Debate Underway Over Whether New Orleans Should Be Rebuilt. Economists have begun to consider the rebuilding of New Orleans. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Hilsenrath) reports, "It's not just the city's natural disadvantages (much of it is located below sea level) that worry economists. It's also its economic position -- rampant poverty and an exodus of people and businesses even before the hurricane touched down -- and the need to avoid creating incentives that could lead to development that is no less vulnerable." Gary Becker, the Nobel prize-winning University of Chicago economist, "any rebuilding of the place should come with tough love from the government, such as tight zoning restrictions in flood-prone areas and tough flood insurance rules." Becker is "not the only Nobel-winner arguing for circumspection about rebuilding New Orleans. 'The best policy is not to permit rebuilding in New Orleans in the areas that are subject to flooding,' says Edward Prescott, a researcher at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis." Richard Posner "proposes that the city come back something like Colonial Williamsburg -- a quaint tourist site that isn't really attached to a city."

Former California Gov. Pete Wilson writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/13) that following the Northridge Earthquake, California "completed the repairs and reopened the freeway to its normal heavy traffic in just 66 days. How? We did two things. First, I quickly exercised the extraordinary emergency powers conferred upon the governor of California by the state Government Code. … Second, we took a page from the book of private sector incentives for accelerating performance. We told contractors bidding to repair the bridges that they must submit bids that specified not only the cost but the date of completion, and that they must agree to an added condition: For every day they were late, they would incur a penalty of $200,000; and for every day they were early, they would be rewarded with a bonus of $200,000." Wilson adds that "before abandoning New Orleans and retreating to the terrestrial, if not the moral, high ground -- we must exhaust all justifiable alternatives. I suggest that the needed super-levee solution will require a sharing of its cost between taxpayers and private investors."

New Orleans Council Upset By Federal Control. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Opdyke, Cooper) reports, "Underscoring tensions over who will control the agenda for the reconstruction of New Orleans, city leaders vented frustration that the federal government already has issued large contracts for initial cleanup and rebuilding without input from local leaders. At a meeting of the New Orleans city council yesterday, held 80 miles away in a conference room at the state capitol in Baton Rouge" council members said that "local minority contractors should be playing a bigger part." But New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said that "the expected aid amounted to an opportunity to completely rebuild the city, and urged the group not to squabble over the first federal money to arrive." He added, "there's going to be enough money for everybody." Meanwhile, President Bush "tried to assuage concerns that the federal government will dictate how New Orleans will be rebuilt."

Evacuees Struggle To Rebuild Their Lives. The Washington Post (9/13, C1, Duke) profiles the Caiado family, who evacuated their home in Marerro, just outside New Orleans. The Post reports, "Folks like them have been evacuated to cities and towns across the nation, but here in Baton Rouge they have nearly doubled the population. Federal, state and local agencies are swamped with applicants for various kinds of aid. Internet cafes, too, have drawn hordes of people searching for a way out of their mess, a way to reconnect with the grid of life they knew. You can see them, huddled over stacks of papers or yellow legal pads. They are, often, the ones with tears in their eyes, desperation on their faces."

Many Displaced By Katrina Seeking Employment Elsewhere. NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 8, 2:15, Allen) reported on the difficulties faced by many of those displaced by Katrina as they seek new jobs. At "this job center in an evacuee shelter, we found workers who used to be clerks, truck drivers, government employees." There are "hundreds of evacuees who in addition to everything else lost their jobs. After some two weeks dependent on the kindness of strangers, they really want to work." There are "job centers and fairs like this across the country, long lines of unemployed filling data banks with resumes from Atlanta to Los Angeles." Employers are "pitching in, offering nursing jobs in California, plumbing work in Seattle, even looking to hire a massage therapist from the Gulf Coast in North Dakota."

New Orleans Residents Starting To Return. A growing number of New Orleans residents are defying the mandatory evacuation order and returning to the city. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Axtman) reports, "There are signs of return to normalcy. The city's airport reopened for cargo traffic Sunday and limited passenger service is planned to begin Tuesday. Officially, the New Orleans Police Department (NOPD) is set to issue temporary weeklong badges to residents with valid reasons for returning. Unofficially, those manning checkpoints have been letting many residents through with simply a wave and a 'good luck.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Luo) says that in recent days, city officials "have increased the pressure to leave by cutting off the military-style rations that many have been living on, a National Guard spokesman said. … But Maj. Amy Hannah, a spokeswoman for the task force that represents the active-duty military side of the hurricane response, said members of the 82nd Airborne Division and other soldiers would continue to provide the meals. City police officials declined to comment."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Lavendera) reported that "plans to forcibly remove the thousands of hold-outs who refuse to leave have been abandoned."

Water Levels In New Orleans Dropping. Water levels dropped "precipitously" in New Orleans Monday, according to the Los Angeles Times (9/13, Zucchino). Areas "that had been under 6 to 8 feet of water less than two days earlier were dry at dawn, with ooze now smearing the streets and water collecting at low, marshy spots. For the first time in the 8th and 9th wards in East New Orleans and Mid-City neighborhoods, search and rescue crews were able to patrol on foot. By midday, National Guardsmen and Marines said they had found several corpses inside homes that had been inaccessible until today.

New Orleans Airport Set To Resume Flights. USA Today (9/13, Frank) reports, "Only Northwest Airlines plans to start round trips today with two flights to Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport from Memphis. The airline will add a round trip from Minneapolis and one from Detroit on Monday, spokeswoman Jennifer Bagdade says. Delta Air Lines, the second-largest carrier at New Orleans, will resume service with two round trips from Atlanta on Wednesday and on Thursday. Starting Friday, it will expand to five Atlanta round trips and one from Cincinnati. Southwest Airlines, which has been the airport's largest carrier, has not made a decision on restarting service. Continental Airlines plans to resume service Monday. Three of its four scheduled flights from New Orleans to Houston are sold out, spokesman David Messing says."

New Orleans Business Leaders Hope To Have Tourist Areas Opened By Year's End. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 4, 2:35, Vargas) reported there "were some dramatic signs of recovery" in New Orleans, and there are "more indications that this beleaguered city is beginning the process of rebirth." ABC (Harris) added, "Business leaders think they can get" the French Quarter "up and running by the end of the year. There's talk about scaled-back Mardi Gras for the end of February. In this city, where water is receding faster than expected, cleanup and recovery are proceeding at an equally surprising rate." Today, the "city's port sent out its first commercial shipment." The "optimism is fueled by the fact that while 80% of New Orleans was flooded, tourist areas like the French Quarter were spared."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 2, 2:10, Williams) reported, "Water now covers 50% of the city, give or take, that's down from 80%." NBC (Costello) added, "Two weeks after Katrina struck so much of New Orleans is still up to its gutters in water. But in the communities closest the pumps, the water is receding, leaving behind entire neighborhoods that are caked in a grimy, white dust and a layer of sludge and mud."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 4, 1:45, Williams) reported, "There were some signs that life, in small ways, is starting to get back to normal." NBC (Tibbles) added some small, family-owned businesses are reopening for business. It is "a grimy, greasy oasis. The St. Claude Used Tire Shop is open as long as there's daylight. And because it's vital, it's making a go of things in this all but deserted town." Joe Peterson "and his crew is busy keeping people moving, and no inflated prices here. It's still 12 bucks to fix a flat and five for labor."

Mercy Flights For Katrina Evacuees Suspended. The Chicago Tribune/KRT (9/13, Wronski, Long) reports, "After flying thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees to shelters across the country, federal officials on Monday suspended their mercy flights, saying they're no longer necessary. 'The need for airlifting has been met,' said Valerie Smith, spokeswoman for the Department of Homeland Security." Since Katrina struck, "More than 26 states and the District of Columbia have taken in tens of thousands of evacuees."

Air Force To Begin Spraying For Mosquitoes. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Cooper) reported, "The Air Force has begun flying missions against the burgeoning mosquito population at the request of FEMA and the Centers for Disease Control. Aircraft out of Duke Field, Florida are going to make low-level flights at dusk spraying 60,000 acres a day."

Confirmed Death Toll Reaches 279 In Louisiana, 214 In Mississippi. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "The latest confirmed toll from Katrina includes 279 deaths in Louisiana and 214 in Mississippi."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 3, :30, Williams) reported, "There was another gruesome discovery reported in New Orleans today. Search teams found more than 40 bodies, many of them elderly patients, inside a flooded hospital. An administrator at the Memorial Medical Center said the patients died while waiting to be evacuated as temperatures inside hit 106 degrees. The spokesman denied the patients were abandoned in any way."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 2, 3:40, Pitts) reported, "Today in New Orleans, the recovery of the dead is well under way. 45 bodies were discovered inside a local hospital Sunday. But it is the haunting voices of the living that still send shivers down the spines of the women who heard them." CBS News "was given exclusive access to the 911 calls of those first horrifying hours, and to the women who answered them." It's "still unknown how many of these callers survived."

The New York Times (9/13, Johnson) reports that officials at the Memorial Medical Center "said at least some of the victims died while waiting to be removed in the four days after the hurricane struck, with the electricity out and temperatures exceeding 100 degrees. Steven L. Campanini, a spokesman for the hospital's owner, Tenet Healthcare, said the dead included patients who died awaiting evacuation as well as people who died before the hurricane struck and whose bodies were in the hospital morgue."

A front page story in the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Struck) adds that "the discovery was certain to raise new questions about why so many city hospitals were not evacuated before the storm. Two medical professionals inside the Memorial Medical Center said conditions began to turn desperate shortly after the floodwaters cut off roads. The darkened corridors were jammed with families. Drinking water grew scarce. Medical supplies exhausted quickly; even IVs were being rationed, they said.'

The Washington Times/AP (9/13, Martel) adds, "Police Superintendent Eddie Compass declined to answer questions yesterday about the discovery, including whether police received any calls for assistance from the Memorial Medical Center after the hospital was evacuated."

Hospital Staff Describe Efforts To Comfort Dying. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Moore) reports that staff from the hospital described "a desperate and harrowing struggle to comfort dying patients as floodwaters rose and the city descended into chaos." Dave Goodson, director of support services at the hospital, "said rescuers came and left — sometimes they helped take someone from the hospital and other times they brought new evacuees plucked from rooftops. Elderly patients had the hardest time, Goodson said. Heat and sickness conspired to kill about 16 patients from a nearby convalescent hospital." Goodson and oncology nurse Joanne Lalla "said that despite their difficult situation, the hospital staff continued to serve the sick as well as they could. For a time they carted patients to the roof of the building to wait for helicopters, but when they realized that they weren't going to be airlifted, they went back downstairs, Lalla said."

Katrina's Dead Still Unidentified, Unknown. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Pressley, Salmon) reports, "The people who died during Katrina and its aftermath are, two weeks later, still largely unidentified and unknown. No one can say yet how many perished, who they were, how and when they died. Communications and recovery problems -- and a heavy cloak of secrecy -- have compounded the mystery. Officials have been told not to pass on any information. For now, and for the indefinite future, the victims of Katrina remain the dead without a roster."

Marines Not Finding Bodies In St. Bernard Parish. The New York Times (9/13, Kifner) reports that Marines searching St. Bernard Parish for bodies of residents killed in the hurricane, "have yet to find any bodies, commanders said Monday. … Dire warnings, from marine planning sessions, of a devil's brew of toxic floodwater, decomposing bodies, feral swamp creatures and hostile, gun-toting locals have just not materialized."

Commander Of Military Cleanup Effort Profiled. USA Today (9/13, Leinwand) profiles Lt. Gen. Russel Honoré, commander of the 1st Army, "which is now charged with the largest humanitarian effort in U.S. history." The "nerve center of the military's response to Hurricane Katrina is at Camp Shelby near Hattiesburg, Miss. … Although Camp Shelby is a 45-minute helicopter ride north of New Orleans, Honoré prefers to spend his day in the disaster zone. He has an air-conditioned tent with computers and communications equipment set up in a garage at the Port of New Orleans. But a good deal of his time is spent riding in the back of an Army truck."

Task Force Says NEPA Hindered Hurricane Protection For New Orleans. A congressional task force says that a 35-year old federal law known as the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) has hampered energy production, the construction of homes and hurricane protection for New Orleans. The Washington Times (9/13, Price) reports that NEPA "requires the U.S. government to evaluate the environmental impact of any significant project undertaken by a federal agency, financed with federal money, or requiring a federal permit. It further mandates that the results of the government assessment be made public and that the public decide whether its benefits outweigh its drawbacks." A task force on improving the act, chaired by Rep. Cathy McMorris, "has held four hearings across the country to assess NEPA's role in accessing affordable energy, building roads and homes, and managing the nation's natural resources. NEPA, which established a national environmental policy framework, has 'resulted in thousands of lawsuits,' holding up some projects for more than 20 years and killing others, said Jennifer Zuccarelli, a task force spokeswoman."

FEMA Hopes To Open 30,000 Homes Every Two Weeks. The New York Times (9/13, Lipton) says a "building boom is under way" as the government begins "what urban planners are calling one of the biggest bursts of federal housing development in United States history. Last year in Florida, the Federal Emergency Management Agency set a record by installing 15,000 homes in the aftermath of four hurricanes there. In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, they hope to open 30,000 homes every two weeks, reaching 300,000 within months. … The numbers might drop if the demand does not meet expectations. But more than 140,000 people are now packed into emergency shelters, while hundreds of thousands of others fill hotels, homes of friends or relatives or are temporarily relocated across the United States. The building blitz is intended to bring as many people as possible back to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama."

CNN's Newsnight with Aaron Brown (9/12, Nissen) reported that FEMA has been "working hard in southern Mississippi since before the storm." Eric Gentry, FEMA: "I think a lot of people don't understand that a lot of the help that they saw early on came in as part of the FEMA umbrella." CNN added, "Like these 18 wheelers, sent by FEMA with tons of bottled water, ice, and emergency food to Pascagoula, Mississippi, early last week, along with thousands of FEMA recruited, FEMA trained, FEMA paid workers. … This FEMA team was as it worked it's way door to door, or rubble to rubble, in Pearlington."

FEMA Allocates $5 Billion To Purchase Trailer Homes. The Washington Times (9/13, Dinan) reports, "FEMA has allocated nearly $5 billion to buy 300,000 trailer homes as part of its emergency hurricane spending -- even though 270,000 of them are on back order and will have to be built, says a congressman who voted against last week's $51.8 billion bill. Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, said President Bush and members of Congress are spending quickly on Hurricane Katrina relief in part to try to counter bad publicity over the federal government's initial response."

FEMA Said To Have Refused To Pay Airfare For California Search-And-Rescue Crews. MSNBC Scarborough Country (9/12, 10:00 pm, Shuster) reported that urban search-and-rescue crews out of California have "said that they were told by FEMA not to take an airplane to get here [to New Orleans], but to take a bus…because the government would not pay for their airfare, about $30,000. In hindsight, that was a huge blunder, given that these were the teams that had that sort of search-and-rescue communications equipment." Scarborough: "Are you telling me tonight -- and you've got this exclusively -- are you telling me tonight that these people contacted FEMA and were ready to fly out the day after the storm and they were told, no thanks; we don't need your help?" Shuster: "That's right. That's exactly what we're reporting, Joe."

FEMA Organized Thousands Of Firefighters For Community Relations Work. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 8, 3:10, Attkisson) reported, "In the crisis after Katrina, an all-call went out to fire stations around the country. Send anyone you can spare for 30 days. FEMA will cover the costs." But "not all of the firefighters have made it to New Orleans. Many got stuck in a wasteful bureaucratic limbo." Billy Whitson and Noel Saldivar "are from Richardson, Texas. On September 1, FEMA flew them from Dallas to Atlanta, where they and hundreds of other firefighters tackled paperwork. On day two, they sat through FEMA classes on diversity and sexual harassment. On day three, Whitson and Saldivar were tapped for a special ops mission to New Orleans. It wasn't what they hoped for." Whitson: "We were being sent to New Orleans to be nothing more than a backdrop for a press conference that was going to take place with President Bush and Michael Brown." Attkisson: "But they missed the news conference, and spent the next three days helplessly watching others perform rescues, with no assignment of their own. When they complained on day six, FEMA sent them home." Thousands "are thought to be in the same predicament. FEMA never intended to send them to the destruction zone. They were slated for community relations, like handing out pamphlets to survivors."

Spellings Says Hurricane Displaced 372,000 Students. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday there are no clear answers about who will pay to educate the 372,000 students displaced by Katrina. The AP (9/13, Feller) reports, "In an interview with The Associated Press, Spellings gave the broadest assessment yet of how the hurricane has affected schools at the start of their year. … 'I shouldn't be talking about the details that I'm in negotiations with the White House and the (Capitol) Hill on,' Spellings said. 'As soon as I can talk about it, I want to talk about it.'" Spellings "said she will ask Congress for unprecedented authority to ease aspects of a federal law governing the education of homeless children. She already had pledged to consider using her powers to waive parts of the law known as No Child Left Behind, including requirements on yearly testing and teacher quality."

Two Mississippi Coast Schools Reopen. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 10, 2:05, Schieffer) reported, "The fall term has begun now for most children in this country, but the government reported today that more than 372,000 school-age kids had to flee the Gulf Coast. In the Mississippi disaster zone, a fortunate few went back to school today." CBS (Whitaker) added, "Today, St. James Elementary in Gulfport welcomed students back, one of only two schools to reopen on the entire Mississippi Coast. Outside, overwhelming chaos; in here, a defiant normalcy."

Lack Of Influence On Hill Could Affect Louisiana Efforts To Get Relief. While Louisiana once had one of the most influential delegations in Congress, those powerful members have retired, and the New York Times (9/13, Rosenbaum) reports, the Louisiana delegation, "in the face of perhaps the state's worst calamity, has no one in a position of authority. … No one can say specifically what the diminished influence will mean for the state's efforts to get hurricane relief from Washington, but no one who follows Congress doubts that sooner or later the ramifications will be felt."

Louisiana Likely To Lose House Seat As Result Of Katrina. Election officials say the evacuation of coastal Louisiana "will likely cost the state one of its House seats," The Hill (9/13, Savodnik) reports. With Katrina "having emptied out New Orleans and much of the surrounding parishes, hundreds of thousands of people who once voted in Louisiana's 1st, 2nd and 3rd Districts are no longer there. And many who never heard of Reps. Jim McCrery, Rodney Alexander and Richard Baker — Louisiana Republicans who represent the 4th, 5th and 6th Districts, respectively — are now camped out in those districts."

Bush Asked To Save Gulf Coast Naval Bases. Reuters (9/13) reports, "Congressmen from Mississippi and Texas asked President George W. Bush on Monday to seek the reversal of proposed closures for two Gulf Coast naval bases, saying the closures would further delay disaster response in the region. In a letter, Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott, a Republican, and Texas Rep. Solomon Ortiz, a Democrat, asked Bush to demand that the Defense Base Realignment and Closure Commission (BRAC) reconsider its recommendation to close the Pascagoula Naval Station in Mississippi and the Ingleside Naval Station at Corpus Christi, Texas. … Bush can ask the commission once to make revisions. After that he can reject the list outright or send it on to Congress, which can accept or reject it but can make no changes."

Hurricane States Will Need Ample Federal Help To Avert Debt Crisis. State treasurers and local financial officials in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama say they will need federal help to pay billions of dollars of debt and finance reconstruction. The New York Times (9/13, Wayne) reports, "So far, they have no formal plan, said John Kennedy, Louisiana's treasurer, but they are considering proposals for the federal government to make payments on existing bonds and cover short-term municipal operating costs. … Last week, the National Association of Bond Lawyers wrote to the White House to propose a Hurricane Katrina Indebtedness Guarantee and Financing Act. That measure would provide cash advances to municipalities unable to pay bondholders and would offer federal guarantees on future debt. These advances would have to be paid back in 10 years. The group also called for creation of a Liberty Bond-type program."

Katrina Donations Outpace Previous Disasters. Charities are saying donations for victims of Hurricane Katrina have come in at a pace that exceeds those from other recent disasters. The New York Times (9/13, Strom) reports, "Almost all of the money is going to the American Red Cross, in large part because other international relief and development organizations simply do not have significant operations in the United States. … Americans donated more than $738 million to relief efforts through Sept. 11, according to The Chronicle of Philanthropy. In the 10 days after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, $239 million was collected, while $163 million was collected in the nine days after the tsunami last December."

Corporate Contributions Reach $547 Million. USA Today (9/13, Jones) reports, "The U.S. Chamber of Commerce says 145 companies had each pledged $1 million or more in cash and products through Monday. In all, 396 companies have given $409 million, says executive director Stephen Jordan of the chambers' Center for Corporate Citizenship. Companies have collected another $138 million in contributions from customers, for $547 million that will likely soon pass the $565 million raised for tsunami relief. Jordan predicts the total will likely be about $1 billion, surpassing the record $750 million collected after Sept. 11, 2001."

Charity Efforts Reignites Debate Over Mandatory Service. The Washington Post (9/13, A4, Strauss) reports that "in a marriage of compassion and convenience, some students moved by the victims' plight have also been able to help themselves by earning credits toward their school's service requirement." For "those who have supported or opposed mandatory service, the recent outpouring has reopened the debate on whether compassion can be taught."

Charities' Use Of Contributions Analyzed. NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 7, 2:55, Williams) reported, "This huge outpouring of charity for Katrina's victims, and sadly, of course, there's a dark side: The scammers trying to take advantage of this crisis or donations being used for purposes other than helping the victims. And now, how to be sure your money is helping the way you intended it to. And by the way, we are talking about a great deal of money here. Americans have so far contributed at least $761 million to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, with the vast majority of that going to the American Red Cross. They have so far brought in $584 million." NBC (Myers) added, "How can Americans be sure all that money actually gets to the victims? The Red Cross promises almost all its donations will go to feed and house victims and fuel emergency relief vehicles." In New Jersey, "independent analysts at the company Charity Navigator check financial statements of 4600 charities." Its Website "then rates charities for efficiency and overall performance." Trent Stamp, Charity Navigator Executive Director: "If you can find a charity that will spend 75 to 80 cents of your dollar on their charitable purposes, you can probably trust them." Myers: "But what about the list of charities recommended by FEMA? The Red Cross and a few others get high marks, but B'nai Brith, a Jewish charity, gets a low rating because analysts found only 56 cents of every dollar goes to relief activities, the rest to fundraising. B'nai Brith disputes the methodology. Many of the religious organizations listed by FEMA disclose so little, they can't even be rated." So "how can you be sure your money is well spent? Experts say beware of email, of door-to-door solicitations, and of websites with addresses that end dot-com. Most legitimate charities, they say, are dot-org."

Citing Katrina, GOP Congressional Leaders Drop Plans For Tax Cut Extensions. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Mullins) reports that in a "major shift of priorities after Hurricane Katrina, Republican leaders in Congress have delayed plans to extend dividend and capital gains tax cuts and may shelve them for the rest of the year." The House and Senate had "planned a fall legislative agenda around a massive budget bill that extended to 2010 the 15% tax rate on dividends and capital gains signed by President Bush two years ago. The cut was one of the president's signature initiatives and is seen inside the White House as a key part of his economic legacy." The 15% rate "isn't scheduled to expire until the end of 2008 -- meaning there's still time to push an extension through. But Republicans, chastened by the costs of rebuilding the Gulf Coast and negative public assessments of Washington's initial response to the hurricane, have decided that taking any action on the bill is politically untenable at least until late October in the suddenly changed political and budgetary environment."

With Appropriations Lagging, Congress Faces Need For Continuing Resolution. Roll Call (9/13, Yachnin) reports that in what "has become an annual tradition, House and Senate lawmakers will likely need to pass at least one continuing resolution to fund government operations. As the clock winds down on fiscal 2005, the chambers have completed work on only two of 11 spending bills." Though the While House "has yet to formally seek a CR, the chamber's appropriators are nonetheless readying for the inevitable request." In the meantime, House appropriators "remain optimistic that the individual spending bills will be completed in coming months, circumventing the need for a consolidated appropriations measure."

Grand Jury Summons Disrupt Lower Level White House Aides' Lives. The Washington Post (9/13, A25, Coates) reports, "Sympathy can be hard to come by for White House officials who are summoned to appear before a grand jury." Those whose "identities remain a secret suffer in silence, discouraged from reaching out to their closest friends for help. Those whose names leak into the public domain become lightning rods for rumor, suspicion and innuendo, as politicians, commentators and journalists try to divine a meaning behind each summons." The "latest White House staffer to face the grand jury is Susan B. Ralston, assistant to White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who gave testimony to the committee investigating the leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame." But while the "politics of every appearance is picked over in minute detail, there is also a human story to each summons that often goes unexplored. Witnesses face stress, uncertainty and -- worst of all -- crippling lawyer's fees that can take years to pay off. And as prosecutors cast their net ever wider, inexperienced staffers with few financial assets are increasingly facing the emotional and financial burden of grand jury testimony."

Hurricane Victims May Get Access To 401(k) Funds. USA Today (9/13, Chu) reports, "The IRS is expected to ease 401(k) restrictions this week to allow those affected by Hurricane Katrina to tap into their retirement funds. Representatives of organizations involved in retirement issues…say they expect the IRS to announce this move in the next few days."

CNN Allegedly Coaxing Guests To "Get Angry" When Discussing Katrina. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" (9/13, Pierce) reports, "Los Angeles Times pundit Michael Kinsley, who used to work for CNN, says the network is coaching guests to 'get angry' when they go on the air to discuss Hurricane Katrina. 'The TV news networks, which only a few months ago were piously suppressing emotional fireworks by their pundits, are now piously encouraging their news anchors to break out of the emotional straitjackets and express outrage,' Mr. Kinsley said. 'A Los Angeles Times colleague of mine, appearing on CNN last week to talk about Katrina, was told by a producer to 'get angry.'" Mr. Kinsley's words were reported yesterday by the online Drudge Report."

GOP Opponents Seek To Derail King's Bid For Homeland Security Chair. Republican opponents of Rep. Peter King are questioning his loyalty to the party in what The Hill (9/13, O'Connor, Tiron) calls "a last-gasp effort to derail" his effort to become chairman of the homeland Security Committee. King's GOP opponents "have compiled a one-page collection of negative remarks that King has made over the years about members of the Republican Party. The sheet, which was obtained by The Hill, includes a King quote from 1996 criticizing then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and then-Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas) for comments the two made describing union leaders as 'big labor' and 'union bosses.'"

King's Phone Call To Bush In New Orleans Noted. Roll Call (9/13, Akers) reports Rep. Peter King "greased the wheels for some New York firefighters who were dispatched to New Orleans for rescue-and-cleanup patrol after Hurricane Katrina. The firefighters wanted to meet the president during his brief stopover in the wiped-out city, so they called their man King to see if he could put the fix in." Roll Call continues, "King called…back to see if they were successful. Battling overloaded mobile phone service, he finally got through on the fourth try and was startled — and maybe a little irked — to hear a voice saying, 'You should be down here with your men.' … Again, the voice came back: 'Pedro, how come you're not down here?' By now, the jig was up: It was W himself, who nicknamed King 'Pedro' some time ago. And by now, Pedro was shaking in his boots."

Carolinas Prepare As Ophelia Slows Offshore. Tropical Storm Ophelia remained along the Carolina coast Monday, the New York Times/AP (9/13, Press) reports. The storm, which dropped "slightly in strength from a hurricane as it barely moved toward land," was "centered more than 200 miles offshore." Nonresidents "were ordered to leave one of North Carolina's Outer Banks islands and 300 National Guard troops were sent to mustering points along the coast. School systems in five counties closed, even though the storm's eye was predicted to remain offshore until Wednesday. Many people acknowledged that they were paying closer attention to the storm because of the vast destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina along the Gulf Coast. Others insisted they would not let the milder storm disrupt their plans."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 7, 0:30, Roberts) said Ophelia's "intentions are not clear. Now a tropical storm, Ophelia is more than 150 miles off the Carolinas, and it could become a hurricane again. Some projections show it hitting the Carolinas; others show it going out to sea."

In Wake Of Katrina, House Democrats Go On Offensive. Roll Call (9/13, Billings) reports, "With Republican poll numbers falling and the nation focusing increasingly on domestic policy, House Democrats are feeling new political confidence and taking on a rare offensive posture against the GOP. Through mid-August, Democrats were feeling emboldened as public confidence dipped in the U.S. handling of the Iraqi conflict, Social Security reform and Congressional ethics. Then Hurricane Katrina brought mounting questions about the Bush administration's response to the disaster." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "was the first to call on Congress to return to session early to pass a relief package for the disaster area and led her party's call for" then-FEMA Director Michael Brown "to step aside." This week, "Pelosi and other leaders will reiterate their call for the creation of a nonpartisan, independent commission to investigate the hurricane response, to urge creation of an independent anti-fraud panel to ensure proper oversight of the contracts awarded for the relief effort and to decry price gouging in the wake of rising fuel costs. The party also will announce the creation of a Democratic relief package for the victims of the hurricane."

Hurricane Boosts Barbour As Potential Presidential Candidate. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (9/13, McCaslin) reports, "Hurricane Katrina…has shined the national spotlight on Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour. So much so that Mr. Barbour, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, is now ranked third among Republicans – behind" Sen. George Allen and Gov. Mitt Romney "in the 2008 White House Power Rankings, as posted by the Jockey Wire at PoliticalDerby.com."

DOD May Be Affected By Ruling On DHS Personnel Rules. Congress Daily (9/13, Klein) reports, "Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, said a court ruling last month that struck down some of the Homeland Security Department's personnel regulations could require the department to 'go back to the drawing board' and might force the Pentagon to "take a harder look" at its personnel proposal scheduled to be put in place later this year." Congress Daily continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer, in throwing out the rules, said they do not provide for collective bargaining. Collins said this week she was concerned that DHS drew up regulations that did not 'reflect congressional intent.' … A spokesman for House Government Reform Chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., whose panel also oversees federal workers, would only say of the ruling's ramifications: 'It's too early in the process to predict the outcome of the litigation or how it will affect other systems.'" Congress Daily adds, "DHS announced last week that it would delay implementation of the new personnel system, scheduled to go into effect in January, for at least a year. It is not clear whether that decision was related to the court ruling, or what changes -- if any -- would be made before implementation. Ward Morrow, assistant general counsel for the American Federation of Governmental Employees, the largest of four unions that filed the suit, said DHS may ask to simply revisit the labor relations portion of the regulations, rather than rewrite the whole system. A spokesman for the Justice Department, which is handling the court case, did not return calls."

OTHER NEWS:

Los Angeles Blackout Attributed To Technical Error, Not Terrorism. The city of Los Angeles was hit by a blackout yesterday, but authorities were quick to announce that the outage was the result of a technician's error, not a terrorist act, and that the shutdown prevented a cascade effect blackout that could have affected the entire state. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, lead story, 2:20, Vargas) reported there "was a lot of tension this afternoon, when power went out to large sections of the city and surrounding area. The police department went on full tactical alert, meaning officers were not allowed to leave work when their shifts ended. The immediate concern for officials was the possibility of terrorism. But it quickly became clear that this major outage was a result of a single mistake." ABC (Rooney) added, "24 hours after a terrorist threat tape aired on ABC, which specifically targeting Los Angeles, the incident tapped people's nerves." But "after several hours Los Angeles water and power announced that a major line had been improperly connected, causing a backup in the system and circuit breakers to trip. In short, human error. The outage affected as many as 2 million people."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 2, :50, Ross) reported, "It happened at a receiving station at North Hollywood that receives the voltage coming in at 230,000 volts, coming in at the speed of light from Utah. They misconnected a new computer control room, which blew out that. And blew out two other generators in Los Angeles. That caused the big problem. Strange as it may seem, the system actually worked."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, lead story, 2:05, Schieffer) reported, "Hundreds of thousands of people were affected. There was a lot of confusion at first about what caused it but officials say it was not terrorism. It was apparently an accident." NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 5, 2:05, Williams) reported, "Throughout Los Angeles, traffic on city streets was hopelessly snarled as stop lights failed. There were numerous reports of minor accidents. 911 switchboards were jammed with calls from people stranded in office building elevators."

The Washington Times/AP (9/13) reports that "even before the utility workers explained what had happened, Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said there was no indication of terrorism."

Among other print sources, the Los Angeles Times (9/13, Bernstein, McGreevy, Landsberg), New York Times (9/13, Archibold), Wall Street Journal (9/13, Smith), USA Today (9/13, Kasindorf, Woodyard) and Washington Post (9/13, A2, Pomfret) run similar reports this morning. The Los Angeles Times (9/13) also runs human interest story examining reaction to the blackout from Los Angeles residents.

Majority Of National Black Republican Association's Board Members Resign. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (9/13, McCaslin) reports, "We've learned of a major shake-up at the Washington-based, with six of the 10 NBRA board members resigning in recent days over various disagreements. 'The organization and its current leadership is heading down a much different direction than was envisioned by myself and the other board members,' says Christopher R. Arps." The Times adds, "Three resigning board members, we're told, frowned on signing a 'statement of commitment' sent to them by NBRA Chairman Frances Rice. … Meanwhile, there also were questions surrounding approval of the latest news release issued by the NBRA, praising President Bush's leadership after Hurricane Katrina."

Federal Oversight Of Developmentally Disabled Homes For Seen As Lacking. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Ansberry) profiles Billy Cothran, a developmentally disabled person who died under the negligent care of the Babcock Center. This illustrates that "oversight of homes for the developmentally disabled is fragmented between the federal government, states and thousands of community-based agencies. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services -- which pays about half of the $27 billion spent annually on community services for the developmentally disabled -- is ultimately responsible for their protection. But the federal agency assigns the creation and enforcing of rules over such homes to each state. As a result, laws and monitoring vary by state. States aren't required to report all incidents of abuse or neglect to the federal agency." So, HHS "is drafting new procedures following a 2003 report from the General Accounting Office, saying states should be required to report more information about how they protect people with developmental disabilities."

FDA Criticized For Failing To Act Quickly On Defective Heart Defibrillators. The New York Times (9/13) says in an editorial that the "deplorable story of how a medical-device company sat on information about a flawed heart defibrillator while a hapless recipient died has now engulfed the Food and Drug Administration as complicit in the silence. A report by Barry Meier in The Times yesterday revealed that the agency received a report from the manufacturer detailing the flaws months before the F.D.A. issued a safety alert on the devices. By the time the agency acted, a college student relying on the implanted defibrillator to shock any erratic heart beats back to normal had died while mountain biking. His unit had short-circuited, just as the same model did earlier in about two dozen other patients." What is "disturbing is how long it took the company, the Guidant Corporation, and the regulators to get a meaningful warning to doctors and patients." The regulators "also appeared lethargic."

Researchers Link Surgery To Cancer Relapse. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Marcus) reports on a study by Michael Retsky, a lecturer in surgery at Children's Hospital Boston and Harvard Medical School, that found the surgical removal of a cancerous tumor in the breast "triggers the release of certain substances in the body," enabling "cancer cells that had been lying dormant in other parts of the body to undergo angiogenesis -- the process by which the body forms new blood vessels -- which also feeds the tumors' growth. This can cause the women to relapse early."

Ashcroft Appearing As Commentator On CNN. Roll Call (9/13, Akers) reports former Attorney General John Ashcroft "is out of hiding and back in the public spotlight. On Monday he made his first media appearance since leaving the Justice Department in February, appearing as a color commentator on CNN." Ashcroft "is expected to be doing lots and lots of TV in the weeks and months ahead."

Palestinians Pour Into Gaza Strip. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 9, 1:55, Vargas) reported, "Israel's 38-year occupation of the Gaza Strip ended today touching off a chaotic celebration by the Palestinians. They poured into the evacuated Jewish settlements, after the last Israeli tanks left, overwhelming plans by the Palestinian police to keep them out. Several empty synagogues were set on fire." ABC (Dinnick) added, "Today, most Palestinians came to just look. Others to take what was left. Some unleashing 38 years of anger. Some of it directed at the synagogues Israel left standing. The Palestinian Authority was here in large numbers, in a desperate attempt to show it is in charge. But its security forces were outnumbered by Palestinian militants. The Palestinian Authority did nothing to stop groups like Islamic jihad, who were here today to show they had control of the land."

USA Today (9/13, Patience) reports Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "said Palestinians still faced a 'long road' to statehood." But he added, "Today our people have the right to celebrate their freedom, their dignity." The Washington Times (9/13, Mitnick), New York Times (9/13, Erlanger) and Washington Post (9/13, A19, Wilson) run similar stories this morning.

Chinese President Creating Trade Policy Worries In US. USA Today (9/13, Lynch) writes, "What started as a bad pun has become one of the most consequential questions facing the United States: 'Who is Hu?' Is Chinese President Hu Jintao the valued customer Corporate America fancies or, as a growing segment of official Washington fears, is he the USA's most dangerous long-term enemy?" USA Today adds that with "the Chinese and American presidents preparing to meet today on the sidelines of a United Nations session in New York, long-standing Sino-U.S. trade friction is merging with mounting anxiety over Beijing's stepped-up military spending and its muscular drive to secure energy supplies. As the Bush administration struggles to balance commerce and national security, companies seeking to expand sales to China may wind up in the crossfire."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Hutzler) reports that as Hu and President Bush "gear up to meet in New York today, many Americans are questioning China's longer-term intentions. Zheng Bijian thinks he has the answer. The consummate Chinese Communist Party insider and confidant of Mr. Hu is promoting a message that China isn't trying to displace the U.S. but is seeking to emerge onto the global stage peacefully. His 'peaceful rise' project has gained the support of China's top leaders, with Mr. Hu originally expected to touch on the theme during a weeklong U.S. tour earlier this month." Zheng says China "'must take a different path, a path that none of the late emerging countries has taken in the contemporary world.' … Otherwise, he said recently in an interview, China could meet the fates of Germany, Japan and the Soviet Union in the past century, ambitious upstarts foiled by the dominant powers of their time."

US May File WTO Complaint Over Chinese Product Piracy. USA Today (9/13, Lynch) reports that the US "is actively considering lodging a formal complaint with the World Trade Organization over rampant Chinese counterfeiting of copyrighted American products." US Trade Representative Rob Portman said government lawyers "were collecting data needed to support a WTO filing. 'We are looking at a case. … If we have a strong case, and if we don't see the progress that we've asked for, we won't hesitate to move forward,' he added." US officials "have complained for years about widespread copying by Chinese companies of products such as compact discs, computer software and apparel. In July, Portman and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez held an annual meeting with top Chinese officials to discuss trade frictions."

China, Mexico Sign Several Trade Agreements. The New York Times (9/13) reports President Hu "wooed Mexican leaders on Monday during a state visit, trying to smooth out the often prickly relationship between the two countries as part of a larger campaign to expand China's influence in Latin America." Hu and President Vicente Fox "signed several minor agreements with great fanfare, among them one providing mutual tax limits on companies doing business in both countries and another that will allow Mexico to export grapes to China in return for importing Chinese pears. The countries also agreed on a framework for negotiating future accords that eventually may allow Chinese companies to mine iron and other minerals in Mexico."

Chinese Export Market Continues To Thrive. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Browne) reports, "China's export juggernaut picked up momentum in August, dashing any expectations that a small currency revaluation on July 21 would act as a speed bump to slow it down." Exports in August "hit $67.82 billion, which was 3.4% higher than July's $65.6 billion and 32% higher than those of August 2004. Imports in August totaled $57.78 billion, up 23% from a year earlier, giving China a monthly surplus of $10.04 billion."

China Declassifies Natural Disaster Death Toll Counts. The New York Times (9/13, Kahn) reports that China said it would "no longer treat the death toll in natural disasters as a state secret, a step that could lead to greater transparency in a country that has a long history of providing partial or misleading data about diseases, accidents, and state-directed atrocities. The National Administration of State Secrets, a government agency that oversees the vast array of data deemed secret, announced the declassification of disaster-related death tolls, which the agency said had been carried out last month."

Musharraf Believes Khan Exported Nuclear Production Materials To North Korea. The New York Times (9/13, Sanger) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said he "believed that a Pakistani nuclear expert who ran the world's largest proliferation ring exported 'probably a dozen' centrifuges to North Korea to produce nuclear weapons fuel. He added, however, that after two years of interrogations there was still no evidence about whether the expert also gave North Korea a Chinese-origin design to build a nuclear weapon." Musharraf's comments about the results of the interrogations of A.Q. Khan "are significant because they tend to confirm the accusations American intelligence officials made against North Korea in 2002."

US Rejects Pakistani Request For Nuclear Technology Assistance. The Washington Times (9/13, Kralev) reports that Pakistan "asked the United States and other Western countries yesterday to help it develop civilian nuclear technology, citing Washington's July pledge for such assistance to neighboring India. The Bush administration, however, dismissed the request, saying Pakistan's energy needs are not as pressing as India's."

India, Pakistan Exchange Prisoners. Reuters (9/12, Raza) reports that Pakistan and India "swapped hundreds of prisoners at a border post on Monday to foster goodwill as South Asia's nuclear rivals seek to push forward their sluggish peace process. … Pakistan released 435 Indian prisoners while Indian freed 152 Pakistanis, some as young as 12 years."

New Poll Shows German Election Tightening. The Financial Times (9/13, Williamson, Cave) reports, "Germany's election race tightened further on Monday as Gerhard Schröder's Social Democrats pulled closer to the opposition Christian Democrats in a new opinion poll, increasing the likelihood of a "grand coalition" after Sunday's election." The SPD "scored 35 per cent in a Forsa poll, up 1 point to its highest rating since Mr Schröder called for an early election in May. The CDU was stable on 42 per cent."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Walker) adds, "It is looking increasingly likely that Angela Merkel will become Germany's next chancellor in Sunday's election, but whom she governs with -- and what economic policy she can carry out -- is increasingly up for grabs." Merkel's "center-right Christian Democrats are the clear favorite to snare the biggest share of votes, but in the stretch run her coalition's poll numbers have been slipping to just short of an outright majority." The New York Times (9/13, Bernstein) and USA Today (9/13, Knox) runs similar stories.

After Sweeping Re-Election, Speculation Turns To Koizumi's Use Of Mandate. The New York Times (9/13, Onishi) reports that a day after Japan's Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi "secured the second largest landslide in a general election in the Liberal Democratic Party's history, attention turned Monday to how he would use that mandate. With his coalition holding more than two-thirds of the seats in the lower house of Parliament, Mr. Koizumi is now expected, in the next month or so, to push through his bill to privatize the country's postal services. But once that is accomplished, what next?" Koizumi "has one year before party rules force him to retire, and he repeated Monday that he would not seek an extension. Still, he finds himself possibly postwar Japan's most powerful prime minister, at a time when Japan is confronting problems ranging from an aging, declining population to growing economic dependence on China."

In a Wall Street Journal (9/13) op-ed, Yale University Japanese history scholar Michael Auslin writes, "Koizumi has pulled off the unthinkable: A smashing electoral victory that would be the equivalent of carrying 49 states and 525 electoral votes in an American presidential election. … Sober reflection on the election's outcome, however, raises questions about the true strength of the victory and the message voters were really sending. Far from a powerful affirmation of Mr. Koizumi's policies on the merits, the results reflect the lack of a viable opposition, as well as the citizenry's willingness to indulge bold schemes -- the details of which few really grasp, and which are so far in the future that they seem painless ways to endorse the idea of reform."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) editorializes, "Fortune favors the bold, and on Sunday it smiled broadly on Junichiro Koizumi. … Koizumi's governing coalition now holds more than the two-thirds majority it needs to override further upper house intransigence. The unexpectedly large victory means that Japan's voters have endorsed Mr. Koizumi's policy mix of smaller government and an activist foreign policy. The economic paternalism and diplomatic timidity of the post-World War II era are giving way to change."

The Washington Post (9/13) editorializes, "It's not clear how much Japan's long-term project of fostering competitive, pluralistic politics will benefit. On the plus side, Mr. Koizumi has demonstrated that electoral appeal can trump the vested interests represented by his party's factions; it would be nice to believe that this boosts the political value of ideas and policies, though the main boost is clearly to the political value of image. On the negative side, Mr. Koizumi is to retire in a year, and the factions may reassert themselves."

The New York Times (9/13) editorializes, "Postal privatization was virtually the only issue discussed during the 12-day election campaign. That gave a pass to Mr. Koizumi's unwise embrace of Japan's traditions of military nationalism. … Japan needs postal service privatization, two-party democracy and a more constructive relationship with its neighbors and trading partners. Only the first was advanced by Sunday's election."

Georgia Receives $295.3 Million Millennium Challenge Grant. Reuters (9/12) reports that the US and the Republic of Georgia "signed an aid agreement on Monday worth $295.3 million via a U.S. development fund dedicated to poor nations that undertake political and economic reforms. The five-year grant, or 'compact,' comes from the Millennium Challenge Corporation and will cover road, energy and infrastructure projects in Georgia." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "Our partnership will only grow stronger as Georgia continues to establish the rule of law, a vibrant civil society, an independent media, a free economy and effective institutions of government."

Bush Unpopular In Major South American Cities. Reuters (9/12) reports that a "majority of South Americans" in the capital cities of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Uruguay "have a negative opinion" of President Bush, according to a poll conducted by a Santiago think tank. Of the four cities, "Buenos Aires ranked as the city where Bush is most unpopular, with six out of ten Argentines saying they disapproved of him. Residents in the Chilean capital of Santiago had the most favorable opinion of Bush, the poll showed -- 19 percent approved of Bush and 40 percent rejected him."

Governors, Poor Work To Implement Chavez "Social Revolution." The Washington Times (9/13, Behn) reports that Venezuelan governors and the "rural poor are moving quickly to implement President Hugo Chavez's vision of a social revolution, carving up and redistributing large landholdings and threatening to take over the premises of internationally owned companies. There has been none of the violence and mayhem that accompanied land seizures in Zimbabwe in recent years, but economists and angry land owners fear that -- as in Zimbabwe -- the takeovers will destroy a productive agriculture sector and undermine the economy."

G-8 Debt Relief Plan In Jeopardy As Final Vote Nears. The Washington Post (9/13, A14, Blustein) reports that while "full debt relief for the world's poorest countries" seemed to be imminent when G-8 leaders met in Scotland in July, "objections to the plan are emerging as it heads toward an official vote at the annual meetings of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund later this month. Most notable is an internal World Bank report that warns the plan could deplete the bank's coffers so severely as to impair its ability to provide new aid for impoverished nations." The report "uses bureaucratic language to convey a dire message about the problems that the G-8's plan could pose for the International Development Association (IDA), the World Bank agency that lends about $9 billion a year to low-income countries. By potentially forgiving as much as $42.5 billion in payments owed by many poor countries over the next several decades, the plan 'could reduce IDA's financial capacity significantly,' says the report, which was discussed at a meeting of the bank's executive board last week." Treasury Department spokesman Tony Fratto said, "The deal to provide 100 percent debt cancellation is in jeopardy." Fratto "said he was 'outraged' at the World Bank report. 'There are individuals trying to chip away at it and see that it doesn't happen.'"

Little Progress Seen As World Leaders Prepare For UN Reform Discussions. The AP (9/13, Press) reports that with "just days before leaders of more than 170 countries gather at a U.N. summit, there has been little progress on a document they are to adopt." Secretary-General Kofi Annan "wants heads of state and government to mark the 60th anniversary of the United Nations by adopting a sweeping blueprint to tackle the challenges of the 21st century at the Sept. 14-16 summit in New York. But despite intense negotiations over the weekend, some U.N. ambassadors expressed concern the text would be weak and said negotiations were slow and difficult."

The Washington Post (9/13, A15, Lynch) reports that Annan "proposed the most far-reaching changes for the organization since its founding 60 years ago" in March. The plan would reorganize the UN to "combat terrorism and poverty, expanding the Security Council beyond the victors of World War II and setting new rules for the preemptive use of military force. But six months of contentious negotiations by governments have stripped out many of the boldest initiatives, including proposals for creating 10 new Security Council seats. And delegates this week are straining to reach agreement on a far less ambitious package of steps that can be agreed on by some 170 leaders set to arrive" in New York tomorrow.

WSJournal Says Criticism Of UN Fair, Needed. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) editorializes, "The so-called Millennium Development Goals for helping the planet's poorest will be among the topics of discussion at the U.N. summit that begins tomorrow in New York. In recent weeks, the Bush Administration has come under media fire for suggesting some sensible revisions, such as requiring more accountability from countries on the receiving end of international assistance (imagine that). … If the U.N. and its supporters are serious about the Millennium Development Goals, and U.S. support in pursuing them, they should stop equating criticism of U.N. methods with criticism of its motives. U.N. reform is a better use of their energies this week. And the establishment of an auditor general or some other independent body responsible for commissioning and publishing performance reviews is a good place to start."

Scholar Says Bush Administration Should Back Security Council Expansion. In a New York Times (9/13) op-ed, American Enterprise Institute research fellow Vance Serchuk writes that when the meetings begin, "any mention of the expansion of the Security Council will be off the agenda, thanks in no small part to the diplomatic exertions of the Bush administration. The White House's foreclosure of discussion on Security Council expansion has drawn cheers from conservatives worried about any dilution of American power, and scorn from liberals convinced that the Bush administration is once again unilaterally sabotaging the international system. In fact, both sides are wrong." Brazil, Germany, India, and Japan "have joined together in the so-called Group of Four and have been furiously trawling the developing world for support. … Getting Japan, in particular, on the council should be a top priority for the United States, not just as a reward for past support on countless issues - from Iraq to North Korea - but also because of its central role in America's grand strategy for the region. Equally important is the development of a long-term alliance with India."

More Commentary On UN Reform. In his New York Times (9/13) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "The biggest gathering of leaders in history unfolds this week at the United Nations, as they preen and boast about how much they're helping the world's poor. In short, it may be the greatest assembly in history -- of hypocrites. The fact is that with just a few exceptions, the presidents and prime ministers coming to the U.N. summit are doing a disgraceful job in helping the poor. That's one reason the world's richest 500 individuals have the same income as the world's poorest 416 million people."

In a New York Times (9/13) op-ed, University of Ottawa professor Amir Attaran writes, "According to the United Nations Millennium Project, only a 'handful of countries' can really prove the maternal mortality ratio is improving. … Malaria is another example where United Nations goals hinge on something immeasurable. … Probably the most useful discussion the United Nations could plan for this week's meeting would be one that asked world leaders to endorse new goals against which they could truly measure progress. This is feasible: there are alternative ways to track malaria's toll or to assess the safety of pregnancies."

Left Coalition Wins Majority In Norwegian Parliament. The AP (9/12) reports that Norway is "poised for a power shift after the left-leaning opposition won a majority of seats in Parliament with pledges to spend more of the nation's vast oil wealth on welfare." With almost all votes tallied, "a three-party coalition led by the Labor party had grabbed 88 seats in the 169-seat assembly, enough to oust the center-right government. Prime Minister Kjell Magne Bondevik, who campaigned on promises of tax cuts, said if the final tally confirmed the result, his government would resign after presenting its draft 2006 budget on Oct. 14."

Liberians In US Hope To Play Role In Homeland's Election. The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Raghavan) reports that as Liberia "prepares for a historic post-civil war election next month, a new hope is prevailing. After years of building wealth and sharing it with impoverished relatives back home," Liberians living in the US "want to influence the outcome of the campaign. Many of the Washington region's estimated 10,000 native Liberians view it as nothing less than their homeland's last chance for peace and stability."

NYTimes Lauds Brazil's Progress In Protection Of Amazon. The New York Times (9/13) editorializes, "Last month, Brazil's environmental officials announced that the burning of the Amazon has slowed. Deforestation this year is half of what it was the year before. This news shows that when Brazil's government musters the political will to protect the Amazon, it can do it. … The health of the Amazon is a global concern because the forest soaks up greenhouse gases, which lessens global warming. Deforestation means the Amazon could eventually become too small to produce the rain that it needs to survive. … The government's commitment to protecting the Amazon has also been important. Led by Marina Silva, the environment minister and once a poor Amazon rubber tapper herself, Brazil is starting to impose its authority in parts of the forest that have always been lawless. … Rule of law is still foreign to the Amazon. But it is becoming a little less so."

Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 43

TERRORISM NEWS:

British Businessman Sentenced For Missile Smuggling. USA Today (9/13) reports British businessman Hemant Lakhani, "convicted of trying to smuggle shoulder-launched missiles into the USA," was "sentenced Monday in Newark, N.J., to 47 years in prison. The plot involved the sale of missiles to a group that" Lakhani, 70, was "told would use them to shoot down commercial planes. The weapons' buyer and seller actually were government agents." Lakhani, "arrested in August 2003, was convicted in April of trying to provide material support to terrorists, unlawful brokering of foreign defense articles and attempting to import merchandise to the USA by means of false statements, plus two counts of money laundering."

The AP (9/13, Gold) reports, "During his trial, and again Monday, his lawyers said Lakhani was the victim of government entrapment because the supposed missile seller and buyer were actually government agents." But Assistant US Attorney Stuart Rabner recounted "evidence in which Lakhani volunteered praise for Osama bin Laden. 'We may see a man who looks like us and dresses like us, but is so morally bankrupt that he plots the death of thousands of people,' Rabner said. U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden rejected pleas for leniency from Lakhani and his wife, referring to what she called 'overwhelming' evidence of his 'reprehensible conduct.'"

Reuters (9/13) reports, "His conviction was considered one of the more significant victories for the U.S. Justice Department since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks and the launch of the U.S.-led war on terror. … Lakhani, his attorney, Henry Klingeman, and his wife pleaded for leniency, noting he is elderly and wants to return home to Britain. … 'Mr. Lakhani is not entitled to leniency. He's entitled to fairness,' U.S. District Court Judge Katharine Hayden said in handing down the sentence."

California Men Plead Not Guilty To Plotting Terror Attacks. The AP (9/13, Marquez) reports Californians Levar Haley Washington and Gregory Vernon Patterson "pleaded not guilty Monday to federal charges alleging they planned terrorist attacks against military facilities, the Israeli Consulate and other targets in the Los Angeles area." Washington and Patterson "were ordered held without bail after their pleas," and Assistant US Attorney Kevin Smith called them "dangers to society and flight risks, saying they had planned to carry out a 'homegrown jihad.'" The AP adds, "Also Monday, law enforcement officials briefed Jewish community leaders in Los Angeles on the case and said local police planned to step up security in and around synagogues during the holidays. Randy Parsons, acting assistant director of the FBI's Los Angeles office, said the extra security was being taken out of an abundance of caution, not because there was any specific, credible threat. 'It's important that people go about their normal activities but remain vigilant,' Parsons said."

Al Arian Codefendant's Lawyer Challenges Allegations Of PIJ Ties. The Tampa Tribune (9/13, Fechter) reports, "An attorney for one of Sami Al-Arian's codefendants is challenging prosecution claims that his client was on the payroll of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad. Defense attorney Stephen Bernstein points to the same translations of intercepted telephone calls prosecutors are relying on, but says the figures discussed leave no room to pay Sameeh Hammoudeh. Bernstein spent the morning cross examining FBI agent Michael Wysocki, who analyzed dozens of bank accounts involving the defendants and organizations they helped run. … Bernstein asked about other records seized, which he said were never translated by the government, that might lead to a different conclusion. But, thus far, Bernstein has not shown Wysocki any additional documents that challenge the accuracy of his review."

Hunger Strike Spreads Among Guantanamo Bay Detainees. The Washington Post (9/13, A3, Leonnig) reports a "month-old hunger strike at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to include at least 128 detainees, 18 of whom are forcibly receiving intravenous fluids or nutrition in the prison hospital, military officials and detainee lawyers said yesterday." The captives are "protesting their indefinite imprisonment and what they describe as beatings administered by the prison's Immediate Response Force (IRF) -- squads of military personnel who are dispatched to put down disturbances in detainees' cells. Some have said they will refuse to eat until the military gives them a fair hearing or they die, according to their attorneys." Military officials "first acknowledged the hunger strike, the second of the summer, on Aug. 25. Since then, the number of people hospitalized and in serious physical danger has grown to 18, according to Maj. Jeffrey J. Weir, a Guantanamo Bay spokesman."

WSJournal Praises Ruling Upholding Bush Power To Detain Padilla. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) says in an editorial, "The timing couldn't have been better. Two days before the anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, a panel for the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled unanimously last Friday that the President 'unquestionably' has the power to detain an American citizen who has taken up arms against his country." Judge Michael Luttig noted the Supreme Court said "precisely that in its Hamdi decision last year," but 'that wasn't enough for José Padilla's attorneys, who argued that Hamdi, which concerned an American picked up on a battlefield in Afghanistan, didn't apply to their client, who was arrested domestically, at O'Hare Airport." Padilla's supporters "want him to be charged in the criminal justice system or released. They include the American Civil Liberties Union, the People for the American Way Foundation, and former Clinton Justice officials Janet Reno, Eric Holder and Philip Heymann, who all want a return to the days of treating terrorism like a law-enforcement problem. In the week of the 9/11 anniversary, we're glad the Fourth Circuit didn't authorize a return to this September 10 mindset."

European Crackdown On Islamic Extremists Noted. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Ford) reports that since Yasir al-Sirri "sought asylum" in Britain "11 years ago the Egyptian Islamic radical has been in and out of jail, and has successfully fought off attempts to extradite him on terrorism charges to both the US and Egypt. Now, however, in the wake of July's London bombings, he faces perhaps his greatest challenge yet as the British government prepares to join a Europewide crackdown on extremist Islamic circles and deport dozens of individuals deemed 'not conducive to the public good.'" As European governments "lower their traditional levels of tolerance for radicalism, they are redrawing the lines between civil liberties and national security in the face of terrorist violence." Sirri, who "runs the 'Islamic Observation Center' in London, (he says it monitors human rights abuses in the Muslim world, but US and British police say it is a conduit for messages among Al Qaeda militants), would undoubtedly be arrested if he were sent back to Egypt."

PATRIOT ACT:

Booksellers Decry FBI Search Power Under Patriot Act. In the second of a three-part series on the Patriot Act, the San Mateo County (CA) Times (9/12, Farooq) reports, "Five years ago, an independent bookstore in Denver became the center of a drug investigation, and at the same time, inadvertently became a model for bookstore owners across the country concerned with the Patriot Act. … Police officers walked into the Tattered Cover Book Store and served a search warrant for the records of one of the store's customers, who was suspected of manufacturing methamphetamine, according to the American Bookseller Foundation for Free Expression. Even though the search took place more than a year before the Patriot Act was passed, the case set a precedent for booksellers and others across the country who are fighting some of the surveillance provisions of the anti-terrorism law." The Times continues, "Several businesses, city councils and other governmental institutions across the country have taken stances for and against the act for a variety of reasons. Some of those stances are driven by politics, some by security and others by fear. … 'You have to be able to do this without the government looking over your shoulder,' said Rich Van Castle, owner of three Bay Books stores in the East Bay. 'It is very important. I wouldn't want the government coming in here and saying "What did he read or did she read?"' … Van Castle is just one of many independent and corporate booksellers across the country who have been fighting one of most controversial measures of the act, Section 215, which gives federal authorities access to customers' book, medical and library records, while establishing a gag order to prevent anyone involved from commenting on the case." The Times adds, "But to the FBI, which is often painted as the abuser of Patriot Act powers, says the gag order is a matter of both national and personal security. The FBI also contends that bookstore purchases and library records were available to federal authorities long before the Sept. 11-inspired Patriot Act. … 'Some of this is just common sense,' said Special Agent LaRae Quay with the San Francisco office of the FBI. 'It's just one of these things if we are looking at an individual it's best that they not know. (It's) also to protect the individuals that are cleared."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Negroponte Says US Remains Al Qaeda's Top Target. USA Today (9/13, Diamond) reports that in his "first media interview since becoming the nation's first director of national intelligence in April," John Negroponte "spoke Monday to reporters and an editor from USA TODAY." Negroponte told USA, "Progress has been made in dismembering and attacking the leadership of" Osama bin Laden's "organization. A number of important operatives of his have been killed or captured. He is, we think, alive somewhere in the Afghan-Pakistan border area. … Even though he hasn't been captured, I think that he and his organization are very much on the defensive." Regarding the possibility of terrorist activity, Negroponte said, "We've seen in some of the statements and correspondence that we've laid our hands on between al-Qaeda leadership that clearly they would like to see this activity spread into such targets as Western Europe, and I think what happened in London on the 7th of July, whether or not it was directed by al-Qaeda, was certainly consistent with that desire. … They see vulnerabilities in the West, in Western Europe. And of course, the United States homeland remains, in my view, their No. 1 target."

Negroponte Praises Chertoff For Linking Domestic, Foreign Intelligence. USA Today (9/13, Diamond) reports Negroponte also "praised Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for helping the 'lash-up between domestic and foreign' intelligence, which the 9/11 Commission called a major contributor to lapses before 9/11."

Competing Technology Tested To Close "Gaping Hole In Airport Security." The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Meckler) reports that "one of the most promising" machines being tested to close the "gaping hole in airport security" concerning the ability to detect explosives on passengers or in their carry-on baggage is the backscatter, which has the ability to see through clothing. "The problem with early versions of the machine is that they show images of people as if they had no clothes on, which sparked privacy concerns. Yesterday, American Science & Engineering Inc. launched an X-ray machine that can see objects hidden beneath clothing while obscuring private parts. The other leading manufacturer of the machines also promises to cover up those parts of the image, though in a different way. An alternate technology, being tried in some airports now, shoots puffs of air at passengers to detect traces of explosive residue." The Journal adds that it's all "part of a highly competitive, rapidly unfolding race to deploy the best technology for closing the security gap at airport checkpoints."

WAR NEWS:

Talibani Says Iraqis Could Replace 50,000 US Troops By Year's End. The Washington Post (9/13, A20, VandeHei) reports Iraqi President Jalal Talabani "said in an interview yesterday that the United States could withdraw as many as 50,000 troops by the end of the year, declaring there are enough Iraqi forces trained and ready to begin assuming control in cities throughout the country. After the White House and Pentagon were contacted for comment, however, a senior adviser to Talabani called The Washington Post to say Talabani did not intend to suggest a specific timeline for withdrawal. … In the interview, Talabani said he planned to discuss reductions in U.S. forces during a private meeting with President Bush today, and said he believed the United States could begin pulling out some troops immediately." The Post notes, "That assessment differs dramatically from those offered by Bush and by U.S. military commanders in Iraq." Talabani "said the number of 'well-trained' Iraqi security forces stood at 60,000 and would reach 100,000 by the end of the year."

Al-Jafari Appears In Tal Afar To Tout Counterinsurgency Operation. The New York Times (9/13, Worth) reports Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari "paid a surprise visit to Tal Afar on Monday, with that city largely quiet after a major offensive by American and Iraqi troops aimed at reclaiming it from insurgents. The prime minister has repeatedly showcased the Tal Afar operation as proof of his government's willingness to deal decisively with Sunni insurgents in western Iraq."

Iraqi Forces Kill Additional Forty Insurgents In Tal Afar. USA Today (9/13) reports, "Violence flared in the northern Iraq city of Tal Afar late Monday when Iraqi forces trapped insurgents in basement hide-outs, killing 40 militants in fierce fighting, the Iraqi military said. … The new fighting Monday night raised the insurgent death toll since the offensive began to nearly 200, the government said. Baghdad said it lost seven soldiers in the course of the three-day offensive and six civilians were killed. The U.S. military said no American soldiers were hurt."

Tal Afar Insurgents Threaten To Use Chemical Weapons. The Washington Post/AP (9/13, A20) reports, "Al-Iraqiya television, which showed no pictures of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari's visit to the Tall Afar area, said he was there despite an insurgent threat to unleash chemical and biological weapons against Iraqi and U.S. forces. There was no known public threat from the insurgents to use unconventional weapons in the area, but they have vowed in two Web postings since Friday to use chemical weapons against U.S. and Iraqi government interests in Baghdad. The threats mentioned the fortified Green Zone that houses the U.S. Embassy, Iraq's parliament and other government offices."

US Making Extensive Use Of Informants. The Washington Post (9/13, A1, Finer) reports, "This is how the 10-day-old invasion of Tall Afar unfolded Monday. After two days of relatively uneventful patrols in the abandoned neighborhood of Sarai, where commanders had expected insurgents to be massed for a fight, U.S. and Iraqi forces turned north in the morning, to neighborhoods they had already cleared, and found hundreds of men who appeared to be of military age and troops believed to have slipped through their cordons. Eventually, 52 men were placed in the open backs of flatbed trucks bound for Camp Sykes." The Post goes on to report, "Soldiers with little training relevant to the mission have been forced into roles more traditionally assigned to police: gathering evidence, interrogating witnesses and suspects, and following up on leads. In searching almost every house in the city's most violent neighborhoods, they have detained hundreds of young men, some because they possessed weapons or insurgent literature, but others solely on the hearsay of local informants often called 'sources' by U.S. troops." U.S. soldiers "acknowledge knowing little about their backgrounds and motives -- or even their names -- and admit that their reliability varies widely."

US Ambassador To Iraq Says Syria Harboring Iraqi Insurgents. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 8, :25, Vargas) reported, "The US Ambassador to Iraq had some very harsh words for Syria today. He said Syria has become a hub for terrorists trying to undercut Iraq's government. He said, 'Our patience is running out. The patience of Iraqis are running out. The time for decision has arrived for Damascus.' He refused to rule out a military strike on Syria, although such an attack is seen as unlikely."

USA Today (9/13, Slavin) reports, "Syria is harboring training camps for Iraqi insurgents, U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said Monday. U.S. patience with Syria is running out, he said. The United States has ruled out no option, including military force, for dealing with the government of Syrian President Bashar Assad, Khalilzad said during a State Department briefing with reporters. … Administration officials have repeatedly accused Syria of allowing insurgents to travel to Iraq, but it was the first time an official has publicly named specific cities — Aleppo, Latakia and Damascus — as training sites."

The New York Times (9/13, Brinkley) reports, "While other administration officials made similar accusations early this year, the focus of American attention to Syria in recent months has been its occupation of Lebanon. Over the summer, Syria said that it had cracked down on insurgents operating within its territory. But Mr. Khalilzad, in remarks to reporters in Washington, made it clear that the United States believed that Syria was providing assistance to insurgents operating in Iraq and that such help might have increased. Government-controlled Syrian newspapers 'glorify the terrorists as resistance fighters,' he said. Syrian authorities 'allow youngsters misguided by Al Qaeda - from Saudi Arabia, from Yemen, from North Africa - to fly into Damascus International Airport,' attend training camps and then cross into Iraq, he contended."

Negroponte Says Baathists Present Greatest Challenge In Iraq. USA Today (9/13, Diamond) reports, "U.S. intelligence is struggling to expose elements of the insurgency in Iraq made up of former members of Saddam Hussein's regime, John Negroponte, the nation's intelligence chief, said in an interview Monday. Joint U.S.-Iraqi military efforts have damaged the network of foreign insurgents led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, though Zarqawi himself remains at large, Negroponte said. Indigenous Iraqi insurgents, led by former members of Saddam's ruling Baath Party, have been tougher to track down." Negroponte "said Iraqis dominate the insurgency. Despite intense focus on Iraq, where 138,000 U.S. troops are deployed, U.S. intelligence has not been able to produce anything more than a 'speculative' estimate of the insurgency's size, he said." Based on everything he has seen, Negroponte said, the insurgency is neither gaining strength nor weakening appreciably."

Sunni Elite Seen As Unlikely To Abandon Insurgency Soon. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/13, A27) Gary Schmitt, executive director of the Project for the New American Century, writes, "The reality is that a stable, democratic Iraq, with large-scale Sunni participation, is unlikely until the insurgency in Iraq is widely seen by the Sunnis themselves as not succeeding. … Irrespective of the fact that their demands cannot be met without losing, in turn, Iraq's critical majority -- the Shiites -- Sunni leaders still live in a world that is about past prominence and future expectations. And until a new reality is forced upon them, they are not likely to move from their current opposition to the constitution."

US Indicts Dutch Citizen For Plotting Attacks Against Americans In Fallujah. The Washington Times (9/13, Waterman) reports, "Federal prosecutors have indicted a Dutch resident for conspiring to kill members of the U.S. armed forces in Iraq -- the first criminal charges filed in connection with the insurgency against American forces in that country. The indictment, filed Friday afternoon in U.S. District Court in Washington, charges Iraqi-born Wesam Delaema, 32, who is in Dutch custody, with conspiring to bomb U.S. convoys in Fallujah, Iraq. … A Dutch official at the embassy in Washington said extradition hearings could take up to a year, but that if the courts cleared the way, the government almost certainly would accede to the U.S. request."

TV Program Featuring Police Footage Proves Popular In Kirkuk. The Washington Times/AP (9/13, Tran) reports, "Created to make government more transparent, 'The Cops Show,' featuring Kirkuk officers in action, is the first of its kind in the country and is breaking new ground in Iraqi television. A live call-in portion gives the public the chance to praise the security forces or gripe about them. Screened weekly on Kirkuk Television, which broadcasts in this northern city of nearly 1 million people, 'The Cops Show' has opened the floodgates in a community long suppressed."

Musharraf Offers To Build Security Fence Along Afghan Border. USA Today (9/13) reports, "Chafing under criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to fight terrorism, President Pervez Musharraf offered Monday to build a security fence to deter militants and drug merchants from entering the country from Afghanistan. … Musharraf made the offer at a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, 'We think it is important that Pakistan and Afghanistan take up this idea.' President Bush meets with Musharraf today."

28 Candidates Barred From Participating In Afghan Elections. The Washington Post (9/13, A19, Aizenman) reports, "Twenty-one candidates running in Afghanistan's upcoming legislative election have been disqualified for maintaining links to illegal armed militias and seven more for failing to resign from government posts, the joint Afghan and international Electoral Complaints Commission announced Monday. … The latest disqualifications did not satisfy human rights advocates who have expressed concern that the field of contenders is rife with warlords who committed well-documented atrocities during warfare that began in 1978." Grant Kippen, chairman of the electoral commission, "said the commission relied on the recommendations of a disarmament commission that includes representatives of the Afghan government, the United Nations, the U.S. military and a NATO-led international force to determine which candidates retained associations with banned armed groups."

Army Will Miss Annual Recruiting Goal. The New York Times/Reuters (9/13) reports, "The Army posted its best recruiting month in four years in August, but will still miss its annual recruiting goal for the first time since 1999, officials said Monday. In August, the regular Army sent more recruits to boot camp than in any other month since July 2001. But the part-time Army National Guard and Army Reserve both missed their monthly goals and will fall far short of their annual goals for the 2005 fiscal year, which ends this month. The regular Army, which is aiming for 80,000 recruits this year, was behind its year-to-date goal by the end of August, with too big a deficit to make up through September's recruiting, officials said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

OFHEO Reaches Settlement With Freddie Mac. The Dow Jones Newswires (9/12) reports, "Freddie Mac's regulator settled its case against the company for failing to properly penalize former top executives in 2003 after Freddie discovered widespread accounting problems and evidence of earnings manipulation, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight announced Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The company agreed Friday to turn over new documents and to help OFHEO pursue separate cases against Freddie's former Chief Executive Leland Brendsel and former Chief Financial Officer Vaughn Clarke." Dow Jones adds, "Freddie is still struggling to emerge from an accounting scandal that resulted in a clean sweep of the company's senior management team, an overhaul of internal controls, an earnings restatement of more than $5 billion, multiple shareholder lawsuits and federal regulatory probes. OFHEO is the only regulator to settle its case against Freddie, which agreed to pay OFHEO $125 million and agreed to other remedial actions in December 2003 to settle charges of safety and soundness violations. … OFHEO, however, filed separate charges against Freddie Mac, Brendsel and Clarke that month seeking cease-and-desist orders from an administrative law judge to force the company to alter its termination agreements with the two men and to impose fines against them. Freddie's board of directors allowed Brendsel to retire and Clarke to resign in June 2003 with roughly $56 million and $1.2 million in severance and other pay, respectively. … OFHEO's settlement with Freddie, which was signed Friday, only settles the regulator's administrative case against the company regarding the nature of Brendsel and Clarke's departures. Parallel investigations related to Freddie's accounting troubles by the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission and others, are still pending."

Freddie Mac Will Help Recover Funds From Former Officers. As part of a settlement made public yesterday by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Freddie Mac will assist federal regulators as they try to recover millions of dollars paid to two of its former executives. The New York Times (9/13, Glater) reports, "The agreement comes nearly two years after Freddie Mac…paid a $125 million penalty to settle charges related to its accounting, as part of a related settlement with its regulator, known as Ofheo. … The two executives in question are Leland C. Brendsel, the former chief executive at Freddie Mac, and Vaughn A. Clarke, its former chief financial officer. Both men left Freddie Mac in June 2003, several months into an expanding investigation of the company's accounting."

Former Westar Official Convicted Of Looting Millions From Utility. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) reports, "A federal jury found former Westar Energy Inc. Chief Executive Officer David Wittig and another executive guilty of looting the electric utility of millions of dollars." The Journal continues, "Prosecutors claimed the two men, who were forced out of the Topeka, Kan., company in 2002, engineered extravagant salaries and benefits for themselves at the expense of shareholders, hiding much of their actions from the company's board and federal regulators. … Mr. Wittig and former Chief Strategy Officer Douglas Lake were found guilty of conspiracy, wire fraud, circumventing internal controls and money laundering." The Journal adds, "The jury deliberated for 7½ days before convicting Mr. Wittig on 39 counts and Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Each count of wire fraud, the most serious of the charges, is punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of as much as $1 million. Testimony about whether the government can recover money from the executives is expected to start Tuesday."

Oracle CEO Agrees To Charity Payments In Settlement Of Insider Trading Suit. The Washington Post (9/13, D5, White) reports, "Oracle Corp. chief executive Lawrence J. Ellison tentatively agreed to pay $100 million to charity over five years to settle a private lawsuit in California accusing him of insider trading in Oracle stock, a plaintiff's lawyer in the case said yesterday." The Post continues, "Plaintiffs in the suit alleged that Ellison engaged in insider trading when he sold nearly $900 million worth of Oracle shares in January 2001, a little more than a month before the company announced poor earnings. Oracle shares fell 21 percent, to $16.88, after the announcement. Ellison had sold his stock for a little less than twice that amount." The Post adds, "The proposed settlement, reported yesterday by the New York Times and the San Jose Mercury News, must be approved by Oracle's board and a California judge. If approved, the deal would end what is known as a shareholder derivative lawsuit, an increasingly common type of civil case in which shareholders file suit on behalf of a company. … Monetary settlements in derivative cases have typically been small, and most of the money usually goes to plaintiff's attorneys. Companies often agree to make changes to the way they operate in order to settle the suits. … Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., an attorney for plaintiffs in the case, said the charity payments represent a compromise between the two sides. He said Oracle shareholders would benefit because the company will implement new insider-trading rules as part of the settlement."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Facing A Grand Jury Carries Emotional, Financial Costs. The Washington Post (9/13, A25, Coates) reports, "Sympathy can be hard to come by for White House officials who are summoned to appear before a grand jury." The Post continues, "Those whose identities remain a secret suffer in silence, discouraged from reaching out to their closest friends for help. Those whose names leak into the public domain become lightning rods for rumor, suspicion and innuendo, as politicians, commentators and journalists try to divine a meaning behind each summons." The Post adds, "The latest White House staffer to face the grand jury is Susan B. Ralston, assistant to White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who gave testimony to the committee investigating the leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame. … But while the politics of every appearance is picked over in minute detail, there is also a human story to each summons that often goes unexplored." The Post notes, "Witnesses face stress, uncertainty and -- worst of all -- crippling lawyer's fees that can take years to pay off. And as prosecutors cast their net ever wider, inexperienced staffers with few financial assets are increasingly facing the emotional and financial burden of grand jury testimony. … But veterans of past grand jury appearances -- including the investigation into President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky -- said that keeping silent compounded an already difficult process."

US Charges FBI Intelligence Analyst With Spying For The Philippines. The AP (9/13, Gold) reports, "An FBI intelligence analyst with top secret clearance who worked at a New Jersey Army base was charged Monday with passing classified information about Filipino leaders to current and former officials of that nation." The AP continues, "The analyst, Leandro Aragoncillo, sent some of the material to Michael Ray Aquino, a former deputy director of the Philippines National Police who lives in New York City, according to an FBI complaint unsealed with the arrests." The AP adds, "Aragoncillo, 46, of Woodbury, was hired to work at Fort Monmouth in July 2004 and began sending classified information and documents in January, according to the complaint. … From May to Aug. 15, Aragoncillo printed or downloaded 101 classified documents relating to the Philippines, of which 37 were classified 'secret,' the complaint said. Details of the documents' contents were not disclosed in court papers or in court. … The investigation by immigration authorities began after Aquino, 39, was arrested in March, accused of overstaying the tourist visa he used to enter the country in July 2001."

9th Circuit Rules Warrantless Searches Must Be Based On Probable Cause. The California Recorder (9/13, Smith) reports, "Even if a defendant agrees to warrantless searches in exchange for pretrial release, police still can't search him without probable cause, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday." The Recorder continues, "In a victory for the privacy rights of defendants awaiting trial while on their own recognizance, a 2-1 majority threw out evidence Nevada authorities had received by testing Raymond Scott for drugs without probable cause." The Recorder adds, "True, Scott had consented to random drug testing 'by any peace officer without a warrant.' But because the government did not have probable cause -- and could not show a 'special need' to lower the bar -- the drug test violated Scott's Fourth Amendment rights, 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski wrote for the majority." The Recorder adds, "The panel says its opinion is one of first impression among all the federal circuit courts, and the dissenting judge predicted a widespread impact on federal and state pretrial proceedings. … By holding that probable cause is required for the warrantless search of a pretrial 'releasee' or his home, 'the majority casually adopts a rule that carries monumental implications for the pretrial procedures employed by every state in our circuit, as well as the United States,' wrote 9th Circuit Judge Jay Bybee. … Scott was facing state charges of drug possession when he was released on his own recognizance, subject to several conditions, including warrantless drug and alcohol testing."

American University's Audit Of Presidential Spending Nearly Complete. The Washington Post (9/13, B5, Strauss, Kinzie) reports, "American University trustees are nearing completion of a probe into hundreds of thousands of dollars of questionable expenses by suspended President Benjamin Ladner and his wife, according to two sources with knowledge of the audit." The Post continues, "The school's 25-member governing Board of Trustees will meet within a few weeks to discuss the results and decide how to proceed with Ladner, who became president of the private university in Northwest Washington in 1994." The Post adds, "Ladner was placed on administrative leave Aug. 24, a few months after the board began reviewing the expenses of the president and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner, who is described on the university's Web site as a volunteer who represents the Ladner presidency. … The audit was prompted by an anonymous letter detailing what it said were questionable travel and entertainment expenses by the Ladners, according to sources close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect their role."

Chicago Bankruptcy Court Clerk Charged With Extortion. The Daily Southtown (9/13, Hack) reports Chicago bankruptcy court clerk Sandra D. Butler on Monday was "charged with extortion, accused of accepting a bribe in an FBI sting." The Southtown notes, "According to an FBI affidavit, agents first began investigating Butler three years ago after a debtor complained she had paid the clerk $5,000 to stop the foreclosure proceedings against her house but later learned the bribe was unnecessary. … Earlier this month, FBI agents filed a bogus Chapter 13 in Butler's courtroom and sent a fake debtor to see her. … After looking up the man's bankruptcy petition, Butler allegedly said she could make some phone calls 'off the record' to stop the sale of his house, the FBI said." The Chicago Tribune (9/13, Higgins) also reports on the charges, noting the FBI sting.

FBI, Florida Authorities Investigating State Prison Officials. The Tallahassee Democrat (9/13, Cotterell) reports, "State and federal authorities are investigating the activities of prison officials in North Florida, where the regional director for the state Department of Corrections abruptly resigned last month. FBI and state officials said Monday that no one has been arrested or indicted in the investigation, which has been the subject of heated discussion among corrections employees on computer bulletin boards and e-mail networks. 'There is an ongoing investigation regarding the Department of Corrections,' FBI Special Agent Jeff Westcott said from Jacksonville. He declined to comment on specifics.

Judge Clears Indicted Tennessee Senator To Attend DC Lobbying Conference. The AP (9/13) reports, "An indictment on bribery and extortion charges won't keep former state Senator John Ford from attending a convention of black business and political leaders in Washington, DC." Ford "will attend the conference September 21st to 26th to look for new clients for his private consulting business. US District Court Judge Daniel Breen gave Ford permission to leave the state for the convention." The AP notes, "Ford is charged with bribery and extortion in an…investigation focused on an FBI front company that sought favorable legislation from the General Assembly. He also is charged with threatening a federal witness." The Tennessean (9/13, de la Cruz) adds that Ford, "who is under house arrest on federal bribery and intimidation charges, got a judge's permission to travel to the '35th Annual Legislature Conference for Black Leaders and Businessmen.'"

State Trooper's Testimony Provides Details About Cockfighting Raids. The Knoxville News (9/12, Stambaugh) reports, "Among the evidence compiled by the FBI before a June 11 raid on a cockfighting pit near Del Rio were aerial photographs and video surveillance of the facility, according to testimony heard last week. A preliminary hearing Wednesday in Cocke County General Sessions Court provided many new details about the controversial raid, which was cloaked in secrecy as part of a sweeping four-year probe by federal and state authorities into organized crime and public corruption in Cocke County." Tennessee Highway Patrol Trooper Timothy Wolfenbarger "said the operation was orchestrated by the FBI and a federal SWAT team had been assigned to conduct the 'initial sweep' on the compound. State troopers, who had been drawn from posts across the state, were ordered into the site after it was secured. 'They (the FBI) had surveillance videos aerial photographs,' Wolfenbarger said. 'They had a good plan.'" The AP (9/12, Bailey) notes, "Judge John Bell bound the cases over to the grand jury but said he didn't think the evidence presented at the hearing was enough to convict them."

Family, Police Puzzled By Virginia College Student's Disappearance. The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Stockwell) reports, "Eager to begin her freshman year at Virginia Commonwealth University, Taylor Behl created an online profile and wrote that she was looking for new friends in the Richmond area. Last week, she told her roommate she was going out for a few hours. She did not come back." The Post continues, "Behl, 17, was last seen

Sept. 5, and campus officials said yesterday they still do not suspect foul play. But they are becoming increasingly concerned, and the investigation into her disappearance gains momentum and urgency with each passing day. … Nearby jurisdictions have joined the hunt, and the FBI has assigned an agent to advise campus and Richmond police. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, based in Alexandria, has posted a notice on its site." The Post adds, "Every year, students 'appear to disappear' from the 30,000-student university and do not call their families for days, said Pam Lepley, a campus police spokeswoman. The students usually resurface after a couple of days, she said. But in this case, Behl, a June graduate of Madison High School in Vienna, has contacted no one. … Behl was last seen about 10 p.m. on Labor Day after a late supper at a local cafe. She found her roommate in their room with a boyfriend and told her she would leave for a while to give them privacy, police said."

Judge Dismisses Case Against DeLay Fundraiser. The Hill (9/13, O'Connor) reports, "A Texas judge dismissed a civil case against a major fundraiser for House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) last Friday. The federal district-court judge dismissed the case brought by two Texas Democrats against John Colyandro, the former executive director of the Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee (TRMPAC). The judge, Lee Yeakel, ruled that lawyers for the two Democrats failed to prove that Colyandro had knowingly broken Texas election law in using corporate contributions to fund campaign ads."

DeLay Seeks To Put Case Behind Him Ahead Of Potential Ethics Probe. Roll Call (9/13, Bresnahan) reports, "The recently disclosed meeting between House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and a prosecutor investigating allegations of state campaign finance violations is a strong signal that DeLay is trying to put a longstanding Texas investigation behind him as he prepares for a potential probe by the House ethics committee. DeLay and his lawyers met with Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle and his aides for about 90 minutes on Aug. 17. … Sources close to both men described the meeting as cordial and said DeLay was treated more like a witness than a potential target of the probe." DeLay "was not under oath when he met with Earle, and there were no other preconditions put in place, such as transactional or prosecutorial immunity, sources close to the Majority Leader said." Roll Call adds that "while a number of legal issues remain for Texas courts to straighten out, including outstanding criminal charges against several DeLay allies, the fact that Earle privately told DeLay and his attorneys that he is not a target of investigators may now enable DeLay to focus his attention on the House ethics committee."

CIVIL LAW:

McCain, Feingold Take Aim At Campaign-Finance Rider. Roll Call (9/13, Nelson) reports, "Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) implored their colleagues Monday to support their efforts to remove a campaign-finance rider to the Treasury-Transportation appropriations bill, which is slated to come to the Senate floor as early as this week. The provision would allow lawmakers' leadership" PACs "to give unlimited funds to the national party committees, opening what the two Senators believe would be a significant loophole in the campaign finance law." Roll Call notes, "In a 'Dear Colleague' letter, Feingold and McCain noted that national parties could turn around and spend those funds on the lawmaker's own re-election, 'effectively subverting individual and PAC donor contribution limits on the amounts that can be given to a Member's campaign.'" McCain and Feingold "concluded by asserting that substantive changes to the campaign finance laws should occur only after 'adequate' debate, the antithesis of which would be '[s]lipping a rider onto an appropriations bill in a subcommittee markup.' The two plan to force a vote on the provision on the Senate floor."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Coalition Seen As Falling Apart. The AP (9/13, Leblanc, Emery) reports, "A fragile coalition of lawmakers cobbled together to support an anti-gay marriage amendment is falling apart, virtually assuring that same-sex marriage will for now remain legal in Massachusetts, according to an Associated Press poll." The AP continues, "The survey, conducted between Sept. 6-9, found at least 104 lawmakers who plan to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, which would ban gay marriage but create civil unions. … The amendment, which is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday, needs the support of at least 101 of the state's 200 lawmakers to get on the 2006 ballot. … 'It's a dangerous precedent to take away rights that have been granted by the court for an identifiable group of people,' said Democrat Rep. James Brendan Leary." The AP adds, "Last year, months after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that same-sex marriage was legal, the amendment passed 105-92. It must pass a second vote to get on next year's ballot. … Reasons for the faltering support are rooted in the language of the amendment, which was intended as a compromise between foes of same-sex marriage and supporters of gay rights. It ultimately had an opposite effect, however, alienating gay marriage opponents by creating civil unions and offending gay rights supporters by banning gay marriage."

California Gay Marriage Bill Could Have National Implications. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Wood) reports, "The latest struggle over who decides the legality of gay marriage -- citizens, lawmakers, or the courts -- played out in the nation's most populous state last week. The California legislature was the first to approve a bill legalizing same-sex marriage, although Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has vowed to veto it. … The legislature's attempt to broaden the definition of marriage is in direct conflict with a citizens' initiative passed in 2000 defining legal marriage as between a man and woman only. That citizen's initiative itself, Proposition 22, is also being challenged in court. But the recent move by Sacramento legislators emphasizes what some observers see as a shift in public opinion that appears to be more accepting of gay marriage. Still, others anticipate the bill could add to the backlash against the gay-marriage movement that prompted 11 states to ban same-sex marriage through ballot initiatives last year." The Monitor adds, "National pollsters report more acceptance of gays and lesbians in a variety of other contexts. What happens in California could set the tone for how other states deal with the issue legislatively."

WPost Praises California Lawmakers' Vote On Same-Sex Marriage. The Washington Post (9/13, A26) editorializes, "The California General Assembly last week became the first state legislature to allow same-sex marriages. … While the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court permitted same-sex marriage in that state and legislatures have created civil unions elsewhere, the vote is the first time that a state legislature has acted on its own to create marriage equality. … The California legislature's decision gives the lie to the notion that only imperial judges would foist such a social policy on a state." The Post notes that despite Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's vow to veto the bill, "the legislative action last week remains an important symbol -- at once a rebuke to those states that have reacted to the Massachusetts decision by writing discrimination into their fundamental laws and a gentle reminder to those who see hope for progress only in the courts that legislatures can still be engines for positive change."

New York Firefighter Arrested For Assault Of Immigrant Worker. The AP (9/13) reports, "Hours after many New York firefighters gathered to mark the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, one of them was arrested for attacking an immigrant worker from Bangladesh and telling him he looked 'like he's al-Qaida,' police said." The AP continues, "Firefighter Edward Dailey was arrested Sunday on charges of criminal mischief and felony second-degree assault, Police Sgt. Kevin Farrell said. … He was released without bail. Despite the alleged al-Qaida remark, there was not enough evidence to charge him with a hate crime, authorities said." The AP adds, "Dailey, 27, is accused of breaking a piece of Plexiglas off a curbside newsstand and throwing it at a 51-year-old man who works there, Farrell said. Dailey had said the man looked 'like he's al-Qaida,' Farrell said. … The victim, whose arm was cut in the alleged attack, was treated at a hospital and released, Farrell said."

Jury Finds Two Men Guilty Of Murdering Transgender Teen. The New York Times (9/13, Marshall) reports, "A jury convicted two men of murder on Monday but deadlocked on the fate of a third man in the retrial of three defendants charged with killing a 17-year-old transgender teenager in October 2002." The Times continues, "The two - Michael W. Magidson and Jose A. Merel, both 25 - were found guilty of second-degree murder for the death of Gwen Araujo, who was born as a male named Eddie Araujo Jr., but who frequently wore women's clothing and lived as a women. … After the verdict was read, Mr. Magidson bowed his head and Mr. Merel slowly shook his. They face sentences of 15 years to life in prison. … The jury found both men not guilty of committing a hate crime." The Times adds, "The actions of the third man, Jason Cazares, also 25, confounded a jury for the second time in two years. The panel, which heard the case for several months in a packed Alameda County Superior Court room, told Judge Harry R. Sheppard that they were hopelessly deadlocked on the fate of Mr. Cazares."

The AP (9/12, Locke) reports, "Araujo, 17, was born a boy named Edward but grew up to believe her true identity was female. The defendants, who knew her as Lida, met Araujo in the summer of 2002. Magidson and Merel had sexual encounters with Araujo, experiences that fueled suspicions about Araujo's gender." The AP continues, "The issue boiled over in the early hours of Oct. 4, 2002, in a confrontation at Merel's house in the San Francisco suburb of Newark. … Merel's lawyer, William Du Bois, said he was shocked by the verdict, especially since prosecutor Chris Lamiero said he didn't think Merel was the killer." The AP notes, "In the first trial, the three defendants stuck together, with their lawyers attacking the chief prosecution witness, Jaron Nabors, who was also at the house the night Araujo died but was allowed to plead guilty to manslaughter in exchange for testifying. … But in the second trial, the defendants' united front cracked."

California, Ohio, Florida Eyeing Redistricting Reform. Roll Call (9/13, Jacobson) reports, "With initiatives to reform redistricting expected to make the 2005 ballot in California and Ohio, and another for 2006 gaining traction in Florida, the ultimate insider issue has suddenly become hot in three of the nation's most populous states." Political strategists "say the pivotal wild card is frustration with politics as usual. If such a mood exists, and if it is channeled effectively, it can put a dry issue like redistricting over the top, said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the liberal Ballot Initiative Strategy Center. And in these three states at least, the political conditions may be riper than normal." Roll Call notes, "In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R)…has staked his prestige on the redistricting measure and other reforms. In Ohio, a metastasizing political scandal involving Gov. Bob Taft (R) and the state Republican Party is producing anger and volatility in a state long dominated by the GOP. And Florida, like Ohio, has been home to a divisive presidential election in which residents aired a torrent of allegations about how partisanship may have influenced vote counting."

ANTITRUST:

Oracle To Acquire Siebel For $5.85 Billion. The New York Times (9/13, Flynn) reports, "Oracle, the giant database-software maker, announced on Monday that it would pay $5.85 billion to acquire Siebel Systems, its largest competitor in the market for sales automation programs." The Times continues, "The deal will bolster Oracle's effort to topple its German rival SAP as the leading seller of business applications software for big corporations. … It comes less than a year after Oracle managed to achieve a hostile takeover of PeopleSoft for $10.3 billion after a contentious battle that dragged on for nearly 18 months."

The San Francisco Chronicle (9/12, Fost) reports, "The Siebel acquisition not only gives Redwood City's Oracle enough ammo to take on its archrival SAP of Germany in the field of customer relationship management, or CRM, software — essentially, software used to manage a company's sales operations — but it also has the delicious twist of allowing the Oracle boss to declare victory over Tom Siebel, a former protege turned enemy."

The Financial Times (9/13, Politi, Nuttall) reports, "For Larry Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, the acquisition will cement his reputation as a prolific dealmaker. In December, Oracle agreed to buy PeopleSoft for about $10.5bn, after winning an 18-month takeover battle, seeing off a high-profile, antitrust suit brought by the US Department of Justice." The Times adds, "Mr Ellison on Monday suggested the company's attention would now be focused on integration. 'I don't think you'll see another major acquisition any time soon,' he said. The purchase of Siebel will give Oracle access to 3.4m users and 4,000 corporate customers of its CRM software, which helps companies track sales, marketing and customer service."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Sanchez) reports, "Under the deal, Oracle will purchase each Siebel share for $10.66 in cash unless the owner of the stock decides to receive Oracle stock." The Times adds, "The merger, which is subject to regulatory review, has been approved by the boards of Oracle and Siebel. Siebel shareholders must still vote on the deal, but a vote by Oracle shareholders is not required, according to the company."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Bank) reports, "Oracle predicted the deal will close early next year, after approval by Siebel shareholders. The acquisition is expected to face an antitrust review by the Justice Department, which unsuccessfully sought to block Oracle's purchase of PeopleSoft. … Analysts said they don't expect strong opposition this time; Oracle has lagged well behind SAP and Siebel in CRM software, and Oracle's marketing of Siebel products could potentially increase competition in the market."

The Washington Post (9/13, D5, Musgrove) reports, "A Justice Department spokeswoman, Gina Talamona, said it was too soon for the agency to comment on Oracle's planned acquisition. 'It's certainly something we'd be interested in taking a look at,' she said." The Post adds, "Analysts said Oracle's proposed acquisition may not generate the same type of controversy as the PeopleSoft deal because it's not considered a hostile takeover bid and the combined company would not dominate the CRM market."

The AP (9/13, Liedtke) reports, "In the past nine months, Oracle has either completed or announced five takeovers in the field, an expansion that has cost more than $17.6 billion. Among the acquired was PeopleSoft Inc., which like Siebel Systems was run by a former Oracle executive who had developed a frosty relationship Ellison. … The Siebel acquisition, expected to close early next year, affects about 4,000 customers. The company has about 5,000 workers, many of whom are expected to lose their jobs as Oracle cuts costs in an effort to boost its profits by about 20 percent annually."

Bloomberg News (9/12) and Dow Jones Newswires (9/12) also report on the planned acquisition.

FCC Moves Ahead On Telephone Mergers. The AP (9/13, Kerr) reports, "The head of the Federal Communications Commission has asked agency staff to draft orders approving two big phone company mergers - SBC Communications Inc. with AT&T, and Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI Inc." The AP continues, "FCC chairman Kevin Martin wants the commission to take a final vote on the deals next month, two people with firsthand knowledge of the issue said Monday. They were authorized to speak about the drafts only on the condition of anonymity." The AP adds, "The sources would not say what conditions might be placed on the mergers to ensure competition is not compromised. … SBC's deal to acquire AT&T is valued at $16 billion while Verizon is offering $8.5 billion for MCI. SBC and Verizon already are the largest regional phone companies, known informally as 'Baby Bells.' The mergers would enhance their base of business customers and expand their national and international presence." The AP notes, "The Bells have been peeling away long-distance customers from AT&T and MCI by offering unlimited national calling for a set rate. … Martin's request for drafts of approval signal his intention to press ahead with the mergers despite the 2-2 split between Republicans and Democrats on the commission. The decision also seems to indicate Martin's willingness to reach out to the Democrats to craft an agreement. … The Justice Department also will have to sign off on the mergers."

eBay To Purchase Internet Phone Leader Skype Technologies. The Washington Post (9/13, D1, Krim) reports, "Online auction giant eBay Inc. announced a deal yesterday to become one of the world's largest telecommunications companies, buying Internet phone-service leader Skype Technologies SA." The Post continues, "Although Luxembourg-based Skype is relatively unknown in the United States, it has amassed 54 million global customers in less than three years by offering free calls between those who use its software."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Mangalindan, Rhoads) reports, "Founded in 2002, Luxembourg's Skype allows its subscribers to talk to one another over personal computers free. It also allows cut-rate voice calls from PCs to regular phones or cellphones. Skype, which employs about 200 people, has signed up 54 million users, mainly in Europe and Asia so far, making it one of the fastest-growing online communities." The Journal continues, "EBay officials said the acquisition gives the company a new way to reach millions of potential customers, to help customers make complicated transactions, and to open up ways to generate revenue from services such as classified advertisements. Chief Executive Meg Whitman said Skype will also help eBay penetrate developing markets such as India, Brazil, Russia and China that offer huge growth potential but typically have lower levels of trust in Internet-based commerce."

The Financial Times (9/13, Waters, Taylor) reports, "The auction company's executives said that adding a voice calling feature to its existing online network would let it charge fees to merchants for generating sales leads the internet's fastest-growing business, currently dominated by the two biggest search engine companies. It could represent the most important in a series of recent initiatives by Ebay to extendinto new areas of online activity."

The New York Times (9/13, Belson) reports, "The total value of the deal may grow based on 'potential performance-based consideration' that could be worth an additional $1.5 billion, eBay said. Though Skype's revenue is expected to grow to about $200 million in 2006, from an estimated $60 million this year, eBay does not expect Skype - which gives its basic PC-to-PC service away free - to turn a profit until the fourth quarter next year." The Times adds, "The deal ends months of speculation about who might scoop up Skype, which since 2002 has been offering downloadable software that allows users to talk to one another over the Internet through their personal computers. The News Corporation, Google and Yahoo had been mentioned as potential suitors in recent months."

USA Today (9/13, Maney) reports, "EBay insists the deal isn't a major corporate turn. Top eBay executives became aware of Skype about a year ago, 'And we started putting some thinking against Skype,' says eBay CFO Rajiv Dutta. … Though other online services such as Google Talk offer free computer-to-computer voice conversations, Skype has caught fire globally. It's adding 150,000 users a day, the majority in countries such as China, India and Sweden. In 2005, Skype's first full year of charging for services, it will have revenue of $60 million. Skype expects revenue to jump to $200 million in 2006."

The Los Angeles Times/AP (9/13) reports, "Other big Internet names have expanded their VoIP capabilities lately, including Google Inc., which rolled out a new instant-messaging program with voice service. Last month Microsoft Corp. acquired Teleo Inc., a small startup whose software lets people make calls from computers to traditional telephones. … But some analysts have been skeptical about eBay's need to own a VoIP provider." The AP adds, "EBay buyers and sellers can communicate with each other via e-mail before a transaction is complete -- eBay says about 5 million such messages are exchanged daily. Adding Skype and its voice capabilities will speed the communication between parties and increase the level of trust, said Meg Whitman, eBay's chief executive."

DOJ, FTC To Hold Workshop On Real Estate Industry Competition. Inman News (9/13) reports, "Four days after launching a lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors for alleged anticompetitive practices, federal agencies are planning a public forum to discuss competition in the real estate industry." Inman continues, "The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission will jointly host a one-day workshop on competition policy and the real estate industry next month, the agencies said. … The workshop will be held on Oct. 25, at the FTC's Satellite Building Conference Center located at 601 New Jersey Ave. NW, in Washington, D.C." Inman adds, "The workshop is free and open to the public and aims to provide a forum on the competitiveness of the residential real estate industry, focusing on topics such as multiple listing services, discount and limited-service brokers, and minimum-service requirements. … In particular, discussion will center on the real estate transaction, the multiple listing service, and private and state actions that affect competition among brokers. … Parties seeking to participate as panelists in the workshop must notify both the Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the FTC in writing on or before Sept. 25. Persons submitting a request to participate as a panelist will be notified on or before Oct. 11, if they have been selected."

UK Regulators Launch Antitrust Probe Of Loan Insurers. Bloomberg News (9/13) reports, "Barclays Plc, Lloyds TSB Group Plc, HBOS Plc and Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc are among U.K. banks facing an antitrust probe after a consumer group said loan insurance in Britain is expensive and inappropriately sold." Bloomberg continues, "Citizens Advice, a nonprofit organization, asked Britain's Office of Fair Trading to investigate the 5 billion-pound ($9.1 billion) a year market after uncovering numerous problems, the London-based organization said in an e-mailed statement released today. The complaint triggered an automatic review by the antitrust regulator, which has 90 days to decide on a full investigation." Bloomberg adds, "The call for an investigation of loan insurers is the second this year, after a committee of lawmakers in February asked the Financial Services Authority, the main regulator of banks and insurers, for a probe, saying some consumers have purchased policies that they won't be able to use to make claims. … The report didn't name any companies involved in the sale of loan insurance, which is provided by all of Britain's biggest banks on credit card and other unsecured debt."

Ford To Sell Hertz For $5.5 Billion. NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 9, :30, Williams) reported, "Ford said today it is selling its Hertz rental call business to a group of private equity firms for $5.5 billion. The infusion of cash is expected to help Ford's bottom line, which has been hurt lately by falling sales for SUVs and rising costs for healthcare."

The Financial Times (9/13, Politi) reports that a consortium of three private equity groups announced yesterday that they have purchased Hertz, the New Jersey-based car rental business for $15 billion. The paper notes the deal is the largest buy-out since 1989. The paper says, "The acquisition, by Clayton Dubilier & Rice, Carlyle, and the buy-out unit of Merrill Lynch, came after several weeks of negotiations with Ford, the carmaker that has owned all of Hertz since 2001 and is selling the unit as part of its revitalization plan. The three buyers will be paying $5.6 billion in cash to Ford, and have agreed to assume nearly $10 billion in debt under the agreement." The Times adds, "The buyers dismissed suggestions that the jump in petrol prices could make it an unattractive time to invest in car rentals, by saying that they were optimistic about the long-term trends in the travel industry. The acquisition is being financed with a combination of asset-backed securities linked to Hertz's fleet of rental cars, traditional corporate debt, and the equity contributions of the three buy-out groups. … There were no plans to extract cost savings through large-scale staff reductions, and the consortium would continue to support management's plans to diversify away from airport rentals."

The Washington Post (9/13, D3, Hilzenrath) says, "The deal will provide a $5.6 billion cash infusion to the automaker, whose bonds were downgraded in May to junk status. … Carlyle managing director Gregory S. Ledford said the investment firm sees growth potential in Hertz's overseas and heavy equipment rental businesses." He added the firm viewed Hertz as a "corporate orphan" -- a well-run company with a good brand and a good business that is not central to its corporate parent's business. Ledford said he didn't believe rising crude oil and gasoline prices would have a big impact on Hertz, "unless it really impacts people flying," because Hertz's business is largely driven by airport traffic.

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Sender, Johnson) reports, "The last days of the bidding war took place against the backdrop of a hurricane that led many economists to forecast lower growth for the car-rental industry. Hertz has annual revenue of more than $7 billion. But concerns about growth didn't deter bidders, giving Ford a bigger payday than auction participants anticipated. The losing group consisted of Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee & Partners." The Journal adds, "The new owners of Hertz may have a different vision for the company's future than current management. Hertz management, which analysts say had favored a public listing to a sale, had positioned the firm to demonstrate strong growth prospects and had lots of initiatives beyond its core airport car-rental business. By contrast, the buyout group may be under pressure to cut costs and raise cash by selling noncore operations, people familiar with the matter say."

Wachovia To Acquire Westcorp. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Bauerlein) reports, "Wachovia Corp. agreed to acquire Westcorp Inc. for about $3.91 billion in a deal aimed at boosting the Charlotte, NC, company's heft in the auto-finance business while giving Wachovia its first branches in California. In addition to making Wachovia the ninth-largest auto lender in the US, the takeover quiets speculation at least for the moment that the bank is about to make an even larger acquisition of a commercial bank or consumer-finance company. The purchase price represents only about 5% of Wachovia's stock-market value, which analysts said seemed reasonable given Westcorp's size and reputation for being well-run."

The New York Times (9/13, Creswell) reports, "Moving to expand its presence in automobile financing, the Wachovia Corporation, the nation's fourth-largest bank, agreed yesterday to acquire the financial-services holding company Westcorp and its majority-owned auto-finance group, WFS Financial, in a stock deal valued at $3.91 billion. The deal, which had been rumored for weeks…is the latest in a string of purchases by banks in the auto-finance industry after downgrades this spring in the debt ratings of the General Motors Corporation and the Ford Motor Corporation. The downgrades raised the costs of borrowing for the car makers' finance arms, which have typically offered low-interest loans that banks were hard pressed to match." The Times adds that in yesterday's deal, Wachovia said it was acquiring Westcorp and WFS for $3.42 billion in stock. Wachovia will pay $490 million in stock for the 16 percent of the publicly traded WFS that Westcorp does not own. The deal is expected to close in early 2006.

The AP (9/13) reports, "Wachovia said its purchase of Westcorp will give it a small presence in the California retail banking market, while expanding its auto finance group into a national business. The firm will add about 8,500 automobile dealer clients, and about 920,000 individual customers."

Refiner Tupras Sold For $4.14 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Wang) reports, "A consortium led by Koc Holding AS of Turkey and including Royal Dutch Shell PLC fended off eight other bidders in a hotly contested privatization auction for control of Tupras, Turkey's 500,000-barrel-a-day refiner. The winning bid of $4.14 billion defied even the most optimistic expectations which, ahead of the auction, had reckoned with a final price tag closer to $3 billion." The paper adds, "The Koc-Shell group faced its strongest competition from a joint venture comprising state-owned Indian Oil Corp. and Turkey's Calik Enerji Sanayii, as well as OYAK, an industrial conglomerate representing a Turkish Army officers' pension fund. The winning consortium comprised two Shell units -- Shell Co. of Turkey Ltd. and Shell Overseas Investment BV -- together holding 10%; Koc, one of Turkey's biggest industrial conglomerates, with 80%; and two smaller Turkish energy companies, Aygaz AS with 7% and Opet Petrolculuk AS with the remaining 3%." The Journal notes, "The win by the Koc-Shell consortium represents a best-case scenario for the government as it keeps majority control of Tupras in Turkish hands. Shell's minor involvement lends it credibility."

Ichan Plans Time Warner Proxy Fight. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Angwin) reports, "A group led by New York financier Carl Icahn said it intends to mount a proxy contest to win seats on Time Warner Inc.'s board, in the latest step by the investor group to pressure the company to spin off its cable unit and buy back $20 billion in stock." The paper adds, "The group, made up of several hedge funds including one managed by Mr. Icahn, also said it thinks the 'true value' of Time Warner shares is between $26 and $28, about $10 a share above the stock's trading range over the past couple of years." The Journal notes that in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, "the group laid out its most detailed argument to date as to why Time Warner shares are trading at a discount to their 'inherent value' and what 'immediate actions' the company could take to reduce the discount." The paper continues, "The filing noted that the stock is down 6% since Chairman Richard Parsons took over in May 2002 and said 'management's slow pace of change' has hurt Time Warner stock. The group chastised Time Warner for not paying dividends or buying back stock as aggressively as other media companies. It argued that Time Warner has an "inefficient capital structure" and could afford to take on more debt if it spun off Time Warner Cable."

Buyouts Booming As Stock Market Surges. USA Today (9/13, Krantz) reports, "Following a multiyear downturn in the number of mergers and acquisitions, companies are again in the shopping mood. Oracle, eBay and Wachovia all announced deals Monday worth billions to buy other companies, signaling a pickup in the deal boom. Already this year, companies have announced $707 billion in mergers and acquisitions, says Richard Peterson, senior researcher at Thomson Financial. That's 30% more than the deals during the same period last year and the highest since the M&A heyday in 2000. It's also the fourth-strongest pace of M&A in history, Peterson says." Howard Silverblatt, market analyst for Standard & Poor's, said, "Companies were shy. Now they are definitely doing more."

Judge Halts Logging In Sequoia Forest. The AP (9/13, Kravets) reports, "A federal judge (in San Francisco) halted the Bush administration's bid to keep logging 2,000 acres in Giant Sequoia National Monument, saying he 'called into question' the scientific analysis used to justify cutting in a preserve that houses two-thirds of the world's largest trees." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Stephen Breyer, ruling in a lawsuit brought by environmentalists, also questioned whether fire control was the government's real motive for allowing commercial logging in the monument. The so-called 'Saddle Project' was approved years ago, but cutting only commenced this summer, when timber prices were high." The AP adds, "The government, Breyer wrote late Friday in issuing a preliminary injunction barring further logging, 'waited five years to execute this contract because of unfavorable timber prices.' … In 2000, just after the project was approved, Congress declared Sequoia National Forest a national monument, which generally prevented further logging on thousands of acres in the Central Valley area of Tulare County. The government argued the project was grandfathered in and therefore not covered by monument rules." The AP notes, "The Justice Department, which defended the logging plan in court here, declined to say whether it would challenge Breyer's injunction. If it does not, the case is over and the acreage is safe from harvesting. The government could also take the issue to trial."

Senate To Vote On Challenge To EPA Mercury Emission Rules. The New York Times/AP (9/13) reports the Senate "agreed Monday to vote on a resolution challenging new rules limiting mercury emissions from power plants." The Bush Administration said "that the rules, completed by the Environmental Protection Agency in March, would eventually cut mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 70 percent without driving up energy costs and that repealing the rules would delay the reduction of such emissions." But environmental and health groups "have demanded swifter and tougher measures to reduce emissions." By "repealing the rules, the Senate would compel the E.P.A. to rewrite them. The revisions would be in line with Clean Air Act standards requiring the use of the best available technology to reduce mercury emissions." The Senate vote "on Tuesday is expected to be close, but the Republican-dominated House is unlikely to act on a resolution, which President Bush has said he opposes."

US Households Face Higher Winter Energy Bills. USA Today (9/13, Kirchhoff) reports US consumers "could still face higher energy bills ahead despite declines in energy prices Monday as gulf producers continued to rebound from Hurricane Katrina's pounding." The "average nationwide retail gasoline price Monday fell to $2.967 a gallon for regular unleaded from $3.018 the day before, according to AAA. Gasoline futures prices have dropped by about a third since the end of August." Crude oil prices "dropped to $63.34 a barrel, down 9% from the record close of $69.81 in late August. Natural gas futures were down more than 23 cents in New York trading, to $11.03 per million British thermal units, compared with a record $11.76 on Sept. 1." But energy experts "say consumers will feel the impact of Katrina for months. Natural gas prices will be a big challenge this winter."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 9, :25, Schieffer) reported, "The price of gasoline is slowly coming down. It hit a record high $3.07 a gallon after Hurricane Katrina hit. But an Energy Department survey out tonight says gas is down now to a national average $2.96 for self-serve regular."

Carter Decries Move To Drill In ANWR. In a Washington Post op-ed (9/13, A27), former President Jimmy Carter says that Congress is "about to make one of those big decisions that marks an era. Unless wiser heads prevail, it may do it badly -- making the wrong decision in the wrong way and about the wrong place. At stake is America's greatest wildlife sanctuary, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. To dissuade Congress from this environmental tragedy, Americans must rally, and quickly." We "cannot drill our way to energy security or lower gasoline prices as long as our nation sits on just 3 percent of world oil reserves yet accounts for 25 percent of all oil consumption. An obvious answer is to increase the fuel efficiency of motor vehicles, at least to the level we set more than a quarter-century ago. Instead, the administration recently proposed a tiny increase in gas mileage for SUVs, minivans and pickups."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

IG Finds FBI Violates Informant Rules. The AP (9/13, Sherman) reports, "FBI agents often violate bureau's rules for handling confidential informants that were revised after FBI abuses in the 1990s, the Justice Department's internal watchdog said Monday." The AP continues, "A review of 120 confidential informant files from FBI offices around the country found violations in 104 cases, or 87 percent, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. His 301-page report, parts of which were blacked out, examined FBI compliance with rules that govern most criminal investigations." The AP adds, "The report said agents failed to assess informants' suitability or get permission for informants to engage in activity that otherwise would be illegal. Agents did not convey proper instructions or tell prosecutors when informants had committed crimes that were not authorized by their FBI handlers, Fine said. … FBI Director Robert Mueller, according to the report, said many agents find the required paperwork cumbersome. In a statement, the FBI said the violations were 'administrative' and that officials have begun simplifying procedures."

The Boston Globe (9/13, Murphy) reports that "the FBI has continued to violate informant guidelines adopted several years ago amid public condemnation over its mishandling of notorious Boston gangsters James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi." US Rep. William Delahunt called the report "damning," and said that he and Rep. Daniel Lungren "will file a bill mandating that the FBI follow the guidelines and include sanctions for agents who do not."

The New York Times (9/13, Lichtblau) notes, "Part of the problem, F.B.I. officials acknowledged, was the bureau's continued difficulty in building a modern computer system to help oversee the informant program and ensure better compliance. 'Even before the inspector general's review, we realized that we had to do some re-engineering of our whole human source program,' Kevin R. Brock, an assistant F.B.I.

director who oversees the program, said in an interview. … 'Agents are failing to do certain things not because of mal-intent but just the press of administrative requirements, and overlooking them,' he said."

The Washington Times (9/13, Seper) adds, "Noting that confidential informants are critical to the bureau's ability to carry out its 'counterterrorism, national security and criminal law-enforcement missions,' the FBI said it began a project several months ago to review and revise its confidential-informant program." Cogswell "said the review seeks to develop policies and processes to simplify and standardize administrative procedures and to clarify and improve compliance requirements." USA Today (9/13, A8) also reports on Fine's review, running a truncated version of the AP story.

Report Also Urges Tighter Rules On Terrorism Surveillance. The New York Times (9/13, Lichtblau) also reports that the review "looked at the effect of a number of changes ordered by Mr. Ashcroft in his 2002 revamping of the bureau's investigative guidelines," which "allowed F.B.I. agents to visit public sites and events, attend mosques and other religious institutions, or peruse the Internet in search of leads in terrorism cases. The changes relaxed restrictions put in place in the 1970's as a result of F.B.I. abuses in the monitoring of political dissidents, and they have drawn criticism from civil rights advocates and Muslim leaders who say they open the door to investigative abuses." Director Mueller "told the inspector general's office that because agents were not required to get supervisors' approval before visiting public sites, it was 'difficult to determine to what extent these authorities have been used,' the inspector general's office said. It called on the F.B.I. to consider requiring approval from supervisors and more documentation of public visits to guard against possible abuses."

FBI Releases Additional 800 Pages Of Thurmond Files. The State (9/13) reports, "More than 800 pages of the late Strom Thurmond's FBI file were released Monday at the request of several news organizations, including The State. The first 600 came out in March. … The 800 pages just released deal mainly with threats made against Thurmond throughout his public life. According to the FBI, about 900 more pages are yet to be released. As is typical with the FBI and Monday's release, it might take several more months before these additional pages are made available to the public."

Files Reveal FBI Investigated At Least 31 Death Threats Against Thurmond. The State (9/13, Bandy, Burris, Monk, Stensland, Washington) reports, "For a half century, Strom Thurmond was a Southern icon and a national figure. His longevity…exposed him to at least 31 threats that the FBI investigated. The threats ranged from the serious…to the ravings of a 'chronic letter writer with apparent mental problems,' the FBI reported" in recently-released Thurmond files. The State goes on to detail several of the more significant plots against Thurmond investigated by the FBI.

The State (9/13, Markoe) adds that Thurmond "made plenty of political enemies over his long and controversial career — including the kind the FBI feared might try to kill him. … The documents are windows into some of the more unpleasant aspects of political fame and include copies of threatening telegrams, results of handwriting tests and summaries of interviews with suspects. … The documents do not indicate that any of the threats resulted in prosecutions."

GAO Finds Continuing Shortcomings With FBI IT Modernization. Government Executive (9/13, Pulliam) reports, "Despite past warnings from congressional auditors, the FBI does not have an effective framework for modernizing its information technology systems, according to a new report" by the GAO. GAO also "found that the bureau's heavy reliance on private contractors to develop the IT framework was hampered because the FBI does not use performance-based contracting techniques and has failed to effectively oversee the contractors' work." GE adds, "GAO recommended that the FBI's chief information officer and chief financial officer implement performance-based contracting wherever possible, along with stronger tracking and oversight practices." CIO Zalmai Azmi "wrote that the bureau has been successful in using fixed-price contracting, rather than the performance-based contracting, because the approach gives contractors an incentive to stay on schedule. But, he said, the FBI would take steps to encourage performance-based contracting."

Three Plead Guilty To Roles In Louisiana Cocaine Ring. The AP (9/12) reports that three Lafayette, Louisiana, men "pleaded guilty Monday to being members of a cocaine distribution ring that operated over 16 years." Nathan Campbell and Aubrey Howard "pleaded guilty to conspiracy to possess and distribute cocaine," while Tevin Bennett "pleaded guilty to possession of cocaine with intent to sell, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Monday. A sentencing date has not been set."

Fighting Between Bolivian Government, Coca Farmers Could Resume. Knight Ridder (9/12, Chang) reports that the "uneasy peace" between Bolivian coca farmers and the government could be nearing an end. A "one-year truce signed by growers and the administration of since-ousted President Carlos Mesa that allows limited cultivation of coca" will expire on October 1, and Bolivians are "scheduled to elect a new president in December. … 'If the government doesn't respect our right to determine our own livelihood, we will organize and we will fight,' said Gabina Contreras, a 54-year-old mother of 11 from the growers' collective Sindicato Esteban Arce, named for a Bolivian independence hero. 'Coca is like father and mother to us. We can't live without coca.'" The US State Department says Bolivia is the world's third-largest producer of cocaine.

"Guru Of Ganja" Appeals To Ninth Circuit Court Today. The Alameda (CA) Times-Star (9/13, Richman) reports, "More than two years after being convicted and sentenced for growing marijuana, Oakland's self-styled 'Guru of Ganja' will make his appeal Tuesday for why even a slap on the wrist was too much. Ed Rosenthal, a renowned pro-marijuana author, activist and cultivation authority, claims he never should have been convicted of three marijuana-growing felonies. The government claims he not only deserved conviction, but he also deserved at least two to five years in prison instead of his one-day, time-already-served sentence. Three judges of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will decide sometime in the few months after Tuesday's arguments. Rosenthal -- famed for his books and for the 'Ask Ed' column he wrote for 'High Times' magazine -- became a medical-marijuana cause celebre after his February 2002 arrest. Drug Enforcement Administration agents raided sites including his Oakland home office; an Oakland warehouse where he'd been growing marijuana; San Francisco's Harm Reduction Center medical marijuana club, which he'd supplied; and the HRC's founder's Petaluma home. After a five-day trial, a federal jury convicted Rosenthal on Jan. 31, 2003, of three marijuana-growing felonies. Upon learning afterward of the state and city protections Rosenthal had not been allowed to raise as a defense, several jurors renounced their verdict and rallied to his cause. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced Rosenthal on June 4, 2003, to one day in prison."

UN Report Says Opium Prices Down Since Taliban's Fall In Afghanistan. The AP (9/12, Gedda) reports, "Favorable opium harvests in Afghanistan have led to a sharp drop in prices since the U.S. military forced the Taliban regime from power in 2001, according to a United Nations report. The Taliban imposed a ban on opium cultivation in 2000, triggering an eight-fold price increase to $675 per kilogram in late 2001, the U.N. report said. Since then good harvests coupled with improved yields dropped the price to $151 as of this past July, the study said. The report was outlined at a new conference by the U.N.'s anti-drug chief, Antonio Maria Costa. It will be presented to the House Committee on International Relations on Tuesday." Costa also noted that "Afghanistan accounts for 87 percent of world opium production, down 3 percent from last year," and that the "opium economy is netting traffickers $2.14 billion in 2005, about 41 percent of Afghanistan's gross national product, a 7 percent decline from last year. The death toll from Afghan opiate overdoses, mostly by Europeans, is estimated at 10,000 annually. About 100,000 others died from sickness related to heroin use."

Chicago Tribune Urges Realistic Action In Meth Battle. The Chicago Tribune (9/13) editorializes, "The summer began with a controversy over a new government anti-marijuana campaign that re-ignited a long-smoldering debate about the dangers of pot. It ended with a dust-up over methamphetamine, a potent and addictive drug also known as meth or crystal meth. … A Newsweek cover breathlessly called meth 'America's Most Dangerous Drug' and warned of an 'epidemic' that will soon be spreading to Your Town, if it's not already there. Meth is being called a 'plague' by some drug officials and likened to a forest fire sweeping the country. A recent survey of 500 sheriffs' departments in 45 states labeled meth the No. 1 scourge. Some in Congress are accusing the White House of largely ignoring meth to focus on battling marijuana." The Tribune continues, "All of that has prompted some critics to cry 'hype,' suspecting that the meth epidemic is a transparent ploy by law enforcement to drum up more federal money. … A dose of skepticism is warranted here. … 'Epidemic' implies that meth has swamped the country. That is not true. If you're a Drug Enforcement Administration agent in San Diego or Phoenix, the term is apt. But it's not if you're in Chicago. Cocaine and heroin are much bigger problems here, a DEA agent said. That's also true of many Northeastern cities, where meth remains a minor player. … But meth, sometimes called 'poor man's cocaine,' is popular and spreading." The Tribune concludes, "Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales recently declared that meth had overtaken marijuana as the most dangerous drug in America. That's certainly true in many places in this country. And where it isn't, it could be tomorrow. The focus now should be in making sure that meth doesn't become a full-fledged 'epidemic.'"

"DC Arsonist" Gets Life Plus 136 Years. The Baltimore Sun (9/13, Dolan) reports, "Thomas A. Sweatt, 50, the once-elusive 'firebug' responsible for setting more than 45 fires in Maryland, Virginia and Washington that killed two people" was sentenced yesterday in federal court "to serve the rest of his life in prison." The paper notes a law enforcement task force that "secretly labored for years from a warren of empty laboratories at the Beltsville Agricultural Research Center, chasing more than a thousand dead-end leads" finally cracked the case. The Sun adds, "In the end, it was a combination of sheer doggedness, a serendipitous meeting with military officials about DNA evidence from a pair of Marine dress-blues left behind at a fire scene, and an unusually cooperative suspect that cracked the case. "It's a relief," said Scott Fulkerson, a special agent from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco Firearms and Explosives' Baltimore field office who was co-leader of the task force that operated for nearly two years. The paper said Sweatt was convicted of setting fires in the District of Columbia, Maryland and Virginia.

The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Castaneda, Wilber) reports, "Serial arsonist Thomas A. Sweatt offered an apology yesterday as he was sentenced to a life prison term for carrying out a deadly string of fires, but he provided no clue in court about why he spent nearly three years igniting homes where people were sleeping. It was the first time that Sweatt spoke publicly of the pain he caused by setting 45 houses and apartments on fire throughout the Washington region -- blazes that killed two elderly women and caused millions of dollars in damage. His words rang hollow, according to family members who said they want a motive and explanation." The paper adds, "During a news conference, Maryland US Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein praised the Serial Arson Task Force, which included members of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and local police and fire department investigators from Maryland, the District and Virginia. He also cited the work of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which helped connect DNA from a single strand of hair left at a September 2003 fire scene to Sweatt." Rosenstein said that if the task force had not arrested Sweatt, "I have no doubt Mr. Sweatt would have set fire to more houses, and more people would have died."

The Washington Times/AP (9/13, Greenfield) reports, "Sweatt, 50, admitted setting 45 arson fires in the Washington area. Investigators know how he did it -- using jugs of gasoline, and clothing for a wick. But the reason why remained unanswered even as a federal judge sentenced him yesterday to life in prison plus 136 years. … The former fast-food restaurant manager admitted that between February 2003 and December 2004 he set 45 fires: 21 in the District, 17 in Prince George's County, three in Fairfax County, two in Montgomery County, and one each in Arlington County and Alexandria. Under a plea deal, local prosecutors agreed not to charge Sweatt with other arsons. Sweatt also pleaded guilty to two murder charges."

The New York Times (9/13, Gately) reports, "Federal Judge Deborah K. Chasanow sentenced Mr. Sweatt to life plus nearly 136 years, eliminating any chance of parole. Judge Chasanow said she would recommend to prison officials that Mr. Sweatt receive a psychiatric evaluation and, if necessary, treatment. But, she added, mental illness could not excuse killing two people and setting fire to more than 45 homes, as well as several automobiles." The Times adds, "Mr. Sweatt's arrest in April resulted from an intensive investigation by federal agencies and local law enforcement in Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia. Investigators broke the case when they found a pair of Marine Corps blue trousers near a fire scene. The trousers led them to Navy investigators, who had identified Mr. Sweatt as a suspect in car fires more than two years earlier near the Marine barracks in Southeast Washington. Mr. Sweatt consented to giving a DNA sample, which linked him to evidence from four of the fires, the authorities said, and he admitted to setting others next to entrances to homes using cloth wicks and one-gallon jugs of gasoline.

TAX:

Panel Concludes Treasury Tax Analysis Of Kerry Plan Was Lawful. The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones Newswires (9/13, A4) reports, "An independent investigation concluded that the Treasury Department didn't break the law by calculating the cost of then-Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry's tax plan and posting the results on the department's Web site. 'We do not believe that Treasury employees completed the revenue estimate at issue for use by a campaign or a party, but as a defense of the [Bush] administration's policies,' according to a March 24 letter to the Treasury from Special Counsel Scott Bloch. The analysis was made with an eye toward congressional action, not to criticize Mr. Kerry, the special counsel's office said. The Hatch Act restricts political activities by government employees."

Professor Says Estate Tax Repeal Won't Doom Giving To Charity. Arthur C. Brooks, associate professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/13), "Americans bequeath $20 billion every year to nonprofits, including organizations that provide relief to disaster victims." Opponents of estate tax repeal say "that doing so removes a powerful philanthropic motive, because the portion of an estate willed to charity is tax-exempt. … When all is said and done, the Senate will most likely repeal or greatly reduce the estate tax without too much consideration of the interests of the nonprofit sector. This does not spell doom for charities, however. The key is not to focus on how the tax system can be used to get more money from the dead, but rather to look to the future and find ways to increase giving -- for humanitarian relief and other worthy causes -- among a new generation of heirs."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Gives Opening Statement As Hearing Get Underway. Supreme Court nominee John Roberts appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday. With Democrats suggesting they would challenge his stands on civil rights and abortion, Roberts used his brief remarks to make the case for judicial restraint and pledge "humility" if confirmed. The consensus from the media coverage continues to be that Roberts is likely to win Senate confirmation.

Roberts' performance yesterday is receiving largely positive reviews, though many reports note a better test of how he stands under questioning will come today, when Democratic senators will begin pressing him for his views. As for yesterday, USA Today (9/13, Kiely, Biskupic) sums up the media's view when it calls Roberts "unflappable and succinct," with the Los Angeles Times (9/13, Savage, Gerstenzang) saying the nominee's statement "showed the qualities that made him a superb advocate before the Supreme Court." The Washington Post (9/13, C1, Davis), meanwhile, says that when listening to the senators, "Roberts was as still as he was silent, his face a wall. His lips were a tight line, except on the few occasions when he laughed at a joke -- mainly the recurring one about his relative youth and appearance of good health."

While the hearing received coverage on the network news and today's major newspapers, the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Babington, Becker) notes it "seemed almost anticlimactic, with public attention riveted on the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina." Moreover, "With few doubting that Roberts, 50, will ultimately win confirmation, senators of both parties used yesterday's forum to highlight their contrasting legal philosophies and views of the court's role in society."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 6, 2:15, P. Williams) reported Roberts "gamely listened for three hours to Judiciary Committee members, then spoke just six minutes, saying a Supreme Court justice should not make the law but must serve as an umpire." Committee Democrats "said they want to know if Roberts is committed to protecting civil rights, especially after Hurricane Katrina reminded us many Americans have yet to share in the nation's prosperity." Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) Massachusetts: "As one nation under God, we cannot continue to ignore the injustice, the inequality, and the gross disparities that exist in our society." Pete Williams: "The committee's only woman said a key issue for here would be Roberts's views on the constitutionally of abortion." Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D) California: "It would be very difficult, and I said this to you privately and I said it publicly, for me to vote to confirm someone whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade." Pete Williams: "But committee Republicans said Roberts should not have to say how he would decide any question." Roberts's supporters "predict a strong party line vote of approval in the committee, 10 to 8. And unless the next two days bring a surprise, even Democrats say he'll be confirmed."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 4, 1:55, Borger) reported senators are "going to start asking questions tomorrow. I think they're going to be tough because there is some confusion about where Judge Roberts stands on issue number one for Democrats, that's the question of Roe versus Wade or abortion." Democrats have "also given some other hints. They're going to ask questions about civil rights and about the separation of powers. … I don't think he's going to be off the hook. These questions could be tough."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 6, 1:50, Vargas) excerpted Judge Roberts' opening statement: "Judges and justices are servants of the law. Not the other way around. Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules. They apply them. The role of an umpire and a judge is critical. They make sure everybody plays by the rules. But it is a limited role."

The Washington Times (9/13, Hurt) says "Roberts Jr. yesterday left little doubt why President Bush nominated him to be the next chief justice of the Supreme Court. … One conservative observer later remarked that Judge Roberts 'stole the show.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Greenhouse), in a story headlined "An Opening Performance Worthy Of An Experienced Lawyer," says "the White House team handling his nomination as chief justice had not seen the statement in advance, and Judge Roberts had not rehearsed it before the 'murder board' that helped prepare him for the confirmation process."

The Baltimore Sun (9/13, Shaw) says Roberts' remarks "echoed comments by Republican senators, who view Roberts as someone who will move the court to the right, in line with the wishes of their party's conservative base." But Roberts, "a White House lawyer under President Ronald Reagan, also spoke of his more recent work as an appellate attorney, representing clients against the government. He said that the rule of law enables a wronged citizen to prevail against the 'might' of the United States in court, 'a remarkable thing' that reflects that 'we are a government of laws and not of men.'"

The AP (9/13) notes "Republicans advised Roberts to follow the example set by recent nominees to the high court and avoid responding to probing questions on controversial topics."

The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Balz) says, "Judging from the opening statements, Democrats and Republicans approached the first day of the hearings with far different goals. Confident of the outcome of the Roberts confirmation battle, many Republicans came with a set of procedural talking points aimed at encouraging Roberts not to answer the Democrats' questions about his views on controversial issues before the court." That view "was summed up most succinctly by Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), whose advice to the nominee was: 'Don't take the bait.'" Democrats "came with the intention of talking about their values and their view of the courts as protectors of women's rights and civil rights, and of the importance of preserving an expansive view of the federal government's powers in the face of a series of Supreme Court decisions limiting that power."

Reuters (9/13) quotes Roberts saying, "I have no agenda, but I do have a commitment. … I will be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court. I will work to ensure that it upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans." Reuters adds, "While he is widely expected to win Senate confirmation, lawmakers told the 50-year-old Roberts to expect tough questions, beginning on Tuesday."

USA Today (9/13, Biskupic, Locy) reports Roberts also "played up his boyhood in Indiana, referring to the 'endless fields' on which he played and his belief in their 'endless possibilities.'" He also "vowed to protect the integrity and independence of the high court."

The New York Times (9/13, Purdum, Toner) reports, "No one in either party promised to oppose or support Judge Roberts outright, though some came close, including Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, who said that on the basis of Judge Roberts's written record alone, 'I would have to vote no.'" Biden, "who is considering a presidential bid, added, 'This is your chance, judge, to explain what you meant by what you have said and what you have written.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Liptak) reports, "In opening statements…Democratic senators continued their calls for the release of documents from Judge Roberts's years as a senior lawyer in the first Bush administration." The documents, said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, "the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, could help illuminate the nominee's views in three areas: civil rights, privacy and access to justice. While the first two areas have garnered attention from interest groups and the news organizations, the third category -- access to justice -- has received relatively little scrutiny."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Cummings, Bravin) reports Sen. Charles Schumer "acknowledged the nominee's accomplishments," but, the senator said, "the public must be able to 'assess not only the sharpness of your mind, but also the fullness of your heart. They need to believe that an overachiever can identify with an underdog who has nothing but the Constitution on his side.'"

The Legal Times (9/13, Mauro, Goldman) reports, "Roberts, accompanied by his wife, two children, and numerous family members, smiled easily and spoke briefly about his mentor Rehnquist. Roberts said he had spoken to some of the nurses who treated Rehnquist, and he was glad to hear that Rehnquist was 'not a good patient. He chafed at the limitations they tried to impose.' Rehnquist died at 80 of thyroid cancer. 'I will miss him,' Roberts said." The Times notes, "If Monday was any indication of what is to come, Roberts will have a relatively easy path toward Senate confirmation. Senate Democrats, while warning they will have tough questions for him on Tuesday and Wednesday, praised Roberts' intellect and outward qualifications for the job. Even Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, said after the hearing Monday that Roberts had given a 'masterful performance -- and short.' She also said, 'He's like an actor in a show, and he's done a first-rate job.'"

More Commentary On Roberts Performance. Sandy Grady, a member of USA Today's board of contributors, writes this morning (9/13), "You might say Judge John Roberts is history's first made-for-TV nominee for the Supreme Court. With his smooth, bland face and careful haircut, he seems to burst fresh from a barbershop or makeup room." Roberts "seems created for his star role this week as network TV cameras focus on his grilling by the Senate Judiciary Committee." He is "a conservative with the demeanor of a friendly scoutmaster. Barring edgy surprises, he will likely cool the red-state-blue-state furor and be drafted to be the youngest chief justice since 1806."

John Tierney writes in his New York Times column (9/13), "He came, he charmed, he shut up. During the opening statements, the senators blathered away their time and more; Judge John Roberts used less than half of his to utter a few graceful generalities. He has made a career out of not saying the wrong thing. Why start now? … The only hope for Democrats is to try the tactics used by interrogation pros like Israeli airport screeners and US customs agents. These experts know that a smart criminal will have rehearsed a cover story for, say, what he was doing in London and why he's going to New York." But "if he's asked something unexpected…he has to change mental gears. He's apt to exhibit telltale signs of a liar under stress, like gazing upward and to his right as he answers." Tierney adds, "I'm not suggesting that Mr. Roberts is a liar, or that anything the Democrats ask today could stop him from being confirmed. But they might at least keep TV viewers awake by trying questions like these: If Roe v. Wade were a tree, what kind of tree would it be? Is there any chance that you could speed up Justice Stevens's retirement by addressing him as 'Gramps'?"

Roberts Rulings As Federal Judge Said To "Lean Right." In a story titled "Nominee's Rulings Lean Right," the Washington Post (9/13, A7, Lane) reports, "During his two years as a federal appeals court judge, John G. Roberts Jr. has compiled a voting record that places him to the right of the average member of the U.S. circuit courts, according to the first independent statistical study of his voting record." Roberts "was most conservative on issues involving civil rights and civil liberties, the study found. At the same time, President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States showed a liberal streak on economic regulation and labor issues; in those matters, he was significantly to the left of the average, according to the study."

Cases Involving Abortion, Assisted Suicide Laws Expected To Reach Court. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 6, 2:35, Andrews) reported on the controversial cases that the court is expected to hear this year. Once case concerns "a New Hampshire law requiring teenaged girls to tell their parents before getting an abortion. It's not parental permission, says state representative Barbara Hagan, just notification." It is "what many see as the biggest abortion case in five years. Why: Because there is no exception in the law to provide for the health of the mother. To abortion rights advocates, the women's health exception is a defining issue. To them, any justice who doesn't believe the women's health exception is a fundamental right probably doesn't believe in 'Roe v. Wade.'" Karen Pearl, Planned Parenthood Federation of America: "And with Judge Roberts joining the court, we need to know whether he will continue to say that women's health is that important that it cannot be violated." Andrews: "But abortion opponents call the health exception a sham, because in practice 'health' can mean almost anything." Judge Roberts "will also face a crucial states' rights case. Can terminally ill patients in Oregon, patients like Jack Neubold, kill themselves with a legal prescription?"

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Cummings) says "earlier public statements suggest Judge Roberts, seen as an ally to social conservatives on abortion, could disappoint them on whether terminally ill patients may end their lives. When the Supreme Court last weighed in on the matter, in 1997, Judge Roberts discussed the cases in a television talk show." The high court "had just decided to protect prohibitions on assisted suicide in Washington and New York states. Judge Roberts, at the time a lawyer in private practice, defended the decision to maintain the restrictions -- invoking states' rights, not morality."

No Indication Seen That Roberts Was Involved In Iran-Contra. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Richey) reports, "As a member of the White House counsel's office in 1985 and early 1986, Roberts was in close proximity to what ultimately became the Reagan administration's Iran-contra scandal." As early as January 1985, "Roberts was asked to give a legal opinion about White House involvement in private fundraising to help the contra forces fighting Nicaragua's Sandinista government. He also wrote several memos in early 1986 concerning the private fundraising activities of individuals who were later prosecuted in the Iran-contra affair." But "Roberts's White House memos, made public at the National Archives, are unlikely to provide much grist for conspiracy theorists seeking to link the former Reagan staffer to the scandal." Instead, "Roberts's memos on contra-related issues reveal a cautious lawyer who consistently sounded alarm bells about appearances and who urged compliance with the letter and spirit of the law. His words convey no sign of a devious consigliere searching for ways to bend the law or conceal lawless activities." The Monitor adds, "More important, the memos suggest that Roberts and his colleagues in the White House counsel's office were outside the loop on the secret dealings of Lt. Col. Oliver North at the National Security Council."

Coburn Went From Crossword Puzzle To "Emotional Overdrive." The Washington Post (9/13, A7, Milbank) reports, "Yesterday's opening of the John Roberts confirmation hearings was a time for historic firsts." Schumer "made 49 first-person references in a 10-minute statement that was, ostensibly, not about himself. Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) showed exceptional emotional versatility, working a crossword puzzle during the hearing and then choking back a sob while making a prosaic statement about partisanship. … A television camera behind Coburn caught the senator working a crossword puzzle. But Coburn went from detachment to emotional overdrive when it was his turn to talk; seconds after asserting that 'a super-legislator body is not what the court was intended to be,' he paused and wept." It was "the biggest Senate choke-up since Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) cried while opposing the nomination of the ambassador to the United Nations -- and Coburn has to get through three more days of hearings."

Conservatives Happy With Specter So Far. Roll Call (9/13, Kane) reports, "After bitterly attempting to deny Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) the gavel, conservative activists are now beginning to praise the five-term moderate as an unexpected ally in several key battles this year." Specter, who "was nearly denied the chairmanship last November after an eruption on the right regarding comments he made about Roe v. Wade," has won "some grudging respect from conservatives in recent weeks. Those activists have been particularly pleased with his handling of the run-up to this week's confirmation hearing for Judge John Roberts, who is President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States."

Rehnquist Remarks On Nomination Politics Noted. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 7, 2:00, Vargas) reported on remarks the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist made to a group of high school students in 1990. Asked about the "politics that go into the nomination" process, Rehnquist said, "The president has traditionally tried to find a nominee who was sympathetic to the president's general approach to how…judicial philosophy. Now, I don't lots of presidents have terribly well-defined judicial philosophies. They have a lot other things on their mind, as well."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/13), Margaret Carlson writes, "I'm as excited as anyone about the prospect of 'Advise and Consent, the Sequel,' with a budget rivaling 'War of the Worlds' and advance hype just short of Tom Cruise jumping on a couch, declaring his love for Arlen Specter. … Eighteen years after 'Borking' became part of the language, the two main protagonists in that battle are still at it. Specter, the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, got in one more lick Sunday against the Supreme Court nominee he defeated back then, Robert Bork. 'If his "original intent" stood, we'd still be segregating the United States Senate with African Americans on one side and Caucasians on the other side,' Specter said on CNN. Bork said later in the same program: 'I know Specter, and the truth is not in him.'" Carlson continues, "Somehow Alberto Gonzales, one of the potential candidates to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, seems incapable of generating that level of venom. He may prove to be a stealth candidate with rock-hard positions we don't know about, but he comes across as milder than that. The right wing jokes that 'Gonzales' is Spanish for 'David Souter.' And the left dislikes him for condoning torture at Abu Ghraib. The bipartisan dismay has lent Gonzales an air of being just right." Carlson adds, "I'm not saying Bush is going to nominate Gonzales, the old friend he huffily told folks to lay off of as he flew to the G-8 summit in Scotland. He might even nominate a real hard-liner, lure the Democrats into eliminating him and then get whomever he wants to replace O'Connor and Chief Justice William Rehnquist when he retires. … What I am saying is that although Bush looks more and more messianic, he's got enough of his father's pragmatism in him to want to overturn Roe vs. Wade about as much as he wants to read the collected works of Shakespeare. … If Roe goes down, so does his majority, his legacy and present and future politicians bearing the name Bush. Traditional Republicans who voted for Bush for his pro-corporate, pro-tax-cut views will put aside their selfish concerns and flock to pro-choice candidates, who tend to be Democrats. He doesn't want to be remembered as the guy who knocked down the late Lee Atwater's Big Tent."

Bush Visits New Orleans, Says Relief Effort Did Not Discriminate Against Blacks. President Bush yesterday visited New Orleans for the third time to oversee hurricane recovery efforts. The network coverage of the Bush's trip was pointedly skeptical, with reporters implying that it was another effort to buoy the President's sagging job approval ratings. Bush was portrayed as irritated when questioned about the speed of the relief efforts. As ABC's Lisa Stark put it, he "bristled" when asked about the timeliness of the Federal response. The networks all noted it was Bush's first trip to downtown New Orleans, and CBS, which has had the most negative view of the city's progress, went so far as to say he "didn't find much good news." Bush also firmly denied that race played a role in the Federal Government's perceived lack of effort in the early stages of Katrina's aftermath.

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 2, 3:40, Schieffer) reported, "President Bush went back to New Orleans today, but he didn't find much good news. There was more trouble with one of the levees, and authorities confirmed a grim discovery, the bodies of 45 patients in a hospital that was thought to have been evacuated." CBS (Pitts) added, "Late this afternoon, a levy in northeast New Orleans broke, flooding some neighborhoods all over again. Hours earlier, President Bush was in town, managing his own political crisis. This marked the President's third trip to the city, his first actual on-the-ground survey of the devastation. But if he was hoping to reach out to the citizens of New Orleans, he was too late, since most of the victims are out of town, evacuated days ago. When asked if race played a role in his response, the President had a stern answer." President Bush: "My attitude is this: The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery effort."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 3, 2:35, Vargas) reported, "Two weeks after Katrina, a new ABC News poll finds that 63% of Americans still believe the Federal Government lacks a clear plan to deal with the devastation. President Bush was in Louisiana and Mississippi again today, trying to counter that perception." ABC (Stark) added, "The President on his third tour of the devastated area today, bristled at continued questions about the government's slow response." President Bush: "I know there's been a lot of second guessing. I can assure you that I'm not interested in that. What I'm interested in is solving problems. There will be time to take a step back and to take a sober look of what went right, what didn't go right." Stark: "The President got his first close-up look at the flooding in New Orleans. His previous visits had been fly-overs. Today, he stood out in the open, in a military motorcade. Later, flying to St. Bernard Parish, one of the hardest-hit, to meet privately with state and local leaders, before going to a damaged elementary school in Gulfport, Mississippi."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) reported, "Abandoning the customary bulletproof motorcade, for a time today the President perched atop an open air military truck for a hands on look at the ruins of New Orleans he had not yet seen."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Chen) reports Bush said Monday that New Orleans "was 'on the way' to recovery and stated that there was now 'close coordination' among all levels of government." Bush also "alluded for the first time to the disproportionate number of African Americans stranded by the flooding in New Orleans, and he vowed to look into growing concerns among homeowners who lacked flood insurance coverage." Despite the "relief progress that he said he noted Monday — Bush cited a gas station 'up and running' in Gulfport, Miss. — the president warned: 'There's a lot of serious and hard work that's yet to be done.'" Asked "about the large numbers of blacks who were trapped in the Superdome and the convention center in New Orleans," Bush said, "My attitude is this: The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery."

The AP (9/13, Loven) reports Bush "denied that poor, black victims of Hurricane Katrina were ignored because of their race." Bush "replied testily to a reporter who asked whether he felt let down by federal officials in responding to the disaster." Bush "seized on the news of falling water levels throughout New Orleans and pronounced the city on the mend."

Reuters (9/13, Christie) reports Bush "rejected charges the government was slow to respond to Hurricane Katrina because most of the victims were black or because the nation's military was over-extended in Iraq." He also said "it was 'preposterous' to claim that the Iraq war had drained military resources, leaving too few troops to help out with the hurricane." Reuters adds that in a "new blast at the administration, civil rights leader Rev. Jesse Jackson said the government was now discriminating against local businesses by ensuring that big corporations with close ties to the establishment received all the major rebuilding contracts."

Bloomberg (9/13) reports Bush "promised to take 'a sober look' at how emergency agencies reacted after the storm" and that "every citizen of the affected areas will get aid." The President "made his remarks after touring the city's French Quarter and other neighborhoods in a caravan of military vehicles along with Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco."

Knight Ridder (9/13, Robbins, Dodd) reports President Bush "got his first close look Monday at flood-ravaged New Orleans, even as state health officials revealed another grim discovery: 45 people found dead at a hospital evacuated more than a week ago." The President "rebutted charges of a slow response by the federal government, but that didn't save the job of Michael Brown, the embattled Federal Emergency Management Agency chief. He resigned from his post on Monday."

The Washington Times (9/13, Curl) reports President Bush "yesterday rejected charges that the federal government's emergency response was slow because most of the victims were black." Mr. Bush "replied angrily to another reporter who asked whether he felt let down by federal officials' response to the disaster."

USA Today (9/12, 12A) editorializes, "With his poll numbers sagging, President Bush made his third trip to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast on Monday. Though the trip had many purposes, one certainly was to burnish an image tattered by his administration's bungling of relief operations after Hurricane Katrina struck."

Rice Defends Bush Record On Race. The New York Times (9/13, Weisman) reports, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that "the hurricane disaster that disproportionately struck poor blacks in New Orleans 'gives us an opportunity' to rectify historic injustices that she experienced as an African-American growing up in the South." Asked "what she told foreign leaders wondering about racial discrimination and poverty in the United States", Rice said, "You go to any other meeting around the world and show me the kind of diversity that you see in America's cabinet, in America's Foreign Service, in America's business community, in America's journalistic community." She added, "Show me that kind of diversity anyplace else in the world, and I'm prepared to be lectured about race." She also "rejected as 'poisonous' any suggestion that President Bush himself would discriminate racially against any victims of the hurricane and said that his record on education, including aid to historically black colleges and the setting of standards for schoolchildren, demonstrated that he believed passionately in racial equality."

In Katrina Aftermath, Polls Show Nation Divided By Race. The Washington Post (9/13, A8, Fletcher, Morin) reports, "Touring devastated portions of New Orleans yesterday, President Bush sought to reassure the public that the government is responding to Hurricane Katrina with equity and dispatch, even as his standing hit record lows amid broad support for an independent investigation of the federal response to the storm. A new Washington Post-ABC News poll found that clear majorities of Americans disapprove of the way officials at all levels of government are handling the recovery from Katrina. A 54 percent majority disapproved of Bush's response to Katrina, while an even larger majority -- 57 percent -- say state and local officials should bear responsibility for the problems." These attitudes "fracture along clear racial lines. Nearly three in four whites doubted the federal government would have responded more quickly to those trapped in New Orleans if they had been wealthier and white rather than poorer and black, the poll found. But an equal share of blacks disagreed, saying help would have come sooner if the victims had been more affluent whites." The poll also found that "76 percent of the public favors an investigation of federal storm response efforts by an independent commission similar to the one that probed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." The poll of 1,201 randomly selected adults was conducted September 8-11 and has a margin of error of +/-3 percent. The Post adds, "Bush aides privately view the latest poll numbers with gloomy realism but take heart from Bush's past ability to push the Republican Congress to follow his lead even when his popularity has flagged."

USA Today (9/13, Page, Puente) reports, "There is a lot that Americans agree about in the wake of Hurricane Katrina: that government agencies initially stumbled but are doing better now, for one, and that more money and attention should be paid to addressing the issue of poverty. But a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday finds a stark racial divide on other issues, including attitudes toward the hurricane's victims, the performance of President Bush and the reasons the government's early response was so wanting. Six in 10 African-Americans say the fact that most hurricane victims were poor and black was one reason the federal government failed to come to the rescue more quickly. Whites reject that idea; nearly 9 in 10 say those weren't factors." And "the racial divide…could affect the debate over addressing poverty and rebuilding the Gulf Coast in the hurricane's wake." The survey also found that "African-Americans by 74%-16% have an unfavorable opinion of the GOP. By more than 3-to-1, they say Bush doesn't care about black people. By more than 2-to-1, whites say he does." The poll of 1,005 adults has a margin of error of +/-3 percent. Also the president's job-approval rating "is 46%, essentially the same as the 45% rating in the Gallup Poll 10 days earlier." USA Today continues, "the nation that champions equal rights around the globe has not resolved its own racial tensions." In all, "one in four of those surveyed blame the mayor of New Orleans; another one in four blame the residents themselves. One in five blame the Bush administration. But blacks are much more likely than whites to hold the federal government responsible. Whites are much more likely to hold the residents responsible."

Bush Job Approval Falls To 42% In ABC News/Washington Post Poll. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 5, :35, Vargas) reported, "Our latest ABC News/Washington Post poll finds that dissatisfaction, however, with the government's response to the hurricane is growing and hurting President Bush's overall approval rating. It now stands at just 42%, the lowest it's ever been. And one more finding that gets at the division in the country after the hurricane, an overwhelming number of African-Americans, more than 70%, say that the government would have responded more quickly to the disaster in New Orleans if more of the victims had been wealthy and white, rather than poor and black. Only 20% of whites agree with that."

Columnist Addresses Plight Of Blacks In New Orleans. In a USA Today (9/12) column, DeWayne Wickham writes, "It wasn't long after the tortured images of thousands of black men, women and children holed up in the Louisiana Superdome and Morial Convention Center started appearing on TV newscasts that talk of an old conundrum surfaced. Was it the color of their skin or their place in society that made the suffering among that city's blacks so great? The race or class question pits those who believe that racism is the root cause of much that ails blacks against those who say it is their economic and social condition that is the problem." Wickham concludes that while both race and class contributed to the initial suffering, the race of the victims played a part in delaying the response of the government.

Recent Discontent Said To End "Bush Era." In a Washington Post (9/13, A27) op-ed, E.J. Dionne, Jr., writes, "The Bush Era is over. The sooner politicians in both parties realize that, the better for them -- and the country. Recent months, and especially the past two weeks, have brought home to a steadily growing majority of Americans the truth that President Bush's government doesn't work. His policies are failing, his approach to leadership is detached and self-indulgent, his way of politics has produced a divided, angry and dysfunctional public square. We dare not go on like this." Dionne concludes that Bush's most helpful course "lies in recognizing that the Bush Era, as he and we have known it, really is gone. He can decide to help us in the transition to what comes next. Or he can cling stubbornly to his past and thereby doom himself to frustrating irrelevance."

Obama's Comments On Hurricane Response Criticized. George Will writes in the Washington Post (9/13, A27) that Sen. Mary Landrieu's speech on the Senate floor moved some senators to tears. But you "can no more embarrass a senator than you can a sofa, so the tears were not accompanied by blushing about having just passed a transportation bill whose 6,371 pork projects cost $24 billion, about 10 times more than the price of the levee New Orleans needed. Louisiana's congressional delegation larded the bill with $540,580,200 worth of earmarks, one-fifth the price of a capable levee." Will notes Sen. Barack Obama's "lament about the president's inadequate 'empathy' and an amazing criticism of the government's 'historic indifference' and its 'passive indifference' that 'is as bad as active malice.'" Obama "is just 30 months older than the 'war on poverty' that President Johnson declared in January 1964. Since then the indifference that is as bad as active malice has been expressed in more than $6.6 trillion of anti-poverty spending, strictly defined." Obama might "care to note three not-at-all recondite rules for avoiding poverty: Graduate from high school, don't have a baby until you are married, don't marry while you are a teenager. Among people who obey those rules, poverty is minimal."

Embattled FEMA Director Brown Resigns. Days after being relieved of his duties in the hurricane zone, embattled Federal Emergency Management Director Michael Brown resigned his post. The White House named David Paulison, currently director of emergency preparedness division at FEMA, as acting director. While Paulison is receiving cautious praise, most analysts agree that Administration critics are unlikely to soften their censure of the relief effort. However, as CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Malveaux) said last night, Brown's resignation "clears the way for the administration to move forward on two fronts: recovery and rebuilding public perception." Another major theme in several TV and print reports, such as the one in CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Malveaux), was that Brown's departure "is really a rarity for the White House," which "puts a premium on loyalty. But it was clear from the early days there was a serious problem here."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 3, 2:35, L. Stark) reported Brown's resignation was "probably not a big surprise." Brown said he "resigned because he had become a distraction." The "embattled FEMA director" also "defended his agency's handling of Hurricane Katrina. And said the country needs a legitimate debate about FEMA's role." Brown was shown saying, "We're not a first responder agency. We're there to coordinate and help people prepare and coordinate in times of disaster. If the country wants us to be more, we should have a great public policy debate whether that's true or not."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:00, Stewart) reported, "Rarely has a White House favorite fallen so far, so fast. A little more than a week ago, FEMA Director Mike Brown was lavished with praise for his job on Hurricane Katrina. The President even called him by nickname." But a "week later, Brown had been replaced. The President was facing an avalanche of personal criticism he had responded too slowly to the crisis, and today, Brown took a political bullet for the White House with a terse resignation announcement."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Malveaux) reported, "Senior administration officials setting up a timeline for us, saying it was Wednesday, just two days after the hurricane hit, when Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff told the president at the White House in a morning meeting that he was essentially going to move him to a desk job, that he would be out of the field. They were not happy with his performance then." Thursday, "Chertoff traveling with Vice President Cheney in the damaged regions. Cheney saying he heard an earful from Republicans, as well as Democrats, who were unhappy with the FEMA effort, and then it followed with Friday, of course, Chief of Staff Andy Card got word that the choice to replace him, at least on the ground, would be Thad Allen. Even on that day, the president was not willing to disparage Mike Brown in any way, in fact saying, 'Brownie, you are doing a heck of a job.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Gerstenzang, Chen) reports Brown "often" presented "an upbeat assessment of the region's recovery, even as television pictures, playing on a split screen, showed the scope of the floods in New Orleans, scenes of devastation, and the bodies of victims left unattended." The Times adds, "Political analysts said Brown's departure should surprise no one, considering that he was dismissed Friday as the Bush administration's point man on the Katrina relief effort and sent back to Washington, ostensibly to oversee FEMA's preparedness for other hurricanes."

Reporter David Shuster spoke about Brown on MSNBC's Hardball (9/9), "The people here [in New Orleans] cannot forget the images on that fourth day when people were at the convention center. 15,000 people who had gone four days without food and water and that night on television, Michael Brown didn't know anything about it. That is the reason why people here in New Orleans over the last week have said that Michael Brown deserves to be sacked and why people will be glad that he has."

Knight Ridder (9/13, Dodd) reports, "Brown told his senior staff that he was resigning at about 3 p.m. Monday, according to FEMA press secretary Sharon Worthy, who was among those informed by Brown. She said the group of about 12 people took his resignation 'professionally.'"

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/13, McFeatters) reports, "At the White House there was a sense that with Brown gone, President Bush could get his presidency back on track and repair the public relations damage done when millions of people in American and around the world began criticizing the administration for how the aftermath of Katrina was handled." Brown "was deeply humiliated last Friday when Chertoff publicly relieved him of command of the disaster relief operations." The Wall Street Journal (9/13) adds "that move was widely seen as a precursor to Mr. Brown's eventual departure especially given that some members of Congress said that a reassignment wasn't enough." Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and three other senators "said in a letter to President Bush on Friday that Mr. Brown's 'continued presence in this critical position endangers the success of the ongoing recovery efforts.'"

The Financial Times (9/13, Daniel) also says Brown's decision "follows an embarrassing public dressing down on Friday, when he was relieved of command of events as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (Fema) and sent back to Washington." His departure "represents a rare resignation by an official of the Bush administration, which does not like admitting mistakes." It "comes a week after President George W. Bush praised his handling of the crisis, saying: 'Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job.'"

Bush Says He Didn't Know About Brown Resignation. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:00, Stewart) reported, "In New Orleans on his third visit to the disaster site, President Bush claimed not to know anything of the resignation, and bristled when asked if he felt Brown and FEMA had let him down." President Bush: "Look, there will be plenty of time to play the blame game. That's what you're trying to do. You're trying to say somebody is at fault."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) reported, "In Mississippi, the President distanced himself from the biggest political casualty of the Katrina disaster, FEMA Director Michael Brown, who submitted his resignation today." President Bush: "I have not talked to Michael Brown or Mike Chertoff, that's who I'd talk to. As you know, I've been working." O'Donnell: "Only ten days ago, Mr. Bush stood shoulder-to-shoulder with Brown."

Later in its broadcast, NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) said the President "tried to direct attention away from Brown and back on survivors' needs." President Bush: "There's time to, you know, try to blame somebody, but they want to get their lives back together."

The Baltimore Sun/AP (9/13, Superville) reports, "The president was told of Brown's resignation earlier today and spoke to Homeland Security Secretary Mike Chertoff, who was Brown's boss, from Air Force One in the afternoon as he flew back to Washington from an overnight visit to the region." White House spokesman Scott McClellan "said the White House did not seek Brown's resignation. 'This was Mike Brown's decision and we respect his decision,' McClellan said." USA Today (9/13, Hall) adds McClellan "praised Brown's work but did not mention Katrina. 'The president appreciates Mike Brown's service,' he said. 'Mike has done a lot of great work on a number of hurricanes.'"

Paulison, A Democrat, Named Acting FEMA Director. Bush's appointment of David Paulison as acting FEMA director received cautious praise from the media. The main theme is Paulison's coverage was his past experience in emergency response, with some print outlets noting he is a registered Democrat. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 3, 2:35, L. Stark) said that "unlike Michael Brown, Mr. Paulison has a background in emergency management." Reuters (9/13) reports Bush made the selection "on an apparent nod to demands that Brown be replaced by someone with experience in emergency response," adding Paulison is "a veteran firefighter who now runs FEMA's preparedness division."

CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/12, Zahn) noted that Paulison "was the guy behind the government's suggestion that everyone buy plastic sheeting and duct tape in case of a terrorist attack." USA Today (9/13, Eisler, Hall) adds "the advice became a staple of late-night comics, who usually misattributed the comment to Tom Ridge, then secretary of Homeland Security." The Bush administration "hasn't put Paulison in front of reporters much since then. Now, he steps into a lead role directing federal response to one of the nation's worst natural disasters." In a statement, Chertoff said, "I appreciate his willingness to take on the vital task of leading FEMA during this challenging time." Paulison, "a Democrat, was flying back from the Gulf Coast on Monday and was unavailable for comment on his new appointment."

The New York Times (9/13, Kornblut) also says that "at least on one political score, he departs from the typical Bush administration faithful: As of four years ago, he was a registered Democrat, according to an article in The Miami Herald at the time." That "creates at least the perception that he is independent of the administration's political machine -- unlike Mr. Brown, who got his job on the recommendation of a former senior campaign adviser to Mr. Bush, Joe M. Allbaugh, an old friend from college."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/13, McFeatters) reports Paulison "is head of the US Fire Administration and leads FEMA's emergency preparedness force. He has more than 30 years' experience working in fire prevention and containment. The former fire chief in Miami, Paulison dealt with the aftermath of Hurricane Andrew in 1992." Paulison "will be the acting director of FEMA -- if he is nominated to the directorship he must be confirmed by the Senate."

The AP (9/13, Fournier) reports, "As chief of the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department, Paulison led 1,900 personnel under a $200 million operating budget. He was also in charge of Dade County's emergency management office, according to his biography." Fox News' Special Report (9/12) also said Paulison's "official bio says he has fire and rescue experience."

The Washington Post (9/13, A12, Hsu, Lee) profiles Paulison in s story titled "Paulison Is Skilled At Disasters." International Association of Fire Fighters General President Harold A. Schaitberger, "whose organization Paulison formerly headed, said Paulison 'not only has the administrative experience and skills that you need at the bureaucratic level, he really understands what the troops need on the front line.'"

Brown Says He Made Decision After Sunday Talk With Card. The New York Times (9/13, Stevenson) reports, "In an interview Monday night, Mr. Brown said that he felt that his role had become an obstacle to the agency's work. 'The press was too focused on what did we do, what didn't we do, the whole blame game,' he said. 'I wanted to take that factor out of the equation, so that the people at FEMA, who are some of the most hard-working, dedicated civil servants I have ever met, could just go do their job.'" Brown "said he had felt no pressure to resign. He said he made his decision on Sunday with his family after a long conversation on Saturday night with Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff. 'Andy was very, very supportive of me,' Mr. Brown said."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Meserve) reported, "I'm told there was a phone conversation on Saturday between Michael Brown and Andy Card, the White House chief of staff. And that Brown came to the conclusion that he should leave. I'm told by a FEMA spokeswoman he was not under any pressure to do so. In his letter to the president this morning, I'm told he said that it was important to leave now to avoid further distraction from the ongoing mission of FEMA and that it has been an honor to serve the president, work with the people of FEMA and help Americans in their darkest hour."

Democrats Say Brown's Departure Long Overdue. The Washington Times (9/13, Hudson) reports, "Some Democrats said Mr. Brown was right to resign, but others continued to criticize Mr. Bush for not firing the director. 'Michael Brown's departure from FEMA is long overdue, and his resignation is the right thing for the country and for the people of the Gulf Coast states,' said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat."

The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Gerstenzang, Chen) reports Sen. John F. Kerry "issued a six-word statement: 'Long overdue. Too little, too late.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (9/12, Henry) reported that "the Republican Party believes this is good politically because it's going to take this issue off the table -- getting Mike Brown out of the way. But I think that may be wishful thinking because the Democrats are pouncing here. Democrats are basically saying, they are emboldened. They have been calling for Mike Brown's head for over a week now. They've gotten it. So they want much more. Just a few moments ago, Senator Hillary Clinton said that they basically need an independent commission. She reiterated her call for just that."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, lead story, 2:20, O'Donnell) reported "some say Brown's exit won't take the heat off the President." Stuart Rothenberg, political analyst: "I think FEMA was such a problem and Brown himself was seen as epitomizing that problem that getting him away really won't help the President fundamentally."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Cooper) also reported that "criticism over the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina likely won't end with Michael Brown's resignation. Blame is being pointed in every direction, not just towards the feds, but also local and state representatives. Other figures might be brought down because of the disaster."

Vitter Says Bureaucratic Model For FEMA Should Be Discarded. Sen. David Vitter was asked on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees if the position of FEMA director should be a "patronage job." Vitter said, "I think we need to look broader than that and look at the model for the bureaucracy of FEMA, because in my opinion this wasn't a failure of one person, although it was that also. It was a failure of the whole bureaucracy, and the solution to that isn't getting a new head bureaucrat or a new type of head bureaucrat. So I think we need to ask some truly fundamental questions about why that didn't work, and also what worked. The military response, which largely worked; the private industry, local citizen response, private initiative, which worked. We need to ask probing questions about that, to figure out a new model, because I think the whole bureaucratic FEMA model is what has to be probably discarded."

Frist Not Surprised By Brown Resignation. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/12) about Michael Brown's decision to resign as FEMA director. Frist said," I am not surprised by it. … I, too, have not talked to anybody about the resignation today. I've heard it through news reports. I'm not terribly surprised by that, but I am very pleased with the leadership that we have now, the command and control we have." Asked if the President should select someone 'who is a career professional as opposed to a political ally" to replace Brown, Frist said, "First of all, let me say I agree with your whole premise there," adding that "we need people in that position with authority, with good command and control, with a lot of experience, real-life experience. And then we got to go back and fix the entire system."

Managing Hurricane Relief Funds Called Major Test For FEMA. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Witte, Babcock) reports, "The Federal Emergency Management Agency will receive most of the $62 billion Congress has approved for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, setting up a major test of the agency's ability to distribute the cash and monitor the private contractors who will do much of the work. FEMA's track record in managing much smaller amounts of money has raised concerns." The Post adds, "The agency has already begun awarding hundreds of millions of dollars in no-bid Katrina contracts under loosened government rules designed to get relief and rebuilding efforts underway quickly. As the money begins to flow, some fear the agency could become overwhelmed."

More Commentary. In an editorial titled "Goodbye, 'Brownie,'" the Washington Post (9/13) says, "No one will be sorry or surprised to learn that Michael D. Brown…intends to spend more time with his family. Mr. Brown will be forever remembered as the man who, at the height of the New Orleans evacuation crisis, appeared not to know that 25,000 people were crammed into the city's convention center without food, water or toilets, despite television reports broadcasting that fact for the previous 24 hours." The Post notes Brown's resignation letter, in which he said "The focus has got to be on FEMA," adding, "We agree -- although we would add that the focus should be on presidential attention to FEMA, as well as congressional oversight and funding of FEMA, and not on FEMA's position in the federal bureaucracy." Turning to Paulison, the Post adds that he "may be qualified. But before coming to that conclusion, it would help if Congress and the White House take a bit more than 42 minutes to find out."

Mike Walker, a former deputy director of FEMA and former acting secretary of the Army, writes in today's Washington Times (9/13), "Don't blame FEMA's great professional, dedicated and unselfish employees for what happened in New Orleans. FEMA did not fail in the early response because of these great Americans. They were totally focused on responding to the tragedy and saving lives. Nor did FEMA fail because of an over-emphasis on terrorism prevention." FEMA "did fail because of a lack of effective leadership and its refusal to adapt to the new realities of the post-September 11 world." He adds, "The problem at FEMA is not a structural problem. FEMA did not fail because it is now part of the Department of Homeland Security. Making FEMA an independent agency again would only further complicate the nation's ability to shape the agency into a 21st century, forward-leaning, truly all-hazard response agency." But "the next director of FEMA must understand emergency management. He must appreciate his people. He must listen to his state and local partners. And, most importantly, he must understand FEMA's role in the post-September 11 world."

George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/13) that "the blame game is missing the mark. George W. Bush is being accused by his natural enemies of everything from being asleep on the job to racism. But his real error came long before Katrina, when he and Congress created a Department of Homeland Security (DHS) in response to 9/11. … Creating a bigger bureaucracy to deal with the failures of two existing bureaucracies -- the FBI and the CIA -- was simply giving free rein to Beltway gluttony. The DHS has spent many billions, but when a hurricane equivalent of a weapon of mass destruction struck, the DHS was too cumbersome to respond quickly." Melloan adds, "If an agency is meant to cope with emergencies, don't put lawyers in charge. DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff is an admirable man but former federal judges aren't trained for quick executive action."

Contrary To Chertoff Claims, Officials Said To Have Known Damage Katrina Would Cause. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Foreman) reported, "When Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, federal, state and local officials, despite claims to the contrary, knew everything that was coming. The massive storm surge, the failing levees, the stranded survivors, the collapse of roads, bridges, electricity and phones. They had planned for and trained for all of it. And now with FEMA Director Michael Brown bowing out, accusations against others at all levels are rising like flood waters." CNN added, "The head of Homeland Security, which oversees FEMA, Michael Chertoff, has insisted for two weeks he had no warning of how bad Katrina could be. … But it turns out the National Weather Service issued a detailed message a day before the strike, saying buildings would be leveled, high-rises crippled and most of the area will be uninhabitable for weeks, perhaps longer. In addition, and again contrary to Chertoff's claims, FEMA was most certainly warned that the levees could collapse, although even well after the levees failed, FEMA officials continued to downplay how bad the flooding might be."

MSNBC's Hardball (9/12, Phillips) reported, "What has not been widely known until now is that over the years, many local, state, and federal government officials have been warned over and over again about this very scenario." Officials "knew that someday, the levees mate fail. And it turns out, they were warned just last year how catastrophic a levee failure would be. In July 2004, FEMA sponsored what amounted to a hurricane war game. It anticipated what could happen if a hypothetical category three storm named Pam hit New Orleans. … Despite the dire predictions… some federal officials didn't seem to take the drill seriously."

NYTimes Decries Army Corps' Spending On Civil Works Projects. The New York Times (9/13) editorializes, "There has been much grumbling that Congress and the Bush administration denied the Army Corps of Engineers the money that was required to fortify New Orleans against a hurricane like Katrina. These complaints need to be pursued. Flood control is mainly a federal obligation, and the agency most responsible for it must have enough money to do the job right. But there is another question worth asking: has the Army Corps made wise use of the money it has? Louisiana has received about $1.9 billion over the past four years for corps civil works projects, more than any other state. Although much of this has been spent to protect New Orleans, a lot has also been spent on unrelated water projects…mainly to serve the barge industry and other commercial interests. The Louisiana delegation, second to none in bringing home the bacon, is as much to blame for these skewed priorities as the corps is. … Unfortunately, many other senators - not just those from Louisiana - are powerfully addicted to corps projects and the votes they attract, especially Christopher Bond of Missouri, who controls the corps's budget and has single-handedly kept alive a nonessential barge industry on the Missouri River at great cost to the environment and taxpayers. To discipline the corps, Congress must first discipline itself."

Debate Underway Over Whether New Orleans Should Be Rebuilt. Economists have begun to consider the rebuilding of New Orleans. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Hilsenrath) reports, "It's not just the city's natural disadvantages (much of it is located below sea level) that worry economists. It's also its economic position -- rampant poverty and an exodus of people and businesses even before the hurricane touched down -- and the need to avoid creating incentives that could lead to development that is no less vulnerable." Gary Becker, the Nobel prize-winning University of Chicago economist, "any rebuilding of the place should come with tough love from the government, such as tight zoning restrictions in flood-prone areas and tough flood insurance rules." Becker is "not the only Nobel-winner arguing for circumspection about rebuilding New Orleans. 'The best policy is not to permit rebuilding in New Orleans in the areas that are subject to flooding,' says Edward Prescott, a researcher at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis." Richard Posner "proposes that the city come back something like Colonial Williamsburg -- a quaint tourist site that isn't really attached to a city."

Former California Gov. Pete Wilson writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/13) that following the Northridge Earthquake, California "completed the repairs and reopened the freeway to its normal heavy traffic in just 66 days. How? We did two things. First, I quickly exercised the extraordinary emergency powers conferred upon the governor of California by the state Government Code. … Second, we took a page from the book of private sector incentives for accelerating performance. We told contractors bidding to repair the bridges that they must submit bids that specified not only the cost but the date of completion, and that they must agree to an added condition: For every day they were late, they would incur a penalty of $200,000; and for every day they were early, they would be rewarded with a bonus of $200,000." Wilson adds that "before abandoning New Orleans and retreating to the terrestrial, if not the moral, high ground -- we must exhaust all justifiable alternatives. I suggest that the needed super-levee solution will require a sharing of its cost between taxpayers and private investors."

New Orleans Council Upset By Federal Control. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Opdyke, Cooper) reports, "Underscoring tensions over who will control the agenda for the reconstruction of New Orleans, city leaders vented frustration that the federal government already has issued large contracts for initial cleanup and rebuilding without input from local leaders. At a meeting of the New Orleans city council yesterday, held 80 miles away in a conference room at the state capitol in Baton Rouge" council members said that "local minority contractors should be playing a bigger part." But New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said that "the expected aid amounted to an opportunity to completely rebuild the city, and urged the group not to squabble over the first federal money to arrive." He added, "there's going to be enough money for everybody." Meanwhile, President Bush "tried to assuage concerns that the federal government will dictate how New Orleans will be rebuilt."

Evacuees Struggle To Rebuild Their Lives. The Washington Post (9/13, C1, Duke) profiles the Caiado family, who evacuated their home in Marerro, just outside New Orleans. The Post reports, "Folks like them have been evacuated to cities and towns across the nation, but here in Baton Rouge they have nearly doubled the population. Federal, state and local agencies are swamped with applicants for various kinds of aid. Internet cafes, too, have drawn hordes of people searching for a way out of their mess, a way to reconnect with the grid of life they knew. You can see them, huddled over stacks of papers or yellow legal pads. They are, often, the ones with tears in their eyes, desperation on their faces."

Many Displaced By Katrina Seeking Employment Elsewhere. NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 8, 2:15, Allen) reported on the difficulties faced by many of those displaced by Katrina as they seek new jobs. At "this job center in an evacuee shelter, we found workers who used to be clerks, truck drivers, government employees." There are "hundreds of evacuees who in addition to everything else lost their jobs. After some two weeks dependent on the kindness of strangers, they really want to work." There are "job centers and fairs like this across the country, long lines of unemployed filling data banks with resumes from Atlanta to Los Angeles." Employers are "pitching in, offering nursing jobs in California, plumbing work in Seattle, even looking to hire a massage therapist from the Gulf Coast in North Dakota."

New Orleans Residents Starting To Return. A growing number of New Orleans residents are defying the mandatory evacuation order and returning to the city. The Christian Science Monitor (9/13, Axtman) reports, "There are signs of return to normalcy. The city's airport reopened for cargo traffic Sunday and limited passenger service is planned to begin Tuesday. Officially, the New Orleans Police Department (NOPD) is set to issue temporary weeklong badges to residents with valid reasons for returning. Unofficially, those manning checkpoints have been letting many residents through with simply a wave and a 'good luck.'"

The New York Times (9/13, Luo) says that in recent days, city officials "have increased the pressure to leave by cutting off the military-style rations that many have been living on, a National Guard spokesman said. … But Maj. Amy Hannah, a spokeswoman for the task force that represents the active-duty military side of the hurricane response, said members of the 82nd Airborne Division and other soldiers would continue to provide the meals. City police officials declined to comment."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Lavendera) reported that "plans to forcibly remove the thousands of hold-outs who refuse to leave have been abandoned."

Water Levels In New Orleans Dropping. Water levels dropped "precipitously" in New Orleans Monday, according to the Los Angeles Times (9/13, Zucchino). Areas "that had been under 6 to 8 feet of water less than two days earlier were dry at dawn, with ooze now smearing the streets and water collecting at low, marshy spots. For the first time in the 8th and 9th wards in East New Orleans and Mid-City neighborhoods, search and rescue crews were able to patrol on foot. By midday, National Guardsmen and Marines said they had found several corpses inside homes that had been inaccessible until today.

New Orleans Airport Set To Resume Flights. USA Today (9/13, Frank) reports, "Only Northwest Airlines plans to start round trips today with two flights to Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport from Memphis. The airline will add a round trip from Minneapolis and one from Detroit on Monday, spokeswoman Jennifer Bagdade says. Delta Air Lines, the second-largest carrier at New Orleans, will resume service with two round trips from Atlanta on Wednesday and on Thursday. Starting Friday, it will expand to five Atlanta round trips and one from Cincinnati. Southwest Airlines, which has been the airport's largest carrier, has not made a decision on restarting service. Continental Airlines plans to resume service Monday. Three of its four scheduled flights from New Orleans to Houston are sold out, spokesman David Messing says."

New Orleans Business Leaders Hope To Have Tourist Areas Opened By Year's End. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 4, 2:35, Vargas) reported there "were some dramatic signs of recovery" in New Orleans, and there are "more indications that this beleaguered city is beginning the process of rebirth." ABC (Harris) added, "Business leaders think they can get" the French Quarter "up and running by the end of the year. There's talk about scaled-back Mardi Gras for the end of February. In this city, where water is receding faster than expected, cleanup and recovery are proceeding at an equally surprising rate." Today, the "city's port sent out its first commercial shipment." The "optimism is fueled by the fact that while 80% of New Orleans was flooded, tourist areas like the French Quarter were spared."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 2, 2:10, Williams) reported, "Water now covers 50% of the city, give or take, that's down from 80%." NBC (Costello) added, "Two weeks after Katrina struck so much of New Orleans is still up to its gutters in water. But in the communities closest the pumps, the water is receding, leaving behind entire neighborhoods that are caked in a grimy, white dust and a layer of sludge and mud."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 4, 1:45, Williams) reported, "There were some signs that life, in small ways, is starting to get back to normal." NBC (Tibbles) added some small, family-owned businesses are reopening for business. It is "a grimy, greasy oasis. The St. Claude Used Tire Shop is open as long as there's daylight. And because it's vital, it's making a go of things in this all but deserted town." Joe Peterson "and his crew is busy keeping people moving, and no inflated prices here. It's still 12 bucks to fix a flat and five for labor."

Mercy Flights For Katrina Evacuees Suspended. The Chicago Tribune/KRT (9/13, Wronski, Long) reports, "After flying thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees to shelters across the country, federal officials on Monday suspended their mercy flights, saying they're no longer necessary. 'The need for airlifting has been met,' said Valerie Smith, spokeswoman for the Department of Homeland Security." Since Katrina struck, "More than 26 states and the District of Columbia have taken in tens of thousands of evacuees."

Air Force To Begin Spraying For Mosquitoes. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/12, Cooper) reported, "The Air Force has begun flying missions against the burgeoning mosquito population at the request of FEMA and the Centers for Disease Control. Aircraft out of Duke Field, Florida are going to make low-level flights at dusk spraying 60,000 acres a day."

Confirmed Death Toll Reaches 279 In Louisiana, 214 In Mississippi. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 3, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "The latest confirmed toll from Katrina includes 279 deaths in Louisiana and 214 in Mississippi."

NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 3, :30, Williams) reported, "There was another gruesome discovery reported in New Orleans today. Search teams found more than 40 bodies, many of them elderly patients, inside a flooded hospital. An administrator at the Memorial Medical Center said the patients died while waiting to be evacuated as temperatures inside hit 106 degrees. The spokesman denied the patients were abandoned in any way."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 2, 3:40, Pitts) reported, "Today in New Orleans, the recovery of the dead is well under way. 45 bodies were discovered inside a local hospital Sunday. But it is the haunting voices of the living that still send shivers down the spines of the women who heard them." CBS News "was given exclusive access to the 911 calls of those first horrifying hours, and to the women who answered them." It's "still unknown how many of these callers survived."

The New York Times (9/13, Johnson) reports that officials at the Memorial Medical Center "said at least some of the victims died while waiting to be removed in the four days after the hurricane struck, with the electricity out and temperatures exceeding 100 degrees. Steven L. Campanini, a spokesman for the hospital's owner, Tenet Healthcare, said the dead included patients who died awaiting evacuation as well as people who died before the hurricane struck and whose bodies were in the hospital morgue."

A front page story in the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Struck) adds that "the discovery was certain to raise new questions about why so many city hospitals were not evacuated before the storm. Two medical professionals inside the Memorial Medical Center said conditions began to turn desperate shortly after the floodwaters cut off roads. The darkened corridors were jammed with families. Drinking water grew scarce. Medical supplies exhausted quickly; even IVs were being rationed, they said.'

The Washington Times/AP (9/13, Martel) adds, "Police Superintendent Eddie Compass declined to answer questions yesterday about the discovery, including whether police received any calls for assistance from the Memorial Medical Center after the hospital was evacuated."

Hospital Staff Describe Efforts To Comfort Dying. The Los Angeles Times (9/13, Moore) reports that staff from the hospital described "a desperate and harrowing struggle to comfort dying patients as floodwaters rose and the city descended into chaos." Dave Goodson, director of support services at the hospital, "said rescuers came and left — sometimes they helped take someone from the hospital and other times they brought new evacuees plucked from rooftops. Elderly patients had the hardest time, Goodson said. Heat and sickness conspired to kill about 16 patients from a nearby convalescent hospital." Goodson and oncology nurse Joanne Lalla "said that despite their difficult situation, the hospital staff continued to serve the sick as well as they could. For a time they carted patients to the roof of the building to wait for helicopters, but when they realized that they weren't going to be airlifted, they went back downstairs, Lalla said."

Katrina's Dead Still Unidentified, Unknown. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/13, A1, Pressley, Salmon) reports, "The people who died during Katrina and its aftermath are, two weeks later, still largely unidentified and unknown. No one can say yet how many perished, who they were, how and when they died. Communications and recovery problems -- and a heavy cloak of secrecy -- have compounded the mystery. Officials have been told not to pass on any information. For now, and for the indefinite future, the victims of Katrina remain the dead without a roster."

Marines Not Finding Bodies In St. Bernard Parish. The New York Times (9/13, Kifner) reports that Marines searching St. Bernard Parish for bodies of residents killed in the hurricane, "have yet to find any bodies, commanders said Monday. … Dire warnings, from marine planning sessions, of a devil's brew of toxic floodwater, decomposing bodies, feral swamp creatures and hostile, gun-toting locals have just not materialized."

Commander Of Military Cleanup Effort Profiled. USA Today (9/13, Leinwand) profiles Lt. Gen. Russel Honoré, commander of the 1st Army, "which is now charged with the largest humanitarian effort in U.S. history." The "nerve center of the military's response to Hurricane Katrina is at Camp Shelby near Hattiesburg, Miss. … Although Camp Shelby is a 45-minute helicopter ride north of New Orleans, Honoré prefers to spend his day in the disaster zone. He has an air-conditioned tent with computers and communications equipment set up in a garage at the Port of New Orleans. But a good deal of his time is spent riding in the back of an Army truck."

Task Force Says NEPA Hindered Hurricane Protection For New Orleans. A congressional task force says that a 35-year old federal law known as the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) has hampered energy production, the construction of homes and hurricane protection for New Orleans. The Washington Times (9/13, Price) reports that NEPA "requires the U.S. government to evaluate the environmental impact of any significant project undertaken by a federal agency, financed with federal money, or requiring a federal permit. It further mandates that the results of the government assessment be made public and that the public decide whether its benefits outweigh its drawbacks." A task force on improving the act, chaired by Rep. Cathy McMorris, "has held four hearings across the country to assess NEPA's role in accessing affordable energy, building roads and homes, and managing the nation's natural resources. NEPA, which established a national environmental policy framework, has 'resulted in thousands of lawsuits,' holding up some projects for more than 20 years and killing others, said Jennifer Zuccarelli, a task force spokeswoman."

FEMA Hopes To Open 30,000 Homes Every Two Weeks. The New York Times (9/13, Lipton) says a "building boom is under way" as the government begins "what urban planners are calling one of the biggest bursts of federal housing development in United States history. Last year in Florida, the Federal Emergency Management Agency set a record by installing 15,000 homes in the aftermath of four hurricanes there. In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, they hope to open 30,000 homes every two weeks, reaching 300,000 within months. … The numbers might drop if the demand does not meet expectations. But more than 140,000 people are now packed into emergency shelters, while hundreds of thousands of others fill hotels, homes of friends or relatives or are temporarily relocated across the United States. The building blitz is intended to bring as many people as possible back to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama."

CNN's Newsnight with Aaron Brown (9/12, Nissen) reported that FEMA has been "working hard in southern Mississippi since before the storm." Eric Gentry, FEMA: "I think a lot of people don't understand that a lot of the help that they saw early on came in as part of the FEMA umbrella." CNN added, "Like these 18 wheelers, sent by FEMA with tons of bottled water, ice, and emergency food to Pascagoula, Mississippi, early last week, along with thousands of FEMA recruited, FEMA trained, FEMA paid workers. … This FEMA team was as it worked it's way door to door, or rubble to rubble, in Pearlington."

FEMA Allocates $5 Billion To Purchase Trailer Homes. The Washington Times (9/13, Dinan) reports, "FEMA has allocated nearly $5 billion to buy 300,000 trailer homes as part of its emergency hurricane spending -- even though 270,000 of them are on back order and will have to be built, says a congressman who voted against last week's $51.8 billion bill. Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, said President Bush and members of Congress are spending quickly on Hurricane Katrina relief in part to try to counter bad publicity over the federal government's initial response."

FEMA Said To Have Refused To Pay Airfare For California Search-And-Rescue Crews. MSNBC

Scarborough Country (9/12, 10:00 pm, Shuster) reported that urban search-and-rescue crews out of California have "said that they were told by FEMA not to take an airplane to get here [to New Orleans], but to take a bus…because the government would not pay for their airfare, about $30,000. In hindsight, that was a huge blunder, given that these were the teams that had that sort of search-and-rescue communications equipment." Scarborough: "Are you telling me tonight -- and you've got this exclusively -- are you telling me tonight that these people contacted FEMA and were ready to fly out the day after the storm and they were told, no thanks; we don't need your help?" Shuster: "That's right. That's exactly what we're reporting, Joe."

