workers in all aspects of the evacuation and collectively all groups significantly contributed to saving all those lives."

Port Authority officials also credited U.S. Rep. Joseph Crowley, a New York Democrat, for helping get the recognition for the 13 civilians.

Overall, a total of 2,749 people died at the World Trade Center on 9/11.

The role of the Port Authority Police, which lost 37 officers that day, has been well documented. Those to be similarly honored by Bush also include members of the New York City Police and Fire Department who perished that day. In total, 443 responders will be recognized on the White House lawn.

The other 10 civilian employees to be honored are Douglas Karpiloff of Mamaroneck, N.Y.; Eugene Raggio of Staten Island; Edward Strauss of Edison; Francis Riccardelli of Westwood; Carlos Da Costa of Elizabeth; Frank DeMartini of Brooklyn; David Ortiz of Nanuet, N.Y.; Joseph Amatuccio of Baldwin Harbor, N.Y.; Peter Negron of Elizabeth, and Ken Grouzalis of Lyndhurst.

They had received training for emergencies and participated in response drills. On 9/11, they helped staff the fire command center and direct rescuers to people trapped in elevators and various other parts of the buildings.

All 13 civilians were not obligated to go to the emergency posts because the building had been leased to developer Larry Silverstein the previous July, and the Port Authority had become the tenant. But the employees still felt duty-bound and stayed voluntarily.

"These people knew these buildings like the back of their hands," said Lillian Valenti, chief of the Port Authority's Office of Medical Services. "They were really the road map and the eyes and ears of people who didn't know the complex."

Ron Marsico covers the Port Authority. He may be reached at rmarsico@starledger.com or (973) 392-7860.

AP: 9/11 Loans Wind Up Far From Manhattan (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ben Dobbin, Ap Business Writer

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - CHURCHVILLE, N.Y.-Richard Parsons Jr., a veterinarian in a country suburb 280 miles from ground zero in Manhattan, felt the ripple effects of Sept. 11, 2001, about a year later. It almost put him out of business.

Called up for duty with the Army Reserves in fall 2002, Parsons spent 10 months in Afghanistan. He hired a substitute vet and barely kept his one-man practice near Rochester from going bankrupt by obtaining a low-interest, $72,800 loan from a federal program designed to help small businesses recover from 9/11.

It upsets the 43-year-old father of two that all manner of companies in upstate New York not damaged in the slightest by the terror attacks - from chiropractors to auto-repair shops to fast-food franchises - could dip into the same $5 billion disaster-relief fund administered by the Small Business Association.

"It seems like when the government has a big pot of money, there's always charlatans that are going to try to, in some way, finagle out money," he said. "I guess when you're dealing with such massive amounts of money and numbers of applications, people are going to get away with things."

His words reverberated in cafes, on street corners and around the dinner table.

"It doesn't sound right to me, it doesn't sound fair," said security guard Doug Kleinhammer, 50, as he hopped on his motorcycle outside the World Wide News store in Rochester. "It's unnecessary spending of money. The people who needed it were those directly affected."

An Associated Press review of two Small Business Administration programs that doled out Sept. 11 recovery loans, found the government provided, approved or guaranteed nearly $4.9 billion in loans, and took credit for saving 20,000 jobs. That puts the average cost of saving a job at about a quarter million dollars each.

Of the 19,000 loans, fewer than 11 percent went to companies in New York City and Washington, an AP computer analysis showed. Officials conceded the SBA allocated few resources to oversee the congressionally-approved loan programs, leaving banks on an honor system to determine who should get terror recovery loans.

SBA documents obtained by AP show the banks had a strong incentive to approve as many loans as possible from the terror program - their cost was reduced in half.

The SBA said it first learned of the problems through AP's review and was weighing whether an investigation was needed.

DOJ_NMG_0004003

Among the hardest-hit enterprises in places far removed from the devastation were travel agencies, tourist shops, food caterers, limousine fleets, hotels and bars. Americans weren't traveling far from home like they used to.

"The country as a whole was not in a jovial mood. We saw people drinking less, eating less and buying less tickets to special events," said Stephen Waite, whose three-story brew pub in downtown Albany saw a sudden 25 percent to 30 percent drop in revenues.

"It was like this kind of guilt feeling of, `There's no time for just foolhardily passing the time like we used to, we need to be serious and more into our family.'"

Waite, 51, a lawyer who recently sold The Big House Brewing Co., got a $1.1 million loan from the Small Business Administration's "supplemental terrorist activity recovery" program in 2002. Even though his nightlife venture took about 18 months to recover, he had no idea the fund was specifically intended to deal with the terrorist aftershocks.

"We just went through a banking group, that's a typical way to obtain loans," he said. "There was no discussion of the 9/11 situation. I wasn't even aware of that program.

"As long as people are filling out applications correctly, I guess I'm not as upset as I would be at the people approving them," he said. "I'm sure every governmental agency is going to get a ton of applications that don't fit within the program and their job responsibility is to reject."

Lorraine Serpe, 44, was on the brink of folding her Lorraine's Lunch Basket food-catering firm in Rochester when her $153,500 loan came through in June 2002.

"Business was just dead, it was just nothing," Serpe said. "We were catering to Xerox, Bausch & Lomb, Kodak and they just all stopped traveling. I was speaking to my accountant about the hard times I was in and, by a miracle of God, she said `Oh my God, I've heard of this disaster relief fund.' She says `Try it, try it!' I tried it. I explained my situation and they said I qualified."

Thre "affected the world," Serpe said. "It affected me, and I'm only in little Rochester."

In contrast, chiropractor Colby Shores said his business in Irondequoit, a Rochester suburb along Lake Ontario, was unaffected. While his patients "were devastated" by 9/11, "they weren't putting their health second to anything else," he said.

Nonetheless, Shores obtained a $87,000 loan with a 4 percent interest rate. He, too, said he was unaware of the type of program he was tapping into.

"I had nothing to do with the financing," he said. "I hired a contractor and they found the correct amount of funds I needed for my small business loan."

In Bath in western New York, Arvind "Andy" Patel, 50, said his $350,000 loan in fall 2002 to remodel his Dunkin' Donuts store was arranged through a bank approved by the fast-food chain's corporate office.

Patel, a native of Bombay, India, who bought another Dunkin' Donuts in Wilmington, Del., in 1998, moved into his Bath store on Sept. 6, 2001.

The catastrophe five days later had no impact on his business. "Not at all," he said.

On the Net:

An AP interactive with data on SBA loans in each state can be viewed at:

http://hosted.ap.org/dynamic/files/specials/interactives/-national/terror-lo ans/index.html

SBA: http://www.sba.gov

Key Official In Clandestine Service Of CIA To Retire (WP)

By Dana Priest And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Robert Richer, the second-ranking official in the CIA's clandestine service, has announced his retirement, telling colleagues that he lacked confidence in the agency's leadership, according to current and former intelligence officials.

Richer, who was one of CIA Director Porter J. Goss's key personnel choices, made his announcement last Friday at a meeting of the Directorate of Operations leaders, according to some of the officials.

Some of them said Richer's decision revolved around an ongoing debate over how to improve human intelligence and the direction of the CIA. The agency's role and influence have waned with the appointment of John D. Negroponte as the overall director of national intelligence.

Other government officials disagreed with that assertion and said Richer's departure involved disputes over "operational issues" that they would not specify, and a clash of personalities between Richer, a former Marine, and Goss and his top aides.

Last year, Richer's predecessor and his boss resigned after clashing with Goss's aides. During Friday's meeting, Richer said he and his boss, the deputy director of operations -- who cannot be named because he remains undercover -- had been frustrated by Goss and his staff in their efforts to implement certain measures, sources said. Richer subsequently met with national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley to explain his decision.

DOJ_NMG_0004004

A CIA spokesman declined to comment on the matter. Other intelligence sources would speak only anonymously because of agency rules and traditions against speaking to the media.

Yesterday, Goss sent an unusual worldwide message to all CIA employees praising Richer for his nearly 35 years of service. That only fueled the belief among some former intelligence officials that Richer's resignation reflects ongoing problems at the agency.

Richer has served for less than a year as the number two in the spy service, having been promoted from being chief of the Near East division.

The CIA has been under pressure to make changes after a presidential commission and the Sept. 11 commission found last year that human intelligence collection had failed regarding both the al Qaeda terrorist network and whether Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.

The presidential commission recommended creation of a Human Intelligence Directorate within the CIA, which would rank above the agency's Directorate of Operations and coordinate foreign human-intelligence collection across the intelligence community, including the Pentagon and the FBI.

Some top administration officials favor a plan to make the clandestine service, as the Directorate of Operations is known, the central focus of the CIA, with all other functions -- such as analysis and technology -- subordinate to the human intelligence role.

Tight Constraints On Pentagon's Freedom Walk (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Organizers of the Pentagon's 9/11 memorial Freedom Walk on Sunday are taking extraordinary measures to control participation in the march and concert, with the route fenced off and lined with police and the event closed to anyone who does not register online by 4:30 p.m. today.

The march, sponsored by the Department of Defense, will wend its way from the Pentagon to the Mall along a route that has not been specified but will be lined with four-foot-high snow fencing to keep it closed and "sterile," said Allison Barber, deputy assistant secretary of defense.

The U.S. Park Police will have its entire Washington force of several hundred on duty and along the route, on foot, horseback and motorcycles and monitoring from above by helicopter. Officers are prepared to arrest anyone who joins the march or concert without a credential and refuses to leave, said Park Police Chief Dwight E. Pettiford.

The event, the America Supports You Freedom Walk, is billed as a memorial to victims of the 2001 terrorist attacks and a show of support for those serving in the military, topped off with a concert by country singer Clint Black, known for his pro-troops anthem, "Iraq and Roll." Organizers said they expect 3,000 to 10,000 participants.

Barber said that organizers would rather not have such stringent measures on their event but that police had requested them.

Pettiford said officers would patrol to keep interlopers out because the Pentagon restricted the event in its permit application. "That is what their permit called for, so we have those fences to keep the public out."

Once the National Park Service approves the permit, it is normal for police to do what they can to adhere to the organizers' requests. "It's a permitted event. That means [organizers] are allowed to say who is in and who's out," said Sgt. Scott Fear, a Park Police spokesman. He declined to say how many officers were in the Park Police, which had a Washington detail of about 400 two years ago.

What's unusual for an event on the Mall is the combination of fences, required preregistration and the threat of arrest.

Park Police officials said security and safety were concerns, especially because Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld will participate in some of the day's events. They said they have approved a permit for a small group of protesters that plans to stand along Independence Avenue.

Barber at first said this week that event organizers would rather not be so strict but that they were complying with police orders. But yesterday she said Park Police offered two options: Screen participants at the Mall, as police did for the Fourth of July fireworks and concert, where bags would be searched and restricted items such as alcohol, weapons, animals or glass bottles would be seized; or screen them at the Pentagon and, by restricting access throughout the march, "make sure the same people who were screened at the Pentagon are the same people going to the concert," she said.

Barber added: "We didn't want a bottleneck at the concert. We didn't want people to miss the concert while waiting to be screened. So we decided to do the screening at the Pentagon. That means the entire route has to be kept closed."

DOJ_NMG_0004005

Some military supporters have welcomed the event as a way to counter the antiwar movement and back the troops abroad. Antiwar groups say they are convinced that the event was orchestrated to boost the war effort and link the war to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks -- and to undercut an antiwar protest planned for Sept. 24.

One restricted group will be the media, whose members will not be allowed to walk along the march route. Reporters and cameras are restricted to three enclosed areas along the route but are not permitted to walk alongside participants walking from the Pentagon, across the Memorial Bridge to the Mall.

The Washington Post and other corporate entities initially signed on as co-sponsors. But critics from within the newspaper and from the antiwar movement said partnering with the Pentagon raised questions about objectivity, and three weeks ago The Post pulled its co-sponsorship.

Other media co-sponsors -- WTOP radio, WJLA-TV and NewsChannel 8 -- support the effort with advertising.

Opponents of the Freedom Walk took issue with the way the Pentagon is staging the event. When the walk first was publicized, participants were required to submit their names, ages, e-mail addresses and home addresses. After some groups accused the Pentagon of using the registration as a recruiting tool for the military, the requirements were changed.

Barber said the government now asks for a full name, age group, T-shirt size and e-mail address (each registered walker will get a T-shirt). Walkers have until 4:30 p.m. today to register, which must be done online (http://www.asyfreedomwalk.com).

Officials at the Pentagon, where 184 people died in the attack, decided to open the attack site and memorial chapel to the public tomorrow for the first time.

Visitors will be welcome from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and can see the stone that marks the crash site of American Airlines Flight 77 and the memorial chapel built there.

There is no need to register to visit the memorial chapel tomorrow.

After Four Years, First Signs Of Renewal At Ground Zero (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

NEW YORK - Dust still powders ground zero where the World Trade Center once stood, but it's construction dust that the wind now whips gently around this deep, 16-acre hole.

Called "the bathtub," it reveals the strides and the stumbling, as well as the dogged determination, that have marked the rebuilding effort in the four years since terrorists slammed two planes into the twin symbols of New York's financial prowess.

There has been progress: A grand master plan is in place, complete with a soaring 1,776-foot Freedom Tower and a sunken, sacred memorial where waterfalls cascade in the two footprints of the original towers.

But it has been slow going, due in part to the seeming incompatibility of rebuilding a vital commercial, retail, and financial hub on what many now consider to be a sacred burial ground. What's more, there's a determination to see that ground zero - an international symbol of the West's refusal to bow to terrorism - rises stronger than before. Though it's taking extra time to ensure that happens, planners hope ground zero will come to stand for America's resilience, its ability to overcome hatred, and a celebration of its values.

Chief among those values, particularly in New York, is democracy. But that, too, is adding to the slow pace of development. In this gritty city that pioneered urban planning, everybody has an opinion: Wall Street tycoons and cabbies alike aren't afraid to tell you exactly what they think.

So before a new skyline pierces the void now in lower Manhattan, this major urban project is expected to be the most publicly debated, disputed, reviewed, and revised in world history. As a top developer puts it, the master plan is very much a "living document."

Add to that the challenge of making the new structures as secure as possible to prevent future devastation, and you have an urban rebirth that could take more than a decade, if not a generation, to complete.

"I'd like to tell you we're building a city on a hill, and we may get there, but it's certainly in fits and starts," says Robert Yarrow, president of the Regional Planning Association, which has been involved with the planning process from the start. "While a lot of progress has been made, there's a lot that's still very much in the air."

From the vantage point of the bottom of the bathtub, progress is evident on the eastern wall of the hole, where sunlight glints off the new, exposed steel of the temporary train station that's already moving commuters uptown and across the Hudson River. On the west side, the massive steel bolts that reinforce a retaining wall dot the barren concrete. In the northwest corner hangs a huge American flag, marking where ground was broken this week on a new transportation hub.

The design of the transportation center is meant to evoke the rising wings of a dove. Underground, the hub will connect 11 subways, the PATH train system, and walkways to the Hudson River ferries, as well as future rail links to Kennedy International Airport and Long Island. Gov. George Pataki (R) calls it an "iconic transportation facility - an architectural marvel and a grand terminal." When construction begins Monday, it will be the first time in four years a spade was put in this 16-acre site to begin construction on a permanent structure.

This summer the city secured a commitment for another permanent anchor in the area: Goldman Sachs, the massive investment house that last spring pulled plans to build its $2.9 billion headquarters across from the site because of security and traffic concerns. After state officials moved a planned tunnel and offered an additional $1.6 billion in 9/11 Liberty Bonds, the firm changed its mind again. Construction is slated to begin later this year.

But hovering above all the activity, the damaged and contaminated Deutsche Bank building still stands shrouded in black mesh cloth, awaiting the demolition ball. In the ground, the Freedom Tower cornerstone sits ignored. Both are testaments to the legal, insurance, security, and political obstacles that have stymied the rebuilding. The Freedom Tower is a case in point. The cornerstone was solemnly laid a year ago, only to have the police department demand that construction be halted. The NYPD's security experts said the design - already approved by other parties - would leave the new building too vulnerable to attack from a suicide truck bomber.

Plans for a new tower were finally agreed upon and presented to the public in June, but construction could be a year off. The cornerstone, meanwhile, sits there waiting to be moved.

"Anyone who thinks the agenda is done when the shovels are put in the ground here are sadly mistaken, but at least in the last few months there's been some real progress," Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York said before this week's groundbreaking. "Goldman Sachs and now this station are a one-two punch that say maybe this culture of gridlock and inertia is changing."

The rebuilding lessons at ground zero may prove instructive to the Gulf Coast - inspiring hope that reconstruction can be done, but also providing a reality check. These things take time. Gulf Coast planners, to their credit, are moving quickly. They've already contacted the Lower Manhattan Development Corp. (LMDC), created to oversee the rebuilding of ground zero.

"We plan to continue assisting in any way that will be useful in terms of the precedents established here, the lessons learned, and ... to offer encouragement that there is a better future ahead," says Stefan Pryor, LMDC president. "We have every confidence that Louisiana and the Gulf states will recover better than ever, just as lower Manhattan is doing."

Part of that confidence comes from the rebuilding process itself, despite the setbacks and slow pace.

"I would have loved it if it had gone faster," says Mayor Michael Bloomberg. But given the magnitude of the project, it is probably not unusual to be taking some time, he adds. "In the end, the only thing that people will remember is whether we do the right thing, not whether it took two years or four years or eight years."

WAR NEWS:

Powell Calls His U.N. Speech A Lasting Blot On His Record (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - The former secretary of state, Colin L. Powell, says in a television interview to be broadcast Friday that his 2003 speech to the United Nations, in which he gave a detailed description of Iraqi weapons programs that turned out not to exist, was "painful" for him personally and would be a permanent "blot" on his record.

"I'm the one who presented it on behalf of the United States to the world," Mr. Powell told Barbara Walters of ABC News, adding that the presentation "will always be a part of my record."

Asked by Ms. Walters how painful this was for him, Mr. Powell replied: "It was painful. It's painful now." Asked further how he felt upon learning that he had been misled about the accuracy of intelligence on which he relied, Mr. Powell said, "Terrible." He added that it was "devastating" to learn later that some intelligence agents knew the information he had was unreliable but did not speak up.

Mr. Powell also implied in the interview that the United States did not go to war in Iraq with sufficient troops to secure the country and failed to keep sufficient Iraqi forces to help stabilize the country.

"What we didn't do in the immediate aftermath of the war was to impose our will on the whole country with enough troops of our own, with enough troops from coalition forces or by re-creating the Iraqi forces, armed forces, more quickly than we are doing now," he said.

But with Iraq still violent and plagued by sectarian conflict, the United States has "little choice but to keep investing in the Iraqi armed forces and to do everything we can to increase their size and their capability and their strength."

DOJ_NMG_0004007

Since leaving office in January, Mr. Powell has declined interview requests. But his expressions of regret about the weapons intelligence and the lack of troops were consistent with many of his statements in office, especially after it became clear that Iraq had none of the weapons that Mr. Powell had said it was stockpiling.

He acknowledged several times that intelligence failures lay behind his presentation on the eve of the Iraq war two years ago, but he has never expressed any regret about the war itself. Asked by Ms. Walters, "When the president made the decision to go to war, you were for it?" Mr. Powell said, "Yes."

Asked about editorials asserting that he had put loyalty "ahead of leadership," Mr. Powell parried the question. "Well, loyalty is a trait that I value, and yes, I am loyal," he replied. "And there are some who say, 'Well, you shouldn't have supported it, you should have resigned.' But I'm glad that Saddam Hussein is gone."

Mr. Powell said he did not blame George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence, for the failures and did not believe that Mr. Tenet tried to mislead him.

"No, George Tenet did not sit there for five days with me, misleading me," he said, referring to the week he spent at the Central Intelligence Agency reviewing the evidence on Iraq before making his presentation to the United Nations. "There were some people in the intelligence community who knew at that time that some of these sources were not good, and shouldn't be relied upon, and they didn't speak up. That devastated me."

U.S.-Iraqi Sweep Arrests 200 In Rebel Staging Area (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

TAL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 8 (AP) - As a joint force of American and Iraqi troops moved into Tal Afar, a major insurgent staging ground near the Syrian border, the Iraqi Army said Thursday that it had arrested 200 people suspected of being militants in the sweep and that three-fourths of them were foreigners.

Most of the estimated civilian population of 200,000 has fled this predominantly Turkmen city, where 70 percent of that ethnic group is Sunni Muslim, the sect that dominates the Iraqi insurgency. The American military reported killing seven insurgents in the last two days, and indications were growing that the joint force would intensify the operation.

Tal Afar was swept as election officials tallied voter registration figures from three Sunni-dominated provinces, where registration had been extended a week in preparation for the Oct. 15 nationwide referendum on the new constitution.

"Turnout was unbelievable, and people were very enthusiastic, especially in Falluja and Ramadi," said Farid Ayar, an electoral commission spokesman in Baghdad. Falluja and Ramadi are Sunni insurgent bastions in Anbar Province, which stretches west from Baghdad to the Syrian, Jordanian and Saudi borders.

The heavy voter registration suggests the minority Sunnis are mobilizing to defeat the draft charter, a shift from January, when their boycott of the parliamentary vote gave control of the National Assembly to Shiites and Kurds.

The draft constitution was approved and sent to voters by a coalition of Shiites and Kurds, over the objections of Sunnis, who fear it would allow the country to split into sectarian and ethnic mini-states. That could cut Sunnis out of Iraq's oil wealth.

Sunni clerics are now urging their people to take part in the referendum and the parliamentary balloting in December.

Rejection of the draft constitution would mean elections in December for a Parliament under the rules of the interim constitution. The new Parliament would start drafting a constitution from scratch.

Demographics are a big problem for the Sunni Arabs, about 20 percent of Iraq's 27 million people. Sunnis form the majority in four of the 18 provinces, but their numbers are overwhelming in only two, Anbar and Salahuddin. Under election rules, a "no" vote by a two-thirds majority in any three provinces would defeat the referendum.

In Anbar and Salahuddin, about 75 percent of eligible voters had signed up by Wednesday, the deadline, election officials said, while cautioning the tally was not final. In Diyala, a province with a Sunni majority where the count was final, 417,000 of 750,000 eligible voters, or 56 percent, had registered, said Amir Latif, director of the provincial elections commission. He spoke from Baquba, the provincial capital, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

Sunnis also hold a majority in Nineveh Province, home to Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city, and Tal Afar. But much of the Sunni population in the province is Kurdish and committed to the draft charter.

In the Tal Afar sweep, Capt. Muhammad Ahmed of the Iraqi Army said that one of captives was Amr Omayer, an Iraqi who was believed to be commander of all insurgent operations stemming from Tal Afar.

Captain Ahmed said some of those arrested could not speak Arabic.

"We believe they are Afghans, but we have not checked their nationalities so far," he said. The Arab-speaking captives were from Syria, Sudan, Yemen and Jordan, he said. Captain Ahmed said eight civilians were killed Wednesday in the city by a suicide car bomber. The Iraqi police said Thursday that they had found 17 bullet-ridden bodies near Mahmudiya, a heavily Sunni town south of Baghdad. Two more bodies, blindfolded and handcuffed, were found on Baghdad's outskirts. The United States announced the death on Wednesday of a soldier in an accident at Camp Taqaddum near Falluja.

DOJ_NMG_0004008

U.S. Forces Chase Ghost Fighters Amid Iraqis (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 8 -- The U.S. soldiers sensed something wasn't quite right when an ambulance carrying two dead bodies arrived Thursday morning at a checkpoint for people evacuating this city under siege.

Hanging off the sides of the vehicle were three young men who said they were escorting the remains of family members killed in the previous night's bombardment to a local hospital. But when an Iraqi policeman looked them over, he pointed to a man who wore white sweatpants and a white shirt and appeared to be in his early twenties. "I know him. He must be detained," the officer said. "He murdered a policeman."

The interrogation by American soldiers initially went nowhere. The man insisted he spoke Turkish, not Arabic, and therefore could not communicate with the Americans' interpreters. Asked his name, he kept alternating between "Habib" and "Faris." At one point, he rolled on the floor making retching noises as if he were going to throw up. But everything changed when exasperated soldiers said they had no choice but to turn him over to the Iraqis, who were anxious to take him into custody.

"Yes, I am a terrorist, yes," the man said in perfect Arabic, his ailment apparently forgotten. "I would rather you shoot me in the head than give me to them."

The episode underscored what many U.S. troops have said is among the most difficult tasks they face in battling the insurgency across Iraq: identifying fighters who blend seamlessly into the local population.

American commanders have long insisted that growing numbers of Iraqi security forces will make that job much easier by providing an insider's knowledge of local communities. Privately, U.S. commanders also acknowledge that the Iraqi troops' reputation for heavy-handed treatment of prisoners cuts two ways: It can terrify prisoners into talking but undermine the rapport policemen and soldiers have with the populations they serve.

In Tall Afar, where a week ago U.S. and Iraqi troops launched their largest urban assault since the push into Fallujah last November, soldiers are simultaneously working to help people flee in anticipation of an imminent attack on the city center and to prevent insurgents among them from escaping undetected.

Heavy bombing continued Thursday evening, as U.S. jets dropped 500-pound J-DAM precision bombs and other munitions into the insurgent-controlled neighborhood of Sarai, while playing messages over loudspeakers that called on residents to evacuate. Nearly 1,000 people left the city through U.S. checkpoints Thursday, and commanders said intelligence showed that insurgent leaders were attempting to vacate the city.

Iraqi policemen and soldiers are fully integrated into nearly every aspect of the Tall Afar operation, often attached to units from the U.S. Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is leading the assault, or advised by small groups of U.S. Special Forces soldiers. Among the units here are several battalions of the Iraqi army's 3rd Division, which is based in northwestern Iraq, and a battalion of Kurdish soldiers assigned to Tall Afar for this operation. Hundreds of regular Iraqi policemen and police commandos are also being brought to the city to man stations that U.S. forces have said they will establish once the fighting wanes.

The performance of Iraqi troops in this region has improved dramatically since the 3rd Armored Cavalry arrived in April, U.S. commanders said. In early June, an Iraqi platoon led by two U.S. soldiers was ambushed in Sarai. When machine-gun fire rained down on the platoon, most of its members fled. An American lieutenant colonel was killed in the engagement.

"When we started with them, whenever they would receive a little fire they would either run or do what we called the 'death blossom' -- basically spraying in all directions, which was dangerous for us and dangerous for the town," said Lt. Col. Christopher Hickey, who leads the 3rd Armored Cavalry's Sabre Squadron and works closely with Iraqi commanders. "Through leadership and experience, they have become more disciplined."

Lacking sufficient numbers of skilled interpreters for interrogations, U.S. forces operating independently of Iraqi units have sometimes struggled in their attempts to find insurgents during several days of house-to-house searches in Tall Afar.

On Sunday, soldiers from Eagle Squadron's Blue Platoon raided the home of a suspected insurgent named Suleiman Dawou. When they arrived at the house, Dawou was gone, but they found a man they believed to be his cousin. They asked in English if the cousin knew where Dawou was, and the man said no. Believing he was lying, the soldiers placed him in plastic cuffs and told him that he was being detained. They began filling out paperwork required to take him into custody when an interpreter arrived and tried questioning him one last time.

"I thought the soldiers said Salman Dawou," the man told the interpreter. "I know Suleiman, but I have not seen him for months." The soldiers let him go.

DOJ_NMG_0004009

But while Hickey and other commanders said the participation of Iraqi troops will help immeasurably with efforts to identify insurgents, there is also concern here, as in other Sunni Arab communities across Iraq, because the Iraqi units are predominantly composed of Shiite Muslims or ethnic Kurds. Hickey said that U.S. forces have met with local Sunni leaders to encourage recruitment of Sunnis into police and army units. But after a series of meetings last month in which the tribal leaders said they would provide lists of candidates, only three names were put forward.

"Part of the problem is the security situation is so bad here that no one wants to be a policeman," Hickey said. "Once that improves, we are hoping more of them will sign up. The ideal is for people to be policing their own people, their own neighborhoods, so they have a stake in doing it right."

Civilians fleeing Tall Afar, where most residents are Sunnis from the Turkmen ethnic group, were told by U.S. troops to evacuate through checkpoints in the southern part of the city. But many said they were too afraid to enter south-side neighborhoods where most police and residents are Shiites.

The Kurdish soldiers involved in the operation here are members of the pesh merga militia that battled the Sunni-led government of former president Saddam Hussein and that supports Kurdish forces fighting the government of neighboring Turkey. They will particularly relish their role invading a stronghold of the Turkmens, who have strong ethnic ties to Turkey, American commanders said.

"They are champing at the bit," said Hickey, who denied that zeal would lead to overly aggressive tactics. "They are a professional fighting force with a good reputation. They want to keep that intact."

The man who was plucked from the ambulance and interrogated Thursday appeared genuinely frightened of facing the Iraqi police. "Please no," he repeated several times. Once soldiers realized they had a lever to extract information, they called for Iraqi policemen to sit in on the questioning. The officers said the man was involved in a gruesome killing of a local policeman who was beheaded, his corpse placed on the street with a bomb lodged inside of it that exploded when a dog began sniffing at the body.

When the policemen first entered the room, the man turned to face the corner, refusing to look at them. After a series of increasingly pointed questions shouted at him, he became defiant.

"No matter what you say, I am a holy warrior. I am going to paradise," he told the interrogators, referring to the belief cited by many insurgent fighters that those who die for their cause have a special place in the afterlife. "The rest of you are infidels who will go to hell."

For A U.S. Platoon In Iraq, Merciless Missions (WP)

By Steve Fainaru

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

BALAD, Iraq -- On an asphalt road surrounded by apple trees and date palms, a bomb went off beneath an armored Humvee leading a midnight patrol. The towering fireball, followed by an explosion, lit up the night and propelled the five-ton vehicle two feet into the air.

The Humvee fell and sputtered to a halt, its bulletproof windshield cracked, its electrical system shut down. Inside, four American soldiers and an Iraqi interpreter choked on dust and grit. The attack was witnessed by a reporter riding along on the Aug. 26 patrol and later described by soldiers involved.

"My face! My face! I can't see!" screamed Sgt. Jason Fishbein, 30, a diminutive gunner from the New York City borough of Queens. Along with the Humvee's other occupants, Fishbein was unharmed: the gray dust had momentarily blinded him and it was sweat -- not blood, as he feared -- that poured from his face.

"Man, I got a headache now," said Cpl. William Young, the 24-year-old driver of the second Humvee, which careened into a ditch as fist-sized chunks of asphalt hurtled toward it. Young reached into the back seat, where Sgt. Joseph Smith, 29 and deaf in his right ear from an earlier blast, handed him an extra-large bottle of migraine medicine.

Six hours after the attack, and with only a few hours of sleep, the soldiers of the 3rd Platoon, Charlie Company, 5th Battalion, 7th Cavalry Regiment, were back patrolling the bomb-cratered streets of Balad, an agricultural city about 50 miles north of Baghdad. The attack quickly faded, taking its place alongside myriad others that have occurred during the platoon's first eight months of a yearlong combat tour in Iraq.

The experiences of the 17-man "Blue Platoon," as the unit is called, go to the heart of the growing debate over the continued involvement of U.S. troops in Iraq. The days are infused not with the politics of war but the stark realities of it: tragedy and loss, loneliness and exhaustion, resilience and camaraderie in the face of a stubborn and deadly insurgency. The platoon's daily life has been ordered by nothing more than the merciless patrol schedule, twice-daily, four-hour combat missions that inevitably place the soldiers in the paths of attacks aimed at killing them.

DOJ_NMG_0004010

"I can tell you right now: We ready to go home," said L.B. Baker, 38, a lanky trumpet player and farmer from Belcher, La., who as platoon sergeant is responsible for holding the unit together.

"I tell my guys every day, 'Look, this is the home stretch,' " Baker said. "I don't want them to relax right now. It's not the time to start thinking this is a game."

In three days of patrols culminating in the roadside attack, the physical and emotional toll of prosecuting the war in Iraq was vividly apparent in interviews, personal diaries written by the soldiers, and even songs they recorded in makeshift barracks studios. Weighted down by 50 pounds of body armor and ammunition, the soldiers venture out every day in 120-degree heat to find the insurgents. More often than not, they never do, even after bombs explode directly on them, a source of endless frustration compounded by what the soldiers said is the unwillingness of most Iraqis to help them.

"It's always kul shee maku ," said Sgt. Rob Hammer, a 32-year-old squad leader from Sublette, Kan., reciting the Arabic phrase for "there is nothing," which the entire platoon has memorized.

In such an unforgiving environment, the Americans said they found meaning in their commitment to each other, "the friends who would take a bullet for me, friends who would kill their own selves to save my life," said Sgt. Patrick Hagood, 24, of Anderson, S.C.

In the tense moments after Friday's bombing, Blue Platoon's medic, Pfc. James Tickal, 23, of Oviedo, Fla., first checked to make sure his soldiers were okay. He then took out a brown, leather-bound diary he keeps inside his Humvee and recorded the incident in the middle of rubble.

Prefacing the entry with an obscenity, he wrote: "I'm still shaking. Boom! My humvee just got hit by an IED about two minutes ago. I am sick of getting hit w/ this crap. Aw man that was a big bomb that they blew up right underneath us. Thank God for keeping everyone OK in my humvee. Now that's a direct hit."The First Losses

Tragedy hit the platoon on Feb. 13. While patrolling the outskirts of Balad around 4:30 a.m., one of the four Humvees overshot a right turn and tumbled upside down into a freezing, seven-foot-deep canal, and three soldiers drowned, along with an Air Force firefighter who fell in during the rescue effort.

Memories of the three popular men -- Sgt. Rene Knox Jr., 22, of New Orleans; Sgt. Chad Lake, 26, of Ocala, Fla., and Sgt. Dakotah Gooding, 21, of Des Moines -- hovered over soldiers "like a mist," said Tickal, Tickal soon began to narrate what he was seeing, first in jottings in an all-weather field book he kept behind his Humvee's sun visor, then in the thick diary that his ex-girlfriend, Spec. Jessica Williams, a reservist, sent him from the United States.

"I am currently in Iraq, my tour is half way over," he wrote in June. "When we first got to Iraq I lost three friends in the first month: Gooding, Knox and Lake. Gooding and I were pretty chill. He told me how he met his wife and mostly how much he loved her. He was also the funniest guy I have ever met. He would always say, 'foreeeal.' "

Even as the scorching summer heated up, Tickal, a bespectacled 23-year-old who studied biology at the University of Central Florida before joining the Army, frequently began his entries: "Today is a beautiful day." A self-described "dreamer" he punctuated passages with smiley faces or frowning faces; on one page he sketched a picture of Garfield, the cartoon cat, firing an M-4 assault rifle from the turret of a Humvee.

Tickal described himself as apolitical: "Truthfully, I don't care who the president is. I would have signed up to come over here anyway." But he criticized the apathy of Americans who, he wrote, failed to understand the stakes in Iraq: "I hope people back home understand what we are doing, keeping our country free. Truthfully I think our country needs a kick in the ass. Most people believe it doesn't affect them. Who cares? Well, I CARE."

Tickal worried that he "could die any day." On July 4, he described a phone conversation in which Williams "asked me what my biggest fears are. I never told her but I imagine a car bomb going off all the time. People screaming in my dreams."

"If I was a cat I would be down to maybe 2 lives left, I hope," he wrote six days later. "There is no way I am going to die in a place like this."Growing Frustration

By July, Blue Platoon was increasingly under attack.

The frequency of indirect fire -- mortars and rockets fired at Camp Paliwoda -- had diminished significantly. But the number of roadside bombs, which have accounted for about 26 percent of the nearly 1,900 deaths of U.S. military personnel in Iraq, had more than doubled, to nearly two a day, within the battalion's 20-by-15-mile area of operation.

Many of the attacks were concentrated in al-Ruashid, a Sunni tribal neighborhood northwest of Balad. The insurgents seemed to operate invisibly amid the orchards. The locus was a one-lane road known as the Isaki Highway, its asphalt surface pocked with an obstacle course of bomb craters.

Tickal's diary reflected the growing tension, the platoon's exhaustion and frustration. "The day is half way over. It's about 136 degrees out," he wrote on July 29. "This morning seemed to disappear. The heat kind of puts you to sleep."

DOJ_NMG_0004011

On Aug. 5, the platoon was hit by a roadside bomb on the way back from picking up a commander, who was returning from leave in the United States. "I told the captain, Welcome home,' " wrote Tickal. Using a racial epithet, he wrote, "I am getting tired of getting bombed and not catching" them.

On Aug. 6, Charlie Company's "Red Platoon" captured some insurgents with an artillery round. "That make me feel really great when we catch these jerkoffs," Tickal wrote. "They think they can get away w/anything. The thing is that it could be anyone. Everyone is poor in this country and I don't blame them. If I was poor I would take a few thousand dollars to place a road bomb. Man, I hate these insurgents."

On Aug. 7, the company's "White Platoon" was "hit by an IED for the 6th time in 2 days," Tickal wrote. "This time Big Will got hit. His whole right leg was hit by shrapnel."

By Aug. 10, it was "full out war," Tickal wrote. White Platoon was attacked by two roadside bombs and rocket-propelled grenades, wounding two soldiers. When Blue Platoon arrived to assist, the soldiers came under small-arms fire. "I kept on hearing, pew, pew, pew," Tickal wrote. "Taylor my gunner started unloading amo can after amo can into the wood line. We ended up being there about 2 hours. The first hour was nothing but gunfire."

Each day, the platoon would seek out information to find the men who were attacking them. The soldiers acted on tips and stopped at random houses. They questioned nervous residents through masked translators who went by nicknames like "Fly" and "Steve" and struggled with English themselves.

The platoon did not expect much. Few residents offered information; some were openly hostile. On the morning of Aug. 24, the platoon dismounted and strolled through a neighborhood of modest homes and mud huts. The soldiers came upon a young farmer, Bassam Hazim Mohammed, 19, sitting in the shade beneath an arbor.

"He says he doesn't like coalition forces," the interpreter told the platoon.

"I'm gonna tell him right now the fastest way to get rid of us: approve a constitution, stop shooting at us, and stop blowing stuff up," said 1st Lt. Lamarius Workman, 31, the platoon leader. As he spoke, a few Americans split off to search Mohammed's home.

"So, basically, the easiest way to get rid of us is to just fake like they like us, just fake it," implored Workman. "I'm serious. Just sacrifice a little pride and fake it for six months and you'll see we'll be gone in no time."Lyrics of Loneliness

As the grueling month wore on, Baker, the platoon sergeant and an accomplished trumpet player, recorded his latest song about Iraq with Anthony Blocker, 27, of Marietta, Ga., another platoon sergeant in Charlie Company.

The two men used a music software program and microphone, mixing the songs on a laptop computer in a tiny wooden studio that Blocker built in his room. Baker wrote songs about the three drowned soldiers, the platoon's desolate base, the isolation of being away from family. "If it feels like I'm gonna cry a little bit, then I know it's good," he said.

Baker called this latest song, "August." Its haunting melody was set against lyrics that spoke of loneliness and resilience during endless separation:

A year long
A year gone
Is so damn long
Baby, hold on
It won't be long
Till I come home
There's been ups
There's been downs
We stay strong
Hold on
It won't be long
Till I come homeMidnight Attack

On Aug. 26, Blue Platoon went back on patrol at 8 p.m. It was the second patrol of the day; earlier that morning, the platoon had been shot at outside a mosque.

Dusk was fading as the soldiers made their way around the city, stopping to question residents, inspecting an Iraqi police checkpoint. The brutal afternoon heat broke, giving way to a soft summer night.

At 10:30, the four Humvees raced down the dangerous Isaki Highway. The platoon reached a shuttered white store at the end of the road, stopped to fix a jammed grenade launcher, then doubled back down the highway.

The convoy slowed to about 20 miles per hour and headed east, the vehicles' headlights cutting a path through the darkness. Every hundred yards or so, the Humvees swerved to avoid bomb craters in the asphalt road.

DOJ_NMG_0004012

Baker, driving the lead vehicle, swerved right to avoid one of the three-foot-deep craters. Beside it, buried beneath the asphalt and unbeknownst to him, was another bomb. "I was just going around the hole and it blew," Baker said.

"The truck came off the ground, sir," he continued, recounting the incident the next day in his room. "It kind of lifted it up and set it back down on the ground."

"It felt like we were flying," said Fishbein, the gunner.

About 25 yards back, Young found himself driving toward an orange fireball. Rocks and huge chunks of the road smashed the windshield, spreading a web of cracks. Young jerked the Humvee to the right. "Stop! Stop!" yelled Hagood, who was seated in the passenger seat. The vehicle stopped in a ditch surrounded by tall grass.

The gunners shot illumination flares and lit up the night. Now, able to see across the orchards, the gunners opened a barrage of fire with their M-240 machine guns, hoping to kill the unseen insurgents who had detonated the bomb. The red-hot shell casings fell down into the Humvees; one landed on Smith, scorched him through his pants.

"Ow!" he screamed, swearing.

The soldiers became euphoric as they learned no one had been hurt.

Inside the lead vehicle, Baker and Sgt. Ernest Daniels, of Harlem, N.Y., patted the dashboard, thanking the Humvee for protecting them.

"Good job, baby," Baker said.

"Yeah, baby," Daniels said. "Good job, good job."

Young backed the second Humvee out of the ditch and parked in the middle of the road.

"Thank God, whoever's praying for us," he said as the shooting subsided.

Once bomb experts arrived to inspect the site, the soldiers got out of their Humvees and walked over to the crater.

It stretched about six feet wide and three feet deep. Thousands of pieces of rubble were spread across the road. Next to the new crater was the old one that had been used as a decoy. Inside it was a battery bound with masking tape and attached to a thin copper wire.

Young, Hammer, Hagood and an explosives expert followed the wire across the road, along a wide dirt path. The wire ended abruptly after about 50 yards away, at another path that led back into the orchard.

The soldiers used flashlights at the end of their M-16 assault rifles to search the darkened fields. They scanned the tall grass between the bushy, 20-foot apple trees, warily sweeping their weapons.

"Something's moving right there," Hammer said, pointing his rifle. "I got my laser on it."

The soldiers pointed in unison. Lights and three red dots danced over the grass, which seemed to move.

"It's a rabbit," someone said finally.

The soldiers hiked over gullies and through the scrub before finally turning back to the vehicles.

The Humvees slowly headed back to the base, Baker's vehicle hobbling on a flat tire. Their headlights were dark; to see, the drivers used night vision goggles.

About 20 minutes later, the platoon arrived at Camp Paliwoda. The sign outside the gate displayed the American and Iraqi flags and read: "Partners in Peace, Balad, Iraq."

Once inside, Young began to sing the Army promotional jingle: "Be all you can be"

Two days later, at the onset of a morning patrol, Tickal pulled out his diary. "The sun is starting to rise," he wrote. "Thank you God for another day on this beautiful planet. Yesterday my humvee's windshields were being replaced. Thank goodness for bullet proof glass, huh?"

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'hanlon And Amy Unikewicz

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

It was not a good summer in Iraq. After the midwinter bright spots - reductions in violence, greater economic vitality, the famous purple fingers of voters - the situation worsened as the weather warmed. Most worrisome, the constitutional process has failed to bring aboard Sunni Arabs, who remain the core of the insurgency. While Shiites and Kurds wisely compromised on some key points, they favor an oil-allocation scheme that Sunnis fear could deprive them of their fair share of Iraq's natural wealth.

There is, as always, some good news. The government has made progress on managing inflation, rewriting banking laws and adopting strict budgetary rules to prevent deficit spending. Telephone and Internet use continue to increase; gross domestic product is greater than during Saddam Hussein's latter years in power; school enrollment is up 20 percent since 2000. And somewhere between one-tenth and one-fifth of Iraqi security forces are now fairly capable.

DOJ_NMG_0004013

But on balance the indicators are troubling. Electricity production remains stuck at prewar levels even as demand soars, and the power is off in Baghdad more often than it is on. Unemployment is stubbornly high. Infant mortality rates are still among the Middle East's highest. And Iraq is the most violent country in the region, not only in terms of war casualties but of criminal murders as well. On one point at least, pessimists and optimists about Iraq tend to agree: the situation needs a major boost from the political process. In that light, the Oct. 15 referendum on the draft constitution looms very large.

New Orleans And Baghdad (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

Memo to: Iraq's Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni leaders.

From: An American friend.

Dear Sirs: As someone who really wishes you well, I am writing to give you my best sense of how the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is going to affect the U.S. mission in Iraq. Let me begin with an analogy offered by Michael Mandelbaum, author of the forthcoming book "The Case for Goliath: How America Acts as the World's Government in the 21st Century." He points out: "The U.S. military presence in Iraq today is like the dikes and levees that were protecting New Orleans from the flood. The equivalent of the flood for Iraq is a civil war between Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. The U.S. military right now is holding that back."

Therefore, the key question in Iraq is whether your constitutional process now unfolding can produce a power-sharing accord between Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds that can be a homegrown, self-sustaining dike against civil war, replacing the Americans. In the wake of Katrina, this is now an urgent question. No, we will not be pulling out tomorrow just because of Katrina, let alone before your December parliamentary elections. But after that, when we will be in a Congressional election year, who knows what pressures may build.

Why? Because most Democrats have opposed the war from the start, and many Republicans no longer support the war per se, but only George Bush. The president has carried this war on his shoulders, and the more he's weakened politically by Katrina, the less he will be able to carry. Yes, Mr. Bush has said we'll do whatever it takes to finish the job in Iraq, but he said that before there was another huge job to do.

Can you imagine if Mr. Bush had to go to Congress this week to ask for yet another $100 billion to keep fixing Iraq, when an entire U.S. city needs rebuilding? And the Katrina TV drama is not going away. Hell hath no fury like journalists with a compelling TV story where they get to be the heroes and the government the fools.

Now, as for your draft constitution, it is at one level a remarkable document - a rare example of the elected citizens of an Arab state having a horizontal dialogue and forging their own social contract. There is already more free politics in Iraq than anywhere else in the Arab world except Lebanon. But this draft constitution will come to life only if Iraqi Sunnis of good will publicly embrace it, and up to now they have not.

Some Sunnis are intimidated, others are posturing for the elections, and some are acting in bad faith, still fantasizing that their Baath Party will come to power again. But Sunnis of good will, and Iraq has many, can be brought around if the constitution creates a politically and economically viable central government, and doesn't pave the way for Kurdish and Shiite separatism, which would leave the Sunnis isolated in central Iraq without power or oil.

As Yitzhak Nakash, the Brandeis University expert on the Shiites, put it: "We need to see a form of federalism in Iraq that is uniting Iraqis, not dividing them - a form of federalism that gives Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds a degree of cultural and religious autonomy without compromising either Iraq's political unity or Baghdad's role as the locus of national politics. The draft constitution is not quite there yet."

I know how justifiably bitter the Shiites and the Kurds of Iraq are over what they have suffered at the hands of murderous Sunni Baathists and jihadist fascists. But it is in their interest and ours to see if we can nurture more Iraqi Sunnis who understand that their best future lies in working with a new Iraq, rather than trying to subvert it. Will Iraqi Sunnis, like the Palestinians, waste a generation trying to reverse history - and destroy themselves and Iraq in the process? Or will they accept the fact that they are a minority that can no longer rule all of a fascist Iraq, but can get its fair share of power and oil in a free Iraq? I don't know.

The only way to find out is to make them an offer they can't refuse. If there is a constitution basically supported by all the key parties, a decent outcome is still possible in Iraq. Yes, Mr. Bush says he intends to stay the course there no matter what, but without a constitution embraced by all three communities, there will be no course to stay. The pressure on us to leave will only grow.

And if the dikes of stability that U.S. soldiers are holding together in Iraq give way, well, you all will envy the people of New Orleans. Most of them had somewhere to go when their floods hit. You and your neighbors will not.

DOJ_NMG_0004014

Saddam Aide Hired Camelot Attorney To Bribe U.N. Staff (NYSUN)

By Benny Avni

New York Sun, September 9, 2005

UNITED NATIONS - A Democratic Party icon of the Kennedy days, Theodore Sorensen, was hired in 1993 by an agent of Saddam Hussein, Samir Vincent, to influence top Turtle Bay officials, according to Wednesday's Volcker report on the U.N. oil-for-food program. Vincent and his Korean partner, Tongsun Park, also financed an American pro-U.N. organization known as UNA-USA with Taiwanese money.

In the spring of 1993, Vincent, who has since pleaded guilty in a federal court to charges of acting as an unregistered agent for the Iraqi government, "sought legal advice" from Mr. Sorensen, according to the Volcker report. Attempting "to obtain an agreement between the United Nations and Iraq," Mr. Vincent retained the services of Mr. Sorensen, who is described in the report as "a New York attorney and former special council and adviser to the United States President John F. Kennedy."

The famed attorney was still basking in the glow of Camelot when he was hired by the Iraqi dictator's agent to shape what ultimately became oil for food. Launched officially in 1996, the program grew into a cash cow for Saddam, fraught with bribery and corruption, according to the U.N-authorized Independent Inquiry Committee's report. Mr. Sorensen was hired in the spring of 1993 for an undisclosed sum "to provide advice on how a 'plan of compliance' could be proposed to the United Nations between the two parties," the report says.

In the spring of 1993, as Mr. Sorensen was put on Saddam's payroll by Mr. Vincent - an undeclared foreign agent - the attorney's wife, Gillian Sorensen, was hired by then-Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali as his special adviser for public policy, according to a biography of her posted on the United Nations Foundation Web site. Ms. Sorensen has been involved in U.N. affairs ever since, and today is a senior adviser and national advocate at the U.N. Foundation, a pro-Turtle Bay organization founded by Ted Turner.

Ms. Sorensen is also involved in Democratic Party foreign policy circles, and was among a small group of Democratic "Friends of Annan" who last year gathered at the Manhattan apartment of a former U.N. ambassador Richard Holbrooke, to try to reshape Secretary-General Annan's agenda and save his job as he was criticized for his possible missteps in oil for food.

"There was no connection whatsoever" between her husband's work for Mr. Vincent and hers for being hired at the same time by Mr. Boutros-Ghali, Mrs. Sorensen told The New York Sun yesterday.

Mr. Vincent, who has been cooperating with the federal prosecutor for the Southern District of New York since pleading guilty, is said by the Volcker report to have solicited millions of dollars from the Saddam regime to target officials, including Mr. Boutros-Ghali, for bribery. Mr. Volcker told the Sun at a Wednesday press conference that the investigation regarding Mr. Boutros-Ghali is "ongoing."

Another man who was recruited for the bribery scheme, according to the Volcker committee, was the North Korean-born Mr. Park, who was at the center of a Washington influence-peddling scandal in the 1970s, and who was indicted this year for his part in the attempt to bribe top U.N. officials on behalf of Saddam. Already known for his involvement in the Washington scandal known as "Koreagate," Mr. Park, according to the new Volcker report, assisted Mr. Boutros-Ghali in 1993 and 1994 in raising funds for the 50th anniversary of the United Nations.

A company controlled by Mr. Park, according to the Volcker report, arranged a $4 million contribution to a Washington-based U.N. advocacy group, the United Nations Association of the United States of America. The contribution went through a Taiwanese entity known as the Chinese National Association of Industry and Commerce. The Volcker report stresses that although Mr. Boutros-Ghali knew Mr. Park was a Taiwanese lobbyist, he said he was not aware of the donation from Taiwan.

UNA-USA yesterday issued a statement welcoming the release of the Volcker report, using many talking points used in the last 48 hours by U.N. spokesmen, including support for Mr. Annan and calls for reform at Turtle Bay. The UNA-USA statement does not address Mr. Volcker's findings about the organization itself, and the questions it raises, including whether, as a non-for-profit organization, it listed Taiwan - a nonmember of the U.N. - as one of its donors.

An organization spokeswoman, in fact, first heard of the reference to UNA-USA in the Volcker report from a reporter. "We have no comment at this time," Director of Communications Peggy Atherlay told the Sun, adding that the $4 million donation was received when the organization was under a previous administration, and that it is now seeking answers.

Oil For Food As Usual (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

"The scandal, quote, unquote, is, in my view, nonsense." Thus did Denis Halliday, a former United Nations Assistant Secretary General, opine in November 2004 on the U.N.'s Oil for Food program. With the release Wednesday of Paul Volcker's fourth report on Oil for Food, we have the clearest account yet of what this quote-unquote scandal is really about.

DOJ_NMG_0004015

Let's begin with what this scandal is not about, at least not fundamentally. It is not about the dubious business practices of the Swiss Inspections company Cotecna, which was improperly awarded a multimillion-dollar Oil for Food contract while employing Secretary General Kofi Annan's son Kojo, although this taught us something about the nepotism that typifies U.N. dealings. Nor is it about Kofi Annan's personal probity, which had been called into question by evidence that he was aware of, and tried to influence, the Cotecna bid. Mr. Volcker has found no conclusive proof on this score.

In other words, Oil for Food is not about some isolated incidents of perceived or actual wrongdoing during the course of a seven-year effort to maintain sanctions on Iraq, monitor its oil flows and feed its people. Oil for Food is a story about what the U.N. is. And our conclusion from reading the 847-page report is that the U.N. is Oil for Food. * * *

To better understand the scandal, it helps to distinguish its political and managerial components. Responsibility for administering the program fell primarily to the U.N. Secretariat, which established the Office of Iraq Program (OIP) under the direction of Benon Sevan.

But the program itself was designed by members of the U.N. Security Council following protracted negotiations with the government of Saddam Hussein. It was the Security Council, for example, that approved Saddam's right to choose the companies, contractors and middlemen with whom Iraq would do business, and through which the entire program was corrupted. The Security Council also ran its own supervisory "661 Committee," named after the 1990 Security Council resolution that imposed sanctions on Iraq following its invasion of Kuwait.

The result of this bifurcated structure was that real responsibility for overseeing Oil for Food fell between two stools -- and into the lap of Mr. Sevan and his staff. Mr. Volcker's previous reports tell us that Mr. Sevan was in the pay of the Iraqi government.

The current report adds to our knowledge of what the Iraqis got for their money. For example, Mr. Sevan and his staff failed to inform the Secretariat and the 661 Committee of the extent of Iraq's various kickback schemes -- involving as many as 2,500 companies -- and dismissed media reports about them as "groundless allegations, provocative suggestions and factual mistakes." Mr. Sevan also fought tooth-and-nail the Bush Administration's successful attempt to impose retroactive pricing standards on the sale of Iraqi oil, which helped curb some of Saddam's abuses.

However, part of the reason Mr. Sevan was able to get away with his malfeasance was that neither the Secretariat nor the 661 Committee showed any appetite to exercise their fiduciary obligations. Mr. Annan testified to the Committee that Mr. Sevan worked directly for the 661 Committee. Yet as the report acidly notes, "the difficulty with the Secretary-General's view is that he appointed Mr. Sevan and he created OIP in the first place." Maybe former Enron CEO Kenneth Lay should call Mr. Annan to testify as an expert witness at his trial.

Mr. Annan is also on record telling the Committee he viewed Oil for Food as "a very transparent operation." Yet as the report shows, Mr. Annan was himself complicit in covering up Iraqi violations of the sanctions regime. Specifically, Mr. Annan was aware of the kickback issue from at least February 2001, yet "the Secretary General's quarterly reports never mentioned the emerging problem." (See the report excerpt nearby.)

Why Mr. Annan chose to see no evil on Iraqi sanctions violations, much less use his bully pulpit to denounce it (as he later denounced the Iraq war as "illegal"), is an interesting question. Our sense is that the U.N. Secretariat as a whole took the view that the sanctions regime was immoral and that Saddam was within his rights to break free of it.

Whatever the case, the Secretariat had a more than willing partner in the 661 Committee, and for reasons that are more easily comprehended. Iraq regularly steered contracts to Security Council members it believed were friendly to its political interests. Russian companies, for instance, did $19 billion in oil deals with Iraq, and French companies sold Saddam $3 billion in humanitarian assistance (much of which, the report notes, was diverted for Iraqi military purposes).

It's no coincidence, comrade, that France and Russia, as well as China (which did its own thriving business with Saddam) consistently downplayed the kickback allegations and pushed to have the sanctions regime eased. Only the U.S. and Britain made any effort to monitor Oil for Food for fraud, although even these efforts were lackluster until the Bush Administration came to office. We should also note the U.S. was itself guilty of looking the other way when it came to Iraq's oil smuggling through allies Jordan and Turkey. * * *

So it was that the largest fraud ever recorded in history came about. Press reports often cite the overall size of Oil for Food at $60 billion, but Mr. Volcker's report makes clear that the real figure was in excess of $100 billion. From this, Saddam was able to derive $10.2 billion from illicit transactions. But the important point is that he was able to steer 10 times that sum toward his preferred clients in the service of his political aims.

None of this happened by accident. Mr. Volcker's report is replete with examples of incompetent U.N. oversight and tales of political wrangling among the permanent members of the Security Council. But the abiding fact is that it was the Western powers, not Saddam, who wanted Oil for Food at virtually any cost, because it offered the appearance of a meaningful policy in the absence of a real one, namely regime change. And it was the political convenience of this chimera that led the U.S. and the U.K.

DOJ_NMG_0004016

to tolerate, and the rest of the Security Council to feast on, the opportunities for corruption that were inscribed in the very nature of the program.

As for the U.N., it proved its worth to Saddam as the one hall of mirrors in which such shenanigans could take place. Yet even now we are told that "at least" Oil for Food fed the Iraqi people when they were on the edge of starvation, and this is accounted a U.N. success. That is false. Oil for Food offered a lifeline of cash and influence to a regime that was starving its people. The program did not corrupt the U.N. so much as exploit its essential nature. Now Mr. Annan wants to use this report as an endorsement of his "reform" proposals. Only at the U.N. could he dare to think he could get away with this.

The View From The 38th Floor (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

What follows is an excerpt from the latest report of Paul Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee on the United Nations' Oil for Food program. Benon Sevan, the former director of the Office of Iraq Program (OIP) that oversaw Oil for Food, has been accused by the Committee of taking nearly $150,000 in bribes from Iraq. "The 38th Floor" refers to Secretary General Kofi Annan's offices at U.N. headquarters. The "661 Committee" was a U.N. Security Council body, outside of Mr. Annan's Secretariat, which helped oversee the Oil for Food program.

"When interviewed by the Committee, the Secretary General, the Deputy Secretary-General [Louise Frechette] and [Chief of Staff Iqbal] Riza each struggled to rationalize the role of the 38th Floor in overseeing OIP. Instead, they offered conflicting views of their own responsibilities as well the functions of Mr. Sevan vis-a-vis the program. These inconsistencies demonstrate a basic confusion within the highest offices of the Secretariat. . . .

"When interviewed by the Committee, the Secretary General insisted that the program was "a very transparent operation" -- "one of the most transparent programs [he has] seen" in terms of the process it required for reports to be made by the Secretariat to the Security Council. However, significant information was routinely withheld from the 661 Committee. Despite mounting evidence of a widespread kickback scheme, the Secretary General's quarterly reports never mentioned the emerging problem. . . .

"To be sure, the Secretary General and Deputy Secretary General were apparently not aware of the full scope of evidence that OIP had accumulated and, clearly, Mr. Sevan bears responsibility for withholding information. . . . But the Secretary-General and Deputy Secretary-General (and Mr. Riza) were aware of the kickback scheme at least as early as February 2001. The Secretary General discussed the kickback allegations and other sanctions violations with Mr. Sevan on numerous occasions. . . .

"In the final analysis, Mr. Sevan ran a $100 billion program with very little oversight from the supervisory authority that created his position and OIP. Through a combination of an unclear reporting structure, a lack of supervision by the 38th Floor, and a general unwillingness to recognize and address significant issues on the part of the Secretary General and Deputy Secretary General, Mr. Sevan had substantial autonomy to shape the program's direction. He failed to resist and challenge the Iraqi regime's rampant sanctions violations through which the regime diverted billions of dollars away from the humanitarian effort."

Taliban Kill 6 Afghan Police In Attack On Army Arms Depot (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 8 - Taliban insurgents attacked an Afghan National Army weapons depot south of Kabul on Thursday, killing six Afghan policemen, the state Bakhtar news agency said. Two men suspected of being Taliban insurgents were killed in the firefight that ensued, and one was captured, Bakhtar reported, quoting the press office of the Interior Ministry.

The attack took place in Muqur, a district of Ghazni Province, south of Kabul, a spokesman for the ministry said.

Gunmen also attacked a parliamentary candidate in eastern Afghanistan. The candidate, Safia Siddiqui, a well-known figure and spokeswoman at the national constitutional convention in 2004, was campaigning in her native Nangarhar Province when she came under fire. She was not injured, but three of her supporters were wounded, Agence France-Presse reported.

International and Afghan security forces have tightened security in anticipation of the Sept. 18 elections, as the Taliban have increased attacks on candidates and government targets. Six candidates and four election workers have been killed recently, and government officials have warned that there may be more violence, in particular roadside bombs in the provinces and suicide bombs in the cities.

The violence on Thursday followed a report that a car laden with explosives had blown up Wednesday in southern Afghanistan, killing its two occupants. The local police said that the two were suspected of being suicide bombers and that their explosives had detonated early. A Taliban spokesman said that the group claimed responsibility and that the car bomb had been aimed at American forces.

DOJ_NMG_0004017

"War On Terror" Saves Few Lives: Expert (REU-Y2)

By Maggie Fox, Health And Science Correspondent

Reuters, September 9, 2005

The U.S. "war on terror" is saving fewer lives than just spending the money on disease prevention and research, and has probably caused deaths by taking money away from basic services, an expert said on Thursday.

The accusation is not new, but Dr. Erica Frank of the Department of Family and Preventive Medicine at Emory University School of Medicine in Atlanta said she has calculated the cost, in terms of lives, of the Bush administration's terror policies.

"The most recent effects of these diversions of funding have been seen in the unfolding tragedy of Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans and the surrounding area," Frank wrote in a commentary published in the British Medical Journal.

"Governments must protect their citizens, and anticipating these possible future threats is appropriate and could prove essential to Americans' health."

Frank warned there is a threat that because of the U.S. government's policy, enormous numbers of Americans will die unnecessarily.

On September 11, 2001, 3,400 people died because of the four intentional plane crashes in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania. But 5,200 other Americans died that same day from common diseases, according to Frank.

To estimate how many Americans died of routine causes on September 11, Frank used national estimates of mortality from various causes.

"Predictable tragedies happen every day. We know strategies to reduce deaths from tobacco, alcohol, poor diet, unintentional injuries, and other predictable causes. And we know that millions of people will die unless we protect the population against these routine causes of death," she wrote.

Yet more money is spent to protect against deaths that are not likely to happen.

"For example, in September 2002, New York was awarded $1.3 million to reduce heart disease, the leading killer of New Yorkers, while $34 million was awarded for bioterrorism preparedness in the state," Frank added.

Proponents have argued that bioterror preparedness would build up the public health structure in general.

"If this is an improvement it sure is frightening to think what this might have looked like before," Frank said in a telephone interview.

She cited numerous reports showing the federal government cut spending to reinforce the levees built to protect New Orleans from the flood that has devastated the city.

"Since the point of investing in counterterror is to protect American lives, the question is a dollar better spent in Iraq or is it better spent here?" she asked.

Our Enemy's Face (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Let us take a hard look at some extremely important words: "the global war on terrorism." Since Sept. 11, this phrase -- often reduced in Washingtonese to "GWOT" -- has entered the English language, popularized by journalists and administration officials. It is the way our highest national priority is described by almost everyone.

But "GWOT" is not an accurate description of America's enemy or of what we are engaged in. Unless people know whom we are fighting, it will be virtually impossible to win the war of ideas that is such a key part of this struggle. The new undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, Karen Hughes, who is charged with primary responsibility for this part of the war, has a chance to fix the problem, but only if she is willing to change some deeply ingrained rhetoric and the political reasons behind it.

Stopping terrorists, using all necessary means, is vital in protecting the nation. We cannot win without the use of force and first-rate intelligence. But suicide bombers are merely the expendable, deluded cannon fodder of ruthless ideologues. This has been true with terrorists throughout history. The long-term battle is against the underlying ideas and leaders behind these specific groups of terrorists.

Despite factionalism and fierce doctrinal disputes, our enemies, broadly speaking, constitute a movement, with goals, gurus, ideologues, myths and martyrs. They share a core set of virulently anti-Western beliefs and have common goals: to destroy the moderate (and still majority) wing of Islam, to establish Islamist theocracies that look backward toward a mythic "golden age," to seek the destruction of Israel, and to inflict maximum damage and human suffering through acts of terrorism.

Among its leaders, there is one whose face is as internationally recognized today as Adolf Hitler's was in 1941. He was responsible for Sept. 11. Yet the United States has not made it a primary goal to expose Osama bin Laden as the monster he is, something Roosevelt and Winston Churchill did to Hitler, and American leadership did to communism during the Cold War by demonstrating its moral and intellectual bankruptcy. Bin Laden (unlike Saddam Hussein) has been virtually ignored in public by official Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0004018

Terrorism is not an end in itself; it is a tactic, just as it has been for countless other movements throughout history that sought to destroy or paralyze the established order, or attract attention to their cause. Over two years ago, Zbigniew Brzezinski, among others, pointed out that a "war on terror" was like a "war on blitzkrieg" or a "war on war." For this important insight, the former national security adviser was both attacked and ignored. During the 2004 campaign, I stumbled into a public dispute with senior administration officials, including Vice President Cheney, when, as a John Kerry surrogate, I told a New York Times Magazine writer that the phrase could be considered a metaphor and compared it to phrases such as the "war on poverty." For this both Kerry and I were assailed as naive, and I was asked, in the sneering tones of certain cable television interviewers, if I really thought we were at war with a "metaphor."

Of course not. But despite the grand rhetoric, does anyone think the United States is actually fighting "terror" or "terrorism" globally? We may detest terrorism in Sri Lanka, but we are not engaged in that civil war. Nor in Nepal, northern Uganda, Aceh or countless places around the world.

By calling both Iraq and Sept. 11 part of the war on terrorism, the administration has been partially successful in linking public support for the less popular war in Iraq to the universally supported fight against al Qaeda, even though no convincing evidence has been produced connecting the two. No other explanation has proved as valuable in keeping Americans, albeit in declining numbers, behind our increasingly controversial involvement in Iraq. "GWOT," as Dan Froomkin wrote on The Post's Web site last month, is "the metaphor that has consistently been [President Bush's] most potent weapon in the battle for public opinion."

The struggle against violent extremism will continue, of course, long after bin Laden is eliminated by death or capture. It will be a long conflict, with casualties and high costs, just like the efforts against fascism and communism. But fundamentally this is a war of ideas, and a more aggressive, direct attack on those ideas, and the men behind them, is necessary.

For starters, Osama bin Laden must be discredited, even if he remains at large. He is not, as some argue, irrelevant simply because his war will continue after he is gone (although, of course, it will). He remains a folk hero to millions of Muslims; youths wear T-shirts of him and children are named after him throughout the Muslim world. The United States should stop ignoring him and his henchmen; exposing them must become a top priority. He is a false prophet who incites mass murder, but he is clearly eloquent and charismatic. His ideas, no matter how insane they seem to us, appeal to many people. (Hitler had those qualities, too.)

Which brings us back to Karen Hughes. With her enormous bureaucratic clout, derived from her closeness with President Bush, the new undersecretary of state has a chance to make history. To do so, however, she must change some fundamental parts of our public message, and then devise better delivery systems for it -- precisely what she did so effectively for Bush during so many campaigns.

Hughes should begin by revisiting what her own boss said on Aug. 6, 2004, speaking without a text. "We actually misnamed the war on terror," the president said that day. "It ought to be the struggle against ideological extremists who do not believe in free societies, who happen to use terror as a weapon." He was, inexplicably, laughed at for this remark, and rapidly retreated to safer rhetorical terrain. More recently, when Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld tried to replace "GWOT" with the "global struggle against violent extremism" -- a somewhat more accurate phrase -- the president immediately overruled him and again linked GWOT closely to Iraq during a series of public appearances.

But the president got it right last year. Words matter, and we need better ones to explain to the world, and to ourselves, who the enemy is. How about making it simple and specific: something like "the war against Osama bin laden and his followers"? And then create an all-out, no-holds-barred campaign to expose, ridicule and destroy everything he and his ilk stand for -- murder, horror, intolerance, disrespect for human life and a false view of Islam.

Richard Holbrooke, an ambassador to the United Nations during the Clinton administration, writes a monthly column for The Post.

'They Are All So Wrong' (WSJ)

By Mark Helprin

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

September 11 was not so much a discrete event as part of a continuum. It was the result of broad strategic failures that, preceding it by decades, continue to this day and are likely to continue on. It is as if the country has lost, as exemplified by the Left now out of power, a great deal of the will to self-preservation, and, as exemplified by the Right now in charge, not a little of its capacity for self-defense. Our politics and policies have somehow been parceled out to opportunists like Michael Moore -- purveyor of conspiracy theories and hatreds, whose presentation, unclean in every respect, is honored nonetheless by the controlling rump of Democrats -- and to Bushmen like "Kip" Hawley of Homeland Security, father of the proposal to allow carry-on ice-picks, bows and arrows, and knives with blades up to five-inches long. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0004019

For more than 20 years prior to September 11, Islamic terrorists imprisoned and murdered our diplomats and military personnel, destroyed our civil aviation, machine-gunned our civilians, razed our embassies, attacked an American warship and, in 1993, the U.S. itself. For varying reasons, none legitimate, we hesitated to mount an offensive against the terrorists' infrastructure, hunt them down, eliminate a single rogue regime that supported them, or properly disconcert our fatted allies whose robes they infested. This was comparable in its way to Munich. Only in 2001, when it became obvious to any rational being that we must, did we retaliate, but even then in the face of domestic pressure to judicialize the response, which was exactly what we had done all along.

The underlying corollary to this reflex of appeasement is the notion that our military options are constrained financially, as if we are not a nation of stupendous wealth and it has not been the American tradition since the Civil War to spend, in support of war, with the intensity of war itself. In 1945, we devoted 38.5% of GNP to defense, the equivalent of $4.76 trillion now. The current $400 billion defense budget is a twelfth of that and only 3.2% of GDP, as opposed to the average of 5.7% of GNP in the peacetime years between 1940 and 2000. A false sense of constraint has arisen in every quarter of society. It is the ethos of the administration, the press, the civilian side of the Pentagon, and many of the prominent uniformed military brought to high rank in recent years.

They are all so wrong. In violating established tradition and throwing aside advantage and elemental common sense, they waste American lives. And for what? What moral construction would allow anyone to spend more than 2,000 dead and tens of thousands of wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan -- so far -- while insisting without major exception that cutting costs is a virtue? When is holding back from one's troops at war the reinforcements, armor and basic equipment they need a virtue rather than a sin?

Is it not the duty of the secretary of defense, his chiefs, and the wide array of generals to press energetically -- even to the point of resignation -- for whatever is necessary (not the minimum, but a safe surplus) to support the armies in the field? If they do not, who will? Had the president gone to Congress on September 12 and asked for almost anything, he would have been granted it. But he never did. This was a fundamental strategic error. If you must go to war, do not do so hesitantly, with half a heart. And in answer to the rationale that the casualties of this war are relatively light, one does not decently measure casualties against those of previous wars, but in terms of whether they can be avoided.

Apart from the paucity of armored vehicles, body armor, and other staples of battle, the chief problem of prosecuting the Iraq war has been the size and scale of the force. Despite inaccurate claims of unprecedented speed in the advance to Baghdad, the three weeks of halting action it took to get there, with lines of supply that are to this day poorly protected, were both spur and instruction for the insurgency. In what is only apparently a paradox, the military objective should have been less the conquest of territory and echelons than of morale, and, to accomplish this, territory and echelons would have to have been subdued with the blinding speed, shock and awe of the Six-Day and Gulf wars. The instant the Arab world realized that the promised shock and awe had not materialized, the insurgency was born.

We then nurtured it by deploying a fraction of the ratio (10:1) long experience indicates is necessary for suppression; by dismissing the enemy as mere "thugs," when, although they are thugs and worse, they have the thousand-year motivation of their civilization defending its heartland from Persians, Mongols, Shiites, and now Christians; and by gratuitously elevating our aims from the purely defensive to the transcendental, while steadily diluting the little power we have in the hope of forcing the entire Arab and Muslim worlds to a new politics. From a country where they have been held down in their beleaguered enclaves for two-and-a-half years, how are 140,000 soldiers to transform the highly aggressive and deeply rooted political cultures of 1.2 billion people? * * *

Ceaselessly, we court strategic error. At the end of the Cold War, assuming that history had concluded, we discarded too much military power. This continues through the present, rationalized by reference to transformation. But it is yet further error to believe that military-technical evolution can make up for the kind of deficiencies and poor strategic judgments from which no machine can save an army. Continual and remarkable innovation is both indispensable and expensive, but President Clinton required budgetary choice between innovation and everything else, and his successor has yet to disagree. The root of the error that offers transformation as a substitute for so much that is crucial is the conviction that having both would exceed reasonable military expenditures and somehow break the common weal.

Having made many wrong choices, we find ourselves at yet another strategic crossroads, where invisibly to the general public we are about to choose wrongly again. We are reshaping the military into a gendarmerie, configured for small wars, counterinsurgency, peacekeeping and nation-building, all at the expense of the type of force that could deter or defeat a rising

DOJ_NMG_0004020

China. Although we need a gendarmerie, we cannot do without heavy formations and the many additional ships required for a navy -- now less than half the size of the Reagan fleet and shrinking -- to exploit our natural advantage in the Pacific.

The U.S. will chase every terrorist mouse (which is good, unless it means also neglecting the core competencies of the armed forces), while lessening and dispersing its power, and moving from previous centers of gravity (Europe, the Western Pacific) to Africa, Central Asia and the Middle East. This will create a long and open alley through which China will run. Among other things, by placing markers in every trouble spot, we will probably be tied down and distracted, taxingly and often, to our enemies' delight.

When China completes its run up the broad alley we have afforded it, it will much sooner be the other pole in a once-again bipolar world, which will create the opportunity for terrorists in the guise of liberation movements to gather under its wing, as they did with the Soviet Bloc during the Cold War. Ironically, in reconfiguring the military to focus primarily on terrorism, we may not only give China a great opening, but create for the terrorists a new lease on life.

The war in Iraq has been poorly planned and executed from the beginning, and now, like a hurricane over warm water, the insurgency is in a position to take immense energy from the fundamental divisions in that nation. The rise of Chinese military power, although lately noted, has met with no response. America's borders are open, its cities vulnerable, its civil defense nonexistent, its armies stretched thin. We have taken only deeply inadequate steps to prepare for and forestall a viral pandemic that by the testimony of experts is a high probability and could kill scores of millions in this country alone. That we do not see relatively simple and necessary courses of action, and are not led and inspired to them, represents a catastrophic failure of leadership that bridges party lines.

Perhaps this and previous administrations have had an effective policy just too difficult to comprehend because they have ingeniously sheltered it under the pretense of their incompetence. But failing that, the legacy of this generation's presidents will be promiscuous declarations and alliances, badly defined war aims, opportunities inexplicably forgone, ill-supported troops sent into the field, a country at risk without adequate civil protections, and a military shaped to fight neither the last war nor this one nor the next.

Mr. Helprin, a Journal contributing editor, is Senior Fellow of the Claremont Institute and Distinguished Visiting Fellow of Hillsdale College. He is the author, most recently, of "Freddy and Fredericka" (Penguin, 2005).

9/11 Recruits: They Enlisted When USA Was Under Fire (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, September 9, 2005

One year ago, Cpl. Kevin Mincio stood before his platoon at an Army base in the Iraqi desert and tried to explain why a 31-year-old Goldman Sachs vice president had upped and enlisted in the infantry.

The short answer: 9/11.

“Three years ago,” he began, reading what he'd written down, “I stood in disbelief on the corner of Liberty and Church streets and watched as just a half a block away, a Boeing 767 flew into the south tower of the World Trade Center.”

Mincio was an unusual recruit in more than age and background. Contrary to popular belief, there never was an upsurge in military enlistments as a result of the attacks that killed almost 3,000 people four years ago.

But in a time of retreat and collapse, when Americans were urged to maintain their routines and get on with their lives, a few people stepped forward and did just the opposite. Although statistically insignificant, they epitomized a raw patriotism that bolstered the nation's spirit in the bleakest days since Pearl Harbor.

They were people like Kevin Mincio, people for whom the military has no exact count — the 9/11 recruits.

Four years later, USA TODAY spoke with about two dozen 9/11 recruits or their relatives. Most are still in active service or the reserves. Some are in Iraq or Afghanistan. A few never made it into the service. A few have been discharged. A few have been killed.

Most of the 9/11 recruits say they did the right thing and would do it again. They largely defend the war in Iraq but are far more enthusiastic in their support for the troops. Because many remain in the service, however, it's hard to know how free they feel to speak.

Many see a link between the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and the war in Iraq, although there is little evidence of ties between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda.

Above all, they say they're better for having served — that they grew personally through their military experiences. “You learn not to take for granted what we have in this country,” says Mincio, who spent a year in Iraq. “And you learn to handle pressure.”

The most famous 9/11 recruit was Pat Tillman, the NFL star who gave up a big contract to join the Army and was killed by friendly fire in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0004021

But there were others.

Mincio, who worked next door to the Trade Center, gave up his six-figure income, boat and beachfront house. He wound up in Iraq, where for a time he lived in his Army vehicle, showered once a week and dodged mortar fire. Why did he do it? Partly to do something different, to get out from behind a desk. Partly to do something about the crime he witnessed.

Mincio wasn't the only 9/11 recruit who was galvanized by a personal connection that Tuesday morning.

In Manheim, Pa., Patrick Troccoli, a financial-planning intern, was on the phone with his cousin in Brooklyn, who said he could hear the roar of the jetliners and the rumble of the towers collapsing.

In Hempstead, N.Y., Tom Duffy was visiting a friend at Hofstra University whose high-rise dorm room had a view of the smoke rising from lower Manhattan.

In Washington, PricewaterhouseCoopers senior associate Kyle Conley was driving to work over the Theodore Roosevelt Bridge when he saw black smoke rising from the Pentagon.

Until that day, Duffy was planning a career in law enforcement. Conley, married with a young child, had just begun training to swim the English Channel. Troccoli didn't even believe in the military. Within the month, each decided to enlist.

Some didn't even wait that long. On the day after, Sept. 12:

·Actor Sean Huze walked into the Marine recruiter's office at Sunset and La Brea in Los Angeles, expecting a line. Instead, he was the only one there. He signed up on the spot.

·Josh Hyland, who already had completed a four-year hitch in the Army as an enlisted man, signed up for ROTC at the University of Montana, where he was working on a degree in business. “He wanted to make a difference in the world,” his mother would recall. “He was excited about it.”

·Jim O'Shaughnessy, a philosophy major at John Carroll University in Cleveland, had been going summers to officer candidate school. But after 9/11, he decided not to wait and enlisted as a private in the Marines.

He told a Cleveland Plain Dealer reporter at the recruiting office he was “sick to my stomach angry. … If they need people now, this would be the time to go. I just didn't want to look back when I was 50 and everybody else did their share and I didn't.”

Over the next week and month, as Americans discussed how much life had or hadn't changed, 9/11 recruits made life-altering decisions.

Steven Gill of Round Rock, Texas, was so intent on signing up that his parents had to persuade him to finish the semester at Concordia University in Austin, where he was studying to be a youth minister before enlisting in the Marine reserve.

Bryan Hancock of Lebanon, Ohio, a former paratrooper, made two big decisions within 72 hours of the attacks: to re-enter the Army and to marry his girlfriend so she and their month-old son would be provided for. They married that Friday; the groom wore army boots.

Chris Petite of Lake Arrowhead, Calif., took the attacks personally — he was a volunteer firefighter, and his girlfriend's aunt was an American Airlines flight attendant. He enlisted a month to the day after the attacks, saying that the war on terrorism “is too big for me not to get involved in.” The first thing his father, an Air Force officer during Vietnam, knew about it was when Chris came home and told him, “I joined.”

They were brave, they were altruistic, and they were aberrations. In the weeks after 9/11 military recruiters got more calls, more visits, more website hits, but the upsurge in enlistments was an urban myth.

Many who volunteered were too old — the Kentucky National Guard got a call from a 48-year-old teacher. Others were disabled or unbalanced or unqualified. Jonathan Ridlin volunteered at the Marine recruiting station in Pasadena, Calf.; he was rejected because of a charge of driving under the influence.

For some, 9/11 was not the only motivation. Some already had been thinking about military service, often for the usual reasons — to learn a skill or earn college money. They were waiting to jump; the attacks just gave them a push.

Dan Greeley was a freshman at the State University of New York at Albany. On 9/11 he had an uncle in Rescue One, a New York Fire Department company in Manhattan. His uncle survived, but two other firefighters whom he knew did not.

Later that month, Greeley enlisted in the Marines. But it wasn't only the attacks, he admits: “I was bored in school.”

Today, the 9/11 recruits are scattered across the country and the globe. Duffy, who saw smoke that morning from the dorm room, will leave the Air Force this year and go into business with his brother back home in New Jersey. Troccoli is still in the Navy, waiting for his first overseas posting. Conley, who served seven months in Iraq in 2003, is back at PricewaterhouseCoopers.

O'Shaughnessy, the philosophy major, served seven months in Afghanistan last year. Now he's the Marine recruiter in Wheeling, W.Va. He's nostalgic about the days after 9/11: “There was just blanket ‘Go, America' patriotism. Now, there's not as strong a belief that what we're doing is right anymore.”

Hyland, the Montana Army veteran who joined ROTC, got his officer's commission and went to Afghanistan in March. He was killed last month when a bomb exploded under a bridge his convoy was crossing.

DOJ_NMG_0004022

Petite, the volunteer fireman from California, is with the Marines in Iraq.

In an e-mail, he writes that enlisting "was the best thing to do. Looking back on it now, out here in Iraq, I find a new reason every day. Mostly for my nephews, so that they don't have to grow up in a world filled with people hell bent on destroying everything that the U.S. stands for."

Hancock, the ex-paratrooper who got married as a prelude to re-enlisting, was eventually rejected because of back problems. He's a state prison guard in Ohio.

Gill, the future youth minister, was killed July 23 in Iraq when an improvised explosive went off during an operation near Zaidon. He was 24 and had been in the country since March.

Greeley, the bored college student, has completed two tours in Iraq. He says 9/11 gives meaning to those who fight there.

Mincio was discharged from the Army in May, two months after appearing with the secretary of the Army at a congressional appropriations hearing. He has a new job in Seattle, where he lives with his wife. He's not moving back to New York. He won't comment on the wisdom of the war in Iraq, other than to say: "There are a lot of soldiers over there trying to do the right thing. I'm with all those soldiers."

He stands by what he told his platoon one year ago. He's still trying to understand 9/11 and its role in where he is today:

"I am not proud of everything I have done since then, but I am proud to be amongst people who have done something, people who care about our way of life. People who haven't forgotten."

N.Y. Judge Who Abandoned His Post For Iraq Is Removed (LAW)

By John Caher, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 9, 2005

For the first time in its history, the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct has disciplined a judge for flat-out failing to do his job.

In a determination released Thursday, the commission called for the removal of North Hudson Town Justice Glenn T. Fiore of Essex County, who abandoned his judicial position to take a yearlong position as a truck driver in Iraq.

Justice Fiore continued to draw his $10,000 a year judicial salary, leaving North Hudson, where he was elected, without a town judge. The town had to pay a neighboring judge to handle matters within its borders while Justice Fiore worked for a private subsidiary of the Halliburton Corp.

Records show that Fiore returned from Iraq after four months, indicating that he was giving up his private position to resume his judicial duties. However, he did not resume his position and ultimately resigned under pressure last month for what he said were patriotic reasons.

"It is with great satisfaction that I am resigning my elected position of Town Justice," he wrote in a letter to the North Hudson Town Board. He said in the letter that the board, by complaining of his absence, had "revealed its true nature and color." He expressed a preference to "serve the boots on the ground" rather than his constituents.

"You people use words like honor, integrity, independence while the people I work with embody those very words," Fiore wrote. "Have any of you done anything for your country lately? I bet not. Thank GOD we don't have people like you defending this nation. ... Sleep well, the true Patriots are protecting you."

Commission Administrator Robert H. Tembeckjian said the matter has nothing to do with patriotism or the war in Iraq.

"It is simply about a judge who abandoned his post for paid private employment overseas, leaving his town without a judge, while still collecting his judicial salary," Tembeckjian said.

Tembeckjian said the commission has never before taken action against a judge for neglecting to show up for work.

The commission, in its determination, noted that the state Constitution empowers the panel to discipline a judge for "persistent failure to perform his duties." Additionally, it said §100.3(A) of the Rules Governing Judicial Conduct require that the judicial duties of a judge take precedence over other interests.

"Respondent's flagrant, voluntary abandonment of his judicial position in order to pursue other employment requires the sanction of removal," the commission said in a 10-0 determination.

The panel noted that Justice Fiore apparently planned to have his son, who was also his clerk, cover for him and to perform judicial duties when the judge was home on vacation. However, he apparently never sought an ethics opinion or court administration approval of that plan.

"It would appear that his motive was to draw two salaries, one as a judge and the other as a [civilian] employee in Iraq," the commission said. "His conduct is inexcusable and in no way justified by his professed patriotism or support of the war effort."

Under the order, Fiore is barred from holding judicial office in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0004023

Fiore was censured in 1998 for claiming on campaign literature that he was the "senior associate" at a law firm, Muller & Muller in Glens Falls. Actually, Justice Fiore was licensed to represent clients before the Workers' Compensation Board and permitted to represent individuals before the Social Security Administration. He is not licensed to practice law.

John T. Wilkins of Wilkins & Griffin in Lake Placid represented Fiore, but did not appear at oral argument before the commission. Appearing for the commission were staff attorneys Cathleen S. Cenci and Kathryn J. Blake.

Panel Says N.Y. Judge Should Be Removed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mark Johnson, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - ALBANY, N.Y.-A town justice who abandoned his part-time post, but not his paycheck, to take a job in Iraq should be removed from office, a judicial commission said Thursday.

The New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct said Judge Glenn Fiore's flagrant abandonment of his position requires the sanction of removal because ethical rules require a judge to put his judicial duties over all other activities.

Fiore, 54, said he would not appeal the ruling.

In March, he took a one-year job in Iraq driving a truck for Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc.

He didn't give the town of North Hudson, 90 miles north of Albany, any notice that he was leaving. Instead, he left his son in place as court clerk to cover for him and planned to render decisions when he returned.

Because of Fiore's absence from his $10,000 a year post, the town had to secure the services of a judge from another town at additional expense, according to the commission's ruling.

Fiore returned after four months and told the commission in an affidavit that he had resigned from his Iraq job and was ready to resume his court duties. Three weeks later he resigned his judgeship.

A resignation does not stop the commission from acting on conduct cases. Any recommendation or penalty can be used in the future should a person decide to pursue public office again.

Fiore said Thursday that he took the job in Iraq because he went out of business as an independent truck driver and needed to pay some bills. Fiore, who served in the Marines in Vietnam, said he also headed to Iraq out of a sense of patriotism.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling, Lay Allege Case Misconduct (AP)

By KRISTEN HAYS, AP Business Writer

AP, September 8, 2005

HOUSTON (AP) - Lawyers for Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling say "deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct" has choked their efforts to prepare for trial in January.

Lay, Skilling and the third defendant in their case, former top Enron accountant Richard Causey, say obvious or veiled threats from prosecutors that dozens of witnesses may be indicted or, if they have pleaded guilty to crimes, face harsh prison sentences if they talk to the former executives has shut off critical information sources.

Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's lead trial lawyer, said the defense teams have whittled that list to 38 particularly crucial witnesses who have consistently refused to talk to them.

Lay's lawyer, Michael Ramsey, told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in a hearing Thursday that the defense teams have seen a "pervasive freeze-up of witnesses," though he acknowledged out of court that it was possible at least some just don't want to help his client or the others.

The trio wants to dismiss the sprawling case against them on grounds that the Justice Department's Enron Task Force "has engaged in deliberate, systematic prosecutorial misconduct that has irreparably harmed defendants' ability to prepare for trial," according to a court filing made public this week.

But while awaiting Lake's ruling on that request, the trio wants the judge to compel those witnesses to appear in court later this month so Lake can assure them that they can talk to the defendants about the case and testify on their behalf without fear of government reprisal.

Lake said Thursday that such a move could embarrass potential witnesses forced to appear in open court and therefore be counterproductive. He said instead he would send letters to attorneys for the 38 witnesses reiterating that they are free to talk to the defense teams without fear.

DOJ_NMG_0004024

Petrocelli said he didn't think the letters would help, particularly since the defense lawyers had sent witnesses a copy of Lake's May order advising witnesses that they could meet with one or more defendants and their lawyers with no worries of government repercussions.

Instead, he said Lake could order prosecutors to require those witnesses to talk to the defense teams. Lake declined.

Sean Berkowitz, head of the task force, insisted that prosecutors do not want to block anyone from talking to the defense teams.

"The government does not want any witness to not speak to the defense out of fear of retribution from the United States," he said.

At a status hearing last week, Lake told attorneys on both sides that he would do what he could to help the defendants gain access to witnesses so they could adequately prepare for trial. The judge told prosecutors last week he wasn't acknowledging that any such misconduct had taken place, but he wanted to help facilitate trial preparations to preclude any possible requests to postpone the Jan. 17 trial.

Skilling and Causey are charged with more than 30 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and other charges stemming from various alleged schemes over several years to fool investors into believing Enron was a financially solid growth machine. The government alleges in the 11 conspiracy and fraud counts against Lay that he took over the ruse after Skilling abruptly resigned in August 2001 until Enron spiraled into bankruptcy in December that year. All three pleaded innocent.

Local Lawyer Charged In Currency Trading Scheme (PALMBEACHP)

By David Sedore, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 8, 2005

A federal grand jury in Cleveland has indicted a Palm Beach County securities lawyer on charges of securities fraud in connection with a $14 million currency trading scheme.

The indictment, dated Sept. 1, alleges that Delmer C. Gowing III, 61, of Ocean Ridge helped a Cleveland-based brokerage, Capital Markets Trading Group, convince 10 investors that they could earn yields as high as 20 percent a month through a currency trading deal Capital Markets claimed it had with insurance giant AIG. That arrangement didn't exist, and most of the millions invested four years ago was either lost in trades or allegedly pocketed by Capital Markets' principals, including Gowing.

Gowing, arrested Friday by U.S. marshals, was released Monday from the Palm Beach County Jail on $100,000 bond. He faces a trial in federal court in Cleveland. A call Wednesday to the U.S. attorney's office in Cleveland wasn't returned.

Gowing's attorney, Gary Eric Susser of Boynton Beach, said his client is innocent and denies that he had an active role in the scheme other than acting as the lawyer for Capital Markets.

"When a lawyer's client does bad things, sometime the lawyer gets sucked into it," Susser said.

According to the indictment, Capital Markets began soliciting money in early 2000 from investors by claiming it had an arrangement to trade foreign currencies through AIG, one of the largest insurers in the world.

But the indictment alleges that no such arrangement existed. Instead, Capital Markets wired the money to an Irish company called Magenta Forex Corp. Ltd., which did the trading and produced "substantial losses" that weren't disclosed to investors.

Capital Markets returned some money to investors, claiming it was their profits from successful trades, while soliciting more of their money.

The alleged scheme came to an end in 2001 when Capital Markets told the investors that their money had been stolen by a third party.

One investor, Carolyn Cline, a plastic surgeon from San Francisco who now lives in Long Boat Key, gave Capital Markets $10.6 million. Last year, Cline sued Gowing and others, accusing them of defrauding her. Susser, Gowing's attorney, blames that ongoing suit for Gowing's indictment.

"This case arises out of one person," Susser said. "I'm convinced that the criminal justice system is being used as a collection agency."

Gowing, well-known in the Palm Beach County legal community as a securities lawyer, moved to the county from Bloomfield Hills, Mich., in the late 1980s.

He worked for two large Michigan-based law firms here before forming a securities law firm with partner Lloyd Schwed in West Palm Beach.

That firm fell apart in 1997 when Schwed won arbitration awards totaling $1 million in back pay for four brokers who were stiffed by their former employer, D. Blech & Co. of Boca Raton, which was under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Schwed got caught trying to leverage some allegedly incriminating tape recordings into payment for his clients.

DOJ_NMG_0004025

CRIMINAL LAW:

Boeing Could Avoid Prosecution, Pay Up To $500 Million To U.S. (WSJ)

By Andy Pasztor And Anne Marie Squeo, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

The Justice Department and Boeing Co. are negotiating a settlement in which the company could be required to pay up to $500 million but would avoid prosecution in two federal probes, said people familiar with the details.

The settlement would resolve allegations that Boeing improperly acquired thousands of pages of Lockheed Martin Corp.'s proprietary documents dealing with rocket programs, and illegally recruited a senior Air Force official while she still had oversight of billions of dollars in other Boeing contracts.

Talks are continuing and details could change, these people said, with a final agreement expected to take at least several more weeks to emerge. But the terms currently under discussion would make the pact one of the largest and most comprehensive corporate fraud settlements in recent years.

Based on the broad outlines so far, the settlement also is likely to entail the stiffest financial penalty ever imposed on a U.S. defense contractor for alleged procurement violations, said people familiar with the situation -- far exceeding those meted out during Pentagon scandals in the 1980s and 1990s, which stayed under $200 million.

The two separate, much-publicized probes, which spanned two years, sent two former high-ranking Boeing executives to jail and set off events that helped lead to the departure of two Boeing chief executives. The company wasn't formally charged in that period, but it was stripped of some important contracts, became a frequent target of Congressional critics and ended up embroiled in the most serious military-procurement scandal of the past two decades.

With the company struggling to overcome the negative impact of its ethical lapses, Boeing's management sees a comprehensive settlement with the Justice Department as an essential step in reviving its image. The latest moves partly appear to reflect the desire of Jim McNerney, Boeing's recently installed chairman and CEO, to move past its troubles and focus on Boeing's future, said people familiar with the matter.

Justice Department spokesmen declined to comment. A Boeing spokesman said the company "continues to cooperate fully with government investigators."

Under the terms of what's known as a deferred prosecution agreement, Boeing wouldn't plead guilty to any specific charges but would admit wrongdoing in both the rocket and employment cases, according to the people familiar with the matter. Prosecutors would retain the right to charge Boeing if it runs afoul of the law during the course of the agreement, said people familiar with the matter. It isn't clear how long Boeing's deal with the government would run.

As part of the package, Boeing's outside legal team has been discussing possible payments to the U.S. government of between $300 million and $500 million, these people said. Earlier this year, government officials suggested that under some legal theories, the maximum penalty could approach $700 million.

A major theme of Boeing's legal arguments has been that regardless of what comes next, it already has suffered considerable harm and been subjected to various types of punishment. Indeed, all sides, including prosecutors in northern Virginia and Los Angeles, seem eager to wrap up the long-running cases. The California team recently agreed to forego prosecuting Boeing, according to one person close to the issue. Without commenting on any specifics, Paul McNulty, the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, Va., said, "Everyone with an interest is working together on this."

After months of apparent stalemate, the prospect of a settlement is relatively good news for Boeing, which has been buffeted in recent months by a 20-month suspension from bidding on some Pentagon work, loss of existing contracts, high-profile scrutiny of ethical lapses and turmoil in its management and worker ranks. Last week, 18,300 machinists at the company's commercial airline unit, which wasn't touched by the ethics scandals, went on strike and shut down production.

For Boeing, the economic pain of a settlement would represent fewer risks than an outright guilty plea to felony charges. The company has worried that criminal charges would further tarnish its reputation and potentially jeopardize billions of dollars more in U.S. government contracts.

No high-ranking executives are expected to be prosecuted beyond Boeing's former chief financial officer, Michael Sears, who previously admitted recruiting Air Force official Darleen Druyun for a $250,000-a-year Boeing job in violation of conflict-of-interest laws. Both Mr. Sears and Ms. Druyun were sentenced to prison after guilty pleas that ratcheted up the investigation of Boeing's business practices and ethical missteps.

In an interview last week, Mr. McNulty, the top U.S. prosecutor in Alexandria, the office that has purview over the Pentagon, said, "We've held a senior, very senior officer criminally liable, and other things typically flow from that."

DOJ_NMG_0004026

While Boeing initially tried to attribute wrongdoing to a few rogue employees, prosecutors discovered evidence that misconduct was more extensive. Court documents that accompanied Mr. Sears' guilty plea indicated other high-level officials knew of the company's efforts to hire Ms. Druyun, who failed to remove herself quickly enough from a decision-making role over Boeing's defense businesses. In the rocket case, only two former managers have been indicted, but other executives have been punished, reassigned or forced out.

In recent months, Boeing has undergone numerous internal and external reviews of its behavior. At the Air Force's insistence, it accepted an unprecedented level of government oversight of its corporate-ethics programs. For example, it agreed to provide the Air Force monthly reports on the status of sensitive, in-house investigations, as well as information about suspected misconduct anywhere in its army of subcontractors.

It also set up a hotline for employees to report ethical lapses. One tip to that hotline led to the departure earlier this year of CEO Harry C. Stonecipher when a caller reported his consensual relationship with a female executive.

So-called deferred-prosecution agreements have been used in recent years against roughly a dozen large companies, including Time Warner Inc., Monsanto Co. and Computer Associates Inc. The goal is to hold management liable without resorting to indictments or guilty pleas that could threaten the survival of the entire company. With the exception of Boeing, big defense suppliers haven't been a major focus of the recent federal crackdown on white-collar crime.

Write to Andy Pasztor at andy.pasztor@wsj.com1 and Anne Marie Squeo at annemarie.squeo@wsj.com2

CIA Leak Probe May Be Nearing End Game: Lawyers (BOS/REU)

The Boston Globe, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - New York Times reporter Judith Miller, locked up for refusing to reveal who told her a covert CIA operative's name in a probe that may be nearing a conclusion, works part time at the jail laundry helping clean fellow inmates' green jumpsuits and dirty linens.

Between shifts at the laundry, Miller works at the library on a card catalog of the jail's books, said attorney Floyd Abrams, offering new details about Miller's life behind bars after meeting with her on Wednesday.

Abrams, who represents The New York Times, said Miller was "safe" but that conditions in jail were "grim."

This week Miller marked two months -- 65 days as of Thursday -- at the Alexandria Detention Center just outside Washington for refusing to testify to a grand jury trying to determine who in the Bush administration leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Abrams said Miller remained "resolute" and would not reveal her confidential source to a grand jury in the case, which could shake up an administration already reeling from criticism over its response to Hurricane Katrina. The probe has ensnarled President George W. Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

But lawyers close to the investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks in a final flurry of negotiations and legal maneuvering.

Asked if talks were under way with special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, a Justice Department prosecutor, to secure Miller's testimony and release, Abrams said: "If there are any discussions, they would be private."

"She is there (in jail) for a reason. At this time, the reason is still there. She made a promise and, unless properly released from her promise by her source, she has no choice but to continue to take the position that she's taking," Abrams said.

He declined comment when asked if Miller, who was sent to jail on July 6 though she never wrote an article about the Plame matter, had reached out anew to her source for a clear release from confidentiality that would allow her to testify.

Attorney Theodore Boutrous, who represents Time magazine and its reporter, Matthew Cooper, said Miller's "standoff" with Fitzgerald may be coming to a head.

"Either Fitzgerald still needs Miller or he doesn't," Boutrous said. "It's who blinks first. ... You would think something needs to happen soon, one way or another."

Unlike Miller, Cooper avoided jail by agreeing to testify after saying he received the "express personal consent" of his source to reveal his identity. The first person to tell him about Plame was Rove, Cooper said.

Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, said the leak was meant to discredit him for criticizing Bush's Iraq policy in 2003 after a CIA-funded trip to investigate whether Niger helped supply nuclear materials to Baghdad.

FITZGERALD'S END GAME?

Several lawyers involved in the case say Fitzgerald was likely to wrap up his inquiry this fall, if not sooner, though they say they have not heard from his office in weeks.

The outcome could have political implications for Bush, whose approval ratings are already the lowest of his presidency.

After initially promising to fire anyone found to have leaked information in the case, Bush in July offered a more qualified pledge: "If someone committed a crime they will no longer work in my administration."

Prominent Democrats have called on Bush to fire Rove, the architect of his two presidential election victories and now his deputy chief of staff, or block his access to classified information.

Rove's attorneys said Rove did nothing wrong and has been repeatedly assured he is not a target of Fitzgerald's investigation.

When Miller was jailed, chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan said she must stay there until she agreed to testify or for the rest of the grand jury's term, which lasts into October.

But if no deal is reached, lawyers say, Fitzgerald could step up pressure by threatening Miller with a longer sentence. Miller's attorneys, in turn, could argue she has no intention of testifying and that her continued incarceration is of little consequence to Fitzgerald's case since others have revealed their sources.

LIVING A FLOOR BELOW MOUSSAOUI

An investigative reporter who covers national security and foreign policy issues, Miller is one of about 440 inmates at the Alexandria Detention Center, according to its spokesman, Capt. Tony Davis.

Miller has been in a U.S. jail longer than any other newspaper journalist to protect a source, according to Abrams. The previous record-holder, he said, was a journalist from The Los Angeles Times who served for 48 days.

The Alexandria facility where Miller is being held has housed some of the nation's most notorious spies and terror suspects. One floor above Miller's cell is Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person convicted in connection with the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Like other inmates, Miller has a small cell, which gets some natural light through a window and is "locked down" for the night at about 11:00 p.m. The cell is equipped with a toilet, a sink and a bed.

Davis declined to discuss Miller's daily routine. Speaking generally, he said, inmates assigned to laundry detail help wash jail linens and blankets, as well as green jumpsuits marked with the word "PRISONER."

Judge Orders Berger To Pay $50,000 Fine (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A judge on Thursday ordered Sandy Berger, former President Clinton's national security adviser, to pay a $50,000 fine for illegally taking classified documents from the National Archives, the main repository of U.S. government papers.

The punishment handed down by U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah Robinson exceeded the $10,000 fine recommended by government lawyers. Under the deal, Mr. Berger avoids prison time but he must surrender access to classified government materials for three years.

"The court finds the fine is inadequate because it doesn't reflect the seriousness of the offense," Judge Robinson said, as a grim-faced Mr. Berger stood silently.

Earlier in the hearing, Mr. Berger expressed remorse for his crime, which he described as a lapse of judgment that came while he was preparing to testify before the commission investigating the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"I let considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material," Mr. Berger said. "I believe this lapse, serious as it is, does not reflect the character of myself."

The sentencing capped a bizarre sequence of events in which Mr. Berger admitted to sneaking classified documents out of the Archives in his suit, later destroying some of them in his office and then lying about it.

After initially saying it was an "honest mistake," Mr. Berger pleaded guilty in April to a misdemeanor of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, which contained information relating to terror threats in the U.S. during the 2000 millennium celebration.

Berger Is Fined For Smuggling Classified Papers (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

A federal judge yesterday ordered former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger to pay a $50,000 fine and give up his security clearance for three years as the penalty for smuggling classified terrorism documents out of the National Archives in 2003.

The sentence was much more severe than the $10,000 fine that Justice Department prosecutors and Berger's attorneys had jointly proposed after Berger pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge. But Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson said the punishment, which also included two years of probation and 100 hours of community service, would more "sufficiently reflect the seriousness of the offense."

She said she took into account Berger's "otherwise exemplary record" and "sincere expression of remorse" in her sentence.

Berger, who had classified documents hand-delivered to his desk when he advised President Bill Clinton, pleaded guilty in April to unauthorized removal and retention of classified documents. He admitted to stuffing copies of documents in his coat jacket as he left the National Archives and then destroying some at his office and pretending he had never possessed them. Berger had been reviewing the records about the Clinton administration's response to reports of terrorist threats in 2000 as he was preparing to respond to questions from the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"My actions . . . were wrong. They were foolish. I deeply regret them, and I have every day since," Berger told Robinson yesterday. "I let considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material."

The disclosure of the government's investigation of Berger last year prompted him to step down as an adviser to the 2004 presidential campaign of Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

Ex-Clinton Official Draws Higher-Than-Expected Fine (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Samuel R. Berger, an influential adviser to former President Bill Clinton who helped shape American foreign policy through the 1990's, was ordered Thursday to pay a higher-than-expected fine of $50,000 but received no jail time for removing and destroying copies of classified documents from the National Archives.

Mr. Berger, 59, stood somberly before a federal judge moments before he was sentenced, and admitted that his decision to remove material on terrorism in three visits to the archives in 2003 was "indefensible." His actions, Mr. Berger said, "were wrong, they were foolish," adding, "I deeply regret them, and I have every day since."

In a plea deal reached five months ago, lawyers for the Justice Department and Mr. Berger agreed to seek a $10,000 fine as part of his sentence. But Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson of Federal District Court here decided Thursday to impose the $50,000 fine, along with 100 hours of community service and two years' probation. She also barred Mr. Berger from access to classified material for three years.

The judge said the proposed $10,000 fine failed to reflect the severity of the crime or the financial resources of Mr. Berger, who founded an international consulting firm after serving as national security adviser from 1997 through 2000.

The sentencing caps an embarrassing 14-month ordeal that Mr. Berger's lawyers acknowledge has badly hurt his reputation. His motivation in taking the documents remains a matter of fierce debate in political circles, and Mr. Berger himself did little to shed light on the mystery Thursday, except to say, without elaboration, that he had put his own "personal convenience" in reviewing the documents ahead of federal law.

But new court filings, prepared by the Justice Department and Mr. Berger's lawyers, did provide fresh details about the episode and possible explanations for his actions.

The filings suggest that prosecutors and defense lawyers believe Mr. Berger's decision to remove the documents was triggered by pressure, fatigue and confusion, rather than by any intent to hide damaging information about the Clinton administration, as Republican critics have charged.

Mr. Berger spent hundreds of hours in 2003 reviewing the Clinton administration's record on terrorism in his capacity as the administration's official liaison to the Sept. 11 commission, which investigated the terrorist attacks of 2001.

In preparing for his testimony to the commission on three visits to the archives, he came across several versions of a highly classified memorandum that he had ordered written in 2000 regarding the administration's response to the so-called millennium terror plots in December 1999, according to the court filings, and he improperly removed several sets of copies. He later destroyed some of the copies and lied to archive officials when confronted about the missing documents, the court filings said.

When the episode first became public last year - forcing Mr. Berger to step down as an adviser to the presidential campaign of Senator John Kerry - he said he had accidentally removed the documents. But he admitted as part of his guilty plea in April that he had intentionally taken the material.

Defense lawyers said in their pre-sentencing memorandum to the judge this week that Mr. Berger, in reviewing material at the archives for several days for as long as 10 hours a day, became overwhelmed.

The defense lawyers said that Mr. Berger, "weary from the document review and not thinking clearly," wanted to reconstruct events in his own office by comparing memorandums side by side and so decided to remove notes and classified copies.

The lawyers said that "the tiring nature of the review, the burden it imposed on Mr. Berger's schedule, and the importance that Mr. Berger attached to being prepared to testify before the 9/11 commission and to prepare his colleagues" led him to a "lapse in judgment."

DOJ_NMG_0004029

Prosecutors for the Justice Department, in their own memorandum to the judge, offered no evidence to suggest any ulterior motive by Mr. Berger. On the contrary, prosecutors noted that the Sept. 11 commission reviewed copies of all the documents that Mr. Berger took and that there was "no evidence that any unique document was destroyed or lost."

Instead, prosecutors said in their filing, Mr. Berger appeared to have taken the documents "for his own convenience." He "was entitled to review the documents any time he wished to, at the secure locations, but he decided that was too burdensome and so he chose to break the law," the prosecutors said.

However, Justice Department prosecutors made clear in their sentencing memorandum that no matter what may have motivated Mr. Berger, they considered his offense a serious crime.

"As a consultant to the government the defendant assumed an important task to review highly classified documents related to national security," they wrote, "and in the course of that review he breached the trust given to him by unlawfully removing, retaining and destroying classified documents."

In considering a sentence, Magistrate Judge Robinson reviewed letters of support from several admirers of Mr. Berger, including Anthony Lake, his predecessor as national security adviser, who called him "a man of extraordinary integrity," and Fred Reiner, his rabbi. But the judge also received some 15 opposing letters from members of the public and some former government employees, who urged her to sentence Mr. Berger to jail for what they viewed as a serious offense.

