Of the speeches delivered yesterday by the Democrats' 2004 ticket, Kerry's was harsher by far, and it drew a sharp rebuttal from the Republican National Committee's Tracey Schmitt. "Armchair-quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry," she said. "Such tactics haven't served him well in the past, and today is no exception."

According to a text of Kerry's speech made available in Washington, he said Katrina had provided an "accountability moment" for the administration.

"This is about the broader pattern of incompetence and negligence that Katrina exposed and beyond that a truly systemic effort to distort and disable the people's government and devote it to the interests of the privileged and the powerful," he said.

Kerry also charged that the administration is pursuing politics as usual in its prescription for rebuilding. "The plan they're designing for the Gulf Coast turns the region into a vast laboratory for right-wing ideological experiments," he said, citing private-school vouchers, subsidies to business and other proposals.

Edwards called for a restoration of community. "The administration may think every American is an island," he said. "But Americans know that Katrina's victims shouldn't have been out there on their own and that no American should be out there on their own."

Edwards used the metaphor of the flooded levees in New Orleans to describe what he called society's inadequate efforts to bolster the poor. Although he called for many new programs to help, he also said everyone, from parents and clergy to those most in need, must accept the responsibility to speak hard truths about behavior -- particularly out-of-wedlock pregnancies -- that condemn many to perpetual poverty.

Kerry Blasts Bush On Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 20, 2005

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) unleashed a furious attack on the Bush administration at a Brown University speech yesterday, upbraiding the president's response to the hurricane that recently devastated the Gulf Coastand tying it to what he sees as other flaws at the White House.

"This is the Katrina administration," read prepared remarks posted on 2004 Democratic presidential nominee's website, www.johnkerry.com. "Katrina is a symbol of all this administration does and doesn't do," read Kerry's script, portions of which were included in an e-mail to supporters that ended with a fundraising appeal.

"Michael Brown [Bush's former emergency-management director] … is to Katrina what [former Iraq administrator] Paul Bremer is to peace in Iraq; what [former CIA Director] George Tenet is to slam-dunk intelligence; what [former Deputy Defense Secretary] Paul Wolfowitz is to parades paved with flowers in Baghdad; what [Vice President] Dick Cheney is to visionary energy policy; what [Defense Secretary] Donald Rumsfeld is to basic war planning; what [House Majority Leader] Tom Delay [R-Texas] is to ethics; and what George Bush is to 'Mission Accomplished' and 'Wanted Dead or Alive.'"

In a brief interview, Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, called Kerry's pitch for cash "repulsive."

In a news release, she said, "John Kerry's attacks on President Bush's efforts to assist the victims and rebuild the Gulf Coast don't come as a surprise. Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry. The American people have pulled together during a difficult time and Democrats' efforts to politicize this tragedy are unsavory at best."

Kerry's speech is the latest salvo in a political battle over accountability that has pitted the parties against each other in Washington and federal officials against their state and local counterparts in the Gulf region.

While Kerry's speech may play well with the Democratic base, Sarah Binder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a professor at George Washington University, said the senator has a tough challenge to pin blame on Bush.

Kerry And Edwards Say Bush's Actions Have Been A Disaster (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — Both members of the 2004 Democratic presidential ticket sharply criticized President Bush in dueling speeches Monday that highlighted the partisan conflict over Hurricane Katrina and early maneuvering for the 2008 White House race.

Speaking at Brown University in Rhode Island, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) delivered his most sweeping indictment of Bush's priorities and performance since last year's campaign.

The crisis caused by the hurricane, Kerry said, exposed a "pattern of incompetence and negligence" in the Bush administration, as well as "a truly systemic effort to distort and disable the people's government, and devote it to the interests of the privileged and the powerful."

At a liberal think tank in Washington, former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) offered more policy proposals in a speech focused on combating poverty. Echoing former President Clinton's famous campaign formulation about welfare, Kerry's 2004 running mate urged "a serious, long-term effort to end poverty as we know it."

Tracey Schmitt, press secretary for the Republican National Committee, accused the two of attempting to politicize the tragedy along the Gulf Coast.

"Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues was never a problem for the Kerry/Edwards campaign," she said. "Such overt tactics didn't serve them well in the 2004 campaign, and today is no exception."

Monday's speeches offered a reminder that Kerry and Edwards, rivals during the 2004 Democratic primaries, could find themselves competing for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

"In a sense, these are two guys who have never stopped running; they have never gotten out of campaign mode," said Democratic consultant Jim Jordan, who served as Kerry's campaign manager early in the 2004 race.

Kerry and Edwards each began their speeches with a similar argument, contending that the devastation in New Orleans revealed social and governmental problems that the administration had not sufficiently addressed. But from there, they moved in different directions.

Edwards, who last year spoke often about disparities between the "two Americas" of affluence and need, on Monday promoted elements of what he called a "Working Society."

For New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast, he proposed a modern version of the Works Progress Administration that President Franklin D. Roosevelt devised to create jobs during the Great Depression.

Edwards' agenda also included an increase in the nationwide minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.50 an hour (California's minimum wage is $6.75), and new government subsidies to help working-poor families purchase a first home or build savings accounts.

Edwards said he would pay for his ideas partly by allowing tax cuts for top income brackets that Bush pushed through Congress to expire.

Far more directly than in 2004, Edwards said that reducing poverty would also require more progress in discouraging teen pregnancy and encouraging young men to take responsibility for the children they father.

Rhetorically linking such problems with the flooding, Edwards declared: "When a 13-year-old girl thinks there's nothing wrong with having a baby that will drive both her and her child into poverty, we haven't built the levees high enough."

Trent Duffy, a White House spokesman, would not comment directly on Edwards' speech. But he said Bush has focused on "the root causes of poverty" through his economic and education reform agenda.

"No. 1, the best anti-poverty program is a job," Duffy said. "And second, it is education. We are closing the achievement gap between black, Hispanic and white children."

Kerry focused his speech on broader themes, critiquing Bush on two fronts.

He charged that the administration's response to the hurricane showed a lack of competence evident in other areas, such as planning for the reconstruction of Iraq. Accusing Bush of ignoring warnings about the threat of flooding in New Orleans, Kerry declared: "This horrifying disaster has shown Americans at their best — and their government at its worst."

Kerry said the recovery agenda for the region that Bush announced last week "turns the region into a vast laboratory for right-wing ideological experiments," such as waiving requirements that federal contractors pay prevailing wages during the cleanup.

Second, he said the hurricane should show Americans the need to take collective action through the government to attack entrenched problems, such as persistent poverty and lack of access to healthcare.

"It's time we framed every question — every issue — not in terms of what's in it for 'me,' but what's in it for all of us," Kerry said.

Schmitt, the RNC press secretary, criticized Kerry for sending excerpts of the speech to supporters in an e-mail that included a box asking recipients to make a contribution to his political action committee

DOJ_NMG_0006849

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 20, 2005

BATON ROUGE — The Louisiana attorney general launched an investigation Monday into 14 deaths at a New Orleans nursing home that happened after the elderly patients were not evacuated for Hurricane Katrina.

Attorney General Charles Foti's office has been besieged with complaints about patients being left at medical facilities during the hurricane or receiving shoddy treatment, said Kris Wartelle, a spokeswoman for Foti. She said state investigators are checking additional reports of patients and residents who died at 20 to 30 other hospitals and nursing homes. The nursing home under investigation was identified as Lafon Nursing Facility of the Holy Family in New Orleans. The home's operators — a team of nuns and nurses — told The New York Times last week that patients were moved to the second floor and given care throughout the hurricane.

Wartelle said Foti's office is “close” to beginning probes into two hospitals where numerous other patients died.

Wartelle said there was a “pretty strong” likelihood that the two hospitals would be investigated.

Informal inquiries will be made to see whether complaints can be verified before starting a full probe and gathering documents, witnesses and other evidence that could support criminal charges, Wartelle said.

Foti is hiring additional investigators to look into the complaints made at hospitals and nursing homes.

His office disclosed the latest investigation six days after charging Salvatore and Mable Mangano, owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home near New Orleans, with negligent homicide in the deaths of 34 people who were left in the home despite evacuation orders.

Foti said he is planning to write a report when investigations are finished “on how things should be changed for a disaster in the future” and recommend possible changes in evacuation policies for medical facilities.

Foti said most of the 9,000 to 10,000 nursing home residents in the hurricane's path were evacuated without any problem.

Nurse Says Hospital Owner Left Her 'High And Dry' (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi And Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

CHALMETTE, La. -- Charlene Gonzalez wanted to get out of town before Hurricane Katrina hit, but because she was a nurse at the only hospital in this low-lying waterside town, she would lose her job if she did not stay at her post.

Then, after Gonzalez, her husband and more than 100 other employees and their families spent days trapped by rising floodwaters, the Pennsylvania-based corporation that owns Chalmette Medical Center, Universal Health Services, told its employees that they could count on only two more weeks of pay.

"They left me to die," Gonzalez said. "And now nobody's even called to say `Thank you,' nobody's even called to say `I'm sorry.' "

In the days following Katrina, southeastern Louisiana's hospitals became isolated deathtraps as power failed, water rose and severely ill patients could no longer survive. Officials have not accounted for all the patients at the two-story Chalmette hospital, but staff members say at least four died, three of whom were critically ill and had do not resuscitate orders.

But it is UHS' behavior after the water cleared that has infuriated the residents of St. Bernard Parish, a devastated suburban region of 65,000 residents, where every neighborhood was inundated. The area remains uninhabitable, buried by mud. The hospital is severely damaged.

Officials at UHS say the anger is understandable after such a catastrophe, but they contend they did everything they could for their patients and employees. They say they tried to evacuate their hospital -- albeit at least a day after emergency officials say they urged it -- but that it was too late to get all the patients out. The company, which had $3.9 billion in revenue last year and says it is the nation's third-largest hospital management corporation, says it is trying to place employees with some of its 84 other facilities and has started a foundation to aid those who lost their homes.

But UHS says on its Web site that it is "committed" to paying through Saturday the 2,800 employees at its three New Orleans-area hospitals, including the 900 at Chalmette. It says they will receive insurance coverage through "at least" the end of October.

Marc Miller, a vice president at UHS, said the cutoff of pay on Saturday is subject to change."This is a highly unusual situation," Miller said. "No final determination has been made on salary and benefits."

Jon Sewell, the hospital's chief executive, said that as he and his employees were trapped in the hospital, the most common question people asked was: Will I have a job?

Three weeks later, he could offer his workers no reassurance.

"Everybody's very emotional about what's in our future," Sewell said.

DOJ_NMG_0006850

St. Bernard residents say the other major employer in the parish, Exxon Mobil Corp., is still paying employees even though its refineries have not come back on line. Bitterly, they say they do not expect additional help from UHS.

"It's a betrayal," Parish Councilman Kenneth Henderson said. "The people treated them good and they turned their backs on us."

For Henderson, it's personal. His daughter, Kendal Guerra, is a nurse at the hospital and is seven months pregnant. She will lose her health insurance, Henderson said, before she gives birth.

Based in King of Prussia, Penn., UHS drew 7 percent of its revenues during the first half of this year from its three New Orleans-area hospitals. All were damaged by Katrina.

Before the storm, the company had invested heavily in its 230-bed hospital in Chalmette, an oil town eight miles east of New Orleans' French Quarter. It had just opened a new 30-bed intensive care unit when Hurricane Katrina began to form.

Dr. Lee R. Domangue, the hospital's director of emergency medicine, said that late on Friday, Aug. 26, he heard the news about the storm turning toward New Orleans and made a frantic call to hospital administration.

"I said `Close the hospital,' " he recalled in an interview. "'You have a category five storm going right over you. You have a medical obligation to evacuate."

Domangue said the answer was no. "It was an administrative decision, against my better judgment," he said.

Sewell said he does not recall the conversation, but parish emergency officials said they also pleaded with the hospital before Saturday to evacuate quickly, to no avail.

"It was nothing less than depraved indifference," said Dr. Paul Verrette, medical director of the parish's emergency preparedness office.

After meeting Saturday with parish officials, Sewell said he was convinced that the hospital needed to evacuate. As in prior storms, intensive-care patients were taken out first. Sunday, less than 24 hours before Katrina hit, the hospital began evacuating other patients from its first floor.

"Our intention was to do it as long as we could," Sewell said.

But with medical facilities throughout New Orleans also scrambling to relocate their patients, Chalmette could not find any available beds in Louisiana or surrounding states. Late Sunday, the hospital moved the 50 or so remaining patients to the second floor.

With patients in the facility, employees on hand were required to remain on duty, something the hospital's officials said was standard emergency procedure in the industry. "It's like being a policeman or a fireman," Sewell said.

About 150 staffers and their families hunkered down. Gonzalez, the nurse, had her husband come along. She couldn't believe they were riding out such a storm in a two-story building, and brought the family airboat.

Several hours after the hurricane struck early Monday, Sewell lay down in his first-floor office for a nap. He felt water on his back. Water was pouring into the hospital, drowning the first-floor generators. The floodwaters that were beginning to rise in New Orleans were inundating St. Bernard Parish. Within two hours, about 16 feet of water covered the first floor, and rescue workers were launching airboats off the second floor terrace to retrieve neighbors stranded on their roofs.

For the next three days, as many as 400 evacuees took shelter on the second floor of the hospital. Food and water were tightly rationed -- meals consisted of a scoop of cottage cheese, a few slices of fruit and two pieces of ham. Staff desperately tried to keep conditions sanitary without a sewage system and attempted to break shatter-proof windows to let fresh air into the scorching building.

By Wednesday, parish officials had found a scrap of dry land to function as a triage center. Sheriff's deputies, firefighters and civilians began to shuttle patients to the parish jail, which sat on high ground. The next morning, the last of the staff was evacuated by a National Guard helicopter. Sewell was on the last flight off the hospital roof.

Most staff made their way out of the parish on Sept. 2. The following week, at a parish meeting in Baton Rouge, word began to travel among nurses that UHS would give them only two weeks' pay.

"They would always stress to their employees [that] they want to be active in their community, give to the United Way, and then they do something like that," said Brenda Ingargiola, the wife of the parish's emergency management director and a nurse at Chalmette for 29 years.

Charlene Gonzalez's three grown children have all been promised by their employers that they will not lose their jobs, as has her husband, who works at the Port of New Orleans.

"Everybody's been taken care of," she said, "but UHS has left me high and dry."

For Illegal Immigrants, Some Aid Is Too Risky (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- The man who stood with his head bowed outside a cheap motel room here said his name is Almicar of Guatemala. He crept across the Mexican border into the United States a few years ago and since that time has found work as a painter in New Orleans.

But several weeks ago, Hurricane Katrina turned his world upside down along with everyone else's. Almicar, who gave only his first name for fear of being deported, said his situation is worse because he is an illegal immigrant. Since the storm hit, he has watched his neighbors at the motel call the Federal Emergency Management Agency to get money he will never see and food stamps that are forbidden to his family of five, and to seek jobs at the Social Security office, where he dares not show his face.

Almicar didn't speak a word of English, but his body language said it all. Eyes down, arms folded, back slumped, he had the visage of a defeated man.

"I'm afraid," he said in Spanish. His family's "situation is getting harder and harder. You don't know what to think, starting from zero again."

Much has been said about the suffering of the poor in New Orleans, but Latino civil rights advocates and relief workers say those troubled Americans are better off than immigrants who live in Gulf states illegally, working in restaurants, casinos, farms and construction.

Some have managed to get into shelters run by the Red Cross and Catholic Charities, which provide food and medical care, no questions asked. But when U.S. citizens in those shelters flock to cardboard tables where FEMA, Social Security and Internal Revenue Service agents sit, Latinos stay behind, watching from their cots, relief workers said.

The Department of Homeland Security recently announced that information provided by illegal immigrants seeking federal aid could be used against them later in deportation proceedings.

"The administration's priority is to provide needed assistance: water, food, medical care, shelter," said Joanna Gonzalez, a DHS spokeswoman. "However, as we move forward with the response, we can't turn a blind eye to the law."

That point was driven home when two illegal immigrants, from Honduras and El Salvador, were taken into custody in West Virginia by state police after a military cargo plane carrying 305 evacuees arrived there Sept. 5. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials say the two, who were friends, were taken into custody after state police received a complaint that one had been accused of a sexual assault.

"What that suggests is that the federal government is prepared to serve some victims but not others," said Cecilia Muñoz, vice president for policy at the National Council of La Raza. "That sends a terrifying message to the larger community."

In his national address Thursday, President Bush read off a list of services that the estimated 40,000 Mexicans and 150,000 Hondurans who lived in the New Orleans area cannot get: checks from Social Security, mail delivery by the Postal Service, money to rent apartments and temporary trailer homes.

Opponents of illegal immigration, such as Numbers USA, have fought giving financial aid to illegal immigrants. On the other side, a group of U.S. senators including Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) urged DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff to issue a statement reassuring immigrants that they could come forward without fear of deportation.

"We are very concerned because they're afraid to ask for help," Brent A. Wilkes, executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, said of illegal immigrants. "It's difficult to get word to them. They're in the dark much more so than other folks. They have a default position: to avoid authorities at all costs."

About 65 Latinos were staying at the $30-a-night motel where Almicar stood. Some were documented; many were not. A Guatemalan woman said she is consumed by worry and fear. She would not give her name, she said, because people would come to deport her.

What if my children get sick? she wondered. "I guess I will have to go to the hospital and take my chances," she said.

Her friend Merling Buchanan, a Tulane University master's student from Honduras who speaks English, is the eyes and ears to the world for several of the Peruvians, Guatemalans and Ecuadoreans living at the motel.

"Normally when I get up, there's always someone I need to take somewhere," said Buchanan, a naturalized citizen. On Monday, a friend from Guatemala wanted to speak with a caseworkers at Catholic Community Services.

"The lines are long, so I stay all day," she said. "There is a list, and people write their name. I was number 102."

Days before, FEMA deposited $2,000 directly into her bank account, she said. At the cheap motel, that pittance seems like an embarrassment of riches.

Mario Fletes, 31, a Honduran painter, said he's very frustrated, watching his wife and three sons worry.

"I went to get unemployment, and they said they couldn't process my Social Security number," which, he insisted, is legitimate. "I went to apply for food stamps. They told me to come back in two days. I went Thursday. I went Friday. Finally, they told me not to come back."

Wilkes said FEMA doesn't have enough Spanish-speaking officials to handle even those who work legally on farms, in hotels and in casinos.

But David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, denied that. "We have Spanish-speaking operators on our registration phone lines," he said. "We understand the need to communicate with people in several different languages. If we have areas were we're lacking, advocacy groups can tell us. We're open to input."

Rony Reyes said his friends are almost out of money for the motel. Catholic Community Services of Baton Rouge paid the motel manager about $200 to keep some under a roof for a week.

"Thank God for the church," he said. "We would be sleeping in the parking lot now, no doubt."

But others are helping.

In Mississippi, a group called Project Prep braved floodwaters in Biloxi to get aid to Latino migrant farmworkers and others who feared deportation, said John D. Arnold, the project's director and co-founder.

Jacob Prado, who is coordinating relief efforts for the Mexican Embassy, distributed cash and airline tickets in and around Biloxi to Mexican citizens wishing to return to Mexico, an embassy spokesman said.

In San Antonio, a convoy of 45 Mexican army vehicles rolled into the city with troops and mobile kitchens capable of feeding 14,000 people. Elsewhere in Texas, Catholic Charities of Galveston/Houston doled out $300,000 to immigrant families as of Friday, about $25,000 a day, said Julissa Guerrero, the communications director.

"As quickly as the donations are coming in, they are going right back out," she said. "We are worried that people who are undocumented are falling through the cracks."

In Louisiana, Diane Chisholm, the director of migration and refugee services for Catholic Community Services of Baton Rouge, said documented and undocumented Latinos have poured through the group's doors every day for a week.

"I can say it's been hundreds of people," Chisholm said Monday.

Almicar and other immigrants living at the motel in East Baton Rouge Parish were residents of Metairie, La., near the New Orleans airport.

On the Saturday before Katrina struck, Buchanan was doing the wash when the New Orleans mayor said on television, in English, "We're facing the storm most of us have feared."

She woke her sleeping husband, who snapped at her. "How are we going to go? We don't have money." He eventually agreed to go and borrowed money from a friend.

"Hispanic friends . . . followed us because they didn't know where to go," Buchanan said. "They followed us because we speak English."

They formed a caravan of five rickety cars, one of which broke down en route to Baton Rouge.

The men work where they can find it, usually in towns more than an hour away. It costs about $20 in gas per trip, eating into their pay of about $90 each.

Right now, Reyes said, work is worth the sacrifice. The motel rooms are too precious to give up.

"If you leave, there are three people waiting to take them," he said. "It's all we have right now."

Dying For A Drink Of Clean Water (WP)

By Jan Eliasson And Susan Blumenthal

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

In the United States and Europe, people take it for granted that when they turn on their taps, clean water will flow out. But for those living in U.S. cities devastated by Hurricane Katrina, as in large parts of the world, obtaining safe water requires a constant struggle.

Water is essential to all aspects of life, yet 99 percent of water on Earth is unsafe or unavailable to drink. About 1.2 billion people globally lack safe water to consume and 2.6 billion do not have access to adequate sanitation. There are also stark comparisons: Just one flush of a toilet in the West uses more water than most Africans have to perform an entire day's washing, cleaning, cooking and drinking.

Ensuring access to safe water worldwide is imperative. Water is an economic issue since it is essential for poverty reduction, agriculture, food and energy production, as well as recreation. It is a women's issue in the developing world because women have primary responsibility for household water gathering in many of these countries. Time spent hauling water robs women and girls of getting an education or engaging in meaningful work. It is a children's issue because water is essential for healthy development. A youngster dies every eight seconds from water-borne disease. And water is a national security issue because some of the world's conflicts today arise from disputes over arable land and water: The tragedy in Darfur, for example, was driven in no small part by tensions over access to water.

But most of all, water is a fundamental global health issue. Unsafe water and sanitation is now the single largest cause of illness worldwide, just as it has been a major threat to the health of people affected by Hurricane Katrina. A recent U.N. report has estimated that:

· At least 2 million people, most of them children, die annually from water-borne diseases such as diarrhea, cholera, dysentery, typhoid, guinea worm and hepatitis as well as such illnesses as malaria and West Nile virus carried by mosquitoes that breed in stagnant water.

· Many of the 10 million child deaths that occurred last year were linked to unsafe water and lack of sanitation. Children can't fight off infections if their bodies are weakened by water-borne diseases.

· Over half of the hospital beds in the developing world are occupied by people suffering from preventable diseases caused by unsafe water and inadequate sanitation.

If action is not taken now, 135 million people could die of water-related diseases by the year 2020. That is a larger number than those expected to fall victim to the HIV/AIDS pandemic, a catastrophe that has already killed 23 million people worldwide. Furthermore, water plays a critical role in this disease since many deaths from AIDS are linked to illnesses resulting from dehydration and diarrhea caused by unsafe water.

The United Nations has set a Millennium Development Goal -- to be reached by 2015 -- of reducing by half the percentage of people without access to safe drinking water and basic sanitation. There is a long way to go to reach this goal. That's why the U.N. General Assembly has declared the next 10 years to be the International Decade for Action on "Water for Life" to focus attention on this vital issue.

When poor people are asked what would most improve their lives, water and sanitation is repeatedly one of their highest priorities. We should heed their call. The recent decision by the leaders of the Group of Eight nations to double economic assistance for Africa has the potential to help if a significant portion of this aid goes to address the problems of water and sanitation. Developing countries should involve their citizens in decision making about how best to get improved water and sanitation services to their people. And developed nations should work with the ideas and aspirations of those countries and people they are seeking to help -- particularly women -- so that improvements can be sustained over the long term.

Nations in both the developing and developed world must share knowledge and experiences in public education, disease prevention, emergency response strategies, the application of new technologies and training. A global coalition of organizations, businesses and individuals must be mobilized across the public and private sectors for infrastructure development and innovation.

Time is of the essence. By 2025 the world's population is projected to increase from 6.4 billion to 8.4 billion. At that time, 3.4 billion people could live in countries where water is scarce. Today we are talking about our planet as a global village. With coordinated efforts and a large influx of funding, the Gulf Coast region of the United States will, we hope, restore its water and sanitation systems within months. But unless we soon implement a global action plan for water with increased awareness, activism and resources, large numbers of people around the world will continue to suffer and die needlessly for generations to come for want of clean water.

Jan Eliasson, former Swedish ambassador to the United States, is the president of the United Nations General Assembly. Retired Rear Admiral Susan Blumenthal, a physician, served as assistant surgeon general of the United States. She is a clinical professor at the Georgetown and Tufts University schools of medicine.

Cameras Headed To Court? (RC)

By John Mcardle, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

Bill Would Put Supremes on Air For the past 20 years, every time a vacancy arises in the Supreme Court, C-SPAN General Counsel Bruce Collins is teased by the possibility that new blood on the bench might mean the highest court in the land would reconsider its stance on allowing cameras into its halls.

But while Collins waits, hoping the court's two new justices will allow proceedings to be televised, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee is ready to force the matter.

According to a GOP Congressional source close to the issue, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) — who has said that Congress legally has authority over court administration issues — intends to drop new legislation, possibly as early as this week, that will push for opening the Supreme Court to television cameras.

Specter had discussed the possibility of a bill at last week's hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice when the issue was brought up by Members on both sides of the aisle.

On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) pointedly asked Roberts if he was against cameras in the courtroom "like Justice [William] Rehnquist was."

"Well, you know, my new best friend, [former] Sen. [Fred] Thompson [R-Tenn.], assures me that television cameras are nothing to be afraid of," Roberts responded. "But I don't have a set view on that. I do think it's something that I would want to listen to the views of — if I were confirmed — to my colleagues."

On Tuesday, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) also asked Roberts about the issue and made clear his support for cameras in the Supreme Court.

"Americans can watch virtually every significant event of national importance on television, except for oral arguments and announcement of decisions at the Supreme Court," Feingold said. "If you are confirmed, you will essentially disappear from public view ... The possibility of televising trials raises some complicated issues, because we have to consider the safety and rights of criminal defendants and witnesses and jurors, but such concerns are not so present in the case of appellate proceedings ... I think it would benefit the country and the court if all Americans had a chance to see the court conduct its work."

But with Roberts noncommittal, Collins — who first worked to get the Supreme Court to open its oral arguments to C-SPAN and other network audiences in 1985 and has continued to push for cameras in the court several times in the past two decades — continues to wait.

"We've got so much experience with these bursts of interest in this issue that never go anywhere that we're taking a 'wait and see' attitude," Collins said. "If there seems to be a serious interest this time we will definitely follow up by restating our many-year-old commitment to air every minute of every oral argument of every court term and we would be in the middle of these efforts to ensure they happen."

For the past four years, Grassley and several other Senate co-sponsors have been pushing the Sunshine in the Courtroom Act. The bill, which was reintroduced to the 109th Congress in April, would give full discretion to the presiding judge of a case as to whether cameras or recording devices would be allowed during proceedings in federal trial and appellate courts, including the Supreme Court. In appellate courts, the most senior active judge — the chief justice in the case of the Supreme Court — would have discretion on the issue.

It's not yet clear how Specter's new bill would differ from Grassley's, but in an interview earlier this month on C-SPAN's "Q & A" that was filmed before Rehnquist's death, Specter said that pushing for cameras in the Supreme Court was something he had been wanting to move forward with for a long time. He said he hadn't done so "out of deference to Chief Justice Rehnquist."

"I think Congress has the authority to say there ought to be television of the Supreme Court," Specter had said. "Nobody can tell them how to decide cases. But Congress decides, for example, how many justices there will be ... We established time limits. We say when they start to sit on the first Monday in October, and I think, on an administrative matter, that the Supreme Court is subject to a Congressional determination.

"Now they may disagree with this and say, 'It's an invasion of separation of powers.' I don't think it is," Specter said. "But they decide so many cases five to four on the cutting edge. And I think that it would be very helpful for the public to have a great understanding as to what they do."

While C-SPAN's Collins agreed that Congress does have the authority to pass legislation to open the Supreme Court to cameras, he said that "in the end, I can't see the Congress forcing the Supreme Court" to allow cameras in.

And even if Roberts were to come out in favor of cameras in the court and gets confirmed as chief justice, "as a new chief getting his sea legs, so to speak, I don't think he's going to cause trouble over the issue of television.

"I don't think this is a policy issue that can be won on points and authorities, it'll be a personal decision on the part of the judges. And I don't think it'll be a five-four decision, I think it'll have to be a nine-zero decision."

But Henry Schleiff, Court TV CEO, who has been looking to open federal courts to television cameras since the network's founding in 1991 and, like C-SPAN, would carry the court's oral arguments gavel to gavel, said he thought that Roberts' statements at last week's hearings exhibited a fresh sort of open-mindedness to the issue.

"We were encouraged to hear the modern thinking by what is clearly a modern jurist taking a more modern approach," Schleiff said.

Schleiff said Court TV has actively supported Grassley's bill in the past and is in the midst of preparing letters to Roberts, Specter and other Judiciary Committee members to lobby on its behalf.

But Collins said he remains skeptical.

"In 1985 when we started on this, C-SPAN and others, if you'd asked me then if we would have had cameras in the Supreme Court in the next 20 years, I would have said 'well certainly,' because the Court would change its membership and it would have new justices with new views on it," Collins said. "All I can tell you is that the generational change seems to be slower than we thought earlier. There might be a possibility that we might get them but I'm not going to put a date on it."

Senate Poised For Test Vote On Drug Reimportation (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

DOJ_NMG_0006855

The Senate is poised to vote for the first time on language to ease access to prescription drugs imported from abroad during consideration of the agriculture-appropriations bill currently on the Senate floor, fulfilling a promise made by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in July.

Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) has proposed an amendment to the agriculture spending bill that would block the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) from preventing people from importing prescription medicines.

The language was introduced Thursday but had not been placed in the queue for a vote by press time yesterday. Frist hopes to wrap up the agriculture bill by the middle or end of this week, according to a spokesperson. Vitter is the author of a measure that would establish FDA regulation of imported drugs.

As part of an agreement with Vitter, Frist vowed to permit the amendment as a test vote for Senate support of relaxing restrictions on consumers' obtaining drugs at lower prices from countries such as Canada that use price controls to hold down the cost of medicines

Vitter had threatened to block the confirmation of FDA Commissioner Lester Crawford but backed down when Frist promised not to stall the drug-imports amendment when the agriculture-appropriations bill came to the floor.

Prescription-drug importation, or "reimportation," as it is it is sometimes called, enjoys broad support in the Congress but is opposed by the GOP leadership in both chambers and by the White House.

On Wednesday, the Senate took action that could augur well for Vitter's amendment. It adopted legislation by unanimous consent that would prevent the U.S. trade representative from making deals that would preclude drug imports.

The House passed a bill virtually identical to Vitter's measure during the last Congress, but the Senate never took up the legislation. Sens. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) are the chief sponsors of a rival bill. Backers of drug importation, including Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), are expected to vote in favor of whatever vehicle first reaches the floor.

According to the agreement with Frist, if the Vitter amendment attracts more than 60 votes, a standalone drug-imports bill would be given floor time at a later date. If the amendment is attached to the agriculture bill, it is expected to be stripped out during conference discussions.

The pharmaceutical industry repeatedly has cautioned that drug makers cannot guarantee the safety of medicines entering the U.S. market from abroad, often citing the proliferation of counterfeiting rings and other criminal enterprises linked to the cross-border trade of prescription drugs.

Social Security Appears To Be DOA In Senate (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, September 20, 2005

Though it might be premature to say the nail is in the coffin of President Bush's push to overhaul Social Security, there appear to be plenty of Republicans on Capitol Hill these days who are willing to serve as pallbearers.

In fact, with last week's revelation that National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) thinks that voting on a Social Security overhaul would be political suicide for House Republicans in 2006, Senate leaders are doing little to quell a notion, floated by Reynolds, that any measure offering personal investment accounts under the government's retirement security program would be dead on arrival in the Senate.

Asked if Reynolds was correct to assume that the Senate would be unable or unwilling to take up Social Security in this Congress, Senate Majority Whip

Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said, "It is my personal opinion that Social Security reform ought only to go forward on a bipartisan basis. And as of this moment ... I am unaware of any Democrat who has signed on" to negotiations over personal accounts.

Indeed, Democrats in both chamber have steadfastly refused to even consider the notion of private accounts, saying that the change would make current promised benefits to retirees subject to the whims of Wall Street, and the costs to transition to private accounts would bankrupt the system.

On Monday, Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) unveiled "lockbox" legislation that would keep Social Security revenues from being used for anything other than benefits — a proposal that places the focus on the solvency of the existing program rather than on a major overhaul. Bush's plan, "in my opinion, is not going anywhere," he told reporters.

Republican backers of the president's plan, however, argue that personal investment accounts are the only way to salvage a retirement system slated to become insolvent by mid-century and that retirees stand to reap even more money from the stock market than they are guaranteed under Social Security.

Of course, the uppermost worry among Reynolds and other Republicans with cold feet on Social Security is not about whether the Bush plan will work. Rather, their concern is whether voting to create private accounts will trigger a voter backlash that significantly weakens the GOP Congressional majority — or even hands control to the Democrats.

Indeed, one aide to a Senate Finance Committee Republican said that Reynolds' concerns mirror those of many Senate Republicans who have been "privately for months ... voicing the same concerns."

"I don't think we have the time [on the Senate floor schedule], and I don't think we have the political will," the aide said.

Even one of the most vocal supporters of private accounts, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), acknowledged that Republicans in the Senate are skittish about taking up Social Security before the 2006 midterm elections.

"I think the Senate, like the House, has got to get over being afraid for ourselves," Graham said. "It's a short-sighted view for our party to put off addressing this issue. There will never be a politically opportune time."

Despite admonitions like that from true believers, it isn't as if Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) or Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) are clearing their chambers' schedules for the debate, especially given the onslaught of legislation related to Hurricane Katrina in both chambers, plus two Supreme Court nominees for the Senate to confirm.

While the timeline for House action this fall on Social Security was vague to begin with, Hastert gave an even hazier timeline when asked about it by reporters last week. "Social Security is something very important. It's something we've talked about doing, and when we decide to move forward we'll let the press know," he said, adding that the House is focused on aiding Katrina evacuees first.

Similarly, Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said the Senator is "still interested in considering Social Security reform," but noted the loaded Senate schedule has pushed the issue off the front burner. "We'll see where we are later in the fall," she said.

Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) also put Social Security at the bottom of his list recently, saying that the response to Katrina, Supreme Court nominations, a budget reconciliation bill and the 12 annual appropriations bills take precedence, according to a spokeswoman.

Still, Grassley noted that if the House takes action on Social Security, it could give the issue added momentum in the Senate.

However, Senate Finance ranking member Max Baucus (D-Mont.) said Republicans are just giving lip service about their intentions on Social Security at this point.

"It's all bluster," he said. "Private accounts have a close-to-zero chance of being enacted this year. ... I think Grassley's stock is also close to zero on this."

Though Reynolds and others fear the repercussions of voting on Social Security at the ballot box, the crisis management in Washington over the botched recovery from Katrina is providing Republican leaders with a handy excuse for sidelining Social Security for the rest of this Congress.

"Katrina is the perfect way for Republicans to bow out gracefully without making the president look bad," said an aide to a Finance Republican.

Many Republicans already have acknowledged that trying to bring up the subject during an election year would most certainly spell political death.

Of course, there are a few holdouts trying to give the issue fresh energy, notably, Senate Republican Conference Chairman Rick Santorum (Pa.). Santorum is pushing a bill that would guarantee that senior citizens 55 or older would continue to receive their promised Social Security benefits if private accounts were introduced for younger workers.

Santorum is reportedly hoping to move his bill alongside a measure by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) that would give workers born after 1950 the option of placing part of their Social Security taxes in private investment accounts. DeMint, like Santorum, has expressed a desire to move forward with the plan as well.

Santorum has said the bill will assure seniors that Democratic scare tactics on Social Security are just that, but the introduction of the bill also appears to be a tacit acknowledgement that those Democratic tactics are working.

And, of course, Bush has shown no signs of accepting or acknowledging defeat. He's meeting this week with the very people who recommended he push private accounts in the first place — his 2001 Commission to Strengthen Social Security.

Kerry's complaint

Sen. John Kerry yesterday said Hurricane Katrina exposed "a broader pattern of incompetence and negligence" in the Bush administration and showed what a bad choice Americans made in re-electing the president last year.

"The truth is, democracy is not a game. We are living precious time each day in a different America than the one we can inhabit if we make different choices," Mr. Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat and his party's 2004 presidential nominee, said in a speech at Brown University.

Mr. Kerry used the speech as a fundraising technique, sending an advance preview to his e-mail list of supporters along with a link to click if they wanted to contribute to his political activities.

In his remarks, he said the hurricane is a watershed moment for Americans to define themselves, but that the president has failed to lead.

"Yes, they can run a good campaign -- I can attest to that -- but America needs more than a campaign," he said. "If 12-year-old Boy Scouts can be prepared, Americans have a right to expect the same from their 59-year-old president of the United States."

"Armchair quarterbacking on tough issues has never been a problem for Senator Kerry," said Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt, who called his and other Democrats' recent remarks an "unsavory" attempt to politicize the hurricane.

For nonbelievers

Atheists finally have a lobbyist of their own.

She is Lori Lipman Brown, 47, a former Nevada state senator and lawyer with a background in constitutional law, who is going to work for the Secular Coalition for America, an umbrella group. She's interested in church-state separation issues and says she intends to "help us move toward the day when humanists and atheists are regarded with the same respect as the rest of society."

She began work yesterday at the D.C. headquarters of the American Humanist Association and also will be representing the concerns of the Atheist Alliance International, the Institute for Humanist Studies, the Secular Student Alliance and the Secular Web.

"For humanists, having a full-time lobbyist is a historic accomplishment," said Roy Speckhardt, AHA executive director. "It's a culmination of our efforts to establish a seat at the table for our views.

"Having a lobbyist focusing on a secular point of view is more essential now than ever before. With the three branches of government drenched in religiosity, we have to let America know that we are here, too."

Voinovich's plan

Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, said yesterday that Social Security personal-account proposals aren't going anywhere this year, but that Congress should pass legislation to lock away federal trust funds, including Social Security dollars, to ensure government can't spend them.

Mr. Voinovich introduced a bill that would require all specially designated government revenue, including Social Security, be saved for those purposes and not spent on other programs. The government, he said, has borrowed more than $3.5 trillion from various trust funds, including $1.9 trillion from Social Security and $695 billion from the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund, but that borrowing is not reported to the public as part of the overall deficit.

"What we've been doing every year is raiding those trust funds," he said, arguing that taking the money off the table will reveal the true size of the deficit and force Congress to limit spending, raise taxes or increase borrowing. "We've got to get real."

Mr. Voinovich said overall Social Security reform will not happen this year with other issues, such as hurricane-relief efforts, dominating the agenda. "The Social Security thing, in my opinion, isn't going anywhere," he said. "It may have been doomed from the beginning because it wasn't done on a bipartisan basis."

He added that since much has to be done to get the government's fiscal house in order, he hopes President Bush's tax cuts will not be made permanent, as some Republicans propose.

Flood of money

"There's an old adage that no one in Washington can tell the difference between $1 million and $1 billion. Seldom has that Beltway learning disability been more vividly demonstrated than in the weeks since Katrina," the Wall Street Journal's Stephen Moore writes.

"When President Bush announced last Thursday that the feds would take a lead role in the reconstruction of New Orleans, he in effect established a new $200 billion federal line of credit. To put that $200 billion in perspective, we could give every one of the 500,000 families displaced by Katrina a check for $400,000, and they could each build a beachfront home virtually anywhere in America," Mr. Moore said.

"This flood of money comes on the heels of a massive domestic spending build-up in progress well before Katrina traveled its ruinous path. Federal spending, not counting the war in Iraq, was growing by 7 percent this year, which came atop the 30 percent hike over Mr. Bush's first term.

"Republicans were already being ridiculed as the Grand Old Spending Party by taxpayer groups. Their check-writing binge in response to the hurricane only confirmed, as conservative leader Paul Weyrich put it, that 'the GOP, once the party of small government, has lost its bearings and the Republican establishment doesn't seem to get the message that the grass roots of the party is enraged.' "

No run-off

Democrat Fernando Ferrer has enough votes to officially win the New York mayoral primary and will face Republican Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg on Nov. 8, officials said yesterday.

After a week of uncertainty, Mr. Ferrer edged just past the 40 percent mark as election workers finished counting thousands of absentee and other untallied votes cast in the Sept. 13 primary, Board of Elections officials said.

Officials had said a runoff would have been required by law with the second-place finisher, Rep. Anthony Weiner, if no one had reached 40 percent -- even though Mr. Weiner had conceded defeat.

A "painstaking recanvass" found Mr. Ferrer, the former Bronx borough president, received 192,243 votes of the more than 478,000 votes cast, Board of Elections Executive Director John Ravitz said yesterday. That put him about at 40.15 percent, or 720 votes over the 40 percent threshold, the Associated Press reports.

"There will not be a runoff between Fernando Ferrer and Anthony Weiner," Mr. Ravitz said.

FDA Rethinks Women's Chief (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

One week ago, the Office of Women's Health of the Food and Drug Administration sent an e-mail notice to women's groups and others announcing the appointment of Norris Alderson as its new acting director.

An FDA veteran trained in animal husbandry who spent much of his career in the agency's Center for Veterinary Medicine, Alderson quickly became the subject of active and largely negative comment on the Internet and elsewhere.

The Office of Women's Health serves as a liaison with women's health groups and as an advocate on women's issues; critics said that a man with a primarily veterinary background could not properly fill the role.

The last director, Susan Wood, resigned last month to protest the agency's unwillingness to make a decision on whether to make emergency contraception more easily available.

Three days after the Alderson announcement, the FDA main press office sent out a very different announcement. It said that 20-year FDA veteran Theresa A. Toigo would be the new acting director of the women's health office, and that she would be a champion for women's health inside and outside the agency. Alderson -- and the statement announcing his appointment -- was never mentioned.

Asked yesterday who exactly was running the office, FDA spokeswoman Suzanne Trevino said that Alderson had never been appointed acting director. She said that Toigo would take over from the departed Wood, and that her office knew nothing about the statement regarding Alderson, who is the agency's associate commissioner for science.

"There was no official decision made until we announced Theresa Toigo's appointment on Friday," Trevino said.

The seeming mystery thickened when several women's groups said that not only did they receive e-mails announcing Alderson's appointment, but also that he was also listed on a Health and Human Services directory last week as the acting director of the office. In addition, people who have spoken with women's health office staff said that Alderson was introduced to the staff last week as the new acting director, and that he even had some one-on-one discussions with staff members about future plans.

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), a longtime advocate for the FDA's women's health office, said she already had been concerned by Wood's resignation. "I was further concerned to learn last week that Dr. Norris E. Alderson, someone without women's health experience who has spent the majority of his career at the Center for Veterinary Medicine, was appointed acting director of this important office," she said in a statement yesterday.

Toigo has led the FDA's Office of Special Health Issues, which works with patient advocates on issues such as AIDS and cancer. The FDA announcement of her appointment also says that she has worked with the women's health office on agency initiatives related to the inclusion of women and minorities in clinical trials.

Former director Wood called Toigo a good choice. "She's a very capable and dedicated person who will do an excellent job," Wood said.

But many women's health groups remain unhappy with the FDA and what they consider to be the agency's questionable leadership.

"Once again, this episode shows the agency's complete tone-deafness," said Kirsten Moore, director of the Reproductive Health Technologies Project. "It underscores our concern about the degree of competence at the leadership level, and about political appointees who just don't know much" about the issues before the agency.

Is FDA's New Chief Counsel A Change In Name Only? (LEGTIMES)

DOJ_NMG_0006859

By Lily Henning, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 20, 2005

Sheldon Bradshaw arrived at the Food and Drug Administration without the baggage lugged around by his predecessor.

The previous chief counsel at the FDA, Daniel Troy, was pilloried by critics who slammed his close ties to the drug industry. Troy made a name for himself suing the agency on behalf of drug and tobacco companies before moving to the government agency early in the Bush administration.

Bradshaw, who came to the FDA as chief counsel from the Justice Department in April, has escaped that kind of scrutiny, largely because he hasn't had those corporate relationships. But that doesn't necessarily mean a new day has dawned.

In fact, despite Troy's return to the private sector, his controversial legal policies remain in force at the agency. Like Troy, Bradshaw offers one-on-one meetings with the companies regulated by the agency, has kept low the number of warnings issued to companies violating regulations, and, perhaps most notably, has continued to intervene on behalf of drug companies in private civil lawsuits.

Last week, Bradshaw signed off on a brief agreeing with Pfizer Inc.'s claim that three years ago the FDA would not have allowed the drug company to warn consumers about a link between suicidal behavior and the use of its best-selling antidepressant, Zoloft, by adolescents, an argument Pfizer is using to ward off liability.

That approach and a lighter regulatory hand put the public at risk, consumer and public health advocates complain. And even some in the drug and medical-device industries find the regulatory regime under Troy, and now Bradshaw, discomforting, claiming that without strong FDA oversight, companies are being hauled into court more frequently by state attorneys general and private plaintiffs.

"One of our clients said to me a few months ago, 'I miss the FDA,'" says Arnold & Porter's Donald Beers, a food and drug attorney who served as associate chief counsel for drugs and for enforcement in the FDA's Office of Chief Counsel between 1975 and 1985. "An aggressive FDA that occupies the stage is sometimes better than having lots of different people sniping at you."

STAYING THE COURSE

Before joining the FDA in April, Bradshaw was principal deputy assistant attorney general in the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division.

Bradshaw's move to the FDA -- generally considered a less prestigious agency for government lawyers than the Justice Department -- surprised some of his former colleagues, who describe him as being part of an ideologically conservative group of young leaders in deputy positions at the DOJ.

He also worked in the Office of Legal Counsel, made up of an elite group of lawyers at Justice who advise the executive branch. Among the office's alumni is Troy. Both he and Bradshaw were part of the Bush administration's advance legal teams in 2001.

Bradshaw says that his lack of experience in the food and drug regulatory arena could be, in the wake of what he says was unfair criticism of Troy, a good thing.

"I think it's helped me in my transition that I wasn't seen as already having made up my mind on certain issues," Bradshaw says. "There isn't a perception that I would have a preference in any given case."

But those looking for changes to policies initiated under Troy will be disappointed. Bradshaw says he has no intention of changing the way the FDA's legal department does business.

That continuity was evident last Thursday, when the government filed an amicus brief in Utah reiterating the argument championed by Troy that the FDA's jurisdiction over prescription-drug labeling prevents plaintiffs from suing Pfizer over Zoloft's lack of a warning label.

"Wherever I go, people ask me if I am going to continue Troy's policy in pre-emption cases," Bradshaw says, adding that the FDA does not take such action by itself and must have consent from the Department of Justice and the political leadership at the Department of Health and Human Services.

Troy was a pioneer of the government's intervention on behalf of Pfizer in cases related to Zoloft and suicide, contending the FDA would not have permitted Pfizer to warn about the suicide risk because there was not enough scientific support for the warning. The government's involvement began in September 2002, when Justice, joined by the FDA, filed a friend of the court brief in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals case Motus v. Pfizer. (The 9th Circuit, however, ultimately decided the case on different grounds, never reaching the pre-emption issue.)

The argument was based on the premise that since the FDA has sole jurisdiction over the labeling process of prescription drugs, drug companies like Pfizer should not be held liable for warnings on products if they follow FDA requirements.

The FDA's involvement in the Pfizer case sparked indignation among interest groups, which complained that Troy, who had represented Pfizer in private practice, was leaping to the defense of industry. Plaintiffs advocates complain that if the FDA's legal argument in the Zoloft case is applied broadly, then victims won't be able to sue if they are injured by any FDA-regulated product.

Pfizer has used the 2002 brief for the past three years to fend off lawsuits involving Zoloft-related suicides.

In June, Judge Paul Cassell of the U.S. District Court for the District of Utah asked the government to weigh in again, noting that the FDA's opinion was important because the agency had injected itself into the debate with the 2002 brief.

In that case -- the first in which the government has intervened since Bradshaw took over -- the family of 15-year-old Shyra Kallas sued Pfizer, claiming that Zoloft's label at the time their daughter committed suicide in 2002 did not disclose the risks of suicide and suicide-related side effects associated with the use of Zoloft in adolescents.

They also claim Pfizer failed to warn Kallas' doctor of that possibility.

Kallas, who was prescribed Zoloft by her primary-care doctor, shot and killed herself a month after starting on the drug.

Cassell asked the FDA to explain whether the 2002 brief would apply to the Kallas case, noting that the case involves a minor. The drug is not approved for treatment of depression in adolescents. And while Bradshaw calls the circumstances of the Kallas case "tragic," last week's filing didn't alter the position the government held under Troy.

Judges have had mixed responses to the FDA's position on the Zoloft cases, of which there are now more than a dozen nationwide. In a March 2005 decision in a federal court in Texas, in which Pfizer had filed the 2002 amicus brief, Judge William Steger wrote that Pfizer had relied heavily on the FDA to support its arguments. But the judge ruled that evidence before the agency did suggest that a warning about suicide risks was appropriate and that the FDA's regulations do indeed allow a manufacturer to add to or strengthen a warning without prior agency approval.

Karen Menzies, who represents plaintiffs in cases related to Zoloft, notes that Pfizer never asked the FDA if it could warn consumers about the suicide risk, adding that the FDA had information about the suicide risk associated with antidepressants like Zoloft since the early 1990s but did not analyze it.

The contention that the agency would have prevented Pfizer from issuing the warning is "pure speculation by the FDA's attorneys," says Menzies, a partner with Baum Hedlund in Los Angeles. "But the sheer weight of the FDA intervening is very persuasive."

Pfizer has consistently denied any link between suicidal behavior and the use of Zoloft by adolescents. Last fall, after a review of studies on risks of suicidal thoughts and behaviors in children taking antidepressants, the FDA directed manufacturers to add a "black box" warning -- the most severe kind of advisory -- to the medications' labels to emphasize the need for close monitoring of child patients taking those drugs.

THE OLD ORDER

Troy, 45, is, for many critics of the Bush administration's FDA, Exhibit A of the dangers of appointing a regulator who clashed with the very agency in which he would later play a pivotal role.

The first appointment to the FDA made by President George W. Bush, Troy says his was a necessarily high-profile role. As chief counsel, he gave nearly 80 speeches and met with dozens of industry groups.

Troy says the meetings sometimes helped to narrow the scope of litigation against the agency and, in some situations, to avoid it. "Sometimes when they heard our side, they said that's a good point -- or we're not going to beat you in court," Troy says. "Sometimes I ended up hearing their tale and decided that we were wrong."

Troy was slammed by a wide range of detractors, from newspaper editorial writers to Capitol Hill legislators, for what they said were brazen actions benefiting the industries he represented in private practice.

Before joining the FDA, Troy, as a partner at Wiley, Rein & Fielding, represented tobacco-maker Brown & Williamson in a successful effort to ward off FDA oversight of tobacco. He also played a key role in the 1990s campaign -- spearheaded by the Washington Legal Foundation, a conservative legal group -- that challenged advertising restrictions on prescription drugs. The lawsuits were successful, freeing drug companies to engage in "off-label" promotion of their prescription products.

As chief counsel, Troy was accused of stalling efforts to investigate complaints about the supplement ephedra and loosening the application of rules governing prescription-drug advertising.

"He in a lot of ways transformed the role of chief counsel," says James Czaban, a partner at Heller Ehrman in Washington. "He asserted himself very visibly in key decisions. Troy allowed interested companies much greater access to him and the legal staff to advocate a position or talk about issues."

In early 2004, Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., introduced, and Congress passed, an amendment to take $500,000 away from Troy's office and add it to the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation Research budget. Hinchey argued that by interceding in civil suits on behalf of drug-makers like Pfizer, Troy was ignoring conflicts of interest and putting drug consumers at risk.

James O'Reilly, a food and drug law expert and adjunct professor at the University of Cincinnati School of Law, says one of the considerations in choosing Bradshaw to replace Troy was to "avoid the Hinchey scenario."

"It may be a careful tactic to appoint Sheldon," says O'Reilly. "He comes without the baggage."

DOJ_NMG_0006861

THE NEW BOSS

Bradshaw maintains that he can take a fresh look at the legal questions facing the agency. Perhaps fresher, he says, than "someone who has ties to the regulated industry."

This week he is speaking at the Generic Pharmaceutical Association's policy conference in Washington about legal issues facing the generic-drug industry.

He also continues an open-door policy to the chief counsel's office that Troy initiated, meeting with drug and medical-device companies in "courtesy visits."

Over the summer, Bradshaw's visitors included Pfizer General Counsel Jeffrey Kindler, lawyers from Covington & Burling, Alston & Bird and other firms.

Sounding much like his predecessor, Bradshaw says: "I'm happy to meet with anyone who wants to come in and talk, no matter what side -- industry or citizen groups. It benefits me to hear everyone out."

By winter, Troy could be making similar visits to Bradshaw.

Now a partner at Sidley Austin Brown & Wood, Troy works for a firm that he says "represents pretty much almost every company" in the brand-name drug industry.

This year, among Sidley's lobbying clients are pharmaceutical companies Hoffman La-Roche Inc., Bayer Corp. and Schering Plough Corp. Troy also does work for Pfizer Inc., and did so while working for Bert Rein at Wiley Rein & Fielding.

Although Troy cannot lobby or appear before the FDA until the end of November because of a one-year "quiet period" after leaving the government, his clients can still benefit from the policies he helped put in place.

Since Bradshaw arrived in April, the number of warning letters, which caution companies about violations of food and drug regulations, sent out per month stayed consistent with the dramatic drop-off that occurred during Troy's tenure. Under Troy, the agency's legal department began to review the letters, which do not represent legal action and give the offenders an opportunity to fix the problem. If it isn't remedied, the agency can sue.

So far in 2005, 23 warning letters to advertisers and seven compliance letters regarding manufacturing or compliance problems have gone out. In 2002, 28 advertising letters and 15 compliance letters were sent. By contrast, during the Clinton administration in 1999, 110 letters warning about illegal advertising claims were sent. Bradshaw says that it is not his goal to reduce the number of warnings.

"I don't have any particular agenda about how many ought to be going out or to whom," Bradshaw says of the letters. "I don't view myself as a policy-maker. Someone else decides the policy. I'm here to make sure that they are legally accurate and defensible."

NASA Planning Return To Moon Within 13 Years (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

New York Times, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - Combining an old concept, existing equipment and new ideas, NASA gave shape on Monday to President Bush's promise to send humans back to the Moon by the end of the next decade.

Michael D. Griffin, the agency's new administrator, detailed a $104 billion plan that he said would get astronauts to the Moon by 2018, serve as a steppingstone to Mars and beyond, and stay within NASA's existing budget.

The plan would use a new spacecraft similar to the Apollo command capsule of the original Moon program, and new rockets made up largely of components from the space shuttle program.

"It is very Apollo-like," Dr. Griffin said, "but bigger. Think of it as Apollo on steroids."

The chairman of the House Science Committee, Representative Sherwood Boehlert, Republican of New York, said it appeared to be "the safest, least expensive and most efficient way" of moving forward in space exploration, but added that current cost overruns in other NASA programs might make it hard to develop the new vehicle on schedule.

The outlines of the plan had been disclosed informally over the last two months by NASA officials and space experts. But Dr. Griffin's announcement laid out a timetable and a budget, putting flesh on the bones of a proposal that Mr. Bush announced in January 2004 but had never described in detail.

Dr. Griffin said that after adjusting for inflation, the program would cost just 55 percent of what it cost to put a dozen men on the lunar surface from 1969 to 1972.

The pay-as-you-go plan, approved by the White House last week, would stay within NASA's $16-billion-a-year budget through a combination of retiring the space shuttle, finishing the International Space Station and reallocating money from other NASA programs. And Dr. Griffin said the nation could well afford it, despite concern about tight budgets in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"We're talking about returning to the Moon in 2018," he said at a news conference here in Washington. "There will be a lot more hurricanes and a lot more other natural disasters to befall the United States and the world in that time, I hope none worse than Katrina.

"But the space program is a long-term investment in our future. We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in our future. When we have a hurricane, we don't cancel the Air Force. We don't cancel the Navy. And we're not going to cancel NASA."

Dr. Griffin and other space advocates, including influential members of Congress, have said the United States needs a replacement for the aging shuttle fleet as a matter of national security. Russia and China are currently capable of human spaceflight, and other countries have expressed interest in following suit. Dr. Griffin said the nation must maintain an independent capability to send people into space after the shuttle retires in 2010.

The new craft, called the crew exploration vehicle, would perch the astronauts' capsule above the rockets that power it into space, rather than alongside them as with the shuttle. NASA officials said it would be 10 times as safe as the shuttle, with a projected failure rate of 1 in 2,000, as opposed to 1 in 220 for the shuttle. The increased safety, they said, will be due in part to escape rockets that will be able to jettison the capsule away from the booster rocket in the event of an accident.

Dr. Griffin said the vehicle would be able to take as many as six astronauts to the space station, or fewer astronauts and some cargo. Or it could fly robotically without a crew, he added, carrying up some 25 tons of cargo, about as much as a shuttle can carry. The wingless craft, weighing 50 percent more than the Apollo, could carry a crew of four to the Moon.

As envisioned, the craft would resemble a larger version of the Russian spacecraft Soyuz, including solar-power panels deployed after launching. It would be carried aloft on a modified version of one of the shuttle's solid-fueled rocket boosters and a new second stage using one of the shuttle's main liquid-fueled engines. For Moon voyages, the craft would rendezvous in Earth orbit with lunar components lifted on a big new cargo rocket.

This heavy-cargo rocket, which could put 125 tons into orbit, would comprise two extended shuttle solid-fuel boosters attached to a liquid hydrogen-oxygen first stage made of an extended shuttle external fuel tank with five shuttle main engines. Atop this would be a new second stage using one or more of the shuttle main engines.

The bigger rocket, capable of lifting the payload of the Saturn V, which sent men to the Moon decades ago, would put into Earth orbit another rocket that could carry a landing craft and the crew vehicle to the Moon.

The Moon mission would be accomplished in stages. First, a vehicle with a lunar lander and a Moon rocket would be launched into Earth orbit. The crew capsule would be launched as much as a month later and would meet the first vehicle in orbit.

The joined craft would then be propelled to lunar orbit. From there, the landing craft would fly to the surface, and its crew of four would spend up to a week exploring.

Afterward, the top part of the two-piece lander would take the crew back to lunar orbit to rendezvous with the crew vehicle, which would have been left there unmanned, for the trip back to Earth. The bottom part of the lander could be left behind with equipment that might be used by future crews that land nearby, the agency said.

Nearing Earth, the crew vehicle would jettison its equipment module before the crew capsule plunged into the atmosphere. Parachutes would slow the capsule before it landed in the water or on land, possibly at Edwards Air Force Base in California. The landing would be cushioned by air bags on the craft's bottom or small rockets that fire just before touchdown.

Some of the big military contractors that stand to win multibillion-dollar contracts to launch and maintain the new mission vehicles said they were pleased by Monday's announcement.

"This is a big deal for us," said Michael Coats, chief of space exploration for the nation's largest military contractor, the Lockheed Martin Corporation, one of two teams competing to build the crew exploration vehicle. "Today's announcement means that we will have a stable program for a while. It would be great for us to compete and win a piece of the business."

Lockheed is the leader of a consortium that currently has a $28 million contract to design the crew exploration vehicle. Another team, headed by the Boeing Company and Northrop Grumman, has an identical contract to design an alternative. NASA is expected to select the winning design next spring.

John E. Pike, a space policy expert with the consulting firm GlobalSecurity.org, said NASA needed to sell more people on the value of a Moon program if it is to preserve future budgets and continue space exploration. The Moon may be a source of the rare element helium-3, for instance, which could fuel fusion reactors to provide abundant electricity on Earth, he said.

"NASA," Mr. Pike said, "needs to have reasons like this to go back to the Moon so the program has more stakeholders who see its value and want to protect it."

NASA Aims For A Return To Moon By 2018 (Houston Chronicle)

By Mark Carreau

Houston Chronicle, September 20, 2005

The United States can return to the moon with human explorers by 2018 at a cost of $104 billion by relying on crew capsules similar to those used in the Apollo program and rocketry inherited from the space shuttle, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said Monday.

"Think of this as Apollo on steroids," the space agency chief said.

NASA's Apollo program ended in December 1972, after a dozen American astronauts explored the lunar terrain during six missions as part of a Cold War rivalry with the former Soviet Union.

The strategy outlined by Griffin at a Washington news briefing is a response to a January 2004 directive from President Bush that tasked NASA with retiring its aging space shuttle fleet by 2010 in order to fund missions to the moon, Mars and eventually other deep-space destinations.

Houston's Johnson Space Center, where 15,000 people are employed, will lead the deep-space exploration planning and spacecraft-development efforts, if a debt-conscious Congress supports NASA's plan.

The exploration strategy relies on the development of upgraded versions of the three-man Apollo capsules capable of transporting four explorers to the moon and the continued production of space shuttle fuel tanks in Louisiana, solid rocket boosters in Utah and rocket engines in California.

Given a mandate Griffin took over the $16.1-billion-a-year space agency in mid-April with orders from the White House to quickly devise an exploration strategy carrying out Bush's directives with only modest budget increases.

On Monday, Griffin defended the plan's $104 billion price tag, which will cover expenses through the first mission, in the face of new budget pressures to pay the soaring costs of the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort and the escalating expense of the Iraq war.

"The space program is a long-term investment in our future," Griffin said. "We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in the future. When we have a hurricane, we don't cancel the Air Force, we don't cancel the Navy. We're not going to cancel NASA."

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, the Sugar Land Republican whose district includes Johnson Space Center, hailed the plan during a visit to Houston, declaring it would trigger new economic development in the region. NASA's vitality is critical to the economic leadership of the United States in science and technology, said U.S. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who chairs a NASA oversight panel.

But other key Republicans, expecting as much as a $1 billion increase in NASA spending next year to overcome the fuel tank debris problems that triggered the 2003 shuttle Columbia tragedy and that resurfaced during this summer's Discovery mission, were not as enthusiastic.

"The question Congress and the administration will still have to grapple with most is not the nature or desirability of the exploration (plan), but rather its timing," said U.S. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y., who chairs the House Science Committee. "Given the funding shortfalls in the space shuttle program, there is simply no way to accelerate the development of the Crew Exploration Vehicle unless the NASA budget increases more than anticipated."

The Crew Exploration Vehicle, which Johnson will develop to replace the winged shuttle orbiter, would lift off with a crew of astronauts as soon as 2012, two years earlier than Bush had proposed previously, according to the plan unveiled by Griffin.

The first lunar landing is planned for 2018. Initially, the space agency would launch two missions to the moon annually.

If funding permits, astronauts could begin to establish a base on the moon and develop the means to extract hydrogen and oxygen from the soil, as well as ice, to produce rocket fuel, water and breathable air.

The exploration vehicle would be launched atop a single, two-stage version of the shuttle's solid rocket booster.

The vehicle housing the astronauts would be equipped with an escape rocket and parachutes and could be ejected in a disaster. The escape system, which the Apollo spacecraft also relied upon, would lower the risk of astronaut fatalities to about one in 2,000 missions, NASA estimates.

A new "heavy-lift" rocket comprised of the shuttle fuel tank, boosters and rocket engines, would launch a larger lunar transport and lander assembly into orbit ahead of the astronauts.

Parachute landing Once in Earth orbit, the astronauts would rendezvous and dock with the transport-lander craft and set out for the moon. After reaching lunar orbit, the astronauts would board the lunar lander and descend to the moon's surface.

When their work was finished, the astronauts would board the ascent portion of the lander and lift off to rejoin the crew exploration vehicle in lunar orbit. The exploration vehicle would bring the astronauts back to Earth.

But the new spacecraft would likely parachute to a landing at Edward Air Force Base, Calif., or another desert site in the United States.

NASA 'Vision' Sees Man On Moon, Mars (WT)

By Philip Chien

Washington Times, September 20, 2005

NASA has outlined its new "Vision for Space Exploration" plan that will culminate in the return of astronauts to the moon by 2020 and the infrastructure to send people to Mars.

The plan calls for the retirement of the space shuttle in 2010 and a new 14-person Crew Exploration Vehicle, which could fly as early as 2012 if additional funding becomes available or 2014 within NASA's current budget.

"This is the best mission statement NASA's had in 40 years," NASA administrator Michael Griffin said.

"Think of it as Apollo on steroids," Mr. Griffin said. "Very Apollo-like although upgraded technology."

The new vision for NASA came about primarily in response to the Columbia space shuttle accident more than two years ago. According to investigators, one of the root causes of the disaster was the lack of vision and goals. The Bush administration responded with an announcement in January 2004 to retire the shuttle and for NASA to go back to the moon and on to Mars.

To accomplish these goals, NASA will spend $104 billion over 13 years until the first new footprints are made on the moon.

"This architecture absolutely fits within the funding guidelines the administration has provided," Mr. Griffin said.

One key factor to reduce up-front costs is to reuse space shuttle components. While the space shuttle orbiter is being retired, new versions of its solid rocket boosters, external tank, and shuttle main engines will be used.

But this cost-saving measure is not without its challenges. NASA has had to find new manufacturers when existing subcontractors can no longer manufacture certain parts. Regulations change and older materials may not be easily available, often with unexpected problems and potential safety hazards. For example, an environmentally friendly putty spread between solid rocket motor segments in 1996 nearly led to the burn-through of the rocket's case.

Relying on older designs where many of the components are aging or can become obsolete has also raised the concerns of engineers.

"As NASA continues to use the solid boosters and external tank there will be more aging problems -- there's no way to avoid it," NASA engineer Robert Stevens said.

The plan promises to be a windfall for three existing aerospace contractors. Lockheed-Martin manufactures the external tanks, ATK Thiokol manufactures the solid rocket boosters and Boeing's Rocketdyne division builds the shuttle main engines. Still to be determined are the contractors who will build the Crew Exploration Vehicle.

Back To Moon Via 'Apollo On Steroids' (Los Angeles Times)

By Peter Pae

Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

NASA unveiled a 13-year, $104-billion blueprint Monday for sending humans back to the moon as early as 2018, using a modified space shuttle rocket to propel an Apollo-like capsule into space.

Analysts said the design was decidedly retro, harking back more than three decades to the Cold War's moon race.

But they said the new design was safer and more realistic than the current space shuttle, which is scheduled to be retired in 2010 after nearly 25 years of service and two disastrous shuttle losses.

The blueprint unveiled Monday is part of a broader initiative launched by President Bush 18 months ago, in which he called for returning humans to the moon as a steppingstone to a manned mission to Mars, perhaps as early as 2020.

The new capsule, known as the crew exploration vehicle, would be significantly larger than the cramped Apollo capsule, with seating for up to six astronauts instead of three.

Due to launch in 2012, it would initially be used to resupply and transfer International Space Station crews after the shuttle is retired, NASA officials said.

Unlike the winged shuttle that is mounted on the side of a fuel tank attached to two rockets, the capsule would sit atop a rocket, away from falling debris and potential rocket explosions that doomed the shuttles Columbia in 2003 and Challenger in 1986.

NASA officials estimated that the new craft would be 10 times safer than the space shuttle. The agency estimated that a space shuttle would be lost about every 220 missions. The new vehicle will be designed to be used in more than 2,000 missions without a serious calamity.

In 2018, NASA would launch the first back-to-the-moon mission with a new lunar lander and other components that would allow for up to four astronauts to stay on the surface for up to seven days.

The Apollo missions, which cost $150 billion, focused primarily on landing astronauts on the moon for a day or two and then returning them to Earth.

Elliot G. Pulham, president of the nonprofit Space Foundation, a space exploration advocacy group, called the blueprint a "challenging yet realistic plan" that doesn't "break the bank."

But questions about how NASA would sustain public interest and win funding from Congress for more than a decade dogged the unveiling Monday.

Some observers worried that huge federal spending on such items as rebuilding New Orleans, which could cost up to $200 billion, could undermine funding for any major space initiatives.

"If you're not going to have a lunar landing until 2018, how are you going to keep people and Congress interested?" said John Pike, a space policy analyst for GlobalSecurity.org.

But Griffin said the nation could afford the price tag because he would not seek any new money for the agency's annual $16-billion budget.

Instead, spending within NASA's human spaceflight program would be redirected to pay for the endeavor, he said. About $4 billion to $5 billion a year is now allocated for manned spaceflight.

Measured in constant dollars, the $104-billion price tag, spread over 13 years, represents 55% of what the eight-year Apollo program cost, Griffin said. The objective, he said, was to "pay as you go and what you can afford."

"There will be a lot more hurricanes and a lot more other natural disasters to befall the United States," Griffin said. "We must deal with our short-term problems while not sacrificing our long-term investments in our future."

NASA's announcement created a buzz among enthusiasts at the International Lunar Conference in Toronto on Monday.

"We've got to go" back to the moon, said Buzz Aldrin, a former Apollo astronaut who made the first manned moon landing with Neil Armstrong in 1969. "But we don't want to stay too long....The ultimate goal is Mars."

Although the design for the new crew exploration vehicle would resemble the Apollo capsule, the spacecraft would be three times as big, NASA officials said.

On its return to Earth, it would be able to make a soft terrestrial landing by parachute, perhaps at Edwards Air Force Base in the Mojave Desert, instead of splashing down at sea. It would be reused several times.

"Much of it looks the same," Griffin said, but added, "It's a significant advancement over Apollo."

The return mission to the moon would also differ from the Apollo missions in several ways.

Unlike the Apollo program, which relied on the massive Saturn V rocket to loft both the capsule and the lunar lander, NASA plans to send up two rockets, one carrying the crew capsule and the second the lunar lander and other components.

The crew capsule rocket would be a modified solid rocket booster used on the space shuttle, while the cargo rocket carrying the lunar lander would be consist of a modified shuttle engine, external fuel tank and solid rocket boosters.

Once in orbit, the two spacecraft would rendezvous before making the journey to the moon. The new lunar lander, to be developed later, would be able to carry four astronauts to the moon's surface, compared with two on Apollo. The capsule would stay in orbit unmanned.

For a Mars mission, the capsule would carry six people.

NASA officials said using Apollo concepts and shuttle technology with the latest materials, propulsion systems and avionics would allow the agency to meet the president's goals more efficiently and cheaply.

NASA said about 85% of the shuttle facilities were likely to be retained for work on the craft.

"We believe this venture safer and more affordable than any other spaceflight ventures that the U.S. has had," Griffin said.

The moon missions as outlined could rejuvenate Southern California's declining aerospace industry, which during the 1960s led the development of the Apollo program.

Lockheed Martin Corp. and a team from Northrop Grumman Corp. and Boeing Co. are competing to build the crew exploration vehicle. Northrop, with its headquarters in Century City, said about 200 engineers in El Segundo have been working on the design of the new craft.

Times staff writer John Johnson Jr. contributed to this report.

A Retro Look To Next US Spacecraft (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

It's back to the future for the US manned spaceflight program.

After 25 years of spectacular successes and tragic failures using the winged space shuttles, NASA is opting for the tried and true: Just put a capsule on top of a rocket, put people or cargo into it, and launch it.

NASA's plan for replacing the shuttle, unveiled Monday, calls for launching future space vehicles in the same way that was used during the successful Apollo program of the 1960 and '70s, but borrows the shuttle's concept of a reusable craft.

That new craft would be the cosmic equivalent of the suburban minivan - a "crew-exploration vehicle" capable of carrying six people to the International Space Station, or four people to the moon, or roughly 3-1/2 tons of cargo. It's designed to ride a parachute system back to land, but must also survive an Apollo-like splashdown. Over the long term, the CEV must also be capable of handling a trip to Mars.

If all goes well, its first flight to the space station would launch in 2011. In keeping with President Bush's vision for space exploration, the first mission to the moon is slated for 2018.

The CEV's configuration - a command module, service module, and lander - has an Apollo-era look, and it's not by accident, says Michael Griffin, NASA's administrator. After NASA looked at a range of configurations, he says, it's amazing to see "how much of it all the Apollo guys got right."

If the plan has a quaint, haven't-we-done-this-before quality to some, other space enthusiasts say the blueprint represents a welcome change for human space exploration. "For the first time in 3-1/2 decades, the federal government plans to leave low-Earth orbit. That's a major shift," says George Whitesides of the National Space Society.

The effort marks a technological turning point, adds Ray Williamson, research professor at The George Washington University's Space Policy Institute in Washington. "Basically, we've recognized that it's better to get the job done than to try doing it with flashy technology," he says. "You don't need a Ferrari to take your groceries home."

That's not to say the program faces smooth sailing technologically. Though the rockets have a familiar-looking shell, they'll use state-of-the-art technologies inside, and engineers won't lack for design challenges, analysts say. Low cost, safety, and reliability are vital - features the shuttle, despite being a marvel of aerospace engineering, has not delivered.

Still, NASA seems to be taking a minimalist approach, says Keith Cowing of NASAWatch, a website that tracks the agency's developments. "This is pretty conservative. There are no plans for a big moon base. It's almost like we're trying to prove we can still do it."

The biggest risk with the new plan is financial, analysts say. Hurricane Katrina and continued problems with the debris falling from the shuttle's external fuel tank during launch have saddled NASA with unanticipated costs. The debris problem has forced NASA to delay shuttle launches until next year. This could postpone the orbiters' retirement and the savings the agency had hoped to gain from mothballing the fleet.

The program's overall cost is $104 billion through the first lunar mission - roughly 55 percent of what Apollo cost, Mr. Griffin says. The program is designed on a go-as-you-pay basis, he adds.

Help may come from a new generation of entrepreneurs who are sinking personal fortunes and venture capital into rockets designed to be more reliable and cheaper to build and operate than the launchers used for unmanned missions in the US today. NASA appears ready to give those fledgling companies an opportunity to show what they can do, says Mr. Whitesides, and possibly contract with them for space station missions.

NASA's track record for giving lawmakers accurate costs estimates or for controlling overruns hasn't been stellar. "I am anxious to get more information on the program's expected costs," says Rep. Bart Gordon of Tennessee, the House Science Committee's ranking Democrat.

Space Vision: The Experts Split Again (NYT)

By William J. Broad

New York Times, September 20, 2005

The nation eagerly accepted President John F. Kennedy's challenge in 1961 to put men on the Moon. But President Bush's plan to return humans there and then voyage onward to Mars is dividing space experts and generating skepticism about its feasibility.

Mr. Bush announced his initiative on Jan. 14, 2004, as he was campaigning for re-election. On Monday, 20 months later, NASA filled in some of the blanks by announcing a glossy plan to replace the aging shuttles with a new generation of space vehicles meant to rekindle the nation's exploratory fires.

Michael D. Griffin, the NASA administrator, set a tentative goal of 2018 for a return to the Moon, saying it would cost slightly more than $100 billion. He set no date for Mars.

"The pace of implementation will change to suit the funding that is made available," Dr. Griffin said at a Washington news conference. "All our goals will have to be funding driven."

Experts clash on the practicality of a space vision with a $100 billion price tag, especially given the huge costs of fighting the Iraq war and rebuilding the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina.

Advocates of the plan praise the recent choice of Dr. Griffin as head of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, saying he has the knowledge, drive and experience to make big things happen. A physicist and an engineer with wide experience in academia, industry and the federal government (as well as six advanced college degrees), he joined the agency in April with a mandate to re-energize exploration plans.

"He's outstanding," said Louis D. Friedman, executive director of the Planetary Society, a group in Pasadena, Calif., that advocates space exploration. "He's got a serious intent to do it and do it right."

Backers also say Dr. Griffin is seeking to achieve the exploration goal within a level space agency budget, at least initially. His goal is to squeeze the shuttle to pay for developing new rockets and exploration vehicles. That, the supporters say, helps make the overall aim achievable, at least in theory, despite tightening budgets.

"From my own experience, the administration is very serious," said Douglas O. Stanley, an aerospace expert at the Georgia Institute of Technology who led the NASA exploration study. But Mr. Stanley added a significant caution, noting that the plan still faced votes in Congress.

Skeptics see a huge spending gap. Even if Congress blesses the effort, they say, no real bill will come due until Mr. Bush is long out of office.

"Stick the next administration with an impossibly expensive and pointless program and let them take the blame for ending human space exploration," said Robert L. Park, a physicist at the University of Maryland and an official at the American Physical Society, which has opposed many piloted space programs as scientifically unproductive. "This is a poison pill."

Dr. Park noted that in 1961 Kennedy promised a Moon landing "before this decade is out" and that the nation did so in eight years. By contrast, he said, Mr. Bush's goal is to redo the same accomplishment in 14 years, nearly twice as long.

"We went to Moon because of the cold war and won hands down," he said. "Now there's no political reason to do it."

Dr. Park noted that the first President Bush in 1989 proposed a space program with the same exploratory goals but failed to make any progress. Some political analysts say Mr. Bush consciously or unconsciously seeks to avoid his father's mistakes on Iraq, taxes, conservatism and other issues.

Alex Roland, a former NASA historian who teaches history at Duke University, said the new plan "might sell politically, even though it's retro" in echoing the ends and means of the Apollo Moon program.

"I don't think the public cares" about using simple rockets for advanced exploration, Professor Roland said, "as long as it gets the job done."

The main problem, he added, is that the space agency has a long history of underestimating costs and technical difficulty and that the new plan would probably fail to withstand close Congressional scrutiny.

"It's possible but very unlikely," Professor Roland added. "I doubt this plan will put any man or woman on the Moon in our lifetime."

All the initiative might produce, he said, is a low-tech successor for the space shuttle to travel to the International Space Station.

Dr. Friedman, of the Planetary Society, while praising Dr. Griffin, faulted the plan as making little room for international partners, a factor that he called critical for strong public support. He also said the plan lacked vision.

"If you don't keep the Mars mission out front, people are going to ask, 'Why are we returning to the Moon?' It's got to be because we're extending ourselves into the solar system."

NASA Details Plan For Craft That Will Fly To The Moon (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON — The United States plans to send astronauts back to the moon as soon as 2018 on a mission that would be cheaper and more ambitious than man's first trip to the lunar surface nearly 40 years ago, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said Monday.

NASA wants to send a crew of four to the moon in a spaceship that resembles the capsule developed for the Apollo program in the 1960s. But this capsule would be able to land on either solid ground or water. The Apollo capsule only splashed down at sea.

It would also be safer than its forerunner. And it would be roomier, taking a crew of four to the moon rather than Apollo's three.

“Think of it as Apollo on steroids,” Griffin said of the new ship.

Griffin said the cost of the moon program would be $104 billion. Adjusted for inflation, that's roughly 55% of the cost of the first moon landing in 1969. He said NASA's budget would not need to grow to pay for the new effort and vowed not to raid other programs for funds. Savings would come from retiring the space shuttle in 2010.

"This is not about new money," Griffin said. "This is about a budget which keeps NASA … approximately where it is today."

The plan fleshes out a proposal President Bush made in 2004 to return astronauts to the moon — last visited by humans on the Apollo 17 mission in 1972 — and later to send Americans to Mars, where no human has set foot.

NASA did not set a target date for the first human mission to Mars, a much more expensive and difficult trip than a moon shot.

NASA hopes to launch the new ship, the crew exploration vehicle, in 2012. At first, it would only ferry crews and cargo to the International Space Station orbiting the Earth. Later, the ship would carry astronauts to lunar orbit and wait there while another vehicle carried the crew to the moon's surface.

The timeline leaves a two-year gap in the United States' ability to send people into space. The only other ship able to drop off humans at the space station is Russia's space capsule, the Soyuz.

NASA's blueprint does not indicate whether it would build a base on the moon. The answer, Griffin said, would depend partly on whether other countries are interested in such a project.

The spacecraft unveiled Monday could make two trips to the moon per year, but NASA has not worked out a schedule for the number or length of moon trips.

Some members of Congress, including Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y., praised the plan as cost-effective. But others questioned the worth of a new moon program.

"It is a terrible allocation of scarce resources," said Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass. "The time has come to de-emphasize the manned space program."

NASA's record on holding to its original budget estimates is spotty, says space analyst Marco Caceres of the Teal Group, an aerospace and defense consulting firm.

"Whatever NASA says it will cost will be a low-balled figure so they won't scare too many people away," he said. "Their main goal is to get that (project) through."

He also noted that NASA won't save much money on the shuttle program until the vehicle is put in mothballs in 2010. But to meet its 2012 goal of launching the space capsule, NASA will need to start research and development now.

NASA aims to save money and time by recycling parts of the shuttle for use in its two new rockets:

·The crew launch vehicle would carry the capsule to orbit. It would be powered by a shuttle engine and by a stronger version of the shuttle's rocket booster.

·The heavy-lift vehicle would carry the unoccupied lunar lander into space. It would dock with the crew capsule and then power the whole package to the moon. It would rely on two shuttle boosters, each upgraded to provide extra lift, and five shuttle engines.

However, the designs also incorporate technology that could prove troublesome to develop. The engine that would lift the crew's lander off the lunar surface would burn liquid oxygen and methane, an untried combination. New engines require significant testing.

The risk of losing a crew with the new system is expected to be a third of what it was on an Apollo-era moon landing, said NASA's John Connolly, who helped lead the development effort.

For the trip to Earth orbit and back, he said, the capsule and its rocket would be 20 times safer than the shuttle, in part because the capsule would have an emergency rocket to lift the crew to safety during an aborted launch.

NASA Unveils $104 Billion Plan To Return To The Moon By 2018 (Washington Post)

By Guy Gugliotta

Washington Post, September 20, 2005

NASA yesterday released its master plan for returning humans to the moon by 2018 and eventually sending them to Mars, choosing rocketry from the space shuttle era and drawing inspiration from the Apollo program that first put humans on the lunar surface 36 years ago.

NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin said the plan would cost $104 billion over the next 13 years, with increases for inflation, but would not require extra money beyond NASA's normal budgets. The pace of the project, he said, "will fit the funding that's available."

The plan envisions development of two new rockets, one of them almost as tall and even heavier than the Saturn V that launched the Apollo astronauts, and a new spacecraft to put four people on the moon for up to six months before bringing them back to Earth in a parachute landing.

And while the rocket technology is "shuttle-derived," the new plan abandons the concept of a winged, reusable spacecraft that can fly back to Earth and land at an airport. Griffin said the new "crew exploration vehicle" can be reused perhaps 10 times, but most of the new program's apparatus, like Apollo's before it, will be jettisoned in space or burned up in Earth's atmosphere.

Griffin also acknowledged that there will be a two-year period between the last space shuttle flight in 2010 and the first flight of the exploration vehicle, anticipated in 2012, during which the United States will have no ability to put humans in space.

This gap has been a space policy sticking point for more than a year between the Bush administration and Congress. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.), chairman of the science and space subcommittee and an outspoken advocate of closing the gap, issued an enigmatic statement saying, "I will do everything possible to keep the shuttle and crew exploration vehicle programs on course."

Still, in response to several reporters' questions, Griffin sought to assure employees at NASA's shuttle program centers in the Gulf Coast states that the new program "can use 85 percent of the space shuttle work force."

"It's been pretty well coordinated among the centers," said John Logsdon, director of George Washington University's Space Policy Institute. "It appears to provide for a smooth transition."

The use of "crew" and "service" modules to orbit the moon while astronauts travel to and from the surface in a "lunar lander" called to mind the Apollo missions that put 12 men on the moon between 1969 and 1972.

"We did not set out to make it like Apollo," Griffin said at a NASA headquarters news conference to release the agency's "Exploration Systems Architecture Study." "We looked at every vehicle, but people began to realize that the Apollo guys got it right."

Still, the new plan is "a significant advance over Apollo," he added, describing it as "Apollo on steroids." Among other differences, the new lander is larger, can put twice as many people on the moon, leave them there potentially for months instead of days, land them anywhere on the lunar surface instead of just at the equatorial region and leave the orbiting spacecraft without a crew onboard.

The new spacecraft will also use different, more efficient propellants than Apollo, and substitute lighter composite structures where Apollo used metal. Most important, while Apollo was born during the waning days of vacuum tubes, the new program will benefit from 45 years of advancements in computer science.

Griffin said the choice of targets for moon landings "will be driven by science," but unlike Apollo, the program is also designed so astronauts can linger and establish permanent bases on the lunar surface to develop technologies and test techniques for a more ambitious, subsequent Mars mission.

The new propellants, for instance, will use both oxygen, which can be mined from Martian rocks, or methane, which can be extracted from components of the Martian atmosphere. "One reason to go back to the moon is to learn to live off the land to enable longer-duration space missions," said Georgia Institute of Technology research engineer Douglas Stanley, who led the "Exploration" study for NASA.

Logsdon described the project as "a good plan -- but not an elegant one" because it does not make much use of advanced technology. "It's a doable approach to getting people into space safely," he added.

But space policy and engineering consultant Charles Lurio, an advocate of innovative private-sector approaches to space travel, criticized the new proposal for being too "massive" and "unaffordable now and unsustainable later."

The moon mission will begin by putting into space a new 358-foot "cargo launch vehicle" weighing 6.4 million pounds. It lifts the moon rocket and the lunar lander into low Earth orbit to await the arrival of the crew exploration vehicle, the combined service module-crew module.

Both the heavy lifter and the "crew launch vehicle" that carries the spaceship use solid rocket boosters, like the shuttle, and fuel tanks derived from the external tanks whose foam shedding caused the loss of the shuttle Columbia in 2003. Loose foam will not be a problem for the new spacecraft, which are perched in traditional fashion atop the tanks, out of harm's way.

The exploration vehicle will mate in Earth's orbit with the lunar lander, then the moon rocket will ignite, carrying vehicle and lander on the three-day trip to lunar orbit. From then on, the mission will unreel in Apollo-like fashion, with the astronauts riding to the moon's surface aboard the lander, while the exploration vehicle orbits overhead.

Besides human space travel, the exploration vehicle can fly robotically, perhaps as a cargo carrier for a moon colony. It also could ferry crew and cargo to the international space station and dock autonomously there if necessary.

"The principal concern has always been the lunar mission," said Doug Young, program manager for the Northrop Grumman/Boeing team that is competing with Lockheed for the right to build the exploration vehicle. "But we've always known that we will ultimately have to meet the requirements" of the space station.

NASA's Back-to-the-Future Plans (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0006870

NASA has finally unveiled its plans for carrying out the ambitious space exploration program that was announced by President Bush in January 2004 but left vague and undefined ever since. The proposed new space vehicles look like a sensible way to put astronauts and cargo into space after the shuttle fleet is retired and will be built to facilitate landings on both the Moon and Mars. Michael Griffin, the new administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, deserves credit for putting real flesh on what had been little more than an aspiration. Unfortunately, the new plan lacks the pizzazz to inspire public support and will be operating under budget constraints that make delays or overruns likely.

The new crew exploration vehicle will be built around well-known space technologies, with booster rockets and engines derived from the shuttle program and a crew capsule like the one used in the lunar program, only bigger. That has the great advantage of letting NASA use much of its current shuttle work force on the new program and the great disadvantage of making the technology look retrograde. This approach will not excite those looking for cutting-edge hardware, but it seems reasonable at a time when reliability is the main goal.

The configuration largely eliminates the two hazards that destroyed the Columbia and the Challenger. NASA calculates that the new vehicle should be 10 times safer than the shuttle, with perhaps a 1 in 2,000 chance of a catastrophe.

The plan pays only the barest lip service to international cooperation; Europe, Japan, China and India all have lunar programs of one kind or another under way. Mr. Griffin said NASA hoped to send Americans back to the Moon by 2018 under its own program but was open to partnerships on what to do or build on the lunar surface. Given that most experts say international collaboration will be imperative on a high-cost mission to Mars, it seems desirable to enlist international partners very early.

It is hard to see how NASA can complete all the tasks on its agenda while operating on a constrained budget, which is scheduled to grow at only the rate of inflation. The agency needs to repair the damage to its facilities from Katrina, fly the shuttle safely until 2010, complete the space station by that date, fly the new crew exploration vehicle by 2012 and return to the Moon by 2018 or 2020, all the while carrying out its science, aeronautics and robotics programs. The safety valve is that NASA will carry out the exploration program on a "go as you can afford to pay" basis, without raiding money from other space programs. That means that cost overruns may stretch out the completion dates, and leave the exploration vision a more distant prospect.

Bush And The Mad Scientists (LAT)

By Chris Mooney

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

THE LAMENTATION in the forthcoming New England Journal of Medicine is typical of a growing genre: complaints about the misuse of science by the Bush administration. It is merely the latest jeremiad, from a group of distinguished experts, about the loss of reason by our leaders. This particular editorial, titled "A Sad Day for Science at the FDA," concerned so-called Plan B emergency contraception (the "morning after" pill), but it just as well could have been about the science of global warming or mercury pollution. Yawn. We've heard it all before.

There's an inherent difficulty when it comes to sustaining outrage over how science gets continually misused in the Bush administration. The complexity of scientific disputation, paired with the intricacies of bureaucratic decision-making, make for a truly soporific combination. It's tough to get past the latest scandal and see the big picture — even when, as in this case, three distinguished doctors are writing that the Food and Drug Administration has made "a mockery of the process of evaluating scientific evidence, disillusioned scientists both inside and outside the agency, squandered the public trust and tarnished the agency's image."

Still, let's try to muster whatever's left of our outrage, because the Plan B episode truly demands it. It may represent a historic low for science-based professionalism at the FDA. And it presents an instructive case study in how the political abuse of science plays out in practice.

By any stretch, this decision should have been a no-brainer. The "morning after" pill, which blocks or delays ovulation, had already been approved for prescription use; the latest move merely concerned its availability over the counter. (Six states, including California, have made it available over the counter, but women must request it from the pharmacist.)

Given that the pill's effectiveness in preventing a pregnancy depends on how quickly it is used after unprotected sex — and that it meets the safety and ease-of-administration tests for over-the-counter products — it makes obvious sense that simplifying access would help prevent unwanted pregnancies (and thus, presumably, abortions).

Two scientific advisory committees held a joint hearing to consider the issue. Committee members voted overwhelmingly (23 to 4) in favor of approval. The FDA expert staff was of a similar mind.

And yet in an extraordinary move in May 2004, the agency second-guessed its experts and its advisors and cooked up a dubious rationale for delaying approval of over-the-counter availability. More data were needed, the FDA claimed, on the pill's safety for women under 16. Or course, no evidence existed suggesting a unique problem for this age group, and such age-based data have not been required to switch other drugs to over-the-counter availability.

The FDA suggested that the maker of Plan B could reapply for over-the-counter status with the proviso that girls 16 and younger would have to get a prescription. But when the company did that, the FDA delayed again. Early this month it said it now had to check the legality of the age rule.

As it happens, the "morning after" pill has been strongly opposed by many religiously conservative interest groups. In fact, there's some evidence in the transcript of the hearings to suggest that the rationale cooked up by the FDA may have originally sprung from a controversial advisory committee member — "As Jesus Cared for Women" author W. David Hager — who provided one of the four votes against Plan B's approval. When the agency didn't like the overwhelming opinion of the advisory committees, it seems to have gone shopping for a more convenient scientific-sounding argument: "We need more data."

In the end, the scientific data indicate that Plan B contraception is one of the safest drugs ever considered for over-the-counter sale. FDA decisions about drug approvals are supposed to be based on just such scientific data. If you want to derail such a decision, you have to undermine the science. That standard has not been met.

The abuses in the Plan B case have fundamentally called the FDA's integrity into question.

"People who've been in the agency for decades say they've never seen anything like it," Susan F. Wood, the former assistant FDA commissioner for women's health who resigned over the Plan B decision, told me. The scientists writing in the New England Journal of Medicine agree. Although the FDA may previously have been accused of having too much bureaucracy or too close a rapport with the drug industry, they argue, it had at least "resisted political pressure to reflect a particular social policy or ideology."

But not any more — and that's the really nasty thing about the current war on science. If you can get past the complicated details, you'll see that it is undermining our government's most central mission: to serve and protect us. This mandate cannot be fulfilled without an abiding respect for professionalism, expertise and the integrity of scientific analysis.

Wind Or Flood? Fights With Insurers Loom (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 20, 2005

Hurricane Katrina is likely to be the costliest U.S. natural disaster. It also may be the most contentious.

The Mississippi attorney general is suing insurance companies to get them to pay for hurricane-caused storm damage typically not covered under homeowners policies. Richard Scruggs, the tough-as-nails lawyer who took on the tobacco and asbestos industries, is now taking aim at the insurance industry. Even the vice president has weighed in on the issue.

Unhappy homeowners are calling a hotline with complaints. And officials are asking insurers to give policyholders the benefit of the doubt when it's unclear whether damage was caused by wind, rain or flood so people can rebuild their homes and lives again.

For hurricane survivors who fled their homes and are relying on relatives, friends or charity to get by, haggling over insurance is the last thing they want to do. “These people are exhausted,” says Joanne Doroshow, executive director of the Center for Justice & Democracy, a public-interest group. “The notion of having to fight insurance companies on these claims is almost too much to bear.”

At issue is whether insurers, the federal government or individuals should bear the brunt of billions of dollars in damage to homes and businesses in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. One estimate, by Risk Management Solutions, says total economic losses from Katrina likely will exceed $125 billion, with insurance companies paying $40 billion to $60 billion.

What makes the aftermath of Katrina so ripe for dispute is a polarizing, hard-to-determine issue: Is the damage caused by wind-driven rain or flooding? And what if the hurricane causes a storm surge or flood?

Flooding is usually covered by government-backed insurance, while wind and rain damage are covered by private insurance policies. But Katrina was a complicated storm in which up to 140-mile-per-hour winds leveled homes and businesses before flooding swept them away.

The insurance industry says it will do what it has to do. “You absolutely have to be sympathetic to these people, but on the same token, federal flood insurance has been available for nearly 40 years,” says Jeanne Salvatore, senior vice president at the Insurance Information Institute, an industry trade group. Private “insurance policies are quite clear that flood is excluded. We did not take in premiums for flood losses.”

Not everybody who has homeowners insurance has flood insurance. And flood insurance often isn't as generous as homeowners insurance. Flood insurance covers up to $250,000 in property damage, while a homeowners policy typically covers the value of rebuilding the home, whether that's $100,000 or $1 million. So for many hurricane victims, having damage considered caused by Katrina's winds rather than unrelated flooding is crucial.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) estimates 34% of households and 23% of businesses in the affected areas have federal flood insurance.

How much financial responsibility the industry ends up bearing will depend on how insurers handle the claims of people such as James Bud Ray, who is temporarily living in a motor home in Long Beach, Miss. Ray is lucky. He and his wife got out safely. But lucky is a relative term, because his Long Beach home has been reduced to rubble and his five car-wash facilities in the region were significantly damaged.

He says that after several phone calls to the insurance company, an adjuster called him back and asked: Did he think the damage was due to wind or flood? “I said to him, ‘Hold on, sir. You're not going to paint me in that corner.' ” Ray says if he's not satisfied with the insurance payout, he may hire a lawyer to fight the decision.

Complex Katrina-related insurance claims may take longer to settle than in previous hurricanes, says Ernest Csiszar, president of the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America, although it's likely that 90% to 95% will be completed within six months of filing. Insurers will pay for what's covered under the policies but no more, he says.

Insurance payments can't come quickly enough for Portia Andrew of Hammond, La. The storm ripped the siding off her mobile home and poked a hole in the roof. It also downed trees and knocked a power line on top of her incense-and-herbal-goods shop, 100 yards from the house.

Andrew is worried about what damage is covered by insurance. But she can't find a copy of her homeowners policy and hasn't been able to reach her New Orleans insurance agent since the storm knocked out phone systems. In the meantime, she's struggling to make ends meet. For almost a week, she and her six family members lived off peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches and water. “I'm trying to be patient and just learning to get in line,” Andrew says. “You never know if (insurance) will come through.”

Disputes over wind vs. flood damage occur after every hurricane. But “if it's any indication by the calls we've gotten so far, then we think there are going to be many more lawsuits” this time, says Doroshow of the Center for Justice & Democracy.

The center, along with other consumer groups, has a hotline to document insurance complaints related to Katrina. Since it started Sept. 12, the hotline has received 85 calls, officials said Monday.

While touring Mississippi earlier this month, Vice President Cheney said the question of whether a hurricane-driven storm surge should be considered flooding or hurricane damage has to be addressed. Scruggs, whose house in Pascagoula, Miss., was wiped out by Katrina, says he'll sue insurance companies to get them to pay up.

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood filed a lawsuit last week to invalidate a common clause in home and business policies that allows insurers to deny hurricane-caused storm-surge damage.

James Lucas, 37, says he didn't pay attention to the fine print in his homeowners policy because his Allstate agent told him that he was covered for any damage incurred during a hurricane, including storm surge. The Gautier, Miss., resident — who is living in the top floor of his house because of storm damage downstairs — says he asked about storm-caused water damage four years ago because he was concerned the canal behind his house would overflow.

After Katrina, he was surprised to hear an adjuster say that the company was covering wind but not water damage. “I'm not trying to get rich or anything; I'm just trying to get my appliances back,” Lucas says.

Allstate spokesman Mike Trevino says it's hard to imagine that an agent didn't explain to a policyholder that “flood is a longstanding exclusion in the policy, which includes flooding related to a hurricane. All Allstate agents know the Allstate homeowners policy very well.”

The effort to get insurers to pay for flood claims “ignores the fact that they have obligations to people in 47 other states,” says Randy Maniloff, an attorney who represents insurers in coverage disputes. “If they start paying claims based on risk they weren't prepared to take on, then they're putting themselves in the situation where they may not be ready for other claims.”

That's also the concern of George Dale, Mississippi insurance commissioner. Dale says that while he respects Hood's decision to file the lawsuit, he is worried about the financial hit the industry will take if it has to pay for damage not covered by policies.

Still, Dale has told insurance companies that “where there is any doubt, that doubt will be resolved in favor of finding coverage on behalf of the insured.”

Insurers say that where houses and businesses are still standing, they likely will be able to tell what type of damage occurred. If water entered from the bottom of the structure, homeowners insurance may not cover it, says Elizabeth Stelzer, a spokeswoman for Nationwide. But if wind-driven rain entered through a storm-damaged roof, that may be covered.

But when a structure has drifted away or been leveled, the cause is more difficult to assess. Csiszar expects to see more of these situations than in previous storms.

"If you're going in a court of law, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff," or the policyholder, to show how the damage was caused, he says. "But if you are the defendant, you better have a darn good reason to deny the claim."

Anticipating legal disputes, policyholders are getting this piece of advice: "I've heard that when you call your insurance company, say that the water came from wind-driven rain," says Debbie Barraf, who has a house in St. Bernard Parish, La., that she believes is flooded.

The magnitude of Katrina's damage — homes and businesses along the Louisiana and Mississippi coast are still partially under water or unlivable and may be so for months if not years — means that many people also will be looking to insurers for help with living expenses.

Homeowners policies may cover food and temporary housing costs if state or local officials order an evacuation. Business policies could take care of temporary office relocation and employee pay.

But again, the hurricane vs. flood question is causing disputes. Ellie Rand, a 39-year-old New Orleans resident, fled to Wilson, N.C., where her in-laws live and has racked up $4,000 to $6,000 in expenses along the way that insurance won't pay. "They told me, 'Sorry, the official call for the evacuation was flooding,' " Rand says. "They felt that my homeowners (insurance) wasn't responsible for paying living expenses."

Vienna Abramowitz, who owns three properties in Louisiana's hard-hit Jefferson and St. Tammany parishes, has received a $2,500 check from State Farm for living expenses. The insurer initially told her it's an advance against her government-issued flood coverage. But a day after she said she had talked to USA TODAY, the company told her it will take the money out of her homeowners coverage.

State Farm says it's giving all affected policyholders the $2,500 payment. If people have coverage for wind and flood, the company will advance the money from the flood policy first and then reverse it later if living expenses are covered by homeowners insurance, spokesman Dick Luedke says. State Farm evaluates each individual circumstance and may have discovered in Abramowitz's case that living expenses are covered by the homeowners policy, he says.

Still, "This one thing really triggered me to be worried," Abramowitz says. "If they have this issue with $2,500, what about when it's $75,000 or more?"

Mississippi Governor Calls Special Session (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2005

Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said Monday that he is calling the state Legislature back into session Sept. 27 to help the state recover quickly from Hurricane Katrina.

One item on Barbour's agenda is a proposed change in gambling laws to allow casinos to build on land rather than only over water. Another session item, Barbour said, will be a proposal to allow small businesses hurt by Katrina to apply for $25 million in local loans.

Barbour said he is waiting on a recommendation from the Mississippi Gaming Commission before offering a proposal on changing gambling laws.

The state legalized dockside casinos in 1990, limiting them to tourist areas on the Mississippi River or the Mississippi Sound. All 13 coastal casinos were heavily damaged.

First lady dishes up food and comfort

HOUSTON — First lady Laura Bush served smothered chicken to Hurricane Katrina evacuees at Houston's convention center shelter, home to about 300 people displaced by the disaster.

"It will be a long road for us," she told religious leaders and volunteers at the George R. Brown Convention Center. "We have to stay with (evacuees) every step as they rebuild their lives, and it is not going to be easy."

Bush also talked with families at a center for homeless mothers and children. She joined the children in molding Play-Doh and left behind M&Ms and notepads for them.

A 10-year-old boy told Bush he couldn't believe she was the first lady. "I'm married to the president," Bush said. She then took the hands of two children and walked through the shelter with them.

"I think it is nice because she doesn't have to come," said evacuee Kizzy Mickens. "Just coming to see us, to see how we are doing, is like a blessing because she never knew we existed but we knew about her."

Rural home loans to be expanded

BILOXI, Miss. — In an unprecedented move, some Gulf Coast residents will be eligible for single-family home loans backed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture Rural Development program.

The loans usually are available only to residents in rural communities of 20,000 people or fewer. But now, coastal communities of up to 75,000 residents will be eligible, said Nick Walters, state director of USDA Rural Development in Mississippi.

"I didn't want to leave people out because of some regulation in Washington," Walters said.

Witness Says Researchers Warned Merck On Vioxx (WSJ)

By Greg Groeller

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. -- Merck & Co. should have known that Vioxx could lead to heart attacks, a drug expert told a jury in a high-profile trial yesterday.

In his second day on the stand, Dr. Benedict Lucchesi said several researchers had warned Merck about Vioxx's potential to cause cardiac problems, particularly in people with histories of heart trouble, before the painkiller went on sale in 1999. "According to the slogan, 'Merck puts people first,' I think they should have known," he said.

Dr. Lucchesi, a pharmacology professor, is a witness for the plaintiff in the first trial since a Texas jury awarded $253.4 million last month to the family of a man who died after taking Vioxx. State caps in Texas are expected to reduce the amount of the verdict to about $26 million.

In the Atlantic City case, which began last week in a New Jersey state court and may run until mid-October, Frederick "Mike" Humeston, of Boise, Idaho, alleges that Vioxx caused his heart attack in 2001 after he had used the drug for two months.

Merck maintains that Mr. Humeston's poor health and lifestyle, not Vioxx, led to his heart attack. In any case, Mr. Humeston didn't take the drug for long enough to cause heart problems, Merck lawyers have said. The drug company pulled Vioxx off the market last year after a company-funded study found the painkiller had increased the incidence of heart attacks and strokes after 18 months of usage.

Dr. Lucchesi -- questioned by Christopher Seeger, Mr. Humeston's lawyer -- testified yesterday that he believed the drug could cause a heart attack after just a single dose in certain circumstances. For a second day, Mr. Seeger, showed jurors internal Merck emails and memos that Dr. Lucchesi said appeared to show that the Whitehouse Station, N.J., company knew about Vioxx's dangers.

Later in the day, Dr. Lucchesi and a Merck lawyer, Stephen Raber, had several heated exchanges as Mr. Raber sought to show that Merck had investigated questions about dangers posed by Vioxx. Mr. Raber asked whether Dr. Lucchesi was aware of studies that Merck had performed to test the effects of Vioxx in animals, including the African green monkey.

"Sir, admit it, you don't know what Merck did" in response to warnings that Vioxx could lead to blood clots and, ultimately, heart attacks and strokes, Mr. Raber said. Dr. Lucchesi shot back that Merck never responded to his requests for data on their internal studies.

Dr. Lucchesi also testified in the Texas trial and is expected to be a witness for plaintiffs in future cases.

At Vioxx Trial, Witness Says Short-Term Use Posed A Risk (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 19, 2005

By Bloomberg News

Merck & Company's painkiller Vioxx may cause heart attacks with just one dose, a University of Michigan researcher said at the second product liability trial over the drug, challenging the company's assertion that only long-term users are at risk.

The researcher, Dr. Benedict R. Lucchesi, testified on behalf of Frederick Humeston, who took Vioxx intermittently for two months before his heart attack in September 2001. Merck withdrew drug last September after saying it doubled the risk of heart attacks and strokes after 18 months of daily use.

"There's every reason to believe" that a single dose "can lead to an adverse response," Dr. Lucchesi, a pharmacology professor, told jurors in Atlantic City. "I definitely think that Vioxx can cause a heart attack in the right person."

Mr. Humeston, a 60-year-old postal worker and former marine from Boise, Idaho, asserted in his lawsuit that Merck knew of Vioxx's health risks for years before withdrawing it from the market.

Merck faces about 5,000 Vioxx suits and billions of dollars in potential liability, analysts say.

Merck contends that Mr. Humeston had a heart attack because of his weight, blood pressure and work-related stress. The company says it had no scientific proof of Vioxx's dangers before last September.

Dr. Lucchesi also disputed Merck's explanation of why Vioxx caused five times as many heart attacks as a rival drug, naproxen, in a clinical trial in March 2000. Merck asserted that naproxen, used in the painkiller Aleve, protected the heart. Dr. Lucchesi said the results of the trial, known as the Vigor study, instead showed that Vioxx posed a greater risk.

"When I saw the explanation for the Vigor results, my immediate response was this is nonsense," Dr. Lucchesi said. "There is no evidence that I know of to show that" naproxen protects the heart.

Merck, the No. 3 drug maker in the nation, emphasized the Vigor finding that Vioxx caused less stomach distress than naproxen, a point that was not in dispute, Dr. Lucchesi said. Merck introduced Vioxx, which inhibits the cox-2 enzyme, in May 1999 as an alternative to pain relievers that cause stomach bleeding.

Vioxx accounted for $2.5 billion in annual sales before it was withdrawn.

Dr. Lucchesi testified for a second day that Merck ignored indications dating to 1997 that drugs like Vioxx block one of the body's natural defenses against blood clots. The company, based in Whitehouse Station, N.J., was "forewarned on multiple occasions" by researchers that Vioxx would increase clotting, he said.

A Merck lawyer, Stephen Raber, tried to show during cross-examination that Dr. Lucchesi had disregarded studies that contradicted his conclusions about Vioxx. Dr. Lucchesi said he repeatedly asked Merck's lawyers for such data, and they did not produce it.

Oil Prices Rise As Gulf Storm Looms (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree and Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Oil prices surged as a new storm, Rita, headed toward the Gulf of Mexico, and OPEC ministers meeting in Vienna all but admitted they have no real means to cool red-hot petroleum markets.

The looming new threat to Gulf oil facilities eclipsed efforts by ministers of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to craft a reassuring message reiterating they would produce more oil if needed. It also underscored the U.S.'s dependence on the Gulf region, home to about a quarter of the nation's oil and natural-gas production and a large number of refineries.

The price of U.S. benchmark crude-oil futures for October delivery shot up $4.39 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange -- the highest one-day rise in nominal terms since it began trading oil futures in 1983 -- settling at $67.39. Gasoline and heating-oil futures also rose sharply.

Although still far from the Gulf Coast energy-producing region, Tropical Storm Rita is shaping up to be a worrisome storm for energy markets. Production platforms, pipelines and refineries spared the worst of last month's Hurricane Katrina could be in Rita's path. "This could be a huge punch in the gut for the market," said Agbeli Ameko, a partner with Enercast.com, a Denver-based energy forecasting firm.

Landfall on the Gulf Coast is expected by this weekend. Some oil companies are preparing to shut down facilities and evacuate workers. Analysts believe the storm could cause markets to gyrate all week.

The storm's approach is slowing efforts to fix infrastructure damaged by Katrina. The U.S. Mineral Management Service reported yesterday that 44% of the daily output of oil and natural gas was still off-line, three weeks after Katrina came ashore near the Louisiana-Mississippi border. So far, the damage has prevented the output of the oil and natural-gas equivalent of about 56 million barrels, just shy of 5% of the region's annual total.

Amid the storm concerns, energy markets brushed off the comments of Saudi Arabian Oil Minister Ali Naimi, who repeated his pledge to produce as much as 1.5 million barrels a day of extra oil if needed. Along with other oil ministers, Mr. Naimi sought new ways to dress up the cartel's year-old message that OPEC is willing to produce more oil if buyers could be found.

One of the options being discussed was for the cartel to state that it has two million barrels a day of spare petroleum-pumping capacity, citing projects that OPEC officials say will come on line later this year in the United Arab Emirates and Libya. The statement would say that the oil would be available on demand, regardless of the cartel's formal output ceiling of 28 million barrels a day. "The crude is available," Mr. Naimi told reporters. "If you want it, there it is."

Another option involves raising the cartel's formal output ceiling by 500,000 barrels a day or more to address concerns by major importing countries, whose economies are being hit by high oil prices. Industry analysts said oil markets would find nothing new in this sort of message from OPEC because it won't yield any actual extra crude.

"Definitely, it's a political message" from OPEC aimed at foreign governments, said Roger Diwan, an analyst at Washington consulting firm PFC Energy. "It's not intended to manage the market" because traders know that OPEC's moves here won't affect supplies, Mr. Diwan said.

OPEC is expected to formally announce its decision on output levels today. But none of the options being considered would necessarily lead to greater supplies of fuel. That is because buyers -- oil refiners who turn crude into gasoline and other fuels -- are running at full capacity and have no need currently for more oil, especially for the high-sulfur grades that Saudi Arabia can produce.

Industry analysts also said OPEC was exaggerating its spare production capacity, which was probably no more than 1.5 million barrels a day in a world market that is expected to consume more than 85 million barrels a day in the final quarter of this year. The International Energy Agency this month put OPEC's spare capacity at 1.39 million barrels a day, not counting war-scarred Iraq. Almost all of this extra capacity is in Saudi Arabia, the world's largest oil exporter, which is currently producing about 9.5 million barrels a day.

New US Hurricane Threat Sends Energy Prices Soaring (FT)

By Carola Hoyos, Kevin Morrison And Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

The threat of a new hurricane heading towards the Gulf of Mexico repeating the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina sent oil, petrol and gas prices soaring on Monday and overshadowed the ministerial meeting of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Predictions that tropical storm Rita, gathering strength and expected to turn into a hurricane, might reach the Texas coast within the next week sent oil traders into panic mode: US and European benchmark crude oil prices rose by more than $3, and US natural gas prices hit new record highs.

"Rita has pushed Opec into the background, because there is great fear that we could be facing another severe supply disruption in the US," said Rob Laughlin, an oil trader with Man Financial in London.

Opec ministers said they were likely to finalise a decision to offer the market more oil when it needed it.

Kuwait's oil minister and Opec president Sheikh Ahmad Al-Sabah, insisted the group had 2m barrels a day of extra oil that it would immediately supply to the market if needed.

But traders, who see the extra volume at closer to 1.4m b/d that could take some time to get to the market, said this would do little to lower prices because Opec did not have the light, sweet oil that the market needed to make petrol.

Nevertheless, Opec hopes that its decision will reduce some of the criticism it faces from industrialised countries, which blame the current high oil price on the cartel.

In fact, the biggest impact Opec could hope to make is in the long term.

The International Monetary Fund this week will blame Opec and oil companies for not investing in new oil capacity quickly enough. Both have already begun to invest more thanks to high oil prices, but those efforts will only yield results in a few years when the projects come to fruition and can do little to reduce the current relatively high prices.

The US benchmark, WTI gained $3.30 to $66.30 a barrel in late morning New York trade. In London, IPE November Brent climbed more than $3 to $64.86. Indeed Opec has had little impact on the prices, since its spare oil capacity has shrunk as demand from the US and China outpaced the world's ability to keep up by exploring for and producing new oil.

The Centre for Global Energy Studies, the London-based consulting group, said in a report released yesterday: "Although oil demand growth slowed dramatically since the second quarter of 2004, it continues to outstrip the pace of non-Opec supply growth and Opec's capacity additions, as well as global increases in refining capacity, particularly to turn heavy, sour crudes into light sweet products that are most sought after."

The International Energy Agency, the industrialised countries' watchdog agency, estimates that oil demand growth fell from 5.3 per cent in the second quarter of 2004 to 1.2 per cent in the third quarter of this year.

The oil and gas industry, which has yet to recover from damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, scrambled for cover. Chevron, BP and Shell all pulled staff from the Gulf.

The Port of Houston Authority, the 6th largest in the world, began gathering information with its partners about the pending storm, reviewing all plans and procedures for the hurricane.

Felicia Griffin, spokeswoman, said the port, which is ranked 1st in the US in foreign tonnage and second overall, after the port of southern Louisiana, was checking inventory to ensure it had basic equipment on hand, including flashlights and batteries. If the hurricane stays on track, and is definitely targeting Houston, she said the port would tie down all cargo and equipment - ``anything that could be airborne'' - to prevent damage in the area and make shutdown decisions.

Houstonians, which saw first-hand the devastation wrecked upon their neighbors just weeks ago, raced to supermarkets to stock up on water and other necessities.

Oil Prices Spike As Storm Nears (WP)

By Justin Blum

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

Oil prices soared yesterday in the largest one-day gain ever as fears mounted that a developing tropical storm could damage oil operations in the Gulf of Mexico and Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0006877

U.S. benchmark crude for October delivery gained $4.39 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange to close at $67.39. That was the largest one-day dollar gain since oil started trading on the exchange in 1983, according to the Energy Department. The oil price closed at a record $69.81 on Aug. 30.

Futures prices for gasoline, natural gas and heating oil also rose yesterday.

The spike came as gasoline prices, which surged after Katrina, continued to fall. The national average was $2.786 a gallon for regular, down 16.9 cents from a week earlier, according to the Energy Department. The average price in the Washington area dropped under $3 for a gallon of regular, according to a AAA-sponsored survey.

The increases in futures prices of oil and gasoline reflected concerns that Tropical Storm Rita, which was strengthening off the Bahamas yesterday afternoon, could disrupt offshore oil and natural gas production and impair operations at Texas refineries that produce gasoline. Supplies already are tight because of damage from Hurricane Katrina to offshore production and Gulf Coast refineries.

The new storm "could be coming in right exactly where Katrina didn't go," said Michael Guido, director of commodity strategy in New York for French bank Societe Generale. "It could be a bad situation for all the platforms that didn't get hit before."

The price spike came as ministers from the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries were considering whether to offer additional oil to the market. Traders said a move by OPEC would have little impact on the market because refineries don't have the spare capacity to process the varieties of oil that could become available.

Oil companies yesterday were evacuating hundreds of employees from platforms in the Gulf of Mexico by helicopter and boat, a standard precaution in advance of tropical storms and hurricanes. BP, for instance, said it was in the process of evacuating half of the 1,500 workers it has on platforms in the gulf.

Analysts said that pump prices should continue to fall but that yesterday's increases on Nymex mean they would not fall as much as they would have otherwise. Wholesale prices have dropped more quickly than retail prices, which have been catching up, they said.

"You may see local street prices drift lower," said Tom Kloza, chief analyst for the Oil Price Information Service of Lakewood, N.J. "That's how far behind pump prices were in catching up to the wholesale price."

Four major Gulf Coast refineries remain idle because of Katrina, according to the Energy Department. Even before that storm, analysts had said refining capacity worldwide was struggling to meet demand.

Now analysts say they are concerned that the developing tropical storm could hit Texas, home to about 27 percent of U.S. refining capacity, according to the Energy Department.

D. Mark Routt, an analyst with Energy Security Analysis Inc. of Wakefield, Mass., said Houston is an "extremely important hub" for pipelines and other oil industry operations, adding to concern about storm damage.

Analysts said that they were concerned about damage to oil production in the gulf but that those concerns were secondary to refining.

Nearly 56 percent of daily oil production in the Gulf of Mexico remained off line yesterday because of Katrina, amounting to almost 838,000 barrels a day, according to the Minerals Management Service.

The Energy Department said yesterday that it would lend more oil from the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The department said it is releasing 600,000 barrels to Total Petrochemicals USA Inc., bringing to 13.2 million barrels the amount loaned from the reserve since Katrina.

The department previously agreed to sell 11 million barrels of crude from the reserve.

Storm Makes Oil Cleanup Crews Uneasy (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, September 20, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — In the remote marshlands of southern Louisiana, emergency cleanup crews responding to 15 oil spills unleashed by Hurricane Katrina now have another worry: Tropical Storm Rita.

About 700 private contractors who are deployed each day by riverboat and helicopter are working to contain 6.7 million gallons of spilled oil at remote production sites operated by Bass Enterprises, Chevron, Dynegy, Murphy Oil, Shell and others, says Coast Guard Chief Petty Officer Keith Alholm.

It is the largest oil cleanup effort in state history, more than 10 times greater than the remediation of 550,000 gallons of oil spilled by the ship Westchester in the Mississippi River in November 2000. The biggest spill in U.S. history was 11 million gallons by the ship Exxon Valdez off Alaska in 1989.

Except Bass, where no one could be reached for comment, the other companies said spills had been contained with little or no environmental damage.

Roland Guidry, the Louisiana governor's oil spill coordinator, said Monday that authorities are concerned Tropical Storm Rita could move from the Florida Keys to the Louisiana coast, threatening the safety of crews working in rugged drilling areas that the hurricane rendered largely inaccessible.

"We have to have an exit strategy for all the people out there working, and possibly bring in the equipment we have out there," Guidry said. He said a decision will be made "in the next couple of days."

To date, cleanup efforts have been hindered by a lack of access and accommodations for the emergency cleanup crews, Guidry says: "It took us 31/2 hours by boat to get to some of those places, with no place to stay, no roads to get there. It's been like that since Day 1, and it hasn't improved much."

Guidry, speaking from Baton Rouge, said, "The reason we don't have 1,000 or 2,000 (workers) out there is because we don't have any way to get them out there and keep them out there safely."

To provide temporary lodging on the river for several hundred emergency workers, the federal Maritime Administration, a unit of the Department of Transportation, has deployed five ships to Louisiana, the last of which arrived over the weekend. Two of those ships are anchored in oil field cleanup areas. The government is considering deploying two more ships with several hundred additional berths.

The Coast Guard, which continues to airlift water and ice to some workers on the ground, says a lack of electric power in the area also slows the cleanup. Says Alholm: "It's been a lot more difficult than a normal oil spill cleanup would be because of the (damaged) infrastructure. It's going to take us longer."

Last week, the Coast Guard reported spills at these oil company installations:

·Bass Enterprises: 3.8 million gallons spilled due to damage to two storage tanks at a remote site in southern Louisiana identified on Mississippi River navigational charts as Mile Marker 35.

·Chevron: 991,788 gallons due to a ruptured tank or transfer line at Buras, La. An additional 53,592 gallons spilled at Chevron's Port Fourchon pipeline. At a third Chevron site known as Wagon Wheel, 8,400 gallons spilled. Several birds were among the reported wildlife casualties.

·Dynegy: 70,000 gallons spilled due to two tank failures near Venice, La.

·Murphy Oil: 819,000 gallons spilled at Meraux, La., due to a ruptured tank. As a result, Murphy said, two class-action lawsuits were filed against it by local residents seeking unspecified damages.

·Shell Oil: 933,870 barrels spilled due to a tank or pipeline breach in southern Louisiana identified on Mississippi River charts as Mile Marker 3. An additional 10,500 gallons spilled at Port Sulphur.

Gas Prices Fall, But Storm Worries Push Oil Higher (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, September 20, 2005

Gasoline prices dropped Monday to their lowest since Hurricane Katrina shut refining and shipping in the energy-rich Gulf of Mexico nearly three weeks ago.

But worries about another hurricane striking later this week sent prices of crude oil and wholesale gasoline zooming as energy traders bet on another shortage.

"If it hits the Houston area and damages a whole new set of refineries and shipping and infrastructure, we'd probably see a return to $3 gasoline," AAA spokesman Geoff Sundstrom says. "We were looking forward to gasoline going back to $2.50, $2.60 a gallon, but this new storm will put a stop to that."

That's Tropical Storm Rita off the Florida Keys, expected to become a hurricane, according to the National Weather Service.

AAA's daily survey showed a nationwide average of $2.805 Monday for a gallon of unleaded, down 8.2 cents over the weekend and lowest since $2.68 Sept. 1. The government's weekly price survey showed a nationwide average of $2.786 Monday, down 16.9 cents in a week.

Those numbers could turn fast. Frenzied traders bid up the price of oil $4.39 a barrel, to $67.39 at the close of New York trading. Wholesale gasoline for delivery next month zoomed nearly 25 cents to about $2.03 a gallon.

Oil prices and, more immediately, wholesale gas prices determine what you pay at the pump.

Highs at the pump were hit Sept. 5 when AAA reported a nationwide average of $3.057 and the U.S. Energy Information Administration reported $3.069. The inflation-adjusted record is $3.118, according to EIA.

"The good news is, we have a week to get ready. The bad news is that the market has all week to react," Peter Beutel, president of energy consultant Cameron Hanover, says of Rita.

He says it's possible Rita jitters might halt a further drop in retail gas prices rather than sending them zooming again.

Natural gas, a key gulf energy product and the fuel that heats most U.S. homes, rocketed to a record $12.70 per million Btu during Monday trading, and closed at $12.663, a one-day jump of 13.6%.

Energy companies are evacuating facilities in anticipation of Rita. The U.S. Minerals Management Service said Monday that six oil rigs had been evacuated. Katrina's damage and the new evacuations mean Gulf oil production is 44% of normal, MMS said. The Gulf supplies 29% of oil used in the USA, 21% of the natural gas.

OPEC Set To Open Oil Taps Full Blast (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

VIENNA, Sept. 19 - OPEC delegates said Monday that the group planned to allow its members to provide up to two million barrels a day of additional crude oil if the market needs it. But oil traders brushed aside the move and instead sent oil prices higher on worries of another possible hurricane.

Royal Dutch Shell, Chevron and other oil companies said they were evacuating some employees from offshore oil platforms in anticipation of Tropical Storm Rita. The National Hurricane Center said Monday that the storm was making its way toward the Gulf of Mexico from the Bahamas and could become a hurricane overnight.

The latest hurricane warnings helped push oil prices up on the New York Mercantile Exchange, and they closed Monday at $67.39 a barrel, up $4.39. Natural gas futures hit a record on Monday, closing at $12.663 per thousand cubic feet, up $1.519.

Forecasters issued a hurricane warning for parts of Southern Florida and said that by early Saturday, Rita, the 17th named storm of the Atlantic season, could make landfall near Houston, an area that is a major port and home to many refineries and petrochemical plants.

The mayor of Galveston, Tex., Lyda Ann Thomas, called for a voluntary evacuation. Galveston is an island city and tourist destination about 50 miles southeast of Houston.

OPEC's highly unusual decision to put on call an extra 7 percent of its production is expected to be formally announced Tuesday at the end of the group's two-day meeting in Vienna. Some oil ministers said the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries wanted to show it was doing all it could to lower oil prices even as they blamed refining shortages for the current situation.

Under the proposal, which members have been discussing in meetings since Sunday, OPEC producers would provide as much oil as refiners and other buyers asked for, without regard to previous production limits or quotas. The production ceiling, now set at 28 million barrels a day and shared by all 11 members except Iraq, would theoretically remain unchanged.

"The crude is available," Ali al-Naimi, Saudi Arabia's oil minister and OPEC's most influential voice, told reporters in Vienna. "If you want it, here it is."

OPEC's plan, proposed by Sheik Ahmad Fahad al-Ahmad al-Sabah, the group's president and the oil minister from Kuwait, has the backing of Saudi Arabia, OPEC's largest producer, which would provide 75 percent of the additional oil.

President Bush said he welcomed a release of more oil by OPEC members, particularly if it helped cut retail gas prices by increasing supply.

"I have been concerned about the price at the pump that our folks are paying," Mr. Bush said. "Part of that was caused by the disruptions of Hurricane Katrina. We dealt with that by suspending rules and regulations that enable us to import more gasoline. But part of the cost of gasoline is a result of high crude oil prices, and one way to affect those prices is to conserve and the other way is to encourage an increased supply."

OPEC's proposal is largely shaped around an earlier pledge by Saudi Arabia to fully open its taps to consumers who asked for more oil.

Saudi Arabia's commitment to increase its output to its full capacity of 11 million barrels a day, from 9.5 million barrels now, was repeated after Hurricane Katrina interrupted oil production from the Gulf of Mexico three weeks ago, sending the price of crude oil above $70 a barrel.

But the divergence between the oil market's focus and OPEC's plans illustrates the group's dilemma.

"OPEC's move today is largely for show," said Lawrence J. Goldstein, president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation. "They want to appear to be responsible, but the tools that they have in the bag render them largely impotent for the moment."

Many delegates here have asserted repeatedly that the shortfall in energy markets was not one of crude oil but of refining capacity - the current inability of refiners to turn oil into sufficient gasoline and other products like diesel or jet fuel.

"There is no issue with crude oil supplies," said Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, the minister from Qatar. "The real shortfall is in refineries, especially in the United States. We can do everything we can, except we can't interfere with the nature of the problem."

Still, he said OPEC hoped to send a message to oil traders, who have been bidding up oil prices over the last two years, largely on the belief that the growth in demand was outstripping the ability of suppliers to bring more oil into the market. That has contributed to a doubling in oil prices over the last two years.

OPEC has been facing mounting criticism from consuming nations, especially in Europe, which has been asking OPEC to act more forcefully, regardless of the refining constraints. Many of those nations are beginning to worry that high oil prices may slow growth and hurt the global economy.

According to OPEC's most recent statistics, the group pumps 28.2 million barrels of oil a day, about a third of global production and 40 percent of global exports.

Since 2003, OPEC producers have increased their output 10 percent to make up for a 5 percent rise in global oil demand. That increase leaves only one OPEC member, Saudi Arabia, with large amounts of untapped oil. Sheik Ahmad, the OPEC president, said that Nigeria, the United Arab Emirates and Libya could provide an extra 400,000 barrels a day by December.

At their meeting on Monday, OPEC's ministers also discussed their long-term strategy and the idea of making their future investment plans clearer. The group appears to have dropped a suggestion to raise the production ceiling by 500,000 barrels a day, an idea that was floated by some OPEC officials in the days leading to the meeting.

"We will collectively make a pledge to have the spare capacity available if needed, but I don't believe it is needed," Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's oil minister, told reporters.

To illustrate the availability of oil on the market, many here pointed out that the United States Energy Department had recently found buyers for only 11 million barrels of crude oil from the nation's strategic reserves, just a third of the amount it had put on sale.

"It proves there is no need for oil," Mr. Attiyah of Qatar said. "There is a need for products."

Hurricane Katrina crippled the United States' main oil and gas production region, sending energy markets into a tailspin. But perhaps of greater concern for energy markets, it caused the shutdown of four major refineries along the Gulf of Mexico. These refineries, which can process nearly 900,000 barrels a day, or 5 percent of American capacity, are likely to be out of commission for months.

Chevron said Monday that a large refinery damaged by Hurricane Katrina in Pascagoula, Miss., would not be fully operational until mid-November. Under normal operations, the plant, which accounts for about 2 percent of the nation's capacity, processes 325,000 barrels of crude oil a day, the largest amount from the four refineries that are still recovering from Katrina damage.

The refining crunch in the United States caused gasoline supplies to dip, led to spot shortages in some parts of the country and, for a brief period, pushed gasoline prices above $3 a gallon nationwide for the first time.

As a response to that shock, consuming nations dipped into their oil reserves to make up for the production shortfall from the Gulf of Mexico. The crisis prompted the Bush administration to tap into the nation's strategic stocks, something it had been reluctant to do.

The International Energy Agency, which usually provides advice on energy policies to 26 industrialized nations, also activated its emergency oil plan, releasing oil for only the second time in its 29-year history.

Fears Of New Storm Send Oil Soaring (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 20, 2005

With another storm bearing down on the Florida coast and threatening oil production there, oil prices jumped Monday and dragged stocks down.

Worried any higher uptick in oil prices would tax the economy, investors sent the Dow Jones industrial average down 84.31 points to 10,557.63. The Dow is down 2.1% this year.

Tech stocks didn't do much better, either, with the Nasdaq composite index falling 15.09 points to 2145.26. The Nasdaq is down 1.4% this year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 6.89 points to 1231.02. The educational services, computer electronic retail and auto parts industries were the S&P's worst performers on Monday.

Still, the S&P 500 is alone among the three major stock market indexes in being up for the year at 1.6%.

Investors also were concerned about today's Federal Reserve Board statement on the economy and decision on short-term interest rates. But stocks were under pressure mainly because of the approach of Tropical Storm Rita, just weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast. The price of a barrel of oil jumped $4.39 to $67.39 as investors fretted about the supply of the commodity.

The day's selling was “more than anything the news of Rita coming toward the Gulf Coast,” says Andy Brooks, trader at T. Rowe Price. And that left investors to wonder what kind of disruption could be caused by the storm.

“It was a raucous session,” says A.C. Moore, strategist at Dunvegan Associates. Moore says the demand for oil continues to outstrip supply, which is a problem that only economics, not politicians, can resolve. “Commodity prices can do anything when they're out of balance. That's the problem,” he says.

Spinnaker Exploration, an oil-exploration company, soared $15.40 to $64.15 after rival Norsk Hydro offered $65.50 a share, or $2.5 billion, for the company.

·Carnival added $1.75 to $50.78 after the cruise-ship operator reported 12% higher fiscal third-quarter results because of higher ticket prices and greater passenger capacity.

·Russell, a maker of athletic apparel, fell $2.87 to $15.12. The company said it expects to earn 50 cents to 60 cents a share in the third quarter, well below the 66 cents expected by analysts, due in part to shipping problems caused by Katrina. It said 40 containers of goods were lost or damaged because of the storm.

·TBC, a marketer of tires, rose $8.24 to $34.36 after saying it is being bought by rival Sumitomo for $820 million, or $35 a share.

Shares Tumble On Worries Over New Storm And Rates (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

Shares plummeted yesterday as heightened fears of another hurricane hitting some part of the Gulf Coast sent oil prices racing past $67 a barrel and investors grew concerned about the Federal Reserve's meeting today on interest rates.

Wall Street saw some bright spots in merger activity and strong earnings from Nike and Carnival, but the market became increasingly uneasy as surging energy prices threatened consumer spending. Investors also awaited the Fed's decision on whether to raise rates or to halt its string of increases to mitigate any economic slide after Hurricane Katrina.

With an intensifying Tropical Storm Rita nearing Florida's tip and poised to enter the Gulf of Mexico just weeks after Hurricane Katrina's devastation, the market retreated late in the day.

"Front and center would be concerns of the storm approaching tomorrow, of which you're seeing crude oil trading up $4," said Steven Goldman, chief market strategist at Weeden & Company.

Crude oil made its biggest one-day gain ever, even as the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries neared a consensus on allowing sales of two million additional barrels a day to offset a potential supply shortage from recent refinery shutdowns.

By the close of trading, the Dow Jones industrial average had dropped 84.31 points, or 0.79 percent, to 10,557.63. The Dow lost as much as 120.69 points during the session. Broader stock indicators also declined. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 6.89 points, or 0.56 percent, to 1,231.02, and the Nasdaq composite index sank 15.09, or 0.7 percent, to 2,145.26.

The 10-year Treasury note rose by 8/32 to a price of 1001/32, with the yield sliding to 4.25 percent from 4.27 percent on Friday.

Although Wall Street is uncertain what the Fed's decision is likely to be, many analysts are predicting that the central bank will continue lifting rates to stem inflation and will keep that as its main priority despite the widespread economic ripple left by the hurricane.

In corporate news, Nike, the world's biggest shoemaker, said higher sales across the board helped lift its first-quarter profit 32 percent to easily beat Wall Street expectations. Worldwide future orders for products scheduled for delivery through January 2006 grew 11 percent to $4.9 billion, the company added. Nike surged $4.99, to $83.45.

The cruise ship operator Carnival posted a 12 percent gain in third-quarter profit, as revenue swelled from increased ship capacity and ticket prices. The company also said that while the hurricane depressed results in the latest quarter, recent bookings remained strong and average prices were above those of the year before. Carnival added $1.75, to $50.78.

Sirius Satellite Radio raised its projected full-year revenue by $5 million, to $230 million, but the expanded forecast still fell short of analyst targets for $234.5 million. The company maintained estimates for three million subscribers by year-end, up from about 2.1 million as of last week. Sirius fell 35 cents, to $6.70.

Rita Fears Drag On Stocks (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

DOJ_NMG_0006882

Weather charts showing Tropical Storm Rita potentially slicing into the Gulf of Mexico sent a chill through the stock market three weeks after Hurricane Katrina tore through the Gulf Coast. Petroleum-futures prices surged, causing stocks to sink, though a last-minute kept the market from its lows for the day.

Uncertainty about the Federal Reserve's decision on interest rates Tuesday added to investors' anxiety. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 84.31 points to 10557.63. General Motors slid 3.6%. Exxon Mobil gained 1.5% amid the jump in energy prices. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 6.89 to 1231.02 and the Nasdaq Composite Index declined by 15.09 points to 2145.26.

Worries that Rita could disrupt the post-Katrina recovery pushed light, sweet crude up by $4.39, or 7%, to settle at $67.39 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. It was the biggest dollar jump in crude since trading began on the Nymex. The previous record was on Aug. 6, 1990, a few days after Iraq invaded Kuwait, when crude gained $3.56 a barrel. The biggest decline came several months later, as crude plunged $10.56 on Jan. 17, 1991, soon after the U.S. launched the first Gulf War to evict Iraq from Kuwait.

Gasoline and natural-gas prices surged 14% apiece, adding to worries that consumers could be unnerved by sticker shock at the pump and when home-heating bills arrive in the mail as the weather begins to cool.

Gold for December delivery also moved sharply higher, jumping $7.10, or 1.5%, to $470.40 a troy ounce on the Comex division of the Nymex, the highest level since December 1987. Gold has risen more than $10 an ounce in a week amid concerns about inflation in the wake of surging energy prices and government spending plans to rebuild in the Gulf Coast.

Rita is forecast to skirt across the southern tip of Florida and move into the middle of the Gulf by Thursday. That could deal a "potentially devastating blow to our refining capacity again," said Raymond Carbonne, an oil trader at Paramount Options in New York. Fears were heightened by the fact that "we still haven't found out the severity of the damage that Katrina caused," he said.

Selling accelerated in the stock market after Chevron and Royal Dutch Shell said they are evacuating offshore oil and gas rigs in the Gulf. The National Weather Service said Rita will likely grow into a major hurricane as it moves over the warm waters of the Gulf, with landfall likely in Texas or Louisiana.

If energy prices weren't enough, investors also were unnerved ahead of Tuesday's meeting by the Fed. Expectations for a pause in rate increases by the Fed have gone from a 50%-50% chance the week after Katrina hit the Gulf to a less than 10% chance in the days leading up to the policy meeting, according to trading in federal-funds futures. An increase Tuesday would mark the 11th since June 2004, bringing the Fed's target for overnight loans between banks to 3.75%.

Analysts said the surge in gold and oil prices raised the specter of inflation, and virtually confirmed the Fed would raise rates a quarter-point Tuesday. "You've got gold and energy sending out a message: inflation is an issue, and that's what central bankers are paid to keep their eyes on," said Michael Panzner, head of sales trading at Rabo Securities.

In major market action:

Stocks fell. On the Big Board, where 1.5 billion shares traded, 1,052 stocks rose and 2,258 fell Friday. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 1,021 stocks advanced and 2,003 declined.

Bonds gained. The benchmark 10-year Treasury rose 5/32, or $1.56 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.250% early Monday. The 30-year bond added 4/32 to yield 4.550%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced. It was at 111.51 yen, up from 111.36 yen late Friday, while the euro slipped to $1.2137 from $1.2234.

Stock Trackers Become Master Storm Trackers (USAT)

By Adam Shell

NEW YORK — Tracking violent storms is quickly emerging as a new job requirement on Wall Street.

After the massive financial fallout caused by Hurricane Katrina, a growing number of traders, analysts and portfolio managers now view the weather as a major risk factor. The damage to the Gulf Coast's energy infrastructure exposed a vulnerability in the nation's oil and gas supply chain, sparking a sharp rise in the price of gasoline and heating oil and natural gas used to keep homes warm in winter.

With Tropical Storm Rita barreling down on the Florida Keys and likely to gain strength and become a hurricane, it's no surprise that investors are just as interested in where the next hurricane will hit as they are the direction of interest rates. In fact, investors with billions of dollars riding on stocks now spend a good portion of their day tuning into the Weather Channel and monitoring weather-related websites.

“Bottom line is investors are becoming more cognizant of the impact the weather has on stocks,” says hedge fund manager Mort Cohen of Clarion Group. “You have to factor the weather in when picking stocks.”

Adds Peter Cardillo, chief analyst at S.W. Bach: “What happens if we have another Katrina?”

Tracking “strike probabilities” and “wind swaths” is now common practice, given the potential of natural disasters to damage the economy, spark an energy crisis and crimp profits at affected companies.

·Traders at money management firm T. Rowe Price now tune in to the Weather Channel, says head trader Andy Brooks. “Rita is now on the radar screen,” he says. “Trading desks have got to know what is being broadcast and reported on as it happens.”

·Money manager Gary Kaltbaum of Kaltbaum & Associates checks updates every three hours on the National Hurricane Center's website and is constantly looking at satellite pictures of brewing storms. “If the oil rigs and refineries go down, the price of oil will shoot back up,” he says. A barrel of crude soared more than $4 a barrel Monday amid fears Rita would inflict more damage in the Gulf.

·Analysts at Clarion Group regularly track updates from the National Weather Service. The motivation: “We have a lot of money in energy stocks and are thinking of putting more money in shares of manufactured housing stocks,” Cohen says.

Another sign of the intense demand for weather-related insights: Ken Reeves, senior meteorologist at AccuWeather.com, says “weathermen” from his firm made more than 10 appearances Monday on the business cable channel CNBC. Says Cardillo: “You have to keep an eye on the eye of the storm.”

Bond Market Signals Little Faith In Fed To Slow March Of Inflation (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

The bond market has a message for Federal Reserve officials trying to gauge Hurricane Katrina's economic impact: Inflation probably will accelerate no matter what you do.

Today, the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee decides whether to keep raising short-term interest rates to fight inflation or pause for more data on how the economy has fared since Katrina. Most economists expect the Fed to raise its interest-rate target for the 11th time in 15 months -- by a quarter percentage point to 3.75% -- but will read the accompanying statement closely for signs of future moves.

In the bond market, though, investors already are demanding higher returns on longer-term securities -- a sign they expect inflation to heat up as the government, companies and individuals spend billions of dollars to rebuild in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast. "We're about to rebuild a major U.S. metropolitan area," says David Glocke, a Treasury-bond portfolio manager at The Vanguard Group, an asset-management firm in Valley Forge, Penn. "...That's definitely inflationary."

Before Katrina hit, short-term and long-term rates had been converging, a sign that investors expected the Fed's campaign of rate increases to slow the economy or even tip it into recession, which would in turn force the central bank to bring rates back down in the future. But now that convergence -- known as a flattening yield curve -- has reversed: In afternoon trading yesterday, 10-year Treasury notes yielded 0.32 percentage point more than two-year Treasurys, compared with a difference of 0.12 percentage point on Aug. 29.

The "steepening" trend suggests that while investors' expectations for economic growth haven't necessarily changed, they are more concerned about the level of inflation associated with that growth. "If we get through this without a major hit to economic activity, then I think you'd have to be more worried about inflation than before," says Jan Hatzius, senior U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs in New York.

Since Katrina, for example, more investors have come to believe that the Fed will pause in its interest-rate increases this year. In a survey of 22 big Wall Street banks published yesterday, most expected the FOMC to pause at least once at its three remaining meetings this year. Early yesterday, the futures market was assigning a probability of more than 90% to a rate increase today, but closer to 60% for an increase at the next meeting Nov. 1, and much less to a third raise at the Dec. 13 meeting.

The hurricane -- along with Tropical Storm Rita -- has added uncertainty. Katrina's short-term effect on fuel and construction-materials prices will skew inflation data through at least October, making it difficult for the Fed and investors to understand what is happening in the economy.

But even investors who expect the Fed to keep raising its short-term interest-rate target this year believe that the risk of accelerated inflation has increased. "There's a risk that somewhere along the line inflation gets ahead" of the Fed, says Dave MacEwen, chief investment officer for fixed income at American Century Investments, an asset manager based in Mountain View, Calif.

To mitigate the perceived inflation risk, Mr. MacEwen and other money managers have been reducing bets that would benefit from a flatter yield curve and putting on bets that would benefit from a steepening curve.

Treasury Bonds

Prices of Treasury securities firmed modestly yesterday, buoyed by soaring energy prices, though gains were limited ahead of the Fed's policy meeting.

At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note was up 5/32 point, or $1.5625 per $1,000 face value, at 100. Its yield fell to 4.25% from 4.267% Friday. The 30-year bond was up 4/32 point at 112 11/32 to yield 4.550% from 4.557%.

Asset-Backed Securities

Issuers poured more than $10 billion in new supply into the asset-backed market, making up for time lost to last week's annual industry conference in Florida. Securities backed by home-equity debt accounted for about $7 billion of the new deals.

Greenspan And Katrina (WSJ)

Along the way in his long career, Alan Greenspan has been known to follow the price of gold. Not as a gold bug who thinks it is the lodestar of monetary policy, but as one who finds it a useful indicator of inflationary expectations. We hope he's following the barbaric metal that way now, because yesterday it pushed through $467 an ounce at the close in London, to a 17-year high.

This gold surge is probably a response to the speculation that the Federal Reserve might actually make the mistake at its meeting today of pausing in its monetary tightening in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. Yields on the 10-year note have also climbed back up from their Katrina lows, and even stripping out the Katrina energy spike, prices on steel, lumber, cement and other goods have been rising.

Which means easing up now would be exactly the wrong policy. Those urging such an action include carry-traders who fear getting caught playing the yield curve, investors long on housing, and all kinds of well-intentioned folks who simply don't want to see the expansion end. We know how they feel. This market psychology always takes hold amid a Fed-tightening cycle -- and this time it is being exaggerated by the fallout from Katrina.

But the Fed cannot fine-tune economic growth. It has only one job -- maintaining price stability. We've been writing for two years that the Fed has been providing too much liquidity, with negative real interest rates, and even its 250-basis point rise over the past 15 months has not brought rates back to neutrality. Stopping the rate increases now would run the risk of even greater increases later, as price pressures continue to build.

Our guess is that this is not the kind of policy dilemma Mr. Greenspan wants to leave his successor in 2006 and 2007. We also doubt he wants to depart in January having abandoned some of the hard-earned progress against inflation that he and his predecessor Paul Volcker earned since the last time we had an oil shock, in the 1970s. The Fed printed dollars to offset the economic damage from rising oil prices, only to create more inflation and still higher oil prices. The inflationary cycle didn't end until Ronald Reagan backed Mr. Volcker's slam on the brakes.

Katrina's blow will reduce economic output in the third quarter and maybe the fourth, but probably without inducing recession. The economy entered the eye of the hurricane with momentum built up over two years of 4% average GDP growth since the tax cuts of 2003. The rebuilding of the Gulf Coast will again lift GDP as it gains momentum later this year and into next. A rate hike now could actually have the beneficial effect of calming inflation fears and keeping long-term interest rates lower. If the Fed keeps prices stable, the animal spirits of the private sector will do the rest.

Yes, Parallel Tracks To North, But Parallel Tracks Don't Meet (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 - After four years of bitter arguments over whether to negotiate with North Korea or try to engineer its collapse, the accord President Bush grudgingly approved Sunday evening provided the bare minimum - an agreement in principle that the North would end a five-decade pursuit of nuclear weapons, the only card the erratic nation has to play to get the world to pay attention to its demands.

But even to get that, Mr. Bush had to blink slightly, acknowledging that at some point in the future, the United States would discuss with the North building new nuclear facilities - something Washington has said it could never trust the North with.

And the preliminary agreement, as Mr. Bush himself acknowledged, says nothing about when or under what conditions the North would give up all of its nuclear programs, re-enter the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and allow inspections. "We've got to verify whether or not that happens," Mr. Bush said.

For five years now, many of his most conservative advisers have warned that deceit, distrust and broken agreements make an accord like this a hopeless task.

They blocked negotiations for the first few years of his presidency, but in the end, both Mr. Bush and his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, were persuaded that if a confrontation ever occurred with North Korea, they had to be prepared to show that they had made every effort to reach a diplomatic solution.

"The lesson of Iraq," said one senior American official, who is deeply skeptical about the deal, "is that we can never again confront a country about its weapons unless we show that we have tried every available alternative to disarm it."

It is too early to know if the North has made what Ms. Rice often calls a "strategic choice" to give up all its weapons. Some officials say they suspect that the North entered the talks ready to give up its plutonium program, which it "froze" under an agreement with the Clinton administration in 1994, because those facilities are out in the open, impossible to protect if a conflict with the United States erupted.

Under that theory, the North is more interested in protecting a clandestine uranium enrichment program that, the administration says, the North secretly started to evade the provisions of the 1994 agreement. After initially appearing to acknowledge the program when confronted in 2002, the North now denies it exists. It is never explicitly mentioned in the statement signed Monday, though the administration says it is covered by the commitment to "abandoning all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs."

To experts on North Korea, that raises a critical problem. "It's a huge hole in the agreement," said Art Brown, for years the chief Central Intelligence Agency officer in charge of watching North Korea. "If they don't acknowledge they have it - and if they have buried it in some cave - we'll say it's included in the deal and they'll say there is nothing there to give up."

Moreover, the preliminary agreement says nothing about verification. Mr. Bush's aides have insisted that the United States and other nations will conduct their own inspections, rather than rely entirely on international inspectors.

On Monday, officials at the State Department and the intelligence agencies were dusting off a detailed plan to inspect virtually every suspect site. But it is not clear that the North has agreed to this.

"We will need to travel throughout the country, and be given unhindered access," said one senior Bush administration official, who said he approved of the agreement but insisted on speaking anonymously in part because he was raising doubts about what the negotiators had accomplished. "Can you imagine the North Koreans letting us do that?"

International inspectors, who were thrown out by North Korea in 2002, never had free access beyond a few facilities at one plant, at Yongbyon.

Part of the reason Mr. Bush signed the agreement, American and foreign officials said, is that he had to close the breach among his negotiating partners: China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

China drafted the language signed on Monday. Along with South Korea, it has been eager to do anything to forestall a crisis on the Korean peninsula. That is why China insisted that the draft include references to building a nuclear reactor, at an unspecified time, in the agreement. "They said it was the only way the North Koreans would get on board," said one senior official involved in the talks.

The accord is also unlikely to settle the behind-the-scenes administration battles about how hard to squeeze North Korea. From the moment Mr. Bush's team arrived at the White House in 2001, North Korea has been a subject of tremendous internal strife. It was the issue that first separated former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell from Ms. Rice and administration hard-liners who believed the time was ripe to choke off North Korea.

When Ms. Rice succeeded Mr. Powell, she put together her own negotiating team, led by Christopher R. Hill. Because of Ms. Rice's closeness to the president, he was empowered to discuss things his predecessor never could, including new ways to provide energy to North Korea. But the key has been the timing: Ms. Rice and others had complained that Mr. Clinton erred by agreeing to aid North Korea before it disarmed, and that never again would the United States "reward bad behavior."

On Monday Ms. Rice argued that the wording of the agreement implies that North Korea will disarm first."At an appropriate time we are prepared to discuss - discuss" the idea of building a nuclear reactor, she said. She said several times that the discussion would not even begin until North Korea dismantled its weapons program.

So it was a measure of the disagreements that may be on the way that just hours after she spoke North Korea issued a statement saying it demanded the reactors first.

N. Korea, U.S. Both Bend A Bit For A Deal (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

The United States made key concessions to reach a preliminary nuclear agreement with North Korea on Monday, and hard negotiations lie ahead before that country gives up its nuclear weapons programs.

Under the agreement reached in Beijing among six nations, North Korea pledged to abandon “all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs” and return to an international treaty on nuclear non-proliferation and arms inspections. In return, it would get security assurances and economic aid.

The deal, signed by the United States, North Korea, China, South Korea, Japan and Russia, doesn't mention certain U.S. positions, such as its opposition to North Korean efforts to enrich uranium. Those efforts led to the collapse of a U.S.-North Korea agreement in 2002. It refers instead to a 1992 agreement between North and South Korea that barred such activity. North Korea softened a demand for a nuclear reactor for electricity production.

"Both of them blinked," said Jack Pritchard, a former U.S. negotiator with North Korea.

President Bush called the agreement "a wonderful step forward. But now we've got to verify" it.

Representatives from the six nations will meet again in November to work out the details.

A year ago, U.S. negotiators said energy assistance from North Korea's neighbors would come if it accounted for nuclear programs within three months and began to dismantle them. Such language is missing from the new deal, which says the United States will join other nations to provide energy. The agreement also says:

·The United States has no intention of attacking North Korea, and the two countries can "exist peacefully together." Chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill previously rejected such language, which North Korea interprets as a sign the United States will not try to overturn its repressive government.

·The parties agreed to "discuss at an appropriate time" a light-water reactor to produce electricity. Two such reactors were promised under a 1994 agreement intended to halt nuclear weapons work by the North. Work stopped in 2002, and the United States has opposed reviving the project.

Monday's agreement could lead to something like the 1994 deal, said Scott Snyder, a Korea expert at the Washington office of the Asia Foundation, a research group. The Bush administration had long criticized that deal. "This is a very pragmatic approach which was completely absent for the last four years," Snyder said.

Donald Gregg, a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea, praised Hill and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice for making "sensible concessions." U.S. negotiators had less leeway in the first Bush term because then-secretary of State Colin Powell had less influence in the White House, Gregg said.

Though North Korea has agreed to give up nuclear weapons, it's not clear how or when it would do that or how other nations would verify that it had done so, said David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington think tank. The first priority, Albright said, is removing the weapons-grade plutonium North Korea has amassed. His institute estimates that it is enough for five to 13 nuclear weapons.

"There may be less (to the deal) than meets the eye," said Albright, adding that the North Koreans signed the agreement to stave off pressure from China, its chief source of economic aid and trade.

Bush Hails North Korea Nuclear Accord (FT)

By Anna Fifield And Andrew Yeh

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

President George W. Bush on Monday welcomed North Korea's pledge to abandon its nuclear weapons programmes and rejoin the non-proliferation treaty but expressed reservations over whether all parties would keep to their commitments.

Mr Bush said the Korean deal was "a step forward in making this world a more secure place" but insisted "we've got to verify whether or not that happens".

Under the deal, North Korea will receive energy aid and security guarantees in return for abandoning its weapons programmes and allowing United Nations inspectors back into the country. The US and Japan, meanwhile, will start to normalise relations with the communist stronghold.

The wide-ranging, though vague, agreement is the first breakthrough in more than two years of tortuous six-party negotiations and came just as the differences between Pyongyang and Washington seemed intractable.

The deal could breathe new life into the {nuclear non-proliferation treaty and underlines Iran's isolation as it pushes ahead with its nuclear programme.

It also served to prove that Washington and Beijing, which hosted the talks, can co-operate on issues of mutual security interest.

After 20 days of talks in the fourth round of negotiations, China's fifth draft joint statement finally won approval from Japan, Russia, the US and the two Koreas. "The process that led us to this final agreement was all six parties overcoming one mountain after another, one wall after another," said Wu Dawei, Beijing's chief envoy.

Mr Bush said he wanted to the thank the other partners in the six-party dialogue for working together. But he added: "The question is, over time, will all parties adhere to the agreement?"

Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, made clear that the first step under the agreement was for North Korea to end its nuclear programmes.

Analysts said there were likely to be many difficulties in implementing the pact, particularly as few of the fundamental differences between Pyongyang and Washington appeared to have been bridged. Securing an agreement, given the fractious relations between the two protagonists and North Korea's defiant declaration in February that it had become a nuclear state, represents {a big diplomatic milestone.

Christopher Hill, the US's chief negotiator, said the effectiveness of the agreement, and the exact details of how North Korea would abandon its nuclear programmes, would become clear over the next few weeks.

Under the pact, North Korea vowed to abandon all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programmes, return “at an early date” to the NPT and comply with International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards. North Korea withdrew from the NPT and ordered out IAEA inspectors in 2002 after the US accused it of developing nuclear weapons, breaching the 1994 deal forged with the Clinton administration. A fifth round of talks to iron out the details including providing oil, energy aid and security guarantees to North Korea is set to be held in Beijing in early November.

N. Korea, U.S. Gave Ground To Make Deal (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Edward Cody

The Washington Post, September 20, 2005

The unexpected agreement by North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program, announced yesterday in Beijing, followed decisions by both the Pyongyang government and the Bush administration to compromise on positions they had clung to during nearly three years of crisis over North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

The document signed by North Korea, the United States and the other participants in the six-party nuclear disarmament talks opened the way for what all sides say will be lengthy negotiations on the actual dismantling of North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

The breakthrough accord followed a compromise proposed by China aimed at persuading both countries to sign a document of principles. The Bush administration dropped its opposition to North Korea receiving a light-water nuclear reactor in the future, a softening of its position that the demise of the North's nuclear ambitions must be "irreversible." North Korea said it would give up its nuclear weapons and all of its existing nuclear programs, would rejoin the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and would allow inspections again by the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency.

President Bush cautiously welcomed the agreement as "a step forward in making this world a more secure place" but warned that "we expect a verifiable process."

In an immediate demonstration of the difficulty ahead, the official North Korean news agency early today quoted an unnamed Foreign Ministry spokesman as asserting that Pyongyang would not give up its weapons program until it received nuclear reactors from the United States. A State Department official shrugged off the statement, saying the focus would remain on the Beijing declaration.

The declaration came nearly three years after the Bush administration confronted the Pyongyang government with accusations of a secret uranium enrichment program, which U.S. officials said nullified a Clinton-era agreement to freeze its nuclear activities. Since then, in a separate program, North Korea is estimated by U.S. officials to have harvested enough plutonium for at least nine nuclear weapons. The North has declared it possesses nuclear arms, but no weapons tests have been detected.

Several key issues were deferred or avoided through diplomatic sleight of hand, such as the Bush administration's demand that North Korea admit the existence of the uranium project. The agreement contained no clear timeline for when the North would give up its nuclear programs, or how.

But by finally signing an agreement, North Korea took a major step toward securing international acceptance. The move, analysts said, will allow the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il, to hang on to power for the foreseeable future and will gradually open the nation to foreign investment and avoid a sudden collapse of one of the world's most isolated nations.

For the Bush administration, analysts said, the agreement was welcome at a time when the war in Iraq has lost support at home and negotiations with Iran over its nuclear programs have sputtered. In addition, the president's approval ratings are low in the wake of his administration's response to Hurricane Katrina.

"It's an all-front crisis for the Bush administration," said Kongdan Oh, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program at the Institute for Defense Analyses in Alexandria. "I think they thought, hey, North Korea is a small country and maybe we can handle it if we put it to the side for a while." But she said she did not believe North Korea would ever give up nuclear weapons, "its platinum trump card."

Surprisingly, diplomats said, the main sticking point in this round of negotiations was not persuading North Korea to make the paramount commitment to give up nuclear weapons and research. Rather, they explained, it was North Korea's side demand for a light-water reactor to produce electricity in return for giving up the other programs.

The United States adamantly opposed the demand, saying the North could not be trusted because it already had converted the Yongbyon reactor into a source of weapons-grade plutonium. The only possible outcome, U.S. negotiators said, was agreement to complete, verified abandonment of all nuclear programs.

China sought to bridge the gap, playing its leadership role as sponsor of the talks. Chinese diplomats proposed language according North Korea the right to a reactor for electricity production but implying that it could invoke that right only after dismantling its weapons program and rejoining the international nuclear inspection regime.

For two days, U.S. diplomats refused to embrace the Chinese suggestion. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, told reporters several times he was insisting that all ambiguity be removed, refusing to open the way for problems in interpretation.

During the standoff, Hill was in frequent telephone contact with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and Rice in turn discussed what to do with other senior officials in the U.S. government, said a senior U.S. diplomat involved in the negotiations, joking that their involvement could be seen as "adult supervision." As China became increasingly firm that the compromise on the table was the best bargain possible, he said, the administration finally relented on Sunday.

"We didn't want to lose the agreement over this," he explained. The decision to make a final concession was approved at the highest level of U.S. government, he added, referring to President Bush.

U.S. officials stressed that significant obstacles remained in securing the ultimate end of North Korea's programs, and they insisted that any concessions were relatively minor. The Bush administration's Korea policy has long been troubled by conflicts between officials skeptical that a diplomatic solution could be found and those eager to strike a deal. Those conflicts could reemerge in talks over implementation.

The administration envisions what one senior official described yesterday as a "very intrusive verification regime that will go well beyond what is required" by the IAEA. "It's going to be tough getting there," he said. "This is an important step, but I don't think anyone is overselling this" agreement as a major diplomatic achievement.

Bush administration officials are wary of any comparisons between this week's agreement and a failed pact reached with North Korea by the Clinton administration in 1994. That agreement called for the building of two light-water reactors.

Before expelling international inspectors in late 2002, the secretive North was reluctant to allow access for U.N. inspection teams assigned to monitor its nuclear programs under the 1994 accord. Kim's government has even restricted World Food Program officials from monitoring distribution of food aid.

The statement was signed by North Korea, the United States and the four other participants in the talks -- China, Russia, Japan and South Korea. The six-nation talks have been sponsored by China since August 2003. But they made little progress until Rice became secretary of state this year and assigned Hill, who played a key role in negotiating the Dayton accords that ended the Bosnia war.

Diplomats from the six nations recessed immediately after their signing session, promising to return to Beijing in early November to start talks in which Hill said verification procedures would be the priority. He indicated the next step would be determining how the United States and other nations can confirm that North Korea is shutting down its Yongbyon research reactor and dismantling its weapons program.

Hill, in a telephone interview as he was changing planes in Chicago, said, "Verification is a big deal that has yet to be worked out." He said the importance of the agreement was that "we got them on the record in an international deal. . . . I am not prepared to be cynical about it."

Specialists pointed out that North Korean diplomats were likely to seek immediate economic and energy aid in return for each step toward verification.

"At the moment, we still can't be sure of Kim's intentions," said Hajime Izumi, a professor at Japan's University of Shizuoka. "They have bought some time to consider seriously whether they will give up all their weapons and programs . . . but there are so many points along the road in which this process could again reach a stalemate that it's simply too early to celebrate."

U.S. officials say North Korea in an October 2002 meeting acknowledged the existence of a secret uranium enrichment program designed to become another source of weapons material. North Korea has since denied that.

Although that issue was not mentioned in the document, U.S. officials said it is covered by the pledge to dismantle "all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs" and by a separate reference to a 1992 agreement with South Korea, which prohibited uranium enrichment.

A good first step, Hill suggested, would be shutting down the Yongbyon reactor, which produces plutonium. Under the accord signed yesterday, it must be taken apart, he said, so it makes little sense to keep it running. "The time to turn it off is about now," he added.

One long-term incentive in the joint agreement was the call for the United States and Japan to "take steps to normalize relations with North Korea" if the Pyongyang government gives up its weapons program. Such a historic rapprochement could mean billions of dollars worth of economic assistance from Japan alone in belated World War II-era reparations.

U.S.-Korean Deal On Arms Leaves Key Points Open (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn And David E. Sanger

BEIJING, Sept. 19 - After a tense weekend of heated debate within the Bush administration, the lead American negotiator with North Korea made one last call to Washington at noon on Monday, Beijing time, and then signed a statement of principles that committed North Korea, in black and white, to give up "all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs."

But the negotiator, Christopher Hill, had misgivings because the vaguely worded agreement left unaddressed the date disarmament would happen, and hinted at a concession to North Korea that President Bush and his aides had long said they would never agree to: discussing at an appropriate time providing North Korea with a civilian nuclear power plant, senior administration officials said.

The plant, a light-water reactor, cannot produce fuel for nuclear bombs as efficiently as North Korea's existing nuclear plants, but would keep the country in the nuclear business.

All day Monday, Washington time, the Bush administration said the only appropriate time would be well after North Korea dismantled all its nuclear facilities and allowed highly intrusive inspections of the country. On Monday evening, less than 24 hours after the deal was signed, North Korea declared that the United States "should not even dream" that it would dismantle its nuclear weapons before it receives a new nuclear plant.

As described by senior Bush administration officials and Asian participants in the talks, Mr. Bush agreed to eventual discussions on providing a nuclear plant only after China turned over a draft of an agreement and told the Americans they had hours to decide whether to take it or leave it.

The North Koreans, dependent on China for food and oil, were unhappy but ready to sign. "They said, 'Here's the text, and we're not going to change it, and we suggest you don't walk away,' " said one senior American official at the center of the debate.

Several officials, who would not allow their names to be used because they did not want to publicly discuss Mr. Bush's political challenges, noted that Mr. Bush is tied down in Iraq, consumed by Hurricane Katrina, and headed into another standoff over Iran's nuclear program. The agreement, they said, provides him with a way to forestall, at least for now, a confrontation with another member of what he once famously termed "the axis of evil."

So after two days of debates that reached from Mr. Bush's cabin in Camp David to Condoleezza Rice's suite at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York to Tokyo, Moscow and Seoul, Mr. Bush gave the go-ahead on Sunday evening, once he had returned to the White House, to signing a preliminary accord with Kim Jong Il, a leader he has said he detests.

Had he decided to let the deal fall through, participants in the talks from several countries said, China was prepared to blame the United States for missing a chance to bring a diplomatic end to the confrontation.

The debate over signing the agreement reflected the fact that the North Koreans drove a tough bargain. The agreement has the potential to generate good will for North Korea, increase the aid it receives and possibly reduce its incentive to dismantle its nuclear programs anytime soon.

"The risk of this agreement is exactly what many hawks in Washington had warned about," said Peter Beck of the International Crisis Group in Seoul. "You reduce the sense of urgency and let people grow comfortable with the status quo."

Proponents of the deal say such fears are misplaced. They argue that the six-nation talks, involving China, Russia, South Korea and Japan as well as North Korea and the United States, exerted heavy pressure on the North to adhere to international norms.

All the benefits North Korea was promised in the agreement, including economic aid, security commitments, a possible normalization of relations with the United States, and a large infusion of electricity from South Korea, will not flow until it rejoins the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and readmits international nuclear inspectors.

In the end, participants in the discussions said, Mr. Bush decided he had little choice but to sign. He concluded several years ago that there were no acceptable military options for taking out the North's two separate nuclear programs.

Mr. Bush sounded cautious about it on Monday after a meeting in the Cabinet Room. "Now there is a way forward," he said. "They have said, in principle, that they will abandon their weapons programs. And what we have said is great, that's a wonderful step forward, but now we've got to verify whether or not that happens."

His caution may reflect the fact that the accord, the culmination of two years of difficult negotiation, still left the administration short of its goal, requiring two major concessions that will take months, maybe years, to fully resolve.

The accord makes no mention of the Bush administration's contention that North Korea has a secret, underground program to use enriched uranium to produce nuclear bomb fuel. North Korea has denied trying to produce nuclear fuel through enriched uranium, though it has acknowledged using plutonium from its nuclear reactor at Yongbyon for that purpose.

A nuclear program that depends on enriched uranium, like the one that made Pakistan a nuclear power, is much harder to monitor than a plutonium program.

Intelligence assessments, partly based on information from Seoul, that North Korea was building a secret uranium program were the basis of the administration's declaration in 2002 that North Korea had violated the terms of a 1994 agreement with the Clinton administration to end its nuclear efforts. That began the standoff that prompted North Korea to withdraw from the nonproliferation treaty, expel international inspectors, restart its reactor at Yongbyon, and claim that it had expanded its arsenal of atomic bombs. Intelligence agencies say North Korea may now have fuel for six or eight weapons, but that is an educated guess, they concede.

Despite that history, the new agreement does not explicitly address the existence of a uranium program. North Korea still denies having one, despite growing evidence that it at least tried to develop bomb fuel that way with Pakistan's help.

A senior administration official said the uranium program was covered by the agreement because it required North Korea to dismantle all of its existing nuclear facilities, not specific plants or labs. But the accord did not require North Korea to own up to what the administration had described as its biggest deception, meaning that unless the North admits to the program in a declaration of all its nuclear facilities, inspectors would have to work to uncover the uranium program in an adversarial way down the road.

The second concession involved the North Korean demand that it receive a light-water nuclear reactor as a down payment for scrapping its weapons program.

Allowing North Korea to have a light-water reactor raises what for the Bush administration are unwelcome parallels with the 1994 Clinton administration agreement, which several administration officials, including Ms. Rice, had described as deeply flawed. The 1994 accord promised North Korea two light-water reactors in exchange for freezing its nuclear program. Construction on a site for the reactors began in the 1990's, but the reactors were never delivered. The United States said Monday that the consortium that provided those reactors would go out of business at the end of the year, meaning any new deal would have to begin from scratch.