FEMA Organized Thousands Of Firefighters For Community Relations Work. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 8, 3:10, Attkisson) reported, "In the crisis after Katrina, an all-call went out to fire stations around the country. Send anyone you can spare for 30 days. FEMA will cover the costs." But "not all of the firefighters have made it to New Orleans. Many got stuck in a wasteful bureaucratic limbo." Billy Whitson and Noel Saldivar "are from Richardson, Texas. On September 1, FEMA flew them from Dallas to Atlanta, where they and hundreds of other firefighters tackled paperwork. On day two, they sat through FEMA classes on diversity and sexual harassment. On day three, Whitson and Saldivar were tapped for a special ops mission to New Orleans. It wasn't what they hoped for." Whitson: "We were being sent to New Orleans to be nothing more than a backdrop for a press conference that was going to take place with President Bush and Michael Brown." Attkisson: "But they missed the news conference, and spent the next three days helplessly watching others perform rescues, with no assignment of their own. When they complained on day six, FEMA sent them home." Thousands "are thought to be in the same predicament. FEMA never intended to send them to the destruction zone. They were slated for community relations, like handing out pamphlets to survivors."

Spellings Says Hurricane Displaced 372,000 Students. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday there are no clear answers about who will pay to educate the 372,000 students displaced by Katrina. The AP (9/13, Feller) reports, "In an interview with The Associated Press, Spellings gave the broadest assessment yet of how the hurricane has affected schools at the start of their year. … 'I shouldn't be talking about the details that I'm in negotiations with the White House and the (Capitol) Hill on,' Spellings said. 'As soon as I can talk about it, I want to talk about it.'" Spellings "said she will ask Congress for unprecedented authority to ease aspects of a federal law governing the education of homeless children. She already had pledged to consider using her powers to waive parts of the law known as No Child Left Behind, including requirements on yearly testing and teacher quality."

Two Mississippi Coast Schools Reopen. The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 10, 2:05, Schieffer) reported, "The fall term has begun now for most children in this country, but the government reported today that more than 372,000 school-age kids had to flee the Gulf Coast. In the Mississippi disaster zone, a fortunate few went back to school today." CBS (Whitaker) added, "Today, St. James Elementary in Gulfport welcomed students back, one of only two schools to reopen on the entire Mississippi Coast. Outside, overwhelming chaos; in here, a defiant normalcy."

Lack Of Influence On Hill Could Affect Louisiana Efforts To Get Relief. While Louisiana once had one of the most influential delegations in Congress, those powerful members have retired, and the New York Times (9/13, Rosenbaum) reports, the Louisiana delegation, "in the face of perhaps the state's worst calamity, has no one in a position of authority. … No one can say specifically what the diminished influence will mean for the state's efforts to get hurricane relief from Washington, but no one who follows Congress doubts that sooner or later the ramifications will be felt."

Louisiana Likely To Lose House Seat As Result Of Katrina. Election officials say the evacuation of coastal Louisiana "will likely cost the state one of its House seats," The Hill (9/13, Savodnik) reports. With Katrina "having emptied out New Orleans and much of the surrounding parishes, hundreds of thousands of people who once voted in Louisiana's 1st, 2nd and 3rd Districts are no longer there. And many who never heard of Reps. Jim McCrery, Rodney Alexander and Richard Baker — Louisiana Republicans who represent the 4th, 5th and 6th Districts, respectively — are now camped out in those districts."

Bush Asked To Save Gulf Coast Naval Bases. Reuters (9/13) reports, "Congressmen from Mississippi and Texas asked President George W. Bush on Monday to seek the reversal of proposed closures for two Gulf Coast naval bases, saying the closures would further delay disaster response in the region. In a letter, Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott, a Republican, and Texas Rep. Solomon Ortiz, a Democrat, asked Bush to demand that the Defense Base Realignment and Closure Commission (BRAC) reconsider its recommendation to close the Pascagoula Naval Station in Mississippi and the Ingleside Naval Station at Corpus Christi, Texas. … Bush can ask the commission once to make revisions. After that he can reject the list outright or send it on to Congress, which can accept or reject it but can make no changes."

Hurricane States Will Need Ample Federal Help To Avert Debt Crisis. State treasurers and local financial officials in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama say they will need federal help to pay billions of dollars of debt and finance reconstruction. The New York Times (9/13, Wayne) reports, "So far, they have no formal plan, said John Kennedy, Louisiana's treasurer, but they are considering proposals for the federal government to make payments on existing bonds and cover short-term municipal operating costs. … Last week, the National Association of Bond Lawyers wrote to the White House to propose a Hurricane Katrina Indebtedness Guarantee and Financing Act. That measure would provide cash advances to municipalities unable to pay bondholders and would offer federal guarantees on future debt. These advances would have to be paid back in 10 years. The group also called for creation of a Liberty Bond-type program."

Katrina Donations Outpace Previous Disasters. Charities are saying donations for victims of Hurricane Katrina have come in at a pace that exceeds those from other recent disasters. The New York Times (9/13, Strom) reports, "Almost all of the money is going to the American Red Cross, in large part because other international relief and development organizations simply do not have significant operations in the United States. … Americans donated more than $738 million to relief efforts through Sept. 11, according to The Chronicle of Philanthropy. In the 10 days after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, $239 million was collected, while $163 million was collected in the nine days after the tsunami last December."

Corporate Contributions Reach $547 Million. USA Today (9/13, Jones) reports, "The U.S. Chamber of Commerce says 145 companies had each pledged $1 million or more in cash and products through Monday. In all, 396 companies have given $409 million, says executive director Stephen Jordan of the chambers' Center for Corporate Citizenship. Companies have collected another $138 million in contributions from customers, for $547 million that will likely soon pass the $565 million raised for tsunami relief. Jordan predicts the total will likely be about $1 billion, surpassing the record $750 million collected after Sept. 11, 2001."

Charity Efforts Reignites Debate Over Mandatory Service. The Washington Post (9/13, A4, Strauss) reports that "in a marriage of compassion and convenience, some students moved by the victims' plight have also been able to help themselves by earning credits toward their school's service requirement." For "those who have supported or opposed mandatory service, the recent outpouring has reopened the debate on whether compassion can be taught."

Charities' Use Of Contributions Analyzed. NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 7, 2:55, Williams) reported, "This huge outpouring of charity for Katrina's victims, and sadly, of course, there's a dark side: The scammers trying to take advantage of this crisis or donations being used for purposes other than helping the victims. And now, how to be sure your money is helping the way you intended it to. And by the way, we are talking about a great deal of money here. Americans have so far contributed at least $761 million to help victims of Hurricane Katrina, with the vast majority of that going to the American Red Cross. They have so far brought in $584 million." NBC (Myers) added, "How can Americans be sure all that money actually gets to the victims? The Red Cross promises almost all its donations will go to feed and house victims and fuel emergency relief vehicles." In New Jersey, "independent analysts at the company Charity Navigator check financial statements of 4600 charities." Its Website "then rates charities for efficiency and overall performance." Trent Stamp, Charity Navigator Executive Director: "If you can find a charity that will spend 75 to 80 cents of your dollar on their charitable purposes, you can probably trust them." Myers: "But what about the list of charities recommended by FEMA? The Red Cross and a few others get high marks, but B'nai Brith, a Jewish charity, gets a low rating because analysts found only 56 cents of every dollar goes to relief activities, the rest to fundraising. B'nai Brith disputes the methodology. Many of the religious organizations listed by FEMA disclose so little, they can't even be rated." So "how can you be sure your money is well spent? Experts say beware of email, of door-to-door solicitations, and of websites with addresses that end dot-com. Most legitimate charities, they say, are dot-org."

Citing Katrina, GOP Congressional Leaders Drop Plans For Tax Cut Extensions. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Mullins) reports that in a "major shift of priorities after Hurricane Katrina, Republican leaders in Congress have delayed plans to extend dividend and capital gains tax cuts and may shelve them for the rest of the year." The House and Senate had "planned a fall legislative agenda around a massive budget bill that extended to 2010 the 15% tax rate on dividends and capital gains signed by President Bush two years ago. The cut was one of the president's signature initiatives and is seen inside the White House as a key part of his economic legacy." The 15% rate "isn't scheduled to expire until the end of 2008 -- meaning there's still time to push an extension through. But Republicans, chastened by the costs of rebuilding the Gulf Coast and negative public assessments of Washington's initial response to the hurricane, have decided that taking any action on the bill is politically untenable at least until late October in the suddenly changed political and budgetary environment."

With Appropriations Lagging, Congress Faces Need For Continuing Resolution. Roll Call (9/13, Yachnin) reports that in what "has become an annual tradition, House and Senate lawmakers will likely need to pass at least one continuing resolution to fund government operations. As the clock winds down on fiscal 2005, the chambers have completed work on only two of 11 spending bills." Though the While House "has yet to formally seek a CR, the chamber's appropriators are nonetheless readying for the inevitable request." In the meantime, House appropriators "remain optimistic that the individual spending bills will be completed in coming months, circumventing the need for a consolidated appropriations measure."

Grand Jury Summons Disrupt Lower Level White House Aides' Lives. The Washington Post (9/13, A25, Coates) reports, "Sympathy can be hard to come by for White House officials who are summoned to appear before a grand jury." Those whose "identities remain a secret suffer in silence, discouraged from reaching out to their closest friends for help. Those whose names leak into the public domain become lightning rods for rumor, suspicion and innuendo, as politicians, commentators and journalists try to divine a meaning behind each summons." The "latest White House staffer to face the grand jury is Susan B. Ralston, assistant to White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who gave testimony to the committee investigating the leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame." But while the "politics of every appearance is picked over in minute detail, there is also a human story to each summons that often goes unexplored. Witnesses face stress, uncertainty and -- worst of all -- crippling lawyer's fees that can take years to pay off. And as prosecutors cast their net ever wider, inexperienced staffers with few financial assets are increasingly facing the emotional and financial burden of grand jury testimony."

Hurricane Victims May Get Access To 401(k) Funds. USA Today (9/13, Chu) reports, "The IRS is expected to ease 401(k) restrictions this week to allow those affected by Hurricane Katrina to tap into their retirement funds. Representatives of organizations involved in retirement issues…say they expect the IRS to announce this move in the next few days."

CNN Allegedly Coaxing Guests To "Get Angry" When Discussing Katrina. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" (9/13, Pierce) reports, "Los Angeles Times pundit Michael Kinsley, who used to work for CNN, says the network is coaching guests to 'get angry' when they go on the air to discuss Hurricane Katrina. 'The TV news networks, which only a few months ago were piously suppressing emotional fireworks by their pundits, are now piously encouraging their news anchors to break out of the emotional straitjackets and express outrage,' Mr. Kinsley said. 'A Los Angeles Times colleague of mine, appearing on CNN last week to talk about Katrina, was told by a producer to 'get angry.'" Mr. Kinsley's words were reported yesterday by the online Drudge Report."

GOP Opponents Seek To Derail King's Bid For Homeland Security Chair. Republican opponents of Rep. Peter King are questioning his loyalty to the party in what The Hill (9/13, O'Connor, Tiron) calls "a last-gasp effort to derail" his effort to become chairman of the homeland Security Committee. King's GOP opponents "have compiled a one-page collection of negative remarks that King has made over the years about members of the Republican Party. The sheet, which was obtained by The Hill, includes a King quote from 1996 criticizing then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and then-Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas) for comments the two made describing union leaders as 'big labor' and 'union bosses.'"

King's Phone Call To Bush In New Orleans Noted. Roll Call (9/13, Akers) reports Rep. Peter King "greased the wheels for some New York firefighters who were dispatched to New Orleans for rescue-and-cleanup patrol after Hurricane Katrina. The firefighters wanted to meet the president during his brief stopover in the wiped-out city, so they called their man King to see if he could put the fix in." Roll Call continues, "King called…back to see if they were successful. Battling overloaded mobile phone service, he finally got through on the fourth try and was startled — and maybe a little irked — to hear a voice saying, 'You should be down here with your men.' … Again, the voice came back: 'Pedro, how come you're not down here?' By now, the jig was up: It was W himself, who nicknamed King 'Pedro' some time ago. And by now, Pedro was shaking in his boots."

Carolinas Prepare As Ophelia Slows Offshore. Tropical Storm Ophelia remained along the Carolina coast Monday, the New York Times/AP (9/13, Press) reports. The storm, which dropped "slightly in strength from a hurricane as it barely moved toward land," was "centered more than 200 miles offshore." Nonresidents "were ordered to leave one of North Carolina's Outer Banks islands and 300 National Guard troops were sent to mustering points along the coast. School systems in five counties closed, even though the storm's eye was predicted to remain offshore until Wednesday. Many people acknowledged that they were paying closer attention to the storm because of the vast destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina along the Gulf Coast. Others insisted they would not let the milder storm disrupt their plans."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, story 7, 0:30, Roberts) said Ophelia's "intentions are not clear. Now a tropical storm, Ophelia is more than 150 miles off the Carolinas, and it could become a hurricane again. Some projections show it hitting the Carolinas; others show it going out to sea."

In Wake Of Katrina, House Democrats Go On Offensive. Roll Call (9/13, Billings) reports, "With Republican poll numbers falling and the nation focusing increasingly on domestic policy, House Democrats are feeling new political confidence and taking on a rare offensive posture against the GOP. Through mid-August, Democrats were feeling emboldened as public confidence dipped in the U.S. handling of the Iraqi conflict, Social Security reform and Congressional ethics. Then Hurricane Katrina brought mounting questions about the Bush administration's response to the disaster." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "was the first to call on Congress to return to session early to pass a relief package for the disaster area and led her party's call for" then-FEMA Director Michael Brown "to step aside." This week, "Pelosi and other leaders will reiterate their call for the creation of a nonpartisan, independent commission to investigate the hurricane response, to urge creation of an independent anti-fraud panel to ensure proper oversight of the contracts awarded for the relief effort and to decry price gouging in the wake of rising fuel costs. The party also will announce the creation of a Democratic relief package for the victims of the hurricane."

Hurricane Boosts Barbour As Potential Presidential Candidate. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (9/13, McCaslin) reports, "Hurricane Katrina…has shined the national spotlight on Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour. So much so that Mr. Barbour, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, is now ranked third among Republicans – behind" Sen. George Allen and Gov. Mitt Romney "in the 2008 White House Power Rankings, as posted by the Jockey Wire at PoliticalDerby.com."

DOD May Be Affected By Ruling On DHS Personnel Rules. Congress Daily (9/13, Klein) reports, "Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, said a court ruling last month that struck down some of the Homeland Security Department's personnel regulations could require the department to 'go back to the drawing board' and might force the Pentagon to "take a harder look" at its personnel proposal scheduled to be put in place later this year." Congress Daily continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer, in throwing out the rules, said they do not provide for collective bargaining. Collins said this week she was concerned that DHS drew up regulations that did not 'reflect congressional intent.' … A spokesman for House Government Reform Chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., whose panel also oversees federal workers, would only say of the ruling's ramifications: 'It's too early in the process to predict the outcome of the litigation or how it will affect other systems.'" Congress Daily adds, "DHS announced last week that it would delay implementation of the new personnel system, scheduled to go into effect in January, for at least a year. It is not clear whether that decision was related to the court ruling, or what changes -- if any -- would be made before implementation. Ward Morrow, assistant general counsel for the American Federation of Governmental Employees, the largest of four unions that filed the suit, said DHS may ask to simply revisit the labor relations portion of the regulations, rather than rewrite the whole system. A spokesman for the Justice Department, which is handling the court case, did not return calls."

OTHER NEWS:

Los Angeles Blackout Attributed To Technical Error, Not Terrorism. The city of Los Angeles was hit by a blackout yesterday, but authorities were quick to announce that the outage was the result of a technician's error, not a terrorist act, and that the shutdown prevented a cascade effect blackout that could have affected the entire state. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, lead story, 2:20, Vargas) reported there "was a lot of tension this afternoon, when power went out to large sections of the city and surrounding area. The police department went on full tactical alert, meaning officers were not allowed to leave work when their shifts ended. The immediate concern for officials was the possibility of terrorism. But it quickly became clear that this major outage was a result of a single mistake." ABC (Rooney) added, "24 hours after a terrorist threat tape aired on ABC, which specifically targeting Los Angeles, the incident tapped people's nerves." But "after several hours Los Angeles water and power announced that a major line had been improperly connected, causing a backup in the system and circuit breakers to trip. In short, human error. The outage affected as many as 2 million people."

ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 2, :50, Ross) reported, "It happened at a receiving station at North Hollywood that receives the voltage coming in at 230,000 volts, coming in at the speed of light from Utah. They misconnected a new computer control room, which blew out that. And blew out two other generators in Los Angeles. That caused the big problem. Strange as it may seem, the system actually worked."

The CBS Evening News (9/12, lead story, 2:05, Schieffer) reported, "Hundreds of thousands of people were affected. There was a lot of confusion at first about what caused it but officials say it was not terrorism. It was apparently an accident." NBC Nightly News (9/12, story 5,

2:05, Williams) reported, "Throughout Los Angeles, traffic on city streets was hopelessly snarled as stop lights failed. There were numerous reports of minor accidents. 911 switchboards were jammed with calls from people stranded in office building elevators."

The Washington Times/AP (9/13) reports that "even before the utility workers explained what had happened, Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said there was no indication of terrorism."

Among other print sources, the Los Angeles Times (9/13, Bernstein, McGreevy, Landsberg), New York Times (9/13, Archibold), Wall Street Journal (9/13, Smith), USA Today (9/13, Kasindorf, Woodyard) and Washington Post (9/13, A2, Pomfret) run similar reports this morning. The Los Angeles Times (9/13) also runs human interest story examining reaction to the blackout from Los Angeles residents.

Majority Of National Black Republican Association's Board Members Resign. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (9/13, McCaslin) reports, "We've learned of a major shake-up at the Washington-based, with six of the 10 NBRA board members resigning in recent days over various disagreements. 'The organization and its current leadership is heading down a much different direction than was envisioned by myself and the other board members,' says Christopher R. Arps." The Times adds, "Three resigning board members, we're told, frowned on signing a 'statement of commitment' sent to them by NBRA Chairman Frances Rice. … Meanwhile, there also were questions surrounding approval of the latest news release issued by the NBRA, praising President Bush's leadership after Hurricane Katrina."

Federal Oversight Of Developmentally Disabled Homes For Seen As Lacking. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Ansberry) profiles Billy Cothran, a developmentally disabled person who died under the negligent care of the Babcock Center. This illustrates that "oversight of homes for the developmentally disabled is fragmented between the federal government, states and thousands of community-based agencies. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services -- which pays about half of the $27 billion spent annually on community services for the developmentally disabled -- is ultimately responsible for their protection. But the federal agency assigns the creation and enforcing of rules over such homes to each state. As a result, laws and monitoring vary by state. States aren't required to report all incidents of abuse or neglect to the federal agency." So, HHS "is drafting new procedures following a 2003 report from the General Accounting Office, saying states should be required to report more information about how they protect people with developmental disabilities."

FDA Criticized For Failing To Act Quickly On Defective Heart Defibrillators. The New York Times (9/13) says in an editorial that the "deplorable story of how a medical-device company sat on information about a flawed heart defibrillator while a hapless recipient died has now engulfed the Food and Drug Administration as complicit in the silence. A report by Barry Meier in The Times yesterday revealed that the agency received a report from the manufacturer detailing the flaws months before the F.D.A. issued a safety alert on the devices. By the time the agency acted, a college student relying on the implanted defibrillator to shock any erratic heart beats back to normal had died while mountain biking. His unit had short-circuited, just as the same model did earlier in about two dozen other patients." What is "disturbing is how long it took the company, the Guidant Corporation, and the regulators to get a meaningful warning to doctors and patients." The regulators "also appeared lethargic."

Researchers Link Surgery To Cancer Relapse. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Marcus) reports on a study by Michael Retsky, a lecturer in surgery at Children's Hospital Boston and Harvard Medical School, that found the surgical removal of a cancerous tumor in the breast "triggers the release of certain substances in the body," enabling "cancer cells that had been lying dormant in other parts of the body to undergo angiogenesis -- the process by which the body forms new blood vessels -- which also feeds the tumors' growth. This can cause the women to relapse early."

Ashcroft Appearing As Commentator On CNN. Roll Call (9/13, Akers) reports former Attorney General John Ashcroft "is out of hiding and back in the public spotlight. On Monday he made his first media appearance since leaving the Justice Department in February, appearing as a color commentator on CNN." Ashcroft "is expected to be doing lots and lots of TV in the weeks and months ahead."

Palestinians Pour Into Gaza Strip. ABC World News Tonight (9/12, story 9, 1:55, Vargas) reported, "Israel's 38-year occupation of the Gaza Strip ended today touching off a chaotic celebration by the Palestinians. They poured into the evacuated Jewish settlements, after the last Israeli tanks left, overwhelming plans by the Palestinian police to keep them out. Several empty synagogues were set on fire." ABC (Dinnick) added, "Today, most Palestinians came to just look. Others to take what was left. Some unleashing 38 years of anger. Some of it directed at the synagogues Israel left standing. The Palestinian Authority was here in large numbers, in a desperate attempt to show it is in charge. But its security forces were outnumbered by Palestinian militants. The Palestinian Authority did nothing to stop groups like Islamic jihad, who were here today to show they had control of the land."

USA Today (9/13, Patience) reports Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "said Palestinians still faced a 'long road' to statehood." But he added, "Today our people have the right to celebrate their freedom, their dignity." The Washington Times (9/13, Mitnick), New York Times (9/13, Erlanger) and Washington Post (9/13, A19, Wilson) run similar stories this morning.

Chinese President Creating Trade Policy Worries In US. USA Today (9/13, Lynch) writes, "What started as a bad pun has become one of the most consequential questions facing the United States: 'Who is Hu?' Is Chinese President Hu Jintao the valued customer Corporate America fancies or, as a growing segment of official Washington fears, is he the USA's most dangerous long-term enemy?" USA Today adds that with "the Chinese and American presidents preparing to meet today on the sidelines of a United Nations session in New York, long-standing Sino-U.S. trade friction is merging with mounting anxiety over Beijing's stepped-up military spending and its muscular drive to secure energy supplies. As the Bush administration struggles to balance commerce and national security, companies seeking to expand sales to China may wind up in the crossfire."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Hutzler) reports that as Hu and President Bush "gear up to meet in New York today, many Americans are questioning China's longer-term intentions. Zheng Bijian thinks he has the answer. The consummate Chinese Communist Party insider and confidant of Mr. Hu is promoting a message that China isn't trying to displace the U.S. but is seeking to emerge onto the global stage peacefully. His 'peaceful rise' project has gained the support of China's top leaders, with Mr. Hu originally expected to touch on the theme during a weeklong U.S. tour earlier this month." Zheng says China "'must take a different path, a path that none of the late emerging countries has taken in the contemporary world.' … Otherwise, he said recently in an interview, China could meet the fates of Germany, Japan and the Soviet Union in the past century, ambitious upstarts foiled by the dominant powers of their time."

US May File WTO Complaint Over Chinese Product Piracy. USA Today (9/13, Lynch) reports that the US "is actively considering lodging a formal complaint with the World Trade Organization over rampant Chinese counterfeiting of copyrighted American products." US Trade Representative Rob Portman said government lawyers "were collecting data needed to support a WTO filing. 'We are looking at a case. … If we have a strong case, and if we don't see the progress that we've asked for, we won't hesitate to move forward,' he added." US officials "have complained for years about widespread copying by Chinese companies of products such as compact discs, computer software and apparel. In July, Portman and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez held an annual meeting with top Chinese officials to discuss trade frictions."

China, Mexico Sign Several Trade Agreements. The New York Times (9/13) reports President Hu "wooed Mexican leaders on Monday during a state visit, trying to smooth out the often prickly relationship between the two countries as part of a larger campaign to expand China's influence in Latin America." Hu and President Vicente Fox "signed several minor agreements with great fanfare, among them one providing mutual tax limits on companies doing business in both countries and another that will allow Mexico to export grapes to China in return for importing Chinese pears. The countries also agreed on a framework for negotiating future accords that eventually may allow Chinese companies to mine iron and other minerals in Mexico."

Chinese Export Market Continues To Thrive. The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Browne) reports, "China's export juggernaut picked up momentum in August, dashing any expectations that a small currency revaluation on July 21 would act as a speed bump to slow it down." Exports in August "hit $67.82 billion, which was 3.4% higher than July's $65.6 billion and 32% higher than those of August 2004. Imports in August totaled $57.78 billion, up 23% from a year earlier, giving China a monthly surplus of $10.04 billion."

China Declassifies Natural Disaster Death Toll Counts. The New York Times (9/13, Kahn) reports that China said it would "no longer treat the death toll in natural disasters as a state secret, a step that could lead to greater transparency in a country that has a long history of providing partial or misleading data about diseases, accidents, and state-directed atrocities. The National Administration of State Secrets, a government agency that oversees the vast array of data deemed secret, announced the declassification of disaster-related death tolls, which the agency said had been carried out last month."

Musharraf Believes Khan Exported Nuclear Production Materials To North Korea. The New York Times (9/13, Sanger) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said he "believed that a Pakistani nuclear expert who ran the world's largest proliferation ring exported 'probably a dozen' centrifuges to North Korea to produce nuclear weapons fuel. He added, however, that after two years of interrogations there was still no evidence about whether the expert also gave North Korea a Chinese-origin design to build a nuclear weapon." Musharraf's comments about the results of the interrogations of A.Q. Khan "are significant because they tend to confirm the accusations American intelligence officials made against North Korea in 2002."

US Rejects Pakistani Request For Nuclear Technology Assistance. The Washington Times (9/13, Kralev) reports that Pakistan "asked the United States and other Western countries yesterday to help it develop civilian nuclear technology, citing Washington's July pledge for such assistance to neighboring India. The Bush administration, however, dismissed the request, saying Pakistan's energy needs are not as pressing as India's."

India, Pakistan Exchange Prisoners. Reuters (9/12, Raza) reports that Pakistan and India "swapped hundreds of prisoners at a border post on Monday to foster goodwill as South Asia's nuclear rivals seek to push forward their sluggish peace process. … Pakistan released 435 Indian prisoners while Indian freed 152 Pakistanis, some as young as 12 years."

New Poll Shows German Election Tightening. The Financial Times (9/13, Williamson, Cave) reports, "Germany's election race tightened further on Monday as Gerhard Schröder's Social Democrats pulled closer to the opposition Christian Democrats in a new opinion poll, increasing the likelihood of a "grand coalition" after Sunday's election." The SPD "scored 35 per cent in a Forsa poll, up 1 point to its highest rating since Mr Schröder called for an early election in May. The CDU was stable on 42 per cent."

The Wall Street Journal (9/13, Walker) adds, "It is looking increasingly likely that Angela Merkel will become Germany's next chancellor in Sunday's election, but whom she governs with -- and what economic policy she can carry out -- is increasingly up for grabs." Merkel's "center-right Christian Democrats are the clear favorite to snare the biggest share of votes, but in the stretch run her coalition's poll numbers have been slipping to just short of an outright majority." The New York Times (9/13, Bernstein) and USA Today (9/13, Knox) runs similar stories.

After Sweeping Re-Election, Speculation Turns To Koizumi's Use Of Mandate. The New York Times (9/13, Onishi) reports that a day after Japan's Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi "secured the second largest landslide in a general election in the Liberal Democratic Party's history, attention turned Monday to how he would use that mandate. With his coalition holding more than two-thirds of the seats in the lower house of Parliament, Mr. Koizumi is now expected, in the next month or so, to push through his bill to privatize the country's postal services. But once that is accomplished, what next?" Koizumi "has one year before party rules force him to retire, and he repeated Monday that he would not seek an extension. Still, he finds himself possibly postwar Japan's most powerful prime minister, at a time when Japan is confronting problems ranging from an aging, declining population to growing economic dependence on China."

In a Wall Street Journal (9/13) op-ed, Yale University Japanese history scholar Michael Auslin writes, "Koizumi has pulled off the unthinkable: A smashing electoral victory that would be the equivalent of carrying 49 states and 525 electoral votes in an American presidential election. … Sober reflection on the election's outcome, however, raises questions about the true strength of the victory and the message voters were really sending. Far from a powerful affirmation of Mr. Koizumi's policies on the merits, the results reflect the lack of a viable opposition, as well as the citizenry's willingness to indulge bold schemes -- the details of which few really grasp, and which are so far in the future that they seem painless ways to endorse the idea of reform."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) editorializes, "Fortune favors the bold, and on Sunday it smiled broadly on Junichiro Koizumi. … Koizumi's governing coalition now holds more than the two-thirds majority it needs to override further upper house intransigence. The unexpectedly large victory means that Japan's voters have endorsed Mr. Koizumi's policy mix of smaller government and an activist foreign policy. The economic paternalism and diplomatic timidity of the post-World War II era are giving way to change."

The Washington Post (9/13) editorializes, "It's not clear how much Japan's long-term project of fostering competitive, pluralistic politics will benefit. On the plus side, Mr. Koizumi has demonstrated that electoral appeal can trump the vested interests represented by his party's factions; it would be nice to believe that this boosts the political value of ideas and policies, though the main boost is clearly to the political value of image. On the negative side, Mr. Koizumi is to retire in a year, and the factions may reassert themselves."

The New York Times (9/13) editorializes, "Postal privatization was virtually the only issue discussed during the 12-day election campaign. That gave a pass to Mr. Koizumi's unwise embrace of Japan's traditions of military nationalism. … Japan needs postal service privatization, two-party democracy and a more constructive relationship with its neighbors and trading partners. Only the first was advanced by Sunday's election."

Georgia Receives $295.3 Million Millennium Challenge Grant. Reuters (9/12) reports that the US and the Republic of Georgia "signed an aid agreement on Monday worth $295.3 million via a U.S. development fund dedicated to poor nations that undertake political and economic reforms. The five-year grant, or 'compact,' comes from the Millennium Challenge Corporation and will cover road, energy and infrastructure projects in Georgia." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "Our partnership will only grow stronger as Georgia continues to establish the rule of law, a vibrant civil society, an independent media, a free economy and effective institutions of government."

Bush Unpopular In Major South American Cities. Reuters (9/12) reports that a "majority of South Americans" in the capital cities of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Uruguay "have a negative opinion" of President Bush, according to a poll conducted by a Santiago think tank. Of the four cities, "Buenos Aires ranked as the city where Bush is most unpopular, with six out of ten Argentines saying they disapproved of him. Residents in the Chilean capital of Santiago had the most favorable opinion of Bush, the poll showed -- 19 percent approved of Bush and 40 percent rejected him."

Governors, Poor Work To Implement Chavez "Social Revolution." The Washington Times (9/13, Behn) reports that Venezuelan governors and the "rural poor are moving quickly to implement President Hugo Chavez's vision of a social revolution, carving up and redistributing large landholdings and threatening to take over the premises of internationally owned companies. There has been none of the violence and mayhem that accompanied land seizures in Zimbabwe in recent years, but economists and angry land owners fear that -- as in Zimbabwe -- the takeovers will destroy a productive agriculture sector and undermine the economy."

G-8 Debt Relief Plan In Jeopardy As Final Vote Nears. The Washington Post (9/13, A14, Blustein) reports that while "full debt relief for the world's poorest countries" seemed to be imminent when G-8 leaders met in Scotland in July, "objections to the plan are emerging as it heads toward an official vote at the annual meetings of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund later this month. Most notable is an internal World Bank report that warns the plan could deplete the bank's coffers so severely as to impair its ability to provide new aid for impoverished nations." The report "uses bureaucratic language to convey a dire message about the problems that the G-8's plan could pose for the International Development Association (IDA), the World Bank agency that lends about $9 billion a year to low-income countries. By potentially forgiving as much as $42.5 billion in payments owed by many poor countries over the next several decades, the plan 'could reduce IDA's financial capacity significantly,' says the report, which was discussed at a meeting of the bank's executive board last week." Treasury Department spokesman Tony Fratto said, "The deal to provide 100 percent debt cancellation is in jeopardy." Fratto "said he was 'outraged' at the World Bank report. 'There are individuals trying to chip away at it and see that it doesn't happen.'"

Little Progress Seen As World Leaders Prepare For UN Reform Discussions. The AP (9/13, Press) reports that with "just days before leaders of more than 170 countries gather at a U.N. summit, there has been little progress on a document they are to adopt." Secretary-General Kofi Annan "wants heads of state and government to mark the 60th anniversary of the United Nations by adopting a sweeping blueprint to tackle the challenges of the 21st century at the Sept. 14-16 summit in New York. But despite intense negotiations over the weekend, some U.N. ambassadors expressed concern the text would be weak and said negotiations were slow and difficult."

The Washington Post (9/13, A15, Lynch) reports that Annan "proposed the most far-reaching changes for the organization since its founding 60 years ago" in March. The plan would reorganize the UN to "combat terrorism and poverty, expanding the Security Council beyond the victors of World War II and setting new rules for the preemptive use of military force. But six months of contentious negotiations by governments have stripped out many of the boldest initiatives, including proposals for creating 10 new Security Council seats. And delegates this week are straining to reach agreement on a far less ambitious package of steps that can be agreed on by some 170 leaders set to arrive" in New York tomorrow.

WSJournal Says Criticism Of UN Fair, Needed. The Wall Street Journal (9/13) editorializes, "The so-called Millennium Development Goals for helping the planet's poorest will be among the topics of discussion at the U.N. summit that begins tomorrow in New York. In recent weeks, the Bush Administration has come under media fire for suggesting some sensible revisions, such as requiring more accountability from countries on the receiving end of international assistance (imagine that). … If the U.N. and its supporters are serious about the Millennium Development Goals, and U.S. support in pursuing them, they should stop equating criticism of U.N. methods with criticism of its motives. U.N. reform is a better use of their energies this week. And the establishment of an auditor general or some other independent body responsible for commissioning and publishing performance reviews is a good place to start."

Scholar Says Bush Administration Should Back Security Council Expansion. In a New York Times (9/13) op-ed, American Enterprise Institute research fellow Vance Serchuk writes that when the meetings begin, "any mention of the expansion of the Security Council will be off the agenda, thanks in no small part to the diplomatic exertions of the Bush administration. The White House's foreclosure of discussion on Security Council expansion has drawn cheers from conservatives worried about any dilution of American power, and scorn from liberals convinced that the Bush administration is once again unilaterally sabotaging the international system. In fact, both sides are wrong." Brazil, Germany, India, and Japan "have joined together in the so-called Group of Four and have been furiously trawling the developing world for support. … Getting Japan, in particular, on the council should be a top priority for the United States, not just as a reward for past support on countless issues - from Iraq to North Korea - but also because of its central role in America's grand strategy for the region. Equally important is the development of a long-term alliance with India."

More Commentary On UN Reform. In his New York Times (9/13) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "The biggest gathering of leaders in history unfolds this week at the United Nations, as they preen and boast about how much they're helping the world's poor. In short, it may be the greatest assembly in history -- of hypocrites. The fact is that with just a few exceptions, the presidents and prime ministers coming to the U.N. summit are doing a disgraceful job in helping the poor. That's one reason the world's richest 500 individuals have the same income as the world's poorest 416 million people."

In a New York Times (9/13) op-ed, University of Ottawa professor Amir Attaran writes, "According to the United Nations Millennium Project, only a 'handful of countries' can really prove the maternal mortality ratio is improving. … Malaria is another example where United Nations goals hinge on something immeasurable. … Probably the most useful discussion the United Nations could plan for this week's meeting would be one that asked world leaders to endorse new goals against which they could truly measure progress. This is feasible: there are alternative ways to track malaria's toll or to assess the safety of pregnancies."

Left Coalition Wins Majority In Norwegian Parliament. The AP (9/12) reports that Norway is "poised for a power shift after the left-leaning opposition won a majority of seats in Parliament with pledges to spend more of the nation's vast oil wealth on welfare." With almost all votes tallied, "a three-party coalition led by the Labor party had grabbed 88 seats in the 169-seat assembly, enough to oust the center-right government. Prime Minister Kjell Magne Bondevik, who campaigned on promises of tax cuts, said if the final tally confirmed the result, his government would resign after presenting its draft 2006 budget on Oct. 14."

Liberians In US Hope To Play Role In Homeland's Election. The Washington Post (9/13, B1, Raghavan) reports that as Liberia "prepares for a historic post-civil war election next month, a new hope is prevailing. After years of building wealth and sharing it with impoverished relatives back home," Liberians living in the US "want to influence the outcome of the campaign. Many of the Washington region's estimated 10,000 native Liberians view it as nothing less than their homeland's last chance for peace and stability."

NYTimes Lauds Brazil's Progress In Protection Of Amazon. The New York Times (9/13) editorializes, "Last month, Brazil's environmental officials announced that the burning of the Amazon has slowed. Deforestation this year is half of what it was the year before. This news shows that when Brazil's government musters the political will to protect the Amazon, it can do it. … The health of the Amazon is a global concern because the forest soaks up greenhouse gases, which lessens global warming. Deforestation means the Amazon could eventually become too small to produce the rain that it needs to survive. … The government's commitment to protecting the Amazon has also been important. Led by Marina Silva, the environment minister and once a poor Amazon rubber tapper herself, Brazil is starting to impose its authority in parts of the forest that have always been lawless. … Rule of law is still foreign to the Amazon. But it is becoming a little less so."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Briton Gets 47 Years In Missile-sale Case (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2005

A British businessman convicted of trying to smuggle shoulder-launched missiles into the USA was sentenced Monday in Newark, N.J., to 47 years in prison. The plot involved the sale of missiles to a group that Hemant Lakhani, 70, was told would use them to shoot down commercial planes. The weapons' buyer and seller actually were government agents. Lakhani, arrested in August 2003, was convicted in April of trying to provide material support to terrorists, unlawful brokering of foreign defense articles and attempting to import merchandise to the USA by means of false statements, plus two counts of money laundering.

Push for gay-marriage ban falters in Mass.

An effort among some Massachusetts legislators for a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage in the state is fading, according to an Associated Press poll. The survey, conducted last week, found at least 104 lawmakers who plan to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, which would ban gay marriage but create civil unions. The amendment, which is scheduled for a vote Wednesday, needs the support of at least 101 of the state's 200 lawmakers to get on the 2006 ballot. Last year, months after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that same-sex marriage was legal, the amendment passed 105-92. It must pass a second vote to get on the ballot.

Escaped chimps killed at zoo in Nebraska

Three chimpanzees from a small zoo in Royal, Neb., were shot and killed after they escaped their enclosure and couldn't be recaptured, zoo director Ken Schlueter said. The primates at Zoo Nebraska freed themselves Saturday when a padlock wasn't completely closed after the cage was cleaned, he said. Schlueter killed the animals with a deputy's service revolver after a tranquilizer gun didn't show any effect. No people were hurt, state patrol spokeswoman Deb Collins said.

After the chimps broke out, employees moved visitors into an office area, but the chimps tried to get into the building, Schlueter said. A fourth chimp also escaped but quickly returned to its cage.

Survivor says he never fired at hunter

A deer hunter testified that he never fired at a man accused of going on a rampage and fatally shooting six people in the woods of Wisconsin after a confrontation over trespassing. Terry Willers, one of two hunters wounded in the shootings Nov. 21, testified that he was the only one in his group who had a gun when they confronted Chai Soua Vang. “Who shot first?” Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager asked. “Mr. Vang,” said Willers, whose daughter, Jessica, 27, was killed.

Willers testified on the second day of Vang's trial on six counts of first-degree murder and three counts of attempted murder. He faces life in prison if convicted. Vang, 36, of St. Paul, an ethnic Hmong who came to the USA from a Thai refugee camp in 1980, says he acted in self-defense after someone shot at him.

Field hockey players guilty of hazing

Six women pleaded guilty in Cumberland, Md., to hazing for their roles in a college field hockey initiation that left an 18-year-old hospitalized with a blood-alcohol level more than four times what the law considers intoxicated. The six current and former Frostburg State University players were each fined $300, given suspended 60-day jail terms and placed on a year's probation. On Dec. 3, the victims were urged to drink so much beer and liquor that one was hospitalized with a 0.365% blood-alcohol level, court documents showed. The freshmen were also pelted with flour, ice and eggs and made to sit in their own vomit and urine, the court documents said.

4 Democrats vie to challenge NYC mayor

Voters in New York City today will choose a Democrat to face Mayor Michael Bloomberg in the general election Nov. 8. Gifford Miller, Anthony Weiner and C. Virginia Fields spent the final weekend before the primary attending 9/11 remembrances, but Fernando Ferrer had lunch and a photo-op with Al Sharpton, who has endorsed him.

A poll by the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute found Ferrer with 32% of likely Democratic voters, leading Anthony Weiner's 25%. Thirteen percent of likely Democratic voters in the survey were undecided. The winner needs 40% to avoid a runoff in two weeks. The poll surveyed 717 likely Democratic primary voters from Sept. 6 to Sept. 11 and has a margin of error of +/-3.7 percentage points.

Briton Gets 47 Years In Missile Plot (WP/AP)

By Jeffrey Gold, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

NEWARK, N.J. -- A British businessman convicted of trying to smuggle shoulder-launched missiles into the U.S. to aid terrorists was sentenced Monday to 47 years in prison, effectively a life sentence.

Hemant Lakhani, 70, was convicted in April of attempting to sell the missiles to a group he thought would use them to shoot down commercial airliners.

During his trial, and again Monday, his lawyers said Lakhani was the victim of government entrapment because the supposed missile seller and buyer were actually government agents.

Lakhani was convicted on all five charges he faced: attempting to provide material support to terrorists, unlawful brokering of foreign defense articles and attempting to import merchandise into the U.S. by means of false statements, plus two counts of money laundering.

Federal prosecutors were seeking the maximum on each count, for a total of 67 years, with Assistant U.S. Attorney Stuart Rabner recounting evidence in which Lakhani volunteered praise for Osama bin Laden.

"We may see a man who looks like us and dresses like us, but is so morally bankrupt that he plots the death of thousands of people," Rabner said.

U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden rejected pleas for leniency from Lakhani and his wife, referring to what she called "overwhelming" evidence of his "reprehensible conduct."

Lakhani was arrested in August 2003 at a hotel near Newark Liberty International Airport where he had been meeting with a government informant posing as a representative of a Somali-based militant group.

The government asserted that Lakhani planned to arrange the sale of at least 50 more missiles after the sale of the first one.

Among evidence during the trial was a video secretly made at the hotel in which Lakhani and the informant are seen with a disabled shoulder-fired missile in a box. They stand by a window overlooking the airport and discuss how missiles could be used to bring down airplanes in several locations simultaneously.

Co-defendants Yehuda Abraham and Vijay Raja are to be sentenced in coming months, while an Indian citizen caught in the sting operation was deported after cooperating in the Lakhani prosecution.

Also, Moinuddeen Ahmed Hameed, 41, pleaded guilty in 2004 to conspiracy to operate an unlicensed money transmitting business. He was sentenced in June to the 22 months he had served since his 2003 arrest.

Indian-born British Businessman Sentenced In U.S. Weapons Case (REU)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

NEWARK, N.J. (Reuters) - A U.S. federal court judge on Monday sentenced British businessman Hemant Lakhani to 47 years in prison for providing financial support for terrorist activities against the United States.

Prosecutors say Lakhani, 70, tried to sell a shoulder-fired missile to a man posing as a terrorist group member. He was found guilty in April of attempting to support terrorism, illegal arms brokering, money laundering and other charges.

Lakhani, who had faced a maximum sentence of 67 years, has maintained he was set up in a sting operation.

"It's a total lie," he said, holding his head in his hands, at the defense table in U.S. District Court in Newark, N.J.

His conviction was considered one of the more significant victories for the U.S. Justice Department since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks and the launch of the U.S.-led war on terror.

Lakhani, his attorney, Henry Klingeman, and his wife pleaded for leniency, noting he is elderly and wants to return home to Britain.

"Mr. Lakhani is not entitled to leniency. He's entitled to fairness," U.S. District Court Judge Katharine Hayden said in handing down the sentence.

Lakhani was arrested two years ago after U.S. Customs officers and FBI agents stormed a New Jersey hotel room and found him showing a "sample" shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missile to an informant posing as a member of a Somali militant group.

The arrest was the culmination of a 22-month sting spanning three continents.

The Indian-born clothing merchant has claimed he was a victim of entrapment because the buyer was an FBI informant and the missile sellers were undercover Russian agents.

Prosecutors said Lakhani had agreed to sell as many as 200 missiles to the informant and that he believed they would be used to shoot down U.S. airliners.

They said evidence showed he was a willing participant in the scheme, that he associated with a reputed terrorist and tried to broker other arms deals negotiated during 200 phone calls with the informant and 12 trips to Russia and Ukraine.

Two Plead Not Guilty To Terrorism Charges (PHI)

By Jeremiah Marquez

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 13, 2005

SANTA ANA, Calif. - Two men pleaded not guilty Monday to federal charges alleging they planned terrorist attacks against military facilities, the Israeli Consulate and other targets in the Los Angeles area.

Levar Haley Washington, 25, and Gregory Vernon Patterson, 21, were ordered held without bail after their pleas in U.S. District Court.

"In the name of Allah, I plead not guilty," Washington said before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato.

Prosecutors contend the plot was orchestrated by Washington, Patterson and Hammad Riaz Samana, 21, at the behest of Kevin James, an inmate of the California State Prison, Sacramento. James, 29, founded the radical group Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh, or JIS.

During Monday's hearing, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith called Washington and Patterson dangers to society and flight risks, saying they had planned to carry out a "homegrown jihad" against the United States.

All four men face counts of conspiracy to wage war against the U.S. government through terrorism, kill armed service members and murder foreign officials, among other charges, according to an indictment.

All but Samana are American born and Muslim converts. Counterterrorism officials have said they found no evidence directly connecting the group to al-Qaida or other foreign terror networks.

Samana, a Pakistani national, pleaded not guilty to federal charges last week. He was imprisoned for attempted robbery in Los Angeles County, prosecutors said. James was expected to be arraigned later this month.

Washington, Patterson and Samana - who attended the same Inglewood mosque - allegedly conducted surveillance of military sites, synagogues, the Israeli Consulate and El Al airline facilities in the Los Angeles area.

Prosecutors suspect that Washington, Patterson and Samana robbed gas stations to finance their plans. Patterson bought a rifle, and Samana received "firearms training and physical training," according to the indictment.

Washington and Patterson previously pleaded not guilty to robbery charges in a related state case. Samana has not been charged in that case.

Outside court, Ellen Barry, who was appointed Monday as Washington's attorney, said she had not yet reviewed evidence in the case and expected the Nov. 8 trial would be postponed.

Patterson's lawyer, Winston McKesson, said his client has asked him not to comment on the case.

Also Monday, law enforcement officials briefed Jewish community leaders in Los Angeles on the case and said local police planned to step up security in and around synagogues during the holidays.

Randy Parsons, acting assistant director of the FBI's Los Angeles office, said the extra security was being taken out of an abundance of caution, not because there was any specific, credible threat.

"It's important that people go about their normal activities but remain vigilant," Parsons said.

Al-Arian Trial Focused On Finances (TAMPTRIB)

By MICHAEL FECHTER

Tampa Tribune, September 13, 2005

TAMPA - An attorney for one of Sami Al-Arian's codefendants is challenging prosecution claims that his client was on the payroll of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

Defense attorney Stephen Bernstein points to the same translations of intercepted telephone calls prosecutors are relying on, but says the figures discussed leave no room to pay Sameeh Hammoudeh.

Bernstein spent the morning cross examining FBI agent Michael Wysocki, who analyzed dozens of bank accounts involving the defendants and organizations they helped run. Al-Arian, Hammoudeh, Hatim Fariz and Ghassan Ballut are charged with racketeering and conspiracy to support the Islamic Jihad.

Hammoudeh does receive nearly $20,000 to his Tampa bank account from Islamic Jihad founder Fathi Shikaki in 1994, records show. He later sends $4,000 to Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, then a director at an Islamic think tank in Tampa, and $16,000 to the think tank itself.

In other calls, Al-Arian and Islamic Jihad members discuss salary information for its members. Bernstein has repeatedly tried to show that Hammoudeh is mentioned apart from the others and that references to him are not about salary.

He also is challenging Wysocki's claim that bank records fail to substantiate that Hammoudeh and others failed to make donations to needy Palestinians in Syria, Lebanon and the Occupied Territories despite receipts and lists of orphans seized during searches in 1995.

Bernstein asked about other records seized, which he said were never translated by the government, that might lead to a different conclusion. But, thus far, Bernstein has not shown Wysocki any additional documents that challenge the accuracy of his review.

Such evidence might be presented when defense attorneys get to call witnesses. Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek has indicated the prosecution could complete its case by the end of the month.

More Join Guantanamo Hunger Strike (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

A month-old hunger strike at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to include at least 128 detainees, 18 of whom are forcibly receiving intravenous fluids or nutrition in the prison hospital, military officials and detainee lawyers said yesterday.

The captives are protesting their indefinite imprisonment and what they describe as beatings administered by the prison's Immediate Response Force (IRF)-- squads of military personnel who are dispatched to put down disturbances in detainees' cells. Some have said they will refuse to eat until the military gives them a fair hearing or they die, according to their attorneys.

Military officials first acknowledged the hunger strike, the second of the summer, on Aug. 25. Since then, the number of people hospitalized and in serious physical danger has grown to 18, according to Maj. Jeffrey J. Weir, a Guantanamo Bay spokesman. He said that step was taken to prevent any of the approximately 520 prisoners at the U.S. Navy base prison from engaging in a "form of suicide."

The hunger strike began in the first week of August, and, according to newly declassified accounts of detainees provided by their lawyers, has gradually spread across several camps at the prison. Detainees allege they have been severely beaten and are deeply frustrated at their indefinite detentions. Some have been held for 3 1/2 years without facing charges.

Lawyers for the prisoners assert that more than 200 detainees are refusing food. An earlier hunger strike in June and July ended after military authorities met with a small group of detainees and promised improvements in their living conditions.

"They truly feel they have nothing left," said attorney David Remes, who represents several Yemeni detainees. "I'm not sure what the end point will be. But I do predict there will be death."

Binyam Mohammed, formerly of London, whose account was the first declassified, told his attorney on Aug. 11 of the new hunger strike. "I do not plan to stop until I die or we are respected," he said. "People will definitely die."

Another detainee, Libyan-born Omar Deghayes, told his lawyer he had not eaten in five weeks. "Many more people have fallen unconscious. . . . More are taken to hospital," he said.

Military officials have characterized the protest as a "fast" of prisoners aimed at grabbing attention, and say it involves 128 prisoners. They say its significance is exaggerated by their lawyers.

Weir said no detainees are in danger of dying and that the military's treatment is preventing them from losing critical nutrition. Of the 18 people hospitalized, 13 are being force-fed through nasal tubes and five are being given intravenous hydration.

On Aug. 25, the military said that 89 detainees were fasting and seven were hospitalized and receiving forced fluids or nutrition.

Weir said yesterday that the military does not allow beatings of detainees, and he believes the refusal to eat is part of a campaign to press for their transfer or release.

"My understanding is that it's just because of their continued detention," Weir said. "They're trying to call attention to that."

The majority of detainees at Guantanamo Bay have long insisted that they were captured by mistake by U.S. forces in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. In some prisoners' cases, records show, the military has little but circumstantial evidence that the men engaged in or supported terrorist acts. The military's review of 558 cases resulted in 38 detainees being declared non-enemy combatants.

The appellate court for the District of Columbia heard arguments last week on the legality of the military holding the detainees indefinitely without giving them the chance to challenge their detentions in a U.S. court -- a follow-up to a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 2004. But that dispute is expected to drag on until next year, and is likely to be appealed to the Supreme Court again.

Hunger strikes are not new to the prison. Detainees launched one in 2002 after allegations that guards and interrogators mistreated copies of the Koran. Military officials then issued new guidelines for proper treatment of the Islamic holy book, and the strike ended.

Detainees began a new strike in late June to protest their treatment and the quality of their food and water. They complained about solitary confinement, alleged beatings by IRF teams, and the use of uniform colors to signify how detainees should be treated. Detainees given white uniforms are considered cooperative while those assigned orange uniforms are considered uncooperative and treated more harshly, detainees said.

The prisoners halted the previous strike in the first days of August after military camp leaders met with a small "council" of detainees and promised improvements in their living conditions. But the strike resumed a few days later, some detainees told their lawyers, when news spread through the camp of a Tunisian detainee beaten by an interrogator and IRF teams hitting two others, according to detainees' reports to their lawyers.

Weir declined to discuss individual detainees' cases or allegations.

An Algerian detainee told his lawyer in a newly declassified report provided by his attorney that a new interrogator beat the Tunisian with an empty beverage cooler and a metal chair after the detainee refused to talk to him. The Algerian said he saw the Tunisian's bloodied, swollen eye after the session.

Weir declined to comment on those details. Other detainees' accounts of the strike have not yet been declassified by the military, their lawyers said.

No Way, José (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

The timing couldn't have been better. Two days before the anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, a panel for the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled unanimously last Friday that the President "unquestionably" has the power to detain an American citizen who has taken up arms against his country.

But wait. Didn't the Supreme Court say precisely that in its Hamdi decision last year? So it did, as Judge Michael Luttig notes repeatedly in his 25-page opinion penned for the court. That wasn't enough for José Padilla's attorneys, who argued that Hamdi, which concerned an American picked up on a battlefield in Afghanistan, didn't apply to their client, who was arrested domestically, at O'Hare Airport.

Padilla, for readers who may have forgotten, is the Brooklyn-born former gang leader who was recruited by al Qaeda, trained in Afghanistan, and equipped, funded and dispatched back to America. The "battlefield" in this case was to be American apartment buildings, which Padilla is accused of plotting to blow up. President Bush designated him an enemy combatant in 2002. The "locus of capture" is "irrelevant," Judge Luttig writes. Common sense says that Padilla poses the same threat of returning to the battlefield whether he was captured at home or abroad.

In previous wars, Americans who conspired to kill their fellow citizens were subject to trial by military commission, an option the President expressly ruled out in his post-9/11 order limiting military tribunals to non-citizens. Padilla's supporters want him to be charged in the criminal justice system or released. They include the American Civil Liberties Union, the People for the American Way Foundation, and former Clinton Justice officials Janet Reno, Eric Holder and Philip Heymann, who all want a return to the days of treating terrorism like a law-enforcement problem. In the week of the 9/11 anniversary, we're glad the Fourth Circuit didn't authorize a return to this September 10 mindset.

A Radical Vows To Fight Britain's Expulsion Plan (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2005

LONDON - Yasir al-Sirri is no stranger to British courtrooms. Since he sought asylum here 11 years ago the Egyptian Islamic radical has been in and out of jail, and has successfully fought off attempts to extradite him on terrorism charges to both the US and Egypt.

Now, however, in the wake of July's London bombings, he faces perhaps his greatest challenge yet as the British government prepares to join a Europewide crackdown on extremist Islamic circles and deport dozens of individuals deemed "not conducive to the public good."

As European governments lower their traditional levels of tolerance for radicalism, they are redrawing the lines between civil liberties and national security in the face of terrorist violence.

"Anything can happen," Mr. Sirri says, with a shrug of his shoulders. "I am expecting something to happen."

Last week, the Italian authorities summarily expelled a Moroccan imam and two other Middle Eastern men, giving them no chance to appeal under powers introduced since the London bombings that killed 52 people on July 7.

France announced last month that it would be deporting a dozen or so North African immigrants it deems dangerous, using administrative procedures not subject to prior judicial review. "In France we are very well organized with regard to expulsions," says Guillaume Larrivé, an adviser to Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy. "We don't ask ourselves major juridical questions."

European human rights activists are up in arms, complaining that those sent back to their countries of origin, mostly Middle Eastern nations such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Algeria, face torture.

"It is absolutely scandalous," says Jean-Pierre Dubois, president of the French Human Rights League. "Are human rights not for all humans, or have we decided that radical imams are monsters?"

The United Nations' special rapporteur on torture, Manfred Nowak, also condemns the growing trend. "The risk is very high that these people would be subjected to torture," he warns. "Most of the Muslim fundamentalists' countries of origin unfortunately do have a clear record of torture."

Recognizing the dangers, the British interior minister, Charles Clarke, nonetheless insists that "it really is necessary to balance very important rights for individuals against the collective right for security."

Sirri, who runs the "Islamic Observation Center" in London, (he says it monitors human rights abuses in the Muslim world, but US and British police say it is a conduit for messages among Al Qaeda militants), would undoubtedly be arrested if he were sent back to Egypt.

The government there has been seeking his extradition from Britain for 10 years in connection with his alleged role in a 1993 assassination attempt by the "Islamic Group" against the Egyptian prime minister.

Britain, like other European countries, is bound by the European Convention on Human Rights, and by a UN treaty, not to send anyone to a country where he or she runs a serious risk of torture. The British government, however, is seeking to circumvent this restriction by demanding diplomatic assurances from 10 Middle Eastern and African countries that they would not mistreat any deportees.

So far only Jordan, which has been widely accused of torturing suspects, has agreed to offer an assurance. Britain says negotiations with Egypt, Algeria, Morocco and other governments are still under way.

But no such understandings would be valid, insists Dr. Nowak, an Austrian human rights expert. "Jordan is already a party to the UN Convention against Torture," he argues. "Why should they suddenly stop torturing? They are already violating a legally binding treaty, so why should they not violate a nonbinding diplomatic agreement?"

The Egyptian government broke a similar promise it made to Sweden in 2001, when Stockholm deported Ahmed Agiza only on condition that he be well treated and given a fair trial, Nowak points out. Stockholm later complained that Mr. Agiza had been tried unfairly before a military court, and he complained that he had been tortured. Sirri trusts British judges not to rubber-stamp government deportation orders. "If the government gives any judge the political agreement between the UK and Jordan, he will throw it in his rubbish bin," he says confidently.

Mr. Clarke, on the other hand, said Friday he hoped that judges reviewing deportation cases would "recast the balance" between individual human rights and national security. "The right to be protected from torture and ill treatment must be considered side by side with the right to be protected from the death and destruction caused by indiscriminate terrorism," Mr. Clarke said in his speech last week.

British judges have long protected radical imam Abu Hamza al-Masri from extradition to Yemen, where he is wanted on terrorism charges, for example. His fiery sermons appear to have inspired one regular visitor, shoe bomber Richard Reid.

Clarke last month issued a list of "unacceptable behaviors" that would prompt deportation orders against foreigners living in Britain. It includes fomenting, justifying, or glorifying terrorist violence; seeking to provoke others to terrorist acts; and fostering hatred that might lead to intercommunity violence.

That would appear to cover websites carrying videos of British soldiers being blown up in Iraq or of hostages being beheaded, and the distribution of messages encouraging jihad from such figures as Osama bin Laden.

The move appears to enjoy strong public support. A poll carried out for the Guardian newspaper last month found that 71 per cent of respondents agreed that "foreign Muslims who incite hatred should be excluded or deported from the UK."

Announcing the list, Clarke insisted that it was "not intended to stifle free speech or legitimate debate about religions or other issues." Officials pointed out that the government had backed off a plan to deport foreigners who expressed "views the government considers to be extreme and that conflict with the UK's culture of tolerance."

That is not how Sirri sees things. "Tony Blair is changing this country from one respected for its human rights to a graveyard of human rights," he charges.

In Egypt, he says, military courts that the British government does not regard as fair have handed down three sentences against him: the death penalty, 25 years' hard labor, and 15 years' hard labor. If he were sent back, he says with a bitter laugh, "I don't know which one they would apply first." Yasir al-Sirri: 'I did nothing illegal'

Yasir al-Sirri is exactly the sort of man the British government hopes to be able to expel with its new, tougher deportation policy: He keeps very dubious company and the police are sure he is up to something, but have not been able to pin anything on him or put him on trial.

In Egypt, Mr. Sirri is thought to have been a leader of the radical "Gama'a Islamiya" group, and was sentenced him to death for his alleged role in an assassination attempt against the prime minister. But British judges have refused to extradite him to Cairo, citing weak evidence. Sirri claims he had nothing to do with the plot. He did, though, have ties in those days with Ayman al-Zawahiri, now Al Qaeda's second-in-command. And US authorities want him for carrying messages for Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, who is serving a life term for trying to blow up the World Trade Center in 1993.

Sirri was held in Belmarsh prison in London for eight months for providing a letter of journalistic accreditation to the two men who assassinated the Afghan warlord Ahmed Shah Massoud in 2001. But a British court finally decided he had been an unwitting accomplice in the affair, and let him go. Sirri insists that "I did nothing illegal in this country and I have not broken any law in this country." Islamic law, he adds, demands that "anyone who arrives here under asylum cannot do anything against this country. Tony Blair is just using [the London bombings on] 7/7 as an excuse to carry out his agenda."

PATRIOT ACT:

Booksellers At Fore Of Patriot Act Fights (SMCT)

DOJ_NMG_0004309

By Sajid Farooq, STAFF WRITER

San Mateo County (CA) Times, September 12, 2005

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the second day of a three-day series looking at the impact of and the controversy over the Patriot Act and its second revision that awaits President Bush's signature. The series began Saturday and runs through Tuesday.

Five years ago, an independent bookstore in Denver became the center of a drug investigation, and at the same time, inadvertently became a model for bookstore owners across the country concerned with the Patriot Act.

Police officers walked into the Tattered Cover Book Store and served a search warrant for the records of one of the store's customers, who was suspected of manufacturing methamphetamine, according to the American Bookseller Foundation for Free Expression. Even though the search took place more than a year before the Patriot Act was passed, the case set a precedent for booksellers and others across the country who are fighting some of the surveillance provisions of the anti-terrorism law.

Several businesses, city councils and other governmental institutions across the country have taken stances for and against the act for a variety of reasons. Some of those stances are driven by politics, some by security and others by fear.

"You have to be able to do this without the government looking over your shoulder," said Rich Van Castle, owner of three Bay Books stores in the East Bay. "It is very important. I wouldn't want the government coming in here and saying 'What did he read or did she read?'"

Van Castle is just one of many independent and corporate booksellers across the country who have been fighting one of most controversial measures of the act, Section 215, which gives federal authorities access to customers' book, medical and library records, while establishing a gag order to prevent anyone involved from commenting on the case.

"That to me is a violation of free speech in of itself," Van Castle said.

Successful tool

But to the FBI, which is often painted as the abuser of Patriot Act powers, says the gag order is a matter of both national and personal security. The FBI also contends that bookstore purchases and library records were available to federal authorities long before the Sept. 11-inspired Patriot Act.

"Some of this is just common sense," said Special Agent LaRae Quay with the San Francisco office of the FBI. "It's just one of these things if we are looking at an individual it's best that they not know. (It's) also to protect the individuals that are cleared.

"First of all, if you have a librarian flapping his or her lips that Joe Blow has been looked at, if that's a terrorist, that tips them off. And secondly, if they are innocent, their reputation is smeared."

Critics of Section 215 argue that record searches violate customers' First Amendment rights. The Colorado Supreme Court backed that stance when it ruled in favor of Tattered Cover Book Store, which refused to comply with a subpoena.

The court ruled that the prosecution had not shown enough proof that it needed the customer's buying records to prove his guilt. Reasonable doubt is vital to access records, according to Quay.

"It's not just an agent (who) decides 'I want records and go and seize them'," she said. "We have to be able to articulate any connection with records and an ongoing investigation."

Library records were available for criminal cases before passage of the Patriot Act, but the act gives access to records involving suspected terrorists.

Being able to access library records has been a successful tool in protecting public safety, according to Quay. The FBI was able to track the Unabomber, Ted Kaczynski, by pulling his library records.

The FBI examined Kaczynski's life and noticed that his manifesto referred to three obscure books that very few people would read. The FBI was tipped by Kaczynski's brother that the books of "interest were checked out from his local library." The FBI obtained a federal grand subpoena and went to the library near where he lived to verify the information.

Still, from small independent bookstores to huge chains — such as Borders and Barnes & Noble — to public libraries, protecting customers' privacy is a driving force behind taking a public stance against the act.

"It is very important. We believe that it is our customers' right to choose what to read, listen to and buy, and those decisions are private," said Anne Roman with Borders.

Other entities affected

There are other businesses, such as banks, that must provide access to customer records.

Because of the Patriot Act, certain transactions and identities must be reported to the government to help prevent financial crimes involving terrorism, such as identity theft and money laundering.

The act has also affected local governments across the country. Nearly 400 communities in 43 states, representing 62 million people, have taken positions of one sort or another against the Patriot Act.

Shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, the American Civil Liberties Union hired five people to help get resolutions against the Patriot Act passed across the country, according to Dalia Hashad, an advocate in for the ACLU's campaign against racial profiling.

The ACLU organizers worked with local leaders in each community to get resolutions passed. But the ACLU did not want its name all over the campaign, so the five people hired to work on the resolutions full-time divided the country into five sections and worked with each local community to get them passed.

The success of the campaign was based on Americans' unwillingness to compromise their civil rights for national security, according to Dorothy M. Ehrlich, the executive director of ACLU Northern California.

"I think people understood giving up civil liberties didn't make them any safer," she said. "There is no evidence that it does and there is a lot to lose. There has truly been a bipartisan concern across the country."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

USA Still Terrorists' 'No. 1 Target' (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, September 13, 2005

In his first media interview since becoming the nation's first director of national intelligence in April, John Negroponte spoke Monday to reporters and an editor from USA TODAY.

Some highlights:

"We're talking about something that is a medium- and long-term proposition. We're not talking about changes that can necessarily be instituted overnight."

"Progress has been made in dismembering and attacking the leadership of his organization. A number of important operatives of his have been killed or captured. He is, we think, alive somewhere in the Afghan-Pakistan border area. … Even though he hasn't been captured, I think that he and his organization are very much on the defensive."

"We've seen in some of the statements and correspondence that we've laid our hands on between al-Qaeda leadership that clearly they would like to see this activity spread into such targets as Western Europe, and I think what happened in London on the 7th of July, whether or not it was directed by al-Qaeda, was certainly consistent with that desire. … They see vulnerabilities in the West, in Western Europe. And of course, the United States homeland remains, in my view, their No. 1 target."

"Putting numbers on the size of the insurgency is probably a bit of a speculative business because nobody knows for sure. But I guess I'd say that based on what I've read and on my own knowledge of the situation in Iraq, that over the past several months I don't think the size or nature of the insurgency has changed appreciably."

"These are both states that have got to be watched very carefully, and they are extremely high priority. … In either instance, left to their own devices they are either going to develop or further develop, as the case may be, their nuclear capabilities."

Intel Chief: Iraqis In Insurgency More Elusive (USAT)

By John Diamond, Usa Today

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence is struggling to expose elements of the insurgency in Iraq made up of former members of Saddam Hussein's regime, John Negroponte, the nation's intelligence chief, said in an interview Monday.

Joint U.S.-Iraqi military efforts have damaged the network of foreign insurgents led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, though Zarqawi himself remains at large, Negroponte said. Indigenous Iraqi insurgents, led by former members of Saddam's ruling Baath Party, have been tougher to track down.

The "former regime elements ... seem to have very good operational secrecy," Negroponte said in a wide-ranging interview with USA TODAY reporters. "And thus far it's not been that easy to make a dent in that part of the insurgency."

Though foreign fighters, mainly Sunni Muslim Arabs from Syria and Saudi Arabia, have grabbed headlines with suicide bombings that have killed hundreds of Iraqis, Negroponte said Iraqis dominate the insurgency. Despite intense focus on Iraq, where 138,000 U.S. troops are deployed, U.S. intelligence has not been able to produce anything more than a "speculative" estimate of the insurgency's size, he said.

Based on everything he has seen, Negroponte said, the insurgency is neither gaining strength nor weakening appreciably. The insurgency's stubborn resistance to U.S. and Iraqi military efforts has complicated the development of a democracy.

Negroponte became the nation's first director of national intelligence in April after nine months as U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Congress created the post last year in response to independent commissions that laid out major intelligence failures prior to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. He has spent much of his time in the job setting up special centers overseeing counterterrorism and weapons proliferation. "Mission managers" will be named soon for human intelligence, Iran and North Korea, Negroponte said.

Although the Office of the Director of National Intelligence was created in an atmosphere of urgency, "it's really a start-up organization," he said. "It's work in progress."

In his first media interview since assuming the intelligence post, Negroponte also said:

• Despite significant failures before 9/11 and the Iraq war, U.S. intelligence "is second to none compared to any other intelligence organization in the world." His task is "making it even better."

• Al-Qaeda, though weakened by the U.S.-led global war on terrorism, continues to plan and organize terrorist attacks and regards the U.S. homeland as its top-priority target. Western Europe, Negroponte said, is more vulnerable than the USA to al-Qaeda.

• A viable Iraqi government has been slow in getting organized because the war led to the "degradation ... of virtually every single government department. ... They basically had to start practically from scratch."

Negroponte, 66, spoke in a secure room of his office's headquarters a block from the White House. A career diplomat with Foreign Service commissions signed by every president back to Dwight Eisenhower, Negroponte got his first overseas experience in South Vietnam in the early 1960s. He has been ambassador to Honduras, Mexico, the Philippines, the United Nations and Iraq.

When he appointed Negroponte, President Bush emphasized that the new chief needed broad powers over spending and personnel across military and civilian intelligence agencies.

Nevertheless, Negroponte said he cannot rule the 15 intelligence agencies "by fiat" but must "foster a strong sense of community" among organizations that have not always cooperated.

Negroponte said he is close to making a major decision on whether to go forward with a highly classified imagery intelligence network. According to Steve Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists, the program probably concerns a costly network of satellites capable of evading radar, reflecting a Defense Department concern about the possibility that an adversary might attempt to "blind" U.S. intelligence operations by attacking its satellites.

Negroponte praised Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for helping the "lash-up between domestic and foreign" intelligence, which the 9/11 Commission called a major contributor to lapses before 9/11.

Following the report of the so-called WMD Commission, which examined the incorrect prewar estimates that Iraq had chemical and biological weapons and an active nuclear weapons development program, Negroponte said he is creating new standards on rating the veracity of clandestine intelligence sources. He is also improving the description of sources behind intelligence assessments.

Smarter Airport Screening Machines (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0004312

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A gaping hole in airport security remains: how to detect explosives in carry-on bags and on passengers themselves. Now, a host of new technologies are being tested to close that gap.

One of the most promising is a machine that has the ability to see through clothing to find a hidden weapon. The problem with early versions of the machine is that they show images of people as if they had no clothes on, which sparked privacy concerns. Yesterday, American Science & Engineering Inc. launched an X-ray machine that can see objects hidden beneath clothing while obscuring private parts. The other leading manufacturer of the machines also promises to cover up those parts of the image, though in a different way.

An alternate technology, being tried in some airports now, shoots puffs of air at passengers to detect traces of explosive residue. GE Security, a subsidiary of General Electric Co., yesterday unveiled a new machine that also detects residue, but passengers put their fingers onto a pad instead of being spritzed with air.

The moves are part of a highly competitive, rapidly unfolding race to deploy the best technology for closing the security gap at airport checkpoints.

The security upgrades at American airports since 2001 have been significant, including locking cockpit doors and reinforcing them with steel, and deploying thousands of air marshals aboard flights. But, while all checked luggage is now screened for explosives, people and bags that get carried on generally aren't. Magnetometers that travelers walk through detect metal but not weapons made of other materials. Similarly, carry-on luggage is X-rayed, which will catch scissors or a knife but not necessarily a bomb.

The Transportation Security Administration is currently reviewing several post-9/11 security guidelines that air travelers have grown to loathe: removing shoes, taking off jackets, leaving behind cuticle scissors. How much the agency relaxes these rules could in part depend on how confident government officials are about the new machines' ability to guard airport checkpoints. At Baltimore/Washington International Airport, for instance, those who walk through an explosive-detection machine don't have to take their shoes off for the metal detector.

"Our vision is for passengers to not have to remove their jacket, not have to remove their shoes, not have to remove their laptop from their bag -- to go through a checkpoint rapidly," said Dennis Cooke, president of GE Security's Homeland Protection business.

The TSA has a long list of limitations it must work within. These include everything from space at the checkpoints to cost concerns. The government is focusing mostly on two types of technology, each with pluses and minuses. The "puffer" detects the tiniest bit of explosive material on a traveler but can't find a hidden weapon. The "backscatter," on the other hand, can see through clothing to detect hidden bombs or guns, but creates the obvious privacy concerns.

Puffers, officially called trace detection portals, are now being deployed at two dozen airports around the country, including those in Las Vegas, Baltimore/Washington, San Francisco, Phoenix and Tampa, Fla. They blow several puffs of air on a traveler to shake loose particles that have settled on the body and then analyze them for explosive residue.

"It's right out of 'Star Trek,' " says Natalie Koza, who walked through the machine at BWI airport late last month. The 47-year-old State Department employee, who was on her way to Egypt, was quickly cleared.

The machines, manufactured by GE and Smiths Detection, a subsidiary of London-based Smiths Group PLC, cost about $150,000 each. The TSA has said it anticipates deploying 100 more of them by January. GE's new technology, called the Itemiser FX, which detects explosives as well as narcotics, costs about $65,000 per machine and is portable.

The problem with these machines: While they are great at detecting explosives, they won't find a hidden gun or knife. Backscatter, an X-ray that sees under clothing, solves that problem. TSA is close to deploying these machines in a handful of airports, including those in Baltimore/Washington and San Francisco, to test their effectiveness. But the backscatter creates another problem: It produces intimate pictures of unsuspecting travelers.

"It really is a nude strip search," said Tim Sparapani at the American Civil Liberties Union, which opposes their use.

In response, AS&E's new machine, called SmartCheck, creates an outline of the person's body, along with an outline of hidden items. Rapiscan Systems, the other manufacturer, has come up with a sliding scale where the image starts to get fuzzier or more precise as needed. The companies promise other protections: The people who screen the X-rays would sit in a remote room where they can't see the people moving through security. The screeners would all be of the same sex as the travelers and images won't be saved.

Clifford Wilke, chief technology officer for the federal TSA, says some airports, particularly large ones, could wind up with both puffers and backscatters. But others argue that having multiple machines would take up too much space and keep passengers waiting too long.

Either the puffer or the backscatter is likely to improve on current procedures. In most airports, travelers who are selected for further screening -- either because their name is on a watch list or the metal detector is set off when they walked through -- are subject to a physical pat-down by a screener.

A test of the backscatter technology at London's Heathrow International Airport suggested that hand pat-downs miss at least half of the prohibited items hidden on travelers.

The Homeland Security Department's inspector general said in May that the ability of TSA screeners to stop prohibited items being carried through airports was no better than it had been in late 2001 and early 2002, before the federal government took over screening. Experts say that's partly because screeners are loathe to probe private parts of the body.

Technology to screen carry-on bags for explosives is even less advanced than screening for people. One possible solution is to replace the existing X-rays with CT scans now used on checked bags. A two-month preliminary test of this technology was completed recently at Boston Logan International Airport, and TSA hopes to begin formal lab testing next summer.

In the long term, technology companies envision a day when travelers don't even have to walk through machines -- when sensors throughout the airport scan people as they walk through hallways.

Closer to reality might be one machine that could handle all screening, searching for metal and explosives alike. "Instead of walking through three pieces of machinery, you walk through one," predicted Todd Haupli, a lobbyist for airports. "We have finite resources as a country that we're willing to throw at all this."

WAR NEWS:

Talabani Says Iraqis Could Replace Many U.S. Troops (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said in an interview yesterday that the United States could withdraw as many as 50,000 troops by the end of the year, declaring there are enough Iraqi forces trained and ready to begin assuming control in cities throughout the country.

After the White House and Pentagon were contacted for comment, however, a senior adviser to Talabani called The Washington Post to say Talabani did not intend to suggest a specific timeline for withdrawal. "He is afraid . . . this might put the notion of a timetable on this thing," the adviser said. "The exact figure of what would be required will undeniably depend on the level of insurgency [and] the level of Iraqi capability."

In the interview, Talabani said he planned to discuss reductions in U.S. forces during a private meeting with President Bush today, and said he believed the United States could begin pulling out some troops immediately.

"We think that America has the full right to move some forces from Iraq to their country because I think we can replace them [with] our forces," Talabani said. "In my opinion, at least from 40,000 to 50,000 American troops can be [withdrawn] by the end of this year."

That assessment differs dramatically from those offered by Bush and by U.S. military commanders in Iraq.

Bush has carefully avoided setting a timetable for reducing the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, currently about 140,000, and the Pentagon plans to maintain or slightly increase the force level in anticipation of an Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's new constitution. White House officials say that Bush's strategy for eventually withdrawing troops hinges on Iraqis' approving the constitution and holding successful elections in December.

Dan Bartlett, a senior Bush adviser, said the president and Talabani have the same goals. "We share the same view: As Iraqis build up their capabilities to defend their country, fewer U.S. troops will be needed to complete our mission," Bartlett said. "The president will continue to work with Iraqi leaders, and base his military decisions on the advice of commanders in the field and the secretary of defense."

A senior Army official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the military does not openly discuss withdrawal timelines, said bringing home as many as 50,000 U.S. troops -- or more than 35 percent of those now in Iraq -- by the end of the year is not under discussion. "Any talk of reduction has been for well after the election time frame," the official said. "Are there discussions about how to pull back and when? Sure. But certainly not that dramatically in such a short time."

Talabani's statement has the potential to put Bush in a difficult position if the troops are not pulled out by year's end, since critics are certain to ask why U.S. soldiers cannot come home when Iraq's own president says they can. The two leaders will hold a joint news conference today after their meeting.

In the interview, Talabani said Iraqi troops are prepared to assume control of security in several cities throughout southern, central and northern Iraq, despite continued violence, suicide bombings and killings. Many military experts predict a spike in insurgent attacks ahead of next month's vote.

Talabani said the number of "well-trained" Iraqi security forces stood at 60,000 and would reach 100,000 by the end of the year. All told, there about 190,000 Iraqis enlisted in the military or local security forces. "Some are well-trained, some are not so well-trained," he said. Iraqi troops have light arms, but he said they need 50 tanks and automatic weapons.

Talabani, who is Kurdish, could be influenced by the fact that the Kurds are fairly capable of defending their territory in northern Iraq and are less in need of U.S. military support, said Michael O'Hanlon, a fellow at the Brookings Institution who studies Iraq.

Many Sunni Arabs oppose the draft constitution, and they are organizing in record numbers to vote against it in Sunni-dominated regions. Talabani raised the possibility of an addendum to the constitution in coming days in an effort to appease Sunni factions. "Of course, we would like to have consensus on all articles of the constitution," he said.

In the interview, Talabani said he did not want to speak critically of neighboring Syria, which the top U.S. envoy to Iraq chastised for interfering there. Many of the foreign insurgents fighting in Iraq are believed to have entered the country along the porous Syrian border. "Our patience is running out, the patience of Iraqis [is] . . . running out. The time for decision . . . has arrived for Damascus," Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told reporters at the State Department.

Commenting on the upcoming trial of ousted president Saddam Hussein, Talabani insisted that the former leader had confessed to the killings of tens of thousands of Kurds in the late 1980s, an assertion denied by Hussein's attorney.

Hussein is scheduled to go on trial Oct. 19 on charges stemming from a massacre of Shiite Muslims following a failed assassination attempt on the Iraqi leader in the northern town of Dujail in 1982. Hussein allegedly retaliated for the plot by killing at least 143 people and razing much of the town.

Talabani, based on a conversation with the judge in the case, recounted a scene right out of the movie "A Few Good Men." Asked about the mass killings, Hussein sat silent, refusing to utter a word, Talabani said. But Hussein was taunted, asked if he was afraid to say he carried out such an act. Hussein said, "I am not afraid," and defiantly admitted he ordered the killings. Talabani said the judge has a video and recording of the confession.

Iraqi Premier Visits A City As His Forces Widen Patrols (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 12 - Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari paid a surprise visit to Tal Afar on Monday, with that city largely quiet after a major offensive by American and Iraqi troops aimed at reclaiming it from insurgents.

The prime minister has repeatedly showcased the Tal Afar operation as proof of his government's willingness to deal decisively with Sunni insurgents in western Iraq.

State television continued to show film of Iraqi soldiers storming buildings in Tal Afar throughout the day.

DOJ_NMG_0004315

With the fighting largely over, more police commando units began moving into Tal Afar and the surrounding area, where they will remain for weeks as a new police force for the city is recruited and trained, and reconstruction efforts get under way, Iraqi military officials said.

An insurgent group, the Islamic Army in Iraq, offered up to $100,000 for the assassination of Mr. Jaafari and other high-ranking members of the government who were involved in the offensive, Reuters reported.

The same group announced in an Internet posting that it had killed a high-ranking Interior Ministry official in retaliation for the operation in Tal Afar.

Interior Ministry officials could not confirm such a death by Monday evening.

Another organization, the Victorious Army Group, threatened Sunday to attack Baghdad with chemical weapons if the Tal Afar operation did not stop.

The interior minister, Bayan Jabr, discounted that threat in a news conference on Monday, but he added that the government was consulting with chemical weapons specialists and making preparations in case the threat is carried out.

Mr. Jabr also dismissed questions from reporters about whether the Tal Afar attack was timed to shore up the government's image ahead of the national referendum in October on the constitution.

Scattered violence continued across Iraq on Monday. A car bomb exploded outside a restaurant in the upscale Baghdad neighborhood of Mansour, killing at least 2 people and wounding 20, according to the Interior Ministry.

Also in Baghdad, gunmen in cars opened fire on crowds in two neighborhoods, killing six people and wounding two, and 10 bodies were found in a southern neighborhood, Interior Ministry officials said.

In Kirkuk, in the north, gunmen opened fire on the provincial government headquarters, killing two police officers. A Kurdish militiaman was also killed in Kirkuk after a gun battle broke out in the Hurriya neighborhood, police officials said.

South of Baghdad, insurgents opened fire on a motorcade carrying a representative of Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric. One guard was killed and another wounded, Interior Ministry officials said.

40 Insurgents Killed During Day 3 Of Tal Afar Offensive (USAT)

By From wire reports

USA Today, September 13, 2005

BAGHDAD — Violence flared in the northern Iraq city of Tal Afar late Monday when Iraqi forces trapped insurgents in basement hide-outs, killing 40 militants in fierce fighting, the Iraqi military said.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari visited Tal Afar, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are pursuing a joint offensive against insurgents, to congratulate his forces.

"I met today with the commander of the 3rd Division in Tal Afar and his officers and soldiers and found them in high spirits," al-Jaafari said. Hundreds of Iraqis danced, sang and waved flags as al-Jaafari toured the region.

The new fighting Monday night raised the insurgent death toll since the offensive began to nearly 200, the government said. Baghdad said it lost seven soldiers in the course of the three-day offensive and six civilians were killed. The U.S. military said no American soldiers were hurt.

An estimated 350-500 insurgents were in Tal Afar when Iraqi forces, backed by U.S. troops, began the offensive Saturday. The town, 50 miles from the Syrian border, had become an insurgent stronghold.

In an ongoing propaganda battle, meanwhile, the Islamic Army in Iraq, which has previously claimed responsibility for kidnappings and killings of foreigners, placed bounties on the heads of Iraqi leaders.

The militant group called in a Web posting for its "holy fighters to strike the infidels with an iron fist." It offered $100,000 to the killer of al-Jaafari, $50,000 for Interior Minister Bayan Jabr and $30,000 for Defense Minister Sadoun al-Dulaimi.

Militants also have threatened twice in recent days on Web postings to launch chemical weapons against Baghdad.

In other developments Monday:

• A car bomb exploded in western Baghdad, killing at least two people.

• Police in eastern Baghdad reported finding the bodies of 10 unidentified men, their hands tied and shot to death.

Iraqi Premier Tours Tall Afar (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 12 -- Iraq's prime minister toured the northern city of Tall Afar near the Syrian border on Monday to congratulate Iraqi forces for ousting militants from their stronghold, Iraqi television reported.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, a huge car bomb exploded outside a popular restaurant in the upscale Mansour neighborhood, witnesses said. Hospital officials said at least two people were killed and 17 were wounded. A doctor at Yarmouk Hospital said most of the victims were women.

Al-Iraqiya television, which showed no pictures of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari's visit to the Tall Afar area, said he was there despite an insurgent threat to unleash chemical and biological weapons against Iraqi and U.S. forces.

There was no known public threat from the insurgents to use unconventional weapons in the area, but they have vowed in two Web postings since Friday to use chemical weapons against U.S. and Iraqi government interests in Baghdad. The threats mentioned the fortified Green Zone that houses the U.S. Embassy, Iraq's parliament and other government offices.

On Sunday, Abu Musab Zarqawi, leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, posted audio on the Internet accusing U.S. and Iraqi forces of using poison gas in the Tall Afar offensive. The authenticity of the statement could not be independently verified, but the voice was similar to the one used in other postings attributed to Zarqawi.

U.S. officials consistently have denied using poison gas in warfare.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, gunmen shot and killed two policemen, police Col. Adil Zain Alabideen said. And in Hujjaj, north of Tikrit, Iraqi police found the bodies of four Iraqi soldiers, said Sameer Sumaidae, a physician at a local hospital. The four had been handcuffed and shot, he said.

The U.S. Embassy annex in the southern city of Basra was hit by a "multiple rocket attack" early Monday, an American official in Baghdad said. The official said there were no injuries or deaths, and no significant damage. He declined to discuss the damage or where the rockets hit, other than to say they landed "in the vicinity" of the compounds.

U.S. Applies Capricious Justice In Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 12 -- A masked teenager in an Iraqi army uniform walked slowly through a crowd of 400 detainees captured Monday, studying each face and rendering his verdict with a simple hand gesture, like a Roman emperor deciding the fate of gladiators.

A thumb pointed down meant the suspect was not thought to be an insurgent and would be released by U.S. soldiers. A thumb up meant a man would be removed from the concertina wire-encased pen, handcuffed with tape or plastic ties and taken by truck to a military base to be interrogated.

"Another bad guy right here," shouted an American interpreter, when the masked Iraqi singled out a man in a yellow dishdasha , or traditional gown, who shook his head and protested in Turkish. Another captive who was spared exhaled with relief and placed his hand on his heart.

This is how the 10-day-old invasion of Tall Afar unfolded Monday. After two days of relatively uneventful patrols in the abandoned neighborhood of Sarai, where commanders had expected insurgents to be massed for a fight, U.S. and Iraqi forces turned north in the morning, to neighborhoods they had already cleared, and found hundreds of men who appeared to be of military age and troops believed to have slipped through their cordons.

Eventually, 52 men were placed in the open backs of flatbed trucks bound for Camp Sykes, about seven miles south of this northwestern city. During the attack on insurgents here -- the largest urban assault in Iraq since the siege of Fallujah last November -- the only significant clashes came in the early days, when thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops stormed the city and U.S. jets waged a relentless bombing campaign.

Since then, the fighters who controlled much of Tall Afar for nearly a year have either fled or laid down their arms to blend among the civilian population, commanders here said. Instead of a Fallujah-style assault, the invasion has largely become a citywide roundup designed to prevent insurgents from laying low to fight another day.

Soldiers with little training relevant to the mission have been forced into roles more traditionally assigned to police: gathering evidence, interrogating witnesses and suspects, and following up on leads. In searching almost every house in the city's most violent neighborhoods, they have detained hundreds of young men, some because they possessed weapons or insurgent literature, but others solely on the hearsay of local informants often called "sources" by U.S. troops.

Many of the informants are residents of this city of more than 200,000 who now serve in the Iraqi army. Others have had family members killed by insurgents and said they wanted to help purge them from their neighborhoods. The U.S. soldiers who work with them acknowledge knowing little about their backgrounds and motives -- or even their names -- and admit that their reliability varies widely. Some of those named by sources have in turn blamed their accusers of carrying out tribal or sectarian vendettas, a charge they also level at Iraqi security forces.

"They are the first important step in the process of weeding these people out," Capt. Alan Blackburn, commander of Eagle Troop of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment that has led the invasion of Tall Afar, said of the informants. "You obviously can't just go by what they say because they make plenty of mistakes, but since we don't know these places as well as they do, it helps to have them around."

U.S. forces invaded Tall Afar one year ago, before withdrawing, as insurgents returned and reestablished control over the city. On Monday, Abu Musab Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of the country's main insurgent group, al Qaeda in Iraq, posted a statement on the Internet saying U.S. forces were "repeating their moves against Tall Afar after failing many times to break into it, as its lions many times forced them to taste humiliation, and the bitterness of defeat."

As in the past several days, Iraqi soldiers drawn primarily from the Kurdish pesh merga militia led the operation, joined as always by U.S. Special Operations soldiers, distinctive with their unkempt hair and facial stubble.

At just after 7 a.m., they streamed into the adjoining neighborhoods of Hassan Koy and Uruba, taking every military-age man into custody at a makeshift pen established by U.S. forces along a main road. The U.S. soldiers uncoiled enough concertina wire to hold an expected 50 or so men. But as detainees streamed out from the neighborhoods, the pens were expanded with more coils of wire until the holding area stretched an entire block.

U.S. commanders have praised the performance of the Kurdish forces during the operation, while privately expressing concern that their tactics sometimes verge on being heavy-handed. The pesh merga supports Kurdish rebels fighting the government of neighboring Turkey and for many years were targets of the Sunni Arab-dominated Iraqi government of former president Saddam Hussein. The majority of Tall Afar's residents are Sunni Turkmens, ethnic relatives of the Turks.

Iraqi troops who raided suspected hideouts in a separate sweep late Monday killed 40 insurgents, and arrested 27 in clashes with militants, according to the Associated Press.

In a briefing the night before the morning operation, Lt. Col. Christopher Hickey, commander of the 3rd ACR's 2nd Squadron, instructed the Special Operations soldiers working with the pesh merga to avoid alienating residents.

"We lose these people if we go in there and tear people's homes apart," Hickey said.

By 8 a.m., nearly 400 people were assembled, squatting or seated in the dirt beside the road. Two of the men had bloodied faces and spots of red soaking through their green dishdashas.

"They tried to grab my father, and I said, 'He is old, you don't need to take him,' " said one of the men, whose upper lip and right ear were swollen and bleeding. "They hit us with their fists and their rifles."

Many of the men's hands were bound so tightly with plastic cuffs that their circulation was cut off, so U.S. soldiers cut the bindings and instead wrapped their hands with thick green tape.

The Special Operations soldiers, who do not provide their names to journalists as a matter of policy, said the pesh merga had found a former colonel in Hussein's army inside one home. But when U.S. soldiers looked through the pen, they could not find him. One of the Kurdish fighters said he had been delivered directly to a Kurdish commander.

"Get him down here right now," a Special Forces soldier said. "He is going to be processed here, by the U.S., like everyone else."

After about two hours, the informant arrived. Wearing tan camouflage fatigues, a flak jacket, a green ski mask and green helmet, the informant said he was from the neighborhood and was under 20 years old.

"I am doing this because I want to see the fear and violence leave Tall Afar," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

With a U.S. interpreter, he perused the crowd, pausing for less than two seconds to consider each man's fate. He never spoke a word aloud, only whispering occasionally to the interpreter.

After drawing out 52 suspects from the group, he spent longer assessing each of them in depth and providing more detailed information about their activities. He identified a man with a split lip, wearing a purple shirt and filthy white pants as "a beheader," saying he had killed at least 10 people.

"Cuts heads," wrote Capt. Noah Hanners, leader of Blue Platoon in the 3rd ACR's Eagle Troop, in blue magic marker on the man's forearm.

"You get treated special, buddy. Congratulations," Hanners said.

After conferring with the informant, the translator wrote on the white t-shirt of a man who had no identification papers: "His name is Nafe, but he is giving a different name."

Four others were identified as local insurgent cell leaders known as emirs, and had "emir" written on their arm. Several men had eagles tattooed on their arms, which the informant said indicated they were former members of the Fedayeen Saddam, a reputedly brutal militia run by Hussein's son, Uday. The informant slapped one man's tattoo and when the man protested, an Iraqi soldier smacked him across the face with the back of his hand.

"Don't be slapping them," Hanners warned. "That's not how we do this."

Some of the American soldiers taunted the detainees by asking them, "Can you say Abu Ghraib?" referring to the prison west of Baghdad from which photographs of prisoner abuse emerged last year.

"No, Guantanamo," one smiling captive responded, referring to the U.S. military prison in Cuba where suspected terrorists are held. "I just don't want to go to the Iraqi Army or police."

"Your source is not good, these are all innocent men," said one of the detainees, wearing a gray dishdasha, who said he was a student in the city of Mosul, 40 miles to the east. "We are all Sunnis. That is why he chose us. He is Shia," he said referring to the informant. Hanners said the quality of the informants has varied widely. "Some seem to say what they think you want to hear," he said. "Others give us information that pans out."

Another soldier, who asked not to be named because he said he would be punished by commanders for his criticism, had a more negative view of the sources' performance. "We almost never get anything good from them," he said. "I think they just pick people from another tribe or people who owe them money or something."

Before loading onto trucks and returning to their base, the Kurdish soldiers lined up behind the detainees and posed for digital pictures. They threw packages of food and bottles of water to a large group of children assembled across the road, many of whose fathers had been detained.

Some children picked up the gifts, but several grabbed them and threw them at the departing army vehicles. One truck quickly stopped and a soldier got out and pointed his pistol at the children, causing them to scatter briefly, before he drove away.

Soldiers and some neighborhood children gave the detainees food and water as they waited in the 100-degree heat for trucks to arrive to transport them to Camp Sykes. A woman in a long purple dress and white headscarf shouted at the remaining soldiers in Turkish and others began to gather behind her.

"I give this 30 minutes before it gets out of hand," said Sfc. Herbet Gadsden, surveying the scene. "We have to get these people out of here before their families go nuts."

At noon, two trucks arrived. Soldiers lined up the detainees, photographed each one with a digital camera, and loaded them aboard. The crowd of family members faded back into their homes. "Another day of making friends," Hanners said, shaking his head.

Envoy: Patience Waning On Syria (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Syria is harboring training camps for Iraqi insurgents, U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said Monday. U.S. patience with Syria is running out, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0004319

The United States has ruled out no option, including military force, for dealing with the government of Syrian President Bashar Assad, Khalilzad said during a State Department briefing with reporters. Syria is already under U.S. economic sanctions.

Administration officials have repeatedly accused Syria of allowing insurgents to travel to Iraq, but it was the first time an official has publicly named specific cities — Aleppo, Latakia and Damascus — as training sites. Asked whether he had proof, Khalilzad said, "I wouldn't say anything that I wasn't sure about."

Khalilzad said Syria is a bigger threat to Iraq than Iran and more of a problem than Pakistan had been for Afghanistan. He called Syria "the No. 1 offender" in the region to "the success of Iraq."

Syrian officials couldn't be reached immediately for comment but have denied such charges in the past. Mourhaf Jouejati, a Syrian-American professor of political science and international affairs at George Washington University, said the Bush administration "always has these accusations but never produces any evidence."

The administration has been intensifying pressure on Syria over both Iraq and Lebanon, where a United Nations-backed panel is investigating alleged Syrian involvement in the Feb. 14 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Jouejati said the United States hopes the probe will incriminate Syria and serve as a basis for U.N. sanctions.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans a meeting on Lebanon next week at the United Nations, where world leaders are congregating for a summit. She excluded Syria's foreign minister. Assad doesn't plan to attend the summit.

American Envoy Says Syria Assists Training Of Terrorists (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - The United States ambassador to Iraq lashed out at Syria on Monday, saying that its government continued to allow terrorists to operate training camps within Syria that have sent hundreds of insurgents into Iraq.

"Our patience is running out," said the ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad.

While other administration officials made similar accusations early this year, the focus of American attention to Syria in recent months has been its occupation of Lebanon. Over the summer, Syria said that it had cracked down on insurgents operating within its territory.

But Mr. Khalilzad, in remarks to reporters in Washington, made it clear that the United States believed that Syria was providing assistance to insurgents operating in Iraq and that such help might have increased.

Government-controlled Syrian newspapers "glorify the terrorists as resistance fighters," he said. Syrian authorities "allow youngsters misguided by Al Qaeda - from Saudi Arabia, from Yemen, from North Africa - to fly into Damascus International Airport," attend training camps and then cross into Iraq, he contended.

Imad Moustapha, the Syrian ambassador to the United States, called Mr. Khalilzad's allegations "100 percent rubbish," and said Syria had repeatedly invited American and Iraqi officials to discuss the problem and find solutions. But, he added, neither country had responded.

"We have more troops on our border with Iraq than we have ever had before" as well as "sandbags, barbed wire," Mr. Moustapha said. "We understand the stakes are high."

The Americans, Ambassador Moustapha said, "just continue talking as if they're talking to a TV camera."

For all of Mr. Khalilzad's assertions and warnings, senior American officials said the government did not have any plans for new actions against Syria, except to "continue trying to isolate it, as we have been," as one senior State Department official put it.

Another government official said Bush administration policy was to "keep the heat on Syria, keep the criticism up."

He said the administration had picked up indications that the United Nations investigation of the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri in February might implicate senior Syrian government leaders. The chief United Nations investigator, Detlev Mehlis, arrived in Damascus on Monday to question senior Syrian officials.

If those indications prove true, the official added, the administration was poised to pounce on Syria and perhaps offer a new, critical resolution to the United Nations Security Council.

Mr. Khalilzad's statements, he added, fell into the general policy of "focusing more attention on Syria's negative activities."

DOJ_NMG_0004320

Mr. Khalilzad said insurgents were traveling to Damascus as well as to Latakia, a seaport, and Aleppo, near the border with Turkey. From these and other locations, "people are coming out from Syria to Iraq to kill Iraqis," he said.

"Syria has to decide what price it's willing to pay in making Iraq's success difficult," he added.

In addition to his remarks on Syria, Mr. Khalilzad offered an unusual plea for continued American support for Iraq, even as numerous recent public opinion polls have indicated that public support was waning, particularly after Hurricane Katrina.

"The American public needs to know that what's involved here is huge, as what we did with the Soviet Union was huge," he said. "Iraq is the centerpiece of the defining challenge of our time."

Mr. Khalilzad explained that during his confirmation hearings last summer, he "got a sense" of "a crisis of confidence, perhaps, in what we're doing in Iraq." Now, following Hurricane Katrina, he added, "I can understand" that "there will be a focus, as there should be, on dealing with that crisis."

Still, he spent several minutes trying to explain why Americans should care about Iraq.

"Iraq is part of this region that we call a vital part of the world" that is "producing most of the security problems of this era," he said. "And the way to deal with it is to get Iraq right, first."

Intel Chief: Iraqis In Insurgency More Elusive (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence is struggling to expose elements of the insurgency in Iraq made up of former members of Saddam Hussein's regime, John Negroponte, the nation's intelligence chief, said in an interview Monday.

Joint U.S.-Iraqi military efforts have damaged the network of foreign insurgents led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, though Zarqawi himself remains at large, Negroponte said. Indigenous Iraqi insurgents, led by former members of Saddam's ruling Baath Party, have been tougher to track down.

The “former regime elements … seem to have very good operational secrecy,” Negroponte said in a wide-ranging interview with USA TODAY reporters. “And thus far it's not been that easy to make a dent in that part of the insurgency.”

Though foreign fighters, mainly Sunni Muslim Arabs from Syria and Saudi Arabia, have grabbed headlines with suicide bombings that have killed hundreds of Iraqis, Negroponte said Iraqis dominate the insurgency. Despite intense focus on Iraq, where 138,000 U.S. troops are deployed, U.S. intelligence has not been able to produce anything more than a “speculative” estimate of the insurgency's size, he said.

Based on everything he has seen, Negroponte said, the insurgency is neither gaining strength nor weakening appreciably. The insurgency's stubborn resistance to U.S. and Iraqi military efforts has complicated the development of a democracy.

Negroponte became the nation's first director of national intelligence in April after nine months as U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Congress created the post last year in response to independent commissions that laid out major intelligence failures prior to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. He has spent much of his time in the job setting up special centers overseeing counterterrorism and weapons proliferation. “Mission managers” will be named soon for human intelligence, Iran and North Korea, Negroponte said.

Although the Office of the Director of National Intelligence was created in an atmosphere of urgency, “it's really a start-up organization,” he said. “It's work in progress.”

In his first media interview since assuming the intelligence post, Negroponte also said:

•Despite significant failures before 9/11 and the Iraq war, U.S. intelligence “is second to none compared to any other intelligence organization in the world.” His task is “making it even better.”

•Al-Qaeda, though weakened by the U.S.-led global war on terrorism, continues to plan and organize terrorist attacks and regards the U.S. homeland as its top-priority target. Western Europe, Negroponte said, is more vulnerable than the USA to al-Qaeda.

•A viable Iraqi government has been slow in getting organized because the war led to the “degradation … of virtually every single government department. … They basically had to start practically from scratch.”

Negroponte, 66, spoke in a secure room of his office's headquarters a block from the White House. A career diplomat with Foreign Service commissions signed by every president back to Dwight Eisenhower, Negroponte got his first overseas experience in South Vietnam in the early 1960s. He has been ambassador to Honduras, Mexico, the Philippines, the United Nations and Iraq.

When he appointed Negroponte, President Bush emphasized that the new chief needed broad powers over spending and personnel across military and civilian intelligence agencies.

Nevertheless, Negroponte said he cannot rule the 15 intelligence agencies "by fiat" but must "foster a strong sense of community" among organizations that have not always cooperated.

Negroponte said he is close to making a major decision on whether to go forward with a highly classified imagery intelligence network. According to Steve Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists, the program probably concerns a costly network of satellites capable of evading radar, reflecting a Defense Department concern about the possibility that an adversary might attempt to "blind" U.S. intelligence operations by attacking its satellites.

Negroponte praised Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for helping the "lash-up between domestic and foreign" intelligence, which the 9/11 Commission called a major contributor to lapses before 9/11.

Following the report of the so-called WMD Commission, which examined the incorrect prewar estimates that Iraq had chemical and biological weapons and an active nuclear weapons development program, Negroponte said he is creating new standards on rating the veracity of clandestine intelligence sources. He is also improving the description of sources behind intelligence assessments.

Why Iraq's Sunnis Won't Deal (WP)

By Gary Schmitt

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Despite efforts by Shiites, Kurds and U.S. officials to find a way for Iraq's Sunni Muslims to support the draft constitution, it seems less and less likely that a deal will be struck, which raises the question: Is there any road forward that leads to a stable, democratic Iraq?

The answer is yes. But it's not an easy path. Nor is it one that most commentators and diplomats seem to understand, let alone advocate. The reality is that a stable, democratic Iraq, with large-scale Sunni participation, is unlikely until the insurgency in Iraq is widely seen by the Sunnis themselves as not succeeding.

Of course, the Sunni Arabs of Iraq are not a monolith. Many of them want a new political order for their country, and many undoubtedly will participate in the coming referendum to vote the proposed constitution up or down. Indeed, there are even reports out of western Iraq that Sunnis are now fighting Abu Musab Zarqawi's fighters.

Nevertheless, to the mind of probably a majority of their leaders, the Sunnis face two fundamental choices, neither pleasant. They can accept the new constitution, in which, as a minority, they lose their long-held dominance over Iraq. Or they can continue to reject the constitution and hope that a prolonged insurgency will somehow bring them back to power. With jihadists willing to kill themselves in terrorist attacks and a ready supply of young, unemployed Iraqis willing to bury explosives and launch rocket attacks for a few dinar, the average member of the Sunni elite, even if not an active participant in the insurgency, could well believe that the resulting chaos and even occasional death of a neighbor or a member of his extended family is a price worth paying for a return to Sunni ascendancy.

In fact, too many Sunnis believe the insurgency and the threat of a prolonged insurgency are their hole cards to play. Irrespective of the fact that their demands cannot be met without losing, in turn, Iraq's critical majority -- the Shiites -- Sunni leaders still live in a world that is about past prominence and future expectations. And until a new reality is forced upon them, they are not likely to move from their current opposition to the constitution.

The proposed constitution ought to be reasonably attractive in many respects. The Sunni Arabs are a decided minority in Iraq, certainly no more than a quarter of the population. And the federalist features of the draft document may well be a better guardian of their rights than a unitary state in which majority rule would probably leave them routinely short of the voting strength necessary to have an effective say in their own governance. In addition, the new constitution provides for a distribution of oil revenue along per capita lines, preventing either the Kurdish north or Shiite south from hoarding the country's wealth. By any realistic metric for the Muslim Middle East, the constitution put forward by Iraq's constitutional drafters is about as good as it gets, and far better for the country's minorities than the Sunnis should have expected, given the ruthlessness of their own rule over the past several decades.

But whatever the constitution's merits, that is not how the majority of Sunni leaders sees things today. And only when they see that the insurgency stands no chance of succeeding and, equally important, they personally are not in danger of losing life and limb if they publicly support the new political order, will they come around to accepting a federal, democratic Iraq.

Contrary to most commentary, then, the key to succeeding in Iraq is no longer putting in place a grand political bargain in which Iraqis of all sectarian stripes live happily ever after. In fact, by suggesting that this is the goal, we probably have fueled the Sunnis' own misperception of their future status in Iraq and hardened their own position.

The goal, of course, is to create a political order by which Iraq is made relatively stable and the normal democratic politics of give-and-take are made possible. But that will be a decidedly uphill struggle until the prospect of a successful insurgency is taken off the table and the Sunni Arabs come to the understanding that the new constitution is, in practice, a pretty good deal after all.

Politics cannot solve what ails Iraq now. It can help, and certainly the constitution is an important step in that direction. But at the end of the day, it's only when the so-called dead-enders are either dead or vanquished that one can count on the political process moving decisively forward as most Iraqis desire.

U.S. Indicts Dutchman In Iraq Insurgency (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Federal prosecutors have indicted a Dutch resident for conspiring to kill members of the U.S. armed forces in Iraq -- the first criminal charges filed in connection with the insurgency against American forces in that country.

The indictment, filed Friday afternoon in U.S. District Court in Washington, charges Iraqi-born Wesam Delaema, 32, who is in Dutch custody, with conspiring to bomb U.S. convoys in Fallujah, Iraq.

Despite attacks every day against U.S. forces in Iraq, these are the first criminal charges to be filed against anyone involved with them. The United States government claims jurisdiction over terrorist slayings of U.S. citizens anywhere in the world.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for federal prosecutors in Washington, said the federal courts in the capital have jurisdiction over crimes committed in "the extraterritorial jurisdiction of the United States"; that the suspect was in the custody of a friendly power; and that there was clear evidence in the form of video recordings.

"Everything just came together for this one case," Mr. Phillips said, adding that prosecutors were preparing an extradition request.

A Dutch official at the embassy in Washington said extradition hearings could take up to a year, but that if the courts cleared the way, the government almost certainly would accede to the U.S. request.

"The minister [making the decision] will want to ensure that the Netherlands continues to be a good ally in the war on terror," said Richard Gerding, the counsel for justice and home affairs at the Royal Netherlands Embassy.

The indictment and other court documents say Mr. Delaema was arrested in May in the Dutch city of Amersfoort, after a search of his apartment turned up "videotapes and other visual recordings ... of numerous attacks against American and coalition personnel in Iraq."

The documents charge that authorities recovered video recordings that Mr. Delaema had made of a trip to Iraq in October 2003, when he drove to Fallujah, where U.S. authorities say he was born, in his car, an Opel Omega.

"While in Iraq," the documents say, "Delaema traveled to an area near Fallujah, Iraq, where he met with at least six other individuals.

"Delaema and his associates, each of whom wore a hooded mask over his head, created a video of their meeting" during which "Delaema gave a speech in Arabic" proclaiming his associates and himself as "the Mujahedin of Fallujah."

Mr. Delaema and his associates also videotaped themselves demonstrating how to bury improvised explosive devices under the road, and to detonate them by remote control.

On the video, they discussed the value of separating charges by 50 feet or more in order to strike more than one vehicle in the convoy, the documents say.

TV 'Cops' Reality Show Is Talk Of Kirkuk (WT/AP)

By Tini Tran, Associated Press

KIRKUK, Iraq -- Shattered glass, body parts, a blood-splattered blue sedan -- the grainy video pans over the scene as Iraqi officers comb the site of a drive-by assassination.

It's the Iraqi version of the television program "Cops," minus the "Bad Boys" soundtrack, but otherwise roughly modeled after the American show.

Created to make government more transparent, "The Cops Show," featuring Kirkuk officers in action, is the first of its kind in the country and is breaking new ground in Iraqi television. A live call-in portion gives the public the chance to praise the security forces or gripe about them.

Screened weekly on Kirkuk Television, which broadcasts in this northern city of nearly 1 million people, "The Cops Show" has opened the floodgates in a community long suppressed.

"During Saddam Hussein's time, it was very different," station manager Nasser Hassan Mohammed said. "You were unable to ask questions. You couldn't say anything bad about police.

"Now people can call in directly. Anyone has the right to do this. This is the difference now. This is freedom."

The call-in portion, initially a novelty, has become a staple of the show, and panelists field up to 30 calls per segment, Mr. Mohammed said. And because Kirkuk is ethnically mixed, the show switches among the languages spoken by Kurds, Arabs, Turkomen or Assyrians.

It took Iraqis a while to master the art of the phone-in.

"But after more than a year, they understand very well," Mr. Mohammed said.

Col. Gordon Petrie, the show's American military adviser, said it marks a new era for community-service television.

"There has been a sea change in media," said Col. Petrie, who heads public affairs for the 116th Brigade Combat Team. "Before 2003, it was all Saddam, all the time.

"Kirkuk, which was one of the largest TV stations, basically was robotic. They'd get the Baghdad feed and send it out again. Now they are in charge here."

Until January's landmark elections, the Americans "ran the shows, booked the guests, and tried to show them what community-service programming was about. But after Jan. 30, we became the monitors. They haven't disappointed us," Col. Petrie said.

The show also aims to change a Saddam-era image of police as corrupt, inept and unapproachable.

"The first thing we wanted was to show friendship between citizens and police. They are not your enemy. They are your friend," Mr. Mohammed said.

Provincial police Chief Gen. Sherko Shakir has appeared as a guest several times. His spokesman, Abdullah Abdul-Qadir, is host and moderator. During a recent taping, the panelists included Kirkuk's police chief, Gen. Burhan Taha, and two local police station commanders.

The show opened with graphic videotape of the body of an off-duty police captain, assassinated just days after his wedding. Gen. Taha decried the shooting as a "cowardly job" and urged the public to help.

"Don't be afraid. Give tips anonymously. That way, you can stop bad activities," he said.

Callers were just as quick to demand more of their local police force.

"I was standing on the main road near bridge No. 3. I saw some criminal activity. We don't have security in our area. Sometimes, we have to secure the area by ourselves," one man said.

The show's popularity has not gone unnoticed by its enemies, and the studios are heavily guarded. The station's employees regularly get threats, Mr. Mohammed said, adding that he himself was hit by more than two dozen bullets during an assassination attempt in May 2004.

The station remains undeterred, the station manager said.

"After liberation, many things changed. Many dreams were realized. We use freedom and democracy," he said. "Our duty is to show people that freedom."

Pakistan Offers To Build Security Fence (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Chafing under criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to fight terrorism, President Pervez Musharraf offered Monday to build a security fence to deter militants and drug merchants from entering the country from Afghanistan. "We are fed up with people who say Pakistan has to do more to counter terrorism," Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri said. Osama bin Laden is believed to be hiding in the border area.

Musharraf made the offer at a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "We think it is important that Pakistan and Afghanistan take up this idea." President Bush meets with Musharraf today.

Protestants riot for third night in Belfast

Protestants blocked roads in Belfast, Northern Ireland, and rioted for the third straight night. At least 50 officers were wounded over the weekend when extremists fought riot police and British troops in the worst Protestant violence in a decade. The rampage followed British authorities' decision Saturday to reroute a parade by the Orange Order, Northern Ireland's major Protestant brotherhood, off the main road.

It's official: Japan's ruling party wins

Japan's ruling Liberal Democratic Party won 296 seats in the 480-seat lower house of parliament in last week's election, well above the 241 needed for a majority, according to official results released today. Bolstered by seats from its ally, the New Komei Party, the coalition garnered 327 seats. That gives it the two-thirds majority needed to override votes in the upper house, said Kiyoko Seki of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications. Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi called the elections last month after the upper house rejected his plan to privatize the postal service.

Father, son hijack plane, then surrender

A father in a wheelchair and his son used two grenades to hijacked a Colombian airliner but peacefully surrendered five hours later after allowing the crew and passengers to leave the plane, said Martin Gonzalez, spokesman for the Civil Aviation Authority.

The freed hostages said that the elder hijacker had said he was partially paralyzed by a police bullet during a drug raid 14 years ago and had unsuccessfully sought compensation. Sen. Carlos Moreno, who helped negotiate the standoff, said the man was given a $43,000 check but the government won't honor it.

Ukraine's former PM vows comeback

Ukraine's ousted prime minister said President Viktor Yushchenko had become afraid of her growing popularity and she predicted she would regain her job after March elections. Yulia Tymoshenko said she expected that her bloc would win a majority in March and, under constitutional changes to take effect next year, that the prime minister would be chosen by the parliamentary majority, not by the president. Yushchenko dismissed Tymoshenko and her Cabinet on Thursday amid allegations of corruption that he said had sidetracked the pro-Western "Orange Revolution" that swept them to power in December.

Zimbabwe curbs constitutional rights

Zimbabwe President Robert Mugabe has signed into law constitutional changes he said would settle any dispute over the legality of seizing white-owned farms. During a state visit to Cuba, Mugabe said he had approved the laws passed two weeks ago by the parliament. One strips landowners of their right to appeal expropriation and declares that all real estate is on a 99-year lease from the government. Another lets the government deny passports to its critics. The opposition Movement for Democratic Change denounced the changes as "a dark day for Zimbabwean democracy."

21 Afghan Candidates Disqualified For Ties To Militias (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 12 -- Twenty-one candidates running in Afghanistan's upcoming legislative election have been disqualified for maintaining links to illegal armed militias and seven more for failing to resign from government posts, the joint Afghan and international Electoral Complaints Commission announced Monday.

The move, six days before the Sunday vote, followed dismay among many Afghans over the commission's decision two months ago to exclude only 11 of nearly 6,000 candidates on the basis of failure to disarm. Six others were barred for retaining official positions.

The voting will be Afghanistan's first parliamentary election in more than two decades. The electorate is to choose 249 representatives for the lower house of parliament as well as members of 34 provincial councils that will help select the upper house.

The latest disqualifications did not satisfy human rights advocates who have expressed concern that the field of contenders is rife with warlords who committed well-documented atrocities during warfare that began in 1978.

"We're definitely happy to see more names excluded, and to see some mid-ranking names this time as opposed to just district-level people," said Joanna Nathan, Afghanistan director of the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based advocacy organization. "But there's still widespread disappointment that the big names are not on there."

Nathan said officials in Kabul consider these people untouchable for "reasons of national stability. The past abusers are the ones who continue to abuse power today."

Grant Kippen, chairman of the electoral commission, countered that the body did not have the power to disqualify a candidate on grounds of war crimes unless there had been a conviction. That is a virtual impossibility because Afghanistan has no war crimes tribunals.

"We can't deal with complaints that are simply allegations," Kippen said. "Our mandate is to deal with offenses under electoral law. We're not a criminal court."

Kippen said the commission relied on the recommendations of a disarmament commission that includes representatives of the Afghan government, the United Nations, the U.S. military and a NATO-led international force to determine which candidates retained associations with banned armed groups.

Nathan and other rights advocates have complained that the commission is dominated by the government of President Hamid Karzai and that its work is largely secret. "It's all about bargaining behind closed doors," Nathan said. Although the 21 excluded candidates came from a variety of provinces and ethnic groups, none is considered close to Karzai.

One of the candidates whose disqualification was announced Monday, a 46-year-old man using the single name Deedar, said he was never shown the evidence against him. "This is not a real and fair election. It's just like a show to deceive people," said Deedar, who is running for a seat in the lower house from the central Kabul district.

During his campaign, Deedar emphasized his past as a fighter against Soviet troops, who operated in Afghanistan from 1979 to 1989, while playing down his role as a low-level commander during the rule of the Islamic Taliban movement that took power in the mid-1990s. Deedar has denied belonging to the Taliban but acknowledges commanding men from his own tribe who sometimes helped the Taliban. Several former Taliban officials said he led more than 100 men from a base in Kabul.

Several months ago, Deedar, who has spent most of his time in Pakistan since the Taliban's ouster in 2001, was able to return to Afghanistan under a government program to reintegrate former Taliban members who are willing to pledge allegiance to the government.

On Monday, Deedar said his disqualification from the parliamentary race would discourage others from taking part in the program. "People who want to reconcile will look at my case and conclude that it's hopeless," he said.

He also predicted that he and other excluded candidates could still technically win, since it is too late to take their names off ballots. "I've tried to reach my supporters to let them know I'm no longer eligible. But many of them still don't know," he said. "And I am very popular."

Army Expects To Miss Goals For Recruiting (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 (Reuters) - The Army posted its best recruiting month in four years in August, but will still miss its annual recruiting goal for the first time since 1999, officials said Monday.

In August, the regular Army sent more recruits to boot camp than in any other month since July 2001. But the part-time Army National Guard and Army Reserve both missed their monthly goals and will fall far short of their annual goals for the 2005 fiscal year, which ends this month.

The regular Army, which is aiming for 80,000 recruits this year, was behind its year-to-date goal by the end of August, with too big a deficit to make up through September's recruiting, officials said.

The Marine Corps made its August goal and was 2 percent ahead of its year-to-date goal. The Air Force and Navy both achieved their targets.

Reflecting the regular Army's struggle, the situation was worse in the National Guard, which is under the command of state governors, and in the Reserve. These part-time troops can be called to active duty by the Pentagon; they now make up about 40 percent of the United States force in Iraq.

The Army National Guard has missed its recruiting targets every month this fiscal year and appeared certain to miss its third straight annual recruiting goal.

The Guard missed its recruiting goal by 18 percent in August and was 12,683, or 22 percent, behind its year-to-date goal. Its recruiting goal for this fiscal year is 63,002.

The Army Reserve, which last missed an annual goal in 1999, was short of its August target by 9 percent and was 19 percent behind its year-to-date target. It will also miss its 2005 goal of 28,485 recruits.

The Army has attributed the recruiting shortfalls to a growing wariness about military service because of the Iraq war and an economy that was creating more civilian jobs.

The Army has increased financial incentives for enlistment, added recruiters and bought advertisements appealing to patriotism.

In July, the Pentagon asked Congress to raise the maximum age for military enlistment to 42. The ceiling now is 35 for active duty and 39 for the Reserves or National Guard.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UPDATE: OFHEO Settles Administrative Case Against Freddie (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, September 12, 2005

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Freddie Mac's (FRE) (FRE) regulator settled its case against the company for failing to properly penalize former top executives in 2003 after Freddie discovered widespread accounting problems and evidence of earnings manipulation, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight announced Monday.

The company agreed Friday to turn over new documents and to help OFHEO pursue separate cases against Freddie's former Chief Executive Leland Brendsel and former Chief Financial Officer Vaughn Clarke.

Freddie is still struggling to emerge from an accounting scandal that resulted in a clean sweep of the company's senior management team, an overhaul of internal controls, an earnings restatement of more than $5 billion, multiple shareholder lawsuits and federal regulatory probes. OFHEO is the only regulator to settle its case against Freddie, which agreed to pay OFHEO $125 million and agreed to other remedial actions in December 2003 to settle charges of safety and soundness violations.

OFHEO, however, filed separate charges against Freddie Mac (FRE), Brendsel and Clarke that month seeking cease-and-desist orders from an administrative law judge to force the company to alter its termination agreements with the two men and to impose fines against them. Freddie's board of directors allowed Brendsel to retire and Clarke to resign in June 2003 with roughly $56 million and $1.2 million in severance and other pay, respectively.

OFHEO's settlement with Freddie, which was signed Friday, only settles the regulator's administrative case against the company regarding the nature of Brendsel and Clarke's departures. Parallel investigations related to Freddie's accounting troubles by the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission and others, are still pending.

All told, Brendsel stands to lose at least $34 million, including $24.4 million in lost severance and benefits, $5.8 million in fines and $3.8 million in past bonuses. Clarke's potential losses are substantially less - $3.9 million, two-thirds of which was a fine.

Freddie temporarily withheld some of the executives' pay at OFHEO's urging. A judge, however, ruled about a year ago that OFHEO's informal directive was illegal and required the company to release Brendsel's pay pending the outcome of OFHEO's enforcement actions against the executives.

"We have consistently made clear that we will comply with any valid and effective order from OFHEO. Under the consent order today we're simply agreeing to implement any final order that results from the pending proceedings between OFHEO and Brendsel and Clarke," Freddie Mac (FRE) spokeswoman Sharon McHale said.

Freddie agreed to turn over to OFHEO more internal documents, including the company's "earnings management" binders, materials on executive compensation, internal reports on the company's accounting and materials produced by outside consultants, among other things. OFHEO specifically requested internal documents by consulting firm McKinsey & Co. on derivatives accounting rules as well as all documents relating to McKinsey's consulting work on "MRE Accountabilities and Staffing v. Best Practices."

OFHEO also asked for a number of internal documents relating to the company's reaudit, including internal audit reports and board meeting minutes recorded after Freddie's board ousted Brendsel and Clarke and fired former Chief Operating Officer David Glenn.

Freddie agreed to convert Brendsel's and Clarke's departures to firings only if OFHEO prevails in its court cases against the men. The company said it would also try to recoup their severance pay, within legal bounds, only if OFHEO additionally orders Freddie to do so. OFHEO is pursuing separate enforcement actions against the men in legal action before an administrative law judge at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, OFHEO's parent regulator.

If OFHEO prevails, the agreement will make it easier for OFHEO to enforce penalties against Brendsel and Clarke since Freddie waived its rights to appeal or challenge the administrative court's decision.

"This settlement with the company is a significant step forward and allows us to focus our resources on the cases against former (Freddie) officers," OFHEO acting Director Stephen Blumenthal said in a statement announcing the deal Monday.

For Freddie, which didn't admit or deny any wrongdoing, the settlement brings to close all potential enforcement action or penalties OFHEO could have imposed on the company for not penalizing Brendsel and Clarke for their involvement in Freddie's accounting problems.

Freddie Mac To Aid Effort To Recover Millions From Ex-Officers (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Freddie Mac, the mortgage reseller recovering from an accounting scandal, will assist federal regulators in their effort to recover millions of dollars in benefits and bonuses paid to two of its former executives, under terms of a settlement made public yesterday by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight.

The agreement comes nearly two years after Freddie Mac, which buys mortgages from lenders and resells them to investors as securities, paid a $125 million penalty to settle charges related to its accounting, as part of a related settlement with its regulator, known as Ofheo.

"This settlement with the company is a significant step forward and allows us to focus our resources on the cases against former officers," Stephen A. Blumenthal, acting director of Ofheo, said in a statement.

The two executives in question are Leland C. Brendsel, the former chief executive at Freddie Mac, and Vaughn A. Clarke, its former chief financial officer. Both men left Freddie Mac in June 2003, several months into an expanding investigation of the company's accounting.

Regulators began proceedings in December 2003 to force Freddie Mac to treat Mr. Brendsel and Mr. Clarke as if they were fired, which would have made them ineligible for millions of dollars in benefits and bonuses they received when they left the company.

Ofheo is trying to force the executives to return that money.

According to an Ofheo spokeswoman, if Mr. Brendsel loses the case entirely, he could have to pay at least $34 million, and if Mr. Clarke loses, he could have to pay at least $4 million. Some of the money would go to the company and any civil penalties would be paid to the Treasury Department.

Lawyers for Mr. Brendsel and Mr. Clarke did not return phone calls yesterday afternoon. The case against both men is before an administrative law judge and both sides are gathering evidence, according to Ofheo and Freddie Mac.

David Palombi, a spokesman for Freddie Mac, said the consent decree merely codified the company's longstanding position on the litigation by regulators. "We have consistently made clear that we would comply with any valid order from the regulator," Mr. Palombi said. "We have simply agreed, in effect, to implement any final order" that results from the legal proceedings against Mr. Brendsel and Mr. Clarke, he said.

As part of the agreement with Ofheo, Freddie Mac will provide to the agency copies of the same documents it gave to lawyers who brought shareholder lawsuits against it.

The company will also help make employees available for interviews by the agency and will provide various internal documents, such as explanations of how executives' bonuses were calculated.

Freddie Mac's accounting woes began when its results were questioned in 2003 by PricewaterhouseCoopers, which the year before had replaced the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, which is now defunct.

In November 2003, Freddie Mac restated its earnings for 2000, 2001 and the first three quarters of 2002, revising them upward by nearly $5 billion.

In a report on the questionable accounting, Ofheo found that "Freddie Mac cast aside accounting rules, internal controls, disclosure standards and the public trust in the pursuit of steady earnings growth."

Yesterday, shares of Freddie Mac closed at $59.04, up 99 cents.

The accounting scandal at Freddie Mac and another at its larger corporate sibling, Fannie Mae, has led some to call for stronger regulation of the two companies.

Jury Convicts Westar Ex-Officials Of Looting Millions From Utility (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

KANSAS CITY, Kan. -- A federal jury found former Westar Energy Inc. Chief Executive Officer David Wittig and another executive guilty of looting the electric utility of millions of dollars.

Prosecutors claimed the two men, who were forced out of the Topeka, Kan., company in 2002, engineered extravagant salaries and benefits for themselves at the expense of shareholders, hiding much of their actions from the company's board and federal regulators.

Mr. Wittig and former Chief Strategy Officer Douglas Lake were found guilty of conspiracy, wire fraud, circumventing internal controls and money laundering.

The jury deliberated for 7½ days before convicting Mr. Wittig on 39 counts and Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Each count of wire fraud, the most serious of the charges, is punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of as much as $1 million. Testimony about whether the government can recover money from the executives is expected to start Tuesday.

Attorneys on both sides declined to comment immediately after the verdicts. Messrs. Wittig and Lake have denied the charges, saying their actions were legal, approved by the company's directors, and disclosed in corporate filings.

Mr. Wittig, who became chief executive of Westar in 1998, helped to turn the Midwest utility into a fast-paced deal machine and hired Mr. Lake, a former colleague of his at what was then Salomon Brothers, to become his deputy. Mr. Wittig earned more than $25 million in his seven years at the company.

After some success, Westar's deal frenzy began to falter. The company's stock price fell from $44 to $9 and the company came under pressure from shareholders and regulators. In September 2002, Westar hired the New York law firm Debevoise & Plimpton LLP to conduct an internal investigation, which uncovered many of the details in the grand jury indictment.

The former executives' first trial ended in mistrial last year after jurors were unable to reach a consensus on more than half of the charges.

Ellison Agrees To Pay Charity To Settle Suit (WP)

By Ben White

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Oracle Corp. chief executive Lawrence J. Ellison tentatively agreed to pay $100 million to charity over five years to settle a private lawsuit in California accusing him of insider trading in Oracle stock, a plaintiff's lawyer in the case said yesterday.

Plaintiffs in the suit alleged that Ellison engaged in insider trading when he sold nearly $900 million worth of Oracle shares in January 2001, a little more than a month before the company announced poor earnings. Oracle shares fell 21 percent, to $16.88, after the announcement. Ellison had sold his stock for a little less than twice that amount.

The proposed settlement, reported yesterday by the New York Times and the San Jose Mercury News, must be approved by Oracle's board and a California judge. If approved, the deal would end what is known as a shareholder derivative lawsuit, an increasingly common type of civil case in which shareholders file suit on behalf of a company.

Monetary settlements in derivative cases have typically been small, and most of the money usually goes to plaintiff's attorneys. Companies often agree to make changes to the way they operate in order to settle the suits.

Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., an attorney for plaintiffs in the case, said the charity payments represent a compromise between the two sides. He said Oracle shareholders would benefit because the company will implement new insider-trading rules as part of the settlement.

A Delaware judge last year dismissed a similar derivative case against Ellison. A class-action suit stemming in part from the stock sales is pending in federal court. A trial judge dismissed the federal case, but an appeals court reinstated it.

Tabacco said Ellison may have chosen to settle the California derivative suit because the legal bar for proving insider trading appears to be lower in California than in Delaware. California law also provides for damages of up to three times the difference between the price at which someone buys or sells a stock and what the price would have been had the inside information been public. That left Ellison open to a potential judgment of $1.2 billion.

Tabacco said that as part of the deal, Oracle would pay $22.5 million to plaintiff's lawyers. An Oracle spokeswoman declined to comment. Forbes magazine last year estimated Ellison's worth at $13.7 billion. He owns about 1.3 billion Oracle shares, or 24.5 percent of the company's stock, according to a recent filing.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Costly Price Of Facing A Grand Jury (WP)

By Sam Coates

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Sympathy can be hard to come by for White House officials who are summoned to appear before a grand jury.

Those whose identities remain a secret suffer in silence, discouraged from reaching out to their closest friends for help. Those whose names leak into the public domain become lightning rods for rumor, suspicion and innuendo, as politicians, commentators and journalists try to divine a meaning behind each summons.

The latest White House staffer to face the grand jury is Susan B. Ralston, assistant to White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who gave testimony to the committee investigating the leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame.

But while the politics of every appearance is picked over in minute detail, there is also a human story to each summons that often goes unexplored.

Witnesses face stress, uncertainty and -- worst of all -- crippling lawyer's fees that can take years to pay off. And as prosecutors cast their net ever wider, inexperienced staffers with few financial assets are increasingly facing the emotional and financial burden of grand jury testimony.

Ralston appeared at the end of July on the same day as former Rove aide Israel "Izzy" Hernandez, according to ABC News. The reason Ralston, 37, was asked to testify remains unclear, but it has heightened suspicions that the locus of the investigation still centers on Rove.

Ralston declined to discuss her interview with the grand jury for this article, or the burden that it has caused. Friends said she had not spoken with them about it.

Americans for Tax Reform President Grover G. Norquist, who described himself as a friend and a work contact, said he was not aware that she had even testified. "It hasn't come up, and I haven't noticed anything, in work or other contact. I think she's right as rain. On the other hand, I haven't had a conversation about it with her," he said.

But veterans of past grand jury appearances -- including the investigation into President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky -- said that keeping silent compounded an already difficult process.

"It was an incredibly callous and demoralizing experience, one in which they gave no thought to the personal or financial ramifications," said Neel Lattimore, former press secretary to first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, who was subpoenaed about 10 times during his tenure on the job. "Nothing prepares you for what it's like."

Another former Clinton administration official who is now in the private sector and did not want to be identified agreed. "It paralyzes you from doing your job. It turns your life upside down. I sat outside one grand jury room where I could hear the prosecutors screaming -- I'm not kidding -- screaming at a colleague of mine who was a witness."

The two former Clinton aides said that the financial burden was crippling. Like many others, these White House officials had to pay their own legal bills, and these can run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Some may qualify for a partial reimbursement from the Justice Department, but this usually covers a fraction of the outlay and can take as many as seven years to be paid out. White House aides are even barred from receiving free legal assistance.

"We spent our time on Capitol Hill, and none of us had any assets. It's a scary thing. Lots of people rented apartments, had no assets to their name," said the former Clinton staffer. "If you have a career in public service, you're being paid well under $100,000 a year, and you have student loans, you become paralyzed financially."

Lattimore said that he had to turn to his parents, who loaned him money to cover his legal fees. Lattimore's lawyer, Adam S. Hoffinger, said that the bill for representing someone in a grand jury investigation is usually large. "A white-collar grand jury investigation in D.C. or New York could cost a witness between $10,000 and $100,000 dollars, assuming no trial and no criminal exposure," he wrote in an e-mail.

According to a White House report to Congress, Ralston's salary last year was $67,600. In an interview last September with Asian Week, she said that she took a "significant pay cut" in 2001 from her job working with a prominent lobbyist.

Both former Clinton staffers who were asked to appear in the grand jury investigation said there was one silver lining to their experience. They both discovered that there was an informal support network of former White House employees who had been through the grand jury process that transcended party politics.

"There were people from the Reagan administration who reached out to me in the Clinton administration to say it was going to be okay and to say we've been through this," said the former Clinton staffer.

Lattimore cited Margaret Tutwiler, a long-term aide of James A. Baker III, who was caught up during the 1992 campaign in an investigation into Clinton's overseas trips as a student. He said she "expressed real sympathy and said hang in there. There was very much a sense of fraternity among White House employees no matter what side of the aisle."

FBI Intel Analyst Charged With Spying (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeffrey Gold, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 13, 2005

(AP) - NEWARK, N.J.-An FBI intelligence analyst with top secret clearance who worked at a New Jersey Army base was charged Monday with passing classified information about Filipino leaders to current and former officials of that nation.

The analyst, Leandro Aragoncillo, sent some of the material to Michael Ray Aquino, a former deputy director of the Philippines National Police who lives in New York City, according to an FBI complaint unsealed with the arrests.

Aragoncillo, 46, of Woodbury, was hired to work at Fort Monmouth in July 2004 and began sending classified information and documents in January, according to the complaint.

From May to Aug. 15, Aragoncillo printed or downloaded 101 classified documents relating to the Philippines, of which 37 were classified "secret," the complaint said. Details of the documents' contents were not disclosed in court papers or in court.

The investigation by immigration authorities began after Aquino, 39, was arrested in March, accused of overstaying the tourist visa he used to enter the country in July 2001.

Aragoncillo, a Marine for 21 years, and Aquino were ordered held without bail following an appearance before a federal magistrate.

The defendants face a charge of conspiracy and a charge of acting as unregistered foreign agents, the latter of which carries a sentence of up to 10 years and a $250,000 fine. Aragoncillo also was charged with unauthorized use of a government computer, which carries a sentence of up to 10 years and a $250,000 fine.

9th Circuit: Warrantless Searches Must Be Warranted (LAW)

By Pam Smith, The Recorder

Law.com, September 13, 2005

Even if a defendant agrees to warrantless searches in exchange for pretrial release, police still can't search him without probable cause, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday.

In a victory for the privacy rights of defendants awaiting trial while on their own recognizance, a 2-1 majority threw out evidence Nevada authorities had received by testing Raymond Scott for drugs without probable cause.

True, Scott had consented to random drug testing "by any peace officer without a warrant." But because the government did not have probable cause -- and could not show a "special need" to lower the bar -- the drug test violated Scott's Fourth Amendment rights, 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski wrote for the majority.

The panel says its opinion is one of first impression among all the federal circuit courts, and the dissenting judge predicted a widespread impact on federal and state pretrial proceedings.

By holding that probable cause is required for the warrantless search of a pretrial "releasee" or his home, "the majority casually adopts a rule that carries monumental implications for the pretrial procedures employed by every state in our circuit, as well as the United States," wrote 9th Circuit Judge Jay Bybee.

Scott was facing state charges of drug possession when he was released on his own recognizance, subject to several conditions, including warrantless drug and alcohol testing.

An informant's tip led authorities to check in on him at home, and when he tested positive for methamphetamine, they arrested him, searched his house and found a shotgun. A federal grand jury indicted him for illegal possession of the firearm, a federal district judge granted Scott's request to suppress the evidence and federal prosecutors appealed.

"Until today's decision we have not squarely addressed whether pretrial releasees have diminished Fourth Amendment rights," Bybee wrote.

Kozinski, backed by concurring 9th Circuit Judge William Fletcher, contrasted Scott's situation with that of probationers, who must submit to similar searches, writing, "Pretrial releasees are ordinary people who have been accused of a crime but are presumed innocent."

In a footnote, Kozinski added that while some of their freedoms, like the whim to travel, may still be limited, the 9th Circuit was considering "whether the accused may be made to suffer other burdens that are not designed to ensure his appearance in court."

Bybee disagreed, saying that the interests of the state should be weighed against the privacy interests of a defendant on pretrial release on a case-by-case basis.

"Scott's reasonable expectation of privacy may be somewhat greater than that of a probationer, parolee or pre-sentence releasee, but it is less than that of an 'ordinary citizen,'" Bybee wrote. And he lowered his own expectation of privacy when he agreed to the conditions of his own-recognizance release, Bybee added.

While Bybee says the majority opinion "carries monumental implications" for states that regularly make defendants facing drug charges agree to drug testing in exchange for O.R. release, Assistant Federal Public Defender Cynthia Hahn, who argued for Scott, isn't so sure.

It's difficult to predict how many cases could be affected by the opinion, she said, because Fourth Amendment cases can depend on so many case-specific facts. "I really couldn't even guesstimate how many people it could affect or won't affect," she said.

The U.S. Attorney for the District of Nevada has not decided whether to appeal, said spokeswoman Natalie Collins, who declined to comment further on the opinion.

The case is U.S. v. Scott, 05 C.D.O.S. 8214.

AU's Audit Of Spending By President To Wrap Up (WP)

By Valerie Strauss And Susan Kinzie

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

American University trustees are nearing completion of a probe into hundreds of thousands of dollars of questionable expenses by suspended President Benjamin Ladner and his wife, according to two sources with knowledge of the audit.

The school's 25-member governing Board of Trustees will meet within a few weeks to discuss the results and decide how to proceed with Ladner, who became president of the private university in Northwest Washington in 1994.

Ladner was placed on administrative leave Aug. 24, a few months after the board began reviewing the expenses of the president and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner, who is described on the university's Web site as a volunteer who represents the Ladner presidency.

Ladner's duties are being carried out by the acting president, Cornelius M. Kerwin, who had been provost.

The audit was prompted by an anonymous letter detailing what it said were questionable travel and entertainment expenses by the Ladners, according to sources close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect their role.

Ladner did not return repeated phone calls. His attorney, David Ogden, said that after reviewing the issues involved in the audit, "we are confident that it will result in a positive outcome for him."

Leslie E. Bains, the new chairman of the board under whom the investigation was launched, did not return numerous phone calls, and other trustees would not publicly discuss the probe.

A third source familiar with the investigation said that trustees were reviewing $300,000 to $400,000 in expenses over several years but that the total could be higher. Included was the use of a university car for personal reasons, the source said.

Reginald Green, one of Ladner's former chauffeurs, said the Ladners often used the university car for personal reasons, including requiring him to take in and pick up their laundry and the work shirts of their chef. Ladner hired the chef early in his tenure, raising eyebrows at the time about his spending.

Ladner's base salary last year was $633,000, according to Internal Revenue Service records.

Bankruptcy Clerk Accused Of Taking Bribe In FBI Sting (DAILYST)

By Chris Hack

Daily Southtown, September 13, 2005

A bankruptcy court clerk from Chicago's South Side has been charged with extortion, accused of accepting a bribe in an FBI sting.

Sandra D. Butler, 42, of the 1400 block of East 66th Place, was charged with a single count of extortion in a criminal complaint made public Monday.

Butler has been a clerk at U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Chicago since 1985. As a clerk she was assigned to a bankruptcy judge and handled paperwork from debtors filing bankruptcy petitions.

According to an FBI affidavit, agents first began investigating Butler three years ago after a debtor complained she had paid the clerk $5,000 to stop the foreclosure proceedings against her house but later learned the bribe was unnecessary. Under federal bankruptcy law, the filing of a Chapter 13 petition automatically stops any foreclosure proceedings on the homes of debtors.

Earlier this month, FBI agents filed a bogus Chapter 13 in Butler's courtroom and sent a fake debtor to see her. The undercover witness — who was wearing an audio and visual surveillance device — said his mortgage lender in Kentucky had initiated foreclosure proceedings and that he needed help saving his home, the FBI said.

After looking up the man's bankruptcy petition, Butler allegedly said she could make some phone calls "off the record" to stop the sale of his house, the FBI said. She pretended to call the Kentucky lender — which was fictitious — and then accepted $500 in cash from the man, according to the complaint.

Butler appeared briefly before a federal magistrate Monday and was released on her own recognizance.

Debtor Court Aide Charged In Scam (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 13, 2005

Prosecutors charged a courtroom deputy in U.S. Bankruptcy Court with attempted extortion Monday, alleging she solicited $500 from a debtor by promising to halt the sale of the debtor's house.

Authorities said Sandra Butler, 42, of the 1400 block of East 66th Place in Chicago, did not know that the debtor was working undercover with the FBI and that the bankruptcy case was part of a sting operation.

Butler had no power to influence the bankruptcy proceeding, but she acted otherwise, even pretending to call the debtor's bank to negotiate a more favorable repayment plan, according to an affidavit filed by FBI agent Kenneth Samuel. According to the affidavit, Butler, talking into a phone earlier this month, "asserted that she knew [the debtor] very well" and that while the amount "is supposed to be 10 percent, that was all [he] had."

Butler then led the debtor to her office, where she took the money, according to the affidavit.

Butler appeared Monday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Sidney Schenkier. She was allowed to remain free on a $4,500 bail, and a court date was set for Sept. 27.

Butler was employed by Ken Gardner, clerk of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Chicago, and was assigned to the courtroom of Judge Jacqueline P. Cox. Gardner said he fired Butler from the $69,000-a-year job Monday morning.

"I'm shocked this would occur in the courthouse," Gardner said. "I'm shocked this would occur with someone working for me."

Butler had worked for the clerk's office since 1985 and had been assigned to Cox's courtroom for about two years, Gardner said. Bankruptcy Court officials cooperated with the sting operation, according to the affidavit.

The FBI became suspicious of Butler in August 2002, when a debtor in a bankruptcy case told them Butler had asked for $5,000 to stop the sale of her home, according to Samuel's affidavit. The debtor in that case later learned the money wasn't used for that purpose and contacted the FBI.

In the sting operation, FBI officials filed a fake bankruptcy case, giving the debtor a false name, Stanley Kozubal, and listing his home as an address in Des Plaines. The bankruptcy filing said Kozubal owed $130,000 to a bank in Kentucky.

The undercover witness was wearing an audio and video recording device when he went to Butler's office at the beginning of the month, according to the affidavit. He said he was afraid to lose his home and asked Butler for help.

"Butler responded that she could `off the record' make some phone calls to try and stop the sale of his property," Samuel said in the affidavit. "Butler asked the [debtor] if he had any `funds today.'"

Officials in U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald's office would not elaborate on Samuel's affidavit. A federal defender representing Butler could not be reached for comment.

Gardner said Monday that it was the first case of alleged corruption by a courtroom deputy in his four years as clerk.

DOJ_NMG_0004334

Gardner said he would consider reforms. But he said that court rules already make clear that only staff at the court's intake window can collect money and that "there should be no transacting of money in the courtroom."

Prison Officials Investigated (TD)

By Bill Cotterell

Tallahassee Democrat, September 13, 2005

State and federal authorities are investigating the activities of prison officials in North Florida, where the regional director for the state Department of Corrections abruptly resigned last month.

FBI and state officials said Monday that no one has been arrested or indicted in the investigation, which has been the subject of heated discussion among corrections employees on computer bulletin boards and e-mail networks.

"There is an ongoing investigation regarding the Department of Corrections," FBI Special Agent Jeff Westcott said from Jacksonville. He declined to comment on specifics. The Florida Department of Law Enforcement, which also is involved in the investigation, declined to comment.

Allen Clark, Panhandle director of institutions, resigned without explanation Aug. 30. He supervised operations at 18 major prisons from Jefferson County to the Alabama line. Attempts to reach him and other North Florida prison officials were unsuccessful.

A corrections spokesman said Monday that he knew nothing except what was in Clark's four-sentence resignation letter. Gov. Jeb Bush, when asked about the inquiry, smiled and shrugged off the question. "How am I going to tell you that?" he asked. "That's a no-no."

The case is not related to the indictment last week of Allan Duffee, director of the now-defunct Correctional Privatization Commission, which was set up to oversee Florida's five privately run prisons. Duffee pleaded not guilty to federal accusations of skimming nearly $225,000 from a maintenance fund.

Clark's resignation letter expressed "great regret" but gave no reason for his departure.

"It has been a pleasure serving as Region I director of institutions," he wrote to Department of Corrections Secretary James Crosby. "I have made many friends over the years and wish you and the employees of the department much continued success."

Al Solomon, warden of the Apalachee Correctional Institution near Sneads, has been named interim chief for the region. Solomon, too, declined to comment on Clark.

Ford Gets Permission To Attend Conference In Washington (AP)

AP, September 13, 2005

MEMPHIS, Tenn. An indictment on bribery and extortion charges won't keep former state Senator John Ford from attending a convention of black business and political leaders in Washington, D-C.Ford, of Memphis, will attend the conference September 21st to 26th to look for new clients for his private consulting business.

U-S District Court Judge Daniel Breen gave Ford permission to leave the state for the convention.Since Ford is on bond awaiting trial, he cannot leave Tennessee without a judge's O-K.

Ford's work as a consultant for a TennCare subcontractor while still in the Senate was at the center of a debate on ethics that dominated much of the latest session of the General Assembly.

Ford is charged with bribery and extortion in an unrelated investigation focused on an F-B-I front company that sought favorable legislation from the General Assembly. He also is charged with threatening a federal witness.

Ford resigned from the Senate shortly after his indictment.

Ex-senator To Seek Consulting Work At Black Leaders' Meeting (TENN)

By BONNA de la CRUZ, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004335

Former state Sen. John Ford is planning a trip to Washington, D.C., to attend a black leaders' conference to drum up business for his private consulting business, according to court papers.

The Memphis Democrat, who is under house arrest on federal bribery and intimidation charges, got a judge's permission to travel to the "35th Annual Legislature Conference for Black Leaders and Businessmen."

In his request, he said his "ability to conduct his business on a national basis is necessary to offset the difficulties which have arisen locally due to negative publicity."

No listing for the "35th Annual Legislature Conference for Black Leaders and Businessmen" could be found, but the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation Inc.'s Annual Legislative Conference is in its 35th year and is being held Sept. 21-24 in Washington.

Ford was indicted in May — along with three other sitting lawmakers, a former senator and two bagmen — in Operation Tennessee Waltz on bribery and corruption charges. Ford was further accused of threatening and intimidating potential witnesses. At the time, he was still a state senator, but stepped down from his post two days after his indictment.

He was released on bail after his arrest but was subject to certain conditions, including a curfew, a requirement that he wear an electronic monitoring device, and a prohibition from traveling outside the Memphis area.

In court papers filed earlier this month, Ford asked U.S. District Judge Daniel Breen if he could attend the conference from Sept. 21-26, saying it is an essential aspect in his ability "to foster continued and new business relationships."

Ford said he had attended the conference in past years, and his attendance had helped his consulting business.

Federal prosecutors in Memphis did not object to the motion, spokeswoman Leigh Anne Jordan from the Memphis U.S. Attorney's Office said. The judge granted the request last Thursday.

Taxpayers will not be footing the bill, however, because Ford is no longer a member of the General Assembly. His attorney, Michael Scholl of Memphis, said he was not at liberty to discuss how Ford is covering expenses associated with the conference.

Ford's private consulting work while he was an elected official came under public scrutiny during the legislative session earlier this year.

In two cases, Ford's consulting work was linked to companies doing business with TennCare, the state's health insurance program for the poor and disabled. At the same time, he was chairman of the Senate General Welfare Committee and was a member of two other committees that oversaw TennCare.

Ford also has been a licensed funeral director and insurance agent.

The Congressional Black Caucus Foundation Inc.'s Annual Legislative Conference touts itself on its Web site as the "premier African American conference on policy issues."

The conference provides a platform for the 43 African-American members of Congress to talk about legislative items. And it's a meeting place for attendees interested in the health, economic, educational and political state of black communities, the Web site says.

Conference spokeswoman Patty Rice said the group does not provide information about attendees when asked to confirm Ford's registration.

Among those scheduled to speak is U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr. of Memphis, who is the nephew of John Ford. The congressman is to speak on national security, according to the conference's itinerary.

Others scheduled to speak include U.S. Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton, as well as actor Jamie Foxx.

Ford said he plans to go to trial in the Tennessee Waltz case. Three other defendants, including former state House member Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, have entered guilty pleas and await sentencing in February. •

Details Of Cockfighting Raid Emerge (KNOXNS)

By J.J. STAMBAUGH

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), September 13, 2005

NEWPORT, Tenn. - Among the evidence compiled by the FBI before a June 11 raid on a cockfighting pit near Del Rio were aerial photographs and video surveillance of the facility, according to testimony heard last week.

A preliminary hearing Wednesday in Cocke County General Sessions Court provided many new details about the controversial raid, which was cloaked in secrecy as part of a sweeping four-year probe by federal and state authorities into organized crime and public corruption in Cocke County.

In fact, security leading up to the raid was so tight that most of the officers involved weren't told of the assignment until the day of the operation, according to state troopers.

Tennessee Highway Patrol Trooper Timothy Wolfenbarger was one of four troopers who testified at last week's hearing for nearly a dozen people accused of being spectators at a cockfight.

Wolfenbarger said the operation was orchestrated by the FBI and a federal SWAT team had been assigned to conduct the "initial sweep" on the compound. State troopers, who had been drawn from posts across the state, were ordered into the site after it was secured.

"They (the FBI) had surveillance videos aerial photographs," Wolfenbarger said. "They had a good plan."

The raid has drawn heated criticism from many cockfighters, who feel the raid was too violent and a waste of federal resources.

Scores of heavily armed federal and state agents backed up by snipers and three helicopters took part in the raid. Troopers issued misdemeanor state citations against 143 people, most of whom entered into plea agreements that kept them out of jail.

At least 11 of them, however, have opted to fight the charges.

After the Del Rio raid, federal prosecutors moved to seize both the Del Rio pit and a second alleged cockfighting operation near Newport, the 440 Cockfight Pit, arguing they were illegal gambling operations.

The FBI has said the Del Rio complex had enough bleachers to seat up to 500 people. The compound included a 5,000-square-foot, two-story metal building; a 3,000-square-foot, two-story building partitioned into rooms; a "gate shack" built along the gravel driveway leading up to the site; and "approximately 100 outbuildings, consisting of utility sheds and camping trailers," according to court records.

"I'd never seen anything like that before in my life," Trooper Wolfenbarger said. "It (the main building) was like a gymnasium. There were people sitting up in the arena area."

Wolfenbarger also said the show of force was justified because the officers and agents didn't know what they would encounter.

"Our job is dangerous enough, but anytime you go into the unknown you don't know what's going to happen," he said.

The troopers gave first-hand descriptions of the Del Rio pit and told of finding dead roosters in various places. They conceded during cross-examination, however, that they didn't actually see any of the defendants take part in or watch a cockfight.

Trooper Jim Lee said he saw "a lot of blood, feathers, dead roosters." He also said he was told by one of the suspects detained at the compound that "the blood on his shirt was from being too close."

Trooper Bob Brooks described a restaurant and gift shop on the property that sold T-shirts, caps, belt buckles and other memorabilia. The shop also sold metal gaffes, which are often placed on gamecocks when they fight, he said.

Defense attorney Joe Baker repeatedly solicited testimony from the troopers that they couldn't positively identify all the defendants in the courtroom as having been at the pit. He also stressed that none of the defendants were seen breaking the law and opined that there might have been legal reasons to be at the compound.

At one point, Baker asked Brooks if he would have arrested someone had they only been working at the restaurant and hadn't entered the building where the cockfighting allegedly took place.

"That's aiding and abetting to me," the trooper replied, comparing Baker's hypothetical scenario to someone "selling lemonade" while watching drug deals.

Baker argued unsuccessfully before Judge John Bell that the state's laws concerning cockfighting are vague when it comes to being a spectator at one of the events, which is a Class C misdemeanor punishable by a maximum fine of $50 and 30 days in jail.

He also said that only three of his clients had been positively identified by the troopers in the courtroom and stressed the lack of evidence presented. "If this is the best the state and federal governments can do then I feel like (my clients') rights aren't protected," he said.

Bell sent the cases on to a grand jury for review but noted that, had the defendants been on trial, the evidence presented wouldn't have been enough to convict them.

During a preliminary hearing, Bell explained, prosecutors only have to show "some proof that a crime was committed and some proof that you did it."

Baker said after the hearing that the state Legislature could have "been more specific and clear" when it comes to how spectators - as opposed to actual participants - are treated under the law.

"This is the only law that prohibits being a spectator," Baker said. "I could watch someone run red lights, rob banks, or kill somebody, but you can't watch a cockfight."

TN: Cockfighting Pit Raid Yeilds 143 Citations For Spectators (AP)

AP, September 13, 2005

A cockfighting pit raided by state and federal authorities this summer at Newport, Tennessee had bleachers to seat about 500 people and nearly a hundred outbuildings.

State troopers told a hearing they included a restaurant and gift shop.

Four Tennessee troopers talked about the June raid that netted 143 citations during a hearing Monday for some of the people charged with being spectators at a cockfight.

Heavily armed agents, snipers and helicopters were involved in the raid that was part of the FBI's four-year investigation into organized crime and corruption in the county.

The troopers said they found dead roosters, blood and feathers at the pit but, did not actually see any of the defendants watching or coaching roosters.

Judge John Bell bound the cases over to the grand jury but said he didn't think the evidence presented at the hearing was enough to convict them.

College Student's Disappearance Mystifies Family And Police In Va. (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Eager to begin her freshman year at Virginia Commonwealth University, Taylor Behl created an online profile and wrote that she was looking for new friends in the Richmond area. Last week, she told her roommate she was going out for a few hours. She did not come back.

Behl, 17, was last seen Sept. 5, and campus officials said yesterday they still do not suspect foul play. But they are becoming increasingly concerned, and the investigation into her disappearance gains momentum and urgency with each passing day.

Nearby jurisdictions have joined the hunt, and the FBI has assigned an agent to advise campus and Richmond police. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, based in Alexandria, has posted a notice on its site.

Every year, students "appear to disappear" from the 30,000-student university and do not call their families for days, said Pam Lepley, a campus police spokeswoman. The students usually resurface after a couple of days, she said. But in this case, Behl, a June graduate of Madison High School in Vienna, has contacted no one.

"We're very concerned because of the amount of time that has passed," Lepley said.

Behl was last seen about 10 p.m. on Labor Day after a late supper at a local cafe. She found her roommate in their room with a boyfriend and told her she would leave for a while to give them privacy, police said.

She was wearing jeans and a hooded black sweatshirt and took only her keys and a credit card. Her car, a white 1997 Ford Escort with Virginia tags JPC-2848, is also missing.

Lepley said Behl continues to receive e-mails but has not logged on to read them. Her credit card has not been used, and the last call on her cell phone was made the night she disappeared.

Dozens of people have been interviewed, and more than 20 leads have been fruitlessly followed. A national alert has been issued, and a description of her vehicle has been sent to authorities across the country.

Behl's mother, Janet Pelasara, drove to Richmond from her Vienna home Wednesday, hours after her daughter's disappearance was reported to campus police. She said in several telephone interviews that Behl is an outgoing, friendly girl, not the sort who would cease contact with her family and friends.

"She's very family-oriented," Pelasara said. "She's basically a happy kid, a good kid. She's fun; she's funny; she's smart as a whip. I'm very worried about her."

Friends have posted messages on Myspace.com, the Web site where Behl has an online profile, begging her to call someone and to come home safely.

In the profile Behl created this summer on the site, which serves as a dating and friendship network, she goes by the name "Bitter." She wrote that she was excited to move to Richmond.

"I just graduated from high school and now I'm off to Richmond for college," she wrote. "I'm looking forward to meeting people that are in Richmond because I only know a few people down there."

She had but one requirement in meeting new friends: "Someone who is kind."

Case Against DeLay Associate Dismissed (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 13, 2005

A Texas judge dismissed a civil case against a major fundraiser for House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) last Friday.

The federal district-court judge dismissed the case brought by two Texas Democrats against John Colyandro, the former executive director of the Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee (TRMPAC).

The judge, Lee Yeakel, ruled that lawyers for the two Democrats failed to prove that Colyandro had knowingly broken Texas election law in using corporate contributions to fund campaign ads.

Texas election law prohibits the use of corporate money in races for state office.

In his opinion, Yeakel wrote that the petition against Colyandro and his three co-defendants "fails to allege any facts that Colyandro intentionally or even knowingly violated the applicable sections of the Texas Election Code."

In May, another Texas judge ruled against Colyandro and co-defendants Jim Ellis and Warren Robold in a separate civil case, ruling that the three had violated state election law by failing to report $684,507 in corporate donations.

Colyandro and Ellis also face criminal money-laundering charges following indictments last year by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle.

DeLay Seeks Closure On Texas Case (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

The recently disclosed meeting between House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and a prosecutor investigating allegations of state campaign finance violations is a strong signal that DeLay is trying to put a longstanding Texas investigation behind him as he prepares for a potential probe by the House ethics committee. DeLay and his lawyers met with Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle and his aides for about 90 minutes on Aug. 17 in the Public Integrity unit of the Travis County DA's office. Sources close to both men described the meeting as cordial and said DeLay was treated more like a witness than a potential target of the probe.

Accompanying DeLay to the meeting were his Austin criminal-defense lawyers, Bill White and Steve Brittan, as well Toby Vick of McGuireWoods (one of DeLay's Washington, D.C., law firms) and Elliot Berke, general counsel in the Majority Leader's office. Earle was joined by Greg Cox, director of the Public Integrity unit, and another official.

Earle has been leading a two-and-half-year investigation into the use of corporate funds in the 2002 Texas legislative races. Earle obtained indictments against three DeLay political allies last September for allegedly violating Texas' ban on the use of corporate campaign donations in state legislative races. Since then, there has been widespread speculation that DeLay also could find himself going in front of a grand jury at some point.

On Thursday, Earle announced indictments of Texans for a Republican Majority political action committee and the Texas Association of Business for their activities in 2002 state legislative races. DeLay's office then disclosed that the Majority Leader had held a voluntary meeting with Earle and other Travis County prosecutors to discuss DeLay's involvement with TRMPAC.

Earle told the Dallas Morning News on Friday that, despite earlier comments he had made, his aim in the TRMPAC probe was not to indict DeLay. "I have never said Mr. DeLay is a target of the investigation," Earle told the newspaper.

According to sources familiar with the situation, Earle had asked for a voluntary meeting with DeLay in mid-July, and DeLay's legal team agreed to that request. For reasons that are unclear, however, no further talks were held for several weeks.

Later that month, Earle convinced a Texas judge to issue a subpoena to compel DeLay to testify. Earle then contacted DeLay's lawyers again before actually serving the Texas Republican. At that point, DeLay agreed to a voluntary sit-down, although it still took several weeks for the two men to actually get together. The existence of the DeLay subpoena, which was never formally served on the lawmaker, was first reported by the Austin American-Statesman.

DeLay was not under oath when he met with Earle, and there were no other preconditions put in place, such as transactional or prosecutorial immunity, sources close to the Majority Leader said.

Most of the gathering focused on DeLay's involvement with TRMPAC. DeLay helped create the organization in 2001 with a $50,000 donation from his federal leadership PAC, Americans for a Republican Majority PAC.

TRMPAC's goal was to help Texas Republicans win control of the state Legislature, which would then allow the adoption of a Congressional redistricting map favorable to the GOP. DeLay and other Lone Star State Republicans were angered by the fact that Texas' Congressional delegation was still majority Democratic, despite the fact that Texas voters had shifted decisively to the GOP.

Thanks in part to extensive fundraising by TRMPAC, TAB and other pro-Republican groups, GOP candidates were able to win control in the 2002 elections of the Texas House for the first time since Reconstruction. A DeLay ally, Tom Craddick, was elected Speaker, and despite repeated attempts by Texas Democrats to block it, a Congressional redistricting map much more favorable to Republicans was adopted. Six seats changed from Democratic to Republican control thanks to the DeLay-led redistricting drive, cementing his status as a GOP powerbroker and infuriating Democrats in Austin and Washington.

After an official at TAB bragged in an association newsletter about the group's role in the 2002 state elections, Earle began his investigation. The use of corporate funds is illegal in Texas legislative races.

A Texas judge ruled in May that TRMPAC should have reported more than $532,000 in corporate contributions to state officials during the 2001-02 cycle, and the judge awarded in excess of $196,000 in damages to five state Democratic candidates who have sued the group. TRMPAC, which declared those donations to federal authorities but did not notify state officials, is appealing that ruling.

A Texas grand jury indicted TRMPAC last Thursday on two counts of violating Texas' ban on the use of corporate funds. The charges center on whether TRMPAC illegally solicited and accepted $120,000 from the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care, an industry-funded group, and AT&T Corp. Earle's office charged that these donations represented an infringement of state law.

DeLay has denied playing any significant role in the day-to-day operations of TRMPAC, although he did serve on an advisory committee for the organization.

James Bopp, a GOP campaign expert who has testified on behalf of TRMPAC in a civil case brought by Texas Democrats, said the DeLay-Earle meeting was highly unusual.

"Yeah, I think it's extraordinary," Bopp said. "I think it's an indication that [DeLay] and his lawyers believe he is completely blameless for anything that happened [with TRMPAC], if in fact any crime was committed."

But another campaign-finance expert, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said DeLay faced a political consequence if he did not cooperate with Earle, especially once DeLay's camp knew Earle had obtained a subpoena that would compel the Texas Republican to testify.

"There's always a certain tension between litigators and politicians in any of these cases," said this expert. If DeLay were to refuse to testify unless he were subpoenaed, it could look like he was attempting to hide something — a difficult position for DeLay to be in politically with all of the ethics controversies that have surrounded him.

But if DeLay were to meet with Earle, especially without any assurances that what he said wouldn't be held against him, then he could have exposed himself to legal jeopardy if he admits to illegal behavior. "That's a big risk to take," said one GOP lawyer familiar with the case. "I'm surprised they did it."

Craddick also met privately with Earle last month, according to the Austin American-Statesman. Craddick's lawyer told the newspaper that it was "a pleasant conversation."

Up until now, little love was lost between the Earle and DeLay camps. DeLay has claimed that Earle was seeking to redress Democratic losses at the polls by using a politically motivated investigation, while Earle has suggested that Republicans, including DeLay, repeatedly violated Texas campaign laws through the used of millions of dollars in corporate contributions.

But Earle's probe, or at least the investigatory phase of it, may finally be winding down.

The latest grand jury, the fourth in this case, is set to expire at the end of September, and sources close to the investigation say it will likely be the last one empaneled.

And while a number of legal issues remain for Texas courts to straighten out, including outstanding criminal charges against several DeLay allies, the fact that Earle privately told DeLay and his attorneys that he is not a target of investigators may now enable DeLay to focus his attention on the House ethics committee.

"It's not over yet, but there's some light at the end of the tunnel for DeLay," said a GOP source official close to the Majority Leader. "He may just slip the noose on this one."

CIVIL LAW:

McCain, Feingold Targeting Rider (RC)

By Suzanne Nelson

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) implored their colleagues Monday to support their efforts to remove a campaign-finance rider to the Treasury-Transportation appropriations bill, which is slated to come to the Senate floor as early as this week.

The provision would allow lawmakers' leadership political action committees to give unlimited funds to the national party committees, opening what the two Senators believe would be a significant loophole in the campaign finance law.

In a "Dear Colleague" letter, Feingold and McCain noted that national parties could turn around and spend those funds on the lawmaker's own re-election, "effectively subverting individual and PAC donor contribution limits on the amounts that can be given to a Member's campaign."

But the back-door change has high-level support in the Senate. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), whose presidential aspirations could be aided by the provision, gave the language his endorsement before the August recess. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), a longtime foe of campaign finance restrictions, is also supporting the measure.

The principal difference between a lawmaker's personal campaign and that of his or her leadership PAC is that funds from the latter cannot be spent on direct mail, broadcast ads and other items that directly aid the candidate's campaign. The money from leadership PACs is used primarily as funding for the lawmaker's travel and as a way to gain chits with fellow lawmakers by making contributions to their campaigns.

Like all other political action committees, leadership PACs are currently subject to an annual limit of $15,000 for transfers to the national party committees. The proposed language would treat leadership PACs like candidates' personal campaign committees when it comes to transfers to the national parties.

No one during the past few years has sat on as large a pile of leadership PAC cash as Frist, who as of June 30 had almost $1.2 million left in his account. He's already given the maximum donations to every GOP Senator running for re-election, leaving him to spread his money around to House campaigns — unless this provision allows him to dump large amounts of cash into the NRSC and the RNC.

"This major change in campaign finance law would seriously undermine the effectiveness of longstanding contribution limits which serve as the foundation of the nation's campaign finance laws," McCain and Feingold wrote.

"Let's be very clear on another point — this provision benefits no one but incumbent Members of Congress by allowing them to circumvent those same contribution limits by which their opponents will be forced to abide," the two added in boldfac e type.

A few years ago, leadership PACs were used primarily by a handful of Members with leadership aspirations, but recently the committees have become more common and are now used by rank-and-file and junior lawmakers as well.

The language in the Treasury-Transportation bill also does something seemingly technical but that could nonetheless have a significant impact on campaign-finance law: It codifies for the first time the term "leadership PAC," which heretofore has been an informal term to refer to political action committees informally linked to lawmakers used to further their aspirations for elected leadership. Many campaign reform groups already believe them to be dubiously legal, at best, as they are used in practice as an vehicle for lawmakers to raise money outside of the existing contribution limits.

McCain and Feingold concluded by asserting that substantive changes to the campaign finance laws should occur only after "adequate" debate, the antithesis of which would be "[s]lipping a rider onto an appropriations bill in a subcommittee markup."

The two plan to force a vote on the provision on the Senate floor.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Same-Sex Marriage May Stay Legal In Mass. (FINDLAW/AP)

By Steve Leblanc And Theo Emery, Associated Press Writers

Find Law, September 13, 2005

(AP) - BOSTON-A fragile coalition of lawmakers cobbled together to support an anti-gay marriage amendment is falling apart, virtually assuring that same-sex marriage will for now remain legal in Massachusetts, according to an Associated Press poll.

The survey, conducted between Sept. 6-9, found at least 104 lawmakers who plan to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, which would ban gay marriage but create civil unions.

The amendment, which is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday, needs the support of at least 101 of the state's 200 lawmakers to get on the 2006 ballot.

"It's a dangerous precedent to take away rights that have been granted by the court for an identifiable group of people," said Democrat Rep. James Brendan Leary.

Last year, months after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that same-sex marriage was legal, the amendment passed 105-92. It must pass a second vote to get on next year's ballot.

Reasons for the faltering support are rooted in the language of the amendment, which was intended as a compromise between foes of same-sex marriage and supporters of gay rights. It ultimately had an opposite effect, however, alienating gay marriage opponents by creating civil unions and offending gay rights supporters by banning gay marriage.

For the survey, the AP attempted to reach all 200 lawmakers with at least two phone calls. Of those polled, 104 said they would vote against the proposal, 19 said they would support it and three said they were undecided.

Opposition to the measure is likely deeper than the survey indicates. Several lawmakers who voted against it last year couldn't be reached. Others who have voiced strong opposition declined to respond.

More than a dozen lawmakers who voted for the amendment the first time around said they would change their votes this week, either because they fully support gay marriage or oppose civil unions.

Others said that after more than a year of watching gay couples marry, they see no need to rescind the right. Since Massachusetts' gay marriages started taking place in May 2004, thousands of same-sex couples have tied the knot.

"I haven't talked to any married heterosexual couples that have felt threatened by same-sex marriages," said Democrat Rep. Anne M. Gobi, who said she couldn't support the compromise amendment, as she did last year.

Many foes of gay marriage said they prefer a second, much stricter amendment that would ban gay marriage without granting civil unions. The earliest that proposal could go before voters is 2008.

"We are going back to the beginning and defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman," said Democrat Rep. Philip Travis, who voted for the compromise amendment last year, but now plans to vote against it.

Some lawmakers who have supported gay marriage in the past declined to respond to the survey, saying they believed the vote was still too narrow, and many new lawmakers planned to vote against the measure because of campaign promises.

Still, not everyone is switching their vote.

Democrat Rep. James H. Fagan does not oppose same-sex marriages, but he's sticking with his yes vote on the constitutional amendment because he wants the state's citizens to decide.

"I support their right to vote," Fagan said. "I would suggest that people do not vote to amend our constitution."

Will California's Gay Marriage Bill Spur Similar Measures Elsewhere? (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES - The latest struggle over who decides the legality of gay marriage - citizens, lawmakers, or the courts - played out in the nation's most populous state last week. The California legislature was the first to approve a bill legalizing same-sex marriage, although Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has vowed to veto it.

The political stand-off raises legal issues specific to California, state and national observers say. The legislature's attempt to broaden the definition of marriage is in direct conflict with a citizens' initiative passed in 2000 defining legal marriage as between a man and woman only. That citizen's initiative itself, Proposition 22, is also being challenged in court.

But the recent move by Sacramento legislators emphasizes what some observers see as a shift in public opinion that appears to be more accepting of gay marriage. Still, others anticipate the bill could add to the backlash against the gay-marriage movement that prompted 11 states to ban same-sex marriage through ballot initiatives last year. Indeed, California conservative groups have heightened efforts to place an initiative before voters that would recognize heterosexual unions only.

National pollsters report more acceptance of gays and lesbians in a variety of other contexts. What happens in California could set the tone for how other states deal with the issue legislatively.

"There will be lurches backward and forward as some states throw up roadblocks to such arrangements and others embrace them," says Elizabeth Garrett, a law professor at University of Southern California who tracks state initiatives. "But overall the support for civil unions is getting stronger and stronger."

A recent statewide poll here shows that voters are evenly split (about 46 percent for, and 46 against) same-sex marriage. Five years ago, 61 percent of voters backed the initiative that defined marriage as between a man and woman. "Moves by the California legislature are part of the national trend toward greater equality for same-sex couples that has been growing coast to coast for the past few years," says Ms. Garrett.

San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom reignited the issue here last fall when he directed city officials to permit same-sex marriage licenses. Hundreds of couples who obtained the licenses in San Francisco later learned their nuptials were declared invalid by a court ruling that said a mayor could not ignore state law.

Some social conservative groups reject the analysis that public attitudes are shifting to embrace same-sex marriage. They claim that public opinion polls were roughly 50-50 before the Proposition 22 vote, but that the measure's overwhelming victory was a truer litmus test.

"The only vote that counts is at the ballot box, and the people spoke clearly on Prop. 22," says Karen England, of Capitol Resources Institute, a Sacramento group that advocates for family issues. "This legislature knows what the people feel and were afraid to put their measure to a public vote, which they could have done. Instead they are trying to make an end run around the will of the people."

Governor Schwarzenegger is being accused of political posturing with his veto to protect his conservative base in the face of declining approval ratings. But whatever ensues with the legal and political wrangling here, national gay and lesbian rights groups say they are encouraged by the legislature's move.

"Like activities in Massachusetts and Connecticut which have kept the issue alive despite negative attacks, the California measure is a teachable moment," says Seth Kilborn, marriage project director of the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay/lesbian political organization. "It is an opportunity to talk to voters about why same-sex marriage is important."

California's Solons Lead (WP)

The California General Assembly last week became the first state legislature to allow same-sex marriages. In a close vote, it sent a historic bill to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) that would go a step beyond the state's broad domestic partnership rights. Mr. Schwarzenegger promptly declared that he would veto the bill, so it won't become law. But the legislature's action is an important milestone. While the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court permitted same-sex marriage in that state and legislatures have created civil unions elsewhere, the vote is the first time that a state legislature has acted on its own to create marriage equality.

The importance of the California vote in the politics of same-sex marriage is hard to overstate. After the Massachusetts court ruling, opponents of same-sex marriage decried the court's willingness to make policy on contested social issues. Such questions, they argued, were the rightful province of legislatures, not courts. President Bush even pegged his disgraceful endorsement of a federal constitutional amendment banning gay marriage to the likelihood of "activist judges" depriving the people of democratic choice on the matter. The California legislature's decision gives the lie to the notion that only imperial judges would foist such a social policy on a state.

Only five years ago, voters in California overwhelmingly passed a ballot initiative to refuse recognition to same-sex marriages performed elsewhere. The recent legislative action reflects genuinely changed public sentiment; polls on the matter show voters evenly split.

In an ironic twist, Mr. Schwarzenegger is trying to punt the matter back to the courts, where challenges to current California law are pending. In announcing his decision to veto the bill, he suggested that the new law conflicts with the old initiative -- which would be unconstitutional -- and that "the matter should be determined not by legislative action . . . but by court decision or another vote of the people of our state."

The governor could not be more wrong. Legislation is actually the best way to move forward in this area. And further ballot initiatives that will attempt to write an exclusively heterosexual definition of marriage into the California constitution and, along the way, wipe out the state's progressive domestic partnership laws, are already in the works in any event. A lot of work remains to be done before marriage equality in California becomes a reality.

But the legislative action last week remains an important symbol -- at once a rebuke to those states that have reacted to the Massachusetts decision by writing discrimination into their fundamental laws and a gentle reminder to those who see hope for progress only in the courts that legislatures can still be engines for positive change.

Find Law, September 13, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-Hours after many New York firefighters gathered to mark the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, one of them was arrested for attacking an immigrant worker from Bangladesh and telling him he looked "like he's al-Qaida," police said.

Firefighter Edward Dailey was arrested Sunday on charges of criminal mischief and felony second-degree assault, Police Sgt. Kevin Farrell said.

He was released without bail. Despite the alleged al-Qaida remark, there was not enough evidence to charge him with a hate crime, authorities said.

Dailey, 27, is accused of breaking a piece of Plexiglas off a curbside newsstand and throwing it at a 51-year-old man who works there, Farrell said. Dailey had said the man looked "like he's al-Qaida," Farrell said.

The victim, whose arm was cut in the alleged attack, was treated at a hospital and released, Farrell said.

A woman who answered the phone at Dailey's home wouldn't comment.

Dailey was the class valedictorian at his FDNY graduation ceremony last year.

Two Guilty Of Murder In Death Of A Transgender Teenager (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

HAYWARD, Calif., Sept. 12 - A jury convicted two men of murder on Monday but deadlocked on the fate of a third man in the retrial of three defendants charged with killing a 17-year-old transgender teenager in October 2002.

The two - Michael W. Magidson and Jose A. Merel, both 25 - were found guilty of second-degree murder for the death of Gwen Araujo, who was born as a male named Eddie Araujo Jr., but who frequently wore women's clothing and lived as a women.

After the verdict was read, Mr. Magidson bowed his head and Mr. Merel slowly shook his. They face sentences of 15 years to life in prison.

The jury found both men not guilty of committing a hate crime.

The actions of the third man, Jason Cazares, also 25, confounded a jury for the second time in two years. The panel, which heard the case for several months in a packed Alameda County Superior Court room, told Judge Harry R. Sheppard that they were hopelessly deadlocked on the fate of Mr. Cazares.

Jurors had been deliberating for seven days in the retrial of Mr. Magidson, of Fremont, and Mr. Merel and Mr. Cazares, both of Newark. The three were charged with first-degree murder and with committing a hate crime, although the jury had the option of finding the men guilty of lesser charges, including manslaughter.

The police found the victim's body in October 2002, buried in a three-foot-deep grave in El Dorado County in a remote area of the Sierra Nevada foothills about 120 miles east of San Francisco. She had been bound, bludgeoned and strangled on Oct. 4.

According to court testimony, Ms. Araujo's mother had reported her missing two weeks earlier and just a few days after the 17-year-old youth had attended a party at a house in Newark, then rented by Mr. Merel and his older brother.

The Alameda County deputy district attorney, Chris Lamiero, argued during the retrial that the men attacked and battered Ms. Araujo after they discovered from a friend that the girl with whom several had had a sexual encounter was, in fact, a biological male.

Mr. Lamiero's key witness to the crime was a fourth defendant, Jaron C. Nabors, 22, of Newark. Mr. Nabors was also charged with murder but agreed to plead guilty to voluntary manslaughter in exchange for his testimony against the other three men.

His testimony revealed that all of the men, except Mr. Cazares, had a sexual encounter with the teenager. The jury of eight men and four women began its deliberations on Aug. 30 and on Thursday alerted Judge Sheppard that decisions had been reached on two of the defendants. The verdicts and identities of the men were withheld pending a decision on the third man.

During the three-month trial, the prosecutor told jurors that Ms. Araujo had been murdered by the men in what he considered a brutal hate crime. The prosecutor argued that Mr. Magidson strangled the teenager, Mr. Cazares beat in her skull with a shovel, and Mr. Merel followed along because he said he felt intimidated.

The lawyers for the defendants in part argued that the death of Ms. Araujo was a crime of passion that did not merit a charge of first-degree murder. The lawyer for Mr. Cazares, the defendant on whom the jury deadlocked, argued that his client was not even present during the murder, because he was outside having a cigarette.

All three men testified during the retrial. But only Mr. Cazares took the stand at the first trial, in June 2004, when the jury deadlocked after 10 days of deliberation, leading to a mistrial.

Two Defendants Convicted In Newark Transgender Murder (AP)

By Michelle Locke, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 12, 2005

HAYWARD – Two men who had sex with a transgender teen and then discovered she was biologically male were convicted Monday of her murder, but cleared of hate crime charges.

Michael Magidson and Jose Merel, both 25, face mandatory sentences of 15 years-to-life in prison for second-degree murder in the killing of Gwen Araujo, who was beaten, tied up and strangled.

The jury was deadlocked in the case of a third man, Jason Cazares, 25, marking the second time a mistrial was declared in his case.

There were sobs in the Alameda County courtroom as the verdicts were read and Merel held his head in his hands.

Araujo, 17, was born a boy named Edward but grew up to believe her true identity was female. The defendants, who knew her as Lida, met Araujo in the summer of 2002. Magidson and Merel had sexual encounters with Araujo, experiences that fueled suspicions about Araujo's gender.

The issue boiled over in the early hours of Oct. 4, 2002, in a confrontation at Merel's house in the San Francisco suburb of Newark.

Merel's lawyer, William Du Bois, said he was shocked by the verdict, especially since prosecutor Chris Lamiero said he didn't think Merel was the killer.

"I can't imagine what evidence they used to come to this decision," Du Bois said.

In the first trial, the three defendants stuck together, with their lawyers attacking the chief prosecution witness, Jaron Nabors, who was also at the house the night Araujo died but was allowed to plead guilty to manslaughter in exchange for testifying.

But in the second trial, the defendants' united front cracked.

Nabors testified at both trials that Araujo was savagely attacked after her biological identity was revealed when her underwear was pulled aside. He said he didn't see the killing but saw Magidson pull a rope toward the teen's neck.

Magidson testified that he beat and tied up Araujo but said he couldn't remember large parts of the night and was sure he had not strangled her. He said Nabors was the killer and his attorney asked for a manslaughter conviction.

But Merel, testifying for the first time, broke down and cried when Lamiero asked him directly if Magidson admitted strangling Araujo. He testified that Magidson had told him "if push came to shove" Merel should identify Magidson as the killer.

An autopsy found Araujo died of asphyxiation associated with head injuries.

Nabors testified that Merel smashed Araujo in the head with a can and also hit her with a pan. Merel acknowledged slapping Araujo and hitting her a glancing blow with the pan but said he only menaced her with the can and did not seriously injure the teen. Du Bois said if Merel was guilty of anything it was felony assault.

Cazares said he was outside the house when the killing took place and only helped bury the body in a shallow grave in the Sierra Nevada foothills.

Cazares' attorney said he thought the jury didn't believe Nabors' testimony.

"We believe from the first instant that he wasn't telling the truth and what he was doing was trying to save his own skin," attorney Tony Serra said.

Cazares, who was free on bail, hugged his girlfriend and left the courthouse.

Redistricting Reform May Be On The March In Three Big States (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES — With initiatives to reform redistricting expected to make the 2005 ballot in California and Ohio, and another for 2006 gaining traction in Florida, the ultimate insider issue has suddenly become hot in three of the nation's most populous states.

But those who thrive on map-drawing minutiae wonder whether such an arcane issue can resonate with ordinary voters.

"Most voters don't even know what districts they live in, much less who drew the boundaries, so they don't relate to it," said Garry South, a veteran Democratic strategist in California. His California GOP counterpart, Dan Schnur, concurred, saying, "Under normal circumstances, it's impossible to pass. It's too abstract."

Still, strategists say the pivotal wild card is frustration with politics as usual. If such a mood exists, and if it is channeled effectively, it can put a dry issue like redistricting over the top, said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the liberal Ballot Initiative Strategy Center.

And in these three states at least, the political conditions may be riper than normal.

DOJ_NMG_0004346

In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R), who coasted into office amid mass disaffection with his Democratic predecessor, has staked his prestige on the redistricting measure and other reforms.

In Ohio, a metastasizing political scandal involving Gov. Bob Taft (R) and the state Republican Party is producing anger and volatility in a state long dominated by the GOP.

And Florida, like Ohio, has been home to a divisive presidential election in which residents aired a torrent of allegations about how partisanship may have influenced vote counting.

The Ohio measure, which would create a judicially appointed independent redistricting panel, has the most momentum, thanks to the rising tide of political disaffection.

The proposal's chief proponent, a predominantly Democratic group called Reform Ohio Now, secured roughly 500,000 signatures, easily exceeding the 322,000 required to place the measure on the ballot. (It is expected to share ballot space with proposals for expanded mail-in balloting, reduced donation limits to candidates and a nonpartisan state elections board.)

"There is tremendous energy, excitement and interest in all of the reform amendments," said Cleveland-based Democratic consultant Jeff Rusnack. "Ohioans are looking for real changes that will hold the politicians accountable. Changing the redistricting process is one way to do this."

Herb Asher, an adviser to Reform Ohio Now and political scientist at Ohio State University, said the group knows the issue is hard to explain in 30-second TV spots, so its goal is to skip the mechanics and focus on big themes.

"You tell voters, 'Hey, we all believe in competition for business and schools, so how about competition in our elections? How about making legislators be more attentive to their own districts?'" Asher said. "By saying something that simple, it captures people's attention."

Asher predicts that if the proponents can pick off one-third of the GOP electorate — not an unreasonable number given today's anti-Republican environment — then the measure should prevail.

Ohio First, a largely Republican group, opposes it. Beyond challenging the measure in court, Ohio First asks whether the proposal is as fair as its sponsors contend, said former Ohio Senate President Richard Finan (R), a Cincinnati lawyer affiliated with Ohio First.

"The argument is, 'Yes, we might need some reform to our method of redistricting, but this is certainly not the way to do it,'" he said. The measure, "is strictly slanted toward one side."

In Ohio, as elsewhere, partisanship is never far from the surface. Indeed, critics have noted the irony that more than two decades ago, the state's then-dominant Democratic Party successfully blocked a GOP-backed redistricting reform effort.

In Florida, a narrowly divided state with a heavily Republican Congressional delegation, signature-gatherers are working to place a redistricting measure on the 2006 ballot. While it's too soon to gauge its level of support — already, one facet of the reform package has been thrown out for exceeding the ballot-summary limit by six words — the proposal's sponsors have one key factor on their side.

"Florida has been very inclined to pass constitutional amendments in the past decade," said Aubrey Jewett, a political scientist at the University of Central Florida, citing a range of recently passed measures that span the ideological spectrum, including those protecting pregnant pigs, banning smoking, restricting net fishing, publicizing doctors' mistakes, cutting contingency fees for lawyers and raising the minimum wage. "If the petitions do get on the ballot, I think the odds of passage are good."

Ironically, California, a trailblazer on the issue since Schwarzenegger's election, now seems to offer the longest odds of passage.

Schwarzenegger's proposal, which would hand redistricting duties to a nonpartisan group of judges, received just 32 percent support in a late-August Field poll, compared to 46 percent who were opposed and 22 percent undecided.

While the challenges facing the California measure mirror those in other states, Schwarzenegger's larger-than-life persona may have shaped public perceptions more than anything — on balance, negatively.

As Schwarzenegger's tone has become more partisan, his popularity has dropped among Democrats and independents — and the redistricting measure has suffered. It now fares even worse in recent polls than Schwarzenegger himself. Field's late-August trial heats showed the governor losing to his two likeliest Democratic challengers.

If Schwarzenegger had framed the issue properly and worked with Democrats consistently and publicly, Schnur and South agree, the effort could have won broad support. As a celebrity with cross-party appeal, the governor could have made it a compelling pox-on-both-your-houses issue.

"The thing about initiatives is that you don't have to explain the details," said Elizabeth Garrett, a University of Southern California law professor who studies ballot initiatives. "It's all about symbolic significance. And a take-back-the-government message could have worked."

Now, however, South said that "if a 35 percent governor passes a 35 percent ballot measure, I'll eat my hat."

The main beacon of hope for redistricting reformers is Arizona, which passed a statewide ballot measure to create a redistricting commission in 2000.

