In 1985, Alito filed a job application with the Reagan White House in which he said he was "particularly proud" of the role he had played in the administration's effort to persuade the Supreme Court "that the Constitution does not protect a right to abortion."

This forthright statement will make it hard for Alito to avoid discussing his views on abortion. In September, then-nominee John G. Roberts Jr. steered around the topic by asserting that he was simply a lawyer representing his client when he served in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations.

By contrast, Alito's memo made clear that he agreed with the Reagan administration's public position that Roe vs. Wade should be overruled.

That effort to overturn the ruling ultimately fell short by one vote when two Reagan appointees — Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy — joined a 5-4 majority to affirm the abortion right in 1992.

If confirmed, Alito would succeed O'Connor.

CAP Critic Dropped From Alito Witness List (DP)

By Mark Stefanski

Daily Princetonia, January 8, 2006

An alumnus tapped by Democrats to testify in next week's Senate hearings on Samuel Alito '72 will no longer appear, removing the only witness slated to speak specifically about a controversial conservative alumni group of which Alito was a member.

Stephen Dujack '76, an environmental writer, had been outspoken in his condemnation of the group, Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which during the 1970s criticized the University's move to coeducation and adoption of affirmative action. Opponents of Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court had seized on his membership in the group to show that he is out-of-step with mainstream America on core issues.

Though it wasn't immediately clear why Dujack was removed from the Democrats' witness list, some observers believe he was vulnerable to attacks over an April 2003 Los Angeles Times column he wrote that compared animals killed in slaughterhouses with victims of the Holocaust.

On Friday, the office of Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a strong Alito backer, circulated copies of the column. By that evening, Dujack's name had been removed from a full list of witnesses released by the judiciary committee.

The column has not been specifically cited as the reason for Dujack's removal from the witness list, and he said he still plans to submit written testimony about the alumni group to the judiciary committee to tell senators "how awful this organization was."

"I'm going to want to explain why those of us who know the organization can be filled with revulsion at hearing that a person who was selected to go our nation's high court was proud of his membership in that organization," Dujack said in an email.

Politics professor and prominent conservative constitutional scholar Robert George described Dujack as "an example of a witness Republicans would be able to beat up pretty badly."

"I noticed conservative websites were just salivating because [Dujack] just seemed like such an obvious target," George said. "They could use him to say, 'Look these people against Alito are just these extreme people on the left.' "

Spokesmen for senior senators on the judiciary committee could not be reached for comment.

Dujack said in an email interview that the column has since brought him great grief and that he was only trying to defend something his late grandfather, Nobel laureate Isaac Bashevis Singer, had said about animal rights. Singer was a vegetarian and an advisory board member of a group called "Concern for Helping Animals in Israel."

"I haven't read any of the critiques thus far that mention my grandfather or anything about all of that stuff — just this short sound-bite stuff," Dujack said.

He added, "I regret very much having written that article. It's caused so much pain to people that I didn't intend to, so many who suffered like my family and worse ... That's the only thing I've written that I wish I could pull back. We all make mistakes sometimes."

Dujack has been replaced by two speakers who will discuss other topics, leaving nobody to speak about the alumni group, which has caused a storm of controversy since a 1985 application for a job at the Justice Department listing Alito's membership in the group was released in November.

But Dujack and other opponents believe that his CAP membership will still be an issue. "The issue is 'in play,' which was all that I had tried to accomplish when I set out — and I seem to have succeeded," Dujack said.

Judith Schaeffer '74, deputy legal director for People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group that opposes Alito's confirmation, agreed that the issue will not soon disappear.

"It shouldn't at all," she said. "What [Dujack's] had to say is there and in writing. It's not just him, but the record is demonstrable."

This latest development follows a string of criticisms and questions from the press and Democrats about Alito and CAP, which was founded in 1972 and had become largely defunct by 1987.

Two weeks ago, Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.), a judiciary committee member who has described CAP as "anti-black" and "anti-women," asked committee chairman Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pen.) to make a formal request for access to the archives of one of CAP's founders, hoping to learn more about Alito's involvement in the group. (See full story.)

On Friday, the Drudge Report citied anonymous Senate Democratic aides as saying that tying Alito to CAP was a Democratic strategy to derail his nomination. The report said the aides would make mention of racist comments in Prospect, the alumni group's magazine, and that it didn't matter that Alito had no part in writing them or any connection to them.

Drudge also reported that "Alito will testify that he joined CAP as a protest over Princeton policy that would not allow the ROTC on campus," but did not cite a source.

Opinion pieces in The New York Times and The Washington Post this weekend, including one by Kennedy, again make mention of CAP to raise questions about Alito's nomination.

Arguing that the Senate should "explore Judge Alito's honesty" because of suggestions that "he will bend the truth when it suits his purposes," an editorial in Sunday's New York Times said: "Judge Alito has said he does not recall being in an ultraconservative group called Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which opposed coeducation and affirmative action. That is odd, since he boasted of his membership in that same 1985 job application."

Trying to rebuff concerns about his involvement with CAP, Alito said in a statement last month to the judiciary committee that despite his Justice Department job application, "I have no recollection of being a member, of attending meetings, or otherwise participating in the activities of the group."

Supporters of CAP say the group was dedicated to increasing alumni involvement in University governance and tempering Nassau Hall's left-wing tendencies.

Fox News analyst and former New Jersey superior court judge Andrew Napolitano '72, a former CAP board member, said last month that he has "zero recollection" of Alito participating in the group. "His recollection and mine — which is that there's no recollection of him attending any of this stuff — are the same," Napolitano said.

Supporters of Alito's nomination inside and outside of the Senate have praised his intelligence and experience, among other factors. The nonpartisan American Bar Association this week gave Alito a unanimous "well qualified" rating.

"The President has selected a man with impeccable qualifications to serve on the Supreme Court," Cornyn has said previously of the nomination. "Judge Alito has served as a federal court of appeals judge for the last 15 years — giving him more judicial experience than any Supreme Court nominee in more than 70 years."

Dujack, a former associate editor at the Princeton Alumni Weekly, has publicly written about CAP in The Daily Princetonian and the Newark Star-Ledger since news of Alito's nomination.

In a Nov. 22 op-ed for The Daily Princetonian, he wrote that Alito "will have to explain how he permitted himself to belong to an organization that was overtly racist and sexist for its entire 14-year existence — at times passionately so, too." (See full story.)

Dujack is scheduled to speak on campus Jan. 13 at an event sponsored by the College Democrats.

Alito Advocacy Fills Air Of Swing States (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Three days before Thanksgiving, a trio of former law clerks to Samuel A. Alito Jr. did a "fly-in" to Portland, Maine, to tout the Supreme Court nominee in a strategy organized by the conservative group Progress for America. Two weeks later, a minivan filled with Mainers who oppose Alito traveled the coast from Bar Harbor to Kittery, gathering petition signatures as part of a "Rolling Justice Tour" coordinated by a coalition of left-leaning national groups.

Maine's newspapers have carried dozens of letters to the editor about the nomination, the result of choreographed media campaigns. And this weekend, the last before Alito's Senate confirmation hearing begins tomorrow, the state's television stations are airing ads paid for by Washington-based organizations that portray Alito as a "man of honor, integrity, principle" -- or, alternately, as part of a dangerous right-wing takeover of the Supreme Court.

With two moderate Republican senators who support abortion rights -- senators whose views of this nominee, in other words, are especially uncertain -- Maine is one of several states that the dueling forces in the debate over Alito have targeted for what Brookings Institution scholar Thomas E. Mann calls an artificial grass-roots -- or "Astroturf" -- campaign.

On both sides, organizations based in the nation's capital are pouring money, manpower and advocacy expertise into these states, trying to stir up authentic passions among constituents who might influence Senate votes.

"We don't fire the guns. We are just positioning them," said Chris Myers, executive director of Progress for America, which is spending $100,000 for several days of ads in Maine as well as in Louisiana and North Dakota, two other swing states. As part of the indirect strategy of mobilizing local opinion leaders, the group has enlisted in Maine a popular radio talk show host, a longtime local lawyer and the campaign treasurer of the senior senator, Olympia J. Snowe (R).

Local groups for or against Alito have been created in many states. In addition to Maine, much of the advocacy is being aimed at moderate Republicans including Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.) and Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.), as well as Democrats from relatively conservative states, including Mary Landrieu (La.), Ken Salazar (Colo.), Bill Nelson (Fla.), Blanche Lincoln and Mark Pryor of Arkansas, and Kent Conrad and Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota.

Whether the funds and energy national organizations are investing in the Alito debate will prove effective is unclear. Traditionally, public attention on Supreme Court nominations crests once a confirmation hearing begins.

On the eve of Alito's hearing, the intense advocacy efforts in Maine so far are not "having much impact at all," according to Steve Abbott, chief of staff to Sen. Susan Collins (R). "I don't hear the chatter, when I go out to eat, when I go to the gym," said Abbott, who lives in Portland and commutes to work on Capitol Hill. As television ads have proliferated in the days before Alito's hearing, Collins has been out of earshot on a trip to Antarctica.

In part, the campaigns for and against Alito are getting muffled because Maine, like other swing states in inexpensive media markets, is saturated with advocacy. "One week, it's ANWR [Alaskan oil-drilling] up here, the next week it's prescription drugs. Everything that comes up, the groups take to the airways in Maine," Abbott said. "We've reached the point it's just turned to clutter."

This winter, the future of the Supreme Court is a back-seat issue in Maine, according to several state politics-watchers who say residents are more focused on the immediate problems of high fuel oil prices and possible electricity shortages.

"The reality is, there are people who are on the far sides of the debate who are using this nomination as a battle over a whole host of issues and a lot of sort of tangential issues," said Richard A. Bennett, a former state Senate president who is treasurer of Snowe's reelection campaign this year and has been speaking out on Alito's behalf. "I really doubt that most ordinary citizens in Maine -- certainly the ones I've spoken to -- I really doubt they are being really attentive right now."

Senators, meanwhile, bristle at the suggestion that their vote can be influenced by Washington-directed issue campaigns. "As far as I am concerned, they are wasting their money," Conrad said.

Snowe and Collins pride themselves on being heirs to a long independent streak in their state's politics, unswayable by interest groups, said Christian P. Potholm, a professor of government at Bowdoin College. "For the two Maine senators, both sides would be better off if they just took the money and threw it into the Potomac River," Potholm said. "The advocacy groups don't care, but it's likely to be counterproductive."

Leaders of the most visible such groups dispute the sentiment that their efforts may prove ineffective.

Starting with the failed nomination of Robert H. Bork in 1987, interest groups have applied campaign-style techniques to Supreme Court confirmations, and both sides had been waiting more than a decade to release their pent-up forces. No vacancy on the court had materialized for 11 years until last summer's nomination of John G. Roberts Jr., now the chief justice.

"This is a splendid example of shoe-leather democracy," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the liberal group People for the American Way, who has worked on every Supreme Court confirmation debate for three decades.

Neas said a coalition of about 70 groups opposing Alito has accomplished important steps in the pre-hearing phase. He said the coalition has defined the issues in the nomination, encouraged senators to remain undecided until the hearing, and raised money -- in addition to mobilizing its base.

In Maine, the scores of people who signed anti-Alito petitions along the route of the Rolling Justice tour included many who knew of the project because they already were on e-mail lists of MoveOn.org.

"I travel in a very politically engaged circle of people, and I think that people are very concerned" about his nomination, said Susan Dorr, a real estate broker who is a former state legislator and town selectman in Camden. She said she was one of about a dozen people who turned out when the tour passed through there.

Mike Duddy, a Portland lawyer and co-chairman of Mainers for Judge Alito, said that he offered to work with national groups, believing, "if there is not some presence on the ground to keep a level-headed voice, the opponents would completely occupy what would otherwise be a vacuum."

So far, he has been taking reporters' calls or appearing on talk radio perhaps once a week, but he has not attended any large pro-Alito events. "From my point of view . . . the level of interest seems to be muted," Duddy said. "I don't think it's completely ignored. Neither do I think it's the first thing people are thinking about."

Among Evangelicals, A Kinship With Jews (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

DANVILLE, Va. -- Everyone who worships at the Tabernacle quickly learns three facts about its deeply conservative pastor. He comes from a broken home. He rides a canary-yellow Harley. And he loves the Jews.

There is some murmuring about the motorcycle. But the 2,500 members of this Bible-believing, tradition-respecting Southern Baptist church in southern Virginia have embraced everything else about the Rev. Lamarr Mooneyham.

Out of his painful childhood experiences, Mooneyham, 57, preaches passionately about the importance of home. Out of his reading of the Bible, he preaches with equal passion about God's continuing devotion to the Jewish people.

"I feel jealous sometimes. This term that keeps coming up in the Old Book -- the Chosen, the Chosen," says the minister, who has made three trips to Israel and named his sons Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. "I'm a pardoned gentile, but I'm not one of the Chosen People. They're the apple of his eye."

Scholars of religion call this worldview "philo-Semitism," the opposite of anti-Semitism. It is a burgeoning phenomenon in evangelical Christian churches across the country, a hot topic in Jewish historical studies and a wellspring of support for Israel.

Yet many Jews are nervous about evangelicals' intentions. In recent weeks, leaders of three of the nation's largest Jewish groups -- the Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee and the Union for Reform Judaism -- have decried what they see as a mounting threat to the separation of church and state from evangelicals emboldened by the belief that they have an ally in the White House and an opportunity to shift the Supreme Court.

"Make no mistake: We are facing an emerging Christian right leadership that intends to 'Christianize' all aspects of American life, from the halls of government to the libraries, to the movies, to recording studios, to the playing fields and locker rooms . . . from the military to SpongeBob SquarePants," the ADL's national director, Abraham H. Foxman, said in a Nov. 3 speech.

Julie Galambush, a former American Baptist minister who converted to Judaism 11 years ago, has seen both sides of the divide. She said many Jews suspect that evangelicals' support for Israel is rooted in a belief that the return of Jews to the promised land will trigger the Second Coming of Jesus, the battle of Armageddon and mass conversion.

"That hope is felt and expressed by Christians as a kind, benevolent hope," said Galambush, author of "The Reluctant Parting," a new book on the Jewish roots of Christianity. "But believing that someday Jews will stop being Jews and become Christians is still a form of hoping that someday there will be no more Jews."

The result is a paradox -- warming evangelical attitudes toward Jews at a time of rising Jewish concern about evangelicals -- that could be a turning point in the uneasy alliance between Jewish and Christian groups that ardently back Israel but disagree on much else.

The Rev. Donald E. Wildmon, chairman of the evangelical American Family Association, warned in a Dec. 5 radio broadcast that Foxman was "in a bind" because the "strongest supporters Israel has are members of the religious right -- the people he's fighting."

"The more he says that 'you people are destroying this country,' you know, some people are going to begin to get fed up with this and say, 'Well, all right then. If that's the way you feel, then we just won't support Israel anymore,' " Wildmon said.

Philo-Semitism is far from universal among the 60 million to 90 million U.S. adults who identify themselves as born-again or evangelical Christians. But it has strong roots, not only in the Hebrew scriptures shared by both faiths but also in the belief that today's Jews and Christians have common antagonists, such as secularism, consumerism and militant Islam.

In his sermons, Mooneyham returns again and again to God's promise to Abraham in Genesis 12: "I will bless those who bless you, and curse him who curses you."

It is a theme echoed in many conversations at the Tabernacle, a plain red-brick church in a community that has seen one factory after another close, yet where the congregation made a Christmas offering of $25,000 to help pay for the immigration of Russian Jews to Israel.

"I believe everyone in this church felt it was the best thing we've ever done with missionary money, to help the Jewish people go home," said Dorothy Pawlowski, 72, who tithes to the church.

And it is a message being passed to the next generation. On Thursday nights, J.J. Vogltanz, a deacon, uses a Christian textbook to lead his three home-schooled children in science experiments designed to illustrate Bible verses. One of the first things he taught them about Jesus, he said, was that "he was a Jew."

DOJ_NMG_0008753

Asked whether he also taught his children that the Jews rejected Jesus, Vogltanz, 34, paused. "I'm not sure it's constructive to assign blame," he said.

Mark A. Noll, a professor of Christian thought at Wheaton College, a center of evangelical scholarship in Illinois, said evangelicals are beginning to move away from supersessionism -- the centuries-old belief that with the coming of Jesus, God ended his covenant with the Jews and transferred it to the Christian church.

Since the 1960s, the Roman Catholic Church and some Protestant denominations have renounced supersessionism and stressed their belief that the covenant between God and the Jewish people remains in effect.

Evangelicals generally have not taken that step, but "among what you might call the evangelical intelligentsia, questions of supersessionism have come onto the table," Noll said. "It's in play among evangelicals in the way that it was in mainline Protestantism and Catholicism -- but wasn't among evangelicals -- 30 or 40 years ago."

At Fuller Theological Seminary, an evangelical training ground in Pasadena, Calif., President Richard J. Mouw hosted a kosher breakfast for 20 rabbis a week before Christmas. "More and more, we're inviting Jews as guest lecturers," Mouw said. "We're looking at rabbinic literature and how we can better understand the Bible through rabbinic eyes. That's a real push for us."

Jacques Berlinerblau, a visiting professor of Jewish civilization at Georgetown University, said the rise of philo-Semitism in the United States has led Jewish scholars to look back at previous periods of philo-Semitism, such as in Amsterdam in the mid-17th century. He said revisionists are increasingly challenging the standard "lachrymose version" of Jewish history, questioning whether persecution has been the norm and tolerance the exception, or vice versa.

Still, some Jews think that philo-Semitism is just the flip side of anti-Semitism.

"Both are Semitisms: That is, both install the Jews at the center of history. One regards this centrality positively, the other regards it negatively. But both are forms of obsession about the Jews," said Leon Wieseltier, a Jewish scholar and literary editor of the New Republic.

The Southern Baptist Convention, to which the Tabernacle belongs, passed a resolution in 1867 calling on its members to convert Jews and renewed that call as recently as 1996. Its former president, Bailey Smith, declared in 1980 that "God Almighty does not hear the prayer of a Jew," and it currently supports about 15 congregations of messianic Jews, who are popularly associated with the organization Jews for Jesus.

So Mooneyham has a ready answer for Jews who doubt his motives: "I think they have a right to be suspicious of just about everybody, given the history."

He also has a personal story. The pivotal moment of Mooneyham's childhood came at age 7 when his parents, in the middle of a divorce, took him and his three sisters to a church parking lot in Burlington, N.C., and parceled them out to relatives for a few weeks. Those few weeks turned into years. The family never came together again.

Nearly 45 years later, the pastor was watching television before a Sunday morning church service when he came upon an infomercial by Rabbi Yechiel Z. Eckstein, founder of a group called the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews. Eckstein was standing in Israel with an elderly woman from Russia who said she was finally home.

"She started crying, he started crying, and I started crying," Mooneyham said. "Then I said, 'Lord, help me, because I'm really going to throw my congregation a curveball today. We're going to help Jews -- we're not going to witness to them, we're just going to help them. Because I know what home means.' "

Since that day five years ago, according to Eckstein, the Tabernacle has sent more than $175,000 to the fellowship, which has a donor base of 400,000 Christians and has contributed more than $100 million to Israeli causes.

"I can only say that what we've done should speak for itself, because we've given and we've asked nothing in return," Mooneyham said. "And that's the way it will stay."

A Search For Order, An Answer In The Law (WP)

By Dale Russakoff And Jo Becker

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

It was May 3, 1971, the crest of the antiwar movement, and Washington was clogged with thousands of denim-and-fatigues-clad protesters demanding an end to the Vietnam War. Blocks from the Capitol, but far from the action, a handful of Princeton University undergraduates in sport coats found themselves in the wood-paneled chambers of Justice John M. Harlan.

Most saw the visit as a detour from their real purpose: to meet generals, lawmakers and diplomats and debate the justness of the war. One young man even dozed off.

But not Samuel A. Alito Jr. Harlan was the one person he wanted to meet when Princeton's politics society arranged the trip. Now the clean-cut young man with dark-rimmed glasses was transfixed by the justice whose dissents from landmark liberal rulings of the Supreme Court had become his guideposts.

"The rest of us didn't grasp Harlan's significance," said George Pieler, then president of the politics society. "The only reason I did was that Sam had told me."

Years later, Alito would write that his distress over the court's liberal activism under Chief Justice Earl Warren in the 1960s had propelled him to study constitutional law. Along the way, he would embrace Harlan's view that the court was usurping power that the Constitution had reserved for lawmakers.

At the time of the visit, this vision was hardly in vogue. After all, it was the Warren Court that had stepped in when legislators would not and declared segregated schools unconstitutional.

But Alito was not one to be swayed by fashion. As protest movements shook the world around him in the 1960s and 1970s, he held fast to the respect for authority he learned growing up in a New Jersey suburb in the 1950s.

Like many conservatives of his generation, Alito was inspired by the presidential campaign of Sen. Barry M. Goldwater (R-Ariz.), stimulated by William F. Buckley Jr.'s National Review, alarmed by the discord over the war in Vietnam and disenchanted with the liberal bias of college campuses.

But rather than turn to activism, he found in the study of law a framework for what troubled him. The early years of his journey were deeply private and intellectual. But he later found company, particularly in the Reagan Justice Department, incubator of scores of leading conservative legal practitioners, including Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

In articles today and tomorrow, The Washington Post will explore the forces, people and ideas that helped shape Alito and hastened his rise in the law. The articles are based on Alito's writings, government documents and more than 100 interviews, including the first extensive one with his family. Like other Supreme Court nominees, Alito did not comment.

The Senate confirmation hearings that begin tomorrow on President Bush's nomination of Alito to the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor represent a milestone not only for him but also for the conservative movement that grew up as he did.Like Father, Like Son

He was born at mid-century to Italian Americans from the proud, immigrant enclave of Chambersburg in Trenton, N.J.

"When the first baby came, I said, 'Sam, our children are going to be the smartest children in Hamilton Township,' " Rose Alito, now 91, recalled in an interview at the two-story, red-brick home in the Trenton suburb where she and Samuel Alito Sr. raised a Supreme Court nominee.

From the beginning, she said, the boy took after his father, a scholarly and reserved man who directed New Jersey's nonpartisan Office of Legislative Services. Perennially pipe-puffing, with thick white hair that gave him a look of distinction, the elder Alito spoke reverentially of the importance of exhaustive, bias-free research in the making of law.

"It was never about what he felt; it was what the law was," recalled former New Jersey governor Thomas H. Kean (R).

The father ingrained exacting standards in his children. "My father would assist us in learning how to write well," said Rosemary Alito, the nominee's sister. "He'd say, 'No, this is wrong, this is wrong, this is wrong. Go write it again.' And I'd go write it again. And he'd look at it again. And he'd review it and give me corrections until he'd find it to be perfect."

The elder Alito was tight-lipped about his own leanings. Some published reports have said he was a Republican; others, a Democrat. Co-workers said he joked that he was "a political eunuch." Asked for the real story, Rose Alito -- a Republican who was a Democrat until 1987 -- and Rosemary Alito, a Republican and a leading employment lawyer, looked blankly at each other, answering with shrugs.

Alito Senior, whose death in 1987 left his son too distraught to deliver a eulogy, had always vacuumed up knowledge. Before working for the legislature, he taught ancient history, physics, math and English at Trenton Central High and had scored so high on an Army aptitude test it raised suspicions of cheating. Similarly, the younger Alito was so far ahead of peers at Hamilton-East Steinert High School that he skewed the grade curve. And, like his father, he kept a lot to himself.

"He was always listening to students' comments, my comments -- analyzing, evaluating, but silently. Kind of inscrutable at times," said Elaine Tarr, his 10th-grade English teacher.

Classmates still speak of his unusual blend of braininess, modesty and quietly hilarious wit. He played baseball, was a star debater, edited the school paper and was elected student council president with an uncharacteristically wacky campaign using posters of women having their hair colored and the slogan "I'll just DYE if Sam isn't elected. Alito for President."

Behind the gentle demeanor was a boy bent on winning. "Oh yes, very competitive!" said his mother. His rivalry with a champion debater at Trenton Central High named Jeffrey Laurenti was so fierce that Alito would not say his opponent's full name -- a relationship highlighted by the caption beside Alito's yearbook photograph: "Jeffrey Who?"

Friends and family members say Alito embraced the respect for authority that was ubiquitous in the 1950s from home to school to Our Lady of Sorrows Catholic Church. Asked if he ever rebelled, Rosemary Alito exclaimed, "Oh my goodness, he never did anything rebellious at all!"

His middle school Latin teacher, Grace Bolge, said she saw in his passion for that language a love of order and rules. "He liked structure and rigidity," she said. "I think that's why he liked debate. It was timed, it was regulated, there were rules for when you could speak and how you spoke."

The order that defined Alito's early years began to give way in the 1960s. Rose Alito does not remember her reaction as the Second Vatican Council loosened the top-down authority of the Roman Catholic Church. But she made clear her displeasure at another change in religious practice: the 1963 Supreme Court decision banning public school Bible reading and prayer, which began Alito's school days through sixth grade.

"I was teaching then, and it used to irk me," she said. "I read poems that had something to do with the atmosphere and the trees when we were not permitted to read the Bible."

As a federal appellate judge, Alito would repeatedly rule for more religious expression in public spheres.

In 1964, the Supreme Court transformed the legislature that Sam Alito Sr. served, ruling in Reynolds v. Sims that the Constitution required individual legislative districts to have essentially equal numbers of voters -- one man, one vote. The opinion prompted a dissent from Harlan that, according to a friend and former colleague Douglas W. Kmiec, is one of the nominee's favorites.

"The Constitution is not a panacea for every blot upon the public welfare, nor should this Court, ordained as a judicial body, be thought of as a general haven for reform movements," Harlan wrote. "This Court . . . does not serve its high purpose when it exceeds its authority, even to satisfy justified impatience with the political process."

The elder Alito became the New Jersey legislature's redistricting expert, drawing district lines that shifted power from sparsely populated rural counties to cities and suburbs. In the process, the state Senate turned Democratic for the first time in 52 years. As always, Alito Senior expressed no opinion of the result.

At about this time, politics and government became a fascination for his son, and, according to a job application to the Reagan administration, he was impressed by Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign, a crusade against communism and Washington's dictates to the states in areas including civil rights and public school prayer. Alito became a regular viewer of Buckley's "Firing Line" television program.

Fellow high school debater James Castranova remembers Alito speaking with enthusiasm about reading Buckley's National Review, the opinion journal credited with helping to launch the modern conservative movement. He also recalled Alito's excitement when then-California Gov. Ronald Reagan, a rising conservative star, was roundly deemed the winner of a 1967 televised debate with then-Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.).

"He was just fascinated that Reagan was able to get the better of Bobby Kennedy," Castranova said.

Castranova emphasized that Alito never trumpeted his views, lest he jeopardize his father's reputation for impartiality. In the 1968 yearbook of Victor McDonald, a vocal supporter of Richard M. Nixon, Alito teased: "Who will replace you next year as Steinert High School's biggest reactionary? I doubt anybody can be as FAR RIGHT as you.'"Tradition, Order and Authority'

Former Princeton professor Dennis F. Thompson, now at Harvard, remembers a freshman named Sam Alito from 37 years ago for one reason: He was a conservative.

Thompson assigned students in his political theory class to develop a world view of their own, drawing on philosophers. A tide of liberal and left-wing visions rolled in, with a notable exception. "It wasn't conservative in terms of political issues of the day," Thompson recalled of Alito's paper. "It was more about principles -- a respect for tradition, order and authority."

As the antiwar movement engulfed Princeton, Alito stood outside the fray, finding mentors in books and journals of ideas. In the spring of 1970, after the United States invaded Cambodia, students voted overwhelmingly to postpone classes to campaign against the war.

Classmate Richard R. Clifton, now a 9th Circuit appellate judge, remembers Alito had a different concern. Alito thought that a majority vote to suspend classes would be unfair to a minority who wanted to study. "He was very frustrated," Alito's wife, Martha, said he told her. "He wanted his education."

Many students joined selective-admissions dining clubs dominated by sons of the rich, but Alito chose instead the anti-elitist Stevenson Hall (named for Democrat Adlai E. Stevenson), which welcomed all comers. Friends knew Alito as a confirmed anti-snob, flashing a dry, acerbic wit at any sign of pomposity.

He immersed himself in the study of law, history and politics -- and again debate. His closest friends were all, like him, studious majors in Princeton's Woodrow Wilson School who dined at Stevenson, where they were more likely to debate John Rawls's "A Theory of Justice" than Vietnam. Still, "I knew he was greatly bothered by all the upheaval of the '60s," said Ken Burns, now a lawyer in San Francisco.

Alito had a ringside seat on an ambitious student-faculty effort to make Princeton's decision making more responsive to change, to head off student protest. The chairman of the project, professor Stanley Kelley, who knew Alito's academic work, hired him to take notes and do research while passions flared.

The university approved the group's recommendations, giving students much more influence over tenure, curriculum, dorm curfew and other policies. (A conservative alumni group that Alito listed among his affiliations in a 1985 job application, Concerned Alumni of Princeton, would later say the effort had turned Princeton over to left-wing students.) Kelley said Alito never expressed a view of the deliberations.

Samuel Lipsman, an outspoken leftist who headed Princeton's debate panel, knew Alito's leanings, but only because he asked him directly. "I knew he was conservative and he supported the president and defended the war, but he didn't carry signs even metaphorically," said Lipsman, who nominated Alito to succeed him as debate panel president. "He never antagonized."

Alito's good friend and fellow debater, Andrew P. Napolitano, a self-described "notorious campus conservative" and now a Fox News commentator, said Lipsman knew more than he did: "I do not recall hearing a conservative peep out of Sam's mouth."

But in Alito's mind, he would later write, a conservative legal philosophy was forming by his junior year when he read the works of Yale law professor Alexander M. Bickel, a pioneering critic of the Warren Court. At a time when many intellectuals embraced liberal judicial activism as a force for good, Bickel announced in a book titled "The Supreme Court and the Idea of Progress" that the Warren Court's most sacrosanct rulings -- including Brown v. Board of Education and one man, one vote -- were badly reasoned, based not on the Constitution, but on the egalitarian visions of individual justices. A moderate to liberal Democrat, Bickel wrote that no matter how noble the result, this unelected branch was threatening democracy.

Bickel's views ignited profound unease and even fury in intellectual circles, where the Warren Court was seen as having protected individual rights from being trampled by the majority. Yale activists burned Bickel in effigy in 1969.

For Alito, however, discovering Bickel proved a seminal moment. He would write later that he had objected even as a young man to the Warren Court's rulings, particularly on reapportionment, criminal procedure and public school prayer. Bickel specifically critiqued these decisions, arguing that legislatures, not courts, should execute complex social changes, even if they came more slowly. His vision meshed with Alito's desire for orderly change.

His senior year, Alito crossed paths again with his old debating rival, Jeffrey Laurenti, then a graduate student at Princeton. From similar beginnings as Italian American Catholics raised with moral certainty and respect for authority, they had taken different roads. Laurenti had turned against the Vietnam War and the president. "The scales were falling slowly from my eyes. I was groping," he said. "I don't know that Sam was."

Alito was delving into the history and workings of the Supreme Court. Charles A. Miller, then a Princeton assistant professor of constitutional law, said Alito so loved reading Supreme Court opinions that he persuaded the teacher to completely revise the syllabus of one seminar so that he could take it again.

Alito wrote his research paper for Miller on Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who once famously had summed up his philosophy of judicial restraint: "If my fellow citizens want to go to hell, I will help them. It's my job."

Miller was amazed by the college senior's ability "to embrace historical, philosophical and political material and modes of reasoning," according to the 1972 law school recommendation he wrote. "The logic and precision that Mr. Alito uses in both oral and written presentation is almost palpable. None of it is aggressive, indeed sometimes it is self-effacing," Miller wrote, using adjectives Alito's admirers use today.

"It's easy to say I'm prescient," said Miller, now retired, "but I think what's more true is this guy is very consistent."The Calling of the Law

Yale Law School in 1972 was a temple of legal liberalism, and Alito soon began to feel that some professors were giving him an incomplete view of the law. He would later tell his friend Kmiec that he turned to reading extensively on his own.

"There was this note of regret in his voice that very few of them [professors] seemed to be saying things that he could readily agree with," said Kmiec, now a professor at Pepperdine University Law School.

Bickel soon became gravely ill, unable to teach. His devoted friend on the faculty, Robert H. Bork, was carrying the conservative torch, arguing that the only principled way to interpret the Constitution was to stick to the precise words of the Framers and what they meant at that time.

Bork taught that there was no constitutional basis for rights to privacy, abortion, or one man, one vote, and he criticized court-ordered busing to achieve school desegregation as judicial meddling. Classmates do not recall Alito's reaction to Roe v. Wade in 1973, but he would later write that the decision had no basis in the Constitution. Alito's mother has told reporters that he personally opposes abortion; Alito has not commented on his personal views.

Bork said in an interview that he remembers only one student -- John R. Bolton, now the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations -- who then expressed conservative views openly. "The rest of them kept their heads down," Bork said.

Alito's Yale roommate and Princeton classmate Mark Dwyer said his friend had hoped to have Bork for constitutional law, but ended up with Charles Reich, author of an unofficial bible of the protest movement, "The Greening of America."

Alito applied to be a Supreme Court clerk after law school. But, said his wife, Martha, "it was not to be at that time in his life." Instead, he went home to New Jersey to clerk for Appeals Court Judge Leonard I. Garth in Newark, a 3rd Circuit judicial craftsman in the mold of Alito's hero, Justice Harlan.

In contrast to his intellectual estrangement from Yale, Alito found in Garth a sort of father in the law. Former clerks describe him as a judge who asks himself before deciding any case whether an elected branch of government could resolve it instead.

"Judge Garth and Sam had the same philosophy, and they spoke the same language," said Kenneth Prochnow, Alito's co-clerk in 1976 and 1977.

There was another link. Alito's father had testified before Garth as a demographic expert in a 1972 New Jersey reapportionment case. "It was an extraordinary circumstance because rarely do you remember witnesses," Garth said. "But I was terribly impressed with him. I told Sam about it, and I think he was justifiably proud."

Garth, who once rated Alito 16 1/2 out of 10 as a clerk, said they used to buy a bag of peanuts and "take long walks in Newark, just the two of us, hashing out cases."

Alito was back in an orderly world after seven years in liberal cauldrons. He moved home with his parents and assumed the role of lector, or reader, at Sunday Mass at Our Lady of Sorrows.

Prochnow remembers his surprise when he realized after the 1976 presidential election that his co-clerk was a Republican. "Sam was disappointed that Jimmy Carter won," Prochnow said. "That was very strange for me, because in the environment I'd been in since 1968, I don't think I'd met any Republicans," he said, referring to his time at Columbia University and New York University Law School. "I can only imagine what it was like for Sam to have developed and held his philosophy, which must have been a minority and unpopular position, in the environments he'd been in."

Comfortable in the monastic, intellectual world of appeals -- a more solitary and research-oriented practice than the free-for-all of trial work -- Alito went to work after his clerkship in the appellate section of the U.S. attorney's office in Newark. His skills quickly made him the go-to lawyer on the most sensitive cases. One involved a top-secret exchange of two convicted Russian spies for five Russian dissidents. The intricacies kept him in the library for days, plumbing law books, as well as a Russian dictionary.

Near the end of the process, another staffer breezed by him in the library stacks, calling out offhandedly, "Hey, Sam, I heard you learned Russian over the weekend."

Martha Bomgardner, a young librarian in the U.S. attorney's office, overheard his quiet and upright-sounding answer: "I don't think that's something to talk about."

"Oh, this is a smart one," she thought.

She told friends she would marry him by the following April. But he was uncommonly shy, and despite multiple daily trips to the library, did not ask her out for 13 months. "He is judicious," she said recently with a laugh.

They had dated about a year when he got an offer from the U.S. solicitor general. The office is arguably the most respected law firm in the country, representing the U.S. government before the Supreme Court. Alito left for Washington in August 1981. "I thought that would be the end," Bomgardner said.

Four years later, Martha Bomgardner would become Martha Alito and Samuel Alito Jr. would be on a very different course.

Alito's Challenge (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

The two names uppermost on the minds of official Washington at this moment represent polar extremes of reputation. Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff is an admitted felon and a certified sleaze. Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito is an upright, ethical and highly respected jurist, as modest in his habits as Abramoff is flamboyant.

Abramoff's operations have been thoroughly exposed by the reporting of my colleagues at The Post and in the plea agreements he signed with federal prosecutors, sending tremors of anxiety through the ranks of congressional Republicans and a few Democrats as well.

Alito's work, as a member of the Philadelphia-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, will become much more familiar to the nation when the Senate Judiciary Committee holds its hearings this week on his nomination to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

The question that confronts the senators is whether Alito has an agenda that is every bit as well-defined as that for which the Indian tribes and others hired Abramoff -- but vastly larger in significance.

The goals for which Abramoff connived were petty -- a gambling license here, a contract there. The issues with which Alito has wrestled in his 15 years on the federal bench are much more consequential: the relationship between individuals and the state, the regulatory authority of the federal government, the balance of power between the president and Congress, the protection of civil rights.

On all these issues, Alito has compiled a record that can be read -- and is read by many legal scholars -- as reflecting a consistent and reasoned preference for governmental authority, especially presidential power, and a restrictive view of individual rights.

University of Chicago law professor Cass Sunstein, for example, concluded a study of Alito's dissents with the observation that "there is a good chance that Alito will be with Justices [Antonin] Scalia and [Clarence] Thomas in their attempts to move constitutional law in some respects to what it was a long time ago."

If that reading is correct, then the confirmation of Alito as O'Connor's successor would shift the current Supreme Court balance decisively to the right.

For senators who share President Bush's often-expressed desire to see that happen, the confirmation of Alito presents no conflict. Moreover, his "highly qualified" rating from the American Bar Association underlines the near-universal belief that his intellect and temperament commend him for the bench.

But others face a harder task in weighing the Alito nomination. They may well ask: At a time when the administration is asserting a broad right to conduct warrantless wiretaps of Americans' phone calls, do we really need a Supreme Court that takes an expansionist view of presidential authority? In an era of corporate corruption, do we want to restrict consumers' and workers' ability to turn to the courts for help?

But the evidence on Alito's motivations is not one-sided. At the suggestion of White House allies, I spoke with two of his former colleagues who presented compelling personal testimony that he is not a man driven by a personal or ideological agenda.

Robert Del Tufo was the Jimmy Carter-appointed U.S. attorney in New Jersey who employed Alito in the 1970s to handle difficult appellate cases. "There is no ideological bent that I can perceive," he told me. "He is a balanced human being with great sensitivity for human values and a scholar who analyzes the law and always stays with it."

Susan Sullivan of San Francisco clerked for Alito during the year he wrote his controversial Casey opinion, upholding portions of a Pennsylvania statute restricting abortion, a decision later overturned by the Supreme Court. Sullivan, who describes herself as "a social progressive who is pro-choice and anti-death penalty," says, "In general I would react with suspicion to any nominee of this administration. But having worked with him, I know he does not work toward a specific result. He is not intent on advancing his own agenda. He approaches cases in a very impartial way."

When John Roberts came before the Judiciary Committee for confirmation as chief justice, with barely more than two years of judicial opinions behind him, he was thoroughly believable in disclaiming any particular agenda. All Republicans and half the Democrats saw him, as I did, as an embodiment of judicial impartiality.

Maybe Alito can establish a similar claim for himself in these hearings. But he has a lot of convincing to do.

Alito's Moment (LAT)

By Edward Lazarus

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

SUPREME COURT nominations are as old as the republic, but the modern history of the battles over court appointments begins in 1987. That's when the Senate rejected Robert H. Bork, the conservative appellate judge who President Reagan nominated to replace Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., the swing-voting centrist on what was then, as now, a closely divided court.

Nominees had failed to win Senate approval before Bork. The Senate turned down Clement Haynsworth in 1969 and G. Harold Carswell a year later, President Nixon's first two choices to replace Justice Abe Fortas.

Nor was Bork's nomination unprecedented in the dramatic political shift it portended if he had been confirmed. In 1962, President Kennedy's choice of liberal Arthur J. Goldberg to replace conservative Felix Frankfurter moved an already fairly progressive Warren court significantly to the left, clearing the way for a civil rights and civil liberties revolution.

Still, the Bork hearings were the first in which political-interest groups, recognizing the huge importance of controlling the federal judiciary, defeated a potentially court-altering nominee by using campaign-style tactics to turn the confirmation proceedings into a popularity contest and a national referendum on the Constitution's meaning.

Bork never knew what hit him. He lost because Senate Democrats successfully cast him as an arrogant hyper-intellectual who espoused a judicial philosophy — in particular, his rejection of a constitutional "right to privacy" — out of tune with mainstream America. Every Supreme Court nomination since reflects the lessons that each side drew from the experience.

This was especially true in the fight, one-sided as it was, over John G. Roberts Jr.'s nomination to replace William H. Rehnquist as chief justice. Some Senate Democrats and liberal interest groups tried mightily to reprise the 1987 strategy and portray Roberts as an out-of-the-mainstream, anti-privacy ideologue. But Republicans were ready with an effective counterstrategy that quickly quelled any nascent opposition.

Indeed, Roberts, by design, was the archetypical "reverse Bork" — a congenial, telegenic nominee with an impressive pedigree but as slim a track record as feasible on hot-button issues. And he arrived at his confirmation hearings armed with a reverse-Bork strategy:

· Ameliorate past criticisms of popular liberal precedents, especially Roe vs. Wade, by emphasizing respect for precedent;

· neutralize previous expressions of personal opinion on controversial issues by drawing a bright line between personal beliefs and judicial philosophy;

· avoid an ideological battle by declining to answer problematic questions on grounds that the issues raised might be the subject of future cases;

· and mount a public-relations campaign of your own.

With Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings Monday, it remains unclear whether either side has made significant strategic adjustments based on Roberts' experience.

The administration has stuck with the winning Roberts playbook, albeit this time with a nominee who, thanks to 15 years on the federal bench, has a more extensive track record. For instance, Alito's handlers have tried to overcome the nominee's deeply felt and repeated hostility toward Roe vs. Wade by emphasizing his reverence for precedent and modest conception of the judicial role.

More generally, they've attempted to downplay his record as a sometimes hard-edged conservative on such issues as race and gender discrimination, states' rights and the separation of church and state by casting Alito as congenial, open-minded and keenly aware of the need to divorce personal beliefs from legal interpretations. No doubt Alito will seek to exhibit these qualities when refusing, as did Roberts, to answer problematic questions.

Senate Democrats have not revealed any new strategies after completely failing to force Roberts to elaborate on his judicial ideology or otherwise penetrate the nominee's carefully crafted and beautifully delivered responses. They certainly have more to work with this time.

Early in his career, Alito did not hide his sometimes radical legal views, including hostility toward the now universally accepted one-person/one-vote standard for voting apportionment. He wrote several judicial decisions that are easily caricatured, such as a dissent supporting the legality of a strip-search of a 10-year-old girl and another arguing that Congress does not have authority under the "commerce clause" to restrict the transfer and possession of machine guns.

And no one expects Alito to be as effective testifying as Roberts was.

But to defeat Alito, Senate Democrats will need more than a clutch of 20-year-old policy memos and unsettling judicial opinions. They will have to portray Alito as a genuine threat to some core American value — and not merely to the right to privacy, on which all the moves and countermoves are already choreographed.

President Bush's decision to engage in warrantless wiretapping of Americans in apparent violation of the statute regulating spying for national-security purposes raises a constitutional issue of staggering importance. In undertaking this program — and other policies on the use of torture, detention and the designation of enemy combatants — in its prosecution of the war on terror, the administration asserts an inherent constitutional authority to commit acts that Congress has explicitly deemed criminal.

The question of whether the president is, to put it bluntly, above ordinary law whenever he invokes his constitutional authority as commander in chief will have to be decided by the Supreme Court. Whether it will transform the political landscape remains unclear. But it may be the only issue on which Alito is truly vulnerable. He is on record supporting a very broad view of presidential authority and, as a judge, has shown great deference to the acts of executive branch officials, including advocating legal immunity for the attorney general against lawsuits charging him with illegal wiretapping.

Alito will resist questions on these matters on grounds that presidential authority will be the subject of cases on which he would sit.

But the president's power to flout the will of Congress in secret, and solely on his say-so, should be an issue of transcendent importance. If Senate Democrats pursue it, Alito may face the prospect of separating himself from the president who nominated him or risk a filibuster.

Judging Samuel Alito (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

Judicial nominations are not always motivated by ideology, but the nomination of Judge Samuel Alito certainly was. President Bush's previous choice to fill Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Supreme Court, Harriet Miers, was hounded into withdrawing by the far right, primarily because she appeared to hold moderate views on a variety of legal issues. President Bush placated Ms. Miers's conservative critics by nominating Judge Alito, who has long been one of their favorites.

Judge Alito's confirmation hearings begin tomorrow. He may be able to use them to reassure the Senate that he will be respectful of rights that Americans cherish, but he has a lengthy and often troubling record he will have to explain away. As a government lawyer, he worked to overturn Roe v. Wade. He has disturbing beliefs on presidential power - a critical issue for the country right now. He has worked to sharply curtail Congress's power to pass laws and protect Americans. He may not even believe in "one person one vote."

The White House has tried to create an air of inevitability around Judge Alito's confirmation. But the public is skeptical. In a new Harris poll, just 34 percent of those surveyed said they thought he should be confirmed, while 31 percent said he should not, and 34 percent were unsure. Nearly 70 percent said they would oppose Judge Alito's nomination if they thought he would vote to make abortion illegal - which it appears he might well do.

If President Bush had chosen a pragmatic, mainstream conservative like Justice O'Connor to fill the seat, these confirmation hearings would be a breeze. But now, the Senate has a duty to delve into the many areas in which Judge Alito's record suggests he is an extremist, including:

ABORTION Judge Alito has not only opposed Roe v. Wade, he has also worked to overturn it. When he applied for a promotion in the Reagan administration in 1985, he wrote that he was "particularly proud" of his legal arguments "that the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion." In meetings with senators, Judge Alito has talked about his respect for Roe, but he has said nothing to discourage his supporters on the religious right who back him because they believe he will vote to overturn it. The American people have a right to know, unambiguously, where Judge Alito stands on Roe.

PRESIDENTIAL POWER The continuing domestic wiretapping scandal shows that the Bush administration has a dangerous view of its own powers, and the Supreme Court is the most important check on such excesses. But Judge Alito has some disturbing views about handing the president even more power. He has argued that courts interpreting statutes should consider the president's intent when he signed the law to be just as important as Congress's intent in writing and passing the law. It is a radical suggestion that indicates he has an imperial view of presidential power.

CONGRESSIONAL POWER While Judge Alito seems intent on expanding the president's power, he has called for sharply reducing the power of Congress. In United States v. Rybar, he wrote a now-infamous dissent arguing that Congress exceeded its power in passing a law that banned machine guns. As a Reagan administration lawyer, he argued that Congress did not have the power to pass the Truth in Mileage Act to protect consumers from odometer fraud.

ONE PERSON ONE VOTE Judge Alito said in his 1985 application that he had become interested in constitutional law as a student partly because of his opposition to the Warren court's reapportionment rulings, which created the "one person one vote" standard. He seems to still have believed as a 35-year-old lawyer that these cases, which made legislative districts much more fair, came out the wrong way. ·

There are other areas - including civil rights, sex discrimination, the environment and criminal law - where Judge Alito's record appears extreme. The Senate should question him closely on all of them.

The Senate should also explore Judge Alito's honesty. According to a senator he met with, he tried to dismiss his statement about the Constitution's not protecting abortion as merely part of a job application, which suggests he will bend the truth when it suits his purposes. Judge Alito has said he does not recall being in an ultraconservative group called Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which opposed co-education and affirmative action. That is odd, since he boasted of his membership in that same 1985 job application. The tortuous history of his promise to Congress to recuse himself in cases involving the Vanguard companies, which he ultimately failed to do, should also be explored.

Judge Alito's nomination is often presented as an abortion rights showdown, but it is much more than that. Those who care about the broad range of rights and liberties that Americans now have, and about honesty in government, should tune into the hearings starting tomorrow - and call their senators with their reactions to what they hear.

Our Legal Guardians (LAT)

By Cass R. Sunstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

THE QUESTION underpinning all others at Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings Monday involves the role of the court in our society. Should it be "active" or "passive"? Should it defer to the president or to Congress?

Although such questions can be rephrased in many ways, the answer to them all should be straightforward: The Supreme Court's most important function is to vindicate the law and, in that way, to commit the United States to the rule of law, rather than of individual human beings. That means holding government — legislative and executive — accountable. This role matters in ordinary times, but it is crucial when the political pressure on the court is most intense. Consider:

· One of the nation's greatest presidents, Abraham Lincoln, suspended the writ of habeas corpus in the midst of the Civil War. The nation's chief justice, Roger B. Taney, invalidated the suspension on grounds that only Congress could do that.

· During the Depression, another great president, Franklin D. Roosevelt, fired a member of the Federal Trade Commission. The Supreme Court ruled that Roosevelt acted illegally and in violation of Congress' will.

· During the Korean War, President Truman seized the country's steel mills on grounds that the war effort would be jeopardized if the steel industry went on strike. The top court struck down Truman's action, ruling that the president needed Congress' authorization and that even the president must obey the law.

· In 2004, the court rejected President Bush's claim that in the war on terror, enemy combatants may be detained without a hearing. Carefully holding the president to the Constitution's requirements, it said that the founding document "most assuredly envisions a role for all three branches when individual liberties are at stake."

In protecting the rule of law, the Supreme Court's mere existence is every bit as important as its rulings. Government officials at all levels know the court might hold them to account if they discriminate on the basis of race, sex or religion, or violate the nation's environmental laws, or implement policies that infringe on free speech or the right to private property.

It is important to recognize that many of the court's most important decisions involve ordinary law, not the Constitution (except indirectly). During the Cold War, the court ruled that the secretary of State could not deny a passport to a communist because Congress had not granted the secretary the power to deny a passport on political grounds. More recently, it unanimously endorsed a broad reading of the Clean Air Act that required pollution controls that some members of the Bush administration didn't like. In areas involving consumer protection, energy policy, national security, animal welfare, automobile safety, telecommunications and much more, the Supreme Court greatly increases the likelihood that government will obey the law.

In all this, the court performs an indispensable democratic function simply because the law has been enacted by the people's representatives. But when it is working well, the court does much more to promote democracy. Most important, it safeguards freedom of speech and the right to vote, thus protecting what could be called the internal morality of democracy. A well-functioning system of self-government does not simply follow the majority's desires. At a minimum, it also immunizes political dissent and ensures the right of citizens to select their representatives.

To say this is not to say that the court has always performed its role well. In two different ways, it can sometimes badly serve the nation. The first — and the worse — is by striking down the decisions of the elected branches of government through judgments that reflect the justices' own views on public policy. The second is to capitulate to political will and allow the elected branches to violate the law.

In 1857, the court ruled, wrongly, that the Constitution entrenched slavery and thus banned freeing slaves in the Louisiana Territory. In the early decades of the 20th century, it held, wrongly, that the Constitution bans minimum-wage laws, maximum-hour laws and other government efforts to assist workers. The question of reproductive choice is much more controversial. But many people believe, not implausibly, that the court also was wrong to protect the right to choose abortion.

Since 1995, the Supreme Court has struck down more than 30 acts of Congress, including provisions of the Violence Against Women Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. In taking these stands and in striking down affirmative action programs and campaign finance regulation, the court has probably exceeded its proper bounds.

Nor is it difficult to find cases in which the court did not take the Constitution seriously enough. In 1896, it ruled that the Constitution permits racial segregation. In 1944, it allowed Japanese Americans on the West Coast to be placed in internment camps. Many people believe, not implausibly, that the court was wrong to uphold a Georgia law banning same-sex sodomy in 1986 — and that the court was right to overrule that ruling in 2003.

But more often than not, the court's independent role has served U.S. government exceedingly well.

The more important point is far broader. The rule of law cannot maintain itself on the goodwill of officials, even those who are democratically elected and accountable to the public. The rule of law is an immense but fragile achievement. In our system, the Supreme Court's most crucial role is to protect that achievement.

DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As GOP Leader (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay (Tex.), one of the most powerful and feared Republican leaders in Washington, abandoned his quest to regain his House majority leader post yesterday, bowing to pressure from fellow Republicans worried about the growing corruption and campaign finance scandals linked to his office.

DeLay's announcement in his home town of Sugar Land ends his decade-long tenure as a legislative juggernaut and conservative ideologue who revolutionized the relationship between power and money in Washington. It also cleared the way for a leadership contest that could further shake up the House GOP team going into an uncertain election year. House Speaker J.

Dennis Hastert (Ill.) said Republicans will choose a new majority leader and other officers the week of Jan. 30, when members return for President Bush's State of the Union address.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.), who has served as acting majority leader since September, when DeLay was forced to step down after his indictment on campaign finance charges, will ask his colleagues to make his post permanent. Sources close to House Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman John A. Boehner (Ohio) confirmed he will challenge Blunt.

But dark horse candidates are likely to emerge, including the ideological conservative Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.) and veteran House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (Calif.).

"There has been this desperate plea for someone to take charge," said Charles Cook, an independent political analyst. Republicans "are looking for some leadership, someone that has some sense of what they ought to be doing."

DeLay, 58, who served as House majority whip for eight years before becoming majority leader in late 2002, had resolved to return to the leadership since he was indicted by a Texas grand jury on charges of money laundering and conspiracy linked to his efforts to finance state political campaigns. DeLay contended the indictments were a political vendetta by the Democratic Travis County prosecutor, Ronnie Earle, and until recently most Republicans supported that view.

But last week's guilty pleas by Republican lobbyist and DeLay ally Jack Abramoff dramatically changed the political climate, according to many lawmakers and political experts. A source close to the Republican leadership said DeLay was counseled by senior Republicans, including House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (Calif.), but that DeLay ultimately made the decision, calling Hastert yesterday morning.

"I am writing to inform you of my decision to permanently step aside as majority leader, and of my belief that the best interests of the conference would be served by the election of a new leader as soon as possible," DeLay wrote in a letter to Hastert. "The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions."

He vowed to reclaim his seat on the Appropriations Committee and to run for reelection in what appears to be a difficult race against a former House member, Democrat Nick Lampson, and possibly a primary challenger in former representative Steve Stockman.

In a second letter to his colleagues calling for a leadership election, DeLay said, "During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out. However, we live in serious times and the United States House of Representatives must be focused on the job of protecting our nation and meeting the daily challenges facing the American people. History has proven that when House Republicans are united and focused, success follows."

DeLay has maintained he has nothing to fear from the Abramoff corruption and bribery inquiry. But federal investigators signaled they are inching closer to his office when, on Tuesday, they highlighted the activities of his former deputy chief of staff, Tony C. Rudy, in Abramoff's plea agreement.

Although DeLay's hard-edged political style and tactics frequently drew complaints over the years, his political and legal problems first began to emerge in 2004. At that time, he was admonished by the House ethics committee for holding a social event with energy industry officials as the House was considering an energy bill and for enlisting the Federal Aviation Administration to track down Texas Democratic lawmakers fleeing the state to avoid a vote on a congressional redistricting bill DeLay helped draft.

DeLay's court fight in Texas, which he had hoped would be quickly resolved, has been dragging on, complicating any return to the GOP leadership, but it was Abramoff's plea agreement with prosecutors that ultimately forced DeLay's downfall.

"DeLay is the first political casualty of Abramoff affair," said Republican political strategist Rich Galen. "I don't think there's any question about that."

DeLay's departure deprives House Republicans of their strongest leader and an unparalleled political tactician, said Stuart Rothenberg, a congressional expert. Since he stepped down in late September, the party has had a series of high-profile embarrassments in failing to pass legislation. Republican moderates split with conservatives on the key issues of immigration, social policy and spending. The ensuing sense of drift, as much as the scandals, fueled a rank-and-file desire for change, Cook said.

"Republicans never drifted aimlessly while Tom DeLay was in charge, and the last three months have just been a horror show," Cook said.

DeLay's decision also deprives Democrats of the political villain they have been cultivating since the departure of House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) in 1998, Cook and Rothenberg said. Democrats will try to keep the public focused on DeLay, Rothenberg said, and yesterday they did just that, giving the departing leader an unfriendly farewell.

"For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

Just how anxious Republicans are to avoid such charges could determine the next leadership team, political analysts said. Blunt enters the race as the favorite, with the current chief deputy whip, Rep. Eric I. Cantor (Va.), expected to take over as House majority whip. But some members question Blunt's effectiveness in passing legislation, while some conservatives doubt his commitment to a strong GOP policy agenda, House members and GOP strategists said. If members think that the departure of DeLay from the scene is not enough to satisfy voters that the party is taking the scandals seriously enough, then Blunt's bid to become leader might be threatened.

The other likely candidate, Boehner, is a former member of the House leadership with close ties to Washington's lobbying community and may have difficulty picking up the banner of reform, Rothenberg said.

That could give an opening to a dark horse, perhaps Pence, the chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, or Rep. John Shadegg (Ariz.), another conservative seen by many as a more collegial candidate than Pence.

"Congressman Shadegg has been approached by a number of members, including both conservatives and moderates, who have encouraged him to consider seeking this position," Shadegg spokesman Michael Steel said of the majority leader's post. "He is, of course, honored and flattered. However, there are a lot factors involved. There are others who are interested in the position, some of whom may already have substantial support. He is seeking further input from his colleagues in the conference, and has not made any decision."

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) may have signaled his bid for a leadership post when he issued a statement on DeLay's departure before anyone else, GOP political strategists said. Rogers, formerly an FBI agent who focused on public corruption, would be attractive to members looking for a new image.

"It all depends on how frightened the members are, how much of a statement they need to make that they're shaking up their leadership and embracing a statement of change and reform," Rothenberg said.

DeLay Ends Leadership Fight (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON – Unable to shake his legal troubles and with colleagues in open revolt over a widening corruption scandal, Rep. Tom DeLay gave up his claim Saturday to the powerful job of House majority leader.

FILE Tom DeLay

Mr. DeLay had been forced to temporarily step aside in September after his indictment on state money laundering and campaign finance charges, but he defiantly hung on until events spun beyond his control. Jack Abramoff, a lobbyist he once called a close friend, cut a deal last week to tell the FBI everything he knows about bribery in Congress. And Friday, dozens of GOP House members mounted a revolt by demanding elections to replace Mr. DeLay permanently.

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," Mr. DeLay told supporters at a hastily called event Saturday afternoon at Sugar Land City Hall, with his wife, Christine, at his side. "In the 21 years I have been in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of the House and the laws of our land, and time once again will bear out that truth."

He vowed to continue to seek re-election to his Houston-area district despite the lobbying scandal and his impending state trial.

The decision will mean a scramble among House Republicans, who will choose a successor Jan. 31 when they return to work. But analysts and Democrats said it won't let the party off the hook.

"It takes a little of bit of the taint of scandal away from the Republicans ... but we'll see who gets caught up in Abramoff's web," said James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University.

The Fallout

Rep. Tom DeLay has decided he won't try to reclaim his job as majority leader of the House. The following are some of the things that could affect.

His re-election campaign: Mr. DeLay says he'll seek a 12th term from his Houston-area district. Three Republicans have filed to run against him in the March 7 primary, and they've made ethics a central theme. So has Democrat Nick Lampson, a former congressman who lost his Beaumont-based seat after redistricting and will run for Mr. DeLay's seat. Former GOP Rep. Steve Stockman said last week that he'll run as an independent, and if he makes it onto the November ballot, he could siphon conservative support from Mr. DeLay, who won with just 55 percent in 2004 against an unknown Democrat. Because Mr. DeLay is no longer majority leader, it's unclear how much money will pour into the race on either side.

His criminal charges: The decision is unlikely to affect the charges he faces in Travis County. Mr. DeLay's attorneys had wanted a quick trial to clear the way for him to return as majority leader.

Republicans: Mr. DeLay's decision may help House Republicans, who've benefited from his tactical and fundraising prowess but have also seen their popularity plummet nationally amid headline-making scandals in which he often had a role.

Democrats: They no longer can target Mr. DeLay as a top Republican leader, but his troubles still give them ammo for the midterm elections.

Texas: The Lone Star State loses some congressional clout, but it still has President Bush and plenty of other Texans throughout the administration.

From staff and wire reports

Democrats were hardly willing to accept the news and move on.

"For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay. ... A single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi.

Abramoff's shadow

When Mr. Abramoff's ex-partner, former DeLay aide Michael Scanlon, agreed a few weeks ago to cooperate with prosecutors, the pressure began to grow exponentially. Lawmakers focused on the likelihood that Mr. Abramoff would seek a plea deal and cooperate with investigators, which he did. Tuesday, he pleaded guilty to fraud, bribery of another House member and tax evasion.

Mr. Abramoff provided lavish overseas trips and a great deal of campaign cash to Mr. DeLay, and federal authorities are reportedly looking at the ties between the lobbyist and Mr. DeLay, other lawmakers and congressional aides.

"When you get photographs of Abramoff coming out of court, it just drives home to members how immediate the threat is," said Stuart Rothenberg, publisher of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report , calling Mr. DeLay's decision "an attempt obviously to remove him as a major issue from the midterm elections."

A host of Republicans issued laudatory statements, but few had tried to talk him out of quitting.

Speaker Dennis Hastert had prolonged Mr. DeLay's survival for months, tamping down demands for an election to replace him permanently after his indictment Sept. 28 and scheduling an unusually long six-week winter recess to give Mr. DeLay time to fight the Travis County money laundering charges.

No details have emerged about whether Mr. Hastert eventually urged Mr. DeLay to quit. But when a coalition of moderates and some conservatives began circulating a petition Friday to force a leadership election when the House returns to work Jan. 31, the speaker made no effort to discourage them.

"I respect Congressman Tom DeLay's judgment to step down as majority leader of the House of Representatives. It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Mr. Hastert said Saturday.

Wielding clout

Mr. DeLay has been admonished by the House ethics committee three times for ethical lapses.

In 2004, he drew two admonishments, for appearing to provide "special access" to a Kansas utility firm in exchange for a $25,000 political contribution and for offering to help the candidacy of Michigan lawmaker's son if the lawmaker provided a crucial vote on Medicare.

In 1999, the panel chastised Mr. DeLay for threatening a major trade group that hired a former Democratic congressman as its top executive.

For DeLay watchers, it was all part of the lawmaker's push-the-envelope style.

As majority leader for just over three years, Mr. DeLay became more powerful in the view of many historians than any predecessor since Texan Sam Rayburn in the 1930s, or perhaps Joseph Cannon in the early 1900s. Both became House speakers.

But Mr. DeLay was always too hot for that post, too in-your-face and in the modern age, not quite telegenic enough. He rarely made himself available for the Sunday talk show circuit, though he excelled as a strategist.

His signal institutional effect was in transforming the balance of power within the House. Committee chairmen now face term limits and owe their jobs to a handful of party leaders. The close alliance he forged with K Street – the army of well-paid lobbyists, many of them former lawmakers and aides – allowed him to steer money toward favored candidates, maintaining the GOP majority and ensuring personal loyalty.

"He was stronger than Jim Wright, stronger than Tip O'Neill, stronger than others," Dr. Thurber said. "He couldn't be speaker, but he became a very influential figure. And controversial. ... That is ultimately his downfall."

One colleague who joined Mr. DeLay at his announcement Saturday, Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands, called Mr. DeLay "a force of nature" and said he will "remain a true conservative leader," though "Texas will miss his influence as majority leader."

Redrawing the lines

Mr. DeLay also orchestrated the mid-decade redrawing of the Texas political landscape.

Redistricting flipped six House districts from Democrats to Republicans, bolstering the GOP's slim majority but touching off legal fights on many fronts. Redistricting required the skills of a chessmaster or a Napoleon – selling donors on an untested stratagem, electing enough new Republicans to the Texas Legislature, pressuring a reluctant governor and lieutenant governor to take on the issue, and ultimately winning.

But the tactics drew the attention of Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, and Mr. DeLay and several aides face felony charges stemming from their efforts. Mr. DeLay has denied the charges.

"He was his own worst enemy," Dr. Thurber said. "His arrogance with respect to his power and the power of the money he was bringing in for the campaigns to helped people and hurt people – I think he lost sight of sound judgment."

Before his days as a politician, Mr. DeLay owned a pest exterminating business. The red tape and taxes drove him to distraction, he has said, and he ended up running for the Texas House, where he made friends easily with colleagues in both parties, and acquired the nickname "Hot Tub Tom." Along the way he realized he was neglecting his family and partying too much. He went to Congress 21 years ago, taking on a far more partisan edge and moving up GOP ranks quickly.

Newt Gingrich led the GOP takeover in 1994 and became speaker. Mr. DeLay ran for the No. 3 job, majority whip. Mr. Hastert ran Mr. DeLay's campaign and became his chief deputy.

Over the next eight years as whip, Mr. DeLay collected and exercised growing clout through a network of more than 60 deputy and assistant whips. During late-night sessions, he served meals to members, and he lent his office for hundreds of meetings. No one catered to the rank and file better, and no one had a better sense of their needs, moods and pressure points.

He took on a new nickname, "The Hammer," because those who crossed him learned to regret it. Moderates were passed over for chairmanships. Critics lost pork-barrel projects.

When Mr. Gingrich was forced out after electoral setbacks in 1998, the speaker's job went to Mr. DeLay's lieutenant, the affable Mr. Hastert. Naturally, Mr. DeLay was seen as the power behind the speaker.

And when Dallas-area Rep. Dick Armey retired as majority leader, the post went easily to Mr. DeLay.

AP Surrounded by supporters in Sugar Land, Rep. Tom DeLay announced his decision to abandon his bid to remain as House majority leader Saturday.

Political scientist Earl Black of Rice University in Houston called Mr. DeLay the last of a breed: the Southern Republicans who led the House since 1994, with bases in safe districts that gave them maneuvering room to push conservative causes without political risk.

"It's just an example of the ferocious nature of national politics. Any mistakes that leaders make are certainly going to be pounced on," Dr. Black said.

Many foes

Mr. DeLay certainly made enemies along the way. Democrats despised him as an unyielding and extremely effective opponent who preferred a one-vote victory on a divisive bill to a wide margin on a piece of compromise legislation.

And Mr. Gingrich never forgot that in 1997, Mr. DeLay was an active plotter in an attempt to oust the speaker. Mr. DeLay was contrite when the plot failed. But last week, after Mr. Abramoff's guilty plea, Mr. Gingrich was the most prominent Republican to call for Mr. DeLay's resignation.

"It's obvious that Gingrich played a major role in this. He disliked DeLay and was just laying in wait to even the score," said Martin Frost, a Dallas Democrat who lost his House seat after 24 years because of redistricting.

He said the combination of Mr. DeLay's legal troubles and the prospect of what Mr. Abramoff might tell prosecutors pushed Mr. DeLay past the point of survival.

But Mr. DeLay was more effective than any likely successor, and it will be hard for the party to shake off the taint he's brought.

"He held them together through intimidations and threats," Mr. Frost said. "They're going to have to do a lot more than this. The entire Republican Party is in trouble."

But Rep. John Carter, R-Round Rock, one of Mr. DeLay's staunchest defenders, said he was disappointed that "some weak sisters" in the House GOP let their worries spin out of control.

"Without any evidence, people were hanging Abramoff around his neck," Mr. Carter said. "It's a sad day for Texas to lose the majority leader, but there were a lot of people who thought he ought to leave. I'm very disappointed. He's losing this over something that, when this issue is resolved in Austin, he will be exonerated."

Rep. Michael Burgess, R-Flower Mound, called the decision "one of innumerable selfless acts on his part. ... Leadership is not merely a position but an innate quality that Tom has in spades."

1 Fix, More Problems For GOP (LAT)

By Janet Hook, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Tom DeLay's decision to stop battling for his former House leadership job helps remove a huge distraction from Republican efforts to recover from a stormy 2005 that put President Bush and the party on the defensive.

But DeLay's Saturday announcement that he was giving up his bid may create as many problems as it solves.

It has set off a divisive power struggle to succeed him as the House's permanent majority leader — and could spark the overthrow of other leaders.

Also, whoever is picked to succeed DeLay will be thrust into a job that, now more than ever, requires the kind of iron-fisted leadership that was the Texas Republican's trademark.

Bush's second-term priorities — overhauling Social Security and rewriting the tax code — have faltered, and Republicans are struggling to refocus on an agenda of cutting taxes, reducing federal spending and cracking down on illegal immigration. But the fate of these initiatives is cloudy.

House Republicans had shown signs of splintering late last year, after DeLay was forced to temporarily give up his leadership post because of his indictment in Texas on money laundering charges.

"While Tom DeLay was a public-relations nightmare, he also was a strong leader, a talented vote counter, arm twister and strategist," said Charlie Cook, a Washington political analyst who publishes the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "Since he stepped down three months ago, it's been a horror show for House Republicans."

DeLay was clearly missed by his colleagues, but he also had become damaged goods. And after former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who had close ties to DeLay, pleaded guilty last week to corruption charges and sent many Republicans running for political cover, it became clear to some that DeLay would have to go if the GOP had any hope of changing the subject in this year's congressional campaigns.

"You don't want that kind of distraction moving forward in 2006," said Bill McInturff, a Republican pollster. Now, every Republican House member "doesn't have to go around answering the question, 'Do you think Tom DeLay should resign?' "

Instead, Republicans face another political question: How much more do they need to do — in making leadership changes and embracing legislative initiatives such as tighter rules for lobbyists — to truly distance their party from the taint of the Abramoff scandal?

Some Republicans believe an aggressive anti-corruption agenda is needed. They argue that although DeLay may no longer loom as a leadership figure, his imprint will remain on the way the party raises money and conducts legislative strategy.

Over the last decade, DeLay built powerful new connections between the party and Washington's "K Street" lobbying corridor, harnessing the finances and political support of various interest groups behind a conservative agenda. His skill in doing so gave the GOP strong fundraising advantages, but it created an atmosphere of coziness that Abramoff was able to exploit.

Some of the House's junior Republican members are saying that if the GOP wants to burnish its image with the public, perhaps fresh faces should be brought into the leadership ranks. Although House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared secure in his post, other leaders might be challenged.

Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.) called Saturday for a "potential housecleaning" and full disclosure of GOP leaders' relationships with lobbyists.

"We have to reaffirm that the people who are in positions of leadership have the credentials, the moral credibility, to lead," he said.

Still, the Republicans initially being mentioned as contenders for majority leader have been close to DeLay and are skilled players in the political fundraising machine he established.

Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the majority whip temporarily serving as majority leader, is a DeLay protege who received $8,500 in campaign contributions linked to Abramoff. Last week, he announced he would give that amount to charity.

In June 2003, the Washington Post reported that Blunt had tried to insert into legislation a provision benefiting Philip Morris USA Co. at a time when he had a close personal relationship with its lobbyist and when his son worked for the cigarette maker.

Another possible candidate for majority leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, also had financial links to Abramoff.

According to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, he received $32,500 in campaign contributions from Abramoff and the lobbyist's clients — more than DeLay did.

And in the mid-1990s, Boehner was criticized by public interest groups for passing out campaign contributions from tobacco companies to lawmakers on the House floor.

If Blunt or Boehner became majority leader, it would leave them open to Democratic charges that they remain steeped in a "culture of corruption" in Washington.

"Neither [Blunt nor Boehner] presents a stark change in the leadership," said a Republican strategist who asked not to be named when discussing the two lawmakers. "There is a certain amount of sympathy for generation-skipping, for reaching outside the leadership circle entirely" in finding a successor to DeLay.

That approach, however, would risk delegating power to a lawmaker with less experience in the complex business of running the House.

The challenges of that job became clear when Blunt took over temporarily from DeLay. The House struggled to pass crucial budget bills and postponed final action on Bush's tax cut proposals.

"There is a lot of concern about who can actually do the job," said former Rep. Vin Weber (R-Minn.), who remains in close touch with party leaders. "It has become clear that DeLay was the centerpiece holding the [House] Republican majority together. People understand they have to run the place. It's not just about PR."

Some Republicans believe that Bush might have to step into the breach and play a more aggressive role in advancing his legislative agenda.

"He may have to take a little bit more time and a little bit more involvement in getting some of the tough part of this agenda through," said Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.).

Whatever Republicans do in their new leadership elections, the team that emerges probably will benefit from shedding the shaky status of the temporary leadership structure that has been in place.

"It's very sad for [DeLay], but I think it's an opportunity for clarity and a sense of mission for an election year," said Mark Isakowitz, a Republican lobbyist close to House leaders.

DeLay Halts Bid To Regain House Post (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Faced with increasing anger from his fellow Republicans, Representative Tom DeLay of Texas announced yesterday that he will no longer seek to regain his post as majority leader. The decision brought an end to the leadership career of one of the most powerful and polarizing members of Congress.

DeLay's announcement was made less than 24 hours after moderate and conservative lawmakers began circulating a petition demanding that he be permanently replaced as majority leader. That effort was launched after the indictment of Jack Abramoff, in a scandal that threatens to envelop a wide range of lawmakers.

The move sets the stage for a potentially divisive vote next month in which Republicans will choose a new majority leader, the second-ranking leadership post in the House of Representatives, as November's congressional elections approach. Within hours of DeLay's announcement, several candidates were reported to be contacting colleagues to line up support.

In a letter to his fellow Republicans, DeLay said he remains confident that he would be cleared of wrongdoing. But he said he recognized that Republicans must choose a new majority leader to move beyond the distractions that his legal woes have brought.

"The United States House of Representatives must be focused on the job of protecting our nation and meeting the daily challenges facing the American people," DeLay wrote.

"History has proven that when House Republicans are united and focused, success follows," DeLay continued. "While we wage these important battles, I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention."

DeLay's ties to Abramoff are drawing close scrutiny, and the Texas Republican is also under indictment in an unrelated matter involving allegations of money laundering in a campaign-financing plan. Under House Republican rules, that indictment forced him to resign as majority leader on a temporary basis, but until yesterday DeLay had insisted that he would return after being cleared.

The New York Times reported on its website yesterday that prosecutors are also looking at questions of influence-peddling by a lobbying firm founded by Edwin A. Buckham, a close DeLay friend and his former chief of staff. The firm promoted the idea that it could deliver access to DeLay, and paid DeLay's wife $115,000 in consulting fees, the Times reported.

DeLay said he would continue to serve in his suburban Houston district. He will seek a 12th term this fall, in what promises to be a tough campaign against Nick Lampson, a Democrat and a former congressman.

The move robs Republicans of one of their most talented and aggressive vote-counters, as the GOP agenda has begun to stall and as President Bush and congressional leaders wrestle with sagging approval ratings.

While members pushed to oust DeLay in part out of fear about their own reelection prospects this fall, the revolt that led DeLay to step aside could send the opposite message to voters. DeLay's decision to resign on the heels of the Abramoff plea might suggest a "hint of guilt," said Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

"The dam has broken," Zelizer said. "Democrats clearly have a big opportunity to develop the theme of Republicans and the culture of corruption. This is a big blow to the Republican Party."

But rank-and-file Republicans had a different read on the political landscape. Selecting a new majority leader will allow Republicans to distance themselves from the scandals that swirled around DeLay, and to develop changes in ethics laws that would show a renewed commitment to responsible governance, said Representative Charles F. Bass, a New Hampshire Republican who has led efforts to hold new elections.

"The person who replaces Tom DeLay as permanent majority leader needs to define an agenda for the party that works, and have some specific ideas about what we need to do with ethics," Bass said.

"It's bad news for the Democrats and good news for Republicans and the integrity of the political process," added Bass.

The House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert had tried to keep the party's divisions under wraps by keeping the majority leader's post open for DeLay while he sought to weather his legal storm. After DeLay was indicted in September, Hastert orchestrated a power-sharing arrangement in which the majority whip, Roy Blunt of Missouri, took over DeLay's job temporarily, and in which other members assumed Blunt's responsibilities.

But with the 2006 elections looming, in which all 435 House seats are on the ballot, moderate Republicans grew increasingly concerned about being tarred by their association with DeLay. They teamed with a younger crop of conservative House members who have chafed at DeLay's hard-nosed leadership style and what they viewed as straying from the party's goals of fiscal discipline and high ethical standards.

The frustrations culminated in the petition drive demanding new leadership elections, launched Friday morning by Bass, a moderate, and Representative Jeff Flake of Arizona, a conservative.

Within hours, Flake and Bass had gathered more than half of the 50 signatures they needed to force a meeting to discuss new elections, and word quickly spread among GOP House members that they would gather 50 by early this week.

DeLay initially dismissed talk of a new election. His spokesman issued a statement Friday afternoon expressing DeLay's confidence that he continued to enjoy the support of a majority of House Republicans.

But any chance that DeLay might have had of hanging on seemed to evaporate by Friday evening. Mindful of the dissension within his caucus, a Hastert aide issued a statement saying that the speaker had always said he would allow members to revisit the leadership situation in early 2006.

It was not an endorsement of a new election. But the statement was an unmistakable signal that Hastert would not lend his political weight to helping his lieutenant regain the post.

"The speaker knew that a leadership election was going to happen," Flake said. "I was happy to see that Tom DeLay did the right thing, and I applaud him for it. This is the best thing for the party."

Hastert said yesterday that a new majority leader would be elected in the week of Jan. 31, when the House is scheduled to begin its 2006 session. He applauded DeLay's move.

"It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Hastert said in a statement. "We expect that Tom will continue to help House Republicans succeed with our agenda as we move forward this year."

Democrats served notice that they still intend to use DeLay as an election issue, along with other high-profile ethics-related cases.

Representative Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said the GOP cannot run from what he described as a philosophy' that caters to special interests.

"By forcing out Tom DeLay, Republicans have addressed a party problem, but not the institutional problem of corruption that most troubles the American people," said Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat.

"With the permanence of their special-interest philosophy, a change in the Republican cast of characters simply doesn't matter," Emanuel added in a statement.

Hastert is expected to back Blunt for majority leader, but the race could be a free-for-all. Representative John A. Boehner an Ohio Republican and chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee, is expected to be a front-runner. Boehner made calls to his supporters yesterday, and a source close to the congressman said he is likely to run.

Other potential candidates are Representatives Mike Pence, of Indiana and chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee; Jerry Lewis, of California and chairman of the House Appropriations Committee; and John B. Shadegg, of Arizona, chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee.

Flake said the party needs a full debate about its future and the caucus would benefit from electing a leader who represents a clean break with the current regime. He said he has made no commitments.

"Speaker Hastert wants a united front," Flake said. "But we really can't have that here, because we need the candidates to put together a reform agenda, and say, 'Here's the course correction that I envision.' We don't just need new leaders; we need a course correction, and unless we have it, we're going to be in the minority."

DeLay Gives Up Bid To Reclaim House Post (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP, January 8, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay, the defiant face of a conservative revolution in Congress, stepped down as House majority leader on Saturday under pressure from Republicans staggered by an election-year corruption scandal.

"During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land," the Texas lawmaker told fellow Republicans in a letter informing them of his decision.

Still, referring to criminal charges he faces in his home state, he added, "I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention."

DeLay temporarily gave up his leadership post after he was charged, but always insisted he would reclaim his duties after clearing his name.

His turnabout cleared the way for leadership elections among Republicans buffeted by poor polls and by lobbyist Jack Abramoff's confessions of guilt on corruption charges in connection with congressional wining and dining.

The race to replace Delay as majority leader began taking shape immediately, with Reps. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the GOP whip, and John Boehner of Ohio, a former member of the leadership, making clear their intentions to run. Rep. Jerry Lewis of California declined to say whether he would join them.

Speaker Dennis Hastert, his own grip on power secure, said he expects elections to be held when lawmakers return to the Capitol the week of Jan. 31. That set the stage for several weeks of political maneuvering, and the possibility of a wholesale shuffle in the leadership lineup 10 months before midterm elections.

Democrats, eager to take control of the House in November, reacted to DeLay's announcement with studied indifference.

"The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader.

Added Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic campaign organization: "With the permanence of their special interest philosophy, a change in the Republican cast of characters simply doesn't matter."

Democrats must gain 15 seats in November to win control of the 435-member House.

At a news conference in Texas, DeLay said he had called Hastert, R-Ill., on Saturday to inform him of his decision. "Our success in lowering taxes, creating jobs, growing the economy and providing effective national security was helped by Tom Delay's leadership," the speaker said in a statement.

The 58-year-old DeLay, an exterminator before his election to Congress in 1984, said he intends to seek re-election next fall. "I plan to run a very vigorous campaign and I plan to win it," he told reporters in Texas.

The voters aside, his political future will hinge not only on the outcome of the Texas allegations, but on the future of the Abramoff investigation.

Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay aide and an Abramoff business partner, pleaded guilty in the fall to corruption charges. In court papers, the lobbyist said he had once paid $50,000 to the wife of another former DeLay aide to help kill legislation opposed by his clients.

DeLay has been a fixture in the Republican leadership since the GOP won its majority in the 1994 election landslide.

An outsider at first, he muscled his way up the hierarchy when he won election as whip over the hand-picked choice of then-Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga.

When Gingrich nearly fell in a coup more than three years later, DeLay went before fellow Republicans at a private meeting and emotionally confessed his role in the plotting. He prospered politically, moving up to become majority leader, the No. 2 post, in 1999.

Contrition was never a quality he displayed to his adversaries — Democrats, outside interest groups and others who sought to check the advance of the conservative GOP agenda he promoted.

DeLay raised millions of dollars for the campaigns of fellow House Republicans, conservatives and moderates alike, earning their gratitude regardless of their ideology. He courted controversy almost reflexively, including his involvement in an attempt to force corporations and industry groups to hire more Republican lobbyists.

He rarely backed down.

DeLay was the driving force behind President Clinton's impeachment in 1999, weeks after Republicans lost seats at the polls in a campaign in which they tried to make an issue of Clinton's personal behavior.

DeLay's downfall began at home in Texas, when he led a drive to redraw the state's congressional district boundaries and increase the number of GOP seats in the U.S. House. He succeeded, but was soon ensnared in an investigation involving the use of corporate funds in the campaigns of Texas legislators who had participated in the redistricting.

Flashing his trademark defiance, DeLay attacked prosecutor Ronnie Earle as an "unabashed partisan zealot." He pledged repeatedly to clear his name and said he would reclaim his duties as majority leader by the end of January.

The scandal spawned by Abramoff intervened, though.

Within two days of the lobbyist's appearances in federal court last week, GOP lawmakers began circulating petitions calling for elections. Hastert immediately made clear he would not stand in the way.

`After the Abramoff thing we got critical mass," said Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., who long had advocated new leadership.

While Flake is a conservative in a safe congressional district, others suddenly calling for change were more moderate Republicans who could face difficult re-election campaigns this fall.

New Mexico's Heather Wilson was among them.

She said three of DeLay's "former senior staff members have admitted or have been implicated in corrupt and illegal activities to get money for themselves by influencing legislation. Whether or not Mr. DeLay was involved himself or knew this was going on, he is responsible for his office."

DeLay Ends Bid To Reclaim Majority Leader Post (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, January 8, 2006

U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay, now under indictment in Texas and tainted by a corruption scandal, told fellow House of Representatives Republicans on Saturday that he will not try to reclaim his job as majority leader.

"Today I have asked Speaker (Dennis) Hastert to convene our conference for the purpose of electing a new majority leader," DeLay, a close ally of President George W. Bush and one of the most powerful conservatives in Congress, said in a letter to House Republican leaders.

Later, at a Sugar Land, Texas, appearance surrounded by supporters, DeLay said he would remain in Congress and campaign for re-election in November. "In 21 years in Congress I have always acted in an ethical manner ... and time once again will bear out that truth."

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," he said.

DeLay's decision to resign after three years of tumultuous reign as majority leader set off a scramble among at least a handful of Republicans who want to capture the second most powerful post in the House.

Whoever wins will face the difficult job of steering the party past the influence-peddling scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff that has rocked Washington just as all 435 members of the House gear up for November elections.

Abramoff earlier this week pleaded guilty to fraud charges and admitted that he gave golf trips, sports tickets and other gifts to lawmakers in return for special treatment.

His potential cooperation with federal investigators left lawmakers rattled and many returned campaign contributions from Abramoff clients.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, said DeLay had "engineered" a "culture of corruption ... so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

The White House, which earlier in the week said it would be shedding some Abramoff campaign contributions, supported DeLay's action. "We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first," said spokeswoman Erin Healy.

HOUSE JOB OPEN

Acting Majority Leader Roy Blunt of Missouri is expected to seek DeLay's job on a more permanent basis. Blunt took over the job in September when DeLay was forced to temporarily resign after being indicted in his home state of Texas in a campaign finance case. Those charges were unrelated to the Abramoff scandal.

At the time, DeLay insisted that he would be cleared in the Texas case and would retake the powerful majority leader job.

Ohio Republican John Boehner, chairman of an education and labor committee, is also expected to mount a strong challenge for majority leader.

Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said the elections likely will held during the week of January 31 when the House reconvenes after a long winter break.

Some House Republicans have talked about the need to elect all new leaders, but key lawmakers this week said they did not think Hastert would be challenged.

DeLay, 58, known around Washington as "The Hammer" for his tight control of the House and ability to vanquish political opponents, said in a letter to Hastert he will "work to clear my name of the baseless charges leveled against me."

He also said he will reclaim his seat on the powerful House Appropriations Committee, which controls much of federal spending, including a major NASA space center in his district.

DeLay's decision to leave the Republican leadership came after a group of moderate and conservative House Republicans abandoned their leader and called for elections to replace him.

DeLay's support among rank-and-file Republicans evaporated after Abramoff's guilty pleas this week. At least two former aides of DeLay are entangled in the Abramoff scandal and DeLay has referred to the former lobbyist as a close friend.

In his resignation letter, DeLay said he had "always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out."

DeLay, who has blamed his legal troubles on partisan Democrats, said he "cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention" from legislative work.

DeLay Says He Won't Seek To Return As Majority Leader (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, January 8, 2006

Jan. 7 (Bloomberg) -- Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said he will abandon his drive to return to the post of No. 2 House Republican, bowing to the growing clamor in his party for elections to replace him and setting up a succession battle.

In a letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert and a separate letter to all House Republican colleagues, DeLay for the first time acknowledged that a legal battle in Texas is unlikely to be resolved anytime soon, and said it is time for his party to move ahead without him.

``The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," DeLay wrote in his letter to Hastert.

DeLay, a Texas Republican, said he will seek re-election and return to a seat on the House Appropriations Committee. DeLay said he will continue to work to clear his name ``of the baseless charges leveled against me."

``I will continue to serve my constituents," DeLay said in comments this afternoon to reporters and about 60 supporters in his district at Sugar Land City Hall in Sugar Land, Texas, about 20 miles southwest of Houston. ``I plan to run a very vigorous campaign. I plan to win it."

Hastert said in a statement that House Republicans will hold elections the week of Jan. 31, when the House returns to work for 2006.

``It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Hastert said of DeLay's decision.

Federal Investigation

DeLay faces money-laundering charges in Texas, and a guilty plea Jan. 3 by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff threatens to draw DeLay and other lawmakers into a federal corruption probe. DeLay was forced under House Republican caucus rules to step aside as majority leader in late September after his indictment by a Texas grand jury, and House Majority Whip Roy Blunt has been holding both roles temporarily.

Blunt has indicated that he would like to run in leadership elections to replace DeLay. Both Blunt and another candidate, House Education and Workforce Committee Chairman John Boehner of Ohio, put out statements praising DeLay, a Republican leader since 1992 and majority leader for three years.

``My belief is that Tom will eventually be cleared and exonerated, and my hope is that our conference will one day again benefit from Tom's rare commitment to the principles of smaller government and freedom for which all Republicans fight," Boehner said in an e-mailed statement.

Midterm Elections

Republicans, who control the White House and both houses of Congress, face midterm elections in November. All 435 seats in the U.S. House of Representatives are up for grabs and a third of the U.S. Senate. Democrats are angling to use DeLay's legal troubles and ethics questions involving other Republicans as an issue in this year's elections.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said DeLay's decision shouldn't resolve concerns of those who question whether the Republican party is ensnared in a ``culture of corruption."

``For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay," Pelosi said. ``The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

New Poll

A new poll released today by AP-Ipsos suggests Democrats may have an opening. The Jan. 3-5 poll of 1,001 adults found that 49 preferred to see Democrats control Congress, while 36 percent want to see Republicans stay in charge. The poll had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

DeLay made his decision a day after two House Republicans -- Charles Bass of New Hampshire and Jeff Flake of Arizona -- began circulating a petition among House Republicans needed to start the election process.

DeLay had requested a speedy trial in Texas in an effort to resolve that case, which stems from allegations of illegal fundraising to help elect more Republicans to the Texas statehouse in 2002. Still, he faces a second potential problem after Abramoff pleaded guilty this week to tax evasion, wire fraud and conspiring to corrupt public officials in cases in Washington and Miami.

Golfing Trip

Abramoff is cooperating as prosecutors investigate possible corruption of members of Congress, their aides and former staffers. While DeLay has not been directly implicated, he went on a golfing trip to the U.K. with the lobbyist in 2000. In October, investigators questioned the staff of former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher over a visit DeLay made to her office while on the U.K. trip.

DeLay's former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, has been identified by people close to the investigation as one of the subjects of the probe. DeLay's attorney, Robert Cullen, insists that his client has little to fear in the Justice Department's corruption probe.

Once employed as a pest exterminator, DeLay entered Congress two decades ago after six years in the Texas statehouse. He is the only remaining House leader who served with former Speaker Newt Gingrich after Republicans retook the House in 1994. He initially served as the party's vote-counting ``whip," and his arm-twisting skills earned him the nickname ``The Hammer."

Top Fundraiser

DeLay has been one of the top fundraisers for his party, and consolidated his party's power by demanding that corporations and trade associations hire more Republicans as lobbyists. The tide began to turn against him after his efforts to help Republicans control the statehouse in Texas to redraw congressional district boundaries to favor Republicans. While Republicans picked up five additional U.S. House seats in that state in 2004 as a result of his effort, it triggered charges related to allegedly illegal use of corporate donations to elect statehouse candidates.

DeLay's re-election to his Houston-area district isn't assured. He won his 2004 re-election with 55 percent of the vote. He faces three Republican primary challengers and a general election against former Democratic Representative Nick Lampson. Lampson is one of the Democrats who lost his seat after the DeLay-directed redistricting, and the campaign is becoming a national cause for Democratic donors.

Chris Bell, a former Democratic Congressman who filed one of the original ethics complaints against DeLay and lost his seat after the Texas districts were redrawn, said in a telephone interview that ``today's announcement represents a victory for ethics reform."

``While Tom DeLay was in power there was no way ethics reform would have been possible," said Bell, who is a candidate for governor in the Texas Democratic primary in March. ``You can't put partisanship above everything else."

Reaction To DeLay Announcement (AP-Y2)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 8, 2006

Reaction to Rep. Tom DeLay's announcement Saturday that he will abandon his bid to reclaim his post as majority leader:

"We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first." — White House spokeswoman Erin Healy.

"It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference ... We expect that Tom will continue to help House Republicans succeed with our agenda as we move forward this year." — House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

"For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay. The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress." — House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

"My belief is that Tom will eventually be cleared and exonerated, and my hope is that our conference will one day again benefit from Tom's rare commitment to the principles of smaller government and freedom for which all Republicans fight." — Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, who is considered likely to seek the job of majority leader.

"Tom DeLay bears much of the responsibility for the culture of corruption Republicans have created in Washington, D.C., but his removal from House leadership alone will not end the pervasive cronyism and corruption that he and Washington Republicans created." — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

"My good friend Tom DeLay has made a very difficult decision. ... It is my firm belief that he will beat these baseless charges and will continue to be a strong, effective and committed leader in our efforts to protect our country, limit the scope of government, and win the battle of ideas. ... I know Tom's legacy as one of the most effective Republican leaders in history is assured." — Rep. Roy Blunt, R-Mo, the GOP whip who temporarily has filled in for DeLay and is likely to run for the job.

"I look forward to the democratic process of choosing a new majority leader who will ensure that integrity, honesty, and ethical accountability are central tenants of government operations in Washington." — Rep. Charlie Bass, R-N.H., one of the leaders of the effort to have a new election for majority leader.

"We don't just need new leaders, we need a course correction. This is deeper than just who stands at the head of the party. We have created a system here ... that just breeds corruption. ... We just cannot continue with this trend." — Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., who worked with Bass on pressing for a new election.

"I applaud his decision. It's a good decision. When we return in January, I look forward to a newly elected leadership team." — Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va.

"Tom really has been an effective leader, but he's always been very controversial. It's a decision he feels that is in the best interest of the conference." — Rep. Paul Gillmor, R-Ohio.

"I think it was inevitable. The momentum in the House Republican conference was moving that way. It was presenting problems in moving the agenda forward." — Rep. Pat Tiberi, R-Ohio.

"Cleaning up the pervasive culture of corruption in Washington requires more than shuffling the Republican leadership. It requires cleaning the House. As long as DeLay 'wanna-be's' are in control, America will suffer from their arrogance." — Rep. Lloyd Doggett, D-Texas

"Today's decision, although difficult, continues Tom DeLay's commitment to put his nation, his constituents, his colleagues and his party first." — RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman.

"Tom DeLay is doing the right thing by permanently stepping down. It's time for a more mainstream leader that reflects the views and ethics of the American people and will make restoring Americans' faith in government their top priority." — Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

Analysis: GOP Woes Don't End With DeLay (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, January 8, 2006

Republicans worried about their party's future have succeeded in pushing embattled former Majority Leader Tom DeLay off the stage. Even so, the Republicans' election-year troubles are far from over.

Need a reminder?

President Bush, the titular head of the GOP, is waging an unpopular war in Iraq and presiding over a nation with lingering economic anxieties. He suffers from approval ratings around 40 percent — near record lows for his presidency. Questionable stock transactions by the top Republican in the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, are under investigation. A special prosecutor's probe continues into whether Bush administration officials outed a CIA operative in retribution for her husband's Iraq war criticism. A secret anti-terror program that Bush approved to eavesdrop on people inside the United States without warrants is raising concerns about overly broad presidential powers.

Potentially most damaging is an influence-peddling scandal on Capitol Hill.

Last week's guilty pleas to corruption and tax evasion charges by the central figure in the scandal, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, are anything but the last chapter. Abramoff is cooperating in a wide-ranging investigation that could ensnare dozens of lawmakers with close ties to the generous and powerful lobbyist, including DeLay and House Administration Committee Chairman Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

Ross Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, called it a "partywide crisis" that the GOP has problems with its leadership in all three areas of the federal government that it controls.

"The removal of DeLay from the leadership doesn't end their problems with scandal and, more broadly, with running the House," said Norm Ornstein with the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "That's their challenge, is to begin to get their policy act together. And they're going to have to do it with just Republicans because Democrats are going to be against them."

Republican domination of Congress is at stake in the November elections. Indeed, a new Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that 49 percent of those surveyed said they would prefer to see Democrats take control of Congress, compared with 36 percent who want a continued Republican majority.

With that in mind, Saturday's decision by DeLay to abandon his bid to resume his No. 2 post in the House was welcomed by Republicans.

The man Democrats love to hate is battling campaign finance charges in Texas that had forced him to step aside as majority leader. Maintaining his innocence, he had said he intended to take his leadership position back once cleared of the charges. DeLay changed his tune under pressure from fellow Republicans that only grew as the Abramoff case mushroomed.

At the White House, where aides had insisted for weeks that the famously effective DeLay retained the president's support, there was a sharp pivot. "We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first," Bush spokeswoman Erin Healy said.

Democrats have made clear they plan to make GOP corruption a centerpiece campaign theme. They pounced.

"Tom DeLay bears much of the responsibility for the culture of corruption Republicans have created in Washington, D.C., but his removal from House leadership alone will not end the pervasive cronyism and corruption that he and Washington Republicans created," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

The anti-corruption tact gives Democrats the opportunity to overcome bad fractures within their party as well as their lack of a cohesive message. An AP-Ipsos poll last month showed that 88 percent of Americans say that corruption reaching into all levels of government is a serious problem.

Bush had hoped to rescue both his and his party's political fortunes by turning a new page in 2006 and focusing on immigration reform, good economic news and turning around public opinion on Iraq.

But I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is expected to stand trial in the CIA leak case this summer, just ahead of the midterm elections. The special prosecutor's inquiry continues, leaving the fate of other senior White House officials, notably Bush's deputy chief of staff and political guru Karl Rove, in doubt.

And the election for a new House majority leader will serve as a reminder of the GOP's troubles right when Bush is unveiling his election-year agenda. The House reconvenes the week of Jan. 30, with the election likely to be held right away. Bush's annual State of the Union address is tentatively scheduled for that week.

Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, the GOP whip who temporarily has filled in for DeLay and is expected to run to permanently take his place, also could suffer from his association with Abramoff. He was among many lawmakers who refunded or gave to charity some or all of the donations they received from Abramoff, his associates or clients.

Though House Speaker Dennis Hastert's position seems secure, some are calling for a wider leadership shake up that would be messy and distracting. "The conference needs the ability to reassess the leadership team as a whole," said Rep. Melissa Hart, R-Pa.

Tenacious Tom DeLay Has Had Wild Ride (AP-Y2)

By Donna Cassata And Laurie Kellman

AP, January 8, 2006

Ever disciplined, Tom DeLay even stage-managed one of the lowest moments of his life.

Summoned to a Texas court last fall, DeLay was fingerprinted and photographed like a common criminal. But what a mug shot.

Immaculately groomed in jacket and tie, DeLay grinned from ear to ear, looking more like he had just won the lottery, rather than someone who was facing charges of money laundering.

That was the point: control the message and your enemies can't use it against you.

Democrats gleefully have sought to make the Texas Republican the poster boy for bad Republican behavior. They sorely will miss DeLay's departure from the national stage.

DeLay often operated close to the ethical edge in his ascension to the powerful job of House majority leader.

Relying on political prowess, arm-twisting and devotion to his GOP majority, DeLay tightened the Republican grip on the House in his seven years as Republican whip, the party's No. 3 leadership post. And he delivered for President Bush. The fellow Texans were political partners, but never were close.

DeLay first harnessed his acrimony for government regulations in the late 1970s and rode it into the Texas House and Congress. During his stint in the Texas Legislature, he was known as "Hot Tub Tom" for his partying ways.

Now he is a born-again Christian whose skill as a tenacious political strategist has allowed him to outmaneuver Democrats, pack Congress with more Republicans and push through some major pieces of Bush's legislative agenda.

When he rose to majority leader in 2003, DeLay sought to soften his image. He dumped his "wet look" hairstyle, filled a gap in his teeth and opened up more with the media.

Called "the Hammer" for his hard-nosed approach — his Capitol office has two leather bullwhips — the 58-year-old former pest exterminator has ensured House passage of much of Bush's legislative agenda, including tax cuts, trade agreements and a Medicare prescription drug plan.

His brass-knuckle tactics drew the ire of Democrats, Washington lobbyists and good-government types.

The House ethics committee admonished DeLay on three separate occasions in 2004. In addition to the Texas charges, a federal investigation is pursuing DeLay's ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DeLay has denied any wrongdoing, telling fellow House Republicans in a letter Saturday, "During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out."

In an April letter to supporters, DeLay borrowed a phrase coined by a long-ago besieged President Clinton, arguing his opponents' only agenda "is the politics of personal destruction." To which DeLay added, "and the criminalization of politics."

DeLay has come through for Bush even though DeLay once assailed the first President Bush for breaking his pledge not to increase taxes in 1990, and took heat from George W. Bush in the 2000 campaign for House efforts to disperse earned income tax payments to low-income families monthly instead of in one lump sum.

If DeLay has to hold a 15-minute vote open for the better part of an hour to twist arms, he will do it, as he did in securing House approval of Bush's Central American Free Trade Agreement in July by a razor-thin margin of two votes.

Lobbyists do not escape his version of hardball politics.

DeLay complained to the Electronic Industries Alliance over its hiring of former Democratic Rep. Dave McCurdy of Oklahoma as its president. DeLay subsequently was rebuked by the ethics committee for badgering a lobbying organization.

To win passage of the Medicare prescription drug bill, DeLay promised a lawmaker that if he would vote for the measure, DeLay would back a run for Congress by the lawmaker's son. The lawmaker refused, but DeLay was admonished again by the ethics committee for making the offer.

"His devotion to the cause has led him to push the envelope as hard as possible and not hold back," said Gary C. Jacobson, a professor of political science at the University of California at San Diego.

DeLay has worked tirelessly to increase the Republican majority in the House since the GOP swept out the Democrats in 1994. He has raised tens of millions for Republican candidates and used his own leadership political action committee to shower cash on GOP hopefuls.

In 2002, he helped buck the historic trend of midterm congressional election losses for the party controlling the White House; instead Republicans gained in the House.

He strong-armed a redistricting plan for Texas that led to the defeat of five Democrats in the state in 2004. The ethics panel rebuked DeLay for using the Federal Aviation Administration in the search for Texas Democratic lawmakers trying to avoid a vote on the redistricting proposal.

DeLay was unabashed. "I'm the majority leader and we want more seats," he said.

Elected to the House in 1984 from the Houston suburbs, DeLay chafed under Democratic rule for a decade before the GOP seized control. Then, in 1998, he led the charge in impeaching Clinton over the sex scandal involving a White House intern.

He might have been House speaker in 1998 after Rep. Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., stepped down and Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., stunningly bowed out, but DeLay acknowledged that he was "too nuclear" to take the top job. He instead ensured that his deputy, Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., became speaker.

A fierce conservative, DeLay energized the Republican base last year when he pushed for Congress to intervene in the case of a brain-damaged Florida woman, Terri Schiavo, in a direct challenge to a Florida court's authority. For the most part, the general public questioned the congressional action and the GOP took a hit in opinion polls.

DeLay has raised one daughter and three foster children with his wife, Christine.

DeLay Ends His Drive To Regain Post (LAT)

By Mary Curtius And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, indicted in Texas last fall and under scrutiny in a blossoming political scandal on Capitol Hill, abandoned on Saturday his effort to regain his leadership post.

His decision touched off a race to succeed him in a Republican Party beset by ethics problems. And it followed days of political turmoil and soul-searching within the GOP, sparked by Tuesday's guilty pleas to corruption-related charges by lobbyist Jack Abramoff, once a close DeLay associate.

In a letter released Saturday, DeLay said he agreed with growing calls among Republicans for a new, permanent majority leader to be chosen soon.

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," a tired-looking DeLay said later in the day during a public appearance in his hometown of Sugar Land, Texas.

He also pledged to stay in Congress and run a "vigorous" campaign for reelection in November for the Houston-area seat he has held since 1984.

DeLay, for years widely viewed as Congress' most influential Republican, stepped down as majority leader after he was charged in September with violating campaign finance laws in Texas. Insisting he expected to be found not guilty early this year, DeLay said he would then seek to reclaim the post.

House Republicans — many of whom agreed with DeLay's assertion that the Texas charges were politically motivated — had been willing to give him time to resolve that case. Instead of naming a permanent successor in September, they appointed Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri to be temporary majority leader.

One reason the party so supported him was his work over the last decade to increase campaign contributions to Republican coffers. Key to that was the "K Street Project," an initiative through which Washington's lobbying community was persuaded to increase their donations to the GOP.

Another reason was his ability to deliver unified votes for the party's legislative agenda — he has long has been known in Washington as "The Hammer," a testament to his brass-knuckles political style.

But the Abramoff guilty pleas transformed DeLay-related political calculations. By the end of last week, pressure within GOP ranks was growing for him to relinquish any claim on the majority leader post.

Among the crimes Abramoff acknowledged were bilking Indian tribal clients out of tens of millions of dollars and attempting to influence congressional lawmakers with lavish trips, gifts and campaign contributions. He is cooperating with federal investigators who are examining his ties to DeLay, other lawmakers, and current and former congressional staff members.

As a result, many House Republicans up for reelection this year began worrying about the political fallout of keeping alive DeLay's leadership hopes.

"You know how people talk about the captain being willing to go down with the ship?" said one Republican lawmaker, speaking on condition of anonymity because the issue is politically sensitive.

"Well, in this case, it would have been the ship going down with the captain."

Among those pressuring DeLay to support the selection of a new majority leader was House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), DeLay's longtime political ally.

According to a lawmaker close to the speaker, Hastert dispatched emissaries to Sugar Land — where DeLay, 58, was hunkered down with family members and his closest advisors — to urge him to give up for the good of the party. The lawmaker spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing Hastert's role in the matter.

Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman, said DeLay phoned the speaker Saturday morning to tell him of his decision.

Hastert, in a statement, said DeLay's decision was "honorable … and the right decision for the House Republican Conference."

A White House statement expressed "respect" for DeLay's decision "to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first."

Hastert canceled plans to lead a congressional delegation to Asia and the Egypt starting Monday. The vote on a new majority leader is to be held the first week of February.

Several Republicans said Saturday that Hastert's position as speaker remains secure but that other leadership jobs could be contested as part of the battle for majority leader.

The campaign for that post was in full swing by Saturday afternoon. Senior staff members for several lawmakers opened their Capitol Hill offices and the political horse-trading commenced.

At least one GOP congressman received a call from Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) seeking support to become majority leader. Boehner (pronounced BAY-ner), 56, chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, helped win passage of President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act. Before being elected to Congress in 1990, he ran a plastics and packing company.

He was elected House Republican Conference chairman, the chamber's No. 4 GOP spot, in 1994. An ally of ex-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), he lost the conference post in 1998 to a DeLay-backed candidate.

Blunt, 55, the acting majority leader, is expected to seek the job on a permanent basis.

First elected to Congress in 1996, the low-key Blunt is less combative than DeLay. It was with DeLay's support in late 2002 that he won the No. 3 House post, majority whip — the person responsible for corralling the votes to promote the party's agenda. Blunt is a former Missouri secretary of state who was for four years president of his alma mater Southwest Baptist University in Bolivar, Mo.

Others who are considered possible contenders include Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

"This is a workday," said a delighted Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.). "I'm already getting calls from candidates seeking my support, and there are conference calls going on everywhere."

Bass, a moderate, had joined with Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a conservative, in circulating a letter Friday seeking an election for a permanent majority leader.

He and Flake normally are at far ends of the political spectrum, Bass noted, but they agreed that the party needed to take bold action to rid itself of the taint of scandal.

"I just didn't want to be any part of a caucus that was supporting, in any way, the kind of behavior that is alleged to have occurred between Jack Abramoff and perhaps a number of members of Congress," Bass said.

Bass and other Republicans said they would question candidates for the majority post closely about ethics concerns.

"The criteria for me and the litmus test for me is going to be [that] we have to elect leaders who are not tainted by the Abramoff scandal," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), who is close to Hastert. "The last thing we need is to elect new leaders and then a few months down the road have them under investigation for being involved with Jack Abramoff."

Amid such comments, Hastert was expected to announce as early as today proposals to tighten the rules governing lobbying of Congress.

Democrats are gearing up for a major challenge to DeLay in November's election. He won reelection in 2004 with 55% of the vote — a relatively poor showing for a longtime incumbent — and Democrats are prepared to pour money into this year's race.

"He's losing Republican support here in the district, and he's apparently lost it in Washington, D.C., as well," said Mike Malaise, campaign manager for Democrat Nick Lampson, a former congressman who is DeLay's likely opponent.

DeLay, the former owner of a pest extermination business, served as House majority whip for seven years and became majority leader in 2002. DeLay forged a highly disciplined coalition that focused on cutting taxes and promoting causes dear to the party's social conservative base.

Although they were not personally close, Delay and President Bush forged an effective political partnership, with DeLay playing a key role in pushing through much of the administration's first-term legislative agenda.

But DeLay's hard-charging tactics sometimes brought him close to — or over — the ethical line. In 2004, he was rebuked three times by the House Ethics Committee for ethics lapses. Then, in 2005, a series of stories in the Washington Post and other newspapers detailed DeLay's ties to Abramoff, a flamboyant lobbyist who boasted of his ties to the Republican leadership.

It was disclosed that Delay had taken a trip to an expensive Scottish golf resort with Abramoff that was funded by the lobbyist's tribal clients, in violation of House ethics rules. DeLay said he thought the trip was financed by a conservative think tank, and he denied any wrongdoing.

Ethics Issues Snared GOP's Champion (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Standing before a crowd of applauding House Republicans in the Capitol Hill Club last March, then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (Tex.) inscribed $1.8 million on a giant check and signed his name at the bottom with the flourish of a game show host. The tally, representing funds to be given to the campaigns of 10 Republican lawmakers, was yet another cache collected by one of the premier money machines ever to function on Capitol Hill.

It worked simply. On one side of the machine, a hose vacuumed the pockets of large corporations, wealthy individuals and legions of lobbyists on K Street, all instructed by DeLay to contribute only to Republicans. Out the other side, at some later date, came legislation of interest to many of the donors. Inside the machine, twisting its knobs and pulling its levers, was DeLay -- who was unabashed about his pay-to-play philosophy and relentless in enforcing his political rules.

DeLay's tenure in the congressional leadership, which came to a decisive end with his announcement yesterday that he would not try to regain the leadership post, was marked by an extraordinary record of political accomplishment. From Dec. 6, 1994, until last year, the former pest exterminator from a Houston suburb was the go-to guy in the House for legislative favors, perks, committee chairmanships and election cash.

"Tom DeLay and I have had our differences over the years, but he is one of the most effective and gifted leaders the Republican Party has ever known," said Rep. John A. Boehner (Ohio), who served in the leadership just below DeLay when the GOP, for the first time in recent years, won a majority in the House. He is likely to run for DeLay's now vacated slot as majority leader.

As President Bush noted recently, when DeLay was in the saddle, the administration's priorities were enacted by the House. Under his prodding, that body became in effect a single-party institution, with negligible Democratic influence in any aspect of its operations, from hearings to appropriations.

But DeLay's leadership was undermined over time by a blurring of ethical lines in the handling of money by his aides and advisers, his taste for the lifestyle of the super-rich, and his take-no-prisoners approach to political disputes in a town built on compromise. A lawmaker who cast himself as an icon of moral conservatism, DeLay came increasingly to be regarded as a symbol of special-interest lawmaking. With an election looming in 11 months, his colleagues began to fear the consequences.

Although DeLay was admonished by the House ethics committee as early as 1999 for retaliating against a trade association that hired a Democrat, for the most part his rigidly partisan style was welcomed by Republicans. Not until 2004 did the first major cracks in the DeLay political edifice appear. In three reports, the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct rebuked him for asking federal aviation officials to intervene in a Texas political spat, for improperly pressuring a fellow Republican to vote for a Medicare drug bill, and for creating the appearance that Westar Energy Inc. received special consideration in exchange for campaign donations.

The committee called on him to "temper your future actions to assure you are in compliance" with House ethics rules. But DeLay blamed the rebukes on malevolent Democrats, and his supporters retaliated by ousting the Republican chairman of the committee and tying up its operations in a prolonged dispute over staffing.

More serious damage was done by an ethics inquiry in DeLay's home state, which led last September to his felony indictment and forced him to step aside temporarily under party rules. At issue was one of DeLay's more brilliant achievements, hailed by his fellow Republicans for solidifying their control of the House -- orchestrating a party takeover in the Texas legislature that led to an extraordinary redrawing of congressional districts and the election of five more Texas Republicans to Congress in 2004.

Charges of DeLay's involvement in money laundering associated with that state Republican victory in 2002 are unproved, and many campaign finance lawyers consider the Texas case to be weak. But DeLay's name has also figured prominently in a second ethics probe -- this one in Washington, under the aegis of a federal task force looking at the links between money and favors associated with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff, whom DeLay once termed "one of my closest and dearest friends," pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion and promised to cooperate with investigators. Michael Scanlon, DeLay's former spokesman, pleaded guilty Nov. 21 to conspiracy to bribe public officials and likewise promised cooperation. Prosecutors are meanwhile looking at actions taken by ex-DeLay aides Tony C. Rudy and Edwin A. Buckham on behalf of Abramoff's clients. No one knows where these inquiries will lead, and uncertainty is always the enemy of political strength.

DeLay, now 58, gained a biology degree at the University of Houston and pursued a political career out of opposition to regulation of the pesticide industry. He first came to Congress in 1985, but it was not until a decade later that Buckham, Rudy, Scanlon, and Abramoff played key roles in DeLay's ascent in the GOP hierarchy, a rise underpinned by the steady infusion of corporate cash into Republican political campaigns.

DeLay was blunt about his emphasis on fundraising from the outset -- he and then-Rep. Richard K. Armey (Tex.) each promised in a leadership meeting before the 1994 election to raise half a million dollars for party hopefuls, and DeLay traveled to dozens of House districts, cementing ties to many challengers who won office that fall.

After the historic 1994 elections, when many like-minded conservatives swept into the House, DeLay capitalized on his fundraising prowess in a successful race for majority whip against Rep. Robert S. Walker (Pa.). Walker, who was Rep. Newt Gingrich's best friend and an expert in parliamentary maneuvering, was initially favored to win the contest -- at a time when Gingrich was poised to win election as speaker. But DeLay had distributed so much money that he overtook Walker, securing the votes of 52 out of the 73 freshmen in the Class of 1994.

Walker later decried what he considered the excessive influence of fundraising committees such as DeLay's Americans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee (ARMPAC), which, he said, caused the outcome to be determined by money, not talent. But his colleagues largely shrugged their shoulders. Over the next decade, they accepted nearly $4.5 million in contributions from ARMPAC, which drew its funds heavily from tobacco, energy, railroad and communications interests.

Throughout his tenure in the leadership, DeLay frequently traveled to golf resorts and costly hotels for meetings with lobbyists at ARMPAC's expense; he also preferred traveling on corporate jets instead of commercial airlines. But DeLay was not selfish -- he earned the gratitude of many colleagues by extending the same perquisites to them in exchange for their votes.

According to his former colleagues, DeLay's office functioned at times like a hotel concierge, arranging corporate jets, private cars, fishing trips and other expense-paid travel during congressional breaks, key votes and party conventions, all financed by wealthy donors with interests before Congress.

DeLay's own travel has played a role in his undoing, as investigators have begun delving into the circumstances of trips that DeLay took with Abramoff to Moscow in 1997 and to Scotland and London in 2000. The first trip preceded an unusual million-dollar donation -- which former associates say originated with Russian energy executives -- to a group linked to DeLay; on the second trip, Abramoff and Buckham -- both registered lobbyists -- used their credit cards to pay for some of DeLay's expenses, in apparent conflict with ethics rules. DeLay says he was unaware of the precise financial arrangements for the travel.

Ties To Abramoff Weave Intricate Web (HCHRON)

By MICHAEL HEDGES

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - When a top Justice Department official outlined the public corruption allegations against lobbyist Jack Abramoff, she almost seemed to be describing his cozy relationship with Rep. Tom DeLay.

Abramoff provided public officials with overseas trips, campaign contributions and excessive meals "with the intent ... that the public official would act to benefit Abramoff or his clients," Alice Fisher, head of the department's criminal division, said last week.

Partly to clear his name in the Abramoff affair, DeLay gave up on Saturday his quest to be reinstated as House majority leader. But federal prosecutors' outline of the scandal does not fit DeLay in one crucial respect:

So far, there is no known conclusive evidence that DeLay, the Republican from Sugar Land, performed political favors for Abramoff in return.

Establishing a quid pro quo is necessary to prove political bribery.

To make a case against DeLay, who is among the lawmakers said to be under investigation now that the lobbyist is cooperating with federal authorities, prosecutors must first piece together his complicated relationship with Abramoff, which grew on trips to Pacific islands, Russia and a golf course in Scotland.

The men were introduced in 1994 by conservative Rabbi Daniel Lapin, co-chair of the American Alliance of Jews and Christians, which he created with former GOP presidential candidate Gary Bauer.

DeLay, with strong ties to the Christian right, and Abramoff, an Orthodox Jew, apparently hit it off. Within a few years, DeLay would refer to Abramoff as one of his closest friends.

As a prominent lobbyist in Washington, Abramoff had much to gain from ties to lawmakers such as DeLay. Likewise, as prosecutors, records and news accounts show, Abramoff had lots to offer, including a nearly endless stream of money provided by his clients.

In the mid-1990s, Abramoff persuaded Russian oil and gas clients to donate $1 million to a conservative advocacy group called the U.S. Family Network, which was set up by former DeLay chief of staff Edwin Buckham and collected $2.5 million in its five years of operation.

According to the Washington Post, Buckham told the former head of the U.S. Family Network — the organization had a single full-time employee — that the Russians gave the money to influence DeLay's vote on international aid to Russia. DeLay has denied that his vote was influenced improperly.

The U.S. Family Network received a half-million dollars from garment manufacturers in the Northern Mariana Islands with ties to Abramoff and a quarter-million dollars from Indian tribes he represented.

The money was used to buy radio ads attacking Democrats and to purchase a town house on Capitol Hill near DeLay's office that, according to the Post, DeLay associates called the "safe house." DeLay used it for his own campaign fundraising, the newspaper reported.

Trip to Russia

DeLay's wife, Christine, worked for three years for a lobbying firm run by Buckham, receiving a monthly salary of $3,200, a total of $115,200.

The firm, the Alexander Strategy Group, received hundreds of thousands of dollars in fees from the U.S. Family Network, money almost entirely derived from Abramoff clients.

Christine DeLay compiled a list of favorite charities of members of Congress, according to DeLay's attorney.

DeLay maintained contacts with Russian executives connected to the energy firm NaftaSib, who were paying Abramoff huge sums to promote their interests in Washington.

In August 1997, DeLay took a trip to Russia that, according to his financial disclosure statements, was underwritten by the National Center for Public Policy Research. Abramoff was an officer on the center's board, and during the trip DeLay met with the Russians who were paying large fees to Abramoff.

Although the president of the policy center said the group funded the trip, she conceded that an international law firm working to promote the interests of Abramoff's Russian clients covered its costs with a payment of about $165,000.

The Russian businessmen were eager to assure that their country's economy was supported by International Monetary Fund loans made from funds contributed by the United States. In 1998, DeLay voted for a foreign aid bill that included funds to replenish the IMF. DeLay has said that vote was based on his determination of what was best for his constituents.

Toasting Abramoff

Four months after the Russian trip, DeLay, accompanied by his wife and three aides, visited Saipan, in the Northern Marianas. There DeLay made the widely quoted toast to Abramoff as "one of my closest and dearest friends." The visit was funded by the U.S. territory's government and a trade group representing clothing manufacturers.

The Marianas government had paid Abramoff millions of dollars to lobby Congress in a successful fight to preserve the islands' exemption from U.S. minimum-wage and immigration laws while still being able to claim that clothes produced there were "made in the U.S.A."

DeLay sided with the Marianas government's position — a vote that a spokesman said was consistent with his long-held views on trade.

About two years later, DeLay and Abramoff went to the British Isles. The travel party included DeLay's wife, his chief of staff Susan Hirschmann and her husband, and DeLay aide Tony Rudy.

The weeklong tour included a meeting in London with former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, but it was largely recreational, with a four-day golfing trip to Scotland, where DeLay played at the famed St. Andrews course.

The trip also provided Abramoff's Russian client, NaftaSib general manager Alex Koulakovsky, a chance to spend time with DeLay.

The lavish tour cost about $70,000 for the officials, according to House documents. Among the expenses: a suite at the Four Seasons in London for the DeLays (total cost $4,285), along with thousands of dollars' worth of meals and golf fees.

Again, the National Center for Public Policy Research picked up the tab. Indian tribes who were Abramoff clients because of their interest in gambling legislation donated $50,000 to the NCPPR on the day the trip commenced.

Investigators are looking into whether that was a veiled effort to influence DeLay on Indian gaming bills. DeLay has said he thought the trip was an appropriate fact-finding mission funded by a legal nonprofit group.

Looking at staff members

A DeLay-Abramoff tie that has investigators' attention involves Rudy, the former DeLay deputy chief of staff.

Rudy is reportedly working with federal investigators probing Abramoff's web of corruption.

In court documents, Rudy is described as "Staffer A," who helped Abramoff stop legislation on Internet gambling and postal rate increases that would have hurt Abramoff clients. Rudy at the time was working on DeLay's staff.

In return, Abramoff funneled $50,000 to Rudy's wife, court documents said. The money was "obtained from [Abramoff's] clients who would and did benefit from Staffer A's official actions," prosecutors said. Rudy left Congress in 2000 to work directly for Abramoff.

DeLay attorney Richard Cullen denies wrongdoing by the Sugar Land Republican and said the lawmaker had no knowledge of Rudy's activities on behalf of Abramoff's clients.

Bill Mateja, a former senior Justice Department lawyer involved in corporate fraud cases in Washington and now in private practice in Dallas, said staffers such as Rudy would be of keen interest to prosecutors.

Pleading guilty

"They are the one who makes things run. And clearly [prosecutors] will want to know whether they were ordered by members of Congress to kill these bills," Mateja said. "You would certainly think the member would know. It would be unusual for a staff member to work to kill a bill without the member ordering that."

Abramoff's lobbying for Indian tribes led to his convictions on the fraud and conspiracy charges. Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay spokesman and later an Abramoff business partner, also has pleaded guilty to fraud charges connected to the bilking of the tribes.

The two men played a con game on the tribes, with Abramoff claiming to work for free while steering them to Scanlon for public relations work. The men then secretly split fees of at least $80 million.

Investigators are looking into why four Indian tribes were willing to pay so much to Abramoff and Scanlon to win gambling rights. In testimony before congressional committees and e-mail released by Congress, Abramoff said he told the tribes they were buying the influence of important congressional leaders, including DeLay.

Contributing to DeLay

Bernie Sprague, of the Saginaw Chippewa tribe, testified that he had told federal investigators that Abramoff instructed him to make large contributions to a charity controlled by Abramoff as a way to "impress Tom DeLay."

To buttress his ties to DeLay, Abramoff frequently contributed to the former majority leader's projects, giving about $60,000 to political committees controlled by DeLay since 2000. Abramoff clients also donated a total of $22,500 to a DeLay foundation set up to help abused children.

Some donations went to Texans for a Republican Majority, the political action committee whose spending on Texas legislative races led to indictments against DeLay. He was forced to step aside as majority leader when a grand jury lodged the charges in September.

Was money buying favors?

Now prosecutors in Washington have to determine whether the donations by Abramoff and his clients were part of a con job by Abramoff to secure big fees or whether the lobbyist used the money in an effort to buy favors.

"To charge a public official requires a certain level of intent and knowledge by the public official" that they are being bribed, said Noel Hillman, head of the Justice Department's public corruption section. Hillman described an official's "mental state" as being crucial to the decision by prosecutors to bring criminal charges.

Cullen said DeLay has made a formal offer to cooperate with investigators. So far, they have not approached DeLay for any records or asked him any questions, Cullen said. That is in contrast with Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who has been described in court proceedings in a way that makes it clear he is a target of the investigation.

For prosecutors in the bewilderingly complex investigation, one of the legal hurdles is proving a crime occurred in the time frame when it can be prosecuted. A statute of limitations of five years for most white-collar fraud offenses limits liability to actions after early 2001. The only exception would be if prosecutors can show an ongoing conspiracy.

Officials Focus On A 2nd Firm Tied To DeLay (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Glen Justice

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Having secured a guilty plea from the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, prosecutors are entering a new phase of the corruption investigation in Washington and are focusing on a lobbying firm that has even closer ties to Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader who is under scrutiny in the scandal.

The firm, Alexander Strategy Group, is of particular interest to investigators because it was founded by Edwin A. Buckham, a close friend of Mr. DeLay's and his former chief of staff, and has been a lucrative landing spot for several former members of the DeLay staff, people who are directly involved in the case have said.

Although the firm's name has circulated in connection with the case for many months, prosecutors' questions about Mr. Buckham and Alexander Strategy - which did not respond to requests for comment - have intensified recently, participants in the case said.

The firm openly promoted the idea that it could deliver access to Mr. DeLay, who has denied any wrongdoing but abruptly announced Saturday that he would not try to regain his leadership post. Now the very connections with Mr. DeLay that formed the backbone of Alexander Strategy, put together with Mr. Abramoff's help, have put the future of the firm in doubt.

While doing business with lobbyists is routine for most lawmakers, investigators are looking at the extent to which Mr. DeLay and other lawmakers may have accepted trips, campaign donations and other favors from Alexander Strategy, and in turn tried to help the business.

Still, prosecutors may have a difficult time reaching the high legal threshold required in a bribery case, in which it must be established that lawmakers performed official acts in exchange for specific favors, rather than as a result of an ongoing relationship with an outside lobbyist.

It is unclear whether any single action by the firm has caught investigators' attention so much as its overall pattern of activity.

Details of the ties between Alexander Strategy, Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff - who pleaded guilty last week in federal court and is cooperating with investigators - have already begun to trickle out. Alexander Strategy paid Mr. DeLay's wife $115,000 in consulting fees while conducting business with Mr. Abramoff's firm. Mr. Abramoff also referred clients to Mr. Buckham.

Mr. Buckham and the firm also shared clients - among them an entity in Malaysia and the Choctaw Indian tribe in Mississippi - with Mr. Abramoff, who in his plea agreement admitted to using corrupting tactics with lawmakers on behalf of his clients. Mr. Abramoff also admitted to having defrauded his Indian clients of millions of dollars. At one point, Mr. Buckham even sought to hire Mr. Abramoff himself, participants in the case said.

Mr. Buckham and at least one member of his firm worked with domestic and overseas clients who prosecutors suspect helped funnel money and perks to Mr. DeLay, his fund-raising operations and other lawmakers in ways intended to curry favor with the Republican leadership.

And at one time, Americans for a Republican Majority, or Armpac, the leadership committee that raised money for Mr. DeLay, was run out of the offices of Alexander Strategy.

But the firm's web of contacts on Capitol Hill reaches past Mr. DeLay, making Alexander Strategy a potentially useful resource as investigators examine other lawmakers.

The firm's name surfaced at the periphery of the corruption investigation into Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California. Mr. Cunningham resigned after pleading guilty to accepting bribes from a defense contractor that did business with Alexander Strategy.

For years, Alexander Strategy was one of the crown jewels of the so-called K Street project, an effort Republicans began after taking control of Congress in 1994 to dominate the lobbying industry. The hope, exemplified by Mr. Buckham's company, was for Republican lobbyists to harness the power of their corporate clients to help keep the party in power for years to come.

The successful history of Alexander Strategy since its founding in the late 1990's offers a window into the nexus of Mr. Abramoff, Mr. DeLay and the lobbying world over the last decade or so of Republican control of Congress.

As Mr. DeLay grew more powerful in Congress, the lobbying firm rose in prominence on K Street, building an impressive roster of clients for such a young company and earning, according to records, about $8.8 million lobbying in 2004. That ranked it in the middle of the pack among Washington's largest lobbying firms, but its client list - including Microsoft, United Parcel Service, Time Warner, Freddie Mac and Eli Lilly & Company - suggests what was, at least at one time, a powerful and well-connected operation.

And Mr. DeLay, so intertwined with the lobbying world that his extensive network of allies and former aides scattered throughout town is nicknamed "DeLay Inc.," responded more quickly to calls from Alexander Strategy than he did for any other firm, former aides of his said.

One element prosecutors are trying to understand is what role Mr. DeLay played in sending business to the company. There is evidence, one participant in the case said, that it was "you hire these guys because Tom DeLay tells you to."

Mr. Buckham also ran the U.S. Family Network, a self-styled grassroots organization tied to Mr. DeLay that, according to The Washington Post, was financed almost entirely by clients and associates of Mr. Abramoff. People involved in the case said they expected investigators to examine whether Mr. DeLay cast a vote in Congress in exchange for donations to the network.

Another critical component of the investigation is the activities of Tony C. Rudy, a former DeLay deputy chief of staff who went to work with Mr. Abramoff as a lobbyist before joining Mr. Buckham at Alexander Strategy, where he still works. Mr. Rudy is mentioned - named only as "Staffer A" - in Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement, and investigators are looking into whether he helped secure legislative favors for Mr. Abramoff's clients in exchange for gifts and the promise of a future job while he was still on the DeLay staff.

Mr. Buckham and others from the firm have not responded to inquiries, and Mr. DeLay, through his spokesman, has said he is innocent of wrongdoing. Although investigators are looking at as many as a dozen lawmakers in the inquiry, they have not brought charges against them.

Richard Cullen, a lawyer for Mr. DeLay, pointed out that Mr. Rudy had not been named outright in any court documents.

"But if it turns out to be Mr. Rudy," Mr. Cullen said, "and if what Mr. Rudy did turns out to have been in any way improper, Tom DeLay is going to be very sad and very disappointed. Because he will feel betrayed, and he expects much, much more from his staff than activities like that."

As a result of Mr. Buckham's ties with Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff, investigators are "keenly interested" in him, especially in connection with deals he may have brokered with Mr. DeLay and other lawmakers after going into the private sector, one participant in the case said.

"He allows the connection to be made to DeLay," another participant said of Mr. Buckham. All participants in the case were granted anonymity in interviews because Justice Department officials do not want people talking about it publicly.

Alexander Strategy's name has also surfaced in the course of a corruption investigation that implicates the defense lobbyist Brent Wilkes, who is an unnamed co-conspirator in the criminal case against former Representative Cunningham. Mr. Cunningham pleaded guilty in December to accepting $2.4 million in bribes from Mr. Wilkes and others. Mr. Wilkes's firm, Group W, also hired Alexander Strategy to do lobbying work, and Mr. DeLay used a plane partly owned by Mr. Wilkes.

The scandals swirling around the Alexander franchise, composed of roughly two dozen lobbyists at its offices on the waterfront in Georgetown, have delighted its former rivals while triggering concerns in the lobbying community that the entire business may be tarred.

Dick Armey, the former Republican House majority leader, who now works for the firm DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary and who clashed with Mr. DeLay in the House, invoked Charles Dickens, likening Mr. DeLay to Fagin and Mr. Buckham to the Artful Dodger in "Oliver Twist."

"Tom DeLay sent Buckham downtown to set up shop and start a branch office on K Street," Mr. Armey said. "The whole idea was, 'What's in it for us?' That's what I thought at the time, and I've seen nothing in the way they've conducted themselves since then to dissuade me from that point of view."

Mr. DeLay and a group of like-minded Republicans have spent years promoting Republicans for top lobbying positions in an attempt to counter decades in which Democrats controlled both Congress and K Street. The effort has caused several dustups over the years.

Mr. DeLay was rebuked by the House ethics committee in 1999 after allegedly badgering a trade association that chose a Democrat as its president, rather than the Republican candidate he favored.

Mr. DeLay's political action committee paid Alexander Strategy more than $300,000 for fund-raising and consulting services from 2000 to 2003, according to the Center for Public Integrity, a nonprofit group that tracks money in politics. In addition to Mr. Rudy, the firm also employed Karl Gallant, who headed Mr. DeLay's political action committee.

The firm has already been dropped by one client, MGM Mirage, the casino and resort giant, which retained it in 2004, paying about $350,000 to help block a maneuver by an Indian tribe in Michigan.

At the end of last year, MGM ended the relationship. Alan Feldman, a spokesman for MGM, said that the project had ended and that the firm's services were no longer needed. But Mr. Feldman acknowledged that the scrutiny surrounding Alexander Strategy was a concern. "It would be dishonest to say that it didn't come up in discussions," he said.

Other lobbyists and participants in the case said it would be difficult for the firm to survive this type of scrutiny with all of its clients and relationships intact.

"It's a double-edged sword, being known as DeLay Inc.," said one Republican lobbyist. "They are on the sharp edge of the sword now."

DeLay's War At Home (TIME)

By HILARY HYLTON

Time, January 8, 2006

As Tom DeLay steps into the shadows of the congressional leadership in Washington, the spotlight on his fight for survival shifts to his legal battle and reelection effort in Texas. Unless the 11-term congressman and former House GOP leader wins an unexpected victory in the state's highest court in the next few weeks, he'll spend the next year facing off against a zealous prosecutor and Republican and Democratic challengers for his House seat.

Even as Washington on Friday awaited DeLay's relinquishment of the majority leader's role, Texas tea leaf readers saw more trouble ahead. A new Republican challenger, already dubbed the "dragonslayer" by one Houston political columnist, launched his campaign for the part's nomination in Delay's hometown of Sugarland. Coincidentally, Delay reportedly signaled his intention to reclaim his seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee, a valued position for a congressman seeking reelection.

Attorney Tom Campbell, a Bob Dole campaign leader and administration appointee and backer of President George H.W. Bush announced he would run as a fiscal and social conservative. Campbell, a Mormon and self-styled environmentalist who voted for DeLay in 2004, has deep party connections and access to heavyweight fundraisers that make him a credible threat to the embattled former Majority Leader. "Tom DeLay's 'win at all cost' brand of politics has cost us far too much to let it continue," Campbell says on his campaign website.

DeLay also faces a Democratic challenge from former congressman Nick Lampson, who lost his seat after his district was redrawn during the 2004 DeLay-inspired redistricting of Texas congressional seats. Although Lampson is unopposed in the Democratic primary, the field is further crowded by the entry of an independent in the form of former GOP Congressman and DeLay supporter Steve Stockman, a far-right conservative defeated after a single term by Lampson. Stockman told the conservative Human Events magazine this week that by running as an independent he would attack Lampson "like a pit bull" and criticize Lampson's "ethical lapses....that's something Tom can't do under the present circumstances."

DeLay opponents cite recent polls showing that the former Majority Leader's support in his district has fallen below 50%, but that is exactly where his numbers stood in 2004, in a widely touted poll just days before he won reelection with 55 percent of the vote.

DeLay's attorney, Dick DeGuerin, accuses prosecutor Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, of seeking advantage from national trends by subpoenaing representatives of law firms and Indian tribes connected to lobbyist Jack Abramoff and records from lobbyists connected to disgraced Republican congressman Duke Cunningham — individuals, says DeGuerin, who have no direct ties to the campaign finance charges against his client.

DeGuerin told TIME his client is in fighting spirit."He's very upbeat, he's going about his business." Right now, his best hopes lie an appeal to the state's highest court to throw out the charges or order the trial judge to go forward with a speedy trial, but University of Texas law professor George Dix said that, while DeGuerin's motions are "very good, very interesting, ...with some sophisticated arguments and some really good bull*," intervention by the high court would be very unusual. Word from the court will likely come before the new GOP House leadership vote in late January. If DeLay fails to end the case there, the hope of a trial before the March Texas primary is a long shot, and in a state with no party registration, that primary will be open to disenchanted Republicans and disgruntled Democrats alike.

DeLay Won't Reclaim House Post (HCHRON)

By BENNETT ROTH and SAMANTHA LEVINE

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Entangled in criminal investigations of political activities in Texas and Washington, U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay abandoned claims to his House majority leader's post Saturday, a dramatic reversal for the former pest-control company owner who rose to the height of power in Congress.

DeLay reached the decision Saturday morning after consulting in the past two days with family and advisers, according to a spokesman, then announced his plans in separate letters to House Speaker Dennis Hastert and his GOP colleagues, and to supporters and reporters at Sugar Land City Hall.

"The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," he wrote Hastert.

DeLay's release of any hold on a House leadership role capped a tumultuous week in which GOP lawmakers increasingly voiced concerns that he has become an election-year liability because of ties to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. As part of a plea bargain unveiled in federal court Tuesday, Abramoff agreed to testify against members of Congress and their aides in the Washington corruption probe stemming from his representation of Indian tribes and other clients.

In Fort Bend County, DeLay told supporters he will continue to seek re-election this year in his suburban Houston district, where he faces competition in the March party primary and the November general election.

"I plan to run a vigorous campaign, and I plan to win it," DeLay told the crowd.

In the letter to Republican lawmakers, DeLay proclaimed his innocence of any impropriety.

"During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out," he said.

He has been scolded multiple times by the House ethics panel, however.

In Houston, civic and business leaders increasingly relied on DeLay to deliver federal funds and political favors for area projects and programs such as those at the Johnson Space Center. However, he tangled with city officials because of his opposition, until recently, to using federal money for Metro's rail projects.

Diminished ability

In a telephone interview with the Houston Chronicle, DeLay said Saturday that his absence from the leadership could diminish his ability to help the region.

"The majority leader controls what comes to the floor, and the Houston-Galveston area has benefited from that. That changes now," he said.

Critics who "never gave me an even shake ought to think about that," he remarked.

He said he would reclaim his seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee, where he first honed the legislative skills that brought him to the pinnacle of the House.

DeLay blamed Travis County prosecutor Ronnie Earle for forcing him to give up his post temporarily, saying the Democrat used legal maneuvers to postpone DeLay's trial on campaign-finance violations.

"It became quite evident that Ronnie Earle was successful in delaying the process," DeLay said. "The longer I was hanging out there, the more trouble he was causing."

DeLay stepped aside as majority leader in September, in accordance with House rules, after a Travis County grand jury indicted him. Until Saturday, he sought a quick acquittal or dismissal of the charges on the way to reclaiming the top job.

DeLay told the Chronicle on Saturday that in recent days he discussed his situation with GOP leaders, including Hastert, and considered several options, including resigning from Congress.

In the end he decided against quitting Congress because "I still have a lot to contribute to the Houston-Galveston area," he said.

His decision is expected to trigger a fierce succession battle for leadership, with several GOP lawmakers expected to challenge Rep. Roy Blunt, the Missouri Republican who replaced DeLay on a temporary basis.

Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Education Committee, is expected to announce his candidacy for majority leader today. DeLay said he won't endorse anyone as a successor.

House Republican leaders, who as recently as last month refused to consider replacing DeLay permanently, praised his decision to step down.

"It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Hastert remarked. He said he expects to schedule the majority-leader election for the first week of February.

Other Republicans who were openly critical of DeLay in recent weeks expressed relief that they could install a new leader unshaded by an ethical cloud.

"I look forward to the democratic process of choosing a new majority leader who will ensure that integrity, honesty and ethical accountability are central tenets of government operations in Washington," Rep. Charlie Bass, R-N.H., said.

GOP petition drive

Bass, along with Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., spearheaded a petition drive among Republican lawmakers late last week to force a new leadership election.

DeLay dismissed the significance of the criticism within the GOP, saying it reflected the views of only 20 or 30 members.

"I enjoyed incredibly strong support," he said.

In recent statements, President Bush defended DeLay, who has been a crucial ally in pushing the White House legislative agenda. But the administration signaled Saturday that it is ready to move on.

"We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first," Bush spokeswoman Erin Healy said.

For Democrats, DeLay's absence from the leadership is a double-edged sword. His skill at rounding up congressional votes frequently deprived the minority party of legislative successes, but Democrats also had made him their poster child for an emerging campaign theme attacking a "culture of corruption" in the GOP-run Congress.

"The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," House Democratic leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Saturday.

DeLay's Texas criminal case probably will remain pending by the time Congress resumes business at the end of the month. But for many lawmakers, the turning point for DeLay's fate as a leader came when the Justice Department announced the plea agreement with Abramoff.

He is expected to provide incriminating information about members of Congress and their staffers who were involved in his lobbying schemes.

DeLay, never mentioned as a target of the investigation before the lobbyist admitted guilt, has been closely associated with Abramoff for more than a decade. The lawmaker took three foreign trips with the lobbyist, who used his clients' funds to defray a sizable portion of the costs in a way that DeLay has said was legal.

Former DeLay staffers figure prominently in the investigation. For instance, Michael Scanlon, his former spokesman, worked with Abramoff, agreed to a plea deal in November and is cooperating with investigators. DeLay's former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, is referred to as "Staffer A" in the Abramoff case and reportedly is cooperating with authorities.

DeLay's support among Republicans at home will remain strong, said Jared Woodfill, chairman of the Harris County Republican Party.

"Ultimately, it is not good for him to be outside of the leadership," Woodfill said, "but politically, I think he will be just fine. The people of the district know him quite well, and they will send him back to D.C."

However, recent polls show that DeLay is likely to face a bruising and expensive re-election battle in a redrawn district that includes many voters who are relatively unfamiliar with him.

He faces a well-financed Democratic opponent, Nick Lampson, who lost his Beaumont-area congressional seat in 2004 as a result of DeLay's redistricting scheme. Former Republican U.S. Rep. Steve Stockman of Friendswood has signed up for the November ballot as an independent candidate for DeLay's job.

Supporters Point To DeLay's Impact On 22nd District (HCHRON)

By ERIC HANSON

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

SUGAR LAND - After using a letter to tell his congressional colleagues about his new political plans, U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay surrounded himself with supporters Saturday on the sun-drenched steps of his hometown's City Hall as he read a similar statement to reporters.

About 70 other people turned out to show solidarity with their veteran congressman. A few held DeLay re-election-campaign signs as the congressman delivered prepared remarks with his wife, Christine, at his side.

DeLay explained to the news media that he is abandoning hopes of being House majority leader again. But first there was a procession of sorts and speeches by other politicians.

Having gathered inside Sugar Land City Hall with DeLay, his supporters started the event by lining up outside on the steps. DeLay followed, with other elected officials.

Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace took the podium and credited DeLay with advancing mobility projects such as the renovation of U.S. 59 and improvements at Sugar Land Regional Airport.

"You are very effective in fighting for the city of Sugar Land, for Fort Bend County and for this region, and we want to say thank you," Wallace said.

Wallace was followed by U.S. Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands, who said DeLay will remain a fixture of power in the House of Representatives.

"I would caution those to not write this political obituary just yet," Brady said.

"Tom DeLay is a force of nature. He is a true conservative leader and will remain a conservative and effective leader in the U.S. House of Representatives," Brady said to loud applause.

Brady also said DeLay has a profound impact on getting federal funds for highways, NASA and the area's medical and science communities.

"We are not losing a majority leader. We are gaining a member of Congress who can devote full-time as he has for so long to expanding freedoms, to strengthening families, to delivering for Texas and delivering the most effective voice for this congressional district in Houston," Brady said. "Tom, we love you."

DeLay said he would continue to work for the people of the 22nd District, which stretches across Fort Bend, Harris, Brazoria and Galveston counties.

"I have worked very hard to meet their needs and serve their values in Washington," DeLay said. "Those needs and values will now best be served by allowing House Republicans to set a new course and to unite behind a new and focused leader."

DeLay also reminded supporters of this year's election.

"As you know, I am still a candidate for re-election this November, and I plan to run a very vigorous campaign, and I plan to win it," he said.

He has opposition in the Republican primary in March and the general election in the fall.

The only reference DeLay made to the Texas indictments he is facing was a statement that he has always obeyed the law.

"In the 21 years I have been in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of the House and the laws of our land. And time once again will bear out that truth," he said.

However, DeLay has been scolded several times by the House Ethics Committee.

After his remarks, he and the crowd went back into City Hall without taking questions.

DeLay Likely To Win Party Nomination In 22nd District (HCHRON)

By KRISTEN MACK

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008787

U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay's departure from the House leadership shrinks his national stature, but he is still likely to win his party's nomination in the 22nd District and will be a formidable candidate for re-election, supporters and a key opponent said Saturday.

"He had to take a position for the betterment of the Republican Party and to the detriment of the Houston area," said Fort Bend County Republican Party Chairman Eric Thode. "There's never been a question about his re-election. It's only been fomented by those that are delusional."

DeLay was forced to step aside as House majority leader last year when he was indicted in Travis County on charges relating to campaign fundraising for 2002 legislative races.

On Saturday, under mounting pressure from Republican House members, he abandoned his bid to regain the post, setting the stage for GOP House leadership elections.

DeLay faces three opponents in the March 7 Republican primary.

Biggest challenge

In November, he also may face former Republican Rep. Steve Stockman, who has filed as an independent. Stockman will need to petition for a place on the ballot — which also will include the Libertarian Party nominee and possibly one other independent who has already filed. It is too late for anyone else to file as an independent.

But DeLay's biggest challenge comes from former U.S. Rep. Nick Lampson, who is unopposed in the Democratic primary.

Lampson and GOP leaders expect that DeLay easily will win his party's nomination over challengers Pat Baig, Tom Campbell and Michael Fjetland.

"Not one has any money, following or name ID," Thode said. "We are 100 percent behind DeLay and will continue to stand behind him."

In an unusual move last summer, the Fort Bend and Harris County Republican parties passed resolutions supporting DeLay. Traditionally party leaders remain publicly neutral about contests in their party primaries.

DeLay's situation presents a special circumstance, Harris County GOP Chairman Jared Woodfill said Saturday.

"Because of the circumstances and all DeLay has done for our agenda, principles and values, we are going to stand with him while he is under attack," Woodfill said.

Woodfill said the 22nd Congressional District will suffer because DeLay has lost his position of power, a fall Woodfill blames on a "politically motivated partisan prosecutor who has been able to shake up our leadership."

Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, whose office is prosecuting DeLay, is a Democrat.

But DeLay will continue to be an effective representative of the district, Woodfill said, predicting DeLay will win the primary and the November general election.

Primary opponent Campbell, a lawyer, said DeLay did the right thing by ending his bid for the House majority-leader position.

"Tom has become preoccupied with a whole series of issues that make it difficult for him to continue to serve in leadership positions," Campbell said. "If he hadn't made the decision, he would not have enough votes to become the majority leader. Tom's days as a Washington power broker are coming to a close."

Internal party pressure

DeLay should withdraw from the race and focus on his own issues while the Republican Party focuses on returning to its roots, Campbell said.

"We need to clean our house in March, and if we don't, we run the risk of losing the House in November," Campbell said.

Lampson, who expects DeLay to be his Republican opponent, said he anticipates a tough race but thinks the residents of the district are ready for new leadership.

DeLay can no longer use the "partisan witch-hunt argument" to explain his problems, Lampson said.

Although the state case is prosecuted by a Democrat, an unrelated federal investigation by the Republican administration's Justice Department has touched DeLay and others in Congress. It centers on lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has a long history of ties to DeLay and other Republicans.

And fellow Republicans in Congress began pushing late last week for DeLay to abandon efforts to regain his leadership position.

"There had to have been a great deal of pressure from his own party, whose members lost confidence in him, to make him step down," Lampson said.

Rice University political scientist Bob Stein said DeLay's hopes to be part of the House leadership unraveled in the past 24 hours under pressure from within his party.

"Republicans are worried about midterm elections," Stein said.

The question now, he said, is whether residents of the district view DeLay's departure from the leadership as a significant political liability.

"The only thing that's ironic about it, is it leaves the state without a single member of the delegation, on either side, as part of the leadership," Stein said. "The very thing DeLay sought to provide, a place at the table for Texas, is all lost now. Texas is just as hurt by this as the Republican Party."

DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Leader's Post (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay permanently gave up leadership of House Republicans yesterday, setting off a new leadership race that is shaping up as a referendum on the direction of the Republican Party in Congress.

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," the Texas Republican told reporters after he sent letters to his colleagues and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert informing them of his decision. He said he will remain in Congress and seek re-election in his district in November.

Mr. Hastert said leadership elections will be held the week of Jan. 30, giving candidates about three weeks to campaign to fill Mr. DeLay's former position.

Both the acting majority leader, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, and Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee, are expected to run. Unidentified sources close to Mr. Blunt last night released a list of six members who will publicly campaign for him, and a source close to Mr. Boehner countered with seven Republicans who will actively campaign on his behalf.

By running for the leader's spot, Mr. Blunt leaves open the majority whip's slot, and candidates were lining up to run for it as well.

A spokesman for Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, also a potential candidate, said yesterday that members have been asking him to run, though he has made no decision.

Democrats said Mr. DeLay's announcement doesn't end Republicans' political peril over charges of corruption.

"By forcing out Tom DeLay, Republicans have addressed a party problem, but not the institutional problem of corruption that most troubles the American people," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

To prepare for the leadership elections, Mr. Blunt and Mr. Hastert both bowed out of a congressional delegation scheduled to leave tomorrow for a two-week trip to Asia.

Mr. DeLay had stepped aside temporarily as House Republicans' floor leader after he was indicted in Texas on Sept. 28. He said he would clear his name and reclaim his leader's post within months, but his situation worsened last week after lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to corruption charges and agreed to tell prosecutors about his connections to members of Congress.

Mr. DeLay said he has always acted within ethics rules, but he faced falling support among the conservative activists who had been his biggest boosters. Moreover, two other Republican members of Congress -- Rep. Charles Bass of New Hampshire and Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona -- began to gather petition signatures to force new leadership elections.

"Today's been a very good day for Republicans and our conference and Congress," Mr. Bass said yesterday. He said the recent ethical and criminal charges have not helped Republicans or Democrats, and the leadership elections are healthy for everyone.

"This is a serious problem, this Abramoff thing, for Republicans and Democrats. But it's not the Democrats that are leading the country right now," he said, adding that the ethics issues will be paramount in the new leadership elections. "The standards all members should look for in the replacement leadership need to be high."

Mr. Flake said the new elections must be about more than just new faces.

"We need to make sure this is a proper election and not just an affirmation of the interim structure," he said, calling for a "course correction."

While the ethics charges may have been the latest issue, Mr. Flake said there had been a growing realization among some members that under Mr. DeLay, the party had lost its way on other issues.

"I think for a lot of people they're thinking, 'Why are we trying so hard to keep him?' His view has obviously changed over the years about government," Mr. Flake said in a telephone interview before Mr. DeLay made his announcement.

Republican strategist Michael McKenna said resentment against some of Mr. DeLay's comments last year on federal spending and the 2003 vote on adding a prescription-drug program to Medicare hurt Mr. DeLay among his conference.

"Tom DeLay's legal problem simply provided an opportunity for that resentment to come to the front," he said, adding that the upcoming elections will be a battle for the fundamental direction House Republicans will take.

Mr. McKenna said one figure to watch in the elections is Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, who is chairman of the Republican Study Committee (RSC), a group of 100 conservatives. As chairman of the RSC, Mr. Pence has become a major political force.

"A large chunk of that caucus is going to be looking to him for cues about how to think about this choice," Mr. McKenna said.

Mr. Pence and many other Republicans released statements yesterday that praised Mr. DeLay for his three years as majority leader and eight years as majority whip and for putting the interests of the party first by stepping down.

DeLay's Own Tactics May Have Hurt Him (HCHRON)

By JULIE MASON

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - In his nearly 20-year climb to the No. 2 job in the House, U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay has deployed a cunning and toughness that may have cost him friends but often won the battle — until now.

In his announcement that he would step down as House majority leader permanently, the vaunted counter of House floor votes may have calculated that this time, he lacked the votes to remain viable as a candidate for restoration to leadership.

In many ways, the Sugar Land Republican has been brought up short by the partisan, no-holds-barred political culture he helped create in the House, observers said.

"He shifted the game of politics from one of comity to one of ruling from an ironclad, 'with-us-or-against-us' philosophy," said Bob Stein, Rice University political scientist and pollster. "He felt you had to choose sides, and being neutral wasn't allowed. Over time, he just accrued too many enemies."

In 1984, DeLay shaved his mustache after a study by developer Bob Perry found Republicans with facial hair were not electable. He won a seat in Congress soon after, and a career of doing what it took to win was off and running.

DeLay's pugnacious style quickly earned him a reputation in the House, where Texans such as former House Speaker Sam Rayburn, also a onetime Democratic majority leader, generally had made a trademark of forging coalitions and building bridges across the aisle.

But DeLay's preferred method was different. As a campaigner and on the House floor, DeLay spoke with firebrand contempt for Democrats, especially liberals.

Although fiercely partisan, DeLay has rarely flinched from holding prominent members of his own party accountable when they violated what he believed were key tenets of conservatism.

In 1990, DeLay was among the most vocal critics of former President George H.W. Bush's decision to relent on a campaign pledge to create no new taxes. He also turned on former ally Newt Gingrich in a failed plot to oust the then-speaker.

DeLay, who denies wrongdoing in political activities that have brought criminal investigations, has been under a near-constant ethical cloud since 1993, when he was shown on national TV wearing knickers and playing golf on a trip paid for by lobbyists.

In 1995, DeLay was central to launching the K Street Project, an effort to pressure lobbying and trade organizations, generally headquartered on Washington's K Street, to hire more Republicans.

His tough gamesmanship on the lobbying issue drew notice in 1998, when DeLay led House Republicans in holding up a vote on intellectual property rights, apparently to punish a trade association supporting the bill for its plans to hire a top Democratic lobbyist.

The incident earned him an admonishment from the House Ethics Committee. It was just one of the many probes and investigations into DeLay's fundraising and political activities through the years.

Largely undaunted, DeLay raised $15 million in 1999 for GOP candidates, which helped pave his path to House leadership. He was sued the next year by Democratic leaders claiming he was extorting funds from donors. The case was dropped with both sides declaring victory.

Throughout, DeLay has remained defiant and seemingly unconcerned by criticism, saying in 2003, shortly after he was elected majority leader, "I have just never worried about what people think of me or what the critics say."

He added, "I don't see myself as mean-spirited. I'm just passionate."

His most recent years spent as majority leader brought some of DeLay's more high-profile moments in Congress as he proved indispensable to the advancement of President Bush's legislative agenda and helped obtain — or block — funding for Houston projects, depending on his view of them.

When the House took up major Medicare changes in 2003, DeLay encouraged fiscal conservatives to hold out for a law that would give private health-insurance companies incentives to compete for Medicare dollars.

The House passed the bill to provide a prescription-drug benefit by one vote after some controversial arm-twisting on wavering GOP members by DeLay and other House leaders.

The next year, DeLay was admonished again by the House Ethics Committee, which found he offered to support the House candidacy of Michigan Republican Nick Smith's son in return for the lawmaker's vote on the Medicare drug benefit.

Last year DeLay's interest was drawn by the case of Terri Schiavo, a Florida woman in a brain-dead state whose husband was seeking permission from the courts to take her off life support.

DeLay led an effort in Congress to pass an emergency law granting a federal court review of the Schiavo case, only to see the U.S. Supreme Court refuse to intervene.

Her feeding tube was removed by court order, and Schiavo died 13 days later. DeLay, in remarks he later apologized for, essentially threatened the judges who allowed it to happen.

"The time will come for the men responsible for this to answer for their behavior," DeLay said.

Last year it was also DeLay's turn to be reminded by conservatives about party tenets of fiscal responsibility. After saying that hurricane-relief funds should be provided generously, DeLay later joined the move to cut the federal budget to allow it.

Possible Successors To Tom Delay (AP-Y2)

AP, January 8, 2006

A look at two Republicans who may seek the House majority leader post vacated by Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas:

ROY BLUNT of MISSOURI:

Low key and affable in public, Blunt presents a marked contrast to the hard-driving DeLay, whom Blunt succeeded as House Republican whip in 2003 and now may seek to ascend to the second-ranking post of majority leader.

Blunt, 56, has risen rapidly through his party's ranks since winning election to Missouri's 7th District in 1996. DeLay, who was the GOP whip at the time, tapped Blunt as his top deputy in 1999. Blunt became whip, in charge of counting and nailing down votes, when DeLay became majority leader in 2003.

Blunt took over as acting majority leader in September when DeLay, indicted by a Texas grand jury on charges of conspiring to violate political fundraising laws, was forced to step aside.

Blunt's early tenure was marked by uneven success as Republicans struggled to pass a deficit-cutting bill, then suffered the defeat of a bill to cut spending on social programs.

Republicans rebounded quickly, passing the deficit bill after making changes to mollify party moderates, then resurrecting the spending measure.

While different in style from the stridently partisan DeLay, Blunt is equally conservative and took a leading role in moving President Bush's tax cut packages through the House. As whip, Blunt took the lead last year in the uphill struggle to secure votes needed to pass the Central America Free Trade Agreement.

Blunt was raised on a farm near Springfield, Mo., the son of a dairy farmer and a state legislator. After teaching high school government and history, Blunt became involved in Republican politics. In 1984, Blunt became his state's first Republican secretary of state in more than 50 years.

Blunt lost in the GOP primary for governor in 1992. For the next four years, he was president of his alma mater, Southwest Baptist University. In 1996, when the Republican incumbent retired, Blunt easily captured a seat in Congress from his solidly Republican district.

Blunt garnered some controversy when he unsuccessfully tried to slip a measure into the 2002 bill creating the Homeland Security Department that would have benefited tobacco giant Philip Morris. At the time Blunt had a personal relationship with a lobbyist for the company, Abigail Perlman. Blunt divorced his wife of 35 years and married Perlman in 2003.

Blunt has three children, including Matt Blunt, who was elected Missouri governor last year.

JOHN BOEHNER OF OHIO:

Boehner came to Congress 15 years ago as a crusader against what he saw as the excesses of Democratic power. He was elected to the leadership when Republicans gained a majority in the 1994 election landslide. Boehner lost his post in the hierarchy four years later amid internal struggles following a coup attempt against then-Speaker Newt Gingrich.

As chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, Boehner helped shepherd Bush's No Child Left Behind education bill through the House. In 2002, Bush traveled to Boehner's district on Ohio's western border to sign the measure into law.

Boehner has a strong conservative record, but has also shown an ability to reach across party lines. He pushed pension legislation through the House last year, attracting nearly 300 votes after a last-minute accommodation with the United Auto Workers.

Boehner, 56, was born in Cincinnati to a family of 12 children. He ran a successful plastics and packaging company before winning local and state elections in the 1980s and capturing his seat in Congress in 1990.

During his freshmen year, Boehner became part of the "Gang of Seven" that went after the ethical lapses, mainly of the Democratic majority, including the House Bank scandal. It turned out that lawmakers were writing checks to the House's internal bank without the money to back them up.

Boehner and his wife, Debbie, have two daughters.

After Tom DeLay (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

TEXAS REPUBLICAN Tom DeLay's decision yesterday to permanently relinquish the majority leader's post was necessary but not sufficient for the health of the House majority he dominated for so long.

It's necessary because, notwithstanding his assertion yesterday that "I have always acted in an ethical manner," Mr. DeLay is an ethical recidivist unfit to lead. If the repeated admonishments of the House ethics committee weren't enough to convince his colleagues, consider some of the latest disclosures: The Post's R. Jeffrey Smith reported on a DeLay-linked group, the U.S. Family Network, that appears to have secretly received $1 million from Russian oil and gas executives seeking to induce Mr. DeLay to support a loan bailout for Russia. Foreign companies and individuals aren't permitted to make campaign contributions; such back-door influence buying is especially pernicious.

In addition, according to the guilty plea entered by Jack Abramoff, the former lobbyist arranged for payments totaling $50,000 to the wife of "Staffer A" -- identified as Tony C. Rudy, Mr. DeLay's former deputy chief of staff -- in exchange for Mr. Rudy's help in defeating an Internet gambling bill. The stench surrounding Mr. DeLay had been growing more pungent daily; his decision had the air of inevitability.

But House Republicans need not only to shed Mr. DeLay; they also need to change the way their party has operated under his leadership and that of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and others. For a start, Congress should strengthen the rules governing lobbying, requiring fuller disclosure of the ties between lawmakers and lobbyists. Mr. DeLay did all he could to thicken those bonds, with his K Street project to install more Republicans in key lobbying jobs and his bullying lists of how much lobbyists were giving to each side. More sunlight -- disclosure of the amounts of money steered to lawmakers, the gifts lavished on members and staff -- would have gone a long way to disinfect Mr. Abramoff and to diminish the impact of Mr. DeLay's political hammer.

As Mr. DeLay's golf outings and other excursions demonstrated, the prohibition on travel paid for by an individual lobbyist makes little sense when corporations and other groups that lobby Congress can foot the bill and send their lobbyists along for the ride. The rules about privately funded travel should be tightened to bar lawmakers and staff from accepting reimbursement for trips underwritten, directly or indirectly, by entities that engage in lobbying.

Nor should these changes be limited to the House; the systemic vulnerabilities exploited by Mr. Abramoff are equally evident in the Senate. It is time to consider whether, in this age of partisan division, the existing congressional ethics process can be made to work or whether a different model is required.

Further, earmarks inserted in the dead of night to fund lawmakers' pet projects -- and secure their votes for measures -- are an invitation to abuse. So is, in violation of House rules, unveiling mammoth bills just hours before a scheduled vote. So, too, is the all-too-routine habit of making significant changes to legislation after it emerges from committee and then eliminating, or drastically limiting, lawmakers' ability to offer amendments on the floor. Representative democracy can't function when these practices prevail.

And there is a more fundamental question that the Abramoff mess, and the DeLay departure, ought to prompt House leaders to ask themselves -- or that voters may ask, and answer, for them: What is the purpose of the Republican majority? Is it simply, as some of the leadership's behavior would suggest, to amass, cement and retain power by whatever means necessary? Or, as Republicans claimed when they came to power a decade ago, do they stand for something: a different method of doing business, a belief in limited government, commitment to spending restraint? If there is a role for the Republican machine other than self-perpetuation, it's awfully hard to discern right now. That, as much as anything, ought to be what the upcoming leadership elections are about.

States Intervene After Drug Plan Hits Early Snags (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Low-income Medicare beneficiaries around the country were often overcharged, and some were turned away from pharmacies without getting their medications, in the first week of Medicare's new drug benefit. The problems have prompted emergency action by some states to protect their citizens.

Although there are no hard numbers, concerns expressed by state officials and complaints from pharmacists suggest a widespread pattern of problems.

At least four states - Maine, New Hampshire, North Dakota and Vermont - acted this week to make sure poor people received the drugs they were promised but could not obtain through the federal Medicare program.

Gov. Jim Douglas of Vermont, a Republican, said the state would pay drug claims for low-income people until the federal government fixed problems in the new program, known as Part D of Medicare. Michael K. Smith, the state's secretary of human services, said, "The federal system simply is not working."

On Thursday, the Vermont Legislature passed a bill declaring, "There is a public health emergency due to the federal implementation of Medicare Part D, which has resulted in serious operational problems, causing Vermonters to be turned away at the pharmacy without the drugs they need."

Many factors contributed to the initial chaos. Some people who enrolled in Medicare drug plans did not have any proof of coverage. Pharmacists could not get the information needed to verify eligibility for drug benefits and low-income subsidies. Insurance companies and their pharmacy benefit managers were swamped with calls, so pharmacists often had to wait an hour or more on telephone help lines.

Federal officials promised improvements, but state officials were growing impatient.

In Maine, Gov. John Baldacci, a Democrat, agreed to pay drug claims to provide medications for those in need. Since Tuesday, the state has incurred $2 million of expenses for Medicare beneficiaries.

On Friday, Gov. John Hoeven of North Dakota, a Republican, said he had to act because "some low-income elderly and disabled individuals can't get their prescriptions filled through their Medicare drug plans."

In New Hampshire, Gov. John Lynch, a Democrat, signed an executive order authorizing the state to pay drug claims that he said should have been covered by Medicare. Republican leaders of the state legislature called a special session to provide the money. The start of the Medicare drug program "has been a nightmare for many of our citizens," Governor Lynch said.

"Many are being charged unaffordable co-payments for prescription drugs - co-pays much higher than they are supposed to be. Too many of them are leaving pharmacies without their prescriptions."

Thomas T. Noland Jr., a spokesman for Humana Inc., a major national insurer, said that some problems were "to be expected in a new program with lots of new enrollment taking effect all at once."

Cynthia G. Tudor, a senior Medicare official, told insurers on Wednesday that they must "immediately make improvements" to "ensure that all beneficiaries get their prescriptions filled at the point of sale."

In a memorandum to insurers, Ms. Tudor said she had received "numerous reports" that they were "inappropriately denying some scripts," or claims. In many cases, she said, insurers are not providing the data that pharmacies need to file claims and get paid.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said on Saturday that he was working closely with states to address their concerns and to help individual patients. "We are filling close to a million prescriptions a day, including hundreds of thousands for low-income beneficiaries," Dr. McClellan said. "Many, many people are getting the prescriptions they need."

But in an interview on Friday, Stan Rosenstein, the Medicaid director in California, said: "We are hearing more and more complaints. A significant number of people are not getting their prescriptions. That has us very troubled."

Drug benefits are delivered by private insurers under contract to Medicare. The federal government is supposed to compute the subsidy available to each low-income beneficiary. But Michael Polzin, a spokesman for Walgreens drug stores, said that, in many cases, that information had not been shared with insurers or pharmacists.

Under Medicare rules, each drug plan is supposed to have a transition policy, providing a temporary supply - typically 30 days - of any prescription that a person was previously taking. But customer service representatives at Medicare's toll-free telephone number said they knew nothing of this requirement, and beneficiaries said it had been virtually impossible to take advantage of it.

Nationwide, 6.2 million low-income people receive both Medicare and Medicaid. About 1.1 million of them live in California. They tend to have many chronic illnesses and high drug costs. Cheryl Meronk, manager of the health insurance counseling program in Orange County, Calif., said she was referring people to hospital emergency rooms because they had been unable to get urgently needed medications through Medicare.

Under the standard Medicare drug benefit, which took effect on Jan. 1, the patient pays a $250 deductible and 25 percent of the next $2,000 in annual drug costs.

Over the last year, Medicare officials repeatedly assured poor people that they would receive extra help, so they would not have to pay any deductible and their co-payments would not exceed $5 a prescription.

But Carol A. Herrmann-Steckel, commissioner of the Alabama Medicaid Agency, said that Medicare beneficiaries with very low incomes had often been required to pay the full $250 deductible and co-payments far exceeding $5. "One beneficiary borrowed the money," she said. "Another charged the $250 on a credit card because she was in such dire need of the medicine."

Beverly R. Churchwell, an aide to the Alabama commissioner, said: "Some Medicare beneficiaries have not been able to get their medications. They are being turned away at the pharmacy."

John J. Morris, 42, of Ware, Mass., who has diabetes and multiple sclerosis, signed up for a Medicare drug plan on Nov. 16. The insurer told him his co-payments would not exceed $5, he said, but at the pharmacy this week, he was told he had to pay $23 for each of three drugs.

"I could not afford it," Mr. Morris said, "so I was not able to get my insulin or my M.S. drug."

In Oregon, Sandy K. Hata, a field manager for the State Department of Human Services, said: "We've had calls from people in tears who could not get their medications. These people were being asked to pay a $250 deductible and hundreds of dollars in co-payments."

Jane-ellen A. Weidanz, the Medicare project manager at the Oregon Department of Human Services, said, the $250 deductible "is hitting people very hard," adding: "People are very angry and very upset. They are yelling at us. They feel that we lied to them. They feel Medicare lied to them. They feel they cannot trust anything we say about this program."

Texas reported a similar problem. Low-income beneficiaries are "being charged incorrect (high) co-payments," the state's Health and Human Services Commission said in an e-mail message to the Dallas office of the federal Medicare agency.

In Oklahoma, low-income Medicare beneficiaries were often charged the $250 deductible. "They are being treated as if they were in a higher income bracket," said Mike Fogarty, chief executive of the Oklahoma Health Care Authority. "It's a common problem."

Steven E. Hahn, a spokesman for AARP, which offers a drug plan insured by UnitedHealth Group, said he knew that some low-income people had had difficulty getting medications. "We are taking this very seriously," he said. "This is a global problem, a systemwide problem, for all plan sponsors."

Elizabeth L. Stone, 86, who lives alone in an apartment in Manchester, N.H., is enrolled in both Medicare and Medicaid, has arthritis and a thyroid ailment and is in a wheelchair. She tried to use the new Medicare benefit to fill a prescription this week, but failed.

"I did not get any medication," Ms. Stone said. "People at the pharmacy would not give it to me because they do not know how they will be reimbursed."

Another low-income beneficiary, Terence J. Stevens, 65, of Lakeland, Fla., said he signed up for the drug plan on Nov. 15, the first day on which enrollment was allowed. His plan tried to charge him a $47 co-payment for a drug to treat irregular heartbeats and high blood pressure. Mr. Stevens said he was unable to pay and did not get the drug.

In Alabama, William M. Beasley, a pharmacist and a Democratic member of the State House of Representatives, said, "I have had more difficulty trying to process claims for Medicare recipients than I've had with any other insurer in 43 years as a pharmacist."

Seniors Aided In Medicare Drug Plan Changes (FREEP)

By KATIE MERX

Detroit Free Press, January 8, 2006

Isaac Penson signed up for a Medicare prescription drug plan before the new year with help from someone at his church, but he didn't realize he'd have to pay a $250 out-of-pocket deductible before the plan he chose would pay for any drugs or that the plan he chose wouldn't cover his blood-pressure medicine.

The 84-year-old Detroiter doesn't have $250. And he ran out of his blood-pressure medicine, Norvasc, earlier this week. He takes it to keep his high blood pressure from causing a heart attack, stroke or kidney problems.

The cash price for 30 Norvasc tablets is about $50. He can't afford that, either.

Now, with help from the Michigan Medicare Medicaid Assistance Program this week, Penson was able to change to a plan he can afford.

The new plan doesn't have a $250 deductible and allows him to fill each of his prescriptions for a $15 co-pay. The catch is that he can't use the new plan until next month.

Penson is one of a large number of seniors who are going without vital medicines or paying for them out of pocket because of glitches in the new Medicare drug benefit system and confusion over how it works. The good news, though, is there is time and assistance to help seniors switch to a plan that works for them.

The Medicare drug benefit, which took effect on Jan. 1, is supposed to improve access to prescription drugs for seniors and disabled people by helping them pay for their medication. Enrollment without a penalty of higher premiums continues through May 15.

It's the first time Medicare has offered to help pay for prescription drugs.

More than 1.5 million Michiganders and 40 million other Americans are eligible for the new benefit. The Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services says more than half of all eligible people nationwide have enrolled.

But implementation of the new benefit has Medicare beneficiaries and pharmacists twirling in a sea of confusion and frustration.

"Some people with Medicare -- seniors and people with disabilities -- are experiencing challenges in that they selected a plan and didn't realize it had a $250 deductible," said Mary Johnson, executive director of the Michigan Medicare Medicaid Assistance Program.

More than half of the new Medicare drug plans carry $250 deductibles.

Other enrollees believed the plans they signed up for covered their specific medications, but now are finding the prescriptions aren't covered or that their doctors have to file a special application before the drug plan will pay for them.

The new benefits have overwhelmed many enrollees because they've had to choose from among dozens of plans provided by a slew of private companies. Each plan covers a different mix of drugs, is affiliated with its own network of pharmacies, and charges its own monthly premiums and co-pays.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services reports that more than 1 million people have received prescriptions through the drug benefit since it took effect on Sunday.

But pharmacists report that many people who believe they enrolled haven't been so lucky.

Many people enrolled before the end of the year, but never received confirmation or a benefits card, pharmacists said.

In many cases, couples that sent their applications in on the same day find that one spouse already has received a benefits card and the other hasn't.

And the national computer system that's supposed to verify Medicare drug plan enrollment is so overloaded that pharmacists have been unable to verify benefits for many of their patients, said Al Knaak, head pharmacist and a part owner at Village Pharmacy II in Ann Arbor.

Pharmacists also report that they're having difficulty getting through by computer or telephone to the insurance companies running the drug plans.

"The wait on line with some of the insurance companies is up to 30 minutes now," Knaak said. "Sometimes you can't get through. It's becoming more chaotic as the week goes on."

"Our call volume has gone up during the course of the week," said Louanne Bakk, director of access and benefits assistance at the Area Agency on Aging in Southfield. The agency has been fielding calls from dozens of seniors and disabled people trying to navigate the new Medicare drug benefit.

Village Pharmacy, like many small and large pharmacies, is providing patients with two or three days of medication while they attempt to verify benefits.

"Sometimes if we call first thing in the morning or late in the evening, we're able to get through," Knaak said. If they're lucky, the patients receive their card before they run out of the emergency supply, he said. That's the easiest way to verify enrollment.

Walgreen Co. spokeswoman Tiffani Bruce said the system was overwhelmed by the initial demand, but the situation seemed to be improving by the second half of the week.

"I'm really looking for it to get better next week," Knaak said.

U.S. Plans For Future Without Sharon (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 8, 2006

In deference to an ailing ally, the Bush administration is saying little publicly about how it intends to fan flickering Mideast peace hopes if Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remains incapacitated or does not survive.

Privately, American officials are gathering their thoughts and making some tentative moves despite uncertainty about who would succeed the 77-year-old prime minister.

Sharon remained in serious condition Saturday after undergoing his second brain operation in two days on Friday, two days after suffering a major stroke and bleeding in his brain.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cleared her schedule, canceling visits to Indonesia and Australia to remain in Washington and on top of the situation.

"She thought it was the right thing to do, to be here with her foreign policy team," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

And even as administration officials awaited developments in Jerusalem, they were trying to address the deteriorating security situation in Gaza. The U.S. security coordinator, Maj. Gen. Keith Dayton, has returned to the region to try to get a handle on violence in the Palestinian territory.

"There is no central authority," said Edward S. Walker, a former U.S. ambassador to Israel and to Egypt. "It is not a question of terrorism, but pure, outright criminal behavior."

Administration officials decline to acknowledge that they inevitably have to look beyond Sharon. Spokesman McCormack said only that "our focus is on our solidarity with the Israeli people in what is a tough time."

But Walker, a longtime diplomat in the Middle East and Washington, said in an interview that the first thing U.S. officials must be thinking about is what President Bush would say at a funeral. And Bush's attendance is essential, he said.

"They are mapping out a strategy," Walker said. "They have to be ready to move."

U.S. officials "are going to have to pin down" Ehud Olmert, who temporarily took the reins of power from Sharon and could be a top contender for prime minister in a previously scheduled March 28 election.

Before Sharon was stricken, polls pointed to victory for Kadima, the centrist political party Sharon founded after he broke with many of his longtime supporters in the hard-line Likud.

Benjamin Netanyahu, a former prime minister generally placed to the right of Sharon, is a likely contender for the top job.

Walker said he thought the administration favored Kadima, but added: "They cannot get too enmeshed in the election campaign."

Daniel Kurtzer, also a former U.S. ambassador to Israel and to Egypt, said there were probably two things on the minds of administration officials.

One is how to stabilize the situation, Kurtzer said in an interview. He said that means "ensuring that the leadership that emerges in the post-Sharon era continues along the line Sharon has laid out — a tough response to terrorism, but flexibility and creativity in peacemaking."

The second, Kurtzer said, is that the administration would be "laying down markers on the Arab side, particularly with the Palestinians, not to take advantage of what they might perceive to be a period of instability in Israel."

The retired diplomat added, "My guess is that the administration is working on both to try to prevent a downward spiral."

Mideast history is instructive, with predictions often off the mark. But there are constants: U.S. efforts to maintain order and keep Israel and the Arabs on a peace track.

Sharon illustrates how events in the Middle East often defy expectations. The tough, unyielding ex-general wound up endorsing Palestinian statehood and withdrawing all Jewish settlers from Gaza and part of the West Bank.

Nearly three decades ago, Menachem Begin, another dedicated hardliner, agreed to relinquish Sinai to Egypt in exchange for a peace treaty.

The Arab leader he negotiated with, Anwar Sadat, had vowed only months before the accord that peace with Israel was a worthy objective, but not until the next generation.

Scan Shows Slight Improvement In Condition Of Israel's Sharon (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 -- Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remained in critical condition Saturday, but a new round of tests revealed a slight improvement in the physical state of his brain.

Despite some positive signs, including evidence suggesting that the side of his brain controlling speech remains unharmed, doctors cautioned that it was too soon to tell whether Sharon would survive the massive stroke and extensive hemorrhaging he has endured in recent days.