Mr. Hill, in an interview, said that the administration "didn't want to see any mention" of providing North Korea with a light-water reactor in the statement of principles. But the Chinese included it. The United States also balked at the use of the vague term "appropriate" to describe the timing. South Korea, Russia and China were happy to accept that language, because it left open the question of when the North would receive the nuclear reactor, officials of several countries said.

To break the impasse, Ms. Rice came up with a compromise during meetings on Saturday afternoon with her South Korean and Japanese counterparts. Each country, she suggested, would issue separate statements describing their understanding of the deal, with a specificity that is not in the agreement itself. The South Koreans and Japanese went along with the idea, though South Korea, one official said, complained that it would "sour the atmosphere." Russia and China issued vaguer statements that left unclear the sequence of events.

As this unfolded over the weekend, the Chinese increased pressure on the United States to sign - or take responsibility for a breakdown in the talks.

"At one point they told us that we were totally isolated on this and that they would go to the press," and explain that the United States sank the accord, the senior administration official said.

In the end, it was not necessary. The American delegation surprised some of the other parties on Monday morning with word that it could accept the agreement, sealing a deal.

North Korea Pledges To Exchange Nukes For Other Benefits (KRT)

By Tim Johnson

Knight Ridder, September 20, 2005

BEIJING - In a turnabout that came suddenly after years of failed talks, North Korea on Monday pledged to scrap its nuclear weapons in exchange for energy, trade and security benefits and steps toward diplomatic relations with the United States and Japan.

North Korea also said it would rejoin a global nonproliferation treaty, and let international inspectors ensure compliance. Around the region, leaders hailed the surprise agreement. South Korea's leader called it "epoch-making." A senior Chinese diplomat applauded envoys from six nations for "overcoming one mountain after another, one wall after another."

"We had a great day today," said the chief U.S. negotiator, Christopher Hill. "As you all know, it wasn't easy. But important things often don't come easily."

The pledge by North Korea, once condemned by the Bush administration as part of an "axis of evil," along with Iran and pre-war Iraq, marked an apparent turning point for the Korean Peninsula, which remains divided, heavily militarized and technically in a state of war half a century after it was engulfed in conflict.

In return for dismantling its nuclear programs, energy-starved North Korea won commitments of huge amounts of electricity from South Korea, economic cooperation from other nations and promises from Washington to "exist peacefully" with Pyongyang.

U.S. intelligence officials say North Korea harbors between six and nine nuclear weapons. As recently as last week, the North said it would build more nuclear weapons if other nations did not concede to its demand for a light-water nuclear reactor, worth $2 to $3 billion, to generate electricity. The Bush administration fears Pyongyang might sell one of its nuclear bombs to a terrorist group.

As recently as over the weekend, the talks appeared on the cusp of failure. As the clock ticked by, Hill announced that he would leave for Washington Monday afternoon. Negotiators then reached a breakthrough.

A 17-paragraph "agreement of principles" said that China, Russia, the United States, Japan and South Korea would "discuss at an appropriate time the subject of the provision of light-water reactor" to North Korea, also known as the DPRK.

"What is an appropriate time?" Hill said in a news briefing. "The appropriate time comes when the DPRK gets rid of its nuclear weapons, gets rid of its nuclear programs, comes back into the (Non-proliferation Treaty) and comes back with full (International Atomic Energy Agency) safeguards."

The breakthrough marked a major success for China, which has hosted the six-party talks since 2003, in a region that has seen growing tensions and rivalries.

Why North Korea agreed to dismantle its nuclear programs, after four failed rounds of six-party talks over two years, was not immediately clear.

A throng of journalists and cameramen waited outside the imposing North Korean Embassy in Beijing late Monday, waiting for a news conference that never materialized.

The agreement marked the first time North Korea has signed a document pledging "the verifiable denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula" since 2002, when it admitted to the United States it had broken a 1994 accord to cease development of nuclear weapons.

Acknowledging a secret weapons program, North Korea expelled International Atomic Energy Agency monitors and pulled out of a global nonproliferation regime.

In February, Pyongyang confirmed that it had developed nuclear weapons.

Envoys from China, Russia, Japan, the United States and South Korea, all parties to six-nation talks that began in 2003, signed Monday's agreement.

In exchange for North Korea agreeing to destroy its nuclear weapons and halt all nuclear programs, the other five nations promised cooperation "in the fields of energy, trade and investment." The agreement said the United States affirms it "has no nuclear weapons on the Korean Peninsula" and "has no intention to attack or invade" North Korea.

Both the United States and Japan agreed to "take steps to normalize their relations" with North Korea, but no timetable for diplomatic normalization was announced.

The six countries agreed also to discuss setting up a new multilateral security forum for Northeast Asia, separate from the six-nation talks.

Diplomats said the next round of talks, set for early November, would establish a sequence of phased actions, designed to ensure thorough action by North Korea while rewarding the nation with incentives.

South Korean Unification Minister Chung Dong-young cited his nation's offer of two million kilowatts of electric power to the North, first made in July, along with Washington's pledge to normalize relations with Pyongyang as key to the outcome.

Washington's flexibility in moving "to normalize North Korea-U.S. relations can be viewed as an achievement of the Bush administration," Chung said in Seoul, according to the state Yonhap news agency.

In Hill's closing statement to the talks, he reaffirmed Washington's willingness to establish relations with Pyongyang but also said the United States has "serious concerns" about human rights abuses, biological and chemical weapons development, terrorism, and illicit activities by North Korea's Stalinist regime.

The U.S. signing of the agreement "should in no way be interpreted as meaning we accept all aspects of the DPRK's system, human rights situation or treatment of its people. We intend to sit down and make sure that our concerns in these areas are addressed," Hill said. Since North Korea is entering the agreement voluntarily, Hill said the United States would not push for forceful weapons inspections across the nation.

"We do not plan to go out on the landscape of the DPRK and start hunting for nuclear facilities. We expect those to be shown to us, and we expect to move quickly," Hill said. "This is absolutely in the DPRK's interest, the sooner the better, and I think they know that."

North Korea's Agreement To Scrap Its Nukes (CSM)

By Donald Kirk And Howard Lafranchi

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA; AND WASHINGTON - The most protracted talks over the standoff on the Korean peninsula since the Korean War ended in 1953 concluded Monday with a facesaving "statement of principles."

North Korea agreed to give up its "existing nuclear weapons" and return to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The United States joined others at the six-party talks in expressing "respect" for North Korea's claim to "the right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy," and offering energy assistance and economic cooperation.

The agreement skirts key issues, such as the timing of concessions, that will be addressed when talks resume in November. But the deal is seen as a major victory for international diplomacy, with a pariah country opting for cooperation and assistance - and ultimately survival - over confrontation. The development, some say, could lead to steady change on the Korean peninsula.

"This is a Libya-style deal," says Joseph Cirincione, of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, referring to Libya's 2003 pledge to give up weapons of mass destruction. "North Korea realized it has more to gain economically, politically, and diplomatically by giving up its nuclear weapons program than by keeping them."

The deal is seen by some analysts as a clear victory for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's diplomatic approach over administration forces favoring a more confrontational approach.

Mohammed ElBaradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, cited the agreement as proof that "dialogue can work" - an example he indicated might apply to Iran.

The White House welcomed the accord but said Pyongyang must live up to its obligations and dismantle its nuclear programs.

President Bush, who three years ago questioned whether it was possible to verify any deal with North Korea's leader Kim Jong Il, called the North Korean commitment a "step forward" but said North Korea needed to realize "We're serious about this and that we expect there to be a verifiable process." The question, he said, is "over time, will all parties adhere to the agreement?"

Chief US negotiator Christopher Hill called on the North to shut down its main reactor complex as a sign of good faith.

The six-party agreement - coupled with a promise to discuss a suspended light-water nuclear energy project - came just a week after Mr. Hill declared that North Korea's insistence on the right to nuclear energy for peacetime purposes was "a nonstarter."

Hill, who led the US delegation throughout the fourth round of the talks that began in Beijing in July, joined others in signing off on the statement after intense pressure from South Korea and talks with top US officials. The final statement was drafted by China, which hosted the talks beginning in February 2003.

South Korean leaders, avidly pursuing reconciliation with North Korea, were ecstatic about the statement, even as they acknowledged the need for more talks - and action - to bring about a final agreement.

The agreement comes after an extended period of softening rhetoric. Mr. Bush, in his State of the Union address in 2002, famously included North Korea in an "axis of evil," along with Iraq and Iran, and Ms. Rice in January, before she became secretary of state, identified North Korea as an "outpost of tyranny."

No such comments, however, have emanated from US officials in Washington since then, with the US making pointed statements that it respected the North's sovereignty and had no intention of attacking the country.

But contentious issues remain. In Beijing Monday, Hill expressed "serious concerns" about human rights and other issues he said must be addressed for the two countries to move beyond decades of enmity.

"The US acceptance of the joint statement should in no way be interpreted as meaning we accept all aspects of [North Korea's] system, human rights situation or treatment of its people," Hill said in a closing statement.

Still, analysts in Seoul say that Hill essentially yielded to North - and South - Korean demands in a deal that will enable North Korea to keep pressing for light water nuclear energy reactors as promised by the 1994 Geneva framework agreement under which the North gave up its program for producing nuclear warheads with plutonium.

That deal fell apart after a senior North Korean diplomat appeared to have acknowledged to Hill's predecessor, James Kelly, in 2002 the existence of a secret uranium enrichment program.

The North is expected to demand fast action on a statement of "willingness" on the part of all the parties - China, Japan, and Russia as well as South Korea and the US - to provide energy assistance.

The statement also contained another significant nod to the North - that the US and North Korea "take steps to normalize relations."

A central point of later negotiation will be the question of who does what first in terms of dismantlement or economic assistance.

Darryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association in Washington, says that while the statement does not put the issue to rest, it hints at how it will be addressed by saying "coordinated steps [will be taken] in line with commitment for commitment, action for action."

But the agreement, he adds, is only the beginning of a difficult road ahead. The accord "fails to do what the 1994 agreement framework also failed to do - and that is to really settle the issue of North Korea's insistence on light-water nuclear energy capabilities."

It essentially "kicks the issue down the road," he says. He adds that "this may be the wise way to deal with it" for now. "But it's still something - a big thing - they will need to tackle."

Diplomacy At Work (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

For years now, foreign policy insiders have pointed to North Korea as the ultimate nightmare, the ongoing worst-case scenario for an international crisis: a closed, hostile and paranoid dictatorship with an aggressive nuclear weapons program. Very few people could envision a successful outcome. And yet North Korea agreed in principle this week to dismantle its nuclear weapons program, return to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, abide by the treaty's safeguards and admit international inspectors.

Diplomacy, it seems, does work after all.

The agreement signed yesterday, if all the details can be satisfactorily filled in and then carried out, is a huge win for the United States as well as a fair deal for North Korea. Its achievement became possible when Washington abandoned the confrontational tactics and name-calling associated with its former top antiproliferation official, John Bolton, and gave serious negotiation a chance. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice deserves most of the credit for that switch, which was made with exceptional skill by America's top negotiator at the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill.

The agreement appears to vindicate those who argued all along that North Korea wanted to end its costly diplomatic isolation and ensure the survival of its current regime, and that it was using its nuclear weapons programs as a bargaining chip. Now North Korea must follow through on its commitments. If it does, it should be accepted as a sovereign member of the international community, although no one is obliged to keep silent about its horrific human rights violations.

The biggest winner of all from yesterday's agreement may well be the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty itself. If North Korea returns to the treaty, it will bind every country in the world save India, Pakistan and Israel. The Bush administration, which has spent more than four years discounting the importance of international agreements, has rediscovered the safeguards and rewards of peaceful international diplomacy in general and this vital treaty in particular.

North Korea Agrees To Give Up Nuclear Arms (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough and Carla Anne Robbins

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

After three years of threats and stalemate, North Korea pledged to give up its atomic weapons and abandon its existing nuclear programs in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees from the U.S. and its Asian neighbors.

A final deal ending Pyongyang's atomic ambitions is a long way off. Progress will require sweeping concessions from Pyongyang, including intrusive inspections to ensure the dismantling of its facilities. It will also require important concessions from the Bush administration. As part of yesterday's preliminary agreement, the U.S. said it would forswear hostile actions against the North, eventually move toward normalizing relations and "discuss at an appropriate time" Pyongyang's demand for a light-water nuclear reactor.

On Tuesday morning in Asia, North Korea's foreign ministry issued a statement casting doubt on the country's willingness to act soon. A ministry spokesman said the U.S. "should not even dream" Pyongyang will give up its nuclear deterrent before America provides a reactor.

Washington has said before that the only appropriate time to discuss the issue is after the North has dismantled its nuclear programs and rejoined international arms-control agreements. Even then, officials say, there is no guarantee the U.S. would fund a reactor project.

The U.S. commitment to talk about light-water reactors, brokered by the Chinese, salvaged the negotiations. Until now, Washington had argued that the North might try to divert even limited technology to weapons use.

All sides' sincerity will be severely tested. A round of talks scheduled for early November will grapple with contentious questions, including getting Pyongyang to declare the extent of its atomic activities and striking a verification deal.

Notably, yesterday's declaration made no specific mention of the North's alleged uranium-enrichment efforts. Pyongyang insists that its weapons program is solely plutonium-based. The U.S. insists it also has a secret program to manufacture weapons-grade uranium -- and that, too, will have to be dismantled.

Diplomats will also have to grapple with the timing of the North's steps versus the rewards it will reap and the intrusiveness of outside verification. A deal could founder on any of those questions.

Even a preliminary agreement is a remarkable turnaround for North Korea, which declared itself a nuclear-armed state earlier this year. A few months ago, U.S. officials were warning the North might test a weapon -- a move they feared could set off proliferation across Asia.

It also marked a shift for the Bush administration, which before the summer rejected nearly all concessions as appeasement. The change can be attributed in good part to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who embraced the diplomatic effort and empowered negotiator Christopher Hill to consider compromises.

The deal also is an implicit acknowledgment that the U.S. has no real military options -- especially in the midst of the war in Iraq -- and little chance of persuading China and South Korea, the North's main patrons, to impose economic sanctions. The six-party talks also include Japan and Russia.

By demonstrating Washington's diplomatic bona fides, yesterday's agreement could strengthen the U.S.-European push to refer Iran's nuclear program to the United Nations Security Council for possible punishment. Still, Washington hard-liners are likely to remain skeptical. Mr. Bush responded cautiously, telling reporters, "part of the way forward is for the North Koreans to understand we're serious about this and that we expect there to be a verifiable process."

In the joint statement, the North Koreans "committed to abandoning all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs" and to return "at an early date" to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. That would mean a return of U.N. nuclear monitors. But a senior U.S. official said that Washington would insist on a far more intrusive inspection regime.

In return, the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea said they are willing to provide energy assistance and promote economic cooperation with the North. The U.S. also committed to existing "peacefully" with the North and to "take steps to normalize" relations.

The White House has been extremely critical of the Clinton administration's deal to provide Pyongyang with light-water reactors in exchange for freezing and then dismantling its plutonium-weapons program. U.S. officials were quick to point out the differences in this deal. Ms. Rice insisted even a theoretical discussion would have to await a verified dismantling of the North's entire nuclear program.

In a closing statement, however, the North's top negotiator, Kim Kye Gwan, said light-water reactors were the key to any future dialogue and that Pyongyang shouldn't have to wait.

N. Korea's Reactor Demand Could Be A Deal-Breaker (LAT)

By Barbara Demick, Mark Magnier And Sonni Efron

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2005

SEOUL — Less than 24 hours after diplomats announced a breakthrough pact to eliminate nuclear arms in North Korea, the isolated communist state threw cold water on the deal today, saying it would not abandon its weapons program until the United States gives it a light-water nuclear reactor.

North Korea's demand could be a deal breaker. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator at the six-nation nuclear talks, made it clear at the opening of negotiations in Beijing last week that the idea of providing North Korea with a reactor before disarmament would be a "nonstarter."

After four rounds of discussions spanning several years, the U.S., North and South Korea, Japan, Russia and China said Monday that they had agreed on a vaguely worded plan under which North Korea promised to dismantle its nuclear weapons in return for energy assistance, eventual U.S. and Japanese diplomatic recognition and a pledge by Washington that it would not attack the country.

The agreement also said the U.S. and other nations would discuss giving North Korea a light-water reactor for generating electricity, though it skirted the question of when. It said only that the possibility would be considered "at an appropriate time."

But the North Koreans made it clear today that they are in no mood to defer their reward.

In a blunt statement, North Korea's official KCNA news service warned that "the U.S. should not even dream of the issue of [North Korea's] dismantlement of its nuclear deterrent before providing" a light-water reactor, which it called "a physical guarantee for confidence-building."

Should the United States insist on the dismantling of North Korea's atomic weapons before the provision of light-water reactors, the statement said, "there will be no change in the nuclear issue."

Even though difficulties were expected to arise in the coming months as diplomats sought to iron out the details of Monday's pact, the speed with which the Pyongyang regime punctured the celebratory mood was surprising.

Late Monday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack made a terse statement about the North Korean demand, telling reporters in New York, "This is not the agreement that they signed, and we'll give them some time to reflect."

In Washington, experts said that although North Korea's statement did not completely annul what was achieved in Beijing, it would not help the next round of talks, scheduled for November.

"I don't think it blows up the deal. What it does is underline how difficult the process remains," said Robert J. Einhorn, who was a top player in North Korean negotiations with the Clinton administration.

Einhorn pointed out that the document signed in Beijing was only the vaguest statement of shared principles. "This wasn't a big substantive reconciliation. This was an agreement to set aside a disagreement and move ahead with the talks."

Gordon L. Flake, a North Korean specialist at the Mansfield Foundation, dismissed the KCNA statement as "normal North Korean negotiating behavior." He noted that past statements carried by the official news service proved unreliable as indicators of what North Korean leader Kim Jong Il really intended.

North Korea Hedges On Nuclear Deal (WT/AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

SEOUL -- North Korea said today that it would not dismantle its nuclear-weapons program until the United States first provides an atomic energy reactor, casting doubt on its commitment to a breakthrough agreement reached at international arms talks.

The North's Foreign Ministry made the surprise demand a day after it had agreed at six-nation talks in Beijing to give up its arms efforts.

The North insisted during arms talks that began last week in Beijing that it be given a light-water reactor, a type less easily diverted for weapons use, in exchange for abandoning nuclear weapons. The agreement reached at the talks' end yesterday in Beijing -- the first since the negotiations began in August 2003 -- said the six countries in the negotiations will discuss the reactor issue "at an appropriate time."

Both the United States and Japan, members of the six-nation disarmament talks, rejected the North's latest demand.

"This is not the agreement that they signed, and we'll give them some time to reflect," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

The Beijing agreement had called for the North to abandon its arms efforts and accept inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in exchange for energy, economic and security aid.

But the North's statement today indicated that it was again raising the light-water reactor (LWR) demand as a prerequisite for disarming, rejoining the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and signing safeguards agreement with the IAEA.

"The U.S. should not even dream of the issue of [North Korea's] dismantlement of its nuclear deterrent before providing LWRs," the North's Foreign Ministry said in a statement carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

U.S. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli had emphasized earlier in Washington that the "appropriate time" for discussing the reactor meant only after the North came into compliance with the other conditions.

During the years of debate over its weapons program, the communist nation has sometimes given confusing or dramatic statements as it publicly maneuvers for negotiating leverage.

The North's latest position is likely to be a major sticking point in talks slated to begin in early November on implementing yesterday's agreement.

The North had demanded during the six-nation talks in Beijing -- involving China, Japan, Russia, the United States and the two Koreas -- that it be allowed to keep a civilian nuclear program for power generation after it disarms.

But the United States strongly opposed the demand, and yesterday's agreement only acknowledged that the North had "stated" its claim to that right.

The administration of President Bush has opposed anything resembling a 1994 U.S.-North Korea agreement, which promised the North two light-water reactors for power. That project stalled amid the current crisis that broke out in late 2002 over the North's resumed nuclear-weapons program.

The deal reached in Beijing yesterday won both praise and words of caution from Mr. Bush, who questioned whether the communist state would keep its word.

Pyongyang had said it would abandon its nuclear programs and readmit international inspectors in exchange for economic aid, energy subsidies and a promise from Washington that it was not planning to attack the North.

However, the statement of "principles" -- the product of two years of intense negotiating -- had skirted the central issue of North Korea's demand for a civil nuclear program, which Washington opposes.

In Washington, a restrained Mr. Bush called the three-page accord "a formula that we all hope works."

"They have said -- in principle -- that they will abandon their weapons programs," Mr. Bush told reporters after a meeting of his Homeland Security Council. "And what we have said is, 'Great. That's a wonderful step forward.' But now we've got to verify whether that happens."

At the United Nations, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "We will have to tackle, I'm sure, quite difficult issues of verification of the dismantlement of the North Korean nuclear-weapons programs and other nuclear programs."

U.S. intelligence agencies still know very little about North Korea's covert uranium-enrichment program. It was the disclosure of the uranium program in October 2002 that triggered the most recent crisis on the Korean Peninsula.

But the Beijing deal was hailed by China and South Korea, both of whom viewed a clash between the United States and North Korea with deep unease.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun had called the deal "epoch-making" and "a critical opportunity to resolve the North's nuclear issue."

Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia Christopher Hill, the lead U.S. negotiator at the talks, told reporters in Beijing that any talk of a new North Korean civilian nuclear-energy program would have to wait until IAEA inspectors certified that the old programs were gone.

Until then, he said, talk of a "peaceful" North nuclear program "is really to talk theory rather than facts."

In return, the statement said that the North would be given energy aid and that a "permanent peace regime" for the Korean Peninsula would be discussed "at a separate forum."

L. Gordon Flake, executive director of the Washington-based Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs, said that although verification would be critical, that the North had promised to abandon even "existing nuclear programs," was a far more sweeping concession than expected.

Diplomacy And Double Talk (LAT)

North Korea has always been one of the sternest tests of the Bush administration's diplomacy, and in the space of 24 hours on Monday it showed why. In the morning the communist state agreed to give up its nuclear program, which the president hailed as "a wonderful first step." But by nightfall Pyongyang seemed to have changed its mind, leaving the administration with a sadly familiar lament: That's not what they told us.

The confusion was not entirely unexpected, given North Korea's history of erratic behavior. And though the Bush administration's handling of North Korea has hardly been a model of diplomacy, the president can claim some vindication for insisting on multilateral talks, instead of agreeing to one-on-one negotiations.

The administration and Pyongyang have been engaged in talks for nearly three years, and the latest round of negotiations, like the rest, included four other nations with an interest in peace and stability in the region: China, South Korea, Japan and Russia. Under a pact agreed to on Monday morning, North Korea basically agreed to end its nuclear weapons programs in exchange for economic and energy assistance. Then, on Monday night, Pyongyang said "there would be no change in the nuclear issue" — meaning it would not dismantle its programs — unless the U.S. provided it with a light-water reactor. The U.S. and Japan have rightly opposed that demand, saying that North Korea cannot be trusted to use nuclear material for peaceful purposes. The morning agreement avoided the question by saying it would be discussed "at an appropriate time."

Both the U.S. and North Korea have had their moments of intransigence in this process, but Pyongyang has been more reliably unreasonable. That is why the Bush administration wanted to involve other nations in the talks; not only would they expose Pyongyang's paranoia to a wider audience, they would make it harder for North Korea to deny any agreement it did make.

Reaction to North Korea's pronouncement proved the value of the arrangement. Japan and South Korea both said North Korea should honor its morning commitments, as did U.S. diplomats. The evening's developments put more pressure on China to keep North Korea in line. It was the Chinese who kept both the U.S. and Pyongyang involved in the negotiations when they faltered.

Even its most ardent supporters freely acknowledged that Monday morning's agreement was more a statement of principles than a set of goals; the difficult work of applying those principles would begin at the talks in November. Those talks just got harder. But the value of the agreement is that at least the principles are now clear.

'Wonderful Step' In Korea? (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2005

North Korea's dictator, Kim Jong Il, well deserves his caricature image as an erratic crackpot bent on developing nuclear weapons. So when, on Monday, North Korea agreed to abandon its nuclear weapons and programs, and to let inspectors from the United Nation's nuclear agency return, skepticism was in order.

Has Kim changed?

Unlikely. This first tangible progress in over two years of six-party talks was thanks to the more flexible diplomacy of President Bush's second term. That diplomacy marks a departure from the confrontational stance of the first term, when Bush branded North Korea — along with Iran and Iraq — as part of an axis of evil.

Not knowing what is going on inside North Korea, at a time when one of the world's biggest challenges is to prevent terrorists from obtaining weapons of mass destruction, is dangerous. A pre-emptive military attack on North Korea is unwise and unrealistic.

That leaves diplomacy. The risk of the latest agreement, of course, is that it will send a message to North Korea — and to Iran — that bad behavior is, eventually, rewarded. But there is ample reason to take that risk.

The agreement is an example of classic diplomacy that gets matters started by putting off the most difficult issues and producing concessions on both sides. Kim agreed to scrap his nuclear programs for guarantees the United States and its allies will not attack it, and for energy supplies. But the details aren't nailed down.

The real test is whether the administration can now parlay this promise into the real deal, beginning at November talks. Bush called Monday's agreement "a wonderful step forward," but one that must be verified.

History isn't encouraging. In 1994, Pyongyang agreed to give up nuclear weapons and let in inspectors in return for energy help. But in 2002, Washington accused it of cheating. Matters spiraled downward. North Korea expelled inspectors and declared it had built nuclear weapons for self-defense.

The trick is to avoid past pitfalls. The United States has partners because of its two-year insistence on including neighbors South Korea, China, Japan and Russia in the talks.

The 1994 agreement was hailed with great optimism. Caution is more in order this time around. But the new agreement, and diplomacy, are better than none.

Progress In Beijing (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

President Bush responded cautiously to North Korea's promise yesterday to give up nuclear weapons. "That's a wonderful step forward," he said, "But now we've got to verify whether or not that happens."

That's for sure. But if it does happen, it will be a triumph for U.S. policy, removing a nasty threat to the security of the U.S. and its allies. And this time there is one important reason to believe it could work, past deceptions notwithstanding: China's vital interest in a denuclearized Korean peninsula and continued good relations with the U.S. and Japan.

China has said frequently it opposes Pyongyang's nuclear program, but it has taken its time in responding to U.S. entreaties that it apply muscle to Kim Jong Il, the North Korean dictator. Although China did not feature prominently in yesterday's communiqué from the six-party talks in Beijing, there is reason to believe it played the major role in forcing North Korea to foreswear nukes. That would vindicate Mr. Bush's insistence on six-party talks as opposed to bilateral negotiations with the North.

In yesterday's agreement, Pyongyang "commits" to giving up its nuclear weapons program, and the U.S. expresses "respect" for Pyongyang's desire to pursue peaceful nuclear energy. The agreement leaves many important details to be worked out later. But it suggests that the signatories have more effective methods in mind for verifying compliance than relying on the International Atomic Energy Agency, which North Korea has duped in the past. China could demonstrate its sincerity by taking a major role in verification.

Yesterday's breakthrough came just a week after Mr. Bush met Chinese President Hu Jintao in New York. The U.S. has also been telling China that it could no longer tolerate the status quo and would have to start squeezing Pyongyang harder. Last week the U.S. moved against a Macau bank, Banco Delta Asia Ltd., for laundering money for North Korea, causing a bank run.

We'd also note that North Korea's promise to cooperate came one week after the re-election of Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who has promised a more assertive foreign policy.

China does not want Japan to become a nuclear power, which would certainly happen if North Korea kept its nukes. Beijing's leaders also have a powerful strategic interest in continued good economic relations with the U.S. and Japan, whose investment and trade have helped fuel China's rapid economic growth. While Beijing didn't want to be seen throwing an ally over the side -- and thus didn't want to sign on to an agenda of regime change in Pyongyang -- it also doesn't want a break with the U.S.

Beijing's involvement was a key component missing from the Agreed Framework that the Clinton Administration struck with Kim Jong Il in 1994. North Korea's word by itself is worthless; it has made promises hand on heart in the past and has broken nearly every one, most recently when it kicked out U.N. inspectors and withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. China is either taking on the implicit role of inspector here or this agreement will also be impossible to verify. But if China is doing so, however quietly, it will be a major victory in the battle against WMD proliferation.

The six-party negotiators will take up the many items still to be resolved later in November. One key issue is North Korea's insistence that it has "the right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy," as yesterday's statement put it. The five other parties "expressed their respect and agreed to discuss at an appropriate time the subject of the provision of light-water reactor to the DPRK." But it looks as if that help will come only at the end of process, after the North has given up its program and (we assume) its plutonium.

The chief U.S. negotiator at the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, yesterday urged North Korea to close its main nuclear facility at Yongbyon, where it has boasted of producing warheads with plutonium. "What is the purpose of operating it at this point?" he said. "The time to shut it off would be about now." The North never did shut down Yongbyon as part of the 1994 Agreed Framework. Japan's chief envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, added that Pyongyang would have to fulfill all its pledges before the light-water issue was discussed.

No doubt some will describe this agreement as a triumph of diplomacy alone. But it would never have happened if Mr. Bush hadn't been willing to resist those -- John Kerry, Colin Powell -- who urged that the U.S. deal with the North one-on-one. And it wouldn't have happened without the U.S. willingness to squeeze the North out of its smuggling and proliferation money.

As a former U.S. President liked to say, "trust but verify." In this case, we are trusting that China will help verify that North Korea is fulfilling its pledges. If that's what plays out in coming months, Pyongyang could join Iraq, Pakistan's A.Q. Khan network and Libya on the list of anti-proliferation successes.

Accord With North Korea (WP)

On its face, the multinational agreement on North Korea's weapons program announced yesterday is a surprising piece of good news. For the first time, Pyongyang's brutal communist dictatorship formally agreed to "abandoning all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs," and said it would return "at an early date" to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and its accompanying international safeguards. In return, the United States agreed to take steps to normalize relations with the North and, together with South Korea, Japan, Russia and China, provide it with aid -- including at some "appropriate time" a new light-water reactor for generating electricity. Fulfillment by the North of its commitment would mean an extraordinary breakthrough after more than a decade of failed efforts by the United States to contain one of the world's most serious proliferation threats.

The risk, however, is also considerable: If North Korea's new promise is not a serious one, the agreement will only forestall more concerted outside pressure on the odious regime of Kim Jong Il, while sustaining and enhancing the lifeline of food and energy it receives from its neighbors. History suggests that it is that outcome, rather than genuine nuclear disarmament, that the North is betting on. In 1994, after reaching a similar deal with the Clinton administration, it froze activity at one nuclear complex but secretly launched a program to develop a bomb by other means. It was eight years before the Bush administration discovered the deceit and suspended the "agreed framework."

To comply with its latest pledge, the Kim regime would have to reveal and disassemble the unknown number of nuclear weapons that, by its own account, it possesses. It would have to dismantle both the Yongbyon reactor, which produces plutonium, and hidden uranium-enrichment facilities. But it hasn't yet admitted the existence of the uranium plants, and it's hard to conceive of an inspections process that could fully verify the disarmament of a totalitarian state that holds untold thousands of its citizens in concentration camps, earns much of its foreign income from counterfeiting and drug trafficking, and prohibits foreigners from visiting many parts of the country.

North Korea's agreement to yesterday's statement excuses it from the potential displeasure of China, which brokered the talks and supplies Pyongyang with food and energy. It allows for the continuation of rapidly improving relations with South Korea, including provision by the South of large new supplies of electricity. In accepting Mr. Kim's pledge, the Bush administration avoids looking like the obstacle to progress and keeps the diplomatic focus on the North's disarmament. For the first time in 4 1/2 years, the administration appears to be pursuing a coherent strategy, instead of veering between confrontation and negotiation amid endless internal debates. Those diplomats and opposition Democrats who have argued strenuously that a workable deal can be struck with Pyongyang will see their theory tested. We hope that it works, but also that Mr. Kim is not given much time to deliver. If he is sincere, a concrete disarmament plan could be agreed on relatively quickly. If he is not, talks that have already lasted more than two years will drag on, to the disadvantage of U.S. and global security.

Arrest Ties Pyongyang To Counterfeit $100 Bills (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

North Korea's government is producing high-quality counterfeit $100 bills and is working with criminal groups in China to sell the fake U.S. money internationally, U.S. officials say.

Some details of the production of what federal officials call "supernotes" were disclosed after arrests last month in several U.S. cities of people linked to a major Asian crime ring trafficking in fake money, arms, drugs and cigarettes.

A senior Bush administration official said one of the 10 indictments in the case contains the first disclosure of the North Korean government's role in the counterfeiting.

He told an FBI undercover agent that "the government of a foreign country," identified only as "Country 2," is "making counterfeit U.S. currency which Wu could sell to the" agent.

Mr. Wu has pleaded not guilty to the charges, said his attorney, Debra Opri, who confirmed that federal investigators have determined that the counterfeit currency came from North Korea.

Miss Opri said Mr. Wu has denied the charges and that he was entrapped in an FBI sting. A trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 18.

A spokesman for the U.S. Secret Service, which investigates counterfeit currency violations, declined to comment on the North Korean government's link to the case. He said investigations are proceeding.

Balbina Hwang, a researcher at the Heritage Foundation, says the North Korean government has been making and circulating forged $100 bills for more than a decade.

"They produce some of the best quality supernotes," she says, adding that the North Koreans make $250 million a year from the bills.

The British Broadcasting Corp. reported last year that North Korea is producing supernotes with a high-quality printing press known as Intaglio, similar to presses used by the United States to print its currency. The BBC said it learned of the North Korean role from a defector from Pyongyang.

The counterfeiting profits support the North Korean government's drug trafficking, money laundering and gambling, Miss Hwang says. On a strategic level, the North Koreans think that circulating supernotes will help destabilize Western economies, she says, noting that the U.S. Treasury redesigned the $100 bill in part because of North Korean counterfeiting.

China is linked to the counterfeiting by North Korean use of Chinese territory and criminal gangs, she says. The Beijing government is probably aware of the official role in North Korean counterfeiting and is not doing enough to stop it.

According to the indictment, Mr. Wu told an undercover FBI agent posing as a buyer of fake bills that he could provide $1 million in high-quality counterfeit $100 bills and arranged for the agent to telegraph a payment of $25,000 to another man, who has been charged in the case in a third country.

Mr. Wu provided the undercover agent with samples of the forged currency that he said were sent through "Country 1." A senior U.S. official identified "Country 1" as China. Fifteen sample supernotes were dispatched by Federal Express courier, along with a computer chip containing a photograph of the supernotes waiting to be sent from China. On May 5, 6,998 of the supernotes were sent in a shipping container to Long Beach, Calif., and then to the FBI agent in Pomona, Calif.

The indictment states that Mr. Wu told the agent that he gave $30,000 in supernotes to a client who took them to South America. Mr. Wu then told the agent that he was returning to China to get additional forged currency.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration last week designated the Banco Delta Asia SARL in Macau, a Chinese territory, as a "primary money-laundering concern" for its role in helping North Koreans distribute counterfeit currency and engage in illegal activities. The Treasury Department ordered the bank to be cut off from all U.S. financial transactions as a result.

A U.S. electronic intercept from late May 1997 revealed that Sean Garland, president of the Dublin-based Workers' Party, a communist political party, met Cao Xiaobing, a senior member of the International Liaison Department, Beijing's official office for supporting foreign communist parties.

The intelligence report, marked "top secret," stated that Mr. Garland was the managing director of GKG Comms International Ltd., a Dublin company, and noted that Miss Cao and the Irish communist functionary discussed "unidentified business opportunities." The report said, "Garland is suspected of being involved with counterfeiting U.S. currency, specifically, the supernote, a high-quality counterfeit $100 bill."

U.N. Nuclear Inspector Calls For Talks On Iran (USAT)

The United Nations' chief nuclear inspector, Mohamed ElBaradei, said Monday that talks should replace international confrontation over Iran's nuclear activities. Negotiations proved their worth in getting North Korea to renounce its nuclear arms program, ElBaradei said.

U.S. and European diplomats resumed efforts to have Iran brought before the U.N. Security Council for sanctions, even as Russia called for a delay. The diplomats are drawing up a draft resolution to be voted on this week by the 35 nations on the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency. European Union diplomats and a U.S. official — who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitive nature of the negotiations — said China also remained opposed to referral. They said the West would probably force a vote. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she expects the Security Council to take up the matter “at some point in time.”

Tehran says its nuclear program is for production of electricity, not nuclear weapons. ElBaradei criticized both Tehran's intransigence and U.S.-European calls for Security Council involvement as examples of “confrontations and political brinkmanship.”

Al-Qaeda claims responsibility for attacks

Al-Qaeda deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri said his network carried out the London bombings July 7. The televised statement was the group's first direct claim of responsibility for the attacks that killed 56 people, including the four bombers.

“The blessed London attack was one which al-Qaeda was honored to launch against the British Crusaders' arrogance and against the American Crusader aggression on the Islamic nation for 100 years,” Zawahiri, who is in hiding, said in a videotape aired on the Arabic satellite network Al-Jazeera.

Trial opens in Jordan for accused militants

The defendants, mostly Jordanians of Palestinian origin ages 23 to 33, were detained in March and May and have been charged with plotting to undermine relations with Iraq by enlisting and dispatching at least six militants there. It was unclear whether the defendants had links to Abu-Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, which is responsible for scores of bombings, beheadings and kidnappings.

Flight attendants to stage strike in Italy

As many as 600 Alitalia flight attendants could join a one-day strike today in Italy. A 24-hour nationwide mass-transit strike set for Wednesday was called off after agreement was reached on sick pay for bus, tram and subway drivers. Alitalia said no flights to or from Milan, Rome or Naples would be canceled.

Taiwan Slammed On Lax Defense (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

A senior Pentagon official yesterday sharply criticized Taiwan's government for not moving ahead with an arms buildup to counter a mounting threat from China.

Edward Ross, a senior Pentagon security cooperation official, also suggested in a speech that the United States might not defend Taiwan in a conflict with China unless Taipei does more to boost its defenses and national will.

"As the lone superpower, our interests are plentiful and our attention short," Mr. Ross said. "We cannot help defend you if you cannot defend yourself."

With U.S. troops fighting and dying in Iraq and Afghanistan, "an increasing number of Americans are asking hard questions about how much we are willing to sacrifice -- for the security and democracy of others," Mr. Ross said.

The blunt speech, a copy of which was obtained by The Washington Times, was given at the annual U.S.-Taiwan Business Council-Defense Industry meeting in San Diego. Attendees included Huo Shou-yeh, Taiwan's vice defense minister, and other officials from the island, which is also known as the Republic of China.

Defense officials said the speech was aimed at pressing Taiwan's government to pass a proposed $15 billion special defense budget, which is stalled in the legislature by political differences.

The Bush administration in 2001 approved the sale to Taiwan of eight diesel electric submarines, 12 P-3C anti-submarine aircraft, along with 54 torpedoes, 44 Harpoon submarine-launched anti-ship missiles and additional arms.

The administration also wants Taiwan to purchase Patriot anti-missile systems to counter the more than 750 short-range Chinese missiles deployed within range of the island.

Mr. Ross said China has calculated that U.S. forces will assist Taiwan in any conflict and, as a result, is purchasing more submarines and anti-ship missiles.

The Pentagon is watching both China's military buildup and Taiwan's political stalemate over the defense budget and is making its own calculations, he said.

"We do not live in a world of absolutes," he said. "And the time of reckoning is upon us. In the end, the U.S. ability to contribute to Taiwan's defense in a crisis is going to be measured against Taiwan's ability to resist, defend and survive based on it own capabilities."

He called on Taiwan to unite and invest in a defense-modernization program that will protect its democracy and deter Chinese "aggression" across the Taiwan Strait.

"It is time that the people of Taiwan and their elected officials understand that when it comes to defense, they, and not the United States nor any third party, are in the first instance accountable," said Mr. Ross, a director in the Pentagon's Defense Security Cooperation Agency.

Defense officials said differences within the Bush administration over Taiwan have added to the Taiwan defense problem.

Pro-China officials in the Bush administration have sent mixed signals to Taiwan's government about the need to boost defenses. As a result, Taiwan's government has been confused about the U.S. position.

China Terse About Action On Abuses Of One-Child Policy (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

BEIJING, Sept. 19 -- China said Monday that it has dismissed and detained officials in the eastern city of Linyi for abuses committed while enforcing the country's one-child policy. But the government provided no details and said nothing about the arrest this month of an activist who had campaigned against the use of forced abortion and sterilization there.

The cabinet-level ministry responsible for managing population growth in China said in a statement that a preliminary investigation confirmed allegations that "some persons in a few counties and townships of Linyi" violated the law and the rights of local residents "while conducting family planning work.

"Currently, the responsible persons have been removed from their posts," the statement said. "Some of them are being investigated for liabilities and some have been detained."

The statement did not identify the officials or their crimes. Authorities in Linyi declined to answer questions when reached by telephone.

Jiang Tianyong, a lawyer involved in a class-action lawsuit against the Linyi officials, cast doubt on the government's statement and accused local authorities of continuing to hold Chen Guangcheng, the activist leading the lawsuit, under house arrest without due process.

Jiang said the government may have disciplined a few low-level officials but appeared to have refrained from punishing the local party leaders who ordered Chen's arrest and the population-control crackdown.

Chen, 34, had been collecting evidence that Linyi officials were requiring parents with two children to be sterilized and forcing women pregnant with a third child to have abortions. Chen, who is blind, was detained Sept. 6 in Beijing, taken back to Linyi and placed under house arrest. It is unclear if he has been charged with a crime, though police have threatened to prosecute him for "providing intelligence to foreign countries," apparently a reference to interviews he has given to The Washington Post, Time magazine and other foreign media organizations.

Last week, local police also detained two residents who helped Chen organize the lawsuit: his nephew, Chen Hua, 27, and Han Yandong, 35, a neighbor. University officials in Beijing have also threatened to fire Teng Biao, a prominent legal scholar involved in the case.

Local authorities have cut Chen's phone service, but sympathetic villagers helped him escape briefly last Wednesday. In a hurried phone interview, he accused police of roughing up his wife, and he appealed to the central government for help. But he expressed misgivings about the government's probe of his allegations, noting that investigators had not bothered to speak with him.

US Having A Hard Time Finding Allies For UN Reform (CSM)

By Tom Regan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

After a week when most of the reforms it wanted to see initiated at the United Nations were stymied or watered down, The Sunday Times of London reports that the United States wants to "come out blazing" on Monday and push for change. But it faces a new geopolitical world as it attempts to do this, according to a New York Times analysis; one where countries will ally with you on one issue, while at the same time strongly opposing you on other issues. What Bush faced from the well of the United Nations on Wednesday morning was a strange new geopolitical world, in which your allies on one issue are ganging up on you in the next room. When Bush started coalition-building after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he expected the United States to be the linchpin. But now, post-Iraq, the president is increasingly facing what might be called coalitions of the unwilling, pursuing their own interests or pushing back US goals around the world, issue by issue.

Some of the new geopolitical partnerships that have stood in the way of US goals include India, China and Pakistan on the issue of referring Iran and its nuclear program to the UN Security Council; South Korea and China working together against the US and Japan on North Korea; and Russia and Europe on three key US issues - the Middle East, the war in Iraq, and global warming.

Meanwhile, many UN delegates said the US has not one to blame but itself for the lack of UN reform. The The Sunday Times reports that many blame US Ambassador John Bolton for demanding more than 400 changes to the reform plan at the last second, a demand that threw the whole process into question. And The Observer reports that senior diplomats say it was the US who "deliberately" derailed an attempt to craft an agreement to prevent terrorists from obtaining "weapons of mass destruction." Officials involved in the negotiations have confirmed that the Bush administration's refusal to countenance any form of disarmament blocked attempts to push measures that would prevent regimes seeking to develop a nuclear capability. It contradicts reports last week that the US had in fact been furious that plans to crack down on nuclear proliferation were stripped out of the final UN document.

However, diplomats speaking on condition of anonymity have revealed it was in fact President Bush who scuppered what the UN believed was a crucial move in helping make the world safer from the risk of terrorists obtaining a nuclear threat. Mr. Bolton, meanwhile, says he is ready to "make himself unpopular" in order to push some of the reform goals that the US would like to see in place. Of particular concern to the Americans is the UN Commission on Human Rights. United Press International reports that President Bush would like to see the commission disbanded and replaced with a smaller body "in which only countries with a good human rights record would be eligible for membership." The US is furious that countries with abusive human rights records could sit on the human rights commission and block condemnation of their actions. The New York Times reports that Bolton, despite charges that he helped undo the reform process, has won some respect for his knowledge, diligence, and negotiations during his short time at the UN. "People were very cautious, to say the least, because of his reputation as a tough guy who didn't like the UN" said Abdallah Baali, the ambassador of Algeria, who said he knew Bolton from working with him in Africa. "In fact, I was the only one who said that Bolton was an intelligent man who could be creative and constructive and wouldn't go around bullying delegations." But even while admiring his abilities, observers say that his focus on "what the United States would never accept" has "encouraged more active opposition to US positions." John Ruggie, a professor of international relations at Harvard and a former undersecretary general for planning, said he thought Bolton's approach had emboldened opponents of American priorities, like reforming the UN management structure to give more power and flexibility to the secretary-general.

"After Bolton's bombshell [the last minute request for 400 changes], they were able to make the case that this is why we have to stand firm, because if we give great discretionary authority to the secretary-general, there is a danger that the Americans will roll over him, and behind him always stands the Congress willing to withhold funding," he said. The US will get to see this week if it can still form the needed coalitions to push through its agenda, as the International Atomic Engergy Agency (IAEA) takes up the issue of Iran's nuclear program. Reuters reports that the US and Europe, who are working together on the Iranian issue, face "fierce resistance," with more than half a dozen of the 35 countries that make up the IAEA's board saying that "there is no cause for a referral" of Iran to the UN Security Council."

Sunday Iran's president declared at the UN that nuclear power was an "inalienable right" for Iran and accused the West of practicing "nuclear apartheid" by depriving it of nuclear know-how."

The U.N. Must Look For A New Secretary-General (WSJ)

By Norm Coleman

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

Last week, world leaders met for what Kofi Annan described as a "once-in-a-generation opportunity to take bold decisions in the areas of development, security, human rights and reform of the United Nations." But a reading of the "outcome document" world leaders are signing shows it to be yet another missed opportunity for U.N. reform. John Bolton pushed hard to improve the document and succeeded in modifying its most objectionable clauses. But what remains falls far short of "bold."

The document, for instance, calls for a Human Rights Council to replace the thoroughly discredited Human Rights Commission. But negotiators could not agree on the criteria for participation, leaving open the possibility that this new organ will be more of the same. In the same way, the document does not adequately address critical issues such as establishing a code of ethics, implementing sunset provisions on redundant U.N. programs or a staff buyout to eliminate the deadwood that pervades the personnel system; instead, it merely asks for a report by the secretary-general. And it leaves out entirely essential components of U.N. reform like the installation of a chief operating officer and an independent auditing board.

Instead, we have a document that advocates the implementation of the Mauritius Strategy for small island states, the Almaty Program of Action for landlocked developing countries, the Declaration and Program of Action on a Culture of Peace, and the Global Agenda for Dialogue Among Civilizations. The document, in fact, is structured around such delusions. The first half -- a full 18 pages -- is devoted to amorphous platitudes about development. The superficial treatment of reform is buried at the end. It strains credulity for an organization wracked by corruption and mismanagement to broaden the scope of its mandate when it is supposed to be engaged in self-critique. The U.N. needs to clean house, address its shortcomings and restore its ability to function efficiently and honestly before moving forward.

The problem is not a lack of awareness about the need for reform. The U.N.'s most ardent supporters and even the secretary-general himself publicly acknowledge its urgency. Of course, this is undeniable in light of the widespread abuses and scandals in activities ranging from humanitarian programs to peacekeeping. The report released by Paul Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee, exposing the corruption in the Oil For Food program and harshly criticizing the performance of the U.N. Secretariat, only provides the latest evidence.

The problem cannot be attributed to a shortage of reform ideas. To his credit, the secretary-general commissioned a high-level panel to put together a U.N. reform proposal earlier this year. Newt Gingrich and George Mitchell produced an excellent consensus document on U.N. reform. So why is the U.N. unable to reform itself? Fundamental flaws in the structure and membership of the organization make not only management reform, but also the mission of the entire organization, highly dubious.

· First, the U.N. is dominated by countries that do not have a vested financial interest in efficient organization. Just eight countries pay almost 75% of the budget. The U.S. alone contributes 22%. Common sense dictates that those who "have skin in the game," who have invested literally billions, have a greater interest in seeing their funds spent properly than those who do not make the same commitment.

· Second, the U.N. has become a jobs program for many countries. Hiring is steeped in patronage and nepotism. This partially explains the waste that pervades U.N. operations, and means that reform that might result in a leaner organization is going to be opposed from the outset. Reforms designed to curtail corruption will face a similarly uphill battle.

· Third, there is the power of regional blocs. These shut out Israel from full membership, yet accord human rights violators such as Cuba, Zimbabwe and Sudan membership on the Human Rights Commission.

· Finally, the General Assembly offers countries that have little influence outside the U.N. a rare opportunity to run the show, as it accords the same rights and privileges to dictatorships as it does democracies. In the Assembly, which will be responsible for turning summit pledges into real action, countries such as Myanmar have the same voting power as the U.S. The taste of power otherwise marginal states get has translated into an unwillingness to delegate sufficient administrative powers to the secretary-general, who ultimately must be afforded the authority to enact U.N. reform.

If the U.N. is to genuinely reform itself, it needs visionary and credible leadership. Mr. Annan, whose management failures are unambiguous, is simply too weak to muscle through an effective reform package. We should begin looking for new leadership now.

U.N. reform carries a price tag. Those who care about the U.N. can put their money where their mouths are. Mr. Annan has proposed a buyout of some of the U.N.'s entrenched bureaucracy to make way for a new cadre of the world's best and brightest. I would challenge U.N.-supporters with deep pockets, such as George Soros and Ted Turner, to make an investment in reform by helping to reinvigorate the U.N. staff.

The good news is that this summit is not the end of the reform process. There is still opportunity to create a credible human rights body, to achieve transparency, and to develop meaningful oversight of operations. But it is still highly questionable whether this will come to fruition.

And if it does not? Too much of the debate in Congress is focused on whether failure to achieve reform should result in automatic or discretionary withholding of dues. The reality is that this failure may undermine Congress' willingness to appropriate any funding to the U.N. Dollars can easily be targeted to other international organizations dedicated to humanitarian and security efforts -- NATO, the OAS, the WHO, the Global Fund, or the Red Cross. President Bush put it best during his speech to the General Assembly: "If member countries want the United Nations to be respected . . . they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect."

Germany In Limbo As 2 Stake Claim To Chancellorship (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, September 20, 2005

BERLIN — "Chancellor War!" screamed the headline in Bild, Germany's largest tabloid newspaper, on Monday. "Who will govern Germany now?"

The answer is still days, if not weeks, away. Incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his opponent, Angela Merkel, both claimed victory in Sunday's parliamentary elections. Their competing claims put Germany in a political deadlock and could stall efforts to revive the torpid economy.

"An unstable government and a perpetual election campaign with an uncertain outcome is the last thing our country needs," said Hermann Franzen, the head of HDE, a retail trade association.

Merkel's party, the Christian Democratic Union, won 35.2% of the vote in Sunday's elections, compared with 34.3% for Schroeder's Social Democratic Party.

Neither side had the necessary majority in the parliament to form a government. Merkel and Schroeder scrambled to form alliances with other political parties that would put them in control.

Party leaders said they would start negotiations this week. Traditionally, Merkel's Christian Democrats have linked with the Free Democrats. Schroeder's Social Democrats have allied with the Greens. Merkel and Schroeder are trying to woo each other's ally.

A majority coalition must be in place by Oct. 18. The parliament has three chances to choose a chancellor. If it fails, President Horst Koehler can appoint a minority government or call new elections.

Merkel, a former physicist from East Germany, had held a double-digit advantage over Schroeder for months. The main editorial in the daily Sueddeutsche Zeitung called her "the woman who thought she had it all in her hands, but let it fall through her fingers."

Merkel's agenda of changes scared off many of the 5 million unemployed Germans or those worried about losing their jobs. The German economy grew 1.6% last year after two years of almost no growth.

If Merkel and Schroeder join in a "grand coalition," the resulting government would probably be too divided to push through changes to improve economic conditions. On Monday, each side said it would consider an alliance only if its candidate became chancellor.

Until the chancellor is named, little is expected to change in U.S.-German relations, which soured when Schroeder opposed the U.S.-led war in Iraq, said Jan-Friedrich Kallmorgen, founder of the Atlantic Initiative, a think tank in Berlin. If Merkel wins, "She would foster very close political and military ties with the U.S.," he said. However, Merkel said she would not send German soldiers to Iraq.

The indecision weighed on financial markets. Germany's DAX stock index fell 1.2% at the close of trading Monday, and the euro dipped against the U.S. dollar.

"Whatever the color of Germany's new government will ultimately be, the pace of structural reforms is likely to be slow," Bank of America economist Holger Schmieding said.

After German Election, Deadlock Hardens (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein And Judy Dempsey

BERLIN, Sept. 19 - The stalemate in German politics deepened Monday, the day after an inconclusive national election result, as key party leaders rejected some of the coalition solutions that might otherwise lead to the formation of a new government and the selection of a chancellor.

Most important, the chairman of the Social Democratic Party, Franz Müntefering, confirmed that Chancellor Gerhard Schröder would refuse to enter into any coalition with the main opposition party that did not choose Mr. Schröder himself as chancellor.

This, for the moment at least, seemed to rule out a "grand coalition" between Mr. Schröder's Social Democrats and the Christian Democratic Union, the party of Mr. Schröder's main rival as chancellor, Angela Merkel. That option had been deemed the most likely outcome in the event that no party won a majority.

In that scenario, Mrs. Merkel, as leader of the party with the biggest bloc of seats in Parliament, would then become chancellor, while Mr. Schröder would step down. But both Mr. Schröder and Mr. Müntefering have ruled that out.

For her part on Monday, Mrs. Merkel said at a news conference that she had opened negotiations with other parties in an effort to form a coalition that would command a parliamentary majority.

Her first talks were with the leaders of her party's traditional coalition partner, the Free Democratic Party, even though the election left the two parties combined about a dozen seats short of a majority. That means that Mrs. Merkel still needs to find support from another party, and it was unclear where that support would come from.

One possibility was the Green Party, which is now Mr. Schröder's coalition partner. And Christian Democratic officials said Monday that talks would be held with the Greens.

"We need to speak to the Greens and the F.D.P. in the next few days," said Dieter Althaus, a Christian Democrat who is prime minister of the state of Thuringia. "What we need is the largest possible consensus. We have our own agenda. We need to conduct open talks."

"It's the turn of the C.D.U.," he said. "They should say what they've got to say."

But the best-known Green politician, Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, when asked at a news conference if he would be willing to serve in a government headed by Mrs. Merkel, said, "Mrs. Merkel will not be chancellor." He did not elaborate on his reasons for that statement.

But by Monday, Mrs. Merkel's grip on the chancellorship did seem to be slipping, even in her own party. The Christian Democrats had not expected the poor showing on Sunday, and historically they have not tolerated failed candidates.

When she stepped onto the podium in the headquarters of the Christian Democrats, she received mild applause from staff members who had remained after late-night drinking and dining.

During past regular Monday meetings of the party's presidium, senior Christian Democratic party leaders always lingered in corridors, waiting to mix with the journalists. There were always a few premiers from the states outside Berlin who would stand not too far from the podium, as if to show support for Mrs. Merkel.

But not on this Monday. As soon as the presidium was over, the black Mercedes that had brought the state premiers to Berlin disappeared into the warm September sun.

According to Germany's Basic Law, the newly elected Parliament has 30 days to hold its first meeting, at which presumably it would elect a chancellor. Theoretically, the main candidate is nominated by the president of the Federal Republic, but customarily the president chooses the person who has already been able to get majority support through negotiations with other parties.

Parliament then votes on the candidate. If the candidate fails to win a majority, there must be a second vote. If that vote also turns up no majority, then the president can essentially select a minority candidate to be chancellor, or he can dissolve Parliament and call for new elections.

But there has never been a case in postwar German history where it came to a third vote in Parliament.

Until Parliament chooses a chancellor, or is dissolved by the president, the former government continues in power, meaning in this instance, Mr. Schröder and his partners in the Green Party.

Even for political experts, it was difficult to predict how events might unfold from here.

"It's a power game going on right now," said Peter Lösche, a professor of political science at Göttingen University. "You don't know who's bluffing and who means what they say seriously. But sometimes strange bedfellows wake up in the morning and find themselves in a coalition."

Meanwhile, a great deal of speculation was being devoted to Mr. Schröder's aim in insisting on remaining chancellor in a coalition with the Christian Democrats, even though his party trailed in the vote.

"Yesterday, he was incredible," said Klaus von Beyme, a political science professor at Heidelberg University. He was referring to a television appearance Mr. Schröder made with Mrs. Merkel and other leaders in which he first voiced his insistence that he remain as chancellor.

One interpretation of Mr. Schröder's actions is that he is aiming ultimately at a compromise in which both he and Mrs. Merkel would step down, leaving the way for a compromise chancellor, presumably a Christian Democrat.

"I can imagine a deal in which Schröder has to withdraw and, maybe in exchange for that, the Social Democrats ask the C.D.U. to give up Merkel," Mr. Beyme said.

"The Bavarians are ready to accept such a deal," he continued, referring to the leaders of the Christian Democratic Union's sister party in Bavaria, the Christian Social Union. "And some of the C.D.U. prime ministers of the states would also accept such a deal, because they are not loyal to Merkel, who committed too many blunders and has no charisma. And normally in the C.D.U., there is a rule that somebody who fails has to leave."

Who Will Take Germany's Top Office? (CSM)

By Andreas Tzortzis

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2005

BERLIN - Europe's largest economy is momentarily rudderless as both incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schröder and his challenger Angela Merkel claimed Germany's top office the morning after one of the biggest election surprises in the country's recent history.

The unexpected subpar performance of Ms. Merkel's Christian Democratic Union and its sister party, the Christian Social Union, in Sunday's election gave Mr. Schröder an outside shot at staying in office after reform-shy German voters refused to give either of the major parties a clear mandate. "I'm very pessimistic about the prospect for wholesale economic reform," says Karen Donfried, senior director of the German Marshall Fund in Washington. "It's very clear that's not what Germans want."

The conservative Union parties are less than one percent ahead of Schroeder's SPD, dooming their plans to form a coalition with the pro-business Free Democrats that aimed to aggressively liberalize Germany's social market economy.

The chancellor, emboldened by the SPD's strong showing in the election's final spurt, declared that he planned to stay on as chancellor, whether at the head of a so-called grand coalition with the CDU/CSU or in another party constellation.

The confusion over who will take over at the helm of Europe's economic motor, has unsettled financial markets and business leaders and surprised European politicians. The German capital was abuzz Monday with the political fallout of a tight race which saw the pro-business Free Democrats claim a surprising 9.9 percent share of the vote, followed tightly by the Left Party, their polar opposites in the reform discussion. The Green Party finished a disappointing fifth.

Rumors of coalition possibilities, described using the colors assigned to Germany's parties, made the rounds rapidly as both Merkel and Schröder lay claim to the chancellery.

After seven years of rule, voters had had enough of Schröder's coalition with the Green Party, the so-called red-green government. The government's popularity has been at rock bottom after welfare, health, and labor market reforms it introduced in 2003 cut significant benefits but failed to create jobs for the more than 4.7 million out of work.

But voters also weren't ready to hand over the reins to Merkel's conservatives and Free Democrats, who were planning to strip away hiring and firing laws, reduce unemployment benefits, and push through tax cuts for wealthier Germans, all in the hope of kick-starting growth and investment.

"It's a very mixed message from the voters," says Uwe Andersen, political scientist at Ruhr University. "The majority of the population is still not ready to go through with a harder reform course. On the other hand, they know that things can't go any further with the red-green coalition government."

In the coming week, Merkel, whose party still won the largest share of the vote at 35.2 percent, will begin meeting with the Greens and Schröder's SPD to decide how to proceed. The likely coalition outcome remains a so-called grand coalition, which would put the SPD and the CDU together and Merkel as Germany's next chancellor.

But Schröder doesn't see it that way. The Chancellor appeared visibly smug during a television talk show Sunday night, and his party pointed out that the CDU only has more votes than the SPD if the performance of its sister party, Bavaria's CSU is counted. Such logic would indicate that Schröder, not Merkel, should stay on as Chancellor.

Either way, the predicted political infighting has left industry heads and other European leaders doubtful the continent's largest economy is serious about turning its fortunes around any time soon.

"We won't see any steps backwards, but the tempo of reforms will slow," Holger Schmieding, an economist at Bank of America in London told Agence France Presse. "Germany won't be able to tap into its full potential. The economy is improving, it'll simply improve more slowly."

Others were less optimistic. The head of the BDI industry federation, Juergen Thumann called the results "bitterly disappointing." European politicians expressed confidence that Germany's political class would find an appropriate coalition solution, but acknowledged Germans were obviously not ready for drastic change.

"I think the Germans have responded in a way that will certainly not allow a totally liberal [economic] model to be put in place," French Defense Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie told Europe1 radio. And it's unclear how much power Merkel will wield after leading her party to one of its worst federal electoral showings in German postwar history. Political analyst Mathias Micus said the confusion surrounding who will govern the country plays perfectly into the hands of Schröder.

"Times like this need a power player like Schröder," said Mr. Micus, at the University of Mainz. "He is someone who knows how to play with all his cards, who isn't held up by party dogma and who is Machiavellian."

Germany Faces Leadership Standoff (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker and David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

BERLIN -- Germany's deadlocked election threatened to become the country's messiest postwar political crisis, as both the major parties' leaders insisted they should be chancellor, while small parties ruled out other possible coalitions aimed at forming a governing majority.

That likely means nobody can rule Germany at all unless either incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schröder or challenger Angela Merkel makes a humiliating climb-down. Otherwise, the next most likely outcome could be another election, perhaps months away -- with the danger of another inconclusive result.

As business groups warned that prolonged political uncertainty could hurt investors' and consumers' confidence in the world's third-biggest national economy, a persistent standoff looked more and more likely. A mere 35% of voters backed Mr. Schröder's center-left Social Democrats on Sunday and only 36% supported Ms. Merkel's conservative Christian Democrats, leaving both of Germany's historically dominant parties with too few seats in Parliament to govern with their usual minor-party allies.

"Never before in Germany has there been no clear way to cobble together a government," said Josef Joffe, publisher of newspaper Die Zeit and one of Germany's top political commentators. "This is not only the worst possible outcome to the election, but the worst election outcome in the history of the Federal Republic."

An election that was widely expected to give Germany a conservative-led government, likely shifting the balance of power in European politics toward freer markets and better trans-Atlantic relations, now threatens to contribute to paralysis in the European Union. Ms. Merkel's failure to win a majority with her program of far-reaching economic overhaul could slow the pace of such restructuring across the Continent.

"Without a dynamic Germany, Europe cannot recover," EU Commission President José Manuel Barroso said yesterday, trying to urge German leaders to reach a speedy agreement and avoid spreading limbo on economic policy.

Desperate to fashion a victory, each major party is trying to woo the other's minor-party coalition partners to form a government. The courtships look likely to fail. Ms. Merkel's ally, the Free Democratic Party, reiterated its refusal to defect to Mr. Schröder. The Green party, Mr. Schröder's governing partner for the past seven years, said it saw little chance of finding common ground with Ms. Merkel's conservatives.

A bipartisan government uniting Germany's two major parties in a "grand coalition" is likely the best bet for forming a majority. Still, it confronts a basic problem: Who would be the boss?

The chancellor typically comes from the party that wins the most seats in Germany's Parliament. Right now, that would mean Ms. Merkel, by a mere three-seat margin. Mr. Schröder argues that far more Germans prefer him to Ms. Merkel, a claim based on personal approval ratings in opinion polls. Social Democrats also made the claim that they were the biggest party in Parliament, by arguing that Ms. Merkel's conservatives are really two parties, a national Christian Democrat organization and a sister party in Bavaria, though they campaign together.

In claiming he won, Mr. Schröder may have overreached. Some in his party began to say yesterday that he would have to swallow his pride and accept that he no longer would be chancellor. Mr. Schröder's bravado Sunday night and yesterday, when he repeatedly proclaimed that only he could lead a stable government, must be seen as an understandable "emotional overreaction" to the election result, said Rolf Stöckel, a Social Democrat member of Parliament.

Pundits had written off Mr. Schröder's chances before the election, but he nearly pulled level with the conservatives. He wanted to "demonstrate that the Social Democrats are not on the defensive" going into negotiations with other parties, Mr. Stöckel said.

Mr. Schröder's fate may hinge on whether Ms. Merkel's conservatives are united enough to insist on his removal from office. His insistence on keeping his job may be a gamble that he can face down Ms. Merkel if support for her within her own party crumbles, after she squandered a huge lead and gave the party one of its worst-ever results. Christian Democrats had widely thought they would win the election outright.

So far, most conservatives are standing firm behind Ms. Merkel. After a meeting of top Christian Democrats in Hanover, senior party official Friedbert Pflüger said Ms. Merkel would become chancellor -- unless Mr. Schröder clings to power through a pact with ex-communists, which Mr. Schröder has denied is an option. To shore up her position, Ms. Merkel is expected to ask a meeting of Christian Democrat members of Parliament today to re-elect her as their chairwoman.

Meantime, the most controversial figure in her campaign resigned: Paul Kirchhof, an academic advocate of flat-rate income taxes. Ms. Merkel had pegged him as her finance minister, a move that won votes for Mr. Schröder amid fear the conservatives planned taxes favoring the rich over the working class.

Many analysts expect a grand coalition to emerge, if only after weeks of haggling. Amid deep differences on major policy areas from labor laws to health care, such a bipartisan administration probably would struggle to overcome Germany's chronic problems of low economic growth and mass unemployment.

"An unstable government and endless fighting is the last thing our country needs to finally get moving," said Hermann Franzen, president of Germany's association of retailers.

The prospect is likely to chill needed foreign investment, as companies look for more stable situations for their funds. "Abroad, and especially in the U.S., the process of building a coalition is difficult to comprehend," said a statement by the American Chamber of Commerce, which represents U.S. businesses that have €110 billion invested in Germany.

Following the election, the euro sagged 0.7% to $1.21, while Germany's DAX stock-market index fell 1.2% to 4926.13.

Many economists say individual German companies will carry on improving competitiveness even if political parties are immobilized. In the latest example of corporate restructuring, engineering giant Siemens AG announced cost cuts and layoffs at its German units. "German firms are the true reformers, not the government," said Jörg Krämer, chief economist at German bank HVB Group in Munich.

"Germany is becoming like Italy, in a bad and a good sense," Mr. Joffe said. "Any possible coalition government will be unstable, but we no longer need the government to have healthy companies."

Without a deal, the German Parliament could fail to elect any chancellor at all when it meets in late October -- and the head of state, President Horst Köhler, could be forced to dissolve it and trigger another election.

Maneuvering Begins For A New German Government (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

BERLIN, Sept. 19 -- Germany's major political parties both claimed the right on Monday to patch together a new government following inconclusive national elections, but were confronted with the likelihood of weeks of backroom deal-making before anyone is able to take control.

After their respective parties took a beating in Sunday's vote, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his chief rival, Angela Merkel, were losing their sheen as candidates to lead the country. Lawmakers and analysts tossed around various scenarios in which the country's numerous factions could settle on someone else as a compromise.

Merkel, 51, whose Christian Democrats once had a double-digit lead in opinion polls, said she would open talks with other parties -- including Schroeder's Social Democrats -- about assembling a coalition. But she insisted that her party take the lead in forging a new government by virtue of its narrow first-place finish, with about 35 percent of the vote.

"The election campaign is over, the voters have had their say and we are the strongest party in Parliament," she said at a news conference in Berlin, the capital. "We received a clear mandate to govern."

But Schroeder, 61, and the Social Democrats were having little of that. Even though Schroeder's governing coalition was toppled, his party fared better than predicted. It polled about 34 percent, an achievement that the chancellor portrayed as a virtual victory, given how he was forced to call early elections because of widespread dissatisfaction with a weak economy and record high unemployment.

Franz Muentefering, the Social Democrats' party chairman, said Schroeder deserved a third term. "Mrs. Merkel was being cheered as if she were already the chancellor," Muentefering told reporters. "But it's quite clear that this country doesn't want Mrs. Merkel. I do think it is a personal defeat for her."

Analysts said that despite the Social Democrats' posturing, Schroeder had few realistic prospects for remaining in office. But they also said Merkel had wasted a golden opportunity during the campaign and would be hard-pressed to salvage her candidacy.

"The woman who thought she had everything in her hands now feels it all slipping through her fingers," Heribert Prantl, political editor of the influential Sueddeutsche Zeitung newspaper, wrote in a signed editorial. "Seldom has such a presumed victor looked so disgraced."

Constanze Stelzenmueller, director of the Berlin office of the German Marshall Fund of the United States, agreed. "Angela Merkel may very well be a dead woman walking," she said. "My gut instinct tells me Merkel is in a very difficult position, which is why the Social Democrats are grinning so broadly. Right now, everybody is playing chicken."

The message that the electorate delivered on Sunday was a muddled one. Exit polls showed that many voters were tired of the status quo in Germany -- with its high joblessness and flaccid economy -- but were equally skeptical of the solutions offered by either Merkel or Schroeder. The result was the most splintered vote in decades.

For now, Schroeder's ruling coalition of Social Democrats and Greens will remain in charge, but only until a new alliance emerges that can cobble together a majority of the seats in Parliament. The major parties began that work in earnest on Monday.

Muentefering, for instance, indicated that the Social Democrats would put pressure on the Free Democrats -- an anti-taxation, pro-business party that received about 10 percent of the vote -- to abandon Merkel and join them in a coalition.

The leader of the Free Democrats, Guido Westerwelle, categorically rejected the overture on election night. But Muentefering said he would keep pushing. "Perhaps they were a little too overconfident about yesterday's result," he said.

Similarly, Merkel served notice that her party would try to persuade the Greens to change their stripes, giving them a chance to remain in power under the Christian Democrats, even though the two parties disagree sharply on some issues, such as nuclear energy.

Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, the most prominent Green, said he could not foresee his party marching under Merkel's banner. "She will not be chancellor," he declared. But other Green officials said they were willing to listen.

While the German constitution requires that Parliament reconvene within 30 days of an election, there is no deadline for picking a chancellor or governing majority.

Christian Pestalozza, a constitutional law professor at the Free University of Berlin, dismissed suggestions that Germany was facing a political crisis. He predicted that the parties would soon lower the rhetoric and be more pragmatic in building a coalition.

"According to the constitution, they have all the time they need to take to work this out," he said. "I'm quite sure that after two or three weeks, we'll know what we'll have."

Germany's Political Impasse May Take Weeks To Solve, Observers Say (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

BERLIN - Germany's electoral standoff moved from the inconvenient to the impossible Monday, as leaders of the country's four largest political parties spent the day primarily outlining whom they wouldn't work with in a future coalition government.

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, whose Social Democratic Party came in second in Sunday's elections, with 34 percent of the vote, insisted that he should remain Germany's leader, while backers of Christian Democrat Angela Merkel, whose party won 35 percent, said she should lead a new government.

Political observers said the impasse might take weeks to resolve, a prospect that worries economists in a nation where unemployment is 11 percent and the economy has grown only marginally for years.

"Uncertainty at a time of economic crisis is our worst-case scenario," said Manuela Glaab, the head of the University of Munich-based Center for Applied Policy Research. "We need a working government to get Germany back on track. Every responsible politician has to understand that there is no time to lose."

Investors said they feared the deadlock would slow needed economic reforms, and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barrasso urged a compromise. "Without a dynamic Germany, Europe cannot recover," he said.

Others suggested that new elections are likely. If no government is agreed on by Oct. 18, when Schroeder's current term ends, new elections could be called.

The Christian Democrats had been expected to win Sunday. But missteps by Merkel and a hard campaign by Schroeder allowed the Social Democrats to close the gap, which polls had showed at one time to be as wide as 20 points.

The Christian Democrats won about 225 seats in Parliament while the Social Democrats finished with about 222.

Christian Democrat ally the Free Democrats got 10 percent of the vote, or 61 seats, while Social Democrat ally the Green Party won 8 percent, or about 51 seats.

Parliament will have at least 598 members - the number can change, based on Germany's system of proportional representation - meaning that one party must control at least 300 seats to form a government.

Leaders for the Green Party and the Liberal Party made it clear Monday that that goal was all but unattainable.

The Green Party said it wouldn't join any coalition that the Christian Democrats led. The Liberal Party said the same about any coalition that the Social Democrats led.

All sides have rejected working with a fifth group, the New Left, made up of former communists, largely from the former East Germany. It won 54 seats.

That leaves the possibility of a so-called "grand coalition" between the Christian Democrats and the Social Democrats. But Schroeder said Monday that he'd serve in such a coalition only as chancellor. Christian Democrats responded that they'd won more votes.

Such a coalition would be fraught with problems in any case, said Lutz Erbring, professor of communications at Free University in Berlin, as the two parties positioned themselves for dominance in the next elections.

The likely losers in such political maneuvering would be serious progress on economic reform measures, especially those aimed at creating more jobs and stabilizing government social programs.

"The reform program is not about the next few years, but being able to maintain our society for the next generation," Erbring said. "We may well lose years in the reform process, and we can't afford to lose any time."

The German stock market fell about 2 percent on the news early Monday, before recovering some to close down 1.2 percent.

German economic malaise was the theme of the campaign leading up to Sunday's balloting, and until recent weeks, Merkel and the Christian Democrats were expected to win a decisive victory over Schroeder, whose coalition has led Germany for seven years of little growth.

But many analysts said Merkel frightened German voters with calls for making it easier for small businesses to fire people and for increasing the value-added tax so that payroll taxes could be reduced for employers.

"It is clear that Germans do not want Mrs. Merkel as their chancellor," Social Democratic party chief Franz Muentefering said.

It wasn't clear, however, how Schroeder would be able to form a government, and many saw the likely delay as a disaster.

"The stalemate that emerged in the election is of course the worst result that you could have wished for, the worst for the interests of Germany and for Europe," Klaus Liebscher, a European Central Bank Governing Council member who heads Austria's central bank, said in Vienna.

Tied German Rivals Try To Forge Coalitions (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

BERLIN -- Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and conservative challenger Angela Merkel fought for their political lives yesterday after a cliffhanger election reminiscent of the Bush-Gore deadlock of 2000.

Unlike in the United States, Germany's battle over the Sunday election will be fought not in court but with backroom bargains as the rivals appeal to smaller parties in their struggle to form a government and become the next chancellor.

Failure to form a government would in effect end the political careers of Mr. Schroeder and Mrs. Merkel, said officials from their respective Social Democratic Party (SPD) and Christian Democratic Union (CDU).

The two parties yesterday issued invitations for coalition talks to each other, as well as to the pro-market Free Democratic Party (FDP) and the leftist Greens.

"I have initiated contact with [their] offices," Mrs. Merkel said, urging the center-left Social Democrats to "accept that they are not the strongest party" and to agree to a right-left "grand coalition" under her leadership.

The SPD leadership said it will talk with the CDU and its Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union (CSU), but it ruled out taking part in a Cabinet led by Mrs. Merkel.

"It is clear that Germans do not want Mrs. Merkel as their chancellor," SPD Chairman Franz Muentefering told reporters after a party meeting.

"We have a responsibility to make clear that we want to rule with Mr. Schroeder as chancellor and implement much of what we have undertaken to do," he said in reference to an economic and social reform package known as Agenda 2010.

But Mrs. Merkel said: "I do not rule out anybody revising their position."

SPD officials also challenged Mrs. Merkel's assertion that hers is the country's strongest party, having won 225 seats in the Bundestag, the parliament's lower house, against 222 for the SPD.

The Bundestag has 598 seats, but more may be added under the country's proportional representation electoral system.

The Social Democrats argued that the CSU should be considered a separate party, even though it always has allied with the CDU in federal elections.

In addition, the election in a district in the eastern city of Dresden will not take place until Oct. 2 because of a candidate's death. That vote could provide up to four members and tip the balance, although it is unlikely that all the seats will go to the SPD, analysts said.

The CDU/CSU alliance won 35.2 percent of the vote compared with 34.3 percent for the SPD. FDP, Mrs. Merkel's preferred coalition partner, received 9.8 percent -- not enough for the two parties to form a government.

Mr. Schroeder's coalition partners, the Greens, received 8.1 percent. The new Left Party of former communists and a breakaway SPD fraction did slightly better with 8.7 percent.

Interior Minister Otto Schily, a leading Social Democrat, said he hoped the Free Democrats would join the center-left "red-green" coalition because "we have points in common." But FDP leader Guido Westerwelle rejected the overture.

The Greens were the most accommodating party yesterday. Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, the party's leader, said he would not serve in a Merkel Cabinet, but neither he nor any other party leader ruled out joining a CDU-FDP government.

"We are interested in content," the Greens' co-leader Claudia Roth told ARD television. "We are not interested just in governing. We are interested in politics."

The political deadlock was not to the markets' liking yesterday. German stocks tumbled, and the euro fell to its lowest level against the dollar in seven weeks.

Euro Falls As Germany Splits After Poll Stalemate (FT)

By Bertrand Benoit

Financial Times, September 20, 2005

The euro fell to a seven-week low against the dollar on Monday after Germany's election ended in a stalemate, casting doubt over the country's ability to enact the policy changes needed to bolster faltering economic growth.

Mr Schröder's Social Democratic party and Ms Merkel's CDU now have 30 days to form a government from a number of coalition possibilities. They would then put their choice to parliament, which would elect the new chancellor.

But fears mounted on Monday that protracted coalition talks would increase uncertainty over the pace and direction of the country's economic policy.

Economists have already interpreted the outcome of the poll as a clear rejection of Ms Merkel's reform programme.

One possibility remains a grand coaltion between the SPD and CDU but Elga Bartsch, economist at Morgan Stanley, said such an alliance would probably “lead to reform gridlock”.

The Dax 30 index of German blue chip stocks initially fell 2.2 per cent on disappointment over the poll outcome. But it later rallied on hopes German companies would continue their restructuring efforts. The index finished 1.21 per cent or 60.37 points lower at 4,926.13.

The euro fell to $1.2101 against the dollar before staging a recovery to $1.2155. But analysts said it could slip below $1.20 amid continuing uncertainty.

While a grand coalition remained a likely outcome yesterday, Mr Schröder said his party would not join a cabinet led by Ms Merkel. The SPD appears to be banking on Ms Merkel's weakened authority in her party to exact a high price for its participation in a national-unity government.

Having gained the backing of her party's top executive, Ms Merkel will first try to outmanoeuvre Mr Schröder by seeking a “Jamaica cabinet”, a three-way alliance with the Free Democratic and Green parties, named after their respective colours of green, yellow and black for the CDU.

The CDU leads in the race to form the next government, having gained the most votes, at 35.2 per cent against 34.2 per cent for the SPD, and the largest share of seats at 225 against 222 despite scoring one of its worst results in six decades.

Manfred Güllner, head of the Forsa polling group, said it was “theoretically possible but in practice unlikely” that a by-election in Dresden on October 2 could give the SPD three additional seats, putting it on an equal footing with the CDU.

Neither the Greens nor the FDP ruled out a Jamaica alliance. Ronald Pofalla, deputy CDU parliamentary leader, said the CDU and Greens were “not that far apart” on central economic issues. However, Joschka Fischer, Green foreign minister, poured cold water on the scenario, saying “I don't see myself sporting dreadlocks.”

By contrast, a three-way cabinet under Mr Schröder appeared out of reach on Monday, after the FDP rejected the SPD's invitation to talk, describing it as “a form of stalking”.

Europe's Direction Is Unclear, Much As Germany's Is After Vote (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

PARIS, Sept. 19 - Europe, weakened by the seeming collapse of its constitutional project in May, faces even more uncertainty after the election in Germany on Sunday, which left no party with a clear mandate.

DOJ_NMG_0006912

"It's May 29 all over again," said Dominique Moïsi, a senior adviser at the French Institute for International Relations, referring to the date that France rejected the European Union's draft constitution, stalling a half-century of progress toward European unity.

Both Germany and France, the traditional engines of the European Union, are now consumed by domestic politics and are unlikely to provide the strong leadership needed to re-energize the bloc.

Germany may emerge with a weak coalition government from its split vote, while France has lost steam since May, leaving President Jacques Chirac largely sidelined while his would-be successors dominate the political stage.

Of course, it is too early to say what the real impact of the German elections will be. But the surprisingly narrow margin of the conservative, Angela Merkel, over Chancellor Gerhard Schröder brought anxious analysis across Europe.

At best, Europe will continue to idle while Germany sorts out who is in charge. But many commentators worry that the most ambitious European vision - a union speaking with one voice on international affairs and backed by a military capacity distinct from that of NATO - may evaporate in the meantime.

"You have this big, fuzzy Europe looking inward instead of discussing world affairs," said Anne-Marie Le Gloannec, a European relations specialist at the Center for International Studies and Research in France.

Hopes that Europe can salvage its constitutional project also grow more uncertain. A complicated effort to wrap the various treaties governing the union into a single document foundered on the French rejection of the draft constitution. Mr. Schröder's government had backed the idea of writing a shorter, simpler constitution, but that issue is one of many that are in limbo.

"In most questions, Germany won't be able to take a leadership role," Ms. Gloannec said.

Mr. Moïsi said the muddied European waters were bad for the United States, which more than ever needed a clear ally to deal with an increasingly despotic Russia, an increasingly assertive China and a recalcitrant Iran. Europe has played a central role in pressing Iran to give up a uranium enrichment program that both sides of the Atlantic fear is intended for nuclear weapons.

Europe could suffer in other ways, too. While changes in Germany's economy may yet proceed, many Europeans had also hoped that a clear mandate for Mrs. Merkel's ambitious pro-business plans would add momentum to much needed economic restructuring on the Continent.

"The message already is that Germany is attached to an economic model founded on social guarantees," said Guillaume Klossa, a professor focused on European economies at the École des Hautes Études Commerciales, one of the Continent's leading business schools. "It will slow reform in France."

Without competitive pressure from Germany, the region's largest economy, inertia could stymie efforts to revamp Europe's other sluggish socialist economies.

The lack of European leadership is also expected to cloud talks about Turkey's membership in the union, scheduled to start Oct. 3. Mr. Schröder supports Turkey's membership, but Mrs. Merkel opposes it. Analysts say the talks are unlikely to make much progress without a clear German position.

Merkel Is The Big Loser In Germany's Elections (WSJ)

By Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2005

It will take some time and convoluted coalition negotiations before the world knows who won Sunday's German elections. But it's not too early to call the loser: Angela Merkel.

Putting on a brave face, she kept an appointment Monday night to speak at the opening banquet of the Frankfurt Auto Show. Before her talk, a dinner guest wished her congratulations. "There's not much to congratulate me for," she responded candidly, knowing she had frittered away a lead in the polls that had been as much as 18 percentage points and finished just shy of a percentage point ahead (35.2% to 34.3%) of a chancellor whose legacy is nearly the highest unemployment and lowest growth rates in Europe.

That was far short of what it would take to build a government with her coalition partners, and the party's second worst return ever. She then stood before the Frankfurt car crowd and delivered a dry speech on transportation policy, as if to confirm her failing political instinct. Very briefly, before talking about the Autobahn and articulated filters, she expressed regret that she didn't get the mandate she wanted for economic change, but promised she would push for it anyway. As to forming a government, she told the crowd of Germany's business elite, the core of her political support, "I can assure you that we are going to get this over as quickly as possible."

She has no other choice.

Political insiders say moving quickly to build a government is Angela Merkel's last chance of survival. Any delay will mean her political death, either by Chancellor Schroeder's hand or, just as likely, rivals within her own Christian Democratic party who have never been comfortable with the eastern German Protestant woman in a political leadership that is overwhelmingly male, western and Catholic. Indeed, there may have been method to the madness of Chancellor Schroeder's bellicose appearance on a post-election television show last night, leaving viewers shaking their heads in disbelief and prompting the Berliner Zeitung to interview a psychiatrist, who described Mr. Schroeder's outburst as an "infantile reaction." The chancellor loudly declared himself the winner, though he had lost, and that "his" Social Democrats would never join a grand coalition with Ms. Merkel.

A Social Democratic party insider said Mr. Schroeder's game plan is increasingly clear. He will plant so many obstacles to Ms. Merkel's ability to form a coalition that she is forced to throw up her hands and call for new elections. Having regained so much ground in the final weeks of the election, Mr. Schroeder believes the momentum would then be his. The men-in-waiting of the Christian Democratic party – leading provincial governors who have never favored Ms. Merkel – would likely take out their long knives and try to replace her before the next vote.

Yet what is behind Ms. Merkel's decline? And who, besides Ms. Merkel, will be this election's losers?

The truth is that Merkel's injuries have been largely self-inflicted. Germans were no less against change when they put her significantly ahead of Mr. Schroeder throughout most of the period after he called for early elections in May. They know the country is in trouble, but weren't sold that Ms. Merkel was its salvation.

German leaders traditionally have inspired trust (Konrad Adenauer, Helmut Kohl, Helmut Schmidt). They have also led through charisma (Willy Brandt). Yet Ms. Merkel neither inspired German voters nor charmed them during her campaign. It didn't help that she is a woman in a society where women have never held the country's highest political position nor its top chief executive jobs, and Christian Democratic pollsters to the end weren't sure what impact this would have on legendarily conservative German voters. Mr. Schroeder used comparisons of Ms. Merkel to Margaret Thatcher as a way to frighten voters – among whom the British leader isn't respected for how she remade her country economically but rather is seen as harsh and "unsozial."

Growth isn't as great an allure to most Germans as stability.

Ms. Merkel's problem among German voters, however, wasn't that she was too strong. Rather, the criticism heard most often about her yesterday in the wake of her moral defeat was that she was "wishy-washy" (pronounced, in German, vishy-vahshy), that she was a purveyor of zigzag politics. It wasn't so much that Germans in such great numbers opposed reform, but rather she hadn't convinced them she could guide it.

The biggest misstep of the campaign came in how she managed her choice as top economic adviser, Paul Kirchhof, who during the campaign called for a flat tax of 25% on all incomes. Though Ms. Merkel had chosen him, she at first appeared to distance herself from Mr. Kirchhof, then support him, in the end leaving voters not quite sure how she felt about him. In the campaign's final days, she brought onto the team long-time party rival Friedrich Merz, an economic expert whose views are more palatable to most Germans. Mr. Kirchhof resigned yesterday from Ms. Merkel's shadow cabinet, the party's first sacrifice.

"She failed to project and convince," said Jeffrey Gedmin, director of the Aspen Institute Berlin. "She didn't convince voters she had the plan and the capability."

The other losers from Germany's political stalemate will be the European and world economy. In the wake of this month's election victory for Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who ran on an economic-change agenda, investors began to speak of a potential "Angela Koizumi" impact. Their argument was that the world economy has been running on just two cylinders -- the U.S. and China -- and that the two September elections could get all four cylinders pumping, as Germany could shift Europe.

"It's going to be a very unsettling period," said John Kornblum, a former U.S. ambassador to Germany who heads the Berlin office of investment bank Lazard Freres. "Business doesn't like insecurity and uncertainty."

Yet the German stock market index fell only 1.4% yesterday, and some investors are speaking of a buying opportunity. What they understand is that Germany's failing reforms have made the country a two-speed economy. Even as the German economy overall has seen slow growth, many of its companies have responded to global competition by cutting costs and become among the world's healthiest competitors. They've also lowered labor costs as individual unions, hoping to hold onto their remaining jobs, have grown more compromising. And as those German corporations build up profits, they are buying up companies in healthier economies.

Just today Deutsche Post announced it would buy British rival Excel for 3.7 billion pounds, or $6.72 billion. Early this month, the German utility company E.on confirmed a planned 10 billion pound bid for Scottish Power. It is already the owner of Powergen, the U.K.'s second largest electricity provider. Ms. Merkel is unlikely to become Germany's Maggie Thatcher, but her country's companies are investing in the more liberal economy Ms. Thatcher helped create.

Germany's companies have learned that their challenge is global and not domestic, and they will move if their country won't. It was a message that Angela Merkel tried to carry to the German voter albeit unsuccessfully, telling The Wall Street Journal early in the campaign that her country could no longer redistribute what it didn't produce. The fact that she failed to convince German voters that she could best lead them won't change the economic forces that were at the center of her message.

Colombian Violence Spills Over (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, September 20, 2005

URENA, Venezuela -- Colombian paramilitaries and Marxist guerrillas are running kidnapping, extortion and smuggling rackets as they infiltrate Urena and other communities near Venezuela's border, residents and officials say.

"There are more and more FARC in Apure and in Tachira [two western border states of Venezuela] present in the communities, and they are recruiting," said Virginia Trimarco, regional representative of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

"That makes people inside the country, and the Venezuelans, worried about security and selective killings," she said, near the end of four years of working in Venezuela and more than 20 years in Latin America.

FARC is the acronym in Spanish of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, a guerrilla army founded in 1964 by the Communist Party of Colombia.

On the outskirts of this hot, dusty town several hundred yards from the border, Colombian refugees fleeing the violence take shelter in dusty shacks of paper and branches.

Mrs. Trimarco estimates there are about 1.5 million Colombian refugees now living on the Venezuelan side of the border. Government estimates are as high as 3 million, and nongovernmental organizations have put the number as low as 350,000.

Venezuelan cattle ranchers and a local state official -- who asked not to be named -- said the government of President Hugo Chavez turns a blind eye to FARC guerrillas operating in Venezuela, pushed to the border by the success of the U.S.-backed Plan Colombia, aimed at eradicating the cocaine trade in Colombia that funds the rebels.

Right-wing Colombian paramilitaries are not far behind them, running "protection" operations.

Restaurant owners, taxi drivers and even Colombian refugees are forced to pay what is locally known as a "vaccination" -- money to protect themselves from these armed groups.

The FARC's favorite fundraisers are kidnapping for ransom and cocaine trafficking. Venezuela is a major transshipment point for Colombian cocaine headed for the United States and elsewhere.

Illicit commerce rife

"There is arms trafficking, drug trafficking, people trafficking," said Mrs. Trimarco, one of the few officials ready to speak out about what many in these border towns will say only in private.

"The situation is slipping out of their control. Nobody wants confrontation or war, but the military are worried," she said.

Much of the violence is invisible. Villages of whitewashed houses with red-tiled roofs clinging to the sides of the Andean foothills appear idyllic, but cafes are guarded with shotguns at night and drivers head home after 11 p.m.

"As [Colombia's President Alvaro] Uribe pushes his war and illegal armed groups to the borders, they are moving over the borders, and moving their [cocaine] labs into neighboring countries," said Mrs. Trimarco.

"The border areas are heavy with conflict between the illegal armed groups fighting for turf," she said.

Venezuelan ranchers reportedly sometimes hire Colombian paramilitaries to protect themselves -- either from the FARC or from rural workers trying to invade their land. Even so, in towns like San Cristobal, there are daily kidnappings and assassinations; the local La Nacion newspaper even runs a daily kidnapping column.

Hundreds of beat-up Dodges, Fords and Chevrolets from the 1970s -- the period of Venezuela's last oil boom -- make the crossing every day, carting as much as 100 extra gallons of gasoline in specially built tanks.

Gasoline in Venezuela costs about 18 cents per liter -- 72 cents a gallon -- but about 85 cents per liter -- $3.40 per gallon -- in Colombia. In addition to being a motor fuel, gasoline is also used in the processing of cocaine.

Moms, children hide

Colombian women who have survived the killings of their villages come straggling over the border with numerous children in tow. They settle in dusty shantytowns like El Cuji on the outskirts of Urena, and until they get Venezuelan papers, they are not allowed to travel more than 10 kilometers [about 6.2 miles] from the border.

Their shacks are not much more than mud and paper, sometimes just plastic bags and empty flour sacks glued together and held up on sticks above the dirt floor. Many of the children suffer from respiratory diseases and blisters from the unsanitary conditions.

Local government officials fill each family's drum with water, but it runs out fast, and families are forced to cope. The lucky ones, whose children or newfound husbands do underpaid work in small factories nearby, pool their money to buy extra water.

The UNHCR, along with Caritas and Jesuit Relief Services, two Roman Catholic charity groups, struggle with meager resources to integrate the asylum seekers into the Venezuelan community and process their claims. But many of the Colombians streaming across the border are too afraid to identify themselves.

"There is a great degree of insecurity, because of the high rate of murder and crime" all along the border, said Jenncy Penaranda, a UNHCR protection assistant. The husband of one woman seeking help was slain last month on the dirt track outside his home, she said.

A 34-year-old mother of seven bathed her youngest child, who stood naked in a cement wash tub, using a small plastic pail to pour water over the crying child, trying to keep her children clean to prevent the diarrhea and skin diseases that plague many people here.

"I came from Colombia four years ago because of the violence," said the mother afterward, as she balanced one of a pair of twin girls on her knee while sitting on a broken chair. She asked that her name and those of her children not be used.

"I lived in a village far from the border, but my kids were in danger," she said, light brown hair blowing around her face. "They would cut off people's ears. I was so scared I could not even sleep."

One of her young sons added from behind his mother's shoulder: "And cut their tongues out." Life for this young mother and other families nearby is measurably better, she said. But the guerrillas and paramilitaries that tortured and killed their fathers, brothers and husbands have not disappeared with their move to Venezuela.

Her husband works in a furniture factory, earning the equivalent of $10 per week, barely enough for water and food for the family of nine. A teenage son manages to bring home about $2.50 a week in bolivars for working in a motorbike maintenance shop.

'Slow procedure'

"There is no safety," said the mother. "Anyone can come here and rip the wall," she said, gesturing at the burlap bags and tin roof beside her.

"We also pay the 'vaccination' here for protection," she added when the UNHCR representatives were out of earshot. "Someone comes to pick up the money."

Government commissions have dealt with 700 asylum requests in the past two years, and only 300 applicants were considered refugees, said Mrs. Trimarco in her office in Caracas.

"It is a very slow procedure, but they are slowly getting better. At this pace, we will not meet the needs," she said.

And the needs increase every day as the guerrillas and paramilitaries penetrate deeper into the border towns, not only of Venezuela, but also of neighboring Brazil and Ecuador, said Mrs. Trimarco.

Rights Report Details Uzbek Crackdown After Uprising In May (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

MOSCOW, Sept. 19 - The government of Uzbekistan, stung by the outcry in the West over its bloody suppression of a prison break and anti-government demonstration in May, has engaged for months in a ferocious crackdown against those who have tried to expose the brutality, says a report released Monday by a prominent human rights organization.

The report, by Human Rights Watch, the New York-based organization, says the crackdown included widespread arrests, threats and harassment and was directed at witnesses, survivors, human rights defenders, journalists and political workers.

The report says that some victims have been beaten and that some have been forced to issue scripted confessions on state television, saying they were misled into attending the anti-government demonstration and begging for forgiveness from President Islam A. Karimov.

While many elements of the crackdown have previously been described, including the indefinite detention of human rights workers and intense coercion against the families of refugees who fled Uzbekistan after the demonstration, the report was the most thorough description to date of the crackdown in one of the most autocratic of the former Soviet states.

It also framed the crackdown in the larger context of the unease Uzbekistan's leadership has displayed since revolutions in Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan have swept aside other corrupt and clannish post-Soviet leaders.

Mr. Karimov "fears he is the next domino," Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, said in a telephone interview. He said the crackdown was not merely an attempt to airbrush the ugliest event in recent Uzbek history, but also a program to stifle dissent and the development of civil society.

The uprising in the northeastern city of Andijon, which survivors said was smashed by fusillades of gunfire in the hours after it began on May 13, ended with the deaths of hundreds of civilians, according to survivors' accounts and previous investigations by journalists and independent organizations, including the Organization for the Security and Cooperation in Europe and Human Rights Watch.

Uzbekistan has so far resisted Western calls for an open international investigation into the origins of the uprising and the Uzbek actions to disperse it.

Instead, it has described the uprising as the work of international Islamic terrorists. It has also shifted its foreign relations, aligning more closely with Russia and China. It has issued an eviction notice to the United States for an air base near the Afghan border that the Americans have used since 2001.

Mr. Karimov, a former Soviet bureaucrat who has ruled Uzbekistan since its independence in 1991, has also suggested that Western governments have worked surreptitiously to overthrow him and even collaborated with the possible terrorists. He further said that Western journalists had advance knowledge of the uprising, as if they, too, were agents of some foreign plot.

He has offered no proof for his accusations, and his government was silent about the report on Monday.

Telephones at the Foreign Ministry's information office in Tashkent, the Uzbek capital, were not answered or were busy, as has often been the case since May 13. When a correspondent called the Uzbek Consulate in New York and inquired about the report, the employee who answered promptly hung up.

Uzbekistan Accused Of Coercion In Protest Probe (WP)

By Peter Finn

MOSCOW, Sept. 19 -- The Uzbek government has detained and questioned hundreds of people in a campaign of intimidation aimed at securing testimony that backs its version of events about the killing of demonstrators in the city of Andijan in May, according to a new report by Human Rights Watch.

"Police and security agents threatened or severely beat many of those detained in order to coerce them to confess to belonging to extremist religious organizations and bearing arms while participating in the May 13 protest," the New York-based advocacy organization said in an 81-page report titled "Burying the Truth: Uzbekistan Rewrites the Story of the Andijan Massacre."

The first 15 people charged with organizing an armed revolt in Andijan were to go on trial Tuesday in the Uzbek capital, Tashkent. Prosecutors allege that the 15 were part of a broad conspiracy, financed from abroad, that was designed to overthrow the government and replace it with an Islamic state. Prosecutors said another 106 people may face similar charges.

The deputy chief prosecutor, Anvar Nabiyev, said last week that "external destructive forces" had given organizers of the revolt $300,000. He said two-thirds of it came from the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan, a group listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. government.

Human rights groups charge that government forces killed hundreds of unarmed civilians in Andijan after a day of protests that were largely driven by anger over poverty and government repression. The protests began when armed men freed 23 prominent businessmen from a local prison early on May 13; the men were on trial for alleged membership in a banned Islamic group.

The mass killing led to international demands for an independent investigation, but the Uzbek authorities rejected those calls, leading relations with the United States, among other Western countries, to sour. Uzbekistan ordered the U.S. government to remove its forces from an airfield the Pentagon was using to support operations in Afghanistan.

After the mass killing, Andijan was effectively closed to outsiders, and locals were warned not to talk about the incident. Many people were visited at home by neighborhood committees. The government announced that 187 people were killed and 287 wounded in the violence, and it said most of them were terrorists.

"It was in this atmosphere of fear that the authorities detained hundreds -- and perhaps thousands -- of people in Andijan with the purported aim of obtaining testimony about the crimes committed on May 13, as the government has defined them," Human Rights Watch said.

The government has also arrested human rights workers, journalists and political activists who attempted to investigate the killings. At least 11 activists have been detained and another 15 have been forced into exile, according to Human Rights Watch. One long-time activist, Saidjahon Zainbitdinov, who was widely quoted after the killings, has been in prison since May 21 on charges of terrorism and sowing panic among the population.

In Tashkent and other cities, human rights activists have been the target of "hate rallies and other public denunciations in which local community leaders vilify them, calling them Islamic extremists and enemies of the people, and mobs attempt to run them out of town," according to Human Rights Watch.

The organization called on the United States to freeze any remaining military and counterterrorism assistance to the Uzbek military and said the European Union should suspend assistance to the country. The United States and the E.U. should also stop issuing visas to senior members of the Uzbek government, the group said.

Lining Up To Be Raped? (NYT)

By Nichola D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 20, 2005

Our close ally President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan visited the U.S. last week and fretted aloud about a surprising problem: The "easiest way" for Pakistani women to make money is to get raped, he said, so they're lining up to be raped and thus making him look bad.

That's right. He's nuts.

"You must understand the environment in Pakistan," The Washington Post quoted him as saying. "This has become a moneymaking concern. A lot of people say if you want to go abroad and get a visa for Canada or citizenship and be a millionaire, get yourself raped."

That comment got Mr. Musharraf in hot water. So over the weekend, Mr. Musharraf denied that he had ever said any such thing - noting that if he had, he would have been "stupid."

True.

The Washington Post reviewed its tapes and reported that it had quoted him correctly. It also added an additional quote from the same interview, in which Mr. Musharraf spoke of rape as an avenue to riches: "It is the easiest way of doing it. Every second person now wants to."

Sexual violence has become a sensitive issue for Mr. Musharraf because of the pioneering work of women like Mukhtaran Bibi, whom a tribal council sentenced to be gang-raped as a way to punish her brother - and who then used her compensation money to start schools and launch a nationwide anti-rape campaign. After I wrote about her last year, Times readers sent her a total of $160,000, which she is using to start an ambulance service, operate schools and campaign for women's rights.

Fearing that Ms. Mukhtaran's anti-rape campaign would make his country look bad, General Musharraf barred her from traveling to the U.S. to attend a conference. When she protested to me and others, the government kidnapped her to keep her from complaining, releasing her only after Condi Rice raised the issue with the Pakistani government.

Then in July and August, I wrote about Dr. Shazia Khalid, a Pakistani physician whom the authorities drugged, put in a mental hospital, threatened to kill and finally exiled to keep her from recounting her rape.

The latest victim to come forward is Sonia Naz, a 23-year-old woman whose husband disappeared. Desperate, she went to the National Assembly building in Islamabad to see if she could get help. Then, she says, the police arrested her and repeatedly stripped her, raped her and beat her.

Embarrassed by these revelations, Mr. Musharraf held a conference in Pakistan this month on women's issues. He wore a necktie with blue and pink, which he said could reflect cooperation between men and women - and then he denounced Dr. Shazia.

Here in New York on Saturday, General Musharraf held a meeting with an invited audience to show himself off as a sensitive man. The meeting started awkwardly when he tried to demonstrate his feminist credentials by saying he opposed violence against women because it's unchivalrous toward the weaker sex. Then, in response to skeptical questions, Mr. Musharraf lost his temper, shouting at audience members and threatening to "get" anyone who exposed Pakistan's problems to the world.

"He totally lost it," said Yasmeen Hassan, a Pakistani lawyer in New York who was present. "It's so unbecoming of a president to get into shouting matches, and to say, 'I'm going to get you.' "

Meanwhile, activists in Pakistan say that the government is stepping up its harassment of women's groups. I tried to phone Ms. Mukhtaran yesterday, but the government seemed to be blocking international calls to her line. Finally I was able to interview her by a circuitous route. She said that all her mail is now intercepted and that the government had just transferred away two senior police officials who had supervised her bodyguards and tried to protect her.

"I feel insecure and controlled," she said.

The irony is that while he's a nitwit on social issues, General Musharraf has proved himself to be a good economic manager, and the 7 percent growth rates generated by his reforms will help undermine fundamentalism and sexual violence in the long run. During his visit, Mr. Musharraf pressed for a free-trade area between the U.S. and Pakistan, and that's a great idea to promote Pakistan's development.

So let's give Mr. Musharraf a free-trade deal - but only on the condition that he clamp down not on Pakistani women fighting against rape, but on Osama bin Laden.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ACTING DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Peter D. Keisler
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Division

SUBJECT: Civil Division Weekly Report to the Attorney General

A. NEXT WEEK

- Government's Brief Due in Case Challenging Defense of Marriage Act
  Smelt v. County of Orange [9th Cir.]. Plaintiffs Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer filed this suit against California state government entities and officials seeking to enter into a same sex marriage, and also challenged provisions of the federal Defense of Marriage Act. The United States intervened to defend the federal law, and the district court upheld the definition of marriage included in the Act. Plaintiffs appealed, and on September 28, the United States will file its brief in the Ninth Circuit defending the constitutionality of the Act.

B. THIS WEEK

- Court Sets Schedule for Resolution of Remaining Claims in Energy Task Force Freedom of Information Act Case
  Judicial Watch v. Department of Energy, et al., Natural Resources Defense Council v. Department of Energy, and Natural Resources Defense Council v. Department of Interior, et al. [District of Columbia]. On September 13, Judge Paul Friedman convened a status conference in these consolidated Freedom of Information Act cases seeking documents relating to the work of the National Energy Policy Development Group. At the status hearing, Judge Friedman accepted the parties' joint proposal for resolving all remaining claims. On September 20, the Department of the Interior will complete its re-processing of a group of 29 documents designated by the Plaintiffs. On October 3, the Department of the Interior and the Council on Environmental Quality will complete processing of all documents created by Bureau of Land Management employee Ronald Montagna while he served on the White House Task Force on Energy Project Streamlining. On November 3, the parties will file a joint status report with an agreed-upon briefing schedule for attorneys' fees.

C. LAST WEEK

- Fifth Circuit Holds that the Unauthorized Disclosure of a Document Prepared by the National Drug Intelligence Center Implicates the Privacy Act
  Jacobs v. National Drug Intelligence Center, et al. [5th Cir.; Southern District of Texas]. On August 25, the Fifth Circuit (Reavley, Jolly, Prado) reversed the grant of summary judgment to the government in this action under the Privacy Act and remanded for further proceedings. Plaintiff seeks damages for the unauthorized disclosure of an Executive Summary prepared by the National Drug Intelligence Center in connection with a report concerning an alleged drug trafficking organization. The Executive Summary was not itself stored in a "system of records" within the meaning of the Privacy Act, but the court of appeals nonetheless concluded that the statute was triggered because information about the plaintiff that formed part of the Executive Summary had been retrieved from a system of records.

- D.C. Circuit Dismisses as Moot Appeal from Order Granting Writs of Execution Against Iranian Consular Bank Accounts
  Rubin v. Islamic Republic of Iran [D.C. Cir.; District Court for the District of Columbia]. In a per curiam order issued on September 1, the D.C. Circuit (Sentelle, Henderson, Garland) granted a motion filed jointly by the parties and dismissed as moot the cross-appeals in this case. The Government appealed from a district court's order denying the Government's motion to quash writs of execution issued to judgment-creditors of Iran against two Iranian consular bank accounts that the United States was protecting under its international obligations. After plaintiffs disavowed any interest in pursuing their interest in the writs, the parties filed a joint motion seeking to dismiss the appeals and to vacate the writs of execution as moot. Although the court of appeals dismissed the appeals as moot, it remanded to the district court for consideration whether to vacate the writs.

- $1,108,852 Collected For Transtechnology Corp. Fraud Settlement
  United States of America ex rel. Lorenzo Marrero v. Transtechnology Corporation and Breeze-Eastern, Inc.[D.N.J.]. On September 6, Transtechnology agreed to make installment payments of $1,108,852 to the United States in final settlement of the United States' fraud claims against Transtechnology Coroporation and its sole division, Breeze-Eastern, Inc., to settle allegations raised in a qui tam action that Breeze-Eastern failed to properly perform helicopter hook and rescue hoist repairs for the United States.

- Seventh Circuit Determines That Wealthy Colombian Landowners Constitute A "Particular Social Group"
  Orejuela v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On September 8, the Seventh Circuit reversed the Board's denial of asylum and withholding of removal to Colombian alien. The Immigration Judge determined that death threats from a Colombian guerilla group were based on the aliens' wealth, which was insufficient to show persecution on account of a statutory ground, and the Board affirmed without opinion. The Court held that the aliens' status as "wealthy landowners" constituted a "particular social group" in the context of the Colombian class- and wealth-based internal conflict, and remanded to the Board for further proceedings consistent with its opinion.

- Sixth Circuit Reverses District Court Order Setting Aside Attorney General's Scope of Employment Certification and Remanding Suit to State Court
  Osborn v. Haley; Gaye Luber; Land Between the Lakes Association, InCorporation [6th Cir.; Western District of Kentucky]. In a decision issued on September 8, involving the Westfall Act, the Sixth Circuit (Cook, Moore, Gwin, D.J.) reversed a district court order rejecting the Attorney General's certification that a federal employee acted within the scope of his office or employment at the time of the incident out of which a plaintiff's tort claim arose and remanding the suit to state court for further proceedings. Initially, the court concluded that the Westfall Act does not require a district court to accept as true a plaintiff's claim that some harm-inducing incident occurred. Second, it held that, even if the district court rejects the certification as a substantive matter, the action must still remain in district court because the certification under the Westfall Act shall conclusively establish scope of office or employment for purposes of removal.

- Settlement of United States' Medicare Secondary Payer Claims Arising Out Of Exposure to PCB's Approved
  Tolbert v. Monsanto [Northern District of Alabama]. On September 8, 2005, Judge Clemon approved a settlement between the administrator of the Tolbert Qualified Settlement Fund and the Department of Health and Human Services that will resolve the United States' Medicare Secondary Payer claims against approximately 1,800 Medicare beneficiaries who are receiving settlements in two cases against Monsanto Company and Pharmacia Corporation. The plaintiffs asserted in their litigation that the companies' release of PCB's over a fifty-year period had caused a variety of medical ailments. Pursuant to the settlement agreement, the United States will receive approximately $2,000,000, which is 10 percent of the amount awarded to most Medicare beneficiaries.

- Federal Circuit Affirms Trial Court's Decision Awarding No Damages To Spent Nuclear Fuel Plaintiff
  Indiana Michigan Power Co. v. United States [5th Cir.] (Mayer, Lourie, Bryson). On September 9, 2005, the court affirmed the trial court's decision awarding the plaintiff no damages for the Department of Energy's delay in beginning spent nuclear fuel acceptance under a standardized contract. The plaintiff claimed that, because Energy had not begun spent fuel acceptance by the statutory and contractual deadline of January 31, 1998, Energy has partially, but not totally, breached the contract. On appeal, the appellate court found that, although plaintiffs in the spent nuclear fuel cases are entitled to pursue damages claims for mitigation costs pre-dating Energy's partial breach, the trial court had properly found that the plaintiff here had not established causation for any pre-breach costs. The appellate court also found that, in a partial breach case, the plaintiff is only entitled to recover damages that have been actually incurred by the date that it filed its suit and that any future costs incurred because of partial breaches may only be sought in future suits after the costs are incurred. Accordingly, it affirmed the trial court's decision to award no future damages.

- Merit Systems Protection Board Upholds Removal of Immigration Judge
Levinsky v. Department of Justice [Merit Systems Protection Board]. On September 9, the Board granted the Department of Justice's petition for review. The Executive Office for Immigration Review had charged Mr. Levinsky, an Immigration Judge, with repeatedly using ethnically insensitive generalizations and profanity in the courtroom, and had removed him from his position. Mr. Levsinky appealed the removal. In June 2004, after a four-day evidentiary hearing, an Administrative Judge upheld the agency's charges against Mr. Levinsky but mitigated the penalty to a 60-day suspension. The Department of Justice filed a petition for review, and in its September 9 decision, the Merit Systems Protection Board sustained the penalty of removal. The Board found that the agency reasonably doubted Mr. Levinsky's potential for rehabilitation, given his history of responding to informal warnings by co-workers with only temporary improvements in behavior. The Board emphasized the nature and seriousness of Mr. Levinsky's offense, given that his position as an Immigration Judge required him to avoid even the appearance of any ethnic bias.

- En Banc Ninth Circuit To Hear Case Striking Down Regulation Authorizing Summary Reinstatement Of Prior Removal Orders
Morales-Izquierdo v. Ashcroft [9th Cir.]. On September 12, the Ninth Circuit granted the government's petition for rehearing en banc in this case, in which a panel of the Court, in a published decision struck down as ultra vires a regulation prescribing procedures for an immigration officer to summarily reinstate a prior removal order against a recidivist alien who has illegally reentered the country after previously having been removed or voluntarily departed under a removal order. That decision also required reinstatements to take place in full removal hearings before immigration judges.

- Sixth Circuit Holds that Section 3 of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 is Permissible Spending Clause Legislation
Cutter v. Wilkinson [6th Cir.; Southern District Ohio]. On September 13, the Sixth Circuit (Moore, Gilman, Tarnow) held that section 3 of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA) is a permissible exercise of Congress's Spending Clause powers and is not barred by the Tenth Amendment. Section 3 (42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1) provides that no state or local government may impose a substantial burden on the religious exercise of an institutionalized person unless the government can show that the burden furthers a compelling governmental interest by the least restrictive means. The court of appeals' decision is consistent with prior rulings of the Seventh and Ninth Circuits.

- Second Circuit Affirms Dismissal of an Americans With Disabilities Act Claim Seeking to Compel Medicaid Reimbursement for Costs of Care at a Specific "Assisted Living" Facility

Leocata v. Department of Social Services [2d Cir.; District of Connecticut]. On September 13, in an unpublished order, the Second Circuit (Walker, Jacobs, Hall) affirmed the dismissal of plaintiff's claim that the "reasonable accommodation" requirements of the Americans With Disabilities Act, as interpreted in Olmstead v. L.C. by Zimring, 527 U.S. 581 (1999), compelled the State of Connecticut to cover all costs necessary for her to remain in a specific assisted living facility, even though Medicaid generally covers such costs only in nursing facilities. Accepting our arguments, the court held that the plaintiff could not obtain the relief she sought (Medicaid coverage for room and board at a specific assisted living facility) because (1) applicable Medicaid waiver provisions do not allow coverage of "room and board" costs, and (2) the facility where she sought to remain was not a participant in the Medicaid waiver program and thus could not accept Medicaid funding in any event.

- District Court Strikes Down Pledge of Allegiance on Establishment Clause Grounds
Newdow v. The Congress of the United States et al. [Eastern District of California]. On September 14, Senior Judge Lawrence Karlton held unconstitutional the practice of several California school districts of reciting the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools. Plaintiff Michael Newdow had challenged the Pledge's recitation in previous litigation, and, in February 2003, the Ninth Circuit had held unconstitutional, under the Establishment Clause, the policy of Elk Grove School District of reciting the Pledge. The Supreme Court, however, reversed that ruling in June 2004, holding that Newdow lacked standing to pursue the case -- he did not have custody of his daughter who attended public school. In this case, however, Newdow has been joined by other parent-plaintiffs. Judge Karlton found that those other plaintiffs had standing to challenge the various school districts' Pledge recitation policies. Judge Karlton then found that he was "bound" by the Ninth Circuit's prior ruling, reasoning that the Supreme Court's reversal of that ruling had been based on "prudential standing" grounds, not on Article III jurisdictional grounds. Judge Karlton did not reach the separate issue of plaintiffs' challenge to the Pledge of Allegiance statute; because he held that the school districts' practices are unconstitutional and must be enjoined, Judge Karlton stated that once an injunction enjoining the school districts' recitation practices is entered, any claims relating to the federal statute will be moot.

- District Court Dismisses Establishment Clause Challenge to Inaugural Prayer
Newdow v. Bush, et al. [District of Columbia]. On September 14, Judge John D. Bates granted defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff Michael Newdow's complaint. Mr. Newdow, a professed atheist, sought to prevent President Bush from having prayers recited by invited clergy at the 2005 Presidential Inauguration. In dismissing Newdow's complaint, the Court found that Newdow was precluded from relitigating his standing to assert his claim due to the Ninth Circuit's rejection of Newdow's prior challenge to inaugural prayer in connection with President Bush's 2001 Inauguration. Judge Bates also determined that, aside from preclusion, Newdow did not have standing to assert his claims in the present case because he did not have a personal connection to the Inauguration, and thus lacked a sufficient injury in fact.

- District Court Awards Both Record Civil Penalties and Disgorgement for Telemarketer's Violations of a Consent Decree and the Telemarketing Sales Rule

United States v. Richard L. Prochnow [Northern District of Georgia] (Forrester). On September 14, 2005, the court awarded the United States $4,911,730.00 in civil penalties and $2,461,305.00 disgorgement plus interest for Prochnow's violations of a Consent Decree and the Telemarketing Sales Rule. This is a record civil penalty award for the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection. In assessing civil penalties, the court rejected Prochnow's efforts to portray himself as an absentee business owner and specifically found that Prochnow indeed directed the company's telemarketing activities. The court awarded disgorgement because the evidence established that Prochnow used misleading and deceptive practices to get consumers to purchase the magazines and to prevent them, unless they filed a complaint with the Better Business Bureau or law enforcement authorities, from cancelling them

- Eleventh Circuit Grants Petition for Permission to Appeal in Anthrax Tort Case
Stevens v. United States [11th Cir.; Southern District of Florida]. On September 14, the Eleventh Circuit (per curiam: Birch, Black, Pryor), granted the government's petition for permission to appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), allowing interlocutory review of a district court decision denying the government's motion to dismiss a case brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act under Florida law. The claim seeks to hold the United States liable for the death of Robert Stevens, a photo editor in Florida who was one of the first victims of the anthrax attacks in Fall 2001; the case is extremely sensitive because the investigation into the attacks is ongoing and could be disrupted by discovery and trial in this civil lawsuit. The court of appeals will consider the government's argument that Florida law imposes no duty of care on a laboratory operator to prevent a third party attacker from obtaining a dangerous substance from the laboratory and then using it as a weapon in a criminal activity.

- District Court Upholds Asset Freeze Against Islamic Charity Designated as Terrorist Organization
Islamic American Relief Agency v. Unidentified Federal Bureau of Investigation Agents, et al. [District of Columbia]. On September 15, Judge Reggie B. Walton ruled in favor of the government on all pending motions, including the government's motion for summary judgment. The Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) had designated plaintiff, a purported charity based in Columbia, Missouri, as a "Specially Designated Global Terrorist" under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1701-1707, and Executive Order No. 13,224. On the same day as Office of Foreign Assets Control's designation, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other law enforcement agencies executed a criminal search warrant against the Missouri organization. Plaintiff challenged both the Office of Foreign Assets Control and Federal Bureau of Investigation actions on a variety of statutory and constitutional grounds. Judge Walton had previously denied plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction to unblock its assets, and with this most recent opinion, Judge Walton: (1) granted the government's motion for summary judgment, finding that "the agency's decision to block the Islamic American Relief Agency-United States of America's assets was not arbitrary and capricious, but is in fact supported by substantial evidence in the record and warranted by the facts contained therein," as well as finding no constitutional violations; (2) granted the government's motion to dismiss the individually named defendant, finding lack of personal jurisdiction; (3) denied plaintiff's motion for reconsideration of the Court's denial of its motion for preliminary injunction; and (4) denied plaintiff's motion for attorney's fees from blocked funds, finding that the claim had not been properly pled.

- Court of Federal Claims Awards $436 Million In* Winstar-Related Case
  Long Island Savings Bank, FSB v. United States [Federal Claims]. On September 15, 2005, following a five-week trial, the Judge Lettow awarded cost-of-replacement damages in the amount of $252 million and incidental damages in the amount of $17.7 million. Plaintiffs had originally sought expectancy damages of $696.3 million. The court also awarded a $165.5 million tax "gross-up" on the cost-of-replacement claim, concluding that the award would be taxed and that the "gross up" therefore was necessary to place the plaintiffs in the position they would have occupied but for the breach. The court rejected plaintiffs' additional claim for lost profits in the amount of $78 million and plaintiffs' claim for so-called "reduced initial public offering proceeds" in the amount of $97.4 million. Prior to trial, the court granted our motions for summary judgment with respect to plaintiffs' restitution claim of $548.4 million and reliance damages claim of $233 million.

- United States Settles Upcoding Case Against Georgia Hospital for a Recovery of $800,000
  United States ex rel. Health Outcomes Technologies v. Candler Hospital [Southern District of Georgia]. The United States reached a settlement with a Georgia hospital in July concerning claims that the hospital assigned false codes to pneumonia patient hospitalizations in order to increase its reimbursement from Medicare; Judge Edenfield recently entered an order unsealing the matter.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Bars Military Officers And Analysts From Testifying (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - The Pentagon said Tuesday that it had blocked several military officers and intelligence analysts from testifying at an open Congressional hearing about a highly classified intelligence program that, the officers have said, identified a ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks as a potential terrorist a year before the attacks.

The officers and intelligence analysts had been scheduled to testify on Wednesday about the program, known as Able Danger, at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Bryan Whitman, a Defense Department spokesman, said in a statement that open testimony "would not be appropriate."

"We have expressed our security concerns and believe it is simply not possible to discuss Able Danger in any great detail in an open public forum," Mr. Whitman said.

He offered no other explanation of the Pentagon's reasoning.

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the committee, said he was surprised by the Pentagon's decision because "so much of this has already been in the public domain, and I think that the American people need to know what happened here."

Mr. Specter said in a telephone interview that he intended to go ahead with the hearing on Wednesday and hoped that it "may produce a change of heart by the Department of Defense in answering some very basic questions."

Two military officers - an active-duty captain in the Navy and a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve - have recently said publicly that they were involved with Able Danger and that the program's analysts identified Mohamed Atta, the Egyptian-born ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks, by name as a potential terrorist by early 2000.

They said they tried to share the information with the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the summer of 2000, more than a year before the attacks, but were blocked by Defense Department lawyers. F.B.I. officials, who answer to the jurisdiction of Mr. Specter's committee, have confirmed that the Defense Department abruptly canceled meetings in 2000 between the bureau's Washington field office and representatives of the Able Danger team.

The Pentagon had said that it interviewed three other people who were involved with Able Danger and who said that they, too, recalled the identification of Mr. Atta as a terrorist suspect. Mr. Specter said his staff had talked to all five of the potential witnesses and found that "credibility has been established" for all of them.

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Defense Department lawyers have blocked members of a data-mining intelligence team from testifying today before a congressional panel probing their claims that they identified the September 11 ringleaders as terrorists more than a year before the attacks.

The Senate Judiciary Committee sought testimony from several members of the team -- code-named Able Danger -- as part of an investigation into claims that the project identified Mohamed Atta and three of the other 18 hijackers as tied to al Qaeda in early 2000.

Mark Zaid, an attorney for Army Reserve Col. Tony Shaffer, said his client, a Defense Intelligence Agency liaison to the Able Danger team, was told in a letter not to testify.

The letter, which gave no reason for the order, was signed by the principal deputy general counsel for the Defense Intelligence Agency, Robert Berry.

Mr. Zaid said the team members "were told verbally that they would not be allowed to testify" and that the order was put in writing only with regard to his client at his request.

He said that the team leader, Navy Capt. Scott Philpott, civilian analyst James Smith and other members of the team had been denied permission to testify. A Judiciary Committee aide said panel staff members already have interviewed Capt. Philpott and Col. Shaffer.

No one at the Department of Defense or the Defense Intelligence Agency returned calls for comment yesterday.

Rep. Curt Weldon, the Pennsylvania Republican who first put the Able Danger team in contact with journalists, was concerned about the order, his staff said.

"It is unfortunate that we're trying to get answers ... and the people who could help us get them are not going to testify," said Russ Caso, the congressman's chief of staff.

Capt. Philpott said that chart, produced in January or February 2000, bore the name and likeness of Atta and linked him to a Brooklyn mosque that has been a center of Islamic extremism for more than 20 years.

Capt. Philpott was the special operations officer who ran the effort, an intelligence-led initiative to use data mining on massive amounts of "open source" information culled from the Internet, purchased from credit rating bureaus or other data brokers, or by other means that remain classified.

Detainee Hunger Strike Prompts Request For Health Records Access (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

Attorneys for several detainees at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, asked a federal judge for immediate access to their clients' medical records, saying they fear an eight-week-long hunger strike is growing more serious, according to court papers declassified yesterday.

Lawyers for a group of 17 Yemeni detainees told the court yesterday that, during an early August visit, some captives looked "gaunt and unwell" and that they fear their conditions have deteriorated. They complained to U.S. District Judge Henry H. Kennedy Jr. that the military and the Justice Department have refused to tell them or other lawyers about their clients' health status.

"Many participants . . . have stated their expectation of death and a growing number of detainees are now hospitalized and in grave condition," attorneys David Remes and Marc Falkoff wrote.

Military officials disputed that description, saying the number of detainees participating in the strike has recently declined. As of Sept. 12, the military said, 128 detainees were involved in the strike, which the Pentagon defines as refusing food or water for at least three consecutive days.

At that time, 18 were hospitalized, and were either having intravenous fluids forcibly administered or were being force-fed through nasal-gastric tubes. Yesterday, a military spokesman said, just 45 detainees had been refusing food or water for three or more days.

In a Sept. 12 e-mail, Justice Department attorney Andrew Warden wrote that the government is "not in a position" to provide health updates on hundreds of detainees.

Detainees on hunger strike are protesting what they describe as beatings at the prison and their indefinite detentions, their attorneys have said.

Disaster strikes

"In the presidential campaign last year, Democrats were said to be counting on some misfortune -- terrorists attacking on American soil, the Iraq War taking a turn for the worse, the economy going south -- to help them beat George W. Bush," Brendan Miniter writes at www.OpinionJournal.com.

"That didn't happen, of course. But now disaster has struck, and it's becoming increasingly clear that Democrats are better off for it. In ripping through the Gulf Coast, Hurricane Katrina has peeled back the lid on Republican rule, and many Americans aren't happy with what they see," Mr. Miniter said.

"This isn't about a slow response anymore. ... And unless they change course, Republicans will pay a steep price in next year's midterm elections and leave Democrats in the driver's seat for 2008.

"What President Bush, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and other Republicans haven't figured out yet is that deficit spending isn't a problem for them unless it endangers the broader conservative agenda. If it does, it will become the electoral issue.

"And what we're seeing is that Katrina is swamping every goal conservatives have, from limiting government to cutting taxes to reforming entitlement programs. Katrina spending has already imperiled plans to repeal the death tax, and Congress is already $60 billion into a spending binge.

"Handing out $2,000 debit cards was just the beginning. The conservative Congress has brought back the welfare state."

Back and forth

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, crows in a note to supporters that the DCCC "has already started with hard-hitting campaign ads and accelerated candidate recruitment."

"That claim is goofy," says Jonathan Collegio, who works for Mr. Emanuel's opposite number, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the National Republican Congressional Committee chairman.

"The DCCC is over $3 million in debt, and Emanuel lost five of his highest-profile challengers in the last week," Mr. Collegio told Ralph Z. Hallow of The Washington Times.

DCCC chief spokesman Bill Burton fired back: "After another week of Republican indictments and arrests, I'm surprised that the NRCC has time to comment on anything besides the efficiency of their bail bondsmen."

Weepy Dan

Former CBS News anchor Dan Rather said Monday that there is a climate of fear running through newsrooms stronger than he has ever seen in his more than four-decade career, according to a Hollywood Reporter article by Paul J. Gough.

Mr. Rather famously tangled with President Nixon and his aides during the Watergate years while Mr. Rather was a hard-charging White House correspondent.

Addressing the Fordham University School of Law in Manhattan, occasionally forcing back tears, he said that in the intervening years, politicians "of every persuasion" had gotten better at applying pressure on the conglomerates that own the broadcast networks. He called it a "new journalism order."

He said this pressure -- along with the "dumbed-down, tarted-up" coverage, the advent of 24-hour cable competition and the chase for ratings and demographics -- has taken its toll on the news business.

"All of this creates a bigger atmosphere of fear in newsrooms," Mr. Rather said.

Mr. Rather was accompanied by HBO Documentary and Family President Sheila Nevins, both of whom received lifetime achievement awards at the News and Documentary Emmy Awards on Monday evening.

Miss Nevin asked Mr. Rather whether he felt the same type of repressive forces in the Nixon administration as in the current Bush administration.

"No, I do not," Mr. Rather said.

Courting trouble

"It will be a damning indictment of petty partisanship in Washington if an overwhelming majority of the Senate does not vote to confirm John G. Roberts Jr. to be the next chief justice of the United States," the Los Angeles Times said yesterday in an editorial.

"As last week's confirmation hearings made clear, Roberts is an exceptionally qualified nominee, well within the mainstream of American legal thought, who deserves broad bipartisan support. If a majority of Democrats in the Senate vote against Roberts, they will reveal themselves as nothing more than self-defeating obstructionists. ...

"Even if one treats this vote merely as a tactical game, voting against an impressive, relatively moderate nominee hardly strengthens the Democrats' leverage" on the upcoming second nomination, the newspaper said.

"If Roberts fails to win their support, Bush may justifiably conclude that he needn't even bother trying to find a justice palatable to the center. And if Bush next nominates someone who is genuinely unacceptable to most Americans, it will be harder for Democrats to point that out if they cry wolf over Roberts."

Gitmo inmates

The number of detainees on a hunger strike at the prison at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has fallen by almost two-thirds since last week, a military official told the Associated Press yesterday.

Forty-five detainees are currently on the hunger strike, down from 131 last week, Guantanamo spokeswoman Lt. Angela King-Sweigart said in an e-mail message.

No explanation was given for the sharp decrease, and calls to military officials at Guantanamo went unanswered last night.

Fifteen of the 45 detainees on the hunger strike have been hospitalized, Lt. King-Sweigart said. She could not immediately say if any were being tube-fed. Several detainees have been tube-fed during the hunger strike, either through their noses or intravenously.

Mexico bulldozes

Mexican officials bulldozed 31 abandoned buildings yesterday along the U.S. border in a village that has been a staging ground for illegal aliens and drug smugglers.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Chihuahua Gov. Jose Reyes Baeza agreed last month that the demolition was needed to help end lawlessness in the village of Las Chepas, which has only about 35 full-time residents.

"Bulldozing abandoned buildings in Las Chepas is a major step that sends a strong signal to anyone involved in illegal criminal activity on the border that it will not be tolerated," Mr. Richardson said.

The operation was monitored from the U.S. side by Border Patrol agents, the Associated Press reports. Mr. Richardson declared a state of emergency last month in four New Mexico counties along or near the Mexican border.

Judge Holds Closed Hearing In Case Of Former CIA Contractor (AP)

By ESTES THOMPSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2005

In one of the final hearings before the scheduled start of the trial of a former CIA contractor accused of beating an Afghan detainee who later died, a federal judge closed his courtroom Tuesday to allow attorneys to discuss classified material.

Defense lawyers for David A. Passaro have said they want to review classified messages from the Central Intelligence Agency, Army Special Forces and military intelligence in Afghanistan for possible use in Passaro's case.

It wasn't clear what the lawyers discussed Tuesday, but federal law allows closed sessions to deal with classified information.

U.S. District Court Judge Terrence Boyle said his interest was in "making sure that when we close, we restrict the closed hearing to those things that can only be heard in a closed hearing."

Attorney Amanda Martin said her media clients wouldn't object to a proceeding that dealt with classified information privately and other material in public. Martin represented The Associated Press, The News & Observer of Raleigh and The Washington Post.

"We have not objected to closing the courtroom to deal with classified information," Martin said after the hearing. "We were here to repeat our request that the court rein in and limit the closed portion of the hearing so that it deals only with classified information."

A special room has been created in the courthouse to allow lawyers to read the classified information and remain secure from eavesdropping.

Passaro, 38, arrived at the hearing in the custody of marshals. He wore a prison uniform and had a full beard and shaggy hair. The former Special Forces soldier has been jailed since June, when his bail was revoked after he was accused of assaulting his girlfriend.

Boyle has denied motions by Passaro's lawyers to dismiss the four assault charges against him, claiming the judge lacked jurisdiction because the alleged beating occurred in a foreign country.

Passaro could face 40 years in prison and $1 million in fines if convicted.

He is the first civilian to face prosecution on prisoner abuse charges since the start of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. He has denied the charges and contends he was a scapegoat for the government after the Abu Ghraib prison scandal erupted.

The Afghan prisoner, Abdul Wali, was being questioned about a series of rocket attacks on a remote U.S. outpost in the mountainous northeast of Afghanistan, about five miles from the country's border with Pakistan.

The federal indictment against Passaro said Wali died in a cell at the outpost after two days of beatings by Passaro, who used "his hands and feet and a large flashlight." A witness list includes a fingerprint expert who would identify Passaro's prints on batteries in the flashlight.

Trial had been scheduled for the first week of October, but court officials said the date may be delayed because defense lawyers want to file more motions.

Government: Man Wanted Bush Assassinated (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 21, 2005

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-A suspected terrorist accused of conspiring to assassinate President Bush said he proposed the plot but it wasn't pursued, and he was frustrated that other members of his al-Qaida cell lacked initiative, according to prosecutors.

A government motion unsealed this week by a federal judge reveals new details in the case against Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, 24, who is scheduled to go on trial next month.

Prosecutors say the Falls Church resident has admitted joining al-Qaida while attending college in Saudi Arabia and that he discussed numerous terrorist plots, including plans to assassinate Bush and hijack airplanes. Abu Ali says he was tortured into giving a false confession by Saudi authorities and that U.S. officials aided the torture. His lawyers are asking to have the confession tossed out.

The motion says that Abu Ali was asked to research the location of U.S. nuclear power sites for possible attack. The request was made by the second-highest ranking al-Qaida operative in Saudi Arabia, Sultan Jubran Sultan al-Qahtani, according to the motion.

Also, Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman writes in the motion that Abu Ali was frustrated and bored during a stay at an al-Qaida safe house "because his fellow al-Qaida cell members did not appear sufficiently motivated to suit the defendant's terrorist zeal."

In an initial interrogation by Saudi authorities, Abu Ali said that after a May 2003 al-Qaida attack in Riyadh he organized the cell into a more structured daily regimen at the safe house "because, as I said to the guys, we were wasting our time sleeping and engaging in idle chit chat." The attack killed 39 people, including nine Americans.

Prosecutors said Abu Ali's admission that he proposed the Bush assassination plot came in response to a question posed by Saudi authorities at the request of the FBI.

When Abu Ali was asked, "Were you tasked to assassinate the President?" he replied, "I came up with the idea on my own, but it did not get beyond the idea stage. I wanted to be the brain, the planner, just like (reputed Sept. 11 attack masterminds) Mohammed Atta and Khalid Sheikh Mohammad."

The government motion was in response to defense claims that the case against Abu Ali should be thrown out because the confession was obtained through torture and that U.S. authorities acted in concert with the Saudis. The government contends that Abu Ali's June 2003 arrest, interrogation and confession resulted from an independent Saudi crackdown on al-Qaida following the Riyadh bombings and that FBI requests to question Abu Ali directly were rejected.

Abu Ali's Saudi interrogators have already given depositions in which they testified that Abu Ali was relaxed and well cared for when he confessed. Defense lawyers objected to the depositions, saying the interrogators would be under pressure to lie about Abu Ali's treatment.

The government denies that Abu Ali was mistreated and says he invented the torture allegation to escape justice.

"The defendant in this case represents one of the most dangerous terrorist threats that America faces in the perilous world after Sept. 11, 2001: an al-Qaida operative born and raised in the United States, trained and committed to carry out deadly attacks on American soil," Laufman wrote.

Guantanamo Trial To Resume (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

The Pentagon cleared the way yesterday for the resumption of the long-delayed military trial of Guantanamo Bay prisoner David Hicks.

The Defense Department had put the case on hold last year after an unfavorable court ruling. Officials said the hearings in the Hicks trial will resume sometime between Oct. 3 and Oct. 20.

Hicks, an Australian held for 3 1/2 years at the military prison, has pleaded not guilty to charges of aiding the enemy, attempted murder by an unprivileged belligerent and conspiracy to commit war crimes. Captured in Afghanistan in late 2001, Hicks is accused of fighting for the al Qaeda network.

Of about 505 men held at Guantanamo Bay, four have been charged. Only the Hicks case is being resumed.

The announcement of the resumption of Hicks's trial came two months after a federal appeals court reversed a ruling in the case of another Guantanamo Bay prisoner, Yemeni Salim Ahmed Hamdan. The appeals court ruled that the military commission trials are lawful.

By Laura Wides, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 21, 2005

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-The only way to defeat the enemy is to know the enemy. But in the case of Osama bin Laden, the U.S. public doesn't know enough, says the author of a new book on America's No. 1 nemesis.

In "Osama Bin Laden: America's Enemy In His Own Words," San Diego civil rights attorney Randy Hamud tries to shed light on bin Laden by translating 20 of his statements and letters from 1994 to 2004.

The book, released Monday, is the first comprehensive compilation of statements that are rarely presented in full by the English-language media. It's also the first of several works on bin Laden due out in the coming months.

Hamud said the translations are critical to defeating bin Laden.

"What I mean by defeat is the complete discrediting of his message," he wrote in the book.

The third-generation Lebanese-American spent the past two years working with Arab scholars on the translations. His self-published book also offers an annotated biography of bin Laden and a history of Islam.

It sparked concerns among academics - none of whom has seen the book - because it does not disclose the names of his collaborators and only says they are mostly Middle East immigrants who fear repercussions for their involvement.

"In order for me to trust a text, I need to know who the translator is," said Khaled Abou El Fadl, a University of California, Los Angeles law professor.

Abou El Fadl, who focuses on Islamic law, said he was surprised to learn about Hamud's book because the lawyer is not known as a specialist or scholar in Middle Eastern affairs or Islamic studies.

"In my perspective bin Laden is a criminal," Abou El Fadl said. "Is there value in publishing the diaries of a serial killer? Yes there's a value, and there's a danger."

Richard Dekmejian, a professor of political science at the University of Southern California, also said he would prefer such translations be done by recognized Arab scholars, then reviewed by peers.

"It's very essential to do the translation correctly and reflect the context in which these things are said," Dekmejian said.

Still, Dekmejian is interested in using Hamud's text in his classes as a way to understand bin Laden's anger at the West and how he gained traction among Muslims worldwide.

Hamud defended his decision to withhold the names.

"Sadly, in today's America, Muslim immigrants do not enjoy the freedom of speech that those of us who are native-born enjoy in discussing subjects like Mr. bin Laden, political Islam and the subject of terrorism," wrote Hamud, who has represented a number of Muslims and Arabs detained by federal authorities since Sept. 11, 2001.

In November, Verso Books in England will publish "Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden," a compilation 24 bin Laden speeches dating back to 1994. It was edited by Duke University political science professor Bruce Lawrence.

In January, Simon & Schuster's Free Press will publish former CNN analyst Peter Bergen's "The Osama bin Laden I Know: An Oral History of the Making of a Global Terrorist," with interviews from people who know bin Laden.

Lawrence, who had not seen Hamud's book, applauded his effort to make bin Laden's words more accessible. He said finding some of bin Laden's speeches, which are often blocked on Internet sites or reproduced only in snippets, involved major detective work.

"It's an aspect of Osama bin Laden that has not only been neglected, it has been totally overlooked in the war on terror," Lawrence said.

The speeches and letters show bin Laden's evolution from political attacks against corruption in the Saudi Arabian government to a declaration of war on the United States. There's also a critique of U.S. military contractors.

"The Iraq war generates billions of dollars for big corporations, either munitions makers or those working reconstruction, such as Haliburton and its sister companies," bin Laden said in an April 15, 2004 address originally broadcast by Al-Jazeera in which he offered a truce with European nations that agreed not to attack Muslims.

Throughout his speeches, bin Laden also returns to Israel's treatment of the Palestinians and what he calls the "Jewish enemy."

According to Hamud's translation, bin Laden's anger at the West stems mostly from its support of the repressive Saudi Arabian regime and the idea of a Christian military occupying Muslim lands.

"It is unconscionable to allow the country to become an American colony," bin Laden wrote in 1994 to King Fahd of Saudi Arabia, "for no other reason than to protect your throne and the oil resources."

Police Believe London Bombers Scouted Route Prior To Attacks (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

LONDON, Sept. 20 -- Three of the four bombers who killed themselves and 52 other people in a July 7 attack on the London transit system apparently scouted their route on a trip to the city 10 days earlier, police said Tuesday.

Officials at Scotland Yard said the three men -- Mohammed Sidique Khan, Shehzad Tanweer and Germaine Lindsay -- were spotted by officers as they reviewed thousands of hours of video surveillance tapes from train stations in London and the central English city of Luton.

Police released photos of the men, casually dressed, arriving at the Luton station the morning of June 28, with two of them carrying backpacks. Later in the day, they are seen at the King's Cross and Baker Street stations in London, apparently following the same route they took to stage the deadliest attack on British soil since World War II.

Khan, Tanweer and Hussain were British citizens of Pakistani descent; Lindsay was a Jamaican-born British resident. Police have said they believe all four were young Muslims who had become radicalized.

Earlier this month, the Arabic television network al-Jazeera aired a videotape of a man identifying himself as Khan who called the bombings a response to British policies in Iraq and the Middle East. "We are at war, and I am a soldier," he said.

In another videotaped message aired on al-Jazeera Monday, Ayman Zawahiri, al Qaeda's second-ranking leader, said the group was responsible for the attacks and had the "honor" of carrying them out. Earlier messages from Zawahiri had praised the attack but stopped short of asserting direct responsibility.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has said he believes British foreign policy did not inspire the attacks.

In a statement issued Tuesday, police said Khan, Tanweer and Lindsay spent about three hours in London on June 28. Their visit, the statement said, "might suggest the suspects were carrying out reconnaissance of potential targets on the London transport system and checking the time of the journey they intended to take on the day of the attack."

Police said "other cases here and abroad" suggest that terrorists sometimes visit their targets before an attack.

Police said they reviewed tapes from June 28 after finding train tickets and receipts during searches of addresses linked to some of the suspects.

The Scotland Yard statement offered the most extensive assessment in weeks of the status of the police investigation into the bombings. It said police have reviewed more than 80,000 surveillance tapes, taken statements from more than 3,000 witnesses and searched 15 locations.

It said more than 1,000 pieces of evidence had been taken from a single apartment in Leeds, a city about 200 miles north of London where several of the presumed bombers lived. Police said the search of that apartment, where they believe the explosives used in the attacks were made, took longer than six weeks.

Police have charged four men in a failed second series of attacks on July 21 in which no one was injured. A fifth suspect is in custody in Rome, and the British government is seeking his extradition. Police are still investigating possible links between the attacks.

London Bombers Visited Earlier, Apparently On Practice Run (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

LONDON, Sept. 20 - Less than two weeks before they attacked London on July 7, three of the four suicide bombers traveled to the city for what appears to have been a practice run, the police said Tuesday.

The new information came a day after Osama bin Laden's chief lieutenant, Ayman al-Zawahiri, appeared in a videotaped message claiming that Al Qaeda was responsible for the attacks. Three weeks ago, Mr. Zawahiri was shown in a different tape praising the bombings. British and European antiterrorism officials said that they were investigating the claims but had reached no conclusions about who was responsible.

American intelligence and counterterrorism officials said Tuesday that they had no reason to doubt the authenticity of the latest tape, which was broadcast on Al Jazeera, the Arab satellite network. But they said it remained unclear what role Al Qaeda played in the London attack.

"Al Qaeda is quite content to take responsibility for any number of terrorist attacks, regardless of the nature or extent of their role, including whether they had an inspirational role or a more significant one," said an American counterterrorism official, who requested anonymity because he was discussing sensitive intelligence assessments.

An American intelligence official noted that the tape of Mr. Zawahiri had been released by the Sahab media office, the usual outlet for such statements. Some recent tapes have included English-language subtitles, a departure from past practice, in what American officials said was an indication that they were aimed at American and British audiences.

Whatever group was the mastermind, officials are coming to understand more clearly the events leading to the attacks, which killed 56 people, including the four bombers, and injured 700. On Tuesday, they released closed-circuit television images showing that three of the bombers - Mohammad Sidique Khan, Shehzad Tanweer and Germaine Lindsay - met at Luton station at 8:10 a.m. on June 28 before traveling to King's Cross station in London.

They arrived at King's Cross at 8:55 a.m., were captured again on camera at the Baker Street station at noon and were seen on yet more cameras leaving King's Cross at 12:50 p.m. and arriving back in Luton at 1:40 p.m. "The implication is that they were possibly conducting reconnaissance on that day," Deputy Assistant Commissioner Peter Clarke, head of Scotland Yard's antiterrorism unit, told reporters. "We know that is part of a terrorist's methodology: to check timings, layout and security precautions."

Mr. Clarke said the police, who have seized some 80,000 closed-circuit tapes since July 7, still do not know what the men did between 8:55 a.m. and noon. He appealed to the public for help in reconstructing their movements. "What we want to know is where else they went, and did they meet anybody else while they were in London?"

The police have also disclosed further details about what the bombers - the three who made the earlier trip to London, as well as a fourth man, Hasib Hussain - did on July 7. Mr. Lindsay arrived at Luton station at 5 a.m.; the other three drove from Leeds in a silver Nissan Micra, arriving at Luton at 6:51 a.m. The four then traveled to King's Cross station, where they split up and set off their bombs, three on the London Underground and one on a bus.

The police found a trove of bombing materials in the Nissan Micra, which the men left parked at Luton. Two more "viable devices" - bombs that contained peroxide-based explosives, were surrounded by nails and were ready to go off - were found under the front passenger seat, Mr. Clarke said. There were also coolers in the back of the car, which may have been used to carry the bombs used in the attacks, he said. Peroxide-based bombs need to be kept cool when transported.

Asked whether the presence of the two bombs in the front seat implied that two other suicide bombers were meant to join the four on July 7, Mr. Clarke said the question was "interesting but unhelpful." But, he said, "it is of real concern that there were more explosives in the possession of these people on that day."

U.N. Report Warns Of More Terrorists (AJC/AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

UNITED NATIONS — Al-Qaida has spawned a so-called "third generation" of followers skilled in urban warfare and suicide bombings and U.N. sanctions need to be updated to keep up with the changing tactics, a report warned Tuesday.

The committee monitoring sanctions against the terror network and the Taliban said the arms embargo, travel ban and assets freeze have been effective but "the combination of sanctions has still not achieved its full potential."

"Al-Qaida continues to evolve and adapt to the pressures and opportunities of the world around it and the threat of a significant attack remains real in all areas," the group said in a report to the U.N. Security Council.

"At the same time, there has been a revival of the threat from the Taliban," it said, adding that recent evidence suggests the remnants of Afghanistan's ousted hard-line regime have access to more money.

The report, which was dated Sept. 9 and contained recommendations that will be considered by the U.N. Security Council, was released as Afghanistan faced the fiercest fighting in Afghanistan since U.S.-led forces invaded in late 2001, with more than 1,200 people killed in the six months leading up to Sunday's historic legislative elections.

Sanctions currently require all 191 U.N. member states to impose a travel ban and arms embargo against Afghanistan's former Taliban leaders, Osama bin Laden and his terror network and those "associated with" them, and to freeze their financial assets.

The committee recommended more measures to clamp down on terror financing and said the Security Council should consider broadening the arms embargo to keep the groups from obtaining military-quality materials or using chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

It said al-Qaida is seeking to stage more massive attacks to gain media exposure and an effective embargo would force militants to use less efficient equipment or risk discovery trying to procure more effective means.

"Terrorist tactics have evolved over the past several years and the (monitoring) team believes the arms embargo should change with the times," the report said.

It said no state had reported an attempt to breach the arms embargo but it noted implementation often was complicated in some post-conflict regions or areas beyond government control, such as in Somalia and Afghanistan.

The committee's report said al-Qaida's message remains the same but its operations have expanded to comprise three groups — bin Laden and his deputies, fighters who trained in Afghanistan and new recruits alienated by world events who form cells locally.

It described the new recruits as a third "new and growing generation of supporters who may never have left their countries of residence but have embraced the core elements of the al-Qaida message."

"These cells are emerging as the main threat posed by al-Qaida terrorism today," the report said. "They are bound to the al-Qaida leadership by an overall unity of purpose but remain independent, anonymous and largely invisible until they strike."

They often receive training from "the veterans of Afghanistan or other areas of conflict" or travel to Iraq to gain skills in urban warfare, bombmaking, assassination and suicide attacks, then return home where they pose an increased threat.

The report came more than a month after the Security Council adopted a resolution expanding the sanctions to spell out for the first time who is included among associates of al-Qaida and the Taliban.

It also stated that people who finance or plan acts to support the outlawed groups and who recruit or provide weapons for bin Laden, al-Qaida, the Taliban "or any cell, affiliate, splinter group or derivative thereof" will face sanctions.

PATRIOT ACT:

Librarians Must Stay Silent In Patriot Act Suit, Court Says (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The librarians who challenged the nation's antiterrorism act must continue to keep quiet about their role in the case while a federal appeals court reviews the order of confidentiality that bars them from speaking out, the court ruled yesterday.

A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Manhattan handed the federal government a partial victory yesterday in agreeing to a temporary stay of a lower court ruling that would have allowed the plaintiffs, as of today, to discuss the case. Government lawyers had argued that they needed the stay to give them time to appeal the lower court decision.

At least two members of the appellate panel echoed those arguments. "Absent a stay, this appeal is moot," Judge Sonia Sotomayor commented during the questioning.

In the case involved in the dispute, the F.B.I. sent a library consortium in Connecticut a demand, known as a national security letter, that it turn over patron information and not disclose the request publicly.

Lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union have argued that the consortium's constitutional right to free speech was violated because the confidentiality order prevented it from participating in the debate over the USA Patriot Act while Congress was considering whether to reauthorize the law.

Emerging from the courthouse yesterday, Ann Beeson, the lead lawyer for the civil liberties group, called the appeals court ruling "extremely frustrating." She said it was unfair that "the government can say all they want about the Patriot Act," but not people like the plaintiffs who have firsthand knowledge of its reach. She said she took some comfort from the appellate court's promise to expedite the appeal.

The case landed in Federal District Court in Bridgeport this summer, with government lawyers citing national security as the grounds for sealing large parts of the record.

On Sept. 9, Judge Janet C. Hall ruled in Bridgeport that the nondisclosure provision in the national security letter violated the plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. She said she would allow the plaintiffs to identify themselves, but gave the government until yesterday to appeal.

Though the plaintiffs' organization has not been named in the various proceedings, a close reading of the court record suggests that it is Library Connection in Windsor, Conn.

A search of a court-operated Web site offered a pointer to the plaintiffs' identity. There, a case numbered 3:2005cv01256 is listed under the caption, "Library Connection Inc. v. Attorney General."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI, Industry Offer Anti-ecoterror Award (KCS)

By Elizabeth M. Gillespie

The Kansas City Star, September 21, 2005

SEATTLE - The FBI and a building industry group said Tuesday they will begin offering $100,000 rewards for information leading to the arrest and conviction of ecoterrorists.

The main target is the Earth Liberation Front, a group that has claimed responsibility for setting fires at construction sites in housing developments, calling attention to what it sees as the growing problem of suburban sprawl.

"While ELF used to spike trees and sabotage logging equipment, they're now firebombing neighborhoods and burning down apartment complexes," Lyle Fox, president of the Building Industry Association of Washington, said in a news release.

The "increasingly brazen" attacks raise the likelihood that someone will be hurt or killed, he said.

ELF is an underground movement with no public leadership, membership or spokesperson. E-mails seeking comment were not immediately returned.

The FBI estimates that ecoterrorist groups have committed more than 1,100 crimes in the United States since 1976, causing about $110 million in property damage.

The builders group claims ecoterrorists have caused nearly $8 million in property damage since 1996 in Washington state, much of it in housing developments. California has taken a $53 million hit, and Oregon has had more than $3 million in damage, according to the group's estimates.

In a statement Tuesday, the Seattle FBI office said it was investigating several arsons and attempted arsons in Washington state over the past year and a half that seem to have ties to ELF.

Builders Want To Catch Ecoterrorists (SEAPI)

They've used crude incendiary devices made from milk jugs to torch new homes and construction sites in Western Washington, signing their work "ELF."

Now the Seattle FBI has made catching so-called ecoterrorists such as the Earth Liberation Front a top priority, and a powerful state builders' group is throwing in cash to help.

On Tuesday, the Building Industry Association of Washington announced a reward of up to $100,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of activists who damage homes and construction sites in Washington and claim to be part of ELF.

"It's only a matter of time before someone is hurt or killed by ELF terrorists," association president Lyle Fox said.

He said housing "is a basic necessity of life" and that arson is only hurting families.

The group has claimed responsibility for increasingly frequent acts of vandalism against new housing, sport utility vehicles and the genetic-engineering industry in the name of defending the environment.

ELF "has emerged as a serious terrorist threat," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Laura Laughlin, and "arson, which has resulted in millions of dollars in damage, is the crime of choice."

Arson has caused nearly $8 million in damage in Washington since 1996, according to the builders association. In the past two years, two under-construction homes in Snohomish County were burned down and 13 incendiary devices were found at three nearby developments. A sign advertising lots for sale near Bellingham also was burned.

Two attempts were made earlier this year at home-construction sites in Redmond and Sammamish, where investigators found incendiary devices. At the Sammamish site, someone left a spray-painted sheet that read in part, "Wheres (sic) all the trees? ... ELF."

On an ELF Web site, someone claiming to live in the Sammamish area condemned the group's acts for endangering and frightening people, particularly children. In an anonymous response, someone explained, "you people dont even realize the magnificence of what you are bulldozing to erect some stupid shopping mall. I for one, refuse to go quietly."

The FBI and other agencies have arrested 19 people in connection with crimes of environmental- or animal-rights-activism since early 2004.

The Seattle Times, September 21, 2005

The Building Industry Association of Washington, the state's homebuilders lobby, yesterday offered a $100,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of Earth Liberation Front (ELF) members suspected of arsons and attempted arsons in Washington state.

The FBI has linked ELF, a loosely knit group that has taken aim at what it regards as "urban sprawl," to four arsons and attempted arsons in Western Washington over the past 18 months. Those include the torching of two homes under construction in Snohomish County in April 2004.

"ELF's increasingly brazen attacks on urban targets have BIAW and the FBI worried that it is only a matter of time before someone is hurt or killed by ELF terrorists," said BIAW President Lyle Fox. In Washington alone, ELF members have been responsible for nearly $8 million in property damage since 1996, he said.

Appearing at a news conference with Fox, Laura Laughlin, FBI special agent in charge of the Seattle office, said such "special-interest extremism" linked to ELF and the Animal Liberation Front (ALF), has emerged as a serious domestic-terrorist threat.

The FBI released the following list of arsons and attempted arsons that targeted new housing construction in Washington in the past 18 months:

• April 10, 2004: Two homes under construction in Snohomish County were destroyed. A total of 13 incendiary devices were found at three different housing developments nearby. ELF claimed responsibility in a note left at the scene.

• July 6, 2004: A sign advertising lots for sale at a home-construction site near Bellingham was burned. ELF claimed responsibility.

• March 3, 2005: Two incendiary devices were found at a housing-construction site in Redmond. There was no claim of responsibility, but the devices were similar to those ELF previously used.

• April 13, 2005: Someone tried to burn down a home under construction in Sammamish but an incendiary device didn't ignite. ELF claimed responsibility on a large banner at the scene.

Halted Listing Pulls NYSE Into Eco-terror Inquiry (TIMES)

By James Doran, Wall Street Correspondent

The Times (UK), September 21, 2005

THE New York Stock Exchange has been drawn into a United States Government inquiry into eco-terrorism, after the market postponed listing shares in Huntingdon Life Sciences, the research company, which is under attack from extremists because of its links to animal experimentation.

The Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works has launched an investigation into Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty (SHAC), the activist organisation that has waged several animal rights campaigns in Britain, including a high-profile crusade against Huntingdon.

The committee will hold its first hearing on the group next month, which is expected to focus on the recent decision by the NYSE to delay a listing of Huntingdon's shares.

John Thain, the NYSE chief executive, and Catherine Kinney, its president, are expected to be asked to testify before the committee and to explain their reasons for not going ahead with the Huntingdon listing as scheduled.

"We will hold a hearing next month on SHAC and its tactics against Huntingdon Life Sciences," Bill Holbrook, a spokesman for the committee, said.

The committee launched a wider investigation into eco- terror in May by examining the activities of the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) and the Earth Liberation Front (ELF). The hearing in October will mark the first time that the committee has investigated the activities of SHAC — which aims to stop all companies from doing business with Huntingdon or trading in its shares in an attempt to force the drug-testing group out of business.

The NYSE has failed to explain why it pulled out of the listing at the last minute — a move that angered Huntingdon directors, who had gathered at the NYSE for a celebratory breakfast when the decision to stop their listing was announced by Ms Kinney.

Senator James Inhofe, of Oklahoma, chairman of the committee on the environment, wrote to Mr Thain and Ms Kinney two weeks ago to demand an explanation for the postponement. "It seems to me unimaginable that this country's worldwide symbol of the integrity of the capital markets, the NYSE, would capitulate to threats, or even the mere threat of threats, from a single issue extremist group," he wrote. He added that the NYSE's decision set a dangerous precedent.

Coast Guard Commandant Cites Security Risk (AJC/AP)

By Pat Milton, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

NEW YORK — The Coast Guard says millions of pleasure craft, fishing boats and ferries fall outside its security nets, hampering its ability to safeguard thousands of miles of coastline against terrorist attack.

"How do we include recreational boats — some 58 million in this country — into our security regime without infringing upon the liberty of boaters?" Admiral Thomas Collins, commandant of the Coast Guard, said Tuesday.

Boaters are proud people who "toot around on the water" and don't want the government to tell them where they can go, Collins said following an address at the U.S. Maritime Security Expo, a conference on protecting ports, harbors, ships and cargo against terrorists, thieves and other threats.

"But some of those yachts are big," he said, "and can hold lots of good stuff and bad stuff."

The Coast Guard has identified 50 areas in which the maritime system is vulnerable to a terrorist attack, Collins said. It is working on solutions to blend everyone's needs: to close the gaps and mitigate the risks while not impinging on boaters' rights or interfering with the flow of commerce.

Specific initiatives will be presented to President Bush as part of a National Maritime Security Plan.

Among the Coast Guard's targets are recreational boats, an estimated 110,000 fishing vessels, and ferries that carry tourists and commuters, Collins said.

"How do we screen for explosive devices on a ferry system that moves millions of people, particularly commuters, without constipating the whole system?" Collins asked.

Better technology for detection of explosives on ferries and cargo ships is needed, he said.

"Right now the most capable technology we have," Collins said, "is dogs."

At least 95 percent of the goods coming into the country arrive on ships, according to Collins, and cargo security is crucial.

But Collins said he believes it is "illogical" to screen each cargo container, and inspecting millions of containers would be impossible.

"The issue is inspecting the right one," he said.

That goal can be reached by targeting those ships that have been identified through intelligence reports as having anomalies in the crews, cargo or containers, he said.

"You want to inspect the highest risk," he said, "not every ship that comes into our port."

Alerts Sought In Many Tongues (WT)

Television and radio stations should be required to air emergency disaster and security warnings in multiple languages, according to a petition that several trade and activist groups filed with the Federal Communications Commission yesterday.

The Independent Spanish Broadcasters Association, the Minority Media and Telecommunications Council and the United Church of Christ urged the FCC to require broadcasters to air multilingual warnings during emergencies.

The petition cited Hurricane Katrina, which knocked the only Spanish-language TV station in New Orleans off the air for more than a week, robbing residents who speak only Spanish of "vital information concerning the path of the storm, where and how to seek shelter, and how to remain healthy and safe in the aftermath of the storm."

The FCC began considering new requirements for emergency broadcasts last year. No matter what the agency decides, the groups behind the petition said the FCC should make multilingual warnings mandatory during the interim.

"After Katrina, everyone is hoping there won't be a next time. Unfortunately, with Mother Nature, there always is," said Gloria Tristani, managing director of the United Church of Christ's Office of Communications and a Democrat who served as an FCC commissioner during the Clinton administration.

Frank Montero, acting executive director of the Independent Spanish Broadcasters Association, said that if the FCC adopts a requirement for multilingual warnings, "it must be feasible. My group doesn't want to do anything that wants to make non-Spanish station opponents to this. This really has to be a collaborative effort."

Katrina response

Speaking of the FCC: The agency's chairman, Kevin J. Martin, a Republican, announced plans last week to spend $211 million to begin rebuilding the communications infrastructure in the Gulf Coast states.

Mr. Martin also said the FCC will create a bureau to coordinate the agency's future disaster management work, and that he will appoint a blue-ribbon panel to study the FCC's response to Katrina.

WAR NEWS:

Clash In Basra Brings Iraq War Home For Britain (BSUN)

By Todd Richissin

The Baltimore Sun, September 21, 2005

LONDON -- Great Britain was reminded Tuesday it was in a war in Iraq, the fighting arriving in TV broadcasts and newspaper front pages, showing a British soldier engulfed in flames pulling himself out of his tank in the southern city of Basra.

As American officials announced that insurgents had killed 10 American troops and security officers in attacks across Iraq since Friday, the British found themselves consumed in Basra, which had been one of the most stable parts of the country.

On Monday British soldiers there fought not insurgents but Iraqi police whom the British had helped train.

Television showed the British soldier escaping his tank, the soldier on fire, jumping to the ground and limping out of camera range as Iraqi civilians threw rocks and gasoline bombs. They attacked British forces and rioted in the streets after an armored vehicle was used in an effort to rescue two commandos.

The incident began when British military officials accused Iraqi police of arresting the commandos and then handing them over to Iraqi militias. According to varying accounts by Iraqi authorities, the commandos, wearing civilian clothes, had fired on a police patrol, or they were detained for behaving suspiciously and being seen to collect information.

British forces used armored vehicles to knock down the walls of the Iraqi police station where the commandos were believed to be held, and the violence soon involved hundreds of Iraqis and the burning British tank. The two commandos were later found at a house in the city, British authorities said.

"We don't actually know the details of why these people were handed over -- whether it was under threats or by collusion, or whatever," the British defense secretary, John Reid, told the BBC. "What we do know is that under the law they should have been handed back to the British forces themselves."

"It is a very unfortunate development that the British forces should try to release their forces the way it happened," Haider al-Ebadi, an adviser to Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, told a news conference in Baghdad. The prime minister's office then is sued a statement saying Iraq's interior ministry was investigating.

"We will await the outcome of that inquiry," the statement said. "In the meantime we urge all sides to remain calm."

The governor of Basra said the commandos had indeed been handed over to the al-Mahdi Army, the militia controlled by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al- Sadr. "Police who are members of the militia group took them to a nearby house after jail authorities learned the facility was about to be stormed," said the governor, Mohammed al-Waili.

Meanwhile, an attack Monday in Mosul killed a State Department security officer along with three private security guards as their convoy left the U.S. embassy's regional office there, while two bombings Tuesday near Ramadi in Anbar province each killed two soldiers. Tuesday afternoon, an American military policeman was killed by a home made bomb.

Another American soldier was killed Friday when a bomb went off near his tank during patrol operations. Those latest deaths raised to more than 1,900 the number of U.S. service members who have died in Iraq since the 2003 invasion.

In London, the pictures of the violence made the war seem very real.

Video of the burning soldier in Basra was shown repeatedly Tuesday on the BBC and other news stations but the photographs in newspapers seemed more haunting, showing a man frozen in flames.

The pictures were certainly among the most gripping and disturbing of the war, the spectacle of a man on fire, somehow isolated further by the height of the tank he stands upon, looking for escape as children who looked to be 12 or 13 years old aimed to stone him.

In one photograph, distributed by Reuters, the soldier is standing atop the tank, bent over, with his hands apparently on his knees as if he is trying to catch his breath.

His face cannot be seen. He is wearing a helmet which appears to be on fire, but the flames are blowing backward, over his shoulders and to the middle of his back and not forward.

In the background, fires ignited by other thrown gas bombs can be seen rising high above the tank's height.

More than 70 percent of the British public opposed involvement before the war began. Polls since then show more than half of the country is in favor of pulling British troops out now. And if little progress was evident in Iraq before the images of the soldier afire, the photos seemed to show a country going backward.

Tension has reportedly been growing between British troops and the Shiite police and militias that operate in Basra. Iraqi authorities say the police force has been infiltrated by Shiite militiamen from three groups: the Mahdi Army; the Badr Brigade, the armed wing of the Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution; and Hezbollah in Iraq, a small group based in the marshlands in the south.

Basra, with 1.5 million residents, was considered one of Iraq's safer big cities, escaping the Sunni-led violence in the north. But in the last two months there have been dozens of murders and at least eight people in U.S. and British diplomatic convoys have been killed.

General Defends Basra Mission (USAT)

By Steven Komarow And César G. Soriano

USA Today, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD — A British commander, defending the actions of his troops during violence in Basra, said Tuesday that he ordered an armored rescue of two soldiers arrested by Iraqi police only after learning they had been handed over to a radical Muslim militia.

Efforts to rescue the two British soldiers touched off a melee in which a mob attacked British armored vehicles with rockets and firebombs.

“From an early stage, I had good reason to believe that the lives of the two soldiers were at risk, and troops were sent to the area of Basra near the police station to help ensure their safety by providing a cordon,” Brig. John Lorimer said in a statement.

Lorimer said authorities in Basra appeared to ignore orders from Iraq's central government to transfer the two soldiers to British authority.

Three British servicemembers were injured during the melee, though none of their injuries was life-threatening. The two rescued soldiers are in good health.

The images of a mob attacking British forces in Basra resonated in Britain, fueling anti-war sentiment. “A significant portion of the population of Basra will now see the British as a hostile occupation force,” said Paul Ingram, an analyst at the British American Security Information Council, a think tank.

The picture of a British soldier on fire jumping out of an armored vehicle was plastered on the front page of many newspapers Tuesday. The conservative Daily Mail, which had backed the war, suggested in an editorial that it was time for the British government to rethink its position.

Most of Britain's 8,500 troops are in southern Iraq, a heavily Shiite area that had been relatively peaceful. But there have been recent signs of unrest around Basra, one of Iraq's largest cities.

Three British soldiers have been killed by roadside bombs this month. Monday, an Iraqi reporter working for The New York Times in Basra was found shot to death.

Shiite groups have been vying for control in the city. The “religious parties and their militias” are filling a power vacuum created by an ill-equipped and understaffed government police force, said Muhammed Al-Askari, a military and political analyst in Baghdad.