Two months before Election Day, the measure had just 43 percent support in the polls, recalled Bob Grossfeld, a Democratic consultant in Scottsdale, Ariz. Then, he said, proponents seized on opposition by the state's dominant GOP, enabling undecided voters to "connect the dots" about who benefited from the status quo.

"It was one of the first examples of how populism can trump conservatism," Grossfeld said. "Simply put, the campaign converted more than 25 years of government-is-the-problem rhetoric by conservatives into a double-digit win."

Phoenix-based GOP lobbyist Stuart Goodman agreed that a well-funded, well-run campaign offered "an appealing message."

"The general population is not focused on the political implications of redistricting, but they unquestionably appreciate the importance of fair and competitive elections," Goodman said.

Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.), who's sponsoring a redistricting reform bill in the House, agrees that the broader principle of fair play resonates among rank-and-file voters even when they know little about his legislation.

"The people back home are talking about the partisanship they see in Washington, and they're pleased to see Congressman Tanner trying to work on that," said Tanner's spokesman, Randy Ford.

ANTITRUST:

Oracle To Pay $5.85 Billion For Siebel (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 12 - Oracle, the giant database-software maker, announced on Monday that it would pay $5.85 billion to acquire Siebel Systems, its largest competitor in the market for sales automation programs.

The deal will bolster Oracle's effort to topple its German rival SAP as the leading seller of business applications software for big corporations.

It comes less than a year after Oracle managed to achieve a hostile takeover of PeopleSoft for $10.3 billion after a contentious battle that dragged on for nearly 18 months.

Oracle says its acquisition of Siebel will make it the largest seller of sales automation software - a category also known as customer relationship management software. SAP remains a far bigger supplier of business applications over all, but the Siebel acquisition, said Lawrence J. Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, "moves us closer to our goal of being No. 1 in applications globally."

While the Justice Department tried and failed to block the Oracle-PeopleSoft deal on the basis that it was anticompetitive, industry analysts and antitrust experts do not expect the Siebel deal to encounter the same regulatory opposition.

The combined company will face considerable competition from SAP, as well as from Microsoft, I.B.M. and smaller rivals. And Oracle lawyers succeeded in the PeopleSoft case in convincing a judge that the enterprise software market was robust.

Under the terms of the Oracle-Siebel combination, which is subject to the approval of shareholders of both companies, Oracle will pay $10.66 in cash or stock for each Siebel share. Siebel now has $2.24 billion in cash on hand, reducing Oracle's net takeover cost to $3.61 billion.

The news was announced before the opening of the stock market on Monday. In trading, shares of Oracle rose 21 cents, to $13.49. Siebel Systems advanced $1.16, or 12.7 percent, to $10.29 on volume of more than 187 million shares - roughly one in every three of its shares outstanding.

Oracle agreed to exchange stock for up to 30 percent of Siebel. If the Oracle shares fall below $10.72 before the deal is completed, Siebel shareholders who choose stock will receive 0.994 share of Oracle for each share of Siebel stock.

Oracle executives said the deal would add 2 cents to 3 cents a share to Oracle's profit in the 2007 fiscal year, ending in May 2007. The company said it expected to repurchase any shares issued in the acquisition. While Oracle expects to have $5 billion to $6 billion in cash at the time the deal is likely to close, it said it would use about $1.5 billion of its own cash and borrow the rest.

Beyond PeopleSoft, Oracle has acquired several companies in the last year, including Retek, another business software producer, which it bought in March for $643 million.

Mr. Ellison, speaking to analysts in a conference call on Monday, explained that Oracle had decided to wait for a few quarters after it integrated PeopleSoft before pursuing another large deal.

Once the Siebel acquisition is completed, most likely early in 2006, Oracle said it planned to promote Siebel's customer relationship management program over similar software developed by both Oracle and PeopleSoft. With Siebel, Oracle adds 4,000 customers, including some of the largest corporations, and roughly 3.4 million individual users.

While Oracle's interest in Siebel had been known for some time, reaction was mixed on Wall Street.

Charles Di Bona, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein, said he thought that the merger would be far more difficult than Oracle indicated, and that incorporating another major product line into Oracle's development process would be a great challenge.

William Wall, a spokesman for SAP, said the deal would not cause SAP to change its strategy. "We always anticipated that in order for Oracle to try to catch up with SAP, they would take this step," he said. "We have the benefit of several years, and we intend to leverage that."

But it may be Salesforce.com that has the most to gain - or lose - from the Oracle-Siebel merger. The company, whose chief executive, Marc Benioff, was a longtime associate of Mr. Ellison, has had considerable success providing customer relationship management software through an "on demand" subscription service rather than a discrete product, a strategy that many large customers have come to prefer. Siebel, in recent years, has begun moving toward a similar model, and analysts say that Oracle is trying to move in that direction with this merger.

During Oracle's battle to acquire PeopleSoft last year, Mr. Ellison told a court that Siebel had long been on his company's short list of potential targets.

Thomas M. Siebel, the chairman, had been an Oracle executive from 1984 to 1990. He founded Siebel in 1993. Since then, he and Mr. Ellison have sparred bitterly on occasion, but the relationship lacks the intense animosity that characterized Mr. Ellison's relationship with Craig A. Conway, the PeopleSoft chief executive, who unsuccessfully fought to prevent the takeover of his company.

Siebel Systems has faced considerable turmoil in recent years; its revenue dropped to $1.3 billion last year from $2.1 billion in 2001. Mr. Siebel stepped down last year as chief executive and turned the job over to J. Mike Lawrie, a former I.B.M. executive. Siebel's board fired Mr. Lawrie in April after first-quarter results fell far short of expectations. George Shaheen, formerly of Webvan, took over as chief executive, but barely met revenue goals for the second quarter, and new license revenue was disappointing.

Mr. Ellison and Mr. Siebel said Monday that the merger was driven primarily by customers' desire to do business with fewer suppliers, an idea that Mr. Ellison repeated throughout the battle for PeopleSoft.

"What really moved these companies together," Mr. Siebel said, "was a shift in market dynamics that has been occurring over the past three, four, five years."

Where in past years, customers were satisfied to pick and choose the best applications from a variety of vendors, the complexity of business today has led them to want to simplify those relationships, he said.

Siebel has about 5,000 employees at its headquarters in San Mateo, Calif., south of San Francisco, and throughout the world. While Mr. Ellison said that Oracle, based nearby in Redwood Shores, would retain Siebel's specialized sales force, analysts said that many Siebel employees were likely to be laid off as soon as the deal was completed. Oracle laid off nearly half of PeopleSoft's 11,000 employees soon after that deal took effect.

Oracle To Acquire Siebel For $5.85 Bil (SFC)

By Dan Fost

San Francisco Chronicle, September 12, 2005

Redwood City -- Furthering Chairman Larry Ellison's efforts to consolidate the software industry, Oracle Corp. today announced an agreement to acquire one of its biggest rivals, Siebel Systems, for $5.85 billion.

The deal follows a number of previous acquisitions, most notably the $10.6 billion takeover of Peoplesoft that closed in January. The impact on jobs at either company remains unclear.

Oracle this year has also acquired retailing software firms Retek and ProfitLogic, as well as a controlling interest in banking software maker I-flex Solutions.

The Siebel acquisition not only gives Redwood City's Oracle enough ammo to take on its archrival SAP of Germany in the field of customer relationship management, or CRM, software — essentially, software used to manage a company's sales operations — but it also has the delicious twist of allowing the Oracle boss to declare victory over Tom Siebel, a former protege turned enemy.

"In a single step, Oracle becomes the number one CRM applications company in the world," Ellison said in a press release. "Siebel's 4,000 applications customers and 3,400,000 CRM users strengthen our number one position in applications in North America and move us closer to the number one position in applications globally."

In the Siebel deal, Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 for each share of Siebel stock. The San Mateo firm had been struggling this year, with sales down and the stock having dropped from a high of $10.85 in January to a range hovering between $8 and $9 for most of the summer.

Former Webvan CEO George Shaheen came aboard in April as Siebel CEO in an effort to turn the company around, and Wall Street had watched closely since then to see if the company would either make an acquisition or be swallowed up itself.

In casting his lot with his old company, Tom Siebel, who remained chairman of Siebel Systems after Shaheen was hired, said the merger created a "beneficial business combination."

"Today is a great day for Siebel Systems' customers, partners, shareholders, and employees," Siebel said in a statement.

Another rival and former Oracle employee, Salesforce.com founder and CEO Marc Benioff, had another take on the deal. "Now, the same thing that happened to Peoplesoft will happen to Siebel, it will die," Benioff wrote in an e-mail to his employees.

As of 2:16 p.m. Eastern time today, Siebel shares were up 12.8 percent, or $1.17, at $10.30. Oracle shares were up 1.2 percent, or 16 cents, at $13.44.

The deal will need to meet regulatory approval, including an antitrust review. Oracle expects the acquisition to close in January.

Oracle Snaps Up Rival Siebel For $5.8bn (FT)

By James Politi And Chris Nuttall

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

Oracle, the US technology group, on Monday agreed to buy Siebel Systems for $5.85bn in cash and stock, sealing its second large acquisition in less than a year. The purchase will establish Oracle as the world's largest provider of customer relationship management (CRM) software and reunite two of Silicon Valley's most well-known executives.

Thomas Siebel, who established Siebel in 1993 after a career at Oracle, will return to his former employer to help execute the merger.

For Larry Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, the acquisition will cement his reputation as a prolific dealmaker. In December, Oracle agreed to buy PeopleSoft for about $10.5bn, after winning an 18-month takeover battle, seeing off a high-profile, antitrust suit brought by the US Department of Justice.

Mr Ellison on Monday suggested the company's attention would now be focused on integration. “I don't think you'll see another major acquisition any time soon,” he said. The purchase of Siebel will give Oracle access to 3.4m users and 4,000 corporate customers of its CRM software, which helps companies track sales, marketing and customer service.

Both Oracle and Siebel said the tie-up was encouraged by a number of key customers, including General Electric. “There was a shift in market dynamics,” said Mr Siebel, who added that customers now preferred an “integrated family of applications that minimises their cost structure”. Although CRM is one of the fastest growing segments of the software business, Siebel had been struggling to compete, leading to lower profits and prompting a group of investors mostly hedge funds to press management into pursuing a sale.

Mr Ellison shrugged off comments from one analyst who said Siebel was suffering from poor customer satisfaction. In Oracle's due diligence, Mr Ellison said: “Siebel customers seem to be quite happy with the product.”

Siebel shareholders will receive $10.66 a share in cash for each Siebel share, unless they elect to receive Oracle stock. That price represents a 17 per cent premium to Siebel share price on Friday, which had already moved higher as investors bet that a takeover was near.

Wall Street investors appeared to offer timid approval, sending Oracle shares 1.43 per cent higher closing Monday's trading day at $13.47. The final price of the deal will be reduced by $2.2bn, the value of Siebel's cash.

Oracle said the deal would enhance earnings in 2007 and contribute to its stated goal of lifting profits by 20 per cent per year. The acquisition would be funded using a combination of Siebel's cash, Oracle's cash, and borrowing of up to $3bn.

Morgan Stanley advised Oracle, and Goldman Sachs advised Siebel.

Oracle To Buy Siebel Systems In $5.85-Billion Deal (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

Oracle Corp. today announced it had agreed to buy business software maker Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in the most recent in a string of acquisitions orchestrated by chief executive Larry Ellison.

The Siebel deal comes after Oracle emerged victorious in a bidding battle for another software company, Retek Inc., this year, and as it digests PeopleSoft Inc., which agreed to a $10.3-billion acquisition in December after a bitter and lengthy takeover fight.

This most recent acquisition will help Redwood Shores, Calif.-based Oracle close the gap with SAP, the German company that ranks as the largest seller of software used to manage databases, sales and other corporate functions. SAP lost out to Oracle in the bidding for Retek.

San Mateo, Calif.-based Siebel will make Oracle a major player in the fast-growing segment of software that helps companies manage sales operations and customer relations. Last year, Siebel, founded by Chairman Thomas M. Siebel, a former Oracle executive, generated $110.7 million in net income on $1.34 billion in revenue.

"This is a very beneficial business combination," Siebel said in a statement.

Under the deal, Oracle will purchase each Siebel share for $10.66 in cash unless the owner of the stock decides to receive Oracle stock.

The merger, which is subject to regulatory review, has been approved by the boards of Oracle and Siebel. Siebel shareholders must still vote on the deal, but a vote by Oracle shareholders is not required, according to the company.

Shares of both companies rose on news of the deal. Siebel shares jumped nearly 13%, while Oracle stock was up about 1% in early afternoon trading on the Nasdaq.

Ellison has made it clear that he intends to bolster Oracle's main database business by acquiring more companies in the lucrative market for business software. But Oracle's shopping spree had raised concern among some industry analysts about the company's ability to mesh operations with newly acquired companies.

Oracle To Buy Siebel For $5.85 Billion (WSJ)

By David Bank

DOJ_NMG_0004351

Oracle Corp. Chief Executive Larry Ellison extended his software consolidation strategy, reaching a long-anticipated deal with his former lieutenant and frequent sparring partner Thomas Siebel to acquire Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in stock and cash.

The deal, valued at about $3.61 billion after accounting for Siebel's holding of about $2.2 billion in cash, allows Oracle to absorb the 3.4 million users of Siebel's software for automating sales operations. Oracle has been using acquisitions to try to catch SAP AG of Germany, the leader in the market for business-software applications

The strategy, honed with Oracle's PeopleSoft Inc. purchase earlier this year, is intended to add the existing business of a target company while broadening the customer base for Oracle's existing products. Oracle, though No. 3 behind Microsoft Corp. and International Business Machine Corp. in total software revenue, lags only SAP in business application programs. But with the addition of Siebel, Oracle now faces the challenge of integrating another large acquisition while it is still digesting PeopleSoft, which it acquired for $10.6 billion after a grueling, 18-month takeover battle. Since then, Oracle has completed a half-dozen smaller acquisitions.

Oracle will bear the cost of maintaining three product lines of so-called customer-relationship management software, as it continues to offer its own system and PeopleSoft's while adding Siebel's. It will also have the expense of a separate sales force for Siebel's product lines. Charles Phillips, one of three Oracle co-presidents, said recent changes to Siebel's sales structure had disrupted the company's business, but added, "We can fix that."

Oracle predicted the deal will close early next year, after approval by Siebel shareholders. The acquisition is expected to face an antitrust review by the Justice Department, which unsuccessfully sought to block Oracle's purchase of PeopleSoft.

Analysts said they don't expect strong opposition this time; Oracle has lagged well behind SAP and Siebel in CRM software, and Oracle's marketing of Siebel products could potentially increase competition in the market.

Oracle executives, who are expected to aggressively cut costs at Siebel, said the deal will add two to three cents a share to Oracle's profits in fiscal year 2007, ending in May 2007, not including acquisition-related charges. Oracle plans to repurchase a number of shares equal to those issued in the acquisition, giving the effect of an all-cash deal for the company. Oracle said it will use about $1.5 billion of its own cash and will borrow the rest.

Mr. Siebel's 10.6% ownership of Siebel's shares stands to earn him a payoff of about $585 million, not including his stock options. Earlier this year, Siebel sweetened the terms of its severance-payment agreements for key employees, with top executives eligible for up to 18 months pay and health coverage.

The acquisition brings full circle the 23-year relationship between two of Silicon Valley's strongest personalities. Mr. Siebel was a top Oracle salesman before leaving the company under disputed circumstances in 1992. Since founding Siebel Systems in 1993, he has been an outspoken critic of his former boss, at times calling Mr. Ellison a "pathological" liar.

For his part, Mr. Ellison in the past sought to hasten Siebel's demise, declaring in 2003 that "Siebel will vanish," and putting pressure on the smaller company by revealing he had held takeover talks with Mr. Siebel the previous year. In recounting those discussions, Mr. Siebel said he told Mr. Ellison, "Larry, you and I worked together for nine years, and that was enough," Information Week reported in 2004.

By this year, Mr. Siebel had become a willing seller, and yesterday he called the combination "a wonderfully exciting event." Mr. Siebel, who built his company into one of technology's highest-fliers, watched its new software sales plummet in recent years as information-technology buyers grew wary of high-priced and complicated automation projects.

Where customers once bought individual "best of breed" products for specific chores, Mr. Siebel said, those companies now want a single supplier to provide programs that work well together. Oracle has pledged to deliver an integrated suite of applications, dubbed "Project Fusion," starting in 2007.

What brought Oracle and Siebel together "was a shift in market dynamics," Mr. Siebel told analysts. "The customer and partner community is communicating quite clearly and voting with their dollars that what they are looking for here is an integrated family of applications," he said.

Even so, the on-again, off-again negotiations required a go-between -- Oracle's Mr. Phillips, who largely handled the talks with Mr. Siebel on Mr. Ellison's behalf. "Sometimes you do need an intermediary between two strong-willed people," Mr. Phillips said.

Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 a share, a premium of roughly 17% to Siebel's closing price Friday of $9.13. Shares of Siebelrose more than 8% late last week as rumors spread that the two companies had been negotiating for weeks and that an agreement was imminent. Monday, Siebel's shares rose 13% or $1.16 to $10.29 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Oracle's shares rose 1.6% or 21 cents to $13.49, also on Nasdaq.

The talks had gone cold last May, and then accelerated in the past month, Mr. Phillips said, after Oracle acquired control of Indian software company i-flex Solutions Ltd. As late as Sunday afternoon, the two sides had reached an impasse over the offer price. "We were one penny away and we almost came apart over one penny," Mr. Phillips said, declining to provide further details. "Every penny was negotiated."

At Siebel's insistence, Oracle agreed to exchange stock for up to 30% of Siebel's shares. If Oracle's shares fall below $10.72 before the deal closes, Siebel shareholders that choose to receive stock will receive 0.994 shares of Oracle for each share of Siebel stock.

[by Oracle]SAP's chief executive, Henning Kagermann, played down the significance of the Oracle-Siebel combination. "We see no impact and no reason to react," he said. Mr. Kagermann predicted further industry consolidation, describing any deals SAP is likely to make as "targeted, fill-in acquisitions," with a price range in the hundreds of millions of dollars, rather than billions.

For IBM, the Siebel deal raises concerns about the computer giant's partners falling under the control of a competitor. IBM and Oracle compete fiercely in database software. Siebel has worked closely with IBM, as did PeopleSoft and J.D. Edwards -- purchased by PeopleSoft -- and retail-software maker Retek Inc., purchased by Oracle.

IBM said in a statement that its strategy is to be a "key partner" to thousands of software vendors. "We will continue to provide customers with IBM hardware, middleware and services for Siebel and other applications -- just as we continue to do so for PeopleSoft," the company said.

Separately, Mr. Ellison has tentatively agreed to pay $100 million to charity over five years to settle private insider trading charges, according to a lawyer representing shareholders who were plaintiffs in the case. The shareholder derivative suit, filed in Superior Court in San Mateo, Calif., stemmed from Mr. Ellison's sales of stock in 2001 before news that Oracle would not meet financial targets, which caused its shares to decline.

The settlement still must be approved by Oracle's board of directors and the court, said Joseph Tabacco Jr., an attorney with Berman DeValerio Pease Tabacco Burt & Pucillo representing plaintiffs in the case. In addition to the payment by Mr. Ellison to charities of his choosing, lawyers involved would receive up to $22.5 million, Mr. Tabacco said. The settlement was reported Monday by the New York Times.

An Oracle spokeswoman declined to comment. A lawyer for Mr. Ellison couldn't immediately be reached.

Oracle To Buy Siebel For $5.53 Billion (WP)

By Mike Musgrove

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Oracle Corp. said yesterday that it has agreed to buy Siebel Systems Inc. in a deal valued at $5.53 billion. If approved, the acquisition would give Oracle an edge on its chief competitor, German firm SAP AG, and reunite top executives who have been bitter Silicon Valley rivals.

Oracle is the world's largest database software company, and Siebel, with a customer base of 3.4 million, is the leader in customer relationship management, or CRM, software, which helps companies organize sales, client and marketing data.

Oracle, which finally won approval of its hostile takeover for rival PeopleSoft earlier this year, has been on a buying spree as a way of bolstering its position against SAP and diversifying its product portfolio. The battle for PeopleSoft, which sparked antitrust concerns from the Department of Justice and European regulators, lasted 18 months before closing in January for $10 billion.

A Justice Department spokeswoman, Gina Talamona, said it was too soon for the agency to comment on Oracle's planned acquisition. "It's certainly something we'd be interested in taking a look at," she said.

Analysts said Oracle's proposed acquisition may not generate the same type of controversy as the PeopleSoft deal because it's not considered a hostile takeover bid and the combined company would not dominate the CRM market.

The acquisition would give Oracle a business that generates $1.6 billion in annual revenue in a CRM market worth $8.8 billion, according to research firm IDC.

If approved, the deal also reunites top executives who have publicly displayed animosity toward each other. Siebel Chairman Thomas M. Siebel spent years as an Oracle executive. When he left to start his own company, the animosity between him and Oracle chief executive Lawrence J. Ellison became part of Silicon Valley lore.

The two were chummy in a conference call with Wall Street analysts yesterday as they pitched the acquisition as a boon to shareholders, employees and customers of both companies.

"In a single step, Oracle becomes the number one CRM applications company in the world," Ellison said in a statement, adding that the deal was encouraged by large customers who wanted to see products from each of the companies work together better. "GE and other mutual customers have long encouraged both companies to get together."

Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 per share, a premium of $1.53 over Siebel's closing price of $9.13 on Friday. After deducting Siebel's $2.24 billion in on-hand cash, Oracle would effectively pay $3.29 billion. In addition, Siebel shareholders could elect to exchange their shares for Oracle stock instead of cash. But if more than 30 percent of Siebel's outstanding shares are offered, Oracle said, it would prorate the exchange.

Siebel's stock reacted to the news yesterday by jumping more than 12 percent, or $1.16, to close at $10.29. Oracle's stock rose slightly, up 21 cents to close at $13.49.

The deal is expected to close early next year.

Thomas Siebel, who controlled about 55 million shares -- or more than 10 percent -- of the company as of April, characterized the deal as "wonderfully exciting" and a "natural business combination."

Tom Dwyer, and analyst at the Yankee Group, called the acquisition a "logical marriage" and another sign of the amount of consolidation in the business application market.

But others, including Janet White of Info-Tech Research Group, criticized Oracle for its slow integration of product lines it's already acquired and said the company has overcommitted itself to support the products created by competitors it has acquired.

"You have to wonder how many resources are left over for innovating any new products or services," she said .

Oracle To Buy Rival Siebel In $5.85B Deal (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, September 13, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Oracle Corp. is buying hobbled Siebel Systems Inc. for about $5.85 billion, eliminating another competitor in its campaign to grab market share from business applications software leader SAP AG.

Under the terms of the deal announced Monday, Redwood Shores-based Oracle will pay $10.66 per share in cash or stock for Siebel, whose products help manage companies' relations with customers.

The price represented a 17 percent premium from Siebel's market value entering Monday. Despite four years of flagging fortunes, Siebel still has $2.24 billion in cash, reducing Oracle's net takeover cost to $3.6 billion.

Shares of San Mateo-based Siebel rose $1.16, or nearly 13 percent, to close at $10.29 during late afternoon trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, where Oracle's shares gained 21 cents to finish at $13.49.

The deal accelerates the drive by Oracle CEO Larry Ellison to overtake SAP as the world's largest maker of business applications software, which automates a wide range of administrative tasks.

In the past nine months, Oracle has either completed or announced five takeovers in the field, an expansion that has cost more than $17.6 billion. Among the acquired was PeopleSoft Inc., which like Siebel Systems was run by a former Oracle executive who had developed a frosty relationship Ellison.

For its part, SAP downplayed the significance of Oracle's latest conquest.

"Oracle is in the business to buy customers. Ours is to service customers," said SAP spokesman Tony Roddam.

The Siebel acquisition, expected to close early next year, affects about 4,000 customers. The company has about 5,000 workers, many of whom are expected to lose their jobs as Oracle cuts costs in an effort to boost its profits by about 20 percent annually.

Industry analyst Richard Williams of Garban Institutional Equities predicted Oracle will lay off more than 2,000 workers, based on the percentage of jobs the company eliminated after devouring PeopleSoft, which had about 11,000 employees. Oracle fired 5,000 workers after that deal.

Oracle executives acknowledged that layoffs are likely but didn't provide specific projections in a Monday conference call.

Oracle's intensifying focus on business applications software largely reflects the slowing growth of its database product line, which accounts for more than three-fourths of the company's sales.

Ellison also wants to deepen Oracle's stack of technology products to compete with two other longtime rivals, Microsoft Corp. and IBM Corp.

"Oracle was behind the curve so it needed to buy some big headline-making companies and feed off their technology," Williams said. "They really didn't have much choice, unless they wanted to see their stock price cut in half. They needed to keep their sales growing, and to do that, they need to cannibalize smaller companies."

The big question now is whether Oracle has bitten off more than it can chew, said Octavio Marenzi, chief executive of Celent, a technology consultancy. "Mergers are always difficult, so doing so many at once only compounds the difficult," he said. "This appears to be an unduly risky strategy."

AMR Research analyst Jim Shepherd believes Oracle can pull it off, primarily because the PeopleSoft takeover has gone more smoothly than most industry experts anticipated.

Ellison began preparing for a software industry shakeout in 2003 when he drew up a list of potential takeover targets topped by PeopleSoft and Siebel Systems, according to documents released in an antitrust trial last year.

Oracle first stalked PeopleSoft, launching an 18-month takeover battle that culminated in a $11.1 billion acquisition last December.

That deal pitted Ellison against one of his former Oracle lieutenants, Craig Conway, who spearheaded PeopleSoft's staunch resistance to the takeover bid until he was fired a few months before the two sides negotiated a truce.

The U.S. Department of Justice tried to derail Oracle's bid for PeopleSoft, arguing that the combination would stifle competition. But a federal judge brushed aside the government's objections and cleared the deal, making it unlikely regulators will oppose Oracle's takeover of Siebel Systems, which is much smaller.

European regulators also must approve the takeover.

Siebel Systems is run by Tom Siebel, who has occasionally sniped at his former boss since leaving Oracle and starting his own company in 1993.

But Tom Siebel, who is his company's chairman and largest individual shareholder, welcomed Oracle's takeover offer, calling it a "wonderful, exciting event" during Monday's conference call.

In the same call, Ellison said Siebel, 52, is expected to remain with Oracle for a few years, but didn't provide specific details. Siebel is in line to pocket nearly $600 million by selling his Siebel Systems stock to Oracle.

Siebel Systems has been shrinking since 2001 amid weakening demand for its main product -- customer relationship management, or CRM, software that helps companies analyze their sales patterns and market their products.

The niche accounts for about $3.5 billion in new software sales annually according to Gartner Inc., but Siebel Systems has been losing market share to SAP, Oracle and an Internet startup, Salesforce.com Inc.

"Siebel could see the writing on the wall and knew the time had come to make a deal," said Yankee Group analyst Tom Dwyer.

Siebel's annual revenue has plunged from a peak of $2.1 billion in 2001 to $1.3 billion last year, a slump that has dragged down the company's stock from its highs of more than $100 per share.

Hoping to turn things around last year, Tom Siebel stepped down as the company's CEO and turned over the reins to a veteran IBM executive, Mike Lawrie.

But sales continued to falter, prompting the company's board to oust Lawrie in April and replace him with George Shaheen, an executive best known in Silicon Valley for overseeing the expensive demise of online grocer Webvan Group Inc.

Oracle Agrees To Buy Siebel Systems For $5.85 Bln (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 12, 2005

Sept. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Oracle Corp., the world's third-largest software maker, agreed to buy Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion, leapfrogging SAP AG to become the top seller of programs that manage customer relations.

Siebel investors will receive $10.66 a share in cash or stock, Redwood City, California-based Oracle said today in a statement. That's 17 percent more than Siebel's closing price Sept. 9.

The purchase, Oracle's seventh this year, reunites Chief Executive Officer Larry Ellison and former protege Tom Siebel. The acquisition also helps Oracle tap the biggest and fastest-growing class of business applications. Siebel lost the top spot in the market to Germany's SAP in 2004 because clients wanted to buy broader packages of software that run everything from customer service to accounting to human resources.

``Siebel had a business that didn't appear fixable," said Herbert Denton, president of Providence Capital Inc. in New York, which has been among the holders calling for the company to be sold. ``The notion that they were going to get back to double digit-growth was far-fetched and reality caught up with the board."

The deal builds on a process that began with the $10.6 billion hostile takeover of PeopleSoft Inc. in January to help cut Oracle's reliance on database software, which makes up 80 percent of sales. The Siebel bid came after clients including General Electric Co. encouraged the deal, Ellison, 61, said on a conference call today.

Siebel shares gained $1.17 to $10.30 at 3:29 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They had dropped 13 percent this year before today. Trading in Siebel call options, which are a bet that the share price will rise, surged Sept. 9, rising to 73,383 contracts, from 1,761 the day before. The stock rose 5.2 percent Sept. 9.

Oracle rose 16 cents to $13.44 and lost 3.2 percent before today. Shares of SAP, which still outpaces Oracle in the overall market for applications, fell 10 cents to $44.23 in New York.

Job Cuts?

The purchase, negotiated between Oracle co-President Charles Phillips and Tom Siebel in the past several months, accelerates consolidation in the software industry. Anti-virus program maker Symantec Corp. bought Veritas Software Corp. in July. International Business Machines Corp. in May bought Ascential Software Corp.

Siebel is attractive because it has a wider set of programs in this area than competitors, with some fine-tuned for industries such as financial services, communications and government, Ellison said.

The company may fire as many workers as it did after the PeopleSoft purchase, when Oracle cut 5,000 jobs, said Andrew Brosseau, an analyst at SG Cowen Securities Corp. in Boston. Siebel had 5,089 employees as of last quarter.

``Oracle is buying a more-complete product portfolio from a company that's been failing to execute," Brosseau said. The firm doesn't have ratings on either company.

PeopleSoft Done

The customer-service market will grow to $10 billion by 2009 from $8 billion in 2004, Oracle said citing researcher IDC.

Customer-service software lets businesses keep track of interactions with customers: the status of their accounts, what products they own, contact information, and call logs to keep track of all interactions with them.

``We wouldn't make any other large acquisitions until we had a few successful quarters showing that the PeopleSoft integration had worked," Ellison said on the call about the timing of today's deal. The PeopleSoft ``integration is complete. The numbers are good."

Siebel's Fall

Tom Siebel, 52, founded the company in 1993, three years after leaving his job as a marketing executive at Oracle. The Internet boom fueled sales, propelling the stock to a high of $119.31 in November 2000 and giving Siebel a market value of $63.2 billion.

Since then, his San Mateo, California-based company has had three years of declining sales because Siebel didn't sell a wide enough variety of programs.

Siebel this year has cut jobs and research spending to help shore up its results after ousting former CEO Mike Lawrie in April after less than a year on the job. New CEO George Shaheen in July blamed the second-quarter loss on a failure to clinch large orders.

Ellison first mentioned it as a takeover target in June 2004 during an antitrust trial over Oracle's PeopleSoft bid.

Tom Siebel will work with Oracle for an undisclosed number of years in an undisclosed role, Ellison said. Tom Siebel, the biggest shareholder with 6.94 percent of the stock, will receive about $386.3 million for his stake.

Hedge funds Tudor Investment Corp. and SAC Capital Advisors LLC may earn about 18 percent on their investments, made in the second quarter. Tudor, run by Paul Tudor Jones and Siebel's No. 2 holder as of June 30, may yield a potential profit of about $51.7 million. SAC in Stamford, Connecticut, founded by Steven Cohen, has a potential gain of about $13.8 million.

Cash or Stock

Ellison said the acquisition will also help Oracle, which has spent more than $18 billion on takeovers this year, bolster its on- demand software business, where customers pay a fixed monthly fee per user to use software over the Internet.

Siebel, which provides its on-demand service with IBM, said it has about 40,000 subscribers for its service. San Francisco-based Salesforce.com Inc. says it's the market leader, with 308,000 users. Microsoft Corp. CEO Steve Ballmer said last week the company is also working on a service to rival Salesforce.com.

Siebel holders will receive cash unless they prefer stock. No more than 30 percent of Siebel's shares may be exchanged for stock. If more holders want shares, the equity part will be pro-rated.

If Oracle's average share price is at or above $10.72 prior to close, holders can receive $10.66 per share of value in Oracle stock. If the average price is less than $10.72, holders receive 0.994 shares of Oracle for each share of Siebel.

The deal will add to Oracle's profit in its first full year in fiscal 2007, excluding some costs, Oracle said. The purchase needs regulatory approval and is expected to close in early 2006. Siebel has cash and short-term investments of $2.2 billion.

Morgan Stanley represented Oracle and Goldman Sachs and Perseus LLC handled the deal for Siebel, the companies said today.

2nd UPDATE: Oracle To Buy Siebel For $5.85 Billion (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, September 12, 2005

NEW YORK -(Dow Jones)- Oracle Corp. (ORCL) (ORCL) agreed to buy fellow business software maker Siebel Systems Inc. (SEBL) (SEBL) for about $5.85 billion in a deal meant to bolster Oracle's challenge to market leader SAP AG (SAP) (SAP).

If the deal closes as planned in early 2006, Oracle, which has been playing the role of industry consolidator, will have spent about $17 billion on acquisitions to shore up its applications business in a span of about 12 months.

Oracle has been expanding in applications - software that performs functions such as managing finances, monitoring supplies, and tracking customer data - to augment its larger database business, which faces robust challenges from International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) (IBM), Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) (MSFT), and the open-source community.

In the long-anticipated deal, Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 a share for Siebel - a premium of about 17% to Siebel's closing price Friday. Oracle will pay for up to 30% of the deal with its stock. The remainder will be financed with about $3 billion in debt and about $1.5 billion from cash reserves. Those cash reserves will be replenished through Siebel's $2.24 billion cash pile.

Rival SAP played down the impact of the deal. "We see no impact and no reason to react," Chief Executive Henning Kagermann told The Wall Street Journal in a telephone interview Monday. Any acquisitions SAP is likely to make would be " targeted, fill-in acquisitions" that would "help us improve our product portfolio," he said.

In a conference call Monday, Oracle Chief Executive Larry Ellison said the deal meets the company's two main acquisition criteria: it's immediately accretive to earnings and it's strategically sound.

On the same call, Chief Financial Officer Greg Maffei said Siebel would add 2 cents to 3 cents a share to Oracle's fiscal 2007 earnings. That represents a modest boost of 2% to 3% to earnings in the fiscal year ending May 2007. Analysts on average estimate Oracle's pro forma earnings per share at 92 cents a share, according to Thomson First Call.

Ellison said Siebel would contribute to Oracle's goal of 20% annual earnings growth. He said Oracle was ready for another big acquisition after integrating PeopleSoft, which the company bought for about $10.6 billion after an 18-month hostile takeover battle. The company would now focus its energies on smaller deals. "I don't think you'll see another major acquisition anytime soon," said Ellison.

For the fiscal year ended May 31, Oracle earned $2.89 billion, or 55 cents a share, on revenue of $11.8 billion. Income before items was 68 cents a share. Siebel earned $110.7 million, or 20 cents a share, on revenue of $1.34 billion, in 2004.

Analysts were skeptical of the deal, saying it adds confusion and complexity to Oracle's applications business, which has struggled in the past and is in the midst of a major product redesign. It also brings into the fold a company with few growth prospects.

"The bottom line is Siebel can't grow," said Richard Williams, an analyst with Garban Institutional Equities, who doesn't own shares in either company and whose firm doesn't have a banking relationship with the companies.

"Oracle appears to be close to biting off more than they can chew," said Octavio Marenzi, Chief Executive of research and consulting firm Celent. "Oracle risks trying to integrate too many pieces at once. At the same time, the CRM market has lost its bloom."

Credit rating agency Fitch put Oracle's A- credit rating on negative watch. " Fitch remains concerned about integration risks associated with the...acquisitions (of Siebel and PeopleSoft)," Fitch said in a statement. "(Fitch) also believes successful integration and cost-cutting initiatives from these various acquisitions could result in Oracle having stronger operating fundamentals and a more competitive position."

Siebel, the leader in the $8 billion customer relationship management software market, has issued profit warnings for the last two consecutive quarters, with new software sales disappointing. It also ousted Chief Executive J. Michael Lawrie after the disappointing first quarter.

Siebel is getting squeezed by bigger players like Oracle and SAP, as well as by more nimble vendors such as Salesforce.com Inc. (CRM) (CRM). Tom Siebel, Siebel's founder and chairman, acknowledged that a market shift that favored vendors that sell a broader suite of products, like Oracle, was a driving force behind the decision to sell the company.

Salesforce.com (CRM), which offers its software as a Web-based service, sees Siebel's acquisition by Oracle as a chance for it to gain market share. "The opportunity to be the global leader in the CRM market has opened for salesforce.com," Chief Executive Marc Benioff said a statement. "Our dream is becoming reality."

Salesforce.com (CRM) user base is only about 10% of Siebel's 3.4 million users, but it's been growing rapidly unlike Siebel.

In recent months, Siebel had battled against the sale, rebuffing activist investors and espousing a go-it-alone growth strategy. In May, Siebel promised its nearly 5,300 employees more severance pay and health coverage if the company was acquired.

But that drive for independence appears to have given way to the certainty of cash and a clear exit. Tom Siebel alone stands to cash in nearly $400 million - a payout he would have had difficulty realizing if his company remained independent.

Siebel's board has voted in favor of the deal, and Tom Siebel, who will have an undefined role at Oracle following the deal, has agreed to vote his shares for the transaction. He controls almost 7% of the company's stock.

Oracle's Ellison said Siebel's integration would be "dramatically easier" than PeopleSoft's, because the deal for Siebel was friendly and because of the experience gained in the PeopleSoft process.

He also said Oracle would support Siebel products for "many, many years to come" and would retain Siebel's sales force.

Oracle is currently committed to support PeopleSoft products through 2013, and is in the process of melding PeopleSoft and Oracle applications into a single system, called Fusion, which is due to be rolled out in 2008.

Oracle, PeopleSoft, as well as J.D. Edwards - a company acquired along with PeopleSoft - all have products with sales support and customer service functions similar to Siebel's. Still, Siebel is the recognized industry leader.

The deal is subject to approval by Siebel's shareholders and regulatory authorities. Oracle shareholder approval isn't required, because of the relatively small number of shares involved.

Oracle isn't likely to face the same amount of regulatory resistance as it did when it sought to take over PeopleSoft, because the deal's friendly and U.S. antitrust officials are still smarting from the PeopleSoft setback, said Jeff Comport, an analyst with industry research firm Gartner.

The conversion rate of Oracle's shares will be fixed by the average price of Oracle stock in the 10 trading days before closing. If Oracle's average share price is at or above $10.72 before closing, Siebel shareholders who choose to receive stock will get $10.66 a share in Oracle stock for each share of Siebel stock held.

If Oracle's average share price before closing is less than $10.72 a share, Siebel shareholders who choose stock will receive 0.994 Oracle shares for each share of Siebel stock held. This would result in a value of less than $10.66 a share.

Oracle plans to repurchase an amount of shares equal to the number of shares issued in the transaction to address dilution concerns.

Oracle shares were recently trading at $13.46, up 18 cents or 1.4%. Siebel shares rose 12.9% at $10.31.

Regulators Move Ahead On Two Phone Mergers (AP)

By JENNIFER C. KERR, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The head of the Federal Communications Commission has asked agency staff to draft orders approving two big phone company mergers - SBC Communications Inc. with AT&T, and Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI Inc.

FCC chairman Kevin Martin wants the commission to take a final vote on the deals next month, two people with firsthand knowledge of the issue said Monday. They were authorized to speak about the drafts only on the condition of anonymity.

The sources would not say what conditions might be placed on the mergers to ensure competition is not compromised.

An FCC spokesman declined to comment.

SBC's deal to acquire AT&T is valued at $16 billion while Verizon is offering $8.5 billion for MCI. SBC and Verizon already are the largest regional phone companies, known informally as "Baby Bells." The mergers would enhance their base of business customers and expand their national and international presence.

The Bells have been peeling away long-distance customers from AT&T and MCI by offering unlimited national calling for a set rate.

Martin's request for drafts of approval signal his intention to press ahead with the mergers despite the 2-2 split between Republicans and Democrats on the commission. The decision also seems to indicate Martin's willingness to reach out to the Democrats to craft an agreement.

The White House has not given any hint as to when it might fill the FCC's open fifth seat, which will go to a Republican.

The Justice Department also will have to sign off on the mergers.

Analysts expect the mergers will come with conditions to ensure competition is retained in different service areas. For example, Jessica Zufolo, senior policy analyst with Medley Global Advisors, said regulators have expressed concerns about special access lines - the fiber optic lines that allow large businesses to hook to the Internet and the interstate network.

"Once you eliminate AT&T and MCI, the fear is that the Bells will be able to establish a bottleneck to large business users," she said.

Consumer advocates say AT&T and MCI are the only real competitors to the Bells in those markets, and that competition will disappear if the mergers gain approval.

"We're losing serious competitors for the residential consumer and the business market," said Mark Cooper, research director at the Consumer Federation of America.

SBC spokesman Michael Balmoris declined to comment on Martin's decision to move toward approval of the mergers, saying only that the company remains "optimistic the FCC recognizes the benefits the merger will bring in terms of greater choice, and access to new technologies."

Verizon spokesman David Fish said its merger with MCI would benefit consumers and should get all the necessary regulatory approvals later this year or early next year.

EBay To Acquire Internet Phone Leader (WP)

By Jonathan Krim

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Online auction giant eBay Inc. announced a deal yesterday to become one of the world's largest telecommunications companies, buying Internet phone-service leader Skype Technologies SA.

Although Luxembourg-based Skype is relatively unknown in the United States, it has amassed 54 million global customers in less than three years by offering free calls between those who use its software.

EBay became a commerce powerhouse by hosting everything from auctions of grandma's collectibles to retail sales of new furniture and electronics, but its growth has stagnated, and analysts said the Skype deal is an effort to inject new life. The company said it sees Skype's technology as a vital tool for letting buyers and sellers talk to each other, exchange information and close sales more rapidly.

The deal would vault eBay ahead of other technology titans such as Microsoft Corp., Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc. in developing services to make voice calling an additional feature of using personal computers, akin to e-mail or instant messaging. EBay said it would pay $2.6 billion in cash and stock for Skype, along with future payments that could total an additional $1.5 billion.

Founded by business partners who developed the Kazaa file-sharing service for online music and videos, Skype quickly dwarfed other Internet-based phone companies such as Vonage Holdings Corp., which recently celebrated its 1 millionth customer.

Large cable and telephone firms, such as AT&T Corp., Verizon Communications Inc. and Comcast Corp., also are starting to offer online phone service. They typically charge $20 to $35 per month for unlimited calling in the United States, including free add-ons such as voice mail and call forwarding, and consumers use regular telephone handsets attached to special computer modems that handle the voice calls.

Skype's service and technology differ dramatically from those offerings. Making a Skype call is more like sending an instant message from a personal computer; all that is required is an Internet connection, a microphone for talking, and speakers or a headset for listening.

Skype charges nothing for its software but makes money by charging small fees for making calls to non-Skype users and for talking to people on regular phone networks. Voice mail also is extra.

"By combining the two leading e-commerce franchises, eBay and [online payment service] PayPal, with the leader in Internet voice communications, we will create an extraordinarily powerful environment for business on the Net," eBay chief executive Margaret C. Whitman said in a statement.

In addition to boosting sales, which would earn eBay more commissions, company officials envision Skype accelerating types of electronic commerce that depend heavily on voice conversation, such as personal services, real estate and new cars.

Skype would continue to operate as a separate business, with founders Niklas Zennstrom of Sweden and Janus Friis of Denmark remaining at the helm. The deal would make rich men of the pair, who had been considered outlaws by the U.S. entertainment industry for developing Kazaa, which they sold in 2002.

Zennstrom remains a target of some U.S. litigation accusing Kazaa of facilitating piracy of copyrighted music, videos and software. Skype makes use of the same, underlying "peer-to-peer" technology as Kazaa but carries none of the legal issues.

In an interview, Whitman said Internet telephone service using downloadable software is the future. She cited statistics indicating that by 2009, an estimated 1.5 trillion minutes of voice calls will be Internet-based.

She added that Skype is well ahead of its competition for such systems and already is partnering with such companies as Motorola Inc. for handsets that will work with Skype.

"But we would not have done this if that is all we could see," she said, insisting that integrating Skype, eBay auctions and PayPal would yield significant new revenue for eBay's current businesses.

Closely held Skype had sales of about $7 million last year and is projected to bring in $200 million next year, according to the companies, causing some analysts to question the price eBay paid.

"It's a pretty big number and a pretty big gamble," said Carmi Levy, senior research analyst with Info-Tech Research Group of London, Ontario.

But Levy said that eBay's growth had become stagnant and that it needed to find a way to make its auctions more dynamic.

DOJ_NMG_0004360

Zennstrom said in a statement that his vision was always "to build the world's largest communications business and revolutionize the ease with which people can communicate through the Internet. We can't think of a better platform . . . than with eBay and PayPal."

Analysts said the deal would accelerate the evolution of two new classes of voice communication providers.

Led by Skype, one group makes voice a part of the suite of applications on the computer "desktop." These include Google, Yahoo and Microsoft.

The other is made up of telephone and cable companies that seek to make voice calling part of the suite of offerings that comes with high-speed Internet access and television services.

Left out in the cold, said Kate Griffin, consumer technologies analyst for the Yankee Group, could be unaffiliated Internet-phone providers such as Vonage or 8x8 Inc.

Whitman said she does not expect Skype to be a substitute for basic telephone service for a long time, in the same way that eBay auctions have not replaced retail stores.

EBay's new competitors reacted cautiously.

A BellSouth Corp. spokesman said that his company takes Skype seriously and that it should be expected to fulfill the same obligations as other carriers, such as providing 911 services.

Whitman acknowledged that joining the ranks of communications companies would require eBay to "get to know a whole new set of players" in Washington and elsewhere.

EBay To Buy Skype For $2.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Mylene Mangalindan And Christopher Rhoads

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

EBay Inc. said it agreed to acquire Internet-calling start-up Skype Technologies SA for about $2.6 billion in cash and stock, posing a new threat to phone companies and expanding the online-auction company's revenue sources.

Founded in 2002, Luxembourg's Skype allows its subscribers to talk to one another over personal computers free. It also allows cut-rate voice calls from PCs to regular phones or cellphones. Skype, which employs about 200 people, has signed up 54 million users, mainly in Europe and Asia so far, making it one of the fastest-growing online communities.

EBay officials said the acquisition gives the company a new way to reach millions of potential customers, to help customers make complicated transactions, and to open up ways to generate revenue from services such as classified advertisements. Chief Executive Meg Whitman said Skype will also help eBay penetrate developing markets such as India, Brazil, Russia and China that offer huge growth potential but typically have lower levels of trust in Internet-based commerce. "It allows us to create this unique e-commerce engine for buyers and sellers around the world," Ms. Whitman said.

For the telecommunications industry, the deal could raise the stakes in a market already roiled by rapid consolidation in recent months and the infusion of a host of new competitors offering Internet phoning, including cable companies and start-ups like Vonage Holdings Corp. Skype's U.S. presence remains relatively small compared with its visibility in Europe and Asia -- something the eBay deal could help change.

"We think Skype can grow with this association in helping it become the voice of the Internet," said Kelly Larabee, a Skype spokeswoman.

Consumers are increasingly using the Web for voice calls, much as they use it for emailing. Voice services are offered not just by phone companies but also by videogame concerns and Internet companies such as Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc.

EBay contemplated building its own Internet-call service, "but we didn't feel we would have a winning product," Ms. Whitman said in an interview. "Skype is pretty far ahead in many dimensions." Skype boasts a community of 1,000 developers who are building Skype-related applications.

The San Jose, Calif., company may use this acquisition to drive more transactions to traditional merchants who use eBay's comparison-shopping site, Shopping.com, Ms. Whitman said. Those merchants, who already have established telephone call centers to take customer orders, may garner more revenue from customers who have access to Internet phone calls, said Scot Wingo, chief executive of ChannelAdvisor Corp., a closely held company that helps Internet sellers.

EBay also may be able to derive revenue from free classified listings around the world by adding pay-per-call services through Skype, said an eBay spokesman. The company told some analysts that it could link accounts on its PayPal electronic-payment service to Skype accounts, which could help generate more transactions through PayPal.

The eBay-Skype transaction may spur phone companies to more quickly roll out their own voice-over-Internet-protocol services, which most have begun offering in the past year, industry executives said.

EBay was up 32 cents to $38.94 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq composite trading.

EBay said it may pay out as much as $1.5 billion additionally if certain financial targets are met.

Ebay, Skype Deal Challenges Rivals (FT)

By Richard Waters And Paul Taylor

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

Ebay on Monday laid out plans to move beyond its core e-commerce business, potentially putting it on a collision course with Google and Yahoo, as it confirmed its acquisition of internet voice company Skype for up to $4.1bn.

The auction company's executives said that adding a voice calling feature to its existing online network would let it charge fees to merchants for generating sales leads the internet's fastest-growing business, currently dominated by the two biggest search engine companies. It could represent the most important in a series of recent initiatives by Ebay to extendinto new areas of online activity.

However, the high price for the transaction and the young nature of Skype's business prompted scepticism among some telecommunications industry executives and analysts, who questioned Ebay's ability to generate significant revenues from its new acquisition.

"Ebay has no related presence in the online personal communications market (no instant messaging, chat or e-mail services) and we do not see immediate synergies from such a move," said Mark Main, Senior Analyst with Ovum, the leading telecoms consultancy.

The online auction company said it would pay $2.6bn for Skype, half of it in cash and half in stock, with up to $1.5bn more to be paid if the company meets certain performance targets over the next three years.

Meg Whitman, Ebay's chief executive officer, said that by integrating Skype's voice calling technology into Ebay's markets, making it easier for buyers and sellers to communicate, the company would be able to lower the "friction" in online transactions and increase the overall value of its services.

She also laid out a plan for Ebay to charge fees for generating sales leads, with merchants paying every time a potential customer clicks on a link in an online listing to initiate a voice call.

Some advertisers might beprepared to pay between $2and $12 for each call, she added.

Ebay's millions of visitors could represent a valuable audience for such a service, said Youssef Squali, an analyst atJeffries, a New York investment firm, since they usually visitthe site intending to make a purchase.

Based on conventional measures of valuation, such as its current revenues, the Skype purchase looked expensive, analysts said. The company generated $7m of revenues last year, with $60m expected this year and more than $200m in 2006, eBay said.

Rajiv Dutta, Ebay's chief financial officer, said this represented a faster pick-up in revenues than either Ebay or PayPal, its online payments service, had experienced in their first years of charging for their services, suggesting that Skype would prove a valuable money-earner for the company.

EBay To Buy Skype, Internet Phone Service, For $2.6 Billion (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

EBay said yesterday that it would buy Skype Technologies, the Internet phone provider based in Luxembourg, for $2.6 billion in cash and stock, a move that eBay hopes will bolster trading on its online auction site.

The total value of the deal may grow based on "potential performance-based consideration" that could be worth an additional $1.5 billion, eBay said. Though Skype's revenue is expected to grow to about $200 million in 2006, from an estimated $60 million this year, eBay does not expect Skype - which gives its basic PC-to-PC service away free - to turn a profit until the fourth quarter next year.

The deal ends months of speculation about who might scoop up Skype, which since 2002 has been offering downloadable software that allows users to talk to one another over the Internet through their personal computers. The News Corporation, Google and Yahoo had been mentioned as potential suitors in recent months.

Meg Whitman, chief executive of eBay, said the acquisition did not mean that eBay intended to become a Web portal like Yahoo, Microsoft and Google, which deliver a range of services.

Instead, Skype's voice communications technology will make online trading easier for eBay's 157 million users, she said, particularly with transactions involving real estate, big-ticket purchases and services that require detailed conversations.

"I'm a big believer in focusing brands and businesses that are in very large markets," Ms. Whitman said by phone from London. EBay is "absolutely not" interested in developing a portal, she said. "You can be sure we're going to focus on e-commerce."

Noting that eBay also owns PayPal, the online payment service, Ms. Whitman said "by combining the two leading e-commerce franchises, eBay and PayPal, with the leader in Internet voice communications, we will create an extraordinarily powerful environment for business on the net."

The deal also adds a new twist to the story of Skype's co-founders, Niklas Zennstrom and Janus Friis, who developed Skype after creating and selling Kazaa, the controversial file-sharing service.

That company has been at the center of a copyright infringement lawsuit filed by the music industry. Mr. Zennstrom and Mr. Friis sold Kazaa in January 2002 to Australian investors before that suit was filed. They were named as defendants in the suit, but they have challenged the jurisdiction of the United States courts because they are citizens in Europe. (Nothing bars Mr. Zennstrom and Mr. Friis from traveling to the United States, but they have not been to this country in many years.)

Executives at eBay said that any litigation involving Kazaa or the involvement of Mr. Zennstrom and Mr. Friis in Kazaa would not affect Skype or eBay. Skype, like Kazaa, uses a peer-to-peer file-sharing technology.

While eBay will acquire Skype's 54 million users in 225 countries and territories, the company said it was not interested in becoming a telecommunications provider or challenging traditional phone providers. Still, with Skype adding 150,000 new users a day, the company represents another threat to established carriers like the Bell companies, which maintain extensive phone and data networks.

"Skype is very disruptive to the telecom business and it's one of the reasons people are adopting to it quickly," Mr. Zennstrom said.

In North America, Skype has more users and carries more voice traffic than any other Internet-based phone provider, the companies said.

In addition to the basic service, about two million Skype customers have signed up for a pay service that allows them to use their computers to make calls to regular phone numbers as well as receive calls from landlines and cellphones. To complete these calls, Skype pays phone companies small per-minute fees.

Only 13 percent of Skype's users are in North America; nearly half are in Europe and another quarter are in Asia.

While Skype is the market leader in peer-to-peer voice software, it is not alone. Last month, Google announced Google Talk, a service similar to Skype's free service, and Microsoft said it was acquiring Teleo, a San Francisco company that allows users to call conventional phones from their PC's.

Some industry specialists said eBay's purchase of Skype was a sign that voice calls would increasingly become one of many services that Internet companies would provide, rather than a stand-alone business.

"This turns the entire telecom industry picture on its head, and demonstrates that voice, presence, text messaging and other I.P.-based applications will be essential for the company of the future," said Jeff Pulver, the chairman of pulvermedia, which promotes Internet-based phone services.

Investors seemed to agree. Shares in eBay rose 32 cents, to $38.94, on Monday. The company's shares have fallen 31.7 percent this year, however, because of investor concerns about its slowing growth.

Some industry analysts were also skeptical about the high price for a company with so little revenue that is facing increasing competition from other Internet phone providers.

"Quite frankly, you look at the numbers and you realize there has to be something more for eBay to buy into," said Carmi Levy, an analyst at the Info-Tech Research Group in London, Ontario. "In 1998, we used to see the same thing with the buying of companies that did not have a whole lot of prospects."

While the purchase will shave about 12 cents off earnings next year, the price paid for Skype is less than 5 percent of eBay's market capitalization of $53 billion.

EBay will also inherit some of the legal and regulatory challenges facing Skype. Regulators in the United States and elsewhere have yet to decide, for instance, whether Skype will have to make it possible for its customers to call 911 and have their locations recognized by emergency responders.

$2.6B Deal Gets EBay Into Internet Telephony (USAT)

By Kevin Maney

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Making one of its riskiest bets yet, eBay said Monday that it will buy Internet voice service Skype.

That could eventually pit eBay against phone companies and VoIP services such as Vonage. Buying Skype "is a lot more of a stretch than any of the other acquisitions they've done," says David Edwards, equity analyst at American Technology Research.

EBay will pay $2.6 billion for Skype, which can be used to make free, high-quality voice calls from one computer running Skype software to another, anywhere in the world. Customers need a PC with a microphone. For a fee, Skype users can call regular telephones and vice versa.

EBay insists the deal isn't a major corporate turn. Top eBay executives became aware of Skype about a year ago, "And we started putting some thinking against Skype," says eBay CFO Rajiv Dutta.

Building Skype into eBay will allow buyers and sellers to click a button on the screen to talk to each other, Dutta says. That would be valuable when a buyer has a lot of questions about an expensive product, such as a car, or when an auction is close to closing.

"We've always sought to remove friction from e-commerce," eBay CEO Meg Whitman says. Adding Skype "will lead to a better experience and increase the velocity of trades." Plus, eBay could charge sellers to add Skype to their postings, Whitman says.

Yet the deal moves eBay into unfamiliar territory against powerful competitors. Skype co-founder Niklas Zennstrom on Monday repeated his boast that he has a "vision of creating the world's largest communications company."

"That's what made Skype special to us," Dutta says. "We loved their vision."

Though other online services such as Google Talk offer free computer-to-computer voice conversations, Skype has caught fire globally. It's adding 150,000 users a day, the majority in countries such as China, India and Sweden. In 2005, Skype's first full year of charging for services, it will have revenue of $60 million. Skype expects revenue to jump to $200 million in 2006.

Before starting Skype, Zennstrom and partner Janus Friis created Kazaa, a file-sharing service that has mostly been used to trade pirated music.

EBay sees Skype as a high-growth business and strong brand name on the Net, which could help reinvigorate eBay's growth, Dutta says. In 2003, eBay's revenue jumped 78% from the year before. In 2004, growth slowed to 51%. EBay shares closed Monday at $38.94, up 32 cents.

EBay To Acquire Internet Communications Company Skype (LAT/AP)

By From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Online auctioneer eBay Inc. agreed today to pay at least $2.6 billion in cash and stock for Internet phone provider Skype Technologies SA, confounding many analysts who questioned the lofty price tag and the companies' compatibility.

The total value of the deal may climb to $4.1 billion based on whether Skype meets a series of performance targets over the next three years, San Jose, Calif.-based eBay said. It said the acquisition would create "an unparalleled e-commerce and communications engine" for Internet users worldwide.

Low-cost Internet phone providers like Skype are creating upheaval in the telecommunications industry. That's because Voice over Internet Protocol technology, or VoIP, breaks calls into data packets that get routed over the Internet, which is much more efficient and cheaper than the traditional circuit-switched phone system.

Skype -- founded by the creators of Kazaa, the free music-sharing program that riled the music business -- gives away software lets people talk for free over the Internet using computers and microphones. A paid version, SkypeOut, allows those calls to be connected to regular phones.

Other big Internet names have expanded their VoIP capabilities lately, including Google Inc., which rolled out a new instant-messaging program with voice service. Last month Microsoft Corp. acquired Teleo Inc., a small startup whose software lets people make calls from computers to traditional telephones.

But some analysts have been skeptical about eBay's need to own a VoIP provider.

EBay buyers and sellers can communicate with each other via e-mail before a transaction is complete -- eBay says about 5 million such messages are exchanged daily. Adding Skype and its voice capabilities will speed the communication between parties and increase the level of trust, said Meg Whitman, eBay's chief executive.

"It's instantaneous and private," she said. "You don't have the person's phone number, just a user name, so it protects the privacy of all users."

She also said Skype would help eBay open "several new lines of business."

"Communications is at the heart of e-commerce and community," said Whitman, who had won praise for avoiding deals beyond eBay's core, marketplace-based strategy, especially during the late 1990s Internet craze. "We will create an extraordinarily powerful environment for business on the Net."

EBay shares rose 23 cents, or 0.6 percent, to $38.85 in morning trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Niklas Zennstrom, Skype's CEO and co-founder, will join eBay's senior executive team. He said the deal will help advance his company's goal to "revolutionize the ease with which people can communicate through the Internet."

"When we started Skype, our vision was to create a global communications company," he said, noting that the company has users in almost every country. "I think the only country we don't have on the map is North Korea."

But Ovum analyst Mark Main said he considered the deal "far-fetched" and said eBay could have found cheaper ways to improve its Internet communication abilities.

"EBay could have developed its own sophisticated messaging and communications platform, or even bought one, for far less money than it is paying for Skype," Main said. "And if eBay is mainly paying for Skype's user base and brand, that makes this a risky investment."

Whitman, however, said Skype's name carries great value with customers, noting that many Internet users have started referring to phoning via their computer as "to Skype someone."

"When people are using your brand name as a verb, that is incredibly powerful," Whitman said.

She also said Skype has great market share in places where eBay is not heavily used, such as Japan and the Nordic countries, which may help the online auction company attract more customers.

Skype has 53 million registered users, including more than 2 million who pay for its premium services. Since it was introduced in 2003, the company's free software has been downloaded more than 164 million times.

In 2004, the company generated about $7 million in revenue, which it projects will snowball to $60 million this year and more than $200 million in 2006.

EBay recently trounced analysts' expectations by reporting it earned $291.6 million, or 21 cents per share, for the three months ended in June, a 53 percent increase from last year. Revenue totaled $1.09 billion, a 40 percent increase.

Overall, eBay's community spanned 157 million registered users, up 10 million from March. The company had $3.7 billion in cash and other current assets as of June 30.

But bringing Skype into the fold is expected to cut eBay's earnings in the short term. EBay projected that the acquisition will reduce earnings per share by 4 cents in the fourth quarter of this year and by 12 cents in 2006.

Real Estate Competition Up For Debate (INMAN)

Inman News, September 13, 2005

Four days after launching a lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors for alleged anticompetitive practices, federal agencies are planning a public forum to discuss competition in the real estate industry.

The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission will jointly host a one-day workshop on competition policy and the real estate industry next month, the agencies said.

The workshop will be held on Oct. 25, at the FTC's Satellite Building Conference Center located at 601 New Jersey Ave. NW, in Washington, D.C.

The workshop is free and open to the public and aims to provide a forum on the competitiveness of the residential real estate industry, focusing on topics such as multiple listing services, discount and limited-service brokers, and minimum-service requirements.

In particular, discussion will center on the real estate transaction, the multiple listing service, and private and state actions that affect competition among brokers.

Parties seeking to participate as panelists in the workshop must notify both the Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the FTC in writing on or before Sept. 25. Persons submitting a request to participate as a panelist will be notified on or before Oct. 11, if they have been selected.

The Justice Department on Thursday filed an antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors challenging the trade group's policies for Internet listings. The lawsuit charges that NAR's Web listings policy is anticompetitive because it blocks new brokerage companies from entering the market.

NAR's newest Internet listings policy was made public last Thursday. It combines and eliminates two previous policies for Web listings display.

NAR asserts that the Justice Department "mischaracterized the purpose and effect" of a part of the new policy that enables brokers to restrain their listings from being shown on other brokers' Web sites. The trade group has said that part of the policy "was intended to protect brokers' ownership rights in their property listings."

NAR officials had been in discussions with the Justice Department since May, seeking a compromise that would've relieved antitrust officials' concerns.

The Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the FTC are accepting public comments on the issue until Nov. 28. Comments may be submitted in hardcopy or electronic format. For more detailed instructions on how to submit comments, see the Federal Register Notice.

Last week's lawsuit is the latest in a multilevel attack on the industry. The Justice Department earlier this year filed a lawsuit against the Kentucky Real Estate Commission over its restrictions on real estate rebates. The suit was settled in July, when the state commission lifted the ban on rebates.

Also, Justice Department and FTC officials have been sending out warning letters to states considering adopting legislation or regulation that could inhibit some discount and limited-service brokerage models.

U.K. Loan Insurers Face Antitrust Probe After Group Complains (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 13, 2005

Sept. 13 (Bloomberg) -- Barclays Plc, Lloyds TSB Group Plc, HBOS Plc and Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc are among U.K. banks facing an antitrust probe after a consumer group said loan insurance in Britain is expensive and inappropriately sold.

Citizens Advice, a nonprofit organization, asked Britain's Office of Fair Trading to investigate the 5 billion-pound ($9.1 billion) a year market after uncovering numerous problems, the London-based organization said in an e-mailed statement released today. The complaint triggered an automatic review by the antitrust regulator, which has 90 days to decide on a full investigation.

The call for an investigation of loan insurers is the second this year, after a committee of lawmakers in February asked the Financial Services Authority, the main regulator of banks and insurers, for a probe, saying some consumers have purchased policies that they won't be able to use to make claims.

``Borrowers are often sold completely inappropriate policies," Citizens Advice said. ``The sale of protection insurance is also often linked to irresponsible lending."

The report didn't name any companies involved in the sale of loan insurance, which is provided by all of Britain's biggest banks on credit card and other unsecured debt.

Loan insurance policies are intended to cover payments on debt if the borrower falls ill or becomes unemployed. In some instances banks have sold these policies to people who are already unemployed or ill, which would then prohibit them from claiming under the policies, Citizens Advice said.

The Treasury Select Committee, which has been investigating credit card charges by Britain's biggest banks, in February said some lenders were providing quotes for loans without making clear that these included charges for insurance. Banks also failed to explain the circumstances under which customers can't claim, the committee said.

Private Equity Firms Buy Hertz For $15bn (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

A consortium of three private equity groups on Monday announced the purchase of Hertz, the New Jersey-based car rental business, in a deal worth $15bn that ranks as the largest buy-out since 1989.

The acquisition, by Clayton Dubilier & Rice, Carlyle, and the buy-out unit of Merrill Lynch, came after several weeks of negotiations with Ford, the carmaker that has owned all of Hertz since 2001 and is selling the unit as part of its revitalisation plan.

The three buyers will be paying $5.6bn in cash to Ford, and have agreed to assume nearly $10bn in debt under the agreement.

CD&R, which specialises in acquiring units of large conglomerates, had been considering a buy-out of Hertz for three years. After Ford announced it was exploring options for its rental business in June, the discussions accelerated, and CD&R was joined by the other two members of the consortium. The $15bn price tag makes Hertz the largest buy-out since RJR Nabisco was acquired by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts 16 years ago for roughly $30bn.

In recent years, private equity groups have been raising increasingly large pools of money, from which they have been making ever greater investments. This year, there have been a number of blockbuster buy-outs, the biggest of which was SunGard Data Systems' sale to seven investment firms for $11.3bn.

David Wasserman of CD&R on Monday explained the rationale for the deal by the Fthat Hertz had a "leading franchise, a great brand, and a seasoned and strong management team".

The buyers dismissed suggestions that the jump in petrol prices could make it an unattractive time to invest in car rentals, by saying that they were optimistic about the long-term trends in the travel industry.

The acquisition is being financed with a combination of asset-backed securities linked to Hertz's fleet of rental cars, traditional corporate debt, and the equity contributions of the three buy-out groups.

Mr Wasserman appeared to indicate that there would be no significant changes in strategy at Hertz under the new owners, which outbid a rival private equity consortium including Blackstone and Texas Pacific Group.

There were no plans to extract cost savings through large-scale staff reductions, and the consortium would continue to support management's plans to diversify away from airport rentals.

Ford was advised by Goldman Sachs, Citigroup and JPMorgan Chase. The buyers were advised by Lehman Brothers, Deutsche Bank and Merrill Lynch.

Carlyle And Other Investors To Pay $15 Billion For Hertz (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

DOJ_NMG_0004367

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

A group of investors that includes the District-based Carlyle Group said yesterday that it has agreed to buy Hertz Corp., the car rental company, from Ford Motor Co. for $15 billion in cash and debt.

The deal will provide a $5.6 billion cash infusion to the automaker, whose bonds were downgraded in May to junk status.

Carlyle's cash outlay of about $767 million would be its second-largest, after the $808.5 million in cash it put up in 2003 for the telephone directory business of Qwest Communications, Carlyle spokesman Christopher Ullman said.

Carlyle managing director Gregory S. Ledford said the investment firm sees growth potential in Hertz's overseas and heavy equipment rental businesses. The buyout firm viewed Hertz as a "corporate orphan" -- a well-run company with a good brand and a good business that is not central to its corporate parent's business, Ledford said. "We spend a lot of time looking for businesses like that," he said.

Ledford said he didn't believe rising crude oil and gasoline prices would have a big impact on Hertz, "unless it really impacts people flying," because Hertz's business is largely driven by airport traffic.

Ledford said Ford is selling because "they need cash," but a Ford spokeswoman put it differently.

"We've decided that it's not core to our strategic business plan," Ford's Becky Sanch said.

Ford in recent months had been preparing a public offering of Hertz stock but opted for the sale because it provided "a strong value in up-front cash proceeds," Sanch said.

Carlyle's partners in the deal are Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity and Clayton, Dubilier & Rice Inc., each of which is taking a one-third stake, Carlyle's Ullman said. Clayton, Dubilier & Rice partner George W. Tamke is to become chairman.

Buyout Group Snags Ford's Hertz For $5.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Henny Sender And Avery Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A buyout group led by Clayton Dubilier & Rice is set to acquire Ford Motor Co.'s Hertz Corp. for $5.6 billion, in an anticlimactic end to an auction among private-equity firms.

The acquiring group, which also includes Carlyle Group and Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, will finance the deal with a combination of $2.3 billion in equity and more than $12 billion in debt. The acquiring group will assume around $10 billion in Hertz debt.

"It was a complicated divestiture," said David Wasserman who led the CDR group efforts. "The sale delivers certainty and value to Ford and we get a great brand and franchise."

The last days of the bidding war took place against the backdrop of a hurricane that led many economists to forecast lower growth for the car-rental industry. Hertz has annual revenue of more than $7 billion. But concerns about growth didn't deter bidders, giving Ford a bigger payday than auction participants anticipated. The losing group consisted of Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee & Partners.

Private-equity firms, which cater to institutional investors and wealthy individuals, acquire companies and divisions of companies, often using large amounts of debt to finance their purchases.

The dynamics of the Hertz auction suggest that there is indeed little competition for the largest buyouts. There were no strategic investors and only two private-equity consortia sparring over Hertz. But the outcome also suggested that less competition doesn't necessarily mean a bargain price, a pattern that also characterized the $11.3 billion buyout of SunGard Data Systems earlier this year.

This fall is expected to see a series of even-larger deals, possibly even exceeding the $25 billion buyout of RJR Nabisco in 1989. Both Carlyle and Blackstone are flush with money. Apollo Management recently raised almost $10 billion, Warburg Pincus raised more than $8 billion, and Texas Pacific Group may well go to its investors soon for more cash as well. Private-equity firms generally like such megadeals because they enable them to deploy vast sums swiftly and collect management and transaction fees that reflect the size of the deal.

The outcome of the auction reflects CDR's determination to acquire Hertz. CDR will have three board seats and partner George Tamke will be chairman of the board. The two other CDR partners, Carlyle and Merrill, will each have two seats on the Hertz board. Previously, Ford had three board seats and Hertz two. Merrill is both participating in the buyout and helping to finance it.

The new owners of Hertz may have a different vision for the company's future than current management. Hertz management, which analysts say had favored a public listing to a sale, had positioned the firm to demonstrate strong growth prospects and had lots of initiatives beyond its core airport car-rental business.

By contrast, the buyout group may be under pressure to cut costs and raise cash by selling noncore operations, people familiar with the matter say. "We have no current plans to divest anything or make acquisitions," Mr. Wasserman of CDR says. CDR will have to come up with about $800 million in cash, a large part of its $3.5 billion fund. Because there are limits to how much capital it can dedicate to any one deal, it plans to invite some of its own investors to put money into Hertz alongside it.

Wachovia Agrees To Buy Westcorp (WSJ)

By Valerie Bauerlein

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

Wachovia Corp. agreed to acquire Westcorp Inc. for about $3.91 billion in a deal aimed at boosting the Charlotte, N.C., company's heft in the auto-finance business while giving Wachovia its first branches in California.

In addition to making Wachovia the ninth-largest auto lender in the U.S., the takeover quiets speculation at least for the moment that the bank is about to make an even larger acquisition of a commercial bank or consumer-finance company. The purchase price represents only about 5% of Wachovia's stock-market value, which analysts said seemed reasonable given Westcorp's size and reputation for being well-run.

"This gets Ken [Thompson] his foothold" in California, Nancy Bush, a bank analyst with NAB Research LLC in Annandale, N.J., said, referring to the Wachovia chairman and chief executive. Westcorp's 19 bank branches in Southern California could help Wachovia decide whether to open additional branches in the state or make another acquisition. Most of Wachovia's roughly 3,100 branches are in the Southeast, though it has been opening new branches in growing markets such as Texas and New York.

Westcorp confirmed last month that it was in discussions about a possible takeover. The company originates, securitizes and services loans through 8,300 auto dealers. It also is strong in the subprime market, which is lucrative because customers pay higher interest rates but risky because those customers default more often.

Wachovia's previous auto-lending business was focused on borrowers with the most pristine credit records who typically buy pricey cars. Wachovia has used that business to build relationships with dealers, who sometimes need wealth-management services or loans to build inventory.

The combined company's auto-finance portfolio will consist of 78% prime loans and 22% subprime loans, according to Kevin Fitzsimmons, an analyst with Sandler O'Neill & Partners.

Wachovia's parent company, the former First Union, paid $2.1 billion in 1998 for the Money Store, a subprime lender that advertised heavily on television and was a financial flop. The bank ultimately sold the Money Store. "When you say 'subprime' around here, there's lots of warning flags that go off because of our past experience," Don Truslow, Wachovia's chief risk officer, said in an interview.

Terms of the deal call for Wachovia to swap 1.27 of its shares for each outstanding Westcorp share. Wachovia also agreed to acquire the 16% of WFS Financial Inc., a dealer-finance unit, that isn't already owned by Westcorp for 1.47 Wachovia shares apiece.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Westcorp shares rose 23 cents to $61.58, while Wachovia slipped 81 cents to $49.57. WFS surged $5.23, or 8.1%, to $70.15 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

Westcorp was advised by Credit Suisse First Boston, while Deutsche Bank advised WFS. Goldman Sachs Group advised Wachovia on the deal.

Wachovia Plans To Buy Auto Lender (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Moving to expand its presence in automobile financing, the Wachovia Corporation, the nation's fourth-largest bank, agreed yesterday to acquire the financial-services holding company Westcorp and its majority-owned auto-finance group, WFS Financial, in a stock deal valued at $3.91 billion.

The deal, which had been rumored for weeks and will make Wachovia the ninth-largest auto lender in the country, is the latest in a string of purchases by banks in the auto-finance industry after downgrades this spring in the debt ratings of the General Motors Corporation and the Ford Motor Corporation.

The downgrades raised the costs of borrowing for the car makers' finance arms, which have typically offered low-interest loans that banks were hard pressed to match.

"The change in funding costs at G.M. and Ford has caused consumer-oriented banks to re-examine auto lending and to view it as potentially more attractive than they did in the past," said David Hilder, a bank analyst with Bear Stearns. While G.M. and Ford are still major lenders, Mr. Hilder said, their dominance may diminish as loan rates become more competitive.

This spring, Bank of America acquired KeyCorp's $990 million prime portfolio of indirect automobile loans and, in July, it announced plans to buy up to $55 billion of auto loans from G.M.'s finance arm, the General Motors Acceptance Corporation, over the next five years.

In yesterday's deal, Wachovia said it was acquiring Westcorp, which is based in Irvine, Calif., and WFS for $3.42 billion in stock. Wachovia, based in Charlotte, N.C., will pay $490 million in stock for the 16 percent of the publicly traded WFS that Westcorp does not own. The deal is expected to close in early 2006.

Last year, Westcorp's founder and chief executive, Ernest S. Rady, who owns about 53 percent of Westcorp, announced a restructuring in which the finance company would buy back the 16 percent of WFS that it did not own and fold the entire WFS Financial entity into its retail banking arm, Western Financial Bank. But the conversion of Western Financial Bank into a California state commercial bank was taking "longer than expected," Westcorp said in a statement last month. So it began exploring other options.

Investors have been closely watching Wachovia to see if it would make a big acquisition to keep up with its crosstown rival in Charlotte, Bank of America. Two years ago, Wachovia considered buying FleetBoston, but balked at the price; Bank of America later stepped in and bought it.

In a repeat this summer, Wachovia walked away from talks with the credit card giant MBNA only to have Bank of America swoop in and buy the firm, becoming the nation's largest issuer of credit cards.

"Westcorp is a neat little company, and Wachovia bought it for a perfectly acceptable price, but it doesn't get them anywhere," said Meredith Whitney, an analyst at CIBC World Markets. "Wachovia's problem is that it's been boxed out of so many other big deals by Bank of America that it needs to do a major deal in order to keep up. This doesn't do it."

While some analysts and investors say they think Wachovia has grown gun-shy on big deals, others give the chief executive, G. Kennedy Thompson, credit for restraint in not overpaying for acquisitions. Based on Friday's closing price for Westcorp's shares, Wachovia is paying a 5 percent premium. (It is paying about a 14 percent premium for WFS shares.)

Mr. Thompson has said repeatedly that the bank would only do deals that produced an internal rate of return of at least 15 percent and that would add to earnings on a cash basis by the end of the second year. Wachovia said the Westcorp and WFS acquisitions met both criteria.

Wachovia's stock fell 1.6 percent yesterday, to $49.57.

Wachovia To Purchase Westcorp For $3.42B (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 13, 2005

(AP) - CHARLOTTE, N.C.-The financial services company Wachovia Corp. on Monday said it agreed to acquire Westcorp, an automobile finance company based in Irvine, Calif., for $3.42 billion, creating the nation's ninth largest auto loan originator.

Wachovia also agreed to pay another $490 million for the 16 percent stake that Westcorp doesn't already own in WFS Financial Inc., boosting the combined value of the transactions of $3.9 billion.

he company said the deal for Westcorp is expected to boost earnings in the second year and produce an internal rate of return of more than 15 percent, above Wachovia's acquisition criteria.

Wachovia said its purchase of Westcorp will give it a small presence in the California retail banking market, while expanding its auto finance group into a national business. The firm will add about 8,500 automobile dealer clients, and about 920,000 individual customers.

"This transaction moves our auto finance business to a new level and gives us access to a new set of customers who can benefit from Wachovia's broad offering of financial services," said Ben Jenkins, president of Wachovia's general bank.

Wachovia, which expects the purchase to close in the first quarter, said the combined business will be run by WFS President and Chief Executive Thomas Wolfe and will be based in Irvine. Wolfe will report to Carlos Evans, head of Wachovia wholesale banking.

Tupras To Remain In Turkish Hands, As Koc Bid Wins (WSJ/DJN)

By Michael Wang, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A consortium led by Koc Holding AS of Turkey and including Royal Dutch Shell PLC fended off eight other bidders in a hotly contested privatization auction for control of Tupras, Turkey's 500,000-barrel-a-day refiner.

The winning bid of $4.14 billion (€3.34 billion) defied even the most optimistic expectations which, ahead of the auction, had reckoned with a final price tag closer to $3 billion.

The Koc-Shell group faced its strongest competition from a joint venture comprising state-owned Indian Oil Corp. and Turkey's Calik Enerji Sanayii, as well as OYAK, an industrial conglomerate representing a Turkish Army officers' pension fund.

The winning consortium comprised two Shell units -- Shell Co. of Turkey Ltd. and Shell Overseas Investment BV -- together holding 10%; Koc, one of Turkey's biggest industrial conglomerates, with 80%; and two smaller Turkish energy companies, Aygaz AS with 7% and Opet Petrolculuk AS with the remaining 3%.

The win by the Koc-Shell consortium represents a best-case scenario for the government as it keeps majority control of Tupras in Turkish hands. Shell's minor involvement lends it credibility.

Erol Memioglu, president of Koc's energy business, said he wanted to see Tupras grow further. "We aim to develop Tupras into a key player in the Mediterranean region," he said.

The 90-minute auction, broadcast on television live from Ankara, saw the elimination of several top European oil-companies, including Italy's Eni SpA, Austria's OMV AG, Poland's PKN Orlen and Hungary's MOL Rt., as well as a clutch of Turkish bidders.

Global oil demand has accelerated since early last year on the back of the fast-growing Chinese and Indian economies, soaking up virtually all excess refining capacity and increasing the value of refineries.

Shell spokeswoman Susan Shannon said the acquisition complements the company's strategy in Turkey, where it is the second-biggest gasoline retailer, with about 600 service stations and a market share of around 15%.

Icahn Group Plans Proxy Fight To Raise Heat On Time Warner (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A group led by New York financier Carl Icahn said it intends to mount a proxy contest to win seats on Time Warner Inc.'s board, in the latest step by the investor group to pressure the company to spin off its cable unit and buy back $20 billion in stock.

The group, made up of several hedge funds including one managed by Mr. Icahn, also said it thinks the "true value" of Time Warner shares is between $26 and $28, about $10 a share above the stock's trading range over the past couple of years.

Mr. Icahn's group said it planned to propose "one or more nominees" for election to the Time Warner board at the next annual meeting, which isn't due to be held until next spring. But the group didn't identify any nominees.

Rather, in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the group laid out its most detailed argument to date as to why Time Warner shares are trading at a discount to their "inherent value" and what "immediate actions" the company could take to reduce the discount. Yesterday, Time Warner shares were down 13 cents at $18.21 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. Icahn announced about a month ago that a group he was leading had acquired stock and options representing a 2.6% stake in Time Warner. His challenge to the media giant's management came as the company was emerging from problems caused by the 2001 merger with America Online, which had depressed its stock price.

The filing noted that the stock is down 6% since Chairman Richard Parsons took over in May 2002 and said "management's slow pace of change" has hurt Time Warner stock.

The group chastised Time Warner for not paying dividends or buying back stock as aggressively as other media companies. It argued that Time Warner has an "inefficient capital structure" and could afford to take on more debt if it spun off Time Warner Cable.

Time Warner has recently moved to address both issues. It initiated a dividend earlier this year and last month announced plans to buy back $5 billion in stock over two years. And it plans to offer 16% of its cable company to the public early next year when it completes the acquisition of some assets of Adelphia Communications.

In a statement yesterday, Time Warner said "we are carefully reviewing a range of options to increase the value of our company including those proposed by Mr. Icahn and his group. Investors should rest assured that this evaluation is being done in a prudent and deliberate manner with an eye toward creating sustainable value for all of our shareholders."

Mr. Icahn's group contends that Time Warner Cable would be worth more on its own than it is within the larger organization. The group estimates that the cable unit on its own could be worth $48 billion, or $3,631 per subscriber -- more than the value implied by the stock price of the nation's largest cable company, Comcast Corp.

The other members of Mr. Icahn's group are Franklin Mutual Advisers LLC, JANA Partners LLC and SAC Capital Advisors LLC.

Dealmakers Are Back In Business (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Following a multiyear downturn in the number of mergers and acquisitions, companies are again in the shopping mood.

Oracle, eBay and Wachovia all announced deals Monday worth billions to buy other companies, signaling a pickup in the deal boom (stories, 1B, above).

Already this year, companies have announced $707 billion in mergers and acquisitions, says Richard Peterson, senior researcher at Thomson Financial. That's 30% more than the deals during the same period last year and the highest since the M&A heyday in 2000. It's also the fourth-strongest pace of M&A in history, Peterson says.

“Companies were shy,” says Howard Silverblatt, market analyst for Standard & Poor's. Now “they are definitely doing more.”

There are several reasons for the uptick, including:

•Stock market recovering. The biggest influence on M&A activity is the health of the market, says Chris Kenney, vice president at L.E.K. Consulting. That's largely because many companies use their stock to buy other companies, so the higher the stock, the less expensive the acquisition becomes. M&A has gotten a lift from the fact the Standard & Poor's 500 index is up 2.4% this year and 37% the past three years.

•Borrowing costs still cheap. In addition to fairly strong stock prices, interest rates have also remained surprisingly low, says David Mauer, professor of finance at the Cox School of Business at SMU. That has allowed companies to borrow cash needed to finance many mergers and acquisitions, he says.

•Cash piles surging. Companies are finally getting the guts to use the cash that has been piling up over the past three years, Silverblatt says. Acquisitions are one of the biggest uses of corporate cash.

During the second quarter the amount of cash held by the industrial companies in the S&P 500 fell to $608 billion in part to spending on acquisitions, Silverblatt says. That's down from the record $634 billion in cash the first quarter, but still a giant pile that is difficult to use up just by buying back stock or paying dividends.

•Industry consolidation increasing. Maturing industries, such as discount brokerages and software companies, are looking to combine in order to compete against the bigger players, Mauer says. He points to Oracle's recent buying spree and leadership in consolidating the business-software industry.

The M&A boom's future really depends on the market, Kenney says. “The single most important predictor of M&A is the value of the stock market,” he says.

Judge Blocks Sequoia Forest Logging (AP)

By David Kravets

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge here halted the Bush administration's bid to keep logging 2,000 acres in Giant Sequoia National Monument, saying he "called into question" the scientific analysis used to justify cutting in a preserve that houses two-thirds of the world's largest trees.

U.S. District Judge Stephen Breyer, ruling in a lawsuit brought by environmentalists, also questioned whether fire control was the government's real motive for allowing commercial logging in the monument. The so-called "Saddle Project" was approved years ago, but cutting only commenced this summer, when timber prices were high.

The government, Breyer wrote late Friday in issuing a preliminary injunction barring further logging, "waited five years to execute this contract because of unfavorable timber prices."

In 2000, just after the project was approved, Congress declared Sequoia National Forest a national monument, which generally prevented further logging on thousands of acres in the Central Valley area of Tulare County. The government argued the project was grandfathered in and therefore not covered by monument rules.

The Justice Department, which defended the logging plan in court here, declined to say whether it would challenge Breyer's injunction. If it does not, the case is over and the acreage is safe from harvesting. The government could also take the issue to trial.

Breyer ruled that he was unsure whether the project, which included harvesting 31,000 conifer trees hundreds of years old, "would still protect the forest from fire." Sequoia trees were not targeted in the harvest by logging concern Sierra Forests Products.

The Sierra Club and other groups brought the case this year to stop the logging that began July 10 and ended Aug. 5 after Breyer issued a temporary injunction barring further harvesting. A preliminary injunction is issued when a judge believes plaintiffs would prevail at trial.

"The Forest Service has argued that because the project was approved before it being named a monument, they said they could still do this years later, but the judge said they could not," said Patrick Gallagher, a Sierra Club attorney. "The monument is one of the most amazing areas on Earth."

It was not immediately clear how many acres were logged over four weeks, but environmentalists estimated hundreds.

The Sierra Club is considering filing similar lawsuits to block other logging projects that were approved before Congress declared the forest a national monument.

The case is Sierra Club v. Bosworth, 05-00397.

Senate Decides To Vote On Rejection Of Mercury-Emission Rules (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 (AP) - The Senate agreed Monday to vote on a resolution challenging new rules limiting mercury emissions from power plants.

The Bush administration said that the rules, completed by the Environmental Protection Agency in March, would eventually cut mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 70 percent without driving up energy costs and that repealing the rules would delay the reduction of such emissions.

Environmental and health groups have demanded swifter and tougher measures to reduce emissions.

By repealing the rules, the Senate would compel the E.P.A. to rewrite them. The revisions would be in line with Clean Air Act standards requiring the use of the best available technology to reduce mercury emissions.

The Senate vote on Tuesday is expected to be close, but the Republican-dominated House is unlikely to act on a resolution, which President Bush has said he opposes.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, introduced the resolution through a little-used 1996 law that allows Congress to challenge agency rules with a guaranteed floor vote. The law has been successfully invoked only once, when Congress in 2001 repealed Clinton administration workplace ergonomics regulations.

Senator Collins said that if the rules stand "power plants will be free to continue spewing unlimited amounts of toxic mercury into our air until the year 2018."

But supporters of the E.P.A. rules said that repealing the administration approach could have a devastating impact on the economy, forcing power plants to abandon coal for natural gas and driving up natural-gas prices. They contended it would cost $358 billion to achieve the 90 percent reduction in three years, as opposed to a cost of $2 billion under the Bush administration plan.

"It just can't be justified from a cost-benefit point of view," said Senator George V. Voinovich, Republican of Ohio.

A federal appeals court last month rejected a suit brought by environmental and health groups and 14 states seeking to force the E.P.A. to stop implementing the new rules.

Heating Prices Loom As Problem Natural Gas Could Be Issue In Winter (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — U.S. consumers could still face higher energy bills ahead despite declines in energy prices Monday as gulf producers continued to rebound from Hurricane Katrina's pounding.

The average nationwide retail gasoline price Monday fell to $2.967 a gallon for regular unleaded from $3.018 the day before, according to AAA. Gasoline futures prices have dropped by about a third since the end of August.

Crude oil prices dropped to $63.34 a barrel, down 9% from the record close of $69.81 in late August. Natural gas futures were down more than 23 cents in New York trading, to $11.03 per million British thermal units, compared with a record $11.76 on Sept. 1.

Still, energy experts say consumers will feel the impact of Katrina for months. Natural gas prices will be a big challenge this winter.

The federal Energy Information Administration recently forecast that natural gas prices could rise 71% in the Midwest this winter.

Forecaster Global Insight expects natural gas prices to average $12 per million Btu through the winter, says Mary Novak, managing director for energy services. Consumers saw an average of $7.50 last winter.

“It's astronomical compared to what people were paying for the previous 20 years,” Novak says.

George Coling, executive director of the National Fuel Funds Network, says Katrina will be a “disaster” for less-affluent households. The Network represents non-profit groups that supplement assistance from the federal Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program.

Some members of Congress want to increase the annual budget for LIHEAP, which helps consumers who meet certain income requirements pay heating and cooling bills. The program serves more than 5 million households a year.

“Increasing LIHEAP is one thing, and probably the only effective thing, that Congress can do immediately to relieve the home energy situation” Coling says.

The U.S. Minerals Management Service Monday said about 38% of natural gas production in the gulf remains shuttered.

“It's too early to start relaxing but also no cause yet for panic. We're not hearing from our utility customers that they are going to have a problem meeting customer demand,” says Mark Stultz, spokesman for the National Gas Supply Association.

Arctic Folly (WP)

By Jimmy Carter

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Congress is about to make one of those big decisions that marks an era. Unless wiser heads prevail, it may do it badly -- making the wrong decision in the wrong way and about the wrong place. At stake is America's greatest wildlife sanctuary, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. To dissuade Congress from this environmental tragedy, Americans must rally, and quickly.

Congress had its Pyrrhic energy victory this summer, with a new energy policy that ignores much-needed conservation measures and gives the oil industry large new tax breaks regardless of where it drills and pumps. Surely Congress has done more than enough to increase the profits of the oil industry.

Yet now, in a separate decision, the White House and Big Oil are pressuring Congress to allow drilling rigs to rip into the ecological heart of America's preeminent wildlife sanctuary. We must not confuse this with Prudhoe Bay, which lies west of the Arctic refuge and is already an industrial landscape resembling Houston more than Yellowstone.

With increasing gasoline prices bringing economic hardship and concern to many Americans, we must not be misled by oil lobbyists who are trying to convince us that our energy security is singularly dependent on sacrificing the Arctic refuge. They promote the false premise that development will touch just a few thousand acres when, in fact, it would introduce roads and pipelines spider-webbing across hundreds of thousands of acres on the fragile coastal plain.

We cannot drill our way to energy security or lower gasoline prices as long as our nation sits on just 3 percent of world oil reserves yet accounts for 25 percent of all oil consumption. An obvious answer is to increase the fuel efficiency of motor vehicles, at least to the level we set more than a quarter-century ago.

Instead, the administration recently proposed a tiny increase in gas mileage for SUVs, minivans and pickups. Not effective until the 2011 models, this would save about one month's current consumption of fuel over the next 20 years -- far less than will be saved in just one state by a new California law. The new ruling offers automobile makers an opportunity to avoid the reductions by modifying the size of various models as they persist in manufacturing gas guzzlers. It is not a coincidence that Moody's has just downgraded the debt of General Motors and Ford to junk status, while makers of efficient vehicles prosper.

I have been to the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to study the wilderness wildlife. Far from being the frozen "desert" some suggest, this is a rich, Serengeti-like haven of life: nursery for caribou, polar bears, walruses and millions of shorebirds and waterfowl that migrate annually to the Lower 48. To sit, as Rosalynn and I did, watching a herd of musk oxen circle-up to defend their young and then to find yourself literally in the midst of thousands of caribou streaming by is to touch in a fundamental way God's glorious ark of teeming wildlife.

We Americans use a lot of energy, and millions of us want to do so in a more efficient way that also allows us to cherish our disappearing wilderness heritage. In the Arctic refuge we cannot have it both ways. In the next few months Americans could lose this special and amazing place through a backdoor legislative maneuver.

Each fall Congress endeavors to combine budgetary directives covering the nation's $2.5 trillion dollar annual budget in a single "reconciliation" decision. In a tricky ploy to avoid full debate, drilling advocates have buried their despoil-the-Arctic goal in this mammoth measure. So, conservation-minded Americans must ask our elected representatives to vote down any final budget reconciliation bill that would allow the sacrifice of our Arctic sanctuary.

Now is the time to speak up for the ecological integrity of this unsurpassed 18-million-acre wilderness. Many Americans will be in Washington on Sept. 20 for the Arctic Refuge Action Day rally on the Mall and to contact congressional representatives personally.

If we are not wise enough to protect the Arctic refuge, future generations will condemn us for needlessly sacrificing the wilderness of their world to feed our profligate, short-term and shortsighted energy habit. The pathway to a better, more sustainable energy future does not wind through the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Justice Dept.: FBI Ignores Informant Rules (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 13, 2005

FBI agents often violate bureau's rules for handling confidential informants that were revised after FBI abuses in the 1990s, the Justice Department's internal watchdog said Monday.

A review of 120 confidential informant files from FBI offices around the country found violations in 104 cases, or 87 percent, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. His 301-page report, parts of which were blacked out, examined FBI compliance with rules that govern most criminal investigations.

The report said agents failed to assess informants' suitability or get permission for informants to engage in activity that otherwise would be illegal. Agents did not convey proper instructions or tell prosecutors when informants had committed crimes that were not authorized by their FBI handlers, Fine said.

FBI Director Robert Mueller, according to the report, said many agents find the required paperwork cumbersome. In a statement, the FBI said the violations were "administrative" and that officials have begun simplifying procedures.

Among the material in the report that was withheld from the public is how many confidential informants the FBI uses. Some have provided information to the FBI for more than six years. Others are designated "high-level" informants because they are part of the senior leadership of a group the FBI is investigating.

A third category of informants identified in the report includes lawyers, doctors and clergy — all obligated to keep confidential their dealings with clients — or members of the news media.

FBI spokesman Ed Cogswell said the bureau would not identify whether any of its informants are clergy or members of the media.

"We can use them and if a need presents, I'm sure we do," Cogswell said. "But we do not want to identify what our sources are."

Confidential informants are critical to some prosecutions, the report said. But their use by the FBI also "presents serious risks, including the risk that informants may claim that their criminal activities were authorized or acquiesced in by the government," Fine said.

John Wesley Hall, a vice president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said, "It sounds like they can break their own rules when they're investigating crimes. Too bad our clients can't bend the rules."

The Attorney General's Investigative Guidelines were developed in the mid-1970s in response to FBI surveillance and infiltration of civil rights and other protest groups in the 1950s and 1960s.

The section on informants was overhauled in 2001, after celebrated cases in which FBI agents protected mobsters from prosecution or tipped them off to investigations while simultaneously using them as FBI informants.

In one case, former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. tipped off Boston mobster James "Whitey" Bulger to a looming racketeering indictment, causing Bulger to flee. He remains at large.

The FBI has said informants are important to counterterrorism and criminal investigations.

Two informants helped lure Yemeni Sheik Mohammed Ali Hassan al-Moayad and an aide to a meeting in which the cleric was secretly recorded promising to funnel money to Hamas and al-Qaida. Al-Moayad was sentenced to 75 years in prison. Mohammed Mohsen Yahya Zayed received a 45-year sentence.

The case, however, was nearly derailed when one informant, who was the government's star witness, set himself on fire in Washington in what he later described as an attempt to get more money from the FBI, which paid him at least $100,000.

Mohamed Alanssi recovered in time for the trial.

FBI Violating Informant Guidelines (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 13, 2005

The US Department of Justice announced yesterday that the FBI has continued to violate informant guidelines adopted several years ago amid public condemnation over its mishandling of notorious Boston gangsters James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

A review of 120 confidential informant files at a dozen of the nation's FBI offices, including Boston's, found that agents failed to follow the rules in 87 percent of the cases, according to a 301-page report by Glenn A. Fine, the Justice Department's inspector general. The review was conducted between June and August 2004.

'These numbers are just extraordinary, and they're damning," said US Representative William D. Delahunt, a Quincy Democrat who participated in Congressional hearings investigating the FBI's relationship with Bulger and Flemmi.

"I think what they mean is legislation is now required to ensure compliance," Delahunt said yesterday. He said that he and US Representative Daniel E. Lungren, a California Republican and a fellow member of the House Judiciary Committee, will file a bill mandating that the FBI follow the guidelines and include sanctions for agents who do not.

The report cited agents' failure to report illegal activity by informants; failure to obtain authority to let informants engage in illegal activity such as buying drugs during investigations; failure to evaluate informants for suitability to work with the FBI; and failure to document when informants were deactivated, the report said.

Fine concluded that the violations were caused by inadequate training, a lack of administrative support for agents, and a failure of management to hold supervisors accountable for lack of proper oversight to handling agents.

According to the report, FBI director Robert S. Mueller III "told us that he frequently hears agents complain about the burdensome procedures for opening and operating informants."

The report also cited "lingering differences" between the FBI and the Department of Justice over how informants should be handled.

Tougher guidelines adopted in May 2002 -- aimed at preventing the cozy relationship that developed among Bulger, Flemmi, and their FBI handlers -- required the FBI to share information on informants with other agencies, including federal prosecutors.

The FBI in Washington released a statement yesterday saying that many of the recommendations in Fine's report have already been adopted or are under review as part of a project launched several months ago between the FBI and the Justice Department to revise its Confidential Human Source Program.

The project aims to simplify and standardize administrative procedures, clarify compliance requirements, and improve compliance with the attorney general's informant guidelines, according to the statement.

Delahunt said he will push for legislation that goes even further than the current informant guidelines, to include a provision that requires the FBI to notify state and local law enforcement officials if they learn that an informant is involved in criminal activity.

Retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. was convicted in US District Court in Boston in May 2002 of racketeering, obstruction of justice, and related charges for warning his longtime informants, Bulger and Flemmi, to flee just before they were indicted on federal racketeering charges in January 1995. Bulger, who has since been charged with killing 19 people, remains a fugitive.

Connolly, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison on the federal charges, was indicted earlier this year on state murder charges in Miami in allegedly plotting with Bulger and Flemmi in 1982 to kill a potential witness against them, John Callahan, a Boston financier with ties to Bulger's gang. Connolly is awaiting trial.

Flemmi, who pleaded guilty to killing 10 people and is serving a life sentence, is now cooperating with the government and is slated to testify against Connolly in Florida.

The FBI's relationship with Bulger and Flemmi was exposed during pretrial hearings in US District Court in 1998, which led to Congressional hearings and the overhaul of the informant guidelines.

Former US attorney Donald K. Stern, who helped US Attorney General Janet Reno revamp the older guidelines, said yesterday he was disappointed by the number of violations cited in the report by Fine, the Justice Department's internal watchdog. "It was clear from the efforts to get the guidelines changed that this was to some degree a significant shift in attitude and culture that would be required at the FBI," Stern said, "because for so long the handling of informants was their domain, and they didn't have to share the responsibility or get any oversight outside."

But he said it is important to give the FBI the training and oversight it needs to comply with the guidelines because the previous system did not work.

"If you just assume that everything is OK because the line agent or the immediate supervisor says it is, you're going to have problems," Stern said. "And as we've learned from the Bulger and Flemmi case, those problems could have disastrous consequences."

F.B.I. Found To Violate Its Informant Rules (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - The Federal Bureau of Investigation has often violated internal guidelines in its handling of confidential informants, the Justice Department's inspector general concluded Monday.

In nearly 9 of every 10 cases reviewed by the inspector general, guidelines on the handling of confidential informants were violated in ways that risked compromising investigations, according to a 301-page report by the office of Glenn A. Fine, the inspector general at the Justice Department.

The guidelines sometimes permit informants like drug dealers or gang members to commit crimes to further an investigation. But F.B.I. agents sometimes allowed criminal informants to engage in criminal activities without getting needed approval from supervisors or lawyers for such operations, failed to report unauthorized illegal activity, or approved such illegal activity only retroactively, the review found.

Bureau supervisors were often unfamiliar with the rules that applied to the handling of confidential informants - a reflection, the inspector general's report said, of "inadequate training at every level." And when violations were found, bureau agents and supervisors were often not held accountable for missteps, the review found.

The F.B.I. considers the use of confidential informants, who often have criminal ties, to be critical to its ability to penetrate drug trafficking organizations, gangs, gambling operations and terrorist circles.

In 2001, Janet Reno, then the attorney general, imposed toughened requirements on the F.B.I.'s use of informants in the wake of several embarrassing episodes - most notably, its handling of the Boston gangster James Bulger, who fled in 1995 after a bureau agent tipped him off to a pending indictment against him.

In May 2002, John Ashcroft, then the attorney general, amended the informant rules as part of a broader restructuring of F.B.I. policies aimed at allowing agents to respond more quickly and flexibly to leads in terrorism and criminal investigations.

The F.B.I. said Monday in response to the inspector general's report that it was working to improve compliance with guidelines for the handling of confidential informants and had already moved to make some internal changes recommended by Mr. Fine's office. Part of the problem, F.B.I. officials acknowledged, was the bureau's continued difficulty in building a modern computer system to help oversee the informant program and ensure better compliance.

"Even before the inspector general's review, we realized that we had to do some re-engineering of our whole human source program," Kevin R. Brock, an assistant F.B.I. director who oversees the program, said in an interview. "We were handling more and more sources, we had more and more regulations that we added on over the years, and we weren't doing the follow-up quality control on our own."

The constant flux "just created a situation where it was tough for the working agent to keep track of all this stuff," Mr. Brock said.

"Agents are failing to do certain things not because of mal-intent but just the press of administrative requirements, and overlooking them," he said.

Beyond the problems in managing confidential informants, the inspector general's review looked at the effect of a number of changes ordered by Mr. Ashcroft in his 2002 revamping of the bureau's investigative guidelines. Among other changes, the new guidelines allowed F.B.I. agents to visit public sites and events, attend mosques and other religious institutions, or peruse the Internet in search of leads in terrorism cases.

The changes relaxed restrictions put in place in the 1970's as a result of F.B.I. abuses in the monitoring of political dissidents, and they have drawn criticism from civil rights advocates and Muslim leaders who say they open the door to investigative abuses.

Critics charged last year that the F.B.I. had abused its expanded powers by monitoring, interviewing and sometimes subpoenaing antiwar protesters and political protesters in advance of the political conventions last summer. The inspector general's office disclosed in its report Monday that it was conducting a separate investigation to determine whether the F.B.I. interrogations of protesters were in fact improper.

The inspector general's review found that there was "widespread recognition" among F.B.I. agents and officials of the constitutional and privacy implications of expanding the bureau's ability to monitor public sites. But the review found that there were "gaps" in how the new policy had been put into effect, raising management concerns.

For instance, agents are "encouraged, but not required" to get the approval of a supervisor before attending a public event or site. And it was not always clear what information the F.B.I. could retain if it did not relate to an investigation.

As a result, "an absence of routine documentation" made it difficult if not impossible to assess how agents were using their new powers and whether those powers were being abused, the report said.

Robert S. Mueller III, director of the F.B.I., told the inspector general's office that because agents were not required to get supervisors' approval before visiting public sites, it was "difficult to determine to what extent these authorities have been used," the inspector general's office said. It called on the F.B.I. to consider requiring approval from supervisors and more documentation of public visits to guard against possible abuses.

FBI Hit In Handling Of Secret Informers (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Guidelines governing the FBI's handling of confidential informants, which were established in the 1970s and revised in the wake of September 11, are violated frequently by supervisors and agents, according to a report released yesterday.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General, in a 301-page report, said it found "significant non-compliance" by the FBI in its handling of confidential informants.

"The attorney general's investigative guidelines govern some of the FBI's most important investigative powers, including its authority to operate confidential informants," said Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. "Our review found several significant shortcomings in the FBI's adherence to the guidelines which need correction, particularly the guidelines governing its use of confidential informants."

The report says the guidelines were violated in 87 percent of the confidential-informant cases examined and that errors occurred in several of the most important aspects of the FBI's management of its criminal-informant program, including reviews aimed at assessing the suitability of people who serve as informants.

It says instructions FBI agents are required to give confidential informants were not followed in 49 percent of the reviewed cases, and the agency's use of its power to authorize confidential informants to participate in "otherwise illegal activity" showed a noncompliance rate of 60 percent.

"Guidelines violations can jeopardize Justice Department prosecutions of criminals and can also lead to civil liability claims against the government," Mr. Fine said. "We are concerned the FBI has not taken the necessary steps to ensure that FBI agents and their supervisors adhere to these important requirements."

The FBI yesterday said that although the report listed several instances of administrative noncompliance, it found that the bureau was "generally compliant with the guidelines."

Noting that confidential informants are critical to the bureau's ability to carry out its "counterterrorism, national security and criminal law-enforcement missions," the FBI said it began a project several months ago to review and revise its confidential-informant program.

FBI spokesman Edwin C. Cogswell said the review seeks to develop policies and processes to simplify and standardize administrative procedures and to clarify and improve compliance requirements.

The Justice Department set the guidelines in the 1970s in response to FBI's surveillance and infiltration of civil rights groups. The guidelines address the bureau's investigations of people and groups, its use of confidential informants, undercover operations and warrantless monitoring of verbal communications. After the September 11 attacks, Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered a review of the guidelines to identify revisions necessary to enhance the department's ability to prevent terrorist attacks.

The revised guidelines gave FBI field managers greater authority to conduct preliminary inquiries, criminal intelligence investigations and undercover operations.

FBI Watchdog Report: Agents Often Break Rules For Informants (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2005

FBI agents often violate the bureau's rules for handling confidential informants, the Justice Department's internal watchdog said Monday.

The report by Inspector General Glenn Fine said agents failed to assess informants' suitability or get permission for informants to engage in activity that otherwise would be illegal. Agents did not convey proper instructions or tell prosecutors when informants had committed crimes that were not authorized by their FBI handlers, Fine said.

The report was based on a review of 120 confidential informant files from FBI offices. Fine found violations in 87% of the files, or 104 cases. The report quoted FBI Director Robert Mueller as saying many agents find the required paperwork cumbersome.

The FBI said in a statement that the violations were "administrative" and that officials have begun simplifying procedures.

Among the material in the report that was withheld from the public is how many confidential informants the FBI uses. Some informants are doctors, lawyers, clergy or members of the news media, the report said.

The guidelines on informants were overhauled in 2001 after cases in which FBI agents protected mobsters from prosecution or tipped them off to investigations while using them as FBI informants.

Rumsfeld touts base-closing savings

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has advised President Bush that a plan presented to the White House last week for closing 22 major military bases and realigning 33 others will still yield large savings, even though fewer bases would be closed than Rumsfeld wanted, his spokesman said. Lawrence Di Rita would not say whether Rumsfeld recommended that Bush accept the plan as presented by the Base Realignment and Closure Commission.

The commission said its recommendations will result in annual savings of $4.2 billion, compared with $5.4 billion under the plan it received last May from Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld had recommended closing 33 major bases and realigning 29 others.

Bush has until Sept. 23 to accept the report and forward it to Congress or return it to the commission for more work. If sent to Congress, lawmakers can accept or reject the plan, but can't change it.

ABOUT THIS STORY (TSSC)

The State (SC), September 13, 2005

More than 800 pages of the late Strom Thurmond's FBI file were released Monday at the request of several news organizations, including The State. The first 600 came out in March.

The State requested the file of the former U.S. senator, governor and judge in accordance with the federal Freedom of Information Act shortly after the senator's June 26, 2003, death.

The first 600 pages are called the "general administrative file" and comprise only a fraction of Thurmond's total file. The 800 pages just released deal mainly with threats made against Thurmond throughout his public life.

According to the FBI, about 900 more pages are yet to be released.

As is typical with the FBI and Monday's release, it might take several more months before these additional pages are made available to the public.

Before a subject's death, the Federal Bureau of Investigation will release a file only with the subject's permission. FBI files are made available to the public after an individual's death.

FBI Investigated Many Death Threats Against Thurmond (TSSC)

The State (SC), September 13, 2005

For a half century, Strom Thurmond was a Southern icon and a national figure. His longevity — serving as a U.S. senator from 1956 to 2003 — exposed him to at least 31 threats that the FBI investigated. The threats ranged from the serious — a threat to assassinate Thurmond the same year that Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King Jr. were killed — to the ravings of a "chronic letter writer with apparent mental problems," the FBI reported.

'WE AIN'T LETTIN' NOBODY TALK AGAINST MR. WALLACE'

On Sept. 7, 1968, U.S. Sen. Strom Thurmond's office received an anonymous phone call from a man, threatening to kill the senator if he came to Greenville to campaign against Alabama Gov. George Wallace, then running as a third-party presidential candidate.

"If Strom Thurmond comes to the state fair in Greenville on 9/26/68, he will get the same thing that happened to Kennedy and King," the caller said, referring to U.S. Sen. Robert Kennedy and civil rights leader Martin Luther King, both slain that year.

The senator's secretary received a call a week later from the same anonymous caller, warning "if she brought Thurmond to the state fair, she would also get it."

At the time, Thurmond was traveling the South campaigning for GOP presidential nominee Richard Nixon. He told Southerners a vote for Wallace would, in effect, be a vote for Democrat Hubert Humphrey. Don't waste your vote, he constantly admonished Dixie voters.

On the evening of Sept. 7, 1968, the senator's secretary received a call from the same perons who had phoned earlier. He asked if Thurmond was going to speak at the Anderson fair. She said he was.

"If he doesn't want the same thing to happen to him that happened to Bobby and King, he better not come 'cause we ain't lettin' nobody talk against Mr. Wallace. I'm warning ya'."

Thurmond spoke. Nothing happened. No arrests were made in connection with the threats.

THREAT TO KILL STROM, TED, TOO

On March 31, 1969, Thurmond received a postcard postmarked St. Louis, Mo. It bore a handwritten message, saying the writer planned to kill the senator.

The postcard was followed by another. This time, the name of U.S. Sen. Teddy Kennedy, D-Mass., was added to the list of those to be killed. The same card was sent to President Nixon, former President Johnson and the governor of Vermont.

A fictitious name, Janice Neavles, was signed to the cards. No arrests were made.

'CHRONIC LETTER WRITER WITH ... MENTAL PROBLEM'

In April 1973, the U.S. probation office in Panama City, Fla., forwarded to the FBI a packet of mailed and unmailed notes and cards. One postcard, addressed to Thurmond, contained this cryptic line: "Senator, we hear you are next to be processed."

The probation office had been investigating a crank letter writer in Alabama.

The FBI sent an agent to interview the man, whose name was deleted from the FBI documents. A report on that interview noted, "Subject was hostile and it was apparent from talk and facial expression he has mental problems."

The man's brother told the FBI the letter writer was a paratrooper in World War II, who parachuted into France, was captured by the Germans and developed mental problems.

The FBI took no action. "Subject is chronic letter writer with apparent mental problem," a file memo said.

'WE'LL HANG YOU BY YOUR TOES'

In February 1974, Thurmond's office received a two-page letter that hit close to home.

The letter started out by praising Thurmond for being smart enough to have made a "pile of money" but soon devolved into a profanity-laced diatribe against Thurmond.

After wishing cancer on the entire Thurmond family, the letter concludes with "long live the future revolution — we'll hang you by your toes and your kids too."

The letter was sent from Myrtle Beach and signed "a Revolutionary." The FBI investigated, but it is not clear whether the agency ever identified the sender.

SENATOR'S NAME BANDIED ABOUT IN LAWSUIT

In 1983, Thurmond was sued in U.S. District Court in Norfolk. The suit alleged the senator took a $10,000 bribe in 1978, promising to help the plaintiff in the lawsuit get a $50,000 loan.

The file, heavily redacted, indicates a citizen visited Thurmond's Columbia office in mid- 1978, seeking help. A Thurmond aide, whose name also was removed from the file, allegedly assured the inquiring citizen that Thurmond would recommend him or her for a loan through an unnamed agency. However, the 1983 suit contended the citizen was not eligible for the particular loan.

Federal investigations into the matter started in 1982. However, the FBI file noted there was no proof Thurmond knew anything about the case. Thurmond and others were sued in early 1983.

A federal grand jury in Virginia issued a six-count indictment, and an arrest in the case was made Feb. 17, 1983.

In late 1983, the civil charges against Thurmond were dismissed, according to the file.

THREAT AGAINST BURGER, MEESE AND THURMOND?

In April 1983, police in Raleigh arrested a man for possession of stolen credit cards and credit card fraud.

At the time of his arrest, police noted his personal effects: less than a $1 in cash and a handwritten journal that seemed to vaguely threaten some of the most powerful men in the U.S. government, including Thurmond.

In 1983, Thurmond was Senate president pro tempore and chairman of its Judiciary Committee, which reviewed and voted on judicial and law enforcement appointees.

The FBI file detailing the arrest of the unidentified man in Raleigh makes only a passing reference to how much he knew about Thurmond. The journal included handwritten notations claiming the arrested man had traveled extensively throughout the U.S., acquiring weapons and financial backing for an unnamed organization. According to the man's journal, the purpose of the organization was to free selected federal prisoners and "eliminate" selected snitches.

Of particular interest to federal law enforcement officials was a cryptic journal entry from April 3, 1983. "The plan will start in early May ('83)," the entry reads. "All logistics for those on the list are being put together by group in D.C. i.e. time table (sic) of movement by targets, addresses, travel patterns, etc."

The entry goes on to state: "Meese, Burger and Thurmond pose greatest problem because of positions via security. Weapons and transportation are arranged."

Warren Burger was then chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court; Edwin Meese was counselor to President Ronald Reagan.

U.S. Secret Service agents, believing the arrested man to be a possible threat to the president, attempted to interview him April 19, 1983, but he refused.

Thurmond's security officers in South Carolina and Washington, D.C., were alerted.

In one journal entry, the arrested man noted one difficulty in pulling off whatever plan was afoot: "The handicap will be me," the journal states. "I am to (sic) well known in D.C., both by citizens and by Feds particularly."

FBI files do not say whether the man was prosecuted. But as he sat in a Wake County, N.C., jail, federal and state law enforcement officials were working to find out what he was up to and what, if anything, was to come of his plan.

Some Put Thurmond In The Cross Hairs (TSSC)

By Lauren Markoe

The State (SC), September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — The late Strom Thurmond made plenty of political enemies over his long and controversial career — including the kind the FBI feared might try to kill him.

The FBI on Monday released 836 pages of its file on Thurmond, pages that show the S.C. Democrat-turned-Republican was the target of persistent harassers, from the merely disgruntled to the potentially lethal.

The documents cover most of Thurmond's record-setting 48 years in the U.S. Senate and include information on FBI investigations into:

• An S.C. man with a history of violence who had escaped from a state mental hospital

• A Columbia man who wrote to "our dear senator" and promised to come to Washington or South Carolina and "settle it once and for all"

• A lewd letter in which the writer acknowledged an obsession with Nancy Thurmond, the senator's wife.

The documents are windows into some of the more unpleasant aspects of political fame and include copies of threatening telegrams, results of handwriting tests and summaries of interviews with suspects.

One of the threats taken most seriously by the FBI involved a man who, in 1976, wrote letters to Thurmond, postmarked from Greenville, in which he said he despised Thurmond and his politics.

"I would give my cool seat in hell to be able to pull the trigger," the man wrote.

He signed the letter, "A $65 month disable combat vet," apparently referring to the size of his monthly checks from the Veterans Administration, now known as Veterans Affairs.

In a document distributed to the FBI director at the time, an agent advises, "The Bureau has instructed that his (sic) matter must receive vigorous and continuous attention until fully resolved."

Other documents show the FBI had the Veterans Administration write a computer program to help identify a World War II veteran from the Upstate with certain characteristics the letter writer revealed about himself.

It is unclear how the investigation was resolved.

The State, which requested Thurmond's FBI file after the senator died in 2003, counted 31 threats investigated from 1958 to 1989, the years covered in the released pages. They make up the second installment of Thurmond's FBI file to be made public.

The first installment, released in February, was smaller but more wide-ranging in its subject matter. It included everything from Christmas cards FBI officials sent to Thurmond to Thurmond's requests that the FBI look into civil rights leader Martin Luther King's alleged connection with communists.

This latest release focuses only on contact with Thurmond's office deemed menacing — first by the senator's staff, usually the first to read his mail and receive his calls, and then by the FBI, which assigned agents to investigate.

The documents do not indicate that any of the threats resulted in prosecutions.

The threats came from men and women, whites and blacks, the political and seemingly apolitical. Most did not articulate a particular problem with Thurmond's politics.

Often the FBI identified the threat maker as mentally ill.

S.C. Law Enforcement Division chief Robert M. Stewart, who was personally involved in protecting Thurmond when he was in South Carolina, said SLED agents were with the senator whenever he was in the state.

"We had more threats against Senator Thurmond than any other official that we provided security for, and I would think that would be because of his long years of service and the many issues he dealt with," Stewart said.

Frequently, Stewart continued, SLED had to handle threats from the mentally ill. "There were at least two or three people whose names would repeatedly come up."

Stewart said behavioral scientists and psychologists working for SLED would help identify those who made truly credible threats; often the most threatening were committed or recommitted to mental hospitals.

"You have to take those threats very seriously," said Stewart, noting several mentally ill people have carried out threats against politicians, including John Hinckley, who shot President Reagan in 1981.

Stewart said he has no knowledge of any person ever getting close to hurting the senator while he was in South Carolina.

Thurmond, known for his bravado, tried to minimize threats brought to his attention, Stewart recalled. "He wasn't scared of anybody. None of these things bothered him. But he did allow us to take extra precautions."

Mark Goodin, a senior aide to Thurmond from 1982 to 1988, said the number of threats against Thurmond was about average among U.S. senators. "Most received several a year. They're all taken seriously by the FBI."

Goodin remembered “one or two” Thurmond received that seemed scarier than most. But the senator never altered his schedule.

“Getting Strom Thurmond to cancel an appearance would have taken an act of Congress.”

Report: FBI Lacks Blueprint For Technology Upgrade (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, September 13, 2005

Despite past warnings from congressional auditors, the FBI does not have an effective framework for modernizing its information technology systems, according to a new report.

The Government Accountability Office report (GAO-05-363) argued that the FBI needs to continue to move towards a fully enforced enterprise architecture, a blueprint used by organizations to guide IT system improvements.

The 47-page report also found that the bureau's heavy reliance on private contractors to develop the IT framework was hampered because the FBI does not use performance-based contracting techniques and has failed to effectively oversee the contractors' work.

The FBI's computer systems are based primarily on 1980s technology, and realigning the bureau's mission after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, have strained its IT systems, which are "deployed on an ad hoc basis," according to the report.

Currently, the FBI is undertaking a multimillion-dollar IT modernization effort. More than half of the bureau's IT budget - $390 million out of $737 million - is being spent on upgrading its 450 U.S.-based offices and 45 foreign bureaus.

The FBI has struggled to modernize its systems, a situation highlighted by the failed $170 million Virtual Case File System.

GAO investigators laid the framework for their criticism of the FBI's failure to establish an enterprise architecture in a September 2003 report (GAO-03-959).

Of the 31 elements GAO used at the time to evaluate the quality of an agency's enterprise architecture, the FBI satisfied only 15. While some best practices have been incorporated since that time, several have yet to be adopted.

"If the bureau does not begin employing the kind of effective contract management controls contained in federal regulations and related guidance, its architecture efforts will continue to be at risk," GAO auditors said.

The FBI's heavy reliance on private contractors for the development of its IT blueprint is partly to blame for the ineffective IT architecture, the report stated. GAO found that contracted work for the enterprise architecture was not defined in measurable, results-oriented terms, and specific standards and performance incentives were not tied to contracts' requirements.

FBI officials told GAO that the bureau's approach to IT contacting was based on the concept of working with the contractor until the product or service is satisfactory, a method GAO termed ineffective.

GAO recommended that the FBI's chief information officer and chief financial officer implement performance-based contracting wherever possible, along with stronger tracking and oversight practices.

In response, Zalmai Azmi, the FBI's chief information officer, wrote that the bureau has been successful in using fixed-price contracting, rather than the performance-based contracting, because the approach gives contractors an incentive to stay on schedule. But, he said, the FBI would take steps to encourage performance-based contracting.

Guilty Pleas In Two Southwest Louisiana Cocaine Rings (AP)

LAFAYETTE, La. (AP) — Three men pleaded guilty Monday to being members of a cocaine distribution ring that operated over 16 years.

Nathan Campbell, 24, and Aubrey Howard, 29, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to possess and distribute cocaine, while Tevin Bennett, 18, pleaded guilty to possession of cocaine with intent to sell, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Monday. A sentencing date has not been set.

The three Lafayette men, along with six others, were arrested in December 2003 based on charges outlined in a federal indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0004384

Campbell and Howard conspired with others to sell cocaine in St. Mary Parish as part of a drug ring that operated between January 1987 and October 2003, prosecutors said. Christopher Williams, 36, of Morgan City, awaits trial in the case.

In a separate case, Derrick Alexander, of Lake Charles, pleaded guilty last week to using a cellular phone to facilitate cocaine sales at a playground.

Truce Between Bolivian Troops, Coca Growers Set To Expire (GFH/KRT)

By Jack Chang

The Grand Forks Herald, September 13, 2005

EL CHAPARE, Bolivia - (KRT) - From his quiet corner of Bolivia's Chapare region, Egberto Chipana recalled the day three years ago when government soldiers invaded the radio station he now manages because it was championing the cause of farmers who grow coca, the plant whose leaves are the raw material for cocaine.

On that Tuesday, with battles raging between growers and troops, the soldiers seized the station's transmitter, and its directors were threatened with prosecution for instigating unrest. Growers responded by blocking roads and staging protests, demanding that the station be reopened.

"The government eventually returned everything," Chipana said on a recent sweltering afternoon. Drying coca leaves covered the earth outside the station building. "The outcry was too great, and the government couldn't ignore it."

The Chapare, a tropical region of mountain and plain in central Bolivia, has been a battleground for the past decade between coca growers and government troops.

Sometimes the face-off has had deadly results, but an uneasy peace now prevails, thanks to a one-year truce signed by growers and the administration of since-ousted President Carlos Mesa that allows limited cultivation of coca.

But with the agreement officially set to end Oct. 1 and Bolivians scheduled to elect a new president in December, these could be the last days of peace, some Chapare residents fear.

"If the government doesn't respect our right to determine our own livelihood, we will organize and we will fight," said Gabina Contreras, a 54-year-old mother of 11 from the growers' collective Sindicato Esteban Arce, named for a Bolivian independence hero.

"Coca is like father and mother to us. We can't live without coca."

Despite the truce, U.S. and Bolivian officials say this Andean nation's laws forbid the cultivation of coca and allege that coca grown in the Chapare is ending up as cocaine elsewhere in the Americas.

According to the U.S. State Department, Bolivia is the world's third-largest producer of cocaine. The United States has poured more than $150 million in military and social aid into the country annually over the past four years, in part to fight coca cultivation.

Although eradication of coca in excess of that permitted by the truce continues, the days of widespread military action against coca growers is halted for now, said Luz Mendoza, a spokeswoman for the country's Ministry of Social Defense.

So far this year, the government has destroyed about 16 square miles of coca nationwide, almost all of it in the Chapare, government figures show. In comparison, it eradicated about 46 square miles during all of 2002, nearly half of the 110 square miles believed under cultivation.

"We have a temporary situation there now," she said. "People who are directly involved in the planting of coca are still disobeying laws, and we're not going to ignore that."

Kathryn Ledebur, director of the human rights group the Andean Information Network, sees the coca issue heating up as the election approaches.

Presidential candidates Evo Morales, himself a coca grower, and former President Jorge "Tuto" Quiroga, who oversaw the country's coca eradication effort in 2001 and 2002, were running neck-and-neck in a recent poll.

Morales has said in interviews that he plans to promote the growth of coca for industrial uses other than cocaine production. As one of the country's main coca-producing areas, the Chapare is also the heart of Morales' political support.

Quiroga has been a longtime champion of coca eradication and the development of programs that promote the cultivation of crops such as bananas and oranges in its place.

"Both of the key players in this election built their platforms on the coca issue," Ledebur said.

While forced eradication has slowed in the Chapare, evidence of the drug war is still everywhere in this impoverished, 9,840 square-mile region, where about 45,000 families survive by growing the controversial crop.

Just to get into the Chapare requires going through a series of U.S.-funded checkpoints all manned with drug sniffing dogs and armed soldiers.

At least 4,000 Bolivian troops remain in the Chapare, nearly the same number as were there nearing the peak of the eradication campaign. They are stationed in six local headquarters and 15 mobile bases, according to Godofredo Reinicke, the region's former human rights ombudsman and one of those who believe that the U.S. influence in the drug war is a slap at Bolivian sovereignty.

Coca growers have countered the government presence by strengthening the federations and smaller collectives they have long lived under, allowing them to quickly mobilize in response to military actions.

Growers argue that they cultivate and use coca for traditional purposes such as tea making and chewing to stave off hunger while working.

Selling the crop in government-approved markets, a family working the maximum area of coca crop permitted by the truce can earn between $60 and $80 a month, Ledebur estimated.

Where the coca goes after the markets, however, is a question growers don't have answers for.

"We are just following the legal procedures," Chipana said. "Maybe some of the coca is going to drug production, but that's out of our control."

Jorge Azad, the country's vice-minister of alternative development, said he believes much of it is going to drug production. The amount of coca coming out of the Chapare far exceeds what's needed for traditional use, a fact that demands government action, he said.

"The eradication campaign will continue," Azad said. "I don't know if it will widen after the elections or what will happen, but it will continue."

'Ganja Guru' Appeal Set After Delay (ATS)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Alameda (CA) Times-Star, September 13, 2005

More than two years after being convicted and sentenced for growing marijuana, Oakland's self-styled "Guru of Ganja" will make his appeal Tuesday for why even a slap on the wrist was too much.

Ed Rosenthal, a renowned pro-marijuana author, activist and cultivation authority, claims he never should have been convicted of three marijuana-growing felonies. The government claims he not only deserved conviction, but he also deserved at least two to five years in prison instead of his one-day, time-already-served sentence.

Three judges of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will decide sometime in the few months after Tuesday's arguments.

Rosenthal — famed for his books and for the "Ask Ed" column he wrote for "High Times" magazine — became a medical-marijuana cause celebre after his February 2002 arrest. Drug Enforcement Administration agents raided sites including his Oakland home office; an Oakland warehouse where he'd been growing marijuana; San Francisco's Harm Reduction Center medical marijuana club, which he'd supplied; and the HRC's founder's Petaluma home.

After a five-day trial, a federal jury convicted Rosenthal on Jan. 31, 2003, of three marijuana-growing felonies. Upon learning afterward of the state and city protections Rosenthal had not been allowed to raise as a defense, several jurors renounced their verdict and rallied to his cause. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced Rosenthal on June 4, 2003, to one day in prison.

On appeal, Rosenthal basically claims Breyer erred by not letting him mount an "entrapment-by-estoppel" defense —that is, that local and federal officials had led him to believe his conduct was protected under California's 1996 compassionate-use law and by an Oakland ordinance under which he was deemed an city officer permitted to grow marijuana.

Light sentence explained

In fact, the appeal notes that at Rosenthal's sentencing, Breyer said he believed Rosenthal reasonably — although incorrectly — thought the state and local laws immunized him; the judge used this as an explanation for the lighter-than-normal sentence.

The appeal also claims:

-Federal prosecutor George Bevan committed misconduct by falsely telling the grand jury that later indicted Rosenthal that federal agencies were not aiming to shut down medical marijuana clubs;

-Rosenthal wasn't allowed to rebut the government's claims that he grew the marijuana for profit;

-Two jurors committed misconduct by voting to convict based in part on an attorney-friend's advice not to stray from the judge's instructions;

-Breyer erred by instructing the jury it could not bring its "sense of justice" to bear on this case; and

-Breyer erred by refusing to exclude evidence from the Oakland warehouse based on Rosenthal's claim that the warrant lacked probable cause.

The government not only disputes all of these claims but is seeking a harsher sentence of at least two to five years in prison.

Government's brief

Even if the city of Oakland approved of and encouraged his conduct, the government's brief says, a "one-day sentence for a defendant who has been a sophisticated marijuana cultivator for more than four years is simply indefensible in light of Congress' clear intent to treat marijuana cultivation as a serious offense, regardless of the use to which the marijuana is put."

Breyer's enormous departure from sentencing guidelines "was an abuse of judicial discretion and the case should be remanded for resentencing," the brief concludes.

Rosenthal's case was on hold for many months as the appeals court awaited the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Gonzales v. Raich, another Oakland-based case aimed at halting federal prosecution of medical marijuana patients and caregivers.

That case's plaintiffs had argued the Constitution's commerce clause lets Congress regulate only interstate commerce, and that Californians' medical marijuana use neither crosses state lines nor involves money changing hands. That would mean the Controlled Substances Act's marijuana ban oversteps Congress' authority, and so shouldn't be used to prosecute patients and caregivers.

But in a 6-3 ruling in June, the Supreme Court essentially concluded that even marijuana grown in back yards for personal, medical use can affect or contribute to the illegal interstate market for marijuana, and so is within Congress' constitutional reach. Once the federal government was cleared to arrest and prosecute patients and caregivers, Rosenthal's appeal began moving forward again.

Circuit Judges Betty Fletcher, Marsha Berzon and John Gibson will hear Rosenthal's appeal.

Varied backgrounds

Fletcher is a 1979 Carter appointee and former Seattle attorney with a liberal reputation. Berzon is a 1999 Clinton appointee who, after clerking for outspoken liberal U.S. Supreme Court Justice William Brennan, spent most of her career in private practice in San Francisco. And Gibson, "on loan" from the 8th Circuit appeals court, was a Kansas City attorney before being nominated to the federal bench in 1981 and the circuit court in 1982 by President Reagan.

"We think it's a panel that will be fair and carefully consider the claims," said Dennis Riordan, one of Rosenthal's attorneys.

Afghan Opium Prices Down Sharply Since 2001, U.N. Report Says (AP)

By GEORGE GEDDA, Associated Press

AP, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON - Favorable opium harvests in Afghanistan have led to a sharp drop in prices since the U.S. military forced the Taliban regime from power in 2001, according to a United Nations report.

The Taliban imposed a ban on opium cultivation in 2000, triggering an eight-fold price increase to $675 per kilogram in late 2001, the U.N. report said.

Since then good harvests coupled with improved yields dropped the price to $151 as of this past July, the study said.

The report was outlined at a new conference by the U.N.'s anti-drug chief, Antonio Maria Costa. It will be presented to the House Committee on International Relations on Tuesday.

Opium is the raw material from which heroin is derived.

A crackdown on poppy farming by the Afghan government with U.S., British and other outside help led to a 21 percent decline in the area of Afghanistan under poppy cultivation, Costa said.

But production remained almost unchanged because of optimum growing conditions, he added.

He said there has been a sharp increase in opium production in the northern Afghan province of Balkh. Costa linked the increase to the appointment of Gen. Atta Mohammed as governor last year and said he has urged President Hamid Karzai to replace Atta.

A separate report listed "removal of corrupt governors" among six initiatives the Afghan government should take over the next 12 to 24 months to build on improvements in the anti-drug campaign to date.

Other points Costa made:

_Afghanistan accounts for 87 percent of world opium production, down 3 percent from last year.

_The opium economy is netting traffickers $2.14 billion in 2005, about 41 percent of Afghanistan's gross national product, a 7 percent decline from last year.

_The death toll from Afghan opiate overdoses, mostly by Europeans, is estimated at 10,000 annually. About 100,000 others died from sickness related to heroin use.

Editorial: Battling The Meth `epidemic' (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, September 13, 2005

The summer began with a controversy over a new government anti-marijuana campaign that re-ignited a long-smoldering debate about the dangers of pot. It ended with a dust-up over methamphetamine, a potent and addictive drug also known as meth or crystal meth.

A Newsweek cover breathlessly called meth "America's Most Dangerous Drug" and warned of an "epidemic" that will soon be spreading to Your Town, if it's not already there. Meth is being called a "plague" by some drug officials and likened to a forest fire sweeping the country. A recent survey of 500 sheriffs' departments in 45 states labeled meth the No. 1 scourge. Some in Congress are accusing the White House of largely ignoring meth to focus on battling marijuana.

All of that has prompted some critics to cry "hype," suspecting that the meth epidemic is a transparent ploy by law enforcement to drum up more federal money.

A dose of skepticism is warranted here.

"Epidemic" implies that meth has swamped the country. That is not true. If you're a Drug Enforcement Administration agent in San Diego or Phoenix, the term is apt. But it's not if you're in Chicago. Cocaine and heroin are much bigger problems here, a DEA agent said. That's also true of many Northeastern cities, where meth remains a minor player.

But meth, sometimes called "poor man's cocaine," is popular and spreading.

There's no dispute about the perils of meth. Everyone agrees it's bad stuff. Like any other dangerous drug, meth can kill. It destroys lives. It's an insidious, highly addictive drug that can be smoked, snorted or injected. Users get an intense jolt of energy that often tips into paranoia and insomnia. In some, it stokes violent rages. Side effects include convulsions, stroke and cardiac arrhythmia. As we said, this is bad stuff. It doesn't need to be hyped.

The question being debated in Washington now is how much of America's drug-fighting resources should be focused on meth, as opposed to marijuana, cocaine and other, more widely used drugs. In 2003, for example, an estimated 25 million people used marijuana, 5.9 million used cocaine and crack and 1.3 million used meth.

The White House has favored targeting marijuana as Drug Enemy No. 1, because of its widespread use and because it's considered a gateway for young people toward more serious drug use.

The targeting of marijuana as a gateway drug traces back several administrations. There is growing skepticism about the theory, however, buttressed by more recent research. The notion that youngster's marijuana use will translate into use of harder drugs later is proving to be simplistic at best. And allocating the lion's share of resources by measuring the number of drug users may not be the most effective strategy.

The nation can't focus on fighting one drug to the near-exclusion of all others. Officials must take into account the ripple effects of a drug's damage--that is, not just the health costs for addicts and users, but also costs to cities and neighborhoods in crime, violence and sundered families.

The anti-meth strategy is two-fold.

First, authorities are targeting the makeshift labs where the drug is cooked. They recently boasted of the first nationally coordinated operation, yielding more than 400 arrests in about 200 cities, shutting down 56 labs. Cracking down on meth production in the U.S. is a good idea because those makeshift labs are like toxic waste dumps in a neighborhood. They emit noxious fumes and are highly explosive.

Unfortunately, success in closing such domestic labs won't stop meth. It only means that Mexican cartels pick up the slack. An investigation by The Oregonian newspaper in Portland, Ore., reported that Mexico last year imported nearly twice as much pseudoephedrine--one of the keys to illegal meth production--than is necessary for the production of cold medicine.

The second tactic: Many states, including Illinois, are restricting sales of over-the-counter cold and allergy medicines with ingredients that can be converted into the drug. In Oregon, for instance, you now need a doctor's prescription for such common cold medications as Claritin-D or Sudafed. That's overly burdensome. It is enough to keep some of those products behind the counter, available without a prescription. That's the practice in Illinois. Asking a pharmacist for Sudafed is a small inconvenience that most people will shrug off, particularly if it helps crimp a notorious drug trade.

Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales recently declared that meth had overtaken marijuana as the most dangerous drug in America. That's certainly true in many places in this country. And where it isn't, it could be tomorrow. The focus now should be in making sure that meth doesn't become a full-fledged "epidemic."

Man Gets Life Plus 136 Years In D.C.-area Arsons (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan

The Baltimore Sun, September 13, 2005

GREENBELT -- A law enforcement task force secretly labored for years from a warren of empty laboratories at the Beltsville Agricultural Research Center, chasing more than a thousand dead-end leads trying to catch a serial arsonist before he killed again.

In the end, it was a combination of sheer doggedness, a serendipitous meeting with military officials about DNA evidence from a pair of Marine dress-blues left behind at a fire scene, and an unusually cooperative suspect that cracked the case.

Monday, Thomas A. Sweatt, 50, the once-elusive "firebug" responsible for setting more than 45 fires in Maryland, Virginia and Washington that killed two people was sentenced in federal court to serve the rest of his life in prison.

"It's a relief," said Scott Fulkerson, a special agent from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco Firearms and Explosives' Baltimore field office who was co-leader of the task force that operated for nearly two years.

Sweatt, a former fast-food restaurant manager in Washington who reportedly told authorities he was driven by demons, kept Fulkerson, his co-leader Tom Daley and dozens of investigators from across the state and country puzzled for years.

When he was arrested in April and pleaded guilty in June, he gave it all up. The man who had evaded authorities for months didn't balk when they asked him for a voluntary DNA sample at the KFC restaurant he managed.

He also quickly admitted to a seemingly random set of residential fires that hop-scotched across the Washington region from 2002 until earlier this year.

His attorney described Sweatt as a classic Dr. Jekyl and Mr. Hyde, calling him a good person and victim of an unspecified mental illness.

"Hopefully, he will get the attention and treatment he desperately needs," said Assistant Public Defender John C. Chamble.

But even today, Sweatt's motive remains a mystery.

He walked into court Monday, his gait unsteady, his eyes hidden behind slightly darkened glasses.

When Sweatt stood to address the court before U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow sentenced him to life plus roughly 136 years in prison, he spoke clearly in an almost falsetto voice.

"To the victims and the victims' families, I'm very sorry for all of the harm I have caused," he said, leaning toward the microphone.

Sweatt rarely looked at the weeping families, including his own, assembled behind him.

His fires damaged and destroyed homes, displaced residents and killed 89-year-old Annie Brown and 86-year-old Lou Edna Jones, both of Northeast Washington.

"She befriended the lonely and comforted the broken hearted," Jones' daughter Carolyn said of her mother, who died in June 2003. "He is a vicious murderer who single-handedly terrorized Washington."

Like the 2002 Washington-area sniper attacks, the jarring unpredictability of the fires filled residents with fear and frustrated investigators who initially didn't link the blazes.

The fires were set in almost identical ways -- with homemade bombs of plastic one-gallon jugs filled with gasoline, topped with a piece of cloth used as a wick and wrapped in a plastic bag for easy transport.

Investigators described the arsons as diabolical, saying the incendiary devices were often left outside exits to the home.

A fire at a Silver Spring apartment building in 2004 was set in the building's only stairwell and forced some occupants to jump from second- and third-story windows. Most of the fires were set in the middle of the night as people slept.

Sweatt knew his victims were home, once waiting for 15 minutes on a porch before lighting his Molotov cocktail, investigators said.

The fires, which included several in Prince George's and Montgomery counties, spawned an arson task force that began its work in the summer of 2003.

Investigators believed they had found the arsonist's DNA on a hair recovered from the scene of one fire. They matched it to DNA found at other fires. But the team of federal agents and local detectives did not know who it belonged to.

More than 1,000 leads were logged in black binders, checked out through interviews and then, when exhausted, filed on bookshelves in the red-brick Building 308 at the agricultural center.

Evidence found at a fire in Prince George's County included a black plastic bag that had been part of the makeshift Molotov cocktail used to set the blaze. Most of the other bags had been melted down as a result of the arsons.

The lettering read, in part, "MADE IN CHINA FOR CORNELIUS SHOP."

"We only had part of the lettering at first, so we thought it was from a shop in London," Fulkerson said. "The Secret Service tracked down that lead for us before we knew we were wrong."

Instead, they discovered Cornelius Shopping Bags were used by two convenience stores in Washington -- one of the stores they later learned was a block from Sweatt's Lebaum Street home.

So they enlisted the store owners' help. They installed video cameras and taped dime-sized, numbered tags to each one of the store's bags.

That way, Fulkerson said, investigators could track a purchase made by the suspect to a fire-proof metal tag found at the arson scene. It never worked.

In March 2004, one of the most promising developments emerged.

Police arrested a Prince George's County man after he appeared at two schools pretending to be a fire investigator. He was charged with lying to a federal agent.

But hopes were dashed when his fingerprints did not match those found at fire scenes, and he was in jail when the next blaze linked to the serial arsonist was set on April 16, 2004.

As another year wound down, the leads piled up. Then, in December, authorities got the break they needed.

At the scene of a fire set in Arlington County, Va., they found a pair of Marine Corps blue trousers. DNA taken from the waistband was linked to DNA found at other fires.

Sweatt hoped to throw investigators off his trail by planting evidence suggesting a member of the armed services might be involved, according to Fulkerson.

But at the time, investigators took the lead at face value. They asked the Navy if they could enter their DNA evidence into its database to look for a match.

"It looks great on paper, but they don't keep their data that way," Fulkerson said. At the same time, federal officials said there were plans to scale back the task force because the investigation had not produced an arrest and the fires appeared to have stopped in early 2005.

Feeling despondent, Fulkerson said, investigators heard about an incredible coincidence: 30 months earlier, there had been unsolved car fires at a Marine barracks in Washington. Sweatt had been seen acting suspiciously there, and his name was taken down.

With that, they sought out Sweatt, who provided a DNA sample.

"He gave it to us without a problem," Fulkerson said.

The sample matched DNA from a strand of human hair found at a fire in Washington in September 2003, from fabric of a pant leg found at a Silver Spring fire in February 2004, from an athletic sock found at a D.C. fire last September and from the Marine trousers.

The task force finally disbanded. When he spoke to investigators, Sweatt told them he set so many fires, he was unsure if he could remember them all.

Fulkerson pledged to leave no suspicious fire unsolved.

"The victims we haven't found yet," he said, "they deserve closure too."

Arsonist Apologizes But Does Not Explain (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda And Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Serial arsonist Thomas A. Sweatt offered an apology yesterday as he was sentenced to a life prison term for carrying out a deadly string of fires, but he provided no clue in court about why he spent nearly three years igniting homes where people were sleeping.

It was the first time that Sweatt spoke publicly of the pain he caused by setting 45 houses and apartments on fire throughout the Washington region -- blazes that killed two elderly women and caused millions of dollars in damage. His words rang hollow, according to family members who said they want a motive and explanation.

Having exchanged the orange jail jumpsuit he wore at an earlier court appearance for a dark blue suit, white shirt and dark tie, Sweatt stood and leaned toward a microphone at the federal courthouse in Greenbelt. He turned toward the side of the courtroom where more than a dozen of his victims and their relatives sat.

In a soft voice, Sweatt said: "I'm very sorry for all of the harm that I've caused you. To those who have lost loved ones, I share your hurt, and I share your pain every day."

To anyone who harbors hatred toward him, Sweatt said he would ask God "to replace that hate with understanding." He also apologized to about a dozen members of his own family, some of whom had traveled from Texas and North Carolina to attend the hearing.

Sweatt, a 50-year-old former fast-food restaurant manager from Southeast Washington, pleaded guilty to murder and arson charges in June, less than six weeks after his arrest. His plea agreement with prosecutors called for a life sentence with no chance of parole; the judge yesterday tacked on nearly 136 additional years.

"There's nothing he could say that would be acceptable," said Carolyn Jones, 54, a daughter of Lou Edna Jones, the 86-year-old woman who was killed by the fire Sweatt set at her Northeast Washington home in June 2003. Jones said she left the courtroom as Sweatt stood to speak.

Her mother, known and beloved throughout the neighborhood as "Mama Lou," had lived in the house for 50 years. Jones said she would have liked to see Sweatt receive "the same sentence he gave my mother, the same way he gave it to her."

The other fatal fire was among the first fires that Sweatt admitted setting: a February 2002 blaze that claimed the life of 89-year-old Annie Brown of Northeast Washington. Sweatt admitted to setting fire to 44 more apartments and houses, as well as several vehicles, covering a wide swath of suburban Maryland, the District and Northern Virginia.

Investigators have quoted Sweatt as saying that he was addicted to setting fires and that he chose targets at random. They said he typically placed a plastic jug filled with gasoline just outside the front door and lighted a cloth wick. Sweatt was a thrill-seeker, authorities said, and sometimes watched from his car as the blaze spread. He knew the residences were occupied, they said, and he kept track of media accounts of the massive hunt for a suspect.

Sweatt's attorney, Assistant Public Defender John C. Chamble, told the judge that Sweatt could not stop setting the fires because he was "laboring under a psychological compulsion." Chamble compared Sweatt to a literary character, the peaceful Dr. Jekyll and murderous Mr. Hyde.

"You had the good Mr. Sweatt and the sick Mr. Sweatt," Chamble said.

In sentencing Sweatt, U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow told him that any mental health issues "can't in any way justify the actions you took, actions which terrorized a community."

Chamble asked the judge to recommend that Sweatt be placed in a facility where he could receive psychological treatment. Chasanow said she would make the recommendation. Federal prosecutors did not contest Chamble's request.

Sweatt, a former manager at a KFC/Pizza Hut on Bladensburg Road in Northeast Washington, has been jailed since his arrest April 27. Investigators said they tied him to the crimes through DNA evidence recovered at four arsons.

Within hours of his arrest, authorities said, Sweatt confessed.

During a news conference, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein praised the Serial Arson Task Force, which included members of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and local police and fire department investigators from Maryland, the District and Virginia. He also cited the work of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which helped connect DNA from a single strand of hair left at a September 2003 fire scene to Sweatt.

If the task force had not arrested him, "I have no doubt Mr. Sweatt would have set fire to more houses, and more people would have died," Rosenstein said.

Sweatt, of the 500 block of Lebaum Street SE, lived near a convenience store where he may have purchased a few of the jugs used to set fires, authorities said. The KFC/Pizza Hut was near many of the fire scenes, and Sweatt worked a shift that would have allowed him to strike in early morning.

Investigators said yesterday that they were relieved by the quick guilty plea and lengthy sentence. "Everybody had to put everything they had into this," said Tom Daley, an ATF agent and one of the lead investigators, recalling the many twists and turns of the probe.

In an interview at an ATF office in Lanham, Daley, other federal agents and local police and fire officials said the arson probe was the most taxing and complicated serial case they ever worked.

The agents and officers on the task force, which had more than 100 members during its nearly two-year existence, conducted lengthy surveillance details and, day after day, cruised neighborhoods before dawn. Authorities offered a reward of as much as $100,000 for information. Yet they never caught the arsonist in the act.

"Arsons are hard to prove," said ATF agent Scott Fulkerson, another of the lead investigators. "There is limited evidence left behind. Almost everything is consumed in fires. This covered three states and multiple jurisdictions. There was a lot of media coverage and great stress to the community. There was pressure felt by the task force to catch this guy. There was an ongoing threat to the community."

Investigators declined to discuss much of what they learned from Sweatt during a lengthy interrogation on the day of his arrest and during six subsequent debriefing sessions. They said he discussed a range of issues, pointed out places where he struck and provided a wealth of information about the mind-set of a serial arsonist.

In court yesterday, Sweatt was far less forthcoming.

"It would be better if he had sat down and kept his mouth shut. He's not sorry," declared Darlene Lloyd, the oldest of Lou Edna Jones's four daughters.

Lloyd and her sister, along with two other relatives of Sweatt's victims, addressed the judge at the sentencing. Lloyd told the judge that she learned from authorities that both of her mother's feet had been burned by the time firefighters found her in her bedroom.

"She lost both of her feet trying to get out of that big room," Lloyd said.

Serial Arsonist To Serve Life (WT/AP)

By Heather Greenfield, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Darlene Lloyd feels some relief that Thomas A. Sweatt will spend the rest of his life in jail without the possibility of parole for setting the fire that killed her mother.

But closure is not easy when her mentally handicapped son continues to ask at dinner each night for his grandmother, Lou Edna Jones.

"Being handicapped, he doesn't understand why she is not coming back," Mrs. Lloyd said. She planned to reassure him that Sweatt was not coming back now, either.

As victims of the serial arsonist spoke at his sentencing yesterday at U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, they said they still don't understand what led Sweatt to set random fires that terrorized the Washington area for two years.

"I would love to just find out exactly why he did this," said Jean Kyler, whose 94-year-old mother is still not able to return to her fire-damaged home.

Sweatt, 50, admitted setting 45 arson fires in the Washington area. Investigators know how he did it -- using jugs of gasoline, and clothing for a wick. But the reason why remained unanswered even as a federal judge sentenced him yesterday to life in prison plus 136 years.

"To the victims and the victims' families, I'm very sorry for all the harm I've caused you. To those who have lost loved ones, I share your hurt every day," Sweatt said.

He was dressed in a dark gray suit and appeared almost timid as he leaned into the microphone to speak and turned to the families gathered in court.

The former fast-food restaurant manager admitted that between February 2003 and December 2004 he set 45 fires: 21 in the District, 17 in Prince George's County, three in Fairfax County, two in Montgomery County, and one each in Arlington County and Alexandria.

Under a plea deal, local prosecutors agreed not to charge Sweatt with other arsons.

Sweatt also pleaded guilty to two murder charges.

He took responsibility for the June 2003 death of Mrs. Jones, 86, in her Northeast home, as well as the death of Annie Brown, 91. She died of smoke inhalation a few days after Sweatt set fire to her next-door neighbor's Northeast home in February 2002.

Sweatt has been in custody since his arrest in April. Authorities have said they linked him to the fires after collecting DNA from items found at four crime scenes, including Marine Corps dress pants from a fire in Arlington.

Sweatt showed no emotion during the victims' statements or the sentencing, but earlier said he welcomed the sentence.

Kenneth L. Wainstein, U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, called the sentence "a fitting punishment and a fitting conclusion to this case."

Judge Deborah K. Chasanow told Sweatt she realized he has mental health issues, but that they could not excuse what he did and how he "terrorized" the community.

It will be up to federal prison officials to decide whether to transfer Sweatt from a Charles County prison. There is no parole in the federal system.

D.C.-Area Arsonist Sentenced To Life In Prison (NYT)

By Gary Gately

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

GREENBELT, Md., Sept. 12 - A 50-year-old man was sentenced to life in prison on Monday for setting a series of fires that killed two elderly women and terrorized the Washington area for more than two years.

The man, Thomas A. Sweatt of Washington, apologized to the judge and to the relatives of the arson victims, while Mr. Sweatt's lawyer argued that a mental illness led his client to set the fires.

Federal Judge Deborah K. Chasanow sentenced Mr. Sweatt to life plus nearly 136 years, eliminating any chance of parole. Judge Chasanow said she would recommend to prison officials that Mr. Sweatt receive a psychiatric evaluation and, if necessary, treatment.

But, she added, mental illness could not excuse killing two people and setting fire to more than 45 homes, as well as several automobiles. "Whatever you faced in terms of any problem cannot in any way justify the actions you took - actions that terrorized a community," Judge Chasanow said.

Mr. Sweatt, a former KFC-Pizza Hut manager, sat silently, his lips pursed, through most of the hearing. Just before Judge Chasanow pronounced his sentence, based on a plea agreement, Mr. Sweatt leaned forward and said: "To my victims and to the victims' families, I'm very sorry for all the harm that I caused you. For those of you who have lost loved ones, I share your hurt and share your pain every day."

Mr. Sweatt's arrest in April resulted from an intensive investigation by federal agencies and local law enforcement in Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Investigators broke the case when they found a pair of Marine Corps blue trousers near a fire scene. The trousers led them to Navy investigators, who had identified Mr. Sweatt as a suspect in car fires more than two years earlier near the Marine barracks in Southeast Washington.

Mr. Sweatt consented to giving a DNA sample, which linked him to evidence from four of the fires, the authorities said, and he admitted to setting others next to entrances to homes using cloth wicks and one-gallon jugs of gasoline.

Investigators said Mr. Sweatt had no known ties to the military. John C. Chamble, a federal public defender representing Mr. Sweatt, said his client suffered a mental illness that resulted in radical and uncontrollable shifts in behavior. "He did not have a choice," Mr. Chamble said.

During the sentencing hearing and afterward, relatives of arson victims spoke of the pain and havoc Mr. Sweatt's arsons had caused.

Relatives of Lou Edna Jones, an 86-year-old woman killed in a fire on June 5, 2003, at her Northeast Washington house, wore shirts and carried placards bearing photographs of the woman fondly known as Mama Lou.

"The rest of my life, I'll still be grieving for the loss of my mother," said Darlene Lloyd, Ms. Jones's daughter. "There will always be a hole in my heart that can never be filled or closed."

Annie Brown, an 89-year-old from Northeast Washington, died of smoke inhalation days after a fire Mr. Sweatt admitted to setting at her neighbor's home in February 2002, the authorities said.

Treasury Tax Analysis Concluded As Lawful (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- An independent investigation concluded that the Treasury Department didn't break the law by calculating the cost of then-Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry's tax plan and posting the results on the department's Web site.

"We do not believe that Treasury employees completed the revenue estimate at issue for use by a campaign or a party, but as a defense of the [Bush] administration's policies," according to a March 24 letter to the Treasury from Special Counsel Scott Bloch. The analysis was made with an eye toward congressional action, not to criticize Mr. Kerry, the special counsel's office said. The Hatch Act restricts political activities by government employees.

The documents were made available to Dow Jones Newswires under a Freedom of Information Act request. The investigation was launched after The Wall Street Journal reported1 in the spring of 2004 that Treasury used civil servants to calculate the Kerry tax plan.

Mr. Bloch said his probe found that Treasury's Office of General Counsel for many years has given "problematic" guidance to employees, effectively asking Treasury tax analysts to "turn a blind eye" to potential violations.

Treasury Deputy General Counsel James Carroll welcomed the report of no legal violations, but defended the general counsel's office, saying it has consistently advised employees that it is inappropriate to conduct analyses "for a partisan political purpose."

Heir Tonic For Charities (WSJ)

By Arthur C. Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

The estate tax seemed to be cruising toward inevitable demise. A Senate vote was expected around Labor Day, and the GOP appeared close to the 60 votes needed to permanently abolish taxes on inheritances. Katrina has set the vote back by at least a few weeks, as the Senate attends instead to legislation authorizing relief funds to the Gulf Coast. The hurricane has also provided an argument against repeal to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. He compared beneficiaries of repeal with hurricane victims, asking, "Shall we give [the estate tax revenues] to the wealthiest people in the country, or should we rebuild New Orleans?" The argument is a progressive classic: Not taxing the rich is the same as taking from the poor.

As flawed as the logic might be, it is worth considering how much it will cost taxpayers if the tax is repealed, and what it means for the economy. Estimates place the annual federal revenues from the estate tax at $20 billion. This would certainly make a dent in hurricane recovery efforts -- if it were all used for that purpose.

A more realistic link between the tax and disaster relief is through charitable contributions. Americans bequeath $20 billion every year to nonprofits, including organizations that provide relief to disaster victims. Opponents of repeal note that doing so removes a powerful philanthropic motive, because the portion of an estate willed to charity is tax-exempt. The CBO estimates that a 10% decrease in the estate tax would stimulate a decrease in charitable bequests of 4.2%. This suggests that a repeal of the tax would, by itself, lower charitable giving by $8 billion annually. Many nonprofits have lined up against abolition of the tax for this reason.

In making their case, however, nonprofits employ a tortured logic: Our organization supports the estate tax so that your family will continue to try to avoid it by giving us money. Instead, charities should focus less on the incentives of people making bequests, and more on the incentives of people receiving them.

What can we expect heirs to do with their money, if less of it is taken by the IRS? Data show that people tend to contribute a higher proportion of inherited wealth than they do other kinds of wealth (e.g., from stocks or real estate). If the estate tax is repealed, this extra charitable giving will likely come to at least $750 million per year. In the short run, giving by private heirs will not make up entirely for the loss of charitable gifts by their parents if the estate tax is repealed, but this effect is still considerable. And the amounts given annually are not fixed -- heirs may be convinced to give more.

When all is said and done, the Senate will most likely repeal or greatly reduce the estate tax without too much consideration of the interests of the nonprofit sector. This does not spell doom for charities, however. The key is not to focus on how the tax system can be used to get more money from the dead, but rather to look to the future and find ways to increase giving -- for humanitarian relief and other worthy causes -- among a new generation of heirs.

Mr. Brooks, associate professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, is writing a book on American charity, to be published next year by Basic Books.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Pledges 'humility' As Senate Hearings Begin (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts was unflappable and succinct Monday, after sometimes blunt criticism from Democrats in the opening day of Senate hearings to confirm him as the nation's 17th chief justice.

DOJ_NMG_0004395

In his longest remarks since President Bush first nominated him in July, Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee that he would approach his position as the head of the nation's judiciary with “a certain humility.” Roberts, tapped to replace the late William Rehnquist, spoke without notes for less than seven minutes.

“Judges are like umpires,” said Roberts, a federal appeals judge. “Umpires don't make the rules; they apply them.”

Roberts' remarks ended a day of speeches by the 18 Judiciary Committee members. Democrats put the judge on notice that he has some persuading to do. “If I looked at only what you've said and written in the past, I'd feel compelled to vote no,” said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said Roberts seemed “cavalier” about women's and minority rights in some of his writings.

As questioning begins today, Roberts, 50, will be pressed by Democrats to reveal his views on a range of legal issues.

Democrats noted the nominee could serve for more than a generation. “We are about to enter, if he is successful, the Roberts era,” said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. “We should know this man's core values and beliefs.”

Republicans are counseling caution. “You have no obligation to tell us how you will rule,” Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said. “Don't take the bait.”

But Sen. Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the panel, said he'll ask whether Roberts believes the Constitution guarantees a right to privacy — a right cited in the Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal nationwide. Rehnquist was one of two justices to vote in 1973 against Roe v. Wade.

A campaign atmosphere prevailed outside the hearing room. Critics wore “No on Roberts” lapel stickers. Supporters wore lime green “Roberts Yes!” T-shirts.

Specter is pushing for a Senate vote on Roberts this month. If approved, Roberts could take office by Oct. 3, the beginning of the high court's term.

Roberts Sees Modest Role For Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Judge John G. Roberts Jr., President Bush's choice to be chief justice of the United States, told senators today that he seeks a modest and limited role for the nation's highest court, akin to an umpire who calls the balls and strikes rather than a star player who is the center of attention.

"Justices and judges are servants of the law, not the other way around," Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee, eschewing judicial activism.

"Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules. They apply them," he said. "And nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

His statement served notice that on one of the central questions surrounding the judiciary — the extent to which judges should impose themselves on key issues of the day -he favored a restricted role.

Roberts' short and simple opening statement came on the first day of his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

And though the grand hearing room in the Russell Building was the site of earlier confrontations over Judge Robert Bork in 1987 and Justice Clarence Thomas in 1991, today's opening session had none of the tension and acrimony of those confrontations.

Roberts and his wife, Jane, introduced their two young children — Josie and Jack — and the senators smiled at them like grandparents.

Several Democrats said they intended to question Roberts sharply to discern his views on civil rights and abortion, but they stopped short of saying they would oppose him.

In his brief statement at the hearing's end, Roberts showed the qualities that made him a superb advocate before the Supreme Court. He spoke directly to the senators and without notes. And he used the simple baseball analogy to convey his view that the Supreme Court should play a more modest and limited role in American government.

His comments echoed a theme of the 10 Republican senators who spoke before him. They complained that the Supreme Court had become a "super legislature" in recent decides, regularly deciding the most controversial political question of the day.

The senators said judges should not make the law. Rather, they said the hard political questions should be decided by elected officials, and Roberts indicated that he agreed with them on the court's limited role.

However, Roberts also stressed the court's crucial role in upholding individual rights against the power of the government, a favorite theme of Democrats and liberals.

As a lawyer in private practice, Roberts said he was awed to go before the Supreme Court representing a client who was fighting the federal government.

"Here was the United States, the most powerful entity in the world, aligned against my client. And yet, all I had to do was convince the court that I was right on the law and the government was wrong and all that power and might would recede in deference to the rule of law," he said. "That is a remarkable thing. It is what we mean when we say that we are a government of laws and not of men."

Roberts recalled President Ronald Reagan's reference to the Soviet Constitution, and its list of rights granted to the people. "Those rights were empty promises, because that system did not have an independent judiciary to uphold the rule of law and enforce those rights," he said. "We do, because of the wisdom of our founders and the sacrifices of our heroes over the generations to make their vision a reality."

Roberts, 50, was nominated a week ago to succeed his first boss in Washington, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Sept. 3.

If confirmed, he would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall took office in 1800. And in good health, he could serve until 2040, said Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

In his opening statement, Roberts also stressed that he had "no agenda" for the court.

"I come before the committee with no agenda. I have no platform," he said. "Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

On Tuesday morning, the senators will begin the questioning of Roberts.

Roberts delivered his opening statement roughly three and a half hours after the hearing began; he spoke only after each senator had delivered an opening statement.

Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican, banged the gavel at midday, beginning what is likely to be a weeklong inquiry into Roberts judicial temperament and — to the extent possible — his positions on some of the most sensitive judicial and political issues of the era, even as senators said he had no obligation to speak in specifics.

While there has been little doubt that the nomination will win the committee's approval — and the approval of the full Senate — one senior Democrat, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, said that from what he has seen of Roberts' writings, he would vote against him.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said in her opening statement that she would have trouble voting for a nominee whom she felt might overturn the Roe vs. Wade decision that granted a woman the right to have an abortion. She is the only woman on the committee.

Roberts, in a telegenic red tie, sat smiling and silent at the witness table in the ornate Caucus Room as the senators, one by one, reminded him, and a nationwide television and Internet audience, that the Senate was about to decide whether a 50-year-old jurist would receive a lifetime appointment as chief justice of the United States.

The hearing played out against the backdrop of the devastation brought by Hurricane Katrina two weeks ago to the Gulf Coast.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the committee, said that the storm offered "a tragic reminder of why we have a federal government," which he said was needed, foremost, for the protection and security of the population.

The statement went to the heart of questions about Roberts and where he would lead the court as the first new chief justice in 19 years. Roberts had been nominated in July to replace the retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, but was renominated last week to be the chief justice after the death of William H. Rehnquist.

Leahy noted that "if anyone needed a reminder of the growing poverty and despair among too many Americans, we now have it" in Katrina's aftermath. So too, he said, a reminder of the racial divide that continues to mar the nation.

At the heart of the inquiry of Roberts, a relatively junior judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, Leahy said, was, "Will you be the protector of the rights of all Americans?"

Specter, noting the recent run of 5-4 decisions on the high court, said that Roberts' votes would be critical on many key issues, among them those involving school prayer and defendants' rights. He added that the nomination "comes at a time of turbulent partisanship" in the nation's political life.

He said that senators "have a responsibility to ask probing questions," and that Roberts had the prerogative of answering them, or not, as he sees fit.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), expressing chagrin at the failure of the Bush administration to make available certain documents from the time Roberts spent as a deputy solicitor general during the administration of the first President Bush, said, "We can only wonder what they don' want us to know."

Biden raised the issue of decisions the court has made in recent years to expand the rights of women and African Americans.

"I believe in the right of privacy," he said, using what has become recognized as a reference to abortion.

Biden said that based on what Roberts has written — a record that includes his work in the Reagan and first Bush administrations, on the appellate court and in response to questions from senators — he would vote against the nomination.

Feinstein said that as the panel's only woman she felt a need to ask about issues that primarily had an impact on women.

She and Sen. John Kyl (R-Ariz.) acknowledged that Roberts needed to be sensitive to answering questions in a way that might impinge on his judicial prerogatives.

As the session progressed, there was no sign of political bickering, despite the political sensitivity and the potential divisions attached to the nomination.

There was a small contingent of partisans outside the hearing, and advocates of women's rights expressed concern about rules limiting the public's access to the hearing. With about 250 seats in the room, 40 were set aside for the public.

The Unheard (WP)

By Marcia Davis

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

It was the moment for which the nation had been waiting -- okay, well, at least those who'd managed to get a seat in the hearing room in the Russell Building on Capitol Hill yesterday.

The confirmation hearings for John G. Roberts Jr. were unfolding against the backdrop of Hurricane Katrina, and though a few senators mentioned it early on, as the day progressed in Room 325, its urgency seemed a million miles away. The caucus room with its high ceiling, huge columns and glittering chandeliers has been the site of other history-making moments. It was where in 1987 Robert Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court began its descent into defeat, and where Clarence Thomas crossed swords with Anita Hill. Yesterday, it was where Roberts finally spoke on his own behalf in his bid to become the next Supreme Court chief justice.

A sea of media, 140 or so strong, and the few members of the public who managed to get seats in the very back of the room had been waiting through one senator's speech after another to hear the 50-year-old federal judge work his rhetorical magic. Here was the man who had argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court, and won most. Here was the man touted as a lawyer's lawyer, a man his colleagues have praised as knowing the power of combining legal brilliance with a cool confidence. And here was the man, who, if President Bush has his way, will be confirmed as the nation's 17th chief justice, elevated to a position that could shape the quality of life for Americans for decades to come.

So, naturally, his words were what everyone wanted to hear.

And speak he did -- for all of eight minutes. He was introduced shortly before 3:30, and he was done with his opening statement soon after.

Talk about judicial restraint.

As does any lawyer, John Roberts knows that anything he says can be used against him. And so yesterday he was a man of "thank yous" -- to the senators lined up before him, to Bush for the nomination, to his family and his mentors without whose help and sacrifices he would not be sitting where he was, he said.

He paid respects once again to the man whose casket he helped to carry up the Supreme Court steps last week, William H. Rehnquist. Roberts clerked for the chief justice, and in one of those odd, novel-like twists, he may soon replace him.

"I talked last week with the nurses who helped care for him over the past year, and I was glad to hear from them that he was not a particularly good patient," Roberts said. "He chafed at the limitations they tried to impose. His dedication to duty over the past year was an inspiration to me and, I know, to many others."

Roberts went on to speak of his philosophy, one that demands a limited role for judges. He compared them to umpires, adding, "Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire." Judges are more than umpires, of course, and Roberts tried to assure the panel that his thinking has evolved since his early eager days as a young lawyer working in the Republican administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

When the questioning begins, there will be those who will press him to be more revealing. But yesterday Roberts spent most of the day in silence, sitting through the 10-minute speeches of the Judiciary Committee members, which added up to hours.

Roberts was as still as he was silent, his face a wall. His lips were a tight line, except on the few occasions when he laughed at a joke -- mainly the recurring one about his relative youth and appearance of good health. There were times, too, when someone seemed to make a point that he appreciated, and he would reward that senator with the slightest of nods, as when Joseph Biden (D-Del.) talked about the issues of technology and privacy that no doubt the high court would face in the future.

There were what passed for harsh words from Democratic senators such as New York's Charles Schumer, who warned that he would be unsparing in his questioning, and California's Dianne Feinstein, who said she would be unable to vote for anyone she believed would overturn Roe v. Wade. And there were words of encouragement from Republicans such as Orrin Hatch, who warned Roberts not to be trapped into answering questions that compromised him as a judge.

Roberts took it all in, his eyes often wide and glistening under the glare of the camera lights, but revealing nothing.

It was representative democracy at work, though it was occurring in a room where if you didn't know better, you might think democracy was almost exclusively white. The Judiciary Committee itself is all white, and Feinstein is its only female member.

"Things went as I expected," said Ted Shaw of the NAACP's Legal Defense Fund. "I think Roberts's opening statement was eloquent. I've seen him in court. But the question for me is who is he."

Roberts's moments of greatest animation occurred before the hearings began, when he sat with his wife, Jane, and children, Jack and Josie. Jack wore a suit with shorts and a bow tie. Josie wore a blue dress and a bow in her hair. It was a moment reminiscent of the summer day when Bush first nominated Roberts to replace Sandra Day O'Connor. Jack didn't dance this time, though. He simply climbed into his father's lap. The cameras flashed, and Roberts didn't have to say a word.

'Judges Are Not Politicians,' Roberts Says (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jo Becker

John G. Roberts Jr. opened the first Supreme Court confirmation hearing in 11 years yesterday by portraying himself as a humble, non-political judge who would interpret the law "without fear or favor" if he became the 17th chief justice of the United States.

After listening to three hours of senators' opening statements, in which Democrats expressed fears that he would move the court to the right on abortion, civil rights and other issues, Roberts sought to dispel such speculation. Though he offered no specifics on his views, Roberts said justices must have "the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent."

"I have no platform," he told the Senate Judiciary Committee in a brief speech without notes in the ornate Russell Caucus Room. "Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes." Rather, he said, "judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules; they apply them."

Although the stewardship of the Supreme Court is at stake for potentially decades to come, yesterday's hearing seemed almost anticlimactic, with public attention riveted on the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and Democrats still pressing for 15-year-old documents that might give them better ammunition against Roberts. With few doubting that Roberts, 50, will ultimately win confirmation, senators of both parties used yesterday's forum to highlight their contrasting legal philosophies and views of the court's role in society.

Many Republicans used their allotted 10 minutes apiece to urge the nominee not to answer questions about legal issues that might come before the court. But Democrats said he must satisfy them that he will safeguard the rights of women, disabled people and minorities in the voting booth and workplace. Some also pressed him to recognize a constitutional right to privacy, which underpins the Supreme Court's legalization of abortion nationwide.

"This is a confirmation proceeding," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), "not a coronation. It is the Senate Judiciary Committee's job to ask tough questions."

President Bush's choice to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist will face hours of questions, starting today, from the panel's 10 Republicans and eight Democrats.

With some Republicans congratulating Roberts as though his confirmation is assured in the GOP-controlled Senate, Democrats warned that, if nothing else, he will have to earn their votes by fully explaining his criticisms of a variety of policies aimed at eliminating discrimination, including affirmative action and some aspects of the Voting Rights Act. Those criticisms were found in reams of memos that Roberts wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration.

"I believe the federal government should stamp out discrimination wherever -- wherever -- it occurs," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) told him. "If I look only at what you've said and written . . . I would have to vote no. You dismissed the constitutional protection of privacy as, quote, 'a so-called right.' . . . You dismissed gender discrimination as . . . 'merely a perceived problem.' "

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), the only woman on the committee, said, "It would be very difficult for me to vote to confirm someone to the Supreme Court whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade ." In the 1980s, Roberts wrote that the landmark abortion ruling was wrongly decided and should be overturned, but he since has suggested that the ruling is "settled law" that need not be revisited.

Despite the Democrats' warnings, Roberts's televised performance clearly pleased Republican senators and White House aides. His seven-minute speech "almost moved me to tears," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) told reporters. White House adviser Ed Gillespie, who sat just behind Roberts, assured reporters "there were no notes or anything he spoke from."

Lawmakers' preoccupation with the hurricane catastrophe pervaded the hearing on filling the first chief justice vacancy in nearly two decades. At least two Democrats tried to weave the storm's devastation into their arguments, saying the disproportionate impact on poor people and ethnic minorities underscores the need for a judiciary sympathetic to the nation's most vulnerable.

"We cannot continue to ignore the injustice, the inequality and the gross disparities that exist in our society," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the committee's most senior member, told Roberts. He said Roberts's writings on civil rights suggest there are "real and serious reasons to be deeply concerned" about the direction he would take the court and about "his commitment to equal opportunity. . . . This hearing is John Roberts's job interview with the American people."

Roberts came for the interview well-prepared. Dressed in a dark suit, crisp white shirt and red tie, he introduced his parents; three sisters; his wife, Jane; and their two young children, whose faces alternately betrayed fear, amusement and awe at the scores of cameras and bright lights packed into the templelike hearing room. The senators, many of them grandparents, could not resist greeting the children as cameras clicked furiously. "You're not at all nervous, are you?" Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said to Jack Roberts, 4, who at one point sat in his father's lap and posed like a bodybuilder.

Just how much Roberts should say in response to today's questions was the subject of considerable partisan debate yesterday. Republicans warned Roberts against answering "litmus test" questions that could jeopardize his impartiality on cases likely to come before the Supreme Court.

"Some have said the nominees who do not spill their guts about whatever a senator wants to know are hiding something from the American people," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah). "These might be catchy sound bites, but they are patently false."

But Democrats argued that Americans have a right to know where Roberts stands on issues of profound import to their lives, disputing Republican contentions that Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who was appointed by President Bill Clinton, refused to answer questions about her views on such issues as abortion, discrimination and criminal law.

"It is not enough to say that you will be fair," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), adding that he is sure that conservative Justice Antonin Scalia and the liberal Ginsburg think they, too, are fair. "But in case after case, they rule differently," Schumer said. "They approach the Constitution differently."

Some of the most pointed questions, however, may come from Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.), a Republican moderate and frequent maverick. While Specter said he does not expect Roberts to share his views on Roe v. Wade , he will question him on his previously expressed views on women's rights, term limits for federal judges and what he called the "extreme positions taken by the Supreme Court in denigrating the role of Congress" by striking down a number of laws it has passed.

While Republicans such as Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa charged that Democrats who seek Roberts's views on specific issues are doing so because they "only want judges who will do their political bidding on the bench," others made it clear that they have priorities they would like to see the Supreme Court uphold.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) decried federal courts that "are redefining the meaning of marriage, deciding when a human life is worthy of protection, running prisons and schools by decree," and "removing expressions of faith in the public square." He called Roe v. Wade a judicial "exercise of raw political power" and said "nearly 40 million children have been aborted in America."

Democrats renewed their request for a limited number of documents dating from Roberts's tenure in 1989 to 1993 as principal deputy solicitor general. From that perch, Roberts helped shape and argue the George H.W. Bush administration's positions in hundreds of Supreme Court cases. The letter, sent yesterday to President Bush, was signed by three Democratic members of the pivotal "Gang of 14," a bipartisan group considered key to averting any filibuster of Roberts's nomination.

Roberts Comes With 'No Agenda' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday left little doubt why President Bush nominated him to be the next chief justice of the Supreme Court.

"I have no platform," he promised at the close of the first day of his confirmation hearing, as members of the Senate Judiciary Committee listened intently. "I have no agenda, but I do have a commitment. If I am confirmed, I will confront every case with an open mind."

Judge Roberts' 6 ½-minute speech -- delivered without notes -- came at the end of a marathon of much longer speeches carefully read by committee members.

One conservative observer later remarked that Judge Roberts "stole the show." Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who hasn't said how he'll vote on the nomination, said Judge Roberts even "nodded at all the right times" during the senators' speeches.

The first Supreme Court confirmation hearing in more than 10 years -- and the first for a chief justice since 1986 -- began shortly before noon, when Mr. Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, ushered Judge Roberts through the giant mahogany doors of the Senate Caucus Room.

Mr. Leahy noted that Judge Roberts is "the first nominee of the 21st century" and emphasized that justices are appointed for life.

"The light of the nominations process is intense because it is the only time that light will shine, and the afterglow lasts for the rest of a justice's career," Mr. Leahy said.

Democrats promised to grill Judge Roberts about his positions on such issues as abortion and congressional authority.

"We have an obligation to find out where you will take us before we decide whether we want you to lead us there," said Herb Kohl, Wisconsin Democrat. "And, most importantly, you have an obligation to tell us."

DOJ_NMG_0004401

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, reiterated her position that she could not vote for Judge Roberts if she thinks he will overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 court case that declared abortion a constitutional right.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, who has met privately with Judge Roberts three times, said he and others still know very little about the veteran Washington lawyer.

"We have seen maybe 10 percent of you -- just the visible tip of the iceberg, not the 90 percent that is still submerged," Mr. Schumer said. "And we all know that it is the ice beneath the surface that can sink the ship."

Republicans warned their colleagues against judging Judge Roberts based on political views.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, warned Judge Roberts not to "take the bait" by answering questions that might touch on his views of political matters or might hem him into ruling a certain way on a particular case if he's confirmed.

A pro-choice Republican, Mr. Specter told Judge Roberts: "I do not intend to ask whether you will overturn Roe v. Wade. I will ask you if the Constitution has a right of privacy, and I will ask questions about precedents as they bear on Roe v. Wade."

Mr. Specter, a veteran of nine Supreme Court confirmation hearings, said nominees typically "answer about as many questions as they think they have to in order to be confirmed."

After the committee members had their say, Judge Roberts was officially introduced by the senators from his native Indiana, Republican Sen. Richard G. Lugar and Democrat Evan Bayh.

Judge Roberts stood before the committee, raised his right hand and swore to tell the truth. He then sat down and delivered the briefest remarks of the day.

"Judges and justices are servants of the law, not the other way around," he told the lawmakers. "Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules; they apply them."

He recalled arguing cases against the government before the Supreme Court.

"Here was the United States, the most powerful entity in the world, aligned against my client," Judge Roberts said. "And, yet, all I had to do was convince the court that I was right on the law and the government was wrong and all that power and might would recede in deference to the rule of law. That is a remarkable thing."

He waxed nostalgic about the "endless fields of Indiana" of his youth.

"As I grew older, those endless fields came to represent for me the limitless possibilities of our great land. Growing up, I never imagined that I would be here, in this historic room, nominated to be the chief justice," Judge Roberts said.

"If I am confirmed," he concluded, "I will be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court, and I will work to ensure that it upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans."

An Opening Performance Worthy Of An Experienced Lawyer (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - This time, John Roberts's client was himself.

After arguing 39 cases before the Supreme Court, spending the last eight weeks in the public spotlight and listening for more than three hours on Monday as 18 senators expressed their admiration and doubts, the Supreme Court nominee took just seven minutes to paint a verbal self-portrait in the opening statement of his confirmation hearing.

Judge Roberts said he was a humble servant of the rule of law. He had "no agenda," "no platform;" he was nothing but an umpire, calling balls and strikes.

The White House team handling his nomination as chief justice had not seen the statement in advance, and Judge Roberts had not rehearsed it before the "murder board" that helped prepare him for the confirmation process. He spoke without notes.

It was a performance that lawyers arguing before the Supreme Court can only dream of. They rarely get two uninterrupted minutes, and the justices can reduce to shreds the most eloquent of prepared openings in less time than that.

Not only did the senators on the Judiciary Committee not interrupt Judge Roberts, but they also recessed until the next morning as soon as he had finished. That meant that the senators' carefully prepared opening statements, in which Democrats and some Republicans raised concerns on issues like abortion and the role of the chief justice, faded beneath the rhetorical high note with which Judge Roberts ended his statement. He pledged to make sure the Supreme Court "upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans."

Had the committee then turned immediately to questioning him, that moment would have been lost, or at least blunted. As the hearing proceeds, senators will ask Judge Roberts to explain 25-year-old memorandums or press him on questions he does not care to answer.

But there was no such dissonance as the hearing's first day came to a leisurely midafternoon conclusion. Judge Roberts did not explicitly address any of the senators' concerns; there will be plenty of time for that. His accomplishment, rather, was to address the concerns implicitly without appearing to acknowledge them.

For example, Senator Russell D. Feingold had commented earlier in the afternoon that the memorandums the young John G. Roberts Jr. had written as a lawyer in the Reagan administration were "highly ideological" and "sometimes dismissive of the views of others." But people can change, Senator Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat, observed, adding, "So I will be looking for a somewhat different John Roberts than the John Roberts of 1985."

Nowhere in his statement did Judge Roberts say "I have changed." But his self-description as humble, grateful and open-minded countered the cocky and caustic image that some of his early writings conveyed, without disavowing the positions that those documents embraced.

In the senators' opening statements, one of the most vivid images was provided by Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who told the nominee: "We have seen maybe 10 percent of you, just the visible tip of the iceberg. And we all know that it is the ice beneath the surface that can sink the ship."

Judge Roberts did not address that statement either, but he did not have to. He simply topped it with his own imagery, taken from his youth in Indiana. "I recall those endless fields with their promise of infinite possibilities," he said, although as the suburb-raised, prep-school-educated son of a steel executive, his encounters with "an isolated silo or a barn" may have been somewhat fleeting.

His statement also included an oblique reference to whether the positions he took as an administration lawyer, like in a brief he signed asking the Supreme Court to overturn Roe v. Wade, represented his own views or those of his client.

"When I worked in the Department of Justice, in the office of the solicitor general, it was my job to argue cases for the United States," he said, going on to describe what it was like in private practice to be on the other side and argue against the United States, "the most powerful entity in the world." The suggestion was implicit that not only had he argued on both sides, but that he could also see both sides of an issue.

And he defined a judge's role as, in part, fidelity to precedent. "Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent, shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath," he said.

There was no need to remind anyone listening that the most disputed precedent of all is Roe v. Wade, the 1973 abortion case, which was substantially reaffirmed by the court in 1992. Still in question, as the Judiciary Committee convenes for a second day on Tuesday, is whether Judge Roberts's views on that particular issue will be any better known by the end of his confirmation hearing.

Roberts Confirmation Hearings Begin (BSUN)

By Gwyneth K. Shaw

The Baltimore Sun, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's nominee for chief justice, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., said Monday that Supreme Court justices have a "limited role" -- to apply the law, not make it.

On the first day of Senate hearings on his nomination, Roberts pledged that, if confirmed, he would decide cases "with an open mind" and work to safeguard the liberties "of all Americans."

The 50-year-old appellate judge's remarks, delivered without notes and lasting just six minutes, addressed issues raised by Republicans and Democrats on the Judiciary Committee, which is expected to approve his nomination next week.

"I come before the committee with no agenda. I have no platform. Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes," said Roberts, who used a homespun comparison between Supreme Court justices and baseball umpires.

"I will decide every case based on the record, according to the rule of law, without fear or favor, to the best of my ability. And I will remember that it's my job to call balls and strikes and not to pitch or bat," he said.

Those remarks echoed comments by Republican senators, who view Roberts as someone who will move the court to the right, in line with the wishes of their party's conservative base.

But Roberts, a White House lawyer under President Ronald Reagan, also spoke of his more recent work as an appellate attorney, representing clients against the government. He said that the rule of law enables a wronged citizen to prevail against the "might" of the United States in court, "a remarkable thing" that reflects that "we are a government of laws and not of men."

Roberts said he was committed to fairly analyze every case and "be open to the considered views of my colleagues on the bench."

Responding indirectly to concerns expressed by Democrats, who Monday noted the suffering of many poor, black Americans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, he said, twice, that he was committed to protecting the rights and liberties of "all Americans."

In another apparent nod to Democratic fears -- that he will be part of a new conservative majority that overturns Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision on abortion rights -- Roberts said that judges need to have the "humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent."

Roberts, who would be the youngest chief justice in more than two centuries, said a Supreme Court justice should approach his work with "modesty." He said he was "humbled" by Bush's confidence in him and spoke of his respect and admiration for the man he would replace, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Sept. 3 at age 80.

Robert sat alone at the witness table, with his wife, Jane, and other friends and family behind him. Also prominently seated in the front row were his White House handlers, former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson of Tennessee and former Republican National Chairman Ed Gillespie, who have helped shepherd the nomination through two months of Senate courtesy calls and intense pre-hearing rehearsals.

Monday's session -- which ran more than 3 1/2 hours in the Russell Senate Office Building's historic Caucus Room -- was a mild prelude to the tough questioning expected Tuesday morning, when committee members will get the chance to cross-examine Roberts.

Day One was about photo opportunities, establishing some of the parameters for the debate, and a display of the nominee's considerable gifts as an advocate, which earned him a reputation as one of the most effective lawyers in Washington.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, called the hearings "the biggest challenge of the year, perhaps the biggest challenge of the decade" and vowed to keep the proceedings cordial but substantive.

Republicans on the panel, who like the Democrats had 10 minutes each for opening statements, counseled Roberts to resist efforts to probe his thinking about specific issues and cases, such as Roe v. Wade.

Republican Sen. Orrin G. Hatch of Utah said the Senate must evaluate Roberts on a standard "based upon the fundamental principle that judges interpret and apply, but do not make, the law."

Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia joined two senators from Indiana, where Roberts grew up, in emphasizing his qualifications rather than his judicial ideology.

"I can say, without equivocation, that I have never seen a nominee with stronger qualifications than John Roberts," said Warner, a 27-year Senate veteran.

Democratic Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, signaling a theme that Democrats used all afternoon, pointed out that the Supreme Court has frequently been the last stop for Americans looking for justice in areas such as civil rights.

He said the racial and class divides highlighted in the aftermath of the Gulf Coast hurricane make the composition of the Supreme Court more important than ever.

Democrats maintain that Roberts should provide detailed answers in the hearings because once he is confirmed, he has the job for life.

Roberts would be the youngest chief justice in more than two centuries. The only woman on the committee, Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, said her chief concern revolves around Roberts' views on the right to privacy, the linchpin of the Roe decision and several other major cases. Feinstein said she would find it "very difficult" to vote to confirm a nominee who would overturn Roe.