"We as people are optimists," said Shlomo Mor-Yosef, director of the Hadassah-Ein Kerem Hospital, where Sharon is being treated. "But I can't say that he is out of danger. His condition is still serious. But the scan shows slight improvement."

Sharon, 77, suffered a stroke Wednesday night caused by a blood clot that went to his brain. Doctors have performed three rounds of surgery struggling to control the resulting hemorrhaging, likely caused in part by blood-thinning medication Sharon was taking for a stroke he suffered last month.

The report by Mor-Yosef Saturday evening was the second consecutive assessment of the prime minister's condition that announced no new bleeding and a reduction in dangerous swelling that could cause permanent brain damage.

But whether Sharon, who has dominated Israeli's politics since becoming prime minister nearly five years ago, will recover and do so with his faculties intact remains uncertain.

"The team at Hadassah Hospital, along with the prime minister and the Sharon family, are fighting to save the prime minister's life," Mor-Yosef said.

Sharon's doctors were to meet Sunday morning to decide when to begin rousing him from a coma, medically induced to give his brain a chance to recover from the trauma of the stroke and repeated surgeries.

Only when he is conscious, Mor-Yosef said, will doctors be able to evaluate Sharon's brain function and any possible damage he has sustained.

Sharon underwent a scheduled brain scan Saturday morning to check for bleeding and to measure pressure inside his skull. A day earlier, a CT scan -- a special multiple X-ray screening process that allows viewing of interior body parts -- revealed fresh hemorrhaging and a spike in pressure. Sharon was rushed into five hours of emergency surgery.

The operation, in which a catheter was inserted to drain fluid from his skull, stanched the bleeding and reduced swelling. Mor-Yosef said the swelling declined further Saturday and that the prime minister's vital signs, including blood pressure and urine production, were within "normal ranges."

The tests also revealed that the left side of Sharon's brain appeared to be undamaged, a potentially auspicious sign for his recovery.

Sharon's hemorrhaging occurred on the right side of his brain, meaning he will likely suffer at least some paralysis on the left side of his body if he survives.

But doctors had also feared that the swelling caused by the bleeding may have squeezed the left side of the brain against the skull, causing damage to areas that control speech, faculties of analysis, and fine motor skills such as writing in a right-handed person. Sharon is right handed, according to one of the doctors treating him.

"The only thing we can say is that the left side of the prime minister's brain remains intact," Mor-Yosef said. "We will only know what this means when they wake the prime minister up gradually."

Much of the country paused for the Jewish Sabbath on a rain-blown Saturday, and many of Israel's rabbis continued calling on the nation to pray for Sharon's recovery.

His stroke has caused upheaval in Israel's political system, and his grave but stable condition has frozen many of the decisions that will determine who might replace him should he be unable to return to office.

"It looks as if his acute state is moving to what we'd call the sub-acute state," said Avi Cohen, a neurosurgeon at Soroka Medical Center in the southern Israeli city of Beersheba who is not directly involved in Sharon's case. "Given the picture of the left side of his brain, he might be able to speak and to write."

Cohen echoed Mor-Yosef, however, in saying it was still hard to know what injury Sharon's brain has suffered. He said doctors would wake him up very slowly and may only keep him conscious long enough to run initial tests to measure brain function.

"They are not in a hurry," Cohen said. "That's just the way it should be."

Arabs Ponder Life After Sharon (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

TEL AVIV -- With Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lying in critical condition over the weekend after suffering a stroke on Wednesday, Palestinians and the broader Arab world have looked on with apprehension.

A brain scan on Mr. Sharon yesterday showed a slight easing of swelling, said Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, director of Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem.

Dr. Jose Cohen, one of the neurosurgeons treating the prime minister, was quoted by Israeli radio as saying he thought Mr. Sharon would recover from the massive stroke he suffered and emerge in relatively good shape, but that after such a shock there would undoubtedly be cognitive damage.

Doctors were to decide today when to lift the prime minister's medically induced coma to examine the extent of the neurological damage.

The incapacitation of Mr. Sharon has stunned Israel's Arab neighbors. Yesterday, King Abdullah of Jordan telephoned acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to express his concern about Mr. Sharon's health, and a day earlier Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak called to say that bilateral relations would continue to improve, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported.

To be sure, most throughout the Arab world aren't forgiving Mr. Sharon for his tough response to the latest Palestinian uprising, or the massacre of Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps during Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

Video of Gazans passing out candy in response to the news of Mr. Sharon's stroke reflected widely shared sentiment that considers the Israeli prime minister to be a war criminal, analysts said.

And yet, the rehabilitation of Mr. Sharon's international reputation during his five years in office has also affected Palestinian views of the Israeli leader. Writing in the Palestinian daily Al-Ayyam, editor Abdel Nasser A-Najar compared Mr. Sharon to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and bemoaned the rising insecurity left behind by the two.

"The political map in both Israel and Palestine looks very complicated, with their borders intertwined and unclear. Even the road map looks like it is hibernating towards its death," he said.

"After Sharon, the Israeli people will live in a state of vacuum and confusion not different from the state that the Palestinians had undergone after Yasser Arafat's death. It will take years before both the Israelis and the Palestinians find leaders like Arafat and Sharon."

Mr. Sharon's stature as the chief political patron who helped the spread of Jewish settlements will probably overshadow, among Palestinians, his decision to relinquish Gaza.

Palestinians complain that the Gaza withdrawal has left residents cooped up in the tiny coastal strip while freeing Israel's hand to complete the construction of its separation barrier through the West Bank and bolstering existing Jewish settlements there. At the same time, they don't believe Mr. Sharon was prepared to renew peace negotiations that were halted just after he entered office five years ago.

"The Palestinians look at him as the master of unilateralism," said Palestinian legislator Hanan Ashrawi.

And yet, Mr. Sharon retains a special status among Palestinians for being the first Israeli prime minister able to evacuate Jewish settlements in Gaza and the West Bank.

"He hasn't negotiated, but he has dismantled the settlements, which was a precedent, and we can't ignore that. To people who look at it as a precedent, it's important that the settlements be dismantled to prove that settlements aren't a permanent feature of the landscape."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat expressed concern that the political vacuum in Israel would contribute to tension on the eve of a Palestinian parliamentary election scheduled for Jan. 25.

The transition from Mr. Sharon to Mr. Olmert may allow a dispute over the voting status of Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem to fester, and ultimately delay the election, Mr. Erekat warned.

"Sharon's illness will affect us more than anyone else as Palestinians. He is the one occupying our land," Mr. Erekat said. "I am worrying that the competition that will replace Sharon will build more settlements and more walls."

With Sharon Ill, Palestinians Face Own Travails (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 - The sudden political disappearance of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, struggling for life after a massive stroke, has thrown the future of any peace process with the Palestinians into question. But the Palestinian Authority itself is in such disarray that it may be incapable of negotiating on terms any Israeli leader could accept.

There is spreading chaos, a sense of deterioration and growing concern among both Palestinians and Israelis that the Palestinian Authority, nearly bankrupt and facing a huge budget deficit, may look like a failed state even before it becomes one.

Life for ordinary Palestinians is becoming harder, with less security and optimism than a year ago. The Israelis pulled out of Gaza - a thrilling moment for many Palestinians - but the territory has become practically lawless, not a model for a future state, and Palestinian voters seem set to punish the divided Fatah movement that monopolizes the Palestinian Authority.

Legislative elections on Jan. 25 are expected to bring the radical Islamic group Hamas, dedicated to a continuing armed struggle against Israeli occupation, into a significant share of power in the authority.

"All the chaos is coming from inside the Palestinian Authority and Fatah," said Khaled Duzdar, a Palestinian analyst at the Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information. "Fatah almost seems to be working on behalf of Hamas. This is the lowest the Palestinian Authority has reached."

The splitting of the main Palestinian faction Fatah and the participation of Hamas and its militants in the authority are serious questions that any new Israeli leader will have to confront right away.

By itself, the victory of Hamas or its achievement of a blocking minority within the authority could be enough to put an end to the long-moribund "road map," the peace plan drafted and endorsed by the United States, as well as the Israelis and the Palestinians. Hamas is committed to keeping its armed wing and its weapons, and says it is running in this campaign "to protect the resistance." One of the road map's first requirements is that the authority disarm all militants, including Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is affiliated with Fatah itself.

The Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas, has promised Israel and Washington to disarm the militants after the elections, but no American or Israeli policy maker or intelligence analyst interviewed over the last two months believes that he will be able to do so, and most think he is unlikely even to try.

So, outside of considerations of Israeli leadership, progress toward peace seems unlikely. That can only add to the Israeli inclination to sit tight and manage the current situation while continuing unilateral disengagement from the Palestinians, like the construction of the separation barrier.

"We have an ailing prime minister and the Palestinians have an ailing Authority, and both are on life support," said a senior Israeli intelligence officer, who could not be identified because of the nature of his work. "We have never been through such a period of anarchy in the Palestinian Authority. As far as security is concerned, the Authority is nominal - anyone in the territories does what they please."

In Gaza City recently, Ahmad el-Balawi, 20, said he had turned to Hamas from Fatah because of the corruption of the authority, the lack of jobs and the deterioration of ordinary life. "We are Muslims, and we need change," he said at his father's toy shop festooned with plastic guns. "We've had experience with Fatah, unfortunately."

Bashir el-Balawi, 46, his father, said: "The majority of them are Hamas now. It's because of the current situation, with no jobs and no safety and the corruption." Asked why he sells so many toy rifles, he threw up his hands. "The kids have fallen in love with weapons, it's just weapons they want, no other toys, they think they will fight against Israel." Does that depress him? "Not really," he said. "They want to feel powerful and free."

There are problems for Israel's interim leadership, too. Mr. Abbas has promised Hamas that the elections will not be postponed, but he has also said that if Israel will not allow Palestinians to vote in East Jerusalem, annexed by Israel after the 1967 war, the elections would be impossible. Israel does not want to be blamed for postponing the elections, especially since the Bush administration has called for them to go ahead.

Mr. Sharon had the stature to stand up to Washington on this issue, if he chose. It may be a harder choice for the acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, whose performance will be watched closely by Israeli voters. He may want to show his independence from Washington and make a symbolic stand against Hamas participation by banning voting in East Jerusalem, but he would do that only if Mr. Abbas privately wanted him to.

The Palestinian Authority is in deep financial trouble regardless of how the elections proceed. It is spending almost its entire yearly revenue of some $1 billion on salaries, which were recently raised despite cries of alarm from donor countries and the World Bank. According to the authority's former finance minister, Salam Fayad, who quit in protest to run for election, it is essentially out of money, and unable to raise more funds from banks.

Donor countries at an aid meeting in London in mid-December refused to release a semiannual $60 million in aid because, said Nigel Roberts, the regional director of the World Bank, the Palestinians had broken their commitments to fiscal responsibility. "The Palestinian Authority is in imminent functional bankruptcy," Mr. Roberts said. "In any given month now, they might find themselves unable to pay their basic salaries and minimal operational costs."

In 2006, the Palestinian Authority is facing a deficit of about $900 million. It can hope for about $300 million to $350 million in additional funds from the Arab world and donor countries this year - presuming that they can work out another restructuring program with an authority run or dominated by Hamas. But even that would leave a net deficit of around $600 million.

The combination of the security chaos in Gaza and in large parts of the West Bank, the involvement of Hamas and the accumulated troubles of the Palestinian Authority is likely to drive off foreign investors, Mr. Roberts said. Yet it is only investment and job creation that can offer enough jobs for the growing population of young men.

Overall Palestinian unemployment is about 23 percent, but some 75 percent of young men from 16 to 25 years old in refugee camps are unemployed. Hiring some of them into the security services, which Mr. Abbas has done, makes political sense. The checkpoints and the barrier cost the Palestinian economy about 5 percent real growth every year, Mr. Roberts said. That is a major toll, given that 10 percent real growth would be needed to solve the unemployment problem.

In 1999, before this intifada and the Israeli response, the Palestinian Authority had a balanced budget and needed no outside support. Now, even though revenues have recovered to where they were in 1999, the deficit has ballooned. "You can't hire all these people and then increase their wages, that's what's broken the bank," Mr. Roberts said. "The salary bill is so high in relation to resources there are only two options, and both are unsavory. They have to cut salaries or cut staff."

Maj. Gen. Aharon Zeevi-Farkash, the departing director of Israeli military intelligence, said bluntly, "We are facing a real revolution in the Palestinian Authority." The clash of generations - the older group like Mr. Abbas, who went into exile with the late Yasir Arafat; the middle generation like Mahmoud Dahlan and Marwan Barghouti, who grew up under occupation; and the young generation of gunmen empowered by five years of armed conflict - is pulling Fatah apart, he said.

Fatah's divisions are accelerated by a reputation for corruption, arrogance and cronyism, and an inability - despite 70,000 men listed as part of the official Palestinian security services - to provide law and order. This has been fertile ground for Hamas, which is running under the slogan "Change and Reform."

Khalil Shikaki, director of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, the most respected polling agency in the territories, said, "There is tremendous fragmentation evident in Fatah, with Fatah candidates competing with each other and the Fatah leadership impotent in stopping it."

Hamas, he said, "wants to win and is running like it wants to win," partly to resolve an old battle with the secular Fatah, partly "as a defeat for the accommodationists who want peace with Israel and follow the American lead, and partly as a victory for Islam everywhere."

Hamas wants to respond to demands for reform in the Palestinian Authority, Mr. Shikaki said. "Hamas wants to rise to the challenge. They've built a tremendous constituency and need to deliver."

But on the issue of Israel, neither Mr. Shikaki nor Mr. Duzdar, the Palestinian analyst, thinks Hamas will change its spots. "Anyone who thinks Hamas will become pragmatic if they win and it will be easier to settle the conflict is unrealistic," Mr. Duzdar said. "Hamas will never shift or change its charter or agenda. They want to have an impact on the Palestinian Authority from the inside, to be a tough opposition within the legislature and maybe cripple Abu Mazen and the Palestinian Authority in future negotiations," he said, referring to Mr. Abbas.

The Israeli intelligence officer said: "Hamas wants Israel gone and they want to keep the means of terror. Yet they are allowed into the political process by those who believe that afterwards, for some unknown reason, Hamas will change its soul or that Abu Mazen can deal with them. Hamas wants to enter the Palestinian Authority to promote its goals, not to change them."

Mr. Shikaki's latest poll, which incorporates constituency voting as well as votes for party lists, indicates that Fatah should win half the 132 seats at stake, with Hamas winning some 39 percent of them. About 14 seats will go to independents, some of them Hamas supporters, he said.

Mr. Duzdar and the senior Israeli intelligence officer say they think Hamas will do better than Mr. Shikaki's polls indicate and will get 45 percent or more of the seats - if the election is allowed to proceed. Senior Fatah members do not want to hand over so much power to Hamas, and there is a wide expectation that election day could be violent.

Israel and its policies in the occupied territories are partly to blame for Mr. Abbas's troubles, Mr. Shikaki said. "Israel could have helped him more," he said. "He did after all put the cease-fire in place. Wasn't this sufficient for Israelis to take more risks? To remove checkpoints, ease the economy, dismantle illegal outposts, freeze settlements, help Abu Mazen rebuild the security forces? But Israelis decided to take as little risk as possible."

Mr. Abbas showed little resolve himself, Mr. Shikaki admits, and embraced the old Fatah bosses rather than bringing along the next generation. "Israel certainly shares some responsibility and blame," Mr. Duzdar said. "But after they withdrew from Gaza, there is no reason for the Palestinian Authority to blame Israel for failing to provide law and order there."

Mr. Shikaki said: "If I were Israeli, I'd be very, very worried watching the rise of Hamas and the fragmentation of Fatah. It limits Israel's options in the West Bank in a big way. Even the simple task of unilateral withdrawal would be a nightmare without Fatah and a reliable Palestinian partner. With Hamas in control, unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank would be seen as a victory for Hamas."

His Condition Slightly Improved, A Comatose Sharon Faces The Risk Of Serious Infections (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 - A scan of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's brain on Saturday showed "very slight signs of improvement" but no real change in his condition, which remains stable but critical, a hospital official said Saturday evening.

After three days of a medically induced coma and three operations to stop bleeding and reduce pressure that arose in his brain from a major stroke on Wednesday, Mr. Sharon, 77, is facing a new set of risks.

The risks, which stem from his immobility since the stroke, include development of life-threatening infections like pneumonia, urinary tract infections and bed sores.

It is standard care to move the arms and legs of stroke patients to prevent muscle atrophy and contractions. Hospital workers also move patients and use special mattresses to prevent bed sores.

But Mr. Sharon's bulk would make such care more difficult and increase his risks for complications, according to stroke experts not involved in his care.

Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, the director of Hadassah Ein Kerem Hospital, said Saturday that Mr. Sharon's blood pressure, heart rate and other "vital signs were within normal limits." Mr. Sharon is breathing with the aid of a mechanical respirator.

The hospital has disclosed only limited information about Mr. Sharon's care, making it difficult for independent stroke experts to estimate the severity of brain damage and to follow the case. In addition, conflicting reports form the hospital have added to the confusion.

On Saturday, for example, Dr. Mor-Yosef said that a CT scan obtained earlier in the day showed further reduction in the swelling of Mr. Sharon's brain and said that the pressure had returned to normal.

But on Friday, he had said Mr. Sharon's brain pressure had returned to normal after a third operation to stop bleeding in the brain.

On Saturday, he made no mention of continued bleeding. He also said the left side of Mr. Sharon's brain "looked better" than the right. But he did not say whether he meant that the structure of the left brain seemed normal or whether it was only less damaged than the right.

Later on Saturday, Dr. Jose Cohen, a member of the team monitoring Mr. Sharon, rated his prospects of survival as "very high," Israel's Channel 2 television reported, according to Reuters. "I am pretty optimistic about it. We are praying there won't be complications, like catching an infection," Dr. Cohen was quoted as saying. But he stressed that Mr. Sharon would not be unscathed, saying, "To say that after a severe impact like this one there would not be cognitive problems is just not acknowledging reality."

On Sunday, Mr. Sharon's medical team will consider when to try to wake him from the induced coma. Until that effort is made, doctors cannot determine how much damage the stroke has caused in terms of paralysis and intellectual functions.

Many Israelis prayed for Mr. Sharon on the Jewish Sabbath while his two sons, Omri and Gilad, kept a vigil by his bedside.

Separately, the imprisoned Palestinian politician Marwan Barghouti warned against any move to use Mr. Sharon's illness as a reason to postpone Palestinian legislative elections scheduled for Jan. 25.

"The Palestinian Authority should avoid making any connection between the health of Sharon and the election date," he said in a statement published in Palestinian newspapers. "The election is a national Palestinian issue and it must not be linked to any foreign concerns such as what is happening in Israel with Sharon."

Mr. Barghouti, who heads the list of Fatah Party candidates despite serving multiple life sentences in Israel for his role in the killing of five Israeli civilians, also criticized the conduct of members of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, an armed offshoot of Fatah, who carried out violent protests in the Gaza Strip this week.

The gunmen were ultimately successful in forcing the Palestinian Authority to release Alaa al-Hams, who had been arrested for kidnapping a British family.

On Saturday in Gaza, 10 Palestinians were wounded, including 8 police officers, in gun battles in Deir al Balah, when the police tried to make an arrest. One wounded police officer was said to be in serious condition.

In the West Bank, clashes flared briefly between Palestinian gunmen and Israeli soldiers in the northern city of Jenin. Also in Jenin, Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades ordered international observers overseeing this month's Palestinian election to leave the city. "We are sorry to tell you that you must leave Jenin as soon as possible," said a statement to the observers, most of them European.

Ten Voices On The New Era (NYT)

By Peter Edidin

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

ONE constant, in calls to the Middle East on Thursday and Friday, was the background noise of a television, set to a program that was reporting on the condition of Ariel Sharon.

Whether the person being called was a Palestinian or an Israeli, to the left or right on the political spectrum, Mr. Sharon's sudden and unexpected removal from power and to a critical care ward in a Jerusalem hospital had focused them all on the magnitude of his influence and the enormous gap left by his absence.

In Washington, too, the prime minister's incapacitation managed to overshadow even a looming Supreme Court nomination fight and major controversies over influence peddling and domestic spying.

One reason for the extraordinary degree of interest is simply historical. Mr. Sharon is one of the last of the legendary generation - which included Moshe Dayan, David Ben-Gurion, Yitzhak Rabin and others - who founded Israel in 1948. And he has figured in virtually every major event in the nation's history.

Mr. Sharon fought in every Israeli war, led the invasion of Lebanon, was judged indirectly responsible for the massacre of Palestinian men, women and children by Lebanese Christian forces in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in 1982, masterminded the settlement movement in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, helped to bring the conservative Likud Party to power under Menachem Begin, overturning the long dominance of the Labor Party.

The point is, he has always been there - large, outspoken, sure of himself and infuriating to many, including many Israelis. When he came to power as prime minister in 2001, much of world opinion assumed that the peace process between the Palestinians and Israel was simply at an end.

And yet, in an astonishing act, Mr. Sharon, the most resolute opponent of Arab demands, decided that the nation's security and its future required that Israel relinquish control over the Gaza Strip to the Palestinians. Most observers believe he would have soon followed by withdrawing from parts of the West Bank, too.

To carry out his vision of disengagement and partition, Mr. Sharon created, out of little beyond the force of his personality, a new centrist party called Kadima. And until his stroke, polls showed him - and the array of prominent politicians who had flocked to his banner - well ahead in the parliamentary elections scheduled for March.

How much further he would have gone in pursuing a comprehensive, final peace with the Palestinians is unclear, but many believe that is precisely what he hoped to achieve.

The question now, again assuming that Mr. Sharon is unable to return to power, is what his legacy will be. Will Kadima survive without him, prosper in the elections and, under the leadership of Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, go on to realize Mr. Sharon's plans? Or will Likud, under the leadership of the hard-right former prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, return to power? Will the Labor Party make new gains?

And will the Palestinians and the Arab nations, deprived of Mr. Sharon as a useful bogeyman, begin to put their own houses in order and deal more constructively with Israel?

A number of Middle East experts and policy makers were asked in phone interviews to offer their own initial, off-the-cuff answers to these and other questions. If nothing else, their responses illustrate how large is the space that Mr. Sharon occupied until last week.

History Interrupted (NYT)

By James Bennet

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

"LOOK, the Jews are not easy people," Ariel Sharon, one of the least easy of people, said late one evening in 2004 on his farm in southern Israel. "Maybe that's the reason they managed to exist, I would say, for thousands of years." He chuckled.

"You cannot defeat Jews," Israel's prime minister went on. "You can maneuver them. You maneuver them, they maneuver you. I would say it's endless maneuvers."

It is hard to imagine Mr. Sharon's own gambits at an end. Having outmaneuvered Jew and gentile, enemy and ally alike, Mr. Sharon at 77 was losing ground at this writing to the invincible opponent he had also cheated more than once. It should have surprised no one - though it did - that he was caught, in this struggle, in mid-maneuver. Having torn up the Jewish settlements he founded in the Gaza Strip, he had been on his way to tearing apart the right-wing party he founded, Likud, in favor of a new, centrist party that was going to do - well, it may be that only Mr. Sharon knew exactly what, and some wondered if even he did.

He almost certainly planned to pull some Israeli settlers out of parts of the West Bank, but how soon, and from which areas? Did he envision signing a peace agreement with the Palestinians from behind the West Bank barrier he mapped out? One that would provide them sovereignty in a viable state? Or did he want to cage the Palestinians in barricaded enclaves like Gaza? Its ends still unknown, its ultimate achievements still uncertain, one of the most audacious exercises of leadership in Israel's history came to an abrupt close at a moment of resounding ambiguity.

"We will never know the real answer," said Tzaly Reshef, a founder of the left-wing Israeli group Peace Now. He said that his own feelings about Mr. Sharon were mixed. "Some good friends who share my views remember only the last two years," he said. "I remember the whole history of Sharon."

"He didn't have a lot of limitations, moral or otherwise," Mr. Reshef said. Yet - partly because of those qualities - Mr. Reshef did not have mixed emotions about the loss of Mr. Sharon as a leader. "I think it is a big tragedy that we lose him now," he said. The same "power and personality," he said, that caused Mr. Sharon to command the bloody invasion of Lebanon in 1982 "could maybe have made him the savior of Israel in the next four years."

Maybe Mr. Sharon had confided all in his deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert. Maybe, in a locked chest on the farm, he had squirreled away a map of his planned disposition of territory. But, Mr. Sharon being Mr. Sharon, no one could rule out another feint. Besides, the interplay of Israeli and Palestinian blows and posturing has proved resistant to fixed road maps of any one's devising; prospects for changing the pattern had come to rest more on the creative leadership of the brutal, cunning figure who just exited, stage center.

What Mr. Sharon might have done is a question of more than academic interest. Lacking his credentials, politicians who follow will compete for his legacy and so contest its interpretation. "Everybody's going to fight for the mantle of Ariel Sharon," said Jon Alterman, director of the Middle East program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "I think partly because he covered such a wide swath of the middle of Israeli politics there are going to be innumerable theories of what he might have done."

Israel has never fought a war without Ariel Sharon in the front lines or in command, or both. Even Israelis who held him responsible for the massacre of Palestinians at Sabra and Shatila during the Lebanon War or the deaths of Arab civilians during his commando raids of the 1950's trusted him to concede territory because they believed that, as he often said, he would never take a risk with their security.

As a leader, Mr. Sharon - his first name means "Lion of God" - was everything he seemed, and its opposite. He was blunt in speech and subtle in aim, sloppy in appearance and meticulous in preparation, grandfatherly in demeanor and ruthless in reality. In their 1973 study, "The Israeli Army," Edward Luttwak and Dan Horowitz concluded that he "concealed one of the finest tactical minds in the Army behind the carefully cultivated image of a simple fighting soldier."

It is the effort to conceal that is telling. His nickname, "the Bulldozer," reflected only his most obvious features - the fists, not the brain. He was underestimated even when he ran for prime minister five years ago, when potential opponents, including Benjamin Netanyahu, stood aside in the expectation that Mr. Sharon would keep the seat warm, quickly fall from power, and make a successor look good by comparison.

Those entangled by his tactics often came away revolted. "The biggest liar this side of the Mediterranean," the American diplomat Philip Habib, who on behalf of Ronald Reagan tried to end Israel's 1982 Lebanon invasion, said of Mr. Sharon, who was then defense minister. Mr. Sharon was a man of fixed ends - Israel's security, as he saw it, and its inextricable adjuncts, his own military and political success - and infinitely flexible means. That was the bitter lesson learned by Israeli settlers who moved into Gaza on his encouragement and out of it on his orders.

Mr. Sharon called his new party Kadima, or Forward, without ever saying just where it was headed. Both the indefatigable dove, Shimon Peres, and hawks like Shaul Mofaz, the defense minister, flocked to him. A poll released just before Mr. Sharon was stricken Wednesday showed Kadima crushing the established Likud and Labor Parties. Mr. Sharon had not even prepared a parliamentary list for elections, ranking his party leaders in order of importance. They must now sort it all out on their own.

Mr. Sharon was no mere blur, of course. He used ambiguity to hold the political center but he held that political center in order to shape it. He reversed the logic for ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that was adopted by his predecessors Yitzhak Rabin and Ehud Barak: While those prime ministers sought security through peace agreements, Mr. Sharon insisted, as he put it, that only security could bring peace. The Palestinians would have to lay down arms before negotiations could begin.

As a result, Israelis endorsed Mr. Sharon's conviction that the Palestinian leadership, unable or unwilling to crack down on militants, could not now be a peace partner. And so they overwhelmingly backed his approach of unilaterally setting Israel's boundaries, withdrawing from Gaza in what he assured voters was their own interest.

Palestinians and Mr. Sharon's left-wing critics said his approach was calculatedly self-fulfilling. In their eyes, his refusal to talk undermined Palestinian pragmatists, who needed negotiated achievements to build domestic support. To them, Israeli incursions and blockades crippled the very security forces that were supposed to act against terrorists. Mr. Sharon's unilateralism, they said, empowered militants, who pointed to it in arguing that the violence of the second intifada had achieved something that 10 years of negotiations never did - the evacuation of Israeli settlements.

Mr. Sharon was fairly clear about whether he saw this unilateralism leading to a peace agreement. He wanted an agreement, he said, provided the Palestinians could meet his demands for his security. His senior aides used to joke that, to do so, the Palestinians would have to become Swedes. For years, Mr. Sharon said he wanted a long-term interim agreement, a sort of standstill arrangement that would end the fighting, reduce the friction between the two peoples and help them, somehow, become comfortable with each other. Only after many years, he argued, would there be enough trust for real peace. In any final deal, he wanted to hold all of Jerusalem and Israel's biggest West Bank settlements.

Mr. Sharon liked to quote advice his mother gave him in the early 1980's, when he was negotiating with the Egyptians: "Do not trust them! You cannot trust a piece of paper!"

In that conversation at his farm, in the summer of 2004, Mr. Sharon cautioned, "Here, in this region here, declarations, speeches, words, are worthless." It was, he said, "an empire of lies." Yet even Mr. Reshef said Mr. Sharon would ultimately have been open to negotiating peace with the Palestinians, if they pulled themselves together.

Rather than words, Mr. Sharon believed in action, in land, and in history as he saw it, and he saw it all around him. That evening at his farm, he described riding through the terraced West Bank hills near the city of Ramallah. He would narrow his eyes, he said, to block out the electrical lines and imagine warriors of the ancient Israeli tribe of Benjamin "with spears, running there on those terraces."

Arabs, he added, did not build the terraces. "Those terraces are old Jewish terraces," he said.

Mr. Sharon has earned his own place in that glorious, sad story, and in the debate that may never die.

Specialists To Plan Next Step For Sharon (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM — Doctors said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remained in critical condition in a medically induced coma Saturday as fresh tests showed that swelling in his brain had eased slightly after a massive stroke three days earlier.

Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, director of Hadassah University Medical Center, said during an evening briefing that specialists at the hospital in various medical fields would gather today to plan a course of action.

Sharon's life remained in danger after the severe bleeding of the hemorrhagic stroke. One matter to be decided is when doctors will begin trying to wake the prime minister from the coma by gradually reducing the dosage of anesthetics. Only then can they get a clear idea of the extent of brain damage the 77-year-old Sharon has suffered as a result of the stroke, his second in a month.

Assessing the extent of damage, and to what degree Sharon will be able to function, "is indeed the question we would all like answered," Mor-Yosef said during a briefing that was somewhat more detailed than previous ones.

Sharon underwent a CT scan early Saturday to allow his physicians to check for swelling or renewed bleeding after the cerebral hemorrhage and three operations since Wednesday night.

Mor-Yosef said the scan showed a "slight improvement" in swelling, adding that the left side of the brain appeared to have been spared the damage caused to the right side. Speech functions are centered in the left side.

Mor-Yosef said various vital signs — intracranial pressure, blood pressure and pulse rate — were within "normal limits." But he cautioned that Sharon's condition remained grave.

"It's still critical and stable," he said in English.

He said that after today's meeting among medical specialists, "we will decide about management for the next 24 hours."

Later, one of Sharon's surgeons told Israel's Channel Two that Sharon's chances of survival were "very high," but that cognitive damage was likely, Associated Press reported.

The briefing was the hospital's first since Friday, when Sharon was rushed into surgery for a third time to stanch new bleeding. Doctors performed back-to-back operations after Sharon suffered the stroke late Wednesday.

He had been scheduled for surgery at Hadassah the following day to repair a small hole in his heart that is thought to have contributed to a minor stroke on Dec. 18.

Doctors said the earlier stroke had caused no lasting damage. He was sent home two days later and was taking blood-thinning medications, which made it more difficult for doctors to stop hemorrhaging during the subsequent episode.

Doctors have described the most recent damage as extensive, and the reports have left little hope that Sharon would ever return to office. His deputy, Vice Premier Ehud Olmert, has filled in as prime minister since Wednesday.

Olmert joined Sharon in bolting from the conservative Likud Party two months ago to form a centrist movement that supports steps to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians.

Olmert is considered the person most likely to lead the new party, Kadima, in national elections scheduled to take place in March. But it is not clear whether Olmert or anyone else in Kadima can muster the same support that the party commanded under Sharon. Polls have shown the party with large leads over the left-leaning Labor Party and Likud.

A pair of surveys taken since Sharon's latest stroke indicated that the party would suffer only a minor dip in support under Olmert, but those findings may be an unreliable gauge because public sympathy for the prime minister remains high.

Olmert was reportedly planning to meet again with Shimon Peres in an effort to persuade him to stay with Kadima and to ignore Labor's calls for him to return to the party he once led. Peres is said to be seeking assurances for a senior post if he stays with Kadima and Olmert becomes prime minister.

Peres, 82, joined Kadima after losing the Labor leadership post to Amir Peretz, a fiery union leader. Analysts say Olmert would gain much from an endorsement by Peres, who is widely respected in Israel and abroad despite repeatedly losing elections.

Even Pat Robertson's Friends Are Wondering... (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

EVERY day, two people pay particularly close attention to Pat Robertson's religious news and variety show, "The 700 Club." They have notepads in hand, and the VCR set on "record."

They work in Washington at two of the nation's most ardent enemies of the Christian right: People for the American Way and Americans United for Separation of Church and State. They lay in wait for Mr. Robertson to say something truly jaw-dropping - like his suggestion on Thursday that Ariel Sharon's stroke was divine punishment for "dividing God's land," and giving away Gaza to the Palestinians.

Within hours of such comments, the remarks are disseminated by e-mail to journalists around the country, and soon video clips of Mr. Robertson are the subject of news broadcasts and nationwide ridicule.

Mr. Robertson, who has made provocative comments since he first came on the scene, has in recent months made news repeatedly. Last August, he suggested that the United States assassinate Hugo Chávez, the leftist Venezuelan president. "It's a whole lot cheaper than starting a war, and I don't think any oil shipments will stop," he said.

In September he mused about whether the abortion rate in America could have provoked Hurricane Katrina and the terrorist attacks on the United States.

The news media avidly reported his comments, but are they worthy of attention? Do conservative Christians still follow Mr. Robertson in large numbers?

Certainly, his following seems to have diminished. Mr. Robertson's political machine, the Christian Coalition, once a powerhouse at mobilizing voters, is limping along since he resigned as president five years ago, fending off a long waiting list of creditors, its presence in the capital reduced to a post office box.

His old friends and allies in the conservative Christian movement are cringing with embarrassment, giving interviews ruing his remarks. "He speaks for an ever-diminishing number of American evangelicals, and that process accelerates every time he makes a statement like this," said Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission.

Os Guinness, a prominent Christian writer and social critic, said: " I know hundreds of people who are just terminally frustrated with the idiotic public statements of Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson and the idea that these people represent us. They don't."

Donald Wildmon, the founder and head of American Family Association and American Family Radio, said: "Pat's comments were most unfortunate. I don't think this served our cause very well."

But dismissing Mr. Robertson at this point in his long career would be wrong. Whether his colleagues wish it or not, he remains a force among religious conservatives. At 75, Mr. Robertson still regularly appears on his show. And he remains connected to both Regent University and the American Center for Law and Justice, growing institutions that he founded.

"Among the elites in the movement, they're getting impatient with him and probably are past the point of being able to take him anymore," said Mark J. Rozell, a professor of public policy at George Mason University who has followed Mr. Robertson for years. "But there is a real strong core of activists throughout the country who support and like Pat Robertson, might even agree with some of the things he says, though they might like him to express his views a little more delicately."

For instance, many conservative Christians agree in principle with his comments about the Middle East - the Scriptures, they agree, call for a unified Israel.

Mr. Robertson's daily program, "The 700 Club," is carried in most markets nationwide on ABC Family and the Trinity Broadcasting networks, and drew an average audience of 828,000 viewers in the last quarter of 2005, according to Nielsen Media Research. While he cannot compete with "American Idol," he had more viewers than CNBC or MSNBC in prime time.

As a host, Mr. Robertson regularly draws guests like Republican leaders Bill Frist, Rick Santorum, Tom DeLay and Sam Brownback. Last week, he bantered with Fred Barnes, a Fox commentator and executive editor of The Weekly Standard. The show is also a prime advertising vehicle for Christian books, music and other products.

Mr. Guinness, the writer, said that while he has refused invitations to appear on Mr. Robertson's program, out of principle, "I know a good number who go on because they want to sell their books."

Those who know him say they are puzzled why Mr. Robertson continues to discredit himself - and the cause - with the kind of intemperate remarks that play in media roundups alongside those from the president of Iran.

Mr. Robertson refused interview requests on Friday. The Christian Broadcasting Network issued a statement defending Mr. Robertson, and accusing People for the American way of taking his comments out of context "on an ongoing basis" and circulating them "in an attempt to discredit him."

Mr. Robertson did not appear on "The 700 Club" on Friday. Instead it was hosted, as it often is, by his son, Gordon. He prayed for God to heal Mr. Sharon.

US Concerned Over Violence Flare-up In Sri Lanka (AFP-Y2)

AFP, January 8, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has voiced concern over a flare-up of violence in Sri Lanka, and hopes Colombo and Tamil Tiger rebels will resume talks to reinforce their fragile truce, the State Department said.

Washington plans to dispatch a senior official to the troubled tropical Indian Ocean island soon to discuss the conflict, the department said Friday.

Rice "expressed concern over the recent upsurge in violence in northern and eastern Sri Lanka" during talks with visiting Sri Lankan Foreign Minister Mangala Samaraweera on Thursday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

In the latest violence, at least five Sri Lankan sailors were killed and 10 others were missing and presumed dead early Saturday following the sinking of a navy gunboat in a suspected suicide bombing.

The attack was the first sinking of a high-powered naval gunboat since a Norwegian-brokered truce between Colombo and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) went into effect from February 2002.

Rice and Samaraweera discussed the current status of the Sri Lankan peace process and the importance of strengthening the ceasefire, McCormack said.

"Secretary Rice reiterated the United States hope that talks between the Sri Lankan government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam on ways to strengthen the ceasefire could resume soon," he said.

"She also lauded the Sri Lankan government for its restraint in the face of the Tamil Tigers' provocations."

Rice said the United States, co-chair of the Sri Lanka Donors Group along with Japan, the European Union and Norway, remained committed to working with Sri Lanka "to defeat terrorism and to promote peace."

Washington has tagged the LTTE as a terrorist organization.

Rice told her Sri Lankan counterpart that State Department Undersecretary Nicholas Burns "does intend to travel" to Sri Lanka to discuss prospects of restoring peace.

"I think he's (Burns) going to talk about a number of different issues: talk about facilitating the peace between the government and the LTTE, as well as other issues of regional concern," McCormack said.

Amid the upsurge in violence, many are concerned Sri Lanka would descend again into civil war.

President Mahinda Rajapakse won November polls promising a brand new peace process that would have sidelined Norwegian peacebrokers. But he has now invited Oslo to continue its role, despite staunch opposition by his allies.

LTTE chief Velupillai Prabhakaran had warned that unless Colombo -- which has already ruled out a separate homeland for minority Tamils -- gives them wide autonomy, the Tigers would "intensify their struggle."

Rice praised Norway's "important role" in trying to facilitate the peace process even as Oslo struggled to bring the two parties to the table following a dispute over the venue of potential peace talks.

Citing the most recent attack, Samaraweera appealed for concerted international pressure on Tamil Tiger rebels to bring them back to the negotiating table.

"They are a brutal terror machine but having said that, we must bring them (the rebels) into the mainstream and terrorism must be wiped out," he said.

Asked on the possibility of retaliation, Samaraweera said, "there will come a point when the public could be provoked into action and the government may not be able to control."

The three-decade-old ethnic conflict between the majority Sinhalese and minority Tamils has claimed over 60,000 lives. Four major peace attempts and several ceasefires have collapsed in the past.

Bomb Kills 13 On Navy Boat In Sri Lanka (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Jan. 7 - A suicide bomber destroyed a Sri Lankan gunboat early Saturday, the authorities said, and European cease-fire monitors warned that such an expansion of violence could lead to a return of full-scale war between the government and Tamil Tiger rebels.

The incident, in which 13 of the 15 sailors aboard are believed to have been killed, was the most lethal attack at sea here since a 2002 cease-fire agreement between the government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, who have been fighting for a separate homeland for more than 20 years.

"If the L.T.T.E. is behind this, then they are pushing the situation closer to war," said Hagrup Haukland of Norway, the chief monitor of the truce brokered by Norway in 2002. "I am very worried. I have never been so worried about the situation."

A speedboat laden with explosives rammed the Israeli-built gunboat shortly after midnight, the navy said, sinking the vessel, which carried a 15-member crew. Fishermen plucked 2 sailors from the water, but the 13 others were feared dead.

The Tamil Tigers denied responsibility for the attack.

Sri Lanka's foreign minister, Mangala Samaraweera, in Washington for talks with Secretary of State of State Condoleezza Rice, told reporters that such incidents risked a major expansion of the conflict, Agence France-Presse reported. "There will come a point when the public could be provoked into action and the government may not be able to control," he said.

The boat sank amid spiraling violence; nearly 50 police officers and soldiers were killed in December alone, the bloodiest month since the truce began. On Monday, five ethnic Tamil students were killed in Trincomalee in eastern Sri Lanka. The military said they died in a botched grenade explosion, but the rebels accused the military of shooting them.

The attack on Saturday was the first time a navy gunboat had been sunk since the 2002 cease-fire agreement. "It's almost like an undeclared war," a military spokesman, Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe, said.

Russians Visit Iran On Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By Agence France-presse

TEHRAN, Jan. 7 (Agence France-Presse) - Russian envoys met with Iranian officials on Saturday to try to persuade Tehran to accept a compromise for ending a standoff with the West over Iran's plans to press ahead with its nuclear development program, state television said.

Moscow is proposing that Iran carry out uranium enrichment on Russian territory to allay Western fears that the work could lead to Iran's producing a nuclear bomb. Both the European Union and the United States have backed the proposal in principle, but it has so far been rebuffed by Iran.

The spokesman for Iran's top security body, Hossein Entezami, was quoted by state television as saying that the talks involved "joint enrichment on Russian territory and also enrichment on Iranian soil."

Mr. Entezami also said that inspectors from the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency had arrived here to monitor Iran's resumption of nuclear research next week, though it was not clear what that research would entail.

In Vienna, a spokesman for the agency said that it had still not received details of Iran's plans and that until such clarification was provided, the inspectors' presence in Tehran should be considered routine.

In recent weeks, Iranian officials first hinted that they might consider the Russian plan but later insisted that any deal recognize Iran's right to carry out enrichment in Iran. "If it says that enrichment can only happen in Russia, it's not acceptable," a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Hamid Reza Asefi, said Tuesday.

Iran's Top Mullah May Be On Our Side (LAT)

By Dariush Zahedi And Ali Ezzatyar

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

THE UNITED STATES has a surprising ally in its impatience with the new Iranian president. Since his inauguration, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's pugnacious demeanor has not only roiled the international community but also a significant portion of Iran's ruling elite. A coalition of traditional conservatives, pragmatists and reformists is emerging within the government to oppose Ahmadinejad's brand of governance. With Iran saying it will resume nuclear fuel research, the U.S. should do all in its power to boost the bargaining power of these more moderate Iranian leaders.

The rise of the anti-Ahmadinejad faction defies the expectations of Iran analysts, who believed that the post-Khatami era would produce a monolithic conservative bloc in control of most major levers of power. Instead, the coalition is strengthening and attracting many of the regime's powerful personalities, perhaps even the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Evidence of the latter is Khamenei's recent decree giving the Expediency Council, a non-elected body headed by former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, oversight of the presidency.

Ahmadinejad's primary supporters have always been the rank and file of the country's paramilitary forces. Renowned for their fearlessness and passionate commitment to the populist ideals of the Islamic revolution, they had not dominated government before or since Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's death in 1989.

The political struggle of Iran's security establishment has come full circle with Ahmadinejad's rise, which makes dealing with Tehran more difficult. The paramilitaries are the ultimate guarantors of the regime's survival. Their leaders wield enormous influence in the Islamic Republic's coercive security establishment, particularly those associated with the Revolutionary Guards. The militants also dominate the volunteer, or Basiji, militia force, believed to have more than 1 million members.

The paramilitaries are not fully tied to any one of the groups vying for power in Iran. Rather, they seek to influence domestic and foreign policy through their numbers and martial strength. They know international tensions that heighten security threats to Iran enhance their status in the power struggle. Although Ahmadinejad owes his presidency to allies in the guards and the Basiji forces, they are not totally beholden to him.

The unlikely counterbalance to Ahmadinejad could be Khamenei. He has frequently cultivated the paramilitaries since his elevation and relied on them to consolidate his power. But should the radicals attempt to direct policy without his explicit consent, Khamenei could move toward pragmatists allied with Rafsanjani and reformist supporters of former President Mohammad Khatami. The two former presidents don't want one of their few achievements in the last 16 years — Iran's moderately improved relations with the outside world — to disappear.

Contrary to popular belief, the traditional conservative clerical establishment is apprehensive about the possibility of violence inside and outside Iran. It generally opposes an aggressive foreign policy and, having some intimate ties with Iran's dependent capitalist class, is appalled at the rapid slide of the economy since Ahmadinejad's inauguration. The value of Tehran's stock market has plunged $10 billion, the nation's vibrant real estate market has withered and capital outflows are increasing.

Khamenei has intimated his readiness to distance himself from the radicals. Apart from authorizing nonpresidential bodies to supervise the three branches of government, he has instructed the Supreme Council for National Security to more fully cooperate with the International Atomic Energy Agency in the development of Iran's nuclear program. These moves have strengthened his institutional power and helped prevent Ahmadinejad's administration from undermining the regime's credibility.

Here is where the United States comes in. The history of U.S.-Iran relations shows that the more Washington chastises Tehran for its nuclear ambitions, the more it plays into the hands of the radicals by riling up fear and nationalist sentiment. Instead, the U.S. needs to offer Iran an acceptable face-saving mechanism to allow it to master, under appropriate international supervision, the nuclear fuel cycle. A seed planted now could even grow into the long-awaited detente between the two countries and help the U.S. extricate itself from Iraq.

Assad Said To Reject Questioning In U.N. Inquiry (LAT/REU)

From Reuters

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

BEIRUT — Syrian President Bashar Assad has rejected a request to be interviewed by a United Nations commission investigating the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, diplomatic sources said Saturday.

Syria told the U.N. commission the request violates the country's sovereignty, the sources said.

The decision is likely to intensify international pressure on the Damascus regime, given a U.N. Security Council resolution in October threatening to take unspecified action if Syria failed to fully cooperate with the inquiry.

A spokeswoman for the U.N. investigation confirmed that Syria had replied to a request to meet Assad and Foreign Minister Farouq Shara, among other officials, but refused to elaborate.

Asked whether Syria had rejected the request to meet Assad, one diplomatic source said, "Yes, that's true." The source added, "The main point is that Syria said the request violates the principles of sovereignty."

The diplomats, who asked not to be named, said Damascus has responded positively to "one part of the request" but declined to give further details. Diplomats said earlier that Syria had agreed to allow the commission to meet with Shara.

In an interview published Saturday by Egyptian weekly newspaper El Osboa, Assad hinted that he would be immune from questioning by U.N. investigators.

"There was a previous request, when the committee proposed to come to Syria at the end of last summer to listen to Syrian witnesses, as they call them. At that time, they requested to meet with President Bashar, and the president of the republic has international immunity," Assad said in the interview.

The inquiry has implicated senior Syrian officials and their Lebanese allies in the Feb. 14 killing of Hariri and 22 others in Beirut. Syria has denied any role, but the assassination sparked mass protests in Beirut, forcing Damascus to bow to world pressure and end its 29-year military presence in Lebanon in April.

Europe Comes To Terms With Need For Russian Gas (NYT)

By Mark Landler

DOJ_NMG_0008808

FRANKFURT, Jan. 7 - President Vladimir V. Putin's decision to switch off Russia's natural gas spigot to Ukraine on New Year's Day is being widely judged a ham-handed miscalculation, because in the end it only proved how much Europe was prepared to help an independent-minded Ukraine resist Russian bullying. But realists here argue that Europe needs to draw some lessons as well.

There is plenty of evidence that Mr. Putin overplayed his hand and was humiliated when Europe forced him to turn the gas back on. He underestimated Ukraine's leverage as the primary conduit for Russian gas exports to Europe, and Europe's influence as the major consumer of Russian gas. He also misjudged how much his decision would erode the confidence Germany, France, Italy and other countries had in Russia's trustworthiness as a supplier.

But now that the gas is flowing again - under a tenuous new deal on pricing in which Ukraine and Russia each gave a little ground - the experts are saying another lesson is becoming clear.

Since Europe, they say, still has no alternative to Russia's gas, it must learn to live with Russia's peculiar habits as a political and commercial partner.

Despite its demise as a superpower, Russia is not content to be an economic player that follows the West's lead in political matters. It insists on acting like a global power with a mind of its own, and it views its natural resources as a tool for furthering its political goals - perhaps its last best tool, now that its military and its decrepit industrial base have proved so poorly matched to the West's.

"Europe has to recalibrate itself, not to the idea of a growing, democratic Russia, but to a Russia that is behaving according to its sense of its national interests," said John C. Kornblum, a former American ambassador to Germany who is now a banker in Berlin. "It is not concerned about winning prizes in the West."

That does not mean giving in to Russian threats. It means expecting Russia to put political spin on an economic policy, and being ready to resist, if necessary. It also means that Europe should feel free to link politics to its own economic bargaining - for example, prodding Russia on human rights or democracy as part of the price of remaining a customer.

Lecturing Russia on the evils of using energy as a political weapon makes little sense, given that it derives so much of its hard currency from oil and gas, and Europe's dependence is only likely to increase.

Europe can strengthen its hand by exploring how to curb its dependency, either by finding other gas suppliers or developing alternative fuel sources. Germany is already talking about extending the life of nuclear plants. Last week, President Jacques Chirac said France would build the prototype for a fourth generation of nuclear plants. The goal, he said, is that by 2020, French trains will not use a drop of gasoline.

But such a strategy has limits. Nuclear plants supply only 14 percent of Europe's energy, compared with 23 percent for gas, and the role of gas is expected to increase. Windmills, solar panels and the like are long-term solutions; for the foreseeable future, households from Munich to Milan will rely on Russian gas to ward off the winter cold.

Since Europe's current relationship with Russia has been shaped in large part by Germany - it pioneered economic ties with Moscow during the cold war, and is by far the largest consumer of Russian gas - any new understanding between Russia and Europe will probably have to begin with Germany.

"Germany had the idea that energy could be the guarantor of good relations," said Wolfgang Eichwede, an expert on Russia at the University of Bremen. "The lesson is that relations have to be not only reliable but balanced."

The new German government spoke openly last week about the first part of that formula, when its economics minister, Michael Glos, raised questions about Russia's dependability and said the time had come for Germany to explore other sources of energy.

Chancellor Angela Merkel is expected to discuss the matter when she has her first meeting with Mr. Putin on Jan. 16. Mrs. Merkel, a conservative who was raised in the former East Germany and speaks Russian, is believed to be more of a pessimist about how much to expect from Russia than was her Socialist predecessor, Gerhard Schröder.

"She does not have a romantic view of Russia," said Alexander Rahr, an expert on Russia at the German Council on Foreign Relations. "I don't think she especially likes Russia, but she understands it."

Mr. Schröder cultivated a friendship with Mr. Putin and adopted a Russian child, which became a metaphor for the cozy links he wanted between Germany and Russia. Last month, he became the chairman of a Russian-German consortium that is building a $5 billion gas pipeline from Russia to Germany, a deal he had brokered as chancellor.

Depending on one's perspective, this pipeline is either a shrewd way to avoid the complications of receiving Russian gas via middle countries like Ukraine or Poland, or a mistake that would make Germany even more dependent on Russia.

Skeptics argue that it would be a good thing, not just for Europe but for the relationship, to keep a country like Ukraine as a buffer between the supplier and ultimate customer.

"The more flags that are planted in a pipeline, the harder it is to cut off," said William C. Ramsay, the deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency in Paris.

DOJ_NMG_0008809

In the end, few experts here believe that Europe is in genuine danger of having Russia turn off the tap. The European market is too vital for Russia, and both sides have already invested too much in the plants and pipes that carry the gas. Managing the relationship is the issue.

"Pipelines are like kids in a marriage," said Jérôme Guillet, a French banker and an expert in natural gas. "The seller cannot sell his gas elsewhere; the buyer cannot buy gas elsewhere. The two sides are welded together."

Such marriages work best, the realists argue, when both partners have no illusions about changing the other.

British Liberal Quits As Party Leader (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

LONDON, Jan. 7 - The leader of the Liberal Democratic Party, Charles Kennedy, who admitted last week that he had a drinking problem, resigned as party leader on Saturday in the face of growing criticism in his own party.

Mr. Kennedy, who is not giving up his seat in Parliament, had vowed to fight for his job as party leader, declaring that his drinking was under control and that he had been sober for two months. But his position became increasingly untenable as more and more party members, in Parliament and in the country at large, publicly declared their opposition to his continuing as leader.

On Friday, 25 of Mr. Kennedy's parliamentary colleagues said they would resign from their policy positions if Mr. Kennedy remained as party leader. A poll conducted by the BBC television program "Newsnight" found that more than half the Liberal Democrats in Parliament said that Mr. Kennedy's position as leader had become unsustainable.

Britain is a hard-drinking country, and voters generally find nothing to complain about if politicians enjoy a glass or two. But Mr. Kennedy, sometimes called Champagne Charlie, has long been dogged by rumors that he drank to excess, particularly when he missed important debates in Parliament. His aides have invariably blamed illness or scheduling conflicts for such lapses.

After becoming party leader in 1999, Mr. Kennedy repeatedly and publicly denied that he had trouble with alcohol. He finally admitted that he had been receiving help for a drinking problem after being confronted with damning evidence from Channel 4 News. The Liberal Democrats - Britain's third-largest party. after Labor and the Conservatives - won 62 seats in Parliament in the 2005 election, the party's largest representation since the 1920's.

Party officials said Mr. Kennedy's deputy, Sir Menzies Campbell, would serve as acting leader until the party decided how to go about selecting a permanent leader.

Leader Of British Political Party Steps Down (LAT)

By John Daniszewski

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

LONDON — Charles Kennedy, leader of Britain's third-largest political party, gave in to demands of colleagues and resigned Saturday, two days after being forced to acknowledge a drinking problem.

Kennedy, 46, who had helped raise the Liberal Democrats to the highest level of any third party in British politics since the 1920s, saw his career brought down after a weeks-long campaign by colleagues, who insisted that they were doing it for his good and the good of their party.

Although he said he had not had a drink in two months and was receiving professional help, an ultimatum came in the form of a letter signed by 25 of the 62 Liberal Democrat members of Parliament. They said they would not support him as leader after Monday.

"I am standing down as leader," Kennedy told reporters Saturday at the party's headquarters. "When nominations open for the leadership of the party, I shall not now be putting my name forward."

He said he had received support from rank and file party members but recognized that it was insufficient. "It has become clear that such support is not reflected strongly enough across the parliamentary party."

In 2003, Kennedy was the only British opposition leader to protest Prime Minister Tony Blair's decision to go to war in Iraq.

Although Kennedy's resignation was not expected to bring about any major shift in British politics, his slow political demise has dominated headlines here for a week.

Alcohol abuse and the penchant of many young Britons to engage in binge drinking have become a serious social issue in recent years. British politicians often were known to be heavy drinkers, but the case of Kennedy indicates that such behavior is no longer to be countenanced.

Liberal Democrats began speaking anonymously against Kennedy a few weeks before the Christmas holiday. Using euphemisms, they said such things as he had been "off his game, "tired" or "unfocused" recently.

The attacks began immediately after the Conservatives chose a new leader: charismatic 39-year-old David Cameron, who gave the party a fresh look and political boost. That led some senior Liberal Democrats to think that that their party should change as well to position itself for the next elections, likely to be held in 2009 or 2010.

After insisting that he intended to remain in his post, Kennedy called a news conference Thursday when his office learned that broadcast reporters were about to break the news that he had sought treatment for alcohol abuse. His acknowledgment contradicted earlier denials that he drank excessively.

At that stage, Kennedy said he intended to fight to retain his post, but he agreed to schedule a leadership election if anyone wished to challenge him.

That stance did not satisfy critics, many of whom came out against him more openly Friday, insisting that he spare himself and the party by agreeing to step down.

Kennedy said he would spend the weekend reflecting, but gave in late Saturday, apparently concluding that his position was irrevocably damaged.

A red-haired Scotsman and Roman Catholic from the Highlands near Inverness, Kennedy was the youngest member of Parliament when he was elected to the House of Commons 22 years ago.

Although under Kennedy the Liberal Democrats increased their representation in Parliament, many thought the party should have done better in last year's election, in light of widespread disillusionment with the war in Iraq, which had been backed by both by the Labor and the Conservative parties. To many voters, it seemed, Kennedy lacked the gravity to be considered a potential prime minister.

The Liberal Democrats were formed in 1987 when the Liberal Party, which traced its history to the 19th century, merged with the Social Democratic Party, made up of moderates who had broken away from the Labor Party a few years earlier.

Gandhi-Quoting Yuppie Shakes Stuffiness From Britain's Tories (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

LONDON -- He's a 39-year-old young urban professional who quotes Gandhi, fights poverty with activist rocker Bob Geldof, wants to stand up to big business and is so worried about global warming that he's planning to erect a wind turbine on his roof.

Meet David Cameron, Conservative.

Since his election last month as Conservative Party leader, Cameron has shaken up his party like a man beating a carpet with a stick. Sitting atop an organization that has been sputtering since no-nonsense Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher left office in 1990, Cameron has startled Britain with policy pronouncements and stylistic flourishes rare for a leader of the Tories, as the party is known.

His supporters are betting that combination will make him a formidable challenger to succeed Prime Minister Tony Blair. While some Conservatives worry that he has abandoned their party's "middle England" core values, many more said Cameron is a shot of adrenaline for a party disheartened after three consecutive elections losses to Blair's Labor Party.

"Because of Cameron, there's a new sort of feel -- there's an excitement, there's a feeling we can win," said Laurence Robertson, a Tory member of Parliament. "The man in the pub, the man in the street, they are taking an interest for the first time in a long time in what we are doing."

Robertson and other Conservatives said Labor was frightened by Cameron, but several Labor MPs said they were closer to amused. "He's making all these touchy-feely statements, but none of it is backed up," said Labor MP Fraser Kemp. "The British Tory party is still a pretty right-wing organization. The new-gloss paint is going to fade."

Since taking over, Cameron has worked frenetically to stay in the public eye, turning an annual British cultural phenomenon to his advantage.

From just before Christmas until just after New Year's, virtually every business in Britain shuts down. While Blair decamped to a vacation at Sharm el-Sheikh, a resort in Egypt, Cameron worked during the holiday lull and kept public attention focused squarely on himself.

One day he signed up Geldof as an anti-poverty adviser, the next he demanded that employers address the "morally wrong" gender gap in pay, and then he distanced himself from Thatcher -- a venerated Tory icon -- by saying he "will not be the prisoner of an ideological past."

He rode a bike to work. He surveyed endangered waterways. Then came full-page advertisements in New Year's Day newspapers trumpeting his political call to arms:

"As the world is changing, so must we," Cameron wrote, calling change "the central objective in 2006 of a modern, compassionate Conservative Party." He said he wanted "every single member and supporter of the Conservative Party to remember that personal commitment is the most powerful way to bring about change: As Gandhi said, 'We must be the change we want to see in the world.' "

Labor MP Stephen Byers predicted that Cameron's positions would "melt like snow on a summer day" after the initial excitement about his leadership wore off. "It's not terribly clear the values and principles that have led him to the positions where they are at the moment," Byers said. "It looks like short-term political expediency is driving him."

Michael Gove, a Tory MP, said Cameron was using his "modern, informal, accessible and relaxed" style to refocus the party's image. He said the Conservatives in recent years have tended to accentuate the "grim, tough, efficient, austere, no-nonsense" aspects of their economic policies, while underplaying party policies that are "inclusive, compassionate and socially concerned."

Another Tory MP, John Hayes, said Conservative positions have often been misinterpreted: "The problem is that people see us as self-interested and greedy and uninterested in their needs. People see David Cameron as a regular guy who puts their interests first."

Cameron has said that many of his proposals are designed to challenge Labor for the political middle ground. He has already abandoned party positions he helped draft before last May's general elections. During the campaign, the Tories ran ads on immigration that critics said bordered on xenophobic, but Cameron has now called for a more welcoming stance.

In a speech Wednesday, he scrapped another proposal he helped draft, a health care plan that would allow some people to opt out of the National Health Service. Now, calling that essentially a taxpayer-funded perk for the wealthy, Cameron is advocating a strengthening of the health service for all -- a position much closer to Labor's.

Britain's next general election will take place in 2010 at the latest, and perhaps sooner if Blair decides to step aside, as many political analysts have predicted.

A recent Ipsos Mori poll showed the Conservatives leading Labor 37 to 35 percent when voters were asked which party they would support if the general election were held immediately. But on an individual basis, the poll showed Cameron trailing Chancellor Gordon Brown, Labor's most likely candidate for prime minister, by four points, 31 to 27 percent.

Cameron's blitz of activity over the holidays finally seemed to get to Blair. Even before he returned from the beach, his office posted a "day in the life" video on its official Web site. The folksy, 3 1/2 -minute clip shows Blair kicking a soccer ball with schoolchildren, mugging with foreign heads of state, visiting a hospital. Blair narrates from his desk and discusses the rigors of the job.

While he has said little about Cameron directly, he appears to be taking at least a gentle shot at him when he says: "Being leader of the opposition does not prepare you quite adequately for the difficulty of doing the prime minister's job."

Denmark Is Unlikely Front In Islam-West Culture War (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky

COPENHAGEN - When the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten published 12 cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad, including one in which he is shown wearing a turban shaped as a bomb with a burning fuse, it expected a strong reaction in this country of 5.4 million people.

But the paper was unprepared for the global furor that ensued, including demonstrations in the Indian-controlled part of Kashmir, death threats against the artists, condemnation from 11 Muslim countries and a rebuke from the United Nations.

"The cartoons did nothing that transcends the cultural norms of secular Denmark, and this was not a provocation to insult Muslims," said Flemming Rose, cultural editor of Jyllands-Posten, Denmark's largest newspaper, which has declined to apologize for the drawings.

"But if we talk of freedom of speech, even if it was a provocation, that does not make our right to do it any less legitimate before the law," he added in an interview from Miami. He spent months living under police protection in Denmark.

As countries across Europe grapple with how to assimilate their growing Muslim populations in the post-9/11 world, Denmark has become an unlikely flashpoint in the escalating culture wars between Islam and the West. The publication of the cartoons in late September has provoked a fierce national debate over whether Denmark's famously liberal laws on free speech have gone too far.

It also has tested the patience of Denmark's 200,000 Muslims. Many of them say the cartoons reflect an intensifying anti-immigrant climate that is stigmatizing minorities and radicalizing young Muslims.

In Norrebro, an ethnically mixed neighborhood of Copenhagen where the philosopher Soren Kierkegaard is buried and where kebab stands dot the tree-lined streets, Imam Ahmed Abu-Laban, a leader among Denmark's Muslims, bristles at what he calls the "Islam phobia" gripping the country. He asserted that the cartoons had been calculated to incite Muslims because it was well known that in Islam depictions of the prophet were considered blasphemy.

"We are being mentally tortured," Imam Ahmed said at his mosque, an anonymous building that looks more like an apartment complex than a house of worship. "The cartoons are an insult against Islam, an attempt by right-wing forces in this country to get a rise out of the Muslim community and so portray us as against Danish values."

Mr. Rose, once a journalist in Iran, said he decided to commission the cartoons for Jyllands-Posten when he heard that Danish cartoonists were too scared of Muslim fundamentalists to illustrate a new children's biography of Muhammad.

Annoyed at the self-censorship he said had overtaken Europe since the Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh was murdered last year by a Muslim radical for criticizing Islam's treatment of women, Mr. Rose said he decided to test Denmark's free speech norms.

The cartoons were published amid the growth of an anti-immigrant sentiment in Denmark, reflected in the rise of the far-right Danish People's Party. The party, which holds 13 percent of the seats in the Danish Parliament, has helped to push through the toughest anti-immigration rules on the Continent, including a rule preventing Danish citizens age 24 or younger from bringing in spouses from outside Denmark.

Soren Krarup, a retired priest and leading voice in the party, said the Muslim response to the cartoons showed that Islam was not compatible with Danish customs. He said Jesus had been satirized in Danish literature and popular culture for centuries - including a recent much-publicized Danish painting of Jesus with an erection - so why not Muhammad? He also argues that Muslims must learn to integrate.

"Muslims who come here reject our culture," he said. "Muslim immigration is a way for Muslims to conquer us, just as they have done for the past 1,400 years."

Muslim leaders say that such talk helped create the atmosphere that allowed the cartoons to be published. And they contend that it is alienating the people the Danish People's Party says it wants to assimilate.

In a sign that some Muslims are becoming radicalized, Danish counterterrorism officials say more young Danish Muslims are being drawn to Hizb ut-Tahrir, or the Party of Liberation, which seeks the unification of all Muslim countries under one leader and Shariah, the Islamic legal code. The group, which distributes literature at mosques and on the Internet, is banned in most of the Muslim world, as well as in Russia and Germany.

But because its main weapon is ideology rather than explosives, Danish officials say, it is allowed to operate in Denmark under the same permissive rules that allowed the publication of the cartoons. Under Danish law, inciting someone to commit an act of terror is illegal, but spouting vitriol against the West or satirizing Muhammad is not. The State Prosecutor's Office investigated the group in spring 2004 and decided not to ban it because it had not broken the law.

The free speech debate and the concerns over Hizb ut-Tahrir swept through Denmark's public schools last month when the imam's 17-year-old son, Taim, was expelled from Vester Borgerdyd School, after teachers overheard him giving sermons calling for the destruction of Israel and assailing Danish democracy during Friday Prayer at the school. The imam said his son became radicalized after being recruited by Hizb ut-Tahrir.

He said he opposed his son's sermons and had told his son to leave the house for defying him. But he also criticized the ruling that followed: a committee of mostly Christian rectors banned Friday Prayer at public schools across Denmark.

"They are trying to turn Denmark into a banana republic," said Imam Ahmed. "How is it O.K. to publish the cartoons, yet my son is portrayed as an ayatollah?"

At Vester Borgerdyd School, where the walls are lined with photographs of smiling students in Muslim dress, the headmistress, Anne Birgitte Rasmussen, said that Taim Abu-Laban had attracted a following and that she had feared his sermons would raise tensions among the school's more moderate Muslims.

"The tone of the political debate in this country, the talk about Muslims and immigrants, is making it very difficult for us," she said.

Mr. Rose, the editor, said free speech, no matter how radical, should be allowed to flourish, from all varieties of perspectives.

"Muslims should be allowed to burn the Danish flag in a public square if that's within the boundaries of the law," he said. "Though I think this would be a strange signal to the Danish people who have hosted them."

The French Disconnection (NYT)

By Corinne Maier

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

Paris

WHAT'S going on over there?" my foreign friends have been asking me, concerned about the news coming from France. A justified worry: our impoverished suburbs, or banlieues, were the scene, starting on Oct. 27 and stretching into November, of an urban agitation that turned to a riot. There were thousands of burned cars, public buildings looted, confrontations with the police, a state of emergency that ended only on Wednesday. Paris and then the provinces were affected; we hadn't seen anything like these disturbances since the famous uprising of May 1968. What has happened to the picture-postcard Paris that was the setting for "Amélie"?

The experience has put all of France into a funk, even with the lifting of the state of emergency after New Year's passed relatively peacefully (cars were set afire, but not substantially more than in previous years). In truth, though, people, who - like me - live in the center of Paris, didn't really see that much; they watched the spectacle of the disorder on television. They discovered places they ordinarily wouldn't even be able to find on a map: ghettoes where France has relegated immigrants and their descendants, gloomy blocks that resemble bombed-out sections of Chechnya. They learned that high unemployment (close to 40 percent in some places), racism, drugs, disastrous urban policy and police brutality were making everything worse.

But no one has been truly astonished by the violence. "It was bound to happen," as my local bookseller, who lives in the suburbs, says. What surprised - and relieved - Parisians was that Paris proper was mostly spared: the Eiffel Tower is still there, the Arc de Triomphe hasn't budged, thank goodness.

The reality is that Paris and its "difficult" banlieues are two worlds that are completely foreign to each other. They don't even speak the same language: polished, accent-free French on one side, the verlan, or "reversed" speech, of the housing projects on the other. The suburbs are on fire? So? The Left Bank intellectuals didn't have much to do with these rioters without demands and without leaders.

Away from the banlieues, everything stayed calm, in contrast with the image of France portrayed in the foreign news media. "Paris Is Burning!" was a common headline; a major German newspaper predicted that the intifada was imminent. The Americans and the British covered the violence with as much avidity as some of them had denounced the French decision not to fight in Iraq; was France, they asked with glee, going to be forced to wage its own battle with Islam? We French expected a little more empathy considering the 1992 Los Angeles riots, when the authorities responded in force, and the city experienced curfews, 8,000 arrests, and scores of deaths.

In France, the death toll was almost nonexistent, perhaps because, as the saying goes, "Here, everything ends with songs" - that is, it all works out in the end. Still, an arsenal of repression was put in place. It has a rather unpleasant name, the state of emergency, established by a 1955 law that sought to restore order in French-controlled Algeria, racked by violence in the years before it won independence.

This legal parenthesis brought searches without warrants, curfews, restrictions on comings and goings. All in all, though, the authorities were prudent in the use of these extraordinary powers, even in the banlieues; to say that France suffered under the yoke of oppression during the state of emergency would be an exaggeration, and the French, fatalists for the most part, protested little.

Nonetheless, those few weeks of violence left us bitter. The riots were undoubtedly a reflection of French failure. Failure of the politicians, yes: Jacques Chirac, president since 1995, has been unable to reform society. But also failure of the "French model," which asserts that all inequalities, all differences, can be resolved in that shopworn religion called the Republic. Today all France, even the middle classes, suffers from a feeling that things won't get better, from an inability to make plans for the future. It's the big topic at dinner parties.

Fortunately, in Paris there is always something to do when one is feeling blue. Everyone in town has been talking about an exhibition at the Grand Palais consecrated to ... melancholy. Whether called melancholy, or ennui, depression or "spleen," this sensation was wonderfully defined by Victor Hugo as "the enjoyment of being sad." Welcome to Paris, city of melancholy. You have until Jan. 16 to visit the exhibition. Otherwise, you'll have to go to, well, the suburbs.

Bird Flu Appeal To Turks (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

DOGUBAYAZIT, Turkey, Jan. 7 (Reuters) - Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan urged Turks on Friday not to hide poultry to avoid bird flu culls, and promised that the government would spend what was necessary to fight the spread of the disease and to compensate farmers for slaughtered stocks.

"We should not panic," CNN-Turk reported him as saying. "Our people should not be making efforts to hide chickens, turkeys or geese."

The European Commission said it had confirmed that the bird flu in Turkey was the deadly H5N1 strain. A World Health Organization team is headed for eastern Turkey, where three people have died and 26 are under observation, an unusual cluster of cases that raises the possibility that the virus has become more contagious for humans.

Aid Suspended To Two Pakistan Quake Areas (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0008814

By Burt Herman

AP, January 8, 2006

The United Nations said Saturday it has suspended aid missions to two parts of Pakistan's quake-hit Kashmir region where dozens of survivors stormed two U.N. helicopters and forced an airlift out of the devastated area.

The U.N. said it canceled planned flights into Bana Mula and Leepa, both more than 60 miles southwest of Muzaffarabad. It was investigating the incident and evaluating the possibility of relocating villagers to lower-lying areas.

On Friday, more than 50 survivors forced the pilots of two U.N. helicopters to take them to Muzaffarabad and Abbottabad, a hub for relief activities. One air safety officer was assaulted, the U.N. said, without elaborating.

Pakistan, meanwhile, said it had prepared several contingency relief camps stocked with food to cope with any wave of refugees heading to lower ground during the harsh Himalayan winter.

Days of heavy storms have dumped up to 9 feet of snow in some areas of Kashmir and northwestern Pakistan, forcing the suspension of helicopter flights and aid deliveries. The Pakistan Meteorological Department warned of more snowfall over the next 72 hours.

"It's a bitter winter," said Maj. Gen. Khalid Nawaz Khan, the commander of the Pakistan military in Kashmir. "Things are being taken care of. We are prepared for any contingency."

Officials and aid agencies have warned the weather could cause a second wave of deaths or force more evacuations from higher up in the Himalayas.

The Oct. 8 quake killed some 87,000 people and left 3.5 million homeless, mostly in Kashmir and Pakistan's northwestern region. Control over Kashmir is divided between India and Pakistan, both of which claim it in its entirety.

Helicopters are vital for the mammoth relief effort, particularly since this week's heavy snows blocked roads, hampering aid delivery for several days. All roads into the Kaghan and Siran Valleys in Pakistan's Northwestern Frontier Province are blocked, the U.N. said late Friday.

"We're going to hit more bad weather, no question," said Keith Ursel, the World Food Program quake operations manager. "We have to send specialist teams to clear up the snow before we can land our choppers too."

The World Food Program is feeding 400,000 survivors.

Kashmir Quake Survivors Bemoan Lack Of Aid (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

CHIKAR, Kashmir, Jan. 5 (AP) - The terraced paths through this mountain town are slick with ice. Tents crammed with families have collapsed under the snow. A truck mired in a muddy landslide recently blocked the main road into town. And winter has just barely begun.

Camped on a steep hillside, the five members of the Butt family are surviving after the loss of their patriarch. Their shelter is a tarp propped up by branches, and they spend nights shivering under a single blanket each.

Three months after an earthquake killed more than 80,000 people and left 3.5 million homeless in the region, families across Pakistani-controlled Kashmir are coping with winter's first brush in the Himalayas. Health officials say illnesses are on the rise, but insist the situation has not yet become alarming.

For now, the weather has improved. The sun shone brilliantly Thursday in Chikar, a town of 6,000 people where residents say about 700 people died in the quake on Oct. 8. Water from melting snow dripped flowed down paths through the town, which is draped across several hillsides at an about 5,100 feet.

There were signs of normalcy. The market set up near the rubble of buildings that slid off a hilltop when the quake hit was bustling with spices and baked goods. And preparations were under way for a wedding, one of about 30 that locals say have taken place since the quake.

Getting into the town was complicated by a truck stuck in mud from a landslide caused by recent rain and snow. Residents placed dry straw under its back wheels to get traction, while others pulled on a rope from the front - all to no avail. The truck was finally towed out by several vans.

Residents said they had lost electricity for four days since the bad weather struck, and many tents collapsed under the snow, including one belonging to the family of Muhammad Younas, 15, who was staying with four relatives on Sunday night when their tarp tumbled down. No one was injured and they found shelter with other relatives.

Next to their collapsed tent stood a bare wooden frame intended to be a weatherproof home, but it stood in the snow without metal siding. Similar uncompleted shelters could be seen across the town, and residents complained freely about what they said was a lack of aid.

Azher Bukhari, 35, a shopkeeper whose home and business were destroyed, was walking the snowy paths wearing sandals. He said it was a form of protest against the Pakistani Army's failure to provide aid. "The government isn't paying attention to this area," Mr. Bukhari said.

The military has given out more than 50,000 shelters in Kashmir areas that lie above 5,000 feet, said Maj. Farooq Nasir, an army spokesman in Muzaffarabad. Families where the men have died will also get help assembling the temporary structures, he said.

But families in which men survived are required to build their own shelters with materials provided.

Among those yet to receive shelter are the Butt family - a mother, three daughters and a son. They were camped near their former home, which collapsed on the family's patriarch, 50, killing him.

The family huddled inside a dark makeshift shelter provided by former neighbors. The mother, Mehrfazoon, 45, said she had spent a day at the nearby military camp, waiting for supplies. "We were given nothing," said a daughter, Nayab, 13. "We are living from hand to mouth."

U.N. Cuts Quake Aid Missions

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 7 (AP) - The United Nations said Saturday that it had halted quake aid missions to two parts of Pakistani-controlled Kashmir, where more than 50 survivors had stormed two helicopters, forcing an airlift out of the area. The United Nations said it was evaluating the possibility of relocating villagers to lower-lying areas.

India Digitizes Age-Old Wisdom (WP)

By John Lancaster

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

NEW DELHI -- In a drafty government institute, Nighat Anjum reads from a dog-eared textbook on traditional Indian medicine and acquaints herself with the miracle fruit known as aamla, which is said to be useful in treating heart palpitations, immune disorders, bed-wetting and memory lapses.

Tapping on a computer keyboard, the 27-year-old physician enters its properties in a database that eventually will contain more than 100,000 such traditional remedies -- the collective wisdom of the ancient healing arts known as ayurveda , unani and siddha , the latter based on the teachings of the Hindu god Shiva.

Other entries include powdered nightingale droppings (a skin lightener and laxative), nightingale flesh (an aphrodisiac), ostrich fat (for aches and pains), ostrich blood (for inflammation), charred sea crab (constipation, ulcers, cataracts and dental stains), honey (for improving vision), tumeric (for treating wounds and rashes) and coconut milk (urinary tract infections).

Employing about 150 doctors and technicians, the four-year, $2 million effort is aimed at protecting India's traditional remedies from theft by multinational drug companies in a practice known here as bio-piracy. The database will also include hundreds of yoga poses so that foreigners cannot copyright them as their own.

Though Indian officials can point to just a handful of such intellectual-property cases involving traditional medicine, they say the threat is bound to grow as foreign drug companies seek to cut soaring research-and-development costs by finding new products among natural remedies that have been used in India, China and other developing countries for millennia.

More broadly, the compilation of the Traditional Knowledge Digital Library reflects a nationalistic pride in India's ancient scientific heritage as well as its citizens' continuing faith in herbal and other natural treatments that often are viewed with skepticism in the West.

Indian officials say the data-collection effort will promote the commercialization of traditional Indian remedies, help validate their scientific underpinnings and encourage collaboration between Indian and foreign pharmaceutical companies.

In doing so, they say, the project will spur the development of a uniquely Indian health-care industry that blends 21st-century technology with spirituality and the wisdom of ages in the same way that Brahmin traditions of Sanskrit and mathematics helped set the stage for India's information-technology boom.

"India's strength is civilization, and its culture and knowledge," said V.K. Gupta, the director of the National Institute of Science Communication and Information Resources in New Delhi, which is overseeing the project. "The moment we revisit that, the power of India is unimaginable."

In a telephone interview from Washington, Mark Grayson, a spokesman for Pharmaceutical Researchers and Manufacturers of America, the drug-industry lobbying group, described the Indian project as "a solution in search of a problem." He said "there is no evidence of bio-piracy," noting that most modern drugs are developed from chemicals with the aid of computers, rather than from natural substances.

At the same time, he said, the Indian effort could "inhibit drug development" by discouraging companies from developing new cures from plants whose medicinal uses India now claims as protected intellectual property. The drug industry is opposing India's efforts to amend World Trade Organization rules to protect such ancient remedies.

The most popular traditional medical system in India is ayurveda, which is rooted in Hinduism -- its original Sanskrit formulations were recorded 2,000 years ago on palm leaves -- and aims to restore the "balance" between body and spirit. Despite the growing influence of Western medicine, ayurveda remains the dominant form of treatment in many parts of rural India, where access to conventional care is often limited.

Even in such major cities as New Delhi, which boasts several world-class medical facilities, ayurveda is widely embraced. Pharmacies stock ayurvedic remedies alongside antibiotics and other conventional treatments. Bollywood stars hawk ayurvedic medicines from billboards. And a generation of middle-class children has grown up on morning spoonfuls of Chyvanprasam, a jam-like ayurvedic supplement.

"Ayurvedic medicine has no side effects," said Sheema Rajesh, a 31-year-old soldier's wife from southern India who was seeking treatment for jaundice the other day at an ayurvedic clinic in the capital. "It's made from natural things, and from the time we were small, we've been taking these medicines, so we believe in them."

A politician's charge last week that a line of ayurvedic cures peddled by one of India's most popular television gurus had been adulterated with human bone made the front pages of Indian newspapers -- and sparked an attack by the guru's followers on the politician's Communist Party office in New Delhi.

Besides ayurvedic medicine, the database also is recording remedies from unani, a system that was introduced to the subcontinent 4,000 years ago by the Greeks. Unani is based on the theory that sickness is caused by an imbalance in "the four humors" -- black bile, yellow bile, blood and phlegm -- that define human temperament, according to Anjum, the unani doctor who was entering the data on the aamla fruit.

The system relies heavily on herbs and is "very effective," she said.

Siddha, which was first practiced in southern India by followers of Lord Shiva, employs medicines made from herbs, animal parts, metals and minerals. "Even though it is coming from supernatural power, so much is scientifically proved," said Muthu Kumar, a Siddha expert who is working for the database project.

Gupta, the project director, said the need for the database became apparent in 1995, when two Indian-born scientists in Mississippi were granted a U.S. patent on the use of tumeric, a common spice, to heal wounds. The move sparked protests from the Indian government, which cited ancient Sanskrit texts describing the use of tumeric for the same purpose. The patent was revoked.

To create the database, Gupta's team since 2001 has been poring over ancient texts in Sanskrit, Urdu, Persian and Arabic in search of traditional formulas. Working in drab cubicles and enduring frequent power cuts, the specialists enter the formulas in alphanumeric code, which is then translated automatically into English, Japanese, French, German and Spanish.

Sometime this year, the complete library will be made available to foreign patent offices on a secure Web site. Indian officials hope the patent offices will use the database in evaluating whether to grant patents on natural remedies.

"This traditional knowledge has been validated in the laboratory of life," Gupta said, with the zeal of a true believer. "It has been nurtured and grown in India for 4,000 years."

China Takes Aim At Corruption (WP)

By Edward Cody

BEIJING, Jan. 7 -- In the face of rising discontent over corruption, China's senior Communist Party leaders called on members Saturday to work harder to stop bribery among businessmen and local officials in the country's thousands of cities, counties and villages.

The appeal, in a communique issued after a two-day meeting of the party's Central Discipline Inspection Committee that was attended by President Hu Jintao, seemed to take particular aim at corrupt rural officials whose illegal dealings have helped generate a wave of riots and peasant unrest over the past two years. Much of the violence has stemmed from anger over land confiscations in which, farmers allege, village or county officials took money from business developers in return for favorable deals.

"More anti-corruption education will be carried out among grass-roots officials, while the procedures for selecting officials for promotion will be stricter," the official New China News Agency quoted the communique as saying.

As China moves from socialism toward a market economy, local party officials have adopted economic growth as their main goal, creating a de facto alliance with private businessmen. In the shared race for profits, opportunities for corruption have become numerous. As a result, the party officials called upon to fight the corruption are in most instances the very ones involved in it.

Hu warned his fellow Communist leaders that "the fight against corruption is a long-term, complicated and arduous task," the news agency reported.

The committee also singled out the spread of bribery in China's health system, a source of increasingly angry grumbling among people in the city and countryside alike. Doctors and hospitals have taken to demanding payoffs, above and beyond normal fees, before proceeding with medical care, Chinese complain. Among people who once enjoyed free medical coverage, this practice has produced particular outrage.

Li Xi, the Health Ministry's discipline inspection leader, said 1,248 people in the medical profession were punished during 2005 for malfeasance that involved payments totaling more than $1.3 million, the agency reported.

Appeals Court, Reversing Itself, Holds 2 Salvadoran Generals Liable In Torture Case (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

A federal appeals court has reversed its own ruling and upheld a $54.6 million jury verdict against two retired generals from El Salvador who were held responsible in a 2002 trial for the torture of three Salvadorans during the country's civil war in the 1980's.

The opinion, issued Wednesday by the United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit in Atlanta, was a surprising turn in decade-long efforts by American human rights groups to punish abuses that occurred during the conflict between the United States-backed security forces and leftist guerrillas in El Salvador.

A three-judge appeals panel acted without prompting from lawyers for either side to overturn a ruling it issued on Feb. 28. 2005, that nullified the trial verdict against the two generals, José Guillermo García and Carlos Eugenio Vides Casanova.

The new appeals opinion seems likely to be the decisive step in years of litigation against the generals. During the war, Mr. García and Mr. Vides Casanova served as defense minister, the highest post in the military, with strong support from the United States.

They have been living in South Florida since 1989. In a separate civil trial in Florida in 2000, they were acquitted of responsibility for the killings of four American churchwomen by soldiers in El Salvador in 1980.

The three plaintiffs in the second trial, held in West Palm Beach, suffered lasting injuries from torture by troops under the generals' command.

In its initial ruling, the appeals panel threw out the jury verdict, finding that the district court had improperly extended the 10-year statute of limitations that applied in the case. The claims were brought under the Torture Victim Protection Act, a controversial law that human rights groups have used to bring notoriously violent foreign leaders to face justice in American courts.

But on June 24, 2005, the appeals judges announced in a letter that they had made two factual errors in their opinion, incorrectly recording both the date when the case was first filed - actually May 11, 1999 - and the date when General Vides Casanova stepped down as defense minister - May 31, 1989.

Using the correct dates and re-examining the trial record, the judges decided to agree with the district court that the case was filed within the statute of limitations. The panel concluded that the statute should begin to run in 1992, when the government and the rebels signed a peace accord that ended the war.

Before that, the judges wrote, "the very regime against whom the plaintiffs leveled their accusations remained intent on maintaining its power at any cost and acted with impunity to so do." The three judges were Gerald B. Tjoflat, Edward E. Carnes, and Anne C. Conway.

Kurt Klaus Jr., who represented both retired generals, said he was dumbfounded by the reversal. "I have never, ever heard of such a thing," he said. "I am so shocked, I feel like quitting my practice and moving to El Salvador to grow coca and coffee."

He said he would consult with the former generals to see if they wanted to pursue further appeals. He said both clients had been left essentially bankrupt by legal costs.

"In the war against communism, they did what the United States government wanted them to do and paid them to do," Mr. Klaus said.

Mr. Vides Casanova has placed about $270,000 in an escrow account awaiting the outcome of the appeals, said Moira Feeney, a spokeswoman for the Center for Justice and Accountability in San Francisco, which represented the defendants.

Neris González, a Salvadoran Roman Catholic church worker who testified at the trial that she endured 12 days of torture, said in a statement that the decision showed "that the Salvadoran military bears responsibility for what we, as a people, suffered."

Chief Of U.N. Troops In Haiti Is Found Dead In Hotel Room (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

DOJ_NMG_0008818

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 7 - The commander of the United Nations peacekeeping force in Haiti was found shot to death in his hotel room early Saturday, casting more doubt on the beleaguered mission's capacity to restore order in crime-plagued Haiti as authorities struggle to organize presidential elections.

Initial reports indicated that the commander, Gen. Urano Teixeira Da Matta Bacellar, had committed suicide. He was found wearing shorts and a T-shirt, and his gun was in his hand, the authorities said. The body was found in the general's hotel room at the Hotel Montana in Port-au-Prince, the capital.

Chief Mario Andresol of the Haitian National Police said he could not confirm the death was a suicide until after an investigation. "The general died a violent death," he said. "At this time I can't go into more detail." An unidentified official at the United Nations mission in Haiti later confirmed that the general had died from a self-inflicted gunshot wound, The Associated Press reported.

The shooting came at the end of a week of intense public criticism of the Brazilian-led United Nations Mission in Haiti, commissioned nearly two years ago after an armed rebellion, months of violent political clashes and heavy pressure by the United States that forced President Jean-Bertrand Aristide from office. Since that time, critics of the mission have complained that the violence and political fighting have gotten worse.

Kidnappings peaked over the Christmas holiday to as many as 12 a day, authorities reported, including attacks against journalists and aid workers. Some 10 United Nations soldiers and police officers have died in the line of duty. Haitian business leaders have blamed the United Nations for failing to use the force necessary to stop the street gangs and drug-trafficking organizations responsible for much of the violence.

The security problems have had a devastating impact on Haiti's ability to overcome its latest political crisis. The first round of the presidential elections, already postponed three times and then set for Sunday, were put off again. United Nations authorities have cited persistent fighting within Haiti's electoral council for the delays.

Meanwhile, leaders of Haiti's interim government, which was installed by the United States, have blamed the postponements on failures by international agencies to meet deadlines to distribute voter identification cards and to establish polling places.

Preparations for the elections have already cost an estimated $60 million, most of it from the European Union, Canada and the United States. The authorities estimate they will need at least $14 million more.

On Friday, the United Nations Security Council urged Haiti to set Feb. 7 as the date for the first round of elections. It was unclear Saturday whether the general's death would force the United Nations to withdraw that demand.

David Wimhurst, a United Nations spokesman in Haiti, refused to answer questions by telephone on Saturday. A statement by the agency praised General Bacellar's 39 years of service to the Brazilian Armed Forces and to the United Nations mission in Haiti, known in official shorthand as Minustah.

"His untimely death and sacrifice in the cause of peace," the statement read, "will not weaken the resolve of Minustah and the international community to ensure the will of the Haitian people prevails and Haiti joins the democratic community of nations."

UN Commander In Haiti Dies In Apparent Suicide (REU-Y2)

By Joseph Guyler Delva

Reuters, January 8, 2006

The commander of the United Nations' peacekeeping force in Haiti was found dead in his hotel room on Saturday after apparently shooting himself in the head, U.N. officials said.

Brazilian Lt. Gen. Urano Teixeira Da Matta Bacellar's death comes as the troubled Caribbean country struggles to organize its first presidential election since a monthlong armed revolt ousted then-president Jean-Bertrand Aristide in February 2004.

The general, 58, who had been in command of the 9,000-strong U.N. force in Haiti since the end of August, appeared to have been alone in his suite at the Montana hotel in the capital Port-au-Prince at the time of the shooting.

His gun was found near his body, which was dressed in shorts and a white T-shirt, witnesses said.

"It is unfortunate and devastating to see such a good and honorable general killed in such circumstances," Brazil's ambassador to Haiti, Paulo Cordeiro de Andrade Pinto, told Reuters as he left the hotel.

The Brazilian army initially referred to the incident as a "firearm accident." The army later released a statement saying the armed forces "profoundly lamented" the death of the general, who was a career military officer, and that it would cooperate with the police investigation.

The general's sister, Bartira Bacellar, told TV Band in his home state of Rio Grande do Sul that the family was devastated. "We always accompanied his career, for which he had lots of enthusiasm," she said.

Brazil was expected to send an air force aircraft to pick up his body on Sunday.

A spokesman for U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Annan was "shocked and saddened" and that an investigation was under way.

PERSISTENT VIOLENCE

The U.N. mission, known by its acronym MINUSTAH, was sent to Haiti to keep the peace between supporters and foes of Aristide after the 2004 revolt.

But the country of 8.5 million people has continued to be afflicted by political violence and a wave of kidnappings has swept through Port-au-Prince despite the presence of the Brazilian-led U.N. troops and police.

The business sector, which vigorously opposed Aristide, and the interim government have called on the U.N. force to be more aggressive in taking on street gangs that control many of the sprawling slums in Port-au-Prince. Many of the gangs are seen as supporters of the exiled Aristide.

In contrast, civil and leftist groups in Brazil have criticized the U.N. force for being too aggressive in patrolling the slums. Dozens of civilians have been caught in the cross-fire during gunfights between U.N. troops and gangs.

U.N. mission head Juan Gabriel Valdes announced on Friday that U.N. troops would occupy the Cite Soleil slum, the capital's most dangerous ghetto, and warned that civilians could be harmed.

"We are going to intervene in the coming days. I think there'll be collateral damage but we have to impose our force, there is no other way," Valdes told a local radio station. His comments on collateral damage alarmed civic groups in Haiti.

Bacellar had opposed Valdes' plan for Cite Soleil, some U.N. officials said.

The presidential election was originally scheduled for November but has been put off repeatedly and now is expected to take place in February.

Haiti's interim authorities have blamed the U.N. mission and the Organization of American States for the delays, a charge both organizations refute.

U.N. Chief In Haiti Found Dead (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

MIAMI — The commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Haiti was found dead at an upscale hotel in the country's capital early Saturday with an apparently self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head, officials in Port-au-Prince said.

The death of Lt. Gen. Urano Teixeira Da Matta Bacellar, a Brazilian, seemed likely to further complicate the world body's long-thwarted efforts to bring stability to violence-racked Haiti and to organize elections.

Haiti has been without an elected leader since President Jean-Bertrand Aristide fled an armed rebellion in February 2004. Presidential and parliamentary elections were to have been held in November but have been repeatedly delayed by the U.S.-backed interim leadership.

Bacellar, 58, was found in his suite at the Hotel Montana with a gunshot wound to the head and his service revolver nearby, according to Radio Metropole and other news agencies at the scene. Reuters quoted unidentified diplomats, Haitian police and U.N. sources as saying the general was alone at the time of the shooting and that they believed it was a suicide.

In a dispatch from Sao Paulo, the Brazilian army initially said the general's death was the result of a "firearms accident." In a later statement, the army said Brazilians "profoundly lamented" Bacellar's death and that army investigators would travel to Haiti today to conduct their own review of the shooting.

Chilean Gen. Eduardo Aldunate was put in charge of the military mission until Brazil replaces the commander of its 1,200 troops in Haiti, the largest contingent of the 7,265-strong U.N. military deployment.

The contemplative soldier with snow-white hair and black eyebrows inherited command Aug. 31 and had witnessed a recent deterioration of security in the capital's teeming, gang-controlled slums.

An official of Haiti's Provisional Electoral Council, Rosemond Pradel, last week blamed the U.N. mission for the latest postponement of elections, citing its failure to halt escalating slum violence and a rash of kidnappings. Pradel confirmed that the vote scheduled for today was being called off but said no new election date could be set because of persistent security and organizational problems.

Alarmed by the delays, the U.N. Security Council and the Organization of American States convened special sessions Friday during which they instructed Haitian officials to cease infighting and to hold elections no later than Feb. 7.

The OAS said in a statement that it saw "no valid technical reasons to continue postponing the elections" and that security issues "in no way justify further delay."

A U.S. diplomat in Port-au-Prince said the State Department considered the Feb. 7 deadline feasible and did not believe Bacellar's death would affect the electoral calendar.

"In my view, the technical answers to elections are all fairly clear and should pose no impediment. Neither should the unfortunate demise of Gen. Bacellar," said Elizabeth Spehar, the OAS elections coordinator in Port-au-Prince.

But Haitians point to the daily gunfights in gang-controlled neighborhoods such as Cite Soleil and Bel Air and abductions for ransom as dangers preventing the set-up of polling places in the most populous areas. Almost half of the 3.4 million who registered to vote still haven't received their ID cards or been told where they will cast their ballots.

Expressing the international community's mounting impatience, U.N. mission chief Juan Gabriel Valdes warned Friday that the troops under Bacellar's command and some of the 1,700-plus U.N. police in Haiti would occupy Cite Soleil to break up the crime and kidnapping rings.

Bacellar, as well as his Brazilian predecessor in the mission's command, had been on record as opposing any use of U.N. force that could endanger bystanders. In an October interview with The Times, Bacellar said his troops stayed out of certain areas of the capital "to avoid collateral damage."

A serious and outwardly serene career soldier, Bacellar described his mission in strictly military terms, discussing deployments, patrolling and readiness while professing little knowledge of the United Nations' longer-term political objectives of seating a legitimate government.

Spain Holds General After Remarks (NYT)

By Renwick McLean

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

MADRID, Jan. 7 - A Spanish Army general was put under house arrest on Saturday after he suggested that military intervention might be necessary to quell demands for greater autonomy from the northeastern region of Catalonia, the Defense Ministry said.

Recalling the dispute over Catalan autonomy that was a partial cause of the Spanish Civil War in the 1930's, Lt. Gen. José Mena Aguado, 63, said on Friday night that history appeared to be repeating itself as the nation debated Catalonia's recent requests for more self-government, and that the military was ready to act.

"It is our obligation to warn that there could be serious consequences for the armed forces as an institution and for its members if the Statute of Catalonia is approved in its proposed form," he said during a speech to members of the military in Seville.

"The Constitution establishes a series of impassable limits for any statute of autonomy," he said, referring to the type of law that describes the relationship between Spain's regional governments and Madrid. "But if those limits are exceeded, which thankfully is unthinkable at this time, it would be necessary to apply Article 8 of the Constitution."

Article 8 establishes that the armed forces are responsible for defending Spain's "territorial integrity" and "the constitutional order."

The proposed statute, which was approved overwhelmingly by the Catalan regional Parliament in September, says that Catalonia is a nation unto itself whose powers of self-government are not restricted by the Spanish Constitution.

Critics of the proposal, who include both liberal and conservative politicians, say it could set the stage for an eventual declaration of independence if it were passed in its current form.

Although democracy has taken root in Spain since the death of Gen. Francisco Franco in 1975, the military's history of intervening to settle political disputes continues to cast a shadow over Spanish politics. Today, many Spaniards remain wary of a strong military, and refuse to support significant increases in military spending.

Most political parties immediately condemned General Mena's comments, although a spokesman for the conservative Popular Party, the main opposition group in Parliament, said that statements like his were inevitable because Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero had failed to vigorously oppose the Catalan proposal.

In comments to the Spanish news agency Europa Press, the spokesman, Gabriel Elorriaga, said that Mr. Zapatero had stood idle while the Catalan proposal created a "serious constitutional crisis."

Mr. Zapatero has said that the proposal is unconstitutional and must be modified before he will support it.

Catalonia, a region of about seven million people in Spain's northeastern corner, has been home to a potent separatist movement for more than 100 years.

The region is one of Spain's economic engines, and supporters of more autonomy say that it provides Spain with much more than it gets in return, particularly in taxes that go to support poorer regions, like Andalucia and Extremadura.

In announcing the detention of General Mena on Saturday, the Defense Ministry said it would propose to Mr. Zapatero that the general, who is scheduled to retire in March, be relieved of his command.

During his speech on Friday, Mr. Mena, who was scheduled to retire in March, suggested that others in the military shared his views.

"I have an obligation to know the feelings, concerns, and preoccupations of my subordinates," he said. "It is their express wish that I transmit them to the top authorities of the Army and to make them public."

Serbia Begins Prosecuting Some War Crimes Cases (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

BELGRADE, Serbia - Slowly, Serbia is prosecuting some of the war crimes cases from the Kosovo fighting of 1999 and the 1992-95 conflict in Bosnia, even while it has failed to deliver major suspects to the tribunal in The Hague.

Seven cases have been brought to trial so far. In the past two years, five of them in a war crimes court that has been financed partly by the United States. Prosecutors say they have plans to bring dozens more cases to trial. They and others following the cases say the trials suggest that the country is beginning, at least tentatively, to acknowledge its recent history.

These trials have highlighted some of the most brutal acts reportedly carried out by Serbian forces during wars in Croatia, Bosnia and Kosovo.

The accusations include the massacre of 192 Croatian men taken from a hospital where they were seeking refuge in the town of Vukovar in 1991 and the killing of an extended Albanian family in Kosovo in 1999, when 45 people, including 14 children, a pregnant woman and a 90-year-old woman, were attacked with grenades and then shot.

"It points to the readiness of the state and judiciary to face the past," said Dragoljub Stankovic, one of five deputy prosecutors assigned to Serbia's war crimes department.

Despite such claims and praise from some of the victims' families and human rights groups, there have been notable omissions.

While The Hague tribunal has indicted senior Serbian police and army officers for crimes committed during the 1999 Kosovo conflict, the Serbian courts have focused on midranking officers, human rights groups and diplomats here say. As a result, they say a large number of senior officers have not been challenged about their role in the war.

Also, one prominent case, involving the killing of three American brothers in 1999, appears to be stuck.

"In my opinion, many commanders of police stations were involved in or ordered killings in Kosovo," said Natasa Kandic, a lawyer and the director of the Humanitarian Law Center, a human rights group based in Belgrade.

Some senior police and army officers accused by human rights groups of ordering the crimes, or failing to prevent them, have remained at their posts.

The officers include Goran Radosavljevic, who was the commander of Serbia's special units during the Kosovo fighting and was recently the commander of the Serbian gendarmerie. In addition, the senior police officer in charge of war crimes investigations, Vozdan Gagic, was a member of the joint police and army command during the Kosovo campaign, a position in which he would have known about war crimes taking place, Ms. Kandic said.

"It was impossible for him not to know," she said.

Both Mr. Radosavljevic and Mr. Gagic have denied any involvement in war crimes.

"The army and the police are powerful, and barely reformed, institutions," said Bogdan Ivanisevic, the Human Rights Watch representative in Belgrade. "Addressing the responsibility of the senior officers would be quite a bite for the prosecutors, something they could do only if they felt supported by the government."

The case of the Americans involves the Bytyqi brothers, ethnic Albanians from Long Island who had been among 400 or so Albanian-Americans who had gone to join the fighting in Kosovo in 1999. Their bodies were found in a mass grave near a police training camp in 2001. Their hands were bound behind their backs and they had bullet wounds in the back of the head.

Prosecutors believe they know most of the details about the days leading up to their killing. They say the brothers were held by the Serbian police after they strayed across Kosovo's boundary on June 26, 1999, just weeks after the end of the Kosovo conflict. The three, Ylli, Agron and Mehmet Bytyqi, were in their 20's. They were ordered jailed for 15 days.

While they were serving their sentences, two members of a special police unit came to move them from jail to their training camp, according to testimony given to prosecutors by Sreten Popovic, then deputy commander of the camp. Mr. Popovic said he acted after hearing from Serbia's assistant minister for internal affairs, Gen. Vlastimir Djordjevic.

Mr. Popovic, who is currently the commander of the gendarmerie in Nis, Serbia's third-largest city, has so far escaped prosecution. The investigation into the brothers' deaths shows little sign of reaching trial soon.

Officials at the United States Embassy in Belgrade said they believed that the brothers had been killed because they were American and members of the Kosovo Liberation Army. They say prosecutors have sufficient evidence to bring the case to trial.

R. Nicholas Burns, the State Department's under secretary for political affairs, said in a recent interview that the outcome of the investigation into the Bytyqi brothers' deaths would influence the United States government's view as to Serbia's willingness to handle domestic war crimes cases.

"The authorities already have collected substantial evidence relating to the illegal detention and/or killings," he said. "It is time to bring the perpetrators to justice."

Bosnian Was Killed After Firing Shots, Peacekeepers Say (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

LJUBLJANA, Slovenia, Jan. 7 - A woman killed by peacekeeping troops in Bosnia on Thursday was shot after she and her 11-year-son fired on soldiers seeking the arrest of her husband, a Bosnian Serb war crimes suspect, a military official in the Bosnian capital, Sarajevo, said Friday.

The woman, Rada Abazovic, was declared dead shortly after she was taken to a hospital in Rogatica in southeastern Bosnia on Thursday, several hours after the gun battle outside the Abazovic family home in nearby Bjelogorci, in which her son, Dragoljub, was wounded.

Her husband, Dragomir Abazovic, who stands accused by a Bosnian court of committing war crimes during the 1992-95 Bosnian conflict, had tried to flee but was cornered by troops and shot himself in the head, the official said. Hospital officials said he was in serious condition.

The shooting of Mrs. Abazovic and her son was widely criticized by Serbian politicians in Bosnia and Serbia, including the Serbian member of Bosnia's tripartite presidency, Dragan Cavic, who accused the European Union-led peacekeeping force of using indiscriminate force resulting in the death and injury of innocent victims.

The nationality of the troops involved has not been disclosed. Italian carabinieri, military police officers who are part of the United Nations peacekeeping force, were photographed later at the scene of the shooting.

But on Friday, a spokesman for the European Union-led mission, which took over from NATO troops at the end of 2004, said Mrs. Abazovic had opened fire on the commander of the unit seeking her husband's arrest as he tried to escape.

"She fired short bursts from an automatic weapon, a Kalashnikov AK-47," said the spokesman, Lt. Cmdr. Jem Thomas, in a telephone interview, giving an account based on a debriefing of the unit's commander, whom he did not name. "Soon after, she was joined by a boy."

"When she was about to run out, she gave the weapon to her son, who continued shooting while she looked for more ammunition."

He said troops were then ordered to shoot both Mrs. Abazovic and her son. "She was immobilized," he said, "with one shot." The boy, he said, was also "shot and immobilized."

Mrs. Abazovic was estimated to have used four magazines of ammunition, Commander Thomas said.

A Bosnian Serb police spokesman would not comment on that account, or say whether the autopsy on Mrs. Abazovic had provided evidence that she had fired a gun. "I am unable to talk about it," said the spokesman, Radovan Pejic. "All the evidence has been given to the prosecutor."

In Kenya, 'Why Does This Keep Happening?' (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

NAIROBI, Jan. 7 -- On New Year's Day, groups of angry Masai herders attempted to drive their emaciated cattle onto the manicured lawns of the presidential residence so their animals could graze on the thick carpets of green grass in the morning sun.

With a drought turning their fields and pastures into dusty gray wastelands, and with millions of people in the region facing a food shortage, the herders wanted to make a point, organizers of the action said.

"Africa is not so poor that it doesn't have enough food or grazing land to feed itself. There's plenty of food here," said Ben Ole Koissaba, a leader of the Masai, one of the largest and most powerful tribes in Kenya. "Many countries around the world face drought, but people don't starve. We think it's ludicrous for the government to treat its citizens this way. Why does this keep happening?"

Many are asking that question as yet another drought threatens lives and destroys crops and livestock here. About 11 million people in Kenya, Ethiopia, Djibouti and Somalia are "on the brink of starvation," the United Nations said this week. In northeastern Kenya, at least 40 people, most of them children, have died from malnutrition and related illnesses since December, according to the Kenya Red Cross.

Enough food is grown in Kenya to feed all of its population of 33 million, but many citizens, especially the country's poor subsistence farmers, cannot afford it. When the rains ceased last year, the farmers were left with parched crops, hungry livestock and nothing to eat.

"The month of December 2005 will be remembered for a long time to come by Kenyans as a time when people were starving to death while others were feasting," said Gullet Abbas, secretary general of the Kenya Red Cross Society.

Feeding centers for children younger than 5 are filling up in northern Kenya, Abbas said. Cattle, goats and camels are growing thin. On Thursday, 3,000 herdsmen moved their 20,000 head of cattle across the border into Uganda to look for green pastures, according to reports on national television. Governments have warned that power shortages are possible because of lower water levels at Kenyan and Tanzanian dams, which the countries depend on to generate electricity.

"The current drought is more severe at most locations than the droughts of 1984, 1999 and 2000," Joseph Mukabana, director of the Kenya Meteorological Department, said in a full-page paid commentary in the Daily Nation, Kenya's largest newspaper. "Food relief efforts may need to go beyond December 2006 in some parts of the country."

Late Friday, President Mwai Kibaki ordered the government to purchase "all available" corn in the country in an emergency operation to stave off more deaths. The cabinet has "termed as the country's current number one priority the provision of food for Kenyans," Kibaki's office said in a statement.

The Kenya Red Cross Society and the Famine Early Warning Systems Network, a monitoring group, have criticized the government for failing to do more to prepare for the drought, saying that officials knew more than a year ago that such conditions would develop.

Some experts predict that the cycles of drought and food shortages will continue on the world's poorest continent until governments here develop more permanent, sustainable solutions.

"During these emergencies, we don't talk enough about development and what really needs to happen here," said Nancy Mutunga, the country director for the Famine Early Warning group. "Shouldn't we be building more water irrigation systems and developing more long-term solutions so this doesn't keep happening every few years?"

"If we don't talk about underdevelopment, we may just carry on with these cycles affecting herding and farming households every few years," she said. "These families are poor and live on the edge. Their wealth is dependent only on their livestock and crops. They have to diversify that."

Kibaki has asked the international community for more food aid. The U.S. Embassy, which contributed 62,890 metric tons of relief food last year, said it was eager to help again.

Too much food aid, however, can cause the price of locally grown food to fall, leaving farmers without enough income to purchase seeds for the next season, experts say.

"Making food available for the farmers, though welcome, is short-term and short-lived," said Tom Kagwe, who writes about famines and development in Africa for the Daily Nation. "It cannot provide the long-term solutions to the country's food shortage."

There are many reasons for food shortages in Africa. Sometimes war plays a role. In rebel-controlled eastern Congo, for instance, thousands of banana and mango trees produce more fruit than local people can consume. But the excess food never makes it to markets or drought-stricken regions because the roads are destroyed and armed militiamen loot the supplies or tax them heavily.

In northern Uganda, people displaced by fighting between the government and the Lord's Resistance Army, a rebel group, languish in camps, looking out at the land they used to farm. Fields that once produced abundant amounts of yams, peanuts and corn are barren.

In Kenya, a peaceful and stable country, development has been hindered by corruption and mismanagement, according to Transparency International, a watchdog group that ranks Kenya as one of the most corrupt countries in the world.

Ole Koissaba, the Masai leader, said he was furious that the president turned the herders away from his residence. Even former president Daniel arap Moi, an authoritarian leader who ruled for 24 years, allowed the Masai to graze their cattle near the state house during a drought of 2002, Ole Koissaba pointed out.

"The new leadership cares more about politics than pastoralists, and now it can't do the correct things to save the lives, long term, of its own citizens," he said, adding there should be more international pressure on African governments to develop sound agricultural policies. "No African wants things to stay in this cycle of dysfunction."

A Paradise Drowning (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

MALE, Maldives

When President Bush visits India next month, he should add a whistle-stop at this gorgeous chain of tropical islands southwest of India, for they are a window into the future if we continue to spew carbon into the environment.

These palm-lined islands, where colored fish and small sharks play in the coral reefs, are a paradise. But old-timers point to myriad changes wrought by the rising seas, and the government is already moving some inhabitants from the lowest atolls to those that are a bit more elevated.

Alas, the high point in this entire nation of 1,200 islands is only eight feet above sea level. So people here worry that eventually the entire nation may have to move, making the Maldives perhaps the first country in the world to be destroyed by global warming. (Tuvalu and Kiribati, both small Pacific island nations, are other contenders for the title of the first modern nation to be drowned.)

"There is a realistic threat that we could be the first environmental refugees in the world," said Mohamed H. Shareef, the chief government spokesman.

He notes that some scientific models have suggested that the seas may rise in this century by two or three feet, as polar ice caps melt and seawater warms and expands. He adds, "As 75 percent of the total land area of the Maldives is under three and a half feet, our islands would be submerged to such an extent that we would have to relocate."

The tsunami a year ago offered a glimpse of what may come: when the waters reached their peak, most of the Maldives disappeared under the Indian Ocean for a few minutes.

One reason for Mr. Bush to drop by is that the Maldives may be the most pro-American Muslim country in the world. Local tolerance and pragmatism are exemplified by the attitude toward liquor: don't drink it, but overcharge foreigners for it.

But the more important reason for Mr. Bush to come is not geopolitical but environmental. He should witness a paradise that is gravely threatened by irresponsible environmental policies in the U.S. - the world's leading source of greenhouse gases - and other major carbon emitters. As evidence mounts that climate change is real, is caused by humans and is accelerating because of feedback loops in nature, I find it astonishing that the U.S. still refuses to adopt serious measures to curb greenhouse gases.

Granted, there is considerable uncertainty about the scale of the damage we are inflicting on the earth. But that's no reason to play Russian roulette with our biosphere.

So we must encourage conservation and fuel efficiency, support alternative forms of energy like wind, solar and biofuels, and - I'll get hate mail about this - grudgingly accept nuclear power, because it doesn't produce greenhouse gases. We should also adopt a carbon tax, and join the Kyoto process of binding curbs on emissions.

A visit to the Maldives is sobering because it juxtaposes extraordinary beauty and extraordinary fragility. The islands have perfect white sand beaches, and the most exclusive resorts here charge several thousand dollars per room per night. And yet the luxury rooms are on sandbars barely peeking above the horizon. When the tide is coming in, you have the creepy feeling that unless it stops very quickly, you'll be left treading water in the middle of the Indian Ocean.

Local people say that the rising seas have already led to severe erosion on some islands, to wells filling with saltwater, and to storms' becoming more violent.

"My island sits lower in the water now, because of rising seas," said Hasan Ibraahim, a fisherman from the island of Kandholhudhoo. Twice a year, he said, waves now wash over the island - and so, after the tsunami, the government decided to relocate the island's entire population.

He's sad to say goodbye to the land of his ancestors, but after the tsunami it was three days before he found his 8-year-old daughter and 5-year-old son - and he doesn't want to live through that nightmare again.

So Mr. Bush should come and talk to fishermen who endure the mutating climate every day - and then he should ponder the implications of rising seas for Florida, the Carolinas, Long Island. The Maldives may be the canary in the world's coal mine.

"Our message to the U.S. is as simple as this," said Mr. Shareef, the government spokesman. "Sea level rise is not just a phenomenon which is just going to engulf the Maldives and then stop. If it affects us tomorrow, it will affect you the day after."

TORONTO Barely 18 months ago, Canadian party leaders were out campaigning for better health care policies, a cure for Quebec's nationalist aspirations and an end to government corruption scandals. But since the minority government put in place in June 2004 lost a no-confidence vote late last November, the politicians have been back out on the stump, preparing for a new election on Jan. 23. This time, though, running in the two coldest months of winter, they've been using that familiar demon -- the United States and all its evils -- as the fuel to heat Canadian voters to a frenzy.

There's no denying that Canadians are in an even more anti-American mood than usual, thanks to the Iraq war and the Bush administration's perceived arrogance. And politicians here are playing to that mood. In a blatant appeal for votes, candidates of every stripe, led by Prime Minister Paul Martin and his ruling Liberal Party, are taking aim at Washington, blasting it for taxing Canadian lumber imports, for failing to fight global warming, for lax gun-control laws, for dealing inappropriately with the war on terrorism. And all the while, they're studiously ignoring Canada's own homegrown issues.

America-bashing became such a central part of the election landscape last month that U.S. ambassador David H. Wilkins warned that Canadian-American relations could take a turn for the worse if party leaders didn't back off. But his words only prompted Canadian politicians to lash back with admonitions of their own. Even Stephen Harper, leader of the Conservatives, the party generally most sympathetic to the United States, declared: "I don't think foreign ambassadors should be expressing their views or intervening in an election."

In keeping with a long political tradition, the United States ignores Canada whenever possible. Nonetheless, the issues between the two countries just keep piling up. Leading the way is the softwood lumber dispute. Three years ago, the United States began imposing import duties on Canadian lumber after American producers complained that the Canadian government was all but subsidizing the lumber industry. Canada objected, and last August, arbitrators for the North American Free Trade Agreement decided in its favor. But Americans still have not fully complied with the NAFTA ruling to lift the duties, so Prime Minister Martin has made confronting Washington on this score a main issue of his campaign, even though lumber represents less than 3 percent of Canadian exports to the United States.

While American non-compliance with NAFTA may be a legitimate beef for Canadians, politicians have also been indulging in some inflated rhetoric on other fronts where Canada isn't on such solid ground. The specific attack to which Wilkins responded, for example, had to do with the Kyoto environmental accord. In welcoming a United Nations conference on global warming in Montreal last month, Martin criticized the United States for not signing the agreement and urged it to pay attention to the "global conscience."

In doing so, he conveniently neglected to mention that Canada, which is one of the accord's major promoters, so far hasn't complied with its emission reduction requirements. The United States, in fact, has done a better job in dealing with greenhouse gases. A U.S. Department of Energy report released in December noted that American emissions for 2004 were 16 percent higher than in 1990. A similar study prepared by Environment Canada reported that greenhouse gas emissions rose 24 percent here between 1990 and 2003. But in the current election environment, the prime minister knows that it is hot air that really counts.

The Liberal Party has been determined to divert attention from a corruption scandal that has left it weakened in every province. It is using its anti-American foreign policy as an election tool, continuously reminding Canadians that the Liberal government kept the country out of the Iraq war and the North American missile defense system. Some pundits say that Martin, with no ammunition against opposition candidates, has decided to run against George W. Bush.

The opposition has also played the America card. The Conservatives, who support deep tax cuts, Thatcheresque deregulation of the economy and a set of family values that could attract the vote of any evangelical minister, are sympathetic with Bush's foreign policies but vow never to mimic them. At the other end of the spectrum, the quasi-socialist New Democratic Party has candidates who are so anti-American that they sometimes sound like an undergraduate student forum, performing stunts such as conducting "citizens' weapons inspections" of American military bases in Washington state. The one thing all the candidates have in common is their strenuous assertions that they will not tolerate being bullied, even if they have to make up the bullying.

Although the government boasts about its non-cooperation with the Americans on Iraq, it is desperate to keep quiet its cooperation on the war on terrorism. Under the Liberals, Canada enacted Patriot Act-style legislation with the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2001. Recently, it resisted calls to repeal provisions for increased police surveillance and far-reaching powers of arrest and detention. Federal authorities are currently holding five suspects under so-called security certificates, which allow non-Canadians to be held indefinitely if a judge is convinced they are a threat. These policies, however, have been kept low-key, for fear of an anti-government backlash in public opinion.

The problem is that silence on these issues during the campaign plays into the growing anti-American sentiment and may eventually hinder attempts to deal with terrorism. The best example of this is the case of Abdullah Khadr, the Canadian media's current cause celebre. Khadr is one of several Toronto-born sons of an Egyptian terrorist who was killed in a shootout with police in Pakistan. U.S. authorities suspect Abdullah of being a weapons supplier for al Qaeda and part of a group that planned to assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. On Dec. 2, he came back to Canada after 14 months in a Pakistani prison and was soon arrested on an extradition warrant, issued at the request of the United States, for conspiracy to murder Americans abroad.

Abdullah's 19-year-old brother, Omar, has also been in the news, as the youngest person held in Guantanamo Bay, for allegedly throwing a grenade that killed a U.S. Army medic in Afghanistan. The clan's mother has given interviews saying she detests Western values and that the only reason the family has returned to Canada is for the subsidized health care. One would think few families could be less popular with the liberal-minded Canadian public.

And yet in his current extradition battle, Abdullah is clearly winning in the court of public opinion, if not in the court of law. A number of prominent columnists and CBC News are questioning whether Canada should cooperate with the U.S. government in this or any other terrorism case.

Politicians here know that Canadians love to read, talk and debate about U.S. transgressions. Newspaper articles point to ethnic profiling at airports and long border waits as evidence that the war on terrorism is a sham, and that Americans are simply looking for excuses to harass Canadians for the country's multicultural society. But just as it chooses to ignore weaknesses in Canada's environmental policy, the public is also disinclined to take seriously the country's problems with terrorism. Those problems may not be as exaggerated as some Americans think they are -- just recently Montana's Sen. Conrad Burns reiterated, then retracted, the popular myth that the 9/11 hijackers got into the United States through Canada -- but they are certainly real.

The so-called millennium bomber, Ahmed Ressam, who planned to bomb Los Angeles airport on New Year's Eve 2000, did come from Canada. In another notorious case, Mohammed Zeki Mahjoub was arrested in Toronto after being accused of belonging to a militant group with ties to an Egyptian Islamic Jihad organization. Though he denied those links, Mahjoub admitted he worked closely with Osama bin Laden himself during his years in Sudan. The judge at Mahjoub's first hearing quoted from a report issued by the Canadian Security Intelligence Services that "there are more terrorist cells operating in Canada than in any other country outside the Middle East."

Worry about alienating key constituencies in a hairline election has silenced politicians here on these important issues. But Canada-U.S. relations could reach a turning point if they're not addressed. Over the past five years, Canada has stopped extraditing people to the United States if they face the death penalty. The increasing popularity of the notion that international terrorism suspects also should not be extradited have led to some serious concerns about the heavily trafficked border.

It's not just that Canada is starting to look like a safe haven for America's Most Wanted; it's that America may be starting to view Canada as a less-than-benign neighbor. U.S. Customs and Immigration this year imposed passport requirements on visiting Canadians for the first time, and there is talk of fingerprinting at the border as well. At some point, the truck traffic that carries up to 70 percent of Canadian exports south will start to bog down in security inspections. That's when Canadians' anti-American bark will really start to bite.

In this electoral season, the public is looking for bellicose rhetoric, but Canada's security cries out for sober management. Whoever is elected will have to work publicly with the United States, not just against it, to reduce anti-American sentiment while addressing the problem of terrorism and cross-border control. If the real need for cooperation with Canada's southern neighbor can't temper the public's demand for criticism, the nation will be in for some stormy weather in the next few years.

CRS Report Challenges Legality Of NSA Terrorist Monitoring Program. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Leonnig, 744K) in a front page story reports, "A report by Congress's research arm concluded yesterday that the administration's justification for the warrantless eavesdropping authorized by President Bush conflicts with existing law and hinges on weak legal arguments." The CRS report "rebuts the central assertions made recently by Bush and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales about the president's authority to order secret intercepts of telephone and e-mail exchanges between people inside the United States and their contacts abroad." The "nonpartisan assessment" prompted "Democratic lawmakers and civil liberties advocates to repeat calls yesterday for Congress to conduct hearings on the monitoring program and attempt to halt it." It

The New York Times (1/7, A1, Lichtblau, Shane, 1.19M) in a front page story says the report, "requested by several members of Congress, reached no bottom-line conclusions on the legality of the program, in part because it said so many details remained classified. But it raised numerous doubts about the power to bypass Congress in ordering such operations, saying the legal rationale 'does not seem to be as well grounded' as the administration's lawyers have argued." In addition to Democrats, former 9/11 Commission co-chairman Thomas Kean "weighed in for the first time in the debate. Mr. Kean said he counted himself among those who doubted the legality of the program. He said in an interview that the administration did not inform his commission about the program and that he wished it had."

Knight Ridder (1/7, Landay) notes the report "said Congress passed an amendment to a 1968 law and included language in FISA that made the act the 'exclusive means' by which the government could conduct electronic surveillance." And it "found that while gathering intelligence is 'an important facet of fighting a battle, it is not clear that the collection of intelligence constitutes a use of force.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Gorman, 958K) reports, "The report's authors conclude that, based on what is now known about the secret NSA operation, 'it appears unlikely' that a court would find that Congress had given Bush the authority to initiate such a program." The authors "said the Bush administration's argument, taken to its logical conclusion, would put no limit on what the government could do. In addition, they said: 'It is not clear that the collection of intelligence constitutes a use of force.'

The AP (1/7, Shrader) quotes Sen. Frank Lautenberg saying "It looks like the president's wiretapping was not only illegal, but likely targeted innocent Americans who did nothing more than place a phone call." Bloomberg (1/7, Bliss) also reports on the CRS report.

Cheney Rationale For NSA Monitoring Questioned. Wall Street Journal national political editor John Harwood said on PBS's Now (1/6, Matthews) "I certainly hope that Charles and Dick Cheney are right, that it's not an accident we haven't been attacked again. But it seems a bit of a stretch to say that the avoiding the FISA court in making these decisions unilaterally is the difference between being serious and not serious in the war on terror."

Washington Post Political Editor John Harris said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/6, Matthews), referring to the note Sen. Rockefeller wrote in longhand to Vice President Cheney saying he had great misgivings in the briefing he'd gotten on the domestic surveillance, that Cheney "didn't care. It's not really oversight. In very general terms, it's sort of telling them what they're doing but not asking for permission."

Chris Matthews commented on MSNBC's Hardball (1/6, Matthews), that "I'm sure that [note] ruined Dick Cheney's day."

Roberts Criticizes Continued Public Airing Of NSA Debate. The Kansas City Star (1/7, Helling, 286K) reports, "The continuing focus on a controversial federal eavesdropping program could 'endanger American lives,' Sen. Pat Roberts said Friday. 'What I'm worried about is the al-Qaida reading all of these press accounts as a cascade of further stories and speculation come out, and we lose the capability (of NSA communication intercepts),' said the Intelligence Committee chairman, who has been regularly briefed on the program."

NSA Director Rejects Concerns About Terrorist Monitoring Program. Reuters (1/7) reports NSA Director Lt. Gen. Keith Alexander "told employees last month that NSA officials had not violated U.S. law by participating in an agency program that eavesdrops on U.S. citizens without judicial oversight, newly released documents show." In a December 22 message Alexander said, "Media coverage surmises that administration and agency officials may have acted unlawfully -- notions I reject, categorically!" He added, "Overall, we are not concerned. … Our operations are carefully deliberated and measured; they are within the law; and they are nobly executed with strict oversight."

Administration Accused Of Undermining War On Terrorism. Daniel Klaidman in a Newsweek (1/7) web exclusive claims "the White House's devotion to presidential power has undermined the war on terror." Klaidman continues, "The administration's biggest mistakes in fighting the war on terror have been the product of a willful defiance of the traditional rules of warfare. Bush understood instinctively that the United States needed more creative thinking and a new flexibility to prevail against an enemy as vicious and unconventional as Al Qaeda. But a small, powerful group of ideologically committed Bush administration officials, led by Vice President Dick Cheney, had a more far-reaching agenda: to prove at virtually every turn that the Constitution vests in the president near unfettered powers in the conduct of national security policy. The principle became such an article of faith that upholding it often trumped the wisdom -- and necessity -- of individual policies. Playing out behind the scenes was a bitter struggle between the proponents of presidential supremacy during wartime and traditionalists, often career civil servants, who wanted to maintain the balance of power. A healthy tension between the two should serve as an important check on overreaching by ideologues or on the indolence of time-serving bureaucrats."

WSJ Defends Administration Authorization Of Terrorist Monitoring. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "The Bush Administration's use of warrantless wiretaps in the war on terrorism continues to generate controversy, and Congress is planning hearings. Some of the loopier elements of the Democratic Party have even suggested the wiretaps are grounds for impeachment. But the more we learn about the practice, the clearer it is that the White House has been right to employ and defend it." The Journal concludes, "The upside of the coming Congressional hearings, we guess, is that Americans will get a lesson in the Constitution's separation of powers. We're confident they'll come away believing the Founders were right to the give the President broad war-fighting -- including surveillance -- powers."

Bush Asserts Right To Bypass Detainee Torture Limits. Knight Ridder (1/7, Hutcheson, Kuhnhenn) reports, "President Bush agreed with great fanfare last month to accept a ban on torture, but he later quietly reserved the right to ignore it, even as he signed it into law." He "said he would interpret the new law in keeping with his expansive view of presidential power. He did it by issuing a bill-signing statement -- a little-noticed device that has become a favorite tool of presidential power in the Bush White House." He "has used signing statements to reject, revise or put his spin on more than 500 legislative provisions. Experts say he has been far more aggressive than any previous president in using the statements to claim sweeping executive power - and not just on national security issues."

Hayat Trial Set To Begin Feb. 14. The Lodi News-Sentinel (1/7, Bohm) reports Hamid and Umer Hayat "will stand trial Feb. 14. Over the objections of government prosecutors, a federal judge on Friday set the trial date…and also laid out a fast-moving schedule for pre-trial motions and hearings. Trial testimony will likely take 20 court days — not counting jury selection, opening statements, rebuttal and closing arguments — Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Tice-Raskin told the judge." The News-Sentinel adds, "The two men were arrested during an intense FBI investigation in Lodi. Three other men, including two leaders of the Lodi Muslim Mosque, were detained on immigration violations and have since been deported." The AP (1/7) notes, "Assistant U.S. Atty. S. Robert Tice-Raskin argued that more time was needed because some evidence against the pair was obtained using methods so secret that they can't be disclosed in open court or to anyone without a security clearance."

US "Leaning Toward" Al Arian Retrial. The AP (1/7) reports, "Federal prosecutors, still stinging from Sami Al-Arian's acquittal on eight terrorism counts last month, said Friday they are leaning toward retrying the former college professor and a co-defendant on charges that their jury could not decide. … Asked whether the government could start in late March or April," Assistant US Attorney Terry Zitek "said it was 'theoretically possible,' but that he would like more time to prepare. The judge said conflicts in the court's schedule meant the only alternative start date would be August." The Tampa Tribune (1/7, Silvestrini) notes, "Kevin Beck, a federal public defender representing Al-Arian co-defendant Hatim Fariz, said discussions are being held on 'ways we can avoid a trial.' He said his client will not agree to testify against Al-Arian. 'I can tell you that unabashedly,' he said."

Muslim Civil Rights Advocates Rally For Al Arian's Release. The Tampa Tribune (1/7, Silvestrini) also reports that at a rally outside the Tampa courthouse on Friday, "national Muslim leaders rallied to demand a resolution of the case. … Muslim civil rights activists from California and Washington shared the podium. Ahmed Younis, national director of the Muslim Public Affairs Council, said the Al-Arian case thrust America back into the court of public opinion. Younis said 'a tsunami came upon the Muslim community since 9/11.'" The Orlando Sentinel (1/7, Gutierrez) adds that "dozens of supporters as well as Muslim and Christian activists braved the cold, blustery winds to demand that he be freed. … Like other Muslim-American leaders who flew in from around the country to speak on Al-Arian's behalf, Nihad Awad said Al-Arian was the victim of a politically charged environment three years ago that resulted in the persecution of Muslims." Awad said, "Most of these cases are done for political reasons. ... I think the government is abusing the system," and "signs in the crowd included 'Liberty and Justice For All,' 'Free Al-Arian,' 'All Religions Believe in Justice,' and 'The Patriot Act is Watching You.'"

Spy Satellite Chief To Resign After Dispute With Rumsfeld. Reuters (1/7) reports National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency director James Clapper "will leave his post in June, officials said on Friday." He will resign "three months short of his fifth anniversary as head of the defense department operation, officials said." According to the Baltimore Sun, he "was being forced out after angering Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld on an issue involving intelligence reform." Reuters notes, "The Sun quoted an unnamed former official as saying that Clapper earned Rumsfeld's ire in 2004 by telling Congress his agency would not be ill-served by the creation of a director of national intelligence, or DNI, a post created by post-September 11 reforms that was initially opposed by Pentagon officials."

DOJ IG Inquiry Finds No Misconduct In FBI Probe Of Suspected Terrorist. The New York Times (1/7, Stout, 1.19M) reports, "Overconfidence in its own fingerprint-identification technology and sloppy paperwork contributed to the F.B.I.'s wrongly implicating a Portland, Ore., lawyer in the deadly 2004 Madrid train bombing, a Justice Department investigation said Friday." Yet the DOJ IG's investigation "said there had been no misconduct by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and no abuse of the antiterrorism USA Patriot Act in the case of the lawyer, Brandon Mayfield." While "Mayfield's Islamic faith was not a factor in the initial stages of the bombing investigation, when F.B.I. technicians erroneously concluded that a print found on a plastic bag near the Madrid attack scene matched one of Mr. Mayfield's, it may have slowed his ultimate exoneration, the Justice Department inquiry found." The FBI "said Friday that it was pleased that the inspector general had found no official wrongdoing and no violation of the antiterrorism law."

The Washington Post (1/7, A6, Eggen, 744K) reports, "One of Mayfield's attorneys, Gerry Spence, said in a news release yesterday that Fine's report shows 'the FBI acted with gross negligence' in targeting and arresting his client, and misled the federal courts in doing so." And "Mayfield was quoted in the statement as saying that the report confirms he was 'the victim of religious profiling.'" But the "FBI disagreed, emphasizing that Fine had concluded that Mayfield's Muslim faith was not a factor in the initial identification of him by fingerprint examiners. The bureau said Mayfield's arrest 'was based on an extremely unusual confluence of events,' primarily the remarkable similarity between his fingerprints from military service and the latent print found in Spain, which was eventually matched to an Algerian national, Ouhnane Daoud." The Washington Times (1/7, Seper, 90K), the Los Angeles Times (1/7, Tizon, 958K) and the AP (1/7, Sherman) also reports on the DOJ IG's report.

The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Zajac) reports that the IG's findings "likely will fuel the debate about adding civil liberties protections to the Patriot Act, portions of which are set to expire Feb. 3. … Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and a supporter of the the law, said in a statement the report 'should finally end the baseless accusation lodged by Patriot Act opponents that federal law-enforcement officials used this anti-terrorism law to violate the civil liberties of Brandon Mayfield.' … But Reps. John Conyers of Michigan and Robert Scott of Virginia, two top Democrats on the judiciary panel, wrote Sensenbrenner to urge congressional hearings on the report."

The Oregonian (1/7, Saker, Goldsmith) reports, "In a statement Friday, the FBI pointed out that after the Mayfield case, the bureau invited an independent board of experts to propose changes in how the FBI examines fingerprints, which the FBI has undertaken. … In addition, the inspector general's report 'found no evidence of misconduct on the part of any FBI employees involved in this investigation,' the statement said."" The Oregonian adds, "The FBI did not use the Patriot Act to obtain the court warrants to spy on and search Mayfield without his knowledge. But the law did allow the FBI to share intelligence from the wiretaps and searches with law enforcers, which 'amplified the consequences of the FBI's fingerprint misidentification.' … The U.S. attorney's office in Portland wrote affidavits containing inaccurate and ambiguous information that led a federal judge to believe that Spanish police had agreed with the FBI's fingerprint identification of Mayfield when they had only agreed to conduct another examination."

California Father And Son To Be Tried On Terrorism Charges In February. The Los Angeles Times/AP (1/7) reports, "A father and son from Lodi will be tried on terrorism-related charges beginning Feb. 14. A federal judge set the date Friday over the objection of prosecutors. Assistant U.S. Atty. S. Robert Tice-Raskin argued that more time was needed because some evidence against the pair was obtained using methods so secret that they can't be disclosed in open court or to anyone without a security clearance. Umer Hayat, 47, was arrested in June and charged with lying to the FBI by denying that his son attended an Al Qaeda training camp in Pakistan during 2003 and 2004. His son, 23-year-old Hamid Hayat, was arrested the same day and faces charges of supporting terrorism and lying to investigators."

Padilla To Plead Not Guilty To Federal Charges. The Miami Herald (1/7, Weaver) reports, "Former 'enemy combatant' Jose Padilla next week will plead not guilty to charges he joined terrorists in an Islamic holy war abroad, his attorney said Friday outside the Miami federal courthouse. … But the criminal charges outlined in an indictment against Padilla are completely unrelated to the 'dirty bomber' accusation that landed the former Broward resident in U.S. military detention for about four years. … 'This case started in an unusual way, but I'm happy today it's in a criminal court proceeding,' said New York lawyer Andrew Patel, who is representing Padilla with the Federal Public Defender's Office in Miami. 'Mr. Padilla is being treated like any other American citizen in the criminal justice system.'" The Herald continues, "Padilla's status as an enemy combatant changed on Thursday with his transfer from a South Carolina naval brig to the Miami Federal Detention Center. The move was made immediately following this week's U.S. Supreme Court decision that allowed Padilla's transfer into the criminal justice system. The decision represented a victory for the Bush administration. … Padilla, 35, will have both an arraignment and bond hearing Thursday. He is charged with being a recruit for a North American terrorist cell with South Florida links that allegedly aided an Islamic jihad abroad. The trial is in September. If convicted, he faces a life sentence."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/7, Blum) reports, "One day after his release from a 3 1/2 year military detention, alleged al-Qaida operative José Padilla appeared for a second time in Miami federal court on charges that he was part of a South Florida-based terror cell. … The former Broward County resident seemed animated during the brief hearing, at one point turning to wave to his mother and two other family members sitting in the front row of the packed courtroom." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "At the start of the hearing, federal Magistrate Judge Barry Gelber informed Padilla, 35, of the accusations against him, including a charge that he was part of a conspiracy to 'murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country.' Then, following a request from Padilla's attorneys, Gelber postponed a formal arraignment until Jan. 12. … Prosecutor Stephanie Pell stated that the government intends to oppose bail, leading Gelber to say, 'Why am I not surprised?' The Sun-Sentinel notes, "The Bush administration has made it clear that it considers Padilla one of the most dangerous men in America. In 2002, federal agents arrested Padilla at O'Hare International Airport. At that time the White House designated him an 'enemy combatant' and claimed that the former Chicago gang member had plotted to detonate a radioactive bomb on U.S. soil. Government lawyers argued that Padilla was a captured fighter, not a criminal defendant, and could be held without charges."

Padilla's Plea Hearing Rescheduled For Thursday. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Dahlburg, 958K) reports, "Terrorism suspect Jose Padilla, held 3 1/2 years by the government without charges, was supposed to get his chance Friday to answer the felony counts brought against him as an alleged backer of Islamic war overseas. But the judge postponed the procedure until next week. U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry L. Garber rescheduled for Thursday Padilla's plea and the hearing to determine whether he should be freed on bond. The delay is to give newly appointed lawyers from the federal public defender's office in Miami time to confer with a New York City attorney who had already been representing Padilla. Andrew G. Patel, the New York lawyer, told reporters that Padilla, 35, an alleged Al Qaeda operative, would plead not guilty to charges that he and four co-defendants plotted to support Islamic jihad abroad."

UK Dramatically Expanding Automatic License Plate Recognition System. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Jordan) reports UK "law enforcement agencies are drastically increasing the number of cameras that read license plates and are building a national database that designers say will make it possible to determine in seconds whether a car zooming by has insurance, was stolen or was seen near a crime scene. The plate recognition system will rely on thousands of cameras on stationary poles and in mobile police vans, which will patrol highways and back roads. … Some human rights groups are fighting the new project, calling it a dangerous step toward a Big Brother society." The Post notes Automatic Number Plate Recognition system national coordinator John Dean "said FBI officials asked him about the ANPR system on Tuesday, and officials from Australia, Canada and many European countries have also inquired about it."

PATRIOT ACT:

Cheney Calls For Patriot Act Reauthorization In Speech On Military Base. The Lawrence Journal-World (1/7, Taylor) reports that Vice President Dick Cheney's visited Fort Leavenworth, "awarding the Combat Action Badges and presiding over a re-enlistment ceremony for five other soldiers." Cheney also "delivered a 20-minute speech in which he called for renewal of the Patriot Act, praised the assembled soldiers for their efforts and sacrifices, and told the audience of about 1,400 people that the United States would win the war on terror."

The Wichita Eagle (1/7, Cannon, Bormann, 98K) adds that Cheney was a "confident optimist" who "touted robust economic numbers," the government's "varied approaches to fighting terrorism," and "defended the recently revealed practice of eavesdropping without court warrants."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Vows To Strengthen Border Security. The Washington Times (1/7, Seper, 90K) reports Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "says he will crack down on alien smugglers at two border crossings near San Diego by sending more prosecutors to the area and providing increased jail space for those arrested. Mr. Chertoff's comments came during speaking engagements at the San Ysidro and Otay Mesa, Calif., ports of entry, in the same area where a Mexican national -- identified by law-enforcement authorities as a suspected alien smuggler -- was fatally shot Dec. 30 by a U.S. Border Patrol agent who the Mexican purportedly targeted in a rock-throwing attack." The Times notes, Chertoff "gave no cost estimates for the program and provided few details on how it would work, but he said it would begin in the San Diego area and later shift to other regions. It was unclear how many prosecutors would be added or how an increase in the number of cases they would handle would be financed with existing resources. He said the plan would include an increased law-enforcement presence on the border, renewed efforts at intelligence sharing with other law-enforcement agencies, increased technology and the use of dogs to locate people hidden in vehicles."

Local Law Enforcement's Cooperation Is Part Of New Plan. The AP (1/7, Spagat) reports Chertoff "has declared a crackdown on immigrant smugglers at two California border crossings from Tijuana, Mexico. … In a potentially controversial twist, Chertoff said Thursday state and local officials would participate in the crackdown. Proponents of tougher enforcement have long advocated a larger role for local law enforcement, but critics say local agencies should stick to fighting crime, not enforcing immigration laws."

DeLay Toured Border Region With Chertoff. The Dallas Morning News (1/7, McLemore) reports, "In an effort to take back the border from Mexican drug gangs…Chertoff rolled out the newest series of enforcement and security task forces here Friday. The latest effort in the Homeland Security Department's Secure Border Initiative will focus on investigations of cross-border crime by Mexican drug and human-trafficking organizations. It is modeled on U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Operation Blackjack, unveiled in Laredo last summer. And it includes an unprecedented level of interaction with Mexican agencies. In his first visit to the Laredo area, Mr. Chertoff took a tour of the rough terrain used by drug smugglers and illegal immigrants to enter the U.S. He was accompanied by U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, and other members of the Texas congressional delegation."

Katrina Recovery Chief Says Operation Was Successful, Given Constraints. Time (1/7) publishes an interview with Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen. Allen said, "I think we were successful given the resources we had" in dealing with Katrina's aftermath. He attributes his not becoming "a lightning rod for criticism" despite it being a "fairly loaded situation" to trying "to be transparent. And to make people aware of the constraints we were under." He adds that before our next disaster, "We need to create a clear command and control structure that runs from the federal government to the state."

New Orleans Delays Demolitions For Court Case. The New York Times (1/7, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that New Orleans "officials agreed in court on Friday not to demolish any storm-damaged houses until" a federal judge hears "arguments in a suit over whether the city can demolish houses without homeowners' permission." Demolition "emerged as the sharpest edge of an emotional debate over which neighborhoods should be rebuilt" and "is likely to remain an emotional flashpoint, pitting opponents, including housing advocates, politicians and some residents." The "sides cannot even agree on what constitutes a house," with advocates arguing that "piles of rubble" shouldn't be moved until "dispersed residents" get "the chance to search for their possessions."

The Washington Post (1/7, A2, 744K) adds, "The city reserved the right to clear away perhaps 100 smashed homes that were pushed by the floodwaters into the streets." Opponents worry "that the demolitions would destroy black neighborhoods, marking the beginning of what some see as an effort to push out the city's black population."

New Orleans Mayor, Council Agree On FEMA Trailer Placements. The Washington Post/AP (1/7, Deslatte) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and two city council members said Friday they have agreed on temporary housing sites for thousands of families that requested assistance after Hurricane Katrina. Gov. Kathleen Blanco brought in a mediator and representatives of the Federal Emergency Management Agency to meet with Nagin and the council members at the governor's home." FEMA's head "blamed the dispute" over placement "for holding up the placement of thousands of temporary homes."

WAR NEWS:

US Officials Seek To Create Split Between Iraqi Insurgents And Radical Terrorists. The New York Times (1/7, Filkins, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports, "American officials are talking with local Iraqi insurgent leaders to exploit a rift that has opened between homegrown insurgents and radical groups like Al Qaeda, and to draw the local leaders into the political process, according to a Western diplomat, an Iraqi political leader and an Iraqi insurgent leader." Battles "between Iraqi groups and Al Qaeda have broken out in several cities across the Sunni Triangle, including Taji, Yusefiya, Qaim and Ramadi, and they appear to have intensified in recent months, according to interviews with insurgents and with American and Iraqi officials."

US Commander Outlines Strategy For Bringing Stability To Iraq. The AP (1/7, Burns) reports, "Local Iraqi police forces will be re-established this year in cities and towns across restive Anbar province, where the insurgency had prevented it earlier, a senior American commander said Friday." In an interview Marine Maj. Gen. Stephen Johnson said it "will be part of a broad strategy for bringing greater stability to western Iraq, bolstering Iraqis' confidence in their new government and undermining the insurgency." The AP adds, "If successful, the addition of local police also would lessen the security burden on U.S. troops, who are training Iraqi security forces across the country so U.S. forces can begin to leave this year."

Eleven US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 4, :10, Vargas) reported, "In Iraq, the military said six more U.S. Troops have been killed, bringing to 11 the number killed in the wave of violence that swept the country yesterday. In Baghdad, thousands of Shiites turned out for demonstrations protesting suicide attacks that killed more than 100 Iraqis yesterday."

The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 4, :30, Schieffer) reported, "In Iraq today the military said that six more American soldiers and Marines were killed yesterday, most by suicide bombers or roadside bombs. That is in addition to a previous report of five soldiers killed yesterday. It means a total of 11, one of the worst days in the war for the U.S. forces."

The New York Times (1/7, Oppel, 1.19M) and stories from other sources report, "Thursday was the deadliest day in Iraq in months, as suicide bombers in Karbala and Ramadi killed at least 130 people. Among the 70 killed in Ramadi were two Americans -- a marine and a soldier. Shortly before the suicide blast in Karbala, a roadside bomb outside the city exploded and killed five American soldiers." And "the American military announced Friday that the previous day's toll also included two marines who had been killed in Falluja by small-arms fire and two soldiers who had been killed in Baghdad by a roadside bomb."

US Dismisses Concerns Violence Will Lead To Civil War. AFP (1/7) reports, "The United States played down a dramatic surge in violence in Iraq and said political progress would eventually defuse sectarian tensions. After one of Iraq's bloodiest day since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in 2003, a top US military officer said the violence would not trigger a civil war or disrupt political negotiations for a unity government." On CNN Gen. George Casey said the recent increase in attacks was "an anomaly." But experts have said the insurgency "remains as potent as ever and could get stronger."

Shiite Leaders Urge Restraint After Deadly Attacks. The Washington Times/Reuters (1/7, Jumaili) reports, "Iraqis buried their dead yesterday following a day of carnage that left some Shi'ite Muslims demanding revenge against the Sunni Arab militants they blame for a suicide bombing in their holy city of Karbala." But "Shi'ite religious and political leaders urged restraint, telling followers to place their faith in the next government, slowly emerging from the Dec. 15 election and set to be dominated by Shi'ite parties."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "Tensions remained high across Iraq on Friday as security was tightened around mosques on the Muslim day of worship amid fraying relations between Iraq's Shiites and Sunni Arabs." Yet "a measure of placidity returned to the streets, where at least 120 Iraqis were killed in suicide bombings Thursday, as clerics delivered sermons tinged with notes of defiance as well as calls for calm."

The Washington Post/AP (1/7, Quinn) reports, "The rallies and threats by the Iraq's largest Shiite religious party to react with force if the militant attacks continue have renewed fears that paramilitary militias -- now thought to make up part of some elite police units -- would take to the streets and carry out reprisals." But on CNN Robert Ford, the U.S. Embassy's political councilor, said "I don't think the Shiite leadership wants to slip into broader civil strife and neither does the Sunni Arab leadership." Ford maintained that the recent attacks "were a sign that the political process was drawing Sunni Arab groups into politics and away from insurgency -- which has angered radical militants."

Iraqi Leaders To Discuss Formation Of Inclusive Government. The Washington Times/Reuters (1/7, Jumaili) in an article on Iraqi reaction to the latest violence also notes, "After a series of recent bilateral meetings in Iraq's Kurdish-dominated north, political leaders have agreed to meet in Baghdad soon to push their plan for an inclusive government that includes all Iraq's sects and ethnic groups."

New Zawahiri Tape Claims Bush Admits Defeat In Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 3, :10, Vargas) reported, "Osama bin Laden's right-hand man Ayman al Zawahiri ridiculed the U.S. in a videotape that surfaced today. He says the decision to withdraw troops from Iraq this year a victory for the insurgency and for Muslims around the world."

The Washington Post (1/7, A12, Hernandez, 744K) reports on the video Zawahiri "said President Bush had admitted defeat in Iraq by announcing plans to reduce the American troop presence in the country, saying the move would be a victory for Islam." He "warned Americans that 'as long as you do not deal with Muslim nations with understanding and respect, you will still go from one disaster to another. And your calamity will not end, unless you leave our lands and stop stealing our resources and stop supporting the bad rulers in our countries.'"

Bremer Says US Unprepared For Insurgency. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/7, A4) reports that in an interview for "Dateline NBC" which will air Sunday night "L. Paul Bremer, who led the civilian occupation authority in Iraq after the 2003 invasion, told NBC-TV that the United States did not anticipate the insurgency in the country, the network said yesterday." In the interview he recount "the decision to disband the Iraqi army quickly after the U.S. arrival in Baghdad, a move many experts consider a major miscalculation. When asked who was to blame for the deaths of thousands of Iraqis and Americans after the official end of combat, he said, 'We really didn't see the insurgency coming,' NBC said in a news release." He "said he raised his concerns about the numbers and quality of forces with President Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and senior military officials" and "that he did everything he could do in Iraq and that 'the president, in the end, is responsible for making decisions,' according to the network."

Study Reveals More Body Armor Would Have Prevented Many US Casualties. The New York Times (1/7, Moss, 1.19M) reports, "A secret Pentagon study has found that as many as 80 percent of the marines who have been killed in Iraq from wounds to the upper body could have survived if they had had extra body armor. Such armor has been available since 2003, but until recently the Pentagon has largely declined to supply it to troops despite calls from the field for additional protection, according to military officials." It "shows the cost in lives from inadequate armor, even as the Pentagon continues to publicly defend its protection of the troops."

The Washington Post (1/7, A5, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The medical examiner study analyzed a random sample of 93 Marine deaths from torso wounds and found that 60 percent of the fatalities were caused by gunshots. 'As many as 42 percent of the Marine casualties who died from isolated torso injuries could have been prevented with improved protection in the areas surrounding the plated areas of the vest. Nearly 23 percent might have benefited from protection along the mid-axillary line of the lateral chest. Another 15 percent died from impacts through the unprotected shoulder and upper arm.'"

The AP (1/7, Burns) adds, "The findings underscore the difficulty facing the Army and Marine Corps in providing the optimum level of body armor protection in a war against an insurgency whose tactics are constantly changing."

1970's known as Koreagate, was arrested yesterday in Houston on charges that he worked illegally to secure favorable treatment for Iraq under the United Nations oil-for-food program, federal authorities said." US attorney Michael Garcia "announced that Mr. Park was arrested in Houston by F.B.I. agents, but provided no information about how he was found. Mr. Park's whereabouts had been unknown since he was first indicted on April 14, 2005, for his role in the program."

Murtha Accuses Military Of Blaming Recruiting Woes On Him. The AP (1/7, Hefling) reports, "Rep. John Murtha says the military is blaming him for a recruitment slump instead of recognizing mistakes that have led to an enlistment shortage." Murtha said, "They're trying to direct attention away from their problems."

Civilian Killed By IED In Afghanistan. The Washington Post/AP (1/7) reports, "A roadside bomb blew up Saturday as a van packed with police cadets and trainers was driving through an eastern Afghan city, killing a passer-by and wounding a police colonel and driver, officials said." Officials "initially thought the blast may have been the work of a suicide attacker but later concluded it was a roadside bomb, said Abdul Jabar, a senior police officer in Jalalabad city where the attacks occurred." The AP adds, "The two wounded were rushed to a hospital in Jalalabad and were in stable condition. The other 18 people in the van were unhurt, Jabar said."

Dowd Criticizes Bush For Brevity Of Meeting With Former Foreign Policy Leaders. Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) writes, "It may seem disturbing at first, that with several hundreds of years' worth of foreign policy at his elbows, and a bloody, thorny mess in Iraq, Mr. Bush would devote mere moments to letting some fresh air into his House of Pain." Bush "just spent six straight days mountain-biking and brush clearing in Crawford. He couldn't devote 60 minutes to getting our kids home rather than just a few for a 'Message: I Care' photo-op faking sincerity?"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Wal-Mart Official To Plead Guilty To Defrauding Company. The New York Times (1/7, Barbaro) reports, "The former vice chairman of Wal-Mart Stores, Thomas M. Coughlin, has agreed to plead guilty to federal charges that he defrauded the company of at least $350,000, people close to the negotiations said yesterday." The Times continues, "Mr. Coughlin, once the retailer's No. 2 executive, was ousted last year amid accusations that he used fake invoices and misappropriated gift cards to pay for items like contact lenses and a custom-made dog kennel. … He has agreed to plead guilty to five counts of wire fraud and one count of tax evasion, people close to the inquiry said, and is scheduled to enter the pleas this month in federal court in Fort Smith, Ark." The Times adds, "Defense lawyers and prosecutors expect Mr. Coughlin to be sentenced to slightly more than two years in prison, said people close to the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation into the matter is still open. The court is also expected to order Mr. Coughlin to make restitution to Wal-Mart for benefits he received and money he misappropriated. … The guilty plea casts considerable doubt on Mr. Coughlin's assertion that he used company money to reimburse himself for a secret campaign, approved by senior executives, to pay union members for information about their organization drives, a potential violation of federal law. … Mr. Coughlin is still expected to advance that argument before a judge during sentencing. A person close to the matter said that the plea agreement explicitly mentions a plan to use Wal-Mart's money to buy information that would disrupt efforts to unionize Wal-Mart Stores."

The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Bandler) reports, "The deal, if it holds, will bring down the curtain on a bizarre chapter in Wal-Mart's history. Mr. Coughlin, a Wal-Mart legend who was a protégé and former hunting buddy of founder Sam Walton, left the company early last year amid accusations that he misappropriated as much as $500,000 from Wal-Mart through fraudulent reimbursements and improper use of gift cards." The Journal adds, "Although Mr. Coughlin took home millions of dollars in compensation, documents reviewed by The Wall Street Journal suggest that he secretly had the retailer pay for a range of his personal expenses, including hunting vacations, a $2,590 dog enclosure at his home and a $1,359 pair of handmade alligator boots." The Journal adds, "The most explosive aspect of the drama may remain unresolved. Mr. Coughlin is expected to claim that, in part, he was reimbursing himself for a secret scheme to fund an antiunion spy operation. … But federal prosecutors for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Arkansas have found no evidence that Mr. Coughlin was part of any clandestine intelligence operation directed at unions, according to someone familiar with the investigation. Wal-Mart has said it has also investigated the matter and found Mr. Coughlin's claims to be untrue."

The Washington Post (1/7, D1, Joyce, Johnson) reports, "Coughlin, who was the No. 2 executive at the company until January 2005, was ousted from the board last March over allegations of financial improprieties estimated to have cost up to $500,000. A six-week investigation prompted the company to fire three other employees. Jared Bowen, a former vice president who was fired, is suing the company, claiming he was fired illegally in retaliation for blowing the whistle on Coughlin. The company responded that Bowen participated in the same acts he challenged. … Wal-Mart's investigation focused on the alleged unauthorized use of corporate gift cards and suspect expense reports. The company said it reported the matter to the U.S. attorney for the Western District of Arkansas based on the findings of the investigation."

Five Indicted Over San Diego Pension System Scheme. The New York Times (1/7, Broder) reports, "San Diego's legal and financial troubles deepened on Friday as a federal grand jury handed up fraud and conspiracy indictments against five current and former officials of the city's pension system." The Times continues, "The charges centered on a 2002 decision by the 13-member San Diego City Employees' Retirement System to enact a plan to increase significantly the pension benefits of city employees, including all the defendants, while failing to provide sufficient money to keep the pension fund solvent." The Times adds, "Federal prosecutors said the five defendants had conspired to hide the details of the proposal from other members of the pension board as part of a scheme to enrich themselves and cover up the financial danger to the pension system posed by the plan. … The decision helped to push the city to the brink of bankruptcy and led to the resignation of Mayor Dick Murphy last spring. The San Diego retirement system now has a deficit of at least $1.4 billion, and the city is unable to borrow in the capital markets. … The local United States attorney, Carol Lam, said the five pension fund officials had violated their obligations to city retirees and the taxpaying public. … 'The defendants had a duty to act in the best interest of the city retirement system,' Ms. Lam said in a statement accompanying release of the indictments. 'They breached that duty by engaging in self-dealing, ignoring conflicts of interest and exploiting their positions to the detriment of the retirement system.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Perry) reports, "Former pension board members Ronald Saathoff, Cathy Lexin and Teresa Webster — along with former board administrator Lawrence Grissom and the panel's current attorney, Loraine Chapin — were named in a 20-count indictment charging them with wire fraud, mail fraud and conspiracy. … The five are accused of using their positions to approve pension boosts for themselves and others while saddling the system with a 'dangerous practice' that depended on a bull market on Wall Street to keep the pension plan solvent. When the technology bubble burst, the pension system's deficit ballooned." The Times adds, "According to the indictment, Saathoff, longtime president of the local firefighters union, received a pension boost of $25,000 a year in exchange for voting to endorse a plan whereby the City Council would continue to rely on the investment plan rather than increasing payments from the city budget. … Increasing payments to the pension fund would have meant cutting services to residents, a politically risky move. When the stock market declined, the council faced the prospect of making a $100-million 'balloon payment' to keep the system funded at the level the council thought prudent, the indictment said."

Causey Not Yet On Enron Prosecutors' Trial Witness List. The Washington Post (1/7, D3, Johnson) reports, "Prosecutors in the fraud trial against former Enron Corp. leaders have not yet decided whether to call the Houston company's former accounting chief as a witness, according to court papers filed late yesterday." The Post continues, "Richard A. Causey pleaded guilty to a single count of securities fraud last week. Representatives from the Justice Department's Enron Task Force said at the time that they were continuing to debrief him as a possible witness against former chief executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, with whom he had been scheduled to be tried." The Post adds, "Under the terms of his plea deal, Causey could shave as much as two years off a seven-year prison sentence if prosecutors determine he cooperated with their investigation. … Causey's name did not appear on a list of 61 witnesses submitted yesterday by government lawyers. But prosecutors 'reserve the right' to add others to the lineup before the Jan. 30 trial, they wrote. … In all, prosecutors cut 17 witnesses from an earlier list, an acknowledgement that Causey's plea allows them to sidestep weeks of complicated accounting testimony that might confound a jury."

2nd Circuit Rejects Martha Stewart's Appeal. The New York Times (1/7, Barbaro) reports, "As Martha Stewart served time at the red-brick federal prison in West Virginia, as she lived under court-ordered confinement on her farm in New York and even when she began politely firing aspiring employees on 'The Apprentice,' she quietly pursued an appeal of her conviction, hoping to prove her oft-proclaimed innocence. … But it was not to be - at least not this time." The Times continues, "A federal appeals court yesterday upheld the conviction of Ms. Stewart, the founder of Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia, and her former stockbroker, Peter E. Bacanovic, for lying about a lucrative stock sale. … The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in Manhattan, rejected arguments, put forth by lawyers for both defendants, that their trial was tainted by prosecutorial misconduct, juror misconduct, extraneous influence on the jury and erroneous jury instructions." The times adds, "In one sense, neither Ms. Stewart nor Mr. Bacanovic had much riding on the outcome of the decision; both have already served their prison sentences. … But the appeal was a last-ditch effort - and by most accounts, this will be their last - to clear their names."

SEC May Delay New Trading Rules. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Lucchetti) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, prompted by Wall Street firms, is considering whether to delay new trading rules scheduled to go into effect this summer that, among other things, will require that investors' trades be completed at the best price that can be executed immediately." The Journal continues, "The SEC is weighing whether to give the firms another one or two months to prepare for the challenge of getting all their trading systems ready, according to people familiar with the regulator's talks with Wall Street firms about the matter. An SEC spokesman said 'the commission hasn't taken any action with regard to delaying the implementation dates' but declined to comment on whether the SEC was considering a delay. In addition to eliminating the 'best price' protection from orders handled manually on exchanges such as the New York Stock Exchange, the new regulation will alter the way dealers and exchanges interact. … Under the so-called trade-through rule, trading desks and exchanges will have to distinguish all their orders between those that are being handled manually on the floor and those that will be handled electronically. Manual trades won't necessarily get the best price currently available under the new rules. The other major change entails preparing for so-called sweep orders, which will quickly be sent across markets to get good prices when various exchanges have shares to buy or sell at a price that benefits investors."

Sarbanes-Oxley Said To Have Increased Class Action Suits. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "Should Congress ever take a break from congratulating itself on passing Sarbanes-Oxley, it might take a look at a new study released this week about the number of companies sued in securities class actions last year. The Members might then want to think about moving their money into bonds. At first glance, the study from Stanford University and Cornerstone Research seems to be good news, noting that the number of class-action suits filed in 2005 dropped to 176 from 213 in 2004 -- a 17% decrease. … So what then accounts for those 176 suits? Try . . . Sarbanes-Oxley. It appears the tort bar is now using the law's strict financial-reporting requirements as its latest excuse to sue. A whopping 89% of the suits alleged misrepresentations in financial documents, while 82% claimed false forward-looking statements. Lawyers have certainly used financial documents as a reason to sue in the past, but this year's notable uptick in the number of suits filed that cite this cause of action suggests that the tort bar has found a whole new line of business."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cunningham Said To Have Worn A Wire. Time (1/7, Burger) reports that sources say ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham "wore a wire to help investigators gather evidence against others just before copping his own plea" to taking bribes. It is unknown who he met with while wearing the wire and it "is the source of furious -- and nervous -- speculation by congressional Republicans." K. Lee Blalack, a Cunningham lawyer, "refused to confirm or deny the story," and "an FBI spokesman declined comment."

Politicians React To Abramoff Scandal By Proposing Lobbying Reform. Knight Ridder (1/7, Thomma) reports, "Politicians fearing fallout from Abramoff's criminal excesses now insist that they have to make the rules tougher." Although "Abramoff violated all the rules, many members of Congress say the solution to the scandal is to toughen them."

The AP (1/7, Abrams) adds, "Bills dealing with lobbying ethics that have been dormant for months are getting a new look as lawmakers digest the consequences of Abramoff pleading guilty to corruption and tax evasion charges, and his agreement to cooperate in an influence-peddling investigation that could taint dozens of members of Congress." House Republican leadership aides "said there was a good chance that lobbying legislation will get a vote this year."

Tribe Wants Politicians To Return Abramoff Contributions, Not Donate It. The AP (1/7, Gamboa) reports, "The Tigua tribe of El Paso wants campaign contributions it gave while employing disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff returned to the tribe, not given to charity. Arturo Senclair, governor of the tribe officially known as the Ysleta Del Sur Pueblo, said Friday that the tribe isn't demanding its donations back but that anyone returning money should check with the Tiguas first." Senclair says "the tribe needs that money," citing decreased federal funds and rising unemployment.

Feingold Returning Possibly Abramoff Associated Donations. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (1/7, Schultze, 266K) reports, "The campaign of Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) announced Friday it had returned four donations totaling $1,600 that Feingold had received from associates of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in 2002-'04" in order to "avoid even the appearance of a conflict," although the senator is "unaware of any connection between Abramoff and the donations to Feingold."

Charities Benefit From Divesting Of Abramoff Tainted Funds. The Washington Post (1/7, B3, Salmon, 744K) reports, "Charities in the Washington area and across the country are reaping the benefits of the Jack Abramoff case as legislators distancing themselves from the convicted lobbyist dump campaign contributions linked to him and donate the money to worthy causes." The charities argue there is "nothing wrong with accepting the money, despite its origins."

Tribes See Repeat Of Exploitation In Abramoff Misdeeds. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "Led on by what they say were his false promises of political access, leaders of the Coushatta Tribe of Louisiana, which is based here, paid Abramoff and his partners about $32 million for lobbying and other services," but, "by their accounting, they got very little in return. It was thievery, tribal members said, that echoes the historic losses of Native Americans to European settlers." Even more "rankling to many Coushattas" than the monetary loss "is the knowledge that Abramoff had, in released e-mails, referred to some of his Native American clients as 'monkeys,' 'troglodytes' and 'morons.'"

FBI Arrests "Koreagate" Lobbyist On Oil-For-Food Charges. The New York Times (1/7, Preston) reports, "Tongsun Park, a lobbyist from South Korea who was a central figure in the Congressional bribery scandal in the 1970's known as Koreagate, was arrested yesterday in Houston on charges that he worked illegally to secure favorable treatment for Iraq under the United Nations oil-for-food program, federal authorities said." US Attorney Michael Garcia "announced that Mr. Park was arrested in Houston by F.B.I. agents, but provided no information about how he was found." The Times notes that a new indictment unsealed Friday alleges, "Park began working with an Iraqi-American businessman, Samir Vincent, as early as 1992 to represent the interests of Saddam Hussein's government in negotiations at the United Nations to set up the program. … The complaint says that Mr. Park was paid at least $2 million, most of it in cash, by the Iraqi government. Much of the cash was delivered to Mr. Park in New York in Iraqi diplomatic pouches, the complaint says."

Reuters (1/7, Trotta) reports Park "was arrested…on accusations of acting as an unregistered agent of Saddam Hussein's former government among others charges," as well as "conspiring to commit wire fraud and to launder criminal proceeds. 'Park actively lobbied U.N. officials to establish the program, while extracting millions of dollars from profiteering Iraqi officials,' the FBI chief in New York, Mark Mershon, said in the statement. Mershon called the oil-for-food program 'a cash cow masquerading as humanitarian aid.' The U.S. authorities say Park met in 1993 with the high-ranking U.N. official at his Manhattan apartment to set the terms of the program. That meeting included an unnamed collaborator who is now cooperating with the investigation."

The Houston Chronicle (1/7, Ivanovich, Fowler) reports, "Park was arrested in Houston around noon, New York FBI spokeswoman Christine Monaco said. Bush Intercontinental Airport was Park's entry point into the United States. But Monaco could not say where Park was coming from or where he was headed. Park was brought to the Federal Detention Center in downtown Houston, where he will stay until an appearance Monday before a U.S. magistrate judge." The Chronicle adds that Mershon "said Park was 'instrumental in the corruption of the U.N. Oil-for-Food Program, which ultimately proved to be a cash cow masquerading as a humanitarian aid program.'" BBC News (1/6) also notes Mershon "said Mr Park 'actively lobbied' UN officials to set up the oil-for-food scheme, while ensuring he was handsomely rewarded for doing so by Iraqi officials. … The programme was 'a cash cow masquerading as humanitarian aid', said Mr Mershon."

The AP (1/7) and The (UK) Daily Telegraph (1/7, Sherwell) also report Park's arrest, as does The Washington Post (1/7, A18) in "Nation in Brief."

Former Chicago Forestry Official Expected To Plead Guilty In Hired Truck Probe. The Chicago Tribune (1/7) reports, "A former supervisor in the city's Department of Streets and Sanitation is expected to plead guilty in federal court to obstructing justice for directing an underling to lie to federal agents, his lawyer said Friday. Attorney Barry Pechter declined to say, however, if Bruno Bertucci, formerly with the Bureau of Forestry, has been cooperating with federal authorities. In September Bertucci was accused in a criminal complaint of sharing in a $5,000 bribe for arranging for the removal of two healthy trees in the way of a construction project in Lincoln Park in 2004. … The charges were an offshoot of the ongoing probe of the city's scandal-ridden Hired Truck Program." The Tribune notes, "A member of the crew sent to remove the trees later cooperated with the FBI and secretly tape-recorded a meeting in which Bertucci told him to lie to federal agents, according to the charges."

SCOTUS To Hear Search Case. The New York Times (1/7, Greenhouse) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed on Friday to try to define, more precisely than in the past, the emergencies that can justify a warrantless police entry into a private home." The Times continues, "The case is an appeal filed by the State of Utah from a Utah Supreme Court decision early last year that four Brigham City police officers violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure by entering a home to break up a fight.:" The Times adds, "The police, who went to the home in response to a neighbor's complaint about a loud party, did not have a warrant and did not announce their presence before walking through an open back door. They arrested three occupants for disorderly conduct, intoxication and contributing to the delinquency of a minor by allowing a teenager to drink. … The Utah trial court, appeals court and Supreme Court all ruled that the evidence of alcohol consumption could not be introduced at trial because of the illegal police entry."

The AP (1/7) reports, "States supporting Utah in the case are Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Delaware, Hawaii, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Vermont and Washington."

Maryland Governor's Plan Would Toughen Sex-Offender Laws. The Washington Post (1/7, B2, Mosk) reports, "Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. has produced a plan to combat sexual predators that would dramatically increase the number of convicted sex offenders who must submit to lifetime electronic monitoring." The Post continues, "Ehrlich presented the package of initiatives yesterday, saying he will institute some of them on his own and bring several others to legislators when they convene Wednesday for the start of the General Assembly session." The Post adds, "The Republican governor laid out his plans at Glendale Elementary School in Anne Arundel County, a school that was recently in the news when a quick-thinking secretary used the state's online registry to identify a man lurking on school property. She quickly alerted authorities, and he was arrested. … Among Ehrlich's proposals will be one that makes it illegal for a convicted child sex offender to enter school grounds without permission, or live within 1,000 feet of a school or day-care facility. … The governor's plan adds to a mix of get-tough proposals, including several from Democrats, that are headed for the legislature. All of them have drawn the attention of the American Civil Liberties Union, which plans to review them for constitutional concerns. … Ehrlich acknowledged yesterday that he expects resistance from civil libertarians but compared the trade-off to the one made when Congress passed the Patriot Act."

Mob Informant's Widow Sues Over Alleged FBI Agents' Complicity In Murder. The AP (1/8, Hays) reports, "No one disputes that Nicholas Grancio died in a gangland-style shooting. But a lawsuit filed by Grancio's wife, Maria, and an investigation by state prosecutors have renewed questions about whether the gangster who ordered his killing in broad daylight more than a decade ago had an unlikely ally: an FBI agent. The lawsuit, filed Friday, alleges that R. Lindley DeVecchio called off a surveillance team that was tailing Grancio in 1992 at the request of his trusted Mafia informant. … The case 'is about the corrupt and unlawful relationship between law enforcement and a ruthless killer and career criminal that went unchecked for years and led to the cold-blooded murder of a man,' court documents say." The AP adds, "Named as defendants are DeVecchio and a current FBI agent, Christopher Favo. The lawsuit, which seeks unspecified damages, alleges that Favo, at DeVecchio's direction, ordered the surveillance team to retreat." The Washington Post (1/8, A10) runs a truncated version of the AP story in "Nation in Brief."

New York Hit Man Claims FBI Agent Tied To Mob Slaying. The New York Daily News (1/7, Martinez, Sherman) reports, "Stone-cold mafia hit man Larry Mazza said he always knew his boss had a direct pipeline to law enforcement - he just didn't know it was an FBI agent." The News continues, "Mazza told the Daily News yesterday that he has agreed to tell a Brooklyn grand jury everything he knows about the relationship between his boss, Greg Scarpa, and FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio." The News adds, "Scarpa would have numerous conversations with an unnamed law enforcement snitch, whom Scarfa referred to as his 'girlfriend,' recalled Mazza, standing outside his Florida condo. … 'I didn't know who it was at the time,' said Mazza, now a personnel trainer and fitness buff. … 'We knew it was law enforcement and that's all we knew,' Mazza, 45, told The News. … 'The way it was done, we would pull over to phone booths. We used cell phones and two-way radios to be in contact with DeVecchio. It was a constant back and forth,' he said. … Those alleged conversations between Scarpa and DeVecchio are a focal point of the Brooklyn district attorney's probe into whether DeVecchio helped Scarpa murder rivals during the Colombo crime family's bloody civil war in the early 1990s."

Rowland Probe Reportedly Targets Anson. The AP (1/6) reports, "Federal prosecutors who sent former (Connecticut) Gov. John G. Rowland to prison are investigating whether a former public works commissioner lied under oath during the Rowland probe, The Associated Press has learned." The AP continues, "Investigators recently informed Tunxis Plantation, a Farmington country club, that they are preparing grand jury subpoenas for two of its employees, according to a person directly involved with the matter who spoke on the condition of anonymity because grand jury matters are secret by law." The AP adds, "Prosecutors plan to ask if former DPW Commissioner Theodore Anson golfed for free at Tunxis or received any other benefit from the company and compare those answers to Anson's grand jury testimony from the Rowland investigation, the source said. Beginning in 2003, Anson testified multiple times in the corruption investigation. … The Justice Department… declined comment but Assistant U.S. Attorney Nora Dannehy has said that investigators have not closed the book on corruption in the Rowland administration."

Warner Orders DNA Testing To Determine If Executed Man Was Innocent. Both CBS and NBC ran segments on Virginia governor Mark Warner's decision to do DNA testing to determine if an innocent man was executed in 1992. CBS included an interview with the governor. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 6, 3:00, Vargas) reported, "Virginia's governor Mark Warner has taken the extraordinary step of ordering DNA tests to determine if a man executed for murder was, in fact, innocent. Since 1993, 14 death row inmates have been cleared by sophisticated DNA testing. The Virginia case marks the first time the test could exonerate someone already put to death."

The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 7, 2:00, Stewart) reported, "It's been 13 years since the state of Virginia executed Roger Keith Coleman. It's now only a matter of days before they find out whether they killed the wrong man. New DNA testing could make Coleman, convicted of murdering his sister-in-law, the first man in the United States cleared by genetic testing after his execution. Outgoing governor Mark Warner ordered the tests as well as new tests on potentially thousands of other cases because he said, new science demands it." Gov. Mark Warner: "In my mind it was the only morally justifiable thing to do."

The Washington Post (1/7, A10, Glod, 744K) reports, "Forensic scientist Edward Blake kept vials of genetic evidence from the 1981 rape and murder of a young Virginia woman in a refrigerator at his California laboratory for more than 15 years. He even ignored a judge's order to send the samples back to Virginia because he feared they would be destroyed. … Ellen Qualls, a Warner spokeswoman, said yesterday that the samples Blake preserved are the only evidence known to remain in Coleman's case. Other evidence -- including blood-drenched clothing and other samples from the victim's body -- could not be located by Virginia State Police, Qualls said. Virginia law does not require evidence to be saved after an execution."

SCOTUS To Hear Death Row Inmate's Appeal Based On DNA Evidence. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Lane, 744K) reports, "It has been nearly two decades since the body of Carolyn Muncey was discovered under some brush. … Not long after her slaying, authorities charged Paul Gregory House, a paroled rapist from Utah who lived nearby, with her murder. In February 1986, a local jury convicted him and sentenced him to death. Long after the trial, DNA tests were performed on Muncey's clothes. They proved that body fluids on the clothes belonged not to House, as authorities believed and told the jury, but to the victim's husband, Hubert Muncey Jr. On Wednesday, the Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in House's case, the first in which a death row inmate has come to the high court with DNA evidence claiming innocence. The justices' intervention takes place at a time when DNA evidence may be changing the way Americans think about criminal justice, including the death penalty; last week Virginia Gov. Mark R. Warner (D) ordered DNA testing in the case of a man executed in 1992, to see whether he was wrongly put to death."

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS To Hear Several Important Business-Related Cases. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Anderson, 2.11M) reports, "The Supreme Court's business docket has mushroomed into a formidable set of cases with the potential for a big financial impact on corporations and the way companies handle legal disputes. The beefed-up docket has evolved since the Supreme Court began its 2005-06 term in October, when the justices had granted only a few business-related appeals. Since then, the high court has agreed to hear several high-profile cases that, depending on how the justices rule, could have a major impact on the business sector. … The biggest cases include appeals on the constitutionality of state and local business-incentive tax credits, standards for civil racketeering lawsuits against corporations, rights of health-insurance companies to sue to recover costs from third parties and standards for patent injunctions in technology-innovation disputes. Other important issues on the docket deal with securities lawsuits, arbitration, wetlands regulation, campaign-finance spending, bankruptcy and employer retaliation."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Florida Courts Ruling Against Vouchers Compared To Segregation. The New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) John Tierney writes, "Democrats once went to court to desegregate schools. But in Florida they've been fighting to kick black students out of integrated schools, and they've succeeded, thanks to the Democratic majority on the State Supreme Court. The court's decision on Thursday was a legally incoherent but politically creative solution to a delicate problem. Ever since Florida's pioneering statewide voucher program began, Democrats have been struggling to deal with the program's success.'