“It is of deep concern that British soldiers held by the police should end up being held by militia,” Lorimer said.

The incident has also raised tensions between British forces and their Iraqi government allies.

Haidar al-Abadi, a spokesman for Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, questioned British claims that the Iraqi government in Baghdad ordered local police to turn the two soldiers over to British control. "The matter was not treated centrally from Baghdad," he said.

The standoff began Monday when Iraqi police arrested two members of Britain's elite Special Air Service, who were on an intelligence mission, according to a British defense source.

British officials asked that the soldiers be turned over to British authority but were rebuffed, Lorimer said. An armored patrol was then dispatched to a police station where the men were believed to be held, Lorimer said. British forces entered the station, during which time "minor damage" was done to a prison compound, he said.

Once the troops confirmed the men were not held there, they went to a home in Basra where the men were being held by militia members. No one was arrested in connection with the rescue mission.

Lorimer said calm had returned to Basra and the incident would not poison relations between British and Iraqi security forces.

"It was a difficult day yesterday, but we have put this behind us and will move on," he said.

Attacks In Iraq Kill 9 Americans, Including State Dept. Aide (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 20 - In one of the most lethal stretches for Americans in Iraq in recent months, nine soldiers and security officers were killed in four attacks in the past two days.

British military officials in Basra, in the south, also faced harsh criticism from the Iraqi government on Tuesday over their siege of a police station there.

Among the attacks on Americans was a suicide bombing on Monday morning that killed a State Department security official and three security contractors as their convoy left the regional American Embassy office in Mosul.

A lone attacker driving an explosives-packed car struck the second of three armored sport-utility vehicles in the convoy as it left the compound, killing the official and contractors instantly, and wounding two more in the other vehicles, a diplomatic official in Baghdad said.

A statement by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice identified the State Department employee as Stephen Eric Sullivan, an assistant regional security officer.

In Basra, the bizarre fight on Monday between some police officers and British soldiers threatened to further destabilize the region, a Shiite-dominated area that had been relatively calm but has had a surge of skirmishes among rival Shiite militias that control much of the Iraqi police and military forces there. The fight broke out when British forces attacked a police station after the detention of two British soldiers apparently disguised in local dress.

Offering new details about the incident, the British military accused the Basra police of turning over the soldiers to hostile Shiite militiamen. That action was a crucial factor in the decision to begin a rescue attempt and knock down the police station's walls with armored vehicles, British officials said.

Pictures of the fighting included images of a British soldier aflame as he scrambled from his burning armored vehicle, and of hundreds of Iraqis throwing rocks and Molotov cocktails at the troops. The British military said no soldiers were seriously wounded.

Ultimately, the two soldiers were not at the jail but were later rescued from a home in Basra, the British military said.

The governor of Basra Province, Muhammad al-Waili, was quoted by The Associated Press as saying militiamen loyal to the rebel Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr had taken custody of the soldiers because of the looming British attack on the police station. He also called for the soldiers to be handed back to the Basra authorities for trial.

The militiamen have been furious with the British military for detaining two senior officials in Mr. Sadr's organization in Basra this week. And Shiite militias have either claimed responsibility or have been suspected in several attacks against British forces in recent months.

In London, a senior British military official interviewed by telephone refused to say how the troops eventually found the home where the two soldiers were held or who the military believed was ultimately behind their detention. British officials also said they did not know whether the Iraqi police who turned the soldiers over to the militia did so because they were in league with the group or because of fear.

"We don't actually know the details of why these people were handed over - whether it was under threats or by collusion, or whatever," the BBC quoted Defense Minister John Reid as saying. "What we do know is that under the law they should have been handed back to the British forces themselves."

The British military said joint British-Iraqi police patrols continued Tuesday. But as coalition forces promote gains in training Iraqi security forces, the skirmish on Monday and the warring statements that followed suggested a breakdown of trust.

In a statement on Tuesday, the commander of the British 12th Mechanized Brigade in Basra, Brig. John Lorimer, said the Iraqi interior minister had personally ordered the release of the British soldiers on Monday but that his order "seems to have been ignored."

However, Haidar al-Ebadi, spokesman for Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, said the police had been right to arrest the soldiers and denied that the Interior Ministry had ordered their release. The soldiers were arrested, he added, because they "had been acting suspiciously in civilian clothes without adequate papers."

"For two guys to be collecting information in civilian clothes in the current tense situation in Iraq and in Basra, the reaction of the Iraqi police is understandable," he said. "It was a very unfortunate development that British soldiers should try to release their soldiers the way it happened."

Hours after those comments, Mr. Jaafari's office issued a statement saying there was no "crisis" between Iraq and the British military.

Reuters reported that video of the soldiers taken while they were in jail showed them "unshaven and looking nervous as police looked over wigs, Arab headdresses, antitank missiles and electronic equipment, all apparently used in their mission."

In addition to the bombing in Mosul, the United States military reported that four Army soldiers assigned to the Second Marine Division were killed in two bombings on Monday during fighting in Ramadi, in Anbar Province.

Embassy Aide Among 9 Americans Killed In Insurgent Attacks In Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Omar Fekeiki

BAGHDAD, Sept. 20 -- Nine Americans were killed in insurgent attacks across Iraq in the last two days, military and diplomatic sources said Tuesday. The dead included an embassy official and three security contractors killed Monday morning in a suicide car bombing in the northern city of Mosul.

Witnesses in Mosul said a lone driver smashed his red sedan into the second vehicle in a convoy of three sport-utility vehicles, triggering a fiery explosion. Security forces immediately cordoned the area and administered first aid, but the contractors and an assistant regional security officer, Stephen Eric Sullivan, had died instantly, according to a U.S. official in Baghdad who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Two others riding in the diplomatic convoy, which was leaving a U.S. Embassy satellite office, suffered minor injuries.

"Steve was a brave American, dedicated to his country and to a brighter future for the people of Iraq," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a written statement. "Our thoughts and prayers are with Steve's family."

Sullivan, whose job involved coordinating security and overseeing contractors, was the third American diplomat killed since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. Diplomatic security agent Edward J. Seitz died in October in a mortar attack on a U.S. base near Baghdad International Airport. The following month, James Mollen, an American special adviser to Iraq's Higher Education and Scientific Research Ministry, was shot to death near the capital's fortified Green Zone.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of four soldiers in two roadside bombings in the city of Ramadi, 60 miles west of Baghdad, and the death of another soldier whose vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb 75 miles north of the capital. The soldiers' names were not released.

According to the Pentagon, 1,902 U.S. service members, including civilian employees of the Defense Department, have been killed in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion.

The recent rash of violence against Americans came as British and Iraqi officials offered widely contrasting public accounts of the circumstances that led to clashes Monday between British soldiers and Iraqi police in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city. A British armored vehicle smashed into a police station in an attempt to force the release of two British soldiers who had been detained.

Haider Abadi, a spokesman for Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, called the British actions "very unfortunate" and said police had acted correctly in detaining the men, who were behaving "very suspiciously." They were wearing civilian clothes and asking for information in the streets, he said, but would not elaborate.

"We hoped they would solve this problem with the central government," Abadi said. "But the British forces decided to act individually, and the military operation to release the detainees happened the way we saw it. This is wrong, and it is not a healthy way to deal with problems."

Throughout the day, Iraqi and other Arab television stations broadcast images of the two British men, clad in dark pants and T-shirts, seated in front of a table bearing what appeared to be a large quantity of weapons and ammunition purportedly discovered in their possession. One man had scrapes and small cuts on his head and the side of his face.

Brig. John Lorimer said in a written statement that under Iraqi law, the police were required to hand over the men to coalition forces, an outcome he said he and the British consul general had sought to negotiate.

Lorimer said that the Iraqi interior minister had personally ordered the British personnel released and that the order was ignored. Instead, he said, the two were handed over to a local Shiite Muslim militia.

"I became concerned about the safety of the soldiers after we received information that they had been handed over to militia elements," Lorimer said. "As a result, I took the difficult decision to order entry to the Jamiat police station."

British troops set a cordon around the station and were attacked with "firebombs and rockets by a violent and determined crowd," Lorimer said. An armored vehicle plowed through one wall of a building, but the men were not found inside. They were later discovered in a house elsewhere in the city.

"It is of deep concern that British soldiers held by the police should end up being held by militia," Lorimer said. "This is unacceptable, and I should stress that we won't hesitate to take action against those involved in planning and conducting attacks against coalition forces."

Police officials in Basra have said publicly that the primary loyalty of many of their officers is to Shiite militias such as the Badr Organization, which is affiliated with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the country's dominant Shiite political party. Unrest erupted in Basra this week after the arrest of two members of the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to the outspoken Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr and a rival of the Badr group.

Lorimer did not specify which militia he believed was involved in the British detentions.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Tuesday, government officials said that residents of the northwestern city of Tall Afar who fled during a large U.S.-Iraqi offensive against insurgents this month had been invited to return to their homes and that about $50 million would soon be spent to help rebuild the city.

Abadi, the prime minister's spokesman, said more than 800 suspected insurgents were killed or captured during the operation -- the largest urban assault since the offensive in Fallujah in November.

"The terrorists have received a deadly blow in Tall Afar," Abadi said. He cautioned, however, that intelligence indicated some insurgents were attempting to slip back into the city among returning residents.

Fourteen civilians were killed and 25 wounded during the fighting, he said, adding that residents whose homes and property were damaged would be compensated. The government is also establishing five police stations in a city largely devoid of police presence for much of the past year, he said.

"We have information that some of the terrorists infiltrated the refugee camps," said Brig. Gen. Abdul Aziz Muhammed-Jassim, commander of the Defense Ministry operations room. "Thus, the process of checking people at the entrances to the city is very important to make sure they don't enter the city again."

Abadi said Tall Afar would be secure enough for citizens to vote in the Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's draft constitution. In Baghdad on Tuesday, the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni Muslim political organization, announced in a written statement its "total rejection" of the constitution and urged followers to vote against it. Party leaders had previously suggested they might remain neutral.

Sunnis are widely expected to oppose the constitution, which will fail if two-thirds of voters in at least three provinces vote against it. Among several aspects of the document opposed by many Sunnis is the devolution of power from the central government to regions, a process some fear could lead to Iraq's dissolution.

"We appeal to the people's will represented by the patriotic forces, the civil society institutions and individuals to exercise their rights in rejecting this draft," the party's statement said.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military announced the arrest of two men with medical training who are suspected of being senior members of al Qaeda in Iraq, the country's main insurgent group. Anis Abdul Razaq Ali Muhammad and Mazen Mahdi Salih Mahdi Khudayr are alleged to have established facilities to treat wounded insurgent fighters and were apprehended in raids in Baghdad in late August, the military said.

Basra Violence Challenges U.S. Strategy (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

A surge of violence in Basra, Iraq's second-biggest city, has raised new doubts about the U.S.-led coalition's strategy for pacifying southern Iraq by giving free rein to Shiite religious militias with ties to neighboring Iran.

Backed by the U.S., the British forces in southern Iraq have effectively looked the other way as Shiite Muslim religious parties solidified their control over the city's government and as militia members joined the local police force while maintaining loyalty to militia leaders. The policy choice rested on an unspoken trade-off, with the British banking on the militias' ability to prevent insurgents from sowing instability or endangering Basra's ports and oil fields.

The coalition strategy for Basra has left militiamen in control of Basra's police force and Shiite fighters in plain clothes circulating openly in the city. A combination of the two forces has been blamed for the abduction and murder of two journalists, including one American. The forces are also at the center of the growing international dispute with Britain that erupted this week after British tanks crashed through a Basra prison and British forces raided a private house to free a pair of undercover commandos who had been arrested by Iraqi police and then handed over to militiamen.

The new violence has sparked fears that the Shiite militias aren't under the control of either the British forces in the city or the central government in Baghdad. In the case of the British soldiers, the Interior Ministry in Baghdad ordered officials in Basra to release the two men, but the demands were ignored.

"The British policy was the triumph of short-term stability over long-term success: The Shiite militias metastasize like cancer when they find out they can get away with things," said Michael Rubin, a former adviser to the American occupation authority in Iraq now at the American Enterprise Institute. "We always think we're playing the Iraqis, but they always end up playing us."

The uptick of violence in southern Iraq comes amid unrelenting insurgent attacks throughout the country. Eight American soldiers were killed in roadside attacks yesterday, while a suicide car bombing near the northern city of Mosul killed a State Department security officer and three American security contractors.

It is also happening as Shiites ratchet up their demands for far-reaching regional autonomy in southern Iraq ahead of a key referendum next month on the country's draft constitution. Shiite leaders are pressing for the creation of an oil-rich quasistate comprising Basra and eight neighboring provinces, a step fiercely opposed by Sunni Muslim Arabs, who complain that Shiite leaders are using militias and government forces to intimidate them through mass arrests and targeted killings.

The new tensions in Basra stem from the Shiite religious parties' growing impatience to impose strict religious law across the region and establish a largely independent regional government, said Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, which provides analysis to U.S. lawmakers. He noted that Shiite militias in Basra have already begun effectively segregating the city's schools, beating up or arresting alcohol sellers and forcing men to wear beards.

"The militias and the parties want Islamic law and a form of Islamic government in Basra, and they're increasingly impatient with anyone trying to restrain them," he said. "What we're seeing is the creeping Islamization of that entire region."

The Shiite parties' main instrument for expanding their power over Basra has come from their ability to place militiamen in the city's police force. In an interview with a British newspaper this summer, Basra's police chief, Gen. Hassan al-Sade, admitted that three-quarters of his force of 13,600 men were openly loyal to the religious parties. Western visitors to the city say police cars there are emblazoned with posters of the Shiite parties.

"You have fighters from the different militias in the police force who don't give their allegiance to the police commander or the governor," said Peter Khalil, a former security adviser to the occupation authorities who now works for the Eurasia Group, a consulting company in New York. "These guys have just seeped in for months, with no transparency in their recruitment and no vetting of their backgrounds."

Sunni residents of Basra have complained for months that Shiites are using government security forces to conduct mass arrests and targeted killings designed to intimidate them. Shiite leaders have denied the accusations, but tensions between the two groups continue to rise.

Three British soldiers have been killed so far this month in roadside bombings that London attributed to Sunni militants who infiltrated the region from the restive central province of al-Anbar. The Sunni fighters' ability to carry out the attacks in a predominantly Shiite region suggested that embittered Sunni residents of the Basra area have begun offering shelter and other logistical support to militants from other parts of the country, Mr. Katzman said.

"The fact that Sunnis there are now welcoming insurgents from the rest of Iraq is obviously very worrisome," he said.

Sadr Militia's New Muscle In South (CSM)

By Jill Carroll

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD - Moqtada al-Sadr, the young Shiite cleric who promised to disband his militia after clashing with US forces last April, proved this week that he remains a potent threat to both coalition troops and Iraq's fledgling government.

In a dramatic battle against British forces in Basra, Mr. Sadr quickly mobilized scores of supporters to descend on tanks, setting at least one alight and injuring three British soldiers on Monday.

While the British Army's strategy of appeasement has brought quiet to the Shiite-dominated south for some time, it has allowed militias such as Sadr's Mahdi Army to quietly regroup and flourish. Consequently, Sadr's followers - who have close ties to the city police - have more control of Basra's streets than British troops.

This control has also created a climate of fear among many residents not unlike that under Saddam Hussein. There are whispers that Sadr has established his own sharia courts, which issue rulings based on Islamic law. The Mahdi Army enforces its decisions, Basra residents say.

To build his network of loyal followers, Sadr offers payments to the families of his militia members who died in the fighting in August. Some 3,000 families are dependent on money or other help from the Sadr movement.

When an Iraqi is in poor health in Baghdad, more often than not it's a Sadr movement member who provides aid. Sadr movement officials run the Health Ministry, extending influence from the hospitals to the ambulance service. Posters, stickers, and other memorabilia of Sadr are plastered on Ministry of Health checkpoints, hospitals, and the walls of Baghdad's main ambulance center.

Despite years of community outreach, British forces had no better recourse Monday to free two soldiers arrested by police loyal to Sadr than to ram the jail where they were initially held with tanks. When the British discovered the soldiers were not there, they raided a nearby house where the two were being kept by militia members, according to the British.

"I have no doubt that there was an institutional desire on the part of the British military to have good relations with as many Iraqis as possible," says Robert Springborg, director of the London Middle East Institute that gave Iraq-bound British solders cultural sensitivity training. "It's much less a military problem than a political problem. [But] the resolution of the problems is beyond the control of the British government ... no one really is in control of this [political] process now and that's worrying."

The spark that caused the violence in Basra was the arrest Sunday of leading Sadr cleric Ahmed al-Fertusi and his assistant by British troops. The British claimed they were responsible for planning attacks on their forces. With tension already high between Sadr followers and British troops, Sadr demonstrators poured into the streets to demand Mr. Fertusi's release.

The next day, two British military personnel disguised as Iraqis engaged in a gun battle with Iraqi police, killing one police officer, according to varying accounts. The police eventually captured the two men. When British tanks arrived to free the detainees, crowds attacked them.

Top Sadr official Abbas Rubaie has charged the two undercover British officers with planting roadside bombs in order to justify a longer military presence in the country.

"What the British are doing in Basra is terrorism. They are attacking [British] troops so they can say 'someone attacked us and we need to stay as long as possible,' " Rubaie said.

A statement from the Sadr movement claimed that the two British undercover officers had also been firing into a crowd of pilgrims Monday going to a local shrine to mark the birth of the Imam Mehdi, the 12th and last Imam, or Shiite saint.

They also charged that when "the people of Basra demonstrated" to stop British tanks from freeing the two officers from jail, the troops fired on the crowd "killing and wounding many of them." They said the British tanks crashed into the jail allowing "150 terrorists" to escape.

Iraqi officials Tuesday condemned the British operation. "It is a very unfortunate development that the British forces should try to release their forces the way it happened," Haider al-Ebadi, an adviser to Prime Minister Ibrahim Jaafari, said at a news conference in Baghdad.

While one of Iraq's major cities, Basra is more like a small town, residents say, where everyone knows everyone. People could once play music outside, unmarried couples could once walk together. But as several Shiite groups vie for power, many worry the militias, particularly Sadr's, have forever changed the mood of their city.

These days saying anything against the Mahdi Army or its rival, the Badr Organization backed by ruling Shiite Islamist party Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), can be deadly.

"No one trusts anyone," says Ali Abdel Zahara one of few Basra residents willing to discuss the situation and who gave a false name for fear of retribution from the militias. "You can't talk about this, even at home."

He says Sadr has emerged as the most powerful force among the many groups that are controlling different sections of the town and police. "The ones that are in control are the tribes and the parties. Each one in the police is a representative of his party or his tribe," says Zahara. "Sadr is the biggest because they always solve the problems they face with violence."

In further evidence of the violence that has gripped Basra, Fakher Haider, an Iraqi journalist working with The New York Times was killed Sunday after being abducted by men who witnesses said claimed to be police officers. He was found dead outside the city early Monday. Early last month, Monitor contributor Steven Vincent was abducted by men who, according to witnesses, drove police vehicles. Like Mr. Haider, he was discovered dead not long after being abducted.

Militias Supplant Basra Police, Inflict Chaos (WT)

By Adrian Blomfield, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD -- They wear police uniforms and drive official police vehicles, but the main priority of the rival militias that have usurped Basra's police force is not to maintain law and order.

Instead, they have turned Iraq's third-largest city into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms, where competing militias run corruption scams and kill their rivals, dumping the bodies into a garbage dump known as the Lot on the outskirts of the city.

Although British troops have earned plaudits for avoiding the sledgehammer tactics of American troops in Sunni Arab areas to the north, questions are being asked about the wisdom of Britain's "softly, softly" policy.

British officers, however, say they have little choice in the matter, insisting that troop strength has been insufficient to deal with the problem.

"Quite frankly, we have one brigade here and we've worked bloody miracles," said an officer in Basra who asked not to be identified. "We have had to let the Iraqis get on with it."

There was a sense of inevitability about the chaotic scenes in Basra on Monday, when British tanks smashed the walls of an Iraqi prison to free two undercover British soldiers seized earlier by Iraqi forces.

British officials had been keen to emphasize the relative tranquillity of the city in comparison with Baghdad and other towns to the north.

But behind the scenes is growing unease at Basra's descent into lawlessness and on the increasing influence of Iran on the city's main political factions.

Troops were ordered not to stop if challenged by police officers in case they were militiamen linked to attacks that, this month alone, have resulted in the deaths of three British soldiers and eight Americans in the Basra region.

The raid to rescue two Special Air Service commandos held by a militia that operated as part of Basra's police force has destroyed the pretense of a normal relationship with Basra's authorities.

The group holding the two soldiers blithely ignored instructions from the government in Baghdad to release them, leading many observers to ask who really controls the city.

In May, Basra's police chief, Hassan al-Sade, acknowledged that he had lost control of 75 percent of his 13,750-strong force, saying they either worked for political factions or were involved in attacks on coalition forces.

For his honesty, Basra's governor, Mohammed al-Waili -- who condemned the British raid to free the commandos as "barbaric, savage and irresponsible" -- fired him.

Since the United States handed over sovereignty to an Iraqi government in June 2004, Basra has become one of the country's most conservative Shi'ite bastions.

The city is essentially divided among three factions, although even they are riven by internal squabbles.

The Mahdi's Army of Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr, the cleric who twice last year led bloody confrontations against U.S. forces, is the smallest but is gaining ground in two of Basra's largest suburbs.

The Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the largest party in the ruling coalition, is officially the largest faction and its Badr Brigade militia is accused of many of the assassinations.

It is led by Mohammed Yaqubi, who has close ties to grand ayatollahs in the Iranian holy city of Qom. All three groups are determined to some extent to turn Iraq into an Islamic republic modeled on Iran.

"Iran has a very strong influence across Basra," said respected Iraqi member of parliament Ali al-Dabbagh. "It's not just the Sadrists. Individuals in each and every party are receiving financial backing from Iran."

Iraq's People Need American Troops (WSJ)

By Jalal Talabani

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD -- There is no more important international issue today than the need to defeat the curse of terrorism. And as the first democratically elected president of Iraq, I have a responsibility to ensure that the world's youngest democracy survives the inherently difficult transition from totalitarianism to pluralism. A transformation of the Iraqi state and Iraqi society is impossible without a sustained commitment of soldiers from the U.S. and other democracies.

To understand why, let us recall how we reached this juncture in history. How is it that Iraq today has a democratically elected head of state, government and Parliament? How it is that members of the most repressed ethnic groups now hold the highest offices of state? All these welcome developments are a result of the courage and vision of President Bush and his allies, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Australian Prime Minister John Howard, leaders whose commitment of troops to enforce U.N. Security Council resolutions liberated Iraq.

Without foreign intervention, the transition in Iraq would have been from Saddam's bloodstained hands to his psychopathic offspring. Instead, thanks to American leadership, Iraqis have been given an opportunity of peaceful, participatory politics. Contrary to the new conventional wisdom, Iraq and the history of 20th-century Europe demonstrate that force of arms can implant democracy in the most arid soil.

The rapidity of the democratization and reform of Iraq is staggering. There was no German state for four years after the Second World War. By contrast, Iraq has moved from a centralized, one-man dictatorship to a decentralized, federal republic in half that time.

Inevitably, there have been stresses and strains. In Iraq these have been amplified by the terrorism of the remnants of the fascist Baathist dictatorship and our interfering neighbors. To contain these tensions, and to defend our young democracy, requires the support of American and other troops. Foreign forces are needed to train and equip the new Iraqi armed forces and to give Iraq its own counterterrorism capability. Only the United States and its closest allies are able to provide such assistance.

Creating these Iraqi forces has not been easy, but Iraqis have been undaunted by the difficulties. Every terrorist attack on Iraqi forces leads to a surge in military recruitment -- the opposite of the appeasers' myth that resisting terrorism causes more terrorism. For all the short-term problems, the soundness of the long-term strategy of building up Iraqi forces was demonstrated in recent days when Iraqis took over sole control of security in the holy city of Najaf.

As Iraqi forces gain in confidence and capability, so the need for foreign troops will diminish. The number of foreign troops will be determined in consultations between the Iraqi government and its foreign allies on the basis of operational requirements.

American forces are in Iraq at the invitation of the democratically elected government of Iraq, and with the backing of a United Nations Security Council resolution. Your soldiers are in my country because of your commitment to democracy. Moreover, during my visit to Washington, Mr. Bush reaffirmed the United States' complete support for the Iraqi political process toward sustainable democracy, and for the fight to defeat fascist and jihadist terrorism in Iraq.

That commitment to liberty has shaped our opposition to any timetable for withdrawal. There are also two practical, policy reasons to avoid such a scheduled reduction in foreign troop numbers. First, a timetable will aid the terrorists and tell them that all they have to do is wait. Second, military plans must be flexible. We should have the suppleness to respond to the often-changing level of terrorist threat. Indeed, we will require ongoing security assistance in many forms for many years to come.

If we keep progressing at the present rate, Iraqis may be able to take over many security functions from foreign forces by the end of 2006. That is not a deadline, but it is reasonable aspiration. During my visit to the United States, I was fortunate to meet relatives of some of the brave troops serving in Iraq. They were staunch, and I want their loved ones to have to serve in Iraq not a moment longer than is necessary.

Americans should be proud of what its soldiers have achieved. The presence of foreign forces has prevented a renewed civil war in Iraq -- renewed because there has already been a civil war in Iraq. For 35 years, Saddam and his Baath Party made war on the Iraqi people. The liberation of Iraq ended that civil war.

Above all, American forces provide Iraq with a much-needed deterrence capability. In the past, Iraq sought an illusory security through the follies of aggression, terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. Today, our external security comes from our alliance with the United States. Our neighbors can thereby be assured that we will settle all of our differences with them peacefully.

Sadly, some of our neighbors have chosen not to understand this. They seem either unwilling or unable to shut off the pipeline of terrorists crossing into Iraq. And in addition to what is at least passive support for the terrorists, some of them are providing financial and material support to them, too. They must desist from this behavior now.

While the problem of some of our neighbors supporting terrorism is bad enough, we can only imagine what our neighbors might have done if American troops had not been present. Most likely, Iraq would have been transformed into a regional battlefield, with disastrous consequences for Middle Eastern and global security.

Without American forces, the vision of American leadership and the quiet fortitude of the American people, Iraqis would be almost alone in the world. With its allies, the United States has provided Iraqis with an unprecedented opportunity. Iraqis have responded by enthusiastically embracing democracy and volunteering to fight for their country. By giving us the tools, your troops help us to defend Iraqi democracy and to finish the job of uprooting Baathist fascism.

Forces Bolstered In Western Iraq (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 20 -- U.S. and Iraqi commanders have begun bolstering forces in western Iraq's Euphrates River valley, hoping to choke the flow of foreign fighters along what intelligence officers say has become the primary infiltration route from Syria toward Baghdad.

The buildup, called Operation Sayaid, is aimed at securing the border area around the restive town of Qaim and suppressing other insurgent activity in the villages that hug the winding banks of the Euphrates west of Baghdad.

In recent public remarks, Iraqi Defense Minister Sadoun Dulaimi signaled plans to step up military operations in the valley. Gen. George W. Casey, the senior U.S. commander in Iraq, said in an interview that his forces were intent on "restoring Iraqi control of its border by the end of November, before the December elections." Iraqis are expected to vote for a new parliament by Dec. 15, following a referendum Oct. 15 on the country's draft constitution.

The effort follows months of growing concern, both inside and outside U.S. military ranks, that not enough forces had been committed to the western reaches of Anbar province, a stronghold of Iraq's Sunni Arab resistance and of Abu Musab Zarqawi's foreign-dominated insurgent group, al Qaeda in Iraq. Although U.S. Marines have conducted a series of raids in the far west, most lasting about a week, the longer-term presence of U.S. and Iraqi troops there has been relatively small.

Out of 32,000 U.S. service members in the province, only one Marine regimental combat team -- fewer than 5,000 troops -- and some Special Operations forces have operated in the far western region.

Consequently, insurgent fighters have continued to move freely in many places, according to U.S. officers. Zarqawi's network, in particular, is said to have established safe houses throughout the valley to shelter foreign fighters who enter from Syria before moving on to stage attacks in Baghdad and elsewhere.

"It's not something we haven't known about," said a senior U.S. officer involved in overseeing military operations. "It's just something we're now in position to do something about."

Plans call for adding several more battalions to the area, drawn from the U.S. Army and the Iraqi Intervention Force, one of the most seasoned of the country's military units. Commanders requested that specific troop numbers not be published.

These troops will back up a freshly trained contingent of several hundred Iraqi border guards. In time, the plan calls for thousands of soldiers belonging to Iraq's 7th Army Division, which is still being formed, to provide a permanent military presence in several towns along the river.

Success in quelling insurgent activity elsewhere in Iraq has freed some U.S. troops for reassignment to the river valley, and more Iraqi forces also have become available for duty there, U.S. officers said. In the meantime, the insurgent threat in the area has intensified, the officers added.

Until earlier this year, the main infiltration route for foreign fighters had been along a corridor in northwestern Iraq running from the border with Syria through the city of Mosul, U.S. military intelligence officers said. In May, the Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment was reassigned from south of Baghdad to take back the region from insurgents.

The regiment's operations west of Mosul, culminating in the assault this month on Tall Afar, plus the killing or capturing of at least 20 leading Zarqawi network operatives in Mosul since the spring by the 25th Infantry Division's 1st Brigade, have halted much of the northwestern infiltration. The traffic then shifted south through the Euphrates River valley, the intelligence officers said.

The first phase of Operation Sayaid came in July when an Army squadron of Stryker vehicles, augmented for intelligence gathering, rolled south from Mosul to set up an outpost near the Euphrates River town of Rawah. The contingent of more than

1,000 troops established an American presence on the north side of the river; the Marines had been operating on the south side. Also arriving in Rawah was an Iraqi Intervention Force battalion.

The troops have imposed tight controls on traffic that now must use the single bridge in Rawah. U.S. warplanes this month blew up two smaller pontoon bridges farther west in the towns of Karabilah and New Ubaydi, making the Rawah river crossing even more critical.

Bolstering forces as far west as Qaim, the offensive is designed to restore Iraqi control in the area rather than completely shut the border. Still, the operation is considered key to reducing insurgent activity before the December elections.

"There's no expectation that the border will be sealed," said another senior U.S. military officer. "But the presence of Iraqi border forces and Iraqi army forces, backed up by coalition forces -- that's what we're going to achieve by November 30. So you'll have a lot more people who can dominate the area, which means you will certainly have denied sanctuary for insurgents."

U.S. military estimates of the number of insurgents in the area range from 1,500 to 2,500, with 100 to 150 foreign fighters entering Iraq from Syria each month, one or two at a time. The insurgents intimidate residents and exert control in villages where U.S. and Iraqi forces have no permanent presence, U.S. officers said. Even where troops do patrol, in such towns as Hit, Haditha and Qaim, the insurgents operate in small cells, U.S. intelligence officers said.

About 250,000 people live in the area between Qaim and Rawah, their small houses and villages closely spaced through the valley. Apart from a narrow belt of cultivated land about a mile wide on each side of the river, most of the territory to the north and south is barren and inhospitable.

Although it represents a significant expansion of the U.S. military campaign in Iraq, the new push into the Euphrates valley could fall short of a decisive turn in the conflict -- particularly if, as in previous U.S. offensives in the country, insurgents duck away from the fight hoping to return after U.S. forces withdraw.

One factor raising the chances that the valley, if secured this time, will remain that way is the Iraqi government's intention to keep several Iraqi brigades stationed there, U.S. officers said.

Army Col. Robert B. Brown, the 1st Brigade commander whose forces set up the outpost at Rawah, agreed. "I think it's smart to focus on the west because that's where your martyrs are coming from," he said. "I don't know if you can ever stop it totally, but you can clearly disrupt the heck out of them."

Saudi Fighters In Iraq Bring Money (AJC/AP)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

CAIRO, Egypt — Saudi fighters make up only about 1 percent of Iraq's insurgency, but each contributes thousands of dollars to the cause — and they make sure their roles as "martyrs" are known when they carry out suicide attacks, helping draw more recruits, a new report said.

About 30,000 fighters are believed to be involved in the insurgency, approximately 90 percent of them Sunni Arab Iraqis motivated by fear of Shiite domination or anger over lost power, said the report by the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Of the estimated 3,000 foreign fighters, the largest number — about 20 percent — comes from Algeria, followed by Syria and Yemen with about 18 percent and 17 percent, respectively, said the report issued Monday. About 15 percent come from Sudan, 12 percent from Saudi Arabia, 5 percent from Egypt, and the rest from other countries.

Of about 350 Saudis who entered Iraq by August 2005, about 130 are believed to have been killed or captured, it said.

The report, written by Nawaf Obaid and Anthony Cordesman, was a contrast to accounts contending that Saudis make up a large proportion of foreign fighters in the insurgency that has persisted since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in March 2003.

The study by the CSIS, an independent think tank, said its information was compiled from estimates provided by Saudi intelligence services based on interrogations of captured militants and other sources, and by intelligence agencies of other, unidentified governments in the region.

The "main pillar" of the insurgency is not former Saddam loyalists, though they do contribute expertise, the report said. Instead the bulk of fighters are members of Sunni Arab Iraqi tribes. "Although they do not support a return to Saddam Hussein's regime, most are Sunnis wary of a Shiite-led government," it said.

Most of the Saudis who join the insurgency "were motivated by revulsion at the idea of an Arab land being occupied by a non-Arab country" and anger over allegations of U.S. abuses at the Abu Ghraib or Guantanamo Bay prisons, it said. They average in age between 17-25.

Notably, most of those caught by Saudi authorities trying to enter Iraq "were not militants before the Iraq war," it said. Eighty-five percent were not on any government watch list or known to be al-Qaida members. Instead, they were "radicalized almost exclusively by the coalition invasion," the report said.

The Saudis provide money and propaganda for the insurgents, it said. Unlike fighters from poor Arab nations, Saudis sometimes bring in "personal funds between $10,000 and $15,000" to contribute, the report said.

There also is a system for spreading the news of suicide bombings carried out by Saudis, unlike suicide bombers from Algeria or Egypt, whose families may never be notified, the report said. Saudi bombers leave their colleagues a contact number to notify next of kin.

"The media attention their deaths as 'martyrs' bring to the cause ... is a powerful recruiting tool," the report said.

And Saudi exploits are exaggerated in Internet statements issued by insurgent groups. It noted that analysis of some lists of "martyrs" posted on Islamic militant Web sites found that some said to have carried out suicide attacks were living in Saudi Arabia.

Many of the Saudi fighters were inspired to go to Iraq by militant clerics, who also helped the young men get there, often through Syria.

In one case cited by the report, a 24-year-old Saudi angered by the U.S. invasion of Iraq was introduced by a cleric to a Yemeni al-Qaida operative. The operative indoctrinated him and three of his friends, bought them plane tickets to Damascus in July 2003 and gave them a Syrian contact.

The Syrian took the men to the border and Iraqi handlers brought them to Tikrit, where they joined an insurgent "battalion" made up mostly of Saudis. The Saudi's friends agreed to become suicide bombers, but he declined and returned to Saudi Arabia, where he was arrested.

Contractor Charged In Baghdad Badge Scam (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Josh White

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

A military contractor returning from Iraq was charged yesterday with distributing identity badges that control access to Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone to people not allowed to receive them, including an Iraqi woman he was dating.

Thomas Nelson Barnes III, who worked for DynCorp International, was arrested by federal agents as he arrived at Dulles International Airport. He is accused of defrauding the U.S. government by issuing the high-security badges to other Iraqi civilians and a DynCorp executive.

Security in Baghdad's International Zone -- commonly referred to as the Green Zone -- has been extremely tight since U.S. forces took control of Baghdad during the invasion of Iraq in 2003. The zone, surrounded by blast walls and heavily guarded entry checkpoints, encompasses much of central Baghdad and houses the U.S. Embassy, Iraq's interim government and many coalition and civilian military personnel.

Although law enforcement sources said they knew of no specific security problem resulting from Barnes's alleged actions, federal and military officials warned that any breach could have dire consequences. The Green Zone's entry checkpoints have been the scene of numerous car bombings and are guarded by heavily armed coalition soldiers.

"A free pass to the International Zone is something that an insurgent would love to get his hands on," said Lt. Col. Barry Venable, a Pentagon spokesman. "A compromised badge represents a potential avenue of approach into the zone for folks who would want to commit violence."

The badges allegedly passed out by Barnes have different colors indicating level of access to the Green Zone. The highest access is blue. An FBI affidavit, filed in federal court in Alexandria, said Barnes gave a blue badge to an Iraqi woman he was dating, when she was allowed only a purple badge -- a lower clearance.

He allegedly gave various badges to other Iraqi friends, along with a blue badge to a DynCorp vice president who was not entitled to receive it. Barnes, 48, of Fort Worth appeared in U.S. District Court in Alexandria yesterday and was released on a personal recognizance bond pending another hearing Thursday. He could not be found later for comment, and a defense attorney had not been appointed for him.

Barnes is charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States and use and possession of military passes with the intent to defraud. If convicted, he faces up to five years in prison.

Gregory Lagana, a spokesman for Irving, Tex.-based DynCorp, said Barnes had worked for the company for just over a year and was fired recently because of the investigation. The company was awarded a $7.7 million Pentagon contract in March 2004 to establish a program to centralize ID badges being given out for the Green Zone by a variety of government agencies.

Barnes, a supervisor, was one of fewer than 50 DynCorp employees on the project. "We are disturbed by this," Lagana said. "We do a lot of work for the U.S. government, and we have a very good record. We are cooperating fully and absolutely."

Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, a trade association for government contractors, said the case should not be viewed as an indictment of the tens of thousands of military contractors in Iraq. "There is absolutely no evidence that there have been any more security problems with contractors than with federal government employees or anyone else."

The case is among the first brought by federal prosecutors in Alexandria since February, when U.S. Attorney Paul J. McNulty announced a crackdown on fraud in government programs. Law enforcement sources familiar with the case said the allegations against Barnes arose from that initiative.

England Statement OK'd (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

FORT HOOD, Texas (AP) -- A military judge reversed himself yesterday and decided to let prosecutors use a statement Army Pfc. Lynndie England gave to investigators implicating herself in the abuse of prisoners at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

Pfc. England's court-martial trial on seven counts of conspiracy and prisoner abuse will begin today with jury selection and opening statements. The 22-year-old reservist from rural West Virginia, who is shown in several graphic photos taken by Abu Ghraib guards in 2003, faces up to 11 years in a military prison if convicted.

Pfc. England broke with the pattern of her co-defendants yesterday by opting for an all-officer jury. Two of the others were convicted by juries made up of officers and enlisted personnel, and the other six made plea deals. Most were members of the Maryland-based 372nd Military Police Company.

The judge presiding over Pfc. England's case, Col. James Pohl, had ruled in July that neither of two statements Pfc. England made in January 2004, when she implicated herself in the abuse, would be admissible. He said he thought she did not fully understand the consequences when she waived her rights against self-incrimination before speaking to the investigators.

Yesterday, however, the judge said he now thinks Pfc. England knew what she was doing when she signed a waiver before making the second statement. Her first statement remains inadmissible.

In May, Pfc. England made a plea agreement that eventually collapsed, but this time "there's not going to be a deal," said Capt. Jonathan Crisp, her lead defense attorney.

Capt. Crisp said he plans to base much of his defense on Pfc. England's history of mental health problems that date to her early childhood.

He said he also will focus on the influence exerted over her by Pvt. Charles Graner, the reputed ringleader of the abuse.

Graner, who Pfc. England has said fathered her young son, was convicted in January and sentenced to 10 years in prison.

In her attempted plea deal, Pfc. England pleaded guilty to all of the same counts she faces this week in exchange for an undisclosed sentencing cap. The charges carry a maximum sentence of 11 years.

Col. Pohl threw out the plea deal and declared a mistrial during the sentencing phase because Graner's testimony contradicted Pfc. England's guilty plea.

Graner, testifying as a defense witness, had said pictures he took of Pfc. England holding a prisoner on a leash were meant to be used as a training aid. But in her guilty plea, Pfc. England said the pictures were being taken purely for the amusement of the Abu Ghraib guards.

Prosecutors have refused to discuss the trial.

Battle Lines Behind The Battle Lines (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

FAYETTEVILLE, N.C. -- In military communities across the United States, a debate over the Iraq war is being waged by reluctant, neophyte activists. Their microphones chirp and squeak, or don't pick up their quiet voices at all. Their signs are too small. They forget the banners.

"This is my community. I don't want to offend people here. But my husband is a soldier; he can't say anything. So it's my duty as a citizen to speak up," Kara Hollingsworth, a D.C. native and Army wife at Fort Bragg whose husband served two tours in Iraq, said as she took a seat on a panel of antiwar activists last week.

A few hours earlier, another Army spouse stood in the red-brick village square near the base and held up a handmade sign supporting the war. She threw it together after she heard that an antiwar caravan was coming to town.

"I've never done this before. I'm usually a quiet military wife. But I can't take this anymore," said Marlene Lowrey, whose husband also served in Iraq. "This isn't right, coming into a town like this with that antiwar stuff. Those people don't realize this brings down morale."

Military families, stoic and tight-lipped during most of the nation's wars, have become a powerful voice on both sides of the bitter argument over U.S. involvement in Iraq. And their growing prominence will add a poignant note to Saturday's antiwar march and rally near the White House.

Organizers of the protest, who anticipate a crowd of about 100,000, estimate that thousands of military families and veterans will join in the demonstration. Three busloads of military families have been touring the country since Aug. 31 and will converge on Washington today to promote Saturday's rally.

In recent weeks, war supporters have been countering those bus stops, rallies and vigils with demonstrations of their own. They've got their own bus touring the country and are planning three days of counter-protests in Washington this weekend.

Both sides embrace the slogan "Support our troops." They just disagree on how to do it. They also were inspired by the same person: Cindy Sheehan, who lost her son in combat and kept a vigil near President Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex., through most of August.

Because of Sheehan, "military families across the country are stepping forward to speak out" in support of U.S. policy, said Iowa state Sen. Charles W. Larson Jr., who recently served a year in Iraq with the Army. "You don't normally see people like this do that. They are angry and frustrated, and that is why they have become engaged in the debate."

Sheehan also galvanized Phil and Linda Waste, who were riding one of the "Bring Them Home Now" buses through the hills of North Carolina last week. Their three sons, grandson and granddaughter are all in the military and have served a total of 58 months in Iraq, and the Wastes have white-knuckled their way through each of those tours of duty.

"Then we saw Cindy in Texas," said Linda Waste, holding tight to the table's edge on the bumping bus. Her husband picked up her thought: "And then we heard people call her unpatriotic. And that was it."

The Wastes finish each other's sentences and kiss each time they say "bring them home now" in unison. The people on the bus have started to call them Philinda.

"It's something I've got to do. Otherwise, I can't live with the guilt of what I did to my sons," Phil Waste said. He served in the Navy and has the blurry, sagging tattoos to prove it. He never fought in a war and used the mechanical skills he learned in the military to earn a decent living repairing elevators. "I told them the military was a good place to start out, a good place to learn a skill." He shakes his head and begins to cry.

The three buses have stopped in small towns and state capitals, the riders helping one another step onto makeshift stages to tell their stories and assure other folks that being antiwar doesn't mean being anti-soldier.

"You wouldn't believe how many people in the military are relieved to hear us speak. It's like they have permission to be angry now," said Julie Cuniglio of Dallas, who comes from a large military family. She joined the bus tour in Crawford, mourning the death of her nephew, Staff Sgt. Aaron Dean White, who was killed in May 2003 in Iraq.

The antiwar tours have hit 51 cities in 28 states, covering the South, Midwest and North.

Sheehan has met up with each tour at various times, flying from one city to the next, making quick speaking appearances and signing a few autographs.

Some families have joined the tour for a few days. Others, such as Philinda, are in it for the long haul -- from Crawford to Washington in 24 days.

Last week, the riders on the southern tour had been wearing the same clothes for days and were begging their chain-smoking, ex-Navy driver, who goes only by "Chito," to stop for a bite to eat. In some cities, like-minded families served them fried chicken and potato salad dinners and sometimes put them up for the night. Other nights, they slept on the bus or occasionally splurged for a cheap hotel.

Sometimes, the mere threat of the tour barreling through town spurred people on the other side into action. In downtown Raleigh, N.C., a group of veterans quickly assembled a small rally to counter Sheehan's message. The antiwar tour never showed up at that spot, but Matthew Delk did.

"I'm really not into going to protests. That's not me," said Delk, a beefy Iraq war veteran who spent weeks recovering at Walter Reed Army Medical Center from burns on his hands and chest. A National Guardsman, he is the manager for Halifax County in North Carolina, and he was sweating in a charcoal suit far different from his desert fatigues. "As a soldier, I'm not supposed to get involved in this stuff. But I believe that our mission is a noble mission. And I feel like I had to come here and say my piece."

Carolyn Culbreth, whose father is a retired Special Forces soldier, came to downtown Fayetteville on her lunch hour to meet the antiwar bus. "What they're doing is unpatriotic," Culbreth said, spangled head to toe in red, white and blue. "And in a place like this, it's just like a slap in the face."

When Chito parked the Bring Them Home Now bus in the center of Fayetteville the next day, cars whizzing by it honked and drivers barked at the slogans all over the windows and sides.

A woman in a silver Mercedes leaned out and shouted, "Go home!" A man in a red muscle car gave members of the group an obscene gesture. A soldier in a beat-up Olds Cutlass gave them a peace sign.

Protests Will Test Police Strategy (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Police in the District are preparing for a weekend of demonstrations that could bring as many as 100,000 protesters and test new procedures on handling them.

The demonstrations are scheduled from tomorrow through Monday, but police officials anticipate the biggest turnout Saturday at an anti-war and anti-racism rally on the Ellipse, immediately south of the White House.

The event is scheduled to include a speech by anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, whose enlisted son was killed while fighting in Iraq.

"It's possible that this will be the largest anti-war demonstration since the war in Iraq began in March 2003," said Caneisha Miller, a spokeswoman for event organizer Act Now to Stop War and End Racism, or ANSWER.

Miss Miller said the group has permits from the Metropolitan Police Department that allows it to start a march at 11:30 a.m. that will go from the Ellipse, north on 15th Street Northwest to the front of the White House, west on Pennsylvania Avenue Northwest, north on 17th Street Northwest, east on H Street Northwest, then back to the starting point.

U.S. Park Police spokesman Sgt. Scott Fear said the agency has canceled vacations and other leaves and that officers will be out in force. However, he did not expect problems.

"The majority of these groups meet with us regularly," he said. "They want to be able to come back so we believe what they tell us. It's the splinter groups that we worry about."

In the past, such groups have used the demonstrations as cover to set fires, break windows and destroy private property.

Such violence during a 2002 protest resulted in Metropolitan Police Department officers herding demonstrators without permits into Pershing Park in Northwest. Among those arrested were onlookers and reporters who were restrained, taken by Metro bus to a police station, then made to wait several hours while their paperwork was processed.

An investigation concluded that police failed to give demonstrators enough warning to disperse, which resulted in new laws that took effect in April.

The laws limit officers' use of police lines to entrap demonstrators and their use of wrist-to-ankle restraints. They also require officers to wear identifiable badge numbers.

The Metropolitan Police Department has yet to release details on street closures and other plans such as canceling leave time for officers, help from other jurisdictions and activating the city's network of surveillance cameras.

The most disruptive event could be on Sunday when the group Mobilization for Global Justice is scheduled to join the group Adopt an Intersection to block streets to keep International Monetary Fund and World Bank officers from getting to their semiannual meetings.

At about the same time, the group Operation Iraqi Hope will hold a rally in support of the war in Iraq that will include parents and family members of soldiers who gave their lives in support of the effort. The rally is scheduled to take place from noon until 3 p.m. on the Mall at Fourth Street Northwest.

Folk renewal

It was nearly 40 years ago, during the height of the Vietnam War, that a young folk singer by the name of Joan Baez got arrested during a "sit-in" at a military induction center in Oakland, Calif.

One year later, in 1968, she would marry outspoken anti-Vietnam War protester David Harris, who eventually got locked up himself for dodging the draft. The marriage didn't last.

This Saturday, with the backdrop of a new war being fought by a commander in chief, the folk singer is picking up her guitar where she left off -- performing within view of the White House at what is being promoted as a "massive" anti-war concert, "Operation Ceasefire," on the National Mall.

Also appearing on stage: punk-rock bands Le Tigre, Bouncing Souls and the Machtres; hip-hop groups the Coup and Head-Roc; Wayne Kramer of the MC5 with the Bellrays; country music artist Steve Earle; independent artists Ted Leo and the Pharmacists; the Evens and Sweet Honey in the Rock; and last, but not least, prominent peace mom Cindy Sheehan.

The lineup is sponsored by United for Peace & Justice and was pulled together by Thievery Corporation's Rob Garza and Eric Hilton, with the latter remarking: "As a private citizen, I want to do something because I am very much against all of the post-9/11 wars and occupation."

Go figure

Trying to deflect the uncomfortable exposure that their 30 years of pressure campaigns and lawsuits blocked work on Louisiana's levees, environmental activists convened outside the U.S. Capitol yesterday for what has become a bit of an annual rite: protesting the very idea that America would extract petroleum from its own reserves.

Surely the organizers could use the same fiscal shot in the arm as the rest of the country, what with gas prices still taking a bite out of the budgets of working Americans. And, argued one observer of yesterday's protest, couldn't these groups have chosen a better topic, or at least a better time to chant that America should not reduce dependence on foreign sources of oil by using its domestic sources?

As he put it: "Given current circumstances, one has to question the chances of success for an argument that, distilled, insists that starving people should consider going on a diet."

Tale of two lives

These past few months have been the best of times and worst of times for our favorite political pollster Frank Luntz, or so we learned when finally tracking him down yesterday.

He's just sold his polling and communication company to Omnicom, owners of such venerable PR firms as Fleischman Hillard and Ketchum. And that, he explains, has kept him on the road for 26 days in August and 17 days so far in September.

Otherwise, he was seen deep in conversation with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger at Boston's Fenway Park for the opening of the Rolling Stones global tour, but his poll recommending alternative language for the upcoming reform (Mr. Luntz says call them "accountability") measures on the California ballot were panned by the governor's political adviser.

He had front-row balcony seats for the Emmys on Sunday, but spent the rest of the day at the Santa Monica, Calif., Police Department failing to recover his stolen Corvette. He appeared as himself on "The Daily Show" with Jon Stewart, but his consulting work for "Real Time with Bill Maher" wasn't enough: The show ended up with two coveted nominations, but no statue.

We've also learned that the pollster has received a large advance from Hyperion for a book entitled "Killer Words: The New American Lexicon," but rumor has it he's barely beyond 10,000 words and it's due in less than a hundred days. That advance paid for an 8-foot-tall Bob from Bob's Big Boy, but his latest collector's item arrived the day after his annual baseball All-Star party.

Speaking of which, Mr. Luntz is the only pollster ever invited to throw out the first pitch at a Colorado Rockies game. (He was high and outside.) And none of the three baseball teams for which he has season-ticket plans -- the Washington Nationals, Baltimore Orioles and Los Angeles Dodgers -- will make the playoffs.

Life's tough at the top.

War Opponents Target Military Recruiters In High Schools (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

High schools are the latest anti-war battleground, with parents, students, educators and activists around the country stepping up campaigns to prevent military recruiters from reaching students.

Many of the efforts focus on a provision in President Bush's 2002 No Child Left Behind law that requires federally funded secondary schools to give military recruiters the same access to students as they do college or job recruiters.

The exceptions: Private schools that have a religious objection to military service don't have to comply. And parents can “opt out” of providing details, including names, addresses and phone numbers, to military recruiters.

•“Opt-out” events planned through November in 321 communities are giving parents and students 18 or older forms asking school officials to not release personal information or school records to military officials. They can send similar requests to the Pentagon. By Tuesday, more than 24,000 opt-outs had been requested, says Leave My Child Alone, a national coalition coordinating the events. Meanwhile, a bill introduced by U.S. Rep. Mike Honda, D-Calif., would prevent schools from releasing private information to military recruiters unless families request it.

•Seattle's school board this month voted to tighten districtwide military recruitment policies, and made clear that conscientious objectors can have equal access to students. Other districts, including Toledo (Ohio) Public Schools, this year highlighted the opt-out option in brochures sent to families.

•Grass-roots groups last month launched a series of "Not Your Soldier" camps that teach students ages 13 to 22 how to counter military recruiters. Topics include non-violent campaigns and the ROTC.

The efforts come at a time when some military branches, especially the Army, are struggling to meet recruitment goals.

Unlike anti-war marches, "counter-recruitment" campaigns represent "one of the ways pressure is being put directly on the military," says Bill Dobbs of United for Peace and Justice, a New York group sponsoring a counter-recruitment conference Sunday in Washington as part of a Peace and Justice Festival. "It's the next big thing for the anti-war movement."

But many "opt-out" supporters cite privacy issues. Many were alarmed to learn that a database being created this year for the Pentagon would include students' personal information, such as Social Security numbers, e-mail addresses and grade-point averages.

"It's so insidious," says Kim-Shree Maufas, a San Francisco mother involved in local opt-out efforts. "You figure if anyone wants to get to your kid they have to go through you. Not in this case."

Douglas Smith, spokesman for the Army Recruiting Command, says high schools are an important venue because "it's the last time we'll have them all in one place."

He says most recruiters move on if they get a "hard no" from a student. But "If we get a soft no … I think that's an (invitation) for recruiters to call again," he says.

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday challenged the need for major military operations in Afghanistan. Karzai said airstrikes are no longer effective and U.S.-led coalition forces should focus on rooting out terrorist bases and support networks.

"I don't think there is a big need for military activity in Afghanistan anymore," Karzai said. "The nature of the war on terrorism in Afghanistan has changed now."

Karzai also wants foreign troops to stop searching people's homes without his government's permission. He said foreign governments should "concentrate on where terrorists are trained, on their bases, on the supply to them, on the money coming to them."

Coalition commander Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry said he expected more fighting in the weeks ahead. "We are staying on the offensive against the enemies of Afghanistan," he said.

Israel pulls last troops from 2 West Bank settlements

Israel withdrew the last of its troops out of two isolated West Bank settlements, completing the final phase of the withdrawal it began in Gaza last month.

As Israeli soldiers left the empty settlements of Ganim and Kadim, next to the town of Jenin, thousands of Palestinians streamed in, setting fires as gunmen fired in the air. Two other West Bank settlements were vacated earlier.

Unlike Gaza, Israeli forces will continue to patrol the area, the military said, as it has not turned over control of the northern West Bank to the Palestinians.

More than 1,000 missingafter storm in South Asia

At least 1,000 people were missing in southern India on Wednesday and hundreds of fishermen were unaccounted for in Bangladesh after a severe storm in the Bay of Bengal killed 50 people.

Praveen Prakash, a state government official, said about 100,000 people were homeless after heavy rains caused flooding in coastal districts of the southern Andhra Pradesh state on Monday and Tuesday, with strong winds uprooting thousands of trees and electricity poles.

"Over 1,000 people have been reported missing in the three coastal districts," Prakash said.

Most of the victims were either electrocuted or died in house collapses, he said.

Asia scrambles to curtail dengue fever outbreak

An unusually severe outbreak of dengue fever has caused alarm across Asia and baffled Singapore with a record 10,000 cases this year. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention considers dengue the "most important mosquito-borne viral disease affecting humans" this year — ahead of malaria and encephalitis. An estimated 2.5 billion people are at risk worldwide.

Across Asia, governments are scrambling to curtail the spread, mainly by educating the public about the potentially fatal illness and controlling mosquito-breeding areas such as stagnant pools of water. Symptoms include severe joint pain, high fever and a rash. There is no known cure or vaccine.

Kevin Palmer, a diseases expert at the World Health Organization, said Vietnam, Malaysia, Thailand and the Philippines have had a large number of cases this year.

Outgoing German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, 57, said he's giving up his leading role in the Green Party. A former radical and high school dropout who became Germany's top diplomat, Fischer told reporters in Berlin: "Now is the moment for a new lineup."

Karzai Urges Shift In Strategy (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 20 -- President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday questioned the need for further international military operations within Afghanistan, while the top U.S. military commander here predicted more fighting in the weeks ahead as Taliban guerrillas continue to mount attacks and U.S.-led forces respond.

Karzai, speaking at a news conference two days after landmark parliamentary elections were held with minimal disruption, called instead for a "stronger political approach," focused on shutting down guerrilla training camps and financial support outside the country.

Although he declined to specify any locations of foreign support, aides to Karzai have previously expressed his concern that neighboring Pakistan is serving as a haven for fighters linked to the ousted Taliban regime.

The president repeated past demands that foreign troops stop searching Afghan homes without authorization from his government. He also suggested that airstrikes, which are still sporadically employed by the U.S. military and have resulted in some civilian casualties, were not effective. "The nature of the war on terrorism has changed now," Karzai said. "We do not think there is a serious terrorist challenge emanating from Afghanistan."

Among the reasons he listed was a growing sense among Afghans that they are in control of their political destiny with the adoption of a constitution in January 2004, the country's first democratic presidential election last October, and the first parliamentary elections in three decades, held Sunday.

Taliban fighters failed to follow through on a vow to derail the latest voting. However, the Taliban militia has recently reasserted itself. Hundreds of civilians, government workers, Afghan police officers and soldiers have been killed in bombings and ambushes in the south and east.

U.S. and Afghan forces have responded with an aggressive campaign to root Taliban guerrillas out of their mountain redoubts, killing hundreds, but also losing 51 U.S. troops in combat since March.

At a separate news conference Tuesday, Army Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who commands the approximately 17,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, suggested that pattern would continue. "We can expect more fighting in the weeks ahead, as the enemy attempts to return Afghanistan to the dark days of the past in an effort to impose the will of a very few over the democratically stated choice of many," he said, according to the Reuters news agency. "We are staying on the offensive."

In Washington, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld praised Afghanistan's elections as "an amazing accomplishment." He acknowledged that lethal attacks continue, but suggested that airstrikes are a less useful tactic in the counterinsurgency campaign being waged today by U.S. and Afghan troops. "When you don't have a massed army on the ground or large puddles of enemies, then airstrikes are less effective," he said.

Eikenberry and Karzai also said the elections -- the results of which will be available next month -- were a resounding success.

Asked why turnout, estimated at 50 percent, appeared to have been so much lower than the 70 percent turnout for the presidential election, Karzai suggested that many citizens may have felt overwhelmed by the sheer number of candidates. More than 2,700 candidates competed for 249 seats in the lower house of parliament, and more than 3,000 for seats on 34 provincial councils.

The message sent by voters was "great," Karzai said. "Look at the threats, look at the bombing, look at the terrorism, and despite that, the Afghan people came out and voted."

He also dismissed concerns by rights activists that only a few dozen candidates were disqualified for links to illegal militias, though many more were former militia commanders and warlords, widely alleged to have committed war crimes.

"Our country needs stability," Karzai said, adding that "a system of participation" is important to improve national life. "Certain aspirations for us at this moment may sound like too much of a luxury. So I'm very happy with what we have."

By Carlotta Gall

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 20 - President Hamid Karzai questioned Tuesday the need for major military operations in Afghanistan, saying that airstrikes were no longer effective and that the United States-led coalition should focus more on shutting off the flow of militants.

In what seemed to be a reference to Pakistan, Mr. Karzai said the fight against terrorism should "concentrate on where terrorists are trained, on their bases, on the supply to them, on the money coming to them." Afghan officials have complained in recent months that Taliban insurgents are using Pakistan as a sanctuary where they recruit and train militants and obtain financing.

He added that the United States should refrain from raiding houses without authorization from the Afghan government. Both the airstrikes, which can lead to civilian casualties, and the house searches have grown increasingly unpopular.

It was not the first time the president has complained about the American military presence. In May his request for more authority over military operations by the 20,000-member force was rebuffed by President Bush.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, asked at a Washington news conference about Mr. Karzai's remarks, conceded that airstrikes were less effective "when you don't have a massed army on the ground or large puddles of enemies." But he said the United States was already coordinating closely with the Afghan government on counterterrorism activities.

In his first comments to journalists since Afghanistan's parliamentary elections on Sunday, Mr. Karzai expressed "relief and satisfaction" that they had come off without any major incidents. He said the fact that Afghans had voted in spite of all the threats against them and the killings in the weeks before the elections was proof that Al Qaeda had been defeated in Afghanistan.

The holding of parliamentary and provincial elections completes the international program for Afghanistan's transition laid down in the Bonn accords of 2001, but Mr. Karzai warned that it did not mean Afghanistan was now capable of standing on its own.

"We have just begun the foundations," he said. "Institutionally we are very weak." The country lacks the resources and human capital to run an effective civil service, is struggling to raise $350 million in revenues annually and cannot yet pay for its own army, police service and administration, he said.

Mr. Karzai said he was appealing to foreign governments to direct assistance away from reflief organizations and toward investment in trade and industry. He said he had specifically requested help from international backers, including the United States, in building reservoirs and electric power plants.

"I would like to concentrate on that," he said. "Roads and electricity are what the Afghan people ask for."

He also said Pakistan had formally proposed to build a fence to stem the flow of insurgents but said he had rejected the idea.

The 1,500-mile border between Pakistan and Afghanistan has never been officially determined, and both countries continue to use the administrative division, known as the Durrand Line, that was drawn by the British more than 100 years ago.

Mr. Karzai said building a wall would be extremely difficult because the Durrand Line divides tribes and families, adding "It is separating people, not preventing terrorism."

Pakistan's idea for a fence, first suggested by President Pervez Musharraf last week, was formally proposed in a letter to the Afghan government. But Afghan officials, who asked not to be identified because they did not want to be seen as criticizing Pakistan, have suggested that the proposal is an effort to divert international pressure on Islamabad to crack down on insurgents' networks.

Europe Ships War Refugees Back Home (CSM)

By Isabelle De Pommereau

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

FRANKFURT - Aferdite Hasanaj looks like any of her high school friends. But there's a difference: Every three months for the past 13 years, since her family fled Kosovo on the eve of the Yugoslavia war, she's had to ask permission to remain in Germany.

As a refugee whose asylum claim was rejected, she was subject to expulsion any time. In April, the government told her to go back "home" to Kosovo, squashing her dreams of going to college in Frankfurt.

"I've never been to Kosovo, I can't speak the language, don't know the culture," the 17-year-old said at a recent rally held to protest her expulsion. "The feeling of not having the right to belong fills me with despair."

Across Germany, 220,000 war refugees denied asylum have shared Aferdite's plight. But in a backdrop of public wariness about their perceived drain on the social system and an improved political situation in their countries, the government is speeding their return.

"How can a country expel a child who's been here for 13 years, who is good in school?" says Volker Ludwig of the GRISP Theater in Berlin, which staged a play about the deportation of a family. "Such a practice is unique in Europe, and it's outrageous."

This summer, Germany's 16 state interior ministers voted to hasten the return of hundreds of thousands of refugees to Kosovo, Iraq, and Afghanistan. And in May, the state of Hamburg began repatriating Afghans, saying that stability there had returned.

The trend is spreading across Europe, especially in countries with former liberal asylum policies such as Holland, Norway, Denmark, and England. Governments are implementing plans for faster and more efficient returns of refugees.

"There is a new intensity in the harshness of the repatriation," says Karl Kopp, European representative of Pro Asyl, a Frankfurt-based advocacy group for refugees.

There's a boom, says Mr. Kopp, in so-called "departure institutions," where refugees with failed asylum claims receive counseling meant to prepare them to leave voluntarily in exchange for receiving a stipend and food.

"The thinking in these institutions is: 'what can I do when I can't expel somebody?' " says Kopp. "The only way is to make life more difficult - to limit the people's freedom of movement, to go as far as possible so that the people have no choice but want to leave."

Government officials stress that those denied asylum know from the beginning that they will not receive legal status. Doing so "would send a signal to those who want to come to Germany: to stay here permanently, all you have to do is postpone getting your permit," says Wilfried Schmaeing of the Interior Ministry.

Germany's asylum regulations are considered among Europe's toughest. Until recently, only victims of state persecutions could receive asylum. Those fleeing civil wars like in Kosovo received a "tolerated status" because the persecution they had suffered did not come directly from the state. The new immigration act that went into effect this year loosened the regulations, recognizing persecutions by nonstate agents such as those suffered in Kosovo. At the same time, Germany has become more efficient and less human in sending home those denied asylum, critics say.

"The issue is becoming very politicized," says Patricia Coelho of the European Council on Refugees and Exiles in London. "Politicians are concerned about sharing with their public that they are being tough on asylum."

In England, "uncooperative" asylum seekers with rejected claims, with the exception of those with families, now see their welfare benefits withdrawn. In Holland, refugees denied asylum can now be denied social support after 28 days. Last year, Norway started charging hundreds of special officers with returning asylum seekers. Refugees denied asylum can also be denied access to the labor market or social protection.

"There is a tendency for industrialized nations to develop a policy to help induce or force people who've not been granted any kind of status to repatriate," says Ms. Coelho. Those asylum seekers, she says "form a growing segment of vulnerable, poor and marginalized people in European societies."

Although there are fewer and fewer asylum seekers in Europe, those asking for asylum are seeing their claims denied in greater number, says Ms. Coelho.

In Frankfurt, Europe's most multiethnic city, Aferdite's classmates rallied to her side. And Aferdite will most likely be able to stay at least until she finishes high school because a German family has committed to support her financially here. But her mother and two siblings are most likely going to be expelled next year.

Tyco Lobbyist Urges Senators To Support Tyco Lawyer Nomination (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — A lobbyist for Tyco International Ltd. is urging the Senate to support a top Tyco executive nominated by the president to the second-highest post in the Justice Department.

Edward P. Ayoob acknowledged Tuesday that he had been lobbying senators to approve the president's choice of Timothy E. Flanigan as deputy U.S. attorney general. The lobbyist said he was acting on his own, not as an agent of Tyco.

Flanigan, 52, has been chief counsel at Tyco since 2002, when he resigned as deputy counsel at the White House to take the job at the industrial conglomerate.

Ayoob, who called Flanigan a friend, said, "He is a man of the highest integrity, and I wanted my colleagues to know it."

Flanigan's selection as top aide to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales has provoked controversy. Some senators questioned his role supervising a Tyco lobbying campaign two years ago conducted by Abramoff, now the subject of congressional and criminal investigations.

In 2003, Flanigan engaged Abramoff to help Tyco fight a bill that would have imposed higher taxes on the firm, which had moved its corporate headquarters offshore, to Bermuda.

In a written response to questions from Senate Judiciary Committee members, Flanigan said that at Tyco, he engaged Abramoff after Greenberg Traurig partners advised that "Mr. Abramoff had good relationships with members of Congress, including Rep. Tom DeLay."

Flanigan also told the committee that sometime after Abramoff was involved, he "told us that he had contact with Mr. Karl Rove," a top political advisor to President Bush.

Tyco's lobbying effort against the tax bill and other legislation aimed at offshore-based firms was successful.

In his written response to questions, Flanigan said that while supervising the Greenberg lobbying effort, he had regular contact with Ayoob "and, less frequently, with Mr. Abramoff."

DOJ_NMG_0006968

The nominee also wrote that Tyco discovered after an internal investigation that payments it made to a consulting firm recommended by Abramoff, GrassRoots Interactive, had been diverted to "entities controlled by Mr. Abramoff and were not used in furtherance of lobbying efforts on behalf of Tyco."

He said Tyco had concluded that the diversion was "in violation of Mr. Abramoff's ethical, fiduciary and contractual obligations to Tyco." The payments totaled $1.5 million.

Abramoff, through a spokesman, declined to comment.

Flanigan also responded to a series of questions about his role as a White House counsel in the review of policies for the handling of detainees and whether detainees could be subjected to "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment."

He said he would not advise the attorney general or others "that U.S. personnel are permitted to engage in cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment."

Joe Shoemaker, a spokesman for Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.), said other questions posed to Flanigan had yet to be answered.

Flanigan's nomination is expected to be delayed until the Judiciary Committee acts next week on the Supreme Court chief justice nomination of John G. Roberts Jr.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Radler Plea Deal Vows Cooperation In Hollinger Probe (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

CHICAGO -- The longtime lieutenant of press baron Conrad Black entered a plea-bargain agreement with federal prosecutors, agreeing to cooperate with probes into dealings by Hollinger International Inc. executives, including Mr. Black, in exchange for a 29-month prison sentence and a $250,000 fine.

David Radler, who served as president and chief operating officer of the Chicago-based publisher, pleaded guilty to a mail-fraud charge and will cooperate with probes by federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Prosecutors for the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago said in the plea agreement that Mr. Radler and "the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer" -- titles held at Hollinger International by Mr. Black until 2003 -- schemed from 1999 until 2001 with others to cheat shareholders of $32 million.

Mr. Radler faced a possible maximum prison sentence under the mail-fraud charge of five years.

The fraud, according to the plea agreement entered in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, related to Hollinger International's sales of its small community newspapers in the U.S. and took the form of noncompete payments set up by Mr. Radler, according to a "template" that he understood was approved by "the Chairman." The executives never sought approval of the payments by Hollinger's board.

While the plea agreement doesn't identify "the Chairman" as Mr. Black, its language hints at the direction prosecutors could take against the embattled press baron, based on Mr. Radler's testimony. Hollinger International at one time published London's Daily Telegraph, most of Canada's major papers and a stable of small U.S. papers. The company's flagship is now the Chicago Sun-Times.

"Radler, the chairman and others repeatedly abused their authority and fiduciary obligations as managers of International in order to fraudulently benefit themselves at the expense of International and its public shareholders," the plea agreement states.

Eric Sussman, the assistant U.S. attorney who presented the plea agreement to judge Amy St. Eve, wouldn't comment on the investigation. A spokesman for Mr. Black, who hasn't been charged with any criminal acts but faces SEC charges, declined to comment.

The transactions outlined in Mr. Radler's plea agreement are the same ones that set off the unraveling of Mr. Black's trans-Atlantic newspaper empire when they were uncovered two years ago by a special committee of the board advised by former SEC Chairman Richard Breeden. The deals had been shielded from shareholder scrutiny in part because of the complex structure through which Mr. Black and his close associates, including Mr. Radler, controlled the company.

Mr. Black's closely held holding company, Ravelston Corp., owns a majority stake in Hollinger Inc., a publicly traded Toronto company that controls Hollinger International through supervoting shares.

Mr. Radler's plea is likely to help shareholders, who are seeking more than $400 million in funds that the internal company probe found had been diverted by executives, "get the money back through the civil system," said Eugene Fox, a principal with shareholder Cardinal Capital Management LLC. "David has admitted guilt. It's going to be hard for that not to have some weight in the civil process."

Final sentencing for Mr. Radler, who appeared in court sporting his trademark dark tan sports jacket, is to take place after criminal proceedings against other potential defendants are complete, unless those proceedings take too long, according to the agreement.

"This is the first step in making amends for what has taken place," said Anton Valukas, a lawyer for Mr. Radler.

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

A former Chicago Sun-Times publisher pleaded guilty to a federal fraud charge yesterday and agreed to cooperate with a Justice Department investigation of Conrad M. Black, his former boss at Hollinger International.

Prosecutors will recommend that the former publisher, F. David Radler, 63, serve 29 months in prison and pay a fine of $250,000 for his role in the $32 million fraud. He will remain free on $500,000 bond until all proceedings in the case are concluded.

Lord Black, who founded Hollinger and built it into what once was the world's No. 3 publisher of English-language newspapers, is contesting a lawsuit by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a $425 million civil lawsuit by Hollinger contending that he looted the company through excessive, undisclosed payments to himself and associates. Lord Black has not been charged with a crime.

Mr. Radler, a native of Montreal who now lives in Vancouver, British Columbia, may be permitted under the proposed agreement to serve the prison sentence in Canada. The United States government agreed not to take a position if Mr. Radler filed an application for the International Prisoner Transfer Program.

Mr. Radler made his plea before Judge Amy St. Eve of United States District Court in Chicago.

In a statement, Mr. Radler said, "I regret the obvious pain this whole affair has caused for my family, friends and business colleagues, and I am relieved that I can now begin the process of making amends and moving on with my life."

Mark Kipnis, 58, Hollinger International's former internal lawyer, and the Ravelston Corporation, a closely held company that Lord Black controlled, have also been charged. Mr. Kipnis pleaded not guilty in August. Ravelston is to be arraigned today.

Mr. Kipnis faces a maximum of five years in prison for each count and a $250,000 fine, or a fine of twice either his or Mr. Radler's profit or any victim's loss, prosecutors said. Ravelston faces penalties of $500,000 on each count or the alternative fine if convicted.

Lord Black, 61, has fought a 21-month effort by Hollinger International to neutralize his voting control and influence over the company and over Hollinger Inc. of Toronto. Ravelston in turn controlled Hollinger Inc.

Bloomberg News, September 20, 2005

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Former Chicago Sun-Times publisher David Radler pleaded guilty to a federal fraud charge and agreed to cooperate with a Justice Department probe of Conrad Black, his ex-boss at Hollinger International Inc.

Prosecutors will recommend that Radler, 63, serve 29 months in jail and pay a fine of $250,000 for his role in the $32 million fraud. He'll remain free on a $500,000 bond until all proceedings in the case are concluded.

``From what appears to be going on, the government is using the cooperation of the person who pled guilty today to work up a case against Mr. Black," said Bradford Lewis, a former federal prosecutor who is now a partner at Fenwick & West on Palo Alto, California.

Black, who founded Hollinger and built it into what once was the world's No. 3 publisher of English-language newspapers, is fighting a lawsuit from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and a $425 million civil lawsuit by Hollinger that claims he looted the company through excessive, undisclosed payments to himself and associates. Black hasn't been charged by federal prosecutors.

Radler, a native of Montreal who now lives in Vancouver, may be permitted to serve his prison sentence in Canada. The U.S. government agreed not to take a position if Radler files an application for the International Prisoner Transfer Program. Radler made his plea in U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve's courtroom in Chicago.

Making Amends

``I regret the obvious pain this whole affair has caused for my family, friends and business colleagues, and I am relieved that I can now begin the process of making amends and moving on with my life," Radler said in a statement.

Mark Kipnis, 58, Hollinger International's former in-house lawyer, and Ravelston Corp., a closely held company Black controlled, also have been charged. Kipnis pleaded not guilty in August. Ravelston is to be arraigned tomorrow.

Kipnis faces the same maximum penalties as Radler: five years in prison for each count and a $250,000 fine, or a fine of twice either man's profit or any victim's loss, the government said. Ravelston faces penalties of $500,000 per count or the alternative fine if convicted.

Black, 61, has fought a 21-month effort by Hollinger International to neutralize his voting control and influence over the company and Hollinger Inc., its Canadian parent. Ravelston in turn controlled Toronto-based Hollinger Inc.

The board ousted Black as CEO in November 2003, sued him and stripped him of the chairman's title the following January.

Countersuit

Black has countersued and said if he's found liable, former Illinois Governor James Thompson and other members of the company's audit committee should pay part of the damages because they breached their fiduciary duties.

Hollinger International had spent more than $50 million in the past 18 months on lawsuits relating to the allegations that Black looted the company, Hollinger International's lawyer Eric Hoaken said in a Toronto court in July.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald's office has been investigating Black and Radler to determine whether they ``fraudulently diverted corporate assets," according to court papers. Federal prosecutors were examining Hollinger International's sale of newspapers to companies Black and Radler controlled.

In one 1999 transaction detailed in the federal indictment, Hollinger sold several newspapers to a closely held firm called Horizon Publications Inc., which was owned by Radler, Kipnis and other unidentified Hollinger executives. Horizon paid a $5 million non-compete fee in the agreement, with $1.2 million of that going to Hollinger Inc., according to the indictment.

The SEC's suit, filed in November in federal court in Chicago, contends that between 1999 and 2003 Black and Radler diverted $85 million from the publisher in bogus non-competition payments and concealed ``self-dealing" transactions from shareholders, regulators and the company's board.

Ebbers Centers New-Trial Bid On Ex-Deputy (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Bernard Ebbers, WorldCom's former chief executive, faces 25 years in prison for participating in the largest accounting fraud in U.S. history. Former Chief Financial Officer Scott Sullivan got five years, two other middle-level executives got a year and a day, and a third got five months.

Yet WorldCom's erstwhile second-in-command remains in legal limbo. In court papers, federal prosecutors say former Chief Operating Officer Ronald Beaumont was a "co-conspirator" in the $11 billion fraud, but they haven't had him indicted for reasons they decline to discuss. He also hasn't had to pay penalties in civil cases by the Securities and Exchange Commission or shareholders of WorldCom, which is now known as MCI Inc.

Now Mr. Ebbers, who remains free while appealing his conviction, is hanging his bid for a new trial in part on Mr. Beaumont, along with two lower-level former executives also named by prosecutors as "unindicted co-conspirators." Mr. Ebbers's lawyers argued in April in federal court in New York that the government's refusal to grant Mr. Beaumont and the others immunity from prosecution effectively barred them from calling the ex-CEO's former lieutenants to testify for the defense.

The Ebbers team is focusing much of its appeal for a new trial on Mr. Beaumont as it prepares to send briefs to the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York this month. The Ebbers team says Mr. Beaumont's attorney had indicated that his client, if called, would invoke his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent and avoid possible self-incrimination. That's not a surprising stance, given that prosecutors could decide at any time to indict him, especially if he had said something they deemed incriminating on the stand.

With immunity, there would have been no danger that his testimony would be used against him, so he could have been compelled to answer questions.

Reid Weingarten, Mr. Ebbers's lead trial lawyer, says memos summarizing government interviews with Mr. Beaumont suggest he would have backed Mr. Ebbers's testimony that Mr. Sullivan hid the accounting fraud from the CEO. Mr. Beaumont "was more sophisticated and closer to the numbers than Bernie," Mr. Weingarten says, contending that prosecutors purposely left him in legal limbo to prevent him from helping exculpate his former boss.

The Ebbers lawyers say their inability to call Mr. Beaumont made the first trial unfair. They want the appeals court to order a new trial and to force prosecutors to grant Mr. Beaumont immunity so the defense could call him to the witness stand, where the trial judge could order him to answer questions.

In legal briefs, prosecutors say there is no reason to believe Mr. Beaumont's testimony would have helped Mr. Ebbers because the defendant's "hands-on management style" rendered him well-situated to know about the fraud. At the trial, U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones refused to order prosecutors to grant Mr. Beaumont immunity, ruling that his expected testimony -- denying knowledge of any fraud -- would at most exculpate himself, not Mr. Ebbers. The Ebbers lawyers say Mr. Beaumont's denial would have bolstered their argument that Mr. Sullivan kept senior management in the dark.

Lawyers uninvolved in the case say the appellate argument about Mr. Beaumont is a long shot. "The government always has a reasonable argument that it doesn't want to immunize a person because that person may have committed a crime," says Robert Morvillo, a white-collar attorney who represented homemaking entrepreneur Martha Stewart.

Mr. Beaumont's lawyer, Carey Dunne, says his client has "cooperated fully" in all WorldCom probes, and there is no reason to believe the government "is contemplating any action" against him. Mr. Beaumont previously has maintained he did nothing wrong.

Federal prosecutors in New York City who oversaw the WorldCom case decline to comment on Mr. Beaumont, as does the SEC. Lawyers pursuing WorldCom shareholder suits say they didn't name him as a defendant because he didn't formally endorse the company's fraudulent books, such as by signing SEC filings.

"The universe of people who had a hand in disasters like WorldCom is bigger than the universe of people you can bring a sustainable lawsuit against," says John "Sean" Coffey, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in a federal class-action WorldCom suit.

Mr. Beaumont, 57 years old, arrived at WorldCom in 1997 and became its chief operating officer in late 2000. In 2001, he got a salary and bonus of $3 million and use of a Gulfstream III jet, according to a report by a special committee of WorldCom's former board. The board report doesn't address whether Mr. Beaumont knew that WorldCom artificially inflated revenue, but it says he participated in decisions that resulted in improper accounting.

The report says Mr. Beaumont held meetings every two to three months in 2001 to stress to sales leaders the "importance of achieving revenue targets." Searching for "revenue opportunities" to bridge gaps, the report says, a group headed by Mr. Beaumont decided to count $30 million in penalties from customers who terminated service agreements before they were due to expire. The report concluded that because WorldCom rarely imposed such penalties, it was improper to count the $30 million.

Mr. Beaumont told board lawyers he relied on others to make accounting judgments, according to a lawyer's notes of the interview.

At Mr. Ebbers's trial, prosecutors' designation of Mr. Beaumont as an unindicted co-conspirator allowed them to use testimony about his conversations with alleged co-conspirators. Normally, such testimony would be barred as hearsay, but there's an exception for hearsay about actions taken to advance a criminal conspiracy.

Testifying for the government, Mr. Sullivan, the former chief financial officer, recalled that Mr. Beaumont agreed to Mr. Ebbers's request that slides on bridging a revenue gap be removed from a board presentation the boss was going to make -- suggesting that Mr. Ebbers was hiding something.

Though Mr. Beaumont technically remains in legal limbo, the Ebbers team said in its motion for a new trial that the former No. 2 is unlikely to be charged because doing so would fly "in the face of reality and common sense." Mr. Weingarten adds, "You don't routinely prosecute subordinates after you prosecute the big guy."

Kozlowski And Swartz Ask For Release On Bail (WSJ/DJN)

By Chad Bray, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Lawyers for former Tyco International Ltd. executives L. Dennis Kozlowski and Mark H. Swartz asked a New York state appellate judge to release their clients on bail pending their appeal.

Prosecutors and lawyers for the former executives made arguments on whether the men should be released at a hearing in chambers at the New York State Supreme Court's Appellate Division yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Kozlowski, Tyco's former chief executive, and Mr. Swartz, the conglomerate's former chief financial officer, were remanded to state custody on Monday after they were sentenced to 8 1/3 years to 25 years in prison and ordered to pay $240 million in fines and restitution. Their sentencings came after one of the high-profile trials in the wave of corporate-scandal prosecutions.

With good behavior and other factors, the earliest the two men could finish their prison terms is after nearly seven years.

Prosecutors are expected to file a response to the defense application for bail by tomorrow. Defense attorneys are expected to respond by Monday. A decision is expected soon after that.

Lawyers for Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz declined to comment after the hearing.

In June, a jury of six men and six women convicted Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz of 22 of 23 counts each, including grand larceny, conspiracy and securities fraud. They were each acquitted of one charge of falsifying documents related to the company's 1998 relocation to Florida.

Their convictions followed a mistrial in the case last year. Tyco, which has its headquarters in Bermuda, operates out of West Windsor, N.J.

Judge Declares Mistrial In Gotti Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 21, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-The judge in the John A. "Junior" Gotti racketeering case declared a mistrial Tuesday on the most serious charges in the case after the jury came back deadlocked.

The jury found Gotti not guilty of a lesser count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud. That verdict will stand.

The partial verdict came on the eighth day of deliberations in Gotti's trial on charges that included an allegation that he plotted the kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the founder of the Guardian Angels crime-fighting group.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin declared a mistrial on the remaining counts and discharged the jury after it indicated for the second straight day that it was unable to reach a decision about the bulk of the case.

Gotti Is Released After Judge Declares Mistrial (NYT)

By Julia Preston

In a startling setback to federal prosecutors, John A. Gotti, the Gambino crime family prince who said he wanted to leave the mob life behind and drive a minivan with his family, avoided conviction today in his racketeering trial, as the jury returned hung verdicts on three charges against him and voted to acquit him on a fourth.

After deliberating almost eight days in the six-week trial, the deeply divided jury reached no verdict on the most serious charge against Mr. Gotti, the accusation that he ordered the June 19, 1992, kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and WABC radio talk show host. He was abducted in a taxicab in lower Manhattan and shot several times at point-blank range.

The jury of seven women and five men had sharply mixed reactions to a case the prosecutors built primarily on the contradictory and often chilling testimony of two high-profile Gambino turncoat witnesses, both of whom confessed coolly in court to crimes more bloody than any Mr. Gotti was accused of.

Judge Shira A. Scheindlin said in Federal District Court in Manhattan that she would allow Mr. Gotti to go free once he posted bail, rejecting a request from a prosecutor, Michael McGovern, that he remain in prison pending a possible retrial.

"The time has come" for Mr. Gotti to be released, Judge Scheindlin said, and applause erupted from the many Gotti clan members in the courtroom.

"God hears a mother's prayer," said a happily tearful Victoria Gotti, Mr. Gotti's normally reclusive mother, who sat in the courtroom throughout the deliberations. Mr. Gotti's lawyers, Jeffrey Lichtman and Marc Fernich, requested that his bail be reduced from property worth $5 million to $2 million in property.

It was a notable change of fortune for the son the late John J. Gotti, the fearsome Gambino boss known as the Dapper Don who ran the Gambino family when it was New York's most powerful Costa Nostra organization. Mr. Gotti's father died in federal prison in 2002, and three other senior members of the Gotti family are behind bars for mob crimes.

Mr. Sliwa said prosecutors told him after the trial that they would try Mr. Gotti again on the three counts that ended in hung verdicts: the kidnapping charges for the attack on him, and racketeering and extortion conspiracy charges. Mr. Gotti was acquitted of securities fraud.

The office of Michael J. Garcia, the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, had no comment today.

Mr. Sliwa, dressed in the Guardian Angels uniform of a red sateen jacket and red beret, said he was stunned and disappointed and saw "a page out of O.J." in the hung verdicts, referring to the murder acquittal of O.J. Simpson.

"This jury was out to lunch," Mr. Sliwa said. "So let's make it round two. I can't wait." He predicted that Mr. Gotti and the Gambino family would continue "a reign of terror" once he was released from jail.

"John Gotti Junior is still down to the marrow of his bone an enemy of society, a thug," Mr. Sliwa said.

One juror, as she arrived today at her apartment on the Upper West Side of Manhattan, said the jury's debate "was exhausting." The jurors served anonymously in the trial, and she declined to give her name.

"Have you ever tried to get three people to agree on anything?" the juror asked. "Try 12."

The juror, who told the court during jury selection she was a retired actress, 67, recalled what defense lawyers had said of the government's cooperating Gambino defector witnesses: that they were "people who never told the truth in their lives."

She said, "I think we were all surprised," that Mr. Gotti was not convicted of any charge. In the most surprising verdict in the trial, the jurors acquitted another defendant, Michael Yannotti, 42, of two shooting executions on Jan. 27, 1996, in the Mill Basin section of Brooklyn. Mr. Yannotti was accused of shooting Robert Arena, a Cosa Nostra rival, and Thomas Maranga, who prosecutors said was a bystander in the wrong place at the wrong time. Mr. Yannotti's pager was found by police on the pavement among the spent cartridges of the murder bullets.

The jury delivered a hung verdict on the role of Mr. Yannotti, a Gambino associate, in the Sliwa attack. The prosecutors - Mr. McGovern, Victor Hou and Joon Kim - had sought to prove that he was the gunman who shot Mr. Sliwa in the legs and abdomen in the back seat of a taxi. Mr. Yannotti was convicted of one lesser racketeering conspiracy count.

Louis Mariani, 49, another Gambino associate, was convicted of three counts of securities fraud. Mr. Mariani's aunt, Antoinette Laboccetta, gave an anguished cry of "No!" when the guilty verdicts were read, and then fainted. She was carried from the courtroom by marshals.

As a sign of the intense dissent in the jury room, the jurors' verdict on the main racketeering count against Mr. Gotti and the other defendants was so divided that Judge Scheindlin and the lawyers puzzled over it for half an hour before deciding what it meant.

Gotti Set For Bail After Hung Jury, Acquittal (REU)

By Christine Kearney

Reuters, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - A New York jury deadlocked over racketeering charges against the son of late mob boss John Gotti on Tuesday and acquitted him of securities fraud charges, paving the way for his release from prison on bail.

She also said Gotti was entitled to bail and asked defense lawyers to submit a bail package. If granted bail, Gotti could be released within a week.

Gotti was imprisoned on other racketeering charges and was due to be released last year before the latest charges were brought against him.

The remaining charges against him included extortion, loan sharking conspiracy and ordering the attempted kidnapping of the Guardian Angels anti-crime patrol leader, Curtis Sliwa. Gotti faced up to 30 years in prison.

The verdict came after seven days of deliberations. A visibly relieved Gotti, wearing a crisp white shirt and black suit, hugged his lawyers, while family members in the Manhattan federal courtroom cried.

During the trial, prosecutors said Gotti became "street boss" of the Gambino crime family in the 1990s after his infamous father, known as the "Dapper Don," went to prison, where he died of cancer in 2002.

The jury sent a note to the judge on Monday, saying they could not agree on whether Gotti withdrew from the Mafia in 1999 after being sent to prison for pleading guilty to other racketeering charges, as his defense team had maintained.

The charges against Gotti are bound by a five-year statute of limitations, which means the prosecution had to prove Gotti was involved in at least one conspiracy after July 1999 -- five years before his indictment was handed down.

Outside the courtroom, Gotti's lawyer, Jeffrey Lichtman, said he was pleased with the result because "just the name Gotti" was usually enough to get a conviction. He said he plans to ask the court to dismiss the remaining counts against his client.

Curtis Sliwa, who testified during the trial that he was shot in the back of a taxi in 1992 after making derogatory comments about Gotti's father, said he couldn't wait for "round two."

"I am disappointed. I've been waiting 13 years, but I can still wait a little longer for justice," he said. "I feel in my heart I am alive today simply so that justice can be done for John Gotti Junior."

An array of mob turncoats testified during the monthlong trial, including the taxi driver in the Sliwa shooting, Joseph D'Angelo, who said Gotti ordered the attack.

But Gotti's defense lawyers said the prosecution's case was based on witnesses who were liars and murderers who testified to get lighter prison terms.

At The Gotti Trial, A Mob Scene (WP)

By David Segal, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 20 -- In a scene that seemed scripted by a Hollywood hack, the federal trial of John A. "Junior" Gotti ended Tuesday with tears, applause, fainting and a mixed verdict that soon could spring the onetime Mafia boss from prison.

On its eighth day of deliberation, a weary panel of seven women and five men acquitted Gotti, 41, of securities fraud and hung on the three other counts, including loan-sharking and the alleged kidnapping of Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin declared a mistrial on those charges and said that she's inclined to approve a request by Gotti's lawyers that he be freed on $2 million bail. Odds are good that one of the country's most notorious gangsters -- or ex-gangsters, as his defense team argued -- will be restricted only to house arrest starting sometime next week.

The coda to this seven-week trial was weird, baffling and at moments very noisy. The aunt of Louis Mariani, one of Gotti's two co-defendants, screamed "Noooooooooo!" as she heard the forewoman declare her nephew guilty of securities fraud. Antoinette Laboccetta then slipped off her seat and onto the floor, her eyes rolling, a copy of a pamphlet called "The Promises of Our Lord" clutched to her chest.

Two marshals in the courtroom rushed to aid her. "Do you need an ambulance?" shouted one of Scheindlin's clerks, sitting directly in front of the judge, as Laboccetta was carried out of the room. All the while, the judge tried to go through the formality of polling the jury, which wasn't easy because jurors, too, were fixated on the drama in the audience. "Pay attention to me," she said, as cheerfully as possible. Adding to the upheaval, the clerk who'd asked about the ambulance started to cry.

Other members of the crowd -- the Gotti side, at any rate -- clapped wildly when the last "not guilty" was read. Angel Gotti, a sister of the accused, praised her favorite psychic, who she said had predicted this very outcome on this very day. "I told you, didn't I?" she said, nudging her mother as the two of them wiped tears from their eyes. "God listens to a mother's prayers," said Gotti's mother, Victoria, who leaped to her feet and left the courtroom as the verdict was read.

Gotti shook his head, hugged his lawyer and eventually turned to give a thumbs-up to assorted friends and family. But for a while he looked baffled by the proceedings. And the proceedings, in truth, were pretty baffling.

There was some confusion about the law -- for a good half-hour, the judge and lawyers puzzled over the verdict sheet, parsed the complicated rules of racketeering statutes and debated whether the jury had actually acquitted Gotti of all counts or just had failed to reach a unanimous decision. (It had deadlocked, it was decided, leaving Gotti open to a retrial.)

Gotti is hardly out of legal jeopardy -- prosecutors will almost certainly retry him -- but he and his attorneys clearly won over a juror or two by arguing that he'd quit the mob in 1999, when he pleaded guilty to a handful of racketeering charges. Gotti, son of the "Dapper Don," the late John J. Gotti, had contended that his charismatic and murder-prone dad led him astray, and that after six years in prison, a variety of slights by former associates in the Gambino crime family, and maybe a little moral clarity, he had had enough of crime.

"The fact is they built a case on the backs of psychotics," Lichtman said, referring to the parade of ex-mobsters who provided the juiciest part of the prosecution's presentation. "Altogether they committed about 30 murders, these guys, and some of them are walking among us. The jury rejected that approach."

Lichtman also said it was time to leave the Gottis alone. "Enough already," he said. "Let's find Osama bin Laden."

The sidewalk outside the Daniel Patrick Moynihan courthouse in Lower Manhattan was jammed with television cameras as Lichtman and other players in the case left the building. Sliwa, who the government alleged had been shot on Gotti's orders in a 1992 kidnapping attempt, fumed in the middle of the scrum.

"There's a Round 2," he said. "This doesn't mean Gotti is innocent. I've waited 13 years for this. I can wait a little longer."

Mariani, who is free pending sentencing, shrugged off the guilty verdict against him and told the assembled media that he was ready to do his time.

"It'll be a lot like a fat farm," he said of prison, grinning widely, his hands on his expansive belly.

"I could stand to lose 60 pounds."

Gotti Mistrial Leaves Some Elated, Others Stunned (NYNSDY)

By Patricia Hurtado, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, September 21, 2005

The verdict in the month-long trial of John "Junior" Gotti was met with tears, applause and near-pandemonium.

Gotti's sister Angela gasped and began to weep, while his mother and other siblings applauded as the jury announced it had cleared him of a securities fraud charge and were hung on the remaining racketeering and conspiracy counts.

When the audience heard that Gotti's co-defendant Louis Mariani, a reputed Gambino crime family associate, was convicted of securities fraud and other charges, Mariani's aunt let out a groan and fainted.

Lawyers tried to get U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin to stop, but she continued to read the verdict as a team of U.S. Marshals and courtroom security officers carried the unconscious woman out.

Later, as the courtroom was emptying, Gotti's mother, Victoria, of Howard Beach, beamed triumphantly as she waved at her son.

"I'm feeling great. God hears a mother's prayers. I have no doubt though that they'll be back at it in a couple of months. We've gotta get him out of the country. He's always going to be catnip to these people," she said of prosecutors and the FBI.

Gotti's sister Victoria, star of her own reality TV show, "Growing Up Gotti," left the courtroom alone, leaned against the courthouse's white marble wall and began to weep. "He's just coming home," she said. "I think it means a lot for the men in my family, my boys. I just think this sends a message that you just can't prosecute someone because of their last name."

Asked what Gotti had said after the verdict, defense lawyer Jeffrey Lichtman said his client was elated.

"He said 'Thank you, you did everything you said you would do,'" Lictman said.

Lichtman, who apparently did not know the jury had come close to convicting his client (it voted 11-to-1 for conviction on a variety of crimes) sounded a triumphant note.

"This case, what's left of it, is a limping wreck," he said. Noting that the judge said she would likely release Gotti on bail, Litchman said: "John's very pleased he's going to be home very shortly with his children, which is all that he's talked about for the last year."

Meanwhile, Curtis Sliwa, who testified about how he was kidnapped and shot -- allegedly at Gotti's behest in June 1992 -- emerged from the courthouse looking grim.

Asked how he felt about the acquittal of Gotti co-defendant Michael Yannotti, Sliwa shook his head.

"I'm stunned," he said. "This is a page out of the O.J. Simpson case. Next thing you know, they will believe it was the Colombians who shot me.

"I feel that I am alive today simply to make sure that justice is done in this case ... I think it's time to have 12 fresh jurors."

Reuters, September 20, 2005

BATON ROUGE, Louisiana (Reuters) - Identity thieves are preying on Louisiana residents forced from their homes by Hurricane Katrina, the state attorney general's office said on Tuesday.

Consumer protection officials said complaints were coming in from hurricane victims who discovered the thefts when they applied for financial aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"When they (hurricane victims) go into apply, they'll find that somebody has already done it in their name," said Isabel Wingerter, director of the Louisiana Attorney General's public protection division.

Thieves were able to apply for the aid using the victim's social security numbers.

Experts had warned that identity theft could become a problem in the wake of the storm with thieves taking birth certificates, banking and other sensitive documents left among the waterlogged debris.

Wingerter said Louisiana officials had received about 50 complaints of identity fraud in the past day, but she expected the number to grow as more storm victim apply for federal assistance.

Displaced hurricane victims were also being urged to file for changes of addresses with the U.S. Post Office to prevent sensitive materials from being delivered to their wrecked homes before they return.

The Justice Department in Washington has set up a task force to investigate identity theft and other types of fraud related to the Katrina.

Federal Officials Scrutinize Ladner (WP)

By Valerie Strauss And Susan Kinzie, Washington Post Staff Writers

Federal law enforcement officers are reviewing documents regarding suspended American University President Benjamin A. Ladner, whose personal and travel expenses are being investigated by the school's trustees.

Officials from the U.S. attorney's office in Washington, working with the FBI, requested documents from American University, which turned them over to comply with a subpoena, according to two sources with knowledge of the probe.

In addition, the Internal Revenue Service has contacted the university about issues involving the Ladner case, but the IRS is not actively involved, according to the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

The case could have tax implications not only for Ladner but also for AU, which is bound by laws governing how much charities and universities pay their executives.

The board of trustees placed Ladner on administrative leave Aug. 24, and Provost Cornelius M. Kerwin stepped in to serve as acting president. Ladner would not comment for this article. The chairman of the board, Leslie E. Bains, did not return a phone call yesterday.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said last night that grand jury secrecy rules and Justice Department policy prevent his office from commenting.

The trustee board is close to completing its probe of Ladner, who became president in 1994. He has been credited with raising academic standards and the national profile of the university, which is in Northwest Washington .

There is a split on the board about the severity of the issues reviewed in its audit, according to several sources familiar with the board's discussions. Some trustees view Ladner's expenses as justified by the constant fundraising and entertaining required of today's university presidents, while others believe that the spending was out of line for a school of AU's size, the sources said.

Those sources and others with knowledge of the board probe said it involved a number of complicated issues and hundreds of thousands of dollars in travel and personal expenses over the past three years. The board has not determined whether Ladner should be asked to repay the university for any of the spending, a source said.

The board also has been wrangling with Ladner over compensation -- his salary, benefits and allowances -- which has more than tripled since he came in 1994, according to one source with detailed knowledge of Ladner's pay. In 2004, his base salary was $633,000, but his total compensation was well over $800,000, according to forms the university filed with the IRS.

Last year, some board members became concerned that Ladner's pay was too high for the president of a 10,000-student private, nonprofit school and that they could be liable under laws intended to avoid excessive compensation to executives of charities, sources knowledgeable about board activities said.

Any payment of an executive's personal expenses by the organization generally must be repaid or reported as income, said LaVerne Woods, chair of the tax-exempt organizations committee of the American Bar Association.

The board decided to reduce Ladner's overall compensation by an undisclosed amount, according to the sources. The trustees, meanwhile, continued to investigate his personal and travel expenses, including an engagement party for his son that he allegedly charged to the university, the sources said.

Because his contract required Ladner to spend a certain amount of time at a university-owned house, sources said, Ladner's attorneys argued that the cost of all food and services required while living there should be paid by the school.

A preliminary report by Arnold & Porter LLP, a law firm helping the trustees, has been completed and sent to Ladner. The report includes records of several chauffeurs employed by Ladner and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner. Chauffeurs kept a log of their duties, including taking Ladner to such events as an athletic awards banquet, dropping off dry cleaning and taking Nancy Ladner to an appointment at a hair salon.

A final report has not been completed but is expected to be within a few weeks, the sources said. The board, however, already has eliminated the position of personal chef to the Ladners and transferred the social secretary for the Ladners to another department.

FBI Investigates Democrats On Steele's Credit Report (WP)

By John Wagner And Matthew Mosk

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, acknowledged yesterday that two of his organization's employees had resigned as a result of the episode, which he said was subsequently referred to the U.S. attorney's office by the Democratic committee.

Under federal law, it is illegal to knowingly and willfully obtain a credit report under false pretenses. A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office for the District of Columbia confirmed last night that an investigation by its fraud and public corruption section is proceeding with the assistance of the FBI.

The July episode came as both parties started digging into the backgrounds of opposing candidates for Maryland's two marquee races next year, for governor and an open U.S. Senate seat.

Steele's chief of staff, Paul Ellington, said FBI agents interviewed the lieutenant governor about the matter last week.

Ellington said Steele learned of the possible impropriety when agents approached him. "He didn't have any idea this was going on," Ellington said. Personal finances could be fertile territory for researchers looking into Steele, who acknowledged financial difficulties when he ran for statewide office three years ago.

The DSCC, the arm of the Democratic Party tasked with promoting Senate candidates, declined to disclose the names of the employees involved. But sources with knowledge of the episode identified them as Katie Barge, the committee's former research director, and Lauren Weiner, an employee who had been researching Steele even before he formed an exploratory committee for Senate in June.

Bill Lawler, an attorney representing Barge, said she had brought the matter to her superiors' attention. "She resigned because she didn't want this episode to negatively reflect on the committee," Lawler said.

An attorney said to be representing Weiner did not return a phone call yesterday.

Singer said the two employees acted without the committee's authorization but later told their superiors, who "immediately ensured that Mr. Steele's credit report was not used or disseminated to anyone."

Singer added that the former employees were cooperating with authorities and that the DSCC had launched an internal review of the matter. He said the DSCC is not a target of the federal inquiry.

Sources familiar with the episode said Steele's credit report was obtained with the use of his Social Security number, which was found on a public court document.

Shortly after being named by Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) as his running mate in 2002, Steele disclosed to reporters that he owed more than $35,000 in personal debts and had an unpaid political loan of $25,000 from a previous race.

Steele, a former corporate lawyer who started his own consulting firm in 1998, said at the time that his "tight" financial situation should not detract from his political message. "At least my report reflects a blue-collar man, an entrepreneur out there trying to start a business in Maryland," Steele said in July 2002. "I don't have trusts that are going to cover me."

Steele is paid $120,833 a year as lieutenant governor. According to the most recent financial disclosure he submitted to the Maryland State Ethics Commission, which covers 2004, he has paid off some of his debts.

Steele has been heavily courted to run for Senate by national GOP leaders and is expected to give the party its best shot at a Senate seat in years.

Democrats Got Steele's Credit Report (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Two members of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee have resigned after admitting they obtained Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's credit report.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), said the two staffers told committee officials in July what they had done. He said the committee began an internal investigation and determined it was an isolated incident.

"The DSCC immediately ensured that Mr. Steele's credit report was not used or disseminated to anyone," Mr. Singer said, "It also reported this incident to the U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C."

He said the employees, who were not identified, were cooperating with authorities.

A source familiar with the investigation said the employees were "senior staff" members in the research department of the DSCC.

"While the DSCC did not authorize the employees to access Mr. Steele's credit report, we regret that this incident occurred and apologize to Mr. Steele," Mr. Singer said.

Mr. Steele's chief of staff, Paul Ellington, said the lieutenant governor had been made aware of the incident.

"This is a serious legal issue, and a criminal investigation is under way," Mr. Ellington said last night. "We have been advised by the FBI to not comment and will honor their request."

Mr. Steele, a Republican, in June announced the formation of an exploratory committee for his run for the U.S. Senate after Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes in March announced he would not seek a sixth term.

State and national Republican Party leaders, including President Bush and Sen. Elizabeth Dole, North Carolina Republican and chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, have pressured him to run.

Audra Miller, spokesperson for the Maryland Republican Party, would not comment on the credit-report incident, referring a request to the National Republican Senatorial Committee. A spokesman for the committee said it is a "serious legal issue" and he was unable to comment until the committee receives more information.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s election as governor with Mr. Steele as lieutenant governor in 2002 made the two men the first Republicans to hold those offices in Maryland in more than 30 years. The state has not had a Republican senator since 1987.

Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, achieved national prominence after his prime-time speech at the 2004 Republican National Convention.

His political rise, from a post on the Prince George's County Republican Central Committee to lieutenant governor, took less than 10 years. Mr. Steele said he did not plan his political trajectory but seized the opportunities presented to him.

Democrats who have announced their candidacies are U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin; socialist activist A. Robert Kaufman; Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; and Dr. Lise Van Susteren, a Montgomery County psychiatrist, and the sister of Greta Van Susteren, who hosts the Fox News Channel's "On the Record" interview program.

CBS 2 Chicago, September 21, 2005

Stephens, the long-time mayor of Rosemont, had lobbied hard for the Emerald Casino Inc., to be granted a license to operate in Rosemont. But the Illinois Gaming Board rejected the Emerald bid, citing alleged mob ties.

At a special hearing Tuesday on the Emerald license, the gaming board watched an undercover videotape from the Operation Family Secrets investigation. On the tape, the Marcello brothers discussed whether the mob would have a piece of any casino in Rosemont.

The two men did not use proper names when discussing the matter. The FBI said "he" referred to Stephens.

James Marcello: “Are we gonna be in there at all?”

Michael Marcello: “I don’t ... MGM or one of them companies will wind up with it. I mean he ain't going to get it like he wanted it before but...”

James Marcello: “They'll pay him so much a month and that'll be it.”

James Marcello: “You gotta say it. This guy really knew what he was doing, Mickey. They could say what they want about him.”

Attorney Robert Cliffford, who represents Emerald Casino, was skeptical of the meaning of the tape.

“When I first saw this my reaction was you have a couple of sideways talking about stuff they don't know an awful lot about,” Clifford said.

But top FBI organized crime agent John Mallul said that Stephens had a special interest in Emerald getting a license since he could exercise some control over it.

A spokesman for the Rosemont mayor ripped the FBI tape, calling it "meaningless."

He said it proves nothing and suggests the gaming board has a "vendetta against Mayor Stephens."

As far as the videotape itself, this is the first time we've seen some of the mountain of evidence expected to be used against James Marcello and other alleged mobsters in the Family Secrets case.

The video portion clearly showed the Marcello brothers having a chat in a day room at the Michigan prison. But the audio was difficult to make out. We had to read from a transcript provided by an FBI agent.

FBI Agent: Mob Ties To Casino Discussed (CHIST/AP)

By MAURA KELLY LANNAN, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 21, 2005

The reputed head of the Chicago mob and his half brother were caught two years ago on surveillance videotape talking about organized crime's involvement and control of a proposed casino in Rosemont, an FBI agent testified Tuesday.

A two-and-a-half-minute segment of the grainy and muffled videotape was played during a hearing in which the Illinois Gaming Board is trying to revoke Emerald Casino Inc.'s gambling license. State regulators want to revoke Emerald's license because they say some of the casino's investors had alleged mob ties.

Emerald had hoped to relocate to Rosemont. Attorney General Lisa Madigan has questioned the suitability of Rosemont as a casino location and said she had concerns about possible mob ties in the Chicago suburb.

A written transcript of the videotape, which the FBI agent said is about five hours long, includes vague references and does not name a person or town.

However, FBI special agent John Mallul testified he believed portions of the taped conversation referred to Rosemont Mayor Donald Stephens and his quest to have a casino open in Rosemont as well as organized crime's influence at such a casino.

Attorneys for Rosemont and Emerald questioned how Mallul could draw those conclusions from the videotape.

Mallul said the tape, made March 24, 2003 by Chicago FBI agents, shows James and Michael Marcello talking in the visiting room at a federal prison in Michigan where James Marcello was incarcerated.

The Marcello brothers are now both in jail. A June federal indictment accuses James Marcello in three slayings, including the killing of Las Vegas mobster Tony "The Ant" Spilotro and his brother. Michael Marcello is accused of helping his imprisoned brother by keeping him informed of the mob's activities, delivering messages and carrying out illegal activities, including operating an illegal video gambling business.

On the videotape James Marcello asked Michael Marcello: "How are you guys doin' with that, okay? Everything okay?"

"So far, yeah. Things workin' out good," replied Michael Marcello, whom the FBI has identified as an associate of organized crime.

"Good," James Marcello said.

When asked what that exchange meant, Mallul testified, "It's my opinion that they're referring to organized crime involvement and control of a casino in Rosemont."

However, on cross examination Mallul said he never asked the Marcello brothers what they discussed.

"If anybody would fairly read it, they would come away with the same conclusion," Stephenson said.

Emerald attorney, Robert Clifford, argued against the use of the videotape during the hearing because he said he had not seen the entire tape. He also said it was irrelevant to Emerald's case.

According to the transcript, James Marcello later asks, "Are we gonna be in there at all?"

Michael Marcello replied, "I don't ... MGM or one of them companies will wind up with it. I mean, he ain't gonna get it like he wanted it before."

Mallul said he thought that exchange meant James Marcello asked if organized crime would be involved with the Rosemont casino, and Michael Marcello replied that Stephens was not going to get the type of casino he wanted. Mallul did not elaborate.

"It's my opinion, based on this conversation, Donald Stephens had a special interest in having Emerald itself be a casino in Rosemont," Mallul said.

Mallul declined to comment after the hearing.

The videotape also includes an exchange in which the Marcello brothers discuss Wayne Johnson, a former chief investigator of the Chicago Crime Commission, and his settlement of a defamation lawsuit filed against him by Stephens, Mallul said.

Stephens filed the lawsuit after Johnson accused him of having connections to organized crime. As part of a settlement, Johnson withdrew his claim. He later became police chief in Cicero.

"The V guy put his arm around him (the videotape shows Michael Marcello making a fist and hitting his stomach). Alright? Put 'em over there in that town. He backed off the other guy out there. Now they're goin' for the thing again," Michael Marcello said, according to the transcript.

Mallul testified that "the V guy" was former Chicago alderman and Cicero attorney Edward Vrdolyak, and the town mentioned was Cicero. Mallul said Marcello meant Johnson backed off his comments about Stephens, and that Stephens and Rosemont were seeking a casino again.

Vrdolyak denied that claim Tuesday and said he did not know the Marcello brothers.

"I wasn't involved in any negotiations with Don Stephens or anybody involving the casino in Rosemont," he said. "I don't know anything. It's absolutely insane."

Johnson could not be reached for comment. Attempts to reach several public listings for a Wayne Johnson were not successful. Attorneys for the Marcellos did not return telephone messages left at their offices.

Ex-Conn. Sen. Pleads Guilty In Bribe Case (KCS)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Kansas City Star, September 21, 2005

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. - In the latest in a string of corruption cases in Connecticut, a former state senator pleaded guilty Tuesday to felony charges of receiving a bribe, mail fraud and tax evasion.

Sen. Ernest Newton II acknowledged in federal court that he accepted a $5,000 bribe in exchange for helping the director of a job training agency secure a $100,000 grant.

As part of a plea agreement, Newton also admitted filing false tax returns and diverting $40,000 in campaign contributions for personal use over five years.

Asked as he left court what he had done with the money, Newton said, "I don't know nothing about that." Reminded that he had just pleaded guilty, he said, "I didn't buy a new house, a new car, nothing like that."

Newton, 49, will remain free until his sentencing Dec. 19. Newton faces a maximum of 35 years in prison, but prosecutors have said they will ask for less time because he accepted responsibility.

Last month, Warren K. Godbolt, executive director of the nonprofit Progressive Training Associates in Bridgeport, pleaded guilty to paying the bribe.

Newton announced his resignation last week and submitted it Monday. Gov. M. Jodi Rell has scheduled a special election for Nov. 14 to fill Newton's Senate seat.

Other recent federal corruption probes led to prison sentences for Connecticut officials including former Gov. John G. Rowland and former Bridgeport Mayor Joseph Ganim.

Newton was elected to the Senate in 2003 after serving in the House for 14 years.

Though Newton's constituents stood by him through ups and downs - including his seeking treatment in the mid-'90s for cocaine addiction - U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said it was constituents who provided some of the information used in the probe.

Correction Officer Arrested For Extortion (NYNSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, September 21, 2005

A veteran New York City correction officer Tuesday was accused of being the "muscle" who collected debts for a Long Island businessman at the point of his .38-caliber service revolver, federal officials said.

Byron Christopher Chavis, 38, of Brooklyn, who worked in the city court system at 100 Centre St. in Manhattan, was arrested by FBI agents and charged with conspiracy to commit extortion, extortion, attempted extortion and use of a firearm in a crime of violence.

Chavis worked for businessman Michael Pescatore, 41, of Old Brookville, according to sources familiar with the case.

Pescatore was also charged with conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion in the case and has been held without bail since February in two cases, one of which accuses him of masterminding a car theft ring.

Chavis, who worked mainly at Rikers Island for the past 15 years, was immediately suspended without pay, according to city officials.

Chavis pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Central Islip. His attorney, Joey Jackson of Manhattan, declined to comment. Arraignment for Pescatore on the new charges is scheduled later in the week.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lara Treinis Gatz said Chavis had extorted money from five business associates of Pescatore.

She asked that Chavis be held without bail as a danger to the community, noting the use of his service revolver and threats to kill or break legs while collecting debts.

Judge Thomas Platt ordered Chavis held pending future hearings. If convicted, he faces a mandatory sentence of 5 years on the gun charge, and up to 20 years on the conspiracy and extortion charges.

A.C Tax Official And Wife Convicted In Robbery Plot (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 21, 2005

A federal jury found a former Atlantic City tax collector and his wife guilty today of attempting to rob a tax office courier of $100,000 in cash and checks.

Clinton Van Berry, 61, and his wife, Nadine Homick-Van Berry, 55, could both face a maximum of 20 years in prison when they are sentenced.

They also face a separate trial in a scheme to bribe the West Cape May mayor for insider information on a federally-funded sewer and water-main project. A date for that trial has not been set.

In that case, prosecutors said, the Van Berrys hoped to use the information to secure work for Charles Varvaro, an Atlantic County contractor, then collect a cut from him. Varvaro, however, has been an FBI informant since 1978.

Nadine Homick-Van Berry also went to Varvaro, a friend since the 1980s, to enlist his help in robbing the tax courier. Varvaro tape recorded many of their conversations about the robbery and testified at the beginning of the two-week trial in U.S. District Court in Camden.

Varvaro was supposed to find someone to physically rob the courier on his way from the Atlantic City tax office to a nearby Commerce Bank. The robbery was set for Dec. 16, 2003, the day after a tax sale that left the office flush with cash.

The courier had $100,000 in cash and checks in a lockbag. When he left the tax office, Clinton Van Berry signaled his wife by calling her and asking about an aching tooth, according to testimony.

Homick-Van Berry then used a disposable cell phone to call the person she thought would rob the courier. The person on the other line was a police officer, and the robbery never took place.

CBS 2 Chicago, September 21, 2005

(AP) CHICAGO George Ryan's lawyers and federal prosecutors interviewed a fresh batch of potential jurors Tuesday including one man with "strong negative views about politicians" and another who announced he was an admirer of 19th Century German statesman Otto von Bismarck.

A woman who was a potential juror for the former governor's racketeering trial said her truck driver-boyfriend had been interviewed by FBI agents investigating bribes paid in exchange for work in Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program -- but was cleared of any wrongdoing.

Still another potential juror said her ex-husband served two months in jail.

"I think he got what he deserved," she told Assistant U.S. Attorney Zachary Fardon, who said he wanted to make sure that episode would not leave her biased against law enforcement.

Ryan, 71, is charged with racketeering, mail fraud, lying to FBI agents and tax fraud when he was secretary of state from 1991 through 1998 and later governor. A 22-count indictment accuses him of giving lobbyist Larry Warner, now his co-defendant, free rein to dole out contracts and leases to his clients while getting loans for his relatives and gifts from Warner.

Ryan and Warner both deny that anything they did was illegal.

Over two days of jury selection, attorneys have succeeded in finding at least 16 and possibly 18 potential jurors. They hope to come up with a pool of at least 46 and then whittle that number down by using their so-called peremptory challenges -- challenges that the lawyer's don't have to explain and which automatically strike potential jurors from the list.

The process is designed to yield 12 jurors and six alternates.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer asked one man why on a questionnaire, filled out by about 300 potential jurors last week, he had cited Bismarck as someone he admired greatly.

He said he was something of a scholar and admired Bismarck for uniting Germany. Pallmeyer later dismissed him from the pool of potential jurors.

Despite protests from Ryan attorney Dan Webb, she refused to dismiss a man who admitted he had "strong negative views about politicians." On a questionnaire filled out by potential jurors last week, he said that "too often campaign promises are forgotten."

Asked on the questionnaire about Ryan, he said: "If he allowed abuses to occur he is to blame and should be punished." Webb said he was obviously biased against the former governor.

Prosecutors said they were sure the man would be fair if chosen for the jury.

But they grumbled when Pallmeyer for the second day refused to bump a man who said both he and his mother know Webb and the mother is in awe of his brilliance as an attorney.

But Webb has succeeded in keeping the potential juror's hopes alive by saying that he doesn't remember meeting the man, did meet the mother years ago but had no relationship with her.

There will be 18 potential jurors in the pool if Pallmeyer keeps that man along with another man who said he works 16-hour days and will have to go to his night job after court.

If those two are dismissed the number of potential jurors surviving will be 16.

Pallmeyer had hoped to pick a jury by the close of business Wednesday and start the trial on Thursday. But hope of that has faded as jury selection has gone slowly.

The trial promises to take a lot longer.

DOJ_NMG_0006984

When one female candidate for the jury said she enjoyed watching Judge Judy on TV, Warner defense attorney Marc Martin asked: "You do know that this trial is going to last four months? It isn't going to be half an hour."

Inmate Pleads Guilty To Threatening Supreme Court Justices (LAW)

By R. Robin Mcdonald, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 21, 2005

A Florida inmate has pleaded guilty to charges of mailing threatening letters to public officials, including the clerk of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, the U.S. Supreme Court, and President Bush and his family.

Federal prosecutors in Atlanta said that letters from Anthony Scott Simboli, who is serving time in Clearwater, Fla., for theft and forgery, contained a white powder that authorities said was purported to be anthrax but later was identified as detergent. Simboli put his name, inmate number and return address on the letters, which threatened Judges Edward E. Carnes and Frank M. Hull, President Bush and his family, and unspecified Supreme Court justices.

The first letter was discovered at the 11th Circuit in December when a scanning machine in the court's in-house mail-sorting facility opened one and detergent spilled out. A hazardous materials team came to collect the letter and deal with any potential threat.

Two subsequent detergent-laced threats were recovered at mail-handling facilities near Washington.

Simboli's threatening letters followed a failed pro se appeal to overturn his eight-year Florida sentence for grand theft and burglary, according to court records. He filed the appeal while he was incarcerated in a Florida prison housing inmates who require psychiatric treatment.

In 2001 Carnes denied both Simboli's certificate of appealability and his motion seeking permission to waive all court costs associated with the appeal, according to court records.

Prosecutors said that Simboli also was attempting to help his brother, an inmate at another Florida prison, with an appeal of a life sentence for carjacking and robbery. Both Carnes and Hull were on the 11th Circuit panel that in 2002 dismissed Robert Francis Simboli's appeal, according to court records.

THREATS TO THE 11TH CIRCUIT

Threats by mail have been a particular concern at the 11th Circuit. On Dec. 16, 1989, Judge Robert S. Vance was killed and his wife seriously injured when a package bomb exploded after being delivered to their suburban home in Birmingham, Ala. Two days later a second bomb killed Savannah, Ga., attorney Robert E. Robinson.

That same day, federal law enforcement agents intercepted a third bomb at the 11th Circuit's Atlanta complex. On Dec. 19, 1989, a fourth bomb was intercepted at the Jacksonville, Fla., office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Walter Leroy Moody, who previously had filed unsuccessful pro se appeals at the 11th Circuit, eventually was convicted and sentenced to seven life sentences for the murders.

LETTERS FROM PRISON

Simboli's plea agreement for sending the threatening letters includes a 10-year sentence in federal prison, the maximum term for the offense.

The agreement does not prohibit Simboli from mailing letters to public officials or to state and federal courts.

A spokesman for the Pinellas County Sheriff's Office, Mac McMullin, said that because Simboli's letters to the 11th Circuit, the Supreme Court and the president were considered privileged correspondence, the letters were not opened before the jail forwarded them to the U.S. Postal Service to mail.

"We don't search outgoing mail that has official correspondence," McMullin explained, referring to the department's written mail policy. As a result, he said, "it's clear how something like that could occur."

The policy states that "under no circumstance" are sheriff's staff members to read privileged communications from inmates, including correspondence to lawyers, the courts and public officials. If privileged mail is opened, it must be in the inmate's presence and only to confirm the privileged status.

The policy also states that outgoing privileged correspondence shall be mailed without charge to the inmate.

Neither 11th Circuit Chief Judge J.L. Edmondson nor court executive Norman E. Zoller could be reached to discuss the plea agreement and court security.

In February, while under investigation for mailing the letters to the 11th Circuit and the Supreme Court, Simboli mailed the third letter from the Pinellas County jail to "George W., 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., Washington D.C." It contained detergent as well as graphic threats against the president, the first lady and one of their twin daughters, court records said.

A Mother's Too-Familiar Role (WP)

By Paul Duggan And Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

RICHMOND -- Janet Pelasara answered the phone in her hotel room at 8 a.m. Monday and said she had a busy day ahead: bookings on Fox News Channel, CNN and Court TV. She said she could spare only a few minutes in the lobby for a newspaper reporter.

"Greta's here; I'm going to meet with her," Pelasara said a short time later, seated on a couch near the front desk of a downtown Marriott. She was referring to Greta Van Susteren, host of a crime and legal affairs program on Fox.

"I have Nancy Grace tonight," said Pelesara, 44, of Vienna, mother of college student Taylor Marie Behl, who disappeared in Richmond two weeks ago. Grace is the host of shows similar to Van Susteren's on Court TV and CNN Headline News.

Since Sept. 7, two nights after Behl vanished, Pelasara has been staying in the Marriott with friends while police search for her 17-year-old daughter, a freshman at Virginia Commonwealth University. Pelasara has waited patiently -- but not silently.

"There was 'The Early Show,' " she said, listing some of her recent network and syndicated TV appearances. "There was 'Good Morning America,' 'Inside Edition' . . ."

The shows that have put Pelasara on screens from coast to coast have a seemingly bottomless appetite for dramas like hers. Stories of missing young women who are thought to have been abducted are a particular staple of the 24-hour cable news channels.

Critics complain that such coverage is devoted disproportionately to suburban white women, such as Behl, while victims of color who are poor are often overlooked. But Pelasara can't afford to consider that debate at the moment. She said her goal is to get on as many programs as possible, to keep her daughter's face in front of the nation.

"After so many days, the interviews really become tiring," said a friend, Ann Martin, who is staying at the Marriott and coordinating Pelasara's TV appearances. While Pelasara sat in the lobby, Martin was in her room, awaiting a phone call about a car that would take Pelasara to meet Van Susteren at Behl's dormitory.

"It's really hectic, but we welcome it," said Martin, who works for the American Association of Pastoral Counselors. "We have to keep this out there."

Behl, who graduated from James Madison High School in Vienna, disappeared after leaving her dorm room Labor Day evening, two weeks into her freshman year. Her 1997 Ford Escort was found Saturday parked on a residential street about two miles from the campus. Its Virginia license plates were gone, replaced by stolen Ohio tags.

Besides trying to determine how the car wound up in that neighborhood with stolen plates, police have been looking into Behl's relationship with a 38-year-old photographer who has an apartment near the campus. The man took pictures of Behl last spring, fully clothed and posing on Belle Isle in Richmond, and posted them on his Web site.

Chris Collins, an attorney for the photographer, said yesterday that his client had a "romantic relationship" with Behl. He said Behl visited him at his apartment twice Sept. 5, once during the day and again about 9:30 p.m., not long before she vanished.

Collins said the photographer -- who maintains several Web sites featuring his work, including collages of short-skirted teenage girls in suggestive poses -- has asserted that he has no knowledge of Behl's whereabouts. "He's very worried about her," the lawyer said. "He liked her very much. . . . He's distraught over all of this."

Collins said his client has cooperated with investigators in several interviews. "He was one of the last persons to have seen her," Collins said.

The photographer is a former VCU student, according to his profile on MySpace.com, a popular dating and social networking Web site. He photographed Behl in April while she was visiting his roommate, a high school friend of hers from Vienna. He recently removed the photos from his site.

Now Behl is the latest young American woman in highly publicized peril -- after Chandra Levy, the Washington intern whose disappearance scandalized a politician; Laci Peterson, the pregnant California woman whose husband landed on death row; Jennifer Wilbanks, the runaway bride from Georgia; and Natalee Holloway of Alabama, who vanished in Aruba during her high school senior class trip.

And Pelasara is the latest anxious parent, even if she doesn't always come across that way. In interviews, her demeanor is often so calm that she seems almost detached from what's happening.

It's a coping strategy, said Pelasura, who works as an administrator for a Northern Virginia computer firm.

"Did you watch any of the Natalee Holloway disappearance?" Van Susteren asked her on Fox. "The tracking of her this summer?"

"I did some," replied Pelasara, who is divorced from her only child's father. "But I was busy with Taylor with her graduation . . . and getting her ready for college."

Van Susteren said, "Do you have any idea -- of the little you did see of the disappearance of Natalee -- any sort of idea, you know, of the pain a mother can go through?"

Pelasara said she has not allowed herself to feel pain.

"Until I get her back safe and sound, or if we find out the worst, I think then I'll be able to feel and be able to appreciate that," she said, referring to the other mothers. "But no, everything is buried so deep. . . . That's the only way I can get through this."

Earlier Monday, in the Marriott lobby, she said: "Yes, I can sleep. I have to sleep. And I can think. I can think enough to get through all these interviews, because I have to do that. And then I don't have to think anymore."

Mornings are the worst times for her, she said, as she faces yet another round of interviews, of questions and answers she doesn't like to think about.

"Yes, mornings," she said. "Because I know what I have to face for the rest of the day."

Past Of Democrat In Forrester Ad Is Attacked (NYT)

By Josh Benson

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

TRENTON, Sept. 20 - State Democratic officials said on Tuesday that one of the Democrats appearing in an anticorruption commercial for the Republican candidate for governor, Douglas R. Forrester, was fired as a court clerk in Essex County after being accused of stealing money from court deposits and was, for a time, a Republican.

The commercial, titled "Democrats for Doug," features interviews with several people identified as Democrats who say they are angry at the corruption in their party and in state government.

One of them, identified as Dave McGraw, says, "The corruption is out of control," and urges, "It's time to take back New Jersey."

The man, David P. McGraw, 71, formerly a clerk in Essex County District Court, was indicted in the mid-1980's on charges of embezzling tens of thousands of dollars in court money over nearly three years, but was acquitted by a jury. He was a Democrat at the time. He lost his job in 1986, according to a January 2000 article in The Star-Ledger, after a disciplinary hearing determined that he had taken cash from court deposit envelopes for his personal use, had court employees cash his personal checks knowing they would bounce and had lied to the county prosecutor. The assignment judge fired him based on those findings, the newspaper said.

In an interview on Tuesday, Mr. McGraw did not dispute the sequence of events that led to his firing, but denied the charges.

In 2000, he brought a whistle-blower suit against Essex County after being removed from another public job, for the county parks department. He alleged that the county was losing money by giving away free rounds at a public golf course to "individuals with personal relationships" to county officials. He said he eventually settled the suit for $175,000.

Voting records show that Mr. McGraw voted in several Republican primary elections in the late 1990's through 2000.

Mr. McGraw said the embezzlement charges and his firing from the court job were results of a feud with Essex County officials at the time.

He expressed puzzlement that he had become a campaign issue. "They asked me if I could get some people to be in the commercial," said Mr. McGraw, who said he had done work for the Forrester campaign as a volunteer. "Lo and behold, I went over there and I was in the commercial. Quite frankly, if I knew there was going to be repercussions I wouldn't have done it. I don't want to hurt Doug Forrester's chances."

Mr. McGraw said he was registered as a Republican in recent years, but registered as a Democrat again in 2002 to vote in a primary election for Essex County executive.

Richard McGrath, a Democratic Party spokesman, said "the Forrester spot essentially 'advertises' the candidate's hypocrisy." Ivette Mendez, a spokeswoman for Senator Jon S. Corzine, Mr. Forrester's Democratic opponent, said only, "The party's statement speaks for itself."

Sherry Sylvester, a Forrester spokeswoman, said: "For Jon Corzine to attack a 71-year-old whistle-blower is a new low even for him. Dave McGraw illustrated what's wrong with New Jersey: politicians using intimidation and wrongful allegations to abuse their power."

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Says Pope Immune From Abuse Suits (AP)

By NICOLE WINFIELD, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2005

ROME -- The U.S. Justice Department has told a Texas court that a lawsuit accusing Pope Benedict XVI of conspiring to cover up the sexual molestation of three boys by a seminarian should be dismissed because the pontiff enjoys immunity as head of state of the Holy See.

Assistant U.S. Attorney General Peter Keisler said in Monday's filing that allowing the lawsuit to proceed would be "incompatible with the United States' foreign policy interests."

There was no immediate ruling from Judge Lee Rosenthal of the U.S. District Court for the southern district of Texas in Houston. However, U.S. courts have been bound by such "suggestion of immunity" motions submitted by the government, Keisler's filing says.

A 1994 lawsuit against Pope John Paul II, also filed in Texas, was dismissed after the U.S. government filed a similar motion.

Keisler's motion was not unexpected, as the Vatican Embassy in Washington had asked the U.S. government to issue the immunity suggestion and do everything it could to get the case dismissed.

The former Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger was named as a defendant in a civil lawsuit by three plaintiffs who allege that Juan Carlos Patino-Arango, a Colombian-born seminarian on assignment at St. Francis de Sales church in Houston, molested them during counseling sessions in the church in the mid-1990s.

Patino-Arango has been indicted in a criminal case by a grand jury in Harris County, Texas, and is a fugitive from justice.

The lawsuit alleges Ratzinger, who headed the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith before becoming pope, was involved in a conspiracy to hide Patino-Arango's crimes and help him escape prosecution.

The lawsuit cites a May 18, 2001, letter from Ratzinger written in Latin to bishops around the world, explaining that "grave" crimes such as the sexual abuse of minors would be handled by his congregation and that the proceedings of special church tribunals handling the cases were subject to "pontifical secret."

Daniel Shea, attorney for one of the plaintiffs, has said such secret proceedings amounted to a conspiracy to cover up the crimes.

The Vatican and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops have insisted the secret church procedures in the sex abuse case were not designed to cover up abuse nor to prevent victims from reporting crimes to law enforcement authorities. The document deals with church law -- not keeping secrets from secular authorities, they say.

The pope's lawyer, Jeffrey Lena, said Tuesday it was "appropriate" the Justice Department had determined the pope was "the sitting head of state of the Holy See."

In a telephone interview, Lena said the motion would now be considered by the Texas court, "which should be bound by the executive's determination" and rule accordingly.

Many lawsuits stemming from the U.S. church sex abuse crisis have named the pope, the Vatican and other high-ranking church officials, but they failed because the officials could never be served with the papers. This case got further than most because Ratzinger was actually served with the documents.

Shea said Tuesday he would challenge the constitutionality of the U.S. diplomatic recognition of the Holy See on the grounds that it goes against the First Amendment's "establishment clause" that bars any laws respecting the establishment of religion.

Shea noted that in trying to have the case dismissed, Ratzinger's lawyers have already admitted in court papers that the Holy See is a church. A May 26 motion to dismiss the suit, citing the First Amendment, says the case should be thrown out because it would "invite court intrusion into the internal affairs of the Roman Catholic Church."

However, legal experts said such a challenge would be difficult to win, partly because previous challenges have failed and because the U.S. has maintained diplomatic relations with the Vatican since 1984.

"The courts have become a lot less interested in the establishment clause in the last few years," said Kent Greenawalt, a professor of First Amendment and legal philosophy at Columbia Law School.

Officials at the U.S. Embassy to the Holy See said they were familiar with the case but had no other immediate comment. The Vatican said it had no comment.

Along with the pope, the lawsuit names as defendants Patino-Arango, the Diocese of Galveston-Houston, Archbishop Joseph Fiorenza and the Rev. William Pickhard, Patino-Arango's vocational director.

GlaxoSmithKline Agrees To Pay $150 Million To Settle Drug Price Fraud Case (AP)

By Mark Sherman, ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – GlaxoSmithKline PLC will pay $150 million to settle claims it overcharged the government for two anti-nausea drugs, and prosecutors say they're looking into 150 cases of drug price fraud.

Scrutiny of the pharmaceutical industry has increased along with the portion of health care costs attributable to prescription drugs. That attention is likely to grow as the government prepares to begin a drug insurance program for older Americans under Medicare that is expected to increase sharply government spending on medicines.

The Glaxo settlement is the latest in a series of whistleblower claims that have resulted in $2.4 billion in payments from drug companies in recent years.

Glaxo engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health care providers based on the manufacturers' prices, the government said. The drugs, typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals, are used mainly to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation.

The company charged health care providers less for the drugs, knowing the providers would get to pocket the difference and would be more likely to prescribe them again, the Justice Department said.

Glaxo admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement. "We believe that our price reporting was lawful and was done in good faith, but we've agreed to this settlement to avoid the delay, expense and uncertainty of litigation," said Mary Anne Rhyne, a company spokeswoman.

The settlement covers claims submitted from 1994 to 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0006989

The case resulted from a whistleblower lawsuit filed by Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys, Inc., a small home-infusion company that has won several suits that made similar allegations against other drug makers. The company and its principals will receive $26 million from the settlement, as allowed under the federal False Claims Act, the Justice Department said.

James Moorman, president of the advocacy group Taxpayers Against Fraud, said the scheme alleged by Ven-A-Care and the Justice Department represents "a perverse competition, where you don't compete with a low price but with a high price."

The Medicare law that created prescription drug coverage beginning in January also was designed to eliminate the huge spread between what manufacturers reported as their average wholesale price and what health care providers actually paid.

Moorman said no similar fix has yet been put in place for Medicaid, the federal-state health program for the poor.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, Congress' leading advocate for whistleblower protection, said the "importance of whistleblowers will only increase as the new Medicare prescription drug benefit takes effect. Bad actors in the industry should know that these good guys are on the case."

Glaxo has faced fraudulent billing charges before. In 1997, its forerunner, SmithKline Beecham Clinical Laboratories Inc., was ordered to pay $325 million for filing false claims relating to laboratory tests that were paid for in whole or in part by the federal government. The company added tests not requested by doctors and not medically necessary, billed for tests not actually performed and gave kickbacks to doctors.

Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Civil Division, said federal and state officials are looking into 150 price and marketing fraud cases involving more than 500 drugs.

The Glaxo settlement is the first announced this year. However, another may be coming soon: Serono Laboratories of Switzerland has set aside $725 million for a settlement of allegations it offered kickbacks to doctors for writing prescriptions for an AIDS treatment drug with sagging sales.

Four former executives have been indicted by a federal grand jury for their alleged roles in the kickback scheme.

California regulators have sued 41 pharmaceutical companies, accusing them of inflating drug prices for the state's version of the Medicaid program and costing state taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars. Glaxo is a defendant in that suit as well.

In one example, the state said Abbott Laboratories Inc. reported the average wholesale price of a vial of the antibiotic vancomycin as $58.37 to Medi-Cal but charged pharmacies just $6.29. The company has denied any improprieties.

GSK Pays $150m To Settle US Court Case (LONDTIMES)

By Richard Irving

London (UK) Daily Times, September 21, 2005

GLAXOSMITHKLINE has agreed to pay more than $150 million (£83 million) to settle US government charges that the company fraudulently inflated the price of two anti-nausea drugs available under the federal healthcare programme.

Peter Keisler, assistant attorney-general at the Justice Department, said yesterday that government prosecutors would continue to crack down on abuses. “We will not tolerate fraudulent pricing practices designed to reap profits for drug companies and doctors at the expense of healthcare programmes for the poor and elderly,” he said.

Prosecutors alleged that GlaxoSmithKline (GSK) had engaged in a scheme deliberately to set inflated prices for Zofran and Kytril, knowing that federal healthcare programmes used the prices to establish reimbursement rates.

The Justice Department claimed that the company actually had charged doctors less than the official rates, knowing that they would be able to pocket the difference.

The two drugs are used to alleviate sickness among patients undergoing chemo and radiation therapy.

GSK said that it had decided to settle the case without admitting any wrongdoing to put an end to litigation that has been continuing for more than a decade. The company added that the settlement, which includes a $149 million payment as well as additional interest of $1.8 million, is covered by additional legal reserves.

A spokesman said: “The company fully co-operated with the government over the course of this investigation (and) understands that the federal government’s inquiries concerning pricing issues is now completed and closed.”

Reuters, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - GlaxoSmithKline has paid more than $150 million to settle government charges that the company fraudulently inflated the price of drugs purchased by federal health-care programs, the U.S. Justice Department said on Tuesday.

The settlement stems from allegations that the British company violated the U.S. False Claims Act in the sale and marketing of Zofran and Kytril, two nausea drugs prescribed to patients undergoing cancer treatment, the department said.

GlaxoSmithKline issued a statement saying it did nothing wrong, but agreed to settle the case to avoid litigation.

According to the department, Glaxo engaged in a scheme to deliberately set and maintain inflated prices for the two drugs, knowing that federal health care programs used those prices to establish their reimbursement rates.

The Justice Department "will not tolerate fraudulent pricing practices designed to reap profits for drug companies and doctors at the expense of health care programs for the poor and the elderly," an official said in a statement.

Of the amount paid by GlaxoSmithKline, $26 million will go to whistle-blowers who prompted the investigation and another $10 million will go to state governments.

GlaxoSmithKline Pays $150 Million To Settle Charges (WSJ/DJN)

By Brian Blackstone, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- GlaxoSmithKline PLC paid $150 million (€123 million) to settle fraud allegations over the pricing and marketing of two antinausea drugs, the Justice Department said.

The government alleges that the United Kingdom-based pharmaceutical maker engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the federal Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health-care providers based on the manufacturers' prices. The drugs are used mainly to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation.

But the company charged health-care providers less for the drugs, knowing that the providers would get to pocket the difference, the Justice Department said.

GlaxoSmithKline admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement. Company spokeswoman Mary Anne Rhyne said the firm "believes its price reporting was lawful and in good faith."

The government opened an investigation into the drugs' pricing after Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc., a small home-infusion company, filed a whistle-blower lawsuit. Ven-A-Care will receive $26 million of the government's settlement.

The Justice Department "will continue to pursue these types of fraud schemes vigorously to make clear that we will not tolerate fraudulent pricing practices designed to reap profits for drug companies and doctors at the expense of healthcare programs for the poor and the elderly," Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler said in a statement.

GOP Rep. Tries To Kill Base Closings (NSDY/AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A House Republican set the wheels in motion Tuesday to try to kill the Pentagon's proposal to close or downsize hundreds of U.S. military bases, a move that is largely symbolic and has little chance of succeeding.

Rep. Ray LaHood of Illinois introduced a joint resolution in the House to reject the plan to restructure the U.S. network of military bases. It is the first effort to close bases since 1995.

LaHood said the base-closing commission and the Pentagon ignored a significant fact: The country is at war.

"Now is not the time to be closing bases around the country," he said. "Now we as a Congress have the opportunity, I think, to have our say."

President Bush endorsed the commission report last week. It calls for closing 22 major military bases and reconfiguring another 33. Hundreds more from coast to coast also will be affected.

The president sent the report to Congress, where it will become law after 45 legislative days unless the House and Senate pass a joint resolution rejecting it.

DOJ_NMG_0006991

LaHood, whose district includes a base in Springfield, Ill., that is to lose 15 National Guard fighter jets, became the first lawmaker to introduce such a resolution.

The House overwhelmingly supports the fifth round of base restructuring, and Republican leaders -- who also back the closures -- control whether lawmakers vote on LaHood's measure.

"I'm going to encourage the speaker and the majority leader to let us have our prerogative, have a debate and see what happens," he said.

No lawmaker in the Senate has introduced a joint resolution. A GOP-led effort in the Senate to derail the plan fizzled last month after the commission reviewing the plan spared several bases in the home states of lawmakers who opposed it.

Tentative Deal Set Over ADA Violations (LVS)

By Brian Wargo, LAS VEGAS SUN

Las Vegas Sun, September 21, 2005

North Las Vegas has reached a tentative agreement with the Justice Department that will cost the city about $2 million over the next two to three years to address violations of the Americans with Disability Act.

The 1990 federal law requires local governments improve access for the disabled to government facilities and programs.

The agreement, which the city's staff has recommended the City Council ratify, has already cost the city $80,000. North Las Vegas has budgeted $655,000 in the current budget and projects a similar amount will be needed in the next two years to comply with the disabilities act.

North Las Vegas City Manager Gregory Rose said the city doesn't know what the total cost will be because it plans to go beyond the minimum requirements in providing for the needs of the disabled. Rose, who became city manager in October 2003, said the city didn't do anything blatant but is to blame for not placing a high enough emphasis on complying with the law.

"If we live long enough, all of us will be disabled at some point," Rose said. "This is the right thing to do."

North Las Vegas came under fire from the Justice Department after federal officials conducted a January 2004 review of 75 percent of the city's parks and facilities and found 182 violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act.

The violations included the absence of an accessible drinking fountain at City Hall, a need for restroom improvements and for fixing sidewalks where street lights or signage hindered the mobility by wheelchair users. Sidewalks will have to be expanded or signs moved.

Rose said it will be costly, but the city can afford the upgrades by spreading out the improvements rather than doing them all at once. He said the city is making a good-faith effort to correct the violations in the next two to three years, and if that can't be done, an extension will be requested from the federal government.

The Justice Department can file lawsuits in federal court to enforce the ADA requirements and can seek fines of up to $55,000 for the first violation and $110,000 for subsequent violations.

Las Vegas attorney Marina Kolias has sued North Las Vegas, alleging the city violated her two clients' civil rights when its Police Department failed to provide a sign language interpreter during an arrest. She said the city still needs to do more and do it more quickly, but she is glad that North Las Vegas finally is taking some remedial steps.

"What North Las Vegas is doing is too little, but it is never too late for any steps or efforts to advance assistance to persons with disabilities. It is appreciated and a step in the right direction," Kolias said.

The agreement calls on the city to implement a policy for police officers communicating with those who are deaf and hiring a sign-language interpreter who is available 24 hours a day. It also requires the city to equip its police and detention facilities with a telecommunciations device for the deaf.

Kolias said the city should move faster than six months and she fears the city will use an outdated technology that won't help the deaf communicate with family members.

Facilities constructed after Jan. 26, 1992, must comply with the ADA standards. That includes improving access for wheelchair users to a counter, drinking fountains, bathrooms, corridors and parking lots. During the construction of its new justice facility that opened in May, North Las Vegas had to make changes in its construction plans to comply with the ADA.

When streets are resurfaced, cities are required to reconfigure sidewalks and curbs to accommodate wheelchairs. During the last decade, city officials said they have spent more than $1.4 million for ramp improvements.

Under the ADA, all government activities, services and programs are covered. That includes employment, public meetings, court activities and programs of police, fire, voting, parks and recreation departments.

Sticking Point Of Voting-reform Bid: Photo IDs (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

WASHINGTON - Since the disputed election of 2000, some Americans have lost faith that their votes count.

The federal reforms of 2002 were a start, say voting experts, but more is needed. Problems in the 2004 elections - from long lines at polling stations to inconsistent handling of provisional ballots - have exacerbated the sense that US elections are flawed.

Now, a bipartisan commission headed by former President Carter, a Democrat, and former Secretary of State James Baker, a Republican, has recommended additional changes - including a call for all voters to show photo IDs, paper trails for electronic voting machines, and a shift toward nonpartisan administration of elections.

But a backlash over the photo ID recommendation, in particular, threatens to overtake any attention to the 86 other recommendations. Additional election reform was already a low priority on Congress's agenda, the commission itself acknowledges, and now the controversy may have complicated matters.

"The real divide [over election reform] boils down to the voter-fraud side for conservatives and voter-access issues for liberals," says Rob Richie, executive director of the group Fair Vote, which seeks to increase participation in elections.

About 12 percent of the voting-age population does not have a driver's license, a group that skews toward minorities and low-income workers.

Former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle, a member of the commission, dissented on that part of the report, comparing the requirement of an ID to a " modern-day poll tax."

Ironically, the voter-ID issue is already in the headlines in Mr. Carter's home state of Georgia. On Monday, voting and civil-rights groups filed a federal lawsuit challenging the state's requirement that voters show a government-issued photo ID at the polls - a new law the litigants call the most restrictive of its kind in the US.

Anticipating criticism over voter IDs, the Carter-Baker commission recommended that states provide free ID cards to those who don't already have one, and take measures to ensure privacy.

Still, critics say, there remains the challenge for elderly, infirm, low-income, and rural citizens to travel to a location and obtain the ID. Further, they add, there is no such requirement for photo IDs with absentee ballots, only a requirement that signatures match.

Richard L. Hasen, an election law expert at Loyola School of Law in Los Angeles, bemoans the siphoning of attention away from what he sees as a significant recommendation: the removal of control of elections from partisan politicians and into the hands of impartial election administrators. Once implemented, that step would go far toward restoring Americans' confidence in elections, he says.

"We cannot build confidence in elections if secretaries of State responsible for certifying votes are simultaneously chairing political campaigns," the report said.

That statement was a veiled reference to recent examples in states that proved critical to the outcome of presidential races: Florida Rep. Katherine Harris (R), secretary of State for Florida during the 2000 election, was also co-chair of President Bush's Florida campaign. In Ohio in 2004, Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell performed the same role for Bush.

"It took the debacle in Florida 2000 and further problems in 2004 to illustrate what the problems are; public confidence has shot way down," says Professor Hasen. He notes that in Washington State, where the Democratic gubernatorial candidate squeaked by the Republican in the 2004 race, the problem is reversed: Republicans there are more cynical than Democrats over the fairness of the outcome.

"The hope was that the Carter-Baker commission would move beyond politics, and move into consensus recommendations, which are desperately needed," Hasen says. "I think they've squandered their political capital. In 2004, my phone was ringing off the hook with reporters asking why things haven't been fixed. It will happen in 2008."

The commission recommended that a state's chief election officer be an appointed position, with two-thirds approval by the state legislature. At the federal level, the commission recommended that a nonpartisan chairperson be added to the four-person US Election Assistance Commission. This person would be nominated by the president to a 10-year term and confirmed by the Senate.

Other commission proposals include:

• A new system of presidential primaries, in which four regional primaries are held, one per month beginning in March of an election. Every election, a different region would hold its primaries first, after the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary.

• Maintenance of voter lists by states, and not localities, allowing for greater "interoperability" among states. Such a system is aimed at eliminating the potential for voters to cast ballots in more than one state and also could allow voters to register once in their lives and then make it easier to update registration information when they move.

• Passage by Congress of a law that would require all voting machines to have a "voter-verifiable paper audit trail."

Voting For Reform (LAT)

If it is true, as former President Jimmy Carter said, that Americans have lost faith in their voting system, then he and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III have lost a significant opportunity to help them restore it. A bipartisan commission led by Carter and Baker released a report Monday that proposes many reasonable ways to make voting a smoother and more trustworthy process — but stops far short of addressing what really keeps people from the polls.

For that, the report would have to have recommended abolishing the Electoral College, the cornerstone of a winner-take-all system that leads presidential candidates to lavish their attention on a few key states. It might also have at least alluded to reforms of campaign finance laws and conflict-of-interest rules for elected officials, especially because many voters see politics as a parade of special-interest pandering in which their interests seldom count for much.

Such reforms would take tremendous political will. But that is lacking these days, so the commission limited itself to pragmatic, incremental reforms designed to boost public faith in the ballot system. With some adjustments, many of these should be adopted.

One recommendation that should become reality is a rescheduling of the presidential primaries. The report suggests holding them on a mostly regional basis and rotating the first regional primary regularly. This system would put an end to the electoral arms race in which states vie for the earliest possible primary. It's also smart to encourage mobile registration vans and electronic voting machines that produce a paper trail that can be audited. Better tracking of voters who move is another wise idea.

Civil rights advocates, though, complain about the commission's recommendation that authorities require photo ID to vote in order to cut down on voter fraud. Usually photo ID means a driver's license, but the report recommends that states provide free cards to non-drivers. The idea's critics point out, rightly, that African Americans and the elderly are less likely to drive or have the documents to prove citizenship, and they say these groups would be disenfranchised.

But most everyone, excepting Hurricane Katrina victims, should be able to get a birth certificate easily. And there will be plenty of get-out-the-vote workers to help them with the process. The photo ID can also be viewed as a protection for voters because it sets a single standard for voting eligibility and reduces local discretion to question or intimidate voters.

The key is to not create excessive demands for proof of citizenship and for the federal government to insist that the cards be free. That last item might sound foolishly obvious, but the state of Georgia recently won U.S. Justice Department approval to charge voters a fee for a five-year card. (The fee, which varies and which the state says will be waived for the poor, is being challenged in court.)

There should be no financial impediment to the most basic democratic right. That such an un-American idea could win the approval of a state legislature and be signed by a governor shows better than anything why so many people consider politics, and voting, such a waste of time.

ANTITRUST:

Federal Courts May Face Flood Of Price-Fixing Actions (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 21, 2005

An unlikely marriage between the Department of Justice's amnesty program in price-fixing cases and the recent reform of federal class action law has had an unexpected but profound effect on civil antitrust actions.

Indirect victims of price-fixing, those who buy items produced from a part that was subject to price-fixing, have been barred since 1977 from recovering damages in federal court after Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720 (1977).

Many state courts rushed to fill that void with their own state antitrust protections, giving indirect purchasers a forum to bring class actions against cartel participants but leaving those plaintiffs to wage state-by-state battles for recovery.

That created a two-tier system of direct purchasers -- such as companies buying computer chips -- suing in federal courts, while indirect purchasers -- companies that bought the finished computers containing the overpriced chips -- sued in state courts.

Then came this year's Class Action Fairness Act, an effort by Congress to move mass tort class actions out of what it saw as plaintiff-friendly state courts and into less-sympathetic federal courts. It opened the federal court door for indirect buyers.

FLOODING INTO FEDERAL COURTS

Indirect-purchaser antitrust cases have flooded back to federal court using pendent state law antitrust claims. It has put federal judges in the position of interpreting, for example, 20 separate state antitrust laws in order to decide 20 separate motions to dismiss in a single case.

Or a single federal judge may have to sort out the intricacies of how damages will be apportioned if a direct purchaser passed on the increased price from a fixed-price product to downstream consumers.

"Congress couldn't have been intending this to happen," said Daniel G. Swanson, a defense attorney with Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's Washington office. Swanson represents Dutch chemical giant Akzo Nobel N.V., one of several companies sued for allegedly fixing the price of hydrogen peroxide, a bleaching agent.

"I think [indirect purchasers] will be an issue in virtually all treble damage suits going forward," warned Donald Klawiter, chair of the American Bar Association Section of Antitrust Law and a partner with Morgan, Lewis & Bockius.

"The question is: Can a court sort out all the damages and get it right so [defendants] are not paying six times damages? It is an important issue for the legislature and judiciary to work out," said Klawiter, who is based in Washington.

A 12-member Antitrust Modernization Commission, created by Congress in 2002, began looking at some of the indirect purchaser issues during its July meeting and has some legislative reform ideas under consideration. The American Bar Association antitrust section plans to conduct a special program for commissioners and the bar focusing on some of these questions in June 2006.

Two of the first major courtroom battlegrounds for indirect purchaser disputes are shaping up at opposite ends of the country. In San Francisco federal court, direct- and indirect-purchaser suits have been filed against major computer memory chip companies, known as the DRAM case. Meanwhile, in Philadelphia, plaintiffs have gone after hydrogen peroxide producers for alleged price-fixing.

Both cases stem from the Justice Department's intense enforcement efforts against price-fixing that encourages companies to confess their role. The first company in the door gets the biggest break from prosecutors, while those who dally face criminal prosecution and severe penalties, followed by private civil suits with treble damages.

In its latest permutation, federal antitrust lawyers have offered early cooperators the chance to avoid treble damages as well, something most plaintiffs lawyers have welcomed.

"The program has been a good thing for the antitrust world," according to Bruce Simon, a plaintiffs lawyer with Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy in San Francisco. "We understand we have to be careful," he said of companies who cooperate with investigations. "Part of the government's job of getting them to roll over [on other price-fixers] is not to throw them to the wolves," Simon said.

In the DRAM case, revenue for the memory chips exceeds $20 billion a year, with the six top chipmakers controlling 96 percent of the market, among them Samsung Corp., The Micron Group, Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and Toshiba Corp., according to the complaint, In re Dynamic Random Access Memory Antitrust Litigation, No. MDL1486.

Infineon Technologies A.G. pleaded guilty in 2004 and agreed to pay a $160 million fine for its role in the international price-fixing scheme that affected companies such as Dell Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co. and Apple Computer Inc.

The companies that bought the chips to install in their computers may recover damages as direct purchasers of the chips, even if they passed on the cost to consumers who bought the computers. But millions of consumers, the indirect purchasers, have a much tougher time in state courts and now in federal court actions.

In the hydrogen peroxide case, In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litigation, No. C05-0666SD, the suit alleges a global conspiracy began in 1994 among the chemical makers to sell at agreed prices, reduce production capacity and share sales information. The chemical is used in the pulp and paper industry and for textiles as a bleaching agent.

The French firm Elf Atochem, and a British company, Degussa U.K. Holdings, pleaded guilty to price-fixing in federal court and agreed to pay a total of $5 million in fines for their roles in a conspiracy, according to a 2004 Justice Department statement.

Both the DRAM and chemical cases have indirect purchasers who have joined the direct-purchaser suits, but the fight over their place in the litigation is still unfolding.

While some defendants may want to send the indirect-purchaser cases back to state court, the new reform act now stands in the way. The CAFA statute has a number of tests that hamper remand to state court. The tests were intended to make it tough on plaintiffs. Few thought that defendants might want to get the cases out of federal court.

And plaintiffs lawyers with indirect-purchaser claims have often been only too happy to leave state courts. State court judges frequently look for ways to dump the indirect-buyer claims, according to Daniel Karon, a plaintiffs lawyer and law professor at Cleveland-Marshall College of Law who has written about the issue.

"State court judges ought to know their state law ... but they often say, 'Indirect purchasers can sue, but not you,'" Karon said. "They totally screw it up. The people who have losses are the consumers at the end" of the buying chain, he said.

"The theoretical flaw in state reasoning [in dismissing cases] is that not one state antitrust law requires a consumer to purchase a price-fixed item. There is no purchase requirement. That has been read into the statutes by courts," he said.

In a sign of the willingness of state courts to throw out indirect-purchaser claims, Gibson Dunn's Swanson said that in roughly 20 state court cases involving indirect purchase of rubber chemicals around the country, he successfully got state court judges to throw out all but about five cases.

If they had been gathered into a single federal suit, "How many federal judges will parse through all that? I have enormous confidence in federal judges doing a good job dealing with it, but it would stagger any individual human being," he said.

Some states still struggle with standing for indirect purchasers to sue. Just last week, the Tennessee Supreme Court overruled a lower court to hold that indirect purchasers do have the right to bring an action under the state's Trade Practices Act. Freeman Industries v. Eastman Chemical Co., No. E2003-00527-SC-S09-CV.

In addition, the plaintiffs in that case successfully brought unjust enrichment claims. "That is something we throw into antitrust cases now," Karon said.

He is awaiting the outcome of a similar state appeal in Ohio for a case argued in February.

DILEMMA FOR DEFENSE

During the July testimony before Congress' Antitrust Modernization Commission, a lawyer for Microsoft Corp., David Tulchin of New York's Sullivan & Cromwell, explained the dilemma for the defense. Indirect-purchaser cases against Microsoft Corp. were filed in nearly 38 states. With matters in so many states, "the process of adjudicating what really is a national claim on behalf of indirect purchasers becomes extremely complex, extremely expensive," Tulchin said.

"There are lawyers, in some cases dozens of lawyers, in each state on each side working on what really is the same matter," Tulchin said.

It can become coercive to defendants, he said. It's one thing to go to trial where a victory means something, "but it's another thing where if you win you have just one victory but if you lose you have the domino effect of collateral estoppel," Tulchin said.

A defendant with pending cases in numerous states risks incurring a loss that will have the collateral estoppel effect with potential treble damages in dozens of pending cases, he said.

Yet the federal courts create a different dilemma. Said Swanson: "The fight turns into whether you get federal judges to do something they are generally not asked to do: to construe individual state antitrust laws on a very detailed and granular basis."

FCC Extends Review Of Verizon-MCI Merger To Oct. 13 (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The Federal Communications Commission on Tuesday extended its review period of Verizon Communications Inc. (VZ)'s (VZ) proposed acquisition of MCI Inc. (MCIP) (MCIP) until Oct. 13.

The agency's internal and nonbinding 180-day target for merger reviews expired Tuesday. On Monday, Verizon (VZ) and MCI asked the FCC to extend it until Oct. 13.

The FCC said in a public notice that the extension is "in the interest of ensuring sound analysis of the record" and noted that Verizon (VZ) and MCI have in recent days filed "substantial additional relevant information."

Verizon (VZ) has agreed to acquire MCI for $8.5 billion. MCI shareholders are slated to vote on the deal Oct. 6.

Opponents of the deal say the merged company would reduce competition, particularly in the business-services market, leading to higher prices.

Earlier this month, the FCC agreed to stop the clock on its review of the proposed $16 billion acquisition of AT&T Corp. (T) (T) by SBC Communications Inc. (SBC) (SBC) until October 13.

The Wall Street Journal reported Tuesday that FCC Chairman Kevin Martin wants agency staff to deliver recommendations to approve the two mergers.

Such an order could be on commissioners' desks for consideration as early as Wednesday. The next public FCC meeting is scheduled for Oct. 12, one day before the newly extended review clocks expire.

Under agency rules, commissioners should receive orders that are up for a vote three weeks before public meetings.

The Justice Department must also sign off on the mergers.

Antitrust Lawyers Expect Realtor-DOJ Case To Settle (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, September 20, 2005

It's not surprising that the federal government sued the National Association of Realtors over alleged antitrust violations – trade groups can be a breeding ground for anticompetitive activities, and Realtors have clashed with regulators before on antitrust issues, say legal experts, adding that it won't be surprising if an agreement is reached before the lawsuit goes to trial.

On Sept. 7, the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division filed a lawsuit against the 1.2 million-member Realtor trade group to try to bar it from enforcing rules that antitrust officials say restrain competition. The suit specifically challenges NAR's policies related to the display of property listings on the Internet.

An earlier policy adopted by the trade group enabled brokers to pick and choose which competitors could display their property listings online.

While the Realtor group, in response to a Justice Department investigation over its earlier policy, enacted a new Internet listings policy on Aug. 31 for all Realtor-owned MLSs, this new policy continues "to discriminate against brokers who use the Internet to more efficiently and cost effectively serve home sellers and buyers," the Justice Department alleges. Realtor-owned MLSs must adopt and implement the trade group's new policy by July 1, 2006, and some provisions of the new policy are optional.

Earlier lawsuits, dating back to the 1950s, have alleged that Realtor groups have conspired to fix commission rates. Industry research has found that real estate commission rates have dropped slightly over the past several years from the historic average of 6 percent, though home-price increases have risen more than enough to offset this drop in many markets.

In addition to this latest lawsuit against the Realtor trade group, the Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission this year issued letters opposing Realtor-backed legislation in several states that would impose new real estate service requirements and essentially ban some discount business models.

Also, the Justice Department filed a lawsuit in March over real estate rebate restrictions in Kentucky, which led that state to lift its rebate ban. And South Dakota also loosened its rebate restrictions this year in response to a separate Justice Department investigation.

Robert Cohan, Jackson Walker

Trade groups "are kind of a hotbed of antitrust activity – they are by their nature a gathering of competitors," said Robert M. Cohan, a lawyer who is chairman of the antitrust group and a partner in the Jackson Walker law firm's Dallas office. "There are many good things that trade associations do but there is always a danger that when you get competitors together they're going to do things they shouldn't do, such as agree on price."

He added, "There is certainly a history of challenges to real estate multiple listing services and the way Realtor associations operate. There has been some history of tension between the industry and the regulators. What the Justice Department seems to be suggesting is that the Realtor association is protecting Realtors who may still be doing business the old-fashioned way."

Federal antitrust cases can be "tremendously expensive to litigate" and can be drawn out for years if groups aggressively fight the charges, and Cohan said it's fairly common for the parties in such cases to settle before the cases reach trial.

Sutton Keany, Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman

Sutton Keany, a partner and antitrust lawyer who works in the New York office of the Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman law firm, said the Justice Department has already had some success in prompting the Realtor group to rethink its Internet listings policy. The lawsuit may have provided inspiration for NAR to move more quickly in its adoption of new rules, he said, adding that "(The Justice Department) has had success at least on one point - if the purpose of the complaint is to shake up practices in the area."

He added, "It is generally thought that most markets operate more efficiently as the availability of information is increased. If participants in that market get together to try to exclude certain brokers or to restrict the flow of information or to reward non-technological advances, it raises questions. In the end that's what is motivating the Department of Justice."

Tim Greaney, a law professor at Saint Louis University in Missouriwho worked in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division for 10 years during the 1980s, said the lawsuit against the Realtors appears to be "really a classic case of changing market conditions and innovation having a major potential impact on an industry, and an industry's reaction being to resist it because it certainly has the potential to disrupt the way business has been conducted in the past."

While property information continues to be vital for the business of real estate brokerage, "nothing cheapens information quite as much as the Internet," Greaney said, which poses challenges for companies that have relied on brick-and-mortar investments.

MLSs can benefit consumers by providing widespread property listings information, but such joint ventures can be anticompetitive if they serve as devices for exclusion, he said. If the lawsuit is settled, Greaney expects it would be in the form of a court-enforced consent decree, which could lessen the chances for extensive future litigation related to this case.

Legal experts say that federal antitrust cases can be the basis for private litigation, and if the Justice Department prevails in the case there may be a trailing wave of class-action or individual lawsuits by real estate companies or groups.

The federal government is not seeking any damages in the lawsuit, but aims to restrain and enjoin the Realtor association from requiring rules that restrict how a broker interacts with customers, competitors or others, according to the Justice Department complaint.

The lawsuit also seeks to prevent the trade group from requiring affiliated boards and MLSs to adopt specific Internet listings policies – such as the ability for brokers to selectively withhold listings from some competing brokers – that the Justice Department considers to be anticompetitive.

Theodore "Ted" Bolema, a lawyer in the Finance and Law Department at Central Michigan University who served in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division from 1992-2000, said the lawsuit against the Realtor group appears to be at the "intersection of antitrust laws and (intellectual) property rights," as it relates to the ownership control of property listings information.

Theodore Bolema, Central Michigan University

"It strikes me as one of the most interesting antitrust cases we've seen in some time because of the rather unique issues in it," he said.

Antitrust cases can take longer to resolve than average court cases, Bolema said, and the Justice Department must present a very detailed factual analysis to support its case. "(These cases) are very fact specific. Courts have held that it's really the economic impact that is critical in determining whether there is a violation or not." While some antitrust cases seek damages for past violations, the case against the Realtor trade group does not.

The American Antitrust Institute, an independent, non-profit research and advocacy group that promotes fair competition, has commended the Justice Department for bringing the lawsuit against the Realtor association. Albert Foer, president of the institute, said, "I think that the Realtors are going to have a very difficult time in prevailing. There is a context of an industry in which commissions appear to have been stable for a long time, even as the price of housing has escalated. That tips us off that something is wrong in terms of how competition is working."

But, he also said, "At this stage it's hard to prejudge the outcome. We supported the idea that (the Justice Department) brought the case because we think this is a really important issue for consumers and it ought to get the fullest possible airing."

Legal experts have said that Washington politics should not have a major bearing on this case – despite the Realtor group's powerful presence in congressional lobbying and financial support for federal elections.

But Justice Department officials, Foer said, "are clearly aware of the political power of the Realtors. And nonetheless they put forward the case – one assumes they've done a lot of thinking and a lot of preparation and have a lot to offer."

Governors Ask Probe Into Possible Gasoline Price Gouging (AP)

By JOSEPH B. FRAZIER, Associated Press

AP, September 21, 2005

Eight Democratic governors, including Gov. Ted Kulongoski, have written the Bush Administration requesting a probe into possible gasoline price gouging in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"We urge Congress to immediately commence an investigation into the excessive profits being made by oil companies who are taking advantage of this national crisis," the letter said.

It urged legislation refunding any excessive profits to consumers and was signed by the governors of Oregon, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, New Mexico, Iowa, Montana and Washington.

The letter cites a report by Don Nichols, an economist and director of the Robert M. LaFollett School of Public Affairs at the University of Wisconsin as saying there is a disproportionate increase in the rise of pump prices and crude oil prices.

Historically, Nichols said, the markup between the price of a gallon of crude and a gallon of gasoline is about 85 to 90 cents a gallon including refining, distribution and taxes.

At $50 for a 44-gallon barrel of crude, he said, the pump price should be about $2 a gallon, a little more or less in some states depending on taxes. At $65 a barrel — nearly identical to the price in Tuesday afternoon trading — a gallon should be about $2.30.

But as of Monday, the average cost of a gallon of regular was $2.78 nationwide. A week ago, it was $2.95 a gallon.