Ultimately, the judge said she decided that probation and community service were more appropriate.

Federal Agents Armed With Warrant Raid Melrose Park Police Station (AP)

AP, September 9, 2005

CHICAGO - Federal agents armed with a search warrant raided the police station in suburban Melrose Park on Thursday, an FBI spokesman said.

"We did have several agents there this morning," FBI spokesman Ross Rice said.

The raid, he said, was part of an ongoing investigation but he declined to give details. He also declined to say what the agents were looking for and what, if anything, they found.

"No arrests have been made and no charges have been filed," he said.

U.S. attorney spokesman Randall Samborn declined to comment.

A woman who answered the phone at the west suburban police station said that Chief Vito Scavo and his lieutenants were not immediately available to answer questions.

The suburb has figured in a number of high-profile criminal cases in recent years.

Former Melrose Park Mayor C. Augustus Taddeo pleaded guilty in 1999 to extortion and tax fraud and was sentenced to 27 months in federal prison.

In recent years, a federal investigation of illegal electronic gambling devices controlled by the mob found that many were installed in Melrose Park taverns and strip joints. And the FBI said recently that the mob has a street crew based in the suburb.

The suburb was also the site of the first raid by federal agents in October 1998 on an Illinois drivers license testing station operated by then-Secretary of State George Ryan's office. It was the beginning of the Operation Safe Road investigation of bribes exchanged for drivers licenses and political corruption in the Ryan era.

Federal Agents Raid Melrose Park Police Station (WLS-TV)

By Charles Thomas

WLS-TV, September 8, 2005

September 8, 2005 - Federal agents raided the Melrose Park police station on Thursday. They shut the building down for half a day and seized records without explaining the nature of the investigation.

The Melrose Park police headquarters is back in business after being shut down all morning and part of the early afternoon by federal investigators. Officially the feds will not say what they were looking for and village officials will not comment on the raid, referring questions to a private public relations firm.

The federal agents arrived shortly after 9:00 a.m., They were mostly postal inspectors, but a card on the dashboard of one vehicle indicated it was operated by the U.S. Department of Labor. ABC 7 has learned the investigators were searching employment records going back several years to determine on what days and at what times certain officers worked.

The headquarters was closed to the public during the four hours that the feds worked in side as citizens with routine business were turned away.

"Normally they tell me to come in and now they say to come back in a couple of hours," said Rene Morales.

Federal agents had no comment and the Melrose Park police chief was unavailable.

There have been some complaints about the private security company owned by the Melrose Park police chief, which has contracts to supply security for many bars and saloons as well as many other businesses.

Officers cooperated with federal agents. The feds apparently got everything they were looking for.

Melrose Park Police Department Shut Down For Federal Raid (WMAQ-TV)

WMAQ-TV, September 9, 2005

CHICAGO -- The Melrose Park Police Department was shut down Thursday morning as federal agents conducted a raid.

Federal agents came calling early and by 10 a.m., they had control of the building and were turning local citizens away.

City officials insisted no police calls were affected, Rogers reported.

"Those calls would come to my desk," said the mayor's assistant, Patty Dindia.

NBC5's Phil Rogers reported. The investigators came from the FBI and the IRS, as well as the postal inspectors and the U.S. Department of Labor.

The investigation has been lengthy and there are no signs it is nearing completion, Rogers reported. Melrose Park has had political turbulence in the past -- in the last election, the mayor's aunt ran against him.

Previously, NBC5 has reported that a $42 million water project in Melrose Park was under investigation, especially questions about a $432,000 public relations budget, as well as another $2.5 million for something called "program management."

But, it is believed that the federal agents on Thursday were seeking records relating to a private security firm operated by Melrose Park Police Chief Vito Scavo. Questions have been raised about what role Scavo's firm played in the water project, Rogers reported. Rogers reported that there have also been questions about Scavo's use of Melrose Park officers in his security company.

Warrants were executed separately at a Cumberland Avenue building housing a second security firm, with which Scavo allegedly has a relationship.

Mayor Ron Serpico was unavailable to answer questions about what exactly federal agents were seeking.

FBI Searches Suburban Police Department (CBS2CHI)

By Dorothy Tucker

CBS 2 Chicago, September 9, 2005

(CBS) MELROSE PARK A west suburban police department was temporarily shut down Thursday when federal agents raided the building searching for clues in an on-going corruption probe.

An investigation is underway right now in west suburban Melrose Park.

Sources tell CBS 2 News that the Melrose Park police chief is at the center of the investigation.

Federal agents from the Chicago office took over the Melrose Park police station Thursday morning, locking the doors and turning away residents.

For four hours the FBI agents, along with investigators from the labor department and the U.S. Postal Service, collected documents and information.

While authorities declined to talk about their investigation, sources tell CBS 2 that Melrose Park Police Chief Veto Scavo was the target of the raid.

Scavo is a paid consultant for a private security firm called IFPC Worldwide Inc.

According to the source, investigators are looking at a number of allegations, but the focus seems to be the Scavo was using on-duty police to work for the private firm, and possibly taking kick backs from clients.

The source said the officers were providing security for a number of businesses, including nightclubs. A nightclub manager, who declined to be interviewed, said Scavo forced bars to use his private firm and threatened not to answer their calls for help if they didn't.

The club manager believes that explains why investigators from the Department of Labor were at the police station, possibly looking at the time sheets of the Melrose Park police officers.

Late Thursday afternoon, CBS 2 contacted the police chief. Scavo pointed out that no one was arrested, but beyond that, he would not comment.

'Safe Road' Figure Sentenced In Bid-rigging Probe (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 9, 2005

Saying she regretted ever getting involved in "the world of politics and political favors," a former trusted lieutenant to one of the state's most powerful lobbyists was spared prison Thursday for lying to investigators in the Operation Safe Road probe.

Julie Starsiak, a longtime close aide to lobbyist Al Ronan, was placed on probation for 5 years and ordered to complete 200 hours of community service by U.S. District Judge Blanche Manning.

Ronan hasn't been charged with wrongdoing, but his lobbying firm, Ronan Potts LLC, pleaded guilty to rigging a bid so a client won a contract to oversee a huge expansion at McCormick Place.

In court Thursday, though, Starsiak's lawyer, Chris Gair, implicated Ronan in the wrongdoing, saying that Ronan directed Starsiak to divulge confidential details of the sealed bids to the Ronan client.

"It's just nonsense," Ronan's lawyer, Edward Genson, responded later to the accusation.

In pleading guilty last year to making false statements, Starsiak admitted she lied to authorities on several occasions by trying to shift blame in part to Ronan, even though she had been given immunity from prosecution if she told the truth.

Gair told the judge that Starsiak had been cooperating with authorities for almost two years, revealing "what she knows about political corruption in this state."

Starsiak had been a close aide to Ronan for more than two decades, including while he was a state legislator.

Starsiak's assistance led Alexandra Coutretsis to cooperate, which in turn resulted in her fiance, Scott Fawell, cooperating, Gair said. Fawell, who once headed the Metropolitan Pier and Exposition Authority, which operates McCormick Place, is expected to be the star witness against former Gov. George Ryan at his upcoming trial. Coutretsis was a top aide to Fawell at McPier.

In addition, Starsiak revealed corruption in "another public entity," Gair said.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Scott Levine called Starsiak's cooperation valuable and confirmed her help resulted in the opening of an investigation that "is bearing fruit."

Gair said Starsiak's assistance has come at a price, ostracizing her from former colleagues in the political realm and leaving her unemployed and penniless.

"There's nothing worse you can be in Chicago than a cooperator," Gair told the judge. "She's lost everything."

Starsiak, 57, of Chicago was so choked with emotion when she read from a prepared statement that her words were barely understandable at times.

Starsiak expressed remorse for ever becoming involved in politics.

"I used to be proud that from my humble background I had become professionally and in some cases even personally acquainted with the most wealthy and powerful people in the state," she said. "Perhaps I was naïve in thinking that associating with important people... I automatically assumed legitimacy and integrity."

Starsiak said her volunteer efforts for several charitable organizations "makes all the glamor of the world of business and politics seem unimportant by comparison."

Manning could have sentenced Starsiak to up to 21 months in prison, but she imposed probation, citing the "absolute toll" the case had taken on her.

"I don't think any more punishment is going to do anything more in a positive way," the judge said.

---

mo'connor@tribune.com

Lobbyist's Former Aide Gets Probation, Sorry She Got Into Politics (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

The Belleville News Democrat, September 9, 2005

CHICAGO - The former vice president of a prominent lobbying firm was put on probation for five years Thursday for lying to FBI agents about bid rigging involving the $800 million expansion of the McCormick Place convention center.

"I'm sorry that I ever became involved in the world of politics and political favors," a tearful Julie Starsiak told federal Judge Blanche M. Manning.

Starsiak, 57, pleaded guilty in February 2004 to making false statements to FBI agents who were investigating bid rigging in the competition to get the contract to manage the expansion.

She said she lied when she told them her boss, lobbyist and former state lawmaker Albert Ronan, was the one who called an engineering firm with confidential bidding information.

Starsiak now says that she made the call, although defense attorney Chris Gair told Manning that Ronan was part of the scheme.

Prominent Chicago defense attorney Edward M. Genson, who represents Ronan, immediately disputed Gair's claim.

"That's nonsense," Genson said when told about the lawyer's remark.

Ronan has been charged with no wrongdoing in the case, although his firm has pleaded guilty to mail fraud and paid a $350,000 fine.

Starsiak told Manning that with only a high school diploma she was awed that as Ronan's top aide she associated with the wealthiest and most powerful men in Illinois.

"Perhaps I was naive in thinking that associating with the most powerful and respected people automatically assumed their legitimacy and integrity," she said.

She said she wanted to devote the rest of her life to helping people and pleaded with Manning not to send her to prison - even though federal guidelines called 15 months minimum.

Manning said she thought Starsiak, who is now broke and has been jobless for two years, has learned her lesson and wouldn't commit further crimes.

"I don't think prison is the answer," said Manning, who ordered probation and 200 hours of community service.

Gair told the judge that Starsiak has done much to help federal prosecutors.

Gair said it was Starsiak's guilty plea that prompted Andrea Coutretsis to plead guilty in the bid-rigging investigation and admit that she gave the bidding information to Starsiak.

Coutretsis is the former assistant and current fiancee of former Gov. George Ryan's top aide, Scott Fawell, who is currently serving a 6 1/2-year racketeering sentence and has agreed to become the government's key witness at Ryan's upcoming trial on racketeering conspiracy charges.

Coutretsis persuaded Fawell to become a federal witness and Gair suggested that Starsiak deserved at least some credit for starting the chain of events that caused him to change sides.

Gair also said it was Starsiak who told prosecutors to investigate the Illinois Health Facilities Planning Board, which is now the focus of a major extortion and fraud investigation.

Daley Names Inspector General (CHIST/AP)

By MEGAN REICHGOTT, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 8, 2005

Mayor Richard M. Daley, struggling to clean up his administration's image amid an ongoing federal investigation of bribe-taking and political hiring, named a former federal prosecutor Thursday to be his new inspector general.

David Hoffman will take over for Alexander Vroustouris, who resigned in June amid allegations that investigations performed by his office were delayed and incomplete. Deputy Inspector General Bill Marback had been acting inspector general since Vroustouris resigned.

Vroustouris "did a good job. This is going to be a better job, simple as that," Daley said at a City Hall news conference to announce the change.

Eight members of Daley's Cabinet have either resigned or been fired since May as the mayor has worked to maintain the public's confidence. Federal investigators have been looking into City Hall for months, first examining bribes traded for jobs in a contract hauling program and most recently looking into allegations of fraud in the city's hiring practices.

Daley, who has not been accused of any wrongdoing, has acknowledged he has been questioned by federal prosecutors. Late last month, he apologized to the public and said he should have done more to prevent corruption in his administration.

Hoffman, 38, is a native of Chicago's north suburbs and has been an assistant U.S. attorney since 1998. For the past three years he has been deputy chief of the narcotics and gangs section.

"As a former federal prosecutor, David has the skills and experience necessary to root out corruption and help us maintain the highest ethical standards in city government," Daley said Thursday.

Daley "has asked only one thing of me: to take all necessary steps to find wrongdoing in city government and expose it," Hoffman said.

Hoffman has the authority to research corruption at all levels of city government, even if the inquiry leads back to City Hall, Daley said.

"Inspector General Hoffman has my full support and authority to root out and prevent misconduct, whether in hiring or contracts or wherever it occurs, so that the people of Chicago know that we are protecting them and putting their interests first," he said.

Daley said he would expand the powers and staff at the inspector general's office after Hoffman has some time on the job to make recommendations.

"The inspector general has to have sufficient staff to audit contracts, to determine compliance with the law and accountability to the taxpayers," Daley said. "And his office has to be equipped with the latest technology."

Daley Names New City Hall Watchdog (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Reports

Chicago Tribune, September 9, 2005

Mayor Richard Daley today named a Chicago-area native and federal prosecutor as his new inspector general, charged with ferreting out dishonesty and corruption in city government.

"I am confident that with our new inspector general, we will see great improvement in the ethics and integrity of city government," Daley said as he introduced David Hoffman at a City Hall news conference.

Hoffman, 38, has been an assistant U.S. attorney since 1998, deputy chief of its Narcotics and Gangs Section since 2002 and head of Project Safe Neighborhoods, a joint federal-city anti-crime initiative to keep parolees and probationers from committing gun crimes, since 2003.

He also is a former law clerk to the late U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

"The mayor has asked only one thing of me: To take all necessary steps to find wrongdoing in city government and to expose it," Hoffman said. Borrowing an oft-used phrase by U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald in exposing government corruption, Hoffman promised to "follow the evidence wherever it leads."

Eight members of Daley's Cabinet have either resigned or been fired since May as the mayor has worked to maintain the public's confidence. Federal investigators have been looking into City Hall for months, first examining bribes traded for jobs in a contract hauling program and most recently looking into allegations of fraud in the city's hiring practices.

Daley, who has not been accused of any wrongdoing, has acknowledged he has been questioned by federal prosecutors. Late last month, he apologized to the public and said he should have done more to prevent corruption in his administration.

Today, the mayor said that acting on Hoffman's recommendations, he would soon announce a series of changes that would expand the powers and staff of the inspector general's office.

Hoffman urged city employees to report wrongdoing.

"If you see corruption, if you see fraud, if you see dishonest practices, let us hear from you. Do not accept it silently," he said. "If your colleagues or superiors are using their positions corruptly or dishonestly, they are tarnishing you and the rest of city government."

"I can assure you as inspector general I will take nothing more seriously than going after those who would retaliate against employees courageous enough to turn in wrongdoers," Hoffman said.

A native of the northern suburbs, Hoffman has a bachelor's degree in history from Yale University and a law degree from the University of Chicago.

He replaces Inspector General Alexander Vroustouris, who had served in the post from 1989 until Ron Huberman, the mayor's chief of staff, requested Vroustouris' resignation in June. The former inspector general was accused of not acting quickly on cases of alleged corruption referred to his office.

Daley today also thanked Acting Inspector General Bill Marback for having substantially reduced a 3,000-case backlog since taking temporary charge of the office in June.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

Mirarchi Dodges Jail (PHI)

By BOB WARNER

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 9, 2005

A widely known defense attorney who admitted taking $7,000 in bribes in a parking-ticket scandal was spared a jail sentence yesterday by a federal judge.

Charles P. Mirarchi III, who cooperated with prosecutors and pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud, will have to spend six months under house arrest, pay a $5,000 fine and face additional restitution payments, U.S. District Judge Bruce W. Kauffman ruled.

Federal sentencing guidelines suggested an 18- to 24-month prison sentence.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy L. Kurland had urged a "significant downward departure" from the guidelines because of the critical testimony Mirarchi provided to convict a more-central participant in the ticket-fixing scam, Joseph F. Hoffman Jr.

Kauffman cited Mirarchi's "substantial and significant cooperation" with the prosecutors and wished Mirarchi "Good luck" after pronouncing the sentence.

The starting date for home detention was left to be worked out with federal marshals, who must arrange an electronic monitoring system.

Convicted in February of mail fraud, conspiracy and extortion, Hoffman drew a two-year prison sentence from Kauffman earlier this week.

Mirarchi, 54, a gregarious fixture in the city's criminal courts for the last 25 years, had functioned briefly as Hoffman's bagman, visiting the office of taxi kingpin Michael Etemad to pick up envelopes stuffed with $100 bills, a total of $7,000.

Hoffman kept $4,000 for himself and gave $3,000 to Mirarchi. In exchange, Hoffman took $47,127 worth of parking tickets issued to Etemad's cabs and reduced his fines to $3,500.

Two of Mirarchi's visits to Etemad were recorded on videotape by the FBI.

Mirarchi hovered close to tears yesterday as he addressed the judge, before the sentencing.

"I would like to apologize to this court... and to my family," Mirarchi said. "Sometimes you're asked if you had one thing to do over in your life. For some people, that's a hard question to answer. Not for me. I'm sorry for the judgment I used and the wrong I committed."

Mirarchi was apparently relieved at his sentence, embracing many of the friends, family and fellow attorneys who had filled the courtroom to hear Kauffman's decision.

The parking-ticket scandal hung over Mirarchi's head for the past 2 ½ years, after the Daily News first reported his involvement in the Etemad payoffs.

But even after his indictment in June 2004, and his guilty plea last October, Mirarchi continued to represent criminal defendants and to draw a $37,893 city salary, as a deputy to the city's top election official, City Commissioner Margaret Tartaglione.

With the sentencing, Mirarchi is likely to lose both his city job and his license to practice law.

Lawyer Who Cooperated Is Sentenced In Ticket Fixing (PHI)

By L. Stuart Ditzen

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 9, 2005

The moral of the story yesterday in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Bruce W. Kauffman was this: He who admits his crime and diligently atones for it may hope for kindness at sentencing.

And so it was for Charles P. Mirarchi 3d, a popular Philadelphia defense lawyer who pleaded guilty to a fraud charge in a ticket-fixing scheme and cooperated with prosecutors in convicting his codefendant.

Although federal sentencing guidelines called for a sentence of 18 to 24 months in prison, Mirarchi ended up with three years' probation, the first six months to be served under house arrest.

Kauffman said he gave the 54-year-old Mirarchi a probationary sentence because of his "extremely significant cooperation with the government" in the investigation and prosecution of Joseph F. Hoffman Jr., the former head of the city parking-ticket appeals office.

Hoffman was sentenced on Wednesday to two years in prison for taking $5,000 in payoffs from taxicab magnate Michael Etemad to reduce $47,000 worth of parking tickets on Etemad's fleet to $3,500.

Mirarchi, the son of retired Common Pleas Court Judge Charles P. Mirarchi Jr., testified at Hoffman's trial in February that he acted as a go-between, carrying payoffs from Etemad to Hoffman in 2002. His testimony was supported by FBI audiotapes and videotapes.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy L. Kurland, who requested a significant sentencing break for Mirarchi, said she was pleased that he got probation.

"His information and assistance provided an inside view of Hoffman's ticket-fixing," Kurland said in a presentence memo to the judge. "And his honest and straightforward testimony at trial was essential to Hoffman's conviction."

Speaking briefly to Kauffman before the sentence, Mirarchi fought back tears as he apologized for his crime.

Martin M. Krimsky, a longtime Philadelphia lawyer who appeared as a character witness, testified: "I know of no person in the City of Philadelphia who is liked and loved more than Charles."

Krimsky said Mirarchi was generous "to a fault."

Which might be what got him in trouble.

Mirarchi testified in February that Hoffman asked him, as a favor, to pick up cash payments from Etemad and to pretend the money was a legal fee.

Mirarchi said he and Hoffman had grown up together in South Philadelphia and had been friends all their lives. So he did him the favor.

"It was wrong," he said. "I know it was wrong, and Hoffman knew it was wrong."

Mirarchi's conviction is likely to result in disbarment and the loss of his part-time city job as a deputy city commissioner. But as of yesterday, his law license was intact and he was still listed as a city employee.

FBI Removes Items From Councilman's Home (KARE-TV)

KARE-TV, September 9, 2005

FBI agents pulled up to the home of Minneapolis City Councilman Dean Zimmerman around 3 p.m. on Thursday afternoon.

Agents were executing a search warrant at the councilman's home. Zimmerman is a first-term representative for the 6th ward, which is located east of 35W between 24th Street East and Lake Street, in the Phillips neighborhood.

Neither the FBI or the Minneapolis Police, who were assisting in the removal of items from Zimmerman's home, would comment on the reason for the search warrant.

But during the three hours police and FBI officials were at the house, they were seen removing everything relating to Zimmermann's re-election campaign plus personal financial records.

The U.S. attorney's office also served Minneapolis City Hall with a subpoena for materials in Zimmerman's council office.

Zimmerman is a member of the green party. He is married with four children.

City Councilman's House Raided (WCCO-TV)

WCCO-TV, September 9, 2005

(WCCO) Federal agents searched a Minneapolis City Councilman's house Thursday afternoon, police said.

According to officials, the corruption division of the FBI searched G. Dean Zimmerman's house, in the 2200 block of Clinton Ave. S.

The FBI said they executed a "court-authorized federal search warrant as part of an ongoing federal investigation."

Federal agents left the house carrying several boxes, folders and computers containing materials related to his re-election campaign and financial records.

Zimmerman was unavailable for comment, but his campaign manager Lauren Maker said the agents spent three hours at his house.

"They took primarily, everything related to the campaign," Maker said. "The took our mailing labels, they took our voter id list."

Maker said she believed the search was politically motivated because it was so close to the election.

The search came five days before the primary elections. Zimmerman is running for a second term on the city council.

Because of redistricting, Zimmerman, first-term a Green Party member is in the same ward as council vice president Robert Lilligren, DFL.

When campaign volunteers came out to help prepare a mailing Thursday evening, an FBI agent at the door turned them away. Zimmerman was reportedly home during the search and met with his defense attorney in the evening.

He has not been charged with any crime.

Zimmerman, a retired teacher, has served as commissioner of the Minneapolis Park and Recreations Board, a board member of the Middle Mississippi River Watershed Management Organization, a board member of the St. Anthony Falls Heritage Board and a board secretary of the Green Institute.

A Top HAWS Official Pleads Not Guilty (WSJ)

By Bertrand M. Gutierrez

Winston-Salem Journal, September 9, 2005

A senior official with the Housing Authority of Winston-Salem pleaded not guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court here to three felony charges: stealing, embezzlement and money laundering.

Federal prosecutors filed the charges Aug. 30 against Kenneth Love, the assistant director of housing services for the housing authority, after a four-year investigation by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the FBI.

The same charges were filed against a Virginia businessman, Sylvester Clay, who pleaded not guilty on Tuesday.

Trials for both men are scheduled for February.

Federal investigators say that Love and Clay worked together to bid on contracts and get paid for phantom jobs through Clay's maintenance companies.

Telephone calls to Reid Law-rence, the executive director of the housing authority, were not returned yesterday or Wednesday. James Rousseau, the chairman of the board of commissioners of the authority, also has not returned telephone calls.

Sherrod Banks, an attorney representing the authority, said Wednesday that Love was on sick leave.

At the courthouse yesterday, Love said "no comment" when asked if he was ill. Nor would he talk about the case.

A spokeswoman with HUD, which determines the amount of money that the housing authority may get for projects, would not say whether the department was taking or might take any action against the local agency.

"Usually, we don't comment on ongoing investigations," HUD spokeswoman Denise Dunckel said. Later in the day, the authority issued a press release in which it never referred to the charges against Love, but only cited the allegations against Clay.

DOJ_NMG_0004036

"HAWS is disturbed by these allegations. However, this is still a continuing investigation both outside HAWS and within HAWS," the press release said.

Banks said he planned to meet today with housing officials to discuss his view of the charges and any possible action that HAWS might take.

Bribe-case Builder Has 2d Arrest (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 9, 2005

NEPTUNE, N.J. - A developer accused of bribing officials in Monmouth County has been charged with threatening a 22-year-old woman at gunpoint in a community-college parking lot.

Anthony Spalliero, 63, fled when an officer at the Middletown campus of Brookdale Community College heard the woman scream about 1:30 p.m. Tuesday, college spokesman Stephen Nacco said.

Spalliero had put a gun against the woman's ribs and told her to come with him, Nacco said.

"I would say that's total nonsense," Spalliero's lawyer, Michael Pappa, told the Asbury Park Press of Neptune for yesterday's editions.

Spalliero, of Marlboro, was arrested Tuesday outside his former wife's home in Holmdel. He was charged with possession of a weapon for an unlawful purpose, making terroristic threats, and aggravated assault, the Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office said.

The weapons charge carries the stiffest penalty, up to 10 years in prison. Spalliero was released Wednesday after posting $150,000 bail.

The arrest may affect Spalliero's bail status on the bribery charges, because he was required to surrender all firearms.

In May, Spalliero was arrested by the FBI and charged with passing bribes, including offering then-Mayor Matthew V. Scannapieco of Marlboro about $143,500 from 2001 to 2003.

Scannapieco, mayor from 1992 to 2003, pleaded guilty April 12 to taking $245,000 from a developer between 1997 and 2003 in return for supporting the developer's projects.

Spalliero was also charged with paying $8,500 from 2001 to 2003 to Monmouth County's top elected official. The FBI complaint did not give the official's name, but the freeholder director then was Harry Larrison Jr., who was charged in April with taking $8,500 in bribes from developers in Marlboro.

Larrison, 78, of Neptune, retired in December and died May 29. His 39 years in office made him the longest-serving freeholder in state history.

Former Kodak Executive Charged In Bribery Probe (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, September 9, 2005

ROCHESTER, N.Y. -- A former executive at Eastman Kodak Co. on Thursday became the fourth person charged in a multimillion-dollar scheme that federal prosecutors claim defrauded the company and suburban Rochester taxpayers.

David Finnman faces two felony counts of mail fraud and one count of conspiracy to defraud. He worked at Kodak from 1970 to 1999.

The alleged fraud happened when tax assessments for Kodak's property in Greece were illegally lowered and the defendants shared the kickbacks.

The FBI said Finnman and co-defendant Charles Schwab, a former Greece assessor, created a business in the Bahamas around February 1998 to hide bribes and kickbacks paid by co-defendant John Nicolo, a regional appraiser.

Investigators claim Finnman and Schwab each admitted receiving about $200,000 and investing it in an offshore account.

The new charges said another company, Global Crossing, was the victim of fraud because Finnman worked there until 2003.

Mark Camarata, Finnman's successor, was the first person charged in the case in May. He was scheduled for a court appearance on Sept. 22.

Finnman's lawyer, Matthew Lembke, could not be reached for comment.

___

Information from: Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, http://www.democratandchronicle.com

Lt. Gov. Now Says He Never Talked To Cooper About Loan (AP)

By MATT GOURAS, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004037

NASHVILLE — Tennessee's lieutenant governor has changed his position on whether he talked to a fellow lawmaker about a bank loan now involved in a federal fraud trial.

Lt. Gov. John Wilder said Wednesday that he was incorrect when he said last week that he had talked with Sen. Jerry Cooper about getting a loan at Wilder's bank.

Wilder has been the subject of heavy criticism since he showed up last week at a hearing held to discuss Cooper and the loan.

Cooper, a Democrat from Smartt, is an unindicted co-conspirator in a federal indictment alleging fraud against two men involved in the sale of property owned by Cooper.

Wilder left the meeting of the Senate Ethics Subcommittee, which was not announced to the public, when reporters showed up and pressed to be allowed entry.

But before leaving, Wilder recounted his role in the loan to reporters, saying Cooper approached him about having BankTennessee, which Wilder partly owns, underwrite the $1.77 million loan when the deal was first going down in the late 1990s.

The resulting land deal led to federal indictments charging Anthony and Teresa Auyer of Alabama, who purchased Cooper's lumber mill property in Warren County, and property appraiser James Passons.

On Wednesday, Wilder changed his story and said he "would like to set the record straight."

"While it has been over six years ago, it is my conviction that I did not talk to Sen. Jerry Cooper about this matter," Wilder said. "I was mistaken when I said I talked to Sen. Jerry Cooper. To the extent I indicated otherwise, I was in error."

The position is a big change from last week when Wilder said he was certain he had talked to Cooper.

At that time, Wilder first told The Associated Press and others that he had not talked to Cooper. But he quickly changed his mind in the next sentence, and went on to say, "Sen. Cooper asked me if my bank would be interested in making the loan. I told him I thought it would and ... (Auyer) called my bank."

Wilder was adamant he did not influence the loan and did not pressure the bank to make the loan.

Wilder was clear that Cooper had talked to him, though, further saying "he asked me if my bank may be interested in making a loan to this person that he sold his plant to. I told Sen. Cooper it might be, and he told this gentlemen that they might be and he talked to them and that's where it started."

Wilder reiterated that position two days later, on Friday telling The (Memphis) Commercial Appeal newspaper that he did nothing more than refer Cooper to BankTennessee executives.

"My offhanded remarks simply were not correct," Wilder now says.

Wilder, 83, has served longer as the presiding officer of a state legislative body than any other person in the nation. He was first elected to the state Senate in 1959 for a two-year term, but then was out of office until winning election again in 1966 to another two-year term. Wilder, a Democrat from Mason, won his first four-year Senate term in 1968 and has been speaker since 1971.

Tennessee Republican Party Chairman Bob Davis, a Wilder critic, said the Senate speaker's latest comments illustrate the problem.

"I guess everybody can change their mind. What's different is that this fellow is lieutenant governor, a career politician who out of convenience and habit has made a career out of covering his tracks," Davis said. "This is exactly why Tennesseans have lost trust in their state government."

It's the second time this year that Wilder has backtracked from public comments.

In May, right after the Tennessee Waltz sting that nabbed five current and former lawmakers, Wilder criticized the FBI for "entrapping" the indicted legislators. A week later, he said the remarks were meant to express only his belief that "entrapment is wrong."

PAC Linked To DeLay Indicted In Funding Probe (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — A Texas grand jury today indicted a political action committee affiliated with House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), alleging that it took illegal campaign contributions during the 2002 election that led to a historic realignment of the Texas Legislature.

The charges, which include indictments against one of the state's oldest and largest employer groups, arise out of a more than two-year probe by local prosecutors into the use of corporate money to bankroll Republican candidates for state office.

The indictments allege violations of a state law that bans corporate contributions to state legislative candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0004038

DeLay, one of the most powerful figures in Congress, was not named in the indictment, although three individuals associated with the political action committee, known as the Texans for a Republican Majority, were indicted last year.

In a statement, the House leader said the allegations were "limited to a political organization," but also acknowledged that he had "voluntarily" spoken with investigators last month at the Travis County district attorney's office who are overseeing the probe.

"Mr. DeLay explained to officials what he has always said publicly: his role ... was limited to serving on the political action committee's advisory board along with other elected Texas officials and to appearing at fundraising events," spokesman Kevin Madden said. "Mr. DeLay assured the district attorney's office that he was not involved in the day to day operations ... and to his knowledge all activities were properly reviewed and approved by lawyers" for the political action committee.

The indictments unsealed today alleged that the Texas Assn. of Business and the Texans for a Republican Majority worked together in a complicated arrangement to circumvent the state's election code.

Ronald Earle, the Travis County district attorney, said "massive amounts of secret corporate wealth" were illegally funneled into the coffers of Republican candidates during the 2002 campaign. The business group was charged with fraudulently soliciting money from corporations, and making illegal contributions, in violation of state election law.

The political action committee was charged with illegally soliciting and accepting corporate contributions, including contributions from AT&T Corp. and a group calling itself the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care.

Roy Minton, an attorney for the business group, said the state was attempting to criminalize activity that is protected by federal law. According to the indictments, the group paid more than $1.1 million in corporate money for mailings to voters and television advertising.

"The indictments leave out all the federal law that there is as to the constitutional right of any business to inform the public concerning the voting record or any conduct on the part of candidates for office," Minton said. "That is not something that can be regulated by the state through its election code."

DeLay PAC Is Indicted For Illegal Donations (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

A grand jury in Texas indicted yesterday a state political action committee organized by House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for accepting $120,000 in allegedly illegal corporate campaign contributions shortly before and after the 2002 elections that helped Republicans cement their control of the House of Representatives.

The indictment follows a lengthy investigation in Austin that previously had targeted the defunct political action committee's executive director, John Colyandro. He was indicted last year for accepting illegal corporate donations and for illegally laundering $190,000 in corporate funds through the Republican National State Elections Committee that later wound up in the hands of Texas Republican candidates.

The criminal charges are based on a Texas election law, akin to rules in 17 other states, that strictly bars political contributions from corporations for election purposes. But according to evidence submitted in a related civil trial, the committee, Texans for a Republican Majority (TRMPAC), raised and spent at least $523,000 in corporate funds -- most of which were not reported to state election officials.

The funds paid for surveys, mailings, receptions, candidate investigations and probes of Democratic candidates that helped Republicans gain control of the Texas House for the first time in 130 years, and enabled them to redraw the state's congressional districts in 2003 in such a way that Texas voters elected five more Republicans to Congress in 2004.

DeLay, who was a member of the committee's advisory board, signed fundraising solicitations and participated in at least one conference call to discuss the committee's plans, was not named in the indictment. He also has not been publicly identified as a target of the continuing investigation by Travis County District Attorney Ronald Earle.

DeLay spokesman Kevin Madden responded to the indictment with a written statement saying that it "is limited to a political organization and does not affect Mr. DeLay."

Madden also disclosed for the first time that DeLay had "voluntarily" talked to Earle's office about the investigation last month, and that DeLay said then that his involvement in the committee's activities was "limited to serving on the political action committee's advisory board along with other elected Texas officials and . . . appearing at fundraising events."

Madden said DeLay "assured the district attorney's office that he was not involved in the day-to-day operations of TRMPAC, and to his knowledge all activities were properly reviewed and approved by lawyers" for the committee.

When asked yesterday about DeLay, however, Earle said at a news conference that he was hampered in bringing charges by a provision of the election law that gives him direct authority only over residents of Travis County. He has separately said he does not face that limitation with respect to bringing new charges under the state money-laundering statute.

DeLay's residence is in Fort Bend County, where the prosecutor is an elected Republican, John F. Healey Jr. If Earle found evidence of criminal wrongdoing by DeLay under the election statute, he could only pass on the information to Healey with a recommendation that he pursue the matter.

Earle has not done so, several sources said yesterday, but has until the end of this month to decide the matter under a three-year statute of limitations.

The grand jury singled out two contributions that it said the committee illegally accepted -- a $20,000 contribution from AT&T Corp. on Nov. 18, 2002, and a $100,000 contribution from the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care Inc. on Oct. 24, 2002. The latter donation generated considerable controversy in Texas political circles after local newspapers reported that state Rep. Tom Craddick accepted it in a white envelope from the head of a large Texas nursing home chain during a meeting at a Houston restaurant.

Craddick's attorney, Roy Q. Minton, said that Craddick -- who was later elected speaker of the House and in that role oversaw the redrawing of congressional districts -- immediately passed the check along to TRMPAC. "Just because the guy happens to be speaker of the House does not mean it's against the law," Minton said.

Terry Scarborough, an attorney for TRMPAC before it formally went out of business this summer, declined to comment on the committee's indictment. Four additional indictments by the grand jury separately accused the Texas Association of Business with accepting additional illegal corporate funds and coordinating its expenditure with TRMPAC. Attorneys for the association have denied wrongdoing.

Political Committee Formed By DeLay Is Indicted (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

AUSTIN, Tex., Sept. 8 (AP) - A grand jury has indicted a political organization formed by the House majority leader, Representative Tom DeLay, accusing it of taking illegal corporate money as he helped Republicans win control of the Texas Legislature and keep control of Congress.

Mr. DeLay, a Republican, was not indicted by a Travis County grand jury in the charges made public Thursday, although three of his political associates were charged earlier.

District Attorney Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, said he had no jurisdiction over Mr. DeLay's personal conduct. Kevin Madden, Mr. DeLay's spokesman, said the majority leader played only a limited role in the organization, Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee. Mr. DeLay served on its advisory board and appeared at fund-raising events, Mr. Madden said.

A complaint filed last year with the House ethics committee said Mr. DeLay's activities with political action committees violated House rules, but the panel deferred action on the complaint.

The charge against Texans for a Republican Majority accuses it of illegally accepting a contribution of $100,000 from the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care and of $20,000 from AT&T. A prominent statewide business group, the Texas Association of Business, was also charged, in what Mr. Earle called an effort to funnel "massive amounts of secret corporate wealth" into Texas political campaigns.

State law prohibits use of corporate contributions to advocate election or defeat of state candidates.

No individuals in the business group were indicted.

The indictments accuse the Texas Association of Business and the political action committee of working together in a complicated scheme to circumvent state law.

Four indictments against the Texas Association of Business include charges of unlawful political advertising, unlawful contributions to a political committee and unlawful expenditures like those to a graphics company and political candidates.

The association, which is influential at the Texas Capitol, spent about $1.7 million in corporate money for mailings in 2002. The group said it was trying to educate voters on issues, which is legal, not advocate the election or defeat of any candidates.

A lawyer for the association, Roy Minton, said it acted under protections of the First Amendment, which "gives individuals and their businesses the absolute right to inform the public of the conduct of our elected officials and the conduct of candidates for public office."

Last fall, the grand jury indicted three officials of Texans for a Republican Majority: John Colyandro of Austin, and Jim Ellis and Warren Robold of Washington, D.C. All are now awaiting trial.

Texas Groups Linked To DeLay Indicted In Scandal (REU-Y2)

By Erwin Seba

Reuters, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004040

A Texas grand jury has indicted a political action committee formed by U.S. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay as well as a powerful business group on charges they violated the state's campaign finance laws, officials said on Thursday.

The indictments, five in all, accuse Texans for a Republican Majority, or TRMPAC, and the Texas Association of Business (TAB) of illegally funneling corporate donations into a 2002 campaign to win control of the Texas Legislature.

DeLay helped create the committee, but he has not been charged with any wrongdoing, and has said he was not involved in TRMPAC's daily operations.

A statement from his office on Thursday said he met with Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle last week and explained his limited role in the committee.

"Today's announcement is limited to a political organization and does not affect Mr. DeLay," the statement said.

Three men with close ties to DeLay were indicted last year for illegal fund-raising activities by TRMPAC.

In a civil case earlier this year, a Texas judge found that TRMPAC did not disclose nearly $600,000 it received from corporations.

Texas law forbids the use of corporate donations in political campaigns.

Earle has said DeLay is under investigation and a spokesman for him said on Thursday the investigation into illegal campaign finances continues.

In a statement, Earle said, "All five of these indictments involve the misuse of corporate money to influence Texas elections in 2002."

"They contain allegations that TAB and TRMPAC worked together in a complicated scheme to circumvent the election code by funneling massive amounts of secret corporate wealth into elections," he said.

TRMPAC's efforts helped Republicans capture the Texas Legislature for the first time since the Reconstruction era after the U.S. Civil War.

The shift led to a remapping of the state's congressional districts which ultimately increased the Republican majority in the U.S. House.

DeLay has been under fire over ethics questions involving fund raising, foreign travel and his relationship with lobbyists.

TAB's attorney Roy Minton said the organization did not violate the law and was merely exercising its free speech rights under the U.S. Constitution's First Amendment.

"At no time did the TAB endorse any candidate, seek any political contribution or campaign expenditure," Minton said.

Missouri Senators Want To Close Loophole For Sexual Predators (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - Missouri's senators want to close a legal loophole they say allowed a Missouri judge to throw out a conviction of a sexual predator.

Sens. Kit Bond and Jim Talent, both Republicans, introduced a bill Thursday that makes it a crime to solicit sex online from a minor even if the person solicited is an undercover agent over 18.

The move is a response to the case of Jan P. Helder, a Mission Hills, Kan., attorney accused of using an Internet chat service to solicit sex from someone he believed to be a 14-year-old girl.

A federal jury convicted Helder, 42, but U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple in Kansas City threw out the verdict last month, saying Helder could not be guilty because the person he communicated with online was actually an undercover Platte County detective.

Whipple's decision outraged children's advocates who worried it could curb the success of such Internet stings. Undercover agents typically pose as minors, waiting for sex offenders to make contact and arrange in-person meetings.

"This may in the minds of predators create a loophole and I think we should try and plug that loophole as quickly as possible by any means possible," Talent said.

Don Ledford, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Todd Graves in Kansas City, said the government plans to appeal Whipple's decision. Ledford said the office would have no other comment on the decision or the legislation because the case is pending.

At least four federal appeals courts have rejected the type of defense used by Helder, but those decisions are not binding on Whipple. The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Missouri, has not yet addressed the issue.

Under the change proposed by Bond and Talent, federal law would expressly provide that communicating with a law enforcement officer pretending to be a child is not a defense. Such language is already included in state law in Missouri.

"If there is a hole in the law that needs to be fixed in order to protect our children from predators, we must act now," Bond said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0004041

Kansas Rep. Jim Ryun has written a letter urging the Justice Department to appeal Whipple's ruling, saying it is contrary to a number of other court cases.

"If permitted to stand, the practical impact of such a ruling would have devastating consequences for prosecutions of child predators who troll the Internet looking for children to entice and ultimately harm," Ryun said in the letter.

City To Request A Federal Audit (PSDS)

By Nelsy Rodriguez, The Desert Sun

Palm Springs (CA) Desert Sun, September 8, 2005

DESERT HOT SPRINGS - The Desert Hot Springs City Council voted unanimously to ask the U.S. Department of Justice to look into the city's accounts for the past five years.

Interim City Manager Corky Larson said she was approached by city residents in the past month who suggested that the city - growing fast, but struggling with City Hall openness and budget issues - ask for a Department of Justice forensic audit.

"If there's a concern out there hopefully there won't be a problem, but if there is, then we'll find it," Larson said.

The council, meeting in closed session for about two hours, took the vote then and and reported it during a public session that ran late into the night.

Councilman Hank Hohenstein made the motion for the vote, and it was seconded by Will Pieper, interim city attorney Toni Eggebraaten said.

Asked what types of things the citizens asked for the Department of Justice to look at, Larson said one example might be building fees, but she would not elaborate.

Desert Hot Springs - exploding with residential growth - has in recent years been collecting millions in building fees, which are required by state law to be deposited in particular city accounts.

Any audit performed would check all revenue and expense flows for the city, receipts, contracts and ensure that any fees associated with planning and building the thousands of new homes going up in the scenic city at the base of the mountains were sent to the appropriate budget accounts.

During a break in the meeting Wednesday night, Larson said she would write the letter to the Department of Justice today.

Larson, an attorney and retired Riverside County Supervisor after whom the Riverside County Larson Justice Center is named, said she didn't know how long a Department of Justice investigation would take.

"Knowing the federal government, it could take a while," Larson said.

Larson said the citizens - not city staff or councilmembers - who approached her suggested the Department of Justice as opposed to another type of audit.

"That was their suggestion. We might as well take advantage of this service," she said.

The Department of Justice investigation vote was just one controversial issue on the agenda for the meeting, which was packed with citizens, some carrying signs demanding a recall of some city council members.

Also in the mix for the meeting were:

The planned presentation of recall papers to Vice Mayor Mary Stephens and Hohenstein, by a group led by citizen Patrick Gillespie;

An unusual vote that would make retired city manager Jerry Hanson's final contract null and void;

Discussion in closed session of two candidates for Hanson's job, known only as "Candidate A" and "Candidate B" in a Labor Day public forum for residents.

The city of 19,500 residents has been embroiled in controversy over the compensation for Hanson, who retired July 31.

Hanson questions In addition to Hanson's 10 employment contracts since 2003, which he wrote himself and which garnered him 1,700 hours of vacation and sick time compensation in 20 months, questions have been raised about his land holdings near the $1 billion StoneRidge development he negotiated for the city.

A Riverside County grand jury is reviewing testimony and has been sent three requests for investigations into city matters, including a request about Hanson's contracts, a request about Hanson's possible conflict of interest in land holdings and a request about Hohenstein's possible conflict of interest on his vote to approve StoneRidge.

If the final consultant's contract is not rejected and the benefits on the contract rack up, Desert Hot Springs would have to pay Hanson every month until 2008:

$7,725 for a minimum of 15 hours of work a week;

$1,128 for use-only vacation;

$1,030 for an additional eight hours of vacation a month;

$1,030 for an additional eight hours of annual leave a month;

$2,000 for a monthly deferred compensation;

$760 for health and dental insurance;
$675 for monthly expenses;
$265 for a 100-gallons gasoline stipend;
$578 for monthly payment on a $200,000 whole life insurance policy;
$27.27 for education and training; organization and membership fees to be paid without limit;
$850 for office supplies and equipment; and
a one-time $40,000 "golden handshake."

On top of that, the contract contains a clause that, as written, assures Hanson would receive approximately $16,320 a month for his retirement.

Worded as "All current or future PERS contributions required to provide the Employee/ Consultant his most recent PERS estimates for PERS retirement benefits shall be paid by the City."

The "most recent PERS estimate" was valued at approximately $20,000.

However, upon reviewing un-accounted for pay raises by as much as 87 percent in 2004, CalPERS determined Hanson would only receive $3,680.

Meaning, the difference "shall be paid by the City."

In a letter to CalPERS, Hanson requested the agency re-review his retirement allowance, saying his work of pulling the city out of bankruptcy, working in excess of 3,000 hours a year, holding five positions and being a licensed engineer and architect are deserving of a larger retirement.

"The majority of the City Council wanted me to continue on after my contract expiration in Feb. 12, 2005," Hanson wrote in the letter dated Aug. 15. "I only resigned as city manager due to vicious and deceptive politics in the local media damaging mine and my family's good name."

Hanson's attorney, Edward Kotkin, was unavailable for comment Wednesday afternoon.

The media scrutiny began in March when the city confirmed to all media outlets that he earned $322,809 in 2004 (the same year he drafted an 87 percent pay increase into his contract and passed it unanimously through the City Council) after his W-2 tax form was leaked to a local TV news channel.

The scrutiny continued as The Desert Sun then reported in April that Hanson bought property along a road that he later negotiated $600,000 worth of street improvements as a condition for recommending the City Council approve an upscale housing development.

Recall drive Angered by Hanson's generous contracts, especially his final consultant's contract, citizens in the city that just emerged from a three-year bankruptcy have obtained the initial signatures on formal recall forms for the councilmembers who voted for the contracts consistently.

A group of citizens led by Patrick Gillespie has promised to present Stephens and Hohenstein with recall papers. The two were among those voting to approve Hanson's final contract, which appears to guarantee that the city will pay $195,000 a year for life in retirement benefits the state has refused to pay in addition to $180,000 a year through Feb. 2006 even if Hanson performs no work.

The median annual income in

Desert Hot Springs is about $29,500 a year.

Once the recall papers are filed and initial signatures are verified, recall supporters must obtain about 1,800 valid signatures for the recall to take place.

Orange County Deputy Sheriff Arrested (ORS)

Pedro Ruz Gutierrez Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, September 9, 2005

An Orange County deputy sheriff indicted on federal embezzlement charges was arrested today by deputy U.S. marshals and relieved of duty without pay, authorities said.

Deputy Tawanda McNeil, a four-year veteran, was assigned to the agency's uniform patrol division in the agency's Sector 2, which covers east Orange County.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando said a federal grand jury indicted McNeil on Wednesday on 18 counts of embezzlement related to payments she erroneously received when the U.S. military called her up for duty.

McNeil was not activated and was not entitled to the the payments, said Carolyn Adams, chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Orlando.

The amounts covered by the indictment total about $23,000.

DOJ_NMG_0004043

Red Lake Seeks Items Seized By FBI (MINNST)

By Chuck Haga, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 9, 2005

Red Lake's school district has gone to federal court to seek recovery of documents and equipment seized by the FBI during its investigation of the March 21 shootings on the reservation, in part to protect itself against potential liability lawsuits.

In a motion filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis, the district said it needs the return of security video footage, education records of shooter Jeffrey Weise, witness statements of district employees and computer hard drives, among other things.

Those materials are "crucial," according to the filing, for the district to evaluate its security system and procedures in effect on March 21 "and to defend against likely lawsuits."

A spokesman for the clerk of court's office confirmed that it had received documents from the district's attorney.

It had not been determined whether the motion would be filed as part of the ongoing juvenile proceeding or as a separate matter.

After seizing the school district materials, the computers and other personal possessions of some Red Lake students, the U.S. attorney's office arrested one other student -- Louis Jourdain, son of Red Lake Tribal Chairman Floyd Jourdain Jr. -- and subpoenaed other students to appear before a federal grand jury.

A judge late last month ruled that Louis Jourdain, who was 16 at the time of the shootings, should be tried as a juvenile. Prosecutors have not said what Jourdain is accused of doing, but a source with knowledge of the case has said the boy is charged with conspiracy to commit murder.

Shamus O'Meara, a Twin Cities attorney who represents the Red Lake district, said that no suits stemming from the shootings have been filed against the district, but that two law firms "representing at least 18 families and individuals" have advised it they're considering liability suits.

"The district faces the very likely prospect of being involved in litigation with multiple plaintiffs," O'Meara said.

"We are respectful of the federal role in this [case] and its investigation," he said. "But there shouldn't be competing interests here. There should be a way to balance the interests of the federal government with the district's interest in [conducting] a complete evaluation."

He said the school district "has tried on several occasions" to obtain the return of the materials, which were seized in the days immediately after the school shootings, in which Weise, 16, killed eight people, including himself. Weise had killed two others before going to the school.

The federal investigators "basically told us to seek access to the materials through the Freedom of Information Act," O'Meara said. "We did that, and it was denied.

"From the district's perspective, this is a last resort. We hope that when the U.S. attorney's office gets a chance to read our motion, they'll give us a call and work this out."

U.S. Attorney Thomas Heffelfinger said late Thursday that he had not seen the district's motion and could not comment.

A thorough investigation into the security arrangements the district had in place on March 21 "is particularly important," according to the district's filing, "because certain individuals have criticized the district's camera system in place at the time."

The district "also has been unable to investigate Jeff Weise's psychological and educational records to determine the extent of the information in the district's possession prior to the incident."

In an affidavit with the filing, Red Lake Superintendent Stuart Desjarlait noted that the FBI has returned several of the district's computers, "but without hard drives."

Weise's student records sought by the district include records maintained during the 2004-05 school year by his instructor in a homebound program "and, possibly, a report involving Jeff Weise authored by a psychiatrist from Indian Health Services," according to the filing.

FBI Pressed To Share Red Lake Evidence (STPPP)

By JIM RAGSDALE, Pioneer Press

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 9, 2005

The Red Lake School District, facing hundreds of workers' compensation claims from employees and the possibility of multiple lawsuits, is seeking to view a complete video record of a student's killing spree at Red Lake High School as well as the killer's academic and psychological records.

DOJ_NMG_0004044

Those materials, the district said in a motion filed on Thursday, were among the items seized by the FBI immediately after the March 21 shootings. Eight people died at the school, including the shooter, 16-year-old student Jeff Weise, who took his own life. Seven were injured. Weise had killed his grandfather and his grandfather's partner at home before assaulting the school.

Shamus O'Meara, a Minneapolis attorney who is representing the school district in the shootings and expected legal claims, said federal officials have declined to make the materials available, and he has failed at attempts to use freedom-of-information laws to view them.

"There is an immediate need to thoroughly review the District's security system to ensure the protection of staff and students from incidents of violence," the school district said in its motion. The district is asking a federal judge to allow the district to view the materials.

U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is leading the criminal investigation into the shootings, said he had not yet reviewed the papers and could not comment on the district's request. The criminal case against a second 16-year-old student, Louis Jourdain, suspected of helping plot the assault is still pending.

According to the district's court filings, video cameras in the school recorded what a technician described as "graphic and detailed incidents of the murder scene." The district retained a copy, but it is a shortened version without all the available camera angles, O'Meara said, and the district wants to view copies held by federal investigators.

The school district said it is also seeking access to educational records for Weise, who was at home that day on the school's homebound instruction program. Included in the district's request are records from the teacher who visited Weise at home during the school year. The district also said it believes the FBI has a psychiatrist's report on Weise.

"The district's perspective is that these are important items of information to have so that we can cogently speak to the issues of security, with the school board, with the district staff, as well as the community," O'Meara said. "Without them, we simply have not done the job we need to do to fully evaluate that system."

In the court papers, the district said "several hundred workers' compensation claims" have been filed against the district over the shootings. The papers suggested that many lawsuits are possible, and said groups of victims' families, school employees and parents of students in one classroom all are consulting attorneys.

O'Meara is also representing the Rocori school district in the aftermath of a school shooting that killed two students at Rocori High School in September 2003. He said in that case, materials were made available by the state to the school district under a judge's order, which prohibited copying or public dissemination of some documents.

The court papers filed by the school district say federal agents seized dozens of school computers and were given maps and blueprints of the school, a student directory with parents' phone numbers, attendance on the day of the shooting and locker combinations for each student.

Jim Ragsdale can be contacted at jragsdale@pioneerpress.com or 651-228-5529.

Student Jeff Weise, 16, took his life March 21 after killing 10 people in Red Lake, Minn.

Man Gets Prison Over Child Porn (TUSCCIT)

By HEIDI ROWLEY, Tucson Citizen

Tucson Citizen, September 9, 2005

A Tucson martial arts instructor has been sentenced to 2.5 years in federal prison for possessing hundreds of child pornography images.

David Michael Lader, 41 will also be fined $30,000 followed by lifetime supervised release with sex offender conditions, a U.S. Attorney's Office news release said. He was ordered to provide a DNA sample.

Lader pleaded guilty to possessing more than 300 child pornography images on his home computer. Many were acquired over the Internet and involved children younger than 12, officials said. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents arrested him in April 2004. Lader, who is not in custody, must surrender to U.S. marshals Oct. 12.

In delivering the sentence yesterday, U.S. District Judge Raner Collins noted that at the time of the crime, Lader was a registered sex offender yet was teaching children and adults.

He worked at the Tucson Racquet & Fitness Club and through The Dojang martial arts school, according to Tucson Citizen archives.

Lader has two misdemeanor indecent exposure convictions in Ohio from 1992, the Citizen previously reported.

Rural Vs. City Ways At Issue In A Wisconsin Murder Trial (NYT)

By Gretchen Ruethling

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004045

MADISON, Wis., Sept. 8 - A jury was chosen in this liberal bastion on Thursday for the trial of a Hmong immigrant charged with killing six hunters, causing consternation in the North Woods, where the shootings took place.

Some residents of Rice Lake, where all the victims lived or grew up, said they were concerned that the jurors from Dane County, which encompasses Madison, might not grasp the nuances of rural life.

"They are not as rural, and their culture and their lifestyle is quite different from ours up here in the north," said Renee Gralewicz, an ethnic studies instructor at the Rice Lake campus of the University of Wisconsin. "So we might have some people who really don't understand the culture of hunting and the etiquette and the ethics and how all of that plays out on the jury."

Judge Norman L. Yackel of Sawyer County Circuit Court ruled in June that the jury for the trial of the immigrant, Chai Soua Vang, would be chosen from Dane County after the defense argued that publicity and strong emotions in the Rice Lake area jeopardized Mr. Vang's chances for a fair trial.

The concern about the composition of the jury stems in part from the racial overtones of the case. Mr. Vang, 36, a refugee from Laos who lived in St. Paul, Minn., told police that he had been sitting in a tree stand on private hunting land about 25 miles northeast of Rice Lake one Sunday last November when the hunters, who were white, swore at him and used ethnic slurs.

Mr. Vang said he shot at the hunters after someone shot at him first.

"The rest of the group scramble for something at the ATV so I shot them at the ATV and ran toward them because I thought that they will get something a gun to shoot me," Mr. Vang wrote in a letter from jail to a reporter for The Chicago Tribune. The letter has been admitted as evidence in the case. "I feel that this incident is happen because people are not able to treated others with respect like they want to be treated and hatred toward other people or race."

One survivor told the police that Mr. Vang fired first.

Hmong hunters have complained of harassment from white hunters, some of whom point to a different hunting culture as the root of the problem. Many residents in Rice Lake, which is 230 miles northwest of Madison and has a population of 8,300, dispute the claim that racial tensions have been high in the area.

Larry Jarvela, 60, the mayor of Rice Lake, said he thought people from the city, especially non-hunters, might have a hard time understanding the context of the incidents and hunting culture.

As to residents' reaction to the jury selection, he said, "I don't think they necessarily like it, but I think on the other hand they understand why it had to be done."

Dan Rassbach, who is organizing construction of a park in Rice Lake in honor of the slain hunters, said there was concern about lifestyle differences between people in Dane and Sawyer counties. "The hope is that they will understand the situation," he said. "If all the facts are presented, it should come out to be a fair verdict."

The 10 women and 4 men, all white, who were selected for the jury on Thursday will be sequestered during the trial, which starts on Saturday and is expected to last less than two weeks. Mr. Vang is charged with six counts of intentional first-degree homicide and three counts of attempted homicide. He has pleaded not guilty to all counts.

The Madison area is known as more liberal, diverse and Democratic than many other parts of the state, a reputation that comes in part from the students and faculty at the University of Wisconsin, who come from around the country and the world.

"It is indeed part of Wisconsin's general political culture that Madison is regarded as distinct from the rest of the state," said Dennis Dresang, a professor of political science at the university.

University students and faculty members were vocal critics of Senator Joseph R. McCarthy in the 1950's and also organized a strong antiwar movement during the Vietnam War.

Donald Downs, another political science professor at the university, said Wisconsinites tended to consider people in the Madison area elite and better educated than people from other parts of the state, and he said hunting was less prevalent there than in northern Wisconsin.

About 130 potential jurors came to court for jury selection on Thursday. Some 200 jurors had already been dismissed based on written answers to more than 60 questions in a questionnaire over the past few weeks.

During the process, Mr. Vang sat quietly in a dark green suit, white shirt and tie. Four of his family members were watching from a television monitor in another courtroom but would not talk to members of the media.

Judge Yackel said many jurors indicated in the questionnaires that they had heard about the case, and he asked them to put aside that information. "I guess what we're asking you to do is unring a bell," he said at the beginning of the selection. "That may be difficult for some and impossible for others."

Nine jurors were excused during the selection process because they said they had a conflict of interest or would not be able to separate prior knowledge of the case to make a judgment based solely on evidence.

Peg Lautenschlager, the state attorney general who is prosecuting the case at the request of Sawyer County, asked potential jurors about their experiences with weapons, confrontation, violence and hunting.

DOJ_NMG_0004046

Jonathan Smith, one of Mr. Vang's lawyers, focused on his client's presumed innocence and asked whether jurors could be objective in light of intense media coverage of the incident.

"Does everyone agree that Mr. Vang as he sits here this morning is presumed innocent?" Mr. Smith asked. "Does anyone have a fear of turning in a verdict of acquittal?"

Mr. Smith also said Mr. Vang's race should not enter into the deliberations and asked potential jurors if that or the number of charges would influence their objectivity.

Mr. Vang's lawyers are expected to argue self-defense, having ruled out a mental illness defense, and they have asked the judge to provide the jury with a legal definition of the term.

Mr. Vang faces life in prison if convicted.

CIVIL LAW:

Bush Loses Appeal On Base Closings (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 (AP) - The Bush administration lost a last-minute bid on Thursday to persuade the Supreme Court to intervene and protect a federal panel's recommendations for the closing and realignment of military bases.

Judges in Connecticut and Tennessee had blocked the panel from recommending changes at local Air National Guard bases, and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg on Thursday rejected the administration's request for intervention. Another appeal could be filed later and handled by the full court.

Solicitor General Paul Clement said in a court filing that disorder was undermining the work of the president and the commission that recommended the closings.

By law, the commission had until Thursday to send its final report to the president, who had pledged to send it to Congress without changes. Congress would then have 45 days to block it.

Justice Ginsburg, noting that the federal appeals court in New York was dealing with the same case, said, "This court should not short-circuit the normal review process absent a showing of irreparable harm stronger than that presented here."

Justice Ginsburg handles appeals from the New York court.

White House Gets Base-Closing Recommendations (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The base-closing commission submitted its recommendations to the White House last night after withdrawing proposed changes at an Air National Guard base in Connecticut.

What was to have been a routine paperwork delivery of those proposals to President Bush was threatened by a cross-country legal fight.

Judges in Connecticut and Tennessee blocked the panel from recommending changes at local Air National Guard bases. The Tennessee decision was overruled by an appeals court yesterday afternoon, but the Connecticut injunction stood.

Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg rejected the Bush administration's request for intervention in the Connecticut case.

The Base Closure and Realignment Commission, which was bound by law to send its report to the president by yesterday, withdrew the portion of the report recommending the realignment of Connecticut's 103rd Fighter Wing. The plan would have moved jets from Connecticut's Bradley Air National Guard Base to Massachusetts.

The commission said it would restore the recommendation if the Connecticut court's injunction "is later vacated, reversed, stayed or otherwise withdrawn."

Separately, Illinois, Missouri and New Jersey lost emergency Supreme Court appeals intended to stop the commission from sending the report to the president. Facilities in those states are among hundreds targeted by the panel for closure or consolidation in the first round of base closings in a decade.

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, the administration's Supreme Court attorney, said the court should safeguard the work of the president and a commission that has spent five months on a plan to restructure domestic military bases to save billions of dollars.

The president has said he will probably pass the commission's final report on to Congress without changes, but he still could reject it or send it back to the commission for more changes. Copies of the report will be delivered this morning to

DOJ_NMG_0004047

Congress and the Defense Department. After Congress receives the report from the president, lawmakers will have 45 days to block it, although they have never rejected reports in base-closing rounds.

Ginsburg said a federal appeals court in New York was dealing with the Connecticut case and "this court should not short-circuit the normal review process absent a showing of irreparable harm stronger than that presented here." Ginsburg handles appeals from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit.

The Supreme Court dealt with a flurry of paperwork yesterday, a day after the funeral for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Lawyers representing Sen. Jon S. Corzine (D) and other New Jersey officials said they wanted a reprieve to appeal the decision to close Fort Monmouth.

Missouri Attorney General Jay Nixon asked the high court to protect an Air National Guard unit in St. Louis, and Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D) challenged plans to move National Guard fighter jets.

Clement had argued for the government that a Connecticut judge was out of line Wednesday in barring the commission from recommending changes at an Air National Guard base in that state.

In other base-closing lawsuits, a Massachusetts judge yesterday rejected the state's efforts to protect the Otis Air National Guard Base. Like several other states, Massachusetts argued that changes to their National Guard units or bases must be approved by governors.

Caremark Pays $137.5M To Settle Case (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, September 8, 2005

Sep. 8, 2005 - Pharmacy benefits manager Caremark and the Justice Department agreed Thursday to a $137.5 million settlement of lawsuits originally filed by whistleblowers claiming a predecessor company received kickbacks affecting several federal health care programs.

Nashville-based Caremark Rx Inc. admitted no wrongdoing in making the settlement, which was approved by a Philadelphia federal court Thursday.

The lawsuits were filed in 2002 under the whistleblower provisions of the Federal False Claims Act by three former executives of AdvancePCS Inc., a Texas-based pharmacy benefits manager that Caremark acquired in March 2004. The Justice Department joined the lawsuits after they were filed.

The lawsuits contended AdvancePCS took kickbacks from drug manufacturers to give their products favorable treatment under contracts with the Federal Employees Health Benefit Program, the Mailhandlers Health Benefit Program, Medicare+Choice and other government programs.

The court filings also charged that AdvancePCS paid existing and potential customers kickbacks to sign pharmacy benefits management contracts. All the allegations date to before Caremark took over AdvancePCS.

"Caremark and the marketplace were aware of this situation prior to our acquisition of AdvancePCS," Caremark CEO Mac Crawford said in a statement. "We are pleased with the settlement with the Federal Government as it allows us to avoid the expense, uncertainty and distraction of potentially time-consuming litigation."

Shares of Caremark closed down 39 cents at $48.26 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The False Claims Act allows private citizens to sue individuals and companies they believe have defrauded the government.

"Each of our clients came forward because they thought it was the right thing to do to improve the PBM industry," said W. Scott Simmer, a partner with Robins, Kaplan, Miller & Ciresi and lead counsel to the three plaintiffs. "They put their careers and their families on the line and are delighted with the result in this case."

Not dismissed by the settlement are whistleblower claims on behalf of 10 states: California, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Also pending against Caremark is a separate Justice Department and whistleblower lawsuit alleging the company did not appropriately repay Medicaid and other federal health insurance programs. Caremark has denied those claims.

U.S. Senate Panel OKs Asbestos Subpoena Power (REU-Y2)

By Susan Cornwell

Reuters, September 9, 2005

A Senate committee on Thursday gave its leaders authority to subpoena information from companies facing asbestos lawsuits as lawmakers work on legislation creating a $140 billion fund for asbestos victims.

The unanimous voice vote gave Judiciary Committee leaders authority to subpoena information about how much companies would expect to contribute to the privately financed fund.

DOJ_NMG_0004048

The panel's chairman, Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), told members he did not know if subpoenas would be necessary, but he wanted "a little muscle" in case companies continued to resist producing the data.

Although the proposed bill has a formula for industry contributions, based on a company's size and prior asbestos expenditures, many companies are reluctant to discuss how it would affect them, saying the information could expose them to more lawsuits.

Specter said he hopes to bring the bill to the Senate floor the first week of October. Aides said the industry information could be used to make changes necessary to build Senate support for the bill.

Without the sought-after information, the bill is "in peril," committee Republican Texas Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record) warned as he applauded the subpoena power authorization.

Specter and the ranking Democrat on the panel, Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, have been seeking more data from the industry for months to answer colleagues' questions about the asbestos compensation fund legislation, which they are co-sponsoring.

Some senators in both parties say they cannot back the bill unless they know how much each company would pay into the fund. Some worry the costs will be unequally distributed or that there simply will not be enough money contributed to pay claims.

"The committee has been woefully underinformed about both the costs and funding of this bill," Cornyn said in a statement. "Without the necessary information, and without the ability to meet the funding requirements, this bill is in peril."

Asbestos, widely used for fireproofing and insulation until the 1970s, has been linked to cancer, and hundreds of thousands of injury claims have bankrupted dozens of U.S. companies.

Specter and Leahy's bill, approved by the judiciary panel in May, would halt the lawsuits and pay claims from a fund financed by asbestos defendant companies and their insurers.

U.S. Prosecutors Allege Safety Violations By American Airlines (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-American Airlines put its passengers at risk and violated multiple U.S. air-safety regulations in 2003 by allowing one of its jets to fly with a leaky fuel tank, according to a civil complaint filed by the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn.

The complaint, which was made public on Thursday, seeks more than $1 million (â,¬800,000) in penalties against the airline.

Tim Wagner, a spokesman for American's parent company AMR Corp., declined to discuss the complaint, saying lawyers for the Fort Worth, Texas-based airline had not had a chance to review it.

The complaint alleges that on Nov. 17, 2003, a Federal Aviation Administration inspector was a passenger on an American flight from Orlando, Florida, to New York's La Guardia Airport when he saw fuel leaking from a wing of the McDonnell Douglas MD-82.

The inspector warned the flight crew about the leak and demanded it be recorded in the aircraft's maintenance log. However, "no such entry was made by the pilot or maintenance personnel," the complaint said.

American allowed the "unsafe and un-airworthy" jet to take 53 commercial flights over two weeks before it was repaired during a regularly scheduled maintenance check, the complaint said.

During that period, the "aircraft was operated in a careless and reckless manner so as to endanger the life or property of another," the complaint said.

Will The Supreme Court Unleash Civil RICO? (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 9, 2005

Many believe that the 1970 civil racketeering law was created to apply only to traditional Mafia-style criminals as a way to force them to pay for their criminal enterprise.

Over the years, interpretation of civil RICO (Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act) has evolved into a tug of war between the U.S. Supreme Court, which reads the law broadly to reach beyond the mob, and appellate courts, which have repeatedly curtailed plaintiffs' use of the act.

The notion that the law should only allow recovery for harm caused by organized crime members is a myth, said G. Robert Blakey, drafter of the original statute and a law professor at Notre Dame University.

"The mob was the occasion for RICO but it does not define its scope," he said. "When it was argued on the House and Senate floors, the principal spokesman said, 'No, it is not a mafia statute,'" Blakey said.

The welter of legal standards imposed by courts over the years has created a patchwork of splits in the circuits around the country. Despite this, the Supreme Court has been "vacillating in the degree to which it is willing to intervene to clarify," Blakey said.

But the new term may change that. The justices have granted review in two RICO cases, and the U.S. solicitor general is pushing for review of a third, while a fourth appeal is on the way.

In general, the cases raise important questions for the high court of how broadly civil RICO can be applied and what the scope of remedies is, according to Erwin Chemerinsky, a Duke University law professor who will argue on behalf of plaintiffs in one of the cases granted review.

CIVIL VS. CRIMINAL

Civil racketeering is intimately intertwined with its criminal counterpart. Criminal RICO law targets organizations that conspire to commit a pattern of crimes specified in the act, from murder and arson to mail fraud. Civil RICO allows victims of criminal racketeering to be compensated for their losses, although a criminal conviction is not necessary to make the civil claim.

Because RICO was modeled on antitrust law, successful private plaintiffs in RICO suits may recover treble damages. Civil RICO has become popular with civil attorneys because it also provides a longer statute of limitations, four years, and allows discovery going back as much as 10 years.

Blakey said that while district courts seem to find any excuse to throw out civil RICO cases, they do not do the same to criminal racketeering cases. The criminal sanctions have been used more often against political corruption than the mob, he said.

"Politicians have felt the full brunt of RICO and that doesn't bother me at all. We can live with a few Mafiosi, but a crooked politician affects everything," he said.

For the 2005 term, the high court has agreed to review the appropriateness of a national injunction prohibiting anti-abortion pickets from blockading abortion clinics, Scheidler v. National Organization for Women, No. 04-1244, and the Bank of China's effort to reinstate a $132 million RICO jury verdict against defendants accused of conspiring to cheat the bank through fraudulent loan deals, Bank of China, NY Branch v. NMB, No. 03-1559.

In addition, the solicitor general has asked the court to review a recent 2-1 decision by the U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, which eliminated the government's RICO remedy: forcing the tobacco industry to disgorge $280 billion it earned through alleged fraud by lying to the American people about the dangers of smoking.

That decision, in U.S. v. Philip Morris USA Inc., 396 F.3d 1190 (2005), conflicts with decisions in the 2nd and 5th circuits, Blakey said.

Both those decisions, U.S. v. Carson, 52 F.3d 1173 (2nd Cir. 1995) and Richard v. Hoechst Celanese Chem. Group Inc., 355 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 2003), authorize equitable disgorgement as a RICO remedy, wrote Edwin Kneedler, acting solicitor general.

Perhaps the most unusual of the four cases is one expected to reach the high court by November. It springs from a split between the 9th Circuit and the 7th and 11th circuits.

The 9th Circuit held in August that a convicted murderer can sue the Los Angeles Police Department as a racketeering enterprise, alleging that he was framed and falsely imprisoned by officers in what became known as the Ramparts scandal, Diaz v. Gates, No. 02-56818.

Ramparts refers to the police division where officers were accused of stealing drugs and framing hundreds of suspects on phony charges in 2000.

Traditionally, the injury to property may come in the form of a burned-out building, but in the case of David Diaz, his alleged injury -- false imprisonment by police -- hindered his ability to earn a living. The 9th Circuit said a loss or injury in employment can be considered an injury to property for purposes of civil RICO. That runs counter to an 11th Circuit decision denying damages sought by the relatives of FBI agents killed in a shootout with criminal suspects, Grogan v. Platt, 835 F.2d 844 (1988), and a 7th Circuit decision in Doe v. Roe, 958 F.2d 763 (1992), which held that economic losses flowing from personal injuries cannot be recovered using RICO.

While Diaz may have standing to get in the courthouse door, that does not mean his RICO will survive, the appeals court made clear. Whether his racketeering allegations are adequate "is a matter on which we express no view," the 7-4 unsigned opinion stated.

To Stephen Yagman, Los Angeles attorney for Diaz, the Supreme Court declared 20 years ago that civil RICO is "wide as the earth and high as the sky," starting with Sedima v. Imrex Co., 473 U.S. 479 (1985).

Judge Stephen Reinhardt, in a concurring opinion in Diaz, suggested that it is time for Congress to reconsider the breadth of the law. Starting with Sedima, racketeering law has been "stretched both in scope and meaning far beyond that which Congress originally intended," he said. "In my view, it is well past the time for our lawmakers to take another look at RICO and consider amending the statute so as to limit it to its original purpose."

DOJ_NMG_0004050

Dissenting Judge Ronald M. Gould warned that the Diaz majority would confer standing to sue on any plaintiff RICO-savvy enough to allege lost employment.

Whatever happens to Diaz, Yagman points out that there are 150 to 200 civil suits by prisoners stemming from the Ramparts police scandal, many with RICO claims. Those defendants may now keep those suits alive.

Los Angeles Deputy City Attorney Janet G. Bogigian said the city will appeal the 9th Circuit decision by November. Although she declined to discuss the case, her papers filed with the appeals court state that Diaz tried to "fashion an obstruction of justice allegation from his evidence of fabrication and witness tampering." It does not save his RICO case, she argued.

Chemerinsky speculated that it is possible the high court would accept the Diaz case. Notre Dame's Blakey was more doubtful. He called the Diaz case "factually unattractive." Nonetheless, he said, "I think the 9th Circuit is right and the 7th Circuit is wrong."

Chemerinsky said, "The brilliance of Diaz is that it uses a broad statute to deal with the social issue of police abuse. If it is ultimately upheld it gives another tool to plaintiffs' lawyers to gain compensation for police abuses," he said.

Blakey tried to debunk what he considers another myth about RICO, that broad reading of the law would open the floodgates to a spate of cases.

In the first decade after its passage, criminal RICO prosecutions accounted for fewer than 30 cases a year and usually went after traditional organized crime such as extortion, gambling or labor racketeering, according to a Vanderbilt University report in 1990.

In the early 1980s, a U.S. Supreme Court ruling that the profits from racketeering were subject to forfeitures from businesses and labor helped produce a rise in the use of the criminal law for major mafia prosecutions in New York; Chicago; Kansas City, Mo.; Cleveland; Philadelphia; and Boston.

RICO was also used in a Chicago prosecution of corrupt judges, in Seattle against a neo-Nazi group and South American drug traffickers, and against former Panamanian leader General Manuel Noriega. Then it began to be applied to white-collar crime, including insider trading and bank fraud in the 1980s savings and loan scandals.

Civil RICO cases remained nearly nonexistent until the 1990s, when the Supreme Court ruled for the second time that civil RICO has broad application.

Blakey said RICO applies to a pattern of unlawful behavior, not simply multiple uses of the mail or phones. One explanation for the slow growth in its use, he said, is that civil litigation and RICO litigation could be compared to the difference between an internist and a brain surgeon. RICO is extremely complex, he said.

And that may also account for judges and appellate courts continuing to throw up barriers to the broad application of civil RICO beyond traditional mobsters.

The civil statute states that "any person injured in his business or property by reason of a violation of section 1962 [racketeering] ... may sue ...

"What part of 'any' don't they understand?" asked Blakey. "The myth [of mob only application] is like a vampire. It has to have a stake driven through its heart over and over," he said.

Attorneys Brace For Impact Of New Bankruptcy Code (LAW)

By Peter Geier, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 9, 2005

The bankruptcy bar is bracing for the bumpy landing many practitioners expect when the new Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 touches down next month.

Most bankruptcy lawyers agree that the new code is highly complex and technical, that it will cause significant changes in consumer and business bankruptcy practice, and that it is so poorly drafted that it will take time for the courts to sort out its ambiguities.

Observers also warn that a law purportedly aimed at financially undisciplined consumers is sure to bear unintended consequences for entrepreneurs, independent contractors and self-employed people -- particularly innovators who use bankruptcy relief when caught in a lean business cycle.

Alan N. Resnick, a co-editor-in-chief of "Collier on Bankruptcy," a comprehensive 23-volume treatise on statutory and procedural bankruptcy law and a professor of bankruptcy law at Hofstra University School of Law in Hempstead, N.Y., said lawyers will have their hands full getting used to the changes.

"First and foremost for lawyers and practitioners is the learning curve. It's a very large bill, it's voluminous -- over 500 pages. Every time you look at the bill you see something else," said Resnick, also of counsel to the bankruptcy and restructuring department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson in New York and a member of the bankruptcy rules advisory committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He agrees with many other bankruptcy practitioners that the legislation, which becomes effective Oct. 17, is very poorly written and filled with ambiguities.

"I don't think there's any doubt that we will see a lot of litigation in the year to come over interpreting many ambiguities in these provisions. It needs a technical amendments bill to clean it up," Resnick said.

THE 'POSITIVES'

Among the "positives" of the new law are provisions protecting patients in nursing homes and health care facilities that file for bankruptcy, and a new Chapter 15 for cross-border cases based on the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Model Law on Cross- Border Insolvency, which is "a step in the right direction," he said.

Bankruptcy lawyers know that the new law will necessitate learning and improvising new strategies, but one aspect that has received little attention yet is the potential effect it will have on the practices of nonbankruptcy lawyers.

For instance, new provisions on how companies in bankruptcy must handle employee incentives, severance packages and retiree benefits are bound to influence how employee-benefits lawyers draft their clients' contracts. And provisions that make it more difficult to reorganize a single-asset real estate venture will be important to real estate attorneys, Resnick said.

John D. Penn, president of the American Bankruptcy Institute and a commercial bankruptcy attorney at Haynes and Boone in Fort Worth, Texas, said that despite heavy media coverage of the effect that the new law will have on consumers, "there are some very dramatic changes on the business side."

For the first time, goods purchased in the ordinary course of business and delivered within 20 days of the filing of the bankruptcy will count as administrative expense claims; that is, they will have a status on a par with legal fees, which generally are paid by the effective date of the reorganization plan, Penn said.

"This is particularly significant because there will be a lot of companies whose available assets simply won't support the cost of a bankruptcy and items delivered within the 20 days before the bankruptcy was filed. It means that in all likelihood, those companies will be on the auction block either right before they file or right after they file," he said.

Another significant rule change involves key employee-retention plans, or KERPs, which are financial incentives paid to certain employees to stay for prescribed time periods or events in the bankruptcy proceeding. It will result in companies no longer being able "to use financial incentives to keep employees on board, because [under the new rules] the ones who can leave, will leave," Penn said.

Commercial bankruptcy lawyers also have voiced concern about strict time limits that Congress imposed on the period during which companies in bankruptcy are allowed to assume or reject nonresidential real estate leases, as well as an 18-month cap on a debtor's exclusive period to file a reorganization plan.

"For the United [Airlines] that files after Oct. 17, if they want the debtor to remain in control [of the reorganization plan] after 18 months, they are going to have to work very quickly," Resnick said.

However, concern over such things as the new exclusivity provision is overstated in the view of Professor Robert M. Lawless, who teaches bankruptcy and corporate law at the William S. Boyd School of Law at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas.

"Tightening [the exclusivity period] and shortening it aren't going to matter too much. I don't think it matters now. If anyone had a good plan for United, I'm sure we would have heard about it by now," said Lawless, noting that the same was true of Eastern Airlines "10 to 12 years ago."

Lawyers and the public should be more concerned with "automatic dismissal triggers on the consumer side," as well as expanded grounds for dismissal of Chapter 11s "for failure to file just about any form," Lawless said.

But the central flaw of the legislation, he said, is that while the law is aimed at making corporate restructuring more efficient and irresponsible consumers more accountable, those who take the biggest hit are small businesses such as sole and family proprietorships, entrepreneurs, self-employed people and independent contractors.

In "The Myth of the Disappearing Business Bankruptcy," a study funded by the Kansas City, Mo.-based Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation that ran in the California Law Review in May, Lawless and co-author professor Elizabeth Warren of Harvard Law School argue that the new law is based on the incorrect premise that business bankruptcies account for only 2 percent of the total, whereas the figure is actually closer to about nine times that amount.

"What we have seen is that one in 7 consumers in bankruptcy court is actually there in connection with his or her own business. These folks are being made to fit into a bankruptcy system designed to deal with consumer problems. What you've got is the proverbial square pegs in a round hole," Lawless said.

"I think [the new law is] going to be a bad thing. I have said before that it's the poster child for campaign finance reform in that it is a law bought and paid for by the credit industry," he said.

CONSUMERS HURT?

DOJ_NMG_0004052

Henry J. Sommer, co-editor-in-chief of "Collier on Bankruptcy" and supervising attorney at the Consumer Bankruptcy Assistance Project, a pro bono bankruptcy legal assistance program based in Philadelphia, said that "there is no question that on the whole consumers are a good deal worse off" because the process will be "more expensive and more burdensome."

Bradford W. Botes, a partner at Bond & Botes, a multistate bankruptcy practice based in Birmingham, Ala., and a director on the board of the National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys, said that he doubted whether the new, "much more arduous, much more rigorous procedure" will provide benefits for creditors or anyone else.

"I am certain that it will make our practice more labor intensive, and that we will charge more money filing bankruptcies, which is unfortunate because most of the people who file have a hard enough time paying as it is," said Botes. He added that he expects simply "to file less cases and be compensated more for the cases we do file.

"It's ironic to me that a Republican Congress has created a lot more bureaucracy" by inserting provisions such as consumer bankruptcy filers having to undergo credit counseling before filing and credit education before a bankruptcy court discharges their cases, Botes said.

It further intrigues Botes that Congress should pick this particular time -- when the Internal Revenue Service and possibly other federal agencies "are investigating the credit consulting industry for violations of not-for-profit tax laws and using misleading language in advertising to the public" -- to include such requirements, he said, citing the AmeriDebt Inc. case.

In March, AmeriDebt, which the Federal Trade Commission had accused of misrepresenting itself as a nonprofit credit counseling organization, shut down its debt management operation as part of a settlement of an FTC civil action, which alleged that the company deceived consumers into paying at least $170 million in hidden fees.

Another irony is how a Republican Congress that is purportedly concerned about individuals' privacy and identity theft issues would include a provision that "any creditor can request tax returns from any debtor at any time," Botes said.

Richard B. Levin, a bankruptcy attorney in the Los Angeles office of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, said he that expects that in the near future the new legislation will make courts and lawyers very busy sorting out the bill's bad drafting, and "very, very busy when the next bankruptcy boom hits -- as it will, of course."

"Some people believe that the creditor lobby wanted to make war on the debtors by making war on their lawyers. What the legislation has done is make [filing for bankruptcy] more dangerous for lawyers and more expensive for consumers."

Pope Wants Head-of-State Immunity From Texas Suit (LAW)

By Brenda Sapino Jeffreys, Texas Lawyer

Law.com, September 9, 2005

Joseph Ratzinger, a defendant in a Texas suit filed before he was elected Pope Benedict XVI, wants to be dismissed from the litigation, arguing he has head-of-state immunity.

But lawyers for the three plaintiffs, who allege in the civil suit they were abused by a former seminary student in Houston, vow to challenge any suggestion of immunity issued by the U.S. Department of State in response to Ratzinger's request, a challenge that could put the immunity argument to a test.

"This is a case of first impression," says plaintiffs lawyer Tahira Kahn Merritt of Dallas.

"We shall see what the political arm of government does," says Daniel Shea, a solo practitioner in Houston who represents one of the plaintiffs in John Doe 1, et al. v The Archdiocese of Galveston-Houston, et al., which is pending before U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal in Houston.

"It's a legitimate political question," Shea says. "I would assume that they wouldn't make a decision on that without running it by the president of the United States."

According to a status report filed by Ratzinger on Aug. 23, the request remains under review before the State Department. Joanne Moore, a press officer for the State Department, says it does not comment on specific cases.

A lawyer for Ratzinger, Jeffrey S. Lena, a solo practitioner in Berkeley, Calif., says he cannot comment on the allegations in the suit or on the request for immunity. But in Ratzinger's Amended Motions to Dismiss, filed in May, the pope alleges he should be dismissed from the suit on several grounds, including his presumed immunity.

"Because Defendant is head of a recognized state, he is absolutely immune from the jurisdiction of the United States Courts," he says in the motion.

Ratzinger also says he should be dismissed from the suit on First Amendment grounds because the plaintiffs' claims would intrude on the internal working of the Roman Catholic Church and would require the court to interpret the meaning of religious documents and resolve issues of church governance.

Merritt, of Kahn Merritt & Allen, who represents two of the plaintiffs in the suit, says the judge should not grant Ratzinger's request for head-of-state immunity because the allegations against him relate to his actions while serving as head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith for the church.

DOJ_NMG_0004053

"He was the policeman that set doctrinal laws, basically, "You are bad, this is your penance,' " Merritt says.

As alleged in the complaint, Ratzinger "designed and explicitly directed" a conspiracy to fraudulently conceal tortious conduct in connection with the alleged sexual abuse of the three plaintiffs. In the complaint, the plaintiffs cite a 2001 letter that then-Cardinal Ratzinger sent to all bishops, reminding them that all proceedings against clerics accused of improprieties with minors under age 18 should be sent to the tribunal of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"It's basically all part of the conspiracy and cover up to get these files into a secret forum," Merritt alleges.

Ratzinger denies the allegations in John Doe 1 and asks to be dismissed as a defendant. So have the other defendants in the suit -- the Archdiocese of Galveston-Houston; Joseph A. Fiorenza, the bishop in the diocese; and a priest, William Pickard, who is described in the Plaintiffs' Original Complaint as a "vocational director" for the seminarian, Juan Carlos Patino-Arango. Patino-Arango is not represented by counsel, according to the docket report in the suit.

'NO PRIOR KNOWLEDGE'

In the original complaint in John Doe 1, the plaintiffs allege they were sexually abused in separate incidents in 1996 by Patino-Arango, a native of Colombia who was then a seminarian working at St. Francis de Sales Church in Houston. They allege in the complaint that after the parents of John Doe 1 reported to the archdiocese the alleged abuse on the part of Patino-Arango, he was moved to a "retreat house for abusive priests" in Houston, and later "secretly spirited" out of the country and sent back to Colombia.

Among other things, the plaintiffs bring breach of confidential relationship and conspiracy to breach a confidential relationship causes of action against all of the defendants, along with assault by offensive physical contact and conspiracy to commit sexual assault; intentional infliction of emotional distress and conspiracy to commit intentional infliction of emotional distress; fraud and fraudulent misrepresentation and conspiracy to commit fraud and fraudulent misrepresentation; and fraudulent concealment and conspiracy to fraudulently conceal.

They also bring sexual exploitation and conspiracy to commit sexual exploitation causes of action against all defendants except Ratzinger, and negligence and negligent misrepresentation involving risk of physical harm against all defendants except Patino-Arango.

They seek unspecified actual and punitive damages in the suit, which the plaintiffs originally filed in 2004 in state court in Houston. It was removed to federal court in 2005.

In the Defendants' Answer filed by the Texas defendants, they allege Patino-Arango was dismissed as a seminarian the day after the parents of one of the plaintiffs reported the alleged abuse, the diocese informed Children's Protective Services of the allegation and the diocese advised Patino-Arango that he could not leave the country while law enforcement investigated. The defendants also allege in the answer that three weeks after the initial report, in June 1996, police advised the diocese that Patino-Arango was "free to leave the country."

The diocese defendants allege in their answer that they had "no prior knowledge of any sexual misdeed by Patino and as soon as they learned of the allegation in this case, took swift, decisive action by dismissing him from seminary and all other activities in the Diocese."

Daniel Schick, a partner in Vinson & Elkins in Houston who represents all of the defendants except Ratzinger and Patino-Arango, says there was no conspiracy.

"The archdiocese did the right thing back in 1996 by reporting the allegation [from John Doe 1] to law enforcement, barring the perpetrator from any ministry and by reaching out at that time to the victim's family, and heard nothing more until the lawsuit was filed in 2004," Schick says.

Patino-Arango "was kept in Houston until law enforcement said that it was OK to allow him to return home to Colombia," Schick says.

SEPARATE COUNTRY

Schick says head-of-state immunity should apply to Ratzinger.

"There's been a long tradition in international law prohibiting suits against heads of state, and we as a matter of comity extend that to foreign heads of state. He absolutely is recognized by international law," Schick says.

But Shea, who studied to become a priest but is not ordained, contends that Ratzinger's immunity as a head of state is not automatic.

Jordan Paust, a professor at the University of Houston Law Center who teaches international law, says head-of-state immunity is not dictated by treaty.

"It's sort of a common-law notion," says Paust.

Paust says that U.S. courts, despite the separation of powers, often do follow a suggestion of immunity from the U.S. Department of State, but don't always do so. And he notes that the State Department doesn't always act on the requests for a suggestion of immunity.

"Sometimes they remain silent. Sometimes they expressly say they don't have a dog in this fight and sometimes they will file a formal suggestion of immunity with the court," he says.

If the State Department does suggest immunity for Ratzinger on head-of-state grounds, Shea says he's prepared to challenge it on constitutional grounds. He contends that the head of the Roman Catholic Church should not receive that immunity.

"This is not a suggestion of immunity [request] filed on behalf of the prime minister of Canada or the guy down in Venezuela or Tony Blair or even Jacques Chirac because there, there are no First Amendment church-state considerations," Shea says.

A lawyer for Ratzinger, Van Gardner, a partner in Houston's Hennessy, Gardner & Barth, did not return a telephone message seeking comment before presstime, and Lena, another lawyer for Ratzinger in John Doe 1, declines comment on the immunity issue.

However, a lawyer who represents the Archdiocese of Dallas says it's his view that immunity would apply to Ratzinger. Randal Mathis, a partner in Mathis & Donheiser in Dallas, says, "The Vatican is a separate country for purposes of this and the pope is the bishop of Rome and it's a separate entity from a diocese in another part of the world and a separate entity not only in the sense of church law, but in the sense of the law of any given country."

He says arguing otherwise ignores the reality of how the Roman Catholic Church is organized.

"It's kind of like the equivalent of suing President Bush because of something the local police department did wrong," Mathis says.

Schick says it doesn't matter that Ratzinger was sued before he became pope.

But Merritt says Ratzinger isn't being sued for his actions as pope, but instead in his former role as head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Dept. Settles Charges Against DCFD (WUSA-TV)

WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC, September 9, 2005

The Justice Department today announced a settlement agreement with the District of Columbia regarding pregnancy-related discrimination in the District's Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department (FEMSD).

The complaint alleged that individuals seeking employment as emergency medical technicians with the FEMSD were required to undergo a pre-hiring pregnancy test, with subsequent employment offers contingent on a negative test result. The complaint further alleged that, once hired, emergency medical technicians were advised by FEMSD management that any technician who became pregnant during her first year of employment would be in jeopardy of losing her job.

"Using pregnancy as a barrier to a woman's entry into the workplace and continued job security is illegal and inexcusable," said Bradley J. Schlozman, Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. "Forcing women to choose between their baby and their job clearly contravenes federal law and will not be tolerated by this Administration."

The three plaintiffs, all known as Jane Does, are emergency medical technicians employed by the D.C. Fire Department. The District required the plaintiffs, along with all other female applicants, to take a pregnancy test and obtain a negative result as a condition of employment. The plaintiffs tested negative for pregnancy and were hired. Upon reporting for duty, the plaintiffs attended a training class where a management official told the women in the class that if they became pregnant during their first year of employment, they were at risk of losing their jobs. Shortly after the training class, each plaintiff discovered she was pregnant. Because they had been threatened with losing their jobs if they became pregnant during the first year of employment, each woman terminated her pregnancy by abortion.

The United States intervened in the case and helped negotiate the three-year agreement, which was approved by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. The settlement agreement requires the District to affirm nondiscriminatory employment policies approved by the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs, implement training for supervisors on the rights of pregnant employees under Title VII, and regularly provide the United States with information concerning any new civil rights complaints. Additionally, the District agreed to compensate each of the Jane Does in the amount of $101,000 plus attorneys fees.

Jurors Acquit U.S. Border Officer In Civil Rights Case Filed By Tourist (AP)

By CAROLYN THOMPSON

AP, September 8, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004055

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) - Homeland Security officer was found not guilty Thursday of beating a female Chinese tourist.

Jurors deliberated about five hours over two days before acquitting Robert Rhodes, a Customs and Border Protection officer, of a single federal count of violating the civil rights of Zhao Yan, 38, a businesswoman from Tianjin, China, who was touring Niagara Falls.

The case provoked anger in China after pictures of Zhao, her face swollen from pepper spray and her eyes and forehead bruised, were widely published after the incident last July.

Defence lawyer Steven Cohen accused the U.S. government on Thursday of prosecuting Rhodes to protect delicate U.S.-Chinese relations. Cohen said Rhodes was an easy target because he was openly gay and had complained about discrimination on the job.

Despite that, Cohen said, Rhodes would like to return to the job he has held for 17 years.

"Rob is a patriot and he loves this country," the lawyer said.

Rhodes was not immediately available to comment because of concerns for his safety. Cohen said he received a tip Saturday from a woman of Chinese origin that Rhodes' life would be in danger should he be cleared. It was one of numerous threats Rhodes has received, the lawyer said.

"The threat was if a not guilty (verdict) was reached, interested persons would kill him upon emergence from the courthouse," Cohen said. "I don't know if the threat had any credibility but the marshals are taking it seriously."

Jurors left U.S. District Court without commenting.

Zhao, who testified during the trial and is pursuing a $10 million US lawsuit against the U.S. government, was not in the courtroom for the verdict.

Government prosecutors claimed Rhodes used excessive force by slamming Zhao's head into pavement and striking her with his knee after pepper-spraying her at a Niagara Falls inspection station in July 2004.

Rhodes told investigators he believed Zhao and two companions might have been associated with a drug suspect who had just been caught and that the women ran when ordered inside. He said he followed proper Customs and Border Protection procedure in subduing the struggling woman.

He faced up to 10 years in prison if convicted.

"The jury did a great job for their country," Cohen said. "They reaffirmed a law enforcement officer's right to protect himself and the right to be able to do what is necessary to do their job."

Cohen said border officers throughout the country had adopted an unofficial policy against using any measure of force against a suspect.

"People who don't even know Officer Rhodes would say, 'Look what happened to Rocky,'" Cohen said, using Rhodes' nickname.

Cohen said he believed the jury was swayed by the testimony of two of Rhodes' fellow border officers - who took the stand against him. Although both were critical of the level of force Rhodes used, they indicated Zhao was resisting arrest.

Also key, Cohen said, was medical evidence that showed Zhao sustained what were considered minor injuries that included no fractures or broken bones.

NAACP Calls For Action In Police Shooting Of Teen (WEWS-TV)

WEWS-TV, September 9, 2005

CLEVELAND -- Funeral services were held Thursday for a Cleveland teen shot and killed by police last week, and now the Cleveland NAACP is joining the chorus of those calling for answers and for action.

Brandon McCloud, 15, was shot by police last Thursday in the bedroom of his home.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People says the police version of what happened doesn't quite make sense, NewsChannel5 reported.

"There is no justifiable reason why a 15-year-old boy, I don't care if he's black, white, blue, green, gray should be shot 10 times in his bedroom. I cannot make sense of that," said NAACP President George Forbes.

Police were carrying out a search warrant at McCloud's Jeffries Street home when they say the teen came at the officers from a closet with a knife.

The preliminary ruling was that the shooting was justifiable.

"If that's justifiable then any shooting of a black person is justifiable in this city," said Forbes.

The investigation into the shooting is following a preset protocol. Cleveland police said they have asked the FBI civil rights team to step in and monitor their process.

But the NAACP wants specific action taken, and they want it now.

"We expect these two men to be fired, fired, fired and prosecuted, and nothing short of that is acceptable," said Forbes.

And if that action is not taken, Forbes is quick to point out to the administration that this is an election year.

"It is the season for solution and you have to be mighty dumb not to understand what I'm saying," said Forbes.

Under police protocol, the officers involved will be making their formal statements by Monday.

The mayor has said the investigation process could take 90 days.

FBI Ends Beta Bridge Probe (CHARDP)

By Melanie Mayhew

Charlottesville Daily Progress, September 9, 2005

Cryptic graffiti scrawled on the University of Virginia's Beta Bridge - including "G Wizard," "G Society," "G Bug," a red eye and derogatory images of women - was not racially motivated, the FBI has concluded.

UVa President John T. Casteen III recently asked the Civil Rights Unit of the FBI in Washington to review photos of the graffiti images to determine their meaning.

James Lamb, an FBI special agent, reported the FBI's findings to university police. "A review by agents in the Civil Rights Unit found nothing to suggest racial implications," Lamb said.

A group of UVa students called police Aug. 29 after someone defaced Beta Bridge, a popular spot where students spray-paint announcements. The controversial defacement appeared during the first two weeks of classes, which were marred by a string of reported hate incidents.

Members of two historically black organizations had painted announcements for their events on both sides of the bridge. Shortly after they began advertising their events, the graffiti appeared.

During the days following the defacement, members of the university community speculated as to the meaning of the graffiti. Some students linked it to recent racial incidents and to the Ku Klux Klan. The speculation prompted Casteen to request FBI assistance.

"I am grateful to the many people who worked overtime for several days to resolve what had become a sensitive public issue in our community," Casteen said.

At the forefront of students' concerns were five reported incidents of written or shouted slurs, three reported incidents of gay bashing, a symbolic attack on a Christian undergraduate, an incident involving a group of white students harassing a group of Asian-Pacific Americans and inappropriate behavior toward women.

The information from the FBI is one more step in quelling hatred at the university, said Leonard W. Sandridge Jr., executive vice president and chief operating officer.

"Given the fact that there have been some incidents, everyone involved with the situation wanted to be very careful," Sandridge said. "We're working very hard to investigate all kinds of incidents of this nature. It reflects the fact that we're a community that's very concerned about these kinds of issues and wants to address them."

Smuggler To Serve 3 Years In Prison (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 9, 2005

A Carmel Valley man who headed a ring that smuggled dozens of Eastern Europeans into the United States through Tijuana was sentenced yesterday to three years in prison and forced to give up his house.

Yervand Asriyants, 42, a native of Azerbaijan, didn't speak during a hearing before Chief U.S. District Judge Irma E. Gonzalez. Asriyants had pleaded guilty June 9 to conspiracy and immigrant smuggling charges.

Asriyants was arrested after an investigation by FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents into a series of smuggling attempts at the region's border crossings involving Eastern European men, women and children.

"He was smuggling aliens across the border that were not what we consider to be typical," said FBI agent Roy Lemons, who added that the case had special urgency because of security concerns after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Lemons said no terrorist links were found.

The immigrants said they agreed to pay $5,000 to $10,000 to be brought from Lithuania, Poland, Russia and Ukraine into the United States through Mexico.

Prosecutors said the immigrants were caught while crossing the border by attempting to claim U.S. citizenship and presenting borrowed or fake passports or driver licenses.

Investigators caught 43 people in the smuggling attempts, but believe many others succeeded in the operation dating to the mid-1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0004057

As part of his sentencing, Asriyants was ordered to forfeit $36,000 seized from his house, a safe-deposit box and the five-bedroom Carmel Valley home he bought for $946,000 in 2003. Prosecutors say the house was bought with illegally obtained money.

Four members of the ring have been sentenced and three await sentencing, prosecutors said.

Anti-Gay-Marriage Initiative Passes Hurdle (FINDLAW/AP)

By Theo Emery, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - BOSTON-A proposed ballot initiative that would ban gay marriage passed a key hurdle Wednesday when the state attorney general ruled it would be permitted under a section of the state constitution allowing voters to overturn court decisions.

The action by Attorney General Tom Reilly, a Democrat who is expected to run for governor in 2006, clears the way for conservative groups to begin the long process of gathering signatures and lobbying lawmakers in hopes of putting the issue before voters in 2008.

Supporters now must go out and gather the signatures of at least 65,825 Massachusetts voters. If they are successful, the question then must by approved by 25 percent of two successive sittings of the 200-member state Legislature. The question would then be placed before voters again as a constitutional amendment in 2008.

The state's highest court ruled in 2003 that it was unconstitutional for the state to ban marriages between gays and lesbians. The following spring, the nation's first state-sanctioned same-sex marriages began taking place in Massachusetts and thousands of gay couples have since tied the knot.

In a letter last week, Gov. Mitt Romney urged Reilly to certify the ballot question, saying voters "should not be denied meaningful participation in the legal definition of marriage."

Backers of the proposed referendum cite the Massachusetts Constitution's Article 48, which permits the people to petition for a constitutional amendment "that overrules a court decision when the court has declared a statute to be in violation of our constitution."

Gay marriage supporters had urged Reilly not to accept the proposed amendment, saying that Article 48 applied to court rulings overturning a statute, while the court case involving gay marriage rights did not overturn an existing law.

Gary Buseck, legal director of Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, which sued the state over gay marriage and won, said the group would challenge Reilly's decision.

The measure defining marriage as between a man and a woman had been proposed last month by the Massachusetts Family Institute. The state legislature is considering an alternate constitutional amendment that also would overturn gay marriage but would legalize Vermont-style civil unions.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department Files Antitrust Lawsuit (AP)

AP, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department sued the National Association of Realtors on Thursday, claiming it unfairly limits competition by allowing real estate agents to withhold home listings from Internet-based brokers.

The antitrust lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago, follows lengthy negotiations in which the government pressed the Realtors to drop restrictions designed to protect traditional brokers.

The association announced changes to its original plan Thursday, but the new steps were insufficient to ward off the lawsuit because the organization kept in place brokers' ability to discriminate against competitors who post listings online, said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Antitrust Division.

Internet brokerages operate in the top dozen real estate markets in the country and their numbers are growing, Justice officials said at a news conference to announce the lawsuit. The online brokers often charge lower fees and allow consumers to review listings at their own pace.

The Realtors' policy prevents brokers who rely on the Internet from being able to show customers all the houses that may be for sale in the locations and price ranges they're seeking, McDonald said. It "allows a broker to target his Web-based competitors," McDonald said.

The association said its new policy took into account Justice Department concerns. Initially, listing agents were allowed to withhold available homes from specific Web sites. The revised policy says that, when an agent chooses, listings will not be displayed on any Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0004058

"The policy does not discriminate against any brokerage model, including discount brokers," said Al Mansell, president of the Realtors' association.</s! pan>

U.S. Sues Realtors, Claims Web Rules Limit Discounting (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And James R. Hagerty, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department challenged the nation's dominant real-estate trade group in a lawsuit that could lower costs of buying and selling homes.

The federal antitrust suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago against the National Association of Realtors, targets the group's bylaws, which allow members to withhold online listings from other brokers in a local market. The government charges that the rules illegally could restrict discounting and disadvantage Internet competitors.

The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission to protect competition in the residential-real-estate market. Strong sales and rising prices have been a huge boon to brokers, who despite higher prices continue to charge commissions of 5% to 6% of a home's sale price -- reaping an estimated $60 billion in such fees last year.

The association's policy "stifles competition to the advantage of some of its members, at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," said J. Bruce McDonald, the acting antitrust chief, who was nominated to the post by President Bush last month. The suit went forward despite the political power of the association's more than 1.2 million members in state capitals and Congress, and is likely to win strong support among consumers.

Mr. McDonald said online commerce brought innovation and lower fees to air travel, stock sales, insurance, music and other markets. "It offers the same opportunity for consumers buying a home," while the Realtors' rules would "lock in outmoded business models," he said. Real-estate brokers, led by the trade association, are fighting Internet-based competitors and discounters to preserve their high commissions, federal officials said.

Officials of the National Association of Realtors defend their bylaws as promoting competition, and they had hoped that a revised, less-restrictive Internet rule that was offered in settlement talks with the government might head off a suit.

The policy is "fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation," the association said. "After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action."

The association also is locked in a multistate battle with the Justice Department and the FTC over the industry's campaign to limit discount brokers on the state level.

The rule at the center of the Justice Department lawsuit involves the Internet display of information from multiple-listing services, or MLS, which are local databases, usually owned by local Realtor organizations, of homes available for sale. Under the revised rule, brokers would have a choice: They could make listing information available to the Web sites of all of their competitors or to none of them.

Under the earlier rule, proposed two years ago by the association, brokers could have denied the data to specific rival Web sites while providing it to others -- a provision that would have allowed brokers to discriminate against discounters. The association abandoned this "selective opt out" provision yesterday in hopes of settling with the government and avoiding a lawsuit.

Write to James R. Hagerty at bob.hagerty@wsj.com1

DOJ Wants Real Estate Market Fairness (REU)

Reuters, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The Justice Department asked a court Thursday to block a rule by the real estate industry's main trade group that authorities claim limits competition from Internet-based brokers.

The Justice Department said in a statement that the National Association of Realtors (NAR) rule "prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting." The government said it filed the civil antitrust lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Chicago.

The NAR said in May it would back away from the disputed bylaw that the department's antitrust division feared would allow real estate brokers to bar their property listings from being displayed by some discount rivals.

The Justice Department Thursday acknowledged that the NAR had revised the rule but said the modified version still discriminated against "innovative" brokers and did not resolve its concerns.

The rule has come under sharp criticism from Internet-based competitors such as RealEstate.com, an online brokerage and referral service that is a unit of IAC/InterActiveCorp (Research).

Efforts to reach an NAR representative for comment on the suit were not immediately successful.

DOJ_NMG_0004059

Antitrust Lawyers Go After Realtors (WP)

By Kirstin Downey, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The Justice Department's antitrust division yesterday sued the National Association of Realtors, alleging that the powerful trade group is using its online multiple listing service policies to restrict competition from discount brokers offering lower prices.

"The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the antitrust division.

Discount brokerages are undercutting the traditional 6 percent commission rate that has continued to dominate even as home prices in some markets, including the Washington area, have doubled over the last five years.

The Realtors group announced yesterday that it was changing its online sales listing policy to make listings more widely available, but Justice Department officials said the changes do not go far enough.

At issue in the lawsuit are Internet listing rules adopted by the Realtors in 2003 that would have allowed real estate brokers to opt out of having their listings appear on the Web sites of other brokers. The rules were controversial from the beginning and association officials said they were never fully implemented, but Justice Department officials said at a news conference yesterday that of about 1,000 affiliated multiple listing services, about 200 adopted the restrictive policy.

In a written statement, association officials said they "were at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action. Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two-year investigation."

Association officials declined further comment yesterday. In an interview Wednesday, before the lawsuit was filed, the group's general counsel, Laurene K. Janik, said it would be a "waste of taxpayers' money" for the Justice Department to sue. The group was changing its policy, she said, and the government would be acting against the rescinded policy.

In the lawsuit, filed in the U.S. District Court in Chicago, where the Realtors have their headquarters, the government alleged that the association -- particularly its traditional broker members -- has sought to maintain a "policy that restrains competition from brokers who use the Internet to more efficiently and cost effectively serve home sellers and buyers."

According to the federal filing, when real estate industry leaders developed their policy in 2003, they talked about ways to maintain the status quo. The working group that formulated the listings policy understood that the right to opt-out would limit competition, according to the lawsuit, which alleged that two members of the group said the opt-out right would be "abused beyond belief" as traditional brokers withheld listings from competitors.

Albert A. Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute, said the Justice Department would have deliberated thoroughly before bringing suit against the politically powerful trade group, which has 1.2 million members nationwide.

"This Justice Department is not trigger-happy," Foer said. "They don't bring a lot of antitrust cases or operate in an anti-business mode, so chances are that they've thought it out very carefully."

"It's great," said Peter Sealey, a professor of marketing at the University of California at Berkeley who has followed the issue. The policies "are a clear conspiracy and restraint of trade. This is long-overdue law enforcement."

US Files Antitrust Suit Against Biggest Real Estate Group (AFP)

Agence France-Presse, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (AFP) - The US Justice Department filed an antitrust suit against the National Association of Realtors, the largest group of real estate brokers, claiming that it stifled competition in the sector.

The lawsuit filed in Chicago claims the Realtors' policies for property listings effectively blocks rival real estate brokers from accessing some computerized home listings.

The policy "prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting," the Justice Department said in a statement.

"The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," said Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Department's Antitrust Division. "Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are free to compete vigorously by offering innovative services."

Although the Realtors group announced its adoption of a revised policy, "the revised policy continues to discriminate against innovative brokers, and does not resolve the Department's concerns," the department said.

Officials said low-cost brokers may be blocked from access to the local Multiple Listing Service (MLS), which contains lists of nearly all properties for sale in the community.

The Realtor group said in a statement its new policy on listings "is fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation." "After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action. Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two year investigation," the group added.