Attorney Decries Attorneys' Fees In Wal-Mart Bias Case. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/7, Eric S. Dreiband, an attorney at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld who served as general counsel of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission from 2003 to 2005, writes, "Sometimes 'rough justice' becomes injustice. Dukes v. Wal-Mart, the largest employment discrimination case in American history, is such a case. It threatens to deprive millions of women of the protections of the civil rights laws, and to deny due process both to victims of sex discrimination and to Wal-Mart. Congress should enact legislation that clarifies the standards that govern in civil rights class actions so that these injustices do not happen again. If Congress fails to act, class action cases like Dukes, will continue to enrich class action lawyers and to deny civil rights protections to millions of Americans." Dreiband continues, "The Dukes case was brought in a San Francisco federal court by six women on behalf of an estimated 1.5 to 1.7 million women who are former or current Wal-Mart employees. The plaintiffs allege that the corporation engages in a 'pattern or practice' of sex discrimination in pay and promotions against women who have worked in Wal-Mart stores since 1998. In 2004, U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins certified the case as a class action, based on the theory -- really, a complete fiction -- that these six individuals could speak for millions of women they do not know, have never met, and will never meet." Dreiband adds, "In the more than four years since the plaintiffs filed the case, one story after another has purported to describe how Wal-Mart engages in widespread sex discrimination against women. The plaintiffs, however, have not proven that Wal-Mart violated their civil rights or anyone else's, and probably never will, because federal courts are divided about the standards that govern employment discrimination class actions and the law is in disarray. Accordingly, the case will almost certainly be settled before a jury hears one word of testimony, as Wal-Mart seeks to avoid the uncertainty of continued litigation. … And then, of course, there is the issue of attorneys' fees. The lawyers who brought the case stand to make hundreds of millions of dollars, perhaps more, while each class member will receive a small amount. Consider, for example, a settlement of $2 billion. This is a staggering sum, but, given that Wal-Mart's exposure exceeds $500 billion, a $2 billion settlement would be less than one-half of 1% of the amount sought. Each class member would, on average, receive less than $1,200." Dreiband concludes, "The district court described this as 'rough justice,' proclaiming that it was 'better than the alternative of no remedy at all for any class member.' The better approach, however, is justice for actual victims of discrimination, not a system that requires an employer to throw trivial amounts of money at millions of individuals and hundreds of millions of dollars or more at a few lawyers. This kind of 'rough justice,' under which any real victim loses her right to bring her own case for real justice while the lawyers become wealthy and move on to their next class action, makes a mockery of the civil rights laws. Congress should put a stop to this."

Florida Governor Names Prosecutor For 1964 Racial Slaying Case. The St. Petersburg Times (1/7, Heller, Brink) reports, "The long legal road in the 1964 killing of Johnnie Mae Chappell took another turn on Friday when Gov. Jeb Bush assigned a special prosecutor to the case." The Times continues, "Bush's decision comes despite another finding from the Florida Department of Law Enforcement that it would not be viable to bring new charges. … Bush assigned William Cervone, the state attorney for the 8th Circuit, which includes Gainesville, for one year. Cervone can request more time if he needs it." The Times adds, "The move encouraged Chappell's youngest son, who has tried for years to persuade authorities to charge three men in the killing. … 'The family is gratified that there's going to be a fresh look at the case by a special prosecutor,' said Robert Spohrer, whose high-profile Jacksonville law firm is representing Shelton Chappell for free. 'We hope that another grand jury will be convened because the first grand jury in 1964 found four men indictable in this case, and we have the same evidence today.'" The Times notes, "Bush's decision perplexed Duval County State Attorney Harry Shorstein, who had jurisdiction over the case. It is rare for a governor to involuntarily remove a state attorney from a case. … 'In my judgment it is outrageous to relieve someone who has as strong a record of civil rights prosecution and trial advocacy ... as I have exhibited in my career,' Shorstein wrote in a statement. … Mrs. Chappell, a black woman, was shot and left to bleed to death as she walked home from work as a maid for a white family. The killing came during riots in Jacksonville in March 1964 as black protesters demonstrated at hotels and restaurants." … A grand jury indicted four suspects on first-degree murder charges, but only one went to trial. A jury convicted the confessed shooter, J.W. Rich, of manslaughter, and he spent three years in prison."

DOJ Approves Changes To Louisiana Election Laws. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/7, Anderson) reports, "Elections law changes passed in last year's two legislative sessions have won approval from the U.S. Justice Department, including a measure to allow 'early voting' and another that would punish voter registration drive organizers who do not turn over the names of the new voters to local registrars within 30 days." The Times-Picayune continues, "Under the federal Voting Rights Act, Louisiana and other Deep South states must get federal approval to any changes in election laws or voting procedures to ensure that the changes are not racially discriminatory. … Jennifer Marusak, a spokeswoman for Secretary of State Al Ater, said the Justice Department blessing means the new laws can now be put into effect. Most were added to the books Jan. 1, but could not be implemented until federal officials approved." The Times-Picayune adds, "The 'early voting law' by Rep. Wayne Waddell, R-Shreveport, essentially repeals the statute requiring voters casting an absentee ballot to attest that they would be unable to vote in person on election day. … Officials said that many voters made up excuses for the sake of convenience. The six-day absentee voting period remains, beginning 12 days before the election."

ANTITRUST:

Alabama Hospice Groups Hit With Antitrust Suit. The Birmingham News (1/7, Faulk) reports, "A civil lawsuit claiming two hospice groups violated Alabama antitrust laws has been filed by a company that was denied state approval to build a 50-bed center for dying patients in Carbon Hill." The News continues, "West Walker Hospice Inc. filed the lawsuit Tuesday in Walker County Circuit Court against New Beacon Hospice and the Alabama Hospice Organization, its members and its executive director, David Stone." The News adds, "The lawsuit claims New Beacon and the Alabama Hospice Organization conspired to fix the price or limit the number of hospice beds for the terminally ill in the state. It accused them of restraining trade, or attempting to, and monopolizing or trying to monopolize hospice beds. … New Beacon, a nonprofit organization, is a ministry of Baptist Health System and St. Vincent's Hospital. Baptist Walker Medical Center, a part of the Baptist system, originally opposed West Walker's proposed center but later withdrew its objections in an agreement with West Walker. … West Walker is not suing Baptist because of that earlier agreement, the lawsuit says. But the lawsuit claims Walker Baptist was a co-conspirator with New Beacon and the Alabama Hospice Organization in attempting to restrict trade."

Ohio AG Not Interested In Fighting Newspaper Merger. The Athens (OH) News (1/7, Phillips) reports, "The Ohio Attorney General's office apparently will not try to interfere with a merger between two national alternative newspaper chains, though some observers fear the joining of the chains could eventually have fallout for media in our state." The News continues, "The Athens NEWS, while not directly affected by the marriage of Village Voice Media and New Times Media, has joined other independent alternative newspapers in expressing opposition to the merger. The deal creates a chain with newspapers in 17 major urban markets around the country. … 'It's further erosion of the diversification of media,' said NEWS Publisher Bruce Mitchell. 'The more chains that are formed, the less independent editorial voices there are. We're against the consolidation of media in general, and this merger specifically.'" The News adds, "The NEWS also has become a small part of the story, through an e-mail the paper sent to the Ohio AG expressing the paper's opposition. … In a letter to NEWS Editor Terry Smith on Dec. 6, Alan C. Witten, an attorney with Ohio Attorney General Jim Petro, responded to Smith's e-mail opposing the merger. … Smith sent the e-mail in response to a campaign by the San Francisco Bay Guardian, an alternative newspaper that opposes the merger and is trying to whip up opposition to it among independent alternative newsweeklies. … In his letter, Witten, an anti-trust attorney, noted that in 2003, Petro's office sued Village Voice Media and New Times Media over a deal the two chains had worked out to give each other alternative newspaper monopolies in two cities, Cleveland and Los Angeles. … Each chain ran a weekly alternative newspaper in each city, which competed with the other chain's paper there. The way the deal worked, New Times agreed to shut down its Cleveland paper, the Free Times, in exchange for Village Voice's closing down its Los Angeles paper. This left each chain as the sole publisher of an alternative newspaper in each city. … The Ohio AG investigated the case with help from the California AG and the U.S. Department of Justice. The lawsuit in Cuyahoga County Common Pleas Court was settled by a consent decree."

Bush Administration Said To Have Relaxed Mining Regulations. Knight Ridder (1/7, Borenstein, Johnson, Mueller) reports, "Since the Bush administration took office in 2001, it has been more lenient toward mining companies facing serious safety violations, issuing fewer and smaller major fines and collecting less than half of the money that violators owed, a Knight Ridder Newspapers investigation has found. At one point last year, the Mine Safety and Health Administration fined a coal company a scant $440 for a 'significant and substantial' violation that ended in the death of a Kentucky man. The firm, International Coal Group Inc., is the same company that owns the Sago mine in West Virginia, where 12 workers died earlier this week. The $440 fine remains unpaid. Relaxed mine safety enforcement is widespread, according to a Knight Ridder analysis of federal records and interviews with former and current federal safety officials, even though deaths and injuries from mining accidents have hovered near record low levels in the past few years."

Investigators Continue To Analyze Mine Disaster. CBS and ABC both began their broadcasts with in-depth coverage of this week's mine disaster. ABC included an investigative report on the mine's safety violations and interviewed prominent financier Wilbur Ross, whose company International Coal Group, bought the Sago mine two months ago. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, lead story, 5:30, Vargas) reported, "Families have claimed their loved one's bodies and union officials have said the mine was not operating safely. Federal investigators are on the scene. They are examining allegations of safety problems and they're looking into why it took 90 minutes for anyone at the mine to call for help. There is also new evidence about what may have caused that initial explosion." ABC went on to report, "Since the deadly accident in the mine there have been many questions about the people who own the Sago mine and how they operated it. A company called the International Coal Group took over the Sago mine only two months ago. But it appears its billionaire chairman was well aware of the mine's extensive safety problems."

The CBS Evening News (1/6, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "As the families prepare to bury their dead investigators are honing in on just why this accident happened, and if, in fact, the miners could have been saved after the explosion that sent the poison gas spewing in the mine."

NBC Nightly News (1/6, story 2, Williams) reported. "The company says it notified state and federal authorities within 45 minutes. But they say they will look at that timeline and see if time would have made a difference."

The New York Times (1/7, A1, Dao, Barringer, 1.19M) reports, "As state and federal investigators began a sweeping investigation of the accident, they have begun grappling with some of the most perplexing questions to have been raised about mine safety in memory."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Probes Virginia Gun Thefts. The Charlottesville (VA) Daily Progress (1/6, McKenzie) reports, "The Albemarle County (VA) police and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms are investigating the Thursday morning theft of $7,000 worth of handguns from an Albemarle County store." The Daily Progress continues, "The joint probe began Thursday afternoon after police officers responded to a burglar alarm at Mountain River Outdoors on U.S. 29. … 'The officer responded at about 4:15 a.m. and discovered the side door had been forced in and an audible alarm,' said Lt. John Teixeira of the county police. 'There were 13 handguns taken of a variety of sizes, from .22-caliber to 9mm and .40-caliber weapons.'" The Daily Progress adds, "A county K-9 officer arrived with a police dog but officers could not find any suspects, Teixeira said. … ATF agents are joining the county in the investigation and are offering a $5,000 reward for information that leads to an arrest and conviction, Teixeira said."

Stricter Federal Gun Access Laws Urged. In an op-ed in the Boston Globe (1/7), John Rosenthal, cofounder of the groups Stop Handgun Violence, Common Sense About Kids and Guns, and the American Hunters and Shooters Association, writes, "Given the huge number of easily accessible and virtually unregulated guns in the United States, it is surprising there aren't more than 30,000 gun deaths and 100,000 gun injuries each year. Most US cities have experienced an increase in gun violence, and this deadly trend is likely to continue until we enact uniform national gun laws that address easy access to guns by criminals and confront race, poverty, and the lack of economic opportunity in our poorest neighborhoods." Rosenthal continues, "Although Massachusetts has enacted one of the most effective gun violence prevention laws and initiatives in the country, it is surrounded by states where it's easy to buy and sell guns. Moreover, the federal government has allowed easy access to guns and actually restricts law enforcement's ability to reduce the number of gun traffickers. Indeed, there are no federal minimum mandatory gun trafficking statutes, and the US Justice Department requires that the FBI destroy National Instant Check gun purchase records after 24 hours -- making it nearly impossible for police to track gun traffickers and illegal multiple gun sale patterns. This is largely due to the influence of the National Rifle Association and the gun lobby over Congress and the Bush administration. As a result, what few national gun laws that do exist are rendered useless. Sadly, law enforcement is unnecessarily at risk because criminals have easy access to more powerful weapons than police are issued." Rosenthal adds, "So what's the answer to gun trafficking and the increasing gun violence in urban centers? … The federal government must enact uniform gun laws similar to what has worked in Massachusetts. … The federal government must also create economic opportunities, job training, and mentoring programs and close the 'equity' gap for the poor urban neighborhoods where virtually all the gun violence and gang activity take place. … These solutions require the political will and courage to stand up to the greed, ignorance, and shortsightedness of the gun lobby and their supporters in Congress and the White House. We must recognize that if gun violence were killing mostly suburban white kids and not urban kids of color, there would be an uproar that Congress and the president could not ignore. There should be an uproar to quiet the sound of gunshots in our inner cities."

IMMIGRATION:

Poll Finds Georgians Support Stricter Immigration Laws, Guest Worker Program. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/7, Campos, 430K) reports, "Do something about illegal immigration. That's the message Georgians are sending to state lawmakers, through a new poll conducted for The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. A majority of Georgians want the Legislature — which convenes on Monday for its annual session — to tackle the issue, the Zogby International poll indicates. Georgians support a high-profile legislative plan to bar illegal immigrants from receiving state services, and a strong majority — 80 percent — want employers who use illegal immigrants to be punished. But Georgians also support a federal proposal to create a guest worker program that would allow illegal immigrants to work in the United States for a fixed period, the poll found.' … Seventy-two percent of respondents said they support a temporary worker program that would require illegal immigrants to register with the government in order to hold jobs in the U.S. on a limited basis."

TAX:

Court Shuts Down Arizona Tax Firm. The Arizona Republic (1/7, Wagner) reports, "A husband and wife in Mesa (AZ) have been ordered to shut down their tax preparation business and provide information to the government on more than 250 clients who received unwarranted refunds from the Internal Revenue Service." The Republic continues, "U.S. District Judge David Campbell issued a permanent injunction against Beverly J. and Darrell J. Hill, proprietors of Superior Claims Management, according to a Justice Department news release." The Republic adds, "The Hills are accused of operating an Internet site, www.getmytaxesback.com, that recruited customers by offering to recover previously paid taxes. … A Justice Department complaint said they filed phony returns to obtain more than $1.2 million in refunds for clients, who paid a 25 percent fee for the service."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Seven Federal Judges To Testify On Behalf Of Alito. The New York Times (1/7, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "In an unusual move, Senate Republicans have called seven federal judges, all of them colleagues of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. on the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, to testify as character witnesses for him next week at his Supreme Court confirmation hearings. It is rare for sitting federal judges to testify on behalf of judicial nominees, not to mention a Supreme Court nominee. Rarer still is the appearance of an entire panel of judges." The Times notes, "The judges' testimony could shed light on one area of controversy, Judge Alito's failure to recuse himself from cases involving Vanguard, a mutual fund company that manages his investments, as he had earlier pledged to do. One judge, Judge Edward R. Becker, said he intended to raise the Vanguard issue.

The AP (1/7, Espo) reports, "The decision also raises the possibility that Democrats on the panel will be able to question Anthony J. Scirica, chief judge of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, about instances in which Alito participated in cases involving an investment company despite once having promised to avoid them."

The Washington Post (1/7, A5, Babington, 744K) reports Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter " said yesterday that he agreed to allow the judges…to address the panel because they can speak to some of the most contentious issues surrounding the nominee. 'They will testify about his approach to judging, as to whether he has an agenda, as to whether he is ideological, whether he pushes any specific point of view,' Specter said in an interview." The Post adds, "Specter said he sees no conflict of interest for either Alito -- who, if confirmed, would review the rulings of the judges expected to praise him next week -- or for the judges, who might want warm ties with a Supreme Court justice able to rule on their decisions that are appealed to the nation's highest court."

Senators From Both Parties To "Grill" Alito On Executive Power Questions. Knight Ridder (1/7, Kuhnhenn, Henderson) reports Alito's confirmation hearings "will thrust him into a confrontation over whether a president can ignore Congress in the name of fighting terrorism. … Senators from both parties will grill Alito over the reach of executive power and the tension between national security and civil liberties. … Two days after Bush acknowledged the secret surveillance program, Specter was the first Judiciary Committee member to put Alito on notice in writing that he would be questioned about the limits of presidential power during times of war. Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a Judiciary Committee member, also said he intends to focus questions on issues of executive power."

The AP (1/7, Holland), in a piece titled, "What To Expect From Alito Hearings," reports, "The questioning of Alito is likely to be more intense than it was in September for Chief Justice John Roberts since Alito would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate swing vote and the court's first female justice. Alito has been a federal appellate judge for 15 years and has written considerably more opinions than Roberts. … Alito also was clearer about his opinions on abortion than Roberts was as a young government lawyer."

Anti-Alito Groups To Run Ads In States With Centrist Democratic Senators. The AP (1/7, Espo) reports, "Republicans hold the upper hand in their drive to confirm Alito. GOP strategists have said they remain concerned about no more than three members of their own party as they look ahead to a final confirmation vote in the Senate, Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Maine Sens. Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe. On the other hand, groups working to maximize opposition to Alito have indicated concerns about the intentions of six or more Democrats, most if not all of them from Republican-leaning states. Underscoring the concern, Independentcourt.org said that in addition to airing on cable television nationwide, its new ad would run in Arkansas and South Dakota, with three Democratic senators between them. Similarly, the group said it will run radio ads on African-American stations in Louisiana, which has one Democratic senator, as well as Arkansas."

Alito Opponents Protest In Florida. The Miami Herald (1/7, Olkon) reports, "With confirmation hearings for U.S. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito set to begin Monday, local leaders from the NAACP and the National Organization for Women met at the U.S. courthouse on Broward Boulevard to protest his candidacy." The Herald continues, "A coalition of liberal groups are campaigning to stop the federal appeals court judge from Philadelphia from taking the seat occupied by retiring Supreme Court Judge Sandra Day O'Connor. … 'Given Judge Alito's past indifference to the impact race and racism has on our society, the NAACP is firmly and formally opposing his nomination,' Fort Lauderdale NAACP President Marsha Ellison said Friday." The Herald adds, "During his tenure at the Justice Department in the 1980s, Alito wrote of an opposition to 'racial quotas.' … A Knight Ridder review of Alito's published opinions found that he seldom sided with an employee alleging discrimination. … Ellison was joined by Juvais J. Harrington, president of the Miami-Dade branch of the NAACP, Brad Brown, the political action chair of the NAACP in Miami-Dade and Bertha E. Smith, president of the Broward chapter of NOW. Smith said her primary fear is that Alito would work to reverse the 1973 Roe v. Wade abortion ruling."

Democrats Announce Their Witness List. Reuters (1/7, Ferraro) notes, "Democrats announced their list of witnesses on Thursday. They include include a constitutional law expert, a veteran civil rights lawyer and Kate Michelman, a former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights group. They also called John Flym, a retired law professor who represented a plaintiff who sued the mutual fund company Vanguard in a case that Alito helped handle in 2002.

Dujack Dropped As Witness. The Washington Times (1/7, Dinan, 90K) reports, "A freelance writer who compared the Holocaust to eating meat in a 2003 column was pulled yesterday from Senate Democrats' list of witnesses who they want to testify next week against Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. The move came just a day after Stephen R. Dujack was announced as a witness and hours after Senate Republicans and conservative bloggers attacked his credibility for writing that the way people treat animals was akin to Nazis' treatment of Jews. … Democrats had hoped Mr. Dujack, who like Judge Alito is a Princeton graduate, would highlight the judge's former membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group that Mr. Dujack said 'existed primarily to oppose the presence of women and minorities' at the university." Tracy Schmaler, a spokeswoman for Sen. Patrick Leahy "said in addition to removing Mr. Dujack, Democrats were adding two new witnesses: Rep. Debbie Wasserman-Schultz, Florida Democrat, and Theodore M. Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc."

Santorum, Dobson To Headline Pro-Alito Rally. The AP (1/7, Hefling) reports Sen. Rick Santorum and Focus on the Family founder James Dobson "will headline a rally Sunday for conservatives in Philadelphia one day before the start of confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee

Samuel Alito. The Family Research Council, which is backing the event dubbed 'Justice Sunday III,' said on its Web site that organizers were defending religious liberty and 'raising the alarm over liberal secularists' attempts to expel prayer and people of faith from the public square.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/7, Stoiber, 423K) reports, "Ministers from Philadelphia, New York and Washington yesterday criticized plans by religious conservatives to hold a nationally broadcast rally tomorrow at an African American church on North Broad Street on the eve of confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State in Washington and a United Church of Christ minister, called the gathering nothing more than 'a big play' by its conveners 'to gain control over the one branch of government they don't now control.'"

Alito's Background And Temperament Contrasted With O'Connor's. The AP (1/7, Holland) reports, "Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor have starkly different backgrounds and personal styles -- and views on major issues. … She's a former politician, known for her social skills and feistiness. Alito, a former prosecutor, is reserved and scholarly.

Thernstrom Defends Alito's Record On Voting Rights Cases. In an letter to the editor of the New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) Abigail Thernstrom, vice chairwoman of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, writes, "In 'Question for Alito: What About One Person One Vote?' (Editorial Observer, Jan. 3), Adam Cohen depicts questioning the one-person-one-vote principle as 'a radical position,' and suggests that perhaps Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. is 'an elitist' and 'antidemocratic.' And yet Justices Felix Frankfurter and John Marshall Harlan - no 'radicals' - both expressed deep misgivings about the Warren Court's mid-1960's apportionment decisions. The Constitution said nothing about mathematically equal districts. … Nevertheless, one person one vote is now settled law, as Judge Alito has said. Mr. Cohen argues that a Justice Alito might be able to 'forge a conservative Supreme Court majority to overturn the reapportionment cases.' The notion that either he or any other members of the Court would now move to undo the reapportionment revolution is fanciful - and irresponsible."

Kennedy Previews His Questions For Alito. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/7, 744K) Se. Edward Kennedy writes, "As Judge Samuel Alito approaches his confirmation hearings next week, the more we learn about him, the more questions we have about the credibility of his assurances to us." Kennedy specifically mentions Alito's DOJ "job application" from 1985, his membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton and his "failure to recuse himself in the Vanguard case." Kennedy concludes, "'Credibility' has rarely been an issue for Supreme Court nominees, but it is clearly a major issue for Alito."

Liberals Encouraged To Not "Bork" Alito. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) attorney Caren Deane Thomas writes, "When I recently received an invitation to a reunion of my Yale Law School class, it stirred memories of the astounding group of students I found when I arrived there in 1972. Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton are the most famous, of course, but my classmates also include someone else who has made news lately: Sam Alito. When Judge Alito was nominated to the United States Supreme Court, my fellow alumni began contacting one another, contemplating the elevation of one of our own to the highest judicial dais in the land. Sam was remembered fondly and with admiration. But an issue of conscience emerged - namely, whether respect for Sam could be squared with the deep qualms many of us feel about the Bush administration and its failings. One classmate sent out an anguished e-mail message begging us to fight at all costs a nomination born of such a regime." Thomas concludes, "The president took the high road on this nomination. He juggled his politics and his public relations, and while I don't like either, I have to be grateful for the quality of lawyer, and individual, who emerged as the nominee. We have to decide whether the unfortunate tradition begun with Robert Bork's nomination should be continued indefinitely or whether, with the wisdom of hindsight, we exhume it only when absolutely warranted. Liberals among us have got to get real - to press for the finest jurists a conservative administration is willing to offer, and to spend our capital in that pursuit."

Alito Compared To Brandeis. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/7, 2.11M) Princeton professor Ken Kersch writes on Woodrow Wilson's nomination of Louis Brandeis. According to Kersch, "The parallels between President Bush's nomination of Samuel Alito and Wilson's nomination of Brandeis, while not perfect, are instructive. The charges that the nominee has strong ties to a political movement, ties that will render him 'biased' in cases involving the most contentious issues he is likely to face, leaves today's Republicans nonplussed -- just as they did the Democrats in Wilson's day."

WPost Praises Some Of Alito's Dissents. The Washington Post (1/7, 744K) editorializes, "the many dissents of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. offer an unusual window into his judicial personality. In political terms, a preponderance of them are ideologically predictable -- that is, there are many cases in which Judge Alito takes an approach that would yield results more conservative than those reached by his colleagues and few in which he dissents from the left. In legal terms, his work is careful and measured, and while we disagree with his analysis in some cases, in others it seems admirable. … Judge Alito's dissents are not the work of an unblinking ideologue. He dissented, for example, on behalf of a race discrimination claimant concerning the length of a statute of limitations and on behalf of a claim of federal jurisdiction under a consumer protection law. He dissented on behalf of the plaintiff in a medical malpractice lawsuit in which the defendant doctors argued that the victim of their error, who died as a result of their advice, was foolish to follow it -- a moving rebuke to colleagues who overturned a jury verdict in her favor. Judge Alito's dissents offer much with which we disagree. But they are the work of a serious and scholarly judge whose arguments deserve respect -- a respect evident among his colleagues even when their positions differ."

Bush Credits Economic Agenda For Strong Economy. President Bush and a number of other top Administration officials launched a nationwide effort touting the Administration's economic policies and crediting them with recent positive economic developments. Media reports on the economy were generally positive. According to the Labor Department the US added 108,000 jobs in last month and the unemployment rate edged down to 4.9 percent. That job creation was much lower than expected, but the Labor Department also said the US added far more jobs in November, 305,000, than it had estimated. The Administration's efforts were widely reported in major US newspapers where Administration officials visited, but local and national TV coverage was limited. Both CBS and ABC paired the news concerning the unemployment rate in the US with reports on IBM's decision to drop its defined-benefit pension plan.

The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Many people are discovering that those new jobs do not come with everything they used to." CBS added, "Overall the economy added more than 400,000 jobs in November and December. Touring the Chicago board of trade today the President was crowing about those numbers." President Bush: "In 2005 the American economy turned in a performance that is the envy of the industrialized world." CBS continued, "But the jobs you find aren't likely to come with the benefits workers have taken for granted. IBM which funds the country's third largest corporate pension plan is the latest major company to freeze pension benefits for its U.S. employees. Big Blue will offer them only a 401 k plan after 2008. While the President said today…" President Bush: "We've got to have a private pension system that is fully funded." Bill Cheney, Chief Economist at John Hancock: "There is no guarantee the job you are in is going to last or even that the employer will survive."

The New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) reports, "The United States generated about 200,000 new jobs a month in the last part of 2005, a healthy pace that President Bush immediately used on Friday as part of a broader campaign to promote his economic record and agenda of tax cuts, tighter limits on government spending and more trade." He "and his top team spread out across the country on Friday to celebrate what administration officials see as a largely unappreciated success amid gloomy news about the war in Iraq, criminal investigations into prominent Republicans and a sense among many people that the economy is not as good as the numbers say it is." Bush cited "data not only on job creation, but also on gains in productivity and homeownership. Then, he used his appearance to demand that Congress extend his major tax cuts on wages and on dividends, capital gains and estate taxes."

The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Silva, Pearson, 643K) reports, "Attempting to make the most of mixed economic progress, President Bush came to Chicago on Friday with an impassioned pitch for the tax cuts he secured during his first term and a demand that Congress make those cuts permanent."

The Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) reports, "The figures offered a well-timed boost to President Bush, who touted them here in his latest outing in a campaign to convince Americans that his tax and budget policies are working, despite polling that shows widespread unease about the economy." But Democratic lawmakers "said the unease is justified, noting that job growth in December was slower than many economists expected and citing Labor Department data showing that, for the average worker, prices are rising faster than wages." He "did not unveil any new policies but called on Congress to make permanent many of the tax cuts enacted during his first term and to cut spending more."

The Wall Street Journal (1/7, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "To make sure no one missed the point, the White House dispatched 23 other administration officials to do the same thing around the country." The "extraordinary" effort was "aimed at closing what the White House views as a troubling disconnect between the robust U.S. economy and many ordinary Americans' wariness. That is especially worrisome to Republicans as they head into a congressional election year when jobs, immigration, health care and pensions are likely to be big issues." The Administration officials traveled across the country "to reassure Americans on their economic worries. But as their itineraries suggested, there are still a lot of sources of concern, despite strong growth and employment numbers."

The Atlanta Journal Constitution (1/7, Herman) in an article titled "December Job Tally Disappoints" reports, "Ruy Teixeira, senior fellow at the Century Foundation, in an analysis of the 2006 challenges facing Bush, noted that recent polls showed that six in 10 Americans rate the nation's economic condition as fair or poor. And more than half see it as a bad time to find a good job." But Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt in Atlanta "touted the economy's performance and discounted worries about a threat coming from a popping 'bubble' in housing." Kimmitt said, "It merits attention, but it does not merit concern."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Gerstenzang, Havemann, 958K) in an article titled "Job Growth Sluggish as Bush Trumpets Economy" notes that "polls indicate that a majority of Americans do not share the president's enthusiasm." Experts "said the actual state of the economy lay somewhere between the administration's rosy account and the Democrats' gloomier one. 'The surprise,' said Sung Won Sohn, president and chief executive of Hanmi Bank in Los Angeles, 'has been the resilience the economy has shown despite the hurricanes, the jump in oil prices and higher interest rates.' But he found some bearish signs in Friday's report, including a decline in the total number of hours worked and a shrinking share of industries hiring new workers."

Focusing on how Bush used his speech on the economy to contrast his policies with Democrats, the Washington Times (1/7, A1, Sammon, 90K) in a front page story reports, "Bush yesterday mocked Democrats who falsely predicted his tax cuts would ruin the economy and cited new job creation numbers as evidence that the cuts should be made permanent." He "also took the unusual step of resurrecting a quote from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi…who predicted in May 2003 that the president's tax cuts would be cause economic disaster." Bush said, "She said, 'Today the Congress of the United States will vote on a reckless, irresponsible tax plan that will undermine opportunity in our country.' … Since that congresswoman had uttered those words, the economy has added more than 4.5 million new jobs."

Similarly, the AP (1/7, Loven) says Bush "opened a sharp election-year attack against Democrats, who he said would devastate the economy and turn back recent job gains by blocking free trade and raising taxes." He "pulled no punches." His "approval ratings on the economy remain low at 39 percent -- close to his record-lowest rating in November of 37 percent." Reuters (1/7, Zakaria) reports on Bush's economic speech and the AP (1/7) also publishes a brief list of quotes by Bush and top Administration officials on the economy and the Democrats' response.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/7, Boselovic, 261K) reports, "The Bush administration moved quickly to seize the upper hand on yesterday's jobs news, focusing more on the two-month average than on December's sluggish job growth. President Bush -- in appearances in Chicago, where he touted tax cuts and other administration economic policies and attacked Democrats for opposing them -- proclaimed that December's employment report showed that the 'American economy heads into 2006 with a full head of steam.'" And Energy Secretary Sam Bodman "appeared at FedEx Ground's headquarters in Moon, where U.S. Reps. Melissa Hart, R-Bradford Woods, and Tim Murphy, R-Upper St. Clair, were hosting a regional summit on energy."

The Kansas City Star (1/7, Stafford, 286K) notes, "Various market analysts described the jobs picture as 'sturdy,' 'good,' and 'showing moderate growth.' The Bush administration seized on the report as more evidence that the economy was doing well."

The AP (1/7, Aversa) says "Bush, in speeches around the country, including an appearance in Chicago yesterday, has shifted into a campaignlike mode to shine a spotlight on the economy's good points."

Local newscasts occasionally reported on President Bush's speech in Chicago. The President was portrayed as pushing an optimistic view of the economy, although some stories said Mr. Bush was keeping attention off the conflict in Iraq. Some examples: KPNX-TV Phoenix (1/6, 5:09 p.m.) reported, "Shrugging off a weaker than expected jobs report, be President Bush headed to the Midwest today to talk about his economic agenda for the new year."

WBAL-TV Baltimore (1/6, 5:15 p.m.) reported, "President Bush and his economic team hit the road to try to pain a rosy picture of what he calls a strong economy." WVIT-TV Hartford (1/6, 5:27 p.m.) reported, "The President is pushing his plan to help the economy."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (1/6, 10:24 p.m.) reported, "President Bush shifted away from Iraq, speaking about the economy. The President expressed optimism about the economy based on the job growth numbers." KMSP-TV Minneapolis (1/6, 5:05 p.m.) reported, "He diverted the spotlight away from Iraq."

Administration Expected To Focus On Targeted Tax Cuts Rather Than More "Ambitious" Tax Reform. In a preview of the Administration's plans for Bush's 2006 economic agenda the Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) in its coverage of Bush's speech also notes, "White House aides continue to fine-tune the policy agenda Bush will unveil later this month, constrained by politics and a tight budget for nonmilitary spending. Bush advisers have shelved plans for an ambitious tax reform agenda, fearing it would flop politically, but still plan to roll out a few new targeted tax and budget plans in the State of the Union address."

And the Wall Street Journal (1/7, Harwood, 2.11M) reports that to sustain his upward movement in the polls, "Bush will promote his tax-cutting policies as critical to keeping the economy humming. After the failed 2005 attempt at a bold overhaul of Social Security through private accounts, however, neither the White House nor congressional Republicans have much appetite for the sweeping tax-code changes they envisioned earlier. 'The mood will be for what's achievable,' says Rep. Roy Blunt. … That means action -- before the April 15 tax-filing deadline -- on extensions of previously enacted cuts in dividend and capital-gains taxes, and a fix in the alternative minimum tax to shield middle-income taxpayers." The President will also "emphasize budget discipline. … If Republicans can hold together on final passage of last year's deficit-reduction bill -- delayed by a Democratic parliamentary maneuver -- the administration will begin the process anew with its 2007 spending proposal in early February. White House Budget Director Joshua Bolten hasn't given up on curbing the entitlement programs of Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security. But true to the sober zeitgeist of the party of 2006, he adds, 'Those changes can be effected in increments.'" But most important "is progress on the Iraq war, which soured the public mood in 2005. Successful Iraqi elections have encouraged the White House enough to announce a modest troop drawdown. Republicans believe that whittling down the contingent of U.S. soldiers will buoy Mr. Bush's popularity."

Bush Seeks To Contrast Economic Policies With Democrats. And the New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) notes, "Mr. Bush has been eager to highlight his differences with Democrats over economic policy. He has sought to set up a contrast between what the White House says is a job-creating agenda and a Democratic approach that White House officials say would lead to higher taxes, a further surge in spending on domestic programs and a drift toward protectionism. Republicans say they expect Mr. Bush to make those assertions increasingly in coming months and include them in his State of Union address, tentatively scheduled for Jan. 31."

Cheney, Top Administration Officials Echo Bush's Economic Message. Vice President Dick Cheney's remarks were briefly noted in most major newspapers. The New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) notes, "Bush and his aides have said…that the economy's performance showed their approach was creating jobs." At a Kansas Harley-Davidson factory Cheney said, "Some in Washington said these tax cuts would not work" and "it's getting pretty hard for the critics to make the case that somehow these tax cuts weren't good for the economy."

The Washington Times (1/7, A1, Sammon, 90K) in its front page story on Bush's speech also notes Bush's "comments were echoed by Mr. Cheney, who ridiculed Democrats during a visit to a Harley-Davidson plant in Kansas City, Mo." Cheney said, "The American economy is on the move, and that is because we did not listen to the pessimists." Sen. Edward Kenney "scoffed at such criticism," saying, ""The administration's constant response is to grant more tax breaks for the wealthy," and he "predicted the economy would hurt the GOP in the midterm elections." Yet "Cheney was unapologetic about the administration's demands that the tax cuts be made permanent, even hinting that additional cuts might be needed." Cheney said, "With the new year beginning, soon people will start receiving their W-2 forms in the mail. … It's always a bit of a shock to see how big a piece the federal government took off the top of your earnings over the past year."

The Atlanta Journal Constitution (1/7, Herman) notes that despite concerns about wages, "Cheney was greeted by workers happy about their economic situation. Kevin Herrera, a paint shop manager, didn't vote for Bush but agreed with the administration view that the economy is good." And "Craig Jenkins, sporting a well-worn Machinists for Kerry shirt, said, 'Yeah, right now everything is fine with my family.'" Yet, "Jenkins, still no Bush fan, said he knows many people are out of work and that the president has done nothing to stem the flow of jobs from America."

The Kansas City Star (1/7, Canon, Bormann, 286K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney on Friday came to Kansas City as the confident optimist. He touted robust economic numbers and the administration's varied approaches to fighting terrorism -- saying President Bush is to be credited for the country's post-Sept. 11 prosperity and security." One "official for the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers said that there was no campaign to organize a protest, and that the union has an agreement with Harley that it would not distribute political literature at the plant. But the union issued a news release that said Harley-Davidson's success has come 'despite Bush administration' policies that allow too many imports to flow into the country."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/7, Weber, 423K) reports, "The Bush administration needs to make sure its tax policies don't give younger workers less of an incentive to change jobs as they move through their careers, Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt said Friday." At "a Commerce Club speech in Atlanta, Kimmitt said that unlike a generation ago, people leaving college are more apt to work for several different employers over time rather than just one. That could make it harder for them to maintain quality health and pension benefits without the right government policies, he said."

The Baltimore Sun (1/7, Hopkins, 296K) reports, 'An economic public-relations blitz by the Bush administration yesterday included a stop at Johns Hopkins Medicine in Baltimore, where Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao promoted a jobs training program and the 'good news for America's workers.'" But "it wasn't ideal timing for the full-court press. Labor Department numbers released earlier in the day showed the nation's employers adding 108,000 jobs last month, less than expected and weaker than needed to keep up with population growth." Yet, "it came on the heels of a strong, 305,000-job increase in November…and so Chao accentuated the positive."

The Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) adds, "Cheney was touring a Harley-Davidson plant in Missouri and touting the economy despite a bad foot that forced him to use a cane. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and several other officials also fanned out to talk about low unemployment numbers and a growing economy."

The vice president's speech and motorcycle plant tour was often covered by local television newscasts in Missouri, usually in the morning before the actual tour. Those stations that mentioned the speech after the event often commented on Mr. Cheney's use of a cane. Some examples: WGEM-TV Quincy (1/6, 5:04 p.m.) reported, "Vice president Dick Cheney is walking with the help of a cane. He used the cane today as he toured a Harley-Davidson motorcycle factory in Kansas City." Later, the station reported that the Vice President, "credited…tax cuts for economic growth."

KRCG-TV Columbia (1/6, 5:27 a.m.) reported, "Vice President Dick Cheney will pay a visit to the 'show me' state today. In Kansas City, Cheney will tour a Harley Davidson motorcycle assembly plant. He's also scheduled to give a speech on the economy." The AP (1/7) also reports on Cheney's need to use a cane.

Wall Street Reacts Positively To New Unemployment Figures. NBC Nightly News (1/6, story 3, Williams) reported. "The unemployment rate ticked down. Wall Street liked those numbers. The Dow was up more than 77 points on today's trading. NASDAQ gained almost 29. For the week the Dow was up almost 242 points in all. NASDAQ had a good week, up 100 points."

Economy Strong Despite Hurricanes, High Energy Prices. In its coverage of the Administration's effort to highlight the positive news for the US economy the New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) notes, "By almost all measures, last year was a good one for the American economy. The economy expanded by about 3.6 percent in 2005, the fourth consecutive year of solid growth, despite the soaring energy prices and the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina." But many experts said "that Mr. Bush's policies were not the primary reason for the economy's strength." Global Insight chief economist Narimen Behravesh said, "Tax cuts had very little to do with it. … You had a housing boom, which had very little to do with tax cuts, driving consumer spending. We also had before this year the dollar coming down, which helped drive up exports."

And the Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) in its coverage adds, "The data reinforced other signs that the economy was growing at a healthy pace as it entered the new year despite the turmoil caused by hurricanes and higher energy prices."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 7, :10, Vargas) reported, "In economic news, unemployment fell to under 5% last month. The government said today that 108,000 new jobs were added to the economy in December. Fewer than analysts expected. Overall, 2 million new jobs were added in 2005, despite higher oil prices and the devastating hurricanes." ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 8, :10, Vargas) then reported, "Even with the solid economic growth, another huge American corporation is expected to phase out pension plans for employees. IBM announced in 2008 it will shift 117,000 workers from traditional pension plans to 401k retirement plan. The move is part of a growing trend by financially healthy companies to save money by eliminating lifetime pensions for worker."

Bush Acknowledges Loss Of Manufacturing Jobs. The AP (1/7, Carpenter) reports, "President Bush's choice of the Midwest as backdrop for a speech Friday touting the nation's economy put the spotlight on a region with an improving but still-mixed economic performance." The continuing "loss of manufacturing jobs has been a sore spot throughout the region, as Bush acknowledged." The AP notes, "Focusing only briefly on the Midwest, he pointed to the creation of jobs nationwide and the decline in unemployment, and said manufacturers will benefit if trade restrictions around the world are eased as he has urged."

Bush Calls For Passage Of Asbestos Lawsuit Reform Bill. Reuters (1/7) reports in his speech touring the US economy in Chicago "Bush called on Friday for Congress to curb asbestos lawsuits this year, saying the United States needed to reform its legal system to better compete in the global economy." He "said Americans needed to understand that frivolous injury lawsuits were a drag on the U.S. economy." Bush said, "To make sure this is the most competitive country in the world, we've got to get rid of some of these junk lawsuits that are running capital out of America."

NYTimes Dismisses Bush's Claims About Health Of Economy. The New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) editorializes, "Responding to yesterday's government report showing paltry job creation in December, Treasury Secretary John Snow urged Americans not to overreact to one month's snapshot, but to focus on the bigger picture. But that picture is not so pretty." And the long-term prospects are "even uglier. Job growth in the current period is the worst by far of the four comparable economic upturns since the 1960's: 2.7 percent versus the 7.8 percent tallied in the weakest of those earlier recoveries." So "President Bush cherry-picked his way through the latest economic figures in his speech yesterday before the Economic Club of Chicago, rattling off numbers without context. The president's prescription -- more tax cuts -- has failed in the past to create a robust job market and is still not the right answer."

New Medicare Drug Benefit's Roll-Out Beset By Problems. The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "After months of controversy the new Medicare prescription drug benefit has been getting its first reality check this week, ever since the law was passed critics have complained that it would lead to confusion. Well, for at least one group of beneficiaries that seems to be true." CBS went on to report, "It was a very tough week for low income seniors who were supposed to be covered by the new Medicare drug benefit. Time after time these seniors were told they indeed have insurance under the system, just not for the specific drugs they use. … When we visited Grubs Pharmacy two blocks from the U.S. Capitol, not one senior citizen we tracked had a prescription filled smoothly."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports, "California health officials reported Friday that database errors and overloaded telephone help lines were spreading confusion and frustration among seniors seeking vital medicines under the new Medicare prescription program. While some warned of a looming crisis, Medicare officials and insurance companies called for patience and promised swift relief. California pharmacists, on the frontline of the new program, complained that improvements are coming too slowly. … Most of those affected are low-income seniors and disabled people." The Times adds, "While acknowledging problems, federal officials defended the new program and said hundreds of thousands of seniors have been getting their prescriptions without incident, many at lower cost. The drug benefit is considered one of the Bush administration's main domestic policy achievements."

Knight Ridder (1/7, Pugh) reports, "Many of Medicare's poorest and most sickly patients are going without their medications because of administrative glitches, misinformation and confusion surrounding the new Medicare prescription drug benefit. Experts had warned that many of the 6.4 million low-income people who get benefits from Medicare and Medicaid could miss out on their life-sustaining medicines when their drug coverage shifted on Jan. 1 from Medicaid to private plans sponsored by Medicare. In interviews, advocates for the elderly as well as lawmakers and seniors themselves indicated that that's happening. … Medicare's contingency plan for patients who aren't enrolled in drug plans also is proving problematic. The agency wants pharmacists to give these customers short-term refills at no cost and bill Medicare later. But some pharmacists don't know about the agreement, and others are balking because they fear they won't be reimbursed."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/7, Wolfe, 424K) reports, "Medicare officials said Friday they will try over the weekend to fix problems that have left hundreds of poor Minnesotans unable to get their prescription drugs. But problems are continuing, with some low-income people on both Medicare and Medicaid – 'dual eligibles' -- struggling to find a pharmacist who will fill prescriptions under a new Medicare drug benefit that took effect this year. While other Medicare beneficiaries also are having some problems, the situation is acute for those who also are on Medicaid."

Grassley To Investigate Medicare Employees' Travel Expenses. Reuters (1/7) reports, "A top Republican lawmaker called for an investigation into Medicare travel expenses on Friday after documents showed some employees attended conferences hosted by contractors at a Florida resort. Medicare officials said they were taking the concerns seriously, but that the conferences were not very expensive because they were held in June during the state's off-peak season." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Sen. Charles Grassley "said the employees were responsible for overseeing $300 million in Medicare contracts to investigate complaints."

HHS Advises Americans On Avian Flu Precautions. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/7, A2) reports, "There is no vaccine and drugs are in short supply, but Americans may be able to ride out any pandemic of bird flu if they stock up on supplies and keep their children clean, the government said yesterday. The Department of Health and Human Services checklist illustrates how little can be done to prevent widespread illness and disruption if H5N1 avian influenza causes a pandemic -- a global epidemic -- this year. … Experts say the best way to wait out a pandemic, which could last months, is to stay away from other people and keep close to home. 'During a pandemic, if you cannot get to a store, or if stores are out of supplies, it will be important for you to have extra supplies on hand. This can be useful in other types of emergencies, such as power outages and disasters,' the HHS guide says."

Federal Officials Seek Deal With Texas Food Stamp Agency. The Dallas Morning News (1/7, Dodge) reports, "Federal food stamp officials this week made a peace offering to their Texas counterparts that could avoid a delay in nutrition benefits to the state's neediest residents. Now, it's up to officials at the Texas Health and Human Services Agency to decide whether they will accept the deal. The state officials would need to sign an application that has been written on their behalf by officials at the Department of Agriculture's Food and Nutrition Service. If they don't, Texans applying under a pilot program set to begin in two weeks could see a delay of a week or more in their food stamp benefits."

DeLay Seen As Unlikely To Regain Leadership Post. The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 3, 1:00, Schieffer) reported, "There are some new developments tonight on the Washington bribery scandal involving congressman Tom DeLay. CBS' Gloria Borger continued, "Tonight two house republicans are circulating a petition that will call for new elections that would permanently replace Tom DeLay in the house leadership. Now sources close to the house republican leadership tell CBS News tonight that these new elections are all but inevitable. And that Tom DeLay himself is slowly coming to the conclusion that he is not going to be able to reclaim his leadership post."

The New York Times (1/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "In the wake of Tuesday's guilty plea to corruption charges by the lobbyist Jack Abramoff," some "rebellious…House Republicans moved Friday to bar Representative Tom DeLay of Texas from regaining his position as majority leader, demanding a vote to replace him permanently at the top of the party hierarchy." Arizona Rep. Jeff Flake and New Hampshire Rep. Charles Bass "began circulating a petition on Friday to collect 50 signatures needed to call a party leadership election," and have "commitments from about two dozen lawmakers." In an new election, "the rank-and-file could push for more if enough lawmakers conclude a broader shake-up is warranted," and "a divisive leadership battle has the potential to roil the House just as President Bush and Congressional Republicans are unveiling their election-year agenda."

The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Weisman, 744K) adds, "Prominent Republicans have begun counseling DeLay that he should renounce claims to the majority leader's post, for the good of the party and for the good of his long-term political career," and "even DeLay aides and supporters acknowledge that time is running out on a comeback."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Curtius, Simon, 958K) adds that the petition "indicated how quickly DeLay's broad and deep support among Republicans has collapsed following this week's guilty pleas by lobbyist Jack Abramoff," and "opposition to DeLay's return as majority leader has united some conservative and moderate House Republicans who normally are at loggerheads over policy issues."

The AP (1/7, Espo) adds, "Buffeted by scandal, House Republicans are clamoring for new election-year leadership, and indicted Rep. Tom DeLay's hopes of returning to power as floor leader are dwindling," as "Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, signaled he would not try to block the rank-and-file from acting."

The Houston Chronicle (1/7, Roth, Gonzalez, Levine, 581K) adds that it is a "significant development" that House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R) "indicated Friday for the first time that he was open to the election of a new majority leader."

The Boston Globe (1/7, Klein, 484K) adds that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's reaction "suggests that a leadership change is all but certain." The maneuver "to oust DeLay is a rebuke to the House GOP's leadership, which has long been known for enforcing strict party discipline."

The Dallas Morning News (1/7, Gillman) adds, "No members of the GOP leadership have signed the petition, though aides called the election likely," and "White House spokesman Trent Duffy sidestepped questions about whether President Bush thinks it's time for Mr. DeLay to renounce his claim on the leadership." However, Ron Talley, spokesman for the Republican Main Street Partnership, a group of moderates who fear that fallout from Mr. DeLay's ethical troubles threatens their hopes in Democrat-leaning districts," said, "We're trying to take away the stigma and the what-ifs and all the monkeys that appear to be on the leaderships' backs. ... It's a matter of survival."

The Financial Times (1/7, Yeager) adds, "Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker who led the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994, said this week that while Mr DeLay must defend himself in court, 'the House Republican party has a different set of interests and [they] involve having a new majority leader.'" Reuters (1/7, Cowan, Ferraro) also covered this story.

DeLay Requests Co-Defendant's Charges Be Dropped. The Houston Chronicle (1/7, 581K) reports, "U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay on Friday asked the 3rd Court of Appeals to throw out a money-laundering indictment against one of his co-defendants," Jim Ellis, the director of DeLay's Americans for a Republican Majority. "A favorable ruling for Ellis would give senior District Judge Pat Priest reason to reconsider his ruling upholding the money-laundering indictment against DeLay," although "The indictments were upheld by state District Judge Bob Perkins, who has since been removed from the DeLay case."

OTHER NEWS:

Future Of Mideast Peace Process Without Sharon Remains Unclear. NBC opened its broadcast with an update on Ariel Sharon's condition and an extensive analysis of the Mideast peace process and the Israeli political scene post-Sharon. NBC noted mixed feeling among Palestinians concerning the likely end Sharon's political dominance. The other networks gave the story less prominence. NBC Nightly News (1/6, lead story, B. Williams) at the end of its lead story reported, "If Sharon does not recover, the political changes in Israel will ripple around the world, and especially the White House. Andrea Mitchell now on what's at stake for the US and the Middle East peace process." NBC's Andrea Mitchell continued, "The President had staked his Middle East policy on Sharon, taking further steps to create a Palestinian state, like his decision to force right wing settlers to withdraw from Gaza. US officials don't know if his temporary successor, Ehud Olmert, will even win the election in March, and if he does, whether he can get Israelis to give up more land."

The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports that "Sharon's near-certain departure from the Israeli political scene has sparked immediate concern among senior Bush administration officials. They fear that Mr. Sharon's successor will be unable, or unwilling, to make territorial compromises necessary to create the viable Palestinian state that the Bush administration sees as vital." The Journal notes, "The challenges confronting the administration stem from Mr. Bush's decision in recent years to place his approach to the Israel-Palestinian question almost entirely on Mr. Sharon's broad shoulders. Public comments notwithstanding, Mr. Sharon's policies have fully supplanted Mr. Bush's 'road map' as the blueprint for the region." Both "U.S. and Israeli officials acknowledge that it will be harder for Mr. Olmert to sell difficult moves like a West Bank withdrawal. Although he is a savvy politician, he lacks Mr. Sharon's credentials as a general who fought in all of Israel's wars and more than once saved the country from apparent defeat. And neither Mr. Olmert nor any other candidate who would succeed Mr. Sharon has the unusual combination of history and personality that has come to embody the contradictions and tensions of the Israeli public."

Speculation Focuses On Sharon's Successor's Capability To Lead. NBC Nightly News (1/6, lead story, Fletcher) reported. "The world press following every medical bulletin about the condition of the man who held the promise of real moves towards peace with the Palestinians. Now one question is whether Ehud Olmert, Israel's acting prime minister, will follow in his footsteps. In fact, it's the other way around. Olmert called for Israel to evacuate the Gaza Strip before Sharon -- and the autonomy for the Palestinians. A former two-time mayor of Jerusalem, Olmert, has not been afraid of political risks. With Sharon he left the right wing Likud Party to form the new Kadima party to compete in the march elections. Their platform: land for peace, with the Palestinians, quickly. … And first, Olmert has to win the election. Opinion polls show about the same support for Sharon's Kadima party without him as with him. Analysts say it could be just a sympathy vote. That could well decline sharply in the months to go before the election."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 5, 2:00, Woodruff) reported, "People had expected that Ariel Sharon would be the prime minister of this country for a very long time to come. In the poll it indicated that he would win by a landslide in the elections coming up in March."

The New York Times (1/7, Berger, 1.19M) reports, "Olmert has little military background, few Israelis can match his deep government experience. He has been a cabinet minister several times and served as mayor of Jerusalem for 10 years. He also has command of an elegant, witty English, and can communicate directly with American audiences. Finally, few others can rival the closeness he has enjoyed with Mr. Sharon." While serving in Parliament he "quickly achieved a reputation for fighting corruption" and also "developed a reputation for ruthlessness." Like President Bush, Olmert is "a fitness buff and avid jogger."

The Time (1/7) reports Olmert is currently "very much a centrist within the Kadima ranks. Olmert is not a particularly popular figure in Israel, but he is very ambitious -- in 1999, he ran against Sharon in a primary for the Likud nomination for prime minister. Now, he'll stake his own claim for leadership by painting himself as the custodian of Sharon's legacy, signaling that he represents stability and continuity on the path initiated by Sharon."

The Washington Times/AP (1/7, Plushnick-Masti) in a front page story adds, "As acting prime minister, the public could come to see Mr. Olmert as a leader, said analyst Gadi Wolfsfeld. 'No one really loves Olmert, but no one really hates him, therefore he has a chance of convincing the public.'"

Roger Cohen in his "Globalist" column in the New York Times/IHT (1/7) writes, "Palestinian and Israeli elections over the next three months make all predictions treacherous. But it is safe enough to say that the best hope for the Middle East may lie with Ehud Olmert, Sharon's deputy and now acting prime minister. If he can consolidate the center and Sharon's course, while engaging Palestinians enough to make that course less unilateralist, progress is possible."

Olmert Reaches Out To Peres. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, King, 958K) in its article describing the seriousness of Sharon's condition also notes, "Olmert met Friday with Shimon Peres, the elder statesman who abandoned his Labor Party in November to join Kadima. Had Sharon not fallen ill, Peres would have been in line for a senior Cabinet post in any new Kadima-led government." Olmert reportedly reassured Peres to keep him "in the fold, but a meeting was cut short by word that Sharon was being rushed into surgery."

The Washington Post (1/7, A11, Wilson, 744K) also notes Peres "met Friday with Olmert to discuss what he said were 'ways to continue Sharon's policies -- both an uncompromising war against terror and an endless effort toward peace.'" While "he has lost a number of national elections, Peres is considered a valuable political asset because of his broad appeal among traditional Labor voters of his generation."

a blow to Mr. Olmert and Kadima because he brings a kind of assurance to voters that the new party is in fact centrist, and not a branch of Likud. Mr. Peres, as the last active senior politician of Israel's founding generation, is respected for his wisdom and international standing."

Arab Observers Concerned Loss Of Sharon Will Stall Progress Toward Peace. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Stack, 958K) reports, "As the realization hit the region that the Israeli prime minister may no longer lead the Jewish state, a mood of regret and uncertainty crept into the tone of Arab analysts and editorials. As Sharon clung to life, the leaders of Egypt and Jordan, Arab countries that signed peace treaties with Israel, sent word of their concern." Despite their past animosity, "many Arabs saw Sharon as the only leader stubborn and strong enough to push Israel into accepting a Palestinian state. Arabs worried that the loss of Sharon would throw Israel into tumult and freeze already stagnant peace talks."

Rice Trip To Southeast Asia Canceled. The AP (1/7, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice canceled a six-day trip to Indonesia and Australia on Friday amid uncertainty over ailing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon."

Reuters (1/7, Pleming) adds, "Rice called off the trip so she could liaise in Washington with President George W. Bush's other top foreign policy aides without the problems of time differences, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said."

In a brief article on Rice's decision not to travel the Financial Times (1/7, Dinmore) notes, "A sense of crisis in the Middle East has been heightened in the Bush administration by the confrontation with Syria over Iraq and the UN investigation into the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, as well as violence in Iraq."

Injury Expected To Keep Sharon From Resuming Leadership. The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "In Israel today Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had a second operation to stop bleeding in his brain. Doctors say it brought a significant improvement in his condition. But two days after suffering a massive stroke, Sharon remains in critical condition. And it seems all but certain he will never return now as Israel's leader."

The Washington Times (1/7, Mitnick, 90K) adds, "Doctors operated on Ariel Sharon for a third time yesterday to stem a new cerebral hemorrhage but said they had stabilized his condition, dispelling speculation that the prime minister was about to succumb to the stroke suffered this week." The Washington Post (1/7, A13, Brown, 744K) also reports on the details of Sharon's treatment.

Sharon's Legacy Examined. Knight Ridder (1/7, Nissenbaum) reports, "Although Sharon's departure from the political stage is expected to create a diplomatic void in the Middle East, analysts across the political spectrum said the prime minister had shifted the political paradigm in Israel by ending its military rule in the occupied Gaza Strip and using the move to create a new centrist party with a pragmatic outlook."

White House Chastises Robertson For Sharon Remarks. The Washington Post (1/7, Deane, 744K) on its web site yesterday afternoon reported, "The White House today criticized television evangelist Pat Robertson's remarks that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's severe illness was deserved, calling the comments 'wholly inappropriate and offensive.'" White House press spokesman Trent Duffy "added that Robertson's comments 'don't have a place in this or any other debate.'" He "also told reporters the president is praying for Sharon's full recovery." The AP (1/7) in a brief article also notes the White House's response to Robertson.

Robertson Criticized By Evangelical Leaders. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Stammer, 958K) reports, "Evangelical leaders said Friday that they were embarrassed and incensed by televangelist Pat Robertson's assertion that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon…was stricken by God as punishment for ceding the Gaza Strip and a portion of the West Bank to Palestinians last summer." They "suggested that Robertson was losing religious and political influence as a result of his remarks on Sharon and other recent controversial comments."

WPost Faults Robertson. The Washington Post (1/7, A16, 744K) editorializes Pat Robertson and Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "are probably beyond the point where they can be reached by embarrassment or shame. But they are not beyond the kind of strong condemnation that they have richly earned." They "share a self-righteousness that blinds them to the distance that they have placed between themselves and the majority of people who find their remarks repulsive. It's sufficient to know, we suppose, that at a time when messages of hope are flowing from around the world to the bedside of Ariel Sharon, Pat Robertson and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad still have each other."

Efforts Intensify To Gain Russian, Chinese Support For Curbing Iran. The New York Times (1/7, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "The United States joined with several European allies on Friday in a drive to enlist Russian and Chinese support to apply new pressure on Iran to halt its suspected nuclear weapons activities" with the aim of "stopping Iran from resuming 'research' on enriching uranium." Attempts "to produce a unified declaration by the permanent members of the Security Council…intensified this week in response to a series of incendiary comments by Iranian leaders about Israel and their nuclear program." Officials say " the Russians have moved closer to the American view, in part because Iran rebuffed a Russian compromise proposal to establish a joint Russian-Iranian uranium enrichment program, but on Russian soil." Also, a European diplomat "said that Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, was himself angered by the behavior of a top Iranian envoy in a meeting this week in Vienna."

Reuters (1/7) adds, "In an effort to bring new pressure in the hours before Tehran takes what could be a fateful step, the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China were working on a statement opposing the Iranian move and urging that Tehran return to negotiations on a compromise proposal."

Bush Will Sign Peru Trade Agreement. The AP (1/7) reports, "President Bush on Friday notified Congress of his plan to sign a trade agreement with Peru," hammered out in December "after Colombia and Ecuador halted discussions with Washington on what was expected to be a regional agreement linking all three countries with the United States," complaining "that the strong desire by Peru for a deal had strengthened the U.S. bargaining position at their expense." However, "ratification by Congress could be complicated by November's midterm elections."

Europe On "High Alert" With New Turkish Cases Of Bird Flu. The New York Times (1/7, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "Health officials in Europe said Friday that they were on 'high alert' as a third child in eastern Turkey was confirmed to have bird flu and more than two dozen people there were under observation at a local hospital, an unusual cluster of human cases that raised the possibility that the virus had become more contagious to humans." While scientists say the cluster "probably stemmed from people handling the same sick birds," both "the W.H.O. and the European Commission were alarmed enough to dispatch a joint team of scientists to eastern Turkey this week."

Reuters (1/7, Yukselbaba) adds, "A third child from the same family in eastern Turkey died from bird flu on Friday and health experts plan to study the outbreak for signs the virus was passing from person to person." While the WHO said in a statement dated Thursday that Turkish authorities had told it that the district had been placed under quarantine, with no people or animals allowed to move in or out," a Reuters reporter "saw no controls" the next day. The Washington Times/AP (1/7, Harvey) also covered this story.

At Government's Request, UN Stops North Koreans Food Aid. The New York Times (1/7, Brooke, 1.19M) reports, "The United Nations World Food Program, which was helping to feed a third of the 22 million people of North Korea as recently as August, has ended all feeding programs there at the request of the government," which "justified the shutdown by saying that after a decade of receiving Western aid they want Western groups to shift to work that will help the nation become more developed." However, "many foreign analysts say the secretive nation's rulers are pursuing a strategy to cut the number of Westerners roaming the countryside inspecting food distribution networks," as "food aid from China and South Korea rose."

Former Ukraine PM Attacks Gas Deal. The New York Times (1/7, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Ukraine's former prime minister, Yulia V. Tymoshenko, who was a driving force behind last winter's Orange Revolution, is emerging as a leading critic of the intricate commercial deal that ended the gas dispute between Ukraine and Russia." While "Ukraine was widely seen as a winner in the dispute," Tymoshenko vowed to "work to scuttle the deal because it transfers control of energy imports to a company she calls corrupt" – RosUkrEnergo - which "has been criticized for ties to organized crime." Tymoshenko's "opposition adds another layer of uncertainty to the settlement."

Russia Trying To Control Gas Distribution. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Murphy, 958K) reports, "Russia denied Friday that its temporary cutoff of natural gas to Ukraine last week in a pricing dispute raised doubts about its ability to act as a responsible energy supplier to Europe. But a Foreign Ministry official acknowledged that there were

'certainly … political factors' in Moscow's aim to maintain a strategic route for transporting gas to Western Europe." Spokesman Alexei Sazonov said "Russia's real political interests involved Moscow's ambition to move to a market-based, commercially viable relationship with its energy clients and assure that its products have an uninterrupted supply line to the West" as Russia's moves "to gain control of the pipelines that carry fuel supplies to foreign markets."

Russia Professes Puzzlement At Rice's Comments. The Washington Post (1/7, Finn, 744K) reports, "The Russian Foreign Ministry said Friday it was puzzled and surprised by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comments that Russia's temporary cutoff of gas supplies to Ukraine was 'politically motivated,'" adding, "It is absolutely unclear what these statements are based on."

Other Countries' Trade Undercuts US Sanctions Against Burma. The Washington Post (1/7, A11, Sipress, 744K) reports, "Burmese industry and exports were on the decline in the 1990s as a result of progressive attempts by the United States to tighten economic sanctions on Burma, protesting its suppression of democracy. But the effort to pressure its rulers has been vastly undercut by the enthusiasm of other countries, especially Burma's Asian neighbors, to tap its cheap workforce and abundant natural resources." While "some of the trade is legal," many "products are also smuggled across Burma's remote, unsettled borders," then "relabeled and shipped beyond the region."

Chavez To Expand Discount Fuel For US Families. The Miami Herald (1/7, Wilson, 323K) reports that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "is expanding a heating oil program that offers discounts as high as 40 percent to low-income U.S. families." Currently in Boston and New York, it "will be extended next week to Maine and Rhode Island," as well as the "neighborhoods in Harlem and Queens" of New York City. "The program thrusts Chávez into the U.S. political debate over whether President George W. Bush is doing enough to help poor Americans cope with soaring heating costs."

Elections Not Expected To Help Haiti. Newsweek (1/7, Beith) reports, "Haiti has postponed elections for the fourth time since November. But a national vote is unlikely to solve the troubled country's many problems," as "even if free and fair elections do go ahead in the near future, there's little hope for a period of peace and prosperity." However, "the U.S. State Department repeated a familiar mantra. 'We believe it is essential that elections move forward.'"

Merkel To Draft Energy Strategy. The Financial Times (1/7, Benoit) reports, "Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, is to draft a 'national energy strategy' prompted by concern about the security of supplies after the recent dispute between Russia and Ukraine over natural gas shipments," and "in response to ever more pressing demands from experts and politicians that a security element should be added to the economic and environmental approaches that have governed energy policy until now." She "will then convene an 'energy summit' between government and companies in March to agree on measures – from diversifying suppliers to increased use of renewable sources – aimed at securing future energy needs."

Caldwell Says Germans Rejecting "Citizenship Of The World." Christopher Caldwell writes in his column in the Financial Times (1/7), "More and more westerners today consider themselves citizens of the world" where "loyalty is owed not to local ways but to multinational organisations and the norms of human rights. This idea of citizenship has proceeded further in Germany than any place else," but ". if today's enlightened, democratic Germans dislike this neutral citizenship-of-the-world, then nobody else is likely to be able to tolerate it, either. One reason why is that it is never as neutral as it looks. It immediately surrenders to any rival affiliation that makes non-negotiable demands." In the end, "Germans are right to conclude that that is a deficient form of citizenship indeed."

TERRORISM NEWS:

CRS Report Challenges Legality Of NSA Terrorist Monitoring Program. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Leonnig, 744K) in a front page story reports, "A report by Congress's research arm concluded yesterday that the administration's justification for the warrantless eavesdropping authorized by President Bush conflicts with existing law and hinges on weak legal arguments." The CRS report "rebuts the central assertions made recently by Bush and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales about the president's authority to order secret intercepts of telephone and e-mail exchanges between people inside the United States and their contacts abroad." The "nonpartisan assessment" prompted "Democratic lawmakers and civil liberties advocates to repeat calls yesterday for Congress to conduct hearings on the monitoring program and attempt to halt it." It

The New York Times (1/7, A1, Lichtblau, Shane, 1.19M) in a front page story says the report, "requested by several members of Congress, reached no bottom-line conclusions on the legality of the program, in part because it said so many details remained classified. But it raised numerous doubts about the power to bypass Congress in ordering such operations, saying the legal rationale 'does not seem to be as well grounded' as the administration's lawyers have argued." In addition to Democrats, former 9/11 Commission co-chairman Thomas Kean "weighed in for the first time in the debate. Mr. Kean said he counted himself among those who doubted the legality of the program. He said in an interview that the administration did not inform his commission about the program and that he wished it had."

Knight Ridder (1/7, Landay) notes the report "said Congress passed an amendment to a 1968 law and included language in FISA that made the act the 'exclusive means' by which the government could conduct electronic surveillance." And it "found that while gathering intelligence is 'an important facet of fighting a battle, it is not clear that the collection of intelligence constitutes a use of force.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Gorman, 958K) reports, "The report's authors conclude that, based on what is now known about the secret NSA operation, 'it appears unlikely' that a court would find that Congress had given Bush the authority to initiate such a program." The authors "said the Bush administration's argument, taken to its logical conclusion, would put no limit on what the government could do. In addition, they said: 'It is not clear that the collection of intelligence constitutes a use of force.'

The AP (1/7, Shrader) quotes Sen. Frank Lautenberg saying "It looks like the president's wiretapping was not only illegal, but likely targeted innocent Americans who did nothing more than place a phone call." Bloomberg (1/7, Bliss) also reports on the CRS report.

Cheney Rationale For NSA Monitoring Questioned. Wall Street Journal national political editor John Harwood said on PBS's Now (1/6, Matthews) "I certainly hope that Charles and Dick Cheney are right, that it's not an accident we haven't been attacked again. But it seems a bit of a stretch to say that the avoiding the FISA court in making these decisions unilaterally is the difference between being serious and not serious in the war on terror."

Washington Post Political Editor John Harris said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/6, Matthews), referring to the note Sen. Rockefeller wrote in longhand to Vice President Cheney saying he had great misgivings in the briefing he'd gotten on the domestic surveillance, that Cheney "didn't care. It's not really oversight. In very general terms, it's sort of telling them what they're doing but not asking for permission."

Chris Matthews commented on MSNBC's Hardball (1/6, Matthews), that "I'm sure that [note] ruined Dick Cheney's day."

Roberts Criticizes Continued Public Airing Of NSA Debate. The Kansas City Star (1/7, Helling, 286K) reports, "The continuing focus on a controversial federal eavesdropping program could 'endanger American lives,' Sen. Pat Roberts said Friday. 'What I'm worried about is the al-Qaida reading all of these press accounts as a cascade of further stories and speculation come out, and we lose the capability (of NSA communication intercepts),' said the Intelligence Committee chairman, who has been regularly briefed on the program."

NSA Director Rejects Concerns About Terrorist Monitoring Program. Reuters (1/7) reports NSA Director Lt. Gen. Keith Alexander "told employees last month that NSA officials had not violated U.S. law by participating in an agency program that eavesdrops on U.S. citizens without judicial oversight, newly released documents show." In a December 22 message Alexander said, "Media coverage surmises that administration and agency officials may have acted unlawfully -- notions I reject, categorically!" He added, "Overall, we are not concerned. … Our operations are carefully deliberated and measured; they are within the law; and they are nobly executed with strict oversight."

Administration Accused Of Undermining War On Terrorism. Daniel Klaidman in a Newsweek (1/7) web exclusive claims "the White House's devotion to presidential power has undermined the war on terror." Klaidman continues, "The administration's biggest mistakes in fighting the war on terror have been the product of a willful defiance of the traditional rules of warfare. Bush understood instinctively that the United States needed more creative thinking and a new flexibility to prevail against an enemy as vicious and unconventional as Al Qaeda. But a small, powerful group of ideologically committed Bush administration officials, led by Vice President Dick Cheney, had a more far-reaching agenda: to prove at virtually every turn that the Constitution vests in the president near unfettered powers in the conduct of national security policy. The principle became such an article of faith that upholding it often trumped the wisdom -- and necessity -- of individual policies. Playing out behind the scenes was a bitter struggle between the proponents of presidential supremacy during wartime and traditionalists, often career civil servants, who wanted to maintain the balance of power. A healthy tension between the two should serve as an important check on overreaching by ideologues or on the indolence of time-serving bureaucrats."

WSJ Defends Administration Authorization Of Terrorist Monitoring. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "The Bush Administration's use of warrantless wiretaps in the war on terrorism continues to generate controversy, and Congress is planning hearings. Some of the loopier elements of the Democratic Party have even suggested the wiretaps are grounds for impeachment. But the more we learn about the practice, the clearer it is that the White House has been right to employ and defend it." The Journal concludes, "The upside of the coming Congressional hearings, we guess, is that Americans will get a lesson in the Constitution's separation of powers. We're confident they'll come away believing the Founders were right to the give the President broad war-fighting -- including surveillance -- powers."

Bush Asserts Right To Bypass Detainee Torture Limits. Knight Ridder (1/7, Hutcheson, Kuhnhenn) reports, "President Bush agreed with great fanfare last month to accept a ban on torture, but he later quietly reserved the right to ignore it, even as he signed it into law." He "said he would interpret the new law in keeping with his expansive view of presidential power. He did it by issuing a bill-signing statement -- a little-noticed device that has become a favorite tool of presidential power in the Bush White House." He "has used signing statements to reject, revise or put his spin on more than 500 legislative provisions. Experts say he has been far more aggressive than any previous president in using the statements to claim sweeping executive power - and not just on national security issues."

Hayat Trial Set To Begin Feb. 14. The Lodi News-Sentinel (1/7, Bohm) reports Hamid and Umer Hayat "will stand trial Feb. 14. Over the objections of government prosecutors, a federal judge on Friday set the trial date…and also laid out a fast-moving schedule for pre-trial motions and hearings. Trial testimony will likely take 20 court days — not counting jury selection, opening statements, rebuttal and closing arguments — Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Tice-Raskin told the judge." The News-Sentinel adds, "The two men were arrested during an intense FBI investigation in Lodi. Three other men, including two leaders of the Lodi Muslim Mosque, were detained on immigration violations and have since been deported." The AP (1/7) notes, "Assistant U.S. Atty. S. Robert Tice-Raskin argued that more time was needed because some evidence against the pair was obtained using methods so secret that they can't be disclosed in open court or to anyone without a security clearance."

US "Leaning Toward" Al Arian Retrial. The AP (1/7) reports, "Federal prosecutors, still stinging from Sami Al-Arian's acquittal on eight terrorism counts last month, said Friday they are leaning toward retrying the former college professor and a co-defendant on charges that their jury could not decide. … Asked whether the government could start in late March or April," Assistant US Attorney Terry Zitek "said it was 'theoretically possible,' but that he would like more time to prepare. The judge said conflicts in the court's schedule meant the only alternative start date would be August." The Tampa Tribune (1/7, Silvestrini) notes, "Kevin Beck, a federal public defender representing Al-Arian co-defendant Hatim Fariz, said discussions are being held on 'ways we can avoid a trial.' He said his client will not agree to testify against Al-Arian. 'I can tell you that unabashedly,' he said."

Muslim Civil Rights Advocates Rally For Al Arian's Release. The Tampa Tribune (1/7, Silvestrini) also reports that at a rally outside the Tampa courthouse on Friday, "national Muslim leaders rallied to demand a resolution of the case. … Muslim civil rights activists from California and Washington shared the podium. Ahmed Younis, national director of the Muslim Public Affairs Council, said the Al-Arian case thrust America back into the court of public opinion. Younis said 'a tsunami came upon the Muslim community since 9/11.'" The Orlando Sentinel (1/7, Gutierrez) adds that "dozens of supporters as well as Muslim and Christian activists braved the cold, blustery winds to demand that he be freed. … Like other Muslim-American leaders who flew in from around the country to speak on Al-Arian's behalf, Nihad Awad said Al-Arian was the victim of a politically charged environment three years ago that resulted in the persecution of Muslims." Awad said, "Most of these cases are done for political reasons. ... I think the government is abusing the system," and "signs in the crowd included 'Liberty and Justice For All,' 'Free Al-Arian,' 'All Religions Believe in Justice,' and 'The Patriot Act is Watching You.'"

Spy Satellite Chief To Resign After Dispute With Rumsfeld. Reuters (1/7) reports National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency director James Clapper "will leave his post in June, officials said on Friday." He will resign "three months short of his fifth anniversary as head of the defense department operation, officials said." According to the Baltimore Sun, he "was being forced out after angering Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld on an issue involving intelligence reform." Reuters notes, "The Sun quoted an unnamed former official as saying that Clapper earned Rumsfeld's ire in 2004 by telling Congress his agency would not be ill-served by the creation of a director of national intelligence, or DNI, a post created by post-September 11 reforms that was initially opposed by Pentagon officials."

DOJ IG Inquiry Finds No Misconduct In FBI Probe Of Suspected Terrorist. The New York Times (1/7, Stout, 1.19M) reports, "Overconfidence in its own fingerprint-identification technology and sloppy paperwork contributed to the F.B.I.'s wrongly implicating a Portland, Ore., lawyer in the deadly 2004 Madrid train bombing, a Justice Department investigation said Friday." Yet the DOJ IG's investigation "said there had been no misconduct by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and no abuse of the antiterrorism USA Patriot Act in the case of the lawyer, Brandon Mayfield." While "Mayfield's Islamic faith was not a factor in the initial stages of the bombing investigation, when F.B.I. technicians erroneously concluded that a print found on a plastic bag near the Madrid attack scene matched one of Mr. Mayfield's, it may have slowed his ultimate exoneration, the Justice Department inquiry found." The FBI "said Friday that it was pleased that the inspector general had found no official wrongdoing and no violation of the antiterrorism law."

The Washington Post (1/7, A6, Eggen, 744K) reports, "One of Mayfield's attorneys, Gerry Spence, said in a news release yesterday that Fine's report shows 'the FBI acted with gross negligence' in targeting and arresting his client, and misled the federal courts in doing so." And "Mayfield was quoted in the statement as saying that the report confirms he was 'the victim of religious profiling.'" But the "FBI disagreed, emphasizing that Fine had concluded that Mayfield's Muslim faith was not a factor in the initial identification of him by fingerprint examiners. The bureau said Mayfield's arrest 'was based on an extremely unusual confluence of events,' primarily the remarkable similarity between his fingerprints from military service and the latent print found in Spain, which was eventually matched to an Algerian national, Ouhnane Daoud." The Washington Times (1/7, Seper, 90K), the Los Angeles Times (1/7, Tizon, 958K) and the AP (1/7, Sherman) also reports on the DOJ IG's report.

The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Zajac) reports that the IG's findings "likely will fuel the debate about adding civil liberties protections to the Patriot Act, portions of which are set to expire Feb. 3. … Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and a supporter of the the law, said in a statement the report 'should finally end the baseless accusation lodged by Patriot Act opponents that federal law-enforcement officials used this anti-terrorism law to violate the civil liberties of Brandon Mayfield.' … But Reps. John Conyers of Michigan and Robert Scott of Virginia, two top Democrats on the judiciary panel, wrote Sensenbrenner to urge congressional hearings on the report."

The Oregonian (1/7, Saker, Goldsmith) reports, "In a statement Friday, the FBI pointed out that after the Mayfield case, the bureau invited an independent board of experts to propose changes in how the FBI examines fingerprints, which the FBI has undertaken. … In addition, the inspector general's report 'found no evidence of misconduct on the part of any FBI employees involved in this investigation,' the statement said.'" The Oregonian adds, "The FBI did not use the Patriot Act to obtain the court warrants to spy on and search Mayfield without his knowledge. But the law did allow the FBI to share intelligence from the wiretaps and searches with law enforcers, which 'amplified the consequences of the FBI's fingerprint misidentification.' … The U.S. attorney's office in Portland wrote affidavits containing inaccurate and ambiguous information that led a federal judge to believe that Spanish police had agreed with the FBI's fingerprint identification of Mayfield when they had only agreed to conduct another examination."

California Father And Son To Be Tried On Terrorism Charges In February. The Los Angeles Times/AP (1/7) reports, "A father and son from Lodi will be tried on terrorism-related charges beginning Feb. 14. A federal judge set the date Friday over the objection of prosecutors. Assistant U.S. Atty. S. Robert Tice-Raskin argued that more time was needed because some evidence against the pair was obtained using methods so secret that they can't be disclosed in open court or to anyone without a security clearance. Umer Hayat, 47, was arrested in June and charged with lying to the FBI by denying that his son attended an Al Qaeda training camp in Pakistan during 2003 and 2004. His son, 23-year-old Hamid Hayat, was arrested the same day and faces charges of supporting terrorism and lying to investigators."

Padilla To Plead Not Guilty To Federal Charges. The Miami Herald (1/7, Weaver) reports, "Former 'enemy combatant' Jose Padilla next week will plead not guilty to charges he joined terrorists in an Islamic holy war abroad, his attorney said Friday outside the Miami federal courthouse. … But the criminal charges outlined in an indictment against Padilla are completely unrelated to the 'dirty bomber' accusation that landed the former Broward resident in U.S. military detention for about four years. … 'This case started in an unusual way, but I'm happy today it's in a criminal court proceeding,' said New York lawyer Andrew Patel, who is representing Padilla with the Federal Public Defender's Office in Miami. 'Mr. Padilla is being treated like any other American citizen in the criminal justice system.'" The Herald continues, "Padilla's status as an enemy combatant changed on Thursday with his transfer from a South Carolina naval brig to the Miami Federal Detention Center. The move was made immediately following this week's U.S. Supreme Court decision that allowed Padilla's transfer into the criminal justice system. The decision represented a victory for the Bush administration. … Padilla, 35, will have both an arraignment and bond hearing Thursday. He is charged with being a recruit for a North American terrorist cell with South Florida links that allegedly aided an Islamic jihad abroad. The trial is in September. If convicted, he faces a life sentence."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/7, Blum) reports, "One day after his release from a 3 1/2 year military detention, alleged al-Qaida operative José Padilla appeared for a second time in Miami federal court on charges that he was part of a South Florida-based terror cell. … The former Broward County resident seemed animated during the brief hearing, at one point turning to wave to his mother and two other family members sitting in the front row of the packed courtroom." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "At the start of the hearing, federal Magistrate Judge Barry Gelber informed Padilla, 35, of the accusations against him, including a charge that he was part of a conspiracy to 'murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country.' Then, following a request from Padilla's attorneys, Gelber postponed a formal arraignment until Jan. 12. … Prosecutor Stephanie Pell stated that the government intends to oppose bail, leading Gelber to say, 'Why am I not surprised?' The Sun-Sentinel notes, "The Bush administration has made it clear that it considers Padilla one of the most dangerous men in America. In 2002, federal agents arrested Padilla at O'Hare International Airport. At that time the White House designated him an 'enemy combatant' and claimed that the former Chicago gang member had plotted to detonate a radioactive bomb on U.S. soil. Government lawyers argued that Padilla was a captured fighter, not a criminal defendant, and could be held without charges."

Padilla's Plea Hearing Rescheduled For Thursday. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Dahlburg, 958K) reports, "Terrorism suspect Jose Padilla, held 3 1/2 years by the government without charges, was supposed to get his chance Friday to answer the felony counts brought against him as an alleged backer of Islamic war overseas. But the judge postponed the procedure until next week. U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry L. Garber rescheduled for Thursday Padilla's plea and the hearing to determine whether he should be freed on bond. The delay is to give newly appointed lawyers from the federal public defender's office in Miami time to confer with a New York City attorney who had already been representing Padilla. Andrew G. Patel, the New York lawyer, told reporters that Padilla, 35, an alleged Al Qaeda operative, would plead not guilty to charges that he and four co-defendants plotted to support Islamic jihad abroad."

UK Dramatically Expanding Automatic License Plate Recognition System. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Jordan) reports UK "law enforcement agencies are drastically increasing the number of cameras that read license plates and are building a national database that designers say will make it possible to determine in seconds whether a car zooming by has insurance, was stolen or was seen near a crime scene. The plate recognition system will rely on thousands of cameras on stationary poles and in mobile police vans, which will patrol highways and back roads. … Some human rights groups are fighting the new project, calling it a dangerous step toward a Big Brother society." The Post notes Automatic Number Plate Recognition system national coordinator John Dean "said FBI officials asked him about the ANPR system on Tuesday, and officials from Australia, Canada and many European countries have also inquired about it."

PATRIOT ACT:

Cheney Calls For Patriot Act Reauthorization In Speech On Military Base. The Lawrence Journal-World (1/7, Taylor) reports that Vice President Dick Cheney's visited Fort Leavenworth, "awarding the Combat Action Badges and presiding over a re-enlistment ceremony for five other soldiers." Cheney also "delivered a 20-minute speech in which he called for renewal of the Patriot Act, praised the assembled soldiers for their efforts and sacrifices, and told the audience of about 1,400 people that the United States would win the war on terror."

The Wichita Eagle (1/7, Cannon, Bormann, 98K) adds that Cheney was a "confident optimist" who "touted robust economic numbers," the government's "varied approaches to fighting terrorism," and "defended the recently revealed practice of eavesdropping without court warrants."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Vows To Strengthen Border Security. The Washington Times (1/7, Seper, 90K) reports Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "says he will crack down on alien smugglers at two border crossings near San Diego by sending more prosecutors to the area and providing increased jail space for those arrested. Mr. Chertoff's comments came during speaking engagements at the San Ysidro and Otay Mesa, Calif., ports of entry, in the same area where a Mexican national -- identified by law-enforcement authorities as a suspected alien smuggler -- was fatally shot Dec. 30 by a U.S. Border Patrol agent who the Mexican purportedly targeted in a rock-throwing attack." The Times notes, Chertoff "gave no cost estimates for the program and provided few details on how it would work, but he said it would begin in the San Diego area and later shift to other regions. It was unclear how many prosecutors would be added or how an increase in the number of cases they would handle would be financed with existing resources. He said the plan would include an increased law-enforcement presence on the border, renewed efforts at intelligence sharing with other law-enforcement agencies, increased technology and the use of dogs to locate people hidden in vehicles."

Local Law Enforcement's Cooperation Is Part Of New Plan. The AP (1/7, Spagat) reports Chertoff "has declared a crackdown on immigrant smugglers at two California border crossings from Tijuana, Mexico. … In a potentially controversial twist, Chertoff said Thursday state and local officials would participate in the crackdown. Proponents of tougher enforcement have long advocated a larger role for local law enforcement, but critics say local agencies should stick to fighting crime, not enforcing immigration laws."

DeLay Toured Border Region With Chertoff. The Dallas Morning News (1/7, McLemore) reports, "In an effort to take back the border from Mexican drug gangs…Chertoff rolled out the newest series of enforcement and security task forces here Friday. The latest effort in the Homeland Security Department's Secure Border Initiative will focus on investigations of cross-border crime by Mexican drug and human-trafficking organizations. It is modeled on U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Operation Blackjack, unveiled in Laredo last summer. And it includes an unprecedented level of interaction with Mexican agencies. In his first visit to the Laredo area, Mr. Chertoff took a tour of the rough terrain used by drug smugglers and illegal immigrants to enter the U.S. He was accompanied by U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, and other members of the Texas congressional delegation."

Katrina Recovery Chief Says Operation Was Successful, Given Constraints. Time (1/7) publishes an interview with Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen. Allen said, "I think we were successful given the resources we had" in dealing with Katrina's aftermath. He attributes his not becoming "a lightning rod for criticism" despite it being a "fairly loaded situation" to trying "to be transparent. And to make people aware of the constraints we were under." He adds that before our next disaster, "We need to create a clear command and control structure that runs from the federal government to the state."

New Orleans Delays Demolitions For Court Case. The New York Times (1/7, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that New Orleans "officials agreed in court on Friday not to demolish any storm-damaged houses until" a federal judge hears "arguments in a suit over whether the city can demolish houses without homeowners' permission." Demolition "emerged as the sharpest edge of an emotional debate over which neighborhoods should be rebuilt" and "is likely to remain an emotional flashpoint, pitting opponents, including housing advocates, politicians and some residents." The "sides cannot even agree on what constitutes a house," with advocates arguing that "piles of rubble" shouldn't be moved until "dispersed residents" get "the chance to search for their possessions."

The Washington Post (1/7, A2, 744K) adds, "The city reserved the right to clear away perhaps 100 smashed homes that were pushed by the floodwaters into the streets." Opponents worry "that the demolitions would destroy black neighborhoods, marking the beginning of what some see as an effort to push out the city's black population."

New Orleans Mayor, Council Agree On FEMA Trailer Placements. The Washington Post/AP (1/7, Deslatte) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and two city council members said Friday they have agreed on temporary housing sites for thousands of families that requested assistance after Hurricane Katrina. Gov. Kathleen Blanco brought in a mediator and representatives of the Federal Emergency Management Agency to meet with Nagin and the council members at the governor's home." FEMA's head "blamed the dispute" over placement "for holding up the placement of thousands of temporary homes."

WAR NEWS:

US Officials Seek To Create Split Between Iraqi Insurgents And Radical Terrorists. The New York Times (1/7, Filkins, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports, "American officials are talking with local Iraqi insurgent leaders to exploit a rift that has opened between homegrown insurgents and radical groups like Al Qaeda, and to draw the local leaders into the political process, according to a Western diplomat, an Iraqi political leader and an Iraqi insurgent leader." Battles "between Iraqi groups and Al Qaeda have broken out in several cities across the Sunni Triangle, including Taji, Yusefiya, Qaim and Ramadi, and they appear to have intensified in recent months, according to interviews with insurgents and with American and Iraqi officials."

US Commander Outlines Strategy For Bringing Stability To Iraq. The AP (1/7, Burns) reports, "Local Iraqi police forces will be re-established this year in cities and towns across restive Anbar province, where the insurgency had prevented it earlier, a senior American commander said Friday." In an interview Marine Maj. Gen. Stephen Johnson said it "will be part of a broad strategy for bringing greater stability to western Iraq, bolstering Iraqis' confidence in their new government and undermining the insurgency." The AP adds, "If successful, the addition of local police also would lessen the security burden on U.S. troops, who are training Iraqi security forces across the country so U.S. forces can begin to leave this year."

Eleven US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 4, :10, Vargas) reported, "In Iraq, the military said six more U.S. Troops have been killed, bringing to 11 the number killed in the wave of violence that swept the country yesterday. In Baghdad, thousands of Shiites turned out for demonstrations protesting suicide attacks that killed more than 100 Iraqis yesterday."

The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 4, :30, Schieffer) reported, "In Iraq today the military said that six more American soldiers and Marines were killed yesterday, most by suicide bombers or roadside bombs. That is in addition to a previous report of five soldiers killed yesterday. It means a total of 11, one of the worst days in the war for the U.S. forces."

The New York Times (1/7, Oppel, 1.19M) and stories from other sources report, "Thursday was the deadliest day in Iraq in months, as suicide bombers in Karbala and Ramadi killed at least 130 people. Among the 70 killed in Ramadi were two Americans -- a marine and a soldier. Shortly before the suicide blast in Karbala, a roadside bomb outside the city exploded and killed five American soldiers." And "the American military announced Friday that the previous day's toll also included two marines who had been killed in Falluja by small-arms fire and two soldiers who had been killed in Baghdad by a roadside bomb."

US Dismisses Concerns Violence Will Lead To Civil War. AFP (1/7) reports, "The United States played down a dramatic surge in violence in Iraq and said political progress would eventually defuse sectarian tensions. After one of Iraq's bloodiest day since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in 2003, a top US military officer said the violence would not trigger a civil war or disrupt political negotiations for a unity government." On CNN Gen. George Casey said the recent increase in attacks was "an anomaly." But experts have said the insurgency "remains as potent as ever and could get stronger."

Shiite Leaders Urge Restraint After Deadly Attacks. The Washington Times/Reuters (1/7, Jumaili) reports, "Iraqis buried their dead yesterday following a day of carnage that left some Shi'ite Muslims demanding revenge against the Sunni Arab militants they blame for a suicide bombing in their holy city of Karbala." But "Shi'ite religious and political leaders urged restraint, telling followers to place their faith in the next government, slowly emerging from the Dec. 15 election and set to be dominated by Shi'ite parties."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "Tensions remained high across Iraq on Friday as security was tightened around mosques on the Muslim day of worship amid fraying relations between Iraq's Shiites and Sunni Arabs." Yet "a measure of placidity returned to the streets, where at least 120 Iraqis were killed in suicide bombings Thursday, as clerics delivered sermons tinged with notes of defiance as well as calls for calm."

The Washington Post/AP (1/7, Quinn) reports, "The rallies and threats by the Iraq's largest Shiite religious party to react with force if the militant attacks continue have renewed fears that paramilitary militias -- now thought to make up part of some elite police units -- would take to the streets and carry out reprisals." But on CNN Robert Ford, the U.S. Embassy's political councilor, said "I don't think the Shiite leadership wants to slip into broader civil strife and neither does the Sunni Arab leadership." Ford maintained that the recent attacks "were a sign that the political process was drawing Sunni Arab groups into politics and away from insurgency -- which has angered radical militants."

Iraqi Leaders To Discuss Formation Of Inclusive Government. The Washington Times/Reuters (1/7, Jumaili) in an article on Iraqi reaction to the latest violence also notes, "After a series of recent bilateral meetings in Iraq's Kurdish-dominated north, political leaders have agreed to meet in Baghdad soon to push their plan for an inclusive government that includes all Iraq's sects and ethnic groups."

New Zawahiri Tape Claims Bush Admits Defeat In Iraq. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 3, :10, Vargas) reported, "Osama bin Laden's right-hand man Ayman al Zawahiri ridiculed the U.S. in a videotape that surfaced today. He says the decision to withdraw troops from Iraq this year a victory for the insurgency and for Muslims around the world."

The Washington Post (1/7, A12, Hernandez, 744K) reports on the video Zawahiri "said President Bush had admitted defeat in Iraq by announcing plans to reduce the American troop presence in the country, saying the move would be a victory for Islam." He "warned Americans that 'as long as you do not deal with Muslim nations with understanding and respect, you will still go from one disaster to another. And your calamity will not end, unless you leave our lands and stop stealing our resources and stop supporting the bad rulers in our countries.'"

Bremer Says US Unprepared For Insurgency. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/7, A4) reports that in an interview for "Dateline NBC" which will air Sunday night "L. Paul Bremer, who led the civilian occupation authority in Iraq after the 2003 invasion, told NBC-TV that the United States did not anticipate the insurgency in the country, the network said yesterday." In the interview he recount "the decision to disband the Iraqi army quickly after the U.S. arrival in Baghdad, a move many experts consider a major miscalculation. When asked who was to blame for the deaths of thousands of Iraqis and Americans after the official end of combat, he said, 'We really didn't see the insurgency coming,' NBC said in a news release." He "said he raised his concerns about the numbers and quality of forces with President Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and senior military officials" and "that he did everything he could do in Iraq and that 'the president, in the end, is responsible for making decisions,' according to the network."

Study Reveals More Body Armor Would Have Prevented Many US Casualties. The New York Times (1/7, Moss, 1.19M) reports, "A secret Pentagon study has found that as many as 80 percent of the marines who have been killed in Iraq from wounds to the upper body could have survived if they had had extra body armor. Such armor has been available since 2003, but until recently the Pentagon has largely declined to supply it to troops despite calls from the field for additional protection, according to military officials." It "shows the cost in lives from inadequate armor, even as the Pentagon continues to publicly defend its protection of the troops."

The Washington Post (1/7, A5, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The medical examiner study analyzed a random sample of 93 Marine deaths from torso wounds and found that 60 percent of the fatalities were caused by gunshots. 'As many as 42 percent of the Marine casualties who died from isolated torso injuries could have been prevented with improved protection in the areas surrounding the plated areas of the vest. Nearly 23 percent might have benefited from protection along the mid-axillary line of the lateral chest. Another 15 percent died from impacts through the unprotected shoulder and upper arm.'"

The AP (1/7, Burns) adds, "The findings underscore the difficulty facing the Army and Marine Corps in providing the optimum level of body armor protection in a war against an insurgency whose tactics are constantly changing."

Suth Korean Lobbyist Arrested In Oil For Food Probe. The New York Times (1/7, Preston, 1.19M) reports, "Tongsun Park, a lobbyist from South Korea who was a central figure in the Congressional bribery scandal in the 1970's known as Koreagate, was arrested yesterday in Houston on charges that he worked illegally to secure favorable treatment for Iraq under the United Nations oil-for-food program, federal authorities said." US attorney Michael Garcia "announced that Mr. Park was arrested in Houston by F.B.I. agents, but provided no information about how he was found. Mr. Park's whereabouts had been unknown since he was first indicted on April 14, 2005, for his role in the program."

Murtha Accuses Military Of Blaming Recruiting Woes On Him. The AP (1/7, Hefling) reports, "Rep. John Murtha says the military is blaming him for a recruitment slump instead of recognizing mistakes that have led to an enlistment shortage." Murtha said, "They're trying to direct attention away from their problems."

Civilian Killed By IED In Afghanistan. The Washington Post/AP (1/7) reports, "A roadside bomb blew up Saturday as a van packed with police cadets and trainers was driving through an eastern Afghan city, killing a passer-by and wounding a police colonel and driver, officials said." Officials "initially thought the blast may have been the work of a suicide attacker but later concluded it was a roadside bomb, said Abdul Jabar, a senior police officer in Jalalabad city where the attacks occurred." The AP adds, "The two wounded were rushed to a hospital in Jalalabad and were in stable condition. The other 18 people in the van were unhurt, Jabar said."

Dowd Criticizes Bush For Brevity Of Meeting With Former Foreign Policy Leaders. Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) writes, "It may seem disturbing at first, that with several hundreds of years' worth of foreign policy at his elbows, and a bloody, thorny mess in Iraq, Mr. Bush would devote mere moments to letting some fresh air into his House of Pain." Bush "just spent six straight days mountain-biking and brush clearing in Crawford. He couldn't devote 60 minutes to getting our kids home rather than just a few for a 'Message: I Care' photo-op faking sincerity?"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Wal-Mart Official To Plead Guilty To Defrauding Company. The New York Times (1/7, Barbaro) reports, "The former vice chairman of Wal-Mart Stores, Thomas M. Coughlin, has agreed to plead guilty to federal charges that he defrauded the company of at least $350,000, people close to the negotiations said yesterday." The Times continues, "Mr. Coughlin, once the retailer's No. 2 executive, was ousted last year amid accusations that he used fake invoices and misappropriated gift cards to pay for items like contact lenses and a custom-made dog kennel. … He has agreed to plead guilty to five counts of wire fraud and one count of tax evasion, people close to the inquiry said, and is scheduled to enter the pleas this month in federal court in Fort Smith, Ark." The Times adds, "Defense lawyers and prosecutors expect Mr. Coughlin to be sentenced to slightly more than two years in prison, said people close to the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation into the matter is still open. The court is also expected to order Mr. Coughlin to make restitution to Wal-Mart for benefits he received and money he misappropriated. … The guilty plea casts considerable doubt on Mr. Coughlin's assertion that he used company money to reimburse himself for a secret campaign, approved by senior executives, to pay union members for information about their organization drives, a potential violation of federal law. … Mr. Coughlin is still expected to advance that argument before a judge during sentencing. A person close to the matter said that the plea agreement explicitly mentions a plan to use Wal-Mart's money to buy information that would disrupt efforts to unionize Wal-Mart Stores."

The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Bandler) reports, "The deal, if it holds, will bring down the curtain on a bizarre chapter in Wal-Mart's history. Mr. Coughlin, a Wal-Mart legend who was a protégé and former hunting buddy of founder Sam Walton, left the company early last year amid accusations that he misappropriated as much as $500,000 from Wal-Mart through fraudulent reimbursements and improper use of gift cards." The Journal adds, "Although Mr. Coughlin took home millions of dollars in compensation, documents reviewed by The Wall Street Journal suggest that he secretly had the retailer pay for a range of his personal expenses, including hunting vacations, a $2,590 dog enclosure at his home and a $1,359 pair of handmade alligator boots." The Journal adds, "The most explosive aspect of the drama may remain unresolved. Mr. Coughlin is expected to claim that, in part, he was reimbursing himself for a secret scheme to fund an antiunion spy operation. … But federal prosecutors for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Arkansas have found no evidence that Mr. Coughlin was part of any clandestine intelligence operation directed at unions, according to someone familiar with the investigation. Wal-Mart has said it has also investigated the matter and found Mr. Coughlin's claims to be untrue."

The Washington Post (1/7, D1, Joyce, Johnson) reports, "Coughlin, who was the No. 2 executive at the company until January 2005, was ousted from the board last March over allegations of financial improprieties estimated to have cost up to $500,000. A six-week investigation prompted the company to fire three other employees. Jared Bowen, a former vice president who was fired, is suing the company, claiming he was fired illegally in retaliation for blowing the whistle on Coughlin. The company responded that Bowen participated in the same acts he challenged. … Wal-Mart's investigation focused on the alleged unauthorized use of corporate gift cards and suspect expense reports. The company said it reported the matter to the U.S. attorney for the Western District of Arkansas based on the findings of the investigation."

Five Indicted Over San Diego Pension System Scheme. The New York Times (1/7, Broder) reports, "San Diego's legal and financial troubles deepened on Friday as a federal grand jury handed up fraud and conspiracy indictments against five current and former officials of the city's pension system." The Times continues, "The charges centered on a 2002 decision by the 13-member San Diego City Employees' Retirement System to enact a plan to increase significantly the pension benefits of city employees, including all the defendants, while failing to provide sufficient money to keep the pension fund solvent." The Times adds, "Federal prosecutors said the five defendants had conspired to hide the details of the proposal from other members of the pension board as part of a scheme to enrich themselves and cover up the financial danger to the pension system posed by the plan. … The decision helped to push the city to the brink of bankruptcy and led to the resignation of Mayor Dick Murphy last spring. The San Diego retirement system now has a deficit of at least $1.4 billion, and the city is unable to borrow in the capital markets. … The local United States attorney, Carol Lam, said the five pension fund officials had violated their obligations to city retirees and the taxpaying public. … 'The defendants had a duty to act in the best interest of the city retirement system,' Ms. Lam said in a statement accompanying release of the indictments. 'They breached that duty by engaging in self-dealing, ignoring conflicts of interest and exploiting their positions to the detriment of the retirement system.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Perry) reports, "Former pension board members Ronald Saathoff, Cathy Lexin and Teresa Webster — along with former board administrator Lawrence Grissom and the panel's current attorney, Loraine Chapin — were named in a 20-count indictment charging them with wire fraud, mail fraud and conspiracy. … The five are accused of using their positions to approve pension boosts for themselves and others while saddling the system with a 'dangerous practice' that depended on a bull market on Wall Street to keep the pension plan solvent. When the technology bubble burst, the pension system's deficit ballooned." The Times adds, "According to the indictment, Saathoff, longtime president of the local firefighters union, received a pension boost of $25,000 a year in exchange for voting to endorse a plan whereby the City Council would continue to rely on the investment plan rather than increasing payments from the city budget. … Increasing payments to the pension fund would have meant cutting services to residents, a politically risky move. When the stock market declined, the council faced the prospect of making a $100-million 'balloon payment' to keep the system funded at the level the council thought prudent, the indictment said."

Causey Not Yet On Enron Prosecutors' Trial Witness List. The Washington Post (1/7, D3, Johnson) reports, "Prosecutors in the fraud trial against former Enron Corp. leaders have not yet decided whether to call the Houston company's former accounting chief as a witness, according to court papers filed late yesterday." The Post continues, "Richard A. Causey pleaded guilty to a single count of securities fraud last week. Representatives from the Justice Department's Enron Task Force said at the time that they were continuing to debrief him as a possible witness against former chief executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, with whom he had been scheduled to be tried." The Post adds, "Under the terms of his plea deal, Causey could shave as much as two years off a seven-year prison sentence if prosecutors determine he cooperated with their investigation. … Causey's name did not appear on a list of 61 witnesses submitted yesterday by government lawyers. But prosecutors 'reserve the right' to add others to the lineup before the Jan. 30 trial, they wrote. … In all, prosecutors cut 17 witnesses from an earlier list, an acknowledgement that Causey's plea allows them to sidestep weeks of complicated accounting testimony that might confound a jury."

2nd Circuit Rejects Martha Stewart's Appeal. The New York Times (1/7, Barbaro) reports, "As Martha Stewart served time at the red-brick federal prison in West Virginia, as she lived under court-ordered confinement on her farm in New York and even when she began politely firing aspiring employees on 'The Apprentice, ' she quietly pursued an appeal of her conviction, hoping to prove her oft-proclaimed innocence. … But it was not to be - at least not this time." The Times continues, "A federal appeals court yesterday upheld the conviction of Ms. Stewart, the founder of Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia, and her former stockbroker, Peter E. Bacanovic, for lying about a lucrative stock sale. … The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in Manhattan, rejected arguments, put forth by lawyers for both defendants, that their trial was tainted by prosecutorial misconduct, juror misconduct, extraneous influence on the jury and erroneous jury instructions." The times adds, "In one sense, neither Ms. Stewart nor Mr. Bacanovic had much riding on the outcome of the decision; both have already served their prison sentences. … But the appeal was a last-ditch effort - and by most accounts, this will be their last - to clear their names."

SEC May Delay New Trading Rules. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Lucchetti) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, prompted by Wall Street firms, is considering whether to delay new trading rules scheduled to go into effect this summer that, among other things, will require that investors' trades be completed at the best price that can be executed immediately." The Journal continues, "The SEC is weighing whether to give the firms another one or two months to prepare for the challenge of getting all their trading systems ready, according to people familiar with the regulator's talks with Wall Street firms about the matter. An SEC spokesman said 'the commission hasn't taken any action with regard to delaying the implementation dates' but declined to comment on whether the SEC was considering a delay. In addition to eliminating the 'best price' protection from orders handled manually on exchanges such as the New York Stock Exchange, the new regulation will alter the way dealers and exchanges interact. … Under the so-called trade-through rule, trading desks and exchanges will have to distinguish all their orders between those that are being handled manually on the floor and those that will be handled electronically. Manual trades won't necessarily get the best price currently available under the new rules. The other major change entails preparing for so-called sweep orders, which will quickly be sent across markets to get good prices when various exchanges have shares to buy or sell at a price that benefits investors."

Sarbanes-Oxley Said To Have Increased Class Action Suits. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "Should Congress ever take a break from congratulating itself on passing Sarbanes-Oxley, it might take a look at a new study released this week about the number of companies sued in securities class actions last year. The Members might then want to think about moving their money into bonds. At first glance, the study from Stanford University and Cornerstone Research seems to be good news, noting that the number of class-action suits filed in 2005 dropped to 176 from 213 in 2004 -- a 17% decrease. … So what then accounts for those 176 suits? Try . . . Sarbanes-Oxley. It appears the tort bar is now using the law's strict financial-reporting requirements as its latest excuse to sue. A whopping 89% of the suits alleged misrepresentations in financial documents, while 82% claimed false forward-looking statements. Lawyers have certainly used financial documents as a reason to sue in the past, but this year's notable uptick in the number of suits filed that cite this cause of action suggests that the tort bar has found a whole new line of business."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cunningham Said To Have Worn A Wire. Time (1/7, Burger) reports that sources say ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham "wore a wire to help investigators gather evidence against others just before copping his own plea" to taking bribes. It is unknown who he met with while wearing the wire and it "is the source of furious -- and nervous -- speculation by congressional Republicans." K. Lee Blalack, a Cunningham lawyer, "refused to confirm or deny the story," and "an FBI spokesman declined comment."

Politicians React To Abramoff Scandal By Proposing Lobbying Reform. Knight Ridder (1/7, Thomma) reports, "Politicians fearing fallout from Abramoff's criminal excesses now insist that they have to make the rules tougher." Although "Abramoff violated all the rules, many members of Congress say the solution to the scandal is to toughen them."

The AP (1/7, Abrams) adds, "Bills dealing with lobbying ethics that have been dormant for months are getting a new look as lawmakers digest the consequences of Abramoff pleading guilty to corruption and tax evasion charges, and his agreement to cooperate in an influence-peddling investigation that could taint dozens of members of Congress." House Republican leadership aides "said there was a good chance that lobbying legislation will get a vote this year."

Tribe Wants Politicians To Return Abramoff Contributions, Not Donate It. The AP (1/7, Gamboa) reports, "The Tigua tribe of El Paso wants campaign contributions it gave while employing disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff returned to the tribe, not given to charity. Arturo Senclair, governor of the tribe officially known as the Ysleta Del Sur Pueblo, said Friday that the tribe isn't demanding its donations back but that anyone returning money should check with the Tiguas first." Senclair says "the tribe needs that money," citing decreased federal funds and rising unemployment.

Feingold Returning Possibly Abramoff Associated Donations. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (1/7, Schultze, 266K) reports, "The campaign of Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) announced Friday it had returned four donations totaling $1,600 that Feingold had received from associates of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in 2002-'04" in order to "avoid even the appearance of a conflict," although the senator is "unaware of any connection between Abramoff and the donations to Feingold."

Charities Benefit From Divesting Of Abramoff Tainted Funds. The Washington Post (1/7, B3, Salmon, 744K) reports, "Charities in the Washington area and across the country are reaping the benefits of the Jack Abramoff case as legislators distancing themselves from the convicted lobbyist dump campaign contributions linked to him and donate the money to worthy causes." The charities argue there is "nothing wrong with accepting the money, despite its origins."

Tribes See Repeat Of Exploitation In Abramoff Misdeeds. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "Led on by what they say were his false promises of political access, leaders of the Coushatta Tribe of Louisiana, which is based here, paid Abramoff and his partners about $32 million for lobbying and other services," but, "by their accounting, they got very little in return. It was thievery, tribal members said, that echoes the historic losses of Native Americans to European settlers." Even more "rankling to many Coushattas" than the monetary loss "is the knowledge that Abramoff had, in released e-mails, referred to some of his Native American clients as 'monkeys,' 'troglodytes' and 'morons.'"

FBI Arrests "Koreagate" Lobbyist On Oil-For-Food Charges. The New York Times (1/7, Preston) reports, "Tongsun Park, a lobbyist from South Korea who was a central figure in the Congressional bribery scandal in the 1970's known as Koreagate, was arrested yesterday in Houston on charges that he worked illegally to secure favorable treatment for Iraq under the United Nations oil-for-food program, federal authorities said." US Attorney Michael Garcia "announced that Mr. Park was arrested in Houston by F.B.I. agents, but provided no information about how he was found." The Times notes that a new indictment unsealed Friday alleges, "Park began working with an Iraqi-American businessman, Samir Vincent, as early as 1992 to represent the interests of Saddam Hussein's government in negotiations at the United Nations to set up the program. … The complaint says that Mr. Park was paid at least $2 million, most of it in cash, by the Iraqi government. Much of the cash was delivered to Mr. Park in New York in Iraqi diplomatic pouches, the complaint says."

Reuters (1/7, Trotta) reports Park "was arrested…on accusations of acting as an unregistered agent of Saddam Hussein's former government among others charges," as well as "conspiring to commit wire fraud and to launder criminal proceeds. 'Park actively lobbied U.N. officials to establish the program, while extracting millions of dollars from profiteering Iraqi officials,' the FBI chief in New York, Mark Mershon, said in the statement. Mershon called the oil-for-food program 'a cash cow masquerading as humanitarian aid.' The U.S. authorities say Park met in 1993 with the high-ranking U.N. official at his Manhattan apartment to set the terms of the program. That meeting included an unnamed collaborator who is now cooperating with the investigation."

The Houston Chronicle (1/7, Ivanovich, Fowler) reports, "Park was arrested in Houston around noon, New York FBI spokeswoman Christine Monaco said. Bush Intercontinental Airport was Park's entry point into the United States. But Monaco could not say where Park was coming from or where he was headed. Park was brought to the Federal Detention Center in downtown Houston, where he will stay until an appearance Monday before a U.S. magistrate judge." The Chronicle adds that Mershon "said Park was 'instrumental in the corruption of the U.N. Oil-for-Food Program, which ultimately proved to be a cash cow masquerading as a humanitarian aid program.'" BBC News (1/6) also notes Mershon "said Mr Park 'actively lobbied' UN officials to set up the oil-for-food scheme, while ensuring he was handsomely rewarded for doing so by Iraqi officials. … The programme was 'a cash cow masquerading as humanitarian aid', said Mr Mershon."

The AP (1/7) and The (UK) Daily Telegraph (1/7, Sherwell) also report Park's arrest, as does The Washington Post (1/7, A18) in "Nation in Brief."

Former Chicago Forestry Official Expected To Plead Guilty In Hired Truck Probe. The Chicago Tribune (1/7) reports, "A former supervisor in the city's Department of Streets and Sanitation is expected to plead guilty in federal court to obstructing justice for directing an underling to lie to federal agents, his lawyer said Friday. Attorney Barry Pechter declined to say, however, if Bruno Bertucci, formerly with the Bureau of Forestry, has been cooperating with federal authorities. In September Bertucci was accused in a criminal complaint of sharing in a $5,000 bribe for arranging for the removal of two healthy trees in the way of a construction project in Lincoln Park in 2004. … The charges were an offshoot of the ongoing probe of the city's scandal-ridden Hired Truck Program." The Tribune notes, "A member of the crew sent to remove the trees later cooperated with the FBI and secretly tape-recorded a meeting in which Bertucci told him to lie to federal agents, according to the charges."

SCOTUS To Hear Search Case. The New York Times (1/7, Greenhouse) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed on Friday to try to define, more precisely than in the past, the emergencies that can justify a warrantless police entry into a private home." The Times continues, "The case is an appeal filed by the State of Utah from a Utah Supreme Court decision early last year that four Brigham City police officers violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure by entering a home to break up a fight.:" The Times adds, "The police, who went to the home in response to a neighbor's complaint about a loud party, did not have a warrant and did not announce their presence before walking through an open back door. They arrested three occupants for disorderly conduct, intoxication and contributing to the delinquency of a minor by allowing a teenager to drink. … The Utah trial court, appeals court and Supreme Court all ruled that the evidence of alcohol consumption could not be introduced at trial because of the illegal police entry."

The AP (1/7) reports, "States supporting Utah in the case are Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Delaware, Hawaii, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Vermont and Washington."

Maryland Governor's Plan Would Toughen Sex-Offender Laws. The Washington Post (1/7, B2, Mosk) reports, "Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. has produced a plan to combat sexual predators that would dramatically increase the number of convicted sex offenders who must submit to lifetime electronic monitoring." The Post continues, "Ehrlich presented the package of initiatives yesterday, saying he will institute some of them on his own and bring several others to legislators when they convene Wednesday for the start of the General Assembly session." The Post adds, "The Republican governor laid out his plans at Glendale Elementary School in Anne Arundel County, a school that was recently in the news when a quick-thinking secretary used the state's online registry to identify a man lurking on school property. She quickly alerted authorities, and he was arrested. … Among Ehrlich's proposals will be one that makes it illegal for a convicted child sex offender to enter school grounds without permission, or live within 1,000 feet of a school or day-care facility. … The governor's plan adds to a mix of get-tough proposals, including several from Democrats, that are headed for the legislature. All of them have drawn the attention of the American Civil Liberties Union, which plans to review them for constitutional concerns. … Ehrlich acknowledged yesterday that he expects resistance from civil libertarians but compared the trade-off to the one made when Congress passed the Patriot Act."

Mob Informant's Widow Sues Over Alleged FBI Agents' Complicity In Murder. The AP (1/8, Hays) reports, "No one disputes that Nicholas Grancio died in a gangland-style shooting. But a lawsuit filed by Grancio's wife, Maria, and an investigation by state prosecutors have renewed questions about whether the gangster who ordered his killing in broad daylight more than a decade ago had an unlikely ally: an FBI agent. The lawsuit, filed Friday, alleges that R. Lindley DeVecchio called off a surveillance team that was tailing Grancio in 1992 at the request of his trusted Mafia informant. … The case 'is about the corrupt and unlawful relationship between law enforcement and a ruthless killer and career criminal that went unchecked for years and led to the cold-blooded murder of a man,' court documents say." The AP adds, "Named as defendants are DeVecchio and a current FBI agent, Christopher Favo. The lawsuit, which seeks unspecified damages, alleges that Favo, at DeVecchio's direction, ordered the surveillance team to retreat." The Washington Post (1/8, A10) runs a truncated version of the AP story in "Nation in Brief."

New York Hit Man Claims FBI Agent Tied To Mob Slaying. The New York Daily News (1/7, Martinez, Sherman) reports, "Stone-cold mafia hit man Larry Mazza said he always knew his boss had a direct pipeline to law enforcement - he just didn't know it was an FBI agent." The News continues, "Mazza told the Daily News yesterday that he has agreed to tell a Brooklyn grand jury everything he knows about the relationship between his boss, Greg Scarpa, and FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio." The News adds, "Scarpa would have numerous conversations with an unnamed law enforcement snitch, whom Scarfa referred to as his 'girlfriend,' recalled Mazza, standing outside his Florida condo. … 'I didn't know who it was at the time,' said Mazza, now a personnel trainer and fitness buff. … 'We knew it was law enforcement and that's all we knew,' Mazza, 45, told The News. … 'The way it was done, we would pull over to phone booths. We used cell phones and two-way radios to be in contact with DeVecchio. It was a constant back and forth,' he said. … Those alleged conversations between Scarpa and DeVecchio are a focal point of the Brooklyn district attorney's probe into whether DeVecchio helped Scarpa murder rivals during the Colombo crime family's bloody civil war in the early 1990s."

Rowland Probe Reportedly Targets Anson. The AP (1/6) reports, "Federal prosecutors who sent former (Connecticut) Gov. John G. Rowland to prison are investigating whether a former public works commissioner lied under oath during the Rowland probe, The Associated Press has learned." The AP continues, "Investigators recently informed Tunxis Plantation, a Farmington country club, that they are preparing grand jury subpoenas for two of its employees, according to a person directly involved with the matter who spoke on the condition of anonymity because grand jury matters are secret by law." The AP adds, "Prosecutors plan to ask if former DPW Commissioner Theodore Anson golfed for free at Tunxis or received any other benefit from the company and compare those answers to Anson's grand jury testimony from the Rowland investigation, the source said. Beginning in 2003, Anson testified multiple times in the corruption investigation. … The Justice Department… declined comment but Assistant U.S. Attorney Nora Dannehy has said that investigators have not closed the book on corruption in the Rowland administration."

Warner Orders DNA Testing To Determine If Executed Man Was Innocent. Both CBS and NBC ran segments on Virginia governor Mark Warner's decision to do DNA testing to determine if an innocent man was executed in 1992. CBS included an interview with the governor. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 6, 3:00, Vargas) reported, "Virginia's governor Mark Warner has taken the extraordinary step of ordering DNA tests to determine if a man executed for murder was, in fact, innocent. Since 1993, 14 death row inmates have been cleared by sophisticated DNA testing. The Virginia case marks the first time the test could exonerate someone already put to death."

The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 7, 2:00, Stewart) reported, "It's been 13 years since the state of Virginia executed Roger Keith Coleman. It's now only a matter of days before they find out whether they killed the wrong man. New DNA testing could make Coleman, convicted of murdering his sister-in-law, the first man in the United States cleared by genetic testing after his execution. Outgoing governor Mark Warner ordered the tests as well as new tests on potentially thousands of other cases because he said, new science demands it." Gov. Mark Warner: "In my mind it was the only morally justifiable thing to do."

The Washington Post (1/7, A10, Glod, 744K) reports, "Forensic scientist Edward Blake kept vials of genetic evidence from the 1981 rape and murder of a young Virginia woman in a refrigerator at his California laboratory for more than 15 years. He even ignored a judge's order to send the samples back to Virginia because he feared they would be destroyed. … Ellen Qualls, a Warner spokeswoman, said yesterday that the samples Blake preserved are the only evidence known to remain in Coleman's case. Other evidence -- including blood-drenched clothing and other samples from the victim's body -- could not be located by Virginia State Police, Qualls said. Virginia law does not require evidence to be saved after an execution."

SCOTUS To Hear Death Row Inmate's Appeal Based On DNA Evidence. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Lane, 744K) reports, "It has been nearly two decades since the body of Carolyn Muncey was discovered under some brush. … Not long after her slaying, authorities charged Paul Gregory House, a paroled rapist from Utah who lived nearby, with her murder. In February 1986, a local jury convicted him and sentenced him to death. Long after the trial, DNA tests were performed on Muncey's clothes. They proved that body fluids on the clothes belonged not to House, as authorities believed and told the jury, but to the victim's husband, Hubert Muncey Jr. On Wednesday, the Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in House's case, the first in which a death row inmate has come to the high court with DNA evidence claiming innocence. The justices' intervention takes place at a time when DNA evidence may be changing the way Americans think about criminal justice, including the death penalty; last week Virginia Gov. Mark R. Warner (D) ordered DNA testing in the case of a man executed in 1992, to see whether he was wrongly put to death."

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS To Hear Several Important Business-Related Cases. The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Anderson, 2.11M) reports, "The Supreme Court's business docket has mushroomed into a formidable set of cases with the potential for a big financial impact on corporations and the way companies handle legal disputes. The beefed-up docket has evolved since the Supreme Court began its 2005-06 term in October, when the justices had granted only a few business-related appeals. Since then, the high court has agreed to hear several high-profile cases that, depending on how the justices rule, could have a major impact on the business sector. … The biggest cases include appeals on the constitutionality of state and local business-incentive tax credits, standards for civil racketeering lawsuits against corporations, rights of health-insurance companies to sue to recover costs from third parties and standards for patent injunctions in technology-innovation disputes. Other important issues on the docket deal with securities lawsuits, arbitration, wetlands regulation, campaign-finance spending, bankruptcy and employer retaliation."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Florida Courts Ruling Against Vouchers Compared To Segregation. The New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) John Tierney writes, "Democrats once went to court to desegregate schools. But in Florida they've been fighting to kick black students out of integrated schools, and they've succeeded, thanks to the Democratic majority on the State Supreme Court. The court's decision on Thursday was a legally incoherent but politically creative solution to a delicate problem. Ever since Florida's pioneering statewide voucher program began, Democrats have been struggling to deal with the program's success.'

Attorney Decries Attorneys' Fees In Wal-Mart Bias Case. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/7, Eric S. Dreiband, an attorney at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld who served as general counsel of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission from 2003 to 2005, writes, "Sometimes 'rough justice' becomes injustice. Dukes v. Wal-Mart, the largest employment discrimination case in American history, is such a case. It threatens to deprive millions of women of the protections of the civil rights laws, and to deny due process both to victims of sex discrimination and to Wal-Mart. Congress should enact legislation that clarifies the standards that govern in civil rights class actions so that these injustices do not happen again. If Congress fails to act, class action cases like Dukes, will continue to enrich class action lawyers and to deny civil rights protections to millions of Americans." Dreiband continues, "The Dukes case was brought in a San Francisco federal court by six women on behalf of an estimated 1.5 to 1.7 million women who are former or current Wal-Mart employees. The plaintiffs allege that the corporation engages in a 'pattern or practice' of sex discrimination in pay and promotions against women who have worked in Wal-Mart stores since 1998. In 2004, U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins certified the case as a class action, based on the theory -- really, a complete fiction -- that these six individuals could speak for millions of women they do not know, have never met, and will never meet." Dreiband adds, "In the more than four years since the plaintiffs filed the case, one story after another has purported to describe how Wal-Mart engages in widespread sex discrimination against women. The plaintiffs, however, have not proven that Wal-Mart violated their civil rights or anyone else's, and probably never will, because federal courts are divided about the standards that govern employment discrimination class actions and the law is in disarray. Accordingly, the case will almost certainly be settled before a jury hears one word of testimony, as Wal-Mart seeks to avoid the uncertainty of continued litigation. … And then, of course, there is the issue of attorneys' fees. The lawyers who brought the case stand to make hundreds of millions of dollars, perhaps more, while each class member will receive a small amount. Consider, for example, a settlement of $2 billion. This is a staggering sum, but, given that Wal-Mart's exposure exceeds $500 billion, a $2 billion settlement would be less than one-half of 1% of the amount sought. Each class member would, on average, receive less than $1,200." Dreiband concludes, "The district court described this as 'rough justice,' proclaiming that it was 'better than the alternative of no remedy at all for any class member.' The better approach, however, is justice for actual victims of discrimination, not a system that requires an employer to throw trivial amounts of money at millions of individuals and hundreds of millions of dollars or more at a few lawyers. This kind of 'rough justice,' under which any real victim loses her right to bring her own case for real justice while the lawyers become wealthy and move on to their next class action, makes a mockery of the civil rights laws. Congress should put a stop to this."

Florida Governor Names Prosecutor For 1964 Racial Slaying Case. The St. Petersburg Times (1/7, Heller, Brink) reports, "The long legal road in the 1964 killing of Johnnie Mae Chappell took another turn on Friday when Gov. Jeb Bush assigned a special prosecutor to the case." The Times continues, "Bush's decision comes despite another finding from the Florida Department of Law Enforcement that it would not be viable to bring new charges. … Bush assigned William Cervone, the state attorney for the 8th Circuit, which includes Gainesville, for one year. Cervone can request more time if he needs it." The Times adds, "The move encouraged Chappell's youngest son, who has tried for years to persuade authorities to charge three men in the killing. … 'The family is gratified that there's going to be a fresh look at the case by a special prosecutor,' said Robert Spohrer, whose high-profile Jacksonville law firm is representing Shelton Chappell for free. 'We hope that another grand jury will be convened because the first grand jury in 1964 found four men indictable in this case, and we have the same evidence today.'" The Times notes, "Bush's decision perplexed Duval County State Attorney Harry Shorstein, who had jurisdiction over the case. It is rare for a governor to involuntarily remove a state attorney from a case. … 'In my judgment it is outrageous to relieve someone who has as strong a record of civil rights prosecution and trial advocacy ... as I have exhibited in my career,' Shorstein wrote in a statement. … Mrs. Chappell, a black woman, was shot and left to bleed to death as she walked home from work as a maid for a white family. The killing came during riots in Jacksonville in March 1964 as black protesters demonstrated at hotels and restaurants." … A grand jury indicted four suspects on first-degree murder charges, but only one went to trial. A jury convicted the confessed shooter, J.W. Rich, of manslaughter, and he spent three years in prison."

DOJ Approves Changes To Louisiana Election Laws. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/7, Anderson) reports, "Elections law changes passed in last year's two legislative sessions have won approval from the U.S. Justice Department, including a measure to allow 'early voting' and another that would punish voter registration drive organizers who do not turn over the names of the new voters to local registrars within 30 days." The Times-Picayune continues, "Under the federal Voting Rights Act, Louisiana and other Deep South states must get federal approval to any changes in election laws or voting procedures to ensure that the changes are not racially discriminatory. … Jennifer Marusak, a spokeswoman for Secretary of State Al Ater, said the Justice Department blessing means the new laws can now be put into effect. Most were added to the books Jan. 1, but could not be implemented until federal officials approved." The Times-Picayune adds, "The 'early voting law' by Rep. Wayne Waddell, R-Shreveport, essentially repeals the statute requiring voters casting an absentee ballot to attest that they would be unable to vote in person on election day. … Officials said that many voters made up excuses for the sake of convenience. The six-day absentee voting period remains, beginning 12 days before the election."

ANTITRUST:

Alabama Hospice Groups Hit With Antitrust Suit. The Birmingham News (1/7, Faulk) reports, "A civil lawsuit claiming two hospice groups violated Alabama antitrust laws has been filed by a company that was denied state approval to build a 50-bed center for dying patients in Carbon Hill." The News continues, "West Walker Hospice Inc. filed the lawsuit Tuesday in Walker County Circuit Court against New Beacon Hospice and the Alabama Hospice Organization, its members and its executive director, David Stone." The News adds, "The lawsuit claims New Beacon and the Alabama Hospice Organization conspired to fix the price or limit the number of hospice beds for the terminally ill in the state. It accused them of restraining trade, or attempting to, and monopolizing or trying to monopolize hospice beds. … New Beacon, a nonprofit organization, is a ministry of Baptist Health System and St. Vincent's Hospital. Baptist Walker Medical Center, a part of the Baptist system, originally opposed West Walker's proposed center but later withdrew its objections in an agreement with West Walker. … West Walker is not suing Baptist because of that earlier agreement, the lawsuit says. But the lawsuit claims Walker Baptist was a co-conspirator with New Beacon and the Alabama Hospice Organization in attempting to restrict trade."

Ohio AG Not Interested In Fighting Newspaper Merger. The Athens (OH) News (1/7, Phillips) reports, "The Ohio Attorney General's office apparently will not try to interfere with a merger between two national alternative newspaper chains, though some observers fear the joining of the chains could eventually have fallout for media in our state." The News continues, "The Athens NEWS, while not directly affected by the marriage of Village Voice Media and New Times Media, has joined other independent alternative newspapers in expressing opposition to the merger. The deal creates a chain with newspapers in 17 major urban markets around the country. … 'It's further erosion of the diversification of media,' said NEWS Publisher Bruce Mitchell. 'The more chains that are formed, the less independent editorial voices there are. We're against the consolidation of media in general, and this merger specifically.'" The News adds, "The NEWS also has become a small part of the story, through an e-mail the paper sent to the Ohio AG expressing the paper's opposition. … In a letter to NEWS Editor Terry Smith on Dec. 6, Alan C. Witten, an attorney with Ohio Attorney General Jim Petro, responded to Smith's e-mail opposing the merger. … Smith sent the e-mail in response to a campaign by the San Francisco Bay Guardian, an alternative newspaper that opposes the merger and is trying to whip up opposition to it among independent alternative newsweeklies. … In his letter, Witten, an anti-trust attorney, noted that in 2003, Petro's office sued Village Voice Media and New Times Media over a deal the two chains had worked out to give each other alternative newspaper monopolies in two cities, Cleveland and Los Angeles. … Each chain ran a weekly alternative newspaper in each city, which competed with the other chain's paper there. The way the deal worked, New Times agreed to shut down its Cleveland paper, the Free Times, in exchange for Village Voice's closing down its Los Angeles paper. This left each chain as the sole publisher of an alternative newspaper in each city. … The Ohio AG investigated the case with help from the California AG and the U.S. Department of Justice. The lawsuit in Cuyahoga County Common Pleas Court was settled by a consent decree."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Administration Said To Have Relaxed Mining Regulations. Knight Ridder (1/7, Borenstein, Johnson, Mueller) reports, "Since the Bush administration took office in 2001, it has been more lenient toward mining companies facing serious safety violations, issuing fewer and smaller major fines and collecting less than half of the money that violators owed, a Knight Ridder Newspapers investigation has found. At one point last year, the Mine Safety and Health Administration fined a coal company a scant $440 for a 'significant and substantial' violation that ended in the death of a Kentucky man. The firm, International Coal Group Inc., is the same company that owns the Sago mine in West Virginia, where 12 workers died earlier this week. The $440 fine remains unpaid. Relaxed mine safety enforcement is widespread, according to a Knight Ridder analysis of federal records and interviews with former and current federal safety officials, even though deaths and injuries from mining accidents have hovered near record low levels in the past few years."

Investigators Continue To Analyze Mine Disaster. CBS and ABC both began their broadcasts with in-depth coverage of this week's mine disaster. ABC included an investigative report on the mine's safety violations and interviewed prominent financier Wilbur Ross, whose company International Coal Group, bought the Sago mine two months ago. ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, lead story, 5:30, Vargas) reported, "Families have claimed their loved one's bodies and union officials have said the mine was not operating safely. Federal investigators are on the scene. They are examining allegations of safety problems and they're looking into why it took 90 minutes for anyone at the mine to call for help. There is also new evidence about what may have caused that initial explosion." ABC went on to report, "Since the deadly accident in the mine there have been many questions about the people who own the Sago mine and how they operated it. A company called the International Coal Group took over the Sago mine only two months ago. But it appears its billionaire chairman was well aware of the mine's extensive safety problems."

The CBS Evening News (1/6, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "As the families prepare to bury their dead investigators are honing in on just why this accident happened, and if, in fact, the miners could have been saved after the explosion that sent the poison gas spewing in the mine."

NBC Nightly News (1/6, story 2, Williams) reported. "The company says it notified state and federal authorities within 45 minutes. But they say they will look at that timeline and see if time would have made a difference."

The New York Times (1/7, A1, Dao, Barringer, 1.19M) reports, "As state and federal investigators began a sweeping investigation of the accident, they have begun grappling with some of the most perplexing questions to have been raised about mine safety in memory."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Probes Virginia Gun Thefts. The Charlottesville (VA) Daily Progress (1/6, McKenzie) reports, "The Albemarle County (VA) police and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms are investigating the Thursday morning theft of $7,000 worth of handguns from an Albemarle County store." The Daily Progress continues, "The joint probe began Thursday afternoon after police officers responded to a burglar alarm at Mountain River Outdoors on U.S. 29. … 'The officer responded at about 4:15 a.m. and discovered the side door had been forced in and an audible alarm,' said Lt. John Teixeira of the county police. 'There were 13 handguns taken of a variety of sizes, from .22-caliber to 9mm and .40-caliber weapons.'" The Daily Progress adds, "A county K-9 officer arrived with a police dog but officers could not find any suspects, Teixeira said. … ATF agents are joining the county in the investigation and are offering a $5,000 reward for information that leads to an arrest and conviction, Teixeira said."

Stricter Federal Gun Access Laws Urged. In an op-ed in the Boston Globe (1/7), John Rosenthal, cofounder of the groups Stop Handgun Violence, Common Sense About Kids and Guns, and the American Hunters and Shooters Association, writes, "Given the huge number of easily accessible and virtually unregulated guns in the United States, it is surprising there aren't more than 30,000 gun deaths and 100,000 gun injuries each year. Most US cities have experienced an increase in gun violence, and this deadly trend is likely to continue until we enact uniform national gun laws that address easy access to guns by criminals and confront race, poverty, and the lack of economic opportunity in our poorest neighborhoods." Rosenthal continues, "Although Massachusetts has enacted one of the most effective gun violence prevention laws and initiatives in the country, it is surrounded by states where it's easy to buy and sell guns. Moreover, the federal government has allowed easy access to guns and actually restricts law enforcement's ability to reduce the number of gun traffickers. Indeed, there are no federal minimum mandatory gun trafficking statutes, and the US Justice Department requires that the FBI destroy National Instant Check gun purchase records after 24 hours -- making it nearly impossible for police to track gun traffickers and illegal multiple gun sale patterns. This is largely due to the influence of the National Rifle Association and the gun lobby over Congress and the Bush administration. As a result, what few national gun laws that do exist are rendered useless. Sadly, law enforcement is unnecessarily at risk because criminals have easy access to more powerful weapons than police are issued." Rosenthal adds, "So what's the answer to gun trafficking and the increasing gun violence in urban centers? … The federal government must enact uniform gun laws similar to what has worked in Massachusetts. … The federal government must also create economic opportunities, job training, and mentoring programs and close the 'equity' gap for the poor urban neighborhoods where virtually all the gun violence and gang activity take place. … These solutions require the political will and courage to stand up to the greed, ignorance, and shortsightedness of the gun lobby and their supporters in Congress and the White House. We must recognize that if gun violence were killing mostly suburban white kids and not urban kids of color, there would be an uproar that Congress and the president could not ignore. There should be an uproar to quiet the sound of gunshots in our inner cities."

IMMIGRATION:

Poll Finds Georgians Support Stricter Immigration Laws, Guest Worker Program. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/7, Campos, 430K) reports, "Do something about illegal immigration. That's the message Georgians are sending to state lawmakers, through a new poll conducted for The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. A majority of Georgians want the Legislature — which convenes on Monday for its annual session — to tackle the issue, the Zogby International poll indicates. Georgians support a high-profile legislative plan to bar illegal immigrants from receiving state services, and a strong majority — 80 percent — want employers who use illegal immigrants to be punished. But Georgians also support a federal proposal to create a guest worker program that would allow illegal immigrants to work in the United States for a fixed period, the poll found.' … Seventy-two percent of respondents said they support a temporary worker program that would require illegal immigrants to register with the government in order to hold jobs in the U.S. on a limited basis."

TAX:

Court Shuts Down Arizona Tax Firm. The Arizona Republic (1/7, Wagner) reports, "A husband and wife in Mesa (AZ) have been ordered to shut down their tax preparation business and provide information to the government on more than 250 clients who received unwarranted refunds from the Internal Revenue Service." The Republic continues, "U.S. District Judge David Campbell issued a permanent injunction against Beverly J. and Darrell J. Hill, proprietors of Superior Claims Management, according to a Justice Department news release." The Republic adds, "The Hills are accused of operating an Internet site, www.getmytaxesback.com, that recruited customers by offering to recover previously paid taxes. … A Justice Department complaint said they filed phony returns to obtain more than $1.2 million in refunds for clients, who paid a 25 percent fee for the service."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Seven Federal Judges To Testify On Behalf Of Alito. The New York Times (1/7, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "In an unusual move, Senate Republicans have called seven federal judges, all of them colleagues of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. on the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, to testify as character witnesses for him next week at his Supreme Court confirmation hearings. It is rare for sitting federal judges to testify on behalf of judicial nominees, not to mention a Supreme Court nominee. Rarer still is the appearance of an entire panel of judges." The Times notes, "The judges' testimony could shed light on one area of controversy, Judge Alito's failure to recuse himself from cases involving Vanguard, a mutual fund company that manages his investments, as he had earlier pledged to do. One judge, Judge Edward R. Becker, said he intended to raise the Vanguard issue.

The AP (1/7, Espo) reports, "The decision also raises the possibility that Democrats on the panel will be able to question Anthony J. Scirica, chief judge of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, about instances in which Alito participated in cases involving an investment company despite once having promised to avoid them."

The Washington Post (1/7, A5, Babington, 744K) reports Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter " said yesterday that he agreed to allow the judges…to address the panel because they can speak to some of the most contentious issues surrounding the nominee. 'They will testify about his approach to judging, as to whether he has an agenda, as to whether he is ideological, whether he pushes any specific point of view,' Specter said in an interview." The Post adds, "Specter said he sees no conflict of interest for either Alito -- who, if confirmed, would review the rulings of the judges expected to praise him next week -- or for the judges, who might want warm ties with a Supreme Court justice able to rule on their decisions that are appealed to the nation's highest court."

Senators From Both Parties To "Grill" Alito On Executive Power Questions. Knight Ridder (1/7, Kuhnhenn, Henderson) reports Alito's confirmation hearings "will thrust him into a confrontation over whether a president can ignore Congress in the name of fighting terrorism. … Senators from both parties will grill Alito over the reach of executive power and the tension between national security and civil liberties. … Two days after Bush acknowledged the secret surveillance program, Specter was the first Judiciary Committee member to put Alito on notice in writing that he would be questioned about the limits of presidential power during times of war. Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a Judiciary Committee member, also said he intends to focus questions on issues of executive power."

The AP (1/7, Holland), in a piece titled, "What To Expect From Alito Hearings," reports, "The questioning of Alito is likely to be more intense than it was in September for Chief Justice John Roberts since Alito would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate swing vote and the court's first female justice. Alito has been a federal appellate judge for 15 years and has written considerably more opinions than Roberts. … Alito also was clearer about his opinions on abortion than Roberts was as a young government lawyer."

Anti-Alito Groups To Run Ads In States With Centrist Democratic Senators. The AP (1/7, Espo) reports, "Republicans hold the upper hand in their drive to confirm Alito. GOP strategists have said they remain concerned about no more than three members of their own party as they look ahead to a final confirmation vote in the Senate, Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Maine Sens. Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe. On the other hand, groups working to maximize opposition to Alito have indicated concerns about the intentions of six or more Democrats, most if not all of them from Republican-leaning states. Underscoring the concern, Independentcourt.org said that in addition to airing on cable television nationwide, its new ad would run in Arkansas and South Dakota, with three Democratic senators between them. Similarly, the group said it will run radio ads on African-American stations in Louisiana, which has one Democratic senator, as well as Arkansas."

Alito Opponents Protest In Florida. The Miami Herald (1/7, Olkon) reports, "With confirmation hearings for U.S. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito set to begin Monday, local leaders from the NAACP and the National Organization for Women met at the U.S. courthouse on Broward Boulevard to protest his candidacy." The Herald continues, "A coalition of liberal groups are campaigning to stop the federal appeals court judge from Philadelphia from taking the seat occupied by retiring Supreme Court Judge Sandra Day O'Connor. … 'Given Judge Alito's past indifference to the impact race and racism has on our society, the NAACP is firmly and formally opposing his nomination,' Fort Lauderdale NAACP President Marsha Ellison said Friday." The Herald adds, "During his tenure at the Justice Department in the 1980s, Alito wrote of an opposition to 'racial quotas.' … A Knight Ridder review of Alito's published opinions found that he seldom sided with an employee alleging discrimination. … Ellison was joined by Juvais J. Harrington, president of the Miami-Dade branch of the NAACP, Brad Brown, the political action chair of the NAACP in Miami-Dade and Bertha E. Smith, president of the Broward chapter of NOW. Smith said her primary fear is that Alito would work to reverse the 1973 Roe v. Wade abortion ruling."

Democrats Announce Their Witness List. Reuters (1/7, Ferraro) notes, "Democrats announced their list of witnesses on Thursday. They include include a constitutional law expert, a veteran civil rights lawyer and Kate Michelman, a former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights group. They also called John Flym, a retired law professor who represented a plaintiff who sued the mutual fund company Vanguard in a case that Alito helped handle in 2002.

Dujack Dropped As Witness. The Washington Times (1/7, Dinan, 90K) reports, "A freelance writer who compared the Holocaust to eating meat in a 2003 column was pulled yesterday from Senate Democrats' list of witnesses who they want to testify next week against Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. The move came just a day after Stephen R. Dujack was announced as a witness and hours after Senate Republicans and conservative bloggers attacked his credibility for writing that the way people treat animals was akin to Nazis' treatment of Jews. … Democrats had hoped Mr. Dujack, who like Judge Alito is a Princeton graduate, would highlight the judge's former membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a group that Mr. Dujack said 'existed primarily to oppose the presence of women and minorities' at the university." Tracy Schmaler, a spokeswoman for Sen. Patrick Leahy "said in addition to removing Mr. Dujack, Democrats were adding two new witnesses: Rep. Debbie Wasserman-Schultz, Florida Democrat, and Theodore M. Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc."

Santorum, Dobson To Headline Pro-Alito Rally. The AP (1/7, Hefling) reports Sen. Rick Santorum and Focus on the Family founder James Dobson "will headline a rally Sunday for conservatives in Philadelphia one day before the start of confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito. The Family Research Council, which is backing the event dubbed 'Justice Sunday III,' said on its Web site that organizers were defending religious liberty and 'raising the alarm over liberal secularists' attempts to expel prayer and people of faith from the public square.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/7, Stoiber, 423K) reports, "Ministers from Philadelphia, New York and Washington yesterday criticized plans by religious conservatives to hold a nationally broadcast rally tomorrow at an African American church on North Broad Street on the eve of confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State in Washington and a United Church of Christ minister, called the gathering nothing more than 'a big play' by its conveners 'to gain control over the one branch of government they don't now control.'"

Alito's Background And Temperament Contrasted With O'Connor's. The AP (1/7, Holland) reports, "Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor have starkly different backgrounds and personal styles -- and views on major issues. … She's a former politician, known for her social skills and feistiness. Alito, a former prosecutor, is reserved and scholarly.

Thernstrom Defends Alito's Record On Voting Rights Cases. In an letter to the editor of the New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) Abigail Thernstrom, vice chairwoman of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, writes, "In 'Question for Alito: What About One Person One Vote?' (Editorial Observer, Jan. 3), Adam Cohen depicts questioning the one-person-one-vote principle as 'a radical position,' and suggests that perhaps Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. is 'an elitist' and 'antidemocratic.' And yet Justices Felix Frankfurter and John Marshall Harlan - no 'radicals' - both expressed deep misgivings about the Warren Court's mid-1960's apportionment decisions. The Constitution said nothing about mathematically equal districts. … Nevertheless, one person one vote is now settled law, as Judge Alito has said. Mr. Cohen argues that a Justice Alito might be able to 'forge a conservative Supreme Court majority to overturn the reapportionment cases.' The notion that either he or any other members of the Court would now move to undo the reapportionment revolution is fanciful - and irresponsible."

Kennedy Previews His Questions For Alito. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/7, 744K) Se. Edward Kennedy writes, "As Judge Samuel Alito approaches his confirmation hearings next week, the more we learn about him, the more questions we have about the credibility of his assurances to us." Kennedy specifically mentions Alito's DOJ "job application" from 1985, his membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton and his "failure to recuse himself in the Vanguard case." Kennedy concludes, "'Credibility' has rarely been an issue for Supreme Court nominees, but it is clearly a major issue for Alito."

Liberals Encouraged To Not "Bork" Alito. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) attorney Caren Deane Thomas writes, "When I recently received an invitation to a reunion of my Yale Law School class, it stirred memories of the astounding group of students I found when I arrived there in 1972. Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton are the most famous, of course, but my classmates also include someone else who has made news lately: Sam Alito. When Judge Alito was nominated to the United States Supreme Court, my fellow alumni began contacting one another, contemplating the elevation of one of our own to the highest judicial dais in the land. Sam was remembered fondly and with admiration. But an issue of conscience emerged - namely, whether respect for Sam could be squared with the deep qualms many of us feel about the Bush administration and its failings. One classmate sent out an anguished e-mail message begging us to fight at all costs a nomination born of such a regime." Thomas concludes, "The president took the high road on this nomination. He juggled his politics and his public relations, and while I don't like either, I have to be grateful for the quality of lawyer, and individual, who emerged as the nominee. We have to decide whether the unfortunate tradition begun with Robert Bork's nomination should be continued indefinitely or whether, with the wisdom of hindsight, we exhume it only when absolutely warranted. Liberals among us have got to get real - to press for the finest jurists a conservative administration is willing to offer, and to spend our capital in that pursuit."

Alito Compared To Brandeis. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/7, 2.11M) Princeton professor Ken Kersch writes on Woodrow Wilson's nomination of Louis Brandeis. According to Kersch, "The parallels between President Bush's nomination of Samuel Alito and Wilson's nomination of Brandeis, while not perfect, are instructive. The charges that the nominee has strong ties to a political movement, ties that will render him 'biased' in cases involving the most contentious issues he is likely to face, leaves today's Republicans nonplussed -- just as they did the Democrats in Wilson's day."

WPost Praises Some Of Alito's Dissents. The Washington Post (1/7, 744K) editorializes, "the many dissents of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. offer an unusual window into his judicial personality. In political terms, a preponderance of them are ideologically predictable -- that is, there are many cases in which Judge Alito takes an approach that would yield results more conservative than those reached by his colleagues and few in which he dissents from the left. In legal terms, his work is careful and measured, and while we disagree with his analysis in some cases, in others it seems admirable. … Judge Alito's dissents are not the work of an unblinking ideologue. He dissented, for example, on behalf of a race discrimination claimant concerning the length of a statute of limitations and on behalf of a claim of federal jurisdiction under a consumer protection law. He dissented on behalf of the plaintiff in a medical malpractice lawsuit in which the defendant doctors argued that the victim of their error, who died as a result of their advice, was foolish to follow it -- a moving rebuke to colleagues who overturned a jury verdict in her favor. Judge Alito's dissents offer much with which we disagree. But they are the work of a serious and scholarly judge whose arguments deserve respect -- a respect evident among his colleagues even when their positions differ."

Bush Credits Economic Agenda For Strong Economy. President Bush and a number of other top Administration officials launched a nationwide effort touting the Administration's economic policies and crediting them with recent positive economic developments. Media reports on the economy were generally positive. According to the Labor Department the US added 108,000 jobs in last month and the unemployment rate edged down to 4.9 percent. That job creation was much lower than expected, but the Labor Department also said the US added far more jobs in November, 305,000, than it had estimated. The Administration's efforts were widely reported in major US newspapers where Administration officials visited, but local and national TV coverage was limited. Both CBS and ABC paired the news concerning the unemployment rate in the US with reports on IBM's decision to drop its defined-benefit pension plan.

The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Many people are discovering that those new jobs do not come with everything they used to." CBS added, "Overall the economy added more than 400,000 jobs in November and December. Touring the Chicago board of trade today the President was crowing about those numbers." President Bush: "In 2005 the American economy turned in a performance that is the envy of the industrialized world." CBS continued, "But the jobs you find aren't likely to come with the benefits workers have taken for granted. IBM which funds the country's third largest corporate pension plan is the latest major company to freeze pension benefits for its U.S. employees. Big Blue will offer them only a 401 k plan after 2008. While the President said today…" President Bush: "We've got to have a private pension system that is fully funded." Bill Cheney, Chief Economist at John Hancock: "There is no guarantee the job you are in is going to last or even that the employer will survive."

The New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) reports, "The United States generated about 200,000 new jobs a month in the last part of 2005, a healthy pace that President Bush immediately used on Friday as part of a broader campaign to promote his economic record and agenda of tax cuts, tighter limits on government spending and more trade." He "and his top team spread out across the country on Friday to celebrate what administration officials see as a largely unappreciated success amid gloomy news about the war in Iraq, criminal investigations into prominent Republicans and a sense among many people that the economy is not as good as the numbers say it is." Bush cited "data not only on job creation, but also on gains in productivity and homeownership. Then, he used his appearance to demand that Congress extend his major tax cuts on wages and on dividends, capital gains and estate taxes."

The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Silva, Pearson, 643K) reports, "Attempting to make the most of mixed economic progress, President Bush came to Chicago on Friday with an impassioned pitch for the tax cuts he secured during his first term and a demand that Congress make those cuts permanent."

The Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) reports, "The figures offered a well-timed boost to President Bush, who touted them here in his latest outing in a campaign to convince Americans that his tax and budget policies are working, despite polling that shows widespread unease about the economy." But Democratic lawmakers "said the unease is justified, noting that job growth in December was slower than many economists expected and citing Labor Department data showing that, for the average worker, prices are rising faster than wages." He "did not unveil any new policies but called on Congress to make permanent many of the tax cuts enacted during his first term and to cut spending more."

The Wall Street Journal (1/7, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "To make sure no one missed the point, the White House dispatched 23 other administration officials to do the same thing around the country." The "extraordinary" effort was "aimed at closing what the White House views as a troubling disconnect between the robust U.S. economy and many ordinary Americans' wariness. That is especially worrisome to Republicans as they head into a congressional election year when jobs, immigration, health care and pensions are likely to be big issues." The Administration officials traveled across the country "to reassure Americans on their economic worries. But as their itineraries suggested, there are still a lot of sources of concern, despite strong growth and employment numbers."

The Atlanta Journal Constitution (1/7, Herman) in an article titled "December Job Tally Disappoints" reports, "Ruy Teixeira, senior fellow at the Century Foundation, in an analysis of the 2006 challenges facing Bush, noted that recent polls showed that six in 10 Americans rate the nation's economic condition as fair or poor. And more than half see it as a bad time to find a good job." But Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt in Atlanta "touted the economy's performance and discounted worries about a threat coming from a popping 'bubble' in housing." Kimmitt said, "It merits attention, but it does not merit concern."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Gerstenzang, Havemann, 958K) in an article titled "Job Growth Sluggish as Bush Trumpets Economy" notes that "polls indicate that a majority of Americans do not share the president's enthusiasm." Experts "said the actual state of the economy lay somewhere between the administration's rosy account and the Democrats' gloomier one. 'The surprise,' said Sung Won Sohn, president and chief executive of Hanmi Bank in Los Angeles, 'has been the resilience the economy has shown despite the hurricanes, the jump in oil prices and higher interest rates.' But he found some bearish signs in Friday's report, including a decline in the total number of hours worked and a shrinking share of industries hiring new workers."

Focusing on how Bush used his speech on the economy to contrast his policies with Democrats, the Washington Times (1/7, A1, Sammon, 90K) in a front page story reports, "Bush yesterday mocked Democrats who falsely predicted his tax cuts would ruin the economy and cited new job creation numbers as evidence that the cuts should be made permanent." He "also took the unusual step of resurrecting a quote from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi…who predicted in May 2003 that the president's tax cuts would be cause economic disaster." Bush said, "She said, 'Today the Congress of the United States will vote on a reckless, irresponsible tax plan that will undermine opportunity in our country.' … Since that congresswoman had uttered those words, the economy has added more than 4.5 million new jobs."

Similarly, the AP (1/7, Loven) says Bush "opened a sharp election-year attack against Democrats, who he said would devastate the economy and turn back recent job gains by blocking free trade and raising taxes." He "pulled no punches." His "approval ratings on the economy remain low at 39 percent -- close to his record-lowest rating in November of 37 percent." Reuters (1/7, Zakaria) reports on Bush's economic speech and the AP (1/7) also publishes a brief list of quotes by Bush and top Administration officials on the economy and the Democrats' response.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/7, Boselovic, 261K) reports, "The Bush administration moved quickly to seize the upper hand on yesterday's jobs news, focusing more on the two-month average than on December's sluggish job growth. President Bush -- in appearances in Chicago, where he touted tax cuts and other administration economic policies and attacked Democrats for opposing them -- proclaimed that December's employment report showed that the 'American economy heads into 2006 with a full head of steam.'" And Energy Secretary Sam Bodman "appeared at FedEx Ground's headquarters in Moon, where U.S. Reps. Melissa Hart, R-Bradford Woods, and Tim Murphy, R-Upper St. Clair, were hosting a regional summit on energy."

The Kansas City Star (1/7, Stafford, 286K) notes, "Various market analysts described the jobs picture as 'sturdy,' 'good,' and 'showing moderate growth.' The Bush administration seized on the report as more evidence that the economy was doing well."

The AP (1/7, Aversa) says "Bush, in speeches around the country, including an appearance in Chicago yesterday, has shifted into a campaignlike mode to shine a spotlight on the economy's good points."

Local newscasts occasionally reported on President Bush's speech in Chicago. The President was portrayed as pushing an optimistic view of the economy, although some stories said Mr. Bush was keeping attention off the conflict in Iraq. Some examples: KPNX-TV Phoenix (1/6, 5:09 p.m.) reported, "Shrugging off a weaker than expected jobs report, be President Bush headed to the Midwest today to talk about his economic agenda for the new year."

WBAL-TV Baltimore (1/6, 5:15 p.m.) reported, "President Bush and his economic team hit the road to try to pain a rosy picture of what he calls a strong economy." WVIT-TV Hartford (1/6, 5:27 p.m.) reported, "The President is pushing his plan to help the economy."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (1/6, 10:24 p.m.) reported, "President Bush shifted away from Iraq, speaking about the economy. The President expressed optimism about the economy based on the job growth numbers." KMSP-TV Minneapolis (1/6, 5:05 p.m.) reported, "He diverted the spotlight away from Iraq."

Administration Expected To Focus On Targeted Tax Cuts Rather Than More "Ambitious" Tax Reform. In a preview of the Administration's plans for Bush's 2006 economic agenda the Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) in its coverage of Bush's speech also notes, "White House aides continue to fine-tune the policy agenda Bush will unveil later this month, constrained by politics and a tight budget for nonmilitary spending. Bush advisers have shelved plans for an ambitious tax reform agenda, fearing it would flop politically, but still plan to roll out a few new targeted tax and budget plans in the State of the Union address."

And the Wall Street Journal (1/7, Harwood, 2.11M) reports that to sustain his upward movement in the polls, "Bush will promote his tax-cutting policies as critical to keeping the economy humming. After the failed 2005 attempt at a bold overhaul of Social Security through private accounts, however, neither the White House nor congressional Republicans have much appetite for the sweeping tax-code changes they envisioned earlier. 'The mood will be for what's achievable,' says Rep. Roy Blunt. … That means action -- before the April 15 tax-filing deadline -- on extensions of previously enacted cuts in dividend and capital-gains taxes, and a fix in the alternative minimum tax to shield middle-income taxpayers." The President will also "emphasize budget discipline. … If Republicans can hold together on final passage of last year's deficit-reduction bill -- delayed by a Democratic parliamentary maneuver -- the administration will begin the process anew with its 2007 spending proposal in early February. White House Budget Director Joshua Bolten hasn't given up on curbing the entitlement programs of Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security. But true to the sober zeitgeist of the party of 2006, he adds, 'Those changes can be effected in increments.'" But most important "is progress on the Iraq war, which soured the public mood in 2005. Successful Iraqi elections have encouraged the White House enough to announce a modest troop drawdown. Republicans believe that whittling down the contingent of U.S. soldiers will buoy Mr. Bush's popularity."

Bush Seeks To Contrast Economic Policies With Democrats. And the New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) notes, "Mr. Bush has been eager to highlight his differences with Democrats over economic policy. He has sought to set up a contrast between what the White House says is a job-creating agenda and a Democratic approach that White House officials say would lead to higher taxes, a further surge in spending on domestic programs and a drift toward protectionism. Republicans say they expect Mr. Bush to make those assertions increasingly in coming months and include them in his State of Union address, tentatively scheduled for Jan. 31."

Cheney, Top Administration Officials Echo Bush's Economic Message. Vice President Dick Cheney's remarks were briefly noted in most major newspapers. The New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) notes, "Bush and his aides have said…that the economy's performance showed their approach was creating jobs." At a Kansas Harley-Davidson factory Cheney said, "Some in Washington said these tax cuts would not work" and "it's getting pretty hard for the critics to make the case that somehow these tax cuts weren't good for the economy."

The Washington Times (1/7, A1, Sammon, 90K) in its front page story on Bush's speech also notes Bush's "comments were echoed by Mr. Cheney, who ridiculed Democrats during a visit to a Harley-Davidson plant in Kansas City, Mo." Cheney said, "The American economy is on the move, and that is because we did not listen to the pessimists." Sen. Edward Kenney "scoffed at such criticism," saying, ""The administration's constant response is to grant more tax breaks for the wealthy," and he "predicted the economy would hurt the GOP in the midterm elections." Yet "Cheney was unapologetic about the administration's demands that the tax cuts be made permanent, even hinting that additional cuts might be needed." Cheney said, "With the new year beginning, soon people will start receiving their W-2 forms in the mail. … It's always a bit of a shock to see how big a piece the federal government took off the top of your earnings over the past year."

The Atlanta Journal Constitution (1/7, Herman) notes that despite concerns about wages, "Cheney was greeted by workers happy about their economic situation. Kevin Herrera, a paint shop manager, didn't vote for Bush but agreed with the administration view that the economy is good." And "Craig Jenkins, sporting a well-worn Machinists for Kerry shirt, said, 'Yeah, right now everything is fine with my family.'" Yet, "Jenkins, still no Bush fan, said he knows many people are out of work and that the president has done nothing to stem the flow of jobs from America."

The Kansas City Star (1/7, Canon, Bormann, 286K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney on Friday came to Kansas City as the confident optimist. He touted robust economic numbers and the administration's varied approaches to fighting terrorism -- saying President Bush is to be credited for the country's post-Sept. 11 prosperity and security." One "official for the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers said that there was no campaign to organize a protest, and that the union has an agreement with Harley that it would not distribute political literature at the plant. But the union issued a news release that said Harley-Davidson's success has come 'despite Bush administration' policies that allow too many imports to flow into the country."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/7, Weber, 423K) reports, "The Bush administration needs to make sure its tax policies don't give younger workers less of an incentive to change jobs as they move through their careers, Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt said Friday." At "a Commerce Club speech in Atlanta, Kimmitt said that unlike a generation ago, people leaving college are more apt to work for several different employers over time rather than just one. That could make it harder for them to maintain quality health and pension benefits without the right government policies, he said."

The Baltimore Sun (1/7, Hopkins, 296K) reports, 'An economic public-relations blitz by the Bush administration yesterday included a stop at Johns Hopkins Medicine in Baltimore, where Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao promoted a jobs training program and the 'good news for America's workers.'" But "it wasn't ideal timing for the full-court press. Labor Department numbers released earlier in the day showed the nation's employers adding 108,000 jobs last month, less than expected and weaker than needed to keep up with population growth." Yet, "it came on the heels of a strong, 305,000-job increase in November…and so Chao accentuated the positive."

The Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) adds, "Cheney was touring a Harley-Davidson plant in Missouri and touting the economy despite a bad foot that forced him to use a cane. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and several other officials also fanned out to talk about low unemployment numbers and a growing economy."

The vice president's speech and motorcycle plant tour was often covered by local television newscasts in Missouri, usually in the morning before the actual tour. Those stations that mentioned the speech after the event often commented on Mr. Cheney's use of a cane. Some examples: WGEM-TV Quincy (1/6, 5:04 p.m.) reported, "Vice president Dick Cheney is walking with the help of a cane. He used the cane today as he toured a Harley-Davidson motorcycle factory in Kansas City." Later, the station reported that the Vice President, "credited…tax cuts for economic growth."

KRCG-TV Columbia (1/6, 5:27 a.m.) reported, "Vice President Dick Cheney will pay a visit to the 'show me' state today. In Kansas City, Cheney will tour a Harley Davidson motorcycle assembly plant. He's also scheduled to give a speech on the economy." The AP (1/7) also reports on Cheney's need to use a cane.

Wall Street Reacts Positively To New Unemployment Figures. NBC Nightly News (1/6, story 3, Williams) reported. "The unemployment rate ticked down. Wall Street liked those numbers. The Dow was up more than 77 points on today's trading. NASDAQ gained almost 29. For the week the Dow was up almost 242 points in all. NASDAQ had a good week, up 100 points."

Economy Strong Despite Hurricanes, High Energy Prices. In its coverage of the Administration's effort to highlight the positive news for the US economy the New York Times (1/7, Andrews, Stevenson, 1.19M) notes, "By almost all measures, last year was a good one for the American economy. The economy expanded by about 3.6 percent in 2005, the fourth consecutive year of solid growth, despite the soaring energy prices and the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina." But many experts said "that Mr. Bush's policies were not the primary reason for the economy's strength." Global Insight chief economist Narimen Behravesh said, "Tax cuts had very little to do with it. … You had a housing boom, which had very little to do with tax cuts, driving consumer spending. We also had before this year the dollar coming down, which helped drive up exports."

And the Washington Post (1/7, A3, Vandehei, Henderson, 744K) in its coverage adds, "The data reinforced other signs that the economy was growing at a healthy pace as it entered the new year despite the turmoil caused by hurricanes and higher energy prices."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 7, :10, Vargas) reported, "In economic news, unemployment fell to under 5% last month. The government said today that 108,000 new jobs were added to the economy in December. Fewer than analysts expected. Overall, 2 million new jobs were added in 2005, despite higher oil prices and the devastating hurricanes." ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 8, :10, Vargas) then reported, "Even with the solid economic growth, another huge American corporation is expected to phase out pension plans for employees. IBM announced in 2008 it will shift 117,000 workers from traditional pension plans to 401k retirement plan. The move is part of a growing trend by financially healthy companies to save money by eliminating lifetime pensions for worker."

Bush Acknowledges Loss Of Manufacturing Jobs. The AP (1/7, Carpenter) reports, "President Bush's choice of the Midwest as backdrop for a speech Friday touting the nation's economy put the spotlight on a region with an improving but still-mixed economic performance." The continuing "loss of manufacturing jobs has been a sore spot throughout the region, as Bush acknowledged." The AP notes, "Focusing only briefly on the Midwest, he pointed to the creation of jobs nationwide and the decline in unemployment, and said manufacturers will benefit if trade restrictions around the world are eased as he has urged."

Bush Calls For Passage Of Asbestos Lawsuit Reform Bill. Reuters (1/7) reports in his speech touring the US economy in Chicago "Bush called on Friday for Congress to curb asbestos lawsuits this year, saying the United States needed to reform its legal system to better compete in the global economy." He "said Americans needed to understand that frivolous injury lawsuits were a drag on the U.S. economy." Bush said, "To make sure this is the most competitive country in the world, we've got to get rid of some of these junk lawsuits that are running capital out of America."

NYTimes Dismisses Bush's Claims About Health Of Economy. The New York Times (1/7, 1.19M) editorializes, "Responding to yesterday's government report showing paltry job creation in December, Treasury Secretary John Snow urged Americans not to overreact to one month's snapshot, but to focus on the bigger picture. But that picture is not so pretty." And the long-term prospects are "even uglier. Job growth in the current period is the worst by far of the four comparable economic upturns since the 1960's: 2.7 percent versus the 7.8 percent tallied in the weakest of those earlier recoveries." So "President Bush cherry-picked his way through the latest economic figures in his speech yesterday before the Economic Club of Chicago, rattling off numbers without context. The president's prescription -- more tax cuts -- has failed in the past to create a robust job market and is still not the right answer."

New Medicare Drug Benefit's Roll-Out Beset By Problems. The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "After months of controversy the new Medicare prescription drug benefit has been getting its first reality check this week, ever since the law was passed critics have complained that it would lead to confusion. Well, for at least one group of beneficiaries that seems to be true." CBS went on to report, "It was a very tough week for low income seniors who were supposed to be covered by the new Medicare drug benefit. Time after time these seniors were told they indeed have insurance under the system, just not for the specific drugs they use. … When we visited Grubs Pharmacy two blocks from the U.S. Capitol, not one senior citizen we tracked had a prescription filled smoothly."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports, "California health officials reported Friday that database errors and overloaded telephone help lines were spreading confusion and frustration among seniors seeking vital medicines under the new Medicare prescription program. While some warned of a looming crisis, Medicare officials and insurance companies called for patience and promised swift relief. California pharmacists, on the frontline of the new program, complained that improvements are coming too slowly. … Most of those affected are low-income seniors and disabled people." The Times adds, "While acknowledging problems, federal officials defended the new program and said hundreds of thousands of seniors have been getting their prescriptions without incident, many at lower cost. The drug benefit is considered one of the Bush administration's main domestic policy achievements."

Knight Ridder (1/7, Pugh) reports, "Many of Medicare's poorest and most sickly patients are going without their medications because of administrative glitches, misinformation and confusion surrounding the new Medicare prescription drug benefit. Experts had warned that many of the 6.4 million low-income people who get benefits from Medicare and Medicaid could miss out on their life-sustaining medicines when their drug coverage shifted on Jan. 1 from Medicaid to private plans sponsored by Medicare. In interviews, advocates for the elderly as well as lawmakers and seniors themselves indicated that that's happening. … Medicare's contingency plan for patients who aren't enrolled in drug plans also is proving problematic. The agency wants pharmacists to give these customers short-term refills at no cost and bill Medicare later. But some pharmacists don't know about the agreement, and others are balking because they fear they won't be reimbursed."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/7, Wolfe, 424K) reports, "Medicare officials said Friday they will try over the weekend to fix problems that have left hundreds of poor Minnesotans unable to get their prescription drugs. But problems are continuing, with some low-income people on both Medicare and Medicaid – 'dual eligibles' -- struggling to find a pharmacist who will fill prescriptions under a new Medicare drug benefit that took effect this year. While other Medicare beneficiaries also are having some problems, the situation is acute for those who also are on Medicaid."

Grassley To Investigate Medicare Employees' Travel Expenses. Reuters (1/7) reports, "A top Republican lawmaker called for an investigation into Medicare travel expenses on Friday after documents showed some employees attended conferences hosted by contractors at a Florida resort. Medicare officials said they were taking the concerns seriously, but that the conferences were not very expensive because they were held in June during the state's off-peak season." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Sen. Charles Grassley "said the employees were responsible for overseeing $300 million in Medicare contracts to investigate complaints."

HHS Advises Americans On Avian Flu Precautions. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/7, A2)

reports, "There is no vaccine and drugs are in short supply, but Americans may be able to ride out any pandemic of bird flu if they stock up on supplies and keep their children clean, the government said yesterday. The Department of Health and Human Services checklist illustrates how little can be done to prevent widespread illness and disruption if H5N1 avian influenza causes a pandemic -- a global epidemic -- this year. … Experts say the best way to wait out a pandemic, which could last months, is to stay away from other people and keep close to home. 'During a pandemic, if you cannot get to a store, or if stores are out of supplies, it will be important for you to have extra supplies on hand. This can be useful in other types of emergencies, such as power outages and disasters,' the HHS guide says."

Federal Officials Seek Deal With Texas Food Stamp Agency. The Dallas Morning News (1/7, Dodge) reports, "Federal food stamp officials this week made a peace offering to their Texas counterparts that could avoid a delay in nutrition benefits to the state's neediest residents. Now, it's up to officials at the Texas Health and Human Services Agency to decide whether they will accept the deal. The state officials would need to sign an application that has been written on their behalf by officials at the Department of Agriculture's Food and Nutrition Service. If they don't, Texans applying under a pilot program set to begin in two weeks could see a delay of a week or more in their food stamp benefits."

DeLay Seen As Unlikely To Regain Leadership Post. The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 3, 1:00, Schieffer) reported, "There are some new developments tonight on the Washington bribery scandal involving congressman Tom DeLay. CBS' Gloria Borger continued, "Tonight two house republicans are circulating a petition that will call for new elections that would permanently replace Tom DeLay in the house leadership. Now sources close to the house republican leadership tell CBS News tonight that these new elections are all but inevitable. And that Tom DeLay himself is slowly coming to the conclusion that he is not going to be able to reclaim his leadership post."

The New York Times (1/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "In the wake of Tuesday's guilty plea to corruption charges by the lobbyist Jack Abramoff," some "rebellious…House Republicans moved Friday to bar Representative Tom DeLay of Texas from regaining his position as majority leader, demanding a vote to replace him permanently at the top of the party hierarchy." Arizona Rep. Jeff Flake and New Hampshire Rep. Charles Bass "began circulating a petition on Friday to collect 50 signatures needed to call a party leadership election," and have "commitments from about two dozen lawmakers." In an new election, "the rank-and-file could push for more if enough lawmakers conclude a broader shake-up is warranted," and "a divisive leadership battle has the potential to roil the House just as President Bush and Congressional Republicans are unveiling their election-year agenda."

The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Weisman, 744K) adds, "Prominent Republicans have begun counseling DeLay that he should renounce claims to the majority leader's post, for the good of the party and for the good of his long-term political career," and "even DeLay aides and supporters acknowledge that time is running out on a comeback."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Curtius, Simon, 958K) adds that the petition "indicated how quickly DeLay's broad and deep support among Republicans has collapsed following this week's guilty pleas by lobbyist Jack Abramoff," and "opposition to DeLay's return as majority leader has united some conservative and moderate House Republicans who normally are at loggerheads over policy issues."

The AP (1/7, Espo) adds, "Buffeted by scandal, House Republicans are clamoring for new election-year leadership, and indicted Rep. Tom DeLay's hopes of returning to power as floor leader are dwindling," as "Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, signaled he would not try to block the rank-and-file from acting."

The Houston Chronicle (1/7, Roth, Gonzalez, Levine, 581K) adds that it is a "significant development" that House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R) "indicated Friday for the first time that he was open to the election of a new majority leader."

The Boston Globe (1/7, Klein, 484K) adds that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's reaction "suggests that a leadership change is all but certain." The maneuver "to oust DeLay is a rebuke to the House GOP's leadership, which has long been known for enforcing strict party discipline."

The Dallas Morning News (1/7, Gillman) adds, "No members of the GOP leadership have signed the petition, though aides called the election likely," and "White House spokesman Trent Duffy sidestepped questions about whether President Bush thinks it's time for Mr. DeLay to renounce his claim on the leadership." However, Ron Talley, spokesman for the Republican Main Street Partnership, a group of moderates who fear that fallout from Mr. DeLay's ethical troubles threatens their hopes in Democrat-leaning districts," said, "We're trying to take away the stigma and the what-ifs and all the monkeys that appear to be on the leaderships' backs. ... It's a matter of survival."

The Financial Times (1/7, Yeager) adds, "Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker who led the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994, said this week that while Mr DeLay must defend himself in court, 'the House Republican party has a different set of interests and [they] involve having a new majority leader.'" Reuters (1/7, Cowan, Ferraro) also covered this story.

DeLay Requests Co-Defendant's Charges Be Dropped. The Houston Chronicle (1/7, 581K) reports, "U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay on Friday asked the 3rd Court of Appeals to throw out a money-laundering indictment against one of his co-defendants," Jim Ellis, the director of DeLay's Americans for a Republican Majority. "A favorable ruling for Ellis would give senior District Judge Pat Priest reason to reconsider his ruling upholding the money-laundering indictment against DeLay," although "The indictments were upheld by state District Judge Bob Perkins, who has since been removed from the DeLay case."

OTHER NEWS:

Future Of Mideast Peace Process Without Sharon Remains Unclear. NBC opened its broadcast with an update on Ariel Sharon's condition and an extensive analysis of the Mideast peace process and the Israeli political scene post-Sharon. NBC noted mixed feeling among Palestinians concerning the likely end Sharon's political dominance. The other networks gave the story less prominence. NBC Nightly News (1/6, lead story, B. Williams) at the end of its lead story reported, "If Sharon does not recover, the political changes in Israel will ripple around the world, and especially the White House. Andrea Mitchell now on what's at stake for the US and the Middle East peace process." NBC's Andrea Mitchell continued, "The President had staked his Middle East policy on Sharon, taking further steps to create a Palestinian state, like his decision to force right wing settlers to withdraw from Gaza. US officials don't know if his temporary successor, Ehud Olmert, will even win the election in March, and if he does, whether he can get Israelis to give up more land."

The Wall Street Journal (1/7, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports that "Sharon's near-certain departure from the Israeli political scene has sparked immediate concern among senior Bush administration officials. They fear that Mr. Sharon's successor will be unable, or unwilling, to make territorial compromises necessary to create the viable Palestinian state that the Bush administration sees as vital." The Journal notes, "The challenges confronting the administration stem from Mr. Bush's decision in recent years to place his approach to the Israel-Palestinian question almost entirely on Mr. Sharon's broad shoulders. Public comments notwithstanding, Mr. Sharon's policies have fully supplanted Mr. Bush's 'road map' as the blueprint for the region." Both "U.S. and Israeli officials acknowledge that it will be harder for Mr. Olmert to sell difficult moves like a West Bank withdrawal. Although he is a savvy politician, he lacks Mr. Sharon's credentials as a general who fought in all of Israel's wars and more than once saved the country from apparent defeat. And neither Mr. Olmert nor any other candidate who would succeed Mr. Sharon has the unusual combination of history and personality that has come to embody the contradictions and tensions of the Israeli public."

Speculation Focuses On Sharon's Successor's Capability To Lead. NBC Nightly News (1/6, lead story, Fletcher) reported. "The world press following every medical bulletin about the condition of the man who held the promise of real moves towards peace with the Palestinians. Now one question is whether Ehud Olmert, Israel's acting prime minister, will follow in his footsteps. In fact, it's the other way around. Olmert called for Israel to evacuate the Gaza Strip before Sharon -- and the autonomy for the Palestinians. A former two-time mayor of Jerusalem, Olmert, has not been afraid of political risks. With Sharon he left the right wing Likud Party to form the new Kadima party to compete in the march elections. Their platform: land for peace, with the Palestinians, quickly. … And first, Olmert has to win the election. Opinion polls show about the same support for Sharon's Kadima party without him as with him. Analysts say it could be just a sympathy vote. That could well decline sharply in the months to go before the election."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/6, story 5, 2:00, Woodruff) reported, "People had expected that Ariel Sharon would be the prime minister of this country for a very long time to come. In the poll it indicated that he would win by a landslide in the elections coming up in March."

The New York Times (1/7, Berger, 1.19M) reports, "Olmert has little military background, few Israelis can match his deep government experience. He has been a cabinet minister several times and served as mayor of Jerusalem for 10 years. He also has command of an elegant, witty English, and can communicate directly with American audiences. Finally, few others can rival the closeness he has enjoyed with Mr. Sharon." While serving in Parliament he "quickly achieved a reputation for fighting corruption" and also "developed a reputation for ruthlessness." Like President Bush, Olmert is "a fitness buff and avid jogger."

The Time (1/7) reports Olmert is currently "very much a centrist within the Kadima ranks. Olmert is not a particularly popular figure in Israel, but he is very ambitious -- in 1999, he ran against Sharon in a primary for the Likud nomination for prime minister. Now, he'll stake his own claim for leadership by painting himself as the custodian of Sharon's legacy, signaling that he represents stability and continuity on the path initiated by Sharon."

The Washington Times/AP (1/7, Plushnick-Masti) in a front page story adds, "As acting prime minister, the public could come to see Mr. Olmert as a leader, said analyst Gadi Wolfsfeld. 'No one really loves Olmert, but no one really hates him, therefore he has a chance of convincing the public.'"

Roger Cohen in his "Globalist" column in the New York Times/IHT (1/7) writes, "Palestinian and Israeli elections over the next three months make all predictions treacherous. But it is safe enough to say that the best hope for the Middle East may lie with Ehud Olmert, Sharon's deputy and now acting prime minister. If he can consolidate the center and Sharon's course, while engaging Palestinians enough to make that course less unilateralist, progress is possible."