For gasoline to be $3 a gallon, he said, crude should be selling for about $95 a barrel.

Ten refineries were knocked out by Katrina but Nichols said windfall profits are still involved.

"There is supply and demand," he said. "That's the market."

"But somebody is sitting on money they didn't earn," he said, "because they were in the right place at the right time."

He said he has seen no explanation for why the markup should be nearly triple. "The disconnect between gasoline and crude oil prices is quite remarkable," he said.

"How can gasoline prices soar if crude prices don't?" he asked in the study, which was contained in a broader look at economic impacts of Katrina.

Officials of major petroleum industry groups asked for comment did not immediately return calls Tuesday.

Last week in Washington the Senate passed an amendment that requires the Federal Trade Commission to conduct an immediate investigation into possible gasoline price-gouging in the wake of the devastating hurricane.

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle wrote that Wisconsin consumers have been overcharged by an estimated $88 million just this month and called for refunds.

Oregon Attorney General Hardy Myers wrote in Tuesday's Oregonian newspaper that Oregon, unlike 21 other states, has no law banning price gouging during emergencies.

Instead, Oregon law limits gouging to the prohibiting of taking advantage of a customer with a physical infirmity.

"The sky's the limit is the rule here even in a declared emergency," he wrote.

He said he has been seeking a law for years to let his office deal with gouging.

Nationally, gasoline prices have been slowly dropping in recent days amid predictions that they could rise again as Hurricane Rita moves toward the Gulf of Mexico.

"Just yesterday, we saw oil set the new record for a one-day spike in prices," Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash., a member of the Senate Energy and Commerce committees, said Tuesday.

"The oil companies know we don't have a plan to protect American consumers. We need a federal law that's going to prohibit profiteering at the gas pump — especially during national emergencies," she said.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson will call a special legislative session next month to propose a $100 million gasoline and home heating relief package.

Spokesman Gilbert Gallegos said Tuesday that the one-time package would include rebates for taxpayers. He said Richardson will seek a bill that will allow the state to investigate and punish companies that engage in price gouging.

White House spokesman Allen Abney said no one has seen the governors' letter Tuesday, but that Bush won't stand for price gouging. He also said Bush has asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to handle any such allegations.

U.S. Plans Deployment Of Antipiracy Attachés (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is stepping up efforts to protect the patent rights of American businesses overseas, amid growing concern over the piracy of U.S. intellectual property.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez today is expected to announce that his department has set up a team of intellectual-property specialists who will be assigned to several nations to help fight piracy there.

The initiative, which builds on a strategy the Commerce Department is following in China, is part of an effort by Washington to gain control of an issue roiling U.S. trade relations around the globe, particularly with developing countries.

Last week, Chinese President Hu Jintao assured President Bush that Beijing is willing to strengthen antipiracy rules, as part of an effort to increase imports of U.S. goods into China and ease the trade gap -- on pace to break last year's record of $162 billion -- between the two economic powers. Past Chinese promises to deal with the issue have yielded few tangible results.

Together with the diplomatic dialogue, the Bush administration is scrambling to provide support for American business. Critics complain tens of billions of dollars in revenue are lost annually as a result of the piracy of intellectual property.

In addition to beefing up the antipiracy effort in China, the administration plans to deploy intellectual-property specialists to Brazil, India, Russia, Thailand and the Middle East -- all regions that concern U.S. trade officials tracking patent issues. The new team of attachés will provide in-country assistance to U.S. businesses facing piracy problems, and work with local officials on efforts to curb theft.

"We're going to have a presence on the ground," Mr. Gutierrez said. He is scheduled to outline the plan on a two-day swing this week through California, where he is to discuss trade issues with technology and movie-industry executives. "It's all part of an overall effort to combat" violations of intellectual-property rights, the secretary said.

The initiative is the work of Chris Israel, a Commerce official tapped over the summer to coordinate antipiracy efforts across the administration. The Commerce Department also is creating an academy, based at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, to train foreign judges, enforcement officials and program administrators on international-patent obligations, as well as how to establish and maintain a system of intellectual-property protections.

Among the countries expected to participate are Brazil and China. Creation of the academy would double the size of an existing program through which the Patent and Trademark Office conducts education and enforcement training programs around the world.

At home, the department is also convening a series of grass-roots seminars around the country to educate small-business owners on protecting their intellectual property overseas.

EU Regulators Eyes Microsoft Complaints (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- EU antitrust officials are again analyzing complaints that software giant Microsoft Corp. broke European rules, European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said Tuesday.

Todd refused to say who made the complaints, what they were and whether they contained new information.

"We are currently in the throes of analyzing these informal complaints. And a decision as to whether or not we will open up a new case against Microsoft _ any such decision will only be taken once we have completed our scrutiny of the information we have received," he told reporters.

He said the EU head office did not need to wait for complaints to take action against any company it suspected of breaking EU law.

The EU executive Commission is currently waiting for a court date to defend its March 2004 antitrust ruling against Microsoft. In that case, the company is challenging a $620 million fine and a ruling that it abusively wielded its Windows software domination to lock competitors out of the market.

Microsoft was also ordered to sell a version of its Windows software without its Media Player and required to share technology with competitors that make server software so their products can better communicate with Windows computers.

Microsoft Could Face Fresh European Antitrust Charges (MRKTWTCH)

By Michael Paige, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, September 21, 2005

LOS ANGELES (MarketWatch) - Microsoft Corp. could face new charges by European antitrust regulators that its business practices are anticompetitive as officials weigh fresh complaints the world's largest software company violated European rules, reports said Tuesday.

Since taking office last year, Neelie Kroes, the European competition commissioner, said she has received informal complaints focusing on Microsoft's (MSFT: news) bundling of its existing software programs and upcoming applications, according to an interview published by the New York Times.

"We have had informal complaints and we are using our time now to look at them," she said. "We're not going to wait and do nothing."

Kroes refused to provide further details on the complaints, the paper said. Microsoft, the world's largest software company, responded by saying it was keeping regulators apprised of its new products, according to the report.

European regulators early last year found that Redmond, Wash., Microsoft abused its dominant position with its Windows software to unfairly shut competitors out of the market. The company was ordered to pay a landmark fine and make sweeping changes to its business practices.

Microsoft and regulators are awaiting a court date for the company's challenge of the fine and ruling. See earlier related story.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the European Commission said there are no imminent plans to open a new antitrust investigation into Microsoft, Dow Jones Newswires reported from Brussels.

A spokesman for the regulatory body was quoted by the Associated Press as saying, "We are currently in the throes of analyzing these informal complaints. And a decision as to whether or not we will open up a new case against Microsoft -- any such decision will only be taken once we have completed our scrutiny of the information we have received."

In March of last year, Microsoft was fined a record 497 million euros, or over $600 million, and ordered by the regulators to change the way it does business.

Under the ruling, Microsoft was ordered to divulge some of its trade secrets for server software to competitors. It was also ordered to offer to consumers a version of its ubiquitous Windows operating system stripped of its Media Player software.

In Tuesday trading, Microsoft's stock eased 16 cents, or 0.6%, to close at $25.84. Shares have ranged from $23.82 to $30.20 over the last 52 weeks.

LOS ANGELES (Dow Jones) - Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) could face new charges by European antitrust regulators that its business practices are anticompetitive as officials weigh fresh complaints the world's largest software company violated European rules, reports said Tuesday.

Since taking office last year, Neelie Kroes, the European competition commissioner, said she has received informal complaints focusing on Microsoft's (MSFT)(MSFT) bundling of its existing software programs and upcoming applications, according to an interview published by the New York Times.

"We have had informal complaints and we are using our time now to look at them," she said. "We're not going to wait and do nothing."

Kroes refused to provide further details on the complaints, the paper said. Microsoft (MSFT), the world's largest software company, responded by saying it was keeping regulators apprised of its new products, according to the report.

European regulators early last year found that Redmond, Wash., Microsoft (MSFT)abused its dominant position with its Windows software to unfairly shut competitors out of the market. The company was ordered to pay a landmark fine and make sweeping changes to its business practices.

Microsoft (MSFT) and regulators are awaiting a court date for the company's challenge of the fine and ruling.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the European Commission said there are no imminent plans to open a new antitrust investigation into Microsoft (MSFT), Dow Jones Newswires reported from Brussels.

A spokesman for the regulatory body was quoted by the Associated Press as saying, "We are currently in the throes of analyzing these informal complaints. And a decision as to whether or not we will open up a new case against Microsoft (MSFT) -- any such decision will only be taken once we have completed our scrutiny of the information we have received."

In March of last year, Microsoft (MSFT) was fined a record 497 million euros, or over $600 million, and ordered by the regulators to change the way it does business.

Under the ruling, Microsoft (MSFT) was ordered to divulge some of its trade secrets for server software to competitors. It was also ordered to offer to consumers a version of its ubiquitous Windows operating system stripped of its Media Player software.

In Tuesday trading, Microsoft's (MSFT) stock gained 12 cents, or 0.5%, to $26.12. Shares have ranged from $23.82 to $30.20 over the last 52 weeks.

Mergers May Vex Regulators (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, September 21, 2005

As federal regulators weigh what, if any, conditions to impose on two mammoth phone company mergers, they face a vexing Rubik's cube of possibilities.

Any requirements they attach to SBC Communications' acquisition of AT&T and Verizon's purchase of MCI could force some customers to do business with a telecom company they didn't choose.

The Justice Department is largely focused on the effects of the megadeals on corporate customers, say people with direct knowledge of the situation. In exchange for the deals' approval, they say, Justice is considering forcing the combined company to shed up to several thousand lines that serve big business. The rub: Most corporate customers are under contract and will likely balk at switching providers.

Both Justice and the Federal Communications Commission could approve both deals by next month, though Justice is further along in its review than the FCC, say the people who are involved. These people asked to remain anonymous because the talks with Justice are sensitive and confidential. Justice and the FCC declined to comment.

The mergers would marry SBC and Verizon, the two biggest regional Bells, with AT&T and MCI, the top two long-distance carriers.

The FCC could impose conditions aimed at preserving consumer choice. Until recently, AT&T and MCI each have competed head-on with SBC and Verizon for consumers' home-phone service. Regulators are less concerned about that segment because the long-distance companies stopped marketing residential service after adverse regulatory rulings last year.

Still, to promote competition, the FCC could require SBC and Verizon to offer consumers DSL broadband service without also requiring them to use the Bells' local voice service. That would allow consumers to replace the Bells' voice service with an Internet-based phone service, such as Vonage, that could travel over the DSL line.

With the FCC split evenly between Republicans and Democrats until a third Republican is appointed, the Democrats could push for such a condition.

In the business market, AT&T and MCI are leaders in linking the nationwide offices of big businesses with voice and data services. Typically, however, they must lease the local fiber-optic lines of the Bells, then resell them to businesses along with other services.

But in recent years, AT&T, MCI and other Bell rivals have built their own fiber lines to customers, undercutting the Bells' prices by 15% to 35%, says Brian Moir, a lawyer for large business customers. While AT&T and MCI control less than 5% of all business lines in the USA, they serve many of the largest business customers in the biggest cities.

They also wholesale, at sharp discounts, both their lines and those they lease from the Bells to smaller phone companies, which in turn, sell them to small and midsize businesses. All told, AT&T and MCI each serve about 2,000 buildings in SBC's and Verizon's regions, respectively, with their own fiber-optic lines. Both the large businesses and smaller phone companies worry they will lose those discounts once AT&T and MCI are swallowed by the Bells.

To prevent that, Justice could force SBC and Verizon to sell the lines, but not customers, of AT&T and MCI. Reason: Supplying data services to businesses is highly specialized and customers with nationwide contracts would resist being tossed to a new provider in one region. “They're not going to want their contracts torn up by government fiat,” says Legg Mason analyst David Kaut.

At the same time, several phone companies say they would have little interest in buying the wires if there is no customer revenue to offset the purchase price. As a result, Level 3 Communications has proposed that Justice allow it or other phone providers to buy the lines, and force AT&T and MCI to lease them back. As units of SBC and Verizon, they would still use the lines to serve their existing customers. The buyers eventually would develop their own customer bases.

Moir says business customers would still bristle at a new phone company controlling the lines.

Yet in a report, Legg Mason says it expects Justice to require just that — a divestiture with a lease-back mandate. To ensure that the Bells don't scrap discount prices, the FCC also could regulate their prices, Legg Mason says.

The Bells argue no divestitures or conditions are needed. They say many of the buildings served by AT&T and MCI are also served, or easily could be, by others.

Authors Slap Google With Copyright Suit (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

A group of authors Tuesday filed suit against Google Inc., accusing the search engine company of copyright infringement under its controversial program to scan millions of books in university and public libraries and to make the texts searchable on the Web.

The Authors Guild, a New York non-profit with over 8,000 members who are published authors, alleged in its complaint that Google's plan to create digital copies of books represented "massive copyright infringement." Authors Herbert Mitgang, Betty Miles, and former U.S. Poet Laureate Daniel Hoffman, are co-plaintiffs in the suit. The plaintiffs have requested the suit be granted class action status. The complaint was filed in U.S. District Court in New York.

In a statement, Google said that its respects copyright and added that it "regrets" the course of action the Authors Guild has chosen. "Google Print directly benefits authors and publishers by increasing awareness of and sales of the books in the program," the company said. "Only small portions of the books are shown [to consumers conducting searches] unless the content owner gives permission to show more," it added, saying that authors and publishers can request their books not be scanned at all.

The complaint is the latest reminder of how Google's attempts to search information beyond simple Web pages -- such as books, television programs and scholarly works -- are proving to be more controversial and time-consuming for the company than the Web searches that have driven its growth to date. Since late last year, Google has been slapped with separate suits, including from a news agency and an adult-entertainment company, alleging copyright infringement in areas such as news reports and images it displays on the Web.

The Mountain View, Calif. company has already faced some backlash from publisher groups since announcing its book-scanning program last December. In a May letter, the Association of American University Presses, a trade group of 125 publishers, warned Google that its plan to digitize millions of books in libraries represented "a fundamental, broad-sweeping violation of the Copyright Act." Individual publishers, including Bertelsmann AG's Random House Inc. unit, and other publisher associations have also contacted Google expressing their concern. Some European officials also oppose the scanning project, arguing it would help English-language sources and an American view of history to dominate the Web.

Google last month suspended its scanning of copyrighted books in libraries until November, saying the delay would give publishers time to specify which books they don't want Google to scan. Google had initially said it planned to scan the entire library of the University of Michigan, which includes seven million volumes, along with books from the libraries of Stanford University, the University of Oxford, and Harvard University and the New York Public Library.

Authors Guild Executive Director Paul Aiken said that Google's move to allow publishers to request their works not be scanned was insufficient. "Opting out is not the way copyright works," said Mr. Aiken.

The complaint alleges Google's scanning of copyrighted works in itself represents a copyright infringement, and that Google's inclusion of any works in its commercial services represents additional infringement. Mr. Aiken said that book publishers typically don't have the contractual right to grant Google permission to use published books in its book search service without the authors' agreement. The complaint requested unspecified damages and an injunction barring Google from further alleged copyright infringement under the program.

Nymex Board Votes To Sell 10% Stake To General Atlantic (WSJ/DJN)

By Leah McGrath Goodman, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

The board of the New York Mercantile Exchange voted in favor of selling a 10% stake to private-equity firm General Atlantic LLC at a meeting last night, according to a person close to Nymex.

The deal, which remains subject to a seatholder vote, values the exchange at $1.35 billion and seeks to help the nation's biggest energy and metals market go public, the person said.

By voting for a deal with General Atlantic, the Nymex board closed the door on a joint bid by private-equity firms Blackstone Group and Battery Ventures VI LLP that valued the exchange at $1.3 billion, people close to Nymex said.

The board also rejected an eleventh-hour bid by Michel Marks, a former Nymex chairman, who teamed up with private-equity firm Hellman & Friedman LLC seeking a Nymex stake that valued total exchange equity at $1.4 billion, several people close to Nymex said.

Nymex plans to recommend the proposed deal with General Atlantic to seatholders at a meeting Sept. 29, where it plans to discuss the exchange's strategic options. Seatholders will vote on the deal at a later date, according to Nymex spokeswoman Anu Ahluwalia.

While minority stake bids from private-equity firms initially targeted the purchase of a 20% equity stake in the exchange, people close to Nymex said board members wary of giving up control reduced the size of the stake for sale.

Under the terms of the General Atlantic offer, the firm would buy a 10% stake in Nymex representing preferred equity that would allow it to seize control of the exchange if it fails to achieve certain revenue and net capital milestones, people close to Nymex said. General Atlantic, Greenwich, Conn., is the largest shareholder of Chicago's Archipelago Holdings Inc., an electronic-trading firm that has made clear its interest in derivatives and is slated to merge with the New York Stock Exchange.

The proposal also seeks to reduce the exchange's 25-member board, with one-third of the remaining directors to be handpicked by General Atlantic, people close to Nymex said. The other board members -- either representatives of Nymex seatholders or public directors -- likely would be approved by a Nymex member vote, they said.

The deal includes provisions that let General Atlantic liquidate its minority stake if Nymex backs out of an IPO, said one of the people close to Nymex.

Qwest To Try To Sway FCC Review Of SBC-AT& T Merger (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed, Washington Post Staff Writer

Qwest Communications International Inc. yesterday raised questions about the pending merger of two major rivals, accusing SBC Communications Inc. of anti-competitive practices as the government considers SBC's purchase of AT&T Corp.

Denver-based Qwest said SBC was making it harder for competitors to serve lucrative medium to large companies and was limiting the ability of rivals to lease SBC lines at cheaper government-regulated rates. It also said SBC appeared to be pressuring smaller phone companies not to merge with unspecified "blacklisted" rivals.

San Antonio-based SBC dismissed Qwest's claims and said it expected the Federal Communications Commission and Justice Department to approve its $16 billion acquisition of AT&T.

Qwest is trying to influence the FCC as the agency weighs both the SBC-AT&T merger and Verizon Communications Inc.'s planned $8.46 billion purchase of MCI Inc.

Qwest was rebuffed in its own effort to buy Ashburn-based MCI this year, and the two mergers leave Qwest -- the fourth-largest U.S. telephone company -- at a competitive disadvantage to the remaining regional telephone giants.

"SBC already is using its increased market power arising from its acquisition of AT&T to create new barriers to the development of competition," Qwest said in a letter it said it would send today to the FCC. The company provided a copy of the letter to The Washington Post.

"These actions underscore why the merger should be conditioned on full divestiture of overlapping AT&T operations and related restrictions on terms and conditions under which SBC provides special access," the letter added.

Special-access customers are usually medium to large companies that, because they buy large amounts of voice and data service, are provided dedicated lines to connect directly to long-distance networks. Long-distance companies typically pay the local telephone company special-access fees for these dedicated lines.

"We are confident that the FCC and the DOJ, after an exhaustive and careful review of the facts, will determine that the merger of SBC and AT&T will benefit consumers -- and many customers have gone on record in support of the merger for this reason," said an SBC spokesman.

"This filing is a sad, desperate act by one of our competitors who is afraid of having a vigorous competitor in their own back yard," he added.

In its letter, Qwest said SBC was capping the number of circuits it would transfer to competitors in a given year, limiting Qwest's ability to serve special-access customers.

It did not disclose the cap but said it was below what SBC transferred for Qwest in the first half of 2005.

Senator Proposes Property Rights Ombudsman (REU-Y2)

By David Lawder

Reuters, September 21, 2005

A senior Senate Republican proposed creating a federal official for arbitration in eminent domain cases on Tuesday as witnesses urged lawmakers to restrict the taking of private property for development.

Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record) announced the bill to create such an ombudsman during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on a separate measure to withhold federal funding from private development projects that rely on government appropriation to obtain property.

"What is happening to me should not happen to anyone else," said Susette Kelo, namesake plaintiff in the landmark Kelo v. New London case the U.S. Supreme Court decided in June.

"Congress and state legislatures need to send a message to local governments that this kind of abuse of power will not be funded or tolerated," she told the hearing.

The court ruled 5-4 that New London, Connecticut, could take Kelo's waterfront home and 14 other properties to make way for a hotel and condominium project, saying economic development and creation of jobs were sanctioned as public use of land under the U.S. Constitution's Fifth Amendment.

The decision enraged property rights advocates and conservatives in Congress, who say it gave local governments the right to give any home in the United States to a wealthy developer, as long as he says he will upgrade the property.

Such projects often involve federal Community Development Block Grants and are backed by tax-exempt bond financing. The project in the Kelo case received a $2 million subsidy.

Under Hatch's bill, an independent property rights ombudsman would have the power to order arbitration to resolve eminent domain disputes. The bill is based on a property ombudsman successfully established in Utah.

Cornyn said his fellow Republican Hatch's idea was "intriguing" and worth considering as the bill progresses.

Cornyn said he has 28 co-sponsors for the legislation, but acknowledged that only two so far are Democrats.

The House of Representatives passed a similar measure as an amendment to a spending bill, but the 231-189 vote was split largely along party lines, with many Democrats opposing it.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's Washington bureau director Hilary Shelton spoke in favor of the legislation, saying eminent domain-driven urban renewal projects too often displace blacks and other minorities with too little compensation.

But Hartford, Connecticut, Mayor Eddie Perez said the Kelo decision did nothing more than confirm the status quo of cities to use eminent domain judiciously as a tool to create jobs and benefit residents.

Senators, Property Owners Review Kelo (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0007006

Private-property owners and government officials squared off yesterday in a Senate hearing over what makes up the American dream.

Mayor Eddie A. Perez of Hartford, Conn., said the American dream means letting city governments seize property under newly expanded eminent-domain powers so they can give it to private developers who promise to generate greater tax revenue with it.

Susette Kelo -- whose restored pink home in New London, Conn., faces such a seizure -- said the American dream means owning a home without fear that the government will take it to give to the highest bidder.

In June, the Supreme Court ruled in favor of government use of eminent-domain powers to take property and give it to private developers. The 5-4 Kelo v. City of New London decision stunned lawmakers on both sides of the aisle, many of whom noted it as another reason to push the court in a more conservative direction.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has introduced a bill that would prohibit federal funds from being used in cases in which the expanded authority is used. Ms. Kelo applauded that bill.

"What we have now at the local, state and federal level amounts to government by the highest bidder," she said. "That has got to stop."

Though criticism of the Kelo decision has come from both conservatives suspicious of big government and liberals who fear the impact on the poor and minorities, only one Democrat -- Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont -- showed up for part of yesterday's hearing. Most Republicans on the panel attended.

At the start of the hearing, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, said that he'd just come from a meeting at the Supreme Court attended by the author of the decision, Justice John Paul Stevens.

"I told Justice Stevens that we were having this Kelo hearing and if he has some spare time later this morning, to come on over. We'd be glad to hear from him," Mr. Specter said. "He didn't think that was very funny, but all the other judges laughed."

Mr. Perez, speaking on behalf of the National League of Cities, said: "Eminent domain is a powerful economic-development tool that helps cities create jobs, grow businesses, and, most importantly, strengthen neighborhoods."

And despite the near-universal outrage from minority groups, the Hartford mayor said eminent domain is good for blacks.

"For urban America and communities of color, in particular, homeownership is the ticket to the American dream," Mr. Perez said. "If Congress were to pass legislation to hamstring state and local governments from using eminent domain in some of our poorest communities, I believe that we would have fewer people becoming homeowners."

And property-rights advocates have nothing to worry about, he said.

"From [an] owner's position, it seems to me that eminent domain ... is, in a way, the most attractive way in which to have your property rearranged," he said, noting that the owner is compensated.

Ms. Kelo said she just wants to keep her house and be left alone.

"None of us asked for any of this," she said. "We were simply living our lives, working, taking care of our families and paying our taxes."

U.S. To Inspect Small Leak From Fuel Pool At Indian Point (NYT)

By By Lisa W. Foderaro

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission announced yesterday that it was inspecting a small radioactive leak from a spent-fuel pool at the Indian Point nuclear power plant in northern Westchester County.

The federal agency said the leak, which was discovered earlier this month during excavation work, was minimal and "does not pose any immediate health or safety concern" for the public or the plant's workers.

But the commission said it would initiate a special inspection to review plans to fix the leak by the company that owns the plant, Entergy Nuclear Northeast. The inspection will also assess the potential environmental impact from the leakage.

Still, elected officials expressed anger that they were notified only yesterday about the leak from one of three spent-fuel pools on the site. C. Scott Vanderhoef, the Rockland County executive, said the leak also raised questions about Entergy's monitoring of the other pools on the site. "The degree of confidence is certainly not improved," he said.

Mr. Vanderhoef also said that emergency officials from Rockland, Westchester and Orange Counties decided yesterday to ask Entergy to conduct another test of its siren system, following the failures and glitches that marked a test last Wednesday. Among other things, a backup activation system that relies on radio signals failed in Rockland County.

Andrew J. Spano, the Westchester County executive, said in a statement yesterday that it was "absolutely unbelievable that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and Entergy would keep us in the dark about a radioactive leak" in the pools.

A spokesman for Entergy, Jim Steets, said that the company would have notified county officials immediately had there been any potential for a threat to public safety.

In a statement, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission said the leak was found during excavation work being done in conjunction with a project to store spent fuel rods without immersing them in a pool. It said that workers had identified several hairline cracks on concrete walls surrounding the pool for Indian Point 2, one of the plant's two active reactors. "Slight se epage was collected," the statement said. "It is not yet clear whether the seepage is from a current or prior leak."

Entergy said that the leak may have stemmed from a leak in the pool that was repaired in 1992. Engineers and chemists reported that trace amounts of radioactive cesium and cobalt were present in samples taken from the wall; both are present in the spent-fuel pool. Soil samples three feet from the wall showed normal background levels of radiation, according to the company.

Interior Dept. Defends Its Keeping Of Indian Books (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

The Interior Department says its audits of accounts it manages for thousands of Native Americans have found few errors and little evidence that anyone tampered with the records.

The agency's position, in a report sent to Congress on Monday, runs contrary to that of Native Americans who filed a 1996 class-action lawsuit saying that they were cheated out of more than $100 billion because of mismanagement of oil, gas, grazing, timber and other royalties from their lands.

A federal judge has ordered that Interior Department officials account for every dollar received and paid to Native Americans since 1887.

In a glossy 24-page brochure, the department says the audit the judge ordered would cost $12 billion and efforts so far have found that errors make up less than 1 percent of the dollars reconciled. "This picture is significantly different from that o ffered by Interior's critics," Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton states in a letter opening the brochure.

Lawyers for the plaintiffs immediately criticized the report. The plaintiffs have argued the department is using inaccurate and, in some cases, incomplete data.

Gossip Meets The G-men In Vast FBI Files (TLPA)

By Randy Herschaft And Larry Mcshane

Times Leader (NE PA), September 21, 2005

NEW YORK - The Beach Boys. Frank Sinatra. Liberace. Sonically, the trio shared little - from the California group's soaring harmonies to Sinatra's saloon singing to Liberace's marshmallow soft vocals. But their offstage antics were music to the ears of the FBI, where all three became the subject of muckraking files in the agency's Washington headquarters.

The portfolios contain innuendo and allegations, with the occasional revelation thrown in. The Beach Boys' penchant for psychedelic drugs and Sinatra's alleged sex parties with President John F. Kennedy are old news.

Celebrities and criminals, rock stars and mob stars, athletes and artists - scores of high-profile Americans have their very own FBI file, a bold-faced universe rife with dirt and scandal. It's no surprise that gossip columnists such as Walter Winchell turn up as sources.

The files chronicle mass marketer Walt Disney and mass murderer Ted Bundy, comic genius Groucho Marx and cosmic genius Albert Einstein. There are reports of canoodling (although the FBI prefers "extramarital affairs"), heavy boozing, mob ties, drug use and the rest of the requisite dish.

The sheer volume became clear in response to a Freedom Of Information Act request by The Associated Press for every FBI "High Visibility Memorandum" filed between 1974 and 2005, allowing a lengthy traipse through the lives of celebrities from A (Louis Armstrong) to Kaye (Danny) to Z (Efrem Zimbalist). The AP's request produced more than 500 redacted memos totaling nearly 1,500 pages - a stack of documents six inches high.

Tucked inside the pile of paperwork were FBI memos on spouses/stars Desi Arnaz and Lucille Ball; football stars Dexter Manley and Walter Payton; Mayors Marion Barry and Frank Rizzo; mobsters Carlo Gambino and Mickey Cohen.

The memos even contain information never made public. The February 2001 paperwork on film director Otto Preminger's file mentioned "all of the information on Preminger's desire to be a source for the FBI is being withheld."

Until now.

In the FBI's files, Andy Warhol's 15 minutes of fame never expire. Instead, as his memo noted, the 38 pages about the artist's film company and a 1968-69 investigation are there for eternity.

Jimmy Hoffa's daughter asked for the files regarding her long-missing dad - 69 volumes of documents and memorandums. James Earl Ray, the assassin who killed Martin Luther King Jr., filed more than 50 FOIA requests from 1977 to '95 on a variety of subjects - including one seeking records about the FBI's electronic surveillance of King's widow.

The FBI also kept a file on "The FBI" - the long-running television show starring Zimbalist as Inspector Lewis Erskine. The real FBI, according to memos, had casting control over its video incarnation: both Bette Davis and Robert Blake were banned from appearing.

Davis was bumped as an alleged communist sympathizer. Blake, recently acquitted of killing his wife, was brushed off after expressing his opinion that "killers aren't at fault, society is," according to a memo.

Sinatra's file generated national headlines upon its 1998 release, as much for its lack of headline-making material as for anything it contained. But tons of other material is out there, some of it barely noticed in the vast verbal ocean of Web sites, books, newspapers and other publications.

The presence of a file or a memo doesn't necessarily mean the subject was targeted for an investigation.

"Celebrity files can be tricky to understand," said FBI historian John Fox. "They can be collections of information gathered from other files. ... Louis Armstrong is a good example of that. It would be incorrect to say the FBI investigated him."

The FBI won't divulge its exact number of files, but estimates are that it could total more than 6 million. The agency has long maintained that its era of surveillance for political purposes is over, reflecting changes that followed FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover's death in 1972 - but there remain plenty of nuggets tucked away on FBI letterhead:

_ Actor Victor Mature once contacted the FBI about a stalker, but was "probably intoxicated" when agents met with him about the problem. "I know Mature," wrote FBI Deputy Director Clyde Tolson. "He is a little nuts."

_ Former Ohio State football coach Woody Hayes once recruited the son of an agent in the Cleveland office to play for the Buckeyes, prompting a letter to FBI headquarters. Hoover and Hayes were pals.

_ Comedian Jackie Gleason launched a 1956 attempt to track down his alcoholic father, who had disappeared when "The Great One" was a child. The FBI aided by checking its fingerprint files.

The high visibility memorandums are generated for a number of reasons: the notoriety of the requester, whether it's a high-ranking government official (ex-President Gerald Ford) or a high-profile Hollywood type (Sinatra); if the request could reveal improper FBI activities; and if the request comes from a story-seeking journalist.

While it might seem the last group would make the most requests, journalists lagged far behind in their filings, according to FBI records. Both prisoners and private citizens outpaced the requests from the news media.

While the subjects are alive, the FBI only releases public source information: news clippings and other items already available. The full files, for both celebrities and common citizens, are not made public until after death due to privacy issues.

One of the files' more entertaining aspects is the failure to distinguish between legitimate and slanderous sources. Gossip column clips sit side by side with anonymous letters like the one ripping Gleason and Hoover for hanging around with Sinatra, who - as his file showed - had once volunteered to work as an FBI undercover in 1950.

The memos abound with unsubstantiated stories of adultery, addiction and various other excesses. Not all the stories are as riveting - as the file for former U.S. Sen. Edmund Muskie indicated.

The memo mentioned that he was turned down for a job with the FBI, and chronicled an assassination threat against the one-time presidential candidate. And it mentioned one other incident: a 1965 charge of "hunting migratory waterfowl over a baited field."

The incident wound up costing Muskie $27.50 in forfeited bond money, the memo said.

Man Convicted Of Threatening Agent (PTR)

By Karen Roebuck, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune Review, September 21, 2005

A South Hills man was convicted Tuesday of threatening to kill an FBI agent who was investigating him for fraud.

Regonaldo Demelio, 36, also known as Ronald Cooley, was in the Allegheny County Jail awaiting trial on two state assault charges Jan. 5 when he placed three telephone calls to his wife in which he threatened to "whack" FBI Special Agent Robert Zalno.

Demelio, a self-employed contractor, said he knew the agent would be listening to his phone calls and told his wife to "pipe down" so he could speak directly to the agent.

Demelio also threatened to file a lawsuit and complain to Zalno's supervisor, a review board and the American Civil Liberties Union that the agent was harassing his wife, Terri Demelio, by visiting her at work as part of the fraud investigation.

Demelio did not testify, but his attorney, Robert L. Downey Jr., argued that his defendant was a "hothead" and was threatening only to take civil action against Zalno.

After the jury's verdict was announced in U.S. District Court, Downtown, Downey complained that the federal law under which his client was convicted "is so vague. Almost anything could be a threat."

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Love told jurors Zalno should have taken the threats seriously because Demelio had assaulted three men -- smashing one of them in the face with a cinderblock -- and was taking psychiatric medication because of his violent past.

Terri Demelio, his wife of two years, previously had filed a protection-of-abuse order against him, saying her husband had pulled a knife on her, hit her in the face, threw a potted plant at her and threatened to kill her, Love argued.

Demelio, who was not charged in the fraud investigation, shook his head when the verdict was read, and his wife sobbed.

He could face up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced by U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab. A sentencing date has not been set.

Man Convicted Of Threatening FBI Agent (AP)

PITTSBURGH (AP) — A man was convicted Tuesday of threatening an FBI agent in a call from jail last year, his lawyer said.

Federal prosecutors said Regonaldo Demelio, 36, of Pittsburgh, knew that his phone calls from the Allegheny County Jail were being recorded and that the federal agent, who was investigating Demelio and his wife, would be listening.

Demelio's lawyer, Robert Downey Jr., said Tuesday night that he was considering an appeal.

Advertisement

Downey said he had listened to the recordings of his client "ad nauseum" and believed that Demelio didn't really intend to hurt Special Agent Robert Zalno. He said his client was just frustrated and felt that agents were baiting him and harassing his wife in a bank and mortgage fraud investigation.

"That apparently is not how the jury perceived it, and that's the rub," Downey said.

No sentencing date was set for Demelio, who was convicted after a two-day trial of a charge of threatening a federal official.

When he spoke about the agent, Demelio had been jailed on an aggravated assault charge. No charges have resulted from the fraud investigation.

Drug Dealer Admits Scams To DEA In Hopes Of Leniency (PHDN)

By Jim Smith

Philadelphia Daily News, September 21, 2005

Admitted drug kingpin Benjamin Ton was facing life in prison for smuggling 11 tons of marijuana and over 300,000 ecstasy pills from Canada into Philadelphia and other areas.

So Ton, 34, a former copy machine repairman who lived in Folcroft, Delaware County, and later in a $300,000 home in Sicklerville, N.J., did the fashionable thing.

A naturalized U.S. citizen from Vietnam who has lived here since 1991, Ton began telling U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents all he knew about his operation, his underlings and drug customers, most of whom are Vietnamese refugees, in hopes of earning some leniency.

Ton yesterday pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia to engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise and other related drug trafficking and money laundering activities.

His public admissions of guilt came several hours after authorities announced that drug charges have been lodged against more than two dozen reputed members of Ton's old network, many of them his top customers.

"The Ton organization is shut down," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan told reporters at a press conference.

Ton and other members of his network had been secretly recorded on wiretaps for six months and followed by DEA agents during the course of a two-year investigation.

The Daily News reported last Nov. 11 that DEA agents had arrested Ton and five codefendants after seizing a shipment of some 55,000 ecstasy pills worth about $1 million on the black market.

Court-authorized wiretaps led to the arrests and seizures, Assistant U.S. Attorney David E. Fritchey said.

Ton has been in jail since his arrest.

Between December 2002 and Nov. 7, 2004, large quantities of drugs were smuggled out of Canada by truck or in secret compartments of cars and vans.

Ton "personally" negotiated prices, recruited workers, supervised drug deliveries, and approved places, including his Folcroft home, where drugs were stashed.

Prosecutors say ecstasy "is a particularly popular drug of abuse at rave clubs" that may cause damage to the central nervous system, including Parkinson's disease.

Bonds: Congress Should Drop Steroids Probe (MERCN)

By Howard Fendrich

The San Jose Mercury News, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - In the nation's capital on his first road trip of 2005, Barry Bonds questioned why Congress, the media and fans continue to talk about steroids.

"I think we have other issues in this country to worry about that are a lot more serious. I think you guys should direct your efforts into taking care of that," the San Francisco Giants slugger said Tuesday before facing the Washington Nationals. "Talk about the athletes that are helping Katrina. Ask yourselves how much money y'all personally donated and have helped."

DOJ_NMG_0007011

Asked whether Congress was wasting time by looking into steroid use in sports, Bonds responded: "Pretty much, I think so. Yeah."

Several congressional committees have held hearings on drug testing in pro sports, and legislation has been proposed to standardize leagues' drug policies.

"You know what? There are still other issues that are more important," Bonds said. "Right now, people are losing lives, don't have homes, I think that's a little more serious. A lot more serious."

Told of Bonds' comments, Dave Marin, a spokesman for House Government Reform Committee chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., said: "Members of Congress, particularly Tom Davis, can walk and chew gum at the same time."

Congressional investigators from that committee are looking into whether Baltimore Orioles slugger Rafael Palmeiro lied under oath about steroid use and are interviewing other players who know Palmeiro.

Bonds has not been contacted.

"Raffy Palmeiro and I are good friends and we will stay continually good friends. Period. And I will always have respect for him as a person and a player, regardless," Bonds said.

Bonds, booed throughout Tuesday's game, hit his 706th homer in the fourth inning.

As the ball arched toward the stands, fans who moments earlier were booing rose to cheer. Bonds was booed when his name was announced during pregame introductions, booed when he stepped into the on-deck circle, and booed when he went out to play left field.

"I've been tarnished for being in baseball for years and years. There's nothing you guys can write or people can say that's going to fix that. It doesn't matter any more. I go out there and enjoy the game," he said.

It was Bonds' third homer of 2005, and it came in his 18th at-bat. Out all season after three knee operations, he returned to the Giants on Sept. 12.

U.N. Reports First Drop In Afghan Opium Cultivation Since Taliban (AP)

Associated Press

AP, September 21, 2005

MOSCOW - The United Nations has recorded the first notable decline in opium cultivation in Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban, but drug production remains high due to favorable weather, the head of the U.N. Drug Control Agency said Tuesday.

Antonio Maria Costa, who on Tuesday presented a new U.N. report on the drug situation in Afghanistan, called the decline "the best drug-related news" since the Taliban ouster in 2001.

He said that opium cultivation nonetheless had more than tripled in some Afghan provinces governed by warlords suspected of involvement in drug trade, and called for their removal.

"Corruption is the wild card, and we have got to remove it from the deck," he said.

Costa also called for greater NATO involvement in fighting drugs, noting that the northwestern Afghan provinces where opium cultivation has grown were places where NATO forces operate.

According to the U.N. report, Afghan opium cultivation dropped by 21 percent in 2005 compared to the previous year, but production dropped only slightly from 4,200 tons in 2004 to 4,100 tons.

Costa said Afghanistan remained the world's largest opium supplier, with 87 percent of the world market coming from Afghanistan. The opium economy makes up 52 percent of Afghanistan's gross domestic product, and 11 million drug addicts worldwide use Afghan heroin, he said.

One-third of the Afghan drug traffic reaches Western markets through the so-called northern route, via the ex-Soviet Central Asia and Russia, and another two-thirds arrives via Pakistan and Iran, he said.

Costa, who met reporters in Moscow alongside Viktor Cherkesov, the head of Russia's Federal Drug Control Service, said that the flow of Afghan heroin seriously aggravated the HIV/AIDS problem in Russia and Ukraine, where drugs are largely taken through injection.

Cherkesov said that in summer his agency recorded a sharp increase in the amount of illegal Afghan drugs coming into Russia.

Colombian Army Discovers Huge Cocaine Lab (NYNSDY/AP)

By Fernando Vergara, Associated Press Writer

New York Newsday, September 21, 2005

MARIPI, Colombia -- Colombian troops raided a sprawling clandestine drug laboratory run by a paramilitary group that was capable of producing 10 tons of cocaine a month, officials said Tuesday.

"This is the biggest cocaine processing factory we've found this year, it contained a large quantity of chemicals used to process the drugs," Gen. Gustavo Matamoros, commander of the army's 5th Division, told The Associated Press.

In a separate operation, the military announced Tuesday that it had seized six tons of marijuana allegedly belonging to the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, the country's main leftist rebel group.

The drugs were discovered Monday wrapped in hundreds of red packages in southwestern Cauca state and later shown to reporters at a military base in the nearby city of Cali.

Workers at the cocaine factory escaped and no arrests were made during the raid Monday in a remote area near the town of Maripi, 50 miles north of Bogota, Matamoros said.

The drug lab, built about four months ago, was concealed under a roof made of sugar cane stalks and plastic sheeting and had enough beds to sleep at least 35 workers.

Matamoros said the lab belonged to paramilitary faction, but did not provide details.

Outlawed paramilitary groups were created two decades ago as a vigilante force to attack leftist rebels that have been waging war on the Colombian government. Both the paramilitaries and leftist rebels use drug trafficking to finance their campaigns.

The paramilitary umbrella group, the United Self Defense Forces of Colombia, or AUC, is involved in a two-year-old peace process, but the organization remains active in illegal activities in various parts of the country.

AP, September 21, 2005

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) - The Oklahoma Tax Commission has asked for federal intervention as the state agency continues to grapple with tribal smoke shops allegedly skirting a new tobacco tax.

The Tax Commission has asked for help from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, according to records obtained through the state Open Records Act.

In a letter dated Aug. 27, the Tax Commission claimed that it "has received reports that the lower-tax-rate smoke shops are selling contraband cigarettes to the higher-tax-rate smoke shops in massive quantities."

In the letter, the Tax Commission said it doesn't have jurisdiction on "trust land" but states that Oklahoma believes the federal authorities could "investigate instances of trafficking of contraband cigarettes on trust land."

The Tax Commission asked ATF for help in March and was denied, records show. The commission asked again in August but has not received a reply.

State Treasurer Scott Meacham said the cigarette tax problem already has cost the state $15 million, with the loss rising by nearly $2 million each succeeding month.

The new tobacco tax took effect Jan. 1.

Tax commissioners broke their silence Sept. 9 on the issue. Commissioner Jerry Johnson said everything is being done that is possible to detect offenders, and the commission is getting "fairly close" to figuring out what wholesalers and tribal shops are doing.

Investigations by the Tulsa World show that numerous smoke shops in the Tulsa area are selling cigarettes carrying 6 cent tax stamps, which are intended for smoke shops next to the state border.

Smoke shop operators allege they are purchasing cigarettes with the cheap stamps from their border stores and reselling them in the Tulsa area.

Tax Commission records reveal that wholesalers may be selling cigarettes to the border stores with the cheap stamps affixed but delivering those cigarettes to non-border stores in Tulsa and elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0007013

"Our problem has arisen because some of the lowest-tax-rate smoke shops are selling cigarettes directly to the highest-tax-rate smoke shops in violation of their compacts," according to a March 18 memo from Tax Commission employee Kay Burkhalter.

"I have also received information that a wholesaler who sells to the tribal smoke shops is invoicing cigarettes to a lowest-tax-rate smoke shop but delivering those cigarettes to higher-tax-rate smoke shops."

Gov. Brad Henry said Sept. 9 that he is working closely with the Tax Commission to see that wholesalers are complying with the law.

"We can crack down, and we will; in fact, we are in the process of doing that."

Johnson confirmed that the Tax Commission is going back 2 1/2 years and auditing unnamed wholesalers' records to see whether there has been an upsurge in sales to some border stores, but the cigarettes are possibly being delivered to non-border stores.

The Tax Commission hopes to have results of its audit by early October, Johnson said.

Meanwhile, Cherokee Nation officials have asked for a 30-day extension to further discuss renegotiating their compact with the state. The extension would delay the beginning of formal arbitration proceedings, said Cherokee Nation spokesman Mike Miller.

Miller said the tribe has also reviewed tax and revenue records of Cherokee smoke shops. Miller said it is against tribal law for smoke shops to funnel cheaper cigarettes to Tulsa-area stores requiring the higher tax stamp.

No Cherokee stores have been accused of this practice.

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- Federal agents raided a neighborhood store in north Charlotte and found about 90 guns and thousands of rounds of ammunition.

A little boy and several small children come in and out of L.K. Farrar's Self-Serve Market in north Charlotte several times a week.

Neighbors said in their neighborhood, they need it for protection

"Man needs to carry a gun in a store because you don't know who is going to rob you," said one neighbor.

Just a few days ago, police and federal agents served a search warrant there -- seizing nearly 60 handguns and more than 30 shotguns and rifles and thousands of rounds of ammunition.

Kiki Gooden said she's been shopping there since she was a little girl.

"I ain't never seen no guns like that. I don't think they'll be showing stuff like that in there," she said.

He is a convicted felon who was arrested in May for possession of a firearm by a felon.

An undercover ATF agent asked for the warrant after visiting the store and seeing Farrar wearing a chrome pistol on his side with a shotgun sitting in a nearby refrigerator.

"I saw all the police come in with their guns drawn and stuff. I didn't know what that was about," said a local resident Curly Wilson.

IMMIGRATION:

DHS Lets Go 'Other' Illegals (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

The Department of Homeland Security, facing a flood of illegal aliens from countries other than Mexico, has increased efforts to remove non-Mexican foreign nationals now being released back onto the streets of America because of a lack of detention space.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has ordered that expedited removal proceedings for non-Mexican foreign nationals caught illegally entering the United States be expanded from three to all nine U.S. Border Patrol sectors along the Southwest border.

Mexican nationals caught in the United States illegally are bused back within a few hours, but illegals known as "other than Mexican," or OTMs, must be flown to their home countries, a process that often takes months.

The new process is aimed at reducing the number of OTMs who have spent less than 14 days in the United States and who are apprehended within 100 miles of the border.

"The use of this authority will allow DHS the ability to gain greater control of our borders and to protect our country against the terrorist threat," Mr. Chertoff said.

Nearly 70 percent, or 68,000, of the more than 98,000 OTMs detained so far this year were released almost immediately because of the government's inability to return them to their home country and a lack of detention facilities to hold them while here, federal authorities said.

Federal law-enforcement authorities said thousands of foreign nationals, including a rising number of Brazilians facing high unemployment at home and having access to a growing number of sophisticated alien smuggling rings, are coming into the United States to seek work -- then surrendering to authorities after they cross the border because of this country's inability to detain or deport them.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar recently told a Senate subcommittee that agents in Texas alone are experiencing a near-threefold increase in the number of OTMs, and there is no place to put them.

"We interdict them, process them and then hand them off," Chief Aguilar said, noting that detention is the responsibility of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), and not his agency. He called the "exponential growth" in the number of OTMs and their subsequent release "a major source of clogging and friction for the removal process."

Chief Aguilar told the subcommittee that because of a lack of intelligence data, some OTMs released may have been criminals.

The OTMs detained are sent to detention centers, where they are released if they do not have a felony conviction or pose no national security threat. Given a "notice to appear" at a future immigration hearing, only about 13 percent ever show.

Since Sept. 30, nearly 25,000 Brazilian nationals have been detained at the border, mostly in Texas and Arizona. ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said the agency is working with Brazilian authorities to identify and disrupt alien smuggling operations, noting that last week, the two countries arrested 48 persons linked to a Brazil-based smuggling ring -- including corrupt Brazilian police and customs officers, and airline employees.

Levin Threatens To Block Homeland Nominee (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 21, 2005

A Democratic senator threatened Tuesday to block approval of a Homeland Security Department nominee until he receives a secret FBI memo about terror suspect interrogations that he's been seeking for months.

The threat against Julie L. Myers, tapped to head the department's bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, came amid lawmakers' concerns that she lacked the experience to head the federal government's second-largest investigative force.

Asked if he planned to use legislative delaying tactics against Myers nomination, Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record), D-Mich., said: "Oh yeah. If we don't get the documents, sure."

At issue is a heavily edited May 2004 e-mail from FBI agents seeking guidance about questioning terror suspects held at Guantanamo Bay.

DOJ_NMG_0007015

In February, Democratic senators began asking for an unedited version of the memo to see if it mentioned or involved Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who headed the Justice Department's criminal division from 2001 to 2003. The Justice Department denied the request, saying the memos contain "information covered by the Privacy Act," and had nothing to do with Chertoff.

Myers was Chertoff's chief of staff at the time, said Levin, who also delayed Chertoff's nomination in February for a week to protest being denied the names of people who sent and received the e-mail. Jim Pasco, executive director of the National Fraternal Order of Police, said Levin's tactic holds "the safety of the American public hostage to the pursuit of a political agenda."

The White House on Tuesday expressed support for Myers.

"Julie Myers is well-respected within the law enforcement community and highly qualified to lead the Immigration and Customs Enforcement," said White House spokeswoman Erin Healy. "We will work with the Senate to ensure her confirmation."

Questions by senators last week about whether Myers has enough experience for the ICE post came on the heels of former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown's resignation after widespread criticism that he had little previous emergency management experience. Myers is a former Treasury official and assistant U.S. attorney.

Bush To Press Congress For Guest-Worker Program, Tancredo Says (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, September 21, 2005

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush will push this year for legislation overhauling immigration laws, including creating a new guest-worker program, said U.S. Representative Tom Tancredo, chairman of the House Immigration Reform Caucus.

The Bush administration has met with Republican lawmakers to press the issue and will likely urge party leaders such as House Speaker Dennis Hastert to hold votes on immigration measures before the end of the congressional session, Tancredo said.

``Certainly there will be a tremendous amount of pressure to do something before Thanksgiving," Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who opposes Bush's guest-worker plan, said in an interview. ``The president wants it. They're not going to tell him no."

Bush has made an overhaul of immigration laws, including a new program to allow immigrants to temporarily work in the U.S., a priority for his second term. The legislative fight on the issue is likely to split Republicans, Tancredo said.

``It will be a terribly divisive thing in the party," he said. Tancredo said he opposes any guest-worker program that allows those in the U.S. illegally to stay and would delay any such program until the borders are deemed secure.

White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove met with House Republicans last week to reiterate the administration's desire to pass a comprehensive bill this year.

``It was very encouraging," Arizona Republican Jeff Flake, an attendee at the meeting, said in an interview. ``I don't think it's a sure thing. I think it's likely. And it's more likely than most people thought."

Comprehensive

Flake said the administration will push for comprehensive legislation that includes border security, workplace enforcement and a new guest-worker program. Tancredo said two measures introduced in the Senate creating a guest-worker program would face opposition in the House.

Legislation in the Senate backed by Massachusetts Democrat Ted Kennedy and Arizona Republican John McCain would let undocumented immigrants work legally in the country after paying a fine. A competing measure sponsored by Republicans John Cornyn of Texas and Jon Kyl of Arizona creates a guest-worker program that requires undocumented immigrants to return home before applying to work in the U.S. legally.

Proposals put forward by Rove last week closely tracked the Kennedy/McCain measure, said Flake, who has introduced the legislation in the House.

`Hell of a Battle'

``It's going to be one hell of a battle," Tancredo said.

DOJ_NMG_0007016

It's ``possible" the measure backed by Cornyn and Kyl could garner support from a majority of Republicans in the House, while the McCain/Kennedy bill could not, he said.

The Kyl/Cornyn bill, he said ``certainly has a better chance than McCain. I think that one is DOA," for dead on arrival.

Flake said there is limited House support for Tancredo's immigration position.

``The Tancredo caucus, in terms of wanting the Tancredo approach, is pretty small,'' Flake said.

Tancredo also said the U.S. Congress should delay a prescription drug benefit for seniors enrolled in Medicare as a way to offset relief costs for Hurricane Katrina.

``That would save significant dollars," Tancredo said.

The benefit is scheduled to begin in January. He said lawmakers also should consider reducing farm subsidies and selling off federal land to offset costs for Katrina, which hit Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi on Aug. 29. Other lawmakers, including McCain, also have called for delaying or canceling the prescription drug benefit.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan indicated yesterday that the administration would oppose delaying the drug benefit.

``It's important to move forward, and we are" with the prescription drug plan, McClellan said at a news briefing.

Payments To IRS Lost In Accident: Check's In The Bay (WSJ)

By Joi Preciphs

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A highway accident caused some 30,000 quarterly estimated-tax payments to the Internal Revenue Service to be dumped into San Francisco Bay, but IRS officials say affected taxpayers will suffer no collateral damage.

A truck carrying about 45,000 forms and tax payments overturned on the San Mateo Bridge on Sept. 11. IRS officials said that the checks, due Sept. 15, were being transported from a post office to an IRS lockbox. No related information about the incident has been posted on the IRS's Web site, www.irs.gov.

IRS spokesman John Lipold said the agency will issue a formal statement once its investigation is complete. He said the agency will waive all interest and penalties for taxpayers who discover that their payments failed to arrive.

"We're going to work with people on good faith," Mr. Lipold said. However, the IRS is asking those who paid estimated taxes in the affected states to wait until Sept. 30 before contacting the agency on its national information line, 1-800-829-1040, to determine the status of their payments. By then, he said most of the checks that were retrieved by the agency will have cleared.

Payments from the following states were affected: Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Ohio, Oregon, Virginia, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Top Democrat Says He'll Vote No On Roberts (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said Tuesday that he would oppose the confirmation of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice, surprising both the White House and fellow Democrats still conflicted about how to vote.

In becoming the first Democrat to declare formally how he intended to vote, Mr. Reid may have made it more difficult for fellow Democrats to support Judge Roberts. Many Senate observers expected Mr. Reid, who comes from a Republican-leaning state and is opposed to abortion, to support Judge Roberts.

And the Democratic leader himself said Tuesday that he had earlier given the White House a list of nominees who would be objectionable and that Judge Roberts was not on it.

In announcing his decision in a lengthy speech on the Senate floor, Mr. Reid questioned Judge Roberts's commitment to civil rights and said he was "very swayed" by the civil rights and women's rights leaders who testified Thursday in opposition to the nomination - and with whom Mr. Reid met privately that same day. Liberal advocacy groups, who raise millions of dollars to support Democratic candidates and who have been putting intense pressure on Democrats to oppose the nomination, were elated.

With the White House considering how to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy, Mr. Reid could be using his vote on Judge Roberts to send a message to President Bush to fill that position with a moderate, in the mold of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a critical swing vote, who is retiring. Along with three other senior senators, Mr. Reid is expected to meet Mr. Bush for breakfast Wednesday to discuss the vacancy.

Explaining his decision on Judge Roberts, Mr. Reid said in his Senate speech that he simply had "too many unanswered questions" about the nominee, who he complained had refused to distance himself from seemingly callous writings while a lawyer for the Reagan administration, including a memorandum in which he used the term "illegal amigos" to refer to illegal immigrants.

"I'm not too sure," Mr. Reid later told reporters, "if his heart is as big as his head."

How much influence Mr. Reid will have over his fellow Democrats is unclear; he has said repeatedly that each senator is free to vote his conscience on the nomination, and several Democrats, including those on the Judiciary Committee, said Tuesday that they were still torn.

One centrist Democrat, Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, said Tuesday that he had "not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" confirmation of Judge Roberts to be the nation's 17th chief justice.

Last Thursday, as Mr. Reid was weighing his decision, representatives of about 40 advocacy groups met with him in the Capitol; the reason, they said, was to underscore the threat they believe Judge Roberts poses to Democrats' core causes, racial and gender equality. Hovering in the background was a political argument, that if Democrats vote in favor of Judge Roberts, they will be held liable by voters for the decisions he makes on the court.

"He got the message loud and clear, didn't he?" Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, said of Mr. Reid on Tuesday.

One of the most memorable presentations, those in attendance said, came from Theodore M. Shaw, general counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, who told Mr. Reid that his group rarely took a position on nominations.

"We appear before the Supreme Court - who in their right mind would want to poke their finger in the eye of the next chief justice?" Mr. Shaw recalled saying. But, he added, "Based on what we know, this is not a nominee that we can let go by unopposed."

Those who attended the meeting said they came away not knowing what Mr. Reid would decide.

"He listened carefully, he listened thoughtfully," said Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Council on Civil Rights and an organizer of the session. "He did not respond to challenges or views that were presented. I do think he felt this should be a vote of conscience and I think in the end he voted his conscience, and I think at the end of the day that speaks volumes about his leadership."

Mr. Reid and his Republican counterpart, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, have been invited to meet with President Bush on Wednesday morning to discuss the second vacancy. The Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, and the committee's senior Democrat, Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, have also been invited.

With a vote in committee scheduled for Thursday, the eight Democrats on the judiciary panel met Tuesday to discuss the nomination. They emerged tight-lipped, saying they wanted to speak to the entire Democratic caucus before announcing their votes. Several, including Mr. Leahy, said they had not yet reached a decision.

"I'm close," Mr. Leahy said. Asked if he would know by the end of the day, he said, "I may. You won't."

By day's end, only one of the panel's eight Democratic members, Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, had announced his position. As expected, he will vote no.

"This is really a leap of faith, isn't it?" Mr. Kennedy told reporters. "I mean, I think there are those that took the leap in terms of the war, there were those that took the leap in terms of taxes and now they're being invited to take the leap again in terms of Judge Roberts, and" - here, Mr. Kennedy paused for effect - "I don't think I'm going to be among them."

The White House reacted coolly to Mr. Reid's announcement. A spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said it departed from Senate tradition in which members have "based their decisions on the qualifications of the nominee, not on whether or not the person doing the nominating was in their same party."

Mr. Reid said there was no single reason he decided to vote against the nomination, and in his speech he described the decision as "a very close question." But he made plain that an important factor was the White House's refusal to release legal memorandums written by Judge Roberts when he was deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration. "The administration cannot treat the Senate with such disrespect without some consequences," he said.

The records issues is a matter of principle to many Democrats. Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado and a member of the so-called Gang of 14 who struck a bipartisan compromise to avoid a showdown over President Bush's judicial nominees, said Tuesday that he had recently called Harriet Miers, the White House counsel, to tell her that disclosing the documents could make the difference in his vote and that of his colleagues.

"I think it is the right of the American people to get that information," Mr. Salazar said. "She said she would consider my request. I don't think they are going to do it."

While Mr. Reid said the records fight does not warrant a filibuster, the parliamentary tactic Democrats have used to block other judicial nominees, he suggested he might not be inclined to avoid that fight with the next nominee. He said he planned to present Mr. Bush with a list of acceptable candidates on Wednesday and said Democrats would consider it "a real poke in the eye with a sharp stick" if Mr. Bush were to name any one of 10 federal appeals court judges who had been blocked by filibuster in the past, including some who are on President Bush's short list as Supreme Court candidates.

Asked if that would warrant a filibuster, Mr. Reid said, "That would warrant my being real upset."

Reid 'No' Vote On Roberts Could Be Dem Green Light (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 21, 2005

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) declared yesterday that he will vote against chief-justice nominee John Roberts and pointedly warned President Bush about his next choice for the Supreme Court in anticipation of today's White House meeting to discuss it.

Reid had asked Senate Democrats to avoid openly discussing their position on Roberts until he came to a decision, which he announced on the Senate floor. He later called the decision to oppose Roberts "not easy, but not the most difficult" of his tenure in the Senate.

Reid's no vote could serve as a green light for swing votes in the caucus to oppose Roberts, although Reid repeatedly stressed that senators would vote their conscience.

Ralph Neas, head of the liberal People for the American Way, said, "On the merits, it's very important that there be significant opposition" to Roberts.

"If there is a significant number opposed, that could have an impact on who the president would nominate for the second vacancy," Neas said.

The minority leader is opposed to abortion rights, which agrees with Roberts's personal views on the issue, and many from the Hill to K Street had predicted Reid would eventually support Roberts.

"I'm not too sure if his heart is as big as his head," Reid said of Roberts, echoing recent statements from several Senate Judiciary Democrats during the three days of questioning. "In the years to come, the decades to come, my vision of what kind of judge he will be will be proven."

Asked to explain his comments about Roberts's heart, Reid mentioned the nominee's description of illegal immigrants as "illegal amigos" in a memo from 1983. Reid also concurred with the conclusion of many in Congress that Roberts will eventually be confirmed.

"There was never any doubt," he acknowledged.

Reid will meet with Bush today to discuss possible replacements for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee have also been invited to the White House consultation.

Reid also issued a stern warning to Bush about appointing any judge Democrats have opposed in the past.

"One thing I think would be a poke in the eye with a sharp stick" on the part of the president, Reid said, would be "to give us one of the 10 we've opposed before."

Reid was referring to the 10 appellate-court nominees previously filibustered by Democrats, two of whom — Judges Priscilla Owen and Janice Rogers Brown — have shown up on lists of potential nominees for O'Connor's seat.

Reid declined to tip his hand on any nominations he would suggest to the president. But when reporters asked whether he would deem Attorney General Alberto Gonzales unacceptable, Reid quietly answered no, then backpedaled and declined to answer.

"The president would be making a terrible mistake" in nominating Owen or Brown, Reid said, without saying outright whether it would presage a Democratic filibuster.

Reid referred to his desire for Senate Democrats to vote their conscience on Roberts, though he implied that there would be no such leeway should the president's second nominee be more controversial than the first. O'Connor's offer to continue serving on the court until her replacement is confirmed, Reid said, means the president can take his time consulting with senators from both parties before selecting the second nominee.

"[Bush] should understand, there is no vacancy on that court," Reid said. "This court could go on for next year or the year after as it's now constituted."

Moreover, Reid added, the Senate's already crowded calendar would be heavily burdened by the need to confirm a second nominee before the year's end. Leaders of both houses have already discussed keeping lawmakers in session until Thanksgiving or beyond to pass separate appropriations bills, budget reconciliation and more relief for hurricane victims.

"The appropriations process has been a complete flop," Reid said. "I would think you'd want to get a little legislating done."

Before Roberts's confirmation hearing began Sept. 12, Democrats had called on the White House to release a block of memos Roberts wrote while serving as deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration. The White House withheld the memos because of concerns that disclosure would prevent an open exchange of views by future presidential advisers, a decision that Reid said left him "gravely disappointed."

Even before Reid's announcement, centrist Senate Democrats began to hint that they would vote to confirm.

"I can't imagine anything that would come about that would cause me not to vote for him," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), adding that he had spoken to the White House as recently as yesterday about the next nominee.

Still, other Democratic senators said they would not indicate publicly how they will vote until after the committee finishes its deliberations.

"Everybody's going to vote their conscience on this one," said Sen. Carl Levin (Mich.).

"People are very mindful that there will be a second nominee," he said.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), another Gang of 14 member, said senators were aware of the circumstances.

Reid said he felt no pressure from within the caucus to consider filibustering Roberts but recalled that Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean had called him to urge strong and public opposition.

Reid said he told Dean, "Governor, you've got to do what you think is right." As for liberal advocacy groups that have worked to foment resistance to Roberts, Reid said, many are "really hard to satisfy."

Democratic Leader Says He Will Vote Against Roberts (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Citing concerns that "his heart is not as big as his head," Minority Leader Harry Reid, the Senate's top Democrat, announced today that he would vote against John G. Roberts Jr., President Bush's choice to serve as the next chief justice of the United States.

Reid was the first Democrat to formally state his position on Roberts' nomination. But Reid, of Nevada, insisted that his decision should not be seen as a party position and other Democrats should vote as they see fit.

However, because Reid is a centrist Democrat who opposes abortion, his opposition was seen as a signal that many, and perhaps most Democrats, were likely to come out against the 50-year-old appeals court judge.

"No one disputes his academic prowess, his mental power. He's a very smart man," Reid told reporters, explaining his decision. "But through all this I came to the realization that I'm not too sure his heart is as big as his head."

Roberts faces two Senate votes — one by the Judiciary Committee on Thursday, and one on the floor of the Senate next week. With Republicans in the majority, Democrats have only one tool to stop a nomination, the filibuster, but they have indicated that they will not use it to halt this nomination.

Reid acknowledged that Roberts would be confirmed no matter how many Democrats voted against him.

"The question is close, and the arguments against him do not warrant extraordinary procedural tactics to block the nomination," Reid said on the floor of the Senate, referring to the filibuster. "Nonetheless, I intend to cast my vote against this nominee."

Reid was to meet Wednesday morning with Bush, with other Democratic and Republican leaders, to discuss the upcoming appointment to fill the second vacancy on the Supreme Court.

Some Democrats said the White House should see Reid's opposition as a message that Democrats would not capitulate if they considered the president's next pick for the court unacceptable.

"At the end of the day, the president should know if he sends someone who is an ideologue or somebody who is an extremist right winger, that person is going to have a very, very difficult time getting through the Senate," said Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), one of the seven Democrats who joined with seven Republicans this year to preserve the minority party's right to filibuster judicial nominees. "I think you'll find unity among the Democratic caucus in opposing someone like that."

The White House expressed disappointment with Reid's decision.

"In confirming recent nominees like [Ruth Bader] Ginsberg, [Stephen] Breyer and [Antonin] Scalia, senators based their decisions on the qualifications of the nominee, not on whether or not the person doing the nominating was in their same party," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "The public does not want to see the Supreme Court become an extension of partisan politics."

Senate Democratic Leader Opposes Roberts (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 21, 2005

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said on Tuesday John Roberts would be confirmed as chief justice of the United States but that he would oppose the conservative Supreme Court nominee because "I'm not too sure if his heart is as big as his head."

"I have too many unanswered questions about the nominee to justify a vote confirming him to this enormously important lifetime position," Reid said of President George W. Bush's first nomination to the high court.

"This is a very close question for me," Reid added. "But I must resolve my doubts in favor of the American people whose rights would be in jeopardy if John Roberts turns out to be the wrong person for the job."

Reid, however, said the case against Roberts did not warrant Democrats raising a procedural hurdle known as a filibuster to block Roberts' nomination when it comes up for a vote in the U.S. Senate next week. It seemed likely Reid would be unable to muster the needed 41 votes in the 100-member Senate to sustain it in any event.

Democrats and Republicans have predicted Roberts will win bipartisan confirmation and be sworn in before the high court begins its new term on October 3.

DOJ_NMG_0007021

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, responding to Reid's comments, said, "Judge Roberts is clearly qualified in terms of intellect, ethics and temperament. ... The public does not want to see the Supreme Court become an extension of partisan politics."

"He is going to be confirmed," Reid told reporters after his Senate speech. Reid said Roberts is a smart man, but "I'm not too sure if his heart is as big as his head."

Members of both parties have praised the credentials of Roberts, a federal appeals court judge the past two years who received the American Bar Association's top rating for a seat on the Supreme Court.

But major liberal groups, along with a number of Senate Democrats, have raised concerns about Roberts' commitment to civil rights and women's rights, based largely on memos he wrote two decades ago in the conservative Reagan administration.

Noting Roberts wrote to oppose legislative and judicial efforts to remedy race and gender discrimination, Reid said he was prepared to dismiss the writings as "the folly of youth" and expected Roberts to repudiate them "in some fashion."

"Instead, the nominee adopted what I consider a disingenuous strategy of suggesting that the views expressed in the memos were not his views, even at the time the memos were written," Reid said.

At Roberts' hearing last week, Democrats complained that Roberts refused to respond to many questions about specific legal issues, from abortion to right-to-die legislative efforts. Roberts said he did not want to prejudge cases that could come before him on the nation's highest court.

Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record), a North Dakota Democrat, has predicted that upwards of one-half of the 45-member Senate Democratic caucus would vote to confirm Roberts.

But other Senate Democrats said on Tuesday that caucus support for Roberts may shrink as a result of Reid's decision to oppose him. "I think we may get as many as 30 votes against him," a Democratic aide said.

If confirmed. Roberts would succeed the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist and be positioned to lead the federal judiciary for decades, shaping the American way of life on matters from voters rights to gay rights.

Reid was to meet at the White House with Bush on Wednesday about the president's pending Supreme Court nomination to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. A bigger fight is expected over this nominee since O'Connor was often the swing vote on the nine-member court.

Roberts Poses Calculus Test For Democrats (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Chief Justice nominee John Roberts is all but certain to be approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee Wednesday and the full Senate next week. But the vote involves a host of political calculations for Democrats struggling to satisfy their liberal base and reach out to moderate voters.

"I literally have not made up my mind. I really don't want to talk about it anymore," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Calif.) said Tuesday in the Capitol as she backed away from a crowd of reporters into an elevator.

For President Bush, whose approval rating has dropped in recent polls, the vote tallies also matter as he moves to fill a second vacancy on the Supreme Court. Many Democratic votes against Judge Roberts -- who is widely seen as conservative but has kept his political leanings to himself -- would suggest a tougher fight against a nominee with a clear stance against abortion rights. But that is just what the president's base is demanding.

Mr. Bush meets at the White House this morning with Senate leaders to discuss how to proceed in picking a successor for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Among the group will be Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who Tuesday took to the Senate floor to announce his opposition to Judge Roberts. "This is a very close question for me," Mr. Reid said in his speech. "But I must resolve my doubts in favor of the American people whose rights would be in jeopardy if John Roberts turns out to be the wrong person for the job."

Judge Roberts's intellectual strength is obvious, Mr. Reid said later, but the senator wasn't "too sure if his heart was as big as his head."

Yet earlier in the day, at the Senate Democrats' weekly caucus lunch, Mr. Reid made clear that his fellow partisans were free to follow their own consciences on the matter, a move that he said will likely lead to "plenty of votes" for the nominee, who is currently on the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. "You can only go to the well so many times," Mr. Reid told reporters. "This just wasn't one of the times I wanted to."

New York Sen. Charles Schumer has told colleagues that Judge Roberts overall acquitted himself well before the committee. But a yes vote could undermine Mr. Schumer's ability to raise money from anti-Roberts donors for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which he now heads. When asked Tuesday if he had made up his mind, Mr. Schumer answered, "Nope."

Similar battles are bedeviling Democrats not on the committee. Some moderates, such as Florida's Sen. Bill Nelson and Nebraska's Ben Nelson, face re-election next year in Republican-leaning states and are eager to pocket some centrist credentials by voting for Judge Roberts. Mr. Nelson of Nebraska said Tuesday he has "not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" the nominee. Another red-state Democrat, Max Baucus of Montana, said, "I'm inclined to vote for him."

By backing Judge Roberts, some Democrats argue, the party will have more credibility if it takes on the president's nominee for Justice O'Connor's seat, one that arguably is more important because she has played a critical role in rulings on issues such as affirmative action and abortion rights.

"It makes the case that they are mindless obstructionists much weaker," says Ross K. Baker, a professor of political science at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

But liberal activists are near unanimous in opposing Judge Roberts, who they say echoed the pre-appointment positioning of conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. They are pressing Democrats to vote against Judge Roberts to send a message about the party's priorities. Those arguments likely will weigh heavily on Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, who both have presidential ambitions and are trying to juggle the left-leaning voters in the party's primaries with general-election voters, who might favor a more centrist approach. "I have not" decided, Sen. Clinton said Tuesday.

Whatever the Democrats decide, they should do so based on their own political calculations, because it is unlikely to sway the White House's thinking, says David Gergen, a former adviser to four presidents. If they oppose Judge Roberts, the White House will conclude "there's no way to please them, so why even consider sending a moderate," Mr. Gergen said. If they vote for him, White House advisers could argue "those guys are patsies. We can roll over them."

The politics of the next high-court appointment are complicated by President Bush's decision to switch Judge Roberts's nomination from the O'Connor seat to that held by Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died of thyroid cancer earlier this month. Democrats had signaled that filling the Rehnquist seat with another conservative wouldn't spark a major fight, since it wouldn't tip the court's balance significantly. The O'Connor seat is another matter, and Democrats vow to give that nominee closer scrutiny, because that justice could represent a swing vote on the landmark abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade. That also is why social conservatives have stepped up their lobbying of the White House.

People familiar with the administration's efforts say the White House is scouring the federal-court benches for a female judge who could hold up under committee questioning. These people also say the administration is looking for a nominee whose record is conservative enough to appeal to the party base but not so sharp as to give ammunition to Democrats, who note that public polls show that most Americans don't want to see Roe v. Wade overturned.

White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card has been calling senators seeking recommendations. Mr. Reid said that at this morning's meeting, he will urge the president not to rush the next nomination, so that the Senate can work on other matters. He also warned that not all confirmations "are going to be easy like this one" -- referring to Judge Roberts -- and that he would consider it a "sharp poke in the eye" if the president sent up the name of a judge whose nomination had been the target of a Democratic filibuster.

That caution would rule out such candidates as Fifth Circuit Judge Priscilla Owen and D.C. Circuit Judge Janice Rogers Brown, who secured their court seats this spring after a bipartisan Senate compromise. Among the names circulating are Fourth Circuit Judge Karen Williams, Ninth Circuit Judge Consuelo M. Callahan and Fifth Circuit Judge Alice M. Batchelder.

Many Bush associates think the president is determined to pick his friend and loyal aide, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. But some conservatives would be cool to that choice, saying Mr. Gonzales isn't sufficiently opposed to affirmative action and abortion rights.

Scott Reed, who ran Republican Bob Dole's 1996 presidential bid, says Mr. Bush's weak position leaves him few options. "Bush has got to go right on this choice or his base will totally implode," Mr. Reed says.

Reid Will Oppose Roberts For Chief Justice (WP)

By Charles Babington And Dan Balz

The Senate Democratic leader, pressed by several allies to build as much opposition as possible to Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr., said yesterday he will vote against President Bush's choice for chief justice. But Sen. Harry M. Reid of Nevada conceded that Roberts will be confirmed easily next week and "will get plenty of votes" from his fellow Democrats.

Reid's announcement, made in a closed party caucus luncheon and then a Senate speech, came as Democratic senators are struggling with the first chief justice confirmation in 19 years. Many party activists want them to show as much solidarity against Roberts as they can muster. Not only does Roberts's conservative philosophy deserve it, they argue, but it also would serve as a warning to Bush that Democrats will fight vigorously if Bush names someone even further to the right to succeed centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor this fall.

An opposing strategy, which Senate insiders described as less persuasive, argues that the party should show a willingness to accept Roberts while saving energy for an all-out battle in case Bush's next nominee is notably more conservative. Reid, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and two other senators will meet with the president today to begin discussing how to replace O'Connor.

Reid said he decided to oppose Roberts because the nominee withheld too much information from senators and because government memos he wrote in the 1980s raised troubling questions about his views, especially on civil rights.

"I was prepared to look past these memos, and chalk them up to the folly of youth," Reid said in his speech. But in last week's Judiciary Committee hearing, he said, Roberts adopted "what I consider a disingenuous strategy of suggesting that the views expressed in those memos were not his views. . . . We should only vote to confirm this nominee if we are absolutely positive that he is the right person" for a lifetime appointment on the nation's highest court.

Reid, an antiabortion lawmaker from a state that Bush carried in 2000 and 2004, said he made clear to colleagues that he was speaking as an individual, not as a minority leader trying to steer his caucus. "This is something people have to vote their conscience on," he told reporters.

Roberts's confirmation is a foregone conclusion in the Senate, where Republicans hold 55 of the 100 seats. The only question is how many Democrats will support him, and what political signal it will send. Party liberals hope no more than 15 Democrats, mostly from states Bush carried, will vote yes. That would result in a 70 to 30 confirmation vote. But Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) recently told reporters: "I think he can get from 75 to 80 votes."

Members of both parties said partisanship and interest-group politics have sharpened over the past decade to the point that a unanimous Supreme Court confirmation vote -- such as the one Justice Antonin Scalia received in 1986 -- is a thing of the past.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will vote tomorrow on recommending Roberts's confirmation, and most of the eight Democratic members appeared torn after meeting privately yesterday morning. The only member who has clearly signaled that he plans to oppose Roberts is Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

The committee's ranking Democrat, Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), said Sunday he had drafted a "for" speech and an "against" speech. Aides yesterday said it was unclear which he will deliver today on the Senate floor.

Some Democratic activists said the party risks alienating its contributors by not uniting against Roberts. "Many, many people in the donor base are feeling discouraged and want to see the Democrats fight back," said Ellen Malcolm, president of Emily's List. "If they see Democrats falling in line with Republicans, they're going to say, 'There's no need for me to support them.' "

Malcolm said prospective 2008 presidential candidates face the wrath of party activists if they support Roberts, and then he and the majority of the court rule against abortion rights.

Perhaps no Democrat is being watched more closely than Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), who has been trying to emphasize her centrist credentials. When asked for her thoughts on Roberts yesterday, she playfully mimed with nods, shrugs and an enigmatic smile.

Both of her husband's high court nominees -- Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer -- won strong Republican support. But on Sunday, former president Bill Clinton drew a clear distinction between those battles and the fight over Roberts's nomination, suggesting reasons Democrats might oppose Roberts that may provide cover to his wife.

The former president said there were no partisan disputes over the withholding of documents in the case of his nominees, as there have been with Roberts. He also noted that, with two vacancies to fill, Bush has the ability to shift the balance on the court and that without knowing who his second choice is, Democrats may be more cautious about backing Roberts.

"The only question is whether the Senate has an extra burden here because it's likely to have a significant impact on the balance of court decisions, depending on who the next nominee is," Clinton said on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday. "I think if President Bush nominated a clear moderate before the vote happened in the Roberts case, he would sail through."

With no suspense but the final vote count left in the Roberts contest, senators from both parties are focused on Bush's next nomination. Reid said Democrats will consider it "a sharp poke in the eye" if Bush taps any of the 10 appellate court nominees who were blocked -- permanently or temporarily -- by Democratic-led filibusters in Bush's first term. That would include Judges Priscilla R. Owen and Janice Rogers Brown, who have been mentioned as possible nominees.

Would he try another filibuster? a reporter asked. "I'm just saying I would be terribly upset," Reid replied.

Reid: Roberts Will Join Court (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 21, 2005

Despite announcing his own opposition to confirmation, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) declared Tuesday that Judge John Roberts would be approved as chief justice of the United States, ending any suspense to the surprisingly smooth nomination process for President Bush's first Supreme Court choice.

While he said too many "unanswered questions" remained about the nominee for Roberts to win his vote, Reid told reporters that he specifically instructed his Caucus to vote their "conscience." He also said flatly that there would be no filibuster of the Roberts nomination.

"He's going to be confirmed, that's never been in doubt," Reid told reporters in a briefing after delivering his floor statement opposing Roberts.

Reid's pronouncements provided a mixed bag of results to liberal activists who have been trying to ratchet up pressure on Democrats to oppose Bush's first selection for the Supreme Court. While Reid's opposition leaves open the possibility that the new chief justice will carry the stigma of an unusually high number of 'no' votes — seven of the eight current justices received 87 or more votes — there is now little internal pressure on Democrats to reject the nominee.

"There are things that I ask the Caucus to follow, this isn't one of them," Reid said, adding later, "You can only go to the well so many times."

However, on the eve of his meeting today with Bush regarding the pick to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Reid signaled Bush would face a far stronger fight if he picked any of those nominees previously filibustered by Democrats in the 108th Congress — a potentially bad omen for lawyer Miguel Estrada and federal appellate Judges Priscilla Owens and Janice Rogers Brown, all of whom have been mentioned as potential nominees.

"I just think the president would be making a terrible mistake," Reid said when asked about the possibility of nominating previously filibustered candidates.

Mindful that he was disappointing many of the liberal activist groups, Reid suggested those organizations would never be satisfied with the level of fight that Democrats put up against Roberts.

"A lot of these special-interest groups are very hard to satisfy," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0007025

This after two of Reid's top lieutenants, Sens. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), received a sharp rebuke at a weekend meeting in Los Angeles from wealthy activists such as television producer Norman Lear over Roberts' glide path to confirmation.

At an event on behalf of People For the American Way, the first of the major liberal groups to announce opposition to Roberts, Lear lashed out at the Democrats for not mounting more determined resistance to the nomination, according to several sources familiar with the event.

Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, confirmed that the event included a "frank discussion" between activists and the Senators. He added that Lear, founder of PFAW, did not hear what he wanted from either he or Durbin, the Minority Whip.

"We gave the pros and cons," Schumer recounted of their discussion about Roberts. "They wanted us to come out against."

Schumer and Durbin are both on the Judiciary Committee and were among the most aggressive questioners of Roberts at last week's nomination hearings. But each Senator remains publicly undeclared on Roberts, despite voting against his nomination to U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in 2003.

Durbin declined to talk about the discussion with Lear.

"I'm not going to get into it," he said Tuesday.

Ralph Neas, PFAW's president, likewise declined to comment on the meeting, which was ostensibly a celebration of the group's new West Coast director, Jeff Berman, a former counsel to Schumer. "When it comes to meetings with Senators, I'm very close-mouthed," said Neas, who was not on hand for the meeting but acknowledged he was aware of the exchange.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), also a member of the Democratic leadership, was on hand at the PFAW event and also declined to discuss the matter, calling the gathering a "legislative update" for the group's members on the West Coast.

Reid, who has been requesting that no one in his Caucus announce his or her position on Roberts, said he thought it was important that he make his decision first as leader — a post he's now held for little more than eight months.

"I wanted to be the first to make a decision," he said when asked if he had a "special obligation" to oppose the nominee because of his position.

"I wanted this to be my decision," he added.

Most Democrats are holding to Reid's mantra of waiting until the Judiciary Committee makes its formal recommendation on the nomination. It is a given that will occur Thursday when Roberts will be sent to the floor with a positive vote.

But enough Democrats, particularly those in conservative-leaning states, have sent signals that they will approve the nominee so there is little drama to the final stage of this fight beyond the expectations game involving how many votes Roberts will receive.

Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), who along with Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) has been an outspoken backer of Roberts, reiterated his support again Tuesday.

"I've not seen anything that would cause me to vote against [Roberts] at this time. ... And I don't expect anything to come out of the woodwork," he said.

Top Senate Dem Opposes Roberts' Bid (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said Tuesday that he will vote against Supreme Court nominee John Roberts but will not press other Democratic senators to follow his lead.

The Nevada senator predicted Roberts will be confirmed next week as the nation's 17th chief justice, succeeding the late William Rehnquist.

Reid also urged President Bush to hold off on naming a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. He said he would view the nomination of federal judges Priscilla Owen or Janice Rogers Brown, who have been mentioned as possible replacements for O'Connor's seat, as "a real poke in the eye with a sharp stick" and hinted that it could provoke a Democratic filibuster. The Senate confirmed Owen and Brown this year over opposition from Reid and other Democrats.

Reid said he was impressed by Roberts' intellect but concerned that he did not repudiate "hurtful" language about women and minorities in memos he wrote as a lawyer for the Reagan administration. Some Democrats, such as Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska, say they are leaning in favor of Roberts. — Kathy Kiely

Senate takes on eminent domain ruling

The Connecticut woman whose case led to the Supreme Court decision allowing local governments to take homes for private development asked senators to end federal involvement in such seizures.

"I sincerely hope that Congress will do what judges and local legislators so far have refused to do … protect our homes," Susette Kelo told the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Supreme Court, ruling for the city of New London, said municipalities have broad power to seize homes in favor of private development to generate tax revenue. The House has already passed a bill that would bar federal transportation funds from being used to make improvements on land seized via eminent domain for private development. The Senate has not yet taken up that bill. The panel is considering proposals from Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and others that would bar federal money from being used in construction projects that benefit from the ruling.

Frist's shares in hospital chain sold

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist no longer holds stock in HCA Inc., the Nashville-based hospital chain his family founded. Frist, his wife and their three sons had owned an undisclosed amount of HCA stock in blind trusts. A California-based watchdog group had complained to the Senate ethics committee last year that Frist's holdings posed a conflict because of his support for legislation limiting medical malpractice lawsuits — which could benefit HCA if it passed. The ethics panel dismissed that complaint.

HCA shares hit a 52-week high of $58.60 in June, not long before Frist was told his stock had been liquidated. The stock lost about 10% of its value on July 13 after a weak earnings report. The sale was reported Monday by Congressional Quarterly. Frist is considering a run for the GOP's 2008 presidential nomination.

Senate Democratic Leader Will Oppose Roberts' Confirmation (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid will vote against confirmation of John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the Supreme Court, he announced Tuesday.

Reid's opposition will not change the outcome. The Republican-controlled Senate is still expected to confirm Roberts as the nation's next chief justice, probably next week.

But it could increase pressure on other fence-sitting Democrats like Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York to vote no. It also could embolden President Bush to pick a more controversial nominee for the remaining court vacancy, thus increasing the chances of a more contentious fight.

Reid's opposition to Roberts came as he prepared to meet with Bush on Wednesday to discuss whom Bush might pick to fill the seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Joining Reid at that meeting will be Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and the Senate Judiciary Committee's leaders - Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman, and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the senior Democrat.

In a Senate floor speech, Reid said he decided to oppose Roberts based on memos Roberts wrote early in his career challenging affirmative action, civil rights and women's rights. The Nevada Democrat said Roberts' two years as an appeals court judge left too short a record to signal how he might rule on such issues in the future.

Reid told his fellow Democrats that he did not expect them to follow him out of party loyalty. Rather, he told them, he would leave it to them to make up their own minds, said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who added that he has not decided.

One senator who did signal he would join Reid in opposition was Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

"This is really a leap of faith, isn't it?" Kennedy said Tuesday. "There are those that took the leap in terms of the war, there were those who took the leap in terms of taxes and now they are being invited to take the leap again in terms of Judge Roberts. And I don't think I'm going to be among them."

Two other Democrats signaled they would vote for Roberts.

DOJ_NMG_0007027

"I'm inclined to vote for Roberts unless something else comes up," said Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont.

"I've not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" Roberts, said Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb.

Several other leading Senate Democrats have refused to say how they will vote, notably including those who might run for president in 2008. They include Clinton, Evan Bayh of Indiana, Joseph Biden of Delaware and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Asked if she had decided, Clinton only shrugged as she entered a Capitol elevator Tuesday.

"We hope that Senator Reid's colleagues will reach the same conclusion and take the same strong stand," said Ralph Neas, president of the People for the American Way, a liberal group.

A majority of Americans, 58 percent, want the Senate to confirm Roberts, according to a recent Gallup Poll. But just 41 percent of Democrats want Roberts confirmed. That suggests Democrats who oppose Roberts face little political risk among their base.

Reid is pressing his case at a time when Bush is at his weakest politically, with the lowest approval ratings of his presidency. But Democratic opposition to Roberts - who emerged politically unscathed by his appearances before the Senate Judiciary Committee - could signal to Bush that he cannot win Democratic support anyway and therefore should go ahead with a more confrontational nomination.

That could lead Democrats to filibuster, possibly prompting Republicans to invoke the "nuclear option" of ending the right of a minority to block Senate action.

"It's likely the next nominee will not be as bulletproof as Roberts," said Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Minnesota. "Bush is going to do what he wants to do. If he has to fight for it, he's still going to get what he wants. This is not an administration that blinks."

The Gallup Poll of 1,005 adults was conducted Sept. 8-11 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Next High Court Pick Anyone's Guess (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

As President Bush weighs viable candidates for a second Supreme Court vacancy, Republican allies close to the process agree on one thing: Expect the unexpected selection.

Top Republicans say liberals are playing politics by warning that a fierce Senate fight will erupt if the president nominates a conservative to replace the high court's moderate female, and that Mr. Bush won't be pigeonholed by Washington pundits' calls for a woman or a Hispanic.

"The idea that he has to move left is a ludicrous, inside-the-Beltway type of thinking, coming from people who want to do him harm," said Gary Bauer, chairman of the Campaign for Working Families. "I'm confident the administration will ignore that advice."

"Nobody ever contemplated that Bill Clinton, with all of his troubles, would be expected to nominate a conservative. The unspoken message here is that the left is telling the president that you have no right to make the court more conservative, only liberal presidents have the right to make the court more liberal," he said.

Still, Democrats and liberals, frustrated by what they say was Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s proclivity to evade tough questions during 20 hours of Senate hearings on his nomination to replace Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, are advising the president to nominate a moderate to avoid a battle in the Senate.

Some Republicans close to the White House say top Bush aides are looking mainly at female jurists to fill Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat. Democrats vow a fight if Mr. Bush nominates a hard-core conservative.

But GOP strategist Charlie Black said the threat does not send shivers down the president's spine.

"It's naive all of a sudden to say that the White House just realized that there's going to be a tough confirmation fight in the Senate," Mr. Black said. "Of course there's pressure from both sides, but he's not going to cave to pressure from the left or the right."

DOJ_NMG_0007028

Mr. Bush will feel some of that pressure today when he meets at the White House with top senators from both parties about who should be picked for the lifetime appointment.

Republicans note that Democrats advised the president in July to chose a moderate or a woman -- or both -- to replace Justice O'Connor, but he instead chose a white, male conservative.

Mr. Black acknowledged that "there's only a handful of people who know" the president's top candidates. Two conservatives in legal organizations say top Bush aides are interviewing new prospects.

Some prominent candidates, however, made it into the final stages of the last search and are considered front-runners this time around. Judges Edith H. Jones and Edith Brown Clement, both of the Fifth Circuit in New Orleans, were on the shortlist. Also at the top of the list is Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who irks Democrats and conservatives alike but is known as a loyal friend of the president.

"If the president decides he would be the best choice, he's going to pick him. That's it," Mr. Black said. If that occurs, he would be the first Hispanic on the high court.

A new name has emerged on the longer list of candidates -- Judge Consuelo M. Callahan of the Ninth Circuit, the liberal San Francisco court, one of whose judges recently ruled that the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance violates the Constitution.

"That would kill two birds with one stone," said David Schultz, a professor at Minnesota's Hamline University law school and author of a new book, "The Encyclopedia of the Supreme Court."

Democrats, he said, "would have a hard time opposing a Hispanic woman," and Mr. Bush already knows her: He appointed her to the federal bench in 2003.

Words That Will Haunt (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

In announcing his opposition yesterday to the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be chief justice of the United States, Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) made a remarkable statement: "The president is not entitled to very much deference in staffing the third branch of government, the judiciary." Leave aside the merits of the Roberts nomination, which we support; if Mr. Reid regards Judge Roberts as unworthy, he is duty-bound to vote against him. But these are dangerous words that Democrats will come to regret.

This country has only one president at a time. That president, right now President Bush, is tasked with naming judges. The Senate has the role of providing advice and consent on the president's choices, which is a significant constitutional task. But if the presidential election means anything in this arena, it must mean that the president's choice has a heavy presumption of confirmation. That is the way the system works. Why else would Justices Sandra Day O'Connor, Antonin Scalia, Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg have received only a handful of no-votes among them? During the Clinton administration, we deplored the way that the Senate treated the president's judicial nominees during six years of Republican control over the Senate. Yet during those six years, the Senate confirmed 245 of President Bill Clinton's judges. If Republicans had been applying Mr. Reid's standard, they would have been within their rights to reject them all.

Do Democrats really want the American confirmation system to move in that direction? Republicans may still be in the majority the next time a Democratic president nominates a justice. Is it now okay for them to vote against a person who -- as Mr. Reid put it of Judge Roberts -- is "an excellent lawyer" and "a thoughtful, mainstream judge" who may make "a fine Supreme Court justice" simply because the nominee doesn't represent their ideal? When that day comes, and Democrats cry foul, remember what Mr. Reid said about how little deference he believes he owes Mr. Bush concerning Judge Roberts.

Sen. Reid Says He'll Vote Against Roberts (AJC/AP)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said Tuesday he would oppose confirmation of Chief Justice-nominee John Roberts, questioning Roberts' commitment to civil rights and accusing the Bush administration of stonewalling requests for documents that might shed light on his views.

DOJ_NMG_0007029

At the same time, Reid readily predicted Roberts will win Senate confirmation, coupling the forecast with a warning of sorts to President Bush as he considers candidates for a second vacancy on the Supreme Court. "No one should think that just automatically they're all going to be easy like this one," he said.

Reid is one of four senators invited to a White House meeting with Bush on Wednesday to discuss the vacancy created by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's decision to retire.

The Nevada senator made his comments as Democrats began taking sides in advance of next week's confirmation vote. President Bush named Roberts, a 50-year-old appeals court judge and former lawyer in two Republican administrations, to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist.

Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., announced he will vote for confirmation, and Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., edged toward an endorsement, as well. Roberts also commands overwhelming if not unanimous support among the Senate's 55 Republicans.

"After reviewing Judge John Roberts' credentials and meeting with him privately, I have found that he meets my criteria for judges. And that is: only the brightest, most objective minds shall serve on the bench," said Baucus," who added the decision was not an easy one.

"I've not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" Roberts, said Nelson, who is seeking re-election next year in Republican Nebraska and often crosses party lines to support Bush's legislative proposals.

Reid had successfully urged fellow Democrats to refrain from taking positions on the appointment until after the completion of last week's confirmation hearings and the regular Tuesday closed-door meeting of the rank-and-file.

"This is a very close question for me. But I must resolve my doubts in favor of the American people whose rights would be in jeopardy if John Roberts turned out to be the wrong person for the job," he said.

Referring to publicly released memos that date to Robert's tenure as a Reagan administration lawyer, Reid said they showed the young attorney "played a significant role in shaping and advancing the Republican agenda to roll back civil rights protections."

"No one suggests that John Roberts was motivated by bigotry or animosity toward minorities or women," Reid added. "But these memos lead one to question whether he truly appreciated the history of the civil rights struggle. He wrote about discrimination as an abstract concept, not as a flesh and blood reality for countless of his fellow citizens."

Reid also said Roberts followed a "disingenuous strategy" at the confirmation hearings of suggesting that the views in the memos were not his own.

Democrats have tried without success to persuade the administration to release documents from Roberts' tenure as principal deputy solicitor general, a senior Justice Department job he held in the administration of the first President Bush.

"The failure of the White House to produce relevant documents is reason enough for any senator to oppose this nomination. The administration cannot treat the Senate with such disrespect without some consequences," Reid said.

Reid's remarks pleased leaders of women's organizations and civil rights groups who outlined the case against Roberts at a closed door meeting with the Democratic leader last week. According to participants in the meeting, they also said they wanted to run up as many votes against Roberts as possible, in part to try and show Bush he would be risking a fierce fight if he named a more conservative nominee than Roberts to replace Sandra Day O'Connor.

For his part, Reid urged the president to proceed slowly on filling O'Connor's seat, adding, "I don't think he needs to do it in the next couple of weeks, that's for sure."

Beyond that, Reid said he would view it as a "poke in the eye with a sharp stick" if Bush were to nominate any of the 10 appeals court nominees that Democrats blocked in recent years, including some who were later confirmed. He declined to say whether Attorney General Alberto Gonzales falls into the same category.

One White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said at least some of the contenders on the president's list fall into the category that would draw Reid's ire.

Dana Perino, White House deputy press secretary, suggested Reid was changing the standard for judging nominees to the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0007030

"In confirming recent nominees like Ginsburg, Breyer and Scalia, senators based their decisions on the qualifications of the nominee, not on whether or not the person doing the nominating was in their same party. The public does not want to see the Supreme Court become an extension of partisan politics," Perino said.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg was confirmed on a vote of 96-3 in 1993; the 1994 vote on Stephen Breyer was 87-9 and Antonin Scalia was confirmed 98-0 in 1987. Rehnquist was confirmed as chief justice in 1986 on a vote of 65-33.

Roberts Will 'Get Plenty Of Votes' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. will be confirmed as the 17th chief justice of the United States without a filibuster, the Senate's top Democrat said yesterday.

"He's going to be confirmed," Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada told reporters yesterday. "Roberts will get plenty of votes."

Mr. Reid announced that he will vote against Judge Roberts' nomination on the Senate floor but said, "The arguments against him do not warrant extraordinary procedural tactics to block the nomination."

"No one doubts that John Roberts is an excellent lawyer and an affable person," Mr. Reid said. "But at the end of this process, I have too many unanswered questions about the nominee to justify a vote confirming him to this enormously important lifetime position."

The senator made the announcements after a lunch meeting with his caucus, during which Democrats discussed their strategy for dealing with the nomination.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to vote on the nomination tomorrow. The entire Senate will vote on the nomination later in the month.

Mr. Reid's remarks about not filibustering Judge Roberts echoed the sentiments of several key Democrats that they don't know whether they will vote to confirm his nomination to the Supreme Court but that they are certain he won't be blocked from getting a final vote.

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat and a key member of the "Gang of 14" senators who can determine whether a filibuster will succeed, said none of the 14 is talking of a filibuster.

"I don't expect anything extraordinary to come about," said Mr. Nelson, adding that he hasn't decided whether he'll support the Roberts nomination on the floor.

Sen. Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat and a Gang of 14 member, said he couldn't imagine a filibuster being employed against Judge Roberts.

Sen. Evan Bayh, the Indiana Democrat who introduced the nominee at his confirmation hearing but withheld endorsement, said yesterday that he has not made his mind up. He called Judge Roberts "brilliant" and "affable," but said there are "a lot of unresolved questions."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, also is being closely watched for her vote on the nomination, especially given widespread speculation that she will run for president in 2008. But she gave no signals yesterday as she dashed past reporters to the elevator.

Mr. Reid said yesterday that he told his caucus members to vote their conscience. Although he complimented Judge Roberts for his intellect, Mr. Reid said he couldn't support the nominee.

"I'm not too sure his heart was as big as his head," he said.

But that's not to say that Mr. Reid was in any hurry to have President Bush fill a second opening on the court.

"I just don't see any rush," he said, noting the Senate's busy schedule right now. Mr. Reid and other Senate leaders will meet with Mr. Bush this morning to discuss that vacancy, filling the seat of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Republicans also are privately urging the White House to hold off on nominating a replacement. With the Roberts confirmation virtually sewn up, they worry that Democrats will spend all their Roberts debate time on a second nominee if one is named.

Unlike many Democrats, however, Mr. Reid said he was pleased by how much Mr. Bush consulted with him and others before nominating Judge Roberts.

"I'm sure it could be improved upon, but I don't think the Roberts consultation process was a total failure," he told reporters. "I didn't think it was a failure at all."

Mr. Reid declined to discuss names of potential nominees, except to say that naming any of the 10 previously filibustered candidates would be a "poke in the eye with a sharp stick." That could spell trouble for a nomination of Judge Priscilla Owen of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, who is often mentioned as an O'Connor replacement.

After Chafee Backs Roberts, Foes Await NARAL's Response (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, September 21, 2005

Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I) has said that he will vote for John Roberts's nomination to the Supreme Court, a move that could jeopardize his endorsement from NARAL Pro-Choice America.

"Absent anything unforeseen," Chafee told The Hill last week, he would vote for Roberts to succeed the late William Rehnquist as chief justice of the United States. The senator reaffirmed his support of Roberts yesterday.

Although Chafee voted against the nomination of U.S. Circuit Court Judge Priscilla Owen, NARAL President Nancy Keenan blasted him June 8 for voting to confirm Janice Rogers Brown's nomination to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"Given our recent conversations with Senator Chafee, this vote is surprising and extremely disappointing," Keegan said in the release. "We'd like to know what pressure the Republican leadership put on him. We will be watching closely his future votes on judicial nominees, including William Pryor and those for the Supreme Court."

Owen, Pryor and Brown were included in the "Gang of 14" deal that averted a floor vote on the so-called "nuclear option." Chafee voted no on Pryor's confirmation.

NARAL, an abortion-rights organization, endorsed Chafee on May 20, stating, "We stand by our friends." Chafee received a 100 percent rating on issues important to NARAL last year.

Asked if he was worried that NARAL would withdraw its endorsement, Chafee said he did not promise the group that he would oppose the president's nominees to the high court.

He added, "I'm reliably pro-choice."

Should NARAL pull its support, it could have implications on the 2006 race.

Darrell West, a professor of political science at Brown University, said what NARAL represents to Chafee carries more weight than the actual endorsement.

"Chafee's strong suit is his support in the center of the political spectrum," he said. "It would undermine his ability to make the case as a moderate in the Senate."

NARAL did not return several calls for comment.

Maureen Moakley, professor of political science at the University of Rhode Island, contended that while NARAL's endorsement might matter in a close, low-turnout Republican primary it probably would not play a deciding factor in the general election.

Chafee faces a challenge from the right from Cranston, Rhode Island Mayor Steve Laffey.

If confirmed, Roberts would replace Rehnquist, a steadfast conservative who died earlier this month. Most political experts believe Roberts's filling Rehnquist's seat would cause little change to the ideological makeup of the court.

However, the nomination of a successor to centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor still looms. NARAL could opt to see how Chafee votes on that nomination before reaffirming or withdrawing its support of his reelection bid.

Former Rhode Island Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse (D), one of the two Democrats vying to challenge Chafee in 2006, issued a statement last week opposing the Roberts nomination:

"I believe that nominees who go before the Senate for an appointment to the Supreme Court in this environment have an obligation to tell the American people where they stand on fundamental issues. John Roberts has not fulfilled this obligation."

DOJ_NMG_0007032

Matt Burgess, a spokesman for Rhode Island Secretary of State Matt Brown (D), who is also running, said that if NARAL decides to buck Chafee then Brown would court its endorsement.

"Matt has a strong record of standing up for a woman's right to choose," he said

Brown has indicated he would apply a litmus test to judicial appointments, vowing to oppose nominees who oppose abortion rights.

Asked by The Providence Journal in May why NARAL opted not to back Brown, Keenan said noted that Chafee has a record of tough votes, while Brown has no congressional voting record.

Chafee has often sided with the administration on confirmation votes, approving of the nominations of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Attorney General Albert Gonzales and voting for cloture on John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Bush Under Pressure Over Supreme Court Nomination (SAEN)

By Gary Martin, Express-News Washington Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - As John Roberts heads toward expected confirmation as chief justice, President Bush is under mounting pressure to nominate a woman or minority with conservative credentials to fill a second vacancy on the Supreme Court.

Bush will meet with Senate leaders today to discuss the Roberts confirmation vote, which is expected next week, and the process to select a judge to replace Sandra Day O'Connor.

Bush has pledged a "wide open" search for a nominee, including consideration of minority candidates.

Many Republicans and interest groups want Bush to choose a woman, preferably one aligned ideologically with religious conservatives.

"I have great faith in the president that he will look at all qualified persons, and I'd like to see him nominate another woman to the Supreme Court," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas.

Hutchison said there are qualified women with academic qualifications and life experience eligible for selection.

"I do want to see the next nominee be a woman," Hutchison said.

O'Connor " one of two women on the high court, along with the liberal-leaning Justice Ruth Ginsberg " has agreed to serve until her replacement is confirmed. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the number of women on the court should not be reduced. Others have pointedly urged the president to nominate a woman.

David Keene, with the American Conservative Union, wants the president to pick a strict constitutionalist, regardless of race or gender, "who believes in the doctrine of original intent of the framers, thus protecting the freedom and liberty of the American people."

Among the names being mentioned prominently around Washington is Priscilla Owen of Austin, a judge on the New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals that serves Texas, Mississippi and Louisiana.

Owen, who served on the conservative Texas Supreme Court, is politically tied to the president, who campaigned hard to win her appointment to the appellate court earlier this year.

Owen has the backing of friends with political clout, namely Karl Rove, the White House senior presidential adviser, Hutchison and Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

O'Connor, considered a moderate, was a swing vote on social issues like abortion and capital punishment.

Democrats and liberal-leaning groups have promised a bruising confirmation battle if the president chooses anyone who might alter the idealogical balance of the court.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, in an interview on CBS's "Face the Nation," called on the president to honor a campaign promise and select "a nominee that would unite both Democrats and Republicans."

Bush is expected to announce his nomination to the Supreme Court after the Senate vote on Roberts is final.

Leahy said he expected to hear names of potential court nominees when he meets with the president today for a White House breakfast with Senate leaders. Senate aides said if Bush selects a nominee in October, confirmation hearings and a vote could be held before December.

Owen's nomination to the appellate court sparked a bitter partisan battle and filibuster threat that ended in an historic compromise brokered by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and moderates from both parties.

She was confirmed in May, 55-43, after Democrats delayed the vote for four years.

Bush could also consider Judge Edith Brown Clement, who also serves on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals. She was reportedly a finalist to Roberts in the last go-round.

A conservative, Clement was a district judge in New Orleans before Bush named her to the appellate bench.

Another judge on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, Edith Jones, a Terrell Hills native and Houston resident, also is considered a possible choice, as is Janice Rogers Brown, a former California Supreme Court justice that Bush appointed to the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals.

Brown, an African-American, would allow Bush to name a minority to the high court. Bush has openly considered naming a Hispanic to the court and announced his consideration of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a San Antonio native, as a possible justice.

But the likelihood of a Gonzales nomination waned this week as conservative groups launched an effort to squelch the nomination, questioning his stance on affirmative action and abortion.

Republican aides said the president has a long list of potential minority candidates, including Emilo Garza of San Antonio, who sits on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, and Larry Thompson, an African-American and former deputy attorney general. > gmartin@express-news.net

Roberts Battle Highlights Vast Gulf Between Parties (USAT)

By Robert Bork And David Rivkin Jr.

USA Today, September 21, 2005

With the John Roberts confirmation hearings over, there is every reason to believe that he will be a worthy successor to the late Supreme Court chief justice William Rehnquist. Roberts performed ably, embracing a modest judicial role, striking a sound balance between respect for stare decisis and the need to "revisit" flawed precedents, and rejecting the use of constitutionally irrelevant foreign law.

Roberts also properly refused to indicate how he would rule in future Supreme Court cases. While he will almost certainly be confirmed, the next confirmation battle, over Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's successor, is likely to be tough.

nonetheless, President Bush can win this battle, provided that he wages it within the proper philosophical context, by arguing that, in our constitutional system, the courts should remain judicial institutions and that most of the policy calls should be made by the political branches.

Senate Democrats have accused Roberts of hiding his views, claiming the American people are entitled to know where he stands on key constitutional issues, including abortion, end-of-life matters and the separation of church and state.

Withholding judgment

Yet nobody, including Roberts himself, can or should know how he would rule in a specific case, until that case comes before him. Having judges behave as politicians, seeking political support from public commitments concerning their future votes, is utterly incompatible with the proper judicial role. Going down this path would fatally undermine judicial independence and legitimacy.

In fact, far from being about Roberts or any future nominee, the pyrotechnics of the Senate hearings are attributable to the fact that the philosophic gulf between our two political parties has grown vast — and nowhere more so than with respect to the federal judiciary. Most Republicans want courts that are legal institutions, not political bodies. Democrats, on the other hand, insist on courts devoted to specific policy outcomes (invariably items on the liberal agenda).

Not content with helping transform the judiciary into the most important player in domestic affairs, and most certainly in cultural trends, Democrats push for courts that are activist in foreign and defense policy, micromanaging, for example, the treatment of captured enemy combatants.

Lost confidence

The hysteria of the Democratic Left is understandable. It has lost confidence in its ability to compete in the political arena and sees a politicized judiciary as its only hope to advance its agenda. The policies it desires, and the Supreme Court has so far advanced, are ones that encourage radical personal autonomy in moral and cultural matters. Activist judges announce principles and reach results that have no plausible connection to the Constitution. Thus, it is increasingly obvious that activist judges are issuing decisions that have no basis other than the judges' personal preferences. There is more than a grain of truth in the statement that the court represents the blue states in their contest with the red states.

The process of confirming Roberts, and choosing O'Connor's successor, has triggered a serious national debate about the judiciary's proper role.

This debate will have long-term benefits, provided that the president decisively wins it.

The presidency is, as Theodore Roosevelt put it, a "bully pulpit." Now is the time to use it. The president can remind us that the greatest transformations in American political life, from the development of the Bill of Rights to the enfranchisement of former slaves and women, were all accomplished democratically through constitutionally proper procedures, and that placing on the court justices who would take judicial shortcuts, often in defiance of the Constitution and the electorate, shows nothing but disdain for American voters.

Robert Bork, a former U.S. Supreme Court nominee and U.S. Court of Appeals judge, is a fellow at the Hudson Institute. David Rivkin served in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations and is a law partner at Baker and Hostetler.

Bush Sees 'Progress' On Fifth Visit To Gulf Coast (LAT)

By Scott Gold And Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — President Bush came to the Gulf Coast today to praise the recovery effort after Hurricane Katrina devastated this region, but he found himself hoping that all of the good work will not be undone by another storm racing into the Gulf of Mexico.

During a visit to a coffee plant that is limping back to life after sustaining $20 million worth of damage, Bush praised the progress of recovery since Katrina dealt the coast a killer blow on Aug. 29. Bush was accompanied by Mayor C. Ray Nagin.

"Progress is being made toward meeting the mayor's vision of a — and my vision, and everybody's vision involved with this — of a vibrant New Orleans and surrounding parishes," Bush said.

But the president warned that Hurricane Rita was heading toward the gulf, carrying winds of more than 100 mph and was expected to gather energy from the warm waters.

"All up and down this coastline people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm," Bush said. "I've been briefed on the planning for what we pray is not a devastating storm — but there's one coming."

Rita stormed through the Florida Straits today, dropping torrential rains on the Keys and Cuba. It is a Category 2 storm, but could reach Category 3 and perhaps more when it makes landfall by week's end.

Current projections have it hitting Texas sometime Friday or Saturday, but it is expected to affect Louisiana by Thursday. New Orleans, which has been recovering from severe flooding, is in an especially sensitive position because its levee system was weakened by Katrina.

Nagin had allowed some residents of New Orleans to return over the weekend, but he suspended that program when federal officials, led by Bush, objected. The city is still without drinking water, the air quality is questionable and the impact of Rita is a potential hazard.

"I appreciate the mayor recognizing that, and he made a wise decision to say to people, be cautious about returning here, because a rain of any amount could cause these levees to break again," Bush said.

Nagin has at times been critical of the federal relief effort, but went out of his way to praise the principal federal official in New Orleans, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen.

We're "one leadership team," Nagin said. "We may not always agree, but we have one mission: To bring New Orleans back."

He then handed Allen a T-shirt boasting "I ©N.O."

Nagin then spoke to the hundreds of thousands of residents who were forced to flee the storm and broken levees that made this city uninhabitable.

"I know it has been three weeks plus that you haven't been able to come back," he said. "Just hold on for a little longer. As soon as we get comfortable that Rita" won't be a problem, "we will get to our reentry program. We fully intend to follow through."

"Be prepared," Nagin warned. "You may not recognize the place.… Come prepared with your eyes wide open as it relates to what you might see."

Despite the successes, including emptying more than half the city of the floodwaters, there are still water and supply problems. Municipal services are spotty at best and schools remain closed.

To bring attention to the progress that has been made, Bush paid his fifth trip to the region. He praised the recovery of the Folger's coffee plant, which roasts, packages and ships coffee nationwide and to parts of Mexico.

The factory, the size of several football fields, has one of its 10 production lines back in operation. About 150 of the 500 employees are working, many living on the grounds in the 110 trailers supplied by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"I want to thank the folks here at the Folgers plant for inviting us to come to say hello," Bush said. "The reason I've come with the mayor and Admiral Allen is because I want the people to know that there's progress being made in this part of the world."

Earlier, in Gulfport, Miss., Bush met with local officials on the governor's commission on the recovery. He praised their efforts and promised that the federal government would move faster to help with the reconstruction.

"Every time I come back here, I see progress," Bush said, establishing the theme for the day. "But this part of the country's changing. And you're moving forward. I don't know if you know that or not, but flying in or driving in, there's something different than the first time I was here.

"There is a can-do attitude. In the midst of all the trauma and pain, one thing I noticed on my first trip was, 'We can do this.' And now I'm seeing it being done," the president said.

"We'll get the debris removed. We'll get your water systems up and running as quickly as possible. We'll get your bridges built," he told the appreciative audience in a white tent set up in the parking lot of an outlet mall.

"There's no doubt in my mind that, out of the rubble and out of the huge heaps of timber that used to be homes, a better Mississippi will emerge," he said.

Before leaving Washington, the White House announced that Bush had named Frances Fragos Townsend, his homeland security adviser, to lead an administration investigation into the sluggish federal response to Katrina.

Bush had promised to investigate "what went wrong and what went right" in the response that has already cost Michael Brown his post as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Congress has been holding hearings, but Democrats are still seeking the creation of an independent commission to investigate the disaster.

Press Secretary Scott McClellan told reporters that the administration would search the federal budget to find cuts to pay the bill for reconstruction after Katrina. Congress has appropriated almost $63 billion in emergency aid and Bush has pledged to rebuild the region.

Though the White House has not placed a price tag on the project, experts have said it could cost $200 billion. Bush has ruled out a tax increase. There have been calls to use some of the funds earmarked for Iraq to rebuild New Orleans, while conservatives have urged that some programs be cut.

McClellan today rejected a call to roll back the new prescription drug benefit.

Rita remains a concern for state officials as well.

More than 7,000 Hurricane Katrina evacuees staying in shelters near the Texas Gulf Coast are being evacuated in buses and planes, said David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, in Baton Rouge.

DOJ_NMG_0007036

About 4,000 will be moved from Ellington Field in Houston to Ft. Chaffee in Fort Smith, Ark. Three thousand people displaced by Katrina will be moved from Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio to somewhere in Tennessee, Passey said.

"Safety, of course, is our top priority," Passey said.

Federal employees will coordinate with the city of New Orleans to comply with any mandatory evacuation.

Passey estimated that 11,000 civilian federal employees and 14,000 active military personnel — not including National Guard — are working in the area.

FEMA housing officials continue to grapple with the largest-scale need for temporary housing the agency has ever encountered, said Ron Sherman, head of FEMA's area housing command.

"Being displaced and losing your home is one of the worst things that can happen to you," Sherman said.

The agency is considering a variety of housing options for evacuees, primarily travel trailers, but also including cruise ships and apartments.

The Louisiana governor's office announced a plan to move the 55,000 people who remain in shelters into hotels and motels for up to 90 days, said Jerry Jones, director of facilities and planning for the state of Louisiana.

State officials had briefed FEMA on the proposal, which Sherman agreed with "in principle," although financial and logistical details of the plan had not been determined.

"We need to do something quicker," Jones said. Evacuees "need to know we're working for them."

State officials hope that the proposal will offer evacuees an alternative to shelters while FEMA works to establish adequate interim housing.

"Our citizens have been waiting and waiting for relief from their shelter environment," Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said in a statement Tuesday.

"While shelters have provided a safe respite, moving our citizens out of harms way immediately following Hurricane Katrina, it is past time to move all of them into the next housing option," she said.

Bush Praises Progress In Rebuilding Efforts (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 -- President Bush returned to the storm-battered Gulf Coast on Tuesday, telling local leaders that amid the rampant devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina there are promising signs of recovery.

Bush, who has faced harsh criticism for a confused and sluggish federal response to the deadly hurricane, said he was "pleased to see the progress being made on the ground" in the difficult task of rebuilding the region.

The president's trip marked his fifth visit to the area since Katrina flattened much of the Mississippi Gulf Coast and unleashed a flood that submerged most of New Orleans. Now, as the floodwaters are being pumped away, much of city and surrounding area remain uninhabitable and crusted in dried mud.

As the region struggles to dry out and lay plans for rebuilding, officials were concerned about Hurricane Rita, which Tuesday was making its way toward the Gulf of Mexico. Bush attended a briefing about the storm aboard the USS Iwo Jima, an amphibious assault ship docked near downtown New Orleans, where it serves as a recovery command center.

The visible federal preparations for Rita stand in contrast to the delayed response that followed Katrina. Although Bush signed emergency orders to ready federal help in anticipation of Katrina, precious days passed before the Federal Emergency Management Agency was able to mount an all-out response. Hundreds of people were killed in the hurricane; others were trapped on rooftops or in hellish shelters for days.

The ineffective federal response has shaken public confidence in an administration that prides itself on its cool efficiency. In Katrina's aftermath, Bush's approval ratings have plummeted to new lows, and polls have found that a dwindling share of Americans give him high marks for leadership.

Since the early confusion, Bush has moved to recover the initiative, vowing to lead one of the largest rebuilding efforts ever seen. Already, more than $62 billion has been appropriated, and some members of Congress have estimated that the rebuilding tab could go as high as $200 billion.

Using FEMA data, the National Low Income Housing Coalition yesterday estimated that Katrina destroyed or heavily damaged 302,000 homes. About 142,000 homes were lost in New Orleans alone. The housing advocacy group said that apartments accounted for 47 percent of units lost or damaged overall, and 55 percent in New Orleans.

In his visit here, Bush said local officials and businesses are making impressive progress in rebuilding and bringing economic life back to the stricken region.

Bush toured a Folgers coffee plant, where 110 trailers are lined up to house workers who have returned to the job. Plant officials said 150 of the facility's 500 workers are back to work and that one of the plant's 10 lines is working to package and ship coffee throughout the country.

"We've got some people working here because of the ingenuity of the plant managers," Bush said. ". . . This company has provided housing for the folks who work here."

Earlier in the day, Bush stopped in Gulfport, Miss., where he met with members of a state commission appointed to lead the storm recovery effort. The meeting was held in a white tent set up in the parking lot of a still-shuttered outlet mall that until a week ago served as a staging area for utility crews working to restore power.

As Bush entered the tent, the business leaders and others inside erupted in applause. "W, we still love ya," someone cried out, causing Bush to crack a smile.

Bush listened quietly as Gov. Haley Barbour (R) pledged to rebuild Mississippi's Gulf Coast and make it better than ever. "Creating a renaissance in this area is what I'm going do the rest of the time I'm in office," Barbour said.

Bush also heard testimonials from business leaders who pledged their efforts to help rebuild the Mississippi coastline.

"Every time I come back here, I see progress," Bush said. ". . . This part of the country is changing. You're moving forward."

A Storm Survivor, Political Reputation Intact (NYT)

By Joyce Purnick

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 20 - Hurricane Katrina has given the nation a new political celebrity, the mayor of beleaguered New Orleans. And like they say with pride here about most everything, Mayor C. Ray Nagin is just plain different.

A former business executive, Mr. Nagin is a Democrat who lashed out at Republican Washington, likes to cuss, has begun treating the president whose administration he lambasted as a buddy and makes no secret of his differences with the state's governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, also a Democrat. Mostly, he seems to be unapologetically making it up as he goes along, as he did on Monday when he (temporarily) defied official advice to slow the reopening of his city.

After Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard and President Bush very publicly advised caution, Mr. Nagin backed down and reversed his order to have people return gradually. He retreated with sword raised. "There's only one mayor of New Orleans and I'm it," he said, attributing his reversal to a "new event" - the prospect that Hurricane Rita might head for the Gulf Coast.

That kind of bravado is classic Nagin, an unorthodox politician of 49 who was a top cable executive before he ran for mayor three years ago. His pre-storm, tenure was seen as a little bumpy as he learned on the job, but not fatally so. Post-storm, Mr. Nagin has made a virtue of being consistently inconsistent. Why fast-track the return of people to a city short on power and potable water, even as he talks about putting safety first?

Those who know Mr. Nagin and know New Orleans attribute his rush to three factors: Nagin chemistry, politics and race, with a dash of civic pride thrown in.

"There's a lot of pressure to get business going again in New Orleans, and he got ahead of himself," said James W. Nickel, a lobbyist here and former state Democratic chairman.

Mr. Nagin, who declined to be interviewed for this article, maintains that politics was not his motive in trying to reopen his city quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0007038

Few who know the politics of New Orleans, a predominantly black city with a powerful white business core, harbor any doubt that he was responding to pressure from the entrenched white business community, and perhaps, too, from black elected officials worried that their constituents would not return unless assured their city was up and running.

Mr. Nagin needed the votes of both constituencies to win election, but white voters held the margin of victory. When he ran for mayor, business executives embraced him as a reformer. He got into the runoff after the black vote split and then went on to a slim victory.

"Candidates running for other offices got more votes than he did," the City Council president, Oliver M. Thomas Jr., said on Tuesday. Mr. Thomas has viewed the mayor's conduct post-storm with some skepticism, including his latest flip-flop. "You can't keep jerking people's chains," Mr. Thomas said.

Others cite mistakes. Mr. Nagin did not get everyone out, did not fire up the school buses for evacuees, did not have enough food or water for them in the Superdome or the convention center, did not protect people adequately and let the looters loot so he could make rescues the priority.

He had to answer for flying to Dallas the second weekend after Hurricane Katrina to visit his evacuated family and for meeting there with white businessmen from New Orleans. This infuriated many of the city's black lawmakers and businessmen, worried about being left out of the rebuilding loop, despite Mr. Nagin's assurances to the contrary.

And of course there was the famous flash of Nagin temper on the Thursday after the storm, when he railed at the federal authorities, "Now get off your asses and do something." In most cities, the public would say, Sure, but why didn't you do it first? But in New Orleans, Mr. Nagin was seen as putting the blame squarely on Washington and as alerting the world to his city's emergency.

Instead of facing political oblivion, Mr. Nagin has emerged as something of a folk hero, a familiar figure with his distinctive shirts and shaved head.

In some places in the country, mayors pay for big mistakes at election time. Mr. Nagin faces a primary election in February, and for now, the talk here is that he is not in big trouble, that he, like his city, was a victim of Washington and Ms. Blanco, whose reputation has suffered while his seems to be holding.

"You experience accountability in other places," said Roy W. Fletcher, a political consultant in Baton Rouge. "Here, while everybody wants something from government, nobody expects something from government."

Some New Orleanians are furious at Mr. Nagin. Others attribute his stumbles to an unfamiliarity with practical politics that pre-dated Hurricane Katrina. "He truly thought he could go into government and run it like a business," said Mr. Nickel, the former Democratic chairman. "If any government can't run like a business, it is the government of New Orleans."

But the mayor, a native of the city from a working-class family, is considered honest and strongly opposed to the old, often corrupt ways, yet limited by his city's poverty and its people's low expectations.

"If he had gotten those people out, it would have been shocking," said Alvin Gauthier, a science teacher and basketball coach at a New Orleans high school, as he waited in line here on Monday at the Federal Emergency Management Agency's disaster relief center.

In fact, as early as July, the mayor and emergency officials were warning that the city did not have the resources to evacuate everyone if a major hurricane hit, The Times-Picayune reported.

Yet nothing significant changed, which was not a surprise.

"This isn't the United States, darling; this is a colony of the powers that be," a rug dealer named Bob Rue said on Saturday in New Orleans, where he was protecting his shop on St. Charles Avenue with a revolver and a claw hammer.

"There's no tax base," Mr. Rue said. Too many people, he added, are too poor.

He was asked why not demand more from the state, more from the wealthy?

Mr. Rue, looking as though he wanted to use his claw hammer, sighed. Listen, he seemed to be saying, he survived. And so, it would seem, did Mr. Nagin. - survived a storm that damaged almost everything and everyone in its path, including a president.

But somehow there is a sense of tolerance from his constituents for their mayor, because, they say, at least he tried - considered an accomplishment in their hometown.

U.S. 'Must Pay' To Rebuild (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

President Bush, accused of embarking on a discretionary spending spree to rebuild the Gulf Coast, yesterday said the federal government is required by law to shoulder most of the cost.

"We have a responsibility by law to help rebuild the infrastructure," Mr. Bush said on his fifth visit to the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina struck three weeks ago. He said the federal government is "the principal party responsible for rebuilding infrastructure."

White House officials pointed out that the 1988 Stafford Act, which is triggered by disasters such as Katrina, requires that the federal government pay at least 75 percent of the cost of rebuilding public infrastructure.

The federal government's share can jump to more than 90 percent in certain extraordinary circumstances, such as Hurricane Andrew in 1992, the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995 and the September 11 attacks.

Yet the Associated Press suggested Friday that White House plans to rebuild the Gulf Coast are discretionary.

"President Bush is presiding over the most expensive government relief and reconstruction operation in U.S. history, casting aside budget discipline," wrote reporter Tom Raum in a story headlined "The new New Deal?"

The next day, conservative John Podhoretz expressed alarm about the president's post-Katrina spending plans in a New York Post column.

"In ignoring the small-government sensitivities of conservatives," he wrote, "Bush may have done something politically catastrophic to his own presidency."

"I guess you could make a discretionary decision not to rebuild this part of the United States, but it would be totally counterproductive," he said. "I mean, it's critical to the economy."

He pointed out that most of the money will be spent on indispensable items such as military and transportation facilities.

"A lot of the big-ticket items are roads -- those are a national asset," he added. "I mean, the farmers in Ohio use the roads in Louisiana and use the navigable waterways of the Mississippi River to ship their agriculture exports to the rest of the world.

"The other big-ticket items are military bases and Veterans Affairs hospitals," he added. "Does any self-described conservative want to not rebuild our military bases or VA hospitals?"

Still, such conservatives as OpinionJournal.com assistant editor Brendan Miniter are urging the White House to exercise restraint.

"Katrina is swamping every goal conservatives have, from limiting government to cutting taxes to reforming entitlement programs," he wrote yesterday on the site, published by the Wall Street Journal. "Katrina spending has already imperiled plans to repeal the death tax."

Yesterday, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow acknowledged the president's push to repeal the death tax and make other tax cuts permanent has been placed on the "back burner" because of Katrina.

"It's taken over the national agenda, and I think it will for a while," Mr. Snow told the National Association of Federal Credit Unions. "I think it will push to the back burner some issues that otherwise would have been on the agenda now -- the estate tax, tax [cut] permanency."

But the White House said yesterday that the president has every intention of making his tax cuts permanent and repealing the death tax.

"Keeping taxes low is the foundation of the president's economic program," Mr. Duffy said. "The president will block any attempt by Democrats to raise taxes."

Message: I Can't (NYT)

The president won't be happy until he dons a yellow slicker and actually takes the place of Anderson Cooper, violently blown about by Rita as he talks into a camera lens lashed with water, hanging onto a mailbox as he's hit by a flying pig in a squall, sucked up by a waterspout in the eye of the storm over the Dry Tortugas.

Then maybe he'll go back to the White House and do his job instead of running down to the Gulf Coast for silly disaster-ops every other day.

There's nothing more pathetic than watching someone who's out of touch feign being in touch. On his fifth sodden pilgrimage of penitence to the devastation he took so long to comprehend, W. desperately tried to show concern. He said he had spent some "quality time" at a Chevron plant in Pascagoula and nattered about trash removal, infrastructure assessment teams and the "can-do spirit."

"We look forward to hearing your vision so we can more better do our job," he said at a briefing in Gulfport, Miss., urging local officials to "think bold," while they still need to think mold.

Mr. Bush should stop posing in shirtsleeves and get back to the Oval Office. He has more hacks and cronies he's trying to put into important jobs, and he needs to ride herd on that.

The announcement that a veterinarian, Norris Alderson, who has no experience on women's health issues, would head the F.D.A.'s Office of Women's Health ran into so much flak from appalled women that the F.D.A. may have already reneged on it. No morning-after pill, thanks to the antediluvian administration, but there may be hope for a morning-after horse pill.

Mr. Bush made a frownie over Brownie, but didn't learn much. He's once more trying to appoint a nothingburger to a position of real consequence in homeland security. The choice of Julie Myers, a 36-year-old lawyer with virtually no immigration, customs or law enforcement experience, to head the roiling Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency with its $4 billion budget and 22,000 staffers, has caused some alarm, according to The Washington Post.

Ms. Myers's main credentials seem to be that she worked briefly for the semidisgraced homeland security director, Michael Chertoff, when he was at the Justice Department. She just married Mr. Chertoff's chief of staff, John Wood, and she's the niece of Gen. Richard Myers, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

As a former associate for Ken Starr, the young woman does have impeachment experience, in case the forensic war on terrorism requires the analysis of stains on dresses.

Julie makes Brownie look like Giuliani. I'll sleep better tonight, knowing that when she gets back from her honeymoon, Julie will be patrolling the frontier.

As if the Veterinarian and the Niece were not bad enough, there was also the Accused. David Safavian, the White House procurement official involved in Katrina relief efforts, was arrested on Monday, accused by the F.B.I. of lying and obstructing a criminal investigation into the seamy case of "Casino Jack" Abramoff, the Republican operative who has broken new ground in giving lobbying a bad name. Democrats say the fact that Mr. Safavian's wife is a top lawyer for the Republican congressman who's leading the whitewash of the White House blundering on Katrina does not give them confidence.

Just as he has stonewalled other inquiries, Mr. Bush is trying to paper over his Katrina mistakes by appointing his homeland security adviser, Frances Townsend, to investigate how the feds fumbled the response.

Mr. Bush's "Who's Your Daddy?" bravura - blowing off the world on global warming and the allies on the Iraq invasion - has been slapped back by Mother Nature, which refuses to be fooled by spin.

When Donald Rumsfeld came out yesterday to castigate the gloom-and-doomers and talk about the inroads American forces had made against terrorists in Afghanistan and Iraq, he could not so easily recast reality.

In Afghanistan, the U.S.'s handpicked puppet president is still battling warlords and a revivified Taliban, and the export of poppies for the heroin trade is once more thriving.

Iraq is worse, with more than 1,900 American troops killed. Five more died yesterday, as well as four security men connected to the U.S. embassy office in Mosul, all to fashion a theocratic-leaning regime aligned with Iran. In Basra, two journalists who have done work for The Times have been killed in the last two months.

The more the president echoes his dad's "Message: I care," the more the world hears "Message: I can't."

Bush: Townsend To Lead Katrina Inquiry (REU-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0007041

Reuters, September 21, 2005

U.S. President George W. Bush has named his homeland security adviser, Fran Townsend, to lead an internal inquiry into the much-criticized federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House said on Tuesday.

Townsend will look at "what went right, what went wrong and lessons learned from the federal response to Hurricane Katrina," said spokesman Trent Duffy, who spoke as Bush prepared to make his fifth trip to the disaster zone.

Bush has come under heavy fire for his handling of the hurricane and its aftermath. A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll released on Monday said 41 percent of Americans approved of his handling of the ordeal, compared to 57 percent who disapproved.

A separate congressional inquiry will also investigate what went wrong with the federal response. But Bush so far has refused to back calls from Democrats for an independent commission to look at the disaster response.

A memo from White House chief of staff Andrew Card directed government departments and agencies to designate by Tuesday one senior official to be the coordinator to work with Townsend for their specific agency.

The memo directed agencies to give this effort "their full attention and highest priority," Duffy said.

The goal is to apply lessons learned to future emergencies.

"The president said he wanted to hold people accountable. This is one of the many ways in which he will do that," the spokesman said.

Katrina slammed into Louisiana and Mississippi on August 29 with 140 mile-per-hour (224 kph) winds and a 30-foot (nine-metre) storm surge. Levees in New Orleans collapsed, flooding the city and leaving thousands of people stranded without any way to leave.

The Louisiana death toll had risen to 736 as of Monday, bringing the total dead from Katrina to 973, including 218 in Mississippi and 19 combined in Florida, Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.

What We Know So Far - And What We Don't (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Why did it take so long? Why was government at almost all levels sluggish in providing aid to the victims of hurricane Katrina?

That's an issue that will preoccupy Washington for months to come. This week, President Bush appointed domestic security adviser Frances Townsend to lead an internal White House inquiry. And Congress will almost certainly authorize a full-scale investigation into the Katrina response, though its form and timing are still disputed.

Individual congressional panels have already begun to hold hearings, but testimony so far has dealt with preparation for future disasters, not the havoc wrought by Katrina's fury.

That said, some lines of questioning are already obvious. From unread plans to unmobilized troops, to a command structure that at times seemed less organized than a soccer team of 7-year-olds, the Katrina response was a case study in confusion. Official briefings, after-action reports, and media accounts have begun to sketch in some crucial details about why this might have been so. Plan? What plan?

Disaster plans were either incomplete, or ignored. Take the Louisiana State Emergency Operations Plan, drawn up in 2000. It has an extensive section on the evacuation of southeast Louisiana, and subsequent sheltering of evacuees, in the event of a hurricane. According to the plan, those not able to drive away from New Orleans were to be transported on locally obtained buses.

Yet New Orleans city officials had long known that those buses would not be forthcoming. From Mayor Ray Nagin (D) on down, they have said that they knew they didn't have the resources to empty out the city as the plan said. As Mr. Nagin told The Wall Street Journal, his own plan was "get people to higher ground and have the Feds and the state airlift supplies to them."

An unanswered question is why the city did not use the resources it did have, even if those might not have been enough to fully transport the estimated 20 percent of the city that didn't leave by car. New Orleans had upwards of 300 buses, plus hundreds of school buses and other municipal vehicles.

Similarly, the relevance of the Department of Homeland Security's National Response Plan (NRP) to the effort that evolved now seems in question.

Released in December 2004, the NRP is an attempt to reorient national disaster preparedness. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), formerly an independent agency, is now part of the larger Homeland Security bureaucracy. Its main stated mission is to support state and local responders.

Thus FEMA waited for state and local officials to provide it with detailed lists of needs. As former director Michael Brown told The New York Times last week, "I never received specific requests for specific things that needed doing."

State and local officials, for their part, were perhaps still thinking about the old, independent FEMA. They were quickly overwhelmed by the disaster, and felt they had neither the time nor information to provided request spreadsheets.

As Congress furthers its Katrina inquiries, it will surely weigh whether FEMA should be plucked out of the larger Department of Homeland Security and made separate once again.

"We would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy," said Sen. Susan Collins (R) of Maine, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, at a kickoff hearing on Katrina last week. "Instead, we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response." Who's in charge?

Perhaps no single issue contributed to the slow-footedness of the initial Katrina response more than lack of leadership structure. As is now well-documented, top officials had little idea of who was in charge of what, when.

On Aug. 29, for instance, FEMA director Mr. Brown was in Baton Rouge, La. He has said he repeatedly warned his superiors in Washington that state and local officials were at odds, or not communicating, and that he was struggling to establish a "unified command."

The next day, 36 hours after the storm first hit, Department of Homeland Security (DHS) Secretary Michael Chertoff finally issued a memo that declared FEMA's Brown the "principal federal official" to coordinate Katrina response. He also declared the storm an "incident of national significance," invoking the full powers of the National Response Plan.

Yet Mr. Bush had already declared the area a disaster zone on Aug. 27, prior to the storm making landfall. Some DHS officials believe that that declaration had already involved the NRP, making Mr. Chertoff's later move irrelevant.

Not that state and local officials were looking for the feds to provide an on-site hurricane czar, they say. In one instance, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) turned down an attempt by Washington to assert more authority. On Sept. 2, she refused to sign over her 13,000 National Guard troops to federal control. She worried that the request was political, allowing Washington to depict prior failures as her fault. Send in the Marines

There is one national resource over which the White House has unquestioned command: the active-duty military. And in the wake of Katrina, some in Washington think the Pentagon should be more involved in the immediate response to disasters, whether they be storms or terrorist attacks.

Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, sent President Bush a letter last week saying it may be time to rethink long-standing laws that hinder the ability of active-duty troops to operate in the US.

These laws, such as the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878, generally prohibit the military from being used for domestic law enforcement. They were originally enacted to protect the nation against even a hint of military tyranny.

In part, this may be a reaction to reports that frustrated military units were held up prior to deployment to the Gulf, or never deployed at all. Units of the 82nd Airborne were reportedly put on alert on Aug. 30, for example, but then not immediately sent. Some military helicopter units in the Gulf felt they could have easily flown rescue missions, but were not tapped soon enough.

Specialized active-duty military personnel did begin racing toward the Gulf in Katrina's immediate wake. Air Force search-and-rescue teams, which include active, reserve, and Guard airmen, were at work in the region within 36 hours. But it was not until six days after the hurricane had hit land that Bush announced deployment of a large number of active-duty troops: 7,200, including Marines.

This is a separate issue from that of the strength of local National Guards. Louisiana has 3,000 Guard troops serving in Iraq, and it's not yet clear whether this had any effect on the ability of state guard commanders to respond to the storm.

As Katrina's lessons are sorted, sober conclusions are already being drawn. "The Katrina disaster and the failure of leadership at so many levels ... has had to have encouraged terrorists," said former Secretary of the Navy John Lehman, a member of the 9/11 commission, last week.

Local, state, and federal officials all need to take action, said Lehman, "before it's too late."

Democrats Say Relief Effort Needs Independent Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Anne E. Kornblut

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - Congressional Democrats said on Tuesday that the arrest of a former senior White House budget official involved in organizing the federal response to Hurricane Katrina demonstrated the need for an independent investigation of the government's reaction to the disaster, especially since the official is married to a leading Republican Congressional aide.

The official, David H. Safavian, 38, a lawyer who was chief of procurement policy in the Office of Management and Budget until he resigned on Friday, was arrested Monday on charges of lying to federal investigators about his relationship with Jack Abramoff, a Washington lobbyist at the center of a corruption investigation at the Justice Department.

Mr. Safavian, who is free without bail, was also accused of lying about a 2002 golfing trip he took with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner, when Mr. Safavian worked at the General Services Administration.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, said the arrest of Mr. Safavian undermined the credibility of a House Republican plan to investigate the troubled hurricane-relief effort through a committee to be led by Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia. Mr. Safavian's wife, Jennifer, is chief counsel for oversight and investigations on the House Government Reform Committee, which Mr. Davis leads.

"Spouses are not responsible for their counterpart's activities," Ms. Pelosi said at a news conference. "But I do say when there is a direct link to the White House and procurement and the investigation that this committee is supposed to conduct, then I think that really shatters all sense of confidence."

Her criticism was echoed on Capitol Hill, with Democrats saying that beyond the criminal charges, Mr. Safavian had lacked the background for an important federal procurement post. They also said he was one of several senior Bush administration officials involved in the sluggish hurricane-relief effort who had been chosen for their jobs because of political connections.

Michael D. Brown, who was chosen by President Bush to direct the Federal Emergency Management Agency, resigned last week after widespread criticism that he and many of his top aides had had little emergency management experience.

Democrats have also been critical of the recent nomination of a lawyer with little immigration experience to lead the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency within the Department of Homeland Security. The lawyer, Julie L. Myers, is the niece of Gen. Richard B. Myers of the Air Force, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"I'd be interested in how Mr. Safavian got his job," Ms. Pelosi said. "Mr. Safavian doesn't have the credentials that would justify his being the top procurement person for the White House. Did any influential members of Congress recommend him to that job? Is there a connection between his wife and that recommendation?"

The General Services Administration, which manages government buildings and other property, refused to answer questions Tuesday about how Mr. Safavian got his job as the agency's chief of staff from 2002 until last year.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director of management for the Office of Management and Budget, said in a statement that he had urged that Mr. Safavian be hired at the budget office last year because "I was impressed with his knowledge of the issues, agencies and the Hill."

"No one interfered or pressured me to do it," Mr. Johnson said.

Mr. Safavian was involved in developing broad policies for federal contracting in the hurricane-relief effort along the Gulf Coast, but Mr. Johnson said Mr. Safavian had nothing to do with awarding individual contracts for emergency relief work.

"No one at O.M.B.," he said, "including Mr. Safavian, is authorized to be involved in any contracting decisions, and I'm not aware of that happening. It's not part of our mission."

Mr. Davis said through a spokesman that he had done nothing to help Mr. Safavian obtain his jobs in the administration.

Mr. Safavian and his wife did not respond to telephone messages left at their home in Alexandria, Va. The Justice Department did not notify news organizations of the arrest until after Mr. Safavian had made his first court appearance, which prevented reporters from observing the hearing. His lawyer also did not return phone calls for comment.

The White House and the Department of Homeland Security stepped up their efforts on Tuesday to rescue the nomination of Ms. Myers, a former federal prosecutor in Brooklyn, to the immigration post.

"Julie Myers is well-respected within the law enforcement community and highly qualified to lead the Immigration and Customs Enforcement," said Erin Healy, a White House spokeswoman. "We will work with the Senate to ensure her confirmation."

But the nomination faced new challenges, some not directly related to Ms. Myers's qualifications.

Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, threatened Tuesday to block the nomination unless he received a secret F.B.I. memo about interrogations of terror suspects that he has been seeking for months; the May 2004 memorandum details the concerns of F.B.I. agents about the interrogation of suspected members of Al Qaeda held at the Navy base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Democrats have questioned whether the memorandum mentions Michael Chertoff, who directed the Justice Department's criminal division in Mr. Bush's first term and who is now the secretary of homeland security. Ms. Myers, whose nomination to the Homeland Security job was the subject of an article in the Tuesday editions of The Washington Post, had been Mr. Chertoff's chief of staff at the Justice Department. She married Mr. Chertoff's current chief of staff last weekend.

Aide Was Reticent On Lobbying For Foreign Clients (WP)

By Susan Schmidt And R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

David H. Safavian, the Bush administration official arrested Monday, initially failed to disclose lobbying work he had done for several controversial foreign clients when he went before a Senate panel last year to be confirmed as chief of the White House's federal procurement office.

The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee held up Safavian's nomination for more than a year, in part because of lawmakers' concerns about lobbying work for two men later accused of links to suspected terrorist organizations, according to committee documents. Safavian did not disclose his firm's representation of the men until questioned in writing by the committee's staff, and initially failed to tell the panel he had registered as a foreign agent for two controversial African regimes.

The Senate panel nevertheless approved him unanimously and the Senate followed suit on Nov. 21, 2004.

Safavian was arrested Monday on charges of lying and obstructing an investigation into former powerhouse lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings with the federal government. Safavian resigned his government post Friday. Yesterday, his attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Senate approval of Safavian occurred two months after The Washington Post disclosed Safavian's participation in an August 2002 Scotland golf trip with Abramoff. That trip was central to the criminal complaint against Safavian unsealed on Monday.

Yesterday, a spokeswoman for committee chairwoman Susan Collins (R-Maine) said the review of Safavian's background had been thorough.

"Based on our extensive review of his qualifications and background, we had no reason to believe that Mr. Safavian had engaged in any wrongdoing," said a spokeswoman for Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), the committee's senior Democrat at the time of the vote.

The record of Safavian's confirmation shows extensive questioning by the committee staff about his alleged lobbying for local Muslim leader Abdurahman Alamoudi, who in October 2000 made widely publicized comments supporting Hezbollah and the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, at a rally in Lafayette Park.

Lobby disclosure forms originally filed by Safavian's firm, Janus-Merritt Strategies, show that it represented Alamoudi, a prominent Muslim activist, until 2001. Alamoudi has since been convicted and imprisoned for accepting money from the Libyan government as part of an alleged plot to assassinate the crown prince of Saudi Arabia.

Janus-Merritt Strategies changed its lobby disclosure forms in 2001 to indicate that its client was not Alamoudi but Jamal Barzinji. In March 2002, Barzinji was named in a search warrant affidavit filed by a Customs Service official as "the officer or director" of a group of entities in Northern Virginia "controlled by individuals who have shown support for terrorists or terrorist fronts." No charges have been filed against Barzinji, and he has denied any wrongdoing.

Safavian told the committee in an April 16, 2004, letter that he and his firm never did any work for Alamoudi. He said the firm lobbied at Barzinji's request to gain U.S. support to free the former deputy prime minister of Malaysia, Anwar Ibrahim, who was imprisoned for six years.

Safavian also told the committee that he had "overlooked" two other clients while preparing his initial submissions for the OMB position. He did not initially mention work as a registered foreign agent for Gabon, a country persistently rated by the United States as having a "poor" human rights record, or his work as a registered foreign agent for Pascal Lissouba, the former president of the Republic of Congo who has been tried in absentia for treason and embezzlement.

Safavian, former chief of staff at the General Services Administration, is charged with three counts of making false statements and obstructing a GSA investigation into his ties with Abramoff. Before joining the government, Safavian worked as a lobbyist with Abramoff, then founded Janus-Merritt Strategies with conservative antitax crusader Grover Norquist.

As a lobbyist, he represented the government of Pakistan on military sales matters and the Islamic Institute in an effort to promote a U.S. postage stamp commemorating Ramadan. With Abramoff, he also represented the Commonwealth of Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. protectorate, to try to block the imposition of minimum wage rules.

In its probe, the Senate committee also raised questions about a potential conflict of interest between Safavian and his wife, Jennifer, the chief counsel for oversight and investigations at the House Committee of Government Reform, which oversees federal procurement policy matters.

Safavian said his wife had pledged to recuse herself from "any matters where the conduct of officials and employees" at the Office of Management and Budget the principal issue, "as well as matters relating specifically to procurement policy, competitive sourcing, or information technology."

Ex-GSA Official Charged With Hindering Probe (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

A former Bush administration official is charged with making false statements and obstructing a federal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

David Safavian, a former chief of staff of the General Services Administration (GSA) and Abramoff lobbying associate, concealed from federal investigators that Mr. Abramoff was seeking to do business with the government when Mr. Safavian, a GSA official at the time, joined him on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to an FBI affidavit and government officials.

FBI agent Jeffrey A. Reising said in the affidavit that a lobbyist -- identified elsewhere as Mr. Abramoff -- had enlisted Mr. Safavian's help in trying to gain control of 40 acres of land at the Federal Research Center at White Oak in Silver Spring for a private high school that Mr. Abramoff helped establish.

Mr. Safavian edited a letter that the lobbyist was preparing to send to the GSA and arranged and attended a meeting involving a GSA official, the lobbyist's wife and others to discuss leasing the property, according to the affidavit.

Mr. Abramoff told his wife to use her maiden name at the meeting because Mr. Safavian sought to play down Mr. Abramoff's involvement, according to the affidavit.

Mr. Safavian was given clearance to go on the August 2002 golf trip after telling the GSA's ethics officer that the lobbyist "has no business before GSA," according to the affidavit.

Nine persons, including Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, made the trip and played golf on the fabled Old Course at St. Andrews in Scotland. Mr. Safavian paid $3,100 for the travel, "in the exercise of discretion," he said, as quoted in the affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0007046

Mr. Safavian moved to the Office of Management and Budget last year, becoming the administration's top procurement official. He resigned from that post, effective Friday, OMB spokesman Alex Conant said.

No one answered the phone at a listing for Mr. Safavian in Alexandria.

Mr. Safavian worked with Mr. Abramoff on the team at the Preston, Gates & Ellis law firm that was lobbying to keep the Northern Mariana Islands free from certain U.S. labor and immigration laws during the last half of the 1990s.

Mr. Abramoff is not named in the affidavit, but two government officials confirmed he is the person referred to in the affidavit as Lobbyist A. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is still under way.

In addition, Mr. Safavian was asked in February for information about the golf trip by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Both the Senate panel and a federal grand jury are investigating deals in which Mr. Abramoff and an associate received at least $66 million from six Indian tribes to lobby for their casinos and other interests.

Separately, Mr. Abramoff has pleaded not guilty to a six-count federal fraud and conspiracy indictment stemming from his role in the 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats in Florida.

No Progress In Fight Over Hurricane Panel (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 21, 2005

Democrats and Republicans in both chambers remained unwilling Tuesday to cede ground on the terms of the joint bicameral committee tasked with investigating the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, leaving the select panel's future in question.

While some talks appeared to be under way in the Senate, the House remained deadlocked on the composition of the panel. House Democrats continued to press their call for an independent panel modeled after the 9/11 Commission, while the GOP leadership was poised to move forward and appoint its members to the joint committee today.

House Republicans vowed to forge ahead with the panel regardless of whether Democrats decide to participate.

"I would just once again call on the Democrats, in the interest of the truth and the victims of Hurricane Katrina, to set aside any partisan hostilities and join the Republicans and the bipartisan, bicameral joint select committee to review the preparations in response to the devastating hurricane," Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said during his regular press briefing.

DeLay declined to speculate on whether Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) might choose to appoint Democrats to the panel himself if House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) declines to do so. He also pointed out that Katrina committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) already has announced plans to call former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown as a witness and said that it would be "pretty irresponsible of the Democrats to miss that opportunity" to question him.

Pelosi, for her part, reiterated her position Tuesday, saying Democrats will not come to the table and participate unless Republicans give them equal representation on the committee as well as full subpoena power. The 20-person panel would be made up of 11 Republicans and nine Democrats under the GOP proposal.

Brendan Daly, spokesman to Pelosi, said: "As it stands now, it's a sham. There's been no change in her position on that."

Daly added that Democrats will not participate with Republicans on the joint committee unless concessions are made, and at this point, "there's been no attempt [by Republicans] to compromise."

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Tuesday that a 9/11-style commission is the best and only way to ensure Americans get the answers they deserve about the Katrina response. He added that it is critical to find out why — four years after 9/11 — "we were still so ill prepared to respond effectively."

"The public saw the 9/11 Commission, they thought the 9/11 Commission did a good job," Hoyer said.

But Congressional Democrats also face a risk in appearing to obstruct any investigation, despite the fact that polling showed a huge majority of respondents favoring an independent commission. One House Democratic leadership aide suggested that it is politically tenuous for either party to keep up the stalemate indefinitely.

"Who is going to give any credibility to an investigation that is led by a Republican and only involves Republicans?" this source said. "I think that it behooves both sides to come to a compromise, but that doesn't mean that a compromise is going to occur."

Across the Capitol, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) were expected to meet today to discuss the select committee controversy.

Reid has been under heavy pressure from Pelosi and other Democrats not to go along with Frist's plan to use the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, chaired by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), as the main vehicle to lead the Senate's investigation into the Bush administration handling of the Katrina crisis.

Senate GOP leadership aides said it was vital for Congress to discharge its oversight role in probing the Katrina disaster immediately, adding that there was time for an independent commission to be appointed after the present crisis has been resolved.

"This is no time for Congress to give up its oversight role," said a Republican staffer. "This is a time for action, and this is what standing committees are designed for. A select committee could also be helpful, but Congress needs to act, and an independent commission releasing some report in a year is not going to help anything."

Reid, though, has objected to Frist's proposal for a select committee. Democrats believe the proposal, as drafted, does not cover a long enough time period to investigate and also gives too much weight to the House in deciding what direction the panel should take. "As it is currently drafted, Sen. Reid will oppose" the Frist select-committee proposal, said Rebecca Kirsner, a Reid aide.

Without a plan for a joint committee in place, GOP leaders are striving to show that their party is actively moving ahead in addressing the humanitarian crisis wrought by Katrina.

Senate Republicans were briefed Tuesday by Office of Management and Budget Director Josh Bolton on the status of the Katrina recovery effort. Bolton's briefing included a detailed breakdown of how and where the Bush administration has spent the $62 billion in emergency funds appropriated by lawmakers so far.

Bolton told the GOP Senators that the administration has disbursed roughly $16 billion so far, and some Republican insiders are now beginning to question whether an additional emergency supplemental will even be necessary, especially if tight controls are implemented on funding recovery programs for Katrina victims.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), whose home state was hit hard by Katrina, cautioned his colleagues in an emotional appeal to be careful about appearing insensitive to the plight of those whose lives were disrupted by Katrina. "It's not all about the money," the Mississippi Republican said on Tuesday of his closed-door speech to the Senate GOP Conference. "We have to make sure we are aware that a lot of people have lost everything. Nobody is saying don't worry about how we spend federal funds. Be we need to get people back on their feet first."

Katrina's Cost May Test GOP Harmony (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Congressional Republicans from across the ideological spectrum yesterday rejected the White House's open-wallet approach to rebuilding the Gulf Coast, a sign that the lockstep GOP discipline that George W. Bush has enjoyed for most of his presidency is eroding on Capitol Hill.

Trying to allay mounting concerns, White House budget director Joshua B. Bolten met with Republican senators for an hour after their regular Tuesday lunch. Senators emerged to say they were annoyed by the lack of concrete ideas for paying the Hurricane Katrina bill.

"Very entertaining," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said sarcastically as he left the session. "I haven't heard any specifics from the administration."

"At least give us some idea" of how to cover the cost, said Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who is facing reelection in 2006. "We owe that to the American taxpayer."

The pushback on Katrina aid, which the White House is also confronting among House Republicans, represents the loudest and most widespread dissent Bush has faced from his own party since it took full control of Congress in 2002. As polls show the president's approval numbers falling, there is growing concern among lawmakers that GOP margins in Congress could shrink next year, and even rank-and-file Republicans are complaining that Bush is shirking the difficult budget decisions that must accompany the rebuilding bonanza.

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) said he and other fiscal conservatives are feeling "genuine concern [which] could easily turn into frustration and anger."

Congressional Republicans are not arguing with Bush's pledge that the federal government will lead the Louisiana and Mississippi recovery. But they are insisting that the massive cost -- as much as $200 billion -- be paid for. Conservatives are calling for spending cuts to existing programs, a few GOP moderates are entertaining the possibility of a tax increase, and many in the middle want to freeze Bush tax cuts that have yet to take effect.

The resistance suggests that Bush's second term could turn out far rockier and more contentious than his first. One indicator many Republicans are watching to gauge whether Bush is becoming a liability for the party is in Pennsylvania, where Rick Santorum, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, is trailing state treasurer Bob Casey Jr. by double digits.

"My caucus would do anything for Senator Santorum," Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) said of his colleague. Chafee, who himself faces a tough reelection battle next year, predicted Republicans will increasingly be faced with the choice of propping up Bush or protecting their own. "I think they're going to collide," Chafee said of the two options.

Asked whether Bush's problems were a factor in his slump, Santorum responded, "That may be."

The White House is aware of the growing political problem and has moved on several fronts to pacify Republicans -- with decidedly uneven results. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, in a speech yesterday, said the White House will be forced to put several plans on the "back burner," including changes to the estate tax and permanently extending first-term tax cuts. "It's taken over the national agenda, and I think it will for a while," he said.

This prompted protests from one of the White House's closest allies, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), who said waiting on taxes was unacceptable. But White House officials said Snow was accurately reflecting Bush's intentions.

Amid this friction, top White House officials told Republicans the relief and recovery package could come in much lower than widely quoted projections of $200 billion. Some House GOP leaders also are urging their colleagues to cool off, reminding them that the true cost of the relief effort is not yet known.

"There are tough choices that are going to have to be made," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan. "We're going to have to cut unnecessary spending elsewhere in the budget to offset some of the cost with Katrina."

House conservatives are particularly riled. Unhappy about spending growth during Bush's first term, they thought they had slowed the pace when Congress passed a relatively austere fiscal 2006 budget this spring.

A group of these conservatives, including Feeney, plans today to present to the White House a proposal to cover the cost of the entire Katrina relief and reconstruction package. Dubbed "Operation Offset," it will include repealing many of the pork-barrel projects stuffed into the $286 billion highway bill that Bush signed into law a few weeks before Katrina struck.

McCain called on Bush to undo the Medicare prescription drug law, while a number of lawmakers said the costly benefit should at least be postponed from its January starting date. Republicans are pressing ahead with the Medicare changes, even as the White House spreads the word it is opposed to such a move.

In one of the most unexpected proposals to cover the reconstruction costs, Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) raised the possibility of raising taxes. Other Republicans say that while a tax increase is unlikely, Bush tax cuts that are scheduled to take effect in coming years may be in serious jeopardy.

Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said he will even comb through the Pentagon budget for cost savings. "Many of us think that we need to step back and look at what we're doing and reevaluate it," Voinovich said. But he added that "someone has to look at the big picture" -- and that someone should be the president. "The vision is missing," Voinovich said.

A new Gallup poll shows a majority of Americans believe the mission in Iraq should be cut to cover the recovery costs, while only a small fraction support slashing other domestic programs, raising taxes or increasing the deficit to finance it. New Orleans also has emerged as the chief target of angst. "The question is do we really want to flood New Orleans with money," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.).

Kingston said he has detected a building hostility toward New Orleans among his constituents, based on reports that local officials mismanaged the crisis, along with federal dollars that had previously flowed the region's way. "What we are hearing from constituents is: 'Wait a minute, slow down on this,' " Kingston said.

Deficits have rarely emerged as a potent political issue, with the exception of Ross Perot's independent bid for the presidency in 1992, but some worried Republicans believe the deficit may soon reach an untenable level, especially if Democrats can link it to Republican mismanagement.

"I don't know that anyone ever lost a race because of the deficit, but there is concern" that it could happen this time around, said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the former head of the National Republican Congressional Committee. "You can't just keep piling up debt."

Message Chaos Afflicts Both Parties As Katrina Aftermath Washes Discipline Away (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

For about an hour and a half yesterday, Republicans had a new tax-cut policy.

Addressing a group of credit-union officials in the morning, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow said that hurricane recovery spending would "push to the back burner" the GOP's plans to extend the tax cuts this year.

But about 90 minutes later, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) held a news conference in his office and asserted that "we're not reexamining" the commitment to extend the tax cuts. "That's not an option," DeLay said, then, for emphasis, added: "Not an option."

Across the aisle and on the other side of the Capitol, Democrats were having similar difficulty staying on message. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) went to the Senate floor to announce his opposition to Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr., and to say that "senators should take notice" of the civil rights objections to the nominee.

But as those words were ringing through the chamber, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), was outside the cloakroom telling reporters that Reid "is speaking as an individual and as the senior senator from Nevada." The leader of the Democrats, Leahy said, is "not speaking for the caucus."

Katrina has washed away party discipline in Washington. With President Bush submerged -- a Gallup poll released yesterday showed that his support has actually fallen to 40 percent since his prime-time speech from Louisiana last week -- Republicans decided to stake out their own positions. And Democrats, with no obvious party leader, are quarreling over message and messenger.

The result: It's every man for himself in Washington. Nature may abhor a vacuum, but politics loves one.

The chairman of the House Republicans' campaign effort, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), told colleagues that they should drop plans for Social Security legislation this year. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) said Reynolds spoke only for himself.

Vice President Cheney said he sees no need for a "czar" to oversee the Katrina response. But Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said after meeting with administration figures yesterday: "I feel we need a czar, an administrator."

The message chaos in the governing party would seem to present an opportunity for the Democrats. But the opposition party is itself divided. Oppose Roberts? Pull out of Iraq? Repeal tax cuts? Democrats are split -- and leaderless.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean took a turn as party leader last week, comparing Roberts to DeLay and Bush aide Karl Rove. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has also vied to speak for the party, calling Bush "oblivious, in denial, dangerous."

On Sunday, former president Bill Clinton took his turn as party leader, attacking the Bush tax cuts. Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) and John Edwards, his former running mate, gave dueling auditions for party leader on Monday.

Yesterday, Reid took the party's reins. Apparently unable to settle on a theme for a morning news conference with Pelosi, the two leaders' news bulletin promised a smorgasbord: Katrina, the federal budget, judicial nominations and the Voting Rights Act.

In the afternoon, Reid held a session with reporters in which he acknowledged that his status as the party's Senate leader only goes so far. "Roberts will get plenty of votes" from Democrats, he said. Reid said he did not ask other Democrats to vote no because "you can only go to the well so many times."

As Reid abandoned hope of a party line on Roberts, Republicans down the hall were openly rebelling against the administration. After meeting with White House budget director Joshua B. Bolten, the GOP senators emerged decidedly off-message, demanding a recovery "czar" and criticizing Bush's spending habits.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) speculated that money will be saved because "we're going to be pulling troops out" of Iraq next year. Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) demanded "some idea" from the administration on Katrina spending, saying: "You'll spill more on the ground than you'll get to the trough."

DeLay, for his part, seemed to be paying the administration no attention at all. A week ago, at a time when Bush was saying "we're going to have to cut unnecessary spending" to pay for the Katrina response, DeLay said the House Republicans had cut just about everything there was to cut.

At his weekly news conference yesterday, when a reporter asked about future supplemental spending for Katrina, DeLay interrupted. "We don't know that there's going to be another supplemental," he said.

This seemed odd because Bolten had said two weeks earlier that he expected "a need for additional supplemental spending."

The reporter pressed, saying "we assume there is" going to be more Katrina spending.

"No," DeLay said, "we don't."

Katrina Clean-up Will 'hurt Bush Agenda' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 21, 2005

The need to focus on the damage and clean-up from Hurricane Katrina will delay other parts of the administration's economic agenda, John Snow, US Treasury secretary, admitted on Tuesday.

"It's taken over the national agenda and I think it will for a while," said Mr Snow said during remarks to the National Association of Federal Credit Unions in Washington. "I think it will push to the back burner some issues that otherwise would have been on the agenda now the estate tax, tax cut permanence, GSEs [government-sponsored enterprises] and other things."

Mr Snow also played down estimates that reconstruction work following Katrina, which struck the Gulf coast on August 29, would eventually cost taxpayers $200bn (£110bn, €165bn).

"Will the relief and reconstruction by costly? Of course it will," he said. "But I want to assure you that this administration. . . will not stray from our course of federal deficit reduction."

White House officials denied that Mr Snow's remarks meant Mr Bush was re-thinking his agenda. "The president has said the Katrina recovery effort will be the top priority," said Trent Duffy, White House spokesman. "The rest of his agenda is still important. A lot of tax relief does not expire this year, so there is no tremendous urgency. He will not raise taxes."

Scott Milburn, spokesman at the Office of Management and Budget, added: "We think tax cuts still need to be made permanent. That is key to preserving our economic expansion."

The comments come amid fierce political skirmishing over tax cuts, and concern from both Democrats and Republicans about how to pay for post-Katrina reconstruction. There are also continued concerns about the $62bn in immediate hurricane relief approved in two separate bills by Congress.

Newt Gingrich, former House speaker, said: "Congress has granted $61,000 per person [to hurricane victims] in the Gulf Coast from the two panic bills. Before they go charging off a cliff, they need to look at that."

Democrats have used the battle over hurricane spending to resist efforts to make the tax cuts permanent. Those concerns were echoed on Monday by a prominent Republican senator, George Voinovich of Ohio.

Yet many Republicans are eager to press ahead. When asked whether he would reconsider his stance on permanent tax cuts, Tom DeLay, House majority leader, said, “That is raising taxes and. . . that is not an option.” Mr DeLay also warned that failing to make the tax cuts permanent could “pour cold water” on economic growth.

Conservative members of the House Republican Study Committee are also expected on Wednesday to launch “Operation Offset” a push designed to outline ideas for spending cuts and to reduce the federal debt “so that the reconstruction costs aren't passed on to our nation's children and grandchildren in an enormous debt burden”, the group said.

Lawmakers Prepare Plans To Finance Storm Relief (New York Times)

By Carl Hulse

New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - Conservative House Republicans plan to recommend on Wednesday more than $500 billion in savings over 10 years to compensate for the costs of Hurricane Katrina as lawmakers continue to struggle to develop a consensus on the fiscal approach to the disaster.

At the top of a partial list of the potential cuts being circulated on Tuesday were previously suggested ideas like delaying the start of the new Medicare prescription drug coverage for one year to save $31 billion and eliminating $25 billion in projects from the newly enacted transportation measure.

The list also proposed eliminating the Moon-Mars initiative that NASA announced on Monday, for $44 billion in savings; ending support for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, $4 billion; cutting taxpayer payments for the national political conventions and the presidential election campaign fund, $600 million; and charging federal employees for parking, $1.54 billion.

"What House conservatives will demonstrate through Operation Offset is that there is more than enough room in the federal budget to provide for the needs of the families affected by Katrina without raising taxes," said a House Republican aide who is working with lawmakers on the proposals and who insisted on anonymity because the package would not be made public until Wednesday.

The suggestions are certain to draw serious opposition from other lawmakers who consider those programs essential, illustrating the difficulty faced by the majority Republicans in finding acceptable ways to offset the hurricane costs.

Before the list was made public, Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the House majority leader, declared that delaying the Medicare plan was a nonstarter. Mr. DeLay also expressed skepticism that most lawmakers would want to revisit the transportation bill, saying he would be reluctant to sacrifice the projects that he won for his district in the Houston area.

"My earmarks are pretty important to building an economy in that region," Mr. DeLay said of the local projects he backed in the bill. A watchdog group said those items totaled more than $114 million.

Mr. DeLay said Republicans would press ahead this year with their planned tax cuts, though Treasury Secretary John W. Snow told a trade association on Tuesday that some tax measures might have to be delayed, including a repeal of the estate tax and the effort to make permanent some cuts instituted earlier in the Bush administration.

"I think it will push to the back burner some issues that otherwise would have been on the agenda now," Mr. Snow said in a speech to the National Association of Federal Credit Unions.

Senate Republicans met for more than an hour on Tuesday with Joshua B. Bolten, director of the Office of Management and Budget, to try to hash out an approach to hurricane-related spending, a problem that lawmakers acknowledge is among the most difficult they have faced.

Senators said they continued to press the White House to name a prominent individual to oversee the relief effort, creating a central contact point for the flow of money, as well as many legislative proposals.

In the House, Democratic leaders called for establishing a special commission to try to prevent fraud and abuse in spending on the recovery.

"We need to make sure that federal contracts are awarded based on confidence and integrity instead of cronyism and greed," Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California, said. "And at long last, we need to start putting the interests of the taxpayers ahead of the private contractor."

Senate Republican leaders promised to be diligent in overseeing the money, which they said was being spent more slowly than immediately after the storm. They said they would keep the deficit in mind.

Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said Congress needed "to make sure that that money is spent wisely, that it is spent with full accountability, that it is spent with fiscal responsibility and transparency."

There was a sharp split among Republicans. Some were more insistent on clearly defined cuts than others.

"There is no agreement to pay for this at all," Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, said. "Those of us who would like to pay for it are very much a minority within our caucus."

Mr. DeLay said estimates that the recovery and rebuilding effort could cost $200 billion or more were unfounded. Other lawmakers disputed that, saying none of the rebuilding costs have been considered, as the Louisiana delegation is preparing a multibillion-dollar aid request.

Republicans Split Over Paying For Hurricane Aid (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, September 21, 2005

Republicans in Congress are deeply split over whether to pay for the burgeoning costs of hurricane relief by cutting domestic programs or to simply add billions of dollars to the growing U.S. national debt, top lawmakers and congressional aides said on Tuesday.

"There's no agreement to pay for this at all. Those of us who would like to pay for it are very much a minority within our caucus," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, a New Hampshire Republican.

Congress has approved $62.3 billion in emergency aid following the death and destruction suffered along the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina slammed ashore last month.