Justice Department Sues Chicago-Based National Association Of Realtors (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, September 9, 2005

The U.S. Department of Justice filed an antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors Thursday, claiming that the Chicago-based trade group's new policy for online displays of home listings stifles competition from Internet-based discount brokerages.

The lawsuit, which has long been anticipated in the industry, was filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago one day after the Realtors announced revamped listing guidelines. An earlier version of the rules had been under investigation by the Justice Department for two years.

"The [new] NAR policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourages discounting," the department announced.

The suit is the latest chapter in a long-running industry fight over who should be able to access home listings. The earlier policy, known as Virtual Office Website, allowed brokerages that are members of multiple listing services to pick and choose which competitors' Web sites could display their listings.

Critics said VOW effectively undercut smaller, Internet-based competitors with lower overhead than traditional bricks-and-mortar brokerages. But many brokerages maintain that they spend so much money in marketing in order to obtain the listings--essentially their "inventory"--that they don't owe competitors any such access.

The new policy, called Internet Listing Display, forbids real estate agents from selecting which brokers can and can't receive their listings. However, individual real estate companies can opt out of sharing their data across the board.

"The new policy raises some of the same problems as the old one," said Deputy Assistant Atty. Gen. J. Bruce McDonald. He said the Justice Department would like to eliminate the opt-out provision entirely because consumers should have full access to online listings in order to find homes more efficiently, presumably at a lower cost.

"The way we go about obtaining goods and services on the Web is threatening to bricks-and-mortar business models," McDonald said.

Ralph Holmen, associate general counsel for the Realtors, said the group was "absolutely puzzled" by the suit.

"We came up with the new policy, which we think accommodated 90 percent of their concerns, and offered them the opportunity to comment on any other concerns," he said. "They didn't provide any comment, other than it was unacceptable."

Steve Murray, a real estate industry consultant who has been a vocal critic of the real estate group's policies, said nonetheless that he thought that the lawsuit was "over the line."

"I think [Justice] is trying to tell brokers where they can and can't market their inventory, and that is totally wrong," Murray said.

National Realtors Group Sued By U.S. Over Web Policy (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 8, 2005

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- The National Association of Realtors was sued by U.S. antitrust enforcers who accused the trade group of trying to restrain competition by restricting Internet brokers' access to listings of homes for sale.

The suit, filed by the Justice Department in federal court in Chicago, challenges the group's policy of allowing traditional real estate brokers to exclude their listings from other brokers' Web sites. It may be propping up an old-fashioned business model and harming consumers looking to lower costs, the suit says.

The association's policy ``stifles competition to advantage some of its members at the expense of home buyers and sellers across the country," J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's antitrust division, said at a news conference in Washington today. ``Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are free to compete vigorously by offering innovative services."

The lawsuit is part of a broader effort by U.S. authorities to open the real estate business to more competition, McDonald said. Internet brokers, who seek to cut costs by letting customers do much of the work of traditional real estate agents, sprung up in the late 1990s and now operate in all major metropolitan areas.

The Chicago-based realtors group announced a revised policy earlier today that it said responded to Justice Department concerns. The association has more than 1 million members who work in residential and commercial real estate.

Defending the Policy

McDonald said at the press conference that the revised policy is just as anticompetitive as the old one.

Responding to today's lawsuit, the realtors issued another statement saying their new ``policy is fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation'' in the real estate business.

``After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action,'' the statement said. ``Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two year investigation.''

In most markets, real estate brokers participate in what is known as a Multiple Listing Service, which allows the brokers to share information about properties that are for sale. By using the service, brokers and buyers can get listings on virtually all homes in the market.

Brokers have traditionally given their clients print-outs of the listings and haven't given them full access to the database. However, some brokerages that operate online have begun to give their customers the ability to see all the Multiple Listing Service information. The sites are password protected.

The realtors group's policy challenged by the Justice Department gave brokers the ability to withhold their clients' listings from the Web sites of the Internet competitors. The policy, which wasn't mandatory until 2006, was already followed by about 200 local Multiple Listing Services, Justice Department officials said.

To contact the reporter on this story: Robert Schmidt in Washington at rschmidt5@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: September 8, 2005 14:18 EDT

Justice Dept. Sues NAR For Antitrust (INMAN)

By Jessica Swesey, Inman News

Inman News, September 8, 2005

The U.S. Justice Department today filed an antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors challenging its new policy for online property listings display.

The Justice Department's Antitrust Division has been investigating the Realtor trade group's policies for Internet listings over whether it has been restricting competition among real estate brokers.

The complaint accuses NAR of mandating a policy that obstructs real estate brokers who use innovative Web-based systems to offer lower costs to consumers.

"We believe the new ILD (Internet Listings Display) policy is fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation," NAR said in a statement this morning. "After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action. Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two-year investigation."

Moments before the Justice Department's announcement this morning, the Realtor trade group said it had adopted a new online listings policy to address the department's concerns stemming from the two-year probe.

The old policy, dubbed the Virtual office Web site or VOW policy, allowed real estate brokers to selectively hold their listings from competitor's Web sites, a move which DOJ officials have said threatens competition in the marketplace.

While NAR's new policy no longer allows brokers to pick and choose who among their competitors is allowed to display their listings, it still enables them to withhold listings from all brokers in the MLS. The Justice Department claims the NAR policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting.

"The repackaged policy narrows the opt-out a bit, but it remains effective," J. Bruce McDonald, Deputy Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust, said this morning during a press meeting in Washington, D.C.

Allowing brokers to hold listings from the Internet "makes the online business model unattractive and tends to undercut competition by the Web-based brokers," he said.

Under the revised policy, a broker opting out can withhold all listings from the Web sites of other brokers, but they would still appear on NAR's own Web site, Realtor.com, McDonald said.

The so-called "blanket opt-out" provision provided in the new policy has been in effect by "hundreds of MLSs" for three and a half years under NAR's policy for Internet Data Exchange, according to NAR. The association has said the policy has been widely accepted by the industry and very few brokers have chosen to opt out.

The policy adopted today contains an entirely new feature that allows brokers who have opted out of displaying their listings on competitors' Web sites the opportunity to make an exception at the direction of a particular seller who wants to have his or her property displayed on the Web sites of all other members of the MLS.

"The revised policy continues to discriminate against innovative brokers, and does not resolve the Department's concerns," Justice Department officials said in a statement today.

NAR President Al Mansell contested that, "The policy treats all MLS members equally yet respects the rights of property owners and their listing brokers to market a property as they see fit…The policy does not discriminate against any brokerage model, including discount brokers."

But the Justice Department in its complaint contends the NAR policy significantly alters the rules that govern MLSs by permitting traditional brokers to discriminate against other brokers based on their business model, denying them the full benefits of MLS participation. "The Department's lawsuit seeks to ensure that traditional brokers, through NAR's policy, cannot deprive consumers of the benefits that would flow from these new ways of competing," the Department said.

According to the Department's complaint, brokers who participated in the NAR work group that formulated the VOW policy in May 2003 recognized that the opt-out right would be "abused beyond belief." The chairman of the working group allegedly admitted that the opt-out right was likely to be exercised by brokers despite the fact that "it may not be in the sellers' best interest to opt out," the Department said in its filing.

"NAR's policy denies brokers using new technologies and business models the same benefits of MLS membership available to their competitor brokers, suppresses innovation, discourages competition on price and quality, and prevents new, efficient competitors from entering into the marketplace - all to the detriment of consumers," the Justice Department said.

The complaint alleges that NAR adopted the online listings policy in response to broker member concerns over rising competition from Internet brokers.

"The chairman of the board of RE/MAX, the nation's second-largest real estate franchisor, publicly expressed his concern that these Internet sites would inevitably place downward pressure on brokers' commission rates," the complaint states.

NAR discussed its revised policy with the Justice Department before adoption, McDonald said, and antitrust officials warned the trade group that it didn't comply with antitrust laws. But the association has chosen to stand by the policy.

U.S. Fights Limit On Home Sale Listings (BSUN)

By Lorraine Mirabella, Sun Staff

The Baltimore Sun, September 9, 2005

In a move that could transform the way real estate brokers work with home buyers and sellers, the Justice Department challenged yesterday a national real estate group's new policy permitting brokers to limit the display of home sale listings on the Internet.

The government filed an anti-trust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors, saying the new rule restrains competition from Web-based, discount real estate brokers, hurting home buyers and sellers.

At the heart of the dispute over how to disseminate home sales information from Realtor-owned multiple listing services, the lawsuit charges, is resistance by traditional brokers to an onslaught of "virtual" brokers who charge less than traditional commissions.

"NAR's policy prevents consumers from receiving the full benefits of competition and threatens to lock in outmoded business models and discourage discounting," the Justice Department said in a statement.

The suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Chicago, highlights the profound transformation the Internet is bringing to the housing market, just as it has changed the way consumers shop for everything from airline tickets to stocks, cars, books and music. The NAR has reported that seven of 10 home buyers turn to the Internet when buying a home.

"The Internet has brought great competitive opportunities to a lot of other industries," said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the antitrust division. "Real estate has been slow to come along to this."

The Realtors contend that brokers who work for their listings should be able to choose whether or not to help their competitors' business.

"A broker gets the opportunity to choose whether or not he wants to facilitate the business fortunes of another competitor, and he ought to have that right," said Ralph Holmen, associate general counsel for NAR in Chicago. "Real estate is unique in that competitors cooperate in the sale of property in a way you don't see in many other industries."

But one local Realtor, John E. Rawlings Jr., a Coldwell Banker agent in Owings Mills, said the Internet has already become a crucial tool for both traditional and Web-based brokers and agents.

"It's the wave of the present," he said. "Most people shop on the Internet for listings before they even call their Realtor. It would do a disservice to the seller if they didn't have the maximum coverage possible. ... A full-service company has to show the value clients are getting for the service we offer."

The lawsuit contends that the NAR rule discriminates against brokers who use password-protected Internet sites that enable customers to search for and get listings over the Internet, replacing the traditional practice of brokers searching for homes for their clients.

DOJ_NMG_0004063

Such Web sites, first developed in the late 1990s, have become a competitive alternative to traditional brokers, who worried that the Internet sites would drive down commission rates, and prompted the NAR to draft its new rule two years ago, the suit said. The Justice Department launched an anti-trust investigation and warned this spring that it stood ready to file suit. The NAR delayed its rule, and the two sides began negotiations in May.

The NAR, the nation's biggest trade group, said yesterday it adopted the controversial policy after modifying it to address the government's concerns, ending up with a policy that gives consumers more access to home sale listings than ever before.

"After months of negotiations, we are at a loss to understand why the Department of Justice would bring a legal action," the NAR statement said. "Many of the changes incorporated in the new policy are in direct response to concerns they have raised over the course of the two-year investigation. ...The policy treats all MLS members equally yet respects the rights of property owners and their listing brokers to market a property as they see fit."

The lawsuit does not attempt to open the MLS information to non-members, the Justice Department said. Listings are controlled by the more than 800 member-only multiple listing services across the country.

The rule allows a broker to withhold his own listings from all Web sites - other than his own - or to have listings displayed on all competitors' sites. It does not permit brokers to selectively choose to withhold listings from competitors, the NAR said.

The rule is meant to consolidate the formerly separate policies for Internet Data Exchanges, on which brokers advertise the listings of other brokers, and Virtual Office Web sites, or VOW, virtual real estate offices on the Web.

"We adopted a policy to bring some order to the market of how those listings would get used," Holmen said. "We disagree that the policy and the rules are unlawfully anti-competitive, and we intend to defend that in court."

Holmen said real estate is different from other industries that have been transformed by the Internet.

"Real estate is unique in that there is competitive cooperation in the sale of properties in a way you don't see in many other industries," Holmen said. The question, he said, is: "Must a broker cooperate with another competitor as fully as he is able or can he choose how much he wants to assist that competitor?"

Joseph T. Landers, III, executive vice president of the Greater Baltimore Board of Realtors, said that under current rules governing Internet listings, few brokers in the Baltimore area have opted out of online listings.

But, he added, "The broker needs to have the flexibility to be able to not display [on the Internet] if that's what their client wants."

In an industry where the MSL system works based on reciprocity, some brokers became concerned because "there are agencies out there that don't bring a lot of listings and are not posting them, but they're taking everyone else's listings and posting them on their sites. That defeats that whole concept of reciprocity. There were also some companies that were basically skimming all the information and posting it on their site."

The NAR, he said, has "tried to put in place rules or regulations to create a fair playing field when it comes to Internet advertising."

DOJ Sues Real Estate Group For Web Listing Policy (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service, Washington Bureau

IDG News Service, September 9, 2005

The U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) has filed a lawsuit against a real estate broker trade group, saying the organization's policies block competition among brokers using a Web-based property listing service.

The DOJ's civil antitrust lawsuit was filed Thursday against the National Association of Realtors (NAR) in U.S. District Court in Chicago. The DOJ accuses the NAR of allowing brokers to pull their real estate listings from the Multiple Listing Service (MLS), a joint venture among competing brokers. NAR brokers have traditionally shared listings with each other, and customers could access those listings by mail, fax or at real estate broker offices, the DOJ said.

But an NAR policy allows brokers to opt out of sharing their listings with brokers offering Web-based property search services, "effectively inhibiting the new technology," the DOJ said.

"Delivering listings over the Internet gives web-savvy consumers more control over their search for a home, allowing them to educate themselves about their options at their own pace and on their own time," the DOJ said in a press release. "This allows brokers to reduce the time that their agents spend searching the MLS database or showing homes the customer dislikes."

The NAR, in a statement, said it has adopted a new policy that addresses the DOJ concerns. "The policy will bring consumers more points of access to real estate information from multiple listing services than they have ever had before," NAR said. "For consumers, whether they are home buyers or sellers, this new policy is a win-win. Buyers will be able to find all the listings available for public display on the Web site of the broker of their choice and sellers will be able to work with the listing broker of their choice."

DOJ_NMG_0004064

But the DOJ said Thursday that the NAR's new policy continues to discriminate against "innovative" brokers and does not resolve the agency's concerns.

"The purchase of a home is one of the most significant financial decisions a family can make, and NAR's policy stifles competition," giving an advantage to some NAR members "at the expense of home buyers and sellers," said J. Bruce McDonald, deputy assistant attorney general in the DOJ's Antitrust Division, in a statement. Consumers benefit when real estate brokers are competitive, he said.

Taubmans Give Up Control Of Sotheby's (WSJ)

By Marcus Baram

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Sotheby's Holdings Inc. announced a major recapitalization that saw the auction house's leading shareholders, the Taubman family, relinquish control and open the company to more outside investment.

As of midnight Wednesday, former chairman A. Alfred Taubman and his family and affiliates reduced their stake in Sotheby's from almost 22% of total shares outstanding and 62% of the votes to 12.4% of both. They exchanged 14 million of their special Class B shares for 7.1 million in common stock and $168 million in cash from the auction house. As a result, Sotheby's dropped its two-class voting structure involving Class B super shares and Class A shares for a single class of stock. The dual class share structure, which is rare in public companies, had been instituted at Sotheby's before the New York-based company went public in 1988.

"There are a lot more investors who will consider investing in Sotheby's when you have a single class of stock," says William Ruprecht, Sotheby's president and chief executive officer. "This will give us a degree of financial flexibility and open us up to a lot of opportunities for the future, such as equity-linked securities."

The move also represents a retreat for Mr. Taubman, a real-estate developer, who bought the company in 1983 and served as its chairman until he was convicted of price fixing in 2001. "A few months ago, the company approached Mr. Taubman and said that the two classes of stock were a problem and were perceived as a problem by investors and he thought this was a fair deal," says Christopher Tennyson, a spokesman for Mr. Taubman, who adds that the 81-year-old businessman is writing a memoir about his life in business. "He's very, very proud of what he's accomplished but things turned out to not be all positive."

Mr. Taubman will remain an investor for at least two years and his son, Robert, will remain on the board of directors but will step down as a member of the executive and nominating committees, the company said. With the Taubmans ratcheting down, the largest shareholder now is Ariel Capital Management, which currently owns 8.7 million shares. Last June, Ariel informed their investors that despite Sotheby's tough year so far, they "are confident in the long-term prospects of the business."

It has been a mixed year so far for Sotheby's -- the company took in $1.3 billion in auction sales for the first half of the year, almost the same results as their sales during the same period last year, while their competitor Christie's recorded a 32% increase in sales during that period. Last month, the company reported a slight decline in second-quarter profit although their margins on auction commissions increased during that quarter.

Sotheby's shares climbed 5%, or 87 cents, closing at $18.30 on the New York Stock Exchange. The move decreased by 11% the company's total number of shares outstanding, which now stand at 57.3 million.

"This is smart," says George Sutton, an analyst with Craig Hallum Capital Group, who has given the company an neutral rating. "It's relatively favorable versus an outright sale which would have been the most lucrative."

Taubman Family Sells Its Interest In Sotheby's (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Carol Vogel

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

A. Alfred Taubman, the former chairman of Sotheby's who was convicted of leading a price-fixing scheme, sold his family's controlling interest in the venerable auction house to the company yesterday for stock and $168 million in cash.

The deal closes the chapter on the Taubman family's long role at Sotheby's and has already ignited speculation that the transaction could be a precursor to a sale or merger of the company, the largest publicly traded auction house in the nation.

Mr. Taubman, a shopping mall mogul who owns The Beverly Center in Los Angeles and The Mall at Short Hills in New Jersey through his controlling stake in Taubman Centers, had bought his interest in Sotheby's in 1983. The acquisition was widely viewed as a glamour purchase, giving him and his wife, Judy, an entree to the titled families of the world.

Sotheby's also became something of a playground for Mr. Taubman - an architect by training - who used the auction house to test his flair for retailing. Over the years, he helped transform Sotheby's from a sleepy auctioneer frequented mostly by dealers to a glass-fronted one-stop shopping center offering a mix of customers everything from financing to appraisals, repairs and sales.

DOJ_NMG_0004065

Under the terms of the deal, Mr. Taubman will cede control of the company for $168 million in cash and 7.1 million shares of common stock in exchange for the family's 14 million Class B shares. The family's Class B shares had given it 62 percent of the voting shares, despite its ownership of only 22 percent of the company's true financial interest. The Taubman family will continue to hold a stake in the company, owning 12 percent of both shares and votes.

The deal removes one of the company's two classes of shares, potentially making it more attractive to investors or a merger partner. "The dual class was increasingly being seen by the investing public with less warmth," William Ruprecht, Sotheby's chief executive, said.

Still, he denied that the company would be put up for sale. "Is this an intermediate step on the way to putting the business up for sale? The answer is no," he said, but added, "Every company on the New York Stock Exchange at some price can be acquired."

Mr. Taubman had made no secret of his interest in selling Sotheby's. Two years ago, after an eight-month search for a buyer, he took it off the market. While the company has had several flirtations with buyers, including several wealthy Asian individuals, employees there say, nobody has been willing to pay the high price Mr. Taubman believed Sotheby's was worth.

The price-fixing scandal sent Mr. Taubman to prison for 10 months starting in July 2002 after he was convicted of conspiring to rig auction prices with Sotheby's archrival, Christie's. Afterward, employees say, he lost interest in the auction house. His son, Robert, who joined the board, had little interest in the art world and was just keeping an eye on the family investment.

The exorbitant expenses of the price-fixing scandal drained Sotheby's cash. The company became so cash poor that two and a half years ago it was forced to sell its York Avenue headquarters to RFR Holding for $175 million.

In February 2004, Cendant, the travel, lodging and real estate services company, agreed to buy Sotheby's International Realty's residential real estate brokerage operations for about $100 million. Cendant, whose brokerage operations include Century 21, Coldwell Banker and ERA, pays the auction house a fee for the use of Sotheby's name.

Sotheby's has also had to turn to wealthy art dealers to help finance several major fine art consignments in order to compete with Christie's, whose owner, the luxury goods magnate François Pinault, gives it considerable financial support.

Banc of America Securities advised Sotheby's, and Bear Stearns advised the company's special committee. Allen & Overy provided legal counsel to Sotheby's, and Simpson Thacher & Bartlett provided legal counsel to the special committee.

Goldman, Sachs and Wachtel, Lipton, Rosen & Katz advised the Taubman family.

Archaeologists And Dealers Spar Over U.S.-Italian Art Accord (NYT)

By Hugh Eakin

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Lawyers representing art dealers and Sotheby's auction house sparred with archaeologists and cultural property experts on Thursday at a State Department committee hearing on the future of a sweeping agreement banning the import of antiquities from Italy.

Known formally as a memorandum of understanding, the five-year-old agreement is intended to reduce the flow of illicitly excavated Italian antiquities to the United States in return for heightened cultural cooperation between the Italian government and American arts institutions.

In the hearing, before the State Department's cultural property advisory committee, archaeologists argued for the effectiveness of the agreement, which is set to expire in January unless it is renewed.

"The agreement has had very significant consequences," said Malcolm Bell III, a University of Virginia archaeologist and specialist in Sicilian archaeology, citing improved policing of looting of ancient artworks in Italy and the availability of long-term archaeological loans to American institutions.

Mr. Bell's comments were echoed by Patti Gerstenblith, a law professor at DePaul University and cultural property specialist, who said the agreement helped provide a basis for a growing number of international regulations for the antiquities trade.

But William Pearlstein, a lawyer representing several dealers, asserted that Italian officials were not living up to the agreement.

"In contrast to the love fest portrayed here, there is a not-so-quiet war between Italy and American museums against which it is trying to pursue cultural patrimony claims," he said, referring to Italian action to recover some artworks.

Representatives from some museums, including one from the Metropolitan Museum, attended the hearing but remained silent. Referring to their lack of participation, Mr. Pearlstein said that antiquities curators were "intimidated" by the threat of litigation from the Italian government.

DOJ_NMG_0004066

Pressed to expand on his statement, he referred to a criminal case pending in Italy against Marion True, the antiquities curator of the Getty Museum in Los Angeles. Italian officials, he said, "are discriminating against museums against which they have patrimony claims."

Stefano Stefani, deputy chief of mission for the Italian Embassy, took issue with Mr. Pearlstein's comments after the hearing.

"If curators feel constrained to avoid acquiring illegal material, then that means it is working," he said, referring to the agreement.

Ms. True has been accused of conspiring to import looted antiquities. The case is a sensitive issue for the Getty as it prepares to reopen its renovated villa in Malibu, Calif., which houses many of the museum's Greek, Roman and Etruscan antiquities. Such objects were a passion of John Paul Getty, a collector and the museum's namesake. The museum has expressed confidence that Ms. True will be vindicated.

The Italian government has recovered 185,190 looted artifacts since the agreement was signed in 2001, compared with 96,472 in the five years prior to the agreement, according to figures provided by Italian officials. Italy has also expanded the number of loan exhibitions of archaeological material to the United States under the agreement, Mr. Stefani said.

Some critics of the agreement have suggested that any renewal of it should restrict the import ban to classes of objects that are in most danger or have particular significance to Italy's cultural heritage. The United States has restrictions on the import of antiquities with a several countries, but the accord with Italy is the most comprehensive.

The 11-member committee includes art dealers, museum officials and archaeologists. The panel will deliberate and make a recommendation to Dina Powell, assistant secretary of state for education and cultural affairs, who will make the decision whether to renew the agreement or allow it to expire.

Private Investors To Buy Hertz For $15 Billion (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

In one of the largest leveraged buyouts in more than a decade, the Ford Motor Company yesterday agreed to sell Hertz, the nation's largest rental car company, to a consortium of private investors for about $15 billion in cash and debt, executives involved in the negotiations said.

Ford is expected to announce the transaction as early as today, the executives said.

The sale, to a group including Clayton, Dubilier & Rice, the Carlyle Group and Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, is the latest super-sized buyout by a team of private equity firms.

Earlier this year, a consortium of investment firms paid $11.3 billion for SunGard Data Systems, which provides software and services to financial companies.

The largest leveraged buyout ever remains the purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company of RJR Nabisco in 1989 for $25 billion.

The deal ends a heated auction for Hertz, which started after Ford announced in April that it was considering putting the company up for sale or spinning it off. The winning investor group beat another team that included Bain Capital Partners, the Blackstone Group, the Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners.

Ford's decision to sell Hertz, which produced about 10 percent of Ford's overall pretax profit in the second quarter of this year, underscores the company's urgent efforts to raise cash as sales continue to decline. Ford is expected to use the proceeds of the sale to pay down debt.

Hertz operates in 7,000 locations in more than 140 countries. Ford acquired the company in 1994 after supplying its fleet for decades. It was unclear last night whether Ford would continue to be the company's exclusive vehicle supplier or whether the new owners would seek deals with other manufacturers.

European Corporations Catch Merger Mania (WSJ)

By Jason SingerAnd Matthew Karnitschnig

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

A sudden surge in takeover activity in Europe, with more than $70 billion of potential deals disclosed in the first several working days of September alone, highlights a new willingness by European corporate chiefs to pursue mergers and acquisitions, executives say.

The deluge of activity is also unusual in its outright aggressiveness. Several are hostile takeovers, unsolicited advances, and bidding wars, suggesting that this region -- once known for its more genteel approach to business -- may have changed for good.

DOJ_NMG_0004067

The deals, taking place across European borders and venturing into the U.S. and elsewhere, involve many industries. They are fueled by a confluence of factors, from companies finishing lengthy cost-cutting programs to sluggish economies at home forcing them to look abroad.

On Monday, Gas Natural SDG SA of Spain made a $28.5 billion unsolicited takeover attempt for fellow Spanish utility Endesa SA, which was rejected a day later, sparking a fight that is expected to drag on for months. Also on Monday, German energy giant E.On AG said it is considering making a bid for Scottish Power PLC of the United Kingdom, a company valued at $20 billion. And Deutsche Post AG, also of Germany, said it is trying to buy logistics concern Exel PLC of the U.K. for more than $7 billion.

While September is typically a busy time for deals -- Europeans have just returned from lengthy August vacations -- this year's activity is notable because the deals are bigger and there are more of them. The value of announced mergers between the beginning of August and early September is $123 billion, up from $33 billion in the year-earlier period, according to Thomson Financial.

While all these deals could fall through, executives and bankers say there are signs the spurt will continue. "You don't see an excessive concentration in any one sector. It's relatively widespread across country and industry," says Gordon Dyal, global head of M&A at Goldman Sachs.

A main driver of the new deal-making is a realization that shareholders have started rewarding ambitious tie-ups, after frowning on these actions since 2000. Chief executives noticed that shares of Pernod Ricard SA of France rose after it moved to take over larger U.K. spirits maker Allied Domecq PLC in April. The same thing happened when Italian bank UniCredito Italiano SpA made a move to take over HVB Group AG in Germany in Europe's biggest-ever cross-border banking deal. Usually, acquiring companies see their shares fall on fears of the financial strain from completing the deal.

"The market is increasingly receptive of chief executives doing deals that meet strategic needs," says Paulo Pereira, head of European M&A at Morgan Stanley.

Gerard Kleisterlee, president and CEO of Philips Electronics NV in Amsterdam, says he is "constantly" looking at expanding key businesses through acquisitions.

Across Europe, many major companies have spent the past several years cutting costs so are now leaner and have cash to do deals. Some European sectors, such as banking and utilities, are highly fragmented so companies need heft to compete globally. Growth in several key markets, such as Germany and Italy, has slowed, prompting companies there to seek sales elsewhere. And, as the healthier firms start expanding, competitors race to acquire the best targets before they are gobbled up by rivals, starting a chain reaction that breeds the type of aggressive deals seen recently.

By contrast, for more than three years, European companies have looked inward, cutting costs and improving efficiency. Instead of using cash for deals, they paid it back as cash to shareholders in the form of stock buybacks and dividends, which reached records over the past year. Private-equity funds stepped in to fill the gap, and accounted for nearly half of all M&A deals.

While nearly every country in Western Europe has seen a big deal announced in recent weeks, the trend is particularly acute in Germany. In many cases, formerly state-owned enterprises have been driving the buying spree as they increasingly look abroad for growth. Companies also face more competition in Germany's deregulated markets along with stagnant domestic demand for their products.

At German media giant Bertelsmann AG, "for two years, we concentrated on getting the business in order," says Siegfried Luther, Bertelsmann vice chairman and chief financial officer. "As a result, we've strengthened our financial situation so it's natural that we'd shift our focus outside the company."

The closely held media company's recent agreed-upon acquisitions include: DVD retailer Columbia House in the U.S., a major German-language magazine publisher, a French bookstore chain and a U.K. broadcaster. The company has spent about €2 billion ($2.5 billion) in recent months and has an additional €500 million earmarked for the rest of the year.

Deutsche Telekom AG, which nearly collapsed under a debt load approaching €70 billion three years ago, also has returned to acquisition mode. The telecom giant, which has pared its debt to €44.5 billion, agreed last month to acquire an Austrian wireless operator for €1.3 billion.

Within Europe, German companies have focused in particular on the U.K., drawn by its large market and the absence of political barriers to foreign investment in sectors such as media and energy.

Indeed, some longstanding political obstacles to foreign acquisitions remain in some major Western European markets, notably France and Italy, prompting several recent fights for companies that attempt deals there.

EU, Spanish Antitrust Watchdogs Become Pawns In Takeover Battle (WSJ)

By Jason Singer In London, Mary Jacoby In Brussels And Keith Johnson In Madrid, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Swords already are crossed in Gas Natural SDG SA's $28 billion hostile takeover bid for domestic rival Endesa SA, with the two companies clashing over who would approve any potential deal: the Spanish government or the European Commission.

Each company is arguing to have the deal vetted by the regulator it thinks will be most sympathetic to its side.

At stake is the approval Gas Natural needs to proceed with the largest takeover attempt in Spanish history. Part of Endesa's defense strategy is to push to involve the commission, which is likely to be far more critical of the potential merger of two of Europe's largest utilities, people close to the matter say.

Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said in a briefing yesterday[THURS] that it is "still unclear" whether European Union antitrust watchdogs or Spanish regulators will judge the proposed takeover.

But Gas Natural Chief Executive Rafael Villaseca said Brussels has no authority over the proposed deal because both companies have more than two-thirds of their businesses in Spain, making it solely a domestic issue to be decided in Madrid.

According to documents given to investors by Gas Natural, the Barcelona-based company expects antitrust and other regulatory reviews to stretch until March. Only then could a tender offer begin.

The European electricity market has lately seen a flurry of deal making. Earlier this week, Germany's E.On AG said it was considering a takeover bid for ScottishPower PLC.

Yesterday, Enel SpA of Italy said it has a war chest of as much as €14 billion ($17.4 billion) for acquisitions in Europe, as it reported a 17% drop in first-half net profit. Enel Chief Executive Fulvio Conti said he is closely monitoring the Spanish market as Enel feels the heat of increased domestic competition, but he ruled out a full counterbid for Endesa. "In Spain, we are interested in buying assets from Endesa, if Gas Natural puts them on the block," he said.

Mr. Conti said Enel still wants to buy 35% of France's Société Nationale d'Electricité et de Thermique, even if Endesa -- Snet's majority shareholder -- is bought by Gas Natural.

Past regulatory action on deals offers a hint at what Endesa is fighting for. Last year, Brussels blocked a deal among utilities in neighboring Portugal on grounds that the combination of a big gas distributor and an electricity firm would squelch competition and run afoul of antitrust safeguards. That decision is currently on appeal.

Spanish authorities, on the other hand, are expected to see Gas Natural's move in a more favorable light, people close to the situation say, because the combination of the companies would create a world-scale Spanish enterprise that, by some measures, would rank as the world's third-largest utility.

Spokesmen at the Spanish Finance Ministry, which oversees competition authorities, weren't available to comment.

Lawyers who specialize in European antitrust issues say Endesa won't be able to wrest control of the approval process from Madrid. European Commission merger rules say the regional body -- which is the executive arm of the EU -- can't review deals where the companies' operations are confined to one country, unless asked by that country to do so. It can "invite" a member nation to seek its assistance but can't force the issue, lawyers say.

"The rules are very clear," Mr. Villaseca said. The commission "doesn't have a way to disturb" the deal, he said.

Endesa Chief Executive Rafael Miranda met with EU officials Wednesday, but it was a long-planned meeting in which Mr. Miranda was acting in his role as president of Eurolectric, a trade group, an Endesa official said.

Endesa believes "in the interests of transparency that it would be a good idea for Brussels to review the operation," said Guillermo Rea, an Endesa spokesman. He said Endesa hasn't asked Spanish competition authorities to formally request an EU review, though all options are on the table.

If Spain asks for a review, "we would be happy to do so," said Mr. Todd, the European Commission spokesman.

--Vittorio Alessio in Rome contributed to this article.

Write to Jason Singer at jason.singer@wsj.com1, Mary Jacoby at mary.jacoby@wsj.com2 and Keith Johnson at keith.johnson@wsj.com3

Dell To Protect E-mail, Data For AMD V. Intel (REU)

Reuters, September 9, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO (Reuters) - Dell Inc. has agreed to retain e-mail and other documents that could be used against its close partner Intel Corp. in a private antitrust suit filed by Intel rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. , court papers show.

The agreement, filed on Wednesday in the U.S. District Court in Delaware, comes as AMD presses its case against Intel, accusing the world's largest chip maker of using its market power to lock out AMD and its microprocessors from computer makers such as Dell, Hewlett-Packard Co. and others.

Dell, the largest PC maker, buys microprocessors exclusively from Intel. The Texas-based PC maker agreed to preserve relevant information and copy hard drives of employees identified as "custodians" -- those who were involved in negotiating microprocessor purchases.

Among the 28 custodians listed were Michael Dell, the company's founder and chairman. Dell Inc. reserved its right to contest a subpoena for the documents.

AMD has sought information on pricing, contracts and other information from dozens of PC makers and distributors, and virtually all companies in the United States and Japan have agreed to take steps to protect data, AMD's lead counsel, Chuck Diamond, said in an interview.

AMD began talks with companies on legal document preservation in early July, Diamond said. A process of culling millions of pages of documents will follow before the case goes to trial. AMD has already served a subpoena on PC maker Gateway Inc. , according to court papers filed this week.

ADVERTISEMENT

Dell declined to comment on the agreement. "We're just not going to comment because it is an ongoing court matter," Dell spokesman Jess Blackburn said. Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy characterized the document preservation requests as procedural.

Intel and AMD at least agree on one thing. The case is poised to become the largest-ever electronic document discovery cases ever, as dozens of computer makers, distributors and retailers in countries around the world are called on to divulge data about their business relationships with Intel.

ENVIRONMENT:

Some In Senate Seek To Change Mercury Rule (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - With a deadline for action approaching, senators from both parties rallied support on Thursday for a resolution that would kill the Bush administration's proposed rule to limit mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants.

Appearing at a midday news conference, the senators said the rule was written to satisfy the utility industry and would take too long to produce benefits, causing serious health problems for thousands of people, especially pregnant women and young children living near the plants.

The senators are trying to send the rule back to the Environmental Protection Agency for reconsideration through a rarely successful procedure known as the Congressional Review Act, which allows lawmakers to challenge agency regulations through a resolution that is guaranteed a floor vote.

The deadline for the vote is Monday, although Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said other issues might force him to extend it by several days.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said, "It is sad and it is appalling to see how the agency has been captured by polluting special interests in decisions on limiting mercury pollution."

Mr. Leahy was joined by Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Senator James M. Jeffords of Vermont, an independent who generally votes with Democrats on environmental issues.

Ms. Collins said: "We want to give the E.P.A. a chance to fix the rule and do it right."

It is doubtful, however, that their effort will produce anything more than a symbolic protest. To force a change in the rule, the resolution would have to win majority votes in the Senate and the House as well as President Bush's approval - all of which are considered highly unlikely.

Only two Republicans, Ms. Collins and Senator Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, have expressed support for the resolution, and in the 10 years since the review act has been available, only one challenge has succeeded.

Mr. Leahy conceded that he did not know how the Senate might vote on the mercury resolution, saying, "We'll have to wait and see."

Power plants are the largest single source of mercury emissions in the country, accounting for more than 90,000 pounds of airborne mercury a year, about a third of the total output.

Until 2001, the emissions were governed by the Clean Air Act, which required plants to have the best available technology in place by 2009, improvements projected to lower emissions by 90 percent. The Bush administration changed course, removing power plants from Clean Air Act jurisdiction and proposing the first regulatory effort to cut the emissions with a plan to reduce output by 70 percent within 13 years.

Republicans, in general, favor the approach because it employs the kind of cap-and-trade system that proved effective in combating adverse effects of acid rain, and it is less expensive to power plant owners that alternatives. Under this system, a plant can exceed its permitted level of emissions by buying credits from a plant in the same region whose emissions are below what is allowed.

Democrats and many environmental and public health groups have attacked the administration rule, saying it violates the law and has the potential to lead to unnecessarily high levels of health problems because of its delayed carrying out.

Dr. Leonardo Trasande, assistant director of the Center for Children's Health and Environment at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York, who joined the news conference, said a new study by his hospital found that each year 231 children nationwide suffer mental retardation caused by their mothers' exposure to mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants.

Industry groups were quick to attack the senators' effort, arguing that the proposed rule is the most efficient and cost-effective way to reduce mercury emissions.

"The best way to address concerns about mercury emissions from U.S. power plants is to leave the existing regulations in place," said Dan Riedinger, spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, a trade group of power companies that generate about 60 percent of the nation's electricity. "Sending E.P.A. back to the drawing board would only delay regulation of power plant emissions, not accelerate them, as Senator Leahy and others claim."

Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, a trade group, accused the senators of misusing the review act and taking up valuable Senate time when more pressing issues were facing the country.

"Frankly, we are quite surprised that the Senate may make time to even consider this petition," Mr. Segal said, alluding to the mounting problems caused by Hurricane Katrina. "We can hardly think of a worse time to be doing so."

3rd Circuit Rejects Substantial Continuity Test (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Law.com, September 9, 2005

It's not too often that a federal judge declares that five of the judges on her own bench were wrong about a point of law in a string of decisions spanning a decade.

What's even rarer is when that lone judge learns, just days after she sticks her neck out, that she was right to do so -- due to the coincidence of an appellate court decision in an unrelated case that tackles the same legal question.

Both decisions are sure to grab the attention of environmental lawyers because they clarify the rules courts should use in deciding when a corporation may be held liable under the Superfund law on a theory of "successor liability."

On Aug. 31, U.S. District Judge of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania Anita B. Brody handed down a 37-page decision in Action Manufacturing Co. Inc. v. Simon Wrecking Co., in which she rejected the plaintiff's argument that Marcegaglia USA Inc. should share responsibility for the costs of an environmental clean-up in Malvern, Pa.

Lawyers for Action Manufacturing had argued that Marcegaglia was also liable as the successor-in-interest to Bishop Tube Co. because it had purchased the assets of Bishop Tube in a bankruptcy court sale.

To win its argument, Action Manufacturing had to persuade Brody to apply the so-called "substantial continuity" test.

Brody said she recognized that five of her Eastern District colleagues have applied the substantial continuity test in toxic clean-up cases brought under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act, or CERCLA, in a string of decisions spanning from 1993 to 2002.

Although the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has never endorsed the test, Brody found that, in light of the 1998 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Bestfoods, it is no longer good law, and that "the national trend is to reject the substantial continuity test."

As Brody described it, the substantial continuity test "is not part of the traditional doctrine of successor liability. ... Rather, the substantial continuity test, also known as the 'continuity of the enterprise test,' is often described as an expansion of the traditional 'mere continuation' theory of successor liability."

Under the traditional mere continuation theory, a purchasing corporation is liable as a "mere continuation" of the transferor corporation if, after the transfer of assets, there is an identity of stock, stockholders and directors between the two corporations.

But Brody found that the substantial continuity test "expands the mere continuation doctrine by making a purchaser of assets liable if it is a 'substantial continuation' of the seller corporation, even if there is no identity of stock and stockholders."

With no 3rd Circuit ruling on the point, Brody looked to other appellate courts and found that the circuits are split, with four circuits -- the 1st, 2nd, 6th and 9th -- rejecting the "substantial continuity" theory and only two -- the 4th and 8th -- endorsing it. Forced to choose, Brody looked to the 3rd Circuit's 1988 decision in Smith Land & Improvement Corp. v. Celotex Corp. which instructed courts to "follow federal common law" when deciding successor liability issues.

In passing CERCLA, the Smith Land court said, Congress "expected the courts to develop a federal common law to supplement the statute."

DOJ_NMG_0004071

Brody also found that, in determining the content of federal common law, the 3rd Circuit "emphasized the need for national uniformity and the need to consider the general doctrine of successor liability in all states."

As a result, Brody concluded that the substantial continuity test must now be rejected. "Given Smith Land's concerns with national uniformity and given that courts in the 3rd Circuit must apply federal common law which consists of the general doctrine of successor liability applicable in most states, I follow the majority of circuit courts that have addressed this issue and conclude that the substantial continuity test should not be applied to determine successor liability in CERCLA cases," Brody wrote.

"The substantial continuity test is not part of federal common law because it is not part of the general doctrine on successor liability in operation in most states. Nor should I attempt to expand federal common law beyond traditional common law rules in order to encompass the substantial continuity test."

If Brody was wondering whether she got it right, she didn't have to wonder very long. On Tuesday, the 3rd Circuit handed down its 56-page opinion in United States v. General Battery Corp. Inc.

Writing for the court, Chief Judge Anthony J. Scirica said, "we return, once again, to the difficult area of indirect liability under CERCLA."

CERCLA, Scirica said, is a "sweeping" federal remedial statute that was passed in 1980 to ensure that "everyone who is potentially responsible for hazardous-waste contamination may be forced to contribute to the costs of cleanup."

But Scirica noted that the law "is not, however, a model of legislative draftsmanship," and that "successor liability is one of its puzzles."

Most of Scirica's opinion is devoted to a discussion of whether the two appellants -- General Battery and Exide Corp. -- were properly held liable on the government's argument that, due to a "de facto merger," they were the successors-in-interest to Price Battery Corp.

Upholding a ruling by Senior U.S. District Judge Ronald L. Buckwalter, Scirica concluded that "the de facto merger criteria are satisfied."

But in a brief, final section of the opinion, Scirica effectively upheld Brody's decision by rejecting Buckwalter's alternative holding that Exide would also be liable under CERCLA on a "substantial continuity" theory of successor liability.

Scirica noted that, prior to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Bestfoods, several courts had adopted the substantial continuity test as a basis for CERCLA successor liability. The substantial continuity theory, Scirica said, "eliminates certain elements of the de facto merger analysis -- including the continuity of ownership requirement — and in effect creates a more expansive rule of liability than is accepted in most states."

But recently, Scirica found, several of the federal circuits "have rejected the doctrine as inconsistent with Bestfoods."

With just two sentences of discussion, Scirica said the 3rd Circuit was joining its sister circuits in rejecting substantial continuity.

"Bestfoods held that CERCLA does not, sub silentio, abrogate fundamental common law principles of indirect corporate liability," Scirica wrote. "Accordingly, 'substantial continuity' is untenable as a basis for successor liability under CERCLA."

In the case before Brody, Marcegaglia USA was represented by attorneys Robert W. Thomson, C. Shawn Dryer, Steven F. Baicker-McKee and Kevin K. Douglass of Babst Calland Clements & Zomnir in Pittsburgh. Action Manufacturing was represented by attorneys Larry Silver, David E. Romine and Sandra Gibbs of Langsam Stevens & Silver in Philadelphia.

In the 3rd Circuit case, Justice Department attorney John T. Stahr argued for the government; General Battery and Exide were represented by attorneys Robert L. Collings and Carl A. Solano of Schnader Harrison Segal & Lewis.

A Light In The Forests (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

The Bush administration has largely succeeded in its systematic effort to roll back environmental protections for America's national forests. It has weakened agreements to protect old-growth trees in the Pacific Northwest, persuaded Congress to adopt an industry-friendly plan for fire suppression and overhauled rules governing forest management in ways that erode safeguards not only for the forests but also for the endangered species that live there.

Now, however, a rebellion is brewing where the White House least expected it. Western governors are challenging the most controversial rollback of all: the decision to repeal a popular rule approved near the end of the Clinton administration to protect nearly 60 million acres of remote national forest from commercial development.

The attorneys general of California and New Mexico and the governor of Oregon have filed a suit charging that the administration failed to conduct necessary environmental reviews before imposing the new rule. They argued further that the rule would endanger "the last, most pristine portions of America's national forests," leading to excessive logging and destroying essential watersheds.

DOJ_NMG_0004072

The lawsuit followed complaints from other governors, including Republicans, that the new rule would saddle them with impossible administrative burdens. The rule would requires states to survey all roadless areas within their borders and devise protection plans, then submit the plans to Washington for approval, with no guarantee of success.

The rebellion is an embarrassment for an administration that had assumed that the governors would leap at the chance to exercise states' rights. It now seems clear that the governors prefer a uniform national approach to federal roadless areas rather than piecemeal management.

The rebellion should also improve the prospects of a bill introduced by Sherwood Boehlert, Republican of New York, and Jay Inslee, Democrat of Washington, to restore the old roadless rule. Now that the governors have spoken, there seems to be no reason to further indulge the commercial interests of a few timber companies.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Pelican Bay State Prison Gang Leaders Get Life Sentences (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, September 9, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO -- Five Pelican Bay State Prison gang leaders were sentenced Thursday to life in federal prison on various racketeering, drug and weapons violations after Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger commuted their state terms.

The inmates were already serving life sentences at the notorious state prison in Crescent City that houses California's worst offenders. With their convictions, they will be transferred to separate federal prisons around the country.

"By incarcerating these defendants in federal maximum security prisons, this organization's operational capabilities will be seriously disrupted," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said.

Defendants Cornelio Tristan, 44, James Morado, 57, Joseph Hernandez, 55, Gerald Rubalcaba, 50, and Tex Hernandez, 50, were leaders of the Nuestra Familia prison gang. They admitted that while they were behind bars, the organization murdered two former gang members and engaged in numerous drug transactions from which they profited.

The five defendants were the last of 22 Nuestra Familia members and associates sentenced in the federal case that began five years ago.

The U.S. Justice Department's key witness in the case, former Nuestra Familia leader Daniel Fred Hernandez, will soon walk free even though he admitted to selling drugs and committing other crimes while working for the government.

Hernandez, 42, cut a deal with federal prosecutors for a reduced sentence in return for providing evidence against fellow gang members. He was arrested nearly five years ago and faced life in prison on the same racketeering charges as the others.

As part of his plea deal, Hernandez agreed to wear a wire and set up drug and gun buys for fellow gang members.

Hernandez was sentenced Wednesday in San Francisco by U.S. District Court Judge Charles Breyer to 54 months in federal custody. He has already served 49 months and has received credit for good behavior.

Nuestra Familia originated about 40 years ago within prison walls among Hispanic inmates from rural Northern California as a way for members to protect themselves against rival prison gangs.

Gang Leaders In Federal Hands (MHCA)

By Julia Reynolds And George B. Sanchez

Montery (CA) Herald, September 9, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO - The intense federal prosecution of Nuestra Familia leaders ended Thursday with a warning from the judge who has presided over the case since 2000.

"This was a very expensive prosecution, involving millions," U.S. District Court Judge Charles Breyer said after sentencing the gang's top five leaders to life in federal prison.

Federal prison officials now, he said, need to make sure they keep the gang from spreading throughout the country the way it spread though the California prison system.

The responsibility for keeping the gang under control is now in the hands of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, Breyer said.

Chained and surrounded by nine U.S. marshals in a specially modified courtroom, James "Tibbs" Morado, 57, Joseph "Pinky" Hernandez, 55, Gerald "Cuete" Rubalcaba, 50, Cornelio Tristan, 44, and Tex Marin Hernandez, 50, were all given life terms in federal prison with the condition that if they are ever released for any reason, they will be returned to California prisons.

"At the time of the pleas, I voiced concerns" about the potential for contamination of the federal system, Breyer said. "I think what I said then is true today. It is a serious concern."

DOJ_NMG_0004073

California authorities also had expressed fears that federal officials might cut deals with the quintet that would enable some or all to be freed in exchange for cooperation.

U.S. Attorney Kevin V. Ryan praised 10 agencies for their roles in the investigation, including the Monterey County Sheriff's Office and District Attorney's Office and the Salinas Police Department.

Operation Black Widow began with the promise of crippling the Nuestra Familia. In 2000, federal prosecutor Robert Mueller, now head of the FBI, began the case in Salinas with 11 indictments, saying the arrests would have "a dramatic impact on criminal activities" in Monterey County and elsewhere.

This week, it all ended quietly and without fanfare. Only a few onlookers attended Thursday's hearing.

The case had been at an impasse for nearly a year since the men agreed to life sentences in federal custody after pleading guilty to a single count of conspiring to conduct a criminal enterprise through a pattern of racketeering.

Federal prosecutors had assumed the state would quickly commute the defendants' life sentences so they could enter the federal system.

Some district attorneys protested the commutation, fearing the defendants could enter federal witness protection programs or become eligible for federal parole if it is reinstated.

Last week, the state's Supreme Court advised Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to relinquish the gang leaders from life sentences in California as long as federal authorities provided the necessary assurances.

On Wednesday, the governor signed commutation letters for each of the five defendants.

Thursday's sentencing hearing began with a moment of tension when attorneys realized the letters from the governor's office hadn't arrived. Once the faxed letters were delivered by U.S. Attorney Edward Torpoco, the proceeding went quickly.

Through their attorneys, the defendants asked for two changes to their pre-sentencing reports, which Breyer agreed to do.

One was that they be described as "Mexican" or "Mexican/Indian" instead of "White/Hispanic."

Another was a request to strike a description of the gang's communication methods that said coded messages are delivered by the defendant's spouses and girlfriends. Defense attorneys said the defendants felt the paragraph's language might be used to keep family members from visiting them in the future.

With the federal sentences finally handed down, the five are likely to be transferred from a holding facility in Dublin to various federal prisons within a few weeks.

Many of the original defendants were serving prisons terms in California when they were indicted federally.

The "final five" leaders all had life sentences. They were locked down for 23 hours a day in the security housing unit at Pelican Bay State Prison. Despite the heaviest security of any California prison, they managed to run one of the nation's most sophisticated criminal enterprises, issuing orders for murders and other crimes on the streets via smuggled messages or through inmates being paroled.

In an attempt to "cut off the head" of the gang, federal prosecutors teamed up with state law enforcement agencies to launch Operation Black Widow.

But some gang investigators, like Al Valdez of the Orange County District Attorney's Office, say that putting the gang's hard-core leaders into the federal system may broaden the gang's reach.

"They have plans and they have connections," he said. The gang may or may not succeed in gaining a strong base in federal prisons, he said, "but they certainly will attempt it."

Attorney Ann Moorman, who represents Rubalcaba, said the sentences were the "right result for this case."

Because the case never went to trial, some questions that surfaced during the years of waiting will never be answered.

One concern is the precise role played by criminal informants, whom defense attorneys said were too active in the gang's criminal activities while working as government witnesses. One key informant, Danny Hernandez, is expected to be released from custody within weeks although he committed numerous crimes with and without the knowledge of his FBI handlers during the investigation, according to FBI reports and other documents.

Assistant United States Attorney Edward Torpoco defended the use of criminal informants during Operation Black Widow.

"Law enforcement in the past has typically used whatever means it can within the bounds of the law to combat organized crime," he said.

"The alternative was to do nothing and that was not an acceptable alternative," Torpoco explained.

Another lingering question, as some investigators suspect, is whether the five leaders played a role in the death of 20-year-old Crystal Morado of Salinas, while they awaited trial. Crystal Morado married James Morado while he was in the Dublin facility, and was found slain several months later on Hecker Pass near Gilroy.

jreynolds@montereyherald.com.

George B. Sanchez can be reached at 753-6771 or gesanchez@ montereyherald.com.

Gang Members Arrested In Major Crackdown (MH)

By Mark Sherman

The Miami Herald, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - More than 650 suspected members of MS-13 and other gangs were arrested in the United States, Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras in a coordinated crackdown on violent Hispanic gangs, officials said Thursday.

But even as a senior FBI official set a goal of dismantling MS-13 in the next 18 months, police officials from the other countries described vast challenges in quelling gang activity in their prisons and disrupting recruitment.

The roundup, conducted Wednesday by 6,400 law enforcement officers in the five countries, was run out of FBI headquarters in Washington, FBI assistant director Chris Swecker said.

"Our end game is to take out the leadership elements especially," Swecker said at a news conference. "These arrests are a means to that end."

Police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said. Thirty-two people were arrested in California alone.

Authorities also arrested 237 people in El Salvador, 162 in Honduras, 98 in Guatemala and 90 in Mexico. The arrests in Mexico all took place in the southern Chiapas state, near the border with Guatemala.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among Central American immigrants. An estimated 10,000 MS-13 members are in the U.S., with the highest concentrations in Los Angeles, New York, northern Virginia and Maryland, the FBI said.

MS-13 may have as many as 50,000 members in the other four countries, officials said.

The foreign police officials said they are all but powerless to stop gang activity in the prison population. "The gang leader must die," said Gen. Mirna Suazo Rivera of the Honduran National Preventive Police.

In El Salvador, poor areas are fertile recruiting grounds, where "10,000 gang members have 10,000 families, brothers, sons, nephews, cousins," said Douglas Omar Garcia-Funes, the country's assistant director of investigations.

ON THE NET

FBI: http://www.fbi.gov

Gang Crackdown Nets 650 Suspects (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

MEXICO CITY — More than 650 suspected gang members were arrested in a five-nation crackdown, including scores in the southern Mexican state of Chiapas, officials said Thursday.

An FBI statement said more than 6,400 law enforcement officers in the U.S., Mexico, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras participated in the coordinated crackdown against gangs, particularly MS-13.

In Mexico, Chiapas suffers most from MS-13 because the state's southern border with Guatemala is a crucial transit point for Central American immigrants.

Gang members prey on largely defenseless migrants, robbing, raping and killing them, especially along a railroad line that runs from Chiapas to the U.S.-Mexico border.

About 1,500 state and local police officers participated in the Chiapas raids, said the state public security secretary, Horacio Schroeder Bejarano. No violence was reported.

Fifty-four of the 94 people arrested there were thought to be Central Americans. The others were Mexicans believed to have been recruited by the gang, also known as Mara Salvatrucha.

Bejarano said there was a warrant for each arrest. The detainees were wanted in various crimes, including homicide.

"These arrests are a consequence of meetings between the security agencies of all the countries in the region and were designed to hit the trans-border criminal gangs," Bejarano said. "They are a problem from Honduras all the way up to the United States."

FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said at a news conference that the operation was run from Washington.

U.S. police and federal agents made 73 arrests, more than half on immigration charges, in 13 states, Swecker said. Thirty-two of the arrests were in California.

Authorities also arrested 237 people in El Salvador, 162 in Honduras and 98 in Guatemala.

MS-13 originated in Los Angeles among Central American immigrants.

According to the FBI, an estimated 10,000 members of the gang are in the United States, with the highest concentrations in Los Angeles, New York, northern Virginia and Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0004075

MS-13 may have as many as 50,000 members in the other four countries, officials said.

Associated Press was used in compiling this report.

Massive International Sting Nets 660 (CNN)

By Terry Frieden, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- A massive international sweep targeting violent MS-13 gang members in the United States and Central America produced about 660 arrests, law enforcement authorities announced Thursday.

The two-day operation, which ended early Thursday, involved more than 6,400 government agents in five countries: the United States, El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Mexico. Top officials from each country coordinated from a joint command post at FBI headquarters in Washington.

"I haven't seen anything like this in 23 years," said veteran FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker, who oversaw the operation.

Alejandro Diaz de Leon, of the southern Mexican state of Chiapas, said, "There is no precedent in our law enforcement effort."

An estimated 10,000 members are in the United States, and while they have been most active in Los Angeles, New York and northern Virginia, other regions are gaining members.

Officials say Central America has about 50,000 MS-13 members, and that the operation is an important step in their common goal of eradicating the MS-13 gang in the next 18 months.

Taking the gang members off the street is only a first step in solving El Salvador's gang problem, said Douglas Omar Garcia Fumes, assistant director of investigations there.

"They continue to operate even after they're arrested. Orders to kill are coming out of our prisons. We have only one maximum security prison," he said.

The operation's scope and collaborative effort "sent a message to MS-13 and other like gangs that their criminal enterprise and the violence they perpetrate will not be tolerated," Swecker said.

The Mara Salvatrucha (MS) gang was first formed in Los Angeles by young men from El Salvador. Most of the members have family ties to that country or to Honduras.

The largest number of arrests -- 237 -- was in El Salvador, where the brutal gang is entrenched. Other arrests included 162 in Honduras, 98 in Guatemala, 90 in Mexico and 73 in the United States.

U.S. cities with the highest number of arrests were: Los Angeles, with 20; San Francisco, with 12; Atlanta, six; and Charlotte, five.

Carrying out the raids in 13 states were agents from the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Immigrations and Customs Enforcement; and local police.

Last month 19 suspected MS-13 gang members were charged in a federal racketeering indictment accusing them of killings and other violent crimes. (Full story)

In May two MS-13 members were convicted for the murder of pregnant federal witness Brenda Paz. (Full story)

FBI Makes Arrests Against Violent Gang Members (KNBC-TV)

KNBC-TV, September 9, 2005

LOS ANGELES -- The FBI Thursday conducted a "coordinated, five-nation law enforcement effort" against violent gangs, including the notorious Mara Salvatrucha-13 organization, which has a large membership in Los Angeles.

"These gangs are organizing internationally, and so are we," FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said in a statement.

Thursday's actions included the participation of more than 6,400 police officers, federal agents or law enforcement personnel, operating in 15 states, as well as in El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Mexico. An unknown number of people were arrested.

The effort was part of a series of actions undertaken with state, local, federal and foreign agencies, coordinated by the FBI's National Gang Task Force, which was established last year to fight gang violence.

The task force's first main target was the Mara Salvatrucha-13, also known as MS-13. The gang's presence has been identified in 33 states, the District of Columbia, Mexico and a number of countries in Central America.

MS-13's estimated membership is more than 10,000 in the United States, with the largest concentration in Los Angeles, Northern Virginia, Maryland and New York.

Swecker described Thursday's operation as "historic ... unprecedented in scope."

DOJ_NMG_0004076

"By bringing together resources from the local, state, federal and international law enforcement community, all levels of U.S. law enforcement and our international partners are working together and sharing information," Swecker said.

"This represents but a beginning, another step, in an ongoing national and international effort to go on offense and to strike back against gang violence," Swecker said.

FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (OREG)

By Noelle Crombie, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, September 9, 2005

Federal agents arrested five self-described MS-13 gang members on Wednesday as part of a nationwide crackdown on the notoriously brutal street gang.

The individuals were arrested on administrative immigration violations and were picked up in Portland, Gresham and Cornelius, authorities said. They have not been charged with a crime and face deportation.

Immigration authorities would not release the names, citing their practice of not identifying individuals accused of administrative violations.

Robert Jordan, the top FBI agent in Oregon, announced the arrests, saying authorities are "seeing the beginnings of a movement of members to Oregon, and we are very serious about making sure MS-13 can't establish a strong foothold in our communities."

The suspected gang members were identified through criminal investigations throughout the country, said Dan Nielsen, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Portland.

Portland gang detectives said Wednesday they have not seen documented MS-13 activity in the area. Gang detectives rely on residents, gang members, and police reports from Portland officers as well as those from outside agencies to identify gang members and gang-related crimes.

Portland Police Officer Russ Corno, a member of the bureau's gang unit for eight years, said competing gang members typically alert police to the presence of another gang. He said officers have encountered a few claiming to be members of MS-13, but said "as far as them getting a major foothold or doing recruiting -- I don't think that it's going on here."

He said concerns about the violent gang are valid, but said they are not having an impact on the Portland area gang scene.

Last year, the FBI set up a national task force to focus on dismantling MS-13.

Experts say MS-13 is an international criminal organization -- trafficking in drugs, arms, alien smuggling, prostitution and home robberies.

Refugees fleeing the U.S.-backed civil war against guerrillas in El Salvador created the gang in a Salvadoran neighborhood of Los Angeles. MS is short for Mara Salvatrucha: "Mara" means gang in Salvadoran; "Salvatrucha" is the word for a Salvadoran male, and was used by guerrilla fighters in El Salvador. The 13 means the gang is a "Sureno" or Southern California Latino gang.

Federal authorities characterize the gang as a soulless, tattooed army of cutthroats, audacious enough to go to war with Central American political groups and California's most infamous gangsters.

Noelle Crombie: 503-276-7184; noellecrombie@news.oregonian.com.

FBI Arrests Suspected MS-13 Gang Members (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, September 9, 2005

Five people who claim to be members of the brutal street gang called "M-S-13" face deportation after they were arrested for immigration violations.

Officials say none was charged with a crime. The immigration violations are part of the administrative procedure leading to possible deportation.

Robert Jordan, the top FBI agent in Oregon, announced the arrests Wednesday as part of a national crackdown. He said the FBI is serious about ensuring that M-S-13 can't establish a strong foothold in the communities.

Last year, the FBI set up a national task force to focus on dismantling MS-13, an international criminal organization that trafficks in drugs, weapons, alien smuggling, prostitution and home robberies.

Four Gwinnett Men Arrested In Gang Sting (GWINNDP)

By Bryan Brooks, Staff Writer

Gwinnet (GA) Daily Post, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004077

LAWRENCEVILLE — Four arrests were made Wednesday in Gwinnett County as part of an international investigation into the violent street gang "Mara Salvatrucha," federal officials said Thursday.

Nationwide, 73 individuals were arrested in the FBI-led crackdown involving local police officers and federal agents in 15 states.

Also known as "MS-13," the international gang has been implicated here and elsewhere in a number of violent crimes, including murder, aggravated assault, rape, firearms violations, drive by shootings and robberies, according to the FBI.

Six gang members were arrested across metro Atlanta, including four in Gwinnett, said FBI Special Agent Steve Emmett.

One arrest was made in Lawrenceville and the other three in unincorporated Norcross, Emmett said.

Although the FBI identified those arrested, Emmett declined to say where each individual was taken into custody.

"We're not going to stipulate who was where," he said. "There were searches conducted (in Gwinnett) and small amounts of marijuana were seized in some instances and various fake IDs and gang paraphernalia were noted."

Arrested were: Roman Aguilar, 24, Juan Claros, 29, Walter Hernandez, 22, Juan "Joker" Maye, 25, Pedro "Mousie" Maye, 20, and Gustavo "Conejo" Martinez, 24.

Martinez is the leader of a local "set of MS-13," according to the FBI, which said all six are in the country illegally and subject to deportation.

The Gwinnett County and Lawrenceville police departments participated in the operation that included the FBI, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

MS-13 has its origins in Los Angeles and El Salvador and is widely dispersed, although there are "clear indications" some within the gang are trying to organize it into a regional and national crime organization with strengthened ties to better established and more violent MS-13 cliques in Central America, according to the FBI.

As part of Wednesday's effort, law enforcement authorities in El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Mexico conducted separate but coordinated actions against MS-13 that netted 563 arrests, according to the FBI.

Gang membership in those four countries is estimated to be as high as 50,000. In the United States it is thought to be more than 10,000, with the largest concentration in Los Angeles, Northern Virginia, Maryland and New York, according to the FBI, which has created a task force to dismantle the gang.

Police Investigate Crime Spree (WMTV-TV)

By Natalie Swaby

WMTV-TV, September 9, 2005

"$45,000 to $55,000 on an average day," says Captain Richard Bach of Madison Police's North District.

Police claim that dollar figure is what their suspects brought in by allegedly stealing over the counter medications while having ties to MS-13, a violent gang.

"They are just one part of a larger organized group, there are many of these small groups of these people throughout the country that commit these types of crimes," explains Bach.

An FBI tip brought officers to a Northside Madison motel on August 29th.

A four hour stake out brought in the two suspects, 21-year old Leonel Avendano and 23-year old Elvis Fuentes-Lazo as well as two boxes of evidence.

Bach says, "in their possession was about $10,000 worth of stolen over the counter medication that they had stolen from about 22 Walgreens in the Madison area the day before."

Detectives interviewed the suspects who are from Houston.

According to Captain Bach, they made the trip to Madison, and allegedly mapped out area Walgreens. Police say their plan was to then steal merchandise, and send it to a company in Louisville, Kentucky.

Now the two men are being held in Dane County jail in connection with felony retail theft. Detectives are also looking into possible connections with MS-13.

"We have not had any encounters or information that the violent MS-13 gang is in Madison. We're not even saying that these were gang members. We are saying they had an affiliation with the gang as far as this criminal activity," says Bach.

MS-13 is a gang that originated in El Salvador, but has spread into the United States. Members are trained in warfare and weapons. This gang is often connected to violent crimes, homicides, and drug deals.

Baggage Handlers Jailed In Smuggling Probe (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004078

The illegal drugs were transported in suitcases on American Airlines flights departing from Port-au-Prince and arriving at MIA, sources said. The baggage handlers received tips about which luggage contained the cocaine, so they could unload it to evade authorities.

Some of the defendants arrested Thursday are expected to appear today in federal court in Fort Lauderdale, the sources said.

The unsealed indictment names 11 defendants, including one who is still at large. The investigation, by the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is targeting other suspects.

Officials with the FBI, which is leading the inquiry, declined to comment.

According to sources, the investigation of baggage handlers at MIA is unrelated to the DEA's three-year investigation of cocaine trafficking and money laundering in the administration of deposed Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, who is in exile in South Africa.

That investigation has led to conspiracy charges against at least 14 defendants. Most have pleaded guilty.

MIAMI-DADE

SEX-OFFENDER LAW VOTE DEFERRED

Miami-Dade County commissioners deferred voting on an ordinance Thursday that would have barred sexual offenders from living within 2,500 feet of a private or public school -- a distance more than twice the limit imposed by Florida statute.

"We just want to make sure this is constitutional," said Commissioner Jose "Pepe" Diaz, one of the sponsors of the proposed laws. Municipalities within Miami-Dade had expressed concern about a law that would supersede local rules regarding sexual offenders, and concerns about the legal ramifications of an overly broad law have surfaced in recent weeks.

MIAMI

TRIAL OF NFL'S TAYLOR DELAYED UNTIL OCT. 24

A judge has delayed the trial of Washington Redskins safety Sean Taylor on aggravated assault charges until Oct. 24.

The trial had been scheduled to begin Monday, one day after the Redskins open their season against the Chicago Bears. Taylor's attorney, Edward Carhart, said he needs more time to take witness statements and gather other evidence for his client's defense.

Prosecutors did not object to the delay, which was granted Thursday by Miami-Dade Circuit Judge Mary Barzee.

Taylor, a former University of Miami standout, allegedly was among a group of people who got into an armed confrontation over an all-terrain vehicle. Prosecutors say Taylor pointed a gun at someone during the dispute. He is charged with aggravated assault with a firearm and simple battery.

Taylor, who pleaded not guilty, faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted. Taylor signed a seven-year, $18 million contract after being drafted by the Redskins in 2004.

AVENTURA

CITY HALL TO TURN INTO A CONCERT HALL

With no dedicated space for cultural activities and the desire to have more events in the city, Aventura officials are getting creative with the space they have.

The upstairs atrium of the government center will be transformed into a piano concert hall 3 p.m. Nov. 6 when the winners of the Murray Dranoff International Twin Piano Competition come to play.

There are no museums, concert halls or theaters within Aventura's city limits. And a push to bring one there died about two years ago.

The concert will be the first of what they hope will be a series. Featured to play are 1993 winners, Elizabeth Laich and Marcel Bergmann and 2003 winners, Per Tengstrand and Shan-Shan Sun.

For the concert, the city will bring in up to 250 folding chairs. The concert will be free for residents, and tickets will be given on a first come first serve basis.

DESIGN DISTRICT

BENEFIT TO AID HAITIAN ORPHANS

South Floridians wishing to help the orphaned children of Haiti can do so today by bringing everything from bars of soaps to their checkbooks to an evening fundraiser at Gigi's Bistro, 190 NE 46th St. in Miami's Design District.

The charity happy hour between 6 and 10 p.m. will benefit Mercy House Orphanage of Haiti, which provides a home and schooling to some of Haiti's smallest and neediest citizens in Port-au-Prince.

Among the items the charity hopes to collect for an upcoming trip later this month: toothpaste and child-size toothbrushes, pencils and pens, nonelectric pencil sharpeners, erasers, durable color markers, pencil cases and composition notebooks.

For further information,contact Julie Katrude, 305-803-4168.

DOJ_NMG_0004079

Drug Cash Smuggling Booming On U.S.-Mexico Border (REU)

By Tim Gaynor

Reuters, September 8, 2005

TIJUANA, Mexico (Reuters) - When the Mexican customs light blinked red at the border crossing with the United States, the driver of the white Chrysler van panicked, put his foot on the gas pedal and made a dash south for Tijuana.

Stopped a few hundred yards down the road, agents found $1,023,000 dollars in $20, $50 and $100 bills crammed into the dash, glove box and even the cloth seat backs of the vehicle traveling from Los Angeles.

For decades, U.S. law enforcement agencies have clamped down on Mexican drug cartels hauling cocaine, marijuana, heroin and amphetamines north over an ever-more tightly watched border to the United States.

Now, with stricter controls on bank accounts and wire transfers, officials are concerned that drug gangs are increasingly running illicit profits back to Mexico in piles of hard cash in cars, trucks and even on foot.

U.S. authorities have seized almost $40 million in bank notes headed into Mexico since 2002 and say cases like that of the van, which was stopped at random crossing into Tijuana in June, are just the tip of the iceberg.

"Bulk currency smuggling is probably the most important part in the war on drugs, although it's not addressed as widely as it should be in law enforcement circles," said Dan Burke, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement supervisory special agent in San Diego.

"Usually when you get a million bucks there's a lot of high-fiving going on, but every single day $1-$2 million in drug money goes across the border here undetected," he added.

STRICTLY CASH

For years, drug gangs bought up houses, cars and luxury goods with cash in the United States and banked billions in profits to send back to Mexican and Colombian suppliers through electronic transfers.

But in 2000, the U.S. Bank Secrecy Act slapped reporting requirements on all cash transactions over $10,000, curtailing the cartels' spending sprees and making cash smuggling attractive for repatriating earnings, agents say.

"Wire transfers and bank accounts can be traced and assets seized, as can investments such as condos and horses and so on," said John Fernandes, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's special agent in charge in San Diego.

"The predominant method now for the cartels is to say, 'Give me the cash; I'll handle it once it's south of the border,'" he added.

Once in Mexico, where banking oversight is less strict and corruption rife, bundles of greenbacks are laundered through businesses including currency exchange houses and construction projects in cities such as Tijuana, Guadalajara and the Caribbean resort of Cancun.

Law enforcement agencies have no estimate for the amount of drug profits flowing back over the border in cash each year, although U.S. Bureau of Customs and Border Protection figures indicate that it is on the rise.

While the number of currency seizures has remained steady at around 300 in recent years along the border, the average value of each almost doubled to $38,200 in the first months of this year, up from $21,600 in 2002.

The busts are widespread at border stations from California to Texas, where agents in Laredo plucked $1.7 million in notes from the quarter panels of a southbound Honda Accord in an incident in February that set a port record.

Hard currency seizures are also vigorous within the interior of the United States, where the Federal Bureau of Investigation netted $12 million bound for the so-called Juarez cartel in just one operation last year, dubbed "Baja Kings."

THE WEAKEST LINK

Law enforcement agents working to hunt down drug proceeds say that while banking laws are adequate to crack down on money laundering in the United States, cross-border cash smuggling remains a weak link.

At present bulk currency seizures are made through intelligence tips and random outbound operations at dozens of border stations along the U.S. side of the 2,000-mile (3,200-km) border.

In Mexico, meanwhile, searches are left to chance as cars and pedestrians are only stopped and searched if they trigger a red light, which flashes randomly, at a customs service post, either at the border or at inland checkpoints dubbed "retenes."

As the result of campaigning within the law enforcement community Burke has succeeded in getting a sign put up just north of the Mexico border near San Diego, warning drivers they must declare "currency or negotiable instruments" over $10,000, which he counts a small victory.

"The biggest problem is the lack of outbound facilities (to carry out searches) and the lack of a method to search vehicles going into Mexico for currency," Burke said.

"We get our victories here and there, we seize $100,000 or $200,000 here or there, but I know at the back of my mind that I'm not even making an impact," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0004080

Drug Crackdown Nets 44 Arrests (SFC)

By Maria Alicia Gaura, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 8, 2005

(09-08) 12:25 PDT East Palo Alto (SF Chronicle) -- A crackdown on organized drug gangs in East Palo Alto has resulted in 44 arrests and the seizure of $500,000 worth of crack and powdered cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, police officials announced today.

Police are searching for another 12 fugitives connected with the case. Spurred by a rising tide of violence and homicides in East Palo Alto, which has seen 13 killings since January, local officials teamed up with an array of state and federal law enforcement agencies to crack down on drug gangs that have taken over local parks and terrified residents here.

"Our message to the community, and to the criminals not caught up in this particular operation, is that this is not the end, this is just the beginning," East Palo Alto Mayor David E. Woods said at a morning news conference in Redwood City. "We will rid the city of this element at all costs."

East Palo Alto Police Chief Ron Davis said the city acted on lessons learned in the early 1990s, when gang warfare and 42 homicides in one year made the town the per-capita slaying capital of the United States.

"We made promises at that time that we would never let the violence rise as high as it was in the '90s," Davis said. Officials sought help from state and federal agencies in March, when the city had experienced four homicides, but observers could tell that gang violence was on the rise.

The resulting collaboration with the Mobile Enforcement Team — a special group of agents within the federal Drug Enforcement Administration — brought together officers from Palo Alto police, the San Mateo County Sheriff's Department, the San Mateo County Narcotics Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and U.S. Immigration and Customs.

In the course of serving 20 search warrants, agents seized 6.1 pounds of crack cocaine, 3.8 pounds of powdered cocaine, 2.7 pounds of methamphetamine, 3.5 pounds of heroin, five vehicles, 17 firearms and $129,113 in cash. Those arrested face anywhere from 10 years to life sentences in prison, according to DEA Special Agent Javier F. Pena.

Dozens Arrested In Drug Sting (SFE)

By Ed Carpenter

San Francisco Examiner, September 8, 2005

REDWOOD CITY — Narcotics agents Thursday announced 45 arrests in a criminal dragnet in East Palo Alto, saying the arrests were the first in an ongoing attempt to disrupt drug dealing and gang activity in the city.

More than $600,000 in drugs, weapons and cash was seized as part of a five-month undercover investigation by East Palo Alto police, the San Mateo County Narcotics Task Force, the Drug Enforcement Administration, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Eleven fugitives remain at large.

"This is probably the largest drug operation in East Palo Alto since 1992," police Chief Ronald Davis said. For many local residents, 1992 marked a low point in the city's history when it was branded as a criminal hotbed and 42 murders occurred.

East Palo Alto Mayor David Woods said the sting was the beginning of a concerted effort to take back control of the city streets and make them safe for children. "I want every citizen to know that the [City] Council is fully dedicated of ridding the city of this element and will at all costs," Wood said. "The violence is not acceptable. The drug action is not acceptable. And it will not be tolerated."

Sheriff Don Horsley said the DEA was brought in for its Mobile Enforcement Team program, which can be deployed to a city to investigate individuals and organizations involved in drug trafficking. "We asked that the DEA come and give us a hand on this, in light of an 18-month upswing in gang violence" in East Palo Alto and other Peninsula cities." Since January, 13 people have been shot to death in East Palo Alto.

Horsley pledged to continue working with state and federal authorities to gather intelligence on the most violent gangs and those responsible for drug distribution in the county over the long term. The increased gang activity in East Palo Alto and on the Peninsula in general can be largely attributed to recruitment efforts by prison parolees looking to regain territorial control in the area, police said.

Police plan to analyze guns seized as part of the investigation to determine whether they have been used in recent shootings or other crimes. "I think this was an incredibly successful investigation," Horsley said.

San Mateo County Supervisor Rose Jacobs Gibson, who represents the area, said the arrests are the first steps in taking back street corners and park such as Jack Farrell in East Palo Alto that have been overrun by methamphetamine and cocaine dealers.

DOJ_NMG_0004081

Survey Shows 9% Decline In Teen Drug Use (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) — The percentage of Americans using illicit drugs declined slightly last year, though the results were more pronounced for youths, according to a survey released Thursday.

For people ages 12-17, there was a 9% drop in illicit drug use between 2002 and 2004, the federal government announced.

"Today's survey confirms the welcome trend on teen drug use," said John P. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Overall, 19.1 million Americans used illicit drugs last year, or 7.9%. The numbers were basically the same for the surveys taken in the previous two years, when about 8% of Americans reported using illicit drugs within the previous month.

The National Survey on Drug Use and Health is an annual survey of close to 70,000 people. It measures drug and alcohol use through several categories, including age, ethnicity and type of drug.

The survey showed that illicit drug use dropped from 11.6% to 10.6% among youths ages 12-17 from 2002 to 2004.

However, binge drinking, which is defined as five or more drinks in one setting, increased in the same age group — from 10.6% to 11.1% from 2003 to 2004.

Officials with the Marijuana Policy Project said federal officials "consistently pay no attention to this alarming situation." The group seeks the regulation of marijuana in the same manner alcohol is regulated.

"Unlike occasional marijuana use, binge drinking can actually kill you," said Bruce Mirken, director of communications for the organization.

Federal officials said they are not ignoring binge drinking. The government is focused on getting the word out to young people that alcohol is not safe, said Leah Young, a spokeswoman for the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

The survey also showed that 70.3 million Americans used tobacco products, which is a slight decline from the previous two years. The percentage of tobacco users among Americans ages 12 and older dropped from 30.4% to 29.2%.

Copyright 2005 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

S.A. Couple Plead Guilty To Playing Role In Drug Ring (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff Writer

San Antonio Express-News, September 9, 2005

A San Antonio couple pleaded guilty Thursday to charges they were involved in a drug-distribution cell linked to the Texas Mexican Mafia that used a local police officer to avoid detection.

Mike Flores, 33, and his girlfriend, Toni Lopez, 35, also admitted that federal prosecutors could show at trial that they dealt heroin and cocaine and that then-San Antonio police officer Enrique Hinojosa, 32, tipped them off to drug investigations. The conspiracy is alleged to go back to at least April 2001.

Flores pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute more than 100 grams of heroin, and Lopez pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting the possession of heroin. Their pleas came just days before their trial was to begin.

Hinojosa, who worked with the San Antonio Police Department from January 2001 to March 2004, is now the only one in the case scheduled for trial Monday before U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia.

Hinojosa faces charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin, aiding and abetting the possession of heroin and two counts of aiding and abetting the possession of cocaine. He has pleaded not guilty.

The plea bargain documents said Hinojosa has known Flores since grade school and that the two were in a West Side gang as teenagers. The documents said Hinojosa would let Flores know when police units that target known drug dealers were in the area where Flores lived or operated, and that Hinojosa drove Flores to locations where Flores would make drug deals.

During the investigation, narcotics detectives raided Flores' home on Sept. 11, 2003, and found 9 ounces of black tar heroin, 1.68 ounces of cocaine, an ounce of cut heroin and $26,827 in cash. Hinojosa was in the home, the documents said, and he gave investigators inconsistent statements about his involvement.

Hinojosa was placed on indefinite suspension on March 4, 2004, a San Antonio police spokeswoman said.

The documents said investigators learned that Hinojosa also told Flores that police were after Ralph Peña, 33, who is Lopez's ex-husband and son of Heriberto "Herb" Huerta.

Law officers contend Huerta, 52, who is serving life in a federal prison in Florence, Colo., is still the president of the Texas Mexican Mafia and runs the gang via a network of relatives and associates inside and outside prison.

The documents said Lopez visited Huerta in prison during the course of the investigation. Last month, federal agents seized the $13,000 in Huerta's commissary account, alleging it is the fruits of the gang's collection of a street tax levied on drug dealers in San Antonio. A week later, Peña was arrested on a charge of being a felon with a gun.

Flores and Lopez face five to 40 years in prison when they are sentenced Dec. 8.

IMMIGRATION:

Local Police Can Enforce Laws On Immigration (DANNT)

By Chipp Reid, THE NEWS-TIMES

Danbury (CT) News-Times, September 9, 2005

DANBURY — Earlier this year, Mayor Mark Boughton wanted the federal government to deputize state police officers so they could enforce immigration laws.

As it turns out, the extra authority might not have been needed.

A recently unearthed U.S. Justice Department memo says state and local cops can make arrests after traffic stops if they find civil immigration violations, such as someone overstaying a visa.

No specific federal authority is needed for local officers to make such arrests, according to the 2002 memo, which came to light in a recent court case.

Danbury officials said the memo will have little impact on law enforcement in a city that has seen a sizable increase in South American immigrants in recent years.

At the same time, however, Danbury officials confirmed city police officers are checking the immigration status of some drivers and making some arrests on immigration charges.

They complained, however, they receive little help from the federal government in prosecuting the cases.

"The problem of enforcement is not at the local level," Boughton said. "We don't get the cooperation we need from Immigrations and Custom Enforcement."

Boughton said he remained committed to having Danbury police enforce immigration laws as necessary. He said the arrests most often occur when a driver is stopped for speeding or other offenses and turns out to not have a license. "That immediately mean we start asking more questions," Boughton said.

The mayor emphasized police must have some reason other than the driver being Hispanic to make the stop. "These are routine traffic stops for speeding or not wearing a seat belt," Boughton said.

The Associated Press reported Thursday the 2002 memo was issued by then-Attorney Gen. John Ashcroft and his staff. It overturned a 1996 letter from Justice Department lawyers that said state and local police could enforce only criminal immigration violations, such as sneaking across a border.

The memo came to light recently when a coalition of civil rights and immigrants' rights groups sued the Justice Department to comply with a Freedom of Information Act request.

The American Civil Liberties Union, among others, has criticized the memo. The ACLU said the memo stretched the definition of the role of local police so far that it could be used to justify giving them the right to enforce the U.S. tax code, environmental rules and other federal laws.

In Danbury, there appears to be little desire to greatly expand the role of officers. Boughton dropped his proposal to deputize state police earlier this year when it found little support among law enforcement officials.

There is no support, right now, to either resurrect the plan or to use city police to conduct immigration sweeps.

"It's pointless for us to try (crack down) locally because we have nowhere to put people we may arrest on immigration violations," Boughton said.

Danbury Police Chief Alan D. Baker said it would cost too much to train the city's 150 officers in immigration law.

"We have enough to do as it is with quality-of-life issues," said Baker. "We have other areas where we need to devote our resources, which are already stretched thin."

Baker said no one knew much about the 2002 memo, and said it would likely "have absolutely no impact on what we do."

Maria-Cinta Lowe, executive director of the Danbury Hispanic Center, however, said she feared the Justice Department ruling could lead to further abuses against ethnic minorities.

"I think it's crazy," Lowe said. "In the first place, why would you put more work on the police? They already have enough to do and they are very good. But, if you give them even more power, I am afraid then that the power could corrupt some police officers."

DOJ_NMG_0004083

She also took issue with city police making immigration arrests based on traffic stops. She believes that could lead to racial profiling.

"I am very concerned about this, because who are the immigrants," Lowe said. "It is the Ecuadoreans, the Brazilians, all the people like that. I think it is crazy to do this, to put even more work on the police."

Baker agreed police had to walk a fine line in enforcing the immigration laws.

"Here in Danbury we do work closely with immigration officials as needed, but we also want to keep positive relations with groups like the Hispanic Center," he said. "We don't want anyone to be afraid to work with the police."

Immigrant License Bill Is Sent To Governor (LAT)

By Robert Salladay And Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

SACRAMENTO — The fate of a bill that could extend driver's licenses to illegal immigrants remained unclear today as some Californians condemned it and others praised the measure.

The state Senate today passed the measure and sent it to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, despite signals that the Republican governor would veto it. With limited debate, the Senate this afternoon approved the bill on a 21-15 vote, the bare minimum needed for passage in the upper house.

After a late-night debate on the politically sensitive issue of immigration, the California Assembly on Wednesday passed the proposal.

Schwarzenegger vetoed a similar bill last year, but his position on the current legislation was not known.

The measure would clear the way for California to create a distinct driver's license, with a unique design and color, for people who cannot prove legal residency in the United States. The license could be used only for driving and would not be valid identification for other purposes, such as opening a bank account or boarding an airplane.

In Santa Ana, Adolfo Sierra, president of Casa Guanajuato, a nonprofit that promotes culture of that central Mexican state, said he has mixed feelings about the proposal.

"It's not fair. We should all be treated equally," he said. "I'm an immigrant and I feel this could increase prejudice against all of us."

Pablo Alvarado, coordinator of the National Day Laborer Organizing Network in Los Angeles, said he expected Schwarzenegger to block the measure.

"I think it's unfortunate that the governor seems ready to veto a bill designed to ensure the safety of the drivers in the state," said Alvarado. "If you have a driver's license, you can insure yourself."

Andy Ramirez, founder of the citizen group Friends of the Border Patrol, said the bill is "an absolute sham."

He said he lobbied the governor's staff to urge a veto.

The driver's licenses "are de facto ID cards," Ramirez said, and the Legislature "is trying to legitimize them being here. If you give them a driver's license, you are legitimizing them and approving of what they have done, which was to break the laws of our nation."

The bill, SB 60 by Sen. Gil Cedillo (D-Los Angeles), would also allow roughly 800,000 people in California who have applied to federal immigration officials for legal residency to get a California driver's license starting as soon as March.

The bill passed the Assembly 42 to 34.

Cedillo said he included several elements in the latest bill aimed at overcoming objections from Schwarzenegger, who last year vetoed a similar bill sponsored by Cedillo. But before the state Assembly took up the bill Wednesday, there were no indications that the changes would satisfy the governor.

The governor's office has consistently said Schwarzenegger does not want to take any action until the federal government finishes deciding its requirements for state licenses -- changes spawned by concern that terrorists or other criminals could get such documents.

Congress gave states the option to create distinct driver's licenses for illegal immigrants under the Real ID Act passed in May. That sweeping law will require most states to change the information they include on driver's licenses, the documents they require to issue a license and how they store driver's license data.

Before adopting their own new laws, most states are waiting to see what regulations the federal Department of Homeland Security issues to implement the Real ID Act. Those regulations are expected next year.

At least two states — Utah and Tennessee — passed laws providing the licenses.

David Lubell, coordinator of the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Rights Coalition, said the proposed California license would be similar to his state's "driving certificate," which gives driver's rights to undocumented immigrants.

Tennessee issued 16,000 certificates in the last year.

In March, Utah began issuing a "driver's privilege card," which looks different than driver's licenses. The card is available to applicants who lack a Social Security number.

Leo Bravo, of the Hispanic Center of Cache Valley in northern Utah, said the card is helping undocumented immigrants in his state.

"We are better off than other states in the Union. People will drive even if they don't have licenses," said Bravo. "They don't have insurance. They are not protected and we are not protected. If we are worried about national security, it's better to know who we have driving on the roads."

On the California Assembly floor, Democrats argued that the bill would improve highway safety in California by ensuring that most drivers are licensed, trained and insured.

"This is a good bill because I believe it's the right thing to do because individuals are here and they're driving and that's the reality," said Assemblyman Jerome Horton (D-Inglewood).

Republicans argued that the bill would reward people for breaking the law.

Assemblyman Doug La Malfa (R-Richvale) asked how he could teach his children to follow rules "when the California state Legislature is making rules that cause people to not have to obey the law."

But the 90-minute debate focused less on the details of the bill than on the politically sensitive issue of immigration.

"Illegal immigration is an enormous cost to this state," said Assemblyman Mark Wyland (R-Escondido). "And what this does is propose to legitimize that."

Assemblyman Alberto Torrico (D-Newark) argued that undocumented workers, through taxes taken from their wages, "put in more than they're taking out."

"The reward is not the driver's license," he said. "People come to this country because of the jobs and the economic opportunity and to get what every one of us wants for our children ... a better life."

In an attempt to head off Schwarzenegger's concern that California should wait until the federal government details the requirements of the Real ID Act, Cedillo amended his bill last week to incorporate such a delay.

Cedillo argues that his bill will help all 22 million Californians with driver's licenses by giving the Department of Motor Vehicles the authority to begin changing its procedures, computers and staffing to meet all the requirements of the federal Real ID Act by the May 2008 deadline. If California misses that deadline, its residents cannot use their driver's licenses for official federal purposes.

With his popularity eroded and polls showing voters displeased with the initiatives he has embraced on the November ballot, Schwarzenegger risks alienating loyal voters if he signs Cedillo's bill."

It would be horribly disappointing" if the governor did not veto the bill, said Mike Spence, president of the California Republican Assembly.

Schwarzenegger has until mid-October to act on the bill.

Where's The Governator Now? (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger was a profile in timidity this week when he vowed to veto a pioneering bill authorizing gay marriage in California. The bill, which both houses of the Legislature passed by narrow margins, would expand the definition of marriage to include a civil contract between two people, not exclusively a man and woman. This was an enlightened and fair-minded stand that made California's Legislature the first in the nation to approve same-sex marriages.

Too bad Mr. Schwarzenegger could not find the courage to sign the bill into law. Instead, even before receiving the bill, he announced a tortured rationale for vetoing it. For years, social conservatives have accused judges of deciding social issues that should be left to legislators. Now Mr. Schwarzenegger wants to ignore his Legislature and leave gay marriage to the courts or the voters at large to decide.

He relies on a fig leaf: five years ago, Californians voted overwhelmingly for a ballot measure that recognized only heterosexual marriages as valid. A statement by the governor's press office declared, "We cannot have a system where the people vote and the Legislature derails that vote."

That ignores the fact that five years is an eternity in the fast-moving arena of gay rights. Even though 61 percent of the voters approved the ballot measure, recent polls show that the electorate is now evenly split, with Democrats and independents favoring same-sex marriage and Republicans strongly opposed. The Legislature is hardly a renegade body if it roughly mirrors popular opinion.

Mr. Schwarzenegger also seems to have forgotten that this nation was founded as a republic, in which the citizens elect legislators to govern on their behalf. Such representative democracy is especially important when it comes to protecting the fundamental rights of minorities, who may face bigoted hostility from some segments of the electorate.

DOJ_NMG_0004085

It's easy to guess why Mr. Schwarzenegger was in such a hurry to announce his veto. Although he was initially hailed as a centrist Republican superhero who could appeal to a broad range of voters, his popularity has plummeted, and polls show that most Californians are inclined to oppose his re-election. Only his Republican base continues to back him.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's own views of gay marriage are hidden beneath vague, elusive, sometimes contradictory comments that add up to ducking the issue. The former Mr. Universe who has derided political opponents as "girlie men" is afraid to say what he really thinks. He falls back on a rationale that would leave the issue to the courts or another vote of the people. Anything to get him off the hook.

Squatter At Minn. School Ordered Deported (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 9, 2005

(AP) - BLOOMINGTON, Minn.-A Mexican immigrant who was found living at a high school last winter must leave the country, an immigration judge decided Wednesday.

Francisco Serrano was ordered to depart within 120 days, though he plans to appeal the decision.

"It's not what I expected - I'm dejected," he said. "I just want to go to college, have a career and go back to my country ... for sure, I'm going to pray."

Serrano, who is in his early 20s, hid at Apple Valley High School, which he had once attended, and was arrested by immigration officials after he was discovered in the school's boiler room.

He has said he and his family moved to Connecticut after his sophomore year here. He said he returned to Minnesota on Christmas Eve with only $200 in his pocket.

Serrano's situation drew some support from parents who e-mailed the school after the man was discovered, though the school was also criticized for allowing someone to live there undetected.

Tim Counts, a spokesman for the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said it was a clear case of someone abusing their visa privileges.

"The circumstances of his discovery (at the school) were unusual, but the facts of the case are quite common," Counts said. "He came in on a visitor's visa and didn't leave when it expired, and therefore he was in the country illegally."

Serrano said he spent three weeks in the school of 2,300 students - though officials could only confirm he was there two weeks - sometimes sitting in on classes and sleeping wherever he could hide.

He was arrested at the school in January and charged with trespassing, then arrested again when he returned.

TAX:

'Survivor' Winner Hatch Indicted For Tax Evasion (REU)

Reuters, September 8, 2005

BOSTON (Reuters) - A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted Richard Hatch, who took home $1 million as the first winner of the CBS hit reality show "Survivor," for tax evasion, bank fraud and other charges.

The U.S. Attorney's office in Providence, Rhode Island, accused Hatch, a motivational speaker, of failing to report the $1 million winnings in 2000 and about $391,000 he earned from half a dozen other sources.

The 10-count indictment follows a grand jury investigation that began in March when Hatch backed out of a deal with prosecutors to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges that carried a maximum 10-year jail sentence and a $500,000 fine.

Hatch, who wandered around naked on the show and was once described by a fellow contestant as a "snake," said he was innocent in March. He was not immediately available for comment following the new list of charges released by prosecutors in Rhode Island.

If convicted on all counts, the 44-year-old Newport, Rhode Island, native would face a maximum fine of $1.35 million and 73 years in prison.

Eight of the charges carry a maximum sentence of five years each in prison, one has a three-year sentence and another bank fraud charge carries a maximum 30-year jail sentence, said Tom Connell, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney in Rhode Island.

A summons was issued for Hatch to appear before a U.S. magistrate for arraignment.

The first "Survivor" became a ratings sensation for CBS and helped spark a boom in reality-based TV shows.

In television and radio interviews aired in March, Hatch's lawyer said CBS should have withheld federal taxes for the game show contestant because the network should have classified him as an employee under California law.

DOJ_NMG_0004086

CBS, a unit of Viacom Inc., has said that Hatch alone was responsible for declaring his winnings to the federal government and paying his taxes.

'Survivor' Winner Indicted On Tax Charges (AP)

By M.I. Johnson

AP, September 9, 2005

PROVIDENCE, R.I. - Richard Hatch, who won $1 million on the first season of the reality show "Survivor," was indicted Thursday for failing to pay taxes on his winnings from the CBS show.

Hatch faces 10 charges, including tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said Hatch, 44, did not pay taxes on his "Survivor" prize, income from a radio show and rental income. The Newport resident also allegedly used donations to his charity, Horizon Bound, to cover personal expenses.

Prosecutors charged Hatch with two counts of tax evasion in January. He agreed to plead guilty, but backed out of the deal in March, saying he thought CBS was responsible for paying the taxes on his prize. CBS has said Hatch was well aware of his obligations to pay taxes on the money.

On Thursday, Hatch was on a plane headed for Houston to help hurricane victims at the Astrodome and could not be reached for comment, said Rod Mitchell, a spokesman for Hatch's lawyer, Michael Minns.

The grand jury, which received the case after the plea deal fell apart, indicted Hatch for filing false 2000 and 2001 tax returns, which omitted his income from the reality show, $327,000 he was paid to co-host "The Wilde Show" on a Boston radio station and $28,000 in rent on a property he owns in Newport.

The indictment said Hatch had two accountants prepare tax returns that included his "Survivor" winnings but did not file them when he learned he would owe hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes. In 2002, he had one of the accountants prepare a second return that did not include his TV show winnings. He filed that one, which called for a $4,500 refund, the indictment said.

Hatch was also accused of misusing $36,500 from a nonprofit camp he set up, Horizon Bound. For example, he allegedly kept for himself a $10,000 donation made in return for his appearance on the NBC game show "Weakest Link." He spent the money from the game show on a construction project at his house, the indictment said.

Hatch faces a maximum of 75 years in prison if found guilty on all charges. He also could face millions of dollars in fines.

On "Survivor," Hatch stood out for being a cunning and ruthless competitor, and spent some of his time in the nude. He won the show's first season in August 2000. He has since appeared on other TV shows, most recently the "Battle of the Network Reality Stars" on Bravo.

Since the TV show, Hatch has weathered a series of legal battles. He was arrested in April 2000 on a charge of abusing his then 9-year-old son. That charge was later dropped. In 2002, Hatch was found innocent of assaulting his ex-boyfriend.

ON THE NET

http://www.richhatch.com/

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Partisan Rancor Accompanies Passage Of Disaster Aid Bill (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Democrats sharpened their criticism of the Bush administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina yesterday, refusing to participate in a Republican-controlled investigative panel and displaying a photo in the Senate of the president strumming a guitar the day New Orleans was inundated.

The day's events, which included a near-lionization of the only Democratic senator from the hard-hit states, left little doubt that political reaction to the catastrophic storm will be dramatically more partisan than was the response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"We are reaching a perfect political storm," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) told reporters as lawmakers appropriated another $51.8 billion for hurricane relief but differed bitterly on how to figure out what went wrong.

Congressional Democratic leaders said they will not name members to a House-Senate commission that Republicans announced Wednesday to investigate local, state and federal government actions before and after Katrina lashed the Gulf Coast Aug. 29. Democrats said the proposed panel is unacceptable because they were not consulted about its formation and because GOP lawmakers would outnumber Democratic members.

DOJ_NMG_0004087

"As it is currently described, I will not appoint members to it," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said: "If we're ever going to protect the American people, we must have an outside independent committee. Let's not have a charade about oversight."

Pelosi and Reid said Congress should appoint a panel of non-lawmakers modeled on the Sept. 11 commission that wrote an extensive report on the 2001 terrorist attacks. Congressional Republicans said they modeled the commission on House and Senate panels formed in 1986 to investigate the Iran-contra scandal during the Reagan administration. Democrats controlled both chambers then, and they outnumbered Republicans on the two committees, which were eventually merged.

"It looks like the Democrats want to play partisan political games at an important time," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). He urged Pelosi and Reid to change their minds but said the panel would go forward without Democrats if necessary.

In the Senate, Democrats rallied around Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), who returned to Washington after 10 days of highly visible and often emotional appeals for aid for her beleaguered constituents. Landrieu, who grew up in New Orleans, praised Republican colleagues from Louisiana and Mississippi but ripped the Bush administration for the federal response to Katrina.

The cost to rebuild "will be staggering," Landrieu said in a Senate speech attended by two dozen Democratic colleagues, a rare sight in the usually empty chamber. "But it will pale in comparison to the staggering incompetence of this national government [which] is responsible." When she finished, many colleagues hugged and kissed her, including Republican Sen. Thad Cochran of Mississippi, a state also ravaged by the storm.

At times, the debate was theatrical. Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) displayed a poster-size photo of Bush playing a guitar handed to him during a tour of a San Diego military base Aug. 30, after broken levees had caused New Orleans to flood.

"The president was enjoying the day, he was strumming a guitar," Lautenberg said. "I don't deny him the pleasures of office, but people were drowning."

When aides to House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) attacked Pelosi's response to the investigative commission, they illustrated it with an e-mailed photo of San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury intersection, associated with the hippies of the 1960s.

Groups and strategists on the left and right, meanwhile, debated the wisdom of the two parties' actions. Some liberals cheered Pelosi and Reid for refusing to join the investigative panel. Others warned Democrats to offer solid alternatives when they criticize.

"These debates on blame alone won't get us anywhere with most people," said Laura Nichols, senior vice president of the liberal-leaning Center for American Progress. "Complaints about 9/11 investigations fell on deaf ears."

The Republican National Committee sent allies a list of "talking points," including: "It's disappointing that while President Bush has focused his administration's entire efforts towards saving lives and helping the victims of Katrina, there are those who are using this tragedy to score cheap political points."

Republicans criticized an online petition from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee that combined a fundraising appeal with a call to oust the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. After an inquiry from the Associated Press, the DSCC removed the page and said any money it generated would go to the American Red Cross.

Bush Signs $51.8 Bln Storm Relief Bill (REU)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, September 8, 2005

President George W. Bush signed legislation to provide $51.8 billion in additional funding for Hurricane Katrina relief on Thursday, shortly after the measure was approved by Congress.

The Senate approved the bill by a vote of 97-0 after receiving it from the House of Representatives, which also passed it overwhelmingly.

"The people affected by this storm have immediate needs that we must continue to meet without delay," Bush said in a statement. "More resources will be needed as we work to help people get back on their feet."

It was the second time in a week that Congress has rushed through emergency funding for the victims of the hurricane that hit Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida at the end of August.

Congress has now approved $62.3 billion sought by Bush, who has warned that further requests will come. Some lawmakers have estimated a final price tag of $150 billion to $200 billion.

"If we were to fail to act, every relief that is going on right this very moment ... will be without money when the sun rises tomorrow," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said on the Senate floor.

DOJ_NMG_0004088

Rep. Henry Waxman (news, bio, voting record) of California, the senior Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, and three senior senators from both major political parties cautioned that a provision in the legislation could open the door to fraudulent spending of emergency aid.

The provision would allow federal workers with government-issued credit cards to buy up to $250,000 in goods or services in a single purchase, up from a $15,000 limit.

A government watchdog agency has found purchases of personal items like jewelry, stereo equipment and home supplies, charged to such credit cards in the past, the lawmakers said.

John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, said the legislation would reduce delays in delivering aid and that federal auditors will review credit card purchases.

Republican Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), whose home state of Alabama suffered in the hurricane, also feared misuse of funds and called for the appointment of a hurricane czar to oversee spending. "We have got to be careful this does not become a feeding frenzy," he warned.

'FAILURES OF LEADERSHIP'

Democrats supported the emergency aid but some accused the House Republican leadership of rushing it and blocking debate on an amendment to revamp the widely criticized Federal Emergency Management Agency, in charge of relief.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican, came to the defense of the White House. Referring to the evacuees sheltered and the food, water and equipment delivered, DeLay said: "We ought to be proud of that. But what are we doing in Washington? We're pointing our fingers."

The disaster will add to already large budget deficits this year and next. Those deficits also are being fueled by the war in Iraq that has cost about $300 billion since 2003.

FEMA will receive nearly all of the funds approved on Thursday -- $50 billion -- while the Defense Department will get $1.4 billion for its rescue efforts. The Army Corps of Engineers will get $400 million to dredge navigation channels, repair pump stations and levees in New Orleans and repair other projects in Gulf states.

Congress Approves $51.8 Billion For Victims (WP)

By Peter Baker And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

President Bush and Congress moved on multiple fronts yesterday to rush fresh relief to people afflicted by Hurricane Katrina, vowing to get cash directly into the hands of victims while enacting an unprecedented spending package to feed and house evacuees, rebuild schools and bridges, and begin clearing out the vast rubble.

Just a day after Bush's request, the House voted 410 to 11 to approve $51.8 billion for relief, and the Senate followed suit hours later 97 to 0, bringing the total approved in the past week to $62.3 billion, with more to come. With his poll approval ratings crumbling further amid a political backlash, Bush tried to unify the country by declaring next Friday a National Day of Prayer and Remembrance.

"The responsibility of caring for hundreds of thousands of citizens who no longer have homes is going to place many demands on our nation," Bush said in a televised statement hours before he signed the spending legislation last night. "We have many difficult days ahead, especially as we recover those who did not survive the storm."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said yesterday's prompt legislative action "illustrates one thing: This Congress is serious about doing everything we can to help local, state and federal officials respond to this crisis."

As the authorities moved through flooded New Orleans to force out the remaining residents and collect an unknown number of bodies, the bipartisan consensus on dispensing federal dollars did little to obscure the growing political rift over how to investigate what both sides consider the bungled initial response to one of the worst natural disasters in the nation's history. Congressional Democrats rejected a Republican plan for a GOP-led joint House-Senate panel to look into the response.

"Despite all the talk of bipartisanship, they have just, on their own, unilaterally, put forth a proposal that will result in a whitewash of what has gone on here," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). She added that she will not appoint any Democratic members to such a "charade" panel.

The two parties likewise split over the details of the spending package they approved yesterday. Democrats said the Republican leadership wrote billions of dollars in checks without considering whether the package offers the proper help -- and proper accountability. "The unfortunate truth is, Mr. Speaker, this compliant Republican Congress has acted more like an adjunct to this administration than a co-equal, independent branch of our government," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.).

DOJ_NMG_0004089

Beyond the spending package, the House approved a series of other measures to help people displaced by the hurricane, such as accelerating welfare money to affected states and allowing college students to keep federal financial aid even if their schools are now closed. But Democrats were blocked from adding provisions to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency, heavily criticized over its handling of the disaster response. Under the Democratic proposals, the agency would be detached from the Department of Homeland Security and its director would be required to have previous experience managing disasters.

On the final votes, the only dissenters were nearly a dozen House Republicans, some of whom expressed concern about accountability for the huge expenditures.

Trying to outdo the Republican rush of aid, Senate Democrats yesterday introduced a separate, more expansive package that would, among other things, extend Medicaid to survivors without health insurance, grant emergency rent vouchers to those who lost homes, and provide funds to schools that take in evacuees.

Even before the votes, Bush summoned television cameras to address hurricane victims directly, promising to provide every household $2,000 as soon as possible to tide it over and to expedite government benefits such as Medicaid, unemployment checks, food stamps, mental health services and nutritional supplements without the traditional bureaucratic requirements. The president told viewers to call 800-621-FEMA or, if they have Internet service, to go to http://www.fema.gov .

"We have much more work to do," Bush said. "But the people who have been hurt by this storm . . . need to know that the government is going to be with you for the long haul."

Bush has scrapped his schedule to focus on hurricane relief after being criticized for reacting too slowly to Katrina's devastation. A Pew Research Center survey found that 67 percent of Americans think Bush could have done more to respond to the storm. The survey placed his overall job approval rating at 40 percent, down 10 points since January. A poll by Zogby America recorded its lowest-ever approval rating for Bush, 41 percent.

In the latest effort to demonstrate commitment to improving the federal response, Bush dispatched Vice President Cheney to the region and first lady Laura Bush to other states housing evacuees. Cheney personally encountered some of the hostility directed at the administration. As he spoke with reporters on a street in Gulfport, Miss., a young man shouted at him. "Go [expletive] yourself, Mr. Cheney," the man yelled twice. Cheney smiled slightly but did not respond.

In his first tour of the damage, Cheney offered an upbeat assessment of what he called the "very impressive" current response efforts. "I think the progress we're making is significant," he said. Cheney also endorsed the Republican inquiry plan instead of the independent commission proposed by Democrats.

The details of yesterday's spending package offer a glimpse of the impact Katrina will have on taxpayers. Nearly half of the money -- $23.2 billion -- will go directly to as many as 1.1 million households in the form of housing grants and other assistance. Such aid will be capped initially at $26,200 per household.

Already, the government has spent $3.3 billion to snap up 200,000 trailers, mobile homes and recreational vehicles from showrooms across the country for the homeless survivors. Clayton Homes Inc., a Tennessee-based manufactured-home company, is trying to get 100 homes a day from its showrooms to a FEMA staging area, said Chris Nicely, the company's vice president for marketing. "We did make a profit on it," he said of the order. "It's hard to say how much."

More business will be coming soon. Included in yesterday's legislation is an additional $1.6 billion for 100,000 housing units. The package also includes $7.65 billion to repair public schools, nonfederal roads and bridges, water facilities, government buildings, parks, and public utilities. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers will receive $3 billion to remove mountains of debris. A total of $1.9 billion will be used to buy ice, water, food, tents and other materials for victims and relief workers.

The bill stirred concerns in both parties about possible fraud. Under one provision, procurement officers can use government credit cards to make purchases costing as much as $250,000, without competitive bidding and without considering small-business and minority-owned-business allotments.

Such authority has traditionally been limited to $2,500 under normal circumstances and to $15,000 in emergencies. Lawmakers gave $15 million to the Homeland Security inspector general, but that did not mollify critics.

Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) signed a letter yesterday opposing raising the limit. "We should not allow the immediate needs of this disaster to trump the need for oversight and accountability for the spending that will occur on these purchase cards," they wrote. Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) agreed: "The vast majority of federal employees are honest, upstanding people, but the ability to buy up to $250,000 in any single purchase is a great temptation."

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) said that "we've got safeguards" to ensure that the money is spent appropriately. "Sure, there is going to be waste in money," he acknowledged. "You can't deal with 5 million people and not have some waste in money. But the bulk is going to go to the people and the property that deserve it."

DOJ_NMG_0004090

Bush Pledges Aid For 'Long Haul' (LAT)

By Warren Vieth And Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Thursday promised the hundreds of thousands displaced by Hurricane Katrina that the government would be with them "for the long haul," and Congress voted to provide $51.8 billion in emergency funds to finance the relief and reconstruction programs.