Olmert Reaches Out To Peres. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, King, 958K) in its article describing the seriousness of Sharon's condition also notes, "Olmert met Friday with Shimon Peres, the elder statesman who abandoned his Labor Party in November to join Kadima. Had Sharon not fallen ill, Peres would have been in line for a senior Cabinet post in any new Kadima-led government." Olmert reportedly reassured Peres to keep him "in the fold, but a meeting was cut short by word that Sharon was being rushed into surgery."

The Washington Post (1/7, A11, Wilson, 744K) also notes Peres "met Friday with Olmert to discuss what he said were 'ways to continue Sharon's policies -- both an uncompromising war against terror and an endless effort toward peace.'" While "he has lost a number of national elections, Peres is considered a valuable political asset because of his broad appeal among traditional Labor voters of his generation."

The New York Times (1/7, Erlanger, 1.19M) in its article on Sharon's condition also notes, "Losing Mr. Peres would be a blow to Mr. Olmert and Kadima because he brings a kind of assurance to voters that the new party is in fact centrist, and not a branch of Likud. Mr. Peres, as the last active senior politician of Israel's founding generation, is respected for his wisdom and international standing."

Arab Observers Concerned Loss Of Sharon Will Stall Progress Toward Peace. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Stack, 958K) reports, "As the realization hit the region that the Israeli prime minister may no longer lead the Jewish state, a mood of regret and uncertainty crept into the tone of Arab analysts and editorials. As Sharon clung to life, the leaders of Egypt and Jordan, Arab countries that signed peace treaties with Israel, sent word of their concern." Despite their past animosity, "many Arabs saw Sharon as the only leader stubborn and strong enough to push Israel into accepting a Palestinian state. Arabs worried that the loss of Sharon would throw Israel into tumult and freeze already stagnant peace talks."

Rice Trip To Southeast Asia Canceled. The AP (1/7, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice canceled a six-day trip to Indonesia and Australia on Friday amid uncertainty over ailing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon."

Reuters (1/7, Pleming) adds, "Rice called off the trip so she could liaise in Washington with President George W. Bush's other top foreign policy aides without the problems of time differences, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said."

In a brief article on Rice's decision not to travel the Financial Times (1/7, Dinmore) notes, "A sense of crisis in the Middle East has been heightened in the Bush administration by the confrontation with Syria over Iraq and the UN investigation into the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister, as well as violence in Iraq."

Injury Expected To Keep Sharon From Resuming Leadership. The CBS Evening News (1/6, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "In Israel today Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had a second operation to stop bleeding in his brain. Doctors say it brought a significant improvement in his condition. But two days after suffering a massive stroke, Sharon remains in critical condition. And it seems all but certain he will never return now as Israel's leader."

The Washington Times (1/7, Mitnick, 90K) adds, "Doctors operated on Ariel Sharon for a third time yesterday to stem a new cerebral hemorrhage but said they had stabilized his condition, dispelling speculation that the prime minister was about to succumb to the stroke suffered this week." The Washington Post (1/7, A13, Brown, 744K) also reports on the details of Sharon's treatment.

Sharon's Legacy Examined. Knight Ridder (1/7, Nissenbaum) reports, "Although Sharon's departure from the political stage is expected to create a diplomatic void in the Middle East, analysts across the political spectrum said the prime minister had shifted the political paradigm in Israel by ending its military rule in the occupied Gaza Strip and using the move to create a new centrist party with a pragmatic outlook."

White House Chastises Robertson For Sharon Remarks. The Washington Post (1/7, Deane, 744K) on its web site yesterday afternoon reported, "The White House today criticized television evangelist Pat Robertson's remarks that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's severe illness was deserved, calling the comments 'wholly inappropriate and offensive.'" White House press spokesman Trent Duffy "added that Robertson's comments 'don't have a place in this or any other debate.'" He "also told reporters the president is praying for Sharon's full recovery." The AP (1/7) in a brief article also notes the White House's response to Robertson.

Robertson Criticized By Evangelical Leaders. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Stammer, 958K) reports, "Evangelical leaders said Friday that they were embarrassed and incensed by televangelist Pat Robertson's assertion that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon…was stricken by God as punishment for ceding the Gaza Strip and a portion of the West Bank to Palestinians last summer." They "suggested that Robertson was losing religious and political influence as a result of his remarks on Sharon and other recent controversial comments."

WPost Faults Robertson. The Washington Post (1/7, A16, 744K) editorializes Pat Robertson and Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "are probably beyond the point where they can be reached by embarrassment or shame. But they are not beyond the kind of strong condemnation that they have richly earned." They "share a self-righteousness that blinds them to the distance that they have placed between themselves and the majority of people who find their remarks repulsive. It's sufficient to know, we suppose, that at a time when messages of hope are flowing from around the world to the bedside of Ariel Sharon, Pat Robertson and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad still have each other."

Efforts Intensify To Gain Russian, Chinese Support For Curbing Iran. The New York Times (1/7, Weisman, 1.19M) reports, "The United States joined with several European allies on Friday in a drive to enlist Russian and Chinese support to apply new pressure on Iran to halt its suspected nuclear weapons activities" with the aim of "stopping Iran from resuming 'research' on enriching uranium." Attempts "to produce a unified declaration by the permanent members of the Security Council…intensified this week in response to a series of incendiary comments by Iranian leaders about Israel and their nuclear program." Officials say " the Russians have moved closer to the American view, in part because Iran rebuffed a Russian compromise proposal to establish a joint Russian-Iranian uranium enrichment program, but on Russian soil." Also, a European diplomat "said that Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, was himself angered by the behavior of a top Iranian envoy in a meeting this week in Vienna."

Reuters (1/7) adds, "In an effort to bring new pressure in the hours before Tehran takes what could be a fateful step, the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China were working on a statement opposing the Iranian move and urging that Tehran return to negotiations on a compromise proposal."

Bush Will Sign Peru Trade Agreement. The AP (1/7) reports, "President Bush on Friday notified Congress of his plan to sign a trade agreement with Peru," hammered out in December "after Colombia and Ecuador halted discussions with Washington on what was expected to be a regional agreement linking all three countries with the United States," complaining "that the strong desire by Peru for a deal had strengthened the U.S. bargaining position at their expense." However, "ratification by Congress could be complicated by November's midterm elections."

Europe On "High Alert" With New Turkish Cases Of Bird Flu. The New York Times (1/7, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "Health officials in Europe said Friday that they were on 'high alert' as a third child in eastern Turkey was confirmed to have bird flu and more than two dozen people there were under observation at a local hospital, an unusual cluster of human cases that raised the possibility that the virus had become more contagious to humans." While scientists say the cluster "probably stemmed from people handling the same sick birds," both "the W.H.O. and the European Commission were alarmed enough to dispatch a joint team of scientists to eastern Turkey this week."

Reuters (1/7, Yukselbaba) adds, "A third child from the same family in eastern Turkey died from bird flu on Friday and health experts plan to study the outbreak for signs the virus was passing from person to person." While the WHO said in a statement dated Thursday that Turkish authorities had told it that the district had been placed under quarantine, with no people or animals allowed to move in or out," a Reuters reporter "saw no controls" the next day. The Washington Times/AP (1/7, Harvey) also covered this story.

At Government's Request, UN Stops North Koreans Food Aid. The New York Times (1/7, Brooke, 1.19M) reports, "The United Nations World Food Program, which was helping to feed a third of the 22 million people of North Korea as recently as August, has ended all feeding programs there at the request of the government," which "justified the shutdown by saying that after a decade of receiving Western aid they want Western groups to shift to work that will help the nation become more developed." However, "many foreign analysts say the secretive nation's rulers are pursuing a strategy to cut the number of Westerners roaming the countryside inspecting food distribution networks," as "food aid from China and South Korea rose."

Former Ukraine PM Attacks Gas Deal. The New York Times (1/7, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Ukraine's former prime minister, Yulia V. Tymoshenko, who was a driving force behind last winter's Orange Revolution, is emerging as a leading critic of the intricate commercial deal that ended the gas dispute between Ukraine and Russia." While "Ukraine was widely seen as a winner in the dispute," Tymoshenko vowed to "work to scuttle the deal because it transfers control of energy imports to a company she calls corrupt" – RosUkrEnergo - which "has been criticized for ties to organized crime." Tymoshenko's "opposition adds another layer of uncertainty to the settlement."

Russia Trying To Control Gas Distribution. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Murphy, 958K) reports, "Russia denied Friday that its temporary cutoff of natural gas to Ukraine last week in a pricing dispute raised doubts about its ability to act as a responsible energy supplier to Europe. But a Foreign Ministry official acknowledged that there were 'certainly …

political factors' in Moscow's aim to maintain a strategic route for transporting gas to Western Europe." Spokesman Alexei Sazonov said "Russia's real political interests involved Moscow's ambition to move to a market-based, commercially viable relationship with its energy clients and assure that its products have an uninterrupted supply line to the West" as Russia's moves "to gain control of the pipelines that carry fuel supplies to foreign markets."

Russia Professes Puzzlement At Rice's Comments. The Washington Post (1/7, Finn, 744K) reports, "The Russian Foreign Ministry said Friday it was puzzled and surprised by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comments that Russia's temporary cutoff of gas supplies to Ukraine was 'politically motivated,'" adding, "It is absolutely unclear what these statements are based on."

Other Countries' Trade Undercuts US Sanctions Against Burma. The Washington Post (1/7, A11, Sipress, 744K) reports, "Burmese industry and exports were on the decline in the 1990s as a result of progressive attempts by the United States to tighten economic sanctions on Burma, protesting its suppression of democracy. But the effort to pressure its rulers has been vastly undercut by the enthusiasm of other countries, especially Burma's Asian neighbors, to tap its cheap workforce and abundant natural resources." While "some of the trade is legal," many "products are also smuggled across Burma's remote, unsettled borders," then "relabeled and shipped beyond the region."

Chavez To Expand Discount Fuel For US Families. The Miami Herald (1/7, Wilson, 323K) reports that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "is expanding a heating oil program that offers discounts as high as 40 percent to low-income U.S. families." Currently in Boston and New York, it "will be extended next week to Maine and Rhode Island," as well as the "neighborhoods in Harlem and Queens" of New York City. "The program thrusts Chávez into the U.S. political debate over whether President George W. Bush is doing enough to help poor Americans cope with soaring heating costs."

Elections Not Expected To Help Haiti. Newsweek (1/7, Beith) reports, "Haiti has postponed elections for the fourth time since November. But a national vote is unlikely to solve the troubled country's many problems," as "even if free and fair elections do go ahead in the near future, there's little hope for a period of peace and prosperity." However, "the U.S. State Department repeated a familiar mantra. 'We believe it is essential that elections move forward.'"

Merkel To Draft Energy Strategy. The Financial Times (1/7, Benoit) reports, "Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, is to draft a 'national energy strategy' prompted by concern about the security of supplies after the recent dispute between Russia and Ukraine over natural gas shipments," and "in response to ever more pressing demands from experts and politicians that a security element should be added to the economic and environmental approaches that have governed energy policy until now." She "will then convene an 'energy summit' between government and companies in March to agree on measures – from diversifying suppliers to increased use of renewable sources – aimed at securing future energy needs."

Caldwell Says Germans Rejecting "Citizenship Of The World." Christopher Caldwell writes in his column in the Financial Times (1/7), "More and more westerners today consider themselves citizens of the world" where "loyalty is owed not to local ways but to multinational organisations and the norms of human rights. This idea of citizenship has proceeded further in Germany than any place else," but ". if today's enlightened, democratic Germans dislike this neutral citizenship-of-the-world, then nobody else is likely to be able to tolerate it, either. One reason why is that it is never as neutral as it looks. It immediately surrenders to any rival affiliation that makes non-negotiable demands." In the end, "Germans are right to conclude that that is a deficient form of citizenship indeed."

Importance: Low

JUDGE SAMUEL ALITO

A CAREER DEDICATED TO PUBLIC SERVICE

President Bush Believes This Nation Deserves A Dignified Process Of Confirmation In The Senate, With A Fair Hearing. Senators have had an opportunity to meet with Judge Alito, review hundreds of opinions and thousands of votes and thousands of pages of supporting documents, including speeches, articles, testimony and other writings. Judge Alito is looking forward to the hearings and answering questions from the Committee.

Throughout His 30 Years Of Public Service, Judge Alito Has Established A Sterling Reputation For Integrity.

Judge Alito recently received a unanimous "well-qualified" rating from the American Bar Association (ABA). The ABA's stated criteria for its evaluation are "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

Judge Alito Began His Distinguished Career With Close To 15 Years Of Service At The U.S. Department Of Justice, Including Three Years As US Attorney For New Jersey. As US Attorney, he was known for his unquestioned character, fair-mindedness and even-handed approach to cases. He was also credited with successfully prosecuting white collar and environmental crimes, drug trafficking, organized crime, and violations of civil rights.

Ø Senator Frank Lautenberg: "As Chief Federal Prosecutor for one of the largest districts in the country, he has led the effort to fight big-time drug rings and organized crime. He has made environmental crime a high priority." (Sen. Frank Lautenberg, Committee On The Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Hearing, 4/5/90)

Ø Michael Gilberti, who worked with Alito in the US Attorney's office, addressed attempts by Alito's opponents to attack his character: "I defy anybody to say anything bad about Sam's private and professional character." (Henry Gottlieb, "No Doubt Where Alito Stands," New Jersey Law Journal, 11/7/05)

His 15-Year Record On The Third Circuit Shows Him To Be A Fair, Thorough Judge Who Respects Precedents And Applies The Law Even-Handedly. Judge Alito has more prior judicial experience than any Supreme Court nominee in over 70 years. Judge Alito's jurisprudence and integrity have been praised by legal scholars, former law clerks, and colleagues from both sides of the aisle.

Ø Hannah Smith, one of Judge Alito's former clerks described Judge Alito's jurisprudence: "He's fair and even handed. And he really approaches each case with an open mind to figure out what the applicable law is, what the relevant precedents are, what the statute requires, what have you, and then to apply the facts of that case to the law at hand." (Salem Broadcasting's "Janet Parshall Show," 11/7/05)

Ø Legal Ethics Professor Ronald Rotunda responded to ethics attacks by liberal interest groups: "These charges of ethics violations are absurd.... Twenty years of ethics opinions and case law are uniform in reaching this conclusion." (Professor Ronald Rotunda, 11/4/05).

Judge Alito's Career Is The Epitome Of "The American Dream."

Ø Judge Alito's father was born in Italy and brought to this country as a child by his parents. He excelled in school, despite having to hand copy textbooks he could not afford to buy. He graduated from college and earned a master's degree from Rutgers University.

Ø Judge Alito's father taught public school before taking a job with the New Jersey Office of Legislative Services, a nonpartisan research and advisory body to the state legislature. He went on to become director of the office. Judge Alito's mother worked as principal of the local elementary school.

Ø Judge Alito graduated valedictorian of his public high school, received his bachelor's degree from Princeton University and attended Yale Law School, where he served as an editor on the Yale Law Journal.

Italy presses U.S. on torture claim

BY JOHN CREWDSON
Chicago Tribune

MILAN, Italy - Prosecutors investigating the CIA's alleged kidnapping of a radical Muslim preacher here want the FBI to question the CIA's former chief in Milan about whether he participated in the interrogation of Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, who claims he was tortured after being "rendered" by the CIA to Egypt nearly three years ago.

Five days after Nasr, better known as Abu Omar, was snatched off the sidewalk in this northern Italian city and flown to Egypt, the CIA chief, Robert Seldon Lady, began a two-week visit to Cairo.

Lady's identity no longer is secret because of an Italian warrant for his arrest and that of 21 other CIA operatives on kidnapping charges. Nor is Lady a spy any longer, having retired at the end of 2003, according to his Italian residence permit.

In communications with family and friends who visited his Egyptian prison, Abu Omar claimed to have been tortured by his Egyptian captors. He said the torture began almost immediately after he refused an offer to return to Milan as an informer for Egyptian intelligence.

Prosecutors here have Lady's travel reservations to Cairo and evidence that his cell phone was in that city when it received two calls from Italy during his visit. Daria Pesce, Lady's Italian lawyer, will say only that the Cairo trip was "official" business.

In a formal request for information under a mutual assistance treaty between Italy and the U.S., Milan's chief anti-terrorism prosecutor, Armando Spataro, is asking U.S. authorities to question Lady, believed to be in Florida, about why he went to Egypt shortly after Abu Omar's arrival there; whether he participated in Abu Omar's interrogation; and whether he had any reason to believe Abu Omar was being mistreated.

Without special dispensation from the CIA, Lady presumably would be prohibited from discussing a covert operation even with the FBI, and certainly with the Italian prosecutors, because of the secrecy agreement that all U.S. intelligence officers sign as a condition of employment.

The CIA has refused to discuss the Milan "rendition," the agency's term for the practice of forcibly transporting terrorism suspects to third countries for interrogation, or even to acknowledge its role in the operation, despite hundreds of pages of evidence compiled by Spataro's investigators that leave little doubt of CIA involvement.

The information request also asks for the interrogation of Lady's boss, the chief of the CIA's station in Rome, who still works under cover at the counterterrorism center at CIA headquarters in northern Virginia. The Chicago Tribune is not identifying the man at the CIA's request.

On Saturday Spataro sent the information request to Italian Justice Minister Roberto Castelli, who will decide whether to officially transmit it to the U.S. Justice Department. Castelli has not yet passed on to U.S. authorities Spataro's earlier request to extradite Lady and the 21 other CIA operatives accused in the case.

The question of what Lady was doing in Cairo goes to the heart of the furor in Europe over the CIA's practice of "rendering" militant Muslims like Abu Omar to friendly Middle Eastern countries such as Egypt and Jordan, and not-so-friendly ones such as Syria.

It also underscores what appears to be a disconnect between the debate in the United States over how aggressive military and CIA interrogators can be in questioning suspected terrorists, and the Bush administration's practice of shipping suspected terrorists to countries where torture is commonplace.

Techniques known to have been used by U.S. interrogators include a practice called "waterboarding" in which a cloth is placed over the subject's face and then water is poured over it, creating the sensation of drowning. The practice, which some human-rights groups say is torture, reportedly has been successful with several high-level al-Qaida detainees, including Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed.

But the reported withholding of pain medication from Abu Zubaydah, Osama bin Laden's former No. 3, who was captured in March 2002 after being wounded in a gunfight in Pakistan, "never happened," according to an authoritative U.S. official who spoke on condition that he not be identified.

Congressional Democrats and a few Republicans allege that the United States is evading federal laws and international conventions by "outsourcing" the torture of suspected terrorists to third countries.

Earlier this month, President Bush offered his assurance that "we adhere to the law of the U.S. We do not torture. We do not render to countries that torture."

A central goal of America's foreign policy since World War II has been promoting respect for human rights. But by the State Department's own account, countries to which the CIA has rendered those it suspects - not always correctly - of terrorist connections have some of the world's worst human-rights records, Egypt foremost among them.

A U.S. law implementing the Senate's ratification of the United Nations Convention Against Torture makes it a crime for a U.S. official outside the United States to inflict torture, threaten to inflict torture or conspire with others to inflict torture, which is defined as "severe physical or mental pain or suffering."

The CIA is required to refer possible violations of federal law to the Justice Department, but no referral has been made in the Milan case. The CIA's internal inspector general, however, is investigating an undetermined number of renditions to see whether agency rules or federal laws were violated.

According to Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazief, 60 to 70 suspects have been rendered by the United States to his country alone, far more cases than are publicly known. Torture is illegal in Egypt, as it is in virtually every country, and Nazief attributes reports of torture to isolated "police abuses."

But the U.S. State Department's latest survey of human rights found that "torture and abuse of detainees by police, security personnel, and prison guards" has "remained common and persistent" in Egypt.

"Principal methods of torture reportedly employed," the report says, "included stripping and blindfolding victims; suspending victims from a ceiling or doorframe with feet just touching the floor; beating victims with fists, whips, metal rods or other objects; using electrical shocks; and dousing victims with cold water."

Jordan also has a record of physical abuse of detainees, according to the State Department, as do Saudi Arabia and Morocco. Several suspects are believed to have been rendered to those countries by the CIA.

The U.N. Convention Against Torture and U.S. law prohibit transferring detainees abroad if there are "substantial grounds for believing" they will be subjected to torture.

But some Bush administration officials, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, say the standard they apply is only that it must be "more likely than not" that no torture will occur.

Additional assurances, Gonzales says, are required from countries with a history of using torture. Other officials say there have been instances in which U.S. government officials have checked on some of those it has rendered to make sure they are not ill-treated.

And yet accounts of torture given by Abu Omar and other rendered detainees who have been released from Egyptian prisons after they were found to have no links to terrorism are similar in their grisly details.

During a recent visit to Berlin, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, under fire from European allies over the CIA's use of European airports and airspace in conducting renditions, asserted that information gleaned from renditions had helped "save European lives."

But Spataro, noting that Milan police already had Abu Omar under surveillance and were preparing to arrest him on charges of recruiting foreign fighters to go to Iraq, declares that "the Abu Omar kidnapping did not save any human life."

When the Italian police asked the CIA if it had any idea where Abu Omar had gone, the agency's written response was that it believed he had returned to Albania, where he lived for several years before obtaining political asylum in Italy.

Spataro has added the CIA official who wrote the memo and the former Rome station chief to the official list of suspects in the case, which makes them liable for arrest if they return to Italy.

DRAFT 1/9/06

GUANTANAMO: DEBUNKING MYTHS

On September 11, 2001, our nation endured the deadliest terrorist attack in its history. That morning, the al Qaeda terrorist network viciously attacked the United States, murdering approximately three thousand people and injuring thousands more. The President, as Commander in Chief, took immediate action to hunt down the terrorists, defend the country, and prevent further attacks. Congress swiftly passed a joint resolution—the Authorization for Use of Military Force—lending the President full support "to use all necessary and appropriate force" against those responsible for the attacks, in order to prevent future acts of international terrorism against our country.

The President dispatched the armed forces of the United States to Afghanistan to seek out and subdue the al Qaeda terrorist network and the Taliban regime that had supported it. Faced with the daunting task of confronting the terrorists in their own element, United States and coalition forces have risen to the challenge. They have removed the Taliban from power and dealt a serious blow to al Qaeda's training capability. Yet pockets of die-hard terrorists remain, and so armed combat with al Qaeda and the Taliban remains ongoing.

In the course of the campaign, consistent with the law and settled practice of war, the United States military and its allies have captured thousands of persons fighting for the enemy. As in virtually every other major armed conflict in our nation's history, the military has determined that a number of the captured persons should be detained as enemy combatants for the duration of the conflict. About 500 of these enemy combatants are being detained at the United States Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

As Americans, we prize dearly our freedom and our liberty. We aspire to the highest ideals of justice and magnanimity. In light of these values, the detention of any person, in war or peace, is a grave matter.

And in the new, post-9/11 world, the detention of enemy combatants raises important and unprecedented issues. In this novel setting, no one claims that questions about Guantanamo should be lightly brushed aside.

Rather, these issues have been and should continue to be considered with care. Our society, as the President has said, is blessed with the ability to freely and openly debate difficult issues, even in wartime. We welcome that debate. Most of it has been constructive. But some have launched irresponsible charges.

They say that Guantanamo has damaged our credibility; that it is an international embarrassment to our ideals; that it does not reflect the policies of a great and just nation. These charges bolster our adversaries. They drain our troops' morale. Most of all, they offend the truth: that America is now, and always will be, a beacon of human rights.

We must remember that we are holding people who were caught on the battlefield, right after shooting at our troops or plotting to kill our civilians—and we are treating them humanely. Not only are we treating them humanely, but we are also giving every detainee at Guantanamo ongoing, repeated chances to prove that he should be released.

These procedures, recently codified and endorsed by Congress, are unprecedented in history. They are more than any nation has ever given captives during a conflict. Recognizing the extraordinary nature of this war, we have taken historic action to give these detainees an opportunity to be heard while the conflict is ongoing.

Today I want to clarify some of the confusion regarding Guantanamo, and respond to some of the specific charges leveled by our critics. But before addressing those inaccuracies, let me turn to the relevant laws of war.

First, let me speak briefly to the term "enemy combatant," as well as the distinction between lawful enemy combatants and unlawful enemy combatants. An "enemy combatant" – a term that comprises both lawful and unlawful combatants – is an individual who, under the laws and customs of war, may be detained for the duration of an armed conflict. [not sure if it's legally safe to offer a definition of "enemy combatant" – Sct has left it open] In the present conflict, members, agents, and associates of al Qaeda and the Taliban are enemy combatants – and thus our military may capture and detain them as long as hostilities continue.

By universal agreement and practice, the law of war distinguishes between lawful enemy combatants and unlawful enemy combatants – a distinction the Supreme Court recognized more than sixty years ago in Ex Parte Quirin. [317 U.S. 1, 30-31 (1942).] Lawful combatants fight within the terms of the laws of war. When captured by opposing military forces, they receive prisoner of war (POW) status and the protections of the Geneva Convention. Unlawful combatants disregard the laws of war. When captured, they receive neither POW status nor the protections of the Geneva Convention. They may be tried and punished by military tribunals for violations of the laws of war.

The President has determined that al Qaeda and Taliban members – including the al Qaeda and Taliban detainees held at Guantanamo – are unlawful enemy combatants.

Those fighting for al Qaeda are unlawful combatants because, among other reasons, al Qaeda is a non-state, terrorist organization that has not signed the Geneva Convention. Those affiliated with the Taliban are unlawful combatants because, although Afghanistan has signed the Convention, Taliban fighters do not satisfy the criteria for POW status set out in Article 4 of the Third Geneva Convention: that combatants must be commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates, have a fixed distinctive sign recognizable at a distance, carry arms openly, and conduct their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war. The Taliban fail most of these requirements. They have no organized command structure. They do not wear a uniform representing another nation's military. They do not obey the laws of war.

The President has unquestioned authority to detain enemy combatants for the duration of the conflict. As Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, the President has all powers necessary and proper to conduct war and to defend the country. The Supreme Court recognized long ago in Quirin, and reaffirmed recently in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, that the capture and detention of enemy combatants, and the trial of combatants who have violated the laws of war, are, by universal agreement and practice, important incidents of war. [Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, 518 (2004) (plurality); Ex Parte Quirin,

317 U.S. 1, 28 (1942).] Hamdi made clear that "detention to prevent a combatant's return to the battlefield is a fundamental incident of waging war" that was unmistakably authorized by Congress when it passed the Authorization for Use of Military Force a week after September 11. [542 U.S. at 519.]

Indeed, the practice of detaining enemy combatants during wartime is as old as war itself. Such detention has occurred in every major conflict in United States history, including the Gulf, Vietnam, and Korean wars. By the end of World War II, the United States had in custody approximately two million enemy combatants. In fact, during World War II, our military detained hundreds of thousands of prisoners of war on American soil without trial or counsel. Our actions now – holding 500 enemy combatants at Guantanamo while the war on terror is ongoing – are fully consistent with time-honored practice and the laws and customs of war. Then as now, this captivity is neither revenge nor punishment; nor are the detainees subject to our criminal justice system. Their detention serves two vital purposes: preventing them from returning to battle, and gathering intelligence to save American lives.

Let me now address some of the false accusations that have been lodged against the detention at Guantanamo.

Some say that we detain people indiscriminately, based on weak evidence or no evidence at all.

Nothing could be further from the truth. As I said, we do not take lightly the capture and detention of any human being. While the detention of enemy combatants serves a critical protective function, it is also vital that we designate and detain these combatants in a principled and humane manner that reflects our values and character as a nation.

Consistent with these values, the process for determining who must be detained is extremely thorough. The military follows an extensive, multi-step screening process to determine which persons captured in zones of combat should be detained as enemy combatants, and, of those, which should be transferred to Guantanamo Bay. Approximately 10,000 people have been screened in Afghanistan and released from United States custody; only about 500 are being held at Guantanamo.

The screening process – along with further procedures for releasing combatants after arriving at Guantanamo, which I will discuss – ensures that a person will be held at Guantanamo only if he presents a danger to our country or has knowledge critical to the war against terror. The Guantanamo detainees include many jihadists who took up arms against the United States, as well as senior al Qaeda operatives and Taliban leaders. They include, for example, an individual who completed advanced terrorist training camps in Afghanistan; one who served as a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden; and one who trained al Qaeda associates in the use of explosives. [accuracy of previous sentence will need to be checked – from fact sheet that may be outdated]

By interrogating Guantanamo detainees, the United States has learned valuable information about terrorist weapons, tactics, and training – information critical to our mission of disrupting terrorist operations around the world. Guantanamo detainees have provided, among other things, information on individuals connected to al Qaeda's efforts to acquire weapons of mass destruction; information on front companies and accounts supporting al Qaeda and Taliban operations; information on the training of teenagers for suicide bombing missions; and information on travel routes potentially used by terrorists to reach the United States.

So it is important to remember: We are talking about people who either are suspected terrorists or have information that we need to fight the war. We are holding them for good reason.

Another myth is that detainees are held under the worst possible conditions.

Again, as a matter of law, the detainees at Guantanamo are not POWs under the Geneva Convention. Nonetheless, our policy is to treat all enemy combatants humanely and, to the extent possible, consistent with the Geneva Convention.

DOJ_NMG_0008912

The military is providing the Guantanamo detainees many privileges similar to those that POWs would receive. These include: three meals per day that meet cultural and religious dietary requirements; adequate shelter and clothing; showers, soap, and toilet articles; exceptional medical care; the opportunity to worship, including copies of the Koran and prayer beads; reading materials; the means to send and receive mail, subject to security screening; and the ability to receive packages of food and clothing, also subject to security screening. The International Committee of the Red Cross has ongoing access to the detainees. The detainees may raise concerns about conditions at Guantanamo, and DoD attempts to address them consistent with security.[need to check accuracy of last two sentences w/ DoD]

Another false allegation: detainees are held without process.

Let me emphasize again that the detention of any person is a matter of the utmost gravity. Our colleagues at DoD have taken their responsibilities seriously. They have established a regime for determining the status of enemy combatants the likes of which no nation in history has ever afforded its enemies. And, in December, Congress adopted and codified the Administration's process.

Congress thus vindicated the care and thought used in developing these procedures. The procedures well deserve such confidence. They were established in accordance with the Supreme Court's guidance on the procedures for detaining United States citizens as enemy combatants. In Hamdi, the Court held that such a citizen is entitled to certain basic procedural protections: He "must receive notice of the factual basis for his classification and a fair opportunity to rebut the Government's factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker." [542 U.S. at 533.] The Court further noted that the process to which a United States citizen was entitled "could be met by an appropriately authorized and properly constituted military tribunal." For this it cited Army Regulation 190-8. That regulation provides for tribunals to determine the status of detainees asserting POW status under the Geneva Convention. [Id. at 538.]

Following the Court's guidance, the Department of Defense established Combatant Status Review Tribunals – or CSRTs – consisting of three neutral military officers who review the evidence surrounding each detainee captured on the battlefield and detained at Guantanamo Bay. The CSRTs are tasked with determining formally whether each detainee was properly detained as an enemy combatant. They permit each detainee the opportunity to contest his enemy combatant designation.

To date, 558 CSRTs have been held—one for each detainee under DoD control at Guantanamo Bay. Of the 558 CSRTs held, 520 detainees were determined to be enemy combatants. 38, or about 7%, were determined no longer to be enemy combatants and subject to release. These 38 are on top of 200 detainees already released from Guantanamo before the CSRT process was established.

Another myth: The Guantanamo detainees are being held "indefinitely." They could be held in perpetuity because there is no definition of when the conflict will end.

The suggestion here is that enemy combatants are being detained lawlessly and without limit. That is false.

The President's constitutional power to detain these combatants during wartime is well-established. Indeed, so long as the war continues and the detainees present a threat or retain intelligence value, it would be imprudent to release them. But, as I have emphasized, we take seriously the detention of any person. We have no interest in detaining enemy combatants any longer than necessary. And so DoD has established procedures to review the case of each enemy combatant every year, on an individual basis, to determine whether he should continue to be held.

In the recent legislation, Congress endorsed these review procedures – with good reason. Our procedures are generous by any measure. They exceed anything required by legal obligations or historical practice. At least once a year, each detainee at Guantanamo Bay is entitled to appear before an administrative review board, or ARB. Much like a parole hearing, each detainee is allowed to appear in person before a panel of three military officers and to provide information to support his release from family members, friends, or otherwise. The purpose of the ARB process is to assess annually whether each enemy combatant at Guantanamo continues to pose a threat to the United States or its allies, or whether there are other factors supporting the need for continued detention. Based on this assessment, the ARB panel can recommend that an individual detainee be released, continue to be detained, or be transferred with conditions to his country of nationality.

This is a detailed process for releasing detainees who no longer present a threat. In developing the process, DoD solicited input from the International Committee of the Red Cross, from nongovernmental organizations, and from ambassadors of the countries with detainees at Guantanamo Bay. DoD then worked across all federal government agencies to ensure a rigorous and fair review process.

This parole-type hearing process goes above and beyond anything required by domestic or international law, including the Geneva Conventions, by providing persons already established to be enemy combatants a chance to be heard and released even while a conflict is ongoing. The first ARB was conducted in December 2004, and the process is continuing. Of the 310 final decisions in ARB proceeding to date, 13 held that the detainee in question should be released, and 105 concluded that the detainee should be transferred to another country.

As a matter of law, the detainees could be held at Guantanamo until the end of the conflict, however long it might last. We recognize, however, that this is an unconventional war that calls for unconventional measures. So we have established the CSRT and ARB processes allowing the release of detainees during the conflict; and many have been released, through the CSRTs and ARBs and even before them.

While we can be proud of the procedural protections we have afforded our enemies, protections no country has ever afforded an enemy in wartime, we cannot discount the danger these detainees continue to pose to us and to our servicemen fighting abroad. Of the hundreds of detainees released after a determination that they posed low risk to this country, we have seen NEED FIGURE return to the battlefield and take up arms against us.

Myth: Some claim that the CSRTs are unfair, inadequate, and unconstitutional.

This is a gross distortion. The truth is that the CSRTs provide generous procedural protections to aliens held abroad, ones that exceed even the requirements for detaining United States citizens as enemy combatants on American soil.

In Hamdi, the Supreme Court addressed the extent of process due under our Constitution to such a citizen who is held in this country as an enemy combatant. The Court held that an American citizen must receive certain minimal, core due process requirements: "notice of the factual basis for his classification" as an enemy combatant, "and a fair opportunity to rebut the Government's factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker." 542 U.S. at 533. The Court recognized that, "aside from these core elements, enemy combatant proceedings may be tailored to alleviate their uncommon potential to burden the Executive at a time of ongoing military conflict." Id. As an example of procedures that might be constitutional for American citizens held as enemy combatants in the United States, the Court cited with approval Army Regulation 190-8, which provides procedures to adjudicate POW status under Article 5 of the Third Geneva Convention.

The CSRTs were based on, and go even further than, Army Regulation 190-8. They afford notice: In advance of the hearing, each detainee is provided with an unclassified summary of the evidence supporting his enemy combatant designation.

They afford a fair opportunity to rebut the Government's case: The detainee has the rights to (a) testify or otherwise address the tribunal in oral or written form, (b) introduce relevant documentary evidence, (c) call witnesses if reasonably available, and (d) question witnesses called by the tribunal. Each detainee has the right to receive the assistance of a military officer assigned to serve as a personal representative, to ensure the detainee understands the process and the opportunities available, and to prepare for the hearing. Another military officer, the recorder of each tribunal, is required to search government files for and present any evidence suggesting that the detainee is not an enemy combatant. In addition, the detainee has the right to attend all proceedings, except as to matters that would compromise national security if the detainee were present; the detainee may not be forced to testify; and an interpreter is provided if necessary.

Finally, the CSRTs afford a neutral decisionmaker: Each CSRT comprises three military officers sworn to discharge their duties faithfully and impartially and in no way involved in the apprehension, detention, interrogation, or previous determination of status of the detainee. CSRT members have been given orders, by the Deputy Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of the Navy, to make a "neutral" and independent evaluation of the status of each individual detainee. The tribunals make decisions by a preponderance of the evidence, and by majority vote. They create a written report of their decision, and the tribunal record is reviewed by the Staff Judge Advocate for legal sufficiency. Each tribunal decision is subject to two further levels of mandatory review, first by the CSRT Legal Advisor and then by the CSRT Director. If appropriate, the record may be returned to the tribunal for further proceedings.[need to check this paragraph, particularly last 3 sentences, w/ DoD]

In several respects, the CSRTs provide even greater procedural protections than those required by Article 5 Tribunals, as set forth in the Army regulation cited with approval in Hamdi. Examples include the express qualifications to ensure the tribunal's independence; the personal representative provided to assist each detainee; the recorder's search of government files for, and provision to the tribunal of, any evidence to suggest that the detainee should not be designated as an enemy combatant; the unclassified summary of the evidence supporting detention that is provided to each detainee in advance of the hearing; the detainee's ability to introduce relevant documentary evidence; and the automatic review of every CSRT decision by a higher authority who may return the record to the tribunal for further proceedings. There are no analogous guarantees in Article 5 tribunals.

And, far from being a rubber-stamp, the CSRT process has led to favorable determinations for 38 out of 558 detainees.

In short, the claim that the CSRT procedures are inadequate finds no support in law or history. In fact, they exceed the procedures necessary to hold American citizens on our own soil as enemy combatants. They provide notice to the detainee of the unclassified factual basis for his enemy combatant designation; they afford the detainee an opportunity to testify, call witnesses, and introduce evidence to rebut the Government's case; and they ensure a fair and impartial tribunal. They are more than sufficient to satisfy the requirements of due process (if any) for aliens held abroad in the unique context of ongoing armed hostilities.

Another myth: The CSRTs rely on secret evidence that the detainees are not allowed to review, depriving the detainees of sufficient notice of the factual basis for their detention.

This is false. First, the detainee does have access to the information supporting his designation as an enemy combatant. Under CSRT procedures, the unclassified factual basis for this designation is disclosed to a detainee before trial. Second, in the CSRTs, each detainee is entitled to a personal representative with access to classified information. The personal representative is a military officer, with the appropriate security clearance, assigned to the detainee for the purpose of assisting the detainee in the CSRT process. The personal representative has access to all Government files and may attend the entire CSRT proceeding, even when classified information is at issue. The personal representative is required to explain the nature of the CSRT process to the detainee, explain his opportunity to present evidence, and assist the detainee in collecting relevant and reasonably available information and in preparing and presenting information to the Tribunal. Finally, the personal representative may [or has a duty to? need to confirm w/ DoD] comment upon classified information that bears upon the detainee's status if it would aid the Tribunal's deliberations. This is more than sufficient, in a hearing to determine the simple factual question whether the alien detainee supported al Qaeda or the Taliban, to satisfy due process.

Detainees themselves – many of whom are suspected terrorists – are not given access to classified information. Some detainees and their lawyers have demanded such information. They claim, in effect, that our armed forces cannot capture and detain suspected al Qaeda terrorists abroad, during ongoing hostilities against al Qaeda, without giving them wholesale access to classified information about this Nation's intelligence sources and methods against al Qaeda. This claim is startling and inconsistent with the conduct of every armed conflict in this Nation's history, Army regulations, and settled case law. If the claim now propounded were right, Nazi soldiers captured in World War II would have been entitled to classified information about American sources of military intelligence.

That cannot be right. Law, historical practice, and common sense reflect that the armed forces need not furnish classified information to a suspected enemy during an ongoing armed conflict. The Supreme Court has repeatedly stressed the paramount importance of protecting the secrecy of intelligence operations and of providing intelligence sources with assurances of confidentiality that are as absolute as possible. [CIA v. Sims, 471 U.S. 159, 172 & n.16, 175-77 (1985).] The traditional procedures used by the armed forces to confirm an individual's POW status specifically allow a tribunal to hold proceedings closed to the detainee. [Army Regulation 190-8.] Those procedures represent the outer bounds of traditional process in the unique context of wartime. As for common sense, to give just one example, our sources in the war on terror risk their lives to provide valuable information to the United States. To induce some informants to cooperate, the Government must keep their identities absolutely confidential. Even a small chance that some court will order disclosure of a source's identity could cause sources to clam shut. [Sims, 471 U.S. at 175.]

To disclose this and other classified information to the enemy – especially when some of them may later be released under procedures we have established – is unthinkable. We would be giving suspected terrorists, as one court has put it, "a composite view of the government investigation." [Center for National Security Studies v. Department of Justice, 331 F.3d 918, 928 (D.C. Cir. 2003).] Nothing in law or history compels that; and reason and prudence forbid it.

Myth: The CSRTs are biased. They simply rubber-stamp the initial decision to detain. They fail to provide a neutral decisionmaker.

This is false. Hamdi recognized that, even for citizens detained in this country, a military tribunal could satisfy due process requirements, including that of a neutral decisionmaker. [542 U.S. at 537-38.] The CSRTs contain express qualifications to ensure the independence and impartiality of the tribunal members. CSRT members cannot have been involved in the apprehension, detention, interrogation, or previous determination of status of the detainees. They must swear an oath to discharge their duties faithfully and impartially. These are the same protections historically available in hearings under Article 5 of the Geneva Convention.

Furthermore, the CSRT officers have been given orders, by the Deputy Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of the Navy, to make a neutral and independent evaluation of the status of each individual detainee. Far from being a rubber-stamp, the CSRT process has led to favorable determinations for 38 detainees. The CSRTs clearly provide a neutral decisionmaker.

Some say that Guantanamo violates the Geneva Conventions.

This too is false. As I have explained, the Guantanamo detainees are unlawful enemy combatants. They do not qualify as prisoners of war; nor do they qualify as a matter of law for the protections of the Geneva Convention.

Al Qaeda is a terrorist organization that has killed thousands of innocent people from many countries, and it is continually trying to find ways to keep killing innocent people. It is not a party to the Geneva Convention, and thus the Convention does not apply to al Qaeda.

The Convention creates requirements for POW status that al Qaeda and the Taliban do not meet: things such as fixed distinctive emblems or uniforms, a command organization, the carrying of arms openly, and other factors. The attacks of September 11th and the other terrorist acts al Qaeda has committed around the world targeted innocent civilians and are in flagrant defiance of the law of armed conflict.

President Bush has determined that while the Geneva Convention applies to Taliban detainees because Afghanistan is a signatory to the Convention, they are not POWs under the Convention because—like al Qaeda—they do not meet the Convention's own requirements for POW status.

We must remember that these are people who have harmed our troops abroad and our citizens at home, and who intend to do so again. So they fall into a unique category, different from lawful prisoners of war in past conflicts such as World War II, and far different from criminal defendants in the American justice system. We are holding them, first of all, to prevent them from causing further harm to our troops and our civilians, and second, to gain by lawful interrogation methods any information possible to save more lives, both military and civilian.

Also, it is important to point out that even in cases where the Convention does not apply, U.S. policy is to treat each and every detainee in our custody humanely. Our policy is to treat detainees humanely, consistent with the Geneva Convention, even though they are unlawful combatants who are not entitled to the protections of the Convention.

Another myth: Top officials in the Administration have endorsed torture. Torture is systematically used in interrogating detainees. The CSRTs rely on information obtained through torture or other forms of coercion.

The Administration's policy is very clear. As the President has said, we do not support or condone torture under any circumstances. There are no exceptions. In addition to the President's clear direction on this issue, we have domestic laws and international treaties that prohibit us from engaging in any type of torture. And our policy has been not to use cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, at home or abroad.

Congress recently passed legislation codifying that policy. The legislation prohibits the infliction of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment on any person in the custody or control of the United States government. It also requires uniform standards – those authorized by the Army Field Manual – for the interrogation of Defense Department detainees.

We take our legal and moral obligations seriously. When there is any hint or suggestion that someone acting on behalf of the United States has engaged in torture it is fully and promptly investigated. We have a zero tolerance policy for that kind of behavior. When abuse does occur, those responsible will be held accountable for their illegal actions.

There have been cases of alleged abuse at Guantanamo, but they are not the norm and are not indicative of the behavior of our troops. To assess detention activities, the Administration has conducted more than 10 major reviews, assessments, and investigations, which produced over 500 specific recommendations to improve operations, many of which have already been implemented. In addition, there have been 24-hour inspections by the International Red Cross at Guantanamo.[need to confirm previous 2 sentences w/ DoD] We will continue to aggressively investigate credible allegations of prisoner abuse, to hold individuals accountable for wrongdoing, and to implement fixes to minimize the likelihood of future abuse.

Our policy against torture is fully reflected in the CSRTs. The CSRTs are required to evaluate the "reliability" of any evidence proffered to them. They are free to disregard or to discount the weight of evidence based on allegations that it was a product of torture or coercion.

We cannot forget that our enemies are cunning and eager to exploit any process we extend them. We know, for example, that an al Qaeda training manual instructs would-be terrorists on how to operate in a prison or detention center and turn our justice system to their advantage. It directs detainees to "insist on proving that torture was inflicted" and to "complain of mistreatment while in prison." Our enemies are more than willing to return good-faith process with bad-faith manipulation. Yet, knowing this, we continue to take our legal obligations very seriously. This government will not stand for torture under any circumstance.

Myth: The military commissions that will try the detainees lack basic due process.

Pursuant to Presidential order, when justified, the detained enemy combatants will receive a full and fair trial by military commission for violations of the laws of war. The use of military commissions in this context is well-established. Longstanding Supreme Court precedent, In re

Yamashita, holds that the trial and punishment of enemy combatants for violations of the law of war is part of the conduct of war. [327 U.S. 1, 11 (1946).] Since the founding of our nation, the United States military has used military commissions during wartime to try violations of the laws of war. Military commissions were used in the Revolutionary War, the Mexican-American War, the Civil War, and World War II.

The military commission proceedings are full and fair. They afford an accused substantial procedural protections: notification of charges in a language understood by the accused; the presumption of innocence; trial before an impartial and independent panel of three to seven officers; proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; the right to call and cross-examine witnesses; the right not to testify, with no adverse inference for remaining silent; appointment of military defense counsel at no cost to the defendant, or the right to hire civilian defense counsel; privileged communications with defense counsel; adequate support and resources for defense counsel; appointment of interpreters and translators; open proceedings, except as absolutely necessary to protect national security; and review of the record of trial by a three-member review panel. The military commission rules compare favorably to those used in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. They are consistent with our national commitment to the rule of law.

This is the first time since World War II that our country has had to convene military commissions. We have not simply dusted off the old World War II procedures; we have built a whole new judicial system to try these cases. The process we have established strikes a proper balance between the twin objectives of protecting national security in this time of war and providing the accused a full and fair trial.

Myth: The United States sends detainees to other countries that we know engage in torture.

At every step of the way, including this issue of renditions, President Bush and this administration have made very clear that we abide by the laws of our land and the treaty obligations we have. We will not torture here in America, and we will not export torture. That is unacceptable to this

President, and something that we will not tolerate. When we do extradite we seek assurances from those other countries that these individuals will be treated humanely and in many instances we follow up with these countries to ensure that is happening.

Myth: The courts have rejected the CSRTs, the military commissions, and our treatment of Guantanamo detainees. The Administration is seeking to avoid judicial review of its policies regarding detainees.

These charges are false. The Supreme Court in Hamdi firmly established that detention of enemy combatants, even U.S. citizen enemy combatants, for the duration of the conflict is a fundamental and accepted incident to war. The Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit has held that Congress has fully authorized the military commissions. [need to mention cert in Hamdan, or just strike previous sentence?]

Nonetheless, our enemies, following the express instruction of al Qaeda training manuals, have clogged our courts with frivolous litigation. 160 habeas petitions have been filed in federal court on behalf of approximately 300 Guantanamo detainees. These lawsuits seek everything from access to DVDs to more exercise time to faster mail delivery. Detainees' lawyers have even sued because they consider dial-up Internet access at Guantanamo too slow. And some suits seek not just habeas relief but money damages from individual soldiers.

The government was fully prepared to defend these frivolous lawsuits, and had taken the unprecedented step of allowing private lawyers to access the Guantanamo detainees. But Congress properly determined that such litigation permits captured enemy combatants to continue their fight against the United States in its own courts, at great cost to the nation. The recent legislation passed in December eliminates the hundreds of claims brought by terrorists at Guantanamo that are now pending in our courts.

I applaud this action. As Justice Jackson once explained, "It would be difficult to devise more effective fettering of a field commander than to allow the very enemies he is ordered to reduce to submission to call him to account in his own civil courts and divert his efforts and attention from the military offensive abroad to the legal defensive at home." [Eisentrager, 339 U.S. at 779.] Litigation over Guantanamo distracts our military from its core mission of fighting the war on terror.

As the President has said, our men and women on the front lines in the war on terror deserve our respect and thanks for doing a difficult job in the interest of our country, not a rash of lawsuits brought by our enemies in our own courts. And so I am pleased that the recent legislation provides additional liability protection for those engaged in properly authorized detention or interrogation of terrorists. And it provides for legal counsel and expenses if a terrorist attempts to sue our service members.

The new law does not, as some have falsely charged, cut off terrorist litigation or attack the Supreme Court's 2004 decisions. In fact, it allows each detainee at Guantanamo substantial litigation opportunities: first, a guaranteed right of access to the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit to challenge whether he should be detained as an enemy combatant; second, a guaranteed opportunity for D.C. Circuit review if he is convicted of serious war crimes; and, third, the right to an annual ARB proceeding to determine whether he should be released.

As Senator Graham said on the floor of the Senate, these are terrorists who are suing our own troops and officials in our domestic civilian courts in a time of war. Detained enemies have never before been allowed to challenge their detention in our courts. Yet the new law gives them more process in courts than enemy combatants have ever had in history – and more process in courts than even our own soldiers receive if convicted of crimes by a court-martial.

This law resoundingly reaffirms America's commitment to liberty and justice, even for suspected terrorists. We will continue to work with the Congress to ensure that the United States can effectively fight the war on terror while upholding our commitment to the rule of law.

We cannot become complacent just because another day passes without an attack on our soil. Our enemies are diffuse and elusive. They are patient, diabolical, and resolute. And they intend to harm us again. We have been using every tool at our disposal to stop them. But we have done so in a way that is consistent with our legal obligations abroad and at home.

There is a famous maxim, inter arma silent leges: In time of war, the laws fall silent. Let that never be said of America in this war on terror. Let us hold fast to our laws, principles, and morals. And let us remain true to the values that make America a symbol of freedom.

Senate Extends USA PATRIOT Act Temporarily

Threats Loom Over Further Reauthorization

A minority of Senators in the U.S. Senate have effectively stalled the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act, one of the key tools used to fight terrorism after the September 11th attacks on America. In 25 days, key provisions of this vital law will expire and leave America more vulnerable to the terrorists seeking to attack us.

In fact, just a few weeks ago, the Senate Democratic leader Senator Harry Reid boasted to a group of political supporters that Senate Democrats had "killed the Patriot Act."

President George W. Bush has called on Senate Democrats to reauthorize this key anti-terrorism legislation, saying it was "inexcusable" to block renewal of the law in the face of terrorist threats.

"The terrorist threat is not going to expire," Bush said. "The senators obstructing the Patriot Act need to understand that the expiration of this vital law will endanger America and will leave us in a weaker position in the fight against brutal killers," he added.

President George W. Bush, flanked by Attorney General Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff, meets with U.S. Attorneys from across the country who have used the Patriot Act to help keep America safe from terrorist attacks for more than four years (Roosevelt Room, Tuesday, Jan. 3, 2006). "This Patriot Act was passed overwhelmingly by the United States Congress in 2001," said the President in his remarks to the press. "Members from both parties came together and said we will give those on the front line of protecting America the tools necessary to protect American citizens, and, at the same time, guard the civil liberties of our citizens." White House photo by Eric Draper

PATRIOT ACT FACT:

In 2001, after the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. Senate voted 98-1 to pass the Patriot Act. Nearly all of the senators now threatening to continue to filibuster the Patriot Act actually voted for it in 2001.

What Happens if the Patriot Act Expires?

If the Patriot Act is allowed to expire, we will revert back to pre-9/11 law enforcement capabilities, making it more difficult to investigate a potential terrorist attack than it is to catch a drug dealer, a mobster, or a white collar criminal.

For example:

- Confusion will once again be injected into what and how information may be shared between criminal investigators and intelligence personnel.
- Investigators would possibly be several steps behind sophisticated terrorists who frequently change phones to evade surveillance.
- In the vast majority of cases, intelligence investigators will no longer be able to trace the calls of terrorists and spies.
- It will once again be illegal for a law enforcement officer who learns of an imminent terrorist threat through a wiretap to disclose that threat to our nation's intelligence agencies without first obtaining a court's approval.

DID YOU KNOW?

- Although there has not been a verified abuse of the Patriot Act since its enactment in 2001, the reauthorization bill includes more than 30 new significant civil liberties protections.
- In addition to reauthorizing the Patriot Act, the reauthorization bill also includes new provisions that would bolster port security, help guard against attacks on mass transportation like trains and buses, and continue the attack on the illegal money flow to terrorists around the world.

None of these beneficial provisions will become law unless the minority of Senators who are filibustering the Patriot Act stop their obstructionist tactics.

First, let me thank Omar for the tremendous amount of work he's done on this report. He is really the one who has pulled the laboring oar in drafting and assimilating all of your submissions into a single, cohesive document. Second, let me thank all of you for your feedback. We never could have gotten this far without your input. Finally, a gentle reminder that we are still waiting on supporting documentation from a number of components (you know who you are). We are cross-checking the report with the supporting documentation, which is a time-intensive process. We cannot submit the report to the printer without your supporting documentation, so please get it to us if you have not done so already. I am sure that none of you want your component to be the one holding up finalization of the report!

<< File: DOJ Trafficking Report 1.10.06 >>

Everyone:

As promised, attached is the last draft of the DOJ trafficking report we will circulate to the working group. This draft makes an attempt to incorporate graphs, pictures, and other images to give as good a sense as possible as to what the final product will look like. Because this version includes numerous images, it is a HUGE file. The document has been compressed into a "ZIP file." I've been advised that it is best for you to save the file onto your desktop for quick retrieval. If you do not have WINZIP, you should either obtain the program or contact me and I will burn a CD for you. Please don't attempt to redline this document, the software may freeze on you. Instead, send your comments in the body of an email and images should be attached to your email.

Your expertise and help has resulted in a fairly nice document. Please review and provide comment to us no later than COB tomorrow, 1/11/06. If you propose any new language, please submit drafted language ready for insertion into the document. Same with pictures or other images. Please provide a copy of the image and identify a location in the report for it.

Many Thanks!

Department of Justice
Report on Activities to Combat Human Trafficking
Fiscal Years 2001-2005

I. An Introduction to Human Trafficking

Human trafficking is a pernicious crime that violates the fundamental principles of our society. For traffickers, victims are commodities to be traded and exploited in any market. Human trafficking is the modern-day form of slavery. It requires the use of force, fraud, or coercion by a trafficker to compel a person into, or hold someone in, an employment situation in which he or she will be criminally exploited. Trafficking may occur when victims are transported across borders or within a nation, or may not involve transportation at all. Victims, often women, are usually lured by promises of well-paying jobs. Once deprived of the opportunity to return home or communicate with their family, victims are generally held through force or threats in situations of sexual exploitation or forced labor. Human trafficking offenses thus transgress the victim's human liberty in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment's guarantee of freedom. As such, trafficking offends the core civil rights on which our Constitution and our country are based.

> Human life is the gift of our Creator -- and it should never be for sale. It takes a special kind of depravity to exploit and hurt the most vulnerable members of society. Human traffickers rob children of their innocence, they expose them to the worst of life before they have seen much of life.
> –President George W. Bush, July 16, 2004

By statute, a victim of a "severe form of trafficking in persons" is entitled to certain public programs and benefits. A severe form of trafficking must include the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for one of the three following purposes:

- Labor or services, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- A commercial sex act, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- If the person is under 18 years of age, any commercial sex act, regardless of whether any form of coercion is involved.[1]

Since 2001, the Department of Justice has achieved an impressive record of prosecuting defendants for holding their victims in compelled service in such diverse areas as prostitution, field labor, domestic service, concubinage, "exotic dancing," pornography, garment factory "sweatshops," and street peddling. From fiscal year 2001 through fiscal year 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed 91 trafficking cases, a 405% increase over the number of trafficking cases filed from fiscal years 1996 through 2000. In these cases, Department attorneys charged 248 trafficking defendants, a 210% increase over the previous five fiscal years. In addition, prosecutors with the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices convicted 140 defendants of trafficking-related crimes, a 109% increase over the previous five years.

Traffickers take advantage of the victims' hopes for a better life, preying on or even creating vulnerabilities that they can exploit. For example, in United States v. Satia, Louisa Satia and her husband, Kevin Nanji, used a false passport to bring 14 year-old "R.O." from Cameroon, where R.O. had worked for Satia's mother since the age of 12. R.O. was lured by the promise of an American education. Satia and Nanji refused to send the girl to school, however, and instead forced her to work for them as a maid and as a nanny to their young children. R.O. was not permitted to leave Satia and Nanji's apartment alone, except to take out the trash and walk the children to the school bus stop. Satia hit R.O. routinely, poked R.O. in the eyes, sprayed window cleanser on R.O., poured cola and glue in R.O.'s hair, and threatened her with deportation even though they were the ones who had brought her to the country illegally. Nanji made repeated sexual advances toward the girl. Apart from keeping R.O. in a condition of involuntary servitude, Satia solicited numerous people to sell their identities to her so that she could create false passports and routinely arranged false marriages as part of an immigration fraud scheme. In 2002, after their conviction at trial of involuntary servitude, the defendants were sentenced to 9 years in prison and ordered to pay $105,300 in restitution.[2]

Traffickers may lure their victims into farm work, factories, domestic service or the hospitality and sex industries. For instance, in a pathbreaking case in Florida, United States v. Cadena, Mexican women and girls as young as 14 years of age were brought to the United States with promises of good jobs as waitresses and landscapers, only to be held as slaves in a high-volume prostitution operation.[3]

The Cadena family

I hated to be in the brothels. There were so many clients that came to the house. I was so scared. I would try to hide from them so they wouldn't pick me. The Bossses told me I had to work and to stop behaving in this manner. Also, the Bosses would rape some of the other girls. This scared me. I was afraid they might rape me or hurt me in some other way. I didn't know anyone. I was alone. I was very frightened.

d the women in their service by shooting into the ground at their feet, threatening their families, beating them, and raping them as punishment if they tried to run away. The ringleader and six other men were convicted of involuntary servitude and sentenced to up to 15 years of incarceration. The Cadena case is ongoing, and Federal Bureau of Investigation and Departmental prosecutors and victim-witness specialists have continued to prosecute Cadena family members and assist the survivors. In 2002, one of the family members was apprehended at the United States-Mexico border and pled guilty to conspiracy to enslave the women and girls. With the cooperation of the Mexican Government, the Department secured the conviction of one of the Cadena brothers in Mexico in 2002, where he was sentenced to 24 years of incarceration. In 2005, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department's Office of International Affairs achieved the arrest in 2005 of yet another member of the family; trial is pending in Mexico as of the time of this report and a request for extradition prepared by the Office of International Affairs is pending. The Cadena victims have been assisted by a non-governmental organization that is funded by the Department's Office for Victims of Crime, and with the help of the case agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff, they have been able to bring their children and custodial parents to the United States.

Any specific instance of human trafficking may involve a range of other criminal activity that is not limited to federal anti-human trafficking laws, such as inter-state transportation for prostitution, money laundering, and racketeering. Trafficking indictments often reflect this as the Department is committed to attacking this problem using all of the varied tools in the federal prosecutor's tool box.[4] For instance, in United States v. Zavala, Mariluz Zavala, who in November 2005 received a 15-year prison sentence for enslaving Peruvian workers in Long Island, New York, was charged with a multi-object conspiracy, where the Department alleged that she and her co-conspirators had conspired to commit forced labor and involuntary servitude by withholding immigration documents. The Department also charged her with extortion and falsifying immigration documents, criminal violations that are not found in the federal anti-human trafficking law.[5] In forced prostitution cases, such as United States v. Reyes-Rojas,[6] where two brothers were charged with sex trafficking, additional charges often include inter-state transportation for prostitution under the law known commonly as the "The Mann Act,"[7] and harboring people for prostitution. In cases like United States v. Maksimenko, where a Lithuanian man pled guilty to enslaving Ukranian women in strip clubs through force and threats, federal prosecutors brought money laundering charges. Trafficking charges are predicate acts under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) statutes,[8] and accordingly can sustain money laundering charges for transactions carried out with the proceeds of, or in furtherance of, a trafficking scheme.

Sometimes, when a trafficking situation has occurred, but there is not sufficient evidence with which to establish a trafficking offense, the Mann Act and immigration statutes can be powerful tools to vindicate the federal interest. For example, in United States v. Reddy,[9] the investigation revealed that, for over ten years, defendant Lakireddy Bali Reddy, a wealthy San Francisco Bay Area businessman, maintained a number of young girls and women as a quasi-harem for his sexual gratification and to work in his household and business enterprises. These victims were predominantly from families of lower castes in India and were brought into the United States by way of fraudulent employment offers or sham marriages. Members of Reddy's family posed as relatives of the victims to assist in their fraudulent migration. His scheme came to light after a teenage girl died of carbon monoxide poisoning in the apartment where he had sequestered her, her sister, and another girl. In 2001, Reddy pled guilty to transporting his victims in interstate and foreign commerce for illegal sexual activity. He was sentenced to more than 8 years in prison and ordered to pay $2,000,000 in restitution to four of his victims. The victims received benefits and services under the TVPA and today remain safely in the United States.

II. An Administration Priority

Early in this Administration, the President identified the eradication of human trafficking as a priority. Two particular actions by the President focused Federal resources on trafficking. First, in February 2002, the President issued Executive Order 13257, creating a cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. The President ordered that the Task Force be chaired by the Secretary of State and be comprised of the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Director of Central Intelligence, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.[10] The President took this action to ensure that the TVPA was fully implemented in a coordinated fashion throughout the federal government.[11]

> Slavery, human trafficking, and sexual servitude are crimes that wrench our hearts. They rob human beings of freedom. They strike at our nation's belief in the potential of every life. They are crimes that demand swift and implacable prosecution of the predators. They are crimes that deserve warmth and compassion for the victims.
> -Attorney General John Ashcroft, January 29, 2004

Second, also in February 2002, the President issued National Security Presidential Directive 22 (NSPD-22) to identify human trafficking as an important national security matter as well as to instruct federal agencies to strengthen their collective efforts, capabilities, and coordination to support the President's goal of abolishing human trafficking.[12] NSPD-22 states that human trafficking is a transnational threat that is an affront to the principles on which this country stands. The relationship of human trafficking to organized crime, especially transnational criminal syndicates, fosters official corruption and threatens the rule of law.[13] The clandestine movement of persons across borders also poses terrorism and public health concerns. The United States Attorney's Office for the District of Montana, for example, treats every border incursion as potentially related to terrorism and, in 2004, was involved in a joint operation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Canadian Border Services Agency that resulted in the identification of a dozen Korean women believed to be destined for the sex trade, 80% of whom tested positive for tuberculosis. The syndicates that recruit and move these victims are often the same ones that are responsible for other trans-border crimes, like smuggling, drug trafficking, and the arms trade. Traffickers can and will move any type of cargo, human or otherwise, for profit. The fight against trafficking is therefore a critical element of United States foreign policy, requiring full use of the tools of diplomacy and the cooperation of American and foreign law enforcement.

[11] The President subsequently issued an Executive Order amending Executive Order 13257 on March 18, 2004, conforming it to the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-193, 117 Stat. 2875.

Moreover, NSPD-22 views the abolition of prostitution, the driving force behind sex trafficking, as integral to the abolition of human trafficking. Regarding the United States's policy towards prostitution, NSPD-22 states:

> The United States opposes prostitution and any related activities, including pimping, pandering, and/or maintaining brothels as contributing to the phenomenon of trafficking in persons. These activities are inherently harmful and dehumanizing. The United States Government's position is that these activities should not be regulated as a legitimate form of work for any human being.[14]

NSPD-22 created a three-point plan of action:

1. Implementing Training in Federal Agencies
   The President required all federal agencies to ensure that their own personnel were trained and equipped to carry out their anti-trafficking responsibilities and that their personnel coordinated with counterparts in other agencies. Further, NSPD-22 stated that the United States has a zero-tolerance policy with regard to trafficking by United States Government employees and contractors, who are to be educated about trafficking and investigated, prosecuted, and punished for engaging in it.

2. Developing Cooperation With State and Local Law Enforcement in the United States
   The President recognized that state and local law enforcement are critical to federal efforts to combat human trafficking. NSPD-22 instructs federal agencies to vigorously enforce laws against traffickers, and to provide training and assistance to state and local law enforcement to assist them in recognizing victims and to hold perpetrators accountable for their crimes.

3. Integrating and Coordinating International Programs
   The President required all federal agencies to coordinate foreign assistance programs,

> including funding to governmental and non-governmental organizations and public awareness programs, to combat trafficking in persons. NSPD-22 also required agencies to ensure that contractors receiving United States funding through international programs do not engage in trafficking activities. The President also directed agencies to work to prevent future victimization by reducing the vulnerability of individuals to trafficking, particularly through the expansion of educational and economic opportunities and the protection and promotion of human rights. The President further directed federal agencies to employ diplomatic and foreign policy tools to encourage other nations and multilateral organizations to work with the United States to combat this crime, to draft and enforce laws against trafficking, and to hold accountable those who engage in this crime.[15]

In 2003, Congress passed and President Bush signed the reauthorization of the TVPA, known as the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA).[16] The TVPRA of 2003 codified the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons by creating the Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG), which meets quarterly. The TVPRA slightly expanded the SPOG's authority, particularly as it concerns inter-agency coordination to develop the capacity of foreign nations, both source and destination countries, to combat trafficking; to examine the role of sex tourism in human trafficking; and to foster consultation with governmental and non-governmental organizations regarding implementation of the TVPRA.

The Attorney General has been an engaged member of the SPOG, and the Department supports this group in a variety of ways. In 2004, for example, the Civil Rights Division and the Office of Justice Programs participated in a SPOG subcommittee charged with designing the President's international human trafficking initiative. Currently, the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, the Office of Legal Policy, and the Office for Victims of Crime are members of the SPOG Subcommittee on Domestic Trafficking. The National Institute of Justice, a component of the Office of Justice Programs, is a member of the SPOG Subcommittee on Research, which shares information regarding research grants and other activities by each SPOG member agency. This subcommittee is also studying the issue of accurately estimating the number of trafficking victims within the United States. In addition, the Office of Justice Programs, the Department's principal grant-making agency, and the Office on Violence Against Women participate in the interagency grant information-sharing process of the SPOG. The grant information-sharing process is designed to provide SPOG member agencies with an opportunity to review and comment on proposed grant awards, helping to ensure that domestic and international grant programs are coordinated across the federal government. Finally, the Office of Legal Policy chairs the SPOG Subcommittee on Regulations, a working group charged with the development of federal regulations to implement the TVPRA.

III. Scope of the Problem

A. How Many Victims and Who are They?

It is extremely difficult to quantify the number of victims trafficked globally and into the United States each year. Some estimates indicate that as many as 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, with up to 17,500 victims trafficked into our country each year.[17] Clearly, the problem is of sufficient magnitude that a continued dedication of substantial resources to this enforcement area is very much in order.

Despite our record number of investigations and prosecutions, there is a noted disparity between the estimated number of victims and those who have been found and assisted. The Department realizes that it must address the incongruity between some estimates and the fewer than 1,000 victims who have been assisted through the efforts of federal, state, and local law enforcement since 2003, when services for trafficking victims were first made available under the TVPA. Though the possible reasons for this disparity vary, the difference nevertheless signals the need to carefully scrutinize the estimated number of trafficking victims to assure that it reflects as accurately as possible the number of human trafficking victims within our country.

Some Estimates Overstate the Number of Victims

Some possible explanations are that estimates may overstate the extent of the problem and conflate human trafficking with the smuggling and harboring of illegal aliens or with the related crime of migrant prostitution. Trafficking victims are not all illegal aliens; human trafficking is distinct from human smuggling. Trafficking victims may be United States citizens, legal residents, or visitors. For example, United States v. Pipkins was the first case in which the Department successfully prosecuted two pimps for trafficking women and girls, all American citizens.[18] Prostitution alone is not trafficking; but where, as here, it involved the use of force or coercion to prevent people from leaving the enterprise, it becomes trafficking. Human smuggling, on the other hand, is the facilitation, transportation, attempted transportation, or illegal entry of a person or persons across an international border, in violation of American immigration laws. Many of those illegally entering the United States are smuggled, not trafficked.[19] Smuggling may occur clandestinely or through deception, such as the use of fraudulent passports or other immigration documents.[20] Human smugglers enter into a contractual relationship with those they will illegally transport into our country. The smuggler is often paid a considerable amount of money for his services and the relationship normally ends once the smuggled person has entered the United States and the debt is paid. Sometimes, smuggling may turn into trafficking when smugglers extort their victims until the smuggling debt is repaid.

The defendants in United States v. Pipkins.

Identifying Victims is Difficult

Another explanation is that identifying and assisting victims of human trafficking are difficult tasks, and consequently, the Department does not have reliable figures regarding the number of victims who may be in the United States. Trafficking victims who have been rescued in connection with federal government activities over the past several years have come from more than 50 different countries.[21] But several factors contribute to the difficulty of identifying trafficking victims. Human trafficking, like many other crimes, often requires that the victim and the criminal enterprise remain in the shadows of our communities. Moreover, victims often suffer from paralyzing fear and are reluctant to seek help, further exacerbating the problem. Traffickers prey on the meek and destitute, coercing and deceiving them into hiding.

Trafficking Schemes May Be Dismantled In A Variety of Ways

A third possible explanation for this disparity is that victims may be helped by state and local law enforcement activities that the Department does not know about, or, in some instances, state and local officials may not realize that they have uncovered trafficking victims. Under our federal system of government, state and local governments may prosecute these cases under other criminal laws. Furthermore, although a particular prosecution by the Department may only result in the rescue of one or a few victims, it is reasonable to assume that enterprises that have been in business for several years have victimized dozens and possibly hundreds of people.

Developing A Better Understanding of Trafficking & its Victims

The Department is committed to discussing and refining methodologies for estimating the number of victims that may yield more reliable results. The Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics and National Institute of Justice have begun to research these issues and will publish information useful to victim advocates, policy makers, and law enforcement officials. Indeed, Congress has recently mandated that the Department undertake research to develop an estimate of the number of persons engaged in severe forms of trafficking and commercial sex acts and to share this information with its state and local governmental and non-governmental partners.[22] The enactment of anti-trafficking crimes at the state level, many of which are based on the Department's model anti-trafficking statute, is a heartening trend, as the men and women in state and local law enforcement far outnumber the federal resources available to combat this problem.[23] As with domestic violence and sexual abuse, it is local police and prosecutors who will investigate and prosecute the lion's share of trafficking cases in the coming years. The Department is committed to supporting these partners in expanding the victim-centered approach it has developed.

B. The Department Responds to this Crime with A Victim-Centered Approach

[W]e must combat crimes that tear at the fabric of our

Victim-centered prosecutions recognize that the government's interest in these cases stems from the violation of the fundamental right of freedom. Moreover, victim-centered prosecutions are essential to the liberation and care of victims. In vindicating the survivor's right to be free, federal prosecutors must give him or her the opportunity to use that freedom and the support to make it meaningful. The Department's approach flows from our nation's foundational principles– respect for human dignity and one's civil rights

Typically, federal prosecutors learn about a crime from the victim, an eyewitness, or through an investigation. For traffickers to be successful, they must hide their crime from law enforcement by concealing their victims and their collaborators. Those who benefit from trafficking – men who frequent prostitutes and those who benefit from the low cost labor that the traffickers broker – are often momentary beneficiaries, and may not even know that the victim is being held in compelled service. Thus, the only remaining eyewitness is often the victim. To prevent their workforce from running away and to forestall detection, traffickers have an incentive to instill fear in their victims– fear of American law enforcement, fear of their captors, and fear of anyone they meet in their unfamiliar settings. Many victims are far from their country of origin and their families. They do not speak English and are more likely than not to lack any legal immigration status. Traffickers prey on the unsettled aspects of their lives, playing victims against each other and fostering collaboration.

Victims of trafficking often live and are forced to work in linguistic and social isolation. They fear the threat of exposure and feel shame about the work they are forced to do, particularly when that work includes sexual abuse. They also fear continued violence or the threat of reprisals against loved ones. They can develop a psychological and emotional dependence on the trafficker or others. Immigrant victims of human trafficking often face a special set of circumstances that keep them in the shadows of our nation's communities. Traffickers will often withhold from immigrant victims of trafficking their immigration documents. Immigrant victims may have a fear of American law enforcement , do not understand their rights, and fear risking default on monies owed their captors, as well as the collateral effect that may have on their families back home. The result is that victims will rarely self-report and so they must be pro-actively found.

While relying on the victims to give testimony about their suffering – the same duty American law requires of any witness – the Department places a premium on addressing the victims' need for recovery. Agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff work with, and are intensifying their relationships with, victim service providers. These groups, often experienced faith or community-based organizations that have previously served immigrant or abused populations, can help keep the victims safe, meet their medical and housing needs, and help them find an equilibrium in their lives through job training, language classes, and life-skills counseling.

"It's their fault that I lost my friends, my parents....My story is very long. It took me about a year to reach my parents....They (the defendants) don't repent for everything they did to me, for all the damage they did to me. They hit me....They thought they were big shots. I tried to defend myself but couldn't. I tried to escape...."

–An in-court statement by S.A.H., a victim in United States v. Jimenez-Calderon

The services that are available to victims formed the basis of the Department of Justice "victim-centered approach" that understands that the mission of government is to remove victims from the abusive setting, place them into safe programs of restorative care and hold the perpetrators accountable. Congress intended this comprehensive effort to combat trafficking in the TVPA and is reauthorization in 2003 and 2005. One of the added benefits of restorative care for victims is that they become empowered to provide critical evidence that law enforcement can use to investigate and prosecute traffickers. Without these services victims would remain too traumatized or afraid to assist law enforcement.

Victim-centered prosecutions, where government funded services and protection are provided to victims who assist an investigation and prosecution, are critical to the prevention of human trafficking. Without the victim's contribution, law enforcement's ability to stop traffickers from recruiting other vulnerable persons is blocked. Without the victim's help, police and prosecutors will not be able to effectively neutralize the trafficking scheme and prevent others from being trafficked.

Federal law enforcement are committed to combating human trafficking with a victim-centered approach. Federal investigators and prosecutors, including Federal Bureau of Investigation and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and Assistant United States Attorneys, immediately refer a victim to victim-witness specialists who begin to provide the appropriate referrals to victim service providers, often grantees that are funded through the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Refugee Resettlement. The Civil Rights Division and the Office for Victims of Crime work together to ensure that grantees are available to provide services to victims. In addition, because trafficking victims may avail themselves of victim services providers funded through other Departmental components, such as the Office on Violence Against Women and the Bureau of Justice Assistance, grantees of these offices are trained to provide assistance to victims of human trafficking.

Department components regularly promote a victim-centered response and educate other law enforcement agencies and victim service providers about the dynamics of trafficking and the need for pro-active investigations in an effort to increase awareness and outreach to new partners, with the ultimate goal of preventing victimization. For example:

- Since 2002, Civil Rights Division staff have trained federal, state, and local law enforcement officers and victim service providers about proactive victim-centered investigations. In addition, Criminal Section lawyers are educating prosecutors and other law enforcement officials across the country on the criminal provisions of the new trafficking statute and providing practical guidance on investigating and prosecuting these difficult cases, as well as assisting localities to establish regional working groups to better coordinate and focus anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. The Section continues to organize and lead training efforts at the Justice Department's national training facility for federal investigators and prosecutors from around the country, as well as victim-witness coordinators from the Department of Justice and other federal law enforcement agencies.

- Since January 2003, nearly 40,000 law enforcement officers, attorneys, social service providers, advocates, medical and mental health professionals, and community members have been trained by the Office for Victims of Crime and Bureau of Justice Assistance grantees. Moreover, the Bureau of Justice Assistance's law enforcement training emphasizes that code enforcement officials, fire marshals, and other persons who may have access to where victims are being held should be trained on signs of human trafficking.

- The Federal Bureau of Investigation's Civil Rights Unit and various United States Attorneys' Offices have also participated in dozens of regional Department of Justice sponsored human trafficking training conferences hosted throughout the country, in cities including Los Angeles, Houston, New Haven, Portland, St. Louis, San Diego, San Francisco, and Tampa.

- Since 2003, the Criminal Division's Child Endangerment and Obscenity Section has trained more than 350 law enforcement personnel and other officials on the investigation and prosecution of child prostitution cases, emphasizing the importance of a victim's safety.

successful efforts in combating human trafficking would not be possible without the enactment of several statutes by Congress. Prior to 2001, trafficking cases were prosecuted under a number of federal criminal statutes including the involuntary servitude statutes,[24] the Mann Act,[25] and labor laws concerning workplace conditions and compensation.[26] The Mann Act statutes were formerly thought of as the primary federal anti-trafficking tool, when "trafficking" was perceived as interstate transportation for prostitution, as opposed to the modern definition, which focuses on compelled service. The involuntary servitude statutes set forth a variety of substantive crimes covering the slave trade, involuntary servitude, and peonage. Sections 1584 and 1581, of Title 18 of the United States Code, which respectively criminalize involuntary servitude and peonage, were the primary statutes prosecutors used in involuntary servitude and trafficking prosecutions. Section 1583, which criminalizes kidnaping victims into slavery, likewise remains a useful tool in modern federal prosecutions. Prior to the TVPA, these statutes did not always treat the workers involved as victims and enforcement authority for each of these possible anti-trafficking tools was scattered across the United States Government, leading to differing outcomes depending on which charges were brought or which agency learned of the allegations of abuse.

Today, the centerpiece of United States Government efforts is the TVPA.[27] The TVPA provided for a range of new protections and assistance for victims of trafficking who cooperate with law enforcement investigations; it expanded the crimes and enhanced the penalties available to federal investigators and prosecutors pursuing traffickers; and it expanded United States activities internationally to prevent victims from being trafficked in the first place.

Protections and Assistance for Victims

The TVPA authorized a dedicated stream of funding for victim services and provides for immigration relief for severe forms of trafficking.[28] Under the TVPA, a victim is certified by the Department of Health and Human Services as eligible for services funded by any federal or state program or activity, such as the Departments of Agriculture, Health and Human Services, and Labor or the Legal Services Corporation. Department of Health and Human Services certification is granted after consultation with the Department's law enforcement officials, including investigators and prosecutors, that the victim meets the statutory definition of a "victim of a severe form of trafficking" and is also cooperating with the federal law enforcement investigation. The TVPA also authorized the Department to fund and provide training and technical assistance to law enforcement agencies and victim service providers.

The Department's Office for Victims of Crime directs its funding to support services for pre-certified victims and may, in special circumstances, fund organizations that provide services to certified victims. Pre-certified victims are those victims who have been identified by law enforcement in connection with an investigation and are awaiting Department of Health and Human Services certification that they are a victim of a severe form of trafficking and assisting law enforcement. This is significant because pre-certified victims are not entitled to the same publicly funded benefits that certified victims are, yet the need for services is most acute at this stage. Secondarily, providing those services enables victims, in most instances, to cooperate with law enforcement to investigate and prosecute their human traffickers. A safe and healthy victim is better able to articulate to investigators and in a court what has happened to her. Indeed, a survivor of trafficking can often be an effective anti-trafficking advocates and providers of services for victims.

> My experience was terrifying and horrible. I was so unhappy because of the abuse and because the bosses would not give me any of the money I made them. I asked them to send money to my family and they refused. I felt trapped there. Whenever I tried to run away, they found me and punished me. I could not go back to Mexico because I was told that they tore up my identification papers. I didn't have any money with which to leave because they refused to give me any of the proceeds from my work. I was very scared and sad.

The TVPA[29] provided a clear definition of human trafficking as a crime, created stiff sentences, and provided prosecutors with definitions of terms used to describe the offense such as "coercion," and "commercial sex act."[30] Traffickers that use force, fraud or coercion, or who exploit children under 14 years of age for commercial sex acts, may be sentenced to a term of up to life imprisonment.[31]

Prevention

As discussed above[32], victim services under the TVPA that are provided in connection with a victim helping in the government's prosecution of traffickers is essential to prevention. The TVPA has also given the Department the tools needed to increase public awareness within our communities, particularly among law enforcement and social services agencies, as well as internationally. The Department's activities, including those undertaken by non-governmental organizations that receive grants from the Office for Victims of Crime, that aim to prevent victimization through public awareness and outreach are discussed below in Part VI "The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers," section C "Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations."

Subsequently, in 2003, Congress, with the President's support, re-authorized the TVPA,[33] which further enhanced penalties and added responsibilities to the United States Government's anti-trafficking portfolio, such as new public awareness campaigns to combat sex tourism and some refinements to the federal criminal law. Significantly, Congress included trafficking as a predicate for money laundering and racketeering, under the RICO statute. Prosecutors have used this effective tool to dismantle trafficking syndicates. In conjunction with the mandatory restitution and forfeiture provisions of the TVPA, these sections work together to ensure that defendants convicted of trafficking in persons receive sentences that reflect the seriousness of their crimes. The TVPRA has produced tangible results in the field, yielding penalties three and four times those obtained under smuggling or harboring statutes and under historical servitude and trafficking statutes, as discussed earlier in this section.

Kil Soo Lee, a former owner of

It also clarified the provision regarding victims and the requirement that they cooperate with law enforcement. Specifically, the Department of Health and Human Services, as part of their process of certifying whether a victim has suffered a severe form of trafficking, may now consider statements from state and local law enforcement, that the victim has "been willing to assist in the investigation and prosecution of state and local crimes." The TVPRA also relieved victims under the age of 18 from meeting this requirement altogether in order to be eligible for the T visa. Congress also created a new civil action that allows trafficking victims to sue their traffickers in federal district court, thus complementing the criminal prosecution of traffickers. Specifically, the TVPRA of 2003 gave victims of human trafficking the right to bring federal civil suits against their traffickers for actual and punitive damages. Nine of the victims in the Reddy[34] case and the mother of another, for example, sued the Reddy family, seeking $100 million in damages. The Reddy family settled the case before going to trial.

The President, also in 2003, signed into law the Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today Act of 2003, known as the PROTECT Act. The PROTECT Act, developed with the assistance of experts in the Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section of the Criminal Division, has given the Department's prosecutors several new tools to combat sex trafficking and child prostitution. The Act makes it a crime for a United States citizen to travel in foreign commerce and engage in illicit sexual activity with minors,[35] and now includes an attempt provision.[36] Moreover, this Act facilitated prosecutions by eliminating the requirement that the Department prove that the traveler-predator intended to have sex with a child prior to traveling. As discussed in the next section, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section and the United States Attorneys' Offices have used this new tool to aggressively combat child sex trafficking.

In addition to adding important new tools in the prosecution of child sex tourism cases, the PROTECT Act supplemented the TVPA by raising the statutory maximum sentences for violations of 18 U.S.C. 1591 involving children. The PROTECT Act also abolished the statute of limitations for crimes involving the abduction or physical or sexual abuse of a child in virtually all cases. Under previous law, the statute of limitations expired when the child turned 25, potentially allowing child abusers to go free if law enforcement could not solve the crime in time.

On January 10, 2006 President Bush signed into law the Trafficking Victims' Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 (TVPRA of 2005). In addition to reauthorizing the TVPRA, the law enhances our ability to combat trafficking in persons by extending our prosecutorial tools and providing new protections for victims. In important enhancements to prosecutorial tools, the bill establishes extra-territorial authority for prosecution of trafficking in persons offenses committed by federal contractors abroad or persons accompanying them and adds trafficking in persons as predicates for the offense of document servitude, where one's identity papers, such as foreign birth certificate, passport, or immigration documents, are withheld by the trafficker and used to coerce or compel the trafficking victim. The TVPRA of 2005 also promotes efforts to fight domestic trafficking in persons. It requires a comprehensive research and statistical review and analysis of incidents of trafficking and commercial sex acts within the United States and annual conferences, to be conducted by the Department for the benefit of state and local law enforcement, other governmental agencies, and non-governmental organizations, on domestic trafficking in fiscal years 2006, 2007, and 2008 and biennially thereafter.

The bill I sign today will help us to continue to investigate and prosecute traffickers and provide new grants to state and local law enforcement. Yet, we cannot put the criminals out of business until we also confront the problem of demand. Those who pay for the chance to sexually abuse children and teenage girls must be held to account. So we'll investigate and prosecute the customers, the unscrupulous adults who prey on the young and the innocent.

-President George Bush, January 10, 2006.

In addition, the TVPRA of 2005 establishes a grant program to develop, expand, and strengthen assistance programs for United States citizens and permanent residents who have been subjected to trafficking and establishes a pilot program to create residential treatment facilities for children subjected to trafficking. It also creates a new grant program for state and local law enforcement authorities to investigate and prosecute trafficking of U.S. citizens and permanent residents, including efforts to reduce demand for commercial sex acts. Furthermore, the TVPRA of 2005 contains new requirements for data collection that will promote effective responses to trafficking. These include study by the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, an inter-agency program discussed in more detail below, of the relationship between trafficking and terrorism, the abduction and enslavement of children as soldiers, and development of a mechanism for quantifying the number of victims of trafficking.

In United States v. Cadena, a 14-year old girl, trafficked into prostitution, was only allowed two possessions: a roll of paper towels and a teddy bear.

V. Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Successful Investigations and Prosecutions

Since 2001, the Department has achieved a record number of human trafficking investigations and prosecutions through a unique victim-centered approach that focuses on three important themes: sex trafficking, labor trafficking, and child sex trafficking. Successful prosecutions of sex and labor trafficking depend on the elements of force, fraud, or coercion that render the victim's role involuntary. Because trafficking is modern day slavery, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft designated the Civil Rights Division, in early 2001, as the principal architect of the Department's comprehensive response to human trafficking. The Civil Rights Division presently collaborates with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Attorneys' Offices, the Criminal Division, and the Office of Justice Programs, as well as the Department of Homeland Security's Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement,[37] to uncover and investigate these criminal enterprises, to prosecute and hold traffickers accountable for their criminal conduct, and, most importantly, to rescue victims and return to them their dignity.

In 2004, the Federal Bureau of Investigation took an important step towards the vigorous investigation of trafficking crimes when it launched the Involuntary Servitude and Slavery/Trafficking in Persons Initiative. This Initiative has achieved important results in the manner in which the Bureau uncovers and investigates these cases in coordination with the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions. The Bureau's Civil Rights Unit, the primary Bureau agency charged with investigating federal civil rights statutes, spearheaded the following initiatives:

- Developed and disseminated a general human trafficking investigative protocol to all FBI field offices;
- Implemented commercial sex trafficking intelligence collection requirements and disseminated those requirements to every Bureau Field Intelligence Group;
- Established a mechanism for the Bureau to properly classify cases as human trafficking, alien smuggling, or child prostitution;
- Expanded the Bureau's outreach to national human trafficking victim advocacy organizations, such as The Freedom Network and the International Justice Mission to establish contacts and leverage partnerships.

- Commenced, in October 2005, human trafficking threat assessments in each of the nation's 56 Bureau Field Offices. The threat assessments are intended to help the Bureau determine the nature and scope of human trafficking and to develop a more informed response to this criminal activity. Field Offices will be guided by this analysis in determining whether to establish or enhance their participation in local anti-human trafficking task forces, including establishing relationships with local non-governmental organizations and more aggressive involvement in investigations by federal, state and local law enforcement;[38] and
- Created, in November 2005, a case tracking database to track and maintain important human trafficking related data from the Bureau's Field Offices regarding the Department's prosecutorial decisions, identifying emerging trends and reporting significant events in the field to the Bureau's Civil Rights Unit or the Crimes Against Children Unit, as appropriate.

A. Sex Trafficking

Human trafficking typically manifests itself in compelled service either for forced labor or in the "sex industry." Sadly, in both areas, sexual abuse of female victims is common.
Sex trafficking is both a crime and phenomenon. The TVPA's "sex trafficking" statute[39] makes it illegal to use force or coercion to obtain persons for commercial sexual activity, with special

United States
Attorneys' Offices charged 189 defendants with sex trafficking, a 450% increase over the 34 defendants charged between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. In addition to the new records set in investigations and prosecutions of sex trafficking, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices have achieved impressive results in convicting traffickers. From fiscal years 2001 to 2005, federal prosecutors obtained the convictions of 109 sex trafficking defendants, a 445% increase over the 20 defendants convicted during the previous five fiscal year period.

Sex trafficking may occur in any American community – urban, suburban or rural – and involves both aliens and United States citizens. Sex trafficking can occur in bars, farm worker camps, and sex entertainment and prostitution enterprises. The traffickers are endlessly inventive. While the public stereotype of these cases involve large scale international organized crime syndicates, forced prostitution cases often involve groups of family members or even individual pimps. In United States v. Jimenez-Calderon, a group of family members recruited women and girls from the Mexican state of Tlaxclala to come to the United States with promises of love, only to hold them in prostitution through force and by threatening them and their families in Mexico.[40] The defendants in Jimenez-Calderon received sentences ranging from 1 1/3 to 17 years of incarceration following her guilty plea.[41]

Cases involving United States citizen victims that might not have been brought under the Mann Act are now being brought using the TVPA sex trafficking statute, which does not require interstate travel. In United States v. Gates and Heyward, two defendants pled guilty in 2004 to sex trafficking for running an internet prostitution business from their home, at times using girls as young as 14 to perform sexual acts. Defendant Gates, who beat the women who disobeyed him and provided drugs to support some of the women's addictions, was sentenced to more than 14 ½ years in prison. His co-defendant girlfriend, Heyward, received a sentence of 9 years of incarceration.[42]

Many cases in the past few years involving individuals from countries of the former Soviet republics have involved compelled service in "exotic dancing." In United States v. Gasanov, a husband and wife were convicted at trial and sentenced to serve five years in prison and to pay $516,150 in restitution for bringing Uzbeki women to El Paso, Texas, under the guise of a student researcher exchange program, only to hold them in compelled service in strip clubs by confiscating their immigration documents, and making threats against their families.[43] In United States v. Maksimenko, five defendants have pled guilty as of December 19, 2005, for their roles in a scheme to enslave Ukrainian women in Detroit-area strip clubs through threats and extortion.[44]

Sometimes victims are held in sexual slavery without any commercial aspect. In United States v. Soto, eight men were convicted in 2003 for their roles in an alien smuggling organization that would hold vulnerable alien women as "concubines," forcing them to cook, clean, and submit to the sexual demands of the alien smugglers through force, threats, and punitive rape. The lead defendant in the Soto case was sentenced to 23 years of incarceration following his guilty plea.[45]

Women in United States v. Molina, a "bargirl" case, were forced to entertain male patrons of the defendant's bars.

communities, women are imported to work as "bargirls." While this is not technically sex trafficking under the TVPA, as it does not involve a sex act, the women are treated as sex objects and forced to entertain male bar patrons, dancing and drinking with them at their pleasure. In United States v. Kang, for example, a Korean couple lured Korean women to New York City with promises of good jobs as hostesses in their nightclub, but subjected them to physical abuse, held them for repayment of a $10,000 debt, and attempted to force them into prostitution.[46] Seven defendants pled guilty to forced labor and obstruction of justice charges. The defendants include a Federal Air Marshal and a Department of Homeland Security agent, who attempted to force one of the victims to get on a flight to South Korea to keep her from testifying against the Kangs.[47] In another "bargirl" case, United States v. Molina, six Hondurans in Ft. Worth, Texas received sentences of up to 5 years and 3 months of incarceration following their guilty pleas to harboring the women and making them repay their alien smuggling debts by entertaining the male patrons of the defendants' bars.[48]

B. Labor Trafficking

Labor trafficking occurs when a victim is forced to work in an area of the economy that would otherwise be a legal form of labor, absent the force, fraud or coercion. This phenomenon commonly is found in farms, factories, and households. Similar to sex trafficking, if a person is subjected to coercive force such that he cannot leave his employer's service, he is considered a victim regardless of whether he initially chose to perform that type of work, or even if he received some pay for his labor. There is no requirement that the victim be transported by the defendant.

Over the past five years, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices have prosecuted a record number of labor trafficking cases. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed 23 labor trafficking cases, an increase of 110% over the 11 labor trafficking cases the federal prosecutors filed between fiscal years 1996 and 2000.[49] In these cases, 61 defendants were charged with labor trafficking, an increase of 33% over the 46 defendants the charged during the previous five fiscal year period.

48 United States v. Molina, Cr. No. 114-A (N.D. Tex. 2002).

49 Two seminal trafficking cases are responsible for the large number of defendants charged in 1997-98. United States v. Paoletti, the "Deaf Mexican" trinket peddling case, involved 18 defendants, and the Florida forced prostitution case United States v. Cadena involved 16 defendants. Prosecution and victim protection in these two cases are ongoing. In 2005, cooperation with the Mexican authorities resulted in the arrest of Juan Luis Cadena in Mexico. Also in 2005, as a result of the work of the Office of International Affairs, Renato and Jose Paoletti were the first Mexican citizens ever extradited to the United States for human trafficking offenses.

DOJ_NMG_0008955

As in sex trafficking cases, vulnerable United States citizens may find themselves trapped in a forced labor situation, unable to escape because of threats or coercion. For example, in United States v. Michael Lee, the defendants recruited homeless African-American men for their orange-picking operation. Once employed, the workers were involuntarily retained by beatings, threats, and a "company store" debt run up by short-term loans for rent, food, cigarettes, and cocaine. Three defendants were convicted in 2001 and received prison terms of up to 4 ½ years of incarceration.[50]

Forced labor situations often appear in parts of the agricultural sector that require "stoop labor." One such case, United States v. Garcia,[51] involved the first successful defense of the TVPA against a constitutional challenge. In that case, four defendants received sentences of up to nearly 4 years of incarceration in 2005 for recruiting young undocumented Mexican aliens from the Arizona border and transporting them to New York with false promises of good wages, only to force them to work in the fields for little or no pay and house them in overcrowded and filthy conditions through threats to turn them over to the Border Patrol.[52] In their constitutional challenge, the defendants argued that the TVPA was unconstitutionally vague, inviting arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement, and that Congress exceeded its authority in enacting it because it did not involve interstate commerce. A federal district court disagreed and found that the TVPA's terms were clear and provide adequate notice of the conduct it prohibits.[53] It also found that Congress had the duration of the harvesting season and for assaulting the owner of a transportation service to cut off any avenue of escape the workers might have had from the area. Domestic servant cases continue to be a regular part of the Department's forced labor portfolio. Sadly, in many of these cases the young female victims are subjected not only to long hours and low pay for their work as nannies and maids, but suffer sexual abuse at the hands of their captors as well.

For instance, in United States v. Mubang,[56] a Cameroonian woman was convicted of bringing an eleven year-

d girl to the United States illegally and under false pretenses. Once the girl was in America, she was forced to care for the defendant's two children and perform all the household chores without pay. The defendant forced the victim to comply by beating her with a broken metal broom stick and a cable cord, forbidding her from speaking of her employment conditions to anyone, forbidding her from leaving the house or opening the door to anyone, and interfering with her mail. Mubang fled the country soon after her conviction but was extradited to the United States in 2005 through the assistance of the Cameroonian government. She is currently serving a sentence of 17 ½ years of incarceration.

Similarly, in 2004, in United States v. Trisanti, a Los Angeles woman was convicted of involuntary servitude for trafficking two victims into the United States from Indonesia and forcing them to work as domestic servants through threats and physical violence. Trisanti was sentenced to more than 3 ½ years in prison and ordered to pay $203,000 in restitution.[57]

C. Child Sex Trafficking

Within the Department, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has taken the leading role in overseeing the prosecution of cases of sex trafficking of minors. Sex trafficking in children occurs when persons under the age of 18 are provided or obtained for a commercial sex act. Prior to the passage of the TVPA, this aspect of human trafficking was traditionally dealt with by law enforcement under the label "Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children" (CSEC), and all states have statutes criminalizing child prostitution. It is a continuing challenge to incorporate long-established child protective services, family court, and anti-CSEC activities and programs into the anti-trafficking effort.

"Our society has no place for those who prey on children and no tolerance for child prostitution or sex trafficking."

–Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, December 16, 2005.

Child sex trafficking may also involve child sex tourism, which occurs when individuals travel to foreign countries to engage in sexual acts with children, who are often the victims of trafficking. As with child prostitution, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has taken the leading role in overseeing the development of anti-sex tourism policies and resulting prosecutions. United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide, with guidance or co-counsel assistance from the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, have obtained at least 50 sex tourism indictments or complaints and a minimum of 29 convictions between 2003 and 2005 under the PROTECT Act, with approximately 60 investigations currently pending.

Like other forms of trafficking, child sex trafficking can occur in any community. The TVPA

Usually, when people commit crimes, the best the criminal justice system can do is punish the offender and occasionally have him repay the out-of-pocket expenses of the victims. This plea not only does that, but attempts to give the victims future opportunities for treatment, counseling, and even an education.

[57] United States v. Trisanti, Cr. No. 03-473 (C.D. Cal. 2003).

Like other forms of trafficking, child sex trafficking can occur in any community. The TVPA supplemented the Mann Act, which prohibits the interstate transportation of persons for prostitution or other illegal sexual activity, by extending federal jurisdiction to situations in which the pimps did not cross a state line with their minor victims. In recent years, the Department has prosecuted cases of child sex trafficking across the nation. In United States v. Sims, for example, Maurice Sims was prosecuted in the Northern District of Georgia and sentenced to life in prison, in 2004, for kidnaping, trafficking, and transportation across state lines for criminal sexual purposes, among other crimes.[58] Sims transported a 16 year old girl from El Dorado, Arkansas to Atlanta, Georgia for purposes of prostitution. Along the way he beat and raped his victim.

Additionally, the Department is strategically and aggressively using forfeiture laws to increase a defendant's punishment, create greater disincentives, and, ultimately, to fully disable and dismantle criminal networks engaged in human trafficking. The Department has been particularly innovative in its use of forfeiture in cases involving child prostitution. In several of those cases, Department prosecutors negotiated plea agreements requiring the child pimps to set up monetary funds to provide for the rehabilitation, education and job training of their young victims. In United States v Boehm,[59] for example, four persons pled guilty to sex trafficking of children, among other charges. In 2001, Boehm, along with his co-defendants, agreed to distribute cocaine and cocaine base to persons under the age of 21 and to recruit minors for sexual purposes in exchange for money and crack cocaine. All five defendants were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from 3 years to more than 13 years and Boehm, as part of his plea agreement, also forfeited his residence and provided $1.2 million in trust for the future benefit of his victims.[60] The trust fund will compensate Boehm's victims for expenses for drug treatment, counseling, educational, and professional training expenses.

Going forward, the Department will continue to place a keen emphasis on the use of forfeiture incidence of prostituted children. The Section then asked each of these offices to establish a task force to address the problem through a variety of federal criminal statutes including the Mann Act, TVPA, and RICO,[61] where appropriate, to neutralize the entire criminal enterprise. The Section asked the remaining 42 Bureau Field Offices to assess whether the localities they serve have a substantial child prostitution problem.

As of September 30, 2005, Innocence Lost Initiative Task Forces have been instituted in Atlantic City, Boston, Chicago, Detroit, Harrisburg, Indianapolis, Los Angeles, Miami, Toledo, Portland, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C. In connection with this initiative, federal law enforcement agencies, prosecutors, and social service providers were brought to NCMEC's Washington, D.C.-area offices, where groups from the same jurisdiction were trained together in order to cultivate cooperation, partnership, and an effective integration among the critical enforcement entities in each city. To date, more than 350 key personnel have been trained. As a result of the Department's substantial investigatory efforts through this Initiative, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has seen a marked increase in the number of requests from both Assistant United States Attorneys and Bureau agents in the field for advice, guidance, and co-counsel on child prostitution cases.

More importantly, on December 16, 2005, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced, more than 30 child victims were recently identified in connection with the latest phase of Innocence Lost, bringing the total of child victims identified to more than 200 since the Innocence Lost Initiative began. This latest effort resulted in the arrest of 19 individuals. Between 2004 and 2005, the Innocence Lost Initiative has resulted in 139 open investigations, 505 arrests, 60 complaints, 70 indictments, and 67 convictions.

Again, many cases of child sex tourism involve child sex trafficking and the Department is committed to aggressively prosecuting these cases. For example, in 2003, in the first prosecution under the PROTECT Act, Michael Clark, who had been arrested in Cambodia for sexually abusing two Cambodian boys (ages 10 and 13), was charged with attempting to engage in illicit sexual conduct after travel in foreign commerce. Clark pled guilty to the charges and was sentenced to 8 years of imprisonment. In connection with his plea, Clark reserved the right to appeal the constitutionality of the PROTECT Act, arguing that Congress exceeded its power to enact criminal laws that do not involve interstate commerce and that criminalizing activities in a foreign country violate his right to due process and international law. Clark's appeal is currently pending before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.[62]

Also in 2003, in United States v. Russell,[63] an American man was prosecuted when an investigation revealed that he had traveled to the Philippines on numerous occasions over a two-year period in order to engage in sexual acts with children and to produce child pornography for the purpose of importation into the United States. At least three Philippine children have been identified as victims of Russell, who pled guilty and was sentenced to more than 3 years of imprisonment.

D. Inter-Agency Coordination

Implementation of the President's directive to combat human trafficking requires meaningful inter-agency coordination. Much of the coordination has been accomplished through the President's Inter-Agency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, and subsequently the Senior Policy Operating Group, discussed above. In connection with these efforts, the Department has engaged with other federal agencies to create additional vehicles of inter-agency coordination.

The most significant achievement in this regard is the Department's support of the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center that is led by a steering committee comprised of representatives from the Department of Justice, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Departments of Homeland Security and State, among others. The Center provides a mechanism to bring together federal agency representatives from policy, law enforcement, intelligence, and diplomatic areas to work together on a full-time basis to achieve increased effectiveness among federal law enforcement and to convert intelligence about human trafficking, alien smuggling, and clandestine terrorist travel into effective law enforcement activities. Analysts accomplish this function by identifying issues related to migrant smuggling or trafficking in persons and then forward their findings to the relevant federal agencies or interagency organizations for consideration and appropriate action. The Center has been under development since mid-2004 and, shortly thereafter, started initial operations.

In addition, the Department in July 2004 entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Health and Human Services streamlining protocols for the Health and Human Services ("HHS") certification of victims (or in the case of minors, eligibility letters) rescued in connection with Department of Justice or Homeland Security law enforcement efforts. A determination by HHS, in consultation with the Department, that victims have suffered a "severe form of trafficking" and are cooperating with law enforcement enables these individuals to qualify for federally-funded or administered benefits and services to the same extent as refugees.[64] The agreement also marked an important step towards the coordination of treatment of potential trafficking victims by agents of the Departments of Homeland Security and Justice through better information sharing. It is important to note that over 30% of the investigations initiated by the Department since 2001 were begun by agents of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The Department's anti-trafficking investigative and prosecution strategy requires effective intra-departmental collaboration to bring the specialties of each component to bear on these multi-faceted, complex, and labor-intensive criminal cases. The following components are important contributors to the Department's activities in support of the President's directive to combat human trafficking:

- The Civil Rights Division's Criminal Section
- The Criminal Division, particularly its Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section, Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, Domestic Security Section, International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program, Office of International Affairs, Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, and Organized Crime and Racketeering Section
- The Executive Office of United States Attorneys and United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide
- The Federal Bureau of Investigation, and its Field Offices
- The Office of Community Oriented Policing Services
- The Office of Justice Programs, particularly its Bureau of Justice Assistance, Bureau of Justice Statistics, National Institute of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, and Office for Victims of Crime
- The Office of Legal Policy
- The Office of Legislative Affairs
- The Office on Violence Against Women

Representatives from the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation meet periodically to share information and to identify ways to leverage resources to identify and combat trafficking in persons, among other criminal activity. In addition, the Office of Legal Policy convenes regular meetings of Department of Justice components to coordinate the development of policies regarding the Department's anti-human trafficking activities. The Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division, in early 2003, authored a comprehensive legal monograph on trafficking issues to assist United States Attorney personnel in the field to prosecute trafficking cases more effectively. The monograph has been distributed at the Department's training center, the National Advocacy Center, and at human trafficking training workshops.

Both the Civil Rights Division and the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section publish newsletters that provide valuable information regarding human trafficking prosecutions, case analysis, and developments that are important to the work of other Departmental components and the non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of trafficking victims. The Civil Rights Division provides investigators, prosecutors, and victim assistance professionals with technical assistance regarding human trafficking and keeps the field of trafficking victim advocates informed about the Division's efforts to prevent and prosecute this crime. And, since 2003, the quarterly Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section newsletter has discussed issues of sex tourism and trafficking in all but two editions.

From the time that the TVPA was enacted, the Department recognized that alien smuggling, document fraud, and various forms of human trafficking, while constituting separate offenses, can be integrally related, as discussed above.[65] The trafficking of victims across international borders virtually always involves alien smuggling, also possibly including some type of fraud or misrepresentation. Perhaps the most direct manifestation of cooperation between the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions is that in 2002 the Civil Rights Division detailed several experienced attorneys to the Criminal Division's Alien Smuggling Task Force for a three-year period. Over the past three years, those Civil Rights prosecutors worked with their Criminal Division colleagues to target the criminal infrastructure that makes international trafficking possible. Examples include successful prosecutions involving the fraudulent adoption of Cambodian babies, the sexual exploitation of Estonian women employed in massage parlors, and large-scale fraudulent leasing of foreign workers to major United States companies. The three-year details, which recently ended, demonstrate the concrete, effective results that can be obtained through innovative approaches to anti-trafficking cooperation.

The Department has taken a number of steps to ensure that its components are well trained in the Department's strategy of victim-centered, proactive investigations. Here are some examples:

- In October 2001, the Civil Rights Division conducted training on the unique victim protections and services of the TVPA for almost 100 federal victim witness coordinators at the National Advocacy Center in Columbia, South Carolina.

- In October 2002, the Civil Rights Division organized comprehensive anti-trafficking training for federal prosecutors and agents at the Department's training facility, the National Advocacy Center, in Columbia, South Carolina. Approximately 150 federal prosecutors and agents attended the training.

- In November 2002 the Attorney General issued "blue sheets" for prosecutors, outlining the new TVPA crimes and adding guidance regarding the prosecution of such crimes to the U.S. Attorneys' Manual. The "blue sheets" highlight human trafficking as a priority and provide a comprehensive source of information and resources within the Department and with related agencies.

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division provided periodic training at the Federal Bureau of Investigation training center in Quantico, Virginia for Bureau and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents.

- In January 2004, the Civil Rights Division and the Executive Office of United States Attorneys' Office of Legal Education hosted a comprehensive training session for federal agents and prosecutors at the Department's National Advocacy Center. Furthermore, the Civil Rights Division actively participates in human trafficking training sessions at United States Attorneys' Offices as part of the regular curriculum offered to Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Homeland Security Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and Department of State Diplomatic Security Service agents.

- Since 2003, the Criminal Division's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has annually trained Assistant United States Attorneys and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents at the National Advocacy Center regarding the investigation of cases involving the commercial exploitation of minors for sex (i.e., domestic sex trafficking), child prostitution, trafficking and sex tourism.

VI. The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers

A. Multi-Disciplinary Task Force Initiative

The Department has designed, developed, and instituted locally based, multi-disciplinary task forces to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases. These task forces embody the Department's victim-centered approach because they are specifically engineered to aid in uncovering victims, providing them with immediate protection and support, and then working with them to further investigate and prosecute the trafficker. More importantly, task forces are a supreme force multiplier as the nation's numerous state and local police, occupational safety and health inspectors, and other enforcement officials are added to the limited number of federal law enforcement that are now in the field.

In July 2004, the Department hosted the first ever National Training Conference on Human Trafficking: Rescuing Women and Children From Slavery, in Tampa, Florida. The National Conference was designed to introduce the model of victim-centered investigations and the concept of human trafficking prosecutions through the creation of local task forces. Hosted by the Department and with a keynote speech by President Bush, the conference brought together more than 500 attendees, consisting of 21 teams of about 20 state, local, and federal officials who were willing to thereafter work together to combat human trafficking in their respective communities across America. Teams included the following members: United States Attorneys or designated Assistant United States Attorneys; Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement Special Agents-In-Charge; Federal Bureau of Investigation Special Agents-In-Charge; local law enforcement agency special crimes and victim units; state and local prosecutors; and governmental and non-governmental organizations, especially faith and community-based victim service providers. The Department, with the assistance of the Civil Rights Division, invited participants from some of the most intense trafficking jurisdictions in the country at that time, such as: Atlanta, Charlotte, Chicago, El Paso, Houston, Las Vegas, Long Island, Los Angeles, Miami, Newark, New Orleans, New York City, Washington, D.C., Philadelphia, Phoenix, Richmond, San Diego, San Francisco, St. Louis, Seattle, and Tampa.

President Bush, along with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, announced this important new initiative on July 16, 2004 at the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking, where the President condemned human trafficking as an affront to America's fundamental values and committed his Administration to combating trafficking on every level at home and abroad. Regarding domestic efforts to combat trafficking, the President remarked, "We're supporting organizations that rescue the victims, passing stronger anti-trafficking laws, and warning travelers that they will be held to account for supporting this modern form of slavery. Women and children should never be exploited for pleasure or greed, anywhere on Earth."

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft set forth the Department's comprehensive anti-trafficking strategy: protecting the victims, prosecuting the perpetrators, and partnership-building that addresses, attacks, and prevents human trafficking. The Attorney General also noted that the Bush Administration had, up to that time, provided more than $35 million in funding to community-based service providers that aid trafficking victims, and he announced a further $14 million in support of the Department's task force initiative. Concurrently with the National Conference, the Department issued a funding solicitation, entitled Law Enforcement and Service Provider Multi-disciplinary Anti-Trafficking Task Forces. The solicitation urged applicants to leverage existing federally-funded victim services efforts and to mirror the victim-focused federal, state, and non-governmental partnership that was the theme of the Conference. In the fall of 2004, the Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime issued a joint solicitation for concept papers to continue the coordinated law enforcement task forces and victim services initiatives. Federal funds made available through this solicitation were intended to support task forces or supplemental funding of current trafficking victim service providers in areas with pre-existing Bureau of Justice Assistance-funded task forces.

Task forces add to the Department's law enforcement resources the intelligence and expertise of

"The conference program provided a model of collaboration among service providers and law enforcement and underscored the necessity of teamwork in working to keep victims of trafficking front and center in both the prosecution and service delivery areas-it was a great kick off for the task force initiative."

-Florrie Burke, Senior Director of International Programs, Anti-Trafficking Program, SOLACE Program for Survivors of Torture, Safe Horizon

locally-based immigration agents, local community- and faith-based social service providers, and local law enforcement, particularly special crimes and vice squads. These task forces recognize that local authorities, often more than federal officials, may be in the best position to find trafficking victims because of their familiarity with their jurisdictions, but might need the training and support of the federal government to recognize this crime for what it is. The Department has too often seen in federal investigations police reports indicating that local officers responded to complaints but failed to stop the ongoing exploitation of trafficking victims simply because they were not trained to recognize trafficking situations. The task force approach leverages local knowledge and staff resources with strong federal statutes. Indeed, victims rescued in United States v. Reddy,[66] United States v. Molina,[67] and United States v. Ramos[68] were brought to the Department's attention through the activities of state and local law enforcement. Moreover, they serve as a way to incorporate the non-governmental crime victim services organizations, funded by federal grant awards, into the law enforcement activities in their area. Local community- and faith-based organizations are essential to reaching those victims in communities that are isolated by geography, culture, or language.

The task force convened by the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Texas presents an illustration. In 2004, the United States Attorney for the Northern District of Texas established a working group consisting of representatives from the police departments of the Dallas-Fort Worth area, including Arlington, Coppell, Garland, Grand Prairie, Irving, and Richardson, and representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Internal Revenue Service, and Department of Labor. The group's faith and community-based partners include several charitable organizations such as Catholic Charities and Mosaic Family Services, Inc., which received grants from the Office for Victims of Crime to provide victim services and to assist with the formation and implementation of this program.

Insert graphic of the United States depicting the location of the 32 jurisdictions with task forces.

Just prior to the conference, the Department had begun work on eight task forces. Immediately following the National Conference, the Department embarked on a 20-city training initiative designed to reinforce the training received at the National Conference and to institute nearly two dozen task forces. Within a year of the National Conference, 18 task forces were operating with Departmental support. There are now 32 task forces operating throughout the United States.

Each of the 32 task forces, funded in part through $13 million in grants from the Department's Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime since fiscal year 2004, is coordinated through the local United States Attorney's Office and includes representatives of local FBI field offices and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, as well as state and local law enforcement and social services agencies. In order to receive Department of Justice funding support and the assistance of the local United States Attorney, local law enforcement agencies and victim service providers are required to enter into a Memorandum of Understanding with all task force members committing themselves to collaborating together on investigations and assistance to victims. Applicants were invited to design task forces that best suited the needs of their local communities, and many task forces involve faith-based and other community organizations in their work. At their core, task forces include the local United States Attorney's Office; Federal Bureau of Investigation Field Offices; Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents; state and local law enforcement agencies; and social services agencies, including community-based victim services providers. As of June 2005, with reporting based only on the first six months of operation by the 18 task forces that existed at that time, 61 victims of severe trafficking had been identified and many more victims were rescued from environments where trafficking was occurring.

Alliance forms to fight modern slavery in Texas

'Ancient' crime exists in Houston, a U.S. official says

By HARVEY RICE
HOUSTON CHRONICLE

Ruth came to Houston from East Africa a year ago under a contract that promised $5.15 per hour for working a nine-hour day, six days per week taking care of her employer's household.

Instead, she said she found herself a prisoner working for no pay and enduring emotional and physical abuse.

"I was a slave," she said Friday.

Because local and federal police agencies often fail to recognize such victims of this modern slave trade, the U.S. attorney's office announced the formation Friday of the Human Trafficking Rescue Alliance, the fifth such group in the country and the first in Texas.

"This terrible crime, so ancient in its origins, exists right here in Houston, Texas," U.S. Attorney Michael Shelby said as he was joined by representatives of all major local and federal law enforcement agencies in Harris County and several nongovernmental social services organizations.

Shelby said the social services groups will be crucial to finding human-trafficking victims who may be too frightened to turn to police.

Ruth, whose true identity is being withheld because she fears retaliation from her former employer, is one of an estimated 16,000 immigrants who are kidnapped or tricked into coming into the United States and then coerced into prostitution or forced labor, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

She said she despaired until an acquaintance connected her with a program run by YMCA International Services.

Opening eyes of the law

The Texas Office of Immigration and Refugee Affairs says human trafficking is a multinational organized criminal industry generating billions of dollars per year. Most of the victims are women and children.

Shelby said traffickers include the Russian mafia and Asian triads as well as smugglers on the U.S.-Mexican border.

The newly formed alliance will train officers to spot a trafficking victim whom they otherwise might have arrested as a prostitute. The group also will coordinate investigation and prosecution of traffickers, improve the treatment and care of victims for use as witnesses in prosecutions and conduct regional conferences.

The alliance plans to duplicate itself in Brownsville, Corpus Christi, McAllen and Laredo.

"This task force and others like it are an important step toward ending the scourge of human trafficking and slavery," said U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, who recently authored a resolution calling for increased cooperation among Congress, federal and local law enforcement to end human trafficking.

Officials say they don't know how serious the problem is in Harris County because they have only recently been made aware of it.

District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal said he is unaware of any such cases in the county because law enforcement agencies have not been trained to identify the problem.

"We didn't know what we were looking at," Rosenthal said.

He said the creation of the task force will open local law enforcement's eyes to the crime, "like changing your glasses prescription."

R. Alexander Acosta, assistant U.S. attorney general for civil rights, said, "We don't know what the trends are because the data has not been collected."

Acosta said he is reminded of

STEVE CAMPBELL / CHRONICLE

the seriousness of the crime by a crime-scene photo in his office, showing a teddy bear on a nightstand beside a bed.

The teddy bear belonged to a 14-year-old girl who was forced to have sex with as many as 30 men a day on the bed, he said.

"We simply must do a better job of identifying the victims and bringing human traffickers to justice," Cornyn said.

Efforts get results

Jeff Watkins, executive director of YMCA International Services, said his agency has treated only five victims since it received a $560,000, three-year grant from the Justice Department last year.

The money, which comes from fines and penalties paid by convicted criminals, is used in part to train police in spotting victims of human trafficking.

Watkins said the YMCA trained 1,500 Houston police officers in the past year and will help train other officers in the federal Southern District, which stretches from Huntsville to Brownsville and Laredo.

Last year, the Justice Department formed similar rescue alliances in Atlanta, Philadelphia, Phoenix and Tampa, Fla.

Shelby said the Houston alliance is the first of about a dozen the Justice Department plans to form this year.

An emphasis on the prosecution of human trafficking by the Justice Department led to a tripling of charges filed in the past three years, compared with the previous three years, although the 150 total remains small.

A 2000 federal law and a 2003 Texas law were aimed at human trafficking.

The Houston alliance will be coordinated by Assistant U.S. Attorneys Edward Gallagher and Ruben Perez.

harvey.rice@chron.com

The Houston (Harris County, Texas) trafficking task force provides a meaningful illustration of the work and potential of the Department's multi-disciplinary task forces. In 2004, concerned that trafficking might fall into the cracks between civil rights and organized crime enforcement programs, the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas formed the Human Trafficking Rescue Alliance with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Harris County Sheriff's Department, and a number of non-governmental organizations who had recently come together on the issue. The Rescue Alliance began with listening sessions of the stakeholders and moved to joint training for law enforcement and other community groups. Rescue Alliance members attended the Department's National Training Conference on Human Trafficking in Florida in July 2004, and pledged themselves to work together to combat trafficking. When the Bureau of Justice Assistance called for grant proposals, the working group was ready with a task force proposal that built upon and solidified their relationships. As the profile of this issue has grown, so has the demand for training on the part of state and local law enforcement, and the most recent training opportunity

DOJ_NMG_0008969

Rescue Alliance have solidified the relationship of the law enforcement participants with the Office for Victims of Crime and Health and Human Services victim-services grantees such as the YMCA of Houston and Catholic Charities.

Houston Chronicle, August 14, 2004

One novel aspect of the Rescue Alliance has been to place Harris County Sheriff's Deputies with vice-squad experience in Federal Bureau of Investigation and Immigration and Customs Enforcement Field Offices on the squads tasked with trafficking investigations. Especially in the Federal Bureau of Investigation office, having a full-time investigator with extensive knowledge of the local landscape was invaluable, and his activities served as a catalyst for the other agents on the task force to work pro-actively to identify and dismantle trafficking rings. The inclusion of agents from the Texas Alcohol and Beverage Commission has proven instrumental in the success of the Rescue Alliance.

As a result of operations by the Rescue Alliance, two large-scale trafficking operations resulted in federal human trafficking indictments in the Houston area in the fall of 2005 -- one involving allegations of Mexican women and girls forced into prostitution and another involving allegations that dozens of Central American women and girls were held in peonage in a "bargirl" operation. These prosecutions, which are pending at the time of this report,[69] could not have happened without the interagency approach and close cooperation with non-governmental service providers and advocacy groups that was fostered and intensified through the Bureau of Justice Assistance grant. The Rescue Alliance is an example of an energized and successful task force effort that successfully blends state, local, and federal personnel, across traditional organized crime and civil rights approaches, to work with the non-governmental community to act in the best interests of the victim while seeking justice.

The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with other federal partners, provides ongoing training and technical assistance to task forces. In 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Civil Rights Division, the Office for Victims of Crime, and other experts, developed a specific training curriculum for law enforcement officers nationwide who may come into contact with trafficking victims, entitled Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness. The curriculum is a flexible, one-day training course educating law enforcement officers about the basics of the phenomenon of human trafficking and a victim-centered approach to proactive investigation of potential cases. The curriculum provides an introduction to human trafficking, its victims, and offenders; a legal overview with a focus on the TVPA; investigative considerations and techniques; an overview of the role of victim service providers; the need for victim services and the types of services available; and immigration matters, including the role of immigration officials and remedies available to victims. The training program also reviews lessons on understanding the need for a formal multi-disciplinary approach towards human trafficking and an understanding of the important role of the community in law enforcement efforts. The training curriculum is unique in that it incorporates multimedia learning and each participant is provided with multimedia resources to be used in training other officers and building greater community awareness and support. The course is taught by seasoned investigators who have handled trafficking cases as well as by national experts on trafficking issues.

In February 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance convened a conference of the 22 nascent task forces that had been instituted by that time. More than 115 individuals attended. Federal participants in the conference included representatives from within the Department as well the Departments of Homeland Security and Health and Human Services. The focus of the conference was to explain the degree of collaboration needed among federal, state, and local law enforcement, prosecution, and victim services agencies in order to effectively rescue victims and prosecute traffickers. Task force members were trained using the Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness curriculum, described above. Future cross-training of task force members will enable the Department to build on that effort by sharing best practices and linking the groups' efforts across geographical lines.

The Human Trafficking Task Forces are just the approach we need to combat human trafficking. With all of us working as a team we will be more effective in this endeavor than we would be if we tried to combat human trafficking individually.

--Lt. Bill Rule, Collier County Sheriff's Office, Victim Services Bureau

B. Restoring Victims' Dignity

As discussed above,[70] the Department places a premium on enabling trafficking victims to achieve stable and secure lives. Federal investigators and prosecutors will therefore immediately refer a victim to victim service professionals for immediate care. Again, victims that are safe and healthy are better able to articulate to investigators and a court what has happened to her. Without the victim's assistance, traffickers may not ever be held accountable for their crimes.

In many cases, the referral process and the provision of services is expedited through relationships already established by task force partners. Some task forces have created innovative ways to connect victims identified through law enforcement activity with services. The United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, developed a compendium of victim service providers for use by task force members in Fort Myers, Jacksonville, and Tampa. The task force in Indianapolis, Indiana, coordinated through the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Indiana, has partnered with the Indianapolis Family Justice Center to deliver services to victims of human trafficking that are funded by the Office for Victims of Crime. The Family Justice Center, created in connection with President Bush's Family Justice Initiative, a program that is administered by the Office on Violence Against Women, co-locates services to families involved in domestic violence. Making this Center the coordinator of services to victims of human trafficking makes the response to victims more efficient and effective.

Once potential cases of trafficking are uncovered, victims may become eligible for important services that help to keep them safe as they recover from their victimization. Trafficking victims, like all crime victims, may be eligible for services and benefits under the Victims of Crime Act, a program administered by the Office for Victims of Crime.[71] The TVPA, as amended, created new protections for alien victims.[72] Under the TVPA, victims are afforded:

- Immigration relief, in the form of an administrative change in immigration status known as "continued presence" as well as a temporary, non-immigrant visa known as the "T visa;"
- Access to refugee benefits;
- Adequate shelter, care, and protection;
- Legal assistance;
- Information & translation services; and
- Mandatory restitution.[73]

The TVPA authorizes similar victim services programs to be administered by the Department of Health and Human Services, thus requiring a significant amount of coordination between the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services. In 2004, the Office for Victims of Crime initiated regular coordination meetings with the Office of Refugee Resettlement, its counterpart agency at HHS, known

[71] The Crime Victims Fund, 42 U.S.C. § 10601, established by the Victims of Crime Act of 1984 (VOCA), is a major source of funding for victim services throughout the nation. The Office for Victims of Crime administers the Fund and distributes funding to the states on a formula basis to support crime victim assistance and crime victim compensation programs. Victim assistance includes lifeline victim services such as crisis intervention, emergency shelter and transportation, counseling, and criminal justice system advocacy. Crime victim compensation is a direct reimbursement to or on behalf of a crime victim for expenses such as medical costs. Trafficking victims may be eligible for support under the Crime Victims Fund, the TVPA, or both of these programs, depending on the circumstances of their cases and, in the case of the Crime Victims Fund, the specific guidelines of the state agency that administers the program.

The TVPA authorizes similar victim services programs to be administered by the Department of Health and Human Services, thus requiring a significant amount of coordination between the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services. In 2004, the Office for Victims of Crime initiated regular coordination meetings with the Office of Refugee Resettlement, its counterpart agency at HHS, known as the Human Trafficking Victim Services Coordination Working Group. By working together, both agencies maximize their resources and exchange information to improve the provision of victim services as both HHS and the Office for Victims crime may fund grantees that provide services to pre-certified victims. Consequently, grantees funded by the Office for Victims of Crime under the TVPA only provide services to victims of trafficking before they are certified as victims of a "severe form of trafficking" by the Department of Health and Human Services, except in special circumstances.[74]

Since fiscal year 2003, the Office for Victims of Crime has funded 20 victim service providers to assist pre-certified victims of trafficking in the United States, one grant to the headquarters of the Salvation Army to work with their territorial divisions to provide shelter to trafficking victims, and one grant to an organization to provide technical assistance. Since January 2003, Office for Victims of Crime-funded grantees have served 741 pre-certified trafficking victims. The Department, in cooperation with other law enforcement agencies, have assisted 687 victims to obtain continued presence immigration status, allowing them to remain in the country and to receive benefits and services.[75]

The period between being rescued and receiving certification is the time when victims are most vulnerable. They typically have a host of needs that includes housing, clothing, and food; medical, dental, and psychological care; legal assistance and immigration advocacy; and interpretation services. However, few organizations or communities have the resources to provide or fund these services. The Office for Victims of Crime grant program helps communities to fill this critical service gap and, in the process, supports victims' abilities to cooperate with law enforcement. Immigrant victims are offered culturally and linguistically appropriate services and may, if needed, petition for T visas that would allow them to remain in the United States legally. Some organizations are specifically prepared to provide immediate, critical assistance in crisis situations until the services of a local victim service provider can be put in place.

The Office for Victims of Crime supports the work of the victim service providers it funds with technical assistance that is made available through workshops, on-site consultation, and via the internet. Office for Victims of Crime training and technical assistance includes mentoring guides and safety protocols for both providers and clients. Grantees also provide training to local police and non-governmental organizations. Since fiscal year 2003, approximately 38,635 persons have been trained through the efforts of Office for Victims of Crime grantees. Training topics have included the dynamics of trafficking, the legal definition of trafficking under the TVPA, legal rights and services for trafficking victims, and cultural considerations in serving these victims. More important, the Office for Victims of Crime and the National Institute of Justice are studying effective approaches to victim service delivery and plan to publish an evaluation of field-tested services in 2006.

In addition to the work of the Office for Victims of Crime, the Office on Violence Against Women has, since 2001, funded more than $700,000 for technical assistance projects that assist Office on Violence Against Women grantees in providing services to trafficking victims if they have also been victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking. For example, Legal Momentum's Immigrant Women Program provides technical assistance to Office on Violence Against Women grantees to foster their ability to serve immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and stalking. Because trafficking victims may seek services from Office on Violence Against Women grantees if they have also been a victim of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking, the Immigrant Women Program training workshops educate grantees about the availability of T- and U-visas, identifying whether a victim has been trafficked, barriers faced by trafficking victims who seek services, and conducting outreach to potential victims of trafficking. In addition, Legal Momentum has developed a nationwide directory of experts working with immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault and trafficking. Nearly 950 attorneys and advocates have attended these workshops and another 150 will be trained within the next year. Another example is the Family Violence Prevention Fund, which used Office on Violence Against Women funding in 2003 to establish a project aimed at improving collaborative responses to trafficked victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. The main goal of the project was to build multi-disciplinary collaborations between service providers and law enforcement to effectively and appropriately assist trafficking victims in Georgia and Washington. Plans are underway to expand the project into Alaska.

C. Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations

Public awareness is essential to proactive investigations that uncover victims. In fact, the prosecutions in United States v. Kil Soo Lee[76], which resulted in the single largest rescue of trafficking victims in the Department's history, and United States v. Soto[77] were brought to the attention of federal law enforcement through referrals by non-governmental organizations that work with populations at risk for trafficking. The Department works to motivate communities, especially anti-human trafficking task forces, to increase awareness among law enforcement, various government inspectors (especially health code, wage and hour, and occupational safety and health agents), hospitals and other medical providers, social services agencies, and community- and faith-based organizations.

Increased outreach and public awareness is critical to the investigation and prosecution of human trafficking cases. The Department established a toll-free telephone complaint line in 2000 to receive allegations of trafficking from individuals ready to report to law enforcement, creating a mechanism that has substantially increased the number of investigations initiated by the Civil Rights Division. [78]

Since 2003, the Department has made available a brochure describing its processes and resources to assist non-governmental organizations in dealing with trafficking victims and the Department in a more efficient way. Through outreach, America's communities – particularly immigrant communities – are better educated about this crime and how to report possible cases. Moreover, increased public awareness about this crime and the benefits available to its victims can eliminate important aspects of the leverage that traffickers hold over their victims.

As a result, all components speak publicly about trafficking and the Department's activities to combat this crime to state, local, and foreign legislators, law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and non-governmental victim advocacy and services organizations. The Civil Rights Division, for example, has delivered more than 200 presentations around the nation since fiscal year 2001. Office for

Victims of Crime grants to 21 human trafficking victim service providers under the TVPA include funding to increase public awareness in the communities they serve. Civil Rights Division representatives continuously emphasize the important role that faith and community-based organizations can play. Because of their proximity to the communities they serve, they can provide immense intelligence about potential criminal enterprises and trafficking victims, provide immediate, crisis care, and long term programs that help to prevent further victimization. The Federal Bureau of Investigation Civil Rights Unit has appeared on national television and local radio programs which highlight, define, and expose trafficking to the general public, including CNBC, Donny Deutche's The Big Idea, and WMAL AM 630's "Danger Zone" with Richard Carlson, a Washington, D.C.-area radio program. The Civil Rights Unit has also provided human trafficking-related training presentations at various non-governmental conferences, such as the International Association of Labor Standards Annual Conference in Memphis, Tennessee, and the National Organization of Women's Annual Conference in Los Angeles, California. The Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section is also actively engaged in promoting the Department's strategy of multi-disciplinary cooperation that emphasizes the victim-centered approach to combating domestic child prostitution with non-governmental organizations such as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

United States Attorneys' Offices are also involved in providing outreach and education about human trafficking within their districts. The United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of California, for example, has hosted five conferences on human trafficking since October 2001. Each of Women were victims of sex trafficking in United States v. Molina

These conferences have provided training about applicable statutes and resources available for victims, including contact information for potential victims, to local law enforcement and non-governmental organizations serving trafficking victims. These conferences have resulted in long-standing relationships between federal prosecutors and law enforcement, state and local police, and numerous local service-providers, such as the Bilateral Safety Corridor Coalition. Another example are the efforts of the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Connecticut, which convened a meeting in May 2004 of federal and state agencies to explore why human trafficking cases have not been prosecuted in this jurisdiction. By September 2004, this office convened a training conference intended to educate federal, state, and local law enforcement and victim service providers about human trafficking and how to identify resources, including federal grant opportunities. The result of these efforts has been the creation of an

D. Promoting Foreign Criminalization and Prosecution of Human Trafficking

As discussed above,[79] the President has directed federal agencies to use all diplomatic and foreign assistance tools in the nation's effort to abolish human trafficking. The Department has had an important role in advancing this directive. The Department's primary goal in this regard is to promote the efforts of foreign governments to criminalize human trafficking and to enhance their capacity to investigate and prosecute these crimes first through the President's international human rights initiative; second, by collaborating with foreign law enforcement agencies on human trafficking cases; third, by supporting foreign training and technical assistance programs, increase the capacity of several source and destination countries to combat trafficking. Specifically, the President's initiative aims to replicate our victim-centered prosecutions through multi-disciplinary task forces and increased outreach in Cambodia, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Moldova, and Tanzania.

The Department has been actively involved in the design, development, and implementation of this initiative. Working primarily through the Civil Rights Division, and with the assistance of the Criminal Division's Offices of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program, the Department coordinated with the Departments of Health and Human Services, Labor, and State, as well as the United States Agency for International Development, to develop the capacity of foreign governments to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases, and to develop partnerships with non-governmental organizations to prevent the vulnerable from becoming victims through outreach and education as well as to protect and rehabilitate victims. The inter-agency working group found the lessons learned by the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of trafficking cases and its organization of trafficking task forces a valuable model for the implementation of the President's international initiative. The objective of the initiative thus became the institution of multi-disciplinary efforts to combat human trafficking in particular geographic regions. In practice, this would mean that programs to promote awareness raising, victim shelters, and police and prosecutor training would be established and supported in a collaborative effort by each of the participating federal agencies. The Department designs country assessments to help the United States Government better understand the nature of the trafficking problem in a particular area and to inventory what efforts were currently underway.

Foreign Country
Human Trafficking Assessments By the Department of Justice

- What is the current statutory framework?
- What is the capacity of police to investigate trafficking offenses?
- What is the level of prosecutorial skill and interest in trafficking victims?
- What is the current state of services for victim shelter and restoration by both governmental and non-governmental organizations?
- What is the current level of cooperation between prospective anti trafficking team members, and?
- What is the level of political will and interest among those government officials who would be the implementers of the plan?

The first task is to gain a foundational understanding of human trafficking within the host country by answering such questions as: Who are the victims and where do they come from? What kind of coercion is used to control the victims? What are the historical and cultural factors that influence trafficking or the response to it? Is there trafficking of minors into sexual exploitation? What industries tend to have labor trafficking? Next, the Department's trafficking experts design a matrix of the necessary tools that would be required to rescue particular victims, place them into restorative care, and hold perpetrators accountable.

Once the assessment is completed, the United States Government, through the local United States Embassy, and the host government enter into a Letter of Agreement (LOA) that states the roles and responsibilities of both parties and the level of funding to be provided in connection with the President's initiative. Department team members then coordinate with the other federal agencies to deploy training and other capacity building and to assign to the host country personnel from the United States Government to provide expertise and mentoring to those working on the anti-trafficking project. A primary goal of every LOA entered into in connection with the President's initiative is the Department's imperative to rescue victims and hold perpetrators accountable. The President's initiative was designed to place a clear emphasis on results that change lives for victims and their families.

The United States Government's work with the Mexican Government in connection with this initiative presents a useful illustration of the Department's work. Since 2003, the Department's Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions have been actively conducting country planning sessions in both Mexico and Indonesia, and has detailed a Civil Rights Division attorney to the United States Embassy in Moldova, in connection with the President's international human trafficking initiative. In Mexico, a significant number of senior United States law enforcement specialists met repeatedly over the past year with their counterparts from the Mexican Government before a final Letter of Agreement was signed in mid 2005. As a result, both partners have a clear understanding of how the President's program will be implemented. One significant factor in the United States-Mexico anti-trafficking partnership is the agreement to work together on cases that involve criminal trafficking enterprises that are active on both sides for the border.

Collaboration with Foreign Law Enforcement

Another important Departmental component in the international arena is the Office of International Affairs of the Criminal Division, which serves as the link between federal, state, and local anti-trafficking efforts and foreign prosecution and judicial authorities. Good working partnerships with foreign governments have been essential to the Department's efforts to combat human trafficking. The Office of International Affairs' most significant contribution to United States Government anti-trafficking efforts has been to assist in gathering evidence from abroad and to assist foreign prosecutors in gathering evidence located in our country. For example, in United States v. Carreto,[80] Mexican nationals were accused of recruiting uneducated women and girls from impoverished areas of Mexico and compelling them to prostitute themselves in both Mexico and New York. Carreto's victims were forced to service up to 20 men a day as prostitutes and were beaten if they did not make enough money during a single day or if they attempted to hide the money they made. One victim was also forced to have an abortion.[81] The Office of International Affairs, in collaboration with the United States

Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York, helped secure testimony, as well as documentary and physical evidence, gathered by Mexican authorities in their investigations of the Carretos' transnational operation. Similarly, the Office of International Affairs secured evidence and testimony from Russia in support of a federal prosecution by the United States Attorney's Office for the Central District of California of a defendant in California accused of trafficking her niece into the United States and forcing her to be used in prostitution.[82]

The Office of International Affairs also works to extradite traffickers from foreign nations to the United States or from our country to foreign nations for prosecution. On September 28, 2005, Mexico provisionally arrested a Mexican national pursued by the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida on charges including conspiracy, alien smuggling, and transporting women and minors for purposes of prostitution between August 1996 and February 1998. The victims, who reportedly did not know their fate until they arrived in the United States, were not allowed to leave the brothels until they paid a smuggling fee to the accused, who allegedly took 70% of the prostitution proceeds.

Since fiscal year 2003, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has participated in the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative, a multilateral organization designed to combat trans-border crime and develop closer law enforcement coordination among its members, as the lead observer on human trafficking cases and has detailed agents to Albania, Bulgaria, and Romania to work on trafficking issues. The Southeast European Cooperative Initiative Regional Center for Combating Trans-Border Crime in Bucharest, Romania, coordinates southeastern European police and customs regional actions for preventing and combating trans-border crime, including trafficking in persons and migrant smuggling. The following twelve countries are actively involved with the Center: Albania, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Greece, Hungary, Macedonia, Moldova, Romania, Serbia and Montenegro, Slovenia and Turkey.

Foreign Training and Technical Assistance Programs

Dismantling transnational human trafficking networks requires a willingness and ability to work closely with our foreign partners in countries where victims are recruited. Consequently, the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions are actively involved in outreach and providing technical assistance to foreign governments and non-governmental organizations. Since 2002, Civil Rights Division officials have addressed international gatherings convened in countries such as Azerbaijan, Belize, Brazil, Cambodia, Canada, China, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Japan, Mexico, Moldova, Philippines, South Africa, Suriname, Thailand, and Ukraine, to encourage a coordinated response to human trafficking worldwide. These events are attended by foreign law enforcement executives, prosecutors, judges, and non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of or provide assistance to trafficking victims.

The Criminal Division's Offices of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and its sister organization, the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program work to build effective partnerships with other law enforcement agencies sharing the goal of eradicating predatory trafficking groups. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training conducted a total of 142 training and technical assistance programs involving 25 countries.

The Criminal Division's International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program has partnered with 12 nations, including Albania, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Costa Rica, Georgia, Indonesia, Macedonia, Nigeria, Ukraine, Russia, and Senegal

Assistant United States Attorney Susan Coppedge, in the Northern District of Georgia, was selected as a recipient of the 2006 Ian Axford New Zealand Fellowship in Public Policy to study Human Trafficking issues in New Zealand by the Common Wealth Fund. Ian Axford Fellowships in Public Policy give outstanding mid-career American professionals opportunities to study, travel, and gain practical experience in public policy in New Zealand, including firsthand knowledge of economic, social, and political reforms and management of the government sector.

AUSA Coppedge will work to strengthen anti-trafficking policies and laws in New Zealand. She plans to develop a comparative analysis of New Zealand and American approaches to combating human trafficking. During her six-month fellowship, AUSA Coppedge will be based with the New Zealand Ministry of Justice and the New Zealand Police.

to build local capacity to prevent and combat trafficking in persons. International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program projects have included training foreign police on how to properly identify and investigate trafficking cases, especially techniques for interviewing victims. Activities also included developing strike forces and specialized anti-trafficking police units; providing equipment and information technologies to manage trafficking-related cases; and developing law enforcement manuals to assist police to conduct investigations, make arrests, and rescue victims.

Insert graphic of all countries referenced re foreign assistance programs

Department experts also participate in regional, multilateral consultations between law enforcement executives that promote international cooperation between the country of victim origin and the destination country, such as the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative, which is discussed in more detail below. Attendees at workshops conducted by the Department are often law enforcement executives who can and do take information and put it into practice. In one recent example, Department lawyers relied upon contacts made through these training sessions to assist a country in arresting recruiters who held the children of trafficking victims as hostages to prevent the victims from providing evidence to assist in a United States prosecution.

Educating Foreign Visitors to United States

The Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Office for Victims of Crime, supplement the Department's foreign assistance programs by providing technical assistance and informational briefings with foreign delegations to the United States. Since the passage of the TVPA, Civil Rights Division lawyers have participated in numerous training and outreach programs, speaking at more programs last year and the year before than ever before in countries such as Austria, Cambodia, Mexico, Singapore, and Thailand. The Department's experts have also assisted their counterparts in other countries with assistance in developing a victim-centered response to human trafficking through meetings and training workshops. For example, many foreign governments host their own training in partnership with the United States Embassy. Lasting a week to two weeks, the Department's attorneys, investigators, and victim specialists teach critical skills such as evidence gathering, pro-active investigations, and victim interviews. Workshops provide an opportunity to practice skills and learn new law enforcement methods that reflect the lessons Department has learned in investigating and prosecuting these cases. The Department's consistent theme in each of these events is to present the crime of human trafficking as a multi-disciplinary challenge requiring collaboration among governmental and non-governmental agencies. The Department has learned that a critical need in many developing countries is the ability to develop a framework for governmental and non-governmental organizations to collaborate, particularly as it concerns the protection of victims and programs to prevent further victimization.

DOJ_NMG_0008983

In addition, some United States Attorney Offices, particularly in connection with their local Task Forces, have been involved in training and educating visitors from foreign governmental and non-governmental organizations about strategies to combat human trafficking. Representatives of the United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, along with its task force members from the Collier County Sheriff's Office, the Immigrant Rights Advocacy Center, and the Florida State University Center for the Advancement of Human Rights, traveled to Central America in late 2004 to educate governmental leaders about the efforts of their task force to combat human trafficking and provide assistance to its victims. An additional example is that of the United States Attorney's Office for the Western District of Washington, where the Seattle offices of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General have worked together to share information about efforts to combat human trafficking with officials and visitors from countries such as Brazil, Germany, Mexico, France, Italy, and Spain, and with organizations like the World Affairs Council.

The Department also works with foreign governments to adopt legislation that aids in the investigation and prosecution of traffickers and the protection of victims. Through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, the Department's trafficking experts in the Civil Rights Division, Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section and United States Attorneys' Offices assist foreign governments with the development and ratification of anti-human trafficking legislation to help ensure that foreign governments adopt laws that are victim-centered and compliant with the Palermo Protocol.[83] For example, in fiscal year 2004 alone, Civil Rights Division attorneys and its victim-witness coordinator have conducted training sessions and have assisted in drafting trafficking legislation in Asia, Africa, Europe, the Caribbean, North America, and South America, in coordination with the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training. These training sessions emphasize the Department's experience in investigating and prosecuting these cases, collecting evidence, and keeping the victim safe.

In fiscal year 2004, the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program assisted 7 foreign nations with legislation that directly or indirectly furthered anti-human trafficking efforts in fiscal year 2004. The Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training provides substantial technical assistance based on a victim-centered strategy known commonly as the "Three Ps of Trafficking in Persons: Prevention, Protection and Prosecution." Technical assistance by this office includes educating and developing joint projects with foreign law enforcement officials geared to strengthening their capacity to prevent transnational trafficking; protect victim witnesses and thereby encourage their participation in investigations and prosecutions; and effectively investigate and prosecute trafficking cases. This office also works with host countries on developing evidence collection techniques which can generate evidence usable in prosecutions – either here in the United States or in a foreign country.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, has provided training programs in Azerbaijan, Suriname and Ghana. In fiscal year 2004, the FBI trained 50 international visitors, including officials from Australia, India, Pakistan, South Africa, Haiti, and England. In addition, the Bureau's Civil Rights and the Asian Criminal Enterprise and Crimes Against Children Units conducted a training session at the British Embassy in January 2005 during a program jointly sponsored by the British Embassy and Women in Federal Law Enforcement.

Another component of the Department's international human trafficking program are activities to prevent victimization. An important step towards prevention is the Department's efforts to increase international public awareness about human trafficking. Raising the visibility of human trafficking and the efforts of the United States government to combat it encourages foreign governments to take victim-centered action to prevent, uncover, and prosecute cases of human trafficking. International public awareness is increased through activities of the Civil Rights Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Office working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program, in connection with briefings for foreign delegations and training programs. These training programs provide foreign parties – law enforcement officials, prosecutors, legislators, and non-governmental organizations – with information about the strategies the Department has employed to combat trafficking. Federal investigators and prosecutors, mostly Civil Rights Division attorneys, share lessons learned in prosecuting these cases, building local multi-disciplinary task forces, and providing services and protection for victims.

Insert Graphic of Globe Showing international efforts

As a further part of the Department's efforts concerning sex and labor trafficking, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has trained attorneys and investigators from numerous countries on sex trafficking of children. Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section staff have trained individuals from: the Council of Baltic States (11 Baltic nations), Albania, Angola, Armenia, Austria, the Balkans, Belgium, Belize, Bosnia, Brazil, Bulgaria, China, Costa Rica, Croatia, Czech Republic, El Salvador, Ecuador, Georgia, Germany, Guinea, Hungary, Indonesia,

Israel, Japan, Korea, Lithuania, Latvia, Macedonia, Mexico, Montenegro, Nigeria, Panama, the Philippines, Poland, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Serbia, Slovenia, South Africa, Suriname, Thailand, the United Kingdom, and Ukraine, among others.

States, governors, and legislatures can help by adopting anti-trafficking laws. The Justice Department has created a model state anti-trafficking law, and I intend to send a copy of it to every governor and legislative leader in those 40-plus states that do not yet have their own anti-trafficking laws.

-Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at the Hoover Institution Board of Overseers Conference, February 28, 2005

E. Fostering State, Local and Non-Governmental Activities to Combat Human Trafficking

The Department's work with state and local governmental agencies, particularly activities to expand anti-trafficking law enforcement authority, is intended to harness the nearly 700,000 state and local law enforcement officers who might come into contact with trafficking victims.[84] The number of law enforcement and prosecutorial resources dedicated to trafficking may be exponentially increased by combining federal, state and local assets. Thus, in 2004, the Department developed and introduced a model state law at the National Training Conference on Human Trafficking because many states do not have laws that criminalize this activity. At that time, only four states - Texas, Florida, Missouri, and Washington - had state laws against trafficking. The model state law reflects lessons learned through the Department's prosecutions, especially enforcement of the TVPA by the Civil Rights Division. Adoption of the model statute would promote a uniform national legal strategy to combat human trafficking.

On July 21, 2004, the United States Senate unanimously passed a resolution, authored by Texas Senator John Cornyn, endorsing the Department's model state anti-trafficking statute and encouraging states to adopt it. The Senate resolution also singled out for praise the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of human trafficking crimes and lauded the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking. In March 2005, Attorney General Gonzales sent letters to state governors and legislative leaders explaining the scope of the trafficking problem, pointing to the need for state assistance to the federal government in fighting trafficking, and urging them to adopt the model. Department officials have since promoted the model law, and Civil Rights Division attorneys continue to provide technical assistance regarding the model state law to state legislators and related organizations, such as the National Foundation for Women Legislators. To date, 15 states have enacted anti-trafficking legislation, many of which reflect the Department's model criminal statute.

Insert graphic of states and territories that have passed anti-trafficking legislation

As discussed above,[85] outreach and technical assistance are critical to uncovering this insidious crime. The Civil Rights Division, along with the Criminal Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Offices, works actively to increase awareness among local law enforcement and community- and faith-based organizations through training presentations and the provision of technical assistance. The strategy employed by each of these components reinforces a victim-centered approach to prosecutions and the collaborative work of task forces. Examples of the Department's activities to increase awareness of human trafficking among state and local governmental agencies, non-governmental organizations, and in our nation's communities include the following:

- Attorneys in the Civil Rights Division and the Office of Legal Policy authored an August 2002 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled Working Together to Stop Modern-Day Slavery. The article outlined ways for local law enforcement during the course of their usual investigations to identify trafficking cases.

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division conducted training sessions in the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area, New York City, Chicago, San Diego, Atlanta, Dallas, and several other cities and with numerous non-governmental organizations such as the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Women in Federal Law Enforcement and the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives.

- An attorney in the Civil Rights Division authored a December 2003 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled, Human Trafficking: A Guide to Detecting, Investigating, and Punishing Modern-Day Slavery. The article gave an overview of federal anti-trafficking efforts and urged increased cooperation among state, local, and federal law enforcement officials.

HUMAN TRAFFICKING

A Guide to Detecting, Investigating, and Punishing Modern-Day Slavery

By Bharathi A. Venkatraman, Federal Prosecutor and Special Counsel for Trafficking in Persons, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC

In April 1997, Joseph (not his real name), a homeless, drug-addicted African American man stumbled through the woods in Fort Pierce, Florida. He was dazed and bloody, having just been repeatedly kicked and beaten about the head and face. Deputy Lee, of the Saint Lucie County Sheriff's Department, who was investigating a report of a missing child, observed Joseph. Noticing Joseph's injuries, Lee summoned medical assistance and interviewed the injured man. Thus began an investigation initiated by the Saint Lucie Sheriff's Department, in conjunction with the Fort Pierce Police Department, that uncovered violent and abusive conduct on the part of Lewis Phillips, a fruit harvesting contractor who employed Joseph and a number of other workers on a seasonal basis. Phillips hooked Joseph and other workers on crack cocaine in lieu of paying them adequate salaries, and applied their earnings of 55 cents per bin of fruit picked to the crack debt that the workers owed him. Phillips's payment scheme resulted in a burgeoning debt for Joseph and the other workers and little, if any, take-home pay. Growing increasingly dissatisfied with his work situation, Joseph left Phillips's employ in favor of working for a competing fruit harvesting contractor who offered Joseph better terms. Once Phillips discovered that Joseph had left to work for a competitor, Phillips became enraged and enlisted the assistance of an enforcer to kidnap, beat, and brutalize Joseph in order to "teach him a lesson. . . ."

On the morning of November 22, 1999, 18-year old Geeta came home to her apartment in Berkeley, California, and was confronted by a horrifying sight. Her two roommates, sisters Leela, 16, and Radha, 14, were lying on the floor, unconscious. The apartment was stifling hot, and Geeta ran about grabbing water and ice to sprinkle on her two unconscious roommates, in hopes of reviving them. Geeta then shook and ultimately slapped the two sisters, but they remained unresponsive. A poor young woman from southern India, Geeta was not well educated and unable to speak English. Utterly desperate, she phoned her place of employment, an Indian restaurant in Berkeley, and summoned restaurant workers to come and assist her. The restaurant personnel arrived in a van and attempted to calm Geeta, who was waiting for them outside of the apartment, in a state of extreme agitation. The workers then called one of the unconscious sisters in a rug in order to carry her to the waiting van in a concealed fashion. However, their attempts at concealment failed when a passing motorist noticed a human body part protruding from the rug. Alarmed, the motorist called the Berkeley Police Department. Berkeley police officers responded immediately, along with paramedics, and became suspicious that three young girls, with little or no English language skills, were living alone. Their investigation, which ultimately involved federal agents, revealed that the young unconscious girls were the victims of carbon monoxide poisoning due to a malfunctioning heater. Tragically, one of the two sisters, Radha, ultimately died. The investigation, however, led to the discovery that the young roommates were sex abuse victims of a wealthy and powerful Bay Area business man who was also their employer.

Both of these examples are drawn from real-life human trafficking cases prosecuted by the Department of Justice. Despite the obvious distinctions between the two scenarios and the means used to harm the victims, they share one fundamental feature: both incidents involve defendants who intimidated victims and forced them to work against their will. Such conduct amounts to modern-day slavery, also known as trafficking in persons.

The Importance of Identifying the Crime

Human trafficking is not always easy to detect. As these two cases demonstrate, trafficking can masquerade as a variety of other offenses. However, it is important to identify modern-day slavery for what it is—an assault on fundamental human dignity. Local law enforcement officers are the first responders in the communities where such crimes occur and are therefore the key players in identifying and exposing these serious crimes.

Human Trafficking Defendants Receive Big Sentences

Identifying trafficking crimes for what they are is an efficient way to punish effectively a variety of criminal activity. Time and again we have witnessed the frustration of local officers who arrest persons involved in vice or domestic violence offenses and spend countless hours completing paperwork, only to encounter the same offenders on the street in a matter of days. Lenient laws that enable perpetrators to get away with a mere slap on the wrist serve as a disincentive to enforcement.

By contrast, trafficking crimes carry hefty sentences. Consider the sentences meted out in United States v. Jimenez-Calderon, a recent sex trafficking case prosecuted by the Department of Justice and local law enforcement in Newark, New Jersey, a case that just as easily could have been prosecuted as a prostitution case. In Jimenez-Calderon, the defendants lured and transported young Mexican girls into the United States under false pretenses, and then forced them into prostitution, using physical violence and threats to maintain strict control over them. On August 7 of this year, two female defendants who supervised the victims were sen-

- In fiscal year 2004, the Civil Rights Division conducted more than fifty training sessions around the United States at conferences and meetings in cities such as Albuquerque, Baltimore, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, Newark, New Jersey, and Salt Lake City.

- With funding from the Office on Violence Against Women, the International Association of Chiefs of Police is developing a training package for local law enforcement officers, including a guidebook on the identification and investigation of human trafficking crimes and a roll call training video with a discussion guide to accompany the guidebook.

- The International Association of Chiefs of Police National Law Enforcement Leadership Initiative, in connection with a $200,000 cooperative agreement with the Office on Violence Against Women, is planning a summit of law enforcement leaders in the summer of 2006 to continue to extend the level of awareness of and commitment to combating human trafficking.

- The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS), initiated, in fiscal year 2005, a program to educate local law enforcement about human trafficking through the COPS Regional Community

Policing Institutes at a cost of $245,000. In 2005, COPS conducted three "train-the-trainer" sessions for 300 law enforcement trainers, including members of the then-existing 18 multi-disciplinary task forces, with the human trafficking curriculum developed by the Bureau of Justice Assistance. This program will be expanded in 2006 to hold at least five sessions, educating 5,100 law enforcement personnel.

- Also in fiscal year 2005 and independent of the Bureau of Justice Assistance, COPS sponsored an additional 6 training sessions for nearly 700 law enforcement officers, non-law enforcement governmental officials, and community-based organizations.

- The National Institute of Justice is supporting research that will provide a clear perspective on the current state of law enforcement's understanding of human trafficking. The research will identify current law enforcement responses to human trafficking; the implications of such responses for victims; and best practices and lessons learned by law enforcement and the partners with whom they collaborate on trafficking cases (e.g., victims service providers, attorneys, etc.).

- The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, through the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and the Fox Valley Technical College, provides training on topics such as child maltreatment, runaway and missing children, the protection of children, and domestic trafficking of children for sexual purposes. This training program has educated approximately 36,500 persons between 2001-2005 with about 27,5000 persons trained between 1998-2000.

VII. Conclusion

The Department has achieved incredible success in carrying out President Bush's directive to combat human trafficking. Under this Administration, the Department has been aggressive and effective in its effort to halt human trafficking. Prosecutorial activity has increased four-fold when compared to the last five years of the previous administration. The Department also has been innovative in its approach, by developing a multi-disciplinary victim-centered approach to uncovering human trafficking schemes, rescuing and protecting victims and working with foreign, governmental and non-governmental partners to prevent further victimization. Moreover, the Department is ensuring that the important work to combat human trafficking of the Civil Rights Division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Civil Rights Unit is complemented by, and coordinated with, the contributions of the many other Department components identified throughout this report that contribute in meaningful ways to this important Departmental priority. There is however, much work to be done.

Because the fundamental liberties of a human trafficking victim are violated by traffickers, the Civil Rights Division will continue to lead the Department's efforts to combat this heinous crime, working with federal investigators and prosecutors as well as victim services organizations both here and abroad. With the new tools found in the TVPRA of 2005, the Department will continue to work with its federal, state and local partners to expand the reach and intensity of anti-human trafficking task forces and encourage states to criminalize sex, labor and child sex trafficking.

First, let me thank Omar for the tremendous amount of work he's done on this report. He is really the one who has pulled the laboring oar in drafting and assimilating all of your submissions into a single, cohesive document. Second, let me thank all of you for your feedback. We never could have gotten this far without your input. Finally, a gentle reminder that we are still waiting on supporting documentation from a number of components (you know who you are). We are cross-checking the report with the supporting documentation, which is a time-intensive process. We cannot submit the report to the printer without your supporting documentation, so please get it to us if you have not done so already. I am sure that none of you want your component to be the one holding up finalization of the report!

Everyone:

As promised, attached is the last draft of the DOJ trafficking report we will circulate to the working group. This draft makes an attempt to incorporate graphs, pictures, and other images to give as good a sense as possible as to what the final product will look like. Because this version includes numerous images, it is a HUGE file. The document has been compressed into a "ZIP file." I've been advised that it is best for you to save the file onto your desktop for quick retrieval. If you do not have WINZIP, you should either obtain the program or contact me and I will burn a CD for you. Please don't attempt to redline this document, the software may freeze on you. Instead, send your comments in the body of an email and images should be attached to your email.

Your expertise and help has resulted in a fairly nice document. Please review and provide comment to us no later than COB tomorrow, 1/11/06. If you propose any new language, please submit drafted language ready for insertion into the document. Same with pictures or other images. Please provide a copy of the image and identify a location in the report for it.

Many Thanks!

Department of Justice
Report on Activities to Combat Human Trafficking
Fiscal Years 2001-2005

I. An Introduction to Human Trafficking

Human trafficking is a pernicious crime that violates the fundamental principles of our society. For traffickers, victims are commodities to be traded and exploited in any market. Human trafficking is the modern-day form of slavery. It requires the use of force, fraud, or coercion by a trafficker to compel a person into, or hold someone in, an employment situation in which he or she will be criminally exploited. Trafficking may occur when victims are transported across borders or within a nation, or may not involve transportation at all. Victims, often women, are usually lured by promises of well-paying jobs. Once deprived of the opportunity to return home or communicate with their family, victims are generally held through force or threats in situations of sexual exploitation or forced labor. Human trafficking offenses thus transgress the victim's human liberty in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment's guarantee of freedom. As such, trafficking offends the core civil rights on which our Constitution and our country are based.

> Human life is the gift of our Creator -- and it should never be for sale. It takes a special kind of depravity to exploit and hurt the most vulnerable members of society. Human traffickers rob children of their innocence, they expose them to the worst of life before they have seen much of life.
> –President George W. Bush, July 16, 2004

By statute, a victim of a "severe form of trafficking in persons" is entitled to certain public programs and benefits. A severe form of trafficking must include the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for one of the three following purposes:

- Labor or services, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- A commercial sex act, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- If the person is under 18 years of age, any commercial sex act, regardless of whether any form of coercion is involved.[1]

Since 2001, the Department of Justice has achieved an impressive record of prosecuting defendants for holding their victims in compelled service in such diverse areas as prostitution, field labor, domestic service, concubinage, "exotic dancing," pornography, garment factory "sweatshops," and street peddling. From fiscal year 2001 through fiscal year 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed 91 trafficking cases, a 405% increase over the number of trafficking cases filed from fiscal years 1996 through 2000. In these cases, Department attorneys charged 248 trafficking defendants, a 210% increase over the previous five fiscal years. In addition, prosecutors with the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices convicted 140 defendants of trafficking-related crimes, a 109% increase over the previous five years.

Traffickers take advantage of the victims' hopes for a better life, preying on or even creating vulnerabilities that they can exploit. For example, in United States v. Satia, Louisa Satia and her husband, Kevin Nanji, used a false passport to bring 14 year-old "R.O." from Cameroon, where R.O. had worked for Satia's mother since the age of 12. R.O. was lured by the promise of an American education. Satia and Nanji refused to send the girl to school, however, and instead forced her to work for them as a maid and as a nanny to their young children. R.O. was not permitted to leave Satia and Nanji's apartment alone, except to take out the trash and walk the children to the school bus stop. Satia hit R.O. routinely, poked R.O. in the eyes, sprayed window cleanser on R.O., poured cola and glue in R.O.'s hair, and threatened her with deportation even though they were the ones who had brought her to the country illegally. Nanji made repeated sexual advances toward the girl. Apart from keeping R.O. in a condition of involuntary servitude, Satia solicited numerous people to sell their identities to her so that she could create false passports and routinely arranged false marriages as part of an immigration fraud scheme. In 2002, after their conviction at trial of involuntary servitude, the defendants were sentenced to 9 years in prison and ordered to pay $105,300 in restitution.[2]

Traffickers may lure their victims into farm work, factories, domestic service or the hospitality and sex industries. For instance, in a pathbreaking case in Florida, United States v. Cadena, Mexican women and girls as young as 14 years of age were brought to the United States with promises of good jobs as

The Cadena family

I hated to be in the brothels. There were so many clients that came to the house. I was so scared. I would try to hide from them so they wouldn't pick me. The Bossses told me I had to work and to stop behaving in this manner. Also, the Bosses would rape some of the other girls. This scared me. I was afraid they might rape me or hurt me in some other way. I didn't know anyone. I was alone. I was very frightened.

d the women in their service by shooting into the ground at their feet, threatening their families, beating them, and raping them as punishment if they tried to run away. The ringleader and six other men were convicted of involuntary servitude and sentenced to up to 15 years of incarceration. The Cadena case is ongoing, and Federal Bureau of Investigation and Departmental prosecutors and victim-witness specialists have continued to prosecute Cadena family members and assist the survivors. In 2002, one of the family members was apprehended at the United States-Mexico border and pled guilty to conspiracy to enslave the women and girls. With the cooperation of the Mexican Government, the Department secured the conviction of one of the Cadena brothers in Mexico in 2002, where he was sentenced to 24 years of incarceration. In 2005, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department's Office of International Affairs achieved the arrest in 2005 of yet another member of the family; trial is pending in Mexico as of the time of this report and a request for extradition prepared by the Office of International Affairs is pending. The Cadena victims have been assisted by a non-governmental organization that is funded by the Department's Office for Victims of Crime, and with the help of the case agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff, they have been able to bring their children and custodial parents to the United States.

Any specific instance of human trafficking may involve a range of other criminal activity that is not limited to federal anti-human trafficking laws, such as inter-state transportation for prostitution, money laundering, and racketeering. Trafficking indictments often reflect this as the Department is committed to attacking this problem using all of the varied tools in the federal prosecutor's tool box.[4] For instance, in United States v. Zavala, Mariluz Zavala, who in November 2005 received a 15-year prison sentence for enslaving Peruvian workers in Long Island, New York, was charged with a multi-object conspiracy, where the Department alleged that she and her co-conspirators had conspired to commit forced labor and involuntary servitude by withholding immigration documents. The Department also charged her with extortion and falsifying immigration documents, criminal violations that are not found in the federal anti-human trafficking law.[5] In forced prostitution cases, such as United States v. Reyes-Rojas,[6] where two brothers were charged with sex trafficking, additional charges often include inter-state transportation for prostitution under the law known commonly as the "The Mann Act,"[7] and harboring people for prostitution. In cases like United States v. Maksimenko, where a Lithuanian man pled guilty to enslaving Ukranian women in strip clubs through force and threats, federal prosecutors brought money laundering charges. Trafficking charges are predicate acts under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) statutes,[8] and accordingly can sustain money laundering charges for transactions carried out with the proceeds of, or in furtherance of, a trafficking scheme.

Sometimes, when a trafficking situation has occurred, but there is not sufficient evidence with which to establish a trafficking offense, the Mann Act and immigration statutes can be powerful tools to vindicate the federal interest. For example, in United States v. Reddy,[9] the investigation revealed that, for over ten years, defendant Lakireddy Bali Reddy, a wealthy San Francisco Bay Area businessman, maintained a number of young girls and women as a quasi-harem for his sexual gratification and to work in his household and business enterprises. These victims were predominantly from families of lower castes in India and were brought into the United States by way of fraudulent employment offers or sham marriages. Members of Reddy's family posed as relatives of the victims to assist in their fraudulent migration. His scheme came to light after a teenage girl died of carbon monoxide poisoning in the apartment where he had sequestered her, her sister, and another girl. In 2001, Reddy pled guilty to transporting his victims in interstate and foreign commerce for illegal sexual activity. He was sentenced to more than 8 years in prison and ordered to pay $2,000,000 in restitution to four of his victims. The victims received benefits and services under the TVPA and today remain safely in the United States.

II. An Administration Priority

Early in this Administration, the President identified the eradication of human trafficking as a priority. Two particular actions by the President focused Federal resources on trafficking. First, in February 2002, the President issued Executive Order 13257, creating a cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. The President ordered that the Task Force be chaired by the Secretary of State and be comprised of the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Director of Central Intelligence, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.[10] The President took this action to ensure that the TVPA was fully implemented in a coordinated fashion throughout the federal government.[11]

> Slavery, human trafficking, and sexual servitude are crimes that wrench our hearts. They rob human beings of freedom. They strike at our nation's belief in the potential of every life. They are crimes that demand swift and implacable prosecution of the predators. They are crimes that deserve warmth and compassion for the victims.
> -Attorney General John Ashcroft, January 29, 2004

Second, also in February 2002, the President issued National Security Presidential Directive 22 (NSPD-22) to identify human trafficking as an important national security matter as well as to instruct federal agencies to strengthen their collective efforts, capabilities, and coordination to support the President's goal of abolishing human trafficking.[12] NSPD-22 states that human trafficking is a transnational threat that is an affront to the principles on which this country stands. The relationship of human trafficking to organized crime, especially transnational criminal syndicates, fosters official corruption and threatens the rule of law.[13] The clandestine movement of persons across borders also poses terrorism and public health concerns. The United States Attorney's Office for the District of Montana, for example, treats every border incursion as potentially related to terrorism and, in 2004, was involved in a joint operation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Canadian Border Services Agency that resulted in the identification of a dozen Korean women believed to be destined for the sex trade, 80% of whom tested positive for tuberculosis. The syndicates that recruit and move these victims are often the same ones that are responsible for other trans-border crimes, like smuggling, drug trafficking, and the arms trade. Traffickers can and will move any type of cargo, human or otherwise, for profit. The fight against trafficking is therefore a critical element of United States foreign policy, requiring full use of the tools of diplomacy and the cooperation of American and foreign law enforcement.

[11] The President subsequently issued an Executive Order amending Executive Order 13257 on March 18, 2004, conforming it to the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-193, 117 Stat. 2875.

Moreover, NSPD-22 views the abolition of prostitution, the driving force behind sex trafficking, as integral to the abolition of human trafficking. Regarding the United States's policy towards prostitution, NSPD-22 states:

> The United States opposes prostitution and any related activities, including pimping, pandering, and/or maintaining brothels as contributing to the phenomenon of trafficking in persons. These activities are inherently harmful and dehumanizing. The United States Government's position is that these activities should not be regulated as a legitimate form of work for any human being.[14]

NSPD-22 created a three-point plan of action:

1. Implementing Training in Federal Agencies
   The President required all federal agencies to ensure that their own personnel were trained and equipped to carry out their anti-trafficking responsibilities and that their personnel coordinated with counterparts in other agencies. Further, NSPD-22 stated that the United States has a zero-tolerance policy with regard to trafficking by United States Government employees and contractors, who are to be educated about trafficking and investigated, prosecuted, and punished for engaging in it.

2. Developing Cooperation With State and Local Law Enforcement in the United States
   The President recognized that state and local law enforcement are critical to federal efforts to combat human trafficking. NSPD-22 instructs federal agencies to vigorously enforce laws against traffickers, and to provide training and assistance to state and local law enforcement to assist them in recognizing victims and to hold perpetrators accountable for their crimes.

3. Integrating and Coordinating International Programs
   The President required all federal agencies to coordinate foreign assistance programs,

---

[14] Id.

> including funding to governmental and non-governmental organizations and public awareness programs, to combat trafficking in persons. NSPD-22 also required agencies to ensure that contractors receiving United States funding through international programs do not engage in trafficking activities. The President also directed agencies to work to prevent future victimization by reducing the vulnerability of individuals to trafficking, particularly through the expansion of educational and economic opportunities and the protection and promotion of human rights. The President further directed federal agencies to employ diplomatic and foreign policy tools to encourage other nations and multilateral organizations to work with the United States to combat this crime, to draft and enforce laws against trafficking, and to hold accountable those who engage in this crime.[15]

In 2003, Congress passed and President Bush signed the reauthorization of the TVPA, known as the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA).[16] The TVPRA of 2003 codified the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons by creating the Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG), which meets quarterly. The TVPRA slightly expanded the SPOG's authority, particularly as it concerns inter-agency coordination to develop the capacity of foreign nations, both source and destination countries, to combat trafficking; to examine the role of sex tourism in human trafficking; and to foster consultation with governmental and non-governmental organizations regarding implementation of the TVPRA.

The Attorney General has been an engaged member of the SPOG, and the Department supports this group in a variety of ways. In 2004, for example, the Civil Rights Division and the Office of Justice Programs participated in a SPOG subcommittee charged with designing the President's international human trafficking initiative. Currently, the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, the Office of Legal Policy, and the Office for Victims of Crime are members of the SPOG Subcommittee on Domestic Trafficking. The National Institute of Justice, a component of the Office of Justice Programs, is a member of the SPOG Subcommittee on Research, which shares information regarding research grants and other activities by each SPOG member agency. This subcommittee is also studying the issue of accurately estimating the number of trafficking victims within the United States. In addition, the Office of Justice Programs, the Department's principal grant-making agency, and the Office on Violence Against Women participate in the interagency grant information-sharing process of the SPOG. The grant information-sharing process is designed to provide SPOG member agencies with an opportunity to review and comment on proposed grant awards, helping to ensure that domestic and international grant programs are coordinated across the federal government. Finally, the Office of Legal Policy chairs the SPOG Subcommittee on Regulations, a working group charged with the development of federal regulations to implement the TVPRA.

III. Scope of the Problem

A. How Many Victims and Who are They?

It is extremely difficult to quantify the number of victims trafficked globally and into the United States each year. Some estimates indicate that as many as 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, with up to 17,500 victims trafficked into our country each year.[17] Clearly, the problem is of sufficient magnitude that a continued dedication of substantial resources to this enforcement area is very much in order.

Despite our record number of investigations and prosecutions, there is a noted disparity between the estimated number of victims and those who have been found and assisted. The Department realizes that it must address the incongruity between some estimates and the fewer than 1,000 victims who have been assisted through the efforts of federal, state, and local law enforcement since 2003, when services for trafficking victims were first made available under the TVPA. Though the possible reasons for this disparity vary, the difference nevertheless signals the need to carefully scrutinize the estimated number of trafficking victims to assure that it reflects as accurately as possible the number of human trafficking victims within our country.

Some Estimates Overstate the Number of Victims

Some possible explanations are that estimates may overstate the extent of the problem and conflate human trafficking with the smuggling and harboring of illegal aliens or with the related crime of migrant prostitution. Trafficking victims are not all illegal aliens; human trafficking is distinct from human smuggling. Trafficking victims may be United States citizens, legal residents, or visitors. For example, United States v. Pipkins was the first case in which the Department successfully prosecuted two pimps for trafficking women and girls, all American citizens.[18] Prostitution alone is not trafficking; but where, as here, it involved the use of force or coercion to prevent people from leaving the enterprise, it becomes trafficking. Human smuggling, on the other hand, is the facilitation, transportation, attempted transportation, or illegal entry of a person or persons across an international border, in violation of American immigration laws. Many of those illegally entering the United States are smuggled, not trafficked.[19] Smuggling may occur clandestinely or through deception, such as the use of fraudulent passports or other immigration documents.[20] Human smugglers enter into a contractual relationship with those they will illegally transport into our country. The smuggler is often paid a considerable amount of money for his services and the relationship normally ends once the smuggled person has entered the United States and the debt is paid. Sometimes, smuggling may turn into trafficking when smugglers extort their victims until the smuggling debt is repaid.

Identifying Victims is Difficult

Another explanation is that identifying and assisting victims of human trafficking are difficult tasks, and consequently, the Department does not have reliable figures regarding the number of victims who may be in the United States. Trafficking victims who have been rescued in connection with federal government activities over the past several years have come from more than 50 different countries.[21] But several factors contribute to the difficulty of identifying trafficking victims. Human trafficking, like many other crimes, often requires that the victim and the criminal enterprise remain in the shadows of our communities. Moreover, victims often suffer from paralyzing fear and are reluctant to seek help, further exacerbating the problem. Traffickers prey on the meek and destitute, coercing and deceiving them into hiding.

Trafficking Schemes May Be Dismantled In A Variety of Ways

A third possible explanation for this disparity is that victims may be helped by state and local law enforcement activities that the Department does not know about, or, in some instances, state and local officials may not realize that they have uncovered trafficking victims. Under our federal system of government, state and local governments may prosecute these cases under other criminal laws. Furthermore, although a particular prosecution by the Department may only result in the rescue of one or a few victims, it is reasonable to assume that enterprises that have been in business for several years have victimized dozens and possibly hundreds of people.

Developing A Better Understanding of Trafficking & its Victims

The Department is committed to discussing and refining methodologies for estimating the number of victims that may yield more reliable results. The Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics and National Institute of Justice have begun to research these issues and will publish information useful to victim advocates, policy makers, and law enforcement officials. Indeed, Congress has recently mandated that the Department undertake research to develop an estimate of the number of persons engaged in severe forms of trafficking and commercial sex acts and to share this information with its state and local governmental and non-governmental partners.[22] The enactment of anti-trafficking crimes at the state level, many of which are based on the Department's model anti-trafficking statute, is a heartening trend, as the men and women in state and local law enforcement far outnumber the federal resources available to combat this problem.[23] As with domestic violence and sexual abuse, it is local police and prosecutors who will investigate and prosecute the lion's share of trafficking cases in the coming years. The Department is committed to supporting these partners in expanding the victim-centered approach it has developed.

Victim-centered prosecutions recognize that the government's interest in these cases stems from the violation of the fundamental right of freedom. Moreover, victim-centered prosecutions are essential to the liberation and care of victims. In vindicating the survivor's right to be free, federal prosecutors must give him or her the opportunity to use that freedom and the support to make it meaningful. The Department's approach flows from our nation's foundational principles– respect for human dignity and one's civil rights

Typically, federal prosecutors learn about a crime from the victim, an eyewitness, or through an investigation. For traffickers to be successful, they must hide their crime from law enforcement by concealing their victims and their collaborators. Those who benefit from trafficking – men who frequent prostitutes and those who benefit from the low cost labor that the traffickers broker – are often momentary beneficiaries, and may not even know that the victim is being held in compelled service. Thus, the only remaining eyewitness is often the victim. To prevent their workforce from running away and to forestall detection, traffickers have an incentive to instill fear in their victims– fear of American law enforcement, fear of their captors, and fear of anyone they meet in their unfamiliar settings. Many victims are far from their country of origin and their families. They do not speak English and are more likely than not to lack any legal immigration status. Traffickers prey on the unsettled aspects of their lives, playing victims against each other and fostering collaboration.

Victims of trafficking often live and are forced to work in linguistic and social isolation. They fear the threat of exposure and feel shame about the work they are forced to do, particularly when that work includes sexual abuse. They also fear continued violence or the threat of reprisals against loved ones. They can develop a psychological and emotional dependence on the trafficker or others. Immigrant victims of human trafficking often face a special set of circumstances that keep them in the shadows of our nation's communities. Traffickers will often withhold from immigrant victims of trafficking their immigration documents. Immigrant victims may have a fear of American law enforcement , do not understand their rights, and fear risking default on monies owed their captors, as well as the collateral effect that may have on their families back home. The result is that victims will rarely self-report and so they must be pro-actively found.