Some early estimates pegged the ultimate federal cost of repairing infrastructure, homes, businesses and farms in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama at around $200 billion.

Last week, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay told reporters that "it is right to borrow to pay for it."

But with the Bush administration expected to ask for another round of emergency funds in coming weeks, conservative Republicans in the House and Senate are increasingly vocal about the need to offset costs with domestic spending cuts.

Revisiting the issue on Tuesday, DeLay said, "We are in the process of looking" at spending cuts that might help pay for the biggest federal disaster relief effort in history.

He added that tax increases "are not an option."

In the Senate, Gregg refused to rule out tax hikes, saying Congress must "look at all functions of the budget, including the revenue side."

He refused to say whether a revenue review could include consideration of tax increases, putting off extensions of Republican tax cuts already enacted or raising the wide range of government fees on businesses and individuals.

"I'm willing to look at a revenue solution and I'm not going to get too specific about it," Gregg said after leaving a meeting of Senate Republicans also attended by Vice President Dick Cheney.

If Republicans choose the spending-cut route, a tough fight is anticipated. Prominent Republicans, including Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) of Arizona, called for delaying next year's start of a Medicare prescription drug benefit for the elderly and cutting highway projects approved this summer.

DeLay called the Medicare postponement a "nonstarter" and noted President Bush had ruled out the idea. He said it would be difficult to reopen the highway legislation, which took two years to pass.

Also on Tuesday, the Federal Reserve raised key interest rates for the 11th straight time and signaled more increases to come, saying Hurricane Katrina will provide only a temporary setback to economic growth.

That conclusion is at odds with the views of some House Republicans, including Speaker Dennis Hastert, who have voiced support for an economic stimulus they say is needed to counter any hits the economy could take because of the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0007053

The liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities on Tuesday said such a package of tax cuts, which would likely help businesses and individuals not hit by the hurricane, would be "costly" and "ill-advised."

GOP Factions Vie Over Offset Plans (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 21, 2005

The debate over paying for the recovery from Hurricane Katrina continued Tuesday as various factions within the House GOP floated ideas for spending offsets and jockeyed for position.

Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) embraced the idea of finding spending offsets but declined to endorse any specific proposals, while the conservative Republican Study Committee met with GOP leaders to discuss their own plans and Republican moderates focused on strengthening oversight of the massive federal outlays that are already under way.

The RSC's meeting with the leadership Tuesday came as some leaders had grown concerned that the conservative group's high-profile push for spending offsets were making the party look bad.

In classic Washington, D.C., fashion, one leadership aide described the meeting as a "frank" discussion, during which the RSC lawmakers were told that the total costs for Katrina were still unclear and that it was a useless exercise to try to find offsets for more than the $62 billion Congress has already appropriated.

"We don't have a $200 billion supplemental request from the president," said the leadership aide, who noted that the meeting ended with a spirit of cooperation. "We need to take a hard look at the RSC's list [of offsets]. ... If we have the votes to pass them, we'll do them."

While the RSC's hand would be strengthened if the group could attract some moderate lawmakers to its cause, such outreach appears unlikely in this case.

Though the RSC and the centrist Tuesday Group have been able to work together occasionally in the past, particularly on budget process reform, the two GOP factions are singing from different songbooks on Katrina.

"A lot of the things the RSC wants to do, to the moderates, are unrealistic," said Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.), a leading Tuesday Group member.

Specifically, Castle and other moderate Members and aides said they would be unlikely to support the RSC proposal to delay implementation of the Medicare prescription drug bill for a year.

"I think that's more posturing than it is reality at this point," Castle said of the idea.

Instead, the Tuesday Group is primarily focused on implementing stringent oversight over the money Congress appropriates for Katrina. Many moderate lawmakers were in Chicago this past weekend to attend a Republican Main Street Partnership retreat, and those Members agreed to endorse a proposal by Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) to create a special inspector general to scrutinize Katrina spending.

But while the RSC has been vocal in staking out ground on the offsets issue, the Tuesday Group has been relatively quiet about its plans.

"We don't copy the RSC. We do our own thing," said Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), the co-chairman of the Tuesday Group.

Kirk suggested that the main difference between the two groups was stylistic, with the Tuesday Group preferring to work behind the scenes.

"The difference between us and the RSC is a lot less press releases," Kirk said. "I'm less interested in getting a lot of attention and more interested in getting the special IG."

The RSC will hold a press conference today to unveil the list of specific offset ideas the group shared with leadership Tuesday. Yet even within that conservative faction, the possibility remains that not every member will support all of the proposed spending cuts.

In an e-mail sent Monday to all RSC press secretaries, the office of the group's chairman, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), wrote: "We are coming up with a list of federal savings ... and are NOT asking all those who come to the press conference to endorse all the savings, but ARE SEEKING about 10 Members to specifically take ownership over one offset idea and speak to that at the press conference."

As the RSC trumpets its plan, DeLay has spent this week sharpening his own message about how to deal with the budgetary consequences of Katrina.

At his press briefing last week, DeLay sparked controversy by lauding the GOP's record of fiscal discipline and declaring an "ongoing victory" against government waste.

Following an outcry from his fellow conservatives, DeLay sought to clarify his remarks Tuesday as a he faced a barrage of questions from reporters seeking specific details on how the billions of dollars spent on Katrina might be offset.

While conceding that he spoke "inartfully" last week, DeLay reiterated his praise for the party's overall record of fiscal accomplishment, saying that "this Republican House has been focussed on fiscal responsibility and fiscal restraint" since the GOP took power in 1995.

And after saying last week that he was waiting for someone to bring him a list of realistic spending offsets, DeLay reiterated Tuesday his desire to find spending cuts, though he declined to address many specific ideas.

"There are programs all over the federal budget that are bloated or wasteful or inefficiently using the funds we provide them, and I'm very interested in identifying them," DeLay said.

While DeLay agrees in principle with his fellow conservatives about the importance of finding offsets, the Majority Leader was dismissive of the idea to delay the Medicare bill by a year.

"The president has already spoken on that, and it's a non-starter," DeLay said. Arguing that the Medicare bill was actually designed to save money in the long run anyway, DeLay said that "postponing a reform that is going to implement fiscal restraint doesn't make a whole lot of sense."

He was less clear in his views on another potential spending fix: reopening the highway bill to remove Member earmarks.

"It's still an option, and we're going to look at that [and] many others," DeLay said, though he later emphasized the economic importance of the highway bill and political difficulties that would be associated with revisiting it.

After Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that she would be willing to forgo her highway bill earmarks to help pay for Katrina, DeLay was asked if he would do the same.

"I don't know about that," DeLay said. "I would take a look at it. My earmarks are pretty important to building an economy in that region."

DeLay also criticized the idea of putting off extending President Bush's tax cuts and said that they remained on the agenda, saying that not extending the cuts would be the equivalent of raising taxes.

"Katrina tax hikes are not about Katrina; they're about tax hikes, and they are not an option," he said.

Recovery's Cost Forces Lawmakers To Reassess Pet Spending Projects (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Pressure is growing to help pay for Hurricane Katrina's costs by getting members of Congress to give up the pet spending projects they've inserted into legislation for their states or districts.

But some top lawmakers are decidedly unenthusiastic.

"Kiss my ear!" Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, told a Fairbanks newspaper reporter when asked whether he'd return the $223 million he'd "earmarked" for a bridge in the Alaskan outback. Young is chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee.

Earmarks are projects that have neither been requested by the administration nor deemed worthy by a congressional committee. Over the years they've become as prevalent as grease on a machine's gears. The 1991 transportation bill contained 538 earmarks. This year's had 4,373. Last year's catchall appropriations bill, which wrapped together seven of the 13 annual spending bills, contained 8,000 earmarks totaling $10 billion.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, scoffed at the suggestion that he give up his earmarks, saying highway projects in his district contributed to economic growth. One watchdog group estimated DeLay's total earmarks at $114.4 million over five years.

"My earmarks are pretty important to building an economy in that region," DeLay said. "What's good about the highway bill ... is it creates hundreds of thousands of jobs. It is an economic engine that drives the economy."

Still, as pressure grows to reduce Katrina's bite from the federal budget, many lawmakers are being forced to take a second look at their appetites for federal money.

In Bozeman, Mont., a citizens' group petitioned its congressional delegation to rescind the $4 million the city obtained for a parking garage and direct the money instead to Katrina's victims. Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., a leading conservative in the House of Representatives, said he'd give up his $16 million in highway-bill earmarks to help pay Katrina's costs.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who guided $130 million in special projects into the highway bill, said Tuesday that she'd give up her own earmarks to help the devastated region. Later, however, she amended her stance, saying she wouldn't give up a $50 million retrofitting project for the Golden Gate Bridge to protect the span from earthquakes.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., railed against Republicans for inserting special spending projects that he said were "out of control." But when he was asked whether he'd give up his own $16 million in pet projects, Waxman replied: "How about everybody's earmarks? ... If you want to get rid of all the pork barrel projects, I'm for that."

Getting rid of earmarks alone would hardly make up for Katrina spending, however, which may total $200 billion before it's done. Highway bill earmarks total only $24.2 billion over five years. Even if they all were rescinded, that would save only $9.8 billion over five years because much of the money would go to states anyway under complicated allocation formulas.

Katrina's costs, however, clearly are fraying congressional relations, particularly within Republican ranks. Vice President Dick Cheney and White House Budget Director Joshua Bolten told Senate Republicans on Tuesday that the administration will seek more money for Katrina relief and reconstruction in mid-October. Congress already has approved almost $62 billion.

The Katrina discussion, held during a closed-door luncheon in the Capitol, prompted many Republicans to complain that the administration was too eager to spend money on the devastated region without providing adequate financial safeguards and recommending ways to pay the expense.

But several senators said no one recommended giving back his or her earmarks. And when Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., recommended a balanced package of spending cuts and revenue increases, he was met with stony silence.

Asked whether there were any alternative options worth pursuing to pay for Katrina, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., replied: "There aren't any. Everybody's mad."

A list of top earmarks, or "pork" projects, in this year's highway-spending bill compiled by Taxpayers for Common Sense, a budget watchdog group, is on the group's Web site at www.taxpayer.net/Transportation/safetealu/states.htm.

Highway Bill Earmarks Eyed For Storm Relief (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

The top House Democrat said yesterday she would give up some specific transportation projects in her San Francisco district to help pay for Hurricane Katrina, but Majority Leader Tom DeLay said he doesn't think cutting projects in his district is a good idea.

"The highway bill is an important part of building our economy," Mr. DeLay said. "You cannot have a strong economy unless you have a strong infrastructure."

Earmarks -- the specific spending projects members of Congress write into bills, which critics call "pork" -- have become a major focus of conservatives who want to cut spending to help pay for hurricane relief.

The highway bill contains about $24 billion in earmarks, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, put other lawmakers on the spot yesterday morning when she said she would give hers up.

DOJ_NMG_0007056

"I certainly would give up earmarks to help the people in the region," Mrs. Pelosi said, adding that her constituents would be "proud" to sacrifice.

But by the afternoon she had backtracked, saying she wouldn't give up all of the $128.6 million going to her district. She said the $58.8 million slated to retrofit the Golden Gate Bridge to protect it from earthquakes is a safety issue too important to forgo.

"You have to judge what are your priorities. And the priority for us, I think, is clearly about we want to help the people of the region," Mrs. Pelosi said, adding that Congress should first stop tax cuts planned for later this year.

Hurricane spending has become a dominant issue in Washington with lawmakers promising to spend whatever is necessary to rebuild the Gulf Coast. Some Republicans have called for deep cuts to pay for the spending, but they appear to be a minority.

Members of Congress have estimated Katrina's costs to be between $150 billion and $225 billion, but Mr. DeLay said nobody knows for sure.

"Anybody throwing around this $200 billion figure, it would be nice for one of you all to ask them where they get it, because there is no such a figure," he said. Mr. DeLay said that's why Republicans have not presented a comprehensive plan to pay for Katrina.

"The point is that if you don't know the figure, you don't have a plan," he said.

Mr. DeLay took heat from conservatives after telling reporters last week that the government should borrow money and add to the deficit to pay for Katrina. He specifically rejected cuts to the transportation bill, saying he hadn't seen any that would work.

Asked if that meant the government was running at peak efficiency, Mr. DeLay said, "Yes, after 11 years of Republican majority, we've pared it down pretty good."

But this week, he embraced cutting and said all options should be on the table.

"We are looking at every opportunity to save money and provide offsets for that that has already been authorized to be spent," Mr. DeLay said. "And we are continuing to look, while we are having oversight of how things are being spent."

He also said he did not mean to say there is no cutting room left in the budget.

"What I said was, fiscal restraint -- and I said it inartfully, I know -- I said it is an 'ongoing victory.' Ongoing is the operative word," Mr. DeLay said. "We are always involved in fiscal restraint and fiscal responsibility ever since we have been in the majority."

He at one point defended higher highway spending, arguing it creates jobs. But he also took credit for a two-year fight that cut about $90 billion out of the bill the Senate wanted.

"That was an incredible effort -- I think a laudable effort -- to keep the bank account as closed as possible in the highways," Mr. DeLay said.

He ruled out some conservatives' proposal to delay the Medicare prescription-drug benefit, set to kick in next year at a cost of $40 billion.

"That is a nonstarter," the Texas Republican said. "Medicare is a reform to save spending."

Gregg Open To Katrina Tax Increase (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 21, 2005

The chairman of the Senate Budget Committee refused to rule out increasing taxes yesterday as he and many of his GOP colleagues called for offsets to temper the effect of the next round of federal spending for disaster relief in the Gulf Coast.

"We've got two sides to the ledger," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). "I'm willing to look at a revenue solution … as part of a package."

Though Gregg declined to specify or rule out any solution, there are limited options for generating revenue, many of which involve deferring expected tax cuts or increasing taxes in a targeted or across-the-board fashion.

Conservatives demanded accountability and offsets in the next package of spending for the recovery from Hurricane Katrina, but many of them, including House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), scoffed at tax increases.

DOJ_NMG_0007057

"The so-called Katrina tax hikes are not about Katrina; they're about tax hikes and will only serve to balloon the oversized, under-responsive emergency-management system that broke down three weeks ago in the wake of the hurricane," DeLay said in a House floor speech, according to prepared remarks provided by his office.

Like DeLay, most Republicans who called for offsets focused solely on spending.

Many said they would like to see offsets in the form of reductions in government "waste, fraud and abuse." Others called for increasing the amount Congress plans to cut from mandatory programs through budget reconciliation — currently $35 billion over five years — later in the year.

That could lead to funding Katrina recovery through more severe cuts to programs aimed at the poor and elderly. Medicare, Medicaid and food stamps are among the programs on the chopping block in a reconciliation process that was already pushed back after Katrina hit.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and others sharply criticized Republican budget priorities. "Even though Katrina took a price, and even though a mirror was placed in front of America that shows a face that we sometimes choose to ignore, the majority here in the Congress has still said that they will go forth with a budget that will give $70 billion in tax cuts to the wealthiest people in America," she said.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) repeated his call for a commission to review government programs, similar to the one that closes and realigns military bases. Brownback introduced legislation in 2002 that would create such a panel, called the Commission on the Accountability and Review of Federal Agencies.

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) said tax increases could slow the economy, but he said he might support "rethinking" business incentives in the recently enacted energy law, a position he has long advocated. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), chairman of the Energy Committee, said there should have been more, not fewer, industry incentives.

There have also been many calls from both sides of the aisle to reopen the recently passed highway bill and cut some of the earmarks after congressional passage of $62.3 billion in emergency relief.

DeLay was ambiguous about whether or not he favors reopening the bill. "Everything is an option if it makes sense," he said.

He did say he would not request the repeal of highway projects in his own district after Pelosi volunteered cutting her own transportation projects to help foot the cleanup costs.

One Senate Republican aide pointed out that many of the suggestions for offsets are either unrealistic or would hardly make a dent in the spending. "It's going to be very difficult to pay for this because of the size," the aide said.

The White House on Monday rejected suggestions that implementation of the landmark Medicare prescription-drug law enacted in 2003 should be delayed to offset Katrina spending. Already, Congress has spent $62.3 billion on the recovery effort. But lawmakers are concerned that there has been little scrutiny in the first two relief packages.

All across the Capitol yesterday, lawmakers and aides discussed how to handle the next round of Katrina-related spending, which GOP aides say is not likely to be doled out until after an October recess.

Josh Bolten, the director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, met with Republican senators yesterday afternoon.

Republican leaders in the Senate are assessing how to arrive at a budget for future spending, the question of possible offsets and means of ensuring accountability for the money that they send to the Gulf Coast, according to a senior Senate Republican aide.

Only $14 billion of the money appropriated so far had been spent as of Monday night, the aide said.

House conservatives, led by Republican Study Committee Chairman Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), were expected to unveil a plan for offsetting Katrina spending today.

Foreign Investment Aids Cleanup, Despite Adding To U.S. Deficit (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

On Friday, as official Washington fretted over the potential fiscal calamity of Hurricane Katrina, the Treasury Department let Americans know where the money would come from to rebuild the Gulf Coast: foreign investors.

DOJ_NMG_0007058

The latest Treasury report on foreign lending showed that investors abroad poured $101.4 billion into the United States in July alone -- a voracious clip -- to snap up stocks, bonds and everything else available. So while the federal government keeps spending and while tax cuts remain politically sacrosanct, continued foreign investment should help pick up the estimated $200 billion cleanup tab for Katrina and further postpone a final reckoning on the budget deficit.

"We know [Katrina] is an extraordinarily consequential event for the people and the region, but it's one the economy can weather," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, director of the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. "The evidence is, we can finance this with borrowing. I don't see any evidence we couldn't do that."

Any debt must be paid back, with interest, so running up the deficit to reconstruct the Gulf region carries a cost, at least to future generations. Foreign holdings of U.S. government debt exceeded $2.03 trillion in July, meaning that every man, woman and child in the United States owes foreign investors $6,846.

Holtz-Eakin said Congress and President Bush face a choice on how to finance the recovery: raise taxes, cut spending or let foreigners pay. The decision will reveal much about the government's ability to set priorities in the face of far larger challenges, such as the baby boom's nearing retirement, Holtz-Eakin said.

Ever since record budget surpluses turned to yawning deficits, some economists have issued warnings of pending doom that have yet to come true. They predicted that foreign lenders would sour on U.S. government debt as the Treasury Department sold billions of bonds and notes each day. To keep those buyers happy, interest rates would have to rise substantially. Housing, cars and other items bought on credit would turn expensive, and the U.S. economy would slide into recession.

Despite such warnings, Congress and Bush cut taxes every year since 2001, and spending soared, largely to finance the war in Iraq but also to fund the largest expansion of Medicare since President Lyndon Johnson created the program in 1965, the most expensive transportation and public works bill in history, and now, the biggest domestic reconstruction effort ever.

Compared with the size of the economy, federal tax revenue has plunged, to 16.3 percent of the gross domestic product last year from 20.9 percent in 2000, before recovering to 17.5 percent of the GDP this year. Meanwhile, spending has climbed steadily, to an estimated 20.2 percent of the economy this year from 18.4 percent in 2000, and that CBO estimate came out before Katrina struck.

But economic disaster has not hit.

"These long-run worries, there's an element of truth to them, but I think frankly the fears are exaggerated," said James Glassman, senior U.S. economist at J.P. Morgan Chase.

On the contrary, tax receipts, buoyed by a thriving corporate sector, set a single-day record last Thursday. The Treasury pulled in $71 billion that day, shattering the $61 billion record set June 15. And corporate tax receipts on Thursday -- $63 billion -- surpassed the total for any previous month on record. At 4.9 percent, the unemployment rate is the lowest since August 2001.

And interest rates have shrugged off Katrina. The small increase in rates in recent days stems mainly from inflation fears that predated the hurricane, said Steven Englander, chief currency strategist for North America at Barclays Capital in New York.

That seeming contradiction can be solved by looking abroad. Foreign holdings of U.S. government debt reached slightly more than $1 trillion in 2000 and have more than doubled since. Japan, long the nation's largest creditor, now holds $683 billion in U.S. government debt. China, which recently surpassed Britain as the United States' second largest lender, has seen its stake in the U.S. government more than triple, to $242 billion this summer from $71.4 billion in 2000.

And there does not seem to be much lessening of appetite. Foreign purchases of U.S. stocks and bonds have nearly doubled in the past four months. Asian nations appear intent on buying U.S. assets to prop up the value of the dollar and keep U.S. interest rates low, thus helping U.S. consumers buy their goods. And that Asian buying spree is financed by U.S. consumers who continue their spending on Asian goods. On top of the bill for that new flat-screen television, add the interest owed to Chinese and Japanese lenders.

The United States also remains blessed by its competition: Foreign investors, looking for a stable place to park their money, still see U.S. assets as far more attractive then European or Asian investment options.

Katrina will do nothing to shake that arrangement, said Michael P. Dooley, a senior adviser at Deutsche Bank in New York and an expert on currency markets.

And Katrina just is not as big as it sounds, most budget analysts agree. Currently, about $4.1 trillion in U.S. government debt is traded worldwide. So far, Congress has enacted $64.6 billion on Katrina-related legislation, and the Senate has approved additional legislation worth nearly $11 billion. Without doubt, $75.6 billion is a large amount, larger than the budgets of the Justice, Homeland Security and Energy departments combined. But borrowing $76 billion tomorrow would add a little more than 1 percent to the amount of federal debt already on the market.

Nevertheless, economists who have warned for years of the dangers of the deficit are not about to give up yet, "not on your life," said Stephen S. Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley and a leading deficit hawk. "Here we are taking on $150 [billion], $200 [billion], $300 billion in debt for Katrina at a time when we're doing Iraq, we're doing Afghanistan, and the national savings rate is at a record low for any leading nation in the history of the world," he said. "It will come back to haunt us."

House, Senate Agree On Hurricane Tax-Relief Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- House-Senate negotiators agreed on an estimated $6 billion tax-relief bill to expand deductions this year for Hurricane Katrina survivors and spur employment of low-income workers on the Gulf Coast.

The measure, expected to be sent to President Bush this week, would temporarily relax tax rules to encourage corporate cash donations and make it easier for displaced families to deduct storm losses and claim refunds on past taxes.

While the precise costs weren't available last night, estimates are that it could provide about $6.2 billion in tax relief for the next 24 months. Republicans are promising a second round of hurricane-related tax relief, but a Congressional Research Service report warned that such an approach often provides less help for low-income families with lower tax liability.

The final talks centered on two employer tax credits to encourage companies to hire hurricane survivors or keep employees on the payroll during this period of business interruption. House tax writers preferred to target these credits -- valued at as much as $2,400 a year -- at workers in the disaster area. The Senate approach was more to track survivors and help them find new jobs -- or temporary assignments with their old employers -- regardless of location.

The compromise gives preference to the hard-hit areas, such as New Orleans, but recognizes the need to help evacuees stabilize their lives as well. The existing Work Opportunity Tax Credit would be extended to Katrina survivors for two years if hired inside the disaster area and just through the end of 2005, if hired outside.

Similarly, the House agreed to a three-month experiment with a new Senate-backed employer credit intended to help distressed companies keep workers on their payrolls. The credit is limited to employers in the disaster area with fewer than 200 employees -- which would appear to exclude many of the larger casino operators along the Gulf. The House agreed to reconsider the idea as part of future tax legislation.

Wealthy small-business owners will benefit from a provision lifting the limit on how much a corporation can deduct -- as a percentage of taxable income -- for cash contributions to Katrina relief. Beyond Katrina, there is a short-term improvement in deductions for contributions of food and book inventories, and the bill opens the door for noncorporate taxpayers, such as a farm partnership, to participate in food deductions. The publishing industry failed to get one of its top priorities, allowing an inflated adjustment in the value of books donated.

Property owners stand to benefit most from provisions that make it easier to claim deductions on storm losses and that extend the time period for buying a replacement home or building before being subject to taxes. Casualty losses attributable to Katrina are made fully deductible regardless of whether the loss exceeds 10% of a taxpayer's adjusted gross income. Moreover, a taxpayer can carry back these deductions to apply them to 2004 taxes, yielding a refund on taxes paid.

For example, under current law, a person with an adjusted gross income of $40,000, who has lost a car valued at $5,000, can only deduct $1,000. A Katrina survivor could claim the full $5,000.

Tax writers say this will help persons of all incomes. A second provision allowing families to take money from retirement accounts without penalty would most benefit those with large holdings.

In The Gulf Zone (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

If we had our druthers, all of America would be an "opportunity zone," with low and flat-rate taxes and little of the regulation that can strangle economic development. But the battered Gulf Coast is a good place to start with these investment-friendly reconstruction incentives, and so Congress could (and probably will) do much worse than enact President Bush's Gulf Opportunity Zone.

The idea is to lure businesses back to the region through lower tax rates, incentives for new capital investment, and low-cost business loans and loan guarantees. So far the details are sketchy. But one promising magnet for capital is the small-business expensing plan, which allows firms to immediately deduct from their federal tax bill the first $100,000 of the cost of a new office, plant or equipment. We're typically against temporary tax incentives, but if anything warrants such a lift, the aftermath of Katrina does -- and especially as an alternative to the "Marshall Plan" for new federal spending via FEMA or a bureaucratic cousin that is already being proposed in Washington.

We only wish the tax incentives went further than what Mr. Bush has proposed. Why not allow the Gulf to operate as a laboratory for a flat tax, with an 18% rate and no taxes whatsoever on capital investment for businesses -- small and large? And if this works for New Orleans, as it has for so many of the former economically ravaged nations of East Europe, then make it the law of the land.

The Bush plan also provides an "urban homesteading" feature, whereby low-income families would be given a free plot of federal land in the ruined areas in exchange for a commitment to build a home there. It's a truism that people better maintain homes that are their own property. The plan also contains what amounts to a voucher for students uprooted by Katrina. They'd be able to use up to $7,500 for public, but also for private or religious, schools -- which has the teachers unions up in arms. Leave it to the National Educational Association to let its own monopoly interests trump the welfare of kids, even in the wake of a disaster.

The Office of Management and Budget is also compiling a list of onerous and anti-growth federal regulations that would be suspended in the hurricane region. This should include environmental rules and mandates that have closed down the oil refinery business in this critical national oil, gas and energy hub. And we're glad to see Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta reporting, in a letter to us on Monday, that highway reconstruction is already under way using bonus incentives to reward faster work.

The price tag for these proposals would be a tiny fraction of the cost of a federally directed welfare state/public works effort, which seems to be the choice of Democrats -- and too many Republicans. Congress has already appropriated $62 billion in federal aid and another $100 billion is in the works. That's all new spending, by the way; a better option would be to divert money from pork-barrel projects to Katrina relief. (See below.)

It was through a combination of local civic organizations and business investment that other proud American cities were rebuilt after other disasters. At least one-half of the structures in San Francisco were toppled or burned to the ground, and a quarter million Californians left homeless, by the Great Earthquake of 1906. Within three years the city was rebuilt without any FEMA aid, Small Business Administration loans or federal housing assistance.

Similarly the Chicago Fire of 1871 razed virtually every building in the entire downtown business district (save for the famous Water Tower), while scores of outlying neighborhoods were destroyed. As a recent report from the Foundation for Economic Education details: "Within two years this burned city had been almost completely rebuilt through private aid and initiative." The group that so heroically coordinated the entire relief effort, including housing 157,000 suddenly homeless people and employing tens of thousands of others, was the Chicago Relief and Aid Society.

It is precisely in this spirit of compassion, enterprise and business acumen that New Orleans should be restored to its past glory. Congressman Bobby Jindal, who represents a large slice of New Orleans and whose own home has been nearly destroyed, warns that now is not the time for a bidding war of spending between the two parties. Rather, he says, "We now have a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to let the free market policies that we know will work for New Orleans flourish." And if it works there, why not everywhere?

Sleight Of Budgeting (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0007061

The decision by Congressional leaders to delay action on their tax-and-spending bills was most welcome. The bills' broad outlines were drawn up pre-Katrina, and were objectionable even then: spending cuts totaling $35 billion over five years in programs for low- and moderate-income families, and $70 billion in new tax breaks, mostly for the most affluent families. Counting interest, the bills would increase the deficit by $40 billion over five years.

Post-Katrina, those plans would be scandalous, highlighting the skewed priorities that have put the country into a tight financial spot as it copes both with hurricane damage, and with the social and economic rifts that Katrina has exposed.

Unfortunately, it's increasingly unclear why Congress imposed the delay. (The deadlines were shifted into October and early November.) Initially, it appeared that lawmakers needed time to recast their priorities - away from budget cuts that would reduce the aid for hurricane victims and other needy Americans, and away from high-end tax cuts that would needlessly starve the Treasury at a time of mounting rebuilding costs.

Now, however, it appears that postponement may be only a tactical move to recast Katrina as the event that requires Congress to hack away at existing programs to pre-empt unacceptably large deficits from reconstruction spending. That's false.

Katrina cannot and should not be paid for by cutting government programs, unless the goal is to end up with a government that's even less effective than it was before Katrina. True, there's fat that Congress should trim. But even if members of Congress were willing to rescind the porkiest of the pork spending they approved in the highway bill passed last summer, doing that would raise about $24 billion.

That would be a nice offset for the estimated $200 billion price tag for Katrina, but hardly enough. Bigger cuts that have been suggested, like delaying the start of the Medicare drug coverage plan, are not workable, not to mention political nonstarters for President Bush and for Republican leaders.

What is needed most is more revenue, and that requires Congress to stop cutting taxes.

But Congress appears to be angling to proceed with business as usual while disguising what it is doing. If all goes according to plan, Congress will take up the spending-cut bill weeks before the tax-cut bill.

That would be the first time lawmakers had split such deficit-bloating legislation into two separate bills, raising the suspicion that they're trying to hide the fact that $35 billion in spending cuts, heartless and misguided as they are, would be used to help pay for the $70 billion in new tax breaks - not for deficit reduction and certainly not for Katrina.

The lawmakers' only responsible course of action is to give up on tax cuts, but they are balking. Wedded to tax cuts himself, President Bush cannot lead them where they need to go. It's up to the American people to push their representatives in the right direction.

To Rebuild New Orleans (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

After Hurricane Katrina flooded New Orleans, federal officials warned that the city could be underwater for three months or more. Instead, aided by hot sun and clear skies, the Army Corps of Engineers expects to have the streets of New Orleans pumped dry by the end of this week — provided, of course, that Hurricane Rita doesn't send the water right back over the city's weakened levees.

The pumps' progress led Mayor C. Ray Nagin to start the city's revival too early. On Sunday, Nagin invited residents of the Algiers neighborhood to return home, then rescinded the invitation the next day as Rita bore down on the Gulf of Mexico.

As this episode illustrates, it's time for officials on the Gulf Coast to shift from the pedal-to-the-metal urgency of the rescue efforts to the more deliberate pace of reconstruction. As important as it is to rebuild New Orleans and let evacuees return to their homes and jobs, it's even more critical to ensure that the rebuilt version of the Big Easy does not simply mimic the one Katrina laid to waste — a city ridden by poverty and unemployment, with the poorest residents living in the areas most vulnerable to flooding.

That kind of economic resuscitation will require both a willingness to try new approaches and an attention to history. This country has learned much in the last 40 years about how to revive a city (and, sadly, how not to). New Orleans, more than any city in the nation, can be the beneficiary of those lessons.

Government has three basic, interrelated tasks: rebuilding the city's infrastructure, reviving its economy and resettling its population.

President Bush has pledged that Washington will cover the bulk of the cost of rebuilding New Orleans' roads, bridges, sewers and other public works. Because these are expensive projects that will consume most of Washington's Katrina relief budget, federal and state officials should look for ways to put private dollars to work — for example, by joining forces with private companies to share the cost of toll roads and bridges, then splitting the revenue.

The city's human infrastructure is badly in need of repairs too. Although the investment will take years to yield dividends, the city needs better schools to help residents climb out of poverty and make the city more attractive to employers. The private sector could play an important role here too, through efforts such as charter schools.

To revive New Orleans' economy, Bush has proposed creating "Gulf Opportunity Zones." Similar to the "enterprise zones" that have been declared across the country since the 1980s, these would offer about $2 billion worth of tax breaks and loan subsidies to businesses that build and equip offices in Katrina's wake.

Although some analysts are enthusiastic about enterprise zones, they may not be the best way to encourage New Orleans' recovery. In general, most new jobs emanate from new, small businesses, which don't benefit much from tax breaks because they don't have much taxable income. By contrast, the beneficiaries of enterprise zones often are established businesses that move their offices into the zone to lower their tax burden.

If the goal is to help the economy of New Orleans without siphoning jobs from other cities, policymakers need to find ways to help entrepreneurs create jobs there that residents can and want to fill. That means making it easier and more profitable for companies to create jobs for local residents, and making it easier for residents to do the work.

Education is obviously key to that effort, and so is housing. On the housing front, the administration plans to spend $5 billion to place evacuees in 300,000 mobile homes, trailers and other temporary structures. This plan has drawn flak from both sides of the political spectrum, and rightly so. The "temporary" enclaves isolate evacuees, rather than letting them resettle close to where they can find work. The better approach is to stick with vouchers that evacuees can use to rent housing in the communities of their choice.

Hundreds of thousands of homes were damaged by Katrina and subsequent flooding, and roughly half of the homeowners in New Orleans carried flood insurance. The rest, along with many of Katrina's other victims along the Gulf Coast, are left to haggle with their insurance companies over how much of their loss was caused by Katrina's winds, which would be covered by homeowner's insurance. The federal government can help both groups by offering adjusters assistance in calculating losses and mediators assistance in determining their cause.

For the city's poorest residents, the government should follow Baltimore's example and build low-rise, mixed-income developments that are proving more resistant to crime than the projects they replaced. Planners now have a better understanding of how to design low-income housing to discourage crime. They will have an opportunity in New Orleans to use what they've learned from the successes and failures of numerous American urban renewal projects.

Finally, as Congress and the administration open the federal spigot to aid the Gulf Coast, the public has the right to know exactly where its money is going — and the obligation to share the pain.

Taxpayers have put up more than $60 billion for the rescue and recovery effort so far, and may be asked to spend three times that amount on the Gulf Coast. The best protections against waste and misuse are to ensure that contractors compete for all the projects and publicly account for their spending.

At the same time, Congress should plan to pay off the massive spending on Katrina over the next few years rather than adding to the already burgeoning deficit. The burden should be spread broadly by cutting or postponing far-reaching programs; a good place to start would be the $25 billion that Congress recently authorized for lawmakers' pet highway projects across the country.

And it almost goes without saying that new tax cuts are simply unthinkable — at least until the federal budget has joined New Orleans in recovering from Katrina.

Cuts For Katrina (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0007063

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Last week we suggested that cancellation of $25 billion in pork projects -- euphemistically known as "earmarks" -- in the recently passed Highway Bill would be a good first step to offset some of the cost of rebuilding the infrastructure in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast.

The idea of a pork-for-reconstruction swap had already been denounced as "moronic" by a spokesman for Don Young of Alaska, Chairman of the House Transportation Committee and proud father of the now-infamous $223 million "bridge to nowhere" near Ketchikan. Since then the White House and Congressional Republican leadership have been acting as if the cost of Katrina relief should have no impact on the course of an administration that has presided over the fastest growth in discretionary spending since Lyndon Johnson.

But thankfully, a grassroots Internet campaign and a handful of House GOP conservatives have refused to give up on the idea that spending cuts should be found to defray the estimated $200 billion federal price tag for hurricane relief. In the Senate, John McCain is proposing a similar pork-for-Katrina swap.

The Internet campaign picks up on the idea of revisiting the earmarks in the Highway Bill. A Web site called Porkbusters (www.truthlaidbear.com/porkbusters.php) helpfully lists these projects by state and directs readers to the appropriate Representatives and Senators to ask what they would cut. Around the country a flood of letters to local newspapers has echoed the theme.

And if revisiting the Highway Bill is too much to ask, how about a one-year moratorium on all non-defense earmarks for fiscal 2006? Rep. Ron Lewis (R., Kentucky) proposes just that in a "Dear Colleague" letter dated Monday. Other suggestions include across-the-board spending cuts at federal agencies of 2.5 cents on the dollar and delaying the introduction of the Medicare drug benefit by a year. We should be hearing more today when members of the House Republican Study Committee -- led by consistent spending hawks such as Mike Pence, Jeb Hensarling and Jeff Flake -- announce "Operation Offset" and a list of specific options to find savings in the budget.

White House flaks have been sending out emails claiming the new spending is mandated by a 1988 law called the Stafford Act. But the idea that somehow the government is on automatic pilot and that expenditures cannot be restrained by Congress or the President is irresponsible and even insidious. It is a basic principle of Constitutional law that no Congress can mandate expenditures by a future one. And while the Stafford Act does suggest that temporary infrastructure repair after major disasters is a federal responsibility, it does not justify why 41 states should receive Katrina aid and it certainly doesn't relieve Republicans of their fiscal duty to identify offsetting cuts.

The startling bottom line on Bush administration profligacy is this: At $22,000 per household, federal spending is at an inflation-adjusted post-World War II high and set to go still higher soon as the Baby Boomers start drawing Medicare and Social Security. Reforming those entitlements will be tough enough. And voters will have good reason not to want to entrust that task to a party that can't even admit the wastefulness of bridges to nowhere in the wake of the new century's worst hurricane.

Governors Ask For Inquiry On Oil Prices (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

CHICAGO, Sept. 20 - The governors of eight states sent a letter on Tuesday to President Bush and Congress calling for an investigation into profits made by oil companies after Hurricane Katrina and asking for legislation that would require the companies to refund to customers any profits deemed excess.

"When the wholesale price of gas went up by 60 cents almost overnight, oil companies were obviously using the most devastating natural disaster in our nation's history to reap a windfall at the expense of American consumers," said the letter, which was initiated by Gov. James E. Doyle of Wisconsin and was signed by governors from Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Montana, New Mexico, Oregon and Washington.

"To price-gouge consumers under normal circumstances is dishonest enough," the letter stated, "but to make money off the severe misfortune of others is downright immoral."

DOJ_NMG_0007064

The letter cited an analysis by Donald A. Nichols, an economics professor at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, who reported that gas prices surged disproportionately compared with crude oil price increases. The price markup from crude oil to gasoline has almost tripled since the hurricane, the report said.

OPEC Drops Cartel Role And Says Pump All You Can (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

VIENNA, Sept. 20 - Oil prices slipped Tuesday on signs that the direction of Hurricane Rita was shifting away from America's energy heartland and OPEC formally agreed to lift all restrictions on its oil sales for the next three months, in a move aimed at further reassuring markets still on edge over the security of energy supplies.

On Monday, energy prices surged 7 percent, to $67 a barrel, on worries that Hurricane Rita was headed for the main oil-producing areas of the Gulf of Mexico. The latest predictions somewhat eased those fears but still suggested that the hurricane could affect offshore facilities and refineries along the coast of Texas. Another shift in the storm late Tuesday night pushed oil prices up in after-hours trading.

After OPEC's two-day meeting, Saudi Arabia, the largest and most influential member, rallied the oil-producing group to support its 18-month-long campaign to sell as much oil as consumers ask for.

Saudi Arabia, which always keeps some idle capacity to compensate for unexpected production shortages, has been pumping above its official production ceiling since May 2004.

OPEC's decision effectively freezes the group's two-decade quota system originally intended to prevent prices from dropping too low and instead legitimizes - at least temporarily - a production free-for-all intended to bring prices down. Even so, because of shortages in refining capacity in the United States, Ali al-Naimi, oil minister of Saudi Arabia, admitted there might be few takers for the oil, but he stressed the decision's psychological impact.

"OPEC went out of its way and offered all the spare capacity that it has, recognizing that maybe there is no demand, but offering it so that consumers can feel comfortable that the supply is there," said Mr. Naimi, the group's most influential representative.

OPEC has so far seemed powerless to rein in soaring prices, which have doubled since the beginning of 2004. Even so, some members like Iran and Venezuela, were reluctant to back the Saudi strategy. Both countries produce below their quota levels, but do not want to give the Saudis a freer hand.

Still, members of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries agreed to pledge all their remaining extra capacity to the market, saying they could supply an additional two million barrels of oil a day - amounting to 7 percent of the group's current output.

Mr. Naimi said OPEC's extra oil would be made available immediately - and without any discounts. "If the people don't want the crude, it is better for it to stay underground," he said during a 15-minutes interview with a handful of reporters after the meeting. Though they are now reaping record revenue, oil producers also recognize that excessively high prices could crimp demand. The foreign minister of Saudi Arabia, Prince Saud al-Faisal, said in New York on Tuesday that he would be happy to see oil prices fall to a level of $35 to $40 a barrel, but he cautioned that this "would not happen right now."

Hurricane Katrina, which struck the gulf's energy hub three weeks ago, curbed production from the offshore region and idled four major refineries along the coast, which amount to 5 percent of domestic capacity. Flooded after the storm, these plants will be out of commission until November at the earliest.

Saudi Arabia, which pumped 9.6 million barrels a day in September, has about 1.5 million barrels a day of extra capacity on call. It plans to increase its capacity by an additional 300,000 barrels a day, to a total of 11.3 million barrels, by next spring. More additions are planned through 2010 to bring the country's total capacity to 12.5 million barrels a day.

Other OPEC producers, like Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates and Nigeria, have 500,000 barrels a day of idle capacity. The group currently pumps 28.3 million barrels a day, excluding Iraq, or about a third of world production. With Iraq, whose exports are constrained by the insurgency, OPEC's 11 nations produce 30.2 million barrels a day.Facing criticism that it was not investing enough to add capacity, OPEC also outlined some long-term plans. These call for expanding capacity to 38 million barrels a day by 2010.

Mr. Naimi said he would be happy if buyers called for more supplies - and called OPEC's hand.

"Yes, yes, I hope they do," he said. "We'll make more money. All they have to do is test. We want to move this crude and sell it, if the price is right. We are businessmen after all."

Western governments coordinated the release of 60 million barrels of oil to make up for shortfalls after Hurricane Katrina. But only a fraction of that oil was actually bought by refiners who are struggling to make up for their losses. This makes it unlikely that OPEC will actually sell any more oil than it currently does. "OPEC has done the perfect P.R. move," said Roger Diwan, a managing director at PFC Energy. "It's a hands-down victory for OPEC in the political battle. No barrel of oil is actually involved here."

OPEC Suspends Its Output Quotas (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

VIENNA -- In a bid to reassure markets that its members are free to pump all the crude oil they can, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries yesterday suspended its output quotas for the fourth quarter.

Still, at a time when every oil producer except Saudi Arabia is producing flat-out, the move is unlikely to have much effect on world oil prices. OPEC ministers said the cartel could produce as much as two million barrels a day more of crude for consumers at market prices, but industry observers doubt that OPEC has anywhere near that much unused pumping capacity.

Observers instead watched Hurricane Rita, which is moving toward offshore oil and natural-gas production assets in the Gulf of Mexico that last month's Hurricane Katrina missed. The U.S. government reported that 58% of oil production and 35% of gas were shut off in the Gulf yesterday.

Industry watchers also worry about the potential for Rita to damage Houston-area refineries. The regions around Houston and New Orleans are the two biggest refinery centers in the U.S.; combined, the areas pump out one-third of the nation's gasoline. On New York futures markets, oil, natural gas and gasoline fell, but remained at elevated levels. (See related article.)

Saudi Arabia for more than a year has promised to produce extra oil to tame gyrating petroleum markets. But the International Energy Agency's chief, Claude Mandil, yesterday estimated that all of OPEC could pump between half and three-quarters of the two million barrels extra that the cartel's members claim.

Nor is this extra crude capacity likely to be tapped to any significant degree by refineries, unless there are new supply disruptions. Refineries already are working flat-out to meet rising world demand and can't process any more oil, especially the heavy-sulfur kind that OPEC has left.

"What OPEC has offered is short-term insurance to consumers on the crude-oil front," said Vera de Ladoucette, an analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates in Paris. "It removes any remaining doubt about OPEC's willingness to produce to its maximum capacity."

The cartel's members, including Saudi Arabia, the world's largest oil exporter, haven't in fact been constrained by output quotas since May of last year. During this time, Saudi Arabia's oil minister repeatedly has pledged to produce as much as the kingdom's capacity of 11 million barrels a day if customers want the oil. Yesterday, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi said the kingdom was producing about 9.6 million barrels a day this month, well in excess of its current quota of 9.1 million barrels a day.

As for discounting oil to push more supplies onto world markets to drive down the price, Mr. Naimi said: "Absolutely not. I don't want to bring it on the market unless the consumer wants it at the commercial rate."

Mr. Naimi also said the kingdom's oil-output capacity was likely to rise by 300,000 barrels a day to 11.3 million barrels next spring, when the kingdom brings on line a field called Haradh. Further output-capacity increases are scheduled for 2007, when more of Saudi Arabia's fast-track field developments are completed.

The Paris-based IEA has forecast that, after 2010, oil output outside OPEC will have peaked, leaving the world totally reliant on extra supplies from the cartel to fuel economic growth. In Russia, President Vladimir Putin has backed plans to offer tax holidays to companies developing new oil fields, after a top government official warned that the recent slowdown in oil-production growth could worsen next year.

In the early years of this decade, Russia was the main source of new crude oil on world markets, delivering annual production increases of more than 10% and rivaling Saudi Arabia as the world's largest producer. But the Kremlin's dismantling and partial nationalization last year of OAO Yukos, once the country's most dynamic producer, have combined with higher tax rates to cast a pall over the industry, and production so far this year is up only 1.3% from last year. Industry officials don't expect any significant recovery in output in the near future, since proposed tax changes are still months away from final approval, and new oil projects take years to develop.

Oil Price Drops $1.16 A Barrel; Offshore Evacuations Quicken (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar and Katya Kazakina

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Oil prices dropped more than $1 a barrel but held on to most of Monday's sharp advance, as Hurricane Rita headed toward the Gulf Coast.

Projections made early yesterday that Rita would miss the Houston area refineries triggered a drop of more than $2 a barrel in oil prices. But prices recovered much of those losses as Rita strengthened to a Category 2 hurricane, with winds of 100 miles per hour and the pace of evacuations from offshore rigs picked up.

"The way this is going to enter, it's going to impact most of the Gulf," said Ted Falgout, the director of Port Fourchon, a major port servicing the offshore oil and gas industry. "You can't be leaving people in the path of the storm just because it's predicted to go to Texas."

Mr. Falgout's job as director of a port that handles workers and equipment moving to and from offshore rigs gives him a good perspective on the breadth of activity in the Gulf. Fourchon's significance has been augmented since Hurricane Katrina all but wiped out another important offshore services port in Venice, La.

Companies, including such oil majors Royal Dutch Shell PLC, BP PLC and Chevron Corp., began evacuating staff Monday. Murphy Oil Corp., Marathon Oil Corp. and Apache Corp. are also bringing workers back ashore.

Refineries in the Houston area, representing about 13% of total U.S. processing capacity, continued to operate normally as they began to respond to the storm threat by securing their facilities and developing operating plans.

At the New York Mercantile Exchange, the October crude contract ended $1.16 lower at $66.23. Petroleum products, which advanced more than 10% Monday, posted bigger losses but ended well off their intraday lows by 4 p.m.

October gasoline, up nearly 25 cents at one point Monday, closed at $1.9766 a gallon, down 6.61 cents on the day. October heating oil, up more than 20 cents Monday, ended at $2.0113, down 2.71 cents.

While worries about disruptions to energy infrastructure have eased a bit, forecasters and analysts warned that Rita's track and strength could change as it moves westward.

The pullback in prices came as the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, meeting in Vienna, decided to leave its official output target unchanged but to make some two million barrels a day in unused production capacity available as of Oct. 1.

Officials, expressing concern about the latest price rise, said the move to make all of the cartel's extra capacity available was meant to reassure consumers on supplies.

In other commodity markets:

COFFEE: Futures on the New York Board of Trade rose as funds exited previously established short positions amid rumors that some coffee stored in New Orleans will be decertified by Nybot officials after damage from Katrina. Buying interest was also fueled by concerns Rita could either inflict more damage to coffee stockpiles located in New Orleans or damage coffee stockpiles located in Houston. Coffee for September delivery rose 7.3 cents a pound, to 91.75 cents.

Bush Signs Katrina-related Flood Insurance Bill (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 21, 2005

President George W. Bush on Tuesday signed legislation to increase the borrowing authority of the government's flood insurance program to $3.5 billion from $1.5 billion to pay claims from Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0007067

The legislation increases the borrowing authority of the National Flood Insurance Program that is administered by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The program offers low-cost flood insurance to homeowners and small business owners in high-risk areas where it might otherwise not be available.

The program does not use government funds, but is allowed to borrow from the Treasury if necessary to pay claims.

Some analysts have expressed concern that the new borrowing authority was not enough and would have to be increased again to handle Katrina-related claims.

The National Flood Insurance Program pays up to $250,000 for residential buildings, and another $100,000 for contents that are lost. It also pays up to $500,000 for nonresidential buildings and $500,000 for their contents.

Bush also signed into law a bill to exclude federal financial assistance for flooding from being considered income, so that the recipient's eligibility for other government benefits would not be affected.

Flooding Victims To Get Funds Quicker (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 21, 2005

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is loosening the claims process for its flood-insurance program so Hurricane Katrina victims can get paid even if insurance adjusters can't get to the area.

The move comes as thousands of displaced homeowners and businesses cope with an impaired banking system and try to figure out how to pay for food, shelter and relocation.

“A lot of people don't even have homes,” says Michael Buckley, a FEMA deputy division director. “Rather than trying to agonize over the details” in clear cases of flood damage to homes and businesses, people will be able to get the temporary financial assistance they need, he says.

FEMA is urging the 100 private insurers that handle federal flood claims to advance $3,000 to policyholders from their coverage. FEMA also wants them to ease the requirement that policyholders provide flood loss proof through pictures or other documentation.

Insurance companies typically cover wind and wind-driven rain damage, but not flood losses. Insurers do, however, sell federal flood policies and service the claims for the federal government.

The majority of home and business owners don't have federal flood coverage. Only 34% of homeowners and 23% of businesses in the affected areas have it, FEMA estimates. The policies pay a maximum of $250,000 for damage to a home and $100,000 for damage to contents. Businesses get up to $500,000 each for property and content damage.

FEMA expects to shell out significantly more in Katrina-related flood losses than the record $2 billion payout for 2004's four hurricanes, Buckley says.

FEMA is not mandating the $3,000 payments, but many insurers are expected to provide them. Companies are “doing everything they can to get rid of red tape and bureaucracy,” says Julie Rochman, spokeswoman for the American Insurance Association.

Travelers started advancing policyholders $3,000 from their flood-content coverage a few days after Katrina hit.

“We took a bit of a chance” because FEMA hadn't given guidance at that time, says Ed Charlebois, a Travelers vice president. But, “obviously, these folks had been devastated by what happened.”

State Farm and Allstate also have been advancing funds if policyholders have coverage for flood damage to contents. Separately, many insurers are providing two weeks' worth of living expenses under homeowner policies to those who have been evacuated.

Homeowners insurance typically pays for expenses, including food and lodging, if the government calls for an evacuation due to hurricane winds or if wind damage makes a house unlivable.

Flood insurance, however, does not pay for those costs, so money doled out on those policies will be deducted from the total coverage amount.

Rethinking Flood Insurance (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0007068

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Like a rickety house that was already falling down, the federal flood insurance program has been destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. The theory of the program is that people who choose to live in areas prone to flooding should pay for that risk by buying insurance; they should not expect taxpayers around the country to rescue them from their own recklessness. But the truth is that, after a disaster like Katrina, the federal government will bail everybody out whether they are insured or not; it's humanly and politically unthinkable to do otherwise. Because the likelihood of a federal rescue is so strong, there never was much incentive to buy insurance. The huge federal effort after Katrina will undermine the program further.

The first response must be to make flood insurance compulsory, as auto insurance is. Currently, homeowners have to buy flood insurance if they live in a flood-prone area and they have a mortgage through a federally regulated or insured lender. But other mortgage providers escape this requirement; besides, people who own their homes outright are free to go uninsured, and many who buy insurance as a condition of their mortgage let the coverage lapse later. As a result, fewer than half of the homes in New Orleans had coverage, and the rate in Mississippi was much lower. To improve this situation, Congress needs to mandate coverage for everyone and then come up with a mechanism to enforce compliance. Regulators could oblige insurers that offer homeowners' policies to bundle flood insurance into their protection against fire, theft and so on. Or public authorities could collect flood insurance premiums at the same time they collect property taxes.

The second response must be to price flood insurance properly. In a vain attempt to persuade homeowners to buy coverage, the current system is subsidized; this allows people to build houses in exposed locations and then collect a federal check when the inevitable occurs, sometimes repeatedly. By pricing flood insurance accurately, the government would create price signals that would drive housing development to higher, drier land. Those who remain determined to live below sea level or on the beach -- or developers who put up low-income rental units in these places -- would pay the full cost of their preference. In some areas that have acute shortages of safe land -- New Orleans being one -- this may inflict hardship on the poor. But the best way to address that is to offer means-tested subsidies in a few jurisdictions, not to offer subsidies to rich and poor alike all over the nation.

Compulsory, fully priced insurance would in theory achieve the best of all worlds: It would ensure flood victims of compensation, it would protect taxpayers and it would deter risky construction. But in the real world the purchase of insurance policies will be less than complete, and accurate pricing of insurance risks would require inspecting every beach house to determine the quality of its flood precautions -- which is not likely to be practical. It may therefore be necessary to reinforce the federal construction standards in areas prone to flooding. If the feds are expected to come to the rescue in the event of a flood, it's reasonable to ask that zoning rules limit this liability.

How You Pay For People To Build In Flood Zones (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Katrina was a devastating storm; Rita may well become one. But it is misleading to call such hurricanes natural disasters. (Related: Opposing view)

Storms become disasters only if they hit population centers. Otherwise, they're of interest mainly to scientists and weather buffs but are like the proverbial tree that falls in the forest to the rest of us.

These days, however, there isn't much chance a major hurricane could come ashore in the USA and not become a disaster: 54% of Americans live within 50 miles of a shoreline, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. By 2025, three-quarters of the country is projected to live in such communities.

This unprecedented march to the sea has been abetted by unwise government policies that encourage living along the coast. Principal among them: the National Flood Insurance Program.

Started in 1968, federal flood insurance subsidizes development in coastal areas and other regions subject to flooding by offering insurance at bargain rates underwritten by the government.

As of last year, about 4.6 million policies were in effect with an average annual premium of $438. These premiums are nowhere near enough to cover the program's losses. Earlier this month, Congress authorized the program to borrow $3.5 billion for Katrina-related payments, an amount most experts believe is just the beginning and few believe will be repaid by property owners.

The program not only brings big government into an area better left to private enterprise, it also achieves the opposite of its goal. By lowering the cost of maintaining a home on flood-prone lands, it increases the populations in these areas. That in turn leads to more, and more costly, disasters.

According to the Heinz Center for Science, Economics and the Environment, a non-partisan think tank, development density in flood-prone areas has grown dramatically since the advent of federal flood insurance. Before its enactment, lands subject to flooding were 25% less densely developed on average than comparable land not subject to flooding. Since then, the figure has closed to 15%.

Other problems with the program:

•Passing the buck. Private insurers have an incentive to claim that most hurricane damage is caused by storm surges (which are covered by the federal flood insurance) rather than by winds (which private insurers cover). Mississippi is investigating claims that some adjusters pressured homeowners in Katrina's path to sign waivers saying that their homes were destroyed by water.

• Lack of long-term planning. The government makes little or no attempt to quantify the financial risk it is exposed to through its insurance program, which provides more than three-quarters of a trillion dollars in coverage. That makes it difficult for the public to debate what should be done to protect coastal communities.

The government does, to be sure, have a vital role to play in identifying flood-prone areas. But the actual issuance of policies should be left to the private sector.

True, that would lead to higher premiums because private insurers can't run to Congress for money to cover their losses. But then why should taxpayers in Kansas subsidize insurance for people who live in Florida? And why should those Kansans — or anyone, for that matter — want to underwrite a system that each year helps put more people and property in harm's way?

After 37 years, it's time to recognize federal flood insurance for what it is: a disaster.

Premiums Offset Costs (USAT)

By Richard Baker

USA Today, September 21, 2005

In response to Hurricane Katrina, Congress has unanimously passed legislation I helped introduce, which will allow the National Flood Insurance Program (NFIP) to borrow up to $3.5 billion a year from the U.S. Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $1.5 billion. If this sounds like part of a massive federal taxpayer-funded recovery of the Gulf Coast region, it's not. On the contrary, this is one of the few expenditures in which the taxpayers will not have to contribute. (Related: Our view)

All claims under the NFIP are paid using premiums of policyholders, not taxpayer revenue, and the funds the NFIP borrows from the Treasury must be repaid, with interest. Far from being a subsidy, the NFIP is just about the only federal disaster program in which the victims pay in advance to pick up the tab for the recovery of their losses.

To give an example, in 2001 Tropical Storm Allison, the costliest at the time, produced damages estimated at $5 billion, nearly all of it from flooding in the Houston area. As a result, 2001 saw the highest expenditure in the NFIP's history, with claims exceeding $1.4 billion — or, put another way, about a third of the damages were met not by taxpayers but by NFIP premiums. These losses were more than covered because premiums collected that year exceeded $1.7 billion.

Given this history, and knowing the federal expenditures for disaster relief mandated by law, does anyone doubt that taxpayer resources will pour into Katrina-stricken communities? Why, then, would anyone complain about a program that reduces the taxpayer burden, and actually works according to an old-fashioned concept whereby those who might be impacted pay a premium to fund recovery from the next disaster?

Before the creation of the NFIP, flood-plain management never existed. Today, every community that participates must develop flood-control plans and take steps to mitigate repetitive-loss properties. The more a community does, the better its residents' premiums. According to NFIP's statistics, flood damage is reduced by nearly $1 billion a year through partnerships with communities, the insurance industry and lenders. Every $3 paid in claims saves $1 in disaster assistance payments. And finally, buildings constructed to NFIP standards suffer approximately 80% less damage annually than those that are not.

The question isn't why we need the NFIP. The real question is why it's not used more.

Back To Trent Lott's House (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

"Out of the rubbles of Trent Lott's house -- he's lost his entire house -- there's going to be a fantastic house. And I'm looking forward to sitting on the porch."

-- George W. Bush, Sept. 2

Now that a suitable interval has passed, perhaps it's time to return to the question of Sen. Trent Lott's house. What interests me is not the now-tired question of whether the president ought to have promised to rebuild the Mississippi senator's family home on the Pascagoula beachfront before mentioning the lost homes of thousands of much poorer, less notorious people. What interests me is why his house was built on the beach in the first place.

At first glance, the answer appears simple. Although I haven't had the pleasure of visiting the senator's home, it's pretty safe to guess that he wanted to live by the water because it's psychologically soothing and aesthetically pleasing. It's quieter too, having seagulls instead of neighbors. It's nicer to sit on the porch.

But it's also true that many people build houses along the water because it makes economic sense to do so. Houses or apartments with ocean views command higher prices. Beachfront property owners can demand higher rents. Beachside businesses -- casinos, hotels, restaurants -- spin money. And, best of all, the risks of owning beachfront property -- risks from floods, hurricanes and erosion -- are covered by other people. Federally subsidized flood insurance programs and state-subsidized beach "re-nourishment" programs ensure that taxpayers -- rich, poor, local, national -- pay for damage to property built close to the water. To put it differently, Lott's house was on the beach because you and I paid for it.

Barring an unforeseen dose of political sanity, we're about to subsidize the reconstruction and even the expansion of more susceptible beachfront communities too. Leave aside New Orleans for a moment, with its special history and its peculiar geography. Focus instead on the rest of the Gulf Coast, much of which was wiped out no less thoroughly. Just like other hurricane-prone, flood-prone, erosion-prone parts of the country -- the Florida Keys, the Outer Banks, the Texas and California coasts -- the Gulf Coast recently has experienced an extraordinary building boom. In 2003 approximately 153 million people lived in U.S. coastal counties, an increase of 33 million people since 1980. By 2008, 7 million more will probably have moved there, too.

As a result of this success, beach developers tend to be disproportionately wealthy and politically influential, and therefore unusually good at fighting zoning laws and grabbing subsidies. Even after Hurricane Andrew forced Florida to establish stricter building codes, the owners of hot Florida Panhandle real estate managed to get a raft of exemptions for their region. One North Carolina beach community, Emerald Isle, has collected millions of dollars in state and federal money to combat erosion -- even though some 80 percent of Emerald Isle's new artificial beach is privately owned and inaccessible to the public, which paid for it. As The Post's Michael Grunwald recently pointed out, Lott himself used his political clout to force an Army engineer out of his job after the man had the temerity to suggest that Mississippi stop building casinos along the flood-prone coast. Twenty of those casinos were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, and the 16,000 people who worked in them have lost their jobs and probably their homes as well.

The pattern doesn't hold across the country, away from the ocean: Entire towns happily moved uphill after catastrophic flooding in the Midwest in the 1990s, when the government paid them to leave. But with a few exceptions, coastal victims of hurricanes and floods have not only refused to move inland, they've also used post-disaster government funding to build more and higher buildings, with fewer restrictions then ever before.

To reverse this trend, politicians would have to do a lot more than write checks and come up with neat new names for old housing programs. Instead, they would have to force coastal property owners to pay the real cost of the risk they incur by building in dangerous places. They would not only have to stop subsidizing flood insurance, they also would have to require developers to pay heavier taxes and higher insurance premiums. They would have to alter incentives in order to encourage building farther inland. They would have to enforce stricter building codes. In barrier islands and other truly unstable places, zoning laws should prevent any new construction at all.

Such proposals would, of course, be the kiss of death for almost any politician. After all, they go against two important American principles: property owners' right to build what they want, and the government's obligation to bail them out afterward. Those are the principles supported by the rugged inhabitants of Denver and Los Angeles, who build houses ever closer to forests that periodically burn, and those are the principles supported by the denizens of seaside Pascagoula. At least when President Bush finally gets around to drinking his alcohol-free mint julep on Lott's new porch, we can hope that he raises a glass to those of us who made it all possible.

First Lady Tackles Poverty, Race Issues (AJC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Laura Bush, former inner-city teacher, says Hurricane Katrina could have a silver lining if it forces the nation to respond "in a different way" to difficult poverty and racial problems.

"A large percentage of our population probably doesn't realize what inner cities are really like and has looked away from that," Bush told The Associated Press in an interview Tuesday.

The first lady sat down in the White House's Map Room to promote this weekend's National Book Festival, a daylong event on the National Mall that she has put on in concert with the Library of Congress for five years — a tradition she started as first lady of Texas.

But she readily allowed the brief interview to range beyond books to more difficult issues like Katrina and the Supreme Court vacancy now before President Bush. With her popularity in polls twice that of her husband's, which is stuck at a record-low level, Mrs. Bush often plays the president's chief defender and puts a smiling, trusted face on administration policies.

Mrs. Bush has been to the Gulf Coast four times, once alongside her husband, and has held events around Washington devoted to the hurricane response. Her husband, beset with criticism about the government's initial response to Katrina, traveled to the region for a fifth time Tuesday and is returning again this weekend.

"He has to. That's his job," Mrs. Bush said matter-of-factly. "That's what happens when you run for president. You don't know what might happen like this."

Then, in a wifely endorsement, she said, "Fortunately he is really strong and so I'm confident that he'll be able to sustain the level of attention that he'll have to — and not just to that, also to the war in Iraq, to foreign policy and to all the other issues that are on the desk of the president of the United States."

With her husband called upon — and promising — to take bold new action on racial inequities in the wake of the storm, Mrs. Bush held up the 2002 No Child Left Behind education law as the signature example of how the Bush administration has been fighting poverty from the start. White House aides say the law is fueling higher achievement levels, particularly for poor and minority students — though there is little data yet to prove that such a new law deserves all the credit for recent gains in narrowing the achievement gap between younger whites and minorities.

But she said she also hopes for a broader national discussion of poverty and race. "I think it's really important for us to talk about it in a different way," said Mrs. Bush, who over three decades ago taught elementary students at an inner-city school in Houston and was a school librarian in a poor Austin neighborhood.

Without offering specifics, she urged policymakers to tackle not only improving education so that poor and minority children have a leg up in life, but increasing the amount of affordable housing stock and the jobs available to those who most need them. She pressed for job training programs, whether through the government or unions or corporations.

"Because of the devastation on the coast, there will be a neighborhood and a housing discussion that'll be possible that really was not possible before," she said. "And then the employment piece of it is also very, very important. ... If a large number of people can come out with skills that they didn't have before, that will be one silver lining."

She pleaded with Americans who have been so generous and focused not to turn away from the staggering need in the Gulf Coast before the job is done.

"That's going to be the hard part for everyone, and that is to sustain the amount of help that evacuees are getting to do the long, long hard work that's going to be required," Mrs. Bush said. "It's particularly hard for Americans, because we're so im patient and we think that everything ought to be fixed yesterday."

As for the book festival, it has added a Katrina focus this year by prominently featuring "Book Relief," a joint project between the Library of Congress and the nonprofit First Book that hopes to deliver 5 million books — up from 100,000 gathered so far — to storm evacuees, libraries and schools whose collections were wiped out.

The first lady repeated her desire to see her husband nominate a woman to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whose retirement will leave Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the Supreme Court's sole female, and said "there are qualified women that are in the pool" of potential nominees being considered.

"It's important to have women in those jobs, just like I think it's important for women to be in every field in our country," she said.

But she hedged on whether the president would heed her wishes.

"Whether it's a woman or a man, I know they'll be highly qualified," she said.

Politics, Priorities Stand In Way Of National War On Poverty (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina brought poor people directly into American living rooms. Then, amid the images of hardship, the Census Bureau said poverty had risen for the fourth straight year.

Is the nation at a crossroads, about to experience a dramatic shift in its politics and priorities?

Hurricane Katrina has sparked hopes and calls for a new national resolve to end poverty. But the public may not be mobilized for such a crusade.

Two-thirds of those in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll this month said the country is not spending enough to fight poverty. Yet such sentiment cannot be attributed to Katrina; 69% said the same thing more than a year ago in a University of Chicago Poll.

Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster, says his pre- and post-Katrina surveys show voter priorities are unchanged. Asked what would most influence their vote for Congress next year, their top issues are Iraq, terrorism and jobs.

Even assuming the public would support a national war on poverty, many analysts say it's not likely to happen. One reason is the cost of Gulf Coast recovery, combined with the expense of the Iraq war and President Bush's drive for more tax cuts. "Yes, Katrina has shined a light on poverty," says Sheila Zedlewski, director of the Income and Benefits Policy Center at the Urban Institute. "But we have a competing problem and that is the federal deficit," which the White House estimated to be $333 billion this year.

Another problem is the divide between liberals and conservatives on how to fight poverty. More government programs or more run by churches? Direct help or tax cuts?

"We all want to solve poverty," says Donald Devine, vice chairman of the American Conservative Union. "The question is, will we do it the way we did it in 1932, or have we learned something since then?"

The New Deal looks pretty good to some Democrats. Former vice presidential nominee John Edwards, director of the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina, praised three Depression-era programs this week and proposed a job creation program for the Gulf Coast. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., wants a Gulf Coast Redevelopment Authority modeled on the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Bush's plan includes tax incentives for business, vouchers to help displaced parents pay for private and parochial schools, relaxed environmental regulations and suspension of a requirement that federal contractors pay workers prevailing local wages. All are part of a long-standing GOP agenda.

Calls for a more expansive fight against poverty are coming from many quarters. First lady Laura Bush told the Associated Press she hopes Katrina helps the country respond "in a different way" to poverty and racial problems. "A large percentage of our population probably doesn't realize what inner cities are really like and has looked away from that," she said Tuesday.

Most of those calling for broad-based action are Democrats or clergy. "We can no longer be a nation that overlooks the poor and the suffering," T.D. Jakes, pastor of a Dallas megachurch, said at a memorial service for Katrina victims.

Edwards, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry are among the Democrats pressing to turn Katrina into a pivotal moment. "Will we be satisfied to only do the immediate: care for the victims and rebuild the city?" Kerry, his party's 2004 presidential nominee, asked Monday in a speech at Brown University. "Or will we be inspired to tackle … the societal injustice that left so many of the least fortunate waiting and praying on those rooftops?"

Charlie Cook, publisher of a political report, says Republicans "need to soften some of their hard edges or run the risk of losing their majorities" in the House and Senate. They would be smart, he says, to talk broadly about fighting poverty.

Zedlewski says Katrina has revealed "a fragmented safety net" with many separate programs and sets of rules. It's so difficult to navigate that there may be bipartisan support for streamlining, she says: "People on both sides of the aisle would like to see this support system work better than it does."

Such consequences would be modest compared with those from the 1911 Triangle Shirtwaist factory fire that led to workplace reforms and the modern labor movement, and the 1927 Mississippi River flood that prompted a government response foreshadowing the New Deal.

But some leaders say even a discussion with no immediate results would be better than the pre-Katrina silence. Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa says his city has the highest poverty rate in the country. "I'm amazed at how little the issue of poverty is raised in the Congress," he says. "Hurricane Katrina is an opportunity for us to engage in that debate."

Rita Nears Category 4 (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 21, 2005

MIAMI — Hurricane Rita was forecast to strengthen tonight into a major storm as powerful as Hurricane Katrina, after brushing past the Florida Keys on Tuesday.

Rita's growing strength and its westward track prompted evacuations in Texas, the scrambling of National Guard troops and a dash in Louisiana to shore up levees.

The National Hurricane Center said Rita, with winds above 100 mph, is likely to become a Category 3 hurricane this morning with winds of at least 111 mph. It is then predicted to quickly become a Category 4 with winds of at least 131 mph as it gains strength from the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico, hurricane center specialist Stacy Stewart said. Katrina was a Category 4 storm with winds of 145 mph when it hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

"If Rita goes on to become a Category 4 and remains a Category 4 when it makes landfall, you could have a similar disaster to Katrina," Stewart said. "People need to take this storm very, very, very seriously."

Rita was on track to hit Texas by Friday. Galveston County, Texas, ordered an evacuation starting tonight of tens of thousands of residents in coastal island communities. School buses were lined up to ferry those without cars. Gov. Rick Perry ordered 1,200 Texas National Guardsmen on relief duty in Louisiana to return home.

In New Orleans, the Army Corps of Engineers raced to patch levees damaged by Katrina. There was a small chance Rita could swerve toward Louisiana, according to the hurricane center.

"The protection is very tenuous at best," corps official Dave Wurtzel said of the levees.

The federal government was pouring resources into the region to ensure a rapid response. Helicopters were on standby to carry in water, food and other supplies. The Federal Emergency Management Agency readied aircraft and buses for evacuations. Rescue teams and truckloads of ice, water and prepared meals were being sent to areas in Rita's path.

DOJ_NMG_0007074

The warship USS Bataan, laden with hospital supplies and doctors, was shadowing the storm. President Bush received a briefing aboard the USS Iwo Jima, docked in New Orleans. He discussed plans for "what we pray is not a devastating storm."

Rita ran just south of the Florida Keys on Tuesday. Water and sand washed over some roads.

Gulf Coast Braces As Hurricane Rita Gains Strength (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

FLORIDA KEYS — An intensifying Hurricane Rita gave people here a soaking and a scare today, as the storm roared through this group of isles and islets toward the Gulf Coast.

Though it was unlikely that Rita would directly hit the Keys, there was concern that it would pick up energy and become a serious threat to the Gulf Coast, which is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

"If this is all it is, we have been lucky again," said Monroe County Sheriff Richard Roth. "We've dodged another bullet."

Rita, a Category 2 hurricane with winds of more than 100 mph, is about 50 miles south of Key West and about 65 miles northeast of Havana, Cuba, according to the National Hurricane Center. It was moving toward the Gulf of Mexico, where it was expected to pick up energy from the warm waters and most likely hit Texas by the end of the week.

Some of the storm's effects could be felt as soon as Thursday in New Orleans, slammed when Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

According to the Hurricane Center, Rita was moving west at 15 mph, with rainfall in the Keys between 6 to 8 inches. A storm surge of 2 to 4 feet could bring flooding along the Florida coast.

As it moved south of Key West, the archipelago's largest city, the storm whipped up a chocolate-colored surf that poured onto the Overseas Highway, which is only foot above sea level in places, and is the only road link to the mainland United States. The surf left a thick matt of brownish seaweed on the road, along with coconuts and the occasional float torn from a lobster pot.

Sheriff Roth said his deputies and firefighters had been called in to evacuate 12 people who had hunkered down in their trailer park in Islamorada.

Roth estimated that 40,000 people, about half of the year-round population in this popular tourist and fishing destination, had heeded the wish of authorities that they evacuate.

Though proverbially relaxed about the vagaries of tropical weather, many Conchs, as Keys natives are known, had been spooked by the images of flooding and other devastation caused by Katrina, Roth said

"They were quick to leave this time," Roth said, though they had only one day to evacuate.

One factor in the Key's favor was Rita's brisk forward motion, which gave it less time to linger and cause harm with its waves, wind and rain.

"The more it sits here and stalls, the more damage it does," said Sharon Harrold, a director at the Monroe County sheriff's office. "We like them to move fast. In and out."

As Rita, the third hurricane to strike the United States this year, began to batter the keys, authorities warned residents to stay off the road and hole up in a safe place.

By midday, officials said Highway 1 was flooded in at least eight locations and for all practical purposes cut off from the rest of the county. "The whole Keys, US 1 is impassible," Harrold said, at the county emergency operation center in Marathon, about 45 miles northeast of Key West.

At fire stations throughout the Keys, the red and black flags heralding the coming of the hurricane snapped in the increasingly fierce winds.

The seas around the islands were whipped into a brownish jade color, in places seawater and tossing waves slopped onto roads carrying crabs that then scampered across the asphalt. Palm trees flailed their fronds against a battleship grey sky and the air carried a strong smell of brine.

Though Florida faced four hurricanes last year and three so far in 2005, Roth, the sheriff for the Keys, said the response by authorities was becoming more finally honed with each ordeal.

Florida authorities, he said, had already stockpiled water, ice, gasoline, diesel fuel and other relief supplies at staging areas from Homestead north to Palm Beach. They were just waiting for Rita's winds to die down to bring in whatever was needed.

"I have never seen staging like I have seen in this storm," Roth said. "It's amazing what's available to us — helicopters, Humvees, the National Guard."

On Ohio Key, a trailer park lay partially under water. Further to the south on Big Pine Key, which is home to a federally protected species of deer, no bigger than dogs, the deer preserve was partially flooded. On Big Pine Key Rita's gust were powerful enough to push an SUV around on the road.

Elsewhere in the lower Keys, residents worried about storm surge parked their cars on the highest ground available — the shoulder of US 1, turning the berms of the Overseas Highway into what looked like a large used car lot.

On Big Coppitt Key Rita's winds were powerful enough to tear one of the hurricane warning flags from the fire station's flagpole and carry it away.

In Key West, the southernmost city in the continental United States, closer to Havana than Miami, Rita pushed the foaming surf over the beachfront road on the south side of the island, inundating the road with 4 inches of water and depositing scores of natural sponges, wrested from the seabed.

The raging surf foamed with plumes 6 feet high as it dashed against the sea wall. In Key West's business and tourists district many traffic lights were knocked out, neighborhoods reported power losses and streets were littered with downed palm fronds, tree branches and green coconuts. Duvall Street, the main drag for cruise ship passenger and other tourists, was practically deserted, its storefronts covered with plywood sheets or steel storm shutters.

"We are tired of hurricanes. We are moving to Alaska," was the message painted on the boards protecting one trattoria.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush ordered 2,400 Florida National Guard Troops to active duty, and alerted 2,000 for possible activation.

Homestead Air Force Base and Patrick Air Force Base have been designated as FEMA mobilization centers, from which supplies and equipment will be ferried to the areas affected by the storm. The Pentagon has also put eight helicopters from Patrick Air Force Base on alert to conduct search and rescue missions.

With the storm moving into the Gulf of Mexico, the Pentagon has decided to move the five ships deployed for Joint Task Force Katrina out of Rita's path. The ships that will sail east are the Tortuga, the Comfort, the Iwo Jima, the Shreveport and the Grapple.

In expectation of Rita making landfall in Texas, Gov. Rick Perry today ordered 1,100 Texas National Guard troops aiding relief efforts in Louisiana back to their home state. Perry has authorized the activation of up to 5,000 Texas Guardsmen.

Officials of Galveston, Texas — nearly 900 miles from Key West — have already asked residents to leave voluntarily. Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco urged everyone in the southwest part of her state to prepare to evacuate.

Officials said Rita might reach Category 3, or even Category 4, status before it hits coastal Texas.

In coastal Galveston, officials made plans to evacuate the city's 58,000 residents. In 1900, a hurricane with estimated winds of 135 mph made landfall at Galveston, inundating the Texas resort city with a 20-foot storm surge and killing at least 6,000 people.

Since then, a 17-foot-high seawall has been erected at Galveston, but officials still worried about a tidal surge.

As Texas braced for Hurricane Rita, men, women and children who had been evacuated from Louisiana to shelters in Houston after Hurricane Katrina began to pack their belongings for yet another move.

Officials plan to close down the shelter at the Reliant Center -- Houston's largest temporary facility for Katrina evacuees -- and transfer people to Ft. Chaffee, Ark., in advance of Rita.

The center this morning was a buzz of stress and activity, as reluctant evacuees prepared to leave yet again, heading to their fourth shelter in three states since surviving Katrina.

Many of the 976 evacuees who remained at the Reliant Center began their journeys at the Superdome in New Orleans, were airlifted to Houston's Astrodome, then shifted to the Reliant Center shelter when the Astrodome closed.

DOJ_NMG_0007076

"I'm tired, I'm tired," said Darrell Lewis, 41, as he waited, resigned, on a folding chair outside the shelter for a bus to Ellington Field and an eventual plane to Arkansas. "I just want to settle down, go someplace and stay there and get my life back together. I been in three places already, and now I'm going to Arkansas."

Some of remaining evacuees at the Reliant Center have balked at being airlifted to yet another state and have made plans to move in with relatives or find other housing.

Carol Ben, 62, waited outside of the massive shelter with a friend for "somebody to come and get me. I'm going to Dallas, hopefully to my son or daughter's house.

"We were going to leave Saturday, but we have to leave early," Ben said. "It's a problem all the way around. It looks like it's following us."

FEMA Rushes To Help After Rita (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), already stretched thin from recovery efforts for Hurricane Katrina, is scrambling to prepare for an equally disastrous hurricane forecast to reach Category 4 strength by this afternoon.

FEMA and state officials began preparation efforts Monday for the first impact of Hurricane Rita in the Florida Keys, racing hundred of trucks with ice, water and military Meals Ready to Eat (MREs) rations to pre-staging sites, and dispatched multiple emergency teams to provide medical care and search and rescue services.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush mobilized 2,400 National Guardsmen and put another 2,000 guardsmen on alert Sunday, evacuated all hospitals and nursing-home patients in Monroe County and issued a mandatory evacuation of Key West before closing the bridge to the island at midnight Monday.

Six Black Hawk helicopters and one Chinook were on standby in West Palm Beach, and out-of-state choppers were staged to respond to Hurricane Rita victims.

"The great work being done locally and with support from the state and federal officials, we've responded to this storm, I think, in a way that Floridians can be proud," Mr. Bush said at a press conference yesterday.

R. David Paulison, acting FEMA director, said state evacuation efforts were thorough, and he expects the same cooperation with Texas.

"I've been on the phone with [Mr. Bush] on a regular basis. He is very pleased with the job we've done. Florida, like Texas, has an outstanding emergency management system, and they're easy to work with," Mr. Paulison said.

As Rita grew from a tropical storm to a Category 2 hurricane on a path toward Texas and Louisiana, FEMA began relocating more than 8,000 Katrina evacuees who were sheltered in Texas to other locations, while rounding up water and food for new shelters.

Meanwhile, FEMA officials set up staging areas in Texas with 90 truckloads of water and ice and eight trucks full of MREs, and dispatched 18 urban search-and-rescue task forces and disaster medical assistance teams.

"Texas also has an outstanding emergency management system. They are well prepared," Mr. Paulison said. "They are ready for the hurricane. They know it's not going to be easy, but they're ready to go."

Texas Gov. Rick Perry will begin mandatory evacuations today in Galveston, Corpus Christi, Houston and San Antonio and has recalled the Texas National Guard from Louisiana along with other emergency personnel and equipment. Forecasters currently predict Rita will make landfall near Galveston, a city that was leveled by a hurricane 105 years ago this month.

"For the past three weeks, our emergency personnel have been assisting our neighbors devastated by Hurricane Katrina, and over the last year our state has heightened preparations for dealing with a catastrophic storm. While we continue to hope that day never comes, Texas must be ready if it does," Mr. Perry said.

FEMA officials are in place at Texas' operation center, which went on full-alert status today with 34 state agencies on site round-the-clock, a spokeswoman for the governor told the Houston Chronicle.

"FEMA has already been part of this. They have offered whatever support we need," Perry spokeswoman Kathy Walt said. Texas is not Louisiana. You won't see that breakdown occurring here."

Texas Pulls Katrina Relief Crews To Aid In New Storm (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Texas state officials pulled back emergency workers from Hurricane Katrina relief operations, and businesses and residents began battening down in advance of the second hurricane in a month to take aim at the Gulf Coast.

The National Hurricane Center predicted Hurricane Rita, which strengthened yesterday to a Category 2 with winds of about 100 miles an hour, will make landfall along the Texas coast, though the storm also could turn toward Louisiana. Forecasters expect Rita to continue strengthening before striking Texas as early as Friday night. (See the hurricane center's strike-probability map.)

Texas Gov. Rick Perry recalled a contingent of 1,000 Texas National Guard members from Louisiana and announced plans to redeploy them alongside 5,000 state emergency workers for possible water rescue operations.

In Houston, officials were emptying two huge shelters that were set up four weeks ago to house New Orleans residents fleeing Hurricane Katrina. The two shelters harbored about 30,000 people at the height of the Katrina evacuations, but only 1,200 remained yesterday morning.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency arranged for 10 chartered jets to fly as many as 1,700 people out of the region. Shelter occupants were requested to relocate to Fort Chaffee, Ark. Those who didn't want to leave Texas were being asked to find temporary housing elsewhere.

"Our major concern is to get them out of harm's way," said Gloria Roemer, a spokesman for Harris County Judge Robert Eckels. "We cannot have them here in this arena; it's not safe here," she said. Once the two shelters are closed, personnel will be directed to prepare for Hurricane Rita.

In Louisiana, federal, state and local officials said they are prepared to evacuate residents quickly if Rita threatens the battered state. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said the federal government has provided 500 buses to empty the city of holdouts still there. Starting today, residents and business owners trying to return to assess the damage to their property will be turned back at checkpoints into New Orleans.

Brigadier General Robert Crear of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers warned that the city's levee system was "almost completely destroyed" by Katrina and likely could withstand a storm surge of only five to 10 feet in some locations. Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco said officials are "praying that it dissipates. ... This state can barely stand what happened after Katrina."

In Galveston, an island city 50 miles south of Houston that is no stranger to hurricanes, officials called for nearly 60,000 residents to evacuate inland and closed schools for the week. Galveston hotels and rental cottages were asking visitors to leave the island, and residents were boarding up vacation homes.

Evacuees were directed to Red Cross shelters in Huntsville, Texas, 115 miles north. University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston, the island's largest hospital, said it was drawing up plans for an orderly evacuation of patients, if needed, today or tomorrow.

Rita Is Gaining Force In The Gulf (WP)

By Sam Coates And Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

KEY WEST, Fla., Sept. 20 -- Hurricane Rita slapped at Key West on Tuesday before strengthening in the Gulf of Mexico, where it appeared to be veering away from New Orleans, but still forced the evacuation of 7,000 of Louisiana's Katrina evacuees from Texas.

Forecasters expect Rita to swell on Wednesday into a Category 4 monster, carrying 131-mph winds, as it gains strength from the warm Gulf waters and spins westward toward an anticipated landfall early Saturday near Galveston, Tex. The storm's sudden burst of power after it passed 50 miles south of Key West, and the possibility that its track could change, sent ripples of anxiety across hundreds of miles of the Gulf Coast, much of it still in the early stages of recovery from Katrina three weeks ago.

President Bush signed an emergency declaration for Florida, which allowed federal relief help to be prepositioned. He also said that he had spoken with Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) about storm preparations.

"All up and down this coastline, people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm," Bush said.

Perry activated 5,000 members of the Texas National Guard. Military leaders prepared to rush the USS Iwo Jima, which has served as a floating command post in New Orleans, and several other naval vessels out to sea to better ride out the storm. Emergency workers began plans to open shelters in central Texas, and the mayor of Galveston issued a voluntary evacuation order, which could be followed by a mandatory order on Wednesday.

The scramble to prepare for Rita's next landfall swung into motion even before the storm toppled trees and electrical lines with 90-mph gusts in Key West. But there were no reports of injuries, only isolated flooding. The damage was far less than feared from a storm so fearsome that nearly half of Key West's residents evacuated -- far more than the usual 25 percent on an island famous for its nonchalance in the face of hurricane threats.

"We are very fortunate," Key West Mayor Jimmy Weekley said.

Key West's apparent fortune did little to ease anxiety as the storm grew more powerful Tuesday. New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin, who has delayed plans to let residents return, urged those who are still in the city to leave once again. Two busloads of residents followed his advice. But hundreds ignored him.

In the Gentilly neighborhood of New Orleans, where neck-high floodwaters from Hurricane Katrina have now receded, the National Guard was warning a handful of homeowners who had sneaked into the city to check on their houses that it was time to get out again.

"We are not forcing them, but we will do anything to convince them to get out of here," said Sgt. Timothy Eagle of the Oregon National Guard, who cruised the neighborhood in a Humvee. "We don't want to come back for the body."

Perhaps the worst off, at least psychologically, are the thousands of Katrina evacuees in Texas who are now being "re-traumatized" by a second evacuation.

"You can imagine what's going on in people's minds who lost virtually everything," said Howard B. Smith, associate dean of the College of Education and Counseling at South Dakota State University and coordinator of Red Cross mental health services.

A few evacuees began boarding planes bound for Fort Chaffee in Arkansas, a state that will accept 4,000 displaced residents, while an additional 3,000 will be going to Tennessee. One thousand may be going to Nebraska. But some evacuees were unwilling to be uprooted again.

Perry urged residents to fill their vehicles with gasoline, gather personal and financial records, stock up on a three-month supply of needed medications and emergency provisions such as flashlights, water and nonperishable food; and find places to stay inland.

Advance work in Louisiana, where levees are still being repaired and 40 percent of the pumps in New Orleans still do not work, included the staging of 500 buses in case the storm edged toward the city, addressing a lack of transportation that left the city with no choice but to house tens of thousands of people in squalor at the Louisiana Superdome and the convention center in the days after Katrina.

"We're learning as we go," Nagin said.

Nagin, whose plan to let residents return to the city was sternly criticized by Bush and by the administration's point man for New Orleans recovery, Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, went for a show of unity at a news briefing on Tuesday, presenting Allen with a T-shirt that read "I love New Orleans." He also hugged Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D), who declared a state of emergency as Rita entered the Gulf.

Nagin said he might begin reconsidering when to restart his plan to repopulate the city on Friday if Rita does not hit Louisiana. But he refused to discuss a timetable after meeting with Bush, who made his fifth trip to New Orleans on Tuesday, and Allen, who has cautioned that the city is still unsafe.

Now that the storm is deep into the gulf, the party can continue in Key West, where Bill Piercenall, who works in a restaurant and lives downtown, spent the hours before the storm "feet up" drinking beer.

"I'm just surprised there aren't more drag queens," said L.A. Meyers, working in the 801 bar, the only drinking establishment open on Duval Street, the main road in downtown Key West. "They love to come out during hurricanes."

The arrival of Rita on Key West is getting forecasters closer to the possibility of a notable quirk. An international committee of the World Meteorological Organization has preselected storm names for decades, first using only female names, then alternating male and female names since 1979.

But there is a finite number of preselected names -- 21 -- each summer, and after Rita, only four are left this year: Stan, Tammy, Vince and Wilma. If that list is exhausted, the meteorological group will have to revert to a backup plan: naming storms using the Greek alphabet, beginning with alpha, beta and gamma.

Bush Concerned Rita May Hit Damaged Gulf (KCS)

By Nedra Pickler

The Kansas City Star, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - President Bush kept a worried watch Tuesday on "what we pray is not a devastating storm" - Hurricane Rita - as he flew over miles of flattened homes and mud-caked neighborhoods hit by Hurricane Katrina.

Bush received a briefing about Rita aboard the USS Iwo Jima, which is docked near downtown New Orleans, as the hurricane lashed the Florida Keys and caused new anxiety among Katrina victims in Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama.

In a ship mess hall, the president held a videoconference with three federal officials: Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, the National Hurricane Center's deputy director, Ed Rappaport, and a Federal Emergency Management Agency official.

The officials said Rita was projected to strengthen to a Category 3 hurricane that would hit the upper to middle part of the Texas coast by the weekend and could create tropical storm conditions - or, much less likely, hurricane-force winds - in southeastern Louisiana.

"We're watching very closely, of course, its track," Bush said later at a Folgers coffee plant in Louisiana that recently restarted operations. "All up and down the coastline people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm."

Eager to show hands-on leadership after being criticized for a slow response to Katrina, Bush signed an emergency declaration for Florida, spoke with Texas Gov. Rick Perry about planning for the storm's landfall, and said military outfits are being removed from New Orleans to be out of Rita's path and ready to help with recovery.

The White House said Bush had named Frances Fragos Townsend, his in-house homeland security adviser, to lead an administration investigation of "what went wrong and what went right" in the sluggish federal response to Katrina. The appointment of Townsend, a former federal prosecutor with a reputation as a tough adversary, is unlikely to satisfy Democrats on Capitol Hill who are demanding a fully independent investigation.

Bush said he was pleased that New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin suspended his plan to allow as many as a third of the city's residents to return. He said positive steps are being taken.

"What you're beginning to see is a revitalized economy," Bush said, standing before 110 trailers set up for Folgers employees who lost their homes. "Progress is being made."

Bush began the day in Gulfport, Miss., where he dropped in on the first meeting of Gov. Haley Barbour's Commission on Recovery, Rebuilding and Renewal, applauding their "can-do spirit" and pledging to help clean up the devastated Gulf Coast. He flew along the coast over mile after mile of destroyed homes.

"There is no doubt in my mind that out of the rubble and out of the huge heaps of timber that used to be homes, a better Mississippi will emerge," Bush told the local government and business leaders gathered in an air-conditioned tent set up in a hurricane-damaged outlet shopping center.

The president told them he had heard their complaints about bureaucratic hurdles for trash removal, saying he was personally making calls to cut through red tape and people in the area will soon see results.

"There was a level of frustration, as there should have been," he said. "We'll get the debris removed."

Barbour told Bush that local officials need the federal government's help to rebuild the area's infrastructure and make Mississippi's hurricane zone "the most attractive place in America for private investment."

"I'm confident that we'll get the resources because y'all have been so generous and good to us. But we want you to know that we're going to try to help you know what to give us," Barbour said to laughter.

Jim Barksdale, chairman of Barbour's commission, told the president and other attendees that they only have themselves to blame if reconstruction isn't successful. "You folks are like the pig at a ham and egg breakfast," he said. "You are committed."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan acknowledged that some of Mississippi's more rural areas still are waiting for federal help that has been focused in New Orleans and other larger population centers.

After Bush returned to Washington, the White House issued a statement saying Bush had signed into law legislation that allows the National Flood Insurance Program to borrow up to $3.5 billion a year from the Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $1.5 billion. He also signed into law a measure that excludes federal assistance for mitigating flood damage from being considered income when determining a person's eligibility for other federal benefit programs.

Another Storm Could Renew Flooding (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The Army Corps of Engineers sped repairs to the pumps and levees guarding this crippled city Tuesday, but another hurricane or heavy rains almost certainly would cause new flooding, according to corps officials and engineering and storm experts.

Three weeks after Hurricane Katrina breached levees and flood barriers and inundated large sections of New Orleans, the corps is closely watching the path of Hurricane Rita, which buffeted the Florida Keys Tuesday and moved into the Gulf of Mexico.

“We're not in a position to go through a tropical storm without reflooding a lot of areas that were just drained,” says Paul Kemp, a professor at Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center.

Rita's projected path takes it toward possible landfall Friday on the Texas coast. If that happens, Rita's high winds and storm surge will largely skirt New Orleans, said Lee Butler, an engineering consultant and former corps engineer who has studied New Orleans' levees. “There shouldn't be that much pressure on New Orleans if the storm stays to the west of Galveston,” Butler said.

As Rita strengthens, the corps is filling hundreds of sandbags, moving pumps into vulnerable areas and adding dirt and rock to low spots on levees to strengthen New Orleans' defenses against flooding, said Col. Duane Gapinski, who commands the agency's effort to rebuild the levees.

That combination should protect the city against a storm surge of 5 feet or higher, Gapinski said.

The corps also plans to build temporary steel dams across two canals near Lake Pontchartrain where breaches occurred after Katrina struck.

But parts of New Orleans lie below sea level and almost certainly would flood again if Rita shifts course and hits the region. Here are the area's major flood weaknesses, according to the corps:

•The city's system of pumps, which was knocked out by Katrina, is operating at less than half normal capacity. A preliminary corps study predicted a storm that dumped 9 inches of rain would produce pools of water 2 to 4 feet deep in the lowest lying areas. Even 3 inches would flood some areas again, said Brig. Gen. Robert Crear of the corps.

•Five major breaches that led to flooding in New Orleans during Katrina have been repaired, but the protective barriers are 5 to 10 feet lower than they were before Katrina. The corps plans to dam two canals near Lake Pontchartrain to protect levees there. But there is no such protection near the city's Ninth Ward, which was heavily flooded by Katrina.

•St. Bernard Parish, a community east of New Orleans that was severely flooded by Katrina, could be vulnerable if Rita pushes water toward it from the Gulf. Much of a 10-mile stretch of levees designed to protect the parish was leveled by Katrina's storm surge.

Rita Threatens New Orleans' Damaged Levees (WT/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0007081

NEW ORLEANS -- The Army Corps of Engineers raced to mend New Orleans' fractured levee system yesterday, and residents were forced to decide yet again whether to stay or go as a new hurricane threatened the city.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and other officials strongly urged people along the Louisiana coast to be prepared to evacuate and said nearly 500 buses stood ready.

"The protection is very tenuous at best," said Dave Wurtzel, the Army Corps official responsible for repairing the 17th Street Canal levee, whose huge breach during Hurricane Katrina caused the worst of the floods that soaked the city.

The new threat was Hurricane Rita, which strengthened into a 100-mph Category 2 storm as it barreled past the Florida Keys into the Gulf of Mexico.

"We are praying that the hurricane dissipates or that it weakens," said Mrs. Blanco, who declared a state of emergency. "This state can barely stand what happened to it."

The storm was projected to cross the Gulf and hit Texas by the end of the week. But a slight turn to the right was possible, and engineers warned that even a glancing blow to New Orleans and as little as 3 inches of rain could swamp the city's levees as early as tomorrow.

In anticipation of Rita, the Corps drove a massive metal barrier across the 17th Street Canal bed to prevent a storm surge from Lake Pontchartrain from swamping New Orleans again. Although engineers have left a large opening in the wall to allow floodwater to continue to be pumped back into the lake, it will have to be closed quickly if the storm threatens.

"This is what we're going to have to rely on to protect this canal and this part of the city," Mr. Wurtzel said.

Government engineers and private contractors also worked round-the-clock across New Orleans to repair the damage to the system of pumps, concrete flood walls, earthen berms and canals that protect the city.

In addition, the Corps had 800 giant sandbags weighing 6,000 to 15,000 pounds on hand, and had ordered 2,500 more to shore up low spots and plug any new breaches. It was also putting pumps and other materials where they might be needed.

"If New Orleans was directly affected by a Category 1, I would be concerned -- I would pull my people out," said David Pezza, the top geotechnical engineer for the Army Corps. "These levees are greatly compromised."

Mixed Signals Add New Level Of Aggravation (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Frazzled and frustrated residents prepared Tuesday for the possibility of another hurricane, saying they're sick of mixed signals from federal, state and local leaders about whether to stay or go.

“I'm just tired,” Shandried Baxter, 30, said as she waited for her clothes to dry at one of the few operating coin laundries in the city. “If we have to leave, we have to leave,” she added with a shrug.

Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said they would like to see everyone evacuate: the residents who stayed in the city after Hurricane Katrina hit three weeks ago, as well as those who returned at the mayor's suggestion on Monday to the Algiers section of the city.

The National Hurricane Center projected that Rita would strike Texas at the end of the week, which gave Louisiana officials hope that their state would be bypassed.

“Today I feel better about Rita, and I'm not as prone to do a hard, mandatory evacuation,” Nagin told reporters after meeting with President Bush and other federal officials. “But I want to leave that open as an option.”

Nagin said he will “start to shut the city down” today if Rita remains a serious threat. He estimated that about 500 residents remained in the city, as well as hundreds of emergency, relief and reconstruction workers. The estimate seemed low, as hundreds, if not thousands, of people could be seen in the Algiers area on Tuesday.

Some of the military forces in New Orleans moved out of the city to be ready for action if Rita hits.

Police, meanwhile, turned away many residents trying to return. Nagin said authorities would begin strict enforcement today of a dusk-to-dawn curfew. Buses were provided at the city's convention center for anyone who wanted to leave, and two buses of evacuees left Tuesday, Nagin said.

DOJ_NMG_0007082

Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, commander of the military's Joint Task Force Katrina, bristled at reporters' questions about where those evacuees would be taken.

"That's not your business," he said, adding later: "Don't start panic here. … Let's not get stuck on the last storm. Don't get stuck on stupid, reporters."

Blanco said state officials were working to find housing for people still staying in shelters after Katrina. All of the shelters in the state south of Interstate 10, which runs through New Orleans, would be closed, she said.

"We want people to move out of shelters, because shelter life is not a good way of life," she said.

Many residents of the Algiers neighborhood, which Nagin had urged residents to return to Monday, said they didn't know what to believe. "It doesn't make sense. First he orders us back, then he tells us to leave," Arthur Lawrence Brown Sr., 73, said of the mayor.

Brown sat in a folding chair on his stoop. Like many residents, he vowed not to leave. "I didn't go the first time. I won't go the second time," said Brown, an Army veteran of the Korean War. "If the Lord wants me, I'll be right here."

Others said they will leave if Rita does threaten New Orleans. One was Marcia Toca, 36, who said she would flee if necessary. But she said she didn't want to leave her neighborhood too quickly because authorities were not letting people re-enter the Algiers area.

"We're stuck here," Toca said. "It's like a prison. It's very frustrating. We came back in to get started rebuilding, and then they stopped us again."

Residents Leave Gulf Coast Area As Storm Grows (NYT)

By William Yardley And Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 - Hurricane Rita brushed past Key West on Tuesday and was forecast to strengthen into a major hurricane later in the week, prompting residents and rescuers to begin evacuating this feeble city, as well as parts of Louisiana and Texas.

From the tip of the Florida peninsula to Galveston, Tex., thousands left their homes or made plans to, including many who had already fled once, from Hurricane Katrina, and were living in shelters and temporary housing. In Houston, officials moved evacuees from New Orleans out of the Reliant Arena and sent many of them on to Arkansas.

In Louisiana, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco asked President Bush on Tuesday to declare a state of emergency for her battered state as it prepares for Hurricane Rita. She requested $10 million in assistance.

Churning undiminished toward the warm and wide Gulf of Mexico, Hurricane Rita could strengthen to Category 4 intensity as it approaches Texas later this week, said Colin McAdie, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center in Miami. Hurricane Katrina was a Category 4 storm when it devastated parts of the coasts of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama on Aug. 29.

Mr. McAdie said western Louisiana could also bear the brunt of the storm depending on changes in steering currents.

"It's better not to nail it down too precisely," he said. "Over the next day or so we'll have a better idea."

The threat of a new storm aligned federal and local authorities in Louisiana, at least publicly, after weeks of tension over the response to Hurricane Katrina.

President Bush, who had visited Mississippi earlier, attended a briefing in New Orleans. Later in the day, Mr. Bush signed legislation to increase the borrowing authority of the government's flood insurance program to $3.5 billion from $1.5 billion to pay claims from Hurricane Katrina.

"All up and down this coastline people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm," the president said. He said Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen would remain in charge of the federal effort in Louisiana and Mississippi and that "we've got another admiral who is now being stationed in Texas, to coordinate the relief response."

Mr. Bush also praised the New Orleans mayor, C. Ray Nagin, who decided Monday to suspend a staggered reopening of parts of the city.

"He made a wise decision to say to people, be cautious about returning here, because a rain of any amount could cause these levees to break again," the president said.

DOJ_NMG_0007083

The mayor, prickly a day earlier under pressure from the president and Admiral Allen to delay the return of residents into parts of the city, gave the admiral a T-shirt at a news conference on Tuesday outside City Hall, where generators still supply power and most key operations have moved across the street to the battered Hyatt Hotel.

Mr. Nagin said the words on the T-shirt read: "I love New Orleans."

The official death toll in Louisiana remained at 736. In Mississippi, 219 people died from the storm.

The Associated Press reported that a 72-year-old man, John Lyons, had been found alive in his home in New Orleans. Mr. Lyons's wife, Leola, also 72, was found dead.

In the city, mostly empty of residents but with its physical core still vulnerable, the possibility of heavy rain and a storm surge prompted officials to make emergency efforts to bolster its weakened levee system, station 500 buses on its outskirts to evacuate remaining residents and establish a military hospital at the convention center, which just weeks ago was the scene of violence and desperation for thousands of trapped evacuees from Hurricane Katrina.

In Florida, Hurricane Rita lashed Key West as it passed about 50 miles south of the island on Tuesday afternoon, flooding roads, yards and beaches through much of the Keys but not inflicting the severe damage many had feared. Late Tuesday night, it bordered on Category 3 strength as it moved into the Gulf of Mexico, with sustained winds near 110 miles per hour.

The Lower and Middle Keys were cut off from the rest of Florida for most of the day after Route 1 closed because of flooding. A quarter-mile section of the highway on Lower Matecumbe Key was closed because of a storm surge. Law enforcement officials said the roads were strewn with debris, although that did not stop the curious from driving. A few bars and restaurants stayed opened and drew restless crowds.

"We were not asked to close, and we won't close until we are," said Michael Pastore, a bartender at Don's Place, a Key West bar that opened at 7 a.m. on Tuesday.

By late afternoon, about 24,000 homes and businesses in Monroe, Miami-Dade, Broward and Palm Beach counties had no electricity far fewer than when Hurricane Katrina hit South Florida on Aug. 26, killing 11. In Miami, which suffered only rain squalls, tame winds and minor flooding, officials said government offices and schools would reopen Wednesday.

Gov. Jeb Bush said that 2,400 National Guard troops had been mobilized and 2,000 more were on alert in case the storm the seventh to hit Florida in 13 months - proved devastating. Hospitals and nursing homes in the Keys, eager to avoid the mistakes of New Orleans, evacuated their patients on Monday.

In New Orleans, Mr. Nagin said perhaps as few several hundred people were still living in the city's most vulnerable areas, in addition to the thousands of military and emergency workers who had come to help it recover. Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honoré, who is leading military efforts in the recovery, emphasized that evacuees taken to the convention center would be quickly transported out of town.

"We're not going back into that convention center and Superdome business," he said, alluding to the days of televised despair when tens of thousands of mostly poor black residents were trapped by floodwaters in the two buildings.

Two busloads of residents were evacuated from the convention center on Tuesday, the mayor said.

The mayor said officials would be more aggressive in pushing for evacuation on Wednesday if the storm turns toward the city, but he said they would not force people from their homes. General Honoré said about 14,000 troops in the region would move into shelters capable of withstanding Category 5 storms, the strongest measured on the Saffir-Simpson scale.

The city's weakened levee system could be breached by a storm surge as low as five feet, said Brig. Gen. Robert Crear of the Army Corps of Engineers. The Corps, which has used sandbags, stones and concrete to seal breaches in several levees, does not expect the levees to be fully repaired until June 1, the start of the 2006 hurricane season.

General Crear said canals with repaired levees were being blocked at Lake Pontchartrain, to prevent pressure from building on the levees. In addition to storm damage, he said that the levees may have been damaged by barges that broke lose during Hurricane Katrina but that he was not certain.

"We had barges sitting on top of levees," he said. "We had barges sitting on the other side of levees. We don't know yet. We have not done the forensics yet."

The state continued to grapple with the costs of the destruction from Hurricane Katrina. The governor announced that she had signed an order freezing the state budget in anticipation of a loss of $750 million to $1 billion in state revenues from the effects of thee hurricanes. That order, signed Monday night, includes a hiring freeze for state agencies and is intended to save $30 million to $50 million in spending, she said, adding that it "will be the first of many."

Officials in Galveston called for a voluntary evacuation before Hurricane Rita emerged into the gulf.

Mr. Bush said Tuesday that he had also spoken to Gov. Rick Perry of Texas "on the planning for what we pray is not a devastating storm - but there's one coming."

R. David Paulison, the acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said in Washington on Tuesday that 45 truckloads of water, 45 truckloads of ice and 8 truckloads of ready-to-eat meals were being staged in Texas in advance of the storm. Nine urban search and rescue teams and nine disaster medical assistance teams also are to arrive.

The agency, still facing criticism for its response to Hurricane Katrina, has more search and rescue teams available in Texas than it did along the Gulf Coast in the advance of Hurricane Katrina.

The Texas National Guard has also started withdrawing troops from Louisiana to prepare for landfall by Hurricane Rita, Louisiana National Guard officials said.

About 1,000 Texas troops were recalled, Lt. Michael Odie said. Along Interstate 10, convoys of military trucks drove west, some with handwritten signs with "Katrina" crossed out and "Rita" written beside the words "Texas Bound."

Evacuees Of One Storm Flee Another In Texas (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 20 - Hurricane Rita prompted a mandatory evacuation of this city's public shelters on Tuesday, emptying them as quickly as they had filled just three weeks ago and sending still-dazed survivors of Hurricane Katrina packing off to Arkansas, to the bus terminal, to the airport and, for some who considered themselves lucky, to paid and furnished apartments here in the Houston area.

Clustered in the hot sun and with all they had salvaged spilling from black garbage bags, shopping carts and suitcases tied with cords, evacuees set to leave one of the shelters, at Reliant Arena, seemed largely resigned to this new flight, although there were some flashes of temper.

Leading a circle of 10 with hands clasped in prayer as buses and taxicabs filled around them, Johnny Jeremiah, minister of the Pleasant Grove Missionary Baptist Church here, intoned, "God, this day, right now, this place, with this foolishness going on, we need you."

City and county officials, who had moved a vast bureaucracy to house more than 27,000 survivors in four public shelters quickly after the New Orleans disaster, said none of those now leaving the shelters would be put in housing that could be at risk from the approaching storm. But they said they might have to relocate people who had earlier been placed at hotels and motels in low-lying areas.

With the new storm's path uncertain, Galveston, which still bears scars from the great hurricane of September 1900 - the nation's deadliest disaster, with at least 6,000 killed - ordered a mandatory evacuation to begin at 6 p.m. Wednesday. Mayor Bill White of Houston said that this city of two million would make its own decision Wednesday and that as much as half the population could be called upon to evacuate.

In recent days, the dwindling thousands of storm survivors who had been sheltered in the Astrodome and Reliant Arena, as well as the adjacent Reliant Center exhibition hall and the George R. Brown Convention Center, were concentrated largely in the arena, which was finally emptied Tuesday night.

For the last hundreds in the arena, the day was particularly trying. Families sat on bundles of possessions like war refugees. Pregnant women and the injured waited in wheelchairs. Red Cross volunteers weaved through the throngs, passing out cold water and pastries.

With her month-old daughter asleep in a stroller, Monique Davis scooped up diapers that had spilled over the ground. Nearby lay a trash bag with stuffed animals poking out. A boy rocked solemnly on a wooden hobbyhorse.

About 500 people who had applied for apartments and been promised them lined up for buses and taxicabs to get there. Others boarded tour buses to Ellington Field for flights to new shelter at Fort Chaffee, Ark. - some chose to make the entire trip by bus - or to George Bush Intercontinental Airport, where Continental Airlines was offering free tickets out. Still others got rides to the Greyhound terminal, where free tickets also awaited.

Steve Freeman, an oyster shucker with an injured leg infected from walking through floodwaters, said he planned to take up Continental on the free flight to reach Norfolk, Va., where he heard there were lots of oysters. But he was suspicious of the official motives for the evacuation.

"They've been trying to get us out early," Mr. Freeman said. "We're the working people. They don't want us here."

Paul Horton, driver of a produce truck, said he would use his airline ticket to fly to Atlanta to join his wife and two children, who had evacuated there with a neighbor. He has been separated from them since the hurricane, Mr. Horton said, when they got out after the water reached chest-high. He was later rescued and evacuated by bus to Dallas, then Arizona, Arkansas and finally the Reliant sports and entertainment complex in Houston.

Rohonor R. Randall, in a wheelchair with a bandaged foot ailing from exposure to polluted water, said she was bound for Fort Chaffee, but by bus.

"I'm not afraid of planes, I just like to be on the ground," Ms. Randall said.

She called for her newfound friend, the Rev. Hugh Hairston, pastor of Loveland Church in Ontario, Calif., a leader of a group of volunteer clerics called Operation Compassion. He offered a prayer for her foot.

Ms. Randall gripped his hand and said: "You never know where life leads you. Life changes in an instant, like God is showing you life is valuable."

Rita Evacuees From Keys Play It Safe (USAT)

By Kelly Whiteside

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Some longtime residents leave path of a storm for the 1st time

MIAMI — About 350 evacuees from the Florida Keys spread sleeping bags, blankets and flattened cardboard boxes across the hallways of Florida International University on Tuesday as they sought haven from Hurricane Rita.

Many of them boarded city buses in Key West on Monday evening and arrived three hours later at this makeshift Red Cross shelter to wait out the storm. They left home because of the images of Hurricane Katrina and the fear that Rita might do the same.

Longtime residents of the Keys said it was the first time they had evacuated their homes for a hurricane. Tourists and all 78,000 residents in the low-lying Keys were ordered to leave on Monday.

Mary Smyth from Austin was visiting friends in Key West. Now she was worried if Rita, headed into the Gulf of Mexico for the Texas coast, would allow her to get home.

William Laney, visiting from Fort Lauderdale, learned about the storm while watching pro football on Sunday and a scroll about the mandatory evacuation spread across the TV screen in his hotel room. Unable to drive because of two recent knee replacement surgeries, he took the bus and went to the shelter.

At the earth sciences department at FIU, the scene was a stark contrast to the experiences of those who weathered Hurricane Katrina. Though Rita developed into a Category 2 storm with winds of 100 mph as it passed the Keys on Tuesday afternoon, there was only a light rain and a firm breeze here in west Miami-Dade County.

The greater Miami area, home to more than 2.2 million people, was under a hurricane warning Tuesday. That was lifted after the storm passed.

Wind and rain buffeted the northern Keys, but Isis Majeska has seen worse.

DOJ_NMG_0007086

"If I go out onto my porch, I don't even see leaves down," said Majeska, 46, who works for the Monroe County court system. "It's just not that bad a storm."

Those who took shelter on the third floor of the Charles E. Perry Building on FIU's campus included homeless people, vacationers, office workers, store managers and retirees.

Evacuees slept on tile floors in the hallways or upright in classroom desks. One mother of five swept the floor of an opened classroom that had become a play area for children.

A television without reception was suspended in a corner. "We asked for DVDs, but there weren't any," said Dominique Atkins, who then walked to the Walgreens and bought bingo games and coloring books for her two children.

There was air conditioning and electricity, and the mood was generally upbeat. The Red Cross delivered a steady supply of water and three meals a day.

Judy Garmas cradled her 3-week-old son, Rene, already a veteran of two hurricanes, in her right arm as she sat beneath a map of "Tectonic Lithofacies of Appalachian Orogen" and talked about a different type of earth science. "We live in a trailer, and I didn't want to get caught, not with the baby," she said. "He was only 2 days old when Katrina hit."

The Garmas family lives in Sweetwater, southwest of Miami, but drove to the shelter to join her sister's family, who evacuated from Key West. By 3 p.m., they were packing their blue stroller, diaper bag and blankets once they received word there was no damage to their trailer. An hour later, they were gone.

As Rita Picks Up Steam, It's Deja Vu All Over Again For U.S. Energy Industry (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Hurricane Rita threatens serious damage this week to the energy infrastructure in and around the Gulf of Mexico and could send fuel prices skyrocketing anew.

Oil companies battened down offshore oil rigs and platforms Tuesday in the central and western Gulf and evacuated offshore personnel.

"All of the operators and drilling contractors are taking extra precautions for Rita because they've seen what can happen after Katrina," said David Kent, an owner and editor of the Houston-based Web site Rigzone.com, focused on the offshore oil industry. "I think it's a matter of getting out of Dodge right now."

Rita was upgraded to a Category 2 hurricane Tuesday and is forecast to become Category 4 on Wednesday - with winds from 131 to 155 mph - as it heads toward the Texas coastline. It could make landfall Friday.

Texas is the country's largest oil producer, accounting for 20 percent of national production. Much of it comes from offshore activities coordinated through Houston, America's energy capital.

The state boasts 26 refineries, or about a quarter of the nation's refining. At least 14 are located on or near the Gulf Coast. They turn oil into gasoline or distillates for home heating. Most are built on higher ground in and around Houston, and most are further inland than refineries damaged by Katrina. Even if Houston dodges a direct hit, Rita could force precautionary shutdowns that could severely impact the availability of gasoline.

That could drive gasoline prices up sharply. Most U.S. refineries have been running full throttle to make up for the four major refineries idled by Katrina. Those refineries, three in Louisiana and one in Mississippi, have a combined capacity to convert 659,000 barrels of crude oil per day.

If Rita crosses the Houston area, all eyes will be on ExxonMobil's refinery in Baytown, the nation's largest, with a production capacity of 557,000 barrels a day. Baytown's city manager, Gary Jackson, said he's in close contact with the industry.

"We know they are monitoring just as we are. There will be some critical times with decisions ahead," he said. "Those final calls will be their calls, each on an individual plant-by-plant basis."

Rita's uncertain path drove global oil prices up by more than $4 a barrel Monday, the largest one-day jump ever. Oil prices tapered off Tuesday, closing down a dollar at $66.23 on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"Judging by what the market has done and speaking for myself, I am very nervous indeed," said Bart Melek, a senior economist and energy analyst at BMO Nesbitt Burns in Toronto, a division of the Bank of Montreal.

The world's oil supply is stretched to near capacity. Katrina knocked out almost 5 percent of U.S. oil production, and Rita threatens more damage. Add to that volatile mix growing civil unrest in Nigeria, the fifth-largest oil supplier to the United States, and it all adds up to more fuel-price volatility in the days ahead.

"It's not going to take very much to move it up. God forbid that something happened in the Middle East," Melek said. "There isn't physical spare capacity, there just isn't."

Colonial Pipeline Co. operates the nation's largest pipeline, which originates in Houston. Katrina knocked out the utilities that provide the power to push gasoline through pipes that supply much of the U.S. East Coast. At company headquarters in Alpharetta, Ga., there is understandable concern.

"We're still in a wait-and-watch mode. We're monitoring it carefully," said Steve Baker, a company spokesman.

A lesson from Katrina: Colonial will pre-position portable diesel generators on tractor-trailer rigs if necessary to try to keep its pipelines flowing in case of power outages.

"If the storm goes west of Houston, there's likely to be no impact on us or the power grid," Baker said hopefully.

Chevron, Royal Dutch Shell, ExxonMobil and British Petroleum all announced evacuations of manned oil platforms and rigs days before projected landfall. Some energy analysts believe that's an ominous admission that Rita threatens more destruction.

"They're pretty good about predicting these things," said Craig Smith, an energy expert and author of the forthcoming book "Black Gold Stranglehold," which examines fuel prices. "We hope it peters out, but if it has any strength and hits platforms or turns toward New Orleans, we cannot afford another hurricane right now. We just can't afford it. You're seeing that nervousness in the markets."

Gulf Oil Platforms Hunker Down For Rita (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Still reeling from Hurricane Katrina, the battered Gulf of Mexico energy industry girded Tuesday for its second potentially devastating storm in a month.

Crews evacuated offshore oil platforms ahead of the approaching Hurricane Rita and its 100-mile-per-hour winds. The storm is expected to intensify as it crosses the Gulf of Mexico, home to 29% of domestic U.S. oil production, and could batter energy facilities Katrina left untouched.

“What wasn't hit by Katrina is being targeted by Rita. The market is taking the storm very seriously,” says Agbeli Ameko of First Enercast Financial, an energy forecasting firm in Denver.

After rising $4 a barrel Monday, the biggest one-day jump ever, oil markets calmed Tuesday. Light, sweet crude for October delivery fell $1.16 to $66.23 a barrel in New York trading.

The latest storm could jolt prices if it slams into critical refineries on the Texas coast. Thanks to Katrina, four refineries representing about 5% of U.S. capacity already are closed for “an extended period,” the Energy Department says.

With oil and gas markets already stretched tight, any further loss of capacity from Rita could send prices at the pump back up.

Texas is home to 26 refineries, which account for 27% of domestic refining capacity. Major refineries belonging to BP, Valero, Marathon Oil, Citgo, ExxonMobil, Royal Dutch Shell and ConocoPhillips lie in a coastal arc stretching north and south from Houston.

Some experts say the industry could rebound faster from Rita than it has from Katrina. Coastal refineries in Texas are guarded by barrier islands and thus are not as vulnerable to heavy flood damage as those in Louisiana and Mississippi.

“I'm not convinced it's going to have the lasting effect Katrina has,” says Mark Routt, an analyst at Energy Security Analysis of Wakefield, Mass. “… A lot more capacity could go down, but it'll come back sooner. It's better protected.”

Across the Gulf Tuesday, workers headed for dry land. Transocean, a major offshore drilling contractor, was expected by the end of Tuesday to have evacuated 500 workers from three moored rigs. About 725 workers remain on seven maneuvering rigs. "They move like ships. As the storm dictates, they'll move out of the way," says spokesman Guy Cantwell.

Katrina's legacy, however, continues to be felt. Offshore Logistics' Venice, La., helicopter facility was heavily damaged and left submerged after a protective levee failed under Katrina's assault.

This week, operating from the firm's other sites, Offshore's roughly 150 helicopters have been busy shuttling crews to safety from installations far from land.

With relief workers and evacuees filling hotels in the region, it's hard to find lodging for oil crews. Later this week, Offshore will start flying its choppers out of danger.

"We're going to be battening down our hatches," spokesman Joe Baj says.

Utility Tallies Fiscal Toll (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 21 (AP) - Faced with the costs of rebuilding its Gulf Coast utility systems devastated by Hurricane Katrina, Entergy said Tuesday that it would consider bankruptcy protection for its New Orleans unit.

Entergy, whose Entergy New Orleans unit has lost up to an estimated 130,000 customers because of the hurricane, estimates the unit's storm-related costs at $325 million to $475 million.

Entergy also said Tuesday that it planned to pursue various avenues for recovering costs from the storm, including insurance reimbursements, potential federal relief and "existing or new rate mechanisms."

Blanco Pushes FEMA For Hotel Rooms (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Louisiana's governor asked the federal government Tuesday to move tens of thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees out of shelters and into hotels.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco's request comes after state officials said it could take months to prepare trailers and other temporary housing for evacuees. Blanco wants the Federal Emergency Management Agency to pay for hotel rooms for 90 days for each individual or family.

"It's just not moving fast enough," said Jerry Jones, the governor's director of facility planning. "We don't want to just warehouse these people. We want them to be in a place where they can thrive and get back to normalcy."

Ron Sherman, FEMA's housing coordinator in Louisiana, said the idea could work and vowed to review it. FEMA currently pays for thousands of evacuees to stay in hotels for up to 60 days. The American Red Cross is paying hotel bills for thousands of others.

If accepted, Blanco's recommendation would allow displaced Louisianians living in shelters in their state or elsewhere to move to hotels identified by FEMA. It is unclear how many people would be eligible for hotel stays. Nearly 100,000 people are staying in 1,042 shelters in 26 states and the District of Columbia, according to FEMA.

Montine McNulty, executive director of the Arkansas Hospitality Association, called the plan "workable" and said many local hotels had rented rooms to evacuees for six months. "This is an especially good time because for many of the resort areas; it's sort of a down period," McNulty said.

Arkansas has 7,992 evacuees in shelters, the most of any state not damaged by Katrina. Texas had 13,182 shelter residents Monday but was planning to move 7,000 to Arkansas and Tennessee to keep them safe from Hurricane Rita.

Blanco's hotel request reflects the state's growing concern that Louisianians staying in out-of-state shelters will find permanent housing in the communities where they are sheltered.

People would be more likely to move back to Louisiana if they could stay in hotels for 90 days and then be able to occupy a trailer in their home state, said Jones, the governor's aide. "This buys us some time. … We want to entice them to come back home," he said.

Sherren Bartheleny, 49, sitting on a plastic chair outside a shelter in downtown Baton Rouge, said she was skeptical of the governor's plan because she fears it will take much longer than 90 days for the government to find appropriate housing for evacuees.

"If [Blanco] can put me in a trailer back in Plaquemines Parish after 90 days, I'll go to a hotel," said Bartheleny, whose home was destroyed. "I want a written statement from the governor."

Experts Say Faulty Levees Caused Much Of Flooding (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Susan B. Glasser

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 -- Louisiana's top hurricane experts have rejected the official explanations for the floodwall collapses that inundated much of New Orleans, concluding that Hurricane Katrina's storm surges were much smaller than authorities have suggested and that the city's flood- protection system should have kept most of the city dry.

The Army Corps of Engineers has said that Katrina was just too massive for a system that was not intended to protect the city from a storm greater than a Category 3 hurricane, and that the floodwall failures near Lake Pontchartrain were caused by extraordinary surges that overtopped the walls.

But with the help of complex computer models and stark visual evidence, scientists and engineers at Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center have concluded that Katrina's surges did not come close to overtopping those barriers. That would make faulty design, inadequate construction or some combination of the two the likely cause of the breaching of the floodwalls along the 17th Street and London Avenue canals -- and the flooding of most of New Orleans.

In the weeks since Katrina drowned this low-lying city, there has been an intense focus on the chaotic government response to the flood. But Ivor van Heerden, the Hurricane Center's deputy director, said the real scandal of Katrina is the "catastrophic structural failure" of barriers that should have handled the hurricane with relative ease.

"We are absolutely convinced that those floodwalls were never overtopped," said van Heerden, who also runs LSU's Center for the Study of Public Health Impacts of Hurricanes.

In an interview Tuesday, Corps spokesman Paul Johnston said the agency still believes that storm surges overtopped the concrete floodwalls near the lake, then undermined the earthen levees on which they were perched, setting the stage for the breaches that emptied the lake into the city.

Johnston said the Corps intends to launch an investigation to make sure it is correct about that scenario. But he emphasized that Katrina was a Category 4 hurricane when it smashed into the Gulf Coast, whereas Congress authorized the Corps to protect New Orleans against a storm only up to Category 3. "The event exceeded the design," Johnston said.

The center's researchers agree that Katrina's initial surge from the southeast overwhelmed floodwalls along the New Orleans Industrial Canal, flooding the city's Lower Ninth Ward as well as St. Bernard Parish. They believe that a little-used Army Corps navigation canal known as the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet helped amplify that surge, although they acknowledge that this surge was larger than the system was designed to control.

But the researchers have strong evidence that Katrina's subsequent surge from the north was several feet shy of the height that would have been necessary to overtop the 17th Street and London Avenue floodwalls. It was the failures of those floodwalls that emptied the lake into the rest of the city, filling most of New Orleans like a soup bowl.

On a tour Tuesday, researchers showed numerous indications that Katrina's surge was not as tall as the lakefront's protections. They showed a "debris line" that indicates the top height of Katrina's waves was at least four feet below the crest of Lake Pontchartrain's levees. They also pointed out how the breached floodwalls near the lake showed no signs of overtopping -- no splattering of mud, no drip lines and no erosion at their bases. They contended that the pattern of destruction behind the breaches was consistent with a localized "pressure burst," rather than widespread overtopping.

The center has also completed a computerized "hindcast" of Katrina, which has confirmed the evidence before their eyes. Their model indicates that most of the surge around the lake and its nearby canals was less than 11 feet above sea level, and that none of it should have been greater than 13 feet. The Army Corps's flood-protection system for New Orleans was designed to handle surges of more than 14 feet above sea level.

"This should not have been a big deal for these floodwalls," said oceanographer G. Paul Kemp, a hurricane expert who runs LSU's Natural Systems Modeling Laboratory. "It should have been a modest challenge. There's no way this should have exceeded the capacity."

The center's researchers said it is too early to say whether the breaches were caused by poor design, faulty construction or some combination. But van Heerden said the floodwalls at issue -- massive concrete slabs mounted on steel sheet pilings -- looked more like the sound barriers found on major highways. He also suggested that the slabs should have been interlocked, and that the canals they were supposed to protect should have had floodgates to keep out water from the lake.

Former representative Bob Livingston (R-La.), who helped lead the charge for Corps projects in Louisiana when he chaired the House Appropriations Committee, noted that the earthen levees along Lake Pontchartrain had all held, while the concrete floodwalls had failed. He was especially concerned about the 17th Street barrier, saying it "shouldn't have broken."

"I don't know if it's bad construction or bad design, but whoever the contractor is has a problem," said Livingston, now a lobbyist on Capitol Hill.

Former senator J. Bennett Johnston (D-La.) said he remembers numerous briefings from Corps officials about the danger of a hurricane overtopping the New Orleans levees. But he said he never envisioned a scenario like this one. "This came as a surprise," he said.

The Corps has not identified the contractors who built the floodgates that failed; Paul Johnston said there will be a full investigation into the breaches.

John M. Barry -- who criticized the Corps in "Rising Tide," a history of the Mississippi River flood of 1927 -- said that if Katrina did not exceed the design capacity of the New Orleans levees, the federal government may bear ultimate responsibility for this disaster.

"If this is true, then the loss of life and the devastation in much of New Orleans is no more a natural disaster than a surgeon killing a patient by failing to suture an artery would be a natural death," Barry said. "And that surgeon would be culpable."

Design Flaws Seen In New Orleans Flood Walls (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 - Along the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain, great earthen levees were ample to hold off much of the surging water propelled by Hurricane Katrina.

But concrete flood walls installed over the last several decades along the drainage and barge canals cutting into New Orleans were built in a way that by Army Corps of Engineers standards left them potentially unstable in a flood, according to government documents and interviews. The walls collapsed in several places during the storm.

A corps engineering manual cautions that such flood walls "rarely exceed" seven feet because they can lose stability as waters rise. But some of the New Orleans canal walls rose as high as 11 feet above dirt berms in which they were anchored.

As a result of federal budget constraints, the walls were never tested for their ability to withstand the cascades of lake water that rushed up to, or over, their tops as storm waves pulsed through the canals on Aug. 29, corps and local officials say.

Hurricane Katrina was the first serious test of the flood walls, said Stevan Spencer, chief engineer for the Orleans Levee District, and it "just overwhelmed the system."

Since the storm, corps officials have said that there is a simple explanation for the devastation: Hurricane Katrina was a Category 4 storm and Congress authorized a flood control system to handle only a Category 3 storm. "Anything above that, all bets are off," said Al Naomi, a senior project manager in the corps's New Orleans district.

But federal meteorologists say that New Orleans did not get the full brunt of the storm, because its strongest winds passed dozens of miles east of the city. While a formal analysis of the storm's strength and surges will take months, the National Hurricane Center said the sustained winds over Lake Pontchartrain reached only 95 miles per hour, while Category 3 storms are defined by sustained winds of 111 to 130 m.p.h.

This raises a series of questions about how the walls that failed were designed and constructed, as well as whether the soil in some spots was too weak to hold them. Investigations by federal engineers and outside experts are just now beginning.

One factor could be height, said Robert G. Bea, a former corps engineer and professor at the University of California, Berkeley, who is part of a National Science Foundation inquiry into the flood controls failures. The higher the wall, Professor Bea said, the greater the risk it could tip under the ever greater pressure of rising waters.

The 2000 edition of the Army Corps of Engineers manual "Design and Construction of Levees" says that the height of flood walls built on levees is an important factor in their ability to withstand a flood. For that reason, the manual says walls like those used in New Orleans "rarely exceed" seven feet. But on two of the three canals where breaks occurred - the 17th Street and London Avenue canals - the concrete sections rise 11 feet above the dirt berms.

Each wall resembles a row of teeth set in a jaw. Individual slabs are anchored to a continuous steel sheet buried in the dirt, giving the wall its strength. Above a short foundation, the slabs are linked only by rubbery gaskets that allow the concrete to expand and contract without cracking.

Hassan S. Mashriqui, an engineering professor at Louisiana State University and an expert on storm surges, said the segmented nature of the walls could be an additional problem, since any weak point could cause a catastrophic failure.

"Since they're not tied together you get a little bit of a gap and that's what water needs to make it fail," Dr. Mashriqui said.

Other questions surround the walls' design, known as an "I-wall" for its slim cross section that fits easily into densely developed areas.

The corps manual for flood control construction suggests a different design for walls higher than seven feet - walls shaped like an inverted T, with the horizontal section buried in the dirt for extra stability.

But that option was never considered, corps engineers said, because "T walls" were more expensive, required a broad base of dense soil for support and were not necessarily stronger.

The corps and local levee authorities also never tested whether the chosen I-wall design could survive if water flowed over the top and cascaded onto dirt embankments below.

Corps officials said they were proscribed from considering stronger wall designs for the canals both by the tight quarters and by federal law, which requires that they seek and study only the level of flood control authorized by Congress.

"Our hands are tied as to looking at higher-level events," Mr. Naomi said.

Mr. Naomi said that the recommendations in the flood control engineering manual were "general guidance," and that conditions at a particular site could justify deviations.

He defended the walls, saying: "The flood walls have functioned over the years very successfully and without incident. The design works. It has worked in other locales. And will likely continue to be used as long as you do not subject it to pressures that it was not designed to handle."

The broken walls, which were long seen as a second choice to earthen levees, are testament to 40 years of fiscal and political compromises made by elected officials, from local levee boards to Congress and several presidential administrations, as they balanced costs and environmental concerns with the need to protect a city that lies largely below sea level and is still subsiding.

Ever since Hurricane Betsy flooded parts of New Orleans in 1965, the federal government has financed a hurricane defense system designed to guard against an equivalent storm.

But as the threat of a more intense hurricane became better understood in recent years, government financing for flood prevention in New Orleans did not keep pace with a growing alarm among many local residents, scientists and even the corps's own engineers.

Standing next to the shattered remains of one of the concrete walls last week, Cynthia Hedge-Morrell, a New Orleans councilwoman, said, "In my opinion, they were playing Russian roulette with people's lives."

"Do you realize that if those walls had held, we'd have just had a little cleaning job?" said Ms. Hedge-Morrell, whose district between downtown and the lakefront was covered with 10 feet of water from the breaks of flood walls. "We would not have this massive loss of life and destruction."

On Tuesday, streams of dump trucks hurriedly dumped loads of gravel into the breaches in New Orleans's flood defenses, in case Hurricane Rita shifts toward here later this week.

In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, a surge from Lake Pontchartrain poured into the main parts of the city through breaks on the walls lining the 17th Street and London Avenue canals, which normally carry runoff pumped out of the city into the lake. A separate surge from the Gulf of Mexico overwhelmed the walls along the Industrial Canal, inundating the Lower Ninth Ward. Officials say that break may have been caused by a barge that broke loose from its moorings.

When the hurricane hit, the only earthen levees that failed in a way that produced substantial flooding were on the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, a man-made ship canal east of the city. These levees, which were not as high as those on the river or Lake Pontchartrain, let in the floodwaters that ravaged eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish.

A surge from Lake Pontchartrain was the catastrophic situation that the corps had been guarding against since Hurricane Betsy 40 years ago. Initially, the corps wanted to build a giant barrier to keep water from the Gulf of Mexico from reaching Lake Pontchartrain and flooding the canals.

That project was delayed by lawsuits from environmental groups that contended the corps had failed to study ecological effects. By the late 1970's, the corps abandoned that approach and began raising levees along the lake and the Mississippi and adding flood walls on the canals.

In the mid-1990's, engineering professors at Louisiana State began publicizing computer models that showed how a Category 5 storm could kill tens of thousands of people and flood the French Quarter. Corps officials in Louisiana pushed local officials to help seek more money from Congress, both to finish existing upgrades and to start bolstering the city against bigger threats.

Joseph Suhayda, who was one of the Louisiana State professors, said corps officials privately urged him to "raise the consciousness" about the dire threats.

But upgrading the flood control system never became a major priority for corps officials in Washington, local and federal officials say.

Corps veterans said it was not surprising that federal engineers did not issue more vocal warnings.

"I don't think it was culturally in the system for the corps to say 'this is crazy,' " said William F. Marcuson III, the former director of the Waterways Experiment Station for the corps in Vicksburg, Miss., and president-elect of the American Society of Civil Engineers.

"The corps works for Congress," Mr. Marcuson said, "and when the boss says design for a Category 3 storm, culturally the corps is not going to go back and say this is wrong."

Investigations into how the walls failed are just now beginning. Col. Richard Wagenaar, commander of the corps district in New Orleans, said the soil behind the flood walls could have been weakened after they were topped by the storm surge, or the walls could have simply given way as the water - and the pressure - mounted against them.

Indeed, as several engineers said, while a dirt levee of similar height might eventually be topped as well, and possibly eroded, only the walls were vulnerable to a sudden collapse.

The determination of how the walls fell will bear on how officials decide to remake the flood control system.

Max Hearn, executive director of the Orleans Levee District, said that if the federal government was now ready to pay for Category 5 protection, it seemed unlikely that the flood wall system could be upgraded to that level.

But Mr. Hearn said the only answer might be the construction of flood gates designed to limit a hurricane surge in Lake Pontchartrain - the same idea that was considered and dropped in the 1970's.

Damaged Levees Offer New Orleans Little Flood Protection, Corps Says (KRT)

By Pete Carey

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

Hurricane Katrina so weakened New Orleans' 350-mile levee system that it probably can't protect the city from flooding even in a relatively minor storm, officials with the Army Corps of Engineers said.

DOJ_NMG_0007093

While workers have closed most of the breaches that allowed the city to flood after Katrina, none of the burst levees has been returned to its pre-flood height, corps officials said. Many other sections of the levee have washed away or have eroded enough that even a small rise in the surrounding waters would spill into the city.

The damage to the levees is particularly worrisome as Hurricane Rita approaches the Gulf Coast. Engineers were working feverishly Tuesday to close gaps.

One break remains open on the 17th Street Canal and two are still open along the London Avenue canals, spokeswoman Dana Finney said. Corps engineers dropped 80 10,000-pound sandbags into the breaches Tuesday in an effort to close them.

Walls along both canals are so damaged, however, that corps officials decided to prepare to seal the canals' entrances to Lake Pontchartrain temporarily - even though such a move would render them useless in carrying out their designated purpose, draining water from the city into the lake. A decision on whether to take the final steps to close the canals will be made at noon Wednesday.

"London Avenue has got significant structural problems, we know that," said Col. Richard P. Wagenaar, the corps's New Orleans district commander. "That's why we're closing it off."

Corps officials said recovery efforts were likely to be delayed in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes by a decision to close levee breaks there that had been made to help drain those areas. St. Bernard Parish has been pumped nearly dry.

Computer modeling suggests that parts of the city and nearby parishes could be endangered even without a direct hit from Rita, Finney said.

In a statement Sunday, Brig Gen. Robert Crear, the commander of the corps's Katrina recovery task force, said the system in its current state "does not ensure that the city will be protected against storms or hurricanes." He warned that people in the city would be at risk.

Tuesday, Crear said he thought the levees might be able to handle a storm surge of up to 5 feet, far less than the 17 feet that Katrina brought. He said there was no way the levee system could be repaired before Rita hits and that the goal was to make repairs in time for next year's hurricane season, which begins June 1.

Any new flooding probably would slow down repair operations, said David Pezza, a corps engineering-construction specialist. "I have to say we would have to anticipate a delay," Pezza said, "but our goals are still June 2006."

Officials have noted that new flooding would primarily threaten areas that already were damaged in the floods from Katrina.

In its statement Sunday, corps officials offered a grim assessment of the levee system: Only one of six levees cited was deemed in good shape; the others were likely to flood in a storm.

Joseph Suhayada, retired director of the Louisiana Water Resources Research Institute at Louisiana State University, said some breaches had been filled only to 3 or 4 feet above the level of Lake Pontchartrain, although they were still being built up. They might reach 5 feet of protection soon, "which is not much of a storm."

The corps has stocked 800 huge sandbags to close any new levee breaches and has ordered 2,500 more.

Even heavy rain would be a threat. "With anywhere from 2 to 3 inches of rain, we will get some locations that could have potentially 2 to 3 feet of water," Wagenaar said.

"Hopefully, there won't be too much rain," Wagenaar said.

Supersizing The Levees (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery and Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Three weeks after Hurricane Katrina ripped siding off the three-story building where Ben White owns a hair salon, he was still sweeping away a mess of brown leaves and hair-spritzer nozzles. But one of the battered building's best features was intact: a panoramic view of Lake Pontchartrain.

Even that could change as federal and state officials dust off dormant plans to fortify the system of levees and flood walls in and around New Orleans that proved too weak to withstand Katrina. While none of the options being considered is anywhere close to approval, the floodwaters that inundated the city have boosted the odds that between five and 10 feet could eventually be added to the height of the levees that now generally rise 13 to 18 feet.

Floodwaters are receding in New Orleans, but larger levees may threaten land and homes near the 17th Street Canal.

Besides costing billions of dollars, bolstering the line of defense against future hurricanes would likely send swarms of bulldozers into swank neighborhoods, threaten environmentally vulnerable marshes and trigger lawsuits from homeowners whose property would have to be seized to make room for the supersize levees. Raising the height of the levees to 25 feet or higher could also block views of the lake and require engineers to widen the base of the dirt structures by 100 feet or more.

"It would be disappointing to lose the view," says Mr. White, whose salon is in the Bucktown section of Metairie, just west of New Orleans. But he adds that he "wouldn't be against something that was good for the community."

The city's current flood-control system was designed to handle up to a Category 3 hurricane. Katrina, with winds as strong as 145 miles an hour, was a Category 4. Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which builds most levees and other flood-control systems, say that, from a scientific and engineering standpoint, a levee system can be built that would safeguard the city from even the most powerful hurricanes. "There's no question...we could build to protect against a Category 5 storm," says Don Basham, chief of engineering at Army Corps headquarters in Washington.

A 2002 preliminary study by the Army Corps' New Orleans district of whether the hurricane-protection system around New Orleans should be upgraded included the option of raising levees, and engineers say some could approach 30 feet. It would require protective gates to be built where the canals empty into Lake Pontchartrain, but no changes are likely to be needed in the concrete flood walls along the canals.

Another option drawing renewed attention would steer an estimated $3 billion to the Army Corps to build and reinforce a 35-mile section of levees east of New Orleans, including massive gates in two channels linking Lake Pontchartrain with Lake Borgne and the Gulf of Mexico, plus a third gate at the junction of two man-made waterways that are popular shipping lanes. The gates would be closed as hurricanes approach to block storm surges from flooding the city and neighboring communities, as they did when Katrina barreled through.

It can take decades to study and fund major flood-control projects, partly because state and local governments are required to share the costs. Louisiana officials now contend that protecting New Orleans is so urgent that the federal government should pay for the entire job and that the process for reviewing, designing and constructing stronger levees should be streamlined.

The Louisiana Department of Natural Resources has asked the state's members of Congress to request $18.2 billion in federal funds for a variety of hurricane-protection projects and $14 billion to help restore wetlands that serve as a buffer zone against hurricanes.

So far, state officials are studying a version of the so-called barrier plan east of New Orleans, which would extend levees beyond Slidell, a city on the northern shore of Lake Pontchartrain that was also devastated. But that could harm marshy areas by restricting the natural movement of water. A plan with similar elements was abandoned in the 1970s after environmentalists and fishermen launched a legal attack, and fierce opposition could resurface regardless of how well the new levees would shield New Orleans from floods. The earlier plan also was designed to protect from a Category 3 storm, the corps says.

Randy Hanchey, Louisiana's deputy secretary of natural resources, says state officials are urgently studying the barrier option but haven't decided exactly where the levees and gates would be located. Army Corps officials haven't recommended a specific plan yet. "We'll be looking to the Corps for guidance and working with state and local officials on rebuilding not only New Orleans but its flood-control protection," said Scott Milburn, a spokesman for the White House Office of Management and Budget.

Raising the city's levees, typically grassy mounds where residents used to stroll and enjoy the view of Lake Pontchartrain, could consume precious real estate. One neighborhood that could be affected by new flood control measures is Lakeview, a mostly middle class and upper middle class enclave where housing prices were rising fast before Katrina. Some homes in a nearby neighborhood closer to the lake were valued at as much as $1 million.

The Lakefront Campus of the University of New Orleans on the London Street Canal is still threatened.

It's impossible to tell how much anything is worth now. Along the 17th Street Canal wall, which separates New Orleans from Jefferson Parish and was breached during the hurricane, military vehicles and heavy trucks are kicking up clouds of dust as they repair the flood wall. The homes of families that lived along the canal are strewn with debris from floodwaters that rose near the top of their front doors.

The destruction could make it easier for government officials to use eminent domain to buy out homeowners on sites needed for levee-enlargement projects. But under most eminent-domain laws, compensation is based on assessed value when the purchase is proposed, meaning that New Orleans homeowners would likely get far less than they would have before the storm.

"The whole question of fair market value is going to be very murky," says John McIlwain, a senior resident fellow at the Urban Land Institute in Washington, adding that he expects "a significant amount of litigation."

Jim Wright, who lives in the Lakeshore neighborhood, doubts that many of those who lived on the canals will ever move back now that they know protective flood walls can be breached. "I can't imagine anyone would want to have that time bomb in their backyard," he says.

But Arthur Sterbcow, president of Latter & Blum, a large residential real-estate firm in Louisiana, predicts that affected residents will welcome the added protection -- and that property values will rise as a result.

Katrina's Children Find New Schools, And Fears (NYT)

By Michael Winerip

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

HOUSTON

DAVE SCHRANDT is in charge of registering homeless children for the Cypress-Fairbanks school district, and when he really gets cranked up, he can fill out the six forms to enroll a hurricane evacuee in 15 minutes.

"O.K., Tyrone, you get free breakfast, free lunch, free school supplies, and you'll start tomorrow," he said, madly checking off boxes one day last week. Tyrone Edwards, 16, and Emma Collins, his grandmother, from St. Bernard Parish, La., barely had time to nod before another box was checked.

"Address?" Mr. Schrandt asked, and not waiting, he wrote "8350 Highway 6N," the address of the shelter at Copperfield Church.

Mr. Schrandt asked what kind of math Tyrone was taking back home, and when all the boy could answer was "Math 3," Mr. Schrandt guessed it was probably Algebra II, wrote that in, then put a question mark beside "science," since Tyrone knew he was taking a science, but not which one.

"Special ed?" Mr. Schrandt said, jumping to the next question.

"He had both special ed and the regular," Mrs. Collins said.

"Almost done," said Mr. Schrandt, who asked if Tyrone needed clothes. Mrs. Collins said Tyrone's bag was left behind when they were helicoptered out of the flood, so Mr. Schrandt made notes on Tyrone's pants size (28-30 waist), shirt size (large) and shoe size (11).

"Biggest shoes I've had so far were 18's," Mr. Schrandt said. "So that's it. We're done." And the next morning, before 7, a bus pulled up to the church for Tyrone, one of 1,910 Katrina kids who have enrolled in this suburban district, which includes a small part of Houston and northwest Harris County.

While much of the federal response to Katrina has been its own epic disaster, a rare bright light is the McKinney-Vento Act, federal legislation passed in 2002 to ensure that homeless children are quickly enrolled in school. The law requires that every school district in America have a homeless liaison worker like Mr. Schrandt; that children are registered immediately, even those without records; and that transportation is provided.

Barbara Duffield, policy director of the National Association for the Education of Homeless Children, said she was hearing from as far away as Alaska that the enrollment of the 370,000 displaced children has generally been swift and good hearted.

"It's almost like the three years since the law was passed were a rehearsal for Katrina," she said. "Districts were ready. We're seeing school officials take, not just the letter of the law, but the spirit of the law to heart." And Texas, which has enrolled the most evacuees, 44,812, "gets the gold star," she said.

At Owens Elementary here there is a room called the Closet, stocked with clothing donations that are organized by size, so flood families can shop free for what they need. Each new child is assigned a classroom buddy, a playground buddy, a cafeteria buddy and a bus buddy, so instantly they have four new friends.

In the teachers' lunchroom at Danish Elementary there is a Star of Hope Tree. The stars list evacuee families' needs; teachers pick off a star and shop for the items. "My 15-year-old got three pairs of pants, four to five brand- new shirts," said Judith Howard, a mother of five, who is living doubled up with her sister's family.

There was so little red tape enrolling that New Orleans parents like Barbara Varnado and Latanya Hawkins did not even know the name of their children's new district; they thought they were in Houston city schools.

That is the good news. The hard news on relocation is just emerging. From visits to several schools and shelters in this district of 85,000, the third largest in the state, it is clear that a major task lies ahead, teaching and counseling the newcomers. Principals and teachers say many seem to be behind local students academically and to be traumatized.

At Owens (41 evacuees) and Danish (31), teachers have just begun assessing the new students, and are finding many with significant academic gaps. This is not surprising. The schools here are in their sixth week; New Orleans children had been in school a week when the hurricane hit and are beginning here just as the local students finish midterm exams.

They have been transplanted to a state with an intensive test-driven curriculum that they have not been prepared for. And they have come from an urban district considered one of the worst and poorest in the nation to a middle- to upper-class high-achieving suburban district. "We're recommending a lot for extra tutoring," said Laura Barrett, the Owens principal.

Add to that the effect of the horrors that many have seen. Sadie Woodard, head of counseling for the district, is having every new child interviewed individually and using retired counselors to run weekly support groups. "I have five or six - they have this look, it just breaks your heart, the fear in their eyes," Ms. Barrett said.

At Owens, several have fallen asleep during reading and music and on the soft pillows in the library. A lot still live in church shelters, crowded hotel rooms and doubled up in homes with relatives. The other day, Ms. Barrett carried out a 4-year old prekindergarten girl who was snoring and being sent home for rest. "We tell them it's O.K., they're not in trouble, they can put their heads down," Ms. Barrett said. "They just need a nap."

Aisha Brown's first-grade daughter, India, was sent "home" from Adam Elementary to the Cypress Bible Church shelter to get some sleep. "She hasn't been right since the storm," Ms. Brown said. "India saw everything."

Ms. Brown's three children were saved from the rising waters when the parents emptied their refrigerator, broke off the door and floated them six blocks to a bridge. "India saw people falling off the bridge and drowning, screaming for help. She saw shooting at the Superdome." The mother said that when they finally got on an evacuation bus, "India asked me, 'Is there going to be shooting on the bus, too?' "

At the church shelter, the mother said, people have been extraordinarily kind, but India remains fearful. "She sleepwalks and cries, hollering for me," she said. As parishioners filed into the church hall last week, India was briefly separated from her parents. "I found her under a table crying," said the mother.

LAST week, at 7:30 Monday morning, Brandon Hart paced the lobby of the Hampton Inn where he was living, eager for the school bus to arrive. He said he loved his new middle school, Labay; it was better than his New Orleans school. "I want to stay here," he said. "I used to live in a bad neighborhood. It's better out here. It's quiet. And I'm on the football team. I'm going to my first practice today. They told me I was going to start at tight end. They seen me play on the playground. I'm pretty good."

The next morning, back in the lobby he looked miserable. "I couldn't practice," he said. "They're getting ready for the game. They said it would be too confusing for everyone. They said I had to wait a few days." By Saturday night, the family had checked out and was heading to Baton Rouge, La., to try resettling there. The volatility is reflected in the numbers. Last week, there were 1,910 Katrina children enrolled in Cypress-Fairbanks district; Monday, it was 1,632.

At Cypress Falls High, the principal gathered the 95 Katrina children to welcome them and urged that they join clubs to integrate more quickly into the school. But Reyna Turcios, 16, who came from New Orleans with her aunt and three cousins after their apartment was destroyed, said she did not think she would join anything. "I don't want to get in there and do all the stuff and get so happy and then leave again," she said. "I don't like being here in Houston. I miss my friends, my school, my teachers. It seems impossible, but I wish we could go back and have our own life."

Her aunt, Maria Duarte, said that the children had been treated kindly here, but that they did not feel they belonged. "I see they feel like an ugly duck," she said. "My little one, he tells me I'm a bad mother. He doesn't want to get on the bus in the morning. I have to drag him. I say, 'If you don't go to school, I'll go to jail.' He says, 'Good, we'll go together, who cares.' "

Officials Lower Tally Of 'Missing' Children (WP)

By Evelyn Nieves

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Authorities trying to track down more than 2,600 children in Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia and Alabama still missing three weeks after Hurricane Katrina believe that most of them are not really "missing."

Rather, authorities said, the vast majority of these children are "lost" -- separated from a parent or guardian during the rush to rescue hurricane victims from rooftops and shelters, when families were divided because of lack of space on a bus or helicopter.

"They're not missing in the traditional sense," said Ernie Allen, president and CEO of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which has taken on the task of finding the children and reuniting families.

The Alexandria-based center is working with sheriffs, police officers and FBI agents from across the country who have volunteered to help with the enormous caseload, and is partnering with CNN, which has been airing photos of missing children. As of yesterday, the center had resolved 966 out of 3,600 Hurricane Katrina cases, Allen said.

The number of cases continues to grow, Allen said, as more families learn where they can report missing children. The center has logged about 17,000 calls to a Katrina victim toll-free hotline (1-888-544-5475) and receives an average of 1 million hits a day from around the world on its Web site (http://www.missingkids.com). The site includes links to sites and numbers for those looking to locate adults among the hundreds still unaccounted for in Louisiana and Mississippi.

"The vast majority of the cases in our judgment are what we would call 'fractured families,' " said Allen, including instances in which evacuees ended up in one state and their children in another. He cited several examples of people reporting children missing, only to discover they were safe with a relative who did not know how to find the parents.

"We got a call from parents of a 7-year-old separated from her mother in the storm," Allen said. "We put the photos on the air and on our Web site, and the child's grandmother called and said, 'I have her.' That is a pretty good illustration of the kind of situation we're seeing."

Allen added that there is likely a relatively small number of cases in which children reported missing did not survive the storm.

There are also probably some children in the custody of people with whom they do not belong, Allen said.

In some cases, children whose parents have not been located have ended up in foster care. The state of Louisiana, as of last week, had placed in foster care 50 children whose parents had not been located, with 35 of the children found in shelters in Texas and the remainder in shelters in Mississippi, Arkansas and Louisiana.

"We're working on these one case at a time, doing old-fashioned gumshoe detective work," Allen said. "Every report we get, we have to treat as if it's potentially serious and the child is at risk."

The center has specialized in helping police across the country find children who were abducted by family members or strangers.

"This is more about reunification and repairing," Allen said. "But it's extremely urgent. If you're separated from your child in a supermarket or department store for 10 minutes, it's something you never forget. Here are parents who are separated from their children for three weeks and don't know where they are."

Was It Wind Or Water? Gulf Coast Lawyer Is Taking On Insurers (NYT)

By Jeremy Alford And Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

PASCAGOULA, Miss., Sept. 18 - Richard Scruggs picked his way through the ruins of his once-handsome four-bedroom home, no more than 50 yards from the edge of the Gulf of Mexico.

A wall of water flung by Hurricane Katrina tore through the home a little more than three weeks ago, blowing out the sides of the house and leaving only a pair of brick chimneys and exposed studs tenuously holding up the upper floor.

DOJ_NMG_0007098

To the left of Mr. Scruggs's home lies a bare concrete slab where another elegant home stood until the storm's assault on New Orleans and the coasts of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. To the right, a peaked roof sits at a twisted angle on a waterlogged lawn, all that remains of another big house.

"The whole street is torn up," Mr. Scruggs said. "Very few houses are even standing."

Mr. Scruggs, a wealthy plaintiffs' lawyer who played a leading role in wrenching a $250 billion settlement from the tobacco industry a few years back, is furious about the hurricane - not simply that it happened, but that insurance companies might escape what he sees as their responsibility for a huge portion of the losses from the storm, those resulting from flooding.

The insurers say homeowners' policies cover wind and rain damage, but do not cover flood damage caused by hurricanes or anything else. A federal program provides up to $250,000 in flood insurance, but most people do not have that coverage.

"I'm not going to sit still for this," said Mr. Scruggs, who grew up in Pascagoula and has practiced law here for decades. "I'm going to bring every organizational and legal skill I possess to make these guys do the right thing under their policies."

At stake is a potential $15 billion worth of insurance payments. That explains why the insurance companies, which have never been successfully challenged on the "wind vs. water" issue, are equally adamant.

They have contract law in their favor, they say. Their longstanding practice of not covering flood losses resulted years ago in a federal program being specifically created to provide such coverage. Still, they worry about going to court in Mississippi, which has a reputation for being tough on corporate defendants despite recent changes in the state's legal system.

At the very least, Mr. Scruggs contended that the extent of coverage is ambiguous and that courts have ruled that it is the responsibility of the writer of the policy - the insurance company - to make the provisions clear.

Much of the damage, he said, came from storm surge, which he said was gulf water driven inland by the wind. If the insurers wanted to exclude coverage for storm surge "they certainly know how to do it," he said. "And that term does not appear."

Fred Levin, a Pensacola lawyer who specializes in suing insurance companies, said his first reaction was that Mr. Scruggs had no chance of winning. "What the hell are they trying to do?" he said. "Contract law is contract law."

But Mr. Levin said policies on the Gulf Coast, unlike those in Florida, do not appear to include large, bold-type warnings that flood damage is not covered. He added that any lawsuit by Mr. Scruggs could hinge on whether insurance agents fully explained to homeowners that their hurricane coverage applied only to wind and rain.

"You go to the agent and tell him you want full coverage," Mr. Levin said, "and he tells you, 'Yes, you've got full coverage.' I think that's the best claim they've got."

There is no disputing that Hurricane Katrina caused enormous damage, much of it from flooding. Robert P. Hartwig, the chief economist of the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group in New York, estimates that 200,000 homes were destroyed or damaged beyond repair in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Estimates of the insured losses run as high as $60 billion, nearly twice as much in today's dollars as the losses in the Sept. 11 attacks and nearly three times the insurers' costs from Hurricane Andrew, the worst previous storm, in 1992.

Should the Mississippi challenge go against the insurers, Mr. Hartwig said, costs could rise to more than $75 billion. If forced to pay for damage they never anticipated and for which they never collected premiums, Mr. Hartwig said, insurers would face severe strains; some might even go bankrupt.

Most people, even in low-lying areas, do not buy federal flood insurance. But even fewer people bought flood insurance on the Mississippi Coast than in New Orleans and nearby parishes or counties. In New Orleans, Mr. Hartwig said, 40 percent bought it. Nearly 60 percent did so in the two flanking parishes. But in the three Mississippi counties facing the Gulf of Mexico, 23.4 percent bought it in Hancock County, 11.7 percent in Harrison County and 10.4 percent in Jackson County.

Jim Hood, the attorney general of Mississippi, filed a civil lawsuit in a state court last Thursday to force the insurers to pay for storm surge losses. "I'm not going to allow insurance companies to bankrupt the entire Gulf Coast by using the fine print and saying that people should have known that they didn't have coverage for water damage," he said.

Mr. Scruggs, 59, said that he and his neighbors, like thousands of owners of homes and small businesses along the coast, bought hurricane insurance for which they paid an extra premium and agreed to a higher- than-usual deductible. He said he bought the maximum of $250,000 in federal flood insurance for his $800,000 home because it sits on the waterfront. But he and some insurance executives said the flooding from Katrina extended much farther inland than in previous storms.

Mr. Scruggs said storm surges were part and parcel of hurricanes along the Gulf Coast. "Everyone knows, as does the insurance industry, that the major risk to life and property from a hurricane is storm surge," he said. "So having a hurricane policy that excluded storm surge is preposterous. No one believed that. When you pay an additional premium for a hurricane endorsement you would naturally think, 'O.K., I've got that covered.' "

The insurance companies say the cost of hurricane coverage was intended to pay for extraordinary expenses resulting from hurricane winds and rain.

"The flood exclusions are very broad and cover rising waters regardless of the cause or circumstance," Mr. Hartwig said. "Homeowners' contracts are pretty cut and dry. They've been tested by time."

Mr. Scruggs said he planned to file lawsuits in a few days on behalf of several hundred Gulf Coast residents against State Farm, Allstate and Nationwide - the three largest insurers in the region - as well as others.

With a bank of operators responding to a toll-free number, Mr. Scruggs said his list of clients could easily run into the thousands. To make space for the anticipated jump in business, Mr. Scruggs has gutted a conference room in his office in an antebellum home on the main street of Moss Point, a village adjacent to Pascagoula, and set up rows of interview cubicles with a waiting room filled with dozens of neatly aligned metal folding chairs.

Mr. Scruggs said he did not see the insurance battle as a personal gold mine. He said he was prepared to take as little as 1 percent of any settlement or jury award - far less than the typical contingency fee of one-third or more - and that he would try to get the insurers to pay for his services separately from any payments to policyholders.

State Farm, Allstate and Nationwide declined to comment on the planned lawsuits. But all of the companies contended that any effort to force payment would be against the public interest. "In essence," said Richard Luedke, a spokesman for State Farm, "the attorney general is challenging the validity of contracts in the state of Mississippi and that threatens the foundation of the economy and state and has ramifications for the residents of Mississippi." Paul Leonard, a police lieutenant in Pascagoula, said he turned to Mr. Scruggs after surging gulf waters gutted his home a few blocks back from the waterfront and his insurer, Nationwide, denied his claim.

"They said all my damage was from water and they weren't paying," Mr. Leonard said. "If it was from wind, they said they would have paid."

Mr. Scruggs has shifted much of his daily work to an office in Oxford, Miss., in the last year or so. Since the hurricane, he has been commuting between Oxford and Pascagoula in his private twin-engine corporate jet, sometimes ferrying generators, food, water and other relief supplies. He said he expected to be spending more time on the coast as he battles the insurance companies.

Mr. Scruggs said he has not yet learned how his insurer, USAA, plans to respond to his claim.

In any event, Mr. Scruggs, who said his taxable income last year was $8 million to $9 million, said that if he had to, he could certainly cover his own losses. Most other people, he said, "will have no way to rebuild or do anything."

Cities' New Job 1: Disaster Plans (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

Hurricane Katrina has sent a stark message to other regions of the United States that face the potential for natural disasters: Throw out plans that call for citizens to be self-sufficient for three days. It may take longer for the cavalry to arrive.

The slow, confused initial responses to Katrina are among many elements of the disaster now prompting state and local emergency management officials around the country to take a hard look at disaster-response plans.

In many cases, these reviews were already under way as part of National Preparedness Month. But Katrina - followed in short order by hurricane Ophelia's sweep over North Carolina and now Rita's charge into the Gulf of Mexico - has emphasized the need to have effective plans ready at a moment's notice.

"We've seen what happens when the federal government hasn't done much of anything in advance," says Eric Holdeman, director of emergency planning for Washington State's King County, which includes Seattle and could be prone to an earthquake. "If you want to be prepared for the maximum credible catastrophic event, you should be thinking seven days, not just the minimum of three days."

In Florida, which has emerged as a model for hurricane planning, officials ordered all 80,000 residents of the Keys to evacuate ahead of Rita's arrival. Some, however, stayed behind in boarded-up homes. Military cargo planes evacuated three hospitals.

Whether for this hurricane season or for future situations, learning and applying the lessons from Katrina are crucial, analysts say, because despite its devastation, the hurricane actually wasn't a worst-case event. For example, researchers for years have had their eyes fixed on Los Angeles. Some studies suggest that if the Puente Hills Fault underneath the city ruptures, the temblor could leave hundreds of thousands of people homeless, inflict $250 billion in damage, and kill 20,000.

The Eastern US faces significant - and underappreciated - earthquake risks of its own. While large earthquakes occur there far less frequently, many of the buildings are older, unreinforced brick. And Eastern cities have been slower to change building codes to reduce earthquake fatalities, despite warnings of the hazards.

Some studies suggest that New York, for example, should be as prepared for an earthquake as San Francisco. The potential damage, death toll, and fallout on the US economy could rival that of a major quake in the Bay Area.

In Boston, which has earthquake risks as well, city officials have seen Katrina's handwriting on the wall. They are beefing up evacuation plans, gearing up to withstand more-intense hurricanes, and looking to establish well-stocked shelters for poor or disabled residents who may not be able to leave the city.

Even cities whose hazards may not reach Katrina's proportions are reviewing their plans. In Tulsa, Okla., for example, the public-works department is reexamining how it would respond to worst-case floods that involve a breach of levees that channel the Arkansas River.

"It's probably been 15 years or more since we've looked at that," says Charles Hardt, the city's public-works director. Katrina has been "a wake-up call."

Los Angeles and New York are among the cities acknowledged to have some of the most advanced response plans. Officials in these places say they have honed their plans through repeated reviews and rehearsals. Watching the response to Katrina hasn't altered their plans much, although they're keeping in mind a checklist of practices that would reduce the chance of major missteps.

When it comes to ensuring that the poor or infirm are evacuated to well-stocked shelters in an emergency, Florida is a state that has largely gotten it right, planners say.

"Our lessons learned came from hurricane Andrew," says Kristy Campbell, a spokeswoman for the state's emergency operations center. Storm-specific coordination between state, county, and local agencies begins two to three days before a hurricane strikes. Relief supplies are squirreled away in safe locations. During the year, local officials keep track of the people who may need help evacuating.

Yet disaster response is only half the equation, researchers and planners say. To reduce the effects of an earthquake, storm, or flood, more emphasis must be placed on helping cities build disaster resilience, they argue. Yet such mitigation is not getting the support it needs, they say.

Experts point to the success of programs such as the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Project Impact. During the 1990s, this initiative provided seed money for a range of mitigation projects, from improving earthquake resistance in structures in the Pacific Northwest to developing economical "safe rooms" for homes and offices in tornado-prone areas. The program ended shortly after President Bush took office.

Stocks Slide After Rate Increase (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

A hawkish Federal Reserve spooked Wall Street Tuesday. Stocks dipped sharply as investors bolted for the exits amid fears heightened by the specter of Hurricane Rita.

DOJ_NMG_0007101

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 76.11 points to 10481.52, nearing levels seen at the beginning of September. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index declined 9.68 to 1221.34 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 13.93 to 2131.33.

Rate-sensitive stocks such as banks, consumer cyclicals and home-builders were punished. Technology stocks fared somewhat better, though there were few places to hide amid the broad thumping.

The Federal Open Market Committee increased the target on the federal-funds rate by a quarter-percentage point to 3.75% and said it planned to continue to remove accommodation at a "pace that is likely to be measured."

The increase was widely expected. Investors had hoped for hints that the rate-tightening cycle, which has lasted since June 2004, could be drawing to a close soon in light of the economic damage wrought by Hurricane Katrina. The Fed provided no such clues, however.

The policy statement indicated that "the hurricane didn't matter in the long term," said Stephen Sachs, director of trading at Rydex Investments. "The Fed is getting more and more concerned about energy prices translating into inflation," he said.

Some economists had expected the Fed to pause due to uncertainty over Katrina's impact, but policy makers downplayed the hurricane's effects. The hurricane's damage doesn't pose a "persistent threat," the Fed said in the statement. The more lasting threat: "Higher energy and other costs have the potential to add to inflation pressures."

Expectations for more increases this year rose, according to federal-funds futures contracts. Futures jumped to pricing in a full 4% year-end federal funds rate after the announcement, compared was a 3.975% year-end rate earlier.

A prime example of the headwinds companies are facing -- as well as issues facing the broader economy and the Fed -- is Leggett & Platt, a builder of industrial products. After Monday's close, the company guided earnings and sales lower, citing "higher costs for raw materials and energy," among a range of other issues.

Leggett's solution: price increases. Since "raw material and energy costs are not going to abate, we will have no choice but to pass along these increases," the company said in a news release. Its shares fell 13%.

Leggett hasn't been alone in pegging the blame for earnings shortfall on high energy prices. Beauty-products maker Estee Lauder, which posted disappointing earnings late Monday, fingered higher oil and gas prices, as well as softness in the South due to the impact of Katrina, among other factors. Shares of the beauty-products maker fell nearly 10%.

Investors took some solace in a decrease in oil prices. Light, sweet crude fell $1.16, or 1.7%, to $66.23 a barrel a day after it surged 7%, or $4.39 -- the biggest one-day gain in dollar terms on record, as then-Tropical Storm Rita threatened to disrupt the recovery effort under way after Katrina. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries agreed to offer its remaining spare capacity, about two million extra barrels of oil a day, to reassure markets about energy supply.

Meanwhile, investment bank Goldman Sachs gained a fraction of a point after it posted record third-quarter earnings of $3.25 a share, surpassing forecasts for a gain of $2.38 a share. The strong performance of the investment bank comes on the heels of similar market-beating results from Lehman Brothers and Bear Stearns. Morgan Stanley reports earnings Wednesday.