Despite the expanded efforts, which increase total federal spending on the emergency to $62.3 billion, partisan rancor undermined attempts to project a spirit of unity. And new polls indicated that many Americans were displeased with the government's performance.

Substantial majorities of respondents in three national surveys expressed disappointment with Bush's handling of the emergency and characterized the government's initial relief efforts as too slow. Bush's job approval ratings slipped to new lows.

The dissatisfaction suggested that the White House was having trouble diverting attention from its initial response and was instead focusing attention on signs of progress.

In New Orleans, meanwhile, police tried to root out residents who, 10 days after the hurricane, still were refusing to leave their flooded homes. And emergency workers fanned out across the city as water levels continued to drop, exposing the bodies of Katrina's victims.

"We have much more work to do," the president said, speaking of assisting the residents of New Orleans and the surrounding coastal regions of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama whose lives have been upended by the hurricane that laid waste to much of the Gulf Coast last week.

In his televised address, Bush urged victims to act quickly to get in touch with representatives of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is coordinating the government relief effort.

The number to call is 1-800-621-FEMA, Bush said. About 3,000 operators were staffing the phone lines, he said, and more were on the way. For those storm victims with access to computers, assistance is available at http://www.govbenefits.gov and http://www.fema.gov.Bush said the government aid package included an initial cash payment of $2,000 per family to help with immediate needs, such as food and clothing. FEMA representatives will help get cash into the hands of people staying in emergency shelters and other temporary housing, he said.

He told evacuees: "By registering for the first $2,000, you will begin the process of arranging for the delivery of other, longer-term assistance" — including health, welfare, housing, food stamps, school lunches, child care, mental health, foster care and job training.

One action Bush did not trumpet publicly drew a quick protest from a leading Democrat. By executive order, Bush suspended the Davis-Bacon Act in areas of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana and Mississippi, a move that will allow federal contractors to pay less than the local "prevailing wage" on construction projects.

Rep. George Miller of Martinez, senior Democrat on the House committee that oversees labor law, said the move would allow employers to pay "poverty wages" as they rebuild from the hurricane.

"The administration is using the devastation of Hurricane Katrina to cut the wages of people desperately trying to rebuild their lives," Miller said in a statement, noting that the prevailing wage for construction in New Orleans was about $9 an hour. "At under $9 an hour, workers certainly won't be able to rebuild their livelihoods."

On Capitol Hill, Democrats said they would boycott a planned House-Senate inquiry into the administration's management of the catastrophe. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) accused Republicans of trying to whitewash what she characterized as a failure of the federal government to properly respond to the ravages of the hurricane.

The decision by Pelosi and her Senate counterpart, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), not to appoint any Democrats to the hurricane investigation panel provoked a quick condemnation from Republicans.

"People can join in and help get the job done, or some people can stand aside and criticize," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "But you know, we have work to do. We can't be distracted by partisanship, by finger-pointing, by name-calling…. The American people expect us to get this work done."

In announcing the expanded government assistance, Bush said all residents of counties that had been declared disaster areas would be granted special evacuee status, allowing authorities to waive traditional requirements to verify identity and determine eligibility.

"Many of you have been evacuated from the flooded and destroyed areas and now find yourselves far from home, without proper identification or even a change of clothes," Bush said.

He promised the outreach program would provide the help they needed and "cut through the red tape" to get them that help as quickly and easily as possible.

DOJ_NMG_0004091

In a brief aside to governors, Bush promised to work with Congress to reimburse their states for the cost of providing food, shelter and other services to evacuees.

"We understand this is going to strain your budget," he said. "So the federal government … will operate under this principle: You should not be penalized for showing compassion."

The administration's outreach effort Thursday included a troubleshooting tour of the afflicted Gulf Coast region by Vice President Dick Cheney and appearances by First Lady Laura Bush to generate interest in the needs of displaced schoolchildren. The president designated next Friday as a "national day of prayer and remembrance."

On Capitol Hill, it was a day of frenetic activity, political maneuvering and raw emotions as lawmakers continued to grapple with the scope of the disaster and to grope for ways to respond.

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.), returning to the chamber for the first time since the hurricane turned her hometown of New Orleans into a sodden ghost town, mourned the destruction and delivered a blistering assessment of the federal response.

"Thousands are dead, and only God knows how many," Landrieu said.

By late afternoon, the House had voted 410 to 11 to approve the emergency spending. All members of the California delegation voted in favor, except for Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana), who did not vote. The Senate followed suit Thursday evening, voting 97 to 0.

The federal government has committed $62.3 billion to the relief effort. Besides the $51.8 billion approved Thursday, Congress appropriated $10.5 billion last week. Yet these funds are expected to last only several weeks, and reconstruction costs could rise as high as $200 billion, officials said.

Some Republicans questioned whether FEMA could manage such a massive, long-term rebuilding effort. Several leading senators called on Bush to appoint a senior official to coordinate the federal effort.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), chairman of the Budget Committee, said the government should establish "some type of structured commission, where you basically have a focus point with an individual of great ability and national recognition leading the effort."

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who lost his family home to the storm, said in an interview that he believed former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani or former Sen. John B. Breaux (D-La.) would make a good reconstruction overseer. Other lawmakers have suggested retired U.S. Army Gen. Tommy Franks, who led the invasion of Iraq.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said the president welcomed all suggestions for improving the recovery effort and would give them consideration. "This is a time for people to be offering big ideas and offering ways for us to move forward on the rebuilding and recovery," McClellan said.

But McClellan would not respond to specific proposals, including calls by some lawmakers for the resignation of FEMA's director, Michael D. Brown, or the removal of FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security.

Three national polls released Thursday showed large majorities dissatisfied with government's response to Hurricane Katrina. Disapproval of Bush's overall job performance reached the highest levels of his presidency.

In contrast to initial surveys last week that found little effect on Bush's standing, the new surveys from independent pollster John Zogby, CBS News and the nonpartisan Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found the president's approval rating sagging amid widespread discontent over his handling of the crisis.

In the Zogby and CBS polls, about three-fifths of Americans said they disapproved of Bush's handling of the response to the hurricane; fewer than two-fifths approved. In the Pew survey, 28% said Bush did "all he could" to speed relief efforts, while 67% said he could have done more. Likewise, about two-thirds of those surveyed by CBS said Bush's response was too slow.

Government at all levels fared poorly in the new polls. At least 58% of those polled in all three surveys gave the federal government failing grades for its handling of the situation, with more than three-quarters in the CBS poll expressing such negative views. State and local authorities received slightly better reviews, with 51% disapproving of their performance in the Pew survey, and 70% in the CBS poll.

Bush's Leadership Skills Questioned, Polls Show (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 9, 2005

George W. Bush on Thursday faced some of the worst poll results of his presidency, with a majority of Americans questioning his leadership skills and signs of a drop in support from core Republican voters.

While natural disasters usually boost political leaders, Mr Bush's initial response to Hurricane Katrina has led to the reverse.

According to a CBS News poll on Thursday, 48 per cent said he had strong leadership skills, his lowest rating to date, and far below his 83 per cent rating after September 11.

DOJ_NMG_0004092

For a president who won a second term after campaigning on his strong leadership skills with 64 per cent approval in the election run-up the slide threatens to endanger his authority to rally voters behind unpopular parts of his second-term domestic agenda, such as social security reform.

A separate poll from the Pew Research Center also offered bleak reading. Polls have consistently shown that Mr Bush is a divisive leader, with approval falling on partisan lines. However, the September poll showed that his approval rating since July has fallen by 9 percentage points among Republicans.

Support from core religious groups also declined, with a nine-point fall in approval from white evangelicals and a 12-point drop from white Roman Catholics, a group that Mr Bush has been trying to woo.

In spite of the fall from supporters, 79 per cent of Republicans still approve of Mr Bush. Whit Ayres, president of Ayres, McHenry and Associates, a Republican polling company, said: “That is not surprising after the roughest two weeks of his presidency. What is surprising is that eight out of 10 still approve of him.”

Addressing criticism, Mr Bush this week stepped up his public efforts with a series of initiatives, including seeking $51.8bn in disaster aid, which was approved by the House on Thursday, and giving aid to states that have been bearing the burden of the evacuees. He also announced plans to grant $2,000 in emergency relief to each affected household.

The opinion polls all showed Mr Bush at approval ratings between 40 and 42 per cent, in line with previous data. Mr Ayres said: “All presidents have had approval ratings at some point below 40 per cent except George Bush. His nadir is still higher than any other president, including his father and BillClinton.”

The Pew poll also pointed to a subtler change in voters' priorities after Hurricane Katrina. It found that 56 per cent thought domestic policy which typically favours Democrats was now their chief priority, rather than the war on terror, which had previously bolstered Mr Bush.

Andrew Kohut, director of Pew, said the poll also suggested that racial issues could become a higher political priority. “Seven out of 10 blacks say the disaster shows that racial inequality remains a major problem in the country; a majority of whites, 56 per cent, say this was not a particularly important lesson.”

Bush Suffers In Polls Post-Katrina (REU)

By John Whitesides, Political Correspondent

Reuters, September 8, 2005

President George W. Bush's image suffered in public opinion polls taken after Hurricane Katrina hit the U.S. Gulf Coast, with some finding growing doubts about his leadership and the country's direction.

After a week of criticism for a slow response to the devastation caused by Katrina, polls released on Thursday registered drops in Bush's approval ratings and in confidence in his leadership.

A Pew Research Center poll found 67 percent of Americans believed Bush could have done more to speed up relief efforts, and just 28 percent believed he did all he could. His approval rating slipped to 40 percent, down four points since July to the lowest point Pew has recorded.

The Pew poll also found a shift in public priorities after Katrina caused a jump in gasoline prices last week, with a majority saying for the first time since the September 11, 2001, attacks that it was more important for Bush to focus on domestic policy than the war on terrorism.

"Americans are depressed, angry and very worried about the economic consequences of the disaster," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew poll.

A WEEK OF CRITICISM

The new polls indicated a week of criticism and political finger-pointing over who is to blame for the disastrous response to Katrina could have taken a toll on the White House.

A CBS poll taken September 6-7 found 38 percent approved of Bush's handling of the storm's aftermath, while 58 percent disapproved. That was a dramatic shift from immediately after the storm last week, when 54 percent approved and 12 percent disapproved.

The CBS poll also found confidence in Bush during a crisis had fallen and only 48 percent now view him as a strong leader -- the lowest number ever for Bush in the poll. A year ago 64 percent of voters saw Bush as a strong leader.

Bush's approval rating fell to 41 percent in a new Zogby poll, with only 36 percent giving him a passing grade on his handling of the response to the storm.

The Zogby poll also found broad pessimism among a majority of Americans after the storm, with 53 percent saying the country is headed in the wrong direction and 42 percent saying it is on the right track.

A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll taken on September 5-6 found 42 percent believed Bush did a "bad" or "terrible" job handling the storm and subsequent flooding, while 35 percent thought he performed "great" or "good."

DOJ_NMG_0004093

A Washington Post/ABC News poll taken September 2 offered more mixed results, with 46 percent approving of Bush's performance and 47 percent disapproving.

There was plenty of blame to go around for the slow response to Katrina, with local and state governments also taking a hit.

The Gallup poll found 13 percent blamed Bush for the problems in New Orleans, while 18 percent blamed federal agencies, 25 percent blamed state and local officials and 38 percent said no one was to blame.

In the Pew poll, 58 percent thought the federal government had done only a fair or poor job after the storm, but 51 percent also thought state and local governments in Louisiana and Mississippi had done just a fair or poor job.

Americans Give Bush Poor Marks On Handling Katrina, Polls Show (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil And Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, September 9, 2005

Sept. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Two new polls show Americans give President George W. Bush poor marks for his handling of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, with one survey showing that Bush is now losing support even among his Republican base.

Both polls contain additional bad news for Bush. A poll by the Pew Research Center for People and the Press gives him an overall job approval rating of 40 percent -- down 10 percent since January -- and a disapproval rating of 52 percent, among the highest of his presidency.

Bush's job approval rating was 41 percent in a Zogby America poll, the lowest in that poll's history, and 53 percent of those questioned said the nation is headed in the ``wrong direction."

The surveys were conducted in the week following the hurricane's assault on the Gulf Coast and show that support for the president, at near-record lows before the storm's arrival, fell further amid anger over the federal government's response.

``Uncharacteristically, the president's ratings have slipped most among his core constituents -- Republicans and conservatives," Pew director Andy Kohut wrote in an e-mail.

In the Pew survey, 67 percent of 1,000 adults interviewed by telephone Sept. 6-7 said Bush could have done more to speed up relief efforts; 28 percent said he did everything possible.

`Shift in Priorities'

Hurricane Katrina produced a ``major shift in public priorities," according to Pew. For the first time since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, a majority of Americans now believe it is more important for the president to focus on domestic issues than the war on terrorism.

When asked what should be a priority for the president, 56 percent said ``domestic policy," an increase of 16 percentage points since January. Twenty-five percent said Bush's top priority should be fighting terrorism, a 19-point decline from January.

The Pew survey shows Bush's support among Republicans is strong but slipping, and since his support among Democrats and self-described independents remains consistent, Bush's declining approval is linked directly to that slippage within his own party.

The new poll shows Bush with a job approval rating of 79 percent among Republicans, down 9 percentage points since Pew's July survey. Among Democrats, his approval was 19 percent compared with 18 percent in July, and among independents it was 33 percent versus 32 percent, changes that in both cases are within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Support Down Within Party

Among those who identify themselves as ``conservative Republicans," Bush's job approval declined seven percentage points from the July survey and by 11 percentage points among those who describe themselves as ``moderate Republicans."

Bush's overall job approval rating in July was 44 percent.

The Pew poll found that blacks are more inclined to believe race played a factor in the federal response to the hurricane than whites; many of those who remained in New Orleans after the flooding were blacks.

Some 66 percent of blacks surveyed said the federal response would have been faster if most of the victims in New Orleans were white, while 77 percent of whites questioned said the issue of race made no difference in the government's response.

Hurricane Katrina ravaged Louisiana, Mississippi and parts of Alabama and knocked eight oil refineries out of commission, leading to a surge in gasoline prices. The average U.S. retail price jumped 45 cents last week to $3.057 per gallon, according to the American Automobile Association.

DOJ_NMG_0004094

The Pew survey found that seven in 10 Americans are ``closely'' following news accounts on hurricane coverage, and that 71 percent are following stories on rising gasoline prices -- the highest percentage ever in the 20 years Pew has been asking respondents whether they pay attention to energy issues.

Zogby Poll

In the Zogby survey, Bush's overall job approval rating slumped to a record low as three-fifths of those questioned criticized the government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Forty-one percent of respondents in the telephone survey Sept. 6-7 gave Bush positive marks for his job performance, down from 45 percent in a July 30 survey and 50 percent in mid- February. Bush got negative marks from 59 percent of respondents, up from 55 percent in July and 50 percent in February in the poll.

The poll showed 60 percent characterized Bush's handling of the hurricane as ``fair'' to ``poor,'' while 36 percent graded his performance ``good'' to ``excellent.'' More than half of those polled -- 53 percent -- said the country is headed in the wrong direction.

``The president has managed to do early in his second term what his father did in just one term: go from record-high approval numbers in the aftermath of 9/11 to his present numbers,'' John Zogby, chief executive of polling company Zogby International, said in a statement.

The survey of 1,157 likely voters has a margin of error of plus or minus 2.9 percentage points, Zogby said.

Bush would lose elections if he ran against the past four U.S. presidents, yet would edge Massachusetts Senator John Kerry - - his Democratic opponent in the 2004 election -- by 1 percentage point, the poll showed.

Partisan Bickering Over Katrina Escalates - To Peril Of Both Sides (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - As distasteful as it is to many Americans, the politics of hurricane Katrina have rushed in to fill the agendas of elected officials nearly as quickly as the floodwaters inundated New Orleans.

For the Bush administration, the mantra this week became "no blame-gaming, no finger-pointing" as it sought to recover from the early perception of a slow response to the disaster. The message has been that this is an administration of action, not partisan bickering, and that the task at hand is to address the situation on the ground. President Bush sent Congress a request for $51.8 billion in additional hurricane aid. Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynne, toured New Orleans and the Gulf region Thursday, talking to local officials and first-responders.

In reality, hurricane Katrina has become an anti-9/11 of sorts. Whereas four years ago people dropped their red and blue identities to rally around their leaders, Katrina seems to have exacerbated the extreme polarization of the Bush years. At his first Cabinet meeting since returning from vacation, Mr. Bush declared he would oversee an inquiry into the government response to Katrina, prompting an immediate outcry from Democrats that the government cannot investigate itself.

Republicans in Congress quickly followed by announcing an investigative commission on Katrina, with GOP members to form a majority. Democrats cried foul, arguing that the model of the 9/11 commission - made up of nonlawmakers in a balance of Republicans and Democrats, operating with a goal of consensus - would be preferable. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, widely seen as a leading Democratic hopeful for president in 2008, emerged as a chief critic of the Republicans' inquiry plan and of the performance of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Before Katrina, Senator Clinton had lain low on national issues, focusing instead on reelection to the Senate.

Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, also came out with guns blazing this week. "We must ... come to terms with the ugly truth that skin color, age, and economics played a deadly role in who survived and who did not," he told the National Baptist Convention of America on Wednesday.

"Politicization is very dangerous for both sides," says Marshall Wittmann, a senior fellow at the Democratic Leadership Council. "If either party is seen as obstructing results, people will blame them. Americans are pragmatic, not ideological or partisan. Clearly, the administration has bungled this, but ultimately the American people want to see a restored New Orleans and these people's lives put back together."

On Thursday, the liberal group Moveon.org organized a protest of hurricane evacuees at the White House to decry the federal response and to demand a meeting with Bush - suggesting almost a Cindy Sheehan-ization of Katrina victims. The Republican National Committee fired back in a press release, saying "Moveon.org Democrats play the blame game and politicize Katrina relief."

For Republicans, a political danger lies in the fact that they control the White House and both houses of Congress - and the public will look to them for results. "The real danger comes on the administration's side, where if New Orleans becomes a metaphor for Bush policy in general, they're in real trouble," says Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. "If it reinforces that the comfortable are safe and do well, while the vulnerable are on their own, it could be a burden for Bush for the rest of his term."

DOJ_NMG_0004095

A Texas Poll released Thursday shows Bush's approval ratings in Texas, his home state, are 9 points below where they usually are, with 52 percent approving of his performance and 43 percent disapproving. Bush's job approval in Texas is typically10 points above his national average.

Generally, the partisan polarization registered by pollsters during much of Bush's presidency - abating only in the aftermath of 9/11 - continues. The latest US polls show Bush's job approval among Republicans in the mid-80s and in the low teens among Democrats - a gap of about 70 percentage points. "He's the most polarizing president we've had in the 50-odd years we've been polling the question," says Gary Jacobson, an expert on this issue at the University of California, San Diego.

This phenomenon reflects Bush's tendency to play to his base supporters, and bring over a few Democrats to his side as needed. During a major challenge, Bush's strategy of keeping his core of support on his side serves as a political protection, Professor Jacobson says.

"He's lost the Democrats, period, and the independents are now closer to the Democrats than [to] the Republicans," Jacobson says. "What's saved Bush is that his base has stayed with him."

Congress Clears $51.8 Billion Relief Bill (BSUN/AP)

By David Espo, The Associated Press

The Baltimore Sun, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Acting with extraordinary speed, Congress approved an additional $51.8 billion for relief and recovery from Hurricane Katrina today. President Bush pledged to make it "easy and simple as possible" for uncounted, uprooted storm victims to collect food stamps and other government benefits.

"We're not asking for a handout, but we do need help," said Sen. Trent Lott -- whose home state of Mississippi suffered grievously from the storm -- as lawmakers approved the bill just a day after Bush requested more aid on top of the $10.5 billion already provided. The measure includes $2,000 debit cards for families to use on immediate needs.

Bush signed the bill tonight. In a statement issued by the White House, he praised Congress for "moving swiftly and in strong bipartisan fashion to approve these additional emergency funds" but cautioned: "More resources will be needed as we work to help people get back on their feet."

The overwhelming support for the measure across party lines -- it passed 410-11 in the House and 97-0 in the Senate -- masked murmurs of concern about a rapidly rising price tag as well as a growing atmosphere of political jockeying in Congress less than two weeks after the hurricane battered the Gulf Coast.

Congressional Democratic leaders said they would refuse to appoint members to a committee that Republican leaders intend to create to investigate the administration's readiness and response to the storm.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi called the GOP plan "a sham that is just the latest example of congressional Republicans being the foxes guarding the president's hen house." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said it was like a baseball pitcher calling "his own balls and strikes." Both urged appointment of an independent panel like the Sept. 11 commission.

Republicans said they intended to go ahead despite the threatened boycott. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee told reporters there had been a "systemwide failure" in the response to the storm. Citing problems at the local, state and federal levels, he said, "We will get to the bottom of that" in a congressional investigation.

Beyond that, said New York Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the House GOP campaign committee, "it is reprehensible that some elected officials are looking to score political points in the wake of Hurricane Katrina's devastation."

Even before Bush spoke and Congress acted, the government provided fresh evidence of the impact of the storm.

The Labor Department reported that roughly 10,000 workers filed for unemployment benefits last week after losing their jobs as a result of the storm, and said the level would rise sharply. In a painful irony, analysts said today's number would have been higher yet except that the storm forced claims offices to close and prevented more of the newly jobless from filling out their paperwork.

Bush, his poll numbers sagging and his administration buffeted by criticism of its response to the storm, dispatched Vice President Dick Cheney to the region and met with GOP congressional leaders at the White House. At mid-afternoon, flanked by members of his Cabinet, he stepped to the microphones to pledge additional help, ask for patience and announce a national day of prayer for Friday of next week.

Referring to the debit cards in the legislation making its way quickly through Congress, he said, "The first step is providing every household with $2,000 in emergency disaster relief that can be used for immediate needs, such as food or clothing or personal essentials."

DOJ_NMG_0004096

Additionally, with hundreds of thousands of storm victims now dispersed to numerous states, he said the government was working to "ensure that those of you who receive federal benefits administered by the states of Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana will continue to get those benefits in the states where you're now staying."

He said the government would formally grant those victims evacuee status, meaning they would be able to register for their benefits without producing all of the normal documentation -- much of which may have been lost in a desperate retreat from storm-threatened homes. He urged storm victims to contact the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and asked them to be patient if they encountered delays.

Bush said the evacuee status would apply to "the full range of federal benefits administered by the states," including Medicaid, welfare, food stamps, housing, school lunch and more.

"In all the steps we take, our goal is not to simply provide benefits but to make them easy and simple as possible to collect," he said.

Later, looking ahead to the massive reconstruction effort, Bush quietly waived sections of a federal law that requires payment of prevailing wages on government contracts. Prevailing wages are based on surveys that take into account union and non-union pay. One business organization welcomed the move, while the AFL-CIO criticized it. Conservatives, in particular, said they hoped the government's billions would be spent wisely.

"We have all the hallmarks here of a rush to spend money," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., whose home state was damaged by the storm. "We have got to be careful that this does not become a feeding frenzy. ... This is our grandchildren's money."

Democrats, too, said they wanted the money to be well-spent. At the same time, Reid and other Senate Democrats unveiled a far more comprehensive proposal to provide health, housing, education and other benefits.

The White House said $50 billion of the $51.8 billion bill would be distributed through the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has been the subject of widespread criticism in the past week.

The official breakdown said $23.2 billion was for housing aid and grants to individuals, of which about $640 million was for the unprecedented debit cards.

State and local governments are in line for $7.7 billion in reimbursement costs.

White House officials said the money was needed without delay to prevent an interruption in the massive operation designed to repair the damage along the Gulf Coast and bring hope to an almost unimaginable number of evacuees forced to flee.

The bill brought the total in disaster aid to $62.3 billion -- a total that is certain to rise as the full impact of the storm becomes clear. With much of New Orleans still covered by fouled floodwaters, for example, there is as yet no estimate for the cost of pumping out the city -- or rendering it safely habitable again.

Congress Approves Katrina Package Of $51.8 Billion (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A $51.8 billion Katrina relief package won quick approval from Congress even as lawmakers moved toward making billions of dollars more available for welfare and flood-insurance payments to families displaced by the storm.

The House voted to more than double the national flood-insurance program's borrowing authority to $3.5 billion from $1.5 billion to meet anticipated claims. A second measure, also approved by the House, would advance an estimated $6.2 billion to ease the welfare crunch for states as homeless families are relocated.

The Senate appears sympathetic with both initiatives, but the welfare measure could be delayed unless Republicans develop a more coordinated legislative strategy to deal with the extraordinary circumstances of the storm. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) is drafting a larger bill that would also ease the availability of unemployment and health-care benefits for those evacuated. And it is an open question as to whether the House welfare proposals would be wrapped into this bill or sent to President Bush quickly for his signature.

The $51.8 billion spending measure enjoyed a clearer path and was sent onto the White House last night -- a day after Mr. Bush had requested the money. Given the urgency of the relief efforts, Republicans brooked no changes that risked delaying passage, but the party's tactics also reflected the political sensitivity of the crisis.

Rarely has the House, for example, considered such a large appropriations bill under the strict procedures applied yesterday, which severely limited debate and permitted no amendments. In the aftermath of the storm last week, Democrats had agreed to expedite consideration of the first $10.5 billion emergency bill. But there is growing frustration that Congress finds itself in a situation where it is pouring tens of billions of dollars into disaster accounts administered by the same Federal Emergency Management Agency that many lawmakers have so roundly criticized.

DOJ_NMG_0004097

On a party-line 221-193 vote, Democrats made a doomed attempt to permit a vote calling for a reorganization of the relief effort. "FEMA has been used as a political dumping ground by the White House," said Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin, ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee. "This money is being spent by a disabled agency."

Mindful of this criticism, the House modified the administration's request to provide $15 million to beef up the inspector general's office at the Department of Homeland Security to audit FEMA's expenditures. But the agency is spending money so quickly that neither the House nor Senate has held a single hearing on the requests.

Along with appropriations, the flood-insurance and welfare measures illustrate other costs for the government in the months ahead. The flood-insurance program, for example, is intended to be self-financing, so any money borrowed now would have to be repaid to the Treasury from future premiums. But the $2 billion increase now may be only the first in a series, and the strain so great that Washington will be under pressure to step in eventually to avoid sharp increases in premiums on other policyholders.

The welfare bill also increases the federal government's exposure by advancing funds early to states and freeing up contingency accounts for the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program. The federal government would absorb a greater share of TANF's costs for Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, and the bill waives rules to give all states more flexibility in enrolling displaced families.

A Compassionate Bush Was Absent Right After Katrina (USAT)

By Judy Keen And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush has shown that he can be empathetic, sensitive and decisive. But those qualities eluded him for days after Hurricane Katrina, and the lapse could become a defining moment of his White House tenure.

The most stirring image of Bush's presidency came when he spontaneously grabbed a bullhorn at Ground Zero and vowed retribution against 9/11 terrorists. Tears filled his eyes when he took the oath of office in 2001, and he has wept publicly when talking about U.S. troops slain in battle and his respect for his father. He has hugged countless victims of fires, hurricanes and other tragedies. During his 2000 campaign, he told recovering teen addicts, “I used to drink too much. … I want you to know that your life's walk is shared by a lot of other people.”

But there's another side to Bush. He can seem detached and unaware of the messages conveyed by his words and conduct. Bush decided to see Katrina's destruction for the first time from his jumbo jet and joked on his first trip to the disaster zone about youthful partying in New Orleans. He didn't cancel his vacation until two days after Katrina struck and didn't visit the region until four days after the storm. It's not the first time that side of the president has been visible. He taped a video for a 2004 black-tie dinner showing him hunting under White House furniture for Iraq's weapons of mass destruction as the death toll there mounted. His visit to Ground Zero came three days after the 9/11 attacks.

Bush's critics say his response to the hurricane proves that he's not a leader. “Oblivious, in denial, dangerous,” House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said Wednesday. White House spokesman Scott McClellan has dismissed criticism of the response by Bush and his administration as part of the Washington “blame game.”

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Monday and Tuesday found that 42% of Americans think Bush has done a bad or terrible job responding to the hurricane. “He's starting to create some vision and some hope,” says Christine Riordan, a leadership expert at Texas Christian University's M.J. Neeley School of Business. “But it's five days too late.”

Others say he inherited from his parents a Yankee reserve that sometimes prevents him from quickly grasping the emotional requirements of pivotal events. In his 1992 re-election campaign, President George H.W. Bush seemed disconnected from the pain of persistent joblessness and glanced at his watch during a debate with Bill Clinton. Bush's mother, former first lady Barbara Bush, said Monday at Houston's Astrodome that some evacuees there “were underprivileged anyway, so this is working very well for them.”

“Occasionally their New England roots make them a little embarrassed and awkward about showing that side of themselves,” says Tom Rath, a New Hampshire political strategist and old family friend.

Others say that once Bush becomes engaged, he has the sort of compassion for which Clinton and Ronald Reagan were renowned. “He does have this unique one-on-one quality to relate to people,” says Bill Minutaglio, author of a 2001 Bush biography, First Son. But so far, he says, “The right salve for the nation in this time of great tragedy is missing. People are thirsting for it. … It can't be orchestrated, it just has to happen.”

Bush has cleared his schedule to focus on disaster relief. He has twice visited areas devastated by Katrina and is expected to return soon. During his first visit a week ago, he choked back tears after listening to helicopter pilots describe rescuing victims. On his second visit Monday, he said in Poplarville, Miss., “I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take. And we're with you.”

DOJ_NMG_0004098

Roderick Hart, who teaches communications and government at the University of Texas, calls Bush's initial off-key reaction to Katrina “an odd case.” Bush does have “an ability to reach out to people,” he says. “But the delay was so dramatic that his response now has made it seem disingenuous in some people's eyes.”

But Kathryn Dunn Tenpas, a Washington University political scientist and Brookings Institution fellow, says Bush is now “empathizing and responding in tangible ways. … He will fare well if he shows that he is addressing the needs.”

Bush has spoken before about the consequences of a leader's performance at moments such as this. In a 2000 debate with Democrat Al Gore, he was asked to describe how he handled crises under fire. “It's the time to test your mettle,” Bush said then, “a time to test your heart when you see people whose lives have been turned upside down.”

Katrina Underscores Bush's Isolated Style (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - As President Bush flew this week to the Gulf Coast for his second post-Katrina visit, an aide said the trip reflected Bush's usual routine of "seeing as much as possible and getting information from different places."

Not quite.

Bush did not visit with any angry evacuees in New Orleans. As Katrina approached, Bush and his top aides spent days apparently unaware that New Orleans might be flooded - despite many warnings, some from inside his own administration. Afterwards, he heaped praise on officials responsible for the slow and initially disorganized disaster-relief efforts. His aides dismiss demands that Bush hold someone accountable for failure, saying that's merely a distracting "blame game."

None of this should be a surprise. Bush has a long record of avoiding critics, rewarding loyalty even in the face of failure and shunning - even punishing - those who disagree with him. It's a management style that shapes how he governs - disdaining compromise with Democrats in Congress, for example - and one that brushes off whole sectors of the American electorate.

That could come back to haunt him, as is now evident in the two problems - Iraq and Katrina - that together have sent his approval ratings to the lowest levels of his presidency and threaten his second-term agenda.

His style of isolating himself from unwelcome voices pleases his core supporters, who don't want him to compromise, but it sacrifices the broader public appeal that helped Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton weather second-term setbacks. One new poll, from the independent Pew Research Center, suggests he is losing support even from Republicans and conservatives.

To Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., the Bush administration's response to Katrina suggested "a real sense of arrogance. Loyalty and never admitting a mistake matters more than the truth. It has a Nixon feel to me."

Bush allies insist he is engaged and pressing the government to fix all hurricane-related problems. But the public isn't much impressed, judging by his plummeting polls. One new survey by independent pollster John Zogby shows Bush would lose a hypothetical election to every modern president, including the much-maligned Jimmy Carter.

Bush's isolated management style is one factor hurting him. While his decision-making is usually cloaked in secrecy, the hurricane crisis showed some characteristic traits.

Denial of unpleasant realities, for example. On Sept. 1 Bush contended that no one could have foreseen that New Orleans might be flooded: "I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees."

Actually, a lot of people saw it coming. Three years ago, The New Orleans Times-Picayune published a lengthy examination of how likely that scenario was, and it got wide attention. In fact, Bush's own administration participated in a disaster drill for almost exactly this kind of catastrophe.

Bush himself has admitted in the past that he does not reach far for information.

"I glance at the headlines," Bush told Fox News in September 2003, but "I rarely read the stories, and get briefed by people who ... probably read the news themselves ... And the most objective sources I have are people on my staff who tell me what's happening in the world."

Inside his administration, dissenting views are often stifled, and dissidents punished.

In 2002, the administration fired the head of the Army Corps Engineers after he continued to advocate spending increases for flood control after he'd been overruled. Michael Parker, a former Republican congressman from Mississippi, wanted a 40 percent spending increase, while Bush wanted a 10 percent cut.

When Bush convened an economic summit in 2002, then-Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill later told writer Ron Suskind, the White House wanted to hear only from people who already supported Bush policies.

"A carefully vetted group of more than 240 executives, economists, and even a few labor leaders was being assembled," Suskind wrote. "They'd seem diverse and independent to the untrained eye. In fact, nearly every one would be a Bush supporter and many were major fundraisers. Attendance was, in a way, a reward for support."

DOJ_NMG_0004099

While Bush likes to be surrounded by friendly faces, he avoids frowning ones. Since Katrina hit, Bush visited the Gulf Coast twice, but both times avoided angry evacuees - ostensibly so he wouldn't interfere with relief operations.

Some veteran Bush-watchers are skeptical of that White House explanation.

"They didn't want anything to be on TV showing a bunch of angry people hollering at the president," said George Edwards, a presidential scholar at Texas A&M University. "It would not have been a favorable scene unless he could handle it well, which he can't. Clinton could. He would be down there feeling their pain. But Bush can't."

The president also has refused to speak to two major groups that represent millions of Americans, but have criticized him.

After one brief phone conversation in 2001, Bush has never met with the president of the AFL-CIO. He is the only president in the last half century who has not.

And Bush has never addressed the NAACP as president. "You've heard the rhetoric and the names they've called me," he once explained.

For more on the polls, www.people-press.org and www.zogby.com

Bush Batting Average Calls For New Coaches (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, September 9, 2005

President Bush used to be part owner of a major league baseball team. He once coveted the Baseball Commissioner's job. So, he'll understand this baseball parlance.

He has had three really big at-bats during his four-plus years in the White House. First, 9/11. Then, the Iraq War. Now, the Katrina Hurricane tragedy. His batting performance:

· One home run (9/11).

· Two strikeouts (Iraq and Katrina).

A .333 batting average is pretty good for a baseball player. But in the Oval Office, two strikeouts in three crucial at-bats is bringing boos from more than half the crowd, as national polls show.

In baseball, hitting coaches share credit or blame for the batter's performance. Coaches in Bush's big at-bats:

At the time of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, then-mayor Rudy Giuliani of New York City quickly and wisely coached Bush on what the federal government could and should do. We were comforted and united in efforts to avoid re-occurrences.

On Iraq, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld repeatedly has miscoached Bush for three years on pre-invasion and post-invasion decisions. We are confused and distressed over how and when to get out of this mess.

Local leadership was lacking in Louisiana during Katrina, by both the governor and New Orleans mayor. But Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and FEMA Director Michael Brown co-coached Bush badly. We are angry and scared of what might happen in another major hurricane or a nuclear or biological attack.

If Bush keeps his inept coaches on Iraq and Homeland Security, he may strike out again at his next big at-bat. His average will drop to .250, and the temporary boos will become irreversible jeers. From today's spectators and tomorrow's historians.

Feedback

Other views on President Bush's handling of disasters:

"In baseball, a .333 batting average is very, very good. In major political crises, it's pretty poor. In fact, I would say it's failure. President Bush's shortcomings are not the product of the advice he receives, but his deficient judgment in getting us into the Iraq war and in surrounding himself with men based not on their expertise but on rewarding political associates."

- Robert Dallek, presidential historian

"There are no footnotes from cable TV in history books. Historians will judge on the dispassionate analysis of records. Too soon to tell what they'll say."

- James Jay Carafano, historian, Heritage Foundation

The Party Of Performance (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

In the aftermath of Katrina, there's an opening for a different kind of politics in America. The new politics isn't about values; it isn't about settling scores. It's about performance. It's about putting a wounded, shaken country back on its feet, much as Franklin Delano Roosevelt did in his famous First Hundred Days.

One politician who is clearly articulating that vision right now is the recovering right-wing firebrand, former House speaker Newt Gingrich. I've always had a soft spot for Gingrich, despite his sometimes nasty partisanship during the 1990s, because he is that rare political figure who actually does think "outside the box" about how to solve problems. And he's doing that now.

DOJ_NMG_0004100

The immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has looked like politics as usual. The Democrats are in a paroxysm of righteous indignation -- much of it justified but in the long run counterproductive. When Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid proposes that the Senate investigate whether President's Bush's vacation contributed to the disaster, the public response is likely to be: Give me a break! When the Democrats focus all their criticism on the GOP-led federal government and ignore the appalling lapses of Democratic administrations in New Orleans and Louisiana, they lose credibility.

The Bush administration, meanwhile, remains in its hunkered-down defensive crouch, with White House spokesman Scott McClellan treating any demand for accountability as a partisan "blame game." It's outrageous to read that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has been telling members of Congress that media reports are overstating the problems for storm survivors -- this from a man who was denying on National Public Radio last Thursday that there was any crisis at the New Orleans convention center at the very hour reporters were finding dead bodies and abandoned, starving people there. If the administration maintains that tone, it will self-destruct.

Now listen to what Gingrich has to say about "changing the playbook" after Katrina. His comments are drawn from two memos he has circulated to Republican leaders since the storm hit and from a conversation we had this week exploring some of his ideas.

Gingrich argues that the values debate that has divided America so sharply during the past decade is over. There's a broad consensus about most issues, and anyway people realize that the country's big problems aren't about morality but performance. "We're not in a values fight now but over whether the system is working," Gingrich told me. "The issue is delivery." And that's true at every level -- city, state and federal.

Gingrich's critique of the federal response is as devastating as that of any Democrat. "For the last week the federal government and its state and local counterparts have consistently been behind the curve," he wrote fellow Republicans this week. "The American people overwhelmingly know that the current situation is totally unacceptable," and for that reason, "it is a mistake to get trapped into defending the systems and processes which clearly failed." He observes in another memo, "While the destruction was unprecedented, it was entirely predictable."

What's needed is a creative government response as big as the disaster itself. Gingrich urges in one of his memos that Bush appoint a super-manager who can oversee the rebuilding and suggests Rudy Giuliani for the job. "The former mayor has enough management toughness to force the federal agencies to actually change their behavior," he writes.

The former speaker has some classic Gingrich zingers for how to rev up the rebuilding effort. He wants to turn the Gulf Coast into a "Zone of Recovery, Reconstruction and Prosperity," by offering a 25 percent tax credit for all job-creating investment in the region over the next three years. And he wants to create a cadre of "entrepreneurial public managers" who can replace the leaden public bureaucracy and get things done on Internet time, with the reliability of FedEx or UPS.

This is the moment for the Party of Performance to take center stage. The breakdown in public life was obvious before Katrina. We have a government that can't control its borders, can't find a viable strategy for its war in Iraq, can't organize the key agencies to address the terrorism problems it has been trumpeting. The yearning in the country for something different has been palpable this year.

America faces an "extreme disaster," says Gingrich, one that will have more lasting and complex effects than any domestic event since World War II. The politicians who rise to that challenge will surge in the 2006 and 2008 elections. The ones who remain stuck in their ruts will suffer. Who's ready to sign up for the Party of Performance?

Inescapable Accountability (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The following is brought to you by the word "accountability."

Keep that word in mind whenever you hear defenders of President Bush accusing his political opponents of playing the "blame game" by daring to pose pointed questions about why so many people in New Orleans, most of them very poor, had to wait so long for relief from their suffering.

The Bush White House must have run the phrases "blame game" and "finger-pointing" through its focus groups. In his Wednesday briefing, White House press secretary Scott McClellan used variations on those formulations eight times each.

McClellan neatly rolled them into a single sentence when he told off a reporter who had the nerve to ask whether the president had confidence in those who oversaw the federal relief effort. "If you want to continue to engage in finger-pointing and blame-gaming, that's fine," McClellan harrumphed. Nice job, Scott.

McClellan must have been unaware that the White House had been organizing a finger-pointing, blame-gaming project of its own. "In a reflection of what has long been a hallmark of Mr. Rove's tough political style," Adam Nagourney and Anne E.

DOJ_NMG_0004101

Kornblut reported in Monday's New York Times, "the administration is also working to shift the blame away from the White House and toward officials of New Orleans and Louisiana who, as it happens, are Democrats."

The fruits of that project were quickly visible when White House apologists went to town against New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco. Grover Norquist, one of Washington's most important conservative activists and a close Rove ally, blamed the chaos on "looting in a Democratic city run by a Democratic mayor and a Democratic governor." Surely McClellan will call Norquist to reprimand him about that awful finger-pointing.

Fox's Bill O'Reilly devoted one of his "Talking Points Memos" to denouncing Nagin and Blanco. True, he was "fair and balanced" in devoting a single sentence in his speech of roughly 500 words to Bush's role: "the Homeland Security office and President Bush were 24 hours late in taking decisive action." Thanks for that, Bill.

The White House is aghast because it is pulling levers that once worked, and nothing is happening.

To borrow one of O'Reilly's favorite phrases, New Orleans was a "No Spin Zone." Good, smart, tough and compassionate reporters gave Americans a direct view of the disaster and kept asking, with increasing urgency, why New Orleans was such a mess.

You can tell the White House knows how much trouble it is in -- that's no doubt why Bush had another news conference yesterday -- by following the Frank Theorem. "It's a rule in American politics," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), "that whichever side denounces the other for politicizing the issue is losing the argument." Bingo.

Once, the White House could use its surrogates to intimidate critics. Especially after Sept. 11, Democrats were concerned -- for both patriotic and opportunistic reasons -- that certain criticisms of Bush might be seen as "giving aid and comfort to the enemy." You can't be accused of giving aid and comfort to a hurricane.

This crisis has been an exceptionally clear lesson in this White House's overall approach: Try to get everyone to believe that any criticism of the president will blow back on the critics because Americans just don't like that sort of thing. Attack "finger-pointing," and make sure your allies madly point fingers at your opponents.

Say no one should play politics with a disaster -- and then make sure Republican leaders in Congress set up a commission to investigate the relief effort without asking Democrats for their input on how the investigation should be carried out.

Bush's critics aren't backing off, because they've been here before. Former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle, who cooperated with Bush in the days after Sept. 11 but lost his South Dakota seat after a long, White House-inspired campaign accusing him of being "obstructionist," speaks from experience.

"Democrats to this day remain outraged at the blatant efforts that Republicans, especially in the administration, made to undermine the perception of our patriotism and our motivations," Daschle said in an interview.

This time around, Democrats won't be waved off by right-wing commentators or by contrived and insincere appeals to national unity. "I don't think we should pay a whit of attention to administration criticisms," Daschle said. "Democrats need to ask the hard questions and ignore the political attacks that are destined to come when we ask them."

The sounds of contention you are hearing are the sounds of accountability in a free republic. The president may not like it, but it is a refreshing sound.

Point Those Fingers (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

To understand the history of the Bush administration's response to disaster, just follow the catchphrases.

First, look at 2001 Congressional testimony by Joseph Allbaugh, President Bush's first pick to head the Federal Emergency Management Agency. FEMA, he said, would emphasize "Responsibility and Accountability" (capital letters and boldface in the original statement). He repeated the phrase several times.

What Mr. Allbaugh seems to have meant was that state and local government officials shouldn't count on FEMA to bail them out if they didn't prepare adequately for disasters. They should accept responsibility for protecting their constituents, and be held accountable if they don't.

But those were rules for the little people. Now that the Bush administration has botched its own response to disaster, we're not supposed to play the "blame game." Scott McClellan used that phrase 15 times over the course of just two White House press briefings.

It might make sense to hold off on the criticism if this were the first big disaster on Mr. Bush's watch, or if the chain of mistakes in handling Hurricane Katrina were out of character. But even with the most generous possible assessment, this is the administration's second big policy disaster, after Iraq. And the chain of mistakes was perfectly in character - there are striking parallels between the errors the administration made in Iraq and the errors it made last week.

DOJ_NMG_0004102

In Iraq, the administration displayed a combination of paralysis and denial after the fall of Baghdad, as uncontrolled looting destroyed much of Iraq's infrastructure.

The same deer-in-the-headlights immobility prevailed as Katrina approached and struck the Gulf Coast. The storm gave plenty of warning. By the afternoon of Monday, Aug. 29, the flooding of New Orleans was well under way - city officials publicly confirmed a breach in the 17th Street Canal at 2 p.m. Yet on Tuesday federal officials were still playing down the problem, and large-scale federal aid didn't arrive until last Friday.

In Iraq the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran the country during the crucial first year after Saddam's fall - the period when an effective government might have forestalled the nascent insurgency - was staffed on the basis of ideological correctness and personal connections rather than qualifications. At one point Ari Fleischer's brother was in charge of private-sector development.

The administration followed the same principles in staffing FEMA. The agency had become a highly professional organization during the Clinton years, but under Mr. Bush it reverted to its former status as a "turkey farm," a source of patronage jobs.

As Bloomberg News puts it, the agency's "upper ranks are mostly staffed with people who share two traits: loyalty to President George W. Bush and little or no background in emergency management." By now everyone knows FEMA's current head went from overseeing horse shows to overseeing the nation's response to disaster, with no obvious qualifications other than the fact that he was Mr. Allbaugh's college roommate.

All that's missing from the Katrina story is an expensive reconstruction effort, with lucrative deals for politically connected companies, that fails to deliver essential services. But give it time - they're working on that, too.

Why did the administration make the same mistakes twice? Because it paid no political price the first time.

Can the administration escape accountability again? Some of the tactics it has used to obscure its failure in Iraq won't be available this time. The reality of the catastrophe was right there on our TV's, although FEMA is now trying to prevent the media from showing pictures of the dead. And people who ask hard questions can't be accused of undermining the troops.

But the other factors that allowed the administration to evade responsibility for the mess in Iraq are still in place. The media will be tempted to revert to he-said-she-said stories rather than damning factual accounts. The effort to shift blame to state and local officials is under way. Smear campaigns against critics will start soon, if they haven't already. And raw political power will be used to block any independent investigation.

Will this be enough to let the administration get away with another failure? Let's hope not: if the administration isn't held accountable for what just happened, it will keep repeating its mistakes. Michael Brown and Michael Chertoff will receive presidential medals, and the next disaster will be even worse.

Hughes Is Varnishing The Nation's Tarnish (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The image of the United States has taken a beating over the past 10 days, as foreign television and newspapers show images of death, chaos and disease in New Orleans. Even lowly Bangladesh (per capita income: $400 a year) was moved to send $1 million in foreign aid.

But Karen Hughes has another view. The Bush confidante, now undersecretary of state for public diplomacy, held a meeting with her staff in Foggy Bottom yesterday and was asked about the international ramifications of the response to the New Orleans flooding. The problem, Hughes replied, was not a failed relief effort but a foreign press that did not appreciate the federal government's good work.

"There are a lot of things being said about us around the world that aren't true," said the woman in charge of polishing the American image abroad. "We've marshaled the resources of our federal government" to help fellow Americans, she said, and if people think otherwise, "we need to aggressively challenge that idea around the world."

An hour after Hughes gave her defense, a group of liberal demonstrators assembled in Lafayette Park for the opposite purpose. MoveOn.org, which three weeks ago held a rally in the same place to protest the Iraq war, was protesting the hurricane response. This time, instead of demanding a presidential audience for anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, the group was demanding a presidential audience for three New Orleans evacuees.

The demonstrators, carrying messages promoting women's rights, labor unions and "Hillary '08" and condemning Halliburton, Karl Rove, the Iraq war and killings in Sudan, did not deny that the hurricane protest was opportunistic. "It's almost as if people are looking for an excuse to pin something on Bush that will stick," said Jerry Stein, who also marched in the Iraq rally.

DOJ_NMG_0004103

Ten days after Katrina struck, the administration and its critics faced credibility challenges. On one side, Bush and his aides continued to admit what even key Republicans in Congress have said: that the response to the hurricane was a debacle. On the other side, liberals ratcheted up their criticism of the administration, giving Bush support for his accusation that they are playing politics.

Remarks by prominent Republicans have left the party on the defensive. The president's mother suggested that life in the Astrodome is "working very well" for impoverished evacuees. Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.) suggested fines for people who didn't heed evacuation warnings. And House Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) proposed bulldozing New Orleans.

Two-thirds of Americans say the administration botched the relief effort, a new Pew poll found, and only 40 percent approve of Bush's performance overall. Vice President Cheney was cursed out yesterday in Gulfport, Miss.

Yet the Bush administration, whether discussing Iraq or Katrina, remains unfailingly upbeat. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, introducing Hughes, said nothing of Katrina as she repeated the Bush mantra that "freedom is on the march."

Hughes picked up the theme. "We have to offer a positive vision of hope," she began. As if preparing troops for combat, she described her plans for improving world opinion of the United States: a "rapid-response unit," a plan to "forward-deploy regional SWAT teams" and create "a dual-headed DAS for public diplomacy."

One of her underlings rose to ask how this effort squared with the administration's famously tight control over its message. "Recently, we've had tremendous amount of difficulty in some cases getting clearance for our ambassadors to speak," he said.

Hughes replied that ambassadors are free to talk -- if they use the talking points she sends them. "If they make statements based on something I sent them," she said, "they're not going to be called on the carpet."

While Hughes told employees that America's problems could be solved with message discipline, about 10 blocks away, MoveOn was struggling to maintain its message discipline at its protest outside the White House. When the MoveOn organizers arrived, there was already a demonstration underway calling for intervention in Darfur, and the Katrina and Darfur demonstrators intermingled in an eclectic line demanding "Help Hurricane Victims" and "Stop the Genocide."

Tom Matzzie, a MoveOn official, told the cameras: "This is what government looks like when it is in the hands of people who don't believe in government."

But it proved difficult to keep the focus on the hurricane. Some of the MoveOn demonstrators surrounded a conservative heckler, who shouted: "You're a bunch of loony liberals."

"Bush dug himself a hole by going to Iraq," one of the liberals shouted back.

"What does Iraq have to do with Katrina, for crying out loud?" the conservative demanded.

"Because he doesn't care about poor people," came the reply.

Another conservative, Clarice McMillan, blurted out: "My country, right or wrong!"

Over with the protesters, Lisa Petrovich, a systems analyst from Montgomery County, was ambivalent. She is outraged about the response to the storm: Her mother and sister lost their homes and jobs in New Orleans and are living with her. But at the same time, she said of the protest, "I think there may be some opportunism."

Senators Press Bush On Hurricane Relief Czar (REU)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, September 8, 2005

Two Republican senators pressed President George W. Bush on Thursday to appoint a top official to lead the long-term recovery from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina.

Bush, still said to be dissatisfied with the relief effort, announced measures to help displaced Gulf Coast residents obtain benefits.

"We have much more work to do," he said. "But the people who have been hurt by this storm need to know that the government is going to be with you for the long haul."

Bush earlier met with Republican congressional leaders at the White House, where Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania urged him to pick someone to lead the administration's much-criticized recovery effort in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

White House officials have not ruled out such an option, saying it is among several being discussed for confronting long-term problems in Katrina's aftermath.

Various names have been mentioned in Washington for the job, such as former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, former Secretary of State Colin Powell and retired Gen. Tommy Franks, former head of the U.S. Central Command.

"I believe that we do need a person on the ground for a long period of time, the six- to nine-month range, who would be the person able to make decisions and cut through red tape, and I think the president agrees with that," Hutchison told reporters after the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0004104

Asked whether Bush agreed with creating the position, Santorum said: "That's up to him. He didn't say yes or no."

Vice President Dick Cheney, visiting the devastated region, was asked whether a czar to oversee hurricane relief was needed and responded by praising the people currently in charge.

"Well, I think we have got some very good people involved," he told reporters in Gulfport, Mississippi.

CUTTING RED TAPE

Bush, in a direct message to storm victims, announced measures to "cut through the red tape" to help them get benefits such as unemployment, Medicaid and food stamps.

He also said every household affected by the hurricane would get $2,000 in emergency disaster relief and that "evacuee status" would be granted to victims, many of whom no longer have documents to prove eligibility for benefits.

Bush also declared September 16 a national day of prayer and remembrance for the hurricane victims.

A day after Republican congressional leaders announced a joint House-Senate inquiry into government failures regarding the hurricane, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada criticized the approach and said the investigation should be conducted by an independent commission like the one that looked into the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Reid said Democrats would not participate in the joint committee, which they see as set up to protect the administration.

"An independent investigation insulated from politics and conflicts of interest is the only way to ensure that the American people get the answers they deserve," he said.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California said the congressional plan would "result in a whitewash of what is going on there."

Amid the partisan wrangling over the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "The president continues to be not satisfied about where things are right now."

A CBS News poll reported that 58 percent of Americans disapproved of Bush's handling of the crisis and that only 32 percent expressed a lot of confidence in his ability to handle a crisis, compared with 66 percent approval in the weeks after the September 11, 2001, attacks.

About 300 protesters organized by the liberal group MoveOn.org, marched outside the White House carrying signs saying "Help Hurricane Victims" and chanting "Shame on Bush."

(Additional reporting by Steve Holland, Patricia Wilson)

Democratic Leaders Reject G.O.P. Storm Inquiry Plan (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Congressional Democratic leaders said Thursday that they would not appoint members to a new House-Senate committee to investigate failures in the government response to Hurricane Katrina, calling instead for an independent inquiry.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, and Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, her counterpart in the Senate, said they would not cooperate because the committee would be controlled by Republicans, would have uncertain authority and was created without consultation with Democrats.

"Despite all the talk of bipartisanship," Ms. Pelosi said, "they have just on their own, unilaterally, put forth a proposal that will result in a whitewash of what is going on here." She added, "If we are ever going to truly protect the American people, now it is clear to me that we must have an outside independent commission, as we finally arrived at on 9/11."

Mr. Reid said he would not place any Senate Democrats on the panel "as it is currently described," adding: "The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome."

Republicans said they would still move forward with the panel initiated Wednesday by the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, and Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, and would try to persuade Democrats to drop their objections.

"We hope that in the end, the Democrats will come on board," said Ron Bonjean, the spokesman for Mr. Hastert.

The Republican leaders said they saw the joint House-Senate committee as the preferable way to conduct the inquiry because it would prevent aid officials from having to appear before multiple committees. They said the panel would be structured like other House and Senate panels, with the majority Republicans having a slightly greater number of members than minority Democrats.

But Democrats suggested the panel should be evenly divided to avoid the possibility of Republicans protecting the Bush administration from close scrutiny. They and some Republicans said that in the absence of an outside panel, existing Congressional committees are able to conduct the investigation. In the Senate, the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs

DOJ_NMG_0004105

Committee has already begun its own investigation and met privately on Thursday with administration officials in advance of a hearing next week.

One senior senator, John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he was awaiting more details on the organization of the joint panel but said that the public deserved a thorough accounting of the storm response.

"I think the American public deserves a very clear and forthcoming revelation of all of the facts because in the end, they are going to make the final judgment," he told reporters.

Democrats Spurn Republican-backed Katrina Probe (REU)

By Donna Smith

Reuters, September 8, 2005

Democratic leaders pushing for an independent commission to investigate the government's response to Hurricane Katrina spurned on Thursday a plan by majority Republicans for a joint congressional inquiry.

House of Representatives Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, called the House-Senate investigation announced by Republican leaders on Wednesday a "sham" and said it would not produce an objective assessment of what went wrong in the hours and days following the storm.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada also said he would not participate in the Republican-led inquiry.

The government's initial response to the catastrophic storm that left hundreds of thousands homeless and thousands feared dead along the U.S. Gulf Coast has come under intense bipartisan criticism.

While President George W. Bush declared Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama disaster areas days before Hurricane Katrina hit on August 29 "to avert the threat of a catastrophe," residents of the region complained there was no federal help until days after the storm.

Pelosi said on CNN on Thursday that in meetings with Bush this week to discuss the response to Katrina the president asked her "'What didn't go right last week?'"

House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, both Republicans, announced what they said would be a bipartisan investigation at an event on Wednesday to which no Democrats were invited. With their plan, aides said Republicans would have the majority of members.

"The partisan proposal that Republican leaders outlined yesterday is completely unacceptable," Pelosi said. "House Democrats will not participate in a sham that is just the latest example of congressional Republicans being the foxes guarding the president's hen house."

Both Pelosi and Reid have called for an independent commission similar to the one that investigated intelligence failures before the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Reid also declined to name Democrats to the panel saying its current structure would not yield the truth.

"The only way to ensure that all levels of our government are held accountable to the people is to take this process out of the hands of politicians with a vested interest in the outcome," he said.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said Republicans would move ahead with the inquiry and hoped "that in the end the Democrats will come around and join us for the good of the country."

SENATE PANEL FORGING AHEAD

While the joint congressional inquiry appears to be getting off to a rocky start, a Senate panel began its investigation into the government response effort.

Sen. Susan Collins (news, bio, voting record), a Maine Republican who heads the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said she is committed to pushing the inquiry forward on a bipartisan basis. She and Sen. Joseph Lieberman (news, bio, voting record) of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the panel, spoke to reporters following a closed-door committee session with officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Coast Guard.

She said her committee will continue its investigation until the joint congressional panel gets running and takes over. She will lead the Senate side of the joint inquiry.

"We're still committed to a bipartisan inquiry," Collins said. "I think that's important for the credibility of the investigation and for it to have the confidence of the American people." (additional reporting by Vicki Allen)

Katrina Aid Package Could Push Deficit To New High (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — First came the storm, then the flood, then the exodus. Now come the benefits, followed by the bills.

DOJ_NMG_0004106

Hurricane Katrina has set the federal government on a spending spree. The total of $62 billion approved by Congress is already more than any amount spent on any previous domestic natural disaster. And it will be spent within weeks.

As the months pass, the government will face pressure to pay for health and education services usually rendered by states, cities and school districts. That will apply not just in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, but in states housing and caring for Katrina's evacuees.

That's likely to push the deficit for fiscal year 2006, which begins Oct. 1, beyond last year's record $412 billion. Before Katrina, the 2006 deficit was projected to be $314 billion.

Bill Hoagland, the top budget aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, agreed that the deficit is likely to top $400 billion.

"I don't think it's out of line," he said.

Leon Panetta, White House chief of staff and budget director under President Clinton, said it could hit $500 billion.

"At some point, all of that borrowing comes back to haunt you," he said.

White House budget director Joshua Bolten acknowledged the rising red ink.

"We will have a larger deficit in 2006 than we would otherwise have anticipated," he said. But because Katrina costs are temporary, the deficit should decline quickly in future years, he said.

President Bush signed the $51.8 billion bill on Thursday after quick approval was given in Congress. Bush said the federal government would compensate states caring for Katrina victims. "You should not be penalized for showing compassion," he said.

Today, the nation's school administrators will ask for $12.3 billion to rebuild about 500 schools and educate 250,000 students displaced by Katrina for a year.

Other federal costs will include paying off flood insurance policies, helping industries hit hard by the hurricane and dealing with environmental cleanup and wetlands restoration.

"This is on a magnitude we've never done before," said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis.

Cost Of Recovery Surges, As Do Bids To Join In Effort (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - With Congress primed to spend billions of dollars on the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, lawmakers and industry groups are lining up to bring home their share of the cascade of money for rebuilding and relief.

White House officials and Congressional budget experts now assume that federal costs for the hurricane will shoot past $100 billion, which itself is more than twice the entire annual federal budget for domestic security. Congress on Thursday approved $51.8 billion in spending, bringing the total so far to more than $62 billion.

The demand for money comes from many directions. Louisiana lawmakers plan to push for billions of dollars to upgrade the levees around New Orleans, rebuild highways, lure back business and shore up the city's sinking foundation. The devastated areas of Mississippi and Alabama will need similar infusions of cash.

Communities will want compensation for taking in evacuees. And there will be future costs of health care, debris removal, temporary housing, clothing, vehicle replacement. Farmers from the Midwest, meanwhile, are beginning to press for emergency relief as a result of their difficulties in shipping grain through the Port of New Orleans.

Other ideas circulating through Congress that could entail significant costs include these notions:

¶Turning New Orleans and other cities affected by the storm into big new tax-free zones.

¶Providing reconstruction money for tens of thousands of homeowners and small businesses that did not have federal flood insurance on their houses or buildings.

¶Making most hurricane victims eligible for health care under Medicaid and having the federal government pay the full cost rather than the current practice of splitting costs with states.

The torrent of money - more than $2 billion a day over the weekend, and expected to remain above $500 million a day for the foreseeable future - prompted several lawmakers to warn about the perils of an open checkbook.

"We are reaching a perfect political storm," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama. "We have all the earmarks of a rush to spend money that is very dangerous."

Mr. Sessions called on President Bush to appoint a person with significant business experience to oversee the spending. Contained within the spending measure approved Thursday is a provision that directs an extra $15 million to the inspector general's office in the Department of Homeland Security. The agency is also ordered to provide at least weekly reports to Congress on the use of the money.

Those safeguards, along with a decision by the administration to waive the federal law requiring that prevailing wages be paid on construction projects underwritten by federal dollars, were critical to persuading Congressional conservatives to vote for the money. It passed the House on 410-to-11 vote, with the only opposition coming from Republicans. The Senate vote was 97 to 0.

DOJ_NMG_0004107

But fiscal conservatives who supported the legislation on Thursday threatened to oppose future installments of money unless Congress and the administration begin to find ways to offset the spending so it is not just piled on top of the federal deficit.

"Congress must ensure that a catastrophe of nature does not become a catastrophe of debt for our children and grandchildren," said Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana and a conservative leader in the House.

"There is no sacrifice on the part of Congress," said Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, who said the decision to not cut spending elsewhere was a failure of leadership.

The emergency spending plan also drew scrutiny from some lawmakers who contended that it raised the risk of fraud by increasing the spending limit on about 250,000 credit cards issued to government workers from $15,000 to $250,000. "The use of government credit cards has a track record, and it is not a good one," Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California, wrote in a letter urging Congressional leaders to delete the provision.

But Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader and typically an opponent of increased spending for social programs, argued that Congress had no choice but to provide the financial assistance as quickly as possible.

"I know the American people, some of them are worrying about all this money," Mr. DeLay said. "Ladies and gentlemen, five million people, five million Americans, deserve us finding a way to make them whole."

House Democrats complained that they were prevented Thursday from offering a proposal to sever the Federal Emergency Management Agency from the Department of Homeland Security and making other changes before turning over so much to the agency, which has come under withering fire for its storm response. Republicans said they did not want to impede the aid by getting caught up in a legislative fight, and they said Democrats would have opportunities later to offer the FEMA changes.

Administration officials said the government spent about $2 billion a day last weekend, and the additional $51.8 billion would merely cover costs for "the next few weeks."

Joshua B. Bolten, the White House budget director, said the spending rate last weekend stemmed in part from signing big contracts for debris removal and temporary housing. The government has already bought 100,000 trailers for temporary housing and is trying to buy 200,000 more.

Of the new money, $23.2 billion is designated for temporary housing and other financial assistance to individuals. Another $11 billion is broadly aimed at "mission assignments" by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which will hire other agencies and companies for jobs like debris removal.

FEMA will receive about $4.65 billion to pay for logistical needs, supplies and search-and-rescue operations. The Army Corps of Engineers will get $3 billion, essentially to pay for repairing the broken levees in New Orleans.

But the relief money is not expected to cover any of the real reconstruction costs that lie ahead: repair of highways, bridges and other infrastructure and new projects that seek to prevent a repeat of the New Orleans disaster. Nor will it even help pay for expanded availability of food stamps and poverty programs to cover hurricane victims.

"I'm fearful that this will open the floodgates for money," said Chris Edwards, a budget analyst at the Cato Institute, a research group that supports reduced government spending. "If they spend $1 billion a day for relief, that's fine. But down the road, state and local governments traditionally issue bonds for infrastructure when they need to build."

Shortly before the House voted to approve Mr. Bush's request for $51.8 billion, it approved a separate bill to let hurricane victims get more access to the federal welfare assistance for low-income families.

Democratic lawmakers proposed a raft of their own proposals. Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, called for giving hurricane victims immediate access to Medicaid, the federal health program for low-income people, and letting victims collect unemployment payments for as long as one year.

Lobbyists Seek Leverage From Storm (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Bolstered by the shift in political winds from Hurricane Katrina, U.S. corporations are pressing lawmakers to approve a range of issues that have languished on Capitol Hill, some of which have little to do with hurricane relief.

Major U.S. airlines are asking Congress to suspend federal jet-fuel taxes. Oil and gas companies want drilling rights in new parts of the Gulf Coast. Insurance companies want the ability to use tax-free funds to create a multibillion-dollar industry fund to cover future claims from natural disasters. Shipbuilders such as Northrop Grumman Corp. want billions of dollars to help rebuild shipyards in Mississippi. Even small chicken farmers are asking Congress for low-interest loans to fix or replace hundreds of damaged or destroyed chicken coops in Mississippi.

DOJ_NMG_0004108

"Overall, we are going to be a lot more open to things now that would help keep our traditional industries chugging along," says Rep. Jack Kingston, a Republican from Georgia.

Delta Air Lines stands to be the first big winner of the Republicans' goodwill. Lawmakers in the House and Senate say they expect to approve legislation by mid-October to give the Atlanta-based carrier more time to make payments to its employee pension plan. Delta officials have told Congress they would be forced to file for bankruptcy protection if Congress doesn't lend them a hand by the time the new bankruptcy law takes effect next month. Atlanta-based Delta is the incumbent carrier in the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast.

Yesterday, senators working on a pension-overhaul bill agreed to language requested by Delta's lobbyists that would give the airline 14 years to catch up on payments to its employees' retirement plans. Currently, the Delta plans are underfunded by $5.3 billion. Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, also added a Delta-backed provision that would allow the airline to increase benefits promised to workers if the airline could offset the new costs with matching contributions to the plans.

Until Katrina battered the Gulf Coast, House Republicans were adamantly opposed to helping the airlines. But now their resistance is softening. "I'm clearly sensitive to the problem of the legacy carriers," says Rep. John Boehner, the author of the pension-overhaul legislation in the House. "We ought to do what is reasonable to keep them from dumping their pensions" on the federal government, he says.

Delta and other large airlines are also pushing Congress and the Bush administration to suspend the 4.3-cents-a-gallon tax on jet fuel, a long-sought goal. Earlier this week, Sen. Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican who chairs the Commerce Committee, asked the airline industry what Congress could do to alleviate some of the hurricane's impact, according to airline lobbyists. The industry's trade association, the Air Transport Association, told Mr. Stevens that Congress should suspend the fuel tax for one year.

Mr. Stevens has scheduled a hearing on the matter next week. Despite his interest in providing assistance, the airlines continue to face resistance in both the House and Senate. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas oppose suspending fuel taxes, because the funds are used to build highways, bridges and runways. Rep. John Mica, the Florida Republican who is chairman of the House's aviation subcommittee, says the airlines "can raise their fares to adjust for fuel costs."

A price increase is one possibility. Airlines have considered imposing a "fuel surcharge" that would be tacked on to every ticket, and some would even prefer if Congress mandated it to ensure that all carriers would boost their prices. Either way, carriers have asked the Department of Transportation to let them list any surcharge separately from the regular fare, so that it wouldn't be included in the base fare that customers are initially quoted. Rather, the surcharge would appear at the end of a purchase, along with other taxes and fees. The industry would also like Congress to exempt any fuel surcharge from the existing 7.5% passenger ticket tax.

Beyond the airlines, the energy industry is pushing to permit oil and gas drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, reduce regulatory barriers to building new oil refineries and increase federal subsidies to help low-income Americans heat their homes in the winter.

Gas companies are pressing Congress to revive legislation that would expand oil drilling in eastern portions of the Gulf of Mexico. "It's all stuff that we were talking about before Katrina, but Katrina exposed our vulnerabilities," says Darrell Henry, a lobbyist with the American Gas Association.

On a smaller scale, poultry and seafood producers along the Gulf Coast are also preparing to ask Washington for help. Laurel, Miss.-based Sanderson Farms Inc. reported that the storm killed about five million birds and destroyed nearly 10% of its coops. "Federal assistance in dealing with this type of loss would be very appropriate," said Richard Lobb, a spokesman for the industry's National Chicken Council. Mr. Lobb said chicken farmers are asking the federal government to provide low-interest loans to help rebuild hundreds of 400-foot-long "grow-out houses," which run about $150,000 apiece.

Louisiana's oyster farmers were so hard hit that they still haven't determined what type of help they will seek. Louisiana produces more than 40% of the oysters eaten in the U.S. each year. The National Fisheries Institute, an industry trade group, estimates that two-thirds of Louisiana's oyster industry has been wiped out.

"The boats, docks, processing plants and ice housing are likely decimated," said Stacey Felzenberg, a spokeswoman for the association. "The people who have been impacted really will need some significant aid to get back on their feet."

Louisiana Lawmakers Aim To Cope With Political Fallout (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

LOUISIANA LAWMAKERS aim to cope with political fallout.

Sen. Landrieu, in spotlight now, could find margins squeezed if thousands of Democratic-leaning African-Americans don't return by her 2008 re-election. Louisiana political analyst John Maginnis says state could even lose one of seven House seats in next redistricting.

Two shaky House incumbents, Democrat Melancon and Republican Boustany, hope response to hurricane rallies voters behind them. House Republican campaign chief Reynolds touts chance to market conservative social-policy solutions; Rep. Baker of Baton Rouge is overheard telling lobbyists: "We finally cleaned up public housing in New Orleans. We couldn't do it, but God did."

Baker explains later he didn't intend flippancy but has long wanted to improve low-income housing.

KATRINA ROILS trade debate over shrimp tariffs.

The U.S. International Trade Commission next week considers whether shrimpers from India and Thailand, saddled with tariffs after complaints of unfair competition from domestic producers, still pose a threat. Last winter's tsunami has fueled calls for lifting the levies.

But now the hurricane has given the U.S. industry a new argument for retaining tariff protection: An estimated 40% of domestic shrimpers and processors suffered some Katrina damage. "It's going to take awhile for that to recover," says Sal Versaggi of the eight-state Southern Shrimp Alliance.

SPOTLIGHT ON POOR increases opposition to planned Medicaid cuts.

A bipartisan group of senators urges Finance Chairman Grassley to delay slicing $10 billion from Medicaid and other entitlement programs serving many of those displaced by Katrina. "We must remain focused on the relief efforts and ways to deliver both short- and long-term aid," write Republicans Smith and Snowe, joined by Democrats Bingaman and Lincoln.

Administration officials mull ways to deliver more Medicaid funds to states such as Texas where rolls will swell; House Democrats urge HHS Secretary Leavitt to assume all costs of the state-federal program in affected areas. But conservatives like Rep. Barton of Texas warn Katrina shouldn't become an excuse to block Medicaid overhaul.

"Let me repeat, so that everybody hears me -- evacuees from Hurricane Katrina would not be hurt!" he says.

OPPORTUNITY KNOCKS: Ten U.S. Army recruiters are offering volunteer help for Katrina evacuees at Houston's Astrodome. But the recruiters, struggling to keep enlistment up during Iraq war, are also available with options for the jobless. "Our intent is to approach the evacuees at the right time for them," says Army spokesman Douglas Smith.

PR BONANZA? U.S. adversaries draw wide attention by joining international effort to offer help with Katrina relief. The Bush administration rebuffs Iran's conditional offer of 20 million barrels of oil while remaining mum on Cuba's pitch to send 1,500 doctors and nurses. Venezuela's Chávez, deriding Bush as "king of vacations," mixes offers of aid workers with oil shipments.

DUELING CAUSES? Grass-roots charities sending items to troops in Iraq worry they'll lose out to Katrina relief. "It will be even harder to ask and receive donations when there are so many needing help," says Connie Riecke of the Oregon-based Marine Corps Family Foundation.

FAMILY TIES: Bush's Katrina performance draws fire, but Texas universities eagerly compete for his presidential library in bid process ending next week. Contenders include University of Texas, which has the LBJ library; Southern Methodist, Laura Bush's alma mater; and Baylor, near the Crawford ranch. Library executives say bidders must accommodate "an institute inspired by the principles of George W. Bush's administration," a museum, a cafe and gift shop.

NEW FEMINISM: Conservatives tout female court pick to block Gonzales.

Right rallies around antiabortion appeals-court judges, including Edith Jones and Priscilla Owen; Janice Rogers Brown, an African-American, would meet post-Katrina calls for Bush to appoint a minority. All are seen as more conservative than Attorney General Gonzales, who'd be the first Hispanic pick.

Some close to White House predict Bush won't announce O'Connor's successor until Roberts clears Senate Judiciary Committee. Meanwhile, liberals battle for seats in next week's Judiciary hearings, but find themselves outnumbered by Roberts backers.

The hearing will "look like a Republican town hall meeting," one activist grumbles.

MINOR MEMOS: Trial lawyers' association calls on Republican Rep. Pryce to "stop scaring volunteers" after she says some would-be aid workers feared lawsuits. ... Tom Gallagher of ISI Group says posthurricane congressional spending makes it "Katrina Bar the Door" on fiscal policy.

Bankrupting The Victims (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

Government aid is finally flowing to the most helpless victims of Hurricane Katrina, but a broader category of the dispossessed will test the government over a longer period of time. They are families with the means to flee the hurricane, perhaps even with insurance to cover some losses, but without the resources to make a living immediately. In other contexts, they would be referred to simply as the middle class.

They have lost their homes but are living off their credit cards and maybe a little savings. As those savings dwindle, however, the mortgage keeps coming due and their credit card nears its limit. Soon the paycheck may stop, and with it their health insurance.

How many of these victims exist is anyone's guess; the Congressional Budget Office predicted that the hurricane will cost 400,000 jobs nationally, and some private estimates are double that. Congress will no doubt take some steps to help victims rebuild their lives, but it also should take this opportunity to revisit the new bankruptcy law, which goes into effect Oct. 17. As the Times' Peter Gosselin reported Wednesday, the new bankruptcy law treats those affected by a natural disaster the same as the deadbeat who spent it all on luxury cars, jewelry and cocaine.

As of Oct. 17, individuals filing for bankruptcy who have income at or above their state's family median (in Louisiana, it is $51,402 for a family of four) will largely be forced to repay some or all of their debts for up to five years. Normally, such debtors would have the option of declaring Chapter 7 bankruptcy, which allows people to emerge from debt relatively quickly.

What's more, the new law calculates income by taking a six-month average, so even if someone is jobless, his income statement may not reflect it. And small businesses face a tighter 10-month deadline for coming to agreement with creditors on a repayment plan, even if snack shops and shoe stores drowned by Katrina may take years to recover. And strict deadlines and demands for stacks of documentation remain, even if the documents dissolved in a toxic stew or floated into the Gulf of Mexico.

Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) are leading efforts to delay the bankruptcy law's application to Katrina victims and grant broader exceptions to survivors of all severe disasters.

Before Katrina, supporters of the new law argued it would curb abuse of the bankruptcy code. This argument was always dubious, and in the aftermath of the hurricane, the new law appears simply callous. Does Congress really want to use Katrina's victims as test cases in some sort of grand experiment in bankruptcy reform?

The irony is that Congress has already decided that the more obviously desperate deserve relief. Federal and state officials have sensibly slashed red tape to provide immediate food stamps and Medicaid to evacuees — the poor and not-yet-poor alike. The federal government is providing debit cards to evacuees in the Astrodome.

The federal government failed its most vulnerable citizens in the days after Katrina. Unless Conyers and Feingold prevail, it may do the same, albeit more slowly, to those one rung higher on the economic ladder, as middle- and working-class families lose their foothold on self-sufficiency.

Opinionline: Katrina Exposes America's Fragility (USAT)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

What people around the world are saying about Katrina:

Mehdi Mohammadi,

in a column in Keyhan (Tehran, Iran): "Reports come from New Orleans that show that the pitiful situation of the people in affected areas cannot be entirely attributed to Katrina. A greater tragedy that has astonished the world's people is the widespread chaos, insecurity and plundering that have been caused by thieves, criminals and murderers. ... What kind of human beings are these people who have ambushed and plundered the helpless men and women? ... Americans have created a nationwide scandal. The American government that has been engaged in the overseas mission of spreading welfare and freedom among nations of the world, with its huge resources and facilities, has completely failed to control a crisis that is not so great compared to similar events."

People's Daily

(Beijing), in an editorial: "America seems (to be) fighting a city war at home — New Orleans has become Baghdad. ... People have reason to feel disgusted: when Indonesia was hit by a tsunami last year, everybody lent a helping hand and nobody looted. But now this happened in the United States, showing people another side of this 'civilized country.' In fact, it revealed a fragility of the American society, as well as despair and disorder. ... Katrina swept away not only people's homes, but their dignity."

Al-Sharq

(Qatar), in an editorial: "The global humanitarian reaction to the victims of Katrina will pave the way for a new dialogue between the world's civilizations and religions in the interest of international security and peace."

The Korea Herald

(Seoul), in an editorial: "The U.S. media are heard wondering why the outside world is still slow to come to the aid of the country while it had always been the most generous to help other nations in natural and other calamities. Some commentators even tried to attribute it to U.S. unilateralism shown in the war on terror and the Iraqi war in particular. But world nations will certainly repay the Americans what they owed to them. If their response is not very expeditious, it must be due to the still ineffective worldwide emergency aid logistics system. The United Nations should have quickly played the leading role as the United States, the usual main provider, is now in need."

DOJ_NMG_0004111

National Post

(Ontario, Canada), in an editorial: "The sense that government would be there to make everything all right — to provide food, shelter, water, medicine — is not surprising given that for so many New Orleanians, a general reliance on social assistance is a normal part of daily life. With a median household income of $31,369 and some of the country's oldest and most notorious public housing projects, New Orleans is a city that is fully enmeshed in the vicious welfare cycle that leaves the poor incapable of taking care of themselves. If there was a problem, many of the residents had been conditioned to think, then surely the same people who came through every month with money for food, prescription drugs, housing and child care would be there to take care of it."

Paul Kelly,

editor at large, in a column in The Australian (Sydney): "The U.S. has betrayed its own values and its historic role as an exemplar to the world. ... It is an American tragedy and an American failure. ... The New Orleans disaster documents the failure of contemporary U.S. leadership. It goes to competent government, adequate planning, efficient agency coordination and an effective chief executive. It betrays what many suspect about the Bush administration: that it suffers from a systemic inability to organize effective public policy responses, either in the U.S. or in Iraq."

The Straits Times

(Singapore), in an editorial: "Coping with natural disasters requires systems and the machinery to execute set procedures. But crisis situations demand leadership, above all else. The Japanese government froze for days after the Kobe earthquake of 1995. When organized help finally came, Japan — and now the U.S. — performed up to expectations. But reputations are usually made or ruined in the first critical days."

How Reliable Is Brown's Resume? (TIME)

By Daren Fonda And Rita Healy

Time, September 8, 2005

When President Bush nominated Michael Brown to head the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) in 2003, Brown's boss at the time, Joe Allbaugh, declared, "the President couldn't have chosen a better man to help...prepare and protect the nation." But how well was he prepared for the job? Since Hurricane Katrina, the FEMA director has come under heavy criticism for his performance and scrutiny of his background. Now, an investigation by TIME has found discrepancies in his online legal profile and official bio, including a description of Brown released by the White House at the time of his nomination in 2001 to the job as deputy chief of FEMA. (Brown became Director of FEMA, succeeding Allbaugh, in 2003.)

Before joining FEMA, his only previous stint in emergency management, according to his bio posted on FEMA's website, was "serving as an assistant city manager with emergency services oversight." The White House press release from 2001 stated that Brown worked for the city of Edmond, Okla., from 1975 to 1978 "overseeing the emergency services division." In fact, according to Claudia Deakins, head of public relations for the city of Edmond, Brown was an "assistant to the city manager" from 1977 to 1980, not a manager himself, and had no authority over other employees. "The assistant is more like an intern," she told TIME. "Department heads did not report to him." Brown did do a good job at his humble position, however, according to his boss. "Yes. Mike Brown worked for me. He was my administrative assistant. He was a student at Central State University," recalls former city manager Bill Dashner. "Mike used to handle a lot of details. Every now and again I'd ask him to write me a speech. He was very loyal. He was always on time. He always had on a suit and a starched white shirt."

In response, Nicol Andrews, deputy strategic director in FEMA's office of public affairs, insists that while Brown began as an intern, he became an "assistant city manager" with a distinguished record of service. "According to Mike Brown," she says, "a large portion [of the points raised by TIME] is very inaccurate."

Brown's lack of experience in emergency management isn't the only apparent bit of padding on his resume, which raises questions about how rigorously the White House vetted him before putting him in charge of FEMA. Under the "honors and awards" section of his profile at FindLaw.com — which is information on the legal website provided by lawyers or their offices— he lists "Outstanding Political Science Professor, Central State University". However, Brown "wasn't a professor here, he was only a student here," says Charles Johnson, News Bureau Director in the University Relations office at the University of Central Oklahoma (formerly named Central State University). "He may have been an adjunct instructor," says Johnson, but that title is very different from that of "professor." Carl Reherman, a former political science professor at the University through the '70s and '80s, says that Brown "was not on the faculty." As for the honor of "Outstanding Political Science Professor," Johnson says, "I spoke with the department chair yesterday and he's not aware of it." Johnson could not confirm that Brown made the Dean's list or was an "Outstanding Political Science Senior," as is stated on his online profile.

DOJ_NMG_0004112

Speaking for Brown, Andrews says that Brown has never claimed to be a political science professor, in spite of what his profile in FindLaw indicates. "He was named the outstanding political science senior at Central State, and was an adjunct professor at Oklahoma City School of Law."

Under the heading of "Professional Associations and Memberships" on FindLaw, Brown states that from 1983 to the present he has been director of the Oklahoma Christian Home, a nursing home in Edmond. But an administrator with the Home, told TIME that Brown is "not a person that anyone here is familiar with." She says there was a board of directors until a couple of years ago, but she couldn't find anyone who recalled him being on it. According to FEMA's Andrews, Brown said "he's never claimed to be the director of the home. He was on the board of directors, or governors of the nursing home." However, a veteran employee at the center since 1981 says Brown "was never director here, was never on the board of directors, was never executive director. He was never here in any capacity. I never heard his name mentioned here."

The FindLaw profile for Brown was amended on Thursday to remove a reference to his tenure at the International Arabian Horse Association, which has become a contested point.

Brown's FindLaw profile lists a wide range of areas of legal practice, from estate planning to family law to sports. However, one former colleague does not remember Brown's work as sterling. Stephen Jones, a prominent Oklahoma lawyer who was lead defense attorney on the Timothy McVeigh case, was Brown's boss for two-and-a-half years in the early '80s. "He did mainly transactional work, not litigation," says Jones. "There was a feeling that he was not serious and somewhat shallow." Jones says when his law firm split, Brown was one of two staffers who was let go.

Democrats' Anti-Bush Petition Also Seeks Political Contributions (NYNSDY/AP)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

New York Newsday, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A new Democratic effort to whip up indignation about the Bush administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina also tried to raise money for Democratic candidates.

Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat and the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, issued an appeal Thursday urging people to sign an online petition to fire the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency over his handling of the Katrina response.

After an inquiry from the Associated Press, the DSCC quickly pulled down the page and said they would donate to charity any money raised by the anti-FEMA petition.

When recipients clicked on a link to the petition, the top center of the screen _ above the call to "Fire the FEMA director" _ had asked for a donation to the DSCC.

Other DSCC Web pages have the same appeal for contributions, but several do not.

Since Katrina, Democrats have charged Republicans badly botched the response, and some have called for the firing of FEMA chief Michael Brown.

In recent days, Republicans hit back by accusing Democrats of trying to use the human tragedy for political gain. The letter, the GOP said Thursday, was proof.

"It's a disgrace to exploit Hurricane Katrina to raise political funds," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

"They should halt this activity because it's way over the line," he said.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said: "While the content of the letter is totally valid, it should have never been linked to a Web site that asks people to contribute to political campaigns. We regret it, have removed the letter from our site and will donate any contributions raised as a result of this petition to the Red Cross."

The letter is the latest sign that more than a week after Hurricane Katrina struck, the political fight over what went wrong in the response continues to grow.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has called for an independent commission to probe government failures before and after Katrina, while House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi called Bush "oblivious, in denial, dangerous" in his approach to relief efforts.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, head of the House Republicans' fund-raising efforts, described Democratic criticism as "reprehensible," saying "this is a tragedy, not an opportunity."

The administration and Republican leaders in Congress are scrambling to launch a number of initiatives to help hurricane refugees and victims, including a new $51 billion aid package.

DOJ_NMG_0004113

During the 2004 presidential campaign, some Democrats attacked President Bush for using an image of Sept. 11 devastation in a re-election campaign ad, accusing him of exploiting the tragedy. At the time, Schumer did not join in the criticism.

Advance Men In Charge (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

The Federal Emergency Management Agency announced this week that it didn't want the news media taking photographs of the dead in New Orleans. A FEMA spokeswoman talked unconvincingly about the dignity of the dead. But the bizarre demand, a creepy echo of the ban on news media coverage of the coffins returning from Iraq, is simply the latest spasm of a gutted federal agency.

It's not really all that surprising that the officials who run FEMA are stressing that all-important emergency response function: the public relations campaign. As it turns out, that's all they really have experience at doing.

Michael Brown was made the director after he was asked to resign from the International Arabian Horse Association, and the other top officials at FEMA don't exactly have impressive résumés in emergency management either. The Chicago Tribune reported on Wednesday that neither the acting deputy director, Patrick Rhode, nor the acting deputy chief of staff, Brooks Altshuler, came to FEMA with any previous experience in disaster management. Ditto for Scott Morris, the third in command until May.

Mr. Altshuler and Mr. Rhode had worked in the White House's Office of National Advance Operations. Those are the people who decide where the president will stand on stage and which loyal supporters will be permitted into the audience - and how many firefighters will be diverted from rescue duty to surround the president as he patrols the New Orleans airport trying to look busy. Mr. Morris was a press handler with the Bush presidential campaign. Previously, he worked for the company that produced Bush campaign commercials.

So when Mr. Brown finally got around to asking Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for extra people for Katrina, it wasn't much of a departure for Mr. Brown to say that one of the things he wanted them to do was to "convey a positive image of disaster operations to government officials, community organizations and the general public." We'd like them to stay focused on conveying food, water and medical help to victims.

Political patronage has always been a hallmark of Washington life. But President Bill Clinton appointed political pals at FEMA who actually knew something about disaster management. The former FEMA director James Lee Witt, whose tenure is widely considered a major success, was a friend of Mr. Clinton's when he took office in 1993, but he had run the Arkansas Office of Emergency Services. His top staff came from regional FEMA offices.

Surely there are loyal Republicans among the 50 directors of state emergency services. But President Bush chose to make FEMA a dumping ground for unqualified cronies - a sure sign that he wanted to hasten the degradation of an agency that conservative Republicans have long considered an evil of big government. Katrina has proved that federal disaster help is vital, and that Mr. Brown and his team of advance men can't do the job. What America needs are federal disaster relief people who actually know something about disaster relief.

Leaders Lacking Disaster Experience (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Five of eight top Federal Emergency Management Agency officials came to their posts with virtually no experience in handling disasters and now lead an agency whose ranks of seasoned crisis managers have thinned dramatically since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

FEMA's top three leaders -- Director Michael D. Brown, Chief of Staff Patrick J. Rhode and Deputy Chief of Staff Brooks D. Altshuler -- arrived with ties to President Bush's 2000 campaign or to the White House advance operation, according to the agency. Two other senior operational jobs are filled by a former Republican lieutenant governor of Nebraska anda U.S. Chamber of Commerce official who was once a political operative.

Meanwhile, veterans such as U.S. hurricane specialist Eric Tolbert and World Trade Center disaster managers Laurence W. Zensinger and Bruce P. Baughman -- who led FEMA's offices of response, recovery and preparedness, respectively -- have left since 2003, taking jobs as consultants or state emergency managers, according to current and former officials.

Because of the turnover, three of the five FEMA chiefs for natural-disaster-related operations and nine of 10 regional directors are working in an acting capacity, agency officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0004114

Patronage appointments to the crisis-response agency are nothing new to Washington administrations. But inexperience in FEMA's top ranks is emerging as a key concern of local, state and federal leaders as investigators begin to sift through what the government has admitted was a bungled response to Hurricane Katrina.

"FEMA requires strong leadership and experience because state and local governments rely on them," said Trina Sheets, executive director of the National Emergency Management Association. "When you don't have trained, qualified people in those positions, the program suffers as a whole."

Last week's greatest foe was, of course, a storm of such magnitude that it "overwhelmed" all levels of government, according to Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). And several top FEMA officials are well-regarded by state and private counterparts in disaster preparedness and response.

They include Edward G. Buikema, acting director of response since February, and Kenneth O. Burris, acting chief of operations, a career firefighter and former Marietta, Ga., fire chief.

But scorching criticism has been aimed at FEMA, and it starts at the top with Brown, who has admitted to errors in responding to Hurricane Katrina and the flooding in New Orleans. The Oklahoma native, 50, was hired to the agency after a rocky tenure as commissioner of a horse sporting group by former FEMA director Joe M. Allbaugh, the 2000 Bush campaign manager and a college friend of Brown's.

Rhode, Brown's chief of staff, is a former television reporter who came to Washington as advance deputy director for Bush's Austin-based 2000 campaign and then the White House. He joined FEMA in April 2003 after stints at the Commerce Department and the U.S. Small Business Administration.

Altshuler is a former presidential advance man. His predecessor, Scott Morris, was a media strategist for Bush with the Austin firm Maverick Media.

David I. Maurstad, who stepped down as Nebraska lieutenant governor in 2001 to join FEMA, has served asacting director for risk reduction and federal insurance administrator since June 2004. Daniel A. Craig, a onetime political fundraiser and campaign adviser, came to FEMA in 2001 from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, where he directed the eastern regional office, after working as a lobbyist for the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said Brown has managed more than 160 natural disasters as FEMA general counsel and deputy director since 2001, "hands-on experience [that] cannot be understated. Other leadership at FEMA brings particular skill sets -- policy management leadership, for example."

The agency has a deep bench of career professionals, said FEMA spokeswoman Nicol Andrews, including two dozen senior field coordinators and Gil Jamieson, director of the National Incident Management System. "Simply because folks who have left the agency have a disagreement with how it's being run doesn't necessarily indicate that there is a lack of experience leading it," she said.

Andrews said the "acting" designation for regional officials is a designation that signifies that they are FEMA civil servants -- not political appointees.

Touring the wrecked Gulf Coast with Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff yesterday, Vice President Cheney also defended FEMA leaders, saying, "We're always trying to strike the right balance" between political appointees and "career professionals that fill the jobs underneath them."

But experts inside and out of government said a "brain drain" of experienced disaster hands throughout the agency, hastened in part by the appointment of leaders without backgrounds in emergency management, has weakened the agency's ability to respond to natural disasters. Some security experts and congressional critics say the exodus was fueled by a bureaucratic reshuffling in Washington in 2003, when FEMA was stripped of its independent Cabinet-level status and folded into the Department of Homeland Security.

Emergency preparedness has atrophied as a result, some analysts said, extending from Washington to localities.

FEMA "has gone downhill within the department, drained of resources and leadership," said I.M. "Mac" Destler, a professor at the University of Maryland School of Public Policy. "The crippling of FEMA was one important reason why it failed."

Richard A. Andrews, former emergency services director for the state of California and a member of the president's Homeland Security Advisory Council, said state and local failures were critical in the Katrina response, but competence, funding and political will in Washington were also lacking.

"I do not think fundamentally this is an organizational issue," Andrews said. "You need people in there who have both experience and the confidence of the president, who are able to fight and articulate what FEMA's mission and role is, and who understand how emergency management works."

The agency's troubles are no secret. The Partnership for Public Service, a nonprofit group that promotes careers in federal government, ranked FEMA last of 28 agencies studied in 2003.

In its list of best places to work in the government, a 2004 survey by the American Federation of Government Employees found that of 84 career FEMA professionals who responded, only 10 people ranked agency leaders excellent or good.

An additional 28 said the leadership was fair and 33 called it poor.

More than 50 said they would move to another agency if they could remain at the same pay grade, and 67 ranked the agency as poorer since its merger into the Department of Homeland Security.

Critics Maintain Drumbeat Of FEMA Criticism (LAT)

By Ken Silverstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — In the days since Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans, Federal Emergency Management Agency director Michael Brown has come under withering attack, with critics charging that his lack of prior experience in dealing with natural disasters contributed to his agency's poor performance.

But Brown is just one of at least five current and former senior FEMA officials appointed under President Bush whose professional backgrounds showed few qualifications in the area of disaster relief when they arrived at the agency.

As the administration struggles to counter negative national perceptions about its response, Vice President Dick Cheney defended the administration's FEMA appointees in remarks to reporters on Thursday.

"You've got to have people at the top who respond to and are selected by presidents, and you pick the best people you can to do the jobs that need to be done," said Cheney while touring the stricken Gulf Coast. "We've also got some great career professionals, an absolute and vital part of the operation -- couldn't do it without them. They're the ones that continue the expertise from administration to administration, who have got the experience of having been through all of this before and provide the quality service that needs to be provided."

But Democrats in Congress have attacked Brown and other top FEMA appointees.

"FEMA is an important agency and needs to be run by professionals, not political cronies," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the ranking minority member of the Committee on Government Reform. "Instead of a loyalty test, we need people with experience and competence."

More than a year before the hurricane hit New Orleans, the head of a labor union representing FEMA workers sent a letter to members of Congress charging that "emergency managers at FEMA have been supplanted on the job by politically-connected contractors and by novice employees with little background or knowledge" of disaster management."

"As . . . professionalism diminishes, FEMA is gradually losing its ability to function and to help disaster victims," the letter said.

People appointed to run domestic government agencies frequently have political connections. But for many top positions some relevant background is required as well.

Paul Light, a professor of organizational studies at New York University who has testified before Congress on FEMA's role in the Department of Homeland Security, said that for many years, FEMA was a dumping ground for the politically connected.

But during the Clinton years, Light said, FEMA director James Lee Witt "built a serious hierarchy around expertise. Somewhere along the line, FEMA has returned to being a destination of last resort for political appointees."

Brown, a career attorney who was active in Republican Party politics, was hired to be FEMA's general counsel by Joseph Allbaugh, an old friend and the agency's first director under Bush.

Before coming to FEMA, Brown had worked for nearly a decade at the International Arabian Horse Association. His responsibilities included supervising horse-show judges.

Allbaugh -- a long-time aide to Bush who had managed his 2000 campaign -- resigned as FEMA director in 2003 and opened up a consulting firm that helped companies win contracts in Iraq. Brown, who had risen to become Allbaugh's top deputy, took charge.

Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., a strong critic of Brown's even before Katrina, wants him removed from his position.

"When you're dealing with responding to a natural disaster, it's hard to do your job when you have no experience or background," said Lale Mamaux, Wexler's spokeswoman. "You can't just show up and hope everything goes all right."

Brown is not the only official who came to the agency with scant disaster management background.

Brown's acting deputy director, Patrick James Rhode, began his professional career as an "anchor/reporter with network affiliated television stations in Alabama and Arkansas," according to his resume on FEMA's Website.

Rhode subsequently did public relations work for several state agencies in Texas before becoming deputy director of national advance operations for Bush's 2000 presidential campaign.

Before moving to FEMA in 2003, Rhode served as a special assistant to the president and White House liaison with the Commerce Department. He donated $2,000 to Bush's 2004 campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0004116

Daniel Craig, director of FEMA's Recovery Division since October of 2003, "is responsible for planning and executing the federal government's recovery efforts following major disasters," according to the FEMA website.

Before coming to FEMA he worked for the Eastern Regional Office of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, where he "was responsible for Chamber-related legislative, political, and media initiatives in New England and the Atlantic coast."

Craig's previous jobs included working as a lobbyist for the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, and before that "as a campaign adviser, and political fundraiser and research analyst."

Both Allbaugh and Brown were Oklahoma natives involved in that state's Republican politics. FEMA's acting deputy chief of staff, Brooks Altshuler, also hails from Oklahoma. And like Rhode, Altshuler was an advance man for President Bush.

FEMA did not return several calls seeking comment.

In June of 2004, Local 4060 of the American Federation of Government Employees, which represents FEMA workers, wrote to members of congress to warn about alleged cronyism at the agency.

The letter said the practice initially "took place mainly at the senior levels of FEMA, but it has now entered into the mid-level and working-level" of FEMA.

"The ability of FEMA to manage emergencies and disasters is being seriously eroded," the letter said. "The American people count on FEMA to be there to pick up the pieces after a hurricane, a terrorist attack, or any type of emergency. ... (But) our capability is being drained away."

Congress Approves New Storm Aid, And Bush Pledges To Expedite It (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - President Bush said today that he would work with Congress to "cut through the red tape" and get federal aid as fast as possible to people whose lives had been disrupted by wind and flood along the Gulf Coast, and Congress responded this evening by rushing through an additional $51.8 billion in federal assistance.

But even as the president spoke, there were signs that the federal response to the crisis was hampered by confusion.

"The government is going to be with you for the long haul," Mr. Bush said in a brief speech at the White House as he and Vice President Dick Cheney tried to counter charges that their administration had reacted slowly and ineffectively to the crisis. The president said that Sept. 16, next Friday, would be designated a national day of prayer and remembrance.

Earlier, the vice president defended the work of federal agencies, including the much criticized Federal Emergency Management Agency, as he toured the Gulf region.

Mr. Bush said that $2,000 per family in federal aid would be given to each family uprooted by the flood, and that workers from FEMA and the Red Cross were working to get the money into the hands of those who needed it as fast as possible. He said some 400,000 families had already registered with FEMA for federal help, and that 3,000 people were taking calls around the clock at the agency, with the number of operators to be increased "dramatically" very soon.

But not long after he spoke, FEMA announced that it was ending, after a one-day trial, a distribution of debit cards for immediate living expenses. An agency spokesman I in Baton Rouge, La., David G. Passey, said he did not know why FEMA officials had scuttled the program, although there were problems with distribution of the cards in Houston.

Hundreds of people displaced by the storm and flooding lined up outside the Astrodome to wait for cards, but not all could get them. The Red Cross had handed out appointment slips for people to get Red Cross debit cards at certain times. But out of confusion or anxiety, people started lining up before dawn, and some were overcome by heat during the day, The Associated Press reported. The confusion was deepened as word spread through the Astrodome that FEMA was about to distribute debit cards for up to $2,000 each - but FEMA workers told The A.P. that their agency would not be ready to hand out cards for a couple of days.

President Bush, perhaps with the Houston confusion in mind, said people who fled the storm-affected areas and consequently might have little or no identification would be given "special evacuee status" to make them eligible for the full range of federal benefits - Medicaid, food stamps, school lunch programs and aid to needy families, to name a few - more quickly and without the usual paperwork.

The continuing confusion in the federal response to the crisis could be discerned in a comparison of the president's remarks with those of Mr. Passey, the FEMA spokesman.

Mr. Bush, in speaking to those affected by the storm, said he understood that "some of you do not have access to a savings or checking account, or ways to cash a check."

But, Mr. Passey said, "as we've looked at the logistics of expanding the debit card, we believe that our normal methods of delivery - checks and electronic funds transfer - will suffice."

DOJ_NMG_0004117

The president said he and Congress would also see to it that the states that took in people fleeing the gulf region would be reimbursed for the extra burdens on their budgets. "You should not be penalized for showing compassion," Mr. Bush said.

"We have many difficult days ahead," Mr. Bush observed.

In Gulfport, Miss., the vice president was asked whether agencies like FEMA should have political appointees in leadership posts or "somebody with more qualifications." Michael D. Brown, the FEMA director, has come under particular criticism for his lack of background in emergency planning and for seeming unaware of some flood-related events.

"Well, most of government runs on the basis of the combination of civilian leadership that's elected and career professionals that fill the jobs underneath them," Mr. Cheney said. "And we're always trying to strike the right balance. But I think generally that overall principle has served us well as a government over the years."

As Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney were making their case, Congress was moving on the $51.8 billion aid package requested by the White House. The House overwhelmingly approved it earlier , and the Senate followed suit later. As both the speed and the margins of the votes indicated, lawmakers of both parties seemed in agreement that the federal government should spend heavily to help the disaster victims. But they were far apart on related issues.

Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the Senate minority leader, expressed disdain for the Federal Emergency Management Agency and said that Democrats were prepared to bypass the agency entirely.

"Is there anyone - anyone - who believes that we should continue to let the money go to FEMA and be distributed by them?" Mr. Reid asked.

Mr. Reid said again that the hurricane and flood disaster, and a faulty federal response, should be investigated by an independent commission like the one that dissected the Sept. 11 terror attacks, instead of by Congressional committee, as Republicans have proposed. He said Democrats planned to boycott the Congressional committee approached pushed by Republicans.

Senator Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, a Democrat, who appeared alongside Mr. Reid, said, "There will be a lot of time for blaming in the future, and everyone will be held accountable, including us and including the president himself."

Four Years After Sept. 11, Lessons From Another Blow (USAT)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

This weekend, the fourth anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the nation is reeling from another great tragedy, a hurricane that might have claimed more lives than the nearly 3,000 taken that day.

There is much to reflect upon in that dark coincidence.Hurricane Katrina was a blow from nature, not man. But it has amounted to the first test of the new and improved security system constructed after Sept. 11, 2001.

The storm's effects were much like an assault with weapons of mass destruction, something that has long been the worst U.S. terrorism nightmare: thousands of displaced people, many needing medical help along with food, shelter and information.

The local, state and federal officials in charge failed the test. No reassuring operation snapped into place. Amid the confusion, some still being played out on TV screens, it's fair to ask: Have the past four years, and the vast sums spent on better protection, been squandered?

By one measure, the answer would seem to be no. Since 2001, there hasn't been a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. At least a part of that has to be because of efforts taken to prevent one. Nevertheless, as Hurricane Katrina has shown, the answers to three central questions are troubling:

Are preparations in place if an attack happens? The Department of Homeland Security gives out emergency preparedness grants to local authorities, who must submit detailed plans. At least in the case of Louisiana, those plans failed reality checks. Authorities, for example, had designated the Superdome a shelter. Unlike with a terror attack, they even had notice of the impending disaster. Even so, they still failed to stock the shelter with enough basic necessities.

The attempted evacuation of New Orleans showed that plans drawn up in advance were unworkable. They failed to recognize that the most vulnerable people lacked transportation, or in some cases comprehension of the danger. That lesson should not be lost on state and local officials elsewhere, who could face a similar crisis at any time and should be rethinking their evacuation plans based on New Orleans' experience. Also needed: better oversight of those plans by Homeland Security.

What about the aftermath of an attack? Police, firefighters and emergency medical workers struggled to cope with evacuees from Hurricane Katrina. Bad as that was, it was the barest taste of what the aftermath of a nuclear, biological or chemical attack might be like. Despite four years of preparation, health systems are under-prepared. Warnings persist about insufficient medications, vaccines and distribution systems in the event of a chemical or biological attack — despite a $20 billion government investment in bioterrorism preparedness since 9/11.

Is enough being done to prevent an attack? Nothing can stop a storm like Katrina, but what about terrorism? The list of potential targets is limitless, and absolute protection is impossible. But the devastation wrought by Katrina, despite years of warnings, lends new menace to the steady trickle of reports from many sources about security weaknesses — at nuclear and chemical plants, for instance, or in inspecting cargo entering U.S. ports. The tightened security at airports is by no means representative.

DOJ_NMG_0004118

In many ways, the situation is similar to when a house has been burglarized and the owner vows to buy the best alarm system, a guard dog and take other precautions, no expense spared. But as time goes by, with no new break-in, the urgency dissipates and the protections aren't all implemented.

What's most glaringly missing is the post-9/11 sense of urgency. For most people, that kind of laser focus can't realistically be sustained; everyday life simply gets back in the way. For officials charged with protecting the United States and preventing another 9/11, however, it has to be.

Where To Point The Fingers (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

In less enlightened times there was no catastrophe independent of human agency. When the plague or some other natural disaster struck, witches were burned, Jews were massacred and all felt better (except the witches and Jews).

A few centuries later, our progressive thinkers have progressed not an inch. No fall of a sparrow on this planet is not attributed to sin and human perfidy. The three current favorites are: (1) global warming, (2) the war in Iraq and (3) tax cuts. Katrina hits and the unholy trinity is immediately invoked to damn sinner-in-chief George W. Bush.

This kind of stupidity merits no attention whatsoever, but I'll give it a paragraph. There is no relationship between global warming and the frequency and intensity of Atlantic hurricanes. Period. The problem with the evacuation of New Orleans is not that National Guardsmen in Iraq could not get to New Orleans but that National Guardsmen in Louisiana did not get to New Orleans. As for the Bush tax cuts, administration budget requests for New Orleans flood control during the five Bush years exceed those of the five preceding Clinton years. The notion that the allegedly missing revenue would have been spent wisely by Congress, targeted precisely to the levees of New Orleans, and that the reconstruction would have been completed in time, is a threefold fallacy. The argument ends when you realize that, as The Post noted, "the levees that failed were already completed projects."

Let's be clear. The author of this calamity was, first and foremost, Nature (or if you prefer, Nature's God). The suffering was augmented, aided and abetted in descending order of culpability by the following:

1. The mayor of New Orleans. He knows the city. He knows the danger. He knows that during Hurricane Georges in 1998, the use of the Superdome was a disaster and fully two-thirds of residents never got out of the city. Nothing was done. He declared a mandatory evacuation only 24 hours before Hurricane Katrina hit. He did not even declare a voluntary evacuation until the day before that, at 5 p.m. At that time, he explained that he needed to study his legal authority to call a mandatory evacuation and was hesitating to do so lest the city be sued by hotels and other businesses.

2. The governor. It's her job to call up the National Guard and get it to where it has to go. Where the Guard was in the first few days is a mystery. Indeed, she issued an authorization for the National Guard to commandeer school buses to evacuate people on Wednesday afternoon -- more than two days after the hurricane hit and after much of the fleet had already drowned in its parking lots.

3. The head of FEMA. Late, slow and in way over his head. On Thursday, Sept. 2, he said on national television that he didn't even know there were people in the convention center, when anybody watching television could see them there, destitute and desperate. Maybe in his vast bureaucracy he can assign three 20-year-olds to watch cable news and give him updates every hour on what in hell is going on.

4. The president. Late, slow, and simply out of tune with the urgency and magnitude of the disaster. The second he heard that the levees had been breached in New Orleans, he should have canceled his schedule and addressed the country on national television to mobilize it both emotionally and physically to assist in the disaster. His flyover on the way to Washington was the worst possible symbolism. And his Friday visit was so tone-deaf and politically disastrous that he had to fly back three days later.

5. Congress. Now as always playing holier-than-thou. Perhaps it might ask itself who created the Department of Homeland Security in the first place. The congressional response to all crises is the same -- rearrange the bureaucratic boxes, but be sure to add one extra layer. The past four years of DHS have been spent principally on bureaucratic reorganization (and real estate) instead of, say, a workable plan for as predictable a disaster as a Gulf Coast hurricane.

6. The American people. They have made it impossible for any politician to make any responsible energy policy over the past 30 years -- but that is a column for another day. Now is not the time for constructive suggestions. Now is the time for blame, recrimination and sheer astonishment. Mayor Ray Nagin has announced that, as bodies are still being found and as a public health catastrophe descends upon the city, he is sending 60 percent of his cops on city funds for a little R&R, mostly to Vegas hotels. Asked if it was appropriate to party in these circumstances, he responded: "New Orleans is a party town. Get over it."

DOJ_NMG_0004119

Confusion On Debit Card Aid (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 8 - After a day of confusion and complaints, officials of the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Thursday that the agency would not expand a trial program to distribute debit cards worth $2,000 to victims of Hurricane Katrina for immediate living expenses.

A FEMA official in Washington said the cards would be distributed at the Astrodome in Houston beginning on Friday.