While relying on the victims to give testimony about their suffering – the same duty American law requires of any witness – the Department places a premium on addressing the victims' need for recovery. Agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff work with, and are intensifying their relationships with, victim service providers. These groups, often experienced faith or community-based organizations that have previously served immigrant or abused populations, can help keep the victims safe, meet their medical and housing needs, and help them find an equilibrium in their lives through job training, language classes, and life-skills counseling.

"It's their fault that I lost my friends, my parents....My story is very long. It took me about a year to reach my parents....They (the defendants) don't repent for everything they did to me, for all the damage they did to me. They hit me....They thought they were big shots. I tried to defend myself but couldn't. I tried to escape...."

–An in-court statement by S.A.H., a victim in United States v. Jimenez-Calderon

The services that are available to victims formed the basis of the Department of Justice "victim-centered approach" that understands that the mission of government is to remove victims from the abusive setting, place them into safe programs of restorative care and hold the perpetrators accountable. Congress intended this comprehensive effort to combat trafficking in the TVPA and is reauthorization in 2003 and 2005. One of the added benefits of restorative care for victims is that they become empowered to provide critical evidence that law enforcement can use to investigate and prosecute traffickers. Without these services victims would remain too traumatized or afraid to assist law enforcement.

Victim-centered prosecutions, where government funded services and protection are provided to victims who assist an investigation and prosecution, are critical to the prevention of human trafficking. Without the victim's contribution, law enforcement's ability to stop traffickers from recruiting other vulnerable persons is blocked. Without the victim's help, police and prosecutors will not be able to effectively neutralize the trafficking scheme and prevent others from being trafficked.

Federal law enforcement are committed to combating human trafficking with a victim-centered approach. Federal investigators and prosecutors, including Federal Bureau of Investigation and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and Assistant United States Attorneys, immediately refer a victim to victim-witness specialists who begin to provide the appropriate referrals to victim service providers, often grantees that are funded through the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Refugee Resettlement. The Civil Rights Division and the Office for Victims of Crime work together to ensure that grantees are available to provide services to victims. In addition, because trafficking victims may avail themselves of victim services providers funded through other Departmental components, such as the Office on Violence Against Women and the Bureau of Justice Assistance, grantees of these offices are trained to provide assistance to victims of human trafficking.

Department components regularly promote a victim-centered response and educate other law enforcement agencies and victim service providers about the dynamics of trafficking and the need for pro-active investigations in an effort to increase awareness and outreach to new partners, with the ultimate goal of preventing victimization. For example:

- Since 2002, Civil Rights Division staff have trained federal, state, and local law enforcement officers and victim service providers about proactive victim-centered investigations. In addition, Criminal Section lawyers are educating prosecutors and other law enforcement officials across the country on the criminal provisions of the new trafficking statute and providing practical guidance on investigating and prosecuting these difficult cases, as well as assisting localities to establish regional working groups to better coordinate and focus anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. The Section continues to organize and lead training efforts at the Justice Department's national training facility for federal investigators and prosecutors from around the country, as well as victim-witness coordinators from the Department of Justice and other federal law enforcement agencies.

- Since January 2003, nearly 40,000 law enforcement officers, attorneys, social service providers, advocates, medical and mental health professionals, and community members have been trained by the Office for Victims of Crime and Bureau of Justice Assistance grantees. Moreover, the Bureau of Justice Assistance's law enforcement training emphasizes that code enforcement officials, fire marshals, and other persons who may have access to where victims are being held should be trained on signs of human trafficking.

- The Federal Bureau of Investigation's Civil Rights Unit and various United States Attorneys' Offices have also participated in dozens of regional Department of Justice sponsored human trafficking training conferences hosted throughout the country, in cities including Los Angeles, Houston, New Haven, Portland, St. Louis, San Diego, San Francisco, and Tampa.

- Since 2003, the Criminal Division's Child Endangerment and Obscenity Section has trained more than 350 law enforcement personnel and other officials on the investigation and prosecution of child prostitution cases, emphasizing the importance of a victim's safety.

successful efforts in combating human trafficking would not be possible without the enactment of several statutes by Congress. Prior to 2001, trafficking cases were prosecuted under a number of federal criminal statutes including the involuntary servitude statutes,[24] the Mann Act,[25] and labor laws concerning workplace conditions and compensation.[26] The Mann Act statutes were formerly thought of as the primary federal anti-trafficking tool, when "trafficking" was perceived as interstate transportation for prostitution, as opposed to the modern definition, which focuses on compelled service. The involuntary servitude statutes set forth a variety of substantive crimes covering the slave trade, involuntary servitude, and peonage. Sections 1584 and 1581, of Title 18 of the United States Code, which respectively criminalize involuntary servitude and peonage, were the primary statutes prosecutors used in involuntary servitude and trafficking prosecutions. Section 1583, which criminalizes kidnaping victims into slavery, likewise remains a useful tool in modern federal prosecutions. Prior to the TVPA, these statutes did not always treat the workers involved as victims and enforcement authority for each of these possible anti-trafficking tools was scattered across the United States Government, leading to differing outcomes depending on which charges were brought or which agency learned of the allegations of abuse.

Today, the centerpiece of United States Government efforts is the TVPA.[27] The TVPA provided for a range of new protections and assistance for victims of trafficking who cooperate with law enforcement investigations; it expanded the crimes and enhanced the penalties available to federal investigators and prosecutors pursuing traffickers; and it expanded United States activities internationally to prevent victims from being trafficked in the first place.

Protections and Assistance for Victims

The TVPA authorized a dedicated stream of funding for victim services and provides for immigration relief for severe forms of trafficking.[28] Under the TVPA, a victim is certified by the Department of Health and Human Services as eligible for services funded by any federal or state program or activity, such as the Departments of Agriculture, Health and Human Services, and Labor or the Legal Services Corporation. Department of Health and Human Services certification is granted after consultation with the Department's law enforcement officials, including investigators and prosecutors, that the victim meets the statutory definition of a "victim of a severe form of trafficking" and is also cooperating with the federal law enforcement investigation. The TVPA also authorized the Department to fund and provide training and technical assistance to law enforcement agencies and victim service providers.

The Department's Office for Victims of Crime directs its funding to support services for pre-certified victims and may, in special circumstances, fund organizations that provide services to certified victims. Pre-certified victims are those victims who have been identified by law enforcement in connection with an investigation and are awaiting Department of Health and Human Services certification that they are a victim of a severe form of trafficking and assisting law enforcement. This is significant because pre-certified victims are not entitled to the same publicly funded benefits that certified victims are, yet the need for services is most acute at this stage. Secondarily, providing those services enables victims, in most instances, to cooperate with law enforcement to investigate and prosecute their human traffickers. A safe and healthy victim is better able to articulate to investigators and in a court what has happened to her. Indeed, a survivor of trafficking can often be an effective anti-trafficking advocates and providers of services for victims.

The TVPA[29] provided a clear definition of human trafficking as a crime, created stiff sentences, and provided prosecutors with definitions of terms used to describe the offense such as "coercion," and "commercial sex act."[30] Traffickers that use force, fraud or coercion, or who exploit children under 14 years of age for commercial sex acts, may be sentenced to a term of up to life imprisonment.[31]

Prevention

As discussed above[32], victim services under the TVPA that are provided in connection with a victim helping in the government's prosecution of traffickers is essential to prevention. The TVPA has also given the Department the tools needed to increase public awareness within our communities, particularly among law enforcement and social services agencies, as well as internationally. The Department's activities, including those undertaken by non-governmental organizations that receive grants from the Office for Victims of Crime, that aim to prevent victimization through public awareness and outreach are discussed below in Part VI "The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers," section C "Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations."

Subsequently, in 2003, Congress, with the President's support, re-authorized the TVPA,[33] which further enhanced penalties and added responsibilities to the United States Government's anti-trafficking portfolio, such as new public awareness campaigns to combat sex tourism and some refinements to the federal criminal law. Significantly, Congress included trafficking as a predicate for money laundering and racketeering, under the RICO statute. Prosecutors have used this effective tool to dismantle trafficking syndicates. In conjunction with the mandatory restitution and forfeiture provisions of the TVPA, these sections work together to ensure that defendants convicted of trafficking in persons receive sentences that reflect the seriousness of their crimes. The TVPRA has produced tangible results in the field, yielding penalties three and four times those obtained under smuggling or harboring statutes and under historical servitude and trafficking statutes, as discussed earlier in this section.

Kil Soo Lee, a former owner of

It also clarified the provision regarding victims and the requirement that they cooperate with law enforcement. Specifically, the Department of Health and Human Services, as part of their process of certifying whether a victim has suffered a severe form of trafficking, may now consider statements from state and local law enforcement, that the victim has "been willing to assist in the investigation and prosecution of state and local crimes." The TVPRA also relieved victims under the age of 18 from meeting this requirement altogether in order to be eligible for the T visa. Congress also created a new civil action that allows trafficking victims to sue their traffickers in federal district court, thus complementing the criminal prosecution of traffickers. Specifically, the TVPRA of 2003 gave victims of human trafficking the right to bring federal civil suits against their traffickers for actual and punitive damages. Nine of the victims in the Reddy[34] case and the mother of another, for example, sued the Reddy family, seeking $100 million in damages. The Reddy family settled the case before going to trial.

The President, also in 2003, signed into law the Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today Act of 2003, known as the PROTECT Act. The PROTECT Act, developed with the assistance of experts in the Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section of the Criminal Division, has given the Department's prosecutors several new tools to combat sex trafficking and child prostitution. The Act makes it a crime for a United States citizen to travel in foreign commerce and engage in illicit sexual activity with minors,[35] and now includes an attempt provision.[36] Moreover, this Act facilitated prosecutions by eliminating the requirement that the Department prove that the traveler-predator intended to have sex with a child prior to traveling. As discussed in the next section, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section and the United States Attorneys' Offices have used this new tool to aggressively combat child sex trafficking.

In addition to adding important new tools in the prosecution of child sex tourism cases, the PROTECT Act supplemented the TVPA by raising the statutory maximum sentences for violations of 18 U.S.C. 1591 involving children. The PROTECT Act also abolished the statute of limitations for crimes involving the abduction or physical or sexual abuse of a child in virtually all cases. Under previous law, the statute of limitations expired when the child turned 25, potentially allowing child abusers to go free if law enforcement could not solve the crime in time.

On January 10, 2006 President Bush signed into law the Trafficking Victims' Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 (TVPRA of 2005). In addition to reauthorizing the TVPRA, the law enhances our ability to combat trafficking in persons by extending our prosecutorial tools and providing new protections for victims. In important enhancements to prosecutorial tools, the bill establishes extra-territorial authority for prosecution of trafficking in persons offenses committed by federal contractors abroad or persons accompanying them and adds trafficking in persons as predicates for the offense of document servitude, where one's identity papers, such as foreign birth certificate, passport, or immigration documents, are withheld by the trafficker and used to coerce or compel the trafficking victim. The TVPRA of 2005 also promotes efforts to fight domestic trafficking in persons. It requires a comprehensive research and statistical review and analysis of incidents of trafficking and commercial sex acts within the United States and annual conferences, to be conducted by the Department for the benefit of state and local law enforcement, other governmental agencies, and non-governmental organizations, on domestic trafficking in fiscal years 2006, 2007, and 2008 and biennially thereafter.

The bill I sign today will help us to continue to investigate and prosecute traffickers and provide new grants to state and local law enforcement. Yet, we cannot put the criminals out of business until we also confront the problem of demand. Those who pay for the chance to sexually abuse children and teenage girls must be held to account. So we'll investigate and prosecute the customers, the unscrupulous adults who prey on the young and the innocent.

-President George Bush, January 10, 2006.

In addition, the TVPRA of 2005 establishes a grant program to develop, expand, and strengthen assistance programs for United States citizens and permanent residents who have been subjected to trafficking and establishes a pilot program to create residential treatment facilities for children subjected to trafficking. It also creates a new grant program for state and local law enforcement authorities to investigate and prosecute trafficking of U.S. citizens and permanent residents, including efforts to reduce demand for commercial sex acts. Furthermore, the TVPRA of 2005 contains new requirements for data collection that will promote effective responses to trafficking. These include study by the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, an inter-agency program discussed in more detail below, of the relationship between trafficking and terrorism, the abduction and enslavement of children as soldiers, and development of a mechanism for quantifying the number of victims of trafficking.

In United States v. Cadena, a 14-year old girl, trafficked into prostitution, was only allowed two possessions: a roll of paper towels and a teddy bear.

V. Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Successful Investigations and Prosecutions

Since 2001, the Department has achieved a record number of human trafficking investigations and prosecutions through a unique victim-centered approach that focuses on three important themes: sex trafficking, labor trafficking, and child sex trafficking. Successful prosecutions of sex and labor trafficking depend on the elements of force, fraud, or coercion that render the victim's role involuntary. Because trafficking is modern day slavery, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft designated the Civil Rights Division, in early 2001, as the principal architect of the Department's comprehensive response to human trafficking. The Civil Rights Division presently collaborates with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Attorneys' Offices, the Criminal Division, and the Office of Justice Programs, as well as the Department of Homeland Security's Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement,[37] to uncover and investigate these criminal enterprises, to prosecute and hold traffickers accountable for their criminal conduct, and, most importantly, to rescue victims and return to them their dignity.

In 2004, the Federal Bureau of Investigation took an important step towards the vigorous investigation of trafficking crimes when it launched the Involuntary Servitude and Slavery/Trafficking in Persons Initiative. This Initiative has achieved important results in the manner in which the Bureau uncovers and investigates these cases in coordination with the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions. The Bureau's Civil Rights Unit, the primary Bureau agency charged with investigating federal civil rights statutes, spearheaded the following initiatives:

- Developed and disseminated a general human trafficking investigative protocol to all FBI field offices;
- Implemented commercial sex trafficking intelligence collection requirements and disseminated those requirements to every Bureau Field Intelligence Group;
- Established a mechanism for the Bureau to properly classify cases as human trafficking, alien smuggling, or child prostitution;
- Expanded the Bureau's outreach to national human trafficking victim advocacy organizations, such as The Freedom Network and the International Justice Mission to establish contacts and leverage partnerships.

- Commenced, in October 2005, human trafficking threat assessments in each of the nation's 56 Bureau Field Offices. The threat assessments are intended to help the Bureau determine the nature and scope of human trafficking and to develop a more informed response to this criminal activity. Field Offices will be guided by this analysis in determining whether to establish or enhance their participation in local anti-human trafficking task forces, including establishing relationships with local non-governmental organizations and more aggressive involvement in investigations by federal, state and local law enforcement;[38] and
- Created, in November 2005, a case tracking database to track and maintain important human trafficking related data from the Bureau's Field Offices regarding the Department's prosecutorial decisions, identifying emerging trends and reporting significant events in the field to the Bureau's Civil Rights Unit or the Crimes Against Children Unit, as appropriate.

A. Sex Trafficking

Human trafficking typically manifests itself in compelled service either for forced labor or in the "sex industry." Sadly, in both areas, sexual abuse of female victims is common.
Sex trafficking is both a crime and phenomenon. The TVPA's "sex trafficking" statute[39] makes it illegal to use force or coercion to obtain persons for commercial sexual activity, with special

United States
Attorneys' Offices charged 189 defendants with sex trafficking, a 450% increase over the 34 defendants charged between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. In addition to the new records set in investigations and prosecutions of sex trafficking, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices have achieved impressive results in convicting traffickers. From fiscal years 2001 to 2005, federal prosecutors obtained the convictions of 109 sex trafficking defendants, a 445% increase over the 20 defendants convicted during the previous five fiscal year period.

Sex trafficking may occur in any American community – urban, suburban or rural – and involves both aliens and United States citizens. Sex trafficking can occur in bars, farm worker camps, and sex entertainment and prostitution enterprises. The traffickers are endlessly inventive. While the public stereotype of these cases involve large scale international organized crime syndicates, forced prostitution cases often involve groups of family members or even individual pimps. In United States v. Jimenez-Calderon, a group of family members recruited women and girls from the Mexican state of Tlaxclala to come to the United States with promises of love, only to hold them in prostitution through force and by threatening them and their families in Mexico.[40] The defendants in Jimenez-Calderon received sentences ranging from 1 1/3 to 17 years of incarceration following her guilty plea.[41]

Cases involving United States citizen victims that might not have been brought under the Mann Act are now being brought using the TVPA sex trafficking statute, which does not require interstate travel. In United States v. Gates and Heyward, two defendants pled guilty in 2004 to sex trafficking for running an internet prostitution business from their home, at times using girls as young as 14 to perform sexual acts. Defendant Gates, who beat the women who disobeyed him and provided drugs to support some of the women's addictions, was sentenced to more than 14 ½ years in prison. His co-defendant girlfriend, Heyward, received a sentence of 9 years of incarceration.[42]

Many cases in the past few years involving individuals from countries of the former Soviet republics have involved compelled service in "exotic dancing." In United States v. Gasanov, a husband and wife were convicted at trial and sentenced to serve five years in prison and to pay $516,150 in restitution for bringing Uzbeki women to El Paso, Texas, under the guise of a student researcher exchange program, only to hold them in compelled service in strip clubs by confiscating their immigration documents, and making threats against their families.[43] In United States v. Maksimenko, five defendants have pled guilty as of December 19, 2005, for their roles in a scheme to enslave Ukrainian women in Detroit-area strip clubs through threats and extortion.[44]

Sometimes victims are held in sexual slavery without any commercial aspect. In United States v. Soto, eight men were convicted in 2003 for their roles in an alien smuggling organization that would hold vulnerable alien women as "concubines," forcing them to cook, clean, and submit to the sexual demands of the alien smugglers through force, threats, and punitive rape. The lead defendant in the Soto case was sentenced to 23 years of incarceration following his guilty plea.[45]

Women in United States v. Molina, a "bargirl" case, were forced to entertain male patrons of the defendant's bars.

communities, women are imported to work as "bargirls." While this is not technically sex trafficking under the TVPA, as it does not involve a sex act, the women are treated as sex objects and forced to entertain male bar patrons, dancing and drinking with them at their pleasure. In United States v. Kang, for example, a Korean couple lured Korean women to New York City with promises of good jobs as hostesses in their nightclub, but subjected them to physical abuse, held them for repayment of a $10,000 debt, and attempted to force them into prostitution.[46] Seven defendants pled guilty to forced labor and obstruction of justice charges. The defendants include a Federal Air Marshal and a Department of Homeland Security agent, who attempted to force one of the victims to get on a flight to South Korea to keep her from testifying against the Kangs.[47] In another "bargirl" case, United States v. Molina, six Hondurans in Ft. Worth, Texas received sentences of up to 5 years and 3 months of incarceration following their guilty pleas to harboring the women and making them repay their alien smuggling debts by entertaining the male patrons of the defendants' bars.[48]

B. Labor Trafficking

Labor trafficking occurs when a victim is forced to work in an area of the economy that would otherwise be a legal form of labor, absent the force, fraud or coercion. This phenomenon commonly is found in farms, factories, and households. Similar to sex trafficking, if a person is subjected to coercive force such that he cannot leave his employer's service, he is considered a victim regardless of whether he initially chose to perform that type of work, or even if he received some pay for his labor. There is no requirement that the victim be transported by the defendant.

Over the past five years, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices have prosecuted a record number of labor trafficking cases. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed 23 labor trafficking cases, an increase of 110% over the 11 labor trafficking cases the federal prosecutors filed between fiscal years 1996 and 2000.[49] In these cases, 61 defendants were charged with labor trafficking, an increase of 33% over the 46 defendants the charged during the previous five fiscal year period.

48 United States v. Molina, Cr. No. 114-A (N.D. Tex. 2002).

49 Two seminal trafficking cases are responsible for the large number of defendants charged in 1997-98. United States v. Paoletti, the "Deaf Mexican" trinket peddling case, involved 18 defendants, and the Florida forced prostitution case United States v. Cadena involved 16 defendants. Prosecution and victim protection in these two cases are ongoing. In 2005, cooperation with the Mexican authorities resulted in the arrest of Juan Luis Cadena in Mexico. Also in 2005, as a result of the work of the Office of International Affairs, Renato and Jose Paoletti were the first Mexican citizens ever extradited to the United States for human trafficking offenses.

DOJ_NMG_0009016

As in sex trafficking cases, vulnerable United States citizens may find themselves trapped in a forced labor situation, unable to escape because of threats or coercion. For example, in United States v. Michael Lee, the defendants recruited homeless African-American men for their orange-picking operation. Once employed, the workers were involuntarily retained by beatings, threats, and a "company store" debt run up by short-term loans for rent, food, cigarettes, and cocaine. Three defendants were convicted in 2001 and received prison terms of up to 4 ½ years of incarceration.[50]

Forced labor situations often appear in parts of the agricultural sector that require "stoop labor." One such case, United States v. Garcia,[51] involved the first successful defense of the TVPA against a constitutional challenge. In that case, four defendants received sentences of up to nearly 4 years of incarceration in 2005 for recruiting young undocumented Mexican aliens from the Arizona border and transporting them to New York with false promises of good wages, only to force them to work in the fields for little or no pay and house them in overcrowded and filthy conditions through threats to turn them over to the Border Patrol.[52] In their constitutional challenge, the defendants argued that the TVPA was unconstitutionally vague, inviting arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement, and that Congress exceeded its authority in enacting it because it did not involve interstate commerce. A federal district court disagreed and found that the TVPA's terms were clear and provide adequate notice of the conduct it prohibits.[53] It also found that Congress had the duration of the harvesting season and for assaulting the owner of a transportation service to cut off any avenue of escape the workers might have had from the area. The Ramos brothers were sentenced to 15 years of incarceration and ordered to forfeit $3 million in proceeds from their slavery operation.

Domestic servant cases continue to be a regular part of the Department's forced labor portfolio. Sadly, in many of these cases the young female victims are subjected not only to long hours and low pay for their work as nannies and maids, but suffer sexual abuse at the hands of their captors as well.

For instance, in United States v. Mubang,[56] a Cameroonian woman was convicted of bringing an eleven year-

d girl to the United States illegally and under false pretenses. Once the girl was in America, she was forced to care for the defendant's two children and perform all the household chores without pay. The defendant forced the victim to comply by beating her with a broken metal broom stick and a cable cord, forbidding her from speaking of her employment conditions to anyone, forbidding her from leaving the house or opening the door to anyone, and interfering with her mail. Mubang fled the country soon after her conviction but was extradited to the United States in 2005 through the assistance of the Cameroonian government. She is currently serving a sentence of 17 ½ years of incarceration.

Similarly, in 2004, in United States v. Trisanti, a Los Angeles woman was convicted of involuntary servitude for trafficking two victims into the United States from Indonesia and forcing them to work as domestic servants through threats and physical violence. Trisanti was sentenced to more than 3 ½ years in prison and ordered to pay $203,000 in restitution.[57]

C. Child Sex Trafficking

Within the Department, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has taken the leading role in overseeing the prosecution of cases of sex trafficking of minors. Sex trafficking in children occurs when persons under the age of 18 are provided or obtained for a commercial sex act. Prior to the passage of the TVPA, this aspect of human trafficking was traditionally dealt with by law enforcement under the label "Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children" (CSEC), and all states have statutes criminalizing child prostitution. It is a continuing challenge to incorporate long-established child protective services, family court, and anti-CSEC activities and programs into the anti-trafficking effort.

"Our society has no place for those who prey on children and no tolerance for child prostitution or sex trafficking."

–Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, December 16, 2005.

Child sex trafficking may also involve child sex tourism, which occurs when individuals travel to foreign countries to engage in sexual acts with children, who are often the victims of trafficking. As with child prostitution, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has taken the leading role in overseeing the development of anti-sex tourism policies and resulting prosecutions. United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide, with guidance or co-counsel assistance from the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, have obtained at least 50 sex tourism indictments or complaints and a minimum of 29 convictions between 2003 and 2005 under the PROTECT Act, with approximately 60 investigations currently pending.

Like other forms of trafficking, child sex trafficking can occur in any community. The TVPA

Usually, when people commit crimes, the best the criminal justice system can do is punish the offender and occasionally have him repay the out-of-pocket expenses of the victims. This plea not only does that, but attempts to give the victims future opportunities for treatment, counseling, and even an education.

Like other forms of trafficking, child sex trafficking can occur in any community. The TVPA supplemented the Mann Act, which prohibits the interstate transportation of persons for prostitution or other illegal sexual activity, by extending federal jurisdiction to situations in which the pimps did not cross a state line with their minor victims. In recent years, the Department has prosecuted cases of child sex trafficking across the nation. In United States v. Sims, for example, Maurice Sims was prosecuted in the Northern District of Georgia and sentenced to life in prison, in 2004, for kidnaping, trafficking, and transportation across state lines for criminal sexual purposes, among other crimes.[58] Sims transported a 16 year old girl from El Dorado, Arkansas to Atlanta, Georgia for purposes of prostitution. Along the way he beat and raped his victim.

Additionally, the Department is strategically and aggressively using forfeiture laws to increase a defendant's punishment, create greater disincentives, and, ultimately, to fully disable and dismantle criminal networks engaged in human trafficking. The Department has been particularly innovative in its use of forfeiture in cases involving child prostitution. In several of those cases, Department prosecutors negotiated plea agreements requiring the child pimps to set up monetary funds to provide for the rehabilitation, education and job training of their young victims. In United States v Boehm,[59] for example, four persons pled guilty to sex trafficking of children, among other charges. In 2001, Boehm, along with his co-defendants, agreed to distribute cocaine and cocaine base to persons under the age of 21 and to recruit minors for sexual purposes in exchange for money and crack cocaine. All five defendants were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from 3 years to more than 13 years and Boehm, as part of his plea agreement, also forfeited his residence and provided $1.2 million in trust for the future benefit of his victims.[60] The trust fund will compensate Boehm's victims for expenses for drug treatment, counseling, educational, and professional training expenses.

Going forward, the Department will continue to place a keen emphasis on the use of forfeiture incidence of prostituted children. The Section then asked each of these offices to establish a task force to address the problem through a variety of federal criminal statutes including the Mann Act, TVPA, and RICO,[61] where appropriate, to neutralize the entire criminal enterprise. The Section asked the remaining 42 Bureau Field Offices to assess whether the localities they serve have a substantial child prostitution problem.

As of September 30, 2005, Innocence Lost Initiative Task Forces have been instituted in Atlantic City, Boston, Chicago, Detroit, Harrisburg, Indianapolis, Los Angeles, Miami, Toledo, Portland, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C. In connection with this initiative, federal law enforcement agencies, prosecutors, and social service providers were brought to NCMEC's Washington, D.C.-area offices, where groups from the same jurisdiction were trained together in order to cultivate cooperation, partnership, and an effective integration among the critical enforcement entities in each city. To date, more than 350 key personnel have been trained. As a result of the Department's substantial investigatory efforts through this Initiative, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has seen a marked increase in the number of requests from both Assistant United States Attorneys and Bureau agents in the field for advice, guidance, and co-counsel on child prostitution cases.

More importantly, on December 16, 2005, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced, more than 30 child victims were recently identified in connection with the latest phase of Innocence Lost, bringing the total of child victims identified to more than 200 since the Innocence Lost Initiative began. This latest effort resulted in the arrest of 19 individuals. Between 2004 and 2005, the Innocence Lost Initiative has resulted in 139 open investigations, 505 arrests, 60 complaints, 70 indictments, and 67 convictions.

Again, many cases of child sex tourism involve child sex trafficking and the Department is committed to aggressively prosecuting these cases. For example, in 2003, in the first prosecution under the PROTECT Act, Michael Clark, who had been arrested in Cambodia for sexually abusing two Cambodian boys (ages 10 and 13), was charged with attempting to engage in illicit sexual conduct after travel in foreign commerce. Clark pled guilty to the charges and was sentenced to 8 years of imprisonment. In connection with his plea, Clark reserved the right to appeal the constitutionality of the PROTECT Act, arguing that Congress exceeded its power to enact criminal laws that do not involve interstate commerce and that criminalizing activities in a foreign country violate his right to due process and international law. Clark's appeal is currently pending before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.[62]

Also in 2003, in United States v. Russell,[63] an American man was prosecuted when an investigation revealed that he had traveled to the Philippines on numerous occasions over a two-year period in order to engage in sexual acts with children and to produce child pornography for the purpose of importation into the United States. At least three Philippine children have been identified as victims of Russell, who pled guilty and was sentenced to more than 3 years of imprisonment.

D. Inter-Agency Coordination

Implementation of the President's directive to combat human trafficking requires meaningful inter-agency coordination. Much of the coordination has been accomplished through the President's Inter-Agency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, and subsequently the Senior Policy Operating Group, discussed above. In connection with these efforts, the Department has engaged with other federal agencies to create additional vehicles of inter-agency coordination.

The most significant achievement in this regard is the Department's support of the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center that is led by a steering committee comprised of representatives from the Department of Justice, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Departments of Homeland Security and State, among others. The Center provides a mechanism to bring together federal agency representatives from policy, law enforcement, intelligence, and diplomatic areas to work together on a full-time basis to achieve increased effectiveness among federal law enforcement and to convert intelligence about human trafficking, alien smuggling, and clandestine terrorist travel into effective law enforcement activities. Analysts accomplish this function by identifying issues related to migrant smuggling or trafficking in persons and then forward their findings to the relevant federal agencies or interagency organizations for consideration and appropriate action. The Center has been under development since mid-2004 and, shortly thereafter, started initial operations.

In addition, the Department in July 2004 entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Health and Human Services streamlining protocols for the Health and Human Services ("HHS") certification of victims (or in the case of minors, eligibility letters) rescued in connection with Department of Justice or Homeland Security law enforcement efforts. A determination by HHS, in consultation with the Department, that victims have suffered a "severe form of trafficking" and are cooperating with law enforcement enables these individuals to qualify for federally-funded or administered benefits and services to the same extent as refugees.[64] The agreement also marked an important step towards the coordination of treatment of potential trafficking victims by agents of the Departments of Homeland Security and Justice through better information sharing. It is important to note that over 30% of the investigations initiated by the Department since 2001 were begun by agents of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The Department's anti-trafficking investigative and prosecution strategy requires effective intra-departmental collaboration to bring the specialties of each component to bear on these multi-faceted, complex, and labor-intensive criminal cases. The following components are important contributors to the Department's activities in support of the President's directive to combat human trafficking:

- The Civil Rights Division's Criminal Section
- The Criminal Division, particularly its Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section, Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, Domestic Security Section, International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program, Office of International Affairs, Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, and Organized Crime and Racketeering Section
- The Executive Office of United States Attorneys and United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide
- The Federal Bureau of Investigation, and its Field Offices
- The Office of Community Oriented Policing Services
- The Office of Justice Programs, particularly its Bureau of Justice Assistance, Bureau of Justice Statistics, National Institute of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, and Office for Victims of Crime
- The Office of Legal Policy
- The Office of Legislative Affairs
- The Office on Violence Against Women

Representatives from the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation meet periodically to share information and to identify ways to leverage resources to identify and combat trafficking in persons, among other criminal activity. In addition, the Office of Legal Policy convenes regular meetings of Department of Justice components to coordinate the development of policies regarding the Department's anti-human trafficking activities. The Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division, in early 2003, authored a comprehensive legal monograph on trafficking issues to assist United States Attorney personnel in the field to prosecute trafficking cases more effectively. The monograph has been distributed at the Department's training center, the National Advocacy Center, and at human trafficking training workshops.

Both the Civil Rights Division and the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section publish newsletters that provide valuable information regarding human trafficking prosecutions, case analysis, and developments that are important to the work of other Departmental components and the non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of trafficking victims. The Civil Rights Division provides investigators, prosecutors, and victim assistance professionals with technical assistance regarding human trafficking and keeps the field of trafficking victim advocates informed about the Division's efforts to prevent and prosecute this crime. And, since 2003, the quarterly Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section newsletter has discussed issues of sex tourism and trafficking in all but two editions.

From the time that the TVPA was enacted, the Department recognized that alien smuggling, document fraud, and various forms of human trafficking, while constituting separate offenses, can be integrally related, as discussed above.[65] The trafficking of victims across international borders virtually always involves alien smuggling, also possibly including some type of fraud or misrepresentation. Perhaps the most direct manifestation of cooperation between the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions is that in 2002 the Civil Rights Division detailed several experienced attorneys to the Criminal Division's Alien Smuggling Task Force for a three-year period. Over the past three years, those Civil Rights prosecutors worked with their Criminal Division colleagues to target the criminal infrastructure that makes international trafficking possible. Examples include successful prosecutions involving the fraudulent adoption of Cambodian babies, the sexual exploitation of Estonian women employed in massage parlors, and large-scale fraudulent leasing of foreign workers to major United States companies. The three-year details, which recently ended, demonstrate the concrete, effective results that can be obtained through innovative approaches to anti-trafficking cooperation.

The Department has taken a number of steps to ensure that its components are well trained in the Department's strategy of victim-centered, proactive investigations. Here are some examples:

- In October 2001, the Civil Rights Division conducted training on the unique victim protections and services of the TVPA for almost 100 federal victim witness coordinators at the National Advocacy Center in Columbia, South Carolina.

- In October 2002, the Civil Rights Division organized comprehensive anti-trafficking training for federal prosecutors and agents at the Department's training facility, the National Advocacy Center, in Columbia, South Carolina. Approximately 150 federal prosecutors and agents attended the training.

- In November 2002 the Attorney General issued "blue sheets" for prosecutors, outlining the new TVPA crimes and adding guidance regarding the prosecution of such crimes to the U.S. Attorneys' Manual. The "blue sheets" highlight human trafficking as a priority and provide a comprehensive source of information and resources within the Department and with related agencies.

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division provided periodic training at the Federal Bureau of Investigation training center in Quantico, Virginia for Bureau and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents.

- In January 2004, the Civil Rights Division and the Executive Office of United States Attorneys' Office of Legal Education hosted a comprehensive training session for federal agents and prosecutors at the Department's National Advocacy Center. Furthermore, the Civil Rights Division actively participates in human trafficking training sessions at United States Attorneys' Offices as part of the regular curriculum offered to Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Homeland Security Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and Department of State Diplomatic Security Service agents.

- Since 2003, the Criminal Division's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has annually trained Assistant United States Attorneys and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents at the National Advocacy Center regarding the investigation of cases involving the commercial exploitation of minors for sex (i.e., domestic sex trafficking), child prostitution, trafficking and sex tourism.

VI. The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers

A. Multi-Disciplinary Task Force Initiative

The Department has designed, developed, and instituted locally based, multi-disciplinary task forces to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases. These task forces embody the Department's victim-centered approach because they are specifically engineered to aid in uncovering victims, providing them with immediate protection and support, and then working with them to further investigate and prosecute the trafficker. More importantly, task forces are a supreme force multiplier as the nation's numerous state and local police, occupational safety and health inspectors, and other enforcement officials are added to the limited number of federal law enforcement that are now in the field.

In July 2004, the Department hosted the first ever National Training Conference on Human Trafficking: Rescuing Women and Children From Slavery, in Tampa, Florida. The National Conference was designed to introduce the model of victim-centered investigations and the concept of human trafficking prosecutions through the creation of local task forces. Hosted by the Department and with a keynote speech by President Bush, the conference brought together more than 500 attendees, consisting of 21 teams of about 20 state, local, and federal officials who were willing to thereafter work together to combat human trafficking in their respective communities across America. Teams included the following members: United States Attorneys or designated Assistant United States Attorneys; Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement Special Agents-In-Charge; Federal Bureau of Investigation Special Agents-In-Charge; local law enforcement agency special crimes and victim units; state and local prosecutors; and governmental and non-governmental organizations, especially faith and community-based victim service providers. The Department, with the assistance of the Civil Rights Division, invited participants from some of the most intense trafficking jurisdictions in the country at that time, such as: Atlanta, Charlotte, Chicago, El Paso, Houston, Las Vegas, Long Island, Los Angeles, Miami, Newark, New Orleans, New York City, Washington, D.C., Philadelphia, Phoenix, Richmond, San Diego, San Francisco, St. Louis, Seattle, and Tampa.

President Bush, along with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, announced this important new initiative on July 16, 2004 at the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking, where the President condemned human trafficking as an affront to America's fundamental values and committed his Administration to combating trafficking on every level at home and abroad. Regarding domestic efforts to combat trafficking, the President remarked, "We're supporting organizations that rescue the victims, passing stronger anti-trafficking laws, and warning travelers that they will be held to account for supporting this modern form of slavery. Women and children should never be exploited for pleasure or greed, anywhere on Earth."

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft set forth the Department's comprehensive anti-trafficking strategy: protecting the victims, prosecuting the perpetrators, and partnership-building that addresses, attacks, and prevents human trafficking. The Attorney General also noted that the Bush Administration had, up to that time, provided more than $35 million in funding to community-based service providers that aid trafficking victims, and he announced a further $14 million in support of the Department's task force initiative. Concurrently with the National Conference, the Department issued a funding solicitation, entitled Law Enforcement and Service Provider Multi-disciplinary Anti-Trafficking Task Forces. The solicitation urged applicants to leverage existing federally-funded victim services efforts and to mirror the victim-focused federal, state, and non-governmental partnership that was the theme of the Conference. In the fall of 2004, the Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime issued a joint solicitation for concept papers to continue the coordinated law enforcement task forces and victim services initiatives. Federal funds made available through this solicitation were intended to support task forces or supplemental funding of current trafficking victim service providers in areas with pre-existing Bureau of Justice Assistance-funded task forces.

Task forces add to the Department's law enforcement resources the intelligence and expertise of

"The conference program provided a model of collaboration among service providers and law enforcement and underscored the necessity of teamwork in working to keep victims of trafficking front and center in both the prosecution and service delivery areas-it was a great kick off for the task force initiative."

-Florrie Burke, Senior Director of International Programs, Anti-Trafficking Program, SOLACE Program for Survivors of Torture, Safe Horizon

locally-based immigration agents, local community- and faith-based social service providers, and local law enforcement, particularly special crimes and vice squads. These task forces recognize that local authorities, often more than federal officials, may be in the best position to find trafficking victims because of their familiarity with their jurisdictions, but might need the training and support of the federal government to recognize this crime for what it is. The Department has too often seen in federal investigations police reports indicating that local officers responded to complaints but failed to stop the ongoing exploitation of trafficking victims simply because they were not trained to recognize trafficking situations. The task force approach leverages local knowledge and staff resources with strong federal statutes. Indeed, victims rescued in United States v. Reddy,[66] United States v. Molina,[67] and United States v. Ramos[68] were brought to the Department's attention through the activities of state and local law enforcement. Moreover, they serve as a way to incorporate the non-governmental crime victim services organizations, funded by federal grant awards, into the law enforcement activities in their area. Local community- and faith-based organizations are essential to reaching those victims in communities that are isolated by geography, culture, or language.

The task force convened by the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Texas presents an illustration. In 2004, the United States Attorney for the Northern District of Texas established a working group consisting of representatives from the police departments of the Dallas-Fort Worth area, including Arlington, Coppell, Garland, Grand Prairie, Irving, and Richardson, and representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Internal Revenue Service, and Department of Labor. The group's faith and community-based partners include several charitable organizations such as Catholic Charities and Mosaic Family Services, Inc., which received grants from the Office for Victims of Crime to provide victim services and to assist with the formation and implementation of this program.

Insert graphic of the United States depicting the location of the 32 jurisdictions with task forces.

Just prior to the conference, the Department had begun work on eight task forces. Immediately following the National Conference, the Department embarked on a 20-city training initiative designed to reinforce the training received at the National Conference and to institute nearly two dozen task forces. Within a year of the National Conference, 18 task forces were operating with Departmental support. There are now 32 task forces operating throughout the United States.

Each of the 32 task forces, funded in part through $13 million in grants from the Department's Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime since fiscal year 2004, is coordinated through the local United States Attorney's Office and includes representatives of local FBI field offices and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, as well as state and local law enforcement and social services agencies. In order to receive Department of Justice funding support and the assistance of the local United States Attorney, local law enforcement agencies and victim service providers are required to enter into a Memorandum of Understanding with all task force members committing themselves to collaborating together on investigations and assistance to victims. Applicants were invited to design task forces that best suited the needs of their local communities, and many task forces involve faith-based and other community organizations in their work. At their core, task forces include the local United States Attorney's Office; Federal Bureau of Investigation Field Offices; Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents; state and local law enforcement agencies; and social services agencies, including community-based victim services providers. As of June 2005, with reporting based only on the first six months of operation by the 18 task forces that existed at that time, 61 victims of severe trafficking had been identified and many more victims were rescued from environments where trafficking was occurring.

Alliance forms to fight modern slavery in Texas

'Ancient' crime exists in Houston, a U.S. official says

By HARVEY RICE
HOUSTON CHRONICLE

Ruth came to Houston from East Africa a year ago under a contract that promised $5.15 per hour for working a nine-hour day, six days per week taking care of her employer's household.

Instead, she said she found herself a prisoner working for no pay and enduring emotional and physical abuse.

"I was a slave," she said Friday.

Because local and federal police agencies often fail to recognize such victims of this modern slave trade, the U.S. attorney's office announced the formation Friday of the Human Trafficking Rescue Alliance, the fifth such group in the country and the first in Texas.

"This terrible crime, so ancient in its origins, exists right here in Houston, Texas," U.S. Attorney Michael Shelby said as he was joined by representatives of all major local and federal law enforcement agencies in Harris County and several nongovernmental social services organizations.

Shelby said the social services groups will be crucial to finding human-trafficking victims who may be too frightened to turn to police.

Ruth, whose true identity is being withheld because she fears retaliation from her former employer, is one of an estimated 16,000 immigrants who are kidnapped or tricked into coming into the United States and then coerced into prostitution or forced labor, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

She said she despaired until an acquaintance connected her with a program run by YMCA International Services.

Opening eyes of the law

The Texas Office of Immigration and Refugee Affairs says human trafficking is a multinational organized criminal industry generating billions of dollars per year. Most of the victims are women and children.

Shelby said traffickers include the Russian mafia and Asian triads as well as smugglers on the U.S.-Mexican border.

The newly formed alliance will train officers to spot atrafficking victim whom they otherwise might have arrested as a prostitute. The group also will coordinate investigation and prosecution of traffickers, improve the treatment and care of victims for use as witnesses in prosecutions and conduct regional conferences.

The alliance plans to duplicate itself in Brownsville, Corpus Christi, McAllen and Laredo.

"This task force and others like it are an important step toward ending the scourge of human trafficking and slavery," said U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, who recently authored a resolution calling for increased cooperation among Congress, federal and local law enforcement to end human trafficking.

Officials say they don't know how serious the problem is in Harris County because they have only recently been made aware of it.

District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal said he is unaware of any such cases in the county because law enforcement agencies have not been trained to identify the problem.

"We didn't know what we were looking at," Rosenthal said.

He said the creation of the task force will open local law enforcement's eyes to the crime, like changing your glasses prescription."

R. Alexander Acosta, assistant U.S. attorney general for civil rights, said, "We don't know what the trends are because the data has not been collected."

Acosta said he is reminded of

The teddy bear belonged to a 14-year-old girl who was forced to have sex with as many as 30 men a day on the bed, he said.

"We simply must do a better job of identifying the victims and bringing human traffickers to justice," Cornyn said.

Efforts get results

Jeff Watkins, executive director of YMCA International Services, said his agency has treated only five victims since it received a $560,000, three-year grant from the Justice Department last year.

The money, which comes from fines and penalties paid by convicted criminals, is used in part to train police in spotting victims of human trafficking.

Watkins said the YMCA trained 1,500 Houston police officers in the past year and will help train other officers in the federal Southern District, which stretches from Huntsville to Brownsville and Laredo.

Last year, the Justice Department formed similar rescue alliances in Atlanta, Philadelphia, Phoenix and Tampa, Fla.

Shelby said the Houston alliance is the first of about a dozen the Justice Department plans to form this year.

An emphasis on the prosecution of human trafficking by the Justice Department led to a tripling of charges filed in the past three years, compared with the previous three years, although the 150 total remains small.

A 2000 federal law and a 2003 Texas law were aimed at human trafficking.

The Houston alliance will be coordinated by Assistant U.S. Attorneys Edward Gallagher and Ruben Perez.

The Houston (Harris County, Texas) trafficking task force provides a meaningful illustration of the work and potential of the Department's multi-disciplinary task forces. In 2004, concerned that trafficking might fall into the cracks between civil rights and organized crime enforcement programs, the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas formed the Human Trafficking Rescue Alliance with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Harris County Sheriff's Department, and a number of non-governmental organizations who had recently come together on the issue. The Rescue Alliance began with listening sessions of the stakeholders and moved to joint training for law enforcement and other community groups. Rescue Alliance members attended the Department's National Training Conference on Human Trafficking in Florida in July 2004, and pledged themselves to work together to combat trafficking. When the Bureau of Justice Assistance called for grant proposals, the working group was ready with a task force proposal that built upon and solidified their relationships. As the profile of this issue has grown, so has the demand for training on the part of state and local law enforcement, and the most recent training opportunity

Rescue Alliance have solidified the relationship of the law enforcement participants with the Office for Victims of Crime and Health and Human Services victim-services grantees such as the YMCA of Houston and Catholic Charities.

Houston Chronicle, August 14, 2004

One novel aspect of the Rescue Alliance has been to place Harris County Sheriff's Deputies with vice-squad experience in Federal Bureau of Investigation and Immigration and Customs Enforcement Field Offices on the squads tasked with trafficking investigations. Especially in the Federal Bureau of Investigation office, having a full-time investigator with extensive knowledge of the local landscape was invaluable, and his activities served as a catalyst for the other agents on the task force to work pro-actively to identify and dismantle trafficking rings. The inclusion of agents from the Texas Alcohol and Beverage Commission has proven instrumental in the success of the Rescue Alliance.

As a result of operations by the Rescue Alliance, two large-scale trafficking operations resulted in federal human trafficking indictments in the Houston area in the fall of 2005 -- one involving allegations of Mexican women and girls forced into prostitution and another involving allegations that dozens of Central American women and girls were held in peonage in a "bargirl" operation. These prosecutions, which are pending at the time of this report,[69] could not have happened without the interagency approach and close cooperation with non-governmental service providers and advocacy groups that was fostered and intensified through the Bureau of Justice Assistance grant. The Rescue Alliance is an example of an energized and successful task force effort that successfully blends state, local, and federal personnel, across traditional organized crime and civil rights approaches, to work with the non-governmental community to act in the best interests of the victim while seeking justice.

The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with other federal partners, provides ongoing training and technical assistance to task forces. In 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Civil Rights Division, the Office for Victims of Crime, and other experts, developed a specific training curriculum for law enforcement officers nationwide who may come into contact with trafficking victims, entitled Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness. The curriculum is a flexible, one-day training course educating law enforcement officers about the basics of the phenomenon of human trafficking and a victim-centered approach to proactive investigation of potential cases. The curriculum provides an introduction to human trafficking, its victims, and offenders; a legal overview with a focus on the TVPA; investigative considerations and techniques; an overview of the role of victim service providers; the need for victim services and the types of services available; and immigration matters, including the role of immigration officials and remedies available to victims. The training program also reviews lessons on understanding the need for a formal multi-disciplinary approach towards human trafficking and an understanding of the important role of the community in law enforcement efforts. The training curriculum is unique in that it incorporates multimedia learning and each participant is provided with multimedia resources to be used in training other officers and building greater community awareness and support. The course is taught by seasoned investigators who have handled trafficking cases as well as by national experts on trafficking issues.

In February 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance convened a conference of the 22 nascent task forces that had been instituted by that time. More than 115 individuals attended. Federal participants in the conference included representatives from within the Department as well the Departments of Homeland Security and Health and Human Services. The focus of the conference was to explain the degree of collaboration needed among federal, state, and local law enforcement, prosecution, and victim services agencies in order to effectively rescue victims and prosecute traffickers. Task force members were trained using the Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness curriculum, described above. Future cross-training of task force members will enable the Department to build on that effort by sharing best practices and linking the groups' efforts across geographical lines.

The Human Trafficking Task Forces are just the approach we need to combat human trafficking. With all of us working as a team we will be more effective in this endeavor than we would be if we tried to combat human trafficking individually.

--Lt. Bill Rule, Collier County Sheriff's Office, Victim Services Bureau

B. Restoring Victims' Dignity

As discussed above,[70] the Department places a premium on enabling trafficking victims to achieve stable and secure lives. Federal investigators and prosecutors will therefore immediately refer a victim to victim service professionals for immediate care. Again, victims that are safe and healthy are better able to articulate to investigators and a court what has happened to her. Without the victim's assistance, traffickers may not ever be held accountable for their crimes.

In many cases, the referral process and the provision of services is expedited through relationships already established by task force partners. Some task forces have created innovative ways to connect victims identified through law enforcement activity with services. The United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, developed a compendium of victim service providers for use by task force members in Fort Myers, Jacksonville, and Tampa. The task force in Indianapolis, Indiana, coordinated through the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Indiana, has partnered with the Indianapolis Family Justice Center to deliver services to victims of human trafficking that are funded by the Office for Victims of Crime. The Family Justice Center, created in connection with President Bush's Family Justice Initiative, a program that is administered by the Office on Violence Against Women, co-locates services to families involved in domestic violence. Making this Center the coordinator of services to victims of human trafficking makes the response to victims more efficient and effective.

Once potential cases of trafficking are uncovered, victims may become eligible for important services that help to keep them safe as they recover from their victimization. Trafficking victims, like all crime victims, may be eligible for services and benefits under the Victims of Crime Act, a program administered by the Office for Victims of Crime.[71] The TVPA, as amended, created new protections for alien victims.[72] Under the TVPA, victims are afforded:

- Immigration relief, in the form of an administrative change in immigration status known as "continued presence" as well as a temporary, non-immigrant visa known as the "T visa;"
- Access to refugee benefits;
- Adequate shelter, care, and protection;
- Legal assistance;
- Information & translation services; and
- Mandatory restitution.[73]

The TVPA authorizes similar victim services programs to be administered by the Department of Health and Human Services, thus requiring a significant amount of coordination between the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services. In 2004, the Office for Victims of Crime initiated regular coordination meetings with the Office of Refugee Resettlement, its counterpart agency at HHS, known

[71] The Crime Victims Fund, 42 U.S.C. § 10601, established by the Victims of Crime Act of 1984 (VOCA), is a major source of funding for victim services throughout the nation. The Office for Victims of Crime administers the Fund and distributes funding to the states on a formula basis to support crime victim assistance and crime victim compensation programs. Victim assistance includes lifeline victim services such as crisis intervention, emergency shelter and transportation, counseling, and criminal justice system advocacy. Crime victim compensation is a direct reimbursement to or on behalf of a crime victim for expenses such as medical costs. Trafficking victims may be eligible for support under the Crime Victims Fund, the TVPA, or both of these programs, depending on the circumstances of their cases and, in the case of the Crime Victims Fund, the specific guidelines of the state agency that administers the program.

The TVPA authorizes similar victim services programs to be administered by the Department of Health and Human Services, thus requiring a significant amount of coordination between the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services. In 2004, the Office for Victims of Crime initiated regular coordination meetings with the Office of Refugee Resettlement, its counterpart agency at HHS, known as the Human Trafficking Victim Services Coordination Working Group. By working together, both agencies maximize their resources and exchange information to improve the provision of victim services as both HHS and the Office for Victims crime may fund grantees that provide services to pre-certified victims. Consequently, grantees funded by the Office for Victims of Crime under the TVPA only provide services to victims of trafficking before they are certified as victims of a "severe form of trafficking" by the Department of Health and Human Services, except in special circumstances.[74]

Since fiscal year 2003, the Office for Victims of Crime has funded 20 victim service providers to assist pre-certified victims of trafficking in the United States, one grant to the headquarters of the Salvation Army to work with their territorial divisions to provide shelter to trafficking victims, and one grant to an organization to provide technical assistance. Since January 2003, Office for Victims of Crime-funded grantees have served 741 pre-certified trafficking victims. The Department, in cooperation with other law enforcement agencies, have assisted 687 victims to obtain continued presence immigration status, allowing them to remain in the country and to receive benefits and services.[75]

The period between being rescued and receiving certification is the time when victims are most vulnerable. They typically have a host of needs that includes housing, clothing, and food; medical, dental, and psychological care; legal assistance and immigration advocacy; and interpretation services. However, few organizations or communities have the resources to provide or fund these services. The Office for Victims of Crime grant program helps communities to fill this critical service gap and, in the process, supports victims' abilities to cooperate with law enforcement. Immigrant victims are offered culturally and linguistically appropriate services and may, if needed, petition for T visas that would allow them to remain in the United States legally. Some organizations are specifically prepared to provide immediate, critical assistance in crisis situations until the services of a local victim service provider can be put in place.

The Office for Victims of Crime supports the work of the victim service providers it funds with technical assistance that is made available through workshops, on-site consultation, and via the internet. Office for Victims of Crime training and technical assistance includes mentoring guides and safety protocols for both providers and clients. Grantees also provide training to local police and non-governmental organizations. Since fiscal year 2003, approximately 38,635 persons have been trained through the efforts of Office for Victims of Crime grantees. Training topics have included the dynamics of trafficking, the legal definition of trafficking under the TVPA, legal rights and services for trafficking victims, and cultural considerations in serving these victims. More important, the Office for Victims of Crime and the National Institute of Justice are studying effective approaches to victim service delivery and plan to publish an evaluation of field-tested services in 2006.

In addition to the work of the Office for Victims of Crime, the Office on Violence Against Women has, since 2001, funded more than $700,000 for technical assistance projects that assist Office on Violence Against Women grantees in providing services to trafficking victims if they have also been victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking. For example, Legal Momentum's Immigrant Women Program provides technical assistance to Office on Violence Against Women grantees to foster their ability to serve immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and stalking. Because trafficking victims may seek services from Office on Violence Against Women grantees if they have also been a victim of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking, the Immigrant Women Program training workshops educate grantees about the availability of T- and U-visas, identifying whether a victim has been trafficked, barriers faced by trafficking victims who seek services, and conducting outreach to potential victims of trafficking. In addition, Legal Momentum has developed a nationwide directory of experts working with immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault and trafficking. Nearly 950 attorneys and advocates have attended these workshops and another 150 will be trained within the next year. Another example is the Family Violence Prevention Fund, which used Office on Violence Against Women funding in 2003 to establish a project aimed at improving collaborative responses to trafficked victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. The main goal of the project was to build multi-disciplinary collaborations between service providers and law enforcement to effectively and appropriately assist trafficking victims in Georgia and Washington. Plans are underway to expand the project into Alaska.

C. Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations

Public awareness is essential to proactive investigations that uncover victims. In fact, the prosecutions in United States v. Kil Soo Lee[76], which resulted in the single largest rescue of trafficking victims in the Department's history, and United States v. Soto[77] were brought to the attention of federal law enforcement through referrals by non-governmental organizations that work with populations at risk for trafficking. The Department works to motivate communities, especially anti-human trafficking task forces, to increase awareness among law enforcement, various government inspectors (especially health code, wage and hour, and occupational safety and health agents), hospitals and other medical providers, social services agencies, and community- and faith-based organizations.

Increased outreach and public awareness is critical to the investigation and prosecution of human trafficking cases. The Department established a toll-free telephone complaint line in 2000 to receive allegations of trafficking from individuals ready to report to law enforcement, creating a mechanism that has substantially increased the number of investigations initiated by the Civil Rights Division. [78]

Since 2003, the Department has made available a brochure describing its processes and resources to assist non-governmental organizations in dealing with trafficking victims and the Department in a more efficient way. Through outreach, America's communities – particularly immigrant communities – are better educated about this crime and how to report possible cases. Moreover, increased public awareness about this crime and the benefits available to its victims can eliminate important aspects of the leverage that traffickers hold over their victims.

As a result, all components speak publicly about trafficking and the Department's activities to combat this crime to state, local, and foreign legislators, law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and non-governmental victim advocacy and services organizations. The Civil Rights Division, for example, has delivered more than 200 presentations around the nation since fiscal year 2001. Office for

Victims of Crime grants to 21 human trafficking victim service providers under the TVPA include funding to increase public awareness in the communities they serve. Civil Rights Division representatives continuously emphasize the important role that faith and community-based organizations can play. Because of their proximity to the communities they serve, they can provide immense intelligence about potential criminal enterprises and trafficking victims, provide immediate, crisis care, and long term programs that help to prevent further victimization. The Federal Bureau of Investigation Civil Rights Unit has appeared on national television and local radio programs which highlight, define, and expose trafficking to the general public, including CNBC, Donny Deutche's The Big Idea, and WMAL AM 630's "Danger Zone" with Richard Carlson, a Washington, D.C.-area radio program. The Civil Rights Unit has also provided human trafficking-related training presentations at various non-governmental conferences, such as the International Association of Labor Standards Annual Conference in Memphis, Tennessee, and the National Organization of Women's Annual Conference in Los Angeles, California. The Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section is also actively engaged in promoting the Department's strategy of multi-disciplinary cooperation that emphasizes the victim-centered approach to combating domestic child prostitution with non-governmental organizations such as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

United States Attorneys' Offices are also involved in providing outreach and education about human trafficking within their districts. The United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of California, for example, has hosted five conferences on human trafficking since October 2001. Each of

These conferences have provided training about applicable statutes and resources available for victims, including contact information for potential victims, to local law enforcement and non-governmental organizations serving trafficking victims. These conferences have resulted in long-standing relationships between federal prosecutors and law enforcement, state and local police, and numerous local service-providers, such as the Bilateral Safety Corridor Coalition. Another example are the efforts of the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Connecticut, which convened a meeting in May 2004 of federal and state agencies to explore why human trafficking cases have not been prosecuted in this jurisdiction. By September 2004, this office convened a training conference intended to educate federal, state, and local law enforcement and victim service providers about human trafficking and how to identify resources, including federal grant opportunities. The result of these efforts has been the creation of an

D. Promoting Foreign Criminalization and Prosecution of Human Trafficking

As discussed above,[79] the President has directed federal agencies to use all diplomatic and foreign assistance tools in the nation's effort to abolish human trafficking. The Department has had an important role in advancing this directive. The Department's primary goal in this regard is to promote the efforts of foreign governments to criminalize human trafficking and to enhance their capacity to investigate and prosecute these crimes first through the President's international human rights initiative; second, by collaborating with foreign law enforcement agencies on human trafficking cases; third, by supporting foreign training and technical assistance programs, increase the capacity of several source and destination countries to combat trafficking. Specifically, the President's initiative aims to replicate our victim-centered prosecutions through multi-disciplinary task forces and increased outreach in Cambodia, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Moldova, and Tanzania.

The Department has been actively involved in the design, development, and implementation of this initiative. Working primarily through the Civil Rights Division, and with the assistance of the Criminal Division's Offices of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program, the Department coordinated with the Departments of Health and Human Services, Labor, and State, as well as the United States Agency for International Development, to develop the capacity of foreign governments to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases, and to develop partnerships with non-governmental organizations to prevent the vulnerable from becoming victims through outreach and education as well as to protect and rehabilitate victims. The inter-agency working group found the lessons learned by the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of trafficking cases and its organization of trafficking task forces a valuable model for the implementation of the President's international initiative. The objective of the initiative thus became the institution of multi-disciplinary efforts to combat human trafficking in particular geographic regions. In practice, this would mean that programs to promote awareness raising, victim shelters, and police and prosecutor training would be established and supported in a collaborative effort by each of the participating federal agencies. The Department designs country assessments to help the United States Government better understand the nature of the trafficking problem in a particular area and to inventory what efforts were currently underway.

Foreign Country
Human Trafficking Assessments By the Department of Justice

- What is the current statutory framework?
- What is the capacity of police to investigate trafficking offenses?
- What is the level of prosecutorial skill and interest in trafficking victims?
- What is the current state of services for victim shelter and restoration by both governmental and non-governmental organizations?
- What is the current level of cooperation between prospective anti trafficking team members, and?
- What is the level of political will and interest among those government officials who would be the implementers of the plan?

The first task is to gain a foundational understanding of human trafficking within the host country by answering such questions as: Who are the victims and where do they come from? What kind of coercion is used to control the victims? What are the historical and cultural factors that influence trafficking or the response to it? Is there trafficking of minors into sexual exploitation? What industries tend to have labor trafficking? Next, the Department's trafficking experts design a matrix of the necessary tools that would be required to rescue particular victims, place them into restorative care, and hold perpetrators accountable.

Once the assessment is completed, the United States Government, through the local United States Embassy, and the host government enter into a Letter of Agreement (LOA) that states the roles and responsibilities of both parties and the level of funding to be provided in connection with the President's initiative. Department team members then coordinate with the other federal agencies to deploy training and other capacity building and to assign to the host country personnel from the United States Government to provide expertise and mentoring to those working on the anti-trafficking project. A primary goal of every LOA entered into in connection with the President's initiative is the Department's imperative to rescue victims and hold perpetrators accountable. The President's initiative was designed to place a clear emphasis on results that change lives for victims and their families.

The United States Government's work with the Mexican Government in connection with this initiative presents a useful illustration of the Department's work. Since 2003, the Department's Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions have been actively conducting country planning sessions in both Mexico and Indonesia, and has detailed a Civil Rights Division attorney to the United States Embassy in Moldova, in connection with the President's international human trafficking initiative. In Mexico, a significant number of senior United States law enforcement specialists met repeatedly over the past year with their counterparts from the Mexican Government before a final Letter of Agreement was signed in mid 2005. As a result, both partners have a clear understanding of how the President's program will be implemented. One significant factor in the United States-Mexico anti-trafficking partnership is the agreement to work together on cases that involve criminal trafficking enterprises that are active on both sides for the border.

Collaboration with Foreign Law Enforcement

Another important Departmental component in the international arena is the Office of International Affairs of the Criminal Division, which serves as the link between federal, state, and local anti-trafficking efforts and foreign prosecution and judicial authorities. Good working partnerships with foreign governments have been essential to the Department's efforts to combat human trafficking. The Office of International Affairs' most significant contribution to United States Government anti-trafficking efforts has been to assist in gathering evidence from abroad and to assist foreign prosecutors in gathering evidence located in our country. For example, in United States v. Carreto,[80] Mexican nationals were accused of recruiting uneducated women and girls from impoverished areas of Mexico and compelling them to prostitute themselves in both Mexico and New York. Carreto's victims were forced to service up to 20 men a day as prostitutes and were beaten if they did not make enough money during a single day or if they attempted to hide the money they made. One victim was also forced to have an abortion.[81] The Office of International Affairs, in collaboration with the United States

Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York, helped secure testimony, as well as documentary and physical evidence, gathered by Mexican authorities in their investigations of the Carretos' transnational operation. Similarly, the Office of International Affairs secured evidence and testimony from Russia in support of a federal prosecution by the United States Attorney's Office for the Central District of California of a defendant in California accused of trafficking her niece into the United States and forcing her to be used in prostitution.[82]

The Office of International Affairs also works to extradite traffickers from foreign nations to the United States or from our country to foreign nations for prosecution. On September 28, 2005, Mexico provisionally arrested a Mexican national pursued by the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida on charges including conspiracy, alien smuggling, and transporting women and minors for purposes of prostitution between August 1996 and February 1998. The victims, who reportedly did not know their fate until they arrived in the United States, were not allowed to leave the brothels until they paid a smuggling fee to the accused, who allegedly took 70% of the prostitution proceeds.

Since fiscal year 2003, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has participated in the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative, a multilateral organization designed to combat trans-border crime and develop closer law enforcement coordination among its members, as the lead observer on human trafficking cases and has detailed agents to Albania, Bulgaria, and Romania to work on trafficking issues. The Southeast European Cooperative Initiative Regional Center for Combating Trans-Border Crime in Bucharest, Romania, coordinates southeastern European police and customs regional actions for preventing and combating trans-border crime, including trafficking in persons and migrant smuggling. The following twelve countries are actively involved with the Center: Albania, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Greece, Hungary, Macedonia, Moldova, Romania, Serbia and Montenegro, Slovenia and Turkey.

Foreign Training and Technical Assistance Programs

Dismantling transnational human trafficking networks requires a willingness and ability to work closely with our foreign partners in countries where victims are recruited. Consequently, the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions are actively involved in outreach and providing technical assistance to foreign governments and non-governmental organizations. Since 2002, Civil Rights Division officials have addressed international gatherings convened in countries such as Azerbaijan, Belize, Brazil, Cambodia, Canada, China, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Japan, Mexico, Moldova, Philippines, South Africa, Suriname, Thailand, and Ukraine, to encourage a coordinated response to human trafficking worldwide. These events are attended by foreign law enforcement executives, prosecutors, judges, and non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of or provide assistance to trafficking victims.

The Criminal Division's Offices of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and its sister organization, the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program work to build effective partnerships with other law enforcement agencies sharing the goal of eradicating predatory trafficking groups. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training conducted a total of 142 training and technical assistance programs involving 25 countries.

The Criminal Division's International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program has partnered with 12 nations, including Albania, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Costa Rica, Georgia, Indonesia, Macedonia, Nigeria, Ukraine, Russia, and Senegal

Assistant United States Attorney Susan Coppedge, in the Northern District of Georgia, was selected as a recipient of the 2006 Ian Axford New Zealand Fellowship in Public Policy to study Human Trafficking issues in New Zealand by the Common Wealth Fund. Ian Axford Fellowships in Public Policy give outstanding mid-career American professionals opportunities to study, travel, and gain practical experience in public policy in New Zealand, including firsthand knowledge of economic, social, and political reforms and management of the government sector.

AUSA Coppedge will work to strengthen anti-trafficking policies and laws in New Zealand. to build local capacity to prevent and combat trafficking in persons. International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program projects have included training foreign police on how to properly identify and investigate trafficking cases, especially techniques for interviewing victims. Activities also included developing strike forces and specialized anti-trafficking police units; providing equipment and information technologies to manage trafficking-related cases; and developing law enforcement manuals to assist police to conduct investigations, make arrests, and rescue victims.

Insert graphic of all countries referenced re foreign assistance programs

Department experts also participate in regional, multilateral consultations between law enforcement executives that promote international cooperation between the country of victim origin and the destination country, such as the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative, which is discussed in more detail below. Attendees at workshops conducted by the Department are often law enforcement executives who can and do take information and put it into practice. In one recent example, Department lawyers relied upon contacts made through these training sessions to assist a country in arresting recruiters who held the children of trafficking victims as hostages to prevent the victims from providing evidence to assist in a United States prosecution.

Educating Foreign Visitors to United States

The Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Office for Victims of Crime, supplement the Department's foreign assistance programs by providing technical assistance and informational briefings with foreign delegations to the United States. Since the passage of the TVPA, Civil Rights Division lawyers have participated in numerous training and outreach programs, speaking at more programs last year and the year before than ever before in countries such as Austria, Cambodia, Mexico, Singapore, and Thailand. The Department's experts have also assisted their counterparts in other countries with assistance in developing a victim-centered response to human trafficking through meetings and training workshops. For example, many foreign governments host their own training in partnership with the United States Embassy. Lasting a week to two weeks, the Department's attorneys, investigators, and victim specialists teach critical skills such as evidence gathering, pro-active investigations, and victim interviews. Workshops provide an opportunity to practice skills and learn new law enforcement methods that reflect the lessons Department has learned in investigating and prosecuting these cases. The Department's consistent theme in each of these events is to present the crime of human trafficking as a multi-disciplinary challenge requiring collaboration among governmental and non-governmental agencies. The Department has learned that a critical need in many developing countries is the ability to develop a framework for governmental and non-governmental organizations to collaborate, particularly as it concerns the protection of victims and programs to prevent further victimization.

DOJ_NMG_0009044

In addition, some United States Attorney Offices, particularly in connection with their local Task Forces, have been involved in training and educating visitors from foreign governmental and non-governmental organizations about strategies to combat human trafficking. Representatives of the United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, along with its task force members from the Collier County Sheriff's Office, the Immigrant Rights Advocacy Center, and the Florida State University Center for the Advancement of Human Rights, traveled to Central America in late 2004 to educate governmental leaders about the efforts of their task force to combat human trafficking and provide assistance to its victims. An additional example is that of the United States Attorney's Office for the Western District of Washington, where the Seattle offices of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General have worked together to share information about efforts to combat human trafficking with officials and visitors from countries such as Brazil, Germany, Mexico, France, Italy, and Spain, and with organizations like the World Affairs Council.

The Department also works with foreign governments to adopt legislation that aids in the investigation and prosecution of traffickers and the protection of victims. Through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, the Department's trafficking experts in the Civil Rights Division, Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section and United States Attorneys' Offices assist foreign governments with the development and ratification of anti-human trafficking legislation to help ensure that foreign governments adopt laws that are victim-centered and compliant with the Palermo Protocol.[83] For example, in fiscal year 2004 alone, Civil Rights Division attorneys and its victim-witness coordinator have conducted training sessions and have assisted in drafting trafficking legislation in Asia, Africa, Europe, the Caribbean, North America, and South America, in coordination with the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training. These training sessions emphasize the Department's experience in investigating and prosecuting these cases, collecting evidence, and keeping the victim safe.

In fiscal year 2004, the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program assisted 7 foreign nations with legislation that directly or indirectly furthered anti-human trafficking efforts in fiscal year 2004. The Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training provides substantial technical assistance based on a victim-centered strategy known commonly as the "Three Ps of Trafficking in Persons: Prevention, Protection and Prosecution." Technical assistance by this office includes educating and developing joint projects with foreign law enforcement officials geared to strengthening their capacity to prevent transnational trafficking; protect victim witnesses and thereby encourage their participation in investigations and prosecutions; and effectively investigate and prosecute trafficking cases. This office also works with host countries on developing evidence collection techniques which can generate evidence usable in prosecutions – either here in the United States or in a foreign country.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, has provided training programs in Azerbaijan, Suriname and Ghana. In fiscal year 2004, the FBI trained 50 international visitors, including officials from Australia, India, Pakistan, South Africa, Haiti, and England. In addition, the Bureau's Civil Rights and the Asian Criminal Enterprise and Crimes Against Children Units conducted a training session at the British Embassy in January 2005 during a program jointly sponsored by the British Embassy and Women in Federal Law Enforcement.

Another component of the Department's international human trafficking program are activities to prevent victimization. An important step towards prevention is the Department's efforts to increase international public awareness about human trafficking. Raising the visibility of human trafficking and the efforts of the United States government to combat it encourages foreign governments to take victim-centered action to prevent, uncover, and prosecute cases of human trafficking. International public awareness is increased through activities of the Civil Rights Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Office working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program, in connection with briefings for foreign delegations and training programs. These training programs provide foreign parties – law enforcement officials, prosecutors, legislators, and non-governmental organizations – with information about the strategies the Department has employed to combat trafficking. Federal investigators and prosecutors, mostly Civil Rights Division attorneys, share lessons learned in prosecuting these cases, building local multi-disciplinary task forces, and providing services and protection for victims.

As a further part of the Department's efforts concerning sex and labor trafficking, the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section has trained attorneys and investigators from numerous countries on sex trafficking of children. Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section staff have trained individuals from: the Council of Baltic States (11 Baltic nations), Albania, Angola, Armenia, Austria, the Balkans, Belgium, Belize, Bosnia, Brazil, Bulgaria, China, Costa Rica, Croatia, Czech Republic, El Salvador, Ecuador, Georgia, Germany, Guinea, Hungary, Indonesia,

Israel, Japan, Korea, Lithuania, Latvia, Macedonia, Mexico, Montenegro, Nigeria, Panama, the Philippines, Poland, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Serbia, Slovenia, South Africa, Suriname, Thailand, the United Kingdom, and Ukraine, among others.

States, governors, and legislatures can help by adopting anti-trafficking laws. The Justice Department has created a model state anti-trafficking law, and I intend to send a copy of it to every governor and legislative leader in those 40-plus states that do not yet have their own anti-trafficking laws.

E. Fostering State, Local and Non-Governmental Activities to Combat Human Trafficking

The Department's work with state and local governmental agencies, particularly activities to expand anti-trafficking law enforcement authority, is intended to harness the nearly 700,000 state and local law enforcement officers who might come into contact with trafficking victims.[84] The number of law enforcement and prosecutorial resources dedicated to trafficking may be exponentially increased by combining federal, state and local assets. Thus, in 2004, the Department developed and introduced a model state law at the National Training Conference on Human Trafficking because many states do not have laws that criminalize this activity. At that time, only four states - Texas, Florida, Missouri, and Washington - had state laws against trafficking. The model state law reflects lessons learned through the Department's prosecutions, especially enforcement of the TVPA by the Civil Rights Division. Adoption of the model statute would promote a uniform national legal strategy to combat human trafficking.

On July 21, 2004, the United States Senate unanimously passed a resolution, authored by Texas Senator John Cornyn, endorsing the Department's model state anti-trafficking statute and encouraging states to adopt it. The Senate resolution also singled out for praise the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of human trafficking crimes and lauded the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking. In March 2005, Attorney General Gonzales sent letters to state governors and legislative leaders explaining the scope of the trafficking problem, pointing to the need for state assistance to the federal government in fighting trafficking, and urging them to adopt the model. Department officials have since promoted the model law, and Civil Rights Division attorneys continue to provide technical assistance regarding the model state law to state legislators and related organizations, such as the National Foundation for Women Legislators. To date, 15 states have enacted anti-trafficking legislation, many of which reflect the Department's model criminal statute.

As discussed above,[85] outreach and technical assistance are critical to uncovering this insidious crime. The Civil Rights Division, along with the Criminal Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Offices, works actively to increase awareness among local law enforcement and community- and faith-based organizations through training presentations and the provision of technical assistance. The strategy employed by each of these components reinforces a victim-centered approach to prosecutions and the collaborative work of task forces. Examples of the Department's activities to increase awareness of human trafficking among state and local governmental agencies, non-governmental organizations, and in our nation's communities include the following:

- Attorneys in the Civil Rights Division and the Office of Legal Policy authored an August 2002 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled Working Together to Stop Modern-Day Slavery. The article outlined ways for local law enforcement during the course of their usual investigations to identify trafficking cases.

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division conducted training sessions in the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area, New York City, Chicago, San Diego, Atlanta, Dallas, and several other cities and with numerous non-governmental organizations such as the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Women in Federal Law Enforcement and the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives.

- An attorney in the Civil Rights Division authored a December 2003 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled, Human Trafficking: A Guide to Detecting, Investigating, and Punishing Modern-Day Slavery. The article gave an overview of federal anti-trafficking efforts and urged increased cooperation among state, local, and federal law enforcement officials.

HUMAN TRAFFICKING

A Guide to Detecting, Investigating, and Punishing Modern-Day Slavery

By Bharathi A. Venkatraman, Federal Prosecutor and Special Counsel for Trafficking in Persons, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC

In April 1997, Joseph (not his real name), a homeless, drug-addicted African American man stumbled through the woods in Fort Pierce, Florida. He was dazed and bloody, having just been repeatedly kicked and beaten about the head and face. Deputy Lee, of the Saint Lucie County Sheriff's Department, who was investigating a report of a missing child, observed Joseph. Noticing Joseph's injuries, Lee summoned medical assistance and interviewed the injured man. Thus began an investigation initiated by the Saint Lucie Sheriff's Department, in conjunction with the Fort Pierce Police Department, that uncovered violent and abusive conduct on the part of Lewis Phillips, a fruit harvesting contractor who employed Joseph and a number of other workers on a seasonal basis. Phillips hooked Joseph and other workers on crack cocaine in lieu of paying them adequate salaries, and applied their earnings of 55 cents per bin of fruit picked to the crack debt that the workers owed him. Phillips's payment scheme resulted in a burgeoning debt for Joseph and the other workers and little, if any, take-home pay. Growing increasingly dissatisfied with his work situation, Joseph left Phillips's employ in favor of working for a competing fruit harvesting contractor who offered Joseph better terms. Once Phillips discovered that Joseph had left to work for a competitor, Phillips became enraged and enlisted the assistance of an enforcer to kidnap, beat, and brutalize Joseph in order to "teach him a lesson. . . ."

On the morning of November 22, 1999, 18-year old Geeta came home to her apartment in Berkeley, California, and was confronted by a horrifying sight. Her two roommates, sisters Leela, 16, and Radha, 14, were lying on the floor, unconscious. The apartment was stifling hot, and Geeta ran about grabbing water and ice to sprinkle on her two unconscious roommates, in hopes of reviving them. Geeta then shook and ultimately slapped the two sisters, but they remained unresponsive. A poor young woman from southern India, Geeta was not well educated and unable to speak English. Utterly desperate, she phoned her place of employment, an Indian restaurant in Berkeley, and summoned restaurant workers to come and assist her. The restaurant personnel arrived in a van and attempted to calm Geeta, who was waiting for them outside of the apartment, in a state of extreme agitation. The workers then called one of the unconscious sisters in a rug in order to carry her to the waiting van in a concealed fashion. However, their attempts at concealment failed when a passing motorist noticed a human body part protruding from the rug. Alarmed, the motorist called the Berkeley Police Department. Berkeley police officers responded immediately, along with paramedics, and became suspicious that three young girls, with little or no English language skills, were living alone. Their investigation, which ultimately involved federal agents, revealed that the young unconscious girls were the victims of carbon monoxide poisoning due to a malfunctioning heater. Tragically, one of the two sisters, Radha, ultimately died. The investigation, however, led to the discovery that the young immigrants were sex abuse victims of a wealthy and powerful Bay Area business man who was also their employer.

Both of these examples are drawn from real-life human trafficking cases prosecuted by the Department of Justice. Despite the obvious distinctions between the two scenarios and the means used to harm the victims, they share one fundamental feature: both incidents involve defendants who intimidated victims and forced them to work against their will. Such conduct amounts to modern-day slavery, also known as trafficking in persons.

The Importance of Identifying the Crime

Human trafficking is not always easy to detect. As these two cases demonstrate, trafficking can masquerade as a variety of other offenses. However, it is important to identify modern-day slavery for what it is—an assault on fundamental human dignity. Local law enforcement officers are the first responders in the communities where such crimes occur and are therefore the key players in identifying and exposing these serious crimes.

Human Trafficking Defendants Receive Big Sentences

Identifying trafficking crimes for what they are is an efficient way to punish effectively a variety of criminal activity. Time and again we have witnessed the frustration of local officers who arrest persons involved in vice or domestic violence offenses and spend countless hours completing paperwork, only to encounter the same offenders on the street in a matter of days. Lenient laws that enable perpetrators to get away with a mere slap on the wrist serve as a disincentive to enforcement.

By contrast, trafficking crimes carry hefty sentences. Consider the sentences meted out in United States v. Jimenez-Calderon, a recent sex trafficking case prosecuted by the Department of Justice and local law enforcement in Newark, New Jersey, a case that just as easily could have been prosecuted as a prostitution case. In Jimenez-Calderon, the defendants lured and transported young Mexican girls into the United States under false pretenses, and then forced them into prostitution, using physical violence and threats to maintain strict control over them. On August 7 of this year, two female defendants who supervised the victims were sen-

- In fiscal year 2004, the Civil Rights Division conducted more than fifty training sessions around the United States at conferences and meetings in cities such as Albuquerque, Baltimore, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, Newark, New Jersey, and Salt Lake City.

- With funding from the Office on Violence Against Women, the International Association of Chiefs of Police is developing a training package for local law enforcement officers, including a guidebook on the identification and investigation of human trafficking crimes and a roll call training video with a discussion guide to accompany the guidebook.

- The International Association of Chiefs of Police National Law Enforcement Leadership Initiative, in connection with a $200,000 cooperative agreement with the Office on Violence Against Women, is planning a summit of law enforcement leaders in the summer of 2006 to continue to extend the level of awareness of and commitment to combating human trafficking.

- The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS), initiated, in fiscal year 2005, a program to educate local law enforcement about human trafficking through the COPS Regional Community

Policing Institutes at a cost of $245,000. In 2005, COPS conducted three "train-the-trainer" sessions for 300 law enforcement trainers, including members of the then-existing 18 multi-disciplinary task forces, with the human trafficking curriculum developed by the Bureau of Justice Assistance. This program will be expanded in 2006 to hold at least five sessions, educating 5,100 law enforcement personnel.

- Also in fiscal year 2005 and independent of the Bureau of Justice Assistance, COPS sponsored an additional 6 training sessions for nearly 700 law enforcement officers, non-law enforcement governmental officials, and community-based organizations.

- The National Institute of Justice is supporting research that will provide a clear perspective on the current state of law enforcement's understanding of human trafficking. The research will identify current law enforcement responses to human trafficking; the implications of such responses for victims; and best practices and lessons learned by law enforcement and the partners with whom they collaborate on trafficking cases (e.g., victims service providers, attorneys, etc.).

- The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, through the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and the Fox Valley Technical College, provides training on topics such as child maltreatment, runaway and missing children, the protection of children, and domestic trafficking of children for sexual purposes. This training program has educated approximately 36,500 persons between 2001-2005 with about 27,5000 persons trained between 1998-2000.

VII. Conclusion

The Department has achieved incredible success in carrying out President Bush's directive to combat human trafficking. Under this Administration, the Department has been aggressive and effective in its effort to halt human trafficking. Prosecutorial activity has increased four-fold when compared to the last five years of the previous administration. The Department also has been innovative in its approach, by developing a multi-disciplinary victim-centered approach to uncovering human trafficking schemes, rescuing and protecting victims and working with foreign, governmental and non-governmental partners to prevent further victimization. Moreover, the Department is ensuring that the important work to combat human trafficking of the Civil Rights Division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Civil Rights Unit is complemented by, and coordinated with, the contributions of the many other Department components identified throughout this report that contribute in meaningful ways to this important Departmental priority. There is however, much work to be done.

Because the fundamental liberties of a human trafficking victim are violated by traffickers, the Civil Rights Division will continue to lead the Department's efforts to combat this heinous crime, working with federal investigators and prosecutors as well as victim services organizations both here and abroad. With the new tools found in the TVPRA of 2005, the Department will continue to work with its federal, state and local partners to expand the reach and intensity of anti-human trafficking task forces and encourage states to criminalize sex, labor and child sex trafficking.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
January 11, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs, (202) 514 2007

TOMORROW'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

USA Today* Story on NSA Activities
USA Today is preparing a story on the NSA activities described by the President and criticisms by law professor Laurence Tribe and former CIA General Counsel Jeffrey H. Smith. Tasia Scolinos, Director of Public Affairs, responded on the record as follows: "Legal minds often differ on complex constitutional issues but government lawyers spent many months looking at this question and concluded, as the Attorney General has repeatedly made clear, that this vital national security program is lawful and constitutionally sound."

Talking/Background Points:

- Both Jeff Smith in his January 3 memo to the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and Prof. Tribe in his January 6 letter to Congressman Conyers fail to acknowledge the long history and practice of warrantless communications intelligence targeted at the enemy, including within the United States, which Presidents have traditionally employed during times of armed conflict in order to protect the United States from further attack. Such intelligence gathering is a necessary and fundamental part of the use of military force, as authorized by Congress in the September 18, 2001, Authorization for the Use of Military Force.
  Although Prof. Tribe has criticized this interpretation of the AUMF, Prof. Cass Sunstein of the University of Chicago has recognized that it is "clearly plausible."

- Both Mr. Smith and Prof. Tribe also fail to acknowledge the fundamental canon of interpretation that requires us to interpret FISA in harmony with the AUMF to avoid any conflict between the authority of Congress and the constitutional authority of the President to protect the country from another catastrophic attack in time of armed conflict, if there is any "fairly possible" reading of the statutes that will avoid that question, and there certainly is here. Nothing in FISA precludes Congress from authorizing such surveillance through a general grant of authority to use military force, such as the AUMF.

- Prof. Tribe suggests that the NSA activities described by the President raise serious issues under the Fourth Amendment; however, the courts have consistently held that the President may conduct warrantless electronic surveillance of communications in the United States under his inherent constitutional authority in order to protect the country from armed attack by a foreign power, and that such warrantless surveillance is reasonable and complies with the Fourth Amendment.

Former Sheriff and Private Attorney Convicted of Conspiracy to Defraud Government and Theft
A federal jury in the Northern District of Alabama, Southern Division, convicted Jimmy Woodward, the former Jefferson County Sheriff, and Albert Jordan, a partner with the law firm of Wallace, Jordan, Ratcliff & Brandt, L.L.C., on charges of conspiracy to defraud the United States and theft of government property related to 1998 elections in the county. Following today's conviction, the Honorable Lacey A. Collier, Senior Judge, Pensacola Division, scheduled sentencing for March 26, 2006.

Former Congressional Legislative Assistant Pleads Guilty (Criminal)
A former legislative assistant to a member of the U.S. Congress pleaded guilty in Alexandria, Virginia today to a two-count criminal information charging him with conspiracy to commit bribery and aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a member of Congress, U.S. Attorney Paul J. McNulty of the Eastern District of Virginia and Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division announced today. Brett M. Pfeffer, 37, of Herndon, Virginia, entered his plea earlier today in U.S. District Court in the Eastern District of Virginia before the Honorable T.S. Ellis, III. Pfeffer faces up to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $500,000 under the terms of the plea agreement. As part of his plea, Pfeffer has agreed to cooperate with law enforcement officials in an ongoing investigation.

Talking Points:

- Ensuring honest government for American Taxpayers is among the highest priorities of the Department of Justice -- this conviction is another demonstration of our commitment to that principle.

- This defendant admitted to a crime which, at its core, is a bribery scheme involving a public official. Such schemes deprive citizens of the integrity and honest services expected of our government, the Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these illegal schemes.

US v. National Association of Realtors* (Antitrust)
Glenn Justice of The New York Times will run a story on Thursday about the Department's Antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors. Puerto Rico Attorney Charges with Obstruction of Justice. A federal grand jury today indicted Eugenio A. Guardiola Ramierez— a San Juan attorney— for interfering with federal investigations conducted by the General Services Administration, Office of the Inspector General and a federal grand jury involving a kickback scheme to defraud a Puerto Rico restaurant company. The indictment charges that Guardiola attempted to conceal the true nature of these kickbacks by attempting to persuade witnesses to provide false information and by drafting a phony services contract.

Justice Department Announced Settlement with AMC Movie Theater Chain (Civil Rights)

The Justice Department announced the resolution of a lawsuit against American Multi-Cinema, Inc. and AMC Entertainment Inc., operators of one of the nation's largest chains of movie theaters, filed under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The Judge ordered AMC to remedy violations at AMC movie theaters that do not provide access to the stadium section for seating for individuals who use wheelchairs. The court's decision requires AMC to improve wheelchair seating at approximately 1,200 of AMC's 1,933 stadium-style auditoriums, which includes providing ramps in over 360 auditoriums. The order also requires AMC theaters built in the next five years to comply with Justice Department guidance on ADA new construction requirements. In addition, AMC is ordered to pay $200,000 in damages to complainants who notified the Justice Department about problems with wheelchair access at AMC theaters. Finally, AMC is ordered to pay $100,000 in civil penalties for violation of the ADA.

Talking Points:

- The ADA requires places of public accommodation, such as movie theaters, to provide equal access to persons with disabilities and prevents them from providing persons with disabilities a lower quality of goods and services than they provide other members of the general public.

- Providing the same movie going experience for individuals in wheelchairs that other patrons enjoy delivers on the promise of the ADA. These improvements will make the goals of the ADA a reality for thousands of Americans who want to enjoy this popular form of entertainment.

Rocky Mountain News* Story on Campaign Volunteer that Removed Demonstrators (Civil)

A reporter with The Rocky Mountain News in Denver is asking whether the federal government is footing the bill for the man who allegedly identified and removed 3 anti-Bush demonstrators at a rally in March. The three allege in their suit that the man, Mike Casper, identified himself as a Secret Service agent before removing the protesters. Casper, who was working as a White House volunteer at the event, admits he asked the three to leave before the president appeared. He denies he identified himself as an agent. The newspaper says an attorney, working for Hogan and Hartson has been retained for Casper.

Four Massachusetts National Guard Soldiers Filed a Class Action Lawsuit (Civil)

Four Massachusetts National Guard soldiers filed a class action lawsuit against Sec. Of Defense Rumsfeld today, claiming the Guard refused to reimburse soldiers $73 million in basic allowances and expenses. In the federal lawsuit, the soldiers also claim superiors threatened any guardsmen who pursued their financial claims. According to attorneys for the plaintiffs, the Massachusetts National Guard refused to reimburse more than $73 million in food, lodging and commuting expenses to hundreds and possibly thousands of soldiers who served active duty from Sept. 12, 2001, through now. In that the Department has not seen the complaint, it would be inappropriate to comment on it at this time. We have told reporters that once the government is served, we will review the complaint and file our response at such time as the court requires.

Motion to Recuse Federal Magistrate in New Orleans (Civil)
The Justice Department filed a motion to recuse the Federal Magistrate in New Orleans from a case involving lawsuit by Hurricane Katrina victims against the Army Corps of Engineers. The judge in a hearing disclosed that her house had been destroyed as a result of Katrina. She asked both sides in the matter if anyone had a problem with her dealing with the case. She has been served and indicated that she would indeed recuse herself and the case would be assigned to the next judge.

Miner Tragedy Email Scheme (FBI)
The National Press Office drafted a press release regarding an emerging email scheme soliciting money for the surviving miner's family. The phony request is signed under the name of Mr. McCoy's attending physician.

FBI Meets with Muslim and Arab-American Communities (FBI)
Today, representatives from the American Muslim and Arab-American communities met with the FBI to discuss concerns about the secret monitoring of radiation levels at Muslim homes, businesses and mosques nationwide. Groups included the Muslim Public Affairs Council (MPAC), the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), Muslim American Society (MAS), Arab American Institute (AAI), and the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee (ADC).

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Softens Opposition To Hearings On NSA Domestic Intelligence Program. In a speech in Louisville, KY, President Bush addressed the possibility of congressional hearings on the NSA domestic spying program. Bush's assertion that he's not opposed to hearings as long as they don't "'tell the enemy what we're doing" are being cast as a shift in his position. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 4, :45, Schieffer), the only show to report Bush's comments on the controversy, reported the President "softened his opposition today to congressional hearings on the secret program he authorized to eavesdrop on Americans. Mr. Bush said in a speech Louisville today that hearings would be good for democracy if, he said, they do not give away information to what he called the enemy. The President again insisted he does have the legal authority to authorize such programs."

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Gerstenzang, 958K) also says Bush "stepped back from the strong opposition he expressed last month." Bush's comments "came in response to a question at a citizens forum in Louisville as he took his case for the Iraq war to an audience beyond Washington."

The Washington Post (1/12, A7, Fletcher, 744K) says Bush's "campaign-style" event "was different than most of the events he attends nationwide. Usually he speaks to carefully screened partisan audiences and takes no questions. White House aides described Wednesday's audience of business and community leaders as bipartisan, and Bush opened himself to unscripted questions during the town-hall-style event." The New York Times (1/12, Sanger, 1.19M) headlines its story "In Shift, Bush Says He Welcomes Inquiry On Secret Wiretaps," and notes the President "was repeatedly applauded for authorizing the wiretaps" during "his campaign-style meeting." The Times adds, "Asked whether his administration was going to "go after the media" for revealing operations like the domestic wiretapping, Mr. Bush instead defended his decision to authorize the surveillance." USA Today (1/12, Diamond, Jackson, 2.31M) adds Bush said "that administration lawyers had approved the program."

The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (1/12, 119K) reports Bush "was initially opposed to having the program investigated in a public format, but made it clear that he is resigned to open hearings that are scheduled to begin in coming weeks. … In the days after the program's existence was revealed, Bush cautioned against hearings, arguing that the appropriate members of Congress were being consulted privately and offering assurances that he was working within the law to authorize the eavesdropping. 'Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy, "Here's what they do -- adjust." This is a war,' Bush said at a December news conference when asked about expected hearings on Capitol Hill."

Reuters (1/12) quotes Bush saying, "I can understand concerns about this program, before I went forward I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president. … We are a...country of law." He added, "I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people. … One way to protect us is to understand the nature of the enemy. Part of being able to deal with this kind of enemy in a different kind of war is to understand why they're making decisions they're making inside our country."

Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Cameron) added, "Taking questions from an audience, Bush said he understands concern about limited eavesdropping on people in the US, but said he has taken every available step to protect civil liberties." Bush "noted that Congress knew about the program beforehand, but did not complain." Fox also noted, "Despite all the recent complaints and concerns, to date, not one lawmaker has formally requested that the program be stopped."

The Washington Times (1/12, Curl, 90K) reports that after Bush spoke, "Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean criticized the Bush administration's 'disregard for our courts and our laws.'" Said Dean, "President Bush's decision to sidestep the rule of law and spy on Americans without a court order may have dealt a serious blow to our ability to fight and win the war on terror."

Bush addressed other issues yesterday in Kentucky, but with the exception of his comments on Iraq, which got some coverage, they received little media attention. The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (1/12, 119K) reports Bush "took questions for nearly an hour. When a small business owner focused on rising health insurance costs, Bush acknowledged 'it's becoming an unmanageable cost.'" He "touted health savings accounts and association health plans that pool employees together to try to hold down insurance costs." Bush also "said something needs to be done to halt frivolous medical liability lawsuits that he said drive up health costs." He also "hinted that his upcoming State of the Union speech would address the problem of low math and science proficiency among middle and high school students." Another questioner "asked Bush about immigration. Bush said border security is vital but urged compassion for foreigners coming to the U.S. in search of work."

NSA IG Opens Investigation Into Domestic Spying Program. Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Hume) reported, "The National Security Agency Inspector General has opened an investigation into the NSA's electronic eavesdropping program that…Bush authorized after 9/11 to operate sometimes without a warrant. Critics complain that surveillance of communications between suspected terrorists and people inside the US may violate civil rights." Fox (Cameron) added, "It is a controversy that the president welcomes and is eager to explain."

Herbert Calls Bush "The Lawbreaker In The Oval Office." Columnist Bob Herbert, in a column titled "The Lawbreaker In The Oval Office," writes in the New York Times (1/12, 1.19M), "The country has set the bar so low for the performance of…Bush as president that it is effectively on the ground. No one expects very much from Mr. Bush. He's currently breaking the law by spying on Americans in America without getting warrants, but for a lot of people that's just George being George. Forget the complexities of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or even the Fourth Amendment's safeguards against unwarranted (pun intended) government intrusion into matters that we have a right to keep private." He adds, "On his frequent trips home to his ranch in Texas, the president likes to ride his bicycle. He's not studying the Constitution." The Administration "should not be allowed to use war as an excuse. The US is a very special place in large part because no one, not even the president, is above the law."

NSA Tells Whistleblower Not To Testify About Secret Programs. Under the headline "Ex-Official Warned Against Testifying On NSA Programs," The Washington Times (1.12, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Renee Seymour, director of NSA special access programs stated in a Jan. 9 letter to Russ Tice that he should not testify about secret electronic intelligence programs because members and staff of the House and Senate intelligence committees do not have the proper security clearances for the secret intelligence," although she noted that Tice "has 'every right' to speak to Congress and that NSA has 'no intent to infringe your rights.'" The Times adds that Seymour also said that Tice, "who was dismissed in May, failed to notify either the Pentagon or NSA of the improper behavior that he is charging," and therefore "must first give statements to the Defense Department and NSA inspectors general before he provides any classified information to Congress from the SAPs."

NSA Leakers, Media Seen As Abetting Terrorists. In a Washington Times (1/12, 90K) op-ed, Douglas MacKinnon, former White House and Pentagon official and press secretary to Sen. Bob Dole, writes, "Until recently, I believed that the liberal Americans in society and the media who espouse blind hatred for the Bush administration, the unilateral responsibility to defend our nation, our intelligence operatives and even our military, would see the error of their ways should we one day tragically lose an American city and its innocent inhabitants to terrorism. Today, I wonder if they might not only secretly rejoice at the thought of the 'Great Satan' being 'justifiably' punished in such a manner, but with their very actions, sow the seeds of such destruction? … The latest case of government employees betraying their trust and our nation by leaking information to the media being the story that 'the Bush administration was running a covert-domestic-spying program.'" MacKinnon adds, "Since September 11, we have all been waiting for the next shoe to drop. … The shoe may well be American made."

Etzioni Says Questions About NSA Surveillance Should Not Delay Patriot Act Renewal. In a USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) op-ed, author Amitai Etzioni writes, "A steady stream of revelations, and the ensuing news media reports, have portrayed a president hungry for power, doing whatever is necessary — legal or not — to protect this country. In the wake of such news, some lawmakers in Congress see weakness and an opportunity to gut one of President Bush's vital weapons in the war on terror: the USA Patriot Act. Congress should not hold up extending vital sections of the Patriot Act in reaction to these recently revealed power grabs. The president's authorization of spying on Americans by the National Security Agency has nothing to do with the Patriot Act; nor do secret prisons, nor memos allowing torture. Questions over how much power the commander in chief can exercise must be sorted out by Congress and the courts, but the Patriot Act shouldn't be held for ransom."

Man Who Threw Grenade At Bush Sentenced To Life In Georgia. CNN.com (1/12) reports, "A Republic of Georgia court has sentenced a man to life in prison for attempting to assassinate U.S. President George W. Bush by lobbing a hand grenade towards a podium during a rally in the capital last year, according to Georgia's interior minister." CNN continues, "Vladimir Arutinian of Tbilisi was also found guilty of trying to assassinate Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili, who was standing on the podium with Bush on May 10. … He was also convicted of killing a police officer who tried to apprehend him two months after the incident." CNN adds, "The would-be assassin threw a grenade into a crowd about 20 meters (65 feet) from the stage where Bush had just begun speaking, but the grenade, wrapped in a plaid cloth, failed to detonate, authorities said. … Initial reports said the grenade was not live, but authorities later said it was. … Georgia's Interior Minister Vano Meradishvili told CNN he fully expected Arutinian to appeal the ruling because he 'enjoys the attention' that he has received. … Arutinian would not be eligible for parole, and could only be released under a presidential pardon, which was unlikely under Saakashvili, Meradishvili said. … In September, a U.S. federal grand jury indicted Arutinian for the assassination attempt against Bush, and could request his extradition if he is released in the future."

Drug Traffickers, Terrorists Using Prepaid ATM Cards, Internet To Launder Funds. USA Today (1/12, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports, "Drug traffickers and suspected terrorists are using prepaid ATM cards and Internet-based payment systems to help launder billions of dollars each year, the Treasury Department reported Wednesday in what it called the first government-wide analysis of money laundering in the USA. … The report, which included contributions from 16 federal agencies, will be used to help officials devise a national strategy to fight money laundering, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said." USA adds, "Levey said it's unclear how much money in the USA is made from criminal enterprises. The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy estimates sales of illicit drugs in the USA produce $65 billion a year for traffickers. … 'The key to ending drug trafficking is to wipe out the money side,' Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen Tandy said. The DEA seized $2 billion in 2005, up from $500 million in 2003, she said."

Reuters (1/12, Macinnis) reports, "Internet banking, online payment systems and stored value cards not requiring identification give criminals new opportunities to filter money through the United States, U.S regulators said on Wednesday." Reuters continues, "Representatives of the Treasury Department, Federal Reserve, Justice Department and other government enforcement agencies urged in a Money Laundering Threat Assessment report more cooperation to squeeze money launderers and narrow potential avenues for tainted funds. … 'The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is undeniably vast and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization and the advent of new financial services,' they said in the report, a precursor to the government's annual Anti-Money Laundering Strategy." Reuters adds, "The regulators and law enforcement officials said it was 'currently not possible' to accurately estimate the total amount of money laundering in the United States, or how much is being cut off by government enforcement. … Citing a need for a common definition of what constitutes money laundering, regulators said they needed more cooperation to patch vulnerabilities from money orders, stored value cards, check cashing, electronic payments, remittances and other financial transfers. … 'Moving away from face-to-face customer interaction, particularly for (bank) account openings, challenges the traditional process of customer due diligence,' they said."

ABC News (1/11, Ryan) reports, "Money laundering remains a 'massive and evolving challenge' for investigators, according to the federal government's first-ever threat assessment of the problem." ABC News continues, "Even getting a handle on the size of the money laundering threat and the success of efforts to stop it has been difficult, the report found. … 'It is currently not possible, for example, to quantify with accuracy the total money laundering activity being apprehended by the government,' it said." ABC News adds, "Problems with data, incompatible computer systems and even differing definitions of 'money laundering' have hampered some efforts to combat the crime. The assessment is intended to help law enforcement and government regulators grapple with the issue. … 'Before you can effectively treat a problem, you must first have an accurate diagnosis,' said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence."

Swiss Investigate Leak Of Document On CIA Prisons. The New York Times (1/12, Carvajal, Tribune, 1.19M) reports, "Switzerland is conducting criminal investigations to track down the source of a leak to the Zurich-based newspaper SonntagsBlick of what it reported was a secret document citing clandestine C.I.A. prisons in Eastern Europe." The document was said to be "sent by satellite and intercepted by the Swiss Strategic Intelligence Service," and "high-ranking Swiss government officials, who urged the paper to withhold the information," never "contested the authenticity of the document," which "said the United States had held 23 Iraqi and Afghan prisoners at a base in Romania. It also referred to similar detention centers in Bulgaria, Kosovo, Macedonia and Ukraine."

Guantanamo Prisoner Boycotts US Tribunal. Reuters (1/12, Sutton) reports that Yemeni Ali Hamza al Bahlul, who is "accused of being a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden went before a U.S. military tribunal on Wednesday and said he would boycott his war crimes trial because he did not recognize the tribunal's authority." He had "a list of nine reasons why he refused to be represented by a military lawyer or to participate further, including" accusations that "Guantanamo prisoners had been tortured" and "the potential use of secret evidence and to the U.S. characterization of prisoners as illegal belligerents." Army Reserve Maj. Tom Fleener, the lawyer appointed by the military to defend him "called the tribunals a sham and said it is an ethical violation for him to represent a prisoner who has rejected his services."

The New York Times (1/12, Cloud, 1.19M) adds, "Even as Mr. Bahlul has acknowledged his connections to Al Qaeda, he has shown a talent for courtroom theatrics that have at times flummoxed the commissioners. Little has gone smoothly for the military commissions, which the Bush administration created to try Guantánamo prisoners and which have suffered setbacks because of legal challenges, including a review from the Supreme Court."

The Washington Times ran the Reuters story, and the AP (1/11, Leitsinger) also covered it.

British Accuse Cleric Of Inciting Hatred Toward Jews. The New York Times (1/12, Cowell, 1.19M) reports, "In a closely watched trial, a prominent British Muslim cleric," Abu Hamza al-Masri, "was accused Wednesday of inciting hatred against Jews, praising Hitler and voicing support for suicide bombings" and thereby "violating various British laws" in various "lectures and sermons recorded on videotape and audio cassettes in which he was reported to have said he wanted to see the establishment of an Islamic caliphate in the White House."

The Los Angles Times (1/12, Stobart) adds, "Masri…became well known as the radical preacher at North London's Finsbury Park Mosque" which "was considered a crossroads for terrorists such as Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber, before and after the Sept. 11 attacks." The US has indicted Masri "on 11 terrorism-related charges, including his alleged role in a plot to set up a terrorist training camp in rural Oregon in 1999. It is seeking his extradition."

PATRIOT ACT:

Arkansas US Attorney Touts Usefulness Of Patriot Act. KATV-TV, ABC 7, Little Rock, AR (1/12) reports, "The U.S. Attorney's office is using a conference on terrorism (in Little Rock, AR) to tout the usefulness of the Patriot Act, set to expire on February 3. Supporters of the act say it's essential to protect the American public against the war on terror. Opponents say it's a violation of civil liberties. It's a heavily debated issue about which both sides have strong opinions." US Attorney Bud Cummins "says many of the allegations made against the act are simply not true.. … 'There's nothing ground-breaking about the provisions of the Patriot Act. It's just trying to afford the investigators in these very important terrorism investigations to have the same type of tools we use against drug dealers.'" KATV-TV adds, "Cummins says provisions in the Patriot Act lower the wall between criminal and intelligence investigators to share information and allow intelligence investigators to use similar techniques in criminal investigations. The act also updates laws for electronic surveillance. … 'Terrorists don't use rotary telephones. They use cell phones, pagers, e-mail, text messaging, Web sites, we need to be able to keep up with that.'"

More Patriot Act Commentary. In an op-ed in USA Today (1/12), Amitai Etzioni, author of "How Patriotic is the Patriot Act?: Freedom vs. Security in the Age of Terrorism" and a member of the Markel task force on national security and information, writes, "A steady stream of revelations, and the ensuing news media reports, have portrayed a president hungry for power, doing whatever is necessary — legal or not — to protect this country. In the wake of such news, some lawmakers in Congress see weakness and an opportunity to gut one of President Bush's vital weapons in the war on terror: the USA Patriot Act. … Congress should not hold up extending vital sections of the Patriot Act in reaction to these recently revealed power grabs. The president's authorization of spying on Americans by the National Security Agency has nothing to do with the Patriot Act; nor do secret prisons, nor memos allowing torture. Questions over how much power the commander in chief can exercise must be sorted out by Congress and the courts, but the Patriot Act shouldn't be held for ransom." Etzioni continues, "In contrast to the recently revealed secret White House initiatives, many of the 161 measures included in the law aren't contested by any major figure on the right, left or center. Even a representative of the American Civil Liberties Union said the group seeks to fix the act, not to kill it. An examination of some of the contested sections demonstrates that the measures involved are hardly out of line." Etzioni adds, "We tend to swing wildly in one direction and then in the opposite one. The Senate Church Committee, responding to the abuses such as spying on civil rights groups and public leaders by the FBI under J. Edgar Hoover, tied the agency in knots. … The initial responses to the 9/11 attacks might well have been excessive. As time has passed — without a new attack on the USA — many security measures are being questioned, as they should be. Even so, when it comes to critical components of the act, such as those listed above, minor tweaks — not massive overhauls — would make the Patriot Act work for all Americans. … The same can't be said for the other security measures that the public has recently learned about. Those fully deserve the kind of extensive hearings to which the Patriot Act is being subjected."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Officials Meet With Muslim Groups About Nuclear Surveillance. FBI Deputy Director John Pistole and Assistant Director of Public Affairs John Miller on Wednesday met with Muslim and Arab-American leaders in Washington to discuss recent reports of post-9/11 bureau surveillance for possible nuclear material at mosques and Muslim-owned homes and businesses.

Under the headline "F.B.I. Tries To Dispel Surveillance Concerns," The New York Times (1/12, Clemetson, 1.19M) reports Pistole and Miller "tried to reassure those at the session that the surveillance…had been based on intelligence leads." Miller said after the meeting, "We explained how we work with intelligence and that we did what we did based on the patterns of Al Qaeda, not because of the patterns or activities of any mosque or Muslim neighborhood." The "officials struck a conciliatory tone, several attendees said, and acknowledged that the bureau could have responded to their concerns more quickly. But Mr. Pistole offered few details on the monitoring, they said, and he emphasized that the program…remained classified." The Times notes, "The controversy…comes after the F.B.I. cancelled financing for a bureau-wide training initiative intended to improve outreach to Muslim and Arab Americans. … The program, which would have cost $6 million over three years, was cancelled, in part, because of budget constraints, Mr. Miller said."

The Washington Times (1/12, Seper, 90K) reports, "Two Muslim organizations have since filed Freedom of Information Act requests to learn which sites were monitored." Council on American-Islamic Relations executive director Nihad Awad said, "Today's meeting, while not resolving all underlying issues of concern, offered an opportunity to improve lines of communication and to increase mutual cooperation on issues related to national security and the prevention of hate crimes."

US-VISIT Program To Step Up Fingerprinting System. The Federal Times (1/12, Losey) reports, "The director of the nation's program to screen foreign visitors entering the United States hopes to begin testing a more stringent fingerprinting system this year." The Times continues, "The U.S. Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, or US-VISIT, last July was directed by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to start taking all 10 fingerprints from first-time visitors to the country. US-VISIT director Jim Williams said at a press briefing Jan. 5 that the program is still putting together a plan to expand the process. He expects the plan to be finished in a few months. … Meanwhile, Homeland Security finished installing US-VISIT at all 104 land border ports in December, meeting a deadline mandated by Congress, Williams announced." The Times adds, "US-VISIT now takes only two fingerprints of foreign visitors. The FBI's identification system uses 10 fingerprints and a photograph to track criminals. … The Justice Department criticized the two-print system in 2004, saying it could allow terrorists or violent criminals to slip into the country undetected. … Williams stressed that he does not want US-VISIT to impede legitimate visitors and said the first tests will take place at low-volume border crossings and airports to minimize delays. The State Department also may help with testing, he said."

Former TSA Official Works For Firm Pushing Registered Traveler Program. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "Members of the emerging industry of biometric technology companies who are trying to sell the Registered Traveler security program to the nation's airports have formed a coalition to help boost their credibility and their voice in Washington. Perhaps more important, the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition (VCIC) has scored some substantial lobbying help: Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates . Maybe even more important, the leader of the Wexler & Walker team for the client is Tom Blank . Yes, the Tom Blank who was acting deputy administrator of the Transportation Security Administration and who created the agency's Office of Transportation Security Policy. … Blank joined the lobby shop in September and is prevented by federal ethics restrictions from contacting TSA officials for a year, although he could lobby members of Congress."

New Orleans Reconstruction Plan Greeted By Anger, Protests. The presentation of a plan for rebuilding New Orleans by the Bring New Orleans Back commission drew harsh criticism from city residents yesterday over a proposal that would give the most heavily damaged areas four months to prove themselves viable before being bought by the government. The story was covered by each of the networks last night. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 2, 2:45, Vargas) reported, "The Bring Back New Orleans Commission hopes to attract 245,000 people to the city. For now, people can settle wherever they like. But there's no guarantee that those who invest a lot of money and energy repairing their homes be allowed to stay there." ABC (Osunsami) added, "The map of New Orleans could change considerably. Anyone who lives in a neighborhood highlighted here in yellow, most of the city, could be forced to move. The plan calls for new parks, in green. That would help control flooding. Residents would be resettled in areas circled in red." Mayor Ray Nagin: "This report is controversial. It pushes the edge of the envelope." Osunsami: "The Mayor and FEMA appear to support the plan, but late today, the New Orleans City Council announced that it doesn't support any of this, which could slow everything down."

The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 5, 1:30, Schieffer) reported, "Many residents won't have much time to make their case for staying in their old neighborhoods and they let the Mayor and the commission hear all about it." CBS (Acosta) added, "At a meeting with the city's rebuilding commission Mayor Ray Nagin sent shock waves through Big Easy, laying out a plan that gives many of the hardest hit wards just four months to prove they can survive. Neighborhoods that cannot justify their continued existence will be bought out and demolished." But the Mayor's plan "is more than just controversial, it's also far beyond what the city can afford. $12 billion to acquire and demolish homes beyond repair. $4.8 billion for a new high-speed light rail system. And $413 million to repair city-owned buildings. But it's the razor-thin four-month timetable that threatens to derail the proposal." President Bush "promised New Orleans would be rebuilt. When he returns to the city tomorrow, there will be no shortage of angry people to hold them to his word."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 2, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Enraged city council members say residents need answers they're still not getting." Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson, New Orleans City Council: "We as a city have not given the people all the answers they need before they can make a decision." Savidge: "Detractors also say people in impoverished areas like the Lower Ninth Ward have neither the background or training to organize neighborhood planning committees, and can't even take a head count, since most are still spread across the country. Reaction from the audience was fast and mostly furious."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 6, 2:00, Williams) also reported on the personal decisions by many families to leave the city permanently.

Under the headline "City Revival Plan Draws Sharp Criticism," the Los Angeles Times (1/12, Bustillo, 958K) reports, "Residents of the New Orleans neighborhoods most heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina, under a controversial plan unveiled Wednesday, would have just four months to demonstrate strong support for rebuilding their areas before possibly being forced to sell their properties to the government." It's "a centerpiece of Mayor C. Ray Nagin's 'Bring New Orleans Back' recovery plan," which "drew immediate outrage from residents and community activists, who argued that many citizens -- especially the blacks who predominated the flood-struck areas -- could be forced out of the city for good." Nagin said the report "probably says some things to some people they are probably misinterpreting."

The New York Times (1/12, Rivlin, 1.19M) reports that the rebuilding commission gave "neighborhoods in low-lying parts of the city from four months to a year to prove they should not be bulldozed." At a "standing-room-only" meeting, the presentation of the report was "punctuated by catcalls and angry outbursts that often interrupted members of the panel." The Times adds, "Speaker after speaker, black and white, prosperous and poor, dismissed a plan that Mayor C. Ray Nagin described as 'controversial.' But Mr. Nagin gave them hope as he walked a middle line that neither endorsed the plan nor opposed it."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/12, A3, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that New Orleans is also "waiting on the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine base elevation levels required before flood insurance can be issued. The commission is hoping that Congress will approve a quasi-public recovery authority proposed by US Rep. Richard H. Baker (R-La.) that would sell bonds to buy flood-damaged homes, then work with private developers to rebuild neighborhoods."

WSJournal Says City's Low Lying Areas Will Not Be Resettled. President Bush is scheduled to visit New Orleans Thursday to assess progress since Katrina struck the city. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Glassman, 2.11M) editorializes, "He will find a tale of two cities -- one almost back to normal, the other devastated." Commenting on the rebuilding commission's plan, the Journal says "the truth is that the Lower Ninth Ward and other low-lying areas won't be resettled. The new New Orleans will almost surely look like New Orleans of 1878, which, as shown by the Times-Picayune in a remarkable map, had most of the city's 200,000 residents 'clustered in a narrow swath along the Mississippi River.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Defends Iraq Policies. President Bush defended his Iraq policies and took on his critics during a speech in Louisville, Kentucky, yesterday. Bush's remarks on Iraq were largely overshadowed by comments he made later, during a question and answer session, about the NSA domestic wiretapping program. What coverage there was portrayed Bush's Iraq comments as an attempt to preempt critics o his Iraq policies in advance of the 2006 campaign season.

ABC was the only network to focus on the Iraq angle. Its coverage was mostly critical, and also profiled several Iraq war veterans who are running for Congress as Democrats. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 4, 1:55, Woodruff) reported Bush "delivered another strong message to critics of his Iraq policy: Be careful what you say. But there was an important political reason why he chose that state to make his point." President Bush was shown saying, "One way people can help [in the war on terrorism], is we're coming down the pike of the 2006 elections, is to remember the effect that rhetoric can have on troops in harm's way." ABC (Raddatz) added, "But one of the biggest critics in Louisville has already been in harms way, twice. Marine Corps Reservist Andrew Horne, a two-time Iraq veteran and now a congressional candidate, is challenging the Republican incumbent in this district. He said, today, the President is attempting to limit debate about the war because it is not going well." Horne is "one of 11 veterans of the war in Iraq running for Congress. Nine of them are Democrats, including Patrick Murphy in Pennsylvania, Paul Hackett, who is seeking a senate seat in Ohio, and Tammy Duckworth in Illinois." Duckworth "lost both her legs and the use of one arm when her helicopter was shot down outside of Baghdad." The Republicans "are clearly worried about some of these candidates and the war in Iraq, or the President wouldn't keep making these speeches."

The Lexington Herald-Leader (1/12, Alessi) President Bush "told a select group of Kentucky and Indiana residents yesterday that the U.S. military's progress in Iraq is 'good' and promised ultimate victory -- although he gave no timetable." In a "rare town hall-style meeting set up as a theatre-in-the-round, the president again defended invading Iraq, even though former dictator Saddam Hussein didn't possess weapons of mass destruction as Bush first claimed." Bush has "been more aggressively defending his administration's policies in recent weeks, as public support for the war has waned and critics have ramped up their calls for withdrawing troops from Iraq." Meanwhile, in a conference call "with reporters before Bush's event, Lt. Col. Andrew Horne, a Marine reservist and Democrat who plans to run against U.S. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Louisville, said there's a gap between the Bush administration's bold rhetoric on the Iraq war and its actual support for soldiers. He cited recent news stories describing a suppressed Pentagon report that concluded many U.S. combat deaths in Iraq could be avoided with better body armor, which is available on the market."

Reuters (1/12, Wilson) reports President Bush "tried to shape election-year debate on the Iraq war by warning critics their rhetoric could embolden the enemy and weaken the morale of U.S. troops." Bush "acknowledged his decision to invade Iraq almost three years ago was not universally popular." Though he "said he welcomed dissenting voices," he added, "What I don't like is when somebody said he lied or they're in there for oil or he's doing it only because of Israel." Bush "appeared in the district of Republican Rep. Anne Northup whose likely Democratic opponent will be Andrew Horne, a lawyer and Marine reservist who served two tours in Iraq."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) reported, "President Bush today declared our troops in Iraq should have the best equipment possible. President Bush made his remarks during a speech in Kentucky, defending the conduct of this war. That speech took place in Louisville, a key battleground in the midterm elections later this year, in front of a specially screened audience, once again." Bush "asserted that his goal in Iraq is nothing less than victory."

46% Now Say Iraq War Was Worth It. William Schneider said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11), "Is the president making progress in his six-week old campaign to persuade Americans that it was worth going to war in Iraq? Yes. In November, before President Bush started trying it rally public support, 38 percent of Americans thought the Iraq war was worth it. That number is now up to 46 percent. But a majority still say the war was not worth it. The president has made progress, but he has not turned public opinion around." Schneider added, "The public has confidence in the Americans over there, but not in the Iraqis. Very few people believe Iraq will have a stable government that can maintain order without U.S. help within the next year. In fact, Americans are not sure that will ever happen."

General In Abu Ghraib Abuse Scandal Takes Fifth At Court-Martial. The Washington Post (1/12, White, 744K) reports in a front page story that Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, "a central figure in the U.S. detainee-abuse scandal, this week invoked his right not to incriminate himself in court-martial proceedings against two soldiers accused of using dogs to intimidate captives at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq." Miller "once supervised the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and helped set up operations at Abu Ghraib," and his legal maneuver is "the first time the general has given an indication that he might have information that could implicate him in wrongdoing, according to military lawyers." Miller's decision "came shortly after Col. Thomas M. Pappas, the commanding officer at Abu Ghraib, accepted immunity from prosecution this week and was ordered to testify at upcoming courts-martial."

US, Iraqi Officials Attempt To Exploit Rift Between Insurgents, Al Qaeda. In an approximately 2500 word story, the New York Times (1/12, Tavernise, Filkins, 1.19M) reports how an October, 23, 2005 clash between Iraqi insurgents and members of al Qaeda in Taji is emblematic of the widening rift between the two groups. The battle "was one of several clashes between Al Qaeda and local Iraqi guerrilla groups that have broken out in recent months across the Sunni Triangle." American and Iraqi officials "believe that the conflicts present them with one of the biggest opportunities since the insurgency burst upon Iraq nearly three years ago. They have begun talking with local insurgents, hoping to enlist them to cooperate against Al Qaeda, said Western diplomats, Iraqi officials and an insurgent leader." It is "impossible to say just how far the split extends within the insurgency, which remains a lethal force with a shared goal of driving the Americans out of Iraq. Indeed, the best the Americans can hope for may be a grudging passivity from the Iraqi insurgents when the Americans zero in on Al Qaeda's forces."

US Makes Police Training High Priority. The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Levinson, 61K) reports that in Baghdad on Tuesday, "visiting congressmen stepped out of armored cars" into "the mud of Camp Dublin, home to the Iraqi police's elite special forces unit." US Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson "the ex-linebacker responsible for training 200,000 Iraqi police, greeted them and assured the lawmakers that his Iraqi under- studies will soon be in charge here." Peterson said, "We'll have these forces trained by the end of 2006, and I have full confidence that they will begin to assume control of security in Iraq." The Monitor adds the police "have become a new priority, as the US begins turning over more security control to Iraq. Scrutiny of the police intensified after the discovery of secret jails and the torture of Sunni Arab prisoners."

Shiite Politician Says New Government Not Permitted To Change Iraqi Constitution. The

Washington Post (1/12, A14, Hernandez, 744K) reports Iraq's "most influential Shiite politician said Wednesday that he would not allow a new government to 'change the essence' of the country's constitution, despite a promise made to Sunni Arabs that it would be opened to major revision." In a "last-minute deal negotiated under heavy pressure from U.S. diplomats," Sunnis, Shiites, and Kurds "agreed that the draft constitution would be put to a national referendum in October as planned but would be open to change for four months after a new government was formed early this year." But Abdul Aziz Hakim, "the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the most powerful Shiite party in the ruling coalition, appeared to back away from the constitutional compromise Wednesday." Hakim said, "The first principle is not to change the essence of the constitution. It is our responsibility to form Baghdad provinces and southern Iraq provinces."

The New York Times (1/12, Oppel, Mizher, 1.19M) reports al-Hakim's remarks diminished "Sunni Arab hopes of amending the charter to avoid being shut out of the nation's vast oil wealth." Al-Hakim "vowed to give no ground on crucial parts of the Constitution." The speech "was Mr. Hakim's latest hard-line statement directed at Sunni Arabs, whom Shiites accuse of fomenting violence to improve bargaining leverage in the new government. While he previously signaled unwillingness to reopen major constitutional issues, Mr. Hakim's belligerent declarations are sure to anger Sunnis hopeful of carving out a meaningful role in the government."

The Washington Times/AP (1/12, Juhi) reports al-Hakim's "veiled warning" to Sunnis included not changing "the provision that keeps the central government weak in favor of strong provincial governments." Al-Hakim "said in an address in honor of the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha that provincial governments will remain strong in the constitution, which can be amended after the next government is installed."

NYTimes Calls Al-Hakim Statement Prescription For Civil War. The New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) says in an editorial that al-Hakin, "Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician," has "just dealt a huge blow to American-backed efforts to avoid civil war through the creation of a new, nationally inclusive constitutional order." Hakim's "latest position is a prescription for a national breakup and an endless civil war. It is also a provocative challenge to Washington, which helped broker the original promise of significant constitutional changes."

Judge Denies Bail For Park. The AP (1/12, Lozano) reports, "A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the U.N. oil-for-food scandal was denied bail Wednesday and will be transferred to New York to face additional charges in the case. ... U.S. Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy said she denied Park bond since she believed he was a flight risk because of his finances, his ties to South Korea and his history of not dealing with legal problems in the United States." The AP adds that during the bail hearing, "Randy Schaffer, Park's attorney, argued that his client's arrest was illegal," but FBI Special Agent Robert Midcap testified "that a warrant for Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because the South Korean citizen had not answered the U.S. charges from April. The Mexican government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, Midcap said." Reuters (1/12, Seba, Daily) notes, "Schaffer said Park was flown to Houston against his will, and questioned Midcap about whether it was a U.S. or Mexican decision to deport him. 'No, sir. It was the Mexican government that expelled him,' Midcap said. 'That was the government's decision, the Mexican government's decision.'"

The New York Times (1/12, Romero, 1.19M) reports Judge Stacy "also approved Mr. Park's transfer to New York, where he faces arraignment in federal court. Agents from the F.B.I. arrested Mr. Park" in Houston "after Mexican immigration officials apprehended him at Mexico City's airport on the basis of an Interpol notice, Justice Department officials said. The Mexican officials put Mr. Park on a commercial flight to Houston, accompanied by F.B.I. agents, said Melissa Annis, an assistant United States attorney." The Times of London (1/12, Bone) notes Park "had spent many months as a fugitive and his arrest provided an unexpected boost for the FBI inquiry into UN corruption," but Schaffer "said his client never intended to travel to the United States" and "argued that the arrest was illegal." Agent Midcap "testified that a warrant for Mr Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because he had not answered the US charges," and "the Mexican Government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, he said."

German Intelligence Provided US With Erroneous Tip On Saddam's Location. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Drogin, 958K) reports that with "the battle of Baghdad raging on April 7, 2003, an intelligence tip was rushed to a special Pentagon targeting team: Saddam Hussein and his two sons had been spotted near a chicken restaurant in the city's wealthy Mansour district." Less than "45 minutes later, a B-1 bomber obliterated the site with four satellite-guided bombs, leaving a deep crater and at least a dozen dead. The Iraqi ruler, it soon became clear, was not among them." An Iraqi informant "provided the initial tip. But U.S. officials now say confirmation came from an unusual source: two German military intelligence operatives who stayed in a Baghdad safe house after Berlin had closed its embassy." The "previously undisclosed role of German intelligence in the widely reported attempt to decapitate the Iraqi regime highlights how the CIA and the Pentagon secretly relied on German and other foreign spy services for critical information on Iraq even as the intelligence agents' governments fiercely opposed the Bush administration's drive toward war." That "behind-the-scenes cooperation forms the backdrop as Germany's new chancellor, Angela Merkel, arrives here today on her first official visit. Officials said she aims to repair U.S.-German relations that were badly strained when her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, publicly broke with the White House over Iraq."

In 1998, Berger Warned Iraq Was Pursuing WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/12, 90K) excerpts a November 23, 1998 op-ed by then-National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, which was published in the international Al Hayat. Berger wrote, "[T]he entire world is fed up with Iraq's continuing deception and defiance. Iraq agreed as a condition of the Gulf War cease-fire that it would disclose its weapons of mass destruction arsenal within 15 days. Instead, it has spent the better part of a decade shirking its obligations, withholding information from the inspectors, blocking their work, destroying information in plain sight. … Certainly, when it comes to a rogue regime with weapons of mass destruction and a history of using them, the United States and its friends in the Muslim world must continue to be united -- because we are all at risk."

Army, Marines Step Up Production Of Body Armor. The Washington Post (1/12, A14, Tyson, 744K) reports the Army "announced yesterday that it will soon start producing 230,000 sets of side armor plates and field them over the year to soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, after a recently disclosed Pentagon study indicated that such plates could have helped prevent scores of troop deaths since 2003." Officials said the Marine Corps "has delivered 9,000 sets of the plates to Iraq, a number that will rise to about 30,000 by April, officials said yesterday." Army and Marine generals "in charge of developing and buying equipment defended the pace at which they were getting the new side armor to troops, after a closed-door briefing yesterday on the matter on Capitol Hill. The generals briefed the Senate Armed Services Committee after lawmakers voiced concern over a classified Pentagon forensic study disclosed last week that for the first time linked gaps in upper torso protection to troop fatalities." The "scrutiny of body armor is the latest instance in which Congress has pressured the Pentagon to accelerate the distribution of protective equipment to U.S. troops -- from 'uparmored' Humvees and trucks to bulletproof vests."

The New York Times (1/12, Moss, 1.19M) notes the "ceramic plates now worn by most members of the military shield just some of the upper body from bullets and shrapnel, and the Army said it would buy plates that would extend this protection to the sides of soldiers. The officials spoke after a closed session of the Senate Armed Services Committee, held after The New York Times reported last week that a Pentagon study had found that extra armor could have saved up to 80 percent of the marines who died in Iraq from upper body wounds."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) reported that there is "anger on Capitol Hill over reports that Americans are still losing their lives in Iraq because the Pentagon has failed to give our troops adequate body armor. The Senate Armed Services Committee today considered a study that some Marines who have been killed in Iraq would have survived had they been provided improved armor." CNN (McIntyre) added, "Today top Pentagon and Army officials were on Capitol Hill trying to reel in the perception that the US military is not providing enough protection for its troops. … A top Army and Marine Corp official told members of the Senate Armed Serves Committee, it's a myth troops are not getting all of body armor they need."

CQ (1/11, Donnelly) reports Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner "said Wednesday that he is satisfied the U.S. military is doing all it can to outfit troops with adequate body armor, even as some Democrats drew the opposite conclusion." Military representatives "convinced Warner on Wednesday that they are buying the best armor they can without weighing down soldiers and Marines so much that they cannot perform missions. Nonetheless, Democrats seized on the report as evidence the administration has failed to adequately protect U.S. forces."

Massachusetts National Guard Members Sue For Job-Related Expenses. Reuters (1/12, Szep) reports four members of the Massachusetts National Guard "filed a $73 million class-action lawsuit on Wednesday against Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military officials in a dispute over on-the-job expenses since the September 11 attacks." The lawsuit "appears to be the first of its kind in the U.S. Army National Guard, which has faced heavy demands since September 11, 2001, lawyers involved in the case said." The four men "filed the suit in U.S. District Court on behalf of soldiers in about 300 jobs in the Massachusetts National Guard owed money for meals, car fuel, lodging and daily allowances, their lawyers said."

WPost Profiles Virginia Marine Killed In Action. The Washington Post (1/12, B3, Stewart, 744K) profiles Marine Lance Cpl. Kyle W. Brown, 22, of Newport News, who "was fatally shot in the head by a sniper in Anbar province near Fallujah, according to the account his grandmother said Marine Corps officials gave the family. It was his second tour of duty in Iraq."

Soldier Wounded In Iraq Has Portion Of Skull Replaced. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 8, 2:45, Schieffer) reported on the recovery of Sgt. Paul Statzer, a Pennsylvania National Guardsman who suffered a severe head injury in Iraq, noting that he "was so badly wounded in Iraq it is doubtful he could have been saved in any previous conflict. Well, he has made quite a comeback and thanks to some miracle workers at Walter Reed Army Hospital, he has even started to look like his old self." CBS (Martin) added, "Surgeons removed nearly half Statzer's skull after he suffered a severe head wound in a roadside bomb explosion, captured by this still photo last March. Seven months later, Dr. Leon Moores is getting ready to make Statzer's head whole again, implanting an acrylic replica of the bone he lost."

SEALS Intensify Public Recruiting Effort To Boost Numbers, Maintain Quality. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 7, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Even among Special Forces, they are the specialists, the tough guys, the US Navy SEALS. Tonight the Pentagon is going all out to get more of them, to help fight the war on terror. It costs $380,000 to train just one Navy SEAL, and takes 2 1/2 years of grueling training to do it." To "meet their new demands, these normally secretive seals are going on a very public recruiting campaign." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "The Pentagon wants to add nearly 400 more to the 2,600 seals now in service." With their high "dropout rate, and the increased demand on the force, the Navy may not be able to produce new SEALS fast enough. So for the first time, usually secret and stealthy seals are going public. SEAL recruiters are hitting high schools. Air shows, and sporting events. And openly competing in the Ironman triathlon in Hawaii."

Gonzales To Open St. Louis Family Justice Center. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (1/11) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will make his first official appearance in St. Louis, helping on Thursday morning to open the city's new Family Justice Center." The Post-Dispatch continues, "He will be joined by U.S. Sen. Jim Talent; Diane Stuart, director of the Justice Department's Office of Violence Against Women; Catherine L. Hanaway, the U.S. attorney in St. Louis; Mayor Francis Slay and other leaders. … The Family Justice Center…was funded with a $1.25 million Justice Department grant. It is billed as a one-stop resource for women and their families looking to escape domestic abuse."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Florida Men Plead Guilty To Hedge Fund Scam. South Florida Business Journal (1/11) reports, "Two South Florida men have pleaded guilty to fraud in a hedge fund scam, the government has said. The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida, the FBI and the Florida Office of Financial Regulation said Anthony Giordano…pleaded guilty to federal securities fraud and wire fraud. They said Joseph Zumwalt…pleaded guilty to mail fraud in connection with the former EPG Limited Partners of Fort Lauderdale." The Journal adds, "The government said the defendants admitted representing to investors, including two religious organizations, that they would invest their monies in a hedge fund administered by EPG. Instead, the government said, Giordano converted millions of dollars for other uses, including personal gain."

SEC Corporate Behavior Expert To Step Down. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Scannell) reports, "Alan Beller, a major figure in the Securities and Exchange Commission's drive to overhaul corporate governance, will leave the agency next month, giving SEC Chairman Christopher Cox another high-level vacancy to fill." The Journal continues, "Mr. Beller's departure comes as the SEC is unveiling the most sweeping overhaul of executive-compensation disclosure in 14 years. … A proposed rule outlining the changes is expected to be discussed at a public hearing Tuesday, and after a public comment period it could take effect for the 2007 proxy season." The Journal adds, "The executive-compensation proposal is the capstone for Mr. Beller, 56 years old, who joined the agency in 2002 to head its corporation-finance division. … He oversaw the implementation of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law and an update to securities-offering laws, which allow for greater communication including electronic versions of preoffering 'roadshows' for investors before initial public offerings of stock. … Mr. Beller also has overseen the proposal or implementation of other rules, such as one to speed up the time companies have to file periodic reports, Internet delivery of proxies to investors, and a rule that makes it easier for foreign-based companies to deregister from U.S. reporting requirements. He also helped set up a small-business advisory committee, which is charged with providing guidance to the agency on the costs of regulations to small businesses. … He will 'be recognized as one of the giants of the SEC of all time,' Mr. Cox said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

At Least Two Lawmakers Could Face Charges In Abramoff Probe. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) reported, "CNN has learned at least two members of Congress could face charges following the plea deal reached with former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. One of them is Congressman Bob Ney of Ohio, who stands accused of performing political favors for Abramoff in exchange of gifts, including a golf trip to Scotland. Ney has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing. There is no word on the identity of the other member of Congress, now apparently under close scrutiny. The sources say four other people could face charges as well, including current and former staff members of Congress, and including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay."

CNN.com (1/12, Arena, Bohn) reports, "Up to a half dozen people, including two members of Congress, could face charges after high-powered lobbyist Jack Abramoff's plea deal with the Justice Department, sources with knowledge of the investigation tell CNN." CNN continues, "Abramoff has been cooperating with Justice Department prosecutors and FBI agents for several months in their investigation of his dealings, including his allegations of exchanging gifts for political favors. … Authorities have focused on about 20 people who possibly committed wrongful acts, government sources have previously told CNN. The number is a moving target as new information comes in." CNN adds, "Sources with knowledge of the investigation say at least two members of Congress are under scrutiny as part of the ongoing investigation. One is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who sources say was the person identified in Abramoff's plea agreement as the official who took action for Abramoff after receiving from him such things as a golf trip to Scotland. … Ney has steadfastly denied wrongdoing, has pledged to cooperate with the investigation and has said he is confident he will be cleared. … The sources would not identify the other member, and they told CNN that no charges appear imminent." CNN notes, "Also under scrutiny, the sources say, are some current and former congressional staffers, including at least two people who used to work for then-House Majority Leader Rep. Tom DeLay. DeLay, R-Texas, and Abramoff had a long working relationship. … Investigators are also examining the activities of some officials at the Interior Department and the General Services Administration, sources tell CNN. One former GSA official, David Safavian, was indicted in October on charges of obstructing a GSA proceeding, obstructing a U.S. Senate proceeding and making false statements in connection with the investigation."

Abramoff Case Said To Provide Unprecedented Look At How Washington Works. The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Grier, 61K) says the Abramoff case "provides an unprecedented look at the way Washington really works. That doesn't mean everyone on K Street is corrupt, as Abramoff and his former partner, public relations consultant Michael Scanlon, now have admitted they were. … But US investigations of Abramoff and Scanlon produced pointillistic detail about their daily political activities, much of which were perfectly legal. Hundreds of pages of e-mails and congressional testimony released by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs trace the pair as they scrabble for access, scratch backs, beg for money, and dole out contributions in return." The Monitor adds that "within the e-mail trail are hints that Abramoff didn't have quite the juice he claimed. He was taken by surprise when [Interior Secretary Gale] Norton named Aurene Martin acting head of Indian Affairs in January 2003 - just the sort of thing a well-connected lobbyist should know in advance."

Former Jefferson Aide Implicates Lawmaker In Bribery Plea Deal. USA Today (1/12, 6A, 2.31M) reports, "A former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges that he helped a congressman solicit bribes to arrange two telecommunications deals." Brett Pfeffer, "37, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and aiding and abetting bribery of a public official. He agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and testify if needed. He could get 20 years in prison when sentenced March 31. Pfeffer said in court that a congressman had solicited his assistance in promoting telecom deals in Nigeria and Ghana." Jefferson "demanded 5% to 7% of the newly formed African companies in exchange for his help promoting the deal, according to Pfeffer."

Reuters (1/12, Sullivan) relates that Jefferson "is not named in Pfeffer's plea agreement, which only describes a 'Representative A' who employed Pfeffer from 1995 to 1998. News accounts from that period cite Pfeffer as Jefferson's legislative director. According to court papers, Pfeffer's investment firm in 2004 agreed to invest $45 million to provide high-speed Internet and cable TV service to Nigeria over the existing copper telephone wires there. Jefferson recruited Pfeffer's company for the deal and connected it to a Kentucky technology provider whose equipment would be used in the venture. As the agreement was signed he told Pfeffer he would require an ownership stake, according to court papers. 'Pfeffer understood that Representative A was soliciting a bribe in return for Representative A's official assistance in furthering the Nigerian Deal. Pfeffer…later advised (his boss) that it was part of the cost of doing business with Representative A,' the plea deal said."

CQ (1/12, Ferrechio) reports that Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, referring to Pfeffer, said in a written statement, "This defendant admitted to a crime which, at its core, is a bribery scheme involving a public official. Such schemes deprive citizens of the integrity and honest services expected of our government. The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these illegal schemes."

The Washington Post (1/12, A5, Lengel, 744K) says that along with demanding "a 5 to 7 percent stake in one of two new companies Pfeffer's firm was investing in," Pfeffer "said the congressman also demanded that two relatives be put on the businesses' payrolls." The Post adds, "At one point last year, the FBI set up a sting in which Pfeffer's investment company boss recorded conversations, according to law enforcement sources who declined to be identified because the investigation is ongoing. FBI agents also raided several locations, including Jefferson's homes in the District and New Orleans, where they found about $90,000 in cash in a freezer, sources said."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A6, Aqueo, 2.11M) notes that Jefferson, "an eight-term congressmen, is a senior member of the House Ways and Means Committee and its subcommittee on trade, and also co-chairs the Africa Trade and Investment Caucus." The New York Times/AP (1/12) adds that Jefferson "was elected to the House in 1990, becoming the first black congressman from Louisiana since Reconstruction." FoxNews (1/11) also reports this story.

Former New Orleans Subcontractor Pleads Guilty To Paying Kickbacks. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/12, Eggler, 257K) reports, "Federal prosecutors rang up another conviction Wednesday in their probe of a scheme to skim hundreds of thousands of dollars from a huge energy-efficiency contract awarded during former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial's tenure at City Hall. Under an agreement with prosecutors, Michael Garnett, a subcontractor who did work under the $81 million Johnson Controls Inc. deal, pleaded guilty to misprision of a felony for knowing about crimes related to the scheme but failing to inform authorities, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. Garnett is the fifth subcontractor to enter a guilty plea related to the Johnson Controls contract, Letten said. … Letten said Garnett admitted providing kickbacks to Kerry DeCay, director of the Department of Property Management under Morial, in connection with the subcontract given to Garnett's company, Golden Hammer Construction." The Times-Picayune notes, "Letten urged other business owners to refuse to be corrupted and to report any approaches for kickbacks to the FBI. Garnett, whose case was investigated by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, entered his plea before U.S. District Judge Martin Feldman."

Parish Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Katrina-Related Fraud Charges. The AP (1/12) reports St. Tammany Parish Councilman Joe Impastato on Tuesday "pleaded not guilty to federal charges of extorting at least $50,000 from a businessman in an alleged attempt to broker a contract of dispose of debris from Hurricane Katrina. … U.S. Magistrate Louis Moore Jr. allowed Impastato to remain free on $5,000 bond he posted after his arrest in November." The AP notes, "A grand jury accused Impastato of contacting Pontchartrain Chipping and offering to negotiate a debris-dumping deal for the company in exchange for part of the $200,000 contract. Authorities said Impastato was arrested after the company's owner contacted the FBI, which set up a sting operation."

Lawyer Says FBI Stringently Interrogated Witness In Cruise Line Disappearance. Under the headline "F.B.I. Said To Grill Man, 20, On Cruise Disappearance," The New York Times (1/12, Cowan, 1.19M) reports, "The lawyer for one of the men last seen with a Connecticut newlywed before he vanished on a Mediterranean cruise last summer said federal agents had pressured his client for information about the man's disappearance and threatened to charge him with the rape of a female passenger if he declined to cooperate." Attorney Albert Y. Dayan "said that his client, Rustislav Kofman, denied any role in the disappearance of…George Allen Smith IV…or in any rape. He said that when crew members aboard the ship…approached his client about a missing person, Mr. Kofman thought they were talking about Mr. Smith's wife, Jennifer. He said she was not in the Smiths' cabin when his client and three of his friends put her husband to bed after a night of heavy drinking." Dayan "said he and his co-counsel had decided to speak out because they thought their client was being scapegoated. 'Agents have barraged this young man with question after question in three different interrogations,' Mr. Dayan said. 'Some were five to eight hours long, and some were with no food till it was over.' He said that if his client 'were any weaker psychologically, he would have confessed to anything.'" The Times notes, "A spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in New Haven said yesterday that her office would not comment."

Former Alabama Sheriff, Attorney Convicted Of Misusing Crime Computer. WIAT-TV, CBS 42, Birmingham, AL (1/12, Moseley) reports, "A federal jury returned a verdict against an ex-Jefferson County sheriff and his attorney. It's a case that stretches back a few years…one that had Jim Woodward and Albert Jordon accused of illegally using the national crime computer." WIAT-TV continues, "The justice department filed criminal charges back in 2000, accusing Woodward and his attorney of misusing the N.C.I.C. computer. … Prosecutors contend they conducting background checks on absentee voters during the 1998 sheriff's race, a charge they denied. And a jury agreed." WIAT-TV adds, "Jim Woodward and Albert Jordan sat through a second day of jury deliberations, and when it was over the federal panel found them guilty of two felony counts. … Woodward was found guilty of conspiracy and illegal use of property. Jordan was also found guilty of conspiracy and misuse of public money, property or records."

Puerto Rico Attorney Indicted In Fast-Food Fraud Scheme. The AP (1/12) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted a San Juan attorney Wednesday in connection with a scheme to defraud fast-food giant Tricon Restaurants International, the Justice Department said." The AP continues, "ugenio A. Guardiola Ramirez was charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice and obstruction of justice in an investigation into illegal kickback payments paid by an electrical contractor, said Justice Department spokesman Orlando Rios. … Tricon's brands include Kentucky Fried Chicken, Pizza Hut and Taco Bell. Its Puerto Rico stores are operated by Encanto Restaurants of Puerto Rico, Rios said." The AP adds, "Prosecutors allege Guardiola obstructed an investigation into payments made by the Gate Engineering Corporation to a Tricon employee in exchange for more than $1 million worth of electrical contracts, Rios said. … He is accused of mischaracterizing the payments to a grand jury, interfering with witnesses and drafting a phony services contract, Rios said."

In 5-4 Vote, SCOTUS Reinstates California Inmate's Death Sentence. The AP (1/12, Holland) reports, "A divided Supreme Court reinstated a California inmate's death sentence on Wednesday, the first 5-4 vote under newly installed Chief Justice John Roberts." The AP continues, "Justices overturned an appeals court ruling that declared Ronald Sanders' sentence unconstitutional. Sanders was put on death row for the 1982 killing of a woman during a drug-related robbery in Bakersfield, Calif. … Justice Antonin Scalia wrote the ruling, the Court's first death penalty decision since Roberts replaced Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist last fall." The AP adds, "The case presented a technical question for the Court involving jurors' consideration of invalid aggravating factors. … Special circumstances used by prosecutors in their case against Sanders -- that the crime was committed during a burglary and was cruel or heinous -- were later found invalid. … California argued that Sanders would have been sentenced to death even without those arguments. The Supreme Court's five conservative members agreed. … 'The erroneous factor could not have "skewed" the sentence, and no constitutional violation occurred,' Scalia wrote in an opinion joined by Roberts, retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas. … In a dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens said 'this decision is more likely to complicate than to clarify our capital sentencing jurisprudence.'"

High Court Considers DNA Case Of Tennessee Death Row Inmate. The Supreme Court heard arguments in the case of a Tennessee death row inmate who claims new DNA evidence casts doubt on his guilt in a 1985 murder. According to Reuters (1/12, Vicini), a majority of the Justices "appeared prepared… to overturn the sentence or the conviction." Reuters reports, "The court's four most liberal members, joined by moderate conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, seemed supportive of arguments by the attorney for convicted murderer Paul House that a reasonable juror now would not find him guilty."

USA Today (1/12, Biskupic, 2.31M) adds that a majority of the Court "expressed concern… about blood and semen evidence used" to send House to death row.

The New York Times (1/12, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer were particularly steeped in the details and were deeply engaged on opposite sides of the case, debating it back and forth almost to the exclusion of the lawyers standing before them."

Delaware Court Overturns Death Sentence In Murder Of Governor's Secretary. The AP (1/12) reports, "Delaware's highest court on Wednesday overturned the death sentence of a once well-connected attorney convicted of the 1996 murder of the governor's scheduling secretary." The AP continues, "The sentence was flawed because the jury vote recommending a death sentence for Thomas Capano was not unanimous, the Delaware Supreme Court ruled. The high court ordered a new penalty hearing, but did not overturn his conviction, prosecutor Steven Wood said." The AP adds, "Prosecutors say Capano shot Anne Marie Fahey, 30, scheduling secretary to then-Governor Tom Carper, and dumped her body in the Atlantic Ocean because she was breaking off an affair with him. … Capano, a former state prosecutor, is a member of a well-known family involved in land development. … His attorneys had argued that his death sentence, issued in 1999, should be overturned because his jury was not unanimous in determining that Fahey's slaying was premeditated. The state high court found that the Delaware Constitution demands unanimous jury verdicts in death-penalty sentencing, even if federal law does not."

In Widely-Watched Case, Antique Gun Dealer Sentenced To Prison For Fraud. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/12, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "A once-distinguished antique-firearms dealer who duped a Bucks County millionaire while helping him amass a $30 million gun collection was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison yesterday. … U.S. District Judge Cynthia M. Rufe said that she hoped the prison sentence for the dealer, Michael Zomber of Franklin, Tenn., would deter others who might try to defraud antiques collectors. … Zomber was convicted of fraud at trial. His accomplice, Richard Ellis, of LeClaire, Iowa, pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government. … 'The entire industry was poised to find out what happened to Ellis and Zomber,' said FBI agent Bob Wittman, who handled the case. 'There's an element that's going to be happy that it's a new day, and there's an element that's going to be upset that their antics are going to be put under the microscope.'"

Grand Jury Indicts North Carolina Man For VAMC Murder. The AP (1/12) reports, "A man accused of killing a co-worker and former lover at the Veteran's Administration hospital in Fayetteville was indicted on a murder charge Wednesday by a federal grand jury." Arthur James Charland Jr. "was also charged with use and discharge of a firearm during an in relation to a crime of violence, according to a statement by U.S. Attorney Frank D. Whitney. Charland is accused of fatally shooting Linda Faye Owens, with whom he had an 11-year affair." The AP notes, "At a hearing last month, FBI Special Agent Chris Hedges testified that Charland told investigators he was being treated for bipolar disorder."

Inmate On Trial For Killing Ex-Priest Convicted Of Molestation. The New York Times

(1/12, Belluck) reports, "The murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest, in 2003 by an inmate in state prison was a shocking and almost surreal dénouement to one of the darkest chapters of the sexual abuse crisis in the Roman Catholic Church." The Times continues, "Mr. Geoghan's violent death in the most secure prison in Massachusetts was to some an appalling failure of the state to protect one of its most despised inmates. To others it was a horrible but justified retribution against Mr. Geoghan, one of the most reviled priests named in the abuse scandal, accused of molesting some 150 children in several parishes over three decades. … Now, the man who admits he killed Mr. Geoghan, Joseph L. Druce, is having his day in court, and for anyone watching the trial, it is hard to figure out where to put one's sympathies - with the murder victim or the man who killed him." The Times adds, "Mr. Druce, 40, is pleading not guilty by reason of mental illness. His lawyer, John LaChance, does not dispute the details of the case. Prosecutors say Mr. Druce followed Mr. Geoghan into his cell at the Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center on Aug. 23, 2003, and jammed the cell door shut with a nail clipper and a ripped-up copy of 'The Cross and the Switchblade,' a book about a minister who transformed the lives of teenage gang members by introducing them to Christianity. … Mr. Druce then tied Mr. Geoghan's hands with a T-shirt, wrapped stretched-out socks around Mr. Geoghan's neck, tightened them with a shoe, and then jumped up and down on his body. … According to testimony by corrections officers on Wednesday, Mr. Druce later told them he 'did it for the children,' to stop Mr. Geoghan, 68, from molesting more boys when he got out of prison."

Catholic Bishop Acknowledges Own Abuse As Teen By Priest. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "A Roman Catholic Bishop has made a startling admission. Thomas Gumbleton of Detroit says that he was sexually abused when he was 15 years old by a priest. The Bishop, who's now 75, is believed to be the highest-ranking Catholic clergyman in this country to make such an admission. He was in Ohio today where he endorsed proposed laws there and in other states that would lift the statute of limitations on suing churches for sex abuse. A study commissioned by America's bishops found that over the past half century, nearly 4,400 priests were accused of abusing more than 10,000 people."

National Guard Soldiers Sue US For Post-9/11 Expenses. The AP (1/12, Lindsay) reports, "A group of National Guard soldiers who were ordered to protect possible targets after the Sept. 11 attacks sued the federal government Wednesday, seeking tens of millions of dollars in expenses they say were never reimbursed." The AP continues, "The soldiers, from Massachusetts and New Hampshire, say they traveled hundreds of miles to security postings and used their own money to pay for food and lodging with the expectation that they would be reimbursed. … But the soldiers say in their complaint that their requests for compensation were repeatedly denied and they eventually were told, 'If you don't like the arrangement, we'll make sure you get taken off this mission.'" The AP adds, "In the lawsuit, the plaintiffs argue that federal law provides military personnel with a travel and transportation allowance while away from home on active duty. … The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court by four soldiers but seeks to include hundreds of other guardsmen as a class action. It names the U.S. Department of Defense and the Massachusetts National Guard and seeks $73 million in unpaid expenses. … A spokeswoman for the Defense Department referred calls to the Justice Department, where a spokesman declined to comment until after the agency reviews the lawsuit."

DOJ Will Not Intervene In Whistleblower Suit Against MedcoHealth Solutions. The AP (1/12) reports, "Pharmacy benefits manager Medco Health Solutions Inc. said the Justice Department will not intervene in a whistleblower lawsuit filed against the company in a Pennsylvania court last month." The AP continues, "New Jersey-based Medco said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the U.S. Department of Justice notified the company on Tuesday of its decision not to intervene. … Medco said it first learned of 'qui tam' lawsuit in mid-December, when the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania lifted the seal on the case." The AP adds, "In an earlier filing, the company said the complaint makes allegations concerning turnaround time and performance-guarantee reporting -- the same charges drawn in a 2003 lawsuit. The complaint 'does not allege any health, safety or clinical violations,' Medco said."

Ex-Worker Sues Genentech Over Marketing Practices. Dow Jones (1/12) reports, "A former Genentech Inc. employee has accused the biotechnology company and marketing partner Biogen Idec Inc. of illegally promoting cancer drug Rituxan as a treatment for arthritis, a use not yet approved by regulators." Dow Jones continues, "Paul McDermott, who worked for Genentech in Falmouth, Maine, from March 2004 until April 2005, filed a whistleblower lawsuit in July 2005 in U.S. District Court in Maine alleging the companies' marketing of Rituxan defrauded government health-care programs." Dow Jones adds, "The suit also says Genentech fired McDermott in retaliation for bringing the matter to the attention of Genentech executives. The suit seeks unspecified damages on behalf of the government, and an order that Genentech rehire McDermott and pay him back wages and other damages. … McDermott's lawsuit hasn't surfaced until now because it was filed under seal on behalf of the federal government. In December, however, the Justice Department declined to intervene in the case and requested that the lawsuit be unsealed. … McDermott's lawsuit is the latest legal challenge facing Genentech (DNA) over Rituxan's marketing. In October 2004, Genentech (DNA) received a subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia seeking documents related to the promotion of Rituxan. Genentech (DNA) is cooperating with that investigation, which it said was both civil and criminal in nature."

US Seizes Mislabeled Bread. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/12, Lopez) reports, "Allergists and food allergy activists alike were shaken Wednesday upon learning that the French Meadow Bakery labeled its spelt bread 'wheat-free' when the bread, in fact, contains wheat." The Tribune continues, "For the hundreds of thousands of Americans who are wheat-intolerant or who have a genuine wheat allergy, mislabeled food is no small matter, said Anne Munoz-Furlong, founder of the national Food Allergy and Anaphylaxis Network, based in Fairview, Va. … Wheat allergy reactions, she said, can range from hives and digestive problems to -- at the most extreme end -- death from the inability to breathe." The Tribune adds, "French Meadow, revered by health enthusiasts for its varieties of organic bread, had 30,000 loaves made from spelt and Kamut grain seized Tuesday afternoon by U.S. marshals and agents from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. The agency had spent nearly a year attempting to get the bakery to relabel its bread, noting that both spelt and Kamut are varieties of wheat. … U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is handling the case, said the agents locked most of the loaves in freezers, where they will remain until the case is decided or a court order issued. 'The FDA takes the accuracy of food labeling very seriously,' Heffelfinger said. … French Meadow has 20 days to respond to the FDA's complaint, he said. He did not know whether any consumer complaints were involved. … The company could face administrative penalties and sanctions for the government's costs in prosecuting the case, he said, 'but that hasn't been determined yet. This is primarily about resolving the labeling issue.'"

SCOTUS Ruling On Wine Shipments Slowly Bearing Fruit For Wineries. The AP (1/12, Locke) reports, "A lot has happened since the U.S. Supreme Court opened the door to shipping wine across state lines. But change hasn't been swift in an industry that sometimes seems as rich in red tape as it is red grapes. … 'We're in a highly regulated industry. This isn't like selling sweaters,' said Jeremy Benson, executive director of Free The Grapes, a Napa, Calif.-based group that has been working to loosen shipping restrictions. 'The regulations are there and we have to work through them.'" The AP continues, "The Supreme Court struck down laws last spring in New York and Michigan that allowed wineries to ship directly to in-state consumers but forbade out-of-state businesses from doing the same thing. … The court said either all wineries should be allowed to ship directly to consumers or none, a blow to the old distribution system that required a wholesaler to sell to restaurants and retailers. States have been acting to adjust their shipping laws ever since." The AP notes, "The ruling was particularly important to smaller wineries that don't have the volume for wide distribution in liquor stores and supermarkets and rely on direct sales to consumers, many of whom have developed a taste for their products on winery visits. … Since the Supreme Court ruling, New York, Michigan and Ohio have loosened shipping restrictions. Texas also made shipping easier just prior to the high court ruling."

GPO Contracts With Kinko's For Small Printing Jobs. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, 744K) reports that the Government Printing Office is "hiring Kinko's to handle small printing jobs for federal agencies. The contract, worth about $100 million annually and renewable

McCain-Feingold Said To Provide "Semi-Respectable" Cover For Incumbents. James Bopp, general counsel for the James Madison Center for Free Speech, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) that campaign finance reform "passed by Congress in McCain-Feingold and approved by the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC is mutating and spreading in the states. … State politicians are taking McCain-Feingold and McConnell as a license to enact much broader restrictions on core political speech. This term the court has a chance to decide whether these restrictions are justified, and what remains of the First Amendment in regard to democratic elections." Bopp adds, "The guise of 'reform' offers incumbents semi-respectable cover for their assault on free elections. Unless stopped, this virus will kill the First Amendment and democratic self-government."

AMC Entertainment Settles ADA Claims With DOJ. The AP (1/12, Twiddy) reports, "AMC Entertainment Inc., the nation's second-largest movie theater chain, was ordered to upgrade seating for patrons in wheelchairs at 1,200 of its stadium-style movie auditoriums and pay $300,000 in penalties and civil damages to settle a U.S. lawsuit." The AP continues, "Justice Department officials said Wednesday the order settles its 1999 lawsuit against the company claiming AMC violated the Americans with Disabilities Act because it doesn't provide comparable seating for people in wheelchairs." The AP adds, "The Kansas City-based company also must ensure that all theaters built over the next five years comply with requirements set out Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Florence-Marie Cooper in Los Angeles. … The stadium-style seating now dominating movie theaters gives everyone unobstructed views of the screen. But critics say most wheelchair spaces are at the base of the stadium tiers, forcing those patrons to crane their necks to see the movie. … As part of the order, privately held AMC, which operates more than 3,300 screens, must build ramps in more than 360 theaters, providing wheelchair spaces on higher seating tiers. The company also must pay $200,000 to theatergoers who originally complained to the Justice Department about the seating arrangements and $100,000 in fines. … 'Providing the same moviegoing experience for individuals in wheelchairs that other patrons enjoy delivers on the promise of the ADA,' Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said in a release. 'These improvements will make the goals of the ADA a reality for thousands of Americans who want to enjoy this popular form of entertainment.'"

Hispanic Workers Get Another Chance To Challenge Oklahoma City's English-Only Policy. The AP (1/12) reports, "A federal appeals court ruling Wednesday resurrects claims Hispanic workers made in a lawsuit challenging an English-only policy for city workers in Altus, Okla." The AP continues, "Twelve bilingual Hispanic workers filed complaints with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission after the city adopted the policy in 2002. They argued that the city failed to show there was a need to prevent them from speaking Spanish. They said the policy singled out a nationality." The AP adds, "City officials had argued the policy was necessary because some workers and supervisors couldn't understand what was being said on city radios, some workers felt uncomfortable because they could not understand Spanish, and there were safety concerns about workers understanding each other around heavy equipment. … The Justice Department declined to take action, prompting employees to file a lawsuit in federal court in Oklahoma City. U.S. District Judge David Russell dismissed the complaint, saying the city had the authority to adopt the policy in managing its employees. … On Wednesday a three-judge panel of the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the case back to district court with respect to the plaintiffs' claims of disparate treatment, discrimination and violation of equal protection laws."

California School District Sued Over Intelligent Design. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Sahagun, Bailey, 958K) reports that the town of Lebec, California has become "the latest focal point in the national debate over teaching 'intelligent design" in public schools.' On Tuesday, parents filed suit "against El Tejon Unified School District, the first legal challenge to the teaching of intelligent design in California. … The hullabaloo erupted after disgruntled parents joined with Americans United for Separation of Church and State to challenge a course at Frazier Mountain High School that they consider a minimally disguised endorsement of intelligent design. School trustees approved the new course, 'Philosophy of Design,' at a special meeting on New Year's Day. Attorneys for the district suggested the course could survive a legal challenge if it was called 'philosophy,' the lawsuit said, and the board approved it on a 3-2 vote."

Maytag, Whirlpool Shares Recover After Antitrust Worries. The AP (1/12) reports, "Shares of Maytag Corp. and Whirlpool Corp. stock recovered slightly Wednesday after taking a hit the day before amid speculation that federal regulators may challenge the firms' merger." The AP continues, "Whirlpool closed Tuesday at $83.10 after dropping $1.89, or 2.2 percent, for the day while Maytag fell 4.7 percent, or 88 cents, to close at $17.89. … Wednesday, Whirlpool shares closed at $83.05 and Maytag finished at $17.98." The AP adds, "Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., agreed in August to buy Maytag for $1.7 billion in cash and stock. Both companies have said they expect the deal to close as early as the first quarter of this year. … Shareholders of Newton, Iowa-based Maytag voted Dec. 22 to approve the merger, pending regulatory approval. The U.S. Justice Department is investigating whether the merger of Whirlpool, the leading appliance seller, and Maytag, the third largest, violates antitrust laws." The AP notes, "Industry analyst David MacGregor, of Ohio-based Longbow Research, said the stock fluctuation was based on nothing more than market scuttlebutt. … He said the market reacted to the buzz that regulators were concerned that the merger would place too much of the middle-priced laundry machines in one company's control. Mid-priced washing machines, for example, sell for $350 to $600, MacGregor said."

The Detroit Free Press (1/12, Bodipo-Memba) reports, "An article that appeared on the financial news website TheDeal.com, citing people it didn't name, said antitrust concerns might lead to the U.S. Department of Justice seeking an injunction blocking the merger. In August, Benton Harbor-based Whirlpool agreed to purchase Maytag of Newton, Iowa for $1.7 billion in cash and stock, following a flurry of offers and counter offers by several suitors. … The proposed deal, which is expected to be completed in the first quarter of this year, would combine the nation's No. 1 and No. 3 makers of household appliances under one roof. But, antitrust concerns about merging two of that nation's biggest makers of refrigerators, dishwashers and dryers surrounded the deal for months."

Northwest Airlines Drops Request For SkyTeam Antitrust Immunity. The AP (1/12, Freed) reports, "Northwest Airlines Corp. is withdrawing a request for antitrust immunity for its SkyTeam airline alliance, saying the Transportation Department had signaled it would reject the request anyway." The AP continues, "Northwest entered SkyTeam last year after its partner, KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, merged with SkyTeam member Air France. Northwest has antitrust immunity to coordinate routes and pricing with KLM, but not with other SkyTeam members, which also includes Delta Air Lines Inc., Alitalia, Continental Airlines Inc. and CSA Czech Airlines. The request was submitted by all the carriers, and Northwest said its withdrawal request would apply to the full alliance. … Northwest and Skyteam members can still codeshare, which makes it easier for passengers to book trips on a single ticket with multiple airlines. But the Transportation Department had said the Skyteam routes overlap so much that little new service was likely to result from an antitrust waiver." The AP adds, "In a statement, Northwest called the initial Transportation Department finding 'arbitrary, capricious and inconsistent with established DOT precedent and U.S. international aviation policy' … 'Northwest is at a loss to understand this decision by the same DOT officials claiming to strongly support deregulation and an Administration which espouses a free market philosophy,' Northwest said. 'The U.S. airline industry is in a state of crisis. Four major air carriers, including Northwest and Delta, are operating under Chapter 11, as are several national carriers.' … Regional feeder Mesaba is also in Chapter 11, having filed just one month after Northwest, which provides all of Mesaba's planes, revenues, and passengers."

Some See Realtors' Group Tactics As Overly Aggressive. The New York Times (1/12, Justice) reports, "When the nation's largest banks decided at the start of the decade that they wanted to get into the real estate brokerage business, one major obstacle stood in their way: the National Association of Realtors." The Times continues, "Lobbyists for the huge trade group stonewalled the banks by tying up new rules at the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve. Then the big score came in 2002 when the Realtors persuaded Congress to adopt a one-year moratorium to stop the banks altogether. It was a card the Realtors would play again and again. Four years later, bankers still have not cracked the real estate market. … 'They are known as very aggressive,' said Edward L. Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. 'Not many trade associations are willing to be that tough on an issue.' … But the ability of the National Association of Realtors to beat back competitors is being tested now as few times before. A broad range of critics say the organization and its state and local affiliates have worked to smother competition and protect the decades-old system that provides traditional brokers 5 percent to 6 percent commissions on most home sales." The Times adds, "The Justice Department sued the association last year, asserting that the group's rules for online property listings discriminate against Internet-based brokers. Battles have also raged in the states as Realtor organizations pursued policies that opponents say would hurt discount brokers. The Consumer Federation of America is rewing up to fight any such industry-sponsored legislation state by state in coming months. … Even some industry allies say the association may be too aggressive in protecting its interests. 'They might have small victories, but they are losing the battle,' said Representative Pat Tiberi, an Ohio Republican who worked in real estate before joining Congress. 'I think they should be relooking some of their tactics.' … Officials at the National Association of Realtors are quick to defend the organization. Stephen Cook, the group's spokesman, said the organization and the industry were not under siege. Rather, Mr. Cook said, the current climate is the byproduct of a hot housing market that has focused much national attention on the industry. 'The system can always be improved, but we don't think it is broken,' Mr. Cook said."

Johnson & Johnson Not Ready To Give Up On Guidant Bid. Dow Jones (1/12) reports, "Johnson & Johnson appears unwilling to let its planned Guidant Corp. purchase slip away without a fight, a shift given J&J's prior unwillingness to budge from its offer for the medical device maker, but a move that reflects the new reality of intense competition." Dow Jones continues, "J&J's current purchase price for Guidant, about $64 a share, is the much- reduced product of an acrimonious spat between the companies following troubles with Guidant's heart rhythm devices last year. Given the dispute, many thought J&J was locked into that price, even as a surprise $72 a share offer from rival Boston Scientific Corp. dramatically changed the landscape." Dow Jones adds, "The offer, officially made Sunday at $25 billion, vaulted Boston Scientific (BSX) to apparent frontrunner status, but several reports this week suggest J&J is willing to change its tune. The Wall Street Journal reported that Guidant's board plans to meet at 3:00 p.m. EST Wednesday to decide between the Boston Scientific offer and a new, potentially much more competitive J&J offer. … The New York Times reported earlier Wednesday that J&J approached Guidant's board at the last minute late Tuesday, heading off a vote in favor of Boston Scientific , to negotiate a new deal. CNBC also reported Wednesday that J&J plans to raise its offer. … Boston Scientific, meanwhile, may be willing to answer a any J&J move. 'Don't count us out,' Boston Scientific spokesman Paul Donovan said Wednesday, declining to elaborate further."

Investors Eye Battle For P&O After Singapore Bid Hint. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Stanley, Prystay, Singer) reports, "Smelling a battle between a pair of rich bidders amid a boom in cargo volume, investors pushed shares of port operator Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. of Britain up 6.3% yesterday after PSA International Pte. Ltd. of Singapore said it might make a bid for it at as much as £3.54 billion ($6.25 billion)." The Journal continues, "PSA, a unit of Singapore's state-owned investment company Temasek Holdings Pte. Ltd., said after the London market closed Tuesday that it could pay as much as 470 pence a share for P&O, as the company is known. That would trump a bid of 443 pence a share, or £3.3 billion, that Dubai Ports World, of the United Arab Emirates, made in November and that P&O's board then recommended to its shareholders. … Still, it isn't certain PSA will make a bid for P&O, one of Britain's oldest companies, founded in 1840. Singapore port operator PSA, which has been granted access to the same nonpublic financial information that was given to Dubai Ports, has a little more than two weeks to review the data and decide. Dubai Ports, meanwhile, has said it is reviewing the situation carefully."

Investigators Give Detailed Account Of Sago Mine Rescue Attempt. Investigators offered a detailed account yesterday of rescue efforts after the accident at the Sago Mine in West Virginia that eventually left 12 miners dead. The story was covered by each of the networks in the first half of their newscasts, and was the lead on CBS.

The CBS Evening News (1/10, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "While it took officials above ground 11 hours to organize a rescue effort, just one hour after the explosion, a group of miners below ground organized their own rescue effort and got much closer than anyone realized to the trapped men. Eventually they, too, were turned back by the poison gas and the 12 men died."

The New York Times (1/12, Barringer, 1.19M) reports that regulators "said they had heard nothing to confirm an account by relatives of the only survivor that the men had tried to force their way out in a rail car but that their escape route had been blocked by debris. Rescuers found no such blockage, the regulators said."

ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 3, 2:35, Woodruff) reported rescuers "took major risks to reach the men, not even knowing if they were alive." ABC (L. Stark) added, "This mine had hundreds of safety violations. And today, the company insisted that had nothing to do with the accident."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 3, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Today, 12 US senators from states in coal country called for hearings into the state of mining safety in this country, nine days now after the deaths of those 12 miners. And we're learning more about the number of violations at the Sago Mine. One Federal inspector has already used the word 'negligence.'" NBC (Costello) added, "Federal inspectors found the safety violations at the Sago Mine 'significant, substantial,' and often times indicated 'negligence.' 205 violations in the last year."

FBI Warns Of Coal Mine Accident Email Scam. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 4, 1:00, Williams) reported, "The FBI has issued a warning to all Americans to beware of emails using this mining disaster as a scam soliciting funds to help the soul survivor in this accident, Randall McCloy. Investigators have come across one email scam so far that is actually claiming to raise money for McCloy and they warn there could be more out there. The FBI is urging everyone not to open unsolicited email and to thoroughly check before giving to any charity. By the way, McCloy remains in critical condition."

Interior Department To Open Alaska Acreage To Oil Drilling. The Interior Department has agreed to open about 400,000 acres on Alaska's North Slope for exploratory oil drilling. Officials said the acreage will be leased to oil companies to provide access to domestic oil supplies. The Washington Post (1/12, A8, Blum, 744K) reports, "Government officials said that the area of the preserve opened yesterday has significant potential for oil development. They estimate it contains about 2 billion barrels of oil that is economically recoverable, along with 3.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. The United States consumes more than 20 million barrels of oil per day."

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Wilson, 958K) adds, "Bureau of Land Management staff said the decision was made after three years of study and in response to requests by Vice President Dick Cheney's energy task force."

Study Links Global Warming, Extinctions Of Frog Species. A study to be published in the journal "Nature" links global climate change to the extinction of some species of animals. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 5, 2:20, Blakemore) reported scientists "focused on these creatures. 70 different species of Harlequin frog, gone, from 11 countries in Central and South America, even though there's been no destruction of the wild places these animals live in. Scientists are now beginning to find serious declines of all kinds of species, each linked in one way or another, to global warm warming, all over the world. And tomorrow's study seals the link." Biologist Alan Pounds: "There's a very clear relationship between temperature and the timing of the die-offs." Blakemore: "American biologists Alan Pounds and his colleagues use data from more than 70 researchers across the Americas and from climatologists worldwide. They discovered over the past 20 years, the spikes in global temperatures, coincided in lock-step with years that Harlequin frog species were seen for the last time."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 8, 2:00, Williams) reported scientists "say climate change apparently increases the incidents of a fatal skin fungus. Several other experts disagree, but tonight they say what is happening to the frogs should be a warning to us all."

The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Eilperin) reports, "Rising temperatures are responsible for pushing dozens of frog species over the brink of extinction in the past three decades, according to findings being reported today by a team of Latin American and U.S. scientists." The Post continues, "The study, published in the journal Nature, provides compelling evidence that climate change has already helped wipe out a slew of species and could spur more extinctions and the spread of diseases worldwide. It also helps solve the international mystery of why amphibians around the globe have been vanishing from their usual habitats over the past quarter-century -- as many as 112 species have disappeared since 1980." The Post adds, "Scientists have speculated that rising temperatures and changing weather patterns could endanger the survival of many species, but the new study documents for the first time a direct correlation between global warming and the disappearance of around 65 amphibian species in Central and South America."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Naik) reports, "Conservationists have been puzzled for more than a decade by the mysterious disappearance of harlequin frogs from the pristine, high-altitude tropical forests of Costa Rica. Now a group of scientists believe they have pinpointed the likely cause: global warming that promotes a fungus that is fatal to the frogs. … The finding, published today in the journal Nature1, is likely to stoke the debate about whether climate change is affecting the dynamics of disease, and why amphibians are dying out in such massive numbers world-wide. Recent data indicates that, since 1980, as many as 122 amphibian species are likely to have become extinct and one-third of known amphibian species are threatened."

The New York Times (1/12, Revkin) reports, "If the analysis holds up, it will be the first to link recent climate changes to the spread of a fungus lethal to frogs and salamanders and their kin. The chytrid fungus, Batrachochytrium dendrobatidis, has devastated amphibian communities in many parts of the world over the last several decades. … But experts on amphibian disease and ecology are divided over the finding, which is being published today in the journal Nature. Several scientists criticized the paper yesterday, saying it glossed over significant sources of uncertainty; others said it was important evidence that warming caused by humans was already harming wildlife. Climate scientists have linked most of the recent rise in the earth's average temperature to the buildup of greenhouse emissions from smokestacks and tailpipes."

USA Today (1/12, Watson) reports, "The research team found a 'ear lock-step (link) between the timing of losses and changes in climate,'said lead scientist Alan Pounds of the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve and Tropical Science Center in Costa Rica. 't's a very striking pattern, and it's hard to find another explanation for it.' … The group did not identify the other contributing causes. Pounds and his team say the warmer temperatures of the late 20th century led to better growing conditions for a fungus that kills frogs and toads. … Other scientists expressed skepticism about the findings. Stephen Corn of the U.S. Geological Survey said the dates recorded for extinctions may not be entirely reliable. The University of Colorado's Cynthia Carey questioned why the new work ignores extinctions of related species after 1998."

US Seen As Vulnerable To Drug Shortages In Pandemic. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (1/12, Wysocki, Lueck, 2.11M) reports that in the event of a pandemic flu out break, the US drug supply chain "is almost certain to break. Thousands of drug-company workers in the U.S. and elsewhere could be sickened, prompting factories to close. Truck routes could be blocked and borders may be closed, particularly perilous at a time when 80% of raw materials for U.S. drugs come from abroad. The likely result: shortages of important medicines -- such as insulin, blood products or the anesthetics used in surgery -- quite apart from any shortages of medicine to treat the flu itself." The Journal adds that the US "is exceptionally vulnerable in a pandemic. Near-empty warehouses are a sign of strong inventory management. Production of drugs takes place offshore because that's cheaper. The federal government doesn't intervene as a guaranteed buyer of flu drugs, as it does with weapons. Investors and tax rules conspire to eliminate redundancy and reserves. Antitrust rules prevent private companies from collaborating to speed development of new drugs. Most fundamentally, the widely embraced 'just-in-time' business practice…is at odds with the logic of 'just in case' that promotes stockpiling drugs, government intervention and overall preparedness."

Ohio High Court To Hear First Eminent Domain Case Since SCOTUS Ruling. The AP (1/12, Welsh-Huggins) reports, "Ohio Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday pitting a suburban Cincinnati city against a couple trying to save their home in a long-anticipated hearing that included a rare outburst of applause by spectators." The AP continues, "The city of Norwood is trying to use eminent domain to seize remaining properties for a developer who wants to build a $125 million project of offices, shops and restaurants. The city says the tax revenue will boost its economic fortunes." The AP adds, "Homeowners Carl and Joy Gamble say the city abused its authority to seize property by declaring the neighborhood deteriorating, a less severe condition than blighted. … The case is the first challenge of property rights laws to reach a state high court since the U.S. Supreme Court last summer allowed municipalities to seize homes for use by a private developer." The AP notes, "Property rights' advocates, business groups and backers of city planning are watching the Ohio case because of the precedent it could set as more than a dozen states consider bans against governments taking homes to boost economic development. … A decision is expected by summer."