Circuit City Stores gained 5.9% after it swung to a one-cent gain in the second quarter on strong sales of digital televisions and portable digital audio players, beating forecasts for a loss of three cents a share. The company also boosted revenue guidance for 2006 to a gain of 5% to 8%, higher than the previous range of 3% to 6%.

In major market action:

Stocks fell. On the Big Board, where 1.7 billion shares traded, 1,031 stocks rose and 2,259 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.8 billion shares traded, 1,225 stocks advanced and 1,795 declined.

Bonds were mixed. The benchmark 10-year Treasury lost 2/32, or 63 cents per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.255% Tuesday. The 30-year bond gained 11/32 to yield 4.529%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced. It was at 111.91 yen Tuesday, off from 111.48 yen late Monday, while the euro rose to $1.2127 from $1.2151.

Fed Raises Interest Rate To Highest In 4 Years (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

DOJ_NMG_0007102

USA Today, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve raised short-term interest rates an 11th consecutive time Tuesday, saying that while Hurricane Katrina could dampen near-term growth, the storm damage did not pose a "more persistent threat" to the economy.

In a statement announcing it had boosted its target for short-term rates by a quarter-percentage point to 3.75% — the highest level in four years — the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee also made clear that its measured campaign of rate moves was likely to continue.

Further, in the first dissent since June 2003, Fed Governor Mark Olson voted against the move, preferring to hold rates steady. The vote was 9-1.

"The widespread devastation in the Gulf region, the associated dislocation of economic activity and the boost to energy prices imply that spending, production and employment will be set back in the near term," the Fed said.

"While these unfortunate developments have increased uncertainty about near-term economic performance … they do not pose a more persistent threat," it said.

Following the Fed announcement, a number of banks raised their prime interest rates, the basis for many consumer and business loans, by a quarter-point to 6.75%. Though the move was expected in financial markets, the Dow Jones industrial average ended Tuesday down 76.11 points, or 0.7%, to 10,481.52. Short-term bond prices fell while yields rose.

Hurricane Katrina disrupted oil, gasoline and natural gas operations in the Gulf, sending prices sharply higher. Energy price increases are a double-edged sword, with the potential to fuel inflation and slow growth as consumers reassess their budgets.

Economists said the Fed is clearly signaling that price pressures are the larger risk now.

The central bank, which has been raising rates in quarter-point increments since June 2004, noted the economy was moving at a "good pace" before Katrina, bolstered by high worker output and low interest rates.

It said Katrina could add to inflation pressures and energy price volatility, though noting core inflation, which excludes food and energy, has been relatively low.

"The Fed is, if anything, more concerned about inflation than they are about a growth slowdown," says Stephen Stanley of Greenwich Capital Markets.

He and other economists expect short-term rates to top 4% by the end of the year, while Stanley also expects rate increases to continue into next year.

Unswayed By Storm, Fed Raises Key Rate (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - Saying that Hurricane Katrina was unlikely to pose a "persistent threat" to the economy, the Federal Reserve raised interest rates on Tuesday for the 11th time in a row and signaled that more increases were on the way.

In an unusually long statement, the central bank acknowledged that the hurricane's devastation was likely to cause higher energy prices, higher joblessness and greater uncertainty in the months ahead.

But it said the hurricane had not shaken its confidence about longer-term growth, and it left little doubt that its top priority was still to head off inflationary pressures.

The decision lifted the federal funds rate on overnight loans between banks by a quarter-point, to 3.75 percent, the 11th rate increase since the central bank began raising rates in June 2004.

"The widespread devastation in the gulf region, the associated dislocation of economic activity and the boost to energy prices imply that spending, production and employment will be set back in the near term," the central bank's Federal Open Market Committee said in a statement.

But it continued: "While these unfortunate developments have increased uncertainty about the near-term economic performance, it is the committee's view that they do not pose a more persistent threat."

In an important hint about its desire to keep raising rates for a while longer, the central bank repeated its long-held expectation that "policy accommodation" - meaning low interest rates - could be reversed at a "measured" pace.

In response, the stock market fell yesterday. The Dow Jones industrial average went down 76.11 points, to 10,481.52; the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.8 percent.

In a rare departure from the Fed's normal unity, one member of the policy committee, Mark W. Olson, voted against the rate increase.

It was the first dissent since June 2003, and a sign that Tuesday's decision was unusually difficult.

But it did not necessarily portend a serious rift within the Fed. Mr. Olson, a commercial banker by profession, has focused primarily on bank regulation and has rarely taken strong stands on macroeconomic policy.

Edward McKelvey, a senior economist at Goldman Sachs, said policy makers were taking a much harder line about inflation than investors had been assuming.

"In our view, the financial markets are much too complacent about what a decision to keep tightening means at this juncture," Mr. McKelvey wrote before the Fed decision came out. "If under these circumstances the F.O.M.C. is prepared to keep going, then this means that the committee is more worried about the longer-term risk of higher inflation than the shorter-term risk of a collapse in growth."

In the first two weeks after Hurricane Katrina, many Wall Street analysts speculated that the Fed would either pause in raising rates or signal that the process would end fairly soon.

Historically, the central bank has taken a dim view of changing policy in response to a natural disaster, even a big one. Fed officials, and many economists, contend that the economic impact of such calamities is usually local and usually temporary.

The normal pattern is for the economy to slow and for unemployment to rise in the immediate aftermath. But any slowdown is usually followed by an even bigger jump in economic activity as rebuilding begins.

The big uncertainty this month is whether Hurricane Katrina, which disabled major oil refineries and offshore drilling platforms, will cause a more enduring downturn.

But the Fed, which has been raising the cost of borrowing since June 2004, showed little appetite for a "wait and see" approach.

It noted that the economy had been expanding "at a good pace" before the hurricane. It also noted that "higher energy prices and other costs have the potential to add to inflation pressures."

Most important, it repeated phrases suggesting that money remains too cheap for comfort. It said the prospects for inflation and growth are "roughly equal." It implied that monetary policy is still "accommodative," meaning that interest rates are not yet back to a "neutral" level that allows growth without inflation. And it repeated its expectation about raising rates at a "pace that is likely to be measured."

Ethan Harris, chief United States economist at Lehman Brothers, said that neither the hurricane nor the surge in oil prices constituted a good reason to relax monetary policy.

Both the hurricane damage and higher energy prices amount to a "supply shock" that leads to higher costs. By keeping interest rates low, the Fed would be stoking consumer demand and possibly driving prices up even higher.

"There's not really anything you can do about a supply shock, other than repair the damage," Mr. Harris said. "As a policy maker you have to be very careful about putting a lot of stimulus into the economy at a time when capacity has been impaired."

Analysts continue to debate among themselves about how much more the Fed will raise rates. Most now predict that it will raise them a quarter-point at each of its two remaining meetings this year, in October and December, which would take the federal funds rate to 4.25 percent.

In its statement, the Fed conceded that inflation remains mild and that higher energy prices have yet to drive other prices higher.

But Fed officials are increasingly concerned that low interest rates have fueled too much speculation in housing and too much complacency among investors toward risk.

Fed Raises Key Interest Rate For 11th Straight Time (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

The Federal Reserve today raised interest rates by another quarter percentage point and gave no sign that it was going to postpone rate hikes despite evidence that Hurricane Katrina would likely weaken the economy and labor market in the near term .

The central bank's Federal Open Market Committee, headed by Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, raised the benchmark federal funds rate — what banks charge each other for short-term loans — to 3.75% from 3.50%. It was the 11th consecutive quarter-point increase since mid-2004.

However, in a dissent, committee member Mark W. Olson voted against the rate increase, preferring no change in the federal funds rate.

The Dow Jones industrial average, which had been in positive territory for most of the day, slumped after the Fed's announcement, closing down 76.11 points to 10,481.52. Nasdaq and the S&P 500 were also lower today.

A recent spike in gasoline and energy prices and a plunge in consumer confidence since Hurricane Katrina had increased speculation that the Fed might leave rates unchanged or indicate that it would back away from future increases.

In the widely read remarks that accompanied the rate announcement, the Fed did acknowledge growing concerns about the hurricane's economic impact on the economy.

"The widespread devastation in the gulf region, the associated dislocation of economic activity, and the boost to energy prices imply that spending, production, and employment will be set back in the near term," the Fed said in a statement. "In addition to elevating premiums for some energy products, the disruption to the production and refining infrastructure may add to energy price volatility."

However, in the long run, the policymakers said that increased economic uncertainties do "not pose a more persistent threat" to the economy.

Notably, the Fed continued to telegraph its intention to raise rates "at a measured pace," meaning in small increments, as the economy continues to recover and demand for goods and services increases. The central bank had been compelled to keep pushing rates higher in an effort to keep price inflation in check.

"Higher energy and other costs have the potential to add to inflation pressures," the Fed said. "However, core inflation has been relatively low in recent months and longer-term inflation expectations remain contained."

Changes in the federal funds rate eventually reverberate throughout the economy because many lending rates, on everything from credit cards, home equity loans and adjustable-rate mortgages, are in some way linked to changes in the Fed's benchmark rate. While higher rates will make borrowing money more expensive, it also means that consumers can expect to earn more from savings accounts.

Most analysts have said that the economy is strong enough to continue expanding on its own without the help of rock-bottom lending rates. However, raising rates too quickly could weaken consumer spending — the largest driver of economic growth — and undermine the housing market, which has been a huge source of economic growth in places like California.

Under Greenspan's leadership, the Federal Reserve had steadily cut its rate from 6.5% in 2000 to 1% by last June to prop up an economy hit by tumbling stock prices, the 2001 terrorist attacks, corporate scandals and the Iraq war.

In other economic news today, U.S. new home construction in August weakened for the second consecutive month, according to the Commerce Department.

Housing starts, a measure of construction activity, fell 1.3% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.01 million homes. The August results, which were slightly weaker than many analysts had forecast, came after housing starts in July dropped 1.5%.

Fed Lifts Key Rate, Confident In Growth (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Federal Reserve officials expressed confidence yesterday that Hurricane Katrina has caused no more than a temporary setback to the U.S. economy, allowing them to raise their key short-term interest rate another notch to make sure inflation stays under control.

DOJ_NMG_0007105

As the federal government and insurance companies begin to put tens of billions of dollars into Gulf Coast reconstruction, Fed policymakers expressed more worry about rising inflation pressures than slower economic growth and indicated that they will probably keep raising interest rates in the months ahead.

Private economists are forecasting that the economy will gain more from the reconstruction spending than it has lost because of the storm.

In an unusually long and sympathetic statement released after their meeting, Fed officials noted "the widespread devastation in the Gulf region . . . and the boost to energy prices" resulting from the storm, which displaced thousands of area residents, wiped out hundreds of thousands of jobs, disrupted shipping systems throughout the Mississippi Valley and shut down much of the nation's oil and gasoline production.

In the first week after Katrina hit, economists worried that consumers and businesses might react to soaring energy prices by sharply pulling back on spending plans, triggering a sudden slump. Some Fed officials were open then to the possibility of leaving interest rates unchanged for a while because of the uncertainty of the economic outlook.

But since then, energy production has recovered somewhat, while oil and gasoline prices have come down from their post-Katrina peaks.

By yesterday, Fed officials had concluded that national consumer spending, employment and overall economic growth "will be set back in the near term" because of the storm.

Looking out over the months ahead, they added, "while these unfortunate developments have increased uncertainty about near-term economic performance, it is the [Fed's] view that they do not pose a more persistent threat."

Rather, Fed officials said, low interest rates continue to stimulate economic growth, while "higher energy and other costs have the potential to add to inflation pressures."

Already, prices have climbed for building materials and transportation services. Economists are watching closely to see how successful other businesses are at raising consumer prices to cover their higher energy costs. That may become easier at a time when consumers say they are expecting higher inflation than they did before Katrina.

The central bank's top policymaking group, the Federal Open Market Committee, was more divided yesterday than it has been in more than two years. Nine of the 10 voting members, including Chairman Alan Greenspan, agreed to raise their benchmark federal funds rate to 3.75 percent from 3.5 percent.

Fed board member Mark W. Olson voted against the move, saying he preferred to leave the rate unchanged -- the first dissent on the committee since June 2003.

Some other committee members came to the meeting open to Olson's position; only seven of the 12 regional Fed banks had requested a similar quarter-percentage-point increase in the largely symbolic discount rate to 4.75 percent-- a sign that five Fed banks might have been content with no increase in the funds rate either. The discount rate is charged to commercial banks when they borrow directly from the Fed.

The federal funds rate influences many other borrowing costs throughout the economy. Major banks followed the Fed's action by lifting their prime rate on business loans by a similar quarter percentage point, to 6.75 percent from 6.5 percent. Many consumer rates, such as on credit cards and home equity loans, may rise as well. Banks and other financial institutions may increase the rates they pay on savers' certificates of deposit and money market funds.

However, long-term rates, such as those charged on 30-year mortgages, are determined by global markets. Those rates have remained low over the past 15 months, even as the Fed hiked short-term rates. For example, the fixed rate on a 30-year mortgage averaged 5.74 percent nationally last week, about where it was a year ago at 5.75 percent, according to mortgage finance company Freddie Mac.

The Fed committee made it clear that it plans to keep raising the federal funds rate in the months to come, repeating that it believes it can do so gradually, "at a pace that is likely to be measured."

Stock prices fell on concern that higher interest rates will dampen economic growth and profits.

Fed officials stressed their belief that the economy was in solid shape before the storm hit.

Consumers and businesses increased spending rapidly during the summer, while unemployment fell to a low 4.9 percent in August, and price inflation outside of the energy sector was tame.

DOJ_NMG_0007106

The economy "appeared poised to continue growing at a good pace before the tragic toll of Hurricane Katrina," the Fed statement said.

Fed officials did not mention it, but they are also well aware that the post-hurricane reconstruction will provide a strong stimulus to national economic growth. Insurance companies are preparing to pay about $50 billion in claims. Congress has appropriated more than $60 billion in assistance, and President Bush has proposed a federal response that could cost up to $200 billion by some estimates.

The result will be a net plus for the economy, according to estimates by Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, a St. Louis forecasting firm. The economy will grow by a healthy 3.4 percent in 2005, or roughly 0.2 percentage points slower than it would have without Katrina; the economy will then expand by a robust 3.8 percent next year, or 0.5 percent more than without the post-hurricane spending burst, the firm said yesterday.

The Fed's action was its 11th consecutive quarter-percentage-point increase in the federal funds rate, the overnight rate charged on loans between banks, since June 2004, when it was at a four-decade low of 1 percent.

Many investors and analysts have come to expect a "measured" pace to mean a quarter-percentage-point increase at every scheduled Fed meeting. But Fed officials have stressed that they could pause or increase the rate by as much as a half percentage point at a time, depending on the behavior of the economy.

Thus Fed policymakers might leave the fed funds rate unchanged at their next meeting Nov. 1 if the economy slows more than they expect. Or they could raise the rate by half a point if inflation takes off.

Several analysts predicted that Fed meetings will include more debate and possibly more dissents as the rate goes higher and as Greenspan prepares to step down early next year.

"Greenspan certainly has the intention of raising rates" higher, said Anthony Chan, senior economist for J.P. Morgan Asset Management. But, he said, "moving forward, there will be more challenges to that."

Fed Keeps Focus On Inflation And Raises Rate (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Federal Reserve raised interest rates for the 11th consecutive time, concluding that Hurricane Katrina's impact on inflation is more worrisome than its effect on growth.

The Fed raised its short-term interest-rate target to 3.75%, from 3.5%. It indicated that it expects to raise the rate further at a "measured" pace, which has come to mean an increase of one-quarter percentage point at each meeting of Fed policy makers. (The Fed's statement)

The decision to raise rates and to signal more ahead amid the uncertainty created by Katrina as well as some political pressure to take a break attests to the Fed's mounting concern over inflation. Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan appears more willing to risk slowing the economy down by raising rates too much, then to risk letting inflation rise further by raising them too little.

Tuesday's increase wasn't wholly expected: A minority of economists thought the Fed would pause to assess Katrina's impact. And some Fed officials wanted to do so. Fed Governor Mark Olson cast the lone dissent Tuesday, breaking a two-year stretch of unanimous votes.

In a statement, the Fed acknowledged Katrina's "tragic toll," but predicted it wouldn't derail the economy's expansion, and may aggravate inflation. "The widespread devastation in the Gulf region, the associated dislocation of economic activity, and the boost to energy prices imply that spending, production, and employment will be set back in the near term," the Fed said.

"While these unfortunate developments have increased uncertainty about near-term economic performance, it is the [Fed's] view that they do not pose a more persistent threat." Economic growth, it said, would be supported by still-low interest rates and brisk productivity growth, while "higher energy and other costs have the potential to add to inflation pressures."

It did say that underlying inflation is "relatively low" and longer-term inflation expectations are "contained," but this was less sanguine than the statement following its Aug. 9 meeting, which called such expectations "well contained."

In June of last year, the federal funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks, stood at a 46-year low of 1%. The Fed's goal since then has been to return rates to a "neutral" level that neither fuels inflation nor restrains growth. Estimates of neutral range from 3% to 5.5%.

Financial markets now expect only one more quarter-point rate increase during the three remaining meetings before Mr. Greenspan's term ends Jan. 31 -- and possibly one more by next summer.

In response to the Fed move, commercial banks raised their prime lending rate, a benchmark for many short-term business and consumer loans, to 6.75% from 6.5%. Longer-term lending rates will be little affected, however, as bond markets, where long-term rates are set, had anticipated Tuesday's action and showed little response.

With the economy growing steadily, unemployment falling and underlying inflation low, Fed officials had been comfortable with a steady diet of small, well-telegraphed rate increases for the past several months.

But in the weeks prior to Katrina, the Fed had increasingly fretted that rising energy prices in an economy with little spare capacity were a growing threat to inflation. The unemployment rate in August fell to 4.9%, a level many economists, including those on the Fed's staff, consider indicative of an economy operating at capacity.

Consumer prices rose 3.6% in the 12 months through August, matching the largest such increase in four years, and Morgan Stanley expects them to hit 4.3% in September. Excluding food and energy prices, inflation has hovered around 2%, but Fed officials worry other prices may creep higher as energy costs work their way through the pipeline. Several cities, for instance, recently have permitted taxi companies to boost fares because of higher gasoline prices.

"I'm concerned about core inflation running at the upper end of the range that I feel is consistent with price stability," Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago President Michael Moskow, who voted in favor of Tuesday's rate increase, said earlier this month.

Katrina has aggravated those concerns. Ken Simonson, chief economist for Associated General Contractors of America, recently predicted construction-materials prices would rise 10% next year, up from his previous forecast of 6% to 8%. He blames higher fuel and transportation costs, disruptions and shortages related to Katrina.

The University of Michigan found consumers expect inflation in the coming year of 4.6%, a near-15-year high, and expect average inflation of 3.1% over the next five years, a four-year high. Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley, said federal reconstruction spending could boost growth so much next year that the Fed may have to raise rates even further than it previously anticipated.

Still, there is a risk Tuesday's increase will prove to be a mistake. The University of Michigan said consumer confidence experienced its largest two-month drop on record from July to September, a development that often foreshadowed recession. Oil and gasoline prices have rebounded this week as Hurricane Rita threatens the Gulf coast. "There is a risk the energy shock is going to be bigger and have more damaging effects on the economy than realized," said Bill Dudley, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs. "They could look bad with the benefit of hindsight."

Mr. Greenspan has in the past altered course in the face of a shock, though not a natural disaster. In 1997, the Fed moved to a neutral from a tightening stance because of the Asian financial crisis. In December 1999, it paused rather than raise rates because of uncertainty over how computers at banks and elsewhere would handle the century date change. And it cut rates rapidly after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Its decision not to pause this time drew some political flak. "Chairman Greenspan is insensitive to America's working families," Senator Jim Bunning, a Kentucky Republican and longtime Greenspan critic, said in a statement. "Americans simply don't need another rate hike in the middle of a crisis."

Mr. Greenspan has been praised for bringing down both unemployment and inflation in his 18 years as Fed chairman. But as that tenure draws to a close, he appears clearly more willing to risk a rise in unemployment than a jump in inflation, while aiming to avoid both. Richard DeKaser, chief economist at National City Corp. in Cleveland, said the Fed might welcome a slowdown because it would maintain some slack in the economy. That would make it harder for firms and workers to build higher energy prices into prices and wages. As in 1995, a "soft patch...would provide a firmer basis for extending the expansion into the...rest of the decade," Mr. DeKaser said.

Mr. Olson, a former banking consultant and Congressional staffer, who cast the lone dissent, primarily works on regulatory and consumer affairs, and his views on the economy and monetary policy seldom make news. A spokeswoman said he declined to comment on the reason for his dissent. The reasons are to be given in minutes to the meeting, to be released in three weeks. Mr. Berner said his dissent probably reflected a desire to await more information, rather than a belief that the time had come for the Fed to stop raising rates.

Other officials may also have had misgivings, but these won't be known until the minutes of this meeting are issued. The Fed's policy-making committee comprises 19 officials, of which 12 may cast a vote on rate moves: the seven members of the Fed board of governors in Washington and presidents of five of the 12 regional Fed banks. With two vacancies on the Fed board, Tuesday's vote was 9-1.

In a sign of possible unease among other Fed officials, only seven of the Fed's 12 regional banks asked for a quarter-point increase in the discount rate, to 4.75% from 4.5%, prior to Tuesday's meeting. The little-used discount rate is charged on Fed loans to member banks and usually moves in lockstep with the federal funds rate. Regional banks' discount requests can reflect the rate views of either the bank's president, or its private-sector board, or both.

Among those absent from the request were the Atlanta and Dallas Feds, whose districts bore the brunt of Katrina. Dallas Fed President Richard Fisher, however, voted for the increase in the federal funds target. Two more banks asked for the discount-rate requests late Tuesday.

Those absent may have asked for no increase or, less likely, a larger increase. It's also possible their boards met in the immediate aftermath of Katrina when the economic outlook was much dicier.

US Raises Interest Rates Despite Oil Crisis (FT)

By Carola Hoyos And Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, September 21, 2005

The Federal Reserve on Tuesday voted 9-1 to raise US interest rates by another quarter point and signalled that it expected to continue tightening policy.

The move came in spite of the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina and as Hurricane Rita approached the Gulf, posing a fresh threat to oil production.

But the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries responded to concerns about the rising oil price pushed up in part by hurricane damage by offering the world all its extra crude.

Opec delegates agreed to offer consumers 2m barrels a day of extra oil, though Iran, the traditional price hawk of the group, insisted the offer would be reviewed at the group's meeting in Kuwait in December.

US crude futures on Tuesday retreated $1.16 to $66.23, after gaining $4.17 on Monday as fears of Hurricane Rita grew. October gasoline futures trading on the New York Mercantile exchange fell 4.77 cents to $2 a gallon.

While the Fed acknowledged the economic dislocation caused by Katrina and the rise in energy prices that has hit spending, production and employment in the near term, policymakers rejected calls for a “compassionate pause” in raising interest rates.

The Fed said the disruption to the production and refining infrastructure in the region might add to energy price volatility, but added: “While these unfortunate developments have increased uncertainty about near-term economic performance, it is the committee's view that they do not pose a more persistent threat.”

Before Katrina struck, it said, the US economy had been growing well. Core inflation had been “relatively low” in recent months and longer-term inflation expectations remained contained.

“Policy accommodation can be removed at a pace that is likely to be measured,” it said. However, Mark Olson, a member of the board of governors, voted against a quarter-point rise to 3.75 per cent, instead preferring no change in rates.

Opec's negotiations in Vienna were overshadowed by Rita as delegates and traders tried to forecast how much damage it would do to the Texas oil industry. “We are worried,” said Sheikh Ahmed Fahd Al-Ahmed Al-Sabah, Kuwait's oil minister. “We are following the hurricane to see what will be the effect, especially in Texas.”

DOJ_NMG_0007109

Panic buying seized Houston on Tuesday, with housewives filling trolleys with cases of bottled water at supermarkets such as Wal-Mart and Target.

Thousands of people fled Florida as Rita swept into the Keys, but the storm was expected to do more damage along the Gulf coast this weekend.

Gulf coast energy companies evacuated offshore facilities and tested emergency equipment and procedures.

Analysts agree the US energy industry, already strained after Hurricane Katrina, could see further fuel price rises if bad weather strikes again.

More than a quarter of the US refining industry, processing 4.5m barrels a day of crude oil, stands in the path of Rita, including three of the country's five largest refineries.

Fed Increases Interest Rate Despite Storm (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

The Federal Reserve, in an unusual non-unanimous decision criticized as "insensitive," yesterday voted to raise interest rates despite the economic disruptions caused by Hurricane Katrina.

The Fed said it does not expect the immediate rise in joblessness and decline in growth from the storm to pose a "persistent threat" to the economy, and that it must address the possibility that the soaring energy prices triggered by Katrina will fan inflation.

Mark Olsen, a Fed governor, dissented in the 9-1 vote, saying he thought a pause in the Fed's string of quarter-point rate increases since June 2004 was warranted. Many agreed on Wall Street, where stocks and bonds tumbled in response to the Fed's move.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill and some economists said the central bank was being "insensitive" by increasing the cost of rebuilding from the storm by raising the interest rates on construction loans, while adding to the burden on consumers already hard-pressed by skyrocketing gasoline prices.

The Fed acknowledged the extraordinarily broad devastation from the hurricane, which killed almost 1,000 people and put nearly 1 million out of their homes and work -- some temporarily, some indefinitely.

It also acknowledged that the disaster, which caused consumer confidence to plunge to a 13-year low earlier this month, has "increased uncertainty" about the economy's performance.

But the central bank noted that the economy was growing solidly "before the tragic toll" and should be able to withstand the shock.

Even with the nearly three percentage point boost in interest rates since the Fed started its campaign, it said the level of rates remains low by historical standards and is still stimulating the economy.

The board raised the federal funds rate, which is the rate it targets on overnight loans among banks, to 3.75 percent. Commercial banks raised their prime lending rates by a corresponding amount, to 6.75 percent.

Richard Yamarone, an economist with Argus Research Corp., said the Fed ignored "a chorus of congressional leaders, business figures and investors" because it fears the sharp rise in energy prices this year will push the inflation rate over the psychological threshold of 4 percent.

Although many economists -- and even the Fed -- note that inflation excluding volatile energy prices remains tame at about 2 percent, persistently higher energy costs nevertheless will stoke inflation by prompting higher cost-of-living increases and a push for higher wages, he said.

Katrina fueled inflation not only by shutting down 5 percent of U.S. energy production and driving up energy prices, but also by boosting the costs of transportation and building materials, Mr. Yamarone noted.

"A Fed pause, or even a rate cut, would have done nothing to help the Gulf Coast area," he said. "It is more important to address the drag of inflation than to pause out of compassion for a region that was closed to business for a week."

But Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican, said Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan was "insensitive" and out of touch with the plight of working families.

"Maybe if he didn't have a government car and driver and had to pay for his own gas like ordinary folks, or if he lost everything he owned in a hurricane, he would be a bit more compassionate," the senator said.

Peter Morici, a business professor at the University of Maryland, said the Fed and many economists consistently have underestimated the severity of the storm and its effect on the economy, initially dismissing it as little worse than previous storms.

The central bank may be making a mistake like it did in 1990, when Mr. Greenspan led a campaign to raise rates in the face of a weakening economy, he said. Many economists blame the Fed's unresponsiveness for precipitating the 1990-91 recession.

"Falling retail sales and consumer confidence indicate the mood of the country is turning sour," and the Fed's move yesterday contributes to the pessimism, Mr. Morici said.

"By raising interest rates in an economy already slowing and buffeted by Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Greenspan needlessly risks driving the economy into recession, something he did accomplish for the first President Bush," he said.

Richard Berner, an economist with Morgan Stanley, said the Fed's task is particularly challenging now because of the explosion in energy costs, inflation and federal spending -- which also is inflationary -- prompted by Katrina.

Although the decision to raise rates may be a good one aimed at quelling an inflation threat, communicating that strategy is difficult in light of the public outcry over federal unresponsiveness to the storm.

Home Construction Declined In August (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 (AP) - Construction of new homes slipped for a second month in August, providing fresh evidence that the housing boom may be cooling.

The Commerce Department reported Tuesday that construction of new homes and apartments dropped 1.3 percent last month after a decline of 1.5 percent in July. The two declines are the first consecutive ones since early 2004.

Even with the drops, housing construction totaled 2.01 million units in August, seasonally adjusted and annualized. It was the eighth month in the last nine that construction exceeded the two million rate.

Hurricane Katrina, which hit late in the month, had little impact on the data, but analysts predicted a more adverse effect in September.

David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, predicted that for all of 2005 housing construction would total 2.02 million units, up 3.6 percent from the pace in 2004 and the best showing in more than two decades.

For 2006, Mr. Seiders forecast housing construction would drop 4.8 percent, to around 1.92 million starts. He said he had added just 25,000 starts to that figure for rebuilding from the hurricane, expecting that the recovery effort will be stretched out perhaps as long as five years.

For August, construction of new single-family homes fell by 0.5 percent, to 1.71 million units, while construction of multifamily units was down 6 percent, to 328,000 units.

By region, construction rose 13.3 percent in the West, to an annual rate of 561,000 units. All other regions posted declines in August from July.

The biggest drop occurred in the South, where construction fell 6.6 percent, to an annual rate of 915,000 units. Analysts said unusually wet weather accounted for the decline.

Construction was down 5.2 percent in the Midwest, to an annual rate of 346,000 units, and down 4.1 percent in the Northeast, to an annual rate of 187,000 units.

Housing Starts Fell In August On Drop In Multifamily Units (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Residential construction fell for a second straight month in August as construction of condominiums and apartments tumbled, suggesting that rising concerns about overbuilding in the condo market may have prompted developers to pull back.

DOJ_NMG_0007111

The Commerce Department reported Tuesday that construction starts of new homes declined 1.3% last month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.009 million units. In July, starts were down 1.5% to 2.035 million. The government said the effect from Hurricane Katrina was minimal in August because it disrupted construction activity for only the last few days of the month.

The drop was attributed exclusively to declines in multifamily housing. Construction starts of single-family homes edged up 0.1% to 1.709 million. Starts of housing with two or more units dropped 8.5% to 300,000 units while construction of homes with five or more units fell 12% to 256,000 units.

Read the complete text of the Commerce Department's report on August housing starts and analysis from Briefing.com.

Although statistics for multifamily homes tend to be volatile month to month, economists said the August decline was the second straight drop and the level of starts in August was below the average for the past year. Joel Naroff, chief economist at Commerce Bancorp., said it may be too early to discern a clear trend, but two consecutive months of downward movement may indicate that "builders are starting to throttle back."

David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Homebuilders, said that while the recent declines in multifamily starts could be an "early sign of an oversupply" in the condo market, he cautioned that the declines also could be weather-related since multifamily starts in the South fell sharply last month. "If this is weather-related, these declines will be temporary," Mr. Seiders said.

Despite the possible slowing in the multifamily market, the single-family-home market remains strong. Some economists say the rebuilding efforts along the Gulf Coast in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina will increase housing starts. Even if certain segments of the housing market cool, the overall "residential housing sector is going to be OK for a while," Mr. Naroff said.

Treasury Secretary John Snow Tuesday also dismissed the idea that the overall housing market is in trouble or that there is a bubble in the market. Speaking to credit-union executives in Washington, Mr. Snow said that predictions of a nationwide collapse of the housing market were improbable at best. "There's some easing off going on and that's expected," he said, but added, "I think the bubble is a gross misnomer."

The Commerce Department also reported Tuesday that permits for future building declined 2.2% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.124 million units. In July, permits rose 1.8% -- revised from a previously reported 1.6% increase.

The Commerce report showed that residential construction fell 4.1% in the Northeast, 6.6% in the South, and 5.2% in the Midwest; starts climbed 13% in the West. Nationwide, an estimated 184,600 houses were started in August, based on figures unadjusted for seasonal factors. An estimated 199,600 building permits were issued last month, also based on unadjusted figures.

Barbour Steers Mississippi Toward Recovery (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

GULFPORT, Miss. -- Flood-ravaged New Orleans has dominated press coverage and political debate in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, though neighboring Mississippi took the full brunt of the storm's fury, leaving more than 10,000 residents homeless.

"We're not into whining or moping around or victimhood," said Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, who has avoided the blame game that started in Louisiana as soon as Katrina made landfall.

The Republican governor remains optimistic, insisting that somewhere in the hurricane's devastation is "an opportunity to build the Gulf Coast back bigger and better than ever before."

His can-do attitude has drawn praise from, among others, former Reagan speechwriter Peggy Noonan, who compared Mr. Barbour's post-Katrina leadership to that of former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani after the September 11 attacks.

Mr. Barbour, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, says he's not bothered by the comparatively scant national press coverage given to his state's suffering.

"I would rather [have made] the progress that we've made than get a lot of press attention by not making progress, so it doesn't bother me that we're not on the front page of the news," he said in an interview with The Washington Times.

DOJ_NMG_0007112

Though he describes his job dealing with the hurricane's aftermath in Mississippi as "a little bit like getting a drink of water out of a fire hydrant," Mr. Barbour says he's not complaining.

"I'm a heck of a lot better off than the people [on the coast] that don't have homes, that can't take a shower, that have to rely on somebody to bring them a meal," he said. "If they can deal with it, I can deal with it."

But while some observers say his leadership in Katrina's aftermath have made him a possible White House contender for 2008, Mr. Barbour, 57, insists politics is the last thing on his mind.

"I'm not focused or particularly interested in the politics of it, which is one reason I have disdained all the people who want to point fingers and play the blame game," he said.

"We'll have the opportunity to improve many areas of South Mississippi that were severely damaged and that puts a responsibility on me that makes this more than a full-time job, which is why I'm not very interested in politics, even re-election politics."

While neighboring Louisiana under Democratic Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco continues to be entangled in post-Katrina political wrangling, Mississippi appears on a faster track to recovery -- partly due to Mr. Barbour's experience as a high-powered Washington dealmaker.

Mr. Barbour, who left here last night for a week-long trip to Washington, has been working closely on a federal aid proposal with Mississippi Sens. Trent Lott and Thad Cochran, both of whom are also Republicans and close to the Bush administration.

"Our staffs have been working together to develop the right package that's consistent with good policy for the country and that would meet our needs," he said.

President Bush yesterday made Gulfport the first stop on his fifth tour of the region, appearing with Mr. Barbour in a makeshift tent to inaugurate the governor's "Commission on Rebuilding, Recovery and Renewal," headed by former Netscape CEO James Barksdale.

Mississippi's recovery will be driven private investors sinking cash into the crushed ports and coastal cities, Mr. Barbour said. "Twenty years from now, how we rebuild is going to be determined by the private sector."

But some Mississippi residents have called the state and federal recovery efforts too slow and disorganized. Last week, the state's attorney general filed a lawsuit against five major insurance companies, saying they tried to trick thousands of homeowners out of insurance claims.

Mr. Barbour is taking the bumps in stride. He appeared nonchalant at a press conference Monday in Jackson, the state capital. Flanked by emergency managers, he wore a short-sleeved shirt with no tie and joked with reporters.

Asked how the state is preparing for the possibility of being hit in coming days by Hurricane Rita, he said flatly: "We're praying a lot, and we hope that the same hand that put Katrina right into the coast will put Rita somewhere else."

Afterward, Mr. Barbour acknowledged the stress of dealing with the disaster.

"Sure I get tired," he said. "I'm just human, but I'll tell you what, when you see people who were poor before the storm and who have lost what little they ever had and they're helping their neighbors, it gives you energy."

He said he spends time praying and that "people pray for us and we need it and appreciate it, and they don't make any mulls about it. The Supreme Court ain't outlawed that yet."

GOP Split On Social Security (HILL)

By Bob Cusack And Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 21, 2005

A lack of communication between House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) over the past several months has clouded the prospects for Social Security reform this year.

Thomas has kept Hastert in the dark on his yet-to-be-introduced broad retirement bill, which would include major changes to the Social Security system. Meanwhile, Hastert has not committed to a floor vote on revamping the entitlement program, leaving Thomas unsure of how to proceed.

When pressed on a timetable over the last couple of weeks, Hastert cited talking points on the need to reform the program.

DOJ_NMG_0007113

Throughout the spring and summer, leadership aides complained that they could not educate members about Thomas's plan because the powerful chairman was playing it close to the vest.

In May, a House GOP leadership aide said, "It's hard to react to what Thomas is doing because we're not sure what he's up to. … It's very confusing right now."

But other Republicans say that leadership has postponed making difficult decisions on moving a bill and that the delay has triggered confusion and frustration in the GOP conference.

After Bush made his case for Social Security reform, Thomas held a news conference the next morning without alerting leadership. Infuriated, GOP leadership aides criticized Thomas in the media.

Days later, sources close to Thomas reveled in a Bush speech to the Latino Coalition in which the president said, "I have worked closely with Chairman Thomas on a lot of crucial issues. When he says he can get the job done, he means he can get the job done and has proven over the past five years that he can get the job done."

The crux of the problem for Republicans, congressional sources say, is that House Republicans lack the votes to pass a bill and have been struggling on an exit strategy. Some wanted to cite the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina as a reason to abandon a reform bill, but leadership officials have not taken that approach.

Conservatives have long made Social Security reform a legislative priority. Members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC) were a driving force behind the most recent House reform option, a plan developed by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), a former House and RSC member, and amended by Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.) and other members of the Ways and Means Committee.

The legislation has 46 co-sponsors, and only two lawmakers, Reps. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) and Lee Terry (R-Neb.), have endorsed the bill since the August recess.

Asked yesterday if he is committed to the DeMint-McCrery bill, Thomas said, "I am committed to a retirement-security package."

Most political experts on and off Capitol Hill say Social Security reform is dead in this Congress. They say the only remaining questions are whether Thomas will pass a bill out of his committee and whether the House will pass the legislation.

In April, McCrery said, "I'm confident that we're going to develop, under the chairman's leadership, a plan that can pass the House."

But with dozens of Republicans uncommitted, it is doubtful that the House can approve of any legislation with private accounts in it.

National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds, a Ways and Means Committee member, told Thomas during a panel meeting last week that he would recommend that leadership table Social Security reform this year.

"I think Tom Reynolds may have been talking about what his feelings are," Hastert said during a press briefing Thursday night. "Social Security is something very important. It's something we've talked about doing, and when we decide to move forward we'll let the press know."

Reynolds had dinner with Hastert last Wednesday, the day he told his fellow Ways and Means Republicans that he was recommending leadership postpone the legislation instead of forcing vulnerable members to take a tough vote.

Reynolds declined to say how he would vote on a Social Security bill, saying he does not answer hypothetical questions.

As Democrats aligned against the private-accounts bill, it has proved to be a tough sell for Republican House leaders. During the winter and spring, congressional Republicans met with vocal opposition during a series of town-hall meetings held in member districts across the country.

Bush and his Cabinet secretaries made "100 stops in 100 days," which seemingly did more to incite the opposition than motivate his base, even though the White House initially hoped to have a reform bill passed by late spring, according to lobbyists working closely with the administration.

In July, deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl Rove told a group of college students and lobbyists that the House would move a bill in September and the Senate would act soon thereafter.

DOJ_NMG_0007114

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) has insisted for much of the summer that the House vote on reform legislation at some point this year. Other leaders, Reynolds among them, were reluctant to sign off on a vote that could haunt congressional Republicans during the contentious midterm elections in 2006.

DeLay's public comments on the need to pass Social Security reform have been much stronger than Hastert's.

Blunt and his whip operation, fresh off a bruising battle to pass the Central America Free Trade Agreement, are in no hurry to press members on Social Security reform.

"I think the leaders do need to take into consideration where the Senate may be," House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said last week. "We need to make absolutely sure this is the right way to protect and reform Social Security."

Blunt said last week that his whip operation would continue to listen to member concerns on this issue and to keep providing them with information about the various options for reform.

Asked about whether or not it could pass the House, Blunt said, "This is a step that a majority of House members would be willing to take."

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) has been unable to move any reform out of his panel, and the prospects are grim because Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) opposes private accounts. Without Democratic support, Grassley needs Snowe's vote.

Grassley told The Hill last spring that Congress had to pass a reform bill in 2005 or it would not happen for the next "eight or nine years."

In Bush's Trail, Scarred Ground (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - When people refer to battlegrounds in presidential races, they are usually not thinking of airport runways. But those people probably have not heard of Runway 4/22 at the airport in Las Cruces, N.M.

The runway, the airport's longest, has been closed since President Bush made a campaign stop in August 2004. It has gouges six inches deep and a hundred yards long, which the city says were put there by two Air Force cargo planes accompanying the president. Las Cruces put the damage at $2.1 million.

The city said airport officials warned the Air Force that the planes, a giant C-17 and a military version of the 757, were too heavy, and that the hot asphalt would be too soft for landing that day.

When Bill Clinton paid a presidential visit, he landed at Holloman Air Force Base nearby, said Terence J. Kelly, a spokesman for Las Cruces. When Senator John Kerry and former Senator John Edwards, the Democratic candidates for president and vice president, visited, "they landed elsewhere," Mr. Kelly said.

After a year of discussions, the Air Force has offered $600,000 for repairs.

"It's open to dispute whether it was nice and pretty to begin with," said Maj. Ann Stefanek of the Air Force.

Major Stefanek said the Air Force was acknowledging the damage but denying that it was warned before the landing.

The Las Cruces City Council may discuss the settlement offer next month.

Frist Sold Stock Before Price Drop (LAT/AP)

By From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, sold all his stock in his family's hospital company about two weeks before it issued a disappointing earnings report and the price fell 9%.

Frist held an undisclosed amount of stock in HCA Inc., the nation's largest for-profit hospital chain. On June 13, he instructed the trustee managing the assets to sell his HCA shares and those of his wife and children, said Amy Call, a spokeswoman for Frist.

Frist's shares in the Nashville company were sold by July 1 and those of his wife and children by July 8, Call said. The trustee decided when to sell the shares, and the Tennessee Republican had no control over the exact time they were sold, she said.

HCA shares peaked at $58.40 a share June 22. After slipping for two weeks, the price fell $4.86 to $50.05 on July 13 after the firm announced that quarterly earnings would not meet analysts' expectations.

The value of Frist's stock at the time of the sale was not disclosed. Earlier this year, he reported holding blind trusts valued at $7 million to $35 million.

Blind trusts are used to avoid conflicts of interest. Assets are turned over to a trustee who reports to the owner only the total value and income earned.

The sale of the shares was first reported by Congressional Quarterly.

Judicial Conference Supports Citing Unpublished Opinions (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 21, 2005

The policy-making body of the federal judiciary on Tuesday endorsed a sweeping rule change that will allow lawyers to cite unpublished opinions in federal appeals courts nationwide beginning in 2007.

The Judicial Conference also voted not to take a position on the controversial question of whether the sprawling 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals should be split in two. Members did, however, agree that they would oppose any circuit-splitting bill that does not provide adequate funding for the costs involved. The issue has been debated by Congress for years without resolution.

The citation rule change, if ratified by the Supreme Court and untouched by Congress, would end a practice that brought charges of a hidden, unaccountable system of justice against some of the nation's largest and most important appellate courts. The 2nd, 7th, 9th and federal circuits ban citation of unpublished opinions outright, while six other circuits discourage it.

Passage of the resolution by voice vote followed "a great deal of debate," said Judge Carolyn Dineen King, chair of the executive committee, at a post-meeting news conference.

She said passage was eased by an amendment introduced at the meeting that would make the change prospective only, meaning that lawyers will be able to cite only those unpublished opinions issued after Jan. 1, 2007. King also stressed that individual circuit courts will be able to set their own rules about the precedential value unpublished opinions can be given.

The conference vote is something of a bouquet tossed to its likely next chairman, chief justice nominee John Roberts Jr. As a private practitioner and then as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, Roberts served on the advisory committee that recommended the new rule, 32.1. "A lawyer ought to be able to tell a court what it has done," Roberts said at the April 2004 meeting at which the advisory committee first endorsed the rule.

At his Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearings last week, Roberts said he was in line to chair the advisory committee in October -- now unlikely, since as chief justice he would chair the entire Judicial Conference. The conference's standing committee on rules of practice and procedure approved the citation rule in June of this year.

"This is one of the things John Roberts took a personal interest in," said Mark Levy, who heads the appellate advocacy group at Kilpatrick Stockton and was another member of the advisory committee along with Roberts. "It will be a terrific change that will make the process fairer and more transparent."

Michael Schmier of the California-based Committee for the Rule of Law said: "We have worked for 10 years to see this day. We are gratified that the mechanism by which the rule of law is imposed upon the judiciary is restored." Schmier said that the federal rule change could have a ripple effect on California and other states that have their own non-citation rules.

The meeting of the Judicial Conference was presided over by Justice John Paul Stevens in the wake of the death Sept. 3 of Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

Stevens "did a fine job," King said. "He has a great deal of charm." The conference -- composed of the chief judges of all 13 circuits as well as one district judge from each circuit and the chief judge of the Court of International Trade -- passed a resolution mourning the loss of Rehnquist, who presided over the conference for nearly two decades.

As many as 80 percent of all appeals court opinions are designated "unpublished," though most are available on electronic databases or from the courts themselves. The practice of issuing uncitable, unpublished opinions -- many of them brief dispositions drafted by law clerks or staff attorneys -- developed over the past 30 years as a time-saving device for overburdened appeals judges. Critics say the practice produced a body of often conflicting opinions that did not need to be harmonized and could not be cited or reversed.

A significant faction of appeals judges, led by 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski, resisted the rule change, complaining that it would exponentially increase their workload by forcing them to polish and beef up the unpublished opinions.

After Tuesday's vote, Kozinski said, "I don't have any comment. I think it's a bad idea, but that's what it is. Maybe the Supreme Court will overrule it."

Kozinski, who encouraged other 9th Circuit judges and practitioners to write letters in opposition to the rule change, also asserted the change would increase litigation costs by expanding the universe of cases lawyers must search on behalf of clients. But a study by the Federal Judicial Center, issued in April, found that in circuits that had decided in recent years to allow unpublished opinions to be cited, neither problem had materialized to a significant degree.

But another leading opponent of the rule change said that survey was misleading because it takes a long time for lawyers and judges to change their practices. "In years to come, you are going to see briefs loaded up with this junk law," said Sanford Svetcov of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins in San Francisco, who voted against the move in the advisory committee. But Svetcov acknowledged that the momentum was strongly in favor of the rule change. "There was a freight train running downhill, with only me and Judge Kozinski standing in the way."

Stephen Barnett, emeritus law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, a leading proponent of the citation rule change, said that the Judicial Conference deserved credit for "refusing to be swayed by an elaborate letter-writing campaign from the 9th Circuit." The conference, he added, "has followed an extensive process of deliberation, research, and reason to a courageous and laudable result."

Lawyer Presses Expert Witness To Apologize During Vioxx Trial (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. -- A lawyer representing Merck & Co. in the second Vioxx trial pressed an expert witness for the plaintiff to apologize for earlier testimony in which he said the company put "profits before patients" and that executives "don't mind killing patients."

Stephen D. Raber, an attorney at Williams & Connolly LLP, of Washington, said pharmacology professor Benedict Lucchesi misinterpreted internal emails by Merck executives on which he based inflammatory comments during testimony on Friday.

"You owe them an apology," said Mr. Raber, who sometimes seemed frustrated and angered throughout his tense cross-examination of Dr. Lucchesi. "I don't think I offended them," responded Dr. Lucchesi, who didn't yield much ground to any of Mr. Raber's questioning.

The state-court trial began here last week. Frederick "Mike" Humeston, a postal worker from Boise, Idaho, is suing Merck, alleging Vioxx caused his heart attack in 2001 after he took the painkiller for two months.

Merck lost the first Vioxx trial in Texas state court last month. The Whitehouse Station, N.J., drug maker faces about 5,000 Vioxx lawsuits and could be liable for as much as $50 billion, analysts estimate.

Dr. Lucchesi spent much of the day on the stand yesterday deflecting Mr. Raber's questions. In several instances, Mr. Raber pleaded with Dr. Lucchesi to give a "straight answer" to his questions.

Later, Dr. Lucchesi reiterated his earlier opinion that Vioxx can cause heart attacks and strokes in some patients. Mr. Raber did establish that Dr. Lucchesi didn't read through all of the clinical studies Merck did on animals and humans before Vioxx was approved.

Mr. Raber used an easel and marker to write down the date of the Food and Drug Administration's initial approval of Vioxx and the three subsequent approval dates for additional uses that were received from May 1999 through August 2004. Next to each date he wrote "safe & effective."

Mr. Raber tried to defuse damaging internal emails from Merck scientists, including one from former executive Edward M. Scolnick, who wrote in March 2000 after reviewing data from a study that "the CV events are clearly there," referring to increased cardiovascular issues in some patients taking Vioxx. Mr. Raber presented a subsequent email from Dr. Scolnick from February 2001 that showed his view had changed. "We all worried to death about the CV events last spring," Dr. Scolnick wrote. "With all the data now available I am no longer worried."

When presented with this email, Dr. Lucchesi said, "I don't know what data he looked at. I don't know what convinced him."

North Korea Throws Nuclear Deal Into Doubt (FT)

By Anna Fifield, Guy Dinmore And Andrew Yeh

Financial Times, September 21, 2005

North Korea and the US on Tuesday disputed crucial details of their landmark six-party agreement reached just a day earlier, with Pyongyang declaring it would only give up its nuclear weapons after it received light-water reactors.

China, host to the talks, immediately played down the differences. President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea said his government, which has pledged to double North Korea's electricity supply, would mediate over the issue of timing.

North Korea's foreign ministry released a statement saying: "The US should not even dream of the issue of [North Korea's] dismantlement of its nuclear deterrent before providing light-water reactors, a physical guarantee for confidence-building."

The Bush administration immediately rejected the demand, and said the issue would be discussed at the next round of six-party talks in November.

"This was obviously not the agreement they signed and we will see what the coming weeks bring," the state department's Sean McCormack said.

But Christopher Hill, the chief US negotiator, told the Associated Press in Washington: "Life is too short to overreact to every statement coming out of Pyongyang. It obviously was not a helpful statement. But it was not unexpected, either."

Monday's joint statement of principles set out commitments by the six parties but did not address the crucial issues of verification and timing. Diplomats expect further disputes. North Korea pledged to "abandon" its nuclear weapons programmes, return soon to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and allow in UN inspectors.

The US affirmed it had no intention to attack North Korea, and said it would take steps to normalise relations. The US agreed, along with the other parties, to "discuss at an appropriate time" the provision of a light-water nuclear reactor to North Korea.

The Bush administration made clear that its interpretation of "an appropriate time" followed the complete dismantling of all North Korea's nuclear weapons and facilities.

Washington has been highly critical of the 1994 deal between the Clinton administration and Pyongyang which provided for construction of two reactors in return for a nuclear freeze.

"This has reinforced everything we feared about North Korea's promises, but no one expected them to shove it in everyone's faces within 24 hours," said Peter Beck of the International Crisis Group think-tank. "It doesn't mean they're ripping up the piece of paper, they just like to keep everyone guessing," he added.

US officials suggested that North Korea's demand could be directed at a domestic audience, to avoid suggestions that their leader, Kim Jong-il, was showing weakness by agreeing to disarm. They said Washington did not intend to become drawn into public wrangling over the agreement.

Nations Seek To Hold North Korea To Text Of Agreement (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

The United States, Russia and other nations urged North Korea yesterday to abide by a six-nation deal to dismantle its nuclear programs after the government in Pyongyang issued a statement that cast doubt on the agreement it had signed with great fanfare in Beijing on Monday.

North Korea, in a statement issued by an unnamed foreign ministry spokesman, said it would not begin to dismantle its nuclear programs until after it received a civilian nuclear reactor. That statement ran counter to the interpretation U.S. officials had offered of the agreement -- that a civilian nuclear reactor was only a distant possibility after North Korea had dismantled its programs and demonstrated its compliance.

"We will stick to the text of the Beijing [agreement], and I believe we can make progress if everybody sticks to what we agreed to," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters at the United Nations. At the same news conference, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov agreed, saying, "I also think we have to stick to the text of the agreement." Officials in Japan and China echoed those sentiments.

In its statement, North Korea asserted that the United States had been isolated on the issue of whether North Korea could pursue peaceful nuclear power, leaving it no choice but to withdraw its objection. Once the United States provides North Korea with a light-water reactor, the statement said, North Korea will return to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Christopher R. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, had predicted before he left Beijing that North Korea would issue such a statement, if only for face-saving domestic purposes. Other U.S. officials also said they were not alarmed, calling it a predictable propaganda stunt and saying North Korea's true intentions would be apparent when the talks resume in November.

Still, analysts and some U.S. officials privately said the North Korea statement demonstrated some of the pitfalls in the long-sought statement of principles. The statement outlined a series of goals -- such as North Korea abandoning its nuclear programs, normalizing relations, providing North Korea with energy aid -- but left unstated the sequence and timing of steps needed to achieve those goals.

The final stumbling block was North Korea's demand for a civilian nuclear reactor. The idea was anathema to the Bush administration, which came into office deeply skeptical of a 1994 agreement freezing North Korea's programs in exchange for two light-water reactors. The concrete had been poured for the $4 billion project, but it was terminated after the Bush administration accused North Korea in 2002 of violating the accord by conducting a clandestine nuclear program.

During the final round of talks, China proposed text that said North Korea "stated that it has the right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The other parties expressed their respect and agreed to discuss at an appropriate time the subject of the provision of light-water reactor" to North Korea.

Rice, working primarily with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon, then came up with a solution over the weekend -- that the text was acceptable as long as each party could offer its own interpretation of the sequencing. Hill, in his statement, made clear "appropriate time" would come at the end of the process -- if ever.

One senior U.S. official, asked if he believed North Korea really intended to give up its nuclear programs, paused and then said: "We'll see . . . we'll see."

U.S. Says North Korean Demand For Reactor Won't Derail Accord (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - The Bush administration on Tuesday brushed off a demand from North Korea for a light-water nuclear reactor, saying that the accord announced Monday in Beijing left it clear that the North must abandon its nuclear weapons program before such a matter can be discussed.

"I think we will not get hung up on this statement," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, referring to a comment from North Korea that it would continue to insist on getting a reactor up front, as a price for agreeing to the Beijing deal. "We will stick to the text of the Beijing statement, and I believe we can make progress if everybody sticks to what was actually agreed to," Ms. Rice added at a news briefing with the Russian foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov. Mr. Lavrov said that "we shouldn't rely on oral statements" from North Korea or others.

The Beijing agreement laid out a set of principles to guide discussions, which are scheduled to resume in November. The United States hailed the part of the accord in which North Korea agreed to abandon "all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs" and submit to international inspections.

In return, the United States agreed to join its four partners - Russia, Japan, South Korea and China - in providing security guarantees and economic incentives over time, according to the principle of "commitment for commitment, action for action."

Despite the efforts of American and other top officials to be positive about the Beijing agreement, the exchange about the nuclear reactor appeared to show that a wide gap remained between North Korea and, on the other side, the United States and its partners, on the very question that had stymied the talks for weeks.

In recent talks, North Korea had demanded, for its energy needs, a light-water reactor, of the sort promised in 1994 in return for an earlier agreement to freeze its nuclear programs. In 2002 the United States discovered that the North had reneged on that deal, and the Bush administration refused to supply such a reactor in any future arrangement.

The stalemate was resolved at the last minute over the weekend by China, which called on the United States to agree to discuss providing the North with a light-water reactor "at an appropriate time." Such a reactor is less efficient in producing weapons-grade fuel than a regular reactor.

Christopher R. Hill, the chief negotiator in the talks, said Tuesday that he was not surprised by North Korea's continued insistence on getting the reactor up front, but that the North understood that the American timetable for discussing the reactor was shared by the other countries in the talks.

"The North Koreans will make odd statements at their leisure, but they know precisely what the deal is," Mr. Hill said in an interview. "The deal with five other countries is that they have to get out of the nuclear business, and at an appropriate time to have discussions on a light-water reactor."

Mr. Hill said that he was untroubled by North Korea's statement and that work would begin soon on the next phase, which is a proposal for a way to verify that it is abandoning its nuclear ambitions.

But some experts who examined the Beijing accord said Tuesday that the problem of the light-water reactor would come back to haunt the negotiators.

"I never believed that the administration would ever, as a matter of principle, provide a light-water reactor," said Charles L. Pritchard, who negotiated with North Korea in President Bush's first term. "In this agreement, we've kept the door open in a false matter."

Mr. Pritchard said he now feared that the North Koreans might not come back to the negotiating table in November without assurances on the reactor.

But Mr. Hill said he fully expected North Korea to return to the talks and discuss how to implement the latest accord. That was also the view of the South Koreans and the Japanese.

"The light-water reactor was the major sticking point, and it remains the one sticking point still," said an Asian diplomat, asking that his country not be identified because of its rules barring discussions of negotiations. "These differences of opinion are somewhat worrisome."

He said he expected that North Korea would not agree immediately to resume talks in November, but that eventually China would persuade them to return.

U.S., Russia Tell Pyongyang To Stick To DealPublished (WT/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) -- The United States and Russia told North Korea yesterday to stick to an agreement to dismantle its nuclear-weapons program reached in six-party talks in Beijing and not insist on a light-water reactor first.

"I think that we will not get hung up on this statement" by Pyongyang, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters at the United Nations. "We will stick to the text of the Beijing [agreement], and I believe we can make progress if everybody sticks to what we agreed to."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov agreed, saying, "I also think we have to stick to the text of the agreement. ... The most important thing is to see that the agreement is carried out."

North Korea jeopardized a six-country deal on giving up its nuclear arms less than 24 hours after the pact was announced by vowing yesterday to keep the weapons until Washington provides the communist state with a civilian nuclear power plant.

In the agreement signed Monday in Beijing, North Korea agreed to scrap its nuclear programs in return for aid and recognition of its right to a civilian nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0007120

The six countries -- China, the United States, North Korea, Russia, South Korea and Japan -- agreed to discuss providing a light-water reactor (LWR) "at an appropriate time."

But the North took a different stance yesterday.

"The U.S. should not even dream of the issue of the DPRK's dismantlement of its nuclear deterrent before providing LWRs," it said in a statement published by the Korean Central News Agency. "This is our just and consistent stand as solid as a deeply rooted rock."

DPRK is short for the North's official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. Light-water reactors are used to make electricity that experts say are more proliferation-resistant than other reactors.

China asked all sides to fulfill their promises. Seoul said it would take the lead role in bridging the gap between the United States and North Korea.

President Bush spoke with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun yesterday and both agreed that verification that North Korea has abandoned its nuclear weapons program is "critical" for implementing the recent agreement, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

The United States and others were following the sequencing as specified in the accord, Mr. McClellan said.

"Now, if North Korea needs some time to reflect on that agreement, we'll give it to them. But all the parties are operating off the agreement that was signed by North Korea and all the others," he said.

Japan saw a possible negotiating ploy in North Korea's assertions.

"We must watch North Korea closely to see if there is really a fundamental difference on that point," Japanese Chief Cabinet spokesman Hiroyuki Hosoda told reporters. "If we are completely at odds, that will mean going back to the beginning. But we do not believe that is the case."

Meanwhile Japanese Foreign Minister Nobutaka Machimura said yesterday that Japan and North Korea will resume bilateral talks soon on Pyongyang's nuclear weapons, missile program and abductions of Japanese citizens. The meeting would restart negotiations that have been stalled for nearly a year.

Japan has been eager to reopen the talks in hopes of resolving the cases of Japanese citizens kidnapped by North Korea in the 1970s and '80s. North Korea, meanwhile, could benefit from Japanese aid, investment and trade.

The United States, backed by Japan, had long argued that North Korea could not be trusted with atomic energy because it had broken a previous deal to halt weapons development.

But China, South Korea and Russia said that if Pyongyang scrapped its nuclear weapons and agreed to strict safeguards, it should have such an energy program in the future.

Longtime Statesman Puts Best Face Forward For U.S. (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, who over the weekend as chief U.S. negotiator reached a tentative agreement with North Korea on ending its nuclear programs, was a fresh-faced 21-year-old Peace Corps volunteer in Cameroon when he learned his first lesson in diplomacy.

Hill's job in 1973 was to ride around on a Suzuki dirt bike and audit the books of credit unions in 28 villages and plantations. He discovered one board of directors had taken 60 percent of the money, so he gave an impassioned speech denouncing the malfeasance to hundreds of villagers sitting on a mountainside. His presentation was met with applause and gratitude -- and then the assembled group immediately reelected everyone he had just condemned.

"I realized I didn't know beans about what was going on in this tea plantation," Hill recalled over breakfast recently. It turned out the board reflected a careful amalgam of tribal interests, and it didn't matter whether it ran a good credit union or not.

The lesson, according to Hill: "When something's happened, it's happened for a reason and you do your best to understand that reason. But don't necessarily think you can change it."

Hill, with a dry wit and easy manner, has taken that adage to heart during more than two decades of difficult diplomatic assignments in the foreign service, shuttling back and forth between Asia and Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0007121

During the Clinton administration, Hill was a key negotiator in the Dayton Peace Accords that ended the Bosnian war, and he played an important role in the crisis over Kosovo. He was ambassador to Macedonia when protesters attacked the U.S. Embassy in 1999 over NATO airstrikes in Yugoslavia.

The embassy in Macedonia, unlike most overseas missions, had never been given Marine guards. The protesters quickly overran the guard posts and began to use the embassy flagpole as a battering ram. When a top State Department official called Hill during the crisis to ask where his Marines were, Hill sardonically noted he didn't have any -- but there were Marines at the embassy in Luxembourg.

Former U.N. ambassador Richard C. Holbrooke, who described Hill as "brilliant, fearless and argumentative" in his book on the Dayton negotiations, said that Hill manages to be both "very cool and very passionate." This unique combination, he said, enhances Hill's "extremely good negotiating skills."

Hill also has an easy familiarity with the media. In a city where scores of officials hide behind the cloak of anonymity in speaking to journalists, Hill prefers to speak on the record. He conducted two or three news conferences a day during the talks in Beijing.

The son of a foreign service officer, Hill's first posting was in Belgrade. He had lived there as a child and remembers playing with the daughter of the U.S. ambassador, the legendary George F. Kennan.

Hill has a knack for attracting high-profile sponsors. He was a rising star during the Clinton administration, winning his first ambassadorship on the recommendation of the president of Macedonia. Then he came to President Bush's attention when the president of Poland lavishly praised Hill's performance as ambassador there and requested that Hill stay on.

Some former Clinton administration officials say that Hill sometimes appeared to exceed his negotiating instructions, or at least have a creative interpretation of them. And some conservative officials in the current administration are not happy with the deal he reached in Beijing with North Korea -- and were openly gleeful yesterday when Pyongyang appeared to try to wiggle out of the deal.

Hill had long sought to be ambassador to South Korea, and he finally got there last year. But then Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plucked him for his current job after he had been there just eight months.

In Seoul, Hill broke with diplomatic precedent -- and charmed the South Korean public -- by repeatedly visiting universities and other hotbeds of anti-Americanism to give speeches and have debates. He established a cyber chat room and personally answered questions from Koreans under the name "ambassador." He caused a stir by paying respects at a memorial for thousands of civilians who were fired upon by the then-military government in a 1980 massacre. Many Koreans has suspected that the U.S. government had backed the attack, and no senior U.S. official had ever before visited the cemetery in Gwangju.

"He was here the shortest term among the six ambassadors that I've seen here in my 18 years, but had the most impact," said Tami Overby, a senior official with the American Chamber of Commerce in South Korea. "He was a rule-breaker, always willing to challenge."

Hill jokes that he feels like "assistant secretary for North Korea," but his current post gives him responsibility for U.S. policy toward countries across the Pacific region, including China, Japan and Indonesia. Much as he hated to leave Seoul, he said, Rice's offer was "truly an offer I couldn't refuse."

Hill's experience brings him connections across the globe. While ambassador to Poland, Hill got to know the South Korean ambassador at the time -- Song Min Soon -- who then became the chief South Korean negotiator at the North Korean disarmament talks. The two have joked to Rice that they formed a "Warsaw pact" during the talks.

"He's really a man who wants to do something, not just managing things," Song said in an telephone interview from Seoul. "We jointly determined we would make history, rather than sitting idle on the floor of history."

Rice has given Hill significant negotiating authority, and he said he worked closely with her in structuring the compromise that resulted in this week's agreement. Essentially, it allowed both sides to offer its own interpretation of a crucial clause, allowing a deal to be announced -- but with the essential dispute fundamentally unresolved.

Hill said his years in diplomacy had convinced him that "people are neither as bad as they look nor as good as they look." So, as a negotiator, he tries to suspend value judgments as he analytically tries to figure out the other side's goals -- and whether you can "allow that other side to fulfill its objectives in a way that is consistent with your interests."

DOJ_NMG_0007122

The Bush administration has long been bitterly divided over North Korea policy, but Hill shrugs off any difficulties over managing the competing demands of the State Department, Pentagon and White House.

"Your best diplomacy should start at home," he said. "As a professional diplomat, if I can't deal with that, then what am I doing talking to foreigners?"

A Skeptical View (WSJ)

By Nicholas Eberstadt

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Contrary to conventional wisdom, which holds the North Korean state to be an unremittingly hostile "negotiating partner," history actually demonstrates that Pyongyang can be a highly obliging interlocutor under certain very specific conditions. All that is necessary to "get to yes" with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea is to concede every important point demanded by the North Korean side while sacrificing vital interests of one's own.

Monday's "breakthrough" at the six-party talks in Beijing would appear to conform precisely to this long-established pattern. The vaunted outcome -- a long-desired "consensus statement" inked by North Korea and the other five governments engaged in protracted discussions over North Korean denuclearization -- is being celebrated by diplomatic sophisticates in Seoul, Beijing, Moscow, Tokyo and Washington.

Enthusiasts contend that the North Korean regime, after two years of tough talks with five other countries united in the desire to force it to dismantle its nuclear weapons program, has at last agreed to a step-by-step process that will eventually resolve the crisis. In reality, nothing of the sort has taken place. A careful reading of the Sept. 19 joint statement suggests instead that North Korean negotiators have just achieved a stunning advance in their government's quest to "normalize" its nuclear weapons program. There's also been equally momentous progress in Pyongyang's longstanding campaign to sunder the U.S.-South Korean military alliance. Wittingly or otherwise, the U.S. negotiating team has executed an apparent cave-in -- embracing precepts crucial to North Korean objectives but inimical to Washington's own.

To appreciate the full significance of this joint statement, one need only dwell on two of its precepts: The first is North Korea's now-internationally ratified "peaceful right to the uses of nuclear energy," and the second is the purportedly common "goal of … verifiable denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula." According to the joint statement, North Korea "stated that it has the right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The other parties expressed their respect and agreed to discuss at an appropriate time the subject of the provision of [a] light-water reactor to the DPRK." There is a problem with this declaration, though. Pyongyang's "peaceful nuclear energy program" is, as almost everyone knows, an entirely imaginary animal -- akin to the unicorn.

Although North Korea's nuclear program extends back decades, and entailed terrible expense for its people (it continued through the great famine of the '90s, despite international agreements to "freeze" it), there is no evidence whatever to suggest that North Korea attempted to harness the atom for civilian purposes. The reactors at Yongbyon -- the site that initially attracted world concern about Pyongyang's nuclear intentions -- were never hooked up to the country's electrical energy grid, nor are they today. They have been exclusively used for harvesting weapons-grade plutonium.

Moreover, North Korea has been caught out (through classified intelligence reports, but also via acknowledgments from Pakistan's Pervez Musharraf, whose country's scientists collaborated with Pyongyang) in an illicit program to manufacture highly enriched uranium. This was the trigger to the latest round of the DPRK nuclear crisis, commencing in October 2002.

North Korea's nuclear record is unique. Not only is it the only state ever to withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, but North Korea's is also without doubt the contemporary government that has striven hardest and most consistently to mislead the international community about its nuclear capabilities. Under such circumstances, "respecting" its right to pursue a "peaceful" nuclear program in effect offers Pyongyang carte blanche to continue stockpiling an atomic arsenal.

Washington initially resisted the DPRK's surreal proposal for an international acceptance of "peaceful North Korean nuclear power." Once the Chinese and South Korean governments indicated that they were prepared to endorse this fiction, however, the U.S. government signed on, too. As to the endorsed "goal of … verifiable denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula," this formula conjoins the objective of dismantling the North's nukes with the notion of making South Korea nuke-free. But since the latter has never made nuclear weapons -- and since all U.S. nuclear weapons were removed from there 15 years ago -- how is the corollary to work?

Pyongyang's rhetorical syllogism depends entirely upon the existence of the U.S.-Seoul military alliance. So long as the U.S. is treaty-bound to South Korea's defense, Pyongyang maintains that any and all means of American security protections -- including nuclear guarantees -- naturally cover the South. In this logic, the only way by which the southern portion of the Korean peninsula can be "denuclearized" is by severing the U.S.-South Korean military alliance; by withdrawing all U.S. forces from South Korea; and by leaving South Korea outside the U.S. security perimeter (as it seemed to be in early 1950).

The Beijing joint statement of "common understanding" is being described as a defeat for Bush administration hardliners (who favor regime-change in North Korea) and a victory for administration moderates (who prefer diplomatic engagement). In fact, it is a loss for both camps. After all, the cause of engagement with North Korea is undermined -- not promoted -- by uncritically embracing a flawed schema for a diplomatic resolution of the nuclear crisis.

The future of the six-party talks, as always, remains uncertain. But negotiations between the U.S. and North Korea -- whether in bilateral or multilateral forums -- have always been zero-sum deals. At present Pyongyang seems to be reaping tremendous gains. North Korea can therefore rightly view Monday's joint statement as a diplomatic triumph -- a multilateral broadening, and political deepening, of the gains from the Clinton-era "Agreed Framework." This joint statement affirms all of the "rewards-for-freeze" precepts that helped to finance the survival of the state -- and the development of nuclear weaponry -- in the earlier 1994 accord. But not only has the world now seen the failure of the earlier North Korean nonproliferation accords; it has also witnessed a new administration in Washington -- purportedly cognizant of all the earlier U.S. mistakes -- make those mistakes all over again.

Sanction Call Provokes A New Threat From Iran (WP/AP)

By Ali Akbar Darein, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

TEHRAN, Sept. 20 -- Iran on Tuesday threatened to resume enriching uranium and barring open inspections of its nuclear facilities if a meeting of the U.N. atomic watchdog agency decides to refer Iran to the Security Council for possible sanctions.

However, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, offered European negotiators a new round of talks, saying the world should give Tehran's new government a chance to reach a political understanding.

At the International Atomic Energy Agency board meeting in Vienna, European officials prepared a draft resolution that would refer Iran to the Security Council for alleged "failures and breaches of its obligations to comply" with the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

But opposition by Russia could delay the vote until a later meeting of the 35-member board, diplomats in Vienna said.

Larijani criticized the discussion in Vienna, saying that nuclear technology has become a matter of national pride and that the Iranian government would not compromise over its right to enrich uranium.

"If they want to speak with Iran with the language of force, Iran will have no choice, in order to preserve its technological achievements, to get out of the framework" of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, Larijani said at a news conference.

Larijani did not appear to be calling for Iran to pull out of the treaty completely but rather to suspend the protocol that allows unfettered, short-notice inspections of nuclear facilities.

He warned that Iran's response would be the same if the IAEA tried to impose deadlines.

"If they set a deadline, it will, from Iran's point of view, make no difference from being referred to the U.N. Security Council, and Iran will react in the same manner," Larijani said.

Britain, Germany and France, negotiating on behalf of the European Union, have drafted a resolution demanding Iran be referred to the council. China and Russia -- both Security Council members with veto power -- oppose hauling Iran before the U.N.'s top decision-making body. The Europeans also face opposition from other members of the IAEA board of governors, which convened Monday to discuss Iran's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0007124

The IAEA has been trying to determine whether gaps in Iranian reporting on more than 18 years of clandestine nuclear activity constitute attempts to hide ambitions to produce weapons in what Iran insists is a purely civilian program to generate electricity. Establishing such intent would bolster arguments by U.S. officials for a tougher international stance against Iran.

Iran Warns Against Referral Of Nuclear Issue To The U.N. (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

TEHRAN, Sept. 20 - Iran's chief nuclear negotiator warned Tuesday that the country would resume enriching uranium and restrict United Nations inspectors from critical information if the United States and its allies used the "language of threat" by referring Iran to the Security Council.

The negotiator's threat, which appeared to be backed by Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, came as a confidential draft resolution circulating at the governing board of the International Atomic Energy Agency included a call for the Security Council to take up "Iran's many failures and breaches of its obligations." But the draft makes no specific reference to sanctions, which are still opposed by China and Russia, both of which hold veto power in the Council. A copy of the resolution was provided to The New York Times by an official involved in the behind-the-scenes diplomacy over how the board should deal with Iran at its meeting this week.

The comments by the Iranian negotiator, Ali Larijani, in a news conference here on Tuesday were the first time that Iran had explicitly threatened to cut off inspections and resume enriching uranium - which it insists will be used for civilian reactor fuel, not nuclear weapons - if the atomic agency's board acts.

Mr. Larijani, who is also secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, is newly appointed to his post as negotiator on nuclear issues, and the news conference was his first since President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office last month. In a fiery speech on Saturday in front of the United Nations General Assembly, Mr. Ahmadinejad criticized the United States and its allies and vowed to press ahead with Iran's nuclear program, noting that it had a right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to produce nuclear fuel. The Bush administration maintains that Iran gave up that right by hiding, for more than 17 years, a range of nuclear activities that United Nations inspectors only discovered with the help of intelligence agencies and Iranian dissidents.

Last week in New York, the senior State Department official on nonproliferation, Robert Joseph, briefed seven nations on the I.A.E.A.'s board about evidence that the United States has collected that it says shows that Iran's missiles could be used to launch nuclear warheads, according to a senior administration official, who insisted on anonymity because he was discussing intelligence matters. Among the countries that received the briefing were Ghana, Argentina and India. But American officials insist that the briefings were classified, and they have declined to make public the details of their suspicions.

Iran's threat came only 24 hours after the United States and North Korea reached an agreement in principle for the North to give up its nuclear weapons and all other nuclear facilities. But that accord seemed in jeopardy within hours of its signing, and it is being closely watched by Iranian officials.

Mr. Larijani said the world should learn a lesson from the case of North Korea, which American intelligence officials believe has produced fuel enough for six or eight weapons. He said the Bush administration's efforts to isolate the North had failed. "What was the result of such tough policies?" he asked. "After two years they ended up accepting its program, so you should accept ours right now," he said.

American officials say they have never accepted the North's weapons program; Mr. Larijani may have been referring to President Bush's decision to discuss allowing the North to keep a light-water reactor.

What was striking to several American experts interviewed Tuesday was that Iran's threats seemed to be drawn from the strategy that North Korea pursued three years ago, when it was confronted by American allegations that it had started a second, clandestine nuclear program to evade a freeze on nuclear activities that it had negotiated with the Clinton administration in 1994. At the end of 2002, the North threw out international inspectors and withdrew from the nonproliferation treaty, though Iran has not threatened to go that far.

"The North Koreans were using the Iranian example as well, saying that if they are allowed to keep a reactor, why can't we?" said Jack Pritchard, a former State Department official who dealt with the North and left the department in disagreement with the Bush administration's strategy. "Having these negotiations with North Korea and Iran take place simultaneously means that both countries use the other's tactics, and I'm sure the administration wished that was not happening."

Ayatollah Khamenei, Iran's religious leader, said in a statement read on state television on Tuesday, "The great Iranian nation today, stronger than before and with a determined will to reach its aims and goals, stands solidly and will not surrender to any sort of pressure and threat."

Mr. Larijani emphasized that the ability to enrich uranium was Iran's right under the nonproliferation treaty. The United States and Iran's three European negotiating partners, Germany, Britain and France, have insisted that Iran not be allowed to do so, however, because the enrichment process can also be used to produce weapons.

"If they want to use the language of force against Iran, Iran will definitely review its relations with the nuclear agency and its commitments to N.P.T.," he said. "If they want to use the language of threat, or send Iran's case to the Security Council, Iran will think twice about implementing the Additional Protocol and will resume uranium enrichment."

The Additional Protocol is an addendum to the treaty that allows the I.A.E.A. to conduct intrusive inspections of sites that a country has not declared are part of its nuclear program. Iran adopted it in 2003 and started carrying out its procedures, but the Parliament has not ratified it.

Mr. Larijani also rejected calls for a deadline for the country to stop work at the fuel-conversion facility at Isfahan, saying that setting a deadline was equal to sending Iran's case to the Security Council. "Pressuring a country like this is resisting a country's national pride," he said, referring to the country's achievements in nuclear science and compared it with nationalization of oil in the 1950's. "Two years of negotiations and hiding intentions has made Iran frustrated and it seems that the three European countries have humiliated Iranian people," he said.

To reach a compromise, the three European countries have insisted that Iran freeze its enrichment of uranium fuel, but have promised to provide the country with fuel for its plants. Control would remain in European hands.

Mr. Larijani said Tuesday that that was not acceptable. "There is no international guarantee that governments would provide us with nuclear fuel," he said. "We cannot lay the fate of this nation in the hands of other governments."

Both President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have said in recent days that they think a referral of Iran to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions is nearly certain but its timing is not.

"I am quite certain that at some point in time Iran is going to be referred to the Security Council, particularly if Iran continues to demonstrate that it is not prepared to give the international community assurances that is not going to try to build nuclear weapons under cover of civil power," Ms. Rice said.

Rice Urges Israel To Aid Palestinian Election (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Israel on Tuesday to allow Palestinians to carry out their legislative elections in January without Israeli interference, implicitly criticizing Ariel Sharon, the Israeli prime minister.

During a visit to New York last week, Mr. Sharon said he would withhold cooperation with the Palestinian legislative elections if candidates from the militant group Hamas took part. Both he and Palestinian leaders said elections could not be held without Israeli cooperation.

"This is going to be a Palestinian process," Ms. Rice said after a meeting here to discuss the Middle East, "and I think we have to give the Palestinians some room for the evolution of their political process.

"We hope that the elections can go forward and that everyone will work to make those elections go forward."

Mr. Sharon's assertion puts the Bush administration in the awkward position of having to choose between its two most important foreign policy goals: fighting terrorism and spreading democracy in the Arab world. Ms. Rice met with representatives from the United Nations, the European Union and Russia, a group known as the quartet that is focused on settling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The meeting was called with the idea that it would be used to congratulate Mr. Sharon for the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and to discuss moving the Middle East peace effort forward. And while the officials did congratulate Israel, much of their final statement and individual remarks at a news conference afterward came in response to several provocative statements Mr. Sharon made last week.

American officials widely saw the statements as potential setbacks for the peace effort. Israeli officials seized upon one line in the quartet's final statement, saying it supported Mr. Sharon's position on the Palestinian elections.

"We also agreed that, ultimately, those who want to be part of the political process should not engage in armed group or militia activities," the statement said.

But a senior Bush administration official who is involved in the issue said, "The word 'ultimately' was chosen carefully." Israel should allow the election take place, he added, and the Palestinians ultimately should disarm Hamas. American officials seized on a different statement in Mr. Sharon's speech to the United Nations General Assembly last week. Mr. Sharon said Israel would pursue the peace effort "in accordance with the sequence of the road map," as the peace plan that the United States and its allies proposed in 2003 is called.

But the day after Mr. Sharon gave that speech, he seemed to belie that pledge when he made a new pronouncement on West Bank settlements. He declared that Israel would not freeze growth in any of those settlements until the very end of the peace effort, years from now. The road map calls on Israel to freeze growth in the settlements as one of the first Israeli actions in its sequence of prescribed steps.

The Palestinians have still to take the first step outlined for them in the road map: ending violence and disarming militant groups. The quartet urged them "to maintain law and order and dismantle terrorist capabilities and infrastructure."

Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, has invited Hamas and Islamic Jihad, a similar group, to take part in the elections, saying participation in the political process could serve to moderate their behavior. Hamas is fielding candidates in the election, but there seems to be little evidence yet that the group has moderated its behavior.

In a speech to the General Assembly on Tuesday, Silvan Shalom, the Israeli foreign minister, noted that "two days ago in Gaza, the terrorist organization Hamas held a rally of 10,000 armed men dedicated to a holy war against Israel."

Hamas has claimed responsibility for some of the deadliest suicide bombings in Israel that have killed hundreds of civilians over the last few years, and its charter calls for the elimination of Israel.

With all these conflicts in the air, diplomats and American officials said they would wait before making any decisions about how to move forward. Later this month, Mr. Sharon's party, Likud, will hold a central committee meeting to determine whether it is time to choose a new leader. That could lead to new elections.

"There is a political development on the Israeli side," Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, said during the quartet news conference, adding that "we are not sure whether it leads to elections or not," and "want to see that settled before one takes any other bold initiatives."

At U.N., Sharon Is Praised For Gaza Pullout (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 -- The United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union on Tuesday praised Israeli leader Ariel Sharon for showing what they called "political courage" by ending Israel's 38-year occupation of Gaza with the peaceful withdrawal of Israeli troops and settlers.

The high-level coordinating group on Middle East peace -- known as the quartet -- also voiced "appreciation" to the Palestinian Authority for keeping the peace during the withdrawal, but in the same statement pressed the authority to crack down on Palestinian militants. U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan appealed to Palestinians seeking to participate in the political process not to participate in "armed group or militia activities."

But Annan and the quartet stopped short of supporting an Israeli demand that the Islamic Resistance Movement, a militant group also known as Hamas, be excluded from legislative elections scheduled for January.

The quartet meeting -- which included Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw -- met on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly in an effort to reinvigorate the Palestinian and Israeli peace process.

DOJ_NMG_0007127

The group urged Palestinian and Israeli leaders to resume negotiations on the U.S.-backed "road map," a political blueprint outlining a path toward a final and comprehensive settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The group also applauded the role of the U.S. security adviser, Lt. Gen. William Ward, in coordinating the Israeli and Palestinian security agencies to ensure Israel's bloodless evacuation from Gaza.

"This meeting was very focused on how to move ahead, how to take the momentum of what has been a successful disengagement from the Gaza to build institutions that will form the foundation of a Palestinian state," Rice said after the meeting.

Rice said the group discussed a proposal by former World Bank president James D. Wolfensohn, President Bush's envoy on aid to the Palestinian territories, to invest "substantial sums of money" into public works projects that "improve the economic prospects of the Palestinian people."

Rice joined other quartet partners in voicing concern over Israel's construction of a security barrier separating the Israeli and Palestinian populations, and she urged Sharon's government to halt the establishment of new Israeli settlements on Palestinian lands.

Today's meeting capped a rare week of diplomatic plaudits at the United Nations for Israel, which is traditionally the subject of censure by its European critics and Arab adversaries in the General Assembly and the Security Council.

Sharon was greeted last week with a handshake at the United Nations by Gen. Pervez Musharraf, president of Pakistan, a tough critic of Israel. The exchange followed an unusual high-level meeting between the two countries' foreign ministers in Istanbul. The meeting was brokered by Turkey, one of Israel's closest allies in the Muslim world.

Pakistan and other Muslim countries previously shunned Israel, and some of Israel's Arab adversaries have portrayed Sharon as a warmonger and war criminal.

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom sought to parlay Israel's Gaza withdrawal into broader diplomatic recognition in the Muslim world. He also announced Israel's intention to seek a Security Council seat, although the first opportunity will not arise until 2017.

Shalom said Tuesday in an address to the General Assembly that he has met with more than 10 foreign ministers from the Muslim world, including publicly announced sessions with Tunisia's and Qatar's foreign ministers. The contacts, he noted, are growing "at a rate never seen before."

"Unfortunately, many of our ties with the Arab and Muslim world are still deep in the shadows, away from the public eye," he said. "Today, I call on my Arab and Muslim colleagues to bring our contacts into the light of day."

Although several Arab leaders and ministers publicly welcomed Israel's Gaza pullout, they also demanded that Israel complete its withdrawal from all the Arab lands it has captured since the 1967 Arab-Israeli war.

Kuwait's foreign minister, Sabah Salem Sabah, said Tuesday that Israel's action should be viewed as a "first step" leading to an end of Israel's occupation of all Arab lands and to the establishment of a Palestinian capital in East Jerusalem.

U.S. Pressures Syria To Fall In Line On Lebanon, Iraq (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — The United States is increasing pressure on Syria, using harsher words and pointed diplomacy to get President Bashar Assad's government to stop aiding Iraqi insurgents.

Recently, Bush administration officials met for the second time with a Syrian opposition leader who favors Assad's replacement by a democratic government.

At the United Nations on Monday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice chaired a meeting on shoring up Lebanese democracy that excluded Syria, long the power broker there, and Emile Lahoud, Lebanon's Syrian-backed president.

Last week, President Bush said the United States would work with allies to further isolate Syria, already subject to U.S. trade and investment sanctions. The U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, accused Syria of harboring training camps for insurgents and said U.S. patience was running out.

Several Syria experts say the Bush administration has started to plan for a Syria without Assad at its helm, but some warn that the alternatives could be even worse.

DOJ_NMG_0007128

"The administration is scouting," says Kenneth Katzman, a Middle East expert at the Congressional Research Service in Washington. "There's no Chalabi out there," he adds, referring to Ahmad Chalabi, an Iraqi exile leader who promoted the overthrow of Saddam Hussein and is now a deputy prime minister in Iraq.

Last month, Farid Ghadry, a Syrian-American who heads an opposition group called the Reform Party of Syria, met for an hour with the head of the National Security Council's Middle East section.

Ghadry says he and Michael Scott Doran discussed the "transition from an autocracy to a democracy and why a transitional parliament is an important element" of that change. It was his second meeting with U.S. officials; in March, he went to the State Department to discuss Syria's future.

His party claims to have offices in 18 countries, including an underground office in Syria, and operates a Cyprus-based radio station that broadcasts into Syria.

U.S. officials began anticipating the fall of Assad when Syrian troops were forced to withdraw from Lebanon in April after the Feb. 14 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, Katzman says.

Hariri supporters charge that Syria was behind the murder. A U.N. investigation has led to the arrest of four pro-Syrian Lebanese security officials. Investigators led by German Judge Detlev Mehlis went to Damascus on Tuesday to interview Syrian officials about the crime.

The meetings with Ghadry and the administration's decision to grant visas to two Syrian reformers to attend a May conference in Washington show the administration is in "the very early stages" of planning for regime change in Syria, Katzman says.

Appropriations bills for the fiscal year that begins in October promote democracy in Syria, he says. A House version allocates as much as $1.5 million; the Senate version does not specify an amount.

U.S. officials want Assad out of power because they don't believe he will stop the flow of fighters from Syria to Iraq, says Flynt Leverett, a former member of the National Security Council in the Clinton and current Bush administrations.

Administration officials declined repeated requests for comment. In the New York Post on Thursday, Rice said the U.S. intention was still to change Syria's behavior. "But we'll see whether or not the Syrian government is smart enough to take that course," she said.

Monday, she told reporters at the U.N. that "Syria needs to get on the right side of events" by stopping interference in Lebanon and ending support for Palestinian militants and Iraqi insurgents.

Syria denies it is helping Iraqi insurgents. The United States is not patrolling the border, while Syria has stationed 10,000 troops there, says Buthaina Shabaan, Syria's minister of expatriates and an adviser to Assad. Instead of pushing for Assad's removal, Americans should ask whether "promoting violence and war is the right way to change countries and bring freedom and democracy," she says. "Are they satisfied with the results in Iraq?"

Theodore Kattouf, U.S. ambassador to Syria until September 2003, warns of a power vacuum, leading to chaos, or a worse leader, such as Assad's uncle Rifaat.

Exiled by Assad's late father, Rifaat Assad has long sought power but would be an unlikely ally for the Bush administration. In 1982, he led a brutal crackdown on Islamic fundamentalists in the Syrian city of Hama. An estimated 20,000 people were killed.

Murhaf Jouejati, a Syrian-American professor of political science at George Washington University, says Rifaat Assad is extremely unpopular in Syria and that the secular opposition is weak. Jouejati calls Ghadry a "Chalabi mini-me." The fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood would take advantage of any instability, he says. "The Bush administration wants regime change but cannot find a viable alternative."

Frustration with Assad has been building since the United States invaded Iraq in March 2003. Edward Djerejian, U.S. ambassador to Syria under the first Bush administration, met with Assad in January and urged him to cooperate, just as his father did during the Gulf War in 1991. "He has not made a strategic decision to do so," says Djerejian, director of the Baker Institute for Public Policy at Rice University.

US Uses 'Libya Model' To Boost Pressure On Syria (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

BEIRUT - Once considered key to Middle East stability, Syria is facing growing marginalization as the United States maintains a policy of unrelenting pressure against the Baathist regime.

American and Iraqi officials have stepped up their criticism of Syria in recent days in what some analysts believe is the beginning of an attempt by Washington to repeat the "Libya model" - total political and economic isolation to compel a U-turn in regime behavior.

"They are going to grab Syria by the throat and squeeze and shake, and see what kind of change falls out of the Syrian pockets.... It's going to be the harshest isolation they can manufacture," says Joshua Landis, a professor of Middle Eastern studies at the University of Oklahoma, presently based in Damascus and author of Syriacomment.com.

These are lonely times for Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. His planned trip to attend the United Nations summit in New York last week was cancelled at the last minute amid clear indications that he would not be welcome in the United States.

By contrast, leading Lebanese officials, who a few months ago were at the forefront of the anti-Syrian opposition in Lebanon, were feted in New York.

On Monday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted a multilateral gathering in support of Lebanon that brought together UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan and the foreign ministers of Britain, France, and Russia, among others. They agreed to sponsor an international donor conference for Lebanon in November and encourage Lebanese domestic reforms while furthering Syria's international isolation.

US and Iraqi officials have accused Damascus of failing to prevent militants from crossing into neighboring Iraq to join the insurgency. President Bush warned last week that President Assad must understand that the US "takes his lack of action [on stopping insurgents] seriously."

If persistent US pressure is not enough, Assad also faces the disagreeable prospect that some of his closest regime colleagues could be implicated in a UN report into the assassination of Rafik Hariri, a former Lebanese prime minister who was killed in February. Tuesday, Detlev Mehlis, a German prosecutor who heads the UN investigation commission, traveled to Damascus to interview several senior Syrian military intelligence officers who were serving in Lebanon when Mr. Hariri was killed.

Four senior pro-Syrian Lebanese intelligence and security chiefs were arrested last month on suspicion of involvement in the assassination. The release of Mr. Mehlis's conclusions are expected at the end of October. If the report implicates senior Syrian officials, it could lead to UN sanctions and the severing of diplomatic relations with the US and European countries.

The effect, according to analysts, would be to recreate the economic and diplomatic embargo slapped on Libya in the 1990s. Isolating the pariah state eventually persuaded Libyan leader Col. Muammar Qaddafi to seek a return to the international fold.

US officials often refer to Syria as "low-hanging fruit" - requiring little effort to pick off. Yet, perhaps the Syrian regime's greatest defense is the lack of an organized and credible opposition that could ease into power if the ruling Baath Party was overthrown. Syria's sectarian and ethnic mix is as potentially turbulent as Iraq's, and many analysts say it's only the Baath Party's ruthless grip on society that has ensured stability.

Still, a weak opposition may have resulted in a false sense of confidence.

"They still act with the mentality of the Clinton era, when they were treated like the strongest regional power," says Sami Moubayed, a Syrian political analyst. "That is why they are reacting somewhat passively to the crisis with Washington, saying to themselves and to those around them: This won't last. They won't hit us. The neighboring scenario in Iraq just strengthens their argument" that there is no alternative to the Baath Party, he says.

Senate Votes To Retain Ban On Japanese Beef (WSJ/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0007130

Angry with Japan for refusing to lift a mad cow-related ban on U.S. beef, senators retaliated by voting to retain a ban on Japanese beef.

Once the biggest customer of American beef, importing more than $1.5 billion in 2003, Japan has refused to allow the purchase of U.S. beef since the nation's first case of mad-cow disease was confirmed in Washington state almost two years ago. Last fall, Japan agreed to remove the ban but still hasn't done so.

In June, U.S. authorities confirmed a second domestic case in a Texas-born cow. Japan, in contrast, has found 20 cases of mad-cow disease. U.S. regulators proposed last month to partially lift the ban on Japanese beef.

Senators adopted, on a 72-26 vote, an amendment by Sen. Ben Nelson (D., Neb.) prohibiting importation of Japanese beef until Japan lifts its ban. They adopted a similar, nonbinding measure by Sen. Wayne Allard (R., Colo.) on a voice vote.

Opponents of the amendment said trade decisions about food safety should be based on science, not on restrictions in Japan or other countries.

"And when we expect trading partners to respect science, we should be willing to do the same," said Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa). "So I don't support depriving the Department of Agriculture with the funding it needs to make decisions based on sound science even while we need to send a loud and clear message to Japan."

Japan's food safety panel issued a draft report last week saying U.S. cows faced higher risk of exposure to mad-cow disease than Japanese cows because of insufficient feed controls in the 1980s and 1990s, the Kyodo News agency reported.

Eating infected beef is believed to cause variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, a fatal brain disorder that has killed more than 150 people, mostly in Britain in the 1990s.

Bush's Trade Talks Enthusiasm Welcomed (FT)

By Peter Mandelson

Financial Times, September 21, 2005

From Mr Peter Mandelson.

Sir, With reference to your report of Thabo Mbeki's comments on the Doha round ("Mbeki tells rich world to end farm subsidies", September 17) and comments of mine on President George W. Bush's pledge to end all US tariffs, subsidies and trade barriers if others did the same: I suggested some would regard such a proposition as playing to the gallery, but I did not say this was my view.

On the contrary, I welcome President Bush's personal engagement and bold ambition for the current World Trade Organisation trade talks.

There is no alternative if this round is to deliver what we set out to achieve. My message to President Bush and other leaders is: yes to ambitious goals, but then let us take practical steps to deliver.

I suggest two ways to do just that. In the area of tariffs, let us agree at the WTO ministerial meeting in Hong Kong to eliminate all tariffs and quotas on imports from the poorer countries of the world.

In the area of subsidies, the European Union's Common Agricultural Policy reform will allow us to lower trade-distorting payouts significantly as well as eliminate agricultural export subsidies altogether.

Let the EU and the US demonstrate joint leadership on this and table some real numbers for cuts. To succeed, we need to offer both the bold vision and the concrete steps the world is waiting for.

Europe Is Closer To Talks With Turkey (NYT)

By The International Herald Tribune, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

BRUSSELS, Sept. 20 - The European Union on Tuesday appeared closer than ever to beginning membership talks with Turkey on Oct. 3, despite last-minute objections from the Greek Cypriots.

DOJ_NMG_0007131

Union ambassadors reached a tentative agreement on a declaration dealing with Turkey's failure to recognize Cyprus during talks in Brussels late Monday. But in a turnaround, Cyprus withdrew its support on Tuesday, demanding a clause that would allow Cypriot leaders to revisit the declaration, diplomats said.

However, Tassos Papadopoulos, the president of Cyprus, said he was still broadly satisfied with the terms of the statement, holding out the prospect that a deal could be reached soon.

Since July, when Turkey declared again that it refused to recognize Cyprus, a union country since 2004, European governments have been debating how they can allow Turkey to start membership talks.

Reforms To Forge Ahead Amid Feud (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Ukraine will stick to its pro-Western, pro-market reform program despite an escalating political feud between the leaders of the Orange Revolution, acting Foreign Minister Borys Tarasyuk said in an interview yesterday at the Ukrainian Embassy.

Mr. Tarasyuk, in Washington for talks with Vice President Dick Cheney and senior administration and congressional officials, said the basic thrust of Ukraine's foreign policy has not been an issue in the recent upheaval in Kiev.

"Naturally, it is a question that has come up in all my meetings, but what you are really seeing is a democracy working through its problems," Mr. Tarasyuk said.

"There will be no changes in our foreign policy. We want good relations with our major partners, with the United States, with Europe, with Russia, and we still have a goal of joining the European Union and NATO. These policies are not being held hostage to our internal differences."

But even as Mr. Tarasyuk was speaking, Ukraine's sharply divided parliament rejected President Viktor Yushchenko's choice to replace as prime minister his former Orange Revolution ally Yulia Tymoshenko.

With Mrs. Tymoshenko's faction abstaining, nominee and acting Prime Minister Yuri Yekhanurov, an ally of the president, fell three votes short of the 226 needed in the 450-seat assembly, despite heavy lobbying from the president against what he called "a cynical plot to destroy" his government.

Ukraine plunged into crisis and gridlock earlier this month when Mr. Yushchenko abruptly fired the charismatic Mrs. Tymoshenko amid intense governmental infighting. Adding to the embarrassing feud were charges of corruption, a halting reform program and a slowing economy.

Mr. Yekhanurov remains in charge of a caretaker Cabinet, and the president's options include seeking another parliamentary vote on the nomination.

Mr. Tarasyuk, a close ally of the president, called the upheavals in Kiev a "catharsis" for Ukraine.

"There was a necessary self-cleaning among the government team in order to come back to the principles of the Orange Revolution and to regain the trust of the public," he said.

He expressed confidence that the government would be able to push through the remaining parts of a major economic reform package strongly supported by the Bush administration and the European Union.

"I expect that as soon as the new prime minister is appointed, the drafts will be considered and passed" in parliament, he said.

Full approval of the reform measures is seen as critical to Ukraine's hopes of winning U.S. and European backing for its bid to join the World Trade Organization by the end of the year.

The foreign minister said Ukraine's longer-term hopes of joining the European Union and NATO remain on track despite the political standoff.

The Bush administration strongly backed Mr. Yushchenko in the Orange Revolution standoff late last year over a fraudulent election that originally favored a pro-Moscow rival. U.S. officials said they stand by the new government as it works through the political crisis.

Party Gives Merkel A Vote Of Confidence (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

DOJ_NMG_0007132

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

BERLIN -- Angela Merkel, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's conservative challenger, won her party's overwhelming backing to continue at the helm yesterday, raising her chances to become the first woman to lead Germany following last Sunday's inconclusive election.

In another boost for Mrs. Merkel, who is trying to form a coalition government with other parties, Mr. Schroeder said he was ready for talks without preconditions, dropping his previous demand that Mrs. Merkel not become chancellor.

The vote of confidence in Mrs. Merkel cemented her position after two days of intense speculation that she had lost the broad support of her Christian Democratic Union (CDU) because of its poor election performance.

"It was a good day for the union's parliamentary faction, which is once again ready to work," Mrs. Merkel said after the vote she had requested. "We have underlined the fact that we, as the strongest group in parliament, lay claim to forming the government."

Edmund Stoiber, leader of the Christian Social Union (CSU), the CDU's Bavarian sister party, said the alliance's parliamentary group had given Mrs. Merkel "clear support." She won 98.6 percent, with only three members voting against her.

The result was higher than the first time she was elected group leader in 2002, with 92.2 percent, as well as the 93.7 percent she received a year later.

"Germany needs a stable government that is capable of acting, and under Angela Merkel's leadership," Mr. Stoiber said.

Doubt in Mrs. Merkel's continued leadership was the buzz of Berlin since Sunday, when the election results came as a huge disappointment for the CDU.

Having started the campaign with a 20-point lead over the SPD, the CDU/CSU and preferred coalition partner, the Free Democratic Party (FDP), won a majority of less than 1 percent -- or three parliamentary seats -- over the SPD and its partner, the Greens.

Some politicians and analysts said the CDU's ambitious economic and social reform package had scared voters, while others blamed the outcome on the country's lack of acceptance of a divorced, Protestant woman from the former East Germany as their leader.

The CDU/CSU alliance won 35.2 percent on Sunday against 34.3 percent for the SPD. The FDP received 9.8 percent -- not enough for the two parties to form a government.

The Greens, whom Mrs. Merkel hopes to woo in a coalition Cabinet with the FDP, received 8.1 percent. The new Left Party of former Communists and a breakaway SPD fraction did slightly better with 8.7 percent, but both Mrs. Merkel and Mr. Schroeder have ruled out partnering with them.

Mr. Schroeder, who said his party had begun coalition talks, sounded much more accommodating about a CDU-SPD "grand coalition" led by Mrs. Merkel yesterday.

"It's about exploratory talks, a phase in which we must talk to one another about how one will bring about a stable government, which we need at this time," he said.

Frau Schröder And Herr Merkel (WSJ)

By Mathias Doepfner

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

BERLIN -- After Sunday's election, one feels like shrieking: "And the loser is … Germany!"

Yet everyone is behaving like winners: the Christian Democratic CDU because, despite everything, it is the largest party and will try to form a government; the Social Democratic SPD, especially Gerhard Schröder, who, in a hormone-induced rush brought on by the CDU's unexpected losses, asserted brassily that the chancellorship was his; the Greens, since the left-right shift had such little effect on their vote that it was as if they hadn't been a part of the unsuccessful Red-Green government; the Left Party, which in its first time out secured more than 8% of the vote with a program of nationalist, socialist populism and a front man, Oskar Lafontaine, known to knock the mike out of the hands of journalists who ask awkward questions; and finally, and most surprisingly, the Free Democrats (FDP), who got almost double the expected votes with a radical reform program that was crystal clear from day one.

DOJ_NMG_0007133

What can we learn from this? And what happens next? It is clear that Germans do not want to be governed by Angela Merkel. There is no other way to explain the CDU's collapse to 35.2% in the election after reaching 49% only a couple of months ago in opinion polls. The internationally popular interpretation blames German aversion to reform, as well as Ms. Merkel for being much too honest in announcing changes that were much too harsh. The flat tax promoted by Paul Kirchhof, her finance minister-designate, has been faulted particularly.

This thesis is too simple. Mr. Kirchhof was first taken to task by his own party before the SPD took up the issue. The Union's lack of unity was a mark of Ms. Merkel's unfortunate campaign from the beginning. She failed not because she communicated too clearly, but because she was not clear enough. While Mr. Schröder offered imprecise promises, she offered imprecise demands. While Mr. Schröder -- an instinctive genius and excellent campaigner -- unscrupulously stoked the fear of losing social protections and publicly declared his love for his wife, his challenger showed no emotion at all. While Mr. Schröder staged a sentimental campaign, Ms. Merkel was a candidate of the mind; while the man acted with a feminine touch, the woman's touch was too masculine.

What the conservatives lacked above all was a vision: What do we want to do with this country? Angela Merkel wanted the right things. But it was never clear enough, never concrete, never tangible. The hearts of voters, even those well-disposed, remained remarkably cold. This absence of all pathos, this lack of emotion, was perhaps the most distinctive feature of the CDU campaign and the most important reason for its failure. The FDP, by contrast, proved that it doesn't have to be that way. They were the determined voice of reform, never making a secret of their clear, economically oriented program, bravely defending the Kirchhof flat tax, and earning points with this clarity and honesty -- even among people who actually wanted the CDU, but in the end voted FDP instead.

The Germans' desire for clarity and honesty is apparent not only from this example. Their wish for reform is more pronounced than politicians believe. People simply want to know what they are getting into, and to be convinced that those who lead know where they are going. The "German Disease" is not a crisis of the German mentality, but one of political leadership.

The coming months hold risks and opportunities. The risks lie in the formation of a government, which Ms. Merkel can unfortunately advance with only limited backing from her party. Too many former opponents who had put down their weapons over the past weeks are taking out their knives again -- even though yesterday 98.6% of CDU/CSU lawmakers re-elected her as their parliamentary leader. A further question remains: Will there be a CDU-FDP-Green coalition or a grand coalition, possibly even led by Mr. Schröder, who could keep insisting on this role until the CDU surrenders from a lack of alternatives? Or maybe even another round of elections?

But more important than these nuts-and-bolts political questions is the larger picture and its international consequences. What road will Germany take? Will it continue on the path of Franco-German social protectionism, driving Germany (and thus Europe) into permanent economic crisis and foreign-policy isolationism? Or the path of Anglo-American deregulated economies, which will finally free up Germany's enormous growth potential -- and thus inspire all of Europe and tie it more strongly to a Western alliance? The election in Germany has set things in motion. Nothing is clear and anything is possible: Weimar or "Wirtschaftswunder."

The socialist Left had as much success with class hatreds and social fears as the FDP did with its concept of greater personal responsibility and less bureaucracy. Where will the next government's compass point? Who will find the words to tell people the truth and excite their enthusiasm for change? Things are in motion, and the forces of freedom need one thing above all: faithful international friends who retain their interest in Germany. There is no alternative to the European-American relationship: Germany must not lose. It must win.

Mr. Döpfner is chief executive and chairman of Axel Springer AG, publishers of Bild Zeitung, Europe's largest-circulation newspaper. (Belinda Cooper translated this essay from the German.)

Germany's Political Crisis Has U.S. Roots (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker And David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

BERLIN -- In some ways, Germany's post-election political mess is the fault of the Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0007134

Germany's disarray partly stems from the country's unique political system. No part of the government is strong enough to push through controversial measures, such as economic overhaul, without wide consensus. That is the way the U.S. deliberately set things up after World War II, to prevent the rise of another Hitler.

Tomorrow, the leaders of Germany's two major parties, ideological rivals, plan to meet to discuss forming a "grand coalition" government, after no one won a majority in Sunday's national election.

Such a division of power would come on top of Germany's unusual distribution of influence to its state governors, who regularly veto the plans of the executive branch and lower house of parliament.

That veto is largely why Germany was forced into an election on Sunday that had no conclusive result. Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder disbanded his own governing majority in parliament in May to force the vote, because the balance of power among state governors had turned firmly against him after his party lost a key regional election. Now, Germany has no effective government at all.

Germany's own version of federalism, in which the states and central government have largely overlapping responsibilities and regularly thwart each other, stems from the way the U.S. occupation army chose to build democracy.

Lt. Gen. Lucius D. Clay, America's viceroy in Germany after the Nazi surrender, was charged with shaping the new government. He got little guidance from Washington beyond a U.S. Treasury paper titled "Program to Prevent Germany from Starting a World War III." It proposed reducing the whole German economy to farming.

Lt. Gen. Clay didn't go that far, but to make life difficult for any future dictators he exploited Germany's history of rival local principalities. He oversaw the creation of Germany's regional governments -- some of them based on historical kingdoms and others made up -- and handed powers to them, rather than to national parties.

Then the state representatives, when writing the constitution, made sure a majority of them could veto moves by the federal government.

Parliamentary democracy and coalition governments are common in Europe, but Germany's system does more to weaken the center. It is as if in the U.S. Republican state governors could systematically block a Democratic Congress and president.

That is the difficulty Mr. Schroeder faced in pushing through his own version of economic overhaul.

Germany's more immediate problem after the election is that there is no working majority in the lower house of parliament among the usual party coalitions. So a new one will have to be formed, or yet another election called.

Ahead of talks with other parties, Mr. Schroeder said yesterday that he was open to different coalition possibilities. He sounded more flexible than immediately after the election, when he declared the outcome a personal vindication and a disaster for the opposition conservatives led by Angela Merkel. Both sides were still claiming the right to name the chancellor and lead the government.

The conservatives made a public show of support for Ms. Merkel by re-electing her as their parliamentary leader yesterday, with 219 deputies backing her, but three voting against her in the secret ballot.

Ms. Merkel has faced criticism from colleagues at the state level for a campaign that brought the third-worst result in the party's history.

German business leaders continued to fret about the deadlock, as data from a leading economic-research institute showed falling investor confidence. The ZEW institute, of Mannheim, said its index of analysts' and investors' sentiment fell from 50 in August to just 38.6 after the election.

Deutsche Bank AG's chief executive, Josef Ackermann, told a business conference in Berlin: "The challenges we face, in particular globalization and the demographic changes, won't get smaller because there is a political stalemate in parliament."

To some degree, stalemate is built into the German system. If Ms. Merkel had held on to her lead in polls and won Sunday's election, as expected, she still would have faced a fight against state governors -- even though most of them are in her party. She wanted to raise the value-added tax to fund a reduction in employers' social-security contributions. Christian Democrat state governors -- who are entitled to half of VAT revenue -- wanted to use it to plug holes in their own budgets.

Because the next national government will be less conservative-dominated than Ms. Merkel had hoped, the disputes can only get worse.

DOJ_NMG_0007135

"This constitution is becoming outdated in many ways," says Konrad Jarausch, a history professor at the University of North Carolina.

Overhauling the federal system to get the states and the government out of each other's hair has been on the agenda since the 1960s. "It's one of those things you can't resolve, because someone has to give up something," Prof. Jarausch says. The last attempt at overhaul fell apart a year ago, when a compromise was vetoed -- by state governors.

Those governors owe their power to Lt. Gen. Clay, who helped their predecessors in the states, starting with the self-styled Free State of Bavaria, the independent-minded region in Germany's south.

Bavaria always has been considered the state most likely to secede. Bavaria's present-day premier, Edmund Stoiber, lost votes for his fellow conservative Ms. Merkel during the election campaign by ranting against eastern Germans who voted for neo-communists and lamenting that "the voters are not everywhere as intelligent as in Bavaria." Ms. Merkel is from eastern Germany.

To make a central government palatable to Bavarians at all, the talks about a federal constitution in 1949 -- Germany's Philadelphia Convention -- were held in a Bavarian lakeside castle. Bavaria voted against the constitution anyway.

Over the decades, the states have expanded their power in national affairs. Now, almost any move on the economy, finance or the welfare state needs states' permission.

Mr. Schroeder had to fight his way past obstruction from governors even when both major parties agreed in principle about an overhaul. Shortly after his latest proposal for cutting business taxes foundered on resistance by the states, Mr. Schroeder gave up and asked his own party to vote him down to force Sunday's election.

Germany And The Battle For Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

The big news from Germany's elections on Sunday was what did not happen: Angela Merkel, the right-wing candidate who had a free fall from a 20-point lead, did not become the first woman chancellor. The incumbent, Gerhard Schröder, was not driven into retirement, as his opponents had hoped. And Germans did not give either a governing majority. Still, they delivered a message: economic reform should move forward. The three parties that support reforms got 80 percent of the vote. All they have to do is agree on how to govern.

Given Germany's dismal economic health, there is no alternative to reforms for Germany and for Europe as a whole. Ms. Merkel seemed to be doing well against Mr. Schröder, a highly skilled candidate, until she blundered by picking Paul Kirchhof, a professor who advocates a flat tax, as her economic spokesman. The idea fell, well, flat. As for Mr. Schröder, drawing even with Ms. Merkel's party was a vindication of the risk he took in calling the election to gain a mandate for reforms.

The arithmetic now makes for some complicated possibilities. The most likely outcome seems to be a coalition of Mr. Schröder's party and Ms. Merkel's party. Such a "grand coalition" is widely discredited outside Germany as inherently unstable and incapable of agreeing on policy. But coalitions between the two major parties have worked well in the German states.

If the two major parties look beyond their rivalries, they could find that they agree on the basics of critically needed economic reforms like lowering employment costs, making labor markets more flexible and simplifying the tax code. And they would certainly have the clout to push a joint program through the Parliament and past the unions. Mr. Schröder called the elections because there was a big job to be done, and the voters agreed.

A Mess In Germany (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

The most important German election in decades has produced a dismal result for Germany, the European Union and the transatlantic alliance. As expected, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder of the Social Democrats failed in his attempt to win a new mandate, but his principal opponent, Angela Merkel of the Christian Democratic Party, also did not win enough support to form a government. The two big German parties combined received the lowest percentage of votes in 50 years, and the balance of power in Parliament will be held by three smaller factions -- one of which, the new Left Party, is a noxious mix of anti-globalization populists and former East Bloc communists.

Mr. Schroeder has further fouled this messy situation with arrogant and undemocratic behavior. Though he finished in second place with 34 percent of the vote, and his coalition lost 33 of the 306 seats it held in the Bundestag, the chancellor loudly claimed victory and is trying to bully his way back into office. German commentators are calling his power play "delusional" and "grotesque," but the political situation is so unsettled that its success cannot be ruled out.

It's difficult to imagine a worse outcome to the election than a new term for Mr. Schroeder, whose habitual demagoguery and opportunism have poisoned not only German politics but also the European Union and U.S.-German relations. Yet the other possibilities aren't much better. The most likely is a "grand coalition" between the Christian Democrats and Social Democrats that would exclude Mr. Schroeder, and possibly also Ms. Merkel, who is trying to be the first woman and the first citizen of the former East Germany to become chancellor. Alternatively, one of the large parties could create a coalition including a small party on the opposite side of the political spectrum, alignments as bizarre as the nicknames -- "stoplight" and "Jamaica" -- they have been given.

Whatever the final result, the chances that Germany will continue the economic reforms that Mr. Schroeder cautiously began don't seem great. Both major candidates seem to have been punished by voters for advocating change: Mr. Schroeder for his half-steps and Ms. Merkel for promising more. The two parties together might agree to force through the further reforms they know the country needs, but it is just as likely they will compromise by doing nothing. It also seems unlikely that a weak German government will support needed reforms for the European Union, which itself is reeling from French voters' rejection of a new constitution in May.

American conservatives and internationalists might be tempted to take quiet satisfaction from the political disarray in the two big European states that have worked hardest in the past five years to thwart U.S. policies and establish Europe as a rival power to the United States. That would be shortsighted. In fact, Mr. Schroeder and his French ally, Jacques Chirac, were never likely to succeed in creating a European counterweight, and the weakness of Germany and France will only make them less able to support the United States in key strategic matters on which there is a transatlantic consensus, such as preventing Iran from developing nuclear weapons. About the best that Americans, and Germans, can hope for is that the tenure of the new government will be relatively brief -- and that the next election will produce a more decisive result.

A French Lesson: Taunts About Race Can Boomerang (NYT)

By John Tagliabue

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

PARIS, Sept. 20 - The French news media were captivated by Hurricane Katrina, pointing out how the American government's faltering response brought into plain view the sad lot of black Americans. But this time the French, who have long criticized America's racism, could not overlook the parallels at home.

"It is true that the devastations of Katrina have cruelly shed light on the wounds of America, ghettoization, poverty, criminality, racial and territorial tensions," Le Figaro, the conservative daily, said in an editorial on Sept. 8. "In France, those in disagreement ran to pelt the 'American model' and the neoconservative president. But have they just looked at the state of their own country?"

Only four days before, a fire had swept an apartment in south Paris, killing 12 people, most of them black. And just days before that, 17 black people died in a single blaze. Since April, 48 people, most of them children and all of them black, have died in four separate fires in Paris.

In neighborhoods like Château Rouge, filled with the hundreds of thousands of nonwhite immigrants, some Arabs but mainly blacks, whom France has absorbed over the years from former colonies in Africa and the Caribbean, you feel the anger.

"It could be a coincidence," said Sissouo Cheickh, bitterly, "but one question the French have to answer is: of 48 people who died, why were 48 black?"

Mr. Cheickh, 28, got a university degree in France, but rather than working for someone else and running into what he and other young blacks say is France's low glass ceiling, he decided to start his own business. Six months ago he scraped together some money and opened a store.

"You see these fabrics? All from Africa, from my family," said Mr. Cheickh, who came from Mali, as he gestured toward colorful rolls of cloth.

France has long boasted of itself as the cradle of human rights and a bulwark against racism. It regularly denounced racism in the United States, and the road from Harlem to Paris was wide, inviting talented American blacks like the dancer Josephine Baker, musicians like Sidney Bechet and writers like Richard Wright and James Baldwin.

But French insistence on the equality of man leaves them in a bind, their black critics say, perpetuating the fiction of a society without minorities.

The census in France does not list people by race. Hence, while blacks are thought to number about 1.5 million, of a total population of 59 million, no one really knows the exact number, which is estimated to be far higher.

There are virtually no black people in corporate France, and blacks have almost no political representation. No black person sits in the National Assembly or in a regional parliament, and only a smattering are found in city councils. The European Union finances programs for minorities but not in France, because of its refusal to recognize minorities.

So, today, blacks are not much on the French agenda. After the recent fires, the interior minister, Nicolas Sarkozy, proposed a program of affirmative action and a requirement that résumés conceal a person's ethnic or racial identity. But the rest of the cabinet, including the minister for equal opportunity, rejected the ideas, saying they offended the fundamental principle of equality.

"The French like to say, 'Blacks are a social problem, not racial,' " said Gaston Kelman, 52, a native of Cameroon who has written widely on France's black population. "So our institutions have no means to overcome it."

Until recently, virtually all blacks were on the lowest rung of the social ladder. Gradually, however, a younger generation is, like Mr. Cheickh, gaining education, starting businesses and gradually giving birth to a black middle class. They feel the discrimination they say is rampant in French society and are beginning to resist.

After graduating with a degree in economics and data processing, Claude Vuaki tried his hand at several jobs before deciding to start his own business. Together with his wife, Kibé, he opened a beauty salon in central Paris. But Mr. Vuaki's search for start-up capital was typical of the black experience. "They said right off, no loan, no money," said Mr. Vuaki, 52. He and his wife managed to gather some family savings and self-financed their shop.

Now the business is so successful that they plan a second shop, in Nice or Cannes. Mrs. Vuaki travels regularly to the United States to study African-American hairstyles.

Still, Mr. Vuaki remains one of a relatively small minority. Most blacks are employed in menial jobs, in construction or transportation. What encourages people like Mr. Vuaki is that the glass ceiling often felt by young blacks who get an education is not discouraging them, but increasingly prompting them to strike out on their own.

"A lot of people I know want to create something of their own," he said, often in landscaping, construction and delivery services.

Still, Mr. Kelman said this slight opening is not inhibiting many young Africans with an education to strike off for Britain, Canada and the United States, where they think they will find greater opportunities.

Asked whether the French people are racist, Mr. Kelman replied: "It's a racism of nuance. Every Frenchman would immediately say, 'One of my closest friends is black.' "

Mr. Kelman said government housing and employment policies create an "institutionalized ghetto-building." He described with a laugh a typical job interview for a black candidate. When the boss realizes the candidate is black, he begins praising the sights and sounds of Africa he discovered on his last vacation there: the broad beaches, beautiful greenery, vast sky. Needless to say, the candidate doesn't get the job.

In the schools, white pupils are typically encouraged to continue studying while black children are often steered toward vocational studies. The influence of African-Americans, through television, films and sports, is everywhere. Some young blacks turn to Afrocentrism, Mr. Kelman said, others to rappers and others to black Muslim groups. What they don't turn to is mainstream French society.

"We're at an impasse," Mr. Kelman said.

No 'Turning Back' In Egypt (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

CAIRO -- It's hard to imagine Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak as a change agent. During the 24 years he has ruled this country, he has displayed a military man's passion for stability and a corresponding wariness of democracy. His Egypt has often symbolized the political stasis of the Arab world.

But unlikely as it sounds, the 77-year-old Mubarak won reelection this month on a platform of political and economic reform. The fact that even the pharaonic Mubarak is running as a democrat illustrates the power of the reform movement in the Arab world today. The movement is potent because it's coming from the Arab societies themselves and not just from democracy enthusiasts in Washington.

I can't predict whether Mubarak will deliver on the promises he made during his campaign. I can see all the reasons why he should and all the reasons why he won't. But what's unmistakably clear in the aftermath of Egypt's first semblance of a multi-candidate presidential election is that the country's old authoritarian system has broken apart. I doubt Mubarak could put it back together even if he tried.

This used to be a country where people were very careful about what they said in public. It was basically a one-party state, and the price of keeping your job -- and sometimes of staying out of prison -- was to stay safely within the unwritten but universally recognized red lines. The state-run Egyptian press was often the worst offender -- pretending to be independent but maintaining an almost Stalinist sycophancy toward the ruler. Happily, those old habits of deference are changing.

During several days of conversations here, I found people remarkably frank in their comments. Just as interesting, political activists across the spectrum described the situation in Egypt in similar terms. Though many see the one-sided election as a joke (Mubarak won with 88 percent of the vote), they all see Egypt as changing, and they all agree it will be hard to stop the momentum of change.

Let's start with the most extreme critics of the regime, the Muslim Brotherhood. I met Ali Abdel Fatah, one of the Brotherhood's leaders, over coffee at the Syndicate of Journalists, which has become a haven for activists in recent months. While he denounces Mubarak's election victory as fraudulent, Abdel Fatah thinks the democratic movement in Egypt is real. "We appreciate pluralism and we insist on it," he says.

Abdel Fatah says he has been imprisoned 11 times for his views, and the Brotherhood is still banned from running openly as a political party -- but he wants to play in the new game. He plans to field about 150 "independent" candidates in November's parliamentary elections and expects that about 30 of them will win, roughly doubling the group's unofficial representation in parliament.

Puffing a hookah pipe in a coffeehouse on Imad El-Din Street is Amin Soliman Eskander, one of the co-founders of the protest group known as Kifaya. Even though the election is over, the group (whose Arabic name means "Enough!") is still organizing demonstrations. "The national atmosphere no longer allows oppression," he explains. Eskander has been imprisoned seven times because of his dissent. Asked whether he thinks political change can come peacefully in Egypt, he says, "Yes, of course."

In a cafe on the bank of the Nile, Hisham Kassem, who runs a fiery new independent newspaper, explains that the old days of docility are over. The newspapers are running headlines denouncing Mubarak and his family that would have been unthinkable a year ago. "I'm sure he grits his teeth that we're out there criticizing him, but we can't turn back," Kassem says.

The Mubarak camp doesn't disagree with the view that the rules of the game have changed. Mohamed Kamal, a key political adviser, says the old insistence on stability has given way to a realization that Egypt needs change. That's the importance of Mubarak's agreement to a multi-candidate election this year, he argues. "The president was always up on the mountain, surrounded by people who wanted to protect him. He came down from the mountain to ask people for their vote."

One of the brightest lights in Mubarak's government, Industry Minister Rachid Mohammed Rachid, agrees that the election symbolized the idea of accountability. "When Mubarak ran, he took it seriously, put together a program and a list of deliverables. This has never been done before."

The Mubarak regime is certainly capable of reneging on its promises. But there's so much pressure for change, from so many different directions (including the Bush administration), that it won't be easy. "I don't think there is any turning back," the president's son, Gamal Mubarak, tells me. And for the moment, I'm inclined to take him at his word.

Nazi Hunter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

In taking note of the life of Simon Wiesenthal, the great Nazi hunter who died yesterday at 96 after surviving the Soviet NKVD, numerous German death camps and a 1982 assassination attempt, we are reminded of Andrew Jackson's famous aphorism: "One man with courage makes a majority."

From today's perspective, it is difficult to remember that when Mr. Wiesenthal began tracking Nazis from a tiny "Documentation Center" in the Austrian city of Linz, his work was hardly popular. Much of Europe wanted to put its collaborationist chapters behind it; some of the most prominent Nazis had fled to distant corners and assumed new identities; the world's attention was otherwise engaged.

Yet working off the leads of informers -- some of them ex-Nazis out to settle old scores -- Mr. Wiesenthal was able to track down many of those he called "the murderers among us." Among them: Franz Stangl, commandant of the Treblinka and Sobibor death camps, who had fled to Brazil; Valerian Trifa, a Romanian fascist and pogrom-instigator, who later became an Orthodox Archbishop in Michigan; and Karl Silberbauer, the Gestapo agent who arrested Anne Frank and later found work as a Vienna police officer. These arrests, along with Israel's capture and trial of Adolf Eichmann (in which Mr. Wiesenthal played a secondary role), did as much as anything to put the memory of the Holocaust at the center of every civilized conscience.

Equally remarkable was Mr. Wiesenthal's insistence on backing up his allegations with voluminous documentary evidence. This could get him into scraps, as when he refused to denounce Kurt Waldheim, the one-time SS officer and later U.N. Secretary General and President of Austria, as a war criminal. Some Jewish leaders accused him of a cover-up; Mr. Wiesenthal replied that "accusations from Jewish sources must be able to stand up to all tests of credibility." Such evidentiary standards stand in stark contrast with those of groups such as Amnesty International, with their loose and incendiary accusations of "torture" at Guantanamo or "war crimes" in Jenin.

Toward the end of his life, Mr. Wiesenthal lent his name to a number of centers dedicated to advancing the cause of tolerance world-wide. With the resurgence of virulent anti-Semitism, particularly in Europe and the Muslim world, the cause has only grown in importance. Yet there is a risk that a specious and open-ended form of "tolerance" might obscure more fundamental objectives: justice for the perpetrators of atrocities, and remembrance for their victims. Simon Wiesenthal delivered both, and we owe it to his memory to carry on that work.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Bars Military Officers And Analysts From Testifying (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - The Pentagon said Tuesday that it had blocked several military officers and intelligence analysts from testifying at an open Congressional hearing about a highly classified intelligence program that, the officers have said, identified a ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks as a potential terrorist a year before the attacks.

The officers and intelligence analysts had been scheduled to testify on Wednesday about the program, known as Able Danger, at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Bryan Whitman, a Defense Department spokesman, said in a statement that open testimony "would not be appropriate."

"We have expressed our security concerns and believe it is simply not possible to discuss Able Danger in any great detail in an open public forum," Mr. Whitman said.

He offered no other explanation of the Pentagon's reasoning.

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the committee, said he was surprised by the Pentagon's decision because "so much of this has already been in the public domain, and I think that the American people need to know what happened here."

Mr. Specter said in a telephone interview that he intended to go ahead with the hearing on Wednesday and hoped that it "may produce a change of heart by the Department of Defense in answering some very basic questions."

Two military officers - an active-duty captain in the Navy and a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve - have recently said publicly that they were involved with Able Danger and that the program's analysts identified Mohamed Atta, the Egyptian-born ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks, by name as a potential terrorist by early 2000.

They said they tried to share the information with the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the summer of 2000, more than a year before the attacks, but were blocked by Defense Department lawyers. F.B.I. officials, who answer to the jurisdiction of Mr. Specter's committee, have confirmed that the Defense Department abruptly canceled meetings in 2000 between the bureau's Washington field office and representatives of the Able Danger team.

The Pentagon had said that it interviewed three other people who were involved with Able Danger and who said that they, too, recalled the identification of Mr. Atta as a terrorist suspect. Mr. Specter said his staff had talked to all five of the potential witnesses and found that "credibility has been established" for all of them.

Intelligence Team Members Ordered Silent In 9/11 Probe (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Defense Department lawyers have blocked members of a data-mining intelligence team from testifying today before a congressional panel probing their claims that they identified the September 11 ringleaders as terrorists more than a year before the attacks.

The Senate Judiciary Committee sought testimony from several members of the team -- code-named Able Danger -- as part of an investigation into claims that the project identified Mohamed Atta and three of the other 18 hijackers as tied to al Qaeda in early 2000.

Mark Zaid, an attorney for Army Reserve Col. Tony Shaffer, said his client, a Defense Intelligence Agency liaison to the Able Danger team, was told in a letter not to testify.

The letter, which gave no reason for the order, was signed by the principal deputy general counsel for the Defense Intelligence Agency, Robert Berry.

Mr. Zaid said the team members "were told verbally that they would not be allowed to testify" and that the order was put in writing only with regard to his client at his request.

He said that the team leader, Navy Capt. Scott Philpott, civilian analyst James Smith and other members of the team had been denied permission to testify. A Judiciary Committee aide said panel staff members already have interviewed Capt. Philpott and Col. Shaffer.

No one at the Department of Defense or the Defense Intelligence Agency returned calls for comment yesterday.

Rep. Curt Weldon, the Pennsylvania Republican who first put the Able Danger team in contact with journalists, was concerned about the order, his staff said.

DOJ_NMG_0007144

"It is unfortunate that we're trying to get answers ... and the people who could help us get them are not going to testify," said Russ Caso, the congressman's chief of staff.

At the center of the Senate committee's investigation is a computer-generated chart listing the names and connections of about 60 people thought to be linked to al Qaeda.

Capt. Philpott said that chart, produced in January or February 2000, bore the name and likeness of Atta and linked him to a Brooklyn mosque that has been a center of Islamic extremism for more than 20 years.

Capt. Philpott was the special operations officer who ran the effort, an intelligence-led initiative to use data mining on massive amounts of "open source" information culled from the Internet, purchased from credit rating bureaus or other data brokers, or by other means that remain classified.

Detainee Hunger Strike Prompts Request For Health Records Access (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Attorneys for several detainees at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, asked a federal judge for immediate access to their clients' medical records, saying they fear an eight-week-long hunger strike is growing more serious, according to court papers declassified yesterday.

Lawyers for a group of 17 Yemeni detainees told the court yesterday that, during an early August visit, some captives looked "gaunt and unwell" and that they fear their conditions have deteriorated. They complained to U.S. District Judge Henry H. Kennedy Jr. that the military and the Justice Department have refused to tell them or other lawyers about their clients' health status.

"Many participants . . . have stated their expectation of death and a growing number of detainees are now hospitalized and in grave condition," attorneys David Remes and Marc Falkoff wrote.

Military officials disputed that description, saying the number of detainees participating in the strike has recently declined. As of Sept. 12, the military said, 128 detainees were involved in the strike, which the Pentagon defines as refusing food or water for at least three consecutive days.

At that time, 18 were hospitalized, and were either having intravenous fluids forcibly administered or were being force-fed through nasal-gastric tubes. Yesterday, a military spokesman said, just 45 detainees had been refusing food or water for three or more days.

In a Sept. 12 e-mail, Justice Department attorney Andrew Warden wrote that the government is "not in a position" to provide health updates on hundreds of detainees.

Detainees on hunger strike are protesting what they describe as beatings at the prison and their indefinite detentions, their attorneys have said.

Disaster strikes

"In the presidential campaign last year, Democrats were said to be counting on some misfortune -- terrorists attacking on American soil, the Iraq War taking a turn for the worse, the economy going south -- to help them beat George W. Bush," Brendan Miniter writes at www.OpinionJournal.com.

"That didn't happen, of course. But now disaster has struck, and it's becoming increasingly clear that Democrats are better off for it. In ripping through the Gulf Coast, Hurricane Katrina has peeled back the lid on Republican rule, and many Americans aren't happy with what they see," Mr. Miniter said.

"This isn't about a slow response anymore. ... And unless they change course, Republicans will pay a steep price in next year's midterm elections and leave Democrats in the driver's seat for 2008.

"What President Bush, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and other Republicans haven't figured out yet is that deficit spending isn't a problem for them unless it endangers the broader conservative agenda. If it does, it will become the electoral issue.

"And what we're seeing is that Katrina is swamping every goal conservatives have, from limiting government to cutting taxes to reforming entitlement programs. Katrina spending has already imperiled plans to repeal the death tax, and Congress is already $60 billion into a spending binge.

"Handing out $2,000 debit cards was just the beginning. The conservative Congress has brought back the welfare state."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, crows in a note to supporters that the DCCC "has already started with hard-hitting campaign ads and accelerated candidate recruitment."

"That claim is goofy," says Jonathan Collegio, who works for Mr. Emanuel's opposite number, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the National Republican Congressional Committee chairman.

"The DCCC is over $3 million in debt, and Emanuel lost five of his highest-profile challengers in the last week," Mr. Collegio told Ralph Z. Hallow of The Washington Times.

DCCC chief spokesman Bill Burton fired back: "After another week of Republican indictments and arrests, I'm surprised that the NRCC has time to comment on anything besides the efficiency of their bail bondsmen."

Weepy Dan

Former CBS News anchor Dan Rather said Monday that there is a climate of fear running through newsrooms stronger than he has ever seen in his more than four-decade career, according to a Hollywood Reporter article by Paul J. Gough.

Mr. Rather famously tangled with President Nixon and his aides during the Watergate years while Mr. Rather was a hard-charging White House correspondent.

Addressing the Fordham University School of Law in Manhattan, occasionally forcing back tears, he said that in the intervening years, politicians "of every persuasion" had gotten better at applying pressure on the conglomerates that own the broadcast networks. He called it a "new journalism order."

He said this pressure -- along with the "dumbed-down, tarted-up" coverage, the advent of 24-hour cable competition and the chase for ratings and demographics -- has taken its toll on the news business.

"All of this creates a bigger atmosphere of fear in newsrooms," Mr. Rather said.

Mr. Rather was accompanied by HBO Documentary and Family President Sheila Nevins, both of whom received lifetime achievement awards at the News and Documentary Emmy Awards on Monday evening.

Miss Nevin asked Mr. Rather whether he felt the same type of repressive forces in the Nixon administration as in the current Bush administration.

"No, I do not," Mr. Rather said.

Courting trouble

"It will be a damning indictment of petty partisanship in Washington if an overwhelming majority of the Senate does not vote to confirm John G. Roberts Jr. to be the next chief justice of the United States," the Los Angeles Times said yesterday in an editorial.

"As last week's confirmation hearings made clear, Roberts is an exceptionally qualified nominee, well within the mainstream of American legal thought, who deserves broad bipartisan support. If a majority of Democrats in the Senate vote against Roberts, they will reveal themselves as nothing more than self-defeating obstructionists. ...

"Even if one treats this vote merely as a tactical game, voting against an impressive, relatively moderate nominee hardly strengthens the Democrats' leverage" on the upcoming second nomination, the newspaper said.

"If Roberts fails to win their support, Bush may justifiably conclude that he needn't even bother trying to find a justice palatable to the center. And if Bush next nominates someone who is genuinely unacceptable to most Americans, it will be harder for Democrats to point that out if they cry wolf over Roberts."

Gitmo inmates

The number of detainees on a hunger strike at the prison at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has fallen by almost two-thirds since last week, a military official told the Associated Press yesterday.

Forty-five detainees are currently on the hunger strike, down from 131 last week, Guantanamo spokeswoman Lt. Angela King-Sweigart said in an e-mail message.

No explanation was given for the sharp decrease, and calls to military officials at Guantanamo went unanswered last night.

Fifteen of the 45 detainees on the hunger strike have been hospitalized, Lt. King-Sweigart said. She could not immediately say if any were being tube-fed. Several detainees have been tube-fed during the hunger strike, either through their noses or intravenously.

Mexico bulldozes

Mexican officials bulldozed 31 abandoned buildings yesterday along the U.S. border in a village that has been a staging ground for illegal aliens and drug smugglers.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Chihuahua Gov. Jose Reyes Baeza agreed last month that the demolition was needed to help end lawlessness in the village of Las Chepas, which has only about 35 full-time residents.

"Bulldozing abandoned buildings in Las Chepas is a major step that sends a strong signal to anyone involved in illegal criminal activity on the border that it will not be tolerated," Mr. Richardson said.

DOJ_NMG_0007146

The operation was monitored from the U.S. side by Border Patrol agents, the Associated Press reports. Mr. Richardson declared a state of emergency last month in four New Mexico counties along or near the Mexican border.

Judge Holds Closed Hearing In Case Of Former CIA Contractor (AP)

By ESTES THOMPSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2005

In one of the final hearings before the scheduled start of the trial of a former CIA contractor accused of beating an Afghan detainee who later died, a federal judge closed his courtroom Tuesday to allow attorneys to discuss classified material.

Defense lawyers for David A. Passaro have said they want to review classified messages from the Central Intelligence Agency, Army Special Forces and military intelligence in Afghanistan for possible use in Passaro's case.

It wasn't clear what the lawyers discussed Tuesday, but federal law allows closed sessions to deal with classified information.

U.S. District Court Judge Terrence Boyle said his interest was in "making sure that when we close, we restrict the closed hearing to those things that can only be heard in a closed hearing."

Attorney Amanda Martin said her media clients wouldn't object to a proceeding that dealt with classified information privately and other material in public. Martin represented The Associated Press, The News & Observer of Raleigh and The Washington Post.

"We have not objected to closing the courtroom to deal with classified information," Martin said after the hearing. "We were here to repeat our request that the court rein in and limit the closed portion of the hearing so that it deals only with classified information."

A special room has been created in the courthouse to allow lawyers to read the classified information and remain secure from eavesdropping.

Passaro, 38, arrived at the hearing in the custody of marshals. He wore a prison uniform and had a full beard and shaggy hair. The former Special Forces soldier has been jailed since June, when his bail was revoked after he was accused of assaulting his girlfriend.

Boyle has denied motions by Passaro's lawyers to dismiss the four assault charges against him, claiming the judge lacked jurisdiction because the alleged beating occurred in a foreign country.

Passaro could face 40 years in prison and $1 million in fines if convicted.

He is the first civilian to face prosecution on prisoner abuse charges since the start of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. He has denied the charges and contends he was a scapegoat for the government after the Abu Ghraib prison scandal erupted.

The Afghan prisoner, Abdul Wali, was being questioned about a series of rocket attacks on a remote U.S. outpost in the mountainous northeast of Afghanistan, about five miles from the country's border with Pakistan.

The federal indictment against Passaro said Wali died in a cell at the outpost after two days of beatings by Passaro, who used "his hands and feet and a large flashlight." A witness list includes a fingerprint expert who would identify Passaro's prints on batteries in the flashlight.

Trial had been scheduled for the first week of October, but court officials said the date may be delayed because defense lawyers want to file more motions.

Government: Man Wanted Bush Assassinated (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 21, 2005

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-A suspected terrorist accused of conspiring to assassinate President Bush said he proposed the plot but it wasn't pursued, and he was frustrated that other members of his al-Qaida cell lacked initiative, according to prosecutors.

A government motion unsealed this week by a federal judge reveals new details in the case against Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, 24, who is scheduled to go on trial next month.

Prosecutors say the Falls Church resident has admitted joining al-Qaida while attending college in Saudi Arabia and that he discussed numerous terrorist plots, including plans to assassinate Bush and hijack airplanes. Abu Ali says he was tortured into giving a false confession by Saudi authorities and that U.S. officials aided the torture. His lawyers are asking to have the confession tossed out.

The motion says that Abu Ali was asked to research the location of U.S. nuclear power sites for possible attack. The request was made by the second-highest ranking al-Qaida operative in Saudi Arabia, Sultan Jubran Sultan al-Qahtani, according to the motion.

DOJ_NMG_0007147

Also, Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman writes in the motion that Abu Ali was frustrated and bored during a stay at an al-Qaida safe house "because his fellow al-Qaida cell members did not appear sufficiently motivated to suit the defendant's terrorist zeal."

Abu Ali's lawyers did not return calls seeking comment Tuesday.

In an initial interrogation by Saudi authorities, Abu Ali said that after a May 2003 al-Qaida attack in Riyadh he organized the cell into a more structured daily regimen at the safe house "because, as I said to the guys, we were wasting our time sleeping and engaging in idle chit chat." The attack killed 39 people, including nine Americans.

Prosecutors said Abu Ali's admission that he proposed the Bush assassination plot came in response to a question posed by Saudi authorities at the request of the FBI.

When Abu Ali was asked, "Were you tasked to assassinate the President?" he replied, "I came up with the idea on my own, but it did not get beyond the idea stage. I wanted to be the brain, the planner, just like (reputed Sept. 11 attack masterminds) Mohammed Atta and Khalid Sheikh Mohammad."

The government motion was in response to defense claims that the case against Abu Ali should be thrown out because the confession was obtained through torture and that U.S. authorities acted in concert with the Saudis. The government contends that Abu Ali's June 2003 arrest, interrogation and confession resulted from an independent Saudi crackdown on al-Qaida following the Riyadh bombings and that FBI requests to question Abu Ali directly were rejected.

Abu Ali's Saudi interrogators have already given depositions in which they testified that Abu Ali was relaxed and well cared for when he confessed. Defense lawyers objected to the depositions, saying the interrogators would be under pressure to lie about Abu Ali's treatment.

The government denies that Abu Ali was mistreated and says he invented the torture allegation to escape justice.

"The defendant in this case represents one of the most dangerous terrorist threats that America faces in the perilous world after Sept. 11, 2001: an al-Qaida operative born and raised in the United States, trained and committed to carry out deadly attacks on American soil," Laufman wrote.

Guantanamo Trial To Resume (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

The Pentagon cleared the way yesterday for the resumption of the long-delayed military trial of Guantanamo Bay prisoner David Hicks.

The Defense Department had put the case on hold last year after an unfavorable court ruling. Officials said the hearings in the Hicks trial will resume sometime between Oct. 3 and Oct. 20.

Hicks, an Australian held for 3 1/2 years at the military prison, has pleaded not guilty to charges of aiding the enemy, attempted murder by an unprivileged belligerent and conspiracy to commit war crimes. Captured in Afghanistan in late 2001, Hicks is accused of fighting for the al Qaeda network.

Of about 505 men held at Guantanamo Bay, four have been charged. Only the Hicks case is being resumed.

The announcement of the resumption of Hicks's trial came two months after a federal appeals court reversed a ruling in the case of another Guantanamo Bay prisoner, Yemeni Salim Ahmed Hamdan. The appeals court ruled that the military commission trials are lawful.

Attorney In U.S. Publishes Full Translations Of Bin Laden's Statements (FINDLAW/AP)

By Laura Wides, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 21, 2005

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-The only way to defeat the enemy is to know the enemy. But in the case of Osama bin Laden, the U.S. public doesn't know enough, says the author of a new book on America's No. 1 nemesis.

In "Osama Bin Laden: America's Enemy In His Own Words," San Diego civil rights attorney Randy Hamud tries to shed light on bin Laden by translating 20 of his statements and letters from 1994 to 2004.

The book, released Monday, is the first comprehensive compilation of statements that are rarely presented in full by the English-language media. It's also the first of several works on bin Laden due out in the coming months.

Hamud said the translations are critical to defeating bin Laden.

"What I mean by defeat is the complete discrediting of his message," he wrote in the book.

The third-generation Lebanese-American spent the past two years working with Arab scholars on the translations. His self-published book also offers an annotated biography of bin Laden and a history of Islam.

DOJ_NMG_0007148

It sparked concerns among academics - none of whom has seen the book - because it does not disclose the names of his collaborators and only says they are mostly Middle East immigrants who fear repercussions for their involvement.

"In order for me to trust a text, I need to know who the translator is," said Khaled Abou El Fadl, a University of California, Los Angeles law professor.

Abou El Fadl, who focuses on Islamic law, said he was surprised to learn about Hamud's book because the lawyer is not known as a specialist or scholar in Middle Eastern affairs or Islamic studies.

"In my perspective bin Laden is a criminal," Abou El Fadl said. "Is there value in publishing the diaries of a serial killer? Yes there's a value, and there's a danger."

Richard Dekmejian, a professor of political science at the University of Southern California, also said he would prefer such translations be done by recognized Arab scholars, then reviewed by peers.

"It's very essential to do the translation correctly and reflect the context in which these things are said," Dekmejian said.

Still, Dekmejian is interested in using Hamud's text in his classes as a way to understand bin Laden's anger at the West and how he gained traction among Muslims worldwide.

Hamud defended his decision to withhold the names.

"Sadly, in today's America, Muslim immigrants do not enjoy the freedom of speech that those of us who are native-born enjoy in discussing subjects like Mr. bin Laden, political Islam and the subject of terrorism," wrote Hamud, who has represented a number of Muslims and Arabs detained by federal authorities since Sept. 11, 2001.

In November, Verso Books in England will publish "Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden," a compilation 24 bin Laden speeches dating back to 1994. It was edited by Duke University political science professor Bruce Lawrence.

In January, Simon & Schuster's Free Press will publish former CNN analyst Peter Bergen's "The Osama bin Laden I Know: An Oral History of the Making of a Global Terrorist," with interviews from people who know bin Laden.

Lawrence, who had not seen Hamud's book, applauded his effort to make bin Laden's words more accessible. He said finding some of bin Laden's speeches, which are often blocked on Internet sites or reproduced only in snippets, involved major detective work.

"It's an aspect of Osama bin Laden that has not only been neglected, it has been totally overlooked in the war on terror," Lawrence said.

The speeches and letters show bin Laden's evolution from political attacks against corruption in the Saudi Arabian government to a declaration of war on the United States. There's also a critique of U.S. military contractors.

"The Iraq war generates billions of dollars for big corporations, either munitions makers or those working reconstruction, such as Haliburton and its sister companies," bin Laden said in an April 15, 2004 address originally broadcast by Al-Jazeera in which he offered a truce with European nations that agreed not to attack Muslims.

Throughout his speeches, bin Laden also returns to Israel's treatment of the Palestinians and what he calls the "Jewish enemy."

According to Hamud's translation, bin Laden's anger at the West stems mostly from its support of the repressive Saudi Arabian regime and the idea of a Christian military occupying Muslim lands.

"It is unconscionable to allow the country to become an American colony," bin Laden wrote in 1994 to King Fahd of Saudi Arabia, "for no other reason than to protect your throne and the oil resources."

Police Believe London Bombers Scouted Route Prior To Attacks (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

LONDON, Sept. 20 -- Three of the four bombers who killed themselves and 52 other people in a July 7 attack on the London transit system apparently scouted their route on a trip to the city 10 days earlier, police said Tuesday.

Officials at Scotland Yard said the three men -- Mohammed Sidique Khan, Shehzad Tanweer and Germaine Lindsay -- were spotted by officers as they reviewed thousands of hours of video surveillance tapes from train stations in London and the central English city of Luton.

Police released photos of the men, casually dressed, arriving at the Luton station the morning of June 28, with two of them carrying backpacks. Later in the day, they are seen at the King's Cross and Baker Street stations in London, apparently following the same route they took to stage the deadliest attack on British soil since World War II.

Khan, Tanweer and Hussain were British citizens of Pakistani descent; Lindsay was a Jamaican-born British resident. Police have said they believe all four were young Muslims who had become radicalized.

Earlier this month, the Arabic television network al-Jazeera aired a videotape of a man identifying himself as Khan who called the bombings a response to British policies in Iraq and the Middle East. "We are at war, and I am a soldier," he said.

In another videotaped message aired on al-Jazeera Monday, Ayman Zawahiri, al Qaeda's second-ranking leader, said the group was responsible for the attacks and had the "honor" of carrying them out. Earlier messages from Zawahiri had praised the attack but stopped short of asserting direct responsibility.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has said he believes British foreign policy did not inspire the attacks.

In a statement issued Tuesday, police said Khan, Tanweer and Lindsay spent about three hours in London on June 28. Their visit, the statement said, "might suggest the suspects were carrying out reconnaissance of potential targets on the London transport system and checking the time of the journey they intended to take on the day of the attack."

Police said "other cases here and abroad" suggest that terrorists sometimes visit their targets before an attack.

Police said they reviewed tapes from June 28 after finding train tickets and receipts during searches of addresses linked to some of the suspects.

The Scotland Yard statement offered the most extensive assessment in weeks of the status of the police investigation into the bombings. It said police have reviewed more than 80,000 surveillance tapes, taken statements from more than 3,000 witnesses and searched 15 locations.

It said more than 1,000 pieces of evidence had been taken from a single apartment in Leeds, a city about 200 miles north of London where several of the presumed bombers lived. Police said the search of that apartment, where they believe the explosives used in the attacks were made, took longer than six weeks.

Police have charged four men in a failed second series of attacks on July 21 in which no one was injured. A fifth suspect is in custody in Rome, and the British government is seeking his extradition. Police are still investigating possible links between the attacks.

London Bombers Visited Earlier, Apparently On Practice Run (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

LONDON, Sept. 20 - Less than two weeks before they attacked London on July 7, three of the four suicide bombers traveled to the city for what appears to have been a practice run, the police said Tuesday.

The new information came a day after Osama bin Laden's chief lieutenant, Ayman al-Zawahiri, appeared in a videotaped message claiming that Al Qaeda was responsible for the attacks. Three weeks ago, Mr. Zawahiri was shown in a different tape praising the bombings. British and European antiterrorism officials said that they were investigating the claims but had reached no conclusions about who was responsible.

American intelligence and counterterrorism officials said Tuesday that they had no reason to doubt the authenticity of the latest tape, which was broadcast on Al Jazeera, the Arab satellite network. But they said it remained unclear what role Al Qaeda played in the London attack.

"Al Qaeda is quite content to take responsibility for any number of terrorist attacks, regardless of the nature or extent of their role, including whether they had an inspirational role or a more significant one," said an American counterterrorism official, who requested anonymity because he was discussing sensitive intelligence assessments.

An American intelligence official noted that the tape of Mr. Zawahiri had been released by the Sahab media office, the usual outlet for such statements. Some recent tapes have included English-language subtitles, a departure from past practice, in what American officials said was an indication that they were aimed at American and British audiences.

Whatever group was the mastermind, officials are coming to understand more clearly the events leading to the attacks, which killed 56 people, including the four bombers, and injured 700. On Tuesday, they released closed-circuit television images showing that three of the bombers - Mohammad Sidique Khan, Shehzad Tanweer and Germaine Lindsay - met at Luton station at 8:10 a.m. on June 28 before traveling to King's Cross station in London.

They arrived at King's Cross at 8:55 a.m., were captured again on camera at the Baker Street station at noon and were seen on yet more cameras leaving King's Cross at 12:50 p.m. and arriving back in Luton at 1:40 p.m. "The implication is that they were possibly conducting reconnaissance on that day," Deputy Assistant Commissioner Peter Clarke, head of Scotland Yard's antiterrorism unit, told reporters. "We know that is part of a terrorist's methodology: to check timings, layout and security precautions."

Mr. Clarke said the police, who have seized some 80,000 closed-circuit tapes since July 7, still do not know what the men did between 8:55 a.m. and noon. He appealed to the public for help in reconstructing their movements. "What we want to know is where else they went, and did they meet anybody else while they were in London?"

The police have also disclosed further details about what the bombers - the three who made the earlier trip to London, as well as a fourth man, Hasib Hussain - did on July 7. Mr. Lindsay arrived at Luton station at 5 a.m.; the other three drove from Leeds in a silver Nissan Micra, arriving at Luton at 6:51 a.m. The four then traveled to King's Cross station, where they split up and set off their bombs, three on the London Underground and one on a bus.

The police found a trove of bombing materials in the Nissan Micra, which the men left parked at Luton. Two more "viable devices" - bombs that contained peroxide-based explosives, were surrounded by nails and were ready to go off - were found under the front passenger seat, Mr. Clarke said. There were also coolers in the back of the car, which may have been used to carry the bombs used in the attacks, he said. Peroxide-based bombs need to be kept cool when transported.

Asked whether the presence of the two bombs in the front seat implied that two other suicide bombers were meant to join the four on July 7, Mr. Clarke said the question was "interesting but unhelpful." But, he said, "it is of real concern that there were more explosives in the possession of these people on that day."

U.N. Report Warns Of More Terrorists (AJC/AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

UNITED NATIONS — Al-Qaida has spawned a so-called "third generation" of followers skilled in urban warfare and suicide bombings and U.N. sanctions need to be updated to keep up with the changing tactics, a report warned Tuesday.

The committee monitoring sanctions against the terror network and the Taliban said the arms embargo, travel ban and assets freeze have been effective but "the combination of sanctions has still not achieved its full potential."

"Al-Qaida continues to evolve and adapt to the pressures and opportunities of the world around it and the threat of a significant attack remains real in all areas," the group said in a report to the U.N. Security Council.

"At the same time, there has been a revival of the threat from the Taliban," it said, adding that recent evidence suggests the remnants of Afghanistan's ousted hard-line regime have access to more money.

The report, which was dated Sept. 9 and contained recommendations that will be considered by the U.N. Security Council, was released as Afghanistan faced the fiercest fighting in Afghanistan since U.S.-led forces invaded in late 2001, with more than 1,200 people killed in the six months leading up to Sunday's historic legislative elections.

Sanctions currently require all 191 U.N. member states to impose a travel ban and arms embargo against Afghanistan's former Taliban leaders, Osama bin Laden and his terror network and those "associated with" them, and to freeze their financial assets.

The committee recommended more measures to clamp down on terror financing and said the Security Council should consider broadening the arms embargo to keep the groups from obtaining military-quality materials or using chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

It said al-Qaida is seeking to stage more massive attacks to gain media exposure and an effective embargo would force militants to use less efficient equipment or risk discovery trying to procure more effective means.

"Terrorist tactics have evolved over the past several years and the (monitoring) team believes the arms embargo should change with the times," the report said.

It said no state had reported an attempt to breach the arms embargo but it noted implementation often was complicated in some post-conflict regions or areas beyond government control, such as in Somalia and Afghanistan.

The committee's report said al-Qaida's message remains the same but its operations have expanded to comprise three groups — bin Laden and his deputies, fighters who trained in Afghanistan and new recruits alienated by world events who form cells locally.

It described the new recruits as a third "new and growing generation of supporters who may never have left their countries of residence but have embraced the core elements of the al-Qaida message."

"These cells are emerging as the main threat posed by al-Qaida terrorism today," the report said. "They are bound to the al-Qaida leadership by an overall unity of purpose but remain independent, anonymous and largely invisible until they strike."

They often receive training from "the veterans of Afghanistan or other areas of conflict" or travel to Iraq to gain skills in urban warfare, bombmaking, assassination and suicide attacks, then return home where they pose an increased threat.

The report came more than a month after the Security Council adopted a resolution expanding the sanctions to spell out for the first time who is included among associates of al-Qaida and the Taliban.

It also stated that people who finance or plan acts to support the outlawed groups and who recruit or provide weapons for bin Laden, al-Qaida, the Taliban "or any cell, affiliate, splinter group or derivative thereof" will face sanctions.

PATRIOT ACT:

Librarians Must Stay Silent In Patriot Act Suit, Court Says (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

The librarians who challenged the nation's antiterrorism act must continue to keep quiet about their role in the case while a federal appeals court reviews the order of confidentiality that bars them from speaking out, the court ruled yesterday.

A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Manhattan handed the federal government a partial victory yesterday in agreeing to a temporary stay of a lower court ruling that would have allowed the plaintiffs, as of today, to discuss the case. Government lawyers had argued that they needed the stay to give them time to appeal the lower court decision.

At least two members of the appellate panel echoed those arguments. "Absent a stay, this appeal is moot," Judge Sonia Sotomayor commented during the questioning.

In the case involved in the dispute, the F.B.I. sent a library consortium in Connecticut a demand, known as a national security letter, that it turn over patron information and not disclose the request publicly.

Lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union have argued that the consortium's constitutional right to free speech was violated because the confidentiality order prevented it from participating in the debate over the USA Patriot Act while Congress was considering whether to reauthorize the law.

Emerging from the courthouse yesterday, Ann Beeson, the lead lawyer for the civil liberties group, called the appeals court ruling "extremely frustrating." She said it was unfair that "the government can say all they want about the Patriot Act," but not people like the plaintiffs who have firsthand knowledge of its reach. She said she took some comfort from the appellate court's promise to expedite the appeal.

The case landed in Federal District Court in Bridgeport this summer, with government lawyers citing national security as the grounds for sealing large parts of the record.

On Sept. 9, Judge Janet C. Hall ruled in Bridgeport that the nondisclosure provision in the national security letter violated the plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. She said she would allow the plaintiffs to identify themselves, but gave the government until yesterday to appeal.

Though the plaintiffs' organization has not been named in the various proceedings, a close reading of the court record suggests that it is Library Connection in Windsor, Conn.

A search of a court-operated Web site offered a pointer to the plaintiffs' identity. There, a case numbered 3:2005cv01256 is listed under the caption, "Library Connection Inc. v. Attorney General."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI, Industry Offer Anti-ecoterror Award (KCS)

By Elizabeth M. Gillespie

The Kansas City Star, September 21, 2005

SEATTLE - The FBI and a building industry group said Tuesday they will begin offering $100,000 rewards for information leading to the arrest and conviction of ecoterrorists.

The main target is the Earth Liberation Front, a group that has claimed responsibility for setting fires at construction sites in housing developments, calling attention to what it sees as the growing problem of suburban sprawl.

"While ELF used to spike trees and sabotage logging equipment, they're now firebombing neighborhoods and burning down apartment complexes," Lyle Fox, president of the Building Industry Association of Washington, said in a news release.

The "increasingly brazen" attacks raise the likelihood that someone will be hurt or killed, he said.

ELF is an underground movement with no public leadership, membership or spokesperson. E-mails seeking comment were not immediately returned.

The FBI estimates that ecoterrorist groups have committed more than 1,100 crimes in the United States since 1976, causing about $110 million in property damage.

DOJ_NMG_0007152

The builders group claims ecoterrorists have caused nearly $8 million in property damage since 1996 in Washington state, much of it in housing developments. California has taken a $53 million hit, and Oregon has had more than $3 million in damage, according to the group's estimates.

In a statement Tuesday, the Seattle FBI office said it was investigating several arsons and attempted arsons in Washington state over the past year and a half that seem to have ties to ELF.

Builders Want To Catch Ecoterrorists (SEAPI)

By TRACY JOHNSON, SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 21, 2005

They've used crude incendiary devices made from milk jugs to torch new homes and construction sites in Western Washington, signing their work "ELF."

Now the Seattle FBI has made catching so-called ecoterrorists such as the Earth Liberation Front a top priority, and a powerful state builders' group is throwing in cash to help.

On Tuesday, the Building Industry Association of Washington announced a reward of up to $100,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of activists who damage homes and construction sites in Washington and claim to be part of ELF.

"It's only a matter of time before someone is hurt or killed by ELF terrorists," association president Lyle Fox said.

He said housing "is a basic necessity of life" and that arson is only hurting families.

The group has claimed responsibility for increasingly frequent acts of vandalism against new housing, sport utility vehicles and the genetic-engineering industry in the name of defending the environment.

ELF "has emerged as a serious terrorist threat," said FBI Special Agent in Charge Laura Laughlin, and "arson, which has resulted in millions of dollars in damage, is the crime of choice."

Arson has caused nearly $8 million in damage in Washington since 1996, according to the builders association. In the past two years, two under-construction homes in Snohomish County were burned down and 13 incendiary devices were found at three nearby developments. A sign advertising lots for sale near Bellingham also was burned.

Two attempts were made earlier this year at home-construction sites in Redmond and Sammamish, where investigators found incendiary devices. At the Sammamish site, someone left a spray-painted sheet that read in part, "Wheres (sic) all the trees? ... ELF."

On an ELF Web site, someone claiming to live in the Sammamish area condemned the group's acts for endangering and frightening people, particularly children. In an anonymous response, someone explained, "you people dont even realize the magnificence of what you are bulldozing to erect some stupid shopping mall. I for one, refuse to go quietly."

The FBI and other agencies have arrested 19 people in connection with crimes of environmental- or animal-rights-activism since early 2004.

The Seattle Times, September 21, 2005

The Building Industry Association of Washington, the state's homebuilders lobby, yesterday offered a $100,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of Earth Liberation Front (ELF) members suspected of arsons and attempted arsons in Washington state.

The FBI has linked ELF, a loosely knit group that has taken aim at what it regards as "urban sprawl," to four arsons and attempted arsons in Western Washington over the past 18 months. Those include the torching of two homes under construction in Snohomish County in April 2004.

In some cases, ELF claimed responsibility for the crimes, the FBI said.

"ELF's increasingly brazen attacks on urban targets have BIAW and the FBI worried that it is only a matter of time before someone is hurt or killed by ELF terrorists," said BIAW President Lyle Fox. In Washington alone, ELF members have been responsible for nearly $8 million in property damage since 1996, he said.

Appearing at a news conference with Fox, Laura Laughlin, FBI special agent in charge of the Seattle office, said such "special-interest extremism" linked to ELF and the Animal Liberation Front (ALF), has emerged as a serious domestic-terrorist threat.

The FBI released the following list of arsons and attempted arsons that targeted new housing construction in Washington in the past 18 months:

DOJ_NMG_0007153

· April 10, 2004: Two homes under construction in Snohomish County were destroyed. A total of 13 incendiary devices were found at three different housing developments nearby. ELF claimed responsibility in a note left at the scene.

· July 6, 2004: A sign advertising lots for sale at a home-construction site near Bellingham was burned. ELF claimed responsibility.

· March 3, 2005: Two incendiary devices were found at a housing-construction site in Redmond. There was no claim of responsibility, but the devices were similar to those ELF previously used.

Halted Listing Pulls NYSE Into Eco-terror Inquiry (TIMES)

By James Doran, Wall Street Correspondent

The Times (UK), September 21, 2005

THE New York Stock Exchange has been drawn into a United States Government inquiry into eco-terrorism, after the market postponed listing shares in Huntingdon Life Sciences, the research company, which is under attack from extremists because of its links to animal experimentation.

The Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works has launched an investigation into Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty (SHAC), the activist organisation that has waged several animal rights campaigns in Britain, including a high-profile crusade against Huntingdon.

The committee will hold its first hearing on the group next month, which is expected to focus on the recent decision by the NYSE to delay a listing of Huntingdon's shares.

John Thain, the NYSE chief executive, and Catherine Kinney, its president, are expected to be asked to testify before the committee and to explain their reasons for not going ahead with the Huntingdon listing as scheduled.

"We will hold a hearing next month on SHAC and its tactics against Huntingdon Life Sciences," Bill Holbrook, a spokesman for the committee, said.

The committee launched a wider investigation into eco- terror in May by examining the activities of the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) and the Earth Liberation Front (ELF). The hearing in October will mark the first time that the committee has investigated the activities of SHAC — which aims to stop all companies from doing business with Huntingdon or trading in its shares in an attempt to force the drug-testing group out of business.

The NYSE has failed to explain why it pulled out of the listing at the last minute — a move that angered Huntingdon directors, who had gathered at the NYSE for a celebratory breakfast when the decision to stop their listing was announced by Ms Kinney.

Senator James Inhofe, of Oklahoma, chairman of the committee on the environment, wrote to Mr Thain and Ms Kinney two weeks ago to demand an explanation for the postponement. "It seems to me unimaginable that this country's worldwide symbol of the integrity of the capital markets, the NYSE, would capitulate to threats, or even the mere threat of threats, from a single issue extremist group," he wrote. He added that the NYSE's decision set a dangerous precedent.

Coast Guard Commandant Cites Security Risk (AJC/AP)

By Pat Milton, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

NEW YORK — The Coast Guard says millions of pleasure craft, fishing boats and ferries fall outside its security nets, hampering its ability to safeguard thousands of miles of coastline against terrorist attack.

"How do we include recreational boats — some 58 million in this country — into our security regime without infringing upon the liberty of boaters?" Admiral Thomas Collins, commandant of the Coast Guard, said Tuesday.

Boaters are proud people who "toot around on the water" and don't want the government to tell them where they can go, Collins said following an address at the U.S. Maritime Security Expo, a conference on protecting ports, harbors, ships and cargo against terrorists, thieves and other threats.

"But some of those yachts are big," he said, "and can hold lots of good stuff and bad stuff."

The Coast Guard has identified 50 areas in which the maritime system is vulnerable to a terrorist attack, Collins said. It is working on solutions to blend everyone's needs: to close the gaps and mitigate the risks while not impinging on boaters' rights or interfering with the flow of commerce.

Specific initiatives will be presented to President Bush as part of a National Maritime Security Plan.

Among the Coast Guard's targets are recreational boats, an estimated 110,000 fishing vessels, and ferries that carry tourists and commuters, Collins said.

"How do we screen for explosive devices on a ferry system that moves millions of people, particularly commuters, without constipating the whole system?" Collins asked.

Better technology for detection of explosives on ferries and cargo ships is needed, he said.

"Right now the most capable technology we have," Collins said, "is dogs."

At least 95 percent of the goods coming into the country arrive on ships, according to Collins, and cargo security is crucial.

But Collins said he believes it is "illogical" to screen each cargo container, and inspecting millions of containers would be impossible.

"The issue is inspecting the right one," he said.

That goal can be reached by targeting those ships that have been identified through intelligence reports as having anomalies in the crews, cargo or containers, he said.

"You want to inspect the highest risk," he said, "not every ship that comes into our port."

Alerts Sought In Many Tongues (WT)

Television and radio stations should be required to air emergency disaster and security warnings in multiple languages, according to a petition that several trade and activist groups filed with the Federal Communications Commission yesterday.

The Independent Spanish Broadcasters Association, the Minority Media and Telecommunications Council and the United Church of Christ urged the FCC to require broadcasters to air multilingual warnings during emergencies.

Broadcasting & Cable, an industry publication, reported the petition on its Web site.

The petition cited Hurricane Katrina, which knocked the only Spanish-language TV station in New Orleans off the air for more than a week, robbing residents who speak only Spanish of "vital information concerning the path of the storm, where and how to seek shelter, and how to remain healthy and safe in the aftermath of the storm."

The FCC began considering new requirements for emergency broadcasts last year. No matter what the agency decides, the groups behind the petition said the FCC should make multilingual warnings mandatory during the interim.

"After Katrina, everyone is hoping there won't be a next time. Unfortunately, with Mother Nature, there always is," said Gloria Tristani, managing director of the United Church of Christ's Office of Communications and a Democrat who served as an FCC commissioner during the Clinton administration.

Frank Montero, acting executive director of the Independent Spanish Broadcasters Association, said that if the FCC adopts a requirement for multilingual warnings, "it must be feasible. My group doesn't want to do anything that wants to make non-Spanish station opponents to this. This really has to be a collaborative effort."

Katrina response

Speaking of the FCC: The agency's chairman, Kevin J. Martin, a Republican, announced plans last week to spend $211 million to begin rebuilding the communications infrastructure in the Gulf Coast states.

Mr. Martin also said the FCC will create a bureau to coordinate the agency's future disaster management work, and that he will appoint a blue-ribbon panel to study the FCC's response to Katrina.

ABC affiliate WJLA-TV (Channel 7) drew an average 587,900 households during the Washington Redskins' triumph over the Dallas Cowboys on "Monday Night Football" this week, according to Nielsen Media Research Inc.

The game delivered about 244,500 households to WJLA's late news.

Last week, this column reported on the swipe D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams took at the news media on his new blog. Hizzoner even took a jab at Mark Plotkin, political commentator at WTOP (1500 AM and 107.7 FM).