Reports that the debit cards would be distributed on Thursday morning at the Astrodome, a temporary shelter, brought several hours of mayhem to the complex, attracting a crush of cars and pedestrians that caused the police to shut the gates, locking out thousands of residents in the 90-degree heat.

Meanwhile, in Baton Rouge,David G. Passey, a FEMA spokesman, said he did not know why the program had been discontinued.

But Mr. Passey said, "As we've looked at the logistics of expanding the debit card, we believe that our normal methods of delivery, checks and electronic funds transfer, will suffice."

Under questioning by reporters, he said he could not explain why traditional conduits of aid, which take from 10 days to two weeks to reach victims, provided they have addresses or working bank accounts, had been deemed more appropriate than the immediate relief offered by the debit cards.

He said "program specialists" had made the decision.

Announcing the debit card program on Wednesday, Michael D. Brown, the FEMA director, said it was designed to "empower" evacuees "to make their own decisions about what they need to have to restart their lives." But he did not say when and where the cards would be distributed.

In Baton Rouge, The Associated Press reported, people went to a Red Cross office believing they could get the debit cards there.

Callers to a Baton Rouge radio station from as far away as Atlanta and Houston complained that they did not know how to get the cards. One person said she had called the FEMA office in New York, only to be told that the cards were in Atlanta.

But Mr. Passey said the cards had been intended for distribution only at the Astrodome, where the highest concentration of evacuees was housed.

After the police lockdown at the complex, the order that had characterized the temporary housing situation there so far threatened to collapse, as people fainted, pushed and shoved, and complained loudly.

"It's just a hassle to get assistance," said Sparkle Stanwood, 25, an evacuee from downtown New Orleans, as she stood outside an Astrodome gate, sweat glistening on her face. "They gave us an appointment for 10 a.m. today - now they won't let us in. Some people broke a gate open. It's a lot of people, and it's hot."

Another evacuee, Eric Robertson, said: "We're very angry. We don't really know what's going on. It's so unorganized out here. There's nobody to even answer a question about why the place is on lockdown."

The Red Cross in Houston began handing out debit cards Thursday loaded with $650 to $1,600 in purchasing power.

The relief organization issued 7,000 cards at the Reliant complex around the Astrodome and will issue more Friday at the George R. Brown Convention Center. Tennessee has distributed 1,550 "electronic benefit cards."

George R. Brown Evacuees To Get Red Cross Cards Tonight (HC)

By Salatheia Bryant And Becky Bowman

Houston Chronicle, September 9, 2005

The debit cards have arrived, and with them, perhaps, the longest lines yet.

Evacuees at Reliant Center stood in line as long as five hours today to receive debit cards from the Red Cross.

On the schedule for tomorrow: debit cards from the federal government -- and more long lines as well.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said today that distribution of the $2,000 cards will begin Friday morning at Reliant Park, but only for those currently living there and only then if they've already registered with FEMA.

Most evacuees at Houston's largest shelters have already done the paperwork, and some have even received checks or aid directly deposited to their bank accounts, making them ineligible for the debit cards. Many who thought they were standing in line on Wednesday for the FEMA cards turned out to be in line to simply apply for the federal aid. By this afternoon, the federal agency was still signing up about 45 families an hour.

DOJ_NMG_0004120

After seeing mile-long lines form today for Red Cross cards, authorities were urging those who aren't yet registered with FEMA to do so by calling 1-800-621-FEMA or going to the agency's Web site at http://www.fema.gov. On Saturday, FEMA will begin passing out cards at Reliant Center to evacuees who don't live in the Reliant complex.

Organizers and evacuees alike are hoping that Friday's inevitable lines won't match today's, which included elderly hurricane victims in wheelchairs and children who haven't yet been registered for school. Hurricane victims held newspapers and scraps of cardboard over the heads to shield themselves from the sun as volunteers passed out water and doctors arrived to watch for overheating or dehydration.

Police were called in for crowd control, and Reliant Park shut its gates for a few hours to those who aren't living there to limit the crowds and encourage evacuees from elsewhere to wait their turn.

"We have a very dynamic situation outside," Coast Guard Lt. Joseph Leonard, who is heading up the shelter operation, said this afternoon.

Many of those lined up for the Red Cross cards outside Reliant Center today had appointments and an electronic sign warned evacuees that "no walkups" would be accepted, but the line for getting appointments was as long as the line to pick up the cards.

One woman balancing a toddler on her hip said she'd advanced only 15 to 20 feet in 45 minutes.

"It's just so many people. A lot of people don't have appointments . . . I think this is ridiculous," said 22-year-old Chazz Tripp, who was hoping for funds to buy clothes or perhaps furniture for wherever she ends up. "It's maddening."

Relester Cain, 39, of New Orleans waited for five hours but emerged with a debit card. The wait was hard, she said, but "it was worth it."

The coveted Red Cross debit cards can be activated in eight to 24 hours, a powerful draw for the 7,188 still living at the Reliant Park shelters today. Only those stranded at Reliant Center, Reliant Arena or the Astrodome were eligible this morning and this afternoon for the cards, which carry balances of a $360 to $1,600, depending on a family's size and the age of its children.

Drawn on Chase Bank, the debit cards carry the words "Red Cross client" and "This cannot be used for alcohol, tobacco or weapons."

Standing in line for the card that could pay for gasoline and take him to his next construction job, evacuee Michael Gorman has no complaints.

"Who wouldn't want to stand in line for somebody to help you?" he said. "It's a blessing.

Shalon Matthews, 30, a New Orleans hotel worker, said the long lines are just part of her post-Katrina life.

"We are kind of used to all of the processing going on," she said. "It's second nature now. We know they can only do so much. We have no where else to go."

Yolonda Allen, 39, was ebullient to be among the lucky ones clutching a debit card before lunch. A sickle-cell patient and the mother of a teen-age boy, her first purchase is to be fresh, healthy vegetables.

"This will help me," she said. "It will help lift my spirits up. "

That was the aim of the Red Cross volunteers passing out the cards, but the length of lines were frustrating for harried volunteers as well as evacuees.

Red Cross spokeswoman Jana Zehner said organizers had hoped that assigning appointment times would help, but many people are lining up way too early or getting into the wrong line. Some people are also bringing their entire families along, even though one person can pick up a card for an entire family.

"We can't help them to stand in line," Zehner said.

Another Red Cross spokesman, Gregory L. Smith, promised everyone who needs a card will get a card, but that's going to take time.

"We knew there were going to be a lot of people," Leonard said. "We are refining our process now. This is the largest shelter operation in U.S. history. None of us have a playbook."

The lines would have been much longer if the giveway had happened earlier in the week. More and more evacuees are heading off to more permanent accommodations, and emergency officials have started consolidating the shelters at Reliant Park. They hope to have all the park's shelters closed by a week from Sunday.

Authorites began moving residents of Reliant Arena to Reliant Center on Wednesday afternoon, leaving behind only 200 patients receiving medical services. Reliant Park's medical clinic, which includes an isolation ward for those sick with the Norwalk virus, will continue to operate out of the arena.

With the transfer of evacuees complete today, the Reliant Astrodome had about 2,500 people; Reliant Center, 4,488 people; and downtown's George R. Brown Convention Center, about 1,400 people. Including the 200 patients still at the Reliant

DOJ_NMG_0004121

Arena, this morning's total census of 8,588 compares to a headcount of 8,066 on Wednesday and a rougher estimate of 25,400 as recently as Tuesday.

More than 17,000 evacuees have registered at the convention center. By Saturday, Red Cross officials said, a toll free phone number will be in place for those who registered at the center but who are staying elsewhere.

Frank Gutierrez, Harris County's coordinator for homeland security and emergency management, said the consolidation of shelters has been going well, with "no big glitches."

Cheney, Gonzales Tour Stricken Gulf Coast (AP)

By Tom Raum, Associated Press Writer

The AP, September 8, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday toured parts of the ravaged Gulf Coast, claiming significant progress but acknowledging immense obstacles to a full recovery.

"We can do it," he said, first in Gulfport, Miss., and then in New Orleans, where he stood on a bridge on a levee on the edge of a flooded section of the city.

The vice president said it was too early to estimate the total cost of reconstruction from Hurricane Katrina. He dismissed the idea of raising taxes to pay for storm recovery and the war in Iraq.

Standing by Louisiana's governor, Democrat Kathleen Blanco, Cheney spoke of how the flooding of New Orleans and the destruction of many communities in the region was "a major tragedy in modern times."

"The positive news is we appear to be making progress," said Cheney, who brought 800 pounds of bottled water aboard Air Force Two as a gesture of aid.

His visit was an attempt by President Bush to show an active role in the recovery effort after a slow and tentative start.

Cheney told reporters he planned to return to the area on Saturday. Bush, who has visited twice since the storm hit, is expected to visit again soon.

Seeking to counter attacks by Democrats, the vice president defended the political appointees who are overseeing the federal relief effort. Cheney also spoke of the need to address "mental health issues" among people in the stricken area; he offered no specifics.

Cheney's helicopter stayed low and close to the ravaged coastline on the flight from Gulfport to New Orleans. Later, Cheney stopped in Baton Rouge to meet with state officials in the capital.

At a briefing on the amphibious assault ship USS Iwo Jima, docked in New Orleans, Coast Guard Adm. Thad Allen showed Cheney maps and large aerial photographs.

"You can see right now that the water is staring to recede," Allen told Cheney. Allen said the next step is a door-to-door search of homes as the city moves ahead with its evacuation.

Cheney rode in a Hummer through parts of downtown. Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, the military coordinator, was at the wheel. The vice president stopped at Harrah's hotel and casino, where he shook hands with police and rescue workers.

Standing on a bridge over the 17th Street Canal levee that burst in the hurricane, Cheney could see two huge pipes pumping water out of the city and back into the canal. Flames burst into the air from a ruptured gas line nearby.

Earlier, once-stately waterfront homes, now splintered, some with off their foundations and even in neighboring yards, confronted Cheney.

"I think the progress we're making is significant," Cheney said. "I think the performance, in general, at least in terms of the information I've received from locals, is definitely very impressive."

"That's not to say there's not an awful lot of work to be done — there is," he added.

Cheney spoke to reporters along Gulfport's Second Street. Once it was two blocks from the Gulf of Mexico; now, it essentially is only one away.

Cheney walked about two blocks from the Gulf along a street littered with broken wood, downed trees and furniture. Some houses were severely damaged, some hardly at all.

One passer-by shouted the same vulgar phrase to Cheney that the vice president himself had used on the Senate floor in a celebrated and heated exchanged in June 2004 with Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

"First time I've heard it," Cheney joked with reporters when asked if he was hearing such sentiments a lot.

Cheney visited Rebecca Dubuisson, who said she spent about 18 months adding an extension on her house, only to have the hurricane wipe it away.

The house that once stood between her place and the ocean was gone, too. "We've got a beach view now," she said, voicing a determination to repair her house.

Dubuisson said she did not want to criticize the relief effort. "I don't know that you could have prepared for it," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0004122

Most of the people Cheney met with on his Mississippi stop were friendly.

Lynne Lofton was not. Her house further down the street was destroyed.

"I think this media opportunity today is a terrible waste of time and taxpayer money," she said. "They've picked a nice neighborhood where people have insurance and most are Republicans."

Joining Cheney on the trip were Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Cheney was asked about criticism that leading the relief efforts were political appointees with experience in disaster recovery — Chertoff and Mike Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The vice president said he believes Bush "struck the right balance" between political appointees and career professionals to oversee the relief efforts.

Cheney Tours Katrina Devastation, Backs Chertoff (REU)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, September 8, 2005

U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday toured the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina and expressed confidence in Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's handling of the crisis despite widespread criticism of the initial government response.

Cheney rode through the streets of downtown New Orleans in a humvee, the highest-ranking Bush administration official to visit the shattered city center, during a day-long tour of Mississippi and Louisiana to check on relief efforts.

He was the latest in a series of Bush administration officials to visit the region amid complaints from victims that bureaucracy is slowing the recovery, and he acknowledged problems in the early days of the disaster.

"I've got enormous confidence in the secretary (Chertoff) as does the president," said Cheney at a stop in Gulfport, Mississippi, where he was accompanied by Chertoff.

Chertoff and Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, have been criticized for their handling of the worst U.S. humanitarian crisis, with some Democrats and Republicans saying one or both should be fired.

Asked about problems with bureaucratic barriers, Cheney suggested progress was being made in cutting through them.

"I think the progress we're making is significant. I think the performance in general at least in terms of the information I've received from locals is definitely very impressive," Cheney told reporters in a rare question-and-answer session.

SHOUTED INSULTS

While he was speaking, a young man shouted an obscenity at the vice-president, saying "Go fuck yourself, Mr Cheney" in an outburst that reflected frayed tempers and patience in the stricken region.

Cheney later toured an unflooded part of New Orleans near the convention center, seeing first-hand the debris of chairs, empty water bottles and trash. Thousands of storm survivors pleading for food, water and care stayed several days at the center last week before they were evacuated from the ruined and chaotic city.

Army Lt. Gen. Russell Honore, commander of the military relief effort in the hurricane-hit region, drove Cheney on a tour of several blocks around the convention center.

In the back seat was Cheney's wife, Lynne, and Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Blanco, who has had some frictions with the Bush administration over the federal response. The group stopped at a casino where hundreds of rescue workers were being served barbecued food and Cheney shook hands with many of them.

"Obviously, New Orleans has been through a great trauma," Cheney said, but added there was "significant progress" being made. "We've still got an enormous amount to do," he said.

Cheney acknowledged problems in the recovery's first few days, especially the chaos surrounding the evacuations.

"There's no question there were problems," he said.

Cheney rejected the notion that tax increases were needed to pay for the longterm effort to rebuild the region, saying that would only choke off growth.

He said he would return to the region on Saturday.

In Gulfport, resident Lynn Lofton approached a group of reporters waiting for the vice president and said the visit was too late.

"I think the media opportunity right here is a complete waste of time and taxpayer money," she said. "They should have been here last week."

Relieft Effort 'very Impressive,' Cheney Says (AP)

The AP, September 8, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004123

GULFPORT, Miss. — Walking a hurricane-riddled street, Vice President Dick Cheney declared today that much progress is being made in a disaster relief effort he termed "very impressive."

Cheney's plane took him on a course over heavily damaged houses as he arrived to this Gulf Coast town destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. After meeting with state and local officials, Cheney and his wife, Lynne, toured a particularly damaged part of the town.

The vice president told reporters he was struck by the "very positive, can-do" attitude of Mississippians toward the help they are getting. In general, Mississippi officials have been much more complimentary of the federal hurricane response than those from Louisiana and, particularly, New Orleans.

President Bush dispatched Cheney to the region, amid persistent criticism of the sluggish pace of the federal piece of the response, to examine any bureaucratic red tape getting in the way of helping people and to focus on the long-term issues at hand.

"I think the progress we're making is significant," Cheney said. "I think the performance, in general, at least in terms of the information I've received from locals, is definitely very impressive."

He added: "That's not to say there's not an awful lot of work to be done — there is."

While Cheney spoke, a passer-by hurled an expletive at the vice president. "First time I've heard it," Cheney said, when asked if he was hearing a lot of such sentiments.

Cheney walked about two blocks from the Gulf of Mexico along a street littered with broken wood, downed trees and furniture. Some houses were severely damaged, some hardly at all.

He talked to a man whose house was knocked off its foundation and had extensive roof damage and two or three arm chairs sitting in the front yard. He visited Rebecca Dubuisson, who said she spent a year and a half adding an extension on her house only to see it wiped away by the hurricane. "We've got a beach view now," she said.

Dubuisson said she didn't want to criticize the relief effort. "I don't know that you could have prepared for it," she said.

Cheney said immediate needs for the victims include providing housing, supplies and clean up. He also said mental health issues need to be addressed, but he didn't know how that would be approached.

Cheney said another issue is determining whether insurers should pay for damages if their policy did not include coverage for floods. Most insurance policies do not include flood coverage.

Most the people Cheney met with were friendly. Lynne Lofton, whose house further down the street was completely destroyed, was an exception.

"I think this media opportunity today is a terrible waste of time and taxpayer money," she said. "They've picked a nice neighborhood where people have insurance and most are Republicans."

Cheney was also accompanied by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

First Lady Gives Award, Talks About Katrina's Impact (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, September 9, 2005

First Lady Laura Bush visited Des Moines today, tying her usual focus on education to her role in encouraging a nation weary from Hurricane Katrina.

"As other children around the children around the country are going to school, all of us are thinking about the children in Louisiana and Mississippi and Alabama who aren't in their regular schools because their schools have been hurt," the first lady said during her stop at Lovejoy Elementary School on the city's southeast side.

Mrs. Bush announced a web site where school districts around the country could post lists of available supplies. Those supplies would be for schools receiving an influx of students displaced by the storm.

The web site is www.ed.gov and the link is "Hurricane Help for Schools."

The first lady also awarded Lovejoy math teacher Judy Kinley Iowa's American Star of Teaching, an award given to one educator in every state and the District of Columbia.

Kinley was cited for her work establishing the Des Moines Public School District's math curriculum, especially for students not proficient in English.

Mrs. Bush had traveled from Washington, D.C., Thursday morning.

The first lady, traveling with U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, toured the school before presenting Kinley with the award in a surprise ceremony.

The school stop was Mrs. Bush's only Iowa event. She left the state, headed for hurricane-ravaged Mississippi, shortly before noon.

DOJ_NMG_0004124

First Lady Comforts Storm Refugees In DeSoto County (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, September 9, 2005

SOUTHAVEN, Miss. - First Lady Laura Bush visited with hurricane victims in Southaven Thursday and cradled what could be the storm's youngest refugee - a three-day old infant born to a New Orleans couple seeking shelter in Mississippi.

"Our hearts have been so warmed by the response," said Bush, a former elementary school librarian, as she spoke at Greenbrook Elementary School. The school has among the highest concentration of students in the district displaced by Hurricane Katrina last week.

Bush, who had visited a school in Iowa earlier in the day, praised DeSoto County residents and Superintendent Milton Kuykendall for enrolling storm refugees in the DeSoto County School District. DeSoto County was among the first school districts in the state to welcome students whose schools in Louisiana and south Mississippi were obliterated by Katrina.

Bush, who was making her second stop in Mississippi in less than four days, said she has been encouraged by the love and support that other children have shown toward the newcomers.

Bush and her husband, President George W. Bush, made a stop in Poplarville earlier in the week.

"Children will be very welcoming," the First Lady said. "It's an opportunity for them to meet children from another part of the country and figure out what ways they can help."

Bush was joined by Margaret Spellings, U.S. Department of Education Secretary and Gayle Wicker, the wife of U.S. Rep. Roger Wicker, and other local dignitaries.

The spotlight, however, was on Bush, who comforted families and openly embraced many in the crowd.

"We're trying to get you back in your homes," Bush told nine students and about a dozen parents assembled in the school's library, many of them from New Orleans and southeast Louisiana.

For nearly ten minutes, she cradled 3-day old Irelle Carolynn Johnson in a private meeting with her parents, Irene and Quintell Johnson, at Goodman Oaks Church of Christ.

Betty Shackleford, a volunteer with relief efforts at the church, said the infant was born at Baptist Memorial Hospital-DeSoto on Tuesday when another volunteer had taken the child's mother out to shop for clothes and food, Irene Johnson soon went into labor and delivered Irelle. Shackelford said the family has since been relocated to an apartment from the shelter where more than 164 evacuees have been helped so far.

"This whole community has come together," Shackelford said. "We've never done anything like this before."

First Lady Visits Southaven, Cheers Evacuees (CA)

By Jimmie Covington

Commercial Appeal (TN), September 9, 2005

Hurricane evacuees at a Southaven church shelter said a visit by first lady Laura Bush on Thursday raised their spirits as they try to deal with their losses.

"It is an extraordinary thing to have her here," said Hope Thonn, 44, of Chalmette, La., who has been at the Goodman Oaks Church of Christ shelter since early last week with her husband, Davey, and six children.

"It just brought our spirits up and my family was very honored to be able to just take a picture with her."

Thonn said Bush's visit was a "little bit of good" in "all of the badness" that has occurred as a result of the storm. The Thonns' home and two commercial fishing boats were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

Shermaine Johnson, 33, of New Orleans, who is at the shelter with several family members, said, "For people at this shelter to just be thought about is just a great opportunity."

Bush drew applause from more than 100 evacuees and church volunteers when she entered the foyer of the church's education building shortly after 2 p.m.

Earlier, about 12:45 p.m., Bush also was greeted warmly at Greenbrook Elementary School in Southaven, where she visited a second-grade music class and met with nine evacuee children at the school and 12 of their parents.

Bush and U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings visited a school in Des Moines before coming to Southaven. The Des Moines visit originally had been planned as a state-of-the-school year event, but as a result of the hurricane and its aftermath, Bush broadened the visit to include Southaven.

She said she wanted to come to DeSoto County because its school district has children in it from the Mississippi Gulf Coast and New Orleans, who are now unable to attend their own schools.

DeSoto is a county where President Bush received strong support in both of his presidential races. The President visited the county in 2003 as part of his last campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0004125

Spellings said that in addition to the storm-related situation, the visit here was made because "this (Greenbrook) is a great school, great school district and (you have) a great superintendent (Milton Kuykendall). ... All of the schools made their adequate yearly progress."

Adequate yearly progress is a major standard under the federal No Child Left Behind Act.

At Greenbrook, Bush, who was dressed casually in dark slacks and a blue shirt, hugged the evacuee children and parents, and praised the parents for enrolling their children in school.

She called for all parents from areas affected by Hurricane Katrina to place their youngsters in school, even though they may have to transfer the children to other schools after a short period of time as they find new places to stay.

"It is important for their children to have the structure and routine of going to school, especially since many children have seen and suffered a lot of really terrible things," Bush told reporters who had gathered at the school.

Spellings said her department is preparing a plan to submit to Congress to provide financial assistance to school districts that are serving displaced students and to districts where schools were destroyed or heavily damaged by the storm.

Meantime, some federal requirements for schools are being waived to assist districts, including the granting of flexibility in some provisions of No Child Left Behind, Spellings said.

Answering a reporter's question at the school, the first lady said she believes the federal government response to the disaster has overall been "very good."

"I think we now know that New Orleans is pretty much totally evacuated," Bush said. She said a "huge number of people" have been rescued, including many who were rescued one at a time by helicopter.

Also, shelters that have been set up all across the country are going well, she said.

"This was a huge storm, an unbelievably devastating storm, the largest probably that our country has ever seen," Bush said. "When you consider that and when you consider the number of communities, particularly in this state, that were literally washed out, I think overall you have to say it was a very good response."

Widespread criticism has been directed at the Bush administration, charging that the administration responded too slowly to the disaster.

Bush and Spellings returned to Washington after their visit to the Goodman Oaks Church shelter.

Among politicians and other leaders who were present during Bush's visit were Southaven Mayor Greg Davis, county Supervisor Tommy Lewis. school board president Ann Jolley and Gayle Wicker, wife of U.S. Rep Roger Wicker (R-Miss.).

Davis said Bush's visit shows that the hearts of people "from the top office of the United States on down" are going out to victims of the hurricane.

Schools Supt. Kuykendall said Thursday was a "great day" for the county and the school district. He said Bush's visit shows her passion for serving children.

Wife Says Criticism Of Bush 'Disgusting' (MACT)

The Macon Telegraph, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON - Laura Bush described as "disgusting" comments by rapper Kanye West and Democratic chairman Howard Dean blaming her husband for the disproportionate number of black hurricane victims.

"I think all of those remarks are disgusting, to be perfectly frank, because of course President Bush cares about everyone in our country," the first lady said Thursday in an interview with American Urban Radio Networks.

"And I know that. I mean, I'm the person who lives with him," she said. "I know what he's like and I know what he thinks and I know how he cares about people."

The president has faced sharp criticism over federal relief efforts for Hurricane Katrina victims, who are disproportionally black and poor.

On a nationally televised telethon Friday, broadcast live on NBC, West departed from the script to declare "George Bush doesn't care about black people."

Earlier this week, Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, told the National Baptist Convention of America, a black religious group, that race played a role in the hurricane casualty numbers.

Mrs. Bush said it was clear that poor people were more vulnerable when the hurricane hit.

"They lived in poorer neighborhoods. Their neighborhoods were the ones that were more likely to flood, as we saw in New Orleans. Their housing was more vulnerable," she said.

"And that's what we saw, and that's what we want to address in our country."

Political Issues Snarled Plans For Troop Aid (NYT)

By Eric Lipton, Eric Schmitt And Thom Shanker

DOJ_NMG_0004126

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

This article was reported and written by Eric Lipton, Eric Schmitt and Thom Shanker

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - As New Orleans descended into chaos last week and Louisiana's governor asked for 40,000 soldiers, President Bush's senior advisers debated whether the president should speed the arrival of active-duty troops by seizing control of the hurricane relief mission from the governor.

For reasons of practicality and politics, officials at the Justice Department and the Pentagon, and then at the White House, decided not to urge Mr. Bush to take command of the effort. Instead, the Washington officials decided to rely on the growing number of National Guard personnel flowing into Louisiana, who were under Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's control.

The debate began after officials realized that Hurricane Katrina had exposed a critical flaw in the national disaster response plans created after the Sept. 11 attacks. According to the administration's senior domestic security officials, the plan failed to recognize that local police, fire and medical personnel might be incapacitated.

As criticism of the response to Hurricane Katrina has mounted, one of the most pointed questions has been why more troops were not available more quickly to restore order and offer aid. Interviews with officials in Washington and Louisiana show that as the situation grew worse, they were wrangling with questions of federal/state authority, weighing the realities of military logistics and perhaps talking past each other in the crisis.

To seize control of the mission, Mr. Bush would have had to invoke the Insurrection Act, which allows the president in times of unrest to command active-duty forces into the states to perform law enforcement duties. But decision makers in Washington felt certain that Ms. Blanco would have resisted surrendering control, as Bush administration officials believe would have been required to deploy active-duty combat forces before law and order had been re-established.

While combat troops can conduct relief missions without the legal authority of the Insurrection Act, Pentagon and military officials say that no active-duty forces could have been sent into the chaos of New Orleans on Wednesday or Thursday without confronting law-and-order challenges.

But just as important to the administration were worries about the message that would have been sent by a president ousting a Southern governor of another party from command of her National Guard, according to administration, Pentagon and Justice Department officials.

"Can you imagine how it would have been perceived if a president of the United States of one party had pre-emptively taken from the female governor of another party the command and control of her forces, unless the security situation made it completely clear that she was unable to effectively execute her command authority and that lawlessness was the inevitable result?" asked one senior administration official, who spoke anonymously because the talks were confidential.

Officials in Louisiana agree that the governor would not have given up control over National Guard troops in her state as would have been required to send large numbers of active-duty soldiers into the area. But they also say they were desperate and would have welcomed assistance by active-duty soldiers.

"I need everything you have got," Ms. Blanco said she told Mr. Bush last Monday, after the storm hit.

In an interview, she acknowledged that she did not specify what sorts of soldiers. "Nobody told me that I had to request that," Ms. Blanco said. "I thought that I had requested everything they had. We were living in a war zone by then."

By Wednesday, she had asked for 40,000 soldiers.

In the discussions in Washington, also at issue was whether active-duty troops could respond faster and in larger numbers than the Guard.

By last Wednesday, Pentagon officials said even the 82nd Airborne, which has a brigade on standby to move out within 18 hours, could not arrive any faster than 7,000 National Guard troops, which are specially trained and equipped for civilian law enforcement duties.

In the end, the flow of thousands of National Guard soldiers, especially military police, was accelerated from other states.

"I was there. I saw what needed to be done," Lt. Gen. H Steven Blum, chief of the National Guard Bureau, said in an interview. "They were the fastest, best-capable, most appropriate force to get there in the time allowed. And that's what it's all about."

But one senior Army officer expressed puzzlement that active-duty troops were not summoned sooner, saying 82nd Airborne troops were ready to move out from Fort Bragg, N.C., on Sunday, the day before the hurricane hit.

The call never came, administration officials said, in part because military officials believed Guard troops would get to the stricken region faster and because administration civilians worried that there could be political fallout if federal troops were forced to shoot looters.

Louisiana officials were furious that there was not more of a show of force, in terms of relief supplies and troops, from the federal government in the middle of last week. As the water was rising in New Orleans, the governor repeatedly questioned whether Washington had started its promised surge of federal resources.

"We needed equipment," Ms. Blanco said in an interview. "Helicopters. We got isolated."

Aides to Ms. Blanco said she was prepared to accept the deployment of active-duty military officials in her state. But she and other state officials balked at giving up control of the Guard as Justice Department officials said would have been required by the Insurrection Act if those combat troops were to be sent in before order was restored.

In a separate discussion last weekend, the governor also rejected a more modest proposal for a hybrid command structure in which both the Guard and active-duty troops would be under the command of an active-duty, three-star general - but only after he had been sworn into the Louisiana National Guard.

Lt. Gen. James T. Conway, director of operations for the military's Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that the Pentagon in August streamlined a rigid, decades-old system of deployment orders to allow the military's Northern Command to dispatch liaisons to work with local officials before an approaching hurricane.

The Pentagon is reviewing events from the time Hurricane Katrina reached full strength and bore down on New Orleans and five days later when Mr. Bush ordered 7,200 active-duty soldiers and marines to the scene.

After the hurricane passed New Orleans and the levees broke, flooding the city, it became increasingly evident that disaster-response efforts were badly bogged down.

Justice Department lawyers, who were receiving harrowing reports from the area, considered whether active-duty military units could be brought into relief operations even if state authorities gave their consent - or even if they refused.

The issue of federalizing the response was one of several legal issues considered in a flurry of meetings at the Justice Department, the White House and other agencies, administration officials said.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales urged Justice Department lawyers to interpret the federal law creatively to help local authorities, those officials said. For example, federal prosecutors prepared to expand their enforcement of some criminal statutes like anti-carjacking laws that can be prosecuted by either state or federal authorities.

On the issue of whether the military could be deployed without the invitation of state officials, the Office of Legal Counsel, the unit within the Justice Department that provides legal advice to federal agencies, concluded that the federal government had authority to move in even over the objection of local officials.

This act was last invoked in 1992 for the Los Angeles riots, but at the request of Gov. Pete Wilson of California, and has not been invoked over a governor's objections since the civil rights era - and before that, to the time of the Civil War, administration officials said. Bush administration, Pentagon and senior military officials warned that such an extreme measure would have serious legal and political implications.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has said deployment of National Guard soldiers to Iraq, including a brigade from Louisiana, did not affect the relief mission, but Ms. Blanco disagreed.

"Over the last year, we have had about 5,000 out, at one time," she said. "They are on active duty, serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. That certainly is a factor."

By Friday, National Guard reinforcements had arrived, and a truck convoy of 1,000 Guard soldiers brought relief supplies - and order - to the convention center area.

Officials from the Department of Homeland Security say the experience with Hurricane Katrina has demonstrated flaws in the nation's plans to handle disaster.

"This event has exposed, perhaps ultimately to our benefit, a deficiency in terms of replacing first responders who tragically may be the first casualties," Paul McHale, the assistant secretary of defense for domestic security, said.

Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, has suggested that active-duty troops be trained and equipped to intervene if front-line emergency personnel are stricken. But the Pentagon's leadership remains unconvinced that this plan is sound, suggesting instead that the national emergency response plans be revised to draw reinforcements initially from civilian police, firefighters, medical personnel and hazardous-waste experts in other states not affected by a disaster.

The federal government rewrote its national emergency response plan after the Sept. 11 attacks, but it relied on local officials to manage any crisis in its opening days. But Hurricane Katrina overwhelmed local "first responders," including civilian police and the National Guard.

At a news conference on Saturday, Mr. Chertoff said, "The unusual set of challenges of conducting a massive evacuation in the context of a still dangerous flood requires us to basically break the traditional model and create a new model, one for what you might call kind of an ultra-catastrophe.""

State Rebuffed Security Overture (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004128

Parts of New Orleans became so dangerous last week that the Bush administration briefly sought to take control of local law enforcement to quell the violence and get help to victims.

The administration sent Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco a proposed memorandum of understanding last Friday, raising the possibility that the federal government would take command of the Louisiana National Guard to strengthen law-enforcement efforts in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, according to officials in the Bush administration and the governor's office. In a series of telephone conversations with the White House on Saturday morning, the governor's office refused.

The memorandum amounted to a White House request for a federal takeover of local law enforcement, said Denise Bottcher, the governor's spokeswoman.

Gov. Blanco, in a letter to the White House on Saturday morning, said she would retain control of her state's National Guard troops, and requested the creation a federal joint task force that combined regular military and National Guard units. "Our response was 'no' to federalization, and let's have this instead," said Ms. Bottcher.

As the White House and state officials were discussing alternatives Friday -- the day President Bush first visited the storm-devastated Gulf Coast -- the violence in New Orleans began to subside amid a show of force by National Guard soldiers. That helped speed the evacuations of the Louisiana Superdome and the city's convention center, two sites where violence had erupted in the crowds of evacuees.

The Bush administration ultimately dropped the idea of a federal takeover of law enforcement.

By invoking the Insurrection Act, a president can use the military -- including federalized National Guard troops -- to quell civil disturbances. Under normal circumstances, regular military forces aren't allowed to engage in such law-enforcement activities. As the situation deteriorated in New Orleans last week, the White House weighed whether to use the military for law enforcement, an administration official said.

On Sept. 1, Gov. Blanco said that she needed 40,000 more troops, regardless of whether they were regular Army or National Guard troops. "I've actually asked for uniformed troops of any sort," she said. She added that she preferred to have more National Guard troops, according Ms. Bottcher.

In a letter to the president last Friday, she repeated the request. "Mr. President, only your personal involvement will ensure the immediate delivery of federal assets needed to save lives that are in jeopardy hour by hour," she wrote.

In a tense meeting with Mr. Bush at the New Orleans airport the same day, Gov. Blanco resisted the idea of federalizing the National Guard. When the president emerged from the meeting, Mr. Bush told New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin that the governor "needed 24 hours to decide," Mr. Nagin said at a later news conference. Ms. Bottcher agreed that Mr. Bush and Ms. Blanco discussed the federalization of the National Guard.

Later on Friday, the White House formalized the offer in a memo to the governor's office, suggesting the possibility of a military takeover of the security effort.

The tense and ultimately fruitless negotiations last week apparently contributed to chilly relations between the White House and the governor's office. When Mr. Bush returned to Louisiana for a second visit on Monday, Gov. Blanco's staff learned of the visit from a newspaper reporter; the White House said it had trouble reaching the governor on Sunday to let her know.

When the two leaders toured an evacuee center in Baton Rouge, they worked different parts of the room. Some Republicans say privately that continuing cool relations between Mr. Bush and Gov. Blanco have contributed to discussions of setting up a public corporation to administer long-term relief and reconstruction funds for the region.

City Had Evacuation Plan But Strayed From Strategy (HC)

By Lise Olson

Houston Chronicle, September 9, 2005

Cancer patient Earl Robicheaux, his immune system depleted by radical chemotherapy, lay in a hospital bed as Hurricane Katrina bore down on New Orleans.

Trying to leave, he thought, seemed suicidal.

But after four days in the hospital's reeking darkness, he escaped via a Black Hawk helicopter that landed on the roof of the University Hospital under heavy guard because of the threat of sniper fire.

It was not the evacuation plan authorities had envisioned for its sick, its elderly and its poor. As the floodwaters recede, serious questions remain about whether New Orleans and Louisiana officials followed their own plans for evacuating people with no other way out.

The mayor's mandatory evacuation order was issued 20 hours before the storm struck the Louisiana coast, less than half the time researchers determined would be needed to get everyone out.

DOJ_NMG_0004129

City officials had 550 municipal buses and hundreds of additional school buses at their disposal but made no plans to use them to get people out of New Orleans before the storm, said Chester Wilmot, a civil engineering professor at Louisiana State University and an expert in transportation planning, who helped the city put together its evacuation plan.

Instead, local buses were used to ferry people from 12 pickup points to poorly supplied "shelters of last resort" in the city. An estimated 50,000 New Orleans households have no access to cars, Wilmot said.

State and local plans both called for extra help to be provided in advance to residents with "special needs," though no specific timetable was prepared. But phone lines for people who needed specialized shelters opened at noon Saturday — barely 30 hours before Katrina came ashore in Louisiana.

Many people from New Orleans ended up staying home or using a "last resort" special needs shelter state authorities and the city health department set up at the Superdome. Those who made it out of town initially found limited space. The state of Louisiana provided shelter in Baton Rouge and five other cities for a total of about 1,000.

In the city of New Orleans alone, more than 100,000 of the city's residents described themselves as disabled in a recent U.S. census.

Early mistakes

Hospitals were exempted from the mayor's mandatory evacuation order. But at least two public hospitals, loaded with more than 1,000 caregivers and patients, had their generators in their basements, which made them vulnerable in a flood. That violated the state's hurricane plan but had gone uncorrected for years because the hospitals did not have the money to fix the situation, a state university hospital official told the Chronicle.

The consequences came to bear in the images hours and days later: Elderly people dying outside shelters and hospitals that were losing power and, finally, their patients. Now, hurricane evacuation experts around the country are asking why New Orleans failed to prepare for the flood scenario from a Category 4 or 5 hurricane.

"Everybody knew about it. There's no excuse for not having a plan," said Jay Baker, a Florida State University associate professor who is an expert in hurricane evacuations and is familiar with New Orleans hurricane studies.

Tami Frazier, a spokeswoman for Mayor C. Ray Nagin, currently working out of Houston, refused to comment on direct questions this week or to answer several written questions sent via e-mail. She cited the need to focus on rescuing citizens and recovering bodies.

Robicheaux, the cancer patient who was trapped in a downtown New Orleans hospital, said he thought the city "decided basically to let it ride."

"When you're in a city like New York and there's a big snowstorm, you expect them to have plows. That's not the way it is here. There are no resources to stockpile supplies."

Saturday evening, Hurricane Katrina had intensified to Category 4, with the possibility that it could strike land as a killer Category 5 storm.

About 8 p.m., Mayor Nagin fielded an unusual personal call at home from Max Mayfield, director of the National Hurricane Center, who wanted to be sure Nagin knew what was coming.

Still, Nagin waited to issue a mandatory evacuation, apparently because of legal complications, said Frazier. She said the city attorney was unavailable for an interview to explain.

But Kris Wartelle, spokeswoman for the attorney general of Louisiana, said state law clearly gives the mayor the authority to "direct and compel the evacuation of all or part of the population from any stricken or threatened area."

"They're not confused about it. He had the authority to do it," Wartelle said.

The mandatory evacuation order came at 10 a.m Sunday.

Former Kemah Mayor Bill King, who has spent years trying to boost funding and organization for hurricanes planning in the Houston-Galveston area, said Nagin's decision to wait to order people out compounded the tragedy.

"To call an evacuation on Sunday morning when the storm was going to hit on Monday morning at 6 a.m. is just ... negligence," King said. "If he'd called it better than that he would have saved lives."

Special-needs evacuation

The Chronicle reviewed Louisiana's Emergency Operations Plan, adopted in 2000. It calls for the establishment of specialized shelters for people with special medical needs. It also recommends that cities use public transportation to evacuate residents if necessary.

The city of New Orleans Comprehensive Emergency Management Plan suggested people develop their own way to get out. "The potential exists that New Orleans could be without sufficient supplies to meet the needs of persons with special considerations, and there is significant risk being taken by those individuals who decide to remain in these refuges of last resort," it says.

DOJ_NMG_0004130

People who called for information on special needs shelters Saturday were directed to sites in Alexandria and in Monroe, La. — cities 218 and 326 miles away. The state scrambled to find 20 ambulances and some specialized vans to pick up fragile residents who needed rides.

"There were transportation systems in place to take people out of New Orleans, which was the preferred solution," said Kristen Meyer, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Hospitals. But she's not sure how many got out.

Some, including Lower 9th Ward resident Lois Rice, a paraplegic, became trapped in their homes when the floodwaters rose. She was rescued after using her air mattress to float into her attic.

Florida, by contrast, for two decades has required counties to establish and maintain permanent databases of "special needs citizens," and arrange rides for people with no transportation. The state also has shelters established for myriad medical conditions.

Florida emergency officials agree that last-minute planning simply doesn't work.

"Unless you planned in advance, it would be a catastrophe," said Guy Daines, a retired Florida emergency manager who is considered an expert in specialized evacuations.

In New Orleans, many people with special medical needs ended up at the last resort shelter in the Superdome.

New Orleans' own special needs evacuation plan, however, says that shelter is "NOT TO BE INTERPRETED AS A GUARANTEE OF SAFETY, and the City of New Orleans is not assuring anyone protection from harm within the facilities that are being offered or opened for this purpose."

"When I saw them loading special needs people into the Superdome the day before the storm, my heart was breaking," said Patti Moss, a Texas nursing professor who has developed a tracking system for such vulnerable citizens here. "They were in the path of the storm."

Two of the city's hospitals dedicated to serving the city's poor, University and Charity hospitals, quickly lost power, according to Leslie Capo, a spokesman for the Louisiana State University health sciences department.

After days in the dark, it took the National Guard, the U.S. Army and a Black Hawk to rescue Robicheaux.

"We had been kind of left on our own and I thought, 'This is a fine thank you,' " he said.

Planning for the poor

In storm-vulnerable Jefferson Parish and New Orleans, the American Red Cross worked before the storm to promote a "buddy system" to encourage everyone without cars to find rides through churches and other organizations.

But in an interview published July 18 in New Orleans City Business, Jefferson Parish hurricane planner Walter Maestri insisted New Orleans needed to do much more for those who didn't have cars.

"New Orleans has a significantly larger population without means of transportation, so it's a much bigger problem for the city. ... The answer is very simple — evacuation," he said.

As Hurricane Katrina approached Sunday morning, New Orleans officials advertised city buses would be used to pick people up at 12 sites to go to the "last resort" shelters.

It's unclear how many buses were used. Planners decided not to use any of the New Orleans school buses for early evacuation, Wilmot said.

Photographers recorded images of them lined up in neat rows and submerged — though one was commandeered by Jabbar Gibson, 20, who ferried 70 passengers to safety in the Reliant Astrodome.

Cut Off At Center Of Crisis, City Officials Faced Struggle To Keep In Touch (WSJ)

By Christopher Rhoads

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- For days after Hurricane Katrina's devastating rampage through this city, a small corps of city leaders holed up at the Hyatt Hotel. They had virtually no way to communicate with the outside world.

A command center set up before the storm stopped working when the backup generator ran out of diesel fuel. Cellphone towers had been knocked out by high winds. Many land lines in the area were unusable.

When emergency power finally returned to the Hyatt, Scott Domke, a member of the city's technology team, remembered that he had recently set up an Internet phone account with Vonage Holdings Corp. He was able to find a working socket in a conference room and linked his laptop to an Internet connection.

At 12:27 a.m. on Wednesday, Aug. 31, the mayor's inner circle made its first outside call in two days. Eventually, the team was able to get eight lines running from the single Vonage account. That evening, the phone rang and it was President Bush calling from Air Force One.

During the first days of Katrina, the besieged mayor's office struggled to stay connected. It was forced to rely on ingenuity and extreme methods, including breaking in to an Office Depot -- as the chief of police stood watch and chased away unofficial looters -- to obtain necessary equipment. The Hyatt group would eventually be forced to move to a higher floor as a gang intent on breaking into its stockpile of food assaulted the hotel.

The tragedy has revealed many ways that the city was unprepared for the storm, flood and chaos that followed, and its communications system was no exception. Greg Meffert, the city's chief technology officer, says that the New Orleans emergency communication plan relied heavily on basic phone service remaining intact. Cellphone backups also failed, and the few older model satellite phones lost battery power and couldn't be recharged. But under duress, Mr. Meffert and his three-member team also found creative ways to cope with the disaster.

Hurricane conditions first hit the city on Saturday, Aug. 27. Mr. Meffert -- whose hats include deputy mayor, the mayor's right-hand man and CTO -- and several of his team and their families had decided the Hyatt, which is a couple of blocks from City Hall, was the best place to hunker down and establish communications for the storm. The hotel was better served with power and food than the city command post. With the mayor and some other officials, including the chief of police, they moved into some conference rooms on the fourth floor and figured they'd be in the hotel for a couple of nights at the most.

Over the next two days, what remained of the city government that had not evacuated before the storm -- a core group of about 15 people -- steadily descended into information darkness.

By the time the eye of Katrina made landfall that Monday morning, the group had already suffered more than 24 hours of hurricane-force winds, including a tornado that ripped off part of one side of the hotel.

"When the tornado rolled over us, you could hear a weird rumbling sound," recalled the 40-year-old Mr. Meffert this week, sitting unshaven behind his desk in City Hall in khaki shorts, a black T-shirt and white tennis sneakers. Army Rangers and other troops ran through the still submerged streets below his window. "You could hear the windows popping out like gunshots," he said.

Mr. Meffert says phone service went out at the Hyatt because of power failures and water damage to the hotel's main switch. After that, the Hyatt team's only available means of communication were police radios. But those were operating at a fraction of capacity because the generator serving the main transmission site broke down. Sometimes dozens of officers were trying to use one channel.

For the most part, city officials relied on "human chains of communication," he says. "It was like: 'Go tell so-and-so if you see them.' "

The team slept on floors and tables in the sweaty conference rooms. Then they figured the worst was over and that communications -- and normality -- would soon return.

Instead, the opposite happened.

On Tuesday, the levee at the 17th Street Canal broke, and water poured into the city, raising the water level by a foot or more every 20 minutes, Mr. Meffert estimates. Within hours, nearby streets were submerged in more than 12 feet of water. Water quickly engulfed the Hyatt and surrounding government buildings. Mr. Meffert and his team spent most of this day helping with rescue efforts, mostly from boats. "We were just pulling [people] from the water," he says.

Mr. Meffert evacuated his wife and two young boys to his parents' home in San Antonio. The evacuation party included the pregnant wife of the chief of police.

That evening Mr. Meffert realized things would get worse unless communications were restored, immediately.

That's when Mr. Domke had his brainstorm. For the next five days, virtually all communications out of New Orleans by the city's top officials depended on Mr. Domke's laptop and this single Internet phone account.

Mr. Meffert, a software entrepreneur before he joined the mayor's office in 2002, realized he needed more lines and more phones to cope with a rapidly deteriorating situation. Before dawn on Wednesday, Messrs. Meffert and Domke and some other aides drove a military Humvee into the darkness and devastation. They were accompanied by the chief of police, Eddie Compass.

Their destination was Office Depot, where they loaded up on phones, routers, printers and fax machines -- anything that was needed to support a government under siege by weather and crime. The store had already been looted of some supplies. While Mr. Meffert was looking for printer cartridges, several looters returned. Mr. Compass, the police chief, roared at the looters and chased them off, says Mr. Meffert.

Mr. Meffert told the chief he needed a large computer server for email. They found the one used by Office Depot in its backroom.

"Do you really need this?" Mr. Meffert says the police chief asked him.

"Yes, we do," Mr. Meffert says he replied.

The server was screwed into an equipment rack in the backroom. Without the use of tools, the chief bent parts of the metal rack and ripped the server out of its housing with his hands, Mr. Meffert says, adding: "I have never seen that before."

DOJ_NMG_0004132

The team was sleeping and working out of a single conference room, called Burgundy D. There were enough cots for five people. Another half-dozen slept on the floor. In one corner, phones, routers, cables and other gear lay in a pile. Dirty blankets and clothes were scattered about.

On Wednesday evening, when Mr. Meffert was manning the phones, one rang. On the other end was President Bush in Air Force One. Mr. Meffert, now wearing the hat of secretary, scribbled down the number and sent someone to find Mayor Ray Nagin.

The mayor later recounted his conversation with the president in an interview with WWL-AM on Thursday. "I told him we had an incredible crisis here and that his flying over in Air Force One does not do it justice," the mayor said.

Later in the interview, conducted over the single Hyatt link, the mayor blasted the response to date. "I need reinforcements, I need troops, man. I need 500 buses, man," he said.

On Thursday morning, Mr. Meffert's team got word that 200 gang members were moving on the Hyatt, apparently aware that it still had food, drink and power. To signify that they were in the gang, members had made a distinguishing rip in their shirts, says Mr. Meffert. An elevated walkway from the Superdome connects to a shopping arcade, which in turn connects to the Hyatt.

Around 10 o'clock that morning, the team evacuated its fourth-floor command post for the 27th floor. The only equipment it brought along was a handful of cordless phones, which had a range of 300 feet. On the 27th floor, where the mayor was staying, the phones worked only if the user hung over the balcony toward the atrium inside the building.

"This was when the last parts of the government were about to come undone," says Mr. Meffert. "It felt like the Alamo -- we were surrounded and had only short bursts of communication."

With Police Chief Compass and other officers blocking the entrance, looters were not able to enter the Hyatt, Mr. Meffert says.

At the same time, water continued to rise around the building. Mr. Domke and Jimmy Goodson, an aide in charge of security for the team, realized that the electronics for the hotel -- upon which the single communication link depended -- were on the ground floor, perilously close to the rising water. They dispatched members of their group to throw sandbags around the electronics room. The water reached within three inches of the room but never damaged the electronics, Mr. Meffert says.

New Orleans had an emergency communications plan, but it had serious flaws. The back-up communications of the city's Office of Emergency Preparedness consisted of a few older model satellite phones, but their batteries went dead and couldn't be recharged, Mr. Meffert says.

In the early stages of the storm, the city's emergency command office, on the ninth floor of city hall, got power from an emergency diesel generator. But by the time the hurricane passed, it had burned up about one third of its fuel. Fuel soon ran out completely and couldn't be replenished.

Meantime, the commercial phone systems that the city relied on blinked out during the storm and its immediate aftermath, according to Mr. Meffert. Land lines went dead in part because of switch and power failures, and city-issued cellphones stopped working after towers were blown down, he says. BellSouth Corp. says that its nearby telecom hub was operative throughout the crisis.

Mr. Meffert says the satellite phones were used in the early stages, but their batteries soon were drained. He tried to recharge one phone, but it wouldn't keep the charge, he says. "It kept flashing 'low bat,' " he recalls.

Mr. Meffert says that the city was unable to spend more on emergency communications because of a budget crisis and cuts in federal aid. But he doubts that additional money would have helped much. "Virtually no city could have ever prepared for something of this magnitude," he says.

When Mr. Meffert arrived at the mayor's office in 2002, budgets were calculated on cheap calculators, he says. Out of 70 major cities in the U.S., the New Orleans municipal Web site was ranked dead last that year in a quality survey.

This past year, Mr. Meffert's team constructed an innovative surveillance bubble over the city consisting of cameras, wireless Internet and software in an attempt to lower the city's record murder rate. Though controversial with civil-rights groups, the system has nearly halved crime in the 20% of the city where it operates, says Mr. Meffert. He distributed BlackBerrys among senior ranks in the government, devices that proved invaluable in this crisis once email resumed working late last week.

In the middle of the chaos several days ago, Mr. Meffert was notified that the city's Web site now ranks No. 1 of those 70 major U.S. cities. The site stayed up throughout the storm because Mr. Domke was able to shift it to a Dallas server.

Toward the end of last week, the "cavalry" began arriving, says Mr. Meffert, in the form of several thousand walkie-talkie phones provided by Sprint Nextel Corp. The phones operate directly between users within short distances, so they do not require cell towers to transmit.

At the same time, a team from computer supplier Unisys Corp. arrived, led by an ex-Army Ranger named Ed Minyard. In addition to providing equipment to begin constructing a wireless network in the Hyatt and City Hall, Mr. Minyard brought some other supplies: bottles of Wild Turkey whiskey.

DOJ_NMG_0004133

"We had the necessary provisions," says Mr. Minyard. "These boys needed it."

La. Lawmaker Rebukes Federal Disaster Response (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — A somber "daughter of the Crescent City" returned to Capitol Hill on Thursday to defend Louisiana's response to Hurricane Katrina and chastise how Washington handled the disaster.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., speaking on the Senate floor for the first time since the disaster, dismissed critics who have blamed local officials. The floodwaters destroyed a family retreat in Slidell and damaged her childhood home in New Orleans.

"It is not true that Louisiana was not prepared," said Landrieu, who defended Democratic Gov. Kathleen Blanco and Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, a Republican. She said both had planned for such a disaster.

"I'm angry that some people in Washington … would blame state and local governments for something that is a federal responsibility," she said in an interview later. "For God's sake, they were trying to make decisions under 10 feet of water."

Other members of Congress, including House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, said that there were failures across the board and that Congress will investigate. "My impression is that the whole system broke down," he said. "While the individual efforts of first responders and volunteers and National Guardsmen have obviously been beyond heroic, it's fair to say the overall response could've and should've been better."

Landrieu, 49, said she returned here to provide "an eyewitness account" and to push for quick aid. She is one of five members of Congress who lost homes.

An heir to one of Louisiana's political dynasties, Landrieu is the daughter of former New Orleans mayor Maurice "Moon" Landrieu. He called her in the Senate cloakroom minutes after her speech.

Landrieu is the oldest of nine siblings. Brother Mitch is lieutenant governor of Louisiana and was with her in a Baton Rouge command center when the storm hit. Despite the pleas of his family, he spent three days in a rescue boat where "he lifted the dead and alive out with his own hands," she said.

But Landrieu, whose husband and two school-age children evacuated unscathed, offered few personal anecdotes Thursday. She focused instead on the Federal Emergency Management Agency and its "incompetent and insulting" response.

Landrieu said the "double tragedy" of a monster hurricane and burst levees could have been avoided, or at least alleviated, if federal officials hadn't denied or underfunded years of requests to improve flood barriers and slow coastal erosion. "Washington rolled the dice and Louisiana lost," she said.

Senator Bears Witness And Bares Emotions (WP)

By Mark Leibovich

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Mary Landrieu returned to Washington yesterday, slogging through a day of official business as if through water.

"If my heart is a little heavy today, it's because I've seen more in the last two weeks than I've seen in my entire life," the Louisiana senator said in a floor speech. She stood at her desk, with colleagues rapt in their seats -- nearly all of them fellow Democrats (on orders from Minority Leader Harry Reid) and at least one Republican (Thad Cochran of Mississippi). Sniffles were audible from the gallery as Landrieu catalogued "what I've seen." Everyone knows what she saw, at least in its wide-angle contours of aerial devastation shots and death estimates.

But there was a vivid sense of otherness to Landrieu's day at the Capitol yesterday. She had the shellshocked bearing of someone who's been in a place difficult to describe. People greeted Landrieu delicately, like a mourner.

"This is all just so surreal," Landrieu said in a brief interview after her speech. She had spent the past 10 days at an Embassy Suites in Baton Rouge after evacuating her family's summer home in Slidell on Lake Pontchartrain, since obliterated. Last she heard, her childhood home in New Orleans was filled with five feet of water. Her mother and father -- the former mayor of New Orleans -- are okay, as are her eight siblings and 44 nieces and nephews. Of the seven Landrieu siblings who live in New Orleans, four had their homes destroyed.

She was reluctant to come back to Washington, Landrieu said. Don't focus on her, she pleaded -- a rare instance of a senator saying something like that and maybe even meaning it. But of course, there was fuss everywhere Landrieu went, the clop-clop-clop of her heels echoing down hallways amid camera clicks, processions of well-wishers, trailing reporters, the whole bit.

Still, she looked strangely isolated, even while Reid lavished praise on her at a late-morning news conference. He kept referring to her as "Mary," and Sen. Chuck Schumer patted her on the back. She barely mustered a smile all day. "Really, this is not about me," Landrieu said later, walking back to her office. "This is about telling the story. The full story."

DOJ_NMG_0004134

Like every public official identified with Katrina, Landrieu has had her moments, good and bad. She publicly thanked federal and local officials on CNN, and received a swift and oft-replayed lecture from anchor Anderson Cooper, who derided her as "a politician." As the week wore on, though, she was spared much of the criticism endured by President Bush, FEMA head Michael Brown, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, among others.

Landrieu managed to avoid an attention-getting outburst at least until Sunday, when she appeared on ABC's "This Week" and said that "If one person criticizes them" -- meaning local officials -- "or says one more thing, including the president of the United States, he will hear from me. One more word about it after this show airs and I might likely have to punch him. Literally."

Landrieu revisited that interview during her 26-minute floor speech yesterday. "I want to be clear for the record in that piece that you all saw with me with George Stephanopoulos," she said. "I was not crying in anguish because the home that I walked out of with my children was gone. I knew it would be gone when I left. It was an anguished plea to the only person that I thought could hear, and that was God Himself."

"I think the last week has definitely changed her," Landrieu's press secretary Brian Richardson said after the speech. "This is probably the most important point in her career."

He corrected himself, saying that this moment isn't about Landrieu, and, of course, it's not. "This is the most important issue of her career," he said, meaning the hurricane.

Landrieu got back to her Capitol Hill home late Wednesday night, in time to take her kids to school yesterday. At 10:45, she attended a brief meeting with Democratic senators in Reid's office. Landrieu was at once gracious and defiant, thanking the president and then -- in her floor speech -- ridiculing his statement last week that no one "anticipated the breach of the levees."

"Everybody anticipated the breach of the levee, Mr. President," Landrieu said. This included the clay figurine, Mr. Bill, from "Saturday Night Live." Landrieu is a friend of Walter Williams, a native of New Orleans and Mr. Bill's creator, and he had deployed the high-voiced and squishable icon in public service announcements about Louisiana's coastal erosion problems before the storm. "How can it be that Mr. Bill was better informed than Mr. Bush?" Landrieu asked in her one hint of a laugh line all day.

No one laughed.

Troops Escalate Urgency Of Evacuation (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 8 -- Outside Kajun's Pub, between the relatively dry French Quarter and the heavily flooded Ninth Ward, bar owner JoAnn Guidos loaded up her 1991 Ford Econoline van with clothing, liquor and other necessities Thursday morning. After holding out for 10 days, Guidos and her friends were finally leaving New Orleans and heading to high ground.

The beer was still cold, thanks to a working generator, and hopes for customers were strong as the flood-ravaged city fills with thirsty soldiers and emergency workers.

But on Wednesday night, Guidos said, armed federal agents identifying themselves as U.S. marshals confiscated her weapons and ordered her and six friends to leave by noon Thursday.

"When you get 15 M-16s pointed at you and they line you up against the wall, it's kind of scary," said Guidos, 55.

With floodwaters continuing to recede and cleanup efforts beginning in earnest, police and the military set out on an aggressive door-to-door campaign here Thursday, urging remaining residents to leave or be removed by force.

The former Big Easy took on the air of a military encampment, as thousands of reserve and active-duty troops began patrolling the city and assisting police in search-and-rescue missions. Houses were marked with codes indicating whether any residents -- living or dead -- were found inside. Emergency workers intensified efforts to divide the city into grids in order to methodically retrieve an unknown number of corpses still in the floodwaters or entombed in ruined homes and businesses.

Although the mayor issued a forcible evacuation order, Louisiana and federal officials said they remained hopeful that most stragglers will leave voluntarily when faced with urgent warnings about dwindling supplies and hazardous floodwaters.

"We need everybody out so we can continue with the work of restoring this city," Vice Admiral Thad W. Allen, the U.S. Coast Guard chief of staff who has taken over the federal response in New Orleans, said early in the day on CBS.

P. Edwin Compass, the superintendent of police, said there are thousands of people remaining in the city but that authorities are determined to get everyone out. He said as little force as necessary would be used but that staying is not an option. Anyone with a weapon, even one legally registered, will have it confiscated, he said.

"No one will be able to be armed," Compass said. "Guns will be taken. Only law enforcement will be allowed to have guns."

The evacuation effort, however, appeared haphazard at best. Affluent areas that were not flooded, such as parts of the Garden District and Uptown, appear to be a low priority for mandatory evacuations.

DOJ_NMG_0004135

In the dry neighborhood of Marigny Triangle, residents lounged in lawn chairs while listening to music blaring from "Radio Marigny," an impromptu outdoor music station. The area remained largely untouched by floodwaters, and residents say they see little reason to leave.

Peter and Amy Bas, who have four children ages 5 to 14, noted that they had already cleaned debris from their street. As the couple relaxed in their front yard, a Louisiana state trooper cruised by and asked if they needed diapers.

"Where are we going to go?" Peter Bas asked. "They're going to take us and put us somewhere with 5,000 other people? We're going to stay."

Amy Bas added: "It could happen, but you think you're living in America and nobody is going to make you leave your home."

Police and the National Guard were aided by hundreds of paratroopers from the 82nd Airborne Division, who canvassed the French Quarter and neighborhoods surrounding the convention center and Superdome.

Active-duty U.S. troops such as the 82nd Airborne lack law enforcement authority in a domestic city such as New Orleans, and therefore must avoid direct involvement in forcibly evicting people. Local police warned that they expected friction with residents as they moved forcefully to pull them out, 82nd Airborne commanders said.

The paratroopers, along with other U.S. soldiers, patrolled parts of the city section by section in boats, trucks and on foot, looking to persuade more stragglers to leave.

"Hey! Evacuation!" Sgt. Geriah McAvin, 27, of Detroit yelled toward a block of red brick apartments as his 82nd Airborne platoon rolled into a flooded housing project in two lumbering, five-ton trucks. "Hey! We're here to take you out of here."

One man on crutches waved to the passing trucks from his front stoop. But when the five-ton circled around to get him, he hesitated.

"You're not taking me to the Superdome?" asked Alfred Jones, 43.

"No Superdome!" Dennison said.

Eventually, Jones gave in, wincing and moaning in pain as the soldiers lifted him onto the truck. Jones, who lived alone, has severe arthritis in his legs and said he had survived with the help of a friend who brought him food. But his friend left a few days ago, and Jones had not eaten for at least a day and he ran out of water on Wednesday. Given his leg condition, waving down a helicopter was out of the question, he said.

With major levee breaks patched earlier this week, and a growing number of pumps sending water into nearby Lake Pontchartrain, the floodwaters appeared to be dropping quickly on Thursday. Drier conditions in many areas allowed crews to step up efforts clearing branches, lumber, bricks and other debris, piling the rubble along roadsides and trolley tracks on St. Charles Avenue and other once-picturesque boulevards.

The Environmental Protection Agency also continued to monitor the foul and polluted floodwater that still covers much of New Orleans, testing for more than 100 kinds of chemicals, according to EPA Administrator Steve Johnson. The fetid water, along with the toxic sediment left behind, is one of the main reasons authorities are so adamant about a full evacuation, officials said.

"The water is unsafe," Johnson said in an interview. "This is not just putting in a couple of water bottles. . . . Ultimately we will do whatever testing is needed to assure ourselves, and the public, that the land and water is safe."

EPA officials hope to begin testing the sediment left in the hurricane's wake as early as next week, but they are waiting for an independent scientific board to approve their soil-testing plan. Johnson said he and others are "not letting bureaucracy get in the way" but are intent on devising a credible scientific approach to the survey.

As of Thursday, the official death toll from Hurricane Katrina rose to 118 in Louisiana and 201 in Mississippi. But those numbers, provided by authorities in charge of processing the dead, contrast wildly with projections and the preparations that are underway.

In Louisiana, a contractor working with the Federal Emergency Management Agency has set aside 25,000 body bags, and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin has said as many as 10,000 people could be dead in the city.

Ten days after the Category 4 storm struck the Gulf Coast, many officials said they still do not know what to expect, nor are they willing to provide projections for a final death toll.

"We're not giving estimates -- we're not looking for a body count," said Melissa Walker, a spokeswoman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, working at the state emergency operations center. "These are individual lives that are lost, and each one of them is important."

One example of the difficulty in obtaining reliable information can be seen in St. Bernard Parish, a devastated area 20 miles southeast of downtown New Orleans. Rep. Charlie Melancon (D-La.) said earlier this week that he was told that as many as 100 people died at a warehouse in Chalmette while awaiting rescue, but Melancon later said that number was incorrect.

DOJ_NMG_0004136

Police Hold Off Use Of Force (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Rescuers and police held back Thursday from their threatened use of force as teams searched New Orleans homes for remaining flood survivors and pleaded with them to abandon the stench-filled city.

Police Superintendent Eddie Compass urged residents to leave and said that at some point police and the National Guard would begin using a "minimal amount of force" to get people to leave.

"We are not going to be tough with these people," Compass said.

Mayor Ray Nagin had said he would order people out of the city if they did not leave.

Helicopters clattered overhead and National Guard troops peered into windows of homes in search of the sick or dying, the dead, and those resisting efforts to evacuate them.

"Certain people are hiding out and are not going to leave," said Adrian Tate, a carpenter with a pit bull dog. "They've got pets, and they ain't leaving them behind."

Some 400,000 homes were without power in New Orleans. Water service was restored to some parts of the city but is not drinkable. The floodwater was falling slowly as pumping continued, with waterlines more than a foot below the high-water mark.

In Mississippi, 203,000 homes and businesses were without power, down from about 800,000 after the hurricane hit. State economists pegged losses to the timber industry at $1.2 billion.

In Texas, a convoy of Mexican army troops bearing relief supplies and medical personnel arrived in San Antonio, marking the first time Mexican troops have entered the United States in more than a century.

Juliette Saussy, New Orleans director of emergency medical services, estimated that "hundreds of bodies" have been recovered.

The official death toll remained about 300.

"We saw a lot of dead people, both in the water and in buildings," said South Carolina game warden Gregg Brown, whose team scoured flooded New Orleans neighborhoods by boat.

Some suggested the final count may not be as horrific as earlier feared.

"I am thinking we are better off than we thought we'd be," said Louisiana state Sen. Walter Boasso, who represents St. Bernard Parish near New Orleans. Parts of that parish still sit under 8 feet of water.

Vice President Cheney toured Louisiana and Mississippi on Thursday. Standing by Louisiana's governor, Democrat Kathleen Blanco, Cheney spoke of how the flooding of New Orleans and the destruction of many communities in the region was "a major tragedy in modern times."

"The positive news is we appear to be making progress," Cheney said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said so far 47,300 people had been rescued and that 235,200 people were housed in 750 shelters.

President Bush declared Sept. 16 as a national day of remembrance for the dead and vowed to help states rebuild.

"The government is going to be with you for the long haul," Bush said.

Katrina Holdouts Yield To Power Of Persuasion (KRT)

By Natalie Pompilio, Susannah A. Nesmith And Martin Merzer

Knight Ridder, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Block after block, door by door, eye to eye, police officers and soldiers edged closer Thursday to extracting the last holdouts from this dying city. Authorities did not wield brute strength - yet - but they employed considerable powers of persuasion.

"The soldier talked to me, and I'm sick, and he told me it would be best if I left to get my treatment," Dale Wolfe Noel, 68, of the Algiers section of New Orleans said after rescuers brought her to a makeshift first-aid center. "They're trying to get me some place good."

More people seemed motivated to leave, having heard the term "mandatory evacuation," and fewer than 10,000 people remained in a metropolis that was home to 485,000 before Hurricane Katrina all but destroyed it.

But some still resisted, and their stubbornness imperiled their lives. They were surrounded by sewage-contaminated floods and sporadic fires, and they had no access to fresh food or pure drinking water.

Thousands were feared dead. Those searching for survivors often found bodies floating in the floods, lying on broken highways or decomposing in previously hidden corners of the city, adding to the health risk and horror-movie reality.

DOJ_NMG_0004137

“I can tell you there have been thousands of bodies," said Dr. Juliette Saussy, director of the city’s Emergency Medical Service.

In Washington, meanwhile, lawmakers moved forward on authorizing more help for the nearly 1 million people displaced - many forever - by Katrina.

The House of Representatives approved and the Senate was moving toward passage of a $51.8 billion special appropriation for disaster relief, just a fraction of the expected ultimate cost to restore lives and rebuild bridges, highways and other vital elements of the region’s infrastructure.

President Bush pledged to help victims cut through red tape to receive governmental assistance, including $2,000 debit cards for each displaced family. He said that more than 400,000 families already have applied for federal aid.

"We have much more work to do," Bush said during a Thursday afternoon address to the nation. “But the people that have been hurt by this storm know that - need to know that - the government is going to be with you for the long haul."

His vice president, Dick Cheney, visited Gulfport, Miss., Baton Rouge and New Orleans, publicly viewing the devastation and privately meeting with managers of the relief effort.

Most of the sludge from the Aug. 29 hurricane had dried to dust by the time Cheney arrived in Gulfport, but he saw piles of debris, fallen tree limbs and concrete slabs where nice homes and immaculate lawns once stood.

Cheney said he learned during his visit that Mississippians need help with insurance issues, housing and emotional healing. Still, he said, “Everybody I've met with was upbeat" and determined to rebuild.

But he was not uniformly welcomed. During a brief press conference in the middle of a Gulfport street, a young man twice shouted obscenities at him before walking away. “Go ---- yourself, Mr. Cheney," the man yelled.

Back in New Orleans, Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said voluntary evacuations were continuing, but the department had not yet forced anyone to leave.

"Once we feel sure that all voluntary evacuations are being completed, then the forced evacuations will take place," he said.

On the streets, authorities - many on loan from distant cities - noted a change in attitude.

“Everyone we're coming across today, they've heard the mayor's announcement about the mandatory evacuation, so they're saying ‘OK’ today," said Deputy Robert Rey of the Bernalillo County, N.M. Sheriff's Department. "A lot of people are ready to go at this point."

At the same time, the urgency of official appeals intensified, often to the edge of orders to leave.

"Y’all weren’t here the day after the storm hit, don’t be rushing us now,” James Savage, 41, told National Guard troops on Chef Menteur Highway in New Orleans.

He wanted to stay and take care of his dog, Snoop, but the soldiers convinced him that they would see to the dog’s care and make sure they were reunited.

“I like the way you handle your business,” Savage told them as he agreed to leave.

In the Lower Ninth Ward, where floodwaters receded and left a foul-smelling muck, troops confronted holdouts, many of whom eventually climbed aboard military trucks, taking a few belongings. They were taken to schools and the convention center.

Many soldiers and police learned there was an art to convincing residents to depart.

As New Orleans Police Officer Anthony Pardo tried to talk an elderly woman into leaving, she bit him on the arm. The bite didn't break the skin, Pardo said, laughing, and he was able to get her in the boat and out of her flooded community.

"She was scolding me and another officer like we were little kids," Pardo said. "But we got her to safety, and that's what matters."

In other developments:

_ Northwest Airlines flight 889 touched down Thursday morning at the Gulfport-Biloxi International Airport, sending an important message to the rest of the country. Ten days after the storm, commercial service finally was restored.

"You can now access the Mississippi Gulf Coast," airport assistant director Ken Spirito said with pride. “We are back.”

_ More than 7,000 evacuees lined up outside Houston’s Reliant Center as the American Red Cross began distributing debit cards worth up to $2,000, a program separate from the federal one. Mounted police patrolled the area.

_ More than 100 demonstrators, rallied by the political action committee MoveOn.org, picketed in front of the White House to protest what they called the inept response to the disaster.

Ann Petrobich, 61, a Katrina victim from New Orleans, walked in the midday sun, carrying a blue and yellow sign reading “Shame” and “Help Hurricane Victims Now.” “Anger doesn’t begin to describe it,” she said.

_ President Bush designated September 16 as a national day of prayer and remembrance for Katrina victims. “Throughout our history in times of testing, Americans have come together in prayer to heal and ask for strength for the tasks ahead,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0004138

Some Holdouts Leave, Others Stay As Authorities Urge Evacuation (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper And Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Weary holdouts trickled out of New Orleans as teams of soldiers, police and medical personnel continued going door-to-door to implore thousands of residents still in the battered city to leave. But receding floodwaters could make some of those hunkered down in their homes more than 10 days after Hurricane Katrina hit even more determined to stay.

Meanwhile, Federal Emergency Management Agency officials, who on Wednesday said the agency would distribute 600,000 debit cards valued at $2,000 each to help victims of Katrina buy food, transportation and other necessities, announced that the cards won't be distributed on a wide scale.

Yesterday, FEMA spokesman David Passey could not elaborate on what he called "confusion" about the debit-card program but said the cards would be given only to people in the Astrodome in Houston. He didn't know whether people there were still getting them yesterday and couldn't say how many total cards had been distributed.

"We've determined normal delivery methods would be more helpful," said Mr. Passey. This was the first time FEMA tried to use debit cards.

In New Orleans, while crews are struggling to close one levee breach that is allowing water to flow into the city from Lake Pontchartrain to the north, water levels are declining in many inundated neighborhoods, including some where houses had been submerged as high as their rooftops.

Some major streets in the Lower Ninth Ward and neighboring St. Bernard Parish, trapped between three cascades of water as the storm barreled past New Orleans, were passable yesterday, though a thick coating of mud remained.

As the floodwaters receded, they also revealed fresh evidence of environmental destruction, including a thick, oily sludge coating trees, houses and roads throughout Meraux, a working-class community just east of New Orleans that is located near oil refineries and storage tanks. Workers in yellow, body-length suits were using squeegees to push the smelly mess into dark piles and load it into tanker trucks.

Still flooded are several residential areas of New Orleans, including the Gentilly, Mid-City and Broadmoor neighborhoods. But key tourist and historic districts such as the French Quarter and Garden District, generally located near the Mississippi River, are dry, and soldiers said many people remain in those areas.

The latest evacuations came as the House and Senate approved an additional $51.8 billion to finance recovery efforts, mostly for FEMA, boosting the federal price tag above $62 billion. on Thursday yesterday. The number of confirmed deaths in Mississippi reached 201, the Associated Press reported. Louisiana's death toll is 118, but that is expected to rise, because many people remain unaccounted for.

Gen. Ron Mason of the National Guard estimated that less than 10,000 people still are in New Orleans. While National Guard troops aren't forcing anyone to leave, they are working with police to cajole stubborn residents to evacuate. Adrian Tate, a 41-year-old carpenter, said he was told by a New Orleans police captain who showed up yesterday morning that city officials have established a jail that will be used to lock up those who refuse orders to leave.

"What we're finding out is most people are willing to leave, especially when they find out the gravity of the situation...and when they find out it will take 80 days to pump the water out," Gen. Mason said. "When they hear that message, they're inclined to leave."

City medical officials said no major health epidemics have yet emerged, but they warned remaining residents not to make skin contact with the stagnant water. Meanwhile, search teams continued canvassing neighborhoods by pounding on doors, looking in windows and yelling to anyone inside. Mr. Tate was persuaded to leave by an infected mosquito bite on his forearm. "I can't get sick, man," he said just before climbing aboard a military truck with five other holdouts.

New Orleans Police Chief Eddie Compass said even relatively dry districts of the city will be cleared at gunpoint if necessary by his 900-person force. "We will be very respectful," he said. He gave no firm date for the forced evacuation, adding that "verbal judo" was the harshest technique currently being used.

In the Lower Ninth Ward, the water seemed to disappear overnight, probably because road-grading equipment had scraped the storm drains the day before.

In Meraux, the smell of petroleum hung thick in the air. Across the highway from a refinery that is surrounded by a residential neighborhood, two men in hazmat suits drained the contents of a battered tanker truck into a canal, using a thick black hose. The canal smelled like gasoline. Asked what they were doing, the men declined to comment. "I got a family, I'm not talking," one man said. Some residential streets up to a half mile away ran about a foot deep with what appeared to be crude oil.

Police Begin Seizing Guns Of Civilians (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0004139

By Alex Berenson And John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 8 - Local police officers began confiscating weapons from civilians in preparation for a forced evacuation of the last holdouts still living here, as President Bush steeled the nation for the grisly scenes of recovering the dead that will unfold in coming days.

Police officers and federal law enforcement agents scoured the city carrying assault rifles seeking residents who have holed up to avoid forcible eviction, as well as those who are still considering evacuating voluntarily to escape the city's putrid waters.

"Individuals are at risk of dying," said P. Edwin Compass III, the superintendent of the New Orleans police. "There's nothing more important than the preservation of human life."

Although it appeared Wednesday night that forced evacuations were beginning, on Thursday the authorities were still looking for those willing to leave voluntarily. The police said that the search was about 80 percent done, and that afterward they would begin enforcing Mayor C. Ray Nagin's order to remove residents by force.

Mr. Bush, in Washington, urged the nearly one million people displaced by the storm to contact federal agencies to apply for immediate aid. He praised the outpouring of private charity to the displaced, but said the costs of restoring lives would affect all Americans, as would the horror of the storm's carnage.

"The responsibility of caring for hundreds of thousands of citizens who no longer have homes is going to place many demands on our nation," the president said in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building. "We have many difficult days ahead, especially as we recover those who did not survive the storm."

As Mr. Bush spoke, Vice President Dick Cheney was touring Mississippi and Louisiana, in part as an answer to the critics who have said that the administration responded too slowly and timidly to the epic disaster. At a stop in Gulfport, Miss., a heckler shouted an obscenity at the vice president. Mr. Cheney shrugged it off, saying it was the first such abuse he had heard.

Also on Thursday, Congress approved a $51.8 billion package of storm aid, bringing the total to more than $62 billion in a week. The government is now spending $2 billion dollars a day to respond to the disaster.

The confirmed death toll in Louisiana remained at 83 on Thursday. Efforts to recover corpses are beginning, although only a handful of bodies have been recovered so far. Official estimates of the death toll in New Orleans are still vague, but 10,000 remains a common figure.

Mississippi officials said they had confirmed 196 dead as of Thursday, including 143 in coastal areas, although Gov. Haley Barbour said he expected the toll to rise.

"It would just be a guess, but the 200 or just over 300 we think is a credible and reliable figure," the governor said on NBC's "Today" show.

He also said electricity would be restored by Sunday to most homes and businesses in the state that could receive it.

No one would venture a prediction about when the lights would come back on in New Orleans.

The water continued to recede slowly in the city 10 days after Hurricane Katrina swept ashore and levees failed at several points, inundating the basin New Orleans sits in.

The Army Corps of Engineers has restored to operation 37 of the city's 174 permanent pumps, allowing them to drain 11,000 cubic feet of water per second from the basin. When all the pumps are working, they can remove 81,000 cubic feet of water per second, said Dan Hitchings of the engineering corps.

It will be months before the breadth of the devastation from the storm is known. But a report by the Louisiana fisheries department calculated the economic loss to the state's important seafood industry at as much as $1.6 billion over the next 12 months.

Louisiana's insurance commissioner, J. Robert Wooley, said the state had barred insurance companies from canceling any homeowner's insurance policies in the days immediately before the storm hit and afterward.

"All cancellations will be voided," Mr. Wooley said.

Across New Orleans, active-duty soldiers, National Guard members and local law enforcement agencies from across the country continued door-to-door searches by patrol car, Humvee, helicopter and boat, urging remaining residents to leave.

Maj. Gen. James Ron Mason of the Kansas National Guard, who commands about 25,000 Guard troops in and around New Orleans, said his forces had rescued 687 residents by helicopter, boat and high-wheeled truck in the past 24 hours.

General Mason said Guard troops, although carrying M-16 rifles, would not use force to evict recalcitrant citizens. That, he said, was a job for the police, not members of the Guard.

"I don't believe that you will see National Guard soldiers actually physically forcing people to leave," General Mason said.

DOJ_NMG_0004140

Mr. Compass, the police superintendent, said that after a week of near anarchy in the city, no civilians in New Orleans will be allowed to carry pistols, shotguns, or other firearms of any kind. "Only law enforcement are allowed to have weapons," he said.

That order apparently does not apply to the hundreds of security guards whom businesses and some wealthy individuals have hired to protect their property. The guards, who are civilians working for private security firms like Blackwater, are openly carrying M-16s and other assault rifles.

Mr. Compass said that he was aware of the private guards but that the police had no plans to make them give up their weapons.

New Orleans has turned into an armed camp, patrolled by thousands of local, state, and federal law enforcement officers, as well as National Guard troops and active-duty soldiers. While armed looters roamed unchecked last week, the city is now calm.

The city's slow recovery is continuing on other fronts as well, local officials said at a late morning news conference. Pumping stations are now operating across much of the city, and many taps and fire hydrants have water pressure. Tests have shown no evidence of cholera or other dangerous diseases in flooded areas.

With pumps running and the weather here remaining hot and dry, water has visibly receded across much of the city. Formerly flooded streets are now passable, although covered with leaves, tree branches and mud.

Still, many neighborhoods in the northern half of New Orleans remain under 10 feet of water, and Mr. Compass said Thursday that the city's plans for a forced evacuation remained in effect because of the danger of disease and fires.

Mr. Compass said he could not disclose when residents might be forced to leave en masse. The city's police department and federal law enforcement officers from agencies like United States Marshals Service will lead the evacuation, he said. Officers will search houses in both dry and flooded neighborhoods, and no one will be allowed to stay, he said.

Many of the residents still in the city said they did not understand why the city remained intent on forcing them out.

Holes In New Orleans Flood Walls Slowly Being Patched (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — “We need more trucks out here.”

Richard Pinner drawls softly into his cellphone, but he means business. It's already midmorning Thursday, and the thousands of tons of rock he needs to block a gaping hole in the London Avenue Canal are nowhere in sight.

The Army Corps of Engineers is leading the effort to drain the vast areas of rotting water covering this city. So far, water levels throughout the city have dropped no more than a foot or two. As the corps' project manager on the canal, Pinner is a point man in the aim to get the water off the streets.

A caravan of dump trucks had made huge progress here the day before, but now the effort isn't going as fast as he'd like. “That's why we have to push … as hard as possible,” he says.

Under a relentless sun and surrounded by diseased-laden waters, Pinner paced the side of the canal for about 12 hours, cajoling contractors to speed up, begging for portable pumps and solving problems.

For Pinner, the effort is personal. His home is several miles east of here.

“I've got about 8 feet of water in my house,” he says. His wife and daughters have relocated to Baton Rogue. The sooner the levees are sealed and the city is pumped out, the sooner Pinner can try to salvage what's left back home.

With the closure earlier this week of a breach in the 17th Street Canal, the Army Corps' efforts to dry out New Orleans have shifted here to London Avenue. The battle was being fought on three fronts.

A crane was driving 60-foot-long steel panels into the muddy canal bottom to block additional water from entering. About 7,000 tons of stone and gravel were being dumped into a levee breach reachable via a narrow gravel road above the waters. Helicopters were dropping hundreds of 7,000-pound sandbags into the second breach, which still cannot be reached by work crews on the ground.

Pinner and Neil Hickok, project manager for Boh Bros. construction company, predicted the first of the two London Avenue breaches will be blocked by this morning. Once that's done, their crews can build a road on the levee to the second breach and close it off, too.

Across the city, crews continued to try to get giant pumps that failed in Hurricane Katrina's wake to come back to life. The corps predicts it could take up to 80 days to drain the city.

The debris clogging pumps could contain human remains, and in some cases that was slowing the recovery effort.

“This is a very deep emotional aspect of our work down there, and we need to make sure we respect as best as possible those remains,” Army Corps spokesman John Rickey said.

DOJ_NMG_0004141

By early afternoon, Pinner has a problem that makes him happy. A backup of more than 50 trucks snakes away from the work site, waiting to dump their loads into the breach.

"Every day we accomplish something else and get closer," he says.

Some Areas Inch Toward Normality (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, September 9, 2005

BILOXI, Miss. — Jarin Pepper, manager of a Firestone auto repair shop, went to work Monday to clean up the mess from Hurricane Katrina. Moments later, somebody stopped and asked him to patch a tire. Then somebody else stopped. Then somebody else.

Instantly, the Firestone shop was unexpectedly open for business and going full blast, mostly repairing tires damaged by storm debris. "Oh, man, has it been busy!" says Pepper, 24.

The skeleton of normality is slowly returning to the Mississippi Gulf Coast, which was smashed by Hurricane Katrina Aug. 29. Vast stretches of the area lie in ruins. Tens of thousands remain homeless, many living in tent cities. The drinking water is unsafe. The grim search for bodies goes on.

In a few patches, however, civil society is being restored thanks to electricity, running water, cellular phones and the extraordinary efforts of business owners and workers. About one in 10 businesses in Biloxi and Gulfport, the area's most populous cities, have reopened. Fewer businesses have come back in hard-hit small towns such as Long Beach, Pass Christian and Bay St. Louis.

Nearly everywhere, each day is noticeably better than the last, and progress can be seen almost hour by hour. Gas lines are almost gone. Workers are locating paychecks. A few ATM machines are working. And the lights are coming on.

The backbone of the recovery is an exhaustive effort by Mississippi Power to restore electricity to southern Mississippi. After the hurricane, none of its 195,000 customers had electricity. The company promises that by Sunday, power will be available to every customer in a building safe enough to use it — about 165,000 in all.

Mississippi Power President Anthony Topazi, 55, made a bold pledge that every customer who could use electricity would have it by Sunday, the fourth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. "We wanted to make that date stand for something positive," he says.

While government struggled to get organized, Mississippi Power deployed a repair force that exceeds the National Guard's presence here. The company recruited 10,000 workers from 23 states and Canada to do the repairs, while Mississippi Power's 1,250 workers handle logistics on their home turf.

The repair workers live mostly in air-conditioned tent cities set up at fairgrounds and military bases. They get two hot meals a day and work long hours installing poles and repairing substations.

The utility's efforts have been so successful that electricity is available in many of the most devastated neighborhoods, even though the homes are uninhabitable.

Hud Garrett, a foreman for Power Line Consultants of Farmington, Mo., watched his crew restore power on Royal Oak Circle in Pass Christian. The neighborhood of expensive homes was deserted. Boats were overturned, houses trashed. "I've never seen this much destruction," Garrett says. But the electricity works.

Dramatic improvements in cellphone service also have removed a sense of isolation and offset the loss of many land lines, making communication imperfect but possible. Cellular South, the state's biggest cellphone company, had all but one of its 54 towers on the coast knocked out during the hurricane. Forty are back up. They handled a record 7 million minutes of use Tuesday.

The company stationed technicians along the coast before the storm and began repairs almost immediately. One technician lost his home, dropped his wife and three kids off at a shelter and fixed a cell tower within hours of storm's end.

"I used the Internet, I called my sister in Georgia and told my boss I'd be in to work tomorrow — all on my cellphone," says Rodney Sanford, 29, a pizza delivery man living in a tent outside his home here.

As power and telephones return, the businesses opening first are the ones needed most: auto repair shops, furniture stores and lumberyards.

Twin Oaks Child Development Center is the only child care center open in Gulfport. It's in a badly damaged area, but the building survived unscathed.

"We had air conditioning and power and water. I said, 'God, there has to be a reason,' " says owner Susan Dosher, 51. She decided to open. She had nine kids Monday, 15 Tuesday, 20 Wednesday and 34 Thursday. The children's parents include doctors, nurses and military personnel involved in the recovery effort.

DOJ_NMG_0004142

Even a few non-essential businesses are open. Mississippi Music of Biloxi opened Tuesday and has had one customer: A woman picked up a trumpet she bought for a grandson, who decided he didn't want to play.

“I think we opened just to feel normal again,” says Dave Roof, 49, a band instrument repairman. “And because I'm on commission,” he adds.

The first restaurants have reopened, causing excitement akin to a celebrity sighting.

El Rancho Mexican Bar & Grill of Biloxi may have been the first restaurant to do so when it opened its doors at 11 a.m. Tuesday. “It was so busy we had to close early because we ran out of food,” says owner Enrique Vanegas, who has worked non-stop to save the business he acquired in November when he moved here from California.

The restaurant had no insurance to fix its hurricane-damaged roof, so Vanegas borrowed money from his employees and drove eight hours to Texas to pick up 100 bundles of shingles. The shingles so burdened his 1998 Ford F150 that he drove back on interstate highways at 45 mph, praying that his truck wouldn't break down.

Neither Vanegas nor his employees had ever been on a roof, but they fixed it the best they could Sunday. When Monday came, the restaurant had no food, so Vanegas drove three hours to Jackson, Miss., to buy lettuce, tomatoes, spices and other ingredients.

“The hurricane changed our lives for the better,” he says. “We appreciate what we have — our employees, our families, our kids — more than ever.”

A few fast-food restaurants opened Wednesday, causing a stir and long lines.

Elton Gary, 43, of Gulfport lost his job at a wax factory. The hurricane blew railroad cars into the building. But he is a happy man because he was near the front of the line when the KFC drive-through reopened.

“It was hot and greasy and tasted good!” he says of his six-piece chicken order. “You don't know how much you like it until you can't eat it.” Thursday, he had a lead on some ribs.

The post-hurricane moment Gary cherishes most is coming home late Tuesday and seeing his porch light on. He sat silently in the car and admired the light.

Then he went inside and turned on the air conditioning, as cold as it could go.

A City That Made An Art Of Funerals Now Just Makes Do (WSJ)

By Steven Gray And Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- A solemn parade of uniformed officials and horses typically marks the funeral of a New Orleans police officer.

But the funeral Wednesday of Sgt. Paul Accardo fell far short of that: No horses. No parade. Not a single uniformed member of the New Orleans police department in attendance. The flooding of New Orleans meant that Sgt. Accardo, a New Orleans police spokesman who shot himself to death Saturday, was eulogized 75 miles away, in Baton Rouge. Nor did the body then proceed to the New Orleans cemetery where Sgt. Accardo wanted to be buried. Some family members and friends wore T-shirts to the funeral because their Sunday clothes were ruined in the flood.

"This isn't his city," said Cpl. Don Kelly, police spokesman in Baton Rouge.

Few cities bury their dead in the high style of New Orleans, where funerals can last a week, feature jazz bands as well as parades and draw bigger crowds than weddings do. But those traditions are, for the time being, yet another casualty of Hurricane Katrina. The same flood that ended so many lives in New Orleans shut down most of the city's institutions of death -- its funeral homes, churches and cemeteries. It also scattered the crowds that make New Orleans funerals so extraordinary.

For thousands of survivors, this loss could complicate the effort to accept the death of a loved one. "It means the end of the world to these people if they can't bury their dead in the traditional manner," says Larry Moore, general manager of the Rabenhorst Funeral Home in Baton Rouge.

Yesterday, a woman, her daughter and son-in-law held a short funeral service for the woman's husband, a 59-year-old man who died in the aftermath of the storm. Unable to reach family members displaced in the evacuation of New Orleans, the three sat alone sobbing in a small chapel at Mothe Funeral Home in suburban Harvey, as Boyd Mothe, a funeral-home official read the 23rd Psalm. Mr. Mothe, who described the service, wouldn't identify members of the family by name.

They had held the hastily arranged service to beat the local government's order that residents leave by the end of the day.

The woman had returned to Jefferson Parish on Monday, only to find her husband dead in their home, where he had stayed behind while the others headed to Houston as the storm approached. It's likely he died of asphyxiation from the exhaust of his electric generator. "She started to cry as she was telling me she didn't want to have to cremate him because of the condition of the body," says Boyd Mothe, whose family-run company runs 13 funeral homes in the region, several of which are still flooded.

DOJ_NMG_0004143

In the end cremation wasn't necessary, and the body was interred before noon at Westlawn Memorial Park and Mausoleum.

Among the biggest adherents of the New Orleans funeral tradition are those most affected by Hurricane Katrina: impoverished blacks whose burial processions often feature parades and jazz bands. Some scholars have traced these so-called jazz funerals back to Africa. Duke University professor Karla F.C. Holloway says slaves brought to America held burial processions involving call-and-response chants and musicians beating drums and tambourine-like instruments to help the dead on their way to heaven.

"The slaves in New Orleans would always accompany the dead to the burial site with rejoicing, because the rejoice was a release into a different kind of spiritual world, an ancestral world, which mixed with the Christian idea of being released into heaven," says Dr. Holloway.

In recent years, the tradition took a turn, when street gangs adopted the ritual to bury their murdered members. Then, the tradition gained a hip-hop quality. One of the biggest jazz funerals in recent years was for James "Soulja Slim" Tapp, an up-and-coming rapper who was fatally shot on his mother's front lawn. Soulja Slim's jazz funeral in 2003 sent thousands into the city's streets.

So deeply connected are music and death in New Orleans that the Web site of the Orleans Parish Coroner features the sound of its chief, Frank Minyard, playing the jazz trumpet.

But Katrina began wrecking that tradition even before making landfall. Death notices published in the days before the hurricane arrived struck tentative notes. "The service for Jennie is contingent on the current storm conditions," read the obituary for 63-year-old Jennie Marie Latino, who was scheduled to be buried on the morning Katrina hit New Orleans.

Now, the dead in New Orleans include some corpses that were already lying in funeral homes before the storm hit. Some funeral homes are under water, says Gene Walters, executive director of the Louisiana Funeral Directors Association.

Some funeral homes evacuated their dead. The Mothe chain moved about 10 bodies to the Jefferson Parish Forensics Center, a new facility with plenty of refrigeration capacity. The center is now storing nearly 200 bodies of people who failed to survive the aftermath of the storm.

Tradition in New Orleans calls for open caskets. But the bodies still lying in the flooded wreckage of New Orleans won't be viewable.

Once rescue workers turn their attention from the living to the dead, corpses will be brought to a refrigerated warehouse put up after the hurricane by federal officials outside New Orleans. But already, coroners' offices across Louisiana are filling up with the dead from New Orleans, most of them people who failed to survive the evacuation. "We had four buses pull into town with DOA's among the evacuees," says Sherry Basco of the Rapides Parish Coroner's Office, a nearly four-hour drive from New Orleans.

Several coroners' offices are fielding double their usual number of fatalities, says Randolph Williams, president of the Louisiana Coroners' Association.

Funeral directors around New Orleans are receiving calls from coroners' offices far and wide, reporting the deaths of evacuees who had wished to be buried in New Orleans. But Mr. Walters of the state funeral directors' association says those wishes are going unfulfilled because of the flooded condition of New Orleans cemeteries which are above ground. They were designed that way because the city is largely below sea level. "We're recommending that these people be entombed in holding crypts, until the dead can return to New Orleans, he says.

Holding crypts and refrigeration could preserve not only the dead but also the tradition of New Orleans funerals, but not now. And not with the sheer number of Katrina victims.

In an average year, Louisiana buries 44,000 bodies. Nobody knows how many now lie in the waters of flooded New Orleans.

Standing In The Way Of A Good Story (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

When NBC anchor Brian Williams and his crew were trying to take pictures of a National Guard unit securing a Brooks Brothers shop in downtown New Orleans, a sergeant blocked the footage by ordering them to the other side of Canal Street.

"I have searched my mind for some justification for why I can't be reporting in a calm and heavily defended American city and cannot find one," Williams said yesterday. "I don't like being told when I can and cannot walk on the streets and take pictures."

But he grumbled and told his crew to stop shooting Wednesday, Williams said, because "authority in New Orleans is as good as the last person to make the rule. I didn't have time to take it up the chain."

DOJ_NMG_0004144

As rescue and recovery efforts continue in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, reporters and press analysts are growing increasingly critical of restrictions on media access. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, under heavy journalistic fire for its slow response to the disaster, has sparked new criticism by asking news organizations not to take pictures of bodies being recovered in Louisiana and Mississippi.

FEMA spokesman Mark Pfeifle said yesterday that the agency "has asked that those images not be shown," but that this is only a request. "Our main desire is to avoid unfortunate situations where a family member waiting for news of a loved one would find out about their passing from a newspaper or watching television," he said.

Some Louisiana officials, whether taking their cue from FEMA or not, are attempting to make the policy mandatory. Washington Post reporter Timothy Dwyer said he heard a sergeant from a state agency telling a camera crew allowed on a boat in a flooded area near downtown New Orleans: "If we catch you photographing one body, we're going to bring you back in and throw you off the boat."

The irony, Dwyer said, was that two bodies -- one in a black bag, the other covered by a blue quilt -- were visible on the off-ramp of Interstate 10 that the boats were using as a staging area.

Television networks have continued to show some bodies, as they have since the hurricane struck, but often covered or in body bags, so identification is not an issue.

There have been other moments of tension. At a fire near the French Quarter, Williams noted in a posting on NBC's Web site, a police officer from out of town "raised the muzzle of her weapon and aimed it at members of the media . . . obvious members of the media . . . armed only with notepads." He also noted that the National Guard is barring journalists from the city's convention center and Superdome, the very facilities that evacuees were barred from leaving last week.

"I saw many fingers on triggers," Williams said yesterday, producing such a sense of being in a foreign land that he repeatedly caught himself saying, "When I get back to the States."

Aly Colon, who teaches ethics at the Poynter Institute for Media Studies, said that while journalists should not interfere with rescue work, "at a time like this, the more opportunity the news media has to tell the story the better. People are hungry for information that helps them know as independently as possible what's going on."

Alex Jones, who runs the Shorenstein media center at Harvard, said that while news outlets should not show the deceased until relatives are notified, reports of limited access are "very disturbing":

"There's a reasonable belief that part of the wish to restrict access is rooted in image and public relations. The history of this administration has been very intensely to control the information and control the message. They did that in Iraq and during the Afghanistan war."

The Pentagon had barred photographs of flag-draped caskets returning from Iraq, but after releasing some under Freedom of Information Act requests, agreed last month to quickly release more in settling a lawsuit by University of Delaware professor and former CNN correspondent Ralph Begleiter.

"You cannot report on the disaster and give the public a realistic idea of how horrible it is if you don't see that there are bodies as well," Rebecca Daugherty of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press told Editor & Publisher.

Pfeifle said FEMA has barred reporters and photographers from some rescue and patrol boats, but on a case-by-case basis. "We have had to make decisions that we don't take press along because it takes up room that could be occupied by disaster workers or someone being rescued," he said.

State and local authorities have often blocked journalists from entering shelters, although interviews with evacuees often take place outside them. Pfeifle defended the approach on privacy grounds, saying, "This is their home."

Some Urge Greater Use Of Troops In Major Disasters (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

The breakdown of local and state agencies that tried to respond to Hurricane Katrina has spurred fresh debate about whether disasters of such magnitude ought to be turned over to the U.S. military and other federal authorities to manage at the outset.

National plans developed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks rest on the notion that police, fire and other emergency groups are best positioned to serve as first responders. Federal agencies are supposed to function as backup to state and local ones, and military forces are meant to play a largely supporting role to civilian authorities.

But Katrina showed what can happen when the foundation of this organizational structure is quickly overwhelmed and disintegrates, according to government officials and independent analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0004145

"The would-be first responders at the state and local level were themselves victims in very large numbers," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said at a news conference this week. As a result, "we had a situation that was distinctly different than in past events of this type."

Rumsfeld and other senior administration officials this week have resisted entering a public discussion of alternative approaches, insisting that the focus for now stay on cleaning up after Katrina. President Bush and congressional leaders have promised investigations into what went wrong in the response to the hurricane's devastation.

But Rumsfeld said the government would likely address again the question of "lead responsibility" for the Defense Department in disaster response. He noted that the issue was critical not only in responding to a natural catastrophe but also to a terrorist attack, because reliance on local authorities has been the basis of emergency planning in both cases.

Some homeland defense specialists have argued since Katrina struck that national plans must be revised to provide for a bigger and faster federalized effort, particularly in large-scale disasters.

"Only the federal government can mobilize a national response to catastrophic disasters," said James Carafano of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "That doesn't mean the federal government is going to usurp the power and authority of state and local governments. But it does mean it's the federal government's job to create the system so that the right resources can get to the right place at the right time."

There is no guarantee that a greater federal role would improve response. Both the Pentagon and the Federal Emergency Management Agency have been widely faulted for not grasping quickly enough the scope of Katrina's damage and not committing sufficient people, supplies and equipment early on.

Historically, practical as well as legal considerations have favored relying on leadership at the grass-roots level.

"The police and fire departments and local emergency-service people are, by definition, the first ones on the scene," said H.K. Park, a former defense official who worked on homeland security issues during the Clinton administration. "And they have the advantage of knowing their communities.

"There's also a legal dimension," he added, "involving states' rights versus federal rights."

Further, military forces remain constrained from a domestic law enforcement role by the 1878 Posse Comitatus Act. Though the Pentagon has committed more than 8,000 active-duty Army and Marine troops and about 10,000 sailors, it has made it clear that these forces will not perform police functions.

National Guard troops, now numbering more than 46,000, constitute a far larger share of the military presence in the disaster area. They bring two main advantages. First, they possess medical, engineering, communication and logistical skills required in relief work. Second, Guard units, when operating under the command of state governors, are not limited by Posse Comitatus.

Any move to assign greater responsibility to the Pentagon for domestic emergency management is likely to face resistance, particularly since the armed forces are already strained by the conflict in Iraq. Commanders remain sensitive to the notion of U.S. troops becoming an occupying force in their own country.

When Guard forces arrived in New Orleans late last week, Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, who is overseeing military operations in the region, ordered them to point their rifles down to reinforce the message they had come to provide assistance, not occupy the city.

Politically, too, the idea of an enhanced federal role may be a hard sell to some local and state officials if it means diminishing their authority. Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco resisted a Bush administration effort last week to exert federal control over all local police and state National Guard units.

Some experts also contend that an attempt to federalize a relief effort could backfire, resulting in less flexibility rather than more.

"You don't want to federalize the Guard," Park warned. "When Guard forces are controlled by the governor, they can engage in law enforcement duties. When federalized, they are subject to Posse Comitatus."

But Carafano and others argue that major disasters require a different approach, with only the federal government able to provide the resources and coordination necessary to manage a catastrophic event.

The problem, Carafano said, is that officials at all levels of government have appeared more inclined to focus on preparing for smaller disasters. As a result, much of the increased funding for emergency-response activities in recent years has gone toward equipment useful to local agencies, such as new fire trucks or protective fencing, that are of little value when overwhelming disasters strike.

"The money should have gone towards the things that enable local and state authorities to plug into a national system -- things like communications, emergency operations centers, training," he said. "All of these would have enabled the mayor of New Orleans to better communicate his needs."

DOJ_NMG_0004146

Who Should Call The Cavalry If Katrina Calls? (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

"When you fly over the Gulf, it looks like a WMD exploded," Assistant Secretary of Defense Paul McHale told me this week. "Katrina very nearly approached the operational requirements of a WMD event; this was the first test of the high-end capability envisioned by the strategy."

The "strategy" is a three-month-old document called "Strategy for Homeland Defense and Civil Support." It describes the Defense Department's plans to defend the U.S. from a WMD attack or deal with the rubble and mass casualties of such an attack. Traditionally DoD has always helped civil authorities contend with the ruin of natural disasters. That Katrina's massive scale mirrored a WMD attack, obliterating a city, is a coincidence. But it raises the question of whether the states, or relatively vulnerable states like Louisiana, are up to the job of being "first responders" to a WMD attack or its natural equivalent. If they are not, we need to change some laws.

The popular impression left the past week -- that the government was wholly unprepared for Katrina -- is not true. Significant U.S. military assistance was on alert throughout the week prior to Katrina's landfall. Why those highly trained and drilled assets did not move into New Orleans sooner is a question that should now sit at the center of a debate over who should have the authority -- the states or the federal government -- to be the "first mover."

According to accounts provided by several sources involved with preparations for Katrina, the Pentagon began tracking the storm when it was still just a number in the ocean on Aug. 23, some five days before landfall in Buras, La. As the storm approached, senior Pentagon officials told staff to conduct an inventory of resources available should it grow into a severe hurricane. Their template for these plans was the assistance DoD provided Florida last year for its four hurricanes.

And a week earlier than this, Defense Secretary Rumsfeld issued an executive order delegating hurricane decision authority to the head of the Northern Command, Adm. Timothy J. Keating. Four days later, as the tropical storm soon to be named Katrina gathered force, Adm. Keating acted on that order.

Before the hurricane arrived in New Orleans, Adm. Keating approved the use of the bases in Meridien, Miss., and Barksdale, La., to position emergency meals and some medical equipment; eventually the number of emergency-use bases grew to six. And before landfall, Adm. Keating sent military officers to Mississippi and Louisiana to set up traditional coordination with their counterparts from FEMA. As well, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England ordered the movement of ships into the Gulf.

By the Pentagon's account, it carried out these preparations without any formal Katrina-related request from FEMA or other authorities. The personnel behind the massive military effort now on display in Louisiana -- airlift evacuation, medical, supply, and the National Guard -- was on alert a week before the hurricane. According to Assistant Secretary McHale, "The U.S. military has never deployed a larger, better-resourced civil support capability so rapidly in the history of our country."

So where were they on the two days of globally televised horror? Why, for instance, didn't DoD fly all this help close to New Orleans as soon as it saw Katrina coming? The answer, in military argot, is that you don't deploy troops beneath a bombing run; Katrina predictably would have wiped out any help put in her uncertain path, just as she rolled over the Big Easy's wholly unprotected "first responders."

Then there's American history, tradition and law. Once disaster arrives, several federal laws designed to protect state sovereignty from being swept aside by a Latin-American-style national police force dictate that a state's officials, specifically the governor, is supposed to phone the federal government and describe what they need. If asked by Homeland Security, DoD will send in the cavalry. But this is one audible at the line even Don Rumsfeld doesn't get to call.

Post-mortem investigations will surely recreate, minute by minute, how Louisiana Gov. Blanco and Homeland Security Chief Chertoff idled away their time last week. But it appears now that Gov. Blanco did not make that crucial, early, legally mandated call to the President. Absent that, FOX and CNN became the call to the White House. The media message was "do something!" In fact, the president does have "do-something" authority. It's called the Insurrection Act, which is what John Kennedy used in 1963 against Gov. George Wallace, ordering the governor's own National Guard to turn against him and forcibly integrate the University of Alabama. As to the looters, who were breaking no evident federal law, the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878 explicitly forbids using the military (unless a governor uses her National Guard under "state status") in a domestic police function.

The question raised by the Katrina fiasco -- and by the Pentagon's new Homeland Defense Strategy to protect against WMD attack -- is whether the threat from madmen and nature is now sufficiently huge in its potential horror and unacceptable loss that we should modify existing jurisdictional authority to give the Pentagon functional first-responder status. Should we repeal or modify the Posse Comitatus Act so homicidal thugs have more to fear than the Keystone Kops? Should a governor be able to phone the Defense Secretary direct, creating a kind of "yellow-light authority" and cutting out the Homeland Security or FEMA middleman? Should presidential initiative extend beyond the Insurrection Act?

DOJ_NMG_0004147

Instinct says the answer is forever no. Survival suggests we had better talk about it.

A Native Son Takes Charge In Gulf Coast (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

CAMP SHELBY, MISS. - He's known for his searing one-liners; a relentless schedule that allows only two hours of sleep a night; and a growly, commanding presence. He's also in charge of the military's response to hurricane Katrina. If that superstorm now rivals the 9/11 terror attacks on the scale of national disasters, then First Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honoré has emerged as the Rudy Giuliani of the Gulf Coast.

A rough-talking Louisiana native, he is credited with changing the character of the relief effort from a mad scramble to an increasingly orderly and effective rescue and restoration. But General Honoré is also having to navigate a fine line between necessary leadership and the specter of federal troops using force against American citizens. So far, he appears to have succeeded.

"This is a particularly urgent situation and it looks like the military is the only thing that's functioned in this entire mess," says Michael Greve, an expert at the American Enterprise Institute, a Washington, D.C., think tank. "Once they arrived, things turned around."

In fact, a SurveyUSA poll of 1,200 Americans this week voted General Honoré as the most effective leader of the relief operation, ahead of Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and, at the bottom of the list, Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).

Running on a couple of hours' sleep a night, Honoré brings an unbridled passion to his job, challenging subordinates to keep up, his aides say. "The name fits: If he's not Honoré, he's ornery," says one volunteer.

"He's less a man than a force of nature," says his battle captain, Maj. John Rogers. "He knows the way and that's why he's leading. If you wonder whether God has a role in this relief effort, General Honoré is proof: He's the right man for the job."

The general himself talks of Katrina - which caused potentially thousands of fatalities, displaced an estimated 1 million people, and wrecked at least 140,000 homes - as an enemy. "It was a classic military attack," he says here at Camp Shelby, the US Northern Command forward headquarters in the Katrina effort. "He destroyed communications and moved barges across roads. He created shock and paralysis."

Currently, the Department of Homeland Security, through FEMA, is running the operation, and the Army gets its orders from DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff. But it's the Humvees, five-ton trucks, and the spirit of the leader that are changing attitudes on the ground, and are largely responsible for bringing a sliver of hope to the shell-shocked victims of Katrina - and bolstering weary relief workers. Willing to get into even the dirtiest task, the general has, by force of personality, changed the pace of the operation as he zips by helicopter from New Orleans to Biloxi, from Gulfport to the canteen of the USS Iwo Jima tied up to the New Orleans docks. His energy is infectious. "There's hope in his message," says Lt. Col. John Cornelio.