8th Circuit Takes Up 2003 Meskwaki Tribal Election Case. The AP (1/12) reports, "A federal appeals court in St. Louis was scheduled to hear arguments Thursday on whether a lower court judge erred by dismissing a lawsuit challenging the Meskwaki tribal elections in 2003." The AP continues, "The lawsuit stems from an internal power struggle that began nearly three years ago when the Meskwaki tribal council and its chairman, Alex Walker Jr., were overthrown by a new set of leaders. The new council, led by Homer Bear Jr., was picked by the tribe's hereditary chief after Walker's council ignored recall petitions." The AP adds, "The ensuing political dispute played out in state and federal courts and led to a costly, seven-month shutdown of the Meskwaki casino, located on the tribal settlement west of Tama. The tribe, with 1,200 members, officially is known as the Sac and Fox of the Mississippi in Iowa. … The dispute ultimately was settled after tribal members participated in a series of elections overseen by the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs. … As a result, four Walker council members were removed and the Bear council was put in power. The casino reopened in December 2003." The AP notes, "The lawsuit before the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals originally was filed in 2004 by the election officials appointed by Walker. … In their lawsuit, Walker supporters argue that the BIA mishandled oversight of the election and illegally interfered in the process. They also claim that Aurene Martin, assistant secretary of the BIA, violated agency policy when she rejected an appeal of the election results. … In March, U.S. District Judge Linda Reade, in Cedar Rapids, threw out the lawsuit, saying it was a matter for tribal courts to decide. Walker supporters are appealing that decision."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Study Finds Shorter Prison Terms For Crack Cocaine Convictions. The AP (1/11, Sherman) reports, "Some federal judges are handing out shorter prison terms for crack cocaine crimes since last year's Supreme Court decision giving judges more discretion in sentencing, a report said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Defendants in the study received prison terms averaging 11 years, but those terms were less than what is called for in 20-year-old sentencing guidelines, according to the Sentencing Project, a nonpartisan group that backs alternatives to lengthy prison sentences." The AP adds, "The Supreme Court ruled a year ago that judges do not have to follow the sentencing guidelines. … The analysis focused on crack because the congressionally established guidelines punish some crack cocaine offenses more severely than powder cocaine offenses. A person must possess 100 times more powder cocaine than crack cocaine to receive a comparable sentence, under the guidelines. … The report looked at a very small sample of 24 cases in which judges wrote opinions explaining the prison sentence and cited the Supreme Court ruling. There were more than 5,400 people sentenced for crack offenses in 2003, the latest year for which statistics are available." The AP notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has warned of growing disparity in jail terms and 'a drift toward lesser sentences' since the court ruling. … Congress created the guidelines in the 1980s mainly to reduce disparities between judges. But the high court said making the guidelines mandatory violated a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial because they call for judges to make factual decisions that could add to prison time, such as the amount of drugs involved in a crime."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Fields) reports, "In the wake of the Supreme Court's decision a year ago making sentencing guidelines advisory rather than requirements to be followed, some federal judges appear to be giving more lenient sentences in cases involving crack cocaine, according to an analysis released yesterday." The Journal continues, "Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican, said he intended to introduce a bill this year that will propose changing the law to reduce the disparity between the amounts of crack cocaine and powder cocaine necessary to give a defendant the same sentence. He and Utah Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch co-authored a bill in 2003 that would have reduced the disparity to 20-to-1 -- from 100-to-1 -- but it got little support." The Journal adds, "The Sentencing Commission, which declined to comment on the study, has long supported altering its guidelines on crack-cocaine crimes to bring the penalties and amounts more in line with powder cocaine. In 1995, the Sentencing Commission sent Congress an amendment which would have equalized the penalties on the two forms of cocaine, but Congress rejected the amendment. Similar recommendations from the commission in 1997 and 2002 were ignored by Congress."

NYTimes Says Mandatory Minimum Sentences Have Not Worked. An editorial in the New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) says mandatory sentencing laws "have clearly done more harm than good. The inmate population has skyrocketed, driving prison costs to bankrupting levels, while having no impact at all on the drug problem. By taking away judicial discretion, the laws have led the country to write off first-time offenders who might have deserved second chances and to imprison addicts who could otherwise have been effectively and less expensively handled through treatment programs." In New Jersey, a panel of criminal justice officials "has recommended that the state revise a law that mandates more severe sentences for people convicted of certain drug crimes committed within 1,000 feet of school property. The law appears to have had no impact at all on the actual pattern of drug dealing. But it has created a profoundly discriminatory sentencing pattern, which treats minority defendants unfairly while undermining confidence in the criminal justice system. … The broader message of this study is that the country can't just imprison its way out of the drug problem. Coping with this issue - while reducing prison costs - will require a complex set of strategies, including drug abuse treatment and prevention services and increased judicial discretion in sentencing."

Constituents Not Surprised Barry Failed Drug Test. The Washington Post (1/12, B1, Weiss, Pierre, 744K) reports that news that DC City Council Member Marion Barry failed a court-ordered drug test was not met with "sense of surprise" among his constituents. According to the Post, "Sources said Barry tested positive for cocaine during routine screening in connection with his guilty plea to two misdemeanor tax charges in October. … The drug test that Barry failed was required as a part of a pre-sentencing investigation, said two sources familiar with the case. Now he is undergoing voluntary drug testing as part of his private treatment to help establish that he is making an effort to stay drug free, said the sources, who asked not to be named because the case is pending."

WPost Says Barry Should Resign. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/12, A20, 744K) says, "It's likely that news of Mr. Barry's failed drug test has provoked a collective groan throughout a city that over the years has been forced to live through episode after episode of the four-term mayor's personal troubles. The District, however, has managed to survive Mr. Barry's behavior in the past, and the city can be expected to do so again. The more important question has to do with Mr. Barry himself." Barry 'needs less time in the public limelight so he can devote more attention to the problems of Marion Barry. He has the opportunity to step aside so that others may step up to the task of public service. He should take it."

Flint, MI, Raids Net Ten Arrests In Weed & Seed Effort. The Flint Journal (1/12, Raymer) reports, "Ten people were arrested in drug raids on three homes Sunday as part of a special initiative paid for through a federal grant." The Journal continues, "Police searched east-side homes at 1277 Broadway Ave., 1610 Bennett Ave. and 3009 Dakota Ave. with warrants after drug buys at the homes, according to a news release from Flint Police Chief Gary Hagler. … Police seized $1,866 in cash, $1,000 worth of cocaine, $150 worth of marijuana, $100 worth of heroin and $100 worth of ecstasy in the raids." The Journal adds, "The 10 arrested face a total of 13 felony and 19 misdemeanor charges. … The sweep by the force's Crime Area Target Team and Community Policing was part of the federally funded Weed and Seed Program, which targets blighted areas to reduce crime and promote economic revitalization. … The U.S. Justice Department awarded $225,000 to the United Way for the program on the east side of Flint earlier this year. It was the third such grant."

Border Patrol Agents Find Tunnel Linking US And Mexico. CNN (1/11) reports on its Web site, "U.S. border patrol agents investigating a caved-in road discovered a tunnel linking the United States and Mexico, the third such passage found in three years near the San Ysidro, California, crossing, authorities said Wednesday. Lauren

Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, said agents found the 35-foot long, 3-foot-by-3-foot tunnel on Monday. 'It's unclear what it was used for, but inside we found trash and other evidence indicating people had been inside recently,' Mack said. … Tightened border security since the September 11, 2001 attacks is the likely cause for an increase in U.S.-to-Mexico tunneling, Mack said. At least 15 tunnels have been found in California and Arizona since 9/11, she said. 'We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the Drug Enforcement Administration and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels,' Mack explained."

Top Competitor On US Skeleton Team Is Suspended For Positive Drug Test. New York Times (1/12, Zinser, Pennington) sports writes, "The top competitor on the United States men's skeleton team, Zach Lund, was suspended yesterday after testing positive for a masking agent at a World Cup event last month in Europe. Also yesterday, a New York Supreme Court judge declined to overturn the suspension of the United States skeleton coach, Tim Nardiello. The international skeleton federation suspended Lund pending the outcome of an investigation by the United States Anti-Doping Agency. Jim Shea Sr., president of the United States Bobsled and Skeleton Federation, confirmed that Lund, who holds the No. 1 ranking in the world, tested positive for using Propecia, an anti-baldness drug. 'It's on the banned list; no question, he screwed up,' Shea said in a telephone interview. 'He lost his spot on the World Cup team, and it's possible he won't be able to go to the Games.' … Propecia has been listed as a prohibited substance by both the United States and international anti-doping agencies for more than a year because it can act as a masking agent for steroids."

Reuters (1/11) reports, "America's skeleton world number one Zach Lund has been suspended by the International Bobsleigh and Tobogganing Federation (FIBT) pending an investigation into a positive drugs test at a World Cup event last month."

The AP (1/12) reports, "Lund said he had taken hair-restoration products since 1999 and had always declared them on his medical forms. The United States federation granted him a Therapeutic Use Exemption, which provides a way for athletes to use some banned medications."

Michigan Men Indicted For Alleged Racially-Motivated Arson Plot. Knight Ridder/Detroit Free Press (1/12, Warikoo) reports, "Two Taylor, Mich., men -- angry that an African-American family moved onto their block -- hatched a plot to drive them out by burning down their house, said federal officials in an indictment released Wednesday. … One night in July 2002, the two men, Wayland Mullins and Michael Richardson, gathered at the home of Mullins' mother in Taylor. Across from that home, the Doster family had recently purchased a house." Mullins and Richardson "walked over to the Doster home. Then, 'they broke a window at the back of the house, poured gasoline into the home, and ignited the gasoline, causing fire and smoke damage to the house,' says the indictment. In ensuing months, the two men lied to Taylor police and the FBI, say federal prosecutors. At one point, Richardson tried to finger an innocent man in the arson." The Free Press notes, "More men may be involved in the arson, Murphy said, so federal agents are still investigating the case."

ATF Arrests Five In Dearborn Heights, MI, Drug Sting. The WXYZ-TV, ABC 7, Detroit (1/11, Lewis) reports, "Wednesday, 5 men were arrested after the ATF and local law enforcement officials set up a sting to catch them robbing a pharmacy. … Michigan Pharmacy was previously robbed of $15,000 worth on controlled substances." WXYZ-TV continues, "ATF agent Vera Fedorak, who participated in the sting, said 'Obviously it's a concern for the community, ATF and the local law enforcement.'" WXYZ-TV adds, "The robber came into the Dearborn Heights pharmacy with what he said was a bomb. ATF agents and local law enforcement were on the premise, with one posing as the store owner. They were able to apprehend one man at the pharmacy and also 4 others. … Michigan Pharmacy owner Khalid Saad said he was glad to help ATF agents catch the men who had been robbing his store. … The drug sting may result in federal charges."

Tennessee Man Sentenced For Possessing Explosive Device. The Cleveland (TN) Daily Banner (1/11, Kaylor) reports, "A Polk County man who plead guilty last October to possessing an explosive device has been sentenced to 5 1/2 years in a federal prison by a federal judge." The Banner continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Curtis L. Collier sentenced Danny M. Wilcox, 39, of Reliance, late last week, according to Carl Maskew, Bradley County Sheriff's Office liaison with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. … Wilcox is one of three people arrested and charged with the crime." The Banner adds, "Wilcox and his alleged accomplice, Glenda Cross, 41, took part in assembling the device that investigators learned was to be used in a murder plot against the ex-husband of Cross. … Two bomb squad officers from the Cleveland Police Department and ATF agents removed the device and detonated it in a nearby field. … Adams plead guilty in state court to conspiracy to commit second-degree murder and possession of an explosive. He is serving an eight-year sentence at the Tennessee Department of Corrections … Cross is due back in Bradley County Criminal Court for a March 6 hearing."

IMMIGRATION:

12 Indicted For Smuggling Illegal Immigrants Into US. The Washington Times (1/12, Seper) reports, "Three suspected ringleaders of two major alien-smuggling organizations and nine accomplices have been indicted by a Texas federal grand jury on charges of trucking more than 600 illegals from the El Paso area to Dallas and beyond during the past two years. All but three of the gang members were taken into custody this week by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, assisted by the U.S. Border Patrol. Two of the gang members were identified in indictments unsealed Friday, and another is in La Tuna Federal Correctional Institution on a previous alien-smuggling conviction. … ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said Mike Price, 53, his wife, Fabiola del Carmen Moguel de Price, 39, and Sam Jarvis, 52, headed two separate organizations that generated more than $1.6 million in smuggling fees between March 2003 and October 2005."

Former Saudi Embassy Driver Pleads Guilty To Smuggling Aliens Into US. The AP (1/12) reports, "A former driver for the Saudi Embassy in Washington pleaded guilty Tuesday to smuggling aliens into the United States." The AP continues, "Mohamed Abdel Wahab Yakoub, 61, admitted he used Saudi Embassy letterhead to obtain diplomatic visas from U.S. embassies for several Egyptians and Filipinos. … Yakoub, an Egyptian, faces up to 10 years in prison when he is sentenced in April on a single count of smuggling aliens. He will be subject to deportation after the sentencing." The AP adds, "Yakoub sold visas for $5,000 to $7,000. Court documents indicate he helped at least six illegal aliens gain entry to the U.S. in 2000 and 2001. He was fired by the Saudi embassy in 2002. … The Joint Terrorism Task Force, which helped investigate, said it had no indication the scheme had any connection to terrorism."

TAX:

Former West Virginia County GOP Chairman Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion. The Charleston Gazette (1/12, Searls) reports, "A former Kanawha County Republican chairman has agreed to plead guilty to tax evasion by using some of his employees' withholdings to pay for his wife's Mercedes-Benz." The Gazette continues, "Steven L. Miller admitted in an information filed by Assistant U.S. Attorney Hunter P. Smith Jr. that he 'evaded and defeated approximately $38,000 of the federal personal income taxes, trust fund taxes and Trust Fund Recovery Penalties due and owing by him' to the federal government." The Gazette adds, "Miller had apparently withheld federal taxes and trust fund money from employees' pay, placing it in a separate bank account at the Putnam County Bank, but never passed it on to the federal government. … Internal Revenue Service agents led the investigation of Miller from 1999 through 2000. The IRS has been aggressive in investigating such cases because employees may not qualify for Social Security, Medicare or unemployment benefits if taxes that have been withheld from their pay are never remitted to the federal government. … Miller also owed unpaid personal income taxes."

Wife Of "Mafia Cop" Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Evasion Charges. The AP (1/12, Ritter) reports, "The wife of a former New York police detective accused of working as a mob hit man pleaded not guilty Wednesday to three charges of filing a false income tax return. Frances Eppolito was ordered released without bond and was appointed a federal public defender pending a trial set for March 13. … Eppolito and her husband, Louis Eppolito, were named in a three-count felony indictment handed up Tuesday. Each is accused of filing false federal income tax returns for $127,386 in income in 2000, $8,654 in income in 2001 and a net loss of $1,297 in 2002."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Question Alito Membership In Controversial Princeton Group. At the third day of hearings on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel Alito, Democrats intensified their attacks, probing Alito's membership in a controversial Princeton alumni group that allegedly discriminated against women and minorities. The sharp questions prompted an emotional response from Alito's wife, which received much media attention. Reuters (1/12, Ferraro, Kenen) reports Alito, "pressed repeatedly about his membership two decades ago in the alumni group that opposed efforts to admit more women and minorities to the university, said, 'I'm not any kind of a bigot.' … At one point, Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, was crying in the crowded hearing room and then left." She "returned about an hour later and sat behind her husband." Mrs. Alito emotional reaction came after comments from GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, who is quoted in USA Today (1/12, Kiely, 2.31M) saying, "Judge Alito, I am sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this."

ABC and CBS showed video of the scene. The networks each also noted the confrontation between Sen. Edward Kennedy and Chairman Arlen Specter over documents at the Library of Congress relating to the group in question, Concerned Alumni of Princeton. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 2, 2:00, Borger) said the image of Mrs. Alito crying "may be the picture that people really remember from these hearings. It was quite an emotional day for the Alitos, and in the end the question is whether the Democrats took this a step too far today. … Today you saw the Democrats really ratcheting up their questioning. It's a very fine line, very difficult, but some say they went over the line."

ABC World News Tonight (1/11, lead story, 2:50, Vargas) reported, "The exchange got personal. And the pressure took a toll on Judge Alito's wife." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "It was a dramatic moment," and "sources close to Mrs. Alito say she thought the Democrats' attacks on her husband were disgraceful." ABC added "sparks…flew when Senator Kennedy threatened to shut down the committee if it didn't subpoena documents on the group."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Tempers have flared, mostly among Senators, while the Supreme Court nominee has kept his cool. Then suddenly, this afternoon, television viewers noticed Judge Alito's wife was in tears while sitting behind her husband. It was because of what was being said in defense of her husband after attacks on his character and questions about his past."

Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Hume) noted that "the limits of the sometimes extravagant courtesy that members of the Senate accord each other were tested today during" the Alito hearings. Fox (Angle) added, "With opponents to Alito growing, the frustration on the Democratic side exploded into view when Senator Kennedy demanded a subpoena on documents on a group called Concerned Alumni of Princeton. … Kennedy said he sent specter a letter on the issue and he said he didn't see it. … After increasingly heated exchanges, he attempted to move on and Kennedy threatened to bring the hearings to the stand still." Specter "announced that the papers in question were offered to the committee after a simple phone call."

The New York Times (1/12, Lewis, 1.19M) runs a story recounting Mrs. Alito's emotional reaction, while the Wall Street Journal (1/12, Cummings, 2.11M) reports "Alito said he doesn't remember why he joined in 1985, but he thinks it was because he was troubled by opposition to a Reserve Officers Training Corps office on the Princeton campus." The AP (1/12, Espo) reports that though Alito "repeatedly said he had no memory of involvement with the conservative Concerned Alumni of Princeton," he "highlighted his membership in a 1985 job application for the Reagan administration." Yesterday, "he repudiated the opinions expressed in articles in the organization's magazine." He said, "They're not my views ... I deplore them." The Washington Post (1/12, A6, Russakoff, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Alito Disavows Controversial Group; Nominee Touted His Membership in 1985." The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Neuman, 958K) reports Alito said, "I did not join this group…because of any attitude toward women or minorities," Alito told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "What bothered me about the Princeton administration…was the treatment of ROTC." Alito joined the ROTC "as an undergraduate," and the program "lost its contract with the university during the Vietnam protests."

In his Washington Post "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank (1/12, A6) writes that it has become clear "that the committee, with unified GOP support, would clear the judge" and that's why Democrats focused on the alumni group. Milbank writes, "Clarence Thomas had Anita Hill. Alito would have the Concerned Alumni of Princeton." Milbank calls the dispute "a schoolyard brawl." The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, 90K) reports the testy session came "after many observers had decided that Democrats had been neutered during the first two days, mastering the art of softball pitches. The Washington Post had called the sessions 'a most tender roast of Alito.' Not yesterday." The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, 90K), also runs a front-page story under the headline "Alito Accused Of Racism."

The Legal Times (1/12, Goldman) reports, "Alito repeated the claim he had made the day before, that he had 'racked his brain' and could not remember why he had joined the group. The best explanation he could offer, he said, was his displeasure at the university's attitude toward ROTC, which had been banned at one point but had returned to the campus before Alito graduated in 1972. Alito had been a member of an ROTC unit. … Toward the end of the day Wednesday, however, Schumer was able to elicit a bit more satisfying explanation for Democrats. … Said Schumer: 'You somehow plucked this group, which you now say you somehow have no recollection. Why that group? Why was it plucked out and put on the application?' … Answered Alito: 'You have to look at the question I was responding to. What I was trying to outline were things relevant to obtaining a political position.' … It was the first time Alito had conceded to what many considered obvious: his need to show the Department of Justice, then under the highly conservative influence of Attorney General Edwin Meese, that his conservative bona fides were in order. … 'That was the answer he should have started with,' said Illinois Democrat Sen. Richard Durbin, after the hearing had ended for the day. 'It helps some. I just wish he hadn't gone through this tortuous process to get us there.'"

Alito Said To Have "Signaled" He Might Be Willing To Reconsider Roe. NPR (1/12) reports this morning, "Alito told the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday that the Roe v. Wade decision, which legalized abortion, set an important precedent, but he resisted pressure to be more specific about how he would rule in abortion cases before the High Court." Alito "wrote in 1985 that the constitution does not guarantee a right to abortion. He now says he does not decide cases based on religious faith."

The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Goldstein, Babington, 744K) reports Alito "signaled" yesterday "he might be willing to revisit the ruling that legalized abortion nationwide." The "drama of the hearings' third day," adds the Post, "nearly overshadowed the significance of the position Alito staked out on the landmark abortion case, Roe v. Wade." The nominee "edged closer to suggesting that he might be willing to reconsider Roe if he is confirmed to the high court, refusing, under persistent questioning by Democrats, to say that he regards the 1973 decision as 'settled law' that 'can't be reexamined.' In this way, his answers departed notably from those that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. gave when asked similar questions during his confirmation hearings four months ago." Yesterday, Alito "said that Roe must be treated with respect because it has been reaffirmed by the high court several times in the past three decades." Knight Ridder (1/12, Henderson, Kuhnhenn) adds "Alito's reluctance makes it easier for critics to brand him as a justice who could help overturn the 33-year-old ruling."

Sen. Richard Durbin said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11), "I'm concerned when it comes to the issue of Roe v. Wade. … I don't expect him to tell me how he's going to rule on a case, but I go back to what John Roberts was asked, and I think John Roberts is a man who's well respected in terms of his legal acumen. And he said that he believed that Roe v. Wade was settled law in this land. I asked Sam Alito the same question and he wouldn't give me the same answer. It leads some of us on our side of the table to wonder what's going to happen the first time there's a serious challenge to Roe v. Wade. And I think that's what's propelling a lot of the questions before this committee."

Alito Still Seen As Headed For Confirmation. Media consensus remains that Democrats have yet to damage Alito's prospects. As Pete Williams said on NBC Nightly News (1/11, lead story, 2:30), "It's looking more likely that Samuel Alito will be on the Supreme Court in time to join the Justices when the winter break ends in late February." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) also reported "really seems to be sailing along" and Democrats "are getting frustrated." Knight Ridder (1/12, Henderson, Kuhnhenn) adds Chief Justice Roberts "won 22 Democratic votes when the Senate confirmed him last September. Alito will almost certainly get fewer, though his Republican support appears solid enough to ensure his confirmation, barring any future stumbles."

Alito's performance under fire continues to receive generally positive reviews. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Cummings, 2.11M) says "the Democratic strategy to derail Judge Samuel Alito's Supreme Court appointment is centered on raising doubts about the nominee's credibility and persuading senators he would curb or end abortion rights." However, "Alito's straightforward testimony has served as a strong counter to their campaign." Moreover, "Democrats may have lost points…when Judge Alito's wife…left the hearing room in tears."

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Reynolds, Simon, 958K) headlines its story this morning "Alito Remains Unruffled in Testy Hearings," and says the nominee "at placidly through it all, repeating -- with little apparent irritation -- responses that did not placate his critics." Moreover, "the attacks by Democrats did no apparent damage to Alito among Senate Republicans, most of whom have expressed support for him." On The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 3, 1:30, Schieffer), Jan Crawford Greenburg of the Chicago Tribune said yesterday "we got an introduction to Samuel Alito the man, the calm and quiet son of Italian immigrants who became a conservative jurist."

The New York Times (1/12, Stevenson, Lewis, 1.19M) reports Democrats "sought to build a case against his nomination to the Supreme Court by raising questions about his character and consistency." Democrats, "aware that Judge Alito had made it through the first two days without significant damage to his prospects of confirmation, struck an aggressive tone," but "the partisan volleys seemed to sail over or past Judge Alito, who politely but resolutely declined to be drawn out on abortion, executive authority and other issues. He often sat impassively as the committee members debated his qualifications and forthrightness."

The Financial Times (1/12, Waldmeir) reports Alito "has proved a monochrome, dispassionate and unflappable witness, ignoring insult, slight and political controversy, never taking the bait of those allied against him." This "has made for crushingly tedious political theatre. Even some of the senators seem to be losing interest. … Mr Alito's performance – which involves answering every question unemotionally and legalistically, no matter how aggressive or passionate the questioner – may not make for high television ratings. But all the signs suggest that the sheer weight of his worthy if tedious performance will eventually crush the opposition."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Chaddock, 61K) says Alito "has deftly parried questions on hot-button issues ranging from abortion to the limits of presidential power. No memorable phrases. No conspicuous stumbles. And -- most important -- no searing images of what life in 'Judge Alito's America' might be like." The Monitor adds, "To the frustration of anti-Alito groups staking out front seats in the hearing room, Democrats have been slow to get traction on issues critical to their base."

The New York Times (1/12, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports Alito "opponents" expressed "growing frustration Wednesday at the course of his confirmation hearings, saying that Democratic senators were struggling in their effort to build a strong case against him and that his confirmation appeared increasingly inevitable. Several said they had been particularly distressed after the first day of questioning of Judge Alito by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and had expressed that concern in calls and e-mail messages to Democratic aides on Tuesday."

There was also widespread coverage of Alito's hearings on local television newscasts. The stories tended to use metaphors that indicated the Judge had to deal with difficult questions. Most of the broadcasts also indicated that Alito handled the questioning well. Some stations ventured the opinion that Alito will be confirmed. For example, WSB-TV Atlanta (1/11, 6:17 p.m.) said, "Experts say Alito's nomination is all but certain. With every passing minute is it is more and more a foregone conclusion."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (1/11, 6:26 p.m.) reported, "Alito turned aside attacks on his judicial record at his confirmation hearings today. Despite increasing pressure the 55-year-old judge has kept his cool." KPHO-TV Phoenix (1/11, 6:39 p.m.) reported, "Democrats are turning up the heat, "but so far… Alito hasn't cracked under the pressure."

WEWS-TV Cleveland (1/11, 5:17 p.m.) reported, "Another day of partisan politics with disappointed Democrats hammering…Alito to be more forthcoming about his legal views."

Alito To Complete Testimony Today. CBS News Radio (1/12) reports this morning Alito "should wrap up his testimony this morning. Then the committee hears from other witnesses -- some for him and some against."

Novak Says Democrats "Shooting Blanks" At Alito. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/12) writes that Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy "and other Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who had spent weeks preparing for Alito's Supreme Court confirmation hearing seemed to be shooting blanks at President Bush's nominee. …. Failure to make a direct hit on Alito suggests a transcendent defeat for the Democratic judicial confirmation strategy crafted by Kennedy. It did not block all conservatives for appellate courts and failed to dissuade Bush from naming conservatives to the Supreme Court." Meanwhile, "Republicans were amused at Democrats stressing Alito's membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton (CAP)."

Alito, Senators Citing O'Connor Frequently. The New York Times (1/12, Liptak, 1.19M) reports, "Senators from both parties have frequently used" Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's opinions "as a basis for questioning Judge Alito" in "a testament to her disproportionate influence on the court in her 25 years of service." Also, it is a "reminder of the important role Judge Alito will assume if he is confirmed." Alito and supporters "highlighted instances in which he had ruled as she had." Meanwhile, Democratic senators worked hard to show that Judge Alito and Justice O'Connor were at odds, particularly in an important abortion case." On Wednesday morning, Senator Coburn "had grown frustrated with all the O'Connor talk" and said, "'The fact that you have to fit the Sandra Day O'Connor mold is really a misapplication. … There is no precedent that would say that.'"

Hatch Says Kennedy Was "Trying To Score Some Points." Sen. Orrin Hatch said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11) that Kennedy "was trying to score some points there and he was trying to, I think, set up a situation where he could complain and gripe and maybe even vote against Alito."

Cohen Criticizes Biden's Performance. Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K), "The only thing standing between Joe Biden and the presidency is his mouth. … The reviews for Biden's first crack at Samuel Alito, the humorless Supreme Court nominee, were murderous. The New York Times had Biden out on Page One -- normally a position to kill for -- only this time it was not a paean to his considerable merits, but an account of how it took him nearly three minutes of throat-clearing to ask his first question and then took the rest of his allocated 30 minutes just to get in four more. … The Post had a similar account of Biden running off at the mouth. … The tragedy is that Biden, who is running for president, is a much better man and senator than these accounts would suggest. But his tendency, his compulsion, his manic-obsessive running of the mouth has become the functional equivalent of womanizing or some other character weakness that disqualifies a man for the presidency." Biden "has much to say -- and then too much to add. He is an anatomical disaster. His Achilles' heel is his mouth."

Twenty Democratic House Members Come Out Against Alito. The Washington Times (1/12, Fagan, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Democratic congresswomen yesterday said Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s failure to define abortion as a guaranteed right makes him unfit to sit on the Supreme Court, but senators said they are taking a wait-and-see approach. 'We believe that Judge Alito poses a direct threat to the rights of women in America,' 20 House Democrats wrote in a letter urging senators to block…Bush's nominee."

NYTimes Finds "Quiet Bombshells" In Alito Hearings. The New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) editorializes about several issues that have emerged in the Alito hearings, finding that the nominee has dropped several "quiet bombshells." The New York Times finds "evidence of extremism" in Alito's praise of Judge Robert Bork and membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton. The paper is also troubled by Alito's possible opposition to Roe v. Wade, alleges Alito may support an "imperial presidency," and says that Alito has repeatedly "taken the side of big corporations against the 'little guy,' supported employers against employees, and routinely rejected the claims of women, racial minorities and the disabled." The Times concludes that Alito's testimony "should trouble moderate Republicans, especially those who favor abortion rights or are concerned about presidential excesses."

WSJournal Says Concerned Alumni Allegations Are Old News. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) says that focusing on the Princeton group is "a sign of how little Democrats have on Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." The Journal says that because Democrats can't attack Alito's "credentials or his mastery of jurisprudence," they are now trying "guilt by ancient association." The Journal says Kennedy and Sen. "Chuck Schumer" implied Alito "was racist and sexist by linking the nominee with the views of some members" of the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a line of questioning that "was mean enough that Judge Alito's wife left the hearing room" after Graham's questions. When Alito said he couldn't recall his membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, the Journal opines, Alito "was then tarred as dishonest." The Journal notes that Kennedy cites several decades-old articles on the Concerned Alumni (including a Wall Street Journal editorial) and concludes, "if this irrelevant arcana is the most his opponents have, he can start measuring his new judicial robes."

Michelman Likens Alito Hearings To Bork, Thomas Hearings. Under the headline "Kate Michelman, The Public Face Of a Woman's Right to Privacy," the Washington Post (1/12, C1, Weeks, 744K) reports that Michelman, "the face of reproductive rights," has "been at the forefront of one of this country's thorniest debates. She was president of NARAL Pro-Choice America from 1985 to 2004. She is scheduled to testify this week in opposition to the nomination of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. And she has written a new book, 'With Liberty and Justice for All: A Life Spent Protecting the Right to Choose.' Last night several hundred friends and well-wishers showed up at the Woman's National Democratic Club near Dupont Circle for cheese, wine and a celebration Michelman's book and her mission. Guests included former secretary of state Madeleine Albright, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton and Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.)." the Post notes that Michelman says the confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito ""triggers memories of the Robert Bork confirmation hearings in 1987. Michelman was scheduled to testify then, too. But she and leaders of other advocacy groups decided that Bork was going to cook his own goose, so she decided not to speak. She is also reminded of the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. She did testify then. Like Alito, Michelman said, 'Thomas also said he was open-minded' on the landmark abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade. But he has tried at every opportunity to overturn that decision, she said."

More Commentary. In his column in the New York Times, (1/12) David Brooks opines that Alito would have been a Democrat if he had been born earlier. 1950s Democrats, Brooks writes, were strong in "places like Trenton, where Alito grew up." But the 1960s changed the Democratic Party, as "cultural politics replaced New Deal politics, and liberal Democrats did their best to repel Northern white ethnic voters." Brooks finds Republicans compare more favorably to Democrats in appealing to average voters. Brooks concludes that the Alito hearings highlight "that sometime between 1932 and 1968, the DNA of the Democratic Party fundamentally changed" from "working-class" DNA to "DNA of a minority party."

USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) editorializes, that over the two days of hearings, "it has seemed that for every senator who questioned Alito thoughtfully — and there were several — three others were more interested in hearing themselves talk." USA Today rebukes Sen. Joseph Biden and Sen. Lindsey Graham, while praising Sen. Arlen Specter and Sen. Patrick Leahy. USA Today condemns "bloviating" senators and opines that "it's too bad so many senators seem so disinterested in gathering facts to make an informed, independent choice."

In a second editorial, USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) contends Alito is saying little when answering senators' questions. This silence, USA Today says, "tends to reinforce doubts raised by Alito's record." USA Today finds troubling contrasts between Alito's responses and those of Chief Justice John Roberts when he faced the committee. Among other examples, the paper cites the nominees' divergent statements on Roe v. Wade, which Roberts called "'settled as precedent,'" and Alito called "an 'important precedent.'" USA Today concludes that the "strategy of silence amounts to low short-term politics at high long-term risk."

Bush Expected To Focus On Health Care In 2006. President Bush is preparing to focus on health care as the "centerpiece of his 2006 domestic agenda," the Wall Street Journal (1/12, McKinnon, Lueck, 2.11M) reports. While the Administration "is unlikely to propose major new federal spending" it is "considering expansions of several earlier proposals aimed at using market forces to improve the quality and restrain the rapidly rising cost of health care." The Journal says the "outlines of the health-care system it envisions are becoming clear. It would rely less on generous insurance provided by employers that insulate individuals from the cost of their choices. Instead, it would rely much more on market forces, individual (as opposed to employer-provided) insurance, tax credits to help the uninsured, provider competition and using the Internet to provide consumers with more, better data about the care quality and prices charged by doctors and hospitals."

Card Says 2007 Budget Will "Tighten The Belt." Speaking at the US Chamber of Commerce yesterday, White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card said the Administration's budget blueprint for 2007 will "tighten the belt." Reuters (1/11, Cornwell) reported that Card "gave no budget details in a speech that was short on particulars and long on reminders that the country was at war and that sacrifices were required. He also spoke mysteriously about a 'dark cloud that seems to be gathering around the political world' but did not explain." The White House "was in the final stages of drafting a 'very disciplined' new budget for fiscal 2007, starting October 1, Card said. 'It will fund the appropriate priorities of winning the war on terror, securing the homeland, but it will say, "Tighten the belt,"' he said. … Card said the 2007 budget will 'make the tough decisions about which programs are necessary, and fund them appropriately but exercise prudence with the taxpayers' money.'"

Flake Seeks To Reform Process Of Earmarking. The Washington Times (1/12, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Rep. Jeff Flake "is out to from the practice of earmarking." In a letter to house Speaker Dennis Hastert, Flake wrote, "Unfortunately, we Republicans have taken earmarking to an unprecedented level. It is now our responsibility to clean it up." Flake "goes so far as to say that it is 'no secret that over the past several months, our reputation as a governing majority has taken a beating. It is clear that continuing...indictments, possible indictments, plea deals, tainted campaign contributions, etc., has severely eroded public trust."

Treasury Undersecretary Adams Profiled. USA Today (1/12, Lynch, 2.31M) profiles Treasury Undersecretary for International Affairs Timothy Adams, describing his job as scanning "the globe trying to spot economic brushfires before they become infernos. Right now, he doesn't see much to worry about. But he's still looking. 'If I weren't paid to worry, I would argue that the glass is half full and there's a lot that we should celebrate. But my job isn't to celebrate; it's to think about how this all could go awry,' Adams, undersecretary of Treasury for international affairs, said recently." Adams "moved into one of the department's top posts after serving as chief of staff to then-Treasury secretary Paul O'Neill and several years as a Washington consultant. He also worked in the administration of President George H.W. Bush."

VA IG Wins Alexander Hamilton Award. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Lee, 744K) reports that the Inspector Generals Office of the Veterans Affairs Department have been awarded the Alexander Hamilton Award, which recognizes the "foremost effort by an inspector general to improve efficiency and effectiveness of executive branch operations. The Post adds, "Initially Congress created 12 independent audit and investigative offices, and every affected agency opposed them. Over the past 27 years, inspectors general have become a fixture of the bureaucracy. Their ranks have grown to 57 -- more than half appointed by the president -- and their offices employ 11,400 auditors, investigators, inspectors and other professionals."

Abramoff Scandal Prompts Rush To Reform Lobbying System. USA Today (1/12, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports a "scramble is on to write new rules restricting how lobbyists ply their influence trade as the capital is embroiled in a spreading corruption scandal." Bills "aiming to chill the relationships between lobbyists and members of Congress, stalled for months, are now on a fast track as leaders battle the perception of misconduct." Rep. Marty Meehan, who has sponsored one proposal, said, "These scandals aren't going away. What we know is probably only a fraction of the story." USA adds that after former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea, "the rush began." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and House Speaker Dennis Hastert "have ordered packages of new ethics rules intended to take effect before lawmakers face voters in November." House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., "who is drafting the House package, said it likely will include a ban on members of Congress taking fact-finding trips paid for by private interests." Dreier said he "also is looking at increasing the amount of information available on lobbyists' activities, including their campaign contributions and fundraising efforts." USA adds in the Senate, "the bill drafting has been assigned to Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa."

The Washington Post (1/12, A4, Birnbaum, 744K) reports Congress is "poised to pass measures early this year that would clamp down on lobbying activity and possibly end some lawmaker travel." Proposals are "coming from members of both political parties. A touchstone for all sides, however, is the plan introduced last month by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.)." The McCain bill "would beef up lobbying disclosure considerably and cover grass-roots lobbying campaigns, which now go unreported. It would also require lobbyists to report each fundraising event that they host or sponsor for candidates for federal office, including the amount raised." But "one particularly powerful group is gearing up to oppose several of the most sweeping proposals: lobbyists. Lobby organizations ranging from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to the American Society of Association Executives (ASAE) are concerned that some of the measures under consideration would overburden them with paperwork or unfairly limit their ability to do their jobs. They are already planning to lobby against those parts of any new lobbying law."

Lobbyists Now Seen As Ingrained In DC Political Culture. The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Edsall, 744K) reports in a front page story on "the capital's changing mores" on lobbying. Although the "excesses of Jack Abramoff have captured the news, a wide range of other practices -- rarely publicized and fully legal -- reflect the steady dismantling of the wall between lobbyists and members of the House and Senate." Fallout "from the Abramoff scandal is likely for a time to chill certain aspects of the capital culture, in which access to power on Capitol Hill is lubricated by lobbyist-funded meals, travel and campaign contributions, according to congressional veterans of both parties. But some public interest advocates believe the relationships between lobbyists and politicians have become so institutionalized in recent years that fundamental change is unlikely, absent changes in the law." Since 1998, lobbyists "have served as treasurers of 79 lawmakers' campaign committees and leadership PACs, according to the Center for Public Integrity." In addition, major trade associations "have bought Capitol Hill townhouses for fundraisers so that lawmakers can quickly go back to cast votes and then return to the event." At election time, "many lobbyists put on a new hat and become political consultants, guiding incumbents to reelection. Afterward these lobbyists return to their traditional roles, being able now to ask for votes from those they helped put in office." The "pivotal point in Washington's changing culture, according to lobbyists and congressional ethics analysts, came in 1995, shortly after Newt Gingrich and his 'Republican Revolutionaries' roared to power in the 1994 midterm elections." Then-Majority Whip Tom DeLay "and his allies began the 'K Street Project' -- the pressuring of trade associations and lobbying firms to hire Republican, and to contribute to Republican campaigns if they wanted access to key leaders and committee chairmen in the House."

Rodriguez Calls For Eliminating Many "Reforms" For Transparency. In a Washington Times op-ed (1/12), Paul M. Rodriguez, the former managing editor of Insight magazine, says, "Instead of adding more rules, how's this for a good government concept? Simply eliminate the very rules that sprang out of the Watergate-era campaign finance laws or many of the 'reforms' following the House Bank and House Post Office scandals. The concept isn't as far fetched as it sounds. Consider that it's one that has served well the residents of the Commonwealth of Virginia. The model is simplicity itself -- there are no restrictions governing political donations or gift giving other than making all of it public. What a refreshing thought when one stops for a minute to ponder that, so far as memory serves, such a system has not led to any scandals in Virginia. Total transparency between donors and recipients, actual dollar amounts and specific goodies received are all put into the public domain for anyone to see, report and contemplate."

Lobbyists' Group Urges Transparency In Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column that the American League of Lobbyists "would like members of Congress to take a collective big breath and slow down a bit" as it considers the Abramoff scandal. Paul Miller, the group's president "said the group is not particularly opposed to major changes in lobbying rules. It simply wants 'transparency' in what the Congress is up to in the rush to reform. … Lawmakers could change their rules rather than pass laws to restrict members from taking fancy trips paid for by lobbyists, Miller said. He expressed concern about proposals to prevent lawmakers and staffers from going to work as lobbyists for two years after leaving the Hill. They generally are restricted from lobbying their former colleagues for a year. The one-year cooling-off period isn't being enforced, Miller said, and he doubts there would be any real enforcement on a two-year ban."

Shadegg May Enter Race For Majority Leader. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Rogers, 2.11M) reports that as "the two front-runners slowed" in the House GOP race for majority leader, Rep. John Shadegg "edged closer to entering the nasty Republican contest." Shadegg "stepped up calls seeking support from colleagues, and his allies were optimistic that the six-term Arizona lawmaker will offer a more change-oriented alternative to the two establishment figures in the field," current Majority Whip Roy Blunt and Rep. John Boehner, chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee. Shadegg's office "said no final decision had been made on the leadership race, but issued a statement critical of Reps. Blunt and Boehner for not being aggressive enough, in the congressman's words, 'to clean up our act in the wake of the recent ethics scandals and get back to the agenda that brought us the majority in the first place.'" Speaker Dennis Hastert said, "At the end of the day, he hinted, he'd be in the race. I don't know what his decision is." The Journal adds that neither Blunt nor Boehner "appears close to the 116 votes needed to win. With so many Republicans uncommitted, Mr. Shadegg has the potential to shake up the race, forcing at least a second ballot and greater discussion of changes that many members are demanding."

CQ (1/11, Ota) reports Shadegg "began testing the waters for a possible bid." Shadegg said, "I think we need to clean up our act in the wake of the recent ethics scandals and get back to the agenda that brought us the majority in the first place. I am concerned that the two members currently in the race, whom I have a great deal of respect for, will not move aggressively enough in that direction. I will continue to talk to Members to gauge how many share that concern." CQ adds Shadegg's move "came as an effort by Blunt supporters to move up the date for the leadership election failed. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert declared that the election would be held Feb.2."

Reynolds Seen As Possible Consensus Candidate. U.S. News and World Report (1/12, Bedard) reports House GOP leaders "do not think" Shadegg "will move forward this week to challenge Ohio Rep. John Boehner and Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt for the House majority leader's post." A GOP leadership aide said if "neither Blunt nor Boehner can nail down the job within the next six to eight days, a move could be made to seek a consensus candidate. The leading alternative there, said several leadership officials and GOP consultants, is Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee." Insiders "close to the two campaigns to replace Rep. Tom DeLay as the permanent majority leader said that while Blunt is the leader, Boehner is gaining ground."

Boehner, Blunt Outline Ethics Reform Proposals. Reuters (1/12, Cowan) reports Reps. Roy Blunt and John Boehner, the "two candidates vying to become the next U.S. House of Representatives majority leader," yesterday "set forth their ideas" for "stamping out ethics problems that have threatened Republicans' control of the chamber beyond this year." Boehner "called for outlawing the earmarking of federal funds for special-interest projects sought by lobbyists, which do not go through the regular oversight process in Congress." Blunt, meanwhile, "called for banning privately-funded travel for House members and aides or at least requiring advance approval of such travel."

The New York Times (1/12, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that with the "need for new ethics and lobbying rules emerging as a central theme in the race for House Republican leader," Blunt and Boehner "engaged in an arms race over who supported the most stringent changes." Boehner, "trying to appeal to fiscal conservatives unhappy with an explosion in pet projects being inserted in broad spending bills, proposed banning such 'earmarks' unless they received individual Congressional scrutiny and approval." Rep. Blunt "backed Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's proposal to eliminate Congressional travel paid by special interest groups. Mr. Blunt's other proposals include penalties on lobbyists for violations of the Congressional gift ban. It is now improper only for lawmakers to accept gifts of more than $50, not for a lobbyist to provide such gifts." The Times adds it was "not just the leadership rivals seeking to replace Representative Tom DeLay who sought to up the ante over Congressional ethics." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "wrote Wednesday to Mr. Hastert, asking him to join her in urging the House ethics committee to investigate the conduct of Representatives Bob Ney of Ohio, Mr. DeLay of Texas and other lawmakers whose names have emerged in a federal lobbying inquiry."

Blunt's Ties To DeLay Could Result In Loss. The AP (1/12, Hananel) reports that if Blunt loses the race, he "can blame his close ties to former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and the desire for a clean break from controversy and scandal, according to members of Congress and other observers." As of Wednesday afternoon, Blunt "had at least 62 publicly declared supporters while Boehner claimed more than 30 supporters. It takes 116 votes from GOP members to win the post." Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., "a GOP moderate backing Blunt and a longtime critic of DeLay," said, "Roy is a Midwestern conservative. He understands that a Republican in Connecticut is different than a Republican in Missouri and there needs to be room in our party for both." The AP adds Blunt has "taken a gentler approach to corralling the votes needed to pass legislation. He has served as both majority whip and majority leader since DeLay was forced aside to face money laundering charges, and the experience could give Blunt an edge in the race against Boehner." But some members "want something else. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Ky., who is backing Boehner in the race, wants to send voters a message that Congress is cleaning house."

Blunt Says He Has No Relationship With Abramoff. Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Garrett) reported that that Abramoff scandal is an issue in the race for House Majority Leader, as Republicans "try to distance themselves from Abramoff's admitted efforts to bribe lawmakers. [Interim House Majority Leader Roy] Blunt told FOX this about his relationship with Abramoff." Blunt: "As far as my records indicate, I never had a meeting with him in our office. And because I don't take gaming money, I apparently didn't take the kind of money that he had the most access to." Fox added, "And Blunt had this to say about the ongoing criminal investigation of Abramoff's dealing with lawmakers." Blunt: "I knew who he was. I didn't happen to have any kind of real professional relationship with him."

Blunt Denies Boehner's Claim That GOP Lacks Direction. Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Garrett) reported that in an interview with Fox News, Blunt "denied accusations from his Republican challenger, John Boehner, that the party lacks drive and direction." Blunt: "Any fair look at what we did last year indicates that we are on the right course. We had a great legislative year." Fox added that Blunt "has slightly more than half of the public commitments he needs to win. Some Republicans privately grumble that Blunt said, if he loses the race for leader, he will return to his former post of party whip, from which some fear he might punish those who worked against him."

Hastert Rejects Call To Move Up Election Date. The AP (1/12, Taylor) reports House Republican leaders "rejected calls to move up the election of a new majority leader to replace Tom DeLay before President Bush's State of the Union address Jan. 31." Speaker Dennis Hastert "decided Wednesday to stick with a Feb. 2 caucus election scheduled after DeLay, facing trial in Texas on charges of laundering campaign funds, said last weekend he would not try to regain the job." Blunt supporters "had called this week for holding the election before the House reconvenes Jan. 31." Meanwhile, "some House Republicans are pressing for more sweeping changes in their leadership. Rep. John Sweeney, R-N.Y., is drafting a petition calling for elections for several junior leadership posts. Every position but Hastert's would be at stake."

Bloomberg (1/12, Litvan) reports some House Republicans, "including Representative Clay Shaw of Florida, had urged Hastert to call Republicans back to Congress earlier. In a letter to Hastert this week, Shaw and four other Florida Republicans said the elections might 'overshadow' Bush's speech."

Sweeney Calls For Election Of Lower House Leadership Posts. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Curtius, 958K) reports, "Rank-and-file House Republicans on Wednesday launched a push to require every member of their leadership but Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to face elections for their posts Feb. 2, saying the step was necessary to convince the public that the party was serious about ethics and lobbying reform." Rep. John E. Sweeney "planned to start circulating a petition as early as Wednesday night asking for broad elections. The move underscored many House Republicans' belief that their leaders needed to do more to respond to the unfolding corruption scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, if the party was going to keep its congressional majority in the November elections." Under Sweeney's petition, House Republicans "would hold elections for five leadership posts in addition to picking a successor to DeLay as majority leader."

Redistricting Could Make DeLay Reelection Effort More Difficult. The New York Times (1/12, Lyman, 1.19M) reports that Rep. Tom DeLay "is in the toughest re-election campaign of his 11-term House career, a battle that might be decided not only by his legal problems, but also by the Congressional redistricting plan he spearheaded in 2003. The redistricting led to the loss of six Democratic seats in Texas in 2004, but it also shifted thousands of Democratic voters to strong Republican districts. Among those, Mr. DeLay's 22nd District added several Democratic-leaning parts of Galveston County; several political analysts estimate they may have raised the district's Democratic vote around 5 percent." DeLay "will be running for re-election while standing trial in Austin on money laundering charges in a case over campaign financing. … Meanwhile, Washington waits to see what other indictments might flow from the Abramoff scandal." The Times adds, "Running in the reconfigured district for the first time in 2004, Mr. DeLay won handily, but with a smaller margin than in previous elections: 55 percent compared with his Democratic opponent's 41 percent."

Houston TV Stations Decide To Withhold Ad Accusing DeLay Of Corruption. Reuters (1/12, Franks) reports, "Several Houston television stations withheld a political ad on Wednesday accusing…DeLay of corruption after a lawyer for the former House majority leader said the ad was false and could lead to legal action. The ad, sponsored by public interest groups Campaign for America's Future and Public Campaign Action Fund, calls for DeLay to resign because of his indictment in Texas on campaign finance charges and his links to disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff. 'All four of the major broadcast stations [in Houston] contacted to air the ad, as well as Time Warner cable, have stated they either will not run the ad or will keep it off the air for further review,' according to a statement sent out by DeLay's office. Some of the stations said during their newscasts they were looking at the ad to determine its credibility or that they had found some of the allegations to be questionable."

Nearly Half Of Federal Employees Want Additional Training. The Washington Post (1/12, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that almost half of federal employees "would like additional training to improve their job performance, according to preliminary results of a survey by the Merit Systems Protection Board. Nearly 37,000 full-time government employees from 24 agencies participated in the survey, conducted last year. A summary of the findings appears in this month's Issues of Merit newsletter, published by the board's office of policy and evaluation, headed by Steve Nelson. Although 64 percent of survey respondents said they have received sufficient training to do their jobs, 46 percent said they would like additional training so that they can improve on their work. A huge majority, 81 percent, said the extra career development should be financed by their agencies and provided through formal training sessions. Slightly fewer, 77 percent, supported on-the-job developmental programs."

Cheney, Rumsfeld Create "Security Fuss" In Chinatown. The Washington Post (1/12,C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable source" column that Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld took their wives to a Defense Department dinner at Clyde's of Gallery Place on Tuesday night, "creating quite the security fuss in Chinatown -- many black sedans, men with earpieces. Upstairs in the private Piedmont Room, they nibbled on hors d'oeuvres (crab cakes, smoked salmon and dim sum) and then enjoyed Maryland crab soup and New York strip steaks."

Army Expected To Cancel Lockheed Spy Plane Program. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Karp, 2.11M) reports, "The U.S. Army is poised to cancel a Lockheed Martin Corp. spy-plane program valued at as much as $8 billion, in the face of competing budget priorities and problems in the aircraft's development, according to industry and government officials." People "familiar with the program" say the Army is expected to announce the termination of the Aerial Common Sensor surveillance plane as early as today. The decision would be "a blow to Lockheed's main partner in the program, Empresa Brasileira de Aeronautica SA, or Embraer, the Brazilian aircraft company hoping to break into the U.S. defense market."

USA Today Says Report On Cisneros Probe Should Be Unsealed. An editorial in USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) argues that independent counsel David Barrett's report on his investigation of former Housing Secretary Henry Cisneros should be unsealed. USA says the probe "took too long, cost too much and achieved too little. But at least those failings were the result of honorable intentions: to expose and punish corruption by public officials. Burying his report now serves no such noble goal. Instead, it would give wrong-doers even more reason to believe they can abuse the public's trust, confident that their actions would be hidden from the public's view."

WSJournal Says Congress, Courts Should Leave Credit Card Industry Alone. A Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) editorial says, "Last year the credit card industry handled more than $2 trillion in consumer transactions and gobbled up nearly $30 billion in fees, according to the Nilson Report newsletter on the credit card industry. These fees are now the source of mounting angst among retailers, which have launched 47 antitrust lawsuits against the credit card companies for alleged collusion in setting these fees. Retailers have also rushed to Washington demanding that Congress impose a de facto price cap on credit card charges -- as Australia and the European Union have already done. This campaign against credit card fees and the clamor for price controls sound eerily familiar. A few years ago dim-witted politicians employed price controls to try to limit fees for using ATMs. In localities where that was tried, the result was not lower fees, but fewer ATMs, and thus much less convenience for customers." The Journal adds, "Congress and the courts should keep their paws off this industry and let the market give credit, where credit is due."

World Economy Said To Be Expanding But Imbalanced. USA Today (1/12, Lynch, 2.31M) says the world economy, "though expanding, is dangerously imbalanced. The resulting U.S. current account deficit — reflecting the gap between the nation's ravenous appetite for imports and its anemic savings — is now at levels that many experts fear could trigger a run on the dollar, soaring interest rates and global economic pain. Meanwhile, investment is pouring into risky emerging markets as if the past decade's turmoil in Argentina, Turkey, Thailand and Russia never happened." Nonetheless, both "the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank expect solid global growth of 3.2% this year, about the same as in 2005." USA adds, "To many economists, the swollen U.S. current account deficit looms as the biggest potential hazard. In a nutshell, the United States spends too much and saves too little, and Asia saves too much and spends too little. (Moribund Europe doesn't do enough of either.) No one knows for certain when the day of reckoning will come." But economists "say the USA and the world cannot go on like this indefinitely."

Stocks Gained Wednesday. Stocks posted gains yesterday. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Patterson, 2.11M) reports that the Dow Jones Industrial Average closed up by 31.86 points to 11043.44. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "added 4.49 points to 1294.18 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 11.04 to 2331.36."

Harvard Economist Argues Economic Growth Is Morally Uplifting. Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K) that Benjamin Friedman, a Harvard economist, 'has written a hugely provocative book ('The Moral Consequences of Economic Growth') arguing that rapid growth is morally uplifting. 'Economic growth -- meaning a rising standard of living for the clear majority of citizens -- more often than not fosters greater opportunity, tolerance of diversity, social mobility, commitment to fairness, and dedication to democracy,' he writes. Further, the opposite is true. Poor growth feeds prejudice, class conflict and antidemocratic tendencies." Samuelson adds, "Friedman has identified a tendency, not an iron law. Still, his moral case for economic growth is solid. It's true that growth alone rarely creates happiness. Beyond a certain income, happiness depends on family relationships, a sense of belonging, personal beliefs. But growth surely can cure misery."

Bernanke Expected To Be More Of A Consensus Builder Than Greenspan. Knight Ridder (1/12, Hall) reports that as Ben Bernanke takes over the job of Federal Reserve Chairman, he is "to distinguish himself from [outgoing Chairman Alan] Greenspan as more of a consensus-builder and clear-speaking communicator. He must do it while still establishing his authority over an institution historically run by strong-willed chairmen with deeper real-world experience than he brings to the role." Knight Ridder adds, "Five former Fed governors told Knight Ridder in interviews that Bernanke will have to earn the trust of financial markets. The five also expect Bernanke to be more considerate of opposing viewpoints than was Greenspan, who sometimes left Fed governors feeling that their views were marginalized."

Ehrlich Plan For Funding Stem-Cell Research Will Favor Non-Embryonic Projects. The Baltimore Sun (1/12, Skalka, Bor, 296K) reports that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s "$20 million plan for funding stem cell research sparked sharp criticism Wednesday from scientists and legislators after a key state official disclosed that preference will be given to work on non-embryonic stem cells. With leading Democratic legislators renewing their call for support of embryonic stem cell research, the lines were clearly drawn for a debate that will dominate the General Assembly session that began Wednesday." Hours after Ehrlich "discussed his plan to commit $20 million in state money to stem cell research at a news conference Wednesday in Baltimore," the governor's "top science adviser, Chris Foster, said he doesn't believe the money would be best spent on embryonic stem cell research. 'I don't think at this time that we need to' fund embryonic cell research, said Foster, deputy secretary of the Department of Business and Economic Development." Foster "said the state would entertain applications for embryonic research but there would be a preference for non-embryonic research, a position that brings Ehrlich closer to President Bush on this contentious issue."

The Washington Times (1/12, Ward, 90K) notes, "The research funds, under the governor's proposal, would be disbursed through a committee controlled by his administration, alleviating concerns among Maryland religious groups that the studies would involve embryonic stem-cell research, considered a form of abortion by some. 'Clearly, no one is going to be funding embryonic, because in 25 years, there have been nothing but miserable failures,' said Nancy Fortier, an associate director at the Maryland Catholic Conference. 'Nonembryonic is what is being used to treat cancer, blindness, heart disease, Parkinson's disease." However, Ehrlich "did not rule out embryonic research. 'If it's embryonic with the best chance for therapeutic results, it will be embryonic,' said Mr. Ehrlich." The governor "said a committee, yet to be named, at the Maryland Technology Development Corporation (TEDCO), 'will make those decisions.'"

Scientist Says Stem Cell Research Must Proceed Without Hype. David A. Shaywitz, an endocrinologist at the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K), "The rapid ascent of stem cell research into the spotlight reflects the collision of exciting science with uncharted ethics. President Bush's Aug. 9, 2001, prohibition on the use of public funds to create new human embryonic stem cell lines ignited interest in this field, even as it made it much more difficult for American scientists to conduct the research. The concern that important medical science was being deliberately thwarted by the federal government enraged many patient advocates and further ratcheted up the demand for results. … The good news is that underneath all this mess, stellar science really is happening. Stem cells have proved even more captivating than we could have imagined, and understanding the process by which a stem cell progressively differentiates into a specialized cell such as a neuron or a pancreas beta cell is perhaps the most compelling biology question for our generation. Stem cells have sparked our interest for good reason. But we're not going to figure out how they work overnight; it will take a very long time and require our best minds, as well as our collective effort (and, ideally, our collective dollars). … Difficult or not, good research is the only responsible way to proceed. If the promise of stem cells is to be fulfilled, the pursuit will require a solid scientific foundation, one grounded in reliable, reproducible facts and not simply supported by hype and hope."

With States Awash In Cash, Governors Proposing Bold Spending Plans, Tax Cuts. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A4, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "Facing fat budget deficits, the Bush administration is preparing a tight 2007 budget that squeezes most domestic programs. Flush with cash, state governors across the country are doing the opposite." California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "proposes a $222 billion bond offering because, he says, 'we need more roads, more hospitals, more schools.'" Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) "seeks '$100 million in smart tax relief that strengthens our economy and invests in new technologies.' In 'State of the State' speeches now echoing through state capitols, others propose a beefed-up minimum wage and tax credits to help with energy costs. It's a far cry from the somber tones many governors struck earlier in the Bush era, as they struggled with the plunge in revenue that followed the 2001 recession." The Journal adds that "many governors spent the first half of this decade cutting expenses and raising taxes to meet state balanced-budget requirements. The revenue surge that accompanied economic recovery has left them in the black at an opportune time: the 2006 election season."

Schwarzenegger Chief Of Staff To Help Reelection Fundraising Efforts. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Salladay, 958K) reports that California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "is dispatching his newly appointed chief of staff to woo wealthy Republican donors for his reelection effort, injecting his most influential policy advisor into the job of collecting money for his campaign. Susan Kennedy, once a top-level Democrat, will play a key role in the governor's reelection bid, the administration confirmed Wednesday. She is being paid campaign funds in addition to her $131,000 government salary and will mix freely with influential contributors." Paul S. Ryan, "associate legal counsel at the Campaign Legal Center in Washington, D.C., said allowing donors access to Kennedy creates 'the appearance of corruption in California. If you are fortunate to afford the price of admission, then you automatically gain access that the vast majority of Californians do not have.'" Under California law, Kennedy is permitted "to attend fundraisers for the governor and work on his campaign, as long as she is doing it on her own time." Schwarzenegger communications director Rob Stutzman "said Kennedy would take vacation days to meet donors and work on the campaign, and would 'absolutely' separate her policy job from the fundraising effort."

Ashcroft's Firm Took In $269,000 In Last Half Of 2005. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column that according to year-end disclosures, former US Attorney General John Ashcroft's lobbying shop "brought in $269,000 for the last six months of 2005. … Many of Ashcroft's restrictions on lobbying his former Justice colleagues expire early next month."

More Companies Expected To Freeze Pensions. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Schultz, Forelle, Francis, 2.11M) predicts that more companies will cut back on pension benefits as "an unusual alignment of financial conditions makes such moves more lucrative than usual. Two trends have emerged in the broad shift away from traditional pensions, which provide workers set benefits based on their salary and years of service. Financially strapped companies such as airlines and auto makers are garnering much of the attention as they seek to ditch their badly underfunded pension liabilities and try to stay afloat. Meanwhile, relatively healthy companies -- many with fully paid-up pension plans -- are seeking to shift to retirement programs that put more of the burden for savings and planning on employees." The Journal adds, "Current interest rates offer employers the possibility of a particularly big income boost if they freeze their pensions, effectively wiping out part of a debt owed to future retirees. While assets in a plan still will be paid out when workers retire or leave the company, benefits don't grow with additional years on the job."

Clinton Foundation Negotiates Lower Costs For AIDS Treatments. Former President Bill Clinton is expected to announce today that his foundation, the William J. Clinton Presidential Foundation, has negotiated lower process on AIDS tests and two AIDS drugs. The New York Times (1/12, McNeil, 1.19M) reports, "Four companies, from the United States, India and China, will offer rapid H.I.V. tests for 49 cents to 65 cents, which will reduce the typical cost of a test in poor countries by half, Mr. Clinton said in a written statement. Another four companies - three from India and one from South Africa - will make the antiretroviral drug efavirenz for as little as $240 per patient per year. One of the Indian companies, Cipla, will also make the antiretroviral abacavir for $447."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Schoofs, 2.11M) adds, "The Clinton team worked to lower prices by helping obtain cheaper ingredients to manufacture drugs. For example, one chemical ingredient accounts for most of the cost of making the drug abacavir. The foundation found an alternative supplier willing to slash the price for that ingredient, according to people at the foundation and at the manufacturing company, Matrix Laboratories Ltd. of India. To make efavirenz another raw material is crucial but expensive, so the foundation approached a university researcher and asked him to develop a cheaper method of synthesizing that ingredient, which he has done."

WPost Says Maryland Bill Is Aimed At Wal-Mart. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/12, A20, 744K) says state lawmakers in Maryland are preparing to "impose legislation" on Wal-Mart "so arbitrary that it may achieve the near-impossible feat of casting Wal-Mart as the victim. The Maryland bill would force firms with more than 10,000 in-state employees to spend at least 8 percent of their payrolls on workers' health insurance plans or make compensatory payments to the state. Only three other Maryland employers have more than 10,000 workers on their payrolls -- Johns Hopkins University, Northrop Grumman Corp. and Giant Food Inc. -- and they already meet or exceed the 8 percent threshold. Apparently, only Wal-Mart, with about 15,000 full- and part-time employees in Maryland, does not; thus the bill applies uniquely to Wal-Mart." The Post adds, "The Maryland bill is a legislative mugging masquerading as an act of benevolent social engineering. … And unlovable as it may be, Wal-Mart serves low- and middle-income people, both by creating entry-level and part-time jobs for people who might otherwise be unemployed and by saving its moderate-income customers a staggering amount of money."

Rice Secures Russian Support On Iran. The Washington Post (1/12, Linzer, 744K) reports this morning, "The Bush administration, working intensely to galvanize international pressure on Iran, has secured a guarantee from Russia that it will not block US efforts to take Tehran's nuclear case to the UN Security Council, American and European officials said yesterday." The "commitment," adds the Post, was "made in a Tuesday night phone call between Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." It "will likely help the United States and its European allies win support from key countries weighing a tougher line in response to Iran's resumption of sensitive nuclear work." The AP (1/12, Karimi) reports that Rice had discussed the situation by telephone with IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, while noting that "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shrugged off the international outcry. 'Unfortunately, a group of bullies allows itself to deprive nations of their legal and natural rights,'" he was quoted as saying.

Television coverage of the Iran situation was sparse, with only ABC Evening News (1/11) mentioning the story among the broadcast networks' evening-news programs. ABC reported that "western nations will likely seek economic sanctions from Iran for resuming its nuclear program." Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/12, Weisman, 1.19M) characterizes the standoff as a "contest of wills," and cites comments by Vice President Dick Cheney Wednesday "that the United States would seek the adoption of 'a resolution that could be enforced by sanctions, were they to fail to comply with it.'" On Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Baier), Cheney was shown saying, "They have been offered that opportunity, guaranteed source of fuel that would be enriched only to the level necessary to run civilian reactor. The Russians would take back the spent fuel so it could be reprocessed and they have not been satisfied with that. They want the ability to enrich the uranium themselves and that would take it up to the next level of purity."

The PBS Newshour With Jim Lehrer (1/11) also made mention of the crisis, quoting British Prime Minister Blair's Wednesday speech in the House of Commons in which he expressed "deep dismay" at the escalation. According to the Financial Times (1/12, Khalaf, Dombey), Blair "vowed to report Iran to the United Nations Security Council." The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Ford, 61K) runs a similar report.

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/12, 744K) editorializes today that "Iran's resumption of uranium enrichment dramatically narrows the options of Western governments. … And thanks to better footwork by the Bush administration, European governments no longer have the option of blaming the United States for the failure of diplomacy."

In addition Farouz Farzami, an Iranian journalist "who is forbidden to publish in her own country," writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M), "On the surface, it would appear that pressure from the United Nations and the United States has little effect on the mullahs who rule Iran. The opposite is true." In fact, "if you look past this headline-generating bluster, you see that Western pressure is having an effect. The hard-line position of the Iranian government has begun to splinter. There are now three minds about this issue in the Majlis, the Iranian parliament: A categorical rejection of the Russian proposal to allow Iran to enrich uranium at its facilities, a compromise that would deny Iran the privilege of enriching uranium on its own soil. Modifying the Russian proposal to allow for enrichment to occur in both Russia and Iran. Suspending all enrichment until further notice or even to some agreed-upon future date, to defuse tension and rebuild confidence with the European Union." He adds, "The existence of these more conciliatory positions in a Majlis completely composed of religious hard-liners is a surprise. (A fourth point of view unrepresented officially, since reformers have been thrown out of the government, calls for Iran to comply with the U.N.'s demands and give up on enrichment of nuclear fuel altogether.)"

Also Dariush Zahedi, a political scientist at the University of California at Berkeley, and Omid Memarian, an Iranian journalist and blogger, write in the New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) that Iran "seems to be courting confrontation. But Western leaders would do well to consider what President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's bravado really says about Iran's likely posture in the region and at the nuclear talks that are scheduled to resume at the end of January. To continue down the path of conflict could be very costly, both for the regional interests of the United States and most of all, for the territorial integrity of Iran." Ahmadinejad "appears to be acting on the perception that the United States is in a position of considerable, indeed unprecedented, weakness. America's military is overstretched in Iraq and Afghanistan, and Washington has focused on monitoring North Korea's nuclear program rather than Iran's. If threatened, Iran could wreak havoc in Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon and Israel. These observations may lead Mr. Ahmadinejad to an incorrect assessment of Iran's strength relative to any American threat."

Rice Threatens Syria With UN Action. The Washington Post (1/12, Gearan, 744K) reports "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a new threat Wednesday to haul a defiant Syria before the UN Security Council if Damascus does not cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination in Lebanon." Syria, says the Post, "has failed to heed UN Security Council warnings about its behavior in Lebanon and elsewhere, Rice said, ... and the United States opposes 'any deals or compromises' with Damascus that would undermine the investigation." Reuters (1/11) also reports on Rice's "strongly worded statement," in which she cites what she called Syria's "destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism." The AP (1/12, Gearan), Bloomberg (1/12, Zacharia) and Wall Street Journal (1/12, King Jr., 2.11M) also report the story.

Likud Cabinet Members Plan To Resign. The Washington Times (1/12, 90K) reports, "Cabinet ministers from the Likud Party were to resign from the coalition government today, signaling an end to a weeklong political cease-fire following the massive stroke that felled Prime Minister Ariel Sharon." This will "will have little practical impact on the government, which will serve only as a caretaker until the March elections. Likud hopes to sharpen the distinctions between itself and Kadima as it goes into the campaign." While Sharon "could remain in the hospital for months," his "recently formed Kadima party is a strong favorite to form the next government, even with his likely successor, Ehud Olmert, at the helm."

Doctors Say Brain Damage Likely For Sharon. The Washington Times (1/12, Price, 90K) reports, "The movement that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon experienced on both sides of his body after a massive stroke last week bodes well in terms of his survival, but he could live with brain damage." Dr. Jose Cohen, one of Mr. Sharon's neurosurgeons at Hadassah University Medical Center in Jerusalem said that the stroke "certainly would have caused cognitive damage." However, only "after Mr. Sharon is weaned from the sedatives" can "his doctors in Jerusalem can assess brain damage and function."

Israel Halts Negotiations On Christian Center Over Robertson's Comments. The New York Times (1/12, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Israel said Wednesday that it was breaking off negotiations on a tourism project with the evangelical leader Pat Robertson in response to his remarks suggesting that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke was divine retribution," although it "would be willing to continue the talks without him."

Hoagland Says Stoke May Have Ended Chance Of Palestinian Democratic State. Jim Hoagland writes in his column in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K) that the United States, its European and Arab allies, and the United Nations "are visibly failing" to make "Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip into a catalyst for the creation of an independent, viable Palestinian state." The spreading "chaos in Gaza and Ariel Sharon's sudden incapacitation by a severe stroke are destabilizing blows to President Bush's proclaimed strategy for transforming the Middle East into a zone of democracies," and now "Bush must reassess whether he can get there from here," as "without Sharon in power, the odds drop to virtually zero" for creating a democratic Palestinian state.

US Looking To Reopen Nuclear Talks With North Korea. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (1/12, Kim) reports that U.S. ambassador Alexander Vershbow said in a speech in Seoul that "the United States wants to quickly resume nuclear talks with North Korea." Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said "he would seek information in Beijing on the latest North Korean thinking from its closest ally."

Negroponte Announces Intelligence Mission Managers For North Korea, Iran. The New York Times (1/12, Jehl, 1.19M) reports, "The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, has created new 'mission managers' for Iran and North Korea, adding those two countries to a short list of top-priority challenges for American intelligence agencies," Joseph DeTrani is responsible for North Korea, and S. Leslie Ireland for Iran. They "will be responsible, among other things, for identifying and filling gaps in intelligence on those two countries." Last year the Robb-Silberman commission, an independent panel appointed by President Bush, "described American intelligence on Iran and North Korea as woefully inadequate."

Whereabouts Of Kim Jong Il Remain A Mystery. Meanwhile, the AP (1/12, Kurtenbach) reports "the whereabouts of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il remained unclear Thursday, with a Hong Kong-based television network speculating he may be headed for the south Chinese city of Guangzhou, while other reports put him in Beijing or Russia." The Washington Post (1/12, 744K) places him in Shanghai, which if "true, analysts said that Kim's visit could represent an effort to win China's support for lifting U.S. economic sanctions." Reuters (1/12, Herskovitz) cites comments by US Ambassador Alexander Vershbow as saying: "We hope that he is there [China] and having high-level meetings."

China Unlikely To Use Economic Leverage Against North Korea. The Washington Times (1/12, Salmon, 90K) reports, "Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions are likely to figure in any negotiations North Korean leader Kim Jong-il holds in China this week, but Asian analysts see little chance that Beijing will use its growing economic clout to bring its neighbor to heel," even though "U.S. officials, ranging from Mr. Hill to Vice President Dick Cheney, have called in recent months for China to use its influence to press North Korea for greater cooperation in the nuclear talks." As "South Korea also has been reluctant to bring economic pressure on Pyongyang, partly for fear of falling further behind China in a long-term competition for trade opportunities in its northern neighbor," there has been "a narrowing of policy options for the United States."

Would-Be Bush Assassin Sentenced To Life Imprisonment In Georgia. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 8, :45, Schieffer) reported, "A man who tried to assassinate President Bush last spring in the former Soviet Republic of Georgia was sentenced today to life in prison. The would-be assassin was an opponent of the government then in power in Georgia and he threw a grenade at a rally where the President was speaking. It landed in the crowd well short of the podium, but did not explode."

China Says Trade Surplus Tripled In '05. The New York Times (1/12, Barboza, 1.19M) reports, "China said on Wednesday that its trade surplus with the rest of the world had tripled in 2005, to a record $102 billion, a figure that could reignite global trade frictions and step up pressure on the government to allow its currency to appreciate further." These "figures suggest a changing role for China in the global economy, indicating that it will influence things like prices at Wal-Mart and global interest rates." However, "the growing bilateral trade deficit could strain ties between the United States and China."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Hiebert, 2.11M) adds, "some economists believe China's trade surplus could narrow this year because its imports have begun to pick up in recent months. Beijing is also seeking to reduce trade frictions by promoting domestic consumption." However, "economists point out that the overall U.S. deficit with Asia has remained roughly in balance over the past decade."

Communist Officials Said To Abuse Power To Enrich Selves, Cronies. The Washington Post (1/12, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports that American investor Terry Petty "had forged a venture with the son of a local Communist Party official to open a machine shop" in Shanghai." However, men hired by his partner "forced their way in, brandishing guns, sparring with workers and disabling machinery" after he refused to sell his stake. "Calls to the police proved futile, factory managers said, because the police took direction from local officials connected to the Chinese partner. … The case has garnered the attention of both the United States and Shanghai governments." With market reforms opening investment, "some Communist Party officials abuse their influence over local governments to enrich themselves and their cronies."

Chinese Proposal Suggests Power Project Could Use Fewer Dams. The New York Times (1/12, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "A government environmental review has recommended reducing the number of dams included in a controversial hydropower proposal on the Nu River in southwestern China in order to limit environmental damage and decrease the number of people who would be resettled," calling "for 4 dams instead the 13 in the original Nu proposal." However, the Hong Kong newspaper that reported the story, Wen Wei Po, which has ties to the Communist Party, "suggested that the full 13 dams had not been completely ruled out."

Industry Polluting Much Of China's Waterways. The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Cody, 744K) reports, "The fouling of the Xiang River attracted wide attention, but it was far from unique as China struggles to reconcile breakneck economic growth with protection of the environment. After more than two decades of swift industrialization, a recent government report found that up to 70 percent of the country's rivers and lakes are seriously polluted." Although "extensive national regulations have been put into place," the "enforcement of environmental rules has often been lax, and the result has been frequent contamination of the waterways that China's 1.3 billion people depend on for drinking water."

WSJournal Says Private Economy Would Prevent Pollution. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) editorializes, "The recent news has been bad PR for the PRC" as "problems are popping up all over." While "it's hard to tell exactly how widespread the problems are, but we'd go out on a limb and guess, oh, 'pretty vast.'" Still, "if Beijing really wanted to tackle its environmental malaise, it would move faster to dump state enterprises and speed the development of a private economy in which managers are held accountable both for making a profit and for fouling the air and water," as "China's current environmental problems stem from its rampant misallocation of capital and resources over many decades."

Concerns Raised About Accuracy Of China's Bird Flu Reporting. The Washington Post (1/12, A13, Cody, 744K) reports, "The World Health Organization identified China's latest bird flu victims…who succumbed to the H5N1 strain of the virus last month in different parts of the country" and were only reported two days ago. "The Health Ministry's spokesman, Mao Qunan, spoke at length about bird flu at a news conference Tuesday but did not mention the additional deaths. Mao's omission and the delay in reporting the deaths to WHO fed concerns about the reliability of official information on the extent of bird flu" in China which, after "the SARS controversy…pledged to deal squarely with health information." However, "Chinese reporters have said they are frequently forced to seek information about China's bird flu situation from WHO or foreign publications because China's official sources refuse to provide it."

Turkish Authorities Struggle To Keep Up To 20 Avian Flu Outbreaks Under Control. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 7, 2:00, Woodruff) reported the virulent avian flu strain H5N1 "has suddenly spread west to Turkey, where nearly two dozen human cases have been confirmed in just a few days." ABC (Sciutto) added, "Today, they went from house-to-house here, government teams searching for birds and killing every one they found. Then, disinfecting the homes and themselves." Bird flu "is spreading through Turkey faster than anywhere else in the world. Three new human cases today, 18 in just one week." Dr. Joseph Domenech, United Nations: "The situation is worrying, because we have more outbreaks than we thought." Sciutto: "Normally, one or two in the country. Here, nearly 20 separate outbreaks cross Turkey."

Initial Turkish Response Criticized. The New York Times (1/12, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports that international experts said Turkey's "slow initial response in detecting the arrival of bird flu three weeks ago has created a health crisis that may be very hard to correct." Dr. Joseph Domenech, chief of veterinary services at the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization in Rome said "there was now a risk that the virus had become so entrenched in Turkey that it would be impossible to eradicate it," although "both he and United Nations health officials agreed that Turkey was now taking the problem 'seriously.'"

UN Tries To Prevent Panic Over Avian Flu Cases In Turkey. The Washington Times (1/12, Pisik, 90K) reports, "The United Nations yesterday sought to calm fears about the deadly avian flu virus as signs of near-panic spread through Turkey and its neighbors." Dr. David Nabarro, the coordinator of the U.N. response to the avian flu, "stressed that 'there is no evidence of human-to-human transmission in the Turkey outbreak.' He said each case appeared to be traceable to avian contact." World Health Organization officials also "praised Ankara's response to the crisis, but officials insisted that the counterinfluenza measures must be maintained."

Bird Flu Mutation May Make Bird To Person Transmission Easier. The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Williams, Sipress, 744K) reports that international health officials said "preliminary tests show that the strain of bird flu virus that has stricken at least 15 people in Turkey has evolved in a way that could make it somewhat more hazardous to human beings, although it still lacks the capacity to be passed easily from person to person." While "Influenza experts are studying the apparent change to determine its significance," they "say they believe the genetic change could make it easier for bird flu to pass from chickens to people."

OPEC Expected To See Record Oil Revenues. The Financial Times (1/12, Hoyos) reports that the US Department of Energy forecasts that "oil revenues of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel that controls 40 per cent of the world's oil supplies, will increase by 10 per cent to a record $522bn this year," which "should help keep interest rates low if members of the group continue to spend their increasing wealth in the US bond market."

Bush Signs Trade Pact With Bahrain. The New York Times/Reuters (1/12) reports, "President Bush signed a bill on Wednesday establishing a free trade agreement with Bahrain, the first such pact with a Persian Gulf country." It "requires Bahrain to eliminate its already low tariffs on American consumer and industrial goods and most agricultural products" while "the United States will eliminate tariffs on Bahraini goods."

Canada's Martin Accuses Opponent Of Being Too Close To Bush. The Washington Post (1/12, A18, Struck, 744K) reports, "Well behind in the polls two weeks before a parliamentary election, the governing Liberal Party led by Prime Minister Paul Martin this week brought what in Canadian politics is a most damning indictment: Martin's opponent is too close to the Americans." In Canada, "hostility toward the Bush administration is strongest in eastern cities, traditional strongholds of the Liberal Party. With opinion polls showing the party losing some of that support, Martin's strategists are trying to tap the sentiment," Nelson Wiseman, a political scientist at the University of Toronto said.

Low Turnout In US For Mexican Election Ballot Requests. USA Today (1/12, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "With the deadline" for Mexican expatriates to request ballots for Mexico's presidential election "looming, only a fraction of eligible Mexicans in the USA have participated because of confusion about the application, lack of interest in the campaign and concern that applying for ballots could result in problems with U.S. immigration officials." Out of "an estimated 4 million expatriates who have Mexican voting cards," only about 15,000 applied. "Some people left their voting cards in Mexico so relatives could pay property taxes in their absence or conduct other business" and others "who are here illegally threw away their cards to avoid having any identification." Interest also may be low because "no campaigning is allowed in the USA."

Analysts Worry Citgo Has Become Political Tool For Chavez. USA Today (1/12, Lynch, 2.31M) reports, "The question of" Hugo Chavez's "influence over Citgo was highlighted by the company's recent provision of 25 million gallons of subsidized home-heating oil to poor people in the northeast USA." Analysts "saw the move as a stunt by Chavez aimed at embarrassing the Bush administration. And some say Citgo's generosity…suggests the company may be turning into a political tool for Chavez" and "worry that Venezuela's ownership of more than 6% of U.S. refinery capacity gives Chavez…the power to cripple as well as comfort." However, "others note that imported oil from elsewhere eventually could compensate for any interruption in Citgo supplies" and that "a shutdown would cost him and his country dearly."

Merkel's Washington Visit Could Begin New Era In US-German Relations. Knight Ridder (1/12, Schofield) reports, "When new German Chancellor Angela Merkel sits down on Friday with President Bush in Washington, they'll be ushering in a new era of trans-Atlantic relations - that much is clear. But what those relations will be is less certain." While "Bush finally has a German friend in Merkel," she, "like much of Europe,…finds some of Bush's policies distasteful, and analysts are wondering how far she'll be willing to go in voicing disagreement." Still, "there's little doubt in Germany that she's the only European leader with the staying power to help Bush improve his relations with Europe."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, LaFranchi, 61K) adds there is a question "whether the diplomatic defrosting portends a deeper restrengthening of US-German relations and indeed of transatlantic cooperation," and some experts say "the improvement in US-German atmospherics is not likely to reverse the general drifting apart in transatlantic relations."

Yushchenko Ignores Ukrainian Parliament's Vote To Dismiss Government. The New York Times (1/12, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine on Wednesday criticized as illegitimate a parliamentary vote to dismiss his prime minister and government, deepening the country's political turmoil ahead of new elections in March." Prime minister, Yury I. Yekhanurov, "defied Parliament's vote…by presiding over a meeting of the government's ministers." The dispute "not only undermined" Yushchenko's "political position before the elections but also called into question recent constitutional changes that gave Parliament new powers, including the authority to dismiss the government."

Blair Appeals To Bush To Save Rolls-Royce Contract. The Financial Times (1/12, Alden, Spiegel, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair, the British prime minister, has made a 'very forceful' personal plea to President George W. Bush to save a $2.4bn (€2bn) contract for Rolls-Royce and General Electric to develop a second engine for the Joint Strike Fighter," and "reverse a Pentagon decision to kill the engine before the proposed 2007 defence budget is sent to Congress." Those "familiar with the lobbying campaign said Mr Blair has lent his full muscle to the effort and involved several senior British officials, including Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's chief of staff." However, "Despite industry and Whitehall insiders said yesterday that there is considerable debate within the British government about how forcefully to back Rolls with the Bush administration."

Blair Unveils Program To Deal With Anti-Social Programs. The Washington Times (1/12, Webb, 90K) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair, introducing a key plank of his third and final term in office, has started a $140 million action plan dubbed 'Respect' to attack anti-social problems." He said that "the nation has been fighting '21st-century crime with 19th-century methods' and called for a system of speedy 'summary justice' to bypass traditional courts." Blair "envisions evicting out-of-control families from their homes…for up to three months, and rehousing them in a network of residential centers…to teach them how to behave." Another "key element in the action plan centers on efforts to control unruly children and to help their beleaguered parents." However, "critics immediately attacked Mr. Blair's plan, one dismissing it as 'rubbish,' and another describing it as a package of 'minor tweaks to existing measures and shock tactics.'"

Kazakh Election Poses Conundrum For West. The Washington Times (1/12, Pala, 90K) reports, "In a ceremony as rich in irony as in glitter, President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who has led Kazakhstan for 16 years, was sworn in yesterday for another seven-year term." Despite "widespread ballot-stuffing" and "unlike" Georgia, Ukraine, and Kyrgyzstan, "not a single street demonstration erupted to protest the vote. Opposition leaders said they did not want to be blamed if the government opened fire on demonstrators." The West faces "an unusual conundrum: how to deal with a genuinely popular dictator of an oil-rich and strategic country who, despite muzzling the press, stifling the opposition and brushing aside mounting evidence of nepotism and corruption, would have won easily without cheating."

Harvard Student Claims Detention In Zimbabwe. The Washington Post (1/12, A3, Fahrenthold, 744K) reports that Harvard University student Amar Bakshi "said Wednesday that he had been arrested in Zimbabwe during a trip to research his senior thesis, then held in grimy cells for five days before his parents and local lawyers managed to free him." He believes that "the key to his release might have been a surreptitious cell phone call he made soon after his arrest" Calling form "a bathroom, he told a friend that he had been pulled off an outbound airplane by plainclothes officers." While "Bakshi's account of the ordeal was reported previously by the Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper, and in Zimbabwe by the Standard, an independent weekly," any "official corroboration" was "difficult to find."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Softens Opposition To Hearings On NSA Domestic Intelligence Program. In a speech in Louisville, KY, President Bush addressed the possibility of congressional hearings on the NSA domestic spying program. Bush's assertion that he's not opposed to hearings as long as they don't "'tell the enemy what we're doing" are being cast as a shift in his position. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 4, :45, Schieffer), the only show to report Bush's comments on the controversy, reported the President "softened his opposition today to congressional hearings on the secret program he authorized to eavesdrop on Americans. Mr. Bush said in a speech Louisville today that hearings would be good for democracy if, he said, they do not give away information to what he called the enemy. The President again insisted he does have the legal authority to authorize such programs."

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Gerstenzang, 958K) also says Bush "stepped back from the strong opposition he expressed last month." Bush's comments "came in response to a question at a citizens forum in Louisville as he took his case for the Iraq war to an audience beyond Washington."

The Washington Post (1/12, A7, Fletcher, 744K) says Bush's "campaign-style" event "was different than most of the events he attends nationwide. Usually he speaks to carefully screened partisan audiences and takes no questions. White House aides described Wednesday's audience of business and community leaders as bipartisan, and Bush opened himself to unscripted questions during the town-hall-style event." The New York Times (1/12, Sanger, 1.19M) headlines its story "In Shift, Bush Says He Welcomes Inquiry On Secret Wiretaps," and notes the President "was repeatedly applauded for authorizing the wiretaps" during "his campaign-style meeting." The Times adds, "Asked whether his administration was going to "go after the media" for revealing operations like the domestic wiretapping, Mr. Bush instead defended his decision to authorize the surveillance." USA Today (1/12, Diamond, Jackson, 2.31M) adds Bush said "that administration lawyers had approved the program."

The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (1/12, 119K) reports Bush "was initially opposed to having the program investigated in a public format, but made it clear that he is resigned to open hearings that are scheduled to begin in coming weeks. … In the days after the program's existence was revealed, Bush cautioned against hearings, arguing that the appropriate members of Congress were being consulted privately and offering assurances that he was working within the law to authorize the eavesdropping. 'Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy, "Here's what they do -- adjust." This is a war,' Bush said at a December news conference when asked about expected hearings on Capitol Hill."

Reuters (1/12) quotes Bush saying, "I can understand concerns about this program, before I went forward I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president. … We are a...country of law." He added, "I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people. … One way to protect us is to understand the nature of the enemy. Part of being able to deal with this kind of enemy in a different kind of war is to understand why they're making decisions they're making inside our country."

Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Cameron) added, "Taking questions from an audience, Bush said he understands concern about limited eavesdropping on people in the US, but said he has taken every available step to protect civil liberties." Bush "noted that Congress knew about the program beforehand, but did not complain." Fox also noted, "Despite all the recent complaints and concerns, to date, not one lawmaker has formally requested that the program be stopped."

The Washington Times (1/12, Curl, 90K) reports that after Bush spoke, "Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean criticized the Bush administration's 'disregard for our courts and our laws.'" Said Dean, "President Bush's decision to sidestep the rule of law and spy on Americans without a court order may have dealt a serious blow to our ability to fight and win the war on terror."

Bush addressed other issues yesterday in Kentucky, but with the exception of his comments on Iraq, which got some coverage, they received little media attention. The Lexington Herald-Leader (KY) (1/12, 119K) reports Bush "took questions for nearly an hour. When a small business owner focused on rising health insurance costs, Bush acknowledged 'it's becoming an unmanageable cost.'" He "touted health savings accounts and association health plans that pool employees together to try to hold down insurance costs." Bush also "said something needs to be done to halt frivolous medical liability lawsuits that he said drive up health costs." He also "hinted that his upcoming State of the Union speech would address the problem of low math and science proficiency among middle and high school students." Another questioner "asked Bush about immigration. Bush said border security is vital but urged compassion for foreigners coming to the U.S. in search of work."

NSA IG Opens Investigation Into Domestic Spying Program. Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Hume) reported, "The National Security Agency Inspector General has opened an investigation into the NSA's electronic eavesdropping program that…Bush authorized after 9/11 to operate sometimes without a warrant. Critics complain that surveillance of communications between suspected terrorists and people inside the US may violate civil rights." Fox (Cameron) added, "It is a controversy that the president welcomes and is eager to explain."

Herbert Calls Bush "The Lawbreaker In The Oval Office." Columnist Bob Herbert, in a column titled "The Lawbreaker In The Oval Office," writes in the New York Times (1/12, 1.19M), "The country has set the bar so low for the performance of…Bush as president that it is effectively on the ground. No one expects very much from Mr. Bush. He's currently breaking the law by spying on Americans in America without getting warrants, but for a lot of people that's just George being George. Forget the complexities of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or even the Fourth Amendment's safeguards against unwarranted (pun intended) government intrusion into matters that we have a right to keep private." He adds, "On his frequent trips home to his ranch in Texas, the president likes to ride his bicycle. He's not studying the Constitution." The Administration "should not be allowed to use war as an excuse. The US is a very special place in large part because no one, not even the president, is above the law."

NSA Tells Whistleblower Not To Testify About Secret Programs. Under the headline "Ex-Official Warned Against Testifying On NSA Programs," The Washington Times (1.12, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Renee Seymour, director of NSA special access programs stated in a Jan. 9 letter to Russ Tice that he should not testify about secret electronic intelligence programs because members and staff of the House and Senate intelligence committees do not have the proper security clearances for the secret intelligence," although she noted that Tice "has 'every right' to speak to Congress and that NSA has 'no intent to infringe your rights.'" The Times adds that Seymour also said that Tice, "who was dismissed in May, failed to notify either the Pentagon or NSA of the improper behavior that he is charging," and therefore "must first give statements to the Defense Department and NSA inspectors general before he provides any classified information to Congress from the SAPs."

NSA Leakers, Media Seen As Abetting Terrorists. In a Washington Times (1/12, 90K) op-ed, Douglas MacKinnon, former White House and Pentagon official and press secretary to Sen. Bob Dole, writes, "Until recently, I believed that the liberal Americans in society and the media who espouse blind hatred for the Bush administration, the unilateral responsibility to defend our nation, our intelligence operatives and even our military, would see the error of their ways should we one day tragically lose an American city and its innocent inhabitants to terrorism. Today, I wonder if they might not only secretly rejoice at the thought of the 'Great Satan' being 'justifiably' punished in such a manner, but with their very actions, sow the seeds of such destruction? … The latest case of government employees betraying their trust and our nation by leaking information to the media being the story that 'the Bush administration was running a covert-domestic-spying program.'" MacKinnon adds, "Since September 11, we have all been waiting for the next shoe to drop. … The shoe may well be American made."

Etzioni Says Questions About NSA Surveillance Should Not Delay Patriot Act Renewal. In a USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) op-ed, author Amitai Etzioni writes, "A steady stream of revelations, and the ensuing news media reports, have portrayed a president hungry for power, doing whatever is necessary — legal or not — to protect this country. In the wake of such news, some lawmakers in Congress see weakness and an opportunity to gut one of President Bush's vital weapons in the war on terror: the USA Patriot Act. Congress should not hold up extending vital sections of the Patriot Act in reaction to these recently revealed power grabs. The president's authorization of spying on Americans by the National Security Agency has nothing to do with the Patriot Act; nor do secret prisons, nor memos allowing torture. Questions over how much power the commander in chief can exercise must be sorted out by Congress and the courts, but the Patriot Act shouldn't be held for ransom."

Man Who Threw Grenade At Bush Sentenced To Life In Georgia. CNN.com (1/12) reports, "A Republic of Georgia court has sentenced a man to life in prison for attempting to assassinate U.S. President George W. Bush by lobbing a hand grenade towards a podium during a rally in the capital last year, according to Georgia's interior minister." CNN continues, "Vladimir Arutinian of Tbilisi was also found guilty of trying to assassinate Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili, who was standing on the podium with Bush on May 10. … He was also convicted of killing a police officer who tried to apprehend him two months after the incident." CNN adds, "The would-be assassin threw a grenade into a crowd about 20 meters (65 feet) from the stage where Bush had just begun speaking, but the grenade, wrapped in a plaid cloth, failed to detonate, authorities said. … Initial reports said the grenade was not live, but authorities later said it was. … Georgia's Interior Minister Vano Meradishvili told CNN he fully expected Arutinian to appeal the ruling because he 'enjoys the attention' that he has received. … Arutinian would not be eligible for parole, and could only be released under a presidential pardon, which was unlikely under Saakashvili, Meradishvili said. … In September, a U.S. federal grand jury indicted Arutinian for the assassination attempt against Bush, and could request his extradition if he is released in the future."

Drug Traffickers, Terrorists Using Prepaid ATM Cards, Internet To Launder Funds. USA Today (1/12, Leinwand, 2.31M) reports, "Drug traffickers and suspected terrorists are using prepaid ATM cards and Internet-based payment systems to help launder billions of dollars each year, the Treasury Department reported Wednesday in what it called the first government-wide analysis of money laundering in the USA. … The report, which included contributions from 16 federal agencies, will be used to help officials devise a national strategy to fight money laundering, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said." USA adds, "Levey said it's unclear how much money in the USA is made from criminal enterprises. The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy estimates sales of illicit drugs in the USA produce $65 billion a year for traffickers. … 'The key to ending drug trafficking is to wipe out the money side,' Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen Tandy said. The DEA seized $2 billion in 2005, up from $500 million in 2003, she said."

Reuters (1/12, Macinnis) reports, "Internet banking, online payment systems and stored value cards not requiring identification give criminals new opportunities to filter money through the United States, U.S regulators said on Wednesday." Reuters continues, "Representatives of the Treasury Department, Federal Reserve, Justice Department and other government enforcement agencies urged in a Money Laundering Threat Assessment report more cooperation to squeeze money launderers and narrow potential avenues for tainted funds. … 'The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is undeniably vast and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization and the advent of new financial services,' they said in the report, a precursor to the government's annual Anti-Money Laundering Strategy." Reuters adds, "The regulators and law enforcement officials said it was 'currently not possible' to accurately estimate the total amount of money laundering in the United States, or how much is being cut off by government enforcement. … Citing a need for a common definition of what constitutes money laundering, regulators said they needed more cooperation to patch vulnerabilities from money orders, stored value cards, check cashing, electronic payments, remittances and other financial transfers. … 'Moving away from face-to-face customer interaction, particularly for (bank) account openings, challenges the traditional process of customer due diligence,' they said."

ABC News (1/11, Ryan) reports, "Money laundering remains a 'massive and evolving challenge' for investigators, according to the federal government's first-ever threat assessment of the problem." ABC News continues, "Even getting a handle on the size of the money laundering threat and the success of efforts to stop it has been difficult, the report found. … 'It is currently not possible, for example, to quantify with accuracy the total money laundering activity being apprehended by the government,' it said." ABC News adds, "Problems with data, incompatible computer systems and even differing definitions of 'money laundering' have hampered some efforts to combat the crime. The assessment is intended to help law enforcement and government regulators grapple with the issue. … 'Before you can effectively treat a problem, you must first have an accurate diagnosis,' said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence."

Swiss Investigate Leak Of Document On CIA Prisons. The New York Times (1/12, Carvajal, Tribune, 1.19M) reports, "Switzerland is conducting criminal investigations to track down the source of a leak to the Zurich-based newspaper SonntagsBlick of what it reported was a secret document citing clandestine C.I.A. prisons in Eastern Europe." The document was said to be "sent by satellite and intercepted by the Swiss Strategic Intelligence Service," and "high-ranking Swiss government officials, who urged the paper to withhold the information," never "contested the authenticity of the document," which "said the United States had held 23 Iraqi and Afghan prisoners at a base in Romania. It also referred to similar detention centers in Bulgaria, Kosovo, Macedonia and Ukraine."

Guantanamo Prisoner Boycotts US Tribunal. Reuters (1/12, Sutton) reports that Yemeni Ali Hamza al Bahlul, who is "accused of being a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden went before a U.S. military tribunal on Wednesday and said he would boycott his war crimes trial because he did not recognize the tribunal's authority." He had "a list of nine reasons why he refused to be represented by a military lawyer or to participate further, including" accusations that "Guantanamo prisoners had been tortured" and "the potential use of secret evidence and to the U.S. characterization of prisoners as illegal belligerents." Army Reserve Maj. Tom Fleener, the lawyer appointed by the military to defend him "called the tribunals a sham and said it is an ethical violation for him to represent a prisoner who has rejected his services."

The New York Times (1/12, Cloud, 1.19M) adds, "Even as Mr. Bahlul has acknowledged his connections to Al Qaeda, he has shown a talent for courtroom theatrics that have at times flummoxed the commissioners. Little has gone smoothly for the military commissions, which the Bush administration created to try Guantánamo prisoners and which have suffered setbacks because of legal challenges, including a review from the Supreme Court."

The Washington Times ran the Reuters story, and the AP (1/11, Leitsinger) also covered it.

British Accuse Cleric Of Inciting Hatred Toward Jews. The New York Times (1/12, Cowell, 1.19M) reports, "In a closely watched trial, a prominent British Muslim cleric," Abu Hamza al-Masri, "was accused Wednesday of inciting hatred against Jews, praising Hitler and voicing support for suicide bombings" and thereby "violating various British laws" in various "lectures and sermons recorded on videotape and audio cassettes in which he was reported to have said he wanted to see the establishment of an Islamic caliphate in the White House."

The Los Angles Times (1/12, Stobart) adds, "Masri…became well known as the radical preacher at North London's Finsbury Park Mosque" which "was considered a crossroads for terrorists such as Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber, before and after the Sept. 11 attacks." The US has indicted Masri "on 11 terrorism-related charges, including his alleged role in a plot to set up a terrorist training camp in rural Oregon in 1999. It is seeking his extradition."

PATRIOT ACT:

Arkansas US Attorney Touts Usefulness Of Patriot Act. KATV-TV, ABC 7, Little Rock, AR (1/12) reports, "The U.S. Attorney's office is using a conference on terrorism (in Little Rock, AR) to tout the usefulness of the Patriot Act, set to expire on February 3. Supporters of the act say it's essential to protect the American public against the war on terror. Opponents say it's a violation of civil liberties. It's a heavily debated issue about which both sides have strong opinions." US Attorney Bud Cummins "says many of the allegations made against the act are simply not true.. … 'There's nothing ground-breaking about the provisions of the Patriot Act. It's just trying to afford the investigators in these very important terrorism investigations to have the same type of tools we use against drug dealers.'" KATV-TV adds, "Cummins says provisions in the Patriot Act lower the wall between criminal and intelligence investigators to share information and allow intelligence investigators to use similar techniques in criminal investigations. The act also updates laws for electronic surveillance. … 'Terrorists don't use rotary telephones. They use cell phones, pagers, e-mail, text messaging, Web sites, we need to be able to keep up with that.'"

More Patriot Act Commentary. In an op-ed in USA Today (1/12), Amitai Etzioni, author of "How Patriotic is the Patriot Act?: Freedom vs. Security in the Age of Terrorism" and a member of the Markel task force on national security and information, writes, "A steady stream of revelations, and the ensuing news media reports, have portrayed a president hungry for power, doing whatever is necessary — legal or not — to protect this country. In the wake of such news, some lawmakers in Congress see weakness and an opportunity to gut one of President Bush's vital weapons in the war on terror: the USA Patriot Act. … Congress should not hold up extending vital sections of the Patriot Act in reaction to these recently revealed power grabs. The president's authorization of spying on Americans by the National Security Agency has nothing to do with the Patriot Act; nor do secret prisons, nor memos allowing torture. Questions over how much power the commander in chief can exercise must be sorted out by Congress and the courts, but the Patriot Act shouldn't be held for ransom." Etzioni continues, "In contrast to the recently revealed secret White House initiatives, many of the 161 measures included in the law aren't contested by any major figure on the right, left or center. Even a representative of the American Civil Liberties Union said the group seeks to fix the act, not to kill it. An examination of some of the contested sections demonstrates that the measures involved are hardly out of line." Etzioni adds, "We tend to swing wildly in one direction and then in the opposite one. The Senate Church Committee, responding to the abuses such as spying on civil rights groups and public leaders by the FBI under J. Edgar Hoover, tied the agency in knots. … The initial responses to the 9/11 attacks might well have been excessive. As time has passed — without a new attack on the USA — many security measures are being questioned, as they should be. Even so, when it comes to critical components of the act, such as those listed above, minor tweaks — not massive overhauls — would make the Patriot Act work for all Americans. … The same can't be said for the other security measures that the public has recently learned about. Those fully deserve the kind of extensive hearings to which the Patriot Act is being subjected."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Officials Meet With Muslim Groups About Nuclear Surveillance. FBI Deputy Director John Pistole and Assistant Director of Public Affairs John Miller on Wednesday met with Muslim and Arab-American leaders in Washington to discuss recent reports of post-9/11 bureau surveillance for possible nuclear material at mosques and Muslim-owned homes and businesses.

Under the headline "F.B.I. Tries To Dispel Surveillance Concerns," The New York Times (1/12, Clemetson, 1.19M) reports Pistole and Miller "tried to reassure those at the session that the surveillance…had been based on intelligence leads." Miller said after the meeting, "We explained how we work with intelligence and that we did what we did based on the patterns of Al Qaeda, not because of the patterns or activities of any mosque or Muslim neighborhood." The "officials struck a conciliatory tone, several attendees said, and acknowledged that the bureau could have responded to their concerns more quickly. But Mr. Pistole offered few details on the monitoring, they said, and he emphasized that the program…remained classified." The Times notes, "The controversy…comes after the F.B.I. cancelled financing for a bureau-wide training initiative intended to improve outreach to Muslim and Arab Americans. … The program, which would have cost $6 million over three years, was cancelled, in part, because of budget constraints, Mr. Miller said."

The Washington Times (1/12, Seper, 90K) reports, "Two Muslim organizations have since filed Freedom of Information Act requests to learn which sites were monitored." Council on American-Islamic Relations executive director Nihad Awad said, "Today's meeting, while not resolving all underlying issues of concern, offered an opportunity to improve lines of communication and to increase mutual cooperation on issues related to national security and the prevention of hate crimes."

US-VISIT Program To Step Up Fingerprinting System. The Federal Times (1/12, Losey) reports, "The director of the nation's program to screen foreign visitors entering the United States hopes to begin testing a more stringent fingerprinting system this year." The Times continues, "The U.S. Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, or US-VISIT, last July was directed by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to start taking all 10 fingerprints from first-time visitors to the country. US-VISIT director Jim Williams said at a press briefing Jan. 5 that the program is still putting together a plan to expand the process. He expects the plan to be finished in a few months. … Meanwhile, Homeland Security finished installing US-VISIT at all 104 land border ports in December, meeting a deadline mandated by Congress, Williams announced." The Times adds, "US-VISIT now takes only two fingerprints of foreign visitors. The FBI's identification system uses 10 fingerprints and a photograph to track criminals. … The Justice Department criticized the two-print system in 2004, saying it could allow terrorists or violent criminals to slip into the country undetected. … Williams stressed that he does not want US-VISIT to impede legitimate visitors and said the first tests will take place at low-volume border crossings and airports to minimize delays. The State Department also may help with testing, he said."

Former TSA Official Works For Firm Pushing Registered Traveler Program. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "Members of the emerging industry of biometric technology companies who are trying to sell the Registered Traveler security program to the nation's airports have formed a coalition to help boost their credibility and their voice in Washington. Perhaps more important, the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition (VCIC) has scored some substantial lobbying help: Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates . Maybe even more important, the leader of the Wexler & Walker team for the client is Tom Blank . Yes, the Tom Blank who was acting deputy administrator of the Transportation Security Administration and who created the agency's Office of Transportation Security Policy. … Blank joined the lobby shop in September and is prevented by federal ethics restrictions from contacting TSA officials for a year, although he could lobby members of Congress."

New Orleans Reconstruction Plan Greeted By Anger, Protests. The presentation of a plan for rebuilding New Orleans by the Bring New Orleans Back commission drew harsh criticism from city residents yesterday over a proposal that would give the most heavily damaged areas four months to prove themselves viable before being bought by the government. The story was covered by each of the networks last night. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 2, 2:45, Vargas) reported, "The Bring Back New Orleans Commission hopes to attract 245,000 people to the city. For now, people can settle wherever they like. But there's no guarantee that those who invest a lot of money and energy repairing their homes be allowed to stay there." ABC (Osunsami) added, "The map of New Orleans could change considerably. Anyone who lives in a neighborhood highlighted here in yellow, most of the city, could be forced to move. The plan calls for new parks, in green. That would help control flooding. Residents would be resettled in areas circled in red." Mayor Ray Nagin: "This report is controversial. It pushes the edge of the envelope." Osunsami: "The Mayor and FEMA appear to support the plan, but late today, the New Orleans City Council announced that it doesn't support any of this, which could slow everything down."

The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 5, 1:30, Schieffer) reported, "Many residents won't have much time to make their case for staying in their old neighborhoods and they let the Mayor and the commission hear all about it." CBS (Acosta) added, "At a meeting with the city's rebuilding commission Mayor Ray Nagin sent shock waves through Big Easy, laying out a plan that gives many of the hardest hit wards just four months to prove they can survive. Neighborhoods that cannot justify their continued existence will be bought out and demolished." But the Mayor's plan "is more than just controversial, it's also far beyond what the city can afford. $12 billion to acquire and demolish homes beyond repair. $4.8 billion for a new high-speed light rail system. And $413 million to repair city-owned buildings. But it's the razor-thin four-month timetable that threatens to derail the proposal." President Bush "promised New Orleans would be rebuilt. When he returns to the city tomorrow, there will be no shortage of angry people to hold them to his word."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 2, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Enraged city council members say residents need answers they're still not getting." Jacquelyn Brechtel Clarkson, New Orleans City Council: "We as a city have not given the people all the answers they need before they can make a decision." Savidge: "Detractors also say people in impoverished areas like the Lower Ninth Ward have neither the background or training to organize neighborhood planning committees, and can't even take a head count, since most are still spread across the country. Reaction from the audience was fast and mostly furious."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 6, 2:00, Williams) also reported on the personal decisions by many families to leave the city permanently.

Under the headline "City Revival Plan Draws Sharp Criticism," the Los Angeles Times (1/12, Bustillo, 958K) reports, "Residents of the New Orleans neighborhoods most heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina, under a controversial plan unveiled Wednesday, would have just four months to demonstrate strong support for rebuilding their areas before possibly being forced to sell their properties to the government." It's "a centerpiece of Mayor C. Ray Nagin's 'Bring New Orleans Back' recovery plan," which "drew immediate outrage from residents and community activists, who argued that many citizens -- especially the blacks who predominated the flood-struck areas -- could be forced out of the city for good." Nagin said the report "probably says some things to some people they are probably misinterpreting."

The New York Times (1/12, Rivlin, 1.19M) reports that the rebuilding commission gave "neighborhoods in low-lying parts of the city from four months to a year to prove they should not be bulldozed." At a "standing-room-only" meeting, the presentation of the report was "punctuated by catcalls and angry outbursts that often interrupted members of the panel." The Times adds, "Speaker after speaker, black and white, prosperous and poor, dismissed a plan that Mayor C. Ray Nagin described as 'controversial.' But Mr. Nagin gave them hope as he walked a middle line that neither endorsed the plan nor opposed it."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/12, A3, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that New Orleans is also "waiting on the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine base elevation levels required before flood insurance can be issued. The commission is hoping that Congress will approve a quasi-public recovery authority proposed by US Rep. Richard H. Baker (R-La.) that would sell bonds to buy flood-damaged homes, then work with private developers to rebuild neighborhoods."

WSJournal Says City's Low Lying Areas Will Not Be Resettled. President Bush is scheduled to visit New Orleans Thursday to assess progress since Katrina struck the city. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Glassman, 2.11M) editorializes, "He will find a tale of two cities -- one almost back to normal, the other devastated." Commenting on the rebuilding commission's plan, the Journal says "the truth is that the Lower Ninth Ward and other low-lying areas won't be resettled. The new New Orleans will almost surely look like New Orleans of 1878, which, as shown by the Times-Picayune in a remarkable map, had most of the city's 200,000 residents 'clustered in a narrow swath along the Mississippi River.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Defends Iraq Policies. President Bush defended his Iraq policies and took on his critics during a speech in Louisville, Kentucky, yesterday. Bush's remarks on Iraq were largely overshadowed by comments he made later, during a question and answer session, about the NSA domestic wiretapping program. What coverage there was portrayed Bush's Iraq comments as an attempt to preempt critics o his Iraq policies in advance of the 2006 campaign season.

ABC was the only network to focus on the Iraq angle. Its coverage was mostly critical, and also profiled several Iraq war veterans who are running for Congress as Democrats. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 4, 1:55, Woodruff) reported Bush "delivered another strong message to critics of his Iraq policy: Be careful what you say. But there was an important political reason why he chose that state to make his point." President Bush was shown saying, "One way people can help [in the war on terrorism], is we're coming down the pike of the 2006 elections, is to remember the effect that rhetoric can have on troops in harm's way." ABC (Raddatz) added, "But one of the biggest critics in Louisville has already been in harms way, twice. Marine Corps Reservist Andrew Horne, a two-time Iraq veteran and now a congressional candidate, is challenging the Republican incumbent in this district. He said, today, the President is attempting to limit debate about the war because it is not going well." Horne is "one of 11 veterans of the war in Iraq running for Congress. Nine of them are Democrats, including Patrick Murphy in Pennsylvania, Paul Hackett, who is seeking a senate seat in Ohio, and Tammy Duckworth in Illinois." Duckworth "lost both her legs and the use of one arm when her helicopter was shot down outside of Baghdad." The Republicans "are clearly worried about some of these candidates and the war in Iraq, or the President wouldn't keep making these speeches."

The Lexington Herald-Leader (1/12, Alessi) President Bush "told a select group of Kentucky and Indiana residents yesterday that the U.S. military's progress in Iraq is 'good' and promised ultimate victory -- although he gave no timetable." In a "rare town hall-style meeting set up as a theatre-in-the-round, the president again defended invading Iraq, even though former dictator Saddam Hussein didn't possess weapons of mass destruction as Bush first claimed." Bush has "been more aggressively defending his administration's policies in recent weeks, as public support for the war has waned and critics have ramped up their calls for withdrawing troops from Iraq." Meanwhile, in a conference call "with reporters before Bush's event, Lt. Col. Andrew Horne, a Marine reservist and Democrat who plans to run against U.S. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Louisville, said there's a gap between the Bush administration's bold rhetoric on the Iraq war and its actual support for soldiers. He cited recent news stories describing a suppressed Pentagon report that concluded many U.S. combat deaths in Iraq could be avoided with better body armor, which is available on the market."

Reuters (1/12, Wilson) reports President Bush "tried to shape election-year debate on the Iraq war by warning critics their rhetoric could embolden the enemy and weaken the morale of U.S. troops." Bush "acknowledged his decision to invade Iraq almost three years ago was not universally popular." Though he "said he welcomed dissenting voices," he added, "What I don't like is when somebody said he lied or they're in there for oil or he's doing it only because of Israel." Bush "appeared in the district of Republican Rep. Anne Northup whose likely Democratic opponent will be Andrew Horne, a lawyer and Marine reservist who served two tours in Iraq."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) reported, "President Bush today declared our troops in Iraq should have the best equipment possible. President Bush made his remarks during a speech in Kentucky, defending the conduct of this war. That speech took place in Louisville, a key battleground in the midterm elections later this year, in front of a specially screened audience, once again." Bush "asserted that his goal in Iraq is nothing less than victory."

46% Now Say Iraq War Was Worth It. William Schneider said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11), "Is the president making progress in his six-week old campaign to persuade Americans that it was worth going to war in Iraq? Yes. In November, before President Bush started trying it rally public support, 38 percent of Americans thought the Iraq war was worth it. That number is now up to 46 percent. But a majority still say the war was not worth it. The president has made progress, but he has not turned public opinion around." Schneider added, "The public has confidence in the Americans over there, but not in the Iraqis. Very few people believe Iraq will have a stable government that can maintain order without U.S. help within the next year. In fact, Americans are not sure that will ever happen."

General In Abu Ghraib Abuse Scandal Takes Fifth At Court-Martial. The Washington Post (1/12, White, 744K) reports in a front page story that Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, "a central figure in the U.S. detainee-abuse scandal, this week invoked his right not to incriminate himself in court-martial proceedings against two soldiers accused of using dogs to intimidate captives at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq." Miller "once supervised the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and helped set up operations at Abu Ghraib," and his legal maneuver is "the first time the general has given an indication that he might have information that could implicate him in wrongdoing, according to military lawyers." Miller's decision "came shortly after Col. Thomas M. Pappas, the commanding officer at Abu Ghraib, accepted immunity from prosecution this week and was ordered to testify at upcoming courts-martial."

US, Iraqi Officials Attempt To Exploit Rift Between Insurgents, Al Qaeda. In an approximately 2500 word story, the New York Times (1/12, Tavernise, Filkins, 1.19M) reports how an October, 23, 2005 clash between Iraqi insurgents and members of al Qaeda in Taji is emblematic of the widening rift between the two groups. The battle "was one of several clashes between Al Qaeda and local Iraqi guerrilla groups that have broken out in recent months across the Sunni Triangle." American and Iraqi officials "believe that the conflicts present them with one of the biggest opportunities since the insurgency burst upon Iraq nearly three years ago. They have begun talking with local insurgents, hoping to enlist them to cooperate against Al Qaeda, said Western diplomats, Iraqi officials and an insurgent leader." It is "impossible to say just how far the split extends within the insurgency, which remains a lethal force with a shared goal of driving the Americans out of Iraq. Indeed, the best the Americans can hope for may be a grudging passivity from the Iraqi insurgents when the Americans zero in on Al Qaeda's forces."

US Makes Police Training High Priority. The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Levinson, 61K) reports that in Baghdad on Tuesday, "visiting congressmen stepped out of armored cars" into "the mud of Camp Dublin, home to the Iraqi police's elite special forces unit." US Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson "the ex-linebacker responsible for training 200,000 Iraqi police, greeted them and assured the lawmakers that his Iraqi under- studies will soon be in charge here." Peterson said, "We'll have these forces trained by the end of 2006, and I have full confidence that they will begin to assume control of security in Iraq." The Monitor adds the police "have become a new priority, as the US begins turning over more security control to Iraq. Scrutiny of the police intensified after the discovery of secret jails and the torture of Sunni Arab prisoners."

Shiite Politician Says New Government Not Permitted To Change Iraqi Constitution. The Washington Post (1/12, A14, Hernandez, 744K) reports Iraq's "most influential Shiite politician said Wednesday that he would not allow a new government to 'change the essence' of the country's constitution, despite a promise made to Sunni Arabs that it would be opened to major revision." In a "last-minute deal negotiated under heavy pressure from U.S. diplomats," Sunnis, Shiites, and Kurds "agreed that the draft constitution would be put to a national referendum in October as planned but would be open to change for four months after a new government was formed early this year." But Abdul Aziz Hakim, "the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the most powerful Shiite party in the ruling coalition, appeared to back away from the constitutional compromise Wednesday." Hakim said, "The first principle is not to change the essence of the constitution. It is our responsibility to form Baghdad provinces and southern Iraq provinces."

The New York Times (1/12, Oppel, Mizher, 1.19M) reports al-Hakim's remarks diminished "Sunni Arab hopes of amending the charter to avoid being shut out of the nation's vast oil wealth." Al-Hakim "vowed to give no ground on crucial parts of the Constitution." The speech "was Mr. Hakim's latest hard-line statement directed at Sunni Arabs, whom Shiites accuse of fomenting violence to improve bargaining leverage in the new government. While he previously signaled unwillingness to reopen major constitutional issues, Mr. Hakim's belligerent declarations are sure to anger Sunnis hopeful of carving out a meaningful role in the government."

The Washington Times/AP (1/12, Juhi) reports al-Hakim's "veiled warning" to Sunnis included not changing "the provision that keeps the central government weak in favor of strong provincial governments." Al-Hakim "said in an address in honor of the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha that provincial governments will remain strong in the constitution, which can be amended after the next government is installed."

NYTimes Calls Al-Hakim Statement Prescription For Civil War. The New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) says in an editorial that al-Hakin, "Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician," has "just dealt a huge blow to American-backed efforts to avoid civil war through the creation of a new, nationally inclusive constitutional order." Hakim's "latest position is a prescription for a national breakup and an endless civil war. It is also a provocative challenge to Washington, which helped broker the original promise of significant constitutional changes."

Judge Denies Bail For Park. The AP (1/12, Lozano) reports, "A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the U.N. oil-for-food scandal was denied bail Wednesday and will be transferred to New York to face additional charges in the case. … U.S. Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy said she denied Park bond since she believed he was a flight risk because of his finances, his ties to South Korea and his history of not dealing with legal problems in the United States." The AP adds that during the bail hearing, "Randy Schaffer, Park's attorney, argued that his client's arrest was illegal," but FBI Special Agent Robert Midcap testified "that a warrant for Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because the South Korean citizen had not answered the U.S. charges from April. The Mexican government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, Midcap said." Reuters (1/12, Seba, Daily) notes, "Schaffer said Park was flown to Houston against his will, and questioned Midcap about whether it was a U.S. or Mexican decision to deport him. 'No, sir. It was the Mexican government that expelled him,' Midcap said. 'That was the government's decision, the Mexican government's decision.'"

The New York Times (1/12, Romero, 1.19M) reports Judge Stacy "also approved Mr. Park's transfer to New York, where he faces arraignment in federal court. Agents from the F.B.I. arrested Mr. Park" in Houston "after Mexican immigration officials apprehended him at Mexico City's airport on the basis of an Interpol notice, Justice Department officials said. The Mexican officials put Mr. Park on a commercial flight to Houston, accompanied by F.B.I. agents, said Melissa Annis, an assistant United States attorney." The Times of London (1/12, Bone) notes Park "had spent many months as a fugitive and his arrest provided an unexpected boost for the FBI inquiry into UN corruption," but Schaffer "said his client never intended to travel to the United States" and "argued that the arrest was illegal." Agent Midcap "testified that a warrant for Mr Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because he had not answered the US charges," and "the Mexican Government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, he said."

German Intelligence Provided US With Erroneous Tip On Saddam's Location. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Drogin, 958K) reports that with "the battle of Baghdad raging on April 7, 2003, an intelligence tip was rushed to a special Pentagon targeting team: Saddam Hussein and his two sons had been spotted near a chicken restaurant in the city's wealthy Mansour district." Less than "45 minutes later, a B-1 bomber obliterated the site with four satellite-guided bombs, leaving a deep crater and at least a dozen dead. The Iraqi ruler, it soon became clear, was not among them." An Iraqi informant "provided the initial tip. But U.S. officials now say confirmation came from an unusual source: two German military intelligence operatives who stayed in a Baghdad safe house after Berlin had closed its embassy." The "previously undisclosed role of German intelligence in the widely reported attempt to decapitate the Iraqi regime highlights how the CIA and the Pentagon secretly relied on German and other foreign spy services for critical information on Iraq even as the intelligence agents' governments fiercely opposed the Bush administration's drive toward war." That "behind-the-scenes cooperation forms the backdrop as Germany's new chancellor, Angela Merkel, arrives here today on her first official visit. Officials said she aims to repair U.S.-German relations that were badly strained when her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, publicly broke with the White House over Iraq."

In 1998, Berger Warned Iraq Was Pursuing WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/12, 90K) excerpts a November 23, 1998 op-ed by then-National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, which was published in the international Al Hayat. Berger wrote, "[T]he entire world is fed up with Iraq's continuing deception and defiance. Iraq agreed as a condition of the Gulf War cease-fire that it would disclose its weapons of mass destruction arsenal within 15 days. Instead, it has spent the better part of a decade shirking its obligations, withholding information from the inspectors, blocking their work, destroying information in plain sight. … Certainly, when it comes to a rogue regime with weapons of mass destruction and a history of using them, the United States and its friends in the Muslim world must continue to be united -- because we are all at risk."

Army, Marines Step Up Production Of Body Armor. The Washington Post (1/12, A14, Tyson, 744K) reports the Army "announced yesterday that it will soon start producing 230,000 sets of side armor plates and field them over the year to soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, after a recently disclosed Pentagon study indicated that such plates could have helped prevent scores of troop deaths since 2003." Officials said the Marine Corps "has delivered 9,000 sets of the plates to Iraq, a number that will rise to about 30,000 by April, officials said yesterday." Army and Marine generals "in charge of developing and buying equipment defended the pace at which they were getting the new side armor to troops, after a closed-door briefing yesterday on the matter on Capitol Hill. The generals briefed the Senate Armed Services Committee after lawmakers voiced concern over a classified Pentagon forensic study disclosed last week that for the first time linked gaps in upper torso protection to troop fatalities." The "scrutiny of body armor is the latest instance in which Congress has pressured the Pentagon to accelerate the distribution of protective equipment to U.S. troops -- from 'uparmored' Humvees and trucks to bulletproof vests."

The New York Times (1/12, Moss, 1.19M) notes the "ceramic plates now worn by most members of the military shield just some of the upper body from bullets and shrapnel, and the Army said it would buy plates that would extend this protection to the sides of soldiers. The officials spoke after a closed session of the Senate Armed Services Committee, held after The New York Times reported last week that a Pentagon study had found that extra armor could have saved up to 80 percent of the marines who died in Iraq from upper body wounds."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) reported that there is "anger on Capitol Hill over reports that Americans are still losing their lives in Iraq because the Pentagon has failed to give our troops adequate body armor. The Senate Armed Services Committee today considered a study that some Marines who have been killed in Iraq would have survived had they been provided improved armor." CNN (McIntyre) added, "Today top Pentagon and Army officials were on Capitol Hill trying to reel in the perception that the US military is not providing enough protection for its troops. … A top Army and Marine Corp official told members of the Senate Armed Serves Committee, it's a myth troops are not getting all of body armor they need."

CQ (1/11, Donnelly) reports Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner "said Wednesday that he is satisfied the U.S. military is doing all it can to outfit troops with adequate body armor, even as some Democrats drew the opposite conclusion." Military representatives "convinced Warner on Wednesday that they are buying the best armor they can without weighing down soldiers and Marines so much that they cannot perform missions. Nonetheless, Democrats seized on the report as evidence the administration has failed to adequately protect U.S. forces."

Massachusetts National Guard Members Sue For Job-Related Expenses. Reuters (1/12, Szep) reports four members of the Massachusetts National Guard "filed a $73 million class-action lawsuit on Wednesday against Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military officials in a dispute over on-the-job expenses since the September 11 attacks." The lawsuit "appears to be the first of its kind in the U.S. Army National Guard, which has faced heavy demands since September 11, 2001, lawyers involved in the case said." The four men "filed the suit in U.S. District Court on behalf of soldiers in about 300 jobs in the Massachusetts National Guard owed money for meals, car fuel, lodging and daily allowances, their lawyers said."

WPost Profiles Virginia Marine Killed In Action. The Washington Post (1/12, B3, Stewart, 744K) profiles Marine Lance Cpl. Kyle W. Brown, 22, of Newport News, who "was fatally shot in the head by a sniper in Anbar province near Fallujah, according to the account his grandmother said

Marine Corps officials gave the family. It was his second tour of duty in Iraq."

Soldier Wounded In Iraq Has Portion Of Skull Replaced. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 8, 2:45, Schieffer) reported on the recovery of Sgt. Paul Statzer, a Pennsylvania National Guardsman who suffered a severe head injury in Iraq, noting that he "was so badly wounded in Iraq it is doubtful he could have been saved in any previous conflict. Well, he has made quite a comeback and thanks to some miracle workers at Walter Reed Army Hospital, he has even started to look like his old self." CBS (Martin) added, "Surgeons removed nearly half Statzer's skull after he suffered a severe head wound in a roadside bomb explosion, captured by this still photo last March. Seven months later, Dr. Leon Moores is getting ready to make Statzer's head whole again, implanting an acrylic replica of the bone he lost."

SEALS Intensify Public Recruiting Effort To Boost Numbers, Maintain Quality. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 7, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Even among Special Forces, they are the specialists, the tough guys, the US Navy SEALS. Tonight the Pentagon is going all out to get more of them, to help fight the war on terror. It costs $380,000 to train just one Navy SEAL, and takes 2 1/2 years of grueling training to do it." To "meet their new demands, these normally secretive seals are going on a very public recruiting campaign." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "The Pentagon wants to add nearly 400 more to the 2,600 seals now in service." With their high "dropout rate, and the increased demand on the force, the Navy may not be able to produce new SEALS fast enough. So for the first time, usually secret and stealthy seals are going public. SEAL recruiters are hitting high schools. Air shows, and sporting events. And openly competing in the Ironman triathlon in Hawaii."

DOJ:

Gonzales To Open St. Louis Family Justice Center. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (1/11) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will make his first official appearance in St. Louis, helping on Thursday morning to open the city's new Family Justice Center." The Post-Dispatch continues, "He will be joined by U.S. Sen. Jim Talent; Diane Stuart, director of the Justice Department's Office of Violence Against Women; Catherine L. Hanaway, the U.S. attorney in St. Louis; Mayor Francis Slay and other leaders. … The Family Justice Center…was funded with a $1.25 million Justice Department grant. It is billed as a one-stop resource for women and their families looking to escape domestic abuse."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Florida Men Plead Guilty To Hedge Fund Scam. South Florida Business Journal (1/11) reports, "Two South Florida men have pleaded guilty to fraud in a hedge fund scam, the government has said. The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida, the FBI and the Florida Office of Financial Regulation said Anthony Giordano…pleaded guilty to federal securities fraud and wire fraud. They said Joseph Zumwalt…pleaded guilty to mail fraud in connection with the former EPG Limited Partners of Fort Lauderdale." The Journal adds, "The government said the defendants admitted representing to investors, including two religious organizations, that they would invest their monies in a hedge fund administered by EPG. Instead, the government said, Giordano converted millions of dollars for other uses, including personal gain."

SEC Corporate Behavior Expert To Step Down. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Scannell) reports, "Alan Beller, a major figure in the Securities and Exchange Commission's drive to overhaul corporate governance, will leave the agency next month, giving SEC Chairman Christopher Cox another high-level vacancy to fill." The Journal continues, "Mr. Beller's departure comes as the SEC is unveiling the most sweeping overhaul of executive-compensation disclosure in 14 years. … A proposed rule outlining the changes is expected to be discussed at a public hearing Tuesday, and after a public comment period it could take effect for the 2007 proxy season." The Journal adds, "The executive-compensation proposal is the capstone for Mr. Beller, 56 years old, who joined the agency in 2002 to head its corporation-finance division. … He oversaw the implementation of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law and an update to securities-offering laws, which allow for greater communication including electronic versions of preoffering 'roadshows' for investors before initial public offerings of stock. … Mr. Beller also has overseen the proposal or implementation of other rules, such as one to speed up the time companies have to file periodic reports, Internet delivery of proxies to investors, and a rule that makes it easier for foreign-based companies to deregister from U.S. reporting requirements. He also helped set up a small-business advisory committee, which is charged with providing guidance to the agency on the costs of regulations to small businesses. … He will 'be recognized as one of the giants of the SEC of all time,' Mr. Cox said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

At Least Two Lawmakers Could Face Charges In Abramoff Probe. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) reported, "CNN has learned at least two members of Congress could face charges following the plea deal reached with former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. One of them is Congressman Bob Ney of Ohio, who stands accused of performing political favors for Abramoff in exchange of gifts, including a golf trip to Scotland. Ney has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing. There is no word on the identity of the other member of Congress, now apparently under close scrutiny. The sources say four other people could face charges as well, including current and former staff members of Congress, and including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay."

DOJ_NMG_0009138

CNN.com (1/12, Arena, Bohn) reports, "Up to a half dozen people, including two members of Congress, could face charges after high-powered lobbyist Jack Abramoff's plea deal with the Justice Department, sources with knowledge of the investigation tell CNN." CNN continues, "Abramoff has been cooperating with Justice Department prosecutors and FBI agents for several months in their investigation of his dealings, including his allegations of exchanging gifts for political favors. … Authorities have focused on about 20 people who possibly committed wrongful acts, government sources have previously told CNN. The number is a moving target as new information comes in." CNN adds, "Sources with knowledge of the investigation say at least two members of Congress are under scrutiny as part of the ongoing investigation. One is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who sources say was the person identified in Abramoff's plea agreement as the official who took action for Abramoff after receiving from him such things as a golf trip to Scotland. … Ney has steadfastly denied wrongdoing, has pledged to cooperate with the investigation and has said he is confident he will be cleared. … The sources would not identify the other member, and they told CNN that no charges appear imminent." CNN notes, "Also under scrutiny, the sources say, are some current and former congressional staffers, including at least two people who used to work for then-House Majority Leader Rep. Tom DeLay. DeLay, R-Texas, and Abramoff had a long working relationship. … Investigators are also examining the activities of some officials at the Interior Department and the General Services Administration, sources tell CNN. One former GSA official, David Safavian, was indicted in October on charges of obstructing a GSA proceeding, obstructing a U.S. Senate proceeding and making false statements in connection with the investigation."

Abramoff Case Said To Provide Unprecedented Look At How Washington Works. The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Grier, 61K) says the Abramoff case "provides an unprecedented look at the way Washington really works. That doesn't mean everyone on K Street is corrupt, as Abramoff and his former partner, public relations consultant Michael Scanlon, now have admitted they were. … But US investigations of Abramoff and Scanlon produced pointillistic detail about their daily political activities, much of which were perfectly legal. Hundreds of pages of e-mails and congressional testimony released by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs trace the pair as they scrabble for access, scratch backs, beg for money, and dole out contributions in return." The Monitor adds that "within the e-mail trail are hints that Abramoff didn't have quite the juice he claimed. He was taken by surprise when [Interior Secretary Gale] Norton named Aurene Martin acting head of Indian Affairs in January 2003 - just the sort of thing a well-connected lobbyist should know in advance."

Former Jefferson Aide Implicates Lawmaker In Bribery Plea Deal. USA Today (1/12, 6A, 2.31M) reports, "A former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges that he helped a congressman solicit bribes to arrange two telecommunications deals." Brett Pfeffer, "37, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and aiding and abetting bribery of a public official. He agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and testify if needed. He could get 20 years in prison when sentenced March 31. Pfeffer said in court that a congressman had solicited his assistance in promoting telecom deals in Nigeria and Ghana." Jefferson "demanded 5% to 7% of the newly formed African companies in exchange for his help promoting the deal, according to Pfeffer."

Reuters (1/12, Sullivan) relates that Jefferson "is not named in Pfeffer's plea agreement, which only describes a 'Representative A' who employed Pfeffer from 1995 to 1998. News accounts from that period cite Pfeffer as Jefferson's legislative director. According to court papers, Pfeffer's investment firm in 2004 agreed to invest $45 million to provide high-speed Internet and cable TV service to Nigeria over the existing copper telephone wires there. Jefferson recruited Pfeffer's company for the deal and connected it to a Kentucky technology provider whose equipment would be used in the venture. As the agreement was signed he told Pfeffer he would require an ownership stake, according to court papers. 'Pfeffer understood that Representative A was soliciting a bribe in return for Representative A's official assistance in furthering the Nigerian Deal. Pfeffer…later advised (his boss) that it was part of the cost of doing business with Representative A,' the plea deal said."

CQ (1/12, Ferrechio) reports that Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, referring to Pfeffer, said in a written statement, "This defendant admitted to a crime which, at its core, is a bribery scheme involving a public official. Such schemes deprive citizens of the integrity and honest services expected of our government. The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these illegal schemes."

The Washington Post (1/12, A5, Lengel, 744K) says that along with demanding "a 5 to 7 percent stake in one of two new companies Pfeffer's firm was investing in," Pfeffer "said the congressman also demanded that two relatives be put on the businesses' payrolls." The Post adds, "At one point last year, the FBI set up a sting in which Pfeffer's investment company boss recorded conversations, according to law enforcement sources who declined to be identified because the investigation is ongoing. FBI agents also raided several locations, including Jefferson's homes in the District and New Orleans, where they found about $90,000 in cash in a freezer, sources said."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A6, Aqueo, 2.11M) notes that Jefferson, "an eight-term congressmen, is a senior member of the House Ways and Means Committee and its subcommittee on trade, and also co-chairs the Africa Trade and Investment Caucus." The New York Times/AP (1/12) adds that Jefferson "was elected to the House in 1990, becoming the first black congressman from Louisiana since Reconstruction." FoxNews (1/11) also reports this story.

Former New Orleans Subcontractor Pleads Guilty To Paying Kickbacks. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/12, Eggler, 257K) reports, "Federal prosecutors rang up another conviction Wednesday in their probe of a scheme to skim hundreds of thousands of dollars from a huge energy-efficiency contract awarded during former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial's tenure at City Hall. Under an agreement with prosecutors, Michael Garnett, a subcontractor who did work under the $81 million Johnson Controls Inc. deal, pleaded guilty to misprision of a felony for knowing about crimes related to the scheme but failing to inform authorities, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. Garnett is the fifth subcontractor to enter a guilty plea related to the Johnson Controls contract, Letten said. … Letten said Garnett admitted providing kickbacks to Kerry DeCay, director of the Department of Property Management under Morial, in connection with the subcontract given to Garnett's company, Golden Hammer Construction." The Times-Picayune notes, "Letten urged other business owners to refuse to be corrupted and to report any approaches for kickbacks to the FBI. Garnett, whose case was investigated by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, entered his plea before U.S. District Judge Martin Feldman."

Parish Councilman Pleads Not Guilty To Katrina-Related Fraud Charges. The AP (1/12) reports St. Tammany Parish Councilman Joe Impastato on Tuesday "pleaded not guilty to federal charges of extorting at least $50,000 from a businessman in an alleged attempt to broker a contract of dispose of debris from Hurricane Katrina. … U.S. Magistrate Louis Moore Jr. allowed Impastato to remain free on $5,000 bond he posted after his arrest in November." The AP notes, "A grand jury accused Impastato of contacting Pontchartrain Chipping and offering to negotiate a debris-dumping deal for the company in exchange for part of the $200,000 contract. Authorities said Impastato was arrested after the company's owner contacted the FBI, which set up a sting operation."

Lawyer Says FBI Stringently Interrogated Witness In Cruise Line Disappearance. Under the headline "F.B.I. Said To Grill Man, 20, On Cruise Disappearance," The New York Times (1/12, Cowan, 1.19M) reports, "The lawyer for one of the men last seen with a Connecticut newlywed before he vanished on a Mediterranean cruise last summer said federal agents had pressured his client for information about the man's disappearance and threatened to charge him with the rape of a female passenger if he declined to cooperate." Attorney Albert Y. Dayan "said that his client, Rustislav Kofman, denied any role in the disappearance of…George Allen Smith IV…or in any rape. He said that when crew members aboard the ship…approached his client about a missing person, Mr. Kofman thought they were talking about Mr. Smith's wife, Jennifer. He said she was not in the Smiths' cabin when his client and three of his friends put her husband to bed after a night of heavy drinking." Dayan "said he and his co-counsel had decided to speak out because they thought their client was being scapegoated. 'Agents have barraged this young man with question after question in three different interrogations,' Mr. Dayan said. 'Some were five to eight hours long, and some were with no food till it was over.' He said that if his client 'were any weaker psychologically, he would have confessed to anything.'" The Times notes, "A spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in New Haven said yesterday that her office would not comment."

Former Alabama Sheriff, Attorney Convicted Of Misusing Crime Computer. WIAT-TV, CBS 42 , Birmingham, AL (1/12, Moseley) reports, "A federal jury returned a verdict against an ex-Jefferson County sheriff and his attorney. It's a case that stretches back a few years…one that had Jim Woodward and Albert Jordon accused of illegally using the national crime computer." WIAT-TV continues, "The justice department filed criminal charges back in 2000, accusing Woodward and his attorney of misusing the N.C.I.C. computer. … Prosecutors contend they conducting background checks on absentee voters during the 1998 sheriff's race, a charge they denied. And a jury agreed." WIAT-TV adds, "Jim Woodward and Albert Jordan sat through a second day of jury deliberations, and when it was over the federal panel found them guilty of two felony counts. … Woodward was found guilty of conspiracy and illegal use of property. Jordan was also found guilty of conspiracy and misuse of public money, property or records."

Puerto Rico Attorney Indicted In Fast-Food Fraud Scheme. The AP (1/12) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted a San Juan attorney Wednesday in connection with a scheme to defraud fast-food giant Tricon Restaurants International, the Justice Department said." The AP continues, "ugenio A. Guardiola Ramirez was charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice and obstruction of justice in an investigation into illegal kickback payments paid by an electrical contractor, said Justice Department spokesman Orlando Rios. … Tricon's brands include Kentucky Fried Chicken, Pizza Hut and Taco Bell. Its Puerto Rico stores are operated by Encanto Restaurants of Puerto Rico, Rios said." The AP adds, "Prosecutors allege Guardiola obstructed an investigation into payments made by the Gate Engineering Corporation to a Tricon employee in exchange for more than $1 million worth of electrical contracts, Rios said. … He is accused of mischaracterizing the payments to a grand jury, interfering with witnesses and drafting a phony services contract, Rios said."

In 5-4 Vote, SCOTUS Reinstates California Inmate's Death Sentence. The AP (1/12, Holland) reports, "A divided Supreme Court reinstated a California inmate's death sentence on Wednesday, the first 5-4 vote under newly installed Chief Justice John Roberts." The AP continues, "Justices overturned an appeals court ruling that declared Ronald Sanders' sentence unconstitutional. Sanders was put on death row for the 1982 killing of a woman during a drug-related robbery in Bakersfield, Calif. … Justice Antonin Scalia wrote the ruling, the Court's first death penalty decision since Roberts replaced Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist last fall." The AP adds, "The case presented a technical question for the Court involving jurors' consideration of invalid aggravating factors. … Special circumstances used by prosecutors in their case against Sanders -- that the crime was committed during a burglary and was cruel or heinous -- were later found invalid. … California argued that Sanders would have been sentenced to death even without those arguments. The Supreme Court's five conservative members agreed. … 'The erroneous factor could not have "skewed" the sentence, and no constitutional violation occurred,' Scalia wrote in an opinion joined by Roberts, retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas. … In a dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens said 'this decision is more likely to complicate than to clarify our capital sentencing jurisprudence.'"

High Court Considers DNA Case Of Tennessee Death Row Inmate. The Supreme Court heard arguments in the case of a Tennessee death row inmate who claims new DNA evidence casts doubt on his guilt in a 1985 murder. According to Reuters (1/12, Vicini), a majority of the Justices "appeared prepared… to overturn the sentence or the conviction." Reuters reports, "The court's four most liberal members, joined by moderate conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, seemed supportive of arguments by the attorney for convicted murderer Paul House that a reasonable juror now would not find him guilty."

USA Today (1/12, Biskupic, 2.31M) adds that a majority of the Court "expressed concern… about blood and semen evidence used" to send House to death row.

The New York Times (1/12, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer were particularly steeped in the details and were deeply engaged on opposite sides of the case, debating it back and forth almost to the exclusion of the lawyers standing before them."

Delaware Court Overturns Death Sentence In Murder Of Governor's Secretary. The AP (1/12) reports, "Delaware's highest court on Wednesday overturned the death sentence of a once well-connected attorney convicted of the 1996 murder of the governor's scheduling secretary." The AP continues, "The sentence was flawed because the jury vote recommending a death sentence for Thomas Capano was not unanimous, the Delaware Supreme Court ruled. The high court ordered a new penalty hearing, but did not overturn his conviction, prosecutor Steven Wood said." The AP adds, "Prosecutors say Capano shot Anne Marie Fahey, 30, scheduling secretary to then-Governor Tom Carper, and dumped her body in the Atlantic Ocean because she was breaking off an affair with him. … Capano, a former state prosecutor, is a member of a well-known family involved in land development. … His attorneys had argued that his death sentence, issued in 1999, should be overturned because his jury was not unanimous in determining that Fahey's slaying was premeditated. The state high court found that the Delaware Constitution demands unanimous jury verdicts in death-penalty sentencing, even if federal law does not."

In Widely-Watched Case, Antique Gun Dealer Sentenced To Prison For Fraud. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/12, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "A once-distinguished antique-firearms dealer who duped a Bucks County millionaire while helping him amass a $30 million gun collection was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison yesterday. … U.S. District Judge Cynthia M. Rufe said that she hoped the prison sentence for the dealer, Michael Zomber of Franklin, Tenn., would deter others who might try to defraud antiques collectors. … Zomber was convicted of fraud at trial. His accomplice, Richard Ellis, of LeClaire, Iowa, pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government. … 'The entire industry was poised to find out what happened to Ellis and Zomber,' said FBI agent Bob Wittman, who handled the case. 'There's an element that's going to be happy that it's a new day, and there's an element that's going to be upset that their antics are going to be put under the microscope.'"

Grand Jury Indicts North Carolina Man For VAMC Murder. The AP (1/12) reports, "A man accused of killing a co-worker and former lover at the Veteran's Administration hospital in Fayetteville was indicted on a murder charge Wednesday by a federal grand jury." Arthur James Charland Jr. "was also charged with use and discharge of a firearm during an in relation to a crime of violence, according to a statement by U.S. Attorney Frank D. Whitney. Charland is accused of fatally shooting Linda Faye Owens, with whom he had an 11-year affair." The AP notes, "At a hearing last month, FBI Special Agent Chris Hedges testified that Charland told investigators he was being treated for bipolar disorder."

Inmate On Trial For Killing Ex-Priest Convicted Of Molestation. The New York Times (1/12, Belluck) reports, "The murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest, in 2003 by an inmate in state prison was a shocking and almost surreal dénouement to one of the darkest chapters of the sexual abuse crisis in the Roman Catholic Church." The Times continues, "Mr. Geoghan's violent death in the most secure prison in Massachusetts was to some an appalling failure of the state to protect one of its most despised inmates. To others it was a horrible but justified retribution against Mr. Geoghan, one of the most reviled priests named in the abuse scandal, accused of molesting some 150 children in several parishes over three decades. … Now, the man who admits he killed Mr. Geoghan, Joseph L. Druce, is having his day in court, and for anyone watching the trial, it is hard to figure out where to put one's sympathies - with the murder victim or the man who killed him." The Times adds, "Mr. Druce, 40, is pleading not guilty by reason of mental illness. His lawyer, John LaChance, does not dispute the details of the case. Prosecutors say Mr. Druce followed Mr. Geoghan into his cell at the Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center on Aug. 23, 2003, and jammed the cell door shut with a nail clipper and a ripped-up copy of 'The Cross and the Switchblade,' a book about a minister who transformed the lives of teenage gang members by introducing them to Christianity. … Mr. Druce then tied Mr. Geoghan's hands with a T-shirt, wrapped stretched-out socks around Mr. Geoghan's neck, tightened them with a shoe, and then jumped up and down on his body. … According to testimony by corrections officers on Wednesday, Mr. Druce later told them he 'did it for the children,' to stop Mr. Geoghan, 68, from molesting more boys when he got out of prison."

Catholic Bishop Acknowledges Own Abuse As Teen By Priest. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "A Roman Catholic Bishop has made a startling admission. Thomas Gumbleton of Detroit says that he was sexually abused when he was 15 years old by a priest. The Bishop, who's now 75, is believed to be the highest-ranking Catholic clergyman in this country to make such an admission. He was in Ohio today where he endorsed proposed laws there and in other states that would lift the statute of limitations on suing churches for sex abuse. A study commissioned by America's bishops found that over the past half century, nearly 4,400 priests were accused of abusing more than 10,000 people."

National Guard Soldiers Sue US For Post-9/11 Expenses. The AP (1/12, Lindsay) reports, "A group of National Guard soldiers who were ordered to protect possible targets after the Sept. 11 attacks sued the federal government Wednesday, seeking tens of millions of dollars in expenses they say were never reimbursed." The AP continues, "The soldiers, from Massachusetts and New Hampshire, say they traveled hundreds of miles to security postings and used their own money to pay for food and lodging with the expectation that they would be reimbursed. … But the soldiers say in their complaint that their requests for compensation were repeatedly denied and they eventually were told, 'If you don't like the arrangement, we'll make sure you get taken off this mission.'" The AP adds, "In the lawsuit, the plaintiffs argue that federal law provides military personnel with a travel and transportation allowance while away from home on active duty. … The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court by four soldiers but seeks to include hundreds of other guardsmen as a class action. It names the U.S. Department of Defense and the Massachusetts National Guard and seeks $73 million in unpaid expenses. … A spokeswoman for the Defense Department referred calls to the Justice Department, where a spokesman declined to comment until after the agency reviews the lawsuit."

DOJ Will Not Intervene In Whistleblower Suit Against MedcoHealth Solutions. The AP (1/12) reports, "Pharmacy benefits manager Medco Health Solutions Inc. said the Justice Department will not intervene in a whistleblower lawsuit filed against the company in a Pennsylvania court last month." The AP continues, "New Jersey-based Medco said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the U.S. Department of Justice notified the company on Tuesday of its decision not to intervene. … Medco said it first learned of 'qui tam' lawsuit in mid-December, when the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania lifted the seal on the case." The AP adds, "In an earlier filing, the company said the complaint makes allegations concerning turnaround time and performance-guarantee reporting -- the same charges drawn in a 2003 lawsuit. The complaint 'does not allege any health, safety or clinical violations,' Medco said."

Ex-Worker Sues Genentech Over Marketing Practices. Dow Jones (1/12) reports, "A former Genentech Inc. employee has accused the biotechnology company and marketing partner Biogen Idec Inc. of illegally promoting cancer drug Rituxan as a treatment for arthritis, a use not yet approved by regulators." Dow Jones continues, "Paul McDermott, who worked for Genentech in Falmouth, Maine, from March 2004 until April 2005, filed a whistleblower lawsuit in July 2005 in U.S. District Court in Maine alleging the companies' marketing of Rituxan defrauded government health-care programs." Dow Jones adds, "The suit also says Genentech fired McDermott in retaliation for bringing the matter to the attention of Genentech executives. The suit seeks unspecified damages on behalf of the government, and an order that Genentech rehire McDermott and pay him back wages and other damages. … McDermott's lawsuit hasn't surfaced until now because it was filed under seal on behalf of the federal government. In December, however, the Justice Department declined to intervene in the case and requested that the lawsuit be unsealed. … McDermott's lawsuit is the latest legal challenge facing Genentech (DNA) over Rituxan's marketing. In October 2004, Genentech (DNA) received a subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia seeking documents related to the promotion of Rituxan. Genentech (DNA) is cooperating with that investigation, which it said was both civil and criminal in nature."

US Seizes Mislabeled Bread. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/12, Lopez) reports, "Allergists and food allergy activists alike were shaken Wednesday upon learning that the French Meadow Bakery labeled its spelt bread 'wheat-free' when the bread, in fact, contains wheat." The Tribune continues, "For the hundreds of thousands of Americans who are wheat-intolerant or who have a genuine wheat allergy, mislabeled food is no small matter, said Anne Munoz-Furlong, founder of the national Food Allergy and Anaphylaxis Network, based in Fairview, Va. … Wheat allergy reactions, she said, can range from hives and digestive problems to -- at the most extreme end -- death from the inability to breathe." The Tribune adds, "French Meadow, revered by health enthusiasts for its varieties of organic bread, had 30,000 loaves made from spelt and Kamut grain seized Tuesday afternoon by U.S. marshals and agents from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. The agency had spent nearly a year attempting to get the bakery to relabel its bread, noting that both spelt and Kamut are varieties of wheat. … U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is handling the case, said the agents locked most of the loaves in freezers, where they will remain until the case is decided or a court order issued. 'The FDA takes the accuracy of food labeling very seriously,' Heffelfinger said. … French Meadow has 20 days to respond to the FDA's complaint, he said. He did not know whether any consumer complaints were involved. … The company could face administrative penalties and sanctions for the government's costs in prosecuting the case, he said, 'but that hasn't been determined yet. This is primarily about resolving the labeling issue.'"

SCOTUS Ruling On Wine Shipments Slowly Bearing Fruit For Wineries. The AP (1/12, Locke) reports, "A lot has happened since the U.S. Supreme Court opened the door to shipping wine across state lines. But change hasn't been swift in an industry that sometimes seems as rich in red tape as it is red grapes. … 'We're in a highly regulated industry. This isn't like selling sweaters,' said Jeremy Benson, executive director of Free The Grapes, a Napa, Calif.-based group that has been working to loosen shipping restrictions. 'The regulations are there and we have to work through them.'" The AP continues, "The Supreme Court struck down laws last spring in New York and Michigan that allowed wineries to ship directly to in-state consumers but forbade out-of-state businesses from doing the same thing. … The court said either all wineries should be allowed to ship directly to consumers or none, a blow to the old distribution system that required a wholesaler to sell to restaurants and retailers. States have been acting to adjust their shipping laws ever since." The AP notes, "The ruling was particularly important to smaller wineries that don't have the volume for wide distribution in liquor stores and supermarkets and rely on direct sales to consumers, many of whom have developed a taste for their products on winery visits. … Since the Supreme Court ruling, New York, Michigan and Ohio have loosened shipping restrictions. Texas also made shipping easier just prior to the high court ruling."

GPO Contracts With Kinko's For Small Printing Jobs. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, 744K) reports that the Government Printing Office is "hiring Kinko's to handle small printing jobs for federal agencies. The contract, worth about $100 million annually and renewable for up to four years, will allow federal employees to get discounted copying, binding and printing services (including posters, signs, business cards and brochures) at 1,300 locations across the country. The GPO will pick up the tab through a new GPOExpress Card that federal employees will use."

McCain-Feingold Said To Provide "Semi-Respectable" Cover For Incumbents. James Bopp, general counsel for the James Madison Center for Free Speech, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) that campaign finance reform "passed by Congress in McCain-Feingold and approved by the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC is mutating and spreading in the states. … State politicians are taking McCain-Feingold and McConnell as a license to enact much broader restrictions on core political speech. This term the court has a chance to decide whether these restrictions are justified, and what remains of the First Amendment in regard to democratic elections." Bopp adds, "The guise of 'reform' offers incumbents semi-respectable cover for their assault on free elections. Unless stopped, this virus will kill the First Amendment and democratic self-government."

AMC Entertainment Settles ADA Claims With DOJ. The AP (1/12, Twiddy) reports, "AMC Entertainment Inc., the nation's second-largest movie theater chain, was ordered to upgrade seating for patrons in wheelchairs at 1,200 of its stadium-style movie auditoriums and pay $300,000 in penalties and civil damages to settle a U.S. lawsuit." The AP continues, "Justice Department officials said Wednesday the order settles its 1999 lawsuit against the company claiming AMC violated the Americans with Disabilities Act because it doesn't provide comparable seating for people in wheelchairs." The AP adds, "The Kansas City-based company also must ensure that all theaters built over the next five years comply with requirements set out Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Florence-Marie Cooper in Los Angeles. … The stadium-style seating now dominating movie theaters gives everyone unobstructed views of the screen. But critics say most wheelchair spaces are at the base of the stadium tiers, forcing those patrons to crane their necks to see the movie. … As part of the order, privately held AMC, which operates more than 3,300 screens, must build ramps in more than 360 theaters, providing wheelchair spaces on higher seating tiers. The company also must pay $200,000 to theatergoers who originally complained to the Justice Department about the seating arrangements and $100,000 in fines. … 'Providing the same moviegoing experience for individuals in wheelchairs that other patrons enjoy delivers on the promise of the ADA,' Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said in a release. 'These improvements will make the goals of the ADA a reality for thousands of Americans who want to enjoy this popular form of entertainment.'"

Hispanic Workers Get Another Chance To Challenge Oklahoma City's English-Only Policy. The AP (1/12) reports, "A federal appeals court ruling Wednesday resurrects claims Hispanic workers made in a lawsuit challenging an English-only policy for city workers in Altus, Okla." The AP continues, "Twelve bilingual Hispanic workers filed complaints with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission after the city adopted the policy in 2002. They argued that the city failed to show there was a need to prevent them from speaking Spanish. They said the policy singled out a nationality." The AP adds, "City officials had argued the policy was necessary because some workers and supervisors couldn't understand what was being said on city radios, some workers felt uncomfortable because they could not understand Spanish, and there were safety concerns about workers understanding each other around heavy equipment. … The Justice Department declined to take action, prompting employees to file a lawsuit in federal court in Oklahoma City. U.S. District Judge David Russell dismissed the complaint, saying the city had the authority to adopt the policy in managing its employees. … On Wednesday a three-judge panel of the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the case back to district court with respect to the plaintiffs' claims of disparate treatment, discrimination and violation of equal protection laws."

California School District Sued Over Intelligent Design. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Sahagun, Bailey, 958K) reports that the town of Lebec, California has become "the latest focal point in the national debate over teaching 'intelligent design" in public schools.' On Tuesday, parents filed suit "against El Tejon Unified School District, the first legal challenge to the teaching of intelligent design in California. … The hullabaloo erupted after disgruntled parents joined with Americans United for Separation of Church and State to challenge a course at Frazier Mountain High School that they consider a minimally disguised endorsement of intelligent design. School trustees approved the new course, 'Philosophy of Design,' at a special meeting on New Year's Day. Attorneys for the district suggested the course could survive a legal challenge if it was called 'philosophy,' the lawsuit said, and the board approved it on a 3-2 vote."

Maytag, Whirlpool Shares Recover After Antitrust Worries. The AP (1/12) reports, "Shares of Maytag Corp. and Whirlpool Corp. stock recovered slightly Wednesday after taking a hit the day before amid speculation that federal regulators may challenge the firms' merger." The AP continues, "Whirlpool closed Tuesday at $83.10 after dropping $1.89, or 2.2 percent, for the day while Maytag fell 4.7 percent, or 88 cents, to close at $17.89. … Wednesday, Whirlpool shares closed at $83.05 and Maytag finished at $17.98." The AP adds, "Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., agreed in August to buy Maytag for $1.7 billion in cash and stock. Both companies have said they expect the deal to close as early as the first quarter of this year. … Shareholders of Newton, Iowa-based Maytag voted Dec. 22 to approve the merger, pending regulatory approval. The U.S. Justice Department is investigating whether the merger of Whirlpool, the leading appliance seller, and Maytag, the third largest, violates antitrust laws." The AP notes, "Industry analyst David MacGregor, of Ohio-based Longbow Research, said the stock fluctuation was based on nothing more than market scuttlebutt. … He said the market reacted to the buzz that regulators were concerned that the merger would place too much of the middle-priced laundry machines in one company's control. Mid-priced washing machines, for example, sell for $350 to $600, MacGregor said."

The Detroit Free Press (1/12, Bodipo-Memba) reports, "An article that appeared on the financial news website TheDeal.com, citing people it didn't name, said antitrust concerns might lead to the U.S. Department of Justice seeking an injunction blocking the merger. In August, Benton Harbor-based Whirlpool agreed to purchase Maytag of Newton, Iowa for $1.7 billion in cash and stock, following a flurry of offers and counter offers by several suitors. … The proposed deal, which is expected to be completed in the first quarter of this year, would combine the nation's No. 1 and No. 3 makers of household appliances under one roof. But, antitrust concerns about merging two of that nation's biggest makers of refrigerators, dishwashers and dryers surrounded the deal for months."

Northwest Airlines Drops Request For SkyTeam Antitrust Immunity. The AP (1/12, Freed) reports, "Northwest Airlines Corp. is withdrawing a request for antitrust immunity for its SkyTeam airline alliance, saying the Transportation Department had signaled it would reject the request anyway." The AP continues, "Northwest entered SkyTeam last year after its partner, KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, merged with SkyTeam member Air France. Northwest has antitrust immunity to coordinate routes and pricing with KLM, but not with other SkyTeam members, which also includes Delta Air Lines Inc., Alitalia, Continental Airlines Inc. and CSA Czech Airlines. The request was submitted by all the carriers, and Northwest said its withdrawal request would apply to the full alliance. … Northwest and Skyteam members can still codeshare, which makes it easier for passengers to book trips on a single ticket with multiple airlines. But the Transportation Department had said the Skyteam routes overlap so much that little new service was likely to result from an antitrust waiver." The AP adds, "In a statement, Northwest called the initial Transportation Department finding 'arbitrary, capricious and inconsistent with established DOT precedent and U.S. international aviation policy' … 'Northwest is at a loss to understand this decision by the same DOT officials claiming to strongly support deregulation and an Administration which espouses a free market philosophy,' Northwest said. 'The U.S. airline industry is in a state of crisis. Four major air carriers, including Northwest and Delta, are operating under Chapter 11, as are several national carriers.' … Regional feeder Mesaba is also in Chapter 11, having filed just one month after Northwest, which provides all of Mesaba's planes, revenues, and passengers."

Some See Realtors' Group Tactics As Overly Aggressive. The New York Times (1/12, Justice) reports, "When the nation's largest banks decided at the start of the decade that they wanted to get into the real estate brokerage business, one major obstacle stood in their way: the National Association of Realtors." The Times continues, "Lobbyists for the huge trade group stonewalled the banks by tying up new rules at the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve. Then the big score came in 2002 when the Realtors persuaded Congress to adopt a one-year moratorium to stop the banks altogether. It was a card the Realtors would play again and again. Four years later, bankers still have not cracked the real estate market. … 'They are known as very aggressive,' said Edward L. Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. 'Not many trade associations are willing to be that tough on an issue.' … But the ability of the National Association of Realtors to beat back competitors is being tested now as few times before. A broad range of critics say the organization and its state and local affiliates have worked to smother competition and protect the decades-old system that provides traditional brokers 5 percent to 6 percent commissions on most home sales." The Times adds, "The Justice Department sued the association last year, asserting that the group's rules for online property listings discriminate against Internet-based brokers. Battles have also raged in the states as Realtor organizations pursued policies that opponents say would hurt discount brokers. The Consumer Federation of America is revving up to fight any such industry-sponsored legislation state by state in coming months. … Even some industry allies say the association may be too aggressive in protecting its interests. 'They might have small victories, but they are losing the battle,' said Representative Pat Tiberi, an Ohio Republican who worked in real estate before joining Congress. 'I think they should be relooking some of their tactics.' … Officials at the National Association of Realtors are quick to defend the organization. Stephen Cook, the group's spokesman, said the organization and the industry were not under siege. Rather, Mr. Cook said, the current climate is the byproduct of a hot housing market that has focused much national attention on the industry. 'The system can always be improved, but we don't think it is broken,' Mr. Cook said."

Johnson & Johnson Not Ready To Give Up On Guidant Bid. Dow Jones (1/12) reports, "Johnson & Johnson appears unwilling to let its planned Guidant Corp. purchase slip away without a fight, a shift given J&J's prior unwillingness to budge from its offer for the medical device maker, but a move that reflects the new reality of intense competition." Dow Jones continues, "J&J's current purchase price for Guidant, about $64 a share, is the much- reduced product of an acrimonious spat between the companies following troubles with Guidant's heart rhythm devices last year. Given the dispute, many thought J&J was locked into that price, even as a surprise $72 a share offer from rival Boston Scientific Corp. dramatically changed the landscape." Dow Jones adds, "The offer, officially made Sunday at $25 billion, vaulted Boston Scientific (BSX) to apparent frontrunner status, but several reports this week suggest J&J is willing to change its tune. The Wall Street Journal reported that Guidant's board plans to meet at 3:00 p.m. EST Wednesday to decide between the Boston Scientific offer and a new, potentially much more competitive J&J offer. … The New York Times reported earlier Wednesday that J&J approached Guidant's board at the last minute late Tuesday, heading off a vote in favor of Boston Scientific , to negotiate a new deal. CNBC also reported Wednesday that J&J plans to raise its offer. … Boston Scientific, meanwhile, may be willing to answer a any J&J move. 'Don't count us out,' Boston Scientific spokesman Paul Donovan said Wednesday, declining to elaborate further."

Investors Eye Battle For P&O After Singapore Bid Hint. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Stanley, Prystay, Singer) reports, "Smelling a battle between a pair of rich bidders amid a boom in cargo volume, investors pushed shares of port operator Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. of Britain up 6.3% yesterday after PSA International Pte. Ltd. of Singapore said it might make a bid for it at as much as £3.54 billion ($6.25 billion)." The Journal continues, "PSA, a unit of Singapore's state-owned investment company Temasek Holdings Pte. Ltd., said after the London market closed Tuesday that it could pay as much as 470 pence a share for P&O, as the company is known. That would trump a bid of 443 pence a share, or £3.3 billion, that Dubai Ports World, of the United Arab Emirates, made in November and that P&O's board then recommended to its shareholders. … Still, it isn't certain PSA will make a bid for P&O, one of Britain's oldest companies, founded in 1840. Singapore port operator PSA, which has been granted access to the same nonpublic financial information that was given to Dubai Ports, has a little more than two weeks to review the data and decide. Dubai Ports, meanwhile, has said it is reviewing the situation carefully."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Investigators Give Detailed Account Of Sago Mine Rescue Attempt. Investigators offered a detailed account yesterday of rescue efforts after the accident at the Sago Mine in West Virginia that eventually left 12 miners dead. The story was covered by each of the networks in the first half of their newscasts, and was the lead on CBS.

The CBS Evening News (1/10, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer) reported, "While it took officials above ground 11 hours to organize a rescue effort, just one hour after the explosion, a group of miners below ground organized their own rescue effort and got much closer than anyone realized to the trapped men. Eventually they, too, were turned back by the poison gas and the 12 men died."

The New York Times (1/12, Barringer, 1.19M) reports that regulators "said they had heard nothing to confirm an account by relatives of the only survivor that the men had tried to force their way out in a rail car but that their escape route had been blocked by debris. Rescuers found no such blockage, the regulators said."

ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 3, 2:35, Woodruff) reported rescuers "took major risks to reach the men, not even knowing if they were alive." ABC (L. Stark) added, "This mine had hundreds of safety violations. And today, the company insisted that had nothing to do with the accident."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 3, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Today, 12 US senators from states in coal country called for hearings into the state of mining safety in this country, nine days now after the deaths of those 12 miners. And we're learning more about the number of violations at the Sago Mine. One Federal inspector has already used the word 'negligence.'" NBC (Costello) added, "Federal inspectors found the safety violations at the Sago Mine 'significant, substantial,' and often times indicated 'negligence.' 205 violations in the last year."

FBI Warns Of Coal Mine Accident Email Scam. NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 4, 1:00, Williams) reported, "The FBI has issued a warning to all Americans to beware of emails using this mining disaster as a scam soliciting funds to help the soul survivor in this accident, Randall McCloy. Investigators have come across one email scam so far that is actually claiming to raise money for McCloy and they warn there could be more out there. The FBI is urging everyone not to open unsolicited email and to thoroughly check before giving to any charity. By the way, McCloy remains in critical condition."

Interior Department To Open Alaska Acreage To Oil Drilling. The Interior Department has agreed to open about 400,000 acres on Alaska's North Slope for exploratory oil drilling. Officials said the acreage will be leased to oil companies to provide access to domestic oil supplies. The Washington Post (1/12, A8, Blum, 744K) reports, "Government officials said that the area of the preserve opened yesterday has significant potential for oil development. They estimate it contains about 2 billion barrels of oil that is economically recoverable, along with 3.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. The United States consumes more than 20 million barrels of oil per day."

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Wilson, 958K) adds, "Bureau of Land Management staff said the decision was made after three years of study and in response to requests by Vice President Dick Cheney's energy task force."

Study Links Global Warming, Extinctions Of Frog Species. A study to be published in the journal "Nature" links global climate change to the extinction of some species of animals. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 5, 2:20, Blakemore) reported scientists "focused on these creatures. 70 different species of Harlequin frog, gone, from 11 countries in Central and South America, even though there's been no destruction of the wild places these animals live in. Scientists are now beginning to find serious declines of all kinds of species, each linked in one way or another, to global warm warming, all over the world. And tomorrow's study seals the link." Biologist Alan Pounds: "There's a very clear relationship between temperature and the timing of the die-offs." Blakemore: "American biologists Alan Pounds and his colleagues use data from more than 70 researchers across the Americas and from climatologists worldwide. They discovered over the past 20 years, the spikes in global temperatures, coincided in lock-step with years that Harlequin frog species were seen for the last time."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, story 8, 2:00, Williams) reported scientists "say climate change apparently increases the incidents of a fatal skin fungus. Several other experts disagree, but tonight they say what is happening to the frogs should be a warning to us all."

The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Eilperin) reports, "Rising temperatures are responsible for pushing dozens of frog species over the brink of extinction in the past three decades, according to findings being reported today by a team of Latin American and U.S. scientists." The Post continues, "The study, published in the journal Nature, provides compelling evidence that climate change has already helped wipe out a slew of species and could spur more extinctions and the spread of diseases worldwide. It also helps solve the international mystery of why amphibians around the globe have been vanishing from their usual habitats over the past quarter-century -- as many as 112 species have disappeared since 1980." The Post adds, "Scientists have speculated that rising temperatures and changing weather patterns could endanger the survival of many species, but the new study documents for the first time a direct correlation between global warming and the disappearance of around 65 amphibian species in Central and South America."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Naik) reports, "Conservationists have been puzzled for more than a decade by the mysterious disappearance of harlequin frogs from the pristine, high-altitude tropical forests of Costa Rica. Now a group of scientists believe they have pinpointed the likely cause: global warming that promotes a fungus that is fatal to the frogs. … The finding, published today in the journal Nature1, is likely to stoke the debate about whether climate change is affecting the dynamics of disease, and why amphibians are dying out in such massive numbers world-wide. Recent data indicates that, since 1980, as many as 122 amphibian species are likely to have become extinct and one-third of known amphibian species are threatened."

The New York Times (1/12, Revkin) reports, "If the analysis holds up, it will be the first to link recent climate changes to the spread of a fungus lethal to frogs and salamanders and their kin. The chytrid fungus, Batrachochytrium dendrobatidis, has devastated amphibian communities in many parts of the world over the last several decades. … But experts on amphibian disease and ecology are divided over the finding, which is being published today in the journal Nature. Several scientists criticized the paper yesterday, saying it glossed over significant sources of uncertainty; others said it was important evidence that warming caused by humans was already harming wildlife. Climate scientists have linked most of the recent rise in the earth's average temperature to the buildup of greenhouse emissions from smokestacks and tailpipes."

USA Today (1/12, Watson) reports, "The research team found a 'ear lock-step (link) between the timing of losses and changes in climate,'said lead scientist Alan Pounds of the Monteverde Cloud Forest Preserve and Tropical Science Center in Costa Rica. 't's a very striking pattern, and it's hard to find another explanation for it.' … The group did not identify the other contributing causes. Pounds and his team say the warmer temperatures of the late 20th century led to better growing conditions for a fungus that kills frogs and toads. … Other scientists expressed skepticism about the findings. Stephen Corn of the U.S. Geological Survey said the dates recorded for extinctions may not be entirely reliable. The University of Colorado's Cynthia Carey questioned why the new work ignores extinctions of related species after 1998."

(1/12, Wysocki, Lueck, 2.11M) reports that in the event of a pandemic flu out break, the US drug supply chain "is almost certain to break. Thousands of drug-company workers in the U.S. and elsewhere could be sickened, prompting factories to close. Truck routes could be blocked and borders may be closed, particularly perilous at a time when 80% of raw materials for U.S. drugs come from abroad. The likely result: shortages of important medicines -- such as insulin, blood products or the anesthetics used in surgery -- quite apart from any shortages of medicine to treat the flu itself." The Journal adds that the US "is exceptionally vulnerable in a pandemic. Near-empty warehouses are a sign of strong inventory management. Production of drugs takes place offshore because that's cheaper. The federal government doesn't intervene as a guaranteed buyer of flu drugs, as it does with weapons. Investors and tax rules conspire to eliminate redundancy and reserves. Antitrust rules prevent private companies from collaborating to speed development of new drugs. Most fundamentally, the widely embraced 'just-in-time' business practice…is at odds with the logic of 'just in case' that promotes stockpiling drugs, government intervention and overall preparedness."

Ohio High Court To Hear First Eminent Domain Case Since SCOTUS Ruling. The AP (1/12, Welsh-Huggins) reports, "Ohio Supreme Court heard arguments Wednesday pitting a suburban Cincinnati city against a couple trying to save their home in a long-anticipated hearing that included a rare outburst of applause by spectators." The AP continues, "The city of Norwood is trying to use eminent domain to seize remaining properties for a developer who wants to build a $125 million project of offices, shops and restaurants. The city says the tax revenue will boost its economic fortunes." The AP adds, "Homeowners Carl and Joy Gamble say the city abused its authority to seize property by declaring the neighborhood deteriorating, a less severe condition than blighted. … The case is the first challenge of property rights laws to reach a state high court since the U.S. Supreme Court last summer allowed municipalities to seize homes for use by a private developer." The AP notes, "Property rights' advocates, business groups and backers of city planning are watching the Ohio case because of the precedent it could set as more than a dozen states consider bans against governments taking homes to boost economic development. … A decision is expected by summer."

8th Circuit Takes Up 2003 Meskwaki Tribal Election Case. The AP (1/12) reports, "A federal appeals court in St. Louis was scheduled to hear arguments Thursday on whether a lower court judge erred by dismissing a lawsuit challenging the Meskwaki tribal elections in 2003." The AP continues, "The lawsuit stems from an internal power struggle that began nearly three years ago when the Meskwaki tribal council and its chairman, Alex Walker Jr., were overthrown by a new set of leaders. The new council, led by Homer Bear Jr., was picked by the tribe's hereditary chief after Walker's council ignored recall petitions." The AP adds, "The ensuing political dispute played out in state and federal courts and led to a costly, seven-month shutdown of the Meskwaki casino, located on the tribal settlement west of Tama. The tribe, with 1,200 members, officially is known as the Sac and Fox of the Mississippi in Iowa. … The dispute ultimately was settled after tribal members participated in a series of elections overseen by the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs. … As a result, four Walker council members were removed and the Bear council was put in power. The casino reopened in December 2003." The AP notes, "The lawsuit before the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals originally was filed in 2004 by the election officials appointed by Walker. … In their lawsuit, Walker supporters argue that the BIA mishandled oversight of the election and illegally interfered in the process. They also claim that Aurene Martin, assistant secretary of the BIA, violated agency policy when she rejected an appeal of the election results. … In March, U.S. District Judge Linda Reade, in Cedar Rapids, threw out the lawsuit, saying it was a matter for tribal courts to decide. Walker supporters are appealing that decision."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Study Finds Shorter Prison Terms For Crack Cocaine Convictions. The AP (1/11, Sherman) reports, "Some federal judges are handing out shorter prison terms for crack cocaine crimes since last year's Supreme Court decision giving judges more discretion in sentencing, a report said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Defendants in the study received prison terms averaging 11 years, but those terms were less than what is called for in 20-year-old sentencing guidelines, according to the Sentencing Project, a nonpartisan group that backs alternatives to lengthy prison sentences." The AP adds, "The Supreme Court ruled a year ago that judges do not have to follow the sentencing guidelines. … The analysis focused on crack because the congressionally established guidelines punish some crack cocaine offenses more severely than powder cocaine offenses. A person must possess 100 times more powder cocaine than crack cocaine to receive a comparable sentence, under the guidelines. … The report looked at a very small sample of 24 cases in which judges wrote opinions explaining the prison sentence and cited the Supreme Court ruling. There were more than 5,400 people sentenced for crack offenses in 2003, the latest year for which statistics are available." The AP notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has warned of growing disparity in jail terms and 'a drift toward lesser sentences' since the court ruling. … Congress created the guidelines in the 1980s mainly to reduce disparities between judges. But the high court said making the guidelines mandatory violated a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial because they call for judges to make factual decisions that could add to prison time, such as the amount of drugs involved in a crime."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Fields) reports, "In the wake of the Supreme Court's decision a year ago making sentencing guidelines advisory rather than requirements to be followed, some federal judges appear to be giving more lenient sentences in cases involving crack cocaine, according to an analysis released yesterday." The Journal continues, "Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican, said he intended to introduce a bill this year that will propose changing the law to reduce the disparity between the amounts of crack cocaine and powder cocaine necessary to give a defendant the same sentence. He and Utah Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch co-authored a bill in 2003 that would have reduced the disparity to 20-to-1 -- from 100-to-1 -- but it got little support." The Journal adds, "The Sentencing Commission, which declined to comment on the study, has long supported altering its guidelines on crack-cocaine crimes to bring the penalties and amounts more in line with powder cocaine. In 1995, the Sentencing Commission sent Congress an amendment which would have equalized the penalties on the two forms of cocaine, but Congress rejected the amendment. Similar recommendations from the commission in 1997 and 2002 were ignored by Congress."

NYTimes Says Mandatory Minimum Sentences Have Not Worked. An editorial in the New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) says mandatory sentencing laws "have clearly done more harm than good. The inmate population has skyrocketed, driving prison costs to bankrupting levels, while having no impact at all on the drug problem. By taking away judicial discretion, the laws have led the country to write off first-time offenders who might have deserved second chances and to imprison addicts who could otherwise have been effectively and less expensively handled through treatment programs." In New Jersey, a panel of criminal justice officials "has recommended that the state revise a law that mandates more severe sentences for people convicted of certain drug crimes committed within 1,000 feet of school property. The law appears to have had no impact at all on the actual pattern of drug dealing. But it has created a profoundly discriminatory sentencing pattern, which treats minority defendants unfairly while undermining confidence in the criminal justice system. … The broader message of this study is that the country can't just imprison its way out of the drug problem. Coping with this issue - while reducing prison costs - will require a complex set of strategies, including drug abuse treatment and prevention services and increased judicial discretion in sentencing."

Constituents Not Surprised Barry Failed Drug Test. The Washington Post (1/12, B1, Weiss, Pierre, 744K) reports that news that DC City Council Member Marion Barry failed a court-ordered drug test was not met with "sense of surprise" among his constituents. According to the Post, "Sources said Barry tested positive for cocaine during routine screening in connection with his guilty plea to two misdemeanor tax charges in October. … The drug test that Barry failed was required as a part of a pre-sentencing investigation, said two sources familiar with the case. Now he is undergoing voluntary drug testing as part of his private treatment to help establish that he is making an effort to stay drug free, said the sources, who asked not to be named because the case is pending."

WPost Says Barry Should Resign. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/12, A20, 744K) says, "It's likely that news of Mr. Barry's failed drug test has provoked a collective groan throughout a city that over the years has been forced to live through episode after episode of the four-term mayor's personal troubles. The District, however, has managed to survive Mr. Barry's behavior in the past, and the city can be expected to do so again. The more important question has to do with Mr. Barry himself." Barry 'needs less time in the public limelight so he can devote more attention to the problems of Marion Barry. He has the opportunity to step aside so that others may step up to the task of public service. He should take it."

Flint, MI, Raids Net Ten Arrests In Weed & Seed Effort. The Flint Journal (1/12, Raymer) reports, "Ten people were arrested in drug raids on three homes Sunday as part of a special initiative paid for through a federal grant." The Journal continues, "Police searched east-side homes at 1277 Broadway Ave., 1610 Bennett Ave. and 3009 Dakota Ave. with warrants after drug buys at the homes, according to a news release from Flint Police Chief Gary Hagler. … Police seized $1,866 in cash, $1,000 worth of cocaine, $150 worth of marijuana, $100 worth of heroin and $100 worth of ecstasy in the raids." The Journal adds, "The 10 arrested face a total of 13 felony and 19 misdemeanor charges. … The sweep by the force's Crime Area Target Team and Community Policing was part of the federally funded Weed and Seed Program, which targets blighted areas to reduce crime and promote economic revitalization. … The U.S. Justice Department awarded $225,000 to the United Way for the program on the east side of Flint earlier this year. It was the third such grant."