"How the court decides future cases could determine whether both the beginning-of-life and the end-of-life decisions remain private, or whether individuals could be subject to government intrusion or perhaps the risk of prison," she said.

After the hearing, Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts said he was "troubled" that Republicans seemed to be urging silence on Roberts.

"It's very important for the people of the United States to know who this justice is and what his views are," Kennedy said.

The packed hearing chamber, filled largely with journalists and official guests, had room for only about three dozens members of the public, who were brought in and out in shifts. Some wore stickers advertising their feelings, including "Fair Hearing, Fair Vote" and "No on Roberts."

Judges Should Play Limited Role, Like Umpires Rather Than Players, Roberts Tells Hearing (SDUT)

By Jesse J. Holland, ASSOCIATED PRESS

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 13, 2005

Senate Judiciary Committee hearing (9 a.m.) WASHINGTON – Supreme Court nominee John Roberts said Monday that justices are servants of the law, playing a limited government role, as the Senate opened confirmation hearings on President Bush's choice to be the nation's 17th chief justice.

"A certain humility should characterize the judicial role," the 50-year-old Roberts told the Judiciary Committee. "Judges and justices are servants of the law, not the other way around."

The appellate judge likened jurists to baseball umpires, saying that "they make sure everybody plays by the rules, but it is a limited role. Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

The drama of Roberts' swearing-in and his short statement capped a half day in which Democrats and Republicans sparred over the legitimacy of questioning him about divisive issues. Arguments about ideology and judicial activism also marked the hours devoted to opening statements from the 18-member panel.

Speaking without notes, Roberts addressed the committee for about six minutes – barely half the time each of the senators had been allotted for opening statements before he took the oath and made his remarks. He will answer questions from senators at much greater length on Tuesday.

"Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate in a system of precedent, shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath," Roberts said. He said he appeared before the committee with "no agenda. I have no platform."

At age 50, Roberts could help shape the Supreme Court for a generation if confirmed to replace the late William H. Rehnquist. All questions, Democrats said, were fair game, and they promised to use the nearly weeklong hearings to ask Roberts about abortion, civil rights, privacy, election rights, capital punishment, judicial activism and the powers of the presidency and Congress.

Republicans advised Roberts to follow the example set by recent nominees to the high court and avoid responding to probing questions on controversial topics.

"Some have said that nominees who do not spill their guts about whatever a senator wants to know are hiding something from the American people," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. "Some compare a nominee's refusal to violate his judicial oath or abandon judicial ethics to taking the Fifth Amendment. These might be catchy sound bites, but they are patently false."

"Don't take the bait," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

Democratic Sen. Russell Feingold of Wisconsin dismissed the notion that Republican calls for a dignified confirmation process barred senators from pursuing a line of questions of a lifetime appointee – especially one Feingold described as looking healthy. That last part drew a smile from Roberts.

"If by dignified they mean that tough questions are out of bounds, I must strongly disagree," Feingold said.

Added Democratic Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois: "Only your responses to our questions can convince us that the John Roberts of 2005 will be a truly impartial, open-minded chief justice."

Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee that conducted Monday's hearing, underscored the stakes for the Senate's vote on Roberts, an honors graduate from Harvard, a political appointee in two Republican administrations and a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit for two years.

Roberts originally was chosen to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Rehnquist's death prompted the president to renominate him for chief justice, replacing the man he clerked for in 1980.

"Your prospective stewardship of the court, which could last until 2040 or longer ... would present a very unique opportunity for a new chief justice to rebuild the image of the court away from what many believe it has become as a super-legislature and bring consensus to the court," Specter said.

The journey began for Roberts in the ornate Russell Senate Caucus Room. The day was devoted solely to opening statements – from the 17 men and one woman on the committee, the three senators chosen to introduce Roberts and from the nominee himself.

Roberts introduced members of his family: parents, siblings, his wife, Jane Sullivan Roberts, and his young children, Jack and Josie.

"You see she has a very tight grasp," Roberts said of his wife, who held the two children. An ebullient Jack Roberts had nearly upstaged his father when the president announced his nomination on July 19.

Democrats and Republicans saw few obstacles to Roberts' confirmation. In a Pew Research Center poll released Monday, 46 percent of those surveyed expressed support for Roberts' confirmation, up from 35 percent a week earlier.

How Roberts answers questions from the panel's 18 members about his record as a conservative lawyer in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations could affect the confirmation vote by the full Senate, expected before the end of September. The Supreme Court begins a new term Oct. 3.

Republicans warned Roberts against responding to "litmus-test questions."

Abortion and the 1973 Supreme Court ruling in Roe v. Wade that legalized the procedure loomed large.

"Perhaps the Supreme Court's most notorious exercise of raw political power came in Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton, two 1973 cases which invented a constitutional right to abortion," said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.

Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the only woman on the committee, said in her prepared statement that she planned to ask Roberts about "the constitutional right to privacy" as it deals with abortion rights.

"I am concerned by a trend on the court to limit this right and curtail women's autonomy," Feinstein said. "It would be very difficult for me to vote to confirm someone to the Supreme Court whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade."

The White House has released more than 70,000 documents from Roberts' time in the Reagan administration but has refused to release documents from his tenure as principal deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration.

Seventeen Democratic senators, including potential presidential candidates Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John Kerry of Massachusetts, reiterated the party's call for the Bush administration to release those documents.

"The people deserve to know the complete truth about Judge Roberts, the good and the bad alike," they said in a letter to the White House.

As Battlefield Shrinks, Democrats Mute Their Attacks (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

The first day of confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to become the 17th chief justice of the United States proved to be a tepid opening to what once was billed as a battle of monumental proportions between left and right.

There may yet be some of the fireworks that were predicted when the first of two Supreme Court vacancies opened up two months ago -- particularly this morning, when members of the Senate Judiciary Committee begin to question Roberts. But with

Roberts's confirmation seemingly assured, some of the fight appears to have gone out of the Democrats and they have been forced to shift their strategy.

The confirmation hearings are now only partly about Roberts and what he thinks about the law. Instead, they have become a prelude to the coming battle over President Bush's as-yet-unnamed successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and a forum with broader political implications for a debate about deep philosophical differences between Republicans and Democrats over the role of government and the courts in American society.

In laying out areas of potential inquiry, the Democrats were generally polite and, with few exceptions, largely devoid of passion. However, Roberts's unwillingness to answer certain questions and the White House's continuing to deny Senate Democrats documents from the nominee's days as deputy solicitor general in the administration of President George H.W. Bush are likely to raise the temperature of the opposition.

But the positive reaction to Bush's nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and the internal head counts in the Senate have forced Democrats to adopt a different stance in approaching the hearings, one aimed as much at future elections as the question of whether Roberts will become the next chief justice. A new Washington Post-ABC News poll shows that, by 2 to 1, Americans say he should be confirmed.

Judging from the opening statements, Democrats and Republicans approached the first day of the hearings with far different goals. Confident of the outcome of the Roberts confirmation battle, many Republicans came with a set of procedural talking points aimed at encouraging Roberts not to answer the Democrats' questions about his views on controversial issues before the court.

That view was summed up most succinctly by Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), whose advice to the nominee was: "Don't take the bait."

Democrats came with the intention of talking about their values and their view of the courts as protectors of women's rights and civil rights, and of the importance of preserving an expansive view of the federal government's powers in the face of a series of Supreme Court decisions limiting that power.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said that, with two vacancies, Bush and his conservative allies have a "once in a lifetime moment" to reshape the Supreme Court and to change the court's view of the Constitution. "I believe with every fiber in my being that their view of the Constitution and where the country should be taken would be disaster for our people," he said.

Richard W. Garnett, a law professor at Notre Dame University and a former Rehnquist clerk, said Republicans will have missed an important opportunity if they fail to engage.

"I would have said the Republican strategy should be not just to smooth the way to the confirmation," Garnett said, "because that's going to happen, but to remind the people that ours is a government of limited powers and that the judiciary is limited not to restrict freedom but to protect democracy."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) suggested that he understood that advice and that Republicans could more than hold their own in such a debate. Pointing out that there will be many questions raised by memos and documents Roberts wrote while a young lawyer in the administration of President Ronald Reagan, he said to the nominee, "To some, those policies make no sense; those policies are out of the mainstream. But this hearing is about whether or not you're qualified and whether or not Reagan conservatism is in the mainstream."

Roberts was largely a bystander as the 18 members of the committee gave opening statements. When his time finally arrived, he spoke briefly and without notes, outlining a view of the judiciary as one that requires humility, an open mind and a deference to precedent.

Tougher questions await him today, and the Democrats yesterday telegraphed the areas on which they will focus. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) argued that courts must protect the rights gained by women, minorities and the disabled over the past half-century. "The central issue before us in these hearings," he said, "is whether the Supreme Court will preserve the gains of the past and protect the rights that are indispensable to a modern, more competitive, more equal America."

In one of the most arresting moments of the day, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) talked about abortion rights and her days as a student at Stanford University, before abortion was legal, and when fellow students collected money for a young woman seeking an abortion in Mexico and when another woman committed suicide because she was pregnant. "I don't want to go back to those days," she said.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) raised questions about the administration's decision not to release documents from Roberts's tenure in the solicitor general's office. "The refusal gives rise to a reasonable inference that the administration has something to hide here," he said.

Those issues and others will dominate the Democrats' questioning of Roberts over the next two days, and after a quiet opening day, that is likely to increase the tension inside the Senate hearing room. That will not jeopardize Roberts's likely confirmation; whether it achieves the Democrat's political objectives is much more an open question.

Senate Opens High Court Confirmation Hearing (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

U.S. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts, his record on civil rights and women's rights challenged by Democrats, vowed at the start of his Senate confirmation hearing on Monday to ensure that the Supreme Court protects all Americans.

"I have no agenda, but I do have a commitment," Roberts, President George W. Bush's conservative nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "If I am confirmed, I will confront every case with an open mind."

"I will be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court," Roberts said. "I will work to ensure that it upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans."

Roberts made the pledge after the 18 members of the committee -- 10 Republicans and eight Democrats -- delivered opening statements in the first confirmation hearing of a Supreme Court nominee in 11 years.

Democratic and Republican lawmakers lauded Roberts' credentials. A federal appeals court judge for the past two years, he served in the Republican administrations of President Ronald Reagan and the first President George Bush.

But Democrats, citing documents stemming from Roberts' government work, challenged his commitment to civil rights and women's rights.

While he is widely expected to win Senate confirmation, lawmakers told the 50-year-old Roberts to expect tough questions, beginning on Tuesday.

"Judge, if I looked only at what you've said and written in the past, I'd feel compelled to vote no," said Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), a Delaware Democrat.

"You dismissed the Constitution's protection of privacy as a 'so-called right,' you derided agencies like the Securities and Exchange Commission that combat corporate misconduct as 'constitutional anomalies,' and you dismissed 'gender discrimination' as merely a, and I quote, 'perceived problem.'"

"This is your chance to explain what you meant," Biden said.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record), a South Carolina Republican, replied, telling Roberts: "The memos you wrote while you were working for President Reagan and Bush one, in my opinion, reflect a conservative lawyer advising a conservative president about conservative policies."

"Conservatives have a different view of a lot of issues versus our friends on the other side," Graham said. "The election determines how that shakes out."

Barring a bombshell, Roberts seemed headed toward confirmation by the full Republican-led Senate, perhaps by the time the high court begins its new term on October 3.

Easing his approval to lead the nation's top court was the belief Roberts would not greatly alter the conservative outlook that Rehnquist developed in his three decades on the bench.

A bigger fight was anticipated over Bush's next nominee, who would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who was often the swing vote on the sharply divided nine-member court.

If confirmed, Roberts would be the youngest chief justice in two centuries. And he would be positioned to lead the court for decades, helping to shape the American way of life on matters from civil rights to gay rights.

Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, told Roberts to expect questions on the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

While he said he would not ask a nominee how they would rule on a case that could come before them, Specter said, "I consider it appropriate to question him as to his views on ... following precedents."

Specter and other lawmakers also said they planned to ask about "activist judges" who attempt to usurp the law-making power of the U.S. Congress.

"Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules. They apply them," Roberts said in his opening statement.

Without making any commitments on the abortion decision, he also said, "Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath."

'I Have No Platform,' Roberts Professes (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic And Toni Locy

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — John Roberts' Senate confirmation hearings began Monday with Republicans and Democrats sparring over abortion rights and other legal issues, and over how detailed the nominee for chief justice should have to be in answering their questions.

But it also was clear that a subtext to the question-and-answer sessions that begin today before the Senate Judiciary Committee will be rival ideas of the Supreme Court's role in American life.

Sen. Edward Kennedy and other Democrats called for a high court that would help solve society's dilemmas by protecting the poor and the disenfranchised. Sen. Chuck Grassley and other Republicans emphasized the need for the court to take a back-seat role in such matters and give states more autonomy in solving problems.

To make their point, Kennedy and another Democrat, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, invoked the powerful images of Hurricane Katrina victims — many of them low-income minorities who were stranded in New Orleans as government officials struggled to provide aid.

"The tragedy of Katrina shows in the starkest terms why every American needs an effective national government that will step in to meet urgent needs that individual states and communities cannot meet on their own," said Kennedy, D-Mass. "The people and their Congress must have a voice in decisions that determine the safety of our country and the integrity of our individual rights." Leahy referred to "the devastation and despair facing millions of our fellow Americans in the gulf region" as he spoke of the need for "justice and equal opportunity" for all.

Grassley, R-Iowa, countered that "if we confirm (Supreme Court nominees) who are bent on assigning to themselves the power to fix society's problems as they see fit, a bare majority of these nine unelected and unaccountable men and women will usurp the power of the people, hijacking democracy to serve their own personal prejudices. We do not want to go down that road."

The mention of the hurricane victims by Kennedy and Leahy also seemed designed to highlight the past writings of Roberts, a conservative federal appeals court judge, on issues involving race and civil rights. In his previous work as a government lawyer, Roberts questioned affirmative action and other programs designed to help minorities overcome past discrimination.

The long-running debate over the court's place in society is particularly salient today because of recent rulings and the potential for significant change on a high court that soon will have two new justices after 11 years without a change in membership.

Republican Sens. Jeff Sessions of Alabama and John Cornyn of Texas, for example, each used some of their allotted 10 minutes Monday to criticize a 2003 Supreme Court decision against state laws that ban consensual homosexual relations.

On the other side, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., recalled the world she knew before the court voted to make abortion legal nationwide. "As a college student, I watched the passing of the plate to collect money so young women could go to Tijuana for an abortion," said Feinstein, the committee's only woman. "I knew a woman who ended her life because she was pregnant. … I don't want to go back to those days."

Feinstein also noted that the Supreme Court soon will review an intriguing individual rights case: a dispute that tests the constitutionality of an Oregon law that permits physician-assisted suicide for the terminally ill.

Roberts has been named to succeed Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died of cancer Sept. 3. Rehnquist was among the court's most conservative members, and was among three justices — Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas are the others — who consistently opposed abortion rights.

If Roberts' brand of conservatism is similar to Rehnquist's, the court's overall view might not change much.

The greater potential for change to the court is with the opening created by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a more moderate conservative who has been at the ideological center of the divided court.

President Bush has suggested he will wait until the Roberts hearings are finished before nominating her successor. O'Connor has said she will remain until her replacement is confirmed.

Roberts sat alone at the witness table during the opening comments by the committee's 18 members.

When it was his turn, the former star litigator who argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court spoke without notes. He suggested that he would be the type of restrained justice that Grassley described. Roberts emphasized the "humility" and "modesty" he feels about the idea of being chief justice. "I come before the committee with no agenda," he said. "I have no platform."

Roberts played up his boyhood in Indiana, referring to the "endless fields" on which he played and his belief in their "endless possibilities." He also vowed to protect the integrity and independence of the high court.

During Monday's hearing, Democrats on the committee stressed their desire that Roberts be forthcoming in discussing his judicial philosophy.

Republicans, meanwhile, said the nominee should be able to decline to answer questions that touch on topics that he could later have to rule on as a member of the court.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., perhaps summed it up best: "It has been my experience that the hearings are a subtle minuet, with nominees answering as many questions as they think they have to in order to be confirmed."

Roberts Pledges He'll Hear Cases With 'Open Mind' (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum And Robin Toner

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - In an opening day of confirmation hearings in which senators drew sharp and partisan distinctions over his - and their - views on issues like abortion, civil rights and the role of the courts, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. promised on Monday that if confirmed as the 17th chief justice of the United States he would "confront every case with an open mind."

"I will be open to the considered views of my colleagues on the bench," Judge Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee and a packed hearing room on Capitol Hill. "And I will decide every case based on the record, according to the rule of law, without fear or favor, to the best of my ability. And I will remember that it's my job to call balls and strikes, and not to pitch or bat."

The first afternoon of at least four days of projected hearings amounted to a kind of scripted political ritual, serial speeches by senators who praised Mr. Roberts or raised concerns about him, followed by his brief remarks, in which he responded in the most general terms. [News analysis, Page A29.]

The session nevertheless starkly crystallized the debate over his nomination to fill the first Supreme Court vacancy in 11 years, and the first for chief justice in nearly 20, and how it is likely to play out in questions and answers beginning on Tuesday morning.

Again and again in the old Senate Caucus Room, the scene of contentious hearings since the days of Teapot Dome, Democrats on the panel leveled their gaze at Judge Roberts at the witness table not 20 feet away.

They said they expected him to answer detailed questions about his writings as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration 20 years ago, questioned whether he subscribed to an expansive view of a Constitution able to embrace evolving notions of civil rights and social progress and invoked the devastation of Hurricane Katrina to underscore their arguments about the gap between the American ideal and reality.

For their part, Republicans generally hailed Judge Roberts as the kind of jurist who would exercise judicial restraint and leave law-making to Congress, though some said they wanted to explore his views about a series of recent Supreme Court rulings that curtailed Congressional power. Many said he should not have to answer detailed questions about past, present or future cases.

No one in either party promised to oppose or support Judge Roberts outright, though some came close, including Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, who said that on the basis of Judge Roberts's written record alone, "I would have to vote no."

Mr. Biden, who is considering a presidential bid, added, "This is your chance, judge, to explain what you meant by what you have said and what you have written."

To potential friends and foes alike, Mr. Roberts gave the same respectful, silent, sympathetic pursed-lip look. When he spoke at last, he offered homey testimonials to his deep respect for the rule of law, declaring: "I have no platform. Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

During and after the hearing, Democrats made clear they were unwilling to settle for generalities.

"It was a strong and nice statement, but didn't answer the fundamental question what kind of justice will he be," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said.

Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois and one of Judge Roberts's sharpest interlocutors, seemed to speak for many colleagues when he asked: "The basic question is this: Will you restrict the personal freedoms we enjoy as Americans or will you expand them?"

By contrast, Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said the nominee's views on particular issues were less relevant than his legal philosophy and the political realities that enabled President Bush to name him.

"To me, the central issues before the Senate is whether or not the Senate will allow President Bush to fulfill his campaign promise to appoint a well-qualified, strict constructionist to the Supreme Court, and in this case, to appoint a chief justice to the Supreme Court in the mold of Justice Rehnquist," Mr. Graham said. "He's been elected president twice."

Perhaps nowhere was the partisan divide sharper than on abortion. Many Democrats said they intended to question Judge Roberts on his views of "the right to privacy," the basis for the Roe v. Wade ruling legalizing abortion, which he once seemed to dismiss as a "so called right."

It fell to Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who is the sole woman on the committee, to open the debate on abortion.

"It would be very difficult, and I said this to you privately and I said it publicly, for me to vote to confirm someone whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade, because I remember - and many of the young women here don't - what it was like when abortion was illegal in America," Ms. Feinstein told Judge Roberts.

Speaking somberly and directly to him, she recalled college students' "passing the plate" to send a young pregnant woman to Tijuana for a "back alley" abortion and the suicide of another pregnant friend.

Later in the day, Senator Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican who is a leader in the anti-abortion movement, countered with an impassioned appeal. Describing the Roe decision as "perhaps the Supreme Court's most notorious exercise of raw political power," Mr. Brownback added: "Since that time, nearly 40 million children have been aborted in America, 40 million lives that could be amongst us but are not, beautiful innocent faces that could bless our existence and our families and our nation, creating and expanding a culture of life."

Mr. Brownback noted that if Roe was overturned, it would not ban abortion, but return the issue to the states. Although many legal analysts have argued that the Supreme Court will - and should - be reluctant to overturn 32 years of precedent for Roe, Mr. Brownback argued that the court has overturned precedents many times. Among them, he said, was Plessy v. Ferguson, the 1896 decision that "separate but equal" facilities were constitutional.

If the hearing was tightly choreographed, it was just the first act of a drama that is apt to become more improvisational. The Senate is an institution that cherishes its prerogatives and is governed by rules that allow fluid and unpredictable debate.

Ralph G. Neas, the president of People for the American Way, a liberal group that opposes the confirmation, said after the hearing, "It's going to be a close vote in the committee and on the floor."

But Ed Gillespie, the former chairman of the Republican National Committee who is coordinating the confirmation effort for the White House, said: "I don't anticipate problems. I anticipate a vigorous process."

The Republicans have a majority 55 votes in the Senate, a major asset for the nomination.

A generation of deeply partisan struggles over judicial nominees framed the hearing, a rough history that began with the Reagan administration, in the fight over Judge Robert H. Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court, stretched across the Clinton years and has persisted under Mr. Bush. A panel member, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, choked up speaking on divisions and "mindless partisanship."

Again and again on Monday, Republicans said Democrats had no right to apply an ideological litmus test to Judge Roberts's nomination, or to press for detailed answers on past cases, but merely to judge him by his indisputable qualifications.

"We must use a judicial, rather than a political, standard to evaluate Judge Roberts's fitness for the Supreme Court," said Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah and a senior member of the committee.

Senator Graham told Mr. Roberts: "You have been described as brilliant, talented and well qualified, and that's by Democrats. The question is, is that enough in 2005 to get confirmed? Maybe not."

He added that if Republicans had voted on one issue, the constitutional right to abortion, when President Bill Clinton nominated Ruth Bader Ginsburg to the Supreme Court, "Justice Ginsburg would not be Justice Ginsburg." Democrats said excellent legal qualifications were not enough.

"Long-established rights to privacy are under heavy siege," said Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the long-serving Democrat. "We need a chief justice who believes in the promise of America and the guarantees of our Constitution, a person who will enter that majestic building near here and genuinely believe the four inspiring words inscribed in marble above the entrance, 'Equal justice under law.' "

Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said many people calling for a "dignified process" really meant "an easy process."

Signaling the week to come, Mr. Feingold added, "It is not undignified to ask the nominee questions he would rather not answer, should he prefer to remain inscrutable or, worse yet, all things to all people."

Democrats Seek Papers To Define Whys Of Roberts (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - In opening statements on Monday kicking off the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. and in a follow-up letter to President Bush, Democratic senators continued their calls for the release of documents from Judge Roberts's years as a senior lawyer in the first Bush administration.

The documents, said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, could help illuminate the nominee's views in three areas: civil rights, privacy and access to justice. While the first two areas have garnered attention from interest groups and the news organizations, the third category - access to justice - has received relatively little scrutiny.

Most of these cases did not concern issues of great public moment, but a theme runs through them. They involved people who claimed to have suffered serious and sometimes terrible harms, including sexual abuse and torture. In response, briefs signed by Judge Roberts often accepted, at least for argument's sake, the truth of what was alleged but opposed the lawsuits under various legal doctrines that can limit plaintiffs' access to the federal courts.

Analyzed one way, his arguments reflect a cramped view of the role of the courts, exalting technicalities over justice. Viewed another way, they represent exacting fidelity to the law and a keen awareness of the limited power of the federal courts to right every wrong.

"Federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction," he told the Supreme Court in an oral argument in one of the 16 cases on the Democrats' list. "The presumption is that they are without jurisdiction, and the plaintiff must affirmatively prove that he has standing to invoke the power of the court."

In 1992, he signed a brief arguing that federal courts could not consider newly discovered evidence that was put forward by a death row inmate, Leonel Herrera, because he had raised the issue too late. It added that fears that innocent inmates had or would be executed were overblown.

The only forum in which Mr. Herrera could now make his case, the brief said, was in a clemency application to the governor of Texas. The Supreme Court ruled against Mr. Herrera but left open the possibility that an inmate with "truly persuasive" evidence of innocence could get a court hearing notwithstanding court deadlines. Mr. Herrera was executed in 1993.

In 1992, Mr. Roberts signed a brief in a case brought by an American who said he had been falsely arrested and tortured while employed by a Saudi Arabian hospital. The brief argued that the hospital was immune from a suit because it was owned by the Saudi government. "Allegations of inhumane treatment," the brief said, "should not obscure the legal issue in this case."

Though there is an exception to foreign sovereign immunity for a government's commercial activities, the brief argued that the mistreatment of the plaintiff, Scott Nelson, was not based on commercial activities like his recruitment and employment but on purely governmental conduct. The Supreme Court agreed.

In 1991, another Roberts brief made a subtle distinction. The case involved a Georgia student who had sued her school district, asserting that a teacher had forced her to have sex with him. The brief conceded that the suit itself was proper under a federal antidiscrimination law. But, the brief continued, the student was not entitled to recover money damages. "The existence of a cause of action," the brief said, "by no means assures a right to an unlimited array of remedies."

The Supreme Court unanimously rejected that position.

It is unclear whether the documents sought by the Democratic senators would contain Judge Roberts's personal views on these or the other 12 cases. Administration officials have said that disclosure of the documents could chill discussions in the solicitor general's office, which represents the federal government in the Supreme Court.

From 1989 to 1993, Judge Roberts was the principal deputy solicitor general, a position sometimes referred to as the political deputy. His boss was the solicitor general, Kenneth W. Starr.

"We can only wonder," Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said at the confirmation hearing on Monday, "what they don't want us to know."

In a letter on Monday, 17 Democratic senators, including three members of the bipartisan group of 14 senators who had pledged not to filibuster judges except in "extraordinary circumstances, " called for President Bush to release the documents, saying they were needed to determine "the whole truth about the nominee. " The signers included Senators Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mark Pryor of Arkansas and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut.

The White House has released tens of thousands of pages of documents from Judge Roberts's days as a young lawyer at the Justice Department, where he was special assistant to Attorney General William French Smith, and the White House, where he was associate counsel to President Ronald Reagan.

At the solicitor general's office, the briefs Judge Roberts contributed to were notable in two ways. They took consistently conservative positions on social issues, including abortion, the separation of church and state, school desegregation, environmental protection and affirmative action. They were also aggressive in proposing hurdles for plaintiffs to overcome before courts could hear their cases on the merit.

In an environmental case, for instance, a brief that Judge Roberts signed took a narrow view of both standing, meaning the requirement that plaintiffs show that they have a direct interest in a case, and of Congressional power.

He presented oral arguments in the case, Lujan v. National Wildlife Federation, saying that Congress was powerless to confer standing in some settings and that the plaintiffs there had failed to satisfy the ordinary standing requirements.

The Supreme Court, in a 5-to-4 decision in 1990, ruled in his favor. Three years later, Judge Roberts made similar points, now in his own voice, in a Duke Law Journal article.

Judge Roberts signed two briefs in school desegregation cases. He argued that the school systems in question, both of which had once been found to be segregated by race, should be freed from court supervision. The Supreme Court ruled in his favor in both cases.

DOJ_NMG_0004413

A brief signed by Judge Roberts argued in favor of allowing "ceremonial acknowledgments" of religion at high school graduations. The brief urged the Supreme Court to abandon the standards it has generally used since 1971 to decide whether a given practice violates the establishment clause of the First Amendment and to replace it with a more relaxed one. The court rejected his arguments.

The briefs contain little of the acerbic wit found in Judge Roberts's early papers. But there are flashes, though it is not known whether he wrote them.

A program to give preferences to minority broadcasters, a brief signed by Judge Roberts said, failed to overcome a "fundamental hurdle - the prerequisite of coherence." It was, the brief said, "a policy in search of a purpose."

Senate Starts Roberts Hearings, Sets Groundwork For Questions (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Judge John Roberts suggested that memos he wrote while serving in the Reagan administration might not fully reflect his views today, and repeated calls for judicial "humility," as hearings began on his nomination to become the 17th chief justice of the U.S.

"Judges and justices are servants of the law, not the other way around," said Judge Roberts, President Bush's pick to succeed the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. "I come before the committee with no agenda. I have no platform."

His opening remarks came after considerable positioning by conservative and liberal interest groups, with backers emphasizing Judge Roberts's résumé, while opponents scoured records from his work in past Republican administrations and two years as a federal appeals-court judge to paint him as hostile to minority and women's rights. (Read the full text of his statement1.)

In his remarks to the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Roberts noted how proud he felt when he went before the Supreme Court as a representative of the White House and "my country." But he said it wasn't until he was in private practice -- with the full weight of the federal government against him -- that he came to "fully appreciate the importance of the Supreme Court in our constitutional system."

"Here was the United States, the most powerful entity in the world, aligned against my client, and yet all I had to do was convince the court that I was right on the law and the government was wrong and all that power and might would recede in deference to the rule of law," he said.

The committee begins questioning Judge Roberts today. Throughout most of the day, the 50-year-old nominee sat alone at the witness table, nodding occasionally but showing little emotion.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), warned Judge Roberts that his appointment comes at a time of "turbulent partisanship" on Capitol Hill and worry on the left and right about the high court's direction. "The next chief justice will have the potential to change the court's image, in the eyes of many, as a superlegislature and to bring consensus to the court which has made a hallmark of 5-4 decisions, many of which are inexplicable," Mr. Specter said, citing rulings on matters such as the rights of the disabled to displaying the Ten Commandments on government property.

Committee members also used the session to stake out positions for questioning. Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) acknowledged the nominee's accomplishments: He is an honors graduate of Harvard Law School who has held prestigious posts in Washington and won dozens of appeals before the Supreme Court. But, the senator said, the public must be able to "assess not only the sharpness of your mind, but also the fullness of your heart. They need to believe that an overachiever can identify with an underdog who has nothing but the Constitution on his side."

Several Democrats referred to the images of poor, black residents of New Orleans affected by Hurricane Katrina when stating that Judge Roberts's views on racial discrimination must be explored. During the Reagan administration, Judge Roberts wrote dozens of memos urging a narrow reading -- and reach -- of civil-rights laws. Republicans and Democrats put the nominee on notice that he will be asked to explain his comment in one Reagan-era memo calling the constitutional basis for the Roe v. Wade ruling on abortion rights the "so-called right to privacy."

DOJ_NMG_0004414

Republicans on the panel focused on Judge Roberts's professional qualifications and urged him to decline to answer questions he deems inappropriate. The committee's job, said Sen. Jon Kyl (R., Ariz.), is to determine if he has the "character, legal ability and judicial philosophy" to fulfill his responsibilities.

But Sen. Herb Kohl (D., Wis.), said evasive answers could reduce support for his nomination. "We have an obligation to find out where you will take us before we decide whether we want you to lead us there. And, most importantly, you have an obligation to tell us," Sen. Kohl said.

Roberts Pledges Judicial Humility In Opening Remarks (LAW)

By Tony Mauro And T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Law.com, September 13, 2005

Chief justice nominee John Roberts Jr. opened his Senate confirmation hearing testimony Monday with a brief but powerful pledge of judicial humility, fair-mindedness and respect for precedent.

Likening the job of justice to that of baseball umpires, Roberts said, "They make sure everybody plays by the rules, but it is a limited role. Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

Roberts, a veteran advocate before the Supreme Court, spoke without notes but chose every word with care. He addressed the Senate Judiciary Committee after three hours of members' opening remarks. "I come before the committee with no agenda," Roberts said. "I have no platform."

At another point, Roberts said, "Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent, shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath."

Roberts, 50, was first nominated in July to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on the Court, but after the death on Sept. 3 of Chief Justice William Rehnquist -- for whom Roberts once clerked -- President George W. Bush selected him for the chief justice spot.

The White House hasn't made a choice for O'Connor's seat yet.

The hearing marked the first time in 11 years that a nominee for the nation's highest court had come before the Senate committee, and members said it was the highlight of their year if not their careers.

Roberts, accompanied by his wife, two children, and numerous family members, smiled easily and spoke briefly about his mentor Rehnquist. Roberts said he had spoken to some of the nurses who treated Rehnquist, and he was glad to hear that Rehnquist was "not a good patient. He chafed at the limitations they tried to impose." Rehnquist died at 80 of thyroid cancer. "I will miss him," Roberts said.

If Monday was any indication of what is to come, Roberts will have a relatively easy path toward Senate confirmation. Senate Democrats, while warning they will have tough questions for him on Tuesday and Wednesday, praised Roberts' intellect and outward qualifications for the job. Even Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, said after the hearing Monday that Roberts had given a "masterful performance -- and short." She also said, "He's like an actor in a show, and he's done a first-rate job."

On Tuesday and Wednesday, Roberts will field at least two round of questions from the 18 senators on the committee. On Thursday and possibly Friday, representatives of outside groups will speak for and against his nomination.

Monday's session began what committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., described as a "subtle minuet" between senators and the nominee.

But the friction before Roberts spoke was largely between senators themselves as they clashed over what the nominee should address. Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said he would not vote for Roberts if he failed to answer questions forthrightly. "It is our obligation to ask -- and your obligation to answer -- questions about your judicial philosophy and legal ideology."

But Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said that answering questions even about issues -- not simply cases -- that might come before him would violate American Bar Association ethics guidelines. "I will defend your refusal to answer," said Kyl.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, also cautioned Roberts not to answer questions in order to simply please the senators asking them. "Do not take the bait," Cornyn warned.

Specter seemed to take a middle position, announcing he would not ask Roberts if he would overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling declaring a woman's right to abortion, but he would ask him whether women have a constitutional right of privacy -- the right on which that ruling was based.

After the hearing, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said, "I am particularly troubled that every one of our Republican colleagues was urging him not to be responsive."

From the opening comments of Democrats, it appeared that the privacy issue would be a major theme in coming days. Several cited a comment Roberts made in a memo from his days as a Reagan administration lawyer in which he referred to "the so-called right of privacy."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the only woman on the committee, said the right of privacy is "one of the most important issues to be addressed" at the hearing, and she indicated she would vote against Roberts if she came away believing that he would overturn Roe.

The government's response to Hurricane Katrina even made its way into the comments of several senators. Kennedy said that the hurricane had exposed not only the "gross disparities in society" but the need for "a strong national government."

Senators said the hearing represented a rare and historic opportunity to submit the Court to the influence of the democratically elected Senate. "The Constitution provides for one democratic moment before a lifetime of judicial independence," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del. "This is that moment."

Because it was such a rare chance to send a message to the Court, several senators from both parties indicated they would bring up the Court's recent trend of overturning acts of Congress -- nearly three dozen since Rehnquist became chief justice in 1986.

As he has suggested repeatedly in recent weeks, Specter said he would press Roberts on the scope of congressional power. "These hearings present an opportunity to expose the extreme positions taken by the Supreme Court in denigrating the role of Congress," Specter said.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, Vt., the ranking Democrat on the committee, agreed.

"Chief among emerging concerns are whether the Supreme Court will continue its recent efforts to restrict the authority of Congress to pass legislation to protect the people's interests in the environment, safety, and civil rights," Leahy said. "And whether the Supreme Court will effectively check the enhanced presidential power that has been amassed in the last few years."

In a rare unscripted moment, Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., was suddenly overwhelmed with emotion during his opening remarks. His voice choking and halting, he said, "My heart aches for less divisiveness, less polarization, less finger-pointing, less bitterness... . America is an idea; it's not competing ideologies."

Time For Supreme Court Reality TV (USAT)

By Sandy Grady

USA Today, September 13, 2005

You might say Judge John Roberts is history's first made-for-TV nominee for the Supreme Court. With his smooth, bland face and careful haircut, he seems to burst fresh from a barbershop or makeup room. He speaks in concise sentences. He rarely loses his sincere, benign smile. If this gig doesn't work out, he could get work as a TV anchorman.

Roberts seems created for his star role this week as network TV cameras focus on his grilling by the Senate Judiciary Committee. He is a conservative with the demeanor of a friendly scoutmaster. Barring edgy surprises, he will likely cool the red-state-blue-state furor and be drafted to be the youngest chief justice since 1806.

And then — presto, shazam! — Roberts will disappear. This made-for-TV paragon with the camera-ready stylishness of a Dan Rather, Peter Jennings or Tom Brokaw will vanish from television. Roberts will sink into the cloistered maw of a Supreme Court whose black-robed deities treat TV cameras as welcome as an anthrax attack. Since the justices first met in 1790, no camera has shown their arguments to the public.

Never mind that 47 states allow cameras into trials. Never mind that we can play voyeur at the televised reality soap operas of Martha Stewart, Michael Jackson, Kobe Bryant, Scott Peterson and the latest runaway bride.

Undeniably, there's educational benefit to those TV trials along with the celebrity pizzazz. But if you want to watch the nation's highest court interrogate lawyers and argue such crucial issues as abortion, immigration, gun control or post-9/11 prisoners, forget it. That is, unless you have time to line up outside the Supreme Court for a three-minute glimpse inside.

For the Supremes stuck in their 19th-century fustiness to ban TV cameras at their ornate doors is, I think, an undemocratic shame.

The U.S. House of Representatives since 1977, the Senate since 1986, White House news conferences and almost all Washington events are open to cameras (usually those of CSPAN). Time for the Supremes to also drop their tech-phobia and join the 21st century. Maybe Roberts, so slickly adept at the electronic stage, can change the justice's shy ways if he joins them. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who has long pushed for TV in the court, said of Roberts, "He may have a little different view about television. He's a new generation."

Even so, Roberts would have a tough sale. Time after time, the Supremes have reacted to TV coverage as if it would transform them into a tawdry Jerry Springer Show. Justice David Souter told a House subcommittee that TV cameras would be allowed "over my dead body." The late chief justice William Rehnquist had groused that the cameras would lessen the court's "mystique and moral authority." We can guess at the opposition of Judge Antonin Scalia, who bars cameras or taping of his public appearances — a marshal grabbed a reporter's recorder at a Scalia oration on free speech.

But wait a minute. The Founding Fathers, according to the resolves of the First Continental Congress, wanted courtrooms large enough for "as many of the people as choose to attend." If you're going to invite 300 million people, that means TV. The great Oliver Wendell Holmes, long before invention of the remote control, said the judiciary should be open so that each citizen is "able to satisfy himself within his own eyes" how judges perform.

Modern camera-phobic justices, however, consider TV a nosy, vulgar threat to their dignity. They fret that cameras would change the behavior of lawyers who appear at their lectern or the justices themselves, causing grandstanding for ideological applause. They worry about bright lights. And about networks using TV snippets to slant the news.

Those seem false fears. I covered the House and Senate when C-SPAN turned on its cameras. If anything, speech and decorum improved. (No more slurred bloviating after three-martini lunches). The televised Senate impeachment trial of Bill Clinton, over which Rehnquist presided, was unaffected by cameras. C-SPAN, master of discreet camera work, has offered to televise the Supremes arguments start to finish without comment. Surveys of states report no ill effect from televised courts (let's forget the O.J. Simpson carnival.)

No, I suspect the real hang-up for the Supremes against cameras is their desperate clinging to privacy. They relish their cocoon of facelessness — to go to a mall unobserved.

I saw this personally one afternoon on a golf course when I was joined by a lean, strong-handed 70-year-old whom I recognized instantly as Justice Byron (Whizzer) White. I guessed he wanted to be incognito. Only after a quiet nine holes did I say, "Didn't you play football at Colorado?"

White looked horrified. "How did you recognize me?" he snapped. Then he mumbled, "Well, it was Monday and the court wasn't busy so … look, I've got to go!" He fled for his car.

That's the real angst of the Supremes toward cameras in their court — giving up their precious anonymity. But the high court isn't some imperious, autocratic mystery cult divorced from American life. When it makes momentous decisions — especially the 5-4 vote that stopped the Florida recount and gave George W. Bush the presidency — we all should have front-row seats via television.

If he joins the club as its new chief, maybe John G. Roberts Jr., with his salesman's flair and anchorman's ease on the tube, can persuade the justices to lose their paranoia toward TV cameras.

Mr. Chief Justice Roberts (if you're confirmed), open up those doors and let the rest of America inside.

Making Roberts Talk (NYT)

By John Tierney

DOJ_NMG_0004417

He came, he charmed, he shut up. During the opening statements, the senators blathered away their time and more; Judge John Roberts used less than half of his to utter a few graceful generalities. He has made a career out of not saying the wrong thing. Why start now?

A lawyer who has been cross-examined dozens of times by the Supreme Court will not be caught off guard by senators posing as legal scholars. There has never been a nominee better prepared to dodge constitutional questions.

The only hope for Democrats is to try the tactics used by interrogation pros like Israeli airport screeners and U.S. customs agents. These experts know that a smart criminal will have rehearsed a cover story for, say, what he was doing in London and why he's going to New York.

But if he's asked something unexpected - how he liked the London weather, whether he's planning to visit Times Square - he has to change mental gears. He's apt to exhibit telltale signs of a liar under stress, like gazing upward and to his right as he answers.

I'm not suggesting that Mr. Roberts is a liar, or that anything the Democrats ask today could stop him from being confirmed. But they might at least keep TV viewers awake by trying questions like these:

If Roe v. Wade were a tree, what kind of tree would it be?

Is there any chance that you could speed up Justice Stevens's retirement by addressing him as "Gramps"?

After seeing a judge's robes in a Gilbert and Sullivan production, Chief Justice Rehnquist added gold stripes to his robe. If confirmed, will you keep the stripes, or do you have a whole new look in mind?

In your best judgment, did Brad and Jen really just grow apart, or was it Angelina's fault?

From your analysis of constitutional history, would you classify James Madison as a dog person or a cat person?

Suppose you'd been in Solomon's place when he proposed cutting the baby in two. And suppose neither woman objected. Would you have cut the baby? Flipped a coin? Or opted for foster care?

You've said you're a devotee of P. G. Wodehouse. Of the current justices, who is most like Jeeves? Who's most like Bertie Wooster?

Would you consider instituting a casual Friday dress policy on the bench?

Would it be a violation of Lois Lane's so-called right to privacy if Superman used his X-ray vision to look through her clothes?

Would you think it's cool if a professional wrestler dubbed himself Chief Justice, or would you sue him for trademark infringement?

During the announcement of your nomination at the White House, your son distracted the president with an impromptu dance. When you got home that night, what happened to him?

Would Thomas Jefferson have preferred the Beatles or the Stones?

After Justice Souter's opinion in the Kelo case endorsed the use of eminent domain to seize peoples' homes for a higher "public use," a group proposed that the town of Weare in New Hampshire increase its tax revenue by taking Justice Souter's property there so that a developer could build a resort called the Lost Liberty Hotel. Would your family ever vacation there?

What goes on four legs in the morning, two legs at noon and three legs in the evening?

When you were a clerk at the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Warren Burger was disliked for his pretentiousness. What nickname did the clerks have for him? Burger King?

Does President Bush have a nickname for you yet?

When justices have birthday parties, should they invite all the other justices, or can they invite just the ones they like?

If Vice President Dick Cheney and Justice Scalia invited you duck hunting, would you go?

If Judge Judy isn't afraid of television cameras in her courtroom, why is the Supreme Court so chicken?

Ashley or Mary-Kate?

Your passion for correct grammar and syntax is well known, but you have yet to inform the American people of your position on the serial comma. In the phrase "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," should there be a comma after "liberty"?

How would you edit this sentence to make it grammatically correct?: "I swear I ain't never gonna overturn Roe v. Wade."

Why did you turn to the right and look upward?

Nominee's Rulings Lean Right (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

During his two years as a federal appeals court judge, John G. Roberts Jr. has compiled a voting record that places him to the right of the average member of the U.S. circuit courts, according to the first independent statistical study of his voting record.

Roberts was most conservative on issues involving civil rights and civil liberties, the study found. At the same time, President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States showed a liberal streak on economic regulation and labor issues; in those matters, he was significantly to the left of the average, according to the study.

"An overall comparison of Judge Roberts' decision-making indicates that he is somewhat more conservative than the average appellate court judge, though not dramatically so," writes the study's author, Kenneth L. Manning, a professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts's Dartmouth campus.

Manning presented his paper Sept. 1 at the 2005 annual meeting of the American Political Science Association in the District. He has since posted it on the Web at http://www.umassd.edu/cas/polisci/roberts.pdf .

The professor studied Roberts's votes in 145 of the 190 cases he has heard at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, excluding 45 that "did not reveal a clear liberal/conservative dimension."

He found that, where such an identifiable ideological dimension did exist, Roberts made a conservative decision 67.1 percent of the time, or about 30 percent more frequently than the average federal appeals court judge. Manning based the comparison on data on the votes of all appeals court judges that have been gathered by the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research at the University of Michigan.

Employing what he said were conventional political science categories, Manning classified all 145 of Roberts's cases under three headings: There were 13 "civil rights/civil liberties" cases, 44 "criminal justice" cases, and 88 "economic activity and labor regulation" cases.

In civil rights and civil liberties cases, as in the criminal justice area, Manning counted a vote in favor of the government as "conservative."

Roberts voted for the government 86.4 percent of the time in criminal cases and 84.6 percent of the time in civil rights and civil liberties cases.

Roberts's score on criminal justice cases was in line with the federal appeals courts generally. But his civil rights and civil liberties votes make him almost four times as conservative as the average appellate judge on such issues, Manning said in an interview.

He cautioned that this score was based on a small sample, because few such cases reached the D.C. Circuit since Roberts joined it in 2003.

By contrast, Roberts's relatively liberal score on economic activity and labor regulation reflected his votes in 88 cases, a large number indicative of the D.C. Circuit's prominent role in reviewing decisions of agencies such as the National Labor Relations Board and Federal Communications Commission.

In those cases, Manning said, Roberts tended to side with government out of the same deference to agency decisions that prevails generally on the court.

"The general read I got was of a non-activist stance -- a general reluctance to go out of his way and rule against government regulators," Manning said. "If the EPA ruled against the chemical industry, the general tendency was to defer to the agency."

Court Docket May Color Roberts Hearings (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- If Judge John Roberts wins swift Senate confirmation to the U.S. Supreme Court, one of the first cases he hears will be Gonzales v. Oregon, the Bush administration's bid to block a state law allowing terminally ill patients to end their lives.

DOJ_NMG_0004419

It is a hot-button issue similar to abortion, but the ideological battle lines in the debate are less clearly drawn. Social conservatives argue that assisted suicide, like abortion, should be banned. But states' rights conservatives, who want the court to overturn national abortion law, now want the same court to deny states the right to set policy on death.

Which side would Judge Roberts take? Today, senators will have a chance to probe the nominee's views with questions during Judge Roberts's confirmation hearing.

Earlier public statements suggest Judge Roberts, seen as an ally to social conservatives on abortion, could disappoint them on whether terminally ill patients may end their lives. When the Supreme Court last weighed in on the matter, in 1997, Judge Roberts discussed the cases in a television talk show. The high court had just decided to protect prohibitions on assisted suicide in Washington and New York states. Judge Roberts, at the time a lawyer in private practice, defended the decision to maintain the restrictions -- invoking states' rights, not morality.

"The right that was protected in the assisted-suicide case was the right of the people through their legislatures to articulate their own views...and not to have the court interfering with those policy decisions," he said.

When senators quiz Judge Roberts on his legal philosophy, one area to be explored by Democrats and Republicans is how he views the balance of power between Washington and state capitols. Under the late Chief Justice, William H. Rehnquist, the Supreme Court leaned toward curtailing federal authority.

But at times, even conservatives on the high court have disagreed on where to draw the line. In the court's last term, a clash between state and federal rights was at the heart of the Bush administration's attempts to block California from allowing medical patients to use homegrown marijuana to ease their pain. In the 6-3 ruling, Justice Antonin Scalia voted with the majority upholding the administration while Justice Clarence Thomas and Chief Justice Rehnquist sided with the marijuana-using California patients.

Where Judge Roberts falls on that spectrum could have ramifications made more complex by shifting political terrain. Before, social and economic conservatives pressed federal courts for relief from a Congress controlled by Democrats. Judge Roberts could take the helm of the Supreme Court at a time when Republicans dominate Congress and the White House, and some states are serving as laboratories for liberal social policy.

"Federalism creates strange bedfellows sometimes," says Glenn Lammi, chief counsel of the Washington Legal Foundation, a pro-business public-interest group. "Those who might want, from their ideological perspective, issues to come out one way, sometimes find that, legally speaking, they don't always come out that way."

A state-federal clash could draw the high court into the gay-marriage debate over whether the federal government can impose a national definition of marriage on states favoring same-sex unions. Cloning could become another tug-of-war; some senators want to ban cloning, while some states are trying to advance it.

When the Supreme Court eight years ago unanimously upheld state bans on assisted suicide, the justices cited more than 700 years of evidence of "the Anglo American common law tradition" of condemning "both suicide and assisted suicide."

But Chief Justice Rehnquist, writing for the majority, took an extra step that left the door open for states to revisit the matter. Separated from the rest of the text by about an inch of white space he added a final thought in the Washington v. Glucksberg opinion: "Throughout the nation, Americans are engaged in an earnest and profound debate about the morality, legality and practicality of physician-assisted suicide. Our holding permits this debate to continue, as it should in a democratic society."

In 1994, Oregonians voted 51% to 49% for the Death with Dignity Act. The measure was full of the checks-and-balances that the Supreme Court suggested would be vital to legally balancing the state's interest in protecting life and society's wish to alleviate suffering. The law allows only terminally ill, adult patients with less than six months to live to obtain a prescription for a lethal dose of drugs. Two doctors must approve of the request, and counseling must be offered in certain cases. The patient is required to make the request for the drugs three times in 15 days, twice verbally and once in writing. The patient must be able to swallow the drugs himself, without assistance.

A torrent of legal and political challenges ensued, and an injunction was issued before the law took effect. Two federal courts upheld the law, and the Supreme Court in 1997 refused to review it. State lawmakers that year put through a second referendum, this one to repeal the law. Despite a multimillion dollar campaign funded largely by the Catholic Church and Right to Life organizations, Oregon voters rejected the initiative 60% to 40%.

President Bush's victory in 2000 gave the opposition more powerful tools to employ against the law. On Nov. 6, 2001, Attorney General John Ashcroft invoked the federal Controlled Substances Act to revoke the licenses of Oregon doctors who prescribed the lethal cocktails, and directed investigators to identify doctors who did.

Oregon officials obtained an injunction to block the Justice Department from carrying out Mr. Ashcroft's instructions. The Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the Oregon law, and on his last day at the Justice Department, in November, Mr. Ashcroft appealed the ruling to the Supreme Court.

Shortly after President Bush nominated Judge Roberts to the Supreme Court, Oregon Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden -- a defender of his state's law -- met with the nominee for nearly an hour. They discussed states' rights and whether Judge Roberts thought a "state should have a wide berth in terms of regulating medical practice," Sen. Wyden says. The senator didn't ask Judge Roberts how he might rule in the Oregon case. But based on what he's heard, Sen. Wyden says: "Put me down as hopeful."

On Iran-contra, What Did Roberts Know? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON - What did you know, and when did you know it?

That query, dating from the Watergate probe, is perhaps the best known question ever asked during a congressional hearing (at least since the McCarthy era). But the kind of scandal that prompts such a bare-knuckled interrogation does not appear on John Roberts's golden résumé.

The US Supreme Court nominee, now appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, is being questioned about his conservative leanings, his past writings, and his courtroom advocacy of far-right constitutional interpretations. But no one is attacking the prospective chief justice's honesty, integrity, or ethics.

Nonetheless, at least one episode in Judge Roberts's past may prompt that famous line of interrogation. As a member of the White House counsel's office in 1985 and early 1986, Roberts was in close proximity to what ultimately became the Reagan administration's Iran-contra scandal.

As early as January 1985, Roberts was asked to give a legal opinion about White House involvement in private fundraising to help the contra forces fighting Nicaragua's Sandinista government. He also wrote several memos in early 1986 concerning the private fundraising activities of individuals who were later prosecuted in the Iran-contra affair.

But Roberts's White House memos, made public at the National Archives, are unlikely to provide much grist for conspiracy theorists seeking to link the former Reagan staffer to the scandal.

Instead, Roberts's memos on contra-related issues reveal a cautious lawyer who consistently sounded alarm bells about appearances and who urged compliance with the letter and spirit of the law. His words convey no sign of a devious consigliere searching for ways to bend the law or conceal lawless activities.

More important, the memos suggest that Roberts and his colleagues in the White House counsel's office were outside the loop on the secret dealings of Lt. Col. Oliver North at the National Security Council. There is no indication that the office was consulted about the legality of trading arms for hostages in Lebanon, or using proceeds from the Iran arms sales to support the contras at a time when Congress had barred US government assistance to them.

One odd circumstance, though, might raise a question about how much Roberts knew about Iran-contra and when he knew it.

Roberts left the Reagan White House in May 1986 - six months before public disclosure of the Iran-contra scandal threw the Reagan presidency into turmoil.

Roberts's departure alone isn't unusual. Ambitious and talented lawyers circulate in and out of government service on a regular basis. What is unusual is that between January and June 1986 the entire counsel's office departed. All seven lawyers - including presidential counsel Fred Fielding - resigned and left the White House.

The departures mark an extraordinary exodus of legal experience even as the Iran-contra deception was in full operation.

Peter Wallison, who succeeded Mr. Fielding as White House counsel in April 1986, says the departures were routine turnover within the office, nothing more. "They would have to be very, very perspicacious ... to have sensed something that was such a tightly held secret," he says. "Nobody had the slightest inkling [the Iran-contra operation] was occurring, and if they had, it would have been stopped."

Richard Hauser, deputy White House counsel until early 1986, also says there was no connection between the departures and Iran-contra. "It may have just been because Fred [Fielding] and I were leaving that that became a natural time for others to make plans," he says.

The Roberts legal memos dealing with Iran-contra issues were the type of routine matters that came through the White House counsel's office every day, he says.

"The only thing remarkable about it," Mr. Hauser says, "is that there was a pyrotechnic aspect to it that was unknown at the time."

In January 1985 Roberts was asked to assess the legality of the president and the White House becoming involved in fundraising on behalf of a newly formed private group called the Nicaraguan Refugee Fund. A plan being pushed by Colonel North and others at the National Security Council called for the White House to give corporate leaders a briefing on the situation in Nicaragua and then the group's representatives would ask the CEOs to give money to the fund. The money would be used for humanitarian aid and to wage a publicity campaign in the US against the Sandinista regime.

Roberts objected. In a Jan. 11, 1985, memo, he wrote: "I recommend stopping any White House involvement in this effort." The White House generally does not lend its name to private fundraising, he wrote. "The corporate CEOs would doubtless view the solicitation from the 'private' organization as having official backing if they learn about it at a White House briefing," the memo said.

But that wasn't the last word. After a week of internal appeals, Roberts reversed his position. Supporters of the effort argued that White House fundraising policy would not be violated, because solicitations would occur after the briefing at a reception at the Hay-Adams Hotel, a block from the White House.

"I suppose we could permit the briefing to take place," Roberts wrote on Jan. 18, 1985. "But I think [this] 'Chinese wall' argument is a bit artificial."

The "Chinese wall" concession is important because it established the briefing-solicitation process that North later used to raise funds from private individuals to pay for contra weapons. Those soliciting the funds on North's behalf later pled guilty to violating US tax laws for claiming the donations were tax-free.

In early 1986, Roberts wrote a series of memos on private fundraising. The plan was as in 1985: provide a White House briefing for wealthy administration supporters, then take them to the Hay-Adams and ask for money.

"I see no legal bars to the contemplated briefing," Roberts wrote in January 1986.

Roberts's memos suggest he was unaware that the money was being used by North and others in the administration to arm the contras. White House officials were told the money was for a "public awareness" campaign in the US by a private group that supported Reagan's position on Central America.

The White House briefings and Reagan's drop-bys were used to boost the private fundraising effort. Those preparing Reagan's fundraising pitches to would-be donors often went too far, in Roberts's view.

One proposed draft of Reagan remarks said: "I ask you - and I ask private citizens throughout the country - to give private donations to the freedom fighter cause. Help them survive this Soviet-Cuban-supplied onslaught. Help these brave freedom fighters last out until American aid can reach them."

After reviewing the draft, Roberts fired off a memo. "The final paragraph on page 3 raises serious concerns under the Neutrality Act," he wrote March 20, 1986. Private citizens who contribute money to buy arms for use against a country with which the US is not at war would be violating federal law and be subject to a fine and prison term, he said.

"The president cannot encourage private citizens to engage in such activity," Roberts wrote. "The reference to private donations must either be deleted or revised to make clear that only donations for humanitarian aid (not covered by the Neutrality Act) are encouraged."

The comments were toned down, but, apparently unknown to Roberts, the donations secretly continued to flow to the contras for weapons.

A Day Of Firsts, Overshadowed (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Yesterday's opening of the John Roberts confirmation hearings was a time for historic firsts.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) made 49 first-person references in a 10-minute statement that was, ostensibly, not about himself.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) showed exceptional emotional versatility, working a crossword puzzle during the hearing and then choking back a sob while making a prosaic statement about partisanship.

Roberts delivered what may have been the shortest opening statement by a modern Supreme Court nominee -- less than seven minutes, including the thank-yous and two baseball metaphors.

But in the end, the confirmation kickoff was anticlimactic: As word spread through the gallery midway through the session that FEMA Director Michael D. Brown had quit, reporters knew the Roberts story would, once again, be a sideshow. Roberts may well be confirmed as chief justice of the Supreme Court, but in the case before the court of public attention, in re: Katrina v. Roberts , the defendant doesn't have a chance.

With the nation distracted by the hurricane and flooding down south, neither left nor right nor middle displayed much energy. By 10:30 a.m., only 170 people had shown up for public tickets to witness the noon proceedings -- making unnecessary the plastic cordons and the queue signs leading almost all the way to Union Station. Outside the Russell Senate Office Building at 11 a.m., a grand total of 21 people demonstrated against Roberts, chanting: "Two-four-six-eight, separation of church and state!"

Even inside the storied Senate Caucus Room -- scene of the Teapot Dome, McCarthy and Watergate hearings -- some were preoccupied with Katrina.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the committee's ranking Democrat, led off with an observation that the hurricane was "a tragic reminder of why we have a federal government." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said, in one of three references, "Katrina tore away the mask that has hidden from public view the many Americans who are left out and left behind."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), opening the hearing, called the confirmation "perhaps the biggest challenge of the decade." But at times it appeared to be a swearing-in ceremony. Before the hearing, Kennedy shook the hand of Jane Roberts and said to the nominee's wife, "Congratulations."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) seemed to be taking confirmation for granted when he listed a range of issues likely to come before the court and told Roberts, repeatedly, "You will rule on that." In the park across the street from the Russell Building, a modest but confident group of conservatives sipped from water bottles labeled "Roberts YES."

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), who had the job of formally introducing Roberts to the committee, offered some advice to the nominee's playful young son, Jack: "You can wiggle a little bit. Don't worry."

As it happens, that was similar to the advice GOP members offered. In their 10-minute opening statements, they repeatedly urged him not to answer questions about his views.

"Don't take the bait," suggested Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.). Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said it is "patently false" that Roberts must provide answers. Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) thought it could be "unethical."

Democrats were almost as uniform in the opposite view. "It is our duty to ask questions," Kennedy replied.

"It is not undignified to ask questions," submitted Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.).

"It is our obligation to ask and your obligation to answer," Schumer said.

Roberts sat still, shoulders slightly rounded, moving his head thoughtfully from side to side, and keeping a polite gaze on each speaking senator; after three hours of this, the nominee shamed the lawmakers with a brief speech blending jurisprudence and the national pastime. "I will remember that it's my job to call balls and strikes and not to pitch or bat," he said.

Specter, determined to keep the proceedings on schedule, even cut himself off at the 10-minute mark, saying, "I'm down to 10 seconds . . . that's it."

But there were unscripted moments. Cornyn and Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) spent a chunk of the afternoon whispering and joking. A woman in a 19th-century hat and dress sat in the back of the room wearing a "Women for Roberts" sticker. After Feingold predicted longevity for the 50-year-old nominee because he looks "healthy," Coburn, a doctor, said that cannot be predicted without a "physical exam or a family history" -- neither of which is on this week's hearing schedule.

A television camera behind Coburn caught the senator working a crossword puzzle. But Coburn went from detachment to emotional overdrive when it was his turn to talk; seconds after asserting that "a super-legislator body is not what the court was intended to be," he paused and wept.

Colleagues looked alarmed. One GOP committee aide put his hand to his mouth. It was the biggest Senate choke-up since Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) cried while opposing the nomination of the ambassador to the United Nations -- and Coburn has to get through three more days of hearings.

Right Pleased With Specter (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

After bitterly attempting to deny Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) the gavel, conservative activists are now beginning to praise the five-term moderate as an unexpected ally in several key battles this year.

Specter, who was nearly denied the chairmanship last November after an eruption on the right regarding comments he made about Roe v. Wade, has won some grudging respect from conservatives in recent weeks. Those activists have been particularly pleased with his handling of the run-up to this week's confirmation hearing for Judge John Roberts, who is President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States.

"In the context of this confirmation hearing, he has been spectacular," said Leonard Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society, a conservative group of lawyers.

Jay Sekulow, a point person among conservatives as chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, said Specter's performance had exceeded the "forecasts of doom by some on the right."

Even former Attorney General Edwin Meese, who openly endorsed Specter's primary opponent in April 2004, said that he was expecting the chairman to handle the Roberts hearings "very fairly," and added that he believes Specter has been a "strong chairman."

By no means are conservatives starting a fan club for the chairman — indeed, most of their praise has been hedged with such phrases as "so far." But conservatives have had an easier legislative road this year thanks to Specter's support for a large chunk of the Bush agenda and his avid support of his judicial nominations.

And some of the younger conservative Senators on his panel say that Specter has emerged as the right person to run what has become the chamber's most partisan committee. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said Specter has been "evenhanded" and "fair" to conservatives on the committee with whom the chairman disagrees with personally on issues.

Because Specter has had fights with the conservative movement for nearly two decades, he comes to the chairmanship with a perceived independence from them that ultimately yields a big benefit to the White House and Senate Republicans when he does come down on their side, Graham said.

"It helps in the sense that he's not looked at as an ideologue," he added. "It gives the committee some credibility, and he's probably the perfect guy to be chairman."

Leo said that the two-week gavel fight Specter underwent in November helped him understand what a different role it is to be chairman. "By taking the chairmanship, he was taking a different role. He's not a free agent anymore," he said.

Even as he continues to earn a level of praise from senior Democrats and some liberal activists, Specter has repeatedly been on the side of conservatives more often than not this year on the big issues before his committee.

At Monday's hearing, his opening statement ticked off a litany of issues the panel has worked on this year: the somewhat contentious confirmation of an attorney general, an overhaul of bankruptcy and class-action rules, re-authorization of the highly contentious USA PATRIOT Act and the confirmation of a handful of previously filibustered appellate court nominees. It read like a wish list for conservatives.

In advance of the Roberts hearings, Specter defended the White House position that writings and memos from Roberts' tenure at the Solicitor General's office about 15 years ago should remain sealed.

And on Sunday's "Meet the Press," Specter objected, somewhat unexpectedly, to the idea of elevating Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to the Supreme Court to fill the court's remaining vacancy on the court. That puts him in step with conservatives who are wary that Gonzales harbors comparatively moderate positions on social issues.

And Specter achieved all this while fighting off Hodgkin's lymphoma cancer, which was diagnosed in February and which until the end of July prompted chemotherapy every other Friday at the University of Pennsylvania's Hospital in Philadelphia.

In an interview after Monday's opening day of hearings, Specter spread credit among the membership of the entire panel. And he brushed off any suggestion that his presence in the spotlight represented any kind of redemption.

"This committee has delivered," he said. "It hasn't just been me."

Indeed, part of Specter's recent run of success has been his ability to work through procedural issues with Sen. Pat Leahy (D-Vt.), Judiciary's ranking member, as well as his good relationship with Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Both GOP and Democratic aides say that Specter has smoothed over relations with Leahy in a way that had become impossible under former Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), who bitterly fought with Leahy during President Bush's first term. Hatch later stepped down due to internal GOP rules limiting chairmen's terms.

"All committees should have the working relationship that these two have," Reid said of Specter and Leahy last week.

Liberal activists have taken note of Specter's tendency to work through things privately with Leahy. "He hasn't been as confrontational as Sen. Hatch," said Ralph Neas, president of People For the American Way. "He's tried to resolve things in a bipartisan way."

But, in the same breath, Neas noted with frustration that Specter has "marched in lockstep with President Bush on judicial nominations for the past four-and-a-half years."

"He's a paradox," said Nan Aron, head of the Alliance for Justice, noting Specter's primary role in defeating Robert Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court in 1987 and his subsequent support of almost every nominee from both President Bushes.

"He's someone who, ever since Bork, has walked a very fine line, and someone who has done it effectively," Aron said.

For conservatives, the biggest question mark came in May, when the Senate faced down the fight over filibusters of judicial nominations.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) was poised to force a parliamentary vote banning them, and he needed just 50 votes to do it. According to Democratic and GOP Senators, the vote was 49 Senators on Frist's side, 50 against and Specter the lone holdout. He never publicly stated his position — although he stood at Frist's side at what would have been the start of that floor debate — and he never had to once the "Gang of 14" deal averting that vote materialized.

Still uncertain whether he was on their side in the filibuster fight, conservative activists were happy to see Specter quickly work to win confirmation for such judges as Priscilla Owen to the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — a confirmation victory that now has her on some lists to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

On Monday, Specter again refused to say how he will vote on the Roberts nomination, maintaining his independence and awaiting to hear the nominee answer his questions. He rejected any suggestion that these hearings were personal vindication for a 25-year roller-coaster ride in the Senate, but his smiles and jokes with the press afterward betrayed a sense of satisfaction about being in charge.

"It's one of those slight perks you get if you stay around long enough and you don't get indicted," he said.

Margaret Carlson column: For Dems, Less Might Be More (LAT)

By Margaret Carlson

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

I'm as excited as anyone about the prospect of "Advise and Consent, the Sequel," with a budget rivaling "War of the Worlds" and advance hype just short of Tom Cruise jumping on a couch, declaring his love for Arlen Specter.

Eighteen years after "Borking" became part of the language, the two main protagonists in that battle are still at it. Specter, the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, got in one more lick Sunday against the Supreme Court nominee he defeated back then, Robert Bork. "If his 'original intent' stood, we'd still be segregating the United States Senate with African Americans on one side and Caucasians on the other side," Specter said on CNN. Bork said later in the same program: "I know Specter, and the truth is not in him."

Somehow Alberto Gonzales, one of the potential candidates to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, seems incapable of generating that level of venom. He may prove to be a stealth candidate with rock-hard positions we don't know about, but he comes across as milder than that. The right wing jokes that "Gonzales" is Spanish for "David Souter." And the left dislikes him for condoning torture at Abu Ghraib. The bipartisan dismay has lent Gonzales an air of being just right.

I'm not saying Bush is going to nominate Gonzales, the old friend he huffily told folks to lay off of as he flew to the G-8 summit in Scotland. He might even nominate a real hard-liner, lure the Democrats into eliminating him and then get whomever he wants to replace O'Connor and Chief Justice William Rehnquist when he retires.

What I am saying is that although Bush looks more and more messianic, he's got enough of his father's pragmatism in him to want to overturn Roe vs. Wade about as much as he wants to read the collected works of Shakespeare.

If Roe goes down, so does his majority, his legacy and present and future politicians bearing the name Bush. Traditional Republicans who voted for Bush for his pro-corporate, pro-tax-cut views will put aside their selfish concerns and flock to pro-choice candidates, who tend to be Democrats. He doesn't want to be remembered as the guy who knocked down the late Lee Atwater's Big Tent.

Watching Karl Rove, you know he has his right flank under better control (he got them to the polls in 2004) than Democrats have their left one. Evangelicals look into Bush's soul and see a man who would criminalize abortion as soon as possible, while moderate Republicans see a man who is only doing what's necessary to keep conservatives mollified.

Rove let those on the right vent for a few days about Gonzales and then, about the time he slipped and called Gonzales "Justice" in a meeting with the Washington Post two days ago, had his minions tell them to chill.

Bush has tossed the right enough red meat (Terri Schiavo, embryo protection in stem-cell research, Social Security reform, tax cuts, the war) so that when red meat he doesn't want to deliver is called for, he has the room to finesse it. It's quite a trick. Bush does not keep Laura from saying, as she did on the "Today" show in 2001, that she doesn't want to see Roe vs. Wade overturned, and he lets the twins take the stage at the GOP convention, speaking of sex in front of Grandma and the delegates in a fashion that says no way do they belong to a party that lets Phyllis Schlafly have her way.

This doesn't mean there won't be Kabuki theater from now until October. There are a lot of people with a stake in a big blowout, including political fundraisers and the media.

So what should Democratic senators do, some of whom are up for reelection in 2006 and most of whom secretly believe that putting your name on a benign-sounding piece of legislation with a sweet name like No Child Left Behind is a better career-builder than Borking someone? Republicans have successfully defined advice and consent downward. Whisper "extraordinary circumstances" for anyone other than a felon or flat-earther and you can kiss the Gang of 14 compromise saving the filibuster goodbye

When you combine the polls on Congress (it stinks) with the ones on the Supreme Court nomination (a quick and fair fight is all we ask for), it argues for continuing to do what's worked best for Democrats: as little as possible while letting Republicans go too far.

By abandoning the field, Democrats have unleashed Bush's most fearsome opponent: reality. On Social Security, Republicans are a victory away from annihilation. If only Democrats had done even less, they might have restored their FDR coalition and been sure of winning back the White House and Congress. If the GOP wants to be the party of James Dobson and Jerry Falwell, let them have the shovel to dig that hole. It might not bring Democratic victory tomorrow, but it will soon and for decades to come.

Bush Expresses Confidence In Recovery Efforts (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

DOJ_NMG_0004426

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush, making his third visit to areas in Louisiana and Mississippi devastated by Hurricane Katrina, said Monday that New Orleans was "on the way" to recovery and stated that there was now "close coordination" among all levels of government.

In comments after high-level briefings and a tour of some areas of New Orleans affected by the hurricane, the president alluded for the first time to the disproportionate number of African Americans stranded by the flooding in New Orleans, and he vowed to look into growing concerns among homeowners who lacked flood insurance coverage.

Some residents of the Gulf states are reporting that insurance adjusters are questioning whether their homes were damaged by flood or by wind. Flood damage is generally not covered by standard homeowners' policies; wind damage often is.

Bush said Monday that he had encountered a woman facing such a dilemma. After she told him of her situation and asked how he would feel, the president said he told her: "I wouldn't like it a bit."

He also told her that he would "find out the process that determines whether or not it's a wind or water event."

Despite the relief progress that he said he noted Monday — Bush cited a gas station "up and running" in Gulfport, Miss. — the president warned: "There's a lot of serious and hard work that's yet to be done."

During a brief question-and-answer session with reporters, Bush was asked about the large numbers of blacks who were trapped in the Superdome and the convention center in New Orleans.

"My attitude is this: The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery," Bush replied. "When those Coast Guard choppers, many of whom were first on the scene, were pulling people off roofs, they didn't check the color of a person's skin. They wanted to save lives."

He also reiterated his aversion to conduct an immediate review of the bureaucratic snafus that left tens of thousands of New Orleans' residents stranded by the floodwaters, saying that both the White House and Congress later would "take a good, close look at what went on, what didn't go on."

Such an assessment — after the crisis has eased — would be "really important" and would help "answer the question: Are we prepared for major catastrophes?" Bush said. "If there were to be a biological attack of some kind, we've got to make sure we understand the lessons learned to be able to deal with catastrophe."

The president once more dismissed a suggestion that the rescue efforts may have been hampered by a lack of military personnel because so many troops are serving in Iraq.

"It is preposterous to claim that the engagement in Iraq meant there wasn't enough troops here, just pure and simple," he said.

Bush arrived in New Orleans late Sunday afternoon and spent the night aboard the Iwo Jima, a Navy amphibious assault ship docked in the Mississippi River. He returned to Washington Monday evening after visiting Gulfport.

Bush Denies Racial Component To Response (NSDY/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- President Bush, ducking low-hanging tree limbs and electrical wires, rode in an open truck Monday for his first close-up look at New Orleans' ravaged, trash-strewn, flooded neighborhoods. He denied that poor, black victims of Hurricane Katrina were ignored because of their race.

After a federal response criticized as slow and inadequate, Michael Brown, the embattled director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, announced his resignation in Washington. His departure had been expected after he was stripped of his onsite command of the hurricane relief effort three days earlier.

Bush replied testily to a reporter who asked whether he felt let down by federal officials in responding to the disaster.

"Look, there will be plenty of time to play the blame game," he said. "That's what you're trying to do. You're trying to say somebody is at fault. And, look, I want to know. I want to know exactly what went on and how it went on, and we'll continually assess inside my administration."

Bush spend the night here on the amphibious assault ship USS Iwo Jima, and toured the city for 45 minutes. The president's convoy moved slowly through just-drained neighborhoods caked with black mud and through streets where the water line reached well into the trucks' tire wells or lapped at curbs. At times, the stench was overwhelming.

Bush seized on the news of falling water levels throughout New Orleans and pronounced the city on the mend. Business owners were issues passes to retrieve records and equipment, and more than half of southeastern Louisiana's water treatment plants were back in operation.

"My impression of New Orleans is this: that there is a recovery on the way," Bush said in the shadow of a freeway overpass, destroyed cars littering the landscape behind him and rescue choppers occasionally drowning out his words.

Polls show broad dissatisfaction with Bush's handling of the hurricane and his job approval rating is at the lowest point of his presidency. This was his third and longest trip here since Katrina pulverized Gulf Coast communities and submerged most of New Orleans two weeks earlier. He is expected to return to the region on Thursday, and aides were discussing plans for him to address the nation from a site to be determined.

Bush's tour of New Orleans started by regular motorcade, taking him in his Suburban through the nearly deserted city -- past the now-infamous Superdome, through parts of the central business district and the Bywater District with the orange X's on doors signifying the visit of a search-and-rescue team, and into the French Quarter. There, he and his entourage jumped into the military vehicles.

Escorted by Humvee, Bush stood in the truck bed flanked by a grim-looking New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco -- both of whom have criticized the federal response.

Many people, particularly in the black community, have suggested that one reason for the slow response was that most of the storm victims, especially in New Orleans, were poor and black and that the administration doesn't care about them. The president said that wasn't so.

"The storm didn't discriminate and neither will the recovery effort," he said. "When those Coast Guard choppers ... were pulling people off roofs, they didn't check the color of a person's skin. They wanted to save lives."

Bush also clarified his oft-criticized remark that no one had anticipated that New Orleans' levees being breached. He said there was an initial impression that the city had escaped heavy damage "and I myself thought we had dodged a bullet." He said he got that impression from the media.

Before Monday, Bush had only seen New Orleans' deepest misery from the air -- from aboard Air Force on the way back to Washington from his Texas ranch and again from a helicopter two days after that. His only foray into the city was to one of the breached levees on its edge.

The president ended his two-day stay in the region in Gulfport, Miss., a town on the coast where Katrina's winds turned scores of homes and businesses into matchsticks.

Bush stopped at a distribution center run by Christ in Action. "Good to see you" and "Good luck," Bush murmured to people he greeted along long tables where food and supplies such as water, diapers and toilet paper were being distributed. He also cheered on a group of Mexican marines and Navy Seabees just back from Iraq who were clearing debris at the 28th St. Elementary School.

He said earlier it was "preposterous to claim" that the nation's military was stretched too thinly with the war in Iraq to deal with the Gulf Coast devastation.

WRAPUP 3-Bush Tours Ravaged New Orleans As Criticism Swirls (REU)

By Michael Christie

Reuters, September 12, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept 12 (Reuters) - U.S. President George W. Bush, on a tour of devastated New Orleans on Monday, rejected charges the government was slow to respond to Hurricane Katrina because most of the victims were black or because the nation's military was over-extended in Iraq.

"My attitude is this: The storm didn't discriminate and neither will the recovery effort. When those Coast Guard choppers ... were pulling people off roofs, they didn't check the color of a person's skin. They wanted to save lives," the president said.

He also said it was "preposterous" to claim that the Iraq war had drained military resources, leaving too few troops to help out with the hurricane.

"We've got plenty of troops to do both," Bush said during a tour of the areas of the city ravaged by the hurricane.

It was his third visit to the Gulf Coast since the hurricane struck two weeks ago. He was briefed by Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, the man appointed to take command of recovery efforts last Friday, replacing Michael Brown, the much-criticized head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, whom Bush had earlier praised.

The president then ventured out into the ruined city, riding in an open, flatbed military truck through flooded streets. He saw damaged houses, downed trees and fetid, black and gray floodwaters.

But in a new blast at the administration, civil rights leader Rev. Jesse Jackson said the government was now discriminating against local businesses by ensuring that big corporations with close ties to the establishment received all the major rebuilding contracts.

"It smells so much like cronyism and you've still got people sleeping on floors," Jackson told Reuters.

The official death toll has climbed past 400 and was expected to climb higher, making it one of the deadliest hurricanes in the United States in a century. One million people in the region have been displaced by the disaster.

FOCUS ON HOUSING

Allen told the president he was focusing efforts on getting thousands of evacuees out of temporary shelters as quickly as possible and into more permanent housing.

National Guard soldiers swept mud-covered thoroughfares and cleared debris in central New Orleans ahead of Bush's visit.

Critics have charged that the president seemed isolated from real-time information and slow to grasp the immensity of the disaster in the days after the storm hit.

Around 40 percent of the city remains swamped by contaminated water, although surrounding suburban areas were drying out. Most of city's 450,000 residents are scattered across the United States in shelters or with friends and family. An unknown number have ignored repeated calls to leave, choosing the brave growing health hazards in the city.

Charles Daniels, 63, finally gave up on Monday and was trying to find some fuel for his car to leave. He was hoping for information on his two daughters and seven grandchildren, evacuated during the worst of the flooding.

"I have no idea where they are. No idea. But they're not coming back, because it's all flooded down there where they lived," he said. "My baby daughter's home is bad. She can't move back there. It's gone."

About 1 million people from Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama were displaced by the Aug. 29 storm and many families have been separated.

The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children said 1,600 children were listed as missing by their parents, or were seeking their families.

The tragedy has sparked a national outpouring of charity. The Chronicle of Philanthropy reported Americans had donated at least $739 million to help victims of the disaster at a faster pace than for any previous emergency.

POLLS SHOW DEEP UNHAPPINESS

In recent days, Bush has dispatched Vice President Dick Cheney and Cabinet officials to survey the damage and to counter continued criticism that the administration's response to the storm has been slow and inadequate.

Polls show Americans were deeply unhappy with the response from federal, state and local officials. A Newsweek survey on Saturday found Bush's approval rating at 38 percent, the lowest of his presidency.

The storm could also be the costliest natural disaster in in U.S. history. Estimates range from $100 billion to $200 billion. Congress has approved $62.3 billion so far for hurricane relief.

In devastated coastal Mississippi, where some towns were flattened, residents trying to pick up the pieces had another battle on their hands.

"The pitiful thing here is that insurance companies are trying to stiff us," said Eve Jaspers, a Mississippi deputy sheriff, who did not buy flood coverage because her house was built on high land.

DOJ_NMG_0004429

"They're telling me this was flood damage," she said. "The walls fell out. The front door is in the garage, God knows where the garage door is. It was clearly a small tornado."

Business owners were being allowed back into downtown New Orleans to visit their property, though they were told they could not stray beyond the central business district.

Health officials on Monday were spraying for flies and mosquitoes to minimize the risk of disease being carried by the insects, a step toward making the city habitable again.

Northrop Grumman Corp. <NOC.N> , the largest manufacturing employer in Louisiana and Mississippi, put out a call for thousands of ship builders to return to work if possible on Monday at New Orleans and Pascagoula, Mississippi, shipyards.

Bush Vows A `Sober Look' At Federal Katrina Response (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, September 13, 2005

Sept. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Federal authorities outlined plans to temporarily house Hurricane Katrina survivors in trailers as President George W. Bush promised to take ``a sober look" at how emergency agencies reacted after the storm.

The president, making his third tour of the U.S. Gulf Coast region in the two weeks since the Katrina hammered Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, said in New Orleans this morning that every citizen of the affected areas will get aid.

Responding to criticism that the federal government moved too slowly in the immediate aftermath of Katrina, the president vowed that Congress and the administration will ``take a sober look at the decision-making that went on."

The president made his remarks after touring the city's French Quarter and other neighborhoods in a caravan of military vehicles along with Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco. Before heading out, he got his first on-scene briefing by Coast Guard Vice Admiral Thad Allen, who replaced embattled Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown Sept. 9 as the federal official in charge of relief and recovery operations in the region.

Allen said the trailers are being brought in to serve as stopgap housing. Thousands of people uprooted by the hurricane and unable to afford temporary quarters have been housed at emergency shelters, sports arenas, military bases and the homes of family and friends across the country and even cruise ships.

Permanent Homes

``The ultimate goal is to get them into homes permanently," Allen told Bush aboard the amphibious assault ship USS Iwo Jima, which is moored at a dock in downtown New Orleans to serve as a command center for military operations.

The government has ordered about 100,000 two-bedroom mobile homes and recreational vehicles from several manufacturers around the country to help fill housing needs for about 300,000 people, said James McIntyre, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency in Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

The government has taken delivery of 12,000 units so far, he said, at a rate of about 500 a day, up from 450 yesterday. Mobile homes and RVs are being shipped by railroad or truck to staging areas in Selma, Alabama; Purvis, Mississippi, Baton Rouge, Louisiana and Texarkana, Texas.

Income and Race

Many of those most in need of shelter come from the poorest areas of New Orleans and Mississippi and Alabama. In New Orleans, thousands were stuck for days after the Aug. 29 storm in overcrowded and under-supplied shelters. Bush rejected suggestions from some New Orleans residents that income and race played a role in how quickly relief was delivered.

``The storm didn't discriminate and neither will the recovery effort," Bush said after touring the city today. ``When those Coast Guard choppers, many of whom were first on the scene, were pulling people off roofs, they didn't check the color of a person's skin."

Still, he said, the federal government's response to the storm and the complaints about a lack of coordination with local emergency officials must be examined and shortcomings fixed.

``I think it's very important for Congress to take a good close look at what went on, what didn't go on, and come up with a series of recommendations," Bush said.

Rebuilding

DOJ_NMG_0004430

He promised that New Orleans citizens will be able to create their own vision of how the city should be rebuilt.

``The best policy is one which says the federal government doesn't come down and say here is what your city should look like," he said.

He also called ``preposterous" questions about whether the government would have been able to move in troops more quickly if the military weren't stretched thin by the war in Iraq. ``We've got plenty of troops to do both," he said.

Bush heads to Gulfport, Mississippi, another area hit hard by Katrina, later today.

Political Price

The president is trying to expedite the rebuilding effort as polls show he may be paying a political price for the complaints about the federal government's initial response to the disaster.

In three national polls conducted last week -- for Time, Newsweek and the Associated Press -- the president's job approval rating fell to career lows. Thirty-eight percent of those surveyed in the Newsweek poll approved of the way Bush was handling his job as president, 42 percent approved in the Time poll and 39 percent in the AP/Ipsos poll.

`` As far as my own popularity goes, I don't make decisions based upon polls," Bush said today.

Among the actions taken last week by the administration, Bush said he would grant special ``evacuee status," to those uprooted from the region with making them eligible for cash grants of $2,000 and easier access to government services such as Medicaid, mental health services, housing assistance and unemployment insurance.

FEMA chief Brown was removed from overseeing hurricane recovery efforts and returned to Washington last week after a flood of criticism from Democrats and Republicans of how the agency handled the hurricane response and questions about whether he had the proper background to manage emergency efforts.

Bush Gets Closer Look At Devastation, Rebuts Charges Of Slow Response (KRT)

By Danny Robbins And Scott Dodd

Knight Ridder, September 13, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. - President Bush got his first close look Monday at flood-ravaged New Orleans, even as state health officials revealed another grim discovery: 45 people found dead at a hospital evacuated more than a week ago.

A hospital administrator told a dramatic story of doctors and nurses trying to keep patients alive without power, surrounded by water, while waiting for help that never arrived. At one point, helicopter evacuations were interrupted by gunfire, he said.

While touring New Orleans, the president rebutted charges of a slow response by the federal government, but that didn't save the job of Michael Brown, the embattled Federal Emergency Management Agency chief. He resigned from his post on Monday.

Bush pledged that the federal government will help rebuild New Orleans in whatever form the people of the damaged city decide. He said he could see progress being made from his tour in a military convoy.

As floodwaters dropped Monday, they began to yield to signs of rebuilding and rebirth - as well as significant challenges ahead. Scattered businesses were trying to reopen; the Coast Guard allowed some ship traffic on the lower Mississippi River during daylight hours, and the first commercial flights are scheduled to resume Tuesday at Louis Armstrong New Orleans Airport.

In south Mississippi, most residents were able to enjoy the simple pleasure of flushing toilets once again.

Electricity is being restored more quickly than expected to some areas of Louisiana, allowing critical industries - including oil and gas refineries - to get back to work. And Michael Olivier, a top economic development official in Louisiana, said a number of major companies plan to come back to New Orleans, including Entergy and Oreck Corp., which both temporarily relocated to other states.

But major problems remain throughout the Gulf Coast region. St. Bernard Parish President Henry "Junior" Rodriguez said a massive oil spill may have permanently damaged about 1,500 homes in his community.

It could take eight months or more to clean out the hurricane-damaged areas, the Army Corps of Engineers said at a briefing in Washington, estimating that 20 million cubic yards of debris are scattered across the Mississippi coast alone - enough to cover 300 football fields in 50-foot piles.

The agency doesn't have estimates for Louisiana yet.

It will also take months to rebuild the important Interstate 10 connection from New Orleans to Slidell across Lake Pontchartrain. Gordon Nelson with the Louisiana Department of Transportation said two eastbound lanes should be finished in 45 days, and one westbound lane will be rebuilt by January.

Pumps continue to push 6.5 billion gallons of water out of New Orleans daily, the Corps said, and FEMA is paying for emergency construction to repair the levees. They'll only be rebuilt to withstand a Category 3 storm, however, because that's the level of protection currently authorized by Congress. Katrina was a Category 4 hurricane.

About 40 percent of New Orleans remains flooded, down from 80 percent after Katrina struck and protective levees broke two weeks ago.

The bodies of 45 storm victims were found over the weekend at Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans, which had been surrounded by floodwaters, said Bob Johannesen, a spokesman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals.

They died in the four days after the storm while waiting to be evacuated, an assistant hospital administrator told The Associated Press. Temperatures inside the 317-bed hospital got as hot as 106 degrees, and the only way to get people out was by boat.

Many of the patients were elderly and seriously ill, and none expired because of lack of food or electricity, a spokesman for hospital owner TenetHealthcare Corp. told the AP. Some may even have died before the storm, he said.

Some of the recovered bodies had been in the hospital's morgue, but most of them were patients who died in the first four days after the storm hit, while the hospital waited for help, Tenet Healthcare spokesman Harry Anderson said.

It never came.

By Tuesday, he said, the floodwaters surrounding the building had washed out the hospital's generator, cutting off electricity, and temperatures in the facility reached up to 110 degrees.

Doctors and nurses worked around the clock to stabilize the sickest, using hand ventilators to keep patients alive, Anderson said. Some didn't make it.

Hospital officials frantically contacted the National Guard, Coast Guard and state emergency officials to ask for help as the waters rose, Anderson said. Eventually, the third floor was flooded.

"Everybody said, `Be patient. It's going to happen,'" he said.

But on Wednesday, Anderson said, hospital officials were told by the state that they would have to "use their own assets" to evacuate up to 260 patients. The hospital hired boats and private helicopters. The rescue effort was interrupted at one point by gunfire at the helicopters, Anderson said.

"This is a tragic byproduct of this disaster," he said. "People who are frail and vulnerable couldn't survive."

The bodies were taken to a morgue established for Katrina victims in St. Gabriel, La., Johannesen said.

The discovery helped push the Louisiana death toll to 279 on Monday, up from 197 on Sunday. More than 400 people are confirmed dead in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which struck the Gulf Coast two weeks ago Monday.

About 250 bodies have been recovered in New Orleans and its immediate suburbs, said Frank Minyard, the Orleans Parish coroner. He expects the death toll to rise as recovery efforts move into deeper floodwaters - but not to the numbers some had feared.

"It's going to grow, but I don't think it will get to 5,000," Minyard said. "I'd be shocked if it does."

Autopsies began Monday at the temporary facility in St. Gabriel. Minyard said most of the bodies are not recognizable.

"The decomposition is bad. Every body is swollen. Every body has decomposition and deterioration," he said. "It's almost impossible to physically identify them. If you have your loved one there, you can't really see them."

Coroners are performing autopsies only on bodies that appear to have suffered trauma, such as gunshot wounds, and on the 26 recovered from a nursing home in St. Bernard Parish because of questions about negligence.

Death certificates for people who appear to have died strictly as a result of the storm will simply be labeled "Hurricane Katrina death," he said.

Brown announced his resignation Monday afternoon, saying he didn't want his ongoing struggles - being removed from command of the relief effort and recalled to Washington on Friday amid questions about his resume - to distract from the relief effort.

David Paulison, head of FEMA's emergency preparedness force, was quickly named his temporary replacement.

In New Orleans, Bush denied that the federal government was slow to respond to the disaster because many of Hurricane Katrina's victims were poor and black. And he called it "preposterous" to claim that rescue and recovery efforts were hampered because military manpower is stretched too thin by the fighting in Iraq.

"The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery effort," Bush told reporters beneath a highway overpass after a tour in the back of a flatbed military truck. He had to duck at times to avoid hanging branches and power lines.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, now heading the recovery, briefed the president on efforts to provide temporary housing, a day after Louisiana officials accused the federal government of dragging its feet on helping people move out of emergency shelters.

Bush refused to find fault with the government's performance so far, saying, "There will be plenty of time to play the blame game. ... We're moving on. We're going to solve these problems. And there will be ample time for people to look back and see the facts."

For much of his visit, the president sat or stood between two people who harshly criticized the federal government in the days after Katrina struck - New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

Addressing the long-term future of the city, Bush said, "My attitude is this: The people of New Orleans can lay out what New Orleans ought to look like in the future ... and the federal government will help."

After visiting an emergency operations center in hard-hit St. Bernard's Parish, Bush flew to Gulfport, Miss., where he met with hurricane victims at a church relief center and an elementary school.

He also thanked Mexican troops helping with the cleanup, speaking to them briefly in Spanish.

This was the president's third trip to the Gulf States since the storm, but his first tour of downtown New Orleans. He spent the night aboard the USS Iwo Jima, anchored in the Mississippi River.

Bush avoided answering questions about Brown's resignation, saying he had not spoken with Washington during his trip to the Gulf.

"Here in Mississippi and Louisiana, people want to move forward," Bush said. "There'll be time later to blame somebody."

Bush Denies Race Had Role In Recovery (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

President Bush, making his third trip to Gulf Coast states ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, yesterday rejected charges that the federal government's emergency response was slow because most of the victims were black.

"The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery effort," the president told reporters after touring some of the hardest-hit areas in New Orleans.

"When those Coast Guard choppers, many of whom were first on the scene, were pulling people off roofs, they didn't check the color of a person's skin. They wanted to save lives," he said. "The rescue efforts were comprehensive, and the recovery will be comprehensive."

Mr. Bush replied angrily to another reporter who asked whether he felt let down by federal officials' response to the disaster.

"Look, there will be plenty of time to play the blame game," he said in New Orleans. "That's what you're trying to do. You're trying to say somebody is at fault. And, look, I want to know. I want to know exactly what went on and how it went on, and we'll continually assess inside my administration."

Asked whether the federal government needed broader authority to "come in earlier or even in advance of a storm," Mr. Bush said, "I think that's one of the interesting issues that Congress needs to take a look at."

The president began his day early yesterday after staying overnight on the amphibious assault ship USS Iwo Jima. He toured New Orleans for 45 minutes in an open truck for his first close look at the city's flooded neighborhoods, ducking low-hanging branches and electrical wires as his motorcade zigzagged around fallen trees.

Escorted by Humvees, Mr. Bush stood in the truck bed flanked by a grim-looking New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

The president stopped and talked with residents along the way, chatting at one point with shrimp boat worker Ricky Robin, who told the president how his crew rescued 300 people after the hurricane.

The president ended his two-day stay near Gulfport, Miss., stopping at a relief distribution center run by Christ in Action.

"Good to see you," the president said softly to volunteers and storm victims he greeted at long tables where food and supplies such as water, diapers and toilet paper were being distributed.

During a brief session with reporters in New Orleans, Mr. Bush said there was an initial impression after Katrina made landfall that the city had escaped heavy damage "and I myself thought we had dodged a bullet." It was only after the hurricane was well onto land that the levee broke and flooded New Orleans.

The president reacted testily to a question about whether the federal response to the emergency was hindered by a lack of National Guard units, some of which have been deployed in Iraq.

"Let me just talk about that again. I've answered this question before," he said. "It is preposterous to claim that the engagement in Iraq meant there wasn't enough troops here, just pure and simple. ... We've got plenty of troops to do both."

Feds Throw Money At Gulf, But Where's The Oversight? (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2005

With his poll numbers sagging, President Bush made his third trip to the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast on Monday. Though the trip had many purposes, one certainly was to burnish an image tattered by his administration's bungling of relief operations after Hurricane Katrina struck, a perception reinforced by the day's anticlimactic resignation of Michael Brown as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Such forays from the White House are an essential part of governing in a democratic society, where politics and policy go hand-in-hand and presidential leadership can provide comfort and cut through bureaucracy.

But Bush's efforts at damage control come with a potential cost. Having been accused of ineffectual leadership during the disaster, he is under enormous pressure not to be seen as parsimonious with funds for aid and recovery. About $62.3 billion has been appropriated. Contracts for rebuilding are being awarded on a “no-bid” basis. And yet the planning for successful rebuilding campaign is nowhere to be found.

Though ample amounts of federal money are needed, a spend-now, plan-later approach isn't the answer, except for urgent needs such as caring for evacuees. It can create the potential for waste and lead to bad decisions on rebuilding.

There's also the question of who will pay. The usual solution of passing the costs along to our children through borrowing would be a further exercise in irresponsibility.

The president has a fine line to walk, as do lawmakers from both parties. On the one hand, they shouldn't encumber federal money with so much red tape that they hamper the recovery. On the other, they must realize that this huge logistical task requires careful planning and competent decision-making.

The federal government's track record on spending after disasters is a disaster in itself.

The Department of Homeland Security's inspector general reported in May that $31 million poured into Miami after Hurricane Frances last year, even though that storm passed well to the north.

The Associated Press uncovered examples of companies as far afield as South Dakota receiving loans for businesses hit on 9/11.

This woeful record argues for the immediate creation of centralized oversight body headed by a reconstruction czar of national stature. This body would decide which tasks are so critical they merit no-bid contracts and which can wait for a more cost-effective and transparent process. It would also have to begin addressing some thorny issues — such as levee improvements, whether the government should help rebuild uninsured facilities, the role of private insurers, and whether parts of New Orleans should be rebuilt at all.

If Bush wants to recover from the political hit he has taken, he would do himself and the Katrina-ravaged region a favor by showing his administration more out in front of these issues than it was on the storm itself.

Rice Defends Bush's Race Record And Calls For Rebuilding Fairly (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

DOJ_NMG_0004434

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, defending President Bush's record on racial issues, said yesterday that the hurricane disaster that disproportionately struck poor blacks in New Orleans "gives us an opportunity" to rectify historic injustices that she experienced as an African-American growing up in the South.

"When it's rebuilt, it should be rebuilt in a different way than it was at the time that this happened," Ms. Rice said in an interview at The New York Times, adding that "maybe now on the heels of New Orleans" there could be an effort to "deal with the problem of persistent poverty."

Ms. Rice spoke about a wide range of foreign policy issues, but seemed to speak most vehemently when she was asked what she told foreign leaders wondering about racial discrimination and poverty in the United States at a time when the Bush administration was promoting democracy around the world.

"You go to any other meeting around the world and show me the kind of diversity that you see in America's cabinet, in America's Foreign Service, in America's business community, in America's journalistic community," Ms. Rice said. "Show me that kind of diversity anyplace else in the world, and I'm prepared to be lectured about race."

When talking to foreigners about the hurricane victims, Ms. Rice said, she tells them: "Yes, we have a problem when race and poverty come together. We really do. It's a vestige of our history. It's a vestige of the Old South in this case. But don't misread that there has been no progress on issues of race in America."

Ms. Rice, who was born and spent her childhood in Birmingham, Ala., and who flew to Mobile two weekends ago to visit hurricane victims, rarely ventures into domestic political matters but has spoken many times over the last 10 days of those affected as victims of generations of poverty and racial discrimination.

"This is a part of the country I'm from," Ms. Rice said. "It is a place where there are pockets - by no means all of the Old South, but pockets - where race and poverty come together in a very ugly way."

But Ms. Rice rejected as "poisonous" any suggestion that President Bush himself would discriminate racially against any victims of the hurricane and said that his record on education, including aid to historically black colleges and the setting of standards for schoolchildren, demonstrated that he believed passionately in racial equality.

"I find it very strange to think that people would think that the president of the United States would sit deciding who ought to be helped on the basis of color, most especially this president," she said. "What evidence is there that this is the case? Why would you say such a thing?"

Ms. Rice said she was first impressed by Mr. Bush in the 1990's, not because of any foreign policy issues, but because he spoke of "the soft bigotry of low expectations" and the phrase meant something to her. She recalled being told by a high school teacher "that maybe I was junior college material" and added:

"I know about the soft bigotry of low expectations. And it's not in this president. It is, however, deeply ingrained in our system, and we're going to have to do something about it."

Bush's Approval Rating Drops To New Low In Wake Of Storm (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Richard Morin

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Touring devastated portions of New Orleans yesterday, President Bush sought to reassure the public that the government is responding to Hurricane Katrina with equity and dispatch, even as his standing hit record lows amid broad support for an independent investigation of the federal response to the storm.

A new Washington Post-ABC News poll found that clear majorities of Americans disapprove of the way officials at all levels of government are handling the recovery from Katrina. A 54 percent majority disapproved of Bush's response to Katrina, while an even larger majority -- 57 percent -- say state and local officials should bear responsibility for the problems.

Attitudes toward Bush and the government's overall response to Hurricane Katrina fracture along clear racial lines. Nearly three in four whites doubted the federal government would have responded more quickly to those trapped in New Orleans if they had been wealthier and white rather than poorer and black, the poll found. But an equal share of blacks disagreed, saying help would have come sooner if the victims had been more affluent whites.

More than six in 10 blacks -- 63 percent -- said the problems with the hurricane relief effort are an indication of continuing racial inequity in this country, a view rejected by more than seven in 10 whites, according to the poll.

Speaking to reporters after touring New Orleans yesterday, Bush sought to dispel the view that race played a role in the government's response to the disaster. "When those Coast Guard choppers, many of who were first on the scene, were pulling people off roofs, they didn't check the color of a person's skin," Bush said. "They wanted to save lives."

Bush vowed that the massive federal response, which already has received funding of more than $62 billion and involves more than 71,000 federal personnel on the ground, would be managed fairly. "The storm didn't discriminate, and neither did the recovery effort," he said, adding: "The rescue efforts were comprehensive, and the recovery will be comprehensive."

The bungled response to the hurricane has helped drag down Bush's job-approval rating, which now stands at 42 percent -- the lowest of his presidency -- in the Post-ABC poll and down three points since the hurricane hit two weeks ago. Fifty-seven percent disapprove of Bush's performance, a double-digit increase since January.

Even some members of Bush's own party appear to have lost faith in their leader: The president's overall approval rating among Republicans has declined from 91 percent in January to 78 percent in the latest poll.

Overall, half the country now characterizes Bush as a "strong leader" -- down 12 points since May of last year. And the proportion who say he can be "trusted in a crisis" likewise has fallen from 60 percent to 49 percent now.

The survey found that 76 percent of the public favors an investigation of federal storm response efforts by an independent commission similar to the one that probed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The proposal drew strong bipartisan support: 64 percent of all Republicans and 83 percent of Democrats favored creating the independent panel.

Republican leaders in Congress already have announced plans for a congressional inquiry into the federal storm response -- a probe that seven in 10 Americans fear will "get bogged down in partisan politics," according to the poll. Bush also has vowed to lead an investigation of the federal response.

"It's really important that as we take a step back and learn lessons, that we are in a position to adequately answer the question: 'Are we prepared for major catastrophes?' " Bush said in New Orleans yesterday.

In the aftermath of what likely will be the most costly natural disaster in U.S. history, six in 10 Americans want lawmakers to delay action on pending legislation that would cut federal taxes by an estimated $70 billion over the next five years. Those proposed cuts include eliminating the inheritance tax, a Bush priority that supporters now say faces an uncertain fate. Half of all Republicans joined with two-thirds of Democrat to support delaying proposed tax cuts.

Although there is a bipartisan consensus on some issues, on others Americans continue to view the federal response to the hurricane through a partisan lens. More than six in 10 Americans are critical of the federal government response to the storm , including 79 percent of all Democrats and 41 percent of Republicans.

And half the public says the bigger problem is that people failed to take the storm warnings seriously, while nearly as many said the bigger problem was the failure of government to provide transportation to those in the path of the storm.

The poll was conducted with 1,201 randomly selected adults, in an interviews between Sept. 8-11. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

Amid continuing criticism of his handling of the crisis, Bush yesterday wrapped up a two-day tour of the devastated Gulf Coast -- his third visit to the region since Katrina struck. After spending the night aboard the USS Iwo Jima, which is docked in New Orleans and is serving as a command center for the relief effort, Bush began his day with a briefing on storm recovery efforts before touring New Orleans in a military convoy.

He was joined by two vocal critics of the federal government's response to the storm: New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D) and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D).

Bush, who later met with other local officials near New Orleans before surveying storm damage in Gulfport, Miss., played down any differences with the mayor and governor, saying he wanted to cultivate close cooperation across all levels of government. "We got a lot of work to do, a whole lot of work to do," Bush said. "And my pledge again to the governor and the mayor is the federal government will work closely in coordination with their authorities."

Bush aides privately view the latest poll numbers with gloomy realism but take heart from Bush's past ability to push the Republican Congress to follow his lead even when his popularity has flagged. Despite his political problems, they note, the Senate seems almost certain to confirm John G. Roberts Jr. as the next chief justice.

"We're facing some stiff political headwinds," said one senior official who asked not to be named in order to speak candidly. "But George W. Bush has never been a president who's dominated in approval ratings. Where he's been strong has been in two areas -- getting his agenda through and helping the Republican Party in elections."

Others are not so sure the end is near. Even if Bush impresses the country with a more vigorous effort in the Gulf Coast and the story fades from the headlines, some strategists noted that the rest of the political terrain contains little encouraging for the White House.

"The most frightening thing for the White House might be that his numbers on the economy are worse than his numbers on Katrina," said Joel P. Johnson, a former senior adviser in the Clinton White House. "The only way for a president to reverse bad poll numbers is to work your way out of them . . . on economic issues, foreign policy issues, creating jobs, providing health care -- all things that don't look likely."

Views Of Whites, Blacks Differ Starkly On Disaster (USAT)

By Susan Page And Maria Puente

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — There is a lot that Americans agree about in the wake of Hurricane Katrina: that government agencies initially stumbled but are doing better now, for one, and that more money and attention should be paid to addressing the issue of poverty.

But a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday finds a stark racial divide on other issues, including attitudes toward the hurricane's victims, the performance of President Bush and the reasons the government's early response was so wanting.

Six in 10 African-Americans say the fact that most hurricane victims were poor and black was one reason the federal government failed to come to the rescue more quickly. Whites reject that idea; nearly 9 in 10 say those weren't factors.

In New Orleans, Bush on Monday said race played no role. “My attitude is this: The storm didn't discriminate and neither will the recovery effort,” he said. “When those Coast Guard choppers . . . were pulling people off roofs, they didn't check the color of a person's skin. They wanted to save lives.”

But Rae Clifton, 52, a Web designer in Atlanta who is black and was among those surveyed, is certain that race and class did count. “If it had been a 17-year-old white cheerleader who was caught in the water, somebody would have tried to get there faster,” she says. “But because it was poor people … caught in a situation, it was, ‘OK … we'll get there after a while.' ”

Craig Betts, 54, a white man from Amityville, N.Y., disagrees. “Fifty years ago it would have been something else, but things are better now” when it comes to equal treatment regardless of race, he says. He attributes the problems to the unpredictable nature of the storm.

The racial divide — which underscores the different perspectives whites and blacks have on some aspects of life in America — could affect the debate over addressing poverty and rebuilding the Gulf Coast in the hurricane's wake.

“Some of the concern I'm hearing (from blacks) is that New Orleans is going to be rebuilt but gentrified in such a way that they can't go back,” says Michael Fauntroy, a political scientist at George Mason University who has studied relations between blacks and the GOP. The administration needs to allay those fears or risk “long-term negative consequences,” he says.

In any case, Republican efforts this year to reach out to black voters have not been helped. In the survey, African-Americans by 74%-16% have an unfavorable opinion of the GOP. By more than 3-to-1, they say Bush doesn't care about black people. By more than 2-to-1, whites say he does.

The poll of 1,005 adults has a margin of error of +/- 3 percentage points. Additional African-Americans were interviewed to provide a more statistically reliable comparison; the survey of 262 blacks has a margin of error of +/-7 percentage points. The sample of 848 whites has a +/-4 point error margin.

Overall, the president's job-approval rating is 46%, essentially the same as the 45% rating in the Gallup Poll 10 days earlier.

That's at odds with record-low ratings of 38% in a Newsweek poll and 39% in an AP-Ipsos poll, both released on Saturday. An ABC News-Washington Post survey released Monday put Bush's approval rating at a record low 42%.

One possible reason for the discrepancy: The USA TODAY survey was taken later than the Newsweek and AP polls, though the timing coincided with the ABC poll. In the past few days, whites and blacks agree that things on the ground have begun to improve.

Still, the surveys show that Americans' emotions are the most intense they've been since the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington four years ago.

If Katrina has affected Americans' views of themselves, it also affected views of the USA from around the world.

Even from friends, the reaction has been shock. “Anarchy in the USA,” headlined The Sun, Britain's largest newspaper. “Apocalypse Now” said Germany's Handelsblatt daily. “(Al-Qaeda leader Osama) bin Laden, nice and dry in his hideaway, must be killing himself laughing,” France's left-leaning Liberation newspaper said.

For a country that prides itself on its resourcefulness and take-charge aplomb, these are unfamiliar accusations. Americans tend to see their country as compassionate and competent.

Yet Katrina's devastation laid bare some uncomfortable facts: The nation that rescued Europe in World War II, helped Bosnians when they were under attack and repulsed Iraqi forces from Kuwait could not, at least initially, rescue New Orleans. The nation that claims many of the world's wealthiest people also is home to staggering poverty. The nation that champions equal rights around the globe has not resolved its own racial tensions.

And the nation that often leads the rush to help other countries during disasters now is receiving offers of aid from even the poorest nations, such as Bangladesh, which pledged $1 million. Mexico — usually on the receiving end of U.S. disaster relief — sent a convoy of army vehicles and troops across the border into Texas with food, water and medicine for Katrina victims.

It was the first Mexican military operation on U.S. soil since 1916, when soldiers under Gen. Francisco “Pancho” Villa staged a brief raid into New Mexico.

British-born journalist and conservative pundit Andrew Sullivan grew up admiring America as the nation that rescued Europe from Nazis and communists. “Part of the collective shame is that this didn't happen this time in America itself — at least quickly enough,” he says on his blog at andrewsullivan.com.

That, plus such scandals as the abuses in U.S. military prisons in Iraq, damages the “core” American values, Sullivan says. “It will take time to restore that kind of reputation and, yes, honor.”

Americans felt strong emotions as they watched New Orleans flood and its residents struggle.

Nearly everyone has been paying attention to Katrina; 96% of those surveyed by USA TODAY say they are following the story closely. That's a higher level of interest than for any news event of the past quarter-century except the 9/11 terrorist attacks and the start of the Iraq war.

Almost all Americans, 98%, say they felt sadness as they watched. Overwhelming majorities of whites and blacks say they felt shock, too, and anger.

“It just took my breath away,” says Gloria Weis, 75, of Burnsville, Minn. “I couldn't believe what I was seeing and hearing. All that devastation, and why?”

Why were so many trapped?

One in four of those surveyed blame the mayor of New Orleans; another one in four blame the residents themselves. One in five blame the Bush administration.

But blacks are much more likely than whites to hold the federal government responsible. Whites are much more likely to hold the residents responsible.

Images of the looters shown grabbing food, water and TV sets also split along racial lines. Whites by 50%-44% say most of those involved were criminals taking advantage of a situation. Blacks by 77%-16% say they were mostly desperate people trying to find a way to survive.

“We live in a great land, a land of opportunity,” says Gilda Hutcheson, 59, a retired railroad worker in Morrow, Ga., who responded to a request for comments on usatoday.com. “If black leaders would spend as much time encouraging people to be self-reliant as they spend encouraging the free handouts from the government, then the people left in New Orleans would have had the means and opportunity to have bought that $50 bus ticket and have gotten out ahead of the storm."

That sort of attitude is disturbing to the Rev. Fleming Rutledge, an Episcopal priest and author.

"Whether they were conscious of it or not, viewers were absorbing the message: 'This is the everlasting lot of black people, and maybe some of them have brought this on themselves by being poor, by being semi-literate, by being overweight,' " she wrote on PBS' Religion & Ethics NewsWeekly website. "But we should all be clear-eyed about this: Our vaunted American and Christian values will be tested more strongly in this situation than they have been in a very long time."

American politics may be tested as well. There's wide public support for an independent investigation into the government's slow initial response — 7 of 10 endorse that idea — though many are inclined to feel that congressional Democrats and Republicans are spending too much time at the moment trying to finger-point. About 4 in 10 say they don't have much confidence in the government's ability to respond to natural disasters or terrorist attacks next time.

And there are concerns about the economic effects ahead. Eight of 10 say their family finances will be hurt by the aftermath of Katrina, which comes on top of worries about high gasoline prices. Americans are more pessimistic now about the economy's future than at any time during Bush's presidency: 50% predict the economy will be poor a year from now.

And Bush?

His strongest political asset — the perception that he is a strong and decisive leader — has eroded to the lowest rating of his presidency, 52%. That's 8 points lower than in the previous poll, and 23 points lower than immediately after 9/11 — when his response reshaped Americans' views of Bush.

A majority of Americans say the president doesn't display good judgment in a crisis, doesn't inspire confidence and doesn't "care about the needs of people like you."

The rebuilding efforts ahead will take place in the White House as well as along the Gulf Coast, says Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas. "This goes right to the core of his strength and right to the core of the thing that has enabled him to stay plausible despite the political partisan divide in the country," Buchanan says of Bush. "Now he's in damage control big time."

Blacks Suffering Over Race Or Class? Some Of Both. (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, September 13, 2005

It wasn't long after the tortured images of thousands of black men, women and children holed up in the Louisiana Superdome and Morial Convention Center started appearing on TV newscasts that talk of an old conundrum surfaced.

Was it the color of their skin or their place in society that made the suffering among that city's blacks so great? The race or class question pits those who believe that racism is the root cause of much that ails blacks against those who say it is their economic and social condition that is the problem.

More often than not, the answer splits along predictable fault lines. Many liberals — especially blacks — see racism as the culprit. Conservatives, by and large, think it's the lifestyle choices of poor blacks that lock them into the underclass.

I think it's a combination of both. But as with most mixtures, one is more dominant than the other.

Anyone who saw the television footage of black looters hauling away appliances and TV sets is right to believe that the criminal behavior of some blacks has more to do with the hand life deals them than does the color of their skin.

But to view the mindless acts of a few thugs in the same way as the taking of food and drink by the larger body of blacks misses an important distinction. The vast majority of blacks were simply trying to survive — a struggle that was impacted more by race than by class.

Before Hurricane Katrina struck, New Orleans' population was 67% black, but a whopping 84% of the city's poor were black. Many whites lived in neighborhoods at the highest elevations. Most blacks lived in the lower-lying areas of the city. According to The New York Times, 35% of black households in New Orleans didn't own a car. In other words, blacks lived in neighborhoods that were hardest hit by the flooding — and were less likely to have an automobile to escape.

In New Orleans, as in much of the rest of this country, race defines class. It was the poor in New Orleans who had the most difficulty evacuating. It was the poor who were forced to resort to looting to feed themselves and their families while being left stranded by the incompetence of government officials. It was the poor who made up the bulk of those who were housed for days in the Superdome and convention center without much food, water, medical help or police protection. And most of the poor in New Orleans are black.

Poverty is the new Jim Crow. It is a subtler — but no less hurtful form of racism. Last year, a quarter of all blacks in this country lived below the poverty level, compared with less than 9% of whites. The South, where the majority of blacks live, is the nation's poorest region. That's not a chance relationship.

"For a variety of well-documented reasons, poverty is disproportionately experienced among minorities," writes Michael Stoll, a UCLA professor for Public Policy, in a paper he will present this week at a "Colors of Poverty" conference sponsored by the University of Michigan.

Stoll says there is a relationship between where people live and their level of poverty. Poverty is higher in central cities than in suburbs. "Location," he says, influences the access people have to "good schools, decent housing, crime-free neighborhoods, productive contacts and other benefits that help shape, determine or constrain access to opportunity."

If that sounds as if Stoll thinks "class" is to blame for what happened to poor blacks in New Orleans, you're wrong. "If you press me, I have to say that race played more of a role in how fast" the government came to the aid of that city's blacks, he told me.

I couldn't agree more.

End Of The Bush Era (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

The Bush Era is over. The sooner politicians in both parties realize that, the better for them -- and the country.

Recent months, and especially the past two weeks, have brought home to a steadily growing majority of Americans the truth that President Bush's government doesn't work. His policies are failing, his approach to leadership is detached and self-indulgent, his way of politics has produced a divided, angry and dysfunctional public square. We dare not go on like this.

The Bush Era did not begin when he took office, or even with the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. It began on Sept. 14, 2001, when Bush declared at the World Trade Center site: "I can hear you. The rest of the world hears you. And the people who knocked these buildings down will hear all of us soon." Bush was, indeed, skilled in identifying enemies and rallying a nation already disposed to action. He failed to realize after Sept. 11 that it was not we who were lucky to have him as a leader, but he who was lucky to be president of a great country that understood the importance of standing together in the face of a grave foreign threat. Very nearly all of us rallied behind him.

If Bush had understood that his central task was to forge national unity, as he seemed to shortly after Sept. 11, the country would never have become so polarized. Instead, Bush put patriotism to the service of narrowly ideological policies and an extreme partisanship. He pushed for more tax cuts for his wealthiest supporters and shamelessly used relatively modest details in the bill creating a Department of Homeland Security as partisan cudgels in the 2002 elections.

He invoked our national anger over terrorism to win support for a war in Iraq. But he failed to pay heed to those who warned that the United States would need many more troops and careful planning to see the job through. The president assumed things would turn out fine, on the basis of wildly optimistic assumptions. Careful policymaking and thinking through potential flaws in your approach are not his administration's strong suits.

And so the Bush Era ended definitively on Sept. 2, the day Bush first toured the Gulf Coast States after Hurricane Katrina. There was no magic moment with a bullhorn. The utter failure of federal relief efforts had by then penetrated the country's consciousness. Yesterday's resignation of FEMA Director Michael Brown put an exclamation point on the failure.

The source of Bush's political success was his claim that he could protect Americans. Leadership, strength and security were Bush's calling cards. Over the past two weeks, they were lost in the surging waters of New Orleans.

But the first intimations of the end of the Bush Era came months ago. The president's post-election fixation on privatizing part of Social Security showed how out of touch he was. The more Bush discussed this boutique idea cooked up in conservative think tanks and Wall Street imaginations, the less the public liked it. The situation in Iraq deteriorated. The glorious economy Bush kept touting turned out not to be glorious for many Americans. The Census Bureau's annual economic report, released in the midst of the Gulf disaster, found that an additional 4.1 million Americans had slipped into poverty between 2001 and 2004.

The breaking of the Bush spell opens the way for leaders of both parties to declare their independence from the recent past. It gives forces outside the White House the opportunity to shape a more appropriate national agenda -- for competence and innovation in rebuilding the Katrina region and for new approaches to the problems created over the past 4 1/2 years.

The federal budget, already a mess before Katrina, is now a laughable document. Those who call for yet more tax cuts risk sounding like robots droning automated talking points programmed inside them long ago. Katrina has forced the issue of deep poverty back onto the national agenda after a long absence. Finding a way forward in -- and eventually out of -- Iraq will require creativity from those not implicated in the administration's mistakes. And if ever the phrase "reinventing government" had relevance, it is now that we have observed the performance of a government that allows political hacks to push aside the professionals.

And what of Bush, who has more than three years left in his term? Paradoxically, his best hope lies in recognizing that the Bush Era, as he and we have known it, really is gone. He can decide to help us in the transition to what comes next. Or he can cling stubbornly to his past and thereby doom himself to frustrating irrelevance.

A Poverty Of Thought (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

It took exactly one month -- until the president's prime-time news conference of Oct. 11, 2001 -- to refute the notion that Sept. 11 "changed everything." When a reporter said, "You haven't called for any sacrifices from the American people," he replied, "Well, you know, I think the American people are sacrificing now. I think they're waiting in airport lines longer than they've ever had before." And that was before the sacrificing became really hellacious with the requirement that passengers remove their shoes at security checkpoints.

The idea that Hurricane Katrina would change the only thing that matters -- thinking -- perished even more quickly, at about the time Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu, a suitable symbol of congressional narcissism, dramatized the severity of the tragedy by taking a television interviewer on a helicopter flight over her destroyed beach house. "Washington rolled the dice and Louisiana lost," she said in a speech on the Senate floor that moved some senators to tears. You can no more embarrass a senator than you can a sofa, so the tears were not accompanied by blushing about having just passed a transportation bill whose 6,371 pork projects cost $24 billion, about 10 times more than the price of the levee New Orleans needed. Louisiana's congressional delegation larded the bill with $540,580,200 worth of earmarks, one-fifth the price of a capable levee.

America's always fast-flowing river of race-obsessing has overflowed its banks, and last Sunday on ABC's "This Week," Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois's freshman Democrat, applied to the expression of old banalities a fluency that would be beguiling were it without content. Unfortunately, it included the requisite lament about the president's inadequate "empathy" and an amazing criticism of the government's "historic indifference" and its "passive indifference" that "is as bad as active malice." The senator, 44, is just 30 months older than the "war on poverty" that President Johnson declared in January 1964. Since then the indifference that is as bad as active malice has been expressed in more than $6.6 trillion of anti-poverty spending, strictly defined.

The senator is called a "new kind of Democrat," which often means one with new ways of ignoring evidence discordant with old liberal orthodoxies about using cash -- much of it spent through liberalism's "caring professions" -- to cope with cultural collapse. He might, however, care to note three not-at-all recondite rules for avoiding poverty: Graduate from high school, don't have a baby until you are married, don't marry while you are a teenager. Among people who obey those rules, poverty is minimal.

In 1960 John Kennedy of Choate, Harvard and Palm Beach campaigned in West Virginia's primary and American liberalism experienced one of its regularly recurring rediscoveries of poor people, an epiphany abetted three years later by Michael Harrington's book "The Other America" receiving a 50-page review where liberals would notice it, amid the New Yorker magazine's advertisements for luxury goods. Between such rediscoveries, the poor are work for liberalism's constituencies among the "caregiving" professions.

Liberalism's post-Katrina fearlessness in discovering the obvious -- if an inner city is inundated, the victims will be disproportionately minorities -- stopped short of indelicately noting how many of the victims were women with children but not husbands. Because it was released during the post-Katrina debacle, scant attention was paid to the National Center for Health Statistics' report that in 2003, 34.6 percent of all American births were to unmarried women. The percentage among African American women was 68.2.

Given that most African Americans are middle class and almost half live outside central cities, and that 76 percent of all births to Louisiana African Americans were to unmarried women, it is a safe surmise that more than 80 percent of African American births in inner-city New Orleans -- as in some other inner cities -- were to women without husbands. That translates into a large and constantly renewed cohort of lightly parented adolescent males, and that translates into chaos in neighborhoods and schools, come rain or come shine.

This will become of intense interest to the "czar" or "czarina" -- this republic has a fascinating reflex for cloaking improvised offices with the dignity, such as it was, of defunct Russian royalty -- who is charged with "overseeing" the "rebuilding" of New Orleans. He or she can exchange notes with our "nation-builders" in Iraq, now learning conservatism's core truths about the limits of government's abilities to know and control things. Or he or she can glance at Ground Zero in Manhattan where, four years later, the "rebuilding" of a few square blocks is not going well.

Firefighter To Replace Brown As FEMA Chief (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Michael D. Brown, who was stripped Friday of his role directing the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, resigned today as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

R. David Paulison, the director of the preparedness division at FEMA and head of the U.S. Fire Administration, was named as the acting head of the agency. He has spent 30 years in fire rescue services, and was chief of the Miami-Dade, Fla., Fire Rescue Department before joining FEMA in 2001.

Brown, whom President Bush praised during the president's first visit to the storm-stricken Gulf Coast with a verbal declaration — "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" — had been director of FEMA since 2003.

During the first 10 days after the storm struck, Brown was the most visible federal official, often presenting an upbeat assessment of the region's recovery, even as television pictures, playing on a split screen, showed the scope of the floods in New Orleans, scenes of devastation, and the bodies of victims left unattended.

As Brown, who joined the FEMA staff as a deputy director at the start of the Bush administration, drew attention, questions were raised about his background. Before joining the administration, Brown, a Republican lawyer, had directed an Arabian horse association. In addition, news organizations reported that he had overstated at least two earlier jobs, presenting himself as having had experience in emergency management.

In the days following the storm and the breaching of levees that flooded 80% of New Orleans, would-be rescuers said that FEMA imposed bureaucratic obstacles to their efforts to respond to the growing disaster.

Political analysts said Brown's departure should surprise no one, considering that he was dismissed Friday as the Bush administration's point man on the Katrina relief effort and sent back to Washington, ostensibly to oversee FEMA's preparedness for other hurricanes.

His departure mutes, at least for now, the crescendo of criticism directed at Brown and FEMA for being ill-prepared for Katrina and her aftermath.

"No question this Katrina/FEMA exercise has put a mark on the Bush presidency," said Scott Reed, a Republican strategist. "Brown should have resigned last Friday and spared the Bush administration an entire weekend of being bashed. He should have seen the handwriting on the wall."

DOJ_NMG_0004442

For the White House, said Reed, who managed Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign, "Brown's resignation brings a sad chapter to a close. Now that things are improving, thanks to the military, there's still plenty of time for an upswing for Bush and his new team. But the Brown episode clearly was a setback."

Stephen Hess, a onetime White House official during the Eisenhower administration and now government professor at George Washington University, also was not surprised by Brown's resignation.

"He has come to symbolize how unprepared this administration was for this disaster, fairly or unfairly," Hess said.

Whether Brown's performance alone would hurt the Bush administration in the long term was an open question, he said, adding that Brown would unlikely end up as the only scapegoat in the debacle.

Even without any inquiries by Congress or a blue ribbon commission, he said, "it's already clear that there's plenty of blame to go around."

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) issued a six-word statement: "Long overdue. Too little, too late."

Bush Visits New Orleans, Pledges Federal Aid To Rebuild (KCS)

By Scott Dodd

The Kansas City Star, September 13, 2005

Embattled FEMA Director Michael Brown told his senior staff this afternoon that he was calling quits.

The director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency was under fire for his agency's slow and anemic response to Hurricane Katrina's devastation in the Gulf of Mexico. Making matters worse, reports started surfacing last week that his resume was padded.

Now the big question is, should the nation's top disaster chief be someone with emergency management experience or a political heavyweight – both qualities that Brown lacked.

Brown told his senior staff that he was resigning at about 3 p.m. Monday, according to FEMA press secretary Sharon Worthy, who was among those informed by Brown. She said the group of about 12 people took his resignation "professionally.''

Worthy said the agency could not respond with any further information on why Brown resigned, when it would be effective and who would replace him.

President Bush has appointed two FEMA directors – former campaign manager Joe Allbaugh and Brown, who was Allbaugh's friend and college roommate. Neither had emergency management experience before joining FEMA.

The pressure, given FEMA's response to Katrina, will be on Bush to appoint someone who has managed disasters in the past, such as James Lee Witt, who was FEMA's director under President Clinton. Witt, was Arkansas' emergency management chief, and got bipartisan praise.

He was aboard the USS Iwo Jima this morning as Bush was briefed on relief efforts.

Another option is to bring along a political heavyweight to show that the administration is now paying attention to disasters. Names such as former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and homeland security advisor Fran Townsend are among those possibilities, but the job, which carries an undersecretary of homeland security title may be too small for them.

Brown told the Associated Press he was stepping down "in the best interest of the agency and best interest of the president" three days after being recalled to Washington and relieved of command of the federal relief effort.

"The focus has got to be on FEMA, what the people are trying to do down there."

The resignation came hours after President Bush got his first close look at flood-ravaged New Orleans today, and as state health officials announced the grim discovery of 45 bodies at a hospital evacuated more than a week ago.

The victims were found Sunday at Memorial Medical Center, which had been surrounded by floodwaters, the AP reported.

Bob Johannesen, a spokesman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, said the bodies were those of patients. The 317-bed hospital is owned by TenetHealthcare Corp.

The discovery helped push the Louisiana death toll to 279 on Monday, up from 197 on Sunday, Johannesen said. More than 400 people are confirmed dead in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which struck the Gulf Coast two weeks ago Monday.

Touring the city, President Bush rebutted critics of the relief effort and pledged that the federal government will help rebuild – in whatever form the people of New Orleans decide.

Progress could be seen in some sections as floodwaters dropped. Scattered businesses were trying to reopen, and the first commercial flights are scheduled to resume Tuesday at Louis Armstrong New Orleans Airport.

But significant problems remain throughout the Gulf Coast region, including vaccine shortages, health threats and a lack of running water in many cities, including Biloxi and Gulfport.

Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, now heading the recovery, briefed the president on efforts to provide temporary housing, a day after Louisiana officials accused the federal government of dragging its feet on helping people move out of emergency shelters.

Bush denied charges that the initial rescue efforts were slow because many of Hurricane Katrina's victims were poor and black. And he called it "preposterous" to claim military manpower is stretched thin by the fighting in Iraq.

"The storm didn't discriminate, and neither will the recovery effort," Bush told reporters beneath a highway overpass after a tour in the back of a flatbed military truck. He had to duck at times to avoid hanging branches and power lines.

Bush refused to find fault with the government's performance so far, saying, "There will be plenty of time to play the blame game. … We're moving on. We're going to solve these problems. And there will be ample time for people to look back and see the facts."

For much of his visit, the president sat or stood between two people who harshly criticized the federal government in the days after Katrina struck – New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco.

Addressing the long-term future of the city, Bush said, "My attitude is this: The people of New Orleans can lay out what New Orleans ought to look like in the future … and the federal government will help."

After visiting an emergency operations center in hard-hit St. Bernard's Parish, Bush was set to make another stop in Gulfport, Miss. This is his third trip to the Gulf States since the storm, but his first tour of downtown New Orleans.

The president spent the night aboard the USS Iwo Jima, anchored in the Mississippi River.

FEMA Director Michael Brown Resigns (PPG)

By Ann McFeatters

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The White House today accepted the resignation of Michael Brown, head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, who last Friday was pulled off the job of overseeing disaster relief in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

In a statement, Brown said it was in the "best interest" of his embattled agency and the "best interest of the president" that he quit. He said it was important that he no longer be a distraction in the need to recover from the hurricane and flood damage. He said it had been "the best job in the world" to help Americans "in their darkest hour."

Within hours, word leaked that the White House has chosen R. David Paulison as Brown's replacement to head FEMA.

Paulison is head of the U.S. Fire Administration and leads FEMA's emergency preparedness force. He has more than 30 years' experience working in fire prevention and containment. The former fire chief in Miami, Paulison dealt with the aftermath of Hurricane Andrew in 1992. Paulison will be the acting director of FEMA -- if he is nominated to the directorship he must be confirmed by the Senate.

At the White House there was a sense that with Brown gone, President Bush could get his presidency back on track and repair the public relations damage done when millions of people in American and around the world began criticizing the administration for how the aftermath of Katrina was handled.

Bush, touring Gulfport, Miss., refused to comment on the resignation, saying he had not had a chance to talk to Brown or Brown's immediate boss, Michael Chertoff, secretary of the Department of Homeland Security.

Brown was deeply humiliated last Friday when Chertoff publicly relieved him of command of the disaster relief operations. Chertoff said it was so that Brown could concentrate on other duties as administrator of the agency. But in replacing Brown with Vice Admiral Thad Allen of the Coast Guard, Chertoff had the approval of the White House to signal displeasure at how long it had taken to get thousands of people out of flooded New Orleans after the levees broke.

Brown's lack of hands-on experience in disaster relief and the overstating of his credentials on his resume led a chorus of Democrats to call for his ouster last week. President Bush at first had indicated with Brown at his side that he was satisfied with Brown's performance, saying publicly, "Brownie, you're doing a heckuva job."

But as the president's job approval plummeted and pictures of dying Americans left for days without food or water or medical attention circulated around the nation, the administration began considering how to remove Brown. When Chertoff told Bush that he wanted to replace Brown and Vice President Dick Cheney agreed, the president told Chertoff to handle the situation as he thought best.

As he left Baton Rouge where he had been in charge of relief operations last week, Brown told The Associated Press, "I'm going to go home and walk my dog and hug my wife and maybe get a good Mexican meal and a stiff margarita and a full night's sleep. And then I'm going to go right back to FEMA (headquarters) and continue to do all I can to help these victims. This story's not about me. This story's about the worst disaster of the history of our country that stretched every government to its limit and now we have to help these victims."

Over the weekend, increasingly convinced he had no future in the administration, Brown, whose background is as an Oklahoma lawyer, decided to leave. As he prepared to leave his office for good, he said he wanted the media to focus on the "good things that are going on" in Mississippi and Louisiana and Alabama and not on him.

On Capitol Hill, Brown's departure was greeted with obvious relief. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi called Brown's departure long overdue. Senate majority leader Bill Frist did not criticize Brown but stressed that he was impressed with the job being done by Allen, the Coast Guard vice admiral.

Bush concluded his third trip to the damaged region yesterday, telling reporters there was plenty of time for the "blame game" and deciding how FEMA should be reorganized, if at all. "It's appropriate that we step back and look" at the process, he said in New Orleans.

Answering questions from reporters, he denied that aid was delayed because so many victims in flooded New Orleans were poor and black. "The storm didn't discriminate and neither will the recovery effort. The rescue efforts were comprehensive. The recovery will be comprehensive."

He also insisted relief efforts weren't hampered by the fact that 11,000 National Guard troops are deployed in Iraq. "We've got plenty of troops to do both. It is preposterous to claim that the engagement in Iraq meant there weren't enough troops."

Asked about Brown's resignation in Gulfport, Miss., he said he had "been working" thanking people for their work in relief efforts and had not talked to either Chertoff or Brown. He said he would make calls when he was back on Air Force One.

Bush plans to go to New York tomorrow in advance of his speech Wednesday to the United Nations and will meet with a number of foreign leaders. Asked if he was ready to switch to foreign policy issues from the hurricane, he said, "I can do more than one thing at one time."

Brown Steps Down As FEMA Chief (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon, Steve Levine, Christopher Cooper, Michael Corkery, Betsy McKay and Thaddeus Herrick

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

Michael Brown, the embattled director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency who was reassigned Friday from his post spearheading relief operations on the Gulf Coast, has resigned.

"The focus has got to be on FEMA, what the people are trying to do down there," Mr. Brown told the Associated Press. "I think it's in the best interest of the agency and the best interest of the president to do that and get the media focused on the good things that are going on, instead of me."

Mr. Brown had become a lightning rod for criticism over the government's slow and bungled response to the hurricane. On Friday, Mr. Brown's boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, said he was sending Mr. Brown back to Washington "to return to administering FEMA nationally" and to oversee the government's response to other disasters. (See a timeline1 of Brown's management of Katrina relief.)

That move was widely seen as a precursor to Mr. Brown's eventual departure especially given that some members of Congress said that a reassignment wasn't enough. Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and three other senators said in a letter to President Bush on Friday that Mr. Brown's "continued presence in this critical position endangers the success of the ongoing recovery efforts."

The White House picked a top FEMA official with three decades of firefighting experience as his replacement. R. David Paulison, head of FEMA's emergency preparedness force, is Mr. Bush's choice to replace Mr. Brown as head of the relief agency, two senior administration sources say.

The news came as New Orleans slowly and painfully stirred back to life two weeks after being slammed by Katrina.

The bodies of more than 40 mostly elderly patients were found in a flooded-out hospital in the biggest known cluster of corpses to be discovered so far in hurricane-ravaged New Orleans. The exact circumstances under which they died were unclear, with at least one hospital official saying Monday at least a few of the patients were dead before the storm, and another saying the rising temperature in the hospital afterward likely contributed to some of the deaths. The announcement raises Louisiana's official death toll to nearly 280.

Meanwhile, business owners in the central business district were issued passes into the city Monday to retrieve vital records or equipment needed to run their companies. Traffic was heavy on the only major highway into the city that was still open, and vehicles were backed up for about two miles at a National Guard checkpoint in Westwego, a suburb across the Mississippi River from New Orleans. There were also signs of life at businesses elsewhere in the city, after a weekend in which trash collection began and the airport reopened to cargo flights.

Mr. Bush got his first up-close look at the destruction in New Orleans on Monday, taking a tour that took him through several flooded neighborhoods. Occasionally, he had to duck to avoid low-hanging electrical wires and branches.

Mr. Bush denied there was any racial component to people being left behind after the storm, despite suggestions from some critics that the response would have been quicker if so many of the victims hadn't been poor and black.

"The storm didn't discriminate and neither will the recovery effort," Mr. Bush said. "The rescue efforts were comprehensive. The recovery will be comprehensive."

It was Mr. Bush's first exposure to the on-the-ground leadership of his new hurricane relief chief. The federal response to the disaster has been roundly criticized as sluggish and inept. In a sign that Mr. Bush is growing weary of the accusations, he testily replied to a reporter who asked whether he felt let down by federal officials on the ground.

"Look, there will be plenty of time to play the blame game," he said. "That's what you're trying to do. You're trying to say somebody is at fault. And, look, I want to know. I want to know exactly what went on and how it went on, and we'll continually assess inside my administration."

Mr. Bush said Congress should consider whether the federal government should have more authority to step into disaster areas without a request from the states. "All of us want to learn lessons," he said.

Mr. Bush also clarified his now-criticized remark that no one had anticipated the levees being breached. He said he was referring to that "sense of relaxation in a critical moment" when many people initially thought the storm hadn't inflicted heavy damage on the city.

Emergency Airlifts Suspended

Meanwhile, in Washington, FEMA said it's suspending its emergency airlifts of hurricane victims to distant states as it reassesses the needs of the storm victims.

"The big evacuation is over," spokeswoman Kathy Cable said. She said more than 22,000 evacuees had been relocated in less than 72 hours. People who need to get to their families in a distant location will be sent on commercial flights, Ms. Cable said.

Mr. Bush, on a two-day visit to hurricane-affected areas, started the day with a briefing on the federal response effort aboard the 844-foot USS Iwo Jima, a command center for military operations. The slideshow presentation, which covered the latest relief and recovery efforts in three states, was conducted in the ship's ward room by Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, who replaced Mr. Brown as federal hurricane commander last Friday.

White House chief of staff Andrew Card said "I have great confidence" in the team now running the federal effort.

Mr. Bush toured the flooded city in a convoy of military trucks. Later, he will tour hard-hit surrounding parishes by helicopter, touching down to meet with local leaders, and then will travel to Gulfport, Miss.

DOJ_NMG_0004446

It was Mr. Bush's first up-close look in the two weeks since Katrina smashed into the Gulf Coast and drowned this storied city. The trip is Mr. Bush's third and longest to the disaster area, and it came as the White House is eager to show the president displaying hands-on, empathetic leadership in the storm effort. More than half of respondents in an Associated Press-Ipsos poll last week said he is at fault for the slow response.

Mr. Card said Mr. Bush's repeated visits have tangible value: "It reminds people of the mission at hand."

Signs of Improvement

Though 50% of New Orleans remains flooded and teams are still working to recover the dead, there are signs that hopelessness is beginning to lift two weeks after Hurricane Katrina plowed ashore. Law and order has been restored to New Orleans and looting curtailed; the Superdome and city convention center, the scene of so much misery while storm evacuees waited for busses for days with no food and water, are empty; the water level is going down as workers begin to drain the city; and some power is being restored.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez urged business leaders Monday to invest in the Gulf Coast, saying the private sector must play a major role in rebuilding the hurricane-devastated area. In a speech at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Gutierrez said businesses should look at the region as an economic opportunity.

"I hope businesses will consider investing and locating enterprises in the rebuilding zone," he said. "Only then will the region be truly reborn."

The Bush administration said that it's considering adjusting high tariffs imposed on such items as soft-wood lumber from Canada and cement from Mexico if building needs from Katrina cause prices to spike.

Treasury Department spokesman Tony Fratto said that the administration has the executive authority to adjust tariffs to meet special needs. The tariffs have been in place for a number of years since the U.S. lumber and cement industries won cases accusing importers of selling those products at unfairly low prices, a practice known as dumping.

Separately, the Labor Department announced Monday that it was creating a Web site to help people who have lost jobs due to Katrina find new work.

Thousands of Displaced Students

Meanwhile, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said Monday that Katrina forced at least 372,000 school children to flee the Gulf Coast, and there are no clear answers yet on where the money will come from to educate these students.

In Louisiana, more than 247,000 public and private school students have been displaced, 489 schools have been closed and at least six parishes have destroyed or damaged buildings. In Mississippi, more than 125,000 students have been forced elsewhere. A total of 226 schools in 30 districts are closed in that state, and almost 30 schools have been destroyed.

Ms. Spellings declined to estimate how much it will cost states to rebuild devastated districts or serve displaced students -- or how much the federal government will cover. President Bush has charged Ms. Spellings to come up with a plan to provide aid for the states, some of which are absorbing an influx of students just as the school year begins.

Despite some signs of progress, criticism of the relief efforts continues.

A Louisiana official on Sunday criticized FEMA's progress12 on providing temporary housing for hundreds of thousands of the state's residents displaced by Katrina. "There should be trailers rolling and things happening that are not happening fast enough," said Col. Jeff Smith, deputy director of emergency preparedness for the Louisiana Office of Homeland Security and Emergency Preparedness. "We've asked them to start thinking outside the box and it just hasn't been happening."

James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman, acknowledged that just 10 families not involved with Katrina relief efforts have moved into temporary housing in Louisiana so far. Still, he said the agency is moving "as quickly as possible," deploying thousands of mobile homes and moving families into trailers in Mississippi and Alabama. Thousands of trailers are ready for deployment from a staging area in Baton Rouge, while more than 400 displaced families from the Slidell, La., area are moving into trailers.

An estimated million people along the Gulf Coast have been displaced by the hurricane, about half of them from the New Orleans area.

On Saturday, officials announced that FEMA has paid $669 million nationwide to families affected by Katrina. The agency has registered 573,262 households nationwide for benefits, agency spokesman Ed Conley said, explaining that the figure includes singles and families. The government is also ramping up a low-interest loan program through the U.S. Small Business Administration, which can provide as much as $1.5 million to a business and $40,000 to individuals.

Authorities raised Louisiana's death toll to 197 on Sunday, and the recovery of corpses continued. Teams pulled an unspecified number of bodies from Memorial Medical Center, a 317-bed hospital in uptown New Orleans that closed more than a week ago after being surrounded by floodwaters. But authorities said their first systematic sweep of New Orleans found far fewer bodies than expected.

Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, who heads the military's Joint Task Force Katrina, said Sunday that over the next three days, officials should learn how many people died in New Orleans. He said the preliminary figure of 10,000 offered last week by some officials was "a number we'd be very happy to be wrong about."

Severe Environmental Damage

With water receding from some of the most heavily damaged areas of New Orleans, it's becoming increasingly clear that Hurricane Katrina has left a major environmental mess in its wake.

Assessment teams and local emergency officials have identified at least six serious oil spills and numerous smaller incidents in southern Louisiana, but they are most concerned about a leak of an estimated 672,000 gallons of crude oil from a storage tank at a Murphy Oil Corp. refinery, some of which seeped into densely populated neighborhoods on the southeastern outskirts of New Orleans.

Federal officials told area leaders in private meetings over the weekend that they have designated the location around the Murphy refinery in Meraux in St. Bernard Parish as a "hot zone," or a potentially deadly hazard. Official access to the area has been restricted, but reporters from The Wall Street Journal who drove through city streets in the area saw block after block of homes within a mile of the refinery that had been inundated with what appears to be a mixture of oil and mud. Streets and much of the ground are covered in several inches of oozing muck.

The company believes most of the spilled oil was trapped behind a containment dike around the storage tank, and "we don't think very much oil got out of our refinery property, as far as we can tell," says Kevin Fitzgerald, a Murphy spokesman. The Coast Guard says Murphy Oil estimated 672,000 gallons of crude oil leaked out of the partially filled, 3.6 million gallon storage tank. The company says the tank may have dislodged from its foundation during the flood, floated as far as 15 feet and was punctured. Murphy Oil says the containing wall around the tank was damaged during the storm, causing an unknown amount of oil to spread into the neighborhood.

Crude oil contains several harmful substances, including benzene, says Lynn Goldman, a professor of environmental health sciences at the Bloomberg School of Public Health at Johns Hopkins University. Dr. Goldman said that the oil could seep into storm drains and sewers and spread through the city. "Literally the environment around the city would become polluted from it," she says.

The Coast Guard says it is helping clean up as many as six separate oil spills in Louisiana, including the one in Meraux. The other spills occurred along the Louisiana coast, south of New Orleans at facilities owned by Chevron Corp., Royal Dutch/Shell and others. Most of the discharged oil -- totaling more than 5.4 million gallons, according to the Coast Guard -- was contained by retaining systems around the storage tanks, although there was some reported leakage beyond the protective walls. (By comparison, the 1989 Exxon Valdez spill in Prince William Sound in Alaska was about 11 million gallons.)

Other areas of concern to environmental officials in New Orleans include a federal Superfund site near the Industrial Canal where a school and housing were built on top of a former landfill. That area was underwater for days. Before the hurricane, cleanup crews had removed soil that may have been contaminated with arsenic and lead and capped the area with a special covering.

Embattled Brown Resigns As Fema Chief (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

Michael Brown, the man who had become the public face of blunders made by the Bush administration in responding to Hurricane Katrina, on Monday bowed to the inevitable and resigned.

DOJ_NMG_0004448

His decision follows an embarrassing public dressing down on Friday, when he was relieved of command of events as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (Fema) and sent back to Washington.

His departure represents a rare resignation by an official of the Bush administration, which does not like admitting mistakes. It comes a week after President George W. Bush praised his handling of the crisis, saying: "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job."

The president intends to designate R. David Paulison of Florida to become the acting head of Fema, the White House said in a statement. The appointment of Mr Paulison, who has more than 30 years of fire and rescue experience, marks the second promotion of an official with disaster management experience rather than political connections. On Friday Thad Allen, a coast guard vice-admiral, took over ground operations in Louisiana from Mr Brown.

Mr Brown's resignation also followed Mr Bush's efforts to hit back at criticism over the federal response to Katrina. On Monday Mr Bush firmly denied that the number of National Guard troops in Iraq had undermined relief efforts.

"We've got a lot of troops to do both. It is preposterous to claim that the engagement in Iraq meant that there weren't enough troops here, pure and simple," he said after meeting emergency workers and surveying damage in New Orleans.

Mr Bush also defended a comment made shortly after the flood, when he told a television news programme: ''I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees." Multiple studies had consistently warned of the likely local impact of a severe hurricane.

"When that storm [initially] came by, a lot of people said we had dodged a bullet – there was a sense of relaxation at a critical moment," Mr Bush said on Monday. "I knew a big storm was coming on Monday. I pre-signed an emergency declaration, which by the way was extraordinary. Most presidents sign it after the storm." The images of largely poor African-Americans, who bore the brunt of the disaster, has prompted widespread criticism that race had played a role in the slow response.

"My attitude is that the storm didn't discriminate and neither will the recovery effort," he said yesterday. "They [rescuers] wanted to save lives." Amid continued criticism of the bungled co-ordination between federal and local authorities, Mr Bush acknowledged the need for Congress to "take a good close look at what went on and what didn't go on".

Head Of FEMA Steps Down (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Embattled Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown resigned Monday. Hours later, President Bush announced his replacement, a career firefighter with three decades of disaster-response experience.

"This was a catastrophic disaster, and in every disaster, there are mistakes, and it's not always smooth and pretty," Brown said of Hurricane Katrina. "I'm at ease knowing I was doing everything I could."

Bush named R. David Paulison to replace Brown. Paulison has led FEMA's U.S. Fire Administration since December 2001, according to a biography posted on FEMA's website. He led FEMA's emergency preparedness force in 2003-04 and is a former Miami firefighter.

Brown had been under fire for what his critics, including Democratic Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu, called a failure to get federal help to victims of Katrina fast enough.

Brown's limited experience in disaster relief was an issue, too. Before joining FEMA in 2001, Brown was head of the International Arabian Horse Association.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan praised Brown's work but did not mention Katrina. "The president appreciates Mike Brown's service," he said. "Mike has done a lot of great work on a number of hurricanes."

Bush was in New Orleans, viewing the disaster area in an open truck that sloshed through flooded, stench-filled neighborhoods caked in mud.

"My impression of New Orleans is this: that there is a recovery on the way," Bush said.

The Army Corps of Engineers said the fixing of two major pumps meant the city will be drained by Oct. 8, ahead of schedule. Nearly two-thirds of Louisiana's water treatment plants had restarted, and the city's airport plans to resume passenger service today.

Bush rebuked those criticizing the response to what he called America's worst natural disaster. “There will be plenty of time to play the blame game,” he said.

The confirmed death toll in Louisiana rose to 279 on the news that 45 bodies had been found in a flooded hospital in New Orleans. It was not known how many of those people died before Katrina hit.

FEMA Chief Brown Resigns (REU)

Reuters, September 12, 2005

The director of the U.S. Federal Emergency Management Agency Michael Brown resigned on Monday after being recalled to Washington amid criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

In an apparent nod to demands that Brown be replaced by someone with experience in emergency response, President George W. Bush replaced Brown with David Paulison, a veteran firefighter who now runs FEMA's preparedness division.

Paulison was also the Homeland Security official who urged Americans to stock up on duct tape and plastic sheeting in 2003 to protect against a biological or chemical attack, a recommendation that was widely ridiculed in the media.

Brown, who was widely criticized for a slow federal response to the devastating Hurricane Katrina, resigned effective immediately.

"Today I resigned as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency," said Brown, who ran the organization since 2003. "As I told the president, it is important that I leave now to avoid further distraction from the ongoing mission of FEMA."

In an ABC News interview, Brown defended the agency's response to the crisis and said the United States needed to have a debate about FEMA's role in national emergencies.

"We're not a first responder agency. We're there to coordinate and help people prepare and coordinate in times of disaster. And so if the country wants us to be more, then we should have a great public policy debate whether that's true or not," Brown said.

Brown was pulled out of Gulf Coast operations on Friday and replaced on the ground with Vice Admiral Thad Allen of the U.S. Coast Guard.

Bush had praised Brown for doing a "heck of a job" in the first days of the disaster that killed hundreds in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama and displaced 1 million people. He later was pressed by Democrats and others to fire Brown.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Bush discussed Brown's resignation with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on the way home from visiting the Gulf Coast area.

"The president appreciates Mike Brown's service," McClellan told reporters aboard Air Force One. "This was Mike Brown's decision. This was a decision he made."

Shortly after Brown's resignation, Bush named Paulison, the former Miami fire chief with 30 years of fire rescue service experience, as acting FEMA director.

Chertoff said Brown had done "everything he possibly could" to respond to the hurricane and flood in New Orleans. He also said he would name more people to senior positions at the agency in the coming days.

Brown was a close friend of Joe Albaugh, the previous FEMA head who was Bush's chief of staff when he was Governor of Texas, and the National Campaign Manager for Bush's 2000 election campaign.

Brown served as commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association before joining FEMA in 2001. He has been accused of exaggerating his background in disaster relief in his official biography and resume.

Democrats praised the change but said the administration needed to ensure that the country was capable of responding to another major disaster.

Republicans in Congress have initiated an investigation into what went wrong with the government's initial response to Katrina.

New FEMA Chief Takes Center Stage After Years In Wings (USAT)

By Peter Eisler And Mimi Hall

USA Today, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004450

WASHINGTON — R. David Paulison, the new head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, is a seasoned disaster-response expert who has spent years as a behind-the-scenes administrator. Yet he redefined the nation's emergency preparedness with just five words: duct tape and plastic sheeting.

In a small briefing with reporters in 2003, it was Paulison who urged Americans to stock up on those hardware store staples so they could seal windows and doors in a biological or chemical weapons attack. The advice became a staple of late-night comics, who usually misattributed the comment to Tom Ridge, then secretary of Homeland Security.

The Bush administration hasn't put Paulison in front of reporters much since then.

Now, he steps into a lead role directing federal response to one of the nation's worst natural disasters, taking over a Hurricane Katrina relief effort that has been condemned widely by state and local officials as sluggish and inadequate.

"I appreciate his willingness to take on the vital task of leading FEMA during this challenging time," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Monday in announcing the appointment. FEMA is part of the Department of Homeland Security.

Paulison, a Democrat, was flying back from the Gulf Coast on Monday and was unavailable for comment on his new appointment.

Paulison began his career as a firefighter and worked his way up to chief of South Florida's Miami-Dade County Fire Rescue Department, a 1,900-member, $200-million operation. He helped lead the emergency response to Hurricane Andrew in 1992 and the 1996 ValuJet crash in the Everglades. He's also a past president of the International Association of Fire Chiefs and a certified paramedic.

James Burns, New York State Fire Administrator and president of the National Association of State Fire Marshals, called Paulison "a great choice" for the FEMA job.

"He's been in the field, he's been operational, and he knows how to react to emergency situations," Burns said. "He knows how to organize, and he knows how to make things happen."

In 2001, President Bush appointed Paulison to head the U.S. Fire Administration, an agency that studies and promotes fire safety, trains firefighters and administers federal grants to local fire departments.

When the Department of Homeland Security was created in 2003, Paulison was tapped to head FEMA's emergency preparedness efforts.

Paulison's long background in emergency management contrasts with his predecessor, Michael Brown, who had little experience in emergency services and planning at the local level before taking over FEMA. Brown resigned as FEMA director on Monday after Chertoff relieved him of his duties overseeing federal relief efforts in the region devastated by Katrina. The move came amid criticism of Brown from Democrats and Republicans.

Brown said Monday that Paulison faces a mammoth task overseeing the highly politicized federal response to the unprecedented damage wrought by Katrina. "He's walking in at a very difficult time."

Some officials who criticized Brown's leadership of FEMA during the recovery operation were optimistic about Paulison's appointment.

"With new capable leadership, FEMA can again lead the way in saving lives and saving communities," said Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., a critic of FEMA's response to Katrina. "But Mr. Paulison must also quickly surround himself with similarly experienced professionals. … Regaining the confidence of the American people through actions, not press releases, will be job one for David Paulison."

Pick As Acting FEMA Leader Has Disaster Relief Experience (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - To replace Michael D. Brown at the head of the nation's emergency agency, President Bush reached out to a manager who, at least on paper, is different in some important ways.

R. David Paulison, chosen on Monday to take temporary control of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, started out in the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department at the age of 19, rising through the ranks over three decades to become chief.

Unlike Mr. Brown, who was widely criticized for lacking hands-on emergency relief experience, Mr. Paulison has a history in hurricanes: He took over the Miami Fire Department two months before Hurricane Andrew hit South Florida in 1992, destroying the homes of many of his firefighters.

Mr. Paulison, who was named Florida Fire Chief of the Year in 1993, is a past president of the International Association of Fire Chiefs, putting him in the ranks of top emergency professionals.

At least on one political score, he departs from the typical Bush administration faithful: As of four years ago, he was a registered Democrat, according to an article in The Miami Herald at the time. That creates at least the perception that he is independent of the administration's political machine - unlike Mr. Brown, who got his job on the recommendation of a former senior campaign adviser to Mr. Bush, Joe M. Allbaugh, an old friend from college.

Since shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Mr. Paulison has been the head of the national fire administration, a division within FEMA. In taking over the entire agency - at least on a temporary basis - Mr. Paulison joins Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, who took over the federal response to Hurricane Katrina last week after the initial effort faltered under Mr. Brown.

"FEMA needs that type of leadership, especially now," said Peter G. LaPorte, the former director of the Massachusetts and Washington, D.C., emergency management agencies.

Mr. LaPorte said Mr. Paulison, who will be acting director of FEMA as well as acting under secretary for emergency preparedness and response, "understands both disaster response and recovery."

"Katrina is not over, and there's lots to be done, and we're still in hurricane season," Mr. LaPorte said. "It's a good choice. It's a fast choice, and that's important, too. You need to understand the whole system of emergency management, and that's why having a practitioner is important."

President Bush chose Mr. Paulison at the recommendation of Michael Chertoff, the director of the Department of Homeland Security, White House officials said.

Mr. Paulison, who does not need to be confirmed by the Senate because he is becoming FEMA's temporary director, has been confirmed by the Senate once, for his post as administrator of the U.S. Fire Administration. In that job over the last four years, Mr. Paulison has testified before Congress, and also helped the administration make the transition as FEMA was enveloped into the newly created Department of Homeland Security.

"David Paulison is well-respected and someone who is a familiar face to the White House, having previously been through a Senate confirmation," Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, said Monday.

Mr. Chertoff issued a similar statement.

"I appreciate his willingness to take on the vital task of leading FEMA during this challenging time," Mr. Chertoff said in a statement announcing the shuffled roles.

Representative Elijah E. Cummings, Democrat of Maryland, called Mr. Paulison "a leader who brings extensive emergency management experience to this position."

Brown Out, Paulison In (AP)

By RON FOURNIER

The AP, September 12, 2005

Federal Emergency Management Agency director Mike Brown resigned Monday, three days after losing his onsite command of the Hurricane Katrina relief effort. The White House picked a top FEMA official with three decades of firefighting experience as his replacement.

R. David Paulison, head of FEMA's emergency preparedness force, will lead the beleaguered agency, according to three administration sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because the announcement had not yet been made.

Paulison is a career firefighter from Miami who was among emergency workers responding to Hurricane Andrew in 1992 and the crash of ValuJet Flight 592 in the Florida Everglades in 1996, according to a biography posted on FEMA's Web site. He also has led the U.S. Fire Administration since December 2001, according to the site.

As chief of the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department, Paulison led 1,900 personnel under a $200 million operating budget. He was also in charge of Dade County's emergency management office, according to his biography.

Paulison will lead an agency that has been under fire for its response to the Katrina disaster. Local officials and members of Congress have cited confusion and a lagging response to the Gulf Coast devastation.

Brown had taken much of the heat and was relieved of his onsite command on Friday. In an interview Monday with The Associated Press, Brown said he resigned "in the best interest of the agency and best interest of the president." He said he feared he had become a distraction.

"The focus has got to be on FEMA, what the people are trying to do down there," Brown said.

His decision was not a surprise. Brown was abruptly recalled to Washington on Friday, a clear vote of no confidence from his superiors at the White House and the Homeland Security Department. He also was accused of padding his resume, which Brown has denied.

The president ducked questions about Brown's resignation. "Maybe you know something I don't know. I've been working," the president said to reporters on an inspection tour of damage in Gulfport, Miss. Bush said he planned to talk with Brown's boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, from Air Force One on the flight back to Washington.

"There will be plenty of time to figure out what went right and what went wrong," Bush said.

Polls show most Americans believe Bush could have done more to help Katrina's victims, though they also blame leaders of Louisiana and New Orleans. Bush's overall job approval rating is at the lowest point of his presidency.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi called Brown's departure long overdue.

"His resignation is the right thing for the country and for the people of the Gulf Coast states," Pelosi said in a statement.

Brown, who said he last talked to Bush five or six days ago, said the resignation was his idea. He spoke Saturday to White House chief of staff Andrew Card, who did not request his departure, according to Brown.

"I'm turning in my resignation today," Brown said. "I think it's in the best interest of the agency and the best interest of the president to do that and get the media focused on the good things that are going on, instead of me."

Shortly after Brown was recalled to Washington last week, officials close to the FEMA director said he would probably resign. They said that even before Katrina, Brown had been planning on leaving the administration late this fall to go into the private sector.

Paulison Is Skilled At Disasters (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

R. David Paulison, appointed yesterday as acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, has encountered disaster before: three months before Hurricane Andrew laid waste to part of South Florida in 1992, he became chief of the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department.

When one of the nation's worst natural disasters hit, he helped direct rescue and response efforts for the county even as 400 firefighters were made homeless by the storm.

Paulison was not available for interviews yesterday, FEMA spokeswoman Nicol Andrews said. But in testimony during his Senate confirmation hearing in 2001, Paulison said he headed Miami-Dade County's Office of Emergency Management and had handled hazardous materials spills, floods, tornadoes and deadly accidents such as a 1996 jetliner crash into the Florida Everglades.

"Whether in response to a major fire, as incident commander for Hurricane Andrew or in response to the crash of ValuJet 592, I have seen firsthand the need for communication and cooperation during the planning, response, recovery and rebuilding phases after disasters," Paulison told the Senate Commerce Committee.

International Association of Fire Fighters General President Harold A. Schaitberger, whose organization Paulison formerly headed, said Paulison "not only has the administrative experience and skills that you need at the bureaucratic level, he really understands what the troops need on the front line."

Currently U.S. fire administrator and head of FEMA's division of preparedness, Paulison has a long list of emergency management credentials and was confirmed by the Senate for his current job. Those are two key considerations for an administration scrambling to rebut criticism that it has stocked the agency with unseasoned political appointees and de-emphasized natural disaster preparedness.

In a brief written statement, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said he appreciated Paulison's "willingness to take on the vital task of leading FEMA during this challenging time."

"Regaining the confidence of the American people through actions, not press releases, will be job one for David Paulison," said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), who praised Paulison's appointment as "great news" and called on him to surround himself with experienced professionals. She said he must "turn his attention to what went wrong in the federal response to this tragedy and make sure it can never happen again."

Under a pending reorganization announced by Chertoff, the FEMA division that Paulison headed would be removed from the agency and merged into a new homeland security section responsible for emergency preparedness and planning.

In 1971, Paulison became a firefighter with the North Miami Beach Fire Department, which was absorbed by the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department in the early 1980s. He worked as a rescue lieutenant, battalion commander, district chief of operations, division chief, assistant chief and deputy director for administration before becoming chief, according to his FEMA biography.

Chertoff said he would make additional FEMA appointments "in the days ahead," including a new, permanent deputy FEMA director.

After Days Of Criticism, Emergency Director Resigns (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - Three days after being stripped of his duties overseeing the post-hurricane relief effort, Michael D. Brown resigned on Monday as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, saying that he wanted to avoid distracting the agency at a time when it faces a major challenge.

The White House quickly named R. David Paulison to succeed Mr. Brown on an acting basis. Mr. Paulison, a former firefighter, has been director of the agency's preparedness division for the past two years.

In contrast to Mr. Brown, who had relatively little experience dealing with disasters and emergency response before joining FEMA, Mr. Paulison has spent his career in the field, having been chief of the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department before joining the federal government in 2001 as administrator of the United States Fire Administration.

In an interview Monday night, Mr. Brown said that he felt that his role had become an obstacle to the agency's work.

"The press was too focused on what did we do, what didn't we do, the whole blame game," he said. "I wanted to take that factor out of the equation, so that the people at FEMA, who are some of the most hard-working, dedicated civil servants I have ever met, could just go do their job."

Mr. Brown, 50, said he had felt no pressure to resign. He said he made his decision on Sunday with his family after a long conversation on Saturday night with Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff.

"Andy was very, very supportive of me," Mr. Brown said.

He said he planned to "take some time to just rejuvenate the old battery" before considering his options.

Mr. Brown's departure was hardly surprising, given the decision, announced on Friday, to remove him from management of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Brown had become a political liability to the White House, even in his constrained new role. Democrats in Congress had been questioning how the administration could retain him in such an important job as director of FEMA after his performance in responding to the hurricane.

A poll taken over the weekend by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, a nonpartisan research organization, found that more than 6 in 10 respondents judged the federal government's response to be fair or poor. A variety of polls in recent days have found Mr. Bush's approval ratings at or near their lows, with his support eroding even among Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0004454

Asked about Mr. Brown's resignation after he toured a school in Mississippi on Monday afternoon, Mr. Bush declined to comment. He told reporters, "Maybe you know something we don't know."

He pointedly brushed off questions about how Mr. Brown and the administration had handled the storm, saying "don't ask me again" about the subject.

"Here in Mississippi and in Louisiana, people want to move forward," Mr. Bush said. "They understand there's time to try to blame somebody. But they want to get their lives back together."

Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, later told reporters aboard Air Force One on the trip back to Washington that Mr. Bush was informed on Monday morning of Mr. Brown's resignation but was not sure when asked about it whether the decision had been made public.

The decision was welcomed by many Democrats in Congress. But they said it would not deter them from seeking an aggressive independent inquiry into the federal response to the storm.

"Long overdue; too little, too late," said a statement from Senator John Kerry, Mr. Bush's opponent in the 2004 presidential race.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said: "I'm glad he's gone. But that doesn't end the problems with this administration and their action."

Mr. Brown is among a relative handful of officials who have left the Bush administration under pressure. In an interview with ABC News on Monday after the announcement of his resignation, he defended his performance and suggested that the nation needed to decide what role it wanted FEMA to play.

"We're not a first-responder agency," Mr. Brown told ABC. "We're there to coordinate and help people prepare and coordinate in times of disaster. And so if the country wants us to be more, then we should have a great public policy debate whether that's true or not."

Brown Quits As Head Of FEMA (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Embattled Federal Emergency Management Agency director Michael D. Brown resigned yesterday after being criticized for the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Brown said he had not spoken with President Bush since early last week, but decided to resign after a conversation Saturday with White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr.

"I think it's in the best interest of the agency and the best interest of the president to do that and get the media focused on the good things that are going on, instead of me," Mr. Brown told the Associated Press in announcing his resignation.

Mr. Bush named R. David Paulison, administrator of the U.S. Fire Administration within FEMA, to serve as acting director of FEMA. Mr. Paulison has 30 years of fire rescue services experience and was chief of the Miami-Dade County Fire Rescue Department in Florida.

FEMA became a lightning rod for frustrated flood victims as well as state and local officials, who blamed the agency when fresh supplies failed to materialize several days after levees broke and isolated New Orleans. The Red Cross and Salvation Army have blamed the state for not allowing rescue workers and supplies into the city.

On Friday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff replaced Mr. Brown with Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen as head of recovery operations, fueling speculation that Mr. Brown was on his way out. Agency staffers hinted that the director had planned to resign after the hurricane season ended in November.

Mr. Chertoff had said Mr. Brown had other responsibilities and needed to return to Washington from the Gulf Coast.

Mr. Bush was visiting hurricane victims in Gulfport, Miss., yesterday when reporters asked him to respond to the resignation. The president, who looked surprised at the news, declined to comment.

"I was spending time with people, so I can't comment on something that you may know more about than I do," Mr. Bush said. "There will be plenty of time to figure out what went right and what went wrong."

Some Democrats said Mr. Brown was right to resign, but others continued to criticize Mr. Bush for not firing the director.

DOJ_NMG_0004455

"Michael Brown's departure from FEMA is long overdue, and his resignation is the right thing for the country and for the people of the Gulf Coast states," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

Mr. Brown's resignation mattered little to hurricane victims, who say it won't bring them needed relief any quicker.

"The guy is not very organized," said Juan Manson, who was waiting for FEMA assistance after his New Orleans home was destroyed. "But the guy in charge resigning, and then getting a new guy, how does that help me? Does it give me a check? No."

Mr. Paulison's biography said his emergency management experience includes Hurricane Andrew in 1992 and the 1996 crash of ValuJet Flight 592 in the Everglades.

A Major Test For FEMA And Its Contracting Crew (WP)

By Griff Witte And Charles R. Babcock

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

The Federal Emergency Management Agency will receive most of the $62 billion Congress has approved for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, setting up a major test of the agency's ability to distribute the cash and monitor the private contractors who will do much of the work.

FEMA's track record in managing much smaller amounts of money has raised concerns. It made millions in questionable payments to South Florida residents after Hurricane Frances last year, investigators found, in part because the agency's contractors had hired inspectors who lacked training or oversight. A recent audit by the Homeland Security Department's inspector general questioned whether FEMA's acquisition workforce was qualified.

The agency has already begun awarding hundreds of millions of dollars in no-bid Katrina contracts under loosened government rules designed to get relief and rebuilding efforts underway quickly. As the money begins to flow, some fear the agency could become overwhelmed. "They've never spent anything even remotely on this scale. So the real question is going to be what kind of controls are in place," said Bill Jenkins, who monitors FEMA for the Government Accountability Office. "There are going to be fraudsters coming out of the woodwork."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chair of the Senate's Homeland Security Committee, said through an aide yesterday that she is considering creating a special inspector general to oversee and audit Katrina-related spending.

The last time the government spent a massive amount of money under emergency conditions, for the war in Iraq, it set off a frenzy among contractors jockeying for work. Investigators with the special inspector general's office set up to oversee Iraq spending later found numerous cases of questionable costs.

Contractors are already lining up for Katrina money. Yesterday, the Army Corps of Engineers said that, on FEMA's behalf, it would award $1.5 billion in contracts for debris removal this week. Also yesterday, Blackwater USA, known for its work supporting military operations in Iraq, said it would provide 164 armed guards to help provide security at FEMA sites in Louisiana.

Last week FEMA gave out hundreds of millions of dollars worth of contracts to engineering and construction firms to build an estimated 300,000 temporary housing units. Those contracts were awarded without competition under rules that allow agencies to bypass normal procedures during an emergency. Several went to companies that have been major financial supporters of the Bush administration. One firm , Shaw Group Inc., of Baton Rouge, is on the client list of lobbyist and former FEMA director Joe M. Allbaugh, though he has said he does not get involved with contracts.

Shaw also was picked last week by the Corps for a $100 million contract, with one of its first tasks to pump floodwater out of New Orleans. The agency contacted two other companies to generate competition for the work, a Corps contracting official said yesterday, but only Shaw responded.

At FEMA, outsourcing to the private sector is nothing new. The agency has long made contractors a central part of its emergency plans on the thinking that it isn't a good use of tax dollars to maintain a large staff for sporadic work. When disaster strikes, the agency, with help from the Corps of Engineers, has contracts that can be activated to bring in food, water and manpower.

But FEMA insiders and some who have worked with the agency say it has grown increasingly reliant on contractors in recent years not just for help in responding to disasters, but for planning and policymaking as well. It's a trend that's been augmented, they say, by the departure of FEMA's top civil servants and the arrival of political appointees with little disaster management experience.

"Some of the best and the brightest high-level technocrats are at the contracting firms," said Claire B. Rubin, a researcher at George Washington University who has studied disasters for decades. "They used to work for FEMA. And now FEMA needs them back."

Last spring, the Homeland Security Department's inspector general's office audited the FEMA staff that manages its contracts and found it "impossible to determine whether the acquisition personnel met training, education, and experience requirements." As a result, the auditors concluded, "FEMA may be at risk that its acquisition workforce is not qualified."

At the time of the audit, 51 full-time acquisition workers were managing hundreds of millions of dollars in contracts. Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said yesterday that contracting officials are ramping up to handle the extra work, and that the department's IG office has received additional funding to closely monitor Katrina contracts.

Some of the agency's approximately 2,500 full-time employees feel the reliance on contractors is driving away the agency's best talent. Last year, Pleasant Mann, then-president of the union representing FEMA headquarters workers, wrote a letter to congressional leaders warning that the nation was becoming more vulnerable. "The ability of FEMA to manage emergencies and disasters is being seriously eroded," he wrote. "Our professional staff are being systematically replaced by politically connected novices and contractors who have now 'burrowed in' to civil service jobs."

FEMA insiders said a no-bid RAND Corp. contract to help the Homeland Security Department develop the definitive plan for how the nation would respond to an emergency illustrates just how pervasive the contractors' role has become. The National Response Plan was mandated by the White House after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Rather than turn to FEMA employees to craft the new document, according to those familiar with the process, the agency tapped RAND for the work. But the contractor's first draft was rejected by state and local emergency responders who felt the contractor hadn't incorporated the lessons learned from previous disasters.

"There were a lot of things not considered. And I think that was from the fact that the contractor was not a practitioner [of emergency response]," said Dewayne West, president of the International Association of Emergency Managers, a group of local first responders. "So they kind of said, 'We're going to can this one. Let's start over.' "

Bruce Don, a RAND senior researcher who worked on the project, called the experience "frustrating" and said government officials were resistant to change.

FEMA spokespeople did not return multiple calls over several days seeking comment.

RAND's role was subsequently reduced, and government officials wrote the final document. It became the basis for the government's efforts to manage during Hurricane Katrina.

Whether the lackluster response to Katrina was because of the plan or in spite of it will undoubtedly be the subject of numerous reviews, government officials said. So, too, will the issue of contractor performance.

Thousands of people went for days without adequate food and water at the Superdome, at the New Orleans convention center and on rooftops throughout the flooded region, according to news reports, though it is unclear who was to blame .

On the Friday before Katrina hit, Lipsey Mountain Spring Water, FEMA's bottled water supplier, got a call from the Army Corps of Engineers and began shipping truckloads to the region, according to President Joe Lipsey III. The contract calls for the Norcross, Ga., company to get water to sites within 24 hours, and Lipsey said he has developed a nationwide network of 170 suppliers to help.

The first trucks headed toward Pensacola, Fla., he said. But when the storm turned west, the Corps directed Lipsey's deliveries to three federal installations in Mississippi and one in Louisiana. From those staging areas, he said, Corps officials direct where it is delivered. So far Lipsey's network has delivered the equivalent of 198 million half-liter bottles of water, compared with 140 million during the nine-week period last year when four hurricanes hit Florida, he said. Lipsey, a Louisiana native, said despite the criticism, the agency and the Corps "are doing an incredible job," especially given the flooding and breaks in the bridge and highway system.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the ranking minority member on the Senate committee overseeing FEMA, said last night that he has discussed with Collins the idea of a special IG to monitor Katrina spending. "Congress has to be very aggressive in making sure that in our haste to help we aren't wasting an enormous amount of public money, or worse, having it used in a way that's corrupt," he said.

Goodbye, 'Brownie' (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

No one will be sorry or surprised to learn that Michael D. Brown, formerly the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, intends to spend more time with his family. Mr. Brown will be forever remembered as the man who, at the height of the New Orleans evacuation crisis, appeared not to know that 25,000 people were crammed into the city's convention center without food, water or toilets, despite television reports broadcasting that fact for the previous 24 hours. Since then, his qualifications -- which mostly consist of a long stint running horse shows, as well as a useful friendship with a friend of the president -- have sparked a good deal of righteous indignation. But Mr. Brown's parting words are worth heeding. "The focus," he said yesterday, "has got to be on FEMA."

We agree -- although we would add that the focus should be on presidential attention to FEMA, as well as congressional oversight and funding of FEMA, and not on FEMA's position in the federal bureaucracy. Last week, a gaggle of mostly Democratic lawmakers proposed bills that would, among other things, move FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security, making it once again a separate agency, and give it Cabinet-level status. Yet most of the bad decisions made about FEMA over the past several years -- budget cuts, the plan to take away its preparedness function, as well as the decision to staff it with presidential cronies instead of experts -- could have occurred even if FEMA had remained in the Cabinet: After all, presidents have been known to ignore their Cabinet members, too.

By the same token, some of those decisions could have been prevented, even with FEMA buried deep in the bowels of DHS, had anyone in the White House or Congress taken the agency's agenda more seriously. As we wrote yesterday, Mr. Brown received only a 42-minute Senate confirmation hearing when he was nominated to be deputy director of FEMA, and no hearing at all when he became its boss. The White House, preoccupied with al Qaeda, and former Homeland Security secretary Tom Ridge, preoccupied with airline security, were clearly unperturbed by the threats posed by hurricanes and floods.

Without question, there is an overlap between preparations for a terrorist attack and preparations for a natural disaster. There are also good reasons why people who know about public health, people who organize emergency logistics, people who understand the effects of radiation, and people who can coordinate first responders and the National Guard should run into one another in office corridors. What matters is not where those corridors are but the quality of the people themselves. Congress and the administration should now focus hard on R. David Paulison, head of FEMA's emergency preparedness force, who has been nominated to replace Mr. Brown. A former Miami-Dade County fire chief who helped Florida cope with Hurricane Andrew, Mr. Paulison may be qualified. But before coming to that conclusion, it would help if Congress and the White House take a bit more than 42 minutes to find out.

What Ails FEMA? (WT)

By Mike Walker

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Don't blame FEMA's great professional, dedicated and unselfish employees for what happened in New Orleans. FEMA did not fail in the early response because of these great Americans. They were totally focused on responding to the tragedy and saving lives. Nor did FEMA fail because of an over-emphasis on terrorism prevention. FEMA did fail because of a lack of effective leadership and its refusal to adapt to the new realities of the post-September 11 world.

Two years ago in a lecture at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, California, I told students that FEMA was not capable of adequately responding to a major hurricane, let alone a catastrophic terrorist attack. My comments were based on an assessment that morale at FEMA was then the worst since the agency was created. The very people the nation depended on to help out during our time of greatest need were being demoralized by an indifferent, inexperienced leadership that neither understood emergency management nor had the skills to ensure the agency had the resources to meet its all-hazard mission.

Since my lecture, things have only gotten worse. Seasoned emergency managers began retiring in droves, frustrated by an inaccessible leadership at the top that has neither understood what FEMA is all about, nor has been able to effectively fight for

FEMA's resource requirements inside the Department of Homeland Security and the Office of Management and Budget. When Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf region, FEMA's most seasoned battlefield commanders were no longer working at the agency.

Many mistakes were made in New Orleans at every level of government. The City of New Orleans failed to fully implement its evacuation plans for those who had no automobile or had special needs. The State of Louisiana was unable to effectively support local law enforcement and quell unrest in the city. But, arguably, the biggest mistakes were made by the director of FEMA. The president and Secretary Michael Chertoff could only act on the information that was made available to them.

In the past dozen years, I have participated in several New Orleans hurricane exercises. All of those exercises utilized a slow-moving category 3 scenario because the Army Corps of Engineers said the levee system was only built to withstand a category 3 hurricane. That alone would still result in several feet of water in large portions of the city. A category 4 or 5 would most probably breach the levees and create catastrophic flooding, putting a premium on early and complete evacuation.

The director of the National Hurricane Center has stated that his office made it clear to federal, state and local emergency management that the levee system could fail when Hurricane Katrina made landfall. Knowing that, the federal government had an obligation to be more proactive than it was on the front end of Hurricane Katrina, including providing strong professional technical advice to timid state and local officials.

The administration had put the mechanisms in place for success. In January, the final National Response Plan (NRP) was approved by every department and agency of the federal government. The FEMA director failed to use the NRP from the beginning of this incident. Why the catastrophic nature of Hurricane Katrina was not recognized before landfall when the National Weather Service said it would be above a category 3 is inconceivable. The FEMA director knew the levees would most likely be breached. Or maybe he didn't. The old hands were no longer there to tell him.

Had the FEMA director recommended the federal government declare an "incident of national significance" before landfall, as is permitted in the plan, when it was clear Katrina would be a catastrophic hurricane, the NRP Catastrophic Incident Annex could have been triggered. That would have permitted FEMA to stage massive levels of aid in the region, including buses, even if the governor had not yet requested specific help. By failing to expeditiously utilize the established NRP mechanisms, FEMA was left to implement its traditional response and await state requests. The FEMA director did not embrace the DHS post-September 11 mechanisms but instead followed his own ad hoc approach that left FEMA unprepared.

The problem at FEMA is not a structural problem. FEMA did not fail because it is now part of the Department of Homeland Security. Making FEMA an independent agency again would only further complicate the nation's ability to shape the agency into a 21st century, forward-leaning, truly all-hazard response agency. But the next director of FEMA must understand emergency management. He must appreciate his people. He must listen to his state and local partners. And, most importantly, he must understand FEMA's role in the post-September 11 world.

Those who think we have overemphasized terrorism in the wake of September 11, should be concerned with a knee-jerk reaction to Katrina. What we need is balance. We must be prepared to respond to both terrorism and natural disasters. The FEMA I know is capable of rising to the occasion and accomplishing both missions.

Acts of God will never destroy our great country. But that is exactly what radical Islamic terrorists want to do. We must never forget that fact. No doubt, the terrorists have been emboldened by what they have seen on TV in the last several days.

Mike Walker is a former deputy director of FEMA and former acting secretary of the Army.

What Are The Lessons Of Katrina? (WSJ)

By George Melloan

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

In answer to the question above, there are many lessons, but because of bureaucratic realities, most will not be applied to the disasters of the future. Yet here are a few for what they might be worth:

First, the blame game is missing the mark. George W. Bush is being accused by his natural enemies of everything from being asleep on the job to racism. But his real error came long before Katrina, when he and Congress created a Department of Homeland Security (DHS) in response to 9/11.

After a disaster, politicians want to "do something." Striking back at U.S. enemies was essential and Mr. Bush did that against al Qaeda with the enthusiastic approval of Congress, launching the war that continues today with considerably less support. The DHS also had overwhelming congressional approval, but was based on a flawed concept.

Creating a bigger bureaucracy to deal with the failures of two existing bureaucracies -- the FBI and the CIA -- was simply giving free rein to Beltway gluttony. The DHS has spent many billions, but when a hurricane equivalent of a weapon of mass destruction struck, the DHS was too cumbersome to respond quickly.

That leads to lesson No. 2: If an agency is meant to cope with emergencies, don't put lawyers in charge. DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff is an admirable man but former federal judges aren't trained for quick executive action. To his credit, he recovered from early fumbles by pulling fellow lawyer Michael Brown out of the front line in Louisiana and replacing him with a military man, Vice Adm. Thad Allen.

Sen. Trent Lott of hurricane-ravaged Mississippi was referring to Mr. Brown's missteps as head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency when he said: "Pencil pushers make lousy crisis managers. Michael Brown has been acting like a private instead of a general." In Mr. Brown's defense, lawyers are conditioned by training and experience to read all the rules first before taking decisive action, so the administration that hired him is at fault.

Which brings up lesson three: There sure are a lot of rules. Laws and regulations are mass-produced by regulatory agencies and all the various levels of government. In an emergency, the first response by government bureaucrats is to look at the rule book to find out what they are allowed to do. Time was wasted after Katrina struck.

Some of those limitations were built into the Constitution's limits on federal powers. President Bush could not nationalize the Louisiana National Guard without the consent of Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, which was not immediately forthcoming.

The Northern Command of the U.S. Army, set up specifically for homeland defense three years ago, also was prevented from acting immediately because the Posse Comitatus Act (circa 1878) bars the army from conducting police activities on U.S. soil without a waiver. The best army in the world was ready, with equipment and men in place, but was left waiting for orders.

On to lesson four: In the U.S. federal system, state and local governments are the first line of defense, simply because the first responders -- police, firemen, emergency medical services -- report to mayors and governors. When Katrina hit, New Orleans first responders were not up to the challenge. One-third of the police force deserted, leaving the streets to looters and felons, one reason householders and business owners were reluctant to flee the rising waters.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin panicked, leaving the city's fleet of buses sitting in the flood's path instead of using them for evacuation. He neglected to provide the thousands who fled to the Superdome and convention center with adequate police protection and supplies. Acting more the private than the general in Trent Lott's terms, Mayor Nagin instead raged to the TV cameras about the lack of federal help -- as if the feds were supposed to do his job. You're only as good as your first responders: New York rose to the occasion after 9/11; after Katrina, New Orleans didn't.

Lesson five is that the media play a central role. They and the national weather services did a great job of warning Gulf Coast residents that a big one was coming, enabling a million to flee. They were at their best, as usual, covering the suffering and destruction. But then they became involved in the political debate, as Republicans and Democrats tried to outdo each other in assigning blame, with often spurious charges.

Mayor Nagin's wild estimate of 10,000 deaths was broadcast world-wide. The death toll for all the Gulf Coast, when fully tallied, may be well below 1,000, judging from the numbers counted so far.

The media have a natural tendency to make a big story sound even bigger than it is. Politicians and bureaucrats know that the bigger the disaster, the more money is likely to be showered on them. They are being proved right by the $60 billion in federal aid envisioned so far.

But there is a good side. Katrina was indeed a huge tragedy for the many thousands of people who were displaced and whose homes in many cases are no longer there or uninhabitable. Global media coverage arouses global compassion. Governments around the world are offering help, reciprocating for the massive U.S. effort during the Asian tsunami. NATO commanders agreed in an emergency meeting to provide ships and planes to help deliver aid to the victims.

The private sector came up with the quickest responses. Drug companies sent medicine. Wal-Mart is pitching into the reconstruction effort. Families in cities near and far are taking refugees into their homes. Money and gifts are pouring in from non-governmental organizations in the U.S. and abroad. Individual acts of heroism by helicopter crews and other volunteers who helped pull people off the roofs of flooded homes are too numerous to count.

So that brings lesson number six: While America's critics cry shame about the less-than-adequate governmental response to the needs of a poor and predominantly black community, Americans acting on their own are picking up the slack. That kind of individual initiative is what has made the U.S. a great country.

Katrina's Message On The Corps (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

There has been much grumbling that Congress and the Bush administration denied the Army Corps of Engineers the money that was required to fortify New Orleans against a hurricane like Katrina. These complaints need to be pursued. Flood control is mainly a federal obligation, and the agency most responsible for it must have enough money to do the job right.

But there is another question worth asking: has the Army Corps made wise use of the money it has? Louisiana has received about $1.9 billion over the past four years for corps civil works projects, more than any other state. Although much of this has been spent to protect New Orleans, a lot has also been spent on unrelated water projects - a new and unnecessary lock in the New Orleans Industrial Canal, for instance, and dredging little-used waterways like the Red River - mainly to serve the barge industry and other commercial interests.

The Louisiana delegation, second to none in bringing home the bacon, is as much to blame for these skewed priorities as the corps is. Yet the reports of wasted dollars in Louisiana are consistent with the corps's historical profile. Studies by the Government Accountability Office, the National Academy of Sciences and others have documented that the agency has long inflated the economic payoffs of its projects to justify ever greater budget outlays, while underestimating the environmental damage caused by turning free-flowing rivers into lifeless canals and destroying millions of acres of valuable wetlands. This satisfies the corps's appetite for money and Congress's appetite for pork.

Katrina thus raises an even broader question: has the time not come, finally, to impose some real discipline on the Army Corps and its paymasters in Congress who regard it as their own cookie jar?

Both the present commander, Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, and his predecessor have promised internal reforms. But the lead must come from Congress, where enlightened reformers like Senators John McCain and Russell Feingold are pushing independent peer review for individual projects and other changes that might truly make a difference.

Unfortunately, many other senators - not just those from Louisiana - are powerfully addicted to corps projects and the votes they attract, especially Christopher Bond of Missouri, who controls the corps's budget and has single-handedly kept alive a nonessential barge industry on the Missouri River at great cost to the environment and taxpayers. To discipline the corps, Congress must first discipline itself.