"Obviously, the mayor has too much free time. I'm glad to provide any momentary relief from the rigors of office and extensive world travel," Mr. Plotkin said.

Emmy time

A few local television operations picked up honors at the News and Documentary Emmy Awards Monday in New York, including the Silver Spring-based Discovery Channel and "Nightline," which is produced here but soon may be relocated to New York, according to the chatter around ABC News' Washington bureau.

WAR NEWS:

Clash In Basra Brings Iraq War Home For Britain (BSUN)

By Todd Richissin

The Baltimore Sun, September 21, 2005

LONDON -- Great Britain was reminded Tuesday it was in a war in Iraq, the fighting arriving in TV broadcasts and newspaper front pages, showing a British soldier engulfed in flames pulling himself out of his tank in the southern city of Basra.

As American officials announced that insurgents had killed 10 American troops and security officers in attacks across Iraq since Friday, the British found themselves consumed in Basra, which had been one of the most stable parts of the country.

On Monday British soldiers there fought not insurgents but Iraqi police whom the British had helped train.

Television showed the British soldier escaping his tank, the soldier on fire, jumping to the ground and limping out of camera range as Iraqi civilians threw rocks and gasoline bombs. They attacked British forces and rioted in the streets after an armored vehicle was used in an effort to rescue two commandos.

The incident began when British military officials accused Iraqi police of arresting the commandos and then handing them over to Iraqi militias. According to varying accounts by Iraqi authorities, the commandos, wearing civilian clothes, had fired on a police patrol, or they were detained for behaving suspiciously and being seen to collect information.

British forces used armored vehicles to knock down the walls of the Iraqi police station where the commandos were believed to be held, and the violence soon involved hundreds of Iraqis and the burning British tank. The two commandos were later found at a house in the city, British authorities said.

"We don't actually know the details of why these people were handed over -- whether it was under threats or by collusion, or whatever," the British defense secretary, John Reid, told the BBC. "What we do know is that under the law they should have been handed back to the British forces themselves."

"It is a very unfortunate development that the British forces should try to release their forces the way it happened," Haider al- Ebadi, an adviser to Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, told a news conference in Baghdad. The prime minister's office then is sued a statement saying Iraq's interior ministry was investigating.

"We will await the outcome of that inquiry," the statement said. "In the meantime we urge all sides to remain calm."

The governor of Basra said the commandos had indeed been handed over to the al-Mahdi Army, the militia controlled by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al- Sadr. "Police who are members of the militia group took them to a nearby house after jail authorities learned the facility was about to be stormed," said the governor, Mohammed al-Waili.

Meanwhile, an attack Monday in Mosul killed a State Department security officer along with three private security guards as their convoy left the U.S. embassy's regional office there, while two bombings Tuesday near Ramadi in Anbar province each killed two soldiers. Tuesday afternoon, an American military policeman was killed by a home made bomb.

Another American soldier was killed Friday when a bomb went off near his tank during patrol operations. Those latest deaths raised to more than 1,900 the number of U.S. service members who have died in Iraq since the 2003 invasion.

In London, the pictures of the violence made the war seem very real.

Video of the burning soldier in Basra was shown repeatedly Tuesday on the BBC and other news stations but the photographs in newspapers seemed more haunting, showing a man frozen in flames.

The pictures were certainly among the most gripping and disturbing of the war, the spectacle of a man on fire, somehow isolated further by the height of the tank he stands upon, looking for escape as children who looked to be 12 or 13 years old aimed to stone him.

In one photograph, distributed by Reuters, the soldier is standing atop the tank, bent over, with his hands apparently on his knees as if he is trying to catch his breath.

His face cannot be seen. He is wearing a helmet which appears to be on fire, but the flames are blowing backward, over his shoulders and to the middle of his back and not forward.

In the background, fires ignited by other thrown gas bombs can be seen rising high above the tank's height.

More than 70 percent of the British public opposed involvement before the war began. Polls since then show more than half of the country is in favor of pulling British troops out now. And if little progress was evident in Iraq before the images of the soldier afire, the photos seemed to show a country going backward.

Tension has reportedly been growing between British troops and the Shiite police and militias that operate in Basra. Iraqi authorities say the police force has been infiltrated by Shiite militiamen from three groups: the Mahdi Army; the Badr Brigade, the armed wing of the Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution; and Hezbollah in Iraq, a small group based in the marshlands in the south.

Basra, with 1.5 million residents, was considered one of Iraq's safer big cities, escaping the Sunni-led violence in the north. But in the last two months there have been dozens of murders and at least eight people in U.S. and British diplomatic convoys have been killed.

General Defends Basra Mission (USAT)

By Steven Komarow And César G. Soriano

USA Today, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD — A British commander, defending the actions of his troops during violence in Basra, said Tuesday that he ordered an armored rescue of two soldiers arrested by Iraqi police only after learning they had been handed over to a radical Muslim militia.

Efforts to rescue the two British soldiers touched off a melee in which a mob attacked British armored vehicles with rockets and firebombs.

"From an early stage, I had good reason to believe that the lives of the two soldiers were at risk, and troops were sent to the area of Basra near the police station to help ensure their safety by providing a cordon," Brig. John Lorimer said in a statement.

Lorimer said authorities in Basra appeared to ignore orders from Iraq's central government to transfer the two soldiers to British authority.

Three British servicemembers were injured during the melee, though none of their injuries was life-threatening. The two rescued soldiers are in good health.

The images of a mob attacking British forces in Basra resonated in Britain, fueling anti-war sentiment. "A significant portion of the population of Basra will now see the British as a hostile occupation force," said Paul Ingram, an analyst at the British American Security Information Council, a think tank.

The picture of a British soldier on fire jumping out of an armored vehicle was plastered on the front page of many newspapers Tuesday. The conservative Daily Mail, which had backed the war, suggested in an editorial that it was time for the British government to rethink its position.

Most of Britain's 8,500 troops are in southern Iraq, a heavily Shiite area that had been relatively peaceful. But there have been recent signs of unrest around Basra, one of Iraq's largest cities.

Three British soldiers have been killed by roadside bombs this month. Monday, an Iraqi reporter working for The New York Times in Basra was found shot to death.

Shiite groups have been vying for control in the city. The "religious parties and their militias" are filling a power vacuum created by an ill-equipped and understaffed government police force, said Muhammed Al-Askari, a military and political analyst in Baghdad.

The standoff Monday suggested local police have been infiltrated by members of the militias.

"It is of deep concern that British soldiers held by the police should end up being held by militia," Lorimer said.

The incident has also raised tensions between British forces and their Iraqi government allies.

Haidar al-Abadi, a spokesman for Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, questioned British claims that the Iraqi government in Baghdad ordered local police to turn the two soldiers over to British control. "The matter was not treated centrally from Baghdad," he said.

The British action was condemned by Basra's provincial governor, Mohammed al-Waili, who called it "barbaric, savage and irresponsible."

The standoff began Monday when Iraqi police arrested two members of Britain's elite Special Air Service, who were on an intelligence mission, according to a British defense source.

British officials asked that the soldiers be turned over to British authority but were rebuffed, Lorimer said. An armored patrol was then dispatched to a police station where the men were believed to be held, Lorimer said. British forces entered the station, during which time "minor damage" was done to a prison compound, he said.

Once the troops confirmed the men were not held there, they went to a home in Basra where the men were being held by militia members. No one was arrested in connection with the rescue mission.

Lorimer said calm had returned to Basra and the incident would not poison relations between British and Iraqi security forces.

"It was a difficult day yesterday, but we have put this behind us and will move on," he said.

Attacks In Iraq Kill 9 Americans, Including State Dept. Aide (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 20 - In one of the most lethal stretches for Americans in Iraq in recent months, nine soldiers and security officers were killed in four attacks in the past two days.

British military officials in Basra, in the south, also faced harsh criticism from the Iraqi government on Tuesday over their siege of a police station there.

Among the attacks on Americans was a suicide bombing on Monday morning that killed a State Department security official and three security contractors as their convoy left the regional American Embassy office in Mosul.

A lone attacker driving an explosives-packed car struck the second of three armored sport-utility vehicles in the convoy as it left the compound, killing the official and contractors instantly, and wounding two more in the other vehicles, a diplomatic official in Baghdad said.

A statement by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice identified the State Department employee as Stephen Eric Sullivan, an assistant regional security officer.

In Basra, the bizarre fight on Monday between some police officers and British soldiers threatened to further destabilize the region, a Shiite-dominated area that had been relatively calm but has had a surge of skirmishes among rival Shiite militias that control much of the Iraqi police and military forces there. The fight broke out when British forces attacked a police station after the detention of two British soldiers apparently disguised in local dress.

Offering new details about the incident, the British military accused the Basra police of turning over the soldiers to hostile Shiite militiamen. That action was a crucial factor in the decision to begin a rescue attempt and knock down the police station's walls with armored vehicles, British officials said.

Pictures of the fighting included images of a British soldier aflame as he scrambled from his burning armored vehicle, and of hundreds of Iraqis throwing rocks and Molotov cocktails at the troops. The British military said no soldiers were seriously wounded.

Ultimately, the two soldiers were not at the jail but were later rescued from a home in Basra, the British military said.

The governor of Basra Province, Muhammad al-Waili, was quoted by The Associated Press as saying militiamen loyal to the rebel Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr had taken custody of the soldiers because of the looming British attack on the police station. He also called for the soldiers to be handed back to the Basra authorities for trial.

The militiamen have been furious with the British military for detaining two senior officials in Mr. Sadr's organization in Basra this week. And Shiite militias have either claimed responsibility or have been suspected in several attacks against British forces in recent months.

In London, a senior British military official interviewed by telephone refused to say how the troops eventually found the home where the two soldiers were held or who the military believed was ultimately behind their detention. British officials also said they did not know whether the Iraqi police who turned the soldiers over to the militia did so because they were in league with the group or because of fear.

"We don't actually know the details of why these people were handed over - whether it was under threats or by collusion, or whatever," the BBC quoted Defense Minister John Reid as saying. "What we do know is that under the law they should have been handed back to the British forces themselves."

The British military said joint British-Iraqi police patrols continued Tuesday. But as coalition forces promote gains in training Iraqi security forces, the skirmish on Monday and the warring statements that followed suggested a breakdown of trust.

In a statement on Tuesday, the commander of the British 12th Mechanized Brigade in Basra, Brig. John Lorimer, said the Iraqi interior minister had personally ordered the release of the British soldiers on Monday but that his order "seems to have been ignored."

However, Haidar al-Ebadi, spokesman for Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, said the police had been right to arrest the soldiers and denied that the Interior Ministry had ordered their release. The soldiers were arrested, he added, because they "had been acting suspiciously in civilian clothes without adequate papers."

"For two guys to be collecting information in civilian clothes in the current tense situation in Iraq and in Basra, the reaction of the Iraqi police is understandable," he said. "It was a very unfortunate development that British soldiers should try to release their soldiers the way it happened."

Hours after those comments, Mr. Jaafari's office issued a statement saying there was no "crisis" between Iraq and the British military.

Reuters reported that video of the soldiers taken while they were in jail showed them "unshaven and looking nervous as police looked over wigs, Arab headdresses, antitank missiles and electronic equipment, all apparently used in their mission."

In addition to the bombing in Mosul, the United States military reported that four Army soldiers assigned to the Second Marine Division were killed in two bombings on Monday during fighting in Ramadi, in Anbar Province.

Embassy Aide Among 9 Americans Killed In Insurgent Attacks In Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Omar Fekeiki

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 20 -- Nine Americans were killed in insurgent attacks across Iraq in the last two days, military and diplomatic sources said Tuesday. The dead included an embassy official and three security contractors killed Monday morning in a suicide car bombing in the northern city of Mosul.

Witnesses in Mosul said a lone driver smashed his red sedan into the second vehicle in a convoy of three sport-utility vehicles, triggering a fiery explosion. Security forces immediately cordoned the area and administered first aid, but the contractors and an assistant regional security officer, Stephen Eric Sullivan, had died instantly, according to a U.S. official in Baghdad who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Two others riding in the diplomatic convoy, which was leaving a U.S. Embassy satellite office, suffered minor injuries.

"Steve was a brave American, dedicated to his country and to a brighter future for the people of Iraq," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a written statement. "Our thoughts and prayers are with Steve's family."

Sullivan, whose job involved coordinating security and overseeing contractors, was the third American diplomat killed since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. Diplomatic security agent Edward J. Seitz died in October in a mortar attack on a U.S. base near Baghdad International Airport. The following month, James Mollen, an American special adviser to Iraq's Higher Education and Scientific Research Ministry, was shot to death near the capital's fortified Green Zone.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of four soldiers in two roadside bombings in the city of Ramadi, 60 miles west of Baghdad, and the death of another soldier whose vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb 75 miles north of the capital. The soldiers' names were not released.

According to the Pentagon, 1,902 U.S. service members, including civilian employees of the Defense Department, have been killed in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion.

The recent rash of violence against Americans came as British and Iraqi officials offered widely contrasting public accounts of the circumstances that led to clashes Monday between British soldiers and Iraqi police in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city. A British armored vehicle smashed into a police station in an attempt to force the release of two British soldiers who had been detained.

Haider Abadi, a spokesman for Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, called the British actions "very unfortunate" and said police had acted correctly in detaining the men, who were behaving "very suspiciously." They were wearing civilian clothes and asking for information in the streets, he said, but would not elaborate.

"We hoped they would solve this problem with the central government," Abadi said. "But the British forces decided to act individually, and the military operation to release the detainees happened the way we saw it. This is wrong, and it is not a healthy way to deal with problems."

Throughout the day, Iraqi and other Arab television stations broadcast images of the two British men, clad in dark pants and T-shirts, seated in front of a table bearing what appeared to be a large quantity of weapons and ammunition purportedly discovered in their possession. One man had scrapes and small cuts on his head and the side of his face.

Brig. John Lorimer said in a written statement that under Iraqi law, the police were required to hand over the men to coalition forces, an outcome he said he and the British consul general had sought to negotiate.

Lorimer said that the Iraqi interior minister had personally ordered the British personnel released and that the order was ignored. Instead, he said, the two were handed over to a local Shiite Muslim militia.

"I became concerned about the safety of the soldiers after we received information that they had been handed over to militia elements," Lorimer said. "As a result, I took the difficult decision to order entry to the Jamiat police station."

British troops set a cordon around the station and were attacked with "firebombs and rockets by a violent and determined crowd," Lorimer said. An armored vehicle plowed through one wall of a building, but the men were not found inside. They were later discovered in a house elsewhere in the city.

"It is of deep concern that British soldiers held by the police should end up being held by militia," Lorimer said. "This is unacceptable, and I should stress that we won't hesitate to take action against those involved in planning and conducting attacks against coalition forces."

DOJ_NMG_0007159

Police officials in Basra have said publicly that the primary loyalty of many of their officers is to Shiite militias such as the Badr Organization, which is affiliated with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the country's dominant Shiite political party. Unrest erupted in Basra this week after the arrest of two members of the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to the outspoken Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr and a rival of the Badr group.

Lorimer did not specify which militia he believed was involved in the British detentions.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Tuesday, government officials said that residents of the northwestern city of Tall Afar who fled during a large U.S.-Iraqi offensive against insurgents this month had been invited to return to their homes and that about $50 million would soon be spent to help rebuild the city.

Abadi, the prime minister's spokesman, said more than 800 suspected insurgents were killed or captured during the operation -- the largest urban assault since the offensive in Fallujah in November.

"The terrorists have received a deadly blow in Tall Afar," Abadi said. He cautioned, however, that intelligence indicated some insurgents were attempting to slip back into the city among returning residents.

Fourteen civilians were killed and 25 wounded during the fighting, he said, adding that residents whose homes and property were damaged would be compensated. The government is also establishing five police stations in a city largely devoid of police presence for much of the past year, he said.

"We have information that some of the terrorists infiltrated the refugee camps," said Brig. Gen. Abdul Aziz Muhammed-Jassim, commander of the Defense Ministry operations room. "Thus, the process of checking people at the entrances to the city is very important to make sure they don't enter the city again."

Abadi said Tall Afar would be secure enough for citizens to vote in the Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's draft constitution. In Baghdad on Tuesday, the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni Muslim political organization, announced in a written statement its "total rejection" of the constitution and urged followers to vote against it. Party leaders had previously suggested they might remain neutral.

Sunnis are widely expected to oppose the constitution, which will fail if two-thirds of voters in at least three provinces vote against it. Among several aspects of the document opposed by many Sunnis is the devolution of power from the central government to regions, a process some fear could lead to Iraq's dissolution.

"We appeal to the people's will represented by the patriotic forces, the civil society institutions and individuals to exercise their rights in rejecting this draft," the party's statement said.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military announced the arrest of two men with medical training who are suspected of being senior members of al Qaeda in Iraq, the country's main insurgent group. Anis Abdul Razaq Ali Muhammad and Mazen Mahdi Salih Mahdi Khudayr are alleged to have established facilities to treat wounded insurgent fighters and were apprehended in raids in Baghdad in late August, the military said.

Basra Violence Challenges U.S. Strategy (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

A surge of violence in Basra, Iraq's second-biggest city, has raised new doubts about the U.S.-led coalition's strategy for pacifying southern Iraq by giving free rein to Shiite religious militias with ties to neighboring Iran.

Backed by the U.S., the British forces in southern Iraq have effectively looked the other way as Shiite Muslim religious parties solidified their control over the city's government and as militia members joined the local police force while maintaining loyalty to militia leaders. The policy choice rested on an unspoken trade-off, with the British banking on the militias' ability to prevent insurgents from sowing instability or endangering Basra's ports and oil fields.

The coalition strategy for Basra has left militiamen in control of Basra's police force and Shiite fighters in plain clothes circulating openly in the city. A combination of the two forces has been blamed for the abduction and murder of two journalists, including one American. The forces are also at the center of the growing international dispute with Britain that erupted this week after British tanks crashed through a Basra prison and British forces raided a private house to free a pair of undercover commandos who had been arrested by Iraqi police and then handed over to militiamen.

The new violence has sparked fears that the Shiite militias aren't under the control of either the British forces in the city or the central government in Baghdad. In the case of the British soldiers, the Interior Ministry in Baghdad ordered officials in Basra to release the two men, but the demands were ignored.

"The British policy was the triumph of short-term stability over long-term success: The Shiite militias metastasize like cancer when they find out they can get away with things," said Michael Rubin, a former adviser to the American occupation authority in Iraq now at the American Enterprise Institute. "We always think we're playing the Iraqis, but they always end up playing us."

The uptick of violence in southern Iraq comes amid unrelenting insurgent attacks throughout the country. Eight American soldiers were killed in roadside attacks yesterday, while a suicide car bombing near the northern city of Mosul killed a State Department security officer and three American security contractors.

It is also happening as Shiites ratchet up their demands for far-reaching regional autonomy in southern Iraq ahead of a key referendum next month on the country's draft constitution. Shiite leaders are pressing for the creation of an oil-rich quasistate comprising Basra and eight neighboring provinces, a step fiercely opposed by Sunni Muslim Arabs, who complain that Shiite leaders are using militias and government forces to intimidate them through mass arrests and targeted killings.

The new tensions in Basra stem from the Shiite religious parties' growing impatience to impose strict religious law across the region and establish a largely independent regional government, said Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, which provides analysis to U.S. lawmakers. He noted that Shiite militias in Basra have already begun effectively segregating the city's schools, beating up or arresting alcohol sellers and forcing men to wear beards.

"The militias and the parties want Islamic law and a form of Islamic government in Basra, and they're increasingly impatient with anyone trying to restrain them," he said. "What we're seeing is the creeping Islamization of that entire region."

The Shiite parties' main instrument for expanding their power over Basra has come from their ability to place militiamen in the city's police force. In an interview with a British newspaper this summer, Basra's police chief, Gen. Hassan al-Sade, admitted that three-quarters of his force of 13,600 men were openly loyal to the religious parties. Western visitors to the city say police cars there are emblazoned with posters of the Shiite parties.

"You have fighters from the different militias in the police force who don't give their allegiance to the police commander or the governor," said Peter Khalil, a former security adviser to the occupation authorities who now works for the Eurasia Group, a consulting company in New York. "These guys have just seeped in for months, with no transparency in their recruitment and no vetting of their backgrounds."

Sunni residents of Basra have complained for months that Shiites are using government security forces to conduct mass arrests and targeted killings designed to intimidate them. Shiite leaders have denied the accusations, but tensions between the two groups continue to rise.

Three British soldiers have been killed so far this month in roadside bombings that London attributed to Sunni militants who infiltrated the region from the restive central province of al-Anbar. The Sunni fighters' ability to carry out the attacks in a predominantly Shiite region suggested that embittered Sunni residents of the Basra area have begun offering shelter and other logistical support to militants from other parts of the country, Mr. Katzman said.

"The fact that Sunnis there are now welcoming insurgents from the rest of Iraq is obviously very worrisome," he said.

Sadr Militia's New Muscle In South (CSM)

By Jill Carroll

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD - Moqtada al-Sadr, the young Shiite cleric who promised to disband his militia after clashing with US forces last April, proved this week that he remains a potent threat to both coalition troops and Iraq's fledgling government.

In a dramatic battle against British forces in Basra, Mr. Sadr quickly mobilized scores of supporters to descend on tanks, setting at least one alight and injuring three British soldiers on Monday.

While the British Army's strategy of appeasement has brought quiet to the Shiite-dominated south for some time, it has allowed militias such as Sadr's Mahdi Army to quietly regroup and flourish. Consequently, Sadr's followers - who have close ties to the city police - have more control of Basra's streets than British troops.

This control has also created a climate of fear among many residents not unlike that under Saddam Hussein. There are whispers that Sadr has established his own sharia courts, which issue rulings based on Islamic law. The Mahdi Army enforces its decisions, Basra residents say.

To build his network of loyal followers, Sadr offers payments to the families of his militia members who died in the fighting in August. Some 3,000 families are dependent on money or other help from the Sadr movement.

When an Iraqi is in poor health in Baghdad, more often than not it's a Sadr movement member who provides aid. Sadr movement officials run the Health Ministry, extending influence from the hospitals to the ambulance service. Posters, stickers, and other memorabilia of Sadr are plastered on Ministry of Health checkpoints, hospitals, and the walls of Baghdad's main ambulance center.

Despite years of community outreach, British forces had no better recourse Monday to free two soldiers arrested by police loyal to Sadr than to ram the jail where they were initially held with tanks. When the British discovered the soldiers were not there, they raided a nearby house where the two were being kept by militia members, according to the British.

"I have no doubt that there was an institutional desire on the part of the British military to have good relations with as many Iraqis as possible," says Robert Springborg, director of the London Middle East Institute that gave Iraq-bound British solders cultural sensitivity training. "It's much less a military problem than a political problem. [But] the resolution of the problems is beyond the control of the British government ... no one really is in control of this [political] process now and that's worrying."

The spark that caused the violence in Basra was the arrest Sunday of leading Sadr cleric Ahmed al-Fertusi and his assistant by British troops. The British claimed they were responsible for planning attacks on their forces. With tension already high between Sadr followers and British troops, Sadr demonstrators poured into the streets to demand Mr. Fertusi's release.

The next day, two British military personnel disguised as Iraqis engaged in a gun battle with Iraqi police, killing one police officer, according to varying accounts. The police eventually captured the two men. When British tanks arrived to free the detainees, crowds attacked them.

Top Sadr official Abbas Rubaie has charged the two undercover British officers with planting roadside bombs in order to justify a longer military presence in the country.

"What the British are doing in Basra is terrorism. They are attacking [British] troops so they can say 'someone attacked us and we need to stay as long as possible,' " Rubaie said.

A statement from the Sadr movement claimed that the two British undercover officers had also been firing into a crowd of pilgrims Monday going to a local shrine to mark the birth of the Imam Mehdi, the 12th and last Imam, or Shiite saint.

They also charged that when "the people of Basra demonstrated" to stop British tanks from freeing the two officers from jail, the troops fired on the crowd "killing and wounding many of them." They said the British tanks crashed into the jail allowing "150 terrorists" to escape.

Iraqi officials Tuesday condemned the British operation. "It is a very unfortunate development that the British forces should try to release their forces the way it happened," Haider al-Ebadi, an adviser to Prime Minister Ibrahim Jaafari, said at a news conference in Baghdad.

While one of Iraq's major cities, Basra is more like a small town, residents say, where everyone knows everyone. People could once play music outside, unmarried couples could once walk together. But as several Shiite groups vie for power, many worry the militias, particularly Sadr's, have forever changed the mood of their city.

These days saying anything against the Mahdi Army or its rival, the Badr Organization backed by ruling Shiite Islamist party Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), can be deadly.

"No one trusts anyone," says Ali Abdel Zahara one of few Basra residents willing to discuss the situation and who gave a false name for fear of retribution from the militias. "You can't talk about this, even at home."

He says Sadr has emerged as the most powerful force among the many groups that are controlling different sections of the town and police. "The ones that are in control are the tribes and the parties. Each one in the police is a representative of his party or his tribe," says Zahara. "Sadr is the biggest because they always solve the problems they face with violence."

In further evidence of the violence that has gripped Basra, Fakher Haider, an Iraqi journalist working with The New York Times was killed Sunday after being abducted by men who witnesses said claimed to be police officers. He was found dead outside the city early Monday. Early last month, Monitor contributor Steven Vincent was abducted by men who, according to witnesses, drove police vehicles. Like Mr. Haider, he was discovered dead not long after being abducted.

Militias Supplant Basra Police, Inflict Chaos (WT)

By Adrian Blomfield, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD -- They wear police uniforms and drive official police vehicles, but the main priority of the rival militias that have usurped Basra's police force is not to maintain law and order.

Instead, they have turned Iraq's third-largest city into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms, where competing militias run corruption scams and kill their rivals, dumping the bodies into a garbage dump known as the Lot on the outskirts of the city.

Although British troops have earned plaudits for avoiding the sledgehammer tactics of American troops in Sunni Arab areas to the north, questions are being asked about the wisdom of Britain's "softly, softly" policy.

British officers, however, say they have little choice in the matter, insisting that troop strength has been insufficient to deal with the problem.

"Quite frankly, we have one brigade here and we've worked bloody miracles," said an officer in Basra who asked not to be identified. "We have had to let the Iraqis get on with it."

There was a sense of inevitability about the chaotic scenes in Basra on Monday, when British tanks smashed the walls of an Iraqi prison to free two undercover British soldiers seized earlier by Iraqi forces.

DOJ_NMG_0007162

British officials had been keen to emphasize the relative tranquillity of the city in comparison with Baghdad and other towns to the north.

But behind the scenes is growing unease at Basra's descent into lawlessness and on the increasing influence of Iran on the city's main political factions.

Troops were ordered not to stop if challenged by police officers in case they were militiamen linked to attacks that, this month alone, have resulted in the deaths of three British soldiers and eight Americans in the Basra region.

The raid to rescue two Special Air Service commandos held by a militia that operated as part of Basra's police force has destroyed the pretense of a normal relationship with Basra's authorities.

The group holding the two soldiers blithely ignored instructions from the government in Baghdad to release them, leading many observers to ask who really controls the city.

In May, Basra's police chief, Hassan al-Sade, acknowledged that he had lost control of 75 percent of his 13,750-strong force, saying they either worked for political factions or were involved in attacks on coalition forces.

For his honesty, Basra's governor, Mohammed al-Waili -- who condemned the British raid to free the commandos as "barbaric, savage and irresponsible" -- fired him.

Since the United States handed over sovereignty to an Iraqi government in June 2004, Basra has become one of the country's most conservative Shi'ite bastions.

The city is essentially divided among three factions, although even they are riven by internal squabbles.

The Mahdi's Army of Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr, the cleric who twice last year led bloody confrontations against U.S. forces, is the smallest but is gaining ground in two of Basra's largest suburbs.

The Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the largest party in the ruling coalition, is officially the largest faction and its Badr Brigade militia is accused of many of the assassinations.

SCIRI, however, often is outmaneuvered by the Fudala party, which fell out with Sheik al-Sadr but follows the radical strictures of his father, Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr.

It is led by Mohammed Yaqubi, who has close ties to grand ayatollahs in the Iranian holy city of Qom. All three groups are determined to some extent to turn Iraq into an Islamic republic modeled on Iran.

"Iran has a very strong influence across Basra," said respected Iraqi member of parliament Ali al-Dabbagh. "It's not just the Sadrists. Individuals in each and every party are receiving financial backing from Iran."

Iraq's People Need American Troops (WSJ)

By Jalal Talabani

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD -- There is no more important international issue today than the need to defeat the curse of terrorism. And as the first democratically elected president of Iraq, I have a responsibility to ensure that the world's youngest democracy survives the inherently difficult transition from totalitarianism to pluralism. A transformation of the Iraqi state and Iraqi society is impossible without a sustained commitment of soldiers from the U.S. and other democracies.

To understand why, let us recall how we reached this juncture in history. How is it that Iraq today has a democratically elected head of state, government and Parliament? How it is that members of the most repressed ethnic groups now hold the highest offices of state? All these welcome developments are a result of the courage and vision of President Bush and his allies, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Australian Prime Minister John Howard, leaders whose commitment of troops to enforce U.N. Security Council resolutions liberated Iraq.

Without foreign intervention, the transition in Iraq would have been from Saddam's bloodstained hands to his psychopathic offspring. Instead, thanks to American leadership, Iraqis have been given an opportunity of peaceful, participatory politics. Contrary to the new conventional wisdom, Iraq and the history of 20th-century Europe demonstrate that force of arms can implant democracy in the most arid soil.

The rapidity of the democratization and reform of Iraq is staggering. There was no German state for four years after the Second World War. By contrast, Iraq has moved from a centralized, one-man dictatorship to a decentralized, federal republic in half that time.

Inevitably, there have been stresses and strains. In Iraq these have been amplified by the terrorism of the remnants of the fascist Baathist dictatorship and our interfering neighbors. To contain these tensions, and to defend our young democracy, requires the support of American and other troops. Foreign forces are needed to train and equip the new Iraqi armed forces and to give Iraq its own counterterrorism capability. Only the United States and its closest allies are able to provide such assistance.

Creating these Iraqi forces has not been easy, but Iraqis have been undaunted by the difficulties. Every terrorist attack on Iraqi forces leads to a surge in military recruitment -- the opposite of the appeasers' myth that resisting terrorism causes more terrorism. For all the short-term problems, the soundness of the long-term strategy of building up Iraqi forces was demonstrated in recent days when Iraqis took over sole control of security in the holy city of Najaf.

As Iraqi forces gain in confidence and capability, so the need for foreign troops will diminish. The number of foreign troops will be determined in consultations between the Iraqi government and its foreign allies on the basis of operational requirements.

American forces are in Iraq at the invitation of the democratically elected government of Iraq, and with the backing of a United Nations Security Council resolution. Your soldiers are in my country because of your commitment to democracy. Moreover, during my visit to Washington, Mr. Bush reaffirmed the United States' complete support for the Iraqi political process toward sustainable democracy, and for the fight to defeat fascist and jihadist terrorism in Iraq.

That commitment to liberty has shaped our opposition to any timetable for withdrawal. There are also two practical, policy reasons to avoid such a scheduled reduction in foreign troop numbers. First, a timetable will aid the terrorists and tell them that all they have to do is wait. Second, military plans must be flexible. We should have the suppleness to respond to the often-changing level of terrorist threat. Indeed, we will require ongoing security assistance in many forms for many years to come.

If we keep progressing at the present rate, Iraqis may be able to take over many security functions from foreign forces by the end of 2006. That is not a deadline, but it is reasonable aspiration. During my visit to the United States, I was fortunate to meet relatives of some of the brave troops serving in Iraq. They were staunch, and I want their loved ones to have to serve in Iraq not a moment longer than is necessary.

Americans should be proud of what its soldiers have achieved. The presence of foreign forces has prevented a renewed civil war in Iraq -- renewed because there has already been a civil war in Iraq. For 35 years, Saddam and his Baath Party made war on the Iraqi people. The liberation of Iraq ended that civil war.

Above all, American forces provide Iraq with a much-needed deterrence capability. In the past, Iraq sought an illusory security through the follies of aggression, terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. Today, our external security comes from our alliance with the United States. Our neighbors can thereby be assured that we will settle all of our differences with them peacefully.

Sadly, some of our neighbors have chosen not to understand this. They seem either unwilling or unable to shut off the pipeline of terrorists crossing into Iraq. And in addition to what is at least passive support for the terrorists, some of them are providing financial and material support to them, too. They must desist from this behavior now.

While the problem of some of our neighbors supporting terrorism is bad enough, we can only imagine what our neighbors might have done if American troops had not been present. Most likely, Iraq would have been transformed into a regional battlefield, with disastrous consequences for Middle Eastern and global security.

Without American forces, the vision of American leadership and the quiet fortitude of the American people, Iraqis would be almost alone in the world. With its allies, the United States has provided Iraqis with an unprecedented opportunity. Iraqis have responded by enthusiastically embracing democracy and volunteering to fight for their country. By giving us the tools, your troops help us to defend Iraqi democracy and to finish the job of uprooting Baathist fascism.

Mr. Talabani is president of Iraq..

Forces Bolstered In Western Iraq (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 20 -- U.S. and Iraqi commanders have begun bolstering forces in western Iraq's Euphrates River valley, hoping to choke the flow of foreign fighters along what intelligence officers say has become the primary infiltration route from Syria toward Baghdad.

The buildup, called Operation Sayaid, is aimed at securing the border area around the restive town of Qaim and suppressing other insurgent activity in the villages that hug the winding banks of the Euphrates west of Baghdad.

In recent public remarks, Iraqi Defense Minister Sadoun Dulaimi signaled plans to step up military operations in the valley. Gen. George W. Casey, the senior U.S. commander in Iraq, said in an interview that his forces were intent on "restoring Iraqi control of its border by the end of November, before the December elections." Iraqis are expected to vote for a new parliament by Dec. 15, following a referendum Oct. 15 on the country's draft constitution.

The effort follows months of growing concern, both inside and outside U.S. military ranks, that not enough forces had been committed to the western reaches of Anbar province, a stronghold of Iraq's Sunni Arab resistance and of Abu Musab Zarqawi's foreign-dominated insurgent group, al Qaeda in Iraq. Although U.S. Marines have conducted a series of raids in the far west, most lasting about a week, the longer-term presence of U.S. and Iraqi troops there has been relatively small.

Out of 32,000 U.S. service members in the province, only one Marine regimental combat team -- fewer than 5,000 troops -- and some Special Operations forces have operated in the far western region.

Consequently, insurgent fighters have continued to move freely in many places, according to U.S. officers. Zarqawi's network, in particular, is said to have established safe houses throughout the valley to shelter foreign fighters who enter from Syria before moving on to stage attacks in Baghdad and elsewhere.

"It's not something we haven't known about," said a senior U.S. officer involved in overseeing military operations. "It's just something we're now in position to do something about."

Plans call for adding several more battalions to the area, drawn from the U.S. Army and the Iraqi Intervention Force, one of the most seasoned of the country's military units. Commanders requested that specific troop numbers not be published.

These troops will back up a freshly trained contingent of several hundred Iraqi border guards. In time, the plan calls for thousands of soldiers belonging to Iraq's 7th Army Division, which is still being formed, to provide a permanent military presence in several towns along the river.

Success in quelling insurgent activity elsewhere in Iraq has freed some U.S. troops for reassignment to the river valley, and more Iraqi forces also have become available for duty there, U.S. officers said. In the meantime, the insurgent threat in the area has intensified, the officers added.

Until earlier this year, the main infiltration route for foreign fighters had been along a corridor in northwestern Iraq running from the border with Syria through the city of Mosul, U.S. military intelligence officers said. In May, the Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment was reassigned from south of Baghdad to take back the region from insurgents.

The regiment's operations west of Mosul, culminating in the assault this month on Tall Afar, plus the killing or capturing of at least 20 leading Zarqawi network operatives in Mosul since the spring by the 25th Infantry Division's 1st Brigade, have halted much of the northwestern infiltration. The traffic then shifted south through the Euphrates River valley, the intelligence officers said.

The first phase of Operation Sayaid came in July when an Army squadron of Stryker vehicles, augmented for intelligence gathering, rolled south from Mosul to set up an outpost near the Euphrates River town of Rawah. The contingent of more than 1,000 troops established an American presence on the north side of the river; the Marines had been operating on the south side. Also arriving in Rawah was an Iraqi Intervention Force battalion.

The troops have imposed tight controls on traffic that now must use the single bridge in Rawah. U.S. warplanes this month blew up two smaller pontoon bridges farther west in the towns of Karabilah and New Ubaydi, making the Rawah river crossing even more critical.

Bolstering forces as far west as Qaim, the offensive is designed to restore Iraqi control in the area rather than completely shut the border. Still, the operation is considered key to reducing insurgent activity before the December elections.

"There's no expectation that the border will be sealed," said another senior U.S. military officer. "But the presence of Iraqi border forces and Iraqi army forces, backed up by coalition forces -- that's what we're going to achieve by November 30. So you'll have a lot more people who can dominate the area, which means you will certainly have denied sanctuary for insurgents."

U.S. military estimates of the number of insurgents in the area range from 1,500 to 2,500, with 100 to 150 foreign fighters entering Iraq from Syria each month, one or two at a time. The insurgents intimidate residents and exert control in villages where U.S. and Iraqi forces have no permanent presence, U.S. officers said. Even where troops do patrol, in such towns as Hit, Haditha and Qaim, the insurgents operate in small cells, U.S. intelligence officers said.

About 250,000 people live in the area between Qaim and Rawah, their small houses and villages closely spaced through the valley. Apart from a narrow belt of cultivated land about a mile wide on each side of the river, most of the territory to the north and south is barren and inhospitable.

Although it represents a significant expansion of the U.S. military campaign in Iraq, the new push into the Euphrates valley could fall short of a decisive turn in the conflict -- particularly if, as in previous U.S. offensives in the country, insurgents duck away from the fight hoping to return after U.S. forces withdraw.

One factor raising the chances that the valley, if secured this time, will remain that way is the Iraqi government's intention to keep several Iraqi brigades stationed there, U.S. officers said.

"We can't afford to let the enemy get dug into another safe haven," Casey said.

Army Col. Robert B. Brown, the 1st Brigade commander whose forces set up the outpost at Rawah, agreed. "I think it's smart to focus on the west because that's where your martyrs are coming from," he said. "I don't know if you can ever stop it totally, but you can clearly disrupt the heck out of them."

Saudi Fighters In Iraq Bring Money (AJC/AP)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

CAIRO, Egypt — Saudi fighters make up only about 1 percent of Iraq's insurgency, but each contributes thousands of dollars to the cause — and they make sure their roles as "martyrs" are known when they carry out suicide attacks, helping draw more recruits, a new report said.

About 30,000 fighters are believed to be involved in the insurgency, approximately 90 percent of them Sunni Arab Iraqis motivated by fear of Shiite domination or anger over lost power, said the report by the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Of the estimated 3,000 foreign fighters, the largest number — about 20 percent — comes from Algeria, followed by Syria and Yemen with about 18 percent and 17 percent, respectively, said the report issued Monday. About 15 percent come from Sudan, 12 percent from Saudi Arabia, 5 percent from Egypt, and the rest from other countries.

Of about 350 Saudis who entered Iraq by August 2005, about 130 are believed to have been killed or captured, it said.

The report, written by Nawaf Obaid and Anthony Cordesman, was a contrast to accounts contending that Saudis make up a large proportion of foreign fighters in the insurgency that has persisted since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in March 2003.

The study by the CSIS, an independent think tank, said its information was compiled from estimates provided by Saudi intelligence services based on interrogations of captured militants and other sources, and by intelligence agencies of other, unidentified governments in the region.

The "main pillar" of the insurgency is not former Saddam loyalists, though they do contribute expertise, the report said. Instead the bulk of fighters are members of Sunni Arab Iraqi tribes. "Although they do not support a return to Saddam Hussein's regime, most are Sunnis wary of a Shiite-led government," it said.

Most of the Saudis who join the insurgency "were motivated by revulsion at the idea of an Arab land being occupied by a non-Arab country" and anger over allegations of U.S. abuses at the Abu Ghraib or Guantanamo Bay prisons, it said. They average in age between 17-25.

Notably, most of those caught by Saudi authorities trying to enter Iraq "were not militants before the Iraq war," it said. Eighty-five percent were not on any government watch list or known to be al-Qaida members. Instead, they were "radicalized almost exclusively by the coalition invasion," the report said.

The Saudis provide money and propaganda for the insurgents, it said. Unlike fighters from poor Arab nations, Saudis sometimes bring in "personal funds between $10,000 and $15,000" to contribute, the report said.

There also is a system for spreading the news of suicide bombings carried out by Saudis, unlike suicide bombers from Algeria or Egypt, whose families may never be notified, the report said. Saudi bombers leave their colleagues a contact number to notify next of kin.

"The media attention their deaths as 'martyrs' bring to the cause ... is a powerful recruiting tool," the report said.

And Saudi exploits are exaggerated in Internet statements issued by insurgent groups. It noted that analysis of some lists of "martyrs" posted on Islamic militant Web sites found that some said to have carried out suicide attacks were living in Saudi Arabia.

Many of the Saudi fighters were inspired to go to Iraq by militant clerics, who also helped the young men get there, often through Syria.

In one case cited by the report, a 24-year-old Saudi angered by the U.S. invasion of Iraq was introduced by a cleric to a Yemeni al-Qaida operative. The operative indoctrinated him and three of his friends, bought them plane tickets to Damascus in July 2003 and gave them a Syrian contact.

The Syrian took the men to the border and Iraqi handlers brought them to Tikrit, where they joined an insurgent "battalion" made up mostly of Saudis. The Saudi's friends agreed to become suicide bombers, but he declined and returned to Saudi Arabia, where he was arrested.

Contractor Charged In Baghdad Badge Scam (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Josh White

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

A military contractor returning from Iraq was charged yesterday with distributing identity badges that control access to Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone to people not allowed to receive them, including an Iraqi woman he was dating.

Thomas Nelson Barnes III, who worked for DynCorp International, was arrested by federal agents as he arrived at Dulles International Airport. He is accused of defrauding the U.S. government by issuing the high-security badges to other Iraqi civilians and a DynCorp executive.

Security in Baghdad's International Zone -- commonly referred to as the Green Zone -- has been extremely tight since U.S. forces took control of Baghdad during the invasion of Iraq in 2003. The zone, surrounded by blast walls and heavily guarded entry checkpoints, encompasses much of central Baghdad and houses the U.S. Embassy, Iraq's interim government and many coalition and civilian military personnel.

Although law enforcement sources said they knew of no specific security problem resulting from Barnes's alleged actions, federal and military officials warned that any breach could have dire consequences. The Green Zone's entry checkpoints have been the scene of numerous car bombings and are guarded by heavily armed coalition soldiers.

"A free pass to the International Zone is something that an insurgent would love to get his hands on," said Lt. Col. Barry Venable, a Pentagon spokesman. "A compromised badge represents a potential avenue of approach into the zone for folks who would want to commit violence."

The badges allegedly passed out by Barnes have different colors indicating level of access to the Green Zone. The highest access is blue. An FBI affidavit, filed in federal court in Alexandria, said Barnes gave a blue badge to an Iraqi woman he was dating, when she was allowed only a purple badge -- a lower clearance.

He allegedly gave various badges to other Iraqi friends, along with a blue badge to a DynCorp vice president who was not entitled to receive it. Barnes, 48, of Fort Worth appeared in U.S. District Court in Alexandria yesterday and was released on a personal recognizance bond pending another hearing Thursday. He could not be found later for comment, and a defense attorney had not been appointed for him.

Barnes is charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States and use and possession of military passes with the intent to defraud. If convicted, he faces up to five years in prison.

Gregory Lagana, a spokesman for Irving, Tex.-based DynCorp, said Barnes had worked for the company for just over a year and was fired recently because of the investigation. The company was awarded a $7.7 million Pentagon contract in March 2004 to establish a program to centralize ID badges being given out for the Green Zone by a variety of government agencies.

Barnes, a supervisor, was one of fewer than 50 DynCorp employees on the project. "We are disturbed by this," Lagana said. "We do a lot of work for the U.S. government, and we have a very good record. We are cooperating fully and absolutely."

Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, a trade association for government contractors, said the case should not be viewed as an indictment of the tens of thousands of military contractors in Iraq. "There is absolutely no evidence that there have been any more security problems with contractors than with federal government employees or anyone else."

The case is among the first brought by federal prosecutors in Alexandria since February, when U.S. Attorney Paul J. McNulty announced a crackdown on fraud in government programs. Law enforcement sources familiar with the case said the allegations against Barnes arose from that initiative.

England Statement OK'd (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

FORT HOOD, Texas (AP) -- A military judge reversed himself yesterday and decided to let prosecutors use a statement Army Pfc. Lynndie England gave to investigators implicating herself in the abuse of prisoners at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

Pfc. England's court-martial trial on seven counts of conspiracy and prisoner abuse will begin today with jury selection and opening statements. The 22-year-old reservist from rural West Virginia, who is shown in several graphic photos taken by Abu Ghraib guards in 2003, faces up to 11 years in a military prison if convicted.

Pfc. England broke with the pattern of her co-defendants yesterday by opting for an all-officer jury. Two of the others were convicted by juries made up of officers and enlisted personnel, and the other six made plea deals. Most were members of the Maryland-based 372nd Military Police Company.

The judge presiding over Pfc. England's case, Col. James Pohl, had ruled in July that neither of two statements Pfc. England made in January 2004, when she implicated herself in the abuse, would be admissible. He said he thought she did not fully understand the consequences when she waived her rights against self-incrimination before speaking to the investigators.

Yesterday, however, the judge said he now thinks Pfc. England knew what she was doing when she signed a waiver before making the second statement. Her first statement remains inadmissible.

In May, Pfc. England made a plea agreement that eventually collapsed, but this time "there's not going to be a deal," said Capt. Jonathan Crisp, her lead defense attorney.

Capt. Crisp said he plans to base much of his defense on Pfc. England's history of mental health problems that date to her early childhood.

He said he also will focus on the influence exerted over her by Pvt. Charles Graner, the reputed ringleader of the abuse.

Graner, who Pfc. England has said fathered her young son, was convicted in January and sentenced to 10 years in prison.

In her attempted plea deal, Pfc. England pleaded guilty to all of the same counts she faces this week in exchange for an undisclosed sentencing cap. The charges carry a maximum sentence of 11 years.

Col. Pohl threw out the plea deal and declared a mistrial during the sentencing phase because Graner's testimony contradicted Pfc. England's guilty plea.

Graner, testifying as a defense witness, had said pictures he took of Pfc. England holding a prisoner on a leash were meant to be used as a training aid. But in her guilty plea, Pfc. England said the pictures were being taken purely for the amusement of the Abu Ghraib guards.

Prosecutors have refused to discuss the trial.

Battle Lines Behind The Battle Lines (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

FAYETTEVILLE, N.C. -- In military communities across the United States, a debate over the Iraq war is being waged by reluctant, neophyte activists. Their microphones chirp and squeak, or don't pick up their quiet voices at all. Their signs are too small. They forget the banners.

"This is my community. I don't want to offend people here. But my husband is a soldier; he can't say anything. So it's my duty as a citizen to speak up," Kara Hollingsworth, a D.C. native and Army wife at Fort Bragg whose husband served two tours in Iraq, said as she took a seat on a panel of antiwar activists last week.

A few hours earlier, another Army spouse stood in the red-brick village square near the base and held up a handmade sign supporting the war. She threw it together after she heard that an antiwar caravan was coming to town.

"I've never done this before. I'm usually a quiet military wife. But I can't take this anymore," said Marlene Lowrey, whose husband also served in Iraq. "This isn't right, coming into a town like this with that antiwar stuff. Those people don't realize this brings down morale."

Military families, stoic and tight-lipped during most of the nation's wars, have become a powerful voice on both sides of the bitter argument over U.S. involvement in Iraq. And their growing prominence will add a poignant note to Saturday's antiwar march and rally near the White House.

Organizers of the protest, who anticipate a crowd of about 100,000, estimate that thousands of military families and veterans will join in the demonstration. Three busloads of military families have been touring the country since Aug. 31 and will converge on Washington today to promote Saturday's rally.

In recent weeks, war supporters have been countering those bus stops, rallies and vigils with demonstrations of their own. They've got their own bus touring the country and are planning three days of counter-protests in Washington this weekend.

Both sides embrace the slogan "Support our troops." They just disagree on how to do it. They also were inspired by the same person: Cindy Sheehan, who lost her son in combat and kept a vigil near President Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex., through most of August.

Because of Sheehan, "military families across the country are stepping forward to speak out" in support of U.S. policy, said Iowa state Sen. Charles W. Larson Jr., who recently served a year in Iraq with the Army. "You don't normally see people like this do that. They are angry and frustrated, and that is why they have become engaged in the debate."

Sheehan also galvanized Phil and Linda Waste, who were riding one of the "Bring Them Home Now" buses through the hills of North Carolina last week. Their three sons, grandson and granddaughter are all in the military and have served a total of 58 months in Iraq, and the Wastes have white-knuckled their way through each of those tours of duty.

"Then we saw Cindy in Texas," said Linda Waste, holding tight to the table's edge on the bumping bus. Her husband picked up her thought: "And then we heard people call her unpatriotic. And that was it."

The Wastes finish each other's sentences and kiss each time they say "bring them home now" in unison. The people on the bus have started to call them Philinda.

"It's something I've got to do. Otherwise, I can't live with the guilt of what I did to my sons," Phil Waste said. He served in the Navy and has the blurry, sagging tattoos to prove it. He never fought in a war and used the mechanical skills he learned in the military to earn a decent living repairing elevators. "I told them the military was a good place to start out, a good place to learn a skill." He shakes his head and begins to cry.

The three buses have stopped in small towns and state capitals, the riders helping one another step onto makeshift stages to tell their stories and assure other folks that being antiwar doesn't mean being anti-soldier.

DOJ_NMG_0007168

"You wouldn't believe how many people in the military are relieved to hear us speak. It's like they have permission to be angry now," said Julie Cuniglio of Dallas, who comes from a large military family. She joined the bus tour in Crawford, mourning the death of her nephew, Staff Sgt. Aaron Dean White, who was killed in May 2003 in Iraq.

The antiwar tours have hit 51 cities in 28 states, covering the South, Midwest and North.

Sheehan has met up with each tour at various times, flying from one city to the next, making quick speaking appearances and signing a few autographs.

Some families have joined the tour for a few days. Others, such as Philinda, are in it for the long haul -- from Crawford to Washington in 24 days.

Last week, the riders on the southern tour had been wearing the same clothes for days and were begging their chain-smoking, ex-Navy driver, who goes only by "Chito," to stop for a bite to eat. In some cities, like-minded families served them fried chicken and potato salad dinners and sometimes put them up for the night. Other nights, they slept on the bus or occasionally splurged for a cheap hotel.

Sometimes, the mere threat of the tour barreling through town spurred people on the other side into action. In downtown Raleigh, N.C., a group of veterans quickly assembled a small rally to counter Sheehan's message. The antiwar tour never showed up at that spot, but Matthew Delk did.

"I'm really not into going to protests. That's not me," said Delk, a beefy Iraq war veteran who spent weeks recovering at Walter Reed Army Medical Center from burns on his hands and chest. A National Guardsman, he is the manager for Halifax County in North Carolina, and he was sweating in a charcoal suit far different from his desert fatigues. "As a soldier, I'm not supposed to get involved in this stuff. But I believe that our mission is a noble mission. And I feel like I had to come here and say my piece."

Carolyn Culbreth, whose father is a retired Special Forces soldier, came to downtown Fayetteville on her lunch hour to meet the antiwar bus. "What they're doing is unpatriotic," Culbreth said, spangled head to toe in red, white and blue. "And in a place like this, it's just like a slap in the face."

When Chito parked the Bring Them Home Now bus in the center of Fayetteville the next day, cars whizzing by it honked and drivers barked at the slogans all over the windows and sides.

A woman in a silver Mercedes leaned out and shouted, "Go home!" A man in a red muscle car gave members of the group an obscene gesture. A soldier in a beat-up Olds Cutlass gave them a peace sign.

Protests Will Test Police Strategy (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Police in the District are preparing for a weekend of demonstrations that could bring as many as 100,000 protesters and test new procedures on handling them.

The demonstrations are scheduled from tomorrow through Monday, but police officials anticipate the biggest turnout Saturday at an anti-war and anti-racism rally on the Ellipse, immediately south of the White House.

The event is scheduled to include a speech by anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, whose enlisted son was killed while fighting in Iraq.

"It's possible that this will be the largest anti-war demonstration since the war in Iraq began in March 2003," said Caneisha Miller, a spokeswoman for event organizer Act Now to Stop War and End Racism, or ANSWER.

Miss Miller said the group has permits from the Metropolitan Police Department that allows it to start a march at 11:30 a.m. that will go from the Ellipse, north on 15th Street Northwest to the front of the White House, west on Pennsylvania Avenue Northwest, north on 17th Street Northwest, east on H Street Northwest, then back to the starting point.

U.S. Park Police spokesman Sgt. Scott Fear said the agency has canceled vacations and other leaves and that officers will be out in force. However, he did not expect problems.

"The majority of these groups meet with us regularly," he said. "They want to be able to come back so we believe what they tell us. It's the splinter groups that we worry about."

In the past, such groups have used the demonstrations as cover to set fires, break windows and destroy private property.

Such violence during a 2002 protest resulted in Metropolitan Police Department officers herding demonstrators without permits into Pershing Park in Northwest. Among those arrested were onlookers and reporters who were restrained, taken by Metro bus to a police station, then made to wait several hours while their paperwork was processed.

An investigation concluded that police failed to give demonstrators enough warning to disperse, which resulted in new laws that took effect in April.

DOJ_NMG_0007169

The laws limit officers' use of police lines to entrap demonstrators and their use of wrist-to-ankle restraints. They also require officers to wear identifiable badge numbers.

The Metropolitan Police Department has yet to release details on street closures and other plans such as canceling leave time for officers, help from other jurisdictions and activating the city's network of surveillance cameras.

The most disruptive event could be on Sunday when the group Mobilization for Global Justice is scheduled to join the group Adopt an Intersection to block streets to keep International Monetary Fund and World Bank officers from getting to their semiannual meetings.

At about the same time, the group Operation Iraqi Hope will hold a rally in support of the war in Iraq that will include parents and family members of soldiers who gave their lives in support of the effort. The rally is scheduled to take place from noon until 3 p.m. on the Mall at Fourth Street Northwest.

Folk renewal

It was nearly 40 years ago, during the height of the Vietnam War, that a young folk singer by the name of Joan Baez got arrested during a "sit-in" at a military induction center in Oakland, Calif.

One year later, in 1968, she would marry outspoken anti-Vietnam War protester David Harris, who eventually got locked up himself for dodging the draft. The marriage didn't last.

During Christmas week in 1972, Ms. Baez traveled to North Vietnam, only to hunker down with the enemy during Uncle Sam's 11-day "Christmas bombing" of Hanoi.

This Saturday, with the backdrop of a new war being fought by a commander in chief, the folk singer is picking up her guitar where she left off -- performing within view of the White House at what is being promoted as a "massive" anti-war concert, "Operation Ceasefire," on the National Mall.

Also appearing on stage: punk-rock bands Le Tigre, Bouncing Souls and the Machtres; hip-hop groups the Coup and Head-Roc; Wayne Kramer of the MC5 with the Bellrays; country music artist Steve Earle; independent artists Ted Leo and the Pharmacists; the Evens and Sweet Honey in the Rock; and last, but not least, prominent peace mom Cindy Sheehan.

The lineup is sponsored by United for Peace & Justice and was pulled together by Thievery Corporation's Rob Garza and Eric Hilton, with the latter remarking: "As a private citizen, I want to do something because I am very much against all of the post-9/11 wars and occupation."

Go figure

Trying to deflect the uncomfortable exposure that their 30 years of pressure campaigns and lawsuits blocked work on Louisiana's levees, environmental activists convened outside the U.S. Capitol yesterday for what has become a bit of an annual rite: protesting the very idea that America would extract petroleum from its own reserves.

Surely the organizers could use the same fiscal shot in the arm as the rest of the country, what with gas prices still taking a bite out of the budgets of working Americans. And, argued one observer of yesterday's protest, couldn't these groups have chosen a better topic, or at least a better time to chant that America should not reduce dependence on foreign sources of oil by using its domestic sources?

As he put it: "Given current circumstances, one has to question the chances of success for an argument that, distilled, insists that starving people should consider going on a diet."

Tale of two lives

These past few months have been the best of times and worst of times for our favorite political pollster Frank Luntz, or so we learned when finally tracking him down yesterday.

He's just sold his polling and communication company to Omnicom, owners of such venerable PR firms as Fleischman Hillard and Ketchum. And that, he explains, has kept him on the road for 26 days in August and 17 days so far in September.

Otherwise, he was seen deep in conversation with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger at Boston's Fenway Park for the opening of the Rolling Stones global tour, but his poll recommending alternative language for the upcoming reform (Mr. Luntz says call them "accountability") measures on the California ballot were panned by the governor's political adviser.

He had front-row balcony seats for the Emmys on Sunday, but spent the rest of the day at the Santa Monica, Calif., Police Department failing to recover his stolen Corvette. He appeared as himself on "The Daily Show" with Jon Stewart, but his consulting work for "Real Time with Bill Maher" wasn't enough: The show ended up with two coveted nominations, but no statue.

We've also learned that the pollster has received a large advance from Hyperion for a book entitled "Killer Words: The New American Lexicon," but rumor has it he's barely beyond 10,000 words and it's due in less than a hundred days. That advance paid for an 8-foot-tall Bob from Bob's Big Boy, but his latest collector's item arrived the day after his annual baseball All-Star party.

Speaking of which, Mr. Luntz is the only pollster ever invited to throw out the first pitch at a Colorado Rockies game. (He was high and outside.) And none of the three baseball teams for which he has season-ticket plans -- the Washington Nationals, Baltimore Orioles and Los Angeles Dodgers -- will make the playoffs.

Life's tough at the top.

Here she comes

War Opponents Target Military Recruiters In High Schools (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, September 21, 2005

High schools are the latest anti-war battleground, with parents, students, educators and activists around the country stepping up campaigns to prevent military recruiters from reaching students.

Many of the efforts focus on a provision in President Bush's 2002 No Child Left Behind law that requires federally funded secondary schools to give military recruiters the same access to students as they do college or job recruiters.

The exceptions: Private schools that have a religious objection to military service don't have to comply. And parents can “opt out” of providing details, including names, addresses and phone numbers, to military recruiters.

Among recent activity:

·“Opt-out” events planned through November in 321 communities are giving parents and students 18 or older forms asking school officials to not release personal information or school records to military officials. They can send similar requests to the Pentagon. By Tuesday, more than 24,000 opt-outs had been requested, says Leave My Child Alone, a national coalition coordinating the events. Meanwhile, a bill introduced by U.S. Rep. Mike Honda, D-Calif., would prevent schools from releasing private information to military recruiters unless families request it.

·Seattle's school board this month voted to tighten districtwide military recruitment policies, and made clear that conscientious objectors can have equal access to students. Other districts, including Toledo (Ohio) Public Schools, this year highlighted the opt-out option in brochures sent to families.

·Grass-roots groups last month launched a series of “Not Your Soldier” camps that teach students ages 13 to 22 how to counter military recruiters. Topics include non-violent campaigns and the ROTC.

The efforts come at a time when some military branches, especially the Army, are struggling to meet recruitment goals.

Unlike anti-war marches, “counter-recruitment” campaigns represent “one of the ways pressure is being put directly on the military,” says Bill Dobbs of United for Peace and Justice, a New York group sponsoring a counter-recruitment conference Sunday in Washington as part of a Peace and Justice Festival. “It's the next big thing for the anti-war movement.”

But many “opt-out” supporters cite privacy issues. Many were alarmed to learn that a database being created this year for the Pentagon would include students' personal information, such as Social Security numbers, e-mail addresses and grade-point averages.

“It's so insidious,” says Kim-Shree Maufas, a San Francisco mother involved in local opt-out efforts. “You figure if anyone wants to get to your kid they have to go through you. Not in this case.”

Douglas Smith, spokesman for the Army Recruiting Command, says high schools are an important venue because “it's the last time we'll have them all in one place.”

He says most recruiters move on if they get a “hard no” from a student. But “If we get a soft no … I think that's an (invitation) for recruiters to call again,” he says.

Karzai: Ease Up On U.S.-led Operations (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday challenged the need for major military operations in Afghanistan. Karzai said airstrikes are no longer effective and U.S.-led coalition forces should focus on rooting out terrorist bases and support networks.

“I don't think there is a big need for military activity in Afghanistan anymore,” Karzai said. “The nature of the war on terrorism in Afghanistan has changed now.”

Karzai also wants foreign troops to stop searching people's homes without his government's permission. He said foreign governments should “concentrate on where terrorists are trained, on their bases, on the supply to them, on the money coming to them.”

Afghan officials have repeatedly accused Pakistan of aiding Taliban militants, a charge Pakistan denies.

Coalition commander Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry said he expected more fighting in the weeks ahead. “We are staying on the offensive against the enemies of Afghanistan,” he said.

Israel pulls last troops from 2 West Bank settlements

Israel withdrew the last of its troops out of two isolated West Bank settlements, completing the final phase of the withdrawal it began in Gaza last month.

As Israeli soldiers left the empty settlements of Ganim and Kadim, next to the town of Jenin, thousands of Palestinians streamed in, setting fires as gunmen fired in the air. Two other West Bank settlements were vacated earlier.

Unlike Gaza, Israeli forces will continue to patrol the area, the military said, as it has not turned over control of the northern West Bank to the Palestinians.

More than 1,000 missingafter storm in South Asia

At least 1,000 people were missing in southern India on Wednesday and hundreds of fishermen were unaccounted for in Bangladesh after a severe storm in the Bay of Bengal killed 50 people.

Praveen Prakash, a state government official, said about 100,000 people were homeless after heavy rains caused flooding in coastal districts of the southern Andhra Pradesh state on Monday and Tuesday, with strong winds uprooting thousands of trees and electricity poles.

“Over 1,000 people have been reported missing in the three coastal districts,” Prakash said.

Most of the victims were either electrocuted or died in house collapses, he said.

Storms and cyclones that form in the Bay of Bengal in September and October slam into India's eastern coast and neighboring Bangladesh almost annually.

Asia scrambles to curtail dengue fever outbreak

An unusually severe outbreak of dengue fever has caused alarm across Asia and baffled Singapore with a record 10,000 cases this year. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention considers dengue the “most important mosquito-borne viral disease affecting humans” this year — ahead of malaria and encephalitis. An estimated 2.5 billion people are at risk worldwide.

Across Asia, governments are scrambling to curtail the spread, mainly by educating the public about the potentially fatal illness and controlling mosquito-breeding areas such as stagnant pools of water. Symptoms include severe joint pain, high fever and a rash. There is no known cure or vaccine.

Kevin Palmer, a diseases expert at the World Health Organization, said Vietnam, Malaysia, Thailand and the Philippines have had a large number of cases this year.

Fischer to step down as leader of German Greens

Outgoing German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, 57, said he's giving up his leading role in the Green Party. A former radical and high school dropout who became Germany's top diplomat, Fischer told reporters in Berlin: “Now is the moment for a new lineup.”

Karzai Urges Shift In Strategy (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 20 -- President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday questioned the need for further international military operations within Afghanistan, while the top U.S. military commander here predicted more fighting in the weeks ahead as Taliban guerrillas continue to mount attacks and U.S.-led forces respond.

Karzai, speaking at a news conference two days after landmark parliamentary elections were held with minimal disruption, called instead for a "stronger political approach," focused on shutting down guerrilla training camps and financial support outside the country.

Although he declined to specify any locations of foreign support, aides to Karzai have previously expressed his concern that neighboring Pakistan is serving as a haven for fighters linked to the ousted Taliban regime.

The president repeated past demands that foreign troops stop searching Afghan homes without authorization from his government. He also suggested that airstrikes, which are still sporadically employed by the U.S. military and have resulted in some civilian casualties, were not effective. "The nature of the war on terrorism has changed now," Karzai said. "We do not think there is a serious terrorist challenge emanating from Afghanistan."

Among the reasons he listed was a growing sense among Afghans that they are in control of their political destiny with the adoption of a constitution in January 2004, the country's first democratic presidential election last October, and the first parliamentary elections in three decades, held Sunday.

Taliban fighters failed to follow through on a vow to derail the latest voting. However, the Taliban militia has recently reasserted itself. Hundreds of civilians, government workers, Afghan police officers and soldiers have been killed in bombings and ambushes in the south and east.

U.S. and Afghan forces have responded with an aggressive campaign to root Taliban guerrillas out of their mountain redoubts, killing hundreds, but also losing 51 U.S. troops in combat since March.

At a separate news conference Tuesday, Army Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who commands the approximately 17,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, suggested that pattern would continue. "We can expect more fighting in the weeks ahead, as the enemy attempts to return Afghanistan to the dark days of the past in an effort to impose the will of a very few over the democratically stated choice of many," he said, according to the Reuters news agency. "We are staying on the offensive."

In Washington, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld praised Afghanistan's elections as "an amazing accomplishment." He acknowledged that lethal attacks continue, but suggested that airstrikes are a less useful tactic in the counterinsurgency campaign being waged today by U.S. and Afghan troops. "When you don't have a massed army on the ground or large puddles of enemies, then airstrikes are less effective," he said.

Eikenberry and Karzai also said the elections -- the results of which will be available next month -- were a resounding success.

Asked why turnout, estimated at 50 percent, appeared to have been so much lower than the 70 percent turnout for the presidential election, Karzai suggested that many citizens may have felt overwhelmed by the sheer number of candidates. More than 2,700 candidates competed for 249 seats in the lower house of parliament, and more than 3,000 for seats on 34 provincial councils.

The message sent by voters was "great," Karzai said. "Look at the threats, look at the bombing, look at the terrorism, and despite that, the Afghan people came out and voted."

He also dismissed concerns by rights activists that only a few dozen candidates were disqualified for links to illegal militias, though many more were former militia commanders and warlords, widely alleged to have committed war crimes.

"Our country needs stability," Karzai said, adding that "a system of participation" is important to improve national life. "Certain aspirations for us at this moment may sound like too much of a luxury. So I'm very happy with what we have."

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 20 - President Hamid Karzai questioned Tuesday the need for major military operations in Afghanistan, saying that airstrikes were no longer effective and that the United States-led coalition should focus more on shutting off the flow of militants.

In what seemed to be a reference to Pakistan, Mr. Karzai said the fight against terrorism should "concentrate on where terrorists are trained, on their bases, on the supply to them, on the money coming to them." Afghan officials have complained in recent months that Taliban insurgents are using Pakistan as a sanctuary where they recruit and train militants and obtain financing.

He added that the United States should refrain from raiding houses without authorization from the Afghan government. Both the airstrikes, which can lead to civilian casualties, and the house searches have grown increasingly unpopular.

It was not the first time the president has complained about the American military presence. In May his request for more authority over military operations by the 20,000-member force was rebuffed by President Bush.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, asked at a Washington news conference about Mr. Karzai's remarks, conceded that airstrikes were less effective "when you don't have a massed army on the ground or large puddles of enemies." But he said the United States was already coordinating closely with the Afghan government on counterterrorism activities.

In his first comments to journalists since Afghanistan's parliamentary elections on Sunday, Mr. Karzai expressed "relief and satisfaction" that they had come off without any major incidents. He said the fact that Afghans had voted in spite of all the threats against them and the killings in the weeks before the elections was proof that Al Qaeda had been defeated in Afghanistan.

The holding of parliamentary and provincial elections completes the international program for Afghanistan's transition laid down in the Bonn accords of 2001, but Mr. Karzai warned that it did not mean Afghanistan was now capable of standing on its own.

"We have just begun the foundations," he said. "Institutionally we are very weak." The country lacks the resources and human capital to run an effective civil service, is struggling to raise $350 million in revenues annually and cannot yet pay for its own army, police service and administration, he said.

Mr. Karzai said he was appealing to foreign governments to direct assistance away from reflief organizations and toward investment in trade and industry. He said he had specifically requested help from international backers, including the United States, in building reservoirs and electric power plants.

"I would like to concentrate on that," he said. "Roads and electricity are what the Afghan people ask for."

He also said Pakistan had formally proposed to build a fence to stem the flow of insurgents but said he had rejected the idea.

The 1,500-mile border between Pakistan and Afghanistan has never been officially determined, and both countries continue to use the administrative division, known as the Durrand Line, that was drawn by the British more than 100 years ago.

Mr. Karzai said building a wall would be extremely difficult because the Durrand Line divides tribes and families, adding "It is separating people, not preventing terrorism."

Pakistan's idea for a fence, first suggested by President Pervez Musharraf last week, was formally proposed in a letter to the Afghan government. But Afghan officials, who asked not to be identified because they did not want to be seen as criticizing Pakistan, have suggested that the proposal is an effort to divert international pressure on Islamabad to crack down on insurgents' networks.

Europe Ships War Refugees Back Home (CSM)

By Isabelle De Pommereau

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

FRANKFURT - Aferdite Hasanaj looks like any of her high school friends. But there's a difference: Every three months for the past 13 years, since her family fled Kosovo on the eve of the Yugoslavia war, she's had to ask permission to remain in Germany.

As a refugee whose asylum claim was rejected, she was subject to expulsion any time. In April, the government told her to go back "home" to Kosovo, squashing her dreams of going to college in Frankfurt.

"I've never been to Kosovo, I can't speak the language, don't know the culture," the 17- year-old said at a recent rally held to protest her expulsion. "The feeling of not having the right to belong fills me with despair."

Across Germany, 220,000 war refugees denied asylum have shared Aferdite's plight. But in a backdrop of public wariness about their perceived drain on the social system and an improved political situation in their countries, the government is speeding their return.

"How can a country expel a child who's been here for 13 years, who is good in school?" says Volker Ludwig of the GRISP Theater in Berlin, which staged a play about the deportation of a family. "Such a practice is unique in Europe, and it's outrageous."

This summer, Germany's 16 state interior ministers voted to hasten the return of hundreds of thousands of refugees to Kosovo, Iraq, and Afghanistan. And in May, the state of Hamburg began repatriating Afghans, saying that stability there had returned.

The trend is spreading across Europe, especially in countries with former liberal asylum policies such as Holland, Norway, Denmark, and England. Governments are implementing plans for faster and more efficient returns of refugees.

"There is a new intensity in the harshness of the repatriation," says Karl Kopp, European representative of Pro Asyl, a Frankfurt-based advocacy group for refugees.

There's a boom, says Mr. Kopp, in so-called "departure institutions," where refugees with failed asylum claims receive counseling meant to prepare them to leave voluntarily in exchange for receiving a stipend and food.

"The thinking in these institutions is: 'what can I do when I can't expel somebody?' " says Kopp. "The only way is to make life more difficult - to limit the people's freedom of movement, to go as far as possible so that the people have no choice but want to leave."

Government officials stress that those denied asylum know from the beginning that they will not receive legal status. Doing so "would send a signal to those who want to come to Germany: to stay here permanently, all you have to do is postpone getting your permit," says Wilfried Schmaeing of the Interior Ministry.

Germany's asylum regulations are considered among Europe's toughest. Until recently, only victims of state persecutions could receive asylum. Those fleeing civil wars like in Kosovo received a "tolerated status" because the persecution they had suffered did not come directly from the state. The new immigration act that went into effect this year loosened the regulations, recognizing persecutions by nonstate agents such as those suffered in Kosovo. At the same time, Germany has become more efficient and less human in sending home those denied asylum, critics say.

"The issue is becoming very politicized," says Patricia Coelho of the European Council on Refugees and Exiles in London. "Politicians are concerned about sharing with their public that they are being tough on asylum."

In England, "uncooperative" asylum seekers with rejected claims, with the exception of those with families, now see their welfare benefits withdrawn. In Holland, refugees denied asylum can now be denied social support after 28 days. Last year, Norway started charging hundreds of special officers with returning asylum seekers. Refugees denied asylum can also be denied access to the labor market or social protection.

"There is a tendency for industrialized nations to develop a policy to help induce or force people who've not been granted any kind of status to repatriate," says Ms. Coelho. Those asylum seekers, she says "form a growing segment of vulnerable, poor and marginalized people in European societies."

Although there are fewer and fewer asylum seekers in Europe, those asking for asylum are seeing their claims denied in greater number, says Ms. Coelho.

In Frankfurt, Europe's most multiethnic city, Aferdite's classmates rallied to her side. And Aferdite will most likely be able to stay at least until she finishes high school because a German family has committed to support her financially here. But her mother and two siblings are most likely going to be expelled next year.

Tyco Lobbyist Urges Senators To Support Tyco Lawyer Nomination (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — A lobbyist for Tyco International Ltd. is urging the Senate to support a top Tyco executive nominated by the president to the second-highest post in the Justice Department.

Edward P. Ayoob acknowledged Tuesday that he had been lobbying senators to approve the president's choice of Timothy E. Flanigan as deputy U.S. attorney general. The lobbyist said he was acting on his own, not as an agent of Tyco.

Flanigan, 52, has been chief counsel at Tyco since 2002, when he resigned as deputy counsel at the White House to take the job at the industrial conglomerate.

Ayoob is a former top aide to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). The lobbyist also formerly worked with Jack Abramoff at the Washington law firm Greenberg Traurig.

Ayoob, who called Flanigan a friend, said, "He is a man of the highest integrity, and I wanted my colleagues to know it."

Flanigan's selection as top aide to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales has provoked controversy. Some senators questioned his role supervising a Tyco lobbying campaign two years ago conducted by Abramoff, now the subject of congressional and criminal investigations.

In 2003, Flanigan engaged Abramoff to help Tyco fight a bill that would have imposed higher taxes on the firm, which had moved its corporate headquarters offshore, to Bermuda.

In a written response to questions from Senate Judiciary Committee members, Flanigan said that at Tyco, he engaged Abramoff after Greenberg Traurig partners advised that "Mr. Abramoff had good relationships with members of Congress, including Rep. Tom DeLay."

Flanigan also told the committee that sometime after Abramoff was involved, he "told us that he had contact with Mr. Karl Rove," a top political advisor to President Bush.

Tyco's lobbying effort against the tax bill and other legislation aimed at offshore-based firms was successful.

In his written response to questions, Flanigan said that while supervising the Greenberg lobbying effort, he had regular contact with Ayoob "and, less frequently, with Mr. Abramoff."

The nominee also wrote that Tyco discovered after an internal investigation that payments it made to a consulting firm recommended by Abramoff, GrassRoots Interactive, had been diverted to "entities controlled by Mr. Abramoff and were not used in furtherance of lobbying efforts on behalf of Tyco."

He said Tyco had concluded that the diversion was "in violation of Mr. Abramoff's ethical, fiduciary and contractual obligations to Tyco." The payments totaled $1.5 million.

Abramoff, through a spokesman, declined to comment.

Flanigan also responded to a series of questions about his role as a White House counsel in the review of policies for the handling of detainees and whether detainees could be subjected to "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment."

He said he would not advise the attorney general or others "that U.S. personnel are permitted to engage in cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment."

Joe Shoemaker, a spokesman for Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.), said other questions posed to Flanigan had yet to be answered.

Flanigan's nomination is expected to be delayed until the Judiciary Committee acts next week on the Supreme Court chief justice nomination of John G. Roberts Jr.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Radler Plea Deal Vows Cooperation In Hollinger Probe (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

CHICAGO -- The longtime lieutenant of press baron Conrad Black entered a plea-bargain agreement with federal prosecutors, agreeing to cooperate with probes into dealings by Hollinger International Inc. executives, including Mr. Black, in exchange for a 29-month prison sentence and a $250,000 fine.

David Radler, who served as president and chief operating officer of the Chicago-based publisher, pleaded guilty to a mail-fraud charge and will cooperate with probes by federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Prosecutors for the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago said in the plea agreement that Mr. Radler and "the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer" -- titles held at Hollinger International by Mr. Black until 2003 -- schemed from 1999 until 2001 with others to cheat shareholders of $32 million.

Mr. Radler faced a possible maximum prison sentence under the mail-fraud charge of five years.

The fraud, according to the plea agreement entered in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, related to Hollinger International's sales of its small community newspapers in the U.S. and took the form of noncompete payments set up by Mr. Radler, according to a "template" that he understood was approved by "the Chairman." The executives never sought approval of the payments by Hollinger's board.

While the plea agreement doesn't identify "the Chairman" as Mr. Black, its language hints at the direction prosecutors could take against the embattled press baron, based on Mr. Radler's testimony. Hollinger International at one time published London's Daily Telegraph, most of Canada's major papers and a stable of small U.S. papers. The company's flagship is now the Chicago Sun-Times.

"Radler, the chairman and others repeatedly abused their authority and fiduciary obligations as managers of International in order to fraudulently benefit themselves at the expense of International and its public shareholders," the plea agreement states.

Eric Sussman, the assistant U.S. attorney who presented the plea agreement to judge Amy St. Eve, wouldn't comment on the investigation. A spokesman for Mr. Black, who hasn't been charged with any criminal acts but faces SEC charges, declined to comment.

The transactions outlined in Mr. Radler's plea agreement are the same ones that set off the unraveling of Mr. Black's trans-Atlantic newspaper empire when they were uncovered two years ago by a special committee of the board advised by former SEC Chairman Richard Breeden. The deals had been shielded from shareholder scrutiny in part because of the complex structure through which Mr. Black and his close associates, including Mr. Radler, controlled the company.

Mr. Black's closely held holding company, Ravelston Corp., owns a majority stake in Hollinger Inc., a publicly traded Toronto company that controls Hollinger International through supervoting shares.

Mr. Radler's plea is likely to help shareholders, who are seeking more than $400 million in funds that the internal company probe found had been diverted by executives, "get the money back through the civil system," said Eugene Fox, a principal with shareholder Cardinal Capital Management LLC. "David has admitted guilt. It's going to be hard for that not to have some weight in the civil process."

Final sentencing for Mr. Radler, who appeared in court sporting his trademark dark tan sports jacket, is to take place after criminal proceedings against other potential defendants are complete, unless those proceedings take too long, according to the agreement.

"This is the first step in making amends for what has taken place," said Anton Valukas, a lawyer for Mr. Radler.

By Bloomberg News

DOJ_NMG_0007176

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

A former Chicago Sun-Times publisher pleaded guilty to a federal fraud charge yesterday and agreed to cooperate with a Justice Department investigation of Conrad M. Black, his former boss at Hollinger International.

Prosecutors will recommend that the former publisher, F. David Radler, 63, serve 29 months in prison and pay a fine of $250,000 for his role in the $32 million fraud. He will remain free on $500,000 bond until all proceedings in the case are concluded.

Lord Black, who founded Hollinger and built it into what once was the world's No. 3 publisher of English-language newspapers, is contesting a lawsuit by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a $425 million civil lawsuit by Hollinger contending that he looted the company through excessive, undisclosed payments to himself and associates. Lord Black has not been charged with a crime.

Mr. Radler, a native of Montreal who now lives in Vancouver, British Columbia, may be permitted under the proposed agreement to serve the prison sentence in Canada. The United States government agreed not to take a position if Mr. Radler filed an application for the International Prisoner Transfer Program.

Mr. Radler made his plea before Judge Amy St. Eve of United States District Court in Chicago.

In a statement, Mr. Radler said, "I regret the obvious pain this whole affair has caused for my family, friends and business colleagues, and I am relieved that I can now begin the process of making amends and moving on with my life."

Lord Black's lawyer, Enid Litt, did not return a telephone message seeking comment.

Mark Kipnis, 58, Hollinger International's former internal lawyer, and the Ravelston Corporation, a closely held company that Lord Black controlled, have also been charged. Mr. Kipnis pleaded not guilty in August. Ravelston is to be arraigned today.

Mr. Kipnis faces a maximum of five years in prison for each count and a $250,000 fine, or a fine of twice either his or Mr. Radler's profit or any victim's loss, prosecutors said. Ravelston faces penalties of $500,000 on each count or the alternative fine if convicted.

Lord Black, 61, has fought a 21-month effort by Hollinger International to neutralize his voting control and influence over the company and over Hollinger Inc. of Toronto. Ravelston in turn controlled Hollinger Inc.

Bloomberg News, September 20, 2005

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Former Chicago Sun-Times publisher David Radler pleaded guilty to a federal fraud charge and agreed to cooperate with a Justice Department probe of Conrad Black, his ex-boss at Hollinger International Inc.

Prosecutors will recommend that Radler, 63, serve 29 months in jail and pay a fine of $250,000 for his role in the $32 million fraud. He'll remain free on a $500,000 bond until all proceedings in the case are concluded.

``From what appears to be going on, the government is using the cooperation of the person who pled guilty today to work up a case against Mr. Black," said Bradford Lewis, a former federal prosecutor who is now a partner at Fenwick & West on Palo Alto, California.

Black, who founded Hollinger and built it into what once was the world's No. 3 publisher of English-language newspapers, is fighting a lawsuit from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and a $425 million civil lawsuit by Hollinger that claims he looted the company through excessive, undisclosed payments to himself and associates. Black hasn't been charged by federal prosecutors.

Radler, a native of Montreal who now lives in Vancouver, may be permitted to serve his prison sentence in Canada. The U.S. government agreed not to take a position if Radler files an application for the International Prisoner Transfer Program. Radler made his plea in U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve's courtroom in Chicago.

Making Amends

``I regret the obvious pain this whole affair has caused for my family, friends and business colleagues, and I am relieved that I can now begin the process of making amends and moving on with my life," Radler said in a statement.

Mark Kipnis, 58, Hollinger International's former in-house lawyer, and Ravelston Corp., a closely held company Black controlled, also have been charged. Kipnis pleaded not guilty in August. Ravelston is to be arraigned tomorrow.

Kipnis faces the same maximum penalties as Radler: five years in prison for each count and a $250,000 fine, or a fine of twice either man's profit or any victim's loss, the government said. Ravelston faces penalties of $500,000 per count or the alternative fine if convicted.

Black, 61, has fought a 21-month effort by Hollinger International to neutralize his voting control and influence over the company and Hollinger Inc., its Canadian parent. Ravelston in turn controlled Toronto-based Hollinger Inc.

The board ousted Black as CEO in November 2003, sued him and stripped him of the chairman's title the following January.

Countersuit

Black has countersued and said if he's found liable, former Illinois Governor James Thompson and other members of the company's audit committee should pay part of the damages because they breached their fiduciary duties.

Hollinger International had spent more than $50 million in the past 18 months on lawsuits relating to the allegations that Black looted the company, Hollinger International's lawyer Eric Hoaken said in a Toronto court in July.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald's office has been investigating Black and Radler to determine whether they ``fraudulently diverted corporate assets," according to court papers. Federal prosecutors were examining Hollinger International's sale of newspapers to companies Black and Radler controlled.

In one 1999 transaction detailed in the federal indictment, Hollinger sold several newspapers to a closely held firm called Horizon Publications Inc., which was owned by Radler, Kipnis and other unidentified Hollinger executives. Horizon paid a $5 million non-compete fee in the agreement, with $1.2 million of that going to Hollinger Inc., according to the indictment.

The SEC's suit, filed in November in federal court in Chicago, contends that between 1999 and 2003 Black and Radler diverted $85 million from the publisher in bogus non-competition payments and concealed ``self-dealing" transactions from shareholders, regulators and the company's board.

Ebbers Centers New-Trial Bid On Ex-Deputy (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Bernard Ebbers, WorldCom's former chief executive, faces 25 years in prison for participating in the largest accounting fraud in U.S. history. Former Chief Financial Officer Scott Sullivan got five years, two other middle-level executives got a year and a day, and a third got five months.

Yet WorldCom's erstwhile second-in-command remains in legal limbo. In court papers, federal prosecutors say former Chief Operating Officer Ronald Beaumont was a "co-conspirator" in the $11 billion fraud, but they haven't had him indicted for reasons they decline to discuss. He also hasn't had to pay penalties in civil cases by the Securities and Exchange Commission or shareholders of WorldCom, which is now known as MCI Inc.

Now Mr. Ebbers, who remains free while appealing his conviction, is hanging his bid for a new trial in part on Mr. Beaumont, along with two lower-level former executives also named by prosecutors as "unindicted co-conspirators." Mr. Ebbers's lawyers argued in April in federal court in New York that the government's refusal to grant Mr. Beaumont and the others immunity from prosecution effectively barred them from calling the ex-CEO's former lieutenants to testify for the defense.

The Ebbers team is focusing much of its appeal for a new trial on Mr. Beaumont as it prepares to send briefs to the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York this month. The Ebbers team says Mr. Beaumont's attorney had indicated that his client, if called, would invoke his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent and avoid possible self-incrimination. That's not a surprising stance, given that prosecutors could decide at any time to indict him, especially if he had said something they deemed incriminating on the stand.

With immunity, there would have been no danger that his testimony would be used against him, so he could have been compelled to answer questions.

Reid Weingarten, Mr. Ebbers's lead trial lawyer, says memos summarizing government interviews with Mr. Beaumont suggest he would have backed Mr. Ebbers's testimony that Mr. Sullivan hid the accounting fraud from the CEO. Mr. Beaumont "was more sophisticated and closer to the numbers than Bernie," Mr. Weingarten says, contending that prosecutors purposely left him in legal limbo to prevent him from helping exculpate his former boss.

The Ebbers lawyers say their inability to call Mr. Beaumont made the first trial unfair. They want the appeals court to order a new trial and to force prosecutors to grant Mr. Beaumont immunity so the defense could call him to the witness stand, where the trial judge could order him to answer questions.

In legal briefs, prosecutors say there is no reason to believe Mr. Beaumont's testimony would have helped Mr. Ebbers because the defendant's "hands-on management style" rendered him well-situated to know about the fraud. At the trial, U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones refused to order prosecutors to grant Mr. Beaumont immunity, ruling that his expected testimony -- denying knowledge of any fraud -- would at most exculpate himself, not Mr. Ebbers. The Ebbers lawyers say Mr. Beaumont's denial would have bolstered their argument that Mr. Sullivan kept senior management in the dark.

Lawyers uninvolved in the case say the appellate argument about Mr. Beaumont is a long shot. "The government always has a reasonable argument that it doesn't want to immunize a person because that person may have committed a crime," says Robert Morvillo, a white-collar attorney who represented homemaking entrepreneur Martha Stewart.

Mr. Beaumont's lawyer, Carey Dunne, says his client has "cooperated fully" in all WorldCom probes, and there is no reason to believe the government "is contemplating any action" against him. Mr. Beaumont previously has maintained he did nothing wrong.

Federal prosecutors in New York City who oversaw the WorldCom case decline to comment on Mr. Beaumont, as does the SEC. Lawyers pursuing WorldCom shareholder suits say they didn't name him as a defendant because he didn't formally endorse the company's fraudulent books, such as by signing SEC filings.

"The universe of people who had a hand in disasters like WorldCom is bigger than the universe of people you can bring a sustainable lawsuit against," says John "Sean" Coffey, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in a federal class-action WorldCom suit.

Mr. Beaumont, 57 years old, arrived at WorldCom in 1997 and became its chief operating officer in late 2000. In 2001, he got a salary and bonus of $3 million and use of a Gulfstream III jet, according to a report by a special committee of WorldCom's former board. The board report doesn't address whether Mr. Beaumont knew that WorldCom artificially inflated revenue, but it says he participated in decisions that resulted in improper accounting.

The report says Mr. Beaumont held meetings every two to three months in 2001 to stress to sales leaders the "importance of achieving revenue targets." Searching for "revenue opportunities" to bridge gaps, the report says, a group headed by Mr. Beaumont decided to count $30 million in penalties from customers who terminated service agreements before they were due to expire. The report concluded that because WorldCom rarely imposed such penalties, it was improper to count the $30 million. Mr. Beaumont told board lawyers he relied on others to make accounting judgments, according to a lawyer's notes of the interview.

At Mr. Ebbers's trial, prosecutors' designation of Mr. Beaumont as an unindicted co-conspirator allowed them to use testimony about his conversations with alleged co-conspirators. Normally, such testimony would be barred as hearsay, but there's an exception for hearsay about actions taken to advance a criminal conspiracy.

Testifying for the government, Mr. Sullivan, the former chief financial officer, recalled that Mr. Beaumont agreed to Mr. Ebbers's request that slides on bridging a revenue gap be removed from a board presentation the boss was going to make -- suggesting that Mr. Ebbers was hiding something.

Though Mr. Beaumont technically remains in legal limbo, the Ebbers team said in its motion for a new trial that the former No. 2 is unlikely to be charged because doing so would fly "in the face of reality and common sense." Mr. Weingarten adds, "You don't routinely prosecute subordinates after you prosecute the big guy."

Kozlowski And Swartz Ask For Release On Bail (WSJ/DJN)

By Chad Bray, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Lawyers for former Tyco International Ltd. executives L. Dennis Kozlowski and Mark H. Swartz asked a New York state appellate judge to release their clients on bail pending their appeal.

Prosecutors and lawyers for the former executives made arguments on whether the men should be released at a hearing in chambers at the New York State Supreme Court's Appellate Division yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Kozlowski, Tyco's former chief executive, and Mr. Swartz, the conglomerate's former chief financial officer, were remanded to state custody on Monday after they were sentenced to 8 1/3 years to 25 years in prison and ordered to pay $240 million in fines and restitution. Their sentencings came after one of the high-profile trials in the wave of corporate-scandal prosecutions.

With good behavior and other factors, the earliest the two men could finish their prison terms is after nearly seven years.

Prosecutors are expected to file a response to the defense application for bail by tomorrow. Defense attorneys are expected to respond by Monday. A decision is expected soon after that.

Lawyers for Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz declined to comment after the hearing.

In June, a jury of six men and six women convicted Messrs. Kozlowski and Swartz of 22 of 23 counts each, including grand larceny, conspiracy and securities fraud. They were each acquitted of one charge of falsifying documents related to the company's 1998 relocation to Florida.

Their convictions followed a mistrial in the case last year. Tyco, which has its headquarters in Bermuda, operates out of West Windsor, N.J.

Judge Declares Mistrial In Gotti Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 21, 2005

(AP) - NEW YORK-The judge in the John A. "Junior" Gotti racketeering case declared a mistrial Tuesday on the most serious charges in the case after the jury came back deadlocked.

The jury found Gotti not guilty of a lesser count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud. That verdict will stand.

The partial verdict came on the eighth day of deliberations in Gotti's trial on charges that included an allegation that he plotted the kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the founder of the Guardian Angels crime-fighting group.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin declared a mistrial on the remaining counts and discharged the jury after it indicated for the second straight day that it was unable to reach a decision about the bulk of the case.

Gotti Is Released After Judge Declares Mistrial (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

In a startling setback to federal prosecutors, John A. Gotti, the Gambino crime family prince who said he wanted to leave the mob life behind and drive a minivan with his family, avoided conviction today in his racketeering trial, as the jury returned hung verdicts on three charges against him and voted to acquit him on a fourth.

After deliberating almost eight days in the six-week trial, the deeply divided jury reached no verdict on the most serious charge against Mr. Gotti, the accusation that he ordered the June 19, 1992, kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and WABC radio talk show host. He was abducted in a taxicab in lower Manhattan and shot several times at point-blank range.

The jury of seven women and five men had sharply mixed reactions to a case the prosecutors built primarily on the contradictory and often chilling testimony of two high-profile Gambino turncoat witnesses, both of whom confessed coolly in court to crimes more bloody than any Mr. Gotti was accused of.

Judge Shira A. Scheindlin said in Federal District Court in Manhattan that she would allow Mr. Gotti to go free once he posted bail, rejecting a request from a prosecutor, Michael McGovern, that he remain in prison pending a possible retrial.

"The time has come" for Mr. Gotti to be released, Judge Scheindlin said, and applause erupted from the many Gotti clan members in the courtroom.

"God hears a mother's prayer," said a happily tearful Victoria Gotti, Mr. Gotti's normally reclusive mother, who sat in the courtroom throughout the deliberations. Mr. Gotti's lawyers, Jeffrey Lichtman and Marc Fernich, requested that his bail be reduced from property worth $5 million to $2 million in property.

It was a notable change of fortune for the son the late John J. Gotti, the fearsome Gambino boss known as the Dapper Don who ran the Gambino family when it was New York's most powerful Costa Nostra organization. Mr. Gotti's father died in federal prison in 2002, and three other senior members of the Gotti family are behind bars for mob crimes.

Mr. Sliwa said prosecutors told him after the trial that they would try Mr. Gotti again on the three counts that ended in hung verdicts: the kidnapping charges for the attack on him, and racketeering and extortion conspiracy charges. Mr. Gotti was acquitted of securities fraud.

The office of Michael J. Garcia, the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, had no comment today.

Mr. Sliwa, dressed in the Guardian Angels uniform of a red sateen jacket and red beret, said he was stunned and disappointed and saw "a page out of O.J." in the hung verdicts, referring to the murder acquittal of O.J. Simpson.

"This jury was out to lunch," Mr. Sliwa said. "So let's make it round two. I can't wait." He predicted that Mr. Gotti and the Gambino family would continue "a reign of terror" once he was released from jail.

"John Gotti Junior is still down to the marrow of his bone an enemy of society, a thug," Mr. Sliwa said.

One juror, as she arrived today at her apartment on the Upper West Side of Manhattan, said the jury's debate "was exhausting." The jurors served anonymously in the trial, and she declined to give her name.

"Have you ever tried to get three people to agree on anything?" the juror asked. "Try 12."

The juror, who told the court during jury selection she was a retired actress, 67, recalled what defense lawyers had said of the government's cooperating Gambino defector witnesses: that they were "people who never told the truth in their lives."

She said, "I think we were all surprised," that Mr. Gotti was not convicted of any charge. In the most surprising verdict in the trial, the jurors acquitted another defendant, Michael Yannotti, 42, of two shooting executions on Jan. 27, 1996, in the Mill Basin section of Brooklyn. Mr. Yannotti was accused of shooting Robert Arena, a Cosa Nostra rival, and Thomas Maranga, who prosecutors said was a bystander in the wrong place at the wrong time. Mr. Yannotti's pager was found by police on the pavement among the spent cartridges of the murder bullets.

The jury delivered a hung verdict on the role of Mr. Yannotti, a Gambino associate, in the Sliwa attack. The prosecutors - Mr. McGovern, Victor Hou and Joon Kim - had sought to prove that he was the gunman who shot Mr. Sliwa in the legs and abdomen in the back seat of a taxi. Mr. Yannotti was convicted of one lesser racketeering conspiracy count.

Louis Mariani, 49, another Gambino associate, was convicted of three counts of securities fraud. Mr. Mariani's aunt, Antoinette Laboccetta, gave an anguished cry of "No!" when the guilty verdicts were read, and then fainted. She was carried from the courtroom by marshals.

As a sign of the intense dissent in the jury room, the jurors' verdict on the main racketeering count against Mr. Gotti and the other defendants was so divided that Judge Scheindlin and the lawyers puzzled over it for half an hour before deciding what it meant.

Gotti Set For Bail After Hung Jury, Acquittal (REU)

By Christine Kearney

Reuters, September 20, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - A New York jury deadlocked over racketeering charges against the son of late mob boss John Gotti on Tuesday and acquitted him of securities fraud charges, paving the way for his release from prison on bail.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin dismissed the hung jury, saying John A. "Junior" Gotti, 41, could face some of the racketeering charges in a new trial.

She also said Gotti was entitled to bail and asked defense lawyers to submit a bail package. If granted bail, Gotti could be released within a week.

Gotti was imprisoned on other racketeering charges and was due to be released last year before the latest charges were brought against him.

The remaining charges against him included extortion, loan sharking conspiracy and ordering the attempted kidnapping of the Guardian Angels anti-crime patrol leader, Curtis Sliwa. Gotti faced up to 30 years in prison.

The verdict came after seven days of deliberations. A visibly relieved Gotti, wearing a crisp white shirt and black suit, hugged his lawyers, while family members in the Manhattan federal courtroom cried.

During the trial, prosecutors said Gotti became "street boss" of the Gambino crime family in the 1990s after his infamous father, known as the "Dapper Don," went to prison, where he died of cancer in 2002.

The jury sent a note to the judge on Monday, saying they could not agree on whether Gotti withdrew from the Mafia in 1999 after being sent to prison for pleading guilty to other racketeering charges, as his defense team had maintained.

The charges against Gotti are bound by a five-year statute of limitations, which means the prosecution had to prove Gotti was involved in at least one conspiracy after July 1999 -- five years before his indictment was handed down.

Outside the courtroom, Gotti's lawyer, Jeffrey Lichtman, said he was pleased with the result because "just the name Gotti" was usually enough to get a conviction. He said he plans to ask the court to dismiss the remaining counts against his client.

Curtis Sliwa, who testified during the trial that he was shot in the back of a taxi in 1992 after making derogatory comments about Gotti's father, said he couldn't wait for "round two."

"I am disappointed. I've been waiting 13 years, but I can still wait a little longer for justice," he said. "I feel in my heart I am alive today simply so that justice can be done for John Gotti Junior."

An array of mob turncoats testified during the monthlong trial, including the taxi driver in the Sliwa shooting, Joseph D'Angelo, who said Gotti ordered the attack.

But Gotti's defense lawyers said the prosecution's case was based on witnesses who were liars and murderers who testified to get lighter prison terms.

At The Gotti Trial, A Mob Scene (WP)

By David Segal, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 20 -- In a scene that seemed scripted by a Hollywood hack, the federal trial of John A. "Junior" Gotti ended Tuesday with tears, applause, fainting and a mixed verdict that soon could spring the onetime Mafia boss from prison.

On its eighth day of deliberation, a weary panel of seven women and five men acquitted Gotti, 41, of securities fraud and hung on the three other counts, including loan-sharking and the alleged kidnapping of Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa.

U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin declared a mistrial on those charges and said that she's inclined to approve a request by Gotti's lawyers that he be freed on $2 million bail. Odds are good that one of the country's most notorious gangsters -- or ex-gangsters, as his defense team argued -- will be restricted only to house arrest starting sometime next week.

The coda to this seven-week trial was weird, baffling and at moments very noisy. The aunt of Louis Mariani, one of Gotti's two co-defendants, screamed "Noooooooooo!" as she heard the forewoman declare her nephew guilty of securities fraud. Antoinette Laboccetta then slipped off her seat and onto the floor, her eyes rolling, a copy of a pamphlet called "The Promises of Our Lord" clutched to her chest.

Two marshals in the courtroom rushed to aid her. "Do you need an ambulance?" shouted one of Scheindlin's clerks, sitting directly in front of the judge, as Laboccetta was carried out of the room. All the while, the judge tried to go through the formality of polling the jury, which wasn't easy because jurors, too, were fixated on the drama in the audience. "Pay attention to me," she said, as cheerfully as possible. Adding to the upheaval, the clerk who'd asked about the ambulance started to cry.

Other members of the crowd -- the Gotti side, at any rate -- clapped wildly when the last "not guilty" was read. Angel Gotti, a sister of the accused, praised her favorite psychic, who she said had predicted this very outcome on this very day. "I told you, didn't I?" she said, nudging her mother as the two of them wiped tears from their eyes. "God listens to a mother's prayers," said Gotti's mother, Victoria, who leaped to her feet and left the courtroom as the verdict was read.

Gotti shook his head, hugged his lawyer and eventually turned to give a thumbs-up to assorted friends and family. But for a while he looked baffled by the proceedings. And the proceedings, in truth, were pretty baffling.

There was some confusion about the law -- for a good half-hour, the judge and lawyers puzzled over the verdict sheet, parsed the complicated rules of racketeering statutes and debated whether the jury had actually acquitted Gotti of all counts or just had failed to reach a unanimous decision. (It had deadlocked, it was decided, leaving Gotti open to a retrial.)

Gotti is hardly out of legal jeopardy -- prosecutors will almost certainly retry him -- but he and his attorneys clearly won over a juror or two by arguing that he'd quit the mob in 1999, when he pleaded guilty to a handful of racketeering charges. Gotti, son of the "Dapper Don," the late John J. Gotti, had contended that his charismatic and murder-prone dad led him astray, and that after six years in prison, a variety of slights by former associates in the Gambino crime family, and maybe a little moral clarity, he had had enough of crime.

The verdict left Gotti's attorneys, Jeffrey Lichtman and Marc Fernich, beaming.

"The fact is they built a case on the backs of psychotics," Lichtman said, referring to the parade of ex-mobsters who provided the juiciest part of the prosecution's presentation. "Altogether they committed about 30 murders, these guys, and some of them are walking among us. The jury rejected that approach."

Lichtman also said it was time to leave the Gottis alone. "Enough already," he said. "Let's find Osama bin Laden."

The sidewalk outside the Daniel Patrick Moynihan courthouse in Lower Manhattan was jammed with television cameras as Lichtman and other players in the case left the building. Sliwa, who the government alleged had been shot on Gotti's orders in a 1992 kidnapping attempt, fumed in the middle of the scrum.

"There's a Round 2," he said. "This doesn't mean Gotti is innocent. I've waited 13 years for this. I can wait a little longer."

Mariani, who is free pending sentencing, shrugged off the guilty verdict against him and told the assembled media that he was ready to do his time.

"It'll be a lot like a fat farm," he said of prison, grinning widely, his hands on his expansive belly.

"I could stand to lose 60 pounds."

His aunt stood nearby, looking a little dazed but under the circumstances rather steady.

Gotti Mistrial Leaves Some Elated, Others Stunned (NYNSDY)

New York Newsday, September 21, 2005

The verdict in the month-long trial of John "Junior" Gotti was met with tears, applause and near-pandemonium.

Gotti's sister Angela gasped and began to weep, while his mother and other siblings applauded as the jury announced it had cleared him of a securities fraud charge and were hung on the remaining racketeering and conspiracy counts.

When the audience heard that Gotti's co-defendant Louis Mariani, a reputed Gambino crime family associate, was convicted of securities fraud and other charges, Mariani's aunt let out a groan and fainted.

Lawyers tried to get U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin to stop, but she continued to read the verdict as a team of U.S. Marshals and courtroom security officers carried the unconscious woman out.

Later, as the courtroom was emptying, Gotti's mother, Victoria, of Howard Beach, beamed triumphantly as she waved at her son.

DOJ_NMG_0007182

"I'm feeling great. God hears a mother's prayers. I have no doubt though that they'll be back at it in a couple of months. We've gotta get him out of the country. He's always going to be catnip to these people," she said of prosecutors and the FBI.

Gotti's sister Victoria, star of her own reality TV show, "Growing Up Gotti," left the courtroom alone, leaned against the courthouse's white marble wall and began to weep. "He's just coming home," she said. "I think it means a lot for the men in my family, my boys. I just think this sends a message that you just can't prosecute someone because of their last name."

Asked what Gotti had said after the verdict, defense lawyer Jeffrey Lichtman said his client was elated.

"He said 'Thank you, you did everything you said you would do,'" Lictman said.

Lichtman, who apparently did not know the jury had come close to convicting his client (it voted 11-to-1 for conviction on a variety of crimes) sounded a triumphant note.

"This case, what's left of it, is a limping wreck," he said. Noting that the judge said she would likely release Gotti on bail, Litchman said: "John's very pleased he's going to be home very shortly with his children, which is all that he's talked about for the last year."

Meanwhile, Curtis Sliwa, who testified about how he was kidnapped and shot -- allegedly at Gotti's behest in June 1992 -- emerged from the courthouse looking grim.

Asked how he felt about the acquittal of Gotti co-defendant Michael Yannotti, Sliwa shook his head.

"I'm stunned," he said. "This is a page out of the O.J. Simpson case. Next thing you know, they will believe it was the Colombians who shot me.

"I feel that I am alive today simply to make sure that justice is done in this case ... I think it's time to have 12 fresh jurors."

Louisiana Reports ID Fraud Post-Katrina (REU)

Reuters, September 20, 2005

BATON ROUGE, Louisiana (Reuters) - Identity thieves are preying on Louisiana residents forced from their homes by Hurricane Katrina, the state attorney general's office said on Tuesday.

Consumer protection officials said complaints were coming in from hurricane victims who discovered the thefts when they applied for financial aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"When they (hurricane victims) go into apply, they'll find that somebody has already done it in their name," said Isabel Wingerter, director of the Louisiana Attorney General's public protection division.

Thieves were able to apply for the aid using the victim's social security numbers.

Experts had warned that identity theft could become a problem in the wake of the storm with thieves taking birth certificates, banking and other sensitive documents left among the waterlogged debris.

Wingerter said Louisiana officials had received about 50 complaints of identity fraud in the past day, but she expected the number to grow as more storm victim apply for federal assistance.

Displaced hurricane victims were also being urged to file for changes of addresses with the U.S. Post Office to prevent sensitive materials from being delivered to their wrecked homes before they return.

The Justice Department in Washington has set up a task force to investigate identity theft and other types of fraud related to the Katrina.

Federal Officials Scrutinize Ladner (WP)

By Valerie Strauss And Susan Kinzie, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Federal law enforcement officers are reviewing documents regarding suspended American University President Benjamin A. Ladner, whose personal and travel expenses are being investigated by the school's trustees.

Officials from the U.S. attorney's office in Washington, working with the FBI, requested documents from American University, which turned them over to comply with a subpoena, according to two sources with knowledge of the probe.

In addition, the Internal Revenue Service has contacted the university about issues involving the Ladner case, but the IRS is not actively involved, according to the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

The case could have tax implications not only for Ladner but also for AU, which is bound by laws governing how much charities and universities pay their executives.

The board of trustees placed Ladner on administrative leave Aug. 24, and Provost Cornelius M. Kerwin stepped in to serve as acting president. Ladner would not comment for this article. The chairman of the board, Leslie E. Bains, did not return a phone call yesterday.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said last night that grand jury secrecy rules and Justice Department policy prevent his office from commenting.

The trustee board is close to completing its probe of Ladner, who became president in 1994. He has been credited with raising academic standards and the national profile of the university, which is in Northwest Washington .

There is a split on the board about the severity of the issues reviewed in its audit, according to several sources familiar with the board's discussions. Some trustees view Ladner's expenses as justified by the constant fundraising and entertaining required of today's university presidents, while others believe that the spending was out of line for a school of AU's size, the sources said.

Those sources and others with knowledge of the board probe said it involved a number of complicated issues and hundreds of thousands of dollars in travel and personal expenses over the past three years. The board has not determined whether Ladner should be asked to repay the university for any of the spending, a source said.

The board also has been wrangling with Ladner over compensation -- his salary, benefits and allowances -- which has more than tripled since he came in 1994, according to one source with detailed knowledge of Ladner's pay. In 2004, his base salary was $633,000, but his total compensation was well over $800,000, according to forms the university filed with the IRS.

Last year, some board members became concerned that Ladner's pay was too high for the president of a 10,000-student private, nonprofit school and that they could be liable under laws intended to avoid excessive compensation to executives of charities, sources knowledgeable about board activities said.

Any payment of an executive's personal expenses by the organization generally must be repaid or reported as income, said LaVerne Woods, chair of the tax-exempt organizations committee of the American Bar Association.

The board decided to reduce Ladner's overall compensation by an undisclosed amount, according to the sources. The trustees, meanwhile, continued to investigate his personal and travel expenses, including an engagement party for his son that he allegedly charged to the university, the sources said.

Because his contract required Ladner to spend a certain amount of time at a university-owned house, sources said, Ladner's attorneys argued that the cost of all food and services required while living there should be paid by the school.

A preliminary report by Arnold & Porter LLP, a law firm helping the trustees, has been completed and sent to Ladner. The report includes records of several chauffeurs employed by Ladner and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner. Chauffeurs kept a log of their duties, including taking Ladner to such events as an athletic awards banquet, dropping off dry cleaning and taking Nancy Ladner to an appointment at a hair salon.

A final report has not been completed but is expected to be within a few weeks, the sources said. The board, however, already has eliminated the position of personal chef to the Ladners and transferred the social secretary for the Ladners to another department.

FBI Investigates Democrats On Steele's Credit Report (WP)

By John Wagner And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Federal prosecutors are investigating whether two Democratic Party researchers in Washington illegally obtained the credit report of Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele as they conducted opposition research on the likely Republican Senate candidate.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, acknowledged yesterday that two of his organization's employees had resigned as a result of the episode, which he said was subsequently referred to the U.S. attorney's office by the Democratic committee.

Under federal law, it is illegal to knowingly and willfully obtain a credit report under false pretenses. A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office for the District of Columbia confirmed last night that an investigation by its fraud and public corruption section is proceeding with the assistance of the FBI.

The July episode came as both parties started digging into the backgrounds of opposing candidates for Maryland's two marquee races next year, for governor and an open U.S. Senate seat.

Steele's chief of staff, Paul Ellington, said FBI agents interviewed the lieutenant governor about the matter last week.

Ellington said Steele learned of the possible impropriety when agents approached him. "He didn't have any idea this was going on," Ellington said. Personal finances could be fertile territory for researchers looking into Steele, who acknowledged financial difficulties when he ran for statewide office three years ago.

The DSCC, the arm of the Democratic Party tasked with promoting Senate candidates, declined to disclose the names of the employees involved. But sources with knowledge of the episode identified them as Katie Barge, the committee's former research director, and Lauren Weiner, an employee who had been researching Steele even before he formed an exploratory committee for Senate in June.

Bill Lawler, an attorney representing Barge, said she had brought the matter to her superiors' attention. "She resigned because she didn't want this episode to negatively reflect on the committee," Lawler said.

An attorney said to be representing Weiner did not return a phone call yesterday.

Singer said the two employees acted without the committee's authorization but later told their superiors, who "immediately ensured that Mr. Steele's credit report was not used or disseminated to anyone."

Singer added that the former employees were cooperating with authorities and that the DSCC had launched an internal review of the matter. He said the DSCC is not a target of the federal inquiry.

Sources familiar with the episode said Steele's credit report was obtained with the use of his Social Security number, which was found on a public court document.

Shortly after being named by Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) as his running mate in 2002, Steele disclosed to reporters that he owed more than $35,000 in personal debts and had an unpaid political loan of $25,000 from a previous race.

Steele, a former corporate lawyer who started his own consulting firm in 1998, said at the time that his "tight" financial situation should not detract from his political message. "At least my report reflects a blue-collar man, an entrepreneur out there trying to start a business in Maryland," Steele said in July 2002. "I don't have trusts that are going to cover me."

Steele is paid $120,833 a year as lieutenant governor. According to the most recent financial disclosure he submitted to the Maryland State Ethics Commission, which covers 2004, he has paid off some of his debts.

Steele has been heavily courted to run for Senate by national GOP leaders and is expected to give the party its best shot at a Senate seat in years.

Democrats Got Steele's Credit Report (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Two members of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee have resigned after admitting they obtained Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's credit report.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), said the two staffers told committee officials in July what they had done. He said the committee began an internal investigation and determined it was an isolated incident.

"The DSCC immediately ensured that Mr. Steele's credit report was not used or disseminated to anyone," Mr. Singer said, "It also reported this incident to the U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C."

He said the employees, who were not identified, were cooperating with authorities.

A source familiar with the investigation said the employees were "senior staff" members in the research department of the DSCC.

"While the DSCC did not authorize the employees to access Mr. Steele's credit report, we regret that this incident occurred and apologize to Mr. Steele," Mr. Singer said.

Mr. Steele's chief of staff, Paul Ellington, said the lieutenant governor had been made aware of the incident.

"This is a serious legal issue, and a criminal investigation is under way," Mr. Ellington said last night. "We have been advised by the FBI to not comment and will honor their request."

Mr. Steele, a Republican, in June announced the formation of an exploratory committee for his run for the U.S. Senate after Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes in March announced he would not seek a sixth term.

State and national Republican Party leaders, including President Bush and Sen. Elizabeth Dole, North Carolina Republican and chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, have pressured him to run.

Audra Miller, spokesperson for the Maryland Republican Party, would not comment on the credit-report incident, referring a request to the National Republican Senatorial Committee. A spokesman for the committee said it is a "serious legal issue" and he was unable to comment until the committee receives more information.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s election as governor with Mr. Steele as lieutenant governor in 2002 made the two men the first Republicans to hold those offices in Maryland in more than 30 years. The state has not had a Republican senator since 1987.

Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, achieved national prominence after his prime-time speech at the 2004 Republican National Convention.

His political rise, from a post on the Prince George's County Republican Central Committee to lieutenant governor, took less than 10 years. Mr. Steele said he did not plan his political trajectory but seized the opportunities presented to him.

Democrats who have announced their candidacies are U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin; socialist activist A. Robert Kaufman; Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; and Dr. Lise Van Susteren, a Montgomery County psychiatrist, and the sister of Greta Van Susteren, who hosts the Fox News Channel's "On the Record" interview program.

CBS 2 Chicago, September 21, 2005

Stephens, the long-time mayor of Rosemont, had lobbied hard for the Emerald Casino Inc., to be granted a license to operate in Rosemont. But the Illinois Gaming Board rejected the Emerald bid, citing alleged mob ties.

At a special hearing Tuesday on the Emerald license, the gaming board watched an undercover videotape from the Operation Family Secrets investigation. On the tape, the Marcello brothers discussed whether the mob would have a piece of any casino in Rosemont.

The two men did not use proper names when discussing the matter. The FBI said "he" referred to Stephens.

James Marcello: “Are we gonna be in there at all?”

Michael Marcello: “I don’t ... MGM or one of them companies will wind up with it. I mean he ain't going to get it like he wanted it before but...”

James Marcello: “They'll pay him so much a month and that'll be it.”

James Marcello: “You gotta say it. This guy really knew what he was doing, Mickey. They could say what they want about him.”

Attorney Robert Cliffford, who represents Emerald Casino, was skeptical of the meaning of the tape.

“When I first saw this my reaction was you have a couple of sideways talking about stuff they don't know an awful lot about,” Clifford said.

But top FBI organized crime agent John Mallul said that Stephens had a special interest in Emerald getting a license since he could exercise some control over it.

A spokesman for the Rosemont mayor ripped the FBI tape, calling it "meaningless."

He said it proves nothing and suggests the gaming board has a "vendetta against Mayor Stephens."

As far as the videotape itself, this is the first time we've seen some of the mountain of evidence expected to be used against James Marcello and other alleged mobsters in the Family Secrets case.

The video portion clearly showed the Marcello brothers having a chat in a day room at the Michigan prison. But the audio was difficult to make out. We had to read from a transcript provided by an FBI agent.

FBI Agent: Mob Ties To Casino Discussed (CHIST/AP)

By MAURA KELLY LANNAN, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 21, 2005

The reputed head of the Chicago mob and his half brother were caught two years ago on surveillance videotape talking about organized crime's involvement and control of a proposed casino in Rosemont, an FBI agent testified Tuesday.

A two-and-a-half-minute segment of the grainy and muffled videotape was played during a hearing in which the Illinois Gaming Board is trying to revoke Emerald Casino Inc.'s gambling license. State regulators want to revoke Emerald's license because they say some of the casino's investors had alleged mob ties.

Emerald had hoped to relocate to Rosemont. Attorney General Lisa Madigan has questioned the suitability of Rosemont as a casino location and said she had concerns about possible mob ties in the Chicago suburb.

A written transcript of the videotape, which the FBI agent said is about five hours long, includes vague references and does not name a person or town.

However, FBI special agent John Mallul testified he believed portions of the taped conversation referred to Rosemont Mayor Donald Stephens and his quest to have a casino open in Rosemont as well as organized crime's influence at such a casino.

Attorneys for Rosemont and Emerald questioned how Mallul could draw those conclusions from the videotape.

Mallul said the tape, made March 24, 2003 by Chicago FBI agents, shows James and Michael Marcello talking in the visiting room at a federal prison in Michigan where James Marcello was incarcerated.

The Marcello brothers are now both in jail. A June federal indictment accuses James Marcello in three slayings, including the killing of Las Vegas mobster Tony "The Ant" Spilotro and his brother. Michael Marcello is accused of helping his imprisoned brother by keeping him informed of the mob's activities, delivering messages and carrying out illegal activities, including operating an illegal video gambling business.

On the videotape James Marcello asked Michael Marcello: "How are you guys doin' with that, okay? Everything okay?"

"So far, yeah. Things workin' out good," replied Michael Marcello, whom the FBI has identified as an associate of organized crime.

"Good," James Marcello said.

When asked what that exchange meant, Mallul testified, "It's my opinion that they're referring to organized crime involvement and control of a casino in Rosemont."

However, on cross examination Mallul said he never asked the Marcello brothers what they discussed.

Robert Stephenson, attorney for Rosemont, dismissed the videotape and transcript as "absolute nonsense" that "reflects nothing."

"If anybody would fairly read it, they would come away with the same conclusion," Stephenson said.

Emerald attorney, Robert Clifford, argued against the use of the videotape during the hearing because he said he had not seen the entire tape. He also said it was irrelevant to Emerald's case.

According to the transcript, James Marcello later asks, "Are we gonna be in there at all?"

Michael Marcello replied, "I don't ... MGM or one of them companies will wind up with it. I mean, he ain't gonna get it like he wanted it before."

Mallul said he thought that exchange meant James Marcello asked if organized crime would be involved with the Rosemont casino, and Michael Marcello replied that Stephens was not going to get the type of casino he wanted. Mallul did not elaborate.

"It's my opinion, based on this conversation, Donald Stephens had a special interest in having Emerald itself be a casino in Rosemont," Mallul said.

Mallul declined to comment after the hearing.

The videotape also includes an exchange in which the Marcello brothers discuss Wayne Johnson, a former chief investigator of the Chicago Crime Commission, and his settlement of a defamation lawsuit filed against him by Stephens, Mallul said.

Stephens filed the lawsuit after Johnson accused him of having connections to organized crime. As part of a settlement, Johnson withdrew his claim. He later became police chief in Cicero.

"The V guy put his arm around him (the videotape shows Michael Marcello making a fist and hitting his stomach). Alright? Put 'em over there in that town. He backed off the other guy out there. Now they're goin' for the thing again," Michael Marcello said, according to the transcript.

Mallul testified that "the V guy" was former Chicago alderman and Cicero attorney Edward Vrdolyak, and the town mentioned was Cicero. Mallul said Marcello meant Johnson backed off his comments about Stephens, and that Stephens and Rosemont were seeking a casino again.

Vrdolyak denied that claim Tuesday and said he did not know the Marcello brothers.

"I wasn't involved in any negotiations with Don Stephens or anybody involving the casino in Rosemont," he said. "I don't know anything. It's absolutely insane."

Johnson could not be reached for comment. Attempts to reach several public listings for a Wayne Johnson were not successful. Attorneys for the Marcellos did not return telephone messages left at their offices.

Ex-Conn. Sen. Pleads Guilty In Bribe Case (KCS)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Kansas City Star, September 21, 2005

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. - In the latest in a string of corruption cases in Connecticut, a former state senator pleaded guilty Tuesday to felony charges of receiving a bribe, mail fraud and tax evasion.

Sen. Ernest Newton II acknowledged in federal court that he accepted a $5,000 bribe in exchange for helping the director of a job training agency secure a $100,000 grant.

As part of a plea agreement, Newton also admitted filing false tax returns and diverting $40,000 in campaign contributions for personal use over five years.

DOJ_NMG_0007187

Asked as he left court what he had done with the money, Newton said, "I don't know nothing about that." Reminded that he had just pleaded guilty, he said, "I didn't buy a new house, a new car, nothing like that."

Newton, 49, will remain free until his sentencing Dec. 19. Newton faces a maximum of 35 years in prison, but prosecutors have said they will ask for less time because he accepted responsibility.

Last month, Warren K. Godbolt, executive director of the nonprofit Progressive Training Associates in Bridgeport, pleaded guilty to paying the bribe.

Newton announced his resignation last week and submitted it Monday. Gov. M. Jodi Rell has scheduled a special election for Nov. 14 to fill Newton's Senate seat.

Other recent federal corruption probes led to prison sentences for Connecticut officials including former Gov. John G. Rowland and former Bridgeport Mayor Joseph Ganim.

Newton was elected to the Senate in 2003 after serving in the House for 14 years.

Though Newton's constituents stood by him through ups and downs - including his seeking treatment in the mid-'90s for cocaine addiction - U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said it was constituents who provided some of the information used in the probe.

Correction Officer Arrested For Extortion (NYNSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, September 21, 2005

A veteran New York City correction officer Tuesday was accused of being the "muscle" who collected debts for a Long Island businessman at the point of his .38-caliber service revolver, federal officials said.

Byron Christopher Chavis, 38, of Brooklyn, who worked in the city court system at 100 Centre St. in Manhattan, was arrested by FBI agents and charged with conspiracy to commit extortion, extortion, attempted extortion and use of a firearm in a crime of violence.

Chavis worked for businessman Michael Pescatore, 41, of Old Brookville, according to sources familiar with the case.

Pescatore was also charged with conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion in the case and has been held without bail since February in two cases, one of which accuses him of masterminding a car theft ring.

Chavis, who worked mainly at Rikers Island for the past 15 years, was immediately suspended without pay, according to city officials.

Chavis pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Central Islip. His attorney, Joey Jackson of Manhattan, declined to comment. Arraignment for Pescatore on the new charges is scheduled later in the week.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lara Treinis Gatz said Chavis had extorted money from five business associates of Pescatore.

She asked that Chavis be held without bail as a danger to the community, noting the use of his service revolver and threats to kill or break legs while collecting debts.

Judge Thomas Platt ordered Chavis held pending future hearings. If convicted, he faces a mandatory sentence of 5 years on the gun charge, and up to 20 years on the conspiracy and extortion charges.

A.C Tax Official And Wife Convicted In Robbery Plot (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 21, 2005

A federal jury found a former Atlantic City tax collector and his wife guilty today of attempting to rob a tax office courier of $100,000 in cash and checks.

Clinton Van Berry, 61, and his wife, Nadine Homick-Van Berry, 55, could both face a maximum of 20 years in prison when they are sentenced.

They also face a separate trial in a scheme to bribe the West Cape May mayor for insider information on a federally-funded sewer and water-main project. A date for that trial has not been set.

In that case, prosecutors said, the Van Berrys hoped to use the information to secure work for Charles Varvaro, an Atlantic County contractor, then collect a cut from him. Varvaro, however, has been an FBI informant since 1978.

Nadine Homick-Van Berry also went to Varvaro, a friend since the 1980s, to enlist his help in robbing the tax courier. Varvaro tape recorded many of their conversations about the robbery and testified at the beginning of the two-week trial in U.S. District Court in Camden.

Varvaro was supposed to find someone to physically rob the courier on his way from the Atlantic City tax office to a nearby Commerce Bank. The robbery was set for Dec. 16, 2003, the day after a tax sale that left the office flush with cash.

The courier had $100,000 in cash and checks in a lockbag. When he left the tax office, Clinton Van Berry signaled his wife by calling her and asking about an aching tooth, according to testimony.

Homick-Van Berry then used a disposable cell phone to call the person she thought would rob the courier. The person on the other line was a police officer, and the robbery never took place.

Ryan Trial Lawyers Squabble Over Potential Jurors (CBS2CHI/AP)

CBS 2 Chicago, September 21, 2005

(AP) CHICAGO George Ryan's lawyers and federal prosecutors interviewed a fresh batch of potential jurors Tuesday including one man with "strong negative views about politicians" and another who announced he was an admirer of 19th Century German statesman Otto von Bismarck.

A woman who was a potential juror for the former governor's racketeering trial said her truck driver-boyfriend had been interviewed by FBI agents investigating bribes paid in exchange for work in Chicago's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program -- but was cleared of any wrongdoing.

Still another potential juror said her ex-husband served two months in jail.

"I think he got what he deserved," she told Assistant U.S. Attorney Zachary Fardon, who said he wanted to make sure that episode would not leave her biased against law enforcement.

Ryan, 71, is charged with racketeering, mail fraud, lying to FBI agents and tax fraud when he was secretary of state from 1991 through 1998 and later governor. A 22-count indictment accuses him of giving lobbyist Larry Warner, now his co-defendant, free rein to dole out contracts and leases to his clients while getting loans for his relatives and gifts from Warner.

Ryan and Warner both deny that anything they did was illegal.

Over two days of jury selection, attorneys have succeeded in finding at least 16 and possibly 18 potential jurors. They hope to come up with a pool of at least 46 and then whittle that number down by using their so-called peremptory challenges -- challenges that the lawyer's don't have to explain and which automatically strike potential jurors from the list.

The process is designed to yield 12 jurors and six alternates.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer asked one man why on a questionnaire, filled out by about 300 potential jurors last week, he had cited Bismarck as someone he admired greatly.

He said he was something of a scholar and admired Bismarck for uniting Germany. Pallmeyer later dismissed him from the pool of potential jurors.

Despite protests from Ryan attorney Dan Webb, she refused to dismiss a man who admitted he had "strong negative views about politicians." On a questionnaire filled out by potential jurors last week, he said that "too often campaign promises are forgotten."

Asked on the questionnaire about Ryan, he said: "If he allowed abuses to occur he is to blame and should be punished." Webb said he was obviously biased against the former governor.

Prosecutors said they were sure the man would be fair if chosen for the jury.

But they grumbled when Pallmeyer for the second day refused to bump a man who said both he and his mother know Webb and the mother is in awe of his brilliance as an attorney.

But Webb has succeeded in keeping the potential juror's hopes alive by saying that he doesn't remember meeting the man, did meet the mother years ago but had no relationship with her.

There will be 18 potential jurors in the pool if Pallmeyer keeps that man along with another man who said he works 16-hour days and will have to go to his night job after court.

If those two are dismissed the number of potential jurors surviving will be 16.

Pallmeyer had hoped to pick a jury by the close of business Wednesday and start the trial on Thursday. But hope of that has faded as jury selection has gone slowly.

The trial promises to take a lot longer.

When one female candidate for the jury said she enjoyed watching Judge Judy on TV, Warner defense attorney Marc Martin asked: "You do know that this trial is going to last four months? It isn't going to be half an hour."

Inmate Pleads Guilty To Threatening Supreme Court Justices (LAW)

By R. Robin Mcdonald, Fulton County Daily Report

A Florida inmate has pleaded guilty to charges of mailing threatening letters to public officials, including the clerk of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, the U.S. Supreme Court, and President Bush and his family.

Federal prosecutors in Atlanta said that letters from Anthony Scott Simboli, who is serving time in Clearwater, Fla., for theft and forgery, contained a white powder that authorities said was purported to be anthrax but later was identified as detergent. Simboli put his name, inmate number and return address on the letters, which threatened Judges Edward E. Carnes and Frank M. Hull, President Bush and his family, and unspecified Supreme Court justices.

The first letter was discovered at the 11th Circuit in December when a scanning machine in the court's in-house mail-sorting facility opened one and detergent spilled out. A hazardous materials team came to collect the letter and deal with any potential threat.

Two subsequent detergent-laced threats were recovered at mail-handling facilities near Washington.

Simboli's threatening letters followed a failed pro se appeal to overturn his eight-year Florida sentence for grand theft and burglary, according to court records. He filed the appeal while he was incarcerated in a Florida prison housing inmates who require psychiatric treatment.

In 2001 Carnes denied both Simboli's certificate of appealability and his motion seeking permission to waive all court costs associated with the appeal, according to court records.

Prosecutors said that Simboli also was attempting to help his brother, an inmate at another Florida prison, with an appeal of a life sentence for carjacking and robbery. Both Carnes and Hull were on the 11th Circuit panel that in 2002 dismissed Robert Francis Simboli's appeal, according to court records.

THREATS TO THE 11TH CIRCUIT

Threats by mail have been a particular concern at the 11th Circuit. On Dec. 16, 1989, Judge Robert S. Vance was killed and his wife seriously injured when a package bomb exploded after being delivered to their suburban home in Birmingham, Ala. Two days later a second bomb killed Savannah, Ga., attorney Robert E. Robinson.

That same day, federal law enforcement agents intercepted a third bomb at the 11th Circuit's Atlanta complex. On Dec. 19, 1989, a fourth bomb was intercepted at the Jacksonville, Fla., office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Walter Leroy Moody, who previously had filed unsuccessful pro se appeals at the 11th Circuit, eventually was convicted and sentenced to seven life sentences for the murders.

LETTERS FROM PRISON

Simboli's plea agreement for sending the threatening letters includes a 10-year sentence in federal prison, the maximum term for the offense.

The agreement does not prohibit Simboli from mailing letters to public officials or to state and federal courts.

A spokesman for the Pinellas County Sheriff's Office, Mac McMullin, said that because Simboli's letters to the 11th Circuit, the Supreme Court and the president were considered privileged correspondence, the letters were not opened before the jail forwarded them to the U.S. Postal Service to mail.

"We don't search outgoing mail that has official correspondence," McMullin explained, referring to the department's written mail policy. As a result, he said, "it's clear how something like that could occur."

The policy states that "under no circumstance" are sheriff's staff members to read privileged communications from inmates, including correspondence to lawyers, the courts and public officials. If privileged mail is opened, it must be in the inmate's presence and only to confirm the privileged status.

The policy also states that outgoing privileged correspondence shall be mailed without charge to the inmate.

Neither 11th Circuit Chief Judge J.L. Edmondson nor court executive Norman E. Zoller could be reached to discuss the plea agreement and court security.

In February, while under investigation for mailing the letters to the 11th Circuit and the Supreme Court, Simboli mailed the third letter from the Pinellas County jail to "George W., 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., Washington D.C." It contained detergent as well as graphic threats against the president, the first lady and one of their twin daughters, court records said.

A Mother's Too-Familiar Role (WP)

By Paul Duggan And Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

RICHMOND -- Janet Pelasara answered the phone in her hotel room at 8 a.m. Monday and said she had a busy day ahead: bookings on Fox News Channel, CNN and Court TV. She said she could spare only a few minutes in the lobby for a newspaper reporter.

DOJ_NMG_0007190

"Greta's here; I'm going to meet with her," Pelasara said a short time later, seated on a couch near the front desk of a downtown Marriott. She was referring to Greta Van Susteren, host of a crime and legal affairs program on Fox.

"I have Nancy Grace tonight," said Pelesara, 44, of Vienna, mother of college student Taylor Marie Behl, who disappeared in Richmond two weeks ago. Grace is the host of shows similar to Van Susteren's on Court TV and CNN Headline News.

Since Sept. 7, two nights after Behl vanished, Pelasara has been staying in the Marriott with friends while police search for her 17-year-old daughter, a freshman at Virginia Commonwealth University. Pelasara has waited patiently -- but not silently.

"There was 'The Early Show,' " she said, listing some of her recent network and syndicated TV appearances. "There was 'Good Morning America,' 'Inside Edition' . . ."

The shows that have put Pelasara on screens from coast to coast have a seemingly bottomless appetite for dramas like hers. Stories of missing young women who are thought to have been abducted are a particular staple of the 24-hour cable news channels.

Critics complain that such coverage is devoted disproportionately to suburban white women, such as Behl, while victims of color who are poor are often overlooked. But Pelasara can't afford to consider that debate at the moment. She said her goal is to get on as many programs as possible, to keep her daughter's face in front of the nation.

"After so many days, the interviews really become tiring," said a friend, Ann Martin, who is staying at the Marriott and coordinating Pelasara's TV appearances. While Pelasara sat in the lobby, Martin was in her room, awaiting a phone call about a car that would take Pelasara to meet Van Susteren at Behl's dormitory.

"It's really hectic, but we welcome it," said Martin, who works for the American Association of Pastoral Counselors. "We have to keep this out there."

Behl, who graduated from James Madison High School in Vienna, disappeared after leaving her dorm room Labor Day evening, two weeks into her freshman year. Her 1997 Ford Escort was found Saturday parked on a residential street about two miles from the campus. Its Virginia license plates were gone, replaced by stolen Ohio tags.

Besides trying to determine how the car wound up in that neighborhood with stolen plates, police have been looking into Behl's relationship with a 38-year-old photographer who has an apartment near the campus. The man took pictures of Behl last spring, fully clothed and posing on Belle Isle in Richmond, and posted them on his Web site.

Chris Collins, an attorney for the photographer, said yesterday that his client had a "romantic relationship" with Behl. He said Behl visited him at his apartment twice Sept. 5, once during the day and again about 9:30 p.m., not long before she vanished.

Collins said the photographer -- who maintains several Web sites featuring his work, including collages of short-skirted teenage girls in suggestive poses -- has asserted that he has no knowledge of Behl's whereabouts. "He's very worried about her," the lawyer said. "He liked her very much. . . . He's distraught over all of this."

Collins said his client has cooperated with investigators in several interviews. "He was one of the last persons to have seen her," Collins said.

The photographer is a former VCU student, according to his profile on MySpace.com, a popular dating and social networking Web site. He photographed Behl in April while she was visiting his roommate, a high school friend of hers from Vienna. He recently removed the photos from his site.

Now Behl is the latest young American woman in highly publicized peril -- after Chandra Levy, the Washington intern whose disappearance scandalized a politician; Laci Peterson, the pregnant California woman whose husband landed on death row; Jennifer Wilbanks, the runaway bride from Georgia; and Natalee Holloway of Alabama, who vanished in Aruba during her high school senior class trip.

And Pelasara is the latest anxious parent, even if she doesn't always come across that way. In interviews, her demeanor is often so calm that she seems almost detached from what's happening.

It's a coping strategy, said Pelasura, who works as an administrator for a Northern Virginia computer firm.

"Did you watch any of the Natalee Holloway disappearance?" Van Susteren asked her on Fox. "The tracking of her this summer?"

"I did some," replied Pelasara, who is divorced from her only child's father. "But I was busy with Taylor with her graduation . . . and getting her ready for college."

Van Susteren said, "Do you have any idea -- of the little you did see of the disappearance of Natalee -- any sort of idea, you know, of the pain a mother can go through?"

Pelasara said she has not allowed herself to feel pain.

DOJ_NMG_0007191

"Until I get her back safe and sound, or if we find out the worst, I think then I'll be able to feel and be able to appreciate that," she said, referring to the other mothers. "But no, everything is buried so deep. . . . That's the only way I can get through this."

Earlier Monday, in the Marriott lobby, she said: "Yes, I can sleep. I have to sleep. And I can think. I can think enough to get through all these interviews, because I have to do that. And then I don't have to think anymore."

Mornings are the worst times for her, she said, as she faces yet another round of interviews, of questions and answers she doesn't like to think about.

"Yes, mornings," she said. "Because I know what I have to face for the rest of the day."

Past Of Democrat In Forrester Ad Is Attacked (NYT)

By Josh Benson

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

TRENTON, Sept. 20 - State Democratic officials said on Tuesday that one of the Democrats appearing in an anticorruption commercial for the Republican candidate for governor, Douglas R. Forrester, was fired as a court clerk in Essex County after being accused of stealing money from court deposits and was, for a time, a Republican.

The commercial, titled "Democrats for Doug," features interviews with several people identified as Democrats who say they are angry at the corruption in their party and in state government.

One of them, identified as Dave McGraw, says, "The corruption is out of control," and urges, "It's time to take back New Jersey."

The man, David P. McGraw, 71, formerly a clerk in Essex County District Court, was indicted in the mid-1980's on charges of embezzling tens of thousands of dollars in court money over nearly three years, but was acquitted by a jury. He was a Democrat at the time. He lost his job in 1986, according to a January 2000 article in The Star-Ledger, after a disciplinary hearing determined that he had taken cash from court deposit envelopes for his personal use, had court employees cash his personal checks knowing they would bounce and had lied to the county prosecutor. The assignment judge fired him based on those findings, the newspaper said.

In an interview on Tuesday, Mr. McGraw did not dispute the sequence of events that led to his firing, but denied the charges.

In 2000, he brought a whistle-blower suit against Essex County after being removed from another public job, for the county parks department. He alleged that the county was losing money by giving away free rounds at a public golf course to "individuals with personal relationships" to county officials. He said he eventually settled the suit for $175,000.

Voting records show that Mr. McGraw voted in several Republican primary elections in the late 1990's through 2000.

Mr. McGraw said the embezzlement charges and his firing from the court job were results of a feud with Essex County officials at the time.

He expressed puzzlement that he had become a campaign issue. "They asked me if I could get some people to be in the commercial," said Mr. McGraw, who said he had done work for the Forrester campaign as a volunteer. "Lo and behold, I went over there and I was in the commercial. Quite frankly, if I knew there was going to be repercussions I wouldn't have done it. I don't want to hurt Doug Forrester's chances."

Mr. McGraw said he was registered as a Republican in recent years, but registered as a Democrat again in 2002 to vote in a primary election for Essex County executive.

Richard McGrath, a Democratic Party spokesman, said "the Forrester spot essentially 'advertises' the candidate's hypocrisy." Ivette Mendez, a spokeswoman for Senator Jon S. Corzine, Mr. Forrester's Democratic opponent, said only, "The party's statement speaks for itself."

Sherry Sylvester, a Forrester spokeswoman, said: "For Jon Corzine to attack a 71-year-old whistle-blower is a new low even for him. Dave McGraw illustrated what's wrong with New Jersey: politicians using intimidation and wrongful allegations to abuse their power."

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Says Pope Immune From Abuse Suits (AP)

By NICOLE WINFIELD, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0007192

ROME -- The U.S. Justice Department has told a Texas court that a lawsuit accusing Pope Benedict XVI of conspiring to cover up the sexual molestation of three boys by a seminarian should be dismissed because the pontiff enjoys immunity as head of state of the Holy See.

Assistant U.S. Attorney General Peter Keisler said in Monday's filing that allowing the lawsuit to proceed would be "incompatible with the United States' foreign policy interests."

There was no immediate ruling from Judge Lee Rosenthal of the U.S. District Court for the southern district of Texas in Houston. However, U.S. courts have been bound by such "suggestion of immunity" motions submitted by the government, Keisler's filing says.

A 1994 lawsuit against Pope John Paul II, also filed in Texas, was dismissed after the U.S. government filed a similar motion.

Keisler's motion was not unexpected, as the Vatican Embassy in Washington had asked the U.S. government to issue the immunity suggestion and do everything it could to get the case dismissed.

The former Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger was named as a defendant in a civil lawsuit by three plaintiffs who allege that Juan Carlos Patino-Arango, a Colombian-born seminarian on assignment at St. Francis de Sales church in Houston, molested them during counseling sessions in the church in the mid-1990s.

Patino-Arango has been indicted in a criminal case by a grand jury in Harris County, Texas, and is a fugitive from justice.

The lawsuit alleges Ratzinger, who headed the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith before becoming pope, was involved in a conspiracy to hide Patino-Arango's crimes and help him escape prosecution.

The lawsuit cites a May 18, 2001, letter from Ratzinger written in Latin to bishops around the world, explaining that "grave" crimes such as the sexual abuse of minors would be handled by his congregation and that the proceedings of special church tribunals handling the cases were subject to "pontifical secret."

Daniel Shea, attorney for one of the plaintiffs, has said such secret proceedings amounted to a conspiracy to cover up the crimes.

The Vatican and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops have insisted the secret church procedures in the sex abuse case were not designed to cover up abuse nor to prevent victims from reporting crimes to law enforcement authorities. The document deals with church law -- not keeping secrets from secular authorities, they say.

The pope's lawyer, Jeffrey Lena, said Tuesday it was "appropriate" the Justice Department had determined the pope was "the sitting head of state of the Holy See."

In a telephone interview, Lena said the motion would now be considered by the Texas court, "which should be bound by the executive's determination" and rule accordingly.

Many lawsuits stemming from the U.S. church sex abuse crisis have named the pope, the Vatican and other high-ranking church officials, but they failed because the officials could never be served with the papers. This case got further than most because Ratzinger was actually served with the documents.

Shea said Tuesday he would challenge the constitutionality of the U.S. diplomatic recognition of the Holy See on the grounds that it goes against the First Amendment's "establishment clause" that bars any laws respecting the establishment of religion.

Shea noted that in trying to have the case dismissed, Ratzinger's lawyers have already admitted in court papers that the Holy See is a church. A May 26 motion to dismiss the suit, citing the First Amendment, says the case should be thrown out because it would "invite court intrusion into the internal affairs of the Roman Catholic Church."

However, legal experts said such a challenge would be difficult to win, partly because previous challenges have failed and because the U.S. has maintained diplomatic relations with the Vatican since 1984.

"The courts have become a lot less interested in the establishment clause in the last few years," said Kent Greenawalt, a professor of First Amendment and legal philosophy at Columbia Law School.

Officials at the U.S. Embassy to the Holy See said they were familiar with the case but had no other immediate comment. The Vatican said it had no comment.

Along with the pope, the lawsuit names as defendants Patino-Arango, the Diocese of Galveston-Houston, Archbishop Joseph Fiorenza and the Rev. William Pickhard, Patino-Arango's vocational director.

GlaxoSmithKline Agrees To Pay $150 Million To Settle Drug Price Fraud Case (AP)

By Mark Sherman, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON – GlaxoSmithKline PLC will pay $150 million to settle claims it overcharged the government for two anti-nausea drugs, and prosecutors say they're looking into 150 cases of drug price fraud.

Scrutiny of the pharmaceutical industry has increased along with the portion of health care costs attributable to prescription drugs. That attention is likely to grow as the government prepares to begin a drug insurance program for older Americans under Medicare that is expected to increase sharply government spending on medicines.

The Glaxo settlement is the latest in a series of whistleblower claims that have resulted in $2.4 billion in payments from drug companies in recent years.

Glaxo engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health care providers based on the manufacturers' prices, the government said. The drugs, typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals, are used mainly to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation.

The company charged health care providers less for the drugs, knowing the providers would get to pocket the difference and would be more likely to prescribe them again, the Justice Department said.

Glaxo admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement. "We believe that our price reporting was lawful and was done in good faith, but we've agreed to this settlement to avoid the delay, expense and uncertainty of litigation," said Mary Anne Rhyne, a company spokeswoman.

The settlement covers claims submitted from 1994 to 2002.

The case resulted from a whistleblower lawsuit filed by Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys, Inc., a small home-infusion company that has won several suits that made similar allegations against other drug makers. The company and its principals will receive $26 million from the settlement, as allowed under the federal False Claims Act, the Justice Department said.

James Moorman, president of the advocacy group Taxpayers Against Fraud, said the scheme alleged by Ven-A-Care and the Justice Department represents "a perverse competition, where you don't compete with a low price but with a high price."

The Medicare law that created prescription drug coverage beginning in January also was designed to eliminate the huge spread between what manufacturers reported as their average wholesale price and what health care providers actually paid.

Moorman said no similar fix has yet been put in place for Medicaid, the federal-state health program for the poor.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, Congress' leading advocate for whistleblower protection, said the "importance of whistleblowers will only increase as the new Medicare prescription drug benefit takes effect. Bad actors in the industry should know that these good guys are on the case."

Glaxo has faced fraudulent billing charges before. In 1997, its forerunner, SmithKline Beecham Clinical Laboratories Inc., was ordered to pay $325 million for filing false claims relating to laboratory tests that were paid for in whole or in part by the federal government. The company added tests not requested by doctors and not medically necessary, billed for tests not actually performed and gave kickbacks to doctors.

Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Civil Division, said federal and state officials are looking into 150 price and marketing fraud cases involving more than 500 drugs.

The Glaxo settlement is the first announced this year. However, another may be coming soon: Serono Laboratories of Switzerland has set aside $725 million for a settlement of allegations it offered kickbacks to doctors for writing prescriptions for an AIDS treatment drug with sagging sales.

Four former executives have been indicted by a federal grand jury for their alleged roles in the kickback scheme.

California regulators have sued 41 pharmaceutical companies, accusing them of inflating drug prices for the state's version of the Medicaid program and costing state taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars. Glaxo is a defendant in that suit as well.

In one example, the state said Abbott Laboratories Inc. reported the average wholesale price of a vial of the antibiotic vancomycin as $58.37 to Medi-Cal but charged pharmacies just $6.29. The company has denied any improprieties.

GSK Pays $150m To Settle US Court Case (LONDTIMES)

By Richard Irving

London (UK) Daily Times, September 21, 2005

GLAXOSMITHKLINE has agreed to pay more than $150 million (£83 million) to settle US government charges that the company fraudulently inflated the price of two anti-nausea drugs available under the federal healthcare programme.

Peter Keisler, assistant attorney-general at the Justice Department, said yesterday that government prosecutors would continue to crack down on abuses. “We will not tolerate fraudulent pricing practices designed to reap profits for drug companies and doctors at the expense of healthcare programmes for the poor and elderly,” he said.

Prosecutors alleged that GlaxoSmithKline (GSK) had engaged in a scheme deliberately to set inflated prices for Zofran and Kytril, knowing that federal healthcare programmes used the prices to establish reimbursement rates.

The Justice Department claimed that the company actually had charged doctors less than the official rates, knowing that they would be able to pocket the difference.

The two drugs are used to alleviate sickness among patients undergoing chemo and radiation therapy.

GSK said that it had decided to settle the case without admitting any wrongdoing to put an end to litigation that has been continuing for more than a decade. The company added that the settlement, which includes a $149 million payment as well as additional interest of $1.8 million, is covered by additional legal reserves.

A spokesman said: "The company fully co-operated with the government over the course of this investigation (and) understands that the federal government's inquiries concerning pricing issues is now completed and closed."

Reuters, September 20, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - GlaxoSmithKline has paid more than $150 million to settle government charges that the company fraudulently inflated the price of drugs purchased by federal health-care programs, the U.S. Justice Department said on Tuesday.

The settlement stems from allegations that the British company violated the U.S. False Claims Act in the sale and marketing of Zofran and Kytril, two nausea drugs prescribed to patients undergoing cancer treatment, the department said.

GlaxoSmithKline issued a statement saying it did nothing wrong, but agreed to settle the case to avoid litigation.

According to the department, Glaxo engaged in a scheme to deliberately set and maintain inflated prices for the two drugs, knowing that federal health care programs used those prices to establish their reimbursement rates.

The Justice Department "will not tolerate fraudulent pricing practices designed to reap profits for drug companies and doctors at the expense of health care programs for the poor and the elderly," an official said in a statement.

Of the amount paid by GlaxoSmithKline, $26 million will go to whistle-blowers who prompted the investigation and another $10 million will go to state governments.

GlaxoSmithKline Pays $150 Million To Settle Charges (WSJ/DJN)

By Brian Blackstone, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- GlaxoSmithKline PLC paid $150 million (€123 million) to settle fraud allegations over the pricing and marketing of two antinausea drugs, the Justice Department said.

The government alleges that the United Kingdom-based pharmaceutical maker engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the federal Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health-care providers based on the manufacturers' prices. The drugs are used mainly to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation.

But the company charged health-care providers less for the drugs, knowing that the providers would get to pocket the difference, the Justice Department said.

GlaxoSmithKline admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement. Company spokeswoman Mary Anne Rhyne said the firm "believes its price reporting was lawful and in good faith."

The government opened an investigation into the drugs' pricing after Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc., a small home-infusion company, filed a whistle-blower lawsuit. Ven-A-Care will receive $26 million of the government's settlement.

The Justice Department "will continue to pursue these types of fraud schemes vigorously to make clear that we will not tolerate fraudulent pricing practices designed to reap profits for drug companies and doctors at the expense of healthcare programs for the poor and the elderly," Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler said in a statement.

GOP Rep. Tries To Kill Base Closings (NSDY/AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A House Republican set the wheels in motion Tuesday to try to kill the Pentagon's proposal to close or downsize hundreds of U.S. military bases, a move that is largely symbolic and has little chance of succeeding.

Rep. Ray LaHood of Illinois introduced a joint resolution in the House to reject the plan to restructure the U.S. network of military bases. It is the first effort to close bases since 1995.

LaHood said the base-closing commission and the Pentagon ignored a significant fact: The country is at war.

"Now is not the time to be closing bases around the country," he said. "Now we as a Congress have the opportunity, I think, to have our say."

President Bush endorsed the commission report last week. It calls for closing 22 major military bases and reconfiguring another 33. Hundreds more from coast to coast also will be affected.

The president sent the report to Congress, where it will become law after 45 legislative days unless the House and Senate pass a joint resolution rejecting it.

DOJ_NMG_0007195

LaHood, whose district includes a base in Springfield, Ill., that is to lose 15 National Guard fighter jets, became the first lawmaker to introduce such a resolution.

The House overwhelmingly supports the fifth round of base restructuring, and Republican leaders -- who also back the closures -- control whether lawmakers vote on LaHood's measure.

"I'm going to encourage the speaker and the majority leader to let us have our prerogative, have a debate and see what happens," he said.

No lawmaker in the Senate has introduced a joint resolution. A GOP-led effort in the Senate to derail the plan fizzled last month after the commission reviewing the plan spared several bases in the home states of lawmakers who opposed it.

Tentative Deal Set Over ADA Violations (LVS)

By Brian Wargo, LAS VEGAS SUN

Las Vegas Sun, September 21, 2005

North Las Vegas has reached a tentative agreement with the Justice Department that will cost the city about $2 million over the next two to three years to address violations of the Americans with Disability Act.

The 1990 federal law requires local governments improve access for the disabled to government facilities and programs.

The agreement, which the city's staff has recommended the City Council ratify, has already cost the city $80,000. North Las Vegas has budgeted $655,000 in the current budget and projects a similar amount will be needed in the next two years to comply with the disabilities act.

North Las Vegas City Manager Gregory Rose said the city doesn't know what the total cost will be because it plans to go beyond the minimum requirements in providing for the needs of the disabled. Rose, who became city manager in October 2003, said the city didn't do anything blatant but is to blame for not placing a high enough emphasis on complying with the law.

"If we live long enough, all of us will be disabled at some point," Rose said. "This is the right thing to do."

North Las Vegas came under fire from the Justice Department after federal officials conducted a January 2004 review of 75 percent of the city's parks and facilities and found 182 violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act.

The violations included the absence of an accessible drinking fountain at City Hall, a need for restroom improvements and for fixing sidewalks where street lights or signage hindered the mobility by wheelchair users. Sidewalks will have to be expanded or signs moved.

Rose said it will be costly, but the city can afford the upgrades by spreading out the improvements rather than doing them all at once. He said the city is making a good-faith effort to correct the violations in the next two to three years, and if that can't be done, an extension will be requested from the federal government.

The Justice Department can file lawsuits in federal court to enforce the ADA requirements and can seek fines of up to $55,000 for the first violation and $110,000 for subsequent violations.

Las Vegas attorney Marina Kolias has sued North Las Vegas, alleging the city violated her two clients' civil rights when its Police Department failed to provide a sign language interpreter during an arrest. She said the city still needs to do more and do it more quickly, but she is glad that North Las Vegas finally is taking some remedial steps.

"What North Las Vegas is doing is too little, but it is never too late for any steps or efforts to advance assistance to persons with disabilities. It is appreciated and a step in the right direction," Kolias said.

The agreement calls on the city to implement a policy for police officers communicating with those who are deaf and hiring a sign-language interpreter who is available 24 hours a day. It also requires the city to equip its police and detention facilities with a telecommunciations device for the deaf.

Kolias said the city should move faster than six months and she fears the city will use an outdated technology that won't help the deaf communicate with family members.

Facilities constructed after Jan. 26, 1992, must comply with the ADA standards. That includes improving access for wheelchair users to a counter, drinking fountains, bathrooms, corridors and parking lots. During the construction of its new justice facility that opened in May, North Las Vegas had to make changes in its construction plans to comply with the ADA.

DOJ_NMG_0007196

When streets are resurfaced, cities are required to reconfigure sidewalks and curbs to accommodate wheelchairs. During the last decade, city officials said they have spent more than $1.4 million for ramp improvements.

Under the ADA, all government activities, services and programs are covered. That includes employment, public meetings, court activities and programs of police, fire, voting, parks and recreation departments.

Sticking Point Of Voting-reform Bid: Photo IDs (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Since the disputed election of 2000, some Americans have lost faith that their votes count.

The federal reforms of 2002 were a start, say voting experts, but more is needed. Problems in the 2004 elections - from long lines at polling stations to inconsistent handling of provisional ballots - have exacerbated the sense that US elections are flawed.

Now, a bipartisan commission headed by former President Carter, a Democrat, and former Secretary of State James Baker, a Republican, has recommended additional changes - including a call for all voters to show photo IDs, paper trails for electronic voting machines, and a shift toward nonpartisan administration of elections.

But a backlash over the photo ID recommendation, in particular, threatens to overtake any attention to the 86 other recommendations. Additional election reform was already a low priority on Congress's agenda, the commission itself acknowledges, and now the controversy may have complicated matters.

"The real divide [over election reform] boils down to the voter-fraud side for conservatives and voter-access issues for liberals," says Rob Richie, executive director of the group Fair Vote, which seeks to increase participation in elections.

The report's recommendation that, by 2010, all states require voters to show a government-issued photo ID card to vote goes right to the question of how poverty and race affect the ability to vote.

About 12 percent of the voting-age population does not have a driver's license, a group that skews toward minorities and low-income workers.

Former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle, a member of the commission, dissented on that part of the report, comparing the requirement of an ID to a " modern-day poll tax."

Ironically, the voter-ID issue is already in the headlines in Mr. Carter's home state of Georgia. On Monday, voting and civil-rights groups filed a federal lawsuit challenging the state's requirement that voters show a government-issued photo ID at the polls - a new law the litigants call the most restrictive of its kind in the US.

Anticipating criticism over voter IDs, the Carter-Baker commission recommended that states provide free ID cards to those who don't already have one, and take measures to ensure privacy.

Still, critics say, there remains the challenge for elderly, infirm, low-income, and rural citizens to travel to a location and obtain the ID. Further, they add, there is no such requirement for photo IDs with absentee ballots, only a requirement that signatures match.

Richard L. Hasen, an election law expert at Loyola School of Law in Los Angeles, bemoans the siphoning of attention away from what he sees as a significant recommendation: the removal of control of elections from partisan politicians and into the hands of impartial election administrators. Once implemented, that step would go far toward restoring Americans' confidence in elections, he says.

"We cannot build confidence in elections if secretaries of State responsible for certifying votes are simultaneously chairing political campaigns," the report said.

That statement was a veiled reference to recent examples in states that proved critical to the outcome of presidential races: Florida Rep. Katherine Harris (R), secretary of State for Florida during the 2000 election, was also co-chair of President Bush's Florida campaign. In Ohio in 2004, Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell performed the same role for Bush.

"It took the debacle in Florida 2000 and further problems in 2004 to illustrate what the problems are; public confidence has shot way down," says Professor Hasen. He notes that in Washington State, where the Democratic gubernatorial candidate squeaked by the Republican in the 2004 race, the problem is reversed: Republicans there are more cynical than Democrats over the fairness of the outcome.

"The hope was that the Carter-Baker commission would move beyond politics, and move into consensus recommendations, which are desperately needed," Hasen says. "I think they've squandered their political capital. In 2004, my phone was ringing off the hook with reporters asking why things haven't been fixed. It will happen in 2008."

The commission recommended that a state's chief election officer be an appointed position, with two-thirds approval by the state legislature. At the federal level, the commission recommended that a nonpartisan chairperson be added to the four-person

US Election Assistance Commission. This person would be nominated by the president to a 10-year term and confirmed by the Senate.

Other commission proposals include:

· A new system of presidential primaries, in which four regional primaries are held, one per month beginning in March of an election. Every election, a different region would hold its primaries first, after the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary.

· Maintenance of voter lists by states, and not localities, allowing for greater "interoperability" among states. Such a system is aimed at eliminating the potential for voters to cast ballots in more than one state and also could allow voters to register once in their lives and then make it easier to update registration information when they move.

· Passage by Congress of a law that would require all voting machines to have a "voter-verifiable paper audit trail."

Voting For Reform (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

If it is true, as former President Jimmy Carter said, that Americans have lost faith in their voting system, then he and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III have lost a significant opportunity to help them restore it. A bipartisan commission led by Carter and Baker released a report Monday that proposes many reasonable ways to make voting a smoother and more trustworthy process — but stops far short of addressing what really keeps people from the polls.

For that, the report would have to have recommended abolishing the Electoral College, the cornerstone of a winner-take-all system that leads presidential candidates to lavish their attention on a few key states. It might also have at least alluded to reforms of campaign finance laws and conflict-of-interest rules for elected officials, especially because many voters see politics as a parade of special-interest pandering in which their interests seldom count for much.

Such reforms would take tremendous political will. But that is lacking these days, so the commission limited itself to pragmatic, incremental reforms designed to boost public faith in the ballot system. With some adjustments, many of these should be adopted.

One recommendation that should become reality is a rescheduling of the presidential primaries. The report suggests holding them on a mostly regional basis and rotating the first regional primary regularly. This system would put an end to the electoral arms race in which states vie for the earliest possible primary. It's also smart to encourage mobile registration vans and electronic voting machines that produce a paper trail that can be audited. Better tracking of voters who move is another wise idea.

Civil rights advocates, though, complain about the commission's recommendation that authorities require photo ID to vote in order to cut down on voter fraud. Usually photo ID means a driver's license, but the report recommends that states provide free cards to non-drivers. The idea's critics point out, rightly, that African Americans and the elderly are less likely to drive or have the documents to prove citizenship, and they say these groups would be disenfranchised.

But most everyone, excepting Hurricane Katrina victims, should be able to get a birth certificate easily. And there will be plenty of get-out-the-vote workers to help them with the process. The photo ID can also be viewed as a protection for voters because it sets a single standard for voting eligibility and reduces local discretion to question or intimidate voters.

The key is to not create excessive demands for proof of citizenship and for the federal government to insist that the cards be free. That last item might sound foolishly obvious, but the state of Georgia recently won U.S. Justice Department approval to charge voters a fee for a five-year card. (The fee, which varies and which the state says will be waived for the poor, is being challenged in court.)

There should be no financial impediment to the most basic democratic right. That such an un-American idea could win the approval of a state legislature and be signed by a governor shows better than anything why so many people consider politics, and voting, such a waste of time.

ANTITRUST:

Federal Courts May Face Flood Of Price-Fixing Actions (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

Law.com, September 21, 2005

An unlikely marriage between the Department of Justice's amnesty program in price-fixing cases and the recent reform of federal class action law has had an unexpected but profound effect on civil antitrust actions.

Indirect victims of price-fixing, those who buy items produced from a part that was subject to price-fixing, have been barred since 1977 from recovering damages in federal court after Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720 (1977).

DOJ_NMG_0007198

Many state courts rushed to fill that void with their own state antitrust protections, giving indirect purchasers a forum to bring class actions against cartel participants but leaving those plaintiffs to wage state-by-state battles for recovery.

That created a two-tier system of direct purchasers -- such as companies buying computer chips -- suing in federal courts, while indirect purchasers -- companies that bought the finished computers containing the overpriced chips -- sued in state courts.

Then came this year's Class Action Fairness Act, an effort by Congress to move mass tort class actions out of what it saw as plaintiff-friendly state courts and into less-sympathetic federal courts. It opened the federal court door for indirect buyers.

FLOODING INTO FEDERAL COURTS

Indirect-purchaser antitrust cases have flooded back to federal court using pendent state law antitrust claims. It has put federal judges in the position of interpreting, for example, 20 separate state antitrust laws in order to decide 20 separate motions to dismiss in a single case.

Or a single federal judge may have to sort out the intricacies of how damages will be apportioned if a direct purchaser passed on the increased price from a fixed-price product to downstream consumers.

"Congress couldn't have been intending this to happen," said Daniel G. Swanson, a defense attorney with Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's Washington office. Swanson represents Dutch chemical giant Akzo Nobel N.V., one of several companies sued for allegedly fixing the price of hydrogen peroxide, a bleaching agent.

"I think [indirect purchasers] will be an issue in virtually all treble damage suits going forward," warned Donald Klawiter, chair of the American Bar Association Section of Antitrust Law and a partner with Morgan, Lewis & Bockius.

"The question is: Can a court sort out all the damages and get it right so [defendants] are not paying six times damages? It is an important issue for the legislature and judiciary to work out," said Klawiter, who is based in Washington.

A 12-member Antitrust Modernization Commission, created by Congress in 2002, began looking at some of the indirect purchaser issues during its July meeting and has some legislative reform ideas under consideration. The American Bar Association antitrust section plans to conduct a special program for commissioners and the bar focusing on some of these questions in June 2006.

Two of the first major courtroom battlegrounds for indirect purchaser disputes are shaping up at opposite ends of the country. In San Francisco federal court, direct- and indirect-purchaser suits have been filed against major computer memory chip companies, known as the DRAM case. Meanwhile, in Philadelphia, plaintiffs have gone after hydrogen peroxide producers for alleged price-fixing.

Both cases stem from the Justice Department's intense enforcement efforts against price-fixing that encourages companies to confess their role. The first company in the door gets the biggest break from prosecutors, while those who dally face criminal prosecution and severe penalties, followed by private civil suits with treble damages.

In its latest permutation, federal antitrust lawyers have offered early cooperators the chance to avoid treble damages as well, something most plaintiffs lawyers have welcomed.

"The program has been a good thing for the antitrust world," according to Bruce Simon, a plaintiffs lawyer with Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy in San Francisco. "We understand we have to be careful," he said of companies who cooperate with investigations. "Part of the government's job of getting them to roll over [on other price-fixers] is not to throw them to the wolves," Simon said.

In the DRAM case, revenue for the memory chips exceeds $20 billion a year, with the six top chipmakers controlling 96 percent of the market, among them Samsung Corp., The Micron Group, Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and Toshiba Corp., according to the complaint, In re Dynamic Random Access Memory Antitrust Litigation, No. MDL1486.

Infineon Technologies A.G. pleaded guilty in 2004 and agreed to pay a $160 million fine for its role in the international price-fixing scheme that affected companies such as Dell Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co. and Apple Computer Inc.

The companies that bought the chips to install in their computers may recover damages as direct purchasers of the chips, even if they passed on the cost to consumers who bought the computers. But millions of consumers, the indirect purchasers, have a much tougher time in state courts and now in federal court actions.

In the hydrogen peroxide case, In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litigation, No. C05-0666SD, the suit alleges a global conspiracy began in 1994 among the chemical makers to sell at agreed prices, reduce production capacity and share sales information. The chemical is used in the pulp and paper industry and for textiles as a bleaching agent.

The French firm Elf Atochem, and a British company, Degussa U.K. Holdings, pleaded guilty to price-fixing in federal court and agreed to pay a total of $5 million in fines for their roles in a conspiracy, according to a 2004 Justice Department statement.

Both the DRAM and chemical cases have indirect purchasers who have joined the direct-purchaser suits, but the fight over their place in the litigation is still unfolding.

While some defendants may want to send the indirect-purchaser cases back to state court, the new reform act now stands in the way. The CAFA statute has a number of tests that hamper remand to state court. The tests were intended to make it tough on plaintiffs. Few thought that defendants might want to get the cases out of federal court.

And plaintiffs lawyers with indirect-purchaser claims have often been only too happy to leave state courts. State court judges frequently look for ways to dump the indirect-buyer claims, according to Daniel Karon, a plaintiffs lawyer and law professor at Cleveland-Marshall College of Law who has written about the issue.

"State court judges ought to know their state law ... but they often say, 'Indirect purchasers can sue, but not you,'" Karon said. "They totally screw it up. The people who have losses are the consumers at the end" of the buying chain, he said.

"The theoretical flaw in state reasoning [in dismissing cases] is that not one state antitrust law requires a consumer to purchase a price-fixed item. There is no purchase requirement. That has been read into the statutes by courts," he said.

In a sign of the willingness of state courts to throw out indirect-purchaser claims, Gibson Dunn's Swanson said that in roughly 20 state court cases involving indirect purchase of rubber chemicals around the country, he successfully got state court judges to throw out all but about five cases.

If they had been gathered into a single federal suit, "How many federal judges will parse through all that? I have enormous confidence in federal judges doing a good job dealing with it, but it would stagger any individual human being," he said.

Some states still struggle with standing for indirect purchasers to sue. Just last week, the Tennessee Supreme Court overruled a lower court to hold that indirect purchasers do have the right to bring an action under the state's Trade Practices Act. Freeman Industries v. Eastman Chemical Co., No. E2003-00527-SC-S09-CV.

In addition, the plaintiffs in that case successfully brought unjust enrichment claims. "That is something we throw into antitrust cases now," Karon said.

He is awaiting the outcome of a similar state appeal in Ohio for a case argued in February.

DILEMMA FOR DEFENSE

During the July testimony before Congress' Antitrust Modernization Commission, a lawyer for Microsoft Corp., David Tulchin of New York's Sullivan & Cromwell, explained the dilemma for the defense. Indirect-purchaser cases against Microsoft Corp. were filed in nearly 38 states. With matters in so many states, "the process of adjudicating what really is a national claim on behalf of indirect purchasers becomes extremely complex, extremely expensive," Tulchin said.

"There are lawyers, in some cases dozens of lawyers, in each state on each side working on what really is the same matter," Tulchin said.

It can become coercive to defendants, he said. It's one thing to go to trial where a victory means something, "but it's another thing where if you win you have just one victory but if you lose you have the domino effect of collateral estoppel," Tulchin said.

A defendant with pending cases in numerous states risks incurring a loss that will have the collateral estoppel effect with potential treble damages in dozens of pending cases, he said.

Yet the federal courts create a different dilemma. Said Swanson: "The fight turns into whether you get federal judges to do something they are generally not asked to do: to construe individual state antitrust laws on a very detailed and granular basis."

FCC Extends Review Of Verizon-MCI Merger To Oct. 13 (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- The Federal Communications Commission on Tuesday extended its review period of Verizon Communications Inc. (VZ)'s (VZ) proposed acquisition of MCI Inc. (MCIP) (MCIP) until Oct. 13.