Border Patrol Agents Find Tunnel Linking US And Mexico. CNN (1/11) reports on its Web site, "U.S. border patrol agents investigating a caved-in road discovered a tunnel linking the United States and Mexico, the third such passage found in three years near the San Ysidro, California, crossing, authorities said Wednesday. Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, said agents found the 35-foot long, 3-foot-by-3-foot tunnel on Monday. 'It's unclear what it was used for, but inside we found trash and other evidence indicating people had been inside recently,' Mack said. … Tightened border security since the September 11, 2001 attacks is the likely cause for an increase in U.S.-to-Mexico tunneling, Mack said. At least 15 tunnels have been found in California and Arizona since 9/11, she said. 'We've now got a dedicated tunnel task force, which works with the Drug Enforcement Administration and border patrol to proactively look for tunnels,' Mack explained."

Top Competitor On US Skeleton Team Is Suspended For Positive Drug Test. New York Times (1/12, Zinser, Pennington) sports writes, "The top competitor on the United States men's skeleton team, Zach Lund, was suspended yesterday after testing positive for a masking agent at a World Cup event last month in Europe. Also yesterday, a New York Supreme Court judge declined to overturn the suspension of the United States skeleton coach, Tim Nardiello. The international skeleton federation suspended Lund pending the outcome of an investigation by the United States Anti-Doping Agency. Jim Shea Sr., president of the United States Bobsled and Skeleton Federation, confirmed that Lund, who holds the No. 1 ranking in the world, tested positive for using Propecia, an anti-baldness drug. 'It's on the banned list; no question, he screwed up,' Shea said in a telephone interview. 'He lost his spot on the World Cup team, and it's possible he won't be able to go to the Games.' … Propecia has been listed as a prohibited substance by both the United States and international anti-doping agencies for more than a year because it can act as a masking agent for steroids."

Reuters (1/11) reports, "America's skeleton world number one Zach Lund has been suspended by the International Bobsleigh and Tobogganing Federation (FIBT) pending an investigation into a positive drugs test at a World Cup event last month."

The AP (1/12) reports, "Lund said he had taken hair-restoration products since 1999 and had always declared them on his medical forms. The United States federation granted him a Therapeutic Use Exemption, which provides a way for athletes to use some banned medications."

Michigan Men Indicted For Alleged Racially-Motivated Arson Plot. Knight Ridder/Detroit Free Press (1/12, Warikoo) reports, "Two Taylor, Mich., men -- angry that an African-American family moved onto their block -- hatched a plot to drive them out by burning down their house, said federal officials in an indictment released Wednesday. … One night in July 2002, the two men, Wayland Mullins and Michael Richardson, gathered at the home of Mullins' mother in Taylor. Across from that home, the Doster family had recently purchased a house." Mullins and Richardson "walked over to the Doster home. Then, 'they broke a window at the back of the house, poured gasoline into the home, and ignited the gasoline, causing fire and smoke damage to the house,' says the indictment. In ensuing months, the two men lied to Taylor police and the FBI, say federal prosecutors. At one point, Richardson tried to finger an innocent man in the arson." The Free Press notes, "More men may be involved in the arson, Murphy said, so federal agents are still investigating the case."

ATF Arrests Five In Dearborn Heights, MI, Drug Sting. The WXYZ-TV, ABC 7, Detroit (1/11, Lewis) reports, "Wednesday, 5 men were arrested after the ATF and local law enforcement officials set up a sting to catch them robbing a pharmacy. … Michigan Pharmacy was previously robbed of $15,000 worth on controlled substances." WXYZ-TV continues, "ATF agent Vera Fedorak, who participated in the sting, said 'Obviously it's a concern for the community, ATF and the local law enforcement.'" WXYZ-TV adds, "The robber came into the Dearborn Heights pharmacy with what he said was a bomb. ATF agents and local law enforcement were on the premise, with one posing as the store owner. They were able to apprehend one man at the pharmacy and also 4 others. … Michigan Pharmacy owner Khalid Saad said he was glad to help ATF agents catch the men who had been robbing his store. … The drug sting may result in federal charges."

Tennessee Man Sentenced For Possessing Explosive Device. The Cleveland (TN) Daily Banner (1/11, Kaylor) reports, "A Polk County man who plead guilty last October to possessing an explosive device has been sentenced to 5 1/2 years in a federal prison by a federal judge." The Banner continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Curtis L. Collier sentenced Danny M. Wilcox, 39, of Reliance, late last week, according to Carl Maskew, Bradley County Sheriff's Office liaison with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. … Wilcox is one of three people arrested and charged with the crime." The Banner adds, "Wilcox and his alleged accomplice, Glenda Cross, 41, took part in assembling the device that investigators learned was to be used in a murder plot against the ex-husband of Cross. … Two bomb squad officers from the Cleveland Police Department and ATF agents removed the device and detonated it in a nearby field. … Adams plead guilty in state court to conspiracy to commit second-degree murder and possession of an explosive. He is serving an eight-year sentence at the Tennessee Department of Corrections …

IMMIGRATION:

12 Indicted For Smuggling Illegal Immigrants Into US. The Washington Times (1/12, Seper) reports, "Three suspected ringleaders of two major alien-smuggling organizations and nine accomplices have been indicted by a Texas federal grand jury on charges of trucking more than 600 illegals from the El Paso area to Dallas and beyond during the past two years. All but three of the gang members were taken into custody this week by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, assisted by the U.S. Border Patrol. Two of the gang members were identified in indictments unsealed Friday, and another is in La Tuna Federal Correctional Institution on a previous alien-smuggling conviction. … ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said Mike Price, 53, his wife, Fabiola del Carmen Moguel de Price, 39, and Sam Jarvis, 52, headed two separate organizations that generated more than $1.6 million in smuggling fees between March 2003 and October 2005."

Former Saudi Embassy Driver Pleads Guilty To Smuggling Aliens Into US. The AP (1/12) reports, "A former driver for the Saudi Embassy in Washington pleaded guilty Tuesday to smuggling aliens into the United States." The AP continues, "Mohamed Abdel Wahab Yakoub, 61, admitted he used Saudi Embassy letterhead to obtain diplomatic visas from U.S. embassies for several Egyptians and Filipinos. … Yakoub, an Egyptian, faces up to 10 years in prison when he is sentenced in April on a single count of smuggling aliens. He will be subject to deportation after the sentencing." The AP adds, "Yakoub sold visas for $5,000 to $7,000. Court documents indicate he helped at least six illegal aliens gain entry to the U.S. in 2000 and 2001. He was fired by the Saudi embassy in 2002. … The Joint Terrorism Task Force, which helped investigate, said it had no indication the scheme had any connection to terrorism."

TAX:

Former West Virginia County GOP Chairman Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion. The Charleston Gazette (1/12, Searls) reports, "A former Kanawha County Republican chairman has agreed to plead guilty to tax evasion by using some of his employees' withholdings to pay for his wife's Mercedes-Benz." The Gazette continues, "Steven L. Miller admitted in an information filed by Assistant U.S. Attorney Hunter P. Smith Jr. that he 'evaded and defeated approximately $38,000 of the federal personal income taxes, trust fund taxes and Trust Fund Recovery Penalties due and owing by him' to the federal government." The Gazette adds, "Miller had apparently withheld federal taxes and trust fund money from employees' pay, placing it in a separate bank account at the Putnam County Bank, but never passed it on to the federal government. … Internal Revenue Service agents led the investigation of Miller from 1999 through 2000. The IRS has been aggressive in investigating such cases because employees may not qualify for Social Security, Medicare or unemployment benefits if taxes that have been withheld from their pay are never remitted to the federal government. … Miller also owed unpaid personal income taxes."

Wife Of "Mafia Cop" Pleads Not Guilty To Tax Evasion Charges. The AP (1/12, Ritter) reports, "The wife of a former New York police detective accused of working as a mob hit man pleaded not guilty Wednesday to three charges of filing a false income tax return. Frances Eppolito was ordered released without bond and was appointed a federal public defender pending a trial set for March 13. … Eppolito and her husband, Louis Eppolito, were named in a three-count felony indictment handed up Tuesday. Each is accused of filing false federal income tax returns for $127,386 in income in 2000, $8,654 in income in 2001 and a net loss of $1,297 in 2002."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Question Alito Membership In Controversial Princeton Group. At the third day of hearings on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel Alito, Democrats intensified their attacks, probing Alito's membership in a controversial Princeton alumni group that allegedly discriminated against women and minorities. The sharp questions prompted an emotional response from Alito's wife, which received much media attention. Reuters (1/12, Ferraro, Kenen) reports Alito, "pressed repeatedly about his membership two decades ago in the alumni group that opposed efforts to admit more women and minorities to the university, said, 'I'm not any kind of a bigot.' … At one point, Alito's wife, Martha-Ann, was crying in the crowded hearing room and then left." She "returned about an hour later and sat behind her husband." Mrs. Alito emotional reaction came after comments from GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, who is quoted in USA Today (1/12, Kiely, 2.31M) saying, "Judge Alito, I am sorry that you've had to go through this. I am sorry that your family has had to sit here and listen to this."

ABC and CBS showed video of the scene. The networks each also noted the confrontation between Sen. Edward Kennedy and Chairman Arlen Specter over documents at the Library of Congress relating to the group in question, Concerned Alumni of Princeton. The CBS Evening

News (1/10, story 2, 2:00, Borger) said the image of Mrs. Alito crying "may be the picture that people really remember from these hearings. It was quite an emotional day for the Alitos, and in the end the question is whether the Democrats took this a step too far today. … Today you saw the Democrats really ratcheting up their questioning. It's a very fine line, very difficult, but some say they went over the line."

ABC World News Tonight (1/11, lead story, 2:50, Vargas) reported, "The exchange got personal. And the pressure took a toll on Judge Alito's wife." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "It was a dramatic moment," and "sources close to Mrs. Alito say she thought the Democrats' attacks on her husband were disgraceful." ABC added "sparks…flew when Senator Kennedy threatened to shut down the committee if it didn't subpoena documents on the group."

NBC Nightly News (1/11, lead story, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Tempers have flared, mostly among Senators, while the Supreme Court nominee has kept his cool. Then suddenly, this afternoon, television viewers noticed Judge Alito's wife was in tears while sitting behind her husband. It was because of what was being said in defense of her husband after attacks on his character and questions about his past."

Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Hume) noted that "the limits of the sometimes extravagant courtesy that members of the Senate accord each other were tested today during" the Alito hearings. Fox (Angle) added, "With opponents to Alito growing, the frustration on the Democratic side exploded into view when Senator Kennedy demanded a subpoena on documents on a group called Concerned Alumni of Princeton. … Kennedy said he sent specter a letter on the issue and he said he didn't see it. … After increasingly heated exchanges, he attempted to move on and Kennedy threatened to bring the hearings to the stand still." Specter "announced that the papers in question were offered to the committee after a simple phone call."

The New York Times (1/12, Lewis, 1.19M) runs a story recounting Mrs. Alito's emotional reaction, while the Wall Street Journal (1/12, Cummings, 2.11M) reports "Alito said he doesn't remember why he joined in 1985, but he thinks it was because he was troubled by opposition to a Reserve Officers Training Corps office on the Princeton campus." The AP (1/12, Espo) reports that though Alito "repeatedly said he had no memory of involvement with the conservative Concerned Alumni of Princeton," he "highlighted his membership in a 1985 job application for the Reagan administration." Yesterday, "he repudiated the opinions expressed in articles in the organization's magazine." He said, "They're not my views ... I deplore them." The Washington Post (1/12, A6, Russakoff, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Alito Disavows Controversial Group; Nominee Touted His Membership in 1985." The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Neuman, 958K) reports Alito said, "I did not join this group…because of any attitude toward women or minorities," Alito told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "What bothered me about the Princeton administration…was the treatment of ROTC." Alito joined the ROTC "as an undergraduate," and the program "lost its contract with the university during the Vietnam protests."

In his Washington Post "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank (1/12, A6) writes that it has become clear "that the committee, with unified GOP support, would clear the judge" and that's why Democrats focused on the alumni group. Milbank writes, "Clarence Thomas had Anita Hill. Alito would have the Concerned Alumni of Princeton." Milbank calls the dispute "a schoolyard brawl." The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, 90K) reports the testy session came "after many observers had decided that Democrats had been neutered during the first two days, mastering the art of softball pitches. The Washington Post had called the sessions 'a most tender roast of Alito.' Not yesterday." The Washington Times (1/12, Hurt, 90K), also runs a front-page story under the headline "Alito Accused Of Racism."

The Legal Times (1/12, Goldman) reports, "Alito repeated the claim he had made the day before, that he had 'racked his brain' and could not remember why he had joined the group. The best explanation he could offer, he said, was his displeasure at the university's attitude toward ROTC, which had been banned at one point but had returned to the campus before Alito graduated in 1972. Alito had been a member of an ROTC unit. … Toward the end of the day Wednesday, however, Schumer was able to elicit a bit more satisfying explanation for Democrats. … Said Schumer: 'You somehow plucked this group, which you now say you somehow have no recollection. Why that group? Why was it plucked out and put on the application?' … Answered Alito: 'You have to look at the question I was responding to. What I was trying to outline were things relevant to obtaining a political position.' … It was the first time Alito had conceded to what many considered obvious: his need to show the Department of Justice, then under the highly conservative influence of Attorney General Edwin Meese, that his conservative bona fides were in order. … 'That was the answer he should have started with,' said Illinois Democrat Sen. Richard Durbin, after the hearing had ended for the day. 'It helps some. I just wish he hadn't gone through this tortuous process to get us there.'"

Alito Said To Have "Signaled" He Might Be Willing To Reconsider Roe. NPR (1/12) reports this morning, "Alito told the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday that the Roe v. Wade decision, which legalized abortion, set an important precedent, but he resisted pressure to be more specific about how he would rule in abortion cases before the High Court." Alito "wrote in 1985 that the constitution does not guarantee a right to abortion. He now says he does not decide cases based on religious faith."

The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Goldstein, Babington, 744K) reports Alito "signaled" yesterday "he might be willing to revisit the ruling that legalized abortion nationwide." The "drama of the hearings' third day," adds the Post, "nearly overshadowed the significance of the position Alito staked out on the landmark abortion case, Roe v. Wade." The nominee "edged closer to suggesting that he might be willing to reconsider Roe if he is confirmed to the high court, refusing, under persistent questioning by Democrats, to say that he regards the 1973 decision as 'settled law' that 'can't be reexamined.' In this way, his answers departed notably from those that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. gave when asked similar questions during his confirmation hearings four months ago." Yesterday, Alito "said that Roe must be treated with respect because it has been reaffirmed by the high court several times in the past three decades." Knight Ridder (1/12, Henderson, Kuhnhenn) adds "Alito's reluctance makes it easier for critics to brand him as a justice who could help overturn the 33-year-old ruling."

Sen. Richard Durbin said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11), "I'm concerned when it comes to the issue of Roe v. Wade. … I don't expect him to tell me how he's going to rule on a case, but I go back to what John Roberts was asked, and I think John Roberts is a man who's well respected in terms of his legal acumen. And he said that he believed that Roe v. Wade was settled law in this land. I asked Sam Alito the same question and he wouldn't give me the same answer. It leads some of us on our side of the table to wonder what's going to happen the first time there's a serious challenge to Roe v. Wade. And I think that's what's propelling a lot of the questions before this committee."

Alito Still Seen As Headed For Confirmation. Media consensus remains that Democrats have yet to damage Alito's prospects. As Pete Williams said on NBC Nightly News (1/11, lead story, 2:30), "It's looking more likely that Samuel Alito will be on the Supreme Court in time to join the Justices when the winter break ends in late February." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/11, Dobbs) also reported "really seems to be sailing along" and Democrats "are getting frustrated." Knight Ridder (1/12, Henderson, Kuhnhenn) adds Chief Justice Roberts "won 22 Democratic votes when the Senate confirmed him last September. Alito will almost certainly get fewer, though his Republican support appears solid enough to ensure his confirmation, barring any future stumbles."

Alito's performance under fire continues to receive generally positive reviews. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Cummings, 2.11M) says "the Democratic strategy to derail Judge Samuel Alito's Supreme Court appointment is centered on raising doubts about the nominee's credibility and persuading senators he would curb or end abortion rights." However, "Alito's straightforward testimony has served as a strong counter to their campaign." Moreover, "Democrats may have lost points…when Judge Alito's wife…left the hearing room in tears."

The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Reynolds, Simon, 958K) headlines its story this morning "Alito Remains Unruffled in Testy Hearings," and says the nominee "at placidly through it all, repeating -- with little apparent irritation -- responses that did not placate his critics." Moreover, "the attacks by Democrats did no apparent damage to Alito among Senate Republicans, most of whom have expressed support for him." On The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 3, 1:30, Schieffer), Jan Crawford Greenburg of the Chicago Tribune said yesterday "we got an introduction to Samuel Alito the man, the calm and quiet son of Italian immigrants who became a conservative jurist."

The New York Times (1/12, Stevenson, Lewis, 1.19M) reports Democrats "sought to build a case against his nomination to the Supreme Court by raising questions about his character and consistency." Democrats, "aware that Judge Alito had made it through the first two days without significant damage to his prospects of confirmation, struck an aggressive tone," but "the partisan volleys seemed to sail over or past Judge Alito, who politely but resolutely declined to be drawn out on abortion, executive authority and other issues. He often sat impassively as the committee members debated his qualifications and forthrightness."

The Financial Times (1/12, Waldmeir) reports Alito "has proved a monochrome, dispassionate and unflappable witness, ignoring insult, slight and political controversy, never taking the bait of those allied against him." This "has made for crushingly tedious political theatre. Even some of the senators seem to be losing interest. … Mr Alito's performance – which involves answering every question unemotionally and legalistically, no matter how aggressive or passionate the questioner – may not make for high television ratings. But all the signs suggest that the sheer weight of his worthy if tedious performance will eventually crush the opposition."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Chaddock, 61K) says Alito "has deftly parried questions on hot-button issues ranging from abortion to the limits of presidential power. No memorable phrases. No conspicuous stumbles. And -- most important -- no searing images of what life in 'Judge Alito's America' might be like." The Monitor adds, "To the frustration of anti-Alito groups staking out front seats in the hearing room, Democrats have been slow to get traction on issues critical to their base."

The New York Times (1/12, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports Alito "opponents" expressed "growing frustration Wednesday at the course of his confirmation hearings, saying that Democratic senators were struggling in their effort to build a strong case against him and that his confirmation appeared increasingly inevitable. Several said they had been particularly distressed after the first day of questioning of Judge Alito by the Senate Judiciary Committee, and had expressed that concern in calls and e-mail messages to Democratic aides on Tuesday."

There was also widespread coverage of Alito's hearings on local television newscasts. The stories tended to use metaphors that indicated the Judge had to deal with difficult questions. Most of the broadcasts also indicated that Alito handled the questioning well. Some stations ventured the opinion that Alito will be confirmed. For example, WSB-TV Atlanta (1/11, 6:17 p.m.) said, "Experts say Alito's nomination is all but certain. With every passing minute is it is more and more a foregone conclusion."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (1/11, 6:26 p.m.) reported, "Alito turned aside attacks on his judicial record at his confirmation hearings today. Despite increasing pressure the 55-year-old judge has kept his cool." KPHO-TV Phoenix (1/11, 6:39 p.m.) reported, "Democrats are turning up the heat, "but so far… Alito hasn't cracked under the pressure."

WEWS-TV Cleveland (1/11, 5:17 p.m.) reported, "Another day of partisan politics with disappointed Democrats hammering…Alito to be more forthcoming about his legal views."

Alito To Complete Testimony Today. CBS News Radio (1/12) reports this morning Alito "should wrap up his testimony this morning. Then the committee hears from other witnesses -- some for him and some against."

Novak Says Democrats "Shooting Blanks" At Alito. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/12) writes that Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy "and other Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who had spent weeks preparing for Alito's Supreme Court confirmation hearing seemed to be shooting blanks at President Bush's nominee. …. Failure to make a direct hit on Alito suggests a transcendent defeat for the Democratic judicial confirmation strategy crafted by Kennedy. It did not block all conservatives for appellate courts and failed to dissuade Bush from naming conservatives to the Supreme Court." Meanwhile, "Republicans were amused at Democrats stressing Alito's membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton (CAP)."

Alito, Senators Citing O'Connor Frequently. The New York Times (1/12, Liptak, 1.19M) reports, "Senators from both parties have frequently used" Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's opinions "as a basis for questioning Judge Alito" in "a testament to her disproportionate influence on the court in her 25 years of service." Also, it is a "reminder of the important role Judge Alito will assume if he is confirmed." Alito and supporters "highlighted instances in which he had ruled as she had." Meanwhile, Democratic senators worked hard to show that Judge Alito and Justice O'Connor were at odds, particularly in an important abortion case." On Wednesday morning, Senator Coburn "had grown frustrated with all the O'Connor talk" and said, "'The fact that you have to fit the Sandra Day O'Connor mold is really a misapplication. … There is no precedent that would say that.'"

Hatch Says Kennedy Was "Trying To Score Some Points." Sen. Orrin Hatch said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/11) that Kennedy "was trying to score some points there and he was trying to, I think, set up a situation where he could complain and gripe and maybe even vote against Alito."

Cohen Criticizes Biden's Performance. Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K), "The only thing standing between Joe Biden and the presidency is his mouth. … The reviews for Biden's first crack at Samuel Alito, the humorless Supreme Court nominee, were murderous. The New York Times had Biden out on Page One -- normally a position to kill for -- only this time it was not a paean to his considerable merits, but an account of how it took him nearly three minutes of throat-clearing to ask his first question and then took the rest of his allocated 30 minutes just to get in four more. … The Post had a similar account of Biden running off at the mouth. … The tragedy is that Biden, who is running for president, is a much better man and senator than these accounts would suggest. But his tendency, his compulsion, his manic-obsessive running of the mouth has become the functional equivalent of womanizing or some other character weakness that disqualifies a man for the presidency." Biden "has much to say -- and then too much to add. He is an anatomical disaster. His Achilles' heel is his mouth."

Twenty Democratic House Members Come Out Against Alito. The Washington Times (1/12, Fagan, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Democratic congresswomen yesterday said Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s failure to define abortion as a guaranteed right makes him unfit to sit on the Supreme Court, but senators said they are taking a wait-and-see approach. 'We believe that Judge Alito poses a direct threat to the rights of women in America,' 20 House Democrats wrote in a letter urging senators to block…Bush's nominee."

NYTimes Finds "Quiet Bombshells" In Alito Hearings. The New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) editorializes about several issues that have emerged in the Alito hearings, finding that the nominee has dropped several "quiet bombshells." The New York Times finds "evidence of extremism" in Alito's praise of Judge Robert Bork and membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton. The paper is also troubled by Alito's possible opposition to Roe v. Wade, alleges Alito may support an "imperial presidency," and says that Alito has repeatedly "taken the side of big corporations against the 'little guy,' supported employers against employees, and routinely rejected the claims of women, racial minorities and the disabled." The Times concludes that Alito's testimony "should trouble moderate

Republicans, especially those who favor abortion rights or are concerned about presidential excesses."

WSJournal Says Concerned Alumni Allegations Are Old News. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) says that focusing on the Princeton group is "a sign of how little Democrats have on Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." The Journal says that because Democrats can't attack Alito's "credentials or his mastery of jurisprudence," they are now trying "guilt by ancient association." The Journal says Kennedy and Sen. "Chuck Schumer" implied Alito "was racist and sexist by linking the nominee with the views of some members" of the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a line of questioning that "was mean enough that Judge Alito's wife left the hearing room" after Graham's questions. When Alito said he couldn't recall his membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, the Journal opines, Alito "was then tarred as dishonest." The Journal notes that Kennedy cites several decades-old articles on the Concerned Alumni (including a Wall Street Journal editorial) and concludes, "if this irrelevant arcana is the most his opponents have, he can start measuring his new judicial robes."

Michelman Likens Alito Hearings To Bork, Thomas Hearings. Under the headline "Kate Michelman, The Public Face Of a Woman's Right to Privacy," the Washington Post (1/12, C1, Weeks, 744K) reports that Michelman, "the face of reproductive rights," has "been at the forefront of one of this country's thorniest debates. She was president of NARAL Pro-Choice America from 1985 to 2004. She is scheduled to testify this week in opposition to the nomination of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. And she has written a new book, 'With Liberty and Justice for All: A Life Spent Protecting the Right to Choose.' Last night several hundred friends and well-wishers showed up at the Woman's National Democratic Club near Dupont Circle for cheese, wine and a celebration Michelman's book and her mission. Guests included former secretary of state Madeleine Albright, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton and Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.)." the Post notes that Michelman says the confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito ""triggers memories of the Robert Bork confirmation hearings in 1987. Michelman was scheduled to testify then, too. But she and leaders of other advocacy groups decided that Bork was going to cook his own goose, so she decided not to speak. She is also reminded of the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. She did testify then. Like Alito, Michelman said, 'Thomas also said he was open-minded' on the landmark abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade. But he has tried at every opportunity to overturn that decision, she said."

More Commentary. In his column in the New York Times, (1/12) David Brooks opines that Alito would have been a Democrat if he had been born earlier. 1950s Democrats, Brooks writes, were strong in "places like Trenton, where Alito grew up." But the 1960s changed the Democratic Party, as "cultural politics replaced New Deal politics, and liberal Democrats did their best to repel Northern white ethnic voters." Brooks finds Republicans compare more favorably to Democrats in appealing to average voters. Brooks concludes that the Alito hearings highlight "that sometime between 1932 and 1968, the DNA of the Democratic Party fundamentally changed" from "working-class" DNA to "DNA of a minority party."

USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) editorializes, that over the two days of hearings, "it has seemed that for every senator who questioned Alito thoughtfully — and there were several — three others were more interested in hearing themselves talk." USA Today rebukes Sen. Joseph Biden and Sen. Lindsey Graham, while praising Sen. Arlen Specter and Sen. Patrick Leahy. USA Today condemns "bloviating" senators and opines that "it's too bad so many senators seem so disinterested in gathering facts to make an informed, independent choice."

In a second editorial, USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) contends Alito is saying little when answering senators' questions. This silence, USA Today says, "tends to reinforce doubts raised by Alito's record." USA Today finds troubling contrasts between Alito's responses and those of Chief Justice John Roberts when he faced the committee. Among other examples, the paper cites the nominees' divergent statements on Roe v. Wade, which Roberts called "'settled as precedent,'" and Alito called "an 'important precedent.'" USA Today concludes that the "strategy of silence amounts to low short-term politics at high long-term risk."

Bush Expected To Focus On Health Care In 2006. President Bush is preparing to focus on health care as the "centerpiece of his 2006 domestic agenda," the Wall Street Journal (1/12, McKinnon, Lueck, 2.11M) reports. While the Administration "is unlikely to propose major new federal spending" it is "considering expansions of several earlier proposals aimed at using market forces to improve the quality and restrain the rapidly rising cost of health care." The Journal says the "outlines of the health-care system it envisions are becoming clear. It would rely less on generous insurance provided by employers that insulate individuals from the cost of their choices. Instead, it would rely much more on market forces, individual (as opposed to employer-provided) insurance, tax credits to help the uninsured, provider competition and using the Internet to provide consumers with more, better data about the care quality and prices charged by doctors and hospitals."

Card Says 2007 Budget Will "Tighten The Belt." Speaking at the US Chamber of Commerce yesterday, White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card said the Administration's budget blueprint for 2007 will "tighten the belt." Reuters

(1/11, Cornwell) reported that Card "gave no budget details in a speech that was short on particulars and long on reminders that the country was at war and that sacrifices were required. He also spoke mysteriously about a 'dark cloud that seems to be gathering around the political world' but did not explain." The White House "was in the final stages of drafting a 'very disciplined' new budget for fiscal 2007, starting October 1, Card said. 'It will fund the appropriate priorities of winning the war on terror, securing the homeland, but it will say, "Tighten the belt,"' he said. … Card said the 2007 budget will 'make the tough decisions about which programs are necessary, and fund them appropriately but exercise prudence with the taxpayers' money.'"

Flake Seeks To Reform Process Of Earmarking. The Washington Times (1/12, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Rep. Jeff Flake "is out to from the practice of earmarking." In a letter to house Speaker Dennis Hastert, Flake wrote, "Unfortunately, we Republicans have taken earmarking to an unprecedented level. It is now our responsibility to clean it up." Flake "goes so far as to say that it is 'no secret that over the past several months, our reputation as a governing majority has taken a beating. It is clear that continuing...indictments, possible indictments, plea deals, tainted campaign contributions, etc., has severely eroded public trust."

Treasury Undersecretary Adams Profiled. USA Today (1/12, Lynch, 2.31M) profiles Treasury Undersecretary for International Affairs Timothy Adams, describing his job as scanning "the globe trying to spot economic brushfires before they become infernos. Right now, he doesn't see much to worry about. But he's still looking. 'If I weren't paid to worry, I would argue that the glass is half full and there's a lot that we should celebrate. But my job isn't to celebrate; it's to think about how this all could go awry,' Adams, undersecretary of Treasury for international affairs, said recently." Adams "moved into one of the department's top posts after serving as chief of staff to then-Treasury secretary Paul O'Neill and several years as a Washington consultant. He also worked in the administration of President George H.W. Bush."

VA IG Wins Alexander Hamilton Award. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Lee, 744K) reports that the Inspector Generals Office of the Veterans Affairs Department have been awarded the Alexander Hamilton Award, which recognizes the "foremost effort by an inspector general to improve efficiency and effectiveness of executive branch operations. The Post adds, "Initially Congress created 12 independent audit and investigative offices, and every affected agency opposed them. Over the past 27 years, inspectors general have become a fixture of the bureaucracy. Their ranks have grown to 57 -- more than half appointed by the president -- and their offices employ 11,400 auditors, investigators, inspectors and other professionals."

Abramoff Scandal Prompts Rush To Reform Lobbying System. USA Today (1/12, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports a "scramble is on to write new rules restricting how lobbyists ply their influence trade as the capital is embroiled in a spreading corruption scandal." Bills "aiming to chill the relationships between lobbyists and members of Congress, stalled for months, are now on a fast track as leaders battle the perception of misconduct." Rep. Marty Meehan, who has sponsored one proposal, said, "These scandals aren't going away. What we know is probably only a fraction of the story." USA adds that after former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea, "the rush began." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and House Speaker Dennis Hastert "have ordered packages of new ethics rules intended to take effect before lawmakers face voters in November." House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., "who is drafting the House package, said it likely will include a ban on members of Congress taking fact-finding trips paid for by private interests." Dreier said he "also is looking at increasing the amount of information available on lobbyists' activities, including their campaign contributions and fundraising efforts." USA adds in the Senate, "the bill drafting has been assigned to Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa."

The Washington Post (1/12, A4, Birnbaum, 744K) reports Congress is "poised to pass measures early this year that would clamp down on lobbying activity and possibly end some lawmaker travel." Proposals are "coming from members of both political parties. A touchstone for all sides, however, is the plan introduced last month by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.)." The McCain bill "would beef up lobbying disclosure considerably and cover grass-roots lobbying campaigns, which now go unreported. It would also require lobbyists to report each fundraising event that they host or sponsor for candidates for federal office, including the amount raised." But "one particularly powerful group is gearing up to oppose several of the most sweeping proposals: lobbyists. Lobby organizations ranging from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to the American Society of Association Executives (ASAE) are concerned that some of the measures under consideration would overburden them with paperwork or unfairly limit their ability to do their jobs. They are already planning to lobby against those parts of any new lobbying law."

Lobbyists Now Seen As Ingrained In DC Political Culture. The Washington Post (1/12, A1, Edsall, 744K) reports in a front page story on "the capital's changing mores" on lobbying. Although the "excesses of Jack Abramoff have captured the news, a wide range of other practices -- rarely publicized and fully legal -- reflect the steady dismantling of the wall between lobbyists and members of the House and Senate." Fallout "from the Abramoff scandal is likely for a time to chill certain aspects of the capital culture, in which access to power on Capitol Hill is lubricated by lobbyist-funded meals, travel and campaign contributions, according to congressional veterans of both parties. But some public interest advocates believe the relationships between lobbyists and politicians have become so institutionalized in recent years that fundamental change is unlikely, absent changes in the law." Since 1998, lobbyists "have served as treasurers of 79 lawmakers' campaign committees and leadership PACs, according to the Center for Public Integrity." In addition, major trade associations "have bought Capitol Hill townhouses for fundraisers so that lawmakers can quickly go back to cast votes and then return to the event." At election time, "many lobbyists put on a new hat and become political consultants, guiding incumbents to reelection. Afterward these lobbyists return to their traditional roles, being able now to ask for votes from those they helped put in office." The "pivotal point in Washington's changing culture, according to lobbyists and congressional ethics analysts, came in 1995, shortly after Newt Gingrich and his 'Republican Revolutionaries' roared to power in the 1994 midterm elections." Then-Majority Whip Tom DeLay "and his allies began the 'K Street Project' -- the pressuring of trade associations and lobbying firms to hire Republican, and to contribute to Republican campaigns if they wanted access to key leaders and committee chairmen in the House."

Rodriguez Calls For Eliminating Many "Reforms" For Transparency. In a Washington Times op-ed (1/12), Paul M. Rodriguez, the former managing editor of Insight magazine, says, "Instead of adding more rules, how's this for a good government concept? Simply eliminate the very rules that sprang out of the Watergate-era campaign finance laws or many of the 'reforms' following the House Bank and House Post Office scandals. The concept isn't as far fetched as it sounds. Consider that it's one that has served well the residents of the Commonwealth of Virginia. The model is simplicity itself -- there are no restrictions governing political donations or gift giving other than making all of it public. What a refreshing thought when one stops for a minute to ponder that, so far as memory serves, such a system has not led to any scandals in Virginia. Total transparency between donors and recipients, actual dollar amounts and specific goodies received are all put into the public domain for anyone to see, report and contemplate."

Lobbyists' Group Urges Transparency In Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column that the American League of Lobbyists "would like members of Congress to take a collective big breath and slow down a bit" as it considers the Abramoff scandal. Paul Miller, the group's president "said the group is not particularly opposed to major changes in lobbying rules. It simply wants 'transparency' in what the Congress is up to in the rush to reform. … Lawmakers could change their rules rather than pass laws to restrict members from taking fancy trips paid for by lobbyists, Miller said. He expressed concern about proposals to prevent lawmakers and staffers from going to work as lobbyists for two years after leaving the Hill. They generally are restricted from lobbying their former colleagues for a year. The one-year cooling-off period isn't being enforced, Miller said, and he doubts there would be any real enforcement on a two-year ban."

Shadegg May Enter Race For Majority Leader.

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Rogers, 2.11M) reports that as "the two front-runners slowed" in the House GOP race for majority leader, Rep. John Shadegg "edged closer to entering the nasty Republican contest." Shadegg "stepped up calls seeking support from colleagues, and his allies were optimistic that the six-term Arizona lawmaker will offer a more change-oriented alternative to the two establishment figures in the field," current Majority Whip Roy Blunt and Rep. John Boehner, chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee. Shadegg's office "said no final decision had been made on the leadership race, but issued a statement critical of Reps. Blunt and Boehner for not being aggressive enough, in the congressman's words, 'to clean up our act in the wake of the recent ethics scandals and get back to the agenda that brought us the majority in the first place.'" Speaker Dennis Hastert said, "At the end of the day, he hinted, he'd be in the race. I don't know what his decision is." The Journal adds that neither Blunt nor Boehner "appears close to the 116 votes needed to win. With so many Republicans uncommitted, Mr. Shadegg has the potential to shake up the race, forcing at least a second ballot and greater discussion of changes that many members are demanding."

CQ (1/11, Ota) reports Shadegg "began testing the waters for a possible bid." Shadegg said, "I think we need to clean up our act in the wake of the recent ethics scandals and get back to the agenda that brought us the majority in the first place. I am concerned that the two members currently in the race, whom I have a great deal of respect for, will not move aggressively enough in that direction. I will continue to talk to Members to gauge how many share that concern." CQ adds Shadegg's move "came as an effort by Blunt supporters to move up the date for the leadership election failed. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert declared that the election would be held Feb.2."

Reynolds Seen As Possible Consensus Candidate. U.S. News and World Report (1/12, Bedard) reports House GOP leaders "do not think" Shadegg "will move forward this week to challenge Ohio Rep. John Boehner and Missouri

Rep. Roy Blunt for the House majority leader's post." A GOP leadership aide said if "neither Blunt nor Boehner can nail down the job within the next six to eight days, a move could be made to seek a consensus candidate. The leading alternative there, said several leadership officials and GOP consultants, is Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee." Insiders "close to the two campaigns to replace Rep. Tom DeLay as the permanent majority leader said that while Blunt is the leader, Boehner is gaining ground."

Boehner, Blunt Outline Ethics Reform Proposals. Reuters (1/12, Cowan) reports Reps. Roy Blunt and John Boehner, the "two candidates vying to become the next U.S. House of Representatives majority leader," yesterday "set forth their ideas" for "stamping out ethics problems that have threatened Republicans' control of the chamber beyond this year." Boehner "called for outlawing the earmarking of federal funds for special-interest projects sought by lobbyists, which do not go through the regular oversight process in Congress." Blunt, meanwhile, "called for banning privately-funded travel for House members and aides or at least requiring advance approval of such travel."

The New York Times (1/12, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that with the "need for new ethics and lobbying rules emerging as a central theme in the race for House Republican leader," Blunt and Boehner "engaged in an arms race over who supported the most stringent changes." Boehner, "trying to appeal to fiscal conservatives unhappy with an explosion in pet projects being inserted in broad spending bills, proposed banning such 'earmarks' unless they received individual Congressional scrutiny and approval." Rep. Blunt "backed Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's proposal to eliminate Congressional travel paid by special interest groups. Mr. Blunt's other proposals include penalties on lobbyists for violations of the Congressional gift ban. It is now improper only for lawmakers to accept gifts of more than $50, not for a lobbyist to provide such gifts." The Times adds it was "not just the leadership rivals seeking to replace Representative Tom DeLay who sought to up the ante over Congressional ethics." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "wrote Wednesday to Mr. Hastert, asking him to join her in urging the House ethics committee to investigate the conduct of Representatives Bob Ney of Ohio, Mr. DeLay of Texas and other lawmakers whose names have emerged in a federal lobbying inquiry."

Blunt's Ties To DeLay Could Result In Loss. The AP (1/12, Hananel) reports that if Blunt loses the race, he "can blame his close ties to former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and the desire for a clean break from controversy and scandal, according to members of Congress and other observers." As of Wednesday afternoon, Blunt "had at least 62 publicly declared supporters while Boehner claimed more than 30 supporters. It takes 116 votes from GOP members to win the post." Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., "a GOP moderate backing Blunt and a longtime critic of DeLay," said, "Roy is a Midwestern conservative. He understands that a Republican in Connecticut is different than a Republican in Missouri and there needs to be room in our party for both." The AP adds Blunt has "taken a gentler approach to corralling the votes needed to pass legislation. He has served as both majority whip and majority leader since DeLay was forced aside to face money laundering charges, and the experience could give Blunt an edge in the race against Boehner." But some members "want something else. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Ky., who is backing Boehner in the race, wants to send voters a message that Congress is cleaning house."

Blunt Says He Has No Relationship With Abramoff. Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Garrett) reported that that Abramoff scandal is an issue in the race for House Majority Leader, as Republicans "try to distance themselves from Abramoff's admitted efforts to bribe lawmakers. [Interim House Majority Leader Roy] Blunt told FOX this about his relationship with Abramoff." Blunt: "As far as my records indicate, I never had a meeting with him in our office. And because I don't take gaming money, I apparently didn't take the kind of money that he had the most access to." Fox added, "And Blunt had this to say about the ongoing criminal investigation of Abramoff's dealing with lawmakers." Blunt: "I knew who he was. I didn't happen to have any kind of real professional relationship with him."

Blunt Denies Boehner's Claim That GOP Lacks Direction. Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Garrett) reported that in an interview with Fox News, Blunt "denied accusations from his Republican challenger, John Boehner, that the party lacks drive and direction." Blunt: "Any fair look at what we did last year indicates that we are on the right course. We had a great legislative year." Fox added that Blunt "has slightly more than half of the public commitments he needs to win. Some Republicans privately grumble that Blunt said, if he loses the race for leader, he will return to his former post of party whip, from which some fear he might punish those who worked against him."

Hastert Rejects Call To Move Up Election Date. The AP (1/12, Taylor) reports House Republican leaders "rejected calls to move up the election of a new majority leader to replace Tom DeLay before President Bush's State of the Union address Jan. 31." Speaker Dennis Hastert "decided Wednesday to stick with a Feb. 2 caucus election scheduled after DeLay, facing trial in Texas on charges of laundering campaign funds, said last weekend he would not try to regain the job." Blunt supporters "had called this week for holding the election before the House reconvenes Jan. 31." Meanwhile, "some House Republicans are pressing for more sweeping changes in their leadership. Rep. John Sweeney, R-N.Y., is drafting a petition calling for elections for several junior leadership posts. Every position but Hastert's would be at stake."

Bloomberg (1/12, Litvan) reports some House Republicans, "including Representative Clay Shaw of Florida, had urged Hastert to call Republicans back to Congress earlier. In a letter to Hastert this week, Shaw and four other Florida Republicans said the elections might 'overshadow' Bush's speech."

Sweeney Calls For Election Of Lower House Leadership Posts. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Curtius, 958K) reports, "Rank-and-file House Republicans on Wednesday launched a push to require every member of their leadership but Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to face elections for their posts Feb. 2, saying the step was necessary to convince the public that the party was serious about ethics and lobbying reform." Rep. John E. Sweeney "planned to start circulating a petition as early as Wednesday night asking for broad elections. The move underscored many House Republicans' belief that their leaders needed to do more to respond to the unfolding corruption scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, if the party was going to keep its congressional majority in the November elections." Under Sweeney's petition, House Republicans "would hold elections for five leadership posts in addition to picking a successor to DeLay as majority leader."

Redistricting Could Make DeLay Reelection Effort More Difficult. The New York Times (1/12, Lyman, 1.19M) reports that Rep. Tom DeLay "is in the toughest re-election campaign of his 11-term House career, a battle that might be decided not only by his legal problems, but also by the Congressional redistricting plan he spearheaded in 2003. The redistricting led to the loss of six Democratic seats in Texas in 2004, but it also shifted thousands of Democratic voters to strong Republican districts. Among those, Mr. DeLay's 22nd District added several Democratic-leaning parts of Galveston County; several political analysts estimate they may have raised the district's Democratic vote around 5 percent." DeLay "will be running for re-election while standing trial in Austin on money laundering charges in a case over campaign financing. … Meanwhile, Washington waits to see what other indictments might flow from the Abramoff scandal." The Times adds, "Running in the reconfigured district for the first time in 2004, Mr. DeLay won handily, but with a smaller margin than in previous elections: 55 percent compared with his Democratic opponent's 41 percent."

Houston TV Stations Decide To Withhold Ad Accusing DeLay Of Corruption. Reuters (1/12, Franks) reports, "Several Houston television stations withheld a political ad on Wednesday accusing…DeLay of corruption after a lawyer for the former House majority leader said the ad was false and could lead to legal action. The ad, sponsored by public interest groups Campaign for America's Future and Public Campaign Action Fund, calls for DeLay to resign because of his indictment in Texas on campaign finance charges and his links to disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff. 'All four of the major broadcast stations [in Houston] contacted to air the ad, as well as Time Warner cable, have stated they either will not run the ad or will keep it off the air for further review,' according to a statement sent out by DeLay's office. Some of the stations said during their newscasts they were looking at the ad to determine its credibility or that they had found some of the allegations to be questionable."

Nearly Half Of Federal Employees Want Additional Training. The Washington Post (1/12, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that almost half of federal employees "would like additional training to improve their job performance, according to preliminary results of a survey by the Merit Systems Protection Board. Nearly 37,000 full-time government employees from 24 agencies participated in the survey, conducted last year. A summary of the findings appears in this month's Issues of Merit newsletter, published by the board's office of policy and evaluation, headed by Steve Nelson. Although 64 percent of survey respondents said they have received sufficient training to do their jobs, 46 percent said they would like additional training so that they can improve on their work. A huge majority, 81 percent, said the extra career development should be financed by their agencies and provided through formal training sessions. Slightly fewer, 77 percent, supported on-the-job developmental programs."

Cheney, Rumsfeld Create "Security Fuss" In Chinatown. The Washington Post (1/12,C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable source" column that Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld took their wives to a Defense Department dinner at Clyde's of Gallery Place on Tuesday night, "creating quite the security fuss in Chinatown -- many black sedans, men with earpieces. Upstairs in the private Piedmont Room, they nibbled on hors d'oeuvres (crab cakes, smoked salmon and dim sum) and then enjoyed Maryland crab soup and New York strip steaks."

Army Expected To Cancel Lockheed Spy Plane Program. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Karp, 2.11M) reports, "The U.S. Army is poised to cancel a Lockheed Martin Corp. spy-plane program valued at as much as $8 billion, in the face of competing budget priorities and problems in the aircraft's development, according to industry and government officials." People "familiar with the program" say the Army is expected to announce the termination of the Aerial Common Sensor surveillance plane as early as today. The decision would be "a blow to Lockheed's main partner in the program, Empresa Brasileira de Aeronautica SA, or Embraer, the Brazilian aircraft company hoping to break into the U.S. defense market."

USA Today Says Report On Cisneros Probe Should Be Unsealed. An editorial in USA Today (1/12, 2.31M) argues that independent counsel David Barrett's report on his investigation of former Housing Secretary Henry Cisneros should be unsealed. USA says the probe "took too long, cost too much and achieved too little. But at least those failings were the result of honorable intentions: to expose and punish corruption by public officials. Burying his report now serves no such noble goal. Instead, it would give wrong-doers even more reason to believe they can abuse the public's trust, confident that their actions would be hidden from the public's view."

WSJournal Says Congress, Courts Should Leave Credit Card Industry Alone. A Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) editorial says, "Last year the credit card industry handled more than $2 trillion in consumer transactions and gobbled up nearly $30 billion in fees, according to the Nilson Report newsletter on the credit card industry. These fees are now the source of mounting angst among retailers, which have launched 47 antitrust lawsuits against the credit card companies for alleged collusion in setting these fees. Retailers have also rushed to Washington demanding that Congress impose a de facto price cap on credit card charges -- as Australia and the European Union have already done. This campaign against credit card fees and the clamor for price controls sound eerily familiar. A few years ago dim-witted politicians employed price controls to try to limit fees for using ATMs. In localities where that was tried, the result was not lower fees, but fewer ATMs, and thus much less convenience for customers." The Journal adds, "Congress and the courts should keep their paws off this industry and let the market give credit, where credit is due."

World Economy Said To Be Expanding But Imbalanced. USA Today (1/12, Lynch, 2.31M) says the world economy, "though expanding, is dangerously imbalanced. The resulting U.S. current account deficit — reflecting the gap between the nation's ravenous appetite for imports and its anemic savings — is now at levels that many experts fear could trigger a run on the dollar, soaring interest rates and global economic pain. Meanwhile, investment is pouring into risky emerging markets as if the past decade's turmoil in Argentina, Turkey, Thailand and Russia never happened." Nonetheless, both "the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank expect solid global growth of 3.2% this year, about the same as in 2005." USA adds, "To many economists, the swollen U.S. current account deficit looms as the biggest potential hazard. In a nutshell, the United States spends too much and saves too little, and Asia saves too much and spends too little. (Moribund Europe doesn't do enough of either.) No one knows for certain when the day of reckoning will come." But economists "say the USA and the world cannot go on like this indefinitely."

Stocks Gained Wednesday. Stocks posted gains yesterday. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Patterson, 2.11M) reports that the Dow Jones Industrial Average closed up by 31.86 points to 11043.44. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "added 4.49 points to 1294.18 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 11.04 to 2331.36."

Harvard Economist Argues Economic Growth Is Morally Uplifting. Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K) that Benjamin Friedman, a Harvard economist, 'has written a hugely provocative book ('The Moral Consequences of Economic Growth') arguing that rapid growth is morally uplifting. 'Economic growth -- meaning a rising standard of living for the clear majority of citizens -- more often than not fosters greater opportunity, tolerance of diversity, social mobility, commitment to fairness, and dedication to democracy,' he writes. Further, the opposite is true. Poor growth feeds prejudice, class conflict and antidemocratic tendencies." Samuelson adds, "Friedman has identified a tendency, not an iron law. Still, his moral case for economic growth is solid. It's true that growth alone rarely creates happiness. Beyond a certain income, happiness depends on family relationships, a sense of belonging, personal beliefs. But growth surely can cure misery."

Bernanke Expected To Be More Of A Consensus Builder Than Greenspan. Knight Ridder (1/12, Hall) reports that as Ben Bernanke takes over the job of Federal Reserve Chairman, he is "to distinguish himself from [outgoing Chairman Alan] Greenspan as more of a consensus-builder and clear-speaking communicator. He must do it while still establishing his authority over an institution historically run by strong-willed chairmen with deeper real-world experience than he brings to the role." Knight Ridder adds, "Five former Fed governors told Knight Ridder in interviews that Bernanke will have to earn the trust of financial markets. The five also expect Bernanke to be more considerate of opposing viewpoints than was Greenspan, who sometimes left Fed governors feeling that their views were marginalized."

Ehrlich Plan For Funding Stem-Cell Research Will Favor Non-Embryonic Projects. The Baltimore Sun (1/12, Skalka, Bor, 296K) reports that Maryland Gov.

Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s "$20 million plan for funding stem cell research sparked sharp criticism Wednesday from scientists and legislators after a key state official disclosed that preference will be given to work on non-embryonic stem cells. With leading Democratic legislators renewing their call for support of embryonic stem cell research, the lines were clearly drawn for a debate that will dominate the General Assembly session that began Wednesday." Hours after Ehrlich "discussed his plan to commit $20 million in state money to stem cell research at a news conference Wednesday in Baltimore," the governor's "top science adviser, Chris Foster, said he doesn't believe the money would be best spent on embryonic stem cell research. 'I don't think at this time that we need to' fund embryonic cell research, said Foster, deputy secretary of the Department of Business and Economic Development." Foster "said the state would entertain applications for embryonic research but there would be a preference for non-embryonic research, a position that brings Ehrlich closer to President Bush on this contentious issue."

The Washington Times (1/12, Ward, 90K) notes, "The research funds, under the governor's proposal, would be disbursed through a committee controlled by his administration, alleviating concerns among Maryland religious groups that the studies would involve embryonic stem-cell research, considered a form of abortion by some. 'Clearly, no one is going to be funding embryonic, because in 25 years, there have been nothing but miserable failures,' said Nancy Fortier, an associate director at the Maryland Catholic Conference. 'Nonembryonic is what is being used to treat cancer, blindness, heart disease, Parkinson's disease." However, Ehrlich "did not rule out embryonic research. 'If it's embryonic with the best chance for therapeutic results, it will be embryonic,' said Mr. Ehrlich." The governor "said a committee, yet to be named, at the Maryland Technology Development Corporation (TEDCO), 'will make those decisions.'"

Scientist Says Stem Cell Research Must Proceed Without Hype. David A. Shaywitz, an endocrinologist at the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, writes in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K), "The rapid ascent of stem cell research into the spotlight reflects the collision of exciting science with uncharted ethics. President Bush's Aug. 9, 2001, prohibition on the use of public funds to create new human embryonic stem cell lines ignited interest in this field, even as it made it much more difficult for American scientists to conduct the research. The concern that important medical science was being deliberately thwarted by the federal government enraged many patient advocates and further ratcheted up the demand for results. … The good news is that underneath all this mess, stellar science really is happening. Stem cells have proved even more captivating than we could have imagined, and understanding the process by which a stem cell progressively differentiates into a specialized cell such as a neuron or a pancreas beta cell is perhaps the most compelling biology question for our generation. Stem cells have sparked our interest for good reason. But we're not going to figure out how they work overnight; it will take a very long time and require our best minds, as well as our collective effort (and, ideally, our collective dollars). … Difficult or not, good research is the only responsible way to proceed. If the promise of stem cells is to be fulfilled, the pursuit will require a solid scientific foundation, one grounded in reliable, reproducible facts and not simply supported by hype and hope."

With States Awash In Cash, Governors Proposing Bold Spending Plans, Tax Cuts. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, A4, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "Facing fat budget deficits, the Bush administration is preparing a tight 2007 budget that squeezes most domestic programs. Flush with cash, state governors across the country are doing the opposite." California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "proposes a $222 billion bond offering because, he says, 'we need more roads, more hospitals, more schools.'" Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) "seeks '$100 million in smart tax relief that strengthens our economy and invests in new technologies.' In 'State of the State' speeches now echoing through state capitols, others propose a beefed-up minimum wage and tax credits to help with energy costs. It's a far cry from the somber tones many governors struck earlier in the Bush era, as they struggled with the plunge in revenue that followed the 2001 recession." The Journal adds that "many governors spent the first half of this decade cutting expenses and raising taxes to meet state balanced-budget requirements. The revenue surge that accompanied economic recovery has left them in the black at an opportune time: the 2006 election season."

Schwarzenegger Chief Of Staff To Help Reelection Fundraising Efforts. The Los Angeles Times (1/12, Salladay, 958K) reports that California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "is dispatching his newly appointed chief of staff to woo wealthy Republican donors for his reelection effort, injecting his most influential policy advisor into the job of collecting money for his campaign. Susan Kennedy, once a top-level Democrat, will play a key role in the governor's reelection bid, the administration confirmed Wednesday. She is being paid campaign funds in addition to her $131,000 government salary and will mix freely with influential contributors." Paul S. Ryan, "associate legal counsel at the Campaign Legal Center in Washington, D.C., said allowing donors access to Kennedy creates 'the appearance of corruption in California. If you are fortunate to afford the price of admission, then you automatically gain access that the vast majority of Californians do not have.'" Under California law, Kennedy is permitted "to attend fundraisers for the governor and work on his campaign, as long as she is doing it on her own time." Schwarzenegger communications director Rob Stutzman "said Kennedy would take vacation days to meet donors and work on the campaign, and would 'absolutely' separate her policy job from the fundraising effort."

Ashcroft's Firm Took In $269,000 In Last Half Of 2005. The Washington Post (1/12, A19, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column that according to year-end disclosures, former US Attorney General John Ashcroft's lobbying shop "brought in $269,000 for the last six months of 2005. … Many of Ashcroft's restrictions on lobbying his former Justice colleagues expire early next month."

More Companies Expected To Freeze Pensions. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Schultz, Forelle, Francis, 2.11M) predicts that more companies will cut back on pension benefits as "an unusual alignment of financial conditions makes such moves more lucrative than usual. Two trends have emerged in the broad shift away from traditional pensions, which provide workers set benefits based on their salary and years of service. Financially strapped companies such as airlines and auto makers are garnering much of the attention as they seek to ditch their badly underfunded pension liabilities and try to stay afloat. Meanwhile, relatively healthy companies -- many with fully paid-up pension plans -- are seeking to shift to retirement programs that put more of the burden for savings and planning on employees." The Journal adds, "Current interest rates offer employers the possibility of a particularly big income boost if they freeze their pensions, effectively wiping out part of a debt owed to future retirees. While assets in a plan still will be paid out when workers retire or leave the company, benefits don't grow with additional years on the job."

Clinton Foundation Negotiates Lower Costs For AIDS Treatments. Former President Bill Clinton is expected to announce today that his foundation, the William J. Clinton Presidential Foundation, has negotiated lower process on AIDS tests and two AIDS drugs. The New York Times (1/12, McNeil, 1.19M) reports, "Four companies, from the United States, India and China, will offer rapid H.I.V. tests for 49 cents to 65 cents, which will reduce the typical cost of a test in poor countries by half, Mr. Clinton said in a written statement. Another four companies - three from India and one from South Africa - will make the antiretroviral drug efavirenz for as little as $240 per patient per year. One of the Indian companies, Cipla, will also make the antiretroviral abacavir for $447."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Schoofs, 2.11M) adds, "The Clinton team worked to lower prices by helping obtain cheaper ingredients to manufacture drugs. For example, one chemical ingredient accounts for most of the cost of making the drug abacavir. The foundation found an alternative supplier willing to slash the price for that ingredient, according to people at the foundation and at the manufacturing company, Matrix Laboratories Ltd. of India. To make efavirenz another raw material is crucial but expensive, so the foundation approached a university researcher and asked him to develop a cheaper method of synthesizing that ingredient, which he has done."

WPost Says Maryland Bill Is Aimed At Wal-Mart. An editorial in the Washington Post (1/12, A20, 744K) says state lawmakers in Maryland are preparing to "impose legislation" on Wal-Mart "so arbitrary that it may achieve the near-impossible feat of casting Wal-Mart as the victim. The Maryland bill would force firms with more than 10,000 in-state employees to spend at least 8 percent of their payrolls on workers' health insurance plans or make compensatory payments to the state. Only three other Maryland employers have more than 10,000 workers on their payrolls -- Johns Hopkins University, Northrop Grumman Corp. and Giant Food Inc. -- and they already meet or exceed the 8 percent threshold. Apparently, only Wal-Mart, with about 15,000 full- and part-time employees in Maryland, does not; thus the bill applies uniquely to Wal-Mart." The Post adds, "The Maryland bill is a legislative mugging masquerading as an act of benevolent social engineering. … And unlovable as it may be, Wal-Mart serves low- and middle-income people, both by creating entry-level and part-time jobs for people who might otherwise be unemployed and by saving its moderate-income customers a staggering amount of money."

Rice Secures Russian Support On Iran. The Washington Post (1/12, Linzer, 744K) reports this morning, "The Bush administration, working intensely to galvanize international pressure on Iran, has secured a guarantee from Russia that it will not block US efforts to take Tehran's nuclear case to the UN Security Council, American and European officials said yesterday." The "commitment," adds the Post, was "made in a Tuesday night phone call between Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." It "will likely help the United States and its European allies win support from key countries weighing a tougher line in response to Iran's resumption of sensitive nuclear work." The AP (1/12, Karimi) reports that Rice had discussed the situation by telephone with IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, while noting that "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shrugged off the international outcry. 'Unfortunately, a group of bullies allows itself to deprive nations of their legal and natural rights,'" he was quoted as saying.

Television coverage of the Iran situation was sparse, with only ABC Evening News (1/11) mentioning the story among the broadcast networks' evening-news programs. ABC reported that "western nations will likely seek economic sanctions from Iran for resuming its nuclear program." Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/12, Weisman, 1.19M) characterizes the standoff as a "contest of wills," and cites comments by Vice President Dick Cheney Wednesday "that the United States would seek the adoption of 'a resolution that could be enforced by sanctions, were they to fail to comply with it.'" On Fox News' Special Report (1/11, Baier), Cheney was shown saying, "They have been offered that opportunity, guaranteed source of fuel that would be enriched only to the level necessary to run civilian reactor. The Russians would take back the spent fuel so it could be reprocessed and they have not been satisfied with that. They want the ability to enrich the uranium themselves and that would take it up to the next level of purity."

The PBS Newshour With Jim Lehrer (1/11) also made mention of the crisis, quoting British Prime Minister Blair's Wednesday speech in the House of Commons in which he expressed "deep dismay" at the escalation. According to the Financial Times (1/12, Khalaf, Dombey), Blair "vowed to report Iran to the United Nations Security Council." The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, Ford, 61K) runs a similar report.

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/12, 744K) editorializes today that "Iran's resumption of uranium enrichment dramatically narrows the options of Western governments. … And thanks to better footwork by the Bush administration, European governments no longer have the option of blaming the United States for the failure of diplomacy."

In addition Farouz Farzami, an Iranian journalist "who is forbidden to publish in her own country," writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M), "On the surface, it would appear that pressure from the United Nations and the United States has little effect on the mullahs who rule Iran. The opposite is true." In fact, "if you look past this headline-generating bluster, you see that Western pressure is having an effect. The hard-line position of the Iranian government has begun to splinter. There are now three minds about this issue in the Majlis, the Iranian parliament: A categorical rejection of the Russian proposal to allow Iran to enrich uranium at its facilities, a compromise that would deny Iran the privilege of enriching uranium on its own soil. Modifying the Russian proposal to allow for enrichment to occur in both Russia and Iran. Suspending all enrichment until further notice or even to some agreed-upon future date, to defuse tension and rebuild confidence with the European Union." He adds, "The existence of these more conciliatory positions in a Majlis completely composed of religious hard-liners is a surprise. (A fourth point of view unrepresented officially, since reformers have been thrown out of the government, calls for Iran to comply with the U.N.'s demands and give up on enrichment of nuclear fuel altogether.)"

Also Dariush Zahedi, a political scientist at the University of California at Berkeley, and Omid Memarian, an Iranian journalist and blogger, write in the New York Times (1/12, 1.19M) that Iran "seems to be courting confrontation. But Western leaders would do well to consider what President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's bravado really says about Iran's likely posture in the region and at the nuclear talks that are scheduled to resume at the end of January. To continue down the path of conflict could be very costly, both for the regional interests of the United States and most of all, for the territorial integrity of Iran." Ahmadinejad "appears to be acting on the perception that the United States is in a position of considerable, indeed unprecedented, weakness. America's military is overstretched in Iraq and Afghanistan, and Washington has focused on monitoring North Korea's nuclear program rather than Iran's. If threatened, Iran could wreak havoc in Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon and Israel. These observations may lead Mr. Ahmadinejad to an incorrect assessment of Iran's strength relative to any American threat."

Rice Threatens Syria With UN Action. The Washington Post (1/12, Gearan, 744K) reports "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a new threat Wednesday to haul a defiant Syria before the UN Security Council if Damascus does not cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination in Lebanon." Syria, says the Post, "has failed to heed UN Security Council warnings about its behavior in Lebanon and elsewhere, Rice said, ... and the United States opposes 'any deals or compromises' with Damascus that would undermine the investigation." Reuters (1/11) also reports on Rice's "strongly worded statement," in which she cites what she called Syria's "destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism." The AP (1/12, Gearan), Bloomberg (1/12, Zacharia) and Wall Street Journal (1/12, King Jr., 2.11M) also report the story.

Likud Cabinet Members Plan To Resign. The Washington Times (1/12, 90K) reports, "Cabinet ministers from the Likud Party were to resign from the coalition government today, signaling an end to a weeklong political cease-fire following the massive stroke that felled Prime Minister Ariel Sharon." This will "will have little practical impact on the government, which will serve only as a caretaker until the March elections. Likud hopes to sharpen the distinctions between itself and Kadima as it goes into the campaign." While Sharon "could remain in the hospital for months," his "recently formed Kadima party is a strong favorite to form the next government, even with his likely successor, Ehud Olmert, at the helm."

Doctors Say Brain Damage Likely For Sharon. The Washington Times (1/12, Price, 90K) reports, "The movement that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon experienced on both sides of his body after a massive stroke last week bodes well in terms of his survival, but he could live with brain damage." Dr. Jose Cohen, one of Mr. Sharon's neurosurgeons at Hadassah University Medical Center in Jerusalem said that the stroke "certainly would have caused cognitive damage." However, only "after Mr. Sharon is weaned from the sedatives" can "his doctors in Jerusalem can assess brain damage and function."

Israel Halts Negotiations On Christian Center Over Robertson's Comments. The New York Times (1/12, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Israel said Wednesday that it was breaking off negotiations on a tourism project with the evangelical leader Pat Robertson in response to his remarks suggesting that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke was divine retribution," although it "would be willing to continue the talks without him."

Hoagland Says Stoke May Have Ended Chance Of Palestinian Democratic State. Jim Hoagland writes in his column in the Washington Post (1/12, A21, 744K) that the United States, its European and Arab allies, and the United Nations "are visibly failing" to make "Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip into a catalyst for the creation of an independent, viable Palestinian state." The spreading "chaos in Gaza and Ariel Sharon's sudden incapacitation by a severe stroke are destabilizing blows to President Bush's proclaimed strategy for transforming the Middle East into a zone of democracies," and now "Bush must reassess whether he can get there from here," as "without Sharon in power, the odds drop to virtually zero" for creating a democratic Palestinian state.

US Looking To Reopen Nuclear Talks With North Korea. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (1/12, Kim) reports that U.S. ambassador Alexander Vershbow said in a speech in Seoul that "the United States wants to quickly resume nuclear talks with North Korea." Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said "he would seek information in Beijing on the latest North Korean thinking from its closest ally."

Negroponte Announces Intelligence Mission Managers For North Korea, Iran. The New York Times (1/12, Jehl, 1.19M) reports, "The director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, has created new 'mission managers' for Iran and North Korea, adding those two countries to a short list of top-priority challenges for American intelligence agencies," Joseph DeTrani is responsible for North Korea, and S. Leslie Ireland for Iran. They "will be responsible, among other things, for identifying and filling gaps in intelligence on those two countries." Last year the Robb-Silberman commission, an independent panel appointed by President Bush, "described American intelligence on Iran and North Korea as woefully inadequate."

Whereabouts Of Kim Jong Il Remain A Mystery. Meanwhile, the AP (1/12, Kurtenbach) reports "the whereabouts of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il remained unclear Thursday, with a Hong Kong-based television network speculating he may be headed for the south Chinese city of Guangzhou, while other reports put him in Beijing or Russia." The Washington Post (1/12, 744K) places him in Shanghai, which if "true, analysts said that Kim's visit could represent an effort to win China's support for lifting U.S. economic sanctions." Reuters (1/12, Herskovitz) cites comments by US Ambassador Alexander Vershbow as saying: "We hope that he is there [China] and having high-level meetings."

China Unlikely To Use Economic Leverage Against North Korea. The Washington Times (1/12, Salmon, 90K) reports, "Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions are likely to figure in any negotiations North Korean leader Kim Jong-il holds in China this week, but Asian analysts see little chance that Beijing will use its growing economic clout to bring its neighbor to heel," even though "U.S. officials, ranging from Mr. Hill to Vice President Dick Cheney, have called in recent months for China to use its influence to press North Korea for greater cooperation in the nuclear talks." As "South Korea also has been reluctant to bring economic pressure on Pyongyang, partly for fear of falling further behind China in a long-term competition for trade opportunities in its northern neighbor," there has been "a narrowing of policy options for the United States."

Would-Be Bush Assassin Sentenced To Life Imprisonment In Georgia. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 8, :45, Schieffer) reported, "A man who tried to assassinate President Bush last spring in the former Soviet Republic of Georgia was sentenced today to life in prison. The would-be assassin was an opponent of the government then in power in Georgia and he threw a grenade at a rally where the President was speaking. It landed in the crowd well short of the podium, but did not explode."

China Says Trade Surplus Tripled In '05. The New York Times (1/12, Barboza, 1.19M) reports, "China said on Wednesday that its trade surplus with the rest of the world had tripled in 2005, to a record $102 billion, a figure that could reignite global trade frictions and step up pressure on the government to allow its currency to appreciate further." These "figures suggest a changing role for China in the global economy, indicating that it will influence things like prices at

Wal-Mart and global interest rates." However, "the growing bilateral trade deficit could strain ties between the United States and China."

The Wall Street Journal (1/12, Hiebert, 2.11M) adds, "some economists believe China's trade surplus could narrow this year because its imports have begun to pick up in recent months. Beijing is also seeking to reduce trade frictions by promoting domestic consumption." However, "economists point out that the overall U.S. deficit with Asia has remained roughly in balance over the past decade."

Communist Officials Said To Abuse Power To Enrich Selves, Cronies. The Washington Post (1/12, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports that American investor Terry Petty "had forged a venture with the son of a local Communist Party official to open a machine shop" in Shanghai." However, men hired by his partner "forced their way in, brandishing guns, sparring with workers and disabling machinery" after he refused to sell his stake. "Calls to the police proved futile, factory managers said, because the police took direction from local officials connected to the Chinese partner. … The case has garnered the attention of both the United States and Shanghai governments." With market reforms opening investment, "some Communist Party officials abuse their influence over local governments to enrich themselves and their cronies."

Chinese Proposal Suggests Power Project Could Use Fewer Dams. The New York Times (1/12, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "A government environmental review has recommended reducing the number of dams included in a controversial hydropower proposal on the Nu River in southwestern China in order to limit environmental damage and decrease the number of people who would be resettled," calling "for 4 dams instead the 13 in the original Nu proposal." However, the Hong Kong newspaper that reported the story, Wen Wei Po, which has ties to the Communist Party, "suggested that the full 13 dams had not been completely ruled out."

Industry Polluting Much Of China's Waterways. The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Cody, 744K) reports, "The fouling of the Xiang River attracted wide attention, but it was far from unique as China struggles to reconcile breakneck economic growth with protection of the environment. After more than two decades of swift industrialization, a recent government report found that up to 70 percent of the country's rivers and lakes are seriously polluted." Although "extensive national regulations have been put into place," the "enforcement of environmental rules has often been lax, and the result has been frequent contamination of the waterways that China's 1.3 billion people depend on for drinking water."

WSJournal Says Private Economy Would Prevent Pollution. The Wall Street Journal (1/12, 2.11M) editorializes, "The recent news has been bad PR for the PRC" as "problems are popping up all over." While "it's hard to tell exactly how widespread the problems are, but we'd go out on a limb and guess, oh, 'pretty vast.'" Still, "if Beijing really wanted to tackle its environmental malaise, it would move faster to dump state enterprises and speed the development of a private economy in which managers are held accountable both for making a profit and for fouling the air and water," as "China's current environmental problems stem from its rampant misallocation of capital and resources over many decades."

Concerns Raised About Accuracy Of China's Bird Flu Reporting. The Washington Post (1/12, A13, Cody, 744K) reports, "The World Health Organization identified China's latest bird flu victims…who succumbed to the H5N1 strain of the virus last month in different parts of the country" and were only reported two days ago. "The Health Ministry's spokesman, Mao Qunan, spoke at length about bird flu at a news conference Tuesday but did not mention the additional deaths. Mao's omission and the delay in reporting the deaths to WHO fed concerns about the reliability of official information on the extent of bird flu" in China which, after "the SARS controversy…pledged to deal squarely with health information." However, "Chinese reporters have said they are frequently forced to seek information about China's bird flu situation from WHO or foreign publications because China's official sources refuse to provide it."

Turkish Authorities Struggle To Keep Up To 20 Avian Flu Outbreaks Under Control. ABC World News Tonight (1/11, story 7, 2:00, Woodruff) reported the virulent avian flu strain H5N1 "has suddenly spread west to Turkey, where nearly two dozen human cases have been confirmed in just a few days." ABC (Sciutto) added, "Today, they went from house-to-house here, government teams searching for birds and killing every one they found. Then, disinfecting the homes and themselves." Bird flu "is spreading through Turkey faster than anywhere else in the world. Three new human cases today, 18 in just one week." Dr. Joseph Domenech, United Nations: "The situation is worrying, because we have more outbreaks than we thought." Sciutto: "Normally, one or two in the country. Here, nearly 20 separate outbreaks cross Turkey."

Initial Turkish Response Criticized. The New York Times (1/12, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports that international experts said Turkey's "slow initial response in detecting the arrival of bird flu three weeks ago has created a health crisis that may be very hard to correct." Dr. Joseph Domenech, chief of veterinary services at the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization in Rome said "there was now a risk that the virus had become so entrenched in Turkey that it would be impossible to eradicate it," although "both he and

United Nations health officials agreed that Turkey was now taking the problem 'seriously.'"

UN Tries To Prevent Panic Over Avian Flu Cases In Turkey. The Washington Times (1/12, Pisik, 90K) reports, "The United Nations yesterday sought to calm fears about the deadly avian flu virus as signs of near-panic spread through Turkey and its neighbors." Dr. David Nabarro, the coordinator of the U.N. response to the avian flu, "stressed that 'there is no evidence of human-to-human transmission in the Turkey outbreak.' He said each case appeared to be traceable to avian contact." World Health Organization officials also "praised Ankara's response to the crisis, but officials insisted that the counterinfluenza measures must be maintained."

Bird Flu Mutation May Make Bird To Person Transmission Easier. The Washington Post (1/12, A12, Williams, Sipress, 744K) reports that international health officials said "preliminary tests show that the strain of bird flu virus that has stricken at least 15 people in Turkey has evolved in a way that could make it somewhat more hazardous to human beings, although it still lacks the capacity to be passed easily from person to person." While "Influenza experts are studying the apparent change to determine its significance," they "say they believe the genetic change could make it easier for bird flu to pass from chickens to people."

OPEC Expected To See Record Oil Revenues. The Financial Times (1/12, Hoyos) reports that the US Department of Energy forecasts that "oil revenues of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel that controls 40 per cent of the world's oil supplies, will increase by 10 per cent to a record $522bn this year," which "should help keep interest rates low if members of the group continue to spend their increasing wealth in the US bond market."

Bush Signs Trade Pact With Bahrain. The New York Times/Reuters (1/12) reports, "President Bush signed a bill on Wednesday establishing a free trade agreement with Bahrain, the first such pact with a Persian Gulf country." It "requires Bahrain to eliminate its already low tariffs on American consumer and industrial goods and most agricultural products" while "the United States will eliminate tariffs on Bahraini goods."

Canada's Martin Accuses Opponent Of Being Too Close To Bush. The Washington Post (1/12, A18, Struck, 744K) reports, "Well behind in the polls two weeks before a parliamentary election, the governing Liberal Party led by Prime Minister Paul Martin this week brought what in Canadian politics is a most damning indictment: Martin's opponent is too close to the Americans." In Canada, "hostility toward the Bush administration is strongest in eastern cities, traditional strongholds of the Liberal Party. With opinion polls showing the party losing some of that support, Martin's strategists are trying to tap the sentiment," Nelson Wiseman, a political scientist at the University of Toronto said.

Low Turnout In US For Mexican Election Ballot Requests. USA Today (1/12, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "With the deadline" for Mexican expatriates to request ballots for Mexico's presidential election "looming, only a fraction of eligible Mexicans in the USA have participated because of confusion about the application, lack of interest in the campaign and concern that applying for ballots could result in problems with U.S. immigration officials." Out of "an estimated 4 million expatriates who have Mexican voting cards," only about 15,000 applied. "Some people left their voting cards in Mexico so relatives could pay property taxes in their absence or conduct other business" and others "who are here illegally threw away their cards to avoid having any identification." Interest also may be low because "no campaigning is allowed in the USA."

Analysts Worry Citgo Has Become Political Tool For Chavez. USA Today (1/12, Lynch, 2.31M) reports, "The question of" Hugo Chavez's "influence over Citgo was highlighted by the company's recent provision of 25 million gallons of subsidized home-heating oil to poor people in the northeast USA." Analysts "saw the move as a stunt by Chavez aimed at embarrassing the Bush administration. And some say Citgo's generosity…suggests the company may be turning into a political tool for Chavez" and "worry that Venezuela's ownership of more than 6% of U.S. refinery capacity gives Chavez…the power to cripple as well as comfort." However, "others note that imported oil from elsewhere eventually could compensate for any interruption in Citgo supplies" and that "a shutdown would cost him and his country dearly."

Merkel's Washington Visit Could Begin New Era In US-German Relations. Knight Ridder (1/12, Schofield) reports, "When new German Chancellor Angela Merkel sits down on Friday with President Bush in Washington, they'll be ushering in a new era of trans-Atlantic relations - that much is clear. But what those relations will be is less certain." While "Bush finally has a German friend in Merkel," she, "like much of Europe,…finds some of Bush's policies distasteful, and analysts are wondering how far she'll be willing to go in voicing disagreement." Still, "there's little doubt in Germany that she's the only European leader with the staying power to help Bush improve his relations with Europe."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/12, LaFranchi, 61K) adds there is a question "whether the diplomatic defrosting portends a deeper restrengthening of US-German relations and indeed of transatlantic cooperation," and some experts say "the improvement in US-German atmospherics is not likely to reverse the general drifting apart in transatlantic relations."

Yushchenko Ignores Ukrainian Parliament's Vote To Dismiss Government. The New York Times (1/12, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine on Wednesday criticized as illegitimate a parliamentary vote to dismiss his prime minister and government, deepening the country's political turmoil ahead of new elections in March." Prime minister, Yury I. Yekhanurov, "defied Parliament's vote…by presiding over a meeting of the government's ministers." The dispute "not only undermined" Yushchenko's "political position before the elections but also called into question recent constitutional changes that gave Parliament new powers, including the authority to dismiss the government."

Blair Appeals To Bush To Save Rolls-Royce Contract. The Financial Times (1/12, Alden, Spiegel, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair, the British prime minister, has made a 'very forceful' personal plea to President George W. Bush to save a $2.4bn (€2bn) contract for Rolls-Royce and General Electric to develop a second engine for the Joint Strike Fighter," and "reverse a Pentagon decision to kill the engine before the proposed 2007 defence budget is sent to Congress." Those "familiar with the lobbying campaign said Mr Blair has lent his full muscle to the effort and involved several senior British officials, including Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's chief of staff." However, "Despite industry and Whitehall insiders said yesterday that there is considerable debate within the British government about how forcefully to back Rolls with the Bush administration."

Blair Unveils Program To Deal With Anti-Social Programs. The Washington Times (1/12, Webb, 90K) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair, introducing a key plank of his third and final term in office, has started a $140 million action plan dubbed 'Respect' to attack anti-social problems." He said that "the nation has been fighting '21st-century crime with 19th-century methods' and called for a system of speedy 'summary justice' to bypass traditional courts." Blair "envisions evicting out-of-control families from their homes…for up to three months, and rehousing them in a network of residential centers…to teach them how to behave." Another "key element in the action plan centers on efforts to control unruly children and to help their beleaguered parents." However, "critics immediately attacked Mr. Blair's plan, one dismissing it as 'rubbish,' and another describing it as a package of 'minor tweaks to existing measures and shock tactics.'"

Kazakh Election Poses Conundrum For West. The Washington Times (1/12, Pala, 90K) reports, "In a ceremony as rich in irony as in glitter, President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who has led Kazakhstan for 16 years, was sworn in yesterday for another seven-year term." Despite "widespread ballot-stuffing" and "unlike" Georgia, Ukraine, and Kyrgyzstan, "not a single street demonstration erupted to protest the vote. Opposition leaders said they did not want to be blamed if the government opened fire on demonstrators." The West faces "an unusual conundrum: how to deal with a genuinely popular dictator of an oil-rich and strategic country who, despite muzzling the press, stifling the opposition and brushing aside mounting evidence of nepotism and corruption, would have won easily without cheating."

Harvard Student Claims Detention In Zimbabwe. The Washington Post (1/12, A3, Fahrenthold, 744K) reports that Harvard University student Amar Bakshi "said Wednesday that he had been arrested in Zimbabwe during a trip to research his senior thesis, then held in grimy cells for five days before his parents and local lawyers managed to free him." He believes that "the key to his release might have been a surreptitious cell phone call he made soon after his arrest" Calling form "a bathroom, he told a friend that he had been pulled off an outbound airplane by plainclothes officers." While "Bakshi's account of the ordeal was reported previously by the Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper, and in Zimbabwe by the Standard, an independent weekly," any "official corroboration" was "difficult to find."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Calls Spying Inquiry Inevitable (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — President Bush acknowledged Wednesday that congressional hearings into his domestic spying program were inevitable, but he said they would be "good for democracy" as long as they did not "tell the enemy what we're doing."

DOJ_NMG_0009175

Even as he delivered a lengthy defense of the program, Bush stepped back from the strong opposition he expressed last month to a public investigation of his decision to allow the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on communications between people in the United States, including U.S. citizens, and those in other countries in suspected terrorism cases.

He said Wednesday that in approving the program, he had to balance civil liberties against the need to find out, "on a limited basis," what potential terrorists were plotting.

Critics have questioned whether it was legal to order a government agency to listen in on the conversations of people in the United States and read their e-mails without court approval.

Bush's comments came in response to a question at a citizens forum in Louisville as he took his case for the Iraq war to an audience beyond Washington.

The spying program, which was revealed by the New York Times last month, came up when Bush was asked whether the Justice Department, which has begun investigating the leaks, would "follow through and, if necessary, go after the media … to shut these leaks up."

Bush did not directly answer the question, but he used it to launch one of his longest public explanations of the program.

"I did say to the … National Security Agency that they should protect America by taking the phone numbers of known Al Qaeda and/or affiliates and find out why they are making phone calls into the United States and vice versa. And I did so because the enemy still wants to hurt us," Bush said, adding that "if somebody is talking to Al Qaeda, we want to know why."

He said that when he took the oath of office, "I meant it when I said I'm going to uphold the Constitution."

But, he added, "I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people."

Bush said that the program had been "fully scrutinized on a legal basis," that it had been reauthorized several times, with lawyers from different government branches looking into it, and that congressional leaders — Republicans and Democrats — and both parties' leaders on the intelligence committees had been briefed on it.

He did not say that some senior government lawyers, including at least one top Justice Department official, had expressed qualms about the program, and that senior Democrats said they were given limited information and were not allowed to study it more closely.

Bush said that before moving forward with the program, "I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary."

He repeated earlier assertions that the congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11 attacks gave him the authority to use all force he thought necessary to fight terrorists, and that the spying program fell under that authority.

"There will be a lot of hearings and talk about that," Bush said, "but that's good for democracy — just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether I have the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

On Wednesday, Bush addressed about 400 people chosen by civic groups, business organizations and a university. He spoke for about 20 minutes on the war in Iraq, then fielded questions for about an hour on topics such as immigration, the role of church and state in Islamic society, education and the challenges of preparing a workforce for 21st century jobs.

The Louisville trip reflected a drive by the White House to take Bush's message on Iraq and terrorism directly to audiences around the country in an effort to overcome what public opinion polls have found to be sagging support for the war.

As part of the effort, Vice President Dick Cheney spoke in two telephone interviews with Fox News hosts Tony Snow and Sean Hannity, drawing attention to what he says were ties between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda.

Bush Again Defends Wiretapping Program (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Jan. 11 -- President Bush on Wednesday defended his decision to allow government eavesdropping on the phone calls and e-mails of suspected terrorist collaborators in the United States, saying the program is legal and is essential to averting potential attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0009176

"I understand people's concerns about government eavesdropping," Bush said in response to a question about the program during a citizens forum here. "I share their concerns as well." Even so, he added, the program is important to his duty to protect Americans.

Bush's comments on the eavesdropping program came in response to a question posed during a campaign-style event here aimed at shoring up support for the war in Iraq as well as the nation's broader anti-terrorism effort.

The president's forum here was different than most of the events he attends nationwide. Usually he speaks to carefully screened partisan audiences and takes no questions. White House aides described Wednesday's audience of business and community leaders as bipartisan, and Bush opened himself to unscripted questions during the town-hall-style event.

The domestic spying program has drawn fire from members of Congress, both Democrats and Republicans, who think it oversteps the president's authority and violates civil liberties that are part of the nation's fiber. The National Security Agency program began in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as a way to help the nation's intelligence agencies gather information about any future attacks.

The program authorizes the NSA to screen the international e-mails and phone calls of people in the United States with suspected terrorism ties without first obtaining a court order. Bush said that congressional leaders have been briefed on it and have been given the opportunity "to express their approval or disapproval."

Some Democrats, however, have complained that the classified briefings amounted to one-way conversations in which the administration simply told them about the program but left no means to protest it.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has announced plans to hold hearings on the spying program. Bush said he welcomes the inquiry, calling it "good for democracy." He added, however, that the hearings run the danger of telling "the enemy what we're doing."

In a statement released after Bush's remarks, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said that rather than protect the nation, Bush's program may compromise efforts to fight terrorism by resulting in hundreds of cases against suspected terrorists being thrown out of court.

"President Bush's decision to sidestep the rule of law and spy on Americans without a court order may have dealt a serious blow to our ability to fight and win the war on terror," Dean said.

The president sounded now-familiar themes about the war in Iraq. Although insurgents there continue to sow havoc and death with almost daily bombings and other attacks, Bush said steady progress is being made toward success.

Also, with the war sure to be a major issue during the upcoming midterm elections, Bush again warned Democratic critics of the war not to allow their critiques to undermine the morale of troops whose lives are on the line.

"I can understand people being abhorrent about war. War is terrible," Bush said. "But one way people can help as we're coming down the pike in the 2006 elections, is remember the effect that rhetoric can have on our troops in harm's way, and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy."

Earlier this week, Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) charged that Bush has "used our troops as a shield against legitimate criticism of his Iraq war policy."

In Shift, Bush Says He Welcomes Inquiry On Secret Wiretaps (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Jan. 11 - President Bush said Wednesday that he would welcome a Congressional investigation of whether he had the authority to order the National Security Agency to monitor communications in the United States without warrants.

Until now, the White House had opposed public hearings, which are scheduled to begin next month in the Senate. But on Wednesday, answering questions from a friendly crowd in Louisville in a conference center decorated with signs that said "Winning the War on Terror," Mr. Bush appeared ready to make the best of a political necessity.

In his campaign-style meeting, he was repeatedly applauded for authorizing the wiretaps, a decision that some of his political aides said they believed would ultimately help rebuild his approval ratings by demonstrating the lengths to which he would go to prevent another terrorist attack inside the United States.

Asked whether his administration was going to "go after the media" for revealing operations like the domestic wiretapping, Mr. Bush instead defended his decision to authorize the surveillance. "I did so because the enemy still wants to hurt us," he said. "And it seems like to me that if somebody is talking to Al Qaeda, we want to know why."

His order enabled the National Security Agency to monitor the international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda.

Singling out Americans and others in the United States for such surveillance would normally require a warrant under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, although the act also allows the attorney general to authorize a wiretap if it is reported to the court within 72 hours.

"Now, I - look, I understand people's concerns about government eavesdropping," Mr. Bush said. "And I share those concerns, as well. So obviously I had to make the difficult decision between balancing civil liberties and, on a limited basis - and I mean limited basis - try to find out the intention of the enemy."

The president never directly addressed the question of why he avoided the existing system, although his legal advisers and intelligence aides have said it was too cumbersome.

"There will be a lot of hearings to talk about that, but that's good for democracy," Mr. Bush said. "Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I had the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

Mr. Bush said some key members of Congress had been briefed on the program several years ago and "we gave them a chance to express their disapproval or approval," brushing past the claims of some Democrats that their questions about the program's legality were never resolved.

The president's statement that he was willing to see public hearings go forward was a change from his stance at a news conference at the White House just before Christmas. At the time, he said, "Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy, 'Here's what they do - adjust.' "

Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican and the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has scheduled open hearings, and the Senate Intelligence Committee has said it plans closed hearings.

The president's legal justification for the N.S.A. program has gotten mixed reviews, ranging from enthusiastic to skeptical to scathing.

This week, Representative Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, released a 14-page legal analysis she had requested from a former C.I.A. general counsel, Jeffrey H. Smith, now a Washington lawyer.

Although recognizing the president's assertion that his power as commander in chief justifies warrantless surveillance, Mr. Smith called that case "weak" in light of the language and documented purpose of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which requires warrants.

Mr. Smith also wrote that the Congressional resolution authorizing military force against those who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks "does not, in my view, justify warrantless electronic surveillance of United States persons in the United States."

"The president was correct in concluding that many of our laws were not adequate to deal with this new threat," Mr. Smith wrote. "He was wrong, however, to conclude that he is therefore free to follow the laws he agrees with and ignore those with which he disagrees."

Investigate Surveillance, But Be Careful, Bush Says President Reverses On Hearings; Ex-CIA Counsel Questions Legality (USAT)

By John Diamond And David Jackson

USA Today, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009178

LOUISVILLE — President Bush on Wednesday dropped his opposition to upcoming Senate hearings into his program of conducting electronic surveillance on domestic targets without court-approved warrants. He said he welcomes such hearings.

Hearings will be "good for democracy, Bush said during a town-hall-style meeting filled with supporters and interrupted often by applause. "Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I have the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

After the program was revealed publicly last month by The New York Times, Bush said that hearings would be counterproductive and that the members of Congress who needed to know about the surveillance of people linked to terrorism suspects had been briefed on it.

"Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy: 'Here's what they do. Adjust.' This is a war," Bush said at a news conference in December.

Bush said Wednesday that administration lawyers had approved the program. "I can understand concerns about this program," he said. "Before I went forward, I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision."

For the second time in a week, however, an analysis questioned the White House's claims that Congress implicitly authorized the program. Such a contention is "not credible," according to a memo to the House Intelligence Committee by Jeffrey H. Smith, a CIA counsel during the Clinton administration.

Smith's Jan. 3 memo was requested by committee Democrats. It follows a report by the non-partisan Congressional Research Service that said the surveillance program might not be "well grounded" legally and may rest on a mistaken assumption that Congress has no power to limit domestic surveillance in wartime. The report said a firm conclusion couldn't be made because much about the surveillance program is classified.

Bush's argument, that he has the constitutional authority to authorize the surveillance program, is a weak one, Smith wrote.

The president's constitutional authority, he wrote, is limited by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which requires a warrant before spy agencies can target someone in the USA and allows for only a 15-day exception following a declaration of war by Congress. The surveillance program has been in effect for more than four years; Congress has not formally declared war.

White House spokesman Fred Jones said the Justice Department has detailed the legal arguments supporting the policy. Those arguments focus on two points:

•Presidential warmaking powers under Article II of the Constitution give Bush the right to take actions to prevent further attacks. Since the 9/11 attacks showed the enemy was in the USA, surveillance, a standard part of modern warfare, was within Bush's powers.

•The 1978 law forbids surveillance without a warrant "except as authorized by statute." The administration says a post-9/11 congressional resolution authorizing the use of force in response to the attacks is such a statute. However, Smith wrote, "It is hard to believe that Congress had any idea that it was authorizing such sweeping presidential powers" when it voted for the resolution on Sept. 14, 2001.

Smith, who was CIA general counsel in 1995 and 1996, wrote that broad assertions of presidential war powers have generally been upheld by the courts "in areas where Congress has not acted." Where specific legal language exists, such as FISA, presidential power is limited, he wrote.

Bush: Hearings On Eavesdropping Program "good For Democracy" (LEXHL)

By deb riechmann

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - President Bush said Wednesday that congressional hearings to investigate his domestic eavesdropping program will be good for democracy as long as they don't give secrets away to the enemy.

Bush was initially opposed to having the program investigated in a public format, but made it clear that he is resigned to open hearings that are scheduled to begin in coming weeks.

Bush's decision to authorize the National Security Agency to monitor - without warrants - people inside the United States has sparked a flurry of questions about the program's legal justification.

Bush defended the program during a campaign-style town hall meeting, saying he understands concerns about it but monitoring the phone calls of affiliates of the terrorist network al Qaida is necessary to protect the United States. He said he made sure he had the legal authority to allow the program before he did so.

"There will be a lot of hearings to talk about that, but that's good for democracy," he said. "Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I had the prerogative to make the decision I make, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

In the days after the program's existence was revealed, Bush cautioned against hearings, arguing that the appropriate members of Congress were being consulted privately and offering assurances that he was working within the law to authorize the eavesdropping.

"Any public hearings on programs will say to the enemy, `Here's what they do - adjust.' This is a war," Bush said at a December news conference when asked about expected hearings on Capitol Hill.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled hearings on the issue for early February. The Senate Intelligence Committee also plans to hold hearings that will be closed to the public.

For the second time in a month, Bush took questions from audience members during an appearance to win support for his war on terror.

In his opening remarks, he defended the global war on terrorism and the U.S. effort in Iraq. He said insurgents in Iraq were trying to drive the United States out through violence and bloodshed but he declared, "They're not going to shake my will."

While saying he wanted to bring American troops home, he said, "I don't want them to come home without achieving the victory."

In a question and answer session, Bush was asked about Iraq, education priorities, immigration, the economy, health care and other subjects. He said the war on terrorism would not end with an enemy surrender, as was the case in World War II. "I don't envision a signing ceremony on the USS Missouri," Bush said. "The peace won't be the kind of peace we're used to."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said questions from the audience were not prescreened, and Bush himself said that while the event was about terrorism, no questions were off limits.

Kentucky, where Iraq is taking center stage in politics, provided an appropriate backdrop for Bush's remarks.

Kentucky Rep. Anne Northup, a Republican ally of Bush who joined him at the event, describes the situation in Iraq as "painful." Yet, she stands firmly behind the his decision to invade that country, a potentially divisive issue in Northup's upcoming re-election campaign.

In contrast, Iraq war veteran Andrew Horne, a Democrat running for her seat, said the invasion was a mistake because the threat of weapons of mass destruction - a key justification for the war - never materialized.

Bush Not Opposed To Hearings On Eavesdropping (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 12, 2006

President George W. Bush on Wednesday defended his authorization of domestic eavesdropping and said he did not oppose congressional hearings as long as they did not provide information to the enemy.

"I can understand concerns about this program, before I went forward I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president," he said. "We are a ... country of law."

Critics have questioned whether it was legal for Bush to authorize the National Security Agency to eavesdrop inside the United States on Americans with suspected terrorism ties without getting court approval.

"I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people," Bush said in Kentucky where he gave a speech on Iraq and terrorism.

"One way to protect us is to understand the nature of the enemy. Part of being able to deal with this kind of enemy in a different kind of war is to understand why they're making decisions they're making inside our country," Bush said.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, has said he wants to hold hearings in early February on the domestic eavesdropping.

Bush said hearings were "good for democracy" if they did not help the enemy.

"Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I have the prerogative to make the decision I made doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing -- see that's the danger," Bush said.

Bush Reasserts 'Right' To Order Wiretaps (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. -- President Bush said yesterday that he is doing everything "within the Constitution" to protect the American people from another terrorist attack, but added that congressional hearings into a top-secret U.S. spying program will be "good for democracy."

In an unusual, 75-minute campaign-style town hall meeting -- which included nearly a dozen questions from members of the invited audience -- Mr. Bush said he firmly believes he has the authority to order warrantless wiretaps of phone calls by people thought to be linked to al Qaeda or its affiliates.

"I have the right as the commander in chief in a time of war to take action necessary to protect the American people," he said during the event at the Kentucky International Convention Center in Louisville. "I can understand concerns about this program. Before I went forward, I wanted to make sure I had all the legal authority necessary to make this decision as your president."

Mr. Bush said that after the September 11 attacks, he vowed "that I would use everything in my power -- obviously, within the Constitution -- but everything in my power to protect the American people. ... I put that hand on the Bible, and I meant it when I said I'm going to uphold the Constitution."

Some on Capitol Hill are demanding an investigation into the wiretapping program, first revealed last month by the New York Times. The program allows the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on international phone calls without a warrant, which Democrats say is a violation of the constitutional right to privacy.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean criticized the Bush administration's "disregard for our courts and our laws."

"President Bush's decision to sidestep the rule of law and spy on Americans without a court order may have dealt a serious blow to our ability to fight and win the war on terror," Mr. Dean said.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled hearings on the issue for early February, and the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence plans to hold closed-door hearings -- both of which Mr. Bush endorsed yesterday.

"There will be a lot of hearings and talk about that, but that's good for democracy," he said. He added a caveat, however: "Just so long as the hearings, as they explore whether or not I have the prerogative to make the decision I made, doesn't tell the enemy what we're doing. See, that's the danger."

Continuing an effort that began last month to convince Americans that he has a plan for Iraq, Mr. Bush was conciliatory and occasionally contrite during the lengthy question-and-answer session with some of the 400 community leaders, small-business owners and others in attendance.

On the invasion of Iraq, he said: "I can understand folks who say, 'I wish you hadn't done that.' " On the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, he said: "I understand that the intelligence didn't turn out the way a lot of the world thought it would be. And that was disappointing, and we've done something about it" by overhauling the nation's intelligence agencies.

But he took aim at Democrats who he said might be looking to exploit the difficulties in Iraq during midterm elections in November.

Responding to a 7-year-old in the audience who asked how Americans can help in the war on terror, Mr. Bush said: "One way people can help as we're coming down the pike in the 2006 elections is remember the effect that rhetoric can have on our troops in harm's way and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy."

Residents Get Chance To Question President (LEXHL)

By bruce schreiner

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - The global fight against terrorists was the main theme, but topics hit closer to home when Kentuckians got a crack at questioning President Bush on Wednesday.

During the town hall-style event, a business operator bemoaned health insurance costs. An educator called education crucial to the nation's security. A man asked about immigration.

But first, Bush outlined his strategy in the Iraq war.

The president said insurgents were trying to weaken America's resolve. "Whether you agree with me or not, they're not going to shake my will," he said. "We're doing the right thing."

Many tickets for the event were distributed by Greater Louisville Inc., the metro chamber of commerce. The friendly audience included Gov. Ernie Fletcher, Lt. Gov. Steve Pence, and U.S. Reps. Anne Northup and Ron Lewis, all Republicans; and Mayor Jerry Abramson, a Democrat.

Commenting on Abramson's longevity in office, Bush said his father, as president, gave the mayor a pair of cufflinks. "It looks like the mayor is going to outlast both Bushes," he said. Abramson is running for another term this year.

Across the street, about 200 people chanted and waved signs protesting the Iraq war and wiretaps ordered by the Bush administration without first obtaining warrants.

Al Mitchell of Louisville was disappointed that the tickets to Bush's speech were selectively given out and carried a sign that read, "Why aren't we inside?" Mitchell said Bush uses fear to control Americans.

"That's exactly what the Bush administration is using to subdue, to control the American people, to sell them on this war in Iraq," Mitchell said. "It's this factor of fear that we're going to be terrorized by ambiguous figures."

Speaking in the home state of Fort Campbell, which has thousands of soldiers deployed to Iraq, Bush said his goal is "nothing short of victory." He said victory would be achieved when Iraq is no longer a haven for terrorists and Iraqis can defend their fledgling democracy.

Bush said decisions on troop levels would be left to military commanders.

"I know a lot of people want our troops to come home," he said. "I do, too. But I don't want them to come home without achieving the victory. We owe that to the mothers and fathers and husbands and wives who have lost a loved one. We can't let their sacrifice go in vain."

Bush then took questions for nearly an hour. When a small business owner focused on rising health insurance costs, Bush acknowledged "it's becoming an unmanageable cost."

He touted health savings accounts and association health plans that pool employees together to try to hold down insurance costs. Bush also said something needs to be done to halt frivolous medical liability lawsuits that he said drive up health costs.

When asked about education, Bush bemoaned an "achievement gap in America," but said his "No Child Left Behind" law has brought improvements to education accountability.

Bush hinted that his upcoming State of the Union speech would address the problem of low math and science proficiency among middle and high school students.

"We've got to have kids that are the best in science and engineering and math, otherwise jobs are going to go where the workforce does have those skills," he said.

Another questioner asked Bush about immigration. Bush said border security is vital but urged compassion for foreigners coming to the U.S. in search of work.

Bush said employers should be held accountable for hiring legal immigrants, but he said that's difficult given rampant fraud.

Many farmers and other Kentucky employers rely on immigrant workers.

"You've got folks right here in Kentucky who are hiring people to do jobs that Americans won't do, and you say, 'Show me your papers,' and they've been forged and the employer didn't know about it," Bush said.

Bush promoted his guest worker plan in which foreigners would receive tamperproof cards allowing them to work temporarily in the U.S.

One question came from 7-year-old Alex Childress. The youngster, dressed in a suit and tie, asked what people can do to help in the war against terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0009182

Bush used the question to send a message to war critics. "One way people can help is ... remember the effect that rhetoric can have on the troops in harm's way, and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy," he said.

Alex's mother, Martha, said her son thought of the question himself.

"He didn't like any of my questions," she said.

The Lawbreaker In The Oval Office (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

The country has set the bar so low for the performance of George W. Bush as president that it is effectively on the ground.

No one expects very much from Mr. Bush. He's currently breaking the law by spying on Americans in America without getting warrants, but for a lot of people that's just George being George. Forget the complexities of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or even the Fourth Amendment's safeguards against unwarranted (pun intended) government intrusion into matters that we have a right to keep private.

On his frequent trips home to his ranch in Texas, the president likes to ride his bicycle. He's not studying the Constitution.

"People are changing phone numbers and phone calls, and they're moving quick," said Mr. Bush, as he defended his authorization of warrantless eavesdropping by the National Security Agency on phone calls and e-mail into and out of the U.S.

As the president put it, "If somebody from Al Qaeda is calling you, we'd like to know why."

Well, that's true, Mr. President. But Congress and the Constitution have spoken as clearly as a bright sun on a cloudless afternoon about these matters: if you're going to eavesdrop on Americans in the U.S., you'd better run out and get a warrant.

You have to act fast? O.K., do what you have to do - but you then have to apply for a warrant within 72 hours. If, after three days, you can't explain to a court - a secret court, at that - why you need to be spying on somebody, then you need to stop that spying.

It has become fashionable to say that this controversy is about the always difficult problem of balancing civil liberties and national security. But I think the issue is starker than that. The real issue is President Bush's apparent belief - stoked at every opportunity by that zealot of zealots, Dick Cheney - that he can do just about anything he wants (mistreat prisoners, lock people up forever without filing charges), and justify it in the name of fighting terror.

"There's an enemy out there," said Mr. Bush.

That's also true. But this is not China or the old Soviet Union. The United States should be the one place on the planet where even a devastating terror strike by Al Qaeda is unable to shake the foundations of the government, which is grounded in the rule of law, the separation of powers and a constitution that guarantees the fundamental rights of the citizenry.

A group of former government officials and law professors from some of the nation's most distinguished universities sent a letter to Congressional leaders on Monday expressing their deep concern about the president's domestic spying program. They said:

"Although the program's secrecy prevents us from being privy to all of its details, the Justice Department's defense of what it concedes was secret and warrantless electronic surveillance of persons within the United States fails to identify any plausible legal authority for such surveillance. Accordingly, the program appears on its face to violate existing law."

Among those who signed the letter were William Sessions, the former F.B.I. director, and Philip Heymann, a former deputy attorney general who is now a professor at Harvard Law School.

The Congressional Research Service, a nonpartisan arm of Congress, also took issue with the administration's defense of the warrantless eavesdropping. Its analysts searched diligently but apparently in vain for a legal justification of the spying authorized by the president. Their detailed report on the constitutional and statutory issues raised by the program said, "It appears unlikely that a court would hold that Congress has expressly or impliedly authorized the N.S.A. electronic-surveillance operations here under discussion."

The administration's attempt to justify the program, the analysts said, "does not seem to be as well grounded" as the administration seems to believe.

DOJ_NMG_0009183

President Bush and others in the administration have repeatedly argued that the president's wartime powers trump some of the important constitutional guarantees and civil liberties that Americans had previously taken for granted. They don't seem to see the irony of fighting on behalf of liberty in Afghanistan and Iraq while curtailing precious liberties here at home.

The administration should not be allowed to use war as an excuse. The U.S. is a very special place in large part because no one, not even the president, is above the law.

Ex-official Warned Against Testifying On NSA Programs (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

The National Security Agency has warned a former intelligence officer that he should not testify to Congress about accusations of illegal activity at NSA because of the secrecy of the programs involved.

Renee Seymour, director of NSA special access programs stated in a Jan. 9 letter to Russ Tice that he should not testify about secret electronic intelligence programs because members and staff of the House and Senate intelligence committees do not have the proper security clearances for the secret intelligence.

Miss Seymour stated that Mr. Tice has "every right" to speak to Congress and that NSA has "no intent to infringe your rights."

However, she stated that the programs Mr. Tice took part in were so secret that "neither the staff nor the members of the [House intelligence committee] or [Senate intelligence committee] are cleared to receive the information covered by the special access programs, or SAPs."

"The SAPs to which you refer are controlled by the Department of Defense (DoD) and ... neither the staffs nor the members ... are cleared to receive the intelligence covered by the SAPs," Miss Seymour stated.

Special access programs are the most sensitive U.S. intelligence and weapons programs and are exempt from many oversight mechanisms used to check other intelligence agencies.

Miss Seymour also said that Mr. Tice, who was dismissed in May, failed to notify either the Pentagon or NSA of the improper behavior that he is charging.

As a result, she stated that Mr. Tice must first give statements to the Defense Department and NSA inspectors general before he provides any classified information to Congress from the SAPs.

Miss Seymour also said Mr. Tice must first "obtain and follow direction" from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, through the inspectors general on the proper procedures for contacting the congressional oversight committees.

Mr. Tice said he was not part of the classified NSA program disclosed by the New York Times last month that intercepted telephone, e-mail and other communications involving U.S. citizens without a warrant from a special court.

However, he told ABC News on Tuesday that he was a source for the New York Times.

"As far as I'm concerned, as long as I don't say anything that's classified, I'm not worried," he said. "We need to clean up the intelligence community. We've had abuses, and they need to be addressed."

Mr. Tice last month asked to testify to the House and Senate intelligence oversight panels regarding what he called "probable unlawful and unconstitutional acts" that occurred while he was a technical intelligence specialist with NSA and the Defense Intelligence Agency.

He provided no details of the programs.

However, Mr. Tice worked on special access programs related to electronic intelligence gathering while working for the NSA and DIA, where he took part in space systems communications, non-communications signals, electronic warfare, satellite control, telemetry, sensors, and special capability systems.

Revealing A Viper In The Nest (WT)

By Douglas Mackinnon

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Until recently, I believed that the liberal Americans in society and the media who espouse blind hatred for the Bush administration, the unilateral responsibility to defend our nation, our intelligence operatives and even our military, would see the error of their ways should we one day tragically lose an American city and its innocent inhabitants to terrorism.

Today, I wonder if they might not only secretly rejoice at the thought of the "Great Satan" being "justifiably" punished in such a manner, but with their very actions, sow the seeds of such destruction? A stretch? Go to some of these ultra-left Web sites and see the venom they spew at our government. Explain to me why U.S. government employees with Top Secret clearances would leak highly classified information to the media. Explain to me why that media would then selectively print operational details that it knows, beyond a shadow of a doubt, will be harmful to the national security of our nation.

The latest case of government employees betraying their trust and our nation by leaking information to the media being the story that "the Bush administration was running a covert-domestic-spying program." The classified information that was leaked to New York Times reporter James Risen by "numerous" intelligence sources has harmed our nation, our foreign relations, our national security and the welfare of our troops, in real and unimagined ways.

Why do these government employees commit such a high crime as divulging national secrets to the media? Several reasons. The first being that even though it is a very serious crime, there are rarely any consequences. No real price to be paid. It's almost a game. In fact, if you play your leaks right, a left-wing editor up in New York may give you a very handsome book contract for selling out your fellow citizens. That is, of course, assuming said editor is not vaporized first by a nuclear weapon planted by a terrorist that the "covert domestic spying" was trying to capture.

Second, they may do it because they have diluted themselves into believing that such a traitorous action is really to the good of the nation. Just because they got cut from their high school football team doesn't mean that they still can't be heroes. If not heroes to America, then certainly heroes to those who mean to exterminate our nation.

Mostly, they just do it for partisan reasons. They strongly dislike this president, "his" war in Iraq, and have a tremendous inner fear. That fear being that President Bush might actually succeed in what he is trying to accomplish, and expose them as naive fools. So, rather than see that happen, they leak to the media, and sabotage that which they have sworn to serve.

Moving on, what, then, was the motive of the New York Times and reporter James Risen? For the New York Times, one could speculate that with all the left wing U.S. newspapers out there eagerly willing to splash national secrets across their front pages, the New York Times didn't want to get out "Benedict Arnolded" by the competition.

For Mr. Risen, maybe a modern day 30 pieces of silver in the form of a book advance and praise from liberals on the Upper East side, is the answer. If news reports are to be believed, Mr. Risen was very upset that the New York Times sat on the story for a year.

So, in his outrage, what did Mr. Risen do when the New York Times would not publish his potentially devastating story on how the Bush administration might be circumventing the law to protect the American people? Did he walk in front of a stand of news cameras and reveal his "story of the decade?" Did he himself leak it to a rival newspaper in the best interests of America? No.

What Mr. Risen did was take a leave of absence from the New York Times so he could write a book entitled, "State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration." When his book was done and ready for release, Mr. Risen came back to the New York Times and exposed the national secret himself. In doing so he said the New York Times "has performed a great public service by printing it, because this policy is something that the nation should debate." As these leaks and betrayals continue, we need to acknowledge that the viper is in our nest and it's not al Qaeda. It's some of our fellow Americans.

Since September 11, we have all been waiting for the next shoe to drop. Ironically, that is one job we seem to have not outsourced. The shoe may well be American made.

Op-ed: Patriot Act Is Convenient Target (USAT)

By Amitai Etzioni

USA Today, January 12, 2006

A steady stream of revelations, and the ensuing news media reports, have portrayed a president hungry for power, doing whatever is necessary — legal or not — to protect this country. In the wake of such news, some lawmakers in Congress see weakness and an opportunity to gut one of President Bush's vital weapons in the war on terror: the USA Patriot Act.

DOJ_NMG_0009185

Congress should not hold up extending vital sections of the Patriot Act in reaction to these recently revealed power grabs. The president's authorization of spying on Americans by the National Security Agency has nothing to do with the Patriot Act; nor do secret prisons, nor memos allowing torture. Questions over how much power the commander in chief can exercise must be sorted out by Congress and the courts, but the Patriot Act shouldn't be held for ransom.

Despite pleas from the White House to make all of its sections permanent, the Patriot Act has been extended only until Feb. 3. Its viability is, indeed, in jeopardy as lawmakers have found it fashionable to rail against the Patriot Act. (Related: Patriot Act poll results)

In contrast to the recently revealed secret White House initiatives, many of the 161 measures included in the law aren't contested by any major figure on the right, left or center. Even a representative of the American Civil Liberties Union said the group seeks to fix the act, not to kill it. An examination of some of the contested sections demonstrates that the measures involved are hardly out of line:

•Phones. Before the Patriot Act was passed, soon after 9/11, authorities had to obtain a court's permission to tap a phone, but the warrant had to be "particularized" to a given instrument, reflecting the days when people had one phone. Cellphones made this narrow rule obsolete. The Patriot Act changed this requirement to a suspect rather than to one of his instruments. What is wrong with that?

• Libraries. Critics have been outraged by the right of the government to search the computers of public libraries. Actually, the term "library" is not mentioned in the act. The bill authorizes searches of "books, records, papers, documents and other items ... to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities." Critics have singled out libraries because such searches evoke more public outrage than if one would refer to the actual wording of the bill.

• Homes. The "sneak and peek" clause has been particularly vilified. The act grants authorities the right to search a home without notifying the owner for a period of days. But how long is enough? Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., favors seven days; Republicans in the House of Representatives want 180 days. But there has been little discussion of the grubby details in such a search. How long does it take to de-encrypt a PC? To translate messages? And to find any collaborators? Once these matters are examined, it should not be difficult to come up with a compromise on notification.

• Money. The clause that penalizes giving "material support" to terrorists applies only if the donor knew where the funds were headed. If clearer wording is needed to protect those who thought they were giving to a charity, so be it.

We tend to swing wildly in one direction and then in the opposite one. The Senate Church Committee, responding to the abuses such as spying on civil rights groups and public leaders by the FBI under J. Edgar Hoover, tied the agency in knots.

The initial responses to the 9/11 attacks might well have been excessive. As time has passed — without a new attack on the USA — many security measures are being questioned, as they should be. Even so, when it comes to critical components of the act, such as those listed above, minor tweaks — not massive overhauls — would make the Patriot Act work for all Americans.

The same can't be said for the other security measures that the public has recently learned about. Those fully deserve the kind of extensive hearings to which the Patriot Act is being subjected.

Bush Grenade Attacker Gets Life (CNN)

CNN.com, January 12, 2006

(CNN) -- A Republic of Georgia court has sentenced a man to life in prison for attempting to assassinate U.S. President George W. Bush by lobbing a hand grenade towards a podium during a rally in the capital last year, according to Georgia's interior minister.

Vladimir Arutinian of Tbilisi was also found guilty of trying to assassinate Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili, who was standing on the podium with Bush on May 10.

He was also convicted of killing a police officer who tried to apprehend him two months after the incident.

The would-be assassin threw a grenade into a crowd about 20 meters (65 feet) from the stage where Bush had just begun speaking, but the grenade, wrapped in a plaid cloth, failed to detonate, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0009186

Initial reports said the grenade was not live, but authorities later said it was.

Georgia's Interior Minister Vano Meradishvili told CNN he fully expected Arutinian to appeal the ruling because he "enjoys the attention" that he has received.

At one point during the trial, which began just over a month ago, Arutinian appeared in the courtroom with his mouth sewn shut.

Arutinian would not be eligible for parole, and could only be released under a presidential pardon, which was unlikely under Saakashvili, Meradishvili said.

In September, a U.S. federal grand jury indicted Arutinian for the assassination attempt against Bush, and could request his extradition if he is released in the future.

Meradishvili said the government could not have apprehended Arutinian, who lived a reclusive life, without the help of two citizens, who would share an $80,000 reward.

The investigation involved Georgia investigators, the Justice Department, FBI and U.S. Secret Service.

Shortly after Arutinian's capture, the Justice Department and Secret Service issued a joint statement praising the government of Georgia for its "extraordinary cooperation" in the case.

Drug, Terror Rings Find New Ways To Launder Money (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Drug traffickers and suspected terrorists are using prepaid ATM cards and Internet-based payment systems to help launder billions of dollars each year, the Treasury Department reported Wednesday in what it called the first government-wide analysis of money laundering in the USA.

The analysis described security weaknesses throughout the U.S. financial system that enable criminals to hide illicitly obtained money, and to sneak it out of the country. The report, which included contributions from 16 federal agencies, will be used to help officials devise a national strategy to fight money laundering, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said.

Smuggling cash in bulk remains criminals' favorite method for moving money out of the USA, said Marcy Foreman, investigations director for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. The report also detailed a dozen other money-laundering methods used by criminals, including what it called the increasingly prevalent use of prepaid cash cards that can be purchased anonymously at retail and check-cashing stores across the nation.

Such cards are designed to make things easier for students, immigrants and others among the estimated 75 million people in the USA who do not have bank accounts, the report said. Those buying the cards can have a certain value recorded on them, and then the cardholders can use the cards to withdraw the money from automated teller machines around the world.

However, the cards also allow foreign drug traffickers to move money to their home countries without having to sneak bundles of cash past Customs agents — or use bank accounts that leave paper trails, the report said. It noted that companies that issue cash cards outside the USA do not have to comply with U.S. anti-money-laundering laws, but that such cards can be used at ATMs in this country.

“The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is vast, and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization,” the report said.

Levey said it's unclear how much money in the USA is made from criminal enterprises. The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy estimates sales of illicit drugs in the USA produce $65 billion a year for traffickers. The United Nations estimates illicit drug revenue in the USA, Canada and Mexico to be $142 billion a year.

“The key to ending drug trafficking is to wipe out the money side,” Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen Tandy said. The DEA seized $2 billion in 2005, up from $500 million in 2003, she said.

Recent arrests by U.S. agents reflect the complexity of some schemes. Last week, Mohummed Islam Uddin, 39, of Hamtramck, Mich., pleaded guilty to running an unlicensed money-services business that sent $3 million to Bangladesh with little or no documentation of the transactions.

DOJ_NMG_0009187

Uddin used U.S. currency from local people who wanted money transferred to Bangladesh. He then would buy prepaid phone cards, an ICE report said. The cards then were resold in Bangladesh for local currency by a merchant who distributed the proceeds to the intended recipients of the money transfers, ICE said. The scheme allowed Uddin to avoid paying transfer fees and to convert U.S. dollars to Bangladeshi currency.

US Vows Diligence On New Money Laundering Threats (REU)

By Laura MacInnis

Reuters, January 11, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Internet banking, online payment systems and stored value cards not requiring identification give criminals new opportunities to filter money through the United States, U.S. regulators said on Wednesday.

Representatives of the Treasury Department, Federal Reserve, Justice Department and other government enforcement agencies urged in a Money Laundering Threat Assessment report more cooperation to squeeze money launderers and narrow potential avenues for tainted funds.

"The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is undeniably vast and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization and the advent of new financial services," they said in the report, a precursor to the government's annual Anti-Money Laundering Strategy.

The regulators and law enforcement officials said it was "currently not possible" to accurately estimate the total amount of money laundering in the United States, or how much is being cut off by government enforcement.

Citing a need for a common definition of what constitutes money laundering, regulators said they needed more cooperation to patch vulnerabilities from money orders, stored value cards, check cashing, electronic payments, remittances and other financial transfers.

"Moving away from face-to-face customer interaction, particularly for (bank) account openings, challenges the traditional process of customer due diligence," they said.

The report concluded stored value cards or gift cards were compact, potentially anonymous alternatives for those seeking to smuggle physical cash linked to crime. Cards and other tools to facilitate migrant remittances could also be misused, regulators added.

"These programs can also be used to launder money if effective anti-money laundering policies, procedures and controls are not in place," the report said.

Federal Reserve Governor Susan Bies said the 72-page Money Laundering Threat Assessment "begins to give banks a better idea of what types of threats are out there."

Others said it was difficult for banks to detect fraudulent or laundered funds because money increasingly enters the U.S. financial system in indirect ways.

Stuart Levey, treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said agencies like the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Drug Enforcement Administration and Postal Inspection Service were working with the Treasury and Federal Reserve to respond to new vulnerabilities.

"We now have to adjust our actions on all levels ... to stay one step ahead," Levey said.

He said it was "quite difficult to predict" when the 2005 annual strategy report would be completed but stressed inter-agency cooperation would occur before the study's official release.

Threat Assessment Calls Money Laundering A 'Massive' Challenge (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, January 11, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11, 2006 — - Money laundering remains a "massive and evolving challenge" for investigators, according to the federal government's first-ever threat assessment of the problem.

Even getting a handle on the size of the money laundering threat and the success of efforts to stop it has been difficult, the report found.

"It is currently not possible, for example, to quantify with accuracy the total money laundering activity being apprehended by the government," it said.

Problems with data, incompatible computer systems and even differing definitions of "money laundering" have hampered some efforts to combat the crime. The assessment is intended to help law enforcement and government regulators grapple with the issue.

"Before you can effectively treat a problem, you must first have an accurate diagnosis," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

While law enforcement and investigators have made considerable progress in recent years, money laundering is still a vast enterprise made easier by computerized banking and global transactions. With a few clicks of a mouse a drug dealer can wash his proceeds from New York City through the Dominican Republic to an offshore account unknown to investigators. Federal Reserve Governor Susan Bies said the assessment "gives banks a better idea of what types of threats are out there."

Other recent trends and new technology allow criminals to exploit loopholes, such as store gift cards, which officials call "stored value" cards.

"The volume of dirty money circulating through the United States is undeniably vast and criminals are enjoying new advantages with globalization and the advent of new financial services such as stored value cards and online payment systems."

Although law enforcement agencies are concerned about new technologies, traditional methods of money laundering though money service business (MSBs) -- such as money orders, check cashing business and currency exchange remain most prevalent.

Most Laundering Not Linked to Terrorism

The assessment, which was prepared by 16 different government agencies, found that most suspicious transactions are flowing to criminal interests and enterprises in South and Central America, Russia and Caribbean Rim nations. While a great deal of focus has been given to terrorist financing in recent years, the report shows that only 1 percent of Suspicious Activity Reports filed by financial institutions involved potential terrorist financing. Despite this small number, law enforcement officials remain greatly concerned about the nexus of criminal organized crime groups engaged in money laundering and the possibility of financing terrorist operations.

The 9/11 plot cost the al Qaeda network approximately $400,000 of which approximately $300,000 passed through the hijackers' established bank accounts in the United States. Although they left a paper trail in the United States, Germany and the United Arab Emirates, the hijackers moved their funds in a routine way which avoided the scrutiny of law enforcement and banking officials.

Since the 9/11 attacks the Treasury Department and FBI have worked with foreign countries to strengthen global anti-money laundering laws and regulations. The Treasury Department, Justice Department and the Department of Homeland Security also work together in the Financial Action Task Force to monitor global money laundering. The controversial Patriot Act also contains several provisions requiring increased reporting for banking and financial institutions.

After the 9/11 attacks, much attention was focused on regulating informal money transfers, known as the hawala system, originally developed in India. Some challenges remain in detailing and understanding the scope of their use. "It is virtually impossible to ascertain the full extent of [Informal Value Transfer Systems] activity in the United States due to the opacity of the sector and the absence of registration."

Bulk-cash smuggling is a common money laundering technique which may be on the rise because of some anti-money laundering enforcement efforts.

The report cautioned that more data needs to be collected and that electronic and online banking and the decline in paper checks make it more difficult to track financial transactions. Also the working group has found that money remitters and money orders are too voluminous to accurately track down. The sheer scale of Western Union providers around the globe totals 196,000 agents in over 190 countries, for example, allowing money launderers to move their money virtually anywhere.

Swiss Investigate Leak To Paper On C.I.A. Prisons (NYT)

By Doreen Carvajal, International Herald Tribune

DOJ_NMG_0009189

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

PARIS, Jan. 11 - Switzerland is conducting criminal investigations to track down the source of a leak to the Zurich-based newspaper SonntagsBlick of what it reported was a secret document citing clandestine C.I.A. prisons in Eastern Europe.

The Sunday weekly published what it reported was a summary of a fax in November from Egypt's Foreign Ministry to its London embassy that said the United States had held 23 Iraqi and Afghan prisoners at a base in Romania. It also referred to similar detention centers in Bulgaria, Kosovo, Macedonia and Ukraine.

"The Egyptians have sources confirming the presence of secret American prisons," said the document, dated Nov. 15 and written in French to summarize the contents of the fax.

"According to the embassy's own sources, 23 Iraqis and Afghans were interrogated at the Mikhail Kogalniceau base at Constanza, on the Black Sea."

The leaked fax, which the newspaper said was sent by satellite and intercepted by the Swiss Strategic Intelligence Service, was signed by Egypt's foreign minister, Ahmed Aboul Gheit, the report said.

Christoph Grenacher, the newspaper's editor in chief, said that before the article was published, newspaper officials met with high-ranking Swiss government officials, who urged the paper to withhold the information. "We concluded that the discussion about so-called secret prisons is much more important than the interests of the secret service in Switzerland," he said.

During those discussions, he said, no one contested the authenticity of the document. Egypt has not commented on the report, but it quickly reignited a political fury in Europe that began in the fall with news reports that said there were C.I.A. interrogation centers in Europe and that there had been secret flights through European countries transferring terrorism suspects for questioning.

After the article was published on Sunday, Romania and Ukraine issued denials, and the Swiss criminal investigations were opened. Some European lawmakers seized on the information as evidence of dissembling by European Union members. "This is a piece of real evidence to back up the gut instinct many of us have that the denials of complicity we are hearing from E.U. member and candidate states cannot be relied upon," Sarah Ludford, a Liberal Democratic member of the British Parliament, said in a statement.

The Swiss Army's chief prosecutor opened an investigation of Mr. Grenacher and two of his reporters to determine whether military secrets were exposed and to find the source of the leaks. The Swiss attorney general's office is also investigating the issue, adding another layer to its existing investigation of whether there were C.I.A. flights in Swiss airspace.

Germany and Denmark are also examining accusations that the agency used their airspace to transport terrorism suspects.

The United States has acknowledged flights but not the existence of prisons. A C.I.A. spokeswoman declined to comment on the report in the newspaper.

Conceivably, the journalists could face five years in prison for revealing military secrets, although no one prosecuted under the law has ever served any prison time, the authorities said.

Martin Immenhauser, a spokesman for the military prosecutor, said of the document: "Nobody has told us that it's not authentic. I think you can say that it's 99 percent certain that it's authentic."

Guantanamo Prisoner Rejects US War Tribunal (REU-Y2)

By Jane Sutton

Reuters, January 12, 2006

A Yemeni accused of being a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden went before a U.S. military tribunal on Wednesday and said he would boycott his war crimes trial because he did not recognize the tribunal's authority.

Yemeni Ali Hamza al Bahlul, who has acknowledged that he is "from al Qaeda," is one of only nine Guantanamo prisoners charged with crimes.

A separate tribunal also began on Wednesday for Canadian Omar Khadr, who is accused of killing a U.S. Army medic in Afghanistan when he was still 15.

DOJ_NMG_0009190

Most of the 500 or so detainees at Guantanamo have been held without charges for years. The hearings began on the fourth anniversary of the opening of Guantanamo as a prison for terrorism suspects.

Bahlul is accused of conspiring to commit war crimes by acting as a bin Laden bodyguard and making recruiting videos for al Qaeda. He was escorted by two officers into a courtroom at the remote U.S. military base in Cuba for pretrial arguments and said he did not recognize the tribunal's authority.

"There's going to be a tribunal of God on the day of judgment," Bahlul told the court. "Do what you have to do and rule however you have to rule ... God will rule based on justice." His comments were made in Arabic.

Bahlul ended his participation in the proceedings with one word in English "Boycott," and the presiding officer, Army Col. Peter Brownback, set his trial tentatively for May 15.

The tribunal for Canadian prisoner Khadr, accused of killing the medic with a grenade during a firefight at a suspected al Qaeda compound in Afghanistan, was less colorful.

Looking burly and grown up, and sporting a crew cut and full beard, the now 19-year-old quietly answered "Yes sir," when the presiding officer, Marine Col. Robert Chester, asked him if he understood his rights.

Dressed in a blue and red T-shirt and white tennis shoes, Khadr fidgeted and stroked his beard during the hearing and asked that a Canadian lawyer be added to his defense team.

Through his military lawyer, Capt. John Merriam, he also asked that a more experienced military attorney be appointed to represent him. The hearing was the first time that Merriam has represented anybody in a courtroom.

The tribunal called a recess while it considered the issue of representation.

The Pentagon is proceeding with the two cases even though courts have halted the trials of other Guantanamo prisoners pending a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on whether President George W. Bush had authority to establish the tribunals after the September 11 attacks. The high court will hear arguments in the case in March.

NO SHACKLES

Bahlul, with a short beard and mustache and wearing khaki pants and a dark blue shirt, was not shackled or handcuffed.

He read a list of nine reasons why he refused to be represented by a military lawyer or to participate further, including the treatment of Palestinians by U.S. ally Israel -- "your allies, the Jews," he said -- and because his native Yemen had been accused in the bombing of the USS Cole.

Bahlul also said Guantanamo prisoners had been tortured and that the Britons there were not subject to military tribunals. He objected to the potential use of secret evidence and to the U.S. characterization of prisoners as illegal belligerents.

"We are prisoners of war and legal combatants based on our religion and our religious law," he said. "We do not care about anything that you call us."

Brownback rejected Bahlul's request to represent himself and Bahlul refused to meet with Army Reserve Maj. Tom Fleener, the lawyer appointed by the military to defend him.

Smiling and thanking Brownback, he held up a sheet of paper scrawled with the word 'Boycott' in English and Arabic. He removed translation earphones, and refused to enter a plea or to stand when the charges were read.

Bahlul and Khadr could face life in prison if convicted.

The United States has faced criticism at home and abroad over Guantanamo since the first group arrived from Afghanistan, shackled and wearing black-out goggles and surgical masks, on January 11, 2002.

Fleener has called the tribunals a sham and said it is an ethical violation for him to represent a prisoner who has rejected his services. Brownback ordered him to defend Bahlul anyway.

Human rights groups have criticized rules allowing the use of evidence that may have been obtained through torture.

Chief prosecutor Col. Moe Davis said the tribunals were designed to provide a fair trial while addressing an enemy whose actions had not been anticipated under existing law.

Terror Suspect Upsets Plan To Resume Trials In Cuba (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

GUANTÁNAMO BAY, Cuba, Jan. 11 - The military commissions prosecuting suspected members of Al Qaeda reconvened on Wednesday for the first time in more than a year and were quickly thrown into disarray when a defendant declared he was boycotting the proceedings.

Invited by the judge to address the court, the defendant, Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al-Bahlul, delivered a 10-minute address in which he praised Allah and denounced "your allies, the Jews." Complaining that he had not been permitted to choose a lawyer from Yemen, his home country, Mr. Bahlul said he had no expectation of justice from a system created by his American enemies.

"I am telling the judge do what you have to do," he said in Arabic through a translator. "Rule what you have to rule. This life will go on and end at some point. God will rule based on justice, and those who call on other than God are not calling on anything."

Smiling, he then held up a piece of paper with the word "boycott" written in stylized Arabic script, then repeated the word three times in English. For the rest of the two-hour hearing he was silent, even when asked by the presiding officer, Col. Peter Brownback III, to enter a plea.

Prosecutors say that Mr. Bahlul, one of the first prisoners to arrive at the Guantánamo center when it was set up in 2002, attended a Qaeda training camp and was a bodyguard to Osama bin Laden in 2001. Earlier, he had produced recruitment videos for Al Qaeda, including a tape on the 1998 attack on the destroyer Cole. If convicted, he faces a life sentence.

Even as Mr. Bahlul has acknowledged his connections to Al Qaeda, he has shown a talent for courtroom theatrics that have at times flummoxed the commissioners.

Little has gone smoothly for the military commissions, which the Bush administration created to try Guantánamo prisoners and which have suffered setbacks because of legal challenges, including a review from the Supreme Court.

Mr. Bahlul and Omar Khadr, a second defendant who appeared later in the day, are among nine detainees at Guantánamo who are facing war crimes charges under the military commission system.

More than 500 detainees remain in the center, which Pentagon officials once characterized as holding the most hardened terrorists captured in Afghanistan.

Of the remaining prisoners, 50 to 75 are likely to be charged, said a spokeswoman, Maj. Jane Boomer.

Mr. Bahlul demanded more than a year ago to choose a Yemeni lawyer, a request that was refused. Afterward, he said he wanted to represent himself, an idea that led commission authorities to suspend the proceedings while they researched the question. On Wednesday, Colonel Brownback ruled against him, saying President Bush's order establishing the commissions required defendants to have military counsel.

The ruling did not settle the question. Maj. Tom Fleener, Mr. Bahlul's appointed military lawyer, immediately moved to withdraw as defense counsel, a request that Colonel Brownback rejected.

Defendants in most courts, including those of the United States, are entitled to represent themselves as long as they are deemed competent, Major Fleener argued.

Requiring him to represent a client who did not want his help was an effort "to add some air of legitimacy to an otherwise wholly illegitimate process," he said.

It also could violate bar association rules in Iowa and Wyoming where Mr. Fleener, a reservist, is licensed to practice, he said.

Mr. Khadr, who was 15 when he was captured in Afghanistan and also faces life imprisonment, is accused of throwing a grenade that fatally wounded an American soldier. He declined to enter a plea on Wednesday.

Mr. Khadr's civilian defense lawyers say they can find no other war crimes prosecutions for war crimes involving a juvenile.

Prosecutors said juveniles accused of murder in the United States could be tried as adults in many states.

On Wednesday, Mr. Khadr's defense team moved to replace his appointed military lawyer, Capt. John Merriam, of the Army captain. His civilian lawyer, Muneer I. Ahmad, who is a law professor at American University, said Captain Merriam had never defended a case at trial before.

Speaking to reporters this week, Col. Morris Davis, the commission's chief prosecutor, defended the use of military commissions to try accused terrorists, saying existing law did not provide guidance for prosecuting members of terror groups.

Yemeni Prisoner At Gitmo To 'Boycott' Tribunal (WT/REU)

By Jane Sutton

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

U.S. NAVAL BASE GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- A Yemeni accused of being a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden went before a U.S. military tribunal yesterday and said he would boycott his war-crimes trial because he did not recognize the tribunal's authority.

Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al Bahlul, who has acknowledged that he is "from al Qaeda," is one of nine Guantanamo prisoners charged with crimes. Most of the 500 or so detainees have been held without charges for years in the U.S.-led war on terrorism. The hearing began on the fourth anniversary of the camp's opening.

Al Bahlul is accused of conspiring to commit war crimes by acting as a bin Laden bodyguard and making recruiting videos for al Qaeda.

"There's going to be a tribunal of God on the day of judgment," al Bahlul told the court in Arabic. "Do what you have to do and rule however you have to rule. ... God will rule based on justice."

Al Bahlul ended his participation in the proceedings with one word in English: "boycott." Presiding officer Army Col. Peter Brownback set the suspect's trial tentatively for May 15.

A separate tribunal of U.S. military officers was set to begin in the murder case against Canadian prisoner Omar Khadr, 19. He is accused of killing an Army medic with a grenade during a firefight at a suspected al Qaeda compound in Afghanistan when he was 15.

The Pentagon is proceeding with the two cases even though U.S. courts have halted the trials of other Guantanamo prisoners pending a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on whether President Bush had authority to establish the tribunals. The high court will hear arguments in the case in March.

Al Bahlul, who has a short beard and mustache and wore khaki pants and a dark blue shirt, was not shackled or handcuffed in the courtroom.

Earlier in the hearing, he read a list of nine reasons why he refused to be represented by a military lawyer or to participate further, including the treatment of Palestinians by U.S. ally Israel -- "your allies, the Jews," he said -- and because his native country had been accused in the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole.

Al Bahlul said Guantanamo prisoners had been tortured and that the Britons who had been held there were not subject to military tribunals. He objected to the potential use of secret evidence and to the U.S. characterization of the prisoners as illegal belligerents.

"We are prisoners of war and legal combatants based on our religion and our religious law," he said. "We do not care about anything that you call us."

Col. Brownback rejected al Bahlul's request to represent himself, and the prisoner refused to meet with Army Reserve Maj. Tom Fleener, the lawyer appointed by the military to defend him.

Smiling and thanking Col. Brownback, al Bahlul held up a sheet of paper scrawled with the word "boycott" in English and Arabic. He removed the earphones that had enabled him to listen to an Arabic translation of the proceedings and refused to enter a plea or to stand when the charges were read.

Al Bahlul and Khadr face life in prison if convicted by the tribunals, which were authorized by Mr. Bush to try foreign terrorism suspects after the September 11 attacks.

Maj. Fleener has called the tribunals a sham and said he thinks it is an ethical violation for him to represent a prisoner who has rejected his services. Col. Brownback ordered him to defend al Bahlul anyway.

The United States has faced criticism at home and abroad for its treatment of prisoners at Guantanamo since the first group arrived from Afghanistan, shackled and wearing black-out goggles and surgical masks, on Jan. 11, 2002.

Human rights groups have criticized rules allowing the use of evidence that may have been obtained through torture.

Chief prosecutor Col. Moe Davis said the tribunal system was designed to provide a fair trial while addressing an enemy whose actions had not been anticipated under existing law.

Guantanamo Detainee Boycotts U.S. Hearing (AP)

By Miranda Leitsinger, Associated Press Writer

The Associated Press, January 12, 2006

A Yemeni man accused of being Osama bin Laden's former bodyguard told a U.S. military tribunal Wednesday he regarded Americans as enemies and announced he would boycott the hearings, which proceeded anyway.

Led into the courtroom by two U.S. soldiers, Guantanamo detention center detainee Ali Hamza Ahmad Sulayman al Bahlul announced he was boycotting the proceedings, saying he could not appoint his own lawyer, that secret evidence can be withheld from detainees and that the United States was "an enemy to the nation of Muslims."

"I am boycotting all sessions, even if I'm forced to be present," said a calm al Bahlul, who is accused of belonging to al-Qaida, before removing his translation headphones.

Al Bahlul, who wasn't handcuffed, held up a sign written in Arabic that read "boycott." He signed the paper, dated it and presented it to Brownback. He later removed his translating headphones.

Army Col. Peter E. Brownback, the presiding officer, denied al Bahlul's request to represent himself and set a May 15 trial date. Al Bahlul is charged with conspiring with al-Qaida members to commit war crimes, including attacking civilians, and faces other conspiracy charges.

Prosecutors charge that al Bahlul was ordered by bin Laden, the leader of the al-Qaida terrorist network, to create a video glorifying the group's October 2000 attack on the destroyer USS Cole in Yemen that killed 17 American sailors.

Al Bahlul worked in the al-Qaida media office from late 1999 through December 2001 and created instructional and motivational recruiting video tapes for the organization, prosecutors alleged.

On Sept. 11, bin Laden asked al Bahlul to set up a satellite connection so al-Qaida members could see news reports, but he couldn't due to the mountainous terrain, U.S prosecutors said.

In 2001, al Bahlul also allegedly served as a bodyguard to bin Laden, wearing an explosives-laden belt when traveling with the al-Qaida leader to protect him.

About 500 detainees are being held at Guantanamo, some as long as four years.

Omar Ahmed Khadr, a 19-year-old Canadian charged with murder, attempted murder, aiding the enemy and conspiracy, went before the commission later Wednesday, the fourth anniversary of the opening of the Guantanamo prison.

Khadr, who wore a red, white and blue sweat shirt, was soft-spoken, replying "yes, sir" or "no" to presiding officer Marine Col. Robert S. Chester's questions. Chester didn't set a trial date, adjourning the hearing until Thursday.

Toronto-born Khadr, the son of an alleged al-Qaida financial leader, Ahmad Said al-Khadr, was captured on July 27, 2002, near Khost, an al-Qaida hotbed in eastern Afghanistan. He was caught after being badly wounded in a firefight in which an American soldier was killed and four others were wounded.

He was charged with murder, attempted murder, aiding the enemy and conspiracy for allegedly tossing a grenade that killed a U.S. Special Forces medic while fighting with the Taliban in Afghanistan, planting mines to target U.S. convoys, and gathering surveillance.

Muslim Cleric Accused In London Court Of Inciting Hatred Of Jews (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

LONDON, Jan. 11 - In a closely watched trial, a prominent British Muslim cleric was accused Wednesday of inciting hatred against Jews, praising Hitler and voicing support for suicide bombings.

The cleric, Abu Hamza al-Masri, is accused of violating various British laws in lectures and sermons recorded on videotape and audio cassettes in which he was reported to have said he wanted to see the establishment of an Islamic caliphate in the White House.

Mr. Masri, 47, has denied all 15 charges against him, which include inciting racial hatred and possessing a 10-volume "Encyclopedia of the Afghani Jihad," which prosecutors call "a manual for terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0009194

Mr. Masri, also known as Mustafa Kamel Mustafa, is an Egyptian-born preacher who acquired British citizenship by marriage. He is the former imam of the Finsbury Park mosque in North London. He was arrested in May 2004, and is wanted in the United States on other terrorism charges.

Mr. Masri is the best-known British Islamic leader to come to trial since the attacks in the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, set off the international effort to curb terrorism.

David Perry, a prosecutor, said in court that Mr. Masri had "encouraged his listeners, whether they were an audience at a private meeting or a congregation at the mosque, to believe it was part of a religious duty to fight in the cause of Allah, God, and as part of the religious duty to fight in the cause of Allah, it was part of the religious duty to kill."

"The people they were being encouraged to kill, put shortly, were nonbelievers," Mr. Perry said.

The accusations reflected what Mr. Perry depicted as the "intolerance, bigotry and hatred" that he said Mr. Masri had sought to instill among some British Muslims.

The hearings are unfolding under strict British legal restrictions intended to ensure that Mr. Masri's trial is fair and is not influenced by the way he was characterized in British newspapers before his arrest. If convicted, he could face life in prison.

"You would think he would be preaching tolerance, mutual coexistence and responsibility regardless of religion or creed," Mr. Perry said. "In fact he preached the opposite: intolerance, bigotry and hatred, in particular against Jews as a racial group and as a religious body.

"In the course of one lecture, he accused the Jews of being blasphemous, traitors and dirty. This, because of the treachery, because of their blasphemy and filth, was why Hitler was sent into the world."

Mr. Masri told his followers that "Hitler was sent to torture and humiliate the Jews, and every last Jew is going to be buried in Palestine," Mr. Perry added, quoting from what he said was a sermon in October 2000.

In other videotapes, Mr. Masri said it was "permitted to kill women and children if they are fighting Muslims, or if there is no way to stop them," Mr. Perry said.

Mr. Masri was also asked for his views on suicide bombings. "It is not called suicide, this is called martyrdom," Mr. Masri was quoted as saying. According to Mr. Perry's account, Mr. Masri added, "If we do not use terrorism or torture, what are we going to use?"

Mr. Masri frequently evoked the caliphate, Mr. Perry said, referring to Islamic spiritual and temporal leadership based on descendants of the Prophet Muhammad. The caliphate was abolished in 1924 by Ataturk, the founder of modern Turkey.

"He is working for a worldwide caliphate, a world dominated by a caliph sitting, he says in one of his lectures, in the White House," Mr. Perry said.

Radical Cleric Preached Hatred And Murder, Prosecution Argues (LAT)

By Janet Stobart, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

LONDON — A prosecutor Wednesday accused Abu Hamza al Masri, an Egyptian-born Muslim cleric, of preaching hatred, telling followers that the world should be run by a Muslim caliph "sitting in the White House" and that it was legitimate to kill foes of Islamic law.

The high-profile trial began at London's Old Bailey criminal court a day after jury selection, with Masri facing 15 counts of conspiracy to murder and using threatening, abusive and insulting language and behavior in incitement to religious hatred. He also is charged with possessing material and documents relating to terrorist activities. The trial is expected to last four weeks.

Masri, a large man who says he lost an eye and both hands fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan, became well known as the radical preacher at North London's Finsbury Park Mosque. The mosque was considered a crossroads for terrorists such as Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber, before and after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The galleries at the Old Bailey were packed as prosecutor David Perry told jurors that instead of preaching tolerance, Masri preached hatred, particularly against Jews. Tapes seized after Masri's arrest in 2004 reveal the defendant vilifying Jews as "blasphemous, traitors and dirty. It's because of their filth that Hitler was sent into the world to torture and humiliate Jews," Perry related to the court.

DOJ_NMG_0009195

The court, presided over by Judge Anthony Hughes, heard that when Masri was arrested, police found 2,700 audiotapes and 570 videotapes at his West London home and another London address. The material amounted to a blueprint for how life should be lived according to Masri, Perry said.

The overriding theme, he said, was the "obligation to jihad," which justified, according to Masri, killing nonbelievers and enemies of Islam. Those enemies included Western nations and Arab states, such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, that are aligned with the West, the prosecution said.

Perry said Masri also supported suicide bombers. "As far as the defendant is concerned, you don't call it suicide, you call it martyrdom," Perry said. He quoted the cleric as saying, "If we don't use terrorism and torture, what are we going to use?"

Masri, who has denied the charges, sat in the dock in the courtroom wearing a pale blue shirt over matching pants, surrounded by four guards. He seemed to follow the proceedings attentively, occasionally bowing his head or consulting with a female assistant. As a preacher, he normally wore a prosthetic hook, but he has not been allowed to have it during his incarceration.

The tapes allegedly chronicle sermons and talks Masri made from 1997 to 2000, some including references to terrorist attacks, including the suicide bombing of the U.S. Navy destroyer Cole off the coast of Yemen in October 2000, and the slaying of 58 tourists in Luxor, Egypt, in November 1997.

The prosecution also described the "Encyclopedia of Afghani Jihad," an alleged terrorist manual seized from Masri, which included chapters on the construction of weapons, intelligence gathering, combat and, in Perry's words, "all you need to know to make homemade bombs or explosives."

The prosecutor argued that the proceeding should not be seen as a trial against Islam, "one of the great monotheistic religions," or an infringement of free speech. "Tolerance does not extend to racial hatred and encouragement of murder," Perry said.

The United States indicted Masri in 2004 on 11 terrorism-related charges, including his alleged role in a plot to set up a terrorist training camp in rural Oregon in 1999. It is seeking his extradition.

PATRIOT ACT:

U.S. Attorney Touts Usefulness Of Patriot Act To Law Enforcement (KATV-TV)

KATV-TV, ABC 7, Little Rock, AR, January 12, 2006

Little Rock - The U.S. Attorney's office is using a conference on terrorism to tout the usefulness of the Patriot Act, set to expire on February 3. Supporters of the act say it's essential to protect the American public against the war on terror. Opponents say it's a violation of civil liberties. It's a heavily debated issue about which both sides have strong opinions.

Cummins says many of the allegations made against the act are simply not true..

(Bud Cummins, U.S. Attorney) "There's nothing ground-breaking about the provisions of the Patriot Act. It's just trying to afford the investigators in these very important terrorism investigations to have the same type of tools we use against drug dealers."

Cummins says provisions in the Patriot Act lower the wall between criminal and intelligence investigators to share information and allow intelligence investigators to use similar techniques in criminal investigations. The act also updates laws for electronic surveillance.

(Cummins) "Terrorists don't use rotary telephones. They use cell phones, pagers, e-mail, text messaging, Web sites, we need to be able to keep up with that."

(Sklar) "We have plenty of law enforcement officers and investigative tools and what they're doing is investigating crimes and potential crimes and we have a criminal justice system that does that."

The ACLU says the Patriot Act is an abuse of power for many reasons.

(Sklar) "The reason that congress has voted to hold off on the renewing the patriot act. They have concerns as all Americans do about the kind of abuse of power the Patriot Act allows."

DOJ_NMG_0009196

(Sklar) "There are sneak and peak searches which means they can come in and search your home. They've gotten a warrant but they don't have to tell you they've been there.."

Sklar says provisions in the Patriot Act, particularly those allowing investigators in intelligence investigations to use techniques similar to criminal investigations, oversteps it's bounds.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

F.B.I. Tries To Dispel Surveillance Concerns (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - F.B.I. officials met with Muslim and Arab-American leaders on Wednesday in an effort to dispel anger and concern over the bureau's secret monitoring of radiation levels at Muslim sites around the country.

John Pistole, deputy director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and John Miller, the bureau's assistant director of public affairs, tried to reassure those at the session that the surveillance of mosques and Muslim businesses and homes had been based on intelligence leads.

"There was intelligence that talked about the desire to use a dirty bomb in the U.S.; there were statements from bin Laden indicating that he had those materials and that there were cells in the U.S. trained to blend into Muslim communities," Mr. Miller said after the meeting. "We explained how we work with intelligence and that we did what we did based on the patterns of Al Qaeda, not because of the patterns or activities of any mosque or Muslim neighborhood."

F.B.I. officials struck a conciliatory tone, several attendees said, and acknowledged that the bureau could have responded to their concerns more quickly. But Mr. Pistole offered few details on the monitoring, they said, and he emphasized that the program, which began after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and lasted through 2003, remained classified.

Leaders of Muslim and Arab-American groups requested the meeting after the program was disclosed last month by U.S. News & World Report. The nationwide surveillance program included air monitoring of more than 100 private properties in the Washington area.

The controversy over the surveillance program comes after the F.B.I. cancelled financing for a bureau-wide training initiative intended to improve outreach to Muslim and Arab Americans. Group leaders say the news about the radiation monitoring makes such a program all the more crucial.

"This current situation reinforces the notion that our community is viewed more as suspects rather than partners," said one attendee, Salam Al-Marayati, executive director of the Muslim Public Affairs Council, a national advocacy organization. "Formalizing outreach sets a standard for better educating agents on the best means of acquiring information, and it demonstrates that partnership is the best way of protecting our country from terrorist attacks."

In October, the F.B.I. rescinded a $1 million pledge toward a training program to institutionalize bridge-building between its field offices and Muslim groups around the country. The program, which would have cost $6 million over three years, was cancelled, in part, because of budget constraints, Mr. Miller said.

In cities with sizable numbers of Muslims and Arab-Americans, F.B.I. field offices have developed relationships with mosques, advocacy groups and community leaders. In Washington and Los Angeles, for instance, special agents meet regularly with groups. Partnerships in Detroit formed the basis for the training program that bureau officials first embraced, then rejected.

Agents engaged in the outreach program said it helped them gain cultural awareness as well as practical insights into sorting good leads from bad. Muslim, Arab and Sikh leaders said that, as a result of the outreach, they received better F.B.I. protection from hate crimes.

But national initiatives like special security registration of citizens of Arab and Muslim countries, sweeps by federal agents in Muslim and Arab neighborhoods and the freezing of Islamic charities' assets have generated complaints.

The radiation surveillance, conducted with the Department of Energy, is another irritant. Disclosures of such programs, attendees at Wednesday's meeting said, make it more difficult to convince people that forming ties with government agencies is productive.

DOJ_NMG_0009197

"When things like this happen, people come to us and ask, 'What are you doing talking to the F.B.I.?' " said Imam Mohamed Magid, leader of the All Dulles Area Muslim Society, a mosque in Northern Virginia commonly called the Adams Center, which serves 5,000 families.

Imam Magid, who also attended the meeting on Wednesday, has forged ties with agents in the F.B.I.'s Washington field office and organized public forums between them and community members. Now, he said, some of those in the community have questioned whether those sessions were ruses for the agency to conduct secret monitoring.

Several F.B.I. agents have also supported bringing uniformity to bureau practices.

"We're consistent in how we deal with white-collar crime and every other type of crime," said Michael E. Rolince, who was in charge of counterterrorism for the Washington office before he retired in October. "When it comes to dealing with the Arab-American and Muslim community, we have no consistent program. We have 56 different approaches in our 56 different field offices."

The canceled training program, called the Partnering for Prevention and Community Safety Initiative, was developed at Northeastern University in Boston.

"It's not 'Kumbaya, let's sit and talk about how nice things are,' " said Deborah A. Ramirez, a Northeastern law professor and former racial-profiling consultant to the Justice Department, who developed the program. "It's a structured process to learn what exists, what works and what we all need to be doing."

Mr. Miller said the bureau would support the training program if outside financing was secured.

"Now that we've let some of the pressure out of this pressure cooker," he said, "we have to address how we go about building better relationships so that when the next crisis comes, we can just call people and talk about it up front."

Monitoring Of Muslims Addressed (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

Arab-American and Muslim leaders met yesterday with FBI officials to discuss concerns that Muslim religious places, homes and other buildings were monitored for abnormal radiation levels without search warrants or court orders.

The meeting with FBI Deputy Director John S. Pistole, coordinated by the Los Angeles-based Muslim Public Affairs Council (MPAC), was held in the wake of press reports that the monitoring began after the September 11, 2001, attacks and lasted through 2003. The FBI has denied that it singled out private Muslim sites for the radioactivity monitoring.

Two Muslim organizations have since filed Freedom of Information Act requests to learn which sites were monitored.

"Today's meeting, while not resolving all underlying issues of concern, offered an opportunity to improve lines of communication and to increase mutual cooperation on issues related to national security and the prevention of hate crimes," said Nihad Awad, executive director of the Washington-based Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), who participated in the meeting.

Mr. Awad said any security measures that create the perception that the Muslim community in the U.S. is targeted can create difficulties between Muslims and law-enforcement authorities, adding that "such perceptions can also lead to increased Islamophobia and even anti-Muslim hate crimes."

Al Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden has threatened renewed attacks on U.S. targets, and al Qaeda suspect Jose Padilla was arrested in May 2002 by the FBI on suspicion of a scheme to detonate a radiological 'dirty bomb' in this country.

The FBI has acknowledged that it tested for nuclear radiation at more than 100 Muslim sites in the Washington area, but has denied engaging in racial profiling against Muslims. The bureau also said it did not violate the law, breach constitutional guarantees or trespass on private property. It said non-Muslim sites also were monitored for excess radiation.

In its data request, CAIR asked for all government records concerning the authority of President Bush to authorize surveillance without obtaining a court order and "comprehensive lists and addresses" of the Muslim sites -- including mosques, organizations, businesses, warehouses and homes -- that were monitored.

The monitoring activity is thought to have also taken place in Chicago, Detroit, New York, Las Vegas and Seattle.

DOJ_NMG_0009198

Mr. Pistole had invited the Muslim organizations to meet with him to address reports of widespread surveillance and radiation monitoring. There were no reports that high levels of radiation were found during the monitoring, which first was reported last month by U.S. News & World Report.

US-VISIT To Step Up Fingerprinting (FEDTIMES)

By STEPHEN LOSEY

Federal Times, January 12, 2006

The director of the nation's program to screen foreign visitors entering the United States hopes to begin testing a more stringent fingerprinting system this year.

The U.S. Visitor and Immigrant Status Indicator Technology program, or US-VISIT, last July was directed by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to start taking all 10 fingerprints from first-time visitors to the country. US-VISIT director Jim Williams said at a press briefing Jan. 5 that the program is still putting together a plan to expand the process. He expects the plan to be finished in a few months.

Meanwhile, Homeland Security finished installing US-VISIT at all 104 land border ports in December, meeting a deadline mandated by Congress, Williams announced.

US-VISIT now takes only two fingerprints of foreign visitors. The FBI's identification system uses 10 fingerprints and a photograph to track criminals.

The Justice Department criticized the two-print system in 2004, saying it could allow terrorists or violent criminals to slip into the country undetected.

Williams stressed that he does not want US-VISIT to impede legitimate visitors and said the first tests will take place at low-volume border crossings and airports to minimize delays. The State Department also may help with testing, he said.

US-VISIT aims to register fingerprints from each of the 279 million foreigners who enter and leave the country each year and to cross-reference that data with 20 or more criminal, intelligence and immigration databases from multiple federal agencies.

Adopting a 10-print system will help improve information sharing, Williams said. US-VISIT is also trying to increase the number of fingerprints it receives each day from the FBI and is talking to agencies such as Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Customs and Border Protection and Citizenship and Immigration Services to find ways to better exchange data.

Williams also wants to work on improving the procedures used when people leave the country.

US-VISIT plans this spring to finish testing a new technology it hopes will speed up the exit process for visitors. The program is inserting radio frequency identification chips into arrival and departure forms used by visitors at three ports on the Canadian border and two ports on the Mexican border.

Visitors are now supposed to park their cars, get out and physically turn in their forms, called I-94 forms, before they leave the country.

RFID technology allows visitors to drive out of the country without stopping and still inform Homeland Security that they have left.

But the technology cannot tell whether the person in the car is carrying an I-94 that actually belongs to him or her, Williams said.

However, most visitors today do not turn in their I-94s at all because visitors ignore the rule and CBP agents are too busy watching people entering the country to stop them, and US-VISIT wants to have a better picture of who is leaving the country.

"RFID is not perfect, but it's better than not recording people's exit at all," Williams said.

Williams said that US-VISIT has helped the Homeland Security Department catch more than 970 known criminals and visa violators since it began in January 2004. He said the system has not caught any known terrorists entering the country, but he believes it is an effective deterrent that discourages them from trying to come into the country through ports of entry.

Williams said about 0.1 percent of visitors are falsely identified by the US-VISIT system as being on a watch list of suspects, and that Homeland Security's biometric support center can usually clear up any confusion in about two minutes.

DOJ_NMG_0009199

Homeland Security plans to spend $35 million on US-VISIT this fiscal year, the same amount as last year. US-VISIT processed more than 44 million visitors over the last two years.

Trade Group's Quick Advice: Slow Down (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

With lawmakers rushing out new plans for cleaning up their relations with lobbyists in the wake of the Jack Abramoff scandal, there's one trade group that would like a larger role in the deliberations. Indeed, it would like members of Congress to take a collective big breath and slow down a bit.

The group? The American League of Lobbyists.

Paul Miller of Miller/Wenhold Capitol Strategies and president of ALL said the group is not particularly opposed to major changes in lobbying rules. It simply wants "transparency" in what the Congress is up to in the rush to reform.

"Congress cannot just put out a package and rush it to the floor for a vote," Miller said. If lawmakers move too fast, too far to "appease the public," he said, they could find themselves back next year trying to undo unintended consequences.

Lawmakers could change their rules rather than pass laws to restrict members from taking fancy trips paid for by lobbyists, Miller said.

He expressed concern about proposals to prevent lawmakers and staffers from going to work as lobbyists for two years after leaving the Hill. They generally are restricted from lobbying their former colleagues for a year.

The one-year cooling-off period isn't being enforced, Miller said, and he doubts there would be any real enforcement on a two-year ban.

"The finger-pointing can't be just pointed at us. Jack didn't force anyone to take anything," Miller said, adding that Abramoff was never an ALL member.

ALL, which says it has more than 700 members, provides networking and educational opportunities for lobbyists. It also developed a voluntary lobbyist code of ethics.

Miller said ALL's board will meet Jan. 23 to decide on a strategy for dealing with possible legislative action, but that he knew one thing: "We'll do what we do best: lobby."VCIC Gets Lobbying Help

Members of the emerging industry of biometric technology companies who are trying to sell the Registered Traveler security program to the nation's airports have formed a coalition to help boost their credibility and their voice in Washington.

Perhaps more important, the Voluntary Credentialing Industry Coalition (VCIC) has scored some substantial lobbying help: Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates . Maybe even more important, the leader of the Wexler & Walker team for the client is Tom Blank .

Yes, the Tom Blank who was acting deputy administrator of the Transportation Security Administration and who created the agency's Office of Transportation Security Policy. During his time at TSA, the agency developed the Registered Traveler program, which is now a pilot project at the Orlando airport and allows airline passengers who undergo biometric screening and pay a fee to go through security faster. The industry wants to expand the program in which private companies would sign up frequent fliers and be responsible for background checks and necessary technology.

Blank joined the lobby shop in September and is prevented by federal ethics restrictions from contacting TSA officials for a year, although he could lobby members of Congress.

He said he cleared his work for the VCIC with ethics officials at TSA. Particularly "in this climate," Blank said, "I dial the agency ethics officials pretty often."

An e-mail from TSA deputy chief counsel Elizabeth Buchanan advised Blank not send a copy of the release to the agency, "because that would be a communication from you to TSA. . . . Then you leave the line in about 'Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, where Blank is vice chairman, will coordinate day-to-day activities and advocacy for the VCIC.' This is one fact about the organization among others and is fine as written."

Blank said he and the lobby shop are "trying very hard to comply" with the ethics rules.

DOJ_NMG_0009200

Earlier in his Washington career, Blank was an aide to then-House member Robert S. Walker (R-Pa.). Blank also was communications director to then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.).

Among the members of the Wexler & Walker team for VCIC: Timothy Hannegan , a top aviation lobbyist; Anne Wexler , a former senior aide to President Jimmy Carter; and former TSA official Chad Wolf .

Among the members of the coalition are officials of Iridian Technologies, Saflink Corp., Verified Identify Pass Inc. and Lockheed Martin.By the Numbers

His lobby and consulting shop is less than a year old, but the money doesn't appear to have been too shabby for former attorney general John D. Ashcroft . According to year-end disclosures for the Ashcroft Group 's five lobbying clients, the firm brought in $269,000 for the last six months of 2005. As the Chicago Tribune noted this week, these totals "so far represent in some cases only initial retainers or billings."

In only one case -- for Oracle Corp. -- was Ashcroft one of the registered lobbyists. But Oracle's legislative affairs director, Robert Hoffman , said Ashcroft did not end up doing any actual lobbying and only advised the company on antitrust issues.

Here's how the money shook out: The Ashcroft Group reported receiving $220,000 from Oracle; $20,000 from Israel Aircraft Industries International; $15,000 from Choicepoint; and $14,000 from the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants.

Many of Ashcroft's restrictions on lobbying his former Justice colleagues expire early next month.

City Revival Plan Draws Sharp Criticism (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Residents of the New Orleans neighborhoods most heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina, under a controversial plan unveiled Wednesday, would have just four months to demonstrate strong support for rebuilding their areas before possibly being forced to sell their properties to the government.

The proposal is a centerpiece of Mayor C. Ray Nagin's "Bring New Orleans Back" recovery plan, which is being rolled out in phases this week. It drew immediate outrage from residents and community activists, who argued that many citizens -- especially the blacks who predominated the flood-struck areas -- could be forced out of the city for good.

It represents an attempt to seek a middle ground on the issue that has emerged as the flashpoint in the debate over how to restore the ravaged city: Should all of New Orleans be rebuilt, or should city planners shrink the city's footprint, returning low-lying neighborhoods to wetlands and green space to serve as a natural barrier against floods?

"None of us want to be in this particular place, but Katrina has forced us to take a good hard look at what we need to do to rebuild our city," Nagin said. "The realities are that we will have limited resources to redevelop our city. . . .The other reality is this report is controversial. It pushes the edge of the envelope. It probably says some things to some people they are probably misinterpreting."

Despite Nagin's effort to ease tensions, the unveiling of the proposal quickly became heated, with residents across racial and class lines angrily teeing off on what they considered a land grab engineered by the city's elite. Much of the ire was heaped on New Orleans developer Joseph C. Canizaro, a key architect of the plan, whose name elicited boos from the crowd in the standing-room-only auditorium.

"How many people from my back yard are up there?" Harvey Bender, a laid off city maintenance worker from eastern New Orleans, yelled out, disrupting the proceedings. "I'm ready to rebuild, and I'm not letting you take mine," he added. "I'm going to fight, whatever it takes, to rebuild my property. It's going to be baby Iraq for Joe Canizaro."

Under the plan, which would take effect Jan. 20, New Orleans would impose a moratorium on building permits in areas hardest hit by Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters -- a vast swath of the city that includes parts of the Gentilly, Mid-City, Lakeview and Lower 9th Ward neighborhoods. Residents would then have to demonstrate there was sufficient critical mass in their area to rebuild to warrant public investment in schools and city facilities, possibly by showing that half of the population planned to come back.

To accelerate the process, Nagin's commission is asking the Federal Emergency Management Agency to release updated floodplain maps the agency has assembled, which effectively could make the decision for many homeowners by raising home insurance rates and setting other new financial barriers to redevelopment.

Neighborhoods that failed to meet the critical mass test would be shrunk, or eliminated altogether, and a new city agency called the Crescent City Redevelopment Corp. would buy residents out or seize their properties through eminent domain. The estimated cost of the buyouts: $12 billion.

Legislation by Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., seeks to reimburse homeowners who are bought out with 60 percent of their pre-Katrina equity. The Nagin commission plan proposes to go further, compensating displaced homeowners the remaining 40 percent as well with federal Community Development Block Grant money and FEMA funding.

But those sources of funding, like many other elements of the ambitious plan, would need the support of Congress and President Bush, who is scheduled to make a public appearance in New Orleans Thursday and meet with the co-chair of Nagin's commission, health care executive Maurice L. Lagarde III.

"We respect the rights of all citizens to return to their neighborhoods," Lagarde said, casting the four-month process, set to end May 20, as an opportunity for residents to control the future of their communities.

In addition to the litmus test for flood-prone neighborhoods, the blueprint being unfurled this week contains many lofty ideas to use the rebuilding effort as a catalyst to permanently improve New Orleans.

An education subcommittee is proposing a radical reorganization of the city's troubled school system, which has been plagued by corruption and low academic performance. The proposal would de-centralize governing authority, giving principals greater authority over their schools, and neighborhoods more political power over management of smaller clusters of schools in their area.

A cultural subcommittee is proposing creation of a new jazz district near the French Quarter at the former location of Storyville, a fabled district of musicians and houses of ill repute popular during the turn of the last century that fell into disrepair and was demolished. The idea to recreate a cleaned-up version of Storyville, which gave rise to musical legends including Jelly Roll Morton, Manuel Perez and King Oliver, was championed by committee member and Pulitzer Prize winning jazz virtuoso Wynton Marsalis, a leading member of one of New Orleans' current musical dynasties.

Meanwhile, an infrastructure subcommittee is proposing a new $3.3 billion light-rail system modeled on those now in operation in cities including Portland, Ore., and Denver.

But it was the plan to give residents four months to show their neighborhoods could come back or be bought out that claimed the majority of the overall blueprint's $17 billion cost--and generated the most passionate response.

"Over my dead body," said Lower 9th Ward resident Caroline Parker, vowing to fight government seizure of her property. "Like I said, I didn't die with Katrina."

Some critics, who had claimed all along that Nagin's commission was stacked with developers and other business leaders, said the proposal was proof that the mayor was allowing moneyed interests to draw up the reconstruction, to the detriment of the city's working poor.

"To us, that's Katrina cleansing -- the removal of blacks from the city," said Mtangulizi Sanyika, of the African American Leadership Project, a group that was organizing a summit of black community leaders Thursday to discuss alternative plans to revive all of New Orleans.

The summit was part of a larger series of events planned for the upcoming Martin Luther King Day weekend in New Orleans, which are bringing black religious and political leaders from across the country, including Minister Louis Farrakhan of the Nation of Islam, to the city to illuminate the plight of the city's displaced black citizens.

Committee members stressed Wednesday that their blueprint envisioned room for all New Orleans residents who wanted to return to the city, and would accommodate them in part by redeveloping other parts of town, including some existing public housing projects. Only about 144,000 residents have returned to New Orleans, which had a population of 462,000 before the hurricane. Officials estimate only about 250,000 people will return by the fall of 2008.

Anger Meets New Orleans Renewal Plan (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0009202

By Gary Rivlin

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 11 - Residents of the city's most devastated neighborhoods responded with anger Wednesday after the city's rebuilding commission unveiled its most contentious proposal: giving neighborhoods in low-lying parts of the city from four months to a year to prove they should not be bulldozed.

The plan was presented at a standing-room-only meeting punctuated by catcalls and angry outbursts that often interrupted members of the panel. "Over my dead body" was uttered more than once.

"I'm going to suit up like I'm going to Iraq and fight this," said Harvey Bender, a laid-off city worker, who shouted out his comments before an audience at the Sheraton Hotel that numbered in the hundreds and spilled into the aisles and hallways.

Mr. Bender owns a home in New Orleans East, a predominantly black middle-class neighborhood of 90,000 residents largely destroyed by the flooding that followed Hurricane Katrina. Parts of the neighborhood might not survive, according to the plan, if they do not attract enough returning residents.

Speaker after speaker, black and white, prosperous and poor, dismissed a plan that Mayor C. Ray Nagin described as "controversial." But Mr. Nagin gave them hope as he walked a middle line that neither endorsed the plan nor opposed it.

"This is only a recommendation," Mr. Nagin said in remarks that preceded the formal presentation of the rebuilding plan. "We as a community will have the ultimate say in how we move forward."

The mayor called on people to listen to the commission's presentation with an open mind. "Take the time to digest this information, to look it over very carefully," Mr. Nagin said. "The reality is we will have limited resources to redevelop our city."

Yet the audience did not seem in the mood for calm debate.

"Please let us build our own homes," said Charles Young, a homeowner in Lakeview, a largely white middle-class neighborhood. "Let us come back on our own time. Let us spend our insurance money, which we paid for on our own."

Under the proposal, residents would not be permitted to move back into the hardest-hit neighborhoods - about two-thirds of the city, including more than half its homeowners - for at least four months. During that time, leaders of each neighborhood would have to submit to a citywide planning body a recovery plan that would have to be approved before residents would be allowed back.

Neighborhoods not able to come up with an acceptable plan, or those that do not attract sufficient development within a year, could be bulldozed and returned to marshland, with the city compensating homeowners.

The plan represents a compromise between the homeowners in low-lying areas who are determined to rebuild, and the scientists and other experts who believe the city should allow large portions of its flood-prone areas to revert to marshland.

Each neighborhood would have at its disposal teams of planners and other experts to help residents do what they need to prevent the city from forcing them to live elsewhere.

"We want to give every community as best a chance to come back as we can," said Joseph C. Canizaro, a member of the commission. Much of the crowd's enmity was directed at Mr. Canizaro, the plan's main author and a prominent developer here, who was booed several times.

"Joe Canizaro, I don't know you, but I hate you," said Mr. Bender, the New Orleans East resident, when granted his turn at the microphone.

Robyn Braggs, another resident of New Orleans East, said, "I don't think four or five months is close to enough time given all we would need to do." Because former residents are scattered around the country, she said, many, especially those with school-age children, "won't be able to even return to do the work necessary until this summer."

Marc H. Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans who is now president of the National Urban League, described the commission's proposal as a "massive red-lining plan wrapped around a giant land grab." Many homeowners will not be able to settle with their insurance companies if they do not know the future of their neighborhoods, he said.

"It's cruel to bar people from rebuilding," Mr. Morial said. "Telling people they can't rebuild for four months is tantamount to saying they can't ever come back. It's telling people who have lost almost everything that we're going to take the last vestige of what they own."

DOJ_NMG_0009203

Not everyone opposed the plan. One resident of Eastover, a wealthy, largely black community in the eastern part of the city devastated by the storm, told the commissioners, "I accept your challenge" to craft a workable rebuilding plan. He added, "I probably will get hit up the side of the head for my comments."

The plan also impressed Sean Reilly, a member of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, who criticized the city last week, saying it had given the impression that all neighborhoods could be restored. Wednesday, he said the plan struck the proper balance between residents' self-determination and tough choices.

The plan was developed by the rebuilding commission's Urban Planning committee, which Mr. Canizaro led. It is the first of seven committee reports to be unveiled over the next week and one component of a sweeping redevelopment plan that includes proposals for a $3 billion light-rail system and an economic development corporation, fashioned after the one New York created to oversee rebuilding in Lower Manhattan after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The commission is also proposing that New Orleans borrow a second idea from New York: asking the federal government for permission to sell tax-exempt bonds to rebuild businesses, just as New York was able to do to rebuild downtown.

But the commission will clearly have a difficult time selling its plan to residents. "This is a big, audacious plan put together by obviously brilliant people," said Fred Yoder, a resident of Lakeview. "But you missed the boat. We don't need a rail system. We need housing."

Hostility Greets Katrina Recovery Plan (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 11 -- Angry homeowners screamed and City Council members seethed Wednesday as this city's recovery commission recommended imposing a four-month building moratorium on most of New Orleans and creating a powerful new authority that could use eminent domain to seize homes in neighborhoods that will not be rebuilt.

Hundreds of residents packed into a hotel ballroom interrupted the presentation of the long-awaited proposal with shouts and taunts, booed its main architect and unrolled a litany of complaints. One by one, homeowners stepped to a microphone to lampoon the plan -- which contemplates a much smaller city and relies on persuading the federal government to spend billions on new housing and a light-rail system -- as "audacious," "an academic exercise," "garbage," "a no-good, rotten scheme."

"You missed the boat," homeowner Fred Yoder, who lived in heavily flooded Lakeview, told committee members. "Give me a break: We don't need a light-rail system. We're in the mud."

The plan released Wednesday is the first stage of what is sure to be a multi-layered, multi-level effort to resuscitate New Orleans. Mayor C. Ray Nagin, who can accept or alter the proposal, will have to present the plan to a state commission that will control allocation of billions of federal dollars, as well as to Donald E. Powell, President Bush's hurricane recovery coordinator, and the White House. The commission's recommendations are heavily dependent on federal money, counting on $12 billion to buy storm-damaged homes and $4.8 billion for infrastructure improvements, including an ambitious light-rail proposal to connect downtown New Orleans with the city's airport, Baton Rouge and the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

The furious reaction to the plan is the latest agonizing episode in this city's troubled campaign to reinvigorate itself after the devastating floods caused by Hurricane Katrina last August. Nagin, already politically weakened by widespread criticism of his response to the flooding, now faces the difficult challenge of guiding decisions about whether some parts of the city will cease to exist.

Some activists have long accused the commission -- which was appointed by Nagin -- of trying to find ways to abandon predominantly black neighborhoods, such as the Lower Ninth Ward. Wednesday's unveiling did nothing to assuage their fears, even though commission members promised to give all neighborhoods an opportunity to prove that they should be rebuilt by convening planning groups in coming months. The proposed moratorium would be in the city's most damaged neighborhoods, and officials would use the four-month period to gauge whether enough residents will come back to make the areas viable.

"If this plan goes forward as it is, many people's worst fears about our African American heritage and population will come true," said Sue Sperry of the New Orleans Preservation Resource Center. "It's almost like it will be extinguished from this earth."

DOJ_NMG_0009204

Within minutes of the plan's unveiling, Nagin was already showing signs that he might back away from the commission's most controversial proposal. He told WWL-AM that he had some "hesitancy" about the building moratorium. He promised to seek more public input before making a final decision.

At least two of the commission's proposals -- the creation of the Crescent City Rebuilding Authority to buy flood-damaged homes and the implementation of a master redevelopment plan -- will require changes to the city charter, a prospect sure to be contentious because of the mayor's long-standing animosities with the New Orleans City Council. The city is also waiting on the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine base elevation levels required before flood insurance can be issued. The commission is hoping that Congress will approve a quasi-public recovery authority proposed by U.S. Rep. Richard H. Baker (R-La.) that would sell bonds to buy flood-damaged homes, then work with private developers to rebuild neighborhoods.

Despite the hurdles ahead, the commission urged fast action on a broad set of recommendations, including stronger levees and a restructured school system. John Beckham, a consultant who helped devise the plan, urged residents to "imagine the best city in the world."

Beckham -- who declined repeated requests Wednesday to identify the private foundation that hired him to draw up the plan for the commission -- told the audience that New Orleans could have "a park in every neighborhood," "a bustling downtown" and a city connected by bike paths and public transportation systems.

Beckham was introduced by the commission's urban planning chairman, Joseph C. Canizaro, a real estate developer and major fundraiser for Bush, who chuckled when he was booed by some in attendance. "This is just a beginning," Canizaro told the audience.

Mindful that Bush will have a tremendous influence on how much money finds its way to Louisiana, Beckham displayed some of the president's pledges on large screens. He reminded the crowd that Bush said Sept. 15 that "we will do what it takes" to rebuild New Orleans and of his promise in December to build levees that are better and stronger than before. On Thursday, Bush will visit the city for the first time in three months.

The commission's recovery plan anticipates a city that will be only a fraction of its pre-Katrina size of nearly half a million residents. Beckham said the city now has about 144,000 residents and is projected to grow to 181,000 by September and 247,000 by September 2008.

The shrunken city will need a restructured and more efficient local government, Beckham said, drawing smirks from City Council members seated behind the committee. The City Council, which has clashed with Nagin repeatedly -- most recently trying to use zoning laws to block sites he selected for temporary housing trailers -- has effectively been cut out of the power loop in the recovery process and does not have authority over the recovery plan. Before the commission's report had even been announced, five City Council members -- responding to leaks of the plan's main components to the city's influential newspaper, the Times-Picayune -- held a news conference to condemn the committee in the same hotel where the recovery plan was to be unveiled.

Council member Jackie Brechtel Clarkson called the proposal "a blatant violation of property rights."

"I think it's unprecedented in America," said Clarkson, who is also a real estate agent.

The council members were flanked by leaders of the large Vietnamese community that flocked after the Vietnam War to New Orleans East, one of the areas that would be affected by the moratorium. "It just hurt us -- again," said the Rev. Luke Nguyen of Mary Queen of Vietnam Church. "We have 700, 800 families already returned, ready to gut and fix their houses."

Nguyen streamed into the reception hall, shouldering past activists and homeowners bristling with anger. On a table nearby, the commission had placed placards, declaring, "We're Home." Nguyen did not bother to pick one up.

Back To The Future (WSJ)

By James K. Glassman

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- President Bush today makes his ninth trip here since Hurricane Katrina. He will find a tale of two cities -- one almost back to normal, the other devastated. If you drive into New Orleans from the airport the back way, down Jefferson Highway to St. Charles Avenue, everything on the river side is as gorgeous and decadent as ever. Some live oaks have toppled, and many magnolias have died, but all the way to the French Quarter, the shops and restaurants are open, and people have come home.

There are crowds taking a number for po' boy sandwiches at Domilise's on Annunciation, locals lunching on shrimp remoulade and trout amandine at Galatoire's, and browsers examining the silver ice buckets at Lucullus Antiques on Chartres Street. The Camellia Club of New Orleans is holding its 66th annual show on Saturday; schools are opening; and plans are set for the Zulu and Rex parades on Mardi Gras, just seven weeks away. With supply short and demand strong, rents have soared. Real estate records are being set.