As head of the First Army, the job fell to him. Before heading up First Army, the 34-year infantryman had done everything from commanding troops in Korea to developing readiness plans for improvised explosive devices in Iraq. The fact that he's a black Cajun, one of 11 children from Lakeland, La., hasn't hurt his efforts in dealing with the large numbers of blacks along the Gulf Coast. His daughter, out of town during the storm, and extended family live in and around New Orleans.

The general has become the man everybody wants to talk to, from Ted Koppel to Defense Secretary Rumsfeld. On Thursday morning, Sen. Trent Lott managed to secure a piece of his time for a quick debrief. But his aides say Honoré isn't immune to exhaustion, and they spend much of their time protecting him. "He can snap in a minute," one aide explained.

A man of a thousand one-liners, Honoré has told soldiers to keep their guns down: "This isn't Iraq." Aides-de-camp says he knows how to cut through the thickets of famously murky Louisiana politics. At a recent staff meeting here at Camp Shelby, he growled, "We're not stuck on stupid." It became the saying of the day, written on a bulletin board.

Sometimes the comments sting, and more than one National Guardsman - especially the men who weathered the storm with the masses in the chaotic Superdome - has bristled at his commands and wondered about the source of his authority. But most soldiers - and, in turn, the vast numbers of volunteers and rescuers - seem invigorated by his drive.

"Soldiers like to see leaders who are more 'Do as I do' than 'Do as I say,' " says Staff Sgt. Sharon McBride, who is bivouacked at Camp Shelby. "During a time like this, everybody is looking for someone who has that authority."

Still, some experts say the potential for a backlash against troops can happen if the demands of the natural disaster recede and restlessness or lawlessness rise.

DOJ_NMG_0004148

The presence of an active-duty three-star general overseeing 18,000 troops inside the United States in a pocket of scattered unrest is a test of posse comitatus, or "power of the county." Congress enacted the idea after the Civil War at the behest of Southern senators to end the occupation of the South by the US Army.

"There are things that can happen that would become a real ugly picture," says Craig Trebilcock, a York, Pa., lawyer and judge advocate general in the Army Reserve. "It's a real tightrope act."

So far, Honoré has walked it, declining this week to forcibly remove the 10,000 people still in New Orleans. "That is not something for federal troops," he says. "We're doing what we can today and tomorrow to help people and save lives."

Storm Leaves Legal System A Shambles (NYT)

By Peter Applebome And Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 8 - At Rapides Parish Detention Center 3 in Alexandria, which normally holds convicted felons, there are now 200 new inmates who arrived hot, hungry and exhausted on buses this week after being evacuated from flooded jails in New Orleans.

They have no paperwork indicating whether they are charged with having too much to drink or attempted murder. There is no judge to hear their cases, no courthouse designated to hear them in and no lawyer to represent them. If lawyers can be found, there is no mechanism for paying them. The prisoners have had no contact with their families for days and do not know whether they are alive or dead, if their homes do or do not exist.

"It's like taking a jail and shaking it up in a fruit-basket turnover, so no one has any idea who these people are or why they're here," said Phyllis Mann, one of several local lawyers who were at the detention center until 11 p.m. Wednesday, trying to collect basic information on the inmates. "There is no system of any kind for taking care of these people at this point."

Along with the destruction of homes, neighborhoods and lives, Hurricane Katrina decimated the legal system of the New Orleans region.

More than a third of the state's lawyers have lost their offices, some for good. Most computer records will be saved. Many other records will be lost forever. Some local courthouses have been flooded, imperiling a vast universe of files, records and documents. Court proceedings from divorces to murder trials, to corporate litigation, to custody cases will be indefinitely halted and when proceedings resume lawyers will face prodigious - if not insurmountable - obstacles in finding witnesses and principals and in recovering evidence.

It is an implosion of the legal network not seen since disasters like the Chicago fire of 1871 or the San Francisco earthquake of 1906, events in times so much simpler as to be useless in making much sense of this one.

"There aren't too many catastrophes that have just wiped out entire cities," said Robert Gordon, a professor at Yale Law School who teaches legal history.

The effects on individual lawyers vary, from large firms that have already been able to find space, contact clients and resume working on cases, to individual lawyers who fear they may never be able to put their practices back together. But the storm has left even prominent lawyers wondering whether they will have anything to go back to.

William Rittenberg, former president of the Louisiana Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and a lawyer for 35 years in New Orleans, said he had spent the time since the storm living like a gypsy with his wife and two dogs, moving from Columbus, Miss., to Houston to San Antonio. Mr. Rittenberg said that his firm's main client had been the teachers union for the New Orleans schools, but that there is no way to know when or if school will resume this year.

"I really don't know if I have a law practice anymore," he said.

Some logistical issues are being addressed as the courts scramble to find new places to set up shop. The Louisiana Supreme Court is moving its operations from New Orleans to a circuit court in Baton Rouge. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit is moving to Houston, and electronic technology has allowed lawyers and courts to save files and documents in a way that would have been impossible in the past.

But the biggest immediate problem is with criminal courts in southern Louisiana, with thousands of detainees awaiting hearings and trials who have been thrust into a legal limbo without courts, trials, or lawyers.

So in Alexandria, a city in central Louisiana, in a scene repeated at prisons and jails throughout the state, Ms. Mann said she and other lawyers had interviewed all 200 inmates, and the criminal defense lawyers' organization was painstakingly trying to compile a registry of prisoners and lawyers. The goal is to put them together, though many of the prisoners do not yet have lawyers and many of the lawyers are scattered across the country.

Ms. Mann said that some prisoners, no doubt, were accused of serious crimes, but that most had been arrested on misdemeanor charges like drunkenness that typically fill local lockups. Most were either awaiting hearings or had not been able to make bond and were awaiting trial, which, for many, had been set for the day the hurricane hit.

DOJ_NMG_0004149

"I talked to one guy who was arrested for reading a tarot card without a permit," she said. "These are mostly poor people. They haven't been in contact with their family. They have no word at all. A lot of them are pretty devastated. You had a lot of grown men breaking down and boohooing when you talked to them. The warden said they hadn't had food or water for two or three days. So a lot of them were just grateful to be out of the sun, in an air-conditioned place where they could find food and a shower and a mattress."

In addition to the logistical problems of setting up courts, finding a place to meet, and getting judges, lawyers and evidence, a major question looms about how to pay for the defense of indigent detainees. Louisiana has been in a low-grade crisis for years over the issue, and currently two-thirds of the money to defend those too poor to afford lawyers comes from court costs for traffic and parking offenses.

But with the evacuation of New Orleans and its environs, none of that money will be available.

Legal officials say that without a quick resolution of the problem the state may be forced to apportion cases to public defenders on a level that makes adequate representation impossible or to free prisoners rather than violate their constitutional right to a speedy trial.

More than a week after the storm, not all the news is bad. Some law firms, particularly larger ones with offices outside New Orleans, have reorganized with remarkable speed, saving records electronically, finding new space and housing for lawyers in Baton Rouge Lafayette, Houston, or other areas.

Lawyers at McGlinchey Stafford, a firm of about 200 lawyers based in New Orleans and with offices in Baton Rouge and other cities, were among the lucky ones. The lawyers, support staff and their families left New Orleans in advance of the storm as partners in its Baton Rouge office worked to find them housing and office space, said Rudy Aguilar, managing partner of the firm.

After the storm, Mr. Aguilar said, the firm put two college students whose parents worked for the firm on a plane to Chicago to buy computers for the new office space. The students rented a truck and drove the computers back to Baton Rouge for the new office, which by Labor Day was up and running, he said.

Within days, Rick Stanley of Stanley, Flanagan & Reuter, an 11-lawyer litigation firm had people working in borrowed space in offices in Baton Rouge and Lafayette and at homes in Jackson, Miss., and Amarillo, Tex. On Labor Day, Mr. Stanley signed a lease for new space in Baton Rouge on the hood of his car in a Home Depot parking lot.

"The Monday of the storm," he said, "I was in a state of shock, realizing the whole way of life we knew had passed away, and Tuesday I just said we need to get back up and running, and we did."

And some say, with the perverse logic of the law, Hurricane Katrina - months from now, when people return home - will spawn an unimaginable flood of legal issues. Beth Abramson who is organizing pro bono efforts for the state bar anticipates a torrent of legal issues having to do with ruined property, insurance, environmental issues and countless other concerns.

Michelle Ghetti, a law professor at the Southern University Law Center in Baton Rouge said some courts and lawyers moved faster than she could have imagined to shift operations and resume business. On the other hand, the legal issues posed by the storm multiply almost daily.

"Someone just mentioned child molesters," Ms. Ghetti said. "There's a registry in which people are supposed to be notified where they are. But for all we know, they're in shelters or being taken into people's homes.

"New things come up every day. I think this storm is going to produce more legal issues and complications than anyone has ever imagined."

Louisiana Legal System Is Snarled (WSJ)

By Thomas M. Burton

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Hurricane damage has cast the Louisiana legal system into disarray, with courts and cases suspended or relocated, criminal and civil evidence imperiled or destroyed, and lawyers relocated around the U.S. desperately seeking work.

The extent of the destroyed evidence and lawsuit files remains uncertain, as several courts remain inaccessible or under water. But because of the damage, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco this week issued an order suspending all state civil-court deadlines, such as statutes of limitations dictating when cases must be filed, at least through Sept. 25.

Many civil and criminal trial courts have suspended operations in the parishes, or counties, in the New Orleans area. The federal district court in New Orleans says it is "closed until further notice" and that it hopes to reopen in three locations -- Houma, Baton Rouge and Lafayette, La. The Louisiana Supreme Court has moved to Baton Rouge, and the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has shifted temporarily to Houston.

"There could be damage to the court records or filings, but we just don't know," said Robert E. Kleinpeter, president of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association, referring to several New Orleans-area courts.

DOJ_NMG_0004150

Michelle Ghetti, a law professor at Southern University Law Center in Baton Rouge, said that various Louisiana prosecutors met via conference call Thursday in part to discuss the extent of damage to criminal-case evidence. In an email to law colleagues, Prof. Ghetti recently wrote that courts "in as many as eight parishes/counties are under water, as well as three of our circuit courts, with evidence/files at each of them ruined."

As for criminal courts, most law-enforcement authorities have been preoccupied with maintaining the peace as much as they can, and haven't had a chance to focus on courts or evidence. The damage to records and briefs at many law firms is expected to be immense. Tom Alexander of CLC Inc., a legal-referral company, said, "There are a lot of large law firms that are not going to be able to recover their files."

Katrina Leaves Louisiana Criminal Justice System In Disarray (KRT)

By Brad Townsend And Lee Hancock, Dallas Morning News

Knight Ridder, September 9, 2005

DALLAS - (KRT) - Hurricane Katrina has turned Louisiana's legal system upside down.

The Louisiana Supreme Court building was flooded and many critical files and evidence boxes are presumably destroyed. City and district court buildings in neighboring parishes have been similarly hit.

Lawyers and judges alike are scrambling to answer previously unimaginable questions: What will happen to pending cases? What about the out-on-bail defendants, witnesses and even law-enforcement officials who are among the several hundred thousand evacuees sprinkled throughout the country, many in Texas?

Judge Patrick Higginbotham said his formerly New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals will be back in business in Houston by next week.

But Katrina's devastating aftermath will be "enormously disruptive" for the Gulf Coast region's state and local courts, he said.

"I don't think the tasks we face are nearly as difficult as those in the state courts in the Gulf Coast region," the Austin, Texas-based Higginbotham said.

Louisiana State University law professor John Baker said the disruption is a "lesson about what many of us take for granted, of what it takes to function every day, of what it takes to keep a society together."

Baker had just returned from a class now brimming with displaced students from New Orleans-based Tulane and Loyola universities. Everyone, he said, left the room shaking their heads.

"It's not just the evidence, it's the witnesses," he said. "Where are the witnesses? Where are the defendants? How are you going to catch them?"

The day after Katrina hit, the Louisiana Supreme Court issued an emergency order, freezing deadlines and court proceedings through at least Sept. 9. On Tuesday, Gov. Kathleen Blanco, in response to requests from the state bar and other lawyers groups, suspended all court proceedings statewide though Sept. 25.

"The destruction and disruption of services and infrastructure to our system of justice caused by Hurricane Katrina will have a profound impact on the basic rights to an untold number of persons unless action is taken," the governor's order stated.

Federal courts for the entire Southeastern region of the state issued a similar order, with no set date for reopening.

"The entire federal infrastructure has been displaced throughout the region," said one federal law enforcement supervisor, who agreed to speak on condition of anonymity. "The courts have closed down."

The FBI office in New Orleans had wind and water damage that soaked case files and other key records, federal courts were shuttered with the evacuation and all federal law enforcement operations had to move agents and operations to Baton Rouge, Shreveport and other offices across Louisiana.

Another daunting issue is trying to track people still being monitored by the criminal justice system who have been dislocated by the storm.

"Where are the bad guys?" said the federal law enforcement supervisor. "And out of these millions of evacuees, I'm sure there are a number of them who are on parole, probation or are sex offenders who are now in the great state of Texas. What do you do about that?"

Lawyers have scrambled to recreate files, find a place to work, and help clients with problems as basic as trying to determine whether their property was still standing.

On Wednesday, New Orleans lawyer Jeff Dye brought out two pirogues, boats similar to canoes, to take three doctor clients through their flooded neighborhood in the Garden District.

Dye said he stayed in the city to deal with pending legal business. Because he has a home office and his phone worked after the storm, he was able to resume his practice.

DOJ_NMG_0004151

He and others said some law firms have bought and begun shipping computers to lawyers around the country, "developing virtual offices." The state bar and other legal organizations are mobilizing volunteers to help disaster victims deal with bureaucracy and get the legal system back on track.

But Dye and others say at least one firm has had to let employees go, and another has begun downsizing its permanent staff because of income disruptions.

Still, not all of the news is dire. Higginbotham said the 5th Circuit's plan is to "reopen" next week in Houston and move to a suburb of Baton Rouge within 60-90 days.

At least one news report stated that most of 5th Circuit's files were in the New Orleans building's basement, which was flooded. But Higginbotham said it is his understanding that files were not in the basement, and that the building sustained "some seepage," but no major damage.

Outside of New Orleans, the city's dislocated lawyers began scrambling for office space wherever they had landed. Some already had offices in Baton Rouge and others quickly found space to serve as a home base for their far-flung partners.

Bob Rooth, a partner in the city's oldest firm, Chaffe McCall, said he's set up a temporary practice in a large Dallas law firm. And he's enrolled his daughter in school in Dallas and plans to stay at least through the school year.

His firm's Baton Rouge office secured space for many of the New Orleans lawyers and staff and got a caravan of cars and trucks into New Orleans earlier this week. They retrieved client files and computers from their Energy Center offices, getting through checkpoints into the city by securing passes from city officials and from clients already authorized to be in the city on emergency business.

Oil and gas litigation specialist Ralph White, who evacuated to Oxford, Miss., contacted friends in a local law firm and started working out of their law library within two days. He said he brought none of his files but was able to start reconstructing them through electronic court databases, co-counsel in other cities and opposing counsel in his civil cases.

He said other lawyers in his 55-member firm, Montgomery Barnett, are scattered across the Southeast. Though they've been unable to get back into their offices in downtown New Orleans, they've been told that their files and equipment are intact.

"I'm on top of all my files, and I'm keeping up with all my cases, but it's been challenging," he said.

Amid Barrage Of Criticism, Defending His Department (NYT)

By Jere Longman

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 8 - At 4:45 on Thursday morning, P. Edwin Compass III, superintendent of the New Orleans police, awakened a slumbering reporter at City Hall and cajoled him into an early morning trip around this devastated, increasingly deserted city.

"I've been working 21 hours a day; I have a bad back, two sprained knees, two sprained ankles, 55 stitches in my hand that haven't healed from having a cyst removed, hemorrhoids and glaucoma," Mr. Compass said. "I don't want to hear any excuses."

Wearing a back brace, he walked to a military truck and grunted up the ladder with the assistance of two National Guardsmen. But a tender lumbar region - strained in a fall from a truck several days ago - did not suppress his enthusiasm.

"Just remember," Mr. Compass, 47, said to his security detail. "You're with the chief. Nobody gets hurt."

Since Hurricane Katrina flooded the city, Mr. Compass has been widely criticized for his inability to keep the peace as New Orleans sank into mayhem, and to sustain the morale of his officers, about 500 of whom abandoned the 1,700-member force in anger or despair.

In recent days, Mr. Compass, who has been superintendent since 2002, has returned the verbal fire with a raw, impassioned defense of his department. He pointed to those officers who stayed and helped restore order despite a shortage of manpower and ammunition, and volleys of gunshot from what he said were dozens of people trying to thwart rescue efforts.

"This is the time for men of honor, not those others," Mr. Compass said, referring to the officers who left.

While other cities may prefer a more buttoned-down, businesslike presence from their police chiefs, Mr. Compass exudes the casual, loquacious style of the Big Easy. He wants to be called Eddie, not Edwin, and he is as likely to bump fists when greeting people as to shake hands. On Wednesday, he vigorously wrestled to the ground a friend whom he thought had died in Hurricane Katrina's aftermath, and chided him for ignoring instructions to evacuate.

Responding to those who criticize his handling of the chaos, Mr. Compass said he believed that his officers did the best they could, considering that their communications system was inoperable and that the city's ammunition depot was left inaccessible beneath 10 feet of water.

"We faced the greatest challenge that any city has faced in the history of mankind," said Mr. Compass, a man who seems to regard understatement as a felony.

DOJ_NMG_0004152

Some police officers, speaking on the condition of anonymity, complained Wednesday that the superintendent was largely invisible immediately after the flooding began. But others said he had maintained a strong public presence, and they praised him for supporting his officers in a department whose reputation suffered severe damage from corruption scandals in the 1990's.

"That's a cop," Sgt. George Jackson said. "He stands up for his men."

The son of a postal worker and a homemaker, Mr. Compass grew up in midtown New Orleans, attended grammar school with Mayor C. Ray Nagin and high school with Charles Parent, the city's fire superintendent. Mr. Compass said that he always wanted to be a police officer, and that in the current crisis he was relying on faith for guidance and stamina.

"We couldn't have a better policeman to deal with the pressure he's had to deal with," the Rev. Charles J. Southall III, pastor of the First Emanuel Baptist Church of New Orleans, said in a telephone interview. "But I'm concerned about his health and emotional stability. There's only so much you can give without someone giving back."

Mr. Compass said that many evacuees were so angry with him as they waited days to be rescued from the convention center that a group of them tried to grab him and take him hostage, saying, "If we get the chief, we get the buses."

While he acknowledged that murders and rapes had occurred at both the convention center and the Superdome, Mr. Compass said the mayhem at the unlighted convention center would have been worse if the police had not created a plan to capture the armed thugs who were terrorizing others. Because his officers could not risk harming innocent evacuees by returning fire in the dark, he said, they watched instead for muzzle fire and moved toward it, patting people down and yelling "gun" when they felt a weapon. Then officers converged and tackled the gunman.

"That's never been done before," Mr. Compass said. "If we hadn't extracted the weapons, many more may have died."

He defended Mayor Nagin's decision this week to issue a mandatory evacuation order. If force is required, Mr. Compass said, it will be only the minimum necessary. "We are the greatest crowd-control police in the world," he said. "We deal with Mardi Gras every year."

People must leave to allow the city to be rebuilt, and to protect themselves from disease and fires, Mr. Compass said. "When your child needs a shot, you know it's going to be painful," he said. "But if you don't get the shot, they can die."

His wife, Arlene, and children have left New Orleans, and so have 600 of the city's remaining 1,200 officers, for a few days of rest and relaxation in Las Vegas and Atlanta. Another shift will leave when the first returns. Mayor Nagin has also sought a little time off, but Mr. Compass said that he was going nowhere for the moment.

"My feet were the first ones on the battlefield," he said, "and they will be the last to leave the battlefield."

Hundreds Of Police Officers Missing In New Orleans (LAT)

By Julie Cart, Edwin Chen And Scott Gold

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Hundreds of police officers are missing and many may be dead from Hurricane Katrina, according to a top police official, who in an interview today also said that the population of the city may sharply drop because of the storm.

Deputy Police Supt. Warren Riley said about 700 of the city's 1,600-officer force was told to stay home until the storm passed so that they would be available to be deployed wherever they were needed.

Between 400 and 500 officers remain unaccounted for and many are feared dead, though some are believed to have walked away from the job, he said.

Riley said that survivors would have likely called the department to say that they are alive or to explain their absence. He declined to speculate about how many officers may have perished: "One is too many."

"We don't know how many officers are dead," he said. "We don't know how many officers drowned. That's a fear of ours."

Riley spoke as the city continued its evacuation by trying to persuade the thousands of residents who refuse to leave their homes that the city is too dangerous for them to remain. If the stragglers insist on staying, they will be forcibly evacuated, officials said.

Vice President Dick Cheney landed this afternoon in New Orleans as part of his tour of the Gulf Coast, devastated when Katrina hit in the predawn hours of Aug. 29.

President Bush, whose popularity has been falling because of questions about the federal relief effort, briefly addressed the nation today and proclaimed Sept. 16 as a national day of prayer for the victims of Katrina.

Bush appeared on television flanked by four of his Cabinet officers, hours after Democrats in Washington stepped up their attacks on the quality of the federal response and again called for an independent commission to investigate.

No one had been forcibly removed from their homes as of noon today, Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said. Many have resisted calls to leave, but "some people just want to have someone explain to them face to face why they have to leave."

He said that officers will soon begin entering houses and removing people who won't leave. He recognized that there could be considerable tension once that starts, but he pledged to do what he could to ease any difficulties.

DOJ_NMG_0004153

"We're going to be respectful," he said. "We understand it is a dramatic experience and we're going to handle it that way. We are very sensitive to the needs of our community. We are not going to be tough. We are going to be sensitive."

Officials have been emptying the city, which remains substantially flooded by waters that poured through three broken levees after Katrina landed upon the coast. In the more than 10 days since the storm began its march through the gulf, the floodwaters have become infected with large amounts of bacteria.

Hundreds of thousands of evacuees have been moved to shelters across the country, with an estimated 250,000 in Texas alone. New Orleans had a population of about 500,000, but that could decrease to 350,000 when people are allowed to return, Riley said.

There have already been reports of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people leaving out-of-state shelters, such as the Houston Astrodome, in an attempt to start new lives there.

While that could have devastating consequences for a tax base that was strained before the storm, Riley sought to find some solace.

"Some people will probably go places and live better lives," he said. "New Orleans with a smaller population may be a better city. You take away the tragic loss of life here and maybe there is a silver lining."

Fire Superintendent Charles Parent said today that three multistory buildings on the flooded campus of Dillard University, an African American college founded in 1869, were destroyed in an overnight fire.

Parent said the campus is small and he feared that the damage to the school would be substantial and lasting. But he said that because of deep-standing water, firefighters were only able to fight the blaze with helicopters and have not been able to access the site.

The buildings were destroyed in one of 11 major fires the city fought overnight, with the assistance of hundreds of firefighters who have come from other states.

In a message posted to students on its website, Dillard called itself an "institution with a rich, proud and triumphant history."

"Our beginnings are rooted in struggle and a committed determination to overcome social, political and environmental obstacles," the statement said.

"Today, we face a formidable challenge; however, we are equally resolute in our ability to recall our collective strength. We resolve to recommit to our future with full expectation that our beloved Dillard will remain one of the nation's premier institutions of higher learning."

Dillard's campus sits amid the deep flooding in the heart of the city, north of downtown and west of the Gentilly area.

Cheney visited the aircraft carrier Iwo Jima, docked in the Mississippi River. He met with Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, just appointed as deputy to beleaguered FEMA Director Michael Brown. Cheney viewed maps and large aerial photographs of the destruction area.

"As you can see, the water is starting to recede," Allen told Cheney.

Allen said the next step is a door-to-door search of residences as evacuation of the city proceeds.

Afterward, Cheney took a ride in a Humvee to look at repairs to the levee.

Before his arrival in New Orleans, Cheney visited Gulfport, Miss. He and Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales were briefed by Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff.

After meeting with local officials, Cheney and his wife, Lynne, walked through a devastated neighborhood. He praised the first responders and pledged that the federal government would do more.

"I think the progress we're making is significant," Cheney said. "I think the performance, in general, at least in terms of the information I've received from locals, is definitely very impressive.

"That's not to say there's not an awful lot of work to be done — there is."

As Cheney toured the region, the political fallout from what has turned into the nation's worst natural disaster continued.

Democrats sharply attacked Republican plans for a congressional task force to examine the federal response and called for an independent commission. The panel was proposed Wednesday by House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) said today that she wouldn't appoint any Democrats to a panel that she called a "charade."

"I'm protesting the fact that it's not bipartisan. And we've got to work together to get this done. So let's not have a charade about what they decide is bipartisan. That's not what bipartisanship is," she said.

Pelosi and others have also said that Bush should fire Brown, but Cheney defended appointees like the FEMA director.

Cheney also backed the Republican leaders' task force, saying it was similar to the Iran-Contra committee on which he served as a congressman in the 1980s.

Criticism of the federal response has also taken a toll on Bush's poll ratings.

A survey by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found that 67% of those sampled thought Bush could have done more to speed up relief efforts, and 28% thought he had done all he could. His job approval rating dropped to 40%, with the greatest slippage occurring among Republicans and conservatives, the base of his support.

Bush took to the airwaves to explain how to apply for the previously announced program to give $2,000 in disaster assistance to families displaced by the storm. He also said the administration would continue federal benefits such as food stamps, Medicaid and unemployment payments.

He proclaimed Sept. 16 a national day of prayer for victims of Katrina.

"I ask that we pray, as Americans have always prayed in times of trial, with confidence in His purpose, with hope for a brighter future, and with the humility to ask God to keep us strong, so that we can better serve our brothers and sisters in need," the president said.

Earlier this week, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin authorized officials to forcibly remove the remaining residents, even if they didn't want to go, because the city is dangerous.

The order applies to the inundated eastern wards and the lightly damaged French Quarter and Garden District. It exempts Algiers and other communities south of the Mississippi River, known as the West Bank, which were largely spared from flooding. The mayor has said that standing water still covers 60% of New Orleans, down from 80% at its peak.

According to Walter Boasso, a Republican state senator whose district includes the flooded St. Bernard Parish, sheriff deputies and other local officials began forcibly removing residents on Wednesday.

He said today that in at least one case a reluctant evacuee had to be restrained and tied to the bed of a pickup truck.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco has not ordered forced evacuations.

National Guard Maj. Gen. Ron Mason said today in Baton Rouge that if the order is given to forcibly remove the estimated 10,000 residents who remain in New Orleans, that task would fall to the New Orleans Police Department.

"I don't believe that you will see National Guard soldiers actually forcing people to leave," Mason said. "We think that is a police effort."

Mason said 7,000 National Guard troops in New Orleans are going house to house to assist willing evacuees. Should a forced evacuation be ordered, he said, Guard troops will drive vehicles and support the police.

"In every situation where we send National Guard soldiers, we have rules for use of force," he said. "That means these soldiers are allowed to protect themselves. That's the purpose of the weapons. The purpose of the weapons is not to be used against American citizens and force them from their homes."

Complicating the situation is that the floodwaters in New Orleans are teeming with bacteria, carrying the potential for a variety of diseases.

At least four flood victims have died of bacterial infections caused by the water in New Orleans and other hard-hit towns. They appeared to have been infected with vibrio vulnificus bacteria, a water-borne pathogen related to the bacteria that cause cholera.

The Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals announced today that 19 cases of West Nile disease had been detected.

As health authorities joined New Orleans and Louisiana officials in urging the city's estimated 10,000 holdouts to leave their homes, the House passed the Bush administration's latest request for another $51.8 billion in funding to speed help to victims of Hurricane Katrina. The Senate is expected to act soon.

Congress has already approved $10.8 billion in aid.

Ripples from the flooding, which has left as many as 1 million people homeless and untold numbers dead, continued to shake the nation's economy. The federal Labor Department said today that about 10,000 of the evacuees have filed for unemployment benefits last week.

On Wednesday, the Congressional Budget Office predicted that 400,000 jobs would be lost through the end of the year, with privately insured losses topping $30 billion.

The official death count stood at 196 bodies in the state of Mississippi and more than a dozen in other states where Katrina hit.

Juliette Saussy, director of emergency medical services in New Orleans, said today that hundreds of bodies have been removed from the city, and officials are expecting the death toll to climb.

With the increased security has come an increase in arrests. David Dugas, U.S. attorney for the middle district of Louisiana, said 223 prisoners have been processed, most coming from Jefferson Parish. They are being screened at Hunt Correctional Institute in St. Gabriel, southwest of New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0004155

As officials struggle with how to deal with the evacuees, school officials in Orleans Parish were unsure whether any schools will open this year. Schools in Jefferson Parish are expected to open in January. In hard-hit St. Bernard Parish and Plaquemines Parish, no dates have been set for school to begin.

Gasoline tankers have become a more regular sight along the Mississippi Gulf Coast, causing lines for fuel to begin to ease. Lines that just a few days ago had stretched for several miles were cut in half. Residents outside the hardest-hit coastal towns spoke about being able to drive up to a gas station with no wait.

But as gas became easier to get and more residents who had fled the hurricane began to return, traffic on main roads throughout the Mississippi Gulf, particularly Interstate 10, has become extremely heavy.

Meanwhile, construction crews are busy repairing roads, so law enforcement officers are directing drivers through a series of detours, exacerbating the traffic snarls. There are even morning and evening rush hours — another sign of normalcy.

Utility trucks, military vehicles and law enforcement from around the state are also clogging the roads, making commutes sometimes unbearably long.

US Watching Katrina-related Fraud (AFP)

Agence France-Presse, September 9, 2005

With billions of dollars pouring in to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, the US government has established a task force to hunt down fraud, White House spokesman Scott McClellan announced.

"Unfortunately, there are some who are intent on setting up fraudulent schemes to take advantage of the victims and the people who are trying to help those who have been affected," he told reporters.

"These are despicable acts that will not be tolerated. Those who take advantage of the situation will be pursued and will be prosecuted," said McClellan.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has created the Hurricane Katrina Task Force on Fraud "to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes including fraudulent charities, insurance fraud, identity theft and government benefit fraud," said the spokesman.

The national task force includes officials with the Justice Department's criminal division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, he said.

Katrina Victims At Risk For ID Theft, Experts Say (REU)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, September 8, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Birth certificates and other sensitive documents left among the waterlogged debris of Hurricane Katrina could put the storm's victims at heightened risk for identity theft, experts said on Thursday.

U.S. officials and consumer advocates said they had not yet heard of any cases of identity theft related to the disaster because the crime usually takes months to unfold.

But consumers should keep a close eye on their bank statements and order a copy of their credit reports once they get their lives back together to make sure they are not being victimized, they said.

"We tell people not to be alarmed but to be cautious," said Betsy Broder, an assistant director in the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection.

Those who wish to contribute to relief efforts are at risk as well. Internet-security company Websense said on Sunday that it had found a "phishing" e-mail campaign that seeks to trick Internet users into providing their credit-card numbers to a Web site that looks like one run by the Red Cross.

In order to avoid such scams, donors should type the address of charitable Web sites directly into their browsers, rather than clicking on a link in the e-mail, experts said.

The FBI is investigating at least a dozen suspicious Web sites and e-mail messages for fraud, spokesman Paul Bresson said.

Similar scams emerged after the tsunami that devastated large portions of coastal Asia and Africa in December but "this is far worse," he said.

The Justice Department said on Thursday that it has set up a task force to investigate identity theft and other types of fraud related to the Katrina.

Identity theft costs U.S. consumers and businesses $50 billion annually, according to FTC estimates.

A string of computer breaches at businesses and universities has focused attention on the issue this year but those who have been uprooted by Hurricane Katrina also face risk from looters and "dumpster divers" -- those who sift through garbage looking for valuable personal information to steal -- as well.

DOJ_NMG_0004156

Ruined homes and businesses are likely to contain mortgage records, Social Security cards and other documents that criminals can use to hijack an identity, said Linda Foley, co-executive director of the Identity Theft Resource Center.

"A crisis brings out the best of people and the worst of people. Unfortunately, in criminals it brings out their best skills," she said.

Thieves also could intercept drivers' licenses and birth certificates when they are mailed to storm victims trying to get their lives back together, said Beth Givens, director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse.

"I suspect that many of the shelters are temporary facilities and do the people running them have the ability to operate a secure post office?" she said.

Mail bound for the affected areas is currently held in secure sorting facilities and will be forwarded to residents once they fill out a change-of-address form, U.S. Postal Service spokesman Bob Anderson said.

U.S. Names 5 Firms To Build Housing (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Accelerating efforts to rebuild the storm-ravaged Gulf of Mexico region, the Bush administration hired five private contractors -- including some active in rebuilding Iraq -- and took the controversial step of suspending Depression-era wage floors throughout the area.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency announced yesterday that it was awarding contracts to Bechtel National Inc. of San Francisco and Fluor Corp. of Aliso Veijo, Calif., both of which are involved in Iraq. The other companies awarded FEMA work are Shaw Group of Baton Rouge, La., Denver-based CH2M Hill, which is providing housing in Alabama, and Dewberry Technologies of Fairfax, Va., which is providing planning and reporting tools to help guide the efforts.

Later in the day, the White House said it was suspending in the disaster area so-called Davis-Bacon rules requiring prevailing wages be paid to workers on federal contracts. Republicans praised the executive order temporarily waiving the rules, which they said would fuel job growth in the hurricane region, but Democrats and their organized-labor allies accused the White House of exploiting the tragedy to accomplish a conservative goal.

The five contracts awarded yesterday are the first in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, in what is expected to be the largest and most lucrative government-funded rebuilding effort ever launched in the U.S.

Halliburton Corp.'s Kellogg, Brown & Root unit is already doing repair work at three Navy facilities in Mississippi as part of an existing contract.

Shaw Group and Kellogg, Brown & Root are clients of former FEMA director Joe Allbaugh, who has a private consulting firm in disaster relief. He resigned from FEMA in March 2003. Shaw's deal to refurbish damaged buildings and provide emergency housing could be worth as much as $100 million, the company said.

The enormous amounts of federal money beginning to pour into hard-hit areas across the Southeastern U.S. are beginning to set off a gold rush reminiscent of corporate America's efforts to profit from the reconstruction of Iraq, and many companies winning Katrina-related contracts also have multibillion-dollar contracts there. White House and congressional officials are working to finalize a new $51.8 billion aid package that would push the total amount of federal money dedicated to relief efforts to more than $62 billion.

Patti Giglio, a spokeswoman for Mr. Allbaugh, said the former FEMA director helps companies like Shaw with strategic planning but doesn't lobby FEMA or other government agencies on their behalf. She said he is traveling the region to marshal private-sector resources to support hurricane victims, not to seek work for clients. "He's down there because he feels he can help," she said. "He doesn't lobby FEMA, and he's never called FEMA."

Shaw Group's Web site encouraged would-be employees to apply for work online. "Hurricane Recovery Projects -- Apply Here!" it said, adding, "Subcontractors and craftsmen, please click here to apply for available positions."

Executives at the companies that won FEMA contracts said they had begun working on new housing for many of the hundreds of thousands of Americans displaced by the hurricane.

Officials at Bechtel and Fluor said their contracts, like Shaw's, were valued at as much as $100 million. The other two companies couldn't be reached for comment, and a FEMA spokesman didn't return calls about the value of those deals.

Fluor spokesman Lee Tashjian said the contract calls for identifying and leasing large plots of land in Louisiana that could house settlements of temporary housing, transporting trailers and prefab homes to the sites, and connecting the homes to electricity, water and sewage systems. Fluor began transporting the first 20 homes of an initial consignment of 400 units from Baton Rouge to hard-hit Slidell, La., yesterday afternoon, he said.

The government also hired Fluor to handle operations for the new Housing Area Command that is charged with overseeing public- and private-sector emergency housing issues. The organization includes FEMA, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Army Corps of Engineers, the American Red Cross and the private contractors. Its primary goal is to quickly find temporary housing for Katrina refugees, but FEMA said the Housing Area Command will also develop plans for longer-term housing initiatives.

The White House wage order, meanwhile, added fuel to the partisan tensions already raging since the storm hit. At issue are prevailing-wage requirements put into law as part of the Davis-Bacon Act of 1931, one of organized labor's biggest legislative victories.

Republicans have long hated the bill, which they say impedes the free flow of labor and adds unnecessary expense to federal projects. Shortly before leaving office in 1992, President Bush's father issued an executive order exempting hurricane-damaged parts of Florida, Louisiana and Hawaii from the Davis-Bacon regulations, a move rescinded by President Clinton. President Bush's move yesterday marked the first time his administration has suspended the rules, and was hailed by many Republican lawmakers. In a statement, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R., Colo.) said it would save "vital time and money in reconstruction efforts."

Democrats and union leaders attacked the move, with AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney saying it was "unbelievable and outrageous that the White House would lift the time-tested standard for ensuring quality work and decent living standards for taxpayer-financed reconstruction."

Bush Suspends Pay Act In Areas Hit By Storm (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

President Bush yesterday suspended application of the federal law governing workers' pay on federal contracts in the Hurricane Katrina-damaged areas of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi. The action infuriated labor leaders and their Democratic supporters in Congress, who said it will lower wages and make it harder for union contractors to win bids.

The Davis-Bacon Act, passed in 1931 during the Great Depression, sets a minimum pay scale for workers on federal contracts by requiring contractors to pay the prevailing or average pay in the region. Suspension of the act will allow contractors to pay lower wages. Many Republicans have opposed Davis-Bacon, charging that it amounts to a taxpayer subsidy to unions.

In a letter to Congress, Bush said he has the power to suspend the law because of the national emergency caused by the hurricane: "I have found that the conditions caused by Hurricane Katrina constitute a 'national emergency.' "

Bush wrote that his decision is justified because Davis-Bacon increases construction costs, and suspension "will result in greater assistance to these devastated communities and will permit the employment of thousands of additional individuals."

AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney denounced the Bush announcement as "outrageous."

"Employers are all too eager to exploit workers," he said. "This is no time to make that easier. What a double tragedy it would be to allow the destruction of Hurricane Katrina to depress living standards even further."

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, accused Bush of "using the devastation of Hurricane Katrina to cut the wages of people desperately trying to rebuild their lives and their communities."

Miller said: "In New Orleans, where a quarter of the city was poor, the prevailing wage for construction labor is about $9 per hour, according to the Department of Labor. In effect, President Bush is saying that people should be paid less than $9 an hour to rebuild their communities."

A Surgeon Caught Up In The Flooding Tells Of A Week Of Chaos, Peril And Heroism (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

As Hurricane Katrina wailed out of the Gulf of Mexico, Dr. Norman E. McSwain Jr., chief of trauma surgery at the New Orleans hospital known as Big Charity, relished watching what he called "water blowing sideways in big slats, like Venetian blinds," from inside his office at the adjacent Tulane University School of Medicine.

"Frankly, all my life I'd wanted to be in a hurricane," Dr. McSwain recalled in an interview. "It just goes to show how you shouldn't hope to get what you wish for."

After the storm had passed, he had time to drive over to his house on Bourbon Street and was glad to find it intact. The emergency room at Charity, a huge hospital founded for the poor in 1736, was quiet. Young surgeons joked that they would soon be busy sewing up people who had bought chain saws to clear their yards.

But within days, Dr. McSwain would become one of the hurricane's reluctant celebrities. As Charity Hospital withered around him - low on electricity, water and oxygen; its food supplies down to canned fruit cocktail; surrounded by thugs firing at rescue boats - he finally despaired of official channels and cried out to the news media: "We have been trying to call the mayor's office. We have been trying to call the governor's office. We are turning to you. Please help us."

DOJ_NMG_0004158

The 68-year-old surgeon's last nights at his post would be spent sleeping in a red garbage bag, of the kind normally used to hold infectious waste, on the roof of Tulane University Hospital's parking garage, his head cradled on a pile of diapers, hiding with his staff from marauders below as security guards and a lone Marine sniper stood sentry.

What Dr. McSwain described, in telephone interviews from Nashville, where he was helping set up a center for evacuees from New Orleans, was a slow descent into chaos. The more desperate the situation became, he said, the harder it was to reach anyone in authority.

Despite the historical threat of flooding in New Orleans, he said, there was never a plan to evacuate Charity, the nation's oldest continuously operated hospital.

Nor at first did he expect one.

"Medical people don't evacuate," he said. "They stay and take care of people who weren't smart enough to leave."

In addition, he said, minor flooding in New Orleans is common.

"I've waded through waist-deep water several times," he said. "It's no big deal. The pumps take it out. People who live in low-lying areas have to put new carpet down every few years, but they get used to it."

By Tuesday of last week, however, even with the floodwaters eight feet deep, the hospital's generators running out of diesel and shots ringing out in darkened streets, it became clear that no plan was being formed.

"Nobody was in charge," he said. "I guarantee you that. I'd call the governor's office, and either they didn't answer the telephone or I'd talk to lower functionaries, and they'd say: 'The governor's too busy to talk. We'll relay the message.' "

Making matters worse, he said, someone from the state health department announced that Charity had already been emptied, when in fact 250 patients and 1,000 staff members were inside.

He was finally able to appeal to HCA, the company that runs Tulane University Hospital, across the street. HCA had hired 20 medical evacuation helicopters, which were landing on the Tulane hospital's parking garage.

"They said, 'We're not going to leave you down there,' " Dr. McSwain said of company executives. "I have nothing but praise for them."

For the next three days, beginning with the 12th-floor intensive care unit, the staff carried Charity patients down the stairs to flat-bottomed boats steered by state fish and wildlife agents. The boats were met at the Tulane garage, 150 yards away, by a truck, running on gas siphoned from parked cars, that took the patients to the garage's seventh-floor roof to be picked up by the helicopters.

"One cardiac patient was on a pump that weighed 500 pounds and had two feet of tubing," Dr. McSwain said. "We had to carry him down five flights without separating them by two feet. In the dark."

But at one point Tulane University Hospital ran out of oxygen, he said, so Charity was told not to send additional patients there until more of it could be flown in. Oily water sloshed along corridors. Confused patients languished in hallways.

The danger kept increasing, he said. A fish and wildlife sergeant stopped the boat-to-truck shuttle, calling back boats with babies aboard, after one of his men had been shot by a would-be hijacker. At a hotel across the street filled with refugees, "drug lords took command and made people buy their way in and out," Dr. McSwain said, adding that "one of our personnel who had family there was shot at twice."

Phones stopped working. The only news from outside came from battery-powered radios. A staff member whose BlackBerry still had a signal sent out appeals for the National Guard.

On Wednesday night, two days after the hurricane swept ashore, "a helicopter came in, and this lone guy dropped out with an M-16 and said he was a Marine sniper and he'd been sent to protect Charity," Dr. McSwain recalled.

"It was really comforting to have a guy like that who was trained and had been in Iraq three times and would shoot somebody if he had to," the doctor said. "It made us feel good."

The marine stayed on Charity's roof for 12 hours, then moved to the Tulane garage parapet as the hospitals emptied and the staff retreated to the top two floors of the parking structure, barricading its stairs and ramps against looters roaming the five lower floors. Neither the marine nor the 38 hospital guards keeping watch in shifts shot anyone, "as far as I know," Dr. McSwain said.

By Thursday morning, he said, he had reached a friend with press contacts who got him in touch with reporters for The Associated Press and USA Today, to whom he made his plea for help.

The next day, with some of Charity's staff and patients remaining, he got on the last helicopter carrying out members of Tulane's staff, having decided that he could do more good by raising the alarm on the outside. By that evening, the military was rolling through the streets, and the last of the patients were out.

DOJ_NMG_0004159

His house may have been looted, he said, but he is too busy to go see, recruiting paramedics for evacuee centers and trying to find new hospitals for his residents.

"I'm not interested in repeating those five days," he said. "But there were good parts and bad parts."

Even making do with his makeshift bed on the garage roof had its moments, he said, as when he saw the Milky Way above a lightless city.

"It was all awesome," Dr. McSwain said. "Awesome fantastic, awesome sad, awesome beautiful. When I was flying over Lake Pontchartrain in that helicopter, I got teary. 'My life has changed,' I thought. 'It'll never be the same.' "

HUD, VA Offer Homes For Some Katrina Victims (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, September 9, 2005

The U.S. government is making some, but not all, of the thousands of homes it owns in Southern states available to displaced victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development has taken all its homes in stricken states off the market to consider which ones can house evacuees. It has identified 1,380 homes in seven states as livable and plans to move people into them, spokesman Lemar Wooley says.

But the Department of Veterans Affairs continues to sell its homes. In some cases, wealthier Katrina evacuees are buying them.

“If there's a need for additional housing, VA houses will be taken off the market immediately. We are ready to move,” says VA spokesman Scott Hogenson. He says the VA is coordinating its efforts with HUD and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The VA owns about 5,000 homes nationwide, 2,000 of which are in Southern states most affected by Katrina. It acquires them after veterans default on VA-backed loans and banks foreclose the properties. The VA then pays off the mortgages and takes ownership.

Hogenson says the VA is assessing the livability of its homes.

Real estate agents say Katrina destroyed some homes while others were in need of repair even before the storm. Still, they say, many VA properties are habitable.

In Baton Rouge, agent Toby Babich has five VA listings, all sought after by Katrina evacuees.

“The real estate market is amazing here at this point,” he says. He has at least three contracts for one four-bedroom VA home listed at $129,900. “We're selling them to people who need homes.”

Agents in other areas say they've received calls, though fewer, from people displaced by Katrina. “People who have the means are buying homes,” says agent Laura Lei Bodin. She has a VA listing in Bogalusa, La., which was hit hard by Katrina. She says many people want rentals, but those are not as readily available in some areas.

Hamed Rauf, a Houston agent, says he's been approached by Katrina survivors, but his two VA properties need repairs. He says the U.S. government can use the money raised from selling its homes to help less-fortunate evacuees.

“There are two sides to this,” he says. “The government will be paying one way or the other.”

Yet Bob Watkins, an agent in Birmingham, Ala., says the VA homes could help needy evacuees. He has two listings in great shape, one for about $140,000 and another for about $200,000.

Watkins, who also sells about 150 HUD homes each year, says most of the HUD listings he receives are not immediately livable. “You can't put a poor person in a house needing repairs.”

HUD says it owns, through loan foreclosures, 2,562 homes in Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas. Wooley, the agency's spokesman, says FEMA has yet to identify which families will move in to those considered habitable.

Airlift Of Evacuees To Northeast Is Under Way (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

Victims seeking refuge in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina were airlifted to the Northeast yesterday, arriving at Cape Cod, where they will be temporarily housed in a rejuvenated barracks at the Otis Air National Guard Base.

The trickle of arrivals - 107 people moved out of homes or plucked off rooftops and off highways in recent days, and flown to Massachusetts by the Federal Emergency Management Agency - marked the first official evacuation to New England of victims of Hurricane Katrina.

But thousands of beds in shelters, barracks and apartments have been prepared by state and local governments in the region, awaiting an influx of families from the South that has been slow to come.

DOJ_NMG_0004160

Connecticut has offered to make room for 1,500 evacuees, 400 of whom would probably be expected to go to New Haven. On Monday, that city's mayor offered to take in 100 families and moved quickly to transform a cavernous $25 million athletic site from an indoor track into a welcome center, complete with cots and fresh bedding. He also offered those newcomers first priority for vacant public housing apartments.

New York State has offered to accept 5,000 evacuees, a fifth of whom could end up in New York City. Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester, Onondaga, Monroe and Erie counties have each offered to accept 150 people, state and county officials said. Rhode Island promised to house 500 evacuees at a Navy base, and Massachusetts made room for 2,500 people at the National Guard base on Cape Cod.

By midafternoon yesterday, the first inbound plane containing 107 people, including at least two infants and six dogs, touched down in the region, according to Julie Teer, a spokeswoman for Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Ms. Teer said her office understood that the passengers had arrived directly from New Orleans, where they were recently rescued or forced to evacuate homes.

Until now, the Northeast had seen only a small number of evacuees, mostly stragglers who had managed to make their way up North on their own, in most cases seeking relatives or friends.

Though state officials had announced and made extensive efforts to accommodate thousands more, Federal Emergency Management Agency officials warned state officials on Tuesday that the beds were not likely to fill up soon.

An e-mail message sent by FEMA to the office of Connecticut's governor, M. Jodi Rell, said those hurricane victims who had already taken refuge in Texas were unwilling to be relocated far from the region "as they resolve issues concerning the status of property, employment, and the safety of loved ones."

Indeed, at the Houston Astrodome, many displaced residents of Louisiana and Mississippi said they preferred to stay where they were, some merely because they dreaded the thought of moving again.

"We've been in three shelters in eight days," said Rickey Johnson, who with his wife, Tracy, was moved to the Astrodome from New Orleans. "I can't even begin to say how I feel about moving."

By Thursday, FEMA officials appeared to have developed a system for ferrying new survivors, rescued in coming days, to states willing to take them, according to an e-mail message from agency officials in Washington. The message said that evacuees would be taken first to Michigan, Iowa and Rhode Island on Friday. Different states are listed to receive evacuees on different days through next Wednesday, according to the message.

New York, Connecticut, Maine, Vermont and New Hampshire are not listed in the message to receive evacuees, as of now.

FEMA officials did not return phone calls seeking comment or a response to criticism that agency was inefficient in evacuating people to places waiting for them. In one case it flew a group to Charleston, W.Va., instead of Charleston, S.C., which was expecting the plane.

New Haven's mayor, John DeStefano Jr., waiting on Wednesday for evacuees to fill the cavernous field house he had set up for an influx of arrivals, joked that the people meant for his city had probably wound up in the New Haven in Indiana, or any of the several other New Havens in the United States.

By Thursday, only a smattering of individuals had found their way to New Haven - mostly on their own.

Shelters Grow Empty As Apartments Open Up (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 7 - In a stunning turnaround for some of the most besieged victims of Hurricane Katrina, the Astrodome population dwindled to about 3,000 on Wednesday from an estimated 15,000 over the weekend, with many people seizing on local job opportunities and inexpensive housing.

Because of a building boom over the last few years, there is a glut of affordable housing in Houston and its metropolitan area, which includes about 4.5 million people. Hotels are also offering a 14-day stay at no charge to storm victims, with reimbursements to come from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Add the outpouring of offers of shelter across the country and an acknowledgment by the government that the original estimates may have been high, and it appears that the Astrodome might be empty soon.

Frank E. Gutierrez, the emergency management coordinator for Harris County, which covers Houston, said that Joe Leonard, the area commander for the Department of Homeland Security, had made it a goal to clear the shelter complex by Sept. 18. "Everyone was asking him, 'What if we don't make it?' " Mr. Gutierrez said, "And he said, 'Then I'll need to work harder.' "

DOJ_NMG_0004161

Even though many of those in the Astrodome seem to be bracing for a long stay - and the dome is gaining the trappings of normal life, with its own post office, Internet cafe and medical center - it looks increasingly like a temporary society.

And many of the evacuees are opting to stay in Houston or nearby towns. Evacuees in the dome rejected an offer this week from FEMA to transfer 4,000 people to cruise ships in the harbor of Galveston.

"I'm taking my chances in Houston, where we've already been able to accomplish a few things," said Linda Jeffers, 55, who is on the Survivors Leadership Group, an organization of evacuees living in the Astrodome. The group persuaded the American Red Cross this week to create a play area for children and asked officials to lobby communications companies not to turn off evacuees' cellphones.

Mayor Bill White of Houston and Judge Robert Eckels of Harris County, who are leading the operations in Houston, announced that "over 150,000 people have come to our community seeking the basic necessities of life" and that they had established the Houston Katrina Relief Fund, with business leaders on the board to raise money. Asked if he had a goal in mind, Mayor White said: "Yes. As much as we can."

Bed counts by the Red Cross at other Houston shelters showed far fewer people than just days ago, with 1,800 at Reliant Arena, 2,000 at Reliant Center and 1,366 at the George R. Brown Convention Center. Earlier figures were estimates and perhaps overstated, some officials said.

Including the Astrodome, about 8,000 evacuees were in Houston's largest shelters on Wednesday, down from a high of 24,000, city officials said. At least 1,300 people have moved into homes and apartments since Friday, and others have left with friends and relatives or on their own.

A city plan to provide 10,000 rental units to evacuees, a program that could last a year, drew more than 200 apartment operators. Houston intends to distribute vouchers and to be reimbursed by the Department of Housing and Urban Development and FEMA. City officials said landlords would waive credit checks and security deposits.

"I'm grateful to have a change," said Hope Joseph, 29, who moved out of the Astrodome on Tuesday night to a donated apartment in Wharton, a town south of Houston, together with her three children, ages 4, 6 and 9, and her mother, Lola.

"It's very quiet here, but I'm hoping for a fresh start in life," said Ms. Joseph, a former cake decorator at a Winn-Dixie supermarket in New Orleans, in a phone interview from Wharton.

Carmen Scarlett, the owner of a counseling service who will temporarily pay part of the $450 rent, met Ms. Joseph after traveling to Houston to assist evacuees.

At the Astrodome, small signs of comfort abound, like piles of donated clothing, land-line phones by SBC and a low-power FM radio station set to begin broadcasting on Wednesday, with as many as 10,000 radios distributed. There is also plenty of free food, including hot sandwiches from Chick-Fil-A, served by workers from Aramark, the food services company at the Astrodome.

FEMA plans to distribute $2,000 debit cards to each adult displaced by Katrina, sparking considerable discussion in the dome about where to place automatic teller machines. Members of the Survivors Leadership Group suggested a location outside the dome in well-lighted areas.

"There's still some agitation inside here, but it feels like it's calming down a bit," said Charles Adams, 47, a former cook at Dickie Brennan's Steakhouse in New Orleans. "It's still the old, 'You're not getting nothing unless you demand it.' "

The impression of normalcy at the Astrodome, however, was betrayed by reminders of how unstable life remains for many evacuees. Signs in the medical center alerted people about an onset of dysentery, apparently caused by norovirus, known for causing sicknesses on cruise ships.

Even though phones are available in the dome, Glenn Levy, a 16-year-old evacuee, described strong demand for a functioning cellphone. He said that he charges people three cigarettes for three minutes on his cell and had garnered as many as 50 Kool and Camel cigarettes a day.

"My minutes are not free," said Mr. Levy, who said he did not know the whereabouts of his father and mother, a sister and two brothers, though he had reached one sister in New Orleans. "I'm trying not to think they died."

Town Improvises To Absorb Evacuees (WP)

By T.r. Reid

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

ORANGE, Tex. -- Anna Rose Williams had never heard of Orange, Tex., when her tired, frightened family stopped here for dinner last week on their harried journey to escape Hurricane Katrina.

"We was seven people in one car, with the babies," the 61-year-old grandmother recalled. "A gentleman come out of the Domino Pizza and said, 'Do y'all need a place to stay?' I said, 'Honey, we don't need no place to stay. We need a place to live.' "

And that's how the Williams family of Burns Street in New Orleans became residents of Orange -- for the time being, at least. Their current home is the former fourth-grade classroom at the Community Church Youth Center in Orange, a bayou town on the Texas-Louisiana border that has seen its population swell from more than 18,000 to about 20,000 in one week as evacuees have moved in. Like the Williams family, the newcomers are wearing clothes, eating meals, taking medicine, reading schoolbooks and sleeping on cots donated by the residents of Orange.

DOJ_NMG_0004162

If New Orleans has been a locus of destruction, chaos and crime, the news from Orange and numerous other small-town havens is the old, familiar story of neighbor helping neighbor.

The exodus from Katrina has filled the string of hotels along Interstate 10 at the north end of town. Beyond that, Red Cross officials say five shelters have opened in Orange, plus two more in nearby hamlets.

Local churches have set up a rotation for meal deliveries, with a different parish responsible for each meal at each shelter every day. Merchants who have sponsored 5K runs or Little League teams are digging through their back rooms to find leftover T-shirts and sweat suits for the newcomers. Local kennels are taking in displaced pets. The West Orange-Cove school district has enrolled about 200 new students, including three of Anna Rose Williams's grandchildren.

To some extent, the aid has been coordinated by government or welfare organizations. But much of it has come about spontaneously.

"We knew there were people coming here who needed help," said Jerry Brown, music minister at Community Church, an Assemblies of God affiliate with 1,200 active members. "Well, we had room at our youth center, including a big gym. It just seemed like the right thing to do.

"So we called over to Hermann Memorial [Hospital] and got a bunch of cots and blankets. Our members brought in clothes and diapers and food. The Red Cross put our address out on the interstate for people stopping here. The word got around. Last Thursday, I think it was, the school buses started coming; we've got 67 children going to school from this facility."

People here say their geographic setting -- Orange is the first town in Texas for drivers heading west on I-10 -- made it their duty to provide a welcome. "We're the gateway," said Katherine Frey, a florist in Orange. "So we just started hauling stuff out to the rest stop [officially, it's the Texas Welcome Center] on the interstate.

"These people were getting off the buses wearing garbage bags and no shoes," Frey said. "So we started calling people and saying, 'We need footwear. We need bedding. We need two dozen Porta Potties out here quick.' " Virtually overnight, the state welcome center was transformed into an outdoor warehouse, with mountains of donated clothing, diapers, sleeping bags, food and an eight-foot tower of water bottles.

With few or no job prospects in devastated New Orleans, some of Orange's newest residents have been looking for work -- and finding it. One pastor reopened a defunct carwash to provide employment. A local maker of precision tools, Cloeren Co., sent fliers to motels and shelters looking for machinists. "We're going to hire a bunch of people," said Kenneth Cormier, Cloeren's director of human resources.

A key problem facing the shelters here and elsewhere is that nobody knows how long they will be needed. "We are seeing some people leave already," Brown said. "But we think some are going to be here for weeks or months."

To meet that need, said Aaron Thompson of the Orange County Red Cross, the school board has turned over a closed middle school, which is being cleaned and equipped this week to serve as a long-term home. "We're hoping to consolidate all our current shelters into that one place," Thompson said. "We should be able to house 600 or more people there, if that many stay."

Anna Rose Williams is one of those likely to stay. "We don't know if there's anything to go back to," she said. "And I think it must have been God that steered me to this wonderful community. We might just make this place our home."

Learning From Katrina (WP)

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Even with the evacuation unfinished and the structural damage unassessed, it is not too early to start talking about how to rebuild New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast. When residents return to their communities, many will want to rebuild everything exactly as it was. That is understandable. But lessons of the past suggest that this is exactly what should not happen.

In 1969 Hurricane Camille destroyed coastal homes in Mississippi and Louisiana, wiping out much of the area, including Biloxi. But government policy after Camille -- as with government policy after major East Coast hurricanes -- amounted, in the words of one expert, to an "urban development program." Instead of shrinking, coastal development expanded. In truth, local and federal policies, ranging from beach preservation subsidies to zoning laws, have long encouraged building homes along coasts that are unusually susceptible to flooding and wind. Even the National Flood Insurance Program, set up in 1968 to offer government-subsidized flood insurance to susceptible communities in exchange for strict zoning and construction regulations, is at fault. Over the past two decades, the regulatory force of the law has been substantially weakened. All that is left in many places is the subsidy, which thousands of homeowners collect over and over again.

Elsewhere in the country, government programs to acquire property in flood plains have successfully persuaded people to leave them. After the Mississippi River floods of 1993, the town of Valmeyer, Ill., was moved in its entirety, away from the river and onto a surrounding bluff. After Hurricane Floyd in 1999, the city of Kinston, N.C., moved entire neighborhoods out of flood plains and revitalized the city as well. But the political power of wealthy beachfront property owners has prevented such programs from being implemented along the coasts. That must not be allowed to happen again.

DOJ_NMG_0004163

The case of New Orleans is even more difficult. New Orleans is not Valmeyer, and cannot be easily moved. Nor is it Biloxi, Miss., where stronger building codes and zoning laws designed to move construction away from the shore could make the city better able to withstand hurricanes. The geography of New Orleans will leave the city forever vulnerable to catastrophic flooding. Yet the city's history and culture make it very much worth saving. As a result, the city, joined by state and federal governments, must begin to face several extraordinarily difficult and delicate issues: Should the lower, most susceptible parts of the city be rebuilt? Should other houses be constructed -- as houses in the city were a century ago -- on stilts? Should the swamps and wetlands around the city be at least partially restored? How should compensation and new housing requirements be handled? Considering the government's murky record of looking after the poor following natural disasters (as the aftermath of Hurricane Camille demonstrated), those most affected by government's decisions must be part of the discussion.

The time to start planning for a rational reconstruction of the Gulf Coast is now. Six months or more down the road, when the rebuilding has already begun, will be too late.

Insurers Are Urged To Pay Valid Claims (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Putting more pressure on insurers to pay damage claims from Hurricane Katrina, Mississippi's insurance commissioner has told carriers that they will be required to prove to both regulators and homeowners that damage was caused by water and not by wind if they deny a claim.

On Wednesday, Lousiana's insurance commissioner also urged a large group of insurers and reinsurers to pay all valid claims. In many cases, the key to deciding which homeowners recover will be whether wind or water caused the damage.

Many homeowners' and business insurance policies exclude flood damage from their coverage. Flood coverage is written by the federal government through its National Flood Insurance Program, but only a small fraction of property owners in Mississippi and Alabama have bought it.

"In some situations, there is either very little or nothing left of the insured structure, and it will be a fact issue whether the loss was caused by wind or water," Mississippi Insurance Commissioner George Dale said in a bulletin to insurers dated Wednesday. " . . . I expect and believe that, where there is any doubt, that doubt will be resolved in favor of finding coverage on behalf of the insured."

Dale's position startled many insurers and reinsurers, who are concerned they are being pressured to pay claims for damage they did not insure.

Even in Florida, with its many hurricanes, regulators "haven't ever tried to do that," said Brad Kading of the Reinsurance Association of America.

Some industry officials said they did not view Dale's action as alarming.

"I think this is just a cautionary bulletin to lay out what his expectations are," said Julie Pulliam of the Atlanta office of the American Insurance Association, a trade group. "He has been very good to work with, and we expect that to continue. We are at the very beginning of this process. There's a lot to come."

Telephone calls to the Mississippi Insurance Department did not go through, apparently because of damaged phone lines and a high volume of calls to the area.

Kading and others said that at a meeting convened Wednesday by Louisiana Insurance Commissioner J. Robert Wooley to discuss dealing with the disaster regulators were largely hortatory. Kading said they made "no specific draconian statements."

Nonetheless, both insurers and reinsurers are alarmed at the idea of being forced to pay flood claims, as some have urged.

The industry notes that flood exclusions are long established and that the language in policies is approved and understood by regulators. More important from a financial standpoint is that if insurers pay flood claims, reinsurers' contracts typically allow them to refuse to reimburse insurers for those outlays.

"The reinsurer is in the position of indemnifying the insurer," Kading said. That means that "after paying a claim, the insurer presents evidence that it was covered [by the reinsurance contract], and proof that it was paid. The reinsurer then looks at that evidence and decides if it agrees it's a covered claim."

By some estimates, reinsurers will pay about 40 percent of insured losses from Katrina and primary carriers the rest, assuming normal treatment of flood losses. If insurers pay claims that the reinsurers reject, their efforts to spread their risk will be negated, perhaps threatening their solvency.

DOJ_NMG_0004164

But much remains uncertain with regard to losses, irrespective of who pays them. "We are still totally in an assessment-type mode, of how much and where," said John Marlow of the AIA's southwestern regional office in Austin.

NATO To Help U.S. Transport Aid From Abroad (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration turned to NATO on Thursday for help in transporting to the United States a burgeoning international inventory of relief equipment that has been offered to aid the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Ninety-five countries have offered about $1 billion in cash and goods, as well as technical assistance, U.S. officials said. But some of the supplies remained abroad, where foreign officials in some instances said they had not heard back from U.S. counterparts on whether their offers would be accepted.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization told U.S. officials that its crews could transport aid to the Gulf Coast.

Eleven cargo planes landed Thursday in Little Rock, Ark., carrying aid from abroad, after 11 others Wednesday. But some countries said they still had no word on whether their offers would be accepted.

A cargo plane with supplies, including a water purification system, had been on a runway in Sweden since last week waiting for clearance to fly to the U.S.

"We've made a number of requests for clearance, and the U.S. has accepted the offer in principle," said Claes Thorson, spokesman for the Swedish Embassy in Washington. "But it remains to solve the logistical problem."

Other European countries "have the same problem," he added.

Poland, Austria and Norway are among those that have not heard back, diplomats said.

As foreign donors have expressed exasperation with the U.S. response, American officials have sought to emphasize that though they appreciate the offers of aid, not all help can be immediately put to use.

U.S. officials have been telling countries that some kinds of assistance are more helpful than others, adding that cash is the most easily put to use.

More than $400 million has been accepted, including $100 million from Kuwait, $100 million from the United Arab Emirates and $100 million from Qatar. Kuwait has also offered $400 million worth of oil.

Tons of aid has been arriving from Europe. On Thursday, relief workers and supplies arrived from Germany, which has offered a range of aid, including food rations, high-speed water pumps and forensic experts. It has also begun releasing oil from its strategic national reserve.

A French aircraft with supplies and personnel arrived Thursday, after two others that arrived Tuesday. The French have offered water treatment supplies, generators, tents, food rations and a 150-person team to help with relocation and psychological assistance.

The countries offering to help include a number of major recipients of U.S. aid, including Afghanistan, Iraq and Israel.

MoveOn.org Says It Won't Use Evacuee Images In Roberts Ad (USAT)

By Mark Memmott

USA Today, September 9, 2005

A liberal group indicated Thursday that one of its officials was wrong when he said it would broadcast a TV ad with images of poverty-stricken hurricane victims to raise questions about the civil rights record of John Roberts, the nominee for U.S. chief justice.

The statement by MoveOn.org Political Action came a day after Ben Brandzel, the group's advocacy director, told USA TODAY that such an ad would air next week, during Roberts' confirmation hearings in the Senate. Brandzel described plans for a provocative ad that would include images of African-American evacuees and question whether the conservative judge is sensitive to issues that are important to minorities and the poor.

On Thursday, however, MoveOn Executive Director Eli Pariser said the group has “no plans, and … never had plans, to produce such an ad.” Pariser did not blame USA TODAY, and he said that “we regret any misunderstanding that may have arisen because of anything that our staff member might have told USA TODAY's reporter.”

Conservative groups that had criticized MoveOn over the idea of using images of hurricane victims in a political ad weren't buying MoveOn's explanation. Sean Rushton of the conservative Committee for Justice, compared the episode to the flap last month over a TV ad produced by NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights group.

That spot — which NARAL took off the air after it drew wide criticism as unfair — accused Roberts of giving support to groups that advocate violence at abortion clinics. (The ad was based on arguments he made at the Supreme Court as a government lawyer in 1991. Roberts argued that anti-abortion protesters at clinics could not be prosecuted under a civil rights law; a majority of the court later agreed.)

DOJ_NMG_0004165

"I think MoveOn sensed a 'NARAL moment' was upon them," Rushton said.

MoveOn's change underscores how quickly political messages can backfire if they trod too hard on sensitive issues, said Brooks Jackson, director of the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Political Fact Check program, which examines the accuracy of political ads.

Roberts' hearings begin Monday. He has appeared to be headed for confirmation. But MoveOn, other liberal groups and Senate Democrats such as Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts are pushing the White House to release more memos Roberts wrote as a lawyer in the Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations.

In memos already released, Roberts argued for scaling back affirmative action and against a program that favored minorities seeking broadcast licenses.

What A Hispanic Justice Would Mean (USAT)

USA Today, September 9, 2005

I was still a law student when I decided that the Supreme Court needed a Hispanic justice. I was scouring cases, when I came to U.S. v. Brignoni-Ponce (1975). I read the decision twice, thinking I had misread it.

In Brignoni, the court held that "apparent Mexican ancestry" alone did not constitute legitimate grounds for the Border Patrol to conduct an immigration check. Even so, the court said, "the likelihood that any given person of Mexican ancestry is an alien is high enough to make Mexican appearance a relevant factor" in an immigration stop. In effect, the court declared a form of racial profiling constitutional.

A Hispanic justice would have provided a useful perspective to the Brignoni reasoning. So here we are, 30 years later, and the nation's first Hispanic Supreme Court justice is a possibility. No, it won't be with President Bush's first opening. That went to chief justice nominee John Roberts. But Bush now has a second chance to make history. His attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, recently said, "There will be a Hispanic on the court — it's inevitable." I hope he's right.

As with African-Americans and women, Latinos deserve representation. Hispanics are the nation's largest and fastest-growing minority group. Although ethnicity should not be a nominee's chief qualification, a Latino presence on the high court is overdue and would have monumental implications for the country.

Consider Thurgood Marshall's impact. A great-grandson of a slave, he came to the bench as a renowned civil rights attorney, bringing personal insight and expertise honed in cases such as Brown v. Board of Education in 1954. Throughout his tenure, he was sensitive to racial discrimination. "Bringing the Negro into the mainstream of American life should be a state interest of the highest order," Marshall wrote in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke in 1978.

Similarly, a Latino justice would open the eyes of justice a bit further. He would recognize that "Mexican appearance" is a flawed basis for an immigration check. He would see that English-only laws and the Real ID Act, which prohibits driver's licenses for illegal aliens, can be adversely applied to Hispanics.

The appointment of a Hispanic would be a breathtaking milestone. It's worth noting that the Supreme Court will face issues with broad effect on Latinos: bilingual education, affirmative action, immigration and workers' and voters' rights. It is imperative that the concerns of Latinos are represented. Just as Marshall served as the voice for African-Americans, a Hispanic justice could, and should, soon be ours.

Raul A. Reyes is an attorney in New York and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Hill Veterans Light The Way For Nominee (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Shortly after President George H.W. Bush nominated him for the Supreme Court in July 1991, Clarence Thomas went to a downtown Washington office to take part in strategy sessions aimed at ensuring his confirmation by the Senate.

The presiding political mind was not a top White House aide or a legal eagle from the Justice Department but lobbyist Kenneth M. Duberstein, a former Reagan administration official who was Thomas's designated "sherpa" -- his guide through the potentially treacherous process.

Duberstein, then and now, is one of a handful of Washington figures who have acquired reputations for steering top presidential nominees through a confirmation process that has grown more contentious and partisan since the unprecedented campaign that capsized Judge Robert H. Bork's Supreme Court nomination in 1987.

DOJ_NMG_0004166

The role of the sherpa, named for the Tibetan guides who assist climbers in the Himalayas, is largely off camera and unpaid. It is a critical and routine part of the Washington odyssey that high-profile nominees go through on their way to the high court or top Cabinet posts.

When John G. Roberts Jr. was nominated by President Bush in July to be an associate justice, he was promptly provided with two guides: former senator Fred D. Thompson (R-Tenn.) and former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie. Both are considered savvy Washington insiders who are now comfortably on the outside. After the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist last week, Bush nominated Roberts to lead the court.

Roberts has not faced anything like the opposition Bork did. Democrats say they will press him harder at his confirmation hearings beginning Monday now that he is in line to be chief.

"There are several roles you play," said Duberstein, who also served as a guide for Supreme Court Justice David H. Souter, CIA Director Robert M. Gates and Secretary of State George P. Shultz. "You are the chief strategist for the ultimate goal of getting that person confirmed. You are also the traffic cop, because everybody wants to see the prospective nominee. You are a coach and you're also a confidant of the nominee. You are the chief liaison with the Hill, but also the chief liaison within the administration. You are an enforcer, but you are also a negotiator."

Duberstein said the job of guiding Roberts should not change because he has been nominated for chief justice. "I don't recall that there would be any distinction," he said.

The sherpa is very much the media messenger -- shaping and selling a nominee's personal story and image, devising strategies for dealing with reporters, and coordinating courtesy calls with key senators.

"They'll school you on what to say and what not to say," said Paul C. Light, a professor of government at New York University. "They are kind of a sounding board for you, and whenever you have one of those anxiety attacks . . . they are counselors for you. And if you get into trouble, you get a 'hold' placed on you, then they'll help you iron it out."

Sherpas tap their sources on Capitol Hill to learn about tough questions a nominee might face, and then drill nominees in mock confirmation hearings known as "murder boards." They even coach them on such matters as how long to pause before answering a senator's question and how to ask for a bathroom break.

But this is a complex process, and even the helper needs help. Sherpas supervise teams that vet a nominee's financial statements, personal history and professional record -- trolling for red flags.

Light likened them to personal trainers, "somebody who is going to be there while you are doing everything and keep you from hurting yourself."

Other well-known sherpas include longtime Republican lobbyist Tom Korologos, now ambassador to Belgium, who helped Donald H. Rumsfeld (secretary of defense), Antonin Scalia (Supreme Court justice) and Edwin Meese III (attorney general), and veteran Democratic strategist Michael S. Berman, Duberstein's lobbying business partner, who assisted Justices Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Although sherpas work pro bono, the job is not without compensation. The role underscores a lobbyist's political access and clout, impressing prospective corporate clients.

Duberstein and then-Sen. John C. Danforth (R-Mo.), assisted by a team of administration insiders, helped steer Thomas through a difficult confirmation marked by law professor Anita Hill's accusations that Thomas had sexually harassed her when she worked for him at the Education Department and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, in the 1980s. Duberstein was especially influential on matters of style, Danforth wrote in his 1994 book, "Resurrection: The Confirmation of Clarence Thomas."

"As Clarence walked past banks of cameras, Ken would say, 'Give them a thumbs up,' and Clarence would comply," Danforth wrote. "When advising Clarence not to respond to press questions, Ken suggested, 'Tell them, "I wish I could answer that." ' . . . He told Clarence that when he entered the Senate Caucus Room at the start of his first hearing, he should go up and shake hands with each member. He insisted that Clarence, against his will, conclude the first hearing by complimenting the committee for being fair."

Thomas prevailed, in part, because he was able to define himself as an African American who had risen from poverty in rural Pin Point, Ga., and whose confirmation controversy represented yet another hurdle that he had to overcome. In a tactical move, Duberstein won assurances from the Senate Judiciary Committee that Thomas would have the opportunity to respond to any allegation in the same news cycle. That enabled Thomas to reclaim the offensive on the day Hill testified and Thomas responded by memorably labeling the proceedings "a high-tech lynching for uppity blacks."

When Rumsfeld was sworn in as defense secretary in 2001, Korologos was in the Oval Office with Bush and Vice President Cheney. "He is so famous for working around outside the Senate chamber that he is known by the insiders as the 101st senator," Rumsfeld said at a March 2002 award ceremony for Korologos. "But all that experience does come in handy, and it has helped me from time to time -- not least in my confirmation hearings. His advice for courtesy calls was 'Get in, listen, get out.' It worked."

DOJ_NMG_0004167

Korologos has handled hundreds of nominations over the past 40 years, most of them uncontroversial. He has even helped with three or four murder boards by telephone from Brussels, he said.

"It's an arcane art," he said in a telephone interview. "Most nominees have never done this before. . . . You are not running for sheriff; you are not running for Miss America. You are running for whatever the number is, 10 or 11 votes on the committee and 51 on the floor. That's the constituency."

Carol M. Browner, head of the Environmental Protection Agency in the Clinton administration, said her sherpa's best advice was that confirmation hearings are mostly about the senators, not the nominee.

"Mike Berman said to me, 'When they finish asking that question, wait a few seconds to reflect on the question. It makes you look respectful. It makes you look thoughtful. And it takes up time,' " she said. "He had all these little tricks."

Exactly, Korologos said. "You've got to know the system, the nuances, what buttons to push up on the Hill to make them respond. That's why there aren't many of us doing it."

As confirmation fights have become in some ways proxy battles in the country's culture wars, the need for sherpas has grown. But sherpas are guides, not guarantees, and nominees occasionally fail anyway. Korologos, for all his skill, handled the Bork nomination for the Reagan White House.

"Washington is like Salem," Korologos said. "If we ain't hanging somebody, we ain't happy."

OTHER NEWS:

Gauging Katrina's Impact (WSJ)

By Tim Annett

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Hurricane Katrina is likely to slow growth and boost inflation pressures in the second half of this year, economists believe. But the economy could receive a modest boost early next year amid recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast.

That's the view of economists who participated in this month's Wall Street Journal Online forecasting survey. To reflect the expected economic impact of Katrina, they marked down their annualized forecasts for growth in gross domestic product for the second half of this year by 0.4 percentage point. The survey was conducted Sept. 2-7.

These private-sector economists expect a somewhat smaller impact than what has been predicted by the Congressional Budget Office, which has said that second-half growth could be trimmed by a half to a full percentage point.

The WSJ.com survey found that economists don't expect the slowdown to be long lasting. In light of Katrina, they raised their forecasts for the first half of 2006 by 0.2 percentage point, as they see post-hurricane reconstruction giving the economy a kick in early 2006. Further, the economists say there's only an 18% probability of a recession in the U.S. over the next 12 months.

"In five years, economists with somewhat foggy memories will be asking themselves: 'Now what year was that big hurricane in New Orleans anyway?' because they will not be able to see it in the GDP or inflation data," says Donald Straszheim of Straszheim Global Advisors.

The 56 economists now expect GDP, the broadest measure of U.S. economic activity, to expand at a 3.6% seasonally adjusted annual rate in the third quarter and at a 3.2% rate in the fourth quarter. Those forecasts were down sharply from last month's survey, when the economists predicted growth of 4.2% and 3.6% in the third and fourth quarters, respectively. Forecasts for the first half of 2006 changed little, with the economists expecting growth of 3.3% on average.

These revisions reflect all factors that the economists take into account in arriving at their forecasts, not just the impact of Katrina.

Whether the economists' revised projections prove to be on the money may be another matter. Even the economists themselves aren't sure, as Katrina hasn't just made a mess of New Orleans, it has also played havoc with forecasting. On average, the economists are only 57% confident that officially reported GDP growth will fall within 0.5% of their predictions. That's down sharply from the 67% confidence level they expressed in the August survey.

Why have the economists gone wobbly?

"None of us have ever dealt with anything this large," says Susan M. Sterne of Economic Analysis Associates. She says making sense of incoming economic data will be a somewhat dicey proposition in the months ahead. "Obviously there are going to be effects in the data that may or may not be real effects."

Energy Prices Are Crucial

DOJ_NMG_0004168

Ram Bhagavatula of Combinatorics Capital says retail gasoline prices, which shot up to as much as $5 a gallon in some areas last week, are the key to understanding the post-hurricane economic puzzle. "If gasoline prices go back to pre-hurricane levels, I think the economic effects [from the storm] will be minimal," he says.

Even with the big price increases seen at the pump since the storm, economists say gasoline prices haven't been high enough -- for long enough -- to harm the economy. Though the national average price for a gallon of regular unleaded stood at $3.03 a gallon Thursday, just pennies below a high reached Monday, according to AAA, economists say gasoline would need to reach $4.06 a gallon for a sustained interval in order to present a hazard to the expansion.

Ms. Sterne says she'll be keeping an eye on consumer confidence to determine whether skyrocketing gasoline prices will lead people to steer clear of the shopping mall, crimping consumer demand -- and, thus, overall economic growth. "Worrisome to me is that we were seeing some confidence weakness even prior to this. I'm not sure if it was because of gasoline prices, but it's all very much energy related. The hurricane perpetuates and possibly exaggerates the energy situation."

Impact on Inflation, Jobs

Forecasts for inflation were lifted sharply amid the dramatic increase in gasoline and other energy prices. The economists now see the Labor Department's consumer-price index increasing 3.3% year over year in November, up from an expected 2.8% annual increase that was forecast in last month's survey, and they think the CPI will increase 2.8% in May 2006, up from the 2.5% forecast increase last month. The CPI rose 3.2% in July.

Feeding the expected increase in inflation pressures is the recent jump in a range of spot commodity prices -- from coffee to steel to crude oil -- amid concern about supply disruptions. As Katrina rampaged across the Gulf of Mexico and made landfall in Louisiana, oil rose to more than $70 a barrel, but has since retreated to around $67. The economists expect crude to slip to $61 a barrel at year's end and to fall to around $56 by the end of next June.

The economists expect Katrina to be a drag on the U.S. employment situation. They predict that over the next 12 months, nonfarm payrolls will expand by an average of 173,000 jobs a month -- the lowest forecast in more than a year and well beneath the pace of roughly 195,000 new jobs a month so far in 2005. At the same time, forecasts for the unemployment rate were nudged upward, with the economists now predicting a 5% jobless rate in November and a 4.9% rate in May 2006. Last month, the economists forecast 4.9% unemployment in November and 4.8% unemployment in May.

Katrina and the Fed

Besides stirring up trouble for economic models, Katrina has also created some uncertainty about what the Federal Reserve might do with interest rates. Since June of 2004, the Fed has brought the federal-funds rate from a 46-year low of 1% to 3.5%. After Katrina's landfall, futures-market activity revealed a growing belief that the U.S. central bank would pause its campaign of rate increases before the end of this year.

But more than two-thirds of the economists say the Fed shouldn't halt its campaign to lift rates. Indeed, this month's forecasts for the federal-funds target rate were unchanged; the economists still expect the Fed's key short-term lending rate to reach 4% by the end of this year and 4.25% by June 2006.

Paul Kasriel of Northern Trust believes that the Fed shouldn't stop raising rates as a result of Katrina, but he does think policy makers will take to the sidelines for a time. "I believe Hurricane Katrina will result in a Fed pause through the spring of 2006. By pausing in its funds rate hikes, the Fed will indirectly underwrite much of the increased borrowing by the government sector and private sector related to post-Katrina rebuilding -- borrowing and spending that will boost 2006 real GDP growth (and inflation)."

Among other findings in the survey: · Fifty-nine percent of the economists say that there is a bubble in a few of the hottest local housing markets, but only 26% say a bubble exists in a significant part of the nation. Sixteen percent say there is no bubble at all. Meanwhile, 65% say that the end of the housing boom would lead to a noticeable slowdown in economic growth. About a third say there would be little to no effect. Just two economists feel a recession would result.

· Economist raised their forecasts for long-term interest rates. They now expect the yield on the 10-year Treasury note to be 4.48% at the end of this year and 4.75% by next June. The 10-year yield closed trading Wednesday at 4.14%.

Weekly Jobless Claims Drop, But Katrina May Spur Revision (WSJ/DJN)

By Joseph Rebello And Jeff Bater, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Hurricane Katrina caused at least 10,000 job losses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama last week, although nationwide the number of U.S. workers filing first-time applications for unemployment benefits declined slightly, the government said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0004169

Initial jobless claims declined by 1,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 319,000 in the week that ended Saturday, the Labor Department said. That decline occurred despite the filing of 10,000 disaster-related claims in the states hardest hit by Katrina. A Labor Department statistician said the claims numbers are likely to be revised upward in coming weeks.

"We understand that these states took claims over the weekend, continue to take claims from evacuees, and we expect these claims to be reflected in the numbers released next week," the statistician said.

The volume of jobless claims nationwide was larger than Wall Street had expected: Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires had predicted 310,000 claims.

Economists have begun to predict that the nation's job growth will suffer this month because of Katrina's devastation. The Congressional Budget Office, for example, has estimated that Hurricane Katrina could cause national employment to decline "significantly" in September -- by between 150,000 to 500,000 jobs. But job growth should resume after that "as workers return home and businesses reopen and reconstruction gathers steam," the CBO said in a report Tuesday.

Some Wall Street forecasters, as a result, expect Federal Reserve policy makers to suspend their campaign of interest-rate increases when they next meet on Sept. 20. Since June 2004, the U.S. central bank has raised its key federal-funds rate 10 times, in increments of a quarter percentage point. The rate now stands at 3.5%.

In its report Thursday, the Labor Department said the total number of workers drawing unemployment benefits declined in the week that ended Aug. 27, the latest period for which data are available. That number -- known as continuing claims -- fell by 5,000 to 2,593,000. The unemployment rate for workers with unemployment insurance held steady at 2%.

The department didn't revise its estimate of initial claims for the week of Aug. 27. During that week, it said, Kentucky reported the biggest increase in initial claims, a gain of 3,268 that it attributed to layoffs in the manufacturing industry. North Carolina, citing fewer layoffs in construction and other industries, reported a decline of 1,937 claims.

Wholesale Inventories Fall 0.1%

U.S. wholesale inventories unexpectedly dropped in July as sales increased.

Inventories fell 0.1% to a seasonally adjusted $352.04 billion, after increasing a downwardly revised 0.4% in June, the Commerce Department said Thursday. June inventories were originally seen rising 0.7%. The last time inventories dwindled this much was January 2004, when inventories also slipped by 0.1%.

U.S. wholesale sales rose 0.5% to a seasonally adjusted $298.66 billion. Sales climbed a revised 0.5% in June; demand was originally seen up 0.6% for that month. Economists had expected inventories to rise by 0.6% and sales to climb 0.5%, according to Thomson First Call.

The inventory-to-sales ratio was 1.18 in July, down from 1.19 in June. The ratio measures how many months it would take for a firm to deplete its current inventory. Year over year, sales were up 7.5%, while inventories rose 8.2%.

U.S. business inventories had gotten heavy as the pace of production of goods eclipsed demand. Companies lightened things up in the spring, letting sales absorb stocks of goods and, as a result, inventories rose by a mere $2.6 billion in the second quarter after swelling by $58.2 billion the first three months of the year and $50.1 billion in the fourth quarter.

Inventories of durable goods -- items such as cars and appliances that are meant to last three or more years -- rose 0.3% during July, after increasing 0.7% in June. Durable-goods sales decreased 0.2%, following a flat reading in June. Auto stocks grew 0.2% as car makers extended employee discounts to all buyers, driving summer sales higher and helping unclog overstuffed car lots.

Inventories of nondurable goods such as food and clothing fell 0.7% even though petroleum stocks increased by 5.6%, a climb likely given a push by rising oil prices. Sales of nondurable items rose 1.2%.

Consumers Build Up Debt

Meanwhile, U.S. consumers continued to build up debt in July -- though by far less than economists had expected -- the Federal Reserve said Thursday. Debt growth for big-ticket items such as cars, trucks and boats overshadowed a decline in revolving credit such as credit-card debt.

Consumer credit outstanding rose about $4.4 billion to a record $2.157 trillion, the Fed reported, compared with a revised increase of $14.6 billion in June.

The July increase was less than half the $10 billion economists had expected as they anticipated a bigger rise in nonrevolving credit to finance a sharp rise in auto purchases. The consumer credit data, which exclude real-estate mortgages, tend to be highly volatile from month to month and are frequently revised.

Nonrevolving credit rose by $5.4 billion to $1.352 trillion. That followed a revised increase of $7.4 billion in June, previously reported as a $6.9 billion expansion.

Revolving debt fell $1 billion in July to $805 billion, the first decline in four months and the biggest drop since last November. The July decrease followed a revised $7.2 billion increase in June, first reported as a $7.6 billion expansion.

DOJ_NMG_0004170

Total U.S. consumer credit rose at a 2.4% annual rate in July, compared with a 8.2% annual growth rate in June, the Fed said.

Trying To Absorb The Newly Unemployed (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

DALLAS, Sept. 8 -- A staffing company recruiter greeted Eugene Francois and his wife, Claressa, as they walked into a job fair at the cavernous Dallas Convention Center on Thursday. He shook their hands and asked what sort of employment the couple sought.

"Any kind of job," answered Eugene, a 34-year-old former New Orleans firefighter. He spent the morning filling out applications for positions at the Dallas County Sheriff's Department, a local warehouse staffing company and a trucking company.

The one-day job fair here attracted about 3,000 Hurricane Katrina evacuees settling into Dallas. It also enticed a few local unemployed residents, some of whom worry that the inflow of new workers will intensify competition for work in an area where jobs -- particularly in low-skill sectors -- are already tough to come by.

The assimilation of Hurricane Katrina evacuees into Texas's big cities and into communities across the country will be far from seamless. Almost all the evacuees are now unemployed, and many are also homeless. They are scrambling to find work so they can get out of the Federal Emergency Management Administration's massive shelters, into apartments and on with their lives.

"I'm looking for something that pays in the double digits, but I'll take $9 [an hour]. I'm by myself. I don't need much," said Theron Cosey, who is living in a shelter for evacuees in the convention center. Cosey worked in the engineering room of a hotel in New Orleans but said he also knows how to drive a forklift. He filled out an application for a position at a Dallas warehouse.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that 400,000 jobs were lost throughout the Gulf Coast due to Katrina. So far, only an estimated 10,000 workers who lost their jobs have filed for unemployment benefits, the Labor Department said Thursday. That number would have been higher, but many claims offices in the affected region were shut down. The Labor Department predicted that the number of disaster-related claims will rise sharply in coming weeks and that hundreds of thousands of displaced workers will soon be seeking benefits.

Job fairs and training programs are being offered to newly unemployed workers arriving in Dallas, Houston, San Antonio, Atlanta and other cities. This week, in addition to the Dallas job fair, similar events were held by Goodwill Industries in Shreveport, La., and Atlanta's Workforce Development Agency.

The fair in Dallas was sponsored by the Greater Dallas Chamber of Commerce in cooperation with WorkSource, an arm of the Texas Workforce Commission. Originally planned on a smaller scale at a local community college, the Dallas job fair was expanded this week, with companies coming from as far as Florida to offer evacuees jobs.

About 250,000 of those displaced by Katrina have come to Texas. While they make up a relatively small part of the state's overall population, they will be vying for a hotly contested slice of low-skill jobs, said Daniel S. Hamermesh, an economics professor at the University of Texas at Austin.

"Skilled people will certainly find jobs, [but] in terms of unskilled jobs the labor market is pretty tough," Hamermesh said.

The job fair here Thursday reflected that divide. Most of the 225 companies that set up booths were recruiting for nurses, teachers, welders, or other trades and professions that require technical expertise or college degrees. Fewer positions for general labor were available. A recruiter for $10-an-hour meat-packing positions at Tyson Foods said that he often places people in jobs at one of the company's plants in rural Kansas but that fewer positions have been open in Texas.

Over the past few years, the state's unemployment rate has remained around 5 or 6 percent, but that figure does not reflect the increasing competition in the market for low-skill jobs, Hamermesh said. In Texas, those jobs -- mainly in hotels, restaurants, manufacturing and construction -- often are filled by the state's large population of first-generation immigrants from Mexico, he said.

"In south Texas there is a large overhang of temporary and permanent immigrants, so there will be competition there," he said. "The pay level won't be as good as what [people from New Orleans] are used to," he said.

The League of United Latin American Citizens, a national Latino advocacy group, expects the damage to the tourism and service industries in New Orleans to bring greater competition for jobs in the short term but hopes that it might produce job gains in the future.

"Hopefully we will see a construction boom in these devastated areas, and people will come in and help with that. You do see a lot of Hispanic construction workers in those types of jobs," said Gabriela Lemus, director of policy and legislation for LULAC's Washington office.

DOJ_NMG_0004171

Concern over service-sector jobs was apparent at the Dallas job fair.

Ramona Rayford, 25, lives in Dallas and has been looking for retail positions for six months. She said her last job was in a clothing warehouse without air conditioning and with low pay.

"It's like [employers] push us out [of] the way. They know the Hispanics will do it and take $7 an hour or $5 an hour," Rayford said. "I know they have it hard, too."

When Dallas residents Tiffany Garcia, 18, and her friend Ricky Alvarado, 19, walked into the job fair, she looked around at all of the former New Orleans residents and poked him. "There is going to be way more competition. We ain't going to find a job."

Gas Prices Have Eased, But Other Prices Rising (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina, which has already pushed gasoline above $3 a gallon, is prompting higher prices for everything from building supplies to natural gas and chemicals.

Economists have increased their projections for consumer inflation, some significantly. Global Insight expects inflation to reach 5.7% at an annual rate in third-quarter 2005, compared with its earlier 3.4% estimate. Economy.com expects 3.4% inflation through the end of 2005, up from 2.7%.

Both firms expect the inflation gains to be transitory — oil is off its $70-a-barrel peak, though still running $64.49 — with more manageable inflation in 2006. There are questions regarding how much of the price increases will bleed through to core inflation, which excludes food and energy and is the inflation measure most watched by the Federal Reserve.

But some say price gains could last longer. “The pressing effects on the economy are more likely to be temporary, but the adverse effects on inflation are more likely to be permanent,” says Ward McCarthy of Stone & McCarthy Research Associates.

The Energy Department estimates natural gas prices could rise as much as 71% in the Midwest this fall, with heating oil up more than 30% in the Northeast. The price gains depend on how fast refineries and oil rigs in the gulf are repaired.

Kevin Swift, chief economist of the American Chemistry Council, says chemical manufacturers use 12% of U.S. natural gas and will have to pass along price increases.

“Ultimately, the consumer bears it in any good that contains chemicals,” from plastic bottles to auto parts, Swift says.

Ken Simonson, chief economist of the Associated General Contractors of America, estimates construction costs will jump 10% through 2006, rather than the already high 8% he had expected. Frank Nothaft, vice president at mortgage giant Freddie Mac, says reconstruction could add 2% to 3% to new home costs. But that could be balanced by lower mortgage rates.

Chicken prices have risen because of supply disruptions, and pork prices have moved higher as traders speculate the meat could be a chicken substitute. But the Grocery Manufacturers Association doesn't expect big price gains for food in the near term. Coffee prices are off recent highs, as firms say there is less damage to supplies than expected.

Janet Yellen, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, in a speech Thursday said the Fed's task was complicated before Katrina, as the job market tightened and the economy picked up steam. The central bank has raised its target for short-term rates 10 times since June 2004 to 3.5%.

Fed officials and other economists must now weigh the threat of inflation against the possibility that high oil prices could slow growth. Fed policymakers next meet to review interest rates on Sept. 20 in Washington.

“Our approach during this phase must be particularly dependent on information from incoming data,” Yellen said, adding that energy prices could feed into core inflation.

Also affecting the outlook is reconstruction spending. The approval by Congress of a $51.8 billion aid package Thursday brings disaster aid so far to more than $60 billion. The quick aid could stimulate the economy faster than expected and end any lingering chance that Congress will rein in deficits.

Stocks Take A Breather (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

After two days of solid gains on Wall Street, investors stepped away from the plate Thursday, and stocks drifted lower as crude oil ticked up.

Home builders took it on the chin amid concerns that the housing boom could slow. The trigger was a lackluster earnings report by Hovnanian Enterprises, which posted net income of $1.76 a share for the third quarter late Wednesday, two cents below expectations.

The Red Bank, N.J., builder also served up disappointing guidance for the rest of the year and for 2006. Its shares slumped 6.7%. Toll Brothers fell 3.4%, KB Homes shed 2% and Pulte Homes lost 1.4%.

DOJ_NMG_0004172

Bill Strazzulo, chief trading strategist at State Street, said concerns about the housing market were overblown. Treasury bonds have rallied recently, he noted, sending their yields lower. Since mortgage rates are tied to bond yields, a strong bond market should give support to housing, he said.

The decline among home builders had a ricochet effect on some banks, said Sarah Hunt, senior vice president at Capital Management Associates. Since "a large percentage of banks' earnings are related to mortgages," she said, if the housing market cools, that could put a big dent in their earnings. The Philadelphia Bank Sector index fell 0.72%.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 37.57 points to 10595.93. Intel gained 1.7% ahead of its midquarter earnings update after the bell. It gave much of that back after it tightened its revenue guidance for the quarter. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index shed 4.69 to 1231.67 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 6 points to 2166.03.

Light, sweet crude jumped toward the end of open-outcry trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, settling up 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel on news of a large decline in output from the Gulf of Mexico. Oil prices spent most of the day lower after the government reported that petroleum stocks fell less than expected last week.

The report was one of the first yardsticks of the damage done to the oil-and-gas supply system in the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina struck last Monday. It gave investors some relief that the devastation may not have been as widespread as earlier feared.

The Minerals Management Service, a branch of the Interior Department that monitors fossil-fuel production in the U.S., said the amount of Gulf of Mexico oil production shut down by Hurricane Katrina rose to 901,726 barrels a day, or 60% of total output. That was up from the 57% reported offline Wednesday, and renewed concerns that the nation could face an energy shortage in the coming days and weeks.

Investors had little hard economic data to guide them Thursday. The Labor Department reported that initial jobless claims declined by 1,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 319,000 in the week that ended Sept. 3, the Labor Department said. That decline occurred despite the filing of 10,000 disaster-related claims last week in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, the states hardest hit by Katrina. Economists had called for a decrease of about 10,000 claims to 310,000.

In major market action:

Stocks fell7. On the Big Board, where 1.4 billion shares traded, 1,205 stocks rose and 2,060 fell on Thursday. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 1,182 stocks advanced and 1,806 declined.

Bonds advanced8. The benchmark 10-year Treasury gained 1/32, or 31 cents per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.139%. The 30-year bond was up 2/32 to yield 4.419%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.9 It traded at 110.34 yen, up from 110.04 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.2427 from $1.2421.

Gulf Banks May Come Out On Top (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel, Valerie Bauerlein And James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

The bright red sign atop Hancock Holding Co.'s headquarters is illuminated again -- and that could be a good sign for investors.

The 106-year-old bank, based in Gulfport, Miss., is one of dozens of regional and national financial institutions with large operations in the areas devastated by Hurricane Katrina last week.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. estimates that some 280 locally based institutions may have been affected by Katrina, representing $270 billion in assets and $201.3 billion in deposits. Big names in the area include Regions Financial Corp., AmSouth Bancorp, Compass Bancshares Inc. and Whitney Holding Corp.

Although the stocks of some affected banks tumbled last week when the storm's devastation became apparent, investors are betting that the area's economic recovery will generate enormous revenue and loan growth next year.

"As an investor, you can take some reassurance in the fact that after an initial period of loss of business, there will be a lot of cash and insurance proceeds flowing into the area," said James Schmidt, a portfolio manager at John Hancock Funds in Boston, which is owned by Canada's Manulife Financial Corp.

Like the banks, analysts are scrambling to determine the extent of the damage and how it will affect earnings. In addition to getting stuck with bad loans, banks are also likely to incur costs associated with repairing their own facilities and reinstating services to customers.

The storm came at a delicate time in the banking industry. In recent months, bank profits have been squeezed by a flattening yield curve -- the difference between short-term and long-term rates. The profit pinch has prompted some institutions to cut costs and free up funds that have been set aside for bad loans. Now, they may have to add more to those loan-loss reserves, which could take a bite out of earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0004173

"It is unclear the magnitude of an impact that the recovery will have on bank earnings, but we believe that it is likely that results could be impacted for at least a few quarters," Kenneth Usdin, an analyst at Bank of America Corp., wrote in a report issued Tuesday. The report didn't quantify a potential impact.

Richard Bove, an analyst at Punk Ziegel & Co., estimated that Regions could face a billion-dollar loan loss from the storm, resulting in a $1.35 hit to per-share earnings. Still, "we would ignore this write-down if it occurs" due to "a steady stream of new businesses that will flow into this bank as southern Louisiana and Mississippi are rebuilt," he wrote in a report released yesterday.

"There will be credit issues," said Chris Spoth, acting director of supervision and consumer protection at the FDIC. "However, the banks were in very strong condition going into this crisis." Banks can turn to the Federal Reserve and the Federal Home Loan Banks for emergency short-term loans if they experience a shortage of cash, though Mr. Spoth said "we haven't seen" much of an increase in demand for such loans.

Still, the wrath inflicted by Katrina is far different than that of Hurricane Hugo, which ravaged Charleston, S.C., in 1989 or Andrew, which swept through Florida in 1992. Although those storms inflicted billions of dollars in damages that took years to repair, there were far fewer questions about the ability of those communities to rebuild. In New Orleans, the bulk of the city remains underwater, and it isn't clear if displaced residents -- now scattered around the country -- will ever return.

"The eventual reconstruction of the marketplace is going to be bigger [than other storms], but there will be more pain felt by the banks in the wake of this hurricane versus others," said Jefferson Harralson, an analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods Inc. in Atlanta.

Unlike some of its more diversified rivals, Hancock has a 43% market share in its namesake Hancock County, one of the areas hardest hit by Katrina. The bank has $4.7 billion in assets and 107 branches. A branch in Bay St. Louis, Miss., was one of three destroyed by the storm. Another branch located just east of Gulfport was obliterated. "What's left is the vault and the sign," said Richard T. Hill, executive vice president, based in Baton Rouge, La.

But after listening to a conference call with Hancock executives late Tuesday, Andrew Stapp of boutique research firm Cohen Bros. & Co. raised his rating on the bank to "buy" from "hold."

"We believe the market is overreacting with regard to the impact of Hurricane Katrina on [Hancock] and perhaps is underestimating the long-term benefits associated with recovery efforts over the next several years," Mr. Stapp wrote in a research report. Still, he lowered earnings estimates for the bank for 2005 and 2006 based on an increase in loan-loss provisions. The bank, for its part, thinks its exposure to bad loans "is relatively limited," said Michael M. Achary, the bank's treasurer, who is based in Gulfport but is working out of the Baton Rouge office.

In any case, Katrina is expected to cause a surge in defaults on home mortgages. In Louisiana alone, officials have estimated that as many 160,000 homes were ruined. Insurers will bear the costs of replacing those houses in many instances. To the extent that destroyed homes aren't insured against flooding, lenders or other holders of mortgage debt will face possible losses.

But "most investors have very low exposure to the affected areas," said Peter DiMartino, a strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital, an investment-banking firm in Greenwich, Conn. That is because mortgage risks are widely dispersed among lenders and investors around the world. Most U.S. home loans are bundled into mortgage-backed securities and held by banks, insurance companies, pension funds and other investors -- and most have a small exposure to the region hit by the storm.

Most lenders will allow borrowers in affected areas a grace period to delay repayments without facing extra fees, the Mortgage Bankers Association said. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, mortgage-funding providers established by Congress but owned by investors, own or guarantee around half of the $8.3 trillion of U.S. residential mortgage debt outstanding. Spokesmen for both companies said they are still assessing the situation and can't estimate its financial effect. Based on the experience of past hurricanes, however, neither company is likely to face major losses. The credit risk on most mortgages that aren't backed by Fannie, Freddie or the Federal Housing Administration is borne by holders of so-called nonagency mortgage securities. Mortgage analysts at UBS AG in New York released a report this week estimating that less than 1% of the amounts due on loans backing such securities are in the ZIP Codes most affected by Katrina.

Four Easy Pieces (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

If the feds really want to help the economy post-Katrina, here are four words: lumber, cement, shrimp and steel. They all have prices higher than necessary because of U.S. anti-dumping trade law.

Start with lumber and cement, which will soon be in great demand to rebuild the tens of thousands of damaged homes. Prices are sure to rise as reconstruction begins, but thanks to U.S. tariffs as high as 27% on Canadian lumber, American home buyers already pay an extra $1,000 on average for their shelter. The same goes for U.S. duties on Mexican cement, which have averaged 55% since 1990. Now would be an ideal time for Washington to declare a truce in these trade spats and reduce the price of rebuilding.

DOJ_NMG_0004174

Then there's shrimp, an increasingly popular part of the American diet whose prices may well rise sharply in Katrina's wake. Louisiana shrimpers represent the bulk of the domestic industry and were all but wiped out by the hurricane. According to the Consuming Industries Trade Action Coalition, shrimp as a share of total food consumption increased 45% among low-income families from 2000 to 2002. And while the U.S. shrimp industry employed 13,000 in 2002, shrimp-consuming industries employed 250,000.

So this is also a perfect time to review the anti-dumping duties the U.S. imposes on foreign shrimp. The U.S. International Trade Commission, which determines these things, is already scheduled to meet this month to consider relief for India and Thai shrimp after the December 2004 tsunami. But the ITC ought to do even more post-Katrina for American consumers and waive duties on all foreign shrimp.

And while we're at it, consider specialty steel, which depends on hydrogen gas produced in the Gulf. Steel Dynamics, a mini-mill in Butler, Indiana, has already said it will stop making cold-rolled, galvanized and painted sheet products until its hydrogen gas supplies are restored. Steel prices are rising fast in anticipation of tight supplies, which means higher prices for American companies making cars, appliances and many other products. So how about lifting anti-dumping tariffs on imported steel to ease any domestic shortages and help U.S. manufacturers trying to stay competitive?

The Beltway impulse is to assume that the only way to respond to a natural disaster is to spend more money. But these four easy trade pieces would help everyone without taxpayers having to spend a dime.

Crude Oil Supplies Overwhelm Refineries (FT)

By Carola Hoyos And Javier Blas

Financial Times, September 9, 2005

The US and Europe are releasing more emergency crude oil than refineries in the Gulf of Mexico can handle, reinforcing suspicions that governments are using the crisis triggered by Hurricane Katrina to cap record oil prices.

US refineries will on Friday begin to bid for the 30m barrels of crude oil that the US government is releasing from the its emergency reserves but, with many refineries disabled, analysts say the additional supply may not be needed.

“I will not be surprised if they don't bid for all the barrels,” said Katherine Spector, of JPMorgan in New York.

Data released on Thursday suggested that, while petrol is in short supply, oil companies still have plenty of crude in their inventories. The companies' stocks fell 6.45m barrels last week, significantly less than the 13.6m barrels of production capacity lost to the hurricane suggesting that the shortfall did not warrant the scale of the governments' responses.

President George W. Bush has insisted that the US Strategic Petroleum Reserve, which holds nearly 700m barrels of crude oil, will release supplies to relieve shortages, not to depress prices.

The same line has been taken by the International Energy Agency, the industrial countries' oil watchdog, which last week announced a 2m-barrels-a-day emergency release for the next 30 days. That total of 60m barrels includes the 30m barrels from the US's SPR. Société Générale, the Paris-based bank, estimates that the emergency stocks released more than cover last week's loss of crude production and the continuing losses expected over the next 40 days.

Frédéric Lasserre, the bank's chief oil analyst, said the emergency stocks of crude released covered 154 per cent of the lost production.

The excess oil comes on top of commercial crude inventories in the US that are well above 2004 levels and the average over the past five years.

But Mr Lasserre said emergency stockpiles of petrol released by Europe only covered half the loss caused by Hurricane Katrina.

Five US refineries, with a combined capacity of more than 1.1m b/d, 5 per cent of the country's total, were still closed on Thursday.

Samuel Bodman, US energy secretary, said it would take “at least three months” to get them producing. Refineries process crude oil into petrol, diesel, jet fuel and other products, so shutting down a refinery reduces the need for crude but also curtails the supply of petroleum products.

In spite of that, more than 60 per cent of the total international emergency stocks that are being released consist of oil, with petrol accounting for 18.7 per cent. The rest is heating oil and fuel oil.

The US's SPR only contains crude oil, while European countries stock both oil and petroleum products.

Mr Bush criticised the Clinton administration for using the SPR in 2000 to manipulate markets and refused to tap it as prices reached records and pressure from Democrats grew earlier this year. But shortly before the hurricane, oil prices rose to $60 a barrel and there were signs that high oil prices were affecting the economy in the US and beyond.

DOJ_NMG_0004175

Wal-Mart warned that its bottom line was suffering because record petrol prices meant its customers had less money to spend in the stores. Meanwhile Asian countries, such as Indonesia or the Philippines, began to blame the decline in their growth and the value of their currency on high oil prices. US oil prices rose 12 cents on Thursday to $64.49 a barrel.

'A Significantly Slower Recovery' (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 9, 2005

Now for the hard part.

In the first days after Hurricane Katrina, repair crews made good progress bringing oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico back to life. But restoration of energy output to pre-Katrina levels stalled late this week as industry specialists began addressing some of the worst damage to the region's sprawling energy infrastructure.

Ten days after the hurricane barreled ashore, gulf oil production Thursday was less than 40% of normal levels, down from 43% one day earlier, according to the U.S. Minerals Management Service. The lower number was because an oil company that had not previously reported finally did, says Gary Strasburg, an MMS spokesman.

Natural gas output Thursday stood at 59%, almost unchanged from the previous day.

"This is significantly slower than the recovery from (Hurricane) Ivan," says Jamal Qureshi of PFC Energy in Washington, D.C. "The easy stuff has been brought back. … Now the tough stuff is ahead of us."

Oil prices, which had eased a bit earlier in the week, rose slightly on the discouraging gulf numbers. Light sweet crude for October delivery closed at $64.49 a barrel, up 12 cents, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gasoline futures settled slightly higher at $2.0222 a gallon, while heating oil fell more than 3 cents to settle at $1.9296.