The Rationale For A Scaled-Back City (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

House Speaker Dennis Hastert learned the hard way the perils of kicking a city when it's down. He was quoted in an Illinois newspaper shortly after Hurricane Katrina hit saying much of New Orleans "could be bulldozed" after the disaster, and opponents quickly silenced him with accusations of callousness and heartlessness.

The hurricane has clearly shown that New Orleans is home to energy and transportation infrastructure vital to the nation's economy. It's a city with a rich history and a vibrant cultural scene (and party life) that the nation values. And it's home to nearly 500,000 people with ties to their community. All are arguments for a big effort to get the city back on its feet quickly. History has also shown that cities have a way of bouncing back after crisis. (Think of Chicago's great fire more than a century ago.)

But some economists are starting to wonder if Mr. Hastert might have had a point about caution when it comes to rebuilding New Orleans, as poorly articulated as it might have been. It's not just the city's natural disadvantages (much of it is located below sea level) that worry economists. It's also its economic position -- rampant poverty and an exodus of people and businesses even before the hurricane touched down -- and the need to avoid creating incentives that could lead to development that is no less vulnerable.

DOJ_NMG_0004461

"We have an obligation to people, not to places," says Edward Glaeser, a Harvard professor who specializes in urban economics. "Given just how much, on a per capita basis, it would take to rebuild New Orleans to its former glory, lots of residents would be much [better off] with $10,000 and a bus ticket to Houston."

'Good Samaritan' Paradox

Economists have wrestled for years with how to address the economic consequences of natural disasters. Gary Becker, the Nobel prize-winning University of Chicago economist, says policy makers need to consider something he calls the "Good Samaritan" paradox. Just about everybody's inclination after disaster strikes is to help the victims. "It is hard for a country to sit by and watch people in miserable circumstances as a result of a disaster," he says. "It is not desirable."

However the help, and the promise of rebuilding, also gives people an incentive to keep living in disaster-prone places. Like Mr. Glaeser, he's for helping victims. But to limit the perverse incentives, Mr. Becker says any rebuilding of the place should come with tough love from the government, such as tight zoning restrictions in flood-prone areas and tough flood insurance rules.

He's not the only Nobel-winner arguing for circumspection about rebuilding New Orleans. "The best policy is not to permit rebuilding in New Orleans in the areas that are subject to flooding," says Edward Prescott, a researcher at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, who famously used flood-plain relief as an example of how seemingly sound short-run policies can skew incentives in the long-run. Richard Posner, the conservative jurist who shares an economics Web log with Mr. Becker, proposes that the city come back something like Colonial Williamsburg -- a quaint tourist site that isn't really attached to a city.

Of course, the city is highly likely to be rebuilt anyway. Besides the political momentum, the naysayers shouldn't underestimate the pressure on businesses to return, says Loren Scott, a Baton Rouge economist. Chemical firms, ship builders and energy firms have huge capital investments in the area that are of no value if they're not operating. "They're going to come back very quickly," he says.

But people might not. According to Census Bureau estimates, New Orleans's population declined by 4%, or 21,000, between 2000 and 2004, to 462,000. Among the cities with the largest populations in the nation, the only one with a larger decline during that stretch was Detroit. Some 24% of New Orleans families lived below the poverty line, according to the Census Bureau, compared to 9% nationally.

A Flight From the City

Many fled to the suburbs in search of better public schools. Some of those big investors have been fleeing as well. ExxonMobil, Shell and ChevronTexaco, for instance, have eliminated or moved hundreds of jobs to Houston in the past few years, continuing a two-decade exodus from the city. The result: Even though the energy sector is booming, New Orleans hasn't felt much of it. In 2004, private sector employment levels in the city were still below their levels of 1997.

Mr. Glaeser says very long-term issues were behind the city's pre-Katrina woes. Back in the 1840s, New Orleans was among the nation's three largest cities, along with New York and Philadelphia. Back then, water transportation was the dominant means of moving people and products, and the economy was largely agrarian. Its connection to the South and the Mississippi River made New Orleans an integral hub for commerce. Mr. Glaeser says the rise of rail travel, car travel, and industrialization over the next century changed all of that and helped to set off the city on a long, slow decline. Today's fastest growing cities, he notes, are ones like Las Vegas and Atlanta, situated for suburban sprawl and not bounded by water.

"It is a place that reached its economic peak relative to the U.S. economy 160 years ago," says Mr. Glaeser. "It certainly was not delivering a great economic future for a majority of its residents."

There is also a question of timing. Just two weeks after Katrina struck, cities like Baton Rouge and Houston are teeming with people and businesses trying to move on with their lives. By the time a reconstruction plan for New Orleans is developed and executed, thousands of people will likely have settled in somewhere else. As a reminder of how long -- and contentious -- the rebuilding process can be, four years after the Sept. 11 terror attacks on New York, the site that once housed the World Trade Center remains a scar of undeveloped land.

In these early crisis days, Washington seems in no mood for circumspection. The $62 billion pledged already to aid victims is just the first installment on a recovery bill that could reach $200 billion. But before committing billions to repairing the tragic city, these economists say policy makers should take a close look at where New Orleans has been, and make sure they don't send it back in the same direction.

The Californian Way (WSJ)

By Pete Wilson

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES -- Natural disasters, like wars, test human mettle and bring out the best in many people -- courage and selflessness, acts of heroism, and great generosity to afflicted neighbors and total strangers. Sadly, but very predictably, they also generate political opportunism and partisan finger-pointing that is worse than counterproductive. Practitioners of the "blame game" typically do far more to exploit than to assuage the pain of the victims with whom they so gaudily sympathize. Katrina has certainly been no exception, providing an especially absurd and contemptible example of charging the president with racist neglect.

Rather than point fingers, I presume to offer a few practical pointers that I hope will be useful to those who are, or may in future be, challenged to lead their constituents on the hard road back to recovery from a natural disaster.

In early 1994, a major earthquake (measuring 6.7 on the Richter scale) jolted the residents of greater Los Angeles from their slumbers and knocked houses off their foundations. Within seconds, the Northridge earthquake reduced to rubble the overpass bridges of Interstate 10, Los Angeles' major east-west artery, and thereby instantly shut down the most heavily trafficked freeway in the world. I was advised that it would require some two years and two months to repair the bridges and restore the I-10 to use. For as long as it remained unavailable, it would mean not only driver inconvenience on a dramatic scale, but delays that would translate into economic dislocation conservatively estimated to cost $600,000 per day. The interruption to the life of the nation's second largest city would be of a plainly intolerable magnitude and duration.

Instead, we completed the repairs and reopened the freeway to its normal heavy traffic in just 66 days. How? We did two things. • First, I quickly exercised the extraordinary emergency powers conferred upon the governor of California by the state Government Code. I suspended the operation of statutes and regulations which would have required the protracted public hearings called for before environmental impact reports could be filed and acted upon, and suspended other normally demanded procedural hurdles. The elimination of these legal requirements drastically reduced purposeless delays that would have impeded recovery and compounded the injury inflicted by the quake.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the need for governors to be given such clear emergency powers if they are not provided them by existing state law. • Second, we took a page from the book of private sector incentives for accelerating performance. We told contractors bidding to repair the bridges that they must submit bids that specified not only the cost but the date of completion, and that they must agree to an added condition: For every day they were late, they would incur a penalty of $200,000; and for every day they were early, they would be rewarded with a bonus of $200,000. The winning bidder, C. C. Myers, Inc., put on three shifts that worked 24/7. In order to prevent any delay in the work, they hired a locomotive and crew to haul to Los Angeles steel sitting on a siding in Texas. Myers made more on the bonus than they did on the bid.

Incentives work. The reward to the contractor in this instance was well worth the reward to the public in achieving restoration of critical infrastructure two years early. * * *

In New Orleans, all levels of government -- federal, state and local -- and the city's private sector leadership face a challenging threshold decision as to how, or even whether, to rebuild.

Who can say when the next Katrina will lash the Gulf Coast? Voices from outside the city have been heard dismissing the very notion of rebuilding a place that is 12 feet below sea level. In New Orleans, the critical infrastructure -- the system of levees -- is, in fact, far more critical than even the world's busiest freeway: Where prolonged loss of the I-10 severely impacted the functioning of L.A., the loss of the levees threatens the very survival of New Orleans.

I am not an engineer but have been advised that an engineering solution exists that would assure the reliability of the levees, even in the alluvial soil of New Orleans without the bedrock found elsewhere. That assurance of reliability is key, the prerequisite to the confidence that investors must feel if they are to be induced to rebuild the city and its economy. The rub is that the engineering solution is of such cost that it will challenge its advocates to justify that cost to opponents. Many will demand to know why taxpayers living outside the region should be forced to subsidize it.

Before dismissing that solution out of hand -- before abandoning New Orleans and retreating to the terrestrial, if not the moral, high ground -- we must exhaust all justifiable alternatives. I suggest that the needed super-levee solution will require a sharing of its cost between taxpayers and private investors. The public should do what it has done in the past to provide for a measure of flood protection where needed elsewhere in the nation.

Participation by private investors should be enabled by whatever state and federal legislation is required to authorize tax increment bonding to finance creation of new levees. It should authorize terms that will be able to attract pension funds and other institutional investors, while permitting the city to continue providing essential services. Purchase of the bonds would provide the front money for levee construction. The tax increment legally dedicated to redeem the bonds would be built up as new properties are increasingly built in New Orleans, continually adding new assessed valuation to the city's property tax base.

Tax increment bonding to finance the redevelopment of urban areas is a proven method of attracting private investors to replace blight with privately owned improvements that translate into a growing economy and employment base. I suggest that the same mechanism be employed to finance not only the land assembly for redevelopment of the ruined sections of the city, but also for the creation of the levees that have to be built if there is to be any rebuilding on the scale required to bring New Orleans back.

A final suggestion: I respectfully suggest that New Orleans consider creating a non-profit corporation to which it can delegate authority to act as the city's agent in making the complex real-estate deals that will be essential to redevelopment. San Diego did so when I was mayor, creating a non-profit with a paid staff and a board of volunteer real-estate and land-use professionals who possessed the expertise and time that the job required -- time which the City Council, though designated by state law as the city's official redevelopment agency, simply could not devote to it. Deals negotiated by the non-profit Center City Development Corporation were made subject to ratification by mayor and City Council. The result was that the pace of redevelopment of downtown San Diego remarkably accelerated. And the quality was so enhanced that our relatively modest public effort continues 30 years later to spur far greater private redevelopment. It has transformed a decaying core with a declining tax and job base into one of America's most vibrant and thriving urban environments.

I make this suggestion confident that New Orleans is blessed with the dynamic business and civic leaders needed to supply the same kind of motivation to the rebuilding of their city. I have seen this leadership in action. I am privileged to serve as member of the board of trustees of the National D-Day Museum, which Congress has designated as America's official World War II museum. It is located in New Orleans, not Washington. It is New Orleans' gift to America, so that our children and grandchildren will never forget that freedom is not free, but must be purchased with the courage and sacrifice of those willing to fight and die for it.

I am convinced that, given time and the right tools, that kind of leadership can be expected -- and should be given every chance -- to rebuild New Orleans and to make it even better.

New Orleans Officials Criticize Cleanup, Rebuilding Contracts (WSJ)

By Jeff D. Opdyke And Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- Underscoring tensions over who will control the agenda for the reconstruction of New Orleans, city leaders vented frustration that the federal government already has issued large contracts for initial cleanup and rebuilding without input from local leaders.

At a meeting of the New Orleans city council yesterday, held 80 miles away in a conference room at the state capitol in Baton Rouge, Councilwoman Cynthia Willard-Lewis, whose district includes heavily damaged New Orleans East and the Lower Ninth Ward, said she was outraged that decisions regarding the rebuilding of the city so far haven't included local leaders.

Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt told the packed meeting she was "disgusted" that an Austin, Texas, company "was cleaning the convention center," using workers brought from outside the city. Council members said local minority contractors should be playing a bigger part.

"We need to rebuild our own city with our own people," Ms. Pratt said. "Our people should be back in the city, building the temporary shelters and getting the jobs."

Last week, federal agencies announced a $100 million deal with Shaw Group Inc. of Baton Rouge, for pumping of flood water out of New Orleans and other work. Other contracts have been issued for temporary housing and repairs to certain buildings. Federal contracting officials couldn't be reached yesterday.

Addressing the council, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said the expected aid amounted to an opportunity to completely rebuild the city, and urged the group not to squabble over the first federal money to arrive. "We have to fight about the right stuff," Mr. Nagin said. "There's going to be enough money for everybody. We're talking about $50 billion to $100 billion over a 10-year period."

In the meantime, Mr. Nagin said New Orleans faces an acute financial crisis. "Our last payroll was the last cash we have," Mr. Nagin said. "We're trying to get a line of credit from the federal government....We have no money."

In comments yesterday, President Bush tried to assuage concerns that the federal government will dictate how New Orleans will be rebuilt. "My attitude is this: The people of New Orleans can design the vision; the people of New Orleans can lay out what New Orleans ought to look like in the future; and the federal government will help," he said as he concluded his visit to the city. "I think the best policy is one in which the federal government doesn't come down and say, 'Here's what your city will look like.'"

Yesterday's council meeting followed a gathering Saturday in Dallas during which about 40 prominent New Orleans business representatives and professionals offered support to Mr. Nagin, according to people who were present.

William Grace, who helped organize the meeting, said the businessmen made it clear they wanted Mr. Nagin, who attended, to urge the federal Centers for Disease Control to determine as soon as possible whether there was a health risk to opening lightly damaged parts of the city, such as the French Quarter and the central business district. Mr. Nagin promised to consult with the CDC quickly, Mr. Grace said. He said the group emphasized that they considered the first phase of the disaster over and wanted to return. Separately, New Orleans officials began efforts to allow business owners to cross military checkpoints into the city. "In certain areas, everybody wants to get back in there," Mr. Grace said. "Let's do it quick."

Mr. Grace said the meeting included a briefing from Entergy Corp., a New Orleans utility, reporting that the city's core is ready to be electrified, once workers check the areas for gas leaks. Mr. Grace said the group also pledged financial support to create a panel or hire an overseer to steer the rebuilding effort. He said he personally favored creating a czar position. "You can't run a rebuilding effort by committee," he said.

Out Of The Flood Zone But Floating In Limbo (WP)

By Lynne Duke

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

BATON ROUGE -- "I'm not in control of my life." It is the mantra of this era of post-Katrina, of Catastrophe. Loss of control: It hits Mary Kay Caiado, 45, when she tries to reclaim some sense of normalcy and finds herself facing things once unknown to her, like food stamps and laundromats.

So she's here to regroup at Starbucks. It's a vestige of her old life. A change of scenery from the Salvation Army food lines, the hotel room that is her family's new home. She has come with her daughter, mother, father, brother-in-law, niece and husband, Edward, 53.

He is at a WiFi terminal, online, trying to check their banking situation and getting more agitated as he thinks about returning to their home on Long Branch Drive in Marerro, just outside New Orleans, to stand watch for fear of looters. A retired Marine and Vietnam vet, he's in "hyper-vigilance" mode, his wife says. And you know what she means when he declares, "I'd like to buy a shotgun." (And later in the day goes off to a local gun store and picks out a pump-action Winchester.)

Caitlin, their 13-year-old daughter, mourns her jazz dance classes. "Kendall's Dance Academy," her T-shirt says. And high school -- one week and two days of the eighth grade, before Katrina hit. She misses the friends now gone -- to Texas, Florida, Atlanta. And the Siberian husky her dad gave her for her 10th birthday: He could not fit with her and her mom and grandmom, Sylvia Bourgeois, 67, in their room at the Holiday Inn. They gave Cirocco away to a local family.

"I cried because I love that dog so much," Caitlin says.

DOJ_NMG_0004465

Caitlin's cousin, Mia Trupiano, laments the band, swim team and drama club she won't be participating in for her senior year of high school. She, like Caitlin, is waiting to hear which local school will take her.

"You can't adjust, because you're just kind of, like, floating."

Her dad, Frank Trupiano, a crisis counselor, says they feel like they're "on a desert island even in the middle of civilization."

That's the rub. Civilization's all around, but the crisis of Katrina left them disconnected, unplugged. Off the grid.

Where's the mail? Where's the new school? Where's life going to land them?

Folks like them have been evacuated to cities and towns across the nation, but here in Baton Rouge they have nearly doubled the population. Federal, state and local agencies are swamped with applicants for various kinds of aid. Internet cafes, too, have drawn hordes of people searching for a way out of their mess, a way to reconnect with the grid of life they knew.

You can see them, huddled over stacks of papers or yellow legal pads. They are, often, the ones with tears in their eyes, desperation on their faces.

The Caiados aren't quite there yet.

She's a native, from a long line of French and Italian New Orleanians. He's Argentinean, raised in the United States since infancy. She is a bank officer; he is retired military and law enforcement. They have some means, though not enough for food stamps to be out of the question. Through FEMA, her company and the Red Cross, she'll patch together the funds to cover the cost of the Holiday Inn that's home for the foreseeable future.

Not knowing when they'd be allowed to move back into their home, Mary Kay Caiado tried to buy a new home up here in Baton Rouge. That's how she learned the family's hefty home equity line of credit had been cut off -- probably for fear their collateral (on Long Branch Drive) had been destroyed.

It's overwhelming, this post-Katrina life.

"You have every problem you'd have in a 10-year period in one week," she says.

"I think I'm suffering from PTSD 'cause I'm like a cat on a hot tin roof."

But actually their home isn't destroyed. Not at all. Eddie Caiado returned after the hurricane to assess the damage. The lovely brick-fronted home with blue siding still stands, virtually unscathed. In the Holiday Inn, he shows pictures of the house on a CD-ROM. He's done this every time a big storm approached the Big Easy: records the before-and-after images for insurance claims adjusters.

That's what you do (or did) in New Orleans: be ready.

"This goes to his hyper-vigilance. He's prepared to lose everything," his wife explains. He seems amused as she speaks.

So they made reservations at the Holiday Inn here and fled there before the storm -- at least most of them did. The Caiados and Mary Kay's mother decamped to the Holiday Inn. Mary Kay's in-laws, the Trupianos, went to another relative's, though Sandy Trupiano, her sister, stayed behind in New Orleans with the medical technology staff she supervises at a hospital. Frank Trupiano and his father-in-law, Joseph Provenzano, 70, ended up stuck in a truck when Katrina hit. They finally made it to Baton Rouge to join the rest of the clan.

Provenzano, a rotund gentleman who owns about 60 rental properties in New Orleans, struggled in the days after the storm to understand what he'd lost. Mary Kay tried to tell her father he wouldn't be receiving the income he once had from his real estate holdings.

"He kept saying, Well, they're not going to live in my places without paying rent," says Mary Kay. She had to tell him: Dad, there's no one there. The city's emptying out.

Mary Kay's mom, who is no longer married to Provenzano, lost property, too. Her Jefferson Parish home is flooded, ruined. Good thing she'd already taken a trove of family photos when she evacuated before the storm, along with jewelry that had been packed since Hurricane Cindy in 1999.

On a post-storm return visit, Bourgeois found mold growing over her furniture and up the walls. She grabbed her mink and a few good clothes. All that's in the trunk of her long black Lincoln Continental parked near the Caiados' truck outside the Holiday Inn where the Salvation Army serves meals.

Home. For now.

They tried to play Scrabble.

DOJ_NMG_0004466

"We couldn't concentrate," says Bourgeois.

The small desk in their room now is their kitchen counter, crammed with breads and spreads and chips and fruit. Caitlin's standing there later in the afternoon fixing her dad a ham-and-cheese sandwich.

"Nothing like starvation and mental depression to get that diet," Eddie Caiados jokes.

He suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder after a year in Vietnam, Eddie explains, and recently was treated for cancer. He's a gung-ho veteran, flying the big red Marine Corps flag from his home and sporting USMC floor mats on his car.

He's been thinking of Nam more and more of late, reminded of it by the smell of diesel fumes from all the military vehicles, by the smell of decaying food and flesh, by the thwop-thwop of those search-and-rescue choppers coursing overhead.

It's good that he can be elsewhere, because "he doesn't do well around people in closed situations," says his wife of 21 years.

Plus, he's got to have his own private "potty time," he jokes, much to his wife's horror. Caitlin rolls her eyes at her dad's off-color humor.

He's been losing weight, going back to the house to sit vigil, with no protection (till the shotgun arrives) and no electricity, until it finally returned on Sunday. He's spent his days cutting up a tree that fell and clipped a small corner of the roof. He's been clearing the brush and otherwise showing his face in fear that a home left abandoned is a home to be picked clean by looters.

That's the new normal for this family: staying vigilant amid a tangled new existence. Gone, for now, are those mundane old pastimes -- playing with the dog, going to dinner.

But parts of the old normalcy survive, like Caitlin's lime-green fixation: lime-green flip flops, sneakers, backpack, luggage even lime-green curtains back in her room at the house in Marerro.

And so the girl in the lime green steps into a new normal: laundromat time.

"I'll donate a quarter," Caitlin laughs sweetly as her mom lifts the laundry basket and steps outside in the sun to put it in the big Lincoln.

"Mom, you're too old to be in all that heat," Caitlin chides.

And to her own mom, Mary Kay says, "Mama, be mindful that some of those are four-load ones," sounding as normal as can be.

A Return To The Big Easy Begins (CSM)

By Kris Axtman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Nita Hemeter drove back to New Orleans after vacationing in Italy during the hurricane. At each checkpoint, she told officers that she needed to rescue her two dogs and four cats that were left behind. But once she got home and found them safe, she realized that the water had receded entirely in her neighborhood and she could do more good inside the city than out.

So she spends her days alternating between cleaning up her mildewing west side home and "breaking into houses" to leave food and water for pets left behind.

Although New Orleans is still under a mandatory evacuation, a growing number are defying orders and returning with nothing more than their driver's licenses and a desperate story. Most are being let back in, though they're told to get what they need and get out.

Whom to let in and whom to keep out is adding to the tension between residents left in limbo and government officials trying to clean up and restore order to a city that has essentially become a military zone.

There are signs of return to normalcy. The city's airport reopened for cargo traffic Sunday and limited passenger service is planned to begin Tuesday. Officially, the New Orleans Police Department (NOPD) is set to issue temporary weeklong badges to residents with valid reasons for returning.

Unofficially, those manning checkpoints have been letting many residents through with simply a wave and a "good luck."

Steve Barrera says he simply showed his driver's license and he was waved through - no explanation necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0004467

He is cutting up downed trees with a chain saw in front of his house and plans to stay as long as he can. His other option is sitting in a Shreveport, La., shelter. "At least this way, I can help repair some of this damage," he says. "It's going to be a long time before the city does anything."

With the vast majority of New Orleanians cleared out, there is plenty of food and water to go around, say those who are staying. While law enforcement doesn't want them there, they routinely come by to check on them and leave supplies.

Others are simply coming to get what they need and getting out. While no amount of news reporting has prepared them for what they are seeing, many believe much of the official information being disseminated - such as health risks, dangerous conditions, and flat tires - is simply a way to scare them into not coming back.

"There are no health risks in this area," says Caroline Barton, a doctor who used her work badge to get in and check on her west side home. "They should let everyone south of St. Charles Street come back in."

Privately, many residents admit that such a policy could spark even more complaints about racism, since most of what is dry is populated by whites, while much of the black east side is still underwater.

At a checkpoint on River Road, Heath Martin with the Springboro, Ohio, police is waving vehicles through. He estimates that a third of those he is letting through are residents with driver's licenses to prove it. Permission to allow them in has come from the NOPD, he says, with the stipulation that they get what they need and come right back out.

But the official word from the city is that those trying to return are to be turned back. "There is still a mandatory evacuation in the city of New Orleans," says Capt. Martin Defillo with the NOPD. "We won't physically force anyone out of their homes, but anyone who stays is in violation of that order. And those trying to return are not being allowed back in."

Resident Kevin Schoenberger understands the city's position. But "keeping people from their homes and businesses is really a hardship," he says. After talking his way in, he is spending the day cleaning out his refrigerator, gathering a few clothes, and packing up the SUV he left behind.

While law enforcement officers patrolling the neighborhood routinely warn Ms. Hemeter of the dangers of staying, she says she has never felt safer in her adopted home of New Orleans.

In fact, with her red curls poking out from under a safari hat, she has begun to make new friends with the few who are left. Fred Robertson, for example, has offered her a place to sleep so she's not alone at night. His house is several blocks away and she simply pedals her bike there, dropping dog food along the way.

"I've been telling everyone I know to come back. It's not that bad," she says, filling an overturned trash can lid with fresh water for neighborhood pets. "It's sorta like camping out."

For Holdouts, Food Rations May Disappear (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 12 - "They want to starve us out, is what it is," said David Jaurequi.

Mr. Jaurequi, 50, a guitarist, and his wife, Kay Vereen, 59, a bar owner, are among the holdouts here.

In recent days, city officials have increased the pressure to leave by cutting off the military-style rations that many have been living on, a National Guard spokesman said.

"Our commanding general put that out at the request of the New Orleans Police Department," the spokesman, Maj. Arnold Strong, said of the order not to distribute food.

But Maj. Amy Hannah, a spokeswoman for the task force that represents the active-duty military side of the hurricane response, said members of the 82nd Airborne Division and other soldiers would continue to provide the meals.

City police officials declined to comment, releasing only a statement, which read in part, "With respect to residents, we strongly encourage them to leave the city because they are in violation of the mandatory evacuation order."

But it seems clear that a shift has taken place. Guardsmen had been handing out rations near the convention center, but residents who went there over the last few days were told that food would not be available.

For some people, the rations have become a lifeline; for others, a treat amid tuna fish and other nonperishable food.

"It's like you're sitting at a Denny's and you're looking at the menu," Ms. Vereen said of the rations.

Water Levels Down Sharply In New Orleans (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Water levels dropped precipitously Monday in the worst of the flooded neighborhoods in and around New Orleans. Areas that had been under 6 to 8 feet of water less than two days earlier were dry at dawn, with ooze now smearing the streets and water collecting at low, marshy spots.

For the first time in the 8th and 9th wards in East New Orleans and Mid-City neighborhoods, search and rescue crews were able to patrol on foot. By midday, National Guardsmen and Marines said they had found several corpses inside homes that had been inaccessible until today.

In the city's lower 9th Ward, thousands of once-flooded homes bore brown watermarks that documented the systematic dropping of water levels. Marines, who on Saturday had patrolled neighborhoods in amphibious vehicles that floated atop floodwaters up to 8 feet deep, were patrolling on foot today, the slick mud sucking at the bottoms of their rubber boots.

"The water's gone down so fast, we can't keep up with it," a Guard staff sergeant said on North Claiborne Avenue in the lower 9th Ward. "It's like the whole place dried up overnight."

National Guardsman manned checkpoints as Marines wearing long green rubber gloves went house to house, knocking on doors and shouting for survivors. No one has been found alive in three days in the ward, said Lt. Col. Kent Ralston, whose Humvee was able to negotiate streets that had required amphibious vehicles two days earlier.

Marines on foot patrols said they found two decaying corpses inside homes in the ward. In the 8th Ward, Oregon National Guardsmen said they had found two more bodies, also inside homes. Five corpses discovered by Marines on Saturday remained tethered to fences and trees, swelling in the late summer sun.

At the corner of Reynes and Marais streets in the lower 9th Ward, three National Guard soldiers said they had been waiting three hours for a private mortuary contractor working for FEMA to arrive to remove the body.

At the corner of Flood and Johnson streets, the arm and leg bones were visible on the corpse of a man whose ankle was snagged on a tree branch, his torso slung over a fence.

On St. Claude Avenue, the sodden body of a woman lay face down in the mud. Two days earlier, it had floated on top of five feet of water.

In the 8th Ward, in a home at Desire Street and North Claiborne Avenue, Guard soldiers found the body of a middle-aged man on the living room floor. Flood marks on the tiny clapboard house showed that floodwaters had at one point risen above the front porch, about 5 feet high. A small white terrier, smeared with mud, lay on the porch, panting in the heat.

In the 9th Ward, Guard soldiers went house to house, peering into doors and windows to make sure no one was inside. They moved quickly, spraying "NG" and "9/12" in bright green paint to signify that each house had been inspected by the Guard on Monday.

The receding waters made it easier for Marines to make sure that no one alive was still inside homes, Ralston said.

"The water was so high before that we couldn't get a good look inside the houses," Ralston said. "Now we can do a more thorough search."

Ralston said Marines, who have no law enforcement powers, are not permitted to break into and search homes. They were told to look through windows and doorways, and to report the addresses or GPS coordinates of any home containing a corpse.

One Marine, sloshing through slick mud, said he was tired of squinting through mud-smeared windows. "We should be kicking these doors in," he said.

Signs of cleanup and debris removal were everywhere.

National Guard soldiers stripped off their camouflage uniform tops and used chain saws to cut up huge trees that had collapsed into roadways or across roofs. Men in Bobcats and skip loaders tore into the dark sludge on roadways to clear the way for cleanup crews, then shoved debris to the roadsides.

Tangles of downed power lines snarled the streets in the 8th and 9th wards, snagging on the tops of passing National Guard trucks. Several houses that had been torn from their foundations by floodwaters had floated to the middle of streets and settled there, blocking cleanup crews. The neighborhoods stank of rotting garbage, stagnant water and decaying corpses.

In Violet, a town in the southern region of flood-ravaged St. Bernard Parish, backhoes scraped their blades up and down Highway 39, shoving aside gooey mud left by retreating floodwaters. During President Bush's visit to the parish Monday, the parish president told him that not a single house in the parish was habitable.

Hundreds of dogs, freed at last from once-flooded homes, roamed alleys in many neighborhoods, barking wildly at passing Marines and Guard soldiers.

In the 7th Ward in Mid-City, volunteers from the Animal Rescue League of Boston rounded up dozens of dogs and cats that had wandered down from porches, where they had been marooned by floodwaters for 15 days. The volunteers had arrived with boats, expecting to navigate floodwaters, but then dismounted in heavy rubber boots and chased down animals.

"We can get a lot more done on foot, so I expect we'll be able to get to a lot more animals," Brian O'Conner of the rescue league said as volunteers provided water to dehydrated cats and dogs collected at a muddy gas station lot.

Also in the 7th Ward, New Orleans police Officer D.M. Fernandez was on a cellphone outside Mule's Bar this morning. He was calling a retired police officer who owned the flooded establishment to tell him that someone had broken in and stolen his liquor.

The receding floodwaters apparently gave foot access to the thieves in a neighborhood that was under several feet of water 24 hours earlier. Up and down 7th Ward streets, sodden homes stood deserted, with hundreds of residents' cars parked at crazy angles, watermarks staining their roofs.

Most streets were littered with tree limbs and debris, but were passable despite black mud that clung to car tires.

"The water was 3 feet high here," Fernandez said, standing outside the bar in the middle of La Harpe Street. "Everything dried out real good."

Airlines To Return To New Orleans (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 13, 2005

KENNER, La. — Passenger flights return to New Orleans this morning after a 16-day hiatus but on a drastically reduced schedule.

Only Northwest Airlines plans to start round trips today with two flights to Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport from Memphis. The airline will add a round trip from Minneapolis and one from Detroit on Monday, spokeswoman Jennifer Bagdade says.

Delta Air Lines, the second-largest carrier at New Orleans, will resume service with two round trips from Atlanta on Wednesday and on Thursday. Starting Friday, it will expand to five Atlanta round trips and one from Cincinnati.

Southwest Airlines, which has been the airport's largest carrier, has not made a decision on restarting service.

Continental Airlines plans to resume service Monday. Three of its four scheduled flights from New Orleans to Houston are sold out, spokesman David Messing says.

Thousands of airplanes and helicopters have flown in and out of the airport in the past two weeks, bringing in relief workers and supplies and evacuating people who got medical treatment in the terminal. As many as 5,000 medical and military personnel have lived in the airport during that time.

As the relief effort at the airport scaled back in recent days, airport aviation director Roy Williams pushed to open two of the four concourses for commercial flights during the day, the only time the airport is operating. The airport has lost $180,000 a day in landing fees and rent from businesses in the terminal since Hurricane Katrina hit, Williams says.

“There's a real question of what the demand will be in the first few weeks,” Williams says. But, he says, “It's very important that the airport is up and running.”

Situated about 8 miles west of downtown New Orleans and more than a mile south of Lake Ponchartrain, the airport avoided extensive wind and water damage from the hurricane.

But it could be hard for the airport to return to its pre-hurricane level of 175 departing flights a day. About 80% of New Orleans-bound passengers came for vacation, conventions or meetings, Williams says.

DOJ_NMG_0004470

Since Katrina, some airlines have added flights to Baton Rouge Metropolitan Airport, about a 90-minute drive from downtown New Orleans.

Williams expects to have “all the major” carriers operating at the airport within a week but couldn't says when rental car companies and concessionaires will return.

Only a newsstand will be open in the terminal today, airport spokeswoman Michelle Duffourc says.

Officials at Southwest, which typically handles about 30% of New Orleans' passengers, toured the airport Monday.

Mercy Flights For Hurricane Katrina Evacuees Suspended (ChiTrib/KRT)

By Richard Wronski And Jeff Long

Chicago Tribune, September 13, 2005

CHICAGO - (KRT) - After flying thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees to shelters across the country, federal officials on Monday suspended their mercy flights, saying they're no longer necessary.

"The need for airlifting has been met," said Valerie Smith, spokeswoman for the Department of Homeland Security. Most remaining evacuees chose to stay in the Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas areas to be closer to family and friends, officials said.

Those who still must be relocated will be transported by bus, Smith said.

In the past week, more than 300 displaced hurricane victims have been flown to facilities in Illinois. Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office, which pledged to accommodate up to 10,000 evacuees, said another 4,000 Katrina victims came to Illinois through other means.

As evacuees settled in Monday at several facilities in Illinois, some began making preparations to rejoin family and friends in other states.

Others said they may make Illinois their new home.

"I plan on staying here for a little bit because I know the city of New Orleans won't be around," said Harry Ray, 45, who was plucked from the Crescent City's floodwaters by a U.S. Army helicopter and wound up at the Elgin Mental Health Center.

Although grateful for the help provided by Illinois residents, Julie Norwood, 49, said she was eager to get to her sister's home in Atlanta. And Floyd Rachel, 27, said he'd rather be with friends in San Francisco.

"I thank the good Lord that I made it this far," Rachel said.

They were among 31 evacuees who landed at O'Hare International Airport Sunday afternoon. Later Sunday, about 50 others arrived in Rockford, one of the last airlifts.

More than 26 states and the District of Columbia have taken in tens of thousands of evacuees. The Federal Emergency Management Agency estimated that 604 shelters across the United States were housing 134,573 people as of Sunday.

Evacuees at the Elgin Mental Health Center recounted harrowing tales of survival. Ray told of scurrying to the upper floor of his apartment in New Orleans, where he remained surrounded by water for 11 days.

Norwood said she and dozens of others lived in a mausoleum, just a few feet from crypts containing the bodies of her relatives.

But the evacuees woke up Monday in comfortable beds with clean sheets and curtains at the windows. They picked out new clothing from racks loaded with pants and shirts.

After a breakfast whipped up by culinary arts students from Elgin Community College, evacuees went shopping at Wal-Mart.

At the Singer Mental Health Center in Rockford, Ill., officials said the evacuees were trying to unwind.

Gwendolyn Jackson, 47, of New Orleans, was making arrangements to join her 24-year-old daughter, who fled to Chattanooga, Tenn., shortly before Katrina hit.

Jackson was trapped in a school in New Orleans. Like many evacuees, she said she wasn't aware of how bad things were in the city until she came to Rockford and got a chance to watch television.

"We just got quiet. The attention was there on the TV," she said. "You'd see the tears drop from people's eyes."

At the Tinley Park Mental Health Center, where 95 evacuees arrived last Wednesday, director Mike Beary hoped to find a retired executive who could serve as manager. He also needed people with clerical skills to handle the volumes of relief paperwork, as well as male volunteers who can staff the men's quarters on overnight shifts.

FEMA teams had arrived at the Madden Mental Health Center Monday to begin assembling case management plans for the estimated 51 evacuees residing in two pavilions at the center in Maywood, said Diana Meyers, administrator at Madden.

Alfred Jones, 30, from Jefferson Parish, wants to find a warehouse job in Rockford and start his life there.

"I'm going to settle down in this area," said Jones, who was rescued from his flooded apartment building. "The opportunities around here are sounding better by the second."

45 Bodies Found In A New Orleans Hospital (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 12 - The bodies of 45 people have been found in a flooded uptown hospital here, officials said Monday, sharply increasing the death toll from Hurricane Katrina and raising new questions about the breakdown of the evacuation system as the disaster unfolded.

Officials at the hospital, the Memorial Medical Center, said at least some of the victims died while waiting to be removed in the four days after the hurricane struck, with the electricity out and temperatures exceeding 100 degrees.

Steven L. Campanini, a spokesman for the hospital's owner, Tenet Healthcare, said the dead included patients who died awaiting evacuation as well as people who died before the hurricane struck and whose bodies were in the hospital morgue.

Mr. Campanini said the dead might have also included evacuees from other hospitals and the surrounding neighborhood who gathered at Memorial while waiting to evacuate the city.

Repercussions from the storm continued to echo in Washington, where the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Michael D. Brown, a walking symbol to many people here of government failure in the crisis, resigned. Mr. Brown was relieved of his role in the day-to-day disaster operations here on Friday. [Page A26.]

President Bush, meanwhile, toured the ghostly streets of the city standing in the back of an open-air truck flanked by the mayor of New Orleans and the governor of Louisiana, who have been sharply critical of the federal performance.

In Baton Rouge, 1,000 people from the devastated St. Bernard Parish, just east of New Orleans, crowded the State Capitol and were told that memories of their community might be all they have left.

Flights were set to resume at the Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport, and city officials said they were creating a new command center downtown at a closed hotel.

Mr. Bush's appearance with Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans and Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, both Democrats, suggested that at least some of the bitterness over the response to the disaster had lifted.

On Mr. Bush's most recent visit to the stricken area, on Sept. 5, Ms. Blanco learned that he was making the trip from news reports.

The president, in a brief question and answer session with reporters after his tour on Monday, said that government coordination in rebuilding the city and the region was paramount and that local vision should determine the direction of the reconstruction. "It's very important for the folks in New Orleans to understand that, at least as far as I'm concerned, this great city has got ample talent and ample genius to set the strategy and set the vision," Mr. Bush said after his 40-minute tour. "Our role at the federal government is, you know, obviously within the law, to help them realize that vision. And that's what I wanted to assure the mayor."

Mr. Bush also returned to accusations that racial discrimination was involved in government's response to the hurricane, saying "the storm didn't discriminate" and neither did the rescuers.

Mr. Nagin and Ms. Blanco have said federal delays in sending aid had compounded the damage of the storm and heightened the anarchy in the days after the storm, when tens of thousands of people were trapped for days at sites like the Convention Center and the Superdome without food or water.

Mr. Nagin said in a radio interview Monday, when asked about his meeting with the president, "If anything, he told me he kind of appreciated my frankness and my bluntness."

The news that 45 bodies had been found at Memorial was also a reminder of how much else, in the physical structure and in the human toll, might yet remain unknown.

DOJ_NMG_0004472

On Monday, the authorities elevated the statewide death toll from Hurricane Katrina to 279; of those, 242 were from the New Orleans metropolitan region. In Mississippi, Gov. Haley Barbour said the toll there was 218.

In Baton Rouge, there were more reminders of the thousands of people who may have no community to return to at all.

More than 1,000 displaced residents from St. Bernard Parish crowded the State Capitol to learn about the state of their devastated houses. No one has been permitted to re-enter the area to retrieve belongings or examine their houses. News of the meeting traveled by word of mouth and Web sites, and people lined up for blocks outside the Art Deco Capitol, where Gov. Huey P. Long was assassinated in 1935. Some drove from Houston.

Local officials did not try to hide the bad news.

"You will not recognize St. Bernard Parish," the parish president, Henry J. Rodriguez Jr., told hundreds of residents in the marble foyer of the Capitol. "All you will have left of St. Bernard Parish is your memories."

Mr. Bush also saw the devastation first-hand on his tour of New Orleans. His tour passed by smashed cars, tree branches and rubble.

For most of the ride, Ms. Blanco, Mr. Bush and Mr. Nagin stood in a military truck and had to duck under low wires and branches. At one point, Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard, who succeeded Mr. Brown last week as head of hurricane relief, removed his Coast Guard cap to shield Mr. Bush from a wire.

City officials said they had moved most of the makeshift emergency operations command center that they had set up at City Hall since the storm arrived across the street to a battered Hyatt hotel, where power has been restored and Mayor Nagin keeps a suite.

In Ballroom E on the third floor of the hotel, 100 computer stations were set up at pods of circular tables to handle 24-hour work by groups like the New Orleans police, 82nd Airborne Division of the Army, the Coast Guard, National Guard and public health officials.

Edward Minyard, a contractor with Unisys who is in charge of setting up the center, said the operation was very likely to grow to as many as 500 positions, meaning as many as 1,500 people working in shifts around the clock.

In Harrison County, Miss., in the Gulfport-Biloxi region, a list of 600 missing persons was distributed by the coroner's office, though authorities emphasized that the people on the list were not necessarily missing. The names are of people who have been sought by family members.

"We have rescued everybody that we think could possibly be rescued," said Joe Spraggins, the head of emergency management for the county.

Gulfport-Biloxi International Airport, which began running commercial flights at the end of last week, expects to return to its regular flight schedule in two weeks, Colonel Spraggins said.

Delta, Northwest and AirTran Airlines plan to begin operating limited schedules on Tuesday, he said. Northwest said it would resume scheduled commercial service to the New Orleans airport on Wednesday, with its first inbound flight in 10 days scheduled to arrive from Memphis at 10:44 a.m. Repairs began on Monday on the Twin Span Bridge on Interstate 10, connecting New Orleans and Slidell. Within 45 days, the eastbound span is to be repaired, providing one lane of traffic in each direction.

45 Bodies Found In La. Hospital (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 12 -- The bodies of 45 patients left in a hasty evacuation were recovered from a New Orleans hospital, officials said Monday, as the city braced for the scenes left by the receding waters.

The news of the grim recovery at the Memorial Medical Center, the largest such discovery since Hurricane Katrina struck, came hours after President Bush completed a tour of parts of the city and spoke to local officials. He defended his administration's record, even as the chief of the federal emergency agency, Michael D. Brown, said in Washington that he was resigning after being yanked off the hurricane relief job three days ago.

Bush said that he will name R. David Paulison, now U.S. fire administrator and director of preparedness for FEMA, to lead the agency. A poll showed that Bush's standing reached a new low and that a majority of Americans disapprove of his response to Katrina.

Wrapping up his two-day visit, Bush saw a city trying to struggle back to life. But while the higher and drier downtown area buzzed with the sounds of generators and cleanup, vast swaths of the city remained a devastated frieze of dried mud, broken homes and foul stench.

Officials said the bodies found Sunday in the Memorial Medical Center were left there after a frantic evacuation, days after the storm passed and floodwaters began to rise. An official of the hospital owners said the patients died before the evacuation and their bodies were left in the facility.

But the discovery was certain to raise new questions about why so many city hospitals were not evacuated before the storm. Two medical professionals inside the Memorial Medical Center said conditions began to turn desperate shortly after the floodwaters cut off roads. The darkened corridors were jammed with families. Drinking water grew scarce. Medical supplies exhausted quickly; even IVs were being rationed, they said.

"Things looked like they were going downhill quickly," said Scot Sonnier, an oncologist there. He left before the evacuation, thinking other doctors were handling it, he said.

The city braced for more grim discoveries as the receding waters allowed search parties to reach isolated buildings. But the death toll -- 279 for Louisiana -- was still far below the initial prediction of the city's mayor that 10,000 perished.

"It's hot. It smells. But most of the houses we are looking at are empty," Oregon National Guard Staff Sgt. James Lindseth, 33, said as his platoon, inspecting for people dead or alive, worked its way through dank and broken homes that had been in the water a few days ago.

In New Orleans's downtown, most of it on higher and drier land, authorities allowed business owners to check their buildings Monday. Dump trucks with claws plucked the growing piles of debris from street corners and the air rumbled with the sound of generators.

"The least we can do is clean up our own streets," Wallace Kimbrough, 43, said as he pried debris out of the storm drain beside his home in the French Quarter. "Hey," he exclaimed, holding up a plastic bag he pulled from the muck. "Somebody lost their marijuana seeds."

In some of the outlying parishes, local school boards announced plans to restart classes next month. Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport said it will begin operating commercial flights on Tuesday, joining the traffic of helicopters, cargo planes and private charters bringing relief supplies.

Roy A. Williams, the airport's director of aviation, said the rush of evacuees has ended, and Delta, Continental and Northwest have said they want to resume flights to their hub cities.

But just outside downtown, large swaths of New Orleans remained lifeless and still. The growing concert of working pumps had brought the flood down to less than half the city by Monday, although water was seeping through a previously repaired levee. Brig. Gen. Doug Pritt of the Oregon National Guard described it as a minor leak, the Associated Press said. But areas that emerged from the muck remained images of devastation.

There, the homes were draped with trees plucked and flung by the storm. Cars lay overturned; appliances have been ripped from their moorings and thrown onto streets and bridges. The retreating water shone multicolored with oil, and when disturbed, released an overwhelming stench. The air smelled of rot and decay.

Officials of St. Bernard Parish, a poor, racially mixed area east of downtown, told residents in a meeting in Baton Rouge that the homes there would likely not be habitable for four months. Just north of that parish, near the Lakefront Airport, Gene Giroir, 65, pried open the front of his hardware store for the first time in two weeks. The contents lay in a dark, soggy ooze on the floor.

"The only thing left were things hanging on the wall above four feet. That's how high the water got," he said.

He owned the store with his brother and brother-in-law. "This was our living. I've been here since 1949. I grew up in this business, and I don't know whether I want to do it all again," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0004474

The president's visit caused little wake on the streets. Many workers and residents said they had only vaguely heard he was coming. Several shrugged. Most said they were too busy or preoccupied to care.

While Bush was traveling, Brown's resignation was announced in Washington. Brown had become the focus of anger for the slow federal mobilization after the storm savaged the Gulf Coast two weeks ago, unleashing a flood that engulfed most of New Orleans and flattening entire communities in Mississippi and Alabama.

In a written statement, Brown said he told Bush that it is "important that I leave now to avoid further distraction from the ongoing mission of FEMA." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said he will name a permanent deputy director at FEMA, a new position for the agency.

Brown's departure was greeted with glee by Democrats. "Mike Brown's decision to resign from FEMA is the best decision he's made in three weeks," said Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

The announcement of the grim find of bodies at Memorial Medical Center came after the president had left New Orleans.

The hospital, located in the center of the city, had fared the storm pretty well, said Sonnier, who rode out the hurricane at the hospital with his fiancee, Zoe Larner, a hematologist. But after the storm passed and news came of a broken levee, Sonnier said things became grim. Medical supplies were dwindling quickly, and the hospital's emergency power left the hallways dim. The hospital hallways were crowded with families of patients and staff, and soon came reports of looting and lawlessness, he said.

"Things looked like they were going down quickly," he said.

After two days, he waded to his nearby house, where Larner was listening to reports to evacuate the city, Sonnier said he did not know whether he could get back to the hospital, and he believed there was an emergency team of doctors to care for the patients. "I had a feeling things were going bad, and the best thing to do was get out of town," he said. Shortly after, he said, the hospital was evacuated.

Bob Johannesen, a spokesman for the state Department of Health and Hospitals, said the bodies of 45 patients were recovered from the hospital Sunday, although Dave Goodson, an assistant administrator, said the toll was 57, according to the AP.

"These patients were not abandoned," Goodson said. He said they had died before the evacuation. A spokesman for Tenent Healthcare Corp., which owns the hospital, told the AP that some of the people found Sunday had died before the storm, and the others died before the evacuation, which other officials said was done by boats. Many of the patients were in long-term acute care for people with serious ailments, he said.

Several medical care facilities became the site of chaos as the floods rose, with reports of looting and holdups for drugs inside the hospitals. One facility had to post a police sniper on the roof to keep order.

Sonnier said he assumed the emergency team of physicians left in the hospital would carry out the evacuation. But in an interview outside the eight-story brick facility, he said, "I will always have well, not regrets, but concerns over whether I did the right thing."

At Least 40 Bodies Found In New Orleans Hospital (WT/AP)

By Brett Martel, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- The bodies of more than 40 patients found at a flooded hospital drove up the death toll in Louisiana yesterday to 279 and pushed the tally of lives taken by Hurricane Katrina in four states past 500.

The patients, many of them elderly, had died while waiting to be evacuated in the four days after the hurricane hit as temperatures in Memorial Medical Center rose to 106 degrees, said Dave Goodson, assistant administrator of the hospital, owned by Tenet Heathcare Corp.

"These patients were not abandoned," Mr. Goodson said.

Meanwhile, more than half of southeastern Louisiana's water-treatment plants were up and running again yesterday, and business owners were issued passes into the city to retrieve vital records or equipment as New Orleans continued to stir back to life.

President Bush, in his third trip to the ravaged region, got his first close-up look at the destruction in New Orleans yesterday, taking a tour that took him through several flooded neighborhoods.

The president said the race of hurricane victims did not factor in the response and rejected suggestions that the nation's military was stretched too thin by the war in Iraq to deal with the Gulf Coast devastation.

In Washington, Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) Director Michael D. Brown announced that he is resigning "in the best interest of the agency and best interest of the president." Mr. Brown has been vilified for the government's sluggish response to the disaster. Last week, he was stripped of responsibility for overseeing the cleanup and was abruptly recalled to Washington.

To prevent looting, business owners wanting to enter the city's central business district and take what they needed to run their companies were required to obtain passes.

Traffic was heavy on the only major highway into the city that was still open, and vehicles were backed up for about two miles at a National Guard checkpoint across the Mississippi River from New Orleans.

Among the businessmen allowed back was Terry Cockerham, owner of Service Glass, which installs windows at businesses downtown. He has been working out of his house because his business was destroyed by looters and flooding.

"This is about the most work I've ever had," he said. "We'll work seven days a week until we get this job finished. I don't want to get rich. I just want to get everything back right."

State officials said yesterday that 16 of southeastern Louisiana's 25 major wastewater treatment plants were up and running again and that 41 of 174 permanent pumps were draining water from flooded areas. They expected an increase in temporary pumps within 24 hours.

Water in many parts of the metropolitan area was going down at least a foot a day, the Army Corps of Engineers said. Once the streets are dry, crews can begin removing debris, checking buildings and other structures for soundness, and restoring utilities.

Military cargo airplanes were set to begin spraying the area yesterday to kill flies and mosquitoes. The standing water from Katrina is expected to worsen Louisiana's already considerable mosquito problem. Before the storm hit, the state had logged 78 cases of mosquito-borne West Nile virus and four deaths from the disease this year.

Insurance analysts doubled to at least $40 billion their estimate of insured losses caused by Katrina -- a figure that would make it the world's costliest hurricane ever. Risk Management Solutions Inc. of Newark, Calif., put the economic damage at more than $125 billion.

The number of bodies found at the hospital was not clear. Bob Johannesen, a spokesman for the state Department of Health and Hospitals, said 45 patients had been found; Mr. Goodson said there were 44, plus three persons found dead on the hospital grounds.

Dr. Jeffrey Kochan, a Philadelphia-area radiologist volunteering in New Orleans, spoke with the recovery team late Sunday after 36 bodies were found floating on the first floor.

"They're seeing things no human being should have to see," Dr. Kochan said.

Police Superintendent Eddie Compass declined to answer questions yesterday about the discovery, including whether police received any calls for assistance from the Memorial Medical Center after the hospital was evacuated.

A spokeswoman for Mayor C. Ray Nagin, Sally Foreman, said the city knew there were people in hospitals who needed to be evacuated. The city's first priority had been to evacuate patients in critical care units.

As workers removed bodies Sunday from the hospital, in the city's Uptown section, reporters were kept at a distance. A white refrigerated truck carried away remains with federal police escort.

The death toll for Hurricane Katrina reached 509, making it the fifth deadliest hurricane to hit the continental United States since 1900. Bodies recovered in Louisiana reached 279, up from 197 on Sunday. In addition, 214 persons are confirmed dead in Mississippi, 14 in Florida and two in Alabama.

About 50 percent of New Orleans remained flooded -- down from 80 percent early last week, and search teams continued to collect hundreds, perhaps thousands, of corpses.

DOJ_NMG_0004476

Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, commander of active-duty troops engaged in hurricane relief, reiterated Sunday that the number of dead would be "a heck of a lot lower" than initial projections of up to 10,000.

Hospital Staff Tried To Comfort Dying Patients (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Describing a desperate and harrowing struggle to comfort dying patients as floodwaters rose and the city descended into chaos, hospital staffers from Memorial Medical Center said today that 45 people died there during a six-day vigil.

Dave Goodson, director of support services at the hospital, said rescuers came and left — sometimes they helped take someone from the hospital and other times they brought new evacuees plucked from rooftops.

Elderly patients had the hardest time, Goodson said. Heat and sickness conspired to kill about 16 patients from a nearby convalescent hospital.

"I can tell you it was 106 degrees in that hospital" in the days after the storm, he said. Goodson described the heroic efforts of doctors and nurses who comforted ailing patients — even fanning some to cool them.

Goodson said that their hopes rose when they heard helicopters coming toward them, but the patients weren't airlifted — instead, supplies and evacuees who had escaped their homes in nearby neighborhoods were dropped off.

Joanne Lalla, an oncology nurse, said at least one patient was brought to the hospital with a stab wound.

Goodson said that at one point, National Guardsmen came to the hospital and evacuated some patients and promised to come back for more — but then the floodwaters rose. They didn't return until Friday, Goodson said.

Lalla said that she "couldn't understand why nobody was coming to help us."

Lalla said that many hospital staff members brought relatives to the hulking brick hospital, thinking that it would be safer to be there than in their homes. Goodson estimated that 500 hospital staff members were there along with 2,000 patients.

"A lot of hospital employees brought their children, who were like 2 and 4 and 6 years old," she said. "By Tuesday night, they were leery and worried. I knew we definitely were going to have to get out of that hospital. We were all hot and sweaty because the next thing to go was the generator.

"On Wednesday, I went to the bathroom and realized that we had no water, so we had to make sure that no patient flushed the toilet," she said. "The patients were very hot, so we kept all the doors open."

Goodson and Lalla said that despite their difficult situation, the hospital staff continued to serve the sick as well as they could. For a time they carted patients to the roof of the building to wait for helicopters, but when they realized that they weren't going to be airlifted, they went back downstairs, Lalla said.

"We had the National Guard with us for a little bit, but then they said they had to go because of rioting," she said.

Lalla said she was concerned that patients who needed ventilators and other vital electronic aids to stay alive probably didn't make it through the week. She suspected that many patients in the critical care unit died.

"We were just in survival mode," she said. "We couldn't give out medication because we couldn't regulate their medications.

"We were like MASH units," she said. "All the patients were on little cots and mattresses on the garage floor."

Lalla recalled how a dietary specialist ripped his shirt into rags, dipped them in water and stroked the head of one patient as he lay dying. Lalla said that she knew of three cancer patients who died during their wait at the hospital, including one under her direct care.

The hospital staff filled the morgue, Lalla said, and when the morgue was full, they put bodies in the hospital chapel.

Goodson and Lalla said that people in the hospital tried to evacuate as many people as possible, starting with those who could walk on their own, then those in wheelchairs, and finally, bed-ridden patients. They said that without elevators, the sickest patients were the most difficult to move.

DOJ_NMG_0004477

On Tuesday, some citizens on boats came and promised that they would bring many more the next day. But when they returned Wednesday, there were only four boats. They made ferry trips with as many people as they could carry, all day long and into Thursday, Goodson said.

Among the patients who were able to evacuate on the boats were two young bone marrow patients.

"I saw them get into these two-seat boats and saw all these women with newborn babies who were also getting on and I just burst into tears," she said.

By that time, said Lalla, the hospital staff was exhausted and she felt herself beginning to fray.

When she looked out of the hospital windows she could see that the building had become an island in a sea of broken houses and swamped cars.

"On Wednesday morning about 4 a.m. I heard someone trying to kick himself out of his house," she said. "He was screaming for help. Then I heard a plop in the water. I didn't hear anything else."

For Many Casualties, No Who, How Or When (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley And Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Cynthia du Faur telephoned her twin sister in Chicago at 2:15 a.m. on Aug. 30 and told her in a small, surprised voice that water was rising fast inside their New Orleans home.

It was pitch black, she said, and the city around her was paralyzed, and she was alone with their nine dogs and cats. She could not reach the ladder in the basement, and the attic was nailed shut. Suddenly, she said, almost as an aside, "I think we're going to die."

"Her very last words, which haunt me, were 'Let me go try to find some plywood. Okay, bye.' She was looking for something to float on," said her sister, Brenda du Faur, 46. "I can't imagine the slow, rising death that was coming."

Du Faur can't be certain her sister is dead, but like many others who haven't heard from loved ones in this stricken region, she is already grieving. The people who died during Katrina and its aftermath are, two weeks later, still largely unidentified and unknown. No one can say yet how many perished, who they were, how and when they died. Communications and recovery problems -- and a heavy cloak of secrecy -- have compounded the mystery. Officials have been told not to pass on any information. For now, and for the indefinite future, the victims of Katrina remain the dead without a roster.

What is known about them comes not from official confirmation but from scattered sources -- a small-town funeral home director who knows everyone, a frantic sister who posted her last hopes on a missing-persons hotline. It is common knowledge, for example, in east Biloxi that "Miss Odessa" Hurley, 90, drowned alone in her modest house -- although officials have not yet confirmed her death.

Rosalie Guidry Daste, 100, survived five days trapped on the suffocating second-floor of a flooded New Orleans nursing home, only to die soon after she was rescued and airlifted to a hospital. The family of Grady Samuels Sr., 82, is convinced he "grieved himself to death," his daughter said.

Sgt. Paul Accardo, 36, a public affairs officer for the New Orleans Police Department, shot himself in the mouth as he sat in his patrol car, apparently anguished at what was happening to his city. Willie Williams, 25, as big and strong as a football player, apparently thought he could withstand the fury of the storm.

And in her heart, if not on paper, Brenda du Faur senses that she lost her sister in the floodwaters that engulfed their home.At the Nursing Home

As the monstrous hurricane bore down on the Gulf Coast, the nursing staff at Lafon Nursing Home of the Holy Family told family members that Rosalie Daste was too feeble to evacuate from the east New Orleans facility for the elderly poor.

Daste and other patients who stayed behind were moved to the second floor for safety, and worried family members said they were assured that a generator and plenty of supplies were on hand.

But the day after the storm, a levee on a canal to the west of the nursing home collapsed, and water began swirling into the first floor of the facility. The occupants were trapped inside.

Daste's family is not sure what happened after that, but four days passed before rescuers reached the nursing home. By the time Daste was airlifted, first to a makeshift facility at the New Orleans airport, then to a Monroe, La., hospital, "she was dying," said Kevan Cullins, her great-grandson. She was severely dehydrated and had a bacterial infection, her kidneys were failing and her lungs were filled with fluid. Before her family could reach her, he said, she was dead.

At Daste's funeral Saturday in Baton Rouge, La., the family chose to celebrate her long life rather than to dwell on the details of her death. They painted a portrait of a sturdy woman who worked until her early nineties, and who survived financial ruin in the Depression, early widowhood and the deaths of three of her four children. They laughed as they recalled her famous penny-pinching ways, how she would always tell her children and grandchildren, "You watch your pennies and nickels, and when they turn into dollars, they'll watch themselves." She and her husband, who died in 1957, ran a small grocery and accumulated some property.

"She saved tissue paper and would cut it up and use it for napkins," Cullins recalled fondly. "Grandma didn't throw anything away."On the Beat

For Paul Accardo, watching the hurricane rip apart his home town amid chaos, looting and murder was apparently more than he could bear.

After six days of helping to evacuate hundreds from the drowning city, of trying to aid thousands at the Louisiana Superdome -- and watching some of them die -- Accardo shot himself to death on Sept. 3.

"To see people dying, no food, no water, it took a toll on him," said his boss, Capt. Marlon DeFillo.

Accardo, who had been married for about three years, was often the public face of the city police department on local television newscasts. A clean-cut man with a winning smile and a soft-spoken manner, he was in the forefront of a department trying to improve its image.

But during the hurricane, the strait-laced cop who had spent the past five years working as a public affairs officer suddenly found himself on the front lines. Like other New Orleans police officers, he lost his home to Katrina and found himself working 20-hour days, pulling people from floodwaters and battling the looters who swarmed over portions of the city. The kind of guy who carried pet food in his car to feed stray animals, Accardo was overwhelmed by the suffering he saw, DeFillo said.

After working until 2 a.m. Saturday, Accardo slept for two hours and then got up at 4 a.m. to return to work. He looked so exhausted that DeFillo told him to go back to sleep.

"That's the last we saw of him," DeFillo said.

Accardo drove west and stopped in Luling, La., about 25 miles away, where he parked his car and ended his life.At Home

Odessa Hurley, 90, was a familiar figure, walking along the streets of Biloxi during the daylight hours, passing out religious tracts and gathering treasures in the bag she always carried.

"She had sneakers on a mile too big for her, and big white socks pulled up to her knees," said Cleo Meaut, 74, a longtime church friend. "She wasn't what you called poor, but she looked poor. She gave all her money to charity. She would send money off to these missionaries to help them out, and when I say money I mean a good bit of money."

According to three townspeople, she lived all her life in Biloxi, for decades in the same small house without air conditioning, television or other creature comforts. She outlived two husbands. Her life revolved around day-long walks -- "practically all over Biloxi," Meaut said -- and daily services at St. Louis Catholic Church.

"She told me one Saturday night at church, 'I hope God gives me 10 more years because I'm not finished with my work here on Earth, and I'm trying to buy my way into heaven,' " Meaut said. "Father was standing there and he said, 'Oh, Miss Odessa, you know you can't buy your way into heaven -- you have to pray your way in.' And she just laughed."

Hurley refused to leave her home when neighbors were evacuating ahead of the storm. She had survived plenty of storms, she said. But when Meaut returned to find her own house destroyed, her younger son gave her the bad news. "He said, 'You know, they found Miss Odessa drowned.' "

Since then, Meaut has said many prayers for her old friend. But she knows Miss Odessa probably did okay on her own: "She paid her way into heaven -- you can bet your boots on that."Staying in New Orleans

Willie Williams had wanted to be a football player -- and he still looked like one -- but things had not quite turned out the way he wanted. The father of five children under 6, he was a 10th-grade dropout and a laborer whose last job had been in roofing when he decided not to leave his native New Orleans for the hurricane.

"They was going to ride it out like a lot of people always did," said his cousin, Pam Williams, 35, who evacuated with her three children and who described his life and death from Houston, where she was relocating.

It may have been a fatal choice. Indirectly through a police officer friend in New Orleans, Williams learned that her cousin's body had been recovered after the storm, that it was seen tied to a tree by the river to keep it from floating away -- a practice searchers employed in the first chaotic days. His girlfriend, and the mother of his two youngest children, apparently is missing. There is no word on the children.

Williams said she does not know how her cousin died. "He knew how to swim pretty good," she said. "He was a survivor."

He also was the family peacemaker, she said.

"He'd see people getting into fights and he would break it up," she said. "He would tell them just to compromise with each other."In the Shelter

As Grady Samuels Sr. sat in an evacuation shelter in Baton Rouge, he could not stop watching the images of hurt and crying children on television. The elderly man, known as "Grandpa Grady" back in his River Ridge, La., neighborhood, was sickened by the suffering the disaster had brought.

"He was saying, 'Ya'll get those children,' " said Rosie Jackson, 35, one of his many grandchildren. To calm him, family members lied and reassured him that they would rescue the children he was seeing on TV.

But as the days wore on, Samuels grew quieter. He stopped eating or speaking. A nurse stopped by to look at him but did not send him to a hospital, family members said. Last Thursday, he died in a single bed in a small room at the shelter that had been set aside for him and his wife, Louise.

"I think he grieved himself to death," said daughter Julia Samuels, 56.

It was a sad end to a life marked by hard work and a huge family. He and his wife had raised 11 children in the community about six miles west of New Orleans, and he saw himself as "the neighborhood granddad," said Fabiola Jack, 28, one of his great-grandchildren.

If police officers came looking for a neighborhood kid, Jack said, Samuels was likely to try to persuade them to give the youth a second chance. " 'That's my grandson,' he would say. 'Don't put him in jail. I'm going to talk to him first, and if he don't listen, then you can put him in jail.' "On the Phone

Brenda du Faur wishes she had been more alert during her sister's last phone call, that she had had the presence of mind to suggest a way out, that she could have somehow transmitted the belief that Cynthia could survive a flood in the middle of a dark terrifying night.

"I was profoundly inadequate," Brenda du Faur said in an interview from Chicago, where she was away working as a racehorse walker. "Even though my sister was brilliant in her own person and the most creative thinker I've ever known, she had challenges and I was the one who was able to function a little better. All my life, I've saved my sister and I'm just tormented I didn't save her, and I could have."

Cynthia and Brenda du Faur shared what is called "a shotgun house" in mid-city New Orleans, each of them occupying one side of the dwelling; the dogs and cats, with such names as Petrouchka and Svetlana, ran back and forth between them.

Cynthia, a recovering alcoholic, was not working but had many deep interests, her sister said, including ballet, figure skating and old movies. Concerned about the poor, she was "a vehement critic of the establishment when they did wrong," Brenda said. She liked to dress in long, colorful sundresses and vintage shawls.

"She disdained a lot of the modern things she felt were inferior," her sister said.

Brenda said her twin often depended on her to take care of practical matters. She wishes she had cleared access to the attic, as she had long thought of doing. She wishes she had bought a small boat, assembled some kind of kit for emergencies. "All she needed was an inner tube," Brenda said, bursting into tears. "I never thought about a levee breaking."

Officials have had no news for her, as she waits in Chicago. But Brenda du Faur feels certain Cynthia would have gotten word to her if she survived.

Units Search For Bodies But Some Find None (NYT)

By John Kifner

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

MICHOUD, La., Sept. 12 - Despite apocalyptic predictions, marines searching St. Bernard Parish - in the direct path of Hurricane Katrina - have yet to find any bodies, commanders said Monday.

"St. Bernard is actually doing pretty good," said Capt. Stephen Kahn, operations officer for the battalion of marines brought in from Camp Lejeune, N.C., as part of the administration's response to the storm.

"The areas worst flooded, as our guys are getting in there, they're not finding anything," said Captain Kahn, referring to the bodies that were anticipated. Fears were reinforced when previous rescue workers found swollen dead bodies last week in St. Rita's nursing home here. The home's officials have said that 32 of the 60 residents perished.

The marines are grinding through swamps and bayous in amphibious troop carriers, searching a landscape of ruined houses, some torn into scraps like matchsticks, others with stairs leading to nowhere. Houses that have been searched and found empty were marked with a spray-painted orange "X."

Some of the marines' zone, including the Arabi section of the eastern edge of the city, is still underwater and yet to be searched.

"It's an environmental nightmare," said Lt. Col. Kent Ralston, commander of the unit whose amtracks are touring the area around the industrial canal. "It's just chaos, the worst damage I've seen."

From the hamlet of Yscloskey, near Alluvial City, where the marines were trying to help fix a bridge bent out of shape so that it could be raised to let boats through a canal, Robert Labat of the St. Bernard Fire Department said the situation was not as bad as feared.

"You'll be surprised how low the death toll is," said Mr. Labat, who is also a mosquito control officer. "There are about 70,000 people here, and 70 percent of them got out early."

Officers on helicopter flyovers had originally thought a long line of cars and trucks pointed north on highway 39 had been caught by the flood and swept aside, but the vehicles were simply left parked on the highest ground, it turned out.

Dire warnings, from marine planning sessions, of a devil's brew of toxic floodwater, decomposing bodies, feral swamp creatures and hostile, gun-toting locals have just not materialized.

"Thousands are expected dead," stated a briefing for the officers and senior sergeants of the First Battalion/Eighth Marines a few days ago. "Bodies after a week in the water are not a pretty thing.

"There are biologic hazards," the briefing said. "Hepatitis is the main one. There is a very real danger if someone cuts himself and contaminates himself through the water.

"We are assessing the presence of armed civilians. We are more concerned about the looting than the flooding."

The Bravo company, with 130 of the more than 700 marines in the battalion, have been working from a NASA fuel tank assembly plant for eight days. The rest of the battalion was encamped in a huge furniture store in Slidell, to the northeast, and came by convoy on Saturday. They have been replaced by a battalion from Camp Pendleton, Calif.

More military forces, including 46,300 National Guard troops and volunteers from municipalities around the country, have been pouring in.

With the reinforcements, the ratio of rescuers to remaining victims appears to have shifted in the week since the levees broke. A patrol of a few hours on a recent day in St. Bernard Parish revealed a half-dozen outside units, including the New York Police Department, the New Jersey urban search and rescue squad and the Baltimore Fire Department, whose bright red truck got stuck nose down in a fetid canal. Fire departments from across the country have gathered at Our Lady of the Holy Cross College in New Orleans, including 350 New York firefighters, with 1,000 more on the way.

For the marines, the effort has been carried out like a battle, with the headquarters known as COC, or combat operations center.

DOJ_NMG_0004481

"We operate the same," said Lt. Col. Scott Alley, the First Battalion commander. "We grid everything and mark here's what we've been through, here's what we've cleared. A lot of the tactics and techniques are the same."

As more troops have arrived, the facilities have begun to improve. Tents are sprouting on the lawns around the NASA facility for the marines, who have been sleeping on concrete floors and eating Meals Ready to Eat. A line of portable bathrooms is set up. This afternoon, a truck from the Army-Air Force Exchange Service pulled in to set up a PX.

For Man In Charge, No Excuses Will Do During Cleanup (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, September 13, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Lt. Gen. Russel Honoré is the go-to guy here.

When he bounds off his truck in downtown New Orleans and lights his third cigar of the day, he is immediately surrounded by soldiers, volunteers and city workers who shower him with praise and requests.

“I don't know what they say about you anywhere else. All I know is you get the job done,” volunteer Eddie Boy Woerner says.

That job was getting 1,000 pounds of donated beef that was stranded outside the city. Woerner, a group of his employees at his turf business, and some friends came to New Orleans from Gulf Shores, Ala., and set up a massive barbecue to feed the federal workers, soldiers and volunteers who have descended on the disaster zone.

Woerner was having trouble getting the beef into the city. Word got to the general. He sent a helicopter.

Honoré, a Louisiana native with a cigar-smoking habit that begins before noon, has become the symbol of New Orleans' emergence from chaos to reconstruction. He is commander of the 1st Army, which is now charged with the largest humanitarian effort in U.S. history.

Honoré, 57, was raised on a subsistence farm, land his father rented and worked in Lakeland, La. He graduated from Southern University in Baton Rouge, where he studied agriculture. He spent four years in ROTC and got a deferment from the draft. He said he wanted to go in as an officer, serve and then go into farming. He joined the Army in 1971 and never left.

In 1971, the military had only a handful of African-American general officers. Honoré, who calls himself a Louisiana Creole African-American, did not have it in his mind then to become a general. “I just did every job as best as I could,” Honoré says.

Honoré (AHN-ur-ay) is married and has four children — two boys and two girls. One daughter lives in New Orleans. She had gone to Florida before Hurricane Katrina struck to visit her sister, who had just had a baby — Honoré's first grandchild. His son, Sgt. Michael Honoré, 27, of the Louisiana National Guard, returns home next week after a year in Iraq.

The nerve center of the military's response to Hurricane Katrina is at Camp Shelby near Hattiesburg, Miss. Honoré pops in often, as he does at 11:30 p.m. Sunday after a day spent in New Orleans. The night briefing is underway.

Honoré has a few stock lines. He calls everyone “Tiger,” particularly before issuing a demand. His second most common line: “You're looking at the calendar. I'm looking at my watch.” That's his way of saying: “Get it done now.”

Although Camp Shelby is a 45-minute helicopter ride north of New Orleans, Honoré prefers to spend his day in the disaster zone. He has an air-conditioned tent with computers and communications equipment set up in a garage at the Port of New Orleans. But a good deal of his time is spent riding in the back of an Army truck.

“This is my office,” Honoré says. “This truck. I can see all the leaders and find out what they are struggling with.”

“It's what commanders do to get the feel and the smell of the situation,” explains Brig. Gen. Tony Cucolo of the U.S. Joint Forces Command in Norfolk, Va., who is part of Honoré's team. A few days ago, as he drove around the city's convention center, Honoré noticed the stench of the trash and rotting food. The next day, it was clean. “We're not here to talk about things. We're here to get it done,” he says.

He parked his “office” outside City Hall on Sunday. After a 45-minute chat with a city administrator, Honoré is on the phone to his engineering task force: “You need to get City Hall stood up. The water needs to be pumped out of the basement. And the generator. And get in some street sweepers. Get this glass out of the street. The police officers are getting flat tires.”

He says restoring City Hall is a priority. “The people who make things happen within the city have been evacuated. We need to bring them back.”

It seems a daunting task. “Better be someone over here before the day's out,” Honoré says.

U.S. Law Blocked Storm Barrier (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

A congressional task force says energy production, the construction of affordable homes and hurricane protection for New Orleans have been hampered by a 35-year-old federal law known as the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA).

"We have heard from numerous industries that expensive and time-consuming legal and procedural delays are preventing energy production and construction projects," Rep. Cathy McMorris, Washington Republican and chairwoman of the House Task Force on Improving the National Environmental Policy Act.

The 1970 law was designed to protect the environment. The 22-member task force has held four hearings across the country to assess NEPA's role in accessing affordable energy, building roads and homes, and managing the nation's natural resources.

NEPA, which established a national environmental policy framework, has "resulted in thousands of lawsuits," holding up some projects for more than 20 years and killing others, said Jennifer Zuccarelli, a task force spokeswoman.

"The NEPA process, as it has evolved from a vague, extremely short statute, has grown into a massive, unclear process that hurts communities as they wait decades for homes, buildings, roads, energy and job-creating projects," Miss Zuccarelli said.

NEPA requires the U.S. government to evaluate the environmental impact of any significant project undertaken by a federal agency, financed with federal money, or requiring a federal permit. It further mandates that the results of the government assessment be made public and that the public decide whether its benefits outweigh its drawbacks.

On Friday, the task force said NEPA lawsuits at least twice had prevented system improvements to protect New Orleans from a hurricane. It said the Sierra Club and other environmental groups in 1996 sued the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and blocked a project to raise and fortify levees around New Orleans.

It also cited a Los Angeles Times story that said a Save the Wetlands lawsuit filed in 1977 killed plans approved by Congress to create a "massive hurricane barrier to protect New Orleans." The plan was created after Hurricane Betsy in 1965.

A federal judge stopped plans for the hurricane barrier after finding that an environmental-impact statement drafted by the Army Corps of Engineers was flawed. The corps abandoned the project by the mid-1980s.

Rep. Thelma Drake, Virginia Republican and a member of the congressional NEPA task force, says it is clear that NEPA "plays a role in hampering our ability as a nation to develop efficient supply chains capable of providing Americans with affordable energy."

"For years, construction projects that could have mitigated adverse impacts to our supply have been needlessly blocked due to endless red tape and a sluggish federal bureaucracy," the congresswoman added.

The NEPA panel, comprising 12 Republicans and 10 Democrats who are members of the House Resources Committee, was charged in April with making recommendations for improving NEPA. The task force will submit a report to the full committee by year's end.

The task force will hold its fifth hearing on Saturday at 1 p.m. at Old Dominion University in Norfolk.

Rush To Set Up U.S. Housing For Survivors (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

SLIDELL, La., Sept. 12 - One team of men is bent over drills, driving mobile home anchors deep into the moist earth. Others are lifting cinder blocks that will be used to hold up the next set of identical beige homes that trucks, one after another, are bringing here.

A building boom is under way in this city at the edge of Lake Pontchartrain, where one-third of the houses have been damaged or destroyed.

But this is just the start.

The government is beginning what urban planners are calling one of the biggest bursts of federal housing development in United States history. Last year in Florida, the Federal Emergency Management Agency set a record by installing 15,000 homes in the aftermath of four hurricanes there. In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, they hope to open 30,000 homes every two weeks, reaching 300,000 within months.

Those numbers make Levittown - the suburban community on Long Island where 17,447 houses were built after World War II - look modest. Even the rebuilding of Chicago after the great fire of 1871 or San Francisco after the 1906 earthquake do not compare, said Ruth C. Steiner, an associate professor at the Department of Urban and Regional Planning at the University of Florida.

"This is a milestone of urban planning," Ms. Steiner said "There is no precedent on this scale in this country. It is just phenomenal."

The numbers might drop if the demand does not meet expectations. But more than 140,000 people are now packed into emergency shelters, while hundreds of thousands of others fill hotels, homes of friends or relatives or are temporarily relocated across the United States. The building blitz is intended to bring as many people as possible back to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"It is like pushing a big rock down a hill," said Brad Gair, head of FEMA's hurricane housing task force, of the project. "It takes a little time to get it moving, but once it gets moving, it moves very fast. And that is where we are getting right now."

The families moving into the first of these new trailers and mobile homes, the use of which are provided at no cost, seem almost startled to be inside a structure that is not flooded or stiflingly hot and overstuffed with people.

Elizabeth Burregi, 37; her husband Victor, 41; and their three young children arrived Sunday with trash bags filled with donated clothing and other goods. Their side of their home in Marrero, La., was ripped off during the storm. Just about the only thing they carried out with them was the three pet turtles that Christopher, 12, insisted not be left behind.

But already, Sunday, within an hour of arriving, they were feeling at home. "I got air-conditioning!" Mrs. Burregi cried out, as she stood with her hands lifted up toward the vent that was pumping out cool air in her new trailer. "This is better. This is much, much better."

Glenn Barkston, 40, of Kenner, La., said, "God has looked down on us like you would never believe." He was overjoyed, even though he does not have sheets, pots or pans, or even soap for the new trailer he is now sharing with his mother in Patterson, La. "We are very fortunate."

At four giant staging areas across the region, FEMA is assembling tens of thousands of mobile homes and trailers. In Baton Rouge alone, at a former Defense Department logistics center, thousands of them are already lined up on a field.

So many new homes are needed that small-scale developments of 50 or 100 homes will simply not suffice. FEMA is thinking like the onetime Soviet planners, mapping out new towns that in some cases will have as many as 25,000 mobile homes, spread across hundreds of acres.

More than 25 so-called strike teams are deployed across Louisiana, scouting out possible sites for these new boom towns, negotiating with local officials and attempting to draft leases or sales agreements for farmland or camp sites. The teams have been formed by giant global engineering firms including Bechtel National Inc. of San Francisco and Fluor Corporation, of Aliso Viejo, Calif., which last week won no-bid contracts worth $100 million each.

The men and women in charge are used to building things like trash incinerators, coal-fired electricity plants and oil fields in Saudi Arabia. They admit they will not be applying too much creativity to these new communities that will be created at a pace that would have made the master planner Robert Moses weep.

"We are a lot of right-brained guys, nothing too artistic," said Don Stokley, a structural engineer from Fluor, who is managing the company's strike teams.

To meet FEMA's needs, factories are churning out the trailers and mobile homes at full capacity. The agency is also buying homes from lots and warehouses across the country.

James C. Schwab, a research associate at the American Planning Association in Chicago, said the FEMA should be careful to not create communities that are so dense and sterile that no one wants to live there.

"You are in a difficult spot, where you need housing quickly," he said. "But you have got to try to humanize it as much as possible."

DOJ_NMG_0004484

FEMA officials say they realize that they cannot just drop 75,000 people into rural, one-stoplight towns. Classrooms, sewage treatment plants, stores, restaurants and medical centers will be built as well.

By the end of Wednesday, FEMA expects to have installed 3,500 homes requested by the governor in Alabama, most of them set up in long rows at state parks. By Friday, FEMA and its contractors will have installed about 1,000 homes in the New Orleans area for workers helping to rebuild the city. The big test, though, is in places like Slidell, along the rural stretches outside devastated cities in Louisiana and Mississippi.

The small compound in Slidell is one of the first new communities. It is tiny by comparison to the new towns that FEMA and its contractors are planning. Here, they are simply dropping as many new units as they can squeeze into an existing mobile home park.

The homes in Slidell - those so far are all 14 feet wide and 70 feet long and have three bedrooms - arrive furnished with beds and box springs wrapped in plastic, a full-size refrigerator, a couch and living room chair. The homes are lined up exactly 11 feet apart.

But if the experience here over the last few days is any example, the government is going to have a difficult time meeting its goal of 30,000 units every two weeks.

It will be perhaps three weeks, a Fluor official predicted, before the 125 new homes being dropped here are ready for occupancy.

Reinhard Dearing, a top city official in Slidell, had recently come up with a new nickname for FEMA, "Nonexistent Emergency Management Agency," or NEMA, he said, given the department's slow response to requests by individuals for assistance. But even with the extended schedule provided on Monday by Jim Hlavaty, the general superintendent from Fluor, the Slidell city officials said they were impressed.

"These guys here know what they need to do, and they are doing it," Mr. Dearing said. "At least they are getting something done."

As of Sunday, fewer than 10 families in Louisiana had moved into the first new homes. In Patterson, La., 120 miles southwest of Slidell, FEMA officials installed smaller, two-bedroom trailers. To their new occupants, emerging from shelters that held up to 1,000 people, the compact units were all but a palace.

It is not clear how long these new FEMA-created towns will last. Temporary housing built for shipyard workers during World War II in cities like Richmond, Calif., was occupied for decades. FEMA officials say that is not their objective; they will own the units and move people out when they are ready.

"These temporary homes will come out," Mr. Gair of FEMA said. "We want to rebuild New Orleans. We do not want to create a state of travel trailers and mobile home parks."

FEMA Allocates $5 Billion For Trailers Yet To Be Built (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

FEMA has allocated nearly $5 billion to buy 300,000 trailer homes as part of its emergency hurricane spending -- even though 270,000 of them are on back order and will have to be built, says a congressman who voted against last week's $51.8 billion bill.

Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, said President Bush and members of Congress are spending quickly on Hurricane Katrina relief in part to try to counter bad publicity over the federal government's initial response.

"There was definitely a factor in seeking to spend enough money fast enough that they wouldn't have to face the criticism of being too tightfisted," he said. "They think that they're being measured by the amount of money they spend, and I think we ought to be measured by the kind of plan we have."

Congress has passed two emergency spending bills, with $60 billion for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, $1.9 billion for the Department of Defense and $400 million for the Army Corps of Engineers.

The White House and Republican congressional leaders have promised to spend what it takes to aid the hurricane's victims, and both bills have passed with overwhelming support -- a $10.5 billion bill by voice vote and a follow-up $51.8 billion bill by a 97-0 vote in the Senate and 410-11 vote in the House.

"We are going to spare no effort to get them the help that they need," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said last week when asked about the spending total and the increasing deficit. "The president has made it clear, in meetings he's been having, that we are going to show the true compassion of America in all that we do."

Mr. King and others who voted against the $51.8 billion bill said the issue is not how much is being spent, but how.

Speaking by telephone from Louisiana, where he had spent the night at a Red Cross shelter in Baton Rouge, Mr. King said the trailer houses are a perfect example.

The first bill called for 200,000 trailers, at a cost of $3.3 billion. Then, even after learning that only 30,000 trailers could be delivered now, the administration requested money for 100,000 more in the second bill, for a total cost of $4.9 billion.

They will be located "some place about 100 miles north of New Orleans" in a temporary trailer-house city that eventually will be bulldozed, Mr. King said.

The White House Office of Management and Budget referred calls about trailer spending to the Department of Homeland Security, which referred calls to FEMA. The agency did not return two messages for comment yesterday.

Republicans' willingness to spend surprised Democrats, who joked that they were at risk of being outdone.

"The only language they know is money," said one House Democratic chief of staff, who asked not to be named. "They're being Democrats because they're trying to show how they care by shoveling money."

But Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, said Democrats aren't worried about being outspent, especially with Republicans still talking about slowing growth in Medicaid spending and passing $70 billion in tax cuts later in the year.

"At some point, they're going to fall back on their usual fiscally conservative ways," the spokesman said.

Conservatives said they can only hope so, because agencies won't control themselves.

"Fifty billion dollars at the first trot that easily, that little opposition, and there's no resistance," said Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, who voted against the bill. "FEMA will act like any federal agency -- the question isn't how much we need, it's how much we can get."

He called for passing several smaller bills so FEMA would have to return each time and justify its request.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican and a leading budget hawk who voted for the $51.8 billion bill, said his worry is not the spending total.

"This is not a debate about how much we spend today. It's a debate about whose bank account it's drawn on," he said.

Mr. Hensarling and other Republicans said that instead of adding to the debt, the money should be partially offset by spending cuts.

Asked last week about cuts, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, said it was up to the Appropriations Committee to write the bill.

DeLay spokesman Kevin Madden said there have been three disasters from Katrina: the hurricane itself, the flooding and the displacement of hundreds of thousands of people. He said politics didn't enter into the decision to spend on rescue and recovery.

"The reason we've provided the resources is because that's the money needed to immediately rescue people, to begin the recovery and lastly to start the rebuilding," he said. "That has been the focus right now."

Spellings Says 372,000 Students Displaced (AJC/AP)

By Ben Feller, Associated Press

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina has booted at least 372,000 students from classrooms in Louisiana and Mississippi, and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said Monday there are no clear answers about who will pay to educate them.

DOJ_NMG_0004486

In an interview with The Associated Press, Spellings gave the broadest assessment yet of how the hurricane has affected schools at the start of their year.

In Louisiana, more than 247,000 public and private school students have been displaced. The storm forced 489 schools to close. At least six parishes have destroyed or damaged buildings, she said.

In Mississippi, more than 125,000 students have been forced elsewhere. Some 226 schools in 30 districts are closed. Almost 30 schools have been destroyed.

Spellings declined to estimate how much it will cost states to rebuild school districts or serve displaced students — or how much the federal government will cover.

"I shouldn't be talking about the details that I'm in negotiations with the White House and the (Capitol) Hill on," Spellings said. "As soon as I can talk about it, I want to talk about it."

President Bush has told Spellings to develop a plan to provide aid for the states.

In the interview, Spellings said she will ask Congress for unprecedented authority to ease aspects of a federal law governing the education of homeless children. She already had pledged to consider using her powers to waive parts of the law known as No Child Left Behind, including requirements on yearly testing and teacher quality.

Still, Spellings cautioned: "I obviously don't think this is an opportunity for every state in the country to get 'No Child Left Behind is off this year.' We're just not there yet."

In a letter obtained Monday by The Associated Press, Spellings waived a requirement for Mississippi that normally forces school districts to spend some money to obtain federal aid. That means some of the states can cut or shift spending without penalty.

Spellings denied the state's request to excuse some districts from having to make yearly progress on math and reading tests. Because those tests will not be given until the spring, she said, it is too soon to waive the "linchpin" of federal accountability.

It was Spellings' first response to a state request for help dealing with Katrina. Her department has a request pending from Texas.

School districts nationwide are enrolling displaced students who have friends or family from the Gulf Coast — or children who just have nowhere else to go.

Universities are absorbing tens of thousands of college students stranded by the hurricane. In Louisiana, an estimated 73,000 such students from public and private schools have been displaced and 15 campuses have been closed, Spellings' office said.

"I think the school community has responded very well. Obviously, we're part of that," she said. "We've tried to make this as easy as possible, with all the tools that we have to bring to bear immediately. I'll be accountable for that."

Overall, more than 25 states say they have taken in displaced students.

Texas schools expect an influx of roughly 60,000 students. In a letter to the Education Department, Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley said she expects to spend $7,500 per student this year. That means the price of educating evacuees could be at least $450 million.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has told the state it is eligible to be reimbursed for expenses such as temporary schools and mental health counselors. But the hiring of teachers and buying of books are not eligible expenses for relief aid, a FEMA memo says.

The Houston school system has taken in more than 3,000 students displaced students. If the figure reaches at least 5,000 students, as expected, the district's cost would be about $30 million, said spokesman Terry Abbott.

As for college students, Spellings said the government would not try to take back federal financial aid already given students who been forced to move to other schools for at least a semester. That could amount to hundreds of millions of dollars, out of about $100 billion disbursed annually.

The department is considering what to do about aid distributed to help affected students who opt to take time off or work rather than enrolling at a new school, a spokeswoman said.

Lack Of Clout In Congress May Hurt Louisiana's Recovery (NYT)

By David E. Rosenbaum

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - Not long ago, Louisiana had one of the most influential Congressional delegations in the Capitol.

In the last decade, Louisiana has provided the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee; the chairman of the House energy committee; the senior Democrat on the Senate energy committee and the water development subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee; and the Democratic chief deputy whip in the Senate.

But these powerful senators and representatives, who could be counted on to pull strings and twist arms, have recently retired from Congress, and the Louisiana delegation today, in the face of perhaps the state's worst calamity, has no one in a position of authority.

It is one of two states (Arkansas is the other) where both senators - David Vitter, a Republican, and Mary L. Landrieu, a Democrat - are under 50. The most prominent of seven representatives, Jim McCrery, is the fifth-ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee.

No one can say specifically what the diminished influence will mean for the state's efforts to get hurricane relief from Washington, but no one who follows Congress doubts that sooner or later the ramifications will be felt.

"Our senators are very good, but they'd be even better if they were committee chairmen," said former Senator J. Bennett Johnston, a Democrat who retired from the Senate in 1997 after 25 years in which he became a powerhouse on the energy and appropriations committees.

Former Representative Billy Tauzin, a Republican from Louisiana who was chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee before he left Congress in January, offered an example of the importance of a chairmanship.

The energy bill that Congress passed and President Bush signed this summer included $2 billion over 10 years for coastal protection and erosion in Louisiana, Mr. Tauzin said. In contrast, he said, a similar bill that was passed by the House last year, when he was chairman, and was then blocked by a filibuster in the Senate, had $15 billion to $20 billion for the same purpose.

"The delegation has lost all its power," said James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University.

Mr. Thurber pointed to former Representative Robert L. Livingston of Louisiana, who was chairman of the Appropriations Committee when he resigned in 1999, and said: "If Livingston were there, there would be an immediate and probably more focused expenditure response. There might even have been more earlier for that area before the storm."

Noting that Thad Cochran, Republican of Mississippi, is now chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Mr. Thurber said, "Mississippi is likely to fare better" in getting hurricane relief. "That's how it works."

Mr. Vitter, 44, who was elected to the Senate in November, acknowledged that the Louisiana Congressional delegation "has had a tremendous loss in terms of experience and seniority, which is very important in Congress."

But in the face of this crisis, the delegation, its members say, is counting on a bipartisan appeal to overcome the lack of seniority.

The seven House members had a conference call the week the hurricane struck to discuss the situation and agreed at a meeting in Baton Rouge on Sept. 5 to work together across party lines.

In that spirit, Mr. McCrery and William J. Jefferson, a Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, were cosponsors of a bill that the House passed on Thursday to give states emergency resources to satisfy the demands on the welfare system that were created by the hurricane.

Nowhere was the bipartisan approach more apparent than in the coordination between Mr. Vitter and Ms. Landrieu.

There has been bad blood between the two senators. When Mr. Vitter was running for the Senate last year, Ms. Landrieu campaigned vigorously against him, telling voters, "Don't send me a puppet to work with, send me a partner."

But the storm has brought them together. They spent the days immediately after the hurricane together in the Office of Emergency Preparedness in Baton Rouge.

DOJ_NMG_0004488

Mr. Vitter stayed in Louisiana last week touring all parts of the devastated area. On Friday, he visited shelters in Lafayette and Lake Charles. Then he went to Houston, where his wife and four children were staying with relatives, and visited evacuees at the Astrodome over the weekend. His home in Metairie, a suburb west of New Orleans, was mostly spared, Mr. Vitter said.

His goal, Mr. Vitter said, was to collect data so that he could persuade the Senate to address what he called "medium - and long-term issues" like reconstruction of New Orleans's infrastructure and measures "to make sure businesses and jobs come back."

Ms. Landrieu, 49, was more in the public eye. She returned to Washington in the middle of last week - her summer home in Slidell destroyed and her childhood home in New Orleans under several feet of water - and, saying her heart was heavy, delivered a stirring speech on the Senate floor on Thursday appealing for help.

"Today, I stand before my colleagues, Democrats and Republicans," she declared, "to report to the Senate that our people are hurting."

The prevailing view here is that in the short term, the government will give Louisiana everything it needs. "Right now," former Senator Johnston said, "there is huge public sympathy for all those people down there."

"The problem," Mr. Johnston continued - and this, he said, is where the state's loss of influence in Congress could matter - "is, what is the shelf life of that sympathy?"

Hurricane May End Up Costing La. A House Seat (HILL)

By Peter Savodnik

The Hill, September 13, 2005

The mass evacuation of coastal Louisiana triggered by Hurricane Katrina will likely cost the state one of its House seats, according to election officials.

Even before the devastating storm ripped through the Gulf Coast, Louisiana officials said their representation in Congress was in doubt.

“We were concerned about that anyway because of outmigration,” said Jennifer Marusak, a spokeswoman for Louisiana’s secretary of state.

With Katrina having emptied out New Orleans and much of the surrounding parishes, hundreds of thousands of people who once voted in Louisiana’s 1st, 2nd and 3rd Districts are no longer there. And many who never heard of Reps. Jim McCrery, Rodney Alexander and Richard Baker — Louisiana Republicans who represent the 4th, 5th and 6th Districts, respectively — are now camped out in those districts.

House members, their staffers and government officials in Baton Rouge and Washington say they’re loathe to talk about politics when there are still bodies to be recovered, children to be reunited with their parents and schools and hospitals to be reopened.

But the reality is that less than 14 months before voters are scheduled to head to the polls, it’s unclear which polls they’ll be heading to — and how this will affect Louisiana’s congressional balance of power as well as that of neighboring Alabama or Texas.

“Our delegation met last week, talked about the fact that Mobile is, for the moment, the largest the city along the central Gulf Coast,” said Rep. Jo Bonner (R-Ala.), whose 1st District encompasses the thoroughly thrashed port city.

“Clearly, we’ll do redistricting in 2010,” Bonner continued, saying that he and his “band of brothers” — Reps. Gene Taylor (D-Miss.) and Bobby Jindal (R-La.) and other Gulf Coast members — had been bound together by the storm. He added: “I don’t see a groundswell of interest in making any adjustments between now and 2010.”

Tricia Lowrey, a senior legislative analyst at the Louisiana House Governmental Affairs Committee, agreed with Bonner, noting that the government does not have the data to know where to redraw district lines. But, she quickly added, “It certainly will be a redistricting issue after the 2010 census.”

The plight of displaced Louisiana residents could make it politically difficult to strip the state of a House seat. It is unclear what how many residents will return to the New Orleans area after the city is rebuilt.

DOJ_NMG_0004489

Still, there is a realization at the state Legislature in Baton Rouge that Louisiana may have to take action before the end of the decade. Marusak and Lowrey said state lawmakers have discussed holding a special session before they are scheduled to convene again in March 2006.

That recognition may stem from growing pressure in central and northern Louisiana congressional districts that have become a temporary home for thousands of newcomers renting houses, filling public schools and clogging local highways.

Baker spokesman Michael DiResto estimated that the 6th, which is northwest of New Orleans and encompasses Baton Rouge, may have twice as many people in it as most every other district in the nation.

Baker said that motels, hotels and public-housing and rental units are filled in Baton Rouge and surrounding communities. He added that some business owners had bought 20 or 30 houses to relocate their entire operations to the state capital.

The "ideal" district, Lowrey said, has 638,425 people. Officials in Baton Rouge said the 4th, 5th and 6th districts are each housing more than 1 million people. Bonner said Alabama had picked up 20,000 residents, including as many as 5,000 in his district.

For now, no one wants to speculate about what a reconfigured congressional map in Louisiana might look like for fear of sounding crass or because most simply don't know who will be living where come 2006 or 2008, let alone 2010 or 2012.

But strong emotions are swirling around the interrelated questions of future congressional districts, the fate of New Orleans and who, exactly, will represent those former city residents if and when they come back.

"The congressman's main goal right now is rebuilding and moving forward with New Orleans," said Melane Roussell, spokeswoman for Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), whose 2nd District encompasses the ghost town that the Big Easy has become. "To assume that his district wouldn't exist when his election comes up would be to assume that New Orleans doesn't exist, and that's not a consideration — at all."

Said Baker: "New Orleans will come back. Will it be the million-person metro center it was before the storm is very difficult to predict."

For some members, any discussion of congressional boundaries or politics is too much to bear.

Aides to Rep. Charlie Melancon (D-La.), whose 3rd District south and west of New Orleans was savaged by Katrina, refused to answer questions about the future of the district, forwarding all calls to spokeswomen for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC).

"What they're focused on right now is, they're not even focused on this," Sarah Feinberg of the DCCC said. Sounding Democrats' rallying cry from the 2000 presidential recount, Feinberg said: "Congressman Melancon and the DCCC are … making sure that no one is disenfranchised."

Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.) is crafting a bill to ensure that evacuees, like military personnel and students, retain their voting rights, said his communications director, Corey Ealons.

Some officials and congressional aides privately acknowledged that Republicans may ultimately benefit from the hurricane, with Jindal holding onto or gaining population and Democrats Jefferson and Melancon being fused into a single seat.

Bonner was reluctant to speculate. "I think it's way too early to predict any fallout politically," he said. "It's hard to say because it's changing everyday."

Lawmakers Ask Bush To Save Gulf Coast Naval Bases (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

Congressmen from Mississippi and Texas asked President George W. Bush on Monday to seek the reversal of proposed closures for two Gulf Coast naval bases, saying the closures would further delay disaster response in the region.

In a letter, Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott (news, bio, voting record), a Republican, and Texas Rep. Solomon Ortiz (news, bio, voting record), a Democrat, asked Bush to demand that the Defense Base Realignment and Closure Commission (BRAC) reconsider its recommendation to close the Pascagoula Naval Station in Mississippi and the Ingleside Naval Station at Corpus Christi, Texas.

The two bases were among hundreds that the commission recommended for closure or cutbacks in a report submitted to Bush last week for the first round of domestic base closings in a decade.

Bush can ask the commission once to make revisions. After that he can reject the list outright or send it on to Congress, which can accept or reject it but can make no changes.

Lott, who lost a home in Pascagoula to Hurricane Katrina, and Ortiz said the closures would worsen a "strategic vulnerability" by eliminating a Navy fleet presence from the region.

"We believe the DOD/BRAC Commission recommendations contain perhaps an unintended consequence, because post-BRAC, every single surface ship will disappear in the Gulf Coast," they wrote.

They argued that the deployment of Navy ships from East Coast bases took several days to reach the area hit by Katrina. Removal of the ships from Pascagoula and Corpus Christi "would only further degrade the security of the Gulf Coast and our national energy production and distribution system."

Several other Navy facilities in the region were not on the closure list, including the New Orleans Naval Air Station and the Naval Construction Battalion Center in Gulfport, Mississippi.

Politicians in Massachusetts on Monday praised the wording of the final base closing commission report, which recommended "realignment" of the Otis Air National Guard Base on Cape Cod instead of full closure.

Although the commission still recommended the move of F-15 fighter jets elsewhere, it left units based at Otis at their full personnel strength -- a strategy it employed with other Air Guard cutbacks.

"Otis has a new lease on life," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), a Massachusetts Democrat. "The revised report means the base will continue, but with new missions that will give it a strong future role in protecting the security of the Commonwealth and the region."

The commission had faced legal challenges to Air National Guard cutbacks from several state governors who argued that federal law required their consent for such moves. Most of these were rejected by appeals courts or the Supreme Court on the grounds that the cutback decisions are not yet final.

Tax Bases Shattered, Gulf Region Faces Debt Crisis (NYT)

By Leslie Wayne

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

By destroying houses, businesses and peoples' lives, Hurricane Katrina also destroyed the tax base of the gulf region. Without homes, New Orleans cannot collect property taxes. Without tourists, it cannot collect hotel taxes. And without restaurants and stores, it cannot collect sales taxes.

And with so much in the gulf region shattered, the taxes and other revenue streams that once stood behind its municipal bonds are no longer there.

As a result, state treasurers and local financial officials from Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama have concluded that they will need federal aid to help pay billions of dollars in debt as well as finance the area's reconstruction.

So far, they have no formal plan, said John Kennedy, Louisiana's treasurer, but they are considering proposals for the federal government to make payments on existing bonds and cover short-term municipal operating costs. In addition, they are talking about issuing recovery bonds, similar to the $8 billion tax-exempt Liberty Bond program enacted by Congress after 9/11 - only on a far larger scale.

"We are expecting, hoping and will be asking for federal assistance," Mr. Kennedy said. "We are trying to determine what kind of federal relief we can expect. The municipalities that cannot make their bond payments are going to need help. We are hoping for substantial federal aid."

Last week, the National Association of Bond Lawyers wrote to the White House to propose a Hurricane Katrina Indebtedness Guarantee and Financing Act. That measure would provide cash advances to municipalities unable to pay bondholders and would offer federal guarantees on future debt. These advances would have to be paid back in 10 years. The group also called for creation of a Liberty Bond-type program.

"When a city such as New Orleans may be shut down for nine months," said Monty G. Humble, chairman of the association, "you know that access to capital may be an issue. These areas are so devastated."

State economic development officials from the region are heading to Washington today with a $52 billion plan involving tax credits and other development incentives to keep businesses from leaving. They are hoping that $30 billion will be directed to Louisiana, $15 billion to Mississippi and $7 billion to Alabama.

In the annals of municipal finance - with its share of bankruptcies, defaults and financially distressed cities - nothing comes close. Previous hurricanes, floods and earthquakes have had a more limited impact, affecting mainly residential areas and not damaging the business underpinnings of a city the size of New Orleans and the coastal areas around Biloxi and Gulfport, Miss.

"We have nothing to compare this to," said Dwight Denison, associate professor of public finance at the University of Kentucky. "You've never wiped out an entire tax base. And when you wipe out a tax base, you have nothing to tax."

Municipal bond insurers say their exposure in the region is $14 billion. Standard & Poor's, one of the main bond rating agencies, has put $8 billion in municipal debt from the area on its Creditwatch list, signaling possible trouble ahead, while Moody's Investor Service put $9.4 billion in debt on its Watchlist.

Already, late last week, a $36.3 million bond deal for the Orleans Levee District was canceled because the bond insurer, MBIA Inc., backed out.

"In the past you got a shock, like 9/11 or a natural disaster, and it can impair an issuer for a while, but they recover relatively quickly," said Donald Lipkin, a managing director in the municipal finance department at Bear Stearns, a New York brokerage firm. "Here, because of the level of impairment, there is a good chance some credits may not pay on a timely basis."

Municipal issuers in the affected areas say bondholders have nothing to worry about - for the moment. Enough money has been set aside, in nearly all cases, to cover debt service payments at least through the end of the year. The looming question is what happens when the money runs out.

New Orleans has over $2 billion in municipal bonds outstanding, from $650 million in general obligation bonds backed by property taxes to bonds used to pay for work on schools, levees, sewers, and transportation. There are more bonds for hospitals, schools and other public but nongovernmental entities no longer functioning.

Even in the best of times, New Orleans had it tough. Its bonds are rated just above junk and some entities have borrowed just to keep going. The Orleans Parish School Board, for instance, recently sold $50 million in revenue anticipation notes as it ran short of cash. The school district already had $600 million in bonds outstanding.

The city also has $500 million in debt for the New Orleans Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, where many sought refuge after the hurricane. That debt is backed by a share of hotel, food and sightseeing tour taxes.

"For the city, all the long-term debt is fine for a year," said Peter Kessenich, managing director at Public Financial Management in Atlanta, the city's bond adviser. "Beyond that, you will be sending tax bills to people who don't live there or to houses that are not worth much."

After 9/11, the city of New York issued $1 billion in one-year notes to cover immediate financial needs. But these were backed by personal income and sales taxes from a New York City still standing and an economy still functioning. Investors gobbled up those bonds, in part as a show of support.

Liberty Bonds, issued a year later, allowed businesses in lower Manhattan to borrow in the municipal market, where interest rates are lower than for corporate debt.

Mr. Kennedy, the Louisiana treasurer, insisted that his state had sufficient reserves and taxing power to meet all current and future state-level debt obligations and that bankruptcy was not an option. "It's not even in the realm of possibility," he said.

Even so, Mr. Kennedy acknowledged that many local municipalities might not make their debt payments once their reserves run out. As soon as he was able to return to his office after the hurricane, Mr. Kennedy started weekly meetings of local officials, bond underwriters, lawyers and trustees from the affected areas to discuss the many issues.

More than 25 percent of the personal income taxes in the state come from the New Orleans area, and much of that income will no longer exist. As a result, the state government could be hard pressed to help cash-strapped municipalities.

Mr. Kennedy is also holding weekly conference calls with bond rating agencies and institutional investors to keep them abreast of the situation.

In Mississippi, where Gulfport and Biloxi have been hit hard, the state treasurer, Tate Reeves, has been holding similar meetings and is sending out a positive message.

DOJ_NMG_0004492

"We don't anticipate any interruption in debt-service payments," Mr. Reeves said. "For some local issuers, making debt-service payments will be a challenge, no question. But I anticipate no defaults from public issuers in Mississippi." Both Standard and Poor's and Moody's have put $3 billion of Mississippi debt on watch lists.

Mr. Reeves said he thought his state would bounce back faster than many might expect, pointing out that power was already being restored in the coastal areas.

Defaults in the municipal finance market are rare and bankruptcies even rarer. Even during the Depression, 4,770 issues defaulted on $2.85 billion in debt, but most eventually paid it back. In 1994, Orange County in California went into bankruptcy (and paid back all the debt after a two-year delay) and in the late 1970's, Cleveland filed for bankruptcy.

Bond insurers have never had to make debt-service payments because of a natural disaster, but that may change. Drawing on insurance is a last step, and municipalities must pay insurers back for any money used.

"Bond insurers will definitely have to step up to the table," said Bart Hildreth, a public finance professor at Wichita State University.

It is also almost unheard of for the federal government to be asked to pick up debt-service costs for local municipalities. In the 1975 fiscal crisis in New York City, Washington guaranteed bonds issued by the city, but never had to pay anything and actually made money on the deal.

At the moment, most attention is on the immediate crisis. But the White House is aware of the coming financial challenge.

"As we move forward, we will be taking a closer look at the broader needs," said Scott Milburn, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget. "Municipal bonds falls into that category."

Charitable Giving Outpaces That From Other Disasters (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Donations for the victims of Hurricane Katrina have come in at a blistering pace that exceeds that of other recent disasters, charities are saying.

Almost all of the money is going to the American Red Cross, in large part because other international relief and development organizations simply do not have significant operations in the United States. Some groups, like Oxfam and Mercy Corps, are now reassessing their long-held assumption that the federal government is equipped to handle American crises and are taking steps to help as well.

Americans donated more than $738 million to relief efforts through Sept. 11, according to The Chronicle of Philanthropy. In the 10 days after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, $239 million was collected, while $163 million was collected in the nine days after the tsunami last December.

Giving has been made even easier this time by the Internet and by companies. More than half of the donations have been made online.

Stacy Palmer, editor of The Chronicle of Philanthropy, described her own theory about why there was a quick deluge of money.

"I really think the biggest reason has got to be people seeing government agencies not doing the right thing," Ms. Palmer said, "and that drove them to support a private response and do it quickly by sending it online."

The American Red Cross had booked $584 million in gifts and pledges by Sept. 11, an outpouring that is helping underwrite the biggest relief effort in the organization's history. But the group's role is purely as a first responder, filling urgent needs for shelter, food and clothing.

Concerns are emerging that donors will be tapped out when the time comes for long-term rebuilding and recovery, needs that may not be easily met by the government.

"Right now, donors are responding to pictures of desperate people," said Hank Goldstein, vice chairman of the American Association of Fundraising Counsel's Trust for Philanthropy. "The hard and expensive work is the rebuilding to come."

DOJ_NMG_0004493

Companies have made it easier for consumers to make gifts. Whole Foods allows its shoppers to add an amount for hurricane victims at checkout, raising more than $1 million, and Amazon.com has raised more than $10 million for the Red Cross through its Web site.

Normally contemplative foundations have responded with alacrity. Among those making special grants for disaster relief are the Lilly Endowment, with $20 million, and the Hilton Foundation, with $6 million.

And corporations have found ways to put their assets to use in the relief effort. The Target Corporation committed $1.5 million to the Red Cross, allowed a parking lot outside a Baton Rouge store to become a command center and will soon hand over a closed store in Wichita, Kan., to the Salvation Army, which wants to use it for a warehouse and distribution.

Charities, too, are sawier, Ms. Palmer said. The American Red Cross used e-mail addresses collected during the Asian tsunami to reach out to previous donors.

It is operating 675 shelters in 23 states and Washington, with 39,000 volunteers and 270 emergency rescue vehicles. It has given help to 161,000 survivors and, together with the Southern Baptist Convention, has served six million hot meals. It also is covering hotel accommodations for many.

The organization originally said it would need $130 million to address the immediate needs, but that assessment has been thrown out, said Devorah Goldburg, a spokeswoman for the Red Cross.

"Typically, we open a shelter, the hurricane happens, people hang out there maybe a week or so and then everyone goes home," Ms. Goldburg said. "This time, there's nothing to go home to."

Oxfam and Mercy Corps, more accustomed to dealing with disasters in far-flung locales than in their backyards, have dispatched small teams to the area to offer expertise and started raising money.

"It had been our assumption that in a domestic emergency, the emergency phase would be effectively handled by the various agencies charged with handling domestic emergencies," said Stephen Greene, a spokesman for Oxfam America. "Katrina has shaken those assumptions for us, and we've responded accordingly in the absence of a prompt and effective initial response."

This is the first time that Oxfam has mounted a relief effort in the United States, though it has long worked with local organizations on projects. It cannot deploy water bladders and tanks to provide clean water because its warehouses and equipment are closer to areas of recurring need in the developing world. Oxfam is working with local churches in Biloxi, Miss., to provide housing for 150 people.

Mercy Corps has sent 12 people to Baton Rouge, several of whom worked in Indonesia after the tsunami. Among the lessons from that disaster were getting the victims involved in the rebuilding process to create income and jump-starting local businesses that provide essential products and services.

"Most of our work in the U.S. in responding to disasters has been to raise money for other organizations," said Neal Keny-Guyer, Mercy Corps' chief executive. "As the scale became obvious, and local and federal government capacity seemed to be overwhelmed, that's when we thought it might be worthwhile to get more involved."

Corporate Giving Reaches $547 Million (USAT)

By Del Jones

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Wal-Mart, Office Depot and General Electric are the largest corporate givers so far to the hurricane relief effort, all near or surpassing $20 million in cash and products, say three organizations that are tracking it.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce says 145 companies had each pledged $1 million or more in cash and products through Monday. In all, 396 companies have given $409 million, says executive director Stephen Jordan of the chambers' Center for Corporate Citizenship. Companies have collected another $138 million in contributions from customers, for $547 million that will likely soon pass the $565 million raised for tsunami relief. Jordan predicts the total will likely be about $1 billion, surpassing the record $750 million collected after Sept. 11, 2001.

Office Depot is based in Delray Beach, Fla., so it is sensitive to hurricane disasters, CEO Steve Odland says. The company donated $1 million to the American Red Cross before Hurricane Katrina hit. Its total giving is up to $18 million, mostly in products, including $4 million in inventory at five New Orleans stores. Office Depot told city officials to take the merchandise, but Odland doesn't know how much looters took.

Wal-Mart has no estimate on how much was looted from its New Orleans stores, but spokeswoman Sarah Clark says those "millions" were not included in Wal-Mart's $20 million total. It has given $17 million in cash, the largest corporate cash contribution to date.

Other large contributions are coming from foundations with corporate roots. The heirs of Wal-Mart founder Sam Walton have given $15 million. Lilly Endowment, which is unaffiliated with Eli Lilly except that Lilly stock is its main asset, has donated $20 million. Lilly, the company, gave $1 million in cash, $1 million in insulin.

The Business Roundtable, an organization of about 160 CEOs of large corporations, says its companies have contributed $111 million in cash and $56 million in products as of Monday.

Compassion motivates most companies. But there are advantages to donating products instead of cash, because the IRS allows a tax deduction greater than the products' costs, says Curt Weeden, president of the Association of Corporate Contributions Professionals. He says it's possible some companies will use the disaster to unload hard-to-sell products.

Companies might be giving to the point that it's starting to hurt. Most giving after the Dec. 26 tsunami was charged to the 2005 budget, and another major disaster this year could mean large cuts to the arts and other more traditional charities as companies react to an "invasion of their pretax profit lines," Weeden says.

Corporations must make money to be viable, and "unlike the government, don't have the luxury to print money," he says.

If corporate giving reaches $1 billion, it will amount to a single day of what the government is spending on Katrina relief. Congress has already approved $62 billion.

Although small relative to government spending, corporate giving is invaluable, Weeden says, especially where it comes to volunteer efforts and intangibles such as large amounts of shelter and space. Navistar has offered a 7,800-square-foot facility with 10 loading docks.

Companies also offer efficiency. Whole Foods Market says it responded faster than any government or non-profit relief group by serving 300,000 meals of gumbo and jambalaya for evacuees and rescue workers. Merck employee Shawn Walls delivered a package of emergency medicine to evacuees in Georgia.

Anheuser-Busch has converted some capacity at four breweries from beer to water and used its own trucks to get 4 million white aluminum cans worth about $1 million to thirsty people. "You can't drink money," Anheuser-Busch spokeswoman Francine Katz says.

Total giving is higher than reported, Jordan says, because many companies give without issuing a press release. But there is an opportunity for public relations. "We hope that not too far in the future, (evacuees) will want to toast our efforts with a can of Budweiser," Katz says.

Perfume maker Creed has donated front-row seats for a concert at Carnegie Hall for auction. "Even as one enjoys luxury, such as a fine fragrance or an exceptional concert, one must also serve humanity," said Emmanuel Saujet, CEO of Creed's American division, in a press release.

Many Texas schools require uniforms, and apparel maker Lollytogs is donating 120,000 uniforms to evacuee students. Atkins Nutritionals, which filed for bankruptcy protection this year, is donating almost $2 million in nutrition bars. Ford Motor is giving used vehicles. General Motors is giving free OnStar use in the area. Hooters waitresses at one Florida restaurant donated 100% of their tips Monday, and another restaurant plans a teeter-totter fundraiser, where customers pledge money depending on how long waitresses can stay on the playground equipment.

Employee giving is not counted as corporate giving, but companies including Baxter, Chubb and Verizon are among those that try to influence their employees with a $2 match for every $1 they contribute. GE says it has collected more than $2 million from employees and retirees in addition to $16 million from the company, including $10 million in equipment such as power-generation and water-purification units.

On Friday, Starbucks Coffee pledged $5 million over five years. Weeden says that underscores a trend he is noticing. Large corporate grants have been slower in coming than after the tsunami or Sept. 11 attacks because companies see Katrina relief as a protracted effort, and they will be asked for more down the road. "It's a long haul," Weeden says.

Hurricane Nurtures More Models Of Compassion (WP)

By Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Third-graders are selling pickles at a school in Kalamazoo, Mich., to raise money for Hurricane Katrina victims, and here in Bethesda, high school students are collecting thousands of backpacks for needy children. There are read-a-thons, talent shows and pizza parties being thrown across the country -- all held with the purpose of helping Americans in distress.

But in a marriage of compassion and convenience, some students moved by the victims' plight have also been able to help themselves by earning credits toward their school's service requirement.

Thousands of schools across the nation require some form of service from their students. Maryland was the first and remains the only state that has made it a requirement for a high school diploma. No one is questioning the enormous compassion and can-do attitude among young people. But for those who have supported or opposed mandatory service, the recent outpouring has reopened the debate on whether compassion can be taught.

"Is it a good idea to make it mandatory?" Bernice Lerner, director of Boston University's Center for the Advancement of Ethics and Character, asked about service. "It depends very much on the program. Sometimes they are done very well, and sometimes they are not. If you get the right person in charge, and they are doing it thoughtfully, giving students an opportunity to reflect and have an educational component involved, it can be very strong.

"You want to aim to do some soul-turning."

That may not be what often happens in these programs -- a Frost Middle School student, for example, earned credit hours for collecting trash at a Bethesda community baseball game, learning from the experience that "I never want to be a garbage man."

But supporters say that short of a national disaster, in times when society more naturally obsesses on Brad and Angelina than the underprivileged, schools seeking to turn out well-rounded citizens need to nurture a habit of helping.

Although educators debate whether compassion can actually be taught, many agree that it can be modeled and that it is as important as math and science, said Pamela Meador, coordinator for student service learning in Montgomery County. And something less than a turn of the soul as a result is worthwhile, too.

Detractors say that it is counterintuitive to force people to volunteer and that making it mandatory defeats the very notion of instilling a lifelong habit because it breeds resentment. Also, crafty students can get the requirement done without much thought. Some say it is the responsibility of home and church, not schools, to foster morality. Others worry that some students who do endless community service, well beyond the requirement, are simply trying to pad their college applications.

And then, Meador said, there are the parents who "complain that their kids are just too busy for this. He has basketball, tennis, no time."

In Montgomery, which has the state's largest public school system, students can choose from dozens of approved programs or find one themselves to complete their service.

They are encouraged to start earning their required 60 credit hours of public service early in middle school, in large part because it is easier to learn good habits at a younger age, said Teresa Salzano, the student service coordinator at Frost.

Salzano opposed the mandatory program when it began 13 years ago, but she has since changed her mind, saying she has seen children learn valuable lessons about themselves and the world by performing service. One of the important ones is that even a young child can make a difference in someone else's life.

"Some students may not see value in it until they actually do it," she said. "And some may never see the value. But enough do."

Katrina Hauprich, 12, a seventh-grader at Benjamin Banneker Middle School in Burtonsville, is one who does. Although she has until the end of her senior year to complete her requirement, she already completed it -- by working with deaf students this summer -- and wants to continue performing service.

"It's really fun, usually," she said. "I don't do it just for the hours. You get to meet a lot of kids. It's fun to work with them."

Although some students may think that service programs are a new form of torture devised by their teachers, the push for community service has been developing since the start of the 1900s when school systems did seek to teach morality, believing such lessons would create more well-rounded individuals.

There are numerous small studies showing various academic benefits of public service projects, including a decline in absenteeism and an improvement in grades, but nobody knows how long the lessons last and whether these young people grow into adults who readily engage in projects to help others.

Still, the short-term outlook has many teachers, principals and parents across the country thrilled with the voluntary student reaction to Katrina and impressed with the efforts to raise funds.

"Students are also going out of their way to help each other, which has reinforced a positive culture in our school," Scott Murphy, principal of William H. Farquhar Middle School in Olney, wrote in an e-mail.

And, he quipped, it's "a nice alternative to bullying."

Congress Delays Plans To Extend Bush's Tax Cuts (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- In a major shift of priorities after Hurricane Katrina, Republican leaders in Congress have delayed plans to extend dividend and capital gains tax cuts and may shelve them for the rest of the year.

The House and Senate had planned a fall legislative agenda around a massive budget bill that extended to 2010 the 15% tax rate on dividends and capital gains signed by President Bush two years ago. The cut was one of the president's signature initiatives and is seen inside the White House as a key part of his economic legacy.

The 15% rate isn't scheduled to expire until the end of 2008 -- meaning there's still time to push an extension through. But Republicans, chastened by the costs of rebuilding the Gulf Coast and negative public assessments of Washington's initial response to the hurricane, have decided that taking any action on the bill is politically untenable at least until late October in the suddenly changed political and budgetary environment.

"Events have consequences," said Bill Hoagland, the top budget aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. "The overall environment here has been shaped by the large [Katrina] spending bills and I'm starting to sense that some people are getting a little nervous about the deficit."

In recent days, Congress has approved $62.3 billion in emergency aid for Katrina, and yesterday Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg of New Hampshire said the Bush administration is likely to request another $50 billion within a month.

Also in question with the delay are prospects for significant new curbs on Medicaid, the joint federal-state health-care program for the poor. The budget bill would cut $10 billion from the program over the next five years, but a bipartisan group of senators is calling such cuts inappropriate at a time when tens of thousands of poor people have been displaced from their homes.

Lawmakers do appear likely to approve a temporary measure exempting millions of middle-income taxpayers from paying the so-called Alternative Minimum Tax, which has increased the tax burden for a growing portion of Americans in recent years. Without such action, which enjoys strong support among senators of both parties, those middle-income taxpayers would face a significant tax increase next year.

Tax-writing committees on Capitol Hill also are looking to act quickly on new, targeted tax relief to help residents and businesses in storm-stricken areas get back on their feet. Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa and ranking Democrat Max Baucus of Montana yesterday unveiled a $5 billion to $7 billion package of tax relief for individuals that would make it easier for victims to get access to cash.

Moreover, congressional Republicans and the White House remain in favor of ultimately extending the dividend and capital gains tax cuts, which they see as a boon to economic growth.

Still, a delay in extending tax cuts, coming at a time when President Bush's popularity has dropped in polls, could introduce new doubts about whether the president's tax cut will outlast his presidency. The White House has considered the early part of the president's second term its most auspicious window for action. Next year, Congress will be enmeshed in midterm election pressures. After that, the president faces the prospect of seeing his influence ebb as a lame duck with the nation looking toward the election of his successor in 2008.

A separate, 17-point bill that congressional leaders hope to usher through the Senate this week would allow flood victims to withdraw funds from retirement plans without penalty, give them more time to pay their taxes and give businesses tax credits for employing workers from affected areas and enhanced deductions for donations of food and books. "We want to give the proper tools to businesses that will be hiring displaced workers to create new jobs," Sen. Baucus told reporters.

Lawmakers in both chambers also plan further measures to allow displaced students to deduct room and board from their taxable income, and to spur rebuilding efforts through the issuance of tax-exempt bonds and acceleration of capital expensing and depreciation for companies involved.

"These provisions will help revitalize business activity and employment in the affected areas, restore the states' ports and trade capacity and rebuild the energy infrastructure," said House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of California and top Democrat Rep. Charles Rangel of New York in a joint statement.

Meanwhile, the administration announced it would consider cutting tariffs on lumber from Canada and cement from Mexico to guard against price spikes that might accompany the post-Katrina rebuilding effort. The tariffs have been in effect for years amid complaints from domestic producers about dumping of low-priced goods from across the border. But a Treasury spokesman said the administration can adjust the tariffs under special circumstances.

Republicans on Capitol Hill previously had delayed a vote on permanent repeal of the estate tax. That vote had been scheduled as the Senate's first order of legislative business after its summer vacation, but Majority Leader Frist feared that it looked unseemly to approve a tax cut affecting the most affluent 2% of Americans at a time when thousands of poor New Orleans residents were displaced and suffering as a result of Katrina.

The Senate may return to the issue this fall, but under changed political dynamics that may lead to a different outcome. Prospects were already dim for attracting the 60 votes needed to overcome a Democratic filibuster against full repeal. Now there's new impetus behind compromise talks that would preserve the levy for a reduced number of the most valuable estates. Legislative aides in both parties agree that the Democrats' hand has been strengthened in those talks, which include Sen. Baucus, Sen. Grassley and Republican Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona.

The large, so-called reconciliation budget bill containing the capital-gains and dividend-tax-cut extensions had become a prized legislative vehicle. Under Senate rules, it cannot be held up by a filibuster, which means that passage requires just 51 votes rather than 60.

That means that by delaying its consideration -- and perhaps scrapping it for the year -- the Senate has cast a cloud over numerous provisions that lawmakers had hoped to attach aside from the dividends and capital-gains tax-cut extensions.

Other tax provisions in question include a savings credit for low-income taxpayers valued at $5 billion over four years. The credit encourages low-income Americans to save money for retirement by matching as much as 50% of contributions up to $2,000 to 401(k) and IRA plans. About five million Americans use the credit each year, according to H&R Block. It is due to expire at the end of 2006.

The delay in the budget bill also threatens dozens of other issues that lawmakers hoped would hitch a ride on the legislation because the rules for approval make passage easier.

Sen. Grassley, for instance, has planned to include a measure cracking down on tax-exempt organizations. Sen. Frist wants to squeeze a few billion dollars from the guaranteed student loan program to pay for scholarships for low-income Americans earning advanced math, science and engineering degrees. House Education and Workforce Committee Chairman John Boehner of Ohio wants to add pension-reform legislation. And Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens of Alaska plans to use revenue from auctioning off new airwaves to create a billion-dollar fund to upgrade television sets for low-income Americans when television broadcasters switch from sending their signals over analog to digital.

If Congress fails to return to the budget reconciliation bill, those issues will face a more difficult future passing as stand-alone measures. Sen. Stevens's digital television fund, for example, would have to remain a part of a complicated digital television bill that has languished on Capitol Hill for years.

According to the Securities Industry Association, the lower rates enacted in 2003 for capital-gains and dividend taxes saved 24 million households an average of about $950 on their 2004 taxes. The reduced rates for dividends, meanwhile, seem to have encouraged more companies to offer them. In 2004, 113 publicly traded companies decided to begin paying dividends; previously, an average of 22 companies a year added dividends, according to the industry trade group.

House Appropriators Ready To Act On CR Request (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

In what has become an annual tradition, House and Senate lawmakers will likely need to pass at least one continuing resolution to fund government operations. As the clock winds down on fiscal 2005, the chambers have completed work on only two of 11 spending bills.

While House leadership has yet to formally seek a CR, the chamber's appropriators are nonetheless readying for the inevitable request.

House Appropriations spokesman John Scofield said the measure will be crafted to hold down federal spending levels.

"We are preparing a resolution that would fund government programs at the lower of House- or Senate-passed [spending levels] or last year," Scofield said. The House passed its version of the spending bills prior to the July Fourth recess.

"We're serious when we said we're committed to sticking to the budget," he later added.

Across the Capitol, Senators resumed consideration of the Commerce, Justice and science spending bill Monday night, expected to be the sixth appropriations measure that will be completed in the chamber.

A Senate Appropriations aide said the chamber is focused on completing the remaining measures and has not yet prepared a resolution to continue funding after Sept. 30.

"If we need to continue things, then we'll do short-term CRs," the aide noted, adding that it is too early in the process to provide any details on the resolution itself.

In the meantime, House appropriators remain optimistic that the individual spending bills will be completed in coming months, circumventing the need for a consolidated appropriations measure.

"Our preference is still to do these bills one by one," Scofield said, noting that House Appropriations Chairman John Lewis (R-Calif.) has committed to not creating omnibus legislation.

Although Congress' workload has increased significantly in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, the additional efforts are not expected to halt the appropriations process.

Citing the passage of individual spending bills in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which similarly required lawmakers to pass significant emergency spending legislation, Scofield noted: "There's precedent for this."

However should both chambers fail to come to agreement on legislation including the Energy and water spending bill, the House Appropriations panel is prepared to seek full-year continuing resolutions to fund the affected agencies and programs, Scofield said.

Survivors Could Get 401(k) Access (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 13, 2005

The IRS is expected to ease 401(k) restrictions this week to allow those affected by Hurricane Katrina to tap into their retirement funds.

Representatives of organizations involved in retirement issues — including Profit Sharing/401(k) Council of America, T. Rowe Price, Mercer Human Resource Consulting and Spark Institute — say they expect the IRS to announce this move in the next few days.

In a statement, the IRS would say only that it is "looking for ways to provide as much help as possible to Katrina victims."

Retirement-plan providers believe the IRS is likely to say:

•Hurricane Katrina would be considered a hardship, and those affected could qualify for a hardship distribution from their 401(k) plans.

DOJ_NMG_0004499

"It's both the magnitude of the elements of the disaster and the length of time it will take to recover" that is prompting this, says Thomas Schendt, a partner at Alston & Bird law firm, which represents financial-services providers.

•Employers and plan providers could ease the rules on paperwork normally required to get a loan or hardship distribution. This would allow workers to get the funds faster, says Deborah Novotny, a T. Rowe Price vice president.

•Companies that don't currently allow 401(k) loans or hardship distributions would be able to provide these withdrawals. Currently, 95% of large employers allow loans and nearly the same percentage allow hardship withdrawals, says Hewitt Associates. Smaller companies, however, are less likely to offer these withdrawals.

Employers and retirement-plan providers wouldn't have to adopt the IRS' guidance, but they could use the eased restrictions to get funds to cash-strapped employees, according to Larry Goldbrum, general counsel for Spark.

Already, Fidelity Investments says it has seen a "significant increase" in hardship-withdrawal requests because of the hurricane.

Retirement funds make up a large chunk of many people's assets. Generally, workers should not take this money out. But "when you don't have a house and you have kids to feed, your priorities change," says Ed Ferrigno, a vice president at Profit Sharing/401(k) Council of America.

Monday, Sens. Max Baucus, D-Mont., and Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, announced a bill that would raise 401(k) loan limits and waive the 10% early-withdrawal penalty for people who have not yet reached age 591/2.

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Twisting the news

Los Angeles Times pundit Michael Kinsley, who used to work for CNN, says the network is coaching guests to "get angry" when they go on the air to discuss Hurricane Katrina.

"The TV news networks, which only a few months ago were piously suppressing emotional fireworks by their pundits, are now piously encouraging their news anchors to break out of the emotional straitjackets and express outrage," Mr. Kinsley said. "A Los Angeles Times colleague of mine, appearing on CNN last week to talk about Katrina, was told by a producer to 'get angry.' "

Mr. Kinsley's words were reported yesterday by the online Drudge Report. CNN's political stance was more or less confirmed by a New York Times article yesterday that suggested CNN host Anderson Cooper was heroic for scolding a Democratic senator who failed to condemn the Bush administration.

The New York Times article, written by Elizabeth Jensen, said: "Mr. Cooper's Sept. 1 interview with Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, marked a turning point in the tone of hurricane coverage as he snapped when she began thanking federal officials for their recovery efforts.

" 'Excuse me, senator, I'm sorry for interrupting,' Mr. Cooper interjected. 'I haven't heard that, because, for the last four days, I've been seeing dead bodies in the streets here in Mississippi. And to listen to politicians thanking each other and complimenting each other, you know, I got to tell you, there are a lot of people here who are very upset, and very angry, and very frustrated.

" 'And when they hear politicians slap -- you know, thanking one another -- it just, you know, it kind of cuts them the wrong way right now, because literally there was a body on the streets of this town yesterday being eaten by rats because this woman had been laying in the street for 48 hours."

The article did not say how Mrs. Landrieu responded, but she hasn't had a nice word to say about President Bush or federal relief efforts since then.

Politicizing Katrina

"So, while many Americans were busy contributing money, clothing and other necessities for hurricane-devastated Gulf Coast residents, what was Sen. Chuck Schumer up to?" the New York Post asks in an editorial.

"Raising money off the backs of Katrina's victims -- for the Democratic [Senatorial] Campaign Committee," the newspaper said.

DOJ_NMG_0004500

"In one of the more cynical tricks we've seen lately, Schumer's DSCC urged visitors to its Web site to sign a petition urging the firing of Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown, the focus of much of the criticism of the federal response to Katrina. ...

"A click on the petition opened a page requesting a donation to the DSCC, the party organization focused on recruiting and supporting Senate Democrats.

"Only after the press blew the whistle did the tasteless scheme end. The committee yanked the link and agreed to donate any funds raised to charity. ...

"Chuck Schumer should be ashamed of himself."

The weatherman

Former Vice President Al Gore has condemned the Bush administration for its response to Hurricane Katrina, and suggested that Mr. Bush was responsible for the storm, which Mr. Gore attributed to global warming.

"When the corpses of American citizens are floating in toxic floodwaters five days after a hurricane struck, it is time not only to respond directly to the victims of the catastrophe, but to hold ... the leaders of our nation accountable," Mr. Gore told environmentalists Friday at the Sierra Club's national convention in San Francisco.

Mr. Gore had been scheduled to give a speech to state insurance commissioners in New Orleans last weekend about the likelihood that global warming will spawn increasingly deadly hurricanes. He decided to take his speech to San Francisco after that conference was canceled, the Associated Press reports.

"The warnings about global warming have been extremely clear for a long time. We are facing a global climate crisis. It is deepening. We are entering a period of consequences," Mr. Gore said.

Spend, spend, spend

"With almost no debate and with precious few provisions for oversight, Congress has passed President Bush's mammoth $62 billion request for emergency Katrina relief," John Fund writes at www.OpinionJournal.com.

"House Speaker Denny Hastert says the final total will 'probably [be] under the cost of the highway bill' that Congress passed last month with a price tag of $286.4 billion," Mr. Fund said.

"Despite such sums, there are few calls for offsetting cuts in other programs, apart from anti-war opportunists who see in Katrina a chance to undermine the Iraq effort. Last week Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma asked White House Budget Director Josh Bolten if he planned to continue to pursue budget reductions the administration had already proposed in its January budget. Mr. Bolten said he 'didn't have time' to worry about that.

"All this leaves Mr. Coburn and other budget hawks wondering what has happened to what might be called 'the Republican wing of the Republican Party.' 'The president could exercise leadership by insisting that we set priorities and offset the cost of Katrina relief by making changes elsewhere,' says Mr. Coburn. 'Sadly, we don't have that leadership.'"

Top priority

By a 3-to-1 margin, Americans say border control is far more important to national security and fighting crime than gun control, according to a nationwide Zogby survey.

The survey, commissioned by the Second Amendment Foundation, found that 70 percent of the respondents said border control is more important, while only 23 percent favor more gun control. Seven percent of the respondents were undecided.

The survey was conducted Sept. 6-7 by randomly contacting more than 1,150 households around the country. The margin of error was 2.9 percent, the polling firm said.

Mayoral hopefuls

The four Democrats vying for the chance to face New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg in November spent their final hours before today's primary shaking hands at subway stations and senior centers, hoping to make an impression that will translate into votes.

Gifford Miller, Anthony Weiner and C. Virginia Fields attended memorial remembrances, but Fernando Ferrer had lunch and a photo-op with the Rev. Al Sharpton, who has endorsed him.

DOJ_NMG_0004501

A poll by the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute released yesterday found Mr. Weiner in second place with 25 percent to Mr. Ferrer, who has 32 percent. Thirteen percent of likely Democratic voters in the survey were undecided. The winner needs 40 percent to avoid a runoff in two weeks.

GOP Arrows Being Aimed (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 13, 2005

With Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) emerging as the clear leadership favorite to become the next chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, rank-and-file Republican opponents are questioning his loyalty to the party in a last-gasp effort to derail his candidacy.

King's GOP opponents have compiled a one-page collection of negative remarks that King has made over the years about members of the Republican Party. The sheet, which was obtained by The Hill, includes a King quote from 1996 criticizing then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and then-Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas) for comments the two made describing union leaders as "big labor" and "union bosses."

"It's a Southern, anti-union attitude that appeals to the mentality of hillbillies at revival meetings," King told the Memphis Commercial Appeal in response to comments made by Gingrich and Armey.

The sheet also includes a King quote calling members of the historic Republican class of 1994, who took part in the first House GOP majority in nearly four decades, "self-righteous."

"Each of them thinks he has received tablets from God," King told Insight magazine in July 1996.

In addition, the one-pager lists a 2000 King quote asserting that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) would receive the Catholic vote during his primary race against then-Texas Gov. George Bush because Bush was "willing to shake hands with bigots to get votes," in reference to Bush's controversial speech at Bob Jones University in Greenville, S.C.

The list of quotes comes as conservative Republicans fight to ensure that the new chairman of Homeland Security shares their commitment to spending restraint.

"Keeping homeland funding free of earmarks has been a recent struggle," one Republican aide wrote in an e-mail. "What happens if the committee is run by someone who thinks that buying fire ladders is a federal government responsibility?"

King and other candidates for the post have submitted their pitch letters for the chairmanship to the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC). The committee does not plan to meet until tomorrow, the same day candidates will make their presentations to the Steering Committee, aides said.

Last year, House conservatives questioned Rep. Ralph Regula's (R-Ohio) commitment to fiscal responsibility during his race for the Appropriations Committee gavel and former Veterans Affairs Chairman Chris Smith (R-N.J.) was dismissed from his chairmanship for ignoring spending limits set by leadership.

King, however, said he does not think that the list of quotes is going to hurt his candidacy for the Homeland Security gavel.

"I am more than willing to be judged on my entire record," King told The Hill.

King is quick to point out that no one has done more for the Bush administration and that no one "has been more loyal to Denny Hastert [R-Ill.]," the House Speaker, than he has.

"I do not think anyone supported him more than I did," he said, adding that he has shown his loyalty long before he was being considered for any chairmanship.

King earned considerable praise from GOP leaders when he defended embattled Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) this spring.

As for the quotes, he said that they were indicative of "very turbulent times" for the party in 1996, when Gingrich was in his first term as Speaker of the House. At the time, King complained that the GOP was too focused on the gains it had made with Southern voters while failing to realize the importance of union members of the North — urban Catholics and voters of Irish and Italian descent.

"It is no secret that I said this," King said. "They were very turbulent, controversial times. That all changed when Denny Hastert became Speaker."

He also suggested that a look at his entire record would show that "it is pretty conservative."

"I do not think too many people took it personally," King added, recounting that Rep. Spencer Bachus (R-Ala.), a friend, sent him a box of old shoes, as a funny retort to King's "barefooted hillbillies" remarks.

The 28-member Republican Steering Committee is set to meet tomorrow to interview each of the candidates and likely choose a chairman.

In the meantime, the candidates — Reps. Curt Weldon (Pa.), John Linder (Ga.), Dan Lungren (Calif.) and Don Young (Alaska) — are scurrying to meet with as many members of the Steering Committee as possible before tomorrow's presentations.

Rep. Mac Thornberry's (Texas) name also has been circulated, but his office did not return calls to confirm his candidacy. Unlike the other contenders, Thornberry is not a member of the Homeland Security Committee; he sits on the House Armed Services Committee.

Over the August recess, both King and Weldon have intensified their public campaigns for the post. The other candidates preferred a member-to-member approach behind the scenes.

"There is a buzz in [leadership] circles that Peter King is the favorite," one GOP leadership aide said. "But it's been very difficult to keep a handle on it with all the Katrina activity."

"All I am hearing is good things," King said, adding that he is reluctant to believe anything until a final decision is made. "I could not have hoped to be in a better position than I am now."

Party fundraising, one of the major factors in most leadership races, has yet to become an issue for King, who readily admits he has not focused on filling the party's or his GOP colleagues' campaign coffers over the years.

"I keep waiting for the fundraising issue to come up, but nobody brought it up yet," he said. King does not have a leadership political action committee.

Instead, King bases his candidacy on an emotional appeal as a New Yorker whose life was changed dramatically by the Sept. 11 attacks.

He also highlights the work he has done as chairman of the Emergency Preparedness Subcommittee and the role he played in revising the formula that ensures homeland-security grants are based on threat analysis.

In contrast, Linder, who is also a member of the exclusive Ways and Means Committee, bases his candidacy largely on the significant contribution he has made in maintaining and expanding the House majority. Linder served as NRCC chairman during the 1998 election cycle, when Republicans unexpectedly lost a significant number of seats in the House.

In his letter to the Steering Committee obtained by The Hill, Linder stressed that, over the past five cycles, he has written more than $1 million in checks to the National Republican Congressional Committee. Linder also has given $350,000 directly to candidates in competitive races. He attached nine pages about his fundraising achievements to his letter to the Steering Committee.

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

Did Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) really chew out President Bush over the phone? The short answer is yes — but not really.

It all began when the fast- (and tough-) talking New York Republican greased the wheels for some New York firefighters who were dispatched to New Orleans for rescue-and-cleanup patrol after Hurricane Katrina. The firefighters wanted to meet the president during his brief stopover in the wiped-out city, so they called their man King to see if he could put the fix in.

New York City Fire Department Deputy Chief Bob Maynes called King on Sunday to say that he heard Bush was coming to the Big Easy, and that he and his team would like to meet the commander in chief. Any strings to be pulled, Congressman?

"I figured the odds were zero," King said. But he put a call into the White House anyway, then went on about his business, attending a 9/11 anniversary candlelight vigil Sunday. As he walked back to his car after the vigil, he retrieved an hours-old voice mail message from Maynes saying something like, "Thanks for your help. Looks like we might get to meet the president after all."

DOJ_NMG_0004503

Excited for his boys, King called Maynes back to see if they were successful. Battling overloaded mobile phone service, he finally got through on the fourth try and was startled — and maybe a little irked — to hear a voice saying, "You should be down here with your men."

What?! "Hey, I was trying to set up the meeting for you! Did it work out?" replied a slightly perturbed King. (Or at least that's what he recalls saying. HOH has a hunch that the language was a bit stronger.)

Again, the voice came back: "Pedro, how come you're not down here?" By now, the jig was up: It was W himself, who nicknamed King "Pedro" some time ago. And by now, Pedro was shaking in his boots.

"I thought I was talking to the fireman!" King said, laughing with embarrassment. He says he told Bush, "I'm sorry, I didn't know it was you, Mr. President."

"Gee, this guy doesn't even know who he's talking to!" Bush said to the New York firefighters, laughing his trademark laugh.

Bush, who had obviously grabbed the phone when Maynes saw that it was King calling, seemed to forgive Pedro. King said the president thanked him for being at the White House two days earlier for the medal ceremony honoring cops and firefighters killed in the line of duty on 9/11, and said of the firefighters, "These New York guys are great. They're the best."

Maybe a couple of photo-ops with those great, best guys in uniform could have boosted Bush's approval ratings after Katrina struck!

Partisan Politics by Wayside. It's not every day that a Democratic donor writes a $50,000 check to a Republican Member of Congress. But it happened, on Sept. 2, when House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) auctioned off one of his collectibles at the Kruse International Labor Day auto show in Indiana after taking heat from Democrats and journalists for initially deciding not to return to Washington, D.C., to approve Katrina relief legislation, and for saying it "doesn't make sense" to spend billions of dollars to rebuild New Orleans.

The guy who bought Hastert's 1977 Lincoln Continental is Houston attorney John O'Quinn, who also has written major checks this year to groups like the Progressive Patriots Fund, the campaign of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and the failed bid by former Texas Rep. Martin Frost to become Democratic National Committee chairman.

Hastert turned over every Democratic penny of his 50 grand to the American Red Cross hurricane relief mission. "It's nice to see people put partisanship aside and put money towards Hurricane Katrina relief charities," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said.

Coburn: Can't We All Just Get Along? Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) had a Rodney King moment during confirmation hearings for Judge John Roberts on Monday.

During his opening statement on the conformation's first day of hearings, Coburn got choked up during an appeal for bipartisanship when he said, "When I ponder our country ... my heart aches for less divisiveness, less polarization, less finger-pointing, less bitterness and less mindless partisanship, which, at times, sounds almost hateful to the ears of ordinary Americans."

But not everyone was taken in by the display of emotion. Keen observers noticed that moments before, Coburn had been doing a crossword puzzle from his seat in the hearing room. One snide Democratic observer who doubted the sincerity of Coburn's speech said, "And his head hurts for easier crossword puzzles."

He's Baaack. Former Sen. John Ashcroft (R-Mo.), after doing his best Dick Cheney routine, is out of hiding and back in the public spotlight. On Monday he made his first media appearance since leaving the Justice Department in February, appearing as a color commentator on CNN alongside veteran journalist-talking-heads Jeff Greenfield and Jeffrey Toobin.

And if that's not enough for you, hang on to your seats. The former attorney general and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, who formed the Ashcroft Group earlier this year, is expected to be doing lots and lots of TV in the weeks and months ahead.

"He's enjoyed his hiatus, but he's one of the most experienced negotiators of the Washington terrain. Folks have been asking for him and now he's happy to comment, consult and advise," boasts his former spokeswoman, Juleanna Glover Weiss, who also joined the newly up-and-running Ashcroft Group.

Republicans Win Again. Republicans retained their coveted Roll Call Cup on Monday in the annual Congressional Ryder Cup competition, which this year raised money to benefit charities helping with Hurricane Katrina relief.

DOJ_NMG_0004504

The GOP golfers, led by Rep. Mike Oxley (Ohio), won 10.5 to 9.5 to keep the title. The players raised $100,000 for the First Tee program to benefit youth. An additional $20,000 will be donated by the golfing Members to the hurricane-relief charity of their choice.

Tropical Storm Ophelia Slows, But Carolinas Stay Prepared (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WILMINGTON, N.C., Sept. 12 (AP) - Tropical Storm Ophelia stayed along the coast of the Carolinas on Monday, dropping slightly in strength from a hurricane as it barely moved toward land.

Although the storm was centered more than 200 miles offshore, nonresidents were ordered to leave one of North Carolina's Outer Banks islands and 300 National Guard troops were sent to mustering points along the coast. School systems in five counties closed, even though the storm's eye was predicted to remain offshore until Wednesday.

Many people acknowledged that they were paying closer attention to the storm because of the vast destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina along the Gulf Coast. Others insisted they would not let the milder storm disrupt their plans.

"My family is all coming in for a family reunion, including my 84-year-old mother," said Dodie Curtis, 62, of Guilford, Me., on the shore at Wrightsville Beach. "This is our family thing and we don't plan to go anywhere unless it gets a lot worse."

Any appearances to the contrary, Gov. Michael F. Easley said the state was doing its normal storm preparation.

"We have, unfortunately, a great deal of experience with hurricanes," Mr. Easley said. "I think one of the things people in North Carolina will be able to recognize is that this is the exact same pattern we always follow."

The storm was a minimal hurricane early Monday with sustained winds of 75 miles an hour, but by midday it had weakened to about 70 m.p.h., 4 m.p.h. below the threshold, the National Hurricane Center said.

Meteorologists warned, though, that the system had the potential to regain hurricane strength over the next day or so. A hurricane warning was issued from Cape Lookout south to Edisto Beach, S.C.

At 11 p.m., the storm was centered about 140 miles east-southeast of Charleston, S.C., and 210 miles south-southwest of Cape Lookout, the hurricane center said. It was moving northwest at about 3 m.p.h., with a gradual turn to the north expected in the next 24 hours.

With the storm's path uncertain, Gov. Mark Sanford of South Carolina called for a voluntary evacuation of oceanfront and riverside areas in his state's northeastern corner on Monday. Mr. Sanford was joined by officials in North Carolina's adjacent Brunswick County.

The storm's slow movement is its primary danger, bringing the likelihood that it will hang over eastern North Carolina for days, Mr. Easley said. Floods, prolonged power failures and severe wind damage were possible as the storm moved north from Wilmington to the Pamlico Sound, he said.

Mr. Easley ordered the National Guard to eastern North Carolina on Sunday, accompanied by swift-water and urban search and rescue teams, as well as seven helicopters.

He also ordered a mandatory evacuation of visitors from fragile Ocracoke Island, which is reachable only by ferry. Highway Patrol officers helped with the Ocracoke evacuation on Monday.

The Coast Guard closed state ports in Morehead City and Wilmington on Monday.

"I don't think I would be human if I said Katrina had no impact on me," Mayor Spence Broadhurst of Wilmington said after emerging from a meeting where he helped decide to call for voluntary evacuations.

Democrats Taking Offensive Posture (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

With Republican poll numbers falling and the nation focusing increasingly on domestic policy, House Democrats are feeling new political confidence and taking on a rare offensive posture against the GOP.

DOJ_NMG_0004505

Through mid-August, Democrats were feeling emboldened as public confidence dipped in the U.S. handling of the Iraqi conflict, Social Security reform and Congressional ethics. Then Hurricane Katrina brought mounting questions about the Bush administration's response to the disaster.

"Hurricane Katrina has certainly changed the political landscape in the short term," said one Democratic leadership aide. "Whether it does in the long term is another question."

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) was the first to call on Congress to return to session early to pass a relief package for the disaster area and led her party's call for Michael Brown, the then-director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to step aside.

Democrats were also quick to call for Congressional hearings and for a push back on the regular agenda to make room for Katrina-related legislation.

This week, Pelosi will lead the Democratic assault once again, scheduling at least three events on key issues on which Democrats charge the GOP has faltered. Democrats also will continue to raise questions about the Republican management of the federal government at a time when many Americans are looking for assistance.

Pelosi and other leaders will reiterate their call for the creation of a nonpartisan, independent commission to investigate the hurricane response, to urge creation of an independent anti-fraud panel to ensure proper oversight of the contracts awarded for the relief effort and to decry price gouging in the wake of rising fuel costs. The party also will announce the creation of a Democratic relief package for the victims of the hurricane.

One senior Democratic staffer said that Democrats feel not only that they are in a position to stake out some political ground, but that Pelosi is actually being heard.

"There are some opportunities here," said the aide. "The president's numbers are at an all-time low. We are showing that we can lead, and that we're the ones who are listening."

The latest polling by Newsweek Magazine shows President Bush's job approval rating at 38 percent, and reports that just 28 percent are satisfied with the way things are going. It also showed hopeful numbers for Congressional Democrats, with 50 percent of Americans preferring Democratic candidates versus 38 percent for Republicans.

The same survey also showed that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, 57 percent of Americans have lost confidence in the government's ability to handle another disaster.

One top Republican House staffer said the GOP acknowledges that the mood of the country is not high given the war, Katrina and gas prices. But the staffer said that Republicans will rebound by passing legislation to help the victims, rebuild the Gulf Coast and bolster fuel supplies.

"If we can show we are working to solve the problems, we will regain our ground," the aide said. "There are some real opportunities."

A top Democratic House aide acknowledged that since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Democrats have struggled to gain an upper hand against a GOP majority that bills itself as strong on security and values. But as Bush's poll numbers have dipped and confidence in the war has fallen, the aide said, Democrats have been given a rare window of opportunity.

"When he's weak, he can't beat us up and call us obstructionists," this aide said. "He's not in a position of strength."

"It all stems from Iraq," the staffer added. "The voting public just doesn't like what's happening in Iraq. ... It's created a dynamic that's problematic for them and beneficial to us."

As such, Republicans have accused Democrats of using the tragedy of Katrina for partisan gain.

"This is the classic example of the Democrats throwing as much mud against the wall to see what sticks," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "Our strategy is not to take the bait and move forward to help these people. Over time, people will grow tired of their antics."

But Democratic leaders are rejecting the accusation. Rather, they insist they are simply working to protect Americans from any future catastrophe.

"It is clear that too many lessons went unlearned after September 11," Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) wrote in a letter to Roll Call to be published Thursday. "Democrats are speaking out and will continue to do so, demanding more from President Bush and Congress to ensure that we do everything necessary to fulfill our government's basic obligation to protect Americans from danger. We can't change the past, but we can change our future. And there is no excuse not to."

And while they appear to be making some headway, Democrats acknowledge that they can't get overly confident just yet. The party remains divided on the Iraqi conflict, among other things. But Democrats can strike hard against the GOP on core domestic issues including Social Security, federal assistance to disaster victims, the economy and ethics.

A senior Democratic aide said the test for the party and of its strength will really come in the months ahead.

"All four of those issues give Democrats a perfect opportunity to paint the 'us versus them' picture," this staffer said. "This is what Democrats are about. It's a matter of do we capitalize on it."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

God before GOP

We've learned of a major shake-up at the Washington-based National Black Republican Association, with six of the 10 NBRA board members resigning in recent days over various disagreements.

"The organization and its current leadership is heading down a much different direction than was envisioned by myself and the other board members," says Christopher R. Arps.

Similarly, the Rev. Eric M. Wallace, chairman of the African American Republican Council of Illinois and a candidate for lieutenant governor, writes in a resignation letter obtained by Inside the Beltway:

"If you guys decide to formulate another organization based on actually helping our people, let me know. If you choose people with a servant's heart, then I am in. I serve because of my relationship with my Savior. I am a Christian first, a father second, a minister and scholar third, and a black man fourth, and then a Republican. Heaven help me if I ever get these out of order."

Three resigning board members, we're told, frowned on signing a "statement of commitment" sent to them by NBRA Chairman Frances Rice, concluding with: "My failure to sign this statement confirms that I am not a member in good standing of the NBRA and am not eligible to be an officer in the NBRA or a member of the NBRA Board of Directors."

Board member Bill Calhoun, in a memo to Ms. Rice also obtained by this column, wrote: "Regarding your request for me to sign a letter of commitment, is this being requested of all board members? This appears discriminatory."

Meanwhile, there also were questions surrounding approval of the latest news release issued by the NBRA, praising President Bush's leadership after Hurricane Katrina.

"President Bush is to be commended for deploying all of the resources of the federal government to help the refugees," Ms. Rice stated in the release.

Hurricane Haley

Like the resulting popularity that 9/11 handed former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, Hurricane Katrina similarly has shined the national spotlight on Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour.

So much so that Mr. Barbour, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, is now ranked third among Republicans -- behind Sen. George Allen, a former governor of Virginia, and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- in the 2008 White House Power Rankings, as posted by the Jockey Wire at PoliticalDerby.com.

"There is no easy way to say it," it states. "Despite the disaster and carnage of Hurricane Katrina, she has been a political gift to the affable Mississippi governor. In contrast to his counterpart in Louisiana, Barbour has earned rave reviews for his handling of the crisis. And ... he cannot ignore the fact that he suddenly looks more presidential than ever."

As for the remaining GOP horses, Mr. Allen "holds steady at No. 1"; Mr. Romney "is practically drowning in ink these days"; the fourth-place Mr. Giuliani "is still the man to beat"; and Arizona Sen. John McCain, running fifth, is gearing up to run a "much more aggressive, front-loaded campaign" than in 2000.

Rounding out the top 10 are Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum.

DOJ_NMG_0004507

As for former House Speaker Newt Gingrich?

"The ultimate wild card," says the wire.

On the Democratic side, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "is so far ahead that she earns an extra spot" -- ranked both No. 1 and No. 2. However, if "Hillary isn't careful, she'll have to change her voter registration to Republican," the wire states.

"The insanely ambitious New York senator continues to move right while taking timely jabs at the president in order to please her peeps to the left," it notes, including her recent move to break up the Department of Homeland Security in response to Katrina.

Other Democratic front-runners: New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, 2004 vice-presidential candidate John Edwards, Illinois Gov. Rod R. Blagojevich, Delaware Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry gets a few votes, while Illinois Sen. Barack Obama is more of a "major threat in 2012."

Path to peace

In an effort to open a dialogue with youth on peace, tolerance and interfaith coexistence, Jordan's visiting King Abdullah II and his wife, Queen Rania, today will meet with a group of students and teachers from Banneker High School, the Hebrew Academy, International Saudi Academy and Cardozo Senior High School.

The Jordanian Embassy tells us the king's visit to Washington will focus on the "intra-Islamic, interfaith initiative" Jordan is leading, the aim being to build bridges of peace and understanding. His address this afternoon at Catholic University is titled "Traditional Islam: the Path to Peace."

DHS Personnel Ruling Will Affect Pentagon, Senator Says (CD)

By Alyson Klein, CongressDaily

Congress Daily, September 13, 2005

Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, said a court ruling last month that struck down some of the Homeland Security Department's personnel regulations could require the department to "go back to the drawing board" and might force the Pentagon to "take a harder look" at its personnel proposal scheduled to be put in place later this year.

U.S. District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer, in throwing out the rules, said they do not provide for collective bargaining. Collins said this week she was concerned that DHS drew up regulations that did not "reflect congressional intent."

A spokesman for House Government Reform Chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., whose panel also oversees federal workers, would only say of the ruling's ramifications: "It's too early in the process to predict the outcome of the litigation or how it will affect other systems."

DHS announced last week that it would delay implementation of the new personnel system, scheduled to go into effect in January, for at least a year. It is not clear whether that decision was related to the court ruling, or what changes -- if any -- would be made before implementation. Ward Morrow, assistant general counsel for the American Federation of Governmental Employees, the largest of four unions that filed the suit, said DHS may ask to simply revisit the labor relations portion of the regulations, rather than rewrite the whole system. A spokesman for the Justice Department, which is handling the court case, did not return calls.

The Pentagon plans to continue tweaking its personnel rules before releasing them this fall, according to a spokeswoman for the National Security Personnel System, which is responsible for drafting the regulations. She said NSPS has "gone through an extensive meet-and-confer process with our unions" and received thousands of public comments on its draft regulations. She said the office would be making changes but attributed those revisions to the feedback it received, not the court ruling. Still, Morrow said AFGE was likely to challenge the Pentagon's regulations after they are released because, in the union's view, NSPS did not follow Congress' guidelines for the comment process.

When introduced earlier this year, the revamped Homeland Security and Pentagon personnel regulations were heralded as models for a new, governmentwide human resources system. Although OMB circulated draft legislation this spring overhauling the federal personnel system, Collins and Davis have yet to act on it. House Government Reform ranking member Henry

Waxman, D-Calif., who applauded the court ruling, said in a statement that it "should send a signal to both the administration and Congress to slow down on any government-wide personnel changes."

Worker Error Causes Los Angeles Power Outages (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- An error by utility workers caused a blackout across major portions of Los Angeles yesterday, trapping people in elevators and snarling traffic at intersections, authorities said.

About 2 million residents were affected by the resulting power surge and outages, which were reported from downtown west to the Pacific Coast and north into the San Fernando Valley.

Workers who were cutting wires mistakenly sliced them as a group rather than individually, causing a short and leading to the trouble, officials said.

"They cut wires that caused circuit breakers to trip," said Ed Miller, director of power system operations and maintenance for the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power.

The outage occurred at 12:37 p.m. Power was restored to nearly all customers within three hours, officials said.

Downtown high-rise buildings went dark, fire officials said they received reports of people stuck in elevators, and stoplights went out at intersections across the city. Neighboring cities, including Burbank and Glendale, also were affected.

The Los Angeles Police Department went on "full tactical alert," meaning no officers were allowed to leave work when their shifts were finished.

But calm prevailed in downtown Los Angeles around midday. Office workers took the opportunity for an extended lunch break as police and fire sirens echoed in the background.

The blackout came a day after ABC News aired a videotape of a purported al Qaeda member making terrorist threats against Los Angeles and Melbourne, Australia, on the fourth anniversary of the September 11 attacks.

But even before the utility workers explained what had happened, Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said there was no indication of terrorism.

Los Angeles International Airport lost power, but its emergency generator kicked in promptly and no flights were affected, said Harold Johnson, an airport spokesman. UCLA Medical Center used backup generators and reported no danger to patients.

Los Angeles operates its own power utility, which serves 1.4 million electricity customers. Customers of Southern California Edison, the largest utility in Southern California, were not affected, said spokesman Gil Alexander.

As Lights Go Out, Power Worries Rise (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

A mistake on a single bundle of wires Monday cascaded into a major blackout in and around Los Angeles, inconveniencing millions of people and renewing questions about the vulnerability of the region's power system.

Coming one day after a purported Al Qaeda threat of attack on the city, the midday outage pricked nerves and caused isolated incidents of panic. Plumes of flame and smoke heightened the drama as refineries, temporarily shut by the outage, flared off excess gases.

But backup generators, many newly installed since California's 2001 energy crisis, kept many companies and most emergency services operating without major disruption, and there were no reports of deaths or serious injuries caused by the blackout.

The Los Angeles Department of Water and Power, the city-owned utility, said the outage occurred when workers cut through wires while installing a monitoring system at an electrical transmitting station in Toluca Lake.

The mistake rippled through the electrical grid, threatening to overload another transmission station and two electrical generating plants: the Scattergood generating station south of Los Angeles International Airport and the Haynes generating station near Long Beach.

The DWP shut down the generating facilities to avoid damage, sharply reducing the amount of power available to the city. That caused blackouts in neighborhoods across the city, with heavy concentrations in parts of the San Fernando Valley, South Los Angeles and the downtown area. All of Burbank's 52,000 customers and half of Glendale's 80,000 also lost power. Both cities' electrical systems are linked to the DWP.

"This strikes me as something under the category of unbelievably bad luck, where you cut one line and have that kind of cascading effect," said Bob Finkelstein, executive director of the Utility Reform Network in San Francisco, a consumer advocacy group.

"One DWP worker is going to feel really, really bad for a long time."

The automated system workers were installing was meant to detect surges or drops in voltage, said Ed Miller, the DWP's director of power systems, operations and maintenance.

"They cut a bundle of wires," Miller said. "The supposition is that by cutting them together, they created a short that triggered the circuit breakers." Miller said cutting wires one by one might have avoided an electrical short.

Ironically, the system the work crew was trying to install would have identified the power problem much more quickly, Miller said. It would be able to "decipher just what had happened." As it happened, DWP engineers needed an hour to determine where in the system the outage began.

An official with the union that represents DWP workers charged that, regardless of whether lines were cut, the real cause of the outage was the DWP's decision to test the new relay system in the middle of the day, rather than at night when power loads would have been lower — but costs would have been higher because of overtime.

"They are too cheap to pay overtime, so they are testing on a full load at 1 in the afternoon," said Brian D'Arcy, business manager for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 18.

"You clearly don't test the relay at one in the afternoon. If you are cheap and stupid, this is what happens."

The DWP said such work is routinely conducted during the day.

DWP officials insisted the system had worked as it is supposed to — shutting down and causing a temporary inconvenience to avoid widespread permanent damage. Miller compared the shutdown to the way a circuit breaker turns off power to a house to prevent overheated lines from causing a deadly fire.

At the same time, however, Miller said he planned to investigate whether the ability of a single incident to black out half the power supply indicated a need for major changes in the way the city's electrical system is configured. "If I decide I need a differently configured system, that could take a couple of years," he said.

"I'm very proud of my people. There was no system damage, and nobody was hurt," said Miller.

"The system is not fragile," he added. "We have a very strong system."

Others were less sanguine.

"As an engineer, it's unnerving that one individual act can cut power to hundreds of thousands of customers," said Los Angeles City Councilman Tony Cardenas, chairman of a panel overseeing the DWP.

Cardenas, who was stuck in traffic on Van Nuys Boulevard when traffic signals went out, said he would demand to know whether the outage betrayed a broader vulnerability for the city's electrical system.

"I've been told over and over that this kind of vulnerability doesn't exist," Cardenas said.

Mary Nichols, who heads UCLA's Institute of the Environment and was appointed last month as a DWP commissioner, said she, too, had "questions and concerns" about "why the system isn't more resilient and why there isn't more redundancy built into it."

And a spokeswoman for Cal-ISO, the independent organization that oversees the statewide electrical grid, said the incident was "disconcerting." Stephanie McCorkle criticized officials of the DWP, which is independent of Cal-ISO's system, for not being more forthcoming with information about the outage, saying the DWP did not officially alert the rest of the statewide grid until 3:45 p.m., more than three hours after the outage began.

"There was no coordination, and that concerns us," she said.

Although unseasonably cool weather makes the electrical grid less susceptible to widespread failures because of decreased energy demands, McCorkle said she was not sure whether hot weather could have caused the DWP outage to spread.

The outage occurred at 12:37 p.m., cutting power to 750,000 homes and businesses, or about 2 million people, DWP officials said. It struck about half of the DWP's service area. Other parts of the region, most of which is served by Southern California Edison, were not affected.

Power was restored to 90% of the downed customers within 90 minutes, DWP officials said.

Although there apparently were no major problems caused by the outage, there was no shortage of anxiety and discomfort.

Most of the city's 4,300 traffic signals were knocked out, either going dark or flashing red. In one instance, along Olympic Boulevard near Beverly Hills, motorist Beto Ramos said all the lights turned green.

"I had a green light, everyone had green lights," Ramos said. "No one knew what to do. We're so used to stop, go, stop, go. To see nothing but green lights was real weird, like all of society had paused."

State officials have been pushing cities to install low-power stoplights that can be equipped with backup power to prevent outages. So far, San Francisco has adopted the lights, but Los Angeles has not because of the cost, said Rob Schlichting of the state energy commission.

Some commuter trains were delayed about 15 minutes during the lunch hour after power surges were detected by the Metropolitan Transportation Authority's rail operations center. Transit buses also were delayed by traffic congestion.

Workers in high-rise office buildings in downtown Los Angeles faced twin inconveniences: Elevators stopped, forcing people to either stay in their offices or descend many flights of stairs. And air conditioning shut down, turning plush offices into carpeted saunas.

"It got hot real quick in here," said Wells Fargo employee Sean Maddox, stuck in the 60-story Aon building.

Another tool of modern life — high-speed Internet connections — was knocked out in some parts of the city because of the outage. Patti Rockenwegner, a spokesperson for Comcast, which provides cable and broadband Internet service to about 500,000 customers in Southern California, said some customers in Hollywood and South Los Angeles lost service for about 40 minutes when the outage tripped fuses.

Hours after power was restored, however, some customers in other parts of the city, including the Fairfax and Mid-Wilshire areas, were reporting that Comcast lines remained out of service.

The outage occurred one day after the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and a day after a Southern California man suspected of having ties to Al Qaeda warned of an impending terror attack on Los Angeles and Melbourne, Australia.

Although Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton insisted that they knew of no "credible threat" to the city, many Angelenos wondered, if only momentarily, whether the outage was the result of a terrorist attack.

"It is the easiest way to trip up our routine, [to] cut the power," said Matt Jarrette, who found himself in gridlock as he drove to work at the nonprofit California Assoc. of Physician Groups downtown. "The day after Sept. 11 — it is disconcerting."

The scene near harbor-area refineries was disconcerting in a different way. As of 5 p.m. Monday, regional air regulators had received more than 40 complaints about smoke and stack-top flames from residents in Wilmington, Harbor City, Long Beach and other areas in southern Los Angeles County, said Sam Atwood, spokesman for the South Coast Air Quality Management District. Six inspectors were dispatched to investigate the complaints and the mandatory shutdown reports from the refineries.

When refineries lose power, they release built-up pressure by sending oil products up their tall stacks, where it is burned off by stack-top flares, producing flames and heavy smoke. The burn-off is a safety mechanism that prevents flammable fuels from spreading, refinery officials said.

The 200-plus students at the Harbor Teacher Prep Academy in Wilmington were kept in their classrooms or moved to the cafeteria until the end of the school day as a precaution after school officials detected a noxious smell from a nearby oil refinery, said Los Angeles Unified School District spokeswoman Susan Cox. The school is on the Los Angeles Harbor Community College campus.

DOJ_NMG_0004511

Refinery officials said the shutdowns were temporary and were not expected to affect Southern California gasoline supplies or prices.

The disruptions might well have been worse but for the proliferation of backup generators in the years since 2001, when the energy crisis threatened the state with frequent outages.

There has been an increase of several hundred generators in the region since then, according to the air quality district, which issues permits for generators.

Hospitals are required by state law to maintain backup generators, and many in Los Angeles were forced to switch to backup power Monday.

Generators also allowed operations to continue uninterrupted at Van Nuys Airport and Bob Hope Airport in Burbank, both of which were affected by the outage. Van Nuys serves private aircraft, while Burbank handles commercial flights as well as private planes. Los Angeles International Airport did not lose power.

Few Los Angeles schools have backup generators, but many have backup batteries to power emergency lights and alarms. Those systems were triggered Monday at several Los Angeles campuses.

New campuses that are part of the district's ambitious building program are being equipped with backup generators, officials said.

Parents seeking word of the situation in the schools may have been taken aback by the message on the L.A. Unified emergency phone line, however. Callers who dialed Monday seeking word about the outage heard the following: "Topanga Elementary and Wonderland Elementary will be closed Tuesday Jan. 11 because of heavy rain. All other LAUSD campuses will be open as usual…."

Utility Error Disrupts Power In Los Angeles (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 12 - Large areas of Los Angeles lost power on Monday after utility workers doing maintenance work accidentally cut a line, officials said.

The blackout, which occurred just after 12:30 p.m. Pacific time and lasted for less than an hour in most areas, came a day after Sept. 11 and amid reports of threats by Al Qaeda against the city, setting off jitters citywide. During the power loss, television stations broadcast striking images of towering flames at refineries.

But the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power, which provides electricity to a 400-square-mile area, blamed workers at a power station in the San Fernando Valley, and the fiery images turned out to be the routine burn-off of gas at the refineries as a precaution after some lost power.

Officials said there was no evidence of foul play, though the Police Department went on high alert for a few hours as a precaution.

Carol Tucker, a spokeswoman for the utility, said an estimated half of the 1.5 million homes and businesses it served were affected.

The failure was spotty, with a flicker of lights in some areas while others, including parts of downtown and the San Fernando Valley, were left without electricity for longer periods. By 2 p.m., 90 percent of the affected areas had been restored after natural-gas backup generators were started, the utility said.

Most residents seemed to take the blackout in stride.

DOJ_NMG_0004512

"It gave me more time to smoke is all," said Casey Mitchell, a legal secretary taking a break outside a Wilshire Boulevard office building where his workday was interrupted for about 30 minutes.

The blackout did cause sporadic traffic delays when some signals went dark, and the Los Angeles Fire Department said it responded to several calls regarding stuck elevators. But Jim Wells, a department spokesman, said he was not aware of any "major rescues."

In most cases, Mr. Wells said, emergency power in high-rise buildings allowed elevators to return to the ground level without incident.

The failure hit neighborhoods from Wilmington, at the southern tip of the city near its port, to communities in the San Fernando Valley at the northern end.

Ron Deaton, the utility general manager, said at a news conference that the employees had cut a line and reattached it incorrectly, setting off a chain reaction that shut down a string of generating stations as does a circuit breaker in a home. The failure started at a receiving station, which brings high-voltage power into the city and spreads it to distribution centers at a lower voltage.

On Sunday, ABC News broadcast a videotape purported to have been made by a United States-born member of Al Qaeda, threatening terrorist attacks against Los Angeles and Melbourne, Australia. The man on tape, the network said, was Adam Yahiye Gadahn, a Southern Californian wanted for questioning by the F.B.I.

Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa of Los Angeles, appearing at a community event, said "there was no credible threat" against the city but cautioned that terrorists had previously considered Los Angeles targets. He said a blackout coming in this age of terrorism understandably "created a heightened sense of concern" but that most of the city quickly returned to normal.

"I'm here to assure you that our city is prepared to handle these situations," the mayor said, briefly addressing the failure before an event at the Simon Wiesenthal Center. "Power was restored to the vast majority of D.W.P. customers, 90 percent, within the first two hours."

In 2001, power shortages in the state caused rolling blackouts.

Human Error Blamed For Los Angeles Power Failure (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

Los Angeles was hit with an electricity blackout early yesterday afternoon that left millions of people without power across an area stretching west from downtown into coastal areas and north into the San Fernando Valley.

The outage lasted for about an hour in some places, and longer in others. It appeared to mainly cause traffic snarls and inconvenience for people stuck in elevators and in their cars. Flights at Los Angeles International airport weren't affected, but the facility was forced to switch to its backup power supply, a representative said.

The utility that serves most of the city, the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power, blamed the disruption on human error at a substation in the San Fernando Valley. Spokeswoman Kim Hughes said employees there "misdirected power" down lines that weren't designed to carry the load, tripping protective relays that isolate equipment to prevent permanent damage.

Ms. Hughes said the utility was reviewing the sequence of events to assure that it doesn't happen again. Smaller utilities owned by the nearby cities of Burbank, Glendale and Pasadena also were affected. The blackout began at 12:37 p.m. PDT on a day of modest demand due to moderate temperatures. Most customers had electricity again by 4 p.m.

The disruption was troubling to many area residents because it came on the heels of a videotape in which a suspected al Qaeda operative threatened Los Angeles and Melbourne, Australia, with terrorist attacks. After the power went out yesterday, police throughout the Los Angeles area went on "tactical alert" meaning that officers were kept on duty after their shifts ended. Fire stations were flooded with calls from people trapped in elevators.

The outage was the second large electrical disruption to hit Southern California in the past three weeks. A large blackout on Aug. 25 bypassed Los Angeles but hit surrounding communities. It was caused by problems at a substation near the end of a set of major transmission lines that bring electricity to the Los Angeles area from the Pacific Northwest. That disruption mainly affected customers of Edison International's Southern California Edison unit and Sempra Energy's San Diego Gas & Electric Co.

Northrop Grumman Corp., whose headquarters is in the Century City commercial district of Los Angeles, lost power for 35 minutes, according to spokesman Dan McClain, But company facilities south of Los Angeles in Redondo Beach and El Segundo were unaffected. Raytheon Co. said its El Segundo facilities, where Chairman and Chief Executive William Swanson visited yesterday, never lost power.

Two big movie studios -- Time Warner Inc.'s Warner Bros. and Walt Disney Co. -- north of Los Angeles were without power shortly before 2 p.m. But at neighboring Universal Studios, located just east of the other two in Universal City, it was business as usual. On the city's west side, News Corp.'s Twentieth Century Fox studio lot lost power for just 10 minutes before the lights came back on. Sony Corp.'s Sony Pictures Entertainment, located nearby, was unaffected.

Crossed Wires Spark Blackout In L.A. (USAT)

Outage comes

after video threat naming area as al-Qaeda target

LOS ANGELES — Workers connected the wrong wires at a power station Monday and knocked out electricity to about half of the 3.9 million residents of the nation's second-largest city.

The afternoon outage lasted up to four hours, snarling traffic at some intersections and trapping people in elevators.

The blackout came a day after ABC aired a videotape by Adam Gadahn, a suspected al-Qaeda member, threatening terror attacks on Los Angeles and Melbourne, Australia. The Los Angeles Police Department went on full “tactical alert” during the blackout, meaning that no officers were allowed to leave duty.

But police said they had no evidence that the blackout was the work of terrorists.

No injuries or major incidents were reported.

Workers installing an automated power-transmission system wrongly connected a wire to “another line that was not expecting that much electricity,” said Ron Deaton, general manager of the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power.

The misconnection triggered power surges and fail-safe mechanisms in the energy grid controlled by the city-owned utility. Power facilities, including two major generating plants, began tripping off-line at about 12:30 p.m. PT.

Traffic signals went dead in downtown Los Angeles, Hollywood, some beach areas, the San Fernando Valley and south Los Angeles. The outage also affected the neighboring cities of Burbank and Glendale, which are part of the Los Angeles power system.

The incident was reminiscent of the rolling blackouts that hit much of California during the state's 2001 energy shortage. Los Angeles, which generally has adequate power supplies, had no blackouts in 2001.

Monday's outage was far less disruptive than the August 2003 blackout that cut power to an estimated 50 million people in the Northeast, Midwest and Canada's Ontario province. That was the largest blackout in U.S. history. Power was not restored for four days in some areas. A joint U.S.-Canada investigation blamed the incident largely on sloppy practices by two Ohio utilities.

In Los Angeles Monday, loss of the traffic lights jammed vehicles near freeway on-ramps and off-ramps. Gasoline pumps stopped. Fire engines, sirens screaming, raced to high-rise office buildings to free people from elevators.

Some buildings and stores were evacuated, but backup generators kicked in at many office towers, hospitals and Los Angeles International Airport, where no flights were affected.

Staffers at the downtown YMCA used flashlights to guide exercisers from the pool and other areas to locker rooms so they could dress before leaving.

Albert Vasquez, 27, a customer service representative, was returning from lunch when he boarded an elevator in his downtown office tower. The doors closed and the power went out. “It was bizarre,” he said. “It went completely dark.”

Vasquez pried the door open with his hands and left the building, he said.

The Noah's New York Bagels outlet in the Westwood Village district near UCLA stayed open during the busy lunch hour despite the loss of the cash register and credit-card communication lines. “We just grabbed a napkin” and figured out customers' bills on the paper, said manager Scott Nakahara, 22.

DOJ_NMG_0004514

Some Angelenos said they were initially fearful that the blackout was linked to terrorism and ignored instructions to remain in their office buildings. “When they said to stay, I thought, ‘I'm going,' ” clerical worker Erica Fernandez said.

“The fact that this happened the day after Sept. 11 (caused) a heightened sense of concern,” Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said. The mayor sought to reassure residents, saying. “Our city is prepared to handle these situations.”

Power came back on in some areas within minutes when the system automatically shifted to get power from other sources. Gale Harris, spokeswoman for the L.A. Department of Water and Power, said electricity had been restored by about 5 p.m.

Traffic is notoriously bad in Los Angeles, so James Steel, 60, a retiree, was unfazed when a drive that normally takes him 45 minutes took twice that time after he was evacuated from the Central Library downtown.

“This is a little worse than a normal day,” he said.

'Whoops,' And L.A. Has A Two-Hour Blackout (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 12 -- A blackout caused when maintenance workers inadvertently cut a power line rolled through large parts of Los Angeles on Monday, stranding people in elevators, tangling traffic, and prompting the evacuation of some high-rises and other structures.

Officials said about half of this far-flung city, served by the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power, the largest public utility in the nation, lost power starting at 1 p.m. Power was restored two hours later. Los Angeles International Airport lost its lights, but its generator kicked in, and a spokesman said no flights were delayed.

A spokeswoman for the utility said workers at a receiving station mistakenly cut one line and then hooked up the wrong wires, causing a power surge into a line that was not expecting that much electricity.

"Something was cut," said Gale Harris, a spokeswoman for the Department of Water and Power, which also lost power during the blackout. "Somebody said, 'Whoops.' "

Stranded on the street, some people expressed fears that the blackout was part of a terrorist attack. Monday's power loss came a day after ABC News, on the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, aired a videotape of a purported al Qaeda member threatening attacks against Los Angeles and Melbourne, Australia. The Los Angeles Police Department went on "full tactical alert," and officers were not allowed to leave work after their shifts ended. A police spokesman said terrorism was not suspected. The Los Angeles office of the Internal Revenue Service closed after a computer glitch occurred when power was restored.

The Los Angeles Fire Department reported no serious injuries.

"Our most significant calls related to this power outage have just been stuck elevators," said spokesman Ron Myers. "We're just urging people to stay put."

Long lunch breaks turned into a short workday, as thousands of workers headed home early, jamming roads already snarled with traffic.

At Grauman's Chinese Theatre in Hollywood, one of the city's landmarks, the power went out for about seven minutes, interrupting a comedy called "The Man."

"Imagine if the power had cut out when we were showing 'The War of the Worlds,' " quipped usher Lauren Fisher.

The Department of Water and Power, which serves 1.5 million customers, was one of the few utilities to emerge unscathed from California's electricity crisis in the summer of 2000. The department fought off attempts to open Los Angeles to competition from other power companies. When Enron Corp. and other companies gamed the system and prompted widespread power shortages, the department found itself in the enviable position of selling power to utilities across the state, according to James Bushnell, the research director at the Energy Institute at the University of California at Berkeley. It repaid billions of dollars of debt, and talk of further restructuring of the California energy market has been shelved.

Diane Salazar wasn't quite sure what to make of it when the lights went out, the treadmills stopped running and everyone made for the exits at the 24 Hour Fitness club where she works in downtown Los Angeles.

"Oh, my god, I just started freaking out," said the 20-year-old fitness counselor.

"I saw that video over the weekend about terrorists targeting L.A. and I didn't know what to think. I was so scared. I thought this is not natural. This is not cool. I want to go home."

Salazar wasn't the only one whose anxiety level went up today as the lights went down.

On the 46th floor of Two California Plaza, most of Elizabeth Dombrowski's fellow accountants kept working quietly — on their laptops.

But not Dombrowski.

She called her parents in Texas to dictate her living will and phoned her sister and boyfriend to say goodbye, just in case.

She was half-joking, she said, but only half.

Dombrowski, 26, who was wearing a seersucker jacket and skirt, quickly pulled off her high heels and put on her running shoes. Soon she was heading briskly down the stairs, three friends in tow. She had more or less convinced herself and her friends that a terrorist attack was about to occur.

"I'm serious," Dombrowski said later, as some of her friends teased her about being paranoid about terrorists. "They make you scared when the power goes off. Then you feel safe when the electricity goes back on. Then they bomb you. This is what they do."

Two floors underground at the Los Angeles County Superior Court archives, everything went pitch black just after 1 p.m. In the darkness, people began to shriek and scream for help. When the lights came back on — powered by the emergency generator — people blinked at each other, embarrassed and scared.

At the hulking new Caltrans building at 1st and Main streets, the blackout triggered false fire alarms that led some state workers to leave the building more than once.

Caltrans spokeswoman Judy Gish said there was no full-scale evacuation. But just minutes after Gish's report, an automatic alarm system that had not been reset blared recorded warnings that there was "a fire emergency reported in the building." It urged people to leave by the nearest exit and not to use the elevators.

"We evacuated the building and they called us back," said Baljit Soni, a principal accountant with the Los Angeles Department of Transportation.

He said he did smell something. "Then I got scared and said, why take the risk?"

At the nearby Higgins building at 108 2nd St., perhaps the biggest inconvenience came when a tenant couldn't leave the enclosed outdoor parking lot because the electric gate wouldn't open.

"I didn't know the manual override," said building concierge John Cubano. "It was 10 minutes before he decided to walk."

Calm also prevailed at the Spot Light Room cocktail lounge in Hollywood.

"We were just standing here and the lights just flickered for a second and then went out," bartender William "Boo" McClain said.

No one flinched.

"Not at this bar," McClain. "Not when they have cocktails in front of them."

Schoolteachers taught lessons by flashlight, power lunches were thrown into the dark and high rise office dwellers were forced to climb down flights of stairs after the electrical outage hit a large swath of Los Angeles this afternoon.

Electrical service had been restored in many areas served by the Los Angeles Department of Water & Power by midafternoon, but not after interrupting the lunchtime routine for thousands of workers, commuters, students and others.

Beto Ramos was driving from downtown Los Angeles to his office in West Los Angeles when the traffic lights on Olympic Boulevard began to malfunction around Beverly Hills.

"I had a green light. Everyone had green lights," Ramos said. "No one knew what to do. We're so used to stop, go, stop, go. To see nothing but green lights was real weird, like all of society had paused."

Service at the downtown Original Pantry Restaurant was stalled for 45 minutes, as manager Hesh Scdaghat saw his grills, stoves and exhaust fans stop.

"Everything's electrical, so it was terrible," Scdaghat said. "We had some customers leave. When the power came back, they came back. I'm very busy again now."

The power outage was a scary and unwelcome disruption at Cahuenga Elementary School in the Pico-Union area near downtown. The lights went out for about an hour during lunch as first and second graders were finishing their food outdoors and heading back inside to resume class.

Principal Lloyd Houske dispatched emergency flashlights to darkened classrooms, but he said teachers tried to continue their lessons in an effort to maintain calm. He said a few children asked why the lights had gone off, but that the day went on as usual.

"Basically, we went on with our regular schedule," Houske said. "If a teacher remains calm, the children remain calm. If they see you act not scared, they don't get scared. It's when the adults get uptight that they get uptight."

At Rodeo Mexican Grill on Olympic Boulevard, George Orellana, a 35-year-old paralegal, was dishing up a little cup of relish, one of the last people to manage to get food here before the lights went out.

"We walked down seven flights. It felt like the 9/11," said Orellana, whose office is half-block away in a midrise building. "We didn't know what was going on. Once the blackout started, everyone started running out. It was weird."

Safe Place Disabled People Find Group Homes Can Be Broken, Too (WSJ)

By Clare Ansberry

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

COLUMBIA, S.C. -- Billy Cothran spent most of his 63 years in a sprawling, state-owned treatment center for the developmentally disabled. His parents were told it was the best option for their only child, whose mind would never progress beyond that of a 3-year-old.

In the late 1990s, after his parents died, Mr. Cothran was moved by his guardian out of the institution and into a smaller group home, which offered recreational therapy such as horseback riding and took residents to church on Sunday. Staffers helped Mr. Cothran, who was blind and arthritic, don a rented tuxedo for an annual dance.

His new home, the Babcock Center, was one of the thousands of private, nonprofit facilities created during the past 30 years to provide alternatives to big institutions. Babcock was founded in 1970 by a woman who discovered a mentally retarded couple living in a chicken coop. It eventually became South Carolina's largest provider of Medicaid-funded housing, caring for more than 500 people at close to 100 homes and apartments.

In recent years, though, Babcock has been the focus of state and federal investigations after reports of abuse and neglect at some of its homes. Mr. Cothran died last September. An autopsy determined that Mr. Cothran, who was on a pureed-food diet, had portions of what appeared to be a sandwich in his trachea and died of asphyxiation.

After his death and complaints by his family -- which included a former chairman of Babcock's board -- a federal investigation looked into the incident. It found that the home where Mr. Cothran lived "failed to take appropriate actions to ensure client protections" and that conditions there "pose immediate jeopardy to the health and safety of clients." It gave Babcock 23 days to submit a plan and correct the problems.