The city's great architectural heritage -- comprising 18th- and 19th-century Greek Revival and Victorian houses, shops and warehouses -- was built on high ground, hugging the river with its natural levees. While many of these buildings sustained serious wind damage, they avoided the flood that affected areas closer to Lake Pontchartrain. But drive north on Canal Street to the lake or east toward the Ninth Ward or St. Bernard Parish, and you will see block after block of ruination -- gutted houses with water marks six feet off the ground, huge piles of soggy insulation and linoleum, and, on median strips (what Orleanians call the "neutral ground") little plastic signs advertising tree removal, stump grinding, mold mitigation, roof repair and, of course, lawyers for any suit you can think up.

There was controversy when a sightseeing firm last week launched a bus tour of destroyed neighborhoods. Profiting from ghoulish voyeurism? Actually, it's an education. Like the president, everyone should see firsthand what the worst natural disaster in American history has wrought -- the destructive power of nature and the optimism of a city that, before this, was mainly known for its grandiose inertia. There's no illusion that this will be the same place it was. It will be smaller and maybe better. The latest estimate places the current population at 135,000, compared with 462,000 before the storm. A consultant for the city forecasts 252,000 a year from now.

The big debate here today is whether the city should be smaller physically. In a blueprint made public yesterday, Mayor Ray Nagin's Bring Back New Orleans Commission gives residents of flood-damaged areas four months to devise plans to prove they can revive their neighborhoods; if not, they will be bought out. Some 108,000 houses -- about half the city -- took on more than four feet of water, and, as Joseph Canizaro, a member of the commission, said, "A lot of poor African-Americans had everything they own destroyed here."

In a time of high emotion, the commission's approach makes political sense. No family wants to be denied, by government fiat, the right to rebuild. But the truth is that the Lower Ninth Ward and other low-lying areas won't be resettled. The new New Orleans will almost surely look like New Orleans of 1878, which, as shown by the Times-Picayune in a remarkable map, had most of the city's 200,000 residents "clustered in a narrow swath along the Mississippi River." The neighborhoods flooded in 2005 were settled after the city's swampy interior was pumped dry in the early 1900s. Those areas should return to marshland.

Last week, the federal government released $3 billion to fix the levees so that they work as they were supposed to -- ample protection for people living in what, in the real estate ads, are now referred to as "high and dry" places during Katrina. There's a lot of room for sensible commercial and residential development in these areas, as well as in midcity neighborhoods that were wet but not severely inundated.

The rebirth of New Orleans does, however, require a leap into the unknown. It can't be meticulously planned. Preserve the old buildings. Rope off the lowlands. But then let imagination takes its course. Unfortunately, Mr. Nagin's Bring Back New Orleans group is loaded with central planners prescribing a dream city built around such highlights as light-rail transport, a "jazz district" and a neuroscience center. Typical is Michael Cowan, head of the city's Human Relations Commission, who warned that "the alternative to a 'good-enough' plan for the future of our city is free-market chaos, also known . . . as every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost."

Actually, it was precisely this chaos that made New Orleans a great city in the first place. It was planning -- specifically, the horrifying housing projects, largely destroyed in Katrina; the stultifying school system; the Superdome and other wasteful public-works projects -- that held the city back.

But even as a project in free-market creativity, New Orleans needs a leader. The feds are providing the money, but the president, who promised in September that "there is no way to imagine America without New Orleans," has been reluctant to appoint a czar, a MacArthur, to oversee the resurrection. That's a mistake because the most visible alternative right now is Mr. Nagin himself, whose performance during and after the hurricane has been less than inspirational.

The only real leadership in New Orleans these past four months has been provided by the daily newspaper, the Times-Picayune, whose editor, Jim Amoss, has both crusaded for the city's interests and battled the rumor mill (favorite Ninth Ward story: The levees were blown up in an act of racial cleansing) with a flood of bright and tough news stories.

When I was 24, I came to New Orleans to start a business and a family. I stayed for eight happy years. If I were 24 again, I would be packing my bags for New Orleans to be on the ground floor of a modern renaissance. Katrina was a tragedy, but its aftermath presents the most exciting urban opportunity since San Francisco in 1906. Pioneers, please apply.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Open To Hearings On Domestic Spying (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 12, 2006

LOUISVILLE -- President Bush told a select group of Kentucky and Indiana residents yesterday that the U.S. military's progress in Iraq is "good" and promised ultimate victory -- although he gave no timetable.

In a rare town hall-style meeting set up as a theatre-in-the-round, the president again defended invading Iraq, even though former dictator Saddam Hussein didn't possess weapons of mass destruction as Bush first claimed.

"I understand that the intelligence didn't turn out the way a lot of the world thought it would be. And that was disappointing," Bush told the crowd of about 500, who were given tickets through some of the area's business, women's and teacher groups.

Bush also addressed the controversy over the revelation that he had authorized wiretaps on American citizens without court oversight. He said he'd welcome congressional hearings on the issue -- as long as they don't reveal to "the enemy what we're doing."

"I had to make the difficult decision between balancing civil liberties and on a limited basis -- and I mean limited basis -- try to find out the intention of the enemy," he said.

The need for such measures stemmed from the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, in which war "came to us," he said.

Likewise because of 9/11, going to war in Iraq became necessary because terrorists were using it as a "safe haven," he said.

Bush reiterated that he gave the former Iraqi dictator a chance "to disarm or face serious consequences."

"He chose war. He got war. He's not in power and the world is better off for it," he said.

Bush has been more aggressively defending his administration's policies in recent weeks, as public support for the war has waned and critics have ramped up their calls for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

"Things are good. I'm confident we'll succeed," Bush said. "I know a lot of people want our troops to come home. I do, too. But I don't want them to come home without achieving victory."

He said that will be when Iraqis can adequately defend their new democratic state and when it's "no longer a safe haven for the terrorists."

Democratic opposition

In a conference call with reporters before Bush's event, Lt. Col. Andrew Horne, a Marine reservist and Democrat who plans to run against U.S. Rep. Anne Northup, R-Louisville, said there's a gap between the Bush administration's bold rhetoric on the Iraq war and its actual support for soldiers.

He cited recent news stories describing a suppressed Pentagon report that concluded many U.S. combat deaths in Iraq could be avoided with better body armor, which is available on the market.

"It's just deplorable," Horne said. "It is of paramount concern to everyone involved that they be fully supported."

Republican Secretary of State Trey Grayson, who nabbed a front-row seat, said the "town hall" approach was a politically savvy way of taking Bush's Iraq message to the people.

DOJ_NMG_0009207

"He's got a good argument, he just has to make it like this where he comes into a place that's not exactly his home base and takes questions from anyone," Grayson said.

A range of questions

After 24 minutes of remarks on Iraq, Bush opened it up for about 50 minutes for unscripted audience questions.

While giving answers on a wide range of topics, Bush alternated between plugging initiatives his administration already started and hinting at new proposals to come.

For instance, after Sandra R. Patterson-Randles asked what can be done to improve education, the president touted his No Child Left Behind plan for instituting more measurements of student progress.

He said schools need to improve science and math education and that he'd be unveiling a specific proposal in his State of the Union Address Jan. 31.

Patterson-Randles, chancellor of Indiana University Southeast, said later that she'd like to hear officials pledge to beef up all curricula, from the arts to civics to literature.

In response to a question about border security, the president steered his answer toward immigration policy. He said he doesn't favor broad amnesty -- which would mean automatic citizenship to illegal immigrants -- because it would lead to an influx of millions of people.

But he noted, "There are some jobs Americans will not do, and they're being filled by people (from abroad) who want to feed their families." They should be given "temporary worker status," he said.

A boy's question

Eventually, the discussion returned to Bush's theme: national security. The session was punctuated by a succinct question from a 7-year-old.

"How can people help in the war on terror?" asked Alex Childress of Louisville, who attended with his mom, Martha.

"Well," Bush began, "that's the hardest question I've had all day."

He said he welcomes an honest debate about Iraq but one that is "respectful."

"I expect and frankly welcome the voices of people saying 'You know, Mr. President, you shouldn't have made that decision,' or, 'You should have made it another way,' " he said. "What I don't like is when somebody says 'He lied,' or 'They're in there for oil.'"

Bush Tries To Shape Iraq Debate In Election Year (REU-Y2)

By Patricia Wilson

Reuters, January 12, 2006

President George W. Bush on Wednesday tried to shape election-year debate on the Iraq war by warning critics their rhetoric could embolden the enemy and weaken the morale of U.S. troops.

Preparing for a tough campaign against Democrats in the run-up to congressional elections in November when he will try to keep the U.S. Congress in the hands of his Republican Party, Bush acknowledged his decision to invade Iraq almost three years ago was not universally popular.

"I can understand folks who say, 'I wish you hadn't done that,'" he said, adding later, "I expect there to be an honest debate about Iraq ... people can help by making sure the tone of this debate is respectful and is mindful about what messages out of the country can do for morale of our troops."

He said he welcomed dissenting voices, but "what I don't like is when somebody said he lied or they're in there for oil or he's doing it only because of Israel."

A few Democrats have called for a quick withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq but the party remains divided over how to move ahead. Some critics on the political fringes have raised the issues of oil and Israel.

Asked by a 7-year-old in the audience at the Louisville Convention Center how people could help in the war on terrorism, Bush replied, "One way people can help as we're coming down the pike in the 2006 elections is remember the effect that rhetoric can have on our troops in harm's way and the effect that rhetoric can have in emboldening or weakening an enemy."

SEEKING TO CONVINCE SKEPTICS

DOJ_NMG_0009208

Bush is trying to convince skeptical Americans his plan for Iraq will work even as the U.S. death toll mounts. His remarks came as violence surged in Iraq where more than 200 Iraqis and 16 U.S. troops have died in the past week.

"The goal is victory, nothing short of victory," he declared in Kentucky where he unexpectedly answered questions on topics ranging from the war to education, immigration and domestic spying.

Bush said he was confident of success in Iraq but admitted it was tough going.

"Whether you agree with me or not, they're not going to shake my will. We're doing the right thing."

The 400 community leaders, small-business owners and others were invited to listen to Bush, but White House spokesman Scott McClellan said their questions were not screened in advance. Nevertheless, none of them criticized the president.

During a meeting at the White House last week with secretaries of state and defense from previous Republican and Democratic administrations, Bush was urged to talk to Americans in more detail and with more candor about his Iraq strategy in order to build support at home.

Bush appeared in the district of Republican Rep. Anne Northup (news, bio, voting record) whose likely Democratic opponent will be Andrew Horne, a lawyer and Marine reservist who served two tours in Iraq.

He questioned Bush's criticism of war opponents.

"On issues of war, on issues of the welfare of our troops, if we are not raising the questions, who will?" Horne told reporters in a conference call organized by Democrats. "We know that the nature of the military, the Marines, soldiers and sailors on the ground, they can't really raise these issues, so we need to do it for them.

In the campaign-style meeting, Bush again defended a domestic eavesdropping program he authorized after the September 11 attacks as limited in nature and constitutional. He said he did not object to congressional hearings on the matter so long as they "don't tell the enemy what we're doing."

General Asserts Right On Self-Incrimination In Iraq Abuse Cases (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, a central figure in the U.S. detainee-abuse scandal, this week invoked his right not to incriminate himself in court-martial proceedings against two soldiers accused of using dogs to intimidate captives at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, according to lawyers involved in the case.

The move by Miller -- who once supervised the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and helped set up operations at Abu Ghraib -- is the first time the general has given an indication that he might have information that could implicate him in wrongdoing, according to military lawyers.

Harvey Volzer, an attorney for one of the dog handlers, has been seeking to question Miller to determine whether Miller ordered the use of military working dogs to frighten detainees during interrogations at Abu Ghraib. Volzer has argued that the dog handlers were following orders when the animals were used against detainees.

Maj. Michelle E. Crawford, a defense lawyer representing Miller, said the general decided not to answer further questions because he has "been interviewed repeatedly over the last several years" about his role at Guantanamo Bay and his visit to Iraq and he stands by his many statements to Congress, Army investigators and lawyers.

Miller's "choice to no longer answer the same questions . . . was based on the advice of counsel and includes the fact that he has already, and repeatedly, answered all inquiries fully," Crawford said.

Miller's decision came shortly after Col. Thomas M. Pappas, the commanding officer at Abu Ghraib, accepted immunity from prosecution this week and was ordered to testify at upcoming courts-martial. Pappas, a military intelligence officer, could be asked to detail high-level policies relating to the treatment of detainees at Abu Ghraib.

He also could shed light on how abusive tactics emerged, who ordered their use and their possible connection to officials in Washington, according to lawyers and human rights advocates who have closely followed the case. Pappas has never spoken publicly. Crawford said Miller was unaware of Pappas's grant of immunity. "This could be a big break if Pappas testifies as to why those dogs were used and who ordered the dogs to be used," said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights. "It's a steppingstone going up the chain of command, and that's positive. It might demonstrate that it wasn't just a few rotten apples."

Pappas's attorney, Maj. Jeffery D. Lippert, said yesterday that Pappas would not comment. But he added in an e-mail that "the Commanding General of the Military District of Washington has ordered Col. Pappas to testify if called as a witness in pending courts-martial, and granted him testimonial immunity to facilitate his appearance as a witness."

Miller invoked his military Article 31 rights through his Army lawyer on Tuesday, after a Navy judge in the Military District of Washington ruled that lawyers defending the two dog handlers could interview Miller this week. Article 31 rights are almost identical to those afforded civilians by the Fifth Amendment, and invoking them does not legally imply guilt. Miller now will not meet with the defense lawyers.

Eugene R. Fidell, a Washington expert in military law, said that Miller's decision is "consistent with his being concerned that he may have some exposure to worry about." Fidell added: "It's very unusual for senior officers to invoke their Article 31 rights. The culture in the military tends to encourage cooperation rather than the opposite."

Miller has long been in the spotlight of the Abu Ghraib abuse investigations, largely because he was sent to the Iraq prison in August and September 2003 with the goal of streamlining its intelligence-gathering operations, using Guantanamo Bay, commonly called "Gitmo," as a model. Officers at Abu Ghraib have said that Miller wanted to "Gitmo-ize" the facility, and that harsh tactics migrated from the Cuba facility via "Tiger Teams" that Miller sent to Iraq as trainers.

Photographs documenting a wide array of abuse against dozens of detainees at Abu Ghraib in late 2003 were turned over to military investigators in January 2004. The photographs were revealed publicly in April 2004, and seven low-ranking military police soldiers have taken most of the blame for the treatment of captives, which included sexual humiliation, stress positions and beatings. All seven were convicted on various charges, the most serious of which led to a 10-year prison sentence for Pvt. Charles A. Graner.

In an interview with defense attorneys for those MPs in August 2004, Miller said he never told Pappas to use dogs in questioning detainees. Photos of the dog handlers scaring detainees at Abu Ghraib were among the most notorious to emerge from the prison. Dogs were also used at Guantanamo Bay.

"At no time did we discuss the use of dogs in interrogations," Miller said, according to a transcript.

Volzer, who represents Sgt. Santos A. Cardona, one of the military dog handlers charged with abuse, said he believes the grant of immunity to Pappas will essentially clear his client, because Pappas already has admitted in administrative hearings that he improperly ordered the use of dogs. Volzer said he believes that Pappas was taking direction from Miller, and that Miller was acting on instructions from Defense Department officials. Cardona and Sgt. Michael J. Smith are scheduled to be tried in separate courts-martial in February and March.

"I think the command is hiding something, and I think what they're hiding is material that is exculpatory that says the interrogation techniques were approved by powers above General Miller," Volzer said. "Having Pappas available to testify may have given Miller the impression that he is next to be accused of doing something inappropriate or giving inappropriate orders."

Miller, now based at the Pentagon as a senior official managing Army installations, was recommended for administrative punishment for his alleged mishandling of interrogations of a valuable detainee in Guantanamo Bay. But high-ranking military officials have declined to impose the penalty. The detainee was subjected to a number of abuses that mirrored the ones that later emerged in the Abu Ghraib photographs.

Maj. Christopher Graveline, who has prosecuted several of the Abu Ghraib abuse cases, said yesterday that Pappas might be called to testify in upcoming courts-martial, but declined to comment on "any current or future prosecutions."

Asked whether prosecutors are looking at additional charges arising out of the Abu Ghraib investigation, Graveline said: "We're taking it where the evidence leads it."

Local Insurgents Tell Of Clashes With Al Qaeda's Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 11 - The story told by the two Iraqi guerrillas cut to the heart of the war that Iraqi and American officials now believe is raging inside the Iraqi insurgency.

In October, the two insurgents said in interviews, a group of local fighters from the Islamic Army gathered for an open-air meeting on a street corner in Taji, a city north of Baghdad.

Across from the Iraqis stood the men from Al Qaeda, mostly Arabs from outside Iraq. Some of them wore suicide belts. The men from the Islamic Army accused the Qaeda fighters of murdering their comrades.

"Al Qaeda killed two people from our group," said an Islamic Army fighter who uses the nom de guerre Abu Lil and who claimed that he attended the meeting. "They repeatedly kill our people."

The encounter ended angrily. A few days later, the insurgents said, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and the Islamic Army fought a bloody battle on the outskirts of town.

The battle, which the insurgents said was fought on Oct. 23, was one of several clashes between Al Qaeda and local Iraqi guerrilla groups that have broken out in recent months across the Sunni Triangle.

American and Iraqi officials believe that the conflicts present them with one of the biggest opportunities since the insurgency burst upon Iraq nearly three years ago. They have begun talking with local insurgents, hoping to enlist them to cooperate against Al Qaeda, said Western diplomats, Iraqi officials and an insurgent leader.

It is impossible to say just how far the split extends within the insurgency, which remains a lethal force with a shared goal of driving the Americans out of Iraq. Indeed, the best the Americans can hope for may be a grudging passivity from the Iraqi insurgents when the Americans zero in on Al Qaeda's forces.

But the split within the insurgency is coinciding with Sunni Arabs' new desire to participate in Iraq's political process, and a growing resentment of the militants. Iraqis are increasingly saying that they regard Al Qaeda as a foreign-led force, whose extreme religious goals and desires for sectarian war against Iraq's Shiite majority override Iraqi tribal and nationalist traditions.

While American and Iraqi officials have talked of a split for months, detailed accounts of clashes were provided by men claiming to be local insurgents.

Abu Lil was one of four Iraqi men interviewed for this article who said they were fighters for the Islamic Army, one of the main insurgent groups. Despite its name, its members have nationalist and largely secular motivations. While their membership in the insurgency could not be independently verified, the descriptions the four men offered of themselves and their exploits were lengthy, detailed and credible.

The four men interviewed are, by all accounts, ordinary Iraqis. One worked as a trash collector. Another was a part-time mechanic in an ice factory. All of them said they had children. While they claimed to be members of the same group, different members provided lengthy accounts of operations in an array of cities in the Sunni Triangle. The men gave Iraqi nicknames and noms de guerre. Some of their assertions, including specific examples about clashes with Al Qaeda's forces, were confirmed by American and Iraqi officials.

According to an American and an Iraqi intelligence official, as well as Iraqi insurgents, clashes between Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and Iraqi insurgent groups like the Islamic Army and Muhammad's Army have broken out in Ramadi, Husayba, Yusifiya, Dhuluiya and Karmah.

In town after town, Iraqis and Americans say, local Iraqi insurgents and tribal groups have begun trying to expel Al Qaeda's fighters, and, in some cases, kill them. It is unclear how deeply the split pervades Iraqi society. Iraqi leaders say that in some Iraqi cities, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and local insurgent groups continue to cooperate with one another.

American and Iraqi officials believe that Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia is largely made up of Iraqis, with its highest leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian. Even so, among Iraqis, the group is still perceived as a largely foreign force.

Evidence of the split is still largely anecdotal, and from most available evidence, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia remains the most virulent and well-financed group fighting in Iraq. But in most Sunni cities, Iraqis defied Al Qaeda's threats and turned out to vote in large numbers on Dec. 15.

"The tribes are fed up with Al Qaeda and they will not tolerate any more," said a senior Iraqi intelligence official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. The intelligence official confirmed reports that a Sunni tribe in Samarra had tried and executed Qaeda members for their role in assassinating a local sheik.

DOJ_NMG_0009211

"It was a beautiful mistake," the intelligence official said of the sheik's assassination by Al Qaeda. "Now the tribes will kill Al Qaeda. Now they have the courage."

An Attack's Repercussions

Samarra, north of Baghdad, had been infiltrated by Al Qaeda's fighters. In desperation, a local sheik, Hekmat Mumtaz al-Baz, traveled to Baghdad in September to meet with Iraq's defense minister and ask for help, said one of the sheik's aides, Waleed al-Samarrai. A few weeks after the visit, the sheik was shot dead by Qaeda gunmen in his yard.

The account was confirmed by a member of the tribe, and a senior Iraqi intelligence official in Baghdad. Mr. Samarrai spoke in an interview in Al Wasat Hospital in Baghdad, where his brother, Salim, the sheik's bodyguard, who was wounded in a fight with Al Qaeda, was convalescing.

The tribe was furious, and its members tracked down the three men who carried out the killing. Elders from the tribe held a trial in a local farmhouse and interrogated the men for days. They said they worked for a fighter from Saudi Arabia who bankrolled the attacks, Mr. Samarrai said.

The Samarrai brothers said Al Qaeda's appeal was based less on religion than on money. The Iraqis who killed the sheik were believed to have received $500 to $1,000 for the job, and the same amount for dozens of other similar killings, Waleed al-Samarrai said. He said local insurgents had changed allegiances, lured away by Al Qaeda's money.

Members of the tribe swept the town and arrested 17 people they suspected were associated with the sheik's killing. In one house raid, the tribe found men from Sudan, Morocco, Afghanistan and Saudi Arabia, a member of the tribe said.

Al Qaeda's fighters struck back during the tribe's offensive. A foreign Arab believed to be a Saudi wearing in a suicide belt blew himself up at the sheik's funeral, killing one guest and wounding two, said Salim al-Samarrai, who said he witnessed the attack.

As a lesson to all those associated with the sheik's death, the tribe staged a public killing. While the sheik's father watched, men with machine guns shot the three men who carried out the assassination, the Samarrai brothers said.

"Someone from outside the tribe should not tell us what to do," said Waleed al-Samarrai, standing next to Salim's hospital bed. "It is unacceptable for us."

Tactical Disputes

Disagreements over Al Qaeda's bloody tactics between local insurgents and Al Qaeda's fighters are as old as the war. Abu Lil, who fought in Taji in October, for example, claimed to have met with Qaeda fighters in late 2003. The militant group had just claimed responsibility for a double car bombing in Baghdad, and insurgents from the 20th Revolutionary Brigade, a nationalist group that Abu Lil belonged to at that time, were angry about the high civilian death toll.

Abu Lil, an elfin man with a cotton scarf tied around his head, talked in detail about the meeting as he sat on a couch in a house in Baghdad. The meeting was held in a farmhouse in Mosul, he said. About 25 men from Al Qaeda attended. Several appeared to be from Pakistan. Some spoke Arabic so poorly that they had to speak through a translator.

The discussion dragged on for seven hours, he said, but did not go well. The local insurgents demanded that the foreigners from Al Qaeda leave Iraq.

"They said, 'Jihad needs its victims,' " Abu Lil said. " 'Iraqis should be willing to pay the price.' "

"We said, 'It's very expensive.' "

The meeting ended abruptly, and Abu Lil and his associates walked out, feeling powerless and angry.

"I wished I had a nuclear bomb to attack them," he said. "We told them, 'You are not Iraqis. Who gave you the power to do this?' "

It took two more years for Sunni Arab sentiment to turn against the militants. As the Iraqi democratic political process began, including elections and the drafting of a new constitution, there was a widespread feeling among Sunnis that they were being left behind. Last January, Sunnis boycotted an election, giving them few seats in the new Parliament, and leaving them out of the drafting of a new constitution.

In the predominantly Sunni town of Dhuluiya, north of Baghdad, local residents blamed insurgents for their isolation. In the days leading up to a vote on the constitution, they went to the resistance and demanded they let people vote.

DOJ_NMG_0009212

"All of the Sunnis were angry at the resistance," said a resident of Dhuluiya. "People realized, if we do not take part it, then we will lose the government. So the resistance agreed. They said, 'We will protect you from anyone who tries to attack you.' "

Emboldened by the promise of protection by the resistance, clerics from five local mosques encouraged their congregations to vote, even sending out people to put up posters about the election.

The excitement over the vote spurred Al Qaeda into action. At night, men put up their own posters threatening, "He who votes will be beheaded." Then, two days before the Oct. 15 referendum, a group of Qaeda fighters confronted an imam in one of the local Sunni mosques and lectured him about how voting contradicted the Koran. According to the imam, who spoke on condition of anonymity out of concern for his safety, two of the men appeared from their accents to be from Algeria and Syria. They vowed to kill anyone who removed their posters.

"Why are you driving the troubles into our town?" the Sunni cleric said he asked the men. "If you want jihad, the U.S. military is there."

Imams from five Sunni mosques tore down the Qaeda posters wherever they could find them.

"I myself tore those into pieces," the Sunni cleric said.

Al Qaeda got the message. On election day, Dhuluiya's voters streamed into polling places. The streets were quiet, with only a single attack on a polling center.

"All of them voted," the resident said. "All of Dhuluiya. There was no one sitting in his house."

Invisible Boundaries

Two and a half years into the American occupation, the towns and villages south of Baghdad are divided among the insurgent groups like gang territory in big American cities. The arrangement is largely invisible to American troops who patrol the towns, the insurgents said in interviews. But guerrillas themselves say they must seek permission to travel through towns their groups do not control.

Abu Marwa, a 32-year-old guerrilla leader from Yusifiya, a city south of Baghdad, told of a blood feud with Al Qaeda in a village the group controlled called Karagol, south of Baghdad.

Bookish and soft-spoken, wearing jeans and a button-down shirt, Mr. Marwa told of life inside the insurgency during two days of interviews in Baghdad. He said he might never have clashed with Al Qaeda, but the group's sectarian war against Shiites clashed with his loyalty to a Shiite relative of his the group had kidnapped and tortured.

"It's more than crazy when you want to hit Al Qaeda," said Mr. Marwa, who said he was a fighter for a local cell called Thunder. "Even the network of the resistance couldn't think of doing such an act."

According to Mr. Marwa's story, the feud with Al Qaeda began on Oct. 13, when a car full of gunmen he said appeared to be Syrian kidnapped his relative and took him to Karagol, which is in territory he said was controlled by Al Qaeda.

"Karagol is the place where Al Qaeda is based in the region," said an Iraqi Army lieutenant based in the area. He spoke on the condition of anonymity, because he was not authorized to talk to the press.

"There has not been a command to go into Karagol," he said. "There are no government forces there. Now it's fully under control of the terrorists."

For the next three days, Mr. Marwa searched through miles of lush farmland before he got to Karagol. When he was prevented from driving through the town by Qaeda gunmen, who shot at him on the road, he walked through orchards after dark.

He said a guide had led him to the house of a man who was known as a paid killer for Al Qaeda. The man consulted a notebook fat with names, but Mr. Marwa's relative's was not among them.

As he drew closer, a local insurgent warned him to stay away from Karagol, even if he was sure his relative was there.

" 'I advise you, if you know he's with Al Qaeda, don't go there,' " Mr. Marwa recalled the man saying.

Mr. Marwa finally found his relative in the local morgue. His legs bore drill holes revealing bone. His jaw had slid off to one side of his head, and his nose was broken. Burns marked his body. His knees were raw, as if he had been dragged.

"I was totally crazy," Mr. Marwa recalled. "A mad man was more rational than me."

Enlisting the most trusted members of his cell, Mr. Marwa set out to take revenge. They tracked down two Syrian members of Al Qaeda, and in late October laid out an intricate plan for an ambush. They killed them on a country road as they drove out of town, and took their kaffiyeh, or headdresses, to the dead relative's wife, Mr. Marwa said.

DOJ_NMG_0009213

"After many meetings, we decided to terminate them," he said.

Despite such tensions, the Americans face significant challenges in trying to exploit the split. "It is against my beliefs to put my hand with the Americans," said an Iraqi member of the Islamic Army who uses the nom de guerre Abu Omar.

Still, he said in an interview in a house in Baghdad, he allowed himself a small celebration whenever a member of Al Qaeda fell to an American bullet. "I feel happy when the Americans kill them," he said.

Efforts Intensify To Train Iraqi Police (CSM)

By Charles Levinson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD - Visiting congressmen stepped out of armored cars Tuesday into the mud of Camp Dublin, home to the Iraqi police's elite special forces unit. US Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, the ex-linebacker responsible for training 200,000 Iraqi police, greeted them and assured the lawmakers that his Iraqi under- studies will soon be in charge here.

"We'll have these forces trained by the end of 2006," dubbed the year of the police by US officials, "and I have full confidence that they will begin to assume control of security in Iraq," he says.

The police have become a new priority, as the US begins turning over more security control to Iraq. Scrutiny of the police intensified after the discovery of secret jails and the torture of Sunni Arab prisoners.

Shiite control of the police force is also complicating efforts to persuade Iraq's factions to put their divisions behind them and to form a government of national unity following the Dec. 15 parliamentary vote.

On Tuesday, President Bush addressed the issue in a speech to the Veterans of Foreign Wars. He called on Iraqi police "not to address old grievances by taking justice into their own hands.... That's unacceptable to the United States government."

Meanwhile the insurgency rages on, singling out police on an almost daily basis. Wednesday, an attack killed two. On Monday, a pair of suicide bombers killed 29 at the Interior Ministry, and last week 70 recruits were killed in Ramadi. All told, some 3,500 Iraqi police have been killed in the past 16 months. Charges of US interference

In the face of these attacks, US moves to reign in the Iraqi police are irking Ministry of Interior officials and leading Shiite politicians, who seem eager to step up the fight. They say they are ready to do so without US support.

"There is huge interference from the American forces with the work of the Ministry of Interior in a way that does not allow the security forces to deal with security," says Jalal al-Din Saghir, a leading Shiite preacher and member of parliament.

At the heavily guarded Interior Ministry, Mohammed Ali al-Khafaggy, the minister's deputy, says he could "put tens of thousands of police in Ramadi and Diala within hours," referring to two insurgent hot spots. "But we are not doing this because of political circumstances.... We can't defeat the terrorists unless the security forces are allowed to do what has to be done," he says.

Mr. Khafaggy's heavily secured ministry rises up from behind concrete walls and razor wire. It has an estimated 152,000 police on its payrolls, among them border guards, highway patrol, traffic cops, and special paramilitary units. With that number expected to reach 300,000, the Ministry of Interior is one of the country's most coveted posts.

But the Shiite-controlled ministry and its growing cadres of police are widely believed to be infiltrated by the Badr militia, the armed wing of the main Shiite party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI). Ministry officials vehemently deny this. "Where is the evidence?" Mr. Khafaggy asks.

But for many Iraqis, seeing police in the streets of Baghdad continues to provide little comfort.

"The police are just a bunch of gangs rolling around in pickup trucks waving Kalashnikovs," says Subhi Nazem Tawfiq, an ex-Iraqi general and the author of 14 books on Arab politics, history, and militaries. After the fall of Saddam Hussein he worked with US officials to reestablish the Ministry of Defense. "These are people charged up with militant Shiism," he says of many within the police ranks. "They hate Fallujah people, they hate people from Mosul, they hate Sunni [Arabs]."

Inside her dimly lit home in a mixed Sunni Arab-Shiite neighborhood of New Baghdad, a Sunni Arab mother huddles on the floor, weeping as she tells how police dragged her 23-year-old son from his bed at 1:30 a.m. last June.

DOJ_NMG_0009214

She searched for him for six months. Finally, 10 days ago she found his picture with a police report at a Baghdad morgue. The report was dated June 17, the day of the arrest. It said simply that an unidentified body had been found strangled, wrists bound, in a roadside ditch not far from her home.

"I cannot look at [the police]," she says, choking on her anger. "The hate inside these policemen, this is what made them kill my son."

As leading Shiites rattle their sabers in response to last week's death toll (it was one of the country's deadliest weeks), Sunni Arab leaders fear retaliation by police. They have already begun to take a stand against police dragnets and alleged excesses. The Sunni Arab fundamentalist Iraqi Islamic Party says they have put together armed groups to protect neighborhoods targeted by Iraqi police.

"It's a necessary response to the massacres that have occurred in a number of neighborhoods," says Amr al-Jaboori, a member of the party's human rights committee. "The police should protect citizens, not terrorize them." Recruiting more Sunnis

While the US is giving Iraqi police a greater role in putting down the insurgency, doing so may be counterproductive to American goals if the police continue to be viewed as simply a glorified Shiite militia.

The US says it's dealing with that issue by recruiting more Sunni Arabs, Turkomen, and Kurds to the police. It also plans to increase the emphasis on human rights in the 10-week police academy and partner US battalions with police special forces units.

"These recruits get 32 hours of human rights and rule-of-law training," Major General Peterson tells the concerned congressmen. "I've been serving for 34 years, and I don't have 32 hours of human rights training."

He points to one of his Iraqi protégés, Colonel Nomaan, the Iraqi commander of the police force's Emergency Response Unit. "This unit is representative of the Iraqi population."

But Nomaan admits that for now, at least, his unit is an exception. "I insisted on this unit being ethnically balanced, but other leaders aren't like me," he says. "It won't get better as long as we keep distributing ministerial posts based on sect, and not on competency."

Key Shiite Backs Away From Charter Accord (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 11 -- Iraq's most influential Shiite politician said Wednesday that he would not allow a new government to "change the essence" of the country's constitution, despite a promise made to Sunni Arabs that it would be opened to major revision.

The promise of future changes to the constitution had been a key concession to encourage Sunni Arabs to join the political process in Iraq and stop violence. Last summer, Sunnis were ready to walk away from the negotiating table as the country's ruling Shiite and Kurdish coalition wrote a constitution that allowed the creation of strong regional provinces.

In a last-minute deal negotiated under heavy pressure from U.S. diplomats, the three groups agreed that the draft constitution would be put to a national referendum in October as planned but would be open to change for four months after a new government was formed early this year.

But Abdul Aziz Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the most powerful Shiite party in the ruling coalition, appeared to back away from the constitutional compromise Wednesday.

"The first principle is not to change the essence of the constitution," Hakim said in a speech given during the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, according to the Associated Press. "It is our responsibility to form Baghdad provinces and southern Iraq provinces."

A spokesman for Hakim's party confirmed the remarks. "The major points in the constitution were agreed to by all the parties that participated in the drafting of the constitution," Haitham Husseini, the spokesman, said in an interview. "As for changes in the powers, some points or details, these are open to negotiation. However, the main principles which were agreed to by all sides, and approved by the people in a popular referendum, they cannot be touched."

DOJ_NMG_0009215

The most difficult issue is whether Iraq will have a strong central government or a federal government composed of largely autonomous regions. The Kurds and Shiites, who live in oil-rich areas, support federalism; the Sunnis, who have little oil in the areas they dominate, fear that the country will break apart and that they will be denied a share of the oil revenue.

While it would be a blow to Sunnis if they were unable to amend the constitution, which voters approved Oct. 15, a Sunni politician said he viewed Hakim's comments as a political ploy.

"I don't know why Mr. Hakim is saying this at this time," said Alaa Makki, a senior member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the largest Sunni political party in Iraq. "It's time for reconciliation, it's time for negotiation, it's time for participation in the political process."

However, a Western diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity, said it was important "to remember that there's a lot of jockeying for political position going on. I think you have to look at the comments people are making as part of that process. Everyone is staking out their position in advance of the announcement of final election results."

Shiite Leader Rejects Big Charter Changes, Frustrating Sunnis (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 11 - Iraq's most powerful Shiite leader on Wednesday rejected making major changes to the new Constitution, diminishing Sunni Arab hopes of amending the charter to avoid being shut out of the nation's vast oil wealth.

Sunnis were reluctant to sign on to the Constitution last fall, fearing that provisions granting wide powers to autonomous regions would leave oil in the hands of Kurds in the north and Shiites in the south. Sunnis dominate in western and much of northwestern and northcentral Iraq, but the oil lies beneath Kurdistan and parts of southern Iraq that one day may be subsumed in a semi-independent region controlled by Shiites.

As a carrot for the Sunnis, the Constitution was amended before the October referendum so legislators elected in the national voting last month could change it with a two-thirds vote. Some Shiites also voiced a willingness to negotiate with Sunnis on amendments.

But on Wednesday Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, vowed to give no ground on crucial parts of the Constitution.

"We will stop anyone who tries to change the Constitution," said Mr. Hakim, whose party has close ties to Iran. "Many of the people who voted for us were promised federalism in the south," he said, referring to the form of government allowing for semiautonomous regions. He said Kurds, who joined Shiites to form the current ruling coalition, "agree with us about this condition, and we will continue our strategic coalition with our Kurdish brothers."

The speech was Mr. Hakim's latest hard-line statement directed at Sunni Arabs, whom Shiites accuse of fomenting violence to improve bargaining leverage in the new government. While he previously signaled unwillingness to reopen major constitutional issues, Mr. Hakim's belligerent declarations are sure to anger Sunnis hopeful of carving out a meaningful role in the government.

Yet it may not be that simple. While Sunni Arabs boycotted elections a year ago, they turned out heavily last month and are thought to have won about 20 percent of the seats in Parliament. A Western diplomat in Baghdad said Shiites and Kurds probably had not won enough seats on their own to reach the two-thirds majority needed to appoint an executive branch.

So while Shiites have enough votes to block constitutional changes, they may need to draw in parties other than the Kurds to obtain a two-thirds governing majority. If Sunnis are called on to make up that difference, amending the Constitution is sure to top their bargaining list.

Desperate to deflate the Sunni-dominated insurgency, United States officials are pushing Shiites to accept constitutional changes. The American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, wrote in The Wall Street Journal on Monday that the charter "will likely need to be amended in the coming year to broaden support." He cited compromises "on some substantive issues such as federalization in Arab regions of Iraq."

Sunnis Can't Change Government Structure (WT/AP)

By Bushra Juhi

DOJ_NMG_0009216

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The most influential politician in Iraq issued a veiled warning yesterday to Sunni Arabs that Shi'ites would not allow substantive amendments to the country's new constitution, including to the provision that keeps the central government weak in favor of strong provincial governments.

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, said in an address in honor of the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha that provincial governments will remain strong in the constitution, which can be amended after the next government is installed.

"The first principle is not to change the essence of the constitution. This constitution was endorsed by the Iraqi people," he said.

Sunni Arabs place great stock in their ability to change the constitution, one of the reasons Sunni politicians urged the minority to turn out in large numbers for the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections.

They want a stronger central government because the constitution now bestows most power -- including control over oil profits -- on provincial governments. The Shi'ites in the south and the Kurds in the north control most of Iraq's oil. There are few oil reserves in central Iraq, where Sunnis live.

To win their support for the new constitution, which was approved in an Oct. 15 vote, Sunni Arabs were promised they could propose amendments to it during the first four months of the new parliament's tenure. The new parliament is expected to be seated at the end of February. Amendments require two-thirds approval in parliament and a majority in a national referendum.

There was limited violence yesterday. A roadside bomb exploded next to a police patrol outside Samarra, about 60 miles north of Baghdad, killing two policemen, police said.

Iraqi police found seven bodies shot in the head, with their legs and hands bound, in a sewer in eastern Baghdad, police said.

Iraqis nationwide celebrated the opening of the three-day Eid al-Adha celebration Tuesday with visits to relatives, food and sweets. Lambs were slaughtered, and food was distributed to the poor.

Shi'ites and Sunni Arabs also called for an end to the bloodshed that has wracked Iraq since last month's elections.

"This Eid is a happy day for all Muslims, especially Iraqis. But it comes after painful events that happened in Karbala and Ramadi," said Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shi'ite.

He referred to the killings of more than 120 people in suicide bombings last week in the Shi'ite holy city of Karbala and at a police recruiting center in Ramadi.

Violence has increased since the Dec. 15 elections, with at least 498 Iraqis and 54 U.S. forces killed.

Mr. al-Jaafari said that despite the violence, Iraq had made significant advances in 2005, citing a large turnout in the elections as one of the biggest achievements.

Mr. al-Jaafari's governing United Iraqi Alliance emerged with a large lead in the elections, far ahead of a Kurdish coalition and Sunni Arab groups, but without the majority it will need in the 275-member parliament to avoid a coalition.

An Incendiary Threat In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician has just dealt a huge blow to American-backed efforts to avoid civil war through the creation of a new, nationally inclusive constitutional order. That leader, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, has turned his back on the crucial pledge, made before last October's constitutional referendum, that the new charter would be open to substantial amendment by the newly elected Parliament. Instead, Mr. Hakim, who runs the dominant, Iranian-supported fundamentalist party, now says no broad changes should be made. In particular, he defends the current provisions allowing substantial autonomy for the oil-rich Shiite southeast.

The vote count from last month's parliamentary election is not yet complete. But it is already certain that the Shiite religious alliance, in which Mr. Hakim is the most important leader, will hold enough seats to block any constitutional changes it doesn't like. The only recourse is to persuade Mr. Hakim to respect that earlier pledge.

Mr. Hakim's latest position is a prescription for a national breakup and an endless civil war. It is also a provocative challenge to Washington, which helped broker the original promise of significant constitutional changes. On the basis of that promise, Sunni voters turned out in large numbers, both for the constitutional referendum and for last month's parliamentary vote. Drawing Sunni voters into democratic politics is vital to creating the stable, peaceful Iraq that President Bush has declared to be the precondition for an American military withdrawal. The most unacceptable defect of the new constitution for Sunnis is its provision for radically decentralizing national political and economic power, dispersing it to separate regions.

In a quirk of geology, most of Iraq's known oil deposits lie under provinces dominated by Shiites or Kurds, while the Sunni provinces of the west and north are resource-poor and landlocked. Iraq as a whole is rich enough to support all of its people relatively comfortably. But a radically decentralized Iraq would leave the Sunnis impoverished, aggrieved and desperate, driving them into the arms of radical Sunni groups in neighboring lands.

Although Sunnis are a minority in Iraq, they are an overwhelming majority in the Arab world. An irreconcilable split between Iraq's Shiites and Sunnis would leave the Shiites even more dependent than they are now on Iran and American troops.

Constitutional changes are needed in other areas as well, especially in regard to women's rights and the overly broad prohibitions against former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party. But decentralization is the most dangerously explosive issue right now. Mr. Hakim seems perversely determined to inflame it.

South Korean Businessman Denied Bail In Oil-for-food Case (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano

AP, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON - A South Korean businessman accused of accepting millions of dollars from Iraq in the U.N. oil-for-food scandal was denied bail Wednesday and will be transferred to New York to face additional charges in the case.

Tongsun Park was arrested in Houston on Friday after being expelled from Mexico.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy said she denied Park bond since she believed he was a flight risk because of his finances, his ties to South Korea and his history of not dealing with legal problems in the United States.

Park's arrest came after new criminal charges against him were unsealed in federal court in Manhattan.

Park, a South Korean citizen, had already been charged in April with accepting millions of dollars from the Iraqi government while he operated in the United States as an unregistered agent for Iraq's effort to create the oil-for-food program.

The new charges accuse Park of agreeing in October 1992 to work on behalf of the Iraqi government with another person who is now cooperating with the U.S. government.

During a bail hearing Wednesday, Randy Schaffer, Park's attorney, argued that his client's arrest was illegal.

"The guy is picked up in Mexico against his will and brought here," Schaffer said.

Park had been traveling from Canada to Panama City, Panama, when his plane stopped in Mexico City. He was taken off the plane by Mexican immigration officials.

FBI Agent Robert Midcap testified Wednesday that a warrant for Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because the South Korean citizen had not answered the U.S. charges from April. The Mexican government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, Midcap said.

Schaffer also argued Park should not be in jail because of his health. Park, 70, is taking medication for a kidney transplant, diabetes and high blood pressure.

Federal prosecutor Melissa Annis said Park should be denied bail because he's a flight risk due to his history of trouble with the law.

In the 1970s, Park was at the center of what became known as the Koreagate scandal, in which he was accused of trying to buy influence in Congress.

"There is a history of Mr. Park not wishing to face the music in a court of law in the United States," Annis said.

Park is charged with conspiring to commit wire fraud, conspiring to act as an unregistered agent of a foreign government, and laundering the criminal proceeds derived from the crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0009218

The oil-for-food program ran from 1996 to 2003. It was created to help Iraqis cope with U.N. sanctions imposed after Saddam's 1990 invasion of Kuwait. The program let the Iraqi government sell oil to buy humanitarian goods.

Mexican Agents Nabbed Oil-for-food Suspect (/REU)

By Erwin Seba and Matt Daily

Reuters, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan 11 (Reuters) - Mexican agents acting on a U.S. warrant nabbed South Korean lobbyist Tongsun Park in Mexico City, then accompanied him to Houston to face a conspiracy charge linked to corruption in the U.N. oil-for-food program for Iraq, an FBI agent said on Wednesday.

Park's lawyer, Randy Schaffer, tried to get bail for Park and complained that the detention was improper, but in a hearing U.S. Magistrate Frances Stacy refused his request, meaning the 70-year-old suspect will remain behind bars.

Park, who was arrested on Friday, will be flown to New York to face a single count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, acting as unregistered foreign agent and money laundering, for which he could face up to five years in jail and a $250,000 fine if convicted.

"I don't think it was legal to deliver him here," Schaffer said to reporters after the hearing.

FBI agent Robert Midcap testified that the Mexican government learned of the warrant for Park through Interpol and detained him at the Mexico City airport, where he was making a stopover on a flight from Canada to Panama.

Midcap said Mexican agents then flew with Park on a Continental Airlines flight to Houston, where U.S. authorities arrested him.

A Mexican government source confirmed the arrest was made by Mexican agents and that Park was then deported to the United States.

Schaffer said Park was flown to Houston against his will, and questioned Midcap about whether it was a U.S. or Mexican decision to deport him.

"No, sir. It was the Mexican government that expelled him," Midcap said. "That was the government's decision, the Mexican government's decision."

FLIGHT RISK

Park is accused of receiving at least $2 million in cash from the Iraqi government under Saddam Hussein to influence the scandal-tainted, now-defunct U.N operation.

The $67 billion program was set up in 1995 to let Iraq sell oil to buy civilian goods for its people living under U.N. sanctions after the Kuwait invasion in 1990.

U.S. and U.N investigations have since revealed lobbyists, U.N. and Iraqi officials enriched themselves through kickbacks to arrange the oil sales.

U.S. prosecutors on Wednesday argued that Park should not receive bail because he is a flight risk.

But Schaffer said he is old and in ill-health. Park has high blood pressure, diabetes and kidney transplant. Schaffer says he is also the only person linked to the scandal to be held behind bars.

Several other defendants, including Houston oilman Oscar Wyatt, are facing criminal charges in New York in connection with the oil-for-food program.

Park first gained notoriety in the 1970s as a lobbyist who bestowed hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts on U.S. Congress members as part of the influence-peddling scandal dubbed "Koreagate."

The indictment of Park, released on Friday, refers to attempts to buy the influence of two officials, who were not named.

A U.N.-established investigation of the program, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker, accused Park and another man of trying bribe former U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

The report said there was no evidence Boutros-Ghali knew of the attempt or received any money.

The Volcker panel also found that Park invested $1 million in 1997 in a Canadian company linked to the son of Maurice Strong, a Canadian businessman and Secretary-General Kofi Annan's advisor on North Korea. But there was no evidence Strong was involved in any wrongdoing.

Oil-for-Food Suspect, Ailing, Faces Arraignment In New York (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan. 11 - A federal judge ordered an ailing South Korean businessman, Tongsun Park, held without bail on Wednesday, arguing that he posed a flight risk after his arrest here last week on a charge of illegally operating as an agent for Iraq in the United Nations oil-for-food program.

Magistrate Judge Frances Stacy also approved Mr. Park's transfer to New York, where he faces arraignment in federal court. Agents from the F.B.I. arrested Mr. Park here last Friday after Mexican immigration officials apprehended him at Mexico City's airport on the basis of an Interpol notice, Justice Department officials said.

The Mexican officials put Mr. Park on a commercial flight to Houston, accompanied by F.B.I. agents, said Melissa Annis, an assistant United States attorney. Ms. Annis argued for Mr. Park to be detained without bail, citing his history of legal problems in the United States and his financial means. Mr. Park was carrying $45,000 in cash at the time of his apprehension in Mexico, Ms. Annis said.

Mr. Park, 70, was a central figure in a Congressional bribery scandal in the 1970's that involved payments funneled through Mr. Park to American lawmakers from South Korea's national intelligence service. Although Mr. Park cooperated with United States officials in their handling of that scandal, federal prosecutors said he had avoided arrest and several requests to testify in the oil-for-food investigation.

An indictment secured by the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York charged Mr. Park last April with conspiracy for illegally accepting $2 million from Saddam Hussein's government to serve as the Iraqi government's liaison with United Nations officials.

Randy Schaffer, a lawyer for Mr. Park, said his client was being treated unfairly, in that other people arrested in the case had been freed on bail, including wealthy individuals like Oscar S. Wyatt, the Texas oilman accused of paying kickbacks to Mr. Hussein's government. Mr. Schaffer also said Mr. Park's apprehension in Mexico was improper, because he was expelled against his will to the United States and not to his home nation, South Korea.

Mexican officials seized Mr. Park before he was to embark on a flight to Panama City, said Ms. Annis, the federal prosecutor, though it was not clear what he was planning to do in Panama.

The swift cooperation by Mexican authorities in delivering Mr. Park comes at a time of tense relations with the United States on immigration issues. Mr. Park is believed to have strong business ties in Central America and the Caribbean, in addition to South Korea and Taiwan.

Mr. Park communicated with Iraqi officials in the 1990's by telephone from a residence in the Dominican Republic, according to a report last September by the oil-for-food investigating committee headed by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman. Citing a business partner of Mr. Park, the same report said he went by the title "Ambassador Park" in Washington social circles, after purchasing the title of ambassador from a Nicaraguan official for about $150,000.

Mr. Park appeared in federal court on Wednesday wearing long underwear beneath the orange garb of the county jail, where he was transferred from a federal facility over the weekend to take kidney medication under the supervision of a doctor. Mr. Park said through his lawyer that he had recently undergone a kidney transplant, and was being treated for diabetes and high blood pressure.

Oil-for-Food Suspect 'kidnapped' (TIMES)

By James Bone

The Times (UK), January 12, 2006

A KEY figure in the United Nations' Oil-for-Food scandal claims that he was "kidnapped" by US authorities investigating possible pay-offs to top UN officials.

Tongsun Park, a well-connected Korean businessman who has been accused of trying to bribe the former UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali, found himself in jail after he was arrested at Houston airport on Friday. He had spent many months as a fugitive and his arrest provided an unexpected boost for the FBI inquiry into UN corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0009220

But Mr Park's lawyer, Randy Schaffer, said his client never intended to travel to the United States. At a bail hearing yesterday, he argued that the arrest was illegal. He said that Mr Park had been travelling from Canada to Panama, but was taken off the plane when his flight stopped in Mexico City. "The guy is picked up in Mexico against his will and brought here," Mr Schaffer said.

Robert Midcap, an FBI agent, testified that a warrant for Mr Park's arrest had been circulated by Interpol because he had not answered the US charges from April. The Mexican Government saw the Interpol warrant and sent him back to the United States, he said.

Mr Park, a central figure in the "Koreagate" bribery scandal in Washington in the 1970s, is charged with acting as an unregistered foreign agent in the United States for Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq.

Prosecutors say that he was recruited to provide a back-channel to UN officials who set up and administered the Oil-for-Food programme, which allowed Iraq to sell limited quantities of oil to fund humanitarian imports. According to the criminal complaint, Mr Park received at least $2 million (£1.12 million) in cash to approach two unnamed, high-ranking UN officials.

Court papers say that the Iraqi Government signed two agreements in 1996 to make payments of $5 million to an account in London and $10 million to an account in the Channel Islands, contingent on Baghdad agreeing the terms of the Oil-for-Food programme with the UN. The allegations raise questions about whether the $64 billion UN scheme was corrupted from the start.

The two UN officials are not named in court papers. But a UN inquiry said that Mr Park's contacts were Dr Boutros Ghali, then the UN Secretary-General, and Maurice Strong, a top aide at the time to the present UN chief, Kofi Annan. The inquiry found no evidence that Dr Boutros Ghali received any money from Mr Park. Mr Strong received a $1 million investment in a failing company in 1997 while serving as Mr Annan's adviser on UN reform, but he says that this was a normal business transaction.

Mr Park's application for bail was rejected yesterday because prosecutors identified him as a "flight risk" who had been in trouble with the law before.

German Spies Aided U.S. Attempt To Kill Hussein In Aerial Attack (LAT)

By Bob Drogin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the battle of Baghdad raging on April 7, 2003, an intelligence tip was rushed to a special Pentagon targeting team: Saddam Hussein and his two sons had been spotted near a chicken restaurant in the city's wealthy Mansour district.

Less than 45 minutes later, a B-1 bomber obliterated the site with four satellite-guided bombs, leaving a deep crater and at least a dozen dead. The Iraqi ruler, it soon became clear, was not among them.

An Iraqi informant provided the initial tip. But U.S. officials now say confirmation came from an unusual source: two German military intelligence operatives who stayed in a Baghdad safe house after Berlin had closed its embassy.

The Germans drove by the restaurant and saw a convoy of armored vehicles with dark windows, like those used by the Iraqi strongman, parked outside. Germany's Federal Intelligence Service, known as the BND, quickly passed the report to the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, which was part of the targeting team.

The previously undisclosed role of German intelligence in the widely reported attempt to decapitate the Iraqi regime highlights how the CIA and the Pentagon secretly relied on German and other foreign spy services for critical information on Iraq even as the intelligence agents' governments fiercely opposed the Bush administration's drive toward war.

That behind-the-scenes cooperation forms the backdrop as Germany's new chancellor, Angela Merkel, arrives here today on her first official visit. Officials said she aims to repair U.S.-German relations that were badly strained when her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, publicly broke with the White House over Iraq.

U.S. officials said Merkel, 51, will meet President Bush on Friday after a night in the presidential guest quarters across from the White House. The two leaders will discuss terrorism, Iran's nuclear program, Israel's leadership void and other mutual concerns, officials said.

Germany has been roiled in recent months by reports that the Bush administration has maintained secret prisons for suspected terrorists somewhere in Europe, and by public anger over the CIA's use of "extraordinary renditions," in which suspects are secretly snatched and transported to third countries, including some known to practice torture.

In a meeting with Merkel in Berlin last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice discussed the case of German citizen Khaled Masri, who alleges he was mistakenly abducted from Macedonia by U.S. operatives in 2003 and detained for five months, mostly in Afghanistan, on suspicion of terrorism ties. In a lawsuit filed in Virginia, Masri alleges he was tortured during his imprisonment.

Merkel, who in November became Germany's first female chancellor, clearly hasn't forgotten the issue. On Monday, she called for Washington to close its military prison for terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. She told the German newsmagazine Der Spiegel that the facility "can and should not exist in the longer term. Different ways and means must be found for dealing with these prisoners."

Despite those differences, administration officials view Merkel as far more amenable to U.S. interests than Schroeder, who sharply criticized Bush and U.S. policies during his two terms in office. Merkel, who grew up behind the Iron Curtain, has vowed to restore transatlantic relations.

Since the ousting of the Taliban in 2001, Germany has sent more troops to Afghanistan than any other country except the United States, but it has refused to commit any military forces to the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq.

Though the use of U.S. military bases in Germany as critical logistical and transportation hubs for the war is an outward reminder of Germany's cooperation, the nation's role assisting U.S. intelligence and combat forces has been well hidden.

German officials acknowledged in recent interviews that they decided in December 2002 to leave a handful of operatives from the BND in Baghdad after the war began.

In some cases, the German officials said, the BND asked team members to eyeball sites in behalf of U.S. intelligence. The officials said the goal was to collect what they called "humanitarian intelligence" to help the U.S. avoid civilian targets or other potential mistakes, such as the U.S. bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade in 1999.

BND officials said their operatives reported only what they could see and did not provide bombing target coordinates or other specific target data to the Pentagon. The officials said the Germans also met with their own sources and collected other intelligence on the collapsing Iraqi regime once the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003.

"We were running an operation in Baghdad," said a senior German intelligence official. "We were not taking orders from the Americans."

Similarly, although the French government bitterly opposed the Bush administration's policies on Iraq, French intelligence supplied detailed reports to the CIA from a member of Hussein's Cabinet who was a French spy.

"He said there were no weapons of mass destruction," said a former CIA official. "So we didn't believe him."

History Lessons (WT)

The Washington Times, January 12, 2006

From op-ed by National Security Adviser Sandy Berger published Nov. 23, 1998, in the international Al Hayat:

"[T]he entire world is fed up with Iraq's continuing deception and defiance. Iraq agreed as a condition of the Gulf War cease-fire that it would disclose its weapons of mass destruction arsenal within 15 days. Instead, it has spent the better part of a decade shirking its obligations, withholding information from the inspectors, blocking their work, destroying information in plain sight. There is no clearer example than the recent discovery that Iraq produced VX -- the most deadly chemical in the world -- and loaded it into missile warheads that could be launched at any time against its neighbors. Experts from over a dozen countries have now confirmed this finding... Certainly, when it comes to a rogue regime with weapons of mass destruction and a history of using them, the United States and its friends in the Muslim world must continue to be united -- because we are all at risk."

More Body Armor Is On The Way For U.S. Troops (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009222

The Army announced yesterday that it will soon start producing 230,000 sets of side armor plates and field them over the year to soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, after a recently disclosed Pentagon study indicated that such plates could have helped prevent scores of troop deaths since 2003.

The Marine Corps has delivered 9,000 sets of the plates to Iraq, a number that will rise to about 30,000 by April, officials said yesterday. Each set of plates, together with a carrier and soft armor, costs about $450 and weighs about seven pounds, the officials said.

Army and Marine generals in charge of developing and buying equipment defended the pace at which they were getting the new side armor to troops, after a closed-door briefing yesterday on the matter on Capitol Hill. The generals briefed the Senate Armed Services Committee after lawmakers voiced concern over a classified Pentagon forensic study disclosed last week that for the first time linked gaps in upper torso protection to troop fatalities.

The scrutiny of body armor is the latest instance in which Congress has pressured the Pentagon to accelerate the distribution of protective equipment to U.S. troops -- from "uparmored" Humvees and trucks to bulletproof vests. More than 2,200 American troops have died in Iraq since March 2003, 1,741 of them in combat, according to Pentagon figures as of yesterday.

The forensic study of 401 Marines who died in combat in Iraq from March 2003 to June 2005 showed that 21 died primarily from injuries to the side of their torsos. The study, completed in August 2005 by the Office of the Armed Forces Medical Examiner, concluded that those Marines might have benefited from improved protection, such as that offered by the side plates. The findings, if applied to all U.S. combat casualties, suggest that scores of deaths might have been prevented if the new side plates had been worn.

The Marine Corps finalized contracts for the production of the side plates in mid-September and production began six weeks later, with distribution starting in November, said Col. Shawn Reinwald, director for combat equipment at the Marine Corps Systems Command in Quantico, Va. The Marine Corps commandant decided on the need for side plates in June, he said.

The Army also identified a requirement for the side plates in the past year, when Army truck drivers running convoys in Iraq asked for them, Maj. Gen. Jeffrey A. Sorenson, the Army's acquisition chief, told reporters. The Army took a design created by a commander in Iraq, minimized the plates' weight and this week determined the optimal size, according to Maj. Gen. Stephen M. Speakes, director of force development for the Army. "It's a great success," Speakes said.

The generals said the side plates are the most recent in a series of body armor upgrades that have improved the likelihood of survival for U.S. troops. But they stressed that the added armor has drawbacks because it can limit troops' mobility and raise body temperature -- a major consideration, given the 130-degree heat in which forces are fighting.

"We don't want a medieval knight. We are not going to be hoisted onto a horse," Speakes said. "All of this is a very difficult trade-off. How much is adequate?"

As a result, the new armor will be supplied to all troops, but commanders will decide case by case whether the mission requires them to wear it, Army and Marine officials said.

Army Sending Added Armor To Iraq Units (NYT)

By Michael Moss

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - Army officials said Wednesday that they had decided to send additional body armor to Iraq to protect soldiers from insurgents' attacks.

The ceramic plates now worn by most members of the military shield just some of the upper body from bullets and shrapnel, and the Army said it would buy plates that would extend this protection to the sides of soldiers. The officials spoke after a closed session of the Senate Armed Services Committee, held after The New York Times reported last week that a Pentagon study had found that extra armor could have saved up to 80 percent of the marines who died in Iraq from upper body wounds.

In at least 74 of the 93 fatal wounds that were analyzed, bullets and shrapnel struck the marines' sides, shoulders or areas of the torso where the protective plates did not reach.

DOJ_NMG_0009223

The Marine Corps, which commissioned the study in December 2004, began buying side plates in September for its 26,000 troops in Iraq. Army procurement officials said they began studying a similar move last summer after receiving requests from troops in Iraq, but were hampered by the need to supply a much larger force of 160,000 individuals.

The Army had begun supplying small quantities of side plates to soldiers much earlier in the war through its Rapid Equipping Force. Armor Works of Tempe, Ariz., which is making the plates for the marines, said it shipped 250 sets in November 2003.

Another manufacturer, the Excera Materials Group of Columbus, Ohio, said that since late 2004 it had shipped 1,000 sets of side plates to Special Forces personnel, the Air Force and individual units that used their own procurement money to buy the armor.

Citing security concerns, the Army has in recent days urged armor contractors not to disclose information about their work, even if the information is not classified, industry officials said.

"Neither you nor any of your employees are authorized to release to anyone outside your organization any unclassified information, regardless of medium, pertaining to any part of your contract," says a letter from an Army research and procurement unit that The Times obtained.

In Congress on Wednesday, Army and Marine officials defended their efforts to procure additional armor, saying they had to weigh the benefits of additional plates against adding weight and restricting mobility. Citing those concerns, Marine officials said last week that they remained reluctant to buy shoulder plates or larger plates for the chest and back.

"This is a continuous evolution," Maj. Gen. Stephen M. Speakes, the Army director of force development, said after the Senate briefing.

National Guard Troops Sue Government In Pay Dispute (REU-Y2)

By Jason Szep

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Four members of the Massachusetts National Guard filed a $73 million class-action lawsuit on Wednesday against Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military officials in a dispute over on-the-job expenses since the September 11 attacks.

The lawsuit, which also names Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, appears to be the first of its kind in the U.S. Army National Guard, which has faced heavy demands since September 11, 2001, lawyers involved in the case said.

The four men from Massachusetts and New Hampshire filed the suit in U.S. District Court on behalf of soldiers in about 300 jobs in the Massachusetts National Guard owed money for meals, car fuel, lodging and daily allowances, their lawyers said.

"The National Guard refused to reimburse millions of dollars to soldiers called for active duty following the 2001 terror attacks," John Shek, counsel for the plaintiffs, said at a news conference.

"We have found that the closer we look at this the worse the situation gets."

Officials at the National Guard were not immediately available to comment.

Thousands of soldiers in the Guard, a part-time force whose 440,000 members live civilian lives while doing periodic military training, were mobilized after the September 11 attacks to protect airports, borders and other possible targets. Tens of thousands also have been deployed to fight in Iraq and Afghanistan.

SYSTEM FOR EXPENSES

At the heart of the suit is the system of paying expenses to Guard troops who say they traveled hundreds of miles (km) and paid for their own food, car fuel and lodging to perform their duties.

Shek said while National Guard soldiers across the country were paid under federal orders known as "title 10" that included daily allowances, hundreds of troops in Massachusetts were given different orders known as "title 32" that excluded daily allowances but required the same work.

The controversy cuts to the core of the Guard's dual federal and state roles. For state missions, the governor can call on the Guard during emergencies such as storms, fires, earthquakes or civil disturbances. The U.S. president also can call on them for federal missions.

Capt. Louis Tortorella, 51, estimated he was owed $14,600 a year for the two years he worked before he retired in October 2003. He said there were about 1,000 to 1,500 Guard soldiers who worked in Massachusetts owed similar expenses.

After the September 11 attacks, Tortorella was called up to protect the Quabbin Reservoir, which supplies water to about 2.5 million people in metropolitan Boston and is about a five-hour drive each day from his home in New Hampshire.

In their complaint, the soldiers said their requests for compensation were repeatedly denied.

"It was always either shoved to the side or they turned their backs on us," said Sgt. Wayne Gutierrez, 39, who estimates he was owed at least $17,500 a year for his 2-1/2 years in the Army National Guard in Massachusetts.

Lanky Teen Driven To Become A Marine (WP)

By Nikita Stewart

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

As a teenager, Kyle W. Brown was always long and lanky -- a little too slight to be a Marine, despite a high school career in the Navy Junior ROTC, said his grandmother, Katheryn Brown.

"They said, 'You're too skinny to be a Marine,' " recalled Brown, 68. "He worked out hard for a year and a half and beefed up."

In July 2002, the Newport News, Va., teenager realized his ambition.

Last Saturday, Lance Cpl. Kyle W. Brown, 22, was fatally shot in the head by a sniper in Anbar province near Fallujah, according to the account his grandmother said Marine Corps officials gave the family. It was his second tour of duty in Iraq.

An official news release from the Department of Defense said Brown was killed "by enemy small arms fire" near Fallujah. Lance Cpl. Brett L. Lundstrom of Stafford was killed in a separate attack in the same area that day, according to the release. A spokesman for the 2nd Marine Division, 1st Lt. Barry Edwards, said that was all the information he had.

Brown and Lundstrom were assigned to the 2nd Battalion, 6th Marine Regiment, 2nd Marine Division, 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force, based at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

Brown was raised in Newport News and lived with his grandmother. He went to Heritage High School. He had a crooked smile and was so mild-mannered that his grandmother called him "Casper."

"You know, like the friendly ghost," she said during a phone interview.

Growing up, he loved ramen noodles, which he called "Roman noodles," and WarHeads sour candy. "They would light your head up. He used to like to slip me one and look at my face," Brown said.

"He was also silly. You know how teenagers can be silly," she said. "He'd come down and sit at the breakfast table in his underwear with those chicken legs. I'd say, 'Hey, put some pants on.' "

But Kyle Brown was serious about the Marines. "He kept his hair cut short," his grandmother said.

When he finally bulked up enough to make the cut and enlist, he said, "How do you like me now? I'm a Marine," Brown recalled.

She said her grandson was unusually patriotic, although he was hesitant about returning to Iraq after he left in September, she said. "First of all, we are Americans. Freedom is not free," she said.

The family hopes to have visitation this weekend in Poquoson, Va., and will have a funeral at 1 p.m. Tuesday at Arlington National Cemetery, Brown said.

Kyle Brown earned several commendations and medals, including the Iraqi Campaign, Global War on Terrorism Service and National Defense Service medals, Edwards said. Brown had been with the 2nd Battalion since February 2003, he said.

Lundstrom, 22, received medals for the Iraqi Campaign, Afghanistan Campaign, Global War on Terrorism Service and National Defense Service. He joined the Marines in January 2003, Edwards said.

His family could not be located for comment.

Gonzales Will Take Part In Opening Of Center (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 11, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will make his first official appearance in St. Louis, helping on Thursday morning to open the city's new Family Justice Center.

He will be joined by U.S. Sen. Jim Talent; Diane Stuart, director of the Justice Department's Office of Violence Against Women; Catherine L. Hanaway, the U.S. attorney in St. Louis; Mayor Francis Slay and other leaders.

The Family Justice Center, a 12,000 square-foot facility at 1139 Olive Street, was funded with a $1.25 million Justice Department grant. It is billed as a one-stop resource for women and their families looking to escape domestic abuse.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

South Floridians Plead Guilty To Hedge Fund Fraud (SFBJ)

By Jim Freer

South Florida Business Journal, January 12, 2006

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida, the FBI and the Florida Office of Financial Regulation said Anthony Giordano, 29, of Boca Raton, pleaded guilty to federal securities fraud and wire fraud. They said Joseph Zumwalt, 46, of Fort Lauderdale, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in connection with the former EPG Limited Partners of Fort Lauderdale.

"Investors lost more than $1.4 million in as a result of the fraud," the U.S. Attorney's office said.

The government said the defendants admitted representing to investors, including two religious organizations, that they would invest their monies in a hedge fund administered by EPG.

Instead, the government said, Giordano converted millions of dollars for other uses, including personal gain.

Giordano also admitted to manipulating the common stock of Fort Lauderdale-based Weida Communications (Pink Sheets: WDAC) to about $5 a share, in part to facilitate the sale of Weida stock in private transactions at about $3 a share, the government said.

As part of the plea agreement, Giordano transferred more than $2 million in restitution to the U.S. District Court in Miami. The government also said he has agreed to pay $3.25 million more in restitution at sentencing.

Sentencing is scheduled for March 20 before U.S. District Court Judge William Zloch.

Giordano faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a maximum fine of $5,000 for securities fraud.

Giordano and Zumwalt each face maximum prison terms of 20 years and fines of up to $250,000 for wire fraud and for mail fraud.

SEC Losing Torchbearer On Corporate Behavior (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Alan Beller, a major figure in the Securities and Exchange Commission's drive to overhaul corporate governance, will leave the agency next month, giving SEC Chairman Christopher Cox another high-level vacancy to fill.

Mr. Beller's departure comes as the SEC is unveiling the most sweeping overhaul of executive-compensation disclosure in 14 years.

A proposed rule outlining the changes is expected to be discussed at a public hearing Tuesday, and after a public comment period it could take effect for the 2007 proxy season.

The executive-compensation proposal is the capstone for Mr. Beller, 56 years old, who joined the agency in 2002 to head its corporation-finance division.

He oversaw the implementation of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law and an update to securities-offering laws, which allow for greater communication including electronic versions of preoffering "roadshows" for investors before initial public offerings of stock.

Mr. Beller also has overseen the proposal or implementation of other rules, such as one to speed up the time companies have to file periodic reports, Internet delivery of proxies to investors, and a rule that makes it easier for foreign-based companies to deregister from U.S. reporting requirements. He also helped set up a small-business advisory committee, which is charged with providing guidance to the agency on the costs of regulations to small businesses.

He will "be recognized as one of the giants of the SEC of all time," Mr. Cox said.

Mr. Beller's departure has been rumored for months amid speculation that he was waiting until the executive-compensation proposal was completed. He said he will return to private practice, but will stay until February to help with a transition.

While Mr. Cox has said filing vacant spots is an organizational priority, he has yet to staff directors for the divisions of market regulation, investment management and chief accountant. He also needs to name the head of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. Agency insiders have said the delay in filling positions has created some tension as it has slowed decision-making on some issues.

The openings afford Mr. Cox an opportunity to set a tone with his selections. Earlier this month, he named former Latham & Watkins colleague Brian Cartwright as general counsel. Mr. Cartwright, a former rocket scientist, is expected to start later this month.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Sources: Two Lawmakers Could Face Charges In Abramoff Probe (CNN)

By Kelli Arena and Kevin Bohn

CNN.com, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Up to a half dozen people, including two members of Congress, could face charges after high-powered lobbyist Jack Abramoff's plea deal with the Justice Department, sources with knowledge of the investigation tell CNN.

Abramoff has been cooperating with Justice Department prosecutors and FBI agents for several months in their investigation of his dealings, including his allegations of exchanging gifts for political favors.

Authorities have focused on about 20 people who possibly committed wrongful acts, government sources have previously told CNN. The number is a moving target as new information comes in.

Sources with knowledge of the investigation say at least two members of Congress are under scrutiny as part of the ongoing investigation. One is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who sources say was the person identified in Abramoff's plea agreement as the official who took action for Abramoff after receiving from him such things as a golf trip to Scotland.

Ney has steadfastly denied wrongdoing, has pledged to cooperate with the investigation and has said he is confident he will be cleared.

The sources would not identify the other member, and they told CNN that no charges appear imminent.DeLay staffers under scrutiny

Also under scrutiny, the sources say, are some current and former congressional staffers, including at least two people who used to work for then-House Majority Leader Rep. Tom DeLay. DeLay, R-Texas, and Abramoff had a long working relationship.

Investigators are also examining the activities of some officials at the Interior Department and the General Services Administration, sources tell CNN. One former GSA official, David Safavian, was indicted in October on charges of obstructing a GSA proceeding, obstructing a U.S. Senate proceeding and making false statements in connection with the investigation.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion charges January 3 and agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors. About 30 to 40 FBI agents and other staff are working full-time on this investigation, which officials have said is a high priority for the government. (Full Story)

Legal experts have said while there may be some evidence of ethical violations, it is very hard to prosecute government officials for acting on a bribe, because it is standard operating procedure for lobbyists to do favors for those in power hoping to get something in return. They say it is very hard to bring a court case to prove someone acted as a direct result of a bribe.

An E-mail Trail Of Money And Influence (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Lobbyist Jack Abramoff was, in his own word, "jazzed."

It was Sept. 25, 2001, and the night before he'd attended a small Georgetown dinner given by a Republican environmental group. He'd hobnobbed there with Secretary of the Interior Gale Norton and Deputy Secretary Steven Griles - two of the most important officials in the government, as far as Mr. Abramoff's Indian tribe clients were concerned.

Now it was the day after, and time for a little relationship cultivation.

"The event last night was outstanding!!" he wrote in an 11:54 a.m. e-mail to Italia Federici, president of the group, the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy. "Bravo! ... I have a fantastic box at the Redskins stadium. How about you come this Sunday and see it (invite Steve to come with his family also), and we'll all discuss my doing a fund raiser there for you guys?

"Let me know as soon as you can ... I think [Attorney General John] Ashcroft and his guys will also be there. 1PM game," Abramoff concluded.

The case of Jack Abramoff, disgraced super-lobbyist, provides an unprecedented look at the way Washington really works.

That doesn't mean everyone on K Street is corrupt, as Abramoff and his former partner, public relations consultant Michael Scanlon, now have admitted they were. The pair's "Gimme Five" scheme, in which Abramoff steered business to Mr. Scanlon in return for a 50 percent kickback, was unique - and felonious.

But US investigations of Abramoff and Scanlon produced pointillistic detail about their daily political activities, much of which were perfectly legal. Hundreds of pages of e-mails and congressional testimony released by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs trace the pair as they scrabble for access, scratch backs, beg for money, and dole out contributions in return.

It's D.C. as it is, a Vanity Fair of skyboxes, name-dropping, and $130 Sushi Taro lunches. Few lobbyists have their own restaurant, as Abramoff did. But many might relate to that twinge of panic when it's the end of the month, and the checks don't seem to be rolling in.

"Our pool is getting shallow - we need to reload my man!" Scanlon e-mailed Abramoff in September 2002.

Let's start with what might be called The Great Circle of Influence. It's a basic procedure whereby lobbyists obtain access for their clients, and it's well illustrated by the connections that occurred at the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy (CREA) dinner on Sept. 24, 2001.

There's no evidence that either the CREA group or any of its officials have done anything illegal in conjunction with Abramoff. Ms. Federici strongly defended her innocence in an appearance before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee last November, saying she had been subject to Abramoff's manipulations.

But in 2001, with the Bush administration still new, Federici held a card of value: Top GOP officials would show up if she asked. Secretary Norton had helped found the group, and Mr. Griles was a friend. So both agreed to attend when Federici invited them to a fundraising dinner.

"Just heard back from Interior and the date for the dinner is Monday, September 24th," Federici e-mailed Abramoff in late August 2001. "Steve is personally inviting everyone from Interior and talking with them about the dinner so I expect a wonderful turnout ..."

Abramoff, for his part, controlled something that the GOP environmental group needed: cash. Most of his Indian tribe clients agreed to sign on as trustees of CREA, at a cost of $50,000 each. Among the perks for trustees was an invitation to the CREA dinner. And the Interior Department is where many issues important to Indian tribes, such as land use and casino policy, are decided.

Not that the tribes paid quickly. A few days before the dinner, Federici asked Abramoff when some of that money might flow in, as she was trying to make some payments and budget for the next quarter.

"Hi Italia. Choctaw will come through with the $50K sometime next month (they are over budget for this fiscal year, which ends at the end of the month)," Abramoff replied in a Sept. 21 e-mail. "Kickapoo is going to give in two parts of $25K each, starting next month. Chitimacha has, I believe, already sent over some (was it $10K?) ...."

DOJ_NMG_0009228

The dinner was a small one of 23 people, held in a private home near the Naval Observatory. Abramoff seemed happy afterward, as the invitation to his skybox shows. Federici replied a few days later - and asked again if the lobbyists could hurry along promised checks.

"Ahhh - the glamorous world of non-profit work - about one half step above beggar!" she concluded in an Oct. 4, 2001 e-mail to Abramoff.

In subsequent communications with Federici and others, Abramoff called CREA "our access to Norton" and talked about "our guy Steve." He bragged about quashing Interior Department policies that are against his client tribes' interests, and weighed in with his thoughts on who should get key Interior jobs.

But Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, chairman of the Indian Affairs committee, has said the panel has found no evidence that Norton was aware that Abramoff was invoking her name for gain. Griles has testified that he treated Abramoff no differently than other lobbyists.

And within the e-mail trail are hints that Abramoff didn't have quite the juice he claimed. He was taken by surprise when Norton named Aurene Martin acting head of Indian Affairs in January 2003 - just the sort of thing a well-connected lobbyist should know in advance.

And by July 2003, he appeared to be out of the loop, reduced to begging for advice.

Griles "won't discuss any of my clients with me," he complained in a July 17 e-mail to Federici. "The problem is that since he won't do so, and since you are not able to chat with him now, I am left in a real dilemma. I can't deliver anything from Interior for my clients."

Another aspect of lobby life well illustrated in the Abramoff e-mails is infrastructure maintenance. As in, how to get your clients to share the bill for those must-have trappings of success, such as stadium boxes.

In May 2001, Abramoff asked Kathryn Van Hoof, chief counsel of the Louisiana Coushattas, if the tribe wanted to join some of his other clients in his sports suites program. For $185,000, Abramoff wrote in an e-mail, tribal leaders could be official cosponsors of his existing luxury boxes for D.C.-area baseball, hockey, and football venues.

This investment would translate into approximately 400 fundraising opportunities, Abramoff promised, virtually all used by members of Congress or their organizations.

"The huge leverage in doing this is that the tribe not only gets the political credit for making available the sports suite, but gets credit with the Member for all funds raised in that evening," wrote Abramoff.

Pressed by Ms. Van Hoof for more details, Abramoff said the Coushattas would be taking the place of some withdrawing Russian clients. Personal attendance is not a requirement of the deal, said the lobbyist; the Choctaws sent a representative "very rarely", his Marianas clients "never." The tribe should instead send a couple of framed items to hang on the football stadium and MCI Center walls.

"It helps when you attend, but if you are not there, we still make a big deal about you guys being their hosts and we spend a lot of time discussing the tribe," wrote Abramoff.

In Washington, clients of lobbyists are accustomed to being directed where to send large sums of money. Lists of lawmakers and organizations deemed important for the client to support are a staple lobbyist product; a number of these lists are included in the trove of Abramoff e-mails and documents.

Thus a request for an Indian tribe to pay $185,000 to allow other people to watch a football team named "Redskins" did not apparently strike the Coushattas as out of line. The tribe cut the check for the program on May 25, 2001.

Finally, if you're going to be a player in the lobby game, you've got to accept the concept of strange bedfellows. Your ally today can easily be the group that was at your throat last week.

Thus one of Abramoff's primary weapons for protecting the gambling interests of his Indian tribes was the antigambling Christian right. For at least three projects between 1999 and 2002, Abramoff enlisted the help of Ralph Reed, former executive director of the Christian Coalition and current candidate for Georgia lieutenant governor.

DOJ_NMG_0009229

The logic went this way: Use opponents of gambling to stamp out new gambling proposals that threaten the profits of existing casinos. And Mr. Reed enthusiastically rallied antigambling troops:

"We are opening the bomb bays and holding nothing back. If victory is possible, we will achieve it," wrote Reed in a 1999 e-mail to Abramoff regarding a campaign to kill an Alabama casino proposal for the benefit of the Mississippi band of Choctaw Indians.

But Reed and his campaign firm were expensive, prompting Abramoff to finally explode.

"He is a bad version of us! No more money for him!" the now-admitted felon e-mailed his partner Michael Scanlon in 2002.

Congressman's Ex-aide Admits Abetting Bribery (USAT)

USA Today, January 12, 2006

A former aide to Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges that he helped a congressman solicit bribes to arrange two telecommunications deals. A spokeswoman for Jefferson declined to comment.

Brett Pfeffer, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and aiding and abetting bribery of a public official. He agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and testify if needed. He could get 20 years in prison when sentenced March 31.

Pfeffer said in court that a congressman had solicited his assistance in promoting telecom deals in Nigeria and Ghana. The congressman demanded 5% to 7% of the newly formed African companies in exchange for his help promoting the deal, according to Pfeffer.

Court documents referred to the congressman only as "Representative A," but the documents said Pfeffer was his legislative aide from 1995 through 1997. Pfeffer was Jefferson's legislative aide during that period.

Rice faults Syria in assassination probe

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Syria must cooperate with an investigation into a political assassination or face possible United Nations sanctions.

U.N. investigators have been trying to interview Syrian President Bashar Assad as part of an investigation into the assassination Feb. 14 in Beirut of former Lebanon prime minister Rafik Hariri, who was an opponent of Syrian domination of his country.

"We intend to refer this matter back to the Security Council if Syrian obstruction continues," Rice said.

The U.N. probe has implicated Syria, but the Syrian government has denied the allegations.

Rice also said the United States "has grave and continuing concerns about Syria's destabilizing behavior and sponsorship of terrorism."

U.S. ready to seek sanctions against Iran

Iran made a "serious miscalculation" by moving to resume uranium enrichment, and intensive talks are underway with U.S. allies about what to do now, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said it was now "more likely than ever" that Iran would be referred to the U.N. Security Council for possible economic sanctions. Representatives from Britain, France and Germany, which with U.S. backing have been negotiating with Iran, are meeting today in Berlin to consider their next step.

Iran removed U.N. seals at research facilities Tuesday and said it would resume nuclear research after a two-year freeze. Iran says its program is to produce electricity, not bombs.

GOP leadership vote to go on as scheduled

Republican leaders of the House of Representatives rejected calls to move up the election of a new majority leader to replace Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas. DeLay had to step aside after he was indicted in September on charges related to fundraising. Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois decided to keep the leadership election as scheduled on Feb. 2.

Supporters of Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, the No. 3 Republican in the House as party whip, had called this week for holding the election before the House reconvenes Jan. 31. Blunt claims to have more support than his challenger, Ohio Rep. John Boehner, chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee.

Lieberman has broad support in poll

DOJ_NMG_0009230

Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., has lost some support because of his backing of the Iraq war, but 64% of voters in his state believe he should be re-elected, a Quinnipiac University poll found.

The poll found 24% opposed his re-election and the rest didn't know. Lieberman, the 2000 vice presidential nominee and running mate of Al Gore, is seeking a fourth Senate term in November.

Lawmaker Sought Cut Of Nigerian Deal: Aide (REU-Y2)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, January 12, 2006

Louisiana Democratic Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record) sought a cut of a Nigerian telecommunications venture in return for his help setting it up, a former aide said on Wednesday as he pleaded guilty to bribery charges.

In return for lobbying Nigerian officials and arranging a loan through the U.S. Import-Export Bank, Jefferson demanded an ownership stake in a venture by two U.S. companies to provide high-speed Internet and cable television to Nigeria, former aide Brett Pfeffer said.

"The congressman told me he would require 5 to 7 percent of ownership of the company," Pfeffer told U.S. Judge T.S. Ellis. "He was to help promote the business opportunity to Nigerian officials."

Pfeffer, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery and aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a member of Congress for his role as a go-between in the deal, and agreed to cooperate in the investigation.

He faces up to 20 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

According to a statement of facts released in the plea deal, Jefferson sought to place a relative on the company's payroll at a salary of $2,500 to $5,000 per month and steer legal work toward another relative.

Jefferson also lobbied government officials in Ghana to try to set up a similar venture there, according to the plea deal.

A Jefferson spokeswoman declined to comment.

The agreement comes as Congress faces the largest corruption scandal in decades. Lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud last week and admitted that he provided golf trips, campaign contributions and other gifts to lawmakers in exchange for favorable treatment for his clients.

The Abramoff scandal so far has largely implicated Republicans like former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, but Pfeffer's agreement could make it difficult for Democrats to portray corruption as a strictly Republican issue as they try to win back control of Congress.

Jefferson is not named in Pfeffer's plea agreement, which only describes a "Representative A" who employed Pfeffer from 1995 to 1998.

News accounts from that period cite Pfeffer as Jefferson's legislative director.

According to court papers, Pfeffer's investment firm in 2004 agreed to invest $45 million to provide high-speed Internet and cable TV service to Nigeria over the existing copper telephone wires there.

Jefferson recruited Pfeffer's company for the deal and connected it to a Kentucky technology provider whose equipment would be used in the venture. As the agreement was signed he told Pfeffer he would require an ownership stake, according to court papers.

"Pfeffer understood that Representative A was soliciting a bribe in return for Representative A's official assistance in furthering the Nigerian Deal. Pfeffer .... later advised (his boss) that it was part of the cost of doing business with Representative A," the plea deal said.

Pfeffer's boss is not named in the plea deal but is described as a witness cooperating in the investigation.

Pfeffer's lawyer declined to comment after the hearing.

U.S. Assistant Attorney Mark Lytle also declined to comment.

Jefferson has held his seat since 1990, representing many New Orleans neighborhoods that were devastated by Hurricane Katrina. He serves on the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee.

An August 2005 FBI raid on his homes in Washington and New Orleans found thousands of dollars in cash stored in a freezer, according to news reports.

DOJ_NMG_0009231

Jefferson traveled to Nigeria in February 2004 and Ghana in July 2005, according to congressional campaign-finance records.

The $9,248 Ghana trip was paid for by Win Win Strategies Foundation, which did not return a call seeking comment.

A Kentucky technology company called iGate Inc. helped underwrite the Nigeria trip. News accounts indicate that iGate participated in the venture with Pfeffer's company. The company could not be reached for comment.

Ex-Aide Pleads Guilty To Bribing Congressman (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

A former aide to Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) pleaded guilty yesterday to bribing the congressman to promote high-tech business ventures in Africa.

Brett M. Pfeffer, 37, of Herndon, a former president of a McLean investment firm, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Alexandria to conspiracy to commit bribery of a public official and aiding and abetting the bribery of a public official in 2004 and 2005.

Pfeffer, who worked as Jefferson's legislative aide from 1995 to 1998, faces up to 20 years in prison. He has agreed to cooperate in the ongoing FBI probe.

The man Pfeffer bribed is referred to only as "Representative A" in court papers. But law enforcement sources and documents make clear the politician is the defendant's former employer, Jefferson, who has not been charged in the case.

Pfeffer recounted in court how his former Capitol Hill boss, in exchange for using his congressional influence in Africa, demanded a 5 to 7 percent stake in one of two new companies Pfeffer's firm was investing in. The companies were to provide high-speed Internet and cable TV service in Ghana and Nigeria.

Pfeffer said the congressman also demanded that two relatives be put on the businesses' payrolls.

Pfeffer told his boss at the investment firm, a 41-year-old woman referred to as "CW" in court papers, that such was the cost of doing business with the congressman, a court document said.

Jefferson, a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee, is co-chairman of the congressional Africa Trade and Investment Caucus and the caucuses on Brazil and Nigeria.

At one point last year, the FBI set up a sting in which Pfeffer's investment company boss recorded conversations, according to law enforcement sources who declined to be identified because the investigation is ongoing.

FBI agents also raided several locations, including Jefferson's homes in the District and New Orleans, where they found about $90,000 in cash in a freezer, sources said.

Jefferson's press secretary, Melanie Rousell, declined to comment yesterday, saying Jefferson was in the Netherlands studying flood controls.

His attorney, Michael Fawer, said he wanted to speak to Jefferson before commenting.

According to court documents, in early 2004, Pfeffer told his former boss about his job at a McLean investment company and "his search for business opportunities."

Pfeffer said Jefferson told him about an opportunity in Nigeria involving a Louisville-based company with the rights to a technology enabling copper wires to carry high-speed Internet. Pfeffer's boss eventually agreed to invest $45 million in the Nigeria venture, and Jefferson demanded a stake as well assurances his relatives would be on the payroll, according to court documents.

"Pfeffer understood that [Jefferson] was soliciting a bribe in exchange for [his] official assistance," the court document said.

The document said a similar deal was struck in 2005 regarding a Ghana deal.

In U.S. Bribe Probe Of Rep. Jefferson, Ex-Aide Sets Plea (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal prosecutors secured a guilty plea from a former legislative aide to Rep. William Jefferson in a continuing bribery investigation of the Louisiana Democrat.

Brett Pfeffer, 37 years old, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery as well as aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a member of Congress. As part of his plea in an Alexandria, Va., federal court, Mr. Pfeffer agreed to cooperate with law enforcement in the probe. He faces up to 20 years in jail and a fine of as much as $500,000 under the terms of his agreement.

The plea agreement doesn't refer to Mr. Jefferson, but rather "Representative A." Details of Mr. Pfeffer's employment for the congressman make clear who is being discussed, however.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Jefferson said the congressmen wouldn't be commenting on Mr. Pfeffer's plea.

The investigation of Mr. Jefferson is separate from the Justice Department probe into members of Congress involved with former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his business associate Michael Scanlon.

According to the filing, Mr. Pfeffer worked for Mr. Jefferson from 1995 to 1998. He stayed in touch with Mr. Jefferson after leaving his office and later become president of a Virginia investment company.

In 2004, while at this company, Mr. Pfeffer introduced the controlling partner of his firm to Mr. Jefferson. The congressman then introduced that unnamed person, who later became a cooperating witness for the government, to the founder of a Kentucky company planning to provide high-speed Internet and cable-television service to the government of Nigeria. The two agreed Mr. Pfeffer's company would invest $45 million in the Nigerian plan, according to the government's filings in the case.

Afterward, Mr. Jefferson then asked Mr. Pfeffer, as a representative of the controlling partner in his firm, to seek bribes on his behalf in exchange for the congressman using his official post to promote the Nigerian arrangement. Mr. Pfeffer, who also stood to make money if the Nigerian deal proved successful for his company, then passed along these requests by the congressman. In addition, federal prosecutors allege that Mr. Jefferson agreed to promote a similar telecommunications deal for the country of Ghana in exchange for certain payments.

Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term congressmen, is a senior member of the House Ways and Means Committee and its subcommittee on trade, and also co-chairs the Africa Trade and Investment Caucus.

Congressman Implicated In Case (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Jan. 11 (AP) - A Louisiana congressman demanded bribes in exchange for his help in promoting a pair of business deals in Africa, according to court documents filed Wednesday with a guilty plea by a former aide.

The aide, Brett Pfeffer, 37, a former legislative director to Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting bribery of a public official and conspiracy. Mr. Pfeffer could get 20 years in prison when he is sentenced March 31.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Jefferson declined to comment.

Mr. Pfeffer said in federal court here that a congressman had demanded bribes in exchange for his assistance in brokering two African telecommunications deals.

Court documents did not identify the congressman by name, but the documents make clear that Mr. Jefferson is the congressman.

According to the documents, Mr. Pfeffer was employed as a legislative assistant by the congressman from 1995 through 1997. That is when Mr. Pfeffer served as a legislative aide to Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. Pfeffer agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and testify if needed.

The conspiracy took place in 2004 and 2005, years after Mr. Pfeffer had left Mr. Jefferson's office, according to the authorities.

Mr. Pfeffer said in court that a congressman had solicited his assistance in promoting business opportunities in Nigeria and Ghana. The congressman demanded 5 percent to 7 percent of the newly formed African companies in exchange for his help promoting the deal, Mr. Pfeffer said.

Mr. Pfeffer's lawyer, Paul Knight, declined to comment.

Court records give no indication how much money Mr. Jefferson stood to receive.

The F.B.I. raided Mr. Jefferson's home in August.

Mr. Jefferson was elected to the House in 1990, becoming the first black congressman from Louisiana since Reconstruction.

Former Congressional Aide Pleads Guilty In Bribery Scandal (FOX)

FoxNews, January 11, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A former congressional aide pleaded guilty on Wednesday to charges of conspiracy to commit bribery and aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a member of Congress.

Brett Pfeffer , a former aide to Rep. William Jefferson , D-La., entered his plea deal in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va. Pfeffer faces up to 20 years in prison when sentenced March 31 and a fine of up to $500,000.

"Today this defendant admitted to a crime which, at its core, is a bribery scheme involving a public official," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher of the Criminal Division. "Such schemes deprive citizens of the integrity and honest services expected of our government. The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these illegal schemes."

Pfeffer, who worked as a legislative assistant for Jefferson from 1995 to 1998, must cooperate with officials in an ongoing investigation, according to the plea deal.

"The congressman told me of a business opportunity in Nigeria," Pfeffer told Judge T.S. Ellis. "I took that opportunity to a woman I work for. She decided to invest in this company. [Jefferson] would require 5 to 7 percent of the company for his family. In exchange, he would work with officials in Nigeria to further the business."

Prosecutor Mark Lytle said the congressman and Pfeffer traveled to Ghana in July to promote a similar deal there.

Pfeffer, 37, told officials that Jefferson accepted bribes in connection to supporting a telecommunications agreement with the Nigerian government. The court documents do not name Jefferson specifically but refer to him only as "Representative A."

The documents make obvious that Jefferson is the congressman who allegedly solicited the bribes, which was initiated by the Kentucky-based company, and received monthly payments of $2,500 to $5,000 for his family members between 2004 and August 2005.

In August, the FBI searched Jefferson's Louisiana home and Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar's Maryland residence. Jefferson was first elected to Congress in 1990, becoming the first black Louisiana congressman since Reconstruction. He was criticized after Hurricane Katrina for getting the National Guard to escort him to his flooded home at a time when federal resources were sorely strained.

Pfeffer's attorney, Paul Knight, and Jefferson's spokeswoman, Melanie Rousell, declined comment.

Jefferson was unable to comment on Wednesday because he was traveling in the Netherlands with Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., to review levee systems. Jefferson is expected back on Thursday to attend a hearing in Louisiana.

The bribery probe is separate from the ongoing investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff , who pleaded guilty last week to federal charges. Abramoff's investigation could bring down some lawmakers and their aides, including a former aide to Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas.

The investigation has looked into Jefferson's dealings with a privately held technology company, iGate Inc. in Louisville, Ky., which was seeking telecommunications contracts in Nigeria.

FOX News' Molly Hooper and The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Kickbacks Admitted In Work For New Orleans (NOTP)

By Bruce Eggler, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 12, 2006

Federal prosecutors rang up another conviction Wednesday in their probe of a scheme to skim hundreds of thousands of dollars from a huge energy-efficiency contract awarded during former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial's tenure at City Hall.

Under an agreement with prosecutors, Michael Garnett, a subcontractor who did work under the $81 million Johnson Controls Inc. deal, pleaded guilty to misprision of a felony for knowing about crimes related to the scheme but failing to inform authorities, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

Garnett is the fifth subcontractor to enter a guilty plea related to the Johnson Controls contract, Letten said.

The 20-year contract with Johnson Controls, awarded in 2000, was the largest signed by the Morial administration. It was intended to save the city money on its energy bills, in part by replacing an array of energy-consuming fixtures with more efficient models.

Letten said Garnett admitted providing kickbacks to Kerry DeCay, director of the Department of Property Management under Morial, in connection with the subcontract given to Garnett's company, Golden Hammer Construction.

The kickbacks included a refrigerator costing $5,278.20 and an icemaker worth $1,387.57 that Garnett's company bought for DeCay's home, plus an identical icemaker for the home of Terry Songy, Johnson Controls' local project manager, according to the plea agreement.

Songy has told investigators that he and DeCay "controlled assignments given to Golden Hammer under its subcontract with Johnson Controls," the document says.

DeCay has said he's innocent. Prosecutors have said Songy is expected to plead guilty and is cooperating with the investigation.

Letten said Garnett was placed in the difficult position of having to give payments to a city official to get city business, and that he did so reluctantly. Letten urged other business owners to refuse to be corrupted and to report any approaches for kickbacks to the FBI.

Garnett, whose case was investigated by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, entered his plea before U.S. District Judge Martin Feldman.

Feldman, who is set to sentence Garnett April 19, could impose a maximum of three years in prison and a $250,000 fine. But Garnett, and several other Johnson Controls subcontractors who have pleaded guilty to the same crime, could draw a much lighter sentence in return for cooperating with the government.

Subcontractors Roy Joseph Broussard of R.J. Broussard LLC and Owen Prestridge of Owen Prestridge Contractor pleaded guilty in November. Two others, Randall Moore of National Contractor Services Inc. and Michael Farris of Specialty Machines Services, filed guilty pleas in December, First Assistant U.S. Attorney Jan Mann said.

Charges were filed against the five subcontractors and Songy in August. Letten said at the time that all were expected to plead guilty and cooperate with the government.

Besides DeCay, the highest-profile defendants in the Johnson Controls case are expected to be Reginald Walker, owner of a construction company that received a large subcontract from Johnson Controls, and restaurateur Stan "Pampy" Barré, a confidant of Morial's.

According to a grand jury indictment issued in June, DeCay, Walker, Barré and Songy plotted to skim money from the contract by inflating the costs of various jobs. Subcontractors would be directed to turn in fraudulent invoices, after which they would kick back money and sometimes other items to Barré, Songy and DeCay, the indictment said.

Barré grossed more than $800,000 from the deal for little or no work, while Songy and DeCay each took in at least $100,000 in cash and gifts, according to the June 16 indictments.

The government said Barré, DeCay and Songy also agreed to change the contract's scope of work to include renovations to Barré's concession stands at the Morris F.X. Jeff Municipal Auditorium and the Mahalia Jackson Theatre of the Performing Arts. Those changes and others unrelated to energy efficiency added $1.8 million to the price of work in the two buildings, the indictment said.

Barré and Walker have said they are innocent.

Council Member Pleads Not Guilty To Extortion (AP)

AP, January 11, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A member of the St. Tammany Parish Council has pleaded not guilty to federal charges of extorting at least $50,000 from a businessman in an alleged attempt to broker a contract of dispose of debris from Hurricane Katrina.

Advertisement

Joe Impastato, 33, entered the plea Tuesday to extortion, conspiracy and money laundering.

Impastato has admitted making a deal with the owner of Pontchartrain Chipping Yard LLC in Lacombe, but says he obtained an opinion from a private attorney to ensure his actions were legal.

U.S. Magistrate Louis Moore Jr. allowed Impastato to remain free on $5,000 bond he posted after his arrest in November. Each of the three counts carries up to 20 years in prison.

A grand jury accused Impastato of contacting Pontchartrain Chipping and offering to negotiate a debris-dumping deal for the company in exchange for part of the $200,000 contract. Authorities said Impastato was arrested after the company's owner contacted the FBI, which set up a sting operation.

F.B.I. Said To Grill Man, 20, On Cruise Disappearance (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

The lawyer for one of the men last seen with a Connecticut newlywed before he vanished on a Mediterranean cruise last summer said federal agents had pressured his client for information about the man's disappearance and threatened to charge him with the rape of a female passenger if he declined to cooperate.

In his first extensive comments on the case, the lawyer, Albert Y. Dayan, said that his client, Rustislav Kofman, denied any role in the disappearance of the Connecticut man, George Allen Smith IV, last July 5 on a Royal Caribbean cruise or in any rape.

He said that when crew members aboard the ship, Brilliance of the Seas, approached his client about a missing person, Mr. Kofman thought they were talking about Mr. Smith's wife, Jennifer. He said she was not in the Smiths' cabin when his client and three of his friends put her husband to bed after a night of heavy drinking. It was the last time anyone is known to have seen Mr. Smith.

Since his disappearance, his wife and family have demanded to know what happened to Mr. Smith, and have expressed suspicion of foul play. Federal agents have focused on a group of male passengers who helped Mr. Smith back to his cabin and who, two days later, videotaped themselves having sex with an 18-year-old female passenger. She later complained she had been raped; the men have said through their lawyers that the encounter was consensual.

Mr. Dayan said his client, a 20-year-old college student from Brighton Beach, Brooklyn, had been subjected to three lengthy interrogations by federal agents before he hired a lawyer. He said he and his co-counsel had decided to speak out because they thought their client was being scapegoated.

"Agents have barraged this young man with question after question in three different interrogations," Mr. Dayan said. "Some were five to eight hours long, and some were with no food till it was over."

He said that if his client "were any weaker psychologically, he would have confessed to anything."

In an effort to extract information from his client, Mr. Dayan said, agents showed a videotape of his client and two other men having sex with the passenger alleging rape. He said agents also sought to play the tape for Mr. Kofman's father in an effort to get him to instruct his son to cooperate but that the father refused to watch.

A spokeswoman for the F.B.I. in New Haven said yesterday that her office would not comment.

Mr. Dayan said: "We sympathize with the disappearance of Mr. Smith and the family. However, we're concerned that one tragedy - the disappearance of a man - may lead to another tragedy - the arrest of a man who had nothing to do with the disappearance."

He said that he did not believe his client "did anything wrong on the ship" and noted that unlike some of the other people under scrutiny, his client "actually spoke to the F.B.I. and gave them a complete account."

He complained that the authorities had been using a "strictly consensual" sexual encounter as leverage in an effort to force his client to provide more details on the Smith case than the account he had already given.

Last week, a family friend speaking on behalf of the 18-year-old passenger disputed that the encounter was consensual. He said she was "angry and looking forward to her day in court."

Woodward Found Guilty (WIAT-TV)

DOJ_NMG_0009236

By Adam Moseley, News42 WIAT

WIAT-TV, CBS 42 , Birmingham, AL, January 12, 2006

A federal jury returned a verdict against an ex-Jefferson County sheriff and his attorney. It's a case that stretches back a few years…one that had Jim Woodward and Albert Jordon accused of illegally using the national crime computer.

The justice department filed criminal charges back in 2000, accusing Woodward and his attorney of misusing the N.C.I.C. computer.

Prosecutors contend they conducting background checks on absentee voters during the 1998 sheriff's race, a charge they denied. And a jury agreed.

Jim Woodward and Albert Jordan sat through a second day of jury deliberations, and when it was over the federal panel found them guilty of two felony counts.

Woodward was found guilty of conspiracy and illegal use of property. Jordan was also found guilty of conspiracy and misuse of public money, property or records.

Following the decision, Woodward, Jordan or their attorneys would comment on the verdict, but several family members and friends left the courthouse visibly upset.

Both Woodward and Jordan were cleared of a third felony count.

Puerto Rico Lawyer Indicted In Scheme (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) -- A federal grand jury indicted a San Juan attorney Wednesday in connection with a scheme to defraud fast-food giant Tricon Restaurants International, the Justice Department said.

Eugenio A. Guardiola Ramirez was charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice and obstruction of justice in an investigation into illegal kickback payments paid by an electrical contractor, said Justice Department spokesman Orlando Rios.

Tricon's brands include Kentucky Fried Chicken, Pizza Hut and Taco Bell. Its Puerto Rico stores are operated by Encanto Restaurants of Puerto Rico, Rios said.

Prosecutors allege Guardiola obstructed an investigation into payments made by the Gate Engineering Corporation to a Tricon employee in exchange for more than $1 million (euro823,847) worth of electrical contracts, Rios said.

He is accused of mischaracterizing the payments to a grand jury, interfering with witnesses and drafting a phony services contract, Rios said.

If convicted on all charges, Guardiola could face up to 35 years in prison and fines of up to $750,000, Rios said.

In May 2005, the electrical contractor and its president, Albith Colon, pleaded guilty to having made illegal kickbacks and are awaiting sentencing, Rios said. The Tricon employee, Jorge Luis Matos Burgos, was convicted in August of the same charge and was sentenced to a year in prison.

U.S. Supreme Court Splits Over Fairness Of Calif. Death Sentence (LAW/AP)

By Gina Holland, The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2006

A divided Supreme Court reinstated a California inmate's death sentence on Wednesday, the first 5-4 vote under newly installed Chief Justice John Roberts.

Justices overturned an appeals court ruling that declared Ronald Sanders' sentence unconstitutional. Sanders was put on death row for the 1982 killing of a woman during a drug-related robbery in Bakersfield, Calif.

Justice Antonin Scalia wrote the ruling, the Court's first death penalty decision since Roberts replaced Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist last fall.

The case presented a technical question for the Court involving jurors' consideration of invalid aggravating factors.

Special circumstances used by prosecutors in their case against Sanders -- that the crime was committed during a burglary and was cruel or heinous -- were later found invalid.

California argued that Sanders would have been sentenced to death even without those arguments. The Supreme Court's five conservative members agreed.

DOJ_NMG_0009237

"The erroneous factor could not have 'skewed' the sentence, and no constitutional violation occurred," Scalia wrote in an opinion joined by Roberts, retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

In a dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens said "this decision is more likely to complicate than to clarify our capital sentencing jurisprudence."

Also disagreeing with the decision were Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer, although their reasons were varied.

In a lengthy dissent, Breyer said the Court's finding could "deprive a defendant of a fair and reliable sentencing proceeding."

The case is Brown v. Sanders, 04-980.

Justices Question Death Row Inmate's Guilt (REU-Y2)

By James Vicini

Reuters, January 12, 2006

A majority of U.S. Supreme Court justices appeared prepared on Wednesday to overturn the sentence or the conviction of a Tennessee death row inmate who claims new DNA and other evidence cast doubt on his guilt for the 1985 murder of a female neighbor.

The court's four most liberal members, joined by moderate conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, seemed supportive of arguments by the attorney for convicted murderer Paul House that a reasonable juror now would not find him guilty.

The hour-long arguments in the case were unusual in that the justices went into great detail about fact-specific issues and questioned the attorneys on both sides about evidence presented at trial and what was later uncovered.

House was convicted in 1986 of murder in the beating death of Carolyn Muncey, a neighbor and an acquaintance, in rural Union County in Tennessee. He was on parole after pleading guilty in Utah to sexual assault.

In later challenging his sentence and conviction, defense attorneys presented DNA test results showing the semen on the victim's clothes actually belonged to her husband. Such DNA testing had not yet been developed at the time of the trial.

They also presented testimony tending to show that the victim's blood may have been placed on House's blue jeans by state officials and that Muncey may have been killed by her husband.

Prosecutors have said the new evidence failed to prove House's innocence. A federal judge and then a U.S. appeals court, by an 8-7 vote, rejected House's appeal, but the Supreme Court then agreed to decide the case.

Justice Stephen Breyer said the jury heard the prosecution's theory that the murder had been part of a sexual attack by House and that there now was conflicting evidence.

"I don't know who did this crime," Breyer told Jennifer Smith, the Tennessee associate deputy attorney general who argued the case.

Justice David Souter said the prosecution case against House had been built on rape as the motive, and that a juror would have found the evidence of the semen stains coming from Muncey's husband to be "extremely significant."

Kennedy said the semen evidence raised questions about the sentence at a minimum and the conviction as well. "The semen was used to connect it (the murder) to the defendant. We now know that was wrong," he said.

Justice Antonin Scalia was the court member most skeptical of the arguments by House's lawyer, Stephen Kissinger, an assistant federal defender.

Even with the new evidence, the defense must show that no reasonable juror could have found House guilty, Scalia said. He described it as "a very heavy burden" and made clear he did not believe the new blood evidence was sufficient.

Chief Justice John Roberts asked Kissinger what standard of review he thought should be used in deciding the case. Under existing precedent, the Supreme Court must determine that no juror could reasonably vote to convict, based on the old and new evidence, he said.

A decision in the case is expected by the end of June.

Justices Debate Case Of Condemned Inmate Tenn. Man Wants New Hearing, DNA Tests Examined (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0009238

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — A majority of the Supreme Court expressed concern Wednesday about blood and semen evidence used to send a Tennessee man to death row 20 years ago, as the court for the first time heard a case in which a condemned inmate claims DNA evidence could help clear him.

Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer were among those most vigorously questioning whether Paul Gregory House abducted, tried to rape and then murdered Carolyn Muncey in July 1985.

The jury that found House guilty heard that semen found on Muncey's clothing could have been from House and that blood on House's pants likely was from the victim. House is trying to get his case reopened on the grounds that Muncey's blood ended up on his clothing because evidence was mishandled and that new DNA tests show that the semen found on the victim's clothes belonged to her husband.

The question before the court does not turn on the validity of the DNA evidence. Rather, it tests the standards for when a prisoner who has exhausted all appeals can seek to get a hearing before a federal judge to challenge his case.

Chief Justice John Roberts repeatedly tried to bring the justices' discussion back to the relatively dry question of whether House, at this point, can assert that his case was constitutionally flawed.

The justices must examine whether, given the new evidence that House asserts, "it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have convicted" him. That tough standard derives from a 1995 Supreme Court case that attempts to balance an interest in ensuring the finality of verdicts with concerns about inmates' actual innocence.

House's case has drawn national attention because it brings to the forefront the DNA technology that has led dozens of wrongly convicted inmates to be freed.

The New York-based Innocence Project, which has been at the lead of the DNA litigation that it says has exonerated more than 160 defendants, submitted a "friend of the court" brief siding with House.

It told the Supreme Court that scientific evidence contradicting facts at a jury trial should warrant great weight when prisoners seek a hearing in federal court.

No convict in the USA has been exonerated through DNA testing after execution.

However, the results of DNA testing are expected soon in the case of Roger Coleman, a Virginia man who was executed in 1992 for raping and murdering his sister-in-law. Gov. Mark Warner recently ordered the testing because of lingering questions about whether Coleman was guilty.

Stephen Kissinger, an assistant federal community defender representing House, told the justices that House meets the court's requirements to have his case heard again. Kissinger stressed evidence indicating that blood from the victim found on House's jeans could have come from spilled autopsy samples. He also emphasized DNA testing after trial that showed semen found on Muncey was from her husband.

Jennifer Smith, associate deputy attorney general in Tennessee, says that argument fails to meet the threshold for a new hearing.

She said the state agrees that the DNA evidence showed that the semen was from Muncey's husband, but she linked it to testimony that the couple had sexual relations the morning before she disappeared.

Under sharp questioning from justices, Smith minimized the fact that prosecutors had used the attempted rape as a motive for Muncey's murder and as an aggravating factor for the death penalty.

The court could rule in the case of House v. Bell by the end of June, when the justices traditionally recess for their annual term.

A 1986 Case Could Aid Appeals Along Death Row (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0009239

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - An argument before the Supreme Court in a 20-year-old murder case suggested on Wednesday that the court might be willing to open the door a bit wider to death row inmates seeking access to federal court to present plausible but belated claims of innocence.

It was a gritty argument with an unusually intense focus on the evidence that a Tennessee jury considered in convicting Paul G. House of the murder of a neighbor, Carolyn Muncey. Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer were particularly steeped in the details and were deeply engaged on opposite sides of the case, debating it back and forth almost to the exclusion of the lawyers standing before them.

Mr. House has always maintained his innocence, and in 2004 he came within one vote of persuading a federal appeals court to reopen his case. The debate on the appeals court was over whether recently developed scientific evidence had cast enough doubt on the basis of his conviction to overcome the very high bar that the Supreme Court has set for federal courts to hear new claims that were not presented in the initial round of appeals.

The vote against Mr. House, in the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, was 8 to 7; all eight judges in the majority had been appointed by Republican presidents, and all seven dissenters had been named by Democrats. Six of the dissenters concluded that Mr. House had proved his innocence, while the seventh said that he was at least entitled to a new trial.

Addressing Mr. House's lawyer on Wednesday, Justice Scalia said he agreed that the case now looks "much closer" than it must have appeared to the jury in 1986. But that was not the issue, he continued. "Once the case has been tried, we have a much different task," Justice Scalia said, namely to determine "whether any reasonable jury could have found guilt."

Only if the answer was no could a federal court proceed to hear a petition for a writ of habeas corpus and consider whether constitutional errors that had not previously been identified had occurred at the trial. The Supreme Court's leading precedent on this question, a case from 1995 called Schlup v. Delo, refers to this hurdle as a "gateway" through which an inmate must pass. It is, Justice Scalia said, "a very heavy burden" for the defense to meet.

Mr. House's lawyer, Stephen M. Kissinger, replied, "It is a high burden, and we don't shrink from it."

The court's focus, Mr. Kissinger said, should now be on "the effect of the entirety of the evidence on a reasonable juror" rather than on dissecting each disputed piece of evidence.

Mr. Kissinger, an assistant federal defender from Knoxville, Tenn., challenged Justice Scalia's description of the gateway. "It comes down to the 'could' and 'would' distinction," he said. "We don't deny that there is evidence that 'could' support conviction, but that's not the test. What 'would' a reasonable juror conclude? Proof of innocence does not have to be absolute."

Underlying this argument was the question of whether the courts should adjust their rules to take account of the recent string of exonerations based on DNA evidence. Briefs filed by the Innocence Project, a legal clinic in New York, and by the American Bar Association point out that the Supreme Court decided Schlup v. Delo and other cases limiting inmates' appeal rights before DNA testing had revealed flaws in a disturbing proportion of criminal convictions. Those flaws call for new flexibility, the briefs argue.

In this case, House v. Bell, No. 04-8990, the new DNA evidence alone did not produce a clear exoneration. Rather, it substantially undermined the prosecution's theory of the case, which was that sex was the motivation for the crime and that Mr. House had killed the victim in the course of raping her.

Chemical analysis presented at the trial suggested that Mr. House's semen was found on Ms. Muncey's clothing, while DNA testing later showed it to be her husband's. The state maintains that this new evidence does not disprove that Mr. House was guilty of the murder.

The defense theory was that the husband, Hubert Muncey, was the killer. The new legal team that represented Mr. House in his habeas corpus petition produced witnesses who testified that they had heard Mr. Muncey make a drunken confession, but the federal district court discounted the evidence in rejecting the petition in 1997.

Mr. Kissinger said that if the case passed through the gateway, he would argue that Mr. House was deprived of the effective assistance of counsel at his trial and that the state withheld favorable evidence it was constitutionally obliged to produce.

DOJ_NMG_0009240

Representing Tennessee at Wednesday's argument, Jennifer L. Smith, an associate deputy state attorney general, said that all of Mr. House's new evidence "fails to raise sufficient doubt" about the original verdict to get past the gateway into federal court on those or any other claims.

Now it was Justice Breyer's turn. He challenged the state's lawyer on a long list of evidentiary issues, leading Justice Scalia to interject at one point, "We could call on these witnesses ourselves and hear them all over again."

Justice Breyer said, "My goodness, I don't know who committed this crime."

Only nominally addressing Ms. Smith, Justice Scalia said: "Justice Breyer has not heard these witnesses. The district court did."

Along with Justice Breyer, Justice David H. Souter expressed strong doubts about the state's case. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said that "at a minimum," he had questions about the death sentence if not the conviction. Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and John Paul Stevens said little, but if they follow Justice Breyer's lead, as is likely, there would be five votes to reopen the case, even assuming that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was uncharacteristically quiet, is no longer on the court by the time a decision is issued.

Justice O'Connor's vote proved essential in a decision the court issued in another death penalty case on Wednesday, the first 5-to-4 decision since John G. Roberts Jr. became chief justice. In Brown v. Sanders, No. 04-980, the court reinstated the death sentence of a California inmate whose habeas corpus petition had been granted by the federal appeals court in San Francisco.

The appeals court had overturned the sentence because two of the four factors the jury cited in making the defendant, Ronald L. Sanders, eligible for the death penalty were later found by the California Supreme Court to be invalid. Writing for the majority on Wednesday, Justice Scalia said there was no constitutional error in the sentence because the jury was able to give proper consideration to the same facts and circumstances through the remaining, valid factors.

Chief Justice Roberts and Justices O'Connor, Kennedy and Clarence Thomas joined the majority opinion. Justices Stevens, Breyer, Souter and Ginsburg dissented.

U.S. State Court Overturns Death Sentence In Murder Of Governor's Secretary (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

(AP) - DOVER, Delaware-Delaware's highest court on Wednesday overturned the death sentence of a once well-connected attorney convicted of the 1996 murder of the governor's scheduling secretary.

The sentence was flawed because the jury vote recommending a death sentence for Thomas Capano was not unanimous, the Delaware Supreme Court ruled. The high court ordered a new penalty hearing, but did not overturn his conviction, prosecutor Steven Wood said.

Prosecutors say Capano shot Anne Marie Fahey, 30, scheduling secretary to then-Governor Tom Carper, and dumped her body in the Atlantic Ocean because she was breaking off an affair with him.

Capano, a former state prosecutor, is a member of a well-known family involved in land development.

His attorneys had argued that his death sentence, issued in 1999, should be overturned because his jury was not unanimous in determining that Fahey's slaying was premeditated. The state high court found that the Delaware Constitution demands unanimous jury verdicts in death-penalty sentencing, even if federal law does not.

Capano attorney Thomas Bernstein said that while he was relieved the sentence was vacated, he was disappointed that the court did not overturn the conviction.

He said Capano would now appeal the conviction in federal court.

Gun Dealer Sentenced For Fraud (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 12, 2006

A once-distinguished antique-firearms dealer who duped a Bucks County millionaire while helping him amass a $30 million gun collection was sentenced to 21/2 years in prison yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0009241

The case, which included the sale of a pair of revolvers carried into battle by famed Texas Ranger Samuel Walker, was widely followed in the unregulated antique-firearms industry, where the dealers' crimes became a major scandal.

U.S. District Judge Cynthia M. Rufe said that she hoped the prison sentence for the dealer, Michael Zomber of Franklin, Tenn., would deter others who might try to defraud antiques collectors.

"What is seriously missing here is respect for the law," Rufe said. "It's not about money or lack of money; it's about treating each other legally and fairly."

Zomber was convicted of fraud at trial. His accomplice, Richard Ellis, of LeClaire, Iowa, pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government. Rufe sentenced Ellis to 10 months, half of which must be spent in prison; the other half may be spent in a halfway house, she said. Restitution will be calculated later.

"The entire industry was poised to find out what happened to Ellis and Zomber," said FBI agent Bob Wittman, who handled the case. "There's an element that's going to be happy that it's a new day, and there's an element that's going to be upset that their antics are going to be put under the microscope."

The Bucks County businessman who was duped, Joseph A. Murphy of New Hope, said in a related suit that the men defrauded him of $12 million. That suit was settled for $4.7 million worth of antique firearms.

Ellis, hired by Murphy as his expert consultant on a commission basis, led Murphy to believe that Zomber was a disinterested dealer.

He was not. Zomber wrote letters feigning interest in the pieces Murphy sought, artificially inflating the firearms' values. In turn, authorities said, Ellis paid Zomber more than $1 million in kickbacks.

The largest deal involved two firearms Walker designed with Samuel Colt in 1846 - the world's first Magnum revolvers, .44-caliber handguns that launched Colt from bankruptcy to fame, according to Philip Schreier, a curator at the National Firearms Museum in Fairfax, Va.

Murphy paid about $2.2 million for the so-called Walker Colts, about twice what authorities said they are worth.

Before Zomber was sentenced yesterday, he asked for leniency, saying that what happened has consumed him to the point that he has not slept for three years without the aid of pills. He also cited his extensive charitable work on behalf of children with cancer.

"I am extraordinarily sorry and remorseful that my actions have caused pain," Zomber said. "I am disgraced forever."

Murphy also addressed the court. His voice thundering at times, he said he was angry that Zomber had argued that charitable work and medical stresses were relevant at sentencing.

"I'm the laughingstock," Murphy said, explaining that the scandal is the talk of the antique-gun circuit. "I'm the one who had two heart attacks over this, stents put in... . As a victim, I'm pleading with you to sentence him in the most horrible way you can, because he did this without regret. I want punishment."

Afterward, Murphy's attorney, Gavin Lenz, said he was satisfied with both sentences.

Zomber plans to appeal, and Rufe said she is considering whether to allow him to remain free until that appeal is heard.

Rufe chastised both men for continuing to attend gun shows following their convictions. Her sentence forbids the dealers from possessing any firearms, including antiques, for three years after the jail terms.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Goldman said that Ellis deserved a lighter sentence because he cooperated with the investigation and pleaded guilty. Still, Goldman said, he deserved to go to prison.

Ellis wept through much of his statement to the judge: "I'm very sorry for what I did. It was wrong and I regret it. In my business, my good name meant everything. I blew it."

Ellis then turned around to face his victim, who sat in the gallery.

"Joe, I'm truly sorry," Ellis said. "I really am."

Murphy nodded.

Man Indicted In VA Hospital Shooting Of Co-worker (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

GREENVILLE, N.C. - A man accused of killing a co-worker and former lover at the Veteran's Administration hospital in Fayetteville was indicted on a murder charge Wednesday by a federal grand jury.

Arthur James Charland Jr., 42, was also charged with use and discharge of a firearm during an in relation to a crime of violence, according to a statement by U.S. Attorney Frank D. Whitney.

Charland is accused of fatally shooting Linda Faye Owens, with whom he had an 11-year affair.

He could be sentenced to life in prison. Prosecutors could choose to pursue the death penalty, but Whitney said that decision has not been made.

According to a criminal complaint, Charland concealed a shotgun inside Christmas wrapping paper and walked into the hospital pharmacy to shoot Owens on Dec. 13.

At a hearing last month, FBI Special Agent Chris Hedges testified that Charland told investigators he was being treated for bipolar disorder.

Trial Opens In Prison Slaying Of Ex-Priest (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WORCESTER, Mass., Jan. 11 - The murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest, in 2003 by an inmate in state prison was a shocking and almost surreal dénouement to one of the darkest chapters of the sexual abuse crisis in the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. Geoghan's violent death in the most secure prison in Massachusetts was to some an appalling failure of the state to protect one of its most despised inmates. To others it was a horrible but justified retribution against Mr. Geoghan, one of the most reviled priests named in the abuse scandal, accused of molesting some 150 children in several parishes over three decades.

Now, the man who admits he killed Mr. Geoghan, Joseph L. Druce, is having his day in court, and for anyone watching the trial, it is hard to figure out where to put one's sympathies - with the murder victim or the man who killed him.

Mr. Druce, 40, is pleading not guilty by reason of mental illness. His lawyer, John LaChance, does not dispute the details of the case. Prosecutors say Mr. Druce followed Mr. Geoghan into his cell at the Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center on Aug. 23, 2003, and jammed the cell door shut with a nail clipper and a ripped-up copy of "The Cross and the Switchblade," a book about a minister who transformed the lives of teenage gang members by introducing them to Christianity.

Mr. Druce then tied Mr. Geoghan's hands with a T-shirt, wrapped stretched-out socks around Mr. Geoghan's neck, tightened them with a shoe, and then jumped up and down on his body.

According to testimony by corrections officers on Wednesday, Mr. Druce later told them he "did it for the children," to stop Mr. Geoghan, 68, from molesting more boys when he got out of prison.

Mr. Geoghan was serving 6 years of a 9-to-10-year sentence for groping a boy in a swimming pool, and Mr. Druce told law enforcement authorities that he had heard Mr. Geoghan talking about plans to assault more children upon his release. Mr. Druce also signed a card waiving his Miranda rights "the Reverend Joseph Druce."

Mr. LaChance suggested Wednesday that Mr. Druce's behavior was evidence of insanity, saying "he began fantasizing about being an individual who would save the kids and save the world."

The prosecutor, Lawrence Murphy, suggested the opposite, that the fact that "Mr. Druce was planning to kill John Geoghan" showed that he was not insane.

Mr. Druce is serving a life sentence without parole for beating and strangling a driver who he said made a sexual advance toward him when he was hitchhiking in 1988. He unsuccessfully tried an insanity defense in that case in 1989, and his lawyer in that case emphasized Mr. Druce's highly troubled background, including serious behavior problems, drug use, a mother who did not want him and a father who was abusive to his mother.

Mr. LaChance referred to that background Wednesday, saying that Mr. Druce was "like a little puppy you beat and beat," adding, "Eventually the puppy strikes back when it is old enough and big enough."

At the time of Mr. Geoghan's slaying, Mr. Druce's father, Dana Smiledge, said Mr. Druce also had white supremacist leanings - a hatred of gay people, Jews and blacks.

DOJ_NMG_0009243

Mr. Geoghan's murder not only stunned victims of abuse by priests, but also ignited a state investigation into the prison system. Several correction officials were removed, including the correction commissioner.

The investigation found that only one guard was monitoring the 26-inmate unit at the time Mr. Druce slipped into Mr. Geoghan's cell and that the cell doors had been left open while the inmates were taking their lunch trays to a collection point.

Mr. Geoghan was jailed in early 2002 and moved from a medium-security prison in Concord to the maximum-security Souza-Baranowski prison in Shirley in early 2003 after complaining that he felt harassed by guards and afraid for his safety.

The state investigation said that Mr. Geoghan was indeed mistreated by guards in Concord and that he was inappropriately transferred to Shirley, where he was put in a wing for inmates who needed to be separated from the general prison population. But some of them were violent offenders, and many were younger than the frail Mr. Geoghan.

Mr. Druce was transferred there not long afterward because he, too, had felt unsafe in his previous prison, where he had become a jailhouse informant, his lawyer said. Mr. Druce had changed his name, from Darrin Smiledge, because he was afraid of his prison enemies.

Mr. LaChance said that Mr. Druce had been delusional in the past, pretending he was a rich person who owned yachts and million-dollar houses, and subscribing to Robb Report, the luxury magazine, at his previous prison. He said Mr. Druce fantasized that if he killed Mr. Geoghan "he would be someone like a rich person with a yacht."

Mr. Druce, who has previously held up photographs and demonstrated other showy behavior in court, was medicated Wednesday with Ritalin and possibly other drugs, Mr. LaChance said. He made a thumbs up sign to several reporters, but otherwise seemed less attention-seeking. If his defense is successful, Mr. Druce is likely to be moved to a psychiatric institution.

State Guardsmen Sue For Post-9/11 Expenses (AP)

By JAY LINDSAY, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, January 12, 2006

BOSTON -- A group of National Guard soldiers who were ordered to protect possible targets after the Sept. 11 attacks sued the federal government Wednesday, seeking tens of millions of dollars in expenses they say were never reimbursed.

The soldiers, from Massachusetts and New Hampshire, say they traveled hundreds of miles to security postings and used their own money to pay for food and lodging with the expectation that they would be reimbursed.

But the soldiers say in their complaint that their requests for compensation were repeatedly denied and they eventually were told, "If you don't like the arrangement, we'll make sure you get taken off this mission."

In the lawsuit, the plaintiffs argue that federal law provides military personnel with a travel and transportation allowance while away from home on active duty.

The lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court by four soldiers but seeks to include hundreds of other guardsmen as a class action. It names the U.S. Department of Defense and the Massachusetts National Guard and seeks $73 million in unpaid expenses.

A spokeswoman for the Defense Department referred calls to the Justice Department, where a spokesman declined to comment until after the agency reviews the lawsuit.

The Massachusetts National Guard was investigating the allegations and had no immediate comment, said a spokesman, Maj. Winfield Danielson.

The plaintiffs are Steven Littlefield of Plymouth, Wayne Gutierrez of New Bedford, Louis Tortorella of Brookline, N.H.; and Joseph Murphy of Derry, N.H. All but Tortorella are still in the National Guard. The areas they patrolled included Boston's primary water supply.

MedcoHealth Solutions: Department Of Justice Won't Intervene In Whistleblower Lawsuit (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Pharmacy benefits manager Medco Health Solutions Inc. said the Justice Department will not intervene in a whistleblower lawsuit filed against the company in a Pennsylvania court last month.

New Jersey-based Medco said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the U.S. Department of Justice notified the company on Tuesday of its decision not to intervene.

Medco said it first learned of "qui tam" lawsuit in mid-December, when the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania lifted the seal on the case.

In an earlier filing, the company said the complaint makes allegations concerning turnaround time and performance-guarantee reporting -- the same charges drawn in a 2003 lawsuit. The complaint "does not allege any health, safety or clinical violations," Medco said.

"Qui tam" is a statute under the False Claims Act that lets an individual alleging fraud on the federal government to sue on behalf of the state. Its name is an abbreviation of a Latin phrase meaning "he who sues for the king as well as for himself."

Shares of MedcoHealth Solutions fell 22 cents to $54.66 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Former Genentech Worker Sues Co. Over Marketing Practices (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, January 12, 2006

A former Genentech Inc. (DNA) (DNA) employee has accused the biotechnology company and marketing partner Biogen Idec Inc. (BIIB) (BIIB) of illegally promoting cancer drug Rituxan as a treatment for arthritis, a use not yet approved by regulators.

Paul McDermott, who worked for Genentech (DNA) in Falmouth, Maine, until last year, filed a lawsuit in July 2005 in U.S. District Court in Maine alleging the companies' marketing practices surrounding Rituxan defrauded government health-care programs.

The suit also says Genentech (DNA) fired McDermott in retaliation for bringing the matter to the attention of Genentech (DNA) executives. The suit seeks unspecified damages on behalf of the government, and an order that Genentech (DNA) rehire McDermott and pay him back wages and other damages.

McDermott's lawsuit hasn't surface until now because it was filed under seal on behalf of the federal government. In December, however, the Justice Department declined to intervene in the case and requested that the lawsuit be unsealed. Genentech (DNA), of South San Francisco, Calif., was served with a copy of the suit earlier this month, a Genentech (DNA) executive disclosed Tuesday after the company reported fourth-quarter earnings.

Genentech (DNA) spokeswoman Caroline Pecquet said the company hasn't fully evaluated the lawsuit. She added that the company was committed to ethical and legal promotional practices.

Biogen (BIIB) officials couldn't immediately be reached.

McDermott's lawsuit is the latest legal challenge facing Genentech (DNA) over Rituxan's marketing. In October 2004, Genentech (DNA) received a subpoena from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia seeking documents related to the promotion of Rituxan. Genentech (DNA) is cooperating with that investigation, which it said was both civil and criminal in nature.

The promotion of off-label uses of pharmaceuticals has gotten other drug companies in trouble. In 2004, Warner-Lambert pleaded guilty to federal charges that it promoted epilepsy drug Neurontin for off-label uses beginning in the 1990s. Pfizer Inc. (PFE) (PFE), which acquired Warner-Lambert in 2000, agreed to pay $ 430 million to resolve criminal charges and civil liabilities in the case.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration approved Rituxan in 1997 as a treatment for a type of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. U.S. sales of the drug grew to $1.8 billion last year. Studies have shown Rituxan also potential to treat rheumatoid arthritis. Biogen (BIIB) and Genentech (DNA) have applied for FDA approval to market Rituxan as such a treatment, and a decision is expected by late February.

It's generally legal for doctors to prescribe FDA-approved drugs in ways that haven't yet been approved by the FDA, and so-called "off-label" prescriptions are common. But drug companies are generally barred from actively promoting off-label uses of their drugs. That's where McDermott says his former employer and Biogen (BIIB) ran afoul of the law.

McDermott worked as a "professional educational liaison" for Genentech (DNA), according to the lawsuit, a job that involved recruiting doctors to promote the use of Rituxan as a treatment for rheumatoid arthritis.

He alleges Genentech (DNA) sent sales representatives to the offices of rheumatologists - doctors specializing in rheumatoid arthritis treatment - even though Genentech (DNA) had no products approved by the FDA for such treatments. Also, McDermott says Genentech (DNA) and Biogen (BIIB) used "sham" consulting agreements to pay rheumatologists whom the companies identified as being "key opinion leaders," who were expected to influence other doctors to begin prescribing Rituxan for arthritis.

McDermott says he was assigned to recruit certain doctors to work with Genentech (DNA) staffers to publish articles and case studies promoting Rituxan as an arthritis treatment.

He said Biogen (BIIB), the Cambridge, Mass., company that discovered Rituxan, had similar marketing practices for the drug.

McDermott said he was fired in April 2005 after telling his superiors about the alleged off-label promotion of Rituxan.

McDermott filed his lawsuit under a federal "whistleblower law" that would entitle him to a portion of the proceeds of any settlement or award of damages arising from the case. It wasn't immediately clear why the Justice Department declined to intervene, but it does have the right to take up the case at a later date.

Officials with the U.S. Attorney's office in Portland, Maine, which filed the document declining to intervene in the case, couldn't immediately be reached.

Neither McDermott nor his attorney could be reached.

Mislabeled Bread A Danger, Allergists Say (MINNST)

By Patricia Lopez, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 12, 2006

Allergists and food allergy activists alike were shaken Wednesday upon learning that the French Meadow Bakery labeled its spelt bread "wheat-free" when the bread, in fact, contains wheat.

For the hundreds of thousands of Americans who are wheat-intolerant or who have a genuine wheat allergy, mislabeled food is no small matter, said Anne Munoz-Furlong, founder of the national Food Allergy and Anaphylaxis Network, based in Fairview, Va.

"Their health and safety depend on them being able to trust what's on a label," she said. "We can't stop eating food. We can only stop eating the wrong food, and for that we need to know what's in it."

Wheat allergy reactions, she said, can range from hives and digestive problems to -- at the most extreme end -- death from the inability to breathe.

French Meadow, revered by health enthusiasts for its varieties of organic bread, had 30,000 loaves made from spelt and Kamut grain seized Tuesday afternoon by U.S. marshals and agents from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. The agency had spent nearly a year attempting to get the bakery to relabel its bread, noting that both spelt and Kamut are varieties of wheat.

U.S. Attorney Tom Heffelfinger, whose office is handling the case, said the agents locked most of the loaves in freezers, where they will remain until the case is decided or a court order issued. "The FDA takes the accuracy of food labeling very seriously," Heffelfinger said.

French Meadow has 20 days to respond to the FDA's complaint, he said. He did not know whether any consumer complaints were involved.

The company could face administrative penalties and sanctions for the government's costs in prosecuting the case, he said, "but that hasn't been determined yet. This is primarily about resolving the labeling issue."

Steve Shapiro, a partner with Lynn Gordon in the Minneapolis bakery that distributes its products nationwide, did not return calls Wednesday. But he said Tuesday that although he and Gordon disagree with the classification of spelt and Kamut as part of the wheat family, they are putting the final touches on new labels and hope to get their bread back "as soon as we can."

By Wednesday afternoon, the bakery website had pulled the term "wheat-free" from the spelt and kamut varieties of bread, although it retained its claim that they are alternatives for the wheat-intolerant.

DOJ_NMG_0009246

At the Mississippi Market Co-op in St. Paul, loaves of the bakery's breads still lined the shelves Wednesday, including several loaves of the "Health Seed" spelt bread that bore a colorful label touting it as wheat-free.

Steve Conroy, a manager at the co-op, said that while he will continue to stock French Meadow breads, he approves of the FDA action. "I've been in the health food business for 10 years," Conroy said. "Spelt is a type of wheat, no question. To say that bread is wheat-free just isn't true."

Intimidatingly heavy for its small size, Health Seed spelt bread is a compact loaf, with slices that are barely palm-sized. Its price is daunting, too: $4.99 for the 9-inch loaf.

Reading labels

Dr. James Lakin, a Burnsville allergist with Minnesota Allergy and Asthma Consultants, said he was "deeply concerned" by the mislabeling.

"We train our patients to read labels carefully," he said. "That wouldn't have helped here. What are they supposed to do when the label says wheat-free?"

Lakin said spelt is a primitive forerunner to modern wheat, first cultivated about 7,000 years ago. But "it is a type of wheat," he said. "It shares many of the same properties as wheat and people who are allergic to wheat can have reactions to spelt."

Kamut, he said, is of even greater concern because it is much more closely related to modern wheat. "Folks who are sensitive to wheat will definitely react to Kamut," he said.

And because both varieties are somewhat obscure, he said, consumers are almost entirely dependent on labels.

About 11 million Americans suffer from some type of food allergy and wheat is among the "big eight" categories, Munoz-Furlong said.

Lakin put wheat allergy sufferers at about 1 percent, with most of those being wheat-intolerant. Those with true wheat allergies, who risk severe reactions or death, "are probably 1 in 500,000," he said.

Packed on polar trips

Behind the counter at the French Meadow Bakery & Cafe on Wednesday, loaves of organic cranberry corn bread, organic multigrain, country rye and organic ciabatta were for sale, but no spelt.

Sarah Narnang, the cafe's day manager, said the breads in dispute are delivered only to outside customers. Cafe customers, however, can request that it be used as a wheat-free substitute on sandwiches, she added.

Arriving shortly before noon was Will Steger, the polar explorer, who said that he's a longtime fan of the breads and that he stops by the cafe once or twice a week when he's in town from his home near Ely, Minn.

On a 1989 expedition to Antarctica, Steger said, he packed along the bakery's spelt bread. Toasted on a tent stove and slathered with peanut butter and butter, it often would serve as breakfast, he said.

"Nothing but good results," Steger said.

For those with allergies, however, Munoz-Furlong said, the results are anything but good.

"It could be anything from hives to a life-threatening response, she said, "and the worst part is, no one knows at the beginning of the reaction how severe it will be. We know this is something that affects children and adults.

"It is serious."

High Court Ruling Slowly Bears Fruit For Wineries (LAW/AP)

By Michelle Locke, The Associated Press

AP, January 12, 2006

Napa vintner Dennis Cakebread is finally sending out cases of wine to thirsty New York state customers, seven long months after a Supreme Court ruling paved the way for the shipments.

"What we've learned about this is patience and persistence," said Cakebread. "These lawsuits aren't like an episode of 'L.A. Law' -- after one hour you win your case and you're off and running."

A lot has happened since the U.S. Supreme Court opened the door to shipping wine across state lines. But change hasn't been swift in an industry that sometimes seems as rich in red tape as it is red grapes.

DOJ_NMG_0009247

"We're in a highly regulated industry. This isn't like selling sweaters," said Jeremy Benson, executive director of Free The Grapes, a Napa, Calif.-based group that has been working to loosen shipping restrictions. "The regulations are there and we have to work through them."

The Supreme Court struck down laws last spring in New York and Michigan that allowed wineries to ship directly to in-state consumers but forbade out-of-state businesses from doing the same thing.

The court said either all wineries should be allowed to ship directly to consumers or none, a blow to the old distribution system that required a wholesaler to sell to restaurants and retailers. States have been acting to adjust their shipping laws ever since.

The ruling was particularly important to smaller wineries that don't have the volume for wide distribution in liquor stores and supermarkets and rely on direct sales to consumers, many of whom have developed a taste for their products on winery visits.

"It makes a huge difference," says Cakebread, part-owner and senior vice president of sales and marketing at Cakebread Cellars, which began with a 156-case vintage in 1973 and now makes about 95,000 cases a year.

For a small winery like Elan, which makes about 1,000 cases a year, being able to ship is crucial, said owner Linda Elliott-Smith, who has had 15 cases of cabernet sauvignon paid for and ready to go to New York for a while.

They were delayed from shipping even further in January, when floods knocked power out. Customers who are big fans of Elan's elegant reds have been willing to wait. "It's nice that we have customers who are true followers," she said.

Since the Supreme Court ruling, New York, Michigan and Ohio have loosened shipping restrictions. Texas also made shipping easier just prior to the high court ruling.

In December, shipping to New York became practical when the New York State Liquor Authority approved using UPS for wine shipments. FedEx also is working to get approval.

The New York law only allows shipments from states that extend similar privileges to New York vintners, which some experts say may not be constitutional. Michigan's new law says wineries can't ship more than 1,500 cases per year in direct-to-consumer shipments and also prohibits out-of-state wineries from selling direct to restaurants and retailers.

Still, the overall shipping picture is brighter for wineries, who have seen their potential shipping audience increase considerably.

At Joseph Phelps Vineyards, president and CEO Tom Shelton celebrated the California-New York connection when he hosted a dinner last year for New York Gov. George Pataki, who was visiting wine country.

"We got the flow going both ways," he said. In a bit of bottle diplomacy, they served wines from New York state.

Copy Shop Scores With Print Jobs (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 12, 2006

The guy holding up the line at your neighborhood FedEx Kinko's copy shop may be putting your tax dollars to work.

The Government Printing Office, which already contracts out the bulk of the government's printing to the private sector, is taking things a step further by hiring Kinko's to handle small printing jobs for federal agencies.

The contract, worth about $100 million annually and renewable for up to four years, will allow federal employees to get discounted copying, binding and printing services (including posters, signs, business cards and brochures) at 1,300 locations across the country. The GPO will pick up the tab through a new GPOExpress Card that federal employees will use.

"We pay for it," said Bruce R. James, who holds the title of public printer of the United States. "One of the real tricks here was trying to figure out a way to allow government agencies to more efficiently buy their printing and still comply with the law. The law says that all government printing has to come through GPO; it doesn't necessarily say we have to handle every single job."

The arrangement will enable an agency manager here, for instance, to send handouts electronically to a copy shop in Sacramento, where an official can pick them up before a meeting in the agency's regional office. Kinko's also will provide electronic copies of documents for possible inclusion in libraries that archive federal government documents.

Most of the printing going to the company had been done by other GPO contractors or by agency print shops, James said. And, yes, an undetermined number of federal jobs will be lost, but he said the losses will be through attrition.

DOJ_NMG_0009248

The effort began in December as a pilot program involving five agencies and will expand government-wide in February.

Reformzilla (WSJ)

By James Bopp, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Like a virus, the campaign finance "reform" passed by Congress in McCain-Feingold and approved by the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC is mutating and spreading in the states. The law raised contribution limits to federal candidates but imposed substantial restrictions on political parties and citizens' groups. State politicians are taking McCain-Feingold and McConnell as a license to enact much broader restrictions on core political speech. This term the court has a chance to decide whether these restrictions are justified, and what remains of the First Amendment in regard to democratic elections.

This sorry tale began with post-Watergate amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act. Congress passed limits on large contributions and mandatory expenditure limits on all political actors, prohibiting citizens' groups, including corporations and labor unions, from speaking out about public officials and candidates, if what they said would "influence a federal election."

In 1976, in Buckley v. Valeo, the Supreme Court recognized that speech about public issues is at the core of the amendment's protections; it struck down mandatory expenditure limits on candidates and strictly limited the scope of regulation of the political speech of citizens' groups. So long as groups eschewed express advocacy of the election or defeat of a candidate, they were free to speak out about issues, the actions of public officials and the positions of candidates. Alas, Buckley did uphold limits on contributions to candidates -- but only on "large" contributions that pose a threat of corruption.

The contribution-limit virus has spread to the states and mutated. While Buckley approved a large federal contribution limit of $1,000 per election, some states thought much lower limits were constitutional. And when the 2000 Supreme Court approved Missouri's $1,075-per-election limit for statewide officers in Nixon v. Shrink Missouri PAC, using very permissive language, the states and federal courts deemed that all constitutional restraints were off. Furthermore, since very low contribution limits help incumbents against challengers, the interests of campaign finance "reformers" and incumbent politicians coincided. So some states have enacted draconian contribution limits: $500 per year in Alaska and Massachusetts; $700 to $270 per year in Arizona, $500 per election in Florida; $500 to $250 per election in Maine; and $400 to $100 for the general election in Montana. Vermont's is the lowest at $400 to $200 per election cycle.

In McConnell in 2003, the Supreme Court upheld the key provisions of McCain-Feingold -- in particular, the "electioneering communication" provision that prohibits the running of broadcast ads, within 30 days of a primary and 60 days of a general election, that mention the name of a federal candidate in his district or state. The provision was enacted because of complaints by members of Congress that groups run negative attack ads that candidates themselves disapproved of -- ads that "do little to further beneficial debate and healthy political dialogue" (to quote Sen. John McCain). In effect, the court in McConnell abandoned free speech in favor of the interests of incumbent politicians.

But if it's a good idea to ban broadcast ads before elections, then state legislators seem to think it is an even better idea to expand the ban's reach to all communications for longer periods of time. Laws now in Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, North Carolina, South Carolina, Vermont and West Virginia restrict any communication that refers to a candidate. Arizona's is the longest period: 16 weeks before a general election. More remarkable is a Second Circuit decision, Randall v. Sorrell, that read McConnell and Shrink to mean that even Vermont's mandatory expenditure limits on candidates could now be upheld.

Incumbents are displeased when the press criticizes them, too, and have used the law to stifle the print media. Alabama prohibited editorials endorsing candidates on election day and Florida required newspapers to run a response when the paper attacked a public official. The Supreme Court, mercifully, struck down these efforts. Now, however, broad campaign finance laws are being used to the same effect. In Washington, a judge used the state campaign finance law against two radio talk-show hosts whose speech -- championing an anti-gas tax initiative -- was viewed as an "in-kind" contribution to the political committee supporting the initiative. The initiative committee was required to report the talk show hosts' speech as a "contribution."

Two cases before the Supreme Court will test whether the court will stop the spread of the campaign finance "reform" virus before it becomes a pandemic. Next Tuesday, in Wisconsin Right to Life (WRTL) v. FEC, I will argue on behalf of the WRTL that the Constitution requires recognition of a grassroots lobbying exception to the federal prohibition on electioneering communications. Remarkably, the FEC argues that federal courts are prohibited after McConnell from even considering whether a law can be applied unconstitutionally to non-election-related ads -- and that only the FEC has the authority to grant exemptions.

WRTL's ads look nothing like the "sham issue ads" that McConnell said were "the functional equivalent of express advocacy" and, therefore, could be banned. The ads were broadcast in the summer of 2004 and exhorted Wisconsin citizens to ask their senators to oppose the ongoing filibustering of President Bush's judicial appointees. The ads didn't identify any election, candidacy, party affiliation or position of the two incumbent senators on the issue, and said nothing that could be construed to support or oppose either senator. But because Sen. Russ Feingold (of McCain-Feingold) was a candidate for re-election, the ads were banned starting Aug. 15 through the general election. WRTL couldn't mention his name.

Of course, the First Amendment protects the right of the people "to petition" governmental officials, just as it protects our right to praise or criticize them. While McConnell has seriously limited the right during the blackout periods, it would be something else again to say that people can't lobby their representatives about upcoming votes in Congress. Yet the "reform" community, in league with incumbent politicians, is supporting the gag effort here, too.

The second case, Randall v. Sorrell, is about Vermont's decision to impose mandatory expenditure limits on candidates, to cut candidate contribution limits to the lowest in the U.S., and to apply a broad "related expenditure" provision to the activities of those who help candidates. Vermont caps expenditure limits for governor to $300,000 per election cycle; recent statewide candidates in Vermont have spent up to 10 times that amount. Further, the contribution limit of $400 per cycle is less than 20% that approved by the court in Buckley and Shrink and captures more political activity because of the broad "related expenditure" provision.

All of these state provisions share an unappealing element: They benefit incumbents. The guise of "reform" offers incumbents semi-respectable cover for their assault on free elections. Unless stopped, this virus will kill the First Amendment and democratic self-government.

Justice Department Settles AMC Case (AP)

By David Twiddy

AP, January 12, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- AMC Entertainment Inc., the nation's second-largest movie theater chain, was ordered to upgrade seating for patrons in wheelchairs at 1,200 of its stadium-style movie auditoriums and pay $300,000 in penalties and civil damages to settle a U.S. lawsuit.

Justice Department officials said Wednesday the order settles its 1999 lawsuit against the company claiming AMC violated the Americans with Disabilities Act because it doesn't provide comparable seating for people in wheelchairs.

The Kansas City-based company also must ensure that all theaters built over the next five years comply with requirements set out Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Florence-Marie Cooper in Los Angeles.

The stadium-style seating now dominating movie theaters gives everyone unobstructed views of the screen. But critics say most wheelchair spaces are at the base of the stadium tiers, forcing those patrons to crane their necks to see the movie.

As part of the order, privately held AMC, which operates more than 3,300 screens, must build ramps in more than 360 theaters, providing wheelchair spaces on higher seating tiers. The company also must pay $200,000 to theatergoers who originally complained to the Justice Department about the seating arrangements and $100,000 in fines.

"Providing the same moviegoing experience for individuals in wheelchairs that other patrons enjoy delivers on the promise of the ADA," Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said in a release. "These improvements will make the goals of the ADA a reality for thousands of Americans who want to enjoy this popular form of entertainment."

A spokeswoman for AMC said the company couldn't comment on the case because it was still active litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0009250

As part of her decision Tuesday, Cooper dismissed arguments from AMC that the proposed solution was more extensive than what the government required from AMC's competitors.

The Justice Department last summer settled similar lawsuits against industry leader Regal Entertainment Group, with that company agreeing to upgrade 1,000 of its 6,000 auditoriums, expected to cost $15 million over the next five years. Cinemark USA and National Amusements Inc. also resolved lawsuits against them recently, also agreeing to renovate stadium-style auditoriums.

The National Association of Theater Owners has criticized the Justice Department, saying it never gave theater companies guidelines for building stadium-style auditoriums other than to say wheelchair-bound patrons should have unobstructed views.

Hispanic Workers Get 2nd Chance To Challenge English-only Policy (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

DENVER — A federal appeals court ruling Wednesday resurrects claims Hispanic workers made in a lawsuit challenging an English-only policy for city workers in Altus, Okla.

Twelve bilingual Hispanic workers filed complaints with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission after the city adopted the policy in 2002. They argued that the city failed to show there was a need to prevent them from speaking Spanish. They said the policy singled out a nationality.

"I speak more English than I do Spanish, but the idea that I couldn't use it when I wanted to bothered me," said Danny Alcorta, 39, who worked for the city as an electric lineman. "It just wasn't right."

Although he no longer works for the city, Alcorta said he's glad the case remains alive to challenge the policy that he says is discriminatory.

"There's still a lot of my friends that I've worked with for a number of years that have to put up with it.

City officials had argued the policy was necessary because some workers and supervisors couldn't understand what was being said on city radios, some workers felt uncomfortable because they could not understand Spanish, and there were safety concerns about workers understanding each other around heavy equipment.

The Justice Department declined to take action, prompting employees to file a lawsuit in federal court in Oklahoma City. U.S. District Judge David Russell dismissed the complaint, saying the city had the authority to adopt the policy in managing its employees.

On Wednesday a three-judge panel of the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the case back to district court with respect to the plaintiffs' claims of disparate treatment, discrimination and violation of equal protection laws.

In a 2-1 ruling, the panel upheld Russell's dismissal of other claims, including a claim that the policy violated the Hispanic workers' First Amendment rights to free speech. The workers' attorney had argued that speaking Spanish at work was an expression of ethnic pride.

In a dissenting opinion, Judge Stephanie K. Seymour wrote that she would have also remanded the First Amendment claim to district court.

"The city's ban on Spanish from the work place creates a public space where Spanish speakers arguably do not feel welcome," she wrote. "In such a context, it is not hard to imagine the power of a simple `buenos dias' to convey resistance to that effort and hope for the future."

A Fault Line For 'Intelligent Design' (LAT)

By Louis Sahagun And Eric Bailey

The Los Angeles Times, January 12, 2006

LEBEC, Calif. — Tucked in the raw folds of the Tehachapi Mountains, 63 miles north of Los Angeles and a time warp away in ambience, this town is not used to being the center of attention.

But this far-flung place, one of half a dozen close-knit communities in these mountains, has become the latest focal point in the national debate over teaching "intelligent design" in public schools.

Usually, big news in the region is heavy snow shutting down Interstate 5. There are 15 houses of worship, all Christian, and many folks wear their religion on their bumper stickers. But plenty of big-city newcomers, who commute to jobs in Bakersfield and Los Angeles, prefer a solid gap between religion and the classroom.

DOJ_NMG_0009251

The San Andreas fault literally cuts through town, and right here "red state is slamming up against blue state like tectonic plates," said Patric Hedlund, managing editor of the Mountain Enterprise, a local weekly.

"The people here are grappling with fundamental issues of free speech and separation of church and state," she said. "It's one of those divine moments where everybody is right, and we have to find out what the rules are."

Outsiders know this region as the Grapevine. Lebec, the place with the post office, was named after a 19th century pioneer killed by a grizzly bear. The local chamber of commerce refers to Lebec, Gorman, Frazier Park and other north Tehachapi hamlets as the "Mountain Communities." Locals call it "the hill."

As they ruminate and wrangle among themselves, residents feel swamped.

The TV news crews and their satellite trucks began prowling the rugged hills not long after word spread of a lawsuit filed Tuesday by 11 parents against El Tejon Unified School District, the first legal challenge to the teaching of intelligent design in California.

At the district office, secretaries say at least three dozen interview requests have poured in for Supt. John Wight, who was at a conference and unavailable for comment.

The hullabaloo erupted after disgruntled parents joined with Americans United for Separation of Church and State to challenge a course at Frazier Mountain High School that they consider a minimally disguised endorsement of intelligent design.

School trustees approved the new course, "Philosophy of Design," at a special meeting on New Year's Day. Attorneys for the district suggested the course could survive a legal challenge if it was called "philosophy," the lawsuit said, and the board approved it on a 3-2 vote.

Hedlund's newspaper opened up five full pages to letters on both sides of the issue.

In one letter, Nicole Francus of Frazier Park called the course "an academic and legal disaster" that threatens to "take us all down a slippery slope."

"I'm not a biologist," countered Bob Anderson, another letter writer, "but the last time I looked, evolution was and is still an unproven scientific theory."

Intelligent design holds that some biological systems are so complex they could not have evolved through random mutations, as Darwin theorized, but must have sprung from the work of a larger master plan.

The course, which began Jan. 3, is scheduled to run for one month. The teacher is Sharon Lemburg, a special education instructor and the wife of a minister for the local Assembly of God Church, which supports fundamentalist Christian tenets about creationism.

An initial course description, which was distributed to students and their families last month, said "the class will take a close look at evolution as a theory and will discuss the scientific, biological and biblical aspects that suggest why Darwin's philosophy is not rock solid."

"Did God guide me to do this?" Lemburg asked, during an interview on the porch of her log house. "I would hope so."

Most of the reaction she's received has come from supporters or the media, with their e-mails and phone calls falling into three categories: "We support you, we're praying for you and … can we have you on our show?"

"It's scary," Lemburg said. "I just want to teach. I'm not out for big publicity."

Supporters of intelligent design lost a court challenge in Dover, Pa., last month that both sides considered a test case. Now the spotlight has shifted to the Tehachapis.

It's a region that is at once isolated and at the crossroads of the world, perched off bustling I-5 between Los Angeles and the San Joaquin Valley. Towns such as Lebec and Gorman — awash with fast-food joints, gas stations and tow truck operators — serve as pit stops. But Frazier Park and Pinion Pines and Lake of the Woods rarely get a visit.

In addition to a bumper crop of churches, the region has a high number of home-schooled children, according to Hedlund.

About 12,000 people live in the area, and Frazier Mountain High School's cluster of squat, concrete-gray buildings are home to fewer than 500 students.

Jeremy Hurst, a 15-year-old sophomore, is caught in the crossfire in town and at home.

His father, Kenneth Hurst, is a scientist at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in La Cañada Flintridge and one of the parents behind the lawsuit. His mother is a practicing Christian and is not involved in the lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0009252

"My mom takes me to Baptist Church every Sunday; my dad gives me all the science books he can," said the slender youth. "Personally, I don't know what to think."

He said his father, who stated in the lawsuit that the class is an inappropriate attempt to evangelize students, seems "really uptight about this whole thing." The son suggested a different tack: "I think kids should choose whether to take the class or not."

Whether all the attention is a good thing is — like intelligent design — a matter of debate.

"Attention is good," declared Pastor Scott Irwin of the 50-member Lebec Community Church. Inside his white, wood-frame church in the shadow of enormous oaks, Irwin said he hoped the fight would motivate people to question evolution. "I think Lebec is taking a big step for what is true."

Bonnie Kane, director of the Ridge Route Communities Museum, agreed.

"They teach Buddha, Muhammad and everybody else," she said. "I believe they should teach Christianity too."

But head up the two-lane road a bit, and Abbe Gore stands on the opposite side of the rift.

Gore, who works at the community's Internet service provider, believes the intentions might have been good, but the outcome has been a disaster.

"What surprises me is that the local school board decided to go ahead with this class knowing full well it would be controversial," Gore said. "It's an unfortunate way to put Frazier Park on the map."

Well, perhaps for some.

Steven Stark, owner of the Dream Castle restaurant in Frazier Park, was shaking his head over the hubbub. Reporters had been popping in and out all day.

"It's usually a quiet little town," Stark said. But he predicted that the invasion from the outside world would be "good for the area — and it's good for my business."

Appliance Firms' Stock Recovers (AP)

AP, January 12, 2006

DES MOINES (AP) - Shares of Maytag Corp. and Whirlpool Corp. stock recovered slightly Wednesday after taking a hit the day before amid speculation that federal regulators may challenge the firms' merger.

Whirlpool closed Tuesday at $83.10 after dropping $1.89, or 2.2 percent, for the day while Maytag fell 4.7 percent, or 88 cents, to close at $17.89.

Wednesday, Whirlpool shares closed at $83.05 and Maytag finished at $17.98.

Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., agreed in August to buy Maytag for $1.7 billion in cash and stock. Both companies have said they expect the deal to close as early as the first quarter of this year.

Shareholders of Newton, Iowa-based Maytag voted Dec. 22 to approve the merger, pending regulatory approval. The U.S. Justice Department is investigating whether the merger of Whirlpool, the leading appliance seller, and Maytag, the third largest, violates antitrust laws.

Industry analyst David MacGregor, of Ohio-based Longbow Research, said the stock fluctuation was based on nothing more than market scuttlebutt.

He said the market reacted to the buzz that regulators were concerned that the merger would place too much of the middle-priced laundry machines in one company's control. Mid-priced washing machines, for example, sell for $350 to $600, MacGregor said.

"When we start talking about potential concentration in the middle-price points in the laundry category, that is very micro, and it is very unlikely that the transaction is going to be disallowed as a result," MacGregor said.

Other industry observers were more skeptical.

Stephen Calkins, a law professor at Wayne State University in Detroit and a former Federal Trade Commission attorney, has said that regulators probably would have "grave concerns" about concentrating so much of the laundry market in one company.

DOJ_NMG_0009253

Industry analyst Laura Champine, of Morgan Keegan & Co. in Memphis, Tenn., gives the deal a 50-50 chance of gaining regulatory approval.

Prudential Equity Group's Nicholas P. Heymann has written that "2006 is likely to be the year Maytag ceases to exist as an independent company."

Report Sees Legal Hurdles For Whirlpool, Maytag Merger (FREEP)

By ALEJANDRO BODIPO-MEMBA, FREE PRESS BUSINESS WRITER

Detroit Free Press, January 12, 2006

Shares of Whirlpool Corp. and Maytag Corp. changed little Wednesday one day after stock for both appliance makers dropped as much as 2% and 5%, respectively, following rumors that federal regulators may try to block a proposed merger between the two companies.

An article that appeared on the financial news website TheDeal.com, citing people it didn't name, said antitrust concerns might lead to the U.S. Department of Justice seeking an injunction blocking the merger. In August, Benton Harbor-based Whirlpool agreed to purchase Maytag of Newton, Iowa for $1.7 billion in cash and stock, following a flurry of offers and counter offers by several suitors.

The proposed deal, which is expected to be completed in the first quarter of this year, would combine the nation's No. 1 and No. 3 makers of household appliances under one roof. But, antitrust concerns about merging two of that nation's biggest makers of refrigerators, dishwashers and dryers surrounded the deal for months.

News of possible regulatory concerns sent Whirlpool stock tumbling $1.89 a share to $83.10 on the New York Stock Exchange Tuesday. Maytag shares dropped 88 cents to close at $17.89 a share on the same day.

Officials at Whirlpool had no comment. Calls to Maytag weren't immediately returned.

On Wednesday, shares of Whirlpool fell 4 cents to $83.06 at 2:50 p.m. in trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Maytag stock rose 10 cents.

Northwest Drops SkyTeam Antitrust Request (AP)

By Joshua Freed

AP, January 12, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - Northwest Airlines Corp. is withdrawing a request for antitrust immunity for its SkyTeam airline alliance, saying the Transportation Department had signaled it would reject the request anyway.

Separately Wednesday, the parent of Northwest regional feeder Mesaba Aviation Inc. said its fleet may be halved to just 49 turboprop aircraft because of Northwest's reorganization.

Northwest entered SkyTeam last year after its partner, KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, merged with SkyTeam member Air France. Northwest has antitrust immunity to coordinate routes and pricing with KLM, but not with other SkyTeam members, which also includes Delta Air Lines Inc., Alitalia, Continental Airlines Inc. and CSA Czech Airlines. The request was submitted by all the carriers, and Northwest said its withdrawal request would apply to the full alliance.

Northwest and Skyteam members can still codeshare, which makes it easier for passengers to book trips on a single ticket with multiple airlines. But the Transportation Department had said the Skyteam routes overlap so much that little new service was likely to result from an antitrust waiver.

In a statement, Northwest called the initial Transportation Department finding "arbitrary, capricious and inconsistent with established DOT precedent and U.S. international aviation policy.

"Northwest is at a loss to understand this decision by the same DOT officials claiming to strongly support deregulation and an Administration which espouses a free market philosophy," Northwest said. "The U.S. airline industry is in a state of crisis. Four major air carriers, including Northwest and Delta, are operating under Chapter 11, as are several national carriers."

Regional feeder Mesaba is also in Chapter 11, having filed just one month after Northwest, which provides all of Mesaba's planes, revenues, and passengers.

Earlier this year Mesaba operated a fleet of 100 planes for Northwest, including 35 Avro regional jets that seat 69 passengers. But on Wednesday, parent MAIR Holdings Inc. said Northwest told Mesaba that all of Mesaba's Avro jets will be removed by December 2006. Mesaba also said Northwest is removing three of its Saab turboprops, leaving it to built its bankruptcy plan on a fleet of 49 Saabs.

"The four-engine Avros are very expensive to operate, especially in the current high fuel cost environment," Northwest said in a recent employee newsletter.

Northwest has asked regional carriers including Mesaba to bid on flying 76-seat jets, such Mesaba's handful of Canadair Regional Jets. The MAIR statement said Northwest will remove those jets, too, if Mesaba doesn't win that bid. Mesaba spokeswoman Elizabeth Costello said the bid was being submitted this week.

Lobbying To Sell Your House (NYT)

By Glen Justice

The New York Times, January 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11 - When the nation's largest banks decided at the start of the decade that they wanted to get into the real estate brokerage business, one major obstacle stood in their way: the National Association of Realtors.

Lobbyists for the huge trade group stonewalled the banks by tying up new rules at the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve. Then the big score came in 2002 when the Realtors persuaded Congress to adopt a one-year moratorium to stop the banks altogether. It was a card the Realtors would play again and again. Four years later, bankers still have not cracked the real estate market.

"They are known as very aggressive," said Edward L. Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. "Not many trade associations are willing to be that tough on an issue."

But the ability of the National Association of Realtors to beat back competitors is being tested now as few times before. A broad range of critics say the organization and its state and local affiliates have worked to smother competition and protect the decades-old system that provides traditional brokers 5 percent to 6 percent commissions on most home sales.

The Justice Department sued the association last year, asserting that the group's rules for online property listings discriminate against Internet-based brokers. Battles have also raged in the states as Realtor organizations pursued policies that opponents say would hurt discount brokers. The Consumer Federation of America is rewing up to fight any such industry-sponsored legislation state by state in coming months.

"Because the industry functions as a cartel, it is able to overcharge consumers tens of billions of dollars a year," said Stephen Brobeck, the federation's executive director. "Consumers are increasingly wondering why they are often charged more to sell a home than to purchase a new car."

At the same time, traditional brokers are under assault from Web-based companies and discount brokerage firms, many offering rebates and "à la carte" services that can drastically reduce costs. Many of these companies criticize the association as hostile to new business models.

"The industry is not as competitive as it could or should be," said Representative Michael G. Oxley, the chairman of the House Committee on Financial Services and one of several lawmakers who opposed the organization's stand against the banks.

Even some industry allies say the association may be too aggressive in protecting its interests. "They might have small victories, but they are losing the battle," said Representative Pat Tiberi, an Ohio Republican who worked in real estate before joining Congress. "I think they should be relooking some of their tactics."

Officials at the National Association of Realtors are quick to defend the organization. Stephen Cook, the group's spokesman, said the organization and the industry were not under siege. Rather, Mr. Cook said, the current climate is the byproduct of a hot housing market that has focused much national attention on the industry. "The system can always be improved, but we don't think it is broken," Mr. Cook said.

The association's power has swelled during the heady days of the real estate boom. Its ranks have grown by more than 500,000 in the last five years. With almost 1.3 million members, it is the largest trade association in the country. One out of every 203 adults is a dues-paying member, according to August statistics from the association and the United States Census.

The boom has enriched many brokers. With the average cost of a home reaching historic highs, consumers paid roughly $61 billion in brokerage fees for residential real estate in 2004 as some 6.8 million homes changed hands. Last year, the industry was on track to sell almost 7.1 million homes, according to estimates in December.

The Realtors association is also one of the most powerful lobbies in Washington, spending nearly $94 million annually. It dates back almost 100 years. And it has an iron grip on its members. For access to property listings, individual agents and the brokers who employ them must belong to the national association and their state and local affiliates. Even the term "Realtor" is trademarked for use by members only.

The association spent some $13.5 million in 2004 to lobby Congress and the administration on issues like housing, lending, insurance, small-business legislation and anything that might affect agents, according to lobbying disclosures.

Those who have opposed the Realtors speak of another asset as well: chutzpah. Over the years, the organization has gained a reputation as a fierce fighter in the nation's capital, often willing to go further than many other Washington groups to win its battles.

One prime combatant in the antitrust case is Laurie Janik, the association's general counsel. Ms. Janik said her organization, rather than fighting, tried for months to accommodate Justice Department requests to change its rules for online property listings. Ultimately, she said, the requests went too far and would have eroded the control that Realtors have over the listings, which they consider proprietary.

Ms. Janik said the department also wanted the association to sign a consent decree, raising the possibility of legal consequences if it violated the agreement. It was a step the Realtors were not willing to take. Her group held its ground, and the government filed suit in September.

"I think this is a big gamble for them," she said. "They are very likely going to lose this case."

When the suit was filed, J. Bruce McDonald, a deputy assistant attorney general, said, "Our job is to ensure that one group of competitors doesn't tell some of its members they can't compete in a certain way and undercut the level playing field."

At the heart of the case are the roughly 850 multiple listing services through which brokers cooperate to list properties for sale. The system dates back decades. Once kept in large, heavy books, the lists are now maintained electronically and the data is used to market properties on the Internet.

Almost all agents and brokers - even competitors - use the lists to showcase sellers' properties and obtain prospects for buyers. But the Realtors' control over these lists is a controversial subject in the industry. David Barry, a California lawyer and longtime critic of Realtor associations, is seeking to put an initiative on the California ballot that would open the state's multiple listing services to the public.

The association's rules allow brokers to withhold their property listings from competing Internet sites, though that also means forfeiting the ability to show on their own sites houses listed by competitors.

The Justice Department lawsuit contends that these rules give an unfair advantage to large, traditional brokers that supply the majority of listings. The suit points to internal industry documents that identify online brokers as a threat.

Some discount brokers are elated. "We celebrate the Department of Justice involvement," said Eric A. Danziger, chief executive of ZipRealty, a full-service brokerage firm that offers discounts and makes heavy use of the Internet. "What's happening now is many years overdue, a focus on the consumer. There's still huge resistance from the real estate industry."

Steve Murray, editor of Real Trends, an industry newsletter, said that even if Realtors won the Justice Department case, industry efforts to slow market forces and technology might yield few gains. "Businesses that erect barriers and moats around their industry for protection end up getting slaughtered," he said, adding that "a rational person could say these guys are a cartel."

The Justice Department case is still in its early stages before a federal judge in Chicago, where the Realtors have asked for a dismissal and prosecutors will respond in coming weeks.

Ms. Janik warns that major changes to the multiple listing services could cause large nationwide brokerages to pull out of the system and establish their own private listings. That, she said, would be a far greater threat to small firms.

"I'm scratching my head, saying 'what is the Justice Department thinking?' " Ms. Janik said.

DOJ_NMG_0009256

With the housing market showing signs of cooling, market forces could change the landscape a lot sooner than any legal battle might. If home sales decline, either because owners are reluctant to sell at lower prices or rising interest rates keep buyers on the sidelines, Realtors could be in for major changes.

Even industry heavyweights agree that change is imminent. Dave Liniger, chairman and co-founder of Re/Max, said he expected commissions to continue to drop and à la carte models, in which customers choose the services they want and pay accordingly, to continue to rise. But he said both would happen slowly over a period of years.

"It's the evolution of the industry, but not the end of the industry," he said.

At Cendant, which operates Century 21 and Coldwell Banker, Richard A. Smith, the chief executive of the real estate unit, said he expected traditional brokers to gain ground in a softer market. When the market tightens, he said, homeowners are often more interested in selling quickly than they are in saving money.

Still, Mr. Smith said his company, which operates its own discount brokerage, was closely watching the pressure on prices and any action by regulators. And he said that while his organization did not always support the association's political positions, it agreed with the group in the Justice Department case.

"People shouldn't be forced to market their homes the way the government wants them to market their homes," Mr. Smith said. "What's next?"

Realtors have also collided with the Justice Department in several state capitals, where the industry has pushed legal changes that some say will harm nontraditional brokers. Some of the new rules ban rebates to home buyers or sellers. Others, known as minimum-service bills, which require brokers to offer a broad range of services to obtain a real estate license, can hurt discounters who offer fewer services for lower fees.

In Missouri, for example, the legislature unanimously passed a minimum-services bill that sent lobbyists on both sides scrambling to sway Gov. Matt Blunt. As they had done in other states, the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission urged Mr. Blunt to veto the measure.

Ms. Janik had weighed in with a letter to state associations months earlier, saying the Justice Department was merely lobbying and could not apply federal antitrust laws to cases in which states have regulatory authority.

"Realtor associations have the right to lobby for legislative and regulatory action that they support - even if the effect of such action would be anticompetitive," she wrote in a strongly worded memo.

The Missouri Association of Realtors hired Gregg L. Hartley, chief operating officer of Cassidy & Associates, one of the largest lobbying firms in Washington. Mr. Hartley is a former chief of staff to Representative Roy Blunt, the governor's father and one of the most powerful Republicans in Congress. When Representative Tom DeLay was indicted earlier this year, Mr. Blunt took over his duties as majority leader.

The Missouri association paid Mr. Hartley $50,000 for a single month of lobbying, according to state records, which listed his only task as working to enact the bill. Mr. Hartley did not return calls for comment.

Ultimately, Governor Blunt signed the bill.

Johnson & Johnson Won't Wave White Flag Yet For Guidant (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, January 12, 2006

Johnson & Johnson (JNJ) (JNJ) appears unwilling to let its planned Guidant Corp. (GDT) (GDT) purchase slip away without a fight, a shift given J&J's prior unwillingness to budge from its offer for the medical device maker, but a move that reflects the new reality of intense competition.

J&J's current purchase price for Guidant (GDT), about $64 a share, is the much-reduced product of an acrimonious spat between the companies following troubles with Guidant's (GDT) heart rhythm devices last year. Given the dispute, many thought J&J was locked into that price, even as a surprise $72 a share offer from rival Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX) dramatically changed the landscape.

The offer, officially made Sunday at $25 billion, vaulted Boston Scientific (BSX) to apparent frontrunner status, but several reports this week suggest J&J is willing to change its tune. The Wall Street Journal reported that Guidant's (GDT)board plans to meet at 3:00 p.m. EST Wednesday to decide between the Boston Scientific (BSX) offer and a new, potentially much more competitive J&J offer.

The New York Times reported earlier Wednesday that J&J approached Guidant's (GDT)board at the last minute late Tuesday, heading off a vote in favor of Boston Scientific (BSX), to negotiate a new deal. CNBC also reported Wednesday that J&J plans to raise its offer.

Boston Scientific (BSX), meanwhile, may be willing to answer a any J&J move. "Don't count us out," Boston Scientific (BSX) spokesman Paul Donovan said Wednesday, declining to elaborate further.

If health-care giant J&J still really wants Guidant (GDT), "there's a bidding war on now," said Tao Levy, analyst with Deutsche Bank.

Boston Scientific (BSX) shares recently traded at $25.49 a share, down $99, or 3.7%. J&J shares recently traded at $62.15 a share, down 95 cents, or 1.5%. Guidant (GDT)recently traded at $70.38, up 99 cents, or 1.4%.

According to Peter Goldman, a portfolio manager at Chicago Asset Management, which owns 150,000 J&J shares, the company's shift isn't a shock. He'd like to see J&J end up with Guidant (GDT), but can't imagine J&J overpaying or getting in to an outright bidding war.

"I think they're very disciplined," Goldman said.

A Guidant (GDT) spokesman declined comment on the matter Wednesday, and J&J also remained quiet. J&J spokesman Jeff Leebaw said the company won't comment beyond a statement made Sunday, when J&J said it expects to consummate the Guidant (GDT)purchase immediately after a vote by Guidant (GDT) shareholders Jan. 31, and that the agreed-upon deal between the two companies remained the best offer.

Ever since Boston Scientific (BSX) sparked a debate, J&J has generally stuck to its guns, claiming its offer represented fair value for Guidant (GDT). J&J has also pointed to its ability to close the deal quickly: Boston Scientific (BSX) has an aggressive target to close a Guidant (GDT) purchase in the first quarter, but unlike J&J, it doesn't have antitrust clearance.

Given those statements, and its intense effort to drive Guidant's (GDT) buying price lower, many analysts speculated that J&J couldn't change its tune or considerably increase its offer, and was willing to walk away with a $625 million breakup fee.

Wednesday's reports suggest J&J wants to remain in the game, and that it recognizes it has to at least close the offer gap to remain competitive. Elliott Associates LP and Elliott International LP, which collectively own about 3 million Guidant (GDT) shares, wrote Guidant's (GDT) board Tuesday to encourage them to take Boston Scientific's (BSX) offer, and said J&J would have to up its offer to no less than $71 a share to compete.

Boston Scientific's (BSX) Donovan addressed the price issue in a brief statement Wednesday. "Our $72 offer is higher than Johnson & Johnson's (JNJ), and there's strong upside potential over time," he said.

J&J may have to eat some crow and its earlier statements to get back into the game. It makes sense if the company is willing to do so, analyst Levy said.

"At the end of the day they need a big acquisition," he said of J&J. "They wanted to get cute with the price and they got too cute."

If Guidant's (GDT) board officially deems Boston Scientific's (BSX) offer to be superior, and notifies J&J of such in a letter, J&J will have five business days to respond.

Levy does not own shares in the three companies. Deutsche Bank has a financial stake and banking relationship with all three companies.

Investors Expect Battle For P&O After Singapore Hints At A Bid (WSJ)

By Bruce Stanley, Cris Prystay And Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, January 12, 2006

Smelling a battle between a pair of rich bidders amid a boom in cargo volume, investors pushed shares of port operator Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. of Britain up 6.3% yesterday after PSA International Pte. Ltd. of Singapore said it might make a bid for it at as much as £3.54 billion ($6.25 billion).

DOJ_NMG_0009258

PSA, a unit of Singapore's state-owned investment company Temasek Holdings Pte. Ltd., said after the London market closed Tuesday that it could pay as much as 470 pence a share for P&O, as the company is known. That would trump a bid of 443 pence a share, or £3.3 billion, that Dubai Ports World, of the United Arab Emirates, made in November and that P&O's board then recommended to its shareholders.