Industry crews face several obstacles before they can fully restore production. As Katrina bore down on New Orleans, it scythed through waters thick with oil platforms and onto a shoreline hosting the heart of U.S. refining capacity. When the waters eventually crested, more than 95% of gulf oil production and 88% of gas output was "shut in," industry parlance for closed off. The region accounts for more than one-quarter of U.S. domestic oil and gas production.

Even industry veterans have been stunned at Katrina's power. "Massive waves mangled production equipment and piping, living quarters. … I've been doing this for 35 years, and I've never seen such damage," says Kenneth Neveaux of Houston-based Apache, an independent oil and gas company that lost eight platforms to the storm.

More than three dozen oil platforms were capsized by the powerful storm, says Rebecca Watson, assistant secretary of the Interior. Earlier this week, she told Congress it will take "weeks or even months before we are back up to 100%."

One big worry: A quartet of major deep-water platforms that produce 10% of gulf oil "suffered extensive damage which could take up to 3 to 6 months to bring back on line," Watson said.

Royal Dutch Shell's Mars platform, operating in almost 3,000 feet of water, is among those hardest hit. Lying 130 miles southeast of New Orleans, Mars normally produces about 147,000 barrels each day. On Aug. 31, Shell confirmed on its website that the unit "was significantly damaged in the storm." Thursday, Shell spokeswoman Darci Sinclair said no further information was yet available.

The destruction at sea was mirrored by the damage ashore. Katrina flooded refineries with several feet of briny soup, blew out windows and cut electricity. Ten refineries, which turn crude oil into products such as gasoline and heating oil, were closed by the storm; five others had to throttle back. Including some Midwestern facilities that closed because they ran dry of crude, 20% of U.S. refining capacity was affected, says Bob Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical & Refiners Association.

Four refineries, the largest a 325,000 barrels-a-day Chevron facility in Pascagoula, Miss., likely will remain closed for some time. Together, the facilities account for about 5% of total capacity — more than enough to make a difference in today's skittish market.

"The ones that are not on yet are probably the ones that are going to require more time and attention. Now we are really getting into the tougher part of the job," Slaughter says. "I don't think that people really understand the magnitude of the damage that's been done."

In some places, specialists are still trying to assess Katrina's legacy. The condition of the undersea pipelines that ferry oil and gas from the offshore production sites to land-based processing facilities is a big unknown.

And some experts are beginning to worry that the near-silence from pipeline companies masks serious trouble with the 33,000 miles of plumbing that snake beneath the gulf. "It's taking a long time to get the answer. Educated guess: No news is bad news," says David Pursell of the Houston-based consultancy Pickering Energy Partners.

Gas Inventories At A 5-Year Low (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

DOJ_NMG_0004176

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

The nation's gasoline inventories fell last week to their lowest levels in almost five years, the government said yesterday, quantifying for the first time Hurricane Katrina's effect on energy supplies and production.

Americans bought and used about as much gasoline as they did a year earlier - 9.3 million barrels a day - in the week that ended last Friday, but gasoline inventories fell 2.2 percent from the previous week because of supply and production disruptions, the Energy Department reported.

The figures did not include the Labor Day weekend, and gasoline stocks may have declined even more since then.

The hurricane has reduced oil and gasoline production, refining and distribution in the Gulf of Mexico region, and energy companies are still trying to recover lost capacity.

For consumers, the disruptions meant high retail prices and, in some areas, spot shortages of gasoline.

A gallon of regular unleaded gasoline was selling yesterday for an average of $3.03 nationwide, down from $3.04 on Wednesday, according to AAA. Average prices peaked at $3.06 on Monday and briefly spiked up to $4 to $5 during the last week in some cities, Atlanta among them.

Crude oil prices rose 12 cents, to $64.49 a barrel yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Up to 10 refineries in the Gulf Coast that account for 10 percent of the country's capacity were shut and two critical pipelines that bring gasoline and other fuels to the South, the Middle Atlantic States and the Northeast were not operating at full capacity for much of last week. Six refineries are still shut and about half of the gulf's oil and natural gas production remains out of service.

All told, gasoline inventories fell to 190.1 million barrels as of Friday, down 8.6 percent from the period a year earlier. Measured another way, the nation has inventories that could last 20.4 days given normal demand and no additional production.

"That's the lowest in five years," said Fadel Gheit, an energy analyst at Oppenheimer & Company.

"It doesn't matter that if I have whatever level of inventories, but I am consuming a lot more, therefore it will last me fewer days," Mr. Gheit said.

Where Do Gas Prices Go Next? (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

Gasoline prices have begun to ease, but even when all Gulf Coast refineries are running again later this year, consumers may not see a full retreat to pre-Katrina levels.

That conclusion, analysts say, stems from a simple equation involving the cost of a barrel of crude, markups by middlemen, and little margin for error in the nation's energy infrastructure. Across the country, gasoline prices soared into uncharted territory - above $3 per gallon last weekend - stunning motorists and prompting many to shorten or skip Labor Day trips.

Concerns about price gouging by gas stations are being investigated in state capitals and the halls of Congress. Prices have already begun to pull back, as some refineries and long-distance pipelines affected by hurricane Katrina return to full strength.

How far and how quickly prices fall now depend on a few critical factors: when four damaged refineries come back on line, how quickly emergency shipments of gasoline from foreign refineries arrive, and most important, where oil prices go from here.

"As long as crude is high, the gasoline price will be high, although it doesn't have to be where it was the past few days," says Ron Gold, an energy analyst at the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation.

Oil prices fell Thursday to around $64 a barrel in midday trading after Energy Department figures showed higher than expected post-Katrina inventories.

The department's Energy Information Administration said this week it expects gasoline to reach $2.60 a gallon by year end and to average $2.40 a gallon in 2006. Despite the predicted drop, that would still be above July levels, which the EIA pegged at nearly $2.32 per gallon.

Of course, as with all forecasts, actual prices - like gas mileage - may vary. But prices in the mid-to-high $2 range represent a significant shift in what is, for many Americans, the most visible gauge of energy costs.

The question for the economy is how much gas prices will affect overall consumer spending, which drives two-thirds of US growth. So far, recession is not in most forecasts, but high energy costs have been a key predictor of economic slowdowns in the past.

And gas prices are just part of the picture. Although gasoline accounts for about half of America's oil use, surging energy prices in recent months may show up most sharply in heating costs this winter. Natural gas, home heating oil, and electricity costs are all rising.

DOJ_NMG_0004177

The thought may be enough to prompt a rush for cardigan sweaters. But the price of those may edge up, too, as oil prices ripple through trucking and shipping costs.

Several factors, thankfully, could soften the shock at the gas pump and beyond.

For one thing, everything from automobiles to refrigerators to factories are more energy efficient now than they were in the 1970s. This shelters the economy somewhat from price swings.

Emergency responses to hurricane Katrina are helping as well: The Bush administration has eased regional gas-blend rules, so supplies can move freely to wherever they're needed. Strategic petroleum reserves are being tapped. Foreign supplies of gasoline are on the way. And on the Gulf Coast, which contains almost half of America's refining capacity, oil companies are racing to bring refineries and platforms back on line.

"The panic component of the gasoline prices should drop back down to something more in line with oil prices," says John Tobin of the Energy Literacy Project in Colorado.

Any price gouging that occurred in the wake of Katrina may be squelched soon, as federal and state watchdogs track down consumer allegations.

Indeed, as Katrina pushed up wholesale prices for gas by 50 cents or more overnight, America's streetscape grew surreal. In one stretch of road near Boston, retail prices for regular unleaded ranged from $3.04 to $3.69 per gallon last Friday.

"To some extent [price gouging] has happened," says Mark Routt, an analyst at Energy Security Analysis Inc. in Wakefield, Mass. "But my understanding is that it's been relatively rare and isolated."

In general, gas prices are driven by predictable economics: The price for crude oil, costs of refining and transporting, operating costs for 167,000 gas stations, and profit margins for all parties.

Prices typically drop heading into winter as driving season winds down. The gas tab also varies by state depending on tax levels and environmental regulation.

As for crude oil, it is measured in barrels that equate to 42 gallons each. "At $65 a barrel, that translates into $1.55 plus per gallon," before refining, distributing, or taxing, says Mr. Gold of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation.

Economic forecasts vary on where that base-level price heads to next.

"World oil markets are fundamentally tight," says A.F. Alhajji, an oil economist at Ohio Northern University in Ada, Ohio. He wouldn't be surprised by oil at $75 oil a barrel in coming months.

But others say the current high price could give producers an incentive to reopen wells that weren't profitable at $35 a barrel. And it gives consumers an incentive to conserve. "Demand responds to the price signal," says Gus Foucher of Economy.com in West Chester, Pa., who predicts oil will cost $50 by the end of 2006. "Once we get through the hurricane season I think things will calm down a bit."

After Buying Surge, Demand For Gasoline Eases (LAT)

By James F. Peltz And Claire Hoffman

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

Hello, tipping point? Drivers' demand for gasoline appears to have downshifted since Hurricane Katrina sent pump prices soaring above $3 a gallon across much of the nation.

Katrina initially sparked panic buying, sporadic shortages and televised images of long lines at some service stations. Then, consumers pulled back as prices hit record highs, analysts said Thursday.

"America topped its tanks, and then the knee-jerk reaction was: `I'm not going to pay $3.19 a gallon for gas,' " said Tom Kloza, chief analyst at Oil Price Information Service, an energy research firm.

Demand was likely to taper off anyway, because the Labor Day weekend marks the unofficial end of the busy summer driving season. In addition, gas prices already were at or near record levels even before Katrina hit Aug. 29.

But in the aftermath of Katrina, at least one gasoline seller reported a 15 percent drop in sales over Labor Day weekend compared with a year earlier, Kloza said.

The Energy Department issues weekly reports on gasoline demand and supplies, and many analysts expected its report Thursday to show a surge in demand during the four days after Katrina's devastation, reflecting the panic buying.

Yet the agency's statistics arm, the Energy Information Administration, reported Thursday that in the week ended Sept. 2, gasoline demand fell 4 percent from the prior week to 9.03 million barrels a day.

Analysts promptly labeled the data as suspect, contending that reliable numbers were hard to obtain in the days immediately after Katrina made landfall.

With about 20 percent of U.S. refining capacity either shut down or operating at reduced levels last week, compiling precise data was difficult and "we question the accuracy of these numbers," analyst Jacques Rousseau of the investment firm Friedman Billings Ramsey & Co. said in a report to clients.

DOJ_NMG_0004178

Meanwhile, prices of gasoline and crude-oil futures edged higher in commodities trading after falling for several days.

The U.S. benchmark grade of light crude oil for October delivery rose 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel, and gasoline for October delivery inched up 1.33 cents to $2.036 a gallon.

The upswing came after the government reported no daily progress on the Gulf Coast's overall effort to rebuild its damaged energy facilities, a stark reminder that the recovery is expected to take months and require enormous investment.

About 60 percent of the region's oil production remained shut down, up from 57 percent on Wednesday, and the amount of natural-gas output that remained offline was unchanged at 40 percent, according to the U.S. Minerals Management Service.

The average price of self-serve regular nationwide slipped to $3.03 a gallon from $3.042 on Wednesday, according to AAA.

U.S. Gasoline Use Fell 4% Last Week (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball And Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Americans used 4% less gasoline amid skyrocketing pump prices last week than they did the week before Hurricane Katrina hit, the federal government reported. But whether that indicates consumers have decided to conserve or merely that they couldn't find all the gasoline they wanted isn't clear.

The figures came amid signs that Katrina's effect on the nation's energy markets will continue to be felt in the weeks and months to come. The Department of Energy's Energy Information Administration said yesterday that stores of gasoline last week fell below the average range for the period, in a time when refineries are running flat-out to meet demand, after the hurricane knocked out Gulf Coast refineries. Meanwhile, the U.S. Coast Guard said yesterday that 52 energy-production platforms in the Gulf of Mexico were missing and 58 were damaged by the hurricane, nearly double the report of missing or damaged platforms Tuesday.

Following weeks in which U.S. gasoline use stood at more than 9.4 million barrels a day, it fell to about nine million barrels in the week ended last Friday, the EIA reported. Use fell by a similar amount compared with the year-earlier period. However, EIA officials cautioned that one week doesn't make a long-term trend.

The figures didn't include data from the Labor Day weekend or from this week. It's also unclear whether the weather simply reduced driving in the affected states, though government analysts doubted that explained the full drop. Tom Kloza, chief oil analyst with the Oil Price Information Service, a Wall, N.J., industry-research firm, said fuel retailers he has talked to have reported a particularly large drop-off in demand since Saturday. "It dropped off the table," he said -- a shift that, if true, wouldn't be reflected until the next government report, due out next week.

Yesterday's EIA numbers were the second indication in as many days that Americans might be tempering their consumptive ways in response to sharply higher gasoline prices. On Wednesday, the EIA slashed its prediction for U.S. oil-demand growth for the full year, "largely due to higher prices."

Meanwhile, the federal Minerals Management Service reported that 49.6% of combined oil and natural-gas production in the Gulf was still offline yesterday, slightly more than the 49.4% that was shut down on Tuesday. In the days after the hurricane, offshore operators were able to put workers back on numerous platforms and quickly restore about half of the daily output from the Gulf, which accounts for about a quarter of domestic oil and natural-gas production.

But since Tuesday, virtually no additional production has been brought back online. "We've restored the low-hanging fruit and I suspect there will be diminishing returns from here on out," said David Dismukes, associate director of the Louisiana State University Center for Energy Studies in Baton Rouge, La.

Yesterday's bearish news on the pace of infrastructure repairs raised specific concerns about the supply of natural gas for the coming home-heating season. Crews are canvassing the Gulf to determine which pipelines, hub facilities and platforms require repairs.

October natural-gas futures yesterday rose 14.6 cents to close at $11.347 a million British thermal units. Crude-oil futures finished up 12 cents to $64.49 a barrel, up 48% year-to-date. Gasoline futures rose 1.58 cents to $2.04 a gallon.

Separately, British Airways and Singapore Airlines, two of the largest international carriers, raised fuel surcharges on most airline tickets.

Governor Criticizes Bush, Oil Industry Over Record Gas Prices (BJ)

By Mike Sunnucks

The Business Journal, September 9, 2005

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano criticized the Bush administration Thursday for failing to deal with the oil industry and record high gasoline prices.

DOJ_NMG_0004179

Napolitano said the Bush administration has not been aggressive enough in dealing with sky high gasoline prices in recent years and in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The Democratic governor said the Republican White House has not been interested in consumers when it comes to the energy industry.

Phoenix area gasoline prices spiked after Katrina slammed New Orleans and the Gulf Coast. Valley gasoline prices are well above $3 per gallon and higher than California, which usually has higher prices.

Arizona receives more than two-thirds of its gasoline from California but prices still spiked after the hurricane. That worries state officials from both political parties.

Napolitano and state Attorney General Terry Goddard, also a Democrat, announced Wednesday they are investigating gasoline and oil companies for possible state antitrust violations and price collusion.

The governor said she met with oil industry representatives this week and did not receive satisfactory answers to why Arizona prices spiked after Katrina and why state prices are higher than California.

Napolitano said she wants the industry to show some transparency when it comes to pricing and supplies and more action out of the Bush administration.

The governor has pressed President Bush several times in recent years after gasoline price hikes, asking the federal government to investigate pricing, supply and possible antitrust issues. She said the administration has not responded aggressively to those requests.

Some Arizona Republicans favor temporarily suspending 5 percent state fuel tax to help lower gasoline prices. Napolitano said that might not have the desired impact if oil companies and gas stations opt to raise prices even more.

The Bush administration and governor have lifted Phoenix area clean air fuel regulations to allow the sale of various fuel blends in order to improve supplies.

President Bush has also released oil supplies from federal reserves in hope of bolstering national supplies and easing prices.

The governor also joined the chorus of criticism over federal handling of hurricane relief efforts, saying the Federal Emergency Management Administration is "disorganized" and that embattled agency director Michael Brown should be fired.

The Arizona Democrat also said congressional Republicans bear some responsibility for hurricane relief problems, pointing to reductions in funding for New Orleans levee systems and state emergency management programs.

Goddard and Napolitano also back a proposed state anti-price gouging law aimed at gasoline stations. That plan has failed to gain support from Republican legislators.

Democrats hope to make record high gasoline and crude oil prices and GOP ties to the energy industry a top issue in next year's elections.

Republicans, including Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, agree that there were problems with hurricane relief efforts and are concerned about gasoline price hikes.

The GOP argues some of the hurricane blame goes to state and local officials in Louisiana. Napolitano said Thursday that Louisiana Democratic Gov. Kathleen Blanco and GOP Govs. Haley Barbour of Mississippi and Bob Riley of Alabama have done good jobs in dealing with the storm and its aftermath.

For more: www.governor.state.az.us.

Gasoline Thefts Increasing As Fuel Prices Keep Rising (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

As fuel prices rise, and the tempers of American drivers with them, so, too, has the number of people who are stealing gasoline.

From Maine to Oklahoma, gas station owners are reporting a surge in the number of drivers who pull up to the pump, fill up and drive off without paying. The incidents, known as "drive offs" - which are typically concentrated at stations near big cities and Interstates - are forcing stations across the country to adopt prepay policies for cash customers.

Gasoline theft cost the industry - made up largely of convenience stores - $237 million in 2004, trade associations estimate, and the figure is on track to double this year, said Matthew Kussman, the director of business development at GasPriceWatch.com, which tracks gasoline prices and is starting a national database of theft incidents.

"There is a direct correlation between theft and prices being the highest they have ever been," Mr. Kussman said. "And Hurricane Katrina has not helped the situation."

Station owners report that they have sometimes faced frightening confrontations with gas thieves.

DOJ_NMG_0004180

Last month, a station owner in Alabama was struck and killed after he tried to get in front of a sport utility vehicle whose driver was trying to leave without paying.

"This is absolutely a concern," said Holly Tuminello, the vice president of the Petroleum Marketers Association of America. "People get mad when they fill up their car and become irrational at the person selling gas at their little store."

Store owners and convenience store managers interviewed around the country said they had gone from none to a few cases a week to several a day. The thefts began to spike, the station owners say, around midsummer, when gas prices hit $2.50 a gallon. And prices have pushed higher since then. AAA reported yesterday that a gallon of regular unleaded gasoline was selling for $3.03 on average nationwide, down from $3.04 on Wednesday. Average prices peaked at $3.06 on Monday and spiked at $4 to $5 in some cities.

"We are up to two or three a day," said Kelly Porter, a clerk at the Citgo Quick Mart in Norfolk, Va. "They pump and make sure we aren't looking and just drive off."

In contrast to heavily urbanized areas on the East and West Coasts where nearly all stations require prepayment by cash or credit card, many stations elsewhere in the nation allow customers to pump first because it is both convenient for drivers and more lucrative. People who prepay tend to put less gas in their cars. But, it allows for theft.

People who pump without paying can be seen in all sorts of cars - from late-model sedans to brand new S.U.V.'s - and include college students and even the occasional retiree, station owners said. In June members of a theft ring in Florida were arrested for using trucks to siphon off gallons of gas from stations.

Wyman Tapley, the owner of Tapley's Grill and Variety in Bar Harbor, Maine, said he was so stunned by the drive-offs that the first time it happened, he thought a customer had simply been chatting with other locals, forgot to pay and would return the next day, as happens from time to time.

"I just didn't think this could happen this far north," Mr. Tapley said. "We live on an island so it is hard to believe people think they could do that and get away with it." Arrests of gas thieves is rare, gas station owners and operators said.

In response to the wave of thefts, many individual station owners and convenience store companies who previously were more trusting are requiring customers to pay cash before they pump. That represents a sea change for stations in small towns and many American cities. Some cities have passed laws to require prepay, and others, like New Jersey, require an attendant to pump gas.

On Wednesday, Cumberland Farms, a chain of convenience stores, reversed its position and decided that it would require drivers to pay before pumping in 140 of its 900 stations in the Northeast and Florida. The stations are in "places where the other competitors are all prepay," said Christen Graham, a spokeswoman for the company. "Cumberland farms felt it actually became a target. So they have changed the policy."

Wawa, the Pennsylvania-based convenience store chain, said last week that its 540 stores in five states would begin to require prepayment. "Drive-offs may create unsafe situations on store lots, and contribute to higher prices," the company said in a statement.

Drivers who pay with credit cards at the pump - 54 percent last year - are not affected by prepay policies.

"It is not too good for people who come here every day," said Benny Nat, whose family owns a Citgo Quick Mart, in Des Moines.

Generally, store owners selling gas are loath to require drivers to prepay. Drivers often underestimate how much it will cost to fill up, and buy less, said Jeff Lenard, the spokesman for the National Association of Convenience Stores, in Alexandria Va.

Further, prepay drivers tend to pick up fewer bags of M&M's and bottles of water, and those who are required to prepay, especially in times of high prices, may opt to do so with a credit card, which raises fees and chews at the margins of the station owners.

"Most retailers don't make their money at the pump," Mr. Lenard said. "They really need customers to get in the store."

The QuikTrip Corporation, a convenience store and gas station company in Tulsa, has come up with a solution that other companies will probably ape. Cash customers provide gas station clerks with their driver's license, who in turn give the drivers a plastic card that activates the pump, but allows them to pay after pumping. If the driver does not pay the is deactivated and the license number is turned over to the police.

"Two years ago in Tulsa we were losing $4 million a year in gas rips," said Mike Thornbrugh a spokesman for QuikTrip, which operates stations in nine states. "And since we have instituted this, you would be lucky to see losses of a couple hundred dollars a month. We love it, and law enforcement loves it, too."

US Changes Position On Cuba's Weapons (CSM)

By Tom Regan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 9, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004181

In 2002, John Bolton, then US undersecretary for arms control and international security (and current US ambassador to the United Nations) said that Cuba had "biological weapons capabilities" and was sharing them with "rogue nations." Mr. Bolton and the Bush administration were adamant that Cuba was a potential threat to the United States because of this.

So it came as somewhat of a surprise last Tuesday when the US retreated from this early claim that Cuba has "an offensive biological weapons effort." The new position was made public in a State Department document released last Tuesday, when almost the entire United States was focusing on the effects of Hurricane Katrina in the Gulf of Mexico region.

Knight Ridder reported that the Bush administration acknowledged in the document that 'there is a split view' among intelligence analysts on the question.

The Knight Ridder story notes that this is the first time that the US has "publicly softened" its charge that Cuba had biological weapons, which has been "controversial from the outset."

The Economic Times of India said the new position amounts to a "volte face" by the US. The new finding on Cuba is based on a US intelligence-community-wide assessment, known as a National Intelligence Estimate, completed last year. In that estimate, which is classified, 'the Intelligence Community unanimously held that it was unclear whether Cuba has an active biological weapons effort now, or even had one in the past,' the State Department report states. A senior State Department official, briefing reporters on the document, said biological weapons programs are 'some of the most difficult activities to verify' because the facilities needed are small.

The BTC News blog points out that during the Senate confirmation hearings for Mr. Bolton (who was never approved by the Senate, instead getting his job via presidential recess appointment), one of the charges leveled against him was "a substantiated accusation that he tried to have two State Department intelligence analysts reassigned when they wouldn't back his position that Cuba had an active biological warfare program."

The US position on Cuba highlights a problem that has been pointed out by opponents of the Bush administration - that policymakers interpret the information in whatever way suits them at the particular moment, often ignoring the cautions of the intelligence community or pressuring them to change their views. David Adams, the New York Times Latin America correspondent, hits on this point in an opinion piece. Government intelligence experts 'unanimously held that it was unclear whether Cuba has an active offensive biological warfare effort now, or even had one in the past,', the report says. But, using the same information, the policymakers insist the 2003 finding 'remains correct.'

They base their concern on Cuba's 'technical capability' to pursue bioweapons thanks to the island's highly advanced biotech and pharmaceutical industry. Critics say such a hypothetical scenario is hardly the basis for making such a serious allegation.

Does the lead-up to the Iraq war ring a bell?

GlobalSecurity.org, a leading security think tank, reports that Cuba's biotechnology industry is "one of the most advanced in emerging countries." As a result, Bush administration officials, like Bolton, believe that Cuba is "capable of producing biological warfare agents, and Cuba's biotechnology industry could produce many types of toxins" although there is no evidence to suggest that this is the case.

The Associated Press reported that the 108-page document, while admitting to a "split in opinion" over Cuba, claimed that "Russia, Iran, North Korea, and Syria continue to maintain biological weapons programs," while China "maintains some elements" of a program. China denied the charge.

China Says North Korea Nuclear Talks Will Resume Tuesday (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear weapons program will resume Tuesday, China said Thursday, but even as the announcement came from Beijing, a new player who seems likely to complicate the talks took the stage.

Jay Lefkowitz, an assertive, voluble former White House aide, was appointed last month to be a special envoy on human rights in North Korea, and made his first public appearance on Thursday. He said he planned to publicize whatever he learned about human rights abuses in North Korea, like allegations that the government holds political prisoners in concentration camps where they are "starved to death," as he put it.

North Korea typically reacts quickly and angrily to critical statements from Washington. In fact, just the announcement that Mr. Lefkowitz was being appointed to the new position was a factor in the North's decision to postpone resumption of the disarmament talks by two weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0004182

President Bush was required to appoint an envoy by the North Korean Human Rights Act, passed last October. The White House waited more than 10 months to fill the post, with State Department officials cautioning that the envoy would complicate their work. But conservative Christian groups and other important supporters pushed the White House.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice embraced Mr. Lefkowitz's mission at his swearing-in ceremony on Tuesday, saying, "People all over the world have a right to live in dignity," and, "We believe the people of North Korea to be no different."

But others in the government are concerned that North Korea may use any critical statements made by Mr. Lefkowitz as a reason not to cooperate in disarmament talks. The administration acknowledged over the summer that it had made a concerted effort to tone down its comments on North Korea because, through the spring, the government there seized on each new criticism as a justification for refusing to return to the talks.

The talks resumed in August after a break of more than a year. But they recessed Aug. 7 because the parties could not agree on a statement of principles. The six nations involved are the United States, North Korea, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

Mr. Lefkowitz made it clear that his work is intended to be wholly separate from that of Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief American negotiator at the disarmament talks. Mr. Lefkowitz reports directly to Ms. Rice, not Mr. Hill, and will have no role in the disarmament talks, he noted. His work and the disarmament negotiations, he said, are to proceed "in parallel tracks."

But when asked by reporters whether he was worried that his policy of publicizing North Korea's human rights problems might sabotage the talks, he said the administration supported his work, and his issues were "morally unambiguous."

Asked if he would advocate withholding food and other aid from the Korea, Mr. Lefkowitz seemed to leave the option open.

"We must be willing to look at all aspects of our relations with North Korea and our allies' relationship with North Korea," he said. Ms. Rice has repeatedly said the United States will continue supplying aid to the North Korean people no matter what the government does.

The talks are complicated in any case. On Thursday, as soon as China announced the talks would resume Tuesday, several parties restated positions that helped push the last round into a stalemate.

North Korea called it "unimaginable" that it would give up the right to pursue a peaceful nuclear power program - a chief sticking point - even if it gave up its nuclear weapons. The government also layered on a new public demand: that the United States, which has cut its troops in South Korea by a third, withdraw all its troops from the peninsula.

Japan expressed hope for the new talks but also said it would urge North Korea, again, to clear up the dispute over Japanese citizens kidnapped by North Korea decades ago.

South Korea urged the international community "to take the lead in establishing a rehabilitation program for North Korea," a senior Korean official told The Korea Times in Seoul.

Mr. Lefkowitz said he would meet with foreign governments and nongovernmental organizations to promote human rights issues - including the allegation that North Korea "holds 200,000 people in concentration camps," subject to "torture, starvation, disease and exposure."

These are not new allegations, but administration officials have seldom spoken of them in recent months.

North Korea Stands Fast On Nuclear Energy Use (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Two prominent experts on North Korea who recently made an unpublicized visit to the reclusive nation briefed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday as U.S. negotiators prepared to return to Beijing for a renewal of six-nation disarmament talks.

China announced yesterday that the talks would resume next Tuesday, after a recess of more than five weeks after the participants were unable to reach agreement on a "statement of principles" that would guide negotiations to eliminate North Korea's nuclear programs. Japan, South Korea and Russia are also participants in the talks.

John W. Lewis, a retired Stanford University professor, and Siegfried S. Hecker, retired director of Los Alamos National Laboratory, met with Rice yesterday afternoon to provide details of their talks with key North Korean officials, including the top negotiators for the North Korean side.

The two men summarized their conversations in Pyongyang, made some suggestions for bridging gaps, and provided an assessment of the chances of reaching an agreement, according to one U.S. official.

During the talks with Lewis and Hecker, North Korean officials made it clear that they intend to insist that the statement of principles acknowledge North Korea's right to peaceful use of nuclear power, according to Charles L. "Jack" Pritchard, a former State Department Korea expert, who accompanied the two men.

DOJ_NMG_0004183

To varying degrees, South Korea, China and Russia have supported the North Korean position, while Japan has backed the U.S. stance that North Korea's behavior gives it no right to even a peaceful program, except for research for medical, agricultural or industrial use.

"The North Koreans saw a chink in the armor," Pritchard said. "They have concluded this is a winning argument."

Pritchard said that as a result, any statement emerging from the talks appears less likely to be as clear and definitive as U.S. officials had hoped. This in turn might drag out future negotiations.

To prod North Korea to return to the talks, Rice had declared that the United States recognized North Korea's sovereignty. From the North Korean perspective, a sovereign nation has a right to peaceful nuclear energy, and one way the United States can demonstrate that it respects North Korea's sovereignty is to support that right.

North Korea's position -- which also included a demand for a light-water reactor to compensate it for giving up its current nuclear facilities -- has led to sometimes heated discussions within the Bush administration over how to counter Pyongyang's gambit, U.S. officials said.

Some officials, such as Assistant Secretary Christopher R. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, have contended that the issue of whether North Korea has a theoretical right to peaceful nuclear energy is not as important as the main question of whether an agreement to eliminate North Korea's nuclear programs can be reached in the first place. Moreover, even if North Korea wanted to build a civilian nuclear program, none of the countries at the table now would even be willing to fund it.

"The issue for some of the partners is whether . . . North Korea could then reclaim a right to nuclear energy," Hill said last month. "If you ask me, it's not exactly a showstopper issue -- the real issue is getting rid of all their nuclear programs."

But other officials have pushed back, saying that such a concession would allow the North Koreans to chip away at an agreement, especially if they managed to hide materials or programs not discovered during the verification process.

Some of the internal debate has centered on arcane and detailed discussion over various articles of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Some argue that the first two articles support a theoretical right, but others argue that that hinges on compliance with the fourth article, which requires a country to live up to its obligations. North Korea has violated those obligations and withdrawn from the treaty.

Some conservatives in the administration, however, believe the administration has weakened its position in the North Korean talks by agreeing to support the European negotiations with Iran on its nuclear programs, and by quickly reaching a deal this year with India to supply it with civilian nuclear energy. Iran has violated the Non-Proliferation Treaty, and India never joined it.

Yushchenko Sacks Ukraine Government (FT)

By Tom Warner

Financial Times, September 9, 2005

Ukraine's President Viktor Yushchenko yesterday sacked his cabinet and appointed a loyal and moderate ally to take over as prime minister from the populist Yulia Tymoshenko, after accusing her of engaging in divisive conflicts with other members of his political team.

Mr Yushchenko said Ms Tymoshenko and his national security chief, Petro Poroshenko, who had earlier resigned, had "lost their team spirit and trust" and had forced him to play the role of arbiter between competing institutions within his own administration.

"The president shouldn't be a nanny," Mr Yushchenko said. "I'm convinced that millions of people didn't stand on the Maidan for this," he added, referring to the central square in Kiev where his supporters gathered during last winter's Orange Revolution.

The long-simmering conflict between Ms Tymoshenko and Mr Poroshenko reached crisis point after the surprise resignation earlier this week of Olexander Zinchenko, the president's chief of staff, who on Monday accused Mr Poroshenko of corruption and interference in the media and justice system.

Mr Yushchenko appointed his old ally Yuri Yekhanurov, a veteran government official with a record of avoiding direct political confrontations, to take over as acting prime minister and form a new cabinet.

The move made clear that Mr Yushchenko would take direct personal control over government policy for the next six months until parliamentary elections due at the end of March. But his dismissal of Ms Tymoshenko is likely to lead to a damaging confrontation with her and her political team that could further bog down reforms.

Ms Tymoshenko is expected to announce that she will form a separate political bloc and run against Mr Yushchenko's Our Ukraine party, of which Mr Yekhanurov and Mr Poroshenko are senior members, in the March elections.

The elections are crucial, as they coincide with the coming into force of political reforms adopted during the Orange Revolution that transfer many executive powers to the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0004184

After the elections the premier would be chosen by the new parliament and would no longer answer to the president. Mr Yushchenko's allies are expected to attempt to cancel the political reforms in court.

¦US government officials are calling for a special Nato summit to assess Ukraine's readiness to join the military alliance as well as the candidacy of other countries, it emerged yesterday.

Kurt Volcker, a European affairs expert at the US State Department, said the US wanted to hold a summit on Nato enlargement in 2008, after a smaller meeting next year focusing on the effectiveness of the alliance.

Ukraine's President Fires Prime Minister (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, September 9, 2005

MOSCOW — The pro-Western government that swept to power in Ukraine's "Orange Revolution" collapsed today when President Viktor Yushchenko fired his popular prime minister and accepted the resignations of key political allies, struggling to quell the most serious political crisis of his 7-month-old administration.

Paralyzed with savage infighting among his supporters and stung by allegations of corruption surrounding the new democratic government, Yushchenko emptied the top ranks of his rancorous administration in an attempt to reassert his leadership of the tumultuous nation of 47 million on the eastern edge of Europe.

"The team's unity, unfortunately, has become an extremely acute problem. Interpersonal conflicts have begun to affect state affairs," Yushchenko said. "It is very difficult, but today I must remove this Gordian knot."

The president said he would appoint liberal economist Yuri Yekhanurov, a longtime ally and former economy minister, to head a new government as acting prime minister. Yekhanurov, an early architect of Ukraine's post-communist privatization program, is presently governor of the Dnipropetrovsk region in eastern Ukraine.

Yulia Tymoshenko, the sacked prime minister whose popularity had been one of Yushchenko's most valuable weapons, signaled that she will join the opposition in the March 2006 parliament elections that will determine whether the pro-reform team can hold on to power and continue Ukraine's drive toward joining the European Union.

"She's not going to work with Yushchenko," her spokesman, Vasily Chepinoga, said in a telephone interview. "Because Yushchenko and Yulia Tymoshenko see the main strategic ways of developing the country in a completely different way."

The firings followed months of increasingly uneasy relations between the president and Tymoshenko, whose populist moves to raise pensions and salaries, tax businesses, reverse shady privatization deals, and control gasoline prices have been blamed for stifling economic growth and undermining Yushchenko's free-market policies.

Soaring food and energy prices have led to widespread public disenchantment, fueled by the resignation of two top Yushchenko aides who claimed the president had allowed the new government to become tainted by the presence of several corrupt senior advisors.

A recent poll of Ukrainians by the Kiev-based Razumkov Center found that only 37% of respondents believe the new authorities are better than those tossed out when hundreds of thousands of Yushchenko supporters swept into the streets last fall and demanded the new elections that unseated former Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovich.

"This research is a confirmation that our society is gradually growing free of its illusions," Yuri Yakymenko, head of the Razumkov Center's political office in Kiev, said in a telephone interview. "After the Orange Revolution, we had very high public expectations. At first, those expectations gave huge support, both to the president and to the government. But later, the activity of the government itself, and especially the conflict right in the center of power, all of this slowly rid the public of these expectations."

Even so, he said, public support remains substantially higher than it was for Yanukovich and former President Leonid D. Kuchma.

The crisis has been long in the making, emerging not only out of the widening policy gap between Tymoshenko and Yushchenko, but also from a sharp rift between the former prime minister and Petro Poroshenko, a wealthy chocolate manufacturer who resigned today as secretary of the National Security and Defense Council.

Analysts said Poroshenko has quietly angled to force Tymoshenko out and take her place as prime minister. Meanwhile, presidential chief of staff Oleksandr Zinchenko unleashed a firestorm this week when he resigned and accused "a small group of adventurists" outside the president's inner circle, most notably Poroshenko, of corruption.

"Corruption and bribery is again escalating. In many cases, the scale of it surpasses that of the past," Oleksandr announced at a news conference Monday.

"They have set up their own clan, they have orchestrated an information blockade of the president and pushed him into a virtual, unreal world," he said. "Step by step, they are implementing their plan to use power for their own enrichment, to privatize and to grab everything they can."

DOJ_NMG_0004185

Poroshenko has denied the allegations, and Yushchenko appeared to defend him today — even as he moved to dismiss the government.

The key question now is how Yushchenko will move forward to the parliament elections next year, considered crucial because new election reform laws will transfer much of the president's power to parliament. Most analysts believe the president cannot win a legislative majority without Tymoshenko's party in alliance.

"I would like them to stay in the pro-government team," the president said, referring to both Tymoshenko and Poroshenko as "friends."

Many analysts said it was too early to predict a final split between Yushchenko and Tymoshenko, and most did not rule out an election in which the two politicians would run separate but friendly campaigns.

"Without Tymoshenko's support, clearly, Yushchenko never would have become president," Yulia Mostovaya, assistant editor of the respected liberal weekly Zerkalo Nedeli, said in a telephone interview. At the same time, she said, Yushchenko has his own wide base of support.

"He has actually created his own power, building it up on a basement of wealthy, financially strong tycoons, and that's what he's going to bring to the parliament elections," she said.

Ukraine Leader Fires Cabinet As Reform Coalition Splits (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

KIEV, Ukraine, Sept. 8 - President Viktor A. Yushchenko dismissed his prime minister and the rest of the cabinet on Thursday as internal divisions and accusations of corruption splintered the political coalition that led last year's popular uprising against his autocratic predecessor.

Facing a widening scandal, Mr. Yushchenko replaced the prime minister, Yulia V. Tymoshenko, a populist reformer whose fiery oratory drove what became known as the "Orange Revolution" but whose leadership proved divisive and debilitating in government.

In somber remarks broadcast on national television, Mr. Yushchenko said he had acted to end internal struggles for power among those who rallied tens of thousands of people in protests that ultimately overturned a fraudulent presidential election last fall.

He described his decision as a reluctant, though necessary one, saying that as president he "should not baby-sit" his squabbling aides.

"Ukraine was losing momentum, including economic pace," he said in his remarks, as transcribed and translated by the British Broadcasting Corporation. "I think members of my team listened to the president but did not hear him. And today I have cut the Gordian knot, however difficult it may be."

Barely seven months after his inauguration promised a newly transparent and democratic era, Mr. Yushchenko found himself facing a political crisis that threatened to undermine the ideals of last fall's uprising. His closest aides were not only deeply divided, but also faced accusations of the sort that dogged his predecessor, Leonid D. Kuchma.

Last Saturday, Oleksandr O. Zinchenko, Mr. Yushchenko's former campaign manager, resigned as chief of staff and later accused the administration of being "even worse" that Mr. Kuchma's. That thrust into public internal divisions that have simmered for months, hindering the government's work.

On Thursday, almost immediately after Ms. Tymoshenko was dismissed, one of her strongest allies, the chairman of the Ukrainian Security Services, Oleksandr V. Turchinov, who was not dismissed, resigned in protest, deepening the split among Mr. Yushchenko's supporters. He warned that the president's decision "threatened the national security of Ukraine," the security services' spokeswoman said in a telephone interview, citing his resignation letter.

Another aide at the center of the accusations, Petro Poroshenko, the secretary of the newly empowered Security and Defense Council, also announced his resignation on Thursday. He denied allegations of corruption, but said he would step aside to avoid the appearance of thwarting an investigation into the charges.

At the heart of the divisions - and evidently the source of the accusations of corruption - have been the government's efforts to undo some of the dubious privatizations that took place under Mr. Kuchma. Prime Minister Tymoshenko has pressed for review of dozens of privatization deals, at times contradicting Mr. Yushchenko's more modest goal of reviewing only the most egregious.

The latest conflict involved a court ruling that overturned the 2003 privatization of a big steel factory, the Nikopol Ferroalloy Plant. The new owner, Viktor Pinchuk, Mr. Kuchma's son-in-law and one of the country's richest men, appealed, but in the meantime minority shareholders elected a new management team.

DOJ_NMG_0004186

Mr. Pinchuk and the plant's workers rallied last week, calling the shareholders meeting illegal and confronting riot policemen sent to enforce the court's order. Mr. Pinchuk at the time accused Ms. Tymoshenko of trying to wrest control of the plant on behalf of her allies.

In his remarks on Thursday, Mr. Yushchenko referred to the showdown, saying that while the court's order was "deeply correct," he lamented "the intrigues behind the scenes" that nearly resulted in an armed clash.

"The finale of the story had nothing to do with attempts to hand the company from a gang over to the state," he said, "but it appeared that it was handed over from one gang to another. Therefore the people had a right to protest."

He did not elaborate.

Hryhory M. Nemyrya, an adviser of Ms. Tymoshenko's, called the dismissal of the government a sign of indecision. "The decision to punish everyone does not address the question of corruption," he said in a telephone interview. "Rooting out corruption was one of the goals of the Orange Revolution."

Since taking office, Ms. Tymoshenko and Mr. Poroshenko, the secretary of the Security and Defense Council, became powerful rivals, vying for influence and political power.

Yulia Tishchenko of the Ukrainian Center for Independent Political Research in Kiev said in a telephone interview that Mr. Yushchenko's crisis was a result of a new government structure that gave officials greater powers than their predecessors had, though overlapping ones.

"Each of the members of the new team wanted to get as much authority as they could, which was not good for the system," she said.

Mr. Yushchenko appointed a regional governor and former aide, Yury I. Yekhanurov, as acting prime minister.

It remains to be seen whether Mr. Yushchenko's action will stem a slippage of popular support among Ukrainians, whose enthusiasm for his democratic, market-oriented reforms appears to have diminished in the wake of rising inflation and an economic slowdown, as well as the government's infighting.

It is not even certain that Parliament, fractured into blocs led by many of those dismissed on Thursday, will confirm Mr. Yekhanurov or the cabinet he forms.

Ms. Tymoshenko, who leads her own faction in Parliament, did not comment on her dismissal, but Mr. Nemyrya said she would address the nation on television on Friday.

Her dismissal came as Ukraine's political parties have begun jockeying for support in advance of parliamentary elections in March. Those elections have added significance because Parliament's deputies will have the power to choose a prime minister and the government.

The expanded authority is the result of the agreement that cleared the way for a rerun of November's disputed runoff in which Mr. Yushchenko won the presidency from the originally declared winner, Viktor F. Yanukovich.

Ms. Tishchenko said Ms. Tymoshenko's parliamentary faction showed signs of winning greater support, at the expense of the party the president once led.

Mr. Yushchenko referred poignantly and personally to the country's current state, citing the poisoning that disfigured his face on the eve of last year's election, a crime that has yet to be solved.

"A year ago, I ran for president not to see key state institutions struggling to find understanding and failing to find accord and mutual trust," he said. "That is not what I sought as I have been walking for a year with a face that is not mine."

Ukraine's President Fires Cabinet (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

MOSCOW, Sept. 8 -- Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko fired his prime minister and entire cabinet Thursday after a simmering power struggle among leaders of last year's Orange Revolution erupted into very public infighting about alleged corruption in the government's top ranks.

The president appointed Yuriy Yekhanurov, a former economics minister and regional governor, as acting prime minister, replacing the firebrand Yulia Tymoshenko, and addressed the nation in an effort to calm the worst political crisis of his young term.

The mass dismissal signaled the end of the broad coalition that led a popular revolt after fraudulent presidential elections last November and brought Yushchenko to power.

Ukraine is the largest of three former Soviet republics in which a democratic opposition has taken power in this way. Western governments have been watching it closely for evidence of whether the new leadership can maintain unity and address endemic economic and social problems inherited from the communist era.

DOJ_NMG_0004187

On Thursday, Yushchenko addressed the nation after a last-ditch effort to restore unity between the Tymoshenko government and his own presidential administration.

"I knew that there were definite conflicts between those people," Yushchenko said in his televised address. "I hoped that if each of them immersed himself in work, there would not be enough time for mutual intrigues." But he concluded that the government "lost the team spirit and faith."

The dismissal was triggered by a series of resignations by top officials who charged that some of the most powerful people around Yushchenko were using their positions to enrich themselves and reneging on one of the most important promises of last December's revolt, the eradication of endemic graft.

On Saturday, Oleksandr Zinchenko, Yushchenko's chief of staff, accused by name Petro Poroshenko, head of the Defense and Security Council, and Olexander Tretyakov, a senior presidential adviser, of "cynically carrying out their plan to use government posts to their own ends."

"Corruption is now even worse than before," said Zinchenko, announcing his resignation on television in a live nationwide broadcast.

As Zinchenko, a chief architect of the revolt, spoke, Poroshenko, a confectionary and media magnate who was a key financier of the Orange Revolution, stood scowling at the back of the room. Poroshenko moved to the podium when Zinchenko finished to angrily deny the accusations before reporters who were mesmerized by the verbal shootout.

"During my time in government, I did not become one penny richer or gain one share," said Poroshenko, whose candy factories have earned him the nickname Chocolate King in Ukraine. "I ask for one concrete fact that proves the accusations here today."

Zinchenko's resignation was followed Thursday morning by the departure of Deputy Prime Minister Mykola Tomenko. "I don't want to carry responsibility for people who have created a system of corruption," Tomenko said. "Today the president does not know what's going on in the country."

Poroshenko also resigned Thursday before Yushchenko dismissed the government.

Political analysts said the crisis stemmed in large part from the political enmity between Poroshenko and the now dismissed prime minister, Tymoshenko, who is one of the country's most charismatic leaders. Last year, she galvanized huge crowds on Kiev's Independence Square, the epicenter of the mass demonstrations that brought Yushchenko to power.

Poroshenko also aspired to the prime ministership. Igor Koliushko, head of the Center of Political and Legal Reform in Kiev, said in an interview that he used the security council chaired by the president to form "an alternative government" that was in constant conflict with Tymoshenko's cabinet.

"They tried constantly to change the decisions of the constitutional government," Koliushko said. "The split reached such a pitch that they couldn't possibly be together anymore."

Whatever the truth of the allegations of corruption, the public airing of such accusations was designed to force other divisions to a climax, analysts said. Disagreement over how to investigate alleged corruption in past privatizations of state industries is a central issue.

Yuschenko's camp favors a relatively limited look, while Tymoshenko's wants a deep probe.

Svitlana Kononchuk, head of political programs at the Ukrainian Center for Independent Political Research, said Yushchenko must accept some blame for the crisis.

"The war between Tymoshenko and Poroshenko has lasted for seven months," Kononchuk said. "Yushchenko gave a lot of freedom to his partners. He assumed that these people were professionals, efficient, and they understood the importance of the situation which Ukraine found itself in. Yushchenko hasn't become a politician yet. He imagined himself a symbol, not a manager."

Yushchenko, however, said Thursday that "the president cannot be a nanny for them."

A spokesman for Tymoshenko refused to comment on the cabinet's dismissal, but a Ukranian news agency, quoting unnamed government sources, said that the prime minister felt betrayed and was likely to seek a return to office after the next election. After that vote, the prime minister and cabinet will be chosen by parliament rather than the president, as they currently are. The powers of the prime minister will also increase at the expense of the president.

The crisis is likely to deepen public disillusionment with the government's failure to deliver quickly on some of the basic promises of the Orange Revolution, particularly rapid economic improvement. An opinion poll conducted last month found that 53 percent of respondents believed Ukraine was on the wrong path, up from 30 percent in April.

Yushchenko was also tarnished by recent accusations that his 19-year-old son was leading a lifestyle far beyond his apparent means. A Ukrainian Web site reported that Andriy Yushchenko, a student, was driving a high-end BMW, had a luxury $30,000 cell phone and lavished cash on restaurants and other locations around the capital. To the fury of many people in Ukraine, he also registered as trademarks the symbols of the Orange Revolution.

DOJ_NMG_0004188

Peeling Away The Revolution (WSJ)

By Robin Shepherd

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

An act of strength or sign of weakness? Actually, Viktor Yushchenko's decision to fire his entire government yesterday smacks of both: strength because it allows him to form a cabinet of allies rather than rivals; and weakness because he was all but forced to do it to answer damaging accusations that he was tolerating corruption in his own inner circle.

We may leave that debate about the position of President Yushchenko to those who believe history is the product of great men. To the rest of us, Ukraine's biggest political crisis since the Orange Revolution should be understood, to a great extent, in terms of flaws in the revolution which were apparent from the start. Yesterday's events may not have been inevitable, but a panoply of factors made some sort of crisis a distinct possibility.

The most obvious problems, of course, centered on the fractious nature of the democratic forces that took power in January. In explaining his decision yesterday, Mr. Yushchenko accused the government of losing its "team spirit," an accusation which when applied to Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko could pass for the country's understatement of the year. The charismatic, and immensely rich, premier has barely concealed her own ambitions to take the president's place as the key player in national politics and has been engaged in all-out warfare with other members of the government for months. Enter Petro Poroshenko, the National Security and Defense Council secretary, who has been at loggerheads with Ms. Tymoshenko over economic policy. Corruption allegations (unsubstantiated as yet) against Mr. Poroshenko, who is also immensely rich, brought the current crisis to a head, and there is now a real risk that the two will lead their respective power blocks into next March's crucial general elections as enemies rather than allies. Any such confrontation could prove disastrous for the reform movement, either pushing it out of power completely or, more likely, forcing reformists to make damaging concessions to supporters of the previous administration in order to form a new government.

To add to the difficulties, such bickering takes place amid a dramatic downturn in the country's economic fortunes. Growth in the first half of the year collapsed to just 3.7%. That compares to 13.5% in the same period last year. Sliding growth has been accompanied by rocketing inflation, which currently hovers just below 15%. In a country where many people earn less than $50 a month, rising prices can cause real social pain.

Not surprisingly against such a backdrop, public support is plummeting. A poll by the Razumkov institute in August suggested that 43% of Ukrainians believed the country was on the wrong path, a jump from 23% in April. The August poll found just 32% felt the country was doing well, down sharply from 54% last spring.

The key question now, therefore, is this: Can Mr. Yushchenko and his new government recreate unity among the country's democratic forces, or are they heading for collapse?

Much depends on the attitude of Ms. Tymoshenko. She is due to make a televised address later today and it is little exaggeration to say that the content of that broadcast could define the future of her country. If she accepts President Yushchenko's generous offer yesterday to keep her in the fold in some capacity or other, there is hope that the reformists can pull it off. But she could also cause real problems. Mr. Yushchenko already faces difficulties in parliament passing legislation aimed at joining the World Trade Organization. He also has to get approval for the new prime minister. If Ms. Tymoshenko opts for all-out confrontation, it is hard to see how the situation can be prevented from descending into chaos.

But ultimate success for the aims of the Orange Revolution has never been simply down to events inside Ukraine. The country's problems were always going to be too severe to cope with in the absence of outside help. That's why the attitude of the European Union has always been so important, and why its policy hitherto has been so disappointing.

What Ukraine needs, and needs fast, is a clear and unambiguous statement from Brussels that it will be invited to start accession negotiations with the European Union if the country's pro-democracy parties promise to work together to pass important reformist legislation and then go on to win the March elections. Such a statement would certainly be tantamount to blatant intervention in Ukraine's political affairs, but it would be no less welcome for that. There is also a useful precedent in Brussels's brilliant strategy of working with democratic forces in neighboring Slovakia in the 1990s to successfully promote unity among opponents of that country's former authoritarian Prime Minister Vladimir Meciar. Slovakia today is a reformist success story. Brussels must take note.

All this said, the big picture in Ukraine remains one of hope and progress. This time last year, the country was run by a group of people who it would be kind to describe as thugs. The country still may have a long way to go, but we are at least past the stage at which opposition journalists wandered around the streets of Kiev in fear for their lives. When President George W. Bush praised the millions of people who stood on the streets of the Ukrainian capital last year as modern-day heroes of the democratic ideal, he was right. But as in Iraq, what he and his administration may have underestimated is the sheer complexity of the task at hand and the time scale in which we expect success.

DOJ_NMG_0004189

What we are watching in Ukraine are still the first tentative steps in a desperately difficult transition. We will get a pretty good idea of whether that task can, in the end, be accomplished in the days and weeks ahead.

Mr. Shepherd is an adjunct fellow of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. He is based in Bratislava.

Ukraine's Orange Flame, Dimmed (NYT)

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

So ends the Orange Revolution, at least Act I. After months of increasingly nasty disputes, Ukraine's president, Viktor Yushchenko, fired his charismatic prime minister and nominated a caretaker to replace her. The fired prime minister, Yulia Tymoshenko, has said nothing - yet. But she will. Her fiery speeches and powerful presence were a major factor in the popular uprising that brought Mr. Yushchenko to power last fall, and she is certain to turn these weapons on the president and his new government, especially with elections for Parliament scheduled for March. All that is a serious blow to the hopes and expectations that had been raised for the future of Ukraine, and for reformers in Belarus and other former Soviet republics.

Perhaps the expectations were always unrealistic. People who unite to oust one government, as the Ukrainians did with huge demonstrations, do not necessarily agree on what the next one should be, and the alliance was always shaky between Mr. Yushchenko, a former prime minister and central banker, and Ms. Tymoshenko, who made a fortune in the gas business. Mr. Yushchenko and Ms. Tymoshenko squandered the momentum generated on Kiev's streets, struggling over control of lucrative industries, over relations with Russia and over how to cope with soaring energy prices. The impression was of a government with no focus.

On dismissing the government, Mr. Yushchenko declared that his one goal was to ensure stability. But the Ukrainian protesters wanted change. If Mr. Yushchenko hopes to salvage anything of their spirit, he needs to convince his country, and a very wary West, that he not only believes in democracy, free markets and the rule of law, but is also capable of leading Ukraine in that direction.

Controversy Swirls Over Egypt Vote (WP)

By Daniel Williams And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

CAIRO, Sept. 9 -- Egyptian government officials leaked partial results Thursday of the first multi-candidate presidential election to show that President Hosni Mubarak had won at least 70 percent of the vote, but controversy still swirled about alleged irregularities and fraud in Wednesday's vote.

Senior officials put voter turnout at about 30 percent.

Ayman Nour, who ran an energetic campaign as head of the fledgling Tomorrow Party, filed complaints with the Presidential Election Commission, which rejected them early Friday. "There were violations regarding the right of the voter to cast his ballot," Nour said. Independent human rights groups said they were considering filing court cases.

Government officials worked hard to persuade the public that the vote was valid. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the former U.N. secretary general who heads the government's National Council on Human Rights, declared the election a "positive experience." Information Ministry officials urged reporters to accentuate the positive in the election and not focus on alleged violations.

In Washington, the State Department praised the vote. Spokesman Sean McCormack called it a "historic departure for the Egyptian people in holding a multi-candidate presidential election. . . . The debate during the campaign process was something, I think, that will enrich the Egyptian political dialogue certainly for years to come."

But the Mubarak government's efforts to get similar approval from Egyptians was hampered by the continuing disputes. Unlike in past parliamentary votes and presidential referendums, results were not announced at local polling stations. Instead, counts have been funneled to a central tabulation office that has until Saturday to release official numbers. "They have all the time they need to sculpt the result they want," said Enji Haddad, a member of We Are Watching, an independent group that tried to monitor voting irregularities.

Even as complaints were voiced over the vote, the first in which Egyptians were able to mark ballots with more than one choice for president, attention was quickly turning toward the next stage in the herky-jerky battle over changing Egyptian politics -- parliamentary elections scheduled for November.

Although Mubarak might have overcome months of assault from a variety of political opponents, even his staunchest supporters say they believe the battle will go on. Opposition leaders with competing visions for change in Egypt have made vast strides during the past few months, becoming more visible than at any time during the 24 years Mubarak has held power, his supporters say.

"Things can't go back," Information Minister Anas Fiki said in an interview. "The process has moved far."

DOJ_NMG_0004190

This is also the hope of Bush administration officials who insist that the presidential vote was only a first step in converting Egypt from an authoritarian state into a democracy. Along with the war in Iraq and efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Egypt is a key to promoting democracy in the region, in the administration's view.

In remarks made before the vote, however, senior administration officials emphasized the importance of the legislative elections. "For the near future, the parliamentary election is more important. It's not clear who will compete and who will end up where. But it's important to get all the public political energy into the political sphere, or it will go elsewhere," said a senior administration official involved in Middle East policy.

"We're looking at parliamentary elections as a time to bring in new faces and new political parties that will change the political landscape for Egypt," another senior official said.

Wednesday's election was a step in the Mubarak government's own plans to open up politics to some extent, albeit with the levers of power still held by the National Democratic Party, currently dominated by the president's son Gamal and a group of Western-oriented technocrats. They contend that reform in Egypt must be calibrated to avoid unrest that would upset free-market economic liberalization, another project spearheaded by Gamal Mubarak.

Mohammed Kamal, a member of Gamal Mubarak's advisory team, said reform plans include changes in the constitution to transfer some presidential powers to parliament and scale back emergency laws that have inhibited free speech for a quarter-century. "Our message is that we are creating a platform for change," he said in an interview.

It is unclear when the emergency laws might be lifted. Bush administration officials have pressed for them to be amended before the parliamentary vote, but President Mubarak has resisted, senior U.S. officials said.

As Mubarak has made gains, so have his political rivals. Nour, leader of a free-market party that was legalized only last October, has quickly became a prominent opposition force. Mubarak government officials were preoccupied Thursday with the possibility that Nour might have come in second in Wednesday's balloting. Some were openly rooting for Noman Gomaa, 71, the candidate of the established Wafd Party, to be the runner-up.

Wafd spokesman Mahmoud Abaza predicted the party would make a strong showing in the parliamentary vote. "The bottom line is that, the NDP aside, there are only two other political forces: Wafd and the Muslim Brotherhood."

The Brotherhood, which is officially banned from politics but is widely regarded as Egypt's largest opposition force, benefited from the months leading up to the election, said Aly Abdel Fattah, an official of the Brotherhood. Nour and Gomaa visited Brotherhood leaders to solicit support. The Brotherhood issued an anyone-but-Mubarak order to its followers. Members were widely interviewed on Arabic-language satellite television. "We were participants. We got our membership familiar with the workings of elections," said Abdel Fattah, who added: "The Brotherhood plans to run front candidates in the parliamentary vote."

Egypt's Unfree Vote (WP)

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

Millions of Egyptians voted in a historic multi-candidate presidential election on Wednesday -- but the results will never be known. True, 77-year-old President Hosni Mubarak is widely believed to have obtained the most votes and will be duly sworn in next week for a six-year extension of his 24 years in power. But Egyptians will never learn what part of the electorate turned out to vote, or what percentage chose one of the opposition candidates who were allowed 19 days to openly campaign against Mr. Mubarak. That's because Mr. Mubarak excluded foreign monitors from the polling stations and reversed a ban on local watchdog groups only on Election Day, making it impossible for all but a handful to participate. He allowed his National Democratic Party to commit such visible irregularities as busing voters to the polls, standing over them while they cast ballots or offering lottery tickets in exchange for votes. Finally, the president decreed that all the results be tabulated at a central location by his handpicked nominees. When the totals are finally announced in a few days' time, there will be no reason for anyone to take them seriously.

The Bush administration, which cites the democratization of the Middle East as one of its top priorities, persists in describing this exercise as "a positive first step." It has some reason to do so: The election campaign, though absurdly short, resulted in unprecedented opposition rallies and criticism of Mr. Mubarak in newspapers and on television. The incumbent promised a long list of political reforms as part of his own campaign, including more freedom for the media, independence for judges, greater power for parliament and a reform of the emergency laws that have made him a de facto dictator. Still, Mr. Mubarak's insistence on heavy-handed steps to control the election's outcome -- despite his inevitable victory -- leaves the measuring glass of this Egyptian election considerably less than half full.

It also raises urgent priorities for Egyptian reform, and the Bush administration's handling of Mr. Mubarak, in the coming weeks. That's because Egypt has another election coming this fall, for parliament, that in many ways is more important than the presidential poll. Not only is the legislature promised more power, but a recent constitutional change provides that only parties with parliamentary representation of 5 percent or more may nominate candidates in future presidential elections. If the upcoming vote is fair, it will drastically reduce the suffocating authority of the ruling party; if it is not, the election of Mr. Mubarak's successor will probably be as lopsided and unfair as this week's vote.

DOJ_NMG_0004191

President Bush need not ask Mr. Mubarak for radical change -- only for steps that liberal activists in his own party favor. These begin with allowing slates of parliamentary candidates to be elected by proportional representation; the current system of more than 400 districts makes it impossible for opposition parties to compete. Next Mr. Mubarak must allow more of the real Egyptian opposition into the process; he could do this by granting the pending registration of the Center Party, a moderate Islamic grouping that would attract many supporters of the banned Muslim Brotherhood.

Most important, Egypt's next vote should be free and fair, and certified as such by both local and international monitors. Holding such a vote won't threaten Mr. Mubarak's newly extended tenure as president, but it will make it more legitimate. It won't make Egypt a democracy, but it would make it more likely that the regime's promise to gradually lead the country in that direction would be honored. Considering the billions in American dollars that continue to prop up Mr. Mubarak's government, and the importance of translating Mr. Bush's rhetoric about democracy into reality, it shouldn't be too much too ask.

Koizumi Backers Look Poised To Win In Elections (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman And Kazuko Takahashi

USA Today, September 9, 2005

Advocates for change in Japan could emerge rejuvenated from Sunday's legislative elections, thanks to Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's decision last month to wage war on obstructionist lawmakers in his own ruling party.

A poll this week by the daily Asahi Shimbun showed Koizumi's ruling coalition — his Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) and its ally New Komeito — leading the top opposition party. According to Asahi, the LDP is expected to win more than 250 seats in Japan's 480-seat lower house of parliament.

Since becoming prime minister in 2001, Koizumi — known for his unruly hair and love of heavy metal music — has billed himself as a reformer. He often has butted heads with conservative, change-resistant members of the LDP, which has ruled Japan nearly continuously for a half-century.

He took his agenda further with an internal purge of the party, replacing opponents with like-minded candidates. The fireworks started in August when rebel LDP lawmakers rejected Koizumi's pet project: privatization of Japan's massive postal system. In Japan, the post office does more than deliver mail; it also acts like a government bank, collecting trillions in deposits and doling them out as loans, often to corporate borrowers with close links to LDP lawmakers.

Defeated in the parliament when members of his own party joined the opposition Democratic Party of Japan (DPJ) to avoid the privatization scheme, Koizumi dissolved the legislature and called the election.

He threw 37 rebels out of the LDP and recruited a group of attractive candidates, dubbed by the daily Mainichi the “assassins” and “female ninjas,” to defeat them in the polls. Among the hired guns are a former Miss Tokyo University, a celebrity pastry chef, former Olympians and an Internet tycoon.

“His clueless opponents thought he was bluffing. They forgot his favorite movie is High Noon,” says political analyst Michael Cucek with the Tokyo-based business consultancy Okamoto Associates.

Some of the LDP rebels have joined new political parties; others are running as independents.

DPJ candidate Katsuya Okada, who left the LDP in 1993, says real reform is impossible unless the ruling party is ousted.

“The people had hopes that Koizumi would change the LDP, but he was not able to do that,” Okada told Reuters recently. “Rather, domestic reform has not progressed, and foreign policy is beset on all sides.”

The DPJ says reform of Japan's pension system, creaking under the burden of a rapidly aging population and falling birthrate, should top the policy agenda along with cutting wasteful public works and slashing civil servant personnel costs. The government hasn't resolved the question of how a dwindling workforce will pay benefits to a swelling number of retirees.

Okada wants to first slim down the postal service, a sprawling giant with $3 trillion in assets, before deciding whether to privatize or abolish it.

He has also been harshly critical of Koizumi for chilling ties with China and South Korea by making annual visits to the Yasukuni shrine in Tokyo, where convicted war criminals are honored along with Japan's 2.5 million war dead.

Koizumi portrayed the DPJ as opportunists for siding with an opposition that included ex-Socialists and right-wing nationalists.

Some voters acknowledge they don't understand details of Koizumi's postal plan. “I don't really know what the reforms mean,” says Yoshinobu Okuyama, 62, an electrician. “But we need the Liberal Democrats in power.”

“I support Junichiro Koizumi,” says retired executive Katsuyuki Tokura, 63. “At the moment, there is no other politician who can change the corrupt, bureaucratic administration.”

DOJ_NMG_0004192

"Koizumi needed reliable partisans for carrying out future reforms," says teacher Yuichi Mita, 45. "This is a kickoff for reforms."

Billions For Vaccines For The Poor To Be Raised In Bond Markets (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, September 9, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 8 - Britain, France, Spain, Italy and Sweden will announce an agreement on Friday to raise almost $4 billion on the bond markets for an enormously expanded use of vaccines across the developing world. The World Health Organization estimates this undertaking will save the lives of five million children over the next decade.

Commitments from some of the participating nations have been secured only in recent days.

The new funds would roughly double the resources of the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization, an umbrella group of countries, international organizations, vaccine industry representatives and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. Over the past five years, the alliance has financed the immunization of 78 million children and prevented more than a million child deaths, the health organization estimates.

The alliance's board has already approved ambitious programs for 2006 to expand measles coverage in South Asia and sub-Saharan Africa, as well as to help eradicate polio worldwide and increase the use of maternal and neonatal tetanus vaccines. These plans can go forward now that the new financing has been secured.

"We hope this pilot will demonstrate the feasibility and the power of this financing mechanism, and we look to gain more support from more countries," said Paul Kissack, a spokesman for the British treasury.

The United States has declined to join the vaccine plan. Bush administration officials could not be reached for comment Thursday night, but said earlier this year that the long-term commitment to raise money through the bond market is not consistent with the annual appropriations process in Congress. The United States provides $60 million to $70 million a year to the alliance.

"We hope if this process is successful that the United States will reconsider its position," said Dr. Julian Lob-Levyt, the vaccine alliance's executive secretary.

British officials have said they hope the new resources will help the world reach the goal adopted unanimously five years ago at the United Nations to reduce child deaths by two-thirds by 2015. More than 170 government leaders will gather in New York next week to assess progress in meeting the antipoverty objectives they set in 2000.

The pact marks the first time rich nations have used pledges of increased aid to back government bonds as a means of financing a major development program. This so-called international finance facility is the brainchild of Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the exchequer.

Under the plan, income from the sale of the bonds would be provided to the global vaccine alliance to pay for vaccinations over a period of 10 years. The five participating nations would pay off the bonds over 20 years. The two largest donors are Britain, which has pledged to cover 35 percent of the cost, and France, which is covering a quarter.

The money will be used to purchase vaccines and bicycles to transport them, as well as to rehabilitate health clinics and pay health workers to do the immunizing in remote areas. Leaders of the alliance hope the vaccine plan will strengthen basic health services in poor countries, not just immunization efforts.

China Plans To Honor A Reformer (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, September 9, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 8 -- Chinese President Hu Jintao has agreed to restore the standing of the reform-minded Communist leader whose death triggered the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations, a surprising reversal of party dogma that could prompt new calls for democratic change in China, according to people informed of the decision.

Hu Jintao has approved plans for a series of events honoring the late party chief Hu Yaobang on the 90th anniversary of his birth on Nov. 20, the sources said. The activities would end more than a decade of official silence about a party leader who was sacked by hard-liners in 1987 but remained a hero to the party's reformist wing.

The government has not publicly recognized Hu Yaobang since students mourning his death on April 15, 1989, occupied Tiananmen Square and staged weeks of demonstrations for democratic reforms.

Paramount leader Deng Xiaoping ordered the military to use force to clear the square, and hundreds, perhaps thousands were killed. Any tribute to Hu Yaobang was considered taboo because it could stir memories of the June 4 massacre and renew debate about the political reforms he supported.

DOJ_NMG_0004193

But last month, the General Office of the party's Central Committee issued a document outlining plans to mark the anniversary of Hu Yaobang's birth with ceremonies in Beijing as well as in Hunan province, where he was born, and Jiangxi province, where he is buried, according to two sources who have seen the document. The party will also hold a symposium to discuss his legacy, and publish an official biography as well as a collection of his writings, they said.

The sources said there were no plans to change the party's position that the 1989 Tiananmen Square protests were subversive, or to admit it was wrong to use troops to crush them. But the decision to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang, whom the party condemned for being too tolerant of "bourgeois" political views when it removed him from power, suggested such reversals might be possible in the future.

"This might be a first step, a small but important one," said one informed party member, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "If the party can change its position on Hu Yaobang, it can change its position on June 4 and on political reform."

It was unclear why the Chinese president, who on Thursday was visiting Canada, decided to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang, but a key party leadership meeting is scheduled for October and he might have been trying to expand his political base by reaching out to reformers in the party. Hu Jintao took over as the party's top leader in 2002 and as president in 2003, but many allies of his predecessor, Jiang Zemin, remain in power.

The decision to rehabilitate Hu Yaobang -- no relation to Hu Jintao -- surprised many party officials because it was out of character for the president, who has developed a reputation over a long career in the party as an extremely cautious bureaucrat unwilling to take risks. "The safe thing to do would have been to continue to do nothing," said a senior editor of a party newspaper who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Over the past three years, the president has consistently rejected fundamental political reform while leading a sustained crackdown on religion, media freedom and other civil liberties. He has also been quoted telling propaganda officials that while the economic policies of Cuba and North Korea were flawed, their political policies were correct.

But some party officials continue to hold out hope that Hu was acting as a hard-liner to consolidate his position after taking over from Jiang. They noted that he modified another major party doctrine during a speech Saturday marking the 60th anniversary of Japan's surrender in World War II. In the past, the party took credit for defeating the Japanese and ignored the contributions of the ruling Nationalists under Chiang Kai-shek. But in his address, Hu acknowledged the role of the Nationalists, mentioning several military leaders and battles by name.

In another slight departure, Premier Wen Jiabao said during a news conference Monday that China would eventually allow elections, now limited to rural villages, to expand to larger townships. "If the Chinese people can manage a village, I believe in several years they can manage a township," he said.

Hu Dezi, one of Hu Yaobang's nephews in Hunan province, said local authorities received permission recently to build a memorial park that would include a statue, a spacious public square and an exhibition hall.

People close to Hu Yaobang's family said one important, unresolved issue was the fate of a three-volume biography produced independently by a group of former aides to the late party leader over the past 15 years. Party authorities learned of the project, led by Zhang Liqun, a former newspaper editor and party official who died two years ago, and insisted on taking control of it, the sources said.

But it was unclear what deletions and changes would be made before its publication in November. Hu Yaobang served as party chief from 1981 to 1987, and is remembered by many Chinese for overturning cases against millions persecuted during Mao Zedong's political movements and launching the economic and political reforms that ended the turmoil of the Cultural Revolution.

One of the most sensitive issues may be how to explain Hu Yaobang's fall from power amid a wave of student protests demanding democratic reform. The authors have written that Deng Xiaoping forced Hu to resign because he favored reform and resisted instructions to crack down on what the party called "bourgeois liberalization." But influential party members have objected to any account that reflects badly on Deng.

Sources familiar with the discussions said the party had not provided the authors with an edited version of the biography, despite repeated requests, and the authors vowed not to let the party publish the work if it tried to rewrite history.

Chávez's 'Oil Weapon' Is A Popgun (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 9, 2005

Our elected representatives are guzzling publicity with their promises to criminalize high gasoline prices, even though everyone knows that such stupidity creates shortages.

DOJ_NMG_0004194

But it is worth pointing out that this is only the latest display of sheer ignorance in the area of energy -- mixing dangerously with personal ambition, of course -- that threatens a policy mess. Another is the overly deferential Washington mindset toward Venezuela's Hugo Chávez, based on the myth that we need his oil.

Word out of Washington yesterday was that an arm of Congress has begun to investigate what damage would result from a "possible cutoff" of oil supplies to the U.S. by a "politically unstable" Venezuela. The study was requested by Chairman Richard Lugar of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It follows years of hand-wringing about Venezuela from a Washington establishment concerned about the Chávez "oil power."

This confluence of ignorance and commercial interest has produced a U.S. policy of tip-toe diplomacy toward the aggressive and menacing Venezuelan government. Tragically, that cost the Venezuelan people dearly in 2004, with the State Department endorsing the results of the fraudulent recall referendum. That "victory" is feeding the egomania of South America's newest would-be dictator.

In the wake of Katrina and amid fears of a U.S. energy crunch, it is high time to recognize that Chávez has no such leverage, lest he read our readiness to give him a wide berth in the interest of oil as a sign of weakness. Chávez has very little influence over how much the U.S. pays for oil, unless of course he wants to take Venezuela out of its role as a producer. That's unlikely, since he's now spending like a drunken sailor on arms and politics and relies on oil income to hold onto power.

The world oil market is a huge pool that all the globe's consumers draw from. During the Arab oil embargo, the disruptions of which were greatly magnified by U.S. price controls on domestic producers, buyers and sellers simply repositioned their relationships. There was short-term difficulty but markets adjusted as best they could, given the fact that U.S. producers as well were capping wells to wait for price controls to be lifted. Fuel prices went down, not up, when Ronald Reagan removed the last controls in 1981. Today there are more places to get oil and as the price goes up, more producers are coming online because even difficult extractions are becoming profitable.

Suppose China were to take all of Venezuela's oil out of the pool instead of oil from another country, nothing about world supply changes. If China is buying more from the pool than it did before, demand goes up and prices go up but sellers into the pool of oil cannot punish one buyer over another.

This does not mean that the U.S.-Venezuela oil trade doesn't have some special value. But the relationship is symbiotic. One reason Venezuelan oil is attractive to the U.S. is because the shipping costs are low relative to the Middle East. The U.S. may prefer to get its oil nearby but it certainly doesn't have to. Similarly, countries on the other side of the globe also prefer to keep their shipping costs down if possible.

Washington bigwigs may have trouble with this concept but China understands it well. Venezuela's Minister of Energy and Petroleum was in Beijing last month making a big deal out of the China market. But China's ambassador in Caracas, Ju Yigie, set him straight. Beijing, he said, "doesn't see any necessity" for China to replace the U.S. as Venezuela's largest oil buyer because "the natural markets for Venezuelan oil are North and South America."

The oil magazine Petroleum Intelligence Weekly pointed out this week that "courting China" is one way to "needle the U.S." But, it asks, "What does China's new energy relationship with Latin America amount to?" Venezuela's state-owned oil company, PdVSA, "opened a Beijing marketing office last month and has a target of selling 300,000 barrels per day into China by 2012."

China's reluctance to get close to Venezuela might also reflect a recognition that Chávez is a loose cannon and an unreliable manager and that oil investments with him carry great risk. Take PdVSA's new strategic plan for 2006-2012. According to VenEconomy Weekly, based in Caracas, it proposes to invest $56 billion over seven years to raise production to 5,837,000 barrels per day by 2012. Of that, PdVSA would pump 4,109,000 itself.

The company only produces 1.7 million barrels per day now, so the plan promises a 2.3 million barrels-per-day increase in seven years. VenEconomy says that this is highly unrealistic considering that in the seven year period from 1991-1998, when PdVSA was far more technically and managerially competent, it spent $32 billion and only raised production by 915,000 barrels per day. The weekly newsletter estimates that the plan really would need "an investment on the order of $79.9 billion."

Moreover, the same $56 billion is supposed to cover other investments in gas production, refineries, tankers and infrastructure. It also has to fund "cut-rate oil sales to countries in the region." VenEconomy estimates the government's plans are underfunded by some $72 billion.

China also seems to recognize that oil development in Venezuela will depend heavily on foreign investment and that will depend on an investor-friendly environment. The latest rash of property expropriations by Chávez does not bode well for a booming oil industry.

But what about Venezuela's yearning to cut off Uncle Sam? One reason that's harder to do than the saber-rattling Chávez lets on is the fact that Venezuela owns Houston-based Citgo. It has invested more than one billion dollars in its U.S. refineries to make them capable of processing Venezuelan heavy crude and in 1999 Citgo ranked fifth in U.S. market share. As it is now,

DOJ_NMG_0004195

Venezuela can only send about 600,000-800,000 barrels per day to its Citgo refineries. The rest of what those refineries need -- a total well over one million barrels per day -- is bought through third parties.

Not long ago, Venezuela was the largest supplier of crude to the U.S. Today, it may only rank fifth. With an annual 20-25% depletion rate of Venezuelan oil fields, a serious lack of investment and technological expertise and new sources of crude from other countries coming online, that number could easily shrink further. But that is something that ought to worry Chávez more than the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0004196

From: McDowell, Cynthia
Sent: Friday, September 09, 2005 4:12 PM
To: Andrea Bottner; Andrew Emrich; Brad Schlozman; Brent McIntosh; Bruce Mcdonald; Carl Nichols; Carl Peed; Cheri Nolan; Clifford White; Crystal Roberts; Cybele Daley; Dan Meron; Dana Boente; Deborah Rhodes; Deborah Spagnoli; Domingo Herraiz; Donald Gambatesa; Edward McNally; Elizabeth Kessler; Greg Harris; Gregory Katsas; James Clinger; Jeffrey Bucholtz; Jeffrey Clark; Jeffrey Taylor; John Richter; Jonathan Cohn; Joseph Bianco; Kelly Johnson; Kristi Macklin; Kyle Sampson; Laura Parsky; Lily Swenson; Luis Reyes; Matthew Friedrich; Michael Battle; Monica Goodling; Neil Gorsuch; Nicholas Tzitzon; Pat O'Brien; Patrick Hofer; Patrick Philbin; Rachel Brand; Raul Yanes; Rebecca Seidel; Richard Hertling; Richard Morrison; Robert Flores; Sean McLaughlin; Sharee Freeman; Steve Bradbury; Steven McFarland; Stuart Nash; Tasia Scolinos; Theodore Ullyot; Thomas Barnett; Tracy Henke; Uttam Dhillon; Wan Kim; Alex MacLean; Andrew Ames; Andrew Beach; Angela Williamson; Asheesh Agarwal; Ben Curtis; Beth Collins Cook; Brian Cohen; Bruce Taylor; C. Kevin Marshall; Candice Chiu; Carrie Nelson; Chris Gober; Connor Flaherty; Courtney Elwood; Cynthia Magnuson; Cynthia McKnight; Deborah Underhill; Ebony Lee; Elizabeth Apisson; Eric Akers; Eric Holland; Gordon Todd; Grant Nichols; Jaclyn Lesch; James OConnell; Jan Williams; Jana White; Janet Potter; Jason Torchinsky; Jennifer Korn; Jessica Gavora; John Irving; John Nowacki; Julie Warren; Kerri Strug; Kiahna Sellers; Kimberly Smith; Lara Reynolds; Laura Keehner; Lindsey de la Torre; Mark Metcalf; Mary Neumayr; Matt David; Matt Robinson; Matt Roper; Matthew Miranda; Michael Costigan; Miriam Moore; Molly Donlin; Natalie Voris; Neal Jungeblut; Omar Vargas; Patrick McArthur; Payson Peabody; Price Roe; Raquel Sours; Rena Comisac; Ryan Bounds; Sandra Malloy; Shane Chambers; Theodore Cooperstein; Tim Racicot; Timothy Hagle; Trent Luckinbill; Tucker McNeil; Wanda Martinson; William Otis; William Woodruff
Subject: The Appointee Friday Weekly - September 9, 2005

THE APPOINTEES FRIDAY WEEKLY

Friday, September 9, 2005

==========

Dear Appointees,

- TONIGHT's LIVE JAZZ: Friday, September 9: "Raggs and the All-Stars, Big Band Swing, National Gallery of Art's Sculpture Garden, 9th & Constitution Ave. 5:00-8:00 p.m.
- Hurricane Katrina Effects: Status of U.S. Postal Service Operations in the South
- DOJ Event: National Hispanic Heritage Month 2005 Celebration, September 14
- DOJ MAIN Gate Closure: 10th Street Gate from September 9-19

DOJ_NMG_0004197

- New Restaurant: Acadiana at 901 New York Avenue, NW
- Area Event: Alexandria Festival of the Arts, September 10-11
- Museum Events: The International Spy Museum's September events
- Medical News: Free Diabetic and Skin Screenings for DOJ Employees, September
- Tidbits: Design selected for Flight 93 Memorial in Pennsylvania

Have a great week!

Regards,

The DOJ Office of White House Liaison
Jan Williams and Cynthia McDowell

~

Hurricane Katrina Effects: Postal Disruption

STATUS OF U.S. POSTAL SERVICE OPERATIONS IN THE SOUTH

Due to significant network disruption and catastrophic damage, Express Mail sales have been suspended to certain areas of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. USPS also announced that, effective immediately, it is not accepting any Standard Mail or Periodicals Mail - from any source - addressed for delivery within these three-digit ZIP Code ranges: 369, 393, 394, 395, 396, 700 and 701. This emergency action has been taken as a result of severe facility damage, evacuations and other issues associated with Hurricane Katrina. USPS is now formulating plans to address the handling of Standard and Periodicals Mail already in the mail stream and addressed for delivery to these seven ZIP Code areas.

In a related story…

The U.S. Postal Service has delivered some 15,000 Social Security checks at collection points in the area affected by the hurricane, officials said Wednesday. But the agency is still trying to locate 2,000 of its workers. In the affected region, 188 post offices have returned to full service, 189 are providing limited service and 120 are still closed or "have ceased to exist," said Thomas G. Day, the U.S. Postal Service's senior vice president.
(AP, Express, 9-8-05)

~

DOJ Event:

NATIONAL HISPANIC HERITAGE MONTH 2005 CELEBRATION: September 14

"Hispanic Americans: Strong and Colorful Threads in the American Fabric"

September 15 - October 15 is annually designated by Presidential Proclamation as "National Hispanic Heritage Month." This commemoration was established to honor and recognize the cultural and historical contributions of Hispanic Americans to our country.

The Department of Justice will present its commemorative program in observance of National Hispanic Heritage Month 11:00 a.m. to 12:00 noon, Wednesday, September 14, 2005, in the Great Hall of the Robert F. Kennedy MAIN Building. Speakers include Alberto Gonzales, Attorney General; Robert Flores, Administrator, OJJDP, Office of Justice Programs; Jennifer Sevilla Korn, Deputy Director, Office of Intergovernmental and Public Liaison; and Michael Battle, Director, Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys. The program will feature music performances by Christina Perez and Starr Acosta, recent talent show contestants of the Greater Washington Hispanic Youth Symposium. A sign language interpreter and assistive listening devices will be available. Managers are encouraged to grant employees in the Washington Metropolitan Area reasonable official time to participate. An ethnic food sampling will follow the program. JCON Broadcast 9-6-05

~

DOJ_NMG_0004198

DOJ Main Gate Closure: September 9-19
TEMPORARY CLOSURE of the 10th Street Entrance of the RFK MAIN Justice Building

During the upcoming restoration of the exterior ornamental gates at the 10th street entrance, both the vehicular and pedestrian entrances will be closed for one week. Beginning at 6:00 p.m., Friday, September 9 through 6:00 a.m., Monday, September 19, the entrances will be closed.

In addition, both the north and south revolving doors along the 1200 corridor exiting into the portico from the corridor will also be closed to pedestrian traffic during this same time period. Please use the exterior doors by elevator lobbies 4 and 5 to cross the courtyard to go to the other side of the building. Foot traffic will be prohibited in the portico. During this period, the 9th street entrance will be open for both vehicular and pedestrian traffic.

In addition, the Attorney General's ramp on 10th street near Constitution Avenue will be open from 6:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. beginning Monday, September 12 through Friday, September 16 for delivery vehicles that normally access the RFK MAIN Justice Building via the 9th street vehicular entrance.

~

NEW Restaurant!
ACADIANA

LOCATION: 901 New York Avenue, NW, Washington, DC (entrance on K Street, NW at 9th)
PH: 202.408.8848. Metro: Mount Vernon Sq-Convention Ctr. www.acadianarestaurant.com
Opens for Lunch, September 12. Opens for Dinner, September 13

This is the newest restaurant from Passion Food Hospitality, the owners of such restaurant favorites as DC Coast, TenPenh, and Ceiba restaurants.

Acadiana menu offerings include the following: Smoked Chicken and Andouille Sausage Gumbo, Classic Turtle Soup, Oyster Rockefeller Soup, Baby Spinach and Watercress Salad, Heirloom Tomato Salad, Baked Oyster and Fresh Artichoke Gratin, Fried Green Tomatoes and Spiced Boiled Gulf Shrimp Remoulade, Iced Louisiana P & J Oysters on the Half Shell, Trio of Deviled Eggs; Natchitoches Meat Pies (Black Pepper Buttermilk Dipping Sauce and Louisiana Crawfish Pies), Aunt Boo's Fish Camp Crawfish Stew, Pan Roasted Duck with Dirty Rice and Collard Greens Grilled Gulf Redfish, Jumbo Lump Crabcakes, Pan Seared Louisiana Black Fish, New Orleans Style Barbeque Shrimp, American Red Snapper with Sweet Corn Pudding, Blackened Yellowfin Tuna with Grit Soufflé; Bananas Foster Filled Crepes with Vanilla Bean Ice Cream, Praline Crème Brûlée, White Chocolate Bread Pudding with Macadamia Nut Ice Cream, Nectar Cream Soda Float, Vieux Carré Beignets, Pecan Tart with Bourbon Chocolate Ice Cream and Salted Caramel.

(Hungry yet?)

~
Area Event:
2005 ALEXANDRIA FESTIVAL OF THE ARTS - September 10 and 11

Join more than 200 juried artists from around the country in historic Old Town Alexandria as they display and sell a variety of fine art. Held this Saturday (10-7) and Sunday (10-5), September 10 and 11 in the Old Town Historic District. www.ArtFestival.com <http://www.ArtFestival.com>

DOJ_NMG_0004199

~
Museum Events:
INTERNATIONAL SPY MUSEUM - SEPTEMBER 2005 PROGRAMS

Tuesday, September 13, 6:30 - 9:15pm
A Family Affair: The Walker Spy Ring
When a cash-strapped warrant officer volunteered U.S. Naval secrets to the Soviets in 1967, it was the start of one of the most notorious and damaging spy rings in U.S. Naval history. John Walker, a communications specialist, ultimately recruited his brother, his son, and his colleague Jerry Whitworth. The Walker spy ring supplied the Soviet Union with decoding keys to more than 1 million top secret messages and provided information on Naval detection of Soviet submarines. Family can make or break you however - the ring was ultimately foiled by information supplied by Walker's ex-wife. Join espionage author and historian H. Keith Melton and FBI counterintelligence expert Gerald B. Richards as they reveal the spy ring's tradecraft and their operations. You'll follow Walker's final dead drop sequence via satellite photography, view never-before-seen images of Walker's Norfolk residence immediately following his arrest, and probe the depth of the damage the ring inflicted-if the U.S. had gone to war during this time the results could have been catastrophic. Tickets $20; members of The Spy Ring and co-sponsoring organizations: $16. See below.

Thursday, September 22, noon - 1:00pm
Author Debriefing and Book Signing: What Stalin Knew: The Enigma of Barbarossa
Why did Stalin trust Hitler? Despite the fact that Soviet intelligence knew the date, time, and location of Hitler's planned invasion, Stalin was convinced that Hitler would not attack. Former CIA chief of Soviet operations, David E. Murphy, plumbed the archival record to get to the bottom of the intelligence war between Stalin and Hitler. Using the stories of three intelligence officers caught up in Stalin's system, Murphy-the onetime chief of CIA's Berlin base-sheds new light on Stalin's colossal blunder, one of World War II's greatest mysteries. No charge; registration not required.

Thursday, September 29, noon - 1:00pm
Author Debriefing and Book Signing: The World Was Going Our Way: The KGB and the Battle for the Third World - Newly Revealed Secrets from the Mitrokhin Archive
The KGB believed that the Third World was the key to winning the Cold War, and now their secret operations and plans are revealed thanks to renowned intelligence historian and International Spy Museum board member Christopher Andrew. With exclusive access to legendary Russian defector Vasili Mitrokhin and his archive of secret KGB documents - smuggled out when he escaped to the West - Andrew provides the complete story of the KGB's vast operations from the Middle East to Latin America, Africa, and India. No charge; registration not required.

TICKETS FOR PROGRAMS requiring advance registration are limited, non-refundable, and unless otherwise specified do not include admission to the International Spy Museum. Dates, times and scheduled participants are subject to change. To register, order tickets online at www.Ticketmaster.com <http://www.Ticketmaster.com> <http://www.ticketmaster.com/hich/af1/dbch/af34/loch/f1> , or call Ticketmaster at 202.397.SEAT or 800.551.SEAT (standard TicketMaster service charges apply) unless otherwise directed, or purchase tickets in person during the International Spy Museum's visiting hours at the ticket office located inside the 9th Street group arrivals entrance. To become a member of The Spy Ring, the Spy Museum's membership program, go to www.spymuseum.org <http://www.spymuseum.org> <http://www.spymuseum.org/hich/af1/dbch/af34/loch/f1> or call 866.SPYMUSEUM. LOCATION: 800 F Street, NW, Washington, DC.

~
Medical News:

DOJ_NMG_0004200

FREE DIABETIC and SKIN SCREENINGS - During month of September

The following health units are offering a free diabetic and/or skin screening for Department of Justice employees during the month of September. If you are interested, contact the health unit for an appointment because screenings will not be available every day, at all locations. For the diabetic screening, the health professional will need to provide you information in advance, for you to prepare for the screening.

Patrick Henry Building
Room LL 102
Call: (202) 353-9738

Judiciary Center Building
Room 1B - 816
Call (202) 307-0014

RFK Main Health Unit
Room 1420
Call (202) 514-3107

1301 New York Avenue
Room LL 12
Call (202) 616-3296

~

Tidbits:

DESIGN SELECTED FOR FLIGHT 93 MEMORIAL IN PENNSYLVANIA

A design consisting of a chapel with 40 metallic wind chimes was chosen as a permanent memorial to the victims of Flight 93, which was hijacked on September 11, 2001, and crashed in a Pennsylvania field, officials said Wednesday. The "Crescent of Embrace" memorial, created by a team of designers led by Paul Murdoch Architects, was selected from five finalists and approved at a meeting of the Flight 93 Advisory Commission. The design consists of a chapel with 40 chimes, one for each of the passengers and crew who died on Flight 93. Pedestrian trails and a roadway run through a park leading to a visitor center and the actual crash site.

(AP, Express 09-08-05)

~

Enjoy!

Cynthia R. McDowell
Internal Communications Coordinator
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Room 5317
Washington, D.C. 20530
Tel: (202) 514-9376, Fax: (202) 514-3546

DOJ_NMG_0004201

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.67946-000001

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Tuesday, September 13, 2005 8:24 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: Attorney General's News Briefing 9/13/05
Attachments: agnb050913.pdf; agnb050913.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

British Businessman Sentenced For Missile Smuggling. 3
California Men Plead Not Guilty To Plotting Terror Attacks. 3
Al Arian Codefendant's Lawyer Challenges Allegations Of PIJ Ties. 4
Hunger Strike Spreads Among Guantanamo Bay Detainees. 4
European Crackdown On Islamic Extremists Noted. 4

Patriot Act:

Booksellers Decry FBI Search Power Under Patriot Act. 4

Homeland Response:

Negroponte Says US Remains Al Qaeda's Top Target. 5
Competing Technology Tested To Close "Gaping Hole In Airport Security. 5

War News:

Talibani Says Iraqis Could Replace 50,000 US Troops By Year's End. 5
Al-Jafari Appears In Tal Afar To Tout Counterinsurgency Operation. 6
US Ambassador To Iraq Says Syria Harboring Iraqi Insurgents. 6
Negroponte Says Baathists Present Greatest Challenge In Iraq. 7
US Indicts Dutch Citizen For Plotting Attacks Against Americans In Fallujah. 7
TV Program Featuring Police Footage Proves Popular In Kirkuk. 7
Musharraf Offers To Build Security Fence Along Afghan Border. 7
28 Candidates Barred From Participating In Afghan Elections. 7
Army Will Miss Annual Recruiting Goal. 8

Corporate Scandals:

OFHEO Reaches Settlement With Freddie Mac. 8
Former Westar Official Convicted Of Looting Millions From Utility. 8
Oracle CEO Agrees To Charity Payments In Settlement Of Insider Trading Suit. 9

Criminal Law:

Facing A Grand Jury Carries Emotional, Financial Costs. 9
US Charges FBI Intelligence Analyst With Spying For The Philippines. 9
9th Circuit Rules Warrantless Searches Must Be Based On Probable Cause. 9
American University's Audit Of Presidential Spending Nearly Complete. 10
Chicago Bankruptcy Court Clerk Charged With Extortion. 10
FBI, Florida Authorities Investigating State Prison Officials. 10
Judge Clears Indicted Tennessee Senator To Attend DC Lobbying Conference. 10
Family, Police Puzzled By Virginia College Student's Disappearance. 11
Judge Dismisses Case Against DeLay Fundraiser. 11

Civil Law:

McCain, Feingold Take Aim At Campaign-Finance Rider. 11

Civil Rights:

Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Coalition Seen As Falling Apart. 12
California Gay Marriage Bill Could Have National Implications. 12
New York Firefighter Arrested For Assault Of Immigrant Worker. 12
Jury Finds Two Men Guilty Of Murdering Transgender Teen. 13
California, Ohio, Florida Eyeing Redistricting Reform. 13

Antitrust:

Oracle To Acquire Siebel For $5.85 Billion. 13

FCC Moves Ahead On Telephone Mergers.....14
eBay To Purchase Internet Phone Leader Skype Technologies.....14
DOJ, FTC To Hold Workshop On Real Estate Industry Competition.....15
UK Regulators Launch Antitrust Probe Of Loan Insurers.....15
Ford To Sell Hertz For $5.5 Billion.....16
Wachovia To Acquire Westcorp.....16
Refiner Tupras Sold For $4.14 Billion.....17
Ichan Plans Time Warner Proxy Fight.....17
Buyouts Booming As Stock Market Surges.....17

Environment:

Judge Halts Logging In Sequoia Forest.....17
Senate To Vote On Challenge To EPA Mercury Emission Rules.....18
US Households Face Higher Winter Energy Bills.....18
Carter Decries Move To Drill In ANWR.....18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

IG Finds FBI Violates Informant Rules.....18
FBI Releases Additional 800 Pages Of Thurmond Files.....19
GAO Finds Continuing Shortcomings With FBI IT Modernization.....19
Three Plead Guilty To Roles In Louisiana Cocaine Ring.....20
Fighting Between Bolivian Government, Coca Farmers Could Resume.....20
"Guru Of Ganja" Appeals To Ninth Circuit Court Today.....20
UN Report Says Opium Prices Down Since Taliban's Fall In Afghanistan.....20
Chicago Tribune Urges Realistic Action In Meth Battle.....21
"DC Arsonist" Gets Life Plus 136 Years.....21

Tax:

Panel Concludes Treasury Tax Analysis Of Kerry Plan Was Lawful.....22
Professor Says Estate Tax Repeal Won't Doom Giving To Charity.....22

Congress-Administration:

Roberts Gives Opening Statement As Hearing Get Underway.....22
Bush Visits New Orleans, Says Relief Effort Did Not Discriminate Against Blacks.....26
Embattled FEMA Director Brown Resigns.....29
Contrary To Chertoff Claims, Officials Said To Have Known Damage Katrina Would Cause.....33
Debate Underway Over Whether New Orleans Should Be Rebuilt.....33
New Orleans Residents Starting To Return.....34
Confirmed Death Toll Reaches 279 In Louisiana, 214 In Mississippi.....35
Commander Of Military Cleanup Effort Profiled.....36
Task Force Says NEPA Hindered Hurricane Protection For New Orleans.....36
FEMA Hopes To Open 30,000 Homes Every Two Weeks.....37
FEMA Said To Have Refused To Pay Airfare For California Search-And-Rescue Crews.....37
FEMA Organized Thousands Of Firefighters For Community Relations Work.....37
Spellings Says Hurricane Displaced 372,000 Students.....37
Lack Of Influence On Hill Could Affect Louisiana Efforts To Get Relief.....38
Bush Asked To Save Gulf Coast Naval Bases.....38
Hurricane States Will Need Ample Federal Help To Avert Debt Crisis.....38
Katrina Donations Outpace Previous Disasters.....38
Citing Katrina, GOP Congressional Leaders Drop Plans For Tax Cut Extensions.....39
With Appropriations Lagging, Congress Faces Need For Continuing Resolution.....39
Grand Jury Summons Disrupt Lower Level White House Aides' Lives.....40
Hurricane Victims May Get Access To 401(k) Funds.....40
CNN Allegedly Coaxing Guests To "Get Angry" When Discussing Katrina.....40
GOP Opponents Seek To Derail King's Bid For Homeland Security Chair.....40
Carolinas Prepare As Ophelia Slows Offshore.....40
In Wake Of Katrina, House Democrats Go On Offensive.....41
Hurricane Boosts Barbour As Potential Presidential Candidate.....41
DOD May Be Affected By Ruling On DHS Personnel Rules.....41

Other News:

Los Angeles Blackout Attributed To Technical Error, Not Terrorism.....41
Majority Of National Black Republican Association's Board Members Resign.....42
Federal Oversight Of Developmentally Disabled Homes For Seen As Lacking.....42
FDA Criticized For Failing To Act Quickly On Defective Heart Defibrillators.....42
Researchers Link Surgery To Cancer Relapse.....42

DOJ_NMG_0004205

Ashcroft Appearing As Commentator On CNN.....43
Palestinians Pour Into Gaza Strip.....43
Chinese President Creating Trade Policy Worries In US.....43
China Declassifies Natural Disaster Death Toll Counts. 44
Musharraf Believes Khan Exported Nuclear Production Materials To North Korea.....44
US Rejects Pakistani Request For Nuclear Technology Assistance.....44
India, Pakistan Exchange Prisoners.....44
New Poll Shows German Election Tightening. 44
After Sweeping Re-Election, Speculation Turns To Koizumi's Use Of Mandate. 44
Georgia Receives $295.3 Million Millennium Challenge Grant.....45
Bush Unpopular In Major South American Cities. 45
Governors, Poor Work To Implement Chavez "Social Revolution. 45
G-8 Debt Relief Plan In Jeopardy As Final Vote Nears. 45
Little Progress Seen As World Leaders Prepare For UN Reform Discussions.....46
Left Coalition Wins Majority In Norwegian Parliament. 47
Liberians In US Hope To Play Role In Homeland's Election. 47
NYTimes Lauds Brazil's Progress In Protection Of Amazon...47

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington. 47

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 49

TERRORISM NEWS:

British Businessman Sentenced For Missile Smuggling. USA Today (9/13) reports British businessman Hemant Lakhani, "convicted of trying to smuggle shoulder-launched missiles into the USA," was "sentenced Monday in Newark, N.J., to 47 years in prison. The plot involved the sale of missiles to a group that" Lakhani, 70, was "told would use them to shoot down commercial planes. The weapons' buyer and seller actually were government agents." Lakhani, "arrested in August 2003, was convicted in April of trying to provide material support to terrorists, unlawful brokering of foreign defense articles and attempting to import merchandise to the USA by means of false statements, plus two counts of money laundering."

The AP (9/13, Gold) reports, "During his trial, and again Monday, his lawyers said Lakhani was the victim of government entrapment because the supposed missile seller and buyer were actually government agents." But Assistant US Attorney Stuart Rabner recounted "evidence in which Lakhani volunteered praise for Osama bin Laden. 'We may see a man who looks like us and dresses like us, but is so morally bankrupt that he plots the death of thousands of people,' Rabner said. U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden rejected pleas for leniency from Lakhani and his wife, referring to what she called 'overwhelming' evidence of his 'reprehensible conduct.'"

Reuters (9/13) reports, "His conviction was considered one of the more significant victories for the U.S. Justice Department since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks and the launch of the U.S.-led war on terror. … Lakhani, his attorney, Henry Klingeman, and his wife pleaded for leniency, noting he is elderly and wants to return home to Britain. … 'Mr. Lakhani is not entitled to leniency. He's entitled to fairness,' U.S. District Court Judge Katharine Hayden said in handing down the sentence."

California Men Plead Not Guilty To Plotting Terror Attacks. The AP (9/13, Marquez) reports Californians Levar Haley Washington and Gregory Vernon Patterson "pleaded not guilty Monday to federal charges alleging they planned terrorist attacks against military facilities, the Israeli Consulate and other targets in the Los Angeles area." Washington and Patterson "were ordered held without bail after their pleas," and Assistant US Attorney Kevin Smith called them "dangers to society and flight risks, saying they had planned to carry out a 'homegrown jihad.'" The AP adds, "Also Monday, law enforcement officials briefed Jewish community leaders in Los Angeles on the case and said local police planned to step up security in and around synagogues during the holidays. Randy Parsons, acting assistant director of the FBI's Los Angeles office, said the extra security was being taken out of an abundance of caution, not because there was any specific, credible threat. 'It's important that people go about their normal activities but remain vigilant,' Parsons said."

DOJ_NMG_0004206

Al Arian Codefendant's Lawyer Challenges Allegations Of PIJ Ties. The Tampa Tribune (9/13, Fechter) reports, "An attorney for one of Sami Al-Arian's codefendants is challenging prosecution claims that his client was on the payroll of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad. Defense attorney Stephen Bernstein points to the same translations of intercepted telephone calls prosecutors are relying on, but says the figures discussed leave no room to pay Sameeh Hammoudeh. Bernstein spent the morning cross examining FBI agent Michael Wysocki, who analyzed dozens of bank accounts involving the defendants and organizations they helped run. … Bernstein asked about other records seized, which he said were never translated by the government, that might lead to a different conclusion. But, thus far, Bernstein has not shown Wysocki any additional documents that challenge the accuracy of his review."

Hunger Strike Spreads Among Guantanamo Bay Detainees. The Washington Post (9/13, A3, Leonnig) reports a "month-old hunger strike at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to include at least 128 detainees, 18 of whom are forcibly receiving intravenous fluids or nutrition in the prison hospital, military officials and detainee lawyers said yesterday." The captives are "protesting their indefinite imprisonment and what they describe as beatings administered by the prison's Immediate Response Force (IRF) -- squads of military personnel who are dispatched to put down disturbances in detainees' cells. Some have said they will refuse to eat until the military gives them a fair hearing or they die, according to their attorneys." Military officials "first acknowledged the hunger strike, the second of the summer, on Aug. 25. Since then, the number of people hospitalized and in serious physical danger has grown to 18, according to Maj. Jeffrey J. Weir, a Guantanamo Bay spokesman."

WSJournal Praises Ruling Upholding Bush Power To Detain Padilla. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) says in an editorial, "The timing couldn't have been better. Two days before the anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, a panel for the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled unanimously last Friday that the President 'unquestionably' has the power to detain an American citizen who has taken up arms against his country." Judge Michael Luttig noted the Supreme Court said "precisely that in its Hamdi decision last year," but 'that wasn't enough for José Padilla's attorneys, who argued that Hamdi, which concerned an American picked up on a battlefield in Afghanistan, didn't apply to their client, who was arrested domestically, at O'Hare Airport." Padilla's supporters "want him to be charged in the criminal justice system or released. They include the American Civil Liberties Union, the People for the American Way Foundation, and former Clinton Justice officials Janet Reno, Eric Holder and Philip Heymann, who all want a return to the days of treating terrorism like a law-enforcement problem. In the week of the 9/11 anniversary, we're glad the Fourth Circuit didn't authorize a return to this September 10 mindset."

European Crackdown On Islamic Extremists Noted. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Ford) reports that since Yasir al-Sirri "sought asylum" in Britain "11 years ago the Egyptian Islamic radical has been in and out of jail, and has successfully fought off attempts to extradite him on terrorism charges to both the US and Egypt. Now, however, in the wake of July's London bombings, he faces perhaps his greatest challenge yet as the British government prepares to join a Europewide crackdown on extremist Islamic circles and deport dozens of individuals deemed 'not conducive to the public good.'" As European governments "lower their traditional levels of tolerance for radicalism, they are redrawing the lines between civil liberties and national security in the face of terrorist violence." Sirri, who "runs the 'Islamic Observation Center' in London, (he says it monitors human rights abuses in the Muslim world, but US and British police say it is a conduit for messages among Al Qaeda militants), would undoubtedly be arrested if he were sent back to Egypt."

PATRIOT ACT:

Booksellers Decry FBI Search Power Under Patriot Act. In the second of a three-part series on the Patriot Act, the San Mateo County (CA) Times (9/12, Farooq) reports, "Five years ago, an independent bookstore in Denver became the center of a drug investigation, and at the same time, inadvertently became a model for bookstore owners across the country concerned with the Patriot Act. … Police officers walked into the Tattered Cover Book Store and served a search warrant for the records of one of the store's customers, who was suspected of manufacturing methamphetamine, according to the American Bookseller Foundation for Free Expression. Even though the search took place more than a year before the Patriot Act was passed, the case set a precedent for booksellers and others across the country who are fighting some of the surveillance provisions of the anti-terrorism law." The Times continues, "Several businesses, city councils and other governmental institutions across the country have taken stances for and against the act for a variety of reasons. Some of those stances are driven by politics, some by security and others by fear. … 'You have to be able to do this without the government looking over your shoulder,' said Rich Van Castle, owner of three Bay Books stores in the East Bay. 'It is very important. I wouldn't want the government coming in here and saying "What did he read or did she read?"' … Van Castle is just one of many independent and corporate booksellers across the country who have been fighting one of most controversial measures of the act, Section 215, which gives federal authorities access to customers' book, medical and library records, while establishing a gag order to prevent anyone involved from commenting on the case." The Times adds, "But to the FBI, which is often painted as the abuser of Patriot Act powers, says the gag order is a matter of both national and personal security. The FBI also contends that bookstore purchases and library records were available to federal authorities long before the Sept. 11-inspired Patriot Act. … 'Some of this is just common sense,' said Special Agent LaRae Quay with the San Francisco office of the FBI. 'It's just one of these things if we are looking at an individual it's best that they not know. (It's) also to protect the individuals that are cleared."

DOJ_NMG_0004207

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Negroponte Says US Remains Al Qaeda's Top Target. USA Today (9/13, Diamond) reports that in his "first media interview since becoming the nation's first director of national intelligence in April," John Negroponte "spoke Monday to reporters and an editor from USA TODAY." Negroponte told USA, "Progress has been made in dismembering and attacking the leadership of" Osama bin Laden's "organization. A number of important operatives of his have been killed or captured. He is, we think, alive somewhere in the Afghan-Pakistan border area. … Even though he hasn't been captured, I think that he and his organization are very much on the defensive." Regarding the possibility of terrorist activity, Negroponte said, "We've seen in some of the statements and correspondence that we've laid our hands on between al-Qaeda leadership that clearly they would like to see this activity spread into such targets as Western Europe, and I think what happened in London on the 7th of July, whether or not it was directed by al-Qaeda, was certainly consistent with that desire. … They see vulnerabilities in the West, in Western Europe. And of course, the United States homeland remains, in my view, their No. 1 target."

Negroponte Praises Chertoff For Linking Domestic, Foreign Intelligence. USA Today (9/13, Diamond) reports Negroponte also "praised Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for helping the 'lash-up between domestic and foreign' intelligence, which the 9/11 Commission called a major contributor to lapses before 9/11."

Competing Technology Tested To Close "Gaping Hole In Airport Security." The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Meckler) reports that "one of the most promising" machines being tested to close the "gaping hole in airport security" concerning the ability to detect explosives on passengers or in their carry-on baggage is the backscatter, which has the ability to see through clothing. "The problem with early versions of the machine is that they show images of people as if they had no clothes on, which sparked privacy concerns. Yesterday, American Science & Engineering Inc. launched an X-ray machine that can see objects hidden beneath clothing while obscuring private parts. The other leading manufacturer of the machines also promises to cover up those parts of the image, though in a different way. An alternate technology, being tried in some airports now, shoots puffs of air at passengers to detect traces of explosive residue." The Journal adds that it's all "part of a highly competitive, rapidly unfolding race to deploy the best technology for closing the security gap at airport checkpoints."