A spokeswoman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, which provides most of Babcock's funding, says the federal agency is satisfied that the problems it found after Mr. Cothran's death have been corrected.

Mr. Cothran's cousin and guardian John Harrison has filed a wrongful death suit against Babcock Center in South Carolina's Richland County Court of Common Pleas. The case alleges Babcock didn't properly care for Mr. Cothran and failed to properly supervise and train the staff assigned to care for him. Babcock officials are fighting the suit and say it has no merit.

Over the past three decades, there has been a concerted effort to move people with developmental disabilities out of large institutions, which had been long criticized for being overcrowded and isolated. A widely lauded effort to move people into smaller group homes has succeeded in bringing the developmentally disabled into communities where they can learn new skills, get jobs or attend special schools.

But this progress has come at a price. It has strained the systems that support people living in the smaller settings and created big gaps in oversight. Twenty-five years ago, people with developmental disabilities lived in about 16,000 publicly funded homes. Today, they are scattered in about 140,000.

"The systems of quality monitoring have really been taxed beyond what they can manage," says Charlie Lakin, who heads a University of Minnesota program that tracks services to the developmentally disabled. "By and large, a lot of it is pretty loosely organized and pretty loosely monitored."

Only a half-dozen states require that residential programs serving the developmentally disabled be accredited by an independent third-party organization. Developmental disabilities, which affect about 4.6 million people in the U.S., include a range of mental and physical impairments, such as cerebral palsy, autism and mental retardation.

Babcock offers a stark look at the flawed monitoring of group homes, which sometimes leaves family members and other advocates feeling they need to police the care themselves.

Last December, the state ordered the entire Babcock chain to reduce the number of people it houses by half within 18 months. "The growth of Babcock Center happened over a relatively short period of time," says Judy Johnson, Babcock's executive director, who was hired in 2002. "They didn't have the right system of support to manage the larger, different sites."

She says Babcock has made significant progress since she arrived, including improved staff training and procedures to provide additional oversight.

In spite of such efforts, the rate of substantiated cases of abuse, neglect or exploitation at Babcock has averaged 6.7 per 100 residents in each of the past three years, according to the South Carolina Department of Disabilities and Special Needs. The statewide average is three cases per 100 residents, the agency says. Ms. Johnson attributes that, in part, to the kind of people Babcock houses. Babcock takes individuals with complex physical and emotional problems, she says, who are aggressive and sometimes self-abusive. "Babcock Center supports people with severe disabilities that other providers would not," she says.

As for Mr. Cothran, she says, "Billy was loved by many people. I also believe there was nothing the staff could have done to prevent his death." She says Babcock hired a pulmunologist, who, based on a review of the autopsy and staff statements, concluded Mr. Cothran didn't have trouble swallowing his meal, but later regurgitated, causing asphyxiation. He concluded Mr. Cothran's death wasn't the result of any failure on the part of Babcock or its staff.

Oversight of homes for the developmentally disabled is fragmented between the federal government, states and thousands of community-based agencies. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services -- which pays about half of the $27 billion spent annually on community services for the developmentally disabled -- is ultimately responsible for their protection. But the federal agency assigns the creation and enforcing of rules over such homes to each state. As a result, laws and monitoring vary by state.

States aren't required to report all incidents of abuse or neglect to the federal agency. The federal government typically only gets involved if families, advocates or employees of homes provide credible concern about the thoroughness of a state investigation. HHS, which oversees the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, is drafting new procedures following a 2003 report from the General Accounting Office, saying states should be required to report more information about how they protect people with developmental disabilities.

Thousands of nonprofit group homes offer well-supervised programs for the developmentally disabled. But problems exist to some degree in nearly every community, says Curtis Decker, executive director of the National Disability Rights Network, a nonprofit group. Investigators may overlook flaws, he says, because of a lack of other housing options. "They don't know what to do with these folks if they closed a place down."

The number of abuse and neglect cases among the developmentally disabled isn't collected nationwide. Many states don't keep central databases on employees involved in such cases, allowing workers to move from one agency to another. "You put people in tough jobs, who are underpaid, not well-trained or supervised, and the potential for abuse is big," says Mr. Decker. "It's endemic to the country."

A 62-year-old woman in an Illinois group home died in April 2004 after receiving burns from scalding water. Another nonprofit agency in that state, which operated several homes, was decertified after an advocacy group learned the executive director asked a dentist to remove all the teeth of a man who was biting himself.

A 53-year-old New Jersey group-home employee was found guilty earlier last month in Middlesex County Superior Court of aggravated criminal sexual contact with a 19-year-old developmentally disabled woman, with the mental capacity of a child.

Ms. Johnson, Babcock's executive director, says she has a zero-tolerance policy for abuse. Any employee involved in cases of abuse or neglect is terminated, including those who see, but fail to report incidents, she says. "I don't know that we are ever going to eliminate abuse in our society," she says. "Our job is to do the best we can to support and protect individuals with disabilities."

Family members inspect Babcock facilities and report back to her monthly.

One of those is James Carlson, whose son lives in a Babcock home. He and other parents meet with Ms. Johnson to present any findings and concerns. "Next time we meet, she gives a list of all the corrections made," he says.

Babcock has had several serious problems. In late 2002, one mentally retarded man was left overnight in the parking lot of a Wendy's restaurant where he had been taken to apply for a job. A Babcock employee forgot to pick him up. That employee has been fired, Babcock says.

In April 2003, a man received first- and second-degree burns after a 23-year-old employee at a Babcock home said she accidentally poured scalding water on him, according to police reports. That employee has been fired, Babcock says. A supervisor at another Babcock home was arrested last fall and charged with sexually assaulting a 55-year-old female resident and giving her sodas to keep her quiet. The man was fired and the case is pending.

It's often up to relatives to keep tabs on how their family members are treated. Betty Jackson was initially happy when her four developmentally disabled brothers moved into homes run by the Babcock Center more than a decade ago. The brothers, ranging in age from 58 to 81, were born with mental retardation. They were raised at home, with their six siblings, on a South Carolina tobacco farm, until their parents died.

The Babcock Center housed the brothers in different homes, according to their level of disability. "I was very thankful," says Mrs. Jackson, a 63-year-old widow. "They didn't have to be in an institution and they could be in a home setting."

Her brother Archie Jordan got a job carrying groceries at the local supermarket. A TV crew filmed him years ago proudly sweeping the driveway in front of his house to show how Babcock residents keep their homes tidy.

To Mrs. Jackson, everything seemed fine until about three years ago. Her brother James, then 78, a thin, slightly stooped man who likes to wear a baseball hat, was struck with a belt and attacked by a 16-year-old housemate. After he was found bleeding from his rectum, James told Babcock's internal investigator "that damn boy got me last night." Stephanie Marshall, of the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said the allegation of rape was substantiated by an investigator it sent to the home. Babcock's Ms. Johnson says other agencies, including the state ombudsman, didn't substantiate a rape.

James remained in the same home with the 16-year-old for two months because no other housing was available, Babcock said. For safety, an alarm was put over the youth's door, sounding whenever he left his room. Weeks later, James suffered a broken finger. A Babcock internal report concluded he broke it himself, while throwing his bed rails around the room and beating on the walls. Records show he was screaming, "I want out of this hell hole."

Babcock reached an out-of-court settlement with Mrs. Jackson, who is James's guardian. Babcock's Ms. Johnson said she couldn't comment on the settlement.

Mrs. Jackson grew increasingly concerned. Her brother Archie was one of several Babcock residents who collectively gave more than $4,500 to a supervisor who promised to use the money to take them on vacations in 2003 and never did. The man later pleaded guilty to defrauding residents.

Babcock says it has since hired a full-time accountant to make monthly unannounced audits of residents' funds.

In 2003, Keith, 75, Mrs. Jackson's second-eldest brother, had been losing weight and was, at times, listless, she says. In the fall, Mrs. Jackson received a call that Keith was in the hospital. When she arrived, she says he was unconscious. Doctors said he was dehydrated, had a potassium imbalance and asked if he could have gotten hold of any chemicals, according to Mrs. Jackson and Leigh Flynn who was a court-appointed guardian of the brothers. Staffers said cleaning chemicals at the home were locked up, according to Mrs. Jackson. Keith was put in intensive care.

Babcock's Ms. Johnson said she couldn't comment on an individual's medical information because of federal laws protecting the privacy of clients' medical records.

DOJ_NMG_0004519

Mrs. Jackson notified Babcock that she planned to take all of her brothers out of the organization's homes. "I felt like I had to move them while I still had them," she says.

At that point, there were no other residential options in her area. So in November 2003, while Keith remained in the hospital, Mrs. Jackson took her other three brothers to live in her brick ranch house.

Mrs. Jackson, who worked driving a delivery truck for a sheet-metal company, modified her home to accommodate her brothers. In a back room, she installed a special shower and a toilet. She cooked for them and took them to doctors' appointments. She changed diapers regularly for James, then incontinent, fed him and held on to his arm when he walked. Her daughters helped. Keith was eventually transferred from the hospital to a nursing home, where he died of heart failure in January 2004.

In April 2004, the three remaining brothers moved into a home operated by United Cerebral Palsy of South Carolina. They celebrated Archie's 70th birthday with a chocolate cake. Each brother has a private room. Arthur's smells of Old Spice. Archie has an African-print bedspread. A fisherman's hat hangs on James's bedpost and family photos are on his dresser.

Mrs. Jackson has spoken out about the treatment her brothers received, including discussions last summer with members of Congress. Joining her were relatives of other residents, a former Babcock worker, and Babcock's former chairman, Patricia Harrison, who has been a frequent critic of the organization.

Ms. Harrison had been on Babcock's board, an unpaid position, since 1995. She resigned in 2002. Her husband was the cousin of Billy Cothran, the Babcock resident who died last year. The Harrisons were the legal guardians of Mr. Cothran.

Babcock's Ms. Johnson has a suit pending in the Fifth Judicial Circuit Court in Richland County, S.C., charging that Ms. Harrison made statements that were defamatory and intended to "impeach the honesty, integrity and reputation" of Ms. Johnson. Ms. Harrison is fighting the case. "I look forward to telling my story on the witness stand," she says.

Early last year, the Harrisons decided they wanted to move Mr. Cothran out of Babcock. "We were worried that something would happen to Billy," says Mr. Harrison. They bought a house for him and filled it with family photos and his mother's dining-room table. They asked that Medicaid funding for Mr. Cothran, and two of his Babcock housemates, be transferred to another agency that would staff the house.

Mr. Cothran died four days before he was supposed to move. A worker who prepared lunches that day was arrested on a charge of involuntary manslaughter but hasn't been indicted or issued a formal plea.

Mark Plowden, a spokesman for the South Carolina Attorney General's office, said the case is still under investigation to determine what, if any, prosecutorial action is warranted. No other state or federal investigation is pending.

Babcock had been previously warned about choking hazards. Its assistant vice president of food services sent out an internal email in 2002, saying food wasn't being properly mechanically altered, which means pureed, ground or softened, for residents whose diets required that. The memo described the situation as "Red Alert." In 2003, federal Medicaid investigators found a staff member feeding a sandwich, cut in eighths, and cookies to a man whose food was to be ground into rice-size pieces. Babcock said staffers were retrained on dietary matters, satisfying the agency.

After Mr. Cothran's death, there was a federal investigation in October 2004 by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. It found there was "evidence that mechanically altered diets were not consistently prepared as ordered to meet the developmental needs of all the men" at the home where Mr. Cothran lived. The report also concluded that "direct support staff were not assigned in sufficient numbers to supervise mealtimes at the facility on weekend days."

Babcock says it has retrained its staff and Ms. Johnson says the staffing exceeded minimum requirements.

After finding conditions at the home posed "immediate jeopardy to the health and safety of clients," the agency ordered Babcock to submit a plan to correct problems found in its survey or lose Medicaid funding. Babcock did submit a plan that was approved. A subsequent visit by investigators satisfied the agency, and no penalties were levied against Babcock, says Sharon Fisher, a spokeswoman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

In November, the South Carolina Department of Health and Human Services commissioned a special audit of Babcock, in light of the federal findings. It found "management and staffing issues, lack of evidence of ongoing active treatment, and lack of evidence of assessments for appropriate level of care."

DOJ_NMG_0004520

Ms. Johnson, of Babcock, disagrees with those findings. She says the audit was performed by an organization that isn't familiar with specific program requirements for the developmentally disabled and investigators didn't spend enough time at Babcock homes to gauge active treatment. "I don't think they did a fair appraisal," she says.

Stan Butkus, head of the state's Department of Disabilities and Special Needs, ordered Babcock to reduce its number of residents by 50%, saying "system improvements can best be achieved … by reducing Babcock's size and scope of responsibility."

Babcock has proposed turning over facilities to the state so residents won't have to move. Other agencies will be asked to operate the homes.

Regulating A Faulty Heart Device (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

The deplorable story of how a medical-device company sat on information about a flawed heart defibrillator while a hapless recipient died has now engulfed the Food and Drug Administration as complicit in the silence. A report by Barry Meier in The Times yesterday revealed that the agency received a report from the manufacturer detailing the flaws months before the F.D.A. issued a safety alert on the devices. By the time the agency acted, a college student relying on the implanted defibrillator to shock any erratic heart beats back to normal had died while mountain biking. His unit had short-circuited, just as the same model did earlier in about two dozen other patients.

What is disturbing is how long it took the company, the Guidant Corporation, and the regulators to get a meaningful warning to doctors and patients. The company is required to submit an annual report to the F.D.A. that includes data on how often, and why, its devices fail. As it turned out, the company waited until mid-February of this year to submit a report that covered the year from June 1, 2003, to May 31, 2004. The eight-month lag seems intolerably long for devices that can mean life or death. In previous years, Guidant had submitted reports within three months of the period covered.

The report revealed that 10 of the problematic devices suffered short circuits during the year. This was surely information of potentially great importance to doctors and patients. The student mountain biker died in March. Neither he nor his doctors were aware of the short-circuiting problem.

The regulators also appeared lethargic. The F.D.A. has a policy of reviewing the annual reports within 90 days, but it is unclear whether the regulators read Guidant's report by mid-May. There is no indication that the agency took any action in response to it. Only when The Times was about to publish an article on the flawed devices in late May did the company issue an alert to doctors, followed in June by an alert from the F.D.A.

The agency's excuse for not making the failure data public right away is too feeble to withstand scrutiny. Although F.D.A. officials have sometimes claimed that the annual reports are proprietary documents that must be kept confidential, they now acknowledge that the failure data itself is not confidential. The problem, they say, is that the failure data is included in a report that contains other proprietary information. It would be an inefficient use of time and resources, the agency says, to plow through hundreds of annual filings to determine what information could be released and what had to be kept confidential.

If that is the only problem, the solution is simple: require the companies to submit the failure data separately in a form that can be released immediately.

Probing Surgery's Link To Cancer Recurrence (WSJ)

By Amy Dockser Marcus

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

Doctors have long noted that the rate of recurrence for women with breast cancer is highest during the first two years after surgery to remove the tumor. Now a group of researchers say they have found a reason why: the surgery itself.

In a paper published today by the quarterly International Journal of Surgery on its Web site, the researchers argue that taking out the tumor triggers the release of certain substances in the body, perhaps as part of the wound-healing process or in response to the absence of the tumor. They believe that these substances, in turn, enable cancer cells that had been lying dormant in other parts of the body to undergo angiogenesis -- the process by which the body forms new blood vessels -- which also feeds the tumors' growth. This can cause the women to relapse early, the researchers concluded.

The researchers' findings are based on their study of a database of 1,173 breast-cancer patients treated in Italy. They didn't conduct examinations or blood tests on the subjects. Rather they offer the theory of "surgery-induced angiogenesis" as the best explanation for a statistical cluster of recurrences in the group. They say the cases recurred too early to be explained by another mechanism, so the researchers concluded they were related to the women's surgeries.

There is support for this idea in animal and human studies that link surgery to remove tumors, including lung and colon cancer, with cancer recurrence. For instance, in a 2002 paper published in the journal Lancet, colon-cancer patients who had traditional surgery had a significantly higher rate of relapse than patients who had a minimally invasive laparoscopic procedure.

And the study's lead author, Michael Retsky, a lecturer in surgery at Children's Hospital Boston and Harvard Medical School, says the theory of surgery-induced angiogenesis may have implications for treatment of a variety of cancers. Cancer drugs that try to stop tumors from being able to form new blood vessels, such as Avastin, are being increasingly used as part of therapy. And other "anti-angiogenic" agents are being studied in animals and humans, focusing new attention on how to best use these drugs to improve survival.

The paper's authors don't advocate that women with breast cancer forgo surgery. Most women with breast cancer have surgery -- either mastectomy or lumpectomy -- to remove the tumor, and this has long been part of the standard treatment.

"Surgical therapy cures a large majority of women with early-stage breast cancers and I don't want patients to run away from the operating room," says Susan E. Clare, a breast-cancer surgeon at Indiana University School of Medicine in Indianapolis, who wasn't involved in this study.

Women typically undergo chemotherapy or radiation in addition to surgery to try to cut the risk of the cancer coming back. But the study suggests that this may not be enough, and that doctors might want to study the idea of giving certain women anti-angiogenic drugs in the days before and after surgery.

Dr. Retsky and his colleagues looked specifically at breast cancer because it involved a large, deep database of patients, he said. The research has led him to believe that "over half of all relapses in breast cancer are accelerated by surgery."

It isn't yet known which women might be most at risk for this sort of recurrence. But in studying the relapse patterns of the 1,173 women, who were treated at the Milan Cancer Institute in Italy only with surgery and then followed for 16-20 years, the researchers determined that younger women are the hardest hit by surgery-induced angiogenesis. According to the analysis, 20% of premenopausal women whose cancer had spread to their lymph nodes at the time of diagnosis relapsed within the first 10 months after surgery. This relapse rate was twice as high as that of women after menopause whose cancer had spread to the lymph nodes, indicating that surgery-induced angiogenesis may be regulated in some way by hormones.

The study also contended that this phenomenon might help explain the so-called mammography paradox for women ages 40-49 that has come up in some breast-cancer-screening studies. In some trials, women ages 40-49 who were invited to be screened died of breast cancer in greater numbers than women who weren't part of the group asked to be screened. Dr. Retsky, and his co-authors Romano Demicheli and William J.M. Hrushesky, theorize that if the women underwent mammography and had their cancers discovered earlier, they then would be treated by surgery and be at higher risk of being affected by surgery-induced angiogenesis.

The paradox theory itself is hotly disputed, with some scientists contending that it doesn't exist. "The number of cases in the early years of the screening trials are too small to permit accurate analysis," says Daniel B. Kopans, a professor at Harvard Medical School and the director of breast imaging at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston.

The study comes at a time of increasing interest in finding ways to prevent recurrence. Other researchers also believe that angiogenesis plays a role in the process of recurrence. Michael S. O'Reilly, an assistant professor of radiation oncology and cancer biology at M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston, says that animal data suggest that surgery-induced angiogenesis exists, and could be a factor in early relapse. But he said that it still wasn't clear whether the phenomenon worked the same way in every cancer, how to identify at-risk patients, or even whether surgery-induced angiogenesis was the only explanation. "It may explain the phenomenon in some patients but not all of them," Dr. O'Reilly says.

A national breast-cancer trial sponsored by the American College of Surgeons Oncology Group is examining whether treatment that alters hormone levels around the time of surgery will improve outcome and prevent recurrence. "We know that endocrine manipulations have strong effects on tumor blood vessels," says Matthew J. Ellis, director of medical oncology at Washington University School of Medicine in St. Louis, and the principal investigator of the trial.

The question of whether surgery spurs the growth of previously undetectable cancer cells has been around for decades, in part because animal data indicated a connection. Some research suggests that it is the removal of the primary tumor that acts as the trigger, with lab work in animals showing that some metastasized cancer cells don't grow on their own until a primary tumor is removed. The primary tumor may inhibit the growth of blood vessels in cancer cells elsewhere in the body, and cutting out the tumor alters that process. Researchers compared the situation in the body to a huge stew, with the removal of the tumor upsetting the balance of the different ingredients.

Another theory on how surgery jump-starts angiogenesis in a tumor involves the wound-healing process. In the 2002 Lancet study on patients with advanced colon cancer some doctors speculated that in the more-extensive surgery, a larger wound was made than with the laparoscopic surgery -- and more substances and proteins involved in healing the body were released into the blood as a result. These "growth factors" also may spur the angiogenesis process in tumors.

Harikrishna Nakshatri, a colleague of Dr. Clare in the department of surgery at Indiana University School of Medicine, developed a mouse with breast cancer that would spread to the lung only after the removal of the primary tumor. Earlier this year, blood samples from 12 mice were taken before and after the tumor was removed. Then, Dr. Clare and colleagues at the Indiana Centers for Applied Protein Sciences identified proteins that surged or decreased after surgery. Some substances dropped precipitously, suggesting that they might have played a role in stopping cancer cells from previously growing. Others that are involved in helping the body to heal wounds surged.

The next step, Dr. Clare says, is to see whether the same proteins they are seeing in mice are present also in women. "If it turns out to be true in women, we can then try to find therapies to block it," she says.

Joyful Palestinians Rush Into Empty Settlements (USAT)

By Martin Patience

USA Today, September 13, 2005

GUSH KATIF, Gaza — Jubilant Palestinians celebrated the end of 38 years of Israeli occupation Monday by marching into Jewish settlements emptied by Israel after its decision to pull out of Gaza.

Palestinian Authority plans for an orderly transfer of power were quickly brushed aside as eager Palestinians rushed to the settlements early Monday, soon after the last Israeli forces withdrew.

Israel removed 8,500 Jewish settlers from their homes in 21 Gaza settlements last month, razing most of the buildings in the communities. The last column of Israeli tanks rumbled out of Gaza just before sunrise Monday. “The mission has been completed, and an era has ended,” said Israel's Gaza commander, Brig. Gen. Aviv Kochavi, who was the last soldier to leave.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas said Palestinians still faced a “long road” to statehood. But “today our people have the right to celebrate their freedom, their dignity,” he said. “This place was a taboo for us for the past 38 years, and now we are standing here.”

Throughout the day, Palestinians stripped fixtures and roofing materials from municipal buildings and synagogues that had not been demolished by the Israeli army. They loaded trucks, carts pulled by donkeys and supermarket trolleys with bed frames, light fittings, scrap metal and toilets.

Empty synagogues in the Morag, Kfar Darom and Netzarim settlements and a Jewish seminary in Neve Dekalim were torched. Later, a Palestinian bulldozer began knocking down the walls of the Netzarim synagogue. Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom called the burning of the synagogues “a barbaric act.”

Khalid Ismail, 40, a Palestinian math teacher from Khan Younis in Gaza, agreed. “I don't think it's civilized,” he said. “We should respect the religions and beliefs of others.”

For many here, however, Monday was a day of celebration and exploration of the settlements that had been closed to most Palestinians. “I never thought Gaza was so beautiful,” journalist Azmi Mohammed, 40, said as he stood beside a grove of date trees. “For 38 years, we have been closed to this stunning place, and now it feels as if we are out driving in the country.”

DOJ_NMG_0004523

Abu Mahad, 70, was desperate to get to the beach in front of the Gush Katif settlement bloc. The shore had been closed to Palestinians since the start of the Palestinian uprising in September 2000. “I feel like I am born again,” he said.

Palestinian officials said the occupation of Gaza was not over. “By reserving itself the ability to invade the Gaza Strip and by maintaining control over Palestinian airspace, territorial waters and most importantly its borders, Israel will continue its military rule over the Palestinians and thereby continue to deny Palestinians their freedom,” Minister of Civil Affairs Mohammad Dahlan said. “Israel is deluding itself if it believes that its occupation over the Gaza Strip has now ended.”

By late evening, settlement roads were jammed with Palestinian pedestrians and cars flying flags. Iyas Salim, 40, an aid worker, said this was only the start. “The West Bank and Jerusalem must be next,” he said, referring to Palestinian hopes to build an independent state in Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem — captured by Israel in the Mideast war in 1967.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has said he remains committed to the U.S.-backed “road map” peace plan, which calls for an independent Palestinian state, but any negotiations depend on Abbas' ability to rein in militant groups.

Palestinians Rejoice, Loot As Israel Wraps Up Pullout (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

KHAN YOUNIS, Gaza Strip -- Euphoric Palestinians celebrated the exit of the last Israeli soldiers from Gaza yesterday by swarming into former Jewish settlements, frolicking in the sea at previously restricted beaches and spilling over the border into Egypt.

Despite Palestinian Authority pledges to keep Gazans out of the abandoned Israeli settlements for a few days, the Palestinian security forces did not prevent militants from torching synagogue buildings and firing guns in celebration, while looters made off with truckloads of debris.

Television footage of militants, policemen and civilians ransacking the settlements shocked Israelis and underscored the difficulty Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas will have in establishing law and order in the Gaza Strip.

"I think this is unacceptable behavior from our people," said Khan Younis Mayor Osama Alfara, who had just walked through what used to be the neighboring settlement of Neve Dekalim. "But our people want to be sure that there is no return of the Israelis, so they are taking some things as a memory."

Palestinian and Egyptian soldiers along Gaza's border with the Sinai Peninsula were overwhelmed by hundreds of residents from Rafah -- a Palestinian city that straddles the boundary -- who made their way to the Egyptian side, according to the Web site of the Ha'aretz newspaper.

A 38-year-old Palestinian was killed in the tumult, with Egyptian border police and Palestinian police accusing each other of responsibility.

After Israel abandoned the heavily fortified Philadelphi border corridor aimed at preventing weapons smugglers, Egypt deployed border police to patrol the region for infiltrators and illegal arms traders.

Mr. Abbas pledged to do all in his power to put an end to border violations. "The penetration of the border is completely unacceptable, and we will move to stop it," he said.

Israel concluded a monthlong evacuation from Gaza early yesterday, as a convoy of armored vehicles rumbled back over the border and the Gaza division commander, Brig. Gen. Aviv Cochavi, closed a gate in Israel's security barrier that surrounds the strip to the north and east.

Many Palestinians stayed up through the night in anticipation of the first hours of freedom. In pre-dawn hours, many Gazans had crossed over into the abandoned settlements. Hours later, tens of thousands of smiling Palestinians began making their way into land that many of them had never touched.

Amid the rubble around Neve Dekalim, which had been the largest Jewish settlement in Gaza, flags from the militant group Islamic Jihad, the Palestinian Authority and the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine were hoisted above synagogues and other public buildings.

A detachment of Palestinian security officers congregated outside the regional council building to ensure that Palestinians didn't destroy public structures left by the Israelis.

DOJ_NMG_0004524

"It's our mission to protect these buildings and to prevent their destruction," said Mohammed Mansour, a member of the national security force. "But as you can see, we aren't very successful. It's a shame."

On the plaza outside the Neve Dekalim synagogue, mule-drawn carts were piled with heaps of scrap metal. Inside, the Sephardic sanctuary was littered with shards of glass as men with homemade pickaxes smashed windowpanes in the third-floor rafters.

"We've been waiting 38 years, what do you expect from me," said Ahmed Ikhleya between blows at the synagogue. "We want to end the occupation, and we don't want any memory of the occupiers."

In the southern portion of the strip, just west of Neve Dekalim, thousands of adults and children enjoyed their first trip to the local beach in five years.

During the latest Palestinian uprising, the Israeli army barred the residents of Khan Younis from driving five minutes through the Jewish settlement block to the beach, and instead forced them to travel hours to Gaza City.

Yesterday, the children splashed through the surf, using foam from former settlement ceilings as flotation devices.

"We were deprived of smelling clean air," said Fayrouz Figawi, a mother of 12 sitting under a hut of corrugated metal collected at a settlement. "When they deprived us of the beach, we sat at home listening to bullets and tank shells."

Gazans Revel As They Sift Through Ex-Settlements (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

NEVE DEKALIM, Gaza Strip, Sept. 12 - Throughout the abandoned Israeli settlements of Gaza, Monday was a carnival of celebration, political grandstanding and widespread scavenging for a Palestinian population whose occupiers vanished overnight, as the Israeli Army pulled its last soldier out of Gaza at 6:50 a.m.

But hours before the divisional commander, Aviv Kochavi, became the last Israeli soldier to leave, thousands of Palestinians had entered the once-forbidden settlements that, together with their military infrastructure, consumed about 30 percent of the densely populated Gaza Strip.

The celebrations were orchestrated in part by the rival factions within Palestinian society - Islamic Jihad, Hamas and Fatah, the mainspring of the Palestinian Authority. Their flags of black, green and yellow were more numerous than the Palestinian flag, and were prominent on abandoned Israeli military outposts and public buildings.

Hamas, which is running hard for votes in January's legislative elections, paraded through numerous settlements, with armed and often masked men on loudspeaker trucks. Hamas posters and graffiti proclaimed the victory of resistance. Islamic Jihad, which is not running, did the same, as did armed members of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, a Fatah contingent.

Some who came did so to see the land they had worked before the 1967 war, when Israel took Gaza from Egypt; others honored friends who had died in attacks on the Israeli settlers; still others came to salvage whatever could be ripped away and sold from the large piles of rubble the Israelis had left behind.

Donkey carts were piled with bathroom fixtures, pieces of metal, skeins of wire and long pieces of wood, to feed home ovens. Men, women and children worked with a seriousness of purpose, trying to take home some little personal benefit from the return of lands many feel will somehow, as usual, end up in the hands of the wealthy or well connected.

By the light of burning egg crates, Samir Abu Hattah whacked away at window glass with a metal pole, shouting, "Go to hell, Zionists!"

Then he directed a group of young men to start pulling down the electrical wiring, aluminum window frames and doors of an agricultural warehouse here in Neve Dekalim.

"I feel a great sense of victory today," said Mr. Hattah, 40, who lives across the tall concrete wall in the Khan Yunis refugee camp and who used to work in this settlement before the second Palestinian uprising began in 2000. "The Zionists built it and then they destroyed it," he said with satisfaction. "The lesson I've learned, and I will pass it on to my sons, is that no matter how long it takes, the occupiers will leave because of resistance."

DOJ_NMG_0004525

Behind him, a settlement synagogue built in the shape of a huge Star of David was smoldering, fires inside sending smoke through the edges of the star. Atop the building, in the dim smoky moment before dawn, one could see a huge green flag of Hamas, with a smaller Palestinian flag flying below it.

A few minutes later, a large black flag of Islamic Jihad was flying just under the Hamas flag, above the Palestinian one.

Five minutes later, the Palestinian flag had been taken down altogether.

Israel had leveled all the other buildings in the settlements in an agreement with the Palestinians but chose, at the last minute, not to destroy the synagogues because a number of Israeli conservatives argued that it was wrong for Jews to destroy synagogues. As a result, settlement synagogues were standing and vulnerable to vandalism.

As daylight brightened, more Palestinians poured into the former settlements, which are still surrounded by huge fortifications and electronic fences. Some went sightseeing, some went salvaging, some went to swim from beaches that had been closed to them. They were joined by hundreds of schoolchildren in uniform who were given the day off as a holiday. Three people were reported drowned.

Ahmad el-Kurd, the new Hamas mayor of Deir Al Balah, cheek by jowl with the former settlement of Kfar Darom, said his joy was mixed as he remembered how much he loved, as a boy, the unspoiled dunes that were fenced off for Kfar Darom. "If they could only give me back the land as it was 38 years ago," he said. "Now, it's only piles of rubble."

In Kfar Darom, there was an extensive march of armed fighters, but the synagogue there was protected from burning by security forces who made a kind of headquarters out of it. Palestinian officials said they expected to pull down the remaining synagogues themselves, and a bulldozer began the task in Netzarim.

He was happy today, Mr. Kurd said, but his happiness was also tempered "because of the continuing occupation of Jenin and Nablus and Jerusalem, which are also part of Palestine." And until Israel resolved the question of how to allow Palestinians and their goods to enter and exit freely from Gaza, to Egypt and to the West Bank, he said, "Israel remains an occupier," a position supported by the Palestinian Authority.

"If there is no freedom of movement, don't consider the Palestinians free," Mr. Kurd said. "We will not accept Gaza as a big prison."

The Israeli government of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon says that the life of Gaza is up to the Palestinians now, and that only security considerations are preventing a resolution of the issue of Israel's continued control over Gaza's border with Egypt. The Israelis have proposed a complicated six-month provisional procedure, which the Palestinians reject. For their part, the Israelis have so far rejected a proposal by the Western mediator, James D. Wolfensohn, to allow Palestinians to pass through Rafah to Egypt with European officials supervising the process on behalf of Israel.

Thousands of Palestinians slipped through gaps in the border wall on Monday and crossed from Gaza to Egypt at Rafah in a scene of chaos and jubilation, with tearful family reunions and one man reportedly shot dead. Witnesses said an Egyptian soldier shot and killed a Palestinian who crossed into Rafah, but the Egyptian government denied the report, insisting the victim must have died from a stray bullet fired by those celebrating the withdrawal of Israeli border guards.

"I categorically deny this report, which is completely baseless," said Suleiman Awad, official spokesman of President Hosni Mubarak. "It's inconceivable that Egyptian soldiers should have opened fire on the Palestinians after letting 3,000 cross the border for family reunions."

The leader of Hamas's military wing in the sprawling Khan Yunis camp, Abu Moath, came with his armed entourage to take a look at Neve Dekalim. He had not been here in a very long time, he said, and recognized little among the piles of rubble, atop which young men dug for metal scraps, plastic chairs and an old washing machine.

Asked about Israel's last-minute decision not to destroy the last 24 synagogues in Gaza but to ask the Palestinians to protect them, Abu Moath scoffed. "They must be destroyed as symbols of Israel and the occupation," he said. "They promised to destroy them, and we are only carrying out the ruling of their own court." As he spoke, two of his entourage showed their colleagues the car batteries they had found.

On the wall of a synagogue here was a Hamas slogan: "Push them out as they pushed you out!" And nearby, there was another: "Yes for freedom! No for Jews! - Hamas."

Fatma Abu Reziq, whose large, poor Khan Yunis family was profiled in The New York Times in June, said she was one of the first Palestinians into Neve Dekalim, arriving at about 3 a.m., even before the last Israeli tank rumbled away. "People were afraid at first, and then they saw people like me get in, and they became brave," she said.

Even she, she said blushing, had salvaged a few items from this settlement to brighten her home, a few hundred yards across the no man's land from the towering cement wall that still cuts off Khan Yunis from Neve Dekalim. "Now that the Israelis are gone, our lives will be better and quieter," she said. "I can't describe my happiness to see the flag of Palestine flying here."

Palestinians Pour Into Settlements (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

GAZA CITY, Sept. 12 -- Thousands of Palestinians rushed into the former Jewish settlements of the Gaza Strip on Monday in a mood of elation and opportunism. Some scavenged for items of potential value or souvenirs of Israel's departure, while others trashed abandoned synagogues that had been left standing when settlers departed.

Israeli troops had left overnight, ending a 38-year military hold on the Gaza Strip and the 21 former Jewish communities. The Israeli government had razed many of the buildings after settlers departed.

Men and women, young and old, descended on the settlements soon after the last Israeli soldier passed through the Kissufim crossing a little before 7 a.m.

"The children want to know what happened to the trees," said Yasser Nawas, 36, an engineer from the Nusseirat refugee camp, who took his four small children Monday morning to get an early glimpse.

Nawas walked in with his small phalanx of children, under skies filled with acrid black smoke, along roads lined with uprooted pine trees. Amid piles of rubble that last month were comfortable homes, Palestinian men collected coils of cable, aluminum window frames, plastic water tanks and streetlights, loading them onto donkey-drawn carts.

"I brought them to know the place they have been deprived of," Nawas said of the children. "I'm not surprised by the destruction I've seen. But I am shocked by these uncivilized acts. I was expecting celebrations, something for the kids to see."

Although abandoning the territory, Israel will maintain control over its border with Gaza, and Palestinian officials say that means the occupation has not ended. But settlement streets were taken over by various armed militias, all claiming a share of credit for the unilateral Israeli departure from land it occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

Egyptian troops, meanwhile, have deployed along Gaza's southern border. Palestinian officials said Egyptian border guards shot and killed a Palestinian man identified as Nafiz Ateyah, 34. Officials said the shooting occurred while Egyptian police were trying to control crowds along the Gaza side of the border in the city of Rafah, where dozens of Palestinians managed to cross Monday after months of being prevented from doing so. Egypt denied that its border guards shot the man, according to the Reuters news agency.

In some of the former settlements, Palestinians scuffled occasionally amid the rubble, prompting police to intervene with batons and warning shots. Although the day was largely free of violence, the synagogue buildings that the Israeli government decided to leave intact were vandalized, and at least four of about two dozen were set ablaze.

Palestinian authorities later bulldozed some of the synagogue buildings, symbols to many Palestinians of the Israeli occupation. Israeli officials criticized the Palestinian Authority for failing to protect the buildings, including the one in the largest former settlement, Neve Dekalim, where the interior walls bore scorch marks from fires set early in the day.

In the early afternoon, a noisy convoy carrying Mahmoud Zahar, a senior official of the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, rolled through the settlement's torched gatehouse. Zahar's pickup truck was filled with Hamas gunmen and was followed by a truck blaring martial anthems and announcing Zahar's arrival to thousands of Palestinians.

Shattered glass crunched under the feet of Zahar's entourage as he entered the synagogue building. Few Palestinians paused from prying electrical cord from the walls or smashing free an air-conditioning unit as Zahar passed. Someone handed him a hammer, which he swung vigorously against a wall. "Our resistance has succeeded in ending the . . . resistance in Gaza," Zahar said, referring to Israel. "This means that this first step will be followed by a second step." The next step, he said, was to rebuild Gaza and wage "an effective armed resistance in the West Bank," the heartland of what has been designated as a future Palestinian state.

Across the strip, lines of cars clogged roads blocked for years by Israeli checkpoints and barricades. Palestinians pushed aside cement blocks and coils of razor wire to open up old roads and make new ones through dunes and marshy valleys.

In the former settlement of Kfar Darom, Palestinian soldiers watched over the abandoned synagogue, the scene of a dramatic stand by Israeli settlers last month. Holes had been punched in its walls, and insulation dangled from the ceiling from the work of vandals earlier in the day.

Soldiers guarded about 4,000 greenhouses that form the backbone of the strip's agricultural industry, but the large salad factory in Kfar Darom stood unwatched. Scores of Palestinians ransacked the large building, which once employed many Kfar Darom residents and supplied salad to dozens of Israeli restaurants.

For the first time in decades, the dirt road leading from the coastal highway to the former central settlement of Netzarim filled with Palestinians, who made a raucous parade on foot and by donkey cart and SUV into the former settlement. "This is subhuman," one man grumbled as he watched scores of people sift through ashes and scrap heaps.

Mohammed Siam pinched a 7.62mm shell casing from an Israeli machine gun between his fingers. "I will make a medal of it," said Siam, 27, of Gaza City. "I'll tell everyone I took it out of Netzarim."

Mohammed Jadili, an interior designer from the Gaza City neighborhood of Zeitun, clutched a small rosebush flecked with pink buds as he watched a group of Palestinian youth scale the dome of the synagogue building. Hours later, it was demolished by Palestinian bulldozers.

"In my house, I will plant this," Jadili said. "And remember the occupation."

U.S.-Chinese Trade Relations Get Trickier (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — What started as a bad pun has become one of the most consequential questions facing the United States: "Who is Hu?"

Is Chinese President Hu Jintao the valued customer Corporate America fancies or, as a growing segment of official Washington fears, is he the USA's most dangerous long-term enemy?

Financial links between the USA — the world's most powerful country — and China — its most populous one — have never been more crucial. Bilateral trade is running at an annual rate of more than a quarter of a trillion dollars. And Beijing's purchases of U.S. Treasuries are essential to keeping interest rates low, good news for anyone who's taken out a mortgage recently.

Yet, with the Chinese and American presidents preparing to meet today on the sidelines of a United Nations session in New York, long-standing Sino-U.S. trade friction is merging with mounting anxiety over Beijing's stepped-up military spending and its muscular drive to secure energy supplies. As the Bush administration struggles to balance commerce and national security, companies seeking to expand sales to China may wind up in the crossfire.

"A rising China has another side people should be worried about. It's not just about cheap goods," says Yu Maochun, a historian at the U.S. Naval Academy.

This fall, the Commerce Department plans to issue a new "catch-all" regulation to curb sales to China of civilian technologies that could have military applications. The new rule could dramatically expand the list of items requiring export licenses for sale to China, beyond today's narrow list of advanced technologies.

"We're very concerned about it. … It's going to cut off a lot of legitimate non-military trade," says William Reinsch, president of the National Foreign Trade Council, a Washington-based pro-trade business group.

A group of 70 to 80 companies, including General Electric, Boeing and General Dynamics, have banded together to lobby against the proposal, he says. Affected products could include everything from medical technology to heavy equipment.

Bush is scheduled to speak with Hu, making his first visit to the USA since becoming China's president in 2003, on the fringes of a U.N. General Assembly session. The get-together was hastily arranged after Bush canceled a Sept. 7 White House meeting to focus on responding to Hurricane Katrina.

Antagonism toward China is flaring for several reasons. Chief among them: The largest single-country slice of the swollen U.S. trade deficit is with China. Earlier this month, bilateral talks aimed at capping surging Chinese textile shipments to the USA failed to reach an accord. Many U.S. manufacturers say China's refusal to allow world markets to set the value of its currency worsens the trade gap by making Chinese products artificially cheap. (Beijing took a small, but important first step in this direction in July when it stopped pegging the yuan to the dollar's value.)

China's historic emergence as an economic power is a source of both profit and peril for the USA. In a new survey, 66% of companies said their Chinese operations were as profitable or more profitable than their global operations, according to the U.S.-China Business Council, which represents about 250 corporations with operations in China. Three-quarters of those surveyed plan to boost their commitments there.

But as it prospers, China's ravenous appetite for energy is leading to conflicts with the U.S. Last month, a state-owned Chinese oil company, CNOOC, abandoned a bid to buy the U.S. oil company Unocal amid fierce congressional opposition. Other Chinese companies have defied the U.S. by signing deals with anti-American nations such as Iran and Sudan.

Flush with cash, China also is lavishing increasing resources on its military. Defense spending this year increased 12.6% to $29.9 billion — twice the figure from five years ago. And the Defense Department estimates that the actual total may be two to three times that amount, though still just a fraction of the USA's $400 billion military budget. A recent Pentagon report warned that China was amassing the weapons needed to thwart the U.S. in any future contest over Taiwan, which China regards as a renegade province.

The U.S. political climate also has shifted with President Bush's declining approval ratings, opening foreign policy to more widespread partisan attack. After the 9/11 attacks, China provided welcome backing for the U.S. war on terror, including acquiescing in the stationing of American military forces in Central Asian countries on its border. Such cooperation helped insulate China policy from sniping. No longer.

"The post 9/11 honeymoon is definitely over. … People are much more vocal about China," says Minxin Pei, a Shanghai native who directs the China program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

Worries over China's global ambitions threaten to impinge on trade policy. The U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission is expected within weeks to recommend to Congress legislation that would restrict access to U.S. capital markets for Chinese firms. "Bush is really in danger of losing control of policy toward China in the economic realm," says Bonnie Glaser of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "The concern about China in this country is going to continue to climb."

Likewise, the new Commerce Department regulations, which have been in the works for months, are aimed at preventing China's military from benefiting from any U.S. technology.

Today, less than 2% of all exports to China require a government license. And 95% of all applications are approved; the total value of contracts denied last year was just $10.8 million, according to Peter Lichtenbaum, acting undersecretary of Commerce for industry and security.

In June testimony before a congressional commission, Lichtenbaum acknowledged that the U.S. should be "cautious" about broadening its export controls because other countries often can sell to China what the U.S. chooses not to.

Industry representatives, however, say the new rules will discourage trade with China, in products such as manufacturing process technology or product improvement systems, either by adding uncertainty or swaddling it in red tape. Executives worry that the proposed regulations will burden exporters with determining whether their products will aid the Peoples Liberation Army.

"It sends a message to American investors to stay the hell out of the Chinese market," says William Clements, partner at Foley & Lardner, a Washington law firm.

Hu has his own domestic problems, and they could have implications for U.S. firms. Despite rising incomes, the past several years have witnessed a stunning increase in the incidence of public protest in China. Public Security Minister Zhou Yongkang said last month that 3.8 million Chinese had participated in 74,000 public demonstrations last year over issues such as unpaid pensions, official corruption and environmental concerns.

Such demonstrations are a long way from a national anti-government movement, but China is a society whose leaders traditionally — and with good reason — have been obsessed with the dangers of luan, or chaos. Last month, the government announced it was establishing elite anti-riot brigades in 36 major cities to quell future disturbances.

That atmosphere could cause some executives to think twice about future investments. “You could well see some companies decide with their next four plants to put three in China and one in India where three or four years ago they would have built all four in China,” says Kenneth Lieberthal, former director of Asia policy on the National Security Council.

Since assuming China's top government and party posts, Hu has cemented his power by cracking down on the media, academics and unauthorized churches. That feeds U.S. concerns about China's poor human-rights record and long-standing uneasiness with the specter of an increasingly prosperous communist dictatorship.

The ambivalence was reflected in the administration's handling of Hu's now-canceled Sept. 7 White House visit. Chinese officials, traditionally highly sensitive to matters of political symbolism and respect, unsuccessfully sought the hoopla of a full state visit for Hu.

There was ample precedent. In 1997, President Clinton held a state dinner to honor Hu's predecessor, Jiang Zemin. An ex-president, five former secretaries of state, congressional leaders and the heads of 30 corporations, including IBM, AT&T, Boeing, Time Warner and General Electric, were on hand to hear the Chinese president quote Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

Chinese officials were miffed at the U.S. refusal to extend the same treatment to Hu, according to June Teufel Dreyer, a University of Miami China specialist who was recently in Beijing. “It does matter to the Chinese. … They are very finely tuned to nuance,” she says.

Even if that irritation wanes, the tone of the relationship isn't likely to improve anytime soon. As soon as next month, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., could get a Senate vote on their legislation that would slap a 27.5% tariff on all Chinese imports. The measure, which drew 67 votes in an earlier test of political strength this year, is aimed at forcing the Chinese to allow the yuan to appreciate.

Schumer says China's initial 2% adjustment in the value of the yuan was insufficient to alleviate congressional concern over its trade practices. “China has to do more,” he told reporters last week.

The approach of the 2006 election year also won't make things any easier. And if the economy weakens under the spreading impact of high gas prices and the disruption of Hurricane Katrina, then Sino-U.S. trade tensions could really become inflamed.

Yet, given the trade and financial links between Beijing and Washington, neither nation can afford a rupture. “Both sides are trying to keep this thing well on the tracks,” says David Lampton, director of China studies at Johns Hopkins University.

China Promotes 'Peaceful Rise' To Quell U.S. Fears (WSJ)

By Charles Hutzler

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

BEIJING -- Even as Chinese President Hu Jintao and U.S. President George W. Bush gear up to meet in New York today, many Americans are questioning China's longer-term intentions.

Zheng Bijian thinks he has the answer. The consummate Chinese Communist Party insider and confidant of Mr. Hu is promoting a message that China isn't trying to displace the U.S. but is seeking to emerge onto the global stage peacefully. His "peaceful rise" project has gained the support of China's top leaders, with Mr. Hu originally expected to touch on the theme during a weeklong U.S. tour earlier this month.

That visit was postponed in the wake of Hurricane Katrina's devastation. During today's meeting at the United Nations, the two countries' leaders are likely to talk about the value of the yuan and denuclearization of the Korean peninsula, among other issues of bilateral concern.

In the backdrop of the meeting, however, is anxiety about China's rapid rise -- a situation Mr. Zheng is trying to change.

"China must take a different path, a path that none of the late emerging countries has taken in the contemporary world," says Mr. Zheng, a formal man known for choosing his words carefully. Otherwise, he said recently in an interview, China could meet the fates of Germany, Japan and the Soviet Union in the past century, ambitious upstarts foiled by the dominant powers of their time.

Mr. Zheng and his peaceful-rise project offer a rare window into the secretive world of Chinese foreign-policy making at a time when China's leadership is grappling to define the global role of this country of 1.3 billion people. Already, its mighty manufacturing engine, growing diplomatic clout and increasing assertiveness are sparking concern among some people in the U.S. and elsewhere that an emerging China could constitute a threat.

In the U.S., a Pentagon report warns of growing Chinese military might. China's ravenous appetite is contributing to rising oil prices world-wide. A flood of low-price Chinese exports is fraying China's ties with the U.S. and Europe, and its relations with Japan are at a low point.

Of course, the peaceful-rise concept has detractors. U.S. Secretary of State Donald Rumsfeld has questioned why China continues to build up its military if it faces no threat. In China, retired ambassadors have complained that the emphasis on "rise" was counterproductive, scholars close to the ambassadors say. Chinese military officers have objected to the "peaceful" component, saying it gives the impression China won't defend its national interests.

Mr. Zheng is undeterred by such criticisms, and his project is getting a boost by a change in the way Beijing views power. Since the periodic flare-ups with the U.S. over Taiwan and with Southeast Asian nations over territorial disputes that marred Beijing's image in the 1990s, Chinese leaders have been seeking more subtle ways to exercise global influence. They also believe China needs constructive relations both with major powers such as the U.S. and with neighboring countries such as Japan to maintain its fast economic growth, exceeding 9% a year currently, and to overcome daunting domestic challenges, such as a widening wealth gap.

Examples of China's new approach: Beijing's successful bid to host the 2008 Olympics; a free-trade agreement with Southeast Asia that has fueled 30% annual increases in China's import of regional goods in the past two years; and a growing leadership role in the U.S.'s efforts to get North Korea to dismantle its nuclear program.

In some ways, Mr. Zheng, 76 years old, is an unlikely pioneer of a new foreign-policy path. Son of a famous calligrapher and poet, he spent much of his career working in the party's insular propaganda department and focusing on internal matters. Known as a brilliant and visionary thinker, he helped write a critical assessment of Mao Tse-tung and his ruinous, radical policies after Mao's death in 1976, helping lay to rest an era of political struggle and opening the door to economic change.

When market overhauls stalled amid a conservative backlash that followed the crushing of the 1989 Tiananmen Square democracy movement, then-paramount leader Deng Xiaoping tapped Mr. Zheng to compile a series of documents that enshrined rapid economic growth as a goal and encouraged private business. One document Mr. Zheng worked on coined "socialist market economy" -- a somewhat-awkward phrase that nonetheless successfully gave cover to Mr. Deng to allow capitalism to take root.

Mr. Zheng began to focus more on foreign policy as vice president of the Central Party School, then headed by Mr. Hu, revamping the staid academy for midcareer party officials to include classes on modern economics and international affairs. Searching for lessons in recent history, Mr. Zheng commissioned studies on the collapse of the Soviet Union and traveled abroad frequently.

But it was during a trip to the U.S. in winter 2002, soon after Mr. Hu's elevation, that Mr. Zheng decided to spend what should have been his retirement years concentrating on foreign affairs. In a meeting with Condoleezza Rice, then the U.S. national security adviser and an acquaintance of Mr. Zheng, an air of tension crept into the discussions as she pressed him about how China planned to use its rapidly growing power, meeting participants recall. She also asked whether China would be satisfied as a status-quo power.

Mr. Zheng says he left Ms. Rice with a task: figuring out the differences between China's Communist Party and the deposed Soviet Communist Party. He also gave her two books to read, "The Analects" by Chinese philosopher Confucius and a volume of Deng Xiaoping's works.

At the time, Mr. Zheng says, he already was thinking about new foreign-policy directions. He used the phrase "peaceful rise" at a speech in Washington. Still, Ms. Rice's remarks bothered him, suggesting that the U.S. saw China as a threat, scholars close to him say. Returning to Beijing, he wrote a proposal to President Hu, suggesting a wide-ranging research project. Mr. Hu sent the proposal back, scrawling "Initiate research," the scholars say.

Mr. Zheng's team of researchers went to work. They didn't just focus on China's relations with other countries. Research prepared by his team examines pressing domestic issues, such as environmental degradation and income disparities and how, if not handled properly, they could hinder China's peaceful emergence in the world. A report on the reunification of Germany suggests Beijing might be more successful in wooing back Taiwan, a de facto independent island it views as part of China, if it offered a more democratic political system.

In late 2003, Mr. Zheng and China's top leaders began incorporating the term "peaceful rise" in major public addresses. Yet even as the project acquired momentum, opposition began to form at home. The foreign-policy establishment resented Mr. Zheng's sudden influence in their sphere, with some finding fault with the "peaceful" concept and others, with the "rise" aspect. In the face of the criticism, the leadership changed tack -- rhetorically.

In spring 2004, Mr. Hu and other leaders decided to replace the potentially provocative term "peaceful rise" with "peaceful development," researchers involved in the project say. Tellingly, the leadership didn't side with the hawks who opposed the use of the word "peaceful," the researchers say.

Neither Mr. Zheng nor his project appears to have been affected by the terminology shift. " 'Peaceful rise' or 'peaceful development' -- they're four words with the same meaning," Mr. Zheng says. The project has expanded at the leadership's request, he says, drawing on the expertise of nearly 100 researchers and officials.

This spring, before Mr. Hu's originally scheduled trip to the U.S., the Chinese president dispatched Mr. Zheng to deliver a special message to top U.S. officials that China isn't seeking to displace the U.S. and encouraged him to propagate theories from his peaceful-rise project, Mr. Zheng's aides say. Mr. Zheng also sought to get a read for Chinese leaders on the real feelings and views of Americans toward China, the aides say.

Before his trip, Mr. Zheng was briefed by both Mr. Hu, in an hour-long phone conversation, and Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao, in a two-hour talk in the closely guarded leadership compound of Zhongnanhai, Mr. Zheng's aides say.

In the U.S., he got red-carpet treatment, meeting with Secretary of State Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and other high-ranking officials during an 11-day visit. Mr. Zheng also lunched with former President George H.W. Bush at his vacation home in Kennebunkport, Maine, and even met with Sen. Hillary Clinton.

Mr. Zheng hit on the peaceful-rise theme continually during his visit. The usually media-shy theoretician hosted a rare luncheon for a small group of U.S. reporters in the U.S. capital, where much of the talk focused on the impact of an emerging China on the existing world order.

He stayed so late at a party hosted by Brookings Institution Chairman John Thornton at his New Jersey home, just so that he could answer all the guests' questions about China and peaceful rise, that Mr. Zheng's aides, waiting up for him past midnight back at the hotel, became worried. Mr. Zheng made such an impression that Federal Reserve Bank of New York President Timothy Geithner, a guest, proposed introducing him to Treasury Secretary John Snow.

Mr. Zheng, for his part, came away from his U.S. visit with an added sense of urgency, believing that "it is a very crucial time for U.S.-China relations," says Wang Boyong, an aide who accompanied him on the trip. "There are a lot of opportunities but also a lot of challenges. If we don't manage it well, the U.S.-China relationship could retreat."

One challenge, of course, is continued skepticism overseas that China can, or wants to, orchestrate a peaceful emergence onto the world stage.

Sitting in his book-lined office decorated with the calligraphy "Pillar of the Nation" by a former Chinese leader, Mr. Zheng carefully measures out a response. China has been on an upward path for 25 years since it began economic overhauls, with few serious disruptions to the world, he says. Still, he adds, its peaceful rise will be a lengthy process, stretching until midcentury, when China becomes a developed nation.

"We don't expect you to totally believe that we can definitely realize the peaceful rise of China," he says. "But there are still decades to come to see how we do."

U.S. Considers WTO Action On China (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — The United States is actively considering lodging a formal complaint with the World Trade Organization over rampant Chinese counterfeiting of copyrighted American products.

DOJ_NMG_0004532

U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman said in an interview Monday with USA TODAY that government lawyers were collecting data needed to support a WTO filing.

"We are looking at a case. … If we have a strong case, and if we don't see the progress that we've asked for, we won't hesitate to move forward," he added.

U.S. officials have complained for years about widespread copying by Chinese companies of products such as compact discs, computer software and apparel. In July, Portman and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez held an annual meeting with top Chinese officials to discuss trade frictions.

Chinese officials agreed to increase criminal prosecutions of those caught violating copyrights, establish a joint working group of law enforcement personnel and guarantee that all government offices would use only licensed software by the end of this year.

But pirated products remain easily available in any major Chinese city. DVDs of new Hollywood releases — selling for less than $1 — are often available on Beijing's streets before they hit U.S. theaters.

The financial stakes are enormous. In April, William Lash, assistant Commerce secretary, said U.S. firms lose $20 billion to $24 billion annually because of phony Chinese merchandise. Half of U.S. exports depend upon some type of intellectual property protection, according to the State Department.

Since assuming the trade representative's post in April, Portman, a former Republican congressman from Ohio, said he has met with the software, recording and motion picture industries to discuss a potential WTO complaint. (The U.S. has filed 75 such grievances since the WTO's 1995 formation; only one has targeted China, which joined the body four years ago. "More than one dozen" other equally serious issues were resolved without going to the WTO, Portman's office says.)

In May, Portman requested formation of a WTO panel to resolve a U.S. complaint about European Union subsidies for Airbus, potentially the largest and most politically contentious such dispute.

But prospects for a new WTO complaint about China are clouded by U.S. industry's hesitancy to provide detailed information on the harm it's suffering

"We're encouraging those in the private sector who have been subject to piracy and theft of trademark and patents and copyright to step forward to provide us with the kind of information we would need," he said.

So far, there's little evidence that U.S. companies will do that. Many companies whose products have been illegally copied by Chinese manufacturers fear reprisals from the Chinese government if they support a WTO complaint, says Nicholas Lardy, an expert on the Chinese economy at the Institute for International Economics.

Portman's office "will not do it because they can't get the support of U.S. industry," he says.

In December, General Motors filed a lawsuit against a Chinese car company whose QQ small car looked like a Chevy sold in China. But Monday, GM said a WTO complaint might be another matter. "We would need to understand the circumstances and arguments in such a case before we could make a comment," GM spokesman Christopher Preuss says.

Meanwhile, Portman acknowledged that global trade negotiators remain far apart in the current round of multilateral trade talks. A December WTO meeting in Hong Kong, long regarded as critical for the so-called Doha Round, looms as a deadline. If agreement can't be reached at that session, the president's authority to secure a straight up-or-down vote on a new trade pact could expire before Congress could take up the issue.

"We've got some heavy lifting over the next three months," Portman said.

Mexico Builds Trade Ties With China (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 12 - President Hu Jintao of China wooed Mexican leaders on Monday during a state visit, trying to smooth out the often prickly relationship between the two countries as part of a larger campaign to expand China's influence in Latin America.

DOJ_NMG_0004533

In the afternoon, Mr. Hu and President Vicente Fox signed several minor agreements with great fanfare, among them one providing mutual tax limits on companies doing business in both countries and another that will allow Mexico to export grapes to China in return for importing Chinese pears.

The countries also agreed on a framework for negotiating future accords that eventually may allow Chinese companies to mine iron and other minerals in Mexico. In recent years, China has been scouring Latin America for iron and oil to feed its roaring economy.

But underneath these shows of cooperation lies an ugly economic street fight over the United States market, analysts say. Chinese companies have battered Mexico's manufacturers and farmers in recent years, and many here see China threatening to replace Mexico as the main supplier of light manufactured goods. Last year, China knocked Mexico out of the No. 2 spot on the list of importers to the United States.

And Mexico itself is flooded with Chinese products, both legal and contraband, from chili peppers to blue jeans to electronics. Last year, Mexico imported $31 in goods from China for every dollar's worth it sent there, according to trade experts here, and that does not include the thriving market in smuggled Chinese goods.

"The real relationship between the People's Republic of China and Mexico is very tense," said Enrique Dussel Peters, an expert on Mexican-Chinese trade at the Autonomous University of Mexico. "This ratio of 31 to 1, which is only going to grow in the short run, is not only a social problem but could become a political problem."

In a speech after a signing ceremony, Mr. Fox made it clear he had spoken with Mr. Hu about both the yawning trade deficit and the dumping of contraband Chinese goods.

"Today we heard from President Hu his enthusiasm, his help, his support in closing the commercial gap," Mr. Fox said, looking over at Mr. Hu. "We touched on the subject of contraband and President Hu offered to help with this area."

For his part, Mr. Hu kept his remarks short and diplomatic, saying only that he looked forward to seeing more Mexican products in the Chinese market. Later in the day, he visited the Mexican Supreme Court and then the Senate, where he got stuck in a broken elevator for 15 minutes.

Mr. Hu's visit seems part of a broader effort to secure future sources of oil, iron ore, aluminum, timber and other commodities throughout Latin America and Canada, despite the United States' longtime hegemony in the region. Under his watch, China has sewn up deals for Chinese companies to develop oil fields and mines and to purchase commodities in Brazil, Venezuela, Chile, Cuba, Bolivia and Argentina.

Mexico is different. The Constitution bans foreign investment in Petróleos Mexicanos, the state-owned oil monopoly, and the country lacks large reserves of iron and bauxite, analysts say.

Julian Ventura, the Mexican director general for Asian affairs, said oil exploration did not even come up Monday. And the mining agreement is only a framework for future deals, not a binding contract, he said.

Still, Mr. Ventura said the agreements signed Monday were intended to begin diminishing the trade gap. One of the most important agreements, Mr. Ventura said, will establish direct flights and allow large group tours to begin coming to Mexico from China, a potentially rich source of foreign exchange. "China is a country that has firmly arrived here in the international economy with an unprecedented impact and volume," Mr. Ventura said. "And what we are looking to do is to see this reality from the perspective of opportunities and not from the perspective of a threat."

China's Exports Show Gain Of 3.4% (WSJ)

By Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

HONG KONG -- China's export juggernaut picked up momentum in August, dashing any expectations that a small currency revaluation on July 21 would act as a speed bump to slow it down.

When China allowed a 2.1% appreciation of the yuan against the dollar in July, many economists predicted that such a small move would have negligible impact on exports.

In fact, exports showed no sign of slackening in the first full month after the revaluation. Exports in August hit $67.82 billion, which was 3.4% higher than July's $65.6 billion and 32% higher than those of August 2004. Imports in August totaled $57.78 billion, up 23% from a year earlier, giving China a monthly surplus of $10.04 billion, according to data announced yesterday by the Ministry of Commerce.

China now faces the prospect of more-intense pressure from the U.S. and other major trading partners for a steeper currency appreciation. Economists warn that support in the U.S. Congress for protectionist trade policies, muted somewhat after China's revaluation, could bubble up again.

Chinese trade negotiators are heading to the U.S. at the end of this month to try to reach a textile agreement in the face of unilateral curbs on surging Chinese exports. Their goal is to negotiate an accord similar to one agreed to with the European Union that guarantees steady expansion of China's textile exports within quota limits.

An earlier EU-China textile agreement ran aground when annual quotas were filled within weeks as European retailers rushed to fill their shelves before the winter shopping season, leaving some 80 million items of surplus clothing piling up at European ports. The top EU trade official, Peter Mandelson, negotiated a compromise deal last week to allow the excess into Europe, and the pact was quickly approved by EU member governments. The EU's executive arm, the European Commission, yesterday approved the textile accord, paving the way for the stranded bras, sweaters and trousers to be released beginning tomorrow.

Also yesterday, China's National Bureau of Statistics said the country's consumer prices in August rose 1.3% from a year earlier, down from annualized growth of 1.8% in July, largely as a result of falling food prices.

Slowing inflation also reflects a market glut of everything from steel to autos and household appliances as a result of overinvestment. For the first eight months of this year, consumer prices grew 2.1% from a year earlier, the Statistics Bureau said in a statement.

The August trade data offered some comfort to Beijing authorities as the pace of imports picked up. Imports are the key to bringing down China's trade surplus, which has ballooned this year because imports have grown far more slowly than exports.

Rising imports could indicate that Chinese companies are building up inventories again. Many companies had put off overseas purchases on expectations that the yuan could strengthen more, making imports cheaper in local currency terms. At the same time, corporate spending has been crimped by a government-orchestrated austerity program that kicked in last year to cool the economy, particularly in real estate.

In recent years huge trade surpluses with the U.S. and Europe have been largely offset by deficits with much of Asia, giving China only modest overall surpluses. Investment has been the main driver of growth.

For the first eight months of this year, China's trade surplus totaled $60.22 billion, the Commerce Ministry said, compared with a deficit of $1.1 billion during the same period last year. The surplus for all of 2004 was $32 billion. Chinese exports usually surge during the final quarter of the year as factories rush out Christmas orders. That means the surplus for the whole of this year easily could exceed $100 billion.

In the January-to-August period, exports rose 32% from a year earlier to $475.67 billion, while imports were 15% higher at $415.45 billion, the Commerce Ministry said.

China's State Secrets Agency Will Guard One Less: Death Tolls (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 12 - China said Monday that it would no longer treat the death toll in natural disasters as a state secret, a step that could lead to greater transparency in a country that has a long history of providing partial or misleading data about diseases, accidents, and state-directed atrocities.

The National Administration of State Secrets, a government agency that oversees the vast array of data deemed secret, announced the declassification of disaster-related death tolls, which the agency said had been carried out last month.

The rules will apparently apply mainly to purely natural disasters, like earthquakes, floods and typhoons. The change may allow Chinese officials and the state media greater leeway to report on such events as they unfold, rather than waiting for the official version to be released, usually by the state-run New China News Agency.

"Declassification of these figures and materials is conducive to boosting our disaster prevention and relief work," Shen Yongshe, a spokesman for the secrets agency, said at a rare news conference, according to the official news agency. Foreign reporters were not invited to the news conference.

If carried out as advertised, the timely release of casualty figures after accidents would be a modest step toward what officials have called "building a transparent government," a goal they have professed for many years.

Information about casualties in storms and floods are no longer routinely suppressed in China, as it was before the country opened its doors to the outside world a quarter century ago. The new rules are unlikely to lead to the release of data that is not currently available in some form.

But the revised regulations may make it more difficult for local officials to cover up accidents on the grounds of protecting state secrets, as they have often done in the past. As recently as this summer, officials were accused of providing a false death toll for a flash flood that wiped out a school and killed scores of children in the northern province of Heilongjiang.

In a commentary accompanying the announcement, the news agency said the veil of secrecy hindered the response to disasters.

"To continue to see natural disaster death tolls as state secrets makes it difficult to adapt to practical needs of disaster relief work and is not in accordance with general international practices," the commentary said.

There was no immediate indication of whether the easing of restrictions on information about natural disasters signals a broader easing of China's draconian rules on other secrets.

Chinese authorities often cite violations of state secrets, broadly defined as anything that affects the security of the state, to punish journalists, lawyers, doctors, government officials or others who challenge the Communist Party.

Offenders have been sentenced to long jail terms for sharing political gossip, or distributing speeches by government officials or articles published in the state-controlled press.

The secrets agency also did not define what kind of disaster was considered natural as opposed to human. It is unclear, for example, if a flood that followed a dam break, or the collapse of a mine, would be considered accidents in which the government retains the prerogative to suppress data.

It is also unclear whether the rules will apply retroactively to major disasters and atrocities in China's past.

The government has never provided a clear accounting of the deaths from the largely policy-driven famine that occurred during the disastrous Great Leap Forward, from 1958 to 1960, when Mao sold China's scarce grain reserves abroad and forced peasants to make steel in backyard furnaces. Although historians say that about 30 million people may have starved to death in what is still referred to as the "three years of natural disaster," the number is a gross estimate and widely disputed.

The official death toll in the Tangshan earthquake in 1976, one of the largest in history, is still recorded as 250,000, but Chinese experts acknowledge that the real toll was three times that amount.

Pakistan Leader Confirms Nuclear Exports (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan said yesterday that he believed that a Pakistani nuclear expert who ran the world's largest proliferation ring exported "probably a dozen" centrifuges to North Korea to produce nuclear weapons fuel. He added, however, that after two years of interrogations there was still no evidence about whether the expert also gave North Korea a Chinese-origin design to build a nuclear weapon.

General Musharraf's comments, which echo statements he made last month to Japanese reporters, were made in an interview a day before the United States was to reopen talks with North Korea about its nuclear program in Beijing.

The Pakistani leader's comments about the results of the interrogations of the expert, A. Q. Khan, a national hero who is under a loose form of house arrest in Islamabad, are significant because they tend to confirm the accusations American intelligence officials made against North Korea in 2002.

At that time, North Korean officials appeared to confirm that they had secretly started up a second nuclear program to build atomic weapons using uranium technology obtained from Mr. Khan's network, as an alternative to a plutonium program that was frozen under a 1994 agreement with the United States. But ever since, North Korea has denied that a second, secret bomb program exists.

A dozen centrifuges would not be enough to produce a significant amount of bomb-grade uranium. But American officials say they would have enabled North Korea to copy the design and build their own.

The Bush administration has insisted that unless North Korea agrees to give up both programs - and agrees to a broad program of inspections - no comprehensive nuclear deal can be reached. North Korea has suggested it may be willing to give up its older plutonium program, based at a huge nuclear complex located at Yongbyon, but has reiterated its denials that it has hidden centrifuges to make bomb-grade uranium.

In a wide-ranging discussion in New York with three journalists from The New York Times, General Musharraf also discussed Pakistan's tentative diplomatic openings toward Israel and its efforts to track down Al Qaeda leaders. He said that the opening to Israel could flourish "in case there is forward movement" on negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, but he said, "this is by no means recognition of Israel."

Despite protests in Pakistan about the new initiative, he insisted that his move had met little opposition among mainstream Muslims in Pakistan, and he is to address a Jewish group for the first time during his visit here. "What is the harm if I interacted with the Jewish Congress, knowing their influence here?" he said.

He said it was possible that Osama bin Laden, the Qaeda leader, is still moving between remote parts of Pakistan and Afghanistan four years after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States. "I will not negate entirely, with confidence, that he is not there," he said. "But I will never accept anybody who says with confidence that he is there." He said later that he often asks, "Do you have intelligence, have you heard him?"

Mr. bin Laden's whereabouts are a particularly sensitive subject for General Musharraf because Pakistan has been accused by some intelligence officials of doing a lackluster job of pursuing Qaeda suspects, stepping up pressure on them when it suits Pakistani interests but turning down the pressure at other times. He rejected that charge, saying Mr. bin Laden's power is reduced, no matter where he is.

"I do not think he can influence, because he is on the run, hiding," General Musharraf said. If Mr. bin Laden is on the Pakistan-Afghan border, he is switching sides "wherever he sees danger," General Musharraf added.

He rejected arguments that Pakistan was halfhearted in its efforts to root out Al Qaeda and remnants of the Taliban, who ruled Afghanistan until the American-led war there in 2001. "We have almost eliminated them from our cities," he said. "We have caught about 700 of them, and we have broken their back in the mountains." The groups no longer operate in the valleys of the Afghan border area, he said, "because we have occupied them."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, also speaking to reporters yesterday at The New York Times, praised General Musharraf for working in three areas, and said the United States would be supportive: helping to pursue members of Al Qaeda, creating "diplomatic space" for operating by reaching out to India and Israel, and working to improve education and the economy to discourage militancy. "There are parts of Pakistan that are extremely poor where you get breeding grounds for this kind of extremism," she said, and the United States would help him deal with those.

General Musharraf said that, in a meeting he had yesterday with Ms. Rice, he asked her to move toward a free-trade agreement with Pakistan. That is likely to meet some resistance in Congress, which derailed efforts by the Bush administration after the Sept. 11 attacks to aid Pakistan by lifting restrictions on textile imports.

But he said he made no demands for an agreement that would match the Bush administration's offer to help India develop a civilian nuclear power program. India and Pakistan have refused to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, and that has prevented most forms of nuclear cooperation with the United States.

In his discussion of Mr. Khan, General Musharraf said that two years of questioning of Mr. Khan - which the Pakistanis insisted they would do themselves, rather than allowing the United States to question him - a critical question had not been resolved: Did the scientist give the same bomb design to North Korea and Iran that investigators found in Libya, when it dismantled its uranium program.

"I don't know," he said. "Whether he passed these bomb designs to others - there is no such evidence."

U.S. Asked To Aid Nuke Technology (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

NEW YORK -- Pakistan asked the United States and other Western countries yesterday to help it develop civilian nuclear technology, citing Washington's July pledge for such assistance to neighboring India.

The Bush administration, however, dismissed the request, saying Pakistan's energy needs are not as pressing as India's.

Islamabad also offered to erect a fence along its border with Afghanistan to prevent incursions of Taliban and al Qaeda fighters from either side.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf discussed the proposal with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in New York. But he did not raise the civilian nuclear issue, U.S. and Pakistani officials said, and it was not clear whether he would mention it to President Bush when they meet tomorrow.

"We would like the developed countries -- especially the Western countries and the United States -- to extend cooperation to Pakistan for the peaceful uses of nuclear energy," Pakistani Foreign Ministry spokesman Muhammad Naeem Khan said at a press conference in Islamabad.

Although Gen. Musharraf did not bring up the matter yesterday, a Pakistani official traveling with him said that the United States and Pakistan have been "interacting" on the issue through diplomatic channels.

Pakistan built its first nuclear power station in 1972 with Canadian help, but Western cooperation was later discontinued under pressure from the United States and amid suspicions of a secret nuclear weapons program.

Nuclear tests were conducted in 1998, in response to a series of similar tests by India.

China helped the South Asian country start a 300-megawatt nuclear power plant in 1999, and construction of another plant of the same capacity began in April this year.

Even though the Bush administration calls Pakistan one of its staunchest allies in the war on terrorism, it has grown wary of its nuclear capabilities, especially because scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan admitted last year that he sold nuclear technology to Iran, North Korea and Libya.

"Pakistan doesn't have the same energy requirements, of course, that India does. And also, as we have made very clear, part of our consideration is the establishment of a long, positive, non-proliferation record," Robert Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, told Congress last week.

"And so as we look at that, and as we take that into consideration, we have made the determination that we need not move to establish the same type of cooperation with Pakistan," Mr. Joseph said at a House International Relations Committee hearing.

Gen. Musharraf, who is scheduled to meet with Mr. Bush during the United Nations 60th anniversary summit, told Miss Rice yesterday that his offer to build a fence along the Pakistani-Afghan border is a result of criticism that Islamabad is not doing enough to fight terrorism.

"Pakistan is prepared to raise a fence so that we can put an end to these allegations," Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri told reporters in New York. "Pakistan can do nothing more than that to prevent incursions."

He did not specify where and when the fence would be erected, but said that Miss Rice was "very appreciative" of the idea.

A State Department official said the fence issue is not new and was mentioned in a larger discussion about security in the border areas.

"Pakistan has nothing to hide," Mr. Kasuri said, "and we are fed up with people who say Pakistan has to do more to counter terrorism."

Pakistan, India Swap Prisoners To Push Peace Process (NYT/REU)

WAGAH, India-Pakistan border (Reuters) - Pakistan and India swapped hundreds of prisoners at a border post on Monday to foster goodwill as South Asia's nuclear rivals seek to push forward their sluggish peace process.

DOJ_NMG_0004538

Amid emotional scenes, hundreds of people thronged either side of the Wagah border post, between the cities of Lahore in Pakistan and Amritsar in India, hoping that relatives would be among those being released.

``My brother is coming back after 11 years. I am very happy," said a woman carrying a black-and-white picture of her brother on the Indian side of the border, while a crowd on the Pakistani side sang nationalist songs.

Pakistan released 435 Indian prisoners while Indian freed 152 Pakistanis, some as young as 12 years. In March, Pakistan released more than 500 Indian prisoners, mostly fishermen.

The latest mass release came two days before a meeting between Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in New York.

Meeting on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly, the two leaders are expected to seek ways to advance a peace process begun in January, 2004, but has still to make substantive progress on a core dispute over the divided territory of Kashmir.

``My release has become possible due to the efforts of the media and my sister, who approached human rights organizations," said Mohammad Babar after spending 15 years in an Indian jail.

The South Asian neighbors, who have fought three wars since wining independence from Britain in 1947, routinely arrest each others' nationals, mostly civilians or fishermen who have either strayed across land or maritime borders or violated their visas.

``We have no other way of making a living except fishing, so we have to take risks," Vallabh, a 53-year-old from the western Indian state of Gujarat, told Reuters as he got ready to go home after six months in a Pakistani jail.

But even as one batch was being released, 24 Indian fishermen were arrested on Sunday for illegally entering into Pakistani territorial waters in the Arabian sea.

India and Pakistan also have many prisoners they accuse of working for each others' intelligence services.

The case of one Indian condemned to death after being convicted 14 years ago of spying and carrying out a series of bomb attacks has become a cause celebre in India after Pakistan's Supreme Court upheld the death penalty handed to him in 1991.

Sarabjit Singh's family says he is a poor farmer who accidentally wandered into Pakistan in 1990.

Singh's lawyer plans to ask the court to review its decision and he also has the option of appealing to Musharraf for clemency.

Germany's SPD Makes New Gains In Polls (FT)

By Hugh Williamson And Friederike Tiesenhausen Cave

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

Germany's election race tightened further on Monday as Gerhard Schröder's Social Democrats pulled closer to the opposition Christian Democrats in a new opinion poll, increasing the likelihood of a "grand coalition" after Sunday's election.

The SPD scored 35 per cent in a Forsa poll, up 1 point to its highest rating since Mr Schröder called for an early election in May. The CDU was stable on 42 per cent.

In a further boost for the SPD, the chancellor on Monday evening delivered a strong performance in his final pre-election debate with Angela Merkel, pushing his conservative contender on to the defensive over the CDU's record in government and claiming credit for initiating economic reform process in Germany. Speaking on national television, Mr Schröder said "we had the courage to start with the necessary reforms that the CDU ignored during the 1990s".

The debate, which also involved leaders of the Greens, the liberal Free Democrats and the Left party, could influence public opinion in a similar manner to the head-to-head television duel earlier this month between the chancellor and Ms Merkel.

Mr Schröder was seen as having performed more strongly in the duel, leading to a surge in support for the SPD in opinion polls. A report published on Monday by an independent group of media analysts argued that the duel had been a "turning point" in election campaign.

Pollsters predict that Ms Merkel is still likely to emerge as the next chancellor but could be forced to form a coalition with the SPD, rather than with her preferred partner, the FDP. A CDU-SPD coalition would make far-reaching economic reforms more difficult to achieve.

Mr Schröder said in Tuesday's debate that he would continue with reforms if he was re-elected but would do so "in a way that included an element of social justice – an aspect missing from the CDU election programme".

Ms Merkel conceded that the chancellor had initiated some reforms after the CDU "was defeated in the 1998 election because we had not acted".

She accused the chancellor of breaking promises and failing to reduce near-record unemployment.

The CDU on Tuesday warned that the SPD and Greens would form a coalition with the Left party, which includes ex-communists and SPD dissidents, if such an alliance could gain a parliamentary majority.

German Voter Polls Show A Tighter Race (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

FRANKFURT -- It is looking increasingly likely that Angela Merkel will become Germany's next chancellor in Sunday's election, but whom she governs with -- and what economic policy she can carry out -- is increasingly up for grabs.

Ms. Merkel's center-right Christian Democrats are the clear favorite to snare the biggest share of votes, but in the stretch run her coalition's poll numbers have been slipping to just short of an outright majority.

The upshot is that instead of being able to control the German Parliament with help only from the small pro-business Free Democratic Party, the Christian Democrats may have to form a pact with their main rivals, the incumbent Social Democrats of Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

Ms. Merkel and Mr. Schroeder clashed on German TV last night in a debate involving the leaders of the six main parties standing in the election. Ms. Merkel sought to focus the debate on Mr. Schroeder's economic record, while Mr. Schroeder reminded viewers of his popular stance in opposing the U.S. war in Iraq.

Analysts are divided on whether a so-called grand coalition of Germany's two major parties would help or hinder the overhaul of the world's third-biggest national economy. "Many Germans have a notion that a grand coalition is the best way to bring together all political forces in a time of crisis," says Thorsten Polleit, an economist with Barclays Capital in Frankfurt. "Personally, I think it would be a worst-case scenario."

Pessimists about a grand coalition fear it would be short-lived and unstable because the Social Democrats, after once courting the CDU's businesses constituency, have shifted back to the left on economic issues this year -- rejecting further cuts to the welfare state and decrying unfettered capitalism. At the same time, Ms. Merkel has moved the Christian Democrats to the right on taxes and labor-market deregulation. That limits the scope for agreeing on common policies, which was easier in the past when both of Germany's major parties had centrist economic policies.

Some are hopeful that a grand coalition could unblock Germany's political stalemate of recent years, by forcing the big parties to negotiate rather than compete. "I'm not such an opponent of this constellation, because we don't have presidential government," says Josef Esser, political-science professor at Frankfurt University. Mr. Schroeder has had to seek support from overwhelmingly Christian Democrat state governors who sit in the upper house of Parliament, in the German system in which regional governors also have a say in national legislation. "We've effectively had a grand coalition for three years," he says.

Eckart Tuchtfeld, an economist at Commerzbank in Frankfurt, argues in a recent research report that Ms. Merkel could get the Social Democrats to accept at least some of her policies through horse trading. For example, the Social Democrats might accept some loosening of job-protection laws and union-bargained nationwide pay rates to help the unemployed find work. In return, the Christian Democrats might agree to setting minimum wages in some industries, and to raising east Germans' unemployment benefits to the same level as west Germans'.

The effects of such trade-offs would be to stimulate the economy in the short term, Mr. Tuchtfeld argues. The full package of welfare cutbacks that Ms. Merkel would push through if she wins outright, in contrast, could damp short-term growth, but would have a better chance of solving the economy's structural problems, the report argues.

Until a week ago, polls suggested the center-right was set to win a small but workable majority. But Mr. Schroeder has succeeded in putting Ms. Merkel on the defensive, including in a televised head-to-head debate.

Her detailed plans for tax-law changes, as well as her choice of a controversial flat-tax advocate as a key economic adviser, have given Mr. Schroeder an opening to refocus public attention despite widespread unrest about Germany's economic malaise and high unemployment.

Ms. Merkel has struggled with how to explain that she wouldn't introduce a flat tax -- which Mr. Schroeder tagged as skewed toward the rich -- at least not in her first term. "The Christian Democrats' communication wasn't ideal. They gifted the Social Democrats an additional campaign theme," says Torsten Schneider-Haase, a politcal analyst with market-research group TNS Emnid.

The center-right still could govern alone, pollsters say. "It's all about 1% or 2% this week," Mr. Schneider-Haase says. "Everything is open." Ms. Merkel and Mr. Schroeder have refused to contemplate the grand-coalition scenario publicly, with both candidates insisting their respective camps will win outright.

Race In Germany Narrows As Schröder Gains In Surveys (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

BERLIN, Sept. 12 - With less than a week to go until election day, the German campaign has tightened, according to the latest polls, with Chancellor Gerhard Schröder's leftist Social Democratic Party making gains on Mr. Schröder's opponent, Angela Merkel, leader of the right-of-center Christian Democratic Union.

Some polls over the weekend indicated that the Christian Democrats' lead, once a solid 10 percentage points over the Social Democratic Party, or S.P.D., had shrunk to just 6 percentage points.

But public opinion analysts still give Mr. Schröder virtually no chance to hold on to the chancellorship in the vote scheduled for Sunday. The main question in the election, as it always has been, is whether Mrs. Merkel will get enough votes to form a government on her own or whether she will have to form a "grand coalition" with her Social Democratic rivals.

"Schröder will not be chancellor because the S.P.D. will get fewer votes than the C.D.U.," said Reinhardt Schlinkert, a leading public opinion analyst from Bonn.

Theoretically, Mr. Schröder could remain chancellor if his party went into partnership with the Left Party, led by one of his bitterest political rivals, Oskar Lafontaine, which could get upward of 10 percent of the vote. But Mr. Schröder has declared publicly more than once that he will never cooperate with Mr. Lafontaine.

"Unless he changes his mind," Mr. Schlinkert said of Mr. Schröder, "he's out of business."

The tightening of the polls seems to reflect two developments in the campaign. One is simply that Mr. Schröder is deemed to have outperformed Mrs. Merkel in a 90-minute televised debate on Sept. 4.

Second, the Social Democratic Party has capitalized on Mrs. Merkel's appointment of Paul Kirchhof, a former Constitutional Court judge from Heidelberg, as her shadow finance minister. Mr. Kirchhof is well known as an advocate of a 25 percent flat tax for Germany, a position that the left has portrayed in Germany as an indication of Mrs. Merkel's intent to impose radical tax reforms that will strip the country of its social protections.

Mrs. Merkel has all along denied any plan to impose a flat tax, saying that Mr. Kirchhof is a visionary whose presence on her team is aimed at stimulating a thoroughgoing discussion about tax reform, which is part of her program. Still, the appointment nonetheless seems to have backfired.

On Monday, the magazine Der Spiegel, reflecting the attention this matter has gotten, showed a picture of Mr. Kirchhof on its cover under the headline "Election battle over Kirchhof."

"Kirchhof is being turned from the crowd puller into the uninvited guest," the conservative-leaning Süddeutsche Zeitung wrote Monday. "This is a breathtaking piece of theater, and the maddest thing about it is that Schröder is the director. Without any restraint, he is painting a picture of the 'professor from Heidelberg' as the devil of the unjust, antisocial, reactionary state."

Perhaps more troubling to the Christian Democrats than the Social Democrats' gain in the polls are other recent poll results showing that Mrs. Merkel will fall short of controlling the absolute majority in Parliament that would enable her to govern on her own.

DOJ_NMG_0004541

But every major poll published Monday showed Mrs. Merkel and her probable coalition partner, the Free Democratic Party, winning about 48.5 to 49 percent of the total vote, short of an absolute majority. If she does not improve on those numbers on election day, she will face governing with the Social Democratic Party, a situation seen by many people here as sharply reducing her ability to push through the economic reform program she has campaigned on.

Woman Could Be Germany's Next Chancellor (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Even Germans are surprised their next leader could be a woman. Not to mention a business-friendly conservative who was raised in communist East Germany.

"Pretty breathtaking," says Constanze Stelzenmueller, director for the Berlin office of the German Marshall Fund, a trans-Atlantic think tank.

Angela Merkel, head of Germany's Christian Democratic Union (CDU), faces Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder in elections on Sunday, perhaps the most important since German reunification in 1990.

In opinion polls, Merkel's CDU and its sister party in Bavaria have consistently enjoyed big leads over the chancellor's Social Democratic Party and its allies. But Schroeder, a relaxed, engaging public speaker, appeared to close the gap following a Sept. 5 debate with Merkel. A poll released Monday by Germany's Forsa polling agency showed Merkel's party still has the edge — but not enough for an outright majority in parliament.

Merkel, a former physicist, is telling German voters she can fix the economy with income tax cuts and incentives that would make it easier to hire and fire workers. She also has proposed increasing the country's value-added tax to 18% from the current 16%.

Sunday's vote could be the country's most pivotal since Germans on both sides of the Berlin Wall agreed to reunite. The German economy is Europe's largest, but it has languished because of high labor costs, rigid workplace rules and a costly social-welfare system. Unemployment is more than 11% and the government benefits network is near financial collapse. At the same time, Germany's relationship with the United States has eroded amid personal animosity between Schroeder and President Bush, mainly over the Iraq war.

In a televised discussion with the other candidates on Monday, Merkel bluntly criticized Schroeder's seven-year effort to address the country's economic woes. "You have failed in this question," she said. "That's why you are in such a difficult position."

Domestically, Schroeder continues to champion his Agenda 2010 program, unveiled two years ago. It aims to make job creation easier while cutting unemployment payments and pension benefits. So far, though, the plan has failed to budge the double-digit jobless rate or stimulate the economy, which grew 1.7% in 2004 after three years of stagnation.

Schroeder also is playing up his willingness to stand up to an American president, as he did in 2002 before the Iraq war. An Associated Press-Ipsos Poll last December showed seven out of 10 Germans had an unfavorable view of Bush.

Merkel, 51, is the first woman from any of Germany's five major parties to stand for chancellor. "Women in politics, academia and the business world (in Germany) are a decade behind women in America and some other European countries," Stelzenmueller says. "The fact in itself that we have a woman candidate for chancellor is revolutionary."

Merkel's roots are in the communist East. She was raised in a family that didn't fully support the system but accommodated it.

She grew up in Templin, about 60 miles north of Berlin. Her father, a minister, ran a Protestant seminary. She was seven when the Berlin Wall went up and the communist government began a campaign of repression against religion.

As she grew up, Merkel "was very critical" of East Germany's communist system, says Gerd Langguth, author of a Merkel biography. "Her father belonged to the left wing of the Protestant church. He was not willing to accept the rules of the dictatorship, but he made more compromises than many of his other colleagues."

Their differences have endured. Merkel's father skipped a 50th birthday party thrown for his daughter last year by the CDU, Langguth says.

DOJ_NMG_0004542

Merkel has a reputation for being humorless and aloof. London's Sunday Times described her as a “scientific cold fish.” She and her second husband, Joachim Sauer, a chemistry professor, married in 1998 and have no children together. She has few interests outside politics, Langguth says.

Merkel got started in politics after the Berlin Wall fell in 1989, first working as a democracy activist, then as spokeswoman for East Germany's short-lived democratic government, which ceased to exist after reunification in 1990.

Her understated persona has caused some to underestimate her. Even former chancellor Helmut Kohl, her mentor, “would refer to her as mein maedchen — my girl,” Stelzenmueller says. “He didn't see her as a challenger.”

But Merkel was one of the first to turn on Kohl in 1999, when he became mired in a political scandal involving slush funds and secret Swiss bank accounts. Writing in the Frankfurter Allgemeine newspaper, she urged him to resign. “It established her as someone to be reckoned with,” Stelzenmueller says.

Under her leadership, the CDU has triumphed in key regional elections, capitalizing on Schroeder's inability to refire the economy.

If Merkel wins, she is likely to try to return Germany to its traditional role as a peacemaker between France and the United States, says Jan-Friedrich Kallmorgen, director of Atlantic Initiative, a think tank in Berlin. The White House normally steers clear of politics in allied countries. But in July, Bush spent 45 minutes with Wolfgang Schaeuble, who is expected to be foreign minister if Merkel wins. In Germany, it was seen as an endorsement for Merkel, Kallmorgen says.

A 'Now What?' Shadows Japan Leader's Victory (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

TOKYO, Sept. 12 - A day after Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi secured the second largest landslide in a general election in the Liberal Democratic Party's history, attention turned Monday to how he would use that mandate.

With his coalition holding more than two-thirds of the seats in the lower house of Parliament, Mr. Koizumi is now expected, in the next month or so, to push through his bill to privatize the country's postal services. But once that is accomplished, what next?

Mr. Koizumi has one year before party rules force him to retire, and he repeated Monday that he would not seek an extension. Still, he finds himself possibly postwar Japan's most powerful prime minister, at a time when Japan is confronting problems ranging from an aging, declining population to growing economic dependence on China.

During the 12-day campaign, Mr. Koizumi focused exclusively and extremely effectively on postal privatization. "Tell us clearly what else besides postal privatization," read a front-page editorial on Monday in Asahi Shimbun.

"Voters gave Koizumi a mandate to be bold in domestic policy, to deal with the pension system, the falling birthrate and other problems that cannot be solved by other politicians," said Ikuo Kabashima, a professor of politics at the University of Tokyo. "But I don't believe they have given him a mandate in the areas of national defense or foreign policy, because he has not been successful in these areas, especially regarding relations with Korea and China."

Although Japan's deteriorating relations with its Asian neighbors dominated the news here for most of the year, foreign policy went nearly unmentioned during the campaign. Mr. Koizumi's resounding victory on Sunday suggested that voters were either supportive of his government's tough posture toward China and South Korea or were willing to overlook its chilling effects in the region.

With little to gauge how Mr. Koizumi might use his mandate outside Japan, there was general caution in China and South Korea.

"The reaction here has been that Koizumi's big victory will cause relations between South Korea and Japan to keep going in the wrong direction," said Ho Jeon Jin, an expert on South Korea and Japan at Kwang Woon University in Seoul. "Furthermore, there is a sense that Japan will move faster toward the right and, because of his control over the Parliament, will be able to revise its pacifist Constitution."

"My personal hope," Mr. Ho added, "is that he would use his mandate to improve ties with Korea and China, and turn Japan into a country that can be trusted in the region."

DOJ_NMG_0004543

In China, the Communist Party's newspaper, People's Daily, said the election results would "increase further his say inside the party." But the paper also said the vote did not necessarily mean that voters support Mr. Koizumi on issues like his visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, the memorial to Japan's war dead where important war criminals are deified.

Mr. Koizumi said Monday that he would convene a special parliamentary session on Sept. 21 to resubmit his postal privatization bill. Because his Liberal Democratic Party and its coalition partner, New Komeito, control more than two-thirds of the seats of the lower house, Mr. Koizumi has the votes to override decisions by the upper house.

The upper house rejected Mr. Koizumi's bill last month, leading him to call an early election. But in the last week, as polls indicated that Mr. Koizumi was heading toward a big win, former opponents of the bill in the upper house declared that they would support it in a future vote.

Mr. Koizumi wants to break up and privatize Japan Post, which in addition to delivering mail is the world's largest financial institution. It holds $3 trillion in savings and life insurance deposits that politicians have dipped into for decades to finance public works and reward their backers. Mr. Koizumi has said privatization is the prerequisite for further reforms in the Japanese economy, the second largest behind the United States, though he has not specified what other reforms he would pursue.

After the special parliamentary session, Mr. Koizumi said, he will shuffle his Cabinet and the leadership of his party. In one of the few indications of how he would use his mandate during the next year, Mr. Koizumi said he would make appointments with a view to grooming a possible successor.

"There are many aspirants to be party president and prime minister," he said. "I want to give those people the opportunities to play an active role as much as possible."

The successor will find the Liberal Democratic Party, which has ruled Japan nearly continuously for 50 years, much stronger than it was when Mr. Koizumi became prime minister four years ago. Until this election, the party's share of seats had been decreasing and it had found itself increasingly dependent on its coalition partner, New Komeito, to govern.

But on Sunday, Mr. Koizumi reversed the decline by capturing 296 seats out of 480 in the lower house, the second-biggest share in the party's history. What is more, results showed that the party, whose base has been rural, had made big gains in urban areas that had been gravitating to the main opposition Democratic Party in recent years.

So complete has Mr. Koizumi's transformation of his party been that it will have to find a successor in his image, said Professor Kabashima, at the University of Tokyo. "The L.D.P. will have to keep attracting voters from urban sectors, and the only way it can do that is by choosing someone like Koizumi," he said.

The Man, Not The Plan (WSJ)

By Michael R. Auslin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

Junichiro Koizumi has pulled off the unthinkable: A smashing electoral victory that would be the equivalent of carrying 49 states and 525 electoral votes in an American presidential election, were his. The Japanese prime minister humiliated not only the main opposition, but also the "rebels" from his own Liberal Democratic Party, whose resistance to his sweeping postal reform bill provided the impetus for the election. He gave the LDP 296 of 480 seats in the lower house, a two-thirds majority when combined with coalition partners. He is claiming a mandate to reintroduce his bold plan to privatize the postal system, along with its approximately $3 trillion in assets. He has, it seems, firmly steered the Japanese ship of state into the strong current of administrative and economic reform he's been promising since taking the premiership in 2001.

Sober reflection on the election's outcome, however, raises questions about the true strength of the victory and the message voters were really sending. Far from a powerful affirmation of Mr. Koizumi's policies on the merits, the results reflect the lack of a viable opposition, as well as the citizenry's willingness to indulge bold schemes -- the details of which few really grasp, and which are so far in the future that they seem painless ways to endorse the idea of reform. Ironically, it is Japan's domestic stability that allows Mr. Koizumi to dramatize politics without appearing to be reckless.

Despite what many observers claim, the election was always more about personality than policy. Leading up to the votes on postal reform, Mr. Koizumi cunningly portrayed himself as David versus the Goliath of old machine-style LDP politics. His oft-repeated claim that he would "destroy" the party if it didn't pass his reform package grabbed the attention of an electorate starved for dramatic, meaningful politics.

And theatrical it was. The lower house, in a vote covered live on TV, passed the postal reform measure by a mere three votes, making the upper house vote crucial, since it was clear Mr. Koizumi did not have the votes in the lower house necessary to override the senior chamber. He lost the (again, televised) vote in that chamber decisively, thanks to the resistance of 20 LDP holdouts. He immediately dissolved the lower house, called a snap election and sacked a minister who refused to sign the dissolution decree.

Like many successful politicians, Mr. Koizumi is blessed with weak opponents. The LDP rebels symbolized the worst of the old system, coming off as backroom dealers beholden to special interests and championing the status quo. As for the opposition, Katsuya Okada, the head of the Democratic Party of Japan (DPJ), seemed unable to convince even himself that his party would triumph. He subsequently resigned to take responsibility for the debacle on Sunday. By contrast, Mr. Koizumi played the charismatic leader, a part he's perfected over the last four years. The battle was over before it was joined.

Mr. Koizumi's masterstroke was to make the election a referendum on the future of the LDP. This not only highlighted his progressive leadership against the forces of stagnation, it sucked the oxygen out of the DPJ's campaign. No one was listening to a party that seemed sidelined by the main event. Despite recent electoral successes, this election showed that the DPJ never established legitimacy as a true opposition party, especially since its founders had all come from the LDP. The DPJ dropped to 113 seats from 175, and was crushed by the LDP in the urban areas where it supposedly drew its strength: The LDP took 23 seats in Tokyo's wards, compared to just one for the DPJ.

A closer look at the returns, however, reveals a more mixed result. Mr. Koizumi's success may have been "national," in the sense of setting an agenda for reform, but it was not overwhelmingly local. Two of the leaders of the rebel campaign, Shizuka Kamei and Seiko Noda, survived LDP challenges and were re-elected. Overall, pro-Koizumi forces failed to capture 15 of the 33 seats of postal-reform opponents who were targeted by the prime minister. Only 14 of Mr. Koizumi's "assassins," his handpicked candidates to challenge the rebels, won in head-to-head contests. While 12 LDP assassins did well enough in their districts to win seats via proportional representation (as did two rebels), the point is that local electorates did not decisively reject the forces of stagnation.

This was a victory for Mr. Koizumi the man, not for his reform plan. Indeed, one would be hard-pressed to find an ordinary voter who knows the plan's specifics. But everyone knows Mr. Koizumi is committed to his course. By luck or design, his plans are so grand that they seem far removed from daily life. What voters can safely express, therefore, is their approbation of his intentions, without having to worry about the actual results of his policies. That in itself may be the key to this election.

The urgency of immediate reform in Japan has diminished now that the economy is moving forward. Moreover, Mr. Koizumi's reform plan doesn't threaten to inflict any pain on citizens. Postal reorganization, for example, won't be completed until 2017. There is widespread skepticism that it will ever fully be carried out, and even if it is, consumers are assured that none of the changes will affect either their savings or their postal services.

Mr. Koizumi's real luck lies in having an electorate that not only wants to be entertained, but which also wants to feel that it is moving beyond the meandering of the past decade. In a nation averse to uncertainty and sudden change, however, this is a feeling that can prosper only in a relatively benign domestic and international environment. Here, Mr. Koizumi's close relationship with President Bush stands him in good stead, defusing concerns over lingering problems with China and North Korea.

Likewise, the generally good economic indicators and the visual evidence provided by bustling city centers make the gamble of distant administrative reform seem palatable. Take away such conditions and it is questionable whether the traditionally conservative Japanese electorate would be willing to put up with Mr. Koizumi's quixotic trajectory. For his political opponents, then, there is always hope -- but their victory would come at a high price for Japan.

Japan Bets On Reform (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004545

Fortune favors the bold, and on Sunday it smiled broadly on Junichiro Koizumi. Japan's Prime Minister won a stunning victory in snap elections because he stood on principle and called the vote after a reform dear to him, post office privatization, was blocked by the upper house of Parliament. The electorate rewarded him for trusting them.

Mr. Koizumi's governing coalition now holds more than the two-thirds majority it needs to override further upper house intransigence. The unexpectedly large victory means that Japan's voters have endorsed Mr. Koizumi's policy mix of smaller government and an activist foreign policy. The economic paternalism and diplomatic timidity of the post-World War II era are giving way to change. The Bush Administration can also be pleased by this victory for another one of its Iraq War allies. The opposition's promise to have the troops home by Christmas carried little weight with voters.

Mr. Koizumi says he wants Japan to become a "normal country," economically, militarily, culturally and in foreign policy. For decades, academics and diplomats have lauded the "Japanese Way" of minimal political debate and even more miniature returns on bank deposits, a combination that gave politicians money to throw at "champion" industries and companies.

This policy of politically directed credit was sustainable for a time, as Japan rebuilt from World War II, and in the 1980s and early 1990s some Americans actually wanted the U.S. to adopt this "industrial policy." But the system finally imploded with the real estate and stock market crashes of the 1990s, and Japan entered its long decade of stagnation. Mr. Koizumi is the first leader to propose a way back to more dynamic growth.

There's no better place for the re-elected Prime Minister to start than where he left off, by taking up again the privatization of the unwieldy post office. This government institution has 24,700 offices, 400,000 employees and $3 trillion in assets. Apart from delivering mail, the post office is the world's largest bank, its $1.9 trillion in deposits easily surpassing Citigroup's $1.5 trillion. Its insurance arm, Japan's largest insurer, contributes its assets to those owned by the bank to make up the $3 trillion in total assets.

Passing the post office work force to the private sector alone will provide savings to the government and help clean up politics by removing this source of patronage and corruption. There's also a huge benefit to be reaped from the better allocation of $3 trillion in investment throughout the economy.

The size of Sunday's victory may even persuade the government to strengthen the post office bills, which had been watered down in the unsuccessful effort to win passage before Mr. Koizumi called the election. Under the current bill, privatization won't be completed until 2017, and we hope Mr. Koizumi will use his mandate to accelerate reforms. Next on the agenda are the pension and medical systems, both important in a society where 20% of the population will soon be over the age of 60, and the civil service. Financial-sector reforms have already led to a major expansion of residential lending by private banks.

In foreign policy, Mr. Koizumi will most likely press ahead with his plan to revise Article 9 of the Constitution, which by barring use of force abroad has hamstrung foreign policy for decades. He is expected to pass a law that will give blanket approval to international intervention, rather than having to pass separate laws for each event.

China is not expected to savor Mr. Koizumi's victory or his more assertive foreign policy. Beijing has preferred the compliant, apologetic Tokyo that played political dwarf on the international stage and threw millions of yen in aid to countries that suffered from Japanese atrocities in World War II. Two days before the vote, China sent five warships to an area disputed by Tokyo and Beijing. If that move was an attempt to influence the election, Beijing has once again misjudged how a democracy responds to intimidation.

Japan, the economic giant of the 1980s, has been talking about reform for years, and its electorate has now sent a message to the politicians to make up for lost time. For the first time in 15 years, the ruling party has an overwhelming majority. Let's hope they use it to return Japan as one of the engines of global prosperity.

Japan's New Politics (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

As a political spectacle, Sunday's Japanese election would have been remarkable anywhere, but it was especially striking in a country where politics tends to be as thrilling as plain rice. After losing a key vote on economic reform a month ago, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who is known in Japan as "Lion Heart," called a snap election, took the unprecedented step of booting 37 anti-reform lawmakers out of his Liberal Democratic Party, and appealed directly to the people. Having gone into the election with just 212 seats out of 480 in the lower house of parliament, the Liberal Democrats emerged with 296. A country whose government has traditionally been controlled by faceless faction bosses seemed suddenly democratic, even populist. Mr. Koizumi swept the election thanks to his film-star looks, his skill in fielding a team of candidates that included many telegenic women and the sheer gutsiness of his political gamble.

Yet it's not clear how much Japan's long-term project of fostering competitive, pluralistic politics will benefit. On the plus side, Mr. Koizumi has demonstrated that electoral appeal can trump the vested interests represented by his party's factions; it would be nice to believe that this boosts the political value of ideas and policies, though the main boost is clearly to the political value of image. On the negative side, Mr. Koizumi is to retire in a year, and the factions may reassert themselves. Moreover, Sunday's election delivered a huge blow to the opposition Democratic Party, which had gradually been emerging as a plausible rival to the Liberal Democrats. There's a risk that Japan will now revert to de facto one-party politics.

The prospects for economic reform are similarly uncertain. Mr. Koizumi is almost certain to jam through postal-savings reform, the blocking of which was the trigger for Sunday's election. The postal system is the world's largest financial institution and a pillar of Japan's postwar economic order; its 24,700 branches have vacuumed up a quarter of the nation's household savings, much of which have traditionally been channeled into pork-barrel projects that get Liberal Democratic stalwarts elected. Abolishing this wasteful system would be a big step forward, and it's not surprising that Japan's stock market liked Mr. Koizumi's victory. But the prime minister's proposed reform would change the postal system only gradually. Whether he will tackle other economic challenges, including Japan's health and pension systems, is anybody's guess.

Finally, it's possible that Sunday's election heralds greater Japanese military assertiveness, which the United States should view with mixed feelings. Mr. Koizumi has already reinterpreted Japan's pacifist constitution to allow for the deployment of non-lethal troops in Iraq. He has effectively scrapped the long-standing ban on arms exports by taking part in the Bush administration's effort to develop missile defense and has taken a tough stance against China's military buildup. By themselves, these policies would be welcome; given the size of its economy, Japan should make a larger contribution to global and regional security. But Mr. Koizumi has simultaneously refused to back away from the symbols of Japan's aggression in the 1930s and 1940s -- a refusal that renders Japan's new assertiveness troubling in the eyes of its neighbors, especially China. It's one thing for Mr. Koizumi to gamble flamboyantly in politics. It's another to gamble with the uneasy balance in one of the world's tensest regions.

One Good Thing About Japan's Election (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Japanese voters rarely grant their political leaders personal triumphs as resounding as the one they handed to Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi on Sunday. In a country long used to colorless politicians and fragile parliamentary majorities, Mr. Koizumi waged a dramatic campaign focused on privatization of a national postal service that doubles as the world's largest bank and the ruling party's principal slush fund for patronage and pork. As a result, his Liberal Democratic Party and its coalition allies will hold a whopping two-thirds majority in the new parliament.

Unfortunately, the privatization of the banking side of Japan Post is not scheduled until 2017, more than a decade after Mr. Koizumi's scheduled departure from office. And Japan's reform-minded Democratic Party, which might have helped keep the pressure on, emerges from this election with its hope of being a strong opposition party apparently crushed. Mr. Koizumi is a committed reformer, but he will have to wage war against major elements of his party, which remains Japan's principal bastion of status quo politics and resistance to competition.

Postal privatization was virtually the only issue discussed during the 12-day election campaign. That gave a pass to Mr. Koizumi's unwise embrace of Japan's traditions of military nationalism. His visits to shrines where militarists were honored and his backing for more assertive military policies have understandably alarmed public opinion in Asia. Nationalist demagogues in places like China used them to whip up violent anti-Japanese sentiment.

Japan needs postal service privatization, two-party democracy and a more constructive relationship with its neighbors and trading partners. Only the first was advanced by Sunday's election.

US And Georgia Sign $295 Million Aid Compact (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004547

The United States and Georgia signed an aid agreement on Monday worth $295.3 million via a U.S. development fund dedicated to poor nations that undertake political and economic reforms.

The five-year grant, or "compact," comes from the Millennium Challenge Corporation and will cover road, energy and infrastructure projects in Georgia.

The money is targeted at helping Georgia's rural poor and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said it indicated America's long-term commitment to Georgia, where half a million people could directly benefit from the grant.

"Our partnership will only grow stronger as Georgia continues to establish the rule of law, a vibrant civil society, an independent media, a free economy and effective institutions of government," said Rice at the signing ceremony at a ritzy New York hotel.

Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili thanked the United States for its help and said his administration was far more accountable than previous "authoritarian, corrupt regimes."

"This compact is a partnership between our two peoples who share the same values and have the same dreams for their children and ... believe in the supreme value of liberty," said Saakashvili at the signing ceremony.

Georgia's compact is similar to others given by the Millennium Challenge Corporation to Madagascar, Cape Verde, Honduras and Nicaragua.

The corporation is an initiative of the Bush administration and has been criticized by U.S. lawmakers for the slow pace at which it has disbursed funds so far to poor countries. Congress has appropriated about $2.5 billion for the Millennium Challenge Account over the last two years.

U.S. President George W. Bush planned to seek $5 billion in fiscal 2006, which begins on October 1, but cut this to $3 billion because of congressional resistance to providing more money to a program that had spent so little of its existing funds.

Bush Unpopular In South America, Poll Shows (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

A majority of South Americans in four of the region's capitals have a negative opinion of U.S. President George W. Bush, according to an opinion survey released on Monday.

Fifty-three percent of South Americans described their perception of the U.S. leader as "bad" or "very bad," according to a poll conducted by the Santiago-based think-tank Facultad Latinoamericana de Ciencias Sociales.

Many of the 2,362 people polled disagree with the Bush administration's "war on terror" and feel the U.S. government is out of touch with the region's woes like corruption, poverty and drug trafficking, said David Alvarez, a political scientist who organized the survey.

"Latin Americans feel that (terror) issues are not the biggest problems facing our region," Alvarez said. "There is a big difference in the terrorist vision and the social problems many feel are plaguing Latin America."

Bush, who speaks some Spanish, promised to put Latin America at the top of his agenda when he was first elected. But the war on terror after the September 11, 2001 attacks put America's so-called "backyard" on the White House's backburner.

The survey - conducted in the capital cities of Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay - showed that Buenos Aires ranked as the city where Bush is most unpopular, with six out of ten Argentines saying they disapproved of him.

Residents in the Chilean capital of Santiago had the most favorable opinion of Bush, the poll showed -- 19 percent approved of Bush and 40 percent rejected him.

Chile is considered the region's model economy and has had a free trade agreement with the United States since early last year.

Argentina, on the other hand, suffered its worst economic crisis on record in 2001-2002 and many Argentines feel the United States pulled the plug on a badly-needed financial aid package from the International Monetary Fund in their worst moments.

The poll had a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

Chavez Land Seizures Slammed (WT)

By Sharon Behn

DOJ_NMG_0004548

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

SAN CARLOS, Venezuela -- State governors and the rural poor are moving quickly to implement President Hugo Chavez's vision of a social revolution, carving up and redistributing large landholdings and threatening to take over the premises of internationally owned companies.

There has been none of the violence and mayhem that accompanied land seizures in Zimbabwe in recent years, but economists and angry land owners fear that -- as in Zimbabwe -- the takeovers will destroy a productive agriculture sector and undermine the economy.

In the cowboy country state of Cojedes, however, triumphant farmworkers are hailing Mr. Chavez as a hero for pushing through legislation in 2002 that has enabled them to take over pieces of the region's sprawling family-owned ranches.

"He is the man of the poor, the only one who has fought for the poor," said Carlos Julia Roja, 48, his sunburned face peering from his pickup truck across an expanse of privately owned fields. "How many peasants would be able to eat off this land?" he asked.

Mr. Roja is one of the hundreds of rural poor who have been awarded 15-hectare (37-acre) lots from the El Charcote cattle ranch -- a British-owned, 32,000-acre tract that was recently expropriated by the government.

"I am preparing to plant sorghum, then I will sell it as cattle feed, pay off my costs, then reinvest the rest," he said.

Others like him are building rickety, wood-slat, one-room homes on their 37 acres and quickly planting food staples such as cassava and bananas while they wait for government credits to buy seeds.

At least two large landholdings have been taken over in the Cojedes, and government authorities, backed by armed and uniformed military, on Friday were moving in on four other ranches in the Barinas and Apure states. Another 317 ranches are being studied for takeover by the government National Land Institute (INTI), says the national daily El Universal.

Foreign Minister Ali Rodriguez Araque told The Washington Times that all resources would be used to help the poor of Venezuela, who make up about 80 percent of the population and are the base of Mr. Chavez's political support.

"For us, democracy is not linked [just] to political rights, it is also linked to all economic, social and cultural rights. Political rights without the guarantee of these other rights is a denial of the whole system of rights," he said.

But ranchers who have worked their land here for decades, raising and breeding cattle, and even attracting eco-tourists to their wildlife-filled hills and plains, say the claim to their land is simply government expropriation.

"On the surface it seems very legal, but there has not been a court pronouncement on this," said Jaime Branger, whose extended family owns one of the largest cattle ranches in the country -- the 185,330-acre Hato Pinero ranch and nature conservation zone.

Rancher feels exploited

"Nobody is going to go against the concept of social justice, nobody is going against feeding the people, but you have to do it properly; you cannot just tread on people," said Mr. Branger, a tall man with deep worry lines who is fighting to keep his land.

"You can't just grab people by the hair and say 'get out.' What about my social justice? Am I not people?" asked Mr. Branger, whose family obtained Hato Pinero in 1862.

Hato Pinero is one of the better-cared-for ranches in the state. There are acres of carefully planted pasture and about 9,000 sleek cattle, including a breed developed on the ranch called Pinero Red. Thousands of acres have been set aside as a nature conservation area filled with jaguar, puma, hundreds of bird species and a variety of orchids. Paying tourists stay in a Spanish-style adobe guesthouse built to cater to nature safaris.

With shouts of "Harh, harh," Luis Calderon, one of the ranch's young cowboys, or "llaneros," gallops across the fields, guiding a group of horses into a corral before slowing down to talk in the shade of some trees.

"If they take away the ranch, everything we have worked for during the past 60 years will disappear in six months," said the 24-year-old cowboy, who was born on the ranch. His is one of 120 families who have lived and worked on the ranch most of their lives.

His dirty white hat shading his dark eyes, Mr. Calderon -- who is in charge of calving cows -- described what the campesinos did when they took over one of Mr. Branger's seed and cattle farms down the road.

DOJ_NMG_0004549

"They sold all the wild horses and ate all the cattle," he said. "For every one person who would really grow stuff, there are 100 who just won't. There are some people who just hear that the land is good, there is plenty of water, and they want to take a piece."

Poor not given deed

The land expropriations, which began early this year and quickly are gathering pace, came after a new law giving the government the right to take over properties where the ownership documents are deemed unsatisfactory. The poor are given the use of the land -- but not ownership titles, which remain in the hands on the government.

The law also imposes new taxes on any land found to be idle or underproductive. Mr. Branger, who studied at the London School for Economics, said the criteria for either condition are not clear and are being abused by governors seeking to curry favor with the president.

The government is studying the takeover of 1,149 factories -- roughly 10 percent of the private manufacturing sector, according to El Universal -- which are either closed or partially functioning, all part of Mr. Chavez's push to get greater control over the country's economy and boost production.

Economic analyst Alejandro Grisanti Capriles explained that plants were standing idle or underproducing because of a sharp drop in investment due to the uncertain political environment, and because industries have tried to consolidate production in order to stay economically viable.

Government expropriations, coupled with a weak judicial system to counter them, "will have an adverse effect on the whole economy. The threat to private property is driving down investment in all the sectors," said Mr. Grisanti, of EcoAnalitica.

No 'social justice'

But Jose Pimentel, a burly, bearded man who leads the campesino (peasant) movement in Cojedes, said the poor had waited too long for a chance to work their own land.

"I am the son of a campesino, and I have seen that all the previous governments did not have any social justice in the rural areas," he said, riding in the cab of a rattle-bone pickup truck filled with workers.

Mr. Pimentel, who is charged with doling out the confiscated land parcels in his territory, is greeted everywhere by men in beat-up cowboy hats and worn clothes, all seeking pieces of land.

He argued that the huge land holdings do not legally belong to the families that work them, but were taken illegally in the 1930s -- in one case as far back as the 19th century. The land, he says, belongs to the nation, and thus to the people.

"There is a lot of poverty, and we have to fight poverty. We need to help all the people, so all can eat, buy clothes. We want to set up [cooperative] tractor factories, sausage factories, meat processing plants," he said. "This agriculture will generate industry."

Help all the people

Ideology and corporate concerns do not enter the conversation of the campesinos sitting on overturned buckets shucking fresh corn to be ground in a hand-cranked mill and made into corn pancakes called "cachapas."

For these families, ignored for generations by previous governments and pushed to the edge of survival, Mr. Chavez's revolutionary plans appear as their ticket to a new life. They reject the idea that they are squatters or that they have invaded someone else's land.

"We are Venezuelans; we have the right to the soil. This is our earth, so we are not invaders," said Lisa Gramos, 55, before cooking the pancakes on a hot griddle in the one-room hut that serves as kitchen and bedroom for four adults and a number of small children.

Much of the rancor comes from Venezuela's history of the wealthy few owning most of the land, and the failure of successive governments to bring the poor into national development.

It is a situation that Mr. Branger, speaking over a long dinner in Caracas, recognizes.

"We deserved it. We became a very complacent society, and we forgot our social responsibility, and we forgot the communities. We were not giving back to the communities. We deserved a bit of what is going on -- but unfortunately, we got a lot," he said.

Objections Emerge To G-8 Debt Relief Plan (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Full debt relief for the world's poorest countries was finally in the bag. Or so it seemed two months ago when leaders from the Group of Eight major industrial powers, at their summit in Scotland, approved a plan to cancel the debts that 18 nations, mostly in Africa, owe to international lenders such as the World Bank.

But objections to the plan are emerging as it heads toward an official vote at the annual meetings of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund later this month. Most notable is an internal World Bank report that warns the plan could deplete the bank's coffers so severely as to impair its ability to provide new aid for impoverished nations.

The report, obtained by The Washington Post, uses bureaucratic language to convey a dire message about the problems that the G-8's plan could pose for the International Development Association (IDA), the World Bank agency that lends about $9 billion a year to low-income countries. By potentially forgiving as much as $42.5 billion in payments owed by many poor countries over the next several decades, the plan "could reduce IDA's financial capacity significantly," says the report, which was discussed at a meeting of the bank's executive board last week.

Critics of the plan, which include the governments of Scandinavian countries and the Netherlands, are demanding substantial changes in the plan to guarantee that the World Bank is made whole for its losses. That, in turn, is arousing angry warnings from the Bush administration that the whole initiative could come unstuck.

"The deal to provide 100 percent debt cancellation is in jeopardy," said Tony Fratto, the Treasury Department's chief spokesman, who said he was "outraged" at the World Bank report. "There are individuals trying to chip away at it and see that it doesn't happen."

Debt cancellation was one of the key goals of the movement that mobilized behind the "Live Eight" concerts in early July aimed at prodding President Bush and other G-8 leaders to spare no expense in assisting the developing world. The movement had a powerful ally in the British government, which agreed that debt loads were keeping nations such as Tanzania, Uganda and Bolivia mired in poverty even after previous rounds of partial forgiveness. Many activists were pleasantly surprised when the Bush administration embraced that logic as well.

But the debt-relief bandwagon got hung up on the issue of who would bear the cost. The bulk of the loans in question were no-interest, 40-year loans granted by IDA, which gets its money mainly from two sources -- repayments of prior loans and periodic infusions of cash from rich donor nations. Failing to provide IDA with additional donations to replace the revenue lost to debt relief would risk diminishing the World Bank's role on the global stage -- and that, some policymakers and experts suspected, was the Bush team's true aim.

The G-8 summit communique issued in Scotland reflects a compromise on the issue that, according to the World Bank's internal report, does not go far enough in protecting IDA. Although the communique contains firm commitments to cover the $1 billion that IDA would lose over the next three years, the report projects that losses would total $8.9 billion in the first decade, $17.6 billion in the second decade, $14.1 billion in the third decade, and $1.8 billion in the last decade if all 38 countries potentially eligible received full cancellation of their debts. (Only 18 countries so far have met the criteria for full relief, though more are expected to do so.)

The report acknowledges the G-8's pledge that for the period after the first three years, "donors will commit to cover the full costs for the duration of the cancelled loans" by making additional contributions to IDA. But the pledge has no binding force, and there is no "benchmark" for gauging how much donors would have given before the supplemental contributions, notes the report, which proposes several options to more firmly ensure IDA's future financing.

The Treasury's Fratto blasted as "absurd" the fear that Washington would fail to honor its pledge to provide additional contributions to IDA, and he ridiculed the report's assumption that debt repayments by poor countries are a reliable source of income.

"The World Bank's analysis seems to give greater credence to the ability of a Niger to pay back its unsustainable debt than it does for the G-8 countries to meet their commitments," Fratto said.

DOJ_NMG_0004551

Another objection to the G-8 plan voiced by policymakers in recent days, according to IMF officials, is that it may violate a long-standing IMF rule assuring "uniformity of treatment" to all member countries. The plan would fully cancel the debts to the IMF of only nations that qualify as "heavily indebted poor countries," while leaving untouched the obligations of nations such as Kenya and Indonesia that are not heavily indebted enough to be included.

This issue reflects the criticism expressed by some activists during the G-8 summit that the debt-relief plan ought to benefit a wider range of countries.

Activists who backed the G-8 plan said that although they sympathize with the complaints, the plan ought to be approved anyway.

"Our counsel is, don't let the best be the enemy of the good," said Seth Amgott, a spokesman for DATA, the organization founded by the rock star Bono. "Let's get this thing done."

Divisions Remain On U.N. Reform Ahead Of Summit (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

UNITED NATION (AP)-- With just days before leaders of more than 170 countries gather at a U.N. summit, there has been little progress on a document they are to adopt.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan wants heads of state and government to mark the 60th anniversary of the United Nations by adopting a sweeping blueprint to tackle the challenges of the 21st century at the Sept. 14-16 summit in New York.

But despite intense negotiations over the weekend, some U.N. ambassadors expressed concern the text would be weak and said negotiations were slow and difficult.

U.N. General Assembly President Jean Ping, who has been overseeing the document's preparation, told ambassadors Sunday he wanted to see agreement on a document by Monday which is the last day of the 59th General Assembly.

Key issues expected to be addressed in the document include reform of the U.N. Security Council, a Human Rights Council to replace the discredited Human Rights Commission, a new Peacebuilding Commission to help nations emerging from conflict, and new responsibilities for governments to protect civilians from genocide and war crimes.

Chile's U.N. Ambassador Heraldo Munoz told reporters that there had been progress on some issues, but that "I think we're still far from agreement on several others."

He said the most contentious issues in the discussions were disarmament and non-proliferation, the Council of Human Rights and terrorism.

"My fear is that we may end up with something a lot less that what the U.N. deserves and that is the danger that I foresee. I have no doubt that we'll have a document, but whether it is up to the challenge that we have ahead and the changes that are needed, that I have some doubt," he said.

France's U.N. ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere said the summit document negotiations were a "unique opportunity" and that it was in everybody's interests to modernize and reform the United Nations.

"We think this text should be ambitious on development, ambitious on terrorism, ambitious on the human rights, ambitious on peace-building, ambitious on responsibility to protect ... and we are negotiating day and night," he said.

U.N. Members Undercut Annan's Quest For Reform (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 12 -- In March, Secretary General Kofi Annan proposed the most far-reaching changes for the organization since its founding 60 years ago: reorganizing to combat terrorism and poverty, expanding the Security Council beyond the victors of World War II and setting new rules for the preemptive use of military force.

But six months of contentious negotiations by governments have stripped out many of the boldest initiatives, including proposals for creating 10 new Security Council seats. And delegates this week are straining to reach agreement on a far less ambitious package of steps that can be agreed on by some 170 leaders set to arrive in New York on Wednesday for a summit on U.N. reform.

Some key goals -- including the quest for agreement to condemn terrorists who target civilians or to establish a human-rights council that bars membership to rights abusers -- will be put off for discussion by the 191-member General Assembly after the summit ends Friday.

"When you get together with 191 countries to agree on substantive issues, it's obvious that you're going to end up with the least common denominator," Mauritius's U.N. ambassador Jagdish Koonjul said, after quarreling with U.S. negotiators over a proposed provision that would urge world leaders to support the International Criminal Court. "They said they would rather die than allow any reference to the letters ICC."

Annan's manifesto -- outlined in a document titled "In Larger Freedom" -- was designed to pump new life into multilateralism after the U.S.-led invasion in Iraq had highlighted a rift in international relations. But his effort to push through his changes have been hamstrung by corruption scandals that have weakened his authority. U.N. member governments, meanwhile, have been reluctant to make painful tradeoffs to achieve a bold reorganization of the global body.

Some officials now say that the goals were too grand for an organization whose members remain deeply divided over the nature of the world's problems. "If things collapse it will be because the traffic was too heavy for the road to bear," warned Munir Akram, Pakistan's U.N. ambassador, who played a pivotal role in blocking the enlargement of the 15-nation Security Council because its regional rival, India, aspired to a permanent seat on it.

This week's summit, which will draw the largest number of world leaders under one roof, was initially intended to review progress on commitments governments made in 2000 to fight grinding poverty and the spread of HIV/AIDS, malaria and other diseases that disproportionately strike the poor.

The summit's focus shifted following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the invasion of Iraq. Abdallah Baali, Algeria's U.N. ambassador, said the summit was intended to strike a "grand bargain" between the world's poorest countries, who expected to get greater commitments of foreign aid, and the United States and other wealthy countries that wanted the United Nations to change its focus to address new security threats, primarily terrorism.

This meeting represents the first major test of U.S. diplomacy at the United Nations since President Bush bypassed the congressional confirmation process last month and installed John R. Bolton as U.S. ambassador through a 17-month recess appointment.

Since his arrival, Bolton has shaken up the negotiations on a document that can be agreed upon by leaders at the summit, introducing more than 750 amendments. The U.S. amendments called for eliminating new pledges of foreign aid to impoverished nations, scrapping provisions that call for action to halt climate change and deleting language urging nuclear powers to make greater progress in dismantling their nuclear arms.

Bolton has since struck a compromise that welcomes decisions by wealthy governments to increase foreign aid levels to 0.7 percent of their gross national products, but which does not say that governments must do so.

A small group of 15 key negotiators appointed by General Assembly President Jean Ping has also reached agreement in principle on provisions that would increase pressure on states to act to halt genocide, ethnic cleansing and other large-scale killings, and that would establish a peace-building commission to manage postwar recoveries. The negotiators have also agreed to condemn terrorism and set up a human rights council, although they would leave it to the General Assembly to later decide how to define terrorism and to work out the composition and mandate of the rights council.

But the negotiations remain deadlocked over several key issues, including provisions designed to hasten the pace of disarmament and halt the transfer of the world's deadliest weapons to terrorists. Negotiations are also stalled over measures aimed at ending trade subsidies by rich countries that hurt poor nations' ability to compete, and that would bring greater accountability and oversight to U.N. spending.

Bolton sought to dampen expectations that the agreement by world leaders would represent the kind of radical changes first envisioned by Annan. "This is a first step," he told reporters during a break in negotiations. He said the changes under negotiation "are important but I don't think even if they were adopted in full they would result in the kind of cultural revolution that we need in U.N. management and governance."

"Reform is not a one-night stand," he added. "Reform is forever."

DOJ_NMG_0004553

The Bush administration has come under fire from other nations for opposing provisions that it feels would inhibit its ability to defend U.S. interests. The United States has firmly opposed a proposal by Annan to urge the Security Council to adopt a resolution setting guidelines for the use of military force.

The United States also has blocked regulation of small arms and has worked to eliminate references in a summit document to the obligations of nuclear weapons states, under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

"What you see here is the U.S. carving out of this document any reference to the responsibility to the nuclear weapon states to eliminate their nuclear arsenals," said Daryl Kimball of the Arms Control Association. "And that is going to make it all the more difficult to strengthen an already beleaguered nuclear nonproliferation system because other states are less likely to foreclose their nuclear options if the United States and others continue to pursue theirs."

Human rights and development advocates, meanwhile, say that a number of other countries have quietly sought to undercut the negotiations. "Less than 48 hours from the beginning of the summit there remains real risk that major agreements will be blocked by a small number of countries that seem determined to block the summit's success," said Nicola Reindorp of Oxfam International. "These include Pakistan, Egypt, Iran, Syria, Venezuela and Cuba."

Helping The World's Poor (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

The so-called Millennium Development Goals for helping the planet's poorest will be among the topics of discussion at the U.N. summit that begins tomorrow in New York. In recent weeks, the Bush Administration has come under media fire for suggesting some sensible revisions, such as requiring more accountability from countries on the receiving end of international assistance (imagine that).

But according to an article by Amir Attaran in the October issue of PLoS Medicine, a public health journal, the MDG program has much more fundamental problems that the U.S. might take into account before succumbing to mounting pressure to increase aid.

The MDGs -- which target poverty, hunger, infectious disease and other problems in the developing world -- were drafted in 2000 to great fanfare. Yet five years on, writes Mr. Attaran, a professor at the University of Ottawa who specializes in population health and global development policy, "many of the most important MDGs, including those to reduce malaria, maternal mortality, or tuberculosis (TB), suffer from a worrying lack of scientifically valid data."

The article goes on to say that while progress on each of these goals is portrayed in measurable terms, "often the subject matter is so immeasurable, or the measurements are so inadequate, that one cannot know the baseline condition before the MDGs, or know if the desired trend of improvement is actually occurring."

Perhaps even more disturbing, however, is Mr. Attaran's revelation that U.N. scientists "know about these troubles" and that "the necessary corrective steps are being held up by political interference, including the organization's senior leadership, who have ordered delays to amendments that could repair the MDGs." Anticipating this week's summit, a September 2004 memo from U.N. Deputy Secretary General Louise Frechette actually instructed U.N. scientists in charge of MDG statistics to downplay the measurement problems until after the summit because "any changes at this stage would only distract from the result that we would like to achieve." That "result," of course, is more money from wealthy nations with no questions asked.

Other U.N. health outfits have demonstrated a similar inability to measure progress, or the lack thereof. The World Health Organization launched its Roll Back Malaria program in 1998 with the goal of halving the number of malaria deaths by 2010. Seven years into the effort, WHO is claiming it's "too early to tell" if they're on track to meet the goal.

Defenders of the U.N., such as Columbia University's Jeffrey Sachs, accuse the organization's critics of being stingy and irresponsible. But the U.S. government's real responsibility is to make sure tax dollars are put to wise use. U.S. development aid has increased 90% since President Bush took office, and as the world's largest donor it has every right to demand that the U.N. be held accountable for making promises that aren't objectively verifiable.

Health goals that can't be measured, said Mr. Attaran in a recent interview, should be abandoned in favor of alternative approaches. "Because serial guessing isn't helping poor people. If we set quantitative goals, then we ought to be concerned enough to actually quantitate."

DOJ_NMG_0004554

If the U.N. and its supporters are serious about the Millennium Development Goals, and U.S. support in pursuing them, they should stop equating criticism of U.N. methods with criticism of its motives. U.N. reform is a better use of their energies this week. And the establishment of an auditor general or some other independent body responsible for commissioning and publishing performance reviews is a good place to start.

The Good Fight (NYT)

By Vance Serchuk

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Washington

This week, the heads of state of more than 170 countries are meeting to consider wide-ranging reforms for the United Nations. But any mention of the expansion of the Security Council will be off the agenda, thanks in no small part to the diplomatic exertions of the Bush administration.

The White House's foreclosure of discussion on Security Council expansion has drawn cheers from conservatives worried about any dilution of American power, and scorn from liberals convinced that the Bush administration is once again unilaterally sabotaging the international system. In fact, both sides are wrong.

The American position, by prioritizing practicable goals like cleaning up the Human Rights Commission and strengthening peacekeeping capabilities, is actually good for the United Nations, which would suffer from a drawn-out fight over Security Council expansion. But while the Bush administration's stance helps United Nations reform, it does not serve America's interests. To understand why, it's necessary to recognize that the expansion debate is above all a geopolitical contest for power and influence.

Just consider the maneuvers this summer by four aspirants to the Security Council - Brazil, Germany, India and Japan - which have joined together in the so-called Group of Four and have been furiously trawling the developing world for support. Rivals of these countries, like China, Italy and Pakistan, have meanwhile been working to block them. The resulting game of chess has been almost entirely defined by realpolitik, with nations unabashedly trading favors and threats, and the council's effectiveness an afterthought at best.

Such cold-blooded competition should come as no surprise. A seat on the Security Council, after all, is a prized symbol of power and prestige, establishing a country as a regional leader. This has particular importance in Asia, where China is determined to preserve its regional monopoly on the Security Council, while Japan and India are equally determined to break it. Given the Bush administration's concerns about Beijing's rising power and Washington's avowed interest in deepening our relations with Tokyo and Delhi, it's clear which side of this debate we should be on.

Getting Japan, in particular, on the council should be a top priority for the United States, not just as a reward for past support on countless issues - from Iraq to North Korea - but also because of its central role in America's grand strategy for the region. Equally important is the development of a long-term alliance with India. Skeptics warn that New Delhi has often voted against the United States at the United Nations, but given that India has been under American sanctions for its nuclear aspirations until recently - and was aligned with the Soviet Union for decades before that - such past recalcitrance may prove a poor guide to future behavior.

Although the Bush administration rhetorically backs Japan's bid and has been supportive of India's as well, these two states alone will never muster sufficient support in the General Assembly. The best remaining option, then, is for the White House to grit its teeth and embrace the Group of Four.

It hasn't done so, partly because it fears a larger Security Council would be less effective. But the sad truth is, the council already isn't likely to help Washington on first-tier problems like Iran or North Korea. And while a bigger membership would make deliberations more unwieldy, we shouldn't worry too much about damaging an institution that is already broken.

In the end, American support may not ensure passage of the Group of 4 proposal. China will marshal votes against it and, failing that, threaten a veto. But that might not be so bad either. Instead of focusing on the Security Council as an abstract institution, Washington should treat it the same way its peers do: as a commons for bare-knuckle great-power diplomacy.

Pushing Beijing into a confrontation with Germany, Brazil, Japan and India would be the kind of ruthless realpolitik to make Metternich proud.

Meet The Fakers (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

The biggest gathering of leaders in history unfolds this week at the United Nations, as they preen and boast about how much they're helping the world's poor. In short, it may be the greatest assembly in history - of hypocrites.

The fact is that with just a few exceptions, the presidents and prime ministers coming to the U.N. summit are doing a disgraceful job in helping the poor. That's one reason the world's richest 500 individuals have the same income as the world's poorest 416 million people.

We Americans set a dreadful example as hosts to the summit. President Bush has been trying to wriggle away from his 2002 endorsement of the principle that rich countries should try to provide 70 cents in official development assistance for every $100 in national income. (Mr. Bush has sharply increased foreign aid from the Clinton years, but it still stood at only 16 cents in 2004 for each $100 of national income.)

The Bush administration also tried to change summit documents to downplay references to the millennium development goals of overcoming poverty. Fortunately, the Bush administration backed off and now grudgingly joins the international consensus against infant mortality.

It's common to hear abroad scathing criticisms of U.S. stinginess, much of it deserved. But Japan is also a cheapskate, giving only a hair more than the U.S., and Italy gives even less.

The new Human Development Report 2005, recently issued by the U.N. Development Program, is blessedly undiplomatic in its willingness to point figures - at just about everybody. It notes that the U.S. and other rich countries seem unwilling to provide a total of $7 billion annually for the next decade to provide 2.6 billion people with access to clean drinking water. That investment would save 4,000 lives a day, and the cost is less than Europeans spend on perfume - or than Americans spend on cosmetic surgery.

Meanwhile, the report adds, AIDS kills three million people a year and devastates countries like nothing since the Black Death in the 14th century. Yet annual world spending to fight AIDS amounts to three days of military expenditures.

This U.N. summit is meant to review the millennium development goals, such as cutting child deaths around the world by two-thirds by 2015. All the goals, adopted with great fanfare five years ago, are feasible, and some countries - from Bangladesh to Indonesia, Brazil to Mongolia - are on track to meet them. Hats off to them. But most of the world appears likely to miss the goals.

Two countries that should be the leaders of the developing world, China and India, are both off track and should be ashamed of their records. In India, among children 1 to 5, girls are 50 percent more likely to die than boys, meaning that each year 130,000 Indian girls are discriminated to death.

Bangladesh has now overtaken India in improving child mortality, and Vietnam has overtaken China. If India had matched Bangladesh's rate of reduction in child mortality over the last decade, according to the U.N.D.P., it would have saved 732,000 children's lives this year.

Likewise, China has largely ignored its poor interior, so it still loses 730,000 children each year. China has also taken diplomatic positions that hurt the world's most vulnerable populations, by supporting Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe and by implicitly endorsing Sudan's genocide just as it once endorsed Pol Pot's.

And African leaders? Perhaps this is naïve, but it strikes me as racist for them to have complained about brutal white rule in South Africa or Zimbabwe while excusing black rule that is even more brutal.

Readers often ask if I find it depressing to visit African slums or mud-brick villages. On the contrary, it's exhilarating to see how little it takes to make a difference. Ancient scourges like river blindness and leprosy are being controlled, and a clever initiative by Bill Gates and others to promote vaccinations (the Global Alliance for Vaccinations and Immunization) saved more than one million lives just between 2001 and 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0004556

That makes it maddening to see leaders posturing for the cameras at the U.N. while, as the U.N.D.P. report notes, "the promise to the world's poor is being broken." The report adds that the gap between the current trendline on child mortality and the one the leaders committed themselves to amounts to 41 million children dying before their fifth birthday over the next decade.

Rather than toasting themselves, these leaders should apologize for this continuing holocaust.

Necessary Measures (NYT)

By Amir Attaran

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Ottawa

Five years ago, about 150 world leaders gathered at the United Nations in New York and tried to move the mountain of global poverty. They adopted eight Millennium Development Goals - quantifiable measures of progress on problems like malaria, tuberculosis and child and maternal mortality. The achievement of those goals by 2015 would lift more than one billion people out of extreme poverty.

The trouble is that progress toward these benchmarks often cannot be measured. And if their achievement cannot be measured, the goals are not only a letdown for the world's poor, but also a time bomb for the credibility of the United Nations. As world leaders gather in New York again this week, the United Nations will have to grapple with the question of whether progress is on track to achieve the goals by the 2015 deadline. So far, this inability to measure progress has meant that the United Nations has either guessed or remained silent.

Consider the hazard of dying in pregnancy or childbirth, a fate that befalls more than 500,000 women annually, according to the World Health Organization. The Millennium Development Goal on maternal mortality is to "reduce by three-quarters, between 1990 and 2015, the maternal mortality ratio." Measuring that ratio requires an accurate count of both safe births and maternal fatalities.

But according to the United Nations Millennium Project, only a "handful of countries" can really prove the maternal mortality ratio is improving; poor, rural countries where obstetricians are scarce, home births are common and the dead are mourned privately simply do not have the data. That is why in 2000, their most recent assessment, scientists from the United Nations warned that "it would be inappropriate to compare the 2000 estimates with those for 1990," or to "draw conclusions about trends."

Malaria is another example where United Nations goals hinge on something immeasurable. In 2000, the organization's scientists warned that "it will not, in general, be possible to measure the overall incidence rate of malaria." Yet barely two months later, the United Nations placed bets on doing exactly that and persuaded the world's leaders to endorse a new Millennium Development Goal to start lowering the incidence of malaria by 2015.

Having ignored the advice of its own scientists and fashioned its goal unwisely, the United Nations today studiously avoids having an opinion on whether the malaria crisis - the disease is the No. 1 killer of children in sub-Saharan Africa - is getting better or worse. And yet, nobody who studies malaria doubts that it is getting worse.

Probably the most useful discussion the United Nations could plan for this week's meeting would be one that asked world leaders to endorse new goals against which they could truly measure progress. This is feasible: there are alternative ways to track malaria's toll or to assess the safety of pregnancies. For instance, dozens of demographic surveillance sites could be set up in the poorest countries to document births, deaths, illnesses and social services. This has already been done in countries like Tanzania and Ghana.

How disappointing it is that the United Nations leadership went to great lengths to ensure that no such discussion could happen this week. Last September, Louise Fréchette, the United Nations deputy secretary general, instructed the organization's scientists that she didn't want the summit meeting being "distracted by arguments over the measurement of the Millennium Development Goals," and ordered that they refrain from proposing any refinements to the goals. This is lamentable political censorship.

By putting that discussion off limits, and pretending the Millennium Development Goals are meaningful as they now stand, the United Nations has lost five years on a short timeline and sabotaged its own vital mission to help the world's most unfortunate and needy people.

Early Results Give Norway Opposition A Win (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

OSLO, Norway (AP) -- Norway was poised for a power shift after the left-leaning opposition won a majority of seats in Parliament with pledges to spend more of the nation's vast oil wealth on welfare, official election results showed early Tuesday.

With more than 96 percent of votes counted, a three-party coalition led by the Labor party had grabbed 88 seats in the 169-seat assembly, enough to oust the center-right government.

Prime Minister Kjell Magne Bondevik, who campaigned on promises of tax cuts, said if the final tally confirmed the result, his government would resign after presenting its draft 2006 budget on Oct. 14.

Labor leader Jens Stoltenberg, who campaigned on a pledge to spend more of the nation's oil money on welfare, said the opposition Red-Green alliance would start talks in the next few days on forming a coalition majority government.

"In this campaign we had two goals: a strong election for Labor and a chance to form a majority government. The one goal has been reached, the other is within reach," said Stoltenberg, a 46-year-old former prime minister.

Bondevik acknowledged his days as prime minister were likely over, saying: "I am disappointed by such a political defeat, but we had been prepared for the possibility."

Bondevik's government has presided over four years of unprecedented prosperity in the country of 4.6 million, and the nation's wealth has been boosted by a windfall from record high oil prices. But critics complained of cracks in the welfare state, including shortcomings in education, health and elderly care.

Stoltenberg said he thought Labor had made strong gains because "many agree with our main message: "That we can make Norway even better with the fantastic resources we have."

Bondevik, 58, a Christian Democrat and Lutheran minister who has led a three-party coalition government since 2001, had campaigned on promises of further reducing taxes while improving health care and education.

Debate also raged over how to use the oil income, with the far-right populist Party of Progress saying Norway should tap into the $192 billion fund where it invests surplus oil revenue. Offshore oil platforms have made Norway the world's third-largest oil exporter, after Saudi Arabia and Russia.

European Union membership, which Norwegian voters rejected in 1972 and 1994, has not been an issue.

Oslo voter Kari Murberg Martinsen, 42, said she supports the Red-Green alliance because "I am concerned about children and education, and think we owe the elderly decent treatment."

Bondevik said he believed his three-party coalition was hurt by attacks from Party of Progress leader Carl I. Hagen, who said he would not accept another government with Bondevik as prime minister.

Bondevik's minority government of Conservatives, Christian Democrats and Liberals took power four years ago with the support of Hagen's party, but refused it Cabinet posts or any other formal alliance, partly because of its anti-immigration stance.

The Party of Progress advanced in the election to become Norway's second largest party with 37 seats, according to the preliminary count. Labor gained 19 seats for a total of 62, the results showed.

After Shattering Civil War, Liberians See Hope At Polls (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Her dead husband's Bible, his driver's license and their faded wedding photos are in a dusty box in the closet of her College Park home -- not to forget, but to remember. Like so many Liberians, Caroline Barnard is handcuffed to a history of heartache, bloodshed and guilt.

Gunmen killed her husband, Emmanuel Cooper, in a suburb of Monrovia, the country's capital, 15 years ago. They left his corpse on the street. The couple had been married for less than three months. And she was pregnant.

After she fled the chaos on foot, Barnard made a promise.

"Whatever is left of him, I must bury him," she recalled. "I'm going to go back."

DOJ_NMG_0004558

Now, as the West African country prepares for a historic post-civil war election next month, a new hope is prevailing. After years of building wealth and sharing it with impoverished relatives back home, Barnard and other Liberians across the United States want to influence the outcome of the campaign.

Many of the Washington region's estimated 10,000 native Liberians view it as nothing less than their homeland's last chance for peace and stability.

"They feel very passionate, because they realize the future of their country depends on this election," said Bishop Darlingston G. Johnson of Bethel World Outreach Church in Silver Spring, where a third of the 3,000 congregants are from Liberia.

Liberia was founded in 1847 by freed American slaves who named its capital after President James Monroe, and it was a reliable U.S. ally during the Cold War. But starting in the 1980s, a succession of despotic and corrupt leaders brought two decades of disorder. By the time international pressure forced warlord Charles Taylor into exile in Nigeria in 2003, Liberia's government and civil society were in shambles.

Taylor's exit spawned a peace deal and caretaker government, bolstered by 15,000 U.N. peacekeepers. The Oct. 11 election is the next step.

No provisions exist for absentee voting. A Liberian living abroad must go back to register and then return to cast a ballot. So most immigrants in the Washington area will not vote.

And yet, Liberia's main presidential candidates have held fundraisers and town hall-style events across the region. They've canvassed other parts of the United States as well and created slick campaign Web sites.

The reason is such statistics as this: $600 million wired into Liberia, much of it from the United States, between 2000 and 2003, according to the Aite Group, a Boston financial services research firm.

And this: 80 percent illiteracy in Liberia and poverty rates just as high, the United Nations estimates.

So candidates are appealing to Liberian immigrants to contribute to their campaigns and persuade relatives back home to vote for them. It's the latest example of how elections in developing countries have become transnational affairs, as technology connects immigrant to homeland as never before.

"If you supported Liberians during the war, you will have influence, you can make an impact," said Gayah Fahnbulleh, an adviser to candidate Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, a former World Bank official.

The 22-candidate field includes Liberian soccer legend George Weah and Charles W. Brumskine, a lawyer who lives in Northern Virginia.

"This is the time to start a revolution," said Barnard, a mother of three.

The accountant and gospel singer paused, then added softly, "A peaceful revolution."

One that will allow her to keep a 15-year-old promise.'Bullets Were Flying'

Barnard met Cooper at a school in Paynesville, a suburb of Monrovia. She was 14. He was 16. They dated for two years, broke up and got back together 10 years later.

"We soon found out that having each other forever was our greatest desire," Barnard later wrote in her journal.

A year later, on Christmas Eve 1989, Taylor invaded Liberia from neighboring Ivory Coast. The country soon collapsed into civil war. But Barnard and Cooper carried on with their lives as best they could. She worked for Price Waterhouse. He was a small trader. They married April 7, 1990, in a lavish ceremony at a white church with a gospel choir.

On July 2, heavy fighting broke out in Paynesville, where they lived. Cooper was riding in a car with a soldier, probably for protection, as many Liberians did then. They were ambushed by Taylor's rebels on Duport Road.

Barnard never saw his body, but someone told her a few girls had covered him with sand near the road. She tried to retrieve his body.

"As I walked, there was shooting up the road," Barnard recalled. "Bullets were flying. I couldn't reach that particular spot."

A few days later, someone found his wallet and driver's license.

"I don't know why death had to part us so early," Barnard wrote. "We had so many things to achieve."

Pregnant and widowed, Barnard fled. She filled two shopping bags and walked through the jungle until she crossed into the Ivory Coast, joining a vast exodus of refugees.

DOJ_NMG_0004559

"I wonder what the future has for me and our unborn child," Barnard wrote.

The future is what drives Eunice Barnaby of Germantown to phone the relatives who receive $6,000 a year from her and urge them to vote for Sirleaf. After watching Liberia crumble under male leaders, she wants a woman in power.

"There's nothing more I want than to go back to Liberia," said Barnaby, 46, whose brothers and sister were killed by rebels.

It's what drives Bishop Johnson to encourage Liberian immigrants like himself to fast and pray for 21 days so "God Himself will guide the elections."

It's what drives Joseph Juwle to take time off from his job as a hotel supervisor in the District and head to Liberia this month, even though he hasn't registered to vote. He will work for presidential candidate Winston Tubman.

"I'm going there to encourage Liberians to vote for the right person," said Juwle, 47, a father of five who lives in Lanham.One Way to Monrovia

And the future is what drives Barnard.

In Ivory Coast, she gave birth to her daughter, Korpo, remarried and came to Prince George's County in 1996. During the day, she works for the University of Maryland in College Park as a fiscal coordinator. At night, she composes and sings gospel songs about Jesus and her homeland to hip-shaking African rhythms.

Liberia's peace process and the election inspired her last year to write "One Way Ticket to Monrovia."

It has become an anthem for immigrants yearning to go home, played at gatherings and on Liberian community radio. In June, at a fundraiser for Brumskine, dozens of Liberians swayed to every word.

I thank my Lord the God of Peace.

O He really answer prayers.

Thank God the United Nations and Papa Kofi Annan. . . .

Thank God for President Bush, the Peace is here forever

I say one way, one way ticket to Monrovia

I'm never coming back.

At the end of the song, she asks that when she lands in Liberia, she be taken to the "Duport Grave."

Despite the optimism, most Liberians here are realists. Their country, they well know, has endured many upheavals.

"Politics is so tricky," Barnard said. "We only hope and pray we'll get divine inspiration to choose the right person."

If the right person is chosen, she knows she'll be one step closer to Cooper's grave. If she can't find it, she will go to the spot where he died, pick up some of the soil and bury it in his hometown of Kle in Bomi County, about 30 miles from Monrovia. She'll hold a simple memorial service, perhaps build a school in his name.

She know she's fortunate. Most Liberians can't do this much.

"There are a lot of people who don't even know where their relatives are, whether they are dead or just missing," Barnard said. "This war has left a lot of unfinished business for so many people."

Last week, in her comfortable living room peppered with African artifacts, she sifted through the shards of her broken past. A buttery late afternoon light floated through the lace curtains. Her husband, Johnny, sat with her as Korpo, now 15, floated in and out of the room.

The wallet. The driver's license. The Bible. Wedding photos and a video. Her blue journal with the elegant handwriting.

Then, she spotted two black-and-white passport photos. She was young and smiling, as if the future were limitless.

"Those were the days," she sighed.

Then, she smiled as wide as she could.

A Healthier Amazon Jungle (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Last month, Brazil's environmental officials announced that the burning of the Amazon has slowed. Deforestation this year is half of what it was the year before. This news shows that when Brazil's government musters the political will to protect the Amazon, it can do it.

DOJ_NMG_0004560

Large swaths of the jungle are still disappearing, mainly set on fire by soybean farmers and ranchers looking for land to raise cattle. Last year was the worst for Amazon deforestation in a decade.

The health of the Amazon is a global concern because the forest soaks up greenhouse gases, which lessens global warming. Deforestation means the Amazon could eventually become too small to produce the rain that it needs to survive.

Deforestation is also deadly for millions of Amazon peasants trying to eke out a living growing small plots or collecting forest products. Land grabbers snatch up valuable property near planned paved roads, burning the villages to drive the inhabitants away. Hundreds of leaders who have tried to speak up for peasants have been murdered, and virtually none of the killers ever face jail.

Unfortunately, part of the reason farmers and ranchers cleared less jungle this year is because the price of soybeans and beef have dropped, and Brazil's currency is stronger. So exports are less profitable.

But the government's commitment to protecting the Amazon has also been important. Led by Marina Silva, the environment minister and once a poor Amazon rubber tapper herself, Brazil is starting to impose its authority in parts of the forest that have always been lawless. In the state of Pará in February, gunmen killed Dorothy Stang, an American nun who had worked with the rural poor for 30 years. After the murder, the government sent 2,000 federal troops to the zone and announced a logging ban on millions of acres of Amazon land.

The government has also begun to enforce its laws. It is beginning to require real documentation of claims for land title. In June, police arrested dozens of members of an illegal clear-cutting ring. Finally, through new satellite imaging, Brazilian authorities can spot burning while it is happening and theoretically make arrests. Rule of law is still foreign to the Amazon . But it is becoming a little less so.

Briton Gets 47 Years In Missile-sale Case (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2005

A British businessman convicted of trying to smuggle shoulder-launched missiles into the USA was sentenced Monday in Newark, N.J., to 47 years in prison. The plot involved the sale of missiles to a group that Hemant Lakhani, 70, was told would use them to shoot down commercial planes. The weapons' buyer and seller actually were government agents. Lakhani, arrested in August 2003, was convicted in April of trying to provide material support to terrorists, unlawful brokering of foreign defense articles and attempting to import merchandise to the USA by means of false statements, plus two counts of money laundering.

Push for gay-marriage ban falters in Mass.

An effort among some Massachusetts legislators for a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage in the state is fading, according to an Associated Press poll. The survey, conducted last week, found at least 104 lawmakers who plan to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, which would ban gay marriage but create civil unions. The amendment, which is scheduled for a vote Wednesday, needs the support of at least 101 of the state's 200 lawmakers to get on the 2006 ballot. Last year, months after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that same-sex marriage was legal, the amendment passed 105-92. It must pass a second vote to get on the ballot.

Escaped chimps killed at zoo in Nebraska

Three chimpanzees from a small zoo in Royal, Neb., were shot and killed after they escaped their enclosure and couldn't be recaptured, zoo director Ken Schlueter said. The primates at Zoo Nebraska freed themselves Saturday when a padlock wasn't completely closed after the cage was cleaned, he said. Schlueter killed the animals with a deputy's service revolver after a tranquilizer gun didn't show any effect. No people were hurt, state patrol spokeswoman Deb Collins said.

After the chimps broke out, employees moved visitors into an office area, but the chimps tried to get into the building, Schlueter said. A fourth chimp also escaped but quickly returned to its cage.

Survivor says he never fired at hunter

A deer hunter testified that he never fired at a man accused of going on a rampage and fatally shooting six people in the woods of Wisconsin after a confrontation over trespassing. Terry Willers, one of two hunters wounded in the shootings Nov. 21, testified that he was the only one in his group who had a gun when they confronted Chai Soua Vang. “Who shot first?” Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager asked. “Mr. Vang,” said Willers, whose daughter, Jessica, 27, was killed.

Willers testified on the second day of Vang's trial on six counts of first-degree murder and three counts of attempted murder. He faces life in prison if convicted. Vang, 36, of St. Paul, an ethnic Hmong who came to the USA from a Thai refugee camp in 1980, says he acted in self-defense after someone shot at him.

Field hockey players guilty of hazing

Six women pleaded guilty in Cumberland, Md., to hazing for their roles in a college field hockey initiation that left an 18-year-old hospitalized with a blood-alcohol level more than four times what the law considers intoxicated. The six current and former Frostburg State University players were each fined $300, given suspended 60-day jail terms and placed on a year's probation. On Dec. 3, the victims were urged to drink so much beer and liquor that one was hospitalized with a 0.365% blood-alcohol level, court documents showed. The freshmen were also pelted with flour, ice and eggs and made to sit in their own vomit and urine, the court documents said.

4 Democrats vie to challenge NYC mayor

Voters in New York City today will choose a Democrat to face Mayor Michael Bloomberg in the general election Nov. 8. Gifford Miller, Anthony Weiner and C. Virginia Fields spent the final weekend before the primary attending 9/11 remembrances, but Fernando Ferrer had lunch and a photo-op with Al Sharpton, who has endorsed him.

A poll by the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute found Ferrer with 32% of likely Democratic voters, leading Anthony Weiner's 25%. Thirteen percent of likely Democratic voters in the survey were undecided. The winner needs 40% to avoid a runoff in two weeks. The poll surveyed 717 likely Democratic primary voters from Sept. 6 to Sept. 11 and has a margin of error of +/-3.7 percentage points.

Briton Gets 47 Years In Missile Plot (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0004565

By Jeffrey Gold, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

NEWARK, N.J. -- A British businessman convicted of trying to smuggle shoulder-launched missiles into the U.S. to aid terrorists was sentenced Monday to 47 years in prison, effectively a life sentence.

Hemant Lakhani, 70, was convicted in April of attempting to sell the missiles to a group he thought would use them to shoot down commercial airliners.

During his trial, and again Monday, his lawyers said Lakhani was the victim of government entrapment because the supposed missile seller and buyer were actually government agents.

Lakhani was convicted on all five charges he faced: attempting to provide material support to terrorists, unlawful brokering of foreign defense articles and attempting to import merchandise into the U.S. by means of false statements, plus two counts of money laundering.

Federal prosecutors were seeking the maximum on each count, for a total of 67 years, with Assistant U.S. Attorney Stuart Rabner recounting evidence in which Lakhani volunteered praise for Osama bin Laden.

"We may see a man who looks like us and dresses like us, but is so morally bankrupt that he plots the death of thousands of people," Rabner said.

U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden rejected pleas for leniency from Lakhani and his wife, referring to what she called "overwhelming" evidence of his "reprehensible conduct."

Lakhani was arrested in August 2003 at a hotel near Newark Liberty International Airport where he had been meeting with a government informant posing as a representative of a Somali-based militant group.

The government asserted that Lakhani planned to arrange the sale of at least 50 more missiles after the sale of the first one.

Among evidence during the trial was a video secretly made at the hotel in which Lakhani and the informant are seen with a disabled shoulder-fired missile in a box. They stand by a window overlooking the airport and discuss how missiles could be used to bring down airplanes in several locations simultaneously.

Co-defendants Yehuda Abraham and Vijay Raja are to be sentenced in coming months, while an Indian citizen caught in the sting operation was deported after cooperating in the Lakhani prosecution.

Also, Moinuddeen Ahmed Hameed, 41, pleaded guilty in 2004 to conspiracy to operate an unlicensed money transmitting business. He was sentenced in June to the 22 months he had served since his 2003 arrest.

Indian-born British Businessman Sentenced In U.S. Weapons Case (REU)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

NEWARK, N.J. (Reuters) - A U.S. federal court judge on Monday sentenced British businessman Hemant Lakhani to 47 years in prison for providing financial support for terrorist activities against the United States.

Prosecutors say Lakhani, 70, tried to sell a shoulder-fired missile to a man posing as a terrorist group member. He was found guilty in April of attempting to support terrorism, illegal arms brokering, money laundering and other charges.

Lakhani, who had faced a maximum sentence of 67 years, has maintained he was set up in a sting operation.

"It's a total lie," he said, holding his head in his hands, at the defense table in U.S. District Court in Newark, N.J.

His conviction was considered one of the more significant victories for the U.S. Justice Department since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks and the launch of the U.S.-led war on terror.

Lakhani, his attorney, Henry Klingeman, and his wife pleaded for leniency, noting he is elderly and wants to return home to Britain.

"Mr. Lakhani is not entitled to leniency. He's entitled to fairness," U.S. District Court Judge Katharine Hayden said in handing down the sentence.

Lakhani was arrested two years ago after U.S. Customs officers and FBI agents stormed a New Jersey hotel room and found him showing a "sample" shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missile to an informant posing as a member of a Somali militant group.

The arrest was the culmination of a 22-month sting spanning three continents.

The Indian-born clothing merchant has claimed he was a victim of entrapment because the buyer was an FBI informant and the missile sellers were undercover Russian agents.

Prosecutors said Lakhani had agreed to sell as many as 200 missiles to the informant and that he believed they would be used to shoot down U.S. airliners.

DOJ_NMG_0004566

They said evidence showed he was a willing participant in the scheme, that he associated with a reputed terrorist and tried to broker other arms deals negotiated during 200 phone calls with the informant and 12 trips to Russia and Ukraine.

Two Plead Not Guilty To Terrorism Charges (PHI)

By Jeremiah Marquez

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 13, 2005

SANTA ANA, Calif. - Two men pleaded not guilty Monday to federal charges alleging they planned terrorist attacks against military facilities, the Israeli Consulate and other targets in the Los Angeles area.

Levar Haley Washington, 25, and Gregory Vernon Patterson, 21, were ordered held without bail after their pleas in U.S. District Court.

"In the name of Allah, I plead not guilty," Washington said before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato.

Prosecutors contend the plot was orchestrated by Washington, Patterson and Hammad Riaz Samana, 21, at the behest of Kevin James, an inmate of the California State Prison, Sacramento. James, 29, founded the radical group Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh, or JIS.

During Monday's hearing, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith called Washington and Patterson dangers to society and flight risks, saying they had planned to carry out a "homegrown jihad" against the United States.

All four men face counts of conspiracy to wage war against the U.S. government through terrorism, kill armed service members and murder foreign officials, among other charges, according to an indictment.

All but Samana are American born and Muslim converts. Counterterrorism officials have said they found no evidence directly connecting the group to al-Qaida or other foreign terror networks.

Samana, a Pakistani national, pleaded not guilty to federal charges last week. He was imprisoned for attempted robbery in Los Angeles County, prosecutors said. James was expected to be arraigned later this month.

Washington, Patterson and Samana - who attended the same Inglewood mosque - allegedly conducted surveillance of military sites, synagogues, the Israeli Consulate and El Al airline facilities in the Los Angeles area.

Prosecutors suspect that Washington, Patterson and Samana robbed gas stations to finance their plans. Patterson bought a rifle, and Samana received "firearms training and physical training," according to the indictment.

Washington and Patterson previously pleaded not guilty to robbery charges in a related state case. Samana has not been charged in that case.

Outside court, Ellen Barry, who was appointed Monday as Washington's attorney, said she had not yet reviewed evidence in the case and expected the Nov. 8 trial would be postponed.

Patterson's lawyer, Winston McKesson, said his client has asked him not to comment on the case.

Also Monday, law enforcement officials briefed Jewish community leaders in Los Angeles on the case and said local police planned to step up security in and around synagogues during the holidays.

Randy Parsons, acting assistant director of the FBI's Los Angeles office, said the extra security was being taken out of an abundance of caution, not because there was any specific, credible threat.

"It's important that people go about their normal activities but remain vigilant," Parsons said.

Al-Arian Trial Focused On Finances (TAMPTRIB)

By MICHAEL FECHTER

Tampa Tribune, September 13, 2005

TAMPA - An attorney for one of Sami Al-Arian's codefendants is challenging prosecution claims that his client was on the payroll of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

Defense attorney Stephen Bernstein points to the same translations of intercepted telephone calls prosecutors are relying on, but says the figures discussed leave no room to pay Sameeh Hammoudeh.

Bernstein spent the morning cross examining FBI agent Michael Wysocki, who analyzed dozens of bank accounts involving the defendants and organizations they helped run. Al-Arian, Hammoudeh, Hatim Fariz and Ghassan Ballut are charged with racketeering and conspiracy to support the Islamic Jihad.

Hammoudeh does receive nearly $20,000 to his Tampa bank account from Islamic Jihad founder Fathi Shikaki in 1994, records show. He later sends $4,000 to Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, then a director at an Islamic think tank in Tampa, and $16,000 to the think tank itself.

In other calls, Al-Arian and Islamic Jihad members discuss salary information for its members. Bernstein has repeatedly tried to show that Hammoudeh is mentioned apart from the others and that references to him are not about salary.

DOJ_NMG_0004567

He also is challenging Wysocki's claim that bank records fail to substantiate that Hammoudeh and others failed to make donations to needy Palestinians in Syria, Lebanon and the Occupied Territories despite receipts and lists of orphans seized during searches in 1995.

Bernstein asked about other records seized, which he said were never translated by the government, that might lead to a different conclusion. But, thus far, Bernstein has not shown Wysocki any additional documents that challenge the accuracy of his review.

Such evidence might be presented when defense attorneys get to call witnesses. Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek has indicated the prosecution could complete its case by the end of the month.

More Join Guantanamo Hunger Strike (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

A month-old hunger strike at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to include at least 128 detainees, 18 of whom are forcibly receiving intravenous fluids or nutrition in the prison hospital, military officials and detainee lawyers said yesterday.

The captives are protesting their indefinite imprisonment and what they describe as beatings administered by the prison's Immediate Response Force (IRF)-- squads of military personnel who are dispatched to put down disturbances in detainees' cells. Some have said they will refuse to eat until the military gives them a fair hearing or they die, according to their attorneys.

Military officials first acknowledged the hunger strike, the second of the summer, on Aug. 25. Since then, the number of people hospitalized and in serious physical danger has grown to 18, according to Maj. Jeffrey J. Weir, a Guantanamo Bay spokesman. He said that step was taken to prevent any of the approximately 520 prisoners at the U.S. Navy base prison from engaging in a "form of suicide."

The hunger strike began in the first week of August, and, according to newly declassified accounts of detainees provided by their lawyers, has gradually spread across several camps at the prison. Detainees allege they have been severely beaten and are deeply frustrated at their indefinite detentions. Some have been held for 3 1/2 years without facing charges.

Lawyers for the prisoners assert that more than 200 detainees are refusing food. An earlier hunger strike in June and July ended after military authorities met with a small group of detainees and promised improvements in their living conditions.

"They truly feel they have nothing left," said attorney David Remes, who represents several Yemeni detainees. "I'm not sure what the end point will be. But I do predict there will be death."

Binyam Mohammed, formerly of London, whose account was the first declassified, told his attorney on Aug. 11 of the new hunger strike. "I do not plan to stop until I die or we are respected," he said. "People will definitely die."

Another detainee, Libyan-born Omar Deghayes, told his lawyer he had not eaten in five weeks. "Many more people have fallen unconscious. . . . More are taken to hospital," he said.

Military officials have characterized the protest as a "fast" of prisoners aimed at grabbing attention, and say it involves 128 prisoners. They say its significance is exaggerated by their lawyers.

Weir said no detainees are in danger of dying and that the military's treatment is preventing them from losing critical nutrition. Of the 18 people hospitalized, 13 are being force-fed through nasal tubes and five are being given intravenous hydration.

On Aug. 25, the military said that 89 detainees were fasting and seven were hospitalized and receiving forced fluids or nutrition.

Weir said yesterday that the military does not allow beatings of detainees, and he believes the refusal to eat is part of a campaign to press for their transfer or release.

"My understanding is that it's just because of their continued detention," Weir said. "They're trying to call attention to that."

The majority of detainees at Guantanamo Bay have long insisted that they were captured by mistake by U.S. forces in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. In some prisoners' cases, records show, the military has little but circumstantial evidence that the men engaged in or supported terrorist acts. The military's review of 558 cases resulted in 38 detainees being declared non-enemy combatants.

The appellate court for the District of Columbia heard arguments last week on the legality of the military holding the detainees indefinitely without giving them the chance to challenge their detentions in a U.S. court -- a follow-up to a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 2004. But that dispute is expected to drag on until next year, and is likely to be appealed to the Supreme Court again.

Hunger strikes are not new to the prison. Detainees launched one in 2002 after allegations that guards and interrogators mistreated copies of the Koran. Military officials then issued new guidelines for proper treatment of the Islamic holy book, and the strike ended.

Detainees began a new strike in late June to protest their treatment and the quality of their food and water. They complained about solitary confinement, alleged beatings by IRF teams, and the use of uniform colors to signify how detainees should be treated. Detainees given white uniforms are considered cooperative while those assigned orange uniforms are considered uncooperative and treated more harshly, detainees said.

The prisoners halted the previous strike in the first days of August after military camp leaders met with a small "council" of detainees and promised improvements in their living conditions. But the strike resumed a few days later, some detainees told their lawyers, when news spread through the camp of a Tunisian detainee beaten by an interrogator and IRF teams hitting two others, according to detainees' reports to their lawyers.

Weir declined to discuss individual detainees' cases or allegations.

An Algerian detainee told his lawyer in a newly declassified report provided by his attorney that a new interrogator beat the Tunisian with an empty beverage cooler and a metal chair after the detainee refused to talk to him. The Algerian said he saw the Tunisian's bloodied, swollen eye after the session.

Weir declined to comment on those details. Other detainees' accounts of the strike have not yet been declassified by the military, their lawyers said.

No Way, José (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

The timing couldn't have been better. Two days before the anniversary of the 9/11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, a panel for the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled unanimously last Friday that the President "unquestionably" has the power to detain an American citizen who has taken up arms against his country.

But wait. Didn't the Supreme Court say precisely that in its Hamdi decision last year? So it did, as Judge Michael Luttig notes repeatedly in his 25-page opinion penned for the court. That wasn't enough for José Padilla's attorneys, who argued that Hamdi, which concerned an American picked up on a battlefield in Afghanistan, didn't apply to their client, who was arrested domestically, at O'Hare Airport.

Padilla, for readers who may have forgotten, is the Brooklyn-born former gang leader who was recruited by al Qaeda, trained in Afghanistan, and equipped, funded and dispatched back to America. The "battlefield" in this case was to be American apartment buildings, which Padilla is accused of plotting to blow up. President Bush designated him an enemy combatant in 2002. The "locus of capture" is "irrelevant," Judge Luttig writes. Common sense says that Padilla poses the same threat of returning to the battlefield whether he was captured at home or abroad.

In previous wars, Americans who conspired to kill their fellow citizens were subject to trial by military commission, an option the President expressly ruled out in his post-9/11 order limiting military tribunals to non-citizens. Padilla's supporters want him to be charged in the criminal justice system or released. They include the American Civil Liberties Union, the People for the American Way Foundation, and former Clinton Justice officials Janet Reno, Eric Holder and Philip Heymann, who all want a return to the days of treating terrorism like a law-enforcement problem. In the week of the 9/11 anniversary, we're glad the Fourth Circuit didn't authorize a return to this September 10 mindset.

A Radical Vows To Fight Britain's Expulsion Plan (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2005

LONDON - Yasir al-Sirri is no stranger to British courtrooms. Since he sought asylum here 11 years ago the Egyptian Islamic radical has been in and out of jail, and has successfully fought off attempts to extradite him on terrorism charges to both the US and Egypt.

Now, however, in the wake of July's London bombings, he faces perhaps his greatest challenge yet as the British government prepares to join a Europewide crackdown on extremist Islamic circles and deport dozens of individuals deemed "not conducive to the public good."

As European governments lower their traditional levels of tolerance for radicalism, they are redrawing the lines between civil liberties and national security in the face of terrorist violence.

"Anything can happen," Mr. Sirri says, with a shrug of his shoulders. "I am expecting something to happen."

Last week, the Italian authorities summarily expelled a Moroccan imam and two other Middle Eastern men, giving them no chance to appeal under powers introduced since the London bombings that killed 52 people on July 7.

DOJ_NMG_0004569

France announced last month that it would be deporting a dozen or so North African immigrants it deems dangerous, using administrative procedures not subject to prior judicial review. "In France we are very well organized with regard to expulsions," says Guillaume Larrivé, an adviser to Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy. "We don't ask ourselves major juridical questions."

European human rights activists are up in arms, complaining that those sent back to their countries of origin, mostly Middle Eastern nations such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Algeria, face torture.

"It is absolutely scandalous," says Jean-Pierre Dubois, president of the French Human Rights League. "Are human rights not for all humans, or have we decided that radical imams are monsters?"

The United Nations' special rapporteur on torture, Manfred Nowak, also condemns the growing trend. "The risk is very high that these people would be subjected to torture," he warns. "Most of the Muslim fundamentalists' countries of origin unfortunately do have a clear record of torture."

Recognizing the dangers, the British interior minister, Charles Clarke, nonetheless insists that "it really is necessary to balance very important rights for individuals against the collective right for security."

Sirri, who runs the "Islamic Observation Center" in London, (he says it monitors human rights abuses in the Muslim world, but US and British police say it is a conduit for messages among Al Qaeda militants), would undoubtedly be arrested if he were sent back to Egypt.

The government there has been seeking his extradition from Britain for 10 years in connection with his alleged role in a 1993 assassination attempt by the "Islamic Group" against the Egyptian prime minister.

Britain, like other European countries, is bound by the European Convention on Human Rights, and by a UN treaty, not to send anyone to a country where he or she runs a serious risk of torture. The British government, however, is seeking to circumvent this restriction by demanding diplomatic assurances from 10 Middle Eastern and African countries that they would not mistreat any deportees.

So far only Jordan, which has been widely accused of torturing suspects, has agreed to offer an assurance. Britain says negotiations with Egypt, Algeria, Morocco and other governments are still under way.

But no such understandings would be valid, insists Dr. Nowak, an Austrian human rights expert. "Jordan is already a party to the UN Convention against Torture," he argues. "Why should they suddenly stop torturing? They are already violating a legally binding treaty, so why should they not violate a nonbinding diplomatic agreement?"

The Egyptian government broke a similar promise it made to Sweden in 2001, when Stockholm deported Ahmed Agiza only on condition that he be well treated and given a fair trial, Nowak points out. Stockholm later complained that Mr. Agiza had been tried unfairly before a military court, and he complained that he had been tortured. Sirri trusts British judges not to rubber-stamp government deportation orders. "If the government gives any judge the political agreement between the UK and Jordan, he will throw it in his rubbish bin," he says confidently.

Mr. Clarke, on the other hand, said Friday he hoped that judges reviewing deportation cases would "recast the balance" between individual human rights and national security. "The right to be protected from torture and ill treatment must be considered side by side with the right to be protected from the death and destruction caused by indiscriminate terrorism," Mr. Clarke said in his speech last week.

British judges have long protected radical imam Abu Hamza al-Masri from extradition to Yemen, where he is wanted on terrorism charges, for example. His fiery sermons appear to have inspired one regular visitor, shoe bomber Richard Reid.

Clarke last month issued a list of "unacceptable behaviors" that would prompt deportation orders against foreigners living in Britain. It includes fomenting, justifying, or glorifying terrorist violence; seeking to provoke others to terrorist acts; and fostering hatred that might lead to intercommunity violence.

That would appear to cover websites carrying videos of British soldiers being blown up in Iraq or of hostages being beheaded, and the distribution of messages encouraging jihad from such figures as Osama bin Laden.

The move appears to enjoy strong public support. A poll carried out for the Guardian newspaper last month found that 71 per cent of respondents agreed that "foreign Muslims who incite hatred should be excluded or deported from the UK."

Announcing the list, Clarke insisted that it was "not intended to stifle free speech or legitimate debate about religions or other issues." Officials pointed out that the government had backed off a plan to deport foreigners who expressed "views the government considers to be extreme and that conflict with the UK's culture of tolerance."

That is not how Sirri sees things. "Tony Blair is changing this country from one respected for its human rights to a graveyard of human rights," he charges.

In Egypt, he says, military courts that the British government does not regard as fair have handed down three sentences against him: the death penalty, 25 years' hard labor, and 15 years' hard labor. If he were sent back, he says with a bitter laugh, "I don't know which one they would apply first." Yasir al-Sirri: 'I did nothing illegal'

DOJ_NMG_0004570

Yasir al-Sirri is exactly the sort of man the British government hopes to be able to expel with its new, tougher deportation policy: He keeps very dubious company and the police are sure he is up to something, but have not been able to pin anything on him or put him on trial.

In Egypt, Mr. Sirri is thought to have been a leader of the radical "Gama'a Islamiya" group, and was sentenced him to death for his alleged role in an assassination attempt against the prime minister. But British judges have refused to extradite him to Cairo, citing weak evidence. Sirri claims he had nothing to do with the plot. He did, though, have ties in those days with Ayman al-Zawahiri, now Al Qaeda's second-in-command. And US authorities want him for carrying messages for Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, who is serving a life term for trying to blow up the World Trade Center in 1993.

Sirri was held in Belmarsh prison in London for eight months for providing a letter of journalistic accreditation to the two men who assassinated the Afghan warlord Ahmed Shah Massoud in 2001. But a British court finally decided he had been an unwitting accomplice in the affair, and let him go. Sirri insists that "I did nothing illegal in this country and I have not broken any law in this country." Islamic law, he adds, demands that "anyone who arrives here under asylum cannot do anything against this country. Tony Blair is just using [the London bombings on] 7/7 as an excuse to carry out his agenda."

PATRIOT ACT:

Booksellers At Fore Of Patriot Act Fights (SMCT)

By Sajid Farooq, STAFF WRITER

San Mateo County (CA) Times, September 12, 2005

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the second day of a three-day series looking at the impact of and the controversy over the Patriot Act and its second revision that awaits President Bush's signature. The series began Saturday and runs through Tuesday.

Five years ago, an independent bookstore in Denver became the center of a drug investigation, and at the same time, inadvertently became a model for bookstore owners across the country concerned with the Patriot Act.

Police officers walked into the Tattered Cover Book Store and served a search warrant for the records of one of the store's customers, who was suspected of manufacturing methamphetamine, according to the American Bookseller Foundation for Free Expression. Even though the search took place more than a year before the Patriot Act was passed, the case set a precedent for booksellers and others across the country who are fighting some of the surveillance provisions of the anti-terrorism law.

Several businesses, city councils and other governmental institutions across the country have taken stances for and against the act for a variety of reasons. Some of those stances are driven by politics, some by security and others by fear.

"You have to be able to do this without the government looking over your shoulder," said Rich Van Castle, owner of three Bay Books stores in the East Bay. "It is very important. I wouldn't want the government coming in here and saying 'What did he read or did she read?'"

Van Castle is just one of many independent and corporate booksellers across the country who have been fighting one of most controversial measures of the act, Section 215, which gives federal authorities access to customers' book, medical and library records, while establishing a gag order to prevent anyone involved from commenting on the case.

"That to me is a violation of free speech in of itself," Van Castle said.

Successful tool

But to the FBI, which is often painted as the abuser of Patriot Act powers, says the gag order is a matter of both national and personal security. The FBI also contends that bookstore purchases and library records were available to federal authorities long before the Sept. 11-inspired Patriot Act.

"Some of this is just common sense," said Special Agent LaRae Quay with the San Francisco office of the FBI. "It's just one of these things if we are looking at an individual it's best that they not know. (It's) also to protect the individuals that are cleared.

"First of all, if you have a librarian flapping his or her lips that Joe Blow has been looked at, if that's a terrorist, that tips them off. And secondly, if they are innocent, their reputation is smeared."

Critics of Section 215 argue that record searches violate customers' First Amendment rights. The Colorado Supreme Court backed that stance when it ruled in favor of Tattered Cover Book Store, which refused to comply with a subpoena.

The court ruled that the prosecution had not shown enough proof that it needed the customer's buying records to prove his guilt. Reasonable doubt is vital to access records, according to Quay.

"It's not just an agent (who) decides 'I want records and

Advertisement

go and seize them'," she said. "We have to be able to articulate any connection with records and an ongoing investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0004571

Library records were available for criminal cases before passage of the Patriot Act, but the act gives access to records involving suspected terrorists.

Being able to access library records has been a successful tool in protecting public safety, according to Quay. The FBI was able to track the Unabomber, Ted Kaczynski, by pulling his library records.

The FBI examined Kaczynski's life and noticed that his manifesto referred to three obscure books that very few people would read. The FBI was tipped by Kaczynski's brother that the books of "interest were checked out from his local library." The FBI obtained a federal grand subpoena and went to the library near where he lived to verify the information.

Still, from small independent bookstores to huge chains — such as Borders and Barnes & Noble — to public libraries, protecting customers' privacy is a driving force behind taking a public stance against the act.

"It is very important. We believe that it is our customers' right to choose what to read, listen to and buy, and those decisions are private," said Anne Roman with Borders.

Other entities affected

There are other businesses, such as banks, that must provide access to customer records.

Because of the Patriot Act, certain transactions and identities must be reported to the government to help prevent financial crimes involving terrorism, such as identity theft and money laundering.

The act has also affected local governments across the country. Nearly 400 communities in 43 states, representing 62 million people, have taken positions of one sort or another against the Patriot Act.

Shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, the American Civil Liberties Union hired five people to help get resolutions against the Patriot Act passed across the country, according to Dalia Hashad, an advocate in for the ACLU's campaign against racial profiling.

The ACLU organizers worked with local leaders in each community to get resolutions passed. But the ACLU did not want its name all over the campaign, so the five people hired to work on the resolutions full-time divided the country into five sections and worked with each local community to get them passed.

The success of the campaign was based on Americans' unwillingness to compromise their civil rights for national security, according to Dorothy M. Ehrlich, the executive director of ACLU Northern California.

"I think people understood giving up civil liberties didn't make them any safer," she said. "There is no evidence that it does and there is a lot to lose. There has truly been a bipartisan concern across the country."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

USA Still Terrorists' 'No. 1 Target' (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, September 13, 2005

In his first media interview since becoming the nation's first director of national intelligence in April, John Negroponte spoke Monday to reporters and an editor from USA TODAY.

Some highlights:

"We're talking about something that is a medium- and long-term proposition. We're not talking about changes that can necessarily be instituted overnight."

"Progress has been made in dismembering and attacking the leadership of his organization. A number of important operatives of his have been killed or captured. He is, we think, alive somewhere in the Afghan-Pakistan border area. … Even though he hasn't been captured, I think that he and his organization are very much on the defensive."

"We've seen in some of the statements and correspondence that we've laid our hands on between al-Qaeda leadership that clearly they would like to see this activity spread into such targets as Western Europe, and I think what happened in London on the 7th of July, whether or not it was directed by al-Qaeda, was certainly consistent with that desire. … They see vulnerabilities in the West, in Western Europe. And of course, the United States homeland remains, in my view, their No. 1 target."

"Putting numbers on the size of the insurgency is probably a bit of a speculative business because nobody knows for sure. But I guess I'd say that based on what I've read and on my own knowledge of the situation in Iraq, that over the past several months I don't think the size or nature of the insurgency has changed appreciably."

"These are both states that have got to be watched very carefully, and they are extremely high priority. … In either instance, left to their own devices they are either going to develop or further develop, as the case may be, their nuclear capabilities."

Intel Chief: Iraqis In Insurgency More Elusive (USAT)

By John Diamond, Usa Today

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence is struggling to expose elements of the insurgency in Iraq made up of former members of Saddam Hussein's regime, John Negroponte, the nation's intelligence chief, said in an interview Monday.

Joint U.S.-Iraqi military efforts have damaged the network of foreign insurgents led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, though Zarqawi himself remains at large, Negroponte said. Indigenous Iraqi insurgents, led by former members of Saddam's ruling Baath Party, have been tougher to track down.

The "former regime elements ... seem to have very good operational secrecy," Negroponte said in a wide-ranging interview with USA TODAY reporters. "And thus far it's not been that easy to make a dent in that part of the insurgency."

Though foreign fighters, mainly Sunni Muslim Arabs from Syria and Saudi Arabia, have grabbed headlines with suicide bombings that have killed hundreds of Iraqis, Negroponte said Iraqis dominate the insurgency. Despite intense focus on Iraq, where 138,000 U.S. troops are deployed, U.S. intelligence has not been able to produce anything more than a "speculative" estimate of the insurgency's size, he said.

Based on everything he has seen, Negroponte said, the insurgency is neither gaining strength nor weakening appreciably. The insurgency's stubborn resistance to U.S. and Iraqi military efforts has complicated the development of a democracy.

Negroponte became the nation's first director of national intelligence in April after nine months as U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Congress created the post last year in response to independent commissions that laid out major intelligence failures prior to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. He has spent much of his time in the job setting up special centers overseeing counterterrorism and weapons proliferation. "Mission managers" will be named soon for human intelligence, Iran and North Korea, Negroponte said.

Although the Office of the Director of National Intelligence was created in an atmosphere of urgency, "it's really a start-up organization," he said. "It's work in progress."

In his first media interview since assuming the intelligence post, Negroponte also said:

· Despite significant failures before 9/11 and the Iraq war, U.S. intelligence "is second to none compared to any other intelligence organization in the world." His task is "making it even better."

· Al-Qaeda, though weakened by the U.S.-led global war on terrorism, continues to plan and organize terrorist attacks and regards the U.S. homeland as its top-priority target. Western Europe, Negroponte said, is more vulnerable than the USA to al-Qaeda.

· A viable Iraqi government has been slow in getting organized because the war led to the "degradation ... of virtually every single government department. ... They basically had to start practically from scratch."

Negroponte, 66, spoke in a secure room of his office's headquarters a block from the White House. A career diplomat with Foreign Service commissions signed by every president back to Dwight Eisenhower, Negroponte got his first overseas experience in South Vietnam in the early 1960s. He has been ambassador to Honduras, Mexico, the Philippines, the United Nations and Iraq.

When he appointed Negroponte, President Bush emphasized that the new chief needed broad powers over spending and personnel across military and civilian intelligence agencies.

Nevertheless, Negroponte said he cannot rule the 15 intelligence agencies "by fiat" but must "foster a strong sense of community" among organizations that have not always cooperated.

Negroponte said he is close to making a major decision on whether to go forward with a highly classified imagery intelligence network. According to Steve Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists, the program probably concerns a costly network of satellites capable of evading radar, reflecting a Defense Department concern about the possibility that an adversary might attempt to "blind" U.S. intelligence operations by attacking its satellites.

Negroponte praised Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for helping the "lash-up between domestic and foreign" intelligence, which the 9/11 Commission called a major contributor to lapses before 9/11.

Following the report of the so-called WMD Commission, which examined the incorrect prewar estimates that Iraq had chemical and biological weapons and an active nuclear weapons development program, Negroponte said he is creating new standards on rating the veracity of clandestine intelligence sources. He is also improving the description of sources behind intelligence assessments.

Smarter Airport Screening Machines (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

DOJ_NMG_0004573

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A gaping hole in airport security remains: how to detect explosives in carry-on bags and on passengers themselves. Now, a host of new technologies are being tested to close that gap.

One of the most promising is a machine that has the ability to see through clothing to find a hidden weapon. The problem with early versions of the machine is that they show images of people as if they had no clothes on, which sparked privacy concerns. Yesterday, American Science & Engineering Inc. launched an X-ray machine that can see objects hidden beneath clothing while obscuring private parts. The other leading manufacturer of the machines also promises to cover up those parts of the image, though in a different way.

An alternate technology, being tried in some airports now, shoots puffs of air at passengers to detect traces of explosive residue. GE Security, a subsidiary of General Electric Co., yesterday unveiled a new machine that also detects residue, but passengers put their fingers onto a pad instead of being spritzed with air.

The moves are part of a highly competitive, rapidly unfolding race to deploy the best technology for closing the security gap at airport checkpoints.

The security upgrades at American airports since 2001 have been significant, including locking cockpit doors and reinforcing them with steel, and deploying thousands of air marshals aboard flights. But, while all checked luggage is now screened for explosives, people and bags that get carried on generally aren't. Magnetometers that travelers walk through detect metal but not weapons made of other materials. Similarly, carry-on luggage is X-rayed, which will catch scissors or a knife but not necessarily a bomb.

The Transportation Security Administration is currently reviewing several post-9/11 security guidelines that air travelers have grown to loathe: removing shoes, taking off jackets, leaving behind cuticle scissors. How much the agency relaxes these rules could in part depend on how confident government officials are about the new machines' ability to guard airport checkpoints. At Baltimore/Washington International Airport, for instance, those who walk through an explosive-detection machine don't have to take their shoes off for the metal detector.

"Our vision is for passengers to not have to remove their jacket, not have to remove their shoes, not have to remove their laptop from their bag -- to go through a checkpoint rapidly," said Dennis Cooke, president of GE Security's Homeland Protection business.

The TSA has a long list of limitations it must work within. These include everything from space at the checkpoints to cost concerns. The government is focusing mostly on two types of technology, each with pluses and minuses. The "puffer" detects the tiniest bit of explosive material on a traveler but can't find a hidden weapon. The "backscatter," on the other hand, can see through clothing to detect hidden bombs or guns, but creates the obvious privacy concerns.

Puffers, officially called trace detection portals, are now being deployed at two dozen airports around the country, including those in Las Vegas, Baltimore/Washington, San Francisco, Phoenix and Tampa, Fla. They blow several puffs of air on a traveler to shake loose particles that have settled on the body and then analyze them for explosive residue.

"It's right out of 'Star Trek,' " says Natalie Koza, who walked through the machine at BWI airport late last month. The 47-year-old State Department employee, who was on her way to Egypt, was quickly cleared.

The machines, manufactured by GE and Smiths Detection, a subsidiary of London-based Smiths Group PLC, cost about $150,000 each. The TSA has said it anticipates deploying 100 more of them by January. GE's new technology, called the Itemiser FX, which detects explosives as well as narcotics, costs about $65,000 per machine and is portable.

The problem with these machines: While they are great at detecting explosives, they won't find a hidden gun or knife. Backscatter, an X-ray that sees under clothing, solves that problem. TSA is close to deploying these machines in a handful of airports, including those in Baltimore/Washington and San Francisco, to test their effectiveness. But the backscatter creates another problem: It produces intimate pictures of unsuspecting travelers.

"It really is a nude strip search," said Tim Sparapani at the American Civil Liberties Union, which opposes their use.

In response, AS&E's new machine, called SmartCheck, creates an outline of the person's body, along with an outline of hidden items. Rapiscan Systems, the other manufacturer, has come up with a sliding scale where the image starts to get fuzzier or more precise as needed. The companies promise other protections: The people who screen the X-rays would sit in a remote room where they can't see the people moving through security. The screeners would all be of the same sex as the travelers and images won't be saved.

Clifford Wilke, chief technology officer for the federal TSA, says some airports, particularly large ones, could wind up with both puffers and backscatters. But others argue that having multiple machines would take up too much space and keep passengers waiting too long.

DOJ_NMG_0004574

Either the puffer or the backscatter is likely to improve on current procedures. In most airports, travelers who are selected for further screening -- either because their name is on a watch list or the metal detector is set off when they walked through -- are subject to a physical pat-down by a screener.

A test of the backscatter technology at London's Heathrow International Airport suggested that hand pat-downs miss at least half of the prohibited items hidden on travelers.

The Homeland Security Department's inspector general said in May that the ability of TSA screeners to stop prohibited items being carried through airports was no better than it had been in late 2001 and early 2002, before the federal government took over screening. Experts say that's partly because screeners are loathe to probe private parts of the body.

Technology to screen carry-on bags for explosives is even less advanced than screening for people. One possible solution is to replace the existing X-rays with CT scans now used on checked bags. A two-month preliminary test of this technology was completed recently at Boston Logan International Airport, and TSA hopes to begin formal lab testing next summer.

In the long term, technology companies envision a day when travelers don't even have to walk through machines -- when sensors throughout the airport scan people as they walk through hallways.

Closer to reality might be one machine that could handle all screening, searching for metal and explosives alike. "Instead of walking through three pieces of machinery, you walk through one," predicted Todd Haupli, a lobbyist for airports. "We have finite resources as a country that we're willing to throw at all this."

WAR NEWS:

Talabani Says Iraqis Could Replace Many U.S. Troops (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said in an interview yesterday that the United States could withdraw as many as 50,000 troops by the end of the year, declaring there are enough Iraqi forces trained and ready to begin assuming control in cities throughout the country.

After the White House and Pentagon were contacted for comment, however, a senior adviser to Talabani called The Washington Post to say Talabani did not intend to suggest a specific timeline for withdrawal. "He is afraid . . . this might put the notion of a timetable on this thing," the adviser said. "The exact figure of what would be required will undeniably depend on the level of insurgency [and] the level of Iraqi capability."

In the interview, Talabani said he planned to discuss reductions in U.S. forces during a private meeting with President Bush today, and said he believed the United States could begin pulling out some troops immediately.

"We think that America has the full right to move some forces from Iraq to their country because I think we can replace them [with] our forces," Talabani said. "In my opinion, at least from 40,000 to 50,000 American troops can be [withdrawn] by the end of this year."

That assessment differs dramatically from those offered by Bush and by U.S. military commanders in Iraq.

Bush has carefully avoided setting a timetable for reducing the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, currently about 140,000, and the Pentagon plans to maintain or slightly increase the force level in anticipation of an Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's new constitution. White House officials say that Bush's strategy for eventually withdrawing troops hinges on Iraqis' approving the constitution and holding successful elections in December.

Dan Bartlett, a senior Bush adviser, said the president and Talabani have the same goals. "We share the same view: As Iraqis build up their capabilities to defend their country, fewer U.S. troops will be needed to complete our mission," Bartlett said. "The president will continue to work with Iraqi leaders, and base his military decisions on the advice of commanders in the field and the secretary of defense."

A senior Army official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the military does not openly discuss withdrawal timelines, said bringing home as many as 50,000 U.S. troops -- or more than 35 percent of those now in Iraq -- by the end of the year is not under discussion. "Any talk of reduction has been for well after the election time frame," the official said. "Are there discussions about how to pull back and when? Sure. But certainly not that dramatically in such a short time."

Talabani's statement has the potential to put Bush in a difficult position if the troops are not pulled out by year's end, since critics are certain to ask why U.S. soldiers cannot come home when Iraq's own president says they can. The two leaders will hold a joint news conference today after their meeting.

In the interview, Talabani said Iraqi troops are prepared to assume control of security in several cities throughout southern, central and northern Iraq, despite continued violence, suicide bombings and killings. Many military experts predict a spike in insurgent attacks ahead of next month's vote.

Talabani said the number of "well-trained" Iraqi security forces stood at 60,000 and would reach 100,000 by the end of the year. All told, there about 190,000 Iraqis enlisted in the military or local security forces. "Some are well-trained, some are not so well-trained," he said. Iraqi troops have light arms, but he said they need 50 tanks and automatic weapons.

Talabani, who is Kurdish, could be influenced by the fact that the Kurds are fairly capable of defending their territory in northern Iraq and are less in need of U.S. military support, said Michael O'Hanlon, a fellow at the Brookings Institution who studies Iraq.

Many Sunni Arabs oppose the draft constitution, and they are organizing in record numbers to vote against it in Sunni-dominated regions. Talabani raised the possibility of an addendum to the constitution in coming days in an effort to appease Sunni factions. "Of course, we would like to have consensus on all articles of the constitution," he said.

In the interview, Talabani said he did not want to speak critically of neighboring Syria, which the top U.S. envoy to Iraq chastised for interfering there. Many of the foreign insurgents fighting in Iraq are believed to have entered the country along the porous Syrian border. "Our patience is running out, the patience of Iraqis [is] . . . running out. The time for decision . . . has arrived for Damascus," Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told reporters at the State Department.

Commenting on the upcoming trial of ousted president Saddam Hussein, Talabani insisted that the former leader had confessed to the killings of tens of thousands of Kurds in the late 1980s, an assertion denied by Hussein's attorney.

Hussein is scheduled to go on trial Oct. 19 on charges stemming from a massacre of Shiite Muslims following a failed assassination attempt on the Iraqi leader in the northern town of Dujail in 1982. Hussein allegedly retaliated for the plot by killing at least 143 people and razing much of the town.

Talabani, based on a conversation with the judge in the case, recounted a scene right out of the movie "A Few Good Men." Asked about the mass killings, Hussein sat silent, refusing to utter a word, Talabani said. But Hussein was taunted, asked if he was afraid to say he carried out such an act. Hussein said, "I am not afraid," and defiantly admitted he ordered the killings. Talabani said the judge has a video and recording of the confession.

Iraqi Premier Visits A City As His Forces Widen Patrols (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 12 - Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari paid a surprise visit to Tal Afar on Monday, with that city largely quiet after a major offensive by American and Iraqi troops aimed at reclaiming it from insurgents.

The prime minister has repeatedly showcased the Tal Afar operation as proof of his government's willingness to deal decisively with Sunni insurgents in western Iraq.

State television continued to show film of Iraqi soldiers storming buildings in Tal Afar throughout the day.

With the fighting largely over, more police commando units began moving into Tal Afar and the surrounding area, where they will remain for weeks as a new police force for the city is recruited and trained, and reconstruction efforts get under way, Iraqi military officials said.

An insurgent group, the Islamic Army in Iraq, offered up to $100,000 for the assassination of Mr. Jaafari and other high-ranking members of the government who were involved in the offensive, Reuters reported.

The same group announced in an Internet posting that it had killed a high-ranking Interior Ministry official in retaliation for the operation in Tal Afar.

Interior Ministry officials could not confirm such a death by Monday evening.

Another organization, the Victorious Army Group, threatened Sunday to attack Baghdad with chemical weapons if the Tal Afar operation did not stop.

The interior minister, Bayan Jabr, discounted that threat in a news conference on Monday, but he added that the government was consulting with chemical weapons specialists and making preparations in case the threat is carried out.

Mr. Jabr also dismissed questions from reporters about whether the Tal Afar attack was timed to shore up the government's image ahead of the national referendum in October on the constitution.

Scattered violence continued across Iraq on Monday. A car bomb exploded outside a restaurant in the upscale Baghdad neighborhood of Mansour, killing at least 2 people and wounding 20, according to the Interior Ministry.

Also in Baghdad, gunmen in cars opened fire on crowds in two neighborhoods, killing six people and wounding two, and 10 bodies were found in a southern neighborhood, Interior Ministry officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0004576

In Kirkuk, in the north, gunmen opened fire on the provincial government headquarters, killing two police officers. A Kurdish militiaman was also killed in Kirkuk after a gun battle broke out in the Hurriya neighborhood, police officials said.

South of Baghdad, insurgents opened fire on a motorcade carrying a representative of Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric. One guard was killed and another wounded, Interior Ministry officials said.

40 Insurgents Killed During Day 3 Of Tal Afar Offensive (USAT)

By From wire reports

USA Today, September 13, 2005

BAGHDAD — Violence flared in the northern Iraq city of Tal Afar late Monday when Iraqi forces trapped insurgents in basement hide-outs, killing 40 militants in fierce fighting, the Iraqi military said.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari visited Tal Afar, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are pursuing a joint offensive against insurgents, to congratulate his forces.

"I met today with the commander of the 3rd Division in Tal Afar and his officers and soldiers and found them in high spirits," al-Jaafari said. Hundreds of Iraqis danced, sang and waved flags as al-Jaafari toured the region.

The new fighting Monday night raised the insurgent death toll since the offensive began to nearly 200, the government said. Baghdad said it lost seven soldiers in the course of the three-day offensive and six civilians were killed. The U.S. military said no American soldiers were hurt.

An estimated 350-500 insurgents were in Tal Afar when Iraqi forces, backed by U.S. troops, began the offensive Saturday. The town, 50 miles from the Syrian border, had become an insurgent stronghold.

In an ongoing propaganda battle, meanwhile, the Islamic Army in Iraq, which has previously claimed responsibility for kidnappings and killings of foreigners, placed bounties on the heads of Iraqi leaders.

The militant group called in a Web posting for its "holy fighters to strike the infidels with an iron fist." It offered $100,000 to the killer of al-Jaafari, $50,000 for Interior Minister Bayan Jabr and $30,000 for Defense Minister Sadoun al-Dulaimi.

Militants also have threatened twice in recent days on Web postings to launch chemical weapons against Baghdad.

In other developments Monday:

· A car bomb exploded in western Baghdad, killing at least two people.

· Police in eastern Baghdad reported finding the bodies of 10 unidentified men, their hands tied and shot to death.

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 12 -- Iraq's prime minister toured the northern city of Tall Afar near the Syrian border on Monday to congratulate Iraqi forces for ousting militants from their stronghold, Iraqi television reported.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, a huge car bomb exploded outside a popular restaurant in the upscale Mansour neighborhood, witnesses said. Hospital officials said at least two people were killed and 17 were wounded. A doctor at Yarmouk Hospital said most of the victims were women.

Al-Iraqiya television, which showed no pictures of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari's visit to the Tall Afar area, said he was there despite an insurgent threat to unleash chemical and biological weapons against Iraqi and U.S. forces.

There was no known public threat from the insurgents to use unconventional weapons in the area, but they have vowed in two Web postings since Friday to use chemical weapons against U.S. and Iraqi government interests in Baghdad. The threats mentioned the fortified Green Zone that houses the U.S. Embassy, Iraq's parliament and other government offices.

On Sunday, Abu Musab Zarqawi, leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, posted audio on the Internet accusing U.S. and Iraqi forces of using poison gas in the Tall Afar offensive. The authenticity of the statement could not be independently verified, but the voice was similar to the one used in other postings attributed to Zarqawi.

U.S. officials consistently have denied using poison gas in warfare.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, gunmen shot and killed two policemen, police Col. Adil Zain Alabideen said. And in Hujjaj, north of Tikrit, Iraqi police found the bodies of four Iraqi soldiers, said Sameer Sumaidae, a physician at a local hospital. The four had been handcuffed and shot, he said.

The U.S. Embassy annex in the southern city of Basra was hit by a "multiple rocket attack" early Monday, an American official in Baghdad said. The official said there were no injuries or deaths, and no significant damage. He declined to discuss the damage or where the rockets hit, other than to say they landed "in the vicinity" of the compounds.

U.S. Applies Capricious Justice In Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 12 -- A masked teenager in an Iraqi army uniform walked slowly through a crowd of 400 detainees captured Monday, studying each face and rendering his verdict with a simple hand gesture, like a Roman emperor deciding the fate of gladiators.

A thumb pointed down meant the suspect was not thought to be an insurgent and would be released by U.S. soldiers. A thumb up meant a man would be removed from the concertina wire-encased pen, handcuffed with tape or plastic ties and taken by truck to a military base to be interrogated.

"Another bad guy right here," shouted an American interpreter, when the masked Iraqi singled out a man in a yellow dishdasha , or traditional gown, who shook his head and protested in Turkish. Another captive who was spared exhaled with relief and placed his hand on his heart.

This is how the 10-day-old invasion of Tall Afar unfolded Monday. After two days of relatively uneventful patrols in the abandoned neighborhood of Sarai, where commanders had expected insurgents to be massed for a fight, U.S. and Iraqi forces turned north in the morning, to neighborhoods they had already cleared, and found hundreds of men who appeared to be of military age and troops believed to have slipped through their cordons.

Eventually, 52 men were placed in the open backs of flatbed trucks bound for Camp Sykes, about seven miles south of this northwestern city. During the attack on insurgents here -- the largest urban assault in Iraq since the siege of Fallujah last November -- the only significant clashes came in the early days, when thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops stormed the city and U.S. jets waged a relentless bombing campaign.

Since then, the fighters who controlled much of Tall Afar for nearly a year have either fled or laid down their arms to blend among the civilian population, commanders here said. Instead of a Fallujah-style assault, the invasion has largely become a citywide roundup designed to prevent insurgents from laying low to fight another day.

Soldiers with little training relevant to the mission have been forced into roles more traditionally assigned to police: gathering evidence, interrogating witnesses and suspects, and following up on leads. In searching almost every house in the city's most violent neighborhoods, they have detained hundreds of young men, some because they possessed weapons or insurgent literature, but others solely on the hearsay of local informants often called "sources" by U.S. troops.

Many of the informants are residents of this city of more than 200,000 who now serve in the Iraqi army. Others have had family members killed by insurgents and said they wanted to help purge them from their neighborhoods. The U.S. soldiers who work with them acknowledge knowing little about their backgrounds and motives -- or even their names -- and admit that their reliability varies widely. Some of those named by sources have in turn blamed their accusers of carrying out tribal or sectarian vendettas, a charge they also level at Iraqi security forces.

"They are the first important step in the process of weeding these people out," Capt. Alan Blackburn, commander of Eagle Troop of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment that has led the invasion of Tall Afar, said of the informants. "You obviously can't just go by what they say because they make plenty of mistakes, but since we don't know these places as well as they do, it helps to have them around."

U.S. forces invaded Tall Afar one year ago, before withdrawing, as insurgents returned and reestablished control over the city. On Monday, Abu Musab Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of the country's main insurgent group, al Qaeda in Iraq, posted a statement on the Internet saying U.S. forces were "repeating their moves against Tall Afar after failing many times to break into it, as its lions many times forced them to taste humiliation, and the bitterness of defeat."

As in the past several days, Iraqi soldiers drawn primarily from the Kurdish pesh merga militia led the operation, joined as always by U.S. Special Operations soldiers, distinctive with their unkempt hair and facial stubble.

At just after 7 a.m., they streamed into the adjoining neighborhoods of Hassan Koy and Uruba, taking every military-age man into custody at a makeshift pen established by U.S. forces along a main road. The U.S. soldiers uncoiled enough concertina wire to hold an expected 50 or so men. But as detainees streamed out from the neighborhoods, the pens were expanded with more coils of wire until the holding area stretched an entire block.

U.S. commanders have praised the performance of the Kurdish forces during the operation, while privately expressing concern that their tactics sometimes verge on being heavy-handed. The pesh merga supports Kurdish rebels fighting the government of neighboring Turkey and for many years were targets of the Sunni Arab-dominated Iraqi government of former president Saddam Hussein. The majority of Tall Afar's residents are Sunni Turkmens, ethnic relatives of the Turks.

Iraqi troops who raided suspected hideouts in a separate sweep late Monday killed 40 insurgents, and arrested 27 in clashes with militants, according to the Associated Press.

In a briefing the night before the morning operation, Lt. Col. Christopher Hickey, commander of the 3rd ACR's 2nd Squadron, instructed the Special Operations soldiers working with the pesh merga to avoid alienating residents.

DOJ_NMG_0004578

"We lose these people if we go in there and tear people's homes apart," Hickey said.

By 8 a.m., nearly 400 people were assembled, squatting or seated in the dirt beside the road. Two of the men had bloodied faces and spots of red soaking through their green dishdashas.

"They tried to grab my father, and I said, 'He is old, you don't need to take him,' " said one of the men, whose upper lip and right ear were swollen and bleeding. "They hit us with their fists and their rifles."

Many of the men's hands were bound so tightly with plastic cuffs that their circulation was cut off, so U.S. soldiers cut the bindings and instead wrapped their hands with thick green tape.

The Special Operations soldiers, who do not provide their names to journalists as a matter of policy, said the pesh merga had found a former colonel in Hussein's army inside one home. But when U.S. soldiers looked through the pen, they could not find him. One of the Kurdish fighters said he had been delivered directly to a Kurdish commander.

"Get him down here right now," a Special Forces soldier said. "He is going to be processed here, by the U.S., like everyone else."

After about two hours, the informant arrived. Wearing tan camouflage fatigues, a flak jacket, a green ski mask and green helmet, the informant said he was from the neighborhood and was under 20 years old.

"I am doing this because I want to see the fear and violence leave Tall Afar," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

With a U.S. interpreter, he perused the crowd, pausing for less than two seconds to consider each man's fate. He never spoke a word aloud, only whispering occasionally to the interpreter.

After drawing out 52 suspects from the group, he spent longer assessing each of them in depth and providing more detailed information about their activities. He identified a man with a split lip, wearing a purple shirt and filthy white pants as "a beheader," saying he had killed at least 10 people.

"Cuts heads," wrote Capt. Noah Hanners, leader of Blue Platoon in the 3rd ACR's Eagle Troop, in blue magic marker on the man's forearm.

"You get treated special, buddy. Congratulations," Hanners said.

After conferring with the informant, the translator wrote on the white t-shirt of a man who had no identification papers: "His name is Nafe, but he is giving a different name."

Four others were identified as local insurgent cell leaders known as emirs, and had "emir" written on their arm. Several men had eagles tattooed on their arms, which the informant said indicated they were former members of the Fedayeen Saddam, a reputedly brutal militia run by Hussein's son, Uday. The informant slapped one man's tattoo and when the man protested, an Iraqi soldier smacked him across the face with the back of his hand.

"Don't be slapping them," Hanners warned. "That's not how we do this."

Some of the American soldiers taunted the detainees by asking them, "Can you say Abu Ghraib?" referring to the prison west of Baghdad from which photographs of prisoner abuse emerged last year.

"No, Guantanamo," one smiling captive responded, referring to the U.S. military prison in Cuba where suspected terrorists are held. "I just don't want to go to the Iraqi Army or police."

"Your source is not good, these are all innocent men," said one of the detainees, wearing a gray dishdasha, who said he was a student in the city of Mosul, 40 miles to the east. "We are all Sunnis. That is why he chose us. He is Shia," he said referring to the informant. Hanners said the quality of the informants has varied widely. "Some seem to say what they think you want to hear," he said. "Others give us information that pans out."

Another soldier, who asked not to be named because he said he would be punished by commanders for his criticism, had a more negative view of the sources' performance. "We almost never get anything good from them," he said. "I think they just pick people from another tribe or people who owe them money or something."

Before loading onto trucks and returning to their base, the Kurdish soldiers lined up behind the detainees and posed for digital pictures. They threw packages of food and bottles of water to a large group of children assembled across the road, many of whose fathers had been detained.

Some children picked up the gifts, but several grabbed them and threw them at the departing army vehicles. One truck quickly stopped and a soldier got out and pointed his pistol at the children, causing them to scatter briefly, before he drove away.

Soldiers and some neighborhood children gave the detainees food and water as they waited in the 100-degree heat for trucks to arrive to transport them to Camp Sykes. A woman in a long purple dress and white headscarf shouted at the remaining soldiers in Turkish and others began to gather behind her.

"I give this 30 minutes before it gets out of hand," said Sfc. Herbet Gadsden, surveying the scene. "We have to get these people out of here before their families go nuts."

DOJ_NMG_0004579

At noon, two trucks arrived. Soldiers lined up the detainees, photographed each one with a digital camera, and loaded them aboard. The crowd of family members faded back into their homes. "Another day of making friends," Hanners said, shaking his head.

Envoy: Patience Waning On Syria (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Syria is harboring training camps for Iraqi insurgents, U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said Monday. U.S. patience with Syria is running out, he said.

The United States has ruled out no option, including military force, for dealing with the government of Syrian President Bashar Assad, Khalilzad said during a State Department briefing with reporters. Syria is already under U.S. economic sanctions.

Administration officials have repeatedly accused Syria of allowing insurgents to travel to Iraq, but it was the first time an official has publicly named specific cities — Aleppo, Latakia and Damascus — as training sites. Asked whether he had proof, Khalilzad said, “I wouldn't say anything that I wasn't sure about.”

Khalilzad said Syria is a bigger threat to Iraq than Iran and more of a problem than Pakistan had been for Afghanistan. He called Syria “the No. 1 offender” in the region to “the success of Iraq.”

Syrian officials couldn't be reached immediately for comment but have denied such charges in the past. Mourhaf Jouejati, a Syrian-American professor of political science and international affairs at George Washington University, said the Bush administration “always has these accusations but never produces any evidence.”

The administration has been intensifying pressure on Syria over both Iraq and Lebanon, where a United Nations-backed panel is investigating alleged Syrian involvement in the Feb. 14 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Jouejati said the United States hopes the probe will incriminate Syria and serve as a basis for U.N. sanctions.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans a meeting on Lebanon next week at the United Nations, where world leaders are congregating for a summit. She excluded Syria's foreign minister. Assad doesn't plan to attend the summit.

American Envoy Says Syria Assists Training Of Terrorists (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - The United States ambassador to Iraq lashed out at Syria on Monday, saying that its government continued to allow terrorists to operate training camps within Syria that have sent hundreds of insurgents into Iraq.

"Our patience is running out," said the ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad.

While other administration officials made similar accusations early this year, the focus of American attention to Syria in recent months has been its occupation of Lebanon. Over the summer, Syria said that it had cracked down on insurgents operating within its territory.

But Mr. Khalilzad, in remarks to reporters in Washington, made it clear that the United States believed that Syria was providing assistance to insurgents operating in Iraq and that such help might have increased.

Government-controlled Syrian newspapers "glorify the terrorists as resistance fighters," he said. Syrian authorities "allow youngsters misguided by Al Qaeda - from Saudi Arabia, from Yemen, from North Africa - to fly into Damascus International Airport," attend training camps and then cross into Iraq, he contended.

Imad Moustapha, the Syrian ambassador to the United States, called Mr. Khalilzad's allegations "100 percent rubbish," and said Syria had repeatedly invited American and Iraqi officials to discuss the problem and find solutions. But, he added, neither country had responded.

"We have more troops on our border with Iraq than we have ever had before" as well as "sandbags, barbed wire," Mr. Moustapha said. "We understand the stakes are high."

The Americans, Ambassador Moustapha said, "just continue talking as if they're talking to a TV camera."

For all of Mr. Khalilzad's assertions and warnings, senior American officials said the government did not have any plans for new actions against Syria, except to "continue trying to isolate it, as we have been," as one senior State Department official put it.

Another government official said Bush administration policy was to "keep the heat on Syria, keep the criticism up."

He said the administration had picked up indications that the United Nations investigation of the assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri in February might implicate senior Syrian government leaders. The chief United Nations investigator, Detlev Mehlis, arrived in Damascus on Monday to question senior Syrian officials.

DOJ_NMG_0004580

If those indications prove true, the official added, the administration was poised to pounce on Syria and perhaps offer a new, critical resolution to the United Nations Security Council.

Mr. Khalilzad's statements, he added, fell into the general policy of "focusing more attention on Syria's negative activities."

Mr. Khalilzad said insurgents were traveling to Damascus as well as to Latakia, a seaport, and Aleppo, near the border with Turkey. From these and other locations, "people are coming out from Syria to Iraq to kill Iraqis," he said.

"Syria has to decide what price it's willing to pay in making Iraq's success difficult," he added.

In addition to his remarks on Syria, Mr. Khalilzad offered an unusual plea for continued American support for Iraq, even as numerous recent public opinion polls have indicated that public support was waning, particularly after Hurricane Katrina.

"The American public needs to know that what's involved here is huge, as what we did with the Soviet Union was huge," he said. "Iraq is the centerpiece of the defining challenge of our time."

Mr. Khalilzad explained that during his confirmation hearings last summer, he "got a sense" of "a crisis of confidence, perhaps, in what we're doing in Iraq." Now, following Hurricane Katrina, he added, "I can understand" that "there will be a focus, as there should be, on dealing with that crisis."

Still, he spent several minutes trying to explain why Americans should care about Iraq.

"Iraq is part of this region that we call a vital part of the world" that is "producing most of the security problems of this era," he said. "And the way to deal with it is to get Iraq right, first."

Intel Chief: Iraqis In Insurgency More Elusive (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence is struggling to expose elements of the insurgency in Iraq made up of former members of Saddam Hussein's regime, John Negroponte, the nation's intelligence chief, said in an interview Monday.

Joint U.S.-Iraqi military efforts have damaged the network of foreign insurgents led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, though Zarqawi himself remains at large, Negroponte said. Indigenous Iraqi insurgents, led by former members of Saddam's ruling Baath Party, have been tougher to track down.

The “former regime elements … seem to have very good operational secrecy,” Negroponte said in a wide-ranging interview with USA TODAY reporters. “And thus far it's not been that easy to make a dent in that part of the insurgency.”

Though foreign fighters, mainly Sunni Muslim Arabs from Syria and Saudi Arabia, have grabbed headlines with suicide bombings that have killed hundreds of Iraqis, Negroponte said Iraqis dominate the insurgency. Despite intense focus on Iraq, where 138,000 U.S. troops are deployed, U.S. intelligence has not been able to produce anything more than a “speculative” estimate of the insurgency's size, he said.

Based on everything he has seen, Negroponte said, the insurgency is neither gaining strength nor weakening appreciably. The insurgency's stubborn resistance to U.S. and Iraqi military efforts has complicated the development of a democracy.

Negroponte became the nation's first director of national intelligence in April after nine months as U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Congress created the post last year in response to independent commissions that laid out major intelligence failures prior to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. He has spent much of his time in the job setting up special centers overseeing counterterrorism and weapons proliferation. “Mission managers” will be named soon for human intelligence, Iran and North Korea, Negroponte said.

Although the Office of the Director of National Intelligence was created in an atmosphere of urgency, “it's really a start-up organization,” he said. “It's work in progress.”

In his first media interview since assuming the intelligence post, Negroponte also said:

·Despite significant failures before 9/11 and the Iraq war, U.S. intelligence “is second to none compared to any other intelligence organization in the world.” His task is “making it even better.”

·Al-Qaeda, though weakened by the U.S.-led global war on terrorism, continues to plan and organize terrorist attacks and regards the U.S. homeland as its top-priority target. Western Europe, Negroponte said, is more vulnerable than the USA to al-Qaeda.

·A viable Iraqi government has been slow in getting organized because the war led to the “degradation … of virtually every single government department. … They basically had to start practically from scratch.”

Negroponte, 66, spoke in a secure room of his office's headquarters a block from the White House. A career diplomat with Foreign Service commissions signed by every president back to Dwight Eisenhower, Negroponte got his first overseas experience in South Vietnam in the early 1960s. He has been ambassador to Honduras, Mexico, the Philippines, the United Nations and Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0004581

When he appointed Negroponte, President Bush emphasized that the new chief needed broad powers over spending and personnel across military and civilian intelligence agencies.

Nevertheless, Negroponte said he cannot rule the 15 intelligence agencies "by fiat" but must "foster a strong sense of community" among organizations that have not always cooperated.

Negroponte said he is close to making a major decision on whether to go forward with a highly classified imagery intelligence network. According to Steve Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists, the program probably concerns a costly network of satellites capable of evading radar, reflecting a Defense Department concern about the possibility that an adversary might attempt to "blind" U.S. intelligence operations by attacking its satellites.

Negroponte praised Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for helping the "lash-up between domestic and foreign" intelligence, which the 9/11 Commission called a major contributor to lapses before 9/11.

Following the report of the so-called WMD Commission, which examined the incorrect prewar estimates that Iraq had chemical and biological weapons and an active nuclear weapons development program, Negroponte said he is creating new standards on rating the veracity of clandestine intelligence sources. He is also improving the description of sources behind intelligence assessments.

Why Iraq's Sunnis Won't Deal (WP)

By Gary Schmitt

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Despite efforts by Shiites, Kurds and U.S. officials to find a way for Iraq's Sunni Muslims to support the draft constitution, it seems less and less likely that a deal will be struck, which raises the question: Is there any road forward that leads to a stable, democratic Iraq?

The answer is yes. But it's not an easy path. Nor is it one that most commentators and diplomats seem to understand, let alone advocate. The reality is that a stable, democratic Iraq, with large-scale Sunni participation, is unlikely until the insurgency in Iraq is widely seen by the Sunnis themselves as not succeeding.

Of course, the Sunni Arabs of Iraq are not a monolith. Many of them want a new political order for their country, and many undoubtedly will participate in the coming referendum to vote the proposed constitution up or down. Indeed, there are even reports out of western Iraq that Sunnis are now fighting Abu Musab Zarqawi's fighters.

Nevertheless, to the mind of probably a majority of their leaders, the Sunnis face two fundamental choices, neither pleasant. They can accept the new constitution, in which, as a minority, they lose their long-held dominance over Iraq. Or they can continue to reject the constitution and hope that a prolonged insurgency will somehow bring them back to power. With jihadists willing to kill themselves in terrorist attacks and a ready supply of young, unemployed Iraqis willing to bury explosives and launch rocket attacks for a few dinar, the average member of the Sunni elite, even if not an active participant in the insurgency, could well believe that the resulting chaos and even occasional death of a neighbor or a member of his extended family is a price worth paying for a return to Sunni ascendancy.

In fact, too many Sunnis believe the insurgency and the threat of a prolonged insurgency are their hole cards to play. Irrespective of the fact that their demands cannot be met without losing, in turn, Iraq's critical majority -- the Shiites -- Sunni leaders still live in a world that is about past prominence and future expectations. And until a new reality is forced upon them, they are not likely to move from their current opposition to the constitution.

The proposed constitution ought to be reasonably attractive in many respects. The Sunni Arabs are a decided minority in Iraq, certainly no more than a quarter of the population. And the federalist features of the draft document may well be a better guardian of their rights than a unitary state in which majority rule would probably leave them routinely short of the voting strength necessary to have an effective say in their own governance. In addition, the new constitution provides for a distribution of oil revenue along per capita lines, preventing either the Kurdish north or Shiite south from hoarding the country's wealth. By any realistic metric for the Muslim Middle East, the constitution put forward by Iraq's constitutional drafters is about as good as it gets, and far better for the country's minorities than the Sunnis should have expected, given the ruthlessness of their own rule over the past several decades.

But whatever the constitution's merits, that is not how the majority of Sunni leaders sees things today. And only when they see that the insurgency stands no chance of succeeding and, equally important, they personally are not in danger of losing life and limb if they publicly support the new political order, will they come around to accepting a federal, democratic Iraq.

Contrary to most commentary, then, the key to succeeding in Iraq is no longer putting in place a grand political bargain in which Iraqis of all sectarian stripes live happily ever after. In fact, by suggesting that this is the goal, we probably have fueled the Sunnis' own misperception of their future status in Iraq and hardened their own position.

The goal, of course, is to create a political order by which Iraq is made relatively stable and the normal democratic politics of give-and-take are made possible. But that will be a decidedly uphill struggle until the prospect of a successful insurgency is taken off the table and the Sunni Arabs come to the understanding that the new constitution is, in practice, a pretty good deal after all.

Politics cannot solve what ails Iraq now. It can help, and certainly the constitution is an important step in that direction. But at the end of the day, it's only when the so-called dead-enders are either dead or vanquished that one can count on the political process moving decisively forward as most Iraqis desire.

U.S. Indicts Dutchman In Iraq Insurgency (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Federal prosecutors have indicted a Dutch resident for conspiring to kill members of the U.S. armed forces in Iraq -- the first criminal charges filed in connection with the insurgency against American forces in that country.

The indictment, filed Friday afternoon in U.S. District Court in Washington, charges Iraqi-born Wesam Delaema, 32, who is in Dutch custody, with conspiring to bomb U.S. convoys in Fallujah, Iraq.

Despite attacks every day against U.S. forces in Iraq, these are the first criminal charges to be filed against anyone involved with them. The United States government claims jurisdiction over terrorist slayings of U.S. citizens anywhere in the world.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for federal prosecutors in Washington, said the federal courts in the capital have jurisdiction over crimes committed in "the extraterritorial jurisdiction of the United States"; that the suspect was in the custody of a friendly power; and that there was clear evidence in the form of video recordings.

"Everything just came together for this one case," Mr. Phillips said, adding that prosecutors were preparing an extradition request.

A Dutch official at the embassy in Washington said extradition hearings could take up to a year, but that if the courts cleared the way, the government almost certainly would accede to the U.S. request.

"The minister [making the decision] will want to ensure that the Netherlands continues to be a good ally in the war on terror," said Richard Gerding, the counsel for justice and home affairs at the Royal Netherlands Embassy.

The indictment and other court documents say Mr. Delaema was arrested in May in the Dutch city of Amersfoort, after a search of his apartment turned up "videotapes and other visual recordings ... of numerous attacks against American and coalition personnel in Iraq."

The documents charge that authorities recovered video recordings that Mr. Delaema had made of a trip to Iraq in October 2003, when he drove to Fallujah, where U.S. authorities say he was born, in his car, an Opel Omega.

"While in Iraq," the documents say, "Delaema traveled to an area near Fallujah, Iraq, where he met with at least six other individuals.

"Delaema and his associates, each of whom wore a hooded mask over his head, created a video of their meeting" during which "Delaema gave a speech in Arabic" proclaiming his associates and himself as "the Mujahedin of Fallujah."

Mr. Delaema and his associates also videotaped themselves demonstrating how to bury improvised explosive devices under the road, and to detonate them by remote control.

On the video, they discussed the value of separating charges by 50 feet or more in order to strike more than one vehicle in the convoy, the documents say.

TV 'Cops' Reality Show Is Talk Of Kirkuk (WT/AP)

By Tini Tran, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

KIRKUK, Iraq -- Shattered glass, body parts, a blood-splattered blue sedan -- the grainy video pans over the scene as Iraqi officers comb the site of a drive-by assassination.

It's the Iraqi version of the television program "Cops," minus the "Bad Boys" soundtrack, but otherwise roughly modeled after the American show.

Created to make government more transparent, "The Cops Show," featuring Kirkuk officers in action, is the first of its kind in the country and is breaking new ground in Iraqi television. A live call-in portion gives the public the chance to praise the security forces or gripe about them.

DOJ_NMG_0004583

Screened weekly on Kirkuk Television, which broadcasts in this northern city of nearly 1 million people, "The Cops Show" has opened the floodgates in a community long suppressed.

"During Saddam Hussein's time, it was very different," station manager Nasser Hassan Mohammed said. "You were unable to ask questions. You couldn't say anything bad about police.

"Now people can call in directly. Anyone has the right to do this. This is the difference now. This is freedom."

The call-in portion, initially a novelty, has become a staple of the show, and panelists field up to 30 calls per segment, Mr. Mohammed said. And because Kirkuk is ethnically mixed, the show switches among the languages spoken by Kurds, Arabs, Turkomen or Assyrians.

It took Iraqis a while to master the art of the phone-in.

"But after more than a year, they understand very well," Mr. Mohammed said.

Col. Gordon Petrie, the show's American military adviser, said it marks a new era for community-service television.

"There has been a sea change in media," said Col. Petrie, who heads public affairs for the 116th Brigade Combat Team. "Before 2003, it was all Saddam, all the time.

"Kirkuk, which was one of the largest TV stations, basically was robotic. They'd get the Baghdad feed and send it out again. Now they are in charge here."

Until January's landmark elections, the Americans "ran the shows, booked the guests, and tried to show them what community-service programming was about. But after Jan. 30, we became the monitors. They haven't disappointed us," Col. Petrie said.

The show also aims to change a Saddam-era image of police as corrupt, inept and unapproachable.

"The first thing we wanted was to show friendship between citizens and police. They are not your enemy. They are your friend," Mr. Mohammed said.

Provincial police Chief Gen. Sherko Shakir has appeared as a guest several times. His spokesman, Abdullah Abdul-Qadir, is host and moderator. During a recent taping, the panelists included Kirkuk's police chief, Gen. Burhan Taha, and two local police station commanders.

The show opened with graphic videotape of the body of an off-duty police captain, assassinated just days after his wedding. Gen. Taha decried the shooting as a "cowardly job" and urged the public to help.

"Don't be afraid. Give tips anonymously. That way, you can stop bad activities," he said.

Callers were just as quick to demand more of their local police force.

"I was standing on the main road near bridge No. 3. I saw some criminal activity. We don't have security in our area. Sometimes, we have to secure the area by ourselves," one man said.

The show's popularity has not gone unnoticed by its enemies, and the studios are heavily guarded. The station's employees regularly get threats, Mr. Mohammed said, adding that he himself was hit by more than two dozen bullets during an assassination attempt in May 2004.

The station remains undeterred, the station manager said.

"After liberation, many things changed. Many dreams were realized. We use freedom and democracy," he said. "Our duty is to show people that freedom."

Pakistan Offers To Build Security Fence (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Chafing under criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to fight terrorism, President Pervez Musharraf offered Monday to build a security fence to deter militants and drug merchants from entering the country from Afghanistan. “We are fed up with people who say Pakistan has to do more to counter terrorism,” Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri said. Osama bin Laden is believed to be hiding in the border area.

Musharraf made the offer at a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, “We think it is important that Pakistan and Afghanistan take up this idea.” President Bush meets with Musharraf today.

Protestants riot for third night in Belfast

Protestants blocked roads in Belfast, Northern Ireland, and rioted for the third straight night. At least 50 officers were wounded over the weekend when extremists fought riot police and British troops in the worst Protestant violence in a decade. The rampage followed British authorities' decision Saturday to reroute a parade by the Orange Order, Northern Ireland's major Protestant brotherhood, off the main road.

It's official: Japan's ruling party wins

DOJ_NMG_0004584

Japan's ruling Liberal Democratic Party won 296 seats in the 480-seat lower house of parliament in last week's election, well above the 241 needed for a majority, according to official results released today. Bolstered by seats from its ally, the New Komei Party, the coalition garnered 327 seats. That gives it the two-thirds majority needed to override votes in the upper house, said Kiyoko Seki of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications. Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi called the elections last month after the upper house rejected his plan to privatize the postal service.

Father, son hijack plane, then surrender

A father in a wheelchair and his son used two grenades to hijacked a Colombian airliner but peacefully surrendered five hours later after allowing the crew and passengers to leave the plane, said Martin Gonzalez, spokesman for the Civil Aviation Authority.

The freed hostages said that the elder hijacker had said he was partially paralyzed by a police bullet during a drug raid 14 years ago and had unsuccessfully sought compensation. Sen. Carlos Moreno, who helped negotiate the standoff, said the man was given a $43,000 check but the government won't honor it.

Ukraine's former PM vows comeback

Ukraine's ousted prime minister said President Viktor Yushchenko had become afraid of her growing popularity and she predicted she would regain her job after March elections. Yulia Tymoshenko said she expected that her bloc would win a majority in March and, under constitutional changes to take effect next year, that the prime minister would be chosen by the parliamentary majority, not by the president. Yushchenko dismissed Tymoshenko and her Cabinet on Thursday amid allegations of corruption that he said had sidetracked the pro-Western “Orange Revolution” that swept them to power in December.

Zimbabwe curbs constitutional rights

Zimbabwe President Robert Mugabe has signed into law constitutional changes he said would settle any dispute over the legality of seizing white-owned farms. During a state visit to Cuba, Mugabe said he had approved the laws passed two weeks ago by the parliament. One strips landowners of their right to appeal expropriation and declares that all real estate is on a 99-year lease from the government. Another lets the government deny passports to its critics. The opposition Movement for Democratic Change denounced the changes as “a dark day for Zimbabwean democracy.”

21 Afghan Candidates Disqualified For Ties To Militias (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 12 -- Twenty-one candidates running in Afghanistan's upcoming legislative election have been disqualified for maintaining links to illegal armed militias and seven more for failing to resign from government posts, the joint Afghan and international Electoral Complaints Commission announced Monday.

The move, six days before the Sunday vote, followed dismay among many Afghans over the commission's decision two months ago to exclude only 11 of nearly 6,000 candidates on the basis of failure to disarm. Six others were barred for retaining official positions.

The voting will be Afghanistan's first parliamentary election in more than two decades. The electorate is to choose 249 representatives for the lower house of parliament as well as members of 34 provincial councils that will help select the upper house.

The latest disqualifications did not satisfy human rights advocates who have expressed concern that the field of contenders is rife with warlords who committed well-documented atrocities during warfare that began in 1978.

"We're definitely happy to see more names excluded, and to see some mid-ranking names this time as opposed to just district-level people," said Joanna Nathan, Afghanistan director of the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based advocacy organization. "But there's still widespread disappointment that the big names are not on there."

Nathan said officials in Kabul consider these people untouchable for "reasons of national stability. The past abusers are the ones who continue to abuse power today."

Grant Kippen, chairman of the electoral commission, countered that the body did not have the power to disqualify a candidate on grounds of war crimes unless there had been a conviction. That is a virtual impossibility because Afghanistan has no war crimes tribunals.

"We can't deal with complaints that are simply allegations," Kippen said. "Our mandate is to deal with offenses under electoral law. We're not a criminal court."

Kippen said the commission relied on the recommendations of a disarmament commission that includes representatives of the Afghan government, the United Nations, the U.S. military and a NATO-led international force to determine which candidates retained associations with banned armed groups.

Nathan and other rights advocates have complained that the commission is dominated by the government of President Hamid Karzai and that its work is largely secret. "It's all about bargaining behind closed doors," Nathan said. Although the 21 excluded candidates came from a variety of provinces and ethnic groups, none is considered close to Karzai.

One of the candidates whose disqualification was announced Monday, a 46-year-old man using the single name Deedar, said he was never shown the evidence against him. "This is not a real and fair election. It's just like a show to deceive people," said Deedar, who is running for a seat in the lower house from the central Kabul district.

During his campaign, Deedar emphasized his past as a fighter against Soviet troops, who operated in Afghanistan from 1979 to 1989, while playing down his role as a low-level commander during the rule of the Islamic Taliban movement that took power in the mid-1990s. Deedar has denied belonging to the Taliban but acknowledges commanding men from his own tribe who sometimes helped the Taliban. Several former Taliban officials said he led more than 100 men from a base in Kabul.

Several months ago, Deedar, who has spent most of his time in Pakistan since the Taliban's ouster in 2001, was able to return to Afghanistan under a government program to reintegrate former Taliban members who are willing to pledge allegiance to the government.

On Monday, Deedar said his disqualification from the parliamentary race would discourage others from taking part in the program. "People who want to reconcile will look at my case and conclude that it's hopeless," he said.

He also predicted that he and other excluded candidates could still technically win, since it is too late to take their names off ballots. "I've tried to reach my supporters to let them know I'm no longer eligible. But many of them still don't know," he said. "And I am very popular."

Army Expects To Miss Goals For Recruiting (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 (Reuters) - The Army posted its best recruiting month in four years in August, but will still miss its annual recruiting goal for the first time since 1999, officials said Monday.

In August, the regular Army sent more recruits to boot camp than in any other month since July 2001. But the part-time Army National Guard and Army Reserve both missed their monthly goals and will fall far short of their annual goals for the 2005 fiscal year, which ends this month.

The regular Army, which is aiming for 80,000 recruits this year, was behind its year-to-date goal by the end of August, with too big a deficit to make up through September's recruiting, officials said.

The Marine Corps made its August goal and was 2 percent ahead of its year-to-date goal. The Air Force and Navy both achieved their targets.

Reflecting the regular Army's struggle, the situation was worse in the National Guard, which is under the command of state governors, and in the Reserve. These part-time troops can be called to active duty by the Pentagon; they now make up about 40 percent of the United States force in Iraq.

The Army National Guard has missed its recruiting targets every month this fiscal year and appeared certain to miss its third straight annual recruiting goal.

The Guard missed its recruiting goal by 18 percent in August and was 12,683, or 22 percent, behind its year-to-date goal. Its recruiting goal for this fiscal year is 63,002.

The Army Reserve, which last missed an annual goal in 1999, was short of its August target by 9 percent and was 19 percent behind its year-to-date target. It will also miss its 2005 goal of 28,485 recruits.

The Army has attributed the recruiting shortfalls to a growing wariness about military service because of the Iraq war and an economy that was creating more civilian jobs.

The Army has increased financial incentives for enlistment, added recruiters and bought advertisements appealing to patriotism.

In July, the Pentagon asked Congress to raise the maximum age for military enlistment to 42. The ceiling now is 35 for active duty and 39 for the Reserves or National Guard.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UPDATE: OFHEO Settles Administrative Case Against Freddie (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, September 12, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004586

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Freddie Mac's (FRE) (FRE) regulator settled its case against the company for failing to properly penalize former top executives in 2003 after Freddie discovered widespread accounting problems and evidence of earnings manipulation, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight announced Monday.

The company agreed Friday to turn over new documents and to help OFHEO pursue separate cases against Freddie's former Chief Executive Leland Brendsel and former Chief Financial Officer Vaughn Clarke.

Freddie is still struggling to emerge from an accounting scandal that resulted in a clean sweep of the company's senior management team, an overhaul of internal controls, an earnings restatement of more than $5 billion, multiple shareholder lawsuits and federal regulatory probes. OFHEO is the only regulator to settle its case against Freddie, which agreed to pay OFHEO $125 million and agreed to other remedial actions in December 2003 to settle charges of safety and soundness violations.

OFHEO, however, filed separate charges against Freddie Mac (FRE), Brendsel and Clarke that month seeking cease-and-desist orders from an administrative law judge to force the company to alter its termination agreements with the two men and to impose fines against them. Freddie's board of directors allowed Brendsel to retire and Clarke to resign in June 2003 with roughly $56 million and $1.2 million in severance and other pay, respectively.

OFHEO's settlement with Freddie, which was signed Friday, only settles the regulator's administrative case against the company regarding the nature of Brendsel and Clarke's departures. Parallel investigations related to Freddie's accounting troubles by the Justice Department, Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission and others, are still pending.

All told, Brendsel stands to lose at least $34 million, including $24.4 million in lost severance and benefits, $5.8 million in fines and $3.8 million in past bonuses. Clarke's potential losses are substantially less - $3.9 million, two-thirds of which was a fine.

Freddie temporarily withheld some of the executives' pay at OFHEO's urging. A judge, however, ruled about a year ago that OFHEO's informal directive was illegal and required the company to release Brendsel's pay pending the outcome of OFHEO's enforcement actions against the executives.

"We have consistently made clear that we will comply with any valid and effective order from OFHEO. Under the consent order today we're simply agreeing to implement any final order that results from the pending proceedings between OFHEO and Brendsel and Clarke," Freddie Mac (FRE) spokeswoman Sharon McHale said.

Freddie agreed to turn over to OFHEO more internal documents, including the company's "earnings management" binders, materials on executive compensation, internal reports on the company's accounting and materials produced by outside consultants, among other things. OFHEO specifically requested internal documents by consulting firm McKinsey & Co. on derivatives accounting rules as well as all documents relating to McKinsey's consulting work on "MRE Accountabilities and Staffing v. Best Practices."

OFHEO also asked for a number of internal documents relating to the company's reaudit, including internal audit reports and board meeting minutes recorded after Freddie's board ousted Brendsel and Clarke and fired former Chief Operating Officer David Glenn.

Freddie agreed to convert Brendsel's and Clarke's departures to firings only if OFHEO prevails in its court cases against the men. The company said it would also try to recoup their severance pay, within legal bounds, only if OFHEO additionally orders Freddie to do so. OFHEO is pursuing separate enforcement actions against the men in legal action before an administrative law judge at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, OFHEO's parent regulator.

If OFHEO prevails, the agreement will make it easier for OFHEO to enforce penalties against Brendsel and Clarke since Freddie waived its rights to appeal or challenge the administrative court's decision.

"This settlement with the company is a significant step forward and allows us to focus our resources on the cases against former (Freddie) officers," OFHEO acting Director Stephen Blumenthal said in a statement announcing the deal Monday.

For Freddie, which didn't admit or deny any wrongdoing, the settlement brings to close all potential enforcement action or penalties OFHEO could have imposed on the company for not penalizing Brendsel and Clarke for their involvement in Freddie's accounting problems.

Freddie Mac To Aid Effort To Recover Millions From Ex-Officers (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Freddie Mac, the mortgage reseller recovering from an accounting scandal, will assist federal regulators in their effort to recover millions of dollars in benefits and bonuses paid to two of its former executives, under terms of a settlement made public yesterday by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight.

The agreement comes nearly two years after Freddie Mac, which buys mortgages from lenders and resells them to investors as securities, paid a $125 million penalty to settle charges related to its accounting, as part of a related settlement with its regulator, known as Ofheo.

"This settlement with the company is a significant step forward and allows us to focus our resources on the cases against former officers," Stephen A. Blumenthal, acting director of Ofheo, said in a statement.

The two executives in question are Leland C. Brendsel, the former chief executive at Freddie Mac, and Vaughn A. Clarke, its former chief financial officer. Both men left Freddie Mac in June 2003, several months into an expanding investigation of the company's accounting.

Regulators began proceedings in December 2003 to force Freddie Mac to treat Mr. Brendsel and Mr. Clarke as if they were fired, which would have made them ineligible for millions of dollars in benefits and bonuses they received when they left the company.

Ofheo is trying to force the executives to return that money.

According to an Ofheo spokeswoman, if Mr. Brendsel loses the case entirely, he could have to pay at least $34 million, and if Mr. Clarke loses, he could have to pay at least $4 million. Some of the money would go to the company and any civil penalties would be paid to the Treasury Department.

Lawyers for Mr. Brendsel and Mr. Clarke did not return phone calls yesterday afternoon. The case against both men is before an administrative law judge and both sides are gathering evidence, according to Ofheo and Freddie Mac.

David Palombi, a spokesman for Freddie Mac, said the consent decree merely codified the company's longstanding position on the litigation by regulators. "We have consistently made clear that we would comply with any valid order from the regulator," Mr. Palombi said. "We have simply agreed, in effect, to implement any final order" that results from the legal proceedings against Mr. Brendsel and Mr. Clarke, he said.

As part of the agreement with Ofheo, Freddie Mac will provide to the agency copies of the same documents it gave to lawyers who brought shareholder lawsuits against it.

The company will also help make employees available for interviews by the agency and will provide various internal documents, such as explanations of how executives' bonuses were calculated.

Freddie Mac's accounting woes began when its results were questioned in 2003 by PricewaterhouseCoopers, which the year before had replaced the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, which is now defunct.

In November 2003, Freddie Mac restated its earnings for 2000, 2001 and the first three quarters of 2002, revising them upward by nearly $5 billion.

In a report on the questionable accounting, Ofheo found that "Freddie Mac cast aside accounting rules, internal controls, disclosure standards and the public trust in the pursuit of steady earnings growth."

Yesterday, shares of Freddie Mac closed at $59.04, up 99 cents.

The accounting scandal at Freddie Mac and another at its larger corporate sibling, Fannie Mae, has led some to call for stronger regulation of the two companies.

Jury Convicts Westar Ex-Officials Of Looting Millions From Utility (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

KANSAS CITY, Kan. -- A federal jury found former Westar Energy Inc. Chief Executive Officer David Wittig and another executive guilty of looting the electric utility of millions of dollars.

Prosecutors claimed the two men, who were forced out of the Topeka, Kan., company in 2002, engineered extravagant salaries and benefits for themselves at the expense of shareholders, hiding much of their actions from the company's board and federal regulators.

Mr. Wittig and former Chief Strategy Officer Douglas Lake were found guilty of conspiracy, wire fraud, circumventing internal controls and money laundering.

The jury deliberated for 7½ days before convicting Mr. Wittig on 39 counts and Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Each count of wire fraud, the most serious of the charges, is punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of as much as $1 million. Testimony about whether the government can recover money from the executives is expected to start Tuesday.

Attorneys on both sides declined to comment immediately after the verdicts. Messrs. Wittig and Lake have denied the charges, saying their actions were legal, approved by the company's directors, and disclosed in corporate filings.

Mr. Wittig, who became chief executive of Westar in 1998, helped to turn the Midwest utility into a fast-paced deal machine and hired Mr. Lake, a former colleague of his at what was then Salomon Brothers, to become his deputy. Mr. Wittig earned more than $25 million in his seven years at the company.

After some success, Westar's deal frenzy began to falter. The company's stock price fell from $44 to $9 and the company came under pressure from shareholders and regulators. In September 2002, Westar hired the New York law firm Debevoise & Plimpton LLP to conduct an internal investigation, which uncovered many of the details in the grand jury indictment.

The former executives' first trial ended in mistrial last year after jurors were unable to reach a consensus on more than half of the charges.

Ellison Agrees To Pay Charity To Settle Suit (WP)

By Ben White

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Oracle Corp. chief executive Lawrence J. Ellison tentatively agreed to pay $100 million to charity over five years to settle a private lawsuit in California accusing him of insider trading in Oracle stock, a plaintiff's lawyer in the case said yesterday.

Plaintiffs in the suit alleged that Ellison engaged in insider trading when he sold nearly $900 million worth of Oracle shares in January 2001, a little more than a month before the company announced poor earnings. Oracle shares fell 21 percent, to $16.88, after the announcement. Ellison had sold his stock for a little less than twice that amount.

The proposed settlement, reported yesterday by the New York Times and the San Jose Mercury News, must be approved by Oracle's board and a California judge. If approved, the deal would end what is known as a shareholder derivative lawsuit, an increasingly common type of civil case in which shareholders file suit on behalf of a company.

Monetary settlements in derivative cases have typically been small, and most of the money usually goes to plaintiff's attorneys. Companies often agree to make changes to the way they operate in order to settle the suits.

Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., an attorney for plaintiffs in the case, said the charity payments represent a compromise between the two sides. He said Oracle shareholders would benefit because the company will implement new insider-trading rules as part of the settlement.

A Delaware judge last year dismissed a similar derivative case against Ellison. A class-action suit stemming in part from the stock sales is pending in federal court. A trial judge dismissed the federal case, but an appeals court reinstated it.

Tabacco said Ellison may have chosen to settle the California derivative suit because the legal bar for proving insider trading appears to be lower in California than in Delaware. California law also provides for damages of up to three times the difference between the price at which someone buys or sells a stock and what the price would have been had the inside information been public. That left Ellison open to a potential judgment of $1.2 billion.

Tabacco said that as part of the deal, Oracle would pay $22.5 million to plaintiff's lawyers. An Oracle spokeswoman declined to comment. Forbes magazine last year estimated Ellison's worth at $13.7 billion. He owns about 1.3 billion Oracle shares, or 24.5 percent of the company's stock, according to a recent filing.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Costly Price Of Facing A Grand Jury (WP)

By Sam Coates

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Sympathy can be hard to come by for White House officials who are summoned to appear before a grand jury.

Those whose identities remain a secret suffer in silence, discouraged from reaching out to their closest friends for help. Those whose names leak into the public domain become lightning rods for rumor, suspicion and innuendo, as politicians, commentators and journalists try to divine a meaning behind each summons.

The latest White House staffer to face the grand jury is Susan B. Ralston, assistant to White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who gave testimony to the committee investigating the leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame.

But while the politics of every appearance is picked over in minute detail, there is also a human story to each summons that often goes unexplored.

Witnesses face stress, uncertainty and -- worst of all -- crippling lawyer's fees that can take years to pay off. And as prosecutors cast their net ever wider, inexperienced staffers with few financial assets are increasingly facing the emotional and financial burden of grand jury testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0004589

Ralston appeared at the end of July on the same day as former Rove aide Israel "Izzy" Hernandez, according to ABC News. The reason Ralston, 37, was asked to testify remains unclear, but it has heightened suspicions that the locus of the investigation still centers on Rove.

Ralston declined to discuss her interview with the grand jury for this article, or the burden that it has caused. Friends said she had not spoken with them about it.

Americans for Tax Reform President Grover G. Norquist, who described himself as a friend and a work contact, said he was not aware that she had even testified. "It hasn't come up, and I haven't noticed anything, in work or other contact. I think she's right as rain. On the other hand, I haven't had a conversation about it with her," he said.

But veterans of past grand jury appearances -- including the investigation into President Bill Clinton's affair with Monica S. Lewinsky -- said that keeping silent compounded an already difficult process.

"It was an incredibly callous and demoralizing experience, one in which they gave no thought to the personal or financial ramifications," said Neel Lattimore, former press secretary to first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, who was subpoenaed about 10 times during his tenure on the job. "Nothing prepares you for what it's like."

Another former Clinton administration official who is now in the private sector and did not want to be identified agreed. "It paralyzes you from doing your job. It turns your life upside down. I sat outside one grand jury room where I could hear the prosecutors screaming -- I'm not kidding -- screaming at a colleague of mine who was a witness."

The two former Clinton aides said that the financial burden was crippling. Like many others, these White House officials had to pay their own legal bills, and these can run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Some may qualify for a partial reimbursement from the Justice Department, but this usually covers a fraction of the outlay and can take as many as seven years to be paid out. White House aides are even barred from receiving free legal assistance.

"We spent our time on Capitol Hill, and none of us had any assets. It's a scary thing. Lots of people rented apartments, had no assets to their name," said the former Clinton staffer. "If you have a career in public service, you're being paid well under $100,000 a year, and you have student loans, you become paralyzed financially."

Lattimore said that he had to turn to his parents, who loaned him money to cover his legal fees. Lattimore's lawyer, Adam S. Hoffinger, said that the bill for representing someone in a grand jury investigation is usually large. "A white-collar grand jury investigation in D.C. or New York could cost a witness between $10,000 and $100,000 dollars, assuming no trial and no criminal exposure," he wrote in an e-mail.

According to a White House report to Congress, Ralston's salary last year was $67,600. In an interview last September with Asian Week, she said that she took a "significant pay cut" in 2001 from her job working with a prominent lobbyist.

Both former Clinton staffers who were asked to appear in the grand jury investigation said there was one silver lining to their experience. They both discovered that there was an informal support network of former White House employees who had been through the grand jury process that transcended party politics.

"There were people from the Reagan administration who reached out to me in the Clinton administration to say it was going to be okay and to say we've been through this," said the former Clinton staffer.

Lattimore cited Margaret Tutwiler, a long-term aide of James A. Baker III, who was caught up during the 1992 campaign in an investigation into Clinton's overseas trips as a student. He said she "expressed real sympathy and said hang in there. There was very much a sense of fraternity among White House employees no matter what side of the aisle."

FBI Intel Analyst Charged With Spying (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jeffrey Gold, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 13, 2005

(AP) - NEWARK, N.J.-An FBI intelligence analyst with top secret clearance who worked at a New Jersey Army base was charged Monday with passing classified information about Filipino leaders to current and former officials of that nation.

The analyst, Leandro Aragoncillo, sent some of the material to Michael Ray Aquino, a former deputy director of the Philippines National Police who lives in New York City, according to an FBI complaint unsealed with the arrests.

Aragoncillo, 46, of Woodbury, was hired to work at Fort Monmouth in July 2004 and began sending classified information and documents in January, according to the complaint.

From May to Aug. 15, Aragoncillo printed or downloaded 101 classified documents relating to the Philippines, of which 37 were classified "secret," the complaint said. Details of the documents' contents were not disclosed in court papers or in court.

The investigation by immigration authorities began after Aquino, 39, was arrested in March, accused of overstaying the tourist visa he used to enter the country in July 2001.

Aragoncillo, a Marine for 21 years, and Aquino were ordered held without bail following an appearance before a federal magistrate.

DOJ_NMG_0004590

The defendants face a charge of conspiracy and a charge of acting as unregistered foreign agents, the latter of which carries a sentence of up to 10 years and a $250,000 fine. Aragoncillo also was charged with unauthorized use of a government computer, which carries a sentence of up to 10 years and a $250,000 fine.

9th Circuit: Warrantless Searches Must Be Warranted (LAW)

By Pam Smith, The Recorder

Law.com, September 13, 2005

Even if a defendant agrees to warrantless searches in exchange for pretrial release, police still can't search him without probable cause, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday.

In a victory for the privacy rights of defendants awaiting trial while on their own recognizance, a 2-1 majority threw out evidence Nevada authorities had received by testing Raymond Scott for drugs without probable cause.

True, Scott had consented to random drug testing "by any peace officer without a warrant." But because the government did not have probable cause -- and could not show a "special need" to lower the bar -- the drug test violated Scott's Fourth Amendment rights, 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski wrote for the majority.

The panel says its opinion is one of first impression among all the federal circuit courts, and the dissenting judge predicted a widespread impact on federal and state pretrial proceedings.

By holding that probable cause is required for the warrantless search of a pretrial "releasee" or his home, "the majority casually adopts a rule that carries monumental implications for the pretrial procedures employed by every state in our circuit, as well as the United States," wrote 9th Circuit Judge Jay Bybee.

Scott was facing state charges of drug possession when he was released on his own recognizance, subject to several conditions, including warrantless drug and alcohol testing.

An informant's tip led authorities to check in on him at home, and when he tested positive for methamphetamine, they arrested him, searched his house and found a shotgun. A federal grand jury indicted him for illegal possession of the firearm, a federal district judge granted Scott's request to suppress the evidence and federal prosecutors appealed.

"Until today's decision we have not squarely addressed whether pretrial releasees have diminished Fourth Amendment rights," Bybee wrote.

Kozinski, backed by concurring 9th Circuit Judge William Fletcher, contrasted Scott's situation with that of probationers, who must submit to similar searches, writing, "Pretrial releasees are ordinary people who have been accused of a crime but are presumed innocent."

In a footnote, Kozinski added that while some of their freedoms, like the whim to travel, may still be limited, the 9th Circuit was considering "whether the accused may be made to suffer other burdens that are not designed to ensure his appearance in court."

Bybee disagreed, saying that the interests of the state should be weighed against the privacy interests of a defendant on pretrial release on a case-by-case basis.

"Scott's reasonable expectation of privacy may be somewhat greater than that of a probationer, parolee or pre-sentence releasee, but it is less than that of an 'ordinary citizen,'" Bybee wrote. And he lowered his own expectation of privacy when he agreed to the conditions of his own-recognizance release, Bybee added.

While Bybee says the majority opinion "carries monumental implications" for states that regularly make defendants facing drug charges agree to drug testing in exchange for O.R. release, Assistant Federal Public Defender Cynthia Hahn, who argued for Scott, isn't so sure.

It's difficult to predict how many cases could be affected by the opinion, she said, because Fourth Amendment cases can depend on so many case-specific facts. "I really couldn't even guesstimate how many people it could affect or won't affect," she said.

The U.S. Attorney for the District of Nevada has not decided whether to appeal, said spokeswoman Natalie Collins, who declined to comment further on the opinion.

The case is U.S. v. Scott, 05 C.D.O.S. 8214.

AU's Audit Of Spending By President To Wrap Up (WP)

By Valerie Strauss And Susan Kinzie

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

American University trustees are nearing completion of a probe into hundreds of thousands of dollars of questionable expenses by suspended President Benjamin Ladner and his wife, according to two sources with knowledge of the audit.

DOJ_NMG_0004591

The school's 25-member governing Board of Trustees will meet within a few weeks to discuss the results and decide how to proceed with Ladner, who became president of the private university in Northwest Washington in 1994.

Ladner was placed on administrative leave Aug. 24, a few months after the board began reviewing the expenses of the president and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner, who is described on the university's Web site as a volunteer who represents the Ladner presidency.

Ladner's duties are being carried out by the acting president, Cornelius M. Kerwin, who had been provost.

The audit was prompted by an anonymous letter detailing what it said were questionable travel and entertainment expenses by the Ladners, according to sources close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity to protect their role.

Ladner did not return repeated phone calls. His attorney, David Ogden, said that after reviewing the issues involved in the audit, "we are confident that it will result in a positive outcome for him."

Leslie E. Bains, the new chairman of the board under whom the investigation was launched, did not return numerous phone calls, and other trustees would not publicly discuss the probe.

A third source familiar with the investigation said that trustees were reviewing $300,000 to $400,000 in expenses over several years but that the total could be higher. Included was the use of a university car for personal reasons, the source said.

Reginald Green, one of Ladner's former chauffeurs, said the Ladners often used the university car for personal reasons, including requiring him to take in and pick up their laundry and the work shirts of their chef. Ladner hired the chef early in his tenure, raising eyebrows at the time about his spending.

Ladner's base salary last year was $633,000, according to Internal Revenue Service records.

Bankruptcy Clerk Accused Of Taking Bribe In FBI Sting (DAILYST)

By Chris Hack

Daily Southtown, September 13, 2005

A bankruptcy court clerk from Chicago's South Side has been charged with extortion, accused of accepting a bribe in an FBI sting.

Sandra D. Butler, 42, of the 1400 block of East 66th Place, was charged with a single count of extortion in a criminal complaint made public Monday.

Butler has been a clerk at U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Chicago since 1985. As a clerk she was assigned to a bankruptcy judge and handled paperwork from debtors filing bankruptcy petitions.

According to an FBI affidavit, agents first began investigating Butler three years ago after a debtor complained she had paid the clerk $5,000 to stop the foreclosure proceedings against her house but later learned the bribe was unnecessary. Under federal bankruptcy law, the filing of a Chapter 13 petition automatically stops any foreclosure proceedings on the homes of debtors.

Earlier this month, FBI agents filed a bogus Chapter 13 in Butler's courtroom and sent a fake debtor to see her. The undercover witness — who was wearing an audio and visual surveillance device — said his mortgage lender in Kentucky had initiated foreclosure proceedings and that he needed help saving his home, the FBI said.

After looking up the man's bankruptcy petition, Butler allegedly said she could make some phone calls "off the record" to stop the sale of his house, the FBI said. She pretended to call the Kentucky lender — which was fictitious — and then accepted $500 in cash from the man, according to the complaint.

Butler appeared briefly before a federal magistrate Monday and was released on her own recognizance.

Debtor Court Aide Charged In Scam (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 13, 2005

Prosecutors charged a courtroom deputy in U.S. Bankruptcy Court with attempted extortion Monday, alleging she solicited $500 from a debtor by promising to halt the sale of the debtor's house.

Authorities said Sandra Butler, 42, of the 1400 block of East 66th Place in Chicago, did not know that the debtor was working undercover with the FBI and that the bankruptcy case was part of a sting operation.

Butler had no power to influence the bankruptcy proceeding, but she acted otherwise, even pretending to call the debtor's bank to negotiate a more favorable repayment plan, according to an affidavit filed by FBI agent Kenneth Samuel. According to the affidavit, Butler, talking into a phone earlier this month, "asserted that she knew [the debtor] very well" and that while the amount "is supposed to be 10 percent, that was all [he] had."

DOJ_NMG_0004592

Butler then led the debtor to her office, where she took the money, according to the affidavit.

Butler appeared Monday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Sidney Schenkier. She was allowed to remain free on a $4,500 bail, and a court date was set for Sept. 27.

Butler was employed by Ken Gardner, clerk of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Chicago, and was assigned to the courtroom of Judge Jacqueline P. Cox. Gardner said he fired Butler from the $69,000-a-year job Monday morning.

"I'm shocked this would occur in the courthouse," Gardner said. "I'm shocked this would occur with someone working for me."

Butler had worked for the clerk's office since 1985 and had been assigned to Cox's courtroom for about two years, Gardner said. Bankruptcy Court officials cooperated with the sting operation, according to the affidavit.

The FBI became suspicious of Butler in August 2002, when a debtor in a bankruptcy case told them Butler had asked for $5,000 to stop the sale of her home, according to Samuel's affidavit. The debtor in that case later learned the money wasn't used for that purpose and contacted the FBI.

In the sting operation, FBI officials filed a fake bankruptcy case, giving the debtor a false name, Stanley Kozubal, and listing his home as an address in Des Plaines. The bankruptcy filing said Kozubal owed $130,000 to a bank in Kentucky.

The undercover witness was wearing an audio and video recording device when he went to Butler's office at the beginning of the month, according to the affidavit. He said he was afraid to lose his home and asked Butler for help.

"Butler responded that she could `off the record' make some phone calls to try and stop the sale of his property," Samuel said in the affidavit. "Butler asked the [debtor] if he had any `funds today.'"

Officials in U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald's office would not elaborate on Samuel's affidavit. A federal defender representing Butler could not be reached for comment.

Gardner said Monday that it was the first case of alleged corruption by a courtroom deputy in his four years as clerk.

Gardner said he would consider reforms. But he said that court rules already make clear that only staff at the court's intake window can collect money and that "there should be no transacting of money in the courtroom."

Prison Officials Investigated (TD)

By Bill Cotterell

Tallahassee Democrat, September 13, 2005

State and federal authorities are investigating the activities of prison officials in North Florida, where the regional director for the state Department of Corrections abruptly resigned last month.

FBI and state officials said Monday that no one has been arrested or indicted in the investigation, which has been the subject of heated discussion among corrections employees on computer bulletin boards and e-mail networks.

"There is an ongoing investigation regarding the Department of Corrections," FBI Special Agent Jeff Westcott said from Jacksonville. He declined to comment on specifics. The Florida Department of Law Enforcement, which also is involved in the investigation, declined to comment.

Allen Clark, Panhandle director of institutions, resigned without explanation Aug. 30. He supervised operations at 18 major prisons from Jefferson County to the Alabama line. Attempts to reach him and other North Florida prison officials were unsuccessful.

A corrections spokesman said Monday that he knew nothing except what was in Clark's four-sentence resignation letter. Gov. Jeb Bush, when asked about the inquiry, smiled and shrugged off the question. "How am I going to tell you that?" he asked. "That's a no-no."

The case is not related to the indictment last week of Allan Duffee, director of the now-defunct Correctional Privatization Commission, which was set up to oversee Florida's five privately run prisons. Duffee pleaded not guilty to federal accusations of skimming nearly $225,000 from a maintenance fund.

Clark's resignation letter expressed "great regret" but gave no reason for his departure.

"It has been a pleasure serving as Region I director of institutions," he wrote to Department of Corrections Secretary James Crosby. "I have made many friends over the years and wish you and the employees of the department much continued success."

Al Solomon, warden of the Apalachee Correctional Institution near Sneads, has been named interim chief for the region. Solomon, too, declined to comment on Clark.

Ford Gets Permission To Attend Conference In Washington (AP)

AP, September 13, 2005

MEMPHIS, Tenn. An indictment on bribery and extortion charges won't keep former state Senator John Ford from attending a convention of black business and political leaders in Washington, D-C.Ford, of Memphis, will attend the conference September 21st to 26th to look for new clients for his private consulting business.

U-S District Court Judge Daniel Breen gave Ford permission to leave the state for the convention.Since Ford is on bond awaiting trial, he cannot leave Tennessee without a judge's O-K.

Ford's work as a consultant for a TennCare subcontractor while still in the Senate was at the center of a debate on ethics that dominated much of the latest session of the General Assembly.

Ford is charged with bribery and extortion in an unrelated investigation focused on an F-B-I front company that sought favorable legislation from the General Assembly. He also is charged with threatening a federal witness.

Ford resigned from the Senate shortly after his indictment.

Ex-senator To Seek Consulting Work At Black Leaders' Meeting (TENN)

By BONNA de la CRUZ, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, September 13, 2005

Former state Sen. John Ford is planning a trip to Washington, D.C., to attend a black leaders' conference to drum up business for his private consulting business, according to court papers.

The Memphis Democrat, who is under house arrest on federal bribery and intimidation charges, got a judge's permission to travel to the "35th Annual Legislature Conference for Black Leaders and Businessmen."

In his request, he said his "ability to conduct his business on a national basis is necessary to offset the difficulties which have arisen locally due to negative publicity."

No listing for the "35th Annual Legislature Conference for Black Leaders and Businessmen" could be found, but the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation Inc.'s Annual Legislative Conference is in its 35th year and is being held Sept. 21-24 in Washington.

Ford was indicted in May — along with three other sitting lawmakers, a former senator and two bagmen — in Operation Tennessee Waltz on bribery and corruption charges. Ford was further accused of threatening and intimidating potential witnesses. At the time, he was still a state senator, but stepped down from his post two days after his indictment.

He was released on bail after his arrest but was subject to certain conditions, including a curfew, a requirement that he wear an electronic monitoring device, and a prohibition from traveling outside the Memphis area.

In court papers filed earlier this month, Ford asked U.S. District Judge Daniel Breen if he could attend the conference from Sept. 21-26, saying it is an essential aspect in his ability "to foster continued and new business relationships."

Ford said he had attended the conference in past years, and his attendance had helped his consulting business.

Federal prosecutors in Memphis did not object to the motion, spokeswoman Leigh Anne Jordan from the Memphis U.S. Attorney's Office said. The judge granted the request last Thursday.

Taxpayers will not be footing the bill, however, because Ford is no longer a member of the General Assembly. His attorney, Michael Scholl of Memphis, said he was not at liberty to discuss how Ford is covering expenses associated with the conference.

Ford's private consulting work while he was an elected official came under public scrutiny during the legislative session earlier this year.

In two cases, Ford's consulting work was linked to companies doing business with TennCare, the state's health insurance program for the poor and disabled. At the same time, he was chairman of the Senate General Welfare Committee and was a member of two other committees that oversaw TennCare.

Ford also has been a licensed funeral director and insurance agent.

The Congressional Black Caucus Foundation Inc.'s Annual Legislative Conference touts itself on its Web site as the "premier African American conference on policy issues."

The conference provides a platform for the 43 African-American members of Congress to talk about legislative items. And it's a meeting place for attendees interested in the health, economic, educational and political state of black communities, the Web site says.

Conference spokeswoman Patty Rice said the group does not provide information about attendees when asked to confirm Ford's registration.

Among those scheduled to speak is U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr. of Memphis, who is the nephew of John Ford. The congressman is to speak on national security, according to the conference's itinerary.

Others scheduled to speak include U.S. Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton, as well as actor Jamie Foxx.

Ford said he plans to go to trial in the Tennessee Waltz case. Three other defendants, including former state House member Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, have entered guilty pleas and await sentencing in February. ·

Details Of Cockfighting Raid Emerge (KNOXNS)

By J.J. STAMBAUGH

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), September 13, 2005

NEWPORT, Tenn. - Among the evidence compiled by the FBI before a June 11 raid on a cockfighting pit near Del Rio were aerial photographs and video surveillance of the facility, according to testimony heard last week.

A preliminary hearing Wednesday in Cocke County General Sessions Court provided many new details about the controversial raid, which was cloaked in secrecy as part of a sweeping four-year probe by federal and state authorities into organized crime and public corruption in Cocke County.

In fact, security leading up to the raid was so tight that most of the officers involved weren't told of the assignment until the day of the operation, according to state troopers.

Tennessee Highway Patrol Trooper Timothy Wolfenbarger was one of four troopers who testified at last week's hearing for nearly a dozen people accused of being spectators at a cockfight.

Wolfenbarger said the operation was orchestrated by the FBI and a federal SWAT team had been assigned to conduct the "initial sweep" on the compound. State troopers, who had been drawn from posts across the state, were ordered into the site after it was secured.

"They (the FBI) had surveillance videos aerial photographs," Wolfenbarger said. "They had a good plan."

The raid has drawn heated criticism from many cockfighters, who feel the raid was too violent and a waste of federal resources.

Scores of heavily armed federal and state agents backed up by snipers and three helicopters took part in the raid. Troopers issued misdemeanor state citations against 143 people, most of whom entered into plea agreements that kept them out of jail.

At least 11 of them, however, have opted to fight the charges.

After the Del Rio raid, federal prosecutors moved to seize both the Del Rio pit and a second alleged cockfighting operation near Newport, the 440 Cockfight Pit, arguing they were illegal gambling operations.

The FBI has said the Del Rio complex had enough bleachers to seat up to 500 people. The compound included a 5,000-square-foot, two-story metal building; a 3,000-square-foot, two-story building partitioned into rooms; a "gate shack" built along the gravel driveway leading up to the site; and "approximately 100 outbuildings, consisting of utility sheds and camping trailers," according to court records.

"I'd never seen anything like that before in my life," Trooper Wolfenbarger said. "It (the main building) was like a gymnasium. There were people sitting up in the arena area."

Wolfenbarger also said the show of force was justified because the officers and agents didn't know what they would encounter.

"Our job is dangerous enough, but anytime you go into the unknown you don't know what's going to happen," he said.

The troopers gave first-hand descriptions of the Del Rio pit and told of finding dead roosters in various places. They conceded during cross-examination, however, that they didn't actually see any of the defendants take part in or watch a cockfight.

Trooper Jim Lee said he saw "a lot of blood, feathers, dead roosters." He also said he was told by one of the suspects detained at the compound that "the blood on his shirt was from being too close."

Trooper Bob Brooks described a restaurant and gift shop on the property that sold T-shirts, caps, belt buckles and other memorabilia. The shop also sold metal gaffes, which are often placed on gamecocks when they fight, he said.

Defense attorney Joe Baker repeatedly solicited testimony from the troopers that they couldn't positively identify all the defendants in the courtroom as having been at the pit. He also stressed that none of the defendants were seen breaking the law and opined that there might have been legal reasons to be at the compound.

At one point, Baker asked Brooks if he would have arrested someone had they only been working at the restaurant and hadn't entered the building where the cockfighting allegedly took place.

"That's aiding and abetting to me," the trooper replied, comparing Baker's hypothetical scenario to someone "selling lemonade" while watching drug deals.

Baker argued unsuccessfully before Judge John Bell that the state's laws concerning cockfighting are vague when it comes to being a spectator at one of the events, which is a Class C misdemeanor punishable by a maximum fine of $50 and 30 days in jail.

DOJ_NMG_0004595

He also said that only three of his clients had been positively identified by the troopers in the courtroom and stressed the lack of evidence presented. "If this is the best the state and federal governments can do then I feel like (my clients') rights aren't protected," he said.

Bell sent the cases on to a grand jury for review but noted that, had the defendants been on trial, the evidence presented wouldn't have been enough to convict them.

During a preliminary hearing, Bell explained, prosecutors only have to show "some proof that a crime was committed and some proof that you did it."

Baker said after the hearing that the state Legislature could have "been more specific and clear" when it comes to how spectators - as opposed to actual participants - are treated under the law.

"This is the only law that prohibits being a spectator," Baker said. "I could watch someone run red lights, rob banks, or kill somebody, but you can't watch a cockfight."

TN: Cockfighting Pit Raid Yeilds 143 Citations For Spectators (AP)

AP, September 13, 2005

A cockfighting pit raided by state and federal authorities this summer at Newport, Tennessee had bleachers to seat about 500 people and nearly a hundred outbuildings.

State troopers told a hearing they included a restaurant and gift shop.

Four Tennessee troopers talked about the June raid that netted 143 citations during a hearing Monday for some of the people charged with being spectators at a cockfight.

Heavily armed agents, snipers and helicopters were involved in the raid that was part of the FBI's four-year investigation into organized crime and corruption in the county.

The troopers said they found dead roosters, blood and feathers at the pit but, did not actually see any of the defendants watching or coaching roosters.

Judge John Bell bound the cases over to the grand jury but said he didn't think the evidence presented at the hearing was enough to convict them.

College Student's Disappearance Mystifies Family And Police In Va. (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Eager to begin her freshman year at Virginia Commonwealth University, Taylor Behl created an online profile and wrote that she was looking for new friends in the Richmond area. Last week, she told her roommate she was going out for a few hours. She did not come back.

Behl, 17, was last seen Sept. 5, and campus officials said yesterday they still do not suspect foul play. But they are becoming increasingly concerned, and the investigation into her disappearance gains momentum and urgency with each passing day.

Nearby jurisdictions have joined the hunt, and the FBI has assigned an agent to advise campus and Richmond police. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, based in Alexandria, has posted a notice on its site.

Every year, students "appear to disappear" from the 30,000-student university and do not call their families for days, said Pam Lepley, a campus police spokeswoman. The students usually resurface after a couple of days, she said. But in this case, Behl, a June graduate of Madison High School in Vienna, has contacted no one.

"We're very concerned because of the amount of time that has passed," Lepley said.

Behl was last seen about 10 p.m. on Labor Day after a late supper at a local cafe. She found her roommate in their room with a boyfriend and told her she would leave for a while to give them privacy, police said.

She was wearing jeans and a hooded black sweatshirt and took only her keys and a credit card. Her car, a white 1997 Ford Escort with Virginia tags JPC-2848, is also missing.

Lepley said Behl continues to receive e-mails but has not logged on to read them. Her credit card has not been used, and the last call on her cell phone was made the night she disappeared.

Dozens of people have been interviewed, and more than 20 leads have been fruitlessly followed. A national alert has been issued, and a description of her vehicle has been sent to authorities across the country.

Behl's mother, Janet Pelasara, drove to Richmond from her Vienna home Wednesday, hours after her daughter's disappearance was reported to campus police. She said in several telephone interviews that Behl is an outgoing, friendly girl, not the sort who would cease contact with her family and friends.

DOJ_NMG_0004596

"She's very family-oriented," Pelasara said. "She's basically a happy kid, a good kid. She's fun; she's funny; she's smart as a whip. I'm very worried about her."

Friends have posted messages on Myspace.com, the Web site where Behl has an online profile, begging her to call someone and to come home safely.

In the profile Behl created this summer on the site, which serves as a dating and friendship network, she goes by the name "Bitter." She wrote that she was excited to move to Richmond.

"I just graduated from high school and now I'm off to Richmond for college," she wrote. "I'm looking forward to meeting people that are in Richmond because I only know a few people down there."

She had but one requirement in meeting new friends: "Someone who is kind."

Case Against DeLay Associate Dismissed (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 13, 2005

A Texas judge dismissed a civil case against a major fundraiser for House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) last Friday.

The federal district-court judge dismissed the case brought by two Texas Democrats against John Colyandro, the former executive director of the Texans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee (TRMPAC).

The judge, Lee Yeakel, ruled that lawyers for the two Democrats failed to prove that Colyandro had knowingly broken Texas election law in using corporate contributions to fund campaign ads.

Texas election law prohibits the use of corporate money in races for state office.

In his opinion, Yeakel wrote that the petition against Colyandro and his three co-defendants "fails to allege any facts that Colyandro intentionally or even knowingly violated the applicable sections of the Texas Election Code."

In May, another Texas judge ruled against Colyandro and co-defendants Jim Ellis and Warren Robold in a separate civil case, ruling that the three had violated state election law by failing to report $684,507 in corporate donations.

Colyandro and Ellis also face criminal money-laundering charges following indictments last year by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle.

DeLay Seeks Closure On Texas Case (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

The recently disclosed meeting between House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and a prosecutor investigating allegations of state campaign finance violations is a strong signal that DeLay is trying to put a longstanding Texas investigation behind him as he prepares for a potential probe by the House ethics committee. DeLay and his lawyers met with Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle and his aides for about 90 minutes on Aug. 17 in the Public Integrity unit of the Travis County DA's office. Sources close to both men described the meeting as cordial and said DeLay was treated more like a witness than a potential target of the probe.

Accompanying DeLay to the meeting were his Austin criminal-defense lawyers, Bill White and Steve Brittan, as well Toby Vick of McGuireWoods (one of DeLay's Washington, D.C., law firms) and Elliot Berke, general counsel in the Majority Leader's office. Earle was joined by Greg Cox, director of the Public Integrity unit, and another official.

Earle has been leading a two-and-half-year investigation into the use of corporate funds in the 2002 Texas legislative races. Earle obtained indictments against three DeLay political allies last September for allegedly violating Texas' ban on the use of corporate campaign donations in state legislative races. Since then, there has been widespread speculation that DeLay also could find himself going in front of a grand jury at some point.

On Thursday, Earle announced indictments of Texans for a Republican Majority political action committee and the Texas Association of Business for their activities in 2002 state legislative races. DeLay's office then disclosed that the Majority Leader had held a voluntary meeting with Earle and other Travis County prosecutors to discuss DeLay's involvement with TRMPAC.

Earle told the Dallas Morning News on Friday that, despite earlier comments he had made, his aim in the TRMPAC probe was not to indict DeLay. "I have never said Mr. DeLay is a target of the investigation," Earle told the newspaper.

According to sources familiar with the situation, Earle had asked for a voluntary meeting with DeLay in mid-July, and DeLay's legal team agreed to that request. For reasons that are unclear, however, no further talks were held for several weeks.

Later that month, Earle convinced a Texas judge to issue a subpoena to compel DeLay to testify. Earle then contacted DeLay's lawyers again before actually serving the Texas Republican. At that point, DeLay agreed to a voluntary sit-down, although it still took several weeks for the two men to actually get together. The existence of the DeLay subpoena, which was never formally served on the lawmaker, was first reported by the Austin American-Statesman.

DeLay was not under oath when he met with Earle, and there were no other preconditions put in place, such as transactional or prosecutorial immunity, sources close to the Majority Leader said.

Most of the gathering focused on DeLay's involvement with TRMPAC. DeLay helped create the organization in 2001 with a $50,000 donation from his federal leadership PAC, Americans for a Republican Majority PAC.

TRMPAC's goal was to help Texas Republicans win control of the state Legislature, which would then allow the adoption of a Congressional redistricting map favorable to the GOP. DeLay and other Lone Star State Republicans were angered by the fact that Texas' Congressional delegation was still majority Democratic, despite the fact that Texas voters had shifted decisively to the GOP.

Thanks in part to extensive fundraising by TRMPAC, TAB and other pro-Republican groups, GOP candidates were able to win control in the 2002 elections of the Texas House for the first time since Reconstruction. A DeLay ally, Tom Craddick, was elected Speaker, and despite repeated attempts by Texas Democrats to block it, a Congressional redistricting map much more favorable to Republicans was adopted. Six seats changed from Democratic to Republican control thanks to the DeLay-led redistricting drive, cementing his status as a GOP powerbroker and infuriating Democrats in Austin and Washington.

After an official at TAB bragged in an association newsletter about the group's role in the 2002 state elections, Earle began his investigation. The use of corporate funds is illegal in Texas legislative races.

A Texas judge ruled in May that TRMPAC should have reported more than $532,000 in corporate contributions to state officials during the 2001-02 cycle, and the judge awarded in excess of $196,000 in damages to five state Democratic candidates who have sued the group. TRMPAC, which declared those donations to federal authorities but did not notify state officials, is appealing that ruling.

A Texas grand jury indicted TRMPAC last Thursday on two counts of violating Texas' ban on the use of corporate funds. The charges center on whether TRMPAC illegally solicited and accepted $120,000 from the Alliance for Quality Nursing Home Care, an industry-funded group, and AT&T Corp. Earle's office charged that these donations represented an infringement of state law.

DeLay has denied playing any significant role in the day-to-day operations of TRMPAC, although he did serve on an advisory committee for the organization.

James Bopp, a GOP campaign expert who has testified on behalf of TRMPAC in a civil case brought by Texas Democrats, said the DeLay-Earle meeting was highly unusual.

"Yeah, I think it's extraordinary," Bopp said. "I think it's an indication that [DeLay] and his lawyers believe he is completely blameless for anything that happened [with TRMPAC], if in fact any crime was committed."

But another campaign-finance expert, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said DeLay faced a political consequence if he did not cooperate with Earle, especially once DeLay's camp knew Earle had obtained a subpoena that would compel the Texas Republican to testify.

"There's always a certain tension between litigators and politicians in any of these cases," said this expert. If DeLay were to refuse to testify unless he were subpoenaed, it could look like he was attempting to hide something — a difficult position for DeLay to be in politically with all of the ethics controversies that have surrounded him.

But if DeLay were to meet with Earle, especially without any assurances that what he said wouldn't be held against him, then he could have exposed himself to legal jeopardy if he admits to illegal behavior. "That's a big risk to take," said one GOP lawyer familiar with the case. "I'm surprised they did it."

Craddick also met privately with Earle last month, according to the Austin American-Statesman. Craddick's lawyer told the newspaper that it was "a pleasant conversation."

Up until now, little love was lost between the Earle and DeLay camps. DeLay has claimed that Earle was seeking to redress Democratic losses at the polls by using a politically motivated investigation, while Earle has suggested that Republicans, including DeLay, repeatedly violated Texas campaign laws through the used of millions of dollars in corporate contributions.

But Earle's probe, or at least the investigatory phase of it, may finally be winding down.

The latest grand jury, the fourth in this case, is set to expire at the end of September, and sources close to the investigation say it will likely be the last one empaneled.

And while a number of legal issues remain for Texas courts to straighten out, including outstanding criminal charges against several DeLay allies, the fact that Earle privately told DeLay and his attorneys that he is not a target of investigators may now enable DeLay to focus his attention on the House ethics committee.

"It's not over yet, but there's some light at the end of the tunnel for DeLay," said a GOP source official close to the Majority Leader. "He may just slip the noose on this one."

CIVIL LAW:

McCain, Feingold Targeting Rider (RC)

By Suzanne Nelson

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) implored their colleagues Monday to support their efforts to remove a campaign-finance rider to the Treasury-Transportation appropriations bill, which is slated to come to the Senate floor as early as this week.

The provision would allow lawmakers' leadership political action committees to give unlimited funds to the national party committees, opening what the two Senators believe would be a significant loophole in the campaign finance law.

In a "Dear Colleague" letter, Feingold and McCain noted that national parties could turn around and spend those funds on the lawmaker's own re-election, "effectively subverting individual and PAC donor contribution limits on the amounts that can be given to a Member's campaign."

But the back-door change has high-level support in the Senate. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), whose presidential aspirations could be aided by the provision, gave the language his endorsement before the August recess. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), a longtime foe of campaign finance restrictions, is also supporting the measure.

The principal difference between a lawmaker's personal campaign and that of his or her leadership PAC is that funds from the latter cannot be spent on direct mail, broadcast ads and other items that directly aid the candidate's campaign. The money from leadership PACs is used primarily as funding for the lawmaker's travel and as a way to gain chits with fellow lawmakers by making contributions to their campaigns.

Like all other political action committees, leadership PACs are currently subject to an annual limit of $15,000 for transfers to the national party committees. The proposed language would treat leadership PACs like candidates' personal campaign committees when it comes to transfers to the national parties.

No one during the past few years has sat on as large a pile of leadership PAC cash as Frist, who as of June 30 had almost $1.2 million left in his account. He's already given the maximum donations to every GOP Senator running for re-election, leaving him to spread his money around to House campaigns — unless this provision allows him to dump large amounts of cash into the NRSC and the RNC.

"This major change in campaign finance law would seriously undermine the effectiveness of longstanding contribution limits which serve as the foundation of the nation's campaign finance laws," McCain and Feingold wrote.

"Let's be very clear on another point — this provision benefits no one but incumbent Members of Congress by allowing them to circumvent those same contribution limits by which their opponents will be forced to abide," the two added in boldface type.

A few years ago, leadership PACs were used primarily by a handful of Members with leadership aspirations, but recently the committees have become more common and are now used by rank-and-file and junior lawmakers as well.

The language in the Treasury-Transportation bill also does something seemingly technical but that could nonetheless have a significant impact on campaign-finance law: It codifies for the first time the term "leadership PAC," which heretofore has been an informal term to refer to political action committees informally linked to lawmakers used to further their aspirations for elected leadership. Many campaign reform groups already believe them to be dubiously legal, at best, as they are used in practice as an vehicle for lawmakers to raise money outside of the existing contribution limits.

McCain and Feingold concluded by asserting that substantive changes to the campaign finance laws should occur only after "adequate" debate, the antithesis of which would be "[s]lipping a rider onto an appropriations bill in a subcommittee markup."

The two plan to force a vote on the provision on the Senate floor.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Same-Sex Marriage May Stay Legal In Mass. (FINDLAW/AP)

By Steve Leblanc And Theo Emery, Associated Press Writers

Find Law, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004599

(AP) - BOSTON-A fragile coalition of lawmakers cobbled together to support an anti-gay marriage amendment is falling apart, virtually assuring that same-sex marriage will for now remain legal in Massachusetts, according to an Associated Press poll.

The survey, conducted between Sept. 6-9, found at least 104 lawmakers who plan to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, which would ban gay marriage but create civil unions.

The amendment, which is scheduled for a vote on Wednesday, needs the support of at least 101 of the state's 200 lawmakers to get on the 2006 ballot.

"It's a dangerous precedent to take away rights that have been granted by the court for an identifiable group of people," said Democrat Rep. James Brendan Leary.

Last year, months after the state's Supreme Judicial Court ruled that same-sex marriage was legal, the amendment passed 105-92. It must pass a second vote to get on next year's ballot.

Reasons for the faltering support are rooted in the language of the amendment, which was intended as a compromise between foes of same-sex marriage and supporters of gay rights. It ultimately had an opposite effect, however, alienating gay marriage opponents by creating civil unions and offending gay rights supporters by banning gay marriage.

For the survey, the AP attempted to reach all 200 lawmakers with at least two phone calls. Of those polled, 104 said they would vote against the proposal, 19 said they would support it and three said they were undecided.

Opposition to the measure is likely deeper than the survey indicates. Several lawmakers who voted against it last year couldn't be reached. Others who have voiced strong opposition declined to respond.

More than a dozen lawmakers who voted for the amendment the first time around said they would change their votes this week, either because they fully support gay marriage or oppose civil unions.

Others said that after more than a year of watching gay couples marry, they see no need to rescind the right. Since Massachusetts' gay marriages started taking place in May 2004, thousands of same-sex couples have tied the knot.

"I haven't talked to any married heterosexual couples that have felt threatened by same-sex marriages," said Democrat Rep. Anne M. Gobi, who said she couldn't support the compromise amendment, as she did last year.

Many foes of gay marriage said they prefer a second, much stricter amendment that would ban gay marriage without granting civil unions. The earliest that proposal could go before voters is 2008.

"We are going back to the beginning and defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman," said Democrat Rep. Philip Travis, who voted for the compromise amendment last year, but now plans to vote against it.

Some lawmakers who have supported gay marriage in the past declined to respond to the survey, saying they believed the vote was still too narrow, and many new lawmakers planned to vote against the measure because of campaign promises.

Still, not everyone is switching their vote.

Democrat Rep. James H. Fagan does not oppose same-sex marriages, but he's sticking with his yes vote on the constitutional amendment because he wants the state's citizens to decide.

"I support their right to vote," Fagan said. "I would suggest that people do not vote to amend our constitution."

Will California's Gay Marriage Bill Spur Similar Measures Elsewhere? (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES - The latest struggle over who decides the legality of gay marriage - citizens, lawmakers, or the courts - played out in the nation's most populous state last week. The California legislature was the first to approve a bill legalizing same-sex marriage, although Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has vowed to veto it.

The political stand-off raises legal issues specific to California, state and national observers say. The legislature's attempt to broaden the definition of marriage is in direct conflict with a citizens' initiative passed in 2000 defining legal marriage as between a man and woman only. That citizen's initiative itself, Proposition 22, is also being challenged in court.

But the recent move by Sacramento legislators emphasizes what some observers see as a shift in public opinion that appears to be more accepting of gay marriage. Still, others anticipate the bill could add to the backlash against the gay-marriage movement that prompted 11 states to ban same-sex marriage through ballot initiatives last year. Indeed, California conservative groups have heightened efforts to place an initiative before voters that would recognize heterosexual unions only.

National pollsters report more acceptance of gays and lesbians in a variety of other contexts. What happens in California could set the tone for how other states deal with the issue legislatively.

"There will be lurches backward and forward as some states throw up roadblocks to such arrangements and others embrace them," says Elizabeth Garrett, a law professor at University of Southern California who tracks state initiatives. "But overall the support for civil unions is getting stronger and stronger."

DOJ_NMG_0004600

A recent statewide poll here shows that voters are evenly split (about 46 percent for, and 46 against) same-sex marriage. Five years ago, 61 percent of voters backed the initiative that defined marriage as between a man and woman. "Moves by the California legislature are part of the national trend toward greater equality for same-sex couples that has been growing coast to coast for the past few years," says Ms. Garrett.

San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom reignited the issue here last fall when he directed city officials to permit same-sex marriage licenses. Hundreds of couples who obtained the licenses in San Francisco later learned their nuptials were declared invalid by a court ruling that said a mayor could not ignore state law.

Some social conservative groups reject the analysis that public attitudes are shifting to embrace same-sex marriage. They claim that public opinion polls were roughly 50-50 before the Proposition 22 vote, but that the measure's overwhelming victory was a truer litmus test.

"The only vote that counts is at the ballot box, and the people spoke clearly on Prop. 22," says Karen England, of Capitol Resources Institute, a Sacramento group that advocates for family issues. "This legislature knows what the people feel and were afraid to put their measure to a public vote, which they could have done. Instead they are trying to make an end run around the will of the people."

Governor Schwarzenegger is being accused of political posturing with his veto to protect his conservative base in the face of declining approval ratings. But whatever ensues with the legal and political wrangling here, national gay and lesbian rights groups say they are encouraged by the legislature's move.

"Like activities in Massachusetts and Connecticut which have kept the issue alive despite negative attacks, the California measure is a teachable moment," says Seth Kilborn, marriage project director of the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay/lesbian political organization. "It is an opportunity to talk to voters about why same-sex marriage is important."

California's Solons Lead (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

The California General Assembly last week became the first state legislature to allow same-sex marriages. In a close vote, it sent a historic bill to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) that would go a step beyond the state's broad domestic partnership rights. Mr. Schwarzenegger promptly declared that he would veto the bill, so it won't become law. But the legislature's action is an important milestone. While the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court permitted same-sex marriage in that state and legislatures have created civil unions elsewhere, the vote is the first time that a state legislature has acted on its own to create marriage equality.

The importance of the California vote in the politics of same-sex marriage is hard to overstate. After the Massachusetts court ruling, opponents of same-sex marriage decried the court's willingness to make policy on contested social issues. Such questions, they argued, were the rightful province of legislatures, not courts. President Bush even pegged his disgraceful endorsement of a federal constitutional amendment banning gay marriage to the likelihood of "activist judges" depriving the people of democratic choice on the matter. The California legislature's decision gives the lie to the notion that only imperial judges would foist such a social policy on a state.

Only five years ago, voters in California overwhelmingly passed a ballot initiative to refuse recognition to same-sex marriages performed elsewhere. The recent legislative action reflects genuinely changed public sentiment; polls on the matter show voters evenly split.

In an ironic twist, Mr. Schwarzenegger is trying to punt the matter back to the courts, where challenges to current California law are pending. In announcing his decision to veto the bill, he suggested that the new law conflicts with the old initiative -- which would be unconstitutional -- and that "the matter should be determined not by legislative action . . . but by court decision or another vote of the people of our state."

The governor could not be more wrong. Legislation is actually the best way to move forward in this area. And further ballot initiatives that will attempt to write an exclusively heterosexual definition of marriage into the California constitution and, along the way, wipe out the state's progressive domestic partnership laws, are already in the works in any event. A lot of work remains to be done before marriage equality in California becomes a reality.

But the legislative action last week remains an important symbol -- at once a rebuke to those states that have reacted to the Massachusetts decision by writing discrimination into their fundamental laws and a gentle reminder to those who see hope for progress only in the courts that legislatures can still be engines for positive change.

Firefighter Arrested In Alleged Assault Hours After Sept. 11 Anniversary (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004601

(AP) - NEW YORK-Hours after many New York firefighters gathered to mark the fourth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, one of them was arrested for attacking an immigrant worker from Bangladesh and telling him he looked "like he's al-Qaida," police said.

Firefighter Edward Dailey was arrested Sunday on charges of criminal mischief and felony second-degree assault, Police Sgt. Kevin Farrell said.

He was released without bail. Despite the alleged al-Qaida remark, there was not enough evidence to charge him with a hate crime, authorities said.

Dailey, 27, is accused of breaking a piece of Plexiglas off a curbside newsstand and throwing it at a 51-year-old man who works there, Farrell said. Dailey had said the man looked "like he's al-Qaida," Farrell said.

The victim, whose arm was cut in the alleged attack, was treated at a hospital and released, Farrell said.

A woman who answered the phone at Dailey's home wouldn't comment.

Dailey was the class valedictorian at his FDNY graduation ceremony last year.

Two Guilty Of Murder In Death Of A Transgender Teenager (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

HAYWARD, Calif., Sept. 12 - A jury convicted two men of murder on Monday but deadlocked on the fate of a third man in the retrial of three defendants charged with killing a 17-year-old transgender teenager in October 2002.

The two - Michael W. Magidson and Jose A. Merel, both 25 - were found guilty of second-degree murder for the death of Gwen Araujo, who was born as a male named Eddie Araujo Jr., but who frequently wore women's clothing and lived as a women.

After the verdict was read, Mr. Magidson bowed his head and Mr. Merel slowly shook his. They face sentences of 15 years to life in prison.

The jury found both men not guilty of committing a hate crime.

The actions of the third man, Jason Cazares, also 25, confounded a jury for the second time in two years. The panel, which heard the case for several months in a packed Alameda County Superior Court room, told Judge Harry R. Sheppard that they were hopelessly deadlocked on the fate of Mr. Cazares.

Jurors had been deliberating for seven days in the retrial of Mr. Magidson, of Fremont, and Mr. Merel and Mr. Cazares, both of Newark. The three were charged with first-degree murder and with committing a hate crime, although the jury had the option of finding the men guilty of lesser charges, including manslaughter.

The police found the victim's body in October 2002, buried in a three-foot-deep grave in El Dorado County in a remote area of the Sierra Nevada foothills about 120 miles east of San Francisco. She had been bound, bludgeoned and strangled on Oct. 4.

According to court testimony, Ms. Araujo's mother had reported her missing two weeks earlier and just a few days after the 17-year-old youth had attended a party at a house in Newark, then rented by Mr. Merel and his older brother.

The Alameda County deputy district attorney, Chris Lamiero, argued during the retrial that the men attacked and battered Ms. Araujo after they discovered from a friend that the girl with whom several had had a sexual encounter was, in fact, a biological male.

Mr. Lamiero's key witness to the crime was a fourth defendant, Jaron C. Nabors, 22, of Newark. Mr. Nabors was also charged with murder but agreed to plead guilty to voluntary manslaughter in exchange for his testimony against the other three men.

His testimony revealed that all of the men, except Mr. Cazares, had a sexual encounter with the teenager. The jury of eight men and four women began its deliberations on Aug. 30 and on Thursday alerted Judge Sheppard that decisions had been reached on two of the defendants. The verdicts and identities of the men were withheld pending a decision on the third man.

During the three-month trial, the prosecutor told jurors that Ms. Araujo had been murdered by the men in what he considered a brutal hate crime. The prosecutor argued that Mr. Magidson strangled the teenager, Mr. Cazares beat in her skull with a shovel, and Mr. Merel followed along because he said he felt intimidated.

The lawyers for the defendants in part argued that the death of Ms. Araujo was a crime of passion that did not merit a charge of first-degree murder. The lawyer for Mr. Cazares, the defendant on whom the jury deadlocked, argued that his client was not even present during the murder, because he was outside having a cigarette.

All three men testified during the retrial. But only Mr. Cazares took the stand at the first trial, in June 2004, when the jury deadlocked after 10 days of deliberation, leading to a mistrial.

Two Defendants Convicted In Newark Transgender Murder (AP)

AP, September 12, 2005

HAYWARD – Two men who had sex with a transgender teen and then discovered she was biologically male were convicted Monday of her murder, but cleared of hate crime charges.

Michael Magidson and Jose Merel, both 25, face mandatory sentences of 15 years-to-life in prison for second-degree murder in the killing of Gwen Araujo, who was beaten, tied up and strangled.

The jury was deadlocked in the case of a third man, Jason Cazares, 25, marking the second time a mistrial was declared in his case.

There were sobs in the Alameda County courtroom as the verdicts were read and Merel held his head in his hands.

Araujo, 17, was born a boy named Edward but grew up to believe her true identity was female. The defendants, who knew her as Lida, met Araujo in the summer of 2002. Magidson and Merel had sexual encounters with Araujo, experiences that fueled suspicions about Araujo's gender.

The issue boiled over in the early hours of Oct. 4, 2002, in a confrontation at Merel's house in the San Francisco suburb of Newark.

Merel's lawyer, William Du Bois, said he was shocked by the verdict, especially since prosecutor Chris Lamiero said he didn't think Merel was the killer.

"I can't imagine what evidence they used to come to this decision," Du Bois said.

In the first trial, the three defendants stuck together, with their lawyers attacking the chief prosecution witness, Jaron Nabors, who was also at the house the night Araujo died but was allowed to plead guilty to manslaughter in exchange for testifying.

But in the second trial, the defendants' united front cracked.

Nabors testified at both trials that Araujo was savagely attacked after her biological identity was revealed when her underwear was pulled aside. He said he didn't see the killing but saw Magidson pull a rope toward the teen's neck.

Magidson testified that he beat and tied up Araujo but said he couldn't remember large parts of the night and was sure he had not strangled her. He said Nabors was the killer and his attorney asked for a manslaughter conviction.

But Merel, testifying for the first time, broke down and cried when Lamiero asked him directly if Magidson admitted strangling Araujo. He testified that Magidson had told him "if push came to shove" Merel should identify Magidson as the killer.

An autopsy found Araujo died of asphyxiation associated with head injuries.

Nabors testified that Merel smashed Araujo in the head with a can and also hit her with a pan. Merel acknowledged slapping Araujo and hitting her a glancing blow with the pan but said he only menaced her with the can and did not seriously injure the teen. Du Bois said if Merel was guilty of anything it was felony assault.

Cazares said he was outside the house when the killing took place and only helped bury the body in a shallow grave in the Sierra Nevada foothills.

Cazares' attorney said he thought the jury didn't believe Nabors' testimony.

"We believe from the first instant that he wasn't telling the truth and what he was doing was trying to save his own skin," attorney Tony Serra said.

Cazares, who was free on bail, hugged his girlfriend and left the courthouse.

Redistricting Reform May Be On The March In Three Big States (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

LOS ANGELES — With initiatives to reform redistricting expected to make the 2005 ballot in California and Ohio, and another for 2006 gaining traction in Florida, the ultimate insider issue has suddenly become hot in three of the nation's most populous states.

But those who thrive on map-drawing minutiae wonder whether such an arcane issue can resonate with ordinary voters.

"Most voters don't even know what districts they live in, much less who drew the boundaries, so they don't relate to it," said Garry South, a veteran Democratic strategist in California. His California GOP counterpart, Dan Schnur, concurred, saying, "Under normal circumstances, it's impossible to pass. It's too abstract."

Still, strategists say the pivotal wild card is frustration with politics as usual. If such a mood exists, and if it is channeled effectively, it can put a dry issue like redistricting over the top, said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the liberal Ballot Initiative Strategy Center.

And in these three states at least, the political conditions may be riper than normal.

DOJ_NMG_0004603

In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R), who coasted into office amid mass disaffection with his Democratic predecessor, has staked his prestige on the redistricting measure and other reforms.

In Ohio, a metastasizing political scandal involving Gov. Bob Taft (R) and the state Republican Party is producing anger and volatility in a state long dominated by the GOP.

And Florida, like Ohio, has been home to a divisive presidential election in which residents aired a torrent of allegations about how partisanship may have influenced vote counting.

The Ohio measure, which would create a judicially appointed independent redistricting panel, has the most momentum, thanks to the rising tide of political disaffection.

The proposal's chief proponent, a predominantly Democratic group called Reform Ohio Now, secured roughly 500,000 signatures, easily exceeding the 322,000 required to place the measure on the ballot. (It is expected to share ballot space with proposals for expanded mail-in balloting, reduced donation limits to candidates and a nonpartisan state elections board.)

"There is tremendous energy, excitement and interest in all of the reform amendments," said Cleveland-based Democratic consultant Jeff Rusnack. "Ohioans are looking for real changes that will hold the politicians accountable. Changing the redistricting process is one way to do this."

Herb Asher, an adviser to Reform Ohio Now and political scientist at Ohio State University, said the group knows the issue is hard to explain in 30-second TV spots, so its goal is to skip the mechanics and focus on big themes.

"You tell voters, 'Hey, we all believe in competition for business and schools, so how about competition in our elections? How about making legislators be more attentive to their own districts?'" Asher said. "By saying something that simple, it captures people's attention."

Asher predicts that if the proponents can pick off one-third of the GOP electorate — not an unreasonable number given today's anti-Republican environment — then the measure should prevail.

Ohio First, a largely Republican group, opposes it. Beyond challenging the measure in court, Ohio First asks whether the proposal is as fair as its sponsors contend, said former Ohio Senate President Richard Finan (R), a Cincinnati lawyer affiliated with Ohio First.

"The argument is, 'Yes, we might need some reform to our method of redistricting, but this is certainly not the way to do it,'" he said. The measure, "is strictly slanted toward one side."

In Ohio, as elsewhere, partisanship is never far from the surface. Indeed, critics have noted the irony that more than two decades ago, the state's then-dominant Democratic Party successfully blocked a GOP-backed redistricting reform effort.

In Florida, a narrowly divided state with a heavily Republican Congressional delegation, signature-gatherers are working to place a redistricting measure on the 2006 ballot. While it's too soon to gauge its level of support — already, one facet of the reform package has been thrown out for exceeding the ballot-summary limit by six words — the proposal's sponsors have one key factor on their side.

"Florida has been very inclined to pass constitutional amendments in the past decade," said Aubrey Jewett, a political scientist at the University of Central Florida, citing a range of recently passed measures that span the ideological spectrum, including those protecting pregnant pigs, banning smoking, restricting net fishing, publicizing doctors' mistakes, cutting contingency fees for lawyers and raising the minimum wage. "If the petitions do get on the ballot, I think the odds of passage are good."

Ironically, California, a trailblazer on the issue since Schwarzenegger's election, now seems to offer the longest odds of passage.

Schwarzenegger's proposal, which would hand redistricting duties to a nonpartisan group of judges, received just 32 percent support in a late-August Field poll, compared to 46 percent who were opposed and 22 percent undecided.

While the challenges facing the California measure mirror those in other states, Schwarzenegger's larger-than-life persona may have shaped public perceptions more than anything — on balance, negatively.

As Schwarzenegger's tone has become more partisan, his popularity has dropped among Democrats and independents — and the redistricting measure has suffered. It now fares even worse in recent polls than Schwarzenegger himself. Field's late-August trial heats showed the governor losing to his two likeliest Democratic challengers.

If Schwarzenegger had framed the issue properly and worked with Democrats consistently and publicly, Schnur and South agree, the effort could have won broad support. As a celebrity with cross-party appeal, the governor could have made it a compelling pox-on-both-your-houses issue.

"The thing about initiatives is that you don't have to explain the details," said Elizabeth Garrett, a University of Southern California law professor who studies ballot initiatives. "It's all about symbolic significance. And a take-back-the-government message could have worked."

Now, however, South said that "if a 35 percent governor passes a 35 percent ballot measure, I'll eat my hat."

DOJ_NMG_0004604

The main beacon of hope for redistricting reformers is Arizona, which passed a statewide ballot measure to create a redistricting commission in 2000.

Two months before Election Day, the measure had just 43 percent support in the polls, recalled Bob Grossfeld, a Democratic consultant in Scottsdale, Ariz. Then, he said, proponents seized on opposition by the state's dominant GOP, enabling undecided voters to "connect the dots" about who benefited from the status quo.

"It was one of the first examples of how populism can trump conservatism," Grossfeld said. "Simply put, the campaign converted more than 25 years of government-is-the-problem rhetoric by conservatives into a double-digit win."

Phoenix-based GOP lobbyist Stuart Goodman agreed that a well-funded, well-run campaign offered "an appealing message."

"The general population is not focused on the political implications of redistricting, but they unquestionably appreciate the importance of fair and competitive elections," Goodman said.

Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.), who's sponsoring a redistricting reform bill in the House, agrees that the broader principle of fair play resonates among rank-and-file voters even when they know little about his legislation.

"The people back home are talking about the partisanship they see in Washington, and they're pleased to see Congressman Tanner trying to work on that," said Tanner's spokesman, Randy Ford.

ANTITRUST:

Oracle To Pay $5.85 Billion For Siebel (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 12 - Oracle, the giant database-software maker, announced on Monday that it would pay $5.85 billion to acquire Siebel Systems, its largest competitor in the market for sales automation programs.

The deal will bolster Oracle's effort to topple its German rival SAP as the leading seller of business applications software for big corporations.

It comes less than a year after Oracle managed to achieve a hostile takeover of PeopleSoft for $10.3 billion after a contentious battle that dragged on for nearly 18 months.

Oracle says its acquisition of Siebel will make it the largest seller of sales automation software - a category also known as customer relationship management software. SAP remains a far bigger supplier of business applications over all, but the Siebel acquisition, said Lawrence J. Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, "moves us closer to our goal of being No. 1 in applications globally."

While the Justice Department tried and failed to block the Oracle-PeopleSoft deal on the basis that it was anticompetitive, industry analysts and antitrust experts do not expect the Siebel deal to encounter the same regulatory opposition.

The combined company will face considerable competition from SAP, as well as from Microsoft, I.B.M. and smaller rivals. And Oracle lawyers succeeded in the PeopleSoft case in convincing a judge that the enterprise software market was robust.

Under the terms of the Oracle-Siebel combination, which is subject to the approval of shareholders of both companies, Oracle will pay $10.66 in cash or stock for each Siebel share. Siebel now has $2.24 billion in cash on hand, reducing Oracle's net takeover cost to $3.61 billion.

The news was announced before the opening of the stock market on Monday. In trading, shares of Oracle rose 21 cents, to $13.49. Siebel Systems advanced $1.16, or 12.7 percent, to $10.29 on volume of more than 187 million shares - roughly one in every three of its shares outstanding.

Oracle agreed to exchange stock for up to 30 percent of Siebel. If the Oracle shares fall below $10.72 before the deal is completed, Siebel shareholders who choose stock will receive 0.994 share of Oracle for each share of Siebel stock.

Oracle executives said the deal would add 2 cents to 3 cents a share to Oracle's profit in the 2007 fiscal year, ending in May 2007. The company said it expected to repurchase any shares issued in the acquisition. While Oracle expects to have $5 billion to $6 billion in cash at the time the deal is likely to close, it said it would use about $1.5 billion of its own cash and borrow the rest.

Beyond PeopleSoft, Oracle has acquired several companies in the last year, including Retek, another business software producer, which it bought in March for $643 million.

Mr. Ellison, speaking to analysts in a conference call on Monday, explained that Oracle had decided to wait for a few quarters after it integrated PeopleSoft before pursuing another large deal.

DOJ_NMG_0004605

Once the Siebel acquisition is completed, most likely early in 2006, Oracle said it planned to promote Siebel's customer relationship management program over similar software developed by both Oracle and PeopleSoft. With Siebel, Oracle adds 4,000 customers, including some of the largest corporations, and roughly 3.4 million individual users.

While Oracle's interest in Siebel had been known for some time, reaction was mixed on Wall Street.

Charles Di Bona, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein, said he thought that the merger would be far more difficult than Oracle indicated, and that incorporating another major product line into Oracle's development process would be a great challenge.

William Wall, a spokesman for SAP, said the deal would not cause SAP to change its strategy. "We always anticipated that in order for Oracle to try to catch up with SAP, they would take this step," he said. "We have the benefit of several years, and we intend to leverage that."

But it may be Salesforce.com that has the most to gain - or lose - from the Oracle-Siebel merger. The company, whose chief executive, Marc Benioff, was a longtime associate of Mr. Ellison, has had considerable success providing customer relationship management software through an "on demand" subscription service rather than a discrete product, a strategy that many large customers have come to prefer. Siebel, in recent years, has begun moving toward a similar model, and analysts say that Oracle is trying to move in that direction with this merger.

During Oracle's battle to acquire PeopleSoft last year, Mr. Ellison told a court that Siebel had long been on his company's short list of potential targets.

Thomas M. Siebel, the chairman, had been an Oracle executive from 1984 to 1990. He founded Siebel in 1993. Since then, he and Mr. Ellison have sparred bitterly on occasion, but the relationship lacks the intense animosity that characterized Mr. Ellison's relationship with Craig A. Conway, the PeopleSoft chief executive, who unsuccessfully fought to prevent the takeover of his company.

Siebel Systems has faced considerable turmoil in recent years; its revenue dropped to $1.3 billion last year from $2.1 billion in 2001. Mr. Siebel stepped down last year as chief executive and turned the job over to J. Mike Lawrie, a former I.B.M. executive. Siebel's board fired Mr. Lawrie in April after first-quarter results fell far short of expectations. George Shaheen, formerly of Webvan, took over as chief executive, but barely met revenue goals for the second quarter, and new license revenue was disappointing.

Mr. Ellison and Mr. Siebel said Monday that the merger was driven primarily by customers' desire to do business with fewer suppliers, an idea that Mr. Ellison repeated throughout the battle for PeopleSoft.

"What really moved these companies together," Mr. Siebel said, "was a shift in market dynamics that has been occurring over the past three, four, five years."

Where in past years, customers were satisfied to pick and choose the best applications from a variety of vendors, the complexity of business today has led them to want to simplify those relationships, he said.

Siebel has about 5,000 employees at its headquarters in San Mateo, Calif., south of San Francisco, and throughout the world. While Mr. Ellison said that Oracle, based nearby in Redwood Shores, would retain Siebel's specialized sales force, analysts said that many Siebel employees were likely to be laid off as soon as the deal was completed. Oracle laid off nearly half of PeopleSoft's 11,000 employees soon after that deal took effect.

Oracle To Acquire Siebel For $5.85 Bil (SFC)

By Dan Fost

San Francisco Chronicle, September 12, 2005

Redwood City -- Furthering Chairman Larry Ellison's efforts to consolidate the software industry, Oracle Corp. today announced an agreement to acquire one of its biggest rivals, Siebel Systems, for $5.85 billion.

The deal follows a number of previous acquisitions, most notably the $10.6 billion takeover of Peoplesoft that closed in January. The impact on jobs at either company remains unclear.

Oracle this year has also acquired retailing software firms Retek and ProfitLogic, as well as a controlling interest in banking software maker I-flex Solutions.

The Siebel acquisition not only gives Redwood City's Oracle enough ammo to take on its archrival SAP of Germany in the field of customer relationship management, or CRM, software — essentially, software used to manage a company's sales operations — but it also has the delicious twist of allowing the Oracle boss to declare victory over Tom Siebel, a former protege turned enemy.

"In a single step, Oracle becomes the number one CRM applications company in the world," Ellison said in a press release. "Siebel's 4,000 applications customers and 3,400,000 CRM users strengthen our number one position in applications in North America and move us closer to the number one position in applications globally."

In the Siebel deal, Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 for each share of Siebel stock. The San Mateo firm had been struggling this year, with sales down and the stock having dropped from a high of $10.85 in January to a range hovering between $8 and $9 for most of the summer.

Former Webvan CEO George Shaheen came aboard in April as Siebel CEO in an effort to turn the company around, and Wall Street had watched closely since then to see if the company would either make an acquisition or be swallowed up itself.

In casting his lot with his old company, Tom Siebel, who remained chairman of Siebel Systems after Shaheen was hired, said the merger created a "beneficial business combination."

"Today is a great day for Siebel Systems' customers, partners, shareholders, and employees," Siebel said in a statement.

Another rival and former Oracle employee, Salesforce.com founder and CEO Marc Benioff, had another take on the deal. "Now, the same thing that happened to Peoplesoft will happen to Siebel, it will die," Benioff wrote in an e-mail to his employees.

As of 2:16 p.m. Eastern time today, Siebel shares were up 12.8 percent, or $1.17, at $10.30. Oracle shares were up 1.2 percent, or 16 cents, at $13.44.

The deal will need to meet regulatory approval, including an antitrust review. Oracle expects the acquisition to close in January.

Oracle Snaps Up Rival Siebel For $5.8bn (FT)

By James Politi And Chris Nuttall

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

Oracle, the US technology group, on Monday agreed to buy Siebel Systems for $5.85bn in cash and stock, sealing its second large acquisition in less than a year. The purchase will establish Oracle as the world's largest provider of customer relationship management (CRM) software and reunite two of Silicon Valley's most well-known executives.

Thomas Siebel, who established Siebel in 1993 after a career at Oracle, will return to his former employer to help execute the merger.

For Larry Ellison, Oracle's chief executive, the acquisition will cement his reputation as a prolific dealmaker. In December, Oracle agreed to buy PeopleSoft for about $10.5bn, after winning an 18-month takeover battle, seeing off a high-profile, antitrust suit brought by the US Department of Justice.

Mr Ellison on Monday suggested the company's attention would now be focused on integration. "I don't think you'll see another major acquisition any time soon," he said. The purchase of Siebel will give Oracle access to 3.4m users and 4,000 corporate customers of its CRM software, which helps companies track sales, marketing and customer service.

Both Oracle and Siebel said the tie-up was encouraged by a number of key customers, including General Electric. "There was a shift in market dynamics," said Mr Siebel, who added that customers now preferred an "integrated family of applications that minimises their cost structure". Although CRM is one of the fastest growing segments of the software business, Siebel had been struggling to compete, leading to lower profits and prompting a group of investors mostly hedge funds to press management into pursuing a sale.

Mr Ellison shrugged off comments from one analyst who said Siebel was suffering from poor customer satisfaction. In Oracle's due diligence, Mr Ellison said: "Siebel customers seem to be quite happy with the product."

Siebel shareholders will receive $10.66 a share in cash for each Siebel share, unless they elect to receive Oracle stock. That price represents a 17 per cent premium to Siebel share price on Friday, which had already moved higher as investors bet that a takeover was near.

Wall Street investors appeared to offer timid approval, sending Oracle shares 1.43 per cent higher closing Monday's trading day at $13.47. The final price of the deal will be reduced by $2.2bn, the value of Siebel's cash.

Oracle said the deal would enhance earnings in 2007 and contribute to its stated goal of lifting profits by 20 per cent per year. The acquisition would be funded using a combination of Siebel's cash, Oracle's cash, and borrowing of up to $3bn.

Morgan Stanley advised Oracle, and Goldman Sachs advised Siebel.

Oracle To Buy Siebel Systems In $5.85-Billion Deal (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

Oracle Corp. today announced it had agreed to buy business software maker Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in the most recent in a string of acquisitions orchestrated by chief executive Larry Ellison.

The Siebel deal comes after Oracle emerged victorious in a bidding battle for another software company, Retek Inc., this year, and as it digests PeopleSoft Inc., which agreed to a $10.3-billion acquisition in December after a bitter and lengthy takeover fight.

This most recent acquisition will help Redwood Shores, Calif.-based Oracle close the gap with SAP, the German company that ranks as the largest seller of software used to manage databases, sales and other corporate functions. SAP lost out to Oracle in the bidding for Retek.

San Mateo, Calif.-based Siebel will make Oracle a major player in the fast-growing segment of software that helps companies manage sales operations and customer relations. Last year, Siebel, founded by Chairman Thomas M. Siebel, a former Oracle executive, generated $110.7 million in net income on $1.34 billion in revenue.

"This is a very beneficial business combination," Siebel said in a statement.

Under the deal, Oracle will purchase each Siebel share for $10.66 in cash unless the owner of the stock decides to receive Oracle stock.

The merger, which is subject to regulatory review, has been approved by the boards of Oracle and Siebel. Siebel shareholders must still vote on the deal, but a vote by Oracle shareholders is not required, according to the company.

Shares of both companies rose on news of the deal. Siebel shares jumped nearly 13%, while Oracle stock was up about 1% in early afternoon trading on the Nasdaq.

Ellison has made it clear that he intends to bolster Oracle's main database business by acquiring more companies in the lucrative market for business software. But Oracle's shopping spree had raised concern among some industry analysts about the company's ability to mesh operations with newly acquired companies.

Oracle To Buy Siebel For $5.85 Billion (WSJ)

By David Bank

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

Oracle Corp. Chief Executive Larry Ellison extended his software consolidation strategy, reaching a long-anticipated deal with his former lieutenant and frequent sparring partner Thomas Siebel to acquire Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in stock and cash.

The deal, valued at about $3.61 billion after accounting for Siebel's holding of about $2.2 billion in cash, allows Oracle to absorb the 3.4 million users of Siebel's software for automating sales operations. Oracle has been using acquisitions to try to catch SAP AG of Germany, the leader in the market for business-software applications

The strategy, honed with Oracle's PeopleSoft Inc. purchase earlier this year, is intended to add the existing business of a target company while broadening the customer base for Oracle's existing products. Oracle, though No. 3 behind Microsoft Corp. and International Business Machine Corp. in total software revenue, lags only SAP in business application programs. But with the addition of Siebel, Oracle now faces the challenge of integrating another large acquisition while it is still digesting PeopleSoft, which it acquired for $10.6 billion after a grueling, 18-month takeover battle. Since then, Oracle has completed a half-dozen smaller acquisitions.

Oracle will bear the cost of maintaining three product lines of so-called customer-relationship management software, as it continues to offer its own system and PeopleSoft's while adding Siebel's. It will also have the expense of a separate sales force for Siebel's product lines. Charles Phillips, one of three Oracle co-presidents, said recent changes to Siebel's sales structure had disrupted the company's business, but added, "We can fix that."

Oracle predicted the deal will close early next year, after approval by Siebel shareholders. The acquisition is expected to face an antitrust review by the Justice Department, which unsuccessfully sought to block Oracle's purchase of PeopleSoft.

Analysts said they don't expect strong opposition this time; Oracle has lagged well behind SAP and Siebel in CRM software, and Oracle's marketing of Siebel products could potentially increase competition in the market.

Oracle executives, who are expected to aggressively cut costs at Siebel, said the deal will add two to three cents a share to Oracle's profits in fiscal year 2007, ending in May 2007, not including acquisition-related charges. Oracle plans to repurchase a number of shares equal to those issued in the acquisition, giving the effect of an all-cash deal for the company. Oracle said it will use about $1.5 billion of its own cash and will borrow the rest.

Mr. Siebel's 10.6% ownership of Siebel's shares stands to earn him a payoff of about $585 million, not including his stock options. Earlier this year, Siebel sweetened the terms of its severance-payment agreements for key employees, with top executives eligible for up to 18 months pay and health coverage.

The acquisition brings full circle the 23-year relationship between two of Silicon Valley's strongest personalities. Mr. Siebel was a top Oracle salesman before leaving the company under disputed circumstances in 1992. Since founding Siebel Systems in 1993, he has been an outspoken critic of his former boss, at times calling Mr. Ellison a "pathological" liar.

For his part, Mr. Ellison in the past sought to hasten Siebel's demise, declaring in 2003 that "Siebel will vanish," and putting pressure on the smaller company by revealing he had held takeover talks with Mr. Siebel the previous year. In recounting those discussions, Mr. Siebel said he told Mr. Ellison, "Larry, you and I worked together for nine years, and that was enough," Information Week reported in 2004.

By this year, Mr. Siebel had become a willing seller, and yesterday he called the combination "a wonderfully exciting event." Mr. Siebel, who built his company into one of technology's highest-fliers, watched its new software sales plummet in recent years as information-technology buyers grew wary of high-priced and complicated automation projects.

Where customers once bought individual "best of breed" products for specific chores, Mr. Siebel said, those companies now want a single supplier to provide programs that work well together. Oracle has pledged to deliver an integrated suite of applications, dubbed "Project Fusion," starting in 2007.

What brought Oracle and Siebel together "was a shift in market dynamics," Mr. Siebel told analysts. "The customer and partner community is communicating quite clearly and voting with their dollars that what they are looking for here is an integrated family of applications," he said.

Even so, the on-again, off-again negotiations required a go-between -- Oracle's Mr. Phillips, who largely handled the talks with Mr. Siebel on Mr. Ellison's behalf. "Sometimes you do need an intermediary between two strong-willed people," Mr. Phillips said.

Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 a share, a premium of roughly 17% to Siebel's closing price Friday of $9.13. Shares of Siebelrose more than 8% late last week as rumors spread that the two companies had been negotiating for weeks and that an agreement was imminent. Monday, Siebel's shares rose 13% or $1.16 to $10.29 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Oracle's shares rose 1.6% or 21 cents to $13.49, also on Nasdaq.

The talks had gone cold last May, and then accelerated in the past month, Mr. Phillips said, after Oracle acquired control of Indian software company i-flex Solutions Ltd. As late as Sunday afternoon, the two sides had reached an impasse over the offer price. "We were one penny away and we almost came apart over one penny," Mr. Phillips said, declining to provide further details. "Every penny was negotiated."

At Siebel's insistence, Oracle agreed to exchange stock for up to 30% of Siebel's shares. If Oracle's shares fall below $10.72 before the deal closes, Siebel shareholders that choose to receive stock will receive 0.994 shares of Oracle for each share of Siebel stock.

[by Oracle]SAP's chief executive, Henning Kagermann, played down the significance of the Oracle-Siebel combination. "We see no impact and no reason to react," he said. Mr. Kagermann predicted further industry consolidation, describing any deals SAP is likely to make as "targeted, fill-in acquisitions," with a price range in the hundreds of millions of dollars, rather than billions.

For IBM, the Siebel deal raises concerns about the computer giant's partners falling under the control of a competitor. IBM and Oracle compete fiercely in database software. Siebel has worked closely with IBM, as did PeopleSoft and J.D. Edwards -- purchased by PeopleSoft -- and retail-software maker Retek Inc., purchased by Oracle.

IBM said in a statement that its strategy is to be a "key partner" to thousands of software vendors. "We will continue to provide customers with IBM hardware, middleware and services for Siebel and other applications -- just as we continue to do so for PeopleSoft," the company said.

Separately, Mr. Ellison has tentatively agreed to pay $100 million to charity over five years to settle private insider trading charges, according to a lawyer representing shareholders who were plaintiffs in the case. The shareholder derivative suit, filed in Superior Court in San Mateo, Calif., stemmed from Mr. Ellison's sales of stock in 2001 before news that Oracle would not meet financial targets, which caused its shares to decline.

The settlement still must be approved by Oracle's board of directors and the court, said Joseph Tabacco Jr., an attorney with Berman DeValerio Pease Tabacco Burt & Pucillo representing plaintiffs in the case. In addition to the payment by Mr. Ellison to charities of his choosing, lawyers involved would receive up to $22.5 million, Mr. Tabacco said. The settlement was reported Monday by the New York Times.

An Oracle spokeswoman declined to comment. A lawyer for Mr. Ellison couldn't immediately be reached.

Oracle To Buy Siebel For $5.53 Billion (WP)

By Mike Musgrove

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Oracle Corp. said yesterday that it has agreed to buy Siebel Systems Inc. in a deal valued at $5.53 billion. If approved, the acquisition would give Oracle an edge on its chief competitor, German firm SAP AG, and reunite top executives who have been bitter Silicon Valley rivals.

Oracle is the world's largest database software company, and Siebel, with a customer base of 3.4 million, is the leader in customer relationship management, or CRM, software, which helps companies organize sales, client and marketing data.

Oracle, which finally won approval of its hostile takeover for rival PeopleSoft earlier this year, has been on a buying spree as a way of bolstering its position against SAP and diversifying its product portfolio. The battle for PeopleSoft, which sparked antitrust concerns from the Department of Justice and European regulators, lasted 18 months before closing in January for $10 billion.

A Justice Department spokeswoman, Gina Talamona, said it was too soon for the agency to comment on Oracle's planned acquisition. "It's certainly something we'd be interested in taking a look at," she said.

Analysts said Oracle's proposed acquisition may not generate the same type of controversy as the PeopleSoft deal because it's not considered a hostile takeover bid and the combined company would not dominate the CRM market.

The acquisition would give Oracle a business that generates $1.6 billion in annual revenue in a CRM market worth $8.8 billion, according to research firm IDC.

If approved, the deal also reunites top executives who have publicly displayed animosity toward each other. Siebel Chairman Thomas M. Siebel spent years as an Oracle executive. When he left to start his own company, the animosity between him and Oracle chief executive Lawrence J. Ellison became part of Silicon Valley lore.

The two were chummy in a conference call with Wall Street analysts yesterday as they pitched the acquisition as a boon to shareholders, employees and customers of both companies.

"In a single step, Oracle becomes the number one CRM applications company in the world," Ellison said in a statement, adding that the deal was encouraged by large customers who wanted to see products from each of the companies work together better. "GE and other mutual customers have long encouraged both companies to get together."

Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 per share, a premium of $1.53 over Siebel's closing price of $9.13 on Friday. After deducting Siebel's $2.24 billion in on-hand cash, Oracle would effectively pay $3.29 billion. In addition, Siebel shareholders could elect to exchange their shares for Oracle stock instead of cash. But if more than 30 percent of Siebel's outstanding shares are offered, Oracle said, it would prorate the exchange.

Siebel's stock reacted to the news yesterday by jumping more than 12 percent, or $1.16, to close at $10.29. Oracle's stock rose slightly, up 21 cents to close at $13.49.

The deal is expected to close early next year.

Thomas Siebel, who controlled about 55 million shares -- or more than 10 percent -- of the company as of April, characterized the deal as "wonderfully exciting" and a "natural business combination."

Tom Dwyer, and analyst at the Yankee Group, called the acquisition a "logical marriage" and another sign of the amount of consolidation in the business application market.

But others, including Janet White of Info-Tech Research Group, criticized Oracle for its slow integration of product lines it's already acquired and said the company has overcommitted itself to support the products created by competitors it has acquired.

"You have to wonder how many resources are left over for innovating any new products or services," she said .

Oracle To Buy Rival Siebel In $5.85B Deal (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, September 13, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Oracle Corp. is buying hobbled Siebel Systems Inc. for about $5.85 billion, eliminating another competitor in its campaign to grab market share from business applications software leader SAP AG.

Under the terms of the deal announced Monday, Redwood Shores-based Oracle will pay $10.66 per share in cash or stock for Siebel, whose products help manage companies' relations with customers.

The price represented a 17 percent premium from Siebel's market value entering Monday. Despite four years of flagging fortunes, Siebel still has $2.24 billion in cash, reducing Oracle's net takeover cost to $3.6 billion.

Shares of San Mateo-based Siebel rose $1.16, or nearly 13 percent, to close at $10.29 during late afternoon trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, where Oracle's shares gained 21 cents to finish at $13.49.

The deal accelerates the drive by Oracle CEO Larry Ellison to overtake SAP as the world's largest maker of business applications software, which automates a wide range of administrative tasks.

In the past nine months, Oracle has either completed or announced five takeovers in the field, an expansion that has cost more than $17.6 billion. Among the acquired was PeopleSoft Inc., which like Siebel Systems was run by a former Oracle executive who had developed a frosty relationship Ellison.

For its part, SAP downplayed the significance of Oracle's latest conquest.

"Oracle is in the business to buy customers. Ours is to service customers," said SAP spokesman Tony Roddam.

DOJ_NMG_0004610

The Siebel acquisition, expected to close early next year, affects about 4,000 customers. The company has about 5,000 workers, many of whom are expected to lose their jobs as Oracle cuts costs in an effort to boost its profits by about 20 percent annually.

Industry analyst Richard Williams of Garban Institutional Equities predicted Oracle will lay off more than 2,000 workers, based on the percentage of jobs the company eliminated after devouring PeopleSoft, which had about 11,000 employees. Oracle fired 5,000 workers after that deal.

Oracle executives acknowledged that layoffs are likely but didn't provide specific projections in a Monday conference call.

Oracle's intensifying focus on business applications software largely reflects the slowing growth of its database product line, which accounts for more than three-fourths of the company's sales.

Ellison also wants to deepen Oracle's stack of technology products to compete with two other longtime rivals, Microsoft Corp. and IBM Corp.

"Oracle was behind the curve so it needed to buy some big headline-making companies and feed off their technology," Williams said. "They really didn't have much choice, unless they wanted to see their stock price cut in half. They needed to keep their sales growing, and to do that, they need to cannibalize smaller companies."

The big question now is whether Oracle has bitten off more than it can chew, said Octavio Marenzi, chief executive of Celent, a technology consultancy. "Mergers are always difficult, so doing so many at once only compounds the difficult," he said. "This appears to be an unduly risky strategy."

AMR Research analyst Jim Shepherd believes Oracle can pull it off, primarily because the PeopleSoft takeover has gone more smoothly than most industry experts anticipated.

Ellison began preparing for a software industry shakeout in 2003 when he drew up a list of potential takeover targets topped by PeopleSoft and Siebel Systems, according to documents released in an antitrust trial last year.

Oracle first stalked PeopleSoft, launching an 18-month takeover battle that culminated in a $11.1 billion acquisition last December.

That deal pitted Ellison against one of his former Oracle lieutenants, Craig Conway, who spearheaded PeopleSoft's staunch resistance to the takeover bid until he was fired a few months before the two sides negotiated a truce.

The U.S. Department of Justice tried to derail Oracle's bid for PeopleSoft, arguing that the combination would stifle competition. But a federal judge brushed aside the government's objections and cleared the deal, making it unlikely regulators will oppose Oracle's takeover of Siebel Systems, which is much smaller.

European regulators also must approve the takeover.

Siebel Systems is run by Tom Siebel, who has occasionally sniped at his former boss since leaving Oracle and starting his own company in 1993.

But Tom Siebel, who is his company's chairman and largest individual shareholder, welcomed Oracle's takeover offer, calling it a "wonderful, exciting event" during Monday's conference call.

In the same call, Ellison said Siebel, 52, is expected to remain with Oracle for a few years, but didn't provide specific details. Siebel is in line to pocket nearly $600 million by selling his Siebel Systems stock to Oracle.

Siebel Systems has been shrinking since 2001 amid weakening demand for its main product -- customer relationship management, or CRM, software that helps companies analyze their sales patterns and market their products.

The niche accounts for about $3.5 billion in new software sales annually according to Gartner Inc., but Siebel Systems has been losing market share to SAP, Oracle and an Internet startup, Salesforce.com Inc.

"Siebel could see the writing on the wall and knew the time had come to make a deal," said Yankee Group analyst Tom Dwyer.

Siebel's annual revenue has plunged from a peak of $2.1 billion in 2001 to $1.3 billion last year, a slump that has dragged down the company's stock from its highs of more than $100 per share.

Hoping to turn things around last year, Tom Siebel stepped down as the company's CEO and turned over the reins to a veteran IBM executive, Mike Lawrie.

But sales continued to falter, prompting the company's board to oust Lawrie in April and replace him with George Shaheen, an executive best known in Silicon Valley for overseeing the expensive demise of online grocer Webvan Group Inc.

Oracle Agrees To Buy Siebel Systems For $5.85 Bln (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 12, 2005

Sept. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Oracle Corp., the world's third-largest software maker, agreed to buy Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion, leapfrogging SAP AG to become the top seller of programs that manage customer relations.

DOJ_NMG_0004611

Siebel investors will receive $10.66 a share in cash or stock, Redwood City, California-based Oracle said today in a statement. That's 17 percent more than Siebel's closing price Sept. 9.

The purchase, Oracle's seventh this year, reunites Chief Executive Officer Larry Ellison and former protege Tom Siebel. The acquisition also helps Oracle tap the biggest and fastest-growing class of business applications. Siebel lost the top spot in the market to Germany's SAP in 2004 because clients wanted to buy broader packages of software that run everything from customer service to accounting to human resources.

``Siebel had a business that didn't appear fixable,'' said Herbert Denton, president of Providence Capital Inc. in New York, which has been among the holders calling for the company to be sold. ``The notion that they were going to get back to double digit-growth was far-fetched and reality caught up with the board.''

The deal builds on a process that began with the $10.6 billion hostile takeover of PeopleSoft Inc. in January to help cut Oracle's reliance on database software, which makes up 80 percent of sales. The Siebel bid came after clients including General Electric Co. encouraged the deal, Ellison, 61, said on a conference call today.

Siebel shares gained $1.17 to $10.30 at 3:29 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They had dropped 13 percent this year before today. Trading in Siebel call options, which are a bet that the share price will rise, surged Sept. 9, rising to 73,383 contracts, from 1,761 the day before. The stock rose 5.2 percent Sept. 9.

Oracle rose 16 cents to $13.44 and lost 3.2 percent before today. Shares of SAP, which still outpaces Oracle in the overall market for applications, fell 10 cents to $44.23 in New York.

Job Cuts?

The purchase, negotiated between Oracle co-President Charles Phillips and Tom Siebel in the past several months, accelerates consolidation in the software industry. Anti-virus program maker Symantec Corp. bought Veritas Software Corp. in July. International Business Machines Corp. in May bought Ascential Software Corp.

Siebel is attractive because it has a wider set of programs in this area than competitors, with some fine-tuned for industries such as financial services, communications and government, Ellison said.

The company may fire as many workers as it did after the PeopleSoft purchase, when Oracle cut 5,000 jobs, said Andrew Brosseau, an analyst at SG Cowen Securities Corp. in Boston. Siebel had 5,089 employees as of last quarter.

``Oracle is buying a more-complete product portfolio from a company that's been failing to execute,'' Brosseau said. The firm doesn't have ratings on either company.

PeopleSoft Done

The customer-service market will grow to $10 billion by 2009 from $8 billion in 2004, Oracle said citing researcher IDC.

Customer-service software lets businesses keep track of interactions with customers: the status of their accounts, what products they own, contact information, and call logs to keep track of all interactions with them.

``We wouldn't make any other large acquisitions until we had a few successful quarters showing that the PeopleSoft integration had worked,'' Ellison said on the call about the timing of today's deal. The PeopleSoft ``integration is complete. The numbers are good.''

Siebel's Fall

Tom Siebel, 52, founded the company in 1993, three years after leaving his job as a marketing executive at Oracle. The Internet boom fueled sales, propelling the stock to a high of $119.31 in November 2000 and giving Siebel a market value of $63.2 billion.

Since then, his San Mateo, California-based company has had three years of declining sales because Siebel didn't sell a wide enough variety of programs.

Siebel this year has cut jobs and research spending to help shore up its results after ousting former CEO Mike Lawrie in April after less than a year on the job. New CEO George Shaheen in July blamed the second-quarter loss on a failure to clinch large orders.

Ellison first mentioned it as a takeover target in June 2004 during an antitrust trial over Oracle's PeopleSoft bid.

Tom Siebel will work with Oracle for an undisclosed number of years in an undisclosed role, Ellison said. Tom Siebel, the biggest shareholder with 6.94 percent of the stock, will receive about $386.3 million for his stake.

Hedge funds Tudor Investment Corp. and SAC Capital Advisors LLC may earn about 18 percent on their investments, made in the second quarter. Tudor, run by Paul Tudor Jones and Siebel's No. 2 holder as of June 30, may yield a potential profit of about $51.7 million. SAC in Stamford, Connecticut, founded by Steven Cohen, has a potential gain of about $13.8 million.

Cash or Stock

Ellison said the acquisition will also help Oracle, which has spent more than $18 billion on takeovers this year, bolster its on- demand software business, where customers pay a fixed monthly fee per user to use software over the Internet.

Siebel, which provides its on-demand service with IBM, said it has about 40,000 subscribers for its service. San Francisco-based Salesforce.com Inc. says it's the market leader, with 308,000 users. Microsoft Corp. CEO Steve Ballmer said last week the company is also working on a service to rival Salesforce.com.

Siebel holders will receive cash unless they prefer stock. No more than 30 percent of Siebel's shares may be exchanged for stock. If more holders want shares, the equity part will be pro-rated.

If Oracle's average share price is at or above $10.72 prior to close, holders can receive $10.66 per share of value in Oracle stock. If the average price is less than $10.72, holders receive 0.994 shares of Oracle for each share of Siebel.

The deal will add to Oracle's profit in its first full year in fiscal 2007, excluding some costs, Oracle said. The purchase needs regulatory approval and is expected to close in early 2006. Siebel has cash and short-term investments of $2.2 billion.

Morgan Stanley represented Oracle and Goldman Sachs and Perseus LLC handled the deal for Siebel, the companies said today.

2nd UPDATE: Oracle To Buy Siebel For $5.85 Billion (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, September 12, 2005

NEW YORK -(Dow Jones)- Oracle Corp. (ORCL) (ORCL) agreed to buy fellow business software maker Siebel Systems Inc. (SEBL) (SEBL) for about $5.85 billion in a deal meant to bolster Oracle's challenge to market leader SAP AG (SAP) (SAP).

If the deal closes as planned in early 2006, Oracle, which has been playing the role of industry consolidator, will have spent about $17 billion on acquisitions to shore up its applications business in a span of about 12 months.

Oracle has been expanding in applications - software that performs functions such as managing finances, monitoring supplies, and tracking customer data - to augment its larger database business, which faces robust challenges from International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) (IBM), Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) (MSFT), and the open-source community.

In the long-anticipated deal, Oracle agreed to pay $10.66 a share for Siebel - a premium of about 17% to Siebel's closing price Friday. Oracle will pay for up to 30% of the deal with its stock. The remainder will be financed with about $3 billion in debt and about $1.5 billion from cash reserves. Those cash reserves will be replenished through Siebel's $2.24 billion cash pile.

Rival SAP played down the impact of the deal. "We see no impact and no reason to react," Chief Executive Henning Kagermann told The Wall Street Journal in a telephone interview Monday. Any acquisitions SAP is likely to make would be " targeted, fill-in acquisitions" that would "help us improve our product portfolio," he said.

In a conference call Monday, Oracle Chief Executive Larry Ellison said the deal meets the company's two main acquisition criteria: it's immediately accretive to earnings and it's strategically sound.

On the same call, Chief Financial Officer Greg Maffei said Siebel would add 2 cents to 3 cents a share to Oracle's fiscal 2007 earnings. That represents a modest boost of 2% to 3% to earnings in the fiscal year ending May 2007. Analysts on average estimate Oracle's pro forma earnings per share at 92 cents a share, according to Thomson First Call.

Ellison said Siebel would contribute to Oracle's goal of 20% annual earnings growth. He said Oracle was ready for another big acquisition after integrating PeopleSoft, which the company bought for about $10.6 billion after an 18-month hostile takeover battle. The company would now focus its energies on smaller deals. "I don't think you'll see another major acquisition anytime soon," said Ellison.

For the fiscal year ended May 31, Oracle earned $2.89 billion, or 55 cents a share, on revenue of $11.8 billion. Income before items was 68 cents a share. Siebel earned $110.7 million, or 20 cents a share, on revenue of $1.34 billion, in 2004.

Analysts were skeptical of the deal, saying it adds confusion and complexity to Oracle's applications business, which has struggled in the past and is in the midst of a major product redesign. It also brings into the fold a company with few growth prospects.

"The bottom line is Siebel can't grow," said Richard Williams, an analyst with Garban Institutional Equities, who doesn't own shares in either company and whose firm doesn't have a banking relationship with the companies.

"Oracle appears to be close to biting off more than they can chew," said Octavio Marenzi, Chief Executive of research and consulting firm Celent. "Oracle risks trying to integrate too many pieces at once. At the same time, the CRM market has lost its bloom."

Credit rating agency Fitch put Oracle's A- credit rating on negative watch. " Fitch remains concerned about integration risks associated with the...acquisitions (of Siebel and PeopleSoft)," Fitch said in a statement. "(Fitch) also believes successful integration and cost-cutting initiatives from these various acquisitions could result in Oracle having stronger operating fundamentals and a more competitive position."

Siebel, the leader in the $8 billion customer relationship management software market, has issued profit warnings for the last two consecutive quarters, with new software sales disappointing. It also ousted Chief Executive J. Michael Lawrie after the disappointing first quarter.

Siebel is getting squeezed by bigger players like Oracle and SAP, as well as by more nimble vendors such as Salesforce.com Inc. (CRM) (CRM). Tom Siebel, Siebel's founder and chairman, acknowledged that a market shift that favored vendors that sell a broader suite of products, like Oracle, was a driving force behind the decision to sell the company.

Salesforce.com (CRM), which offers its software as a Web-based service, sees Siebel's acquisition by Oracle as a chance for it to gain market share. "The opportunity to be the global leader in the CRM market has opened for salesforce.com," Chief Executive Marc Benioff said a statement. "Our dream is becoming reality."

Salesforce.com (CRM) user base is only about 10% of Siebel's 3.4 million users, but it's been growing rapidly unlike Siebel.

In recent months, Siebel had battled against the sale, rebuffing activist investors and espousing a go-it-alone growth strategy. In May, Siebel promised its nearly 5,300 employees more severance pay and health coverage if the company was acquired.

But that drive for independence appears to have given way to the certainty of cash and a clear exit. Tom Siebel alone stands to cash in nearly $400 million - a payout he would have had difficulty realizing if his company remained independent.

Siebel's board has voted in favor of the deal, and Tom Siebel, who will have an undefined role at Oracle following the deal, has agreed to vote his shares for the transaction. He controls almost 7% of the company's stock.

Oracle's Ellison said Siebel's integration would be "dramatically easier" than PeopleSoft's, because the deal for Siebel was friendly and because of the experience gained in the PeopleSoft process.

He also said Oracle would support Siebel products for "many, many years to come" and would retain Siebel's sales force.

Oracle is currently committed to support PeopleSoft products through 2013, and is in the process of melding PeopleSoft and Oracle applications into a single system, called Fusion, which is due to be rolled out in 2008.

Oracle, PeopleSoft, as well as J.D. Edwards - a company acquired along with PeopleSoft - all have products with sales support and customer service functions similar to Siebel's. Still, Siebel is the recognized industry leader.

The deal is subject to approval by Siebel's shareholders and regulatory authorities. Oracle shareholder approval isn't required, because of the relatively small number of shares involved.

Oracle isn't likely to face the same amount of regulatory resistance as it did when it sought to take over PeopleSoft, because the deal's friendly and U.S. antitrust officials are still smarting from the PeopleSoft setback, said Jeff Comport, an analyst with industry research firm Gartner.

The conversion rate of Oracle's shares will be fixed by the average price of Oracle stock in the 10 trading days before closing. If Oracle's average share price is at or above $10.72 before closing, Siebel shareholders who choose to receive stock will get $10.66 a share in Oracle stock for each share of Siebel stock held.

If Oracle's average share price before closing is less than $10.72 a share, Siebel shareholders who choose stock will receive 0.994 Oracle shares for each share of Siebel stock held. This would result in a value of less than $10.66 a share.

Oracle plans to repurchase an amount of shares equal to the number of shares issued in the transaction to address dilution concerns.

Oracle shares were recently trading at $13.46, up 18 cents or 1.4%. Siebel shares rose 12.9% at $10.31.

Regulators Move Ahead On Two Phone Mergers (AP)

By JENNIFER C. KERR, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The head of the Federal Communications Commission has asked agency staff to draft orders approving two big phone company mergers - SBC Communications Inc. with AT&T, and Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI Inc.

FCC chairman Kevin Martin wants the commission to take a final vote on the deals next month, two people with firsthand knowledge of the issue said Monday. They were authorized to speak about the drafts only on the condition of anonymity.

The sources would not say what conditions might be placed on the mergers to ensure competition is not compromised.

An FCC spokesman declined to comment.

SBC's deal to acquire AT&T is valued at $16 billion while Verizon is offering $8.5 billion for MCI. SBC and Verizon already are the largest regional phone companies, known informally as "Baby Bells." The mergers would enhance their base of business customers and expand their national and international presence.

DOJ_NMG_0004614

The Bells have been peeling away long-distance customers from AT&T and MCI by offering unlimited national calling for a set rate.

Martin's request for drafts of approval signal his intention to press ahead with the mergers despite the 2-2 split between Republicans and Democrats on the commission. The decision also seems to indicate Martin's willingness to reach out to the Democrats to craft an agreement.

The White House has not given any hint as to when it might fill the FCC's open fifth seat, which will go to a Republican.

The Justice Department also will have to sign off on the mergers.

Analysts expect the mergers will come with conditions to ensure competition is retained in different service areas. For example, Jessica Zufolo, senior policy analyst with Medley Global Advisors, said regulators have expressed concerns about special access lines - the fiber optic lines that allow large businesses to hook to the Internet and the interstate network.

"Once you eliminate AT&T and MCI, the fear is that the Bells will be able to establish a bottleneck to large business users," she said.

Consumer advocates say AT&T and MCI are the only real competitors to the Bells in those markets, and that competition will disappear if the mergers gain approval.

"We're losing serious competitors for the residential consumer and the business market," said Mark Cooper, research director at the Consumer Federation of America.

SBC spokesman Michael Balmoris declined to comment on Martin's decision to move toward approval of the mergers, saying only that the company remains "optimistic the FCC recognizes the benefits the merger will bring in terms of greater choice, and access to new technologies."

Verizon spokesman David Fish said its merger with MCI would benefit consumers and should get all the necessary regulatory approvals later this year or early next year.

EBay To Acquire Internet Phone Leader (WP)

By Jonathan Krim

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Online auction giant eBay Inc. announced a deal yesterday to become one of the world's largest telecommunications companies, buying Internet phone-service leader Skype Technologies SA.

Although Luxembourg-based Skype is relatively unknown in the United States, it has amassed 54 million global customers in less than three years by offering free calls between those who use its software.

EBay became a commerce powerhouse by hosting everything from auctions of grandma's collectibles to retail sales of new furniture and electronics, but its growth has stagnated, and analysts said the Skype deal is an effort to inject new life. The company said it sees Skype's technology as a vital tool for letting buyers and sellers talk to each other, exchange information and close sales more rapidly.

The deal would vault eBay ahead of other technology titans such as Microsoft Corp., Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc. in developing services to make voice calling an additional feature of using personal computers, akin to e-mail or instant messaging. EBay said it would pay $2.6 billion in cash and stock for Skype, along with future payments that could total an additional $1.5 billion.

Founded by business partners who developed the Kazaa file-sharing service for online music and videos, Skype quickly dwarfed other Internet-based phone companies such as Vonage Holdings Corp., which recently celebrated its 1 millionth customer.

Large cable and telephone firms, such as AT&T Corp., Verizon Communications Inc. and Comcast Corp., also are starting to offer online phone service. They typically charge $20 to $35 per month for unlimited calling in the United States, including free add-ons such as voice mail and call forwarding, and consumers use regular telephone handsets attached to special computer modems that handle the voice calls.

Skype's service and technology differ dramatically from those offerings. Making a Skype call is more like sending an instant message from a personal computer; all that is required is an Internet connection, a microphone for talking, and speakers or a headset for listening.

Skype charges nothing for its software but makes money by charging small fees for making calls to non-Skype users and for talking to people on regular phone networks. Voice mail also is extra.

"By combining the two leading e-commerce franchises, eBay and [online payment service] PayPal, with the leader in Internet voice communications, we will create an extraordinarily powerful environment for business on the Net," eBay chief executive Margaret C. Whitman said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0004615

In addition to boosting sales, which would earn eBay more commissions, company officials envision Skype accelerating types of electronic commerce that depend heavily on voice conversation, such as personal services, real estate and new cars.

Skype would continue to operate as a separate business, with founders Niklas Zennstrom of Sweden and Janus Friis of Denmark remaining at the helm. The deal would make rich men of the pair, who had been considered outlaws by the U.S. entertainment industry for developing Kazaa, which they sold in 2002.

Zennstrom remains a target of some U.S. litigation accusing Kazaa of facilitating piracy of copyrighted music, videos and software. Skype makes use of the same, underlying "peer-to-peer" technology as Kazaa but carries none of the legal issues.

In an interview, Whitman said Internet telephone service using downloadable software is the future. She cited statistics indicating that by 2009, an estimated 1.5 trillion minutes of voice calls will be Internet-based.

She added that Skype is well ahead of its competition for such systems and already is partnering with such companies as Motorola Inc. for handsets that will work with Skype.

"But we would not have done this if that is all we could see," she said, insisting that integrating Skype, eBay auctions and PayPal would yield significant new revenue for eBay's current businesses.

Closely held Skype had sales of about $7 million last year and is projected to bring in $200 million next year, according to the companies, causing some analysts to question the price eBay paid.

"It's a pretty big number and a pretty big gamble," said Carmi Levy, senior research analyst with Info-Tech Research Group of London, Ontario.

But Levy said that eBay's growth had become stagnant and that it needed to find a way to make its auctions more dynamic.

Zennstrom said in a statement that his vision was always "to build the world's largest communications business and revolutionize the ease with which people can communicate through the Internet. We can't think of a better platform . . . than with eBay and PayPal."

Analysts said the deal would accelerate the evolution of two new classes of voice communication providers.

Led by Skype, one group makes voice a part of the suite of applications on the computer "desktop." These include Google, Yahoo and Microsoft.

The other is made up of telephone and cable companies that seek to make voice calling part of the suite of offerings that comes with high-speed Internet access and television services.

Left out in the cold, said Kate Griffin, consumer technologies analyst for the Yankee Group, could be unaffiliated Internet-phone providers such as Vonage or 8x8 Inc.

Whitman said she does not expect Skype to be a substitute for basic telephone service for a long time, in the same way that eBay auctions have not replaced retail stores.

EBay's new competitors reacted cautiously.

A BellSouth Corp. spokesman said that his company takes Skype seriously and that it should be expected to fulfill the same obligations as other carriers, such as providing 911 services.

Whitman acknowledged that joining the ranks of communications companies would require eBay to "get to know a whole new set of players" in Washington and elsewhere.

EBay To Buy Skype For $2.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Mylene Mangalindan And Christopher Rhoads

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

EBay Inc. said it agreed to acquire Internet-calling start-up Skype Technologies SA for about $2.6 billion in cash and stock, posing a new threat to phone companies and expanding the online-auction company's revenue sources.

Founded in 2002, Luxembourg's Skype allows its subscribers to talk to one another over personal computers free. It also allows cut-rate voice calls from PCs to regular phones or cellphones. Skype, which employs about 200 people, has signed up 54 million users, mainly in Europe and Asia so far, making it one of the fastest-growing online communities.

EBay officials said the acquisition gives the company a new way to reach millions of potential customers, to help customers make complicated transactions, and to open up ways to generate revenue from services such as classified advertisements. Chief Executive Meg Whitman said Skype will also help eBay penetrate developing markets such as India, Brazil, Russia and China that offer huge growth potential but typically have lower levels of trust in Internet-based commerce. "It allows us to create this unique e-commerce engine for buyers and sellers around the world," Ms. Whitman said.

For the telecommunications industry, the deal could raise the stakes in a market already roiled by rapid consolidation in recent months and the infusion of a host of new competitors offering Internet phoning, including cable companies and start-ups like Vonage Holdings Corp. Skype's U.S. presence remains relatively small compared with its visibility in Europe and Asia -- something the eBay deal could help change.

"We think Skype can grow with this association in helping it become the voice of the Internet," said Kelly Larabee, a Skype spokeswoman.

Consumers are increasingly using the Web for voice calls, much as they use it for emailing. Voice services are offered not just by phone companies but also by videogame concerns and Internet companies such as Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc.

EBay contemplated building its own Internet-call service, "but we didn't feel we would have a winning product," Ms. Whitman said in an interview. "Skype is pretty far ahead in many dimensions." Skype boasts a community of 1,000 developers who are building Skype-related applications.

The San Jose, Calif., company may use this acquisition to drive more transactions to traditional merchants who use eBay's comparison-shopping site, Shopping.com, Ms. Whitman said. Those merchants, who already have established telephone call centers to take customer orders, may garner more revenue from customers who have access to Internet phone calls, said Scot Wingo, chief executive of ChannelAdvisor Corp., a closely held company that helps Internet sellers.

EBay also may be able to derive revenue from free classified listings around the world by adding pay-per-call services through Skype, said an eBay spokesman. The company told some analysts that it could link accounts on its PayPal electronic-payment service to Skype accounts, which could help generate more transactions through PayPal.

The eBay-Skype transaction may spur phone companies to more quickly roll out their own voice-over-Internet-protocol services, which most have begun offering in the past year, industry executives said.

EBay was up 32 cents to $38.94 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq composite trading.

EBay said it may pay out as much as $1.5 billion additionally if certain financial targets are met.

Ebay, Skype Deal Challenges Rivals (FT)

By Richard Waters And Paul Taylor

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

Ebay on Monday laid out plans to move beyond its core e-commerce business, potentially putting it on a collision course with Google and Yahoo, as it confirmed its acquisition of internet voice company Skype for up to $4.1bn.

The auction company's executives said that adding a voice calling feature to its existing online network would let it charge fees to merchants for generating sales leads the internet's fastest-growing business, currently dominated by the two biggest search engine companies. It could represent the most important in a series of recent initiatives by Ebay to extendinto new areas of online activity.

However, the high price for the transaction and the young nature of Skype's business prompted scepticism among some telecommunications industry executives and analysts, who questioned Ebay's ability to generate significant revenues from its new acquisition.

“Ebay has no related presence in the online personal communications market (no instant messaging, chat or e-mail services) and we do not see immediate synergies from such a move,” said Mark Main, Senior Analyst with Ovum, the leading telecoms consultancy.

The online auction company said it would pay $2.6bn for Skype, half of it in cash and half in stock, with up to $1.5bn more to be paid if the company meets certain performance targets over the next three years.

Meg Whitman, Ebay's chief executive officer, said that by integrating Skype's voice calling technology into Ebay's markets, making it easier for buyers and sellers to communicate, the company would be able to lower the “friction” in online transactions and increase the overall value of its services.

She also laid out a plan for Ebay to charge fees for generating sales leads, with merchants paying every time a potential customer clicks on a link in an online listing to initiate a voice call.

Some advertisers might beprepared to pay between $2and $12 for each call, she added.

Ebay's millions of visitors could represent a valuable audience for such a service, said Youssef Squali, an analyst atJeffries, a New York investment firm, since they usually visitthe site intending to make a purchase.

Based on conventional measures of valuation, such as its current revenues, the Skype purchase looked expensive, analysts said. The company generated $7m of revenues last year, with $60m expected this year and more than $200m in 2006, eBay said.

Rajiv Dutta, Ebay's chief financial officer, said this represented a faster pick-up in revenues than either Ebay or PayPal, its online payments service, had experienced in their first years of charging for their services, suggesting that Skype would prove a valuable money-earner for the company.

EBay To Buy Skype, Internet Phone Service, For $2.6 Billion (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

EBay said yesterday that it would buy Skype Technologies, the Internet phone provider based in Luxembourg, for $2.6 billion in cash and stock, a move that eBay hopes will bolster trading on its online auction site.

The total value of the deal may grow based on "potential performance-based consideration" that could be worth an additional $1.5 billion, eBay said. Though Skype's revenue is expected to grow to about $200 million in 2006, from an estimated $60 million this year, eBay does not expect Skype - which gives its basic PC-to-PC service away free - to turn a profit until the fourth quarter next year.

The deal ends months of speculation about who might scoop up Skype, which since 2002 has been offering downloadable software that allows users to talk to one another over the Internet through their personal computers. The News Corporation, Google and Yahoo had been mentioned as potential suitors in recent months.

Meg Whitman, chief executive of eBay, said the acquisition did not mean that eBay intended to become a Web portal like Yahoo, Microsoft and Google, which deliver a range of services.

Instead, Skype's voice communications technology will make online trading easier for eBay's 157 million users, she said, particularly with transactions involving real estate, big-ticket purchases and services that require detailed conversations.

"I'm a big believer in focusing brands and businesses that are in very large markets," Ms. Whitman said by phone from London. EBay is "absolutely not" interested in developing a portal, she said. "You can be sure we're going to focus on e-commerce."

Noting that eBay also owns PayPal, the online payment service, Ms. Whitman said "by combining the two leading e-commerce franchises, eBay and PayPal, with the leader in Internet voice communications, we will create an extraordinarily powerful environment for business on the net."

The deal also adds a new twist to the story of Skype's co-founders, Niklas Zennstrom and Janus Friis, who developed Skype after creating and selling Kazaa, the controversial file-sharing service.

That company has been at the center of a copyright infringement lawsuit filed by the music industry. Mr. Zennstrom and Mr. Friis sold Kazaa in January 2002 to Australian investors before that suit was filed. They were named as defendants in the suit, but they have challenged the jurisdiction of the United States courts because they are citizens in Europe. (Nothing bars Mr. Zennstrom and Mr. Friis from traveling to the United States, but they have not been to this country in many years.)

Executives at eBay said that any litigation involving Kazaa or the involvement of Mr. Zennstrom and Mr. Friis in Kazaa would not affect Skype or eBay. Skype, like Kazaa, uses a peer-to-peer file-sharing technology.

While eBay will acquire Skype's 54 million users in 225 countries and territories, the company said it was not interested in becoming a telecommunications provider or challenging traditional phone providers. Still, with Skype adding 150,000 new users a day, the company represents another threat to established carriers like the Bell companies, which maintain extensive phone and data networks.

"Skype is very disruptive to the telecom business and it's one of the reasons people are adopting to it quickly," Mr. Zennstrom said.

In North America, Skype has more users and carries more voice traffic than any other Internet-based phone provider, the companies said.

In addition to the basic service, about two million Skype customers have signed up for a pay service that allows them to use their computers to make calls to regular phone numbers as well as receive calls from landlines and cellphones. To complete these calls, Skype pays phone companies small per-minute fees.

Only 13 percent of Skype's users are in North America; nearly half are in Europe and another quarter are in Asia.

While Skype is the market leader in peer-to-peer voice software, it is not alone. Last month, Google announced Google Talk, a service similar to Skype's free service, and Microsoft said it was acquiring Teleo, a San Francisco company that allows users to call conventional phones from their PC's.

Some industry specialists said eBay's purchase of Skype was a sign that voice calls would increasingly become one of many services that Internet companies would provide, rather than a stand-alone business.

"This turns the entire telecom industry picture on its head, and demonstrates that voice, presence, text messaging and other I.P.-based applications will be essential for the company of the future," said Jeff Pulver, the chairman of pulvermedia, which promotes Internet-based phone services.

Investors seemed to agree. Shares in eBay rose 32 cents, to $38.94, on Monday. The company's shares have fallen 31.7 percent this year, however, because of investor concerns about its slowing growth.

Some industry analysts were also skeptical about the high price for a company with so little revenue that is facing increasing competition from other Internet phone providers.

"Quite frankly, you look at the numbers and you realize there has to be something more for eBay to buy into," said Carmi Levy, an analyst at the Info-Tech Research Group in London, Ontario. "In 1998, we used to see the same thing with the buying of companies that did not have a whole lot of prospects."

While the purchase will shave about 12 cents off earnings next year, the price paid for Skype is less than 5 percent of eBay's market capitalization of $53 billion.

EBay will also inherit some of the legal and regulatory challenges facing Skype. Regulators in the United States and elsewhere have yet to decide, for instance, whether Skype will have to make it possible for its customers to call 911 and have their locations recognized by emergency responders.

$2.6B Deal Gets EBay Into Internet Telephony (USAT)

By Kevin Maney

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Making one of its riskiest bets yet, eBay said Monday that it will buy Internet voice service Skype.

That could eventually pit eBay against phone companies and VoIP services such as Vonage. Buying Skype "is a lot more of a stretch than any of the other acquisitions they've done," says David Edwards, equity analyst at American Technology Research.

EBay will pay $2.6 billion for Skype, which can be used to make free, high-quality voice calls from one computer running Skype software to another, anywhere in the world. Customers need a PC with a microphone. For a fee, Skype users can call regular telephones and vice versa.

EBay insists the deal isn't a major corporate turn. Top eBay executives became aware of Skype about a year ago, "And we started putting some thinking against Skype," says eBay CFO Rajiv Dutta.

Building Skype into eBay will allow buyers and sellers to click a button on the screen to talk to each other, Dutta says. That would be valuable when a buyer has a lot of questions about an expensive product, such as a car, or when an auction is close to closing.

"We've always sought to remove friction from e-commerce," eBay CEO Meg Whitman says. Adding Skype "will lead to a better experience and increase the velocity of trades." Plus, eBay could charge sellers to add Skype to their postings, Whitman says.

Yet the deal moves eBay into unfamiliar territory against powerful competitors. Skype co-founder Niklas Zennstrom on Monday repeated his boast that he has a "vision of creating the world's largest communications company."

"That's what made Skype special to us," Dutta says. "We loved their vision."

Though other online services such as Google Talk offer free computer-to-computer voice conversations, Skype has caught fire globally. It's adding 150,000 users a day, the majority in countries such as China, India and Sweden. In 2005, Skype's first full year of charging for services, it will have revenue of $60 million. Skype expects revenue to jump to $200 million in 2006.

Before starting Skype, Zennstrom and partner Janus Friis created Kazaa, a file-sharing service that has mostly been used to trade pirated music.

EBay sees Skype as a high-growth business and strong brand name on the Net, which could help reinvigorate eBay's growth, Dutta says. In 2003, eBay's revenue jumped 78% from the year before. In 2004, growth slowed to 51%. EBay shares closed Monday at $38.94, up 32 cents.

EBay To Acquire Internet Communications Company Skype (LAT/AP)

By From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Online auctioneer eBay Inc. agreed today to pay at least $2.6 billion in cash and stock for Internet phone provider Skype Technologies SA, confounding many analysts who questioned the lofty price tag and the companies' compatibility.

The total value of the deal may climb to $4.1 billion based on whether Skype meets a series of performance targets over the next three years, San Jose, Calif.-based eBay said. It said the acquisition would create "an unparalleled e-commerce and communications engine" for Internet users worldwide.

Low-cost Internet phone providers like Skype are creating upheaval in the telecommunications industry. That's because Voice over Internet Protocol technology, or VoIP, breaks calls into data packets that get routed over the Internet, which is much more efficient and cheaper than the traditional circuit-switched phone system.

Skype -- founded by the creators of Kazaa, the free music-sharing program that riled the music business -- gives away software lets people talk for free over the Internet using computers and microphones. A paid version, SkypeOut, allows those calls to be connected to regular phones.

Other big Internet names have expanded their VoIP capabilities lately, including Google Inc., which rolled out a new instant-messaging program with voice service. Last month Microsoft Corp. acquired Teleo Inc., a small startup whose software lets people make calls from computers to traditional telephones.

But some analysts have been skeptical about eBay's need to own a VoIP provider.

EBay buyers and sellers can communicate with each other via e-mail before a transaction is complete -- eBay says about 5 million such messages are exchanged daily. Adding Skype and its voice capabilities will speed the communication between parties and increase the level of trust, said Meg Whitman, eBay's chief executive.

"It's instantaneous and private," she said. "You don't have the person's phone number, just a user name, so it protects the privacy of all users."

She also said Skype would help eBay open "several new lines of business."

"Communications is at the heart of e-commerce and community," said Whitman, who had won praise for avoiding deals beyond eBay's core, marketplace-based strategy, especially during the late 1990s Internet craze. "We will create an extraordinarily powerful environment for business on the Net."

EBay shares rose 23 cents, or 0.6 percent, to $38.85 in morning trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Niklas Zennstrom, Skype's CEO and co-founder, will join eBay's senior executive team. He said the deal will help advance his company's goal to "revolutionize the ease with which people can communicate through the Internet."

"When we started Skype, our vision was to create a global communications company," he said, noting that the company has users in almost every country. "I think the only country we don't have on the map is North Korea."

But Ovum analyst Mark Main said he considered the deal "far-fetched" and said eBay could have found cheaper ways to improve its Internet communication abilities.

"EBay could have developed its own sophisticated messaging and communications platform, or even bought one, for far less money than it is paying for Skype," Main said. "And if eBay is mainly paying for Skype's user base and brand, that makes this a risky investment."

Whitman, however, said Skype's name carries great value with customers, noting that many Internet users have started referring to phoning via their computer as "to Skype someone."

"When people are using your brand name as a verb, that is incredibly powerful," Whitman said.

She also said Skype has great market share in places where eBay is not heavily used, such as Japan and the Nordic countries, which may help the online auction company attract more customers.

Skype has 53 million registered users, including more than 2 million who pay for its premium services. Since it was introduced in 2003, the company's free software has been downloaded more than 164 million times.

In 2004, the company generated about $7 million in revenue, which it projects will snowball to $60 million this year and more than $200 million in 2006.

EBay recently trounced analysts' expectations by reporting it earned $291.6 million, or 21 cents per share, for the three months ended in June, a 53 percent increase from last year. Revenue totaled $1.09 billion, a 40 percent increase.

Overall, eBay's community spanned 157 million registered users, up 10 million from March. The company had $3.7 billion in cash and other current assets as of June 30.

But bringing Skype into the fold is expected to cut eBay's earnings in the short term. EBay projected that the acquisition will reduce earnings per share by 4 cents in the fourth quarter of this year and by 12 cents in 2006.

Real Estate Competition Up For Debate (INMAN)

Inman News, September 13, 2005

Four days after launching a lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors for alleged anticompetitive practices, federal agencies are planning a public forum to discuss competition in the real estate industry.

The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission will jointly host a one-day workshop on competition policy and the real estate industry next month, the agencies said.

The workshop will be held on Oct. 25, at the FTC's Satellite Building Conference Center located at 601 New Jersey Ave. NW, in Washington, D.C.

The workshop is free and open to the public and aims to provide a forum on the competitiveness of the residential real estate industry, focusing on topics such as multiple listing services, discount and limited-service brokers, and minimum-service requirements.

DOJ_NMG_0004620

In particular, discussion will center on the real estate transaction, the multiple listing service, and private and state actions that affect competition among brokers.

Parties seeking to participate as panelists in the workshop must notify both the Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the FTC in writing on or before Sept. 25. Persons submitting a request to participate as a panelist will be notified on or before Oct. 11, if they have been selected.

The Justice Department on Thursday filed an antitrust lawsuit against the National Association of Realtors challenging the trade group's policies for Internet listings. The lawsuit charges that NAR's Web listings policy is anticompetitive because it blocks new brokerage companies from entering the market.

NAR's newest Internet listings policy was made public last Thursday. It combines and eliminates two previous policies for Web listings display.

NAR asserts that the Justice Department "mischaracterized the purpose and effect" of a part of the new policy that enables brokers to restrain their listings from being shown on other brokers' Web sites. The trade group has said that part of the policy "was intended to protect brokers' ownership rights in their property listings."

NAR officials had been in discussions with the Justice Department since May, seeking a compromise that would've relieved antitrust officials' concerns.

The Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the FTC are accepting public comments on the issue until Nov. 28. Comments may be submitted in hardcopy or electronic format. For more detailed instructions on how to submit comments, see the Federal Register Notice.

Last week's lawsuit is the latest in a multilevel attack on the industry. The Justice Department earlier this year filed a lawsuit against the Kentucky Real Estate Commission over its restrictions on real estate rebates. The suit was settled in July, when the state commission lifted the ban on rebates.

Also, Justice Department and FTC officials have been sending out warning letters to states considering adopting legislation or regulation that could inhibit some discount and limited-service brokerage models.

U.K. Loan Insurers Face Antitrust Probe After Group Complains (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 13, 2005

Sept. 13 (Bloomberg) -- Barclays Plc, Lloyds TSB Group Plc, HBOS Plc and Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc are among U.K. banks facing an antitrust probe after a consumer group said loan insurance in Britain is expensive and inappropriately sold.

Citizens Advice, a nonprofit organization, asked Britain's Office of Fair Trading to investigate the 5 billion-pound ($9.1 billion) a year market after uncovering numerous problems, the London-based organization said in an e-mailed statement released today. The complaint triggered an automatic review by the antitrust regulator, which has 90 days to decide on a full investigation.

The call for an investigation of loan insurers is the second this year, after a committee of lawmakers in February asked the Financial Services Authority, the main regulator of banks and insurers, for a probe, saying some consumers have purchased policies that they won't be able to use to make claims.

``Borrowers are often sold completely inappropriate policies," Citizens Advice said. ``The sale of protection insurance is also often linked to irresponsible lending."

The report didn't name any companies involved in the sale of loan insurance, which is provided by all of Britain's biggest banks on credit card and other unsecured debt.

Loan insurance policies are intended to cover payments on debt if the borrower falls ill or becomes unemployed. In some instances banks have sold these policies to people who are already unemployed or ill, which would then prohibit them from claiming under the policies, Citizens Advice said.

The Treasury Select Committee, which has been investigating credit card charges by Britain's biggest banks, in February said some lenders were providing quotes for loans without making clear that these included charges for insurance. Banks also failed to explain the circumstances under which customers can't claim, the committee said.

Private Equity Firms Buy Hertz For $15bn (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, September 13, 2005

A consortium of three private equity groups on Monday announced the purchase of Hertz, the New Jersey-based car rental business, in a deal worth $15bn that ranks as the largest buy-out since 1989.

DOJ_NMG_0004621

The acquisition, by Clayton Dubilier & Rice, Carlyle, and the buy-out unit of Merrill Lynch, came after several weeks of negotiations with Ford, the carmaker that has owned all of Hertz since 2001 and is selling the unit as part of its revitalisation plan.

The three buyers will be paying $5.6bn in cash to Ford, and have agreed to assume nearly $10bn in debt under the agreement.

CD&R, which specialises in acquiring units of large conglomerates, had been considering a buy-out of Hertz for three years. After Ford announced it was exploring options for its rental business in June, the discussions accelerated, and CD&R was joined by the other two members of the consortium. The $15bn price tag makes Hertz the largest buy-out since RJR Nabisco was acquired by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts 16 years ago for roughly $30bn.

In recent years, private equity groups have been raising increasingly large pools of money, from which they have been making ever greater investments. This year, there have been a number of blockbuster buy-outs, the biggest of which was SunGard Data Systems' sale to seven investment firms for $11.3bn.

David Wasserman of CD&R on Monday explained the rationale for the deal by the Fthat Hertz had a "leading franchise, a great brand, and a seasoned and strong management team".

The buyers dismissed suggestions that the jump in petrol prices could make it an unattractive time to invest in car rentals, by saying that they were optimistic about the long-term trends in the travel industry.

The acquisition is being financed with a combination of asset-backed securities linked to Hertz's fleet of rental cars, traditional corporate debt, and the equity contributions of the three buy-out groups.

Mr Wasserman appeared to indicate that there would be no significant changes in strategy at Hertz under the new owners, which outbid a rival private equity consortium including Blackstone and Texas Pacific Group.

There were no plans to extract cost savings through large-scale staff reductions, and the consortium would continue to support management's plans to diversify away from airport rentals.

Ford was advised by Goldman Sachs, Citigroup and JPMorgan Chase. The buyers were advised by Lehman Brothers, Deutsche Bank and Merrill Lynch.

Carlyle And Other Investors To Pay $15 Billion For Hertz (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

A group of investors that includes the District-based Carlyle Group said yesterday that it has agreed to buy Hertz Corp., the car rental company, from Ford Motor Co. for $15 billion in cash and debt.

The deal will provide a $5.6 billion cash infusion to the automaker, whose bonds were downgraded in May to junk status.

Carlyle's cash outlay of about $767 million would be its second-largest, after the $808.5 million in cash it put up in 2003 for the telephone directory business of Qwest Communications, Carlyle spokesman Christopher Ullman said.

Carlyle managing director Gregory S. Ledford said the investment firm sees growth potential in Hertz's overseas and heavy equipment rental businesses. The buyout firm viewed Hertz as a "corporate orphan" -- a well-run company with a good brand and a good business that is not central to its corporate parent's business, Ledford said. "We spend a lot of time looking for businesses like that," he said.

Ledford said he didn't believe rising crude oil and gasoline prices would have a big impact on Hertz, "unless it really impacts people flying," because Hertz's business is largely driven by airport traffic.

Ledford said Ford is selling because "they need cash," but a Ford spokeswoman put it differently.

"We've decided that it's not core to our strategic business plan," Ford's Becky Sanch said.

Ford in recent months had been preparing a public offering of Hertz stock but opted for the sale because it provided "a strong value in up-front cash proceeds," Sanch said.

Carlyle's partners in the deal are Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity and Clayton, Dubilier & Rice Inc., each of which is taking a one-third stake, Carlyle's Ullman said. Clayton, Dubilier & Rice partner George W. Tamke is to become chairman.

Buyout Group Snags Ford's Hertz For $5.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Henny Sender And Avery Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A buyout group led by Clayton Dubilier & Rice is set to acquire Ford Motor Co.'s Hertz Corp. for $5.6 billion, in an anticlimactic end to an auction among private-equity firms.

The acquiring group, which also includes Carlyle Group and Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, will finance the deal with a combination of $2.3 billion in equity and more than $12 billion in debt. The acquiring group will assume around $10 billion in Hertz debt.

DOJ_NMG_0004622

"It was a complicated divestiture," said David Wasserman who led the CDR group efforts. "The sale delivers certainty and value to Ford and we get a great brand and franchise."