WAR NEWS:

Talibani Says Iraqis Could Replace 50,000 US Troops By Year's End. The Washington Post (9/13, A20, VandeHei) reports Iraqi President Jalal Talabani "said in an interview yesterday that the United States could withdraw as many as 50,000 troops by the end of the year, declaring there are enough Iraqi forces trained and ready to begin assuming control in cities throughout the country. After the White House and Pentagon were contacted for comment, however, a senior adviser to Talabani called The Washington Post to say Talabani did not intend to suggest a specific timeline for withdrawal. … In the interview, Talabani said he planned to discuss reductions in U.S. forces during a private meeting with President Bush today, and said he believed the United States could begin pulling out some troops immediately." The Post notes, "That assessment differs dramatically from those offered by Bush and by U.S. military commanders in Iraq." Talabani "said the number of 'well-trained' Iraqi security forces stood at 60,000 and would reach 100,000 by the end of the year."

DOJ_NMG_0004208

Al-Jafari Appears In Tal Afar To Tout Counterinsurgency Operation. The New York Times (9/13, Worth) reports Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari "paid a surprise visit to Tal Afar on Monday, with that city largely quiet after a major offensive by American and Iraqi troops aimed at reclaiming it from insurgents. The prime minister has repeatedly showcased the Tal Afar operation as proof of his government's willingness to deal decisively with Sunni insurgents in western Iraq."

Iraqi Forces Kill Additional Forty Insurgents In Tal Afar. USA Today (9/13) reports, "Violence flared in the northern Iraq city of Tal Afar late Monday when Iraqi forces trapped insurgents in basement hide-outs, killing 40 militants in fierce fighting, the Iraqi military said. … The new fighting Monday night raised the insurgent death toll since the offensive began to nearly 200, the government said. Baghdad said it lost seven soldiers in the course of the three-day offensive and six civilians were killed. The U.S. military said no American soldiers were hurt."

Tal Afar Insurgents Threaten To Use Chemical Weapons. The Washington Post/AP (9/13, A20) reports, "Al-Iraqiya television, which showed no pictures of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari's visit to the Tall Afar area, said he was there despite an insurgent threat to unleash chemical and biological weapons against Iraqi and U.S. forces. There was no known public threat from the insurgents to use unconventional weapons in the area, but they have vowed in two Web postings since Friday to use chemical weapons against U.S. and Iraqi government interests in Baghdad. The threats mentioned the fortified Green Zone that houses the U.S. Embassy, Iraq's parliament and other government offices."

US Making Extensive Use Of Informants. The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Finer) reports, "This is how the 10-day-old invasion of Tall Afar unfolded Monday. After two days of relatively uneventful patrols in the abandoned neighborhood of Sarai, where commanders had expected insurgents to be massed for a fight, U.S. and Iraqi forces turned north in the morning, to neighborhoods they had already cleared, and found hundreds of men who appeared to be of military age and troops believed to have slipped through their cordons. Eventually, 52 men were placed in the open backs of flatbed trucks bound for Camp Sykes." The Post goes on to report, "Soldiers with little training relevant to the mission have been forced into roles more traditionally assigned to police: gathering evidence, interrogating witnesses and suspects, and following up on leads. In searching almost every house in the city's most violent neighborhoods, they have detained hundreds of young men, some because they possessed weapons or insurgent literature, but others solely on the hearsay of local informants often called 'sources' by U.S. troops." U.S. soldiers "acknowledge knowing little about their backgrounds and motives -- or even their names -- and admit that their reliability varies widely."

US Ambassador To Iraq Says Syria Harboring Iraqi Insurgents. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 8, :25, Vargas) reported, "The US Ambassador to Iraq had some very harsh words for Syria today. He said Syria has become a hub for terrorists trying to undercut Iraq's government. He said, 'Our patience is running out. The patience of Iraqis are running out. The time for decision has arrived for Damascus.' He refused to rule out a military strike on Syria, although such an attack is seen as unlikely."

USA Today (9/13, Slavin) reports, "Syria is harboring training camps for Iraqi insurgents, U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said Monday. U.S. patience with Syria is running out, he said. The United States has ruled out no option, including military force, for dealing with the government of Syrian President Bashar Assad, Khalilzad said during a State Department briefing with reporters. … Administration officials have repeatedly accused Syria of allowing insurgents to travel to Iraq, but it was the first time an official has publicly named specific cities — Aleppo, Latakia and Damascus — as training sites."

The New York Times (9/13, Brinkley) reports, "While other administration officials made similar accusations early this year, the focus of American attention to Syria in recent months has been its occupation of Lebanon. Over the summer, Syria said that it had cracked down on insurgents operating within its territory. But Mr. Khalilzad, in remarks to reporters in Washington, made it clear that the United States believed that Syria was providing assistance to insurgents operating in Iraq and that such help might have increased. Government-controlled Syrian newspapers 'glorify the terrorists as resistance fighters,' he said. Syrian authorities 'allow youngsters misguided by Al Qaeda - from Saudi Arabia, from Yemen, from North Africa - to fly into Damascus International Airport,' attend training camps and then cross into Iraq, he contended."

DOJ_NMG_0004209

Negroponte Says Baathists Present Greatest Challenge In Iraq. USA Today (9/13, Diamond) reports, "U.S. intelligence is struggling to expose elements of the insurgency in Iraq made up of former members of Saddam Hussein's regime, John Negroponte, the nation's intelligence chief, said in an interview Monday. Joint U.S.-Iraqi military efforts have damaged the network of foreign insurgents led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, though Zarqawi himself remains at large, Negroponte said. Indigenous Iraqi insurgents, led by former members of Saddam's ruling Baath Party, have been tougher to track down." Negroponte "said Iraqis dominate the insurgency. Despite intense focus on Iraq, where 138,000 U.S. troops are deployed, U.S. intelligence has not been able to produce anything more than a 'speculative' estimate of the insurgency's size, he said." Based on everything he has seen, Negroponte said, the insurgency is neither gaining strength nor weakening appreciably."

Sunni Elite Seen As Unlikely To Abandon Insurgency Soon. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/13, A27) Gary Schmitt, executive director of the Project for the New American Century, writes, "The reality is that a stable, democratic Iraq, with large-scale Sunni participation, is unlikely until the insurgency in Iraq is widely seen by the Sunnis themselves as not succeeding. … Irrespective of the fact that their demands cannot be met without losing, in turn, Iraq's critical majority -- the Shiites -- Sunni leaders still live in a world that is about past prominence and future expectations. And until a new reality is forced upon them, they are not likely to move from their current opposition to the constitution."

US Indicts Dutch Citizen For Plotting Attacks Against Americans In Fallujah. The Washington Times (9/13, Waterman) reports, "Federal prosecutors have indicted a Dutch resident for conspiring to kill members of the U.S. armed forces in Iraq -- the first criminal charges filed in connection with the insurgency against American forces in that country. The indictment, filed Friday afternoon in U.S. District Court in Washington, charges Iraqi-born Wesam Delaema, 32, who is in Dutch custody, with conspiring to bomb U.S. convoys in Fallujah, Iraq. … A Dutch official at the embassy in Washington said extradition hearings could take up to a year, but that if the courts cleared the way, the government almost certainly would accede to the U.S. request."

TV Program Featuring Police Footage Proves Popular In Kirkuk. The Washington Times/AP (9/13, Tran) reports, "Created to make government more transparent, 'The Cops Show,' featuring Kirkuk officers in action, is the first of its kind in the country and is breaking new ground in Iraqi television. A live call-in portion gives the public the chance to praise the security forces or gripe about them. Screened weekly on Kirkuk Television, which broadcasts in this northern city of nearly 1 million people, 'The Cops Show' has opened the floodgates in a community long suppressed."

Musharraf Offers To Build Security Fence Along Afghan Border. USA Today (9/13) reports, "Chafing under criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to fight terrorism, President Pervez Musharraf offered Monday to build a security fence to deter militants and drug merchants from entering the country from Afghanistan. … Musharraf made the offer at a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, 'We think it is important that Pakistan and Afghanistan take up this idea.' President Bush meets with Musharraf today."

28 Candidates Barred From Participating In Afghan Elections. The Washington Post (9/13, A19, Aizenman) reports, "Twenty-one candidates running in Afghanistan's upcoming legislative election have been disqualified for maintaining links to illegal armed militias and seven more for failing to resign from government posts, the joint Afghan and international Electoral Complaints Commission announced Monday. … The latest disqualifications did not satisfy human rights advocates who have expressed concern that the field of contenders is rife with warlords who committed well-documented atrocities during warfare that began in 1978." Grant Kippen, chairman of the electoral commission, "said the commission relied on the recommendations of a disarmament commission that includes representatives of the Afghan government, the United Nations, the U.S. military and a NATO-led international force to determine which candidates retained associations with banned armed groups."

DOJ_NMG_0004210

Army Will Miss Annual Recruiting Goal. The New York Times/Reuters (9/13) reports, "The Army posted its best recruiting month in four years in August, but will still miss its annual recruiting goal for the first time since 1999, officials said Monday. In August, the regular Army sent more recruits to boot camp than in any other month since July 2001. But the part-time Army National Guard and Army Reserve both missed their monthly goals and will fall far short of their annual goals for the 2005 fiscal year, which ends this month. The regular Army, which is aiming for 80,000 recruits this year, was behind its year-to-date goal by the end of August, with too big a deficit to make up through September's recruiting, officials said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

OFHEO Reaches Settlement With Freddie Mac. The Dow Jones Newswires (9/12) reports, "Freddie Mac's regulator settled its case against the company for failing to properly penalize former top executives in 2003 after Freddie discovered widespread accounting problems and evidence of earnings manipulation, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight announced Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The company agreed Friday to turn over new documents and to help OFHEO pursue separate cases against Freddie's former Chief Executive Leland Brendsel and former Chief Financial Officer Vaughn Clarke." Dow Jones adds, "Freddie is still struggling to emerge from an accounting scandal that resulted in a clean sweep of the company's senior management team, an overhaul of internal controls, an earnings restatement of more than $5 billion, multiple shareholder lawsuits and federal regulatory probes. OFHEO is the only regulator to settle its case against Freddie, which agreed to pay OFHEO $125 million and agreed to other remedial actions in December 2003 to settle charges of safety and soundness violations. … OFHEO, however, filed separate charges against Freddie Mac, Brendsel and Clarke that month seeking cease-and-desist orders from an administrative law judge to force the company to alter its termination agreements with the two men and to impose fines against them. Freddie's board of directors allowed Brendsel to retire and Clarke to resign in June 2003 with roughly $56 million and $1.2 million in severance and other pay, respectively. … OFHEO's settlement with Freddie, which was signed Friday, only settles the regulator's administrative case against the company regarding the nature of Brendsel and Clarke's departures. Parallel investigations related to Freddie's accounting troubles by the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission and others, are still pending."

Freddie Mac Will Help Recover Funds From Former Officers. As part of a settlement made public yesterday by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Freddie Mac will assist federal regulators as they try to recover millions of dollars paid to two of its former executives. The New York Times (9/13, Glater) reports, "The agreement comes nearly two years after Freddie Mac…paid a $125 million penalty to settle charges related to its accounting, as part of a related settlement with its regulator, known as Ofheo. … The two executives in question are Leland C. Brendsel, the former chief executive at Freddie Mac, and Vaughn A. Clarke, its former chief financial officer. Both men left Freddie Mac in June 2003, several months into an expanding investigation of the company's accounting."

Former Westar Official Convicted Of Looting Millions From Utility. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) reports, "A federal jury found former Westar Energy Inc. Chief Executive Officer David Wittig and another executive guilty of looting the electric utility of millions of dollars." The Journal continues, "Prosecutors claimed the two men, who were forced out of the Topeka, Kan., company in 2002, engineered extravagant salaries and benefits for themselves at the expense of shareholders, hiding much of their actions from the company's board and federal regulators. … Mr. Wittig and former Chief Strategy Officer Douglas Lake were found guilty of conspiracy, wire fraud, circumventing internal controls and money laundering." The Journal adds, "The jury deliberated for 7½ days before convicting Mr. Wittig on 39 counts and Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Each count of wire fraud, the most serious of the charges, is punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of as much as $1 million. Testimony about whether the government can recover money from the executives is expected to start Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0004211

Oracle CEO Agrees To Charity Payments In Settlement Of Insider Trading Suit. The Washington Post (9/13, D5, White) reports, "Oracle Corp. chief executive Lawrence J. Ellison tentatively agreed to pay $100 million to charity over five years to settle a private lawsuit in California accusing him of insider trading in Oracle stock, a plaintiff's lawyer in the case said yesterday." The Post continues, "Plaintiffs in the suit alleged that Ellison engaged in insider trading when he sold nearly $900 million worth of Oracle shares in January 2001, a little more than a month before the company announced poor earnings. Oracle shares fell 21 percent, to $16.88, after the announcement. Ellison had sold his stock for a little less than twice that amount." The Post adds, "The proposed settlement, reported yesterday by the New York Times and the San Jose Mercury News, must be approved by Oracle's board and a California judge. If approved, the deal would end what is known as a shareholder derivative lawsuit, an increasingly common type of civil case in which shareholders file suit on behalf of a company. … Monetary settlements in derivative cases have typically been small, and most of the money usually goes to plaintiff's attorneys. Companies often agree to make changes to the way they operate in order to settle the suits. … Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., an attorney for plaintiffs in the case, said the charity payments represent a compromise between the two sides. He said Oracle shareholders would benefit because the company will implement new insider-trading rules as part of the settlement."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Facing A Grand Jury Carries Emotional, Financial Costs. The Washington Post (9/13, A25, Coates) reports, "Sympathy can be hard to come by for White House officials who are summoned to appear before a grand jury." The Post continues, "Those whose identities remain a secret suffer in silence, discouraged from reaching out to their closest friends for help. Those whose names leak into the public domain become lightning rods for rumor, suspicion and innuendo, as politicians, commentators and journalists try to divine a meaning behind each summons." The Post adds, "The latest White House staffer to face the grand jury is Susan B. Ralston, assistant to White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who gave testimony to the committee investigating the leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame. … But while the politics of every appearance is picked over in minute detail, there is also a human story to each summons that often goes unexplored." The Post notes, "Witnesses face stress, uncertainty and -- worst of all -- crippling lawyer's fees that can take years to pay off. And as prosecutors cast their net ever wider, inexperienced staffers with few financial assets are increasingly facing the emotional and financial burden of grand jury testimony. … But veterans of past grand jury appearances -- including the investigation into President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky -- said that keeping silent compounded an already difficult process."

US Charges FBI Intelligence Analyst With Spying For The Philippines. The AP (9/13, Gold) reports, "An FBI intelligence analyst with top secret clearance who worked at a New Jersey Army base was charged Monday with passing classified information about Filipino leaders to current and former officials of that nation." The AP continues, "The analyst, Leandro Aragoncillo, sent some of the material to Michael Ray Aquino, a former deputy director of the Philippines National Police who lives in New York City, according to an FBI complaint unsealed with the arrests." The AP adds, "Aragoncillo, 46, of Woodbury, was hired to work at Fort Monmouth in July 2004 and began sending classified information and documents in January, according to the complaint. … From May to Aug. 15, Aragoncillo printed or downloaded 101 classified documents relating to the Philippines, of which 37 were classified 'secret,' the complaint said. Details of the documents' contents were not disclosed in court papers or in court. … The investigation by immigration authorities began after Aquino, 39, was arrested in March, accused of overstaying the tourist visa he used to enter the country in July 2001."

9th Circuit Rules Warrantless Searches Must Be Based On Probable Cause. The California Recorder (9/13, Smith) reports, "Even if a defendant agrees to warrantless searches in exchange for pretrial release, police still can't search him without probable cause, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday." The Recorder continues, "In a victory for the privacy rights of defendants awaiting trial while on their own recognizance, a 2-1 majority threw out evidence Nevada authorities had received by testing

DOJ_NMG_0004212

Raymond Scott for drugs without probable cause." The Recorder adds, "True, Scott had consented to random drug testing 'by any peace officer without a warrant.' But because the government did not have probable cause -- and could not show a 'special need' to lower the bar -- the drug test violated Scott's Fourth Amendment rights, 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski wrote for the majority." The Recorder adds, "The panel says its opinion is one of first impression among all the federal circuit courts, and the dissenting judge predicted a widespread impact on federal and state pretrial proceedings. … By holding that probable cause is required for the warrantless search of a pretrial 'releasee' or his home, 'the majority casually adopts a rule that carries monumental implications for the pretrial procedures employed by every state in our circuit, as well as the United States,' wrote 9th Circuit Judge Jay Bybee. … Scott was facing state charges of drug possession when he was released on his own recognizance, subject to several conditions, including warrantless drug and alcohol testing."

American University's Audit Of Presidential Spending Nearly Complete. The Washington Post (9/13, B5, Strauss, Kinzie) reports, "American University trustees are nearing completion of a probe into hundreds of thousands of dollars of questionable expenses by suspended President Benjamin Ladner and his wife, according to two sources with knowledge of the audit." The Post continues, "The school's 25-member governing Board of Trustees will meet within a few weeks to discuss the results and decide how to proceed with Ladner, who became president of the private university in Northwest Washington in 1994." The Post adds, "Ladner was placed on administrative leave Aug. 24, a few months after the board began reviewing the expenses of the president and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner, who is described on the university's Web site as a volunteer who represents the Ladner presidency. … The audit was prompted by an anonymous letter detailing what it said were questionable travel and entertainment expenses by the Ladners, according to sources close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect their role."

Chicago Bankruptcy Court Clerk Charged With Extortion. The Daily Southtown (9/13, Hack) reports Chicago bankruptcy court clerk Sandra D. Butler on Monday was "charged with extortion, accused of accepting a bribe in an FBI sting." The Southtown notes, "According to an FBI affidavit, agents first began investigating Butler three years ago after a debtor complained she had paid the clerk $5,000 to stop the foreclosure proceedings against her house but later learned the bribe was unnecessary. … Earlier this month, FBI agents filed a bogus Chapter 13 in Butler's courtroom and sent a fake debtor to see her. … After looking up the man's bankruptcy petition, Butler allegedly said she could make some phone calls 'off the record' to stop the sale of his house, the FBI said." The Chicago Tribune (9/13, Higgins) also reports on the charges, noting the FBI sting.

FBI, Florida Authorities Investigating State Prison Officials. The Tallahassee Democrat (9/13, Cotterell) reports, "State and federal authorities are investigating the activities of prison officials in North Florida, where the regional director for the state Department of Corrections abruptly resigned last month. FBI and state officials said Monday that no one has been arrested or indicted in the investigation, which has been the subject of heated discussion among corrections employees on computer bulletin boards and e-mail networks. 'There is an ongoing investigation regarding the Department of Corrections,' FBI Special Agent Jeff Westcott said from Jacksonville. He declined to comment on specifics.

Judge Clears Indicted Tennessee Senator To Attend DC Lobbying Conference. The AP (9/13) reports, "An indictment on bribery and extortion charges won't keep former state Senator John Ford from attending a convention of black business and political leaders in Washington, DC." Ford "will attend the conference September 21st to 26th to look for new clients for his private consulting business. US District Court Judge Daniel Breen gave Ford permission to leave the state for the convention." The AP notes, "Ford is charged with bribery and extortion in an…investigation focused on an FBI front company that sought favorable legislation from the General Assembly. He also is charged with threatening a federal witness." The Tennessean (9/13, de la Cruz) adds that Ford, "who is under house arrest on federal bribery and intimidation charges, got a judge's permission to travel to the '35th Annual Legislature Conference for Black Leaders and Businessmen.'"

State Trooper's Testimony Provides Details About Cockfighting Raids. The Knoxville News (9/12, Stambaugh) reports, "Among the evidence compiled by the FBI before a June 11 raid on a cockfighting pit near Del Rio were aerial photographs and video surveillance of the facility, according to testimony heard last week. A preliminary hearing Wednesday in Cocke County General Sessions Court provided many new details about the controversial raid, which was cloaked in secrecy as part of a sweeping four-year probe by federal and state authorities into organized crime and public corruption in Cocke County." Tennessee Highway Patrol Trooper Timothy Wolfenbarger "said the operation was orchestrated by the FBI and a federal SWAT team had been assigned to conduct the 'initial sweep' on the compound. State troopers, who had been drawn from posts across the state, were ordered into the site after it was secured. 'They (the FBI) had surveillance videos aerial photographs,' Wolfenbarger said. 'They had a good plan.'" The AP (9/12, Bailey) notes, "Judge John Bell bound the cases over to the grand jury but said he didn't think the evidence presented at the hearing was enough to convict them."

DOJ_NMG_0004213

Family, Police Puzzled By Virginia College Student's Disappearance. The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Stockwell) reports, "Eager to begin her freshman year at Virginia Commonwealth University, Taylor Behl created an online profile and wrote that she was looking for new friends in the Richmond area. Last week, she told her roommate she was going out for a few hours. She did not come back." The Post continues, "Behl, 17, was last seen Sept. 5, and campus officials said yesterday they still do not suspect foul play. But they are becoming increasingly concerned, and the investigation into her disappearance gains momentum and urgency with each passing day. … Nearby jurisdictions have joined the hunt, and the FBI has assigned an agent to advise campus and Richmond police. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, based in Alexandria, has posted a notice on its site." The Post adds, "Every year, students 'appear to disappear' from the 30,000-student university and do not call their families for days, said Pam Lepley, a campus police spokeswoman. The students usually resurface after a couple of days, she said. But in this case, Behl, a June graduate of Madison High School in Vienna, has contacted no one. … Behl was last seen about 10 p.m. on Labor Day after a late supper at a local cafe. She found her roommate in their room with a boyfriend and told her she would leave for a while to give them privacy, police said."

Judge Dismisses Case Against DeLay Fundraiser. The Hill (9/13, O'Connor) reports, "A Texas judge dismissed a civil case against a major fundraiser for House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) last Friday. The federal district-court judge dismissed the case brought by two Texas Democrats against John Colyandro, the former executive director of the Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee (TRMPAC). The judge, Lee Yeakel, ruled that lawyers for the two Democrats failed to prove that Colyandro had knowingly broken Texas election law in using corporate contributions to fund campaign ads."

DeLay Seeks To Put Case Behind Him Ahead Of Potential Ethics Probe. Roll Call (9/13, Bresnahan) reports, "The recently disclosed meeting between House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and a prosecutor investigating allegations of state campaign finance violations is a strong signal that DeLay is trying to put a longstanding Texas investigation behind him as he prepares for a potential probe by the House ethics committee. DeLay and his lawyers met with Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle and his aides for about 90 minutes on Aug. 17. … Sources close to both men described the meeting as cordial and said DeLay was treated more like a witness than a potential target of the probe." DeLay "was not under oath when he met with Earle, and there were no other preconditions put in place, such as transactional or prosecutorial immunity, sources close to the Majority Leader said." Roll Call adds that "while a number of legal issues remain for Texas courts to straighten out, including outstanding criminal charges against several DeLay allies, the fact that Earle privately told DeLay and his attorneys that he is not a target of investigators may now enable DeLay to focus his attention on the House ethics committee."

CIVIL LAW:

McCain, Feingold Take Aim At Campaign-Finance Rider. Roll Call (9/13, Nelson) reports, "Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) implored their colleagues Monday to support their efforts to remove a campaign-finance rider to the Treasury-Transportation appropriations bill, which is slated to come to the Senate floor as early as this week. The provision would allow lawmakers' leadership" PACs "to give unlimited funds to the national party committees, opening what the two Senators believe would be a significant loophole in the campaign finance law." Roll Call notes, "In a 'Dear Colleague' letter, Feingold and McCain noted that national parties could turn around and spend those funds on the lawmaker's own re-election, 'effectively subverting individual and PAC donor contribution limits on the amounts that can be given to a Member's campaign.'" McCain and Feingold "concluded by asserting that substantive changes to the campaign finance laws should occur only after 'adequate' debate, the antithesis of which would be '[s]lipping a rider onto an appropriations bill in a subcommittee markup.' The two plan to force a vote on the provision on the Senate floor."

DOJ_NMG_0004214

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Coalition Seen As Falling Apart. The AP (9/13, Leblanc, Emery) reports, "A fragile coalition of lawmakers cobbled together to support an anti-gay marriage amendment is falling apart, virtually assuring that same-sex marriage will for now remain legal in Massachusetts, according to an Associated Press poll." The AP continues, "The survey, conducted between Sept. 6-9, found at least 104 lawmakers who plan to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, which would ban gay marriage but create civil unions. … The amendment, which is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday, needs the support of at least 101 of the state's 200 lawmakers to get on the 2006 ballot. … 'It's a dangerous precedent to take away rights that have been granted by the court for an identifiable group of people,' said Democrat Rep. James Brendan Leary." The AP adds, "Last year, months after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that same-sex marriage was legal, the amendment passed 105-92. It must pass a second vote to get on next year's ballot. … Reasons for the faltering support are rooted in the language of the amendment, which was intended as a compromise between foes of same-sex marriage and supporters of gay rights. It ultimately had an opposite effect, however, alienating gay marriage opponents by creating civil unions and offending gay rights supporters by banning gay marriage."

California Gay Marriage Bill Could Have National Implications. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Wood) reports, "The latest struggle over who decides the legality of gay marriage -- citizens, lawmakers, or the courts -- played out in the nation's most populous state last week. The California legislature was the first to approve a bill legalizing same-sex marriage, although Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has vowed to veto it. … The legislature's attempt to broaden the definition of marriage is in direct conflict with a citizens' initiative passed in 2000 defining legal marriage as between a man and woman only. That citizen's initiative itself, Proposition 22, is also being challenged in court. But the recent move by Sacramento legislators emphasizes what some observers see as a shift in public opinion that appears to be more accepting of gay marriage. Still, others anticipate the bill could add to the backlash against the gay-marriage movement that prompted 11 states to ban same-sex marriage through ballot initiatives last year." The Monitor adds, "National pollsters report more acceptance of gays and lesbians in a variety of other contexts. What happens in California could set the tone for how other states deal with the issue legislatively."

WPost Praises California Lawmakers' Vote On Same-Sex Marriage. The Washington Post (9/13, A26) editorializes, "The California General Assembly last week became the first state legislature to allow same-sex marriages. … While the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court permitted same-sex marriage in that state and legislatures have created civil unions elsewhere, the vote is the first time that a state legislature has acted on its own to create marriage equality. … The California legislature's decision gives the lie to the notion that only imperial judges would foist such a social policy on a state." The Post notes that despite Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's vow to veto the bill, "the legislative action last week remains an important symbol -- at once a rebuke to those states that have reacted to the Massachusetts decision by writing discrimination into their fundamental laws and a gentle reminder to those who see hope for progress only in the courts that legislatures can still be engines for positive change."

New York Firefighter Arrested For Assault Of Immigrant Worker. The AP (9/13) reports, "Hours after many New York firefighters gathered to mark the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, one of them was arrested for attacking an immigrant worker from Bangladesh and telling him he looked 'like he's al-Qaida,' police said." The AP continues, "Firefighter Edward Dailey was arrested Sunday on charges of criminal mischief and felony second-degree assault, Police Sgt. Kevin Farrell said. … He was released without bail. Despite the alleged al-Qaida remark, there was not enough evidence to charge him with a hate crime, authorities said." The AP adds, "Dailey, 27, is accused of breaking a piece of Plexiglas off a curbside newsstand and throwing it at a 51-year-old man who works there, Farrell said. Dailey had said the man looked 'like he's al-Qaida,' Farrell said. … The victim, whose arm was cut in the alleged attack, was treated at a hospital and released, Farrell said."

DOJ_NMG_0004215

Jury Finds Two Men Guilty Of Murdering Transgender Teen. The New York Times (9/13, Marshall) reports, "A jury convicted two men of murder on Monday but deadlocked on the fate of a third man in the retrial of three defendants charged with killing a 17-year-old transgender teenager in October 2002." The Times continues, "The two - Michael W. Magidson and Jose A. Merel, both 25 - were found guilty of second-degree murder for the death of Gwen Araujo, who was born as a male named Eddie Araujo Jr., but who frequently wore women's clothing and lived as a women. … After the verdict was read, Mr. Magidson bowed his head and Mr. Merel slowly shook his. They face sentences of 15 years to life in prison. … The jury found both men not guilty of committing a hate crime." The Times adds, "The actions of the third man, Jason Cazares, also 25, confounded a jury for the second time in two years. The panel, which heard the case for several months in a packed Alameda County Superior Court room, told Judge Harry R. Sheppard that they were hopelessly deadlocked on the fate of Mr. Cazares."

The AP (9/12, Locke) reports, "Araujo, 17, was born a boy named Edward but grew up to believe her true identity was female. The defendants, who knew her as Lida, met Araujo in the summer of 2002. Magidson and Merel had sexual encounters with Araujo, experiences that fueled suspicions about Araujo's gender." The AP continues, "The issue boiled over in the early hours of Oct. 4, 2002, in a confrontation at Merel's house in the San Francisco suburb of Newark. … Merel's lawyer, William Du Bois, said he was shocked by the verdict, especially since prosecutor Chris Lamiero said he didn't think Merel was the killer." The AP notes, "In the first trial, the three defendants stuck together, with their lawyers attacking the chief prosecution witness, Jaron Nabors, who was also at the house the night Araujo died but was allowed to plead guilty to manslaughter in exchange for testifying. … But in the second trial, the defendants' united front cracked."

California, Ohio, Florida Eyeing Redistricting Reform. Roll Call (9/13, Jacobson) reports, "With initiatives to reform redistricting expected to make the 2005 ballot in California and Ohio, and another for 2006 gaining traction in Florida, the ultimate insider issue has suddenly become hot in three of the nation's most populous states." Political strategists "say the pivotal wild card is frustration with politics as usual. If such a mood exists, and if it is channeled effectively, it can put a dry issue like redistricting over the top, said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the liberal Ballot Initiative Strategy Center. And in these three states at least, the political conditions may be riper than normal." Roll Call notes, "In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R)…has staked his prestige on the redistricting measure and other reforms. In Ohio, a metastasizing political scandal involving Gov. Bob Taft (R) and the state Republican Party is producing anger and volatility in a state long dominated by the GOP. And Florida, like Ohio, has been home to a divisive presidential election in which residents aired a torrent of allegations about how partisanship may have influenced vote counting."

ANTITRUST:

Oracle To Acquire Siebel For $5.85 Billion. The New York Times (9/13, Flynn) reports, "Oracle, the giant database-software maker, announced on Monday that it would pay $5.85 billion to acquire Siebel Systems, its largest competitor in the market for sales automation programs." The Times continues, "The deal will bolster Oracle's effort to topple its German rival SAP as the leading seller of business applications software for big corporations. … It comes less than a year after Oracle managed to achieve a hostile takeover of PeopleSoft for $10.3 billion after a contentious battle that dragged on for nearly 18 months."

The San Francisco Chronicle (9/12, Fost) reports, "The Siebel acquisition not only gives Redwood City's Oracle enough ammo to take on its archrival SAP of Germany in the field of customer relationship management, or CRM, software — essentially, software used to manage a company's sales operations — but it also has the delicious twist of allowing the Oracle boss to declare victory over Tom Siebel, a former protege turned enemy."

The Financial Times (9/13, Politi, Nuttall) reports, "For Larry Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, the acquisition will cement his reputation as a prolific dealmaker. In December, Oracle agreed to buy PeopleSoft for about $10.5bn, after winning an 18-month takeover battle, seeing off a high-profile, antitrust suit brought by the US Department of Justice." The Times adds, "Mr Ellison on Monday suggested the company's attention would now be focused on integration. 'I don't think you'll see another major acquisition any time soon,' he said. The purchase of Siebel will give Oracle access to 3.4m users and 4,000 corporate customers of its CRM software, which helps companies track sales, marketing and customer service."

DOJ_NMG_0004216

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Sanchez) reports, "Under the deal, Oracle will purchase each Siebel share for $10.66 in cash unless the owner of the stock decides to receive Oracle stock." The Times adds, "The merger, which is subject to regulatory review, has been approved by the boards of Oracle and Siebel. Siebel shareholders must still vote on the deal, but a vote by Oracle shareholders is not required, according to the company."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Bank) reports, "Oracle predicted the deal will close early next year, after approval by Siebel shareholders. The acquisition is expected to face an antitrust review by the Justice Department, which unsuccessfully sought to block Oracle's purchase of PeopleSoft. … Analysts said they don't expect strong opposition this time; Oracle has lagged well behind SAP and Siebel in CRM software, and Oracle's marketing of Siebel products could potentially increase competition in the market."

The Washington Post (9/13, D5, Musgrove) reports, "A Justice Department spokeswoman, Gina Talamona, said it was too soon for the agency to comment on Oracle's planned acquisition. 'It's certainly something we'd be interested in taking a look at,' she said." The Post adds, "Analysts said Oracle's proposed acquisition may not generate the same type of controversy as the PeopleSoft deal because it's not considered a hostile takeover bid and the combined company would not dominate the CRM market."

The AP (9/13, Liedtke) reports, "In the past nine months, Oracle has either completed or announced five takeovers in the field, an expansion that has cost more than $17.6 billion. Among the acquired was PeopleSoft Inc., which like Siebel Systems was run by a former Oracle executive who had developed a frosty relationship Ellison. … The Siebel acquisition, expected to close early next year, affects about 4,000 customers. The company has about 5,000 workers, many of whom are expected to lose their jobs as Oracle cuts costs in an effort to boost its profits by about 20 percent annually."

Bloomberg News (9/12) and Dow Jones Newswires (9/12) also report on the planned acquisition.

FCC Moves Ahead On Telephone Mergers. The AP (9/13, Kerr) reports, "The head of the Federal Communications Commission has asked agency staff to draft orders approving two big phone company mergers - SBC Communications Inc. with AT&T, and Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI Inc." The AP continues, "FCC chairman Kevin Martin wants the commission to take a final vote on the deals next month, two people with firsthand knowledge of the issue said Monday. They were authorized to speak about the drafts only on the condition of anonymity." The AP adds, "The sources would not say what conditions might be placed on the mergers to ensure competition is not compromised. … SBC's deal to acquire AT&T is valued at $16 billion while Verizon is offering $8.5 billion for MCI. SBC and Verizon already are the largest regional phone companies, known informally as 'Baby Bells.' The mergers would enhance their base of business customers and expand their national and international presence." The AP notes, "The Bells have been peeling away long-distance customers from AT&T and MCI by offering unlimited national calling for a set rate. … Martin's request for drafts of approval signal his intention to press ahead with the mergers despite the 2-2 split between Republicans and Democrats on the commission. The decision also seems to indicate Martin's willingness to reach out to the Democrats to craft an agreement. … The Justice Department also will have to sign off on the mergers."

eBay To Purchase Internet Phone Leader Skype Technologies. The Washington Post (9/13, D1, Krim) reports, "Online auction giant eBay Inc. announced a deal yesterday to become one of the world's largest telecommunications companies, buying Internet phone-service leader Skype Technologies SA." The Post continues, "Although Luxembourg-based Skype is relatively unknown in the United States, it has amassed 54 million global customers in less than three years by offering free calls between those who use its software."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Mangalindan, Rhoads) reports, "Founded in 2002, Luxembourg's Skype allows its subscribers to talk to one another over personal computers free. It also allows cut-rate voice calls from PCs to regular phones or cellphones. Skype, which employs about 200 people, has signed up 54 million users, mainly in Europe and Asia so far, making it one of the fastest-growing online communities." The Journal continues, "EBay officials said the acquisition gives the company a new way to reach millions of potential customers, to help customers make complicated transactions, and to open up ways to generate revenue from services such as classified advertisements. Chief Executive Meg Whitman said Skype will also help eBay penetrate developing markets such as India, Brazil, Russia and China that offer huge growth potential but typically have lower levels of trust in Internet-based commerce."

DOJ_NMG_0004217

The Financial Times (9/13, Waters, Taylor) reports, "The auction company's executives said that adding a voice calling feature to its existing online network would let it charge fees to merchants for generating sales leads the internet's fastest-growing business, currently dominated by the two biggest search engine companies. It could represent the most important in a series of recent initiatives by Ebay to extendinto new areas of online activity."

The New York Times (9/13, Belson) reports, "The total value of the deal may grow based on 'potential performance-based consideration' that could be worth an additional $1.5 billion, eBay said. Though Skype's revenue is expected to grow to about $200 million in 2006, from an estimated $60 million this year, eBay does not expect Skype - which gives its basic PC-to-PC service away free - to turn a profit until the fourth quarter next year." The Times adds, "The deal ends months of speculation about who might scoop up Skype, which since 2002 has been offering downloadable software that allows users to talk to one another over the Internet through their personal computers. The News Corporation, Google and Yahoo had been mentioned as potential suitors in recent months."

USA Today (9/13, Maney) reports, "EBay insists the deal isn't a major corporate turn. Top eBay executives became aware of Skype about a year ago, 'And we started putting some thinking against Skype,' says eBay CFO Rajiv Dutta. … Though other online services such as Google Talk offer free computer-to-computer voice conversations, Skype has caught fire globally. It's adding 150,000 users a day, the majority in countries such as China, India and Sweden. In 2005, Skype's first full year of charging for services, it will have revenue of $60 million. Skype expects revenue to jump to $200 million in 2006."

The Los Angeles Times/AP (9/13) reports, "Other big Internet names have expanded their VoIP capabilities lately, including Google Inc., which rolled out a new instant-messaging program with voice service. Last month Microsoft Corp. acquired Teleo Inc., a small startup whose software lets people make calls from computers to traditional telephones. … But some analysts have been skeptical about eBay's need to own a VoIP provider." The AP adds, "EBay buyers and sellers can communicate with each other via e-mail before a transaction is complete -- eBay says about 5 million such messages are exchanged daily. Adding Skype and its voice capabilities will speed the communication between parties and increase the level of trust, said Meg Whitman, eBay's chief executive."

DOJ, FTC To Hold Workshop On Real Estate Industry Competition. Inman News (9/13) reports, "Four days after launching a lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors for alleged anticompetitive practices, federal agencies are planning a public forum to discuss competition in the real estate industry." Inman continues, "The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission will jointly host a one-day workshop on competition policy and the real estate industry next month, the agencies said. … The workshop will be held on Oct. 25, at the FTC's Satellite Building Conference Center located at 601 New Jersey Ave. NW, in Washington, D.C." Inman adds, "The workshop is free and open to the public and aims to provide a forum on the competitiveness of the residential real estate industry, focusing on topics such as multiple listing services, discount and limited-service brokers, and minimum-service requirements. … In particular, discussion will center on the real estate transaction, the multiple listing service, and private and state actions that affect competition among brokers. … Parties seeking to participate as panelists in the workshop must notify both the Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the FTC in writing on or before Sept. 25. Persons submitting a request to participate as a panelist will be notified on or before Oct. 11, if they have been selected."

UK Regulators Launch Antitrust Probe Of Loan Insurers. Bloomberg News (9/13) reports, "Barclays Plc, Lloyds TSB Group Plc, HBOS Plc and Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc are among U.K. banks facing an antitrust probe after a consumer group said loan insurance in Britain is expensive and inappropriately sold." Bloomberg continues, "Citizens Advice, a nonprofit organization, asked Britain's Office of Fair Trading to investigate the 5 billion-pound ($9.1 billion) a year market after uncovering numerous problems, the London-based organization said in an e-mailed statement released today. The complaint triggered an automatic review by the antitrust regulator, which has 90 days to decide on a full investigation." Bloomberg adds, "The call for an investigation of loan insurers is the second this year, after a committee of lawmakers in February asked the Financial Services Authority, the main regulator of banks and insurers, for a probe, saying some consumers have purchased policies that they won't be able to use to make claims. … The report didn't name any companies involved in the sale of loan insurance, which is provided by all of Britain's biggest banks on credit card and other unsecured debt."

DOJ_NMG_0004218

Ford To Sell Hertz For $5.5 Billion. NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 9, :30, Williams) reported, "Ford said today it is selling its Hertz rental call business to a group of private equity firms for $5.5 billion. The infusion of cash is expected to help Ford's bottom line, which has been hurt lately by falling sales for SUVs and rising costs for healthcare."

The Financial Times (9/13, Politi) reports that a consortium of three private equity groups announced yesterday that they have purchased Hertz, the New Jersey-based car rental business for $15 billion. The paper notes the deal is the largest buy-out since 1989. The paper says, "The acquisition, by Clayton Dubilier & Rice, Carlyle, and the buy-out unit of Merrill Lynch, came after several weeks of negotiations with Ford, the carmaker that has owned all of Hertz since 2001 and is selling the unit as part of its revitalization plan. The three buyers will be paying $5.6 billion in cash to Ford, and have agreed to assume nearly $10 billion in debt under the agreement." The Times adds, "The buyers dismissed suggestions that the jump in petrol prices could make it an unattractive time to invest in car rentals, by saying that they were optimistic about the long-term trends in the travel industry. The acquisition is being financed with a combination of asset-backed securities linked to Hertz's fleet of rental cars, traditional corporate debt, and the equity contributions of the three buy-out groups. … There were no plans to extract cost savings through large-scale staff reductions, and the consortium would continue to support management's plans to diversify away from airport rentals."

The Washington Post (9/13, D3, Hilzenrath) says, "The deal will provide a $5.6 billion cash infusion to the automaker, whose bonds were downgraded in May to junk status. … Carlyle managing director Gregory S. Ledford said the investment firm sees growth potential in Hertz's overseas and heavy equipment rental businesses." He added the firm viewed Hertz as a "corporate orphan" -- a well-run company with a good brand and a good business that is not central to its corporate parent's business. Ledford said he didn't believe rising crude oil and gasoline prices would have a big impact on Hertz, "unless it really impacts people flying," because Hertz's business is largely driven by airport traffic.

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Sender, Johnson) reports, "The last days of the bidding war took place against the backdrop of a hurricane that led many economists to forecast lower growth for the car-rental industry. Hertz has annual revenue of more than $7 billion. But concerns about growth didn't deter bidders, giving Ford a bigger payday than auction participants anticipated. The losing group consisted of Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee & Partners." The Journal adds, "The new owners of Hertz may have a different vision for the company's future than current management. Hertz management, which analysts say had favored a public listing to a sale, had positioned the firm to demonstrate strong growth prospects and had lots of initiatives beyond its core airport car-rental business. By contrast, the buyout group may be under pressure to cut costs and raise cash by selling noncore operations, people familiar with the matter say."

Wachovia To Acquire Westcorp. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Bauerlein) reports, "Wachovia Corp. agreed to acquire Westcorp Inc. for about $3.91 billion in a deal aimed at boosting the Charlotte, NC, company's heft in the auto-finance business while giving Wachovia its first branches in California. In addition to making Wachovia the ninth-largest auto lender in the US, the takeover quiets speculation at least for the moment that the bank is about to make an even larger acquisition of a commercial bank or consumer-finance company. The purchase price represents only about 5% of Wachovia's stock-market value, which analysts said seemed reasonable given Westcorp's size and reputation for being well-run."

The New York Times (9/13, Creswell) reports, "Moving to expand its presence in automobile financing, the Wachovia Corporation, the nation's fourth-largest bank, agreed yesterday to acquire the financial-services holding company Westcorp and its majority-owned auto-finance group, WFS Financial, in a stock deal valued at $3.91 billion. The deal, which had been rumored for weeks…is the latest in a string of purchases by banks in the auto-finance industry after downgrades this spring in the debt ratings of the General Motors Corporation and the Ford Motor Corporation. The downgrades raised the costs of borrowing for the car makers' finance arms, which have typically offered low-interest loans that banks were hard pressed to match." The Times adds that in yesterday's deal, Wachovia said it was acquiring Westcorp and WFS for $3.42 billion in stock. Wachovia will pay $490 million in stock for the 16 percent of the publicly traded WFS that Westcorp does not own. The deal is expected to close in early 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0004219

The AP (9/13) reports, "Wachovia said its purchase of Westcorp will give it a small presence in the California retail banking market, while expanding its auto finance group into a national business. The firm will add about 8,500 automobile dealer clients, and about 920,000 individual customers."

Refiner Tupras Sold For $4.14 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Wang) reports, "A consortium led by Koc Holding AS of Turkey and including Royal Dutch Shell PLC fended off eight other bidders in a hotly contested privatization auction for control of Tupras, Turkey's 500,000-barrel-a-day refiner. The winning bid of $4.14 billion defied even the most optimistic expectations which, ahead of the auction, had reckoned with a final price tag closer to $3 billion." The paper adds, "The Koc-Shell group faced its strongest competition from a joint venture comprising state-owned Indian Oil Corp. and Turkey's Calik Enerji Sanayii, as well as OYAK, an industrial conglomerate representing a Turkish Army officers' pension fund. The winning consortium comprised two Shell units -- Shell Co. of Turkey Ltd. and Shell Overseas Investment BV -- together holding 10%; Koc, one of Turkey's biggest industrial conglomerates, with 80%; and two smaller Turkish energy companies, Aygaz AS with 7% and Opet Petrolculuk AS with the remaining 3%." The Journal notes, "The win by the Koc-Shell consortium represents a best-case scenario for the government as it keeps majority control of Tupras in Turkish hands. Shell's minor involvement lends it credibility."

Ichan Plans Time Warner Proxy Fight. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Angwin) reports, "A group led by New York financier Carl Icahn said it intends to mount a proxy contest to win seats on Time Warner Inc.'s board, in the latest step by the investor group to pressure the company to spin off its cable unit and buy back $20 billion in stock." The paper adds, "The group, made up of several hedge funds including one managed by Mr. Icahn, also said it thinks the 'true value' of Time Warner shares is between $26 and $28, about $10 a share above the stock's trading range over the past couple of years." The Journal notes that in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, "the group laid out its most detailed argument to date as to why Time Warner shares are trading at a discount to their 'inherent value' and what 'immediate actions' the company could take to reduce the discount." The paper continues, "The filing noted that the stock is down 6% since Chairman Richard Parsons took over in May 2002 and said 'management's slow pace of change' has hurt Time Warner stock. The group chastised Time Warner for not paying dividends or buying back stock as aggressively as other media companies. It argued that Time Warner has an "inefficient capital structure" and could afford to take on more debt if it spun off Time Warner Cable."

Buyouts Booming As Stock Market Surges. USA Today (9/13, Krantz) reports, "Following a multiyear downturn in the number of mergers and acquisitions, companies are again in the shopping mood. Oracle, eBay and Wachovia all announced deals Monday worth billions to buy other companies, signaling a pickup in the deal boom. Already this year, companies have announced $707 billion in mergers and acquisitions, says Richard Peterson, senior researcher at Thomson Financial. That's 30% more than the deals during the same period last year and the highest since the M&A heyday in 2000. It's also the fourth-strongest pace of M&A in history, Peterson says." Howard Silverblatt, market analyst for Standard & Poor's, said, "Companies were shy. Now they are definitely doing more."

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Halts Logging In Sequoia Forest. The AP (9/13, Kravets) reports, "A federal judge (in San Francisco) halted the Bush administration's bid to keep logging 2,000 acres in Giant Sequoia National Monument, saying he 'called into question' the scientific analysis used to justify cutting in a preserve that houses two-thirds of the world's largest trees." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Stephen Breyer, ruling in a lawsuit brought by environmentalists, also questioned whether fire control was the government's real motive for allowing commercial logging in the monument. The so-called 'Saddle Project' was approved years ago, but cutting only commenced this summer, when timber prices were high." The AP adds, "The government, Breyer wrote late Friday in issuing a preliminary injunction barring further logging, 'waited five years to execute this contract because of unfavorable timber prices.' … In 2000, just after the project was approved, Congress declared Sequoia National Forest a national monument, which generally prevented further logging on thousands of acres in the Central Valley area of Tulare County. The government argued the project was grandfathered in and therefore not covered by monument rules." The AP notes, "The Justice Department, which defended the logging plan in court here, declined to say whether it would challenge Breyer's injunction. If it does not, the case is over and the acreage is safe from harvesting. The government could also take the issue to trial."

DOJ_NMG_0004220

Senate To Vote On Challenge To EPA Mercury Emission Rules. The New York Times/AP (9/13) reports the Senate "agreed Monday to vote on a resolution challenging new rules limiting mercury emissions from power plants." The Bush Administration said "that the rules, completed by the Environmental Protection Agency in March, would eventually cut mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 70 percent without driving up energy costs and that repealing the rules would delay the reduction of such emissions." But environmental and health groups "have demanded swifter and tougher measures to reduce emissions." By "repealing the rules, the Senate would compel the E.P.A. to rewrite them. The revisions would be in line with Clean Air Act standards requiring the use of the best available technology to reduce mercury emissions." The Senate vote "on Tuesday is expected to be close, but the Republican-dominated House is unlikely to act on a resolution, which President Bush has said he opposes."

US Households Face Higher Winter Energy Bills. USA Today (9/13, Kirchhoff) reports US consumers "could still face higher energy bills ahead despite declines in energy prices Monday as gulf producers continued to rebound from Hurricane Katrina's pounding." The "average nationwide retail gasoline price Monday fell to $2.967 a gallon for regular unleaded from $3.018 the day before, according to AAA. Gasoline futures prices have dropped by about a third since the end of August." Crude oil prices "dropped to $63.34 a barrel, down 9% from the record close of $69.81 in late August. Natural gas futures were down more than 23 cents in New York trading, to $11.03 per million British thermal units, compared with a record $11.76 on Sept. 1." But energy experts "say consumers will feel the impact of Katrina for months. Natural gas prices will be a big challenge this winter."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 9, :25, Schieffer) reported, "The price of gasoline is slowly coming down. It hit a record high $3.07 a gallon after Hurricane Katrina hit. But an Energy Department survey out tonight says gas is down now to a national average $2.96 for self-serve regular."

Carter Decries Move To Drill In ANWR. In a Washington Post op-ed (9/13, A27), former President Jimmy Carter says that Congress is "about to make one of those big decisions that marks an era. Unless wiser heads prevail, it may do it badly -- making the wrong decision in the wrong way and about the wrong place. At stake is America's greatest wildlife sanctuary, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. To dissuade Congress from this environmental tragedy, Americans must rally, and quickly." We "cannot drill our way to energy security or lower gasoline prices as long as our nation sits on just 3 percent of world oil reserves yet accounts for 25 percent of all oil consumption. An obvious answer is to increase the fuel efficiency of motor vehicles, at least to the level we set more than a quarter-century ago. Instead, the administration recently proposed a tiny increase in gas mileage for SUVs, minivans and pickups."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

IG Finds FBI Violates Informant Rules. The AP (9/13, Sherman) reports, "FBI agents often violate bureau's rules for handling confidential informants that were revised after FBI abuses in the 1990s, the Justice Department's internal watchdog said Monday." The AP continues, "A review of 120 confidential informant files from FBI offices around the country found violations in 104 cases, or 87 percent, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. His 301-page report, parts of which were blacked out, examined FBI compliance with rules that govern most criminal investigations." The AP adds, "The report said agents failed to assess informants' suitability or get permission for informants to engage in activity that otherwise would be illegal. Agents did not convey proper instructions or tell prosecutors when informants had committed crimes that were not authorized by their FBI handlers, Fine said. … FBI Director Robert Mueller, according to the report, said many agents find the required paperwork cumbersome. In a statement, the FBI said the violations were 'administrative' and that officials have begun simplifying procedures."

DOJ_NMG_0004221

The Boston Globe (9/13, Murphy) reports that "the FBI has continued to violate informant guidelines adopted several years ago amid public condemnation over its mishandling of notorious Boston gangsters James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi." US Rep. William Delahunt called the report "damning," and said that he and Rep. Daniel Lungren "will file a bill mandating that the FBI follow the guidelines and include sanctions for agents who do not."

The New York Times (9/13, Lichtblau) notes, "Part of the problem, F.B.I. officials acknowledged, was the bureau's continued difficulty in building a modern computer system to help oversee the informant program and ensure better compliance. 'Even before the inspector general's review, we realized that we had to do some re-engineering of our whole human source program,' Kevin R. Brock, an assistant F.B.I. director who oversees the program, said in an interview. … 'Agents are failing to do certain things not because of mal-intent but just the press of administrative requirements, and overlooking them,' he said."

The Washington Times (9/13, Seper) adds, "Noting that confidential informants are critical to the bureau's ability to carry out its 'counterterrorism, national security and criminal law-enforcement missions,' the FBI said it began a project several months ago to review and revise its confidential-informant program." Cogswell "said the review seeks to develop policies and processes to simplify and standardize administrative procedures and to clarify and improve compliance requirements." USA Today (9/13, A8) also reports on Fine's review, running a truncated version of the AP story.

Report Also Urges Tighter Rules On Terrorism Surveillance. The New York Times (9/13, Lichtblau) also reports that the review "looked at the effect of a number of changes ordered by Mr. Ashcroft in his 2002 revamping of the bureau's investigative guidelines," which "allowed F.B.I. agents to visit public sites and events, attend mosques and other religious institutions, or peruse the Internet in search of leads in terrorism cases. The changes relaxed restrictions put in place in the 1970's as a result of F.B.I. abuses in the monitoring of political dissidents, and they have drawn criticism from civil rights advocates and Muslim leaders who say they open the door to investigative abuses." Director Mueller "told the inspector general's office that because agents were not required to get supervisors' approval before visiting public sites, it was 'difficult to determine to what extent these authorities have been used,' the inspector general's office said. It called on the F.B.I. to consider requiring approval from supervisors and more documentation of public visits to guard against possible abuses."

FBI Releases Additional 800 Pages Of Thurmond Files. The State (9/13) reports, "More than 800 pages of the late Strom Thurmond's FBI file were released Monday at the request of several news organizations, including The State. The first 600 came out in March. … The 800 pages just released deal mainly with threats made against Thurmond throughout his public life. According to the FBI, about 900 more pages are yet to be released. As is typical with the FBI and Monday's release, it might take several more months before these additional pages are made available to the public."

Files Reveal FBI Investigated At Least 31 Death Threats Against Thurmond. The State (9/13, Bandy, Burris, Monk, Stensland, Washington) reports, "For a half century, Strom Thurmond was a Southern icon and a national figure. His longevity…exposed him to at least 31 threats that the FBI investigated. The threats ranged from the serious…to the ravings of a 'chronic letter writer with apparent mental problems,' the FBI reported" in recently-released Thurmond files. The State goes on to detail several of the more significant plots against Thurmond investigated by the FBI.

The State (9/13, Markoe) adds that Thurmond "made plenty of political enemies over his long and controversial career — including the kind the FBI feared might try to kill him. … The documents are windows into some of the more unpleasant aspects of political fame and include copies of threatening telegrams, results of handwriting tests and summaries of interviews with suspects. … The documents do not indicate that any of the threats resulted in prosecutions."

GAO Finds Continuing Shortcomings With FBI IT Modernization. Government Executive (9/13, Pulliam) reports, "Despite past warnings from congressional auditors, the FBI does not have an effective framework for modernizing its information technology systems, according to a new report" by the GAO. GAO also "found that the bureau's heavy reliance on private contractors to develop the IT framework was hampered because the FBI does not use performance-based contracting techniques and has failed to effectively oversee the contractors' work." GE adds, "GAO recommended that the FBI's chief information officer and chief financial officer implement performance-based contracting wherever possible, along with stronger tracking and oversight practices." CIO Zalmai Azmi "wrote that the bureau has been successful in using fixed-price contracting, rather than the performance-based contracting, because the approach gives contractors an incentive to stay on schedule. But, he said, the FBI would take steps to encourage performance-based contracting."

DOJ_NMG_0004222

Three Plead Guilty To Roles In Louisiana Cocaine Ring. The AP (9/12) reports that three Lafayette, Louisiana, men "pleaded guilty Monday to being members of a cocaine distribution ring that operated over 16 years." Nathan Campbell and Aubrey Howard "pleaded guilty to conspiracy to possess and distribute cocaine," while Tevin Bennett "pleaded guilty to possession of cocaine with intent to sell, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Monday. A sentencing date has not been set."

Fighting Between Bolivian Government, Coca Farmers Could Resume. Knight Ridder (9/12, Chang) reports that the "uneasy peace" between Bolivian coca farmers and the government could be nearing an end. A "one-year truce signed by growers and the administration of since-ousted President Carlos Mesa that allows limited cultivation of coca" will expire on October 1, and Bolivians are "scheduled to elect a new president in December. … 'If the government doesn't respect our right to determine our own livelihood, we will organize and we will fight,' said Gabina Contreras, a 54-year-old mother of 11 from the growers' collective Sindicato Esteban Arce, named for a Bolivian independence hero. 'Coca is like father and mother to us. We can't live without coca.'" The US State Department says Bolivia is the world's third-largest producer of cocaine.

"Guru Of Ganja" Appeals To Ninth Circuit Court Today. The Alameda (CA) Times-Star (9/13, Richman) reports, "More than two years after being convicted and sentenced for growing marijuana, Oakland's self-styled 'Guru of Ganja' will make his appeal Tuesday for why even a slap on the wrist was too much. Ed Rosenthal, a renowned pro-marijuana author, activist and cultivation authority, claims he never should have been convicted of three marijuana-growing felonies. The government claims he not only deserved conviction, but he also deserved at least two to five years in prison instead of his one-day, time-already-served sentence. Three judges of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will decide sometime in the few months after Tuesday's arguments. Rosenthal -- famed for his books and for the 'Ask Ed' column he wrote for 'High Times' magazine -- became a medical-marijuana cause celebre after his February 2002 arrest. Drug Enforcement Administration agents raided sites including his Oakland home office; an Oakland warehouse where he'd been growing marijuana; San Francisco's Harm Reduction Center medical marijuana club, which he'd supplied; and the HRC's founder's Petaluma home. After a five-day trial, a federal jury convicted Rosenthal on Jan. 31, 2003, of three marijuana-growing felonies. Upon learning afterward of the state and city protections Rosenthal had not been allowed to raise as a defense, several jurors renounced their verdict and rallied to his cause. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced Rosenthal on June 4, 2003, to one day in prison."

UN Report Says Opium Prices Down Since Taliban's Fall In Afghanistan. The AP (9/12, Gedda) reports, "Favorable opium harvests in Afghanistan have led to a sharp drop in prices since the U.S. military forced the Taliban regime from power in 2001, according to a United Nations report. The Taliban imposed a ban on opium cultivation in 2000, triggering an eight-fold price increase to $675 per kilogram in late 2001, the U.N. report said. Since then good harvests coupled with improved yields dropped the price to $151 as of this past July, the study said. The report was outlined at a new conference by the U.N.'s anti-drug chief, Antonio Maria Costa. It will be presented to the House Committee on International Relations on Tuesday." Costa also noted that "Afghanistan accounts for 87 percent of world opium production, down 3 percent from last year," and that the "opium economy is netting traffickers $2.14 billion in 2005, about 41 percent of Afghanistan's gross national product, a 7 percent decline from last year. The death toll from Afghan opiate overdoses, mostly by Europeans, is estimated at 10,000 annually. About 100,000 others died from sickness related to heroin use."

DOJ_NMG_0004223

Chicago Tribune Urges Realistic Action In Meth Battle. The Chicago Tribune (9/13) editorializes, "The summer began with a controversy over a new government anti-marijuana campaign that re-ignited a long-smoldering debate about the dangers of pot. It ended with a dust-up over methamphetamine, a potent and addictive drug also known as meth or crystal meth. … A Newsweek cover breathlessly called meth 'America's Most Dangerous Drug' and warned of an 'epidemic' that will soon be spreading to Your Town, if it's not already there. Meth is being called a 'plague' by some drug officials and likened to a forest fire sweeping the country. A recent survey of 500 sheriffs' departments in 45 states labeled meth the No. 1 scourge. Some in Congress are accusing the White House of largely ignoring meth to focus on battling marijuana." The Tribune continues, "All of that has prompted some critics to cry 'hype,' suspecting that the meth epidemic is a transparent ploy by law enforcement to drum up more federal money. … A dose of skepticism is warranted here. … 'Epidemic' implies that meth has swamped the country. That is not true. If you're a Drug Enforcement Administration agent in San Diego or Phoenix, the term is apt. But it's not if you're in Chicago. Cocaine and heroin are much bigger problems here, a DEA agent said. That's also true of many Northeastern cities, where meth remains a minor player. … But meth, sometimes called 'poor man's cocaine,' is popular and spreading." The Tribune concludes, "Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales recently declared that meth had overtaken marijuana as the most dangerous drug in America. That's certainly true in many places in this country. And where it isn't, it could be tomorrow. The focus now should be in making sure that meth doesn't become a full-fledged 'epidemic.'"

"DC Arsonist" Gets Life Plus 136 Years. The Baltimore Sun (9/13, Dolan) reports, "Thomas A. Sweatt, 50, the once-elusive 'firebug' responsible for setting more than 45 fires in Maryland, Virginia and Washington that killed two people" was sentenced yesterday in federal court "to serve the rest of his life in prison." The paper notes a law enforcement task force that "secretly labored for years from a warren of empty laboratories at the Beltsville Agricultural Research Center, chasing more than a thousand dead-end leads" finally cracked the case. The Sun adds, "In the end, it was a combination of sheer doggedness, a serendipitous meeting with military officials about DNA evidence from a pair of Marine dress-blues left behind at a fire scene, and an unusually cooperative suspect that cracked the case. "It's a relief," said Scott Fulkerson, a special agent from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco Firearms and Explosives' Baltimore field office who was co-leader of the task force that operated for nearly two years. The paper said Sweatt was convicted of setting fires in the District of Columbia, Maryland and Virginia.

The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Castaneda, Wilber) reports, "Serial arsonist Thomas A. Sweatt offered an apology yesterday as he was sentenced to a life prison term for carrying out a deadly string of fires, but he provided no clue in court about why he spent nearly three years igniting homes where people were sleeping. It was the first time that Sweatt spoke publicly of the pain he caused by setting 45 houses and apartments on fire throughout the Washington region -- blazes that killed two elderly women and caused millions of dollars in damage. His words rang hollow, according to family members who said they want a motive and explanation." The paper adds, "During a news conference, Maryland US Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein praised the Serial Arson Task Force, which included members of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and local police and fire department investigators from Maryland, the District and Virginia. He also cited the work of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which helped connect DNA from a single strand of hair left at a September 2003 fire scene to Sweatt." Rosenstein said that if the task force had not arrested Sweatt, "I have no doubt Mr. Sweatt would have set fire to more houses, and more people would have died."

The Washington Times/AP (9/13, Greenfield) reports, "Sweatt, 50, admitted setting 45 arson fires in the Washington area. Investigators know how he did it -- using jugs of gasoline, and clothing for a wick. But the reason why remained unanswered even as a federal judge sentenced him yesterday to life in prison plus 136 years. … The former fast-food restaurant manager admitted that between February 2003 and December 2004 he set 45 fires: 21 in the District, 17 in Prince George's County, three in Fairfax County, two in Montgomery County, and one each in Arlington County and Alexandria. Under a plea deal, local prosecutors agreed not to charge Sweatt with other arsons. Sweatt also pleaded guilty to two murder charges."

The New York Times (9/13, Gately) reports, "Federal Judge Deborah K. Chasanow sentenced Mr. Sweatt to life plus nearly 136 years, eliminating any chance of parole. Judge Chasanow said she would recommend to prison officials that Mr. Sweatt receive a psychiatric evaluation and, if necessary, treatment. But, she added, mental illness could not excuse killing two people and setting fire to more than 45 homes, as well as several automobiles." The Times adds, "Mr. Sweatt's arrest in April resulted from an intensive investigation by federal agencies and local law enforcement in Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia. Investigators broke the case when they found a pair of Marine Corps blue trousers near a fire scene. The trousers led them to Navy investigators, who had identified Mr. Sweatt as a suspect in car fires more than two years earlier near the Marine barracks in Southeast Washington. Mr. Sweatt consented to giving a DNA sample, which linked him to evidence from four of the fires, the authorities said, and he admitted to setting others next to entrances to homes using cloth wicks and one-gallon jugs of gasoline.

DOJ_NMG_0004224

TAX:

Panel Concludes Treasury Tax Analysis Of Kerry Plan Was Lawful. The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones Newswires (9/13, A4) reports, "An independent investigation concluded that the Treasury Department didn't break the law by calculating the cost of then-Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry's tax plan and posting the results on the department's Web site. 'We do not believe that Treasury employees completed the revenue estimate at issue for use by a campaign or a party, but as a defense of the [Bush] administration's policies,' according to a March 24 letter to the Treasury from Special Counsel Scott Bloch. The analysis was made with an eye toward congressional action, not to criticize Mr. Kerry, the special counsel's office said. The Hatch Act restricts political activities by government employees."

Professor Says Estate Tax Repeal Won't Doom Giving To Charity. Arthur C. Brooks, associate professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/13), "Americans bequeath $20 billion every year to nonprofits, including organizations that provide relief to disaster victims." Opponents of estate tax repeal say "that doing so removes a powerful philanthropic motive, because the portion of an estate willed to charity is tax-exempt. … When all is said and done, the Senate will most likely repeal or greatly reduce the estate tax without too much consideration of the interests of the nonprofit sector. This does not spell doom for charities, however. The key is not to focus on how the tax system can be used to get more money from the dead, but rather to look to the future and find ways to increase giving -- for humanitarian relief and other worthy causes -- among a new generation of heirs."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Gives Opening Statement As Hearing Get Underway. Supreme Court nominee John Roberts appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday. With Democrats suggesting they would challenge his stands on civil rights and abortion, Roberts used his brief remarks to make the case for judicial restraint and pledge "humility" if confirmed. The consensus from the media coverage continues to be that Roberts is likely to win Senate confirmation.

Roberts' performance yesterday is receiving largely positive reviews, though many reports note a better test of how he stands under questioning will come today, when Democratic senators will begin pressing him for his views. As for yesterday, USA Today (9/13, Kiely, Biskupic) sums up the media's view when it calls Roberts "unflappable and succinct," with the Los Angeles Times (9/13, Savage, Gerstenzang) saying the nominee's statement "showed the qualities that made him a superb advocate before the Supreme Court." The Washington Post (9/13, C1, Davis), meanwhile, says that when listening to the senators, "Roberts was as still as he was silent, his face a wall. His lips were a tight line, except on the few occasions when he laughed at a joke -- mainly the recurring one about his relative youth and appearance of good health."

While the hearing received coverage on the network news and today's major newspapers, the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Babington, Becker) notes it "seemed almost anticlimactic, with public attention riveted on the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina." Moreover, "With few doubting that Roberts, 50, will ultimately win confirmation, senators of both parties used yesterday's forum to highlight their contrasting legal philosophies and views of the court's role in society."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 6, 2:15, P. Williams) reported Roberts "gamely listened for three hours to Judiciary Committee members, then spoke just six minutes, saying a Supreme Court justice should not make the law but must serve as an umpire." Committee Democrats "said they want to know if Roberts is committed to protecting civil rights, especially after Hurricane Katrina reminded us many Americans have yet to share in the nation's prosperity." Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) Massachusetts: "As one nation under God, we cannot continue to ignore the injustice, the inequality, and the gross disparities that exist in our society." Pete Williams: "The committee's only woman said a key issue for here would be Roberts's views on the constitutionally of abortion." Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D) California: "It would be very difficult, and I said this to you privately and I said it publicly, for me to vote to confirm someone whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade." Pete Williams: "But committee Republicans said Roberts should not have to say how he would decide any question." Roberts's supporters "predict a strong party line vote of approval in the committee, 10 to 8. And unless the next two days bring a surprise, even Democrats say he'll be confirmed."

DOJ_NMG_0004225

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 4, 1:55, Borger) reported senators are "going to start asking questions tomorrow. I think they're going to be tough because there is some confusion about where Judge Roberts stands on issue number one for Democrats, that's the question of Roe versus Wade or abortion." Democrats have "also given some other hints. They're going to ask questions about civil rights and about the separation of powers. … I don't think he's going to be off the hook. These questions could be tough."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 6, 1:50, Vargas) excerpted Judge Roberts' opening statement: "Judges and justices are servants of the law. Not the other way around. Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules. They apply them. The role of an umpire and a judge is critical. They make sure everybody plays by the rules. But it is a limited role."

The Washington Times (9/13, Hurt) says "Roberts Jr. yesterday left little doubt why President Bush nominated him to be the next chief justice of the Supreme Court. … One conservative observer later remarked that Judge Roberts 'stole the show.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Greenhouse), in a story headlined "An Opening Performance Worthy Of An Experienced Lawyer," says "the White House team handling his nomination as chief justice had not seen the statement in advance, and Judge Roberts had not rehearsed it before the 'murder board' that helped prepare him for the confirmation process."

The Baltimore Sun (9/13, Shaw) says Roberts' remarks "echoed comments by Republican senators, who view Roberts as someone who will move the court to the right, in line with the wishes of their party's conservative base." But Roberts, "a White House lawyer under President Ronald Reagan, also spoke of his more recent work as an appellate attorney, representing clients against the government. He said that the rule of law enables a wronged citizen to prevail against the 'might' of the United States in court, 'a remarkable thing' that reflects that 'we are a government of laws and not of men.'"

The AP (9/13) notes "Republicans advised Roberts to follow the example set by recent nominees to the high court and avoid responding to probing questions on controversial topics."

The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Balz) says, "Judging from the opening statements, Democrats and Republicans approached the first day of the hearings with far different goals. Confident of the outcome of the Roberts confirmation battle, many Republicans came with a set of procedural talking points aimed at encouraging Roberts not to answer the Democrats' questions about his views on controversial issues before the court." That view "was summed up most succinctly by Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), whose advice to the nominee was: 'Don't take the bait.'" Democrats "came with the intention of talking about their values and their view of the courts as protectors of women's rights and civil rights, and of the importance of preserving an expansive view of the federal government's powers in the face of a series of Supreme Court decisions limiting that power."

Reuters (9/13) quotes Roberts saying, "I have no agenda, but I do have a commitment. … I will be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court. I will work to ensure that it upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans." Reuters adds, "While he is widely expected to win Senate confirmation, lawmakers told the 50-year-old Roberts to expect tough questions, beginning on Tuesday."

USA Today (9/13, Biskupic, Locy) reports Roberts also "played up his boyhood in Indiana, referring to the 'endless fields' on which he played and his belief in their 'endless possibilities.'" He also "vowed to protect the integrity and independence of the high court."

DOJ_NMG_0004226

The New York Times (9/13, Purdum, Toner) reports, "No one in either party promised to oppose or support Judge Roberts outright, though some came close, including Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, who said that on the basis of Judge Roberts's written record alone, 'I would have to vote no.'" Biden, "who is considering a presidential bid, added, 'This is your chance, judge, to explain what you meant by what you have said and what you have written.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Liptak) reports, "In opening statements…Democratic senators continued their calls for the release of documents from Judge Roberts's years as a senior lawyer in the first Bush administration." The documents, said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, "the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, could help illuminate the nominee's views in three areas: civil rights, privacy and access to justice. While the first two areas have garnered attention from interest groups and the news organizations, the third category -- access to justice -- has received relatively little scrutiny."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Cummings, Bravin) reports Sen. Charles Schumer "acknowledged the nominee's accomplishments," but, the senator said, "the public must be able to 'assess not only the sharpness of your mind, but also the fullness of your heart. They need to believe that an overachiever can identify with an underdog who has nothing but the Constitution on his side.'"

The Legal Times (9/13, Mauro, Goldman) reports, "Roberts, accompanied by his wife, two children, and numerous family members, smiled easily and spoke briefly about his mentor Rehnquist. Roberts said he had spoken to some of the nurses who treated Rehnquist, and he was glad to hear that Rehnquist was 'not a good patient. He chafed at the limitations they tried to impose.' Rehnquist died at 80 of thyroid cancer. 'I will miss him,' Roberts said." The Times notes, "If Monday was any indication of what is to come, Roberts will have a relatively easy path toward Senate confirmation. Senate Democrats, while warning they will have tough questions for him on Tuesday and Wednesday, praised Roberts' intellect and outward qualifications for the job. Even Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, said after the hearing Monday that Roberts had given a 'masterful performance -- and short.' She also said, 'He's like an actor in a show, and he's done a first-rate job.'"

More Commentary On Roberts Performance. Sandy Grady, a member of USA Today's board of contributors, writes this morning (9/13), "You might say Judge John Roberts is history's first made-for-TV nominee for the Supreme Court. With his smooth, bland face and careful haircut, he seems to burst fresh from a barbershop or makeup room." Roberts "seems created for his star role this week as network TV cameras focus on his grilling by the Senate Judiciary Committee." He is "a conservative with the demeanor of a friendly scoutmaster. Barring edgy surprises, he will likely cool the red-state-blue-state furor and be drafted to be the youngest chief justice since 1806."

John Tierney writes in his New York Times column (9/13), "He came, he charmed, he shut up. During the opening statements, the senators blathered away their time and more; Judge John Roberts used less than half of his to utter a few graceful generalities. He has made a career out of not saying the wrong thing. Why start now? … The only hope for Democrats is to try the tactics used by interrogation pros like Israeli airport screeners and US customs agents. These experts know that a smart criminal will have rehearsed a cover story for, say, what he was doing in London and why he's going to New York." But "if he's asked something unexpected…he has to change mental gears. He's apt to exhibit telltale signs of a liar under stress, like gazing upward and to his right as he answers." Tierney adds, "I'm not suggesting that Mr. Roberts is a liar, or that anything the Democrats ask today could stop him from being confirmed. But they might at least keep TV viewers awake by trying questions like these: If Roe v. Wade were a tree, what kind of tree would it be? Is there any chance that you could speed up Justice Stevens's retirement by addressing him as 'Gramps'?"

Roberts Rulings As Federal Judge Said To "Lean Right." In a story titled "Nominee's Rulings Lean Right," the Washington Post (9/13, A7, Lane) reports, "During his two years as a federal appeals court judge, John G. Roberts Jr. has compiled a voting record that places him to the right of the average member of the U.S. circuit courts, according to the first independent statistical study of his voting record." Roberts "was most conservative on issues involving civil rights and civil liberties, the study found. At the same time, President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States showed a liberal streak on economic regulation and labor issues; in those matters, he was significantly to the left of the average, according to the study."

Cases Involving Abortion, Assisted Suicide Laws Expected To Reach Court. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 6, 2:35, Andrews) reported on the controversial cases that the court is expected to hear this year. Once case concerns "a New Hampshire law requiring teenaged girls to tell their parents before getting an abortion. It's not parental permission, says state representative Barbara Hagan, just notification." It is "what many see as the biggest abortion case in five years. Why: Because there is no exception in the law to provide for the health of the mother. To abortion rights advocates, the women's health exception is a defining issue. To them, any justice who doesn't believe the women's health exception is a fundamental right probably doesn't believe in 'Roe v. Wade.'" Karen Pearl, Planned Parenthood Federation of America: "And with Judge Roberts joining the court, we need to know whether he will continue to say that women's health is that important that it cannot be violated." Andrews: "But abortion opponents call the health exception a sham, because in practice 'health' can mean almost anything." Judge Roberts "will also face a crucial states' rights case. Can terminally ill patients in Oregon, patients like Jack Neubold, kill themselves with a legal prescription?"

DOJ_NMG_0004227

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Cummings) says "earlier public statements suggest Judge Roberts, seen as an ally to social conservatives on abortion, could disappoint them on whether terminally ill patients may end their lives. When the Supreme Court last weighed in on the matter, in 1997, Judge Roberts discussed the cases in a television talk show." The high court "had just decided to protect prohibitions on assisted suicide in Washington and New York states. Judge Roberts, at the time a lawyer in private practice, defended the decision to maintain the restrictions -- invoking states' rights, not morality."

No Indication Seen That Roberts Was Involved In Iran-Contra. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Richey) reports, "As a member of the White House counsel's office in 1985 and early 1986, Roberts was in close proximity to what ultimately became the Reagan administration's Iran-contra scandal." As early as January 1985, "Roberts was asked to give a legal opinion about White House involvement in private fundraising to help the contra forces fighting Nicaragua's Sandinista government. He also wrote several memos in early 1986 concerning the private fundraising activities of individuals who were later prosecuted in the Iran-contra affair." But "Roberts's White House memos, made public at the National Archives, are unlikely to provide much grist for conspiracy theorists seeking to link the former Reagan staffer to the scandal." Instead, "Roberts's memos on contra-related issues reveal a cautious lawyer who consistently sounded alarm bells about appearances and who urged compliance with the letter and spirit of the law. His words convey no sign of a devious consigliere searching for ways to bend the law or conceal lawless activities." The Monitor adds, "More important, the memos suggest that Roberts and his colleagues in the White House counsel's office were outside the loop on the secret dealings of Lt. Col. Oliver North at the National Security Council."

Coburn Went From Crossword Puzzle To "Emotional Overdrive." The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Milbank) reports, "Yesterday's opening of the John Roberts confirmation hearings was a time for historic firsts." Schumer "made 49 first-person references in a 10-minute statement that was, ostensibly, not about himself. Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) showed exceptional emotional versatility, working a crossword puzzle during the hearing and then choking back a sob while making a prosaic statement about partisanship. … A television camera behind Coburn caught the senator working a crossword puzzle. But Coburn went from detachment to emotional overdrive when it was his turn to talk; seconds after asserting that 'a super-legislator body is not what the court was intended to be,' he paused and wept." It was "the biggest Senate choke-up since Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) cried while opposing the nomination of the ambassador to the United Nations -- and Coburn has to get through three more days of hearings."

Conservatives Happy With Specter So Far. Roll Call (9/13, Kane) reports, "After bitterly attempting to deny Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) the gavel, conservative activists are now beginning to praise the five-term moderate as an unexpected ally in several key battles this year." Specter, who "was nearly denied the chairmanship last November after an eruption on the right regarding comments he made about Roe v. Wade," has won "some grudging respect from conservatives in recent weeks. Those activists have been particularly pleased with his handling of the run-up to this week's confirmation hearing for Judge John Roberts, who is President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States."

Rehnquist Remarks On Nomination Politics Noted. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 7, 2:00, Vargas) reported on remarks the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist made to a group of high school students in 1990. Asked about the "politics that go into the nomination" process, Rehnquist said, "The president has traditionally tried to find a nominee who was sympathetic to the president's general approach to how…judicial philosophy. Now, I don't lots of presidents have terribly well-defined judicial philosophies. They have a lot other things on their mind, as well."

DOJ_NMG_0004228

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/13), Margaret Carlson writes, "I'm as excited as anyone about the prospect of 'Advise and Consent, the Sequel,' with a budget rivaling 'War of the Worlds' and advance hype just short of Tom Cruise jumping on a couch, declaring his love for Arlen Specter. … Eighteen years after 'Borking' became part of the language, the two main protagonists in that battle are still at it. Specter, the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, got in one more lick Sunday against the Supreme Court nominee he defeated back then, Robert Bork. 'If his "original intent" stood, we'd still be segregating the United States Senate with African Americans on one side and Caucasians on the other side,' Specter said on CNN. Bork said later in the same program: 'I know Specter, and the truth is not in him.'" Carlson continues, "Somehow Alberto Gonzales, one of the potential candidates to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, seems incapable of generating that level of venom. He may prove to be a stealth candidate with rock-hard positions we don't know about, but he comes across as milder than that. The right wing jokes that 'Gonzales' is Spanish for 'David Souter.' And the left dislikes him for condoning torture at Abu Ghraib. The bipartisan dismay has lent Gonzales an air of being just right." Carlson adds, "I'm not saying Bush is going to nominate Gonzales, the old friend he huffily told folks to lay off of as he flew to the G-8 summit in Scotland. He might even nominate a real hard-liner, lure the Democrats into eliminating him and then get whomever he wants to replace O'Connor and Chief Justice William Rehnquist when he retires. … What I am saying is that although Bush looks more and more messianic, he's got enough of his father's pragmatism in him to want to overturn Roe vs. Wade about as much as he wants to read the collected works of Shakespeare. … If Roe goes down, so does his majority, his legacy and present and future politicians bearing the name Bush. Traditional Republicans who voted for Bush for his pro-corporate, pro-tax-cut views will put aside their selfish concerns and flock to pro-choice candidates, who tend to be Democrats. He doesn't want to be remembered as the guy who knocked down the late Lee Atwater's Big Tent."

Bush Visits New Orleans, Says Relief Effort Did Not Discriminate Against Blacks. President Bush yesterday visited New Orleans for the third time to oversee hurricane recovery efforts. The network coverage of the Bush's trip was pointedly skeptical, with reporters implying that it was another effort to buoy the President's sagging job approval ratings. Bush was portrayed as irritated when questioned about the speed of the relief efforts. As ABC's Lisa Stark put it, he "bristled" when asked about the timeliness of the Federal response. The networks all noted it was Bush's first trip to downtown New Orleans, and CBS, which has had the most negative view of the city's progress, went so far as to say he "didn't find much good news." Bush also firmly denied that race played a role in the Federal Government's perceived lack of effort in the early stages of Katrina's aftermath.

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 2, 3:40, Schieffer) reported, "President Bush went back to New Orleans today, but he didn't find much good news. There was more trouble with one of the levees, and authorities confirmed a grim discovery, the bodies of 45 patients in a hospital that was thought to have been evacuated." CBS (Pitts) added, "Late this afternoon, a levy in northeast New Orleans broke, flooding some neighborhoods all over again. Hours earlier, President Bush was in town, managing his own political crisis. This marked the President's third trip to the city, his first actual on-the-ground survey of the devastation. But if he was hoping to reach out to the citizens of New Orleans, he was too late, since most of the victims are out of town, evacuated days ago. When asked if race played a role in his response, the President had a stern answer." President Bush: "My attitude is this: The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery effort."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 3, 2:35, Vargas) reported, "Two weeks after Katrina, a new ABC News poll finds that 63% of Americans still believe the Federal Government lacks a clear plan to deal with the devastation. President Bush was in Louisiana and Mississippi again today, trying to counter that perception." ABC (Stark) added, "The President on his third tour of the devastated area today, bristled at continued questions about the government's slow response." President Bush: "I know there's been a lot of second guessing. I can assure you that I'm not interested in that. What I'm interested in is solving problems. There will be time to take a step back and to take a sober look of what went right, what didn't go right." Stark: "The President got his first close-up look at the flooding in New Orleans. His previous visits had been fly-overs. Today, he stood out in the open, in a military motorcade. Later, flying to St. Bernard Parish, one of the hardest-hit, to meet privately with state and local leaders, before going to a damaged elementary school in Gulfport, Mississippi."

DOJ_NMG_0004229

NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) reported, "Abandoning the customary bulletproof motorcade, for a time today the President perched atop an open air military truck for a hands on look at the ruins of New Orleans he had not yet seen."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Chen) reports Bush said Monday that New Orleans "was 'on the way' to recovery and stated that there was now 'close coordination' among all levels of government." Bush also "alluded for the first time to the disproportionate number of African Americans stranded by the flooding in New Orleans, and he vowed to look into growing concerns among homeowners who lacked flood insurance coverage." Despite the "relief progress that he said he noted Monday — Bush cited a gas station 'up and running' in Gulfport, Miss. — the president warned: 'There's a lot of serious and hard work that's yet to be done.'" Asked "about the large numbers of blacks who were trapped in the Superdome and the convention center in New Orleans," Bush said, "My attitude is this: The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery."

The AP (9/13, Loven) reports Bush "denied that poor, black victims of Hurricane Katrina were ignored because of their race." Bush "replied testily to a reporter who asked whether he felt let down by federal officials in responding to the disaster." Bush "seized on the news of falling water levels throughout New Orleans and pronounced the city on the mend."

Reuters (9/13, Christie) reports Bush "rejected charges the government was slow to respond to Hurricane Katrina because most of the victims were black or because the nation's military was over-extended in Iraq." He also said "it was 'preposterous' to claim that the Iraq war had drained military resources, leaving too few troops to help out with the hurricane." Reuters adds that in a "new blast at the administration, civil rights leader Rev. Jesse Jackson said the government was now discriminating against local businesses by ensuring that big corporations with close ties to the establishment received all the major rebuilding contracts."

Bloomberg (9/13) reports Bush "promised to take 'a sober look' at how emergency agencies reacted after the storm" and that "every citizen of the affected areas will get aid." The President "made his remarks after touring the city's French Quarter and other neighborhoods in a caravan of military vehicles along with Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco."

Knight Ridder (9/13, Robbins, Dodd) reports President Bush "got his first close look Monday at flood-ravaged New Orleans, even as state health officials revealed another grim discovery: 45 people found dead at a hospital evacuated more than a week ago." The President "rebutted charges of a slow response by the federal government, but that didn't save the job of Michael Brown, the embattled Federal Emergency Management Agency chief. He resigned from his post on Monday."

The Washington Times (9/13, Curl) reports President Bush "yesterday rejected charges that the federal government's emergency response was slow because most of the victims were black." Mr. Bush "replied angrily to another reporter who asked whether he felt let down by federal officials' response to the disaster."

USA Today (9/12, 12A) editorializes, "With his poll numbers sagging, President Bush made his third trip to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast on Monday. Though the trip had many purposes, one certainly was to burnish an image tattered by his administration's bungling of relief operations after Hurricane Katrina struck."

Rice Defends Bush Record On Race. The New York Times (9/13, Weisman) reports, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that "the hurricane disaster that disproportionately struck poor blacks in New Orleans 'gives us an opportunity' to rectify historic injustices that she experienced as an African-American growing up in the South." Asked "what she told foreign leaders wondering about racial discrimination and poverty in the United States", Rice said, "You go to any other meeting around the world and show me the kind of diversity that you see in America's cabinet, in America's Foreign Service, in America's business community, in America's journalistic community." She added, "Show me that kind of diversity anyplace else in the world, and I'm prepared to be lectured about race." She also "rejected as 'poisonous' any suggestion that President Bush himself would discriminate racially against any victims of the hurricane and said that his record on education, including aid to historically black colleges and the setting of standards for schoolchildren, demonstrated that he believed passionately in racial equality."

In Katrina Aftermath, Polls Show Nation Divided By Race. The Washington Post (9/13, A8, Fletcher, Morin) reports, "Touring devastated portions of New Orleans yesterday, President Bush sought to reassure the public that the government is responding to Hurricane Katrina with equity and dispatch, even as his standing hit record lows amid broad support for an independent investigation of the federal response to the storm. A new Washington Post-ABC News poll found that clear majorities of Americans disapprove of the way officials at all levels of government are handling the recovery from Katrina. A 54 percent majority disapproved of Bush's response to Katrina, while an even larger majority -- 57 percent -- say state and local officials should bear responsibility for the problems." These attitudes "fracture along clear racial lines. Nearly three in four whites doubted the federal government would have responded more quickly to those trapped in New Orleans if they had been wealthier and white rather than poorer and black, the poll found. But an equal share of blacks disagreed, saying help would have come sooner if the victims had been more affluent whites." The poll also found that "76 percent of the public favors an investigation of federal storm response efforts by an independent commission similar to the one that probed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." The poll of 1,201 randomly selected adults was conducted September 8-11 and has a margin of error of +/-3 percent. The Post adds, "Bush aides privately view the latest poll numbers with gloomy realism but take heart from Bush's past ability to push the Republican Congress to follow his lead even when his popularity has flagged."

DOJ_NMG_0004230

USA Today (9/13, Page, Puente) reports, "There is a lot that Americans agree about in the wake of Hurricane Katrina: that government agencies initially stumbled but are doing better now, for one, and that more money and attention should be paid to addressing the issue of poverty. But a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday finds a stark racial divide on other issues, including attitudes toward the hurricane's victims, the performance of President Bush and the reasons the government's early response was so wanting. Six in 10 African-Americans say the fact that most hurricane victims were poor and black was one reason the federal government failed to come to the rescue more quickly. Whites reject that idea; nearly 9 in 10 say those weren't factors." And "the racial divide…could affect the debate over addressing poverty and rebuilding the Gulf Coast in the hurricane's wake." The survey also found that "African-Americans by 74%-16% have an unfavorable opinion of the GOP. By more than 3-to-1, they say Bush doesn't care about black people. By more than 2-to-1, whites say he does." The poll of 1,005 adults has a margin of error of +/-3 percent. Also the president's job-approval rating "is 46%, essentially the same as the 45% rating in the Gallup Poll 10 days earlier." USA Today continues, "the nation that champions equal rights around the globe has not resolved its own racial tensions." In all, "one in four of those surveyed blame the mayor of New Orleans; another one in four blame the residents themselves. One in five blame the Bush administration. But blacks are much more likely than whites to hold the federal government responsible. Whites are much more likely to hold the residents responsible."

Bush Job Approval Falls To 42% In ABC News/Washington Post Poll. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 5, :35, Vargas) reported, "Our latest ABC News/Washington Post poll finds that dissatisfaction, however, with the government's response to the hurricane is growing and hurting President Bush's overall approval rating. It now stands at just 42%, the lowest it's ever been. And one more finding that gets at the division in the country after the hurricane, an overwhelming number of African-Americans, more than 70%, say that the government would have responded more quickly to the disaster in New Orleans if more of the victims had been wealthy and white, rather than poor and black. Only 20% of whites agree with that."

Columnist Addresses Plight Of Blacks In New Orleans. In a USA Today (9/12) column, DeWayne Wickham writes, "It wasn't long after the tortured images of thousands of black men, women and children holed up in the Louisiana Superdome and Morial Convention Center started appearing on TV newscasts that talk of an old conundrum surfaced. Was it the color of their skin or their place in society that made the suffering among that city's blacks so great? The race or class question pits those who believe that racism is the root cause of much that ails blacks against those who say it is their economic and social condition that is the problem." Wickham concludes that while both race and class contributed to the initial suffering, the race of the victims played a part in delaying the response of the government.

Recent Discontent Said To End "Bush Era." In a Washington Post (9/13, A27) op-ed, E.J. Dionne, Jr., writes, "The Bush Era is over. The sooner politicians in both parties realize that, the better for them -- and the country. Recent months, and especially the past two weeks, have brought home to a steadily growing majority of Americans the truth that President Bush's government doesn't work. His policies are failing, his approach to leadership is detached and self-indulgent, his way of politics has produced a divided, angry and dysfunctional public square. We dare not go on like this." Dionne concludes that Bush's most helpful course "lies in recognizing that the Bush Era, as he and we have known it, really is gone. He can decide to help us in the transition to what comes next. Or he can cling stubbornly to his past and thereby doom himself to frustrating irrelevance."

DOJ_NMG_0004231

Obama's Comments On Hurricane Response Criticized. George Will writes in the Washington Post (9/13, A27) that Sen. Mary Landrieu's speech on the Senate floor moved some senators to tears. But you "can no more embarrass a senator than you can a sofa, so the tears were not accompanied by blushing about having just passed a transportation bill whose 6,371 pork projects cost $24 billion, about 10 times more than the price of the levee New Orleans needed. Louisiana's congressional delegation larded the bill with $540,580,200 worth of earmarks, one-fifth the price of a capable levee." Will notes Sen. Barack Obama's "lament about the president's inadequate 'empathy' and an amazing criticism of the government's 'historic indifference' and its 'passive indifference' that 'is as bad as active malice.'" Obama "is just 30 months older than the 'war on poverty' that President Johnson declared in January 1964. Since then the indifference that is as bad as active malice has been expressed in more than $6.6 trillion of anti-poverty spending, strictly defined." Obama might "care to note three not-at-all recondite rules for avoiding poverty: Graduate from high school, don't have a baby until you are married, don't marry while you are a teenager. Among people who obey those rules, poverty is minimal."

Embattled FEMA Director Brown Resigns.

Days after being relieved of his duties in the hurricane zone, embattled Federal Emergency Management Director Michael Brown resigned his post. The White House named David Paulison, currently director of emergency preparedness division at FEMA, as acting director. While Paulison is receiving cautious praise, most analysts agree that Administration critics are unlikely to soften their censure of the relief effort. However, as CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Malveaux) said last night, Brown's resignation "clears the way for the administration to move forward on two fronts: recovery and rebuilding public perception." Another major theme in several TV and print reports, such as the one in CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Malveaux), was that Brown's departure "is really a rarity for the White House," which "puts a premium on loyalty. But it was clear from the early days there was a serious problem here."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 3, 2:35, L. Stark) reported Brown's resignation was "probably not a big surprise." Brown said he "resigned because he had become a distraction." The "embattled FEMA director" also "defended his agency's handling of Hurricane Katrina. And said the country needs a legitimate debate about FEMA's role." Brown was shown saying, "We're not a first responder agency. We're there to coordinate and help people prepare and coordinate in times of disaster. If the country wants us to be more, we should have a great public policy debate whether that's true or not."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:00, Stewart) reported, "Rarely has a White House favorite fallen so far, so fast. A little more than a week ago, FEMA Director Mike Brown was lavished with praise for his job on Hurricane Katrina. The President even called him by nickname." But a "week later, Brown had been replaced. The President was facing an avalanche of personal criticism he had responded too slowly to the crisis, and today, Brown took a political bullet for the White House with a terse resignation announcement."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Malveaux) reported, "Senior administration officials setting up a timeline for us, saying it was Wednesday, just two days after the hurricane hit, when Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff told the president at the White House in a morning meeting that he was essentially going to move him to a desk job, that he would be out of the field. They were not happy with his performance then." Thursday, "Chertoff traveling with Vice President Cheney in the damaged regions. Cheney saying he heard an earful from Republicans, as well as Democrats, who were unhappy with the FEMA effort, and then it followed with Friday, of course, Chief of Staff Andy Card got word that the choice to replace him, at least on the ground, would be Thad Allen. Even on that day, the president was not willing to disparage Mike Brown in any way, in fact saying, 'Brownie, you are doing a heck of a job.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Gerstenzang, Chen) reports Brown "often" presented "an upbeat assessment of the region's recovery, even as television pictures, playing on a split screen, showed the scope of the floods in New Orleans, scenes of devastation, and the bodies of victims left unattended." The Times adds, "Political analysts said Brown's departure should surprise no one, considering that he was dismissed Friday as the Bush administration's point man on the Katrina relief effort and sent back to Washington, ostensibly to oversee FEMA's preparedness for other hurricanes."

DOJ_NMG_0004232

Reporter David Shuster spoke about Brown on MSNBC's Hardball (9/9), "The people here [in New Orleans] cannot forget the images on that fourth day when people were at the convention center. 15,000 people who had gone four days without food and water and that night on television, Michael Brown didn't know anything about it. That is the reason why people here in New Orleans over the last week have said that Michael Brown deserves to be sacked and why people will be glad that he has."

Knight Ridder (9/13, Dodd) reports, "Brown told his senior staff that he was resigning at about 3 p.m. Monday, according to FEMA press secretary Sharon Worthy, who was among those informed by Brown. She said the group of about 12 people took his resignation 'professionally.'"

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/13, McFeatters) reports, "At the White House there was a sense that with Brown gone, President Bush could get his presidency back on track and repair the public relations damage done when millions of people in American and around the world began criticizing the administration for how the aftermath of Katrina was handled." Brown "was deeply humiliated last Friday when Chertoff publicly relieved him of command of the disaster relief operations." The Wall Street Journal (9/13) adds "that move was widely seen as a precursor to Mr. Brown's eventual departure especially given that some members of Congress said that a reassignment wasn't enough." Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and three other senators "said in a letter to President Bush on Friday that Mr. Brown's 'continued presence in this critical position endangers the success of the ongoing recovery efforts.'"

The Financial Times (9/13, Daniel) also says Brown's decision "follows an embarrassing public dressing down on Friday, when he was relieved of command of events as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (Fema) and sent back to Washington." His departure "represents a rare resignation by an official of the Bush administration, which does not like admitting mistakes." It "comes a week after President George W. Bush praised his handling of the crisis, saying: 'Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job.'"

Bush Says He Didn't Know About Brown Resignation. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:00, Stewart) reported, "In New Orleans on his third visit to the disaster site, President Bush claimed not to know anything of the resignation, and bristled when asked if he felt Brown and FEMA had let him down." President Bush: "Look, there will be plenty of time to play the blame game. That's what you're trying to do. You're trying to say somebody is at fault."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) reported, "In Mississippi, the President distanced himself from the biggest political casualty of the Katrina disaster, FEMA Director Michael Brown, who submitted his resignation today." President Bush: "I have not talked to Michael Brown or Mike Chertoff, that's who I'd talk to. As you know, I've been working." O'Donnell: "Only ten days ago, Mr. Bush stood shoulder-to-shoulder with Brown."

Later in its broadcast, NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) said the President "tried to direct attention away from Brown and back on survivors' needs." President Bush: "There's time to, you know, try to blame somebody, but they want to get their lives back together."

The Baltimore Sun/AP (9/13, Superville) reports, "The president was told of Brown's resignation earlier today and spoke to Homeland Security Secretary Mike Chertoff, who was Brown's boss, from Air Force One in the afternoon as he flew back to Washington from an overnight visit to the region." White House spokesman Scott McClellan "said the White House did not seek Brown's resignation. 'This was Mike Brown's decision and we respect his decision,' McClellan said." USA Today (9/13, Hall) adds McClellan "praised Brown's work but did not mention Katrina. 'The president appreciates Mike Brown's service,' he said. 'Mike has done a lot of great work on a number of hurricanes.'"

Paulison, A Democrat, Named Acting FEMA Director. Bush's appointment of David Paulison as acting FEMA director received cautious praise from the media. The main theme is Paulison's coverage was his past experience in emergency response, with some print outlets noting he is a registered Democrat. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 3, 2:35, L. Stark) said that "unlike Michael Brown, Mr. Paulison has a background in emergency management." Reuters (9/13) reports Bush made the selection "on an apparent nod to demands that Brown be replaced by someone with experience in emergency response," adding Paulison is "a veteran firefighter who now runs FEMA's preparedness division."

CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/12, Zahn) noted that Paulison "was the guy behind the government's suggestion that everyone buy plastic sheeting and duct tape in case of a terrorist attack." USA Today (9/13, Eisler, Hall) adds "the advice became a staple of late-night comics, who usually misattributed the comment to Tom Ridge, then secretary of Homeland Security." The Bush administration "hasn't put Paulison in front of reporters much since then. Now, he steps into a lead role directing federal response to one of the nation's worst natural disasters." In a statement, Chertoff said, "I appreciate his willingness to take on the vital task of leading FEMA during this challenging time." Paulison, "a Democrat, was flying back from the Gulf Coast on Monday and was unavailable for comment on his new appointment."

DOJ_NMG_0004233

The New York Times (9/13, Kornblut) also says that "at least on one political score, he departs from the typical Bush administration faithful: As of four years ago, he was a registered Democrat, according to an article in The Miami Herald at the time." That "creates at least the perception that he is independent of the administration's political machine -- unlike Mr. Brown, who got his job on the recommendation of a former senior campaign adviser to Mr. Bush, Joe M. Allbaugh, an old friend from college."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/13, McFeatters) reports Paulison "is head of the US Fire Administration and leads FEMA's emergency preparedness force. He has more than 30 years' experience working in fire prevention and containment. The former fire chief in Miami, Paulison dealt with the aftermath of Hurricane Andrew in 1992." Paulison "will be the acting director of FEMA -- if he is nominated to the directorship he must be confirmed by the Senate."

The AP (9/13, Fournier) reports, "As chief of the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department, Paulison led 1,900 personnel under a $200 million operating budget. He was also in charge of Dade County's emergency management office, according to his biography." Fox News' Special Report (9/12) also said Paulison's "official bio says he has fire and rescue experience."

The Washington Post (9/13, A12, Hsu, Lee) profiles Paulison in s story titled "Paulison Is Skilled At Disasters." International Association of Fire Fighters General President Harold A. Schaitberger, "whose organization Paulison formerly headed, said Paulison 'not only has the administrative experience and skills that you need at the bureaucratic level, he really understands what the troops need on the front line.'"

Brown Says He Made Decision After Sunday Talk With Card. The New York Times (9/13, Stevenson) reports, "In an interview Monday night, Mr. Brown said that he felt that his role had become an obstacle to the agency's work. 'The press was too focused on what did we do, what didn't we do, the whole blame game,' he said. 'I wanted to take that factor out of the equation, so that the people at FEMA, who are some of the most hard-working, dedicated civil servants I have ever met, could just go do their job.'" Brown "said he had felt no pressure to resign. He said he made his decision on Sunday with his family after a long conversation on Saturday night with Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff. 'Andy was very, very supportive of me,' Mr. Brown said."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Meserve) reported, "I'm told there was a phone conversation on Saturday between Michael Brown and Andy Card, the White House chief of staff. And that Brown came to the conclusion that he should leave. I'm told by a FEMA spokeswoman he was not under any pressure to do so. In his letter to the president this morning, I'm told he said that it was important to leave now to avoid further distraction from the ongoing mission of FEMA and that it has been an honor to serve the president, work with the people of FEMA and help Americans in their darkest hour."

Democrats Say Brown's Departure Long Overdue. The Washington Times (9/13, Hudson) reports, "Some Democrats said Mr. Brown was right to resign, but others continued to criticize Mr. Bush for not firing the director. 'Michael Brown's departure from FEMA is long overdue, and his resignation is the right thing for the country and for the people of the Gulf Coast states,' said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Gerstenzang, Chen) reports Sen. John F. Kerry "issued a six-word statement: 'Long overdue. Too little, too late.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Henry) reported that "the Republican Party believes this is good politically because it's going to take this issue off the table -- getting Mike Brown out of the way. But I think that may be wishful thinking because the Democrats are pouncing here. Democrats are basically saying, they are emboldened. They have been calling for Mike Brown's head for over a week now. They've gotten it. So they want much more. Just a few moments ago, Senator Hillary Clinton said that they basically need an independent commission. She reiterated her call for just that."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) reported "some say Brown's exit won't take the heat off the President." Stuart Rothenberg, political analyst: "I think FEMA was such a problem and Brown himself was seen as epitomizing that problem that getting him away really won't help the President fundamentally."

DOJ_NMG_0004234

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Cooper) also reported that "criticism over the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina likely won't end with Michael Brown's resignation. Blame is being pointed in every direction, not just towards the feds, but also local and state representatives. Other figures might be brought down because of the disaster."

Vitter Says Bureaucratic Model For FEMA Should Be Discarded. Sen. David Vitter was asked on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees if the position of FEMA director should be a "patronage job." Vitter said, "I think we need to look broader than that and look at the model for the bureaucracy of FEMA, because in my opinion this wasn't a failure of one person, although it was that also. It was a failure of the whole bureaucracy, and the solution to that isn't getting a new head bureaucrat or a new type of head bureaucrat. So I think we need to ask some truly fundamental questions about why that didn't work, and also what worked. The military response, which largely worked; the private industry, local citizen response, private initiative, which worked. We need to ask probing questions about that, to figure out a new model, because I think the whole bureaucratic FEMA model is what has to be probably discarded."

Frist Not Surprised By Brown Resignation. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/12) about Michael Brown's decision to resign as FEMA director. Frist said," I am not surprised by it. … I, too, have not talked to anybody about the resignation today. I've heard it through news reports. I'm not terribly surprised by that, but I am very pleased with the leadership that we have now, the command and control we have." Asked if the President should select someone 'who is a career professional as opposed to a political ally" to replace Brown, Frist said, "First of all, let me say I agree with your whole premise there," adding that "we need people in that position with authority, with good command and control, with a lot of experience, real-life experience. And then we got to go back and fix the entire system."

Managing Hurricane Relief Funds Called Major Test For FEMA. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Witte, Babcock) reports, "The Federal Emergency Management Agency will receive most of the $62 billion Congress has approved for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, setting up a major test of the agency's ability to distribute the cash and monitor the private contractors who will do much of the work. FEMA's track record in managing much smaller amounts of money has raised concerns." The Post adds, "The agency has already begun awarding hundreds of millions of dollars in no-bid Katrina contracts under loosened government rules designed to get relief and rebuilding efforts underway quickly. As the money begins to flow, some fear the agency could become overwhelmed."

More Commentary. In an editorial titled "Goodbye, 'Brownie,'" the Washington Post (9/13) says, "No one will be sorry or surprised to learn that Michael D. Brown…intends to spend more time with his family. Mr. Brown will be forever remembered as the man who, at the height of the New Orleans evacuation crisis, appeared not to know that 25,000 people were crammed into the city's convention center without food, water or toilets, despite television reports broadcasting that fact for the previous 24 hours." The Post notes Brown's resignation letter, in which he said "The focus has got to be on FEMA," adding, "We agree -- although we would add that the focus should be on presidential attention to FEMA, as well as congressional oversight and funding of FEMA, and not on FEMA's position in the federal bureaucracy." Turning to Paulison, the Post adds that he "may be qualified. But before coming to that conclusion, it would help if Congress and the White House take a bit more than 42 minutes to find out."

Mike Walker, a former deputy director of FEMA and former acting secretary of the Army, writes in today's Washington Times (9/13), "Don't blame FEMA's great professional, dedicated and unselfish employees for what happened in New Orleans. FEMA did not fail in the early response because of these great Americans. They were totally focused on responding to the tragedy and saving lives. Nor did FEMA fail because of an over-emphasis on terrorism prevention." FEMA "did fail because of a lack of effective leadership and its refusal to adapt to the new realities of the post-September 11 world." He adds, "The problem at FEMA is not a structural problem. FEMA did not fail because it is now part of the Department of Homeland Security. Making FEMA an independent agency again would only further complicate the nation's ability to shape the agency into a 21st century, forward-leaning, truly all-hazard response agency." But "the next director of FEMA must understand emergency management. He must appreciate his people. He must listen to his state and local partners. And, most importantly, he must understand FEMA's role in the post-September 11 world."

DOJ_NMG_0004235

George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/13) that "the blame game is missing the mark. George W. Bush is being accused by his natural enemies of everything from being asleep on the job to racism. But his real error came long before Katrina, when he and Congress created a Department of Homeland Security (DHS) in response to 9/11. … Creating a bigger bureaucracy to deal with the failures of two existing bureaucracies -- the FBI and the CIA -- was simply giving free rein to Beltway gluttony. The DHS has spent many billions, but when a hurricane equivalent of a weapon of mass destruction struck, the DHS was too cumbersome to respond quickly." Melloan adds, "If an agency is meant to cope with emergencies, don't put lawyers in charge. DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff is an admirable man but former federal judges aren't trained for quick executive action."

Contrary To Chertoff Claims, Officials Said To Have Known Damage Katrina Would Cause. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Foreman) reported, "When Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, federal, state and local officials, despite claims to the contrary, knew everything that was coming. The massive storm surge, the failing levees, the stranded survivors, the collapse of roads, bridges, electricity and phones. They had planned for and trained for all of it. And now with FEMA Director Michael Brown bowing out, accusations against others at all levels are rising like flood waters." CNN added, "The head of Homeland Security, which oversees FEMA, Michael Chertoff, has insisted for two weeks he had no warning of how bad Katrina could be. … But it turns out the National Weather Service issued a detailed message a day before the strike, saying buildings would be leveled, high-rises crippled and most of the area will be uninhabitable for weeks, perhaps longer. In addition, and again contrary to Chertoff's claims, FEMA was most certainly warned that the levees could collapse, although even well after the levees failed, FEMA officials continued to downplay how bad the flooding might be."

MSNBC's Hardball (9/12, Phillips) reported, "What has not been widely known until now is that over the years, many local, state, and federal government officials have been warned over and over again about this very scenario." Officials "knew that someday, the levees mate fail. And it turns out, they were warned just last year how catastrophic a levee failure would be. In July 2004, FEMA sponsored what amounted to a hurricane war game. It anticipated what could happen if a hypothetical category three storm named Pam hit New Orleans. … Despite the dire predictions… some federal officials didn't seem to take the drill seriously."

NYTimes Decries Army Corps' Spending On Civil Works Projects. The New York Times (9/13) editorializes, "There has been much grumbling that Congress and the Bush administration denied the Army Corps of Engineers the money that was required to fortify New Orleans against a hurricane like Katrina. These complaints need to be pursued. Flood control is mainly a federal obligation, and the agency most responsible for it must have enough money to do the job right. But there is another question worth asking: has the Army Corps made wise use of the money it has? Louisiana has received about $1.9 billion over the past four years for corps civil works projects, more than any other state. Although much of this has been spent to protect New Orleans, a lot has also been spent on unrelated water projects…mainly to serve the barge industry and other commercial interests. The Louisiana delegation, second to none in bringing home the bacon, is as much to blame for these skewed priorities as the corps is. … Unfortunately, many other senators - not just those from Louisiana - are powerfully addicted to corps projects and the votes they attract, especially Christopher Bond of Missouri, who controls the corps's budget and has single-handedly kept alive a nonessential barge industry on the Missouri River at great cost to the environment and taxpayers. To discipline the corps, Congress must first discipline itself."