The last days of the bidding war took place against the backdrop of a hurricane that led many economists to forecast lower growth for the car-rental industry. Hertz has annual revenue of more than $7 billion. But concerns about growth didn't deter bidders, giving Ford a bigger payday than auction participants anticipated. The losing group consisted of Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee & Partners.

Private-equity firms, which cater to institutional investors and wealthy individuals, acquire companies and divisions of companies, often using large amounts of debt to finance their purchases.

The dynamics of the Hertz auction suggest that there is indeed little competition for the largest buyouts. There were no strategic investors and only two private-equity consortia sparring over Hertz. But the outcome also suggested that less competition doesn't necessarily mean a bargain price, a pattern that also characterized the $11.3 billion buyout of SunGard Data Systems earlier this year.

This fall is expected to see a series of even-larger deals, possibly even exceeding the $25 billion buyout of RJR Nabisco in 1989. Both Carlyle and Blackstone are flush with money. Apollo Management recently raised almost $10 billion, Warburg Pincus raised more than $8 billion, and Texas Pacific Group may well go to its investors soon for more cash as well. Private-equity firms generally like such megadeals because they enable them to deploy vast sums swiftly and collect management and transaction fees that reflect the size of the deal.

The outcome of the auction reflects CDR's determination to acquire Hertz. CDR will have three board seats and partner George Tamke will be chairman of the board. The two other CDR partners, Carlyle and Merrill, will each have two seats on the Hertz board. Previously, Ford had three board seats and Hertz two. Merrill is both participating in the buyout and helping to finance it.

The new owners of Hertz may have a different vision for the company's future than current management. Hertz management, which analysts say had favored a public listing to a sale, had positioned the firm to demonstrate strong growth prospects and had lots of initiatives beyond its core airport car-rental business.

By contrast, the buyout group may be under pressure to cut costs and raise cash by selling noncore operations, people familiar with the matter say. "We have no current plans to divest anything or make acquisitions," Mr. Wasserman of CDR says. CDR will have to come up with about $800 million in cash, a large part of its $3.5 billion fund. Because there are limits to how much capital it can dedicate to any one deal, it plans to invite some of its own investors to put money into Hertz alongside it.

Wachovia Agrees To Buy Westcorp (WSJ)

By Valerie Bauerlein

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

Wachovia Corp. agreed to acquire Westcorp Inc. for about $3.91 billion in a deal aimed at boosting the Charlotte, N.C., company's heft in the auto-finance business while giving Wachovia its first branches in California.

In addition to making Wachovia the ninth-largest auto lender in the U.S., the takeover quiets speculation at least for the moment that the bank is about to make an even larger acquisition of a commercial bank or consumer-finance company. The purchase price represents only about 5% of Wachovia's stock-market value, which analysts said seemed reasonable given Westcorp's size and reputation for being well-run.

"This gets Ken [Thompson] his foothold" in California, Nancy Bush, a bank analyst with NAB Research LLC in Annandale, N.J., said, referring to the Wachovia chairman and chief executive. Westcorp's 19 bank branches in Southern California could help Wachovia decide whether to open additional branches in the state or make another acquisition. Most of Wachovia's roughly 3,100 branches are in the Southeast, though it has been opening new branches in growing markets such as Texas and New York.

Westcorp confirmed last month that it was in discussions about a possible takeover. The company originates, securitizes and services loans through 8,300 auto dealers. It also is strong in the subprime market, which is lucrative because customers pay higher interest rates but risky because those customers default more often.

Wachovia's previous auto-lending business was focused on borrowers with the most pristine credit records who typically buy pricey cars. Wachovia has used that business to build relationships with dealers, who sometimes need wealth-management services or loans to build inventory.

The combined company's auto-finance portfolio will consist of 78% prime loans and 22% subprime loans, according to Kevin Fitzsimmons, an analyst with Sandler O'Neill & Partners.

Wachovia's parent company, the former First Union, paid $2.1 billion in 1998 for the Money Store, a subprime lender that advertised heavily on television and was a financial flop. The bank ultimately sold the Money Store. "When you say 'subprime' around here, there's lots of warning flags that go off because of our past experience," Don Truslow, Wachovia's chief risk officer, said in an interview.

Terms of the deal call for Wachovia to swap 1.27 of its shares for each outstanding Westcorp share. Wachovia also agreed to acquire the 16% of WFS Financial Inc., a dealer-finance unit, that isn't already owned by Westcorp for 1.47 Wachovia shares apiece.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Westcorp shares rose 23 cents to $61.58, while Wachovia slipped 81 cents to $49.57. WFS surged $5.23, or 8.1%, to $70.15 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

Westcorp was advised by Credit Suisse First Boston, while Deutsche Bank advised WFS. Goldman Sachs Group advised Wachovia on the deal.

Wachovia Plans To Buy Auto Lender (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

Moving to expand its presence in automobile financing, the Wachovia Corporation, the nation's fourth-largest bank, agreed yesterday to acquire the financial-services holding company Westcorp and its majority-owned auto-finance group, WFS Financial, in a stock deal valued at $3.91 billion.

The deal, which had been rumored for weeks and will make Wachovia the ninth-largest auto lender in the country, is the latest in a string of purchases by banks in the auto-finance industry after downgrades this spring in the debt ratings of the General Motors Corporation and the Ford Motor Corporation.

The downgrades raised the costs of borrowing for the car makers' finance arms, which have typically offered low-interest loans that banks were hard pressed to match.

"The change in funding costs at G.M. and Ford has caused consumer-oriented banks to re-examine auto lending and to view it as potentially more attractive than they did in the past," said David Hilder, a bank analyst with Bear Stearns. While G.M. and Ford are still major lenders, Mr. Hilder said, their dominance may diminish as loan rates become more competitive.

This spring, Bank of America acquired KeyCorp's $990 million prime portfolio of indirect automobile loans and, in July, it announced plans to buy up to $55 billion of auto loans from G.M.'s finance arm, the General Motors Acceptance Corporation, over the next five years.

In yesterday's deal, Wachovia said it was acquiring Westcorp, which is based in Irvine, Calif., and WFS for $3.42 billion in stock. Wachovia, based in Charlotte, N.C., will pay $490 million in stock for the 16 percent of the publicly traded WFS that Westcorp does not own. The deal is expected to close in early 2006.

Last year, Westcorp's founder and chief executive, Ernest S. Rady, who owns about 53 percent of Westcorp, announced a restructuring in which the finance company would buy back the 16 percent of WFS that it did not own and fold the entire WFS Financial entity into its retail banking arm, Western Financial Bank. But the conversion of Western Financial Bank into a California state commercial bank was taking "longer than expected," Westcorp said in a statement last month. So it began exploring other options.

Investors have been closely watching Wachovia to see if it would make a big acquisition to keep up with its crosstown rival in Charlotte, Bank of America. Two years ago, Wachovia considered buying FleetBoston, but balked at the price; Bank of America later stepped in and bought it.

In a repeat this summer, Wachovia walked away from talks with the credit card giant MBNA only to have Bank of America swoop in and buy the firm, becoming the nation's largest issuer of credit cards.

"Westcorp is a neat little company, and Wachovia bought it for a perfectly acceptable price, but it doesn't get them anywhere," said Meredith Whitney, an analyst at CIBC World Markets. "Wachovia's problem is that it's been boxed out of so many other big deals by Bank of America that it needs to do a major deal in order to keep up. This doesn't do it."

While some analysts and investors say they think Wachovia has grown gun-shy on big deals, others give the chief executive, G. Kennedy Thompson, credit for restraint in not overpaying for acquisitions. Based on Friday's closing price for Westcorp's shares, Wachovia is paying a 5 percent premium. (It is paying about a 14 percent premium for WFS shares.)

Mr. Thompson has said repeatedly that the bank would only do deals that produced an internal rate of return of at least 15 percent and that would add to earnings on a cash basis by the end of the second year. Wachovia said the Westcorp and WFS acquisitions met both criteria.

Wachovia's stock fell 1.6 percent yesterday, to $49.57.

Wachovia To Purchase Westcorp For $3.42B (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004624

(AP) - CHARLOTTE, N.C.-The financial services company Wachovia Corp. on Monday said it agreed to acquire Westcorp, an automobile finance company based in Irvine, Calif., for $3.42 billion, creating the nation's ninth largest auto loan originator.

Wachovia also agreed to pay another $490 million for the 16 percent stake that Westcorp doesn't already own in WFS Financial Inc., boosting the combined value of the transactions of $3.9 billion.

he company said the deal for Westcorp is expected to boost earnings in the second year and produce an internal rate of return of more than 15 percent, above Wachovia's acquisition criteria.

Wachovia said its purchase of Westcorp will give it a small presence in the California retail banking market, while expanding its auto finance group into a national business. The firm will add about 8,500 automobile dealer clients, and about 920,000 individual customers.

"This transaction moves our auto finance business to a new level and gives us access to a new set of customers who can benefit from Wachovia's broad offering of financial services," said Ben Jenkins, president of Wachovia's general bank.

Wachovia, which expects the purchase to close in the first quarter, said the combined business will be run by WFS President and Chief Executive Thomas Wolfe and will be based in Irvine. Wolfe will report to Carlos Evans, head of Wachovia wholesale banking.

Tupras To Remain In Turkish Hands, As Koc Bid Wins (WSJ/DJN)

By Michael Wang, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A consortium led by Koc Holding AS of Turkey and including Royal Dutch Shell PLC fended off eight other bidders in a hotly contested privatization auction for control of Tupras, Turkey's 500,000-barrel-a-day refiner.

The winning bid of $4.14 billion (€3.34 billion) defied even the most optimistic expectations which, ahead of the auction, had reckoned with a final price tag closer to $3 billion.

The Koc-Shell group faced its strongest competition from a joint venture comprising state-owned Indian Oil Corp. and Turkey's Calik Enerji Sanayii, as well as OYAK, an industrial conglomerate representing a Turkish Army officers' pension fund.

The winning consortium comprised two Shell units -- Shell Co. of Turkey Ltd. and Shell Overseas Investment BV -- together holding 10%; Koc, one of Turkey's biggest industrial conglomerates, with 80%; and two smaller Turkish energy companies, Aygaz AS with 7% and Opet Petrolculuk AS with the remaining 3%.

The win by the Koc-Shell consortium represents a best-case scenario for the government as it keeps majority control of Tupras in Turkish hands. Shell's minor involvement lends it credibility.

Erol Memioglu, president of Koc's energy business, said he wanted to see Tupras grow further. "We aim to develop Tupras into a key player in the Mediterranean region," he said.

The 90-minute auction, broadcast on television live from Ankara, saw the elimination of several top European oil-companies, including Italy's Eni SpA, Austria's OMV AG, Poland's PKN Orlen and Hungary's MOL Rt., as well as a clutch of Turkish bidders.

Global oil demand has accelerated since early last year on the back of the fast-growing Chinese and Indian economies, soaking up virtually all excess refining capacity and increasing the value of refineries.

Shell spokeswoman Susan Shannon said the acquisition complements the company's strategy in Turkey, where it is the second-biggest gasoline retailer, with about 600 service stations and a market share of around 15%.

Icahn Group Plans Proxy Fight To Raise Heat On Time Warner (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

A group led by New York financier Carl Icahn said it intends to mount a proxy contest to win seats on Time Warner Inc.'s board, in the latest step by the investor group to pressure the company to spin off its cable unit and buy back $20 billion in stock.

The group, made up of several hedge funds including one managed by Mr. Icahn, also said it thinks the "true value" of Time Warner shares is between $26 and $28, about $10 a share above the stock's trading range over the past couple of years.

Mr. Icahn's group said it planned to propose "one or more nominees" for election to the Time Warner board at the next annual meeting, which isn't due to be held until next spring. But the group didn't identify any nominees.

Rather, in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the group laid out its most detailed argument to date as to why Time Warner shares are trading at a discount to their "inherent value" and what "immediate actions" the company could take to reduce the discount. Yesterday, Time Warner shares were down 13 cents at $18.21 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0004625

Mr. Icahn announced about a month ago that a group he was leading had acquired stock and options representing a 2.6% stake in Time Warner. His challenge to the media giant's management came as the company was emerging from problems caused by the 2001 merger with America Online, which had depressed its stock price.

The filing noted that the stock is down 6% since Chairman Richard Parsons took over in May 2002 and said "management's slow pace of change" has hurt Time Warner stock.

The group chastised Time Warner for not paying dividends or buying back stock as aggressively as other media companies. It argued that Time Warner has an "inefficient capital structure" and could afford to take on more debt if it spun off Time Warner Cable.

Time Warner has recently moved to address both issues. It initiated a dividend earlier this year and last month announced plans to buy back $5 billion in stock over two years. And it plans to offer 16% of its cable company to the public early next year when it completes the acquisition of some assets of Adelphia Communications.

In a statement yesterday, Time Warner said "we are carefully reviewing a range of options to increase the value of our company including those proposed by Mr. Icahn and his group. Investors should rest assured that this evaluation is being done in a prudent and deliberate manner with an eye toward creating sustainable value for all of our shareholders."

Mr. Icahn's group contends that Time Warner Cable would be worth more on its own than it is within the larger organization. The group estimates that the cable unit on its own could be worth $48 billion, or $3,631 per subscriber -- more than the value implied by the stock price of the nation's largest cable company, Comcast Corp.

The other members of Mr. Icahn's group are Franklin Mutual Advisers LLC, JANA Partners LLC and SAC Capital Advisors LLC.

Dealmakers Are Back In Business (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 13, 2005

Following a multiyear downturn in the number of mergers and acquisitions, companies are again in the shopping mood.

Oracle, eBay and Wachovia all announced deals Monday worth billions to buy other companies, signaling a pickup in the deal boom (stories, 1B, above).

Already this year, companies have announced $707 billion in mergers and acquisitions, says Richard Peterson, senior researcher at Thomson Financial. That's 30% more than the deals during the same period last year and the highest since the M&A heyday in 2000. It's also the fourth-strongest pace of M&A in history, Peterson says.

“Companies were shy,” says Howard Silverblatt, market analyst for Standard & Poor's. Now “they are definitely doing more.”

There are several reasons for the uptick, including:

·Stock market recovering. The biggest influence on M&A activity is the health of the market, says Chris Kenney, vice president at L.E.K. Consulting. That's largely because many companies use their stock to buy other companies, so the higher the stock, the less expensive the acquisition becomes. M&A has gotten a lift from the fact the Standard & Poor's 500 index is up 2.4% this year and 37% the past three years.

·Borrowing costs still cheap. In addition to fairly strong stock prices, interest rates have also remained surprisingly low, says David Mauer, professor of finance at the Cox School of Business at SMU. That has allowed companies to borrow cash needed to finance many mergers and acquisitions, he says.

·Cash piles surging. Companies are finally getting the guts to use the cash that has been piling up over the past three years, Silverblatt says. Acquisitions are one of the biggest uses of corporate cash.

During the second quarter the amount of cash held by the industrial companies in the S&P 500 fell to $608 billion in part to spending on acquisitions, Silverblatt says. That's down from the record $634 billion in cash the first quarter, but still a giant pile that is difficult to use up just by buying back stock or paying dividends.

·Industry consolidation increasing. Maturing industries, such as discount brokerages and software companies, are looking to combine in order to compete against the bigger players, Mauer says. He points to Oracle's recent buying spree and leadership in consolidating the business-software industry.

The M&A boom's future really depends on the market, Kenney says. “The single most important predictor of M&A is the value of the stock market,” he says.

Judge Blocks Sequoia Forest Logging (AP)

By David Kravets

AP, September 13, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge here halted the Bush administration's bid to keep logging 2,000 acres in Giant Sequoia National Monument, saying he "called into question" the scientific analysis used to justify cutting in a preserve that houses two-thirds of the world's largest trees.

U.S. District Judge Stephen Breyer, ruling in a lawsuit brought by environmentalists, also questioned whether fire control was the government's real motive for allowing commercial logging in the monument. The so-called "Saddle Project" was approved years ago, but cutting only commenced this summer, when timber prices were high.

The government, Breyer wrote late Friday in issuing a preliminary injunction barring further logging, "waited five years to execute this contract because of unfavorable timber prices."

In 2000, just after the project was approved, Congress declared Sequoia National Forest a national monument, which generally prevented further logging on thousands of acres in the Central Valley area of Tulare County. The government argued the project was grandfathered in and therefore not covered by monument rules.

The Justice Department, which defended the logging plan in court here, declined to say whether it would challenge Breyer's injunction. If it does not, the case is over and the acreage is safe from harvesting. The government could also take the issue to trial.

Breyer ruled that he was unsure whether the project, which included harvesting 31,000 conifer trees hundreds of years old, "would still protect the forest from fire." Sequoia trees were not targeted in the harvest by logging concern Sierra Forests Products.

The Sierra Club and other groups brought the case this year to stop the logging that began July 10 and ended Aug. 5 after Breyer issued a temporary injunction barring further harvesting. A preliminary injunction is issued when a judge believes plaintiffs would prevail at trial.

"The Forest Service has argued that because the project was approved before it being named a monument, they said they could still do this years later, but the judge said they could not," said Patrick Gallagher, a Sierra Club attorney. "The monument is one of the most amazing areas on Earth."

It was not immediately clear how many acres were logged over four weeks, but environmentalists estimated hundreds.

The Sierra Club is considering filing similar lawsuits to block other logging projects that were approved before Congress declared the forest a national monument.

The case is Sierra Club v. Bosworth, 05-00397.

Senate Decides To Vote On Rejection Of Mercury-Emission Rules (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 (AP) - The Senate agreed Monday to vote on a resolution challenging new rules limiting mercury emissions from power plants.

The Bush administration said that the rules, completed by the Environmental Protection Agency in March, would eventually cut mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 70 percent without driving up energy costs and that repealing the rules would delay the reduction of such emissions.

Environmental and health groups have demanded swifter and tougher measures to reduce emissions.

By repealing the rules, the Senate would compel the E.P.A. to rewrite them. The revisions would be in line with Clean Air Act standards requiring the use of the best available technology to reduce mercury emissions.

The Senate vote on Tuesday is expected to be close, but the Republican-dominated House is unlikely to act on a resolution, which President Bush has said he opposes.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, introduced the resolution through a little-used 1996 law that allows Congress to challenge agency rules with a guaranteed floor vote. The law has been successfully invoked only once, when Congress in 2001 repealed Clinton administration workplace ergonomics regulations.

Senator Collins said that if the rules stand "power plants will be free to continue spewing unlimited amounts of toxic mercury into our air until the year 2018."

DOJ_NMG_0004627

But supporters of the E.P.A. rules said that repealing the administration approach could have a devastating impact on the economy, forcing power plants to abandon coal for natural gas and driving up natural-gas prices. They contended it would cost $358 billion to achieve the 90 percent reduction in three years, as opposed to a cost of $2 billion under the Bush administration plan.

"It just can't be justified from a cost-benefit point of view," said Senator George V. Voinovich, Republican of Ohio.

A federal appeals court last month rejected a suit brought by environmental and health groups and 14 states seeking to force the E.P.A. to stop implementing the new rules.

Heating Prices Loom As Problem Natural Gas Could Be Issue In Winter (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — U.S. consumers could still face higher energy bills ahead despite declines in energy prices Monday as gulf producers continued to rebound from Hurricane Katrina's pounding.

The average nationwide retail gasoline price Monday fell to $2.967 a gallon for regular unleaded from $3.018 the day before, according to AAA. Gasoline futures prices have dropped by about a third since the end of August.

Crude oil prices dropped to $63.34 a barrel, down 9% from the record close of $69.81 in late August. Natural gas futures were down more than 23 cents in New York trading, to $11.03 per million British thermal units, compared with a record $11.76 on Sept. 1.

Still, energy experts say consumers will feel the impact of Katrina for months. Natural gas prices will be a big challenge this winter.

The federal Energy Information Administration recently forecast that natural gas prices could rise 71% in the Midwest this winter.

Forecaster Global Insight expects natural gas prices to average $12 per million Btu through the winter, says Mary Novak, managing director for energy services. Consumers saw an average of $7.50 last winter.

“It's astronomical compared to what people were paying for the previous 20 years,” Novak says.

George Coling, executive director of the National Fuel Funds Network, says Katrina will be a “disaster” for less-affluent households. The Network represents non-profit groups that supplement assistance from the federal Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program.

Some members of Congress want to increase the annual budget for LIHEAP, which helps consumers who meet certain income requirements pay heating and cooling bills. The program serves more than 5 million households a year.

“Increasing LIHEAP is one thing, and probably the only effective thing, that Congress can do immediately to relieve the home energy situation” Coling says.

The U.S. Minerals Management Service Monday said about 38% of natural gas production in the gulf remains shuttered.

“It's too early to start relaxing but also no cause yet for panic. We're not hearing from our utility customers that they are going to have a problem meeting customer demand,” says Mark Stultz, spokesman for the National Gas Supply Association.

Arctic Folly (WP)

By Jimmy Carter

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Congress is about to make one of those big decisions that marks an era. Unless wiser heads prevail, it may do it badly -- making the wrong decision in the wrong way and about the wrong place. At stake is America's greatest wildlife sanctuary, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. To dissuade Congress from this environmental tragedy, Americans must rally, and quickly.

Congress had its Pyrrhic energy victory this summer, with a new energy policy that ignores much-needed conservation measures and gives the oil industry large new tax breaks regardless of where it drills and pumps. Surely Congress has done more than enough to increase the profits of the oil industry.

Yet now, in a separate decision, the White House and Big Oil are pressuring Congress to allow drilling rigs to rip into the ecological heart of America's preeminent wildlife sanctuary. We must not confuse this with Prudhoe Bay, which lies west of the Arctic refuge and is already an industrial landscape resembling Houston more than Yellowstone.

With increasing gasoline prices bringing economic hardship and concern to many Americans, we must not be misled by oil lobbyists who are trying to convince us that our energy security is singularly dependent on sacrificing the Arctic refuge. They promote the false premise that development will touch just a few thousand acres when, in fact, it would introduce roads and pipelines spider-webbing across hundreds of thousands of acres on the fragile coastal plain.

We cannot drill our way to energy security or lower gasoline prices as long as our nation sits on just 3 percent of world oil reserves yet accounts for 25 percent of all oil consumption. An obvious answer is to increase the fuel efficiency of motor vehicles, at least to the level we set more than a quarter-century ago.

Instead, the administration recently proposed a tiny increase in gas mileage for SUVs, minivans and pickups. Not effective until the 2011 models, this would save about one month's current consumption of fuel over the next 20 years -- far less than will be saved in just one state by a new California law. The new ruling offers automobile makers an opportunity to avoid the reductions by modifying the size of various models as they persist in manufacturing gas guzzlers. It is not a coincidence that Moody's has just downgraded the debt of General Motors and Ford to junk status, while makers of efficient vehicles prosper.

I have been to the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to study the wilderness wildlife. Far from being the frozen "desert" some suggest, this is a rich, Serengeti-like haven of life: nursery for caribou, polar bears, walruses and millions of shorebirds and waterfowl that migrate annually to the Lower 48. To sit, as Rosalynn and I did, watching a herd of musk oxen circle-up to defend their young and then to find yourself literally in the midst of thousands of caribou streaming by is to touch in a fundamental way God's glorious ark of teeming wildlife.

We Americans use a lot of energy, and millions of us want to do so in a more efficient way that also allows us to cherish our disappearing wilderness heritage. In the Arctic refuge we cannot have it both ways. In the next few months Americans could lose this special and amazing place through a backdoor legislative maneuver.

Each fall Congress endeavors to combine budgetary directives covering the nation's $2.5 trillion dollar annual budget in a single "reconciliation" decision. In a tricky ploy to avoid full debate, drilling advocates have buried their despoil-the-Arctic goal in this mammoth measure. So, conservation-minded Americans must ask our elected representatives to vote down any final budget reconciliation bill that would allow the sacrifice of our Arctic sanctuary.

Now is the time to speak up for the ecological integrity of this unsurpassed 18-million-acre wilderness. Many Americans will be in Washington on Sept. 20 for the Arctic Refuge Action Day rally on the Mall and to contact congressional representatives personally.

If we are not wise enough to protect the Arctic refuge, future generations will condemn us for needlessly sacrificing the wilderness of their world to feed our profligate, short-term and shortsighted energy habit. The pathway to a better, more sustainable energy future does not wind through the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Justice Dept.: FBI Ignores Informant Rules (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 13, 2005

FBI agents often violate bureau's rules for handling confidential informants that were revised after FBI abuses in the 1990s, the Justice Department's internal watchdog said Monday.

A review of 120 confidential informant files from FBI offices around the country found violations in 104 cases, or 87 percent, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said. His 301-page report, parts of which were blacked out, examined FBI compliance with rules that govern most criminal investigations.

The report said agents failed to assess informants' suitability or get permission for informants to engage in activity that otherwise would be illegal. Agents did not convey proper instructions or tell prosecutors when informants had committed crimes that were not authorized by their FBI handlers, Fine said.

FBI Director Robert Mueller, according to the report, said many agents find the required paperwork cumbersome. In a statement, the FBI said the violations were "administrative" and that officials have begun simplifying procedures.

Among the material in the report that was withheld from the public is how many confidential informants the FBI uses. Some have provided information to the FBI for more than six years. Others are designated "high-level" informants because they are part of the senior leadership of a group the FBI is investigating.

A third category of informants identified in the report includes lawyers, doctors and clergy — all obligated to keep confidential their dealings with clients — or members of the news media.

FBI spokesman Ed Cogswell said the bureau would not identify whether any of its informants are clergy or members of the media.

"We can use them and if a need presents, I'm sure we do," Cogswell said. "But we do not want to identify what our sources are."

Confidential informants are critical to some prosecutions, the report said. But their use by the FBI also "presents serious risks, including the risk that informants may claim that their criminal activities were authorized or acquiesced in by the government," Fine said.

John Wesley Hall, a vice president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said, "It sounds like they can break their own rules when they're investigating crimes. Too bad our clients can't bend the rules."

The Attorney General's Investigative Guidelines were developed in the mid-1970s in response to FBI surveillance and infiltration of civil rights and other protest groups in the 1950s and 1960s.

The section on informants was overhauled in 2001, after celebrated cases in which FBI agents protected mobsters from prosecution or tipped them off to investigations while simultaneously using them as FBI informants.

In one case, former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. tipped off Boston mobster James "Whitey" Bulger to a looming racketeering indictment, causing Bulger to flee. He remains at large.

The FBI has said informants are important to counterterrorism and criminal investigations.

Two informants helped lure Yemeni Sheik Mohammed Ali Hassan al-Moayad and an aide to a meeting in which the cleric was secretly recorded promising to funnel money to Hamas and al-Qaida. Al-Moayad was sentenced to 75 years in prison. Mohammed Mohsen Yahya Zayed received a 45-year sentence.

The case, however, was nearly derailed when one informant, who was the government's star witness, set himself on fire in Washington in what he later described as an attempt to get more money from the FBI, which paid him at least $100,000.

Mohamed Alanssi recovered in time for the trial.

FBI Violating Informant Guidelines (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 13, 2005

The US Department of Justice announced yesterday that the FBI has continued to violate informant guidelines adopted several years ago amid public condemnation over its mishandling of notorious Boston gangsters James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

A review of 120 confidential informant files at a dozen of the nation's FBI offices, including Boston's, found that agents failed to follow the rules in 87 percent of the cases, according to a 301-page report by Glenn A. Fine, the Justice Department's inspector general. The review was conducted between June and August 2004.

'These numbers are just extraordinary, and they're damning," said US Representative William D. Delahunt, a Quincy Democrat who participated in Congressional hearings investigating the FBI's relationship with Bulger and Flemmi.

"I think what they mean is legislation is now required to ensure compliance," Delahunt said yesterday. He said that he and US Representative Daniel E. Lungren, a California Republican and a fellow member of the House Judiciary Committee, will file a bill mandating that the FBI follow the guidelines and include sanctions for agents who do not.

The report cited agents' failure to report illegal activity by informants; failure to obtain authority to let informants engage in illegal activity such as buying drugs during investigations; failure to evaluate informants for suitability to work with the FBI; and failure to document when informants were deactivated, the report said.

Fine concluded that the violations were caused by inadequate training, a lack of administrative support for agents, and a failure of management to hold supervisors accountable for lack of proper oversight to handling agents.

According to the report, FBI director Robert S. Mueller III "told us that he frequently hears agents complain about the burdensome procedures for opening and operating informants."

The report also cited "lingering differences" between the FBI and the Department of Justice over how informants should be handled.

Tougher guidelines adopted in May 2002 -- aimed at preventing the cozy relationship that developed among Bulger, Flemmi, and their FBI handlers -- required the FBI to share information on informants with other agencies, including federal prosecutors.

The FBI in Washington released a statement yesterday saying that many of the recommendations in Fine's report have already been adopted or are under review as part of a project launched several months ago between the FBI and the Justice Department to revise its Confidential Human Source Program.

The project aims to simplify and standardize administrative procedures, clarify compliance requirements, and improve compliance with the attorney general's informant guidelines, according to the statement.

Delahunt said he will push for legislation that goes even further than the current informant guidelines, to include a provision that requires the FBI to notify state and local law enforcement officials if they learn that an informant is involved in criminal activity.

Retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. was convicted in US District Court in Boston in May 2002 of racketeering, obstruction of justice, and related charges for warning his longtime informants, Bulger and Flemmi, to flee just before they were indicted on federal racketeering charges in January 1995. Bulger, who has since been charged with killing 19 people, remains a fugitive.

Connolly, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison on the federal charges, was indicted earlier this year on state murder charges in Miami in allegedly plotting with Bulger and Flemmi in 1982 to kill a potential witness against them, John Callahan, a Boston financier with ties to Bulger's gang. Connolly is awaiting trial.

Flemmi, who pleaded guilty to killing 10 people and is serving a life sentence, is now cooperating with the government and is slated to testify against Connolly in Florida.

The FBI's relationship with Bulger and Flemmi was exposed during pretrial hearings in US District Court in 1998, which led to Congressional hearings and the overhaul of the informant guidelines.

Former US attorney Donald K. Stern, who helped US Attorney General Janet Reno revamp the older guidelines, said yesterday he was disappointed by the number of violations cited in the report by Fine, the Justice Department's internal watchdog. "It was clear from the efforts to get the guidelines changed that this was to some degree a significant shift in attitude and culture that would be required at the FBI," Stern said, "because for so long the handling of informants was their domain, and they didn't have to share the responsibility or get any oversight outside."

But he said it is important to give the FBI the training and oversight it needs to comply with the guidelines because the previous system did not work.

"If you just assume that everything is OK because the line agent or the immediate supervisor says it is, you're going to have problems," Stern said. "And as we've learned from the Bulger and Flemmi case, those problems could have disastrous consequences."

F.B.I. Found To Violate Its Informant Rules (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - The Federal Bureau of Investigation has often violated internal guidelines in its handling of confidential informants, the Justice Department's inspector general concluded Monday.

In nearly 9 of every 10 cases reviewed by the inspector general, guidelines on the handling of confidential informants were violated in ways that risked compromising investigations, according to a 301-page report by the office of Glenn A. Fine, the inspector general at the Justice Department.

The guidelines sometimes permit informants like drug dealers or gang members to commit crimes to further an investigation. But F.B.I. agents sometimes allowed criminal informants to engage in criminal activities without getting needed approval from supervisors or lawyers for such operations, failed to report unauthorized illegal activity, or approved such illegal activity only retroactively, the review found.

Bureau supervisors were often unfamiliar with the rules that applied to the handling of confidential informants - a reflection, the inspector general's report said, of "inadequate training at every level." And when violations were found, bureau agents and supervisors were often not held accountable for missteps, the review found.

The F.B.I. considers the use of confidential informants, who often have criminal ties, to be critical to its ability to penetrate drug trafficking organizations, gangs, gambling operations and terrorist circles.

In 2001, Janet Reno, then the attorney general, imposed toughened requirements on the F.B.I.'s use of informants in the wake of several embarrassing episodes - most notably, its handling of the Boston gangster James Bulger, who fled in 1995 after a bureau agent tipped him off to a pending indictment against him.

In May 2002, John Ashcroft, then the attorney general, amended the informant rules as part of a broader restructuring of F.B.I. policies aimed at allowing agents to respond more quickly and flexibly to leads in terrorism and criminal investigations.

The F.B.I. said Monday in response to the inspector general's report that it was working to improve compliance with guidelines for the handling of confidential informants and had already moved to make some internal changes recommended by Mr. Fine's office. Part of the problem, F.B.I. officials acknowledged, was the bureau's continued difficulty in building a modern computer system to help oversee the informant program and ensure better compliance.

"Even before the inspector general's review, we realized that we had to do some re-engineering of our whole human source program," Kevin R. Brock, an assistant F.B.I. director who oversees the program, said in an interview. "We were handling more and more sources, we had more and more regulations that we added on over the years, and we weren't doing the follow-up quality control on our own."

The constant flux "just created a situation where it was tough for the working agent to keep track of all this stuff," Mr. Brock said.

"Agents are failing to do certain things not because of mal-intent but just the press of administrative requirements, and overlooking them," he said.

Beyond the problems in managing confidential informants, the inspector general's review looked at the effect of a number of changes ordered by Mr. Ashcroft in his 2002 revamping of the bureau's investigative guidelines. Among other changes, the new guidelines allowed F.B.I. agents to visit public sites and events, attend mosques and other religious institutions, or peruse the Internet in search of leads in terrorism cases.

The changes relaxed restrictions put in place in the 1970's as a result of F.B.I. abuses in the monitoring of political dissidents, and they have drawn criticism from civil rights advocates and Muslim leaders who say they open the door to investigative abuses.

Critics charged last year that the F.B.I. had abused its expanded powers by monitoring, interviewing and sometimes subpoenaing antiwar protesters and political protesters in advance of the political conventions last summer. The inspector general's office disclosed in its report Monday that it was conducting a separate investigation to determine whether the F.B.I. interrogations of protesters were in fact improper.

The inspector general's review found that there was "widespread recognition" among F.B.I. agents and officials of the constitutional and privacy implications of expanding the bureau's ability to monitor public sites. But the review found that there were "gaps" in how the new policy had been put into effect, raising management concerns.

For instance, agents are "encouraged, but not required" to get the approval of a supervisor before attending a public event or site. And it was not always clear what information the F.B.I. could retain if it did not relate to an investigation.

As a result, "an absence of routine documentation" made it difficult if not impossible to assess how agents were using their new powers and whether those powers were being abused, the report said.

Robert S. Mueller III, director of the F.B.I., told the inspector general's office that because agents were not required to get supervisors' approval before visiting public sites, it was "difficult to determine to what extent these authorities have been used," the inspector general's office said. It called on the F.B.I. to consider requiring approval from supervisors and more documentation of public visits to guard against possible abuses.

FBI Hit In Handling Of Secret Informers (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Guidelines governing the FBI's handling of confidential informants, which were established in the 1970s and revised in the wake of September 11, are violated frequently by supervisors and agents, according to a report released yesterday.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General, in a 301-page report, said it found "significant non-compliance" by the FBI in its handling of confidential informants.

"The attorney general's investigative guidelines govern some of the FBI's most important investigative powers, including its authority to operate confidential informants," said Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. "Our review found several significant shortcomings in the FBI's adherence to the guidelines which need correction, particularly the guidelines governing its use of confidential informants."

The report says the guidelines were violated in 87 percent of the confidential-informant cases examined and that errors occurred in several of the most important aspects of the FBI's management of its criminal-informant program, including reviews aimed at assessing the suitability of people who serve as informants.

It says instructions FBI agents are required to give confidential informants were not followed in 49 percent of the reviewed cases, and the agency's use of its power to authorize confidential informants to participate in "otherwise illegal activity" showed a noncompliance rate of 60 percent.

"Guidelines violations can jeopardize Justice Department prosecutions of criminals and can also lead to civil liability claims against the government," Mr. Fine said. "We are concerned the FBI has not taken the necessary steps to ensure that FBI agents and their supervisors adhere to these important requirements."

The FBI yesterday said that although the report listed several instances of administrative noncompliance, it found that the bureau was "generally compliant with the guidelines."

Noting that confidential informants are critical to the bureau's ability to carry out its "counterterrorism, national security and criminal law-enforcement missions," the FBI said it began a project several months ago to review and revise its confidential-informant program.

FBI spokesman Edwin C. Cogswell said the review seeks to develop policies and processes to simplify and standardize administrative procedures and to clarify and improve compliance requirements.

The Justice Department set the guidelines in the 1970s in response to FBI's surveillance and infiltration of civil rights groups. The guidelines address the bureau's investigations of people and groups, its use of confidential informants, undercover operations and warrantless monitoring of verbal communications. After the September 11 attacks, Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered a review of the guidelines to identify revisions necessary to enhance the department's ability to prevent terrorist attacks.

The revised guidelines gave FBI field managers greater authority to conduct preliminary inquiries, criminal intelligence investigations and undercover operations.

FBI Watchdog Report: Agents Often Break Rules For Informants (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2005

FBI agents often violate the bureau's rules for handling confidential informants, the Justice Department's internal watchdog said Monday.

The report by Inspector General Glenn Fine said agents failed to assess informants' suitability or get permission for informants to engage in activity that otherwise would be illegal. Agents did not convey proper instructions or tell prosecutors when informants had committed crimes that were not authorized by their FBI handlers, Fine said.

The report was based on a review of 120 confidential informant files from FBI offices. Fine found violations in 87% of the files, or 104 cases. The report quoted FBI Director Robert Mueller as saying many agents find the required paperwork cumbersome.

The FBI said in a statement that the violations were “administrative” and that officials have begun simplifying procedures.

Among the material in the report that was withheld from the public is how many confidential informants the FBI uses. Some informants are doctors, lawyers, clergy or members of the news media, the report said.

The guidelines on informants were overhauled in 2001 after cases in which FBI agents protected mobsters from prosecution or tipped them off to investigations while using them as FBI informants.

Rumsfeld touts base-closing savings

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has advised President Bush that a plan presented to the White House last week for closing 22 major military bases and realigning 33 others will still yield large savings, even though fewer bases would be closed than Rumsfeld wanted, his spokesman said. Lawrence Di Rita would not say whether Rumsfeld recommended that Bush accept the plan as presented by the Base Realignment and Closure Commission.

The commission said its recommendations will result in annual savings of $4.2 billion, compared with $5.4 billion under the plan it received last May from Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld had recommended closing 33 major bases and realigning 29 others.

Bush has until Sept. 23 to accept the report and forward it to Congress or return it to the commission for more work. If sent to Congress, lawmakers can accept or reject the plan, but can't change it.

ABOUT THIS STORY (TSSC)

The State (SC), September 13, 2005

More than 800 pages of the late Strom Thurmond’s FBI file were released Monday at the request of several news organizations, including The State. The first 600 came out in March.

The State requested the file of the former U.S. senator, governor and judge in accordance with the federal Freedom of Information Act shortly after the senator’s June 26, 2003, death.

The first 600 pages are called the “general administrative file” and comprise only a fraction of Thurmond’s total file. The 800 pages just released deal mainly with threats made against Thurmond throughout his public life.

According to the FBI, about 900 more pages are yet to be released.

As is typical with the FBI and Monday’s release, it might take several more months before these additional pages are made available to the public.

Before a subject’s death, the Federal Bureau of Investigation will release a file only with the subject’s permission. FBI files are made available to the public after an individual’s death.

FBI Investigated Many Death Threats Against Thurmond (TSSC)

The State (SC), September 13, 2005

For a half century, Strom Thurmond was a Southern icon and a national figure. His longevity — serving as a U.S. senator from 1956 to 2003 — exposed him to at least 31 threats that the FBI investigated. The threats ranged from the serious — a threat to assassinate Thurmond the same year that Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King Jr. were killed — to the ravings of a "chronic letter writer with apparent mental problems," the FBI reported.

'WE AIN'T LETTIN' NOBODY TALK AGAINST MR. WALLACE'

On Sept. 7, 1968, U.S. Sen. Strom Thurmond's office received an anonymous phone call from a man, threatening to kill the senator if he came to Greenville to campaign against Alabama Gov. George Wallace, then running as a third-party presidential candidate.

"If Strom Thurmond comes to the state fair in Greenville on 9/26/68, he will get the same thing that happened to Kennedy and King," the caller said, referring to U.S. Sen. Robert Kennedy and civil rights leader Martin Luther King, both slain that year.

The senator's secretary received a call a week later from the same anonymous caller, warning "if she brought Thurmond to the state fair, she would also get it."

At the time, Thurmond was traveling the South campaigning for GOP presidential nominee Richard Nixon. He told Southerners a vote for Wallace would, in effect, be a vote for Democrat Hubert Humphrey. Don't waste your vote, he constantly admonished Dixie voters.

On the evening of Sept. 7, 1968, the senator's secretary received a call from the same perons who had phoned earlier. He asked if Thurmond was going to speak at the Anderson fair. She said he was.

"If he doesn't want the same thing to happen to him that happened to Bobby and King, he better not come 'cause we ain't lettin' nobody talk against Mr. Wallace. I'm warning ya'."

Thurmond spoke. Nothing happened. No arrests were made in connection with the threats.

THREAT TO KILL STROM, TED, TOO

On March 31, 1969, Thurmond received a postcard postmarked St. Louis, Mo. It bore a handwritten message, saying the writer planned to kill the senator.

The postcard was followed by another. This time, the name of U.S. Sen. Teddy Kennedy, D-Mass., was added to the list of those to be killed. The same card was sent to President Nixon, former President Johnson and the governor of Vermont.

A fictitious name, Janice Neavles, was signed to the cards. No arrests were made.

'CHRONIC LETTER WRITER WITH ... MENTAL PROBLEM'

In April 1973, the U.S. probation office in Panama City, Fla., forwarded to the FBI a packet of mailed and unmailed notes and cards. One postcard, addressed to Thurmond, contained this cryptic line: "Senator, we hear you are next to be processed."

The probation office had been investigating a crank letter writer in Alabama.

The FBI sent an agent to interview the man, whose name was deleted from the FBI documents. A report on that interview noted, "Subject was hostile and it was apparent from talk and facial expression he has mental problems."

The man's brother told the FBI the letter writer was a paratrooper in World War II, who parachuted into France, was captured by the Germans and developed mental problems.

The FBI took no action. "Subject is chronic letter writer with apparent mental problem," a file memo said.

'WE'LL HANG YOU BY YOUR TOES'

In February 1974, Thurmond's office received a two-page letter that hit close to home.

The letter started out by praising Thurmond for being smart enough to have made a "pile of money" but soon devolved into a profanity-laced diatribe against Thurmond.

After wishing cancer on the entire Thurmond family, the letter concludes with "long live the future revolution — we'll hang you by your toes and your kids too."

The letter was sent from Myrtle Beach and signed "a Revolutionary." The FBI investigated, but it is not clear whether the agency ever identified the sender.

SENATOR'S NAME BANDIED ABOUT IN LAWSUIT

In 1983, Thurmond was sued in U.S. District Court in Norfolk. The suit alleged the senator took a $10,000 bribe in 1978, promising to help the plaintiff in the lawsuit get a $50,000 loan.

The file, heavily redacted, indicates a citizen visited Thurmond's Columbia office in mid- 1978, seeking help. A Thurmond aide, whose name also was removed from the file, allegedly assured the inquiring citizen that Thurmond would recommend him or her for a loan through an unnamed agency. However, the 1983 suit contended the citizen was not eligible for the particular loan.

Federal investigations into the matter started in 1982. However, the FBI file noted there was no proof Thurmond knew anything about the case. Thurmond and others were sued in early 1983.

A federal grand jury in Virginia issued a six-count indictment, and an arrest in the case was made Feb. 17, 1983.

In late 1983, the civil charges against Thurmond were dismissed, according to the file.

THREAT AGAINST BURGER, MEESE AND THURMOND?

In April 1983, police in Raleigh arrested a man for possession of stolen credit cards and credit card fraud.

At the time of his arrest, police noted his personal effects: less than a $1 in cash and a handwritten journal that seemed to vaguely threaten some of the most powerful men in the U.S. government, including Thurmond.

In 1983, Thurmond was Senate president pro tempore and chairman of its Judiciary Committee, which reviewed and voted on judicial and law enforcement appointees.

The FBI file detailing the arrest of the unidentified man in Raleigh makes only a passing reference to how much he knew about Thurmond. The journal included handwritten notations claiming the arrested man had traveled extensively throughout the U.S., acquiring weapons and financial backing for an unnamed organization. According to the man's journal, the purpose of the organization was to free selected federal prisoners and "eliminate" selected snitches.

Of particular interest to federal law enforcement officials was a cryptic journal entry from April 3, 1983. "The plan will start in early May ('83)," the entry reads. "All logistics for those on the list are being put together by group in D.C. i.e. time table (sic) of movement by targets, addresses, travel patterns, etc."

The entry goes on to state: "Meese, Burger and Thurmond pose greatest problem because of positions via security. Weapons and transportation are arranged."

Warren Burger was then chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court; Edwin Meese was counselor to President Ronald Reagan.

U.S. Secret Service agents, believing the arrested man to be a possible threat to the president, attempted to interview him April 19, 1983, but he refused.

Thurmond's security officers in South Carolina and Washington, D.C., were alerted.

In one journal entry, the arrested man noted one difficulty in pulling off whatever plan was afoot: "The handicap will be me," the journal states. "I am to (sic) well known in D.C., both by citizens and by Feds particularly."

FBI files do not say whether the man was prosecuted. But as he sat in a Wake County, N.C., jail, federal and state law enforcement officials were working to find out what he was up to and what, if anything, was to come of his plan.

Some Put Thurmond In The Cross Hairs (TSSC)

By Lauren Markoe

The State (SC), September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — The late Strom Thurmond made plenty of political enemies over his long and controversial career — including the kind the FBI feared might try to kill him.

The FBI on Monday released 836 pages of its file on Thurmond, pages that show the S.C. Democrat-turned-Republican was the target of persistent harassers, from the merely disgruntled to the potentially lethal.

The documents cover most of Thurmond's record-setting 48 years in the U.S. Senate and include information on FBI investigations into:

· An S.C. man with a history of violence who had escaped from a state mental hospital

· A Columbia man who wrote to "our dear senator" and promised to come to Washington or South Carolina and "settle it once and for all"

· A lewd letter in which the writer acknowledged an obsession with Nancy Thurmond, the senator's wife.

The documents are windows into some of the more unpleasant aspects of political fame and include copies of threatening telegrams, results of handwriting tests and summaries of interviews with suspects.

One of the threats taken most seriously by the FBI involved a man who, in 1976, wrote letters to Thurmond, postmarked from Greenville, in which he said he despised Thurmond and his politics.

"I would give my cool seat in hell to be able to pull the trigger," the man wrote.

He signed the letter, "A $65 month disable combat vet," apparently referring to the size of his monthly checks from the Veterans Administration, now known as Veterans Affairs.

In a document distributed to the FBI director at the time, an agent advises, "The Bureau has instructed that his (sic) matter must receive vigorous and continuous attention until fully resolved."

Other documents show the FBI had the Veterans Administration write a computer program to help identify a World War II veteran from the Upstate with certain characteristics the letter writer revealed about himself.

It is unclear how the investigation was resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0004635

The State, which requested Thurmond's FBI file after the senator died in 2003, counted 31 threats investigated from 1958 to 1989, the years covered in the released pages. They make up the second installment of Thurmond's FBI file to be made public.

The first installment, released in February, was smaller but more wide-ranging in its subject matter. It included everything from Christmas cards FBI officials sent to Thurmond to Thurmond's requests that the FBI look into civil rights leader Martin Luther King's alleged connection with communists.

This latest release focuses only on contact with Thurmond's office deemed menacing — first by the senator's staff, usually the first to read his mail and receive his calls, and then by the FBI, which assigned agents to investigate.

The documents do not indicate that any of the threats resulted in prosecutions.

The threats came from men and women, whites and blacks, the political and seemingly apolitical. Most did not articulate a particular problem with Thurmond's politics.

Some investigations are marked "EXTORTION" by the FBI, but none refers to his biracial daughter, Essie Mae Washington-Williams, whom Thurmond never acknowledged as his child. (Washington-Williams revealed herself to be the senator's daughter after his death.)

Often the FBI identified the threat maker as mentally ill.

S.C. Law Enforcement Division chief Robert M. Stewart, who was personally involved in protecting Thurmond when he was in South Carolina, said SLED agents were with the senator whenever he was in the state.

"We had more threats against Senator Thurmond than any other official that we provided security for, and I would think that would be because of his long years of service and the many issues he dealt with," Stewart said.

Frequently, Stewart continued, SLED had to handle threats from the mentally ill. "There were at least two or three people whose names would repeatedly come up."

Stewart said behavioral scientists and psychologists working for SLED would help identify those who made truly credible threats; often the most threatening were committed or recommitted to mental hospitals.

"You have to take those threats very seriously," said Stewart, noting several mentally ill people have carried out threats against politicians, including John Hinckley, who shot President Reagan in 1981.

Stewart said he has no knowledge of any person ever getting close to hurting the senator while he was in South Carolina.

Thurmond, known for his bravado, tried to minimize threats brought to his attention, Stewart recalled. "He wasn't scared of anybody. None of these things bothered him. But he did allow us to take extra precautions."

Mark Goodin, a senior aide to Thurmond from 1982 to 1988, said the number of threats against Thurmond was about average among U.S. senators. "Most received several a year. They're all taken seriously by the FBI."

Goodin remembered "one or two" Thurmond received that seemed scarier than most. But the senator never altered his schedule.

"Getting Strom Thurmond to cancel an appearance would have taken an act of Congress."

Report: FBI Lacks Blueprint For Technology Upgrade (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, September 13, 2005

Despite past warnings from congressional auditors, the FBI does not have an effective framework for modernizing its information technology systems, according to a new report.

The Government Accountability Office report (GAO-05-363) argued that the FBI needs to continue to move towards a fully enforced enterprise architecture, a blueprint used by organizations to guide IT system improvements.

The 47-page report also found that the bureau's heavy reliance on private contractors to develop the IT framework was hampered because the FBI does not use performance-based contracting techniques and has failed to effectively oversee the contractors' work.

The FBI's computer systems are based primarily on 1980s technology, and realigning the bureau's mission after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, have strained its IT systems, which are "deployed on an ad hoc basis," according to the report.

Currently, the FBI is undertaking a multimillion-dollar IT modernization effort. More than half of the bureau's IT budget - $390 million out of $737 million - is being spent on upgrading its 450 U.S.-based offices and 45 foreign bureaus.

The FBI has struggled to modernize its systems, a situation highlighted by the failed $170 million Virtual Case File System.

GAO investigators laid the framework for their criticism of the FBI's failure to establish an enterprise architecture in a September 2003 report (GAO-03-959).

DOJ_NMG_0004636

Of the 31 elements GAO used at the time to evaluate the quality of an agency's enterprise architecture, the FBI satisfied only 15. While some best practices have been incorporated since that time, several have yet to be adopted.

"If the bureau does not begin employing the kind of effective contract management controls contained in federal regulations and related guidance, its architecture efforts will continue to be at risk," GAO auditors said.

The FBI's heavy reliance on private contractors for the development of its IT blueprint is partly to blame for the ineffective IT architecture, the report stated. GAO found that contracted work for the enterprise architecture was not defined in measurable, results-oriented terms, and specific standards and performance incentives were not tied to contracts' requirements.

FBI officials told GAO that the bureau's approach to IT contacting was based on the concept of working with the contractor until the product or service is satisfactory, a method GAO termed ineffective.

GAO recommended that the FBI's chief information officer and chief financial officer implement performance-based contracting wherever possible, along with stronger tracking and oversight practices.

In response, Zalmai Azmi, the FBI's chief information officer, wrote that the bureau has been successful in using fixed-price contracting, rather than the performance-based contracting, because the approach gives contractors an incentive to stay on schedule. But, he said, the FBI would take steps to encourage performance-based contracting.

Guilty Pleas In Two Southwest Louisiana Cocaine Rings (AP)

AP, September 13, 2005

LAFAYETTE, La. (AP) — Three men pleaded guilty Monday to being members of a cocaine distribution ring that operated over 16 years.

Nathan Campbell, 24, and Aubrey Howard, 29, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to possess and distribute cocaine, while Tevin Bennett, 18, pleaded guilty to possession of cocaine with intent to sell, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Monday. A sentencing date has not been set.

The three Lafayette men, along with six others, were arrested in December 2003 based on charges outlined in a federal indictment.

Campbell and Howard conspired with others to sell cocaine in St. Mary Parish as part of a drug ring that operated between January 1987 and October 2003, prosecutors said. Christopher Williams, 36, of Morgan City, awaits trial in the case.

In a separate case, Derrick Alexander, of Lake Charles, pleaded guilty last week to using a cellular phone to facilitate cocaine sales at a playground.

Truce Between Bolivian Troops, Coca Growers Set To Expire (GFH/KRT)

By Jack Chang

The Grand Forks Herald, September 13, 2005

EL CHAPARE, Bolivia - (KRT) - From his quiet corner of Bolivia's Chapare region, Egberto Chipana recalled the day three years ago when government soldiers invaded the radio station he now manages because it was championing the cause of farmers who grow coca, the plant whose leaves are the raw material for cocaine.

On that Tuesday, with battles raging between growers and troops, the soldiers seized the station's transmitter, and its directors were threatened with prosecution for instigating unrest. Growers responded by blocking roads and staging protests, demanding that the station be reopened.

"The government eventually returned everything," Chipana said on a recent sweltering afternoon. Drying coca leaves covered the earth outside the station building. "The outcry was too great, and the government couldn't ignore it."

The Chapare, a tropical region of mountain and plain in central Bolivia, has been a battleground for the past decade between coca growers and government troops.

Sometimes the face-off has had deadly results, but an uneasy peace now prevails, thanks to a one-year truce signed by growers and the administration of since-ousted President Carlos Mesa that allows limited cultivation of coca.

But with the agreement officially set to end Oct. 1 and Bolivians scheduled to elect a new president in December, these could be the last days of peace, some Chapare residents fear.

"If the government doesn't respect our right to determine our own livelihood, we will organize and we will fight," said Gabina Contreras, a 54-year-old mother of 11 from the growers' collective Sindicato Esteban Arce, named for a Bolivian independence hero.

"Coca is like father and mother to us. We can't live without coca."

Despite the truce, U.S. and Bolivian officials say this Andean nation's laws forbid the cultivation of coca and allege that coca grown in the Chapare is ending up as cocaine elsewhere in the Americas.

DOJ_NMG_0004637

According to the U.S. State Department, Bolivia is the world's third-largest producer of cocaine. The United States has poured more than $150 million in military and social aid into the country annually over the past four years, in part to fight coca cultivation.

Although eradication of coca in excess of that permitted by the truce continues, the days of widespread military action against coca growers is halted for now, said Luz Mendoza, a spokeswoman for the country's Ministry of Social Defense.

So far this year, the government has destroyed about 16 square miles of coca nationwide, almost all of it in the Chapare, government figures show. In comparison, it eradicated about 46 square miles during all of 2002, nearly half of the 110 square miles believed under cultivation.

"We have a temporary situation there now," she said. "People who are directly involved in the planting of coca are still disobeying laws, and we're not going to ignore that."

Kathryn Ledebur, director of the human rights group the Andean Information Network, sees the coca issue heating up as the election approaches.

Presidential candidates Evo Morales, himself a coca grower, and former President Jorge "Tuto" Quiroga, who oversaw the country's coca eradication effort in 2001 and 2002, were running neck-and-neck in a recent poll.

Morales has said in interviews that he plans to promote the growth of coca for industrial uses other than cocaine production. As one of the country's main coca-producing areas, the Chapare is also the heart of Morales' political support.

Quiroga has been a longtime champion of coca eradication and the development of programs that promote the cultivation of crops such as bananas and oranges in its place.

"Both of the key players in this election built their platforms on the coca issue," Ledebur said.

While forced eradication has slowed in the Chapare, evidence of the drug war is still everywhere in this impoverished, 9,840 square-mile region, where about 45,000 families survive by growing the controversial crop.

Just to get into the Chapare requires going through a series of U.S.-funded checkpoints all manned with drug sniffing dogs and armed soldiers.

At least 4,000 Bolivian troops remain in the Chapare, nearly the same number as were there nearing the peak of the eradication campaign. They are stationed in six local headquarters and 15 mobile bases, according to Godofredo Reinicke, the region's former human rights ombudsman and one of those who believe that the U.S. influence in the drug war is a slap at Bolivian sovereignty.

Coca growers have countered the government presence by strengthening the federations and smaller collectives they have long lived under, allowing them to quickly mobilize in response to military actions.

Growers argue that they cultivate and use coca for traditional purposes such as tea making and chewing to stave off hunger while working.

Selling the crop in government-approved markets, a family working the maximum area of coca crop permitted by the truce can earn between $60 and $80 a month, Ledebur estimated.

Where the coca goes after the markets, however, is a question growers don't have answers for.

"We are just following the legal procedures," Chipana said. "Maybe some of the coca is going to drug production, but that's out of our control."

Jorge Azad, the country's vice-minister of alternative development, said he believes much of it is going to drug production. The amount of coca coming out of the Chapare far exceeds what's needed for traditional use, a fact that demands government action, he said.

"The eradication campaign will continue," Azad said. "I don't know if it will widen after the elections or what will happen, but it will continue."

'Ganja Guru' Appeal Set After Delay (ATS)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Alameda (CA) Times-Star, September 13, 2005

More than two years after being convicted and sentenced for growing marijuana, Oakland's self-styled "Guru of Ganja" will make his appeal Tuesday for why even a slap on the wrist was too much.

Ed Rosenthal, a renowned pro-marijuana author, activist and cultivation authority, claims he never should have been convicted of three marijuana-growing felonies. The government claims he not only deserved conviction, but he also deserved at least two to five years in prison instead of his one-day, time-already-served sentence.

Three judges of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will decide sometime in the few months after Tuesday's arguments.

Rosenthal — famed for his books and for the "Ask Ed" column he wrote for "High Times" magazine — became a medical-marijuana cause celebre after his February 2002 arrest. Drug Enforcement Administration agents raided sites including his

DOJ_NMG_0004638

Oakland home office; an Oakland warehouse where he'd been growing marijuana; San Francisco's Harm Reduction Center medical marijuana club, which he'd supplied; and the HRC's founder's Petaluma home.

After a five-day trial, a federal jury convicted Rosenthal on Jan. 31, 2003, of three marijuana-growing felonies. Upon learning afterward of the state and city protections Rosenthal had not been allowed to raise as a defense, several jurors renounced their verdict and rallied to his cause. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced Rosenthal on June 4, 2003, to one day in prison.

On appeal, Rosenthal basically claims Breyer erred by not letting him mount an "entrapment-by-estoppel" defense —that is, that local and federal officials had led him to believe his conduct was protected under California's 1996 compassionate-use law and by an Oakland ordinance under which he was deemed an city officer permitted to grow marijuana.

Light sentence explained

In fact, the appeal notes that at Rosenthal's sentencing, Breyer said he believed Rosenthal reasonably — although incorrectly — thought the state and local laws immunized him; the judge used this as an explanation for the lighter-than-normal sentence.

The appeal also claims:

-Federal prosecutor George Bevan committed misconduct by falsely telling the grand jury that later indicted Rosenthal that federal agencies were not aiming to shut down medical marijuana clubs;

-Rosenthal wasn't allowed to rebut the government's claims that he grew the marijuana for profit;

-Two jurors committed misconduct by voting to convict based in part on an attorney-friend's advice not to stray from the judge's instructions;

-Breyer erred by instructing the jury it could not bring its "sense of justice" to bear on this case; and

-Breyer erred by refusing to exclude evidence from the Oakland warehouse based on Rosenthal's claim that the warrant lacked probable cause.

The government not only disputes all of these claims but is seeking a harsher sentence of at least two to five years in prison.

Government's brief

Even if the city of Oakland approved of and encouraged his conduct, the government's brief says, a "one-day sentence for a defendant who has been a sophisticated marijuana cultivator for more than four years is simply indefensible in light of Congress' clear intent to treat marijuana cultivation as a serious offense, regardless of the use to which the marijuana is put."

Breyer's enormous departure from sentencing guidelines "was an abuse of judicial discretion and the case should be remanded for resentencing," the brief concludes.

Rosenthal's case was on hold for many months as the appeals court awaited the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Gonzales v. Raich, another Oakland-based case aimed at halting federal prosecution of medical marijuana patients and caregivers.

That case's plaintiffs had argued the Constitution's commerce clause lets Congress regulate only interstate commerce, and that Californians' medical marijuana use neither crosses state lines nor involves money changing hands. That would mean the Controlled Substances Act's marijuana ban oversteps Congress' authority, and so shouldn't be used to prosecute patients and caregivers.

But in a 6-3 ruling in June, the Supreme Court essentially concluded that even marijuana grown in back yards for personal, medical use can affect or contribute to the illegal interstate market for marijuana, and so is within Congress' constitutional reach. Once the federal government was cleared to arrest and prosecute patients and caregivers, Rosenthal's appeal began moving forward again.

Circuit Judges Betty Fletcher, Marsha Berzon and John Gibson will hear Rosenthal's appeal.

Varied backgrounds

Fletcher is a 1979 Carter appointee and former Seattle attorney with a liberal reputation. Berzon is a 1999 Clinton appointee who, after clerking for outspoken liberal U.S. Supreme Court Justice William Brennan, spent most of her career in private practice in San Francisco. And Gibson, "on loan" from the 8th Circuit appeals court, was a Kansas City attorney before being nominated to the federal bench in 1981 and the circuit court in 1982 by President Reagan.

"We think it's a panel that will be fair and carefully consider the claims," said Dennis Riordan, one of Rosenthal's attorneys.

Afghan Opium Prices Down Sharply Since 2001, U.N. Report Says (AP)

By GEORGE GEDDA, Associated Press

AP, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004639

WASHINGTON - Favorable opium harvests in Afghanistan have led to a sharp drop in prices since the U.S. military forced the Taliban regime from power in 2001, according to a United Nations report.

The Taliban imposed a ban on opium cultivation in 2000, triggering an eight-fold price increase to $675 per kilogram in late 2001, the U.N. report said.

Since then good harvests coupled with improved yields dropped the price to $151 as of this past July, the study said.

The report was outlined at a new conference by the U.N.'s anti-drug chief, Antonio Maria Costa. It will be presented to the House Committee on International Relations on Tuesday.

Opium is the raw material from which heroin is derived.

A crackdown on poppy farming by the Afghan government with U.S., British and other outside help led to a 21 percent decline in the area of Afghanistan under poppy cultivation, Costa said.

But production remained almost unchanged because of optimum growing conditions, he added.

He said there has been a sharp increase in opium production in the northern Afghan province of Balkh. Costa linked the increase to the appointment of Gen. Atta Mohammed as governor last year and said he has urged President Hamid Karzai to replace Atta.

A separate report listed "removal of corrupt governors" among six initiatives the Afghan government should take over the next 12 to 24 months to build on improvements in the anti-drug campaign to date.

Other points Costa made:

_Afghanistan accounts for 87 percent of world opium production, down 3 percent from last year.

_The opium economy is netting traffickers $2.14 billion in 2005, about 41 percent of Afghanistan's gross national product, a 7 percent decline from last year.

_The death toll from Afghan opiate overdoses, mostly by Europeans, is estimated at 10,000 annually. About 100,000 others died from sickness related to heroin use.

Editorial: Battling The Meth `epidemic' (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, September 13, 2005

The summer began with a controversy over a new government anti-marijuana campaign that re-ignited a long-smoldering debate about the dangers of pot. It ended with a dust-up over methamphetamine, a potent and addictive drug also known as meth or crystal meth.

A Newsweek cover breathlessly called meth "America's Most Dangerous Drug" and warned of an "epidemic" that will soon be spreading to Your Town, if it's not already there. Meth is being called a "plague" by some drug officials and likened to a forest fire sweeping the country. A recent survey of 500 sheriffs' departments in 45 states labeled meth the No. 1 scourge. Some in Congress are accusing the White House of largely ignoring meth to focus on battling marijuana.

All of that has prompted some critics to cry "hype," suspecting that the meth epidemic is a transparent ploy by law enforcement to drum up more federal money.

A dose of skepticism is warranted here.

"Epidemic" implies that meth has swamped the country. That is not true. If you're a Drug Enforcement Administration agent in San Diego or Phoenix, the term is apt. But it's not if you're in Chicago. Cocaine and heroin are much bigger problems here, a DEA agent said. That's also true of many Northeastern cities, where meth remains a minor player.

But meth, sometimes called "poor man's cocaine," is popular and spreading.

There's no dispute about the perils of meth. Everyone agrees it's bad stuff. Like any other dangerous drug, meth can kill. It destroys lives. It's an insidious, highly addictive drug that can be smoked, snorted or injected. Users get an intense jolt of energy that often tips into paranoia and insomnia. In some, it stokes violent rages. Side effects include convulsions, stroke and cardiac arrhythmia. As we said, this is bad stuff. It doesn't need to be hyped.

The question being debated in Washington now is how much of America's drug-fighting resources should be focused on meth, as opposed to marijuana, cocaine and other, more widely used drugs. In 2003, for example, an estimated 25 million people used marijuana, 5.9 million used cocaine and crack and 1.3 million used meth.

The White House has favored targeting marijuana as Drug Enemy No. 1, because of its widespread use and because it's considered a gateway for young people toward more serious drug use.

The targeting of marijuana as a gateway drug traces back several administrations. There is growing skepticism about the theory, however, buttressed by more recent research. The notion that youngster's marijuana use will translate into use of harder drugs later is proving to be simplistic at best. And allocating the lion's share of resources by measuring the number of drug users may not be the most effective strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0004640

The nation can't focus on fighting one drug to the near-exclusion of all others. Officials must take into account the ripple effects of a drug's damage--that is, not just the health costs for addicts and users, but also costs to cities and neighborhoods in crime, violence and sundered families.

The anti-meth strategy is two-fold.

First, authorities are targeting the makeshift labs where the drug is cooked. They recently boasted of the first nationally coordinated operation, yielding more than 400 arrests in about 200 cities, shutting down 56 labs. Cracking down on meth production in the U.S. is a good idea because those makeshift labs are like toxic waste dumps in a neighborhood. They emit noxious fumes and are highly explosive.

Unfortunately, success in closing such domestic labs won't stop meth. It only means that Mexican cartels pick up the slack. An investigation by The Oregonian newspaper in Portland, Ore., reported that Mexico last year imported nearly twice as much pseudoephedrine--one of the keys to illegal meth production--than is necessary for the production of cold medicine.

The second tactic: Many states, including Illinois, are restricting sales of over-the-counter cold and allergy medicines with ingredients that can be converted into the drug. In Oregon, for instance, you now need a doctor's prescription for such common cold medications as Claritin-D or Sudafed. That's overly burdensome. It is enough to keep some of those products behind the counter, available without a prescription. That's the practice in Illinois. Asking a pharmacist for Sudafed is a small inconvenience that most people will shrug off, particularly if it helps crimp a notorious drug trade.

Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales recently declared that meth had overtaken marijuana as the most dangerous drug in America. That's certainly true in many places in this country. And where it isn't, it could be tomorrow. The focus now should be in making sure that meth doesn't become a full-fledged "epidemic."

Man Gets Life Plus 136 Years In D.C.-area Arsons (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan

The Baltimore Sun, September 13, 2005

GREENBELT -- A law enforcement task force secretly labored for years from a warren of empty laboratories at the Beltsville Agricultural Research Center, chasing more than a thousand dead-end leads trying to catch a serial arsonist before he killed again.

In the end, it was a combination of sheer doggedness, a serendipitous meeting with military officials about DNA evidence from a pair of Marine dress-blues left behind at a fire scene, and an unusually cooperative suspect that cracked the case.

Monday, Thomas A. Sweatt, 50, the once-elusive "firebug" responsible for setting more than 45 fires in Maryland, Virginia and Washington that killed two people was sentenced in federal court to serve the rest of his life in prison.

"It's a relief," said Scott Fulkerson, a special agent from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco Firearms and Explosives' Baltimore field office who was co-leader of the task force that operated for nearly two years.

Sweatt, a former fast-food restaurant manager in Washington who reportedly told authorities he was driven by demons, kept Fulkerson, his co-leader Tom Daley and dozens of investigators from across the state and country puzzled for years.

When he was arrested in April and pleaded guilty in June, he gave it all up. The man who had evaded authorities for months didn't balk when they asked him for a voluntary DNA sample at the KFC restaurant he managed.

He also quickly admitted to a seemingly random set of residential fires that hop-scotched across the Washington region from 2002 until earlier this year.

His attorney described Sweatt as a classic Dr. Jekyl and Mr. Hyde, calling him a good person and victim of an unspecified mental illness.

"Hopefully, he will get the attention and treatment he desperately needs," said Assistant Public Defender John C. Chamble.

But even today, Sweatt's motive remains a mystery.

He walked into court Monday, his gait unsteady, his eyes hidden behind slightly darkened glasses.

When Sweatt stood to address the court before U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow sentenced him to life plus roughly 136 years in prison, he spoke clearly in an almost falsetto voice.

"To the victims and the victims' families, I'm very sorry for all of the harm I have caused," he said, leaning toward the microphone.

Sweatt rarely looked at the weeping families, including his own, assembled behind him.

His fires damaged and destroyed homes, displaced residents and killed 89-year-old Annie Brown and 86-year-old Lou Edna Jones, both of Northeast Washington.

"She befriended the lonely and comforted the broken hearted," Jones' daughter Carolyn said of her mother, who died in June 2003. "He is a vicious murderer who single-handedly terrorized Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0004641

Like the 2002 Washington-area sniper attacks, the jarring unpredictability of the fires filled residents with fear and frustrated investigators who initially didn't link the blazes.

The fires were set in almost identical ways -- with homemade bombs of plastic one-gallon jugs filled with gasoline, topped with a piece of cloth used as a wick and wrapped in a plastic bag for easy transport.

Investigators described the arsons as diabolical, saying the incendiary devices were often left outside exits to the home.

A fire at a Silver Spring apartment building in 2004 was set in the building's only stairwell and forced some occupants to jump from second- and third-story windows. Most of the fires were set in the middle of the night as people slept.

Sweatt knew his victims were home, once waiting for 15 minutes on a porch before lighting his Molotov cocktail, investigators said.

The fires, which included several in Prince George's and Montgomery counties, spawned an arson task force that began its work in the summer of 2003.

Investigators believed they had found the arsonist's DNA on a hair recovered from the scene of one fire. They matched it to DNA found at other fires. But the team of federal agents and local detectives did not know who it belonged to.

More than 1,000 leads were logged in black binders, checked out through interviews and then, when exhausted, filed on bookshelves in the red-brick Building 308 at the agricultural center.

Evidence found at a fire in Prince George's County included a black plastic bag that had been part of the makeshift Molotov cocktail used to set the blaze. Most of the other bags had been melted down as a result of the arsons.

The lettering read, in part, "MADE IN CHINA FOR CORNELIUS SHOP."

"We only had part of the lettering at first, so we thought it was from a shop in London," Fulkerson said. "The Secret Service tracked down that lead for us before we knew we were wrong."

Instead, they discovered Cornelius Shopping Bags were used by two convenience stores in Washington -- one of the stores they later learned was a block from Sweatt's Lebaum Street home.

So they enlisted the store owners' help. They installed video cameras and taped dime-sized, numbered tags to each one of the store's bags.

That way, Fulkerson said, investigators could track a purchase made by the suspect to a fire-proof metal tag found at the arson scene. It never worked.

In March 2004, one of the most promising developments emerged.

Police arrested a Prince George's County man after he appeared at two schools pretending to be a fire investigator. He was charged with lying to a federal agent.

But hopes were dashed when his fingerprints did not match those found at fire scenes, and he was in jail when the next blaze linked to the serial arsonist was set on April 16, 2004.

As another year wound down, the leads piled up. Then, in December, authorities got the break they needed.

At the scene of a fire set in Arlington County, Va., they found a pair of Marine Corps blue trousers. DNA taken from the waistband was linked to DNA found at other fires.

Sweatt hoped to throw investigators off his trail by planting evidence suggesting a member of the armed services might be involved, according to Fulkerson.

But at the time, investigators took the lead at face value. They asked the Navy if they could enter their DNA evidence into its database to look for a match.

"It looks great on paper, but they don't keep their data that way," Fulkerson said. At the same time, federal officials said there were plans to scale back the task force because the investigation had not produced an arrest and the fires appeared to have stopped in early 2005.

Feeling despondent, Fulkerson said, investigators heard about an incredible coincidence: 30 months earlier, there had been unsolved car fires at a Marine barracks in Washington. Sweatt had been seen acting suspiciously there, and his name was taken down.

With that, they sought out Sweatt, who provided a DNA sample.

"He gave it to us without a problem," Fulkerson said.

The sample matched DNA from a strand of human hair found at a fire in Washington in September 2003, from fabric of a pant leg found at a Silver Spring fire in February 2004, from an athletic sock found at a D.C. fire last September and from the Marine trousers.

The task force finally disbanded. When he spoke to investigators, Sweatt told them he set so many fires, he was unsure if he could remember them all.

Fulkerson pledged to leave no suspicious fire unsolved.

"The victims we haven't found yet," he said, "they deserve closure too."

Arsonist Apologizes But Does Not Explain (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda And Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Serial arsonist Thomas A. Sweatt offered an apology yesterday as he was sentenced to a life prison term for carrying out a deadly string of fires, but he provided no clue in court about why he spent nearly three years igniting homes where people were sleeping.

It was the first time that Sweatt spoke publicly of the pain he caused by setting 45 houses and apartments on fire throughout the Washington region -- blazes that killed two elderly women and caused millions of dollars in damage. His words rang hollow, according to family members who said they want a motive and explanation.

Having exchanged the orange jail jumpsuit he wore at an earlier court appearance for a dark blue suit, white shirt and dark tie, Sweatt stood and leaned toward a microphone at the federal courthouse in Greenbelt. He turned toward the side of the courtroom where more than a dozen of his victims and their relatives sat.

In a soft voice, Sweatt said: "I'm very sorry for all of the harm that I've caused you. To those who have lost loved ones, I share your hurt, and I share your pain every day."

To anyone who harbors hatred toward him, Sweatt said he would ask God "to replace that hate with understanding." He also apologized to about a dozen members of his own family, some of whom had traveled from Texas and North Carolina to attend the hearing.

Sweatt, a 50-year-old former fast-food restaurant manager from Southeast Washington, pleaded guilty to murder and arson charges in June, less than six weeks after his arrest. His plea agreement with prosecutors called for a life sentence with no chance of parole; the judge yesterday tacked on nearly 136 additional years.

"There's nothing he could say that would be acceptable," said Carolyn Jones, 54, a daughter of Lou Edna Jones, the 86-year-old woman who was killed by the fire Sweatt set at her Northeast Washington home in June 2003. Jones said she left the courtroom as Sweatt stood to speak.

Her mother, known and beloved throughout the neighborhood as "Mama Lou," had lived in the house for 50 years. Jones said she would have liked to see Sweatt receive "the same sentence he gave my mother, the same way he gave it to her."

The other fatal fire was among the first fires that Sweatt admitted setting: a February 2002 blaze that claimed the life of 89-year-old Annie Brown of Northeast Washington. Sweatt admitted to setting fire to 44 more apartments and houses, as well as several vehicles, covering a wide swath of suburban Maryland, the District and Northern Virginia.

Investigators have quoted Sweatt as saying that he was addicted to setting fires and that he chose targets at random. They said he typically placed a plastic jug filled with gasoline just outside the front door and lighted a cloth wick. Sweatt was a thrill-seeker, authorities said, and sometimes watched from his car as the blaze spread. He knew the residences were occupied, they said, and he kept track of media accounts of the massive hunt for a suspect.

Sweatt's attorney, Assistant Public Defender John C. Chamble, told the judge that Sweatt could not stop setting the fires because he was "laboring under a psychological compulsion." Chamble compared Sweatt to a literary character, the peaceful Dr. Jekyll and murderous Mr. Hyde.

"You had the good Mr. Sweatt and the sick Mr. Sweatt," Chamble said.

In sentencing Sweatt, U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow told him that any mental health issues "can't in any way justify the actions you took, actions which terrorized a community."

Chamble asked the judge to recommend that Sweatt be placed in a facility where he could receive psychological treatment. Chasanow said she would make the recommendation. Federal prosecutors did not contest Chamble's request.

Sweatt, a former manager at a KFC/Pizza Hut on Bladensburg Road in Northeast Washington, has been jailed since his arrest April 27. Investigators said they tied him to the crimes through DNA evidence recovered at four arsons.

Within hours of his arrest, authorities said, Sweatt confessed.

During a news conference, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein praised the Serial Arson Task Force, which included members of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and local police and fire department investigators from Maryland, the District and Virginia. He also cited the work of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which helped connect DNA from a single strand of hair left at a September 2003 fire scene to Sweatt.

If the task force had not arrested him, "I have no doubt Mr. Sweatt would have set fire to more houses, and more people would have died," Rosenstein said.

Sweatt, of the 500 block of Lebaum Street SE, lived near a convenience store where he may have purchased a few of the jugs used to set fires, authorities said. The KFC/Pizza Hut was near many of the fire scenes, and Sweatt worked a shift that would have allowed him to strike in early morning.

Investigators said yesterday that they were relieved by the quick guilty plea and lengthy sentence. "Everybody had to put everything they had into this," said Tom Daley, an ATF agent and one of the lead investigators, recalling the many twists and turns of the probe.

In an interview at an ATF office in Lanham, Daley, other federal agents and local police and fire officials said the arson probe was the most taxing and complicated serial case they ever worked.

The agents and officers on the task force, which had more than 100 members during its nearly two-year existence, conducted lengthy surveillance details and, day after day, cruised neighborhoods before dawn. Authorities offered a reward of as much as $100,000 for information. Yet they never caught the arsonist in the act.

"Arsons are hard to prove," said ATF agent Scott Fulkerson, another of the lead investigators. "There is limited evidence left behind. Almost everything is consumed in fires. This covered three states and multiple jurisdictions. There was a lot of media coverage and great stress to the community. There was pressure felt by the task force to catch this guy. There was an ongoing threat to the community."

Investigators declined to discuss much of what they learned from Sweatt during a lengthy interrogation on the day of his arrest and during six subsequent debriefing sessions. They said he discussed a range of issues, pointed out places where he struck and provided a wealth of information about the mind-set of a serial arsonist.

In court yesterday, Sweatt was far less forthcoming.

"It would be better if he had sat down and kept his mouth shut. He's not sorry," declared Darlene Lloyd, the oldest of Lou Edna Jones's four daughters.

Lloyd and her sister, along with two other relatives of Sweatt's victims, addressed the judge at the sentencing. Lloyd told the judge that she learned from authorities that both of her mother's feet had been burned by the time firefighters found her in her bedroom.

"She lost both of her feet trying to get out of that big room," Lloyd said.

Serial Arsonist To Serve Life (WT/AP)

By Heather Greenfield, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Darlene Lloyd feels some relief that Thomas A. Sweatt will spend the rest of his life in jail without the possibility of parole for setting the fire that killed her mother.

But closure is not easy when her mentally handicapped son continues to ask at dinner each night for his grandmother, Lou Edna Jones.

"Being handicapped, he doesn't understand why she is not coming back," Mrs. Lloyd said. She planned to reassure him that Sweatt was not coming back now, either.

As victims of the serial arsonist spoke at his sentencing yesterday at U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, they said they still don't understand what led Sweatt to set random fires that terrorized the Washington area for two years.

"I would love to just find out exactly why he did this," said Jean Kyler, whose 94-year-old mother is still not able to return to her fire-damaged home.

Sweatt, 50, admitted setting 45 arson fires in the Washington area. Investigators know how he did it -- using jugs of gasoline, and clothing for a wick. But the reason why remained unanswered even as a federal judge sentenced him yesterday to life in prison plus 136 years.

"To the victims and the victims' families, I'm very sorry for all the harm I've caused you. To those who have lost loved ones, I share your hurt every day," Sweatt said.

He was dressed in a dark gray suit and appeared almost timid as he leaned into the microphone to speak and turned to the families gathered in court.

The former fast-food restaurant manager admitted that between February 2003 and December 2004 he set 45 fires: 21 in the District, 17 in Prince George's County, three in Fairfax County, two in Montgomery County, and one each in Arlington County and Alexandria.

Under a plea deal, local prosecutors agreed not to charge Sweatt with other arsons.

Sweatt also pleaded guilty to two murder charges.

He took responsibility for the June 2003 death of Mrs. Jones, 86, in her Northeast home, as well as the death of Annie Brown, 91. She died of smoke inhalation a few days after Sweatt set fire to her next-door neighbor's Northeast home in February 2002.

Sweatt has been in custody since his arrest in April. Authorities have said they linked him to the fires after collecting DNA from items found at four crime scenes, including Marine Corps dress pants from a fire in Arlington.

Sweatt showed no emotion during the victims' statements or the sentencing, but earlier said he welcomed the sentence.

Kenneth L. Wainstein, U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, called the sentence "a fitting punishment and a fitting conclusion to this case."

Judge Deborah K. Chasanow told Sweatt she realized he has mental health issues, but that they could not excuse what he did and how he "terrorized" the community.

It will be up to federal prison officials to decide whether to transfer Sweatt from a Charles County prison. There is no parole in the federal system.

D.C.-Area Arsonist Sentenced To Life In Prison (NYT)

By Gary Gately

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

GREENBELT, Md., Sept. 12 - A 50-year-old man was sentenced to life in prison on Monday for setting a series of fires that killed two elderly women and terrorized the Washington area for more than two years.

The man, Thomas A. Sweatt of Washington, apologized to the judge and to the relatives of the arson victims, while Mr. Sweatt's lawyer argued that a mental illness led his client to set the fires.

Federal Judge Deborah K. Chasanow sentenced Mr. Sweatt to life plus nearly 136 years, eliminating any chance of parole. Judge Chasanow said she would recommend to prison officials that Mr. Sweatt receive a psychiatric evaluation and, if necessary, treatment.

But, she added, mental illness could not excuse killing two people and setting fire to more than 45 homes, as well as several automobiles. "Whatever you faced in terms of any problem cannot in any way justify the actions you took - actions that terrorized a community," Judge Chasanow said.

Mr. Sweatt, a former KFC-Pizza Hut manager, sat silently, his lips pursed, through most of the hearing. Just before Judge Chasanow pronounced his sentence, based on a plea agreement, Mr. Sweatt leaned forward and said: "To my victims and to the victims' families, I'm very sorry for all the harm that I caused you. For those of you who have lost loved ones, I share your hurt and share your pain every day."

Mr. Sweatt's arrest in April resulted from an intensive investigation by federal agencies and local law enforcement in Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Investigators broke the case when they found a pair of Marine Corps blue trousers near a fire scene. The trousers led them to Navy investigators, who had identified Mr. Sweatt as a suspect in car fires more than two years earlier near the Marine barracks in Southeast Washington.

Mr. Sweatt consented to giving a DNA sample, which linked him to evidence from four of the fires, the authorities said, and he admitted to setting others next to entrances to homes using cloth wicks and one-gallon jugs of gasoline.

Investigators said Mr. Sweatt had no known ties to the military. John C. Chamble, a federal public defender representing Mr. Sweatt, said his client suffered a mental illness that resulted in radical and uncontrollable shifts in behavior. "He did not have a choice," Mr. Chamble said.

During the sentencing hearing and afterward, relatives of arson victims spoke of the pain and havoc Mr. Sweatt's arsons had caused.

Relatives of Lou Edna Jones, an 86-year-old woman killed in a fire on June 5, 2003, at her Northeast Washington house, wore shirts and carried placards bearing photographs of the woman fondly known as Mama Lou.

"The rest of my life, I'll still be grieving for the loss of my mother," said Darlene Lloyd, Ms. Jones's daughter. "There will always be a hole in my heart that can never be filled or closed."

Annie Brown, an 89-year-old from Northeast Washington, died of smoke inhalation days after a fire Mr. Sweatt admitted to setting at her neighbor's home in February 2002, the authorities said.

Treasury Tax Analysis Concluded As Lawful (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- An independent investigation concluded that the Treasury Department didn't break the law by calculating the cost of then-Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry's tax plan and posting the results on the department's Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0004645

"We do not believe that Treasury employees completed the revenue estimate at issue for use by a campaign or a party, but as a defense of the [Bush] administration's policies," according to a March 24 letter to the Treasury from Special Counsel Scott Bloch. The analysis was made with an eye toward congressional action, not to criticize Mr. Kerry, the special counsel's office said. The Hatch Act restricts political activities by government employees.

The documents were made available to Dow Jones Newswires under a Freedom of Information Act request. The investigation was launched after The Wall Street Journal reported1 in the spring of 2004 that Treasury used civil servants to calculate the Kerry tax plan.

Mr. Bloch said his probe found that Treasury's Office of General Counsel for many years has given "problematic" guidance to employees, effectively asking Treasury tax analysts to "turn a blind eye" to potential violations.

Treasury Deputy General Counsel James Carroll welcomed the report of no legal violations, but defended the general counsel's office, saying it has consistently advised employees that it is inappropriate to conduct analyses "for a partisan political purpose."

Heir Tonic For Charities (WSJ)

By Arthur C. Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

The estate tax seemed to be cruising toward inevitable demise. A Senate vote was expected around Labor Day, and the GOP appeared close to the 60 votes needed to permanently abolish taxes on inheritances. Katrina has set the vote back by at least a few weeks, as the Senate attends instead to legislation authorizing relief funds to the Gulf Coast. The hurricane has also provided an argument against repeal to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. He compared beneficiaries of repeal with hurricane victims, asking, "Shall we give [the estate tax revenues] to the wealthiest people in the country, or should we rebuild New Orleans?" The argument is a progressive classic: Not taxing the rich is the same as taking from the poor.

As flawed as the logic might be, it is worth considering how much it will cost taxpayers if the tax is repealed, and what it means for the economy. Estimates place the annual federal revenues from the estate tax at $20 billion. This would certainly make a dent in hurricane recovery efforts -- if it were all used for that purpose.

A more realistic link between the tax and disaster relief is through charitable contributions. Americans bequeath $20 billion every year to nonprofits, including organizations that provide relief to disaster victims. Opponents of repeal note that doing so removes a powerful philanthropic motive, because the portion of an estate willed to charity is tax-exempt. The CBO estimates that a 10% decrease in the estate tax would stimulate a decrease in charitable bequests of 4.2%. This suggests that a repeal of the tax would, by itself, lower charitable giving by $8 billion annually. Many nonprofits have lined up against abolition of the tax for this reason.

In making their case, however, nonprofits employ a tortured logic: Our organization supports the estate tax so that your family will continue to try to avoid it by giving us money. Instead, charities should focus less on the incentives of people making bequests, and more on the incentives of people receiving them.

What can we expect heirs to do with their money, if less of it is taken by the IRS? Data show that people tend to contribute a higher proportion of inherited wealth than they do other kinds of wealth (e.g., from stocks or real estate). If the estate tax is repealed, this extra charitable giving will likely come to at least $750 million per year. In the short run, giving by private heirs will not make up entirely for the loss of charitable gifts by their parents if the estate tax is repealed, but this effect is still considerable. And the amounts given annually are not fixed -- heirs may be convinced to give more.

When all is said and done, the Senate will most likely repeal or greatly reduce the estate tax without too much consideration of the interests of the nonprofit sector. This does not spell doom for charities, however. The key is not to focus on how the tax system can be used to get more money from the dead, but rather to look to the future and find ways to increase giving -- for humanitarian relief and other worthy causes -- among a new generation of heirs.

Mr. Brooks, associate professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, is writing a book on American charity, to be published next year by Basic Books.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Pledges 'humility' As Senate Hearings Begin (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004646

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts was unflappable and succinct Monday, after sometimes blunt criticism from Democrats in the opening day of Senate hearings to confirm him as the nation's 17th chief justice.

In his longest remarks since President Bush first nominated him in July, Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee that he would approach his position as the head of the nation's judiciary with “a certain humility.” Roberts, tapped to replace the late William Rehnquist, spoke without notes for less than seven minutes.

“Judges are like umpires,” said Roberts, a federal appeals judge. “Umpires don't make the rules; they apply them.”

Roberts' remarks ended a day of speeches by the 18 Judiciary Committee members. Democrats put the judge on notice that he has some persuading to do. “If I looked at only what you've said and written in the past, I'd feel compelled to vote no,” said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said Roberts seemed “cavalier” about women's and minority rights in some of his writings.

As questioning begins today, Roberts, 50, will be pressed by Democrats to reveal his views on a range of legal issues.

Democrats noted the nominee could serve for more than a generation. “We are about to enter, if he is successful, the Roberts era,” said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. “We should know this man's core values and beliefs.”

Republicans are counseling caution. “You have no obligation to tell us how you will rule,” Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said. “Don't take the bait.”

But Sen. Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the panel, said he'll ask whether Roberts believes the Constitution guarantees a right to privacy — a right cited in the Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal nationwide. Rehnquist was one of two justices to vote in 1973 against Roe v. Wade.

A campaign atmosphere prevailed outside the hearing room. Critics wore “No on Roberts” lapel stickers. Supporters wore lime green “Roberts Yes!” T-shirts.

Specter is pushing for a Senate vote on Roberts this month. If approved, Roberts could take office by Oct. 3, the beginning of the high court's term.

Roberts Sees Modest Role For Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — Judge John G. Roberts Jr., President Bush's choice to be chief justice of the United States, told senators today that he seeks a modest and limited role for the nation's highest court, akin to an umpire who calls the balls and strikes rather than a star player who is the center of attention.

"Justices and judges are servants of the law, not the other way around," Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee, eschewing judicial activism.

"Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules. They apply them," he said. "And nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

His statement served notice that on one of the central questions surrounding the judiciary — the extent to which judges should impose themselves on key issues of the day -he favored a restricted role.

Roberts' short and simple opening statement came on the first day of his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

And though the grand hearing room in the Russell Building was the site of earlier confrontations over Judge Robert Bork in 1987 and Justice Clarence Thomas in 1991, today's opening session had none of the tension and acrimony of those confrontations.

Roberts and his wife, Jane, introduced their two young children — Josie and Jack — and the senators smiled at them like grandparents.

Several Democrats said they intended to question Roberts sharply to discern his views on civil rights and abortion, but they stopped short of saying they would oppose him.

In his brief statement at the hearing's end, Roberts showed the qualities that made him a superb advocate before the Supreme Court. He spoke directly to the senators and without notes. And he used the simple baseball analogy to convey his view that the Supreme Court should play a more modest and limited role in American government.

His comments echoed a theme of the 10 Republican senators who spoke before him. They complained that the Supreme Court had become a "super legislature" in recent decides, regularly deciding the most controversial political question of the day.

The senators said judges should not make the law. Rather, they said the hard political questions should be decided by elected officials, and Roberts indicated that he agreed with them on the court's limited role.

However, Roberts also stressed the court's crucial role in upholding individual rights against the power of the government, a favorite theme of Democrats and liberals.

DOJ_NMG_0004647

As a lawyer in private practice, Roberts said he was awed to go before the Supreme Court representing a client who was fighting the federal government.

"Here was the United States, the most powerful entity in the world, aligned against my client. And yet, all I had to do was convince the court that I was right on the law and the government was wrong and all that power and might would recede in deference to the rule of law," he said. "That is a remarkable thing. It is what we mean when we say that we are a government of laws and not of men."

Roberts recalled President Ronald Reagan's reference to the Soviet Constitution, and its list of rights granted to the people. "Those rights were empty promises, because that system did not have an independent judiciary to uphold the rule of law and enforce those rights," he said. "We do, because of the wisdom of our founders and the sacrifices of our heroes over the generations to make their vision a reality."

Roberts, 50, was nominated a week ago to succeed his first boss in Washington, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Sept. 3.

If confirmed, he would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall took office in 1800. And in good health, he could serve until 2040, said Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

In his opening statement, Roberts also stressed that he had "no agenda" for the court.

"I come before the committee with no agenda. I have no platform," he said. "Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

On Tuesday morning, the senators will begin the questioning of Roberts.

Roberts delivered his opening statement roughly three and a half hours after the hearing began; he spoke only after each senator had delivered an opening statement.

Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican, banged the gavel at midday, beginning what is likely to be a weeklong inquiry into Roberts judicial temperament and — to the extent possible — his positions on some of the most sensitive judicial and political issues of the era, even as senators said he had no obligation to speak in specifics.

While there has been little doubt that the nomination will win the committee's approval — and the approval of the full Senate — one senior Democrat, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, said that from what he has seen of Roberts' writings, he would vote against him.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said in her opening statement that she would have trouble voting for a nominee whom she felt might overturn the Roe vs. Wade decision that granted a woman the right to have an abortion. She is the only woman on the committee.

Roberts, in a telegenic red tie, sat smiling and silent at the witness table in the ornate Caucus Room as the senators, one by one, reminded him, and a nationwide television and Internet audience, that the Senate was about to decide whether a 50-year-old jurist would receive a lifetime appointment as chief justice of the United States.

The hearing played out against the backdrop of the devastation brought by Hurricane Katrina two weeks ago to the Gulf Coast.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the committee, said that the storm offered "a tragic reminder of why we have a federal government," which he said was needed, foremost, for the protection and security of the population.

The statement went to the heart of questions about Roberts and where he would lead the court as the first new chief justice in 19 years. Roberts had been nominated in July to replace the retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, but was renominated last week to be the chief justice after the death of William H. Rehnquist.

Leahy noted that "if anyone needed a reminder of the growing poverty and despair among too many Americans, we now have it" in Katrina's aftermath. So too, he said, a reminder of the racial divide that continues to mar the nation.

At the heart of the inquiry of Roberts, a relatively junior judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, Leahy said, was, "Will you be the protector of the rights of all Americans?"

Specter, noting the recent run of 5-4 decisions on the high court, said that Roberts' votes would be critical on many key issues, among them those involving school prayer and defendants' rights. He added that the nomination "comes at a time of turbulent partisanship" in the nation's political life.

He said that senators "have a responsibility to ask probing questions," and that Roberts had the prerogative of answering them, or not, as he sees fit.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), expressing chagrin at the failure of the Bush administration to make available certain documents from the time Roberts spent as a deputy solicitor general during the administration of the first President Bush, said, "We can only wonder what they don' want us to know."

Biden raised the issue of decisions the court has made in recent years to expand the rights of women and African Americans.

"I believe in the right of privacy," he said, using what has become recognized as a reference to abortion.

Biden said that based on what Roberts has written — a record that includes his work in the Reagan and first Bush administrations, on the appellate court and in response to questions from senators — he would vote against the nomination.

Feinstein said that as the panel's only woman she felt a need to ask about issues that primarily had an impact on women.

She and Sen. John Kyl (R-Ariz.) acknowledged that Roberts needed to be sensitive to answering questions in a way that might impinge on his judicial prerogatives.

As the session progressed, there was no sign of political bickering, despite the political sensitivity and the potential divisions attached to the nomination.

There was a small contingent of partisans outside the hearing, and advocates of women's rights expressed concern about rules limiting the public's access to the hearing. With about 250 seats in the room, 40 were set aside for the public.

The Unheard (WP)

By Marcia Davis

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

It was the moment for which the nation had been waiting -- okay, well, at least those who'd managed to get a seat in the hearing room in the Russell Building on Capitol Hill yesterday.

The confirmation hearings for John G. Roberts Jr. were unfolding against the backdrop of Hurricane Katrina, and though a few senators mentioned it early on, as the day progressed in Room 325, its urgency seemed a million miles away. The caucus room with its high ceiling, huge columns and glittering chandeliers has been the site of other history-making moments. It was where in 1987 Robert Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court began its descent into defeat, and where Clarence Thomas crossed swords with Anita Hill. Yesterday, it was where Roberts finally spoke on his own behalf in his bid to become the next Supreme Court chief justice.

A sea of media, 140 or so strong, and the few members of the public who managed to get seats in the very back of the room had been waiting through one senator's speech after another to hear the 50-year-old federal judge work his rhetorical magic. Here was the man who had argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court, and won most. Here was the man touted as a lawyer's lawyer, a man his colleagues have praised as knowing the power of combining legal brilliance with a cool confidence. And here was the man, who, if President Bush has his way, will be confirmed as the nation's 17th chief justice, elevated to a position that could shape the quality of life for Americans for decades to come.

So, naturally, his words were what everyone wanted to hear.

And speak he did -- for all of eight minutes. He was introduced shortly before 3:30, and he was done with his opening statement soon after.

Talk about judicial restraint.

As does any lawyer, John Roberts knows that anything he says can be used against him. And so yesterday he was a man of "thank yous" -- to the senators lined up before him, to Bush for the nomination, to his family and his mentors without whose help and sacrifices he would not be sitting where he was, he said.

He paid respects once again to the man whose casket he helped to carry up the Supreme Court steps last week, William H. Rehnquist. Roberts clerked for the chief justice, and in one of those odd, novel-like twists, he may soon replace him.

"I talked last week with the nurses who helped care for him over the past year, and I was glad to hear from them that he was not a particularly good patient," Roberts said. "He chafed at the limitations they tried to impose. His dedication to duty over the past year was an inspiration to me and, I know, to many others."

Roberts went on to speak of his philosophy, one that demands a limited role for judges. He compared them to umpires, adding, "Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire." Judges are more than umpires, of course, and Roberts tried to assure the panel that his thinking has evolved since his early eager days as a young lawyer working in the Republican administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

When the questioning begins, there will be those who will press him to be more revealing. But yesterday Roberts spent most of the day in silence, sitting through the 10-minute speeches of the Judiciary Committee members, which added up to hours.

Roberts was as still as he was silent, his face a wall. His lips were a tight line, except on the few occasions when he laughed at a joke -- mainly the recurring one about his relative youth and appearance of good health. There were times, too, when someone seemed to make a point that he appreciated, and he would reward that senator with the slightest of nods, as when Joseph Biden (D-Del.) talked about the issues of technology and privacy that no doubt the high court would face in the future.

There were what passed for harsh words from Democratic senators such as New York's Charles Schumer, who warned that he would be unsparing in his questioning, and California's Dianne Feinstein, who said she would be unable to vote for anyone she believed would overturn Roe v. Wade. And there were words of encouragement from Republicans such as Orrin Hatch, who warned Roberts not to be trapped into answering questions that compromised him as a judge.

Roberts took it all in, his eyes often wide and glistening under the glare of the camera lights, but revealing nothing.

It was representative democracy at work, though it was occurring in a room where if you didn't know better, you might think democracy was almost exclusively white. The Judiciary Committee itself is all white, and Feinstein is its only female member.

"Things went as I expected," said Ted Shaw of the NAACP's Legal Defense Fund. "I think Roberts's opening statement was eloquent. I've seen him in court. But the question for me is who is he."

Roberts's moments of greatest animation occurred before the hearings began, when he sat with his wife, Jane, and children, Jack and Josie. Jack wore a suit with shorts and a bow tie. Josie wore a blue dress and a bow in her hair. It was a moment reminiscent of the summer day when Bush first nominated Roberts to replace Sandra Day O'Connor. Jack didn't dance this time, though. He simply climbed into his father's lap. The cameras flashed, and Roberts didn't have to say a word.

'Judges Are Not Politicians,' Roberts Says (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

John G. Roberts Jr. opened the first Supreme Court confirmation hearing in 11 years yesterday by portraying himself as a humble, non-political judge who would interpret the law "without fear or favor" if he became the 17th chief justice of the United States.

After listening to three hours of senators' opening statements, in which Democrats expressed fears that he would move the court to the right on abortion, civil rights and other issues, Roberts sought to dispel such speculation. Though he offered no specifics on his views, Roberts said justices must have "the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent."

"I have no platform," he told the Senate Judiciary Committee in a brief speech without notes in the ornate Russell Caucus Room. "Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes." Rather, he said, "judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules; they apply them."

Although the stewardship of the Supreme Court is at stake for potentially decades to come, yesterday's hearing seemed almost anticlimactic, with public attention riveted on the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and Democrats still pressing for 15-year-old documents that might give them better ammunition against Roberts. With few doubting that Roberts, 50, will ultimately win confirmation, senators of both parties used yesterday's forum to highlight their contrasting legal philosophies and views of the court's role in society.

Many Republicans used their allotted 10 minutes apiece to urge the nominee not to answer questions about legal issues that might come before the court. But Democrats said he must satisfy them that he will safeguard the rights of women, disabled people and minorities in the voting booth and workplace. Some also pressed him to recognize a constitutional right to privacy, which underpins the Supreme Court's legalization of abortion nationwide.

"This is a confirmation proceeding," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), "not a coronation. It is the Senate Judiciary Committee's job to ask tough questions."

President Bush's choice to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist will face hours of questions, starting today, from the panel's 10 Republicans and eight Democrats.

With some Republicans congratulating Roberts as though his confirmation is assured in the GOP-controlled Senate, Democrats warned that, if nothing else, he will have to earn their votes by fully explaining his criticisms of a variety of policies aimed at eliminating discrimination, including affirmative action and some aspects of the Voting Rights Act. Those criticisms were found in reams of memos that Roberts wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration.

"I believe the federal government should stamp out discrimination wherever -- wherever -- it occurs," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) told him. "If I look only at what you've said and written . . . I would have to vote no. You dismissed the constitutional protection of privacy as, quote, 'a so-called right.' . . . You dismissed gender discrimination as . . . 'merely a perceived problem.' "

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), the only woman on the committee, said, "It would be very difficult for me to vote to confirm someone to the Supreme Court whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade ." In the 1980s, Roberts wrote that the landmark abortion ruling was wrongly decided and should be overturned, but he since has suggested that the ruling is "settled law" that need not be revisited.

Despite the Democrats' warnings, Roberts's televised performance clearly pleased Republican senators and White House aides. His seven-minute speech "almost moved me to tears," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) told reporters. White House adviser Ed Gillespie, who sat just behind Roberts, assured reporters "there were no notes or anything he spoke from."

Lawmakers' preoccupation with the hurricane catastrophe pervaded the hearing on filling the first chief justice vacancy in nearly two decades. At least two Democrats tried to weave the storm's devastation into their arguments, saying the disproportionate impact on poor people and ethnic minorities underscores the need for a judiciary sympathetic to the nation's most vulnerable.

"We cannot continue to ignore the injustice, the inequality and the gross disparities that exist in our society," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the committee's most senior member, told Roberts. He said Roberts's writings on civil rights suggest there are "real and serious reasons to be deeply concerned" about the direction he would take the court and about "his commitment to equal opportunity. . . . This hearing is John Roberts's job interview with the American people."

Roberts came for the interview well-prepared. Dressed in a dark suit, crisp white shirt and red tie, he introduced his parents; three sisters; his wife, Jane; and their two young children, whose faces alternately betrayed fear, amusement and awe at the scores of cameras and bright lights packed into the templelike hearing room. The senators, many of them grandparents, could not resist greeting the children as cameras clicked furiously. "You're not at all nervous, are you?" Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said to Jack Roberts, 4, who at one point sat in his father's lap and posed like a bodybuilder.

Just how much Roberts should say in response to today's questions was the subject of considerable partisan debate yesterday. Republicans warned Roberts against answering "litmus test" questions that could jeopardize his impartiality on cases likely to come before the Supreme Court.

"Some have said the nominees who do not spill their guts about whatever a senator wants to know are hiding something from the American people," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah). "These might be catchy sound bites, but they are patently false."

But Democrats argued that Americans have a right to know where Roberts stands on issues of profound import to their lives, disputing Republican contentions that Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who was appointed by President Bill Clinton, refused to answer questions about her views on such issues as abortion, discrimination and criminal law.

"It is not enough to say that you will be fair," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), adding that he is sure that conservative Justice Antonin Scalia and the liberal Ginsburg think they, too, are fair. "But in case after case, they rule differently," Schumer said. "They approach the Constitution differently."

Some of the most pointed questions, however, may come from Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.), a Republican moderate and frequent maverick. While Specter said he does not expect Roberts to share his views on Roe v. Wade , he will question him on his previously expressed views on women's rights, term limits for federal judges and what he called the "extreme positions taken by the Supreme Court in denigrating the role of Congress" by striking down a number of laws it has passed.

While Republicans such as Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa charged that Democrats who seek Roberts's views on specific issues are doing so because they "only want judges who will do their political bidding on the bench," others made it clear that they have priorities they would like to see the Supreme Court uphold.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) decried federal courts that "are redefining the meaning of marriage, deciding when a human life is worthy of protection, running prisons and schools by decree," and "removing expressions of faith in the public square." He called Roe v. Wade a judicial "exercise of raw political power" and said "nearly 40 million children have been aborted in America."

Democrats renewed their request for a limited number of documents dating from Roberts's tenure in 1989 to 1993 as principal deputy solicitor general. From that perch, Roberts helped shape and argue the George H.W. Bush administration's positions in hundreds of Supreme Court cases. The letter, sent yesterday to President Bush, was signed by three Democratic members of the pivotal "Gang of 14," a bipartisan group considered key to averting any filibuster of Roberts's nomination.

Roberts Comes With 'No Agenda' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 13, 2005

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday left little doubt why President Bush nominated him to be the next chief justice of the Supreme Court.

"I have no platform," he promised at the close of the first day of his confirmation hearing, as members of the Senate Judiciary Committee listened intently. "I have no agenda, but I do have a commitment. If I am confirmed, I will confront every case with an open mind."

Judge Roberts' 6 ½-minute speech -- delivered without notes -- came at the end of a marathon of much longer speeches carefully read by committee members.

DOJ_NMG_0004651

One conservative observer later remarked that Judge Roberts "stole the show." Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who hasn't said how he'll vote on the nomination, said Judge Roberts even "nodded at all the right times" during the senators' speeches.

The first Supreme Court confirmation hearing in more than 10 years -- and the first for a chief justice since 1986 -- began shortly before noon, when Mr. Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, ushered Judge Roberts through the giant mahogany doors of the Senate Caucus Room.

Mr. Leahy noted that Judge Roberts is "the first nominee of the 21st century" and emphasized that justices are appointed for life.

"The light of the nominations process is intense because it is the only time that light will shine, and the afterglow lasts for the rest of a justice's career," Mr. Leahy said.

Democrats promised to grill Judge Roberts about his positions on such issues as abortion and congressional authority.

"We have an obligation to find out where you will take us before we decide whether we want you to lead us there," said Herb Kohl, Wisconsin Democrat. "And, most importantly, you have an obligation to tell us."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, reiterated her position that she could not vote for Judge Roberts if she thinks he will overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 court case that declared abortion a constitutional right.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, who has met privately with Judge Roberts three times, said he and others still know very little about the veteran Washington lawyer.

"We have seen maybe 10 percent of you -- just the visible tip of the iceberg, not the 90 percent that is still submerged," Mr. Schumer said. "And we all know that it is the ice beneath the surface that can sink the ship."

Republicans warned their colleagues against judging Judge Roberts based on political views.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, warned Judge Roberts not to "take the bait" by answering questions that might touch on his views of political matters or might hem him into ruling a certain way on a particular case if he's confirmed.

A pro-choice Republican, Mr. Specter told Judge Roberts: "I do not intend to ask whether you will overturn Roe v. Wade. I will ask you if the Constitution has a right of privacy, and I will ask questions about precedents as they bear on Roe v. Wade."

Mr. Specter, a veteran of nine Supreme Court confirmation hearings, said nominees typically "answer about as many questions as they think they have to in order to be confirmed."

After the committee members had their say, Judge Roberts was officially introduced by the senators from his native Indiana, Republican Sen. Richard G. Lugar and Democrat Evan Bayh.

Judge Roberts stood before the committee, raised his right hand and swore to tell the truth. He then sat down and delivered the briefest remarks of the day.

"Judges and justices are servants of the law, not the other way around," he told the lawmakers. "Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules; they apply them."

He recalled arguing cases against the government before the Supreme Court.

"Here was the United States, the most powerful entity in the world, aligned against my client," Judge Roberts said. "And, yet, all I had to do was convince the court that I was right on the law and the government was wrong and all that power and might would recede in deference to the rule of law. That is a remarkable thing."

He waxed nostalgic about the "endless fields of Indiana" of his youth.

"As I grew older, those endless fields came to represent for me the limitless possibilities of our great land. Growing up, I never imagined that I would be here, in this historic room, nominated to be the chief justice," Judge Roberts said.

"If I am confirmed," he concluded, "I will be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court, and I will work to ensure that it upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans."

An Opening Performance Worthy Of An Experienced Lawyer (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - This time, John Roberts's client was himself.

After arguing 39 cases before the Supreme Court, spending the last eight weeks in the public spotlight and listening for more than three hours on Monday as 18 senators expressed their admiration and doubts, the Supreme Court nominee took just seven minutes to paint a verbal self-portrait in the opening statement of his confirmation hearing.

Judge Roberts said he was a humble servant of the rule of law. He had "no agenda," "no platform;" he was nothing but an umpire, calling balls and strikes.

DOJ_NMG_0004652

The White House team handling his nomination as chief justice had not seen the statement in advance, and Judge Roberts had not rehearsed it before the "murder board" that helped prepare him for the confirmation process. He spoke without notes.

It was a performance that lawyers arguing before the Supreme Court can only dream of. They rarely get two uninterrupted minutes, and the justices can reduce to shreds the most eloquent of prepared openings in less time than that.

Not only did the senators on the Judiciary Committee not interrupt Judge Roberts, but they also recessed until the next morning as soon as he had finished. That meant that the senators' carefully prepared opening statements, in which Democrats and some Republicans raised concerns on issues like abortion and the role of the chief justice, faded beneath the rhetorical high note with which Judge Roberts ended his statement. He pledged to make sure the Supreme Court "upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans."

Had the committee then turned immediately to questioning him, that moment would have been lost, or at least blunted. As the hearing proceeds, senators will ask Judge Roberts to explain 25-year-old memorandums or press him on questions he does not care to answer.

But there was no such dissonance as the hearing's first day came to a leisurely midafternoon conclusion. Judge Roberts did not explicitly address any of the senators' concerns; there will be plenty of time for that. His accomplishment, rather, was to address the concerns implicitly without appearing to acknowledge them.

For example, Senator Russell D. Feingold had commented earlier in the afternoon that the memorandums the young John G. Roberts Jr. had written as a lawyer in the Reagan administration were "highly ideological" and "sometimes dismissive of the views of others." But people can change, Senator Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat, observed, adding, "So I will be looking for a somewhat different John Roberts than the John Roberts of 1985."

Nowhere in his statement did Judge Roberts say "I have changed." But his self-description as humble, grateful and open-minded countered the cocky and caustic image that some of his early writings conveyed, without disavowing the positions that those documents embraced.

In the senators' opening statements, one of the most vivid images was provided by Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who told the nominee: "We have seen maybe 10 percent of you, just the visible tip of the iceberg. And we all know that it is the ice beneath the surface that can sink the ship."

Judge Roberts did not address that statement either, but he did not have to. He simply topped it with his own imagery, taken from his youth in Indiana. "I recall those endless fields with their promise of infinite possibilities," he said, although as the suburb-raised, prep-school-educated son of a steel executive, his encounters with "an isolated silo or a barn" may have been somewhat fleeting.

His statement also included an oblique reference to whether the positions he took as an administration lawyer, like in a brief he signed asking the Supreme Court to overturn Roe v. Wade, represented his own views or those of his client.

"When I worked in the Department of Justice, in the office of the solicitor general, it was my job to argue cases for the United States," he said, going on to describe what it was like in private practice to be on the other side and argue against the United States, "the most powerful entity in the world." The suggestion was implicit that not only had he argued on both sides, but that he could also see both sides of an issue.

And he defined a judge's role as, in part, fidelity to precedent. "Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent, shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath," he said.

There was no need to remind anyone listening that the most disputed precedent of all is Roe v. Wade, the 1973 abortion case, which was substantially reaffirmed by the court in 1992. Still in question, as the Judiciary Committee convenes for a second day on Tuesday, is whether Judge Roberts's views on that particular issue will be any better known by the end of his confirmation hearing.

Roberts Confirmation Hearings Begin (BSUN)

By Gwyneth K. Shaw

The Baltimore Sun, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's nominee for chief justice, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., said Monday that Supreme Court justices have a "limited role" -- to apply the law, not make it.

On the first day of Senate hearings on his nomination, Roberts pledged that, if confirmed, he would decide cases "with an open mind" and work to safeguard the liberties "of all Americans."

The 50-year-old appellate judge's remarks, delivered without notes and lasting just six minutes, addressed issues raised by Republicans and Democrats on the Judiciary Committee, which is expected to approve his nomination next week.

DOJ_NMG_0004653

"I come before the committee with no agenda. I have no platform. Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes," said Roberts, who used a homespun comparison between Supreme Court justices and baseball umpires.

"I will decide every case based on the record, according to the rule of law, without fear or favor, to the best of my ability. And I will remember that it's my job to call balls and strikes and not to pitch or bat," he said.

Those remarks echoed comments by Republican senators, who view Roberts as someone who will move the court to the right, in line with the wishes of their party's conservative base.

But Roberts, a White House lawyer under President Ronald Reagan, also spoke of his more recent work as an appellate attorney, representing clients against the government. He said that the rule of law enables a wronged citizen to prevail against the "might" of the United States in court, "a remarkable thing" that reflects that "we are a government of laws and not of men."

Roberts said he was committed to fairly analyze every case and "be open to the considered views of my colleagues on the bench."

Responding indirectly to concerns expressed by Democrats, who Monday noted the suffering of many poor, black Americans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, he said, twice, that he was committed to pro tecting the rights and liberties of "all Americans."

In another apparent nod to Democratic fears -- that he will be part of a new conservative majority that overturns Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision on abortion rights -- Roberts said that judges need to have the "humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent."

Roberts, who would be the youngest chief justice in more than two centuries, said a Supreme Court justice should approach his work with "modesty." He said he was "humbled" by Bush's confidence in him and spoke of his respect and admiration for the man he would replace, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Sept. 3 at age 80.

Robert sat alone at the witness table, with his wife, Jane, and other friends and family behind him. Also prominently seated in the front row were his White House handlers, former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson of Tennessee and former Republican National Chairman Ed Gillespie, who have helped shepherd the nomination through two months of Senate courtesy calls and intense pre-hearing rehearsals.

Monday's session -- which ran more than 3 1/2 hours in the Russell Senate Office Building's historic Caucus Room -- was a mild prelude to the tough questioning expected Tuesday morning, when committee members will get the chance to cross-examine Roberts.

Day One was about photo opportunities, establishing some of the parameters for the debate, and a display of the nominee's considerable gifts as an advocate, which earned him a reputation as one of the most effective lawyers in Washington.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, called the hearings "the biggest challenge of the year, perhaps the biggest challenge of the decade" and vowed to keep the proceedings cordial but substantive.

Republicans on the panel, who like the Democrats had 10 minutes each for opening statements, counseled Roberts to resist efforts to probe his thinking about specific issues and cases, such as Roe v. Wade.

Republican Sen. Orrin G. Hatch of Utah said the Senate must evaluate Roberts on a standard "based upon the fundamental principle that judges interpret and apply, but do not make, the law."

Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia joined two senators from Indiana, where Roberts grew up, in emphasizing his qualifications rather than his judicial ideology.

"I can say, without equivocation, that I have never seen a nominee with stronger qualifications than John Roberts," said Warner, a 27-year Senate veteran.

Democratic Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, signaling a theme that Democrats used all afternoon, pointed out that the Supreme Court has frequently been the last stop for Americans looking for justice in areas such as civil rights.

He said the racial and class divides highlighted in the aftermath of the Gulf Coast hurricane make the composition of the Supreme Court more important than ever.

Democrats maintain that Roberts should provide detailed answers in the hearings because once he is confirmed, he has the job for life.

Roberts would be the youngest chief justice in more than two centuries. The only woman on the committee, Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, said her chief concern revolves around Roberts' views on the right to privacy, the linchpin of the Roe decision and several other major cases. Feinstein said she would find it "very difficult" to vote to confirm a nominee who would overturn Roe.

"How the court decides future cases could determine whether both the beginning-of-life and the end-of-life decisions remain private, or whether individuals could be subject to government intrusion or perhaps the risk of prison," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0004654

After the hearing, Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts said he was "troubled" that Republicans seemed to be urging silence on Roberts.

"It's very important for the people of the United States to know who this justice is and what his views are," Kennedy said.

The packed hearing chamber, filled largely with journalists and official guests, had room for only about three dozens members of the public, who were brought in and out in shifts. Some wore stickers advertising their feelings, including "Fair Hearing, Fair Vote" and "No on Roberts."

Judges Should Play Limited Role, Like Umpires Rather Than Players, Roberts Tells Hearing (SDUT)

By Jesse J. Holland, ASSOCIATED PRESS

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 13, 2005

Senate Judiciary Committee hearing (9 a.m.) WASHINGTON – Supreme Court nominee John Roberts said Monday that justices are servants of the law, playing a limited government role, as the Senate opened confirmation hearings on President Bush's choice to be the nation's 17th chief justice.

"A certain humility should characterize the judicial role," the 50-year-old Roberts told the Judiciary Committee. "Judges and justices are servants of the law, not the other way around."

The appellate judge likened jurists to baseball umpires, saying that "they make sure everybody plays by the rules, but it is a limited role. Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

The drama of Roberts' swearing-in and his short statement capped a half day in which Democrats and Republicans sparred over the legitimacy of questioning him about divisive issues. Arguments about ideology and judicial activism also marked the hours devoted to opening statements from the 18-member panel.

Speaking without notes, Roberts addressed the committee for about six minutes – barely half the time each of the senators had been allotted for opening statements before he took the oath and made his remarks. He will answer questions from senators at much greater length on Tuesday.

"Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate in a system of precedent, shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath," Roberts said. He said he appeared before the committee with "no agenda. I have no platform."

At age 50, Roberts could help shape the Supreme Court for a generation if confirmed to replace the late William H. Rehnquist. All questions, Democrats said, were fair game, and they promised to use the nearly weeklong hearings to ask Roberts about abortion, civil rights, privacy, election rights, capital punishment, judicial activism and the powers of the presidency and Congress.

Republicans advised Roberts to follow the example set by recent nominees to the high court and avoid responding to probing questions on controversial topics.

"Some have said that nominees who do not spill their guts about whatever a senator wants to know are hiding something from the American people," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. "Some compare a nominee's refusal to violate his judicial oath or abandon judicial ethics to taking the Fifth Amendment. These might be catchy sound bites, but they are patently false."

"Don't take the bait," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

Democratic Sen. Russell Feingold of Wisconsin dismissed the notion that Republican calls for a dignified confirmation process barred senators from pursuing a line of questions of a lifetime appointee – especially one Feingold described as looking healthy. That last part drew a smile from Roberts.

"If by dignified they mean that tough questions are out of bounds, I must strongly disagree," Feingold said.

Added Democratic Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois: "Only your responses to our questions can convince us that the John Roberts of 2005 will be a truly impartial, open-minded chief justice."

Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee that conducted Monday's hearing, underscored the stakes for the Senate's vote on Roberts, an honors graduate from Harvard, a political appointee in two Republican administrations and a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit for two years.

Roberts originally was chosen to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Rehnquist's death prompted the president to renominate him for chief justice, replacing the man he clerked for in 1980.

"Your prospective stewardship of the court, which could last until 2040 or longer ... would present a very unique opportunity for a new chief justice to rebuild the image of the court away from what many believe it has become as a super-legislature and bring consensus to the court," Specter said.

The journey began for Roberts in the ornate Russell Senate Caucus Room. The day was devoted solely to opening statements – from the 17 men and one woman on the committee, the three senators chosen to introduce Roberts and from the nominee himself.

Roberts introduced members of his family: parents, siblings, his wife, Jane Sullivan Roberts, and his young children, Jack and Josie.

"You see she has a very tight grasp," Roberts said of his wife, who held the two children. An ebullient Jack Roberts had nearly upstaged his father when the president announced his nomination on July 19.

Democrats and Republicans saw few obstacles to Roberts' confirmation. In a Pew Research Center poll released Monday, 46 percent of those surveyed expressed support for Roberts' confirmation, up from 35 percent a week earlier.

How Roberts answers questions from the panel's 18 members about his record as a conservative lawyer in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations could affect the confirmation vote by the full Senate, expected before the end of September. The Supreme Court begins a new term Oct. 3.

Republicans warned Roberts against responding to "litmus-test questions."

Abortion and the 1973 Supreme Court ruling in Roe v. Wade that legalized the procedure loomed large.

"Perhaps the Supreme Court's most notorious exercise of raw political power came in Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton, two 1973 cases which invented a constitutional right to abortion," said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.

Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the only woman on the committee, said in her prepared statement that she planned to ask Roberts about "the constitutional right to privacy" as it deals with abortion rights.

"I am concerned by a trend on the court to limit this right and curtail women's autonomy," Feinstein said. "It would be very difficult for me to vote to confirm someone to the Supreme Court whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade."

The White House has released more than 70,000 documents from Roberts' time in the Reagan administration but has refused to release documents from his tenure as principal deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration.

Seventeen Democratic senators, including potential presidential candidates Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John Kerry of Massachusetts, reiterated the party's call for the Bush administration to release those documents.

"The people deserve to know the complete truth about Judge Roberts, the good and the bad alike," they said in a letter to the White House.

As Battlefield Shrinks, Democrats Mute Their Attacks (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

The first day of confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to become the 17th chief justice of the United States proved to be a tepid opening to what once was billed as a battle of monumental proportions between left and right.

There may yet be some of the fireworks that were predicted when the first of two Supreme Court vacancies opened up two months ago -- particularly this morning, when members of the Senate Judiciary Committee begin to question Roberts. But with Roberts's confirmation seemingly assured, some of the fight appears to have gone out of the Democrats and they have been forced to shift their strategy.

The confirmation hearings are now only partly about Roberts and what he thinks about the law. Instead, they have become a prelude to the coming battle over President Bush's as-yet-unnamed successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and a forum with broader political implications for a debate about deep philosophical differences between Republicans and Democrats over the role of government and the courts in American society.

In laying out areas of potential inquiry, the Democrats were generally polite and, with few exceptions, largely devoid of passion. However, Roberts's unwillingness to answer certain questions and the White House's continuing to deny Senate Democrats documents from the nominee's days as deputy solicitor general in the administration of President George H.W. Bush are likely to raise the temperature of the opposition.

But the positive reaction to Bush's nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and the internal head counts in the Senate have forced Democrats to adopt a different stance in approaching the hearings, one aimed as much at future elections as the question of whether Roberts will become the next chief justice. A new Washington Post-ABC News poll shows that, by 2 to 1, Americans say he should be confirmed.

Judging from the opening statements, Democrats and Republicans approached the first day of the hearings with far different goals. Confident of the outcome of the Roberts confirmation battle, many Republicans came with a set of procedural talking points aimed at encouraging Roberts not to answer the Democrats' questions about his views on controversial issues before the court.

That view was summed up most succinctly by Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), whose advice to the nominee was: "Don't take the bait."

DOJ_NMG_0004656

Democrats came with the intention of talking about their values and their view of the courts as protectors of women's rights and civil rights, and of the importance of preserving an expansive view of the federal government's powers in the face of a series of Supreme Court decisions limiting that power.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said that, with two vacancies, Bush and his conservative allies have a "once in a lifetime moment" to reshape the Supreme Court and to change the court's view of the Constitution. "I believe with every fiber in my being that their view of the Constitution and where the country should be taken would be disaster for our people," he said.

Richard W. Garnett, a law professor at Notre Dame University and a former Rehnquist clerk, said Republicans will have missed an important opportunity if they fail to engage.

"I would have said the Republican strategy should be not just to smooth the way to the confirmation," Garnett said, "because that's going to happen, but to remind the people that ours is a government of limited powers and that the judiciary is limited not to restrict freedom but to protect democracy."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) suggested that he understood that advice and that Republicans could more than hold their own in such a debate. Pointing out that there will be many questions raised by memos and documents Roberts wrote while a young lawyer in the administration of President Ronald Reagan, he said to the nominee, "To some, those policies make no sense; those policies are out of the mainstream. But this hearing is about whether or not you're qualified and whether or not Reagan conservatism is in the mainstream."

Roberts was largely a bystander as the 18 members of the committee gave opening statements. When his time finally arrived, he spoke briefly and without notes, outlining a view of the judiciary as one that requires humility, an open mind and a deference to precedent.

Tougher questions await him today, and the Democrats yesterday telegraphed the areas on which they will focus. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) argued that courts must protect the rights gained by women, minorities and the disabled over the past half-century. "The central issue before us in these hearings," he said, "is whether the Supreme Court will preserve the gains of the past and protect the rights that are indispensable to a modern, more competitive, more equal America."

In one of the most arresting moments of the day, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) talked about abortion rights and her days as a student at Stanford University, before abortion was legal, and when fellow students collected money for a young woman seeking an abortion in Mexico and when another woman committed suicide because she was pregnant. "I don't want to go back to those days," she said.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) raised questions about the administration's decision not to release documents from Roberts's tenure in the solicitor general's office. "The refusal gives rise to a reasonable inference that the administration has something to hide here," he said.

Those issues and others will dominate the Democrats' questioning of Roberts over the next two days, and after a quiet opening day, that is likely to increase the tension inside the Senate hearing room. That will not jeopardize Roberts's likely confirmation; whether it achieves the Democrat's political objectives is much more an open question.

Senate Opens High Court Confirmation Hearing (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 13, 2005

U.S. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts, his record on civil rights and women's rights challenged by Democrats, vowed at the start of his Senate confirmation hearing on Monday to ensure that the Supreme Court protects all Americans.

"I have no agenda, but I do have a commitment," Roberts, President George W. Bush's conservative nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "If I am confirmed, I will confront every case with an open mind."

"I will be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court," Roberts said. "I will work to ensure that it upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans."

Roberts made the pledge after the 18 members of the committee -- 10 Republicans and eight Democrats -- delivered opening statements in the first confirmation hearing of a Supreme Court nominee in 11 years.

Democratic and Republican lawmakers lauded Roberts' credentials. A federal appeals court judge for the past two years, he served in the Republican administrations of President Ronald Reagan and the first President George Bush.

But Democrats, citing documents stemming from Roberts' government work, challenged his commitment to civil rights and women's rights.

While he is widely expected to win Senate confirmation, lawmakers told the 50-year-old Roberts to expect tough questions, beginning on Tuesday.

"Judge, if I looked only at what you've said and written in the past, I'd feel compelled to vote no," said Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), a Delaware Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0004657

"You dismissed the Constitution's protection of privacy as a 'so-called right,' you derided agencies like the Securities and Exchange Commission that combat corporate misconduct as 'constitutional anomalies,' and you dismissed 'gender discrimination' as merely a, and I quote, 'perceived problem.'"

"This is your chance to explain what you meant," Biden said.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (news, bio, voting record), a South Carolina Republican, replied, telling Roberts: "The memos you wrote while you were working for President Reagan and Bush one, in my opinion, reflect a conservative lawyer advising a conservative president about conservative policies."

"Conservatives have a different view of a lot of issues versus our friends on the other side," Graham said. "The election determines how that shakes out."

Barring a bombshell, Roberts seemed headed toward confirmation by the full Republican-led Senate, perhaps by the time the high court begins its new term on October 3.

Easing his approval to lead the nation's top court was the belief Roberts would not greatly alter the conservative outlook that Rehnquist developed in his three decades on the bench.

A bigger fight was anticipated over Bush's next nominee, who would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who was often the swing vote on the sharply divided nine-member court.

If confirmed, Roberts would be the youngest chief justice in two centuries. And he would be positioned to lead the court for decades, helping to shape the American way of life on matters from civil rights to gay rights.

Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, told Roberts to expect questions on the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

While he said he would not ask a nominee how they would rule on a case that could come before them, Specter said, "I consider it appropriate to question him as to his views on ... following precedents."

Specter and other lawmakers also said they planned to ask about "activist judges" who attempt to usurp the law-making power of the U.S. Congress.

"Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules. They apply them," Roberts said in his opening statement.

Without making any commitments on the abortion decision, he also said, "Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath."

'I Have No Platform,' Roberts Professes (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic And Toni Locy

USA Today, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON — John Roberts' Senate confirmation hearings began Monday with Republicans and Democrats sparring over abortion rights and other legal issues, and over how detailed the nominee for chief justice should have to be in answering their questions.

But it also was clear that a subtext to the question-and-answer sessions that begin today before the Senate Judiciary Committee will be rival ideas of the Supreme Court's role in American life.

Sen. Edward Kennedy and other Democrats called for a high court that would help solve society's dilemmas by protecting the poor and the disenfranchised. Sen. Chuck Grassley and other Republicans emphasized the need for the court to take a back-seat role in such matters and give states more autonomy in solving problems.

To make their point, Kennedy and another Democrat, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, invoked the powerful images of Hurricane Katrina victims — many of them low-income minorities who were stranded in New Orleans as government officials struggled to provide aid.

“The tragedy of Katrina shows in the starkest terms why every American needs an effective national government that will step in to meet urgent needs that individual states and communities cannot meet on their own,” said Kennedy, D-Mass. “The people and their Congress must have a voice in decisions that determine the safety of our country and the integrity of our individual rights.” Leahy referred to “the devastation and despair facing millions of our fellow Americans in the gulf region” as he spoke of the need for “justice and equal opportunity” for all.

Grassley, R-Iowa, countered that “if we confirm (Supreme Court nominees) who are bent on assigning to themselves the power to fix society's problems as they see fit, a bare majority of these nine unelected and unaccountable men and women will usurp the power of the people, hijacking democracy to serve their own personal prejudices. We do not want to go down that road.”

The mention of the hurricane victims by Kennedy and Leahy also seemed designed to highlight the past writings of Roberts, a conservative federal appeals court judge, on issues involving race and civil rights. In his previous work as a government lawyer, Roberts questioned affirmative action and other programs designed to help minorities overcome past discrimination.

The long-running debate over the court's place in society is particularly salient today because of recent rulings and the potential for significant change on a high court that soon will have two new justices after 11 years without a change in membership.

Republican Sens. Jeff Sessions of Alabama and John Cornyn of Texas, for example, each used some of their allotted 10 minutes Monday to criticize a 2003 Supreme Court decision against state laws that ban consensual homosexual relations.

On the other side, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., recalled the world she knew before the court voted to make abortion legal nationwide. “As a college student, I watched the passing of the plate to collect money so young women could go to Tijuana for an abortion,” said Feinstein, the committee's only woman. “I knew a woman who ended her life because she was pregnant. … I don't want to go back to those days.”

Feinstein also noted that the Supreme Court soon will review an intriguing individual rights case: a dispute that tests the constitutionality of an Oregon law that permits physician-assisted suicide for the terminally ill.

Roberts has been named to succeed Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died of cancer Sept. 3. Rehnquist was among the court's most conservative members, and was among three justices — Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas are the others — who consistently opposed abortion rights.

If Roberts' brand of conservatism is similar to Rehnquist's, the court's overall view might not change much.

The greater potential for change to the court is with the opening created by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a more moderate conservative who has been at the ideological center of the divided court.

President Bush has suggested he will wait until the Roberts hearings are finished before nominating her successor. O'Connor has said she will remain until her replacement is confirmed.

Roberts sat alone at the witness table during the opening comments by the committee's 18 members.

When it was his turn, the former star litigator who argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court spoke without notes. He suggested that he would be the type of restrained justice that Grassley described. Roberts emphasized the “humility” and “modesty” he feels about the idea of being chief justice. “I come before the committee with no agenda,” he said. “I have no platform.”

Roberts played up his boyhood in Indiana, referring to the “endless fields” on which he played and his belief in their “endless possibilities.” He also vowed to protect the integrity and independence of the high court.

During Monday's hearing, Democrats on the committee stressed their desire that Roberts be forthcoming in discussing his judicial philosophy.

Republicans, meanwhile, said the nominee should be able to decline to answer questions that touch on topics that he could later have to rule on as a member of the court.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., perhaps summed it up best: “It has been my experience that the hearings are a subtle minuet, with nominees answering as many questions as they think they have to in order to be confirmed.”

Roberts Pledges He'll Hear Cases With 'Open Mind' (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum And Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - In an opening day of confirmation hearings in which senators drew sharp and partisan distinctions over his - and their - views on issues like abortion, civil rights and the role of the courts, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. promised on Monday that if confirmed as the 17th chief justice of the United States he would "confront every case with an open mind."

"I will be open to the considered views of my colleagues on the bench," Judge Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee and a packed hearing room on Capitol Hill. "And I will decide every case based on the record, according to the rule of law, without fear or favor, to the best of my ability. And I will remember that it's my job to call balls and strikes, and not to pitch or bat."

The first afternoon of at least four days of projected hearings amounted to a kind of scripted political ritual, serial speeches by senators who praised Mr. Roberts or raised concerns about him, followed by his brief remarks, in which he responded in the most general terms. [News analysis, Page A29.]

The session nevertheless starkly crystallized the debate over his nomination to fill the first Supreme Court vacancy in 11 years, and the first for chief justice in nearly 20, and how it is likely to play out in questions and answers beginning on Tuesday morning.

Again and again in the old Senate Caucus Room, the scene of contentious hearings since the days of Teapot Dome, Democrats on the panel leveled their gaze at Judge Roberts at the witness table not 20 feet away.

They said they expected him to answer detailed questions about his writings as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration 20 years ago, questioned whether he subscribed to an expansive view of a Constitution able to embrace evolving notions of civil rights and social progress and invoked the devastation of Hurricane Katrina to underscore their arguments about the gap between the American ideal and reality.

For their part, Republicans generally hailed Judge Roberts as the kind of jurist who would exercise judicial restraint and leave law-making to Congress, though some said they wanted to explore his views about a series of recent Supreme Court rulings that curtailed Congressional power. Many said he should not have to answer detailed questions about past, present or future cases.

No one in either party promised to oppose or support Judge Roberts outright, though some came close, including Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, who said that on the basis of Judge Roberts's written record alone, "I would have to vote no."

Mr. Biden, who is considering a presidential bid, added, "This is your chance, judge, to explain what you meant by what you have said and what you have written."

To potential friends and foes alike, Mr. Roberts gave the same respectful, silent, sympathetic pursed-lip look. When he spoke at last, he offered homey testimonials to his deep respect for the rule of law, declaring: "I have no platform. Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

During and after the hearing, Democrats made clear they were unwilling to settle for generalities.

"It was a strong and nice statement, but didn't answer the fundamental question what kind of justice will he be," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said.

Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois and one of Judge Roberts's sharpest interlocutors, seemed to speak for many colleagues when he asked: "The basic question is this: Will you restrict the personal freedoms we enjoy as Americans or will you expand them?"

By contrast, Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said the nominee's views on particular issues were less relevant than his legal philosophy and the political realities that enabled President Bush to name him.

"To me, the central issues before the Senate is whether or not the Senate will allow President Bush to fulfill his campaign promise to appoint a well-qualified, strict constructionist to the Supreme Court, and in this case, to appoint a chief justice to the Supreme Court in the mold of Justice Rehnquist," Mr. Graham said. "He's been elected president twice."

Perhaps nowhere was the partisan divide sharper than on abortion. Many Democrats said they intended to question Judge Roberts on his views of "the right to privacy," the basis for the Roe v. Wade ruling legalizing abortion, which he once seemed to dismiss as a "so called right."

It fell to Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who is the sole woman on the committee, to open the debate on abortion.

"It would be very difficult, and I said this to you privately and I said it publicly, for me to vote to confirm someone whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade, because I remember - and many of the young women here don't - what it was like when abortion was illegal in America," Ms. Feinstein told Judge Roberts.

Speaking somberly and directly to him, she recalled college students' "passing the plate" to send a young pregnant woman to Tijuana for a "back alley" abortion and the suicide of another pregnant friend.

Later in the day, Senator Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican who is a leader in the anti-abortion movement, countered with an impassioned appeal. Describing the Roe decision as "perhaps the Supreme Court's most notorious exercise of raw political power," Mr. Brownback added: "Since that time, nearly 40 million children have been aborted in America, 40 million lives that could be amongst us but are not, beautiful innocent faces that could bless our existence and our families and our nation, creating and expanding a culture of life."

Mr. Brownback noted that if Roe was overturned, it would not ban abortion, but return the issue to the states. Although many legal analysts have argued that the Supreme Court will - and should - be reluctant to overturn 32 years of precedent for Roe, Mr. Brownback argued that the court has overturned precedents many times. Among them, he said, was Plessy v. Ferguson, the 1896 decision that "separate but equal" facilities were constitutional.

If the hearing was tightly choreographed, it was just the first act of a drama that is apt to become more improvisational. The Senate is an institution that cherishes its prerogatives and is governed by rules that allow fluid and unpredictable debate.

Ralph G. Neas, the president of People for the American Way, a liberal group that opposes the confirmation, said after the hearing, "It's going to be a close vote in the committee and on the floor."

DOJ_NMG_0004660

But Ed Gillespie, the former chairman of the Republican National Committee who is coordinating the confirmation effort for the White House, said: "I don't anticipate problems. I anticipate a vigorous process."

The Republicans have a majority 55 votes in the Senate, a major asset for the nomination.

A generation of deeply partisan struggles over judicial nominees framed the hearing, a rough history that began with the Reagan administration, in the fight over Judge Robert H. Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court, stretched across the Clinton years and has persisted under Mr. Bush. A panel member, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, choked up speaking on divisions and "mindless partisanship."

Again and again on Monday, Republicans said Democrats had no right to apply an ideological litmus test to Judge Roberts's nomination, or to press for detailed answers on past cases, but merely to judge him by his indisputable qualifications.

"We must use a judicial, rather than a political, standard to evaluate Judge Roberts's fitness for the Supreme Court," said Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah and a senior member of the committee.

Senator Graham told Mr. Roberts: "You have been described as brilliant, talented and well qualified, and that's by Democrats. The question is, is that enough in 2005 to get confirmed? Maybe not."

He added that if Republicans had voted on one issue, the constitutional right to abortion, when President Bill Clinton nominated Ruth Bader Ginsburg to the Supreme Court, "Justice Ginsburg would not be Justice Ginsburg." Democrats said excellent legal qualifications were not enough.

"Long-established rights to privacy are under heavy siege," said Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the long-serving Democrat. "We need a chief justice who believes in the promise of America and the guarantees of our Constitution, a person who will enter that majestic building near here and genuinely believe the four inspiring words inscribed in marble above the entrance, 'Equal justice under law.' "

Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said many people calling for a "dignified process" really meant "an easy process."

Signaling the week to come, Mr. Feingold added, "It is not undignified to ask the nominee questions he would rather not answer, should he prefer to remain inscrutable or, worse yet, all things to all people."

Democrats Seek Papers To Define Whys Of Roberts (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 - In opening statements on Monday kicking off the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. and in a follow-up letter to President Bush, Democratic senators continued their calls for the release of documents from Judge Roberts's years as a senior lawyer in the first Bush administration.

The documents, said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, could help illuminate the nominee's views in three areas: civil rights, privacy and access to justice. While the first two areas have garnered attention from interest groups and the news organizations, the third category - access to justice - has received relatively little scrutiny.

Most of these cases did not concern issues of great public moment, but a theme runs through them. They involved people who claimed to have suffered serious and sometimes terrible harms, including sexual abuse and torture. In response, briefs signed by Judge Roberts often accepted, at least for argument's sake, the truth of what was alleged but opposed the lawsuits under various legal doctrines that can limit plaintiffs' access to the federal courts.

Analyzed one way, his arguments reflect a cramped view of the role of the courts, exalting technicalities over justice. Viewed another way, they represent exacting fidelity to the law and a keen awareness of the limited power of the federal courts to right every wrong.

"Federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction," he told the Supreme Court in an oral argument in one of the 16 cases on the Democrats' list. "The presumption is that they are without jurisdiction, and the plaintiff must affirmatively prove that he has standing to invoke the power of the court."

In 1992, he signed a brief arguing that federal courts could not consider newly discovered evidence that was put forward by a death row inmate, Leonel Herrera, because he had raised the issue too late. It added that fears that innocent inmates had or would be executed were overblown.

The only forum in which Mr. Herrera could now make his case, the brief said, was in a clemency application to the governor of Texas. The Supreme Court ruled against Mr. Herrera but left open the possibility that an inmate with "truly persuasive" evidence of innocence could get a court hearing notwithstanding court deadlines. Mr. Herrera was executed in 1993.

In 1992, Mr. Roberts signed a brief in a case brought by an American who said he had been falsely arrested and tortured while employed by a Saudi Arabian hospital. The brief argued that the hospital was immune from a suit because it was owned by the Saudi government. "Allegations of inhumane treatment," the brief said, "should not obscure the legal issue in this case."

Though there is an exception to foreign sovereign immunity for a government's commercial activities, the brief argued that the mistreatment of the plaintiff, Scott Nelson, was not based on commercial activities like his recruitment and employment but on purely governmental conduct. The Supreme Court agreed.

In 1991, another Roberts brief made a subtle distinction. The case involved a Georgia student who had sued her school district, asserting that a teacher had forced her to have sex with him. The brief conceded that the suit itself was proper under a federal antidiscrimination law. But, the brief continued, the student was not entitled to recover money damages. "The existence of a cause of action," the brief said, "by no means assures a right to an unlimited array of remedies."

The Supreme Court unanimously rejected that position.

It is unclear whether the documents sought by the Democratic senators would contain Judge Roberts's personal views on these or the other 12 cases. Administration officials have said that disclosure of the documents could chill discussions in the solicitor general's office, which represents the federal government in the Supreme Court.

From 1989 to 1993, Judge Roberts was the principal deputy solicitor general, a position sometimes referred to as the political deputy. His boss was the solicitor general, Kenneth W. Starr.

"We can only wonder," Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said at the confirmation hearing on Monday, "what they don't want us to know."

In a letter on Monday, 17 Democratic senators, including three members of the bipartisan group of 14 senators who had pledged not to filibuster judges except in "extraordinary circumstances, " called for President Bush to release the documents, saying they were needed to determine "the whole truth about the nominee. " The signers included Senators Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mark Pryor of Arkansas and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut.

The White House has released tens of thousands of pages of documents from Judge Roberts's days as a young lawyer at the Justice Department, where he was special assistant to Attorney General William French Smith, and the White House, where he was associate counsel to President Ronald Reagan.

At the solicitor general's office, the briefs Judge Roberts contributed to were notable in two ways. They took consistently conservative positions on social issues, including abortion, the separation of church and state, school desegregation, environmental protection and affirmative action. They were also aggressive in proposing hurdles for plaintiffs to overcome before courts could hear their cases on the merit.

In an environmental case, for instance, a brief that Judge Roberts signed took a narrow view of both standing, meaning the requirement that plaintiffs show that they have a direct interest in a case, and of Congressional power.

He presented oral arguments in the case, Lujan v. National Wildlife Federation, saying that Congress was powerless to confer standing in some settings and that the plaintiffs there had failed to satisfy the ordinary standing requirements.

The Supreme Court, in a 5-to-4 decision in 1990, ruled in his favor. Three years later, Judge Roberts made similar points, now in his own voice, in a Duke Law Journal article.

Judge Roberts signed two briefs in school desegregation cases. He argued that the school systems in question, both of which had once been found to be segregated by race, should be freed from court supervision. The Supreme Court ruled in his favor in both cases.

A brief signed by Judge Roberts argued in favor of allowing "ceremonial acknowledgments" of religion at high school graduations. The brief urged the Supreme Court to abandon the standards it has generally used since 1971 to decide whether a given practice violates the establishment clause of the First Amendment and to replace it with a more relaxed one. The court rejected his arguments.

The briefs contain little of the acerbic wit found in Judge Roberts's early papers. But there are flashes, though it is not known whether he wrote them.

A program to give preferences to minority broadcasters, a brief signed by Judge Roberts said, failed to overcome a "fundamental hurdle - the prerequisite of coherence." It was, the brief said, "a policy in search of a purpose."

Senate Starts Roberts Hearings, Sets Groundwork For Questions (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Judge John Roberts suggested that memos he wrote while serving in the Reagan administration might not fully reflect his views today, and repeated calls for judicial "humility," as hearings began on his nomination to become the 17th chief justice of the U.S.

"Judges and justices are servants of the law, not the other way around," said Judge Roberts, President Bush's pick to succeed the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. "I come before the committee with no agenda. I have no platform."

His opening remarks came after considerable positioning by conservative and liberal interest groups, with backers emphasizing Judge Roberts's résumé, while opponents scoured records from his work in past Republican administrations and two years as a federal appeals-court judge to paint him as hostile to minority and women's rights. (Read the full text of his statement1.)

In his remarks to the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Roberts noted how proud he felt when he went before the Supreme Court as a representative of the White House and "my country." But he said it wasn't until he was in private practice -- with the full weight of the federal government against him -- that he came to "fully appreciate the importance of the Supreme Court in our constitutional system."

"Here was the United States, the most powerful entity in the world, aligned against my client, and yet all I had to do was convince the court that I was right on the law and the government was wrong and all that power and might would recede in deference to the rule of law," he said.

The committee begins questioning Judge Roberts today. Throughout most of the day, the 50-year-old nominee sat alone at the witness table, nodding occasionally but showing little emotion.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), warned Judge Roberts that his appointment comes at a time of "turbulent partisanship" on Capitol Hill and worry on the left and right about the high court's direction. "The next chief justice will have the potential to change the court's image, in the eyes of many, as a superlegislature and to bring consensus to the court which has made a hallmark of 5-4 decisions, many of which are inexplicable," Mr. Specter said, citing rulings on matters such as the rights of the disabled to displaying the Ten Commandments on government property.

Committee members also used the session to stake out positions for questioning. Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) acknowledged the nominee's accomplishments: He is an honors graduate of Harvard Law School who has held prestigious posts in Washington and won dozens of appeals before the Supreme Court. But, the senator said, the public must be able to "assess not only the sharpness of your mind, but also the fullness of your heart. They need to believe that an overachiever can identify with an underdog who has nothing but the Constitution on his side."

Several Democrats referred to the images of poor, black residents of New Orleans affected by Hurricane Katrina when stating that Judge Roberts's views on racial discrimination must be explored. During the Reagan administration, Judge Roberts wrote dozens of memos urging a narrow reading -- and reach -- of civil-rights laws. Republicans and Democrats put the nominee on notice that he will be asked to explain his comment in one Reagan-era memo calling the constitutional basis for the Roe v. Wade ruling on abortion rights the "so-called right to privacy."

Republicans on the panel focused on Judge Roberts's professional qualifications and urged him to decline to answer questions he deems inappropriate. The committee's job, said Sen. Jon Kyl (R., Ariz.), is to determine if he has the "character, legal ability and judicial philosophy" to fulfill his responsibilities.

But Sen. Herb Kohl (D., Wis.), said evasive answers could reduce support for his nomination. "We have an obligation to find out where you will take us before we decide whether we want you to lead us there. And, most importantly, you have an obligation to tell us," Sen. Kohl said.

Roberts Pledges Judicial Humility In Opening Remarks (LAW)

By Tony Mauro And T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Law.com, September 13, 2005

Chief justice nominee John Roberts Jr. opened his Senate confirmation hearing testimony Monday with a brief but powerful pledge of judicial humility, fair-mindedness and respect for precedent.

Likening the job of justice to that of baseball umpires, Roberts said, "They make sure everybody plays by the rules, but it is a limited role. Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

Roberts, a veteran advocate before the Supreme Court, spoke without notes but chose every word with care. He addressed the Senate Judiciary Committee after three hours of members' opening remarks. "I come before the committee with no agenda," Roberts said. "I have no platform."

At another point, Roberts said, "Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent, shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath."

Roberts, 50, was first nominated in July to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on the Court, but after the death on Sept. 3 of Chief Justice William Rehnquist -- for whom Roberts once clerked -- President George W. Bush selected him for the chief justice spot.

The White House hasn't made a choice for O'Connor's seat yet.

The hearing marked the first time in 11 years that a nominee for the nation's highest court had come before the Senate committee, and members said it was the highlight of their year if not their careers.

DOJ_NMG_0004663

Roberts, accompanied by his wife, two children, and numerous family members, smiled easily and spoke briefly about his mentor Rehnquist. Roberts said he had spoken to some of the nurses who treated Rehnquist, and he was glad to hear that Rehnquist was "not a good patient. He chafed at the limitations they tried to impose." Rehnquist died at 80 of thyroid cancer. "I will miss him," Roberts said.

If Monday was any indication of what is to come, Roberts will have a relatively easy path toward Senate confirmation. Senate Democrats, while warning they will have tough questions for him on Tuesday and Wednesday, praised Roberts' intellect and outward qualifications for the job. Even Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, said after the hearing Monday that Roberts had given a "masterful performance -- and short." She also said, "He's like an actor in a show, and he's done a first-rate job."

On Tuesday and Wednesday, Roberts will field at least two round of questions from the 18 senators on the committee. On Thursday and possibly Friday, representatives of outside groups will speak for and against his nomination.

Monday's session began what committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., described as a "subtle minuet" between senators and the nominee.

But the friction before Roberts spoke was largely between senators themselves as they clashed over what the nominee should address. Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said he would not vote for Roberts if he failed to answer questions forthrightly. "It is our obligation to ask -- and your obligation to answer -- questions about your judicial philosophy and legal ideology."

But Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said that answering questions even about issues -- not simply cases -- that might come before him would violate American Bar Association ethics guidelines. "I will defend your refusal to answer," said Kyl.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, also cautioned Roberts not to answer questions in order to simply please the senators asking them. "Do not take the bait," Cornyn warned.

Specter seemed to take a middle position, announcing he would not ask Roberts if he would overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling declaring a woman's right to abortion, but he would ask him whether women have a constitutional right of privacy -- the right on which that ruling was based.

After the hearing, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said, "I am particularly troubled that every one of our Republican colleagues was urging him not to be responsive."

From the opening comments of Democrats, it appeared that the privacy issue would be a major theme in coming days. Several cited a comment Roberts made in a memo from his days as a Reagan administration lawyer in which he referred to "the so-called right of privacy."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the only woman on the committee, said the right of privacy is "one of the most important issues to be addressed" at the hearing, and she indicated she would vote against Roberts if she came away believing that he would overturn Roe.

The government's response to Hurricane Katrina even made its way into the comments of several senators. Kennedy said that the hurricane had exposed not only the "gross disparities in society" but the need for "a strong national government."

Senators said the hearing represented a rare and historic opportunity to submit the Court to the influence of the democratically elected Senate. "The Constitution provides for one democratic moment before a lifetime of judicial independence," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del. "This is that moment."

Because it was such a rare chance to send a message to the Court, several senators from both parties indicated they would bring up the Court's recent trend of overturning acts of Congress -- nearly three dozen since Rehnquist became chief justice in 1986.

As he has suggested repeatedly in recent weeks, Specter said he would press Roberts on the scope of congressional power. "These hearings present an opportunity to expose the extreme positions taken by the Supreme Court in denigrating the role of Congress," Specter said.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, Vt., the ranking Democrat on the committee, agreed.

"Chief among emerging concerns are whether the Supreme Court will continue its recent efforts to restrict the authority of Congress to pass legislation to protect the people's interests in the environment, safety, and civil rights," Leahy said. "And whether the Supreme Court will effectively check the enhanced presidential power that has been amassed in the last few years."

In a rare unscripted moment, Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., was suddenly overwhelmed with emotion during his opening remarks. His voice choking and halting, he said, "My heart aches for less divisiveness, less polarization, less finger-pointing, less bitterness... . America is an idea; it's not competing ideologies."

Time For Supreme Court Reality TV (USAT)

By Sandy Grady

USA Today, September 13, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0004664

You might say Judge John Roberts is history's first made-for-TV nominee for the Supreme Court. With his smooth, bland face and careful haircut, he seems to burst fresh from a barbershop or makeup room. He speaks in concise sentences. He rarely loses his sincere, benign smile. If this gig doesn't work out, he could get work as a TV anchorman.

Roberts seems created for his star role this week as network TV cameras focus on his grilling by the Senate Judiciary Committee. He is a conservative with the demeanor of a friendly scoutmaster. Barring edgy surprises, he will likely cool the red-state-blue-state furor and be drafted to be the youngest chief justice since 1806.

And then — presto, shazam! — Roberts will disappear. This made-for-TV paragon with the camera-ready stylishness of a Dan Rather, Peter Jennings or Tom Brokaw will vanish from television. Roberts will sink into the cloistered maw of a Supreme Court whose black-robed deities treat TV cameras as welcome as an anthrax attack. Since the justices first met in 1790, no camera has shown their arguments to the public.

Never mind that 47 states allow cameras into trials. Never mind that we can play voyeur at the televised reality soap operas of Martha Stewart, Michael Jackson, Kobe Bryant, Scott Peterson and the latest runaway bride.

Undeniably, there's educational benefit to those TV trials along with the celebrity pizzazz. But if you want to watch the nation's highest court interrogate lawyers and argue such crucial issues as abortion, immigration, gun control or post-9/11 prisoners, forget it. That is, unless you have time to line up outside the Supreme Court for a three-minute glimpse inside.

For the Supremes stuck in their 19th-century fustiness to ban TV cameras at their ornate doors is, I think, an undemocratic shame.

The U.S. House of Representatives since 1977, the Senate since 1986, White House news conferences and almost all Washington events are open to cameras (usually those of CSPAN). Time for the Supremes to also drop their tech-phobia and join the 21st century. Maybe Roberts, so slickly adept at the electronic stage, can change the justice's shy ways if he joins them. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who has long pushed for TV in the court, said of Roberts, “He may have a little different view about television. He's a new generation.”

Even so, Roberts would have a tough sale. Time after time, the Supremes have reacted to TV coverage as if it would transform them into a tawdry Jerry Springer Show. Justice David Souter told a House subcommittee that TV cameras would be allowed “over my dead body.” The late chief justice William Rehnquist had groused that the cameras would lessen the court's “mystique and moral authority.” We can guess at the opposition of Judge Antonin Scalia, who bars cameras or taping of his public appearances — a marshal grabbed a reporter's recorder at a Scalia oration on free speech.

But wait a minute. The Founding Fathers, according to the resolves of the First Continental Congress, wanted courtrooms large enough for “as many of the people as choose to attend.” If you're going to invite 300 million people, that means TV. The great Oliver Wendell Holmes, long before invention of the remote control, said the judiciary should be open so that each citizen is “able to satisfy himself within his own eyes” how judges perform.

Modern camera-phobic justices, however, consider TV a nosy, vulgar threat to their dignity. They fret that cameras would change the behavior of lawyers who appear at their lectern or the justices themselves, causing grandstanding for ideological applause. They worry about bright lights. And about networks using TV snippets to slant the news.

Those seem false fears. I covered the House and Senate when C-SPAN turned on its cameras. If anything, speech and decorum improved. (No more slurred bloviating after three-martini lunches). The televised Senate impeachment trial of Bill Clinton, over which Rehnquist presided, was unaffected by cameras. C-SPAN, master of discreet camera work, has offered to televise the Supremes arguments start to finish without comment. Surveys of states report no ill effect from televised courts (let's forget the O.J. Simpson carnival.)

No, I suspect the real hang-up for the Supremes against cameras is their desperate clinging to privacy. They relish their cocoon of facelessness — to go to a mall unobserved.

I saw this personally one afternoon on a golf course when I was joined by a lean, strong-handed 70-year-old whom I recognized instantly as Justice Byron (Whizzer) White. I guessed he wanted to be incognito. Only after a quiet nine holes did I say, “Didn't you play football at Colorado?”

White looked horrified. “How did you recognize me?” he snapped. Then he mumbled, “Well, it was Monday and the court wasn't busy so … look, I've got to go!” He fled for his car.

That's the real angst of the Supremes toward cameras in their court — giving up their precious anonymity. But the high court isn't some imperious, autocratic mystery cult divorced from American life. When it makes momentous decisions — especially the 5-4 vote that stopped the Florida recount and gave George W. Bush the presidency — we all should have front-row seats via television.

If he joins the club as its new chief, maybe John G. Roberts Jr., with his salesman's flair and anchorman's ease on the tube, can persuade the justices to lose their paranoia toward TV cameras.

Mr. Chief Justice Roberts (if you're confirmed), open up those doors and let the rest of America inside.

Making Roberts Talk (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, September 13, 2005

He came, he charmed, he shut up. During the opening statements, the senators blathered away their time and more; Judge John Roberts used less than half of his to utter a few graceful generalities. He has made a career out of not saying the wrong thing. Why start now?

A lawyer who has been cross-examined dozens of times by the Supreme Court will not be caught off guard by senators posing as legal scholars. There has never been a nominee better prepared to dodge constitutional questions.

The only hope for Democrats is to try the tactics used by interrogation pros like Israeli airport screeners and U.S. customs agents. These experts know that a smart criminal will have rehearsed a cover story for, say, what he was doing in London and why he's going to New York.

But if he's asked something unexpected - how he liked the London weather, whether he's planning to visit Times Square - he has to change mental gears. He's apt to exhibit telltale signs of a liar under stress, like gazing upward and to his right as he answers.

I'm not suggesting that Mr. Roberts is a liar, or that anything the Democrats ask today could stop him from being confirmed. But they might at least keep TV viewers awake by trying questions like these:

If Roe v. Wade were a tree, what kind of tree would it be?

Is there any chance that you could speed up Justice Stevens's retirement by addressing him as "Gramps"?

After seeing a judge's robes in a Gilbert and Sullivan production, Chief Justice Rehnquist added gold stripes to his robe. If confirmed, will you keep the stripes, or do you have a whole new look in mind?

In your best judgment, did Brad and Jen really just grow apart, or was it Angelina's fault?

From your analysis of constitutional history, would you classify James Madison as a dog person or a cat person?

Suppose you'd been in Solomon's place when he proposed cutting the baby in two. And suppose neither woman objected. Would you have cut the baby? Flipped a coin? Or opted for foster care?

You've said you're a devotee of P. G. Wodehouse. Of the current justices, who is most like Jeeves? Who's most like Bertie Wooster?

Would you consider instituting a casual Friday dress policy on the bench?

Would it be a violation of Lois Lane's so-called right to privacy if Superman used his X-ray vision to look through her clothes?

Would you think it's cool if a professional wrestler dubbed himself Chief Justice, or would you sue him for trademark infringement?

During the announcement of your nomination at the White House, your son distracted the president with an impromptu dance. When you got home that night, what happened to him?

Would Thomas Jefferson have preferred the Beatles or the Stones?

After Justice Souter's opinion in the Kelo case endorsed the use of eminent domain to seize peoples' homes for a higher "public use," a group proposed that the town of Weare in New Hampshire increase its tax revenue by taking Justice Souter's property there so that a developer could build a resort called the Lost Liberty Hotel. Would your family ever vacation there?

What goes on four legs in the morning, two legs at noon and three legs in the evening?

When you were a clerk at the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Warren Burger was disliked for his pretentiousness. What nickname did the clerks have for him? Burger King?

Does President Bush have a nickname for you yet?

When justices have birthday parties, should they invite all the other justices, or can they invite just the ones they like?

If Vice President Dick Cheney and Justice Scalia invited you duck hunting, would you go?

If Judge Judy isn't afraid of television cameras in her courtroom, why is the Supreme Court so chicken?

Ashley or Mary-Kate?

Your passion for correct grammar and syntax is well known, but you have yet to inform the American people of your position on the serial comma. In the phrase "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," should there be a comma after "liberty"?

How would you edit this sentence to make it grammatically correct?: "I swear I ain't never gonna overturn Roe v. Wade."

Why did you turn to the right and look upward?

During his two years as a federal appeals court judge, John G. Roberts Jr. has compiled a voting record that places him to the right of the average member of the U.S. circuit courts, according to the first independent statistical study of his voting record.

Roberts was most conservative on issues involving civil rights and civil liberties, the study found. At the same time, President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States showed a liberal streak on economic regulation and labor issues; in those matters, he was significantly to the left of the average, according to the study.

"An overall comparison of Judge Roberts' decision-making indicates that he is somewhat more conservative than the average appellate court judge, though not dramatically so," writes the study's author, Kenneth L. Manning, a professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts's Dartmouth campus.

Manning presented his paper Sept. 1 at the 2005 annual meeting of the American Political Science Association in the District. He has since posted it on the Web at http://www.umassd.edu/cas/polisci/roberts.pdf .

The professor studied Roberts's votes in 145 of the 190 cases he has heard at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, excluding 45 that "did not reveal a clear liberal/conservative dimension."

He found that, where such an identifiable ideological dimension did exist, Roberts made a conservative decision 67.1 percent of the time, or about 30 percent more frequently than the average federal appeals court judge. Manning based the comparison on data on the votes of all appeals court judges that have been gathered by the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research at the University of Michigan.

Employing what he said were conventional political science categories, Manning classified all 145 of Roberts's cases under three headings: There were 13 "civil rights/civil liberties" cases, 44 "criminal justice" cases, and 88 "economic activity and labor regulation" cases.

In civil rights and civil liberties cases, as in the criminal justice area, Manning counted a vote in favor of the government as "conservative."

Roberts voted for the government 86.4 percent of the time in criminal cases and 84.6 percent of the time in civil rights and civil liberties cases.

Roberts's score on criminal justice cases was in line with the federal appeals courts generally. But his civil rights and civil liberties votes make him almost four times as conservative as the average appellate judge on such issues, Manning said in an interview.

He cautioned that this score was based on a small sample, because few such cases reached the D.C. Circuit since Roberts joined it in 2003.

By contrast, Roberts's relatively liberal score on economic activity and labor regulation reflected his votes in 88 cases, a large number indicative of the D.C. Circuit's prominent role in reviewing decisions of agencies such as the National Labor Relations Board and Federal Communications Commission.

In those cases, Manning said, Roberts tended to side with government out of the same deference to agency decisions that prevails generally on the court.

"The general read I got was of a non-activist stance -- a general reluctance to go out of his way and rule against government regulators," Manning said. "If the EPA ruled against the chemical industry, the general tendency was to defer to the agency."

Court Docket May Color Roberts Hearings (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON -- If Judge John Roberts wins swift Senate confirmation to the U.S. Supreme Court, one of the first cases he hears will be Gonzales v. Oregon, the Bush administration's bid to block a state law allowing terminally ill patients to end their lives.

It is a hot-button issue similar to abortion, but the ideological battle lines in the debate are less clearly drawn. Social conservatives argue that assisted suicide, like abortion, should be banned. But states' rights conservatives, who want the court to overturn national abortion law, now want the same court to deny states the right to set policy on death.

Which side would Judge Roberts take? Today, senators will have a chance to probe the nominee's views with questions during Judge Roberts's confirmation hearing.

Earlier public statements suggest Judge Roberts, seen as an ally to social conservatives on abortion, could disappoint them on whether terminally ill patients may end their lives. When the Supreme Court last weighed in on the matter, in 1997, Judge Roberts discussed the cases in a television talk show. The high court had just decided to protect prohibitions on assisted suicide in Washington and New York states. Judge Roberts, at the time a lawyer in private practice, defended the decision to maintain the restrictions -- invoking states' rights, not morality.

"The right that was protected in the assisted-suicide case was the right of the people through their legislatures to articulate their own views...and not to have the court interfering with those policy decisions," he said.

When senators quiz Judge Roberts on his legal philosophy, one area to be explored by Democrats and Republicans is how he views the balance of power between Washington and state capitols. Under the late Chief Justice, William H. Rehnquist, the Supreme Court leaned toward curtailing federal authority.

But at times, even conservatives on the high court have disagreed on where to draw the line. In the court's last term, a clash between state and federal rights was at the heart of the Bush administration's attempts to block California from allowing medical patients to use homegrown marijuana to ease their pain. In the 6-3 ruling, Justice Antonin Scalia voted with the majority upholding the administration while Justice Clarence Thomas and Chief Justice Rehnquist sided with the marijuana-using California patients.

Where Judge Roberts falls on that spectrum could have ramifications made more complex by shifting political terrain. Before, social and economic conservatives pressed federal courts for relief from a Congress controlled by Democrats. Judge Roberts could take the helm of the Supreme Court at a time when Republicans dominate Congress and the White House, and some states are serving as laboratories for liberal social policy.

"Federalism creates strange bedfellows sometimes," says Glenn Lammi, chief counsel of the Washington Legal Foundation, a pro-business public-interest group. "Those who might want, from their ideological perspective, issues to come out one way, sometimes find that, legally speaking, they don't always come out that way."

A state-federal clash could draw the high court into the gay-marriage debate over whether the federal government can impose a national definition of marriage on states favoring same-sex unions. Cloning could become another tug-of-war; some senators want to ban cloning, while some states are trying to advance it.

When the Supreme Court eight years ago unanimously upheld state bans on assisted suicide, the justices cited more than 700 years of evidence of "the Anglo American common law tradition" of condemning "both suicide and assisted suicide."

But Chief Justice Rehnquist, writing for the majority, took an extra step that left the door open for states to revisit the matter. Separated from the rest of the text by about an inch of white space he added a final thought in the Washington v. Glucksberg opinion: "Throughout the nation, Americans are engaged in an earnest and profound debate about the morality, legality and practicality of physician-assisted suicide. Our holding permits this debate to continue, as it should in a democratic society."

In 1994, Oregonians voted 51% to 49% for the Death with Dignity Act. The measure was full of the checks-and-balances that the Supreme Court suggested would be vital to legally balancing the state's interest in protecting life and society's wish to alleviate suffering. The law allows only terminally ill, adult patients with less than six months to live to obtain a prescription for a lethal dose of drugs. Two doctors must approve of the request, and counseling must be offered in certain cases. The patient is required to make the request for the drugs three times in 15 days, twice verbally and once in writing. The patient must be able to swallow the drugs himself, without assistance.

A torrent of legal and political challenges ensued, and an injunction was issued before the law took effect. Two federal courts upheld the law, and the Supreme Court in 1997 refused to review it. State lawmakers that year put through a second referendum, this one to repeal the law. Despite a multimillion dollar campaign funded largely by the Catholic Church and Right to Life organizations, Oregon voters rejected the initiative 60% to 40%.

President Bush's victory in 2000 gave the opposition more powerful tools to employ against the law. On Nov. 6, 2001, Attorney General John Ashcroft invoked the federal Controlled Substances Act to revoke the licenses of Oregon doctors who prescribed the lethal cocktails, and directed investigators to identify doctors who did.

Oregon officials obtained an injunction to block the Justice Department from carrying out Mr. Ashcroft's instructions. The Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the Oregon law, and on his last day at the Justice Department, in November, Mr. Ashcroft appealed the ruling to the Supreme Court.

Shortly after President Bush nominated Judge Roberts to the Supreme Court, Oregon Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden -- a defender of his state's law -- met with the nominee for nearly an hour. They discussed states' rights and whether Judge Roberts thought a "state should have a wide berth in terms of regulating medical practice," Sen. Wyden says. The senator didn't ask Judge Roberts how he might rule in the Oregon case. But based on what he's heard, Sen. Wyden says: "Put me down as hopeful."

On Iran-contra, What Did Roberts Know? (CSM)

By Warren Richey

DOJ_NMG_0004668

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2005

WASHINGTON - What did you know, and when did you know it?

That query, dating from the Watergate probe, is perhaps the best known question ever asked during a congressional hearing (at least since the McCarthy era). But the kind of scandal that prompts such a bare-knuckled interrogation does not appear on John Roberts's golden résumé.

The US Supreme Court nominee, now appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, is being questioned about his conservative leanings, his past writings, and his courtroom advocacy of far-right constitutional interpretations. But no one is attacking the prospective chief justice's honesty, integrity, or ethics.

Nonetheless, at least one episode in Judge Roberts's past may prompt that famous line of interrogation. As a member of the White House counsel's office in 1985 and early 1986, Roberts was in close proximity to what ultimately became the Reagan administration's Iran-contra scandal.

As early as January 1985, Roberts was asked to give a legal opinion about White House involvement in private fundraising to help the contra forces fighting Nicaragua's Sandinista government. He also wrote several memos in early 1986 concerning the private fundraising activities of individuals who were later prosecuted in the Iran-contra affair.

But Roberts's White House memos, made public at the National Archives, are unlikely to provide much grist for conspiracy theorists seeking to link the former Reagan staffer to the scandal.

Instead, Roberts's memos on contra-related issues reveal a cautious lawyer who consistently sounded alarm bells about appearances and who urged compliance with the letter and spirit of the law. His words convey no sign of a devious consigliere searching for ways to bend the law or conceal lawless activities.

More important, the memos suggest that Roberts and his colleagues in the White House counsel's office were outside the loop on the secret dealings of Lt. Col. Oliver North at the National Security Council. There is no indication that the office was consulted about the legality of trading arms for hostages in Lebanon, or using proceeds from the Iran arms sales to support the contras at a time when Congress had barred US government assistance to them.

One odd circumstance, though, might raise a question about how much Roberts knew about Iran-contra and when he knew it.

Roberts left the Reagan White House in May 1986 - six months before public disclosure of the Iran-contra scandal threw the Reagan presidency into turmoil.

Roberts's departure alone isn't unusual. Ambitious and talented lawyers circulate in and out of government service on a regular basis. What is unusual is that between January and June 1986 the entire counsel's office departed. All seven lawyers - including presidential counsel Fred Fielding - resigned and left the White House.

The departures mark an extraordinary exodus of legal experience even as the Iran-contra deception was in full operation.

Peter Wallison, who succeeded Mr. Fielding as White House counsel in April 1986, says the departures were routine turnover within the office, nothing more. "They would have to be very, very perspicacious ... to have sensed something that was such a tightly held secret," he says. "Nobody had the slightest inkling [the Iran-contra operation] was occurring, and if they had, it would have been stopped."

Richard Hauser, deputy White House counsel until early 1986, also says there was no connection between the departures and Iran-contra. "It may have just been because Fred [Fielding] and I were leaving that that became a natural time for others to make plans," he says.

The Roberts legal memos dealing with Iran-contra issues were the type of routine matters that came through the White House counsel's office every day, he says.

"The only thing remarkable about it," Mr. Hauser says, "is that there was a pyrotechnic aspect to it that was unknown at the time."

In January 1985 Roberts was asked to assess the legality of the president and the White House becoming involved in fundraising on behalf of a newly formed private group called the Nicaraguan Refugee Fund. A plan being pushed by Colonel North and others at the National Security Council called for the White House to give corporate leaders a briefing on the situation in Nicaragua and then the group's representatives would ask the CEOs to give money to the fund. The money would be used for humanitarian aid and to wage a publicity campaign in the US against the Sandinista regime.

Roberts objected. In a Jan. 11, 1985, memo, he wrote: "I recommend stopping any White House involvement in this effort." The White House generally does not lend its name to private fundraising, he wrote. "The corporate CEOs would doubtless view the solicitation from the 'private' organization as having official backing if they learn about it at a White House briefing," the memo said.

DOJ_NMG_0004669

But that wasn't the last word. After a week of internal appeals, Roberts reversed his position. Supporters of the effort argued that White House fundraising policy would not be violated, because solicitations would occur after the briefing at a reception at the Hay-Adams Hotel, a block from the White House.

"I suppose we could permit the briefing to take place," Roberts wrote on Jan. 18, 1985. "But I think [this] 'Chinese wall' argument is a bit artificial."

The "Chinese wall" concession is important because it established the briefing-solicitation process that North later used to raise funds from private individuals to pay for contra weapons. Those soliciting the funds on North's behalf later pled guilty to violating US tax laws for claiming the donations were tax-free.

In early 1986, Roberts wrote a series of memos on private fundraising. The plan was as in 1985: provide a White House briefing for wealthy administration supporters, then take them to the Hay-Adams and ask for money.

"I see no legal bars to the contemplated briefing," Roberts wrote in January 1986.

Roberts's memos suggest he was unaware that the money was being used by North and others in the administration to arm the contras. White House officials were told the money was for a "public awareness" campaign in the US by a private group that supported Reagan's position on Central America.

The White House briefings and Reagan's drop-bys were used to boost the private fundraising effort. Those preparing Reagan's fundraising pitches to would-be donors often went too far, in Roberts's view.

One proposed draft of Reagan remarks said: "I ask you - and I ask private citizens throughout the country - to give private donations to the freedom fighter cause. Help them survive this Soviet-Cuban-supplied onslaught. Help these brave freedom fighters last out until American aid can reach them."

After reviewing the draft, Roberts fired off a memo. "The final paragraph on page 3 raises serious concerns under the Neutrality Act," he wrote March 20, 1986. Private citizens who contribute money to buy arms for use against a country with which the US is not at war would be violating federal law and be subject to a fine and prison term, he said.

"The president cannot encourage private citizens to engage in such activity," Roberts wrote. "The reference to private donations must either be deleted or revised to make clear that only donations for humanitarian aid (not covered by the Neutrality Act) are encouraged."

The comments were toned down, but, apparently unknown to Roberts, the donations secretly continued to flow to the contras for weapons.

A Day Of Firsts, Overshadowed (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 13, 2005

Yesterday's opening of the John Roberts confirmation hearings was a time for historic firsts.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) made 49 first-person references in a 10-minute statement that was, ostensibly, not about himself.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) showed exceptional emotional versatility, working a crossword puzzle during the hearing and then choking back a sob while making a prosaic statement about partisanship.

Roberts delivered what may have been the shortest opening statement by a modern Supreme Court nominee -- less than seven minutes, including the thank-yous and two baseball metaphors.

But in the end, the confirmation kickoff was anticlimactic: As word spread through the gallery midway through the session that FEMA Director Michael D. Brown had quit, reporters knew the Roberts story would, once again, be a sideshow. Roberts may well be confirmed as chief justice of the Supreme Court, but in the case before the court of public attention, in re: Katrina v. Roberts , the defendant doesn't have a chance.

With the nation distracted by the hurricane and flooding down south, neither left nor right nor middle displayed much energy. By 10:30 a.m., only 170 people had shown up for public tickets to witness the noon proceedings -- making unnecessary the plastic cordons and the queue signs leading almost all the way to Union Station. Outside the Russell Senate Office Building at 11 a.m., a grand total of 21 people demonstrated against Roberts, chanting: "Two-four-six-eight, separation of church and state!"

Even inside the storied Senate Caucus Room -- scene of the Teapot Dome, McCarthy and Watergate hearings -- some were preoccupied with Katrina.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the committee's ranking Democrat, led off with an observation that the hurricane was "a tragic reminder of why we have a federal government." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said, in one of three references, "Katrina tore away the mask that has hidden from public view the many Americans who are left out and left behind."

DOJ_NMG_0004670

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), opening the hearing, called the confirmation "perhaps the biggest challenge of the decade." But at times it appeared to be a swearing-in ceremony. Before the hearing, Kennedy shook the hand of Jane Roberts and said to the nominee's wife, "Congratulations."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) seemed to be taking confirmation for granted when he listed a range of issues likely to come before the court and told Roberts, repeatedly, "You will rule on that." In the park across the street from the Russell Building, a modest but confident group of conservatives sipped from water bottles labeled "Roberts YES."

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), who had the job of formally introducing Roberts to the committee, offered some advice to the nominee's playful young son, Jack: "You can wiggle a little bit. Don't worry."

As it happens, that was similar to the advice GOP members offered. In their 10-minute opening statements, they repeatedly urged him not to answer questions about his views.

"Don't take the bait," suggested Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.). Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said it is "patently false" that Roberts must provide answers. Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) thought it could be "unethical."

Democrats were almost as uniform in the opposite view. "It is our duty to ask questions," Kennedy replied.

"It is not undignified to ask questions," submitted Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.).

"It is our obligation to ask and your obligation to answer," Schumer said.

Roberts sat still, shoulders slightly rounded, moving his head thoughtfully from side to side, and keeping a polite gaze on each speaking senator; after three hours of this, the nominee shamed the lawmakers with a brief speech blending jurisprudence and the national pastime. "I will remember that it's my job to call balls and strikes and not to pitch or bat," he said.

Specter, determined to keep the proceedings on schedule, even cut himself off at the 10-minute mark, saying, "I'm down to 10 seconds . . . that's it."

But there were unscripted moments. Cornyn and Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) spent a chunk of the afternoon whispering and joking. A woman in a 19th-century hat and dress sat in the back of the room wearing a "Women for Roberts" sticker. After Feingold predicted longevity for the 50-year-old nominee because he looks "healthy," Coburn, a doctor, said that cannot be predicted without a "physical exam or a family history" -- neither of which is on this week's hearing schedule.

A television camera behind Coburn caught the senator working a crossword puzzle. But Coburn went from detachment to emotional overdrive when it was his turn to talk; seconds after asserting that "a super-legislator body is not what the court was intended to be," he paused and wept.

Colleagues looked alarmed. One GOP committee aide put his hand to his mouth. It was the biggest Senate choke-up since Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) cried while opposing the nomination of the ambassador to the United Nations -- and Coburn has to get through three more days of hearings.

Right Pleased With Specter (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 13, 2005

After bitterly attempting to deny Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) the gavel, conservative activists are now beginning to praise the five-term moderate as an unexpected ally in several key battles this year.

Specter, who was nearly denied the chairmanship last November after an eruption on the right regarding comments he made about Roe v. Wade, has won some grudging respect from conservatives in recent weeks. Those activists have been particularly pleased with his handling of the run-up to this week's confirmation hearing for Judge John Roberts, who is President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States.

"In the context of this confirmation hearing, he has been spectacular," said Leonard Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society, a conservative group of lawyers.

Jay Sekulow, a point person among conservatives as chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, said Specter's performance had exceeded the "forecasts of doom by some on the right."

Even former Attorney General Edwin Meese, who openly endorsed Specter's primary opponent in April 2004, said that he was expecting the chairman to handle the Roberts hearings "very fairly," and added that he believes Specter has been a "strong chairman."

By no means are conservatives starting a fan club for the chairman — indeed, most of their praise has been hedged with such phrases as "so far." But conservatives have had an easier legislative road this year thanks to Specter's support for a large chunk of the Bush agenda and his avid support of his judicial nominations.

And some of the younger conservative Senators on his panel say that Specter has emerged as the right person to run what has become the chamber's most partisan committee. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said Specter has been "evenhanded" and "fair" to conservatives on the committee with whom the chairman disagrees with personally on issues.

DOJ_NMG_0004671

Because Specter has had fights with the conservative movement for nearly two decades, he comes to the chairmanship with a perceived independence from them that ultimately yields a big benefit to the White House and Senate Republicans when he does come down on their side, Graham said.

"It helps in the sense that he's not looked at as an ideologue," he added. "It gives the committee some credibility, and he's probably the perfect guy to be chairman."

Leo said that the two-week gavel fight Specter underwent in November helped him understand what a different role it is to be chairman. "By taking the chairmanship, he was taking a different role. He's not a free agent anymore," he said.

Even as he continues to earn a level of praise from senior Democrats and some liberal activists, Specter has repeatedly been on the side of conservatives more often than not this year on the big issues before his committee.

At Monday's hearing, his opening statement ticked off a litany of issues the panel has worked on this year: the somewhat contentious confirmation of an attorney general, an overhaul of bankruptcy and class-action rules, re-authorization of the highly contentious USA PATRIOT Act and the confirmation of a handful of previously filibustered appellate court nominees. It read like a wish list for conservatives.

In advance of the Roberts hearings, Specter defended the White House position that writings and memos from Roberts' tenure at the Solicitor General's office about 15 years ago should remain sealed.

And on Sunday's "Meet the Press," Specter objected, somewhat unexpectedly, to the idea of elevating Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to the Supreme Court to fill the court's remaining vacancy on the court. That puts him in step with conservatives who are wary that Gonzales harbors comparatively moderate positions on social issues.

And Specter achieved all this while fighting off Hodgkin's lymphoma cancer, which was diagnosed in February and which until the end of July prompted chemotherapy every other Friday at the University of Pennsylvania's Hospital in Philadelphia.

In an interview after Monday's opening day of hearings, Specter spread credit among the membership of the entire panel. And he brushed off any suggestion that his presence in the spotlight represented any kind of redemption.

"This committee has delivered," he said. "It hasn't just been me."

Indeed, part of Specter's recent run of success has been his ability to work through procedural issues with Sen. Pat Leahy (D-Vt.), Judiciary's ranking member, as well as his good relationship with Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Both GOP and Democratic aides say that Specter has smoothed over relations with Leahy in a way that had become impossible under former Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), who bitterly fought with Leahy during President Bush's first term. Hatch later stepped down due to internal GOP rules limiting chairmen's terms.

"All committees should have the working relationship that these two have," Reid said of Specter and Leahy last week.

Liberal activists have taken note of Specter's tendency to work through things privately with Leahy. "He hasn't been as confrontational as Sen. Hatch," said Ralph Neas, president of People For the American Way. "He's tried to resolve things in a bipartisan way."

But, in the same breath, Neas noted with frustration that Specter has "marched in lockstep with President Bush on judicial nominations for the past four-and-a-half years."

"He's a paradox," said Nan Aron, head of the Alliance for Justice, noting Specter's primary role in defeating Robert Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court in 1987 and his subsequent support of almost every nominee from both President Bushes.

"He's someone who, ever since Bork, has walked a very fine line, and someone who has done it effectively," Aron said.

For conservatives, the biggest question mark came in May, when the Senate faced down the fight over filibusters of judicial nominations.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) was poised to force a parliamentary vote banning them, and he needed just 50 votes to do it. According to Democratic and GOP Senators, the vote was 49 Senators on Frist's side, 50 against and Specter the lone holdout. He never publicly stated his position — although he stood at Frist's side at what would have been the start of that floor debate — and he never had to once the "Gang of 14" deal averting that vote materialized.

Still uncertain whether he was on their side in the filibuster fight, conservative activists were happy to see Specter quickly work to win confirmation for such judges as Priscilla Owen to the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — a confirmation victory that now has her on some lists to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

On Monday, Specter again refused to say how he will vote on the Roberts nomination, maintaining his independence and awaiting to hear the nominee answer his questions. He rejected any suggestion that these hearings were personal vindication for a 25-year roller-coaster ride in the Senate, but his smiles and jokes with the press afterward betrayed a sense of satisfaction about being in charge.

"It's one of those slight perks you get if you stay around long enough and you don't get indicted," he said.

Margaret Carlson column: For Dems, Less Might Be More (LAT)

By Margaret Carlson
The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2005

I'm as excited as anyone about the prospect of "Advise and Consent, the Sequel," with a budget rivaling "War of the Worlds" and advance hype just short of Tom Cruise jumping on a couch, declaring his love for Arlen Specter.

Eighteen years after "Borking" became part of the language, the two main protagonists in that battle are still at it. Specter, the Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, got in one more lick Sunday against the Supreme Court nominee he defeated back then, Robert Bork. "If his 'original intent' stood, we'd still be segregating the United States Senate with African Americans on one side and Caucasians on the other side," Specter said on CNN. Bork said later in the same program: "I know Specter, and the truth is not in him."

Somehow Alberto Gonzales, one of the potential candidates to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, seems incapable of generating that level of venom. He may prove to be a stealth candidate with rock-hard positions we don't know about, but he comes across as milder than that. The right wing jokes that "Gonzales" is Spanish for "David Souter." And the left dislikes him for condoning torture at Abu Ghraib. The bipartisan dismay has lent Gonzales an air of being just right.

I'm not saying Bush is going to nominate Gonzales, the old friend he huffily told folks to lay off of as he flew to the G-8 summit in Scotland. He might even nominate a real hard-liner, lure the Democrats into eliminating him and then get whomever he wants to replace O'Connor and Chief Justice William Rehnquist when he retires.

What I am saying is that although Bush looks more and more messianic, he's got enough of his father's pragmatism in him to want to overturn Roe vs. Wade about as much as he wants to read the collected works of Shakespeare.

If Roe goes down, so does his majority, his legacy and present and future politicians bearing the name Bush. Traditional Republicans who voted for Bush for his pro-corporate, pro-tax-cut views will put aside their selfish concerns and flock to pro-choice candidates, who tend to be Democrats. He doesn't want to be remembered as the guy who knocked down the late Lee Atwater's Big Tent.

Watching Karl Rove, you know he has his right flank under better control (he got them to the polls in 2004) than Democrats have their left one. Evangelicals look into Bush's soul and see a man who would criminalize abortion as soon as possible, while moderate Republicans see a man who is only doing what's necessary to keep conservatives mollified.

Rove let those on the right vent for a few days about Gonzales and then, about the time he slipped and called Gonzales "Justice" in a meeting with the Washington Post two days ago, had his minions tell them to chill.