The agency's internal and nonbinding 180-day target for merger reviews expired Tuesday. On Monday, Verizon (VZ) and MCI asked the FCC to extend it until Oct. 13.

The FCC said in a public notice that the extension is "in the interest of ensuring sound analysis of the record" and noted that Verizon (VZ) and MCI have in recent days filed "substantial additional relevant information."

Verizon (VZ) has agreed to acquire MCI for $8.5 billion. MCI shareholders are slated to vote on the deal Oct. 6.

Opponents of the deal say the merged company would reduce competition, particularly in the business-services market, leading to higher prices.

Earlier this month, the FCC agreed to stop the clock on its review of the proposed $16 billion acquisition of AT&T Corp. (T) (T) by SBC Communications Inc. (SBC) (SBC) until October 13.

The Wall Street Journal reported Tuesday that FCC Chairman Kevin Martin wants agency staff to deliver recommendations to approve the two mergers.

Such an order could be on commissioners' desks for consideration as early as Wednesday. The next public FCC meeting is scheduled for Oct. 12, one day before the newly extended review clocks expire.

Under agency rules, commissioners should receive orders that are up for a vote three weeks before public meetings.
The Justice Department must also sign off on the mergers.

Antitrust Lawyers Expect Realtor-DOJ Case To Settle (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News
Inman News, September 20, 2005

It's not surprising that the federal government sued the National Association of Realtors over alleged antitrust violations – trade groups can be a breeding ground for anticompetitive activities, and Realtors have clashed with regulators before on antitrust issues, say legal experts, adding that it won't be surprising if an agreement is reached before the lawsuit goes to trial.

On Sept. 7, the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division filed a lawsuit against the 1.2 million-member Realtor trade group to try to bar it from enforcing rules that antitrust officials say restrain competition. The suit specifically challenges NAR's policies related to the display of property listings on the Internet.

An earlier policy adopted by the trade group enabled brokers to pick and choose which competitors could display their property listings online.

While the Realtor group, in response to a Justice Department investigation over its earlier policy, enacted a new Internet listings policy on Aug. 31 for all Realtor-owned MLSs, this new policy continues "to discriminate against brokers who use the Internet to more efficiently and cost effectively serve home sellers and buyers," the Justice Department alleges. Realtor-owned MLSs must adopt and implement the trade group's new policy by July 1, 2006, and some provisions of the new policy are optional.

Earlier lawsuits, dating back to the 1950s, have alleged that Realtor groups have conspired to fix commission rates. Industry research has found that real estate commission rates have dropped slightly over the past several years from the historic average of 6 percent, though home-price increases have risen more than enough to offset this drop in many markets.

In addition to this latest lawsuit against the Realtor trade group, the Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission this year issued letters opposing Realtor-backed legislation in several states that would impose new real estate service requirements and essentially ban some discount business models.

Also, the Justice Department filed a lawsuit in March over real estate rebate restrictions in Kentucky, which led that state to lift its rebate ban. And South Dakota also loosened its rebate restrictions this year in response to a separate Justice Department investigation.

Robert Cohan, Jackson Walker

Trade groups "are kind of a hotbed of antitrust activity – they are by their nature a gathering of competitors," said Robert M. Cohan, a lawyer who is chairman of the antitrust group and a partner in the Jackson Walker law firm's Dallas office. "There are many good things that trade associations do but there is always a danger that when you get competitors together they're going to do things they shouldn't do, such as agree on price."

He added, "There is certainly a history of challenges to real estate multiple listing services and the way Realtor associations operate. There has been some history of tension between the industry and the regulators. What the Justice Department seems to be suggesting is that the Realtor association is protecting Realtors who may still be doing business the old-fashioned way."

Federal antitrust cases can be "tremendously expensive to litigate" and can be drawn out for years if groups aggressively fight the charges, and Cohan said it's fairly common for the parties in such cases to settle before the cases reach trial.

Sutton Keany, Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman

Sutton Keany, a partner and antitrust lawyer who works in the New York office of the Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman law firm, said the Justice Department has already had some success in prompting the Realtor group to rethink its Internet listings policy. The lawsuit may have provided inspiration for NAR to move more quickly in its adoption of new rules, he said, adding that "(The Justice Department) has had success at least on one point - if the purpose of the complaint is to shake up practices in the area."

He added, "It is generally thought that most markets operate more efficiently as the availability of information is increased. If participants in that market get together to try to exclude certain brokers or to restrict the flow of information or to reward non-technological advances, it raises questions. In the end that's what is motivating the Department of Justice."

Tim Greaney, a law professor at Saint Louis University in Missouriwho worked in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division for 10 years during the 1980s, said the lawsuit against the Realtors appears to be "really a classic case of changing market conditions and innovation having a major potential impact on an industry, and an industry's reaction being to resist it because it certainly has the potential to disrupt the way business has been conducted in the past."

While property information continues to be vital for the business of real estate brokerage, "nothing cheapens information quite as much as the Internet," Greaney said, which poses challenges for companies that have relied on brick-and-mortar investments.

MLSs can benefit consumers by providing widespread property listings information, but such joint ventures can be anticompetitive if they serve as devices for exclusion, he said. If the lawsuit is settled, Greaney expects it would be in the form of a court-enforced consent decree, which could lessen the chances for extensive future litigation related to this case.

Legal experts say that federal antitrust cases can be the basis for private litigation, and if the Justice Department prevails in the case there may be a trailing wave of class-action or individual lawsuits by real estate companies or groups.

The federal government is not seeking any damages in the lawsuit, but aims to restrain and enjoin the Realtor association from requiring rules that restrict how a broker interacts with customers, competitors or others, according to the Justice Department complaint.

The lawsuit also seeks to prevent the trade group from requiring affiliated boards and MLSs to adopt specific Internet listings policies – such as the ability for brokers to selectively withhold listings from some competing brokers – that the Justice Department considers to be anticompetitive.

Theodore "Ted" Bolema, a lawyer in the Finance and Law Department at Central Michigan University who served in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division from 1992-2000, said the lawsuit against the Realtor group appears to be at the "intersection of antitrust laws and (intellectual) property rights," as it relates to the ownership control of property listings information.

Theodore Bolema, Central Michigan University

"It strikes me as one of the most interesting antitrust cases we've seen in some time because of the rather unique issues in it," he said.

Antitrust cases can take longer to resolve than average court cases, Bolema said, and the Justice Department must present a very detailed factual analysis to support its case. "(These cases) are very fact specific. Courts have held that it's really the economic impact that is critical in determining whether there is a violation or not." While some antitrust cases seek damages for past violations, the case against the Realtor trade group does not.

The American Antitrust Institute, an independent, non-profit research and advocacy group that promotes fair competition, has commended the Justice Department for bringing the lawsuit against the Realtor association. Albert Foer, president of the institute, said, "I think that the Realtors are going to have a very difficult time in prevailing. There is a context of an industry in which commissions appear to have been stable for a long time, even as the price of housing has escalated. That tips us off that something is wrong in terms of how competition is working."

But, he also said, "At this stage it's hard to prejudge the outcome. We supported the idea that (the Justice Department) brought the case because we think this is a really important issue for consumers and it ought to get the fullest possible airing."

Legal experts have said that Washington politics should not have a major bearing on this case – despite the Realtor group's powerful presence in congressional lobbying and financial support for federal elections.

But Justice Department officials, Foer said, "are clearly aware of the political power of the Realtors. And nonetheless they put forward the case – one assumes they've done a lot of thinking and a lot of preparation and have a lot to offer."

Governors Ask Probe Into Possible Gasoline Price Gouging (AP)

By JOSEPH B. FRAZIER, Associated Press

AP, September 21, 2005

Eight Democratic governors, including Gov. Ted Kulongoski, have written the Bush Administration requesting a probe into possible gasoline price gouging in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"We urge Congress to immediately commence an investigation into the excessive profits being made by oil companies who are taking advantage of this national crisis," the letter said.

It urged legislation refunding any excessive profits to consumers and was signed by the governors of Oregon, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, New Mexico, Iowa, Montana and Washington.

The letter cites a report by Don Nichols, an economist and director of the Robert M. LaFollett School of Public Affairs at the University of Wisconsin as saying there is a disproportionate increase in the rise of pump prices and crude oil prices.

Historically, Nichols said, the markup between the price of a gallon of crude and a gallon of gasoline is about 85 to 90 cents a gallon including refining, distribution and taxes.

At $50 for a 44-gallon barrel of crude, he said, the pump price should be about $2 a gallon, a little more or less in some states depending on taxes. At $65 a barrel — nearly identical to the price in Tuesday afternoon trading — a gallon should be about $2.30.

But as of Monday, the average cost of a gallon of regular was $2.78 nationwide. A week ago, it was $2.95 a gallon.

For gasoline to be $3 a gallon, he said, crude should be selling for about $95 a barrel.

Ten refineries were knocked out by Katrina but Nichols said windfall profits are still involved.

"There is supply and demand," he said. "That's the market."

"But somebody is sitting on money they didn't earn," he said, "because they were in the right place at the right time."

He said he has seen no explanation for why the markup should be nearly triple. "The disconnect between gasoline and crude oil prices is quite remarkable," he said.

"How can gasoline prices soar if crude prices don't?" he asked in the study, which was contained in a broader look at economic impacts of Katrina.

Officials of major petroleum industry groups asked for comment did not immediately return calls Tuesday.

Last week in Washington the Senate passed an amendment that requires the Federal Trade Commission to conduct an immediate investigation into possible gasoline price-gouging in the wake of the devastating hurricane.

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle wrote that Wisconsin consumers have been overcharged by an estimated $88 million just this month and called for refunds.

Oregon Attorney General Hardy Myers wrote in Tuesday's Oregonian newspaper that Oregon, unlike 21 other states, has no law banning price gouging during emergencies.

Instead, Oregon law limits gouging to the prohibiting of taking advantage of a customer with a physical infirmity.

"The sky's the limit is the rule here even in a declared emergency," he wrote.

He said he has been seeking a law for years to let his office deal with gouging.

Nationally, gasoline prices have been slowly dropping in recent days amid predictions that they could rise again as Hurricane Rita moves toward the Gulf of Mexico.

"Just yesterday, we saw oil set the new record for a one-day spike in prices," Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash., a member of the Senate Energy and Commerce committees, said Tuesday.

"The oil companies know we don't have a plan to protect American consumers. We need a federal law that's going to prohibit profiteering at the gas pump — especially during national emergencies," she said.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson will call a special legislative session next month to propose a $100 million gasoline and home heating relief package.

Spokesman Gilbert Gallegos said Tuesday that the one-time package would include rebates for taxpayers. He said Richardson will seek a bill that will allow the state to investigate and punish companies that engage in price gouging.

White House spokesman Allen Abney said no one has seen the governors' letter Tuesday, but that Bush won't stand for price gouging. He also said Bush has asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to handle any such allegations.

U.S. Plans Deployment Of Antipiracy Attachés (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is stepping up efforts to protect the patent rights of American businesses overseas, amid growing concern over the piracy of U.S. intellectual property.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez today is expected to announce that his department has set up a team of intellectual-property specialists who will be assigned to several nations to help fight piracy there.

The initiative, which builds on a strategy the Commerce Department is following in China, is part of an effort by Washington to gain control of an issue roiling U.S. trade relations around the globe, particularly with developing countries.

Last week, Chinese President Hu Jintao assured President Bush that Beijing is willing to strengthen antipiracy rules, as part of an effort to increase imports of U.S. goods into China and ease the trade gap -- on pace to break last year's record of $162 billion -- between the two economic powers. Past Chinese promises to deal with the issue have yielded few tangible results.

Together with the diplomatic dialogue, the Bush administration is scrambling to provide support for American business. Critics complain tens of billions of dollars in revenue are lost annually as a result of the piracy of intellectual property.

In addition to beefing up the antipiracy effort in China, the administration plans to deploy intellectual-property specialists to Brazil, India, Russia, Thailand and the Middle East -- all regions that concern U.S. trade officials tracking patent issues. The new team of attachés will provide in-country assistance to U.S. businesses facing piracy problems, and work with local officials on efforts to curb theft.

"We're going to have a presence on the ground," Mr. Gutierrez said. He is scheduled to outline the plan on a two-day swing this week through California, where he is to discuss trade issues with technology and movie-industry executives. "It's all part of an overall effort to combat" violations of intellectual-property rights, the secretary said.

The initiative is the work of Chris Israel, a Commerce official tapped over the summer to coordinate antipiracy efforts across the administration. The Commerce Department also is creating an academy, based at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, to train foreign judges, enforcement officials and program administrators on international-patent obligations, as well as how to establish and maintain a system of intellectual-property protections.

Among the countries expected to participate are Brazil and China. Creation of the academy would double the size of an existing program through which the Patent and Trademark Office conducts education and enforcement training programs around the world.

At home, the department is also convening a series of grass-roots seminars around the country to educate small-business owners on protecting their intellectual property overseas.

EU Regulators Eyes Microsoft Complaints (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- EU antitrust officials are again analyzing complaints that software giant Microsoft Corp. broke European rules, European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said Tuesday.

Todd refused to say who made the complaints, what they were and whether they contained new information.

"We are currently in the throes of analyzing these informal complaints. And a decision as to whether or not we will open up a new case against Microsoft _ any such decision will only be taken once we have completed our scrutiny of the information we have received," he told reporters.

He said the EU head office did not need to wait for complaints to take action against any company it suspected of breaking EU law.

The EU executive Commission is currently waiting for a court date to defend its March 2004 antitrust ruling against Microsoft. In that case, the company is challenging a $620 million fine and a ruling that it abusively wielded its Windows software domination to lock competitors out of the market.

Microsoft was also ordered to sell a version of its Windows software without its Media Player and required to share technology with competitors that make server software so their products can better communicate with Windows computers.

Microsoft Could Face Fresh European Antitrust Charges (MRKTWTCH)

By Michael Paige, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, September 21, 2005

LOS ANGELES (MarketWatch) - Microsoft Corp. could face new charges by European antitrust regulators that its business practices are anticompetitive as officials weigh fresh complaints the world's largest software company violated European rules, reports said Tuesday.

Since taking office last year, Neelie Kroes, the European competition commissioner, said she has received informal complaints focusing on Microsoft's (MSFT: news) bundling of its existing software programs and upcoming applications, according to an interview published by the New York Times.

"We have had informal complaints and we are using our time now to look at them," she said. "We're not going to wait and do nothing."

Kroes refused to provide further details on the complaints, the paper said. Microsoft, the world's largest software company, responded by saying it was keeping regulators apprised of its new products, according to the report.

European regulators early last year found that Redmond, Wash., Microsoft abused its dominant position with its Windows software to unfairly shut competitors out of the market. The company was ordered to pay a landmark fine and make sweeping changes to its business practices.

Microsoft and regulators are awaiting a court date for the company's challenge of the fine and ruling. See earlier related story.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the European Commission said there are no imminent plans to open a new antitrust investigation into Microsoft, Dow Jones Newswires reported from Brussels.

A spokesman for the regulatory body was quoted by the Associated Press as saying, "We are currently in the throes of analyzing these informal complaints. And a decision as to whether or not we will open up a new case against Microsoft -- any such decision will only be taken once we have completed our scrutiny of the information we have received."

In March of last year, Microsoft was fined a record 497 million euros, or over $600 million, and ordered by the regulators to change the way it does business.

Under the ruling, Microsoft was ordered to divulge some of its trade secrets for server software to competitors. It was also ordered to offer to consumers a version of its ubiquitous Windows operating system stripped of its Media Player software.

In Tuesday trading, Microsoft's stock eased 16 cents, or 0.6%, to close at $25.84. Shares have ranged from $23.82 to $30.20 over the last 52 weeks.

Dow Jones, September 21, 2005

LOS ANGELES (Dow Jones) - Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) could face new charges by European antitrust regulators that its business practices are anticompetitive as officials weigh fresh complaints the world's largest software company violated European rules, reports said Tuesday.

Since taking office last year, Neelie Kroes, the European competition commissioner, said she has received informal complaints focusing on Microsoft's (MSFT)(MSFT) bundling of its existing software programs and upcoming applications, according to an interview published by the New York Times.

"We have had informal complaints and we are using our time now to look at them," she said. "We're not going to wait and do nothing."

Kroes refused to provide further details on the complaints, the paper said. Microsoft (MSFT), the world's largest software company, responded by saying it was keeping regulators apprised of its new products, according to the report.

European regulators early last year found that Redmond, Wash., Microsoft (MSFT)abused its dominant position with its Windows software to unfairly shut competitors out of the market. The company was ordered to pay a landmark fine and make sweeping changes to its business practices.

Microsoft (MSFT) and regulators are awaiting a court date for the company's challenge of the fine and ruling.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the European Commission said there are no imminent plans to open a new antitrust investigation into Microsoft (MSFT), Dow Jones Newswires reported from Brussels.

A spokesman for the regulatory body was quoted by the Associated Press as saying, "We are currently in the throes of analyzing these informal complaints. And a decision as to whether or not we will open up a new case against Microsoft (MSFT)--any such decision will only be taken once we have completed our scrutiny of the information we have received."

In March of last year, Microsoft (MSFT) was fined a record 497 million euros, or over $600 million, and ordered by the regulators to change the way it does business.

Under the ruling, Microsoft (MSFT) was ordered to divulge some of its trade secrets for server software to competitors. It was also ordered to offer to consumers a version of its ubiquitous Windows operating system stripped of its Media Player software.

In Tuesday trading, Microsoft's (MSFT) stock gained 12 cents, or 0.5%, to $26.12. Shares have ranged from $23.82 to $30.20 over the last 52 weeks.

Mergers May Vex Regulators (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, September 21, 2005

As federal regulators weigh what, if any, conditions to impose on two mammoth phone company mergers, they face a vexing Rubik's cube of possibilities.

Any requirements they attach to SBC Communications' acquisition of AT&T and Verizon's purchase of MCI could force some customers to do business with a telecom company they didn't choose.

The Justice Department is largely focused on the effects of the megadeals on corporate customers, say people with direct knowledge of the situation. In exchange for the deals' approval, they say, Justice is considering forcing the combined company to shed up to several thousand lines that serve big business. The rub: Most corporate customers are under contract and will likely balk at switching providers.

Both Justice and the Federal Communications Commission could approve both deals by next month, though Justice is further along in its review than the FCC, say the people who are involved. These people asked to remain anonymous because the talks with Justice are sensitive and confidential. Justice and the FCC declined to comment.

The mergers would marry SBC and Verizon, the two biggest regional Bells, with AT&T and MCI, the top two long-distance carriers.

The FCC could impose conditions aimed at preserving consumer choice. Until recently, AT&T and MCI each have competed head-on with SBC and Verizon for consumers' home-phone service. Regulators are less concerned about that segment because the long-distance companies stopped marketing residential service after adverse regulatory rulings last year.

Still, to promote competition, the FCC could require SBC and Verizon to offer consumers DSL broadband service without also requiring them to use the Bells' local voice service. That would allow consumers to replace the Bells' voice service with an Internet-based phone service, such as Vonage, that could travel over the DSL line.

With the FCC split evenly between Republicans and Democrats until a third Republican is appointed, the Democrats could push for such a condition.

In the business market, AT&T and MCI are leaders in linking the nationwide offices of big businesses with voice and data services. Typically, however, they must lease the local fiber-optic lines of the Bells, then resell them to businesses along with other services.

But in recent years, AT&T, MCI and other Bell rivals have built their own fiber lines to customers, undercutting the Bells' prices by 15% to 35%, says Brian Moir, a lawyer for large business customers. While AT&T and MCI control less than 5% of all business lines in the USA, they serve many of the largest business customers in the biggest cities.

They also wholesale, at sharp discounts, both their lines and those they lease from the Bells to smaller phone companies, which in turn, sell them to small and midsize businesses. All told, AT&T and MCI each serve about 2,000 buildings in SBC's and Verizon's regions, respectively, with their own fiber-optic lines. Both the large businesses and smaller phone companies worry they will lose those discounts once AT&T and MCI are swallowed by the Bells.

To prevent that, Justice could force SBC and Verizon to sell the lines, but not customers, of AT&T and MCI. Reason: Supplying data services to businesses is highly specialized and customers with nationwide contracts would resist being tossed to a new provider in one region. “They're not going to want their contracts torn up by government fiat,” says Legg Mason analyst David Kaut.

At the same time, several phone companies say they would have little interest in buying the wires if there is no customer revenue to offset the purchase price. As a result, Level 3 Communications has proposed that Justice allow it or other phone providers to buy the lines, and force AT&T and MCI to lease them back. As units of SBC and Verizon, they would still use the lines to serve their existing customers. The buyers eventually would develop their own customer bases.

Moir says business customers would still bristle at a new phone company controlling the lines.

Yet in a report, Legg Mason says it expects Justice to require just that — a divestiture with a lease-back mandate. To ensure that the Bells don't scrap discount prices, the FCC also could regulate their prices, Legg Mason says.

The Bells argue no divestitures or conditions are needed. They say many of the buildings served by AT&T and MCI are also served, or easily could be, by others.

Authors Slap Google With Copyright Suit (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

A group of authors Tuesday filed suit against Google Inc., accusing the search engine company of copyright infringement under its controversial program to scan millions of books in university and public libraries and to make the texts searchable on the Web.

The Authors Guild, a New York non-profit with over 8,000 members who are published authors, alleged in its complaint that Google's plan to create digital copies of books represented "massive copyright infringement." Authors Herbert Mitgang, Betty Miles, and former U.S. Poet Laureate Daniel Hoffman, are co-plaintiffs in the suit. The plaintiffs have requested the suit be granted class action status. The complaint was filed in U.S. District Court in New York.

In a statement, Google said that its respects copyright and added that it "regrets" the course of action the Authors Guild has chosen. "Google Print directly benefits authors and publishers by increasing awareness of and sales of the books in the program," the company said. "Only small portions of the books are shown [to consumers conducting searches] unless the content owner gives permission to show more," it added, saying that authors and publishers can request their books not be scanned at all.

The complaint is the latest reminder of how Google's attempts to search information beyond simple Web pages -- such as books, television programs and scholarly works -- are proving to be more controversial and time-consuming for the company than the Web searches that have driven its growth to date. Since late last year, Google has been slapped with separate suits, including from a news agency and an adult-entertainment company, alleging copyright infringement in areas such as news reports and images it displays on the Web.

The Mountain View, Calif. company has already faced some backlash from publisher groups since announcing its book-scanning program last December. In a May letter, the Association of American University Presses, a trade group of 125 publishers, warned Google that its plan to digitize millions of books in libraries represented "a fundamental, broad-sweeping violation of the Copyright Act." Individual publishers, including Bertelsmann AG's Random House Inc. unit, and other publisher associations have also contacted Google expressing their concern. Some European officials also oppose the scanning project, arguing it would help English-language sources and an American view of history to dominate the Web.

Google last month suspended its scanning of copyrighted books in libraries until November, saying the delay would give publishers time to specify which books they don't want Google to scan. Google had initially said it planned to scan the entire library of the University of Michigan, which includes seven million volumes, along with books from the libraries of Stanford University, the University of Oxford, and Harvard University and the New York Public Library.

Authors Guild Executive Director Paul Aiken said that Google's move to allow publishers to request their works not be scanned was insufficient. "Opting out is not the way copyright works," said Mr. Aiken.

The complaint alleges Google's scanning of copyrighted works in itself represents a copyright infringement, and that Google's inclusion of any works in its commercial services represents additional infringement. Mr. Aiken said that book publishers typically don't have the contractual right to grant Google permission to use published books in its book search service without the authors' agreement. The complaint requested unspecified damages and an injunction barring Google from further alleged copyright infringement under the program.

Nymex Board Votes To Sell 10% Stake To General Atlantic (WSJ/DJN)

By Leah McGrath Goodman, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

The board of the New York Mercantile Exchange voted in favor of selling a 10% stake to private-equity firm General Atlantic LLC at a meeting last night, according to a person close to Nymex.

The deal, which remains subject to a seatholder vote, values the exchange at $1.35 billion and seeks to help the nation's biggest energy and metals market go public, the person said.

By voting for a deal with General Atlantic, the Nymex board closed the door on a joint bid by private-equity firms Blackstone Group and Battery Ventures VI LLP that valued the exchange at $1.3 billion, people close to Nymex said.

The board also rejected an eleventh-hour bid by Michel Marks, a former Nymex chairman, who teamed up with private-equity firm Hellman & Friedman LLC seeking a Nymex stake that valued total exchange equity at $1.4 billion, several people close to Nymex said.

Nymex plans to recommend the proposed deal with General Atlantic to seatholders at a meeting Sept. 29, where it plans to discuss the exchange's strategic options. Seatholders will vote on the deal at a later date, according to Nymex spokeswoman Anu Ahluwalia.

While minority stake bids from private-equity firms initially targeted the purchase of a 20% equity stake in the exchange, people close to Nymex said board members wary of giving up control reduced the size of the stake for sale.

Under the terms of the General Atlantic offer, the firm would buy a 10% stake in Nymex representing preferred equity that would allow it to seize control of the exchange if it fails to achieve certain revenue and net capital milestones, people close to Nymex said. General Atlantic, Greenwich, Conn., is the largest shareholder of Chicago's Archipelago Holdings Inc., an electronic-trading firm that has made clear its interest in derivatives and is slated to merge with the New York Stock Exchange.

The proposal also seeks to reduce the exchange's 25-member board, with one-third of the remaining directors to be handpicked by General Atlantic, people close to Nymex said. The other board members -- either representatives of Nymex seatholders or public directors -- likely would be approved by a Nymex member vote, they said.

The deal includes provisions that let General Atlantic liquidate its minority stake if Nymex backs out of an IPO, said one of the people close to Nymex.

Qwest To Try To Sway FCC Review Of SBC-AT& T Merger (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Qwest Communications International Inc. yesterday raised questions about the pending merger of two major rivals, accusing SBC Communications Inc. of anti-competitive practices as the government considers SBC's purchase of AT&T Corp.

Denver-based Qwest said SBC was making it harder for competitors to serve lucrative medium to large companies and was limiting the ability of rivals to lease SBC lines at cheaper government-regulated rates. It also said SBC appeared to be pressuring smaller phone companies not to merge with unspecified "blacklisted" rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0007207

San Antonio-based SBC dismissed Qwest's claims and said it expected the Federal Communications Commission and Justice Department to approve its $16 billion acquisition of AT&T.

Qwest is trying to influence the FCC as the agency weighs both the SBC-AT&T merger and Verizon Communications Inc.'s planned $8.46 billion purchase of MCI Inc.

Qwest was rebuffed in its own effort to buy Ashburn-based MCI this year, and the two mergers leave Qwest -- the fourth-largest U.S. telephone company -- at a competitive disadvantage to the remaining regional telephone giants.

"SBC already is using its increased market power arising from its acquisition of AT&T to create new barriers to the development of competition," Qwest said in a letter it said it would send today to the FCC. The company provided a copy of the letter to The Washington Post.

"These actions underscore why the merger should be conditioned on full divestiture of overlapping AT&T operations and related restrictions on terms and conditions under which SBC provides special access," the letter added.

Special-access customers are usually medium to large companies that, because they buy large amounts of voice and data service, are provided dedicated lines to connect directly to long-distance networks. Long-distance companies typically pay the local telephone company special-access fees for these dedicated lines.

"We are confident that the FCC and the DOJ, after an exhaustive and careful review of the facts, will determine that the merger of SBC and AT&T will benefit consumers -- and many customers have gone on record in support of the merger for this reason," said an SBC spokesman.

"This filing is a sad, desperate act by one of our competitors who is afraid of having a vigorous competitor in their own back yard," he added.

In its letter, Qwest said SBC was capping the number of circuits it would transfer to competitors in a given year, limiting Qwest's ability to serve special-access customers.

It did not disclose the cap but said it was below what SBC transferred for Qwest in the first half of 2005.

Senator Proposes Property Rights Ombudsman (REU-Y2)

By David Lawder

Reuters, September 21, 2005

A senior Senate Republican proposed creating a federal official for arbitration in eminent domain cases on Tuesday as witnesses urged lawmakers to restrict the taking of private property for development.

Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record) announced the bill to create such an ombudsman during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on a separate measure to withhold federal funding from private development projects that rely on government appropriation to obtain property.

"What is happening to me should not happen to anyone else," said Susette Kelo, namesake plaintiff in the landmark Kelo v. New London case the U.S. Supreme Court decided in June.

"Congress and state legislatures need to send a message to local governments that this kind of abuse of power will not be funded or tolerated," she told the hearing.

The court ruled 5-4 that New London, Connecticut, could take Kelo's waterfront home and 14 other properties to make way for a hotel and condominium project, saying economic development and creation of jobs were sanctioned as public use of land under the U.S. Constitution's Fifth Amendment.

The decision enraged property rights advocates and conservatives in Congress, who say it gave local governments the right to give any home in the United States to a wealthy developer, as long as he says he will upgrade the property.

Such projects often involve federal Community Development Block Grants and are backed by tax-exempt bond financing. The project in the Kelo case received a $2 million subsidy.

Under Hatch's bill, an independent property rights ombudsman would have the power to order arbitration to resolve eminent domain disputes. The bill is based on a property ombudsman successfully established in Utah.

Cornyn said his fellow Republican Hatch's idea was "intriguing" and worth considering as the bill progresses.

Cornyn said he has 28 co-sponsors for the legislation, but acknowledged that only two so far are Democrats.

The House of Representatives passed a similar measure as an amendment to a spending bill, but the 231-189 vote was split largely along party lines, with many Democrats opposing it.

DOJ_NMG_0007208

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's Washington bureau director Hilary Shelton spoke in favor of the legislation, saying eminent domain-driven urban renewal projects too often displace blacks and other minorities with too little compensation.

But Hartford, Connecticut, Mayor Eddie Perez said the Kelo decision did nothing more than confirm the status quo of cities to use eminent domain judiciously as a tool to create jobs and benefit residents.

Senators, Property Owners Review Kelo (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Private-property owners and government officials squared off yesterday in a Senate hearing over what makes up the American dream.

Mayor Eddie A. Perez of Hartford, Conn., said the American dream means letting city governments seize property under newly expanded eminent-domain powers so they can give it to private developers who promise to generate greater tax revenue with it.

Susette Kelo -- whose restored pink home in New London, Conn., faces such a seizure -- said the American dream means owning a home without fear that the government will take it to give to the highest bidder.

In June, the Supreme Court ruled in favor of government use of eminent-domain powers to take property and give it to private developers. The 5-4 Kelo v. City of New London decision stunned lawmakers on both sides of the aisle, many of whom noted it as another reason to push the court in a more conservative direction.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has introduced a bill that would prohibit federal funds from being used in cases in which the expanded authority is used. Ms. Kelo applauded that bill.

"What we have now at the local, state and federal level amounts to government by the highest bidder," she said. "That has got to stop."

Though criticism of the Kelo decision has come from both conservatives suspicious of big government and liberals who fear the impact on the poor and minorities, only one Democrat -- Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont -- showed up for part of yesterday's hearing. Most Republicans on the panel attended.

At the start of the hearing, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, said that he'd just come from a meeting at the Supreme Court attended by the author of the decision, Justice John Paul Stevens.

"I told Justice Stevens that we were having this Kelo hearing and if he has some spare time later this morning, to come on over. We'd be glad to hear from him," Mr. Specter said. "He didn't think that was very funny, but all the other judges laughed."

Mr. Perez, speaking on behalf of the National League of Cities, said: "Eminent domain is a powerful economic-development tool that helps cities create jobs, grow businesses, and, most importantly, strengthen neighborhoods."

And despite the near-universal outrage from minority groups, the Hartford mayor said eminent domain is good for blacks.

"For urban America and communities of color, in particular, homeownership is the ticket to the American dream," Mr. Perez said. "If Congress were to pass legislation to hamstring state and local governments from using eminent domain in some of our poorest communities, I believe that we would have fewer people becoming homeowners."

And property-rights advocates have nothing to worry about, he said.

"From [an] owner's position, it seems to me that eminent domain ... is, in a way, the most attractive way in which to have your property rearranged," he said, noting that the owner is compensated.

Ms. Kelo said she just wants to keep her house and be left alone.

"None of us asked for any of this," she said. "We were simply living our lives, working, taking care of our families and paying our taxes."

U.S. To Inspect Small Leak From Fuel Pool At Indian Point (NYT)

By By Lisa W. Foderaro

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission announced yesterday that it was inspecting a small radioactive leak from a spent-fuel pool at the Indian Point nuclear power plant in northern Westchester County.

The federal agency said the leak, which was discovered earlier this month during excavation work, was minimal and "does not pose any immediate health or safety concern" for the public or the plant's workers.

But the commission said it would initiate a special inspection to review plans to fix the leak by the company that owns the plant, Entergy Nuclear Northeast. The inspection will also assess the potential environmental impact from the leakage.

DOJ_NMG_0007209

Still, elected officials expressed anger that they were notified only yesterday about the leak from one of three spent-fuel pools on the site. C. Scott Vanderhoef, the Rockland County executive, said the leak also raised questions about Entergy's monitoring of the other pools on the site. "The degree of confidence is certainly not improved," he said.

Mr. Vanderhoef also said that emergency officials from Rockland, Westchester and Orange Counties decided yesterday to ask Entergy to conduct another test of its siren system, following the failures and glitches that marked a test last Wednesday. Among other things, a backup activation system that relies on radio signals failed in Rockland County.

Andrew J. Spano, the Westchester County executive, said in a statement yesterday that it was "absolutely unbelievable that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and Entergy would keep us in the dark about a radioactive leak" in the pools.

A spokesman for Entergy, Jim Steets, said that the company would have notified county officials immediately had there been any potential for a threat to public safety.

In a statement, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission said the leak was found during excavation work being done in conjunction with a project to store spent fuel rods without immersing them in a pool. It said that workers had identified several hairline cracks on concrete walls surrounding the pool for Indian Point 2, one of the plant's two active reactors. "Slight seepage was collected," the statement said. "It is not yet clear whether the seepage is from a current or prior leak."

Entergy said that the leak may have stemmed from a leak in the pool that was repaired in 1992. Engineers and chemists reported that trace amounts of radioactive cesium and cobalt were present in samples taken from the wall; both are present in the spent-fuel pool. Soil samples three feet from the wall showed normal background levels of radiation, according to the company.

Interior Dept. Defends Its Keeping Of Indian Books (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

The Interior Department says its audits of accounts it manages for thousands of Native Americans have found few errors and little evidence that anyone tampered with the records.

The agency's position, in a report sent to Congress on Monday, runs contrary to that of Native Americans who filed a 1996 class-action lawsuit saying that they were cheated out of more than $100 billion because of mismanagement of oil, gas, grazing, timber and other royalties from their lands.

A federal judge has ordered that Interior Department officials account for every dollar received and paid to Native Americans since 1887.

In a glossy 24-page brochure, the department says the audit the judge ordered would cost $12 billion and efforts so far have found that errors make up less than 1 percent of the dollars reconciled. "This picture is significantly different from that offered by Interior's critics," Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton states in a letter opening the brochure.

Lawyers for the plaintiffs immediately criticized the report. The plaintiffs have argued the department is using inaccurate and, in some cases, incomplete data.

Gossip Meets The G-men In Vast FBI Files (TLPA)

By Randy Herschaft And Larry Mcshane

Times Leader (NE PA), September 21, 2005

NEW YORK - The Beach Boys. Frank Sinatra. Liberace. Sonically, the trio shared little - from the California group's soaring harmonies to Sinatra's saloon singing to Liberace's marshmallow soft vocals. But their offstage antics were music to the ears of the FBI, where all three became the subject of muckraking files in the agency's Washington headquarters.

The portfolios contain innuendo and allegations, with the occasional revelation thrown in. The Beach Boys' penchant for psychedelic drugs and Sinatra's alleged sex parties with President John F. Kennedy are old news.

But who knew of Liberace's reputed fondness for gambling? The file on Wladziu Valentino Liberace reports that the rhinestone-worshipping Las Vegas entertainer was betting with a bookie in blue-collar Buffalo for years.

Celebrities and criminals, rock stars and mob stars, athletes and artists - scores of high-profile Americans have their very own FBI file, a bold-faced universe rife with dirt and scandal. It's no surprise that gossip columnists such as Walter Winchell turn up as sources.

DOJ_NMG_0007210

The files chronicle mass marketer Walt Disney and mass murderer Ted Bundy, comic genius Groucho Marx and cosmic genius Albert Einstein. There are reports of canoodling (although the FBI prefers "extramarital affairs"), heavy boozing, mob ties, drug use and the rest of the requisite dish.

The sheer volume became clear in response to a Freedom Of Information Act request by The Associated Press for every FBI "High Visibility Memorandum" filed between 1974 and 2005, allowing a lengthy traipse through the lives of celebrities from A (Louis Armstrong) to Kaye (Danny) to Z (Efrem Zimbalist). The AP's request produced more than 500 redacted memos totaling nearly 1,500 pages - a stack of documents six inches high.

Tucked inside the pile of paperwork were FBI memos on spouses/stars Desi Arnaz and Lucille Ball; football stars Dexter Manley and Walter Payton; Mayors Marion Barry and Frank Rizzo; mobsters Carlo Gambino and Mickey Cohen.

The memos even contain information never made public. The February 2001 paperwork on film director Otto Preminger's file mentioned "all of the information on Preminger's desire to be a source for the FBI is being withheld."

Until now.

In the FBI's files, Andy Warhol's 15 minutes of fame never expire. Instead, as his memo noted, the 38 pages about the artist's film company and a 1968-69 investigation are there for eternity.

Jimmy Hoffa's daughter asked for the files regarding her long-missing dad - 69 volumes of documents and memorandums. James Earl Ray, the assassin who killed Martin Luther King Jr., filed more than 50 FOIA requests from 1977 to '95 on a variety of subjects - including one seeking records about the FBI's electronic surveillance of King's widow.

The FBI also kept a file on "The FBI" - the long-running television show starring Zimbalist as Inspector Lewis Erskine. The real FBI, according to memos, had casting control over its video incarnation: both Bette Davis and Robert Blake were banned from appearing.

Davis was bumped as an alleged communist sympathizer. Blake, recently acquitted of killing his wife, was brushed off after expressing his opinion that "killers aren't at fault, society is," according to a memo.

Sinatra's file generated national headlines upon its 1998 release, as much for its lack of headline-making material as for anything it contained. But tons of other material is out there, some of it barely noticed in the vast verbal ocean of Web sites, books, newspapers and other publications.

The presence of a file or a memo doesn't necessarily mean the subject was targeted for an investigation.

"Celebrity files can be tricky to understand," said FBI historian John Fox. "They can be collections of information gathered from other files. ... Louis Armstrong is a good example of that. It would be incorrect to say the FBI investigated him."

The FBI won't divulge its exact number of files, but estimates are that it could total more than 6 million. The agency has long maintained that its era of surveillance for political purposes is over, reflecting changes that followed FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover's death in 1972 - but there remain plenty of nuggets tucked away on FBI letterhead:

_ Actor Victor Mature once contacted the FBI about a stalker, but was "probably intoxicated" when agents met with him about the problem. "I know Mature," wrote FBI Deputy Director Clyde Tolson. "He is a little nuts."

_ Former Ohio State football coach Woody Hayes once recruited the son of an agent in the Cleveland office to play for the Buckeyes, prompting a letter to FBI headquarters. Hoover and Hayes were pals.

_ Comedian Jackie Gleason launched a 1956 attempt to track down his alcoholic father, who had disappeared when "The Great One" was a child. The FBI aided by checking its fingerprint files.

The high visibility memorandums are generated for a number of reasons: the notoriety of the requester, whether it's a high-ranking government official (ex-President Gerald Ford) or a high-profile Hollywood type (Sinatra); if the request could reveal improper FBI activities; and if the request comes from a story-seeking journalist.

While it might seem the last group would make the most requests, journalists lagged far behind in their filings, according to FBI records. Both prisoners and private citizens outpaced the requests from the news media.

While the subjects are alive, the FBI only releases public source information: news clippings and other items already available. The full files, for both celebrities and common citizens, are not made public until after death due to privacy issues.

One of the files' more entertaining aspects is the failure to distinguish between legitimate and slanderous sources. Gossip column clips sit side by side with anonymous letters like the one ripping Gleason and Hoover for hanging around with Sinatra, who - as his file showed - had once volunteered to work as an FBI undercover in 1950.

The memos abound with unsubstantiated stories of adultery, addiction and various other excesses. Not all the stories are as riveting - as the file for former U.S. Sen. Edmund Muskie indicated.

The memo mentioned that he was turned down for a job with the FBI, and chronicled an assassination threat against the one-time presidential candidate. And it mentioned one other incident: a 1965 charge of "hunting migratory waterfowl over a baited field."

The incident wound up costing Muskie $27.50 in forfeited bond money, the memo said.

Man Convicted Of Threatening Agent (PTR)

By Karen Roebuck, TRIBUNE-REVIEW
Pittsburgh Tribune Review, September 21, 2005

A South Hills man was convicted Tuesday of threatening to kill an FBI agent who was investigating him for fraud.

Regonaldo Demelio, 36, also known as Ronald Cooley, was in the Allegheny County Jail awaiting trial on two state assault charges Jan. 5 when he placed three telephone calls to his wife in which he threatened to "whack" FBI Special Agent Robert Zalno.

Demelio, a self-employed contractor, said he knew the agent would be listening to his phone calls and told his wife to "pipe down" so he could speak directly to the agent.

Demelio also threatened to file a lawsuit and complain to Zalno's supervisor, a review board and the American Civil Liberties Union that the agent was harassing his wife, Terri Demelio, by visiting her at work as part of the fraud investigation.

Demelio did not testify, but his attorney, Robert L. Downey Jr., argued that his defendant was a "hothead" and was threatening only to take civil action against Zalno.

After the jury's verdict was announced in U.S. District Court, Downtown, Downey complained that the federal law under which his client was convicted "is so vague. Almost anything could be a threat."

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Love told jurors Zalno should have taken the threats seriously because Demelio had assaulted three men -- smashing one of them in the face with a cinderblock -- and was taking psychiatric medication because of his violent past.

Terri Demelio, his wife of two years, previously had filed a protection-of-abuse order against him, saying her husband had pulled a knife on her, hit her in the face, threw a potted plant at her and threatened to kill her, Love argued.

Demelio, who was not charged in the fraud investigation, shook his head when the verdict was read, and his wife sobbed.

He could face up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced by U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab. A sentencing date has not been set.

Man Convicted Of Threatening FBI Agent (AP)

AP, September 21, 2005

PITTSBURGH (AP) — A man was convicted Tuesday of threatening an FBI agent in a call from jail last year, his lawyer said.

Federal prosecutors said Regonaldo Demelio, 36, of Pittsburgh, knew that his phone calls from the Allegheny County Jail were being recorded and that the federal agent, who was investigating Demelio and his wife, would be listening.

Demelio's lawyer, Robert Downey Jr., said Tuesday night that he was considering an appeal.

Advertisement

Downey said he had listened to the recordings of his client "ad nauseum" and believed that Demelio didn't really intend to hurt Special Agent Robert Zalno. He said his client was just frustrated and felt that agents were baiting him and harassing his wife in a bank and mortgage fraud investigation.

"That apparently is not how the jury perceived it, and that's the rub," Downey said.

No sentencing date was set for Demelio, who was convicted after a two-day trial of a charge of threatening a federal official.

When he spoke about the agent, Demelio had been jailed on an aggravated assault charge. No charges have resulted from the fraud investigation.

Drug Dealer Admits Scams To DEA In Hopes Of Leniency (PHDN)

By Jim Smith
Philadelphia Daily News, September 21, 2005

Admitted drug kingpin Benjamin Ton was facing life in prison for smuggling 11 tons of marijuana and over 300,000 ecstasy pills from Canada into Philadelphia and other areas.

So Ton, 34, a former copy machine repairman who lived in Folcroft, Delaware County, and later in a $300,000 home in Sicklerville, N.J., did the fashionable thing.

A naturalized U.S. citizen from Vietnam who has lived here since 1991, Ton began telling U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents all he knew about his operation, his underlings and drug customers, most of whom are Vietnamese refugees, in hopes of earning some leniency.

Ton yesterday pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia to engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise and other related drug trafficking and money laundering activities.

His public admissions of guilt came several hours after authorities announced that drug charges have been lodged against more than two dozen reputed members of Ton's old network, many of them his top customers.

"The Ton organization is shut down," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan told reporters at a press conference.

Ton and other members of his network had been secretly recorded on wiretaps for six months and followed by DEA agents during the course of a two-year investigation.

The Daily News reported last Nov. 11 that DEA agents had arrested Ton and five codefendants after seizing a shipment of some 55,000 ecstasy pills worth about $1 million on the black market.

Court-authorized wiretaps led to the arrests and seizures, Assistant U.S. Attorney David E. Fritchey said.

Ton has been in jail since his arrest.

Between December 2002 and Nov. 7, 2004, large quantities of drugs were smuggled out of Canada by truck or in secret compartments of cars and vans.

Ton "personally" negotiated prices, recruited workers, supervised drug deliveries, and approved places, including his Folcroft home, where drugs were stashed.

Ton paid his Canadian suppliers more than $25,000,000 for the drugs.

Prosecutors say ecstasy "is a particularly popular drug of abuse at rave clubs" that may cause damage to the central nervous system, including Parkinson's disease.

Bonds: Congress Should Drop Steroids Probe (MERCN)

By Howard Fendrich

The San Jose Mercury News, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - In the nation's capital on his first road trip of 2005, Barry Bonds questioned why Congress, the media and fans continue to talk about steroids.

"I think we have other issues in this country to worry about that are a lot more serious. I think you guys should direct your efforts into taking care of that," the San Francisco Giants slugger said Tuesday before facing the Washington Nationals. "Talk about the athletes that are helping Katrina. Ask yourselves how much money y'all personally donated and have helped."

Asked whether Congress was wasting time by looking into steroid use in sports, Bonds responded: "Pretty much, I think so. Yeah."

Several congressional committees have held hearings on drug testing in pro sports, and legislation has been proposed to standardize leagues' drug policies.

"You know what? There are still other issues that are more important," Bonds said. "Right now, people are losing lives, don't have homes, I think that's a little more serious. A lot more serious."

Told of Bonds' comments, Dave Marin, a spokesman for House Government Reform Committee chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., said: "Members of Congress, particularly Tom Davis, can walk and chew gum at the same time."

Congressional investigators from that committee are looking into whether Baltimore Orioles slugger Rafael Palmeiro lied under oath about steroid use and are interviewing other players who know Palmeiro.

Bonds has not been contacted.

"Raffy Palmeiro and I are good friends and we will stay continually good friends. Period. And I will always have respect for him as a person and a player, regardless," Bonds said.

Bonds, booed throughout Tuesday's game, hit his 706th homer in the fourth inning.

As the ball arched toward the stands, fans who moments earlier were booing rose to cheer. Bonds was booed when his name was announced during pregame introductions, booed when he stepped into the on-deck circle, and booed when he went out to play left field.

"I've been tarnished for being in baseball for years and years. There's nothing you guys can write or people can say that's going to fix that. It doesn't matter any more. I go out there and enjoy the game," he said.

It was Bonds' third homer of 2005, and it came in his 18th at-bat. Out all season after three knee operations, he returned to the Giants on Sept. 12.

U.N. Reports First Drop In Afghan Opium Cultivation Since Taliban (AP)

Associated Press

AP, September 21, 2005

MOSCOW - The United Nations has recorded the first notable decline in opium cultivation in Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban, but drug production remains high due to favorable weather, the head of the U.N. Drug Control Agency said Tuesday.

Antonio Maria Costa, who on Tuesday presented a new U.N. report on the drug situation in Afghanistan, called the decline "the best drug-related news" since the Taliban ouster in 2001.

He said that opium cultivation nonetheless had more than tripled in some Afghan provinces governed by warlords suspected of involvement in drug trade, and called for their removal.

"Corruption is the wild card, and we have got to remove it from the deck," he said.

Costa also called for greater NATO involvement in fighting drugs, noting that the northwestern Afghan provinces where opium cultivation has grown were places where NATO forces operate.

According to the U.N. report, Afghan opium cultivation dropped by 21 percent in 2005 compared to the previous year, but production dropped only slightly from 4,200 tons in 2004 to 4,100 tons.

Costa said Afghanistan remained the world's largest opium supplier, with 87 percent of the world market coming from Afghanistan. The opium economy makes up 52 percent of Afghanistan's gross domestic product, and 11 million drug addicts worldwide use Afghan heroin, he said.

One-third of the Afghan drug traffic reaches Western markets through the so-called northern route, via the ex-Soviet Central Asia and Russia, and another two-thirds arrives via Pakistan and Iran, he said.

Costa, who met reporters in Moscow alongside Viktor Cherkesov, the head of Russia's Federal Drug Control Service, said that the flow of Afghan heroin seriously aggravated the HIV/AIDS problem in Russia and Ukraine, where drugs are largely taken through injection.

Cherkesov said that in summer his agency recorded a sharp increase in the amount of illegal Afghan drugs coming into Russia.

Colombian Army Discovers Huge Cocaine Lab (NYNSDY/AP)

By Fernando Vergara, Associated Press Writer

New York Newsday, September 21, 2005

MARIPI, Colombia -- Colombian troops raided a sprawling clandestine drug laboratory run by a paramilitary group that was capable of producing 10 tons of cocaine a month, officials said Tuesday.

"This is the biggest cocaine processing factory we've found this year, it contained a large quantity of chemicals used to process the drugs," Gen. Gustavo Matamoros, commander of the army's 5th Division, told The Associated Press.

In a separate operation, the military announced Tuesday that it had seized six tons of marijuana allegedly belonging to the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, the country's main leftist rebel group.

The drugs were discovered Monday wrapped in hundreds of red packages in southwestern Cauca state and later shown to reporters at a military base in the nearby city of Cali.

Workers at the cocaine factory escaped and no arrests were made during the raid Monday in a remote area near the town of Maripi, 50 miles north of Bogota, Matamoros said.

The drug lab, built about four months ago, was concealed under a roof made of sugar cane stalks and plastic sheeting and had enough beds to sleep at least 35 workers.

Matamoros said the lab belonged to paramilitary faction, but did not provide details.

Outlawed paramilitary groups were created two decades ago as a vigilante force to attack leftist rebels that have been waging war on the Colombian government. Both the paramilitaries and leftist rebels use drug trafficking to finance their campaigns.

The paramilitary umbrella group, the United Self Defense Forces of Colombia, or AUC, is involved in a two-year-old peace process, but the organization remains active in illegal activities in various parts of the country.

AP, September 21, 2005

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) - The Oklahoma Tax Commission has asked for federal intervention as the state agency continues to grapple with tribal smoke shops allegedly skirting a new tobacco tax.

The Tax Commission has asked for help from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, according to records obtained through the state Open Records Act.

DOJ_NMG_0007214

In a letter dated Aug. 27, the Tax Commission claimed that it "has received reports that the lower-tax-rate smoke shops are selling contraband cigarettes to the higher-tax-rate smoke shops in massive quantities."

In the letter, the Tax Commission said it doesn't have jurisdiction on "trust land" but states that Oklahoma believes the federal authorities could "investigate instances of trafficking of contraband cigarettes on trust land."

The Tax Commission asked ATF for help in March and was denied, records show. The commission asked again in August but has not received a reply.

State Treasurer Scott Meacham said the cigarette tax problem already has cost the state $15 million, with the loss rising by nearly $2 million each succeeding month.

The new tobacco tax took effect Jan. 1.

Tax commissioners broke their silence Sept. 9 on the issue. Commissioner Jerry Johnson said everything is being done that is possible to detect offenders, and the commission is getting "fairly close" to figuring out what wholesalers and tribal shops are doing.

Investigations by the Tulsa World show that numerous smoke shops in the Tulsa area are selling cigarettes carrying 6 cent tax stamps, which are intended for smoke shops next to the state border.

Smoke shop operators allege they are purchasing cigarettes with the cheap stamps from their border stores and reselling them in the Tulsa area.

Tax Commission records reveal that wholesalers may be selling cigarettes to the border stores with the cheap stamps affixed but delivering those cigarettes to non-border stores in Tulsa and elsewhere.

"Our problem has arisen because some of the lowest-tax-rate smoke shops are selling cigarettes directly to the highest-tax-rate smoke shops in violation of their compacts," according to a March 18 memo from Tax Commission employee Kay Burkhalter.

"I have also received information that a wholesaler who sells to the tribal smoke shops is invoicing cigarettes to a lowest-tax-rate smoke shop but delivering those cigarettes to higher-tax-rate smoke shops."

Gov. Brad Henry said Sept. 9 that he is working closely with the Tax Commission to see that wholesalers are complying with the law.

"We can crack down, and we will; in fact, we are in the process of doing that."

Johnson confirmed that the Tax Commission is going back 2 1/2 years and auditing unnamed wholesalers' records to see whether there has been an upsurge in sales to some border stores, but the cigarettes are possibly being delivered to non-border stores.

The Tax Commission hopes to have results of its audit by early October, Johnson said.

Meanwhile, Cherokee Nation officials have asked for a 30-day extension to further discuss renegotiating their compact with the state. The extension would delay the beginning of formal arbitration proceedings, said Cherokee Nation spokesman Mike Miller.

Miller said the tribe has also reviewed tax and revenue records of Cherokee smoke shops. Miller said it is against tribal law for smoke shops to funnel cheaper cigarettes to Tulsa-area stores requiring the higher tax stamp.

No Cherokee stores have been accused of this practice.

WSOC-TV, ABC 9, Charlotte, NC, September 21, 2005

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- Federal agents raided a neighborhood store in north Charlotte and found about 90 guns and thousands of rounds of ammunition.

A little boy and several small children come in and out of L.K. Farrar's Self-Serve Market in north Charlotte several times a week.

Inside, it looks like any other little grocery store. But outside, some employees wear guns in plain view.

Neighbors said in their neighborhood, they need it for protection

"Man needs to carry a gun in a store because you don't know who is going to rob you," said one neighbor.

Just a few days ago, police and federal agents served a search warrant there -- seizing nearly 60 handguns and more than 30 shotguns and rifles and thousands of rounds of ammunition.

Kiki Gooden said she's been shopping there since she was a little girl.

"I ain't never seen no guns like that. I don't think they'll be showing stuff like that in there," she said.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms requested the warrant against the owner of the store, 52-year-old Lawrence Farrar.

He is a convicted felon who was arrested in May for possession of a firearm by a felon.

DOJ_NMG_0007215

An undercover ATF agent asked for the warrant after visiting the store and seeing Farrar wearing a chrome pistol on his side with a shotgun sitting in a nearby refrigerator.

"I saw all the police come in with their guns drawn and stuff. I didn't know what that was about," said a local resident Curly Wilson.

IMMIGRATION:

DHS Lets Go 'Other' Illegals (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

The Department of Homeland Security, facing a flood of illegal aliens from countries other than Mexico, has increased efforts to remove non-Mexican foreign nationals now being released back onto the streets of America because of a lack of detention space.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has ordered that expedited removal proceedings for non-Mexican foreign nationals caught illegally entering the United States be expanded from three to all nine U.S. Border Patrol sectors along the Southwest border.

Mexican nationals caught in the United States illegally are bused back within a few hours, but illegals known as "other than Mexican," or OTMs, must be flown to their home countries, a process that often takes months.

The new process is aimed at reducing the number of OTMs who have spent less than 14 days in the United States and who are apprehended within 100 miles of the border.

"The use of this authority will allow DHS the ability to gain greater control of our borders and to protect our country against the terrorist threat," Mr. Chertoff said.

Nearly 70 percent, or 68,000, of the more than 98,000 OTMs detained so far this year were released almost immediately because of the government's inability to return them to their home country and a lack of detention facilities to hold them while here, federal authorities said.

Federal law-enforcement authorities said thousands of foreign nationals, including a rising number of Brazilians facing high unemployment at home and having access to a growing number of sophisticated alien smuggling rings, are coming into the United States to seek work -- then surrendering to authorities after they cross the border because of this country's inability to detain or deport them.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar recently told a Senate subcommittee that agents in Texas alone are experiencing a near-threefold increase in the number of OTMs, and there is no place to put them.

"We interdict them, process them and then hand them off," Chief Aguilar said, noting that detention is the responsibility of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), and not his agency. He called the "exponential growth" in the number of OTMs and their subsequent release "a major source of clogging and friction for the removal process."

Chief Aguilar told the subcommittee that because of a lack of intelligence data, some OTMs released may have been criminals.

The OTMs detained are sent to detention centers, where they are released if they do not have a felony conviction or pose no national security threat. Given a "notice to appear" at a future immigration hearing, only about 13 percent ever show.

Since Sept. 30, nearly 25,000 Brazilian nationals have been detained at the border, mostly in Texas and Arizona. ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said the agency is working with Brazilian authorities to identify and disrupt alien smuggling operations, noting that last week, the two countries arrested 48 persons linked to a Brazil-based smuggling ring -- including corrupt Brazilian police and customs officers, and airline employees.

Levin Threatens To Block Homeland Nominee (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 21, 2005

A Democratic senator threatened Tuesday to block approval of a Homeland Security Department nominee until he receives a secret FBI memo about terror suspect interrogations that he's been seeking for months.

The threat against Julie L. Myers, tapped to head the department's bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, came amid lawmakers' concerns that she lacked the experience to head the federal government's second-largest investigative force.

DOJ_NMG_0007216

Asked if he planned to use legislative delaying tactics against Myers nomination, Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record), D-Mich., said: "Oh yeah. If we don't get the documents, sure."

At issue is a heavily edited May 2004 e-mail from FBI agents seeking guidance about questioning terror suspects held at Guantanamo Bay.

In February, Democratic senators began asking for an unedited version of the memo to see if it mentioned or involved Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who headed the Justice Department's criminal division from 2001 to 2003. The Justice Department denied the request, saying the memos contain "information covered by the Privacy Act," and had nothing to do with Chertoff.

Myers was Chertoff's chief of staff at the time, said Levin, who also delayed Chertoff's nomination in February for a week to protest being denied the names of people who sent and received the e-mail. Jim Pasco, executive director of the National Fraternal Order of Police, said Levin's tactic holds "the safety of the American public hostage to the pursuit of a political agenda."

The White House on Tuesday expressed support for Myers.

"Julie Myers is well-respected within the law enforcement community and highly qualified to lead the Immigration and Customs Enforcement," said White House spokeswoman Erin Healy. "We will work with the Senate to ensure her confirmation."

Questions by senators last week about whether Myers has enough experience for the ICE post came on the heels of former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown's resignation after widespread criticism that he had little previous emergency management experience. Myers is a former Treasury official and assistant U.S. attorney.

Bush To Press Congress For Guest-Worker Program, Tancredo Says (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, September 21, 2005

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush will push this year for legislation overhauling immigration laws, including creating a new guest-worker program, said U.S. Representative Tom Tancredo, chairman of the House Immigration Reform Caucus.

The Bush administration has met with Republican lawmakers to press the issue and will likely urge party leaders such as House Speaker Dennis Hastert to hold votes on immigration measures before the end of the congressional session, Tancredo said.

``Certainly there will be a tremendous amount of pressure to do something before Thanksgiving," Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who opposes Bush's guest-worker plan, said in an interview. ``The president wants it. They're not going to tell him no."

Bush has made an overhaul of immigration laws, including a new program to allow immigrants to temporarily work in the U.S., a priority for his second term. The legislative fight on the issue is likely to split Republicans, Tancredo said.

``It will be a terribly divisive thing in the party," he said. Tancredo said he opposes any guest-worker program that allows those in the U.S. illegally to stay and would delay any such program until the borders are deemed secure.

White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove met with House Republicans last week to reiterate the administration's desire to pass a comprehensive bill this year.

``It was very encouraging," Arizona Republican Jeff Flake, an attendee at the meeting, said in an interview. ``I don't think it's a sure thing. I think it's likely. And it's more likely than most people thought."

Comprehensive

Flake said the administration will push for comprehensive legislation that includes border security, workplace enforcement and a new guest-worker program. Tancredo said two measures introduced in the Senate creating a guest-worker program would face opposition in the House.

Legislation in the Senate backed by Massachusetts Democrat Ted Kennedy and Arizona Republican John McCain would let undocumented immigrants work legally in the country after paying a fine. A competing measure sponsored by Republicans John Cornyn of Texas and Jon Kyl of Arizona creates a guest-worker program that requires undocumented immigrants to return home before applying to work in the U.S. legally.

Proposals put forward by Rove last week closely tracked the Kennedy/McCain measure, said Flake, who has introduced the legislation in the House.

`Hell of a Battle'

``It's going to be one hell of a battle," Tancredo said.

It's ``possible" the measure backed by Cornyn and Kyl could garner support from a majority of Republicans in the House, while the McCain/Kennedy bill could not, he said.

The Kyl/Cornyn bill, he said ``certainly has a better chance than McCain. I think that one is DOA," for dead on arrival.

Flake said there is limited House support for Tancredo's immigration position.

``The Tancredo caucus, in terms of wanting the Tancredo approach, is pretty small," Flake said.

Tancredo also said the U.S. Congress should delay a prescription drug benefit for seniors enrolled in Medicare as a way to offset relief costs for Hurricane Katrina.

``That would save significant dollars," Tancredo said.

The benefit is scheduled to begin in January. He said lawmakers also should consider reducing farm subsidies and selling off federal land to offset costs for Katrina, which hit Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi on Aug. 29. Other lawmakers, including McCain, also have called for delaying or canceling the prescription drug benefit.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan indicated yesterday that the administration would oppose delaying the drug benefit.

``It's important to move forward, and we are" with the prescription drug plan, McClellan said at a news briefing.

Payments To IRS Lost In Accident: Check's In The Bay (WSJ)

By Joi Preciphs

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A highway accident caused some 30,000 quarterly estimated-tax payments to the Internal Revenue Service to be dumped into San Francisco Bay, but IRS officials say affected taxpayers will suffer no collateral damage.

A truck carrying about 45,000 forms and tax payments overturned on the San Mateo Bridge on Sept. 11. IRS officials said that the checks, due Sept. 15, were being transported from a post office to an IRS lockbox. No related information about the incident has been posted on the IRS's Web site, www.irs.gov.

IRS spokesman John Lipold said the agency will issue a formal statement once its investigation is complete. He said the agency will waive all interest and penalties for taxpayers who discover that their payments failed to arrive.

"We're going to work with people on good faith," Mr. Lipold said. However, the IRS is asking those who paid estimated taxes in the affected states to wait until Sept. 30 before contacting the agency on its national information line, 1-800-829-1040, to determine the status of their payments. By then, he said most of the checks that were retrieved by the agency will have cleared.

Payments from the following states were affected: Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Ohio, Oregon, Virginia, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Top Democrat Says He'll Vote No On Roberts (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said Tuesday that he would oppose the confirmation of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice, surprising both the White House and fellow Democrats still conflicted about how to vote.

In becoming the first Democrat to declare formally how he intended to vote, Mr. Reid may have made it more difficult for fellow Democrats to support Judge Roberts. Many Senate observers expected Mr. Reid, who comes from a Republican-leaning state and is opposed to abortion, to support Judge Roberts.

And the Democratic leader himself said Tuesday that he had earlier given the White House a list of nominees who would be objectionable and that Judge Roberts was not on it.

In announcing his decision in a lengthy speech on the Senate floor, Mr. Reid questioned Judge Roberts's commitment to civil rights and said he was "very swayed" by the civil rights and women's rights leaders who testified Thursday in opposition to the nomination - and with whom Mr. Reid met privately that same day. Liberal advocacy groups, who raise millions of dollars to support Democratic candidates and who have been putting intense pressure on Democrats to oppose the nomination, were elated.

With the White House considering how to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy, Mr. Reid could be using his vote on Judge Roberts to send a message to President Bush to fill that position with a moderate, in the mold of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a critical swing vote, who is retiring. Along with three other senior senators, Mr. Reid is expected to meet Mr. Bush for breakfast Wednesday to discuss the vacancy.

Explaining his decision on Judge Roberts, Mr. Reid said in his Senate speech that he simply had "too many unanswered questions" about the nominee, who he complained had refused to distance himself from seemingly callous writings while a lawyer for the Reagan administration, including a memorandum in which he used the term "illegal amigos" to refer to illegal immigrants.

"I'm not too sure," Mr. Reid later told reporters, "if his heart is as big as his head."

How much influence Mr. Reid will have over his fellow Democrats is unclear; he has said repeatedly that each senator is free to vote his conscience on the nomination, and several Democrats, including those on the Judiciary Committee, said Tuesday that they were still torn.

One centrist Democrat, Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, said Tuesday that he had "not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" confirmation of Judge Roberts to be the nation's 17th chief justice.

Last Thursday, as Mr. Reid was weighing his decision, representatives of about 40 advocacy groups met with him in the Capitol; the reason, they said, was to underscore the threat they believe Judge Roberts poses to Democrats' core causes, racial and gender equality. Hovering in the background was a political argument, that if Democrats vote in favor of Judge Roberts, they will be held liable by voters for the decisions he makes on the court.

"He got the message loud and clear, didn't he?" Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, said of Mr. Reid on Tuesday.

One of the most memorable presentations, those in attendance said, came from Theodore M. Shaw, general counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, who told Mr. Reid that his group rarely took a position on nominations.

"We appear before the Supreme Court - who in their right mind would want to poke their finger in the eye of the next chief justice?" Mr. Shaw recalled saying. But, he added, "Based on what we know, this is not a nominee that we can let go by unopposed."

Those who attended the meeting said they came away not knowing what Mr. Reid would decide.

"He listened carefully, he listened thoughtfully," said Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Council on Civil Rights and an organizer of the session. "He did not respond to challenges or views that were presented. I do think he felt this should be a vote of conscience and I think in the end he voted his conscience, and I think at the end of the day that speaks volumes about his leadership."

Mr. Reid and his Republican counterpart, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, have been invited to meet with President Bush on Wednesday morning to discuss the second vacancy. The Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, and the committee's senior Democrat, Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, have also been invited.

With a vote in committee scheduled for Thursday, the eight Democrats on the judiciary panel met Tuesday to discuss the nomination. They emerged tight-lipped, saying they wanted to speak to the entire Democratic caucus before announcing their votes. Several, including Mr. Leahy, said they had not yet reached a decision.

"I'm close," Mr. Leahy said. Asked if he would know by the end of the day, he said, "I may. You won't."

By day's end, only one of the panel's eight Democratic members, Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, had announced his position. As expected, he will vote no.

"This is really a leap of faith, isn't it?" Mr. Kennedy told reporters. "I mean, I think there are those that took the leap in terms of the war, there were those that took the leap in terms of taxes and now they're being invited to take the leap again in terms of Judge Roberts, and" - here, Mr. Kennedy paused for effect - "I don't think I'm going to be among them."

The White House reacted coolly to Mr. Reid's announcement. A spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said it departed from Senate tradition in which members have "based their decisions on the qualifications of the nominee, not on whether or not the person doing the nominating was in their same party."

Mr. Reid said there was no single reason he decided to vote against the nomination, and in his speech he described the decision as "a very close question." But he made plain that an important factor was the White House's refusal to release legal memorandums written by Judge Roberts when he was deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration. "The administration cannot treat the Senate with such disrespect without some consequences," he said.

The records issues is a matter of principle to many Democrats. Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado and a member of the so-called Gang of 14 who struck a bipartisan compromise to avoid a showdown over President Bush's judicial nominees, said Tuesday that he had recently called Harriet Miers, the White House counsel, to tell her that disclosing the documents could make the difference in his vote and that of his colleagues.

"I think it is the right of the American people to get that information," Mr. Salazar said. "She said she would consider my request. I don't think they are going to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0007219

While Mr. Reid said the records fight does not warrant a filibuster, the parliamentary tactic Democrats have used to block other judicial nominees, he suggested he might not be inclined to avoid that fight with the next nominee. He said he planned to present Mr. Bush with a list of acceptable candidates on Wednesday and said Democrats would consider it "a real poke in the eye with a sharp stick" if Mr. Bush were to name any one of 10 federal appeals court judges who had been blocked by filibuster in the past, including some who are on President Bush's short list as Supreme Court candidates.

Asked if that would warrant a filibuster, Mr. Reid said, "That would warrant my being real upset."

Reid 'No' Vote On Roberts Could Be Dem Green Light (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 21, 2005

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) declared yesterday that he will vote against chief-justice nominee John Roberts and pointedly warned President Bush about his next choice for the Supreme Court in anticipation of today's White House meeting to discuss it.

Reid had asked Senate Democrats to avoid openly discussing their position on Roberts until he came to a decision, which he announced on the Senate floor. He later called the decision to oppose Roberts "not easy, but not the most difficult" of his tenure in the Senate.

Reid's no vote could serve as a green light for swing votes in the caucus to oppose Roberts, although Reid repeatedly stressed that senators would vote their conscience.

Ralph Neas, head of the liberal People for the American Way, said, "On the merits, it's very important that there be significant opposition" to Roberts.

"If there is a significant number opposed, that could have an impact on who the president would nominate for the second vacancy," Neas said.

The minority leader is opposed to abortion rights, which agrees with Roberts's personal views on the issue, and many from the Hill to K Street had predicted Reid would eventually support Roberts.

"I'm not too sure if his heart is as big as his head," Reid said of Roberts, echoing recent statements from several Senate Judiciary Democrats during the three days of questioning. "In the years to come, the decades to come, my vision of what kind of judge he will be will be proven."

Asked to explain his comments about Roberts's heart, Reid mentioned the nominee's description of illegal immigrants as "illegal amigos" in a memo from 1983. Reid also concurred with the conclusion of many in Congress that Roberts will eventually be confirmed.

"There was never any doubt," he acknowledged.

Reid will meet with Bush today to discuss possible replacements for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee have also been invited to the White House consultation.

Reid also issued a stern warning to Bush about appointing any judge Democrats have opposed in the past.

"One thing I think would be a poke in the eye with a sharp stick" on the part of the president, Reid said, would be "to give us one of the 10 we've opposed before."

Reid was referring to the 10 appellate-court nominees previously filibustered by Democrats, two of whom — Judges Priscilla Owen and Janice Rogers Brown — have shown up on lists of potential nominees for O'Connor's seat.

Reid declined to tip his hand on any nominations he would suggest to the president. But when reporters asked whether he would deem Attorney General Alberto Gonzales unacceptable, Reid quietly answered no, then backpedaled and declined to answer.

"The president would be making a terrible mistake" in nominating Owen or Brown, Reid said, without saying outright whether it would presage a Democratic filibuster.

Reid referred to his desire for Senate Democrats to vote their conscience on Roberts, though he implied that there would be no such leeway should the president's second nominee be more controversial than the first. O'Connor's offer to continue serving on the court until her replacement is confirmed, Reid said, means the president can take his time consulting with senators from both parties before selecting the second nominee.

"[Bush] should understand, there is no vacancy on that court," Reid said. "This court could go on for next year or the year after as it's now constituted."

Moreover, Reid added, the Senate's already crowded calendar would be heavily burdened by the need to confirm a second nominee before the year's end. Leaders of both houses have already discussed keeping lawmakers in session until Thanksgiving or beyond to pass separate appropriations bills, budget reconciliation and more relief for hurricane victims.

DOJ_NMG_0007220

"The appropriations process has been a complete flop," Reid said. "I would think you'd want to get a little legislating done."

Before Roberts's confirmation hearing began Sept. 12, Democrats had called on the White House to release a block of memos Roberts wrote while serving as deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration. The White House withheld the memos because of concerns that disclosure would prevent an open exchange of views by future presidential advisers, a decision that Reid said left him "gravely disappointed."

Even before Reid's announcement, centrist Senate Democrats began to hint that they would vote to confirm.

"I can't imagine anything that would come about that would cause me not to vote for him," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), adding that he had spoken to the White House as recently as yesterday about the next nominee.

Still, other Democratic senators said they would not indicate publicly how they will vote until after the committee finishes its deliberations.

"Everybody's going to vote their conscience on this one," said Sen. Carl Levin (Mich.).

"People are very mindful that there will be a second nominee," he said.

Nelson is one of seven Democrats who signed the so-called "Gang of 14" agreement to filibuster a judicial nominee only under "extraordinary circumstances."

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), another Gang of 14 member, said senators were aware of the circumstances.

Reid said he felt no pressure from within the caucus to consider filibustering Roberts but recalled that Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean had called him to urge strong and public opposition.

Reid said he told Dean, "Governor, you've got to do what you think is right." As for liberal advocacy groups that have worked to foment resistance to Roberts, Reid said, many are "really hard to satisfy."

Democratic Leader Says He Will Vote Against Roberts (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Citing concerns that "his heart is not as big as his head," Minority Leader Harry Reid, the Senate's top Democrat, announced today that he would vote against John G. Roberts Jr., President Bush's choice to serve as the next chief justice of the United States.

Reid was the first Democrat to formally state his position on Roberts' nomination. But Reid, of Nevada, insisted that his decision should not be seen as a party position and other Democrats should vote as they see fit.

However, because Reid is a centrist Democrat who opposes abortion, his opposition was seen as a signal that many, and perhaps most Democrats, were likely to come out against the 50-year-old appeals court judge.

"No one disputes his academic prowess, his mental power. He's a very smart man," Reid told reporters, explaining his decision. "But through all this I came to the realization that I'm not too sure his heart is as big as his head."

Roberts faces two Senate votes — one by the Judiciary Committee on Thursday, and one on the floor of the Senate next week. With Republicans in the majority, Democrats have only one tool to stop a nomination, the filibuster, but they have indicated that they will not use it to halt this nomination.

Reid acknowledged that Roberts would be confirmed no matter how many Democrats voted against him.

"The question is close, and the arguments against him do not warrant extraordinary procedural tactics to block the nomination," Reid said on the floor of the Senate, referring to the filibuster. "Nonetheless, I intend to cast my vote against this nominee."

Reid was to meet Wednesday morning with Bush, with other Democratic and Republican leaders, to discuss the upcoming appointment to fill the second vacancy on the Supreme Court.

Some Democrats said the White House should see Reid's opposition as a message that Democrats would not capitulate if they considered the president's next pick for the court unacceptable.

"At the end of the day, the president should know if he sends someone who is an ideologue or somebody who is an extremist right winger, that person is going to have a very, very difficult time getting through the Senate," said Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), one of the seven Democrats who joined with seven Republicans this year to preserve the minority party's right to filibuster judicial nominees. "I think you'll find unity among the Democratic caucus in opposing someone like that."

The White House expressed disappointment with Reid's decision.

"In confirming recent nominees like [Ruth Bader] Ginsberg, [Stephen] Breyer and [Antonin] Scalia, senators based their decisions on the qualifications of the nominee, not on whether or not the person doing the nominating was in their same party," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "The public does not want to see the Supreme Court become an extension of partisan politics."

Senate Democratic Leader Opposes Roberts (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 21, 2005

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said on Tuesday John Roberts would be confirmed as chief justice of the United States but that he would oppose the conservative Supreme Court nominee because "I'm not too sure if his heart is as big as his head."

"I have too many unanswered questions about the nominee to justify a vote confirming him to this enormously important lifetime position," Reid said of President George W. Bush's first nomination to the high court.

"This is a very close question for me," Reid added. "But I must resolve my doubts in favor of the American people whose rights would be in jeopardy if John Roberts turns out to be the wrong person for the job."

Reid, however, said the case against Roberts did not warrant Democrats raising a procedural hurdle known as a filibuster to block Roberts' nomination when it comes up for a vote in the U.S. Senate next week. It seemed likely Reid would be unable to muster the needed 41 votes in the 100-member Senate to sustain it in any event.

Democrats and Republicans have predicted Roberts will win bipartisan confirmation and be sworn in before the high court begins its new term on October 3.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, responding to Reid's comments, said, "Judge Roberts is clearly qualified in terms of intellect, ethics and temperament. ... The public does not want to see the Supreme Court become an extension of partisan politics."

"He is going to be confirmed," Reid told reporters after his Senate speech. Reid said Roberts is a smart man, but "I'm not too sure if his heart is as big as his head."

Members of both parties have praised the credentials of Roberts, a federal appeals court judge the past two years who received the American Bar Association's top rating for a seat on the Supreme Court.

But major liberal groups, along with a number of Senate Democrats, have raised concerns about Roberts' commitment to civil rights and women's rights, based largely on memos he wrote two decades ago in the conservative Reagan administration.

Noting Roberts wrote to oppose legislative and judicial efforts to remedy race and gender discrimination, Reid said he was prepared to dismiss the writings as "the folly of youth" and expected Roberts to repudiate them "in some fashion."

"Instead, the nominee adopted what I consider a disingenuous strategy of suggesting that the views expressed in the memos were not his views, even at the time the memos were written," Reid said.

At Roberts' hearing last week, Democrats complained that Roberts refused to respond to many questions about specific legal issues, from abortion to right-to-die legislative efforts. Roberts said he did not want to prejudge cases that could come before him on the nation's highest court.

Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record), a North Dakota Democrat, has predicted that upwards of one-half of the 45-member Senate Democratic caucus would vote to confirm Roberts.

But other Senate Democrats said on Tuesday that caucus support for Roberts may shrink as a result of Reid's decision to oppose him. "I think we may get as many as 30 votes against him," a Democratic aide said.

If confirmed. Roberts would succeed the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist and be positioned to lead the federal judiciary for decades, shaping the American way of life on matters from voters rights to gay rights.

Reid was to meet at the White House with Bush on Wednesday about the president's pending Supreme Court nomination to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. A bigger fight is expected over this nominee since O'Connor was often the swing vote on the nine-member court.

Roberts Poses Calculus Test For Democrats (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Chief Justice nominee John Roberts is all but certain to be approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee Wednesday and the full Senate next week. But the vote involves a host of political calculations for Democrats struggling to satisfy their liberal base and reach out to moderate voters.

"I literally have not made up my mind. I really don't want to talk about it anymore," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Calif.) said Tuesday in the Capitol as she backed away from a crowd of reporters into an elevator.

For President Bush, whose approval rating has dropped in recent polls, the vote tallies also matter as he moves to fill a second vacancy on the Supreme Court. Many Democratic votes against Judge Roberts -- who is widely seen as conservative but has kept his political leanings to himself -- would suggest a tougher fight against a nominee with a clear stance against abortion rights. But that is just what the president's base is demanding.

Mr. Bush meets at the White House this morning with Senate leaders to discuss how to proceed in picking a successor for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Among the group will be Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who Tuesday took to the Senate floor to announce his opposition to Judge Roberts. "This is a very close question for me," Mr. Reid said in his speech. "But I must resolve my doubts in favor of the American people whose rights would be in jeopardy if John Roberts turns out to be the wrong person for the job."

Judge Roberts's intellectual strength is obvious, Mr. Reid said later, but the senator wasn't "too sure if his heart was as big as his head."

Yet earlier in the day, at the Senate Democrats' weekly caucus lunch, Mr. Reid made clear that his fellow partisans were free to follow their own consciences on the matter, a move that he said will likely lead to "plenty of votes" for the nominee, who is currently on the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. "You can only go to the well so many times," Mr. Reid told reporters. "This just wasn't one of the times I wanted to."

New York Sen. Charles Schumer has told colleagues that Judge Roberts overall acquitted himself well before the committee. But a yes vote could undermine Mr. Schumer's ability to raise money from anti-Roberts donors for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which he now heads. When asked Tuesday if he had made up his mind, Mr. Schumer answered, "Nope."

Similar battles are bedeviling Democrats not on the committee. Some moderates, such as Florida's Sen. Bill Nelson and Nebraska's Ben Nelson, face re-election next year in Republican-leaning states and are eager to pocket some centrist credentials by voting for Judge Roberts. Mr. Nelson of Nebraska said Tuesday he has "not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" the nominee. Another red-state Democrat, Max Baucus of Montana, said, "I'm inclined to vote for him."

By backing Judge Roberts, some Democrats argue, the party will have more credibility if it takes on the president's nominee for Justice O'Connor's seat, one that arguably is more important because she has played a critical role in rulings on issues such as affirmative action and abortion rights.

"It makes the case that they are mindless obstructionists much weaker," says Ross K. Baker, a professor of political science at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

But liberal activists are near unanimous in opposing Judge Roberts, who they say echoed the pre-appointment positioning of conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. They are pressing Democrats to vote against Judge Roberts to send a message about the party's priorities. Those arguments likely will weigh heavily on Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, who both have presidential ambitions and are trying to juggle the left-leaning voters in the party's primaries with general-election voters, who might favor a more centrist approach. "I have not" decided, Sen. Clinton said Tuesday.

Whatever the Democrats decide, they should do so based on their own political calculations, because it is unlikely to sway the White House's thinking, says David Gergen, a former adviser to four presidents. If they oppose Judge Roberts, the White House will conclude "there's no way to please them, so why even consider sending a moderate," Mr. Gergen said. If they vote for him, White House advisers could argue "those guys are patsies. We can roll over them."

The politics of the next high-court appointment are complicated by President Bush's decision to switch Judge Roberts's nomination from the O'Connor seat to that held by Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died of thyroid cancer earlier this month. Democrats had signaled that filling the Rehnquist seat with another conservative wouldn't spark a major fight, since it wouldn't tip the court's balance significantly. The O'Connor seat is another matter, and Democrats vow to give that nominee closer scrutiny, because that justice could represent a swing vote on the landmark abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade. That also is why social conservatives have stepped up their lobbying of the White House.

People familiar with the administration's efforts say the White House is scouring the federal-court benches for a female judge who could hold up under committee questioning. These people also say the administration is looking for a nominee whose record is conservative enough to appeal to the party base but not so sharp as to give ammunition to Democrats, who note that public polls show that most Americans don't want to see Roe v. Wade overturned.

White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card has been calling senators seeking recommendations. Mr. Reid said that at this morning's meeting, he will urge the president not to rush the next nomination, so that the Senate can work on other matters. He also warned that not all confirmations "are going to be easy like this one" -- referring to Judge Roberts -- and that he would consider it a "sharp poke in the eye" if the president sent up the name of a judge whose nomination had been the target of a Democratic filibuster.

That caution would rule out such candidates as Fifth Circuit Judge Priscilla Owen and D.C. Circuit Judge Janice Rogers Brown, who secured their court seats this spring after a bipartisan Senate compromise. Among the names circulating are Fourth Circuit Judge Karen Williams, Ninth Circuit Judge Consuelo M. Callahan and Fifth Circuit Judge Alice M. Batchelder.

Many Bush associates think the president is determined to pick his friend and loyal aide, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. But some conservatives would be cool to that choice, saying Mr. Gonzales isn't sufficiently opposed to affirmative action and abortion rights.

Scott Reed, who ran Republican Bob Dole's 1996 presidential bid, says Mr. Bush's weak position leaves him few options. "Bush has got to go right on this choice or his base will totally implode," Mr. Reed says.

Reid Will Oppose Roberts For Chief Justice (WP)

By Charles Babington And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

The Senate Democratic leader, pressed by several allies to build as much opposition as possible to Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr., said yesterday he will vote against President Bush's choice for chief justice. But Sen. Harry M. Reid of Nevada conceded that Roberts will be confirmed easily next week and "will get plenty of votes" from his fellow Democrats.

Reid's announcement, made in a closed party caucus luncheon and then a Senate speech, came as Democratic senators are struggling with the first chief justice confirmation in 19 years. Many party activists want them to show as much solidarity against Roberts as they can muster. Not only does Roberts's conservative philosophy deserve it, they argue, but it also would serve as a warning to Bush that Democrats will fight vigorously if Bush names someone even further to the right to succeed centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor this fall.

An opposing strategy, which Senate insiders described as less persuasive, argues that the party should show a willingness to accept Roberts while saving energy for an all-out battle in case Bush's next nominee is notably more conservative. Reid, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and two other senators will meet with the president today to begin discussing how to replace O'Connor.

Reid said he decided to oppose Roberts because the nominee withheld too much information from senators and because government memos he wrote in the 1980s raised troubling questions about his views, especially on civil rights.

"I was prepared to look past these memos, and chalk them up to the folly of youth," Reid said in his speech. But in last week's Judiciary Committee hearing, he said, Roberts adopted "what I consider a disingenuous strategy of suggesting that the views expressed in those memos were not his views. . . . We should only vote to confirm this nominee if we are absolutely positive that he is the right person" for a lifetime appointment on the nation's highest court.

Reid, an antiabortion lawmaker from a state that Bush carried in 2000 and 2004, said he made clear to colleagues that he was speaking as an individual, not as a minority leader trying to steer his caucus. "This is something people have to vote their conscience on," he told reporters.

Roberts's confirmation is a foregone conclusion in the Senate, where Republicans hold 55 of the 100 seats. The only question is how many Democrats will support him, and what political signal it will send. Party liberals hope no more than 15 Democrats, mostly from states Bush carried, will vote yes. That would result in a 70 to 30 confirmation vote. But Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) recently told reporters: "I think he can get from 75 to 80 votes."

Members of both parties said partisanship and interest-group politics have sharpened over the past decade to the point that a unanimous Supreme Court confirmation vote -- such as the one Justice Antonin Scalia received in 1986 -- is a thing of the past.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will vote tomorrow on recommending Roberts's confirmation, and most of the eight Democratic members appeared torn after meeting privately yesterday morning. The only member who has clearly signaled that he plans to oppose Roberts is Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

The committee's ranking Democrat, Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), said Sunday he had drafted a "for" speech and an "against" speech. Aides yesterday said it was unclear which he will deliver today on the Senate floor.

Some Democratic activists said the party risks alienating its contributors by not uniting against Roberts. "Many, many people in the donor base are feeling discouraged and want to see the Democrats fight back," said Ellen Malcolm, president of Emily's List. "If they see Democrats falling in line with Republicans, they're going to say, 'There's no need for me to support them.' "

Malcolm said prospective 2008 presidential candidates face the wrath of party activists if they support Roberts, and then he and the majority of the court rule against abortion rights.

Perhaps no Democrat is being watched more closely than Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), who has been trying to emphasize her centrist credentials. When asked for her thoughts on Roberts yesterday, she playfully mimed with nods, shrugs and an enigmatic smile.

DOJ_NMG_0007224

Both of her husband's high court nominees -- Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer -- won strong Republican support. But on Sunday, former president Bill Clinton drew a clear distinction between those battles and the fight over Roberts's nomination, suggesting reasons Democrats might oppose Roberts that may provide cover to his wife.

The former president said there were no partisan disputes over the withholding of documents in the case of his nominees, as there have been with Roberts. He also noted that, with two vacancies to fill, Bush has the ability to shift the balance on the court and that without knowing who his second choice is, Democrats may be more cautious about backing Roberts.

"The only question is whether the Senate has an extra burden here because it's likely to have a significant impact on the balance of court decisions, depending on who the next nominee is," Clinton said on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday. "I think if President Bush nominated a clear moderate before the vote happened in the Roberts case, he would sail through."

With no suspense but the final vote count left in the Roberts contest, senators from both parties are focused on Bush's next nomination. Reid said Democrats will consider it "a sharp poke in the eye" if Bush taps any of the 10 appellate court nominees who were blocked -- permanently or temporarily -- by Democratic-led filibusters in Bush's first term. That would include Judges Priscilla R. Owen and Janice Rogers Brown, who have been mentioned as possible nominees.

Would he try another filibuster? a reporter asked. "I'm just saying I would be terribly upset," Reid replied.

Reid: Roberts Will Join Court (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 21, 2005

Despite announcing his own opposition to confirmation, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) declared Tuesday that Judge John Roberts would be approved as chief justice of the United States, ending any suspense to the surprisingly smooth nomination process for President Bush's first Supreme Court choice.

While he said too many "unanswered questions" remained about the nominee for Roberts to win his vote, Reid told reporters that he specifically instructed his Caucus to vote their "conscience." He also said flatly that there would be no filibuster of the Roberts nomination.

"He's going to be confirmed, that's never been in doubt," Reid told reporters in a briefing after delivering his floor statement opposing Roberts.

Reid's pronouncements provided a mixed bag of results to liberal activists who have been trying to ratchet up pressure on Democrats to oppose Bush's first selection for the Supreme Court. While Reid's opposition leaves open the possibility that the new chief justice will carry the stigma of an unusually high number of 'no' votes — seven of the eight current justices received 87 or more votes — there is now little internal pressure on Democrats to reject the nominee.

"There are things that I ask the Caucus to follow, this isn't one of them," Reid said, adding later, "You can only go to the well so many times."

However, on the eve of his meeting today with Bush regarding the pick to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Reid signaled Bush would face a far stronger fight if he picked any of those nominees previously filibustered by Democrats in the 108th Congress — a potentially bad omen for lawyer Miguel Estrada and federal appellate Judges Priscilla Owens and Janice Rogers Brown, all of whom have been mentioned as potential nominees.

"I just think the president would be making a terrible mistake," Reid said when asked about the possibility of nominating previously filibustered candidates.

Mindful that he was disappointing many of the liberal activist groups, Reid suggested those organizations would never be satisfied with the level of fight that Democrats put up against Roberts.

"A lot of these special-interest groups are very hard to satisfy," he said.

This after two of Reid's top lieutenants, Sens. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), received a sharp rebuke at a weekend meeting in Los Angeles from wealthy activists such as television producer Norman Lear over Roberts' glide path to confirmation.

At an event on behalf of People For the American Way, the first of the major liberal groups to announce opposition to Roberts, Lear lashed out at the Democrats for not mounting more determined resistance to the nomination, according to several sources familiar with the event.

Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, confirmed that the event included a "frank discussion" between activists and the Senators. He added that Lear, founder of PFAW, did not hear what he wanted from either he or Durbin, the Minority Whip.

"We gave the pros and cons," Schumer recounted of their discussion about Roberts. "They wanted us to come out against."

DOJ_NMG_0007225

Schumer and Durbin are both on the Judiciary Committee and were among the most aggressive questioners of Roberts at last week's nomination hearings. But each Senator remains publicly undeclared on Roberts, despite voting against his nomination to U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in 2003.

Durbin declined to talk about the discussion with Lear.

"I'm not going to get into it," he said Tuesday.

Ralph Neas, PFAW's president, likewise declined to comment on the meeting, which was ostensibly a celebration of the group's new West Coast director, Jeff Berman, a former counsel to Schumer. "When it comes to meetings with Senators, I'm very close-mouthed," said Neas, who was not on hand for the meeting but acknowledged he was aware of the exchange.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), also a member of the Democratic leadership, was on hand at the PFAW event and also declined to discuss the matter, calling the gathering a "legislative update" for the group's members on the West Coast.

Reid, who has been requesting that no one in his Caucus announce his or her position on Roberts, said he thought it was important that he make his decision first as leader — a post he's now held for little more than eight months.

"I wanted to be the first to make a decision," he said when asked if he had a "special obligation" to oppose the nominee because of his position.

"I wanted this to be my decision," he added.

Most Democrats are holding to Reid's mantra of waiting until the Judiciary Committee makes its formal recommendation on the nomination. It is a given that will occur Thursday when Roberts will be sent to the floor with a positive vote.

But enough Democrats, particularly those in conservative-leaning states, have sent signals that they will approve the nominee so there is little drama to the final stage of this fight beyond the expectations game involving how many votes Roberts will receive.

Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), who along with Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) has been an outspoken backer of Roberts, reiterated his support again Tuesday.

"I've not seen anything that would cause me to vote against [Roberts] at this time. ... And I don't expect anything to come out of the woodwork," he said.

Top Senate Dem Opposes Roberts' Bid (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said Tuesday that he will vote against Supreme Court nominee John Roberts but will not press other Democratic senators to follow his lead.

The Nevada senator predicted Roberts will be confirmed next week as the nation's 17th chief justice, succeeding the late William Rehnquist.

Reid also urged President Bush to hold off on naming a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. He said he would view the nomination of federal judges Priscilla Owen or Janice Rogers Brown, who have been mentioned as possible replacements for O'Connor's seat, as "a real poke in the eye with a sharp stick" and hinted that it could provoke a Democratic filibuster. The Senate confirmed Owen and Brown this year over opposition from Reid and other Democrats.

Reid said he was impressed by Roberts' intellect but concerned that he did not repudiate "hurtful" language about women and minorities in memos he wrote as a lawyer for the Reagan administration. Some Democrats, such as Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska, say they are leaning in favor of Roberts. — Kathy Kiely

The Connecticut woman whose case led to the Supreme Court decision allowing local governments to take homes for private development asked senators to end federal involvement in such seizures.

"I sincerely hope that Congress will do what judges and local legislators so far have refused to do … protect our homes," Susette Kelo told the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Supreme Court, ruling for the city of New London, said municipalities have broad power to seize homes in favor of private development to generate tax revenue. The House has already passed a bill that would bar federal transportation funds from being used to make improvements on land seized via eminent domain for private development. The Senate has not yet taken up that bill. The panel is considering proposals from Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and others that would bar federal money from being used in construction projects that benefit from the ruling.

Frist's shares in hospital chain sold

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist no longer holds stock in HCA Inc., the Nashville-based hospital chain his family founded. Frist, his wife and their three sons had owned an undisclosed amount of HCA stock in blind trusts. A California-based watchdog group had complained to the Senate ethics committee last year that Frist's holdings posed a conflict because of his support for legislation limiting medical malpractice lawsuits — which could benefit HCA if it passed. The ethics panel dismissed that complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0007226

HCA shares hit a 52-week high of $58.60 in June, not long before Frist was told his stock had been liquidated. The stock lost about 10% of its value on July 13 after a weak earnings report. The sale was reported Monday by Congressional Quarterly. Frist is considering a run for the GOP's 2008 presidential nomination.

Senate Democratic Leader Will Oppose Roberts' Confirmation (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid will vote against confirmation of John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the Supreme Court, he announced Tuesday.

Reid's opposition will not change the outcome. The Republican-controlled Senate is still expected to confirm Roberts as the nation's next chief justice, probably next week.

But it could increase pressure on other fence-sitting Democrats like Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York to vote no. It also could embolden President Bush to pick a more controversial nominee for the remaining court vacancy, thus increasing the chances of a more contentious fight.

Reid's opposition to Roberts came as he prepared to meet with Bush on Wednesday to discuss whom Bush might pick to fill the seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Joining Reid at that meeting will be Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and the Senate Judiciary Committee's leaders - Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman, and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the senior Democrat.

In a Senate floor speech, Reid said he decided to oppose Roberts based on memos Roberts wrote early in his career challenging affirmative action, civil rights and women's rights. The Nevada Democrat said Roberts' two years as an appeals court judge left too short a record to signal how he might rule on such issues in the future.

Reid told his fellow Democrats that he did not expect them to follow him out of party loyalty. Rather, he told them, he would leave it to them to make up their own minds, said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who added that he has not decided.

One senator who did signal he would join Reid in opposition was Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

"This is really a leap of faith, isn't it?" Kennedy said Tuesday. "There are those that took the leap in terms of the war, there were those who took the leap in terms of taxes and now they are being invited to take the leap again in terms of Judge Roberts. And I don't think I'm going to be among them."

Two other Democrats signaled they would vote for Roberts.

"I'm inclined to vote for Roberts unless something else comes up," said Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont.

"I've not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" Roberts, said Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb.

Several other leading Senate Democrats have refused to say how they will vote, notably including those who might run for president in 2008. They include Clinton, Evan Bayh of Indiana, Joseph Biden of Delaware and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Asked if she had decided, Clinton only shrugged as she entered a Capitol elevator Tuesday.

"We hope that Senator Reid's colleagues will reach the same conclusion and take the same strong stand," said Ralph Neas, president of the People for the American Way, a liberal group.

Opposing Roberts might anger some independents but could appeal to liberal party activists.

A majority of Americans, 58 percent, want the Senate to confirm Roberts, according to a recent Gallup Poll. But just 41 percent of Democrats want Roberts confirmed. That suggests Democrats who oppose Roberts face little political risk among their base.

"They're just shoring up their base," said Betty Glad, a political scientist at the University of South Carolina.

Reid is pressing his case at a time when Bush is at his weakest politically, with the lowest approval ratings of his presidency. But Democratic opposition to Roberts - who emerged politically unscathed by his appearances before the Senate Judiciary Committee - could signal to Bush that he cannot win Democratic support anyway and therefore should go ahead with a more confrontational nomination.

That could lead Democrats to filibuster, possibly prompting Republicans to invoke the "nuclear option" of ending the right of a minority to block Senate action.

"It's likely the next nominee will not be as bulletproof as Roberts," said Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Minnesota. "Bush is going to do what he wants to do. If he has to fight for it, he's still going to get what he wants. This is not an administration that blinks."

The Gallup Poll of 1,005 adults was conducted Sept. 8-11 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Next High Court Pick Anyone's Guess (WT)

By Joseph Curl

DOJ_NMG_0007227

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

As President Bush weighs viable candidates for a second Supreme Court vacancy, Republican allies close to the process agree on one thing: Expect the unexpected selection.

Top Republicans say liberals are playing politics by warning that a fierce Senate fight will erupt if the president nominates a conservative to replace the high court's moderate female, and that Mr. Bush won't be pigeonholed by Washington pundits' calls for a woman or a Hispanic.

"The idea that he has to move left is a ludicrous, inside-the-Beltway type of thinking, coming from people who want to do him harm," said Gary Bauer, chairman of the Campaign for Working Families. "I'm confident the administration will ignore that advice."

"Nobody ever contemplated that Bill Clinton, with all of his troubles, would be expected to nominate a conservative. The unspoken message here is that the left is telling the president that you have no right to make the court more conservative, only liberal presidents have the right to make the court more liberal," he said.

Still, Democrats and liberals, frustrated by what they say was Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s proclivity to evade tough questions during 20 hours of Senate hearings on his nomination to replace Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, are advising the president to nominate a moderate to avoid a battle in the Senate.

Some Republicans close to the White House say top Bush aides are looking mainly at female jurists to fill Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat. Democrats vow a fight if Mr. Bush nominates a hard-core conservative.

But GOP strategist Charlie Black said the threat does not send shivers down the president's spine.

"It's naive all of a sudden to say that the White House just realized that there's going to be a tough confirmation fight in the Senate," Mr. Black said. "Of course there's pressure from both sides, but he's not going to cave to pressure from the left or the right."

Mr. Bush will feel some of that pressure today when he meets at the White House with top senators from both parties about who should be picked for the lifetime appointment.

Republicans note that Democrats advised the president in July to chose a moderate or a woman -- or both -- to replace Justice O'Connor, but he instead chose a white, male conservative.

Mr. Black acknowledged that "there's only a handful of people who know" the president's top candidates. Two conservatives in legal organizations say top Bush aides are interviewing new prospects.

Some prominent candidates, however, made it into the final stages of the last search and are considered front-runners this time around. Judges Edith H. Jones and Edith Brown Clement, both of the Fifth Circuit in New Orleans, were on the shortlist. Also at the top of the list is Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who irks Democrats and conservatives alike but is known as a loyal friend of the president.

"If the president decides he would be the best choice, he's going to pick him. That's it," Mr. Black said. If that occurs, he would be the first Hispanic on the high court.

A new name has emerged on the longer list of candidates -- Judge Consuelo M. Callahan of the Ninth Circuit, the liberal San Francisco court, one of whose judges recently ruled that the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance violates the Constitution.

"That would kill two birds with one stone," said David Schultz, a professor at Minnesota's Hamline University law school and author of a new book, "The Encyclopedia of the Supreme Court."

Democrats, he said, "would have a hard time opposing a Hispanic woman," and Mr. Bush already knows her: He appointed her to the federal bench in 2003.

Words That Will Haunt (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

In announcing his opposition yesterday to the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be chief justice of the United States, Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) made a remarkable statement: "The president is not entitled to very much deference in staffing the third branch of government, the judiciary." Leave aside the merits of the Roberts nomination, which we support; if Mr. Reid regards Judge Roberts as unworthy, he is duty-bound to vote against him. But these are dangerous words that Democrats will come to regret.

This country has only one president at a time. That president, right now President Bush, is tasked with naming judges. The Senate has the role of providing advice and consent on the president's choices, which is a significant constitutional task. But if the presidential election means anything in this arena, it must mean that the president's choice has a heavy presumption of confirmation. That is the way the system works. Why else would Justices Sandra Day O'Connor, Antonin Scalia, Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg have received only a handful of no-votes among them? During the Clinton administration, we deplored the way that the Senate treated the president's judicial nominees during six years of Republican control over the Senate. Yet during those six years, the Senate confirmed 245 of President Bill Clinton's judges. If Republicans had been applying Mr. Reid's standard, they would have been within their rights to reject them all.

Do Democrats really want the American confirmation system to move in that direction? Republicans may still be in the majority the next time a Democratic president nominates a justice. Is it now okay for them to vote against a person who -- as Mr. Reid put it of Judge Roberts -- is "an excellent lawyer" and "a thoughtful, mainstream judge" who may make "a fine Supreme Court justice" simply because the nominee doesn't represent their ideal? When that day comes, and Democrats cry foul, remember what Mr. Reid said about how little deference he believes he owes Mr. Bush concerning Judge Roberts.

Sen. Reid Says He'll Vote Against Roberts (AJC/AP)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said Tuesday he would oppose confirmation of Chief Justice-nominee John Roberts, questioning Roberts' commitment to civil rights and accusing the Bush administration of stonewalling requests for documents that might shed light on his views.

At the same time, Reid readily predicted Roberts will win Senate confirmation, coupling the forecast with a warning of sorts to President Bush as he considers candidates for a second vacancy on the Supreme Court. "No one should think that just automatically they're all going to be easy like this one," he said.

Reid is one of four senators invited to a White House meeting with Bush on Wednesday to discuss the vacancy created by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's decision to retire.

The Nevada senator made his comments as Democrats began taking sides in advance of next week's confirmation vote. President Bush named Roberts, a 50-year-old appeals court judge and former lawyer in two Republican administrations, to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist.

Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., announced he will vote for confirmation, and Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., edged toward an endorsement, as well. Roberts also commands overwhelming if not unanimous support among the Senate's 55 Republicans.

"After reviewing Judge John Roberts' credentials and meeting with him privately, I have found that he meets my criteria for judges. And that is: only the brightest, most objective minds shall serve on the bench," said Baucus," who added the decision was not an easy one.

"I've not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" Roberts, said Nelson, who is seeking re-election next year in Republican Nebraska and often crosses party lines to support Bush's legislative proposals.

Reid had successfully urged fellow Democrats to refrain from taking positions on the appointment until after the completion of last week's confirmation hearings and the regular Tuesday closed-door meeting of the rank-and-file.

"This is a very close question for me. But I must resolve my doubts in favor of the American people whose rights would be in jeopardy if John Roberts turned out to be the wrong person for the job," he said.

Referring to publicly released memos that date to Robert's tenure as a Reagan administration lawyer, Reid said they showed the young attorney "played a significant role in shaping and advancing the Republican agenda to roll back civil rights protections."

"No one suggests that John Roberts was motivated by bigotry or animosity toward minorities or women," Reid added. "But these memos lead one to question whether he truly appreciated the history of the civil rights struggle. He wrote about discrimination as an abstract concept, not as a flesh and blood reality for countless of his fellow citizens."

Reid also said Roberts followed a "disingenuous strategy" at the confirmation hearings of suggesting that the views in the memos were not his own.

Democrats have tried without success to persuade the administration to release documents from Roberts' tenure as principal deputy solicitor general, a senior Justice Department job he held in the administration of the first President Bush.

"The failure of the White House to produce relevant documents is reason enough for any senator to oppose this nomination. The administration cannot treat the Senate with such disrespect without some consequences," Reid said.

Reid's remarks pleased leaders of women's organizations and civil rights groups who outlined the case against Roberts at a closed door meeting with the Democratic leader last week. According to participants in the meeting, they also said they wanted to run up as many votes against Roberts as possible, in part to try and show Bush he would be risking a fierce fight if he named a more conservative nominee than Roberts to replace Sandra Day O'Connor.

For his part, Reid urged the president to proceed slowly on filling O'Connor's seat, adding, "I don't think he needs to do it in the next couple of weeks, that's for sure."

DOJ_NMG_0007229

Beyond that, Reid said he would view it as a "poke in the eye with a sharp stick" if Bush were to nominate any of the 10 appeals court nominees that Democrats blocked in recent years, including some who were later confirmed. He declined to say whether Attorney General Alberto Gonzales falls into the same category.

One White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said at least some of the contenders on the president's list fall into the category that would draw Reid's ire.

Dana Perino, White House deputy press secretary, suggested Reid was changing the standard for judging nominees to the Supreme Court.

"In confirming recent nominees like Ginsburg, Breyer and Scalia, senators based their decisions on the qualifications of the nominee, not on whether or not the person doing the nominating was in their same party. The public does not want to see the Supreme Court become an extension of partisan politics," Perino said.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg was confirmed on a vote of 96-3 in 1993; the 1994 vote on Stephen Breyer was 87-9 and Antonin Scalia was confirmed 98-0 in 1987. Rehnquist was confirmed as chief justice in 1986 on a vote of 65-33.

Roberts Will 'Get Plenty Of Votes' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. will be confirmed as the 17th chief justice of the United States without a filibuster, the Senate's top Democrat said yesterday.

"He's going to be confirmed," Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada told reporters yesterday. "Roberts will get plenty of votes."

Mr. Reid announced that he will vote against Judge Roberts' nomination on the Senate floor but said, "The arguments against him do not warrant extraordinary procedural tactics to block the nomination."

"No one doubts that John Roberts is an excellent lawyer and an affable person," Mr. Reid said. "But at the end of this process, I have too many unanswered questions about the nominee to justify a vote confirming him to this enormously important lifetime position."

The senator made the announcements after a lunch meeting with his caucus, during which Democrats discussed their strategy for dealing with the nomination.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to vote on the nomination tomorrow. The entire Senate will vote on the nomination later in the month.

Mr. Reid's remarks about not filibustering Judge Roberts echoed the sentiments of several key Democrats that they don't know whether they will vote to confirm his nomination to the Supreme Court but that they are certain he won't be blocked from getting a final vote.

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat and a key member of the "Gang of 14" senators who can determine whether a filibuster will succeed, said none of the 14 is talking of a filibuster.

"I don't expect anything extraordinary to come about," said Mr. Nelson, adding that he hasn't decided whether he'll support the Roberts nomination on the floor.

Sen. Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat and a Gang of 14 member, said he couldn't imagine a filibuster being employed against Judge Roberts.

Sen. Evan Bayh, the Indiana Democrat who introduced the nominee at his confirmation hearing but withheld endorsement, said yesterday that he has not made his mind up. He called Judge Roberts "brilliant" and "affable," but said there are "a lot of unresolved questions."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, also is being closely watched for her vote on the nomination, especially given widespread speculation that she will run for president in 2008. But she gave no signals yesterday as she dashed past reporters to the elevator.

Mr. Reid said yesterday that he told his caucus members to vote their conscience. Although he complimented Judge Roberts for his intellect, Mr. Reid said he couldn't support the nominee.

"I'm not too sure his heart was as big as his head," he said.

But that's not to say that Mr. Reid was in any hurry to have President Bush fill a second opening on the court.

"I just don't see any rush," he said, noting the Senate's busy schedule right now. Mr. Reid and other Senate leaders will meet with Mr. Bush this morning to discuss that vacancy, filling the seat of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Republicans also are privately urging the White House to hold off on nominating a replacement. With the Roberts confirmation virtually sewn up, they worry that Democrats will spend all their Roberts debate time on a second nominee if one is named.

Unlike many Democrats, however, Mr. Reid said he was pleased by how much Mr. Bush consulted with him and others before nominating Judge Roberts.

"I'm sure it could be improved upon, but I don't think the Roberts consultation process was a total failure," he told reporters. "I didn't think it was a failure at all."

Mr. Reid declined to discuss names of potential nominees, except to say that naming any of the 10 previously filibustered candidates would be a "poke in the eye with a sharp stick." That could spell trouble for a nomination of Judge Priscilla Owen of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, who is often mentioned as an O'Connor replacement.

After Chafee Backs Roberts, Foes Await NARAL's Response (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, September 21, 2005

Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I) has said that he will vote for John Roberts's nomination to the Supreme Court, a move that could jeopardize his endorsement from NARAL Pro-Choice America.

"Absent anything unforeseen," Chafee told The Hill last week, he would vote for Roberts to succeed the late William Rehnquist as chief justice of the United States. The senator reaffirmed his support of Roberts yesterday.

Although Chafee voted against the nomination of U.S. Circuit Court Judge Priscilla Owen, NARAL President Nancy Keenan blasted him June 8 for voting to confirm Janice Rogers Brown's nomination to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"Given our recent conversations with Senator Chafee, this vote is surprising and extremely disappointing," Keegan said in the release. "We'd like to know what pressure the Republican leadership put on him. We will be watching closely his future votes on judicial nominees, including William Pryor and those for the Supreme Court."

Owen, Pryor and Brown were included in the "Gang of 14" deal that averted a floor vote on the so-called "nuclear option." Chafee voted no on Pryor's confirmation.

NARAL, an abortion-rights organization, endorsed Chafee on May 20, stating, "We stand by our friends." Chafee received a 100 percent rating on issues important to NARAL last year.

Asked if he was worried that NARAL would withdraw its endorsement, Chafee said he did not promise the group that he would oppose the president's nominees to the high court.

He added, "I'm reliably pro-choice."

Should NARAL pull its support, it could have implications on the 2006 race.

Darrell West, a professor of political science at Brown University, said what NARAL represents to Chafee carries more weight than the actual endorsement.

"Chafee's strong suit is his support in the center of the political spectrum," he said. "It would undermine his ability to make the case as a moderate in the Senate."

NARAL did not return several calls for comment.

Maureen Moakley, professor of political science at the University of Rhode Island, contended that while NARAL's endorsement might matter in a close, low-turnout Republican primary it probably would not play a deciding factor in the general election.

Chafee faces a challenge from the right from Cranston, Rhode Island Mayor Steve Laffey.

If confirmed, Roberts would replace Rehnquist, a steadfast conservative who died earlier this month. Most political experts believe Roberts's filling Rehnquist's seat would cause little change to the ideological makeup of the court.

However, the nomination of a successor to centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor still looms. NARAL could opt to see how Chafee votes on that nomination before reaffirming or withdrawing its support of his reelection bid.

Former Rhode Island Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse (D), one of the two Democrats vying to challenge Chafee in 2006, issued a statement last week opposing the Roberts nomination:

"I believe that nominees who go before the Senate for an appointment to the Supreme Court in this environment have an obligation to tell the American people where they stand on fundamental issues. John Roberts has not fulfilled this obligation."

Matt Burgess, a spokesman for Rhode Island Secretary of State Matt Brown (D), who is also running, said that if NARAL decides to buck Chafee then Brown would court its endorsement.

"Matt has a strong record of standing up for a woman's right to choose," he said

Brown has indicated he would apply a litmus test to judicial appointments, vowing to oppose nominees who oppose abortion rights.

Asked by The Providence Journal in May why NARAL opted not to back Brown, Keenan said noted that Chafee has a record of tough votes, while Brown has no congressional voting record.

A recent Brown University poll has Chafee leading Whitehouse, his closest opponent, by 13 points.

Chafee has often sided with the administration on confirmation votes, approving of the nominations of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Attorney General Albert Gonzales and voting for cloture on John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Bush Under Pressure Over Supreme Court Nomination (SAEN)

By Gary Martin, Express-News Washington Bureau

San Antonio Express-News, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - As John Roberts heads toward expected confirmation as chief justice, President Bush is under mounting pressure to nominate a woman or minority with conservative credentials to fill a second vacancy on the Supreme Court.

Bush will meet with Senate leaders today to discuss the Roberts confirmation vote, which is expected next week, and the process to select a judge to replace Sandra Day O'Connor.

Bush has pledged a "wide open" search for a nominee, including consideration of minority candidates.

Many Republicans and interest groups want Bush to choose a woman, preferably one aligned ideologically with religious conservatives.

"I have great faith in the president that he will look at all qualified persons, and I'd like to see him nominate another woman to the Supreme Court," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas.

Hutchison said there are qualified women with academic qualifications and life experience eligible for selection.

"I do want to see the next nominee be a woman," Hutchison said.

O'Connor " one of two women on the high court, along with the liberal-leaning Justice Ruth Ginsberg " has agreed to serve until her replacement is confirmed. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the number of women on the court should not be reduced. Others have pointedly urged the president to nominate a woman.

David Keene, with the American Conservative Union, wants the president to pick a strict constitutionalist, regardless of race or gender, "who believes in the doctrine of original intent of the framers, thus protecting the freedom and liberty of the American people."

Among the names being mentioned prominently around Washington is Priscilla Owen of Austin, a judge on the New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals that serves Texas, Mississippi and Louisiana.

Owen, who served on the conservative Texas Supreme Court, is politically tied to the president, who campaigned hard to win her appointment to the appellate court earlier this year.

Owen has the backing of friends with political clout, namely Karl Rove, the White House senior presidential adviser, Hutchison and Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

O'Connor, considered a moderate, was a swing vote on social issues like abortion and capital punishment.

Democrats and liberal-leaning groups have promised a bruising confirmation battle if the president chooses anyone who might alter the idealogical balance of the court.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, in an interview on CBS's "Face the Nation," called on the president to honor a campaign promise and select "a nominee that would unite both Democrats and Republicans."

Bush is expected to announce his nomination to the Supreme Court after the Senate vote on Roberts is final.

Leahy said he expected to hear names of potential court nominees when he meets with the president today for a White House breakfast with Senate leaders. Senate aides said if Bush selects a nominee in October, confirmation hearings and a vote could be held before December.

Owen's nomination to the appellate court sparked a bitter partisan battle and filibuster threat that ended in an historic compromise brokered by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and moderates from both parties.

She was confirmed in May, 55-43, after Democrats delayed the vote for four years.

Bush could also consider Judge Edith Brown Clement, who also serves on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals. She was reportedly a finalist to Roberts in the last go-round.

A conservative, Clement was a district judge in New Orleans before Bush named her to the appellate bench.

Another judge on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, Edith Jones, a Terrell Hills native and Houston resident, also is considered a possible choice, as is Janice Rogers Brown, a former California Supreme Court justice that Bush appointed to the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals.

Brown, an African-American, would allow Bush to name a minority to the high court. Bush has openly considered naming a Hispanic to the court and announced his consideration of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a San Antonio native, as a possible justice.

But the likelihood of a Gonzales nomination waned this week as conservative groups launched an effort to squelch the nomination, questioning his stance on affirmative action and abortion.

Republican aides said the president has a long list of potential minority candidates, including Emilo Garza of San Antonio, who sits on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, and Larry Thompson, an African-American and former deputy attorney general. > gmartin@express-news.net

By Robert Bork And David Rivkin Jr.

USA Today, September 21, 2005

With the John Roberts confirmation hearings over, there is every reason to believe that he will be a worthy successor to the late Supreme Court chief justice William Rehnquist. Roberts performed ably, embracing a modest judicial role, striking a sound balance between respect for stare decisis and the need to "revisit" flawed precedents, and rejecting the use of constitutionally irrelevant foreign law.

Roberts also properly refused to indicate how he would rule in future Supreme Court cases. While he will almost certainly be confirmed, the next confirmation battle, over Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's successor, is likely to be tough.

nonetheless, President Bush can win this battle, provided that he wages it within the proper philosophical context, by arguing that, in our constitutional system, the courts should remain judicial institutions and that most of the policy calls should be made by the political branches.

Senate Democrats have accused Roberts of hiding his views, claiming the American people are entitled to know where he stands on key constitutional issues, including abortion, end-of-life matters and the separation of church and state.

Withholding judgment

Yet nobody, including Roberts himself, can or should know how he would rule in a specific case, until that case comes before him. Having judges behave as politicians, seeking political support from public commitments concerning their future votes, is utterly incompatible with the proper judicial role. Going down this path would fatally undermine judicial independence and legitimacy.

In fact, far from being about Roberts or any future nominee, the pyrotechnics of the Senate hearings are attributable to the fact that the philosophic gulf between our two political parties has grown vast — and nowhere more so than with respect to the federal judiciary. Most Republicans want courts that are legal institutions, not political bodies. Democrats, on the other hand, insist on courts devoted to specific policy outcomes (invariably items on the liberal agenda).

Not content with helping transform the judiciary into the most important player in domestic affairs, and most certainly in cultural trends, Democrats push for courts that are activist in foreign and defense policy, micromanaging, for example, the treatment of captured enemy combatants.

Lost confidence

The hysteria of the Democratic Left is understandable. It has lost confidence in its ability to compete in the political arena and sees a politicized judiciary as its only hope to advance its agenda. The policies it desires, and the Supreme Court has so far advanced, are ones that encourage radical personal autonomy in moral and cultural matters. Activist judges announce principles and reach results that have no plausible connection to the Constitution. Thus, it is increasingly obvious that activist judges are issuing decisions that have no basis other than the judges' personal preferences. There is more than a grain of truth in the statement that the court represents the blue states in their contest with the red states.

The process of confirming Roberts, and choosing O'Connor's successor, has triggered a serious national debate about the judiciary's proper role.

This debate will have long-term benefits, provided that the president decisively wins it.

The presidency is, as Theodore Roosevelt put it, a "bully pulpit." Now is the time to use it. The president can remind us that the greatest transformations in American political life, from the development of the Bill of Rights to the enfranchisement of former slaves and women, were all accomplished democratically through constitutionally proper procedures, and that placing on the court justices who would take judicial shortcuts, often in defiance of the Constitution and the electorate, shows nothing but disdain for American voters.

Robert Bork, a former U.S. Supreme Court nominee and U.S. Court of Appeals judge, is a fellow at the Hudson Institute. David Rivkin served in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations and is a law partner at Baker and Hostetler.

Bush Sees 'Progress' On Fifth Visit To Gulf Coast (LAT)

By Scott Gold And Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0007233

NEW ORLEANS — President Bush came to the Gulf Coast today to praise the recovery effort after Hurricane Katrina devastated this region, but he found himself hoping that all of the good work will not be undone by another storm racing into the Gulf of Mexico.

During a visit to a coffee plant that is limping back to life after sustaining $20 million worth of damage, Bush praised the progress of recovery since Katrina dealt the coast a killer blow on Aug. 29. Bush was accompanied by Mayor C. Ray Nagin.

"Progress is being made toward meeting the mayor's vision of a — and my vision, and everybody's vision involved with this — of a vibrant New Orleans and surrounding parishes," Bush said.

But the president warned that Hurricane Rita was heading toward the gulf, carrying winds of more than 100 mph and was expected to gather energy from the warm waters.

"All up and down this coastline people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm," Bush said. "I've been briefed on the planning for what we pray is not a devastating storm — but there's one coming."

Rita stormed through the Florida Straits today, dropping torrential rains on the Keys and Cuba. It is a Category 2 storm, but could reach Category 3 and perhaps more when it makes landfall by week's end.

Current projections have it hitting Texas sometime Friday or Saturday, but it is expected to affect Louisiana by Thursday. New Orleans, which has been recovering from severe flooding, is in an especially sensitive position because its levee system was weakened by Katrina.

Nagin had allowed some residents of New Orleans to return over the weekend, but he suspended that program when federal officials, led by Bush, objected. The city is still without drinking water, the air quality is questionable and the impact of Rita is a potential hazard.

"I appreciate the mayor recognizing that, and he made a wise decision to say to people, be cautious about returning here, because a rain of any amount could cause these levees to break again," Bush said.

Nagin has at times been critical of the federal relief effort, but went out of his way to praise the principal federal official in New Orleans, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen.

We're "one leadership team," Nagin said. "We may not always agree, but we have one mission: To bring New Orleans back."

He then handed Allen a T-shirt boasting "I ©N.O."

Nagin then spoke to the hundreds of thousands of residents who were forced to flee the storm and broken levees that made this city uninhabitable.

"I know it has been three weeks plus that you haven't been able to come back," he said. "Just hold on for a little longer. As soon as we get comfortable that Rita" won't be a problem, "we will get to our reentry program. We fully intend to follow through."

"Be prepared," Nagin warned. "You may not recognize the place.… Come prepared with your eyes wide open as it relates to what you might see."

Despite the successes, including emptying more than half the city of the floodwaters, there are still water and supply problems. Municipal services are spotty at best and schools remain closed.

To bring attention to the progress that has been made, Bush paid his fifth trip to the region. He praised the recovery of the Folger's coffee plant, which roasts, packages and ships coffee nationwide and to parts of Mexico.

The factory, the size of several football fields, has one of its 10 production lines back in operation. About 150 of the 500 employees are working, many living on the grounds in the 110 trailers supplied by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"I want to thank the folks here at the Folgers plant for inviting us to come to say hello," Bush said. "The reason I've come with the mayor and Admiral Allen is because I want the people to know that there's progress being made in this part of the world."

Earlier, in Gulfport, Miss., Bush met with local officials on the governor's commission on the recovery. He praised their efforts and promised that the federal government would move faster to help with the reconstruction.

"Every time I come back here, I see progress," Bush said, establishing the theme for the day. "But this part of the country's changing. And you're moving forward. I don't know if you know that or not, but flying in or driving in, there's something different than the first time I was here.

"There is a can-do attitude. In the midst of all the trauma and pain, one thing I noticed on my first trip was, 'We can do this.' And now I'm seeing it being done," the president said.

"We'll get the debris removed. We'll get your water systems up and running as quickly as possible. We'll get your bridges built," he told the appreciative audience in a white tent set up in the parking lot of an outlet mall.

"There's no doubt in my mind that, out of the rubble and out of the huge heaps of timber that used to be homes, a better Mississippi will emerge," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0007234

Before leaving Washington, the White House announced that Bush had named Frances Fragos Townsend, his homeland security adviser, to lead an administration investigation into the sluggish federal response to Katrina.

Bush had promised to investigate "what went wrong and what went right" in the response that has already cost Michael Brown his post as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Congress has been holding hearings, but Democrats are still seeking the creation of an independent commission to investigate the disaster.

Press Secretary Scott McClellan told reporters that the administration would search the federal budget to find cuts to pay the bill for reconstruction after Katrina. Congress has appropriated almost $63 billion in emergency aid and Bush has pledged to rebuild the region.

Though the White House has not placed a price tag on the project, experts have said it could cost $200 billion. Bush has ruled out a tax increase. There have been calls to use some of the funds earmarked for Iraq to rebuild New Orleans, while conservatives have urged that some programs be cut.

McClellan today rejected a call to roll back the new prescription drug benefit.

Rita remains a concern for state officials as well.

More than 7,000 Hurricane Katrina evacuees staying in shelters near the Texas Gulf Coast are being evacuated in buses and planes, said David Passey, a FEMA spokesman, in Baton Rouge.

About 4,000 will be moved from Ellington Field in Houston to Ft. Chaffee in Fort Smith, Ark. Three thousand people displaced by Katrina will be moved from Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio to somewhere in Tennessee, Passey said.

"Safety, of course, is our top priority," Passey said.

Federal employees will coordinate with the city of New Orleans to comply with any mandatory evacuation.

Passey estimated that 11,000 civilian federal employees and 14,000 active military personnel — not including National Guard — are working in the area.

FEMA housing officials continue to grapple with the largest-scale need for temporary housing the agency has ever encountered, said Ron Sherman, head of FEMA's area housing command.

"Being displaced and losing your home is one of the worst things that can happen to you," Sherman said.

The agency is considering a variety of housing options for evacuees, primarily travel trailers, but also including cruise ships and apartments.

The Louisiana governor's office announced a plan to move the 55,000 people who remain in shelters into hotels and motels for up to 90 days, said Jerry Jones, director of facilities and planning for the state of Louisiana.

State officials had briefed FEMA on the proposal, which Sherman agreed with "in principle," although financial and logistical details of the plan had not been determined.

"We need to do something quicker," Jones said. Evacuees "need to know we're working for them."

State officials hope that the proposal will offer evacuees an alternative to shelters while FEMA works to establish adequate interim housing.

"Our citizens have been waiting and waiting for relief from their shelter environment," Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said in a statement Tuesday.

"While shelters have provided a safe respite, moving our citizens out of harms way immediately following Hurricane Katrina, it is past time to move all of them into the next housing option," she said.

Bush Praises Progress In Rebuilding Efforts (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 -- President Bush returned to the storm-battered Gulf Coast on Tuesday, telling local leaders that amid the rampant devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina there are promising signs of recovery.

Bush, who has faced harsh criticism for a confused and sluggish federal response to the deadly hurricane, said he was "pleased to see the progress being made on the ground" in the difficult task of rebuilding the region.

The president's trip marked his fifth visit to the area since Katrina flattened much of the Mississippi Gulf Coast and unleashed a flood that submerged most of New Orleans. Now, as the floodwaters are being pumped away, much of city and surrounding area remain uninhabitable and crusted in dried mud.

As the region struggles to dry out and lay plans for rebuilding, officials were concerned about Hurricane Rita, which Tuesday was making its way toward the Gulf of Mexico. Bush attended a briefing about the storm aboard the USS Iwo Jima, an amphibious assault ship docked near downtown New Orleans, where it serves as a recovery command center.

The visible federal preparations for Rita stand in contrast to the delayed response that followed Katrina. Although Bush signed emergency orders to ready federal help in anticipation of Katrina, precious days passed before the Federal Emergency Management Agency was able to mount an all-out response. Hundreds of people were killed in the hurricane; others were trapped on rooftops or in hellish shelters for days.

The ineffective federal response has shaken public confidence in an administration that prides itself on its cool efficiency. In Katrina's aftermath, Bush's approval ratings have plummeted to new lows, and polls have found that a dwindling share of Americans give him high marks for leadership.

Since the early confusion, Bush has moved to recover the initiative, vowing to lead one of the largest rebuilding efforts ever seen. Already, more than $62 billion has been appropriated, and some members of Congress have estimated that the rebuilding tab could go as high as $200 billion.

Using FEMA data, the National Low Income Housing Coalition yesterday estimated that Katrina destroyed or heavily damaged 302,000 homes. About 142,000 homes were lost in New Orleans alone. The housing advocacy group said that apartments accounted for 47 percent of units lost or damaged overall, and 55 percent in New Orleans.

In his visit here, Bush said local officials and businesses are making impressive progress in rebuilding and bringing economic life back to the stricken region.

Bush toured a Folgers coffee plant, where 110 trailers are lined up to house workers who have returned to the job. Plant officials said 150 of the facility's 500 workers are back to work and that one of the plant's 10 lines is working to package and ship coffee throughout the country.

"We've got some people working here because of the ingenuity of the plant managers," Bush said. ". . . This company has provided housing for the folks who work here."

Earlier in the day, Bush stopped in Gulfport, Miss., where he met with members of a state commission appointed to lead the storm recovery effort. The meeting was held in a white tent set up in the parking lot of a still-shuttered outlet mall that until a week ago served as a staging area for utility crews working to restore power.

As Bush entered the tent, the business leaders and others inside erupted in applause. "W, we still love ya," someone cried out, causing Bush to crack a smile.

Bush listened quietly as Gov. Haley Barbour (R) pledged to rebuild Mississippi's Gulf Coast and make it better than ever. "Creating a renaissance in this area is what I'm going do the rest of the time I'm in office," Barbour said.

Bush also heard testimonials from business leaders who pledged their efforts to help rebuild the Mississippi coastline.

"Every time I come back here, I see progress," Bush said. ". . . This part of the country is changing. You're moving forward."

A Storm Survivor, Political Reputation Intact (NYT)

By Joyce Purnick

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 20 - Hurricane Katrina has given the nation a new political celebrity, the mayor of beleaguered New Orleans. And like they say with pride here about most everything, Mayor C. Ray Nagin is just plain different.

A former business executive, Mr. Nagin is a Democrat who lashed out at Republican Washington, likes to cuss, has begun treating the president whose administration he lambasted as a buddy and makes no secret of his differences with the state's governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, also a Democrat. Mostly, he seems to be unapologetically making it up as he goes along, as he did on Monday when he (temporarily) defied official advice to slow the reopening of his city.

After Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen of the Coast Guard and President Bush very publicly advised caution, Mr. Nagin backed down and reversed his order to have people return gradually. He retreated with sword raised. "There's only one mayor of New Orleans and I'm it," he said, attributing his reversal to a "new event" - the prospect that Hurricane Rita might head for the Gulf Coast.

That kind of bravado is classic Nagin, an unorthodox politician of 49 who was a top cable executive before he ran for mayor three years ago. His pre-storm, tenure was seen as a little bumpy as he learned on the job, but not fatally so. Post-storm, Mr. Nagin has made a virtue of being consistently inconsistent. Why fast-track the return of people to a city short on power and potable water, even as he talks about putting safety first?

Those who know Mr. Nagin and know New Orleans attribute his rush to three factors: Nagin chemistry, politics and race, with a dash of civic pride thrown in.

"There's a lot of pressure to get business going again in New Orleans, and he got ahead of himself," said James W. Nickel, a lobbyist here and former state Democratic chairman.

Mr. Nagin, who declined to be interviewed for this article, maintains that politics was not his motive in trying to reopen his city quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0007236

Few who know the politics of New Orleans, a predominantly black city with a powerful white business core, harbor any doubt that he was responding to pressure from the entrenched white business community, and perhaps, too, from black elected officials worried that their constituents would not return unless assured their city was up and running.

Mr. Nagin needed the votes of both constituencies to win election, but white voters held the margin of victory. When he ran for mayor, business executives embraced him as a reformer. He got into the runoff after the black vote split and then went on to a slim victory.

"Candidates running for other offices got more votes than he did," the City Council president, Oliver M. Thomas Jr., said on Tuesday. Mr. Thomas has viewed the mayor's conduct post-storm with some skepticism, including his latest flip-flop. "You can't keep jerking people's chains," Mr. Thomas said.

Others cite mistakes. Mr. Nagin did not get everyone out, did not fire up the school buses for evacuees, did not have enough food or water for them in the Superdome or the convention center, did not protect people adequately and let the looters loot so he could make rescues the priority.

He had to answer for flying to Dallas the second weekend after Hurricane Katrina to visit his evacuated family and for meeting there with white businessmen from New Orleans. This infuriated many of the city's black lawmakers and businessmen, worried about being left out of the rebuilding loop, despite Mr. Nagin's assurances to the contrary.

And of course there was the famous flash of Nagin temper on the Thursday after the storm, when he railed at the federal authorities, "Now get off your asses and do something." In most cities, the public would say, Sure, but why didn't you do it first? But in New Orleans, Mr. Nagin was seen as putting the blame squarely on Washington and as alerting the world to his city's emergency.

Instead of facing political oblivion, Mr. Nagin has emerged as something of a folk hero, a familiar figure with his distinctive shirts and shaved head.

In some places in the country, mayors pay for big mistakes at election time. Mr. Nagin faces a primary election in February, and for now, the talk here is that he is not in big trouble, that he, like his city, was a victim of Washington and Ms. Blanco, whose reputation has suffered while his seems to be holding.

"You experience accountability in other places," said Roy W. Fletcher, a political consultant in Baton Rouge. "Here, while everybody wants something from government, nobody expects something from government."

Some New Orleanians are furious at Mr. Nagin. Others attribute his stumbles to an unfamiliarity with practical politics that pre-dated Hurricane Katrina. "He truly thought he could go into government and run it like a business," said Mr. Nickel, the former Democratic chairman. "If any government can't run like a business, it is the government of New Orleans."

But the mayor, a native of the city from a working-class family, is considered honest and strongly opposed to the old, often corrupt ways, yet limited by his city's poverty and its people's low expectations.

"If he had gotten those people out, it would have been shocking," said Alvin Gauthier, a science teacher and basketball coach at a New Orleans high school, as he waited in line here on Monday at the Federal Emergency Management Agency's disaster relief center.

In fact, as early as July, the mayor and emergency officials were warning that the city did not have the resources to evacuate everyone if a major hurricane hit, The Times-Picayune reported.

Yet nothing significant changed, which was not a surprise.

"This isn't the United States, darling; this is a colony of the powers that be," a rug dealer named Bob Rue said on Saturday in New Orleans, where he was protecting his shop on St. Charles Avenue with a revolver and a claw hammer.

"There's no tax base," Mr. Rue said. Too many people, he added, are too poor.

He was asked why not demand more from the state, more from the wealthy?

Mr. Rue, looking as though he wanted to use his claw hammer, sighed. Listen, he seemed to be saying, he survived. And so, it would seem, did Mr. Nagin. - survived a storm that damaged almost everything and everyone in its path, including a president.

But somehow there is a sense of tolerance from his constituents for their mayor, because, they say, at least he tried - considered an accomplishment in their hometown.

U.S. 'Must Pay' To Rebuild (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

President Bush, accused of embarking on a discretionary spending spree to rebuild the Gulf Coast, yesterday said the federal government is required by law to shoulder most of the cost.

DOJ_NMG_0007237

"We have a responsibility by law to help rebuild the infrastructure," Mr. Bush said on his fifth visit to the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina struck three weeks ago. He said the federal government is "the principal party responsible for rebuilding infrastructure."

White House officials pointed out that the 1988 Stafford Act, which is triggered by disasters such as Katrina, requires that the federal government pay at least 75 percent of the cost of rebuilding public infrastructure.

The federal government's share can jump to more than 90 percent in certain extraordinary circumstances, such as Hurricane Andrew in 1992, the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995 and the September 11 attacks.

Yet the Associated Press suggested Friday that White House plans to rebuild the Gulf Coast are discretionary.

"President Bush is presiding over the most expensive government relief and reconstruc tion operation in U.S. history, casting aside budget discipline," wrote reporter Tom Raum in a story headlined "The new New Deal?"

The next day, conservative John Podhoretz expressed alarm about the president's post-Katrina spending plans in a New York Post column.

"In ignoring the small-government sensitivities of conservatives," he wrote, "Bush may have done something politically catastrophic to his own presidency."

White House spokesman Trent Duffy countered that Mr. Bush has no choice.

"I guess you could make a discretionary decision not to rebuild this part of the United States, but it would be totally counterproductive," he said. "I mean, it's critical to the economy."

He pointed out that most of the money will be spent on indispensable items such as military and transportation facilities.

"A lot of the big-ticket items are roads -- those are a national asset," he added. "I mean, the farmers in Ohio use the roads in Louisiana and use the navigable waterways of the Mississippi River to ship their agriculture exports to the rest of the world.

"The other big-ticket items are military bases and Veterans Affairs hospitals," he added. "Does any self-described conservative want to not rebuild our military bases or VA hospitals?"

Still, such conservatives as OpinionJournal.com assistant editor Brendan Miniter are urging the White House to exercise restraint.

"Katrina is swamping every goal conservatives have, from limiting government to cutting taxes to reforming entitlement programs," he wrote yesterday on the site, published by the Wall Street Journal. "Katrina spending has already imperiled plans to repeal the death tax."

Yesterday, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow acknowledged the president's push to repeal the death tax and make other tax cuts permanent has been placed on the "back burner" because of Katrina.

"It's taken over the national agenda, and I think it will for a while," Mr. Snow told the National Association of Federal Credit Unions. "I think it will push to the back burner some issues that otherwise would have been on the agenda now -- the estate tax, tax [cut] permanency."

But the White House said yesterday that the president has every intention of making his tax cuts permanent and repealing the death tax.

"Keeping taxes low is the foundation of the president's economic program," Mr. Duffy said. "The president will block any attempt by Democrats to raise taxes."

Message: I Can't (NYT)

WASHINGTON

The president won't be happy until he dons a yellow slicker and actually takes the place of Anderson Cooper, violently blown about by Rita as he talks into a camera lens lashed with water, hanging onto a mailbox as he's hit by a flying pig in a squall, sucked up by a waterspout in the eye of the storm over the Dry Tortugas.

Then maybe he'll go back to the White House and do his job instead of running down to the Gulf Coast for silly disaster-ops every other day.

There's nothing more pathetic than watching someone who's out of touch feign being in touch. On his fifth sodden pilgrimage of penitence to the devastation he took so long to comprehend, W. desperately tried to show concern. He said he had spent some "quality time" at a Chevron plant in Pascagoula and nattered about trash removal, infrastructure assessment teams and the "can-do spirit."

"We look forward to hearing your vision so we can more better do our job," he said at a briefing in Gulfport, Miss., urging local officials to "think bold," while they still need to think mold.

Mr. Bush should stop posing in shirtsleeves and get back to the Oval Office. He has more hacks and cronies he's trying to put into important jobs, and he needs to ride herd on that.

The announcement that a veterinarian, Norris Alderson, who has no experience on women's health issues, would head the F.D.A.'s Office of Women's Health ran into so much flak from appalled women that the F.D.A. may have already reneged on it. No morning-after pill, thanks to the antediluvian administration, but there may be hope for a morning-after horse pill.

Mr. Bush made a frownie over Brownie, but didn't learn much. He's once more trying to appoint a nothingburger to a position of real consequence in homeland security. The choice of Julie Myers, a 36-year-old lawyer with virtually no immigration, customs or law enforcement experience, to head the roiling Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency with its $4 billion budget and 22,000 staffers, has caused some alarm, according to The Washington Post.

Ms. Myers's main credentials seem to be that she worked briefly for the semidisgraced homeland security director, Michael Chertoff, when he was at the Justice Department. She just married Mr. Chertoff's chief of staff, John Wood, and she's the niece of Gen. Richard Myers, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

As a former associate for Ken Starr, the young woman does have impeachment experience, in case the forensic war on terrorism requires the analysis of stains on dresses.

Julie makes Brownie look like Giuliani. I'll sleep better tonight, knowing that when she gets back from her honeymoon, Julie will be patrolling the frontier.

As if the Veterinarian and the Niece were not bad enough, there was also the Accused. David Safavian, the White House procurement official involved in Katrina relief efforts, was arrested on Monday, accused by the F.B.I. of lying and obstructing a criminal investigation into the seamy case of "Casino Jack" Abramoff, the Republican operative who has broken new ground in giving lobbying a bad name. Democrats say the fact that Mr. Safavian's wife is a top lawyer for the Republican congressman who's leading the whitewash of the White House blundering on Katrina does not give them confidence.

Just as he has stonewalled other inquiries, Mr. Bush is trying to paper over his Katrina mistakes by appointing his homeland security adviser, Frances Townsend, to investigate how the feds fumbled the response.

Mr. Bush's "Who's Your Daddy?" bravura - blowing off the world on global warming and the allies on the Iraq invasion - has been slapped back by Mother Nature, which refuses to be fooled by spin.

When Donald Rumsfeld came out yesterday to castigate the gloom-and-doomers and talk about the inroads American forces had made against terrorists in Afghanistan and Iraq, he could not so easily recast reality.

In Afghanistan, the U.S.'s handpicked puppet president is still battling warlords and a revivified Taliban, and the export of poppies for the heroin trade is once more thriving.

Iraq is worse, with more than 1,900 American troops killed. Five more died yesterday, as well as four security men connected to the U.S. embassy office in Mosul, all to fashion a theocratic-leaning regime aligned with Iran. In Basra, two journalists who have done work for The Times have been killed in the last two months.

The more the president echoes his dad's "Message: I care," the more the world hears "Message: I can't."

Bush: Townsend To Lead Katrina Inquiry (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 21, 2005

U.S. President George W. Bush has named his homeland security adviser, Fran Townsend, to lead an internal inquiry into the much-criticized federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House said on Tuesday.

Townsend will look at "what went right, what went wrong and lessons learned from the federal response to Hurricane Katrina," said spokesman Trent Duffy, who spoke as Bush prepared to make his fifth trip to the disaster zone.

Bush has come under heavy fire for his handling of the hurricane and its aftermath. A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll released on Monday said 41 percent of Americans approved of his handling of the ordeal, compared to 57 percent who disapproved.

A separate congressional inquiry will also investigate what went wrong with the federal response. But Bush so far has refused to back calls from Democrats for an independent commission to look at the disaster response.

A memo from White House chief of staff Andrew Card directed government departments and agencies to designate by Tuesday one senior official to be the coordinator to work with Townsend for their specific agency.

The memo directed agencies to give this effort "their full attention and highest priority," Duffy said.

The goal is to apply lessons learned to future emergencies.

"The president said he wanted to hold people accountable. This is one of the many ways in which he will do that," the spokesman said.

Katrina slammed into Louisiana and Mississippi on August 29 with 140 mile-per-hour (224 kph) winds and a 30-foot (nine-metre) storm surge. Levees in New Orleans collapsed, flooding the city and leaving thousands of people stranded without any way to leave.

The Louisiana death toll had risen to 736 as of Monday, bringing the total dead from Katrina to 973, including 218 in Mississippi and 19 combined in Florida, Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.

What We Know So Far - And What We Don't (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Why did it take so long? Why was government at almost all levels sluggish in providing aid to the victims of hurricane Katrina?

That's an issue that will preoccupy Washington for months to come. This week, President Bush appointed domestic security adviser Frances Townsend to lead an internal White House inquiry. And Congress will almost certainly authorize a full-scale investigation into the Katrina response, though its form and timing are still disputed.

Individual congressional panels have already begun to hold hearings, but testimony so far has dealt with preparation for future disasters, not the havoc wrought by Katrina's fury.

That said, some lines of questioning are already obvious. From unread plans to unmobilized troops, to a command structure that at times seemed less organized than a soccer team of 7-year-olds, the Katrina response was a case study in confusion. Official briefings, after-action reports, and media accounts have begun to sketch in some crucial details about why this might have been so. Plan? What plan?

Disaster plans were either incomplete, or ignored. Take the Louisiana State Emergency Operations Plan, drawn up in 2000. It has an extensive section on the evacuation of southeast Louisiana, and subsequent sheltering of evacuees, in the event of a hurricane. According to the plan, those not able to drive away from New Orleans were to be transported on locally obtained buses.

Yet New Orleans city officials had long known that those buses would not be forthcoming. From Mayor Ray Nagin (D) on down, they have said that they knew they didn't have the resources to empty out the city as the plan said. As Mr. Nagin told The Wall Street Journal, his own plan was "get people to higher ground and have the Feds and the state airlift supplies to them."

An unanswered question is why the city did not use the resources it did have, even if those might not have been enough to fully transport the estimated 20 percent of the city that didn't leave by car. New Orleans had upwards of 300 buses, plus hundreds of school buses and other municipal vehicles.

Similarly, the relevance of the Department of Homeland Security's National Response Plan (NRP) to the effort that evolved now seems in question.

Released in December 2004, the NRP is an attempt to reorient national disaster preparedness. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), formerly an independent agency, is now part of the larger Homeland Security bureaucracy. Its main stated mission is to support state and local responders.

Thus FEMA waited for state and local officials to provide it with detailed lists of needs. As former director Michael Brown told The New York Times last week, "I never received specific requests for specific things that needed doing."

State and local officials, for their part, were perhaps still thinking about the old, independent FEMA. They were quickly overwhelmed by the disaster, and felt they had neither the time nor information to provided request spreadsheets.

As Congress furthers its Katrina inquiries, it will surely weigh whether FEMA should be plucked out of the larger Department of Homeland Security and made separate once again.

"We would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy," said Sen. Susan Collins (R) of Maine, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, at a kickoff hearing on Katrina last week. "Instead, we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response." Who's in charge?

Perhaps no single issue contributed to the slow-footedness of the initial Katrina response more than lack of leadership structure. As is now well-documented, top officials had little idea of who was in charge of what, when.

On Aug. 29, for instance, FEMA director Mr. Brown was in Baton Rouge, La. He has said he repeatedly warned his superiors in Washington that state and local officials were at odds, or not communicating, and that he was struggling to establish a "unified command."

The next day, 36 hours after the storm first hit, Department of Homeland Security (DHS) Secretary Michael Chertoff finally issued a memo that declared FEMA's Brown the "principal federal official" to coordinate Katrina response. He also declared the storm an "incident of national significance," invoking the full powers of the National Response Plan.

Yet Mr. Bush had already declared the area a disaster zone on Aug. 27, prior to the storm making landfall. Some DHS officials believe that that declaration had already involved the NRP, making Mr. Chertoff's later move irrelevant.

Not that state and local officials were looking for the feds to provide an on-site hurricane czar, they say. In one instance, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) turned down an attempt by Washington to assert more authority. On Sept. 2, she refused to sign over her 13,000 National Guard troops to federal control. She worried that the request was political, allowing Washington to depict prior failures as her fault. Send in the Marines

There is one national resource over which the White House has unquestioned command: the active-duty military. And in the wake of Katrina, some in Washington think the Pentagon should be more involved in the immediate response to disasters, whether they be storms or terrorist attacks.

Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, sent President Bush a letter last week saying it may be time to rethink long-standing laws that hinder the ability of active-duty troops to operate in the US.

These laws, such as the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878, generally prohibit the military from being used for domestic law enforcement. They were originally enacted to protect the nation against even a hint of military tyranny.

In part, this may be a reaction to reports that frustrated military units were held up prior to deployment to the Gulf, or never deployed at all. Units of the 82nd Airborne were reportedly put on alert on Aug. 30, for example, but then not immediately sent. Some military helicopter units in the Gulf felt they could have easily flown rescue missions, but were not tapped soon enough.

Specialized active-duty military personnel did begin racing toward the Gulf in Katrina's immediate wake. Air Force search-and-rescue teams, which include active, reserve, and Guard airmen, were at work in the region within 36 hours. But it was not until six days after the hurricane had hit land that Bush announced deployment of a large number of active-duty troops: 7,200, including Marines.

This is a separate issue from that of the strength of local National Guards. Louisiana has 3,000 Guard troops serving in Iraq, and it's not yet clear whether this had any effect on the ability of state guard commanders to respond to the storm.

As Katrina's lessons are sorted, sober conclusions are already being drawn. "The Katrina disaster and the failure of leadership at so many levels ... has had to have encouraged terrorists," said former Secretary of the Navy John Lehman, a member of the 9/11 commission, last week.

Local, state, and federal officials all need to take action, said Lehman, "before it's too late."

Democrats Say Relief Effort Needs Independent Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - Congressional Democrats said on Tuesday that the arrest of a former senior White House budget official involved in organizing the federal response to Hurricane Katrina demonstrated the need for an independent investigation of the government's reaction to the disaster, especially since the official is married to a leading Republican Congressional aide.

The official, David H. Safavian, 38, a lawyer who was chief of procurement policy in the Office of Management and Budget until he resigned on Friday, was arrested Monday on charges of lying to federal investigators about his relationship with Jack Abramoff, a Washington lobbyist at the center of a corruption investigation at the Justice Department.

Mr. Safavian, who is free without bail, was also accused of lying about a 2002 golfing trip he took with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner, when Mr. Safavian worked at the General Services Administration.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, said the arrest of Mr. Safavian undermined the credibility of a House Republican plan to investigate the troubled hurricane-relief effort through a committee to be led by Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia. Mr. Safavian's wife, Jennifer, is chief counsel for oversight and investigations on the House Government Reform Committee, which Mr. Davis leads.

"Spouses are not responsible for their counterpart's activities," Ms. Pelosi said at a news conference. "But I do say when there is a direct link to the White House and procurement and the investigation that this committee is supposed to conduct, then I think that really shatters all sense of confidence."

Her criticism was echoed on Capitol Hill, with Democrats saying that beyond the criminal charges, Mr. Safavian had lacked the background for an important federal procurement post. They also said he was one of several senior Bush administration officials involved in the sluggish hurricane-relief effort who had been chosen for their jobs because of political connections.

Michael D. Brown, who was chosen by President Bush to direct the Federal Emergency Management Agency, resigned last week after widespread criticism that he and many of his top aides had had little emergency management experience.

Democrats have also been critical of the recent nomination of a lawyer with little immigration experience to lead the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency within the Department of Homeland Security. The lawyer, Julie L. Myers, is the niece of Gen. Richard B. Myers of the Air Force, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"I'd be interested in how Mr. Safavian got his job," Ms. Pelosi said. "Mr. Safavian doesn't have the credentials that would justify his being the top procurement person for the White House. Did any influential members of Congress recommend him to that job? Is there a connection between his wife and that recommendation?"

The General Services Administration, which manages government buildings and other property, refused to answer questions Tuesday about how Mr. Safavian got his job as the agency's chief of staff from 2002 until last year.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director of management for the Office of Management and Budget, said in a statement that he had urged that Mr. Safavian be hired at the budget office last year because "I was impressed with his knowledge of the issues, agencies and the Hill."

"No one interfered or pressured me to do it," Mr. Johnson said.

Mr. Safavian was involved in developing broad policies for federal contracting in the hurricane-relief effort along the Gulf Coast, but Mr. Johnson said Mr. Safavian had nothing to do with awarding individual contracts for emergency relief work.

"No one at O.M.B.," he said, "including Mr. Safavian, is authorized to be involved in any contracting decisions, and I'm not aware of that happening. It's not part of our mission."

Mr. Davis said through a spokesman that he had done nothing to help Mr. Safavian obtain his jobs in the administration.

Mr. Safavian and his wife did not respond to telephone messages left at their home in Alexandria, Va. The Justice Department did not notify news organizations of the arrest until after Mr. Safavian had made his first court appearance, which prevented reporters from observing the hearing. His lawyer also did not return phone calls for comment.

The White House and the Department of Homeland Security stepped up their efforts on Tuesday to rescue the nomination of Ms. Myers, a former federal prosecutor in Brooklyn, to the immigration post.

"Julie Myers is well-respected within the law enforcement community and highly qualified to lead the Immigration and Customs Enforcement," said Erin Healy, a White House spokeswoman. "We will work with the Senate to ensure her confirmation."

But the nomination faced new challenges, some not directly related to Ms. Myers's qualifications.

Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, threatened Tuesday to block the nomination unless he received a secret F.B.I. memo about interrogations of terror suspects that he has been seeking for months; the May 2004 memorandum details the concerns of F.B.I. agents about the interrogation of suspected members of Al Qaeda held at the Navy base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Democrats have questioned whether the memorandum mentions Michael Chertoff, who directed the Justice Department's criminal division in Mr. Bush's first term and who is now the secretary of homeland security. Ms. Myers, whose nomination to the Homeland Security job was the subject of an article in the Tuesday editions of The Washington Post, had been Mr. Chertoff's chief of staff at the Justice Department. She married Mr. Chertoff's current chief of staff last weekend.

Aide Was Reticent On Lobbying For Foreign Clients (WP)

By Susan Schmidt And R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

David H. Safavian, the Bush administration official arrested Monday, initially failed to disclose lobbying work he had done for several controversial foreign clients when he went before a Senate panel last year to be confirmed as chief of the White House's federal procurement office.

The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee held up Safavian's nomination for more than a year, in part because of lawmakers' concerns about lobbying work for two men later accused of links to suspected terrorist organizations, according to committee documents. Safavian did not disclose his firm's representation of the men until questioned in writing by the committee's staff, and initially failed to tell the panel he had registered as a foreign agent for two controversial African regimes.

The Senate panel nevertheless approved him unanimously and the Senate followed suit on Nov. 21, 2004.

Safavian was arrested Monday on charges of lying and obstructing an investigation into former powerhouse lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings with the federal government. Safavian resigned his government post Friday. Yesterday, his attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Senate approval of Safavian occurred two months after The Washington Post disclosed Safavian's participation in an August 2002 Scotland golf trip with Abramoff. That trip was central to the criminal complaint against Safavian unsealed on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0007242

Yesterday, a spokeswoman for committee chairwoman Susan Collins (R-Maine) said the review of Safavian's background had been thorough.

"Based on our extensive review of his qualifications and background, we had no reason to believe that Mr. Safavian had engaged in any wrongdoing," said a spokeswoman for Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), the committee's senior Democrat at the time of the vote.

The record of Safavian's confirmation shows extensive questioning by the committee staff about his alleged lobbying for local Muslim leader Abdurahman Alamoudi, who in October 2000 made widely publicized comments supporting Hezbollah and the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, at a rally in Lafayette Park.

Lobby disclosure forms originally filed by Safavian's firm, Janus-Merritt Strategies, show that it represented Alamoudi, a prominent Muslim activist, until 2001. Alamoudi has since been convicted and imprisoned for accepting money from the Libyan government as part of an alleged plot to assassinate the crown prince of Saudi Arabia.

Janus-Merritt Strategies changed its lobby disclosure forms in 2001 to indicate that its client was not Alamoudi but Jamal Barzinji. In March 2002, Barzinji was named in a search warrant affidavit filed by a Customs Service official as "the officer or director" of a group of entities in Northern Virginia "controlled by individuals who have shown support for terrorists or terrorist fronts." No charges have been filed against Barzinji, and he has denied any wrongdoing.

Safavian told the committee in an April 16, 2004, letter that he and his firm never did any work for Alamoudi. He said the firm lobbied at Barzinji's request to gain U.S. support to free the former deputy prime minister of Malaysia, Anwar Ibrahim, who was imprisoned for six years.

Safavian also told the committee that he had "overlooked" two other clients while preparing his initial submissions for the OMB position. He did not initially mention work as a registered foreign agent for Gabon, a country persistently rated by the United States as having a "poor" human rights record, or his work as a registered foreign agent for Pascal Lissouba, the former president of the Republic of Congo who has been tried in absentia for treason and embezzlement.

Safavian, former chief of staff at the General Services Administration, is charged with three counts of making false statements and obstructing a GSA investigation into his ties with Abramoff. Before joining the government, Safavian worked as a lobbyist with Abramoff, then founded Janus-Merritt Strategies with conservative antitax crusader Grover Norquist.

As a lobbyist, he represented the government of Pakistan on military sales matters and the Islamic Institute in an effort to promote a U.S. postage stamp commemorating Ramadan. With Abramoff, he also represented the Commonwealth of Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. protectorate, to try to block the imposition of minimum wage rules.

In its probe, the Senate committee also raised questions about a potential conflict of interest between Safavian and his wife, Jennifer, the chief counsel for oversight and investigations at the House Committee of Government Reform, which oversees federal procurement policy matters.

Safavian said his wife had pledged to recuse herself from "any matters where the conduct of officials and employees" at the Office of Management and Budget the principal issue, "as well as matters relating specifically to procurement policy, competitive sourcing, or information technology."

Ex-GSA Official Charged With Hindering Probe (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

A former Bush administration official is charged with making false statements and obstructing a federal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

David Safavian, a former chief of staff of the General Services Administration (GSA) and Abramoff lobbying associate, concealed from federal investigators that Mr. Abramoff was seeking to do business with the government when Mr. Safavian, a GSA official at the time, joined him on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to an FBI affidavit and government officials.

FBI agent Jeffrey A. Reising said in the affidavit that a lobbyist -- identified elsewhere as Mr. Abramoff -- had enlisted Mr. Safavian's help in trying to gain control of 40 acres of land at the Federal Research Center at White Oak in Silver Spring for a private high school that Mr. Abramoff helped establish.

Mr. Safavian edited a letter that the lobbyist was preparing to send to the GSA and arranged and attended a meeting involving a GSA official, the lobbyist's wife and others to discuss leasing the property, according to the affidavit.

Mr. Abramoff told his wife to use her maiden name at the meeting because Mr. Safavian sought to play down Mr. Abramoff's involvement, according to the affidavit.

Mr. Safavian was given clearance to go on the August 2002 golf trip after telling the GSA's ethics officer that the lobbyist "has no business before GSA," according to the affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0007243

Nine persons, including Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, made the trip and played golf on the fabled Old Course at St. Andrews in Scotland. Mr. Safavian paid $3,100 for the travel, "in the exercise of discretion," he said, as quoted in the affidavit.

Mr. Safavian moved to the Office of Management and Budget last year, becoming the administration's top procurement official. He resigned from that post, effective Friday, OMB spokesman Alex Conant said.

No one answered the phone at a listing for Mr. Safavian in Alexandria.

Mr. Safavian worked with Mr. Abramoff on the team at the Preston, Gates & Ellis law firm that was lobbying to keep the Northern Mariana Islands free from certain U.S. labor and immigration laws during the last half of the 1990s.

Mr. Abramoff is not named in the affidavit, but two government officials confirmed he is the person referred to in the affidavit as Lobbyist A. They spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is still under way.

In addition, Mr. Safavian was asked in February for information about the golf trip by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. Both the Senate panel and a federal grand jury are investigating deals in which Mr. Abramoff and an associate received at least $66 million from six Indian tribes to lobby for their casinos and other interests.

Separately, Mr. Abramoff has pleaded not guilty to a six-count federal fraud and conspiracy indictment stemming from his role in the 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats in Florida.

No Progress In Fight Over Hurricane Panel (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 21, 2005

Democrats and Republicans in both chambers remained unwilling Tuesday to cede ground on the terms of the joint bicameral committee tasked with investigating the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, leaving the select panel's future in question.

While some talks appeared to be under way in the Senate, the House remained deadlocked on the composition of the panel. House Democrats continued to press their call for an independent panel modeled after the 9/11 Commission, while the GOP leadership was poised to move forward and appoint its members to the joint committee today.

House Republicans vowed to forge ahead with the panel regardless of whether Democrats decide to participate.

"I would just once again call on the Democrats, in the interest of the truth and the victims of Hurricane Katrina, to set aside any partisan hostilities and join the Republicans and the bipartisan, bicameral joint select committee to review the preparations in response to the devastating hurricane," Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said during his regular press briefing.

DeLay declined to speculate on whether Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) might choose to appoint Democrats to the panel himself if House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) declines to do so. He also pointed out that Katrina committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) already has announced plans to call former Federal Emergency Management Agency Director Michael Brown as a witness and said that it would be "pretty irresponsible of the Democrats to miss that opportunity" to question him.

Pelosi, for her part, reiterated her position Tuesday, saying Democrats will not come to the table and participate unless Republicans give them equal representation on the committee as well as full subpoena power. The 20-person panel would be made up of 11 Republicans and nine Democrats under the GOP proposal.

Brendan Daly, spokesman to Pelosi, said: "As it stands now, it's a sham. There's been no change in her position on that."

Daly added that Democrats will not participate with Republicans on the joint committee unless concessions are made, and at this point, "there's been no attempt [by Republicans] to compromise."

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Tuesday that a 9/11-style commission is the best and only way to ensure Americans get the answers they deserve about the Katrina response. He added that it is critical to find out why — four years after 9/11 — "we were still so ill prepared to respond effectively."

"The public saw the 9/11 Commission, they thought the 9/11 Commission did a good job," Hoyer said.

As the hard-line jockeying continued between party leaders, the political stakes in the battle continued to escalate. New opinion polls released Tuesday showed the American public panning the White House response to Katrina, and when coupled with the continued military problems in Iraq and soaring gasoline prices, President Bush remains mired at the lowest approval ratings of his presidency.

But Congressional Democrats also face a risk in appearing to obstruct any investigation, despite the fact that polling showed a huge majority of respondents favoring an independent commission. One House Democratic leadership aide suggested that it is politically tenuous for either party to keep up the stalemate indefinitely.

"Who is going to give any credibility to an investigation that is led by a Republican and only involves Republicans?" this source said. "I think that it behooves both sides to come to a compromise, but that doesn't mean that a compromise is going to occur."

DOJ_NMG_0007244

Across the Capitol, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) were expected to meet today to discuss the select committee controversy.

Reid has been under heavy pressure from Pelosi and other Democrats not to go along with Frist's plan to use the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, chaired by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), as the main vehicle to lead the Senate's investigation into the Bush administration handling of the Katrina crisis.

Senate GOP leadership aides said it was vital for Congress to discharge its oversight role in probing the Katrina disaster immediately, adding that there was time for an independent commission to be appointed after the present crisis has been resolved.

"This is no time for Congress to give up its oversight role," said a Republican staffer. "This is a time for action, and this is what standing committees are designed for. A select committee could also be helpful, but Congress needs to act, and an independent commission releasing some report in a year is not going to help anything."

Reid, though, has objected to Frist's proposal for a select committee. Democrats believe the proposal, as drafted, does not cover a long enough time period to investigate and also gives too much weight to the House in deciding what direction the panel should take. "As it is currently drafted, Sen. Reid will oppose" the Frist select-committee proposal, said Rebecca Kirsner, a Reid aide.

Without a plan for a joint committee in place, GOP leaders are striving to show that their party is actively moving ahead in addressing the humanitarian crisis wrought by Katrina.

Senate Republicans were briefed Tuesday by Office of Management and Budget Director Josh Bolton on the status of the Katrina recovery effort. Bolton's briefing included a detailed breakdown of how and where the Bush administration has spent the $62 billion in emergency funds appropriated by lawmakers so far.

Bolton told the GOP Senators that the administration has disbursed roughly $16 billion so far, and some Republican insiders are now beginning to question whether an additional emergency supplemental will even be necessary, especially if tight controls are implemented on funding recovery programs for Katrina victims.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), whose home state was hit hard by Katrina, cautioned his colleagues in an emotional appeal to be careful about appearing insensitive to the plight of those whose lives were disrupted by Katrina. "It's not all about the money," the Mississippi Republican said on Tuesday of his closed-door speech to the Senate GOP Conference. "We have to make sure we are aware that a lot of people have lost everything. Nobody is saying don't worry about how we spend federal funds. Be we need to get people back on their feet first."

Katrina's Cost May Test GOP Harmony (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Congressional Republicans from across the ideological spectrum yesterday rejected the White House's open-wallet approach to rebuilding the Gulf Coast, a sign that the lockstep GOP discipline that George W. Bush has enjoyed for most of his presidency is eroding on Capitol Hill.

Trying to allay mounting concerns, White House budget director Joshua B. Bolten met with Republican senators for an hour after their regular Tuesday lunch. Senators emerged to say they were annoyed by the lack of concrete ideas for paying the Hurricane Katrina bill.

"Very entertaining," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said sarcastically as he left the session. "I haven't heard any specifics from the administration."

"At least give us some idea" of how to cover the cost, said Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who is facing reelection in 2006. "We owe that to the American taxpayer."

The pushback on Katrina aid, which the White House is also confronting among House Republicans, represents the loudest and most widespread dissent Bush has faced from his own party since it took full control of Congress in 2002. As polls show the president's approval numbers falling, there is growing concern among lawmakers that GOP margins in Congress could shrink next year, and even rank-and-file Republicans are complaining that Bush is shirking the difficult budget decisions that must accompany the rebuilding bonanza.

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) said he and other fiscal conservatives are feeling "genuine concern [which] could easily turn into frustration and anger."

Congressional Republicans are not arguing with Bush's pledge that the federal government will lead the Louisiana and Mississippi recovery. But they are insisting that the massive cost -- as much as $200 billion -- be paid for. Conservatives are calling for spending cuts to existing programs, a few GOP moderates are entertaining the possibility of a tax increase, and many in the middle want to freeze Bush tax cuts that have yet to take effect.

DOJ_NMG_0007245

The resistance suggests that Bush's second term could turn out far rockier and more contentious than his first. One indicator many Republicans are watching to gauge whether Bush is becoming a liability for the party is in Pennsylvania, where Rick Santorum, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, is trailing state treasurer Bob Casey Jr. by double digits.

"My caucus would do anything for Senator Santorum," Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) said of his colleague. Chafee, who himself faces a tough reelection battle next year, predicted Republicans will increasingly be faced with the choice of propping up Bush or protecting their own. "I think they're going to collide," Chafee said of the two options.

Asked whether Bush's problems were a factor in his slump, Santorum responded, "That may be."

The White House is aware of the growing political problem and has moved on several fronts to pacify Republicans -- with decidedly uneven results. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, in a speech yesterday, said the White House will be forced to put several plans on the "back burner," including changes to the estate tax and permanently extending first-term tax cuts. "It's taken over the national agenda, and I think it will for a while," he said.

This prompted protests from one of the White House's closest allies, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), who said waiting on taxes was unacceptable. But White House officials said Snow was accurately reflecting Bush's intentions.

Amid this friction, top White House officials told Republicans the relief and recovery package could come in much lower than widely quoted projections of $200 billion. Some House GOP leaders also are urging their colleagues to cool off, reminding them that the true cost of the relief effort is not yet known.

"There are tough choices that are going to have to be made," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan. "We're going to have to cut unnecessary spending elsewhere in the budget to offset some of the cost with Katrina."

House conservatives are particularly riled. Unhappy about spending growth during Bush's first term, they thought they had slowed the pace when Congress passed a relatively austere fiscal 2006 budget this spring.

A group of these conservatives, including Feeney, plans today to present to the White House a proposal to cover the cost of the entire Katrina relief and reconstruction package. Dubbed "Operation Offset," it will include repealing many of the pork-barrel projects stuffed into the $286 billion highway bill that Bush signed into law a few weeks before Katrina struck.

McCain called on Bush to undo the Medicare prescription drug law, while a number of lawmakers said the costly benefit should at least be postponed from its January starting date. Republicans are pressing ahead with the Medicare changes, even as the White House spreads the word it is opposed to such a move.

In one of the most unexpected proposals to cover the reconstruction costs, Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) raised the possibility of raising taxes. Other Republicans say that while a tax increase is unlikely, Bush tax cuts that are scheduled to take effect in coming years may be in serious jeopardy.

Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said he will even comb through the Pentagon budget for cost savings. "Many of us think that we need to step back and look at what we're doing and reevaluate it," Voinovich said. But he added that "someone has to look at the big picture" -- and that someone should be the president. "The vision is missing," Voinovich said.

A new Gallup poll shows a majority of Americans believe the mission in Iraq should be cut to cover the recovery costs, while only a small fraction support slashing other domestic programs, raising taxes or increasing the deficit to finance it. New Orleans also has emerged as the chief target of angst. "The question is do we really want to flood New Orleans with money," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.).

Kingston said he has detected a building hostility toward New Orleans among his constituents, based on reports that local officials mismanaged the crisis, along with federal dollars that had previously flowed the region's way. "What we are hearing from constituents is: 'Wait a minute, slow down on this,' " Kingston said.

Deficits have rarely emerged as a potent political issue, with the exception of Ross Perot's independent bid for the presidency in 1992, but some worried Republicans believe the deficit may soon reach an untenable level, especially if Democrats can link it to Republican mismanagement.

"I don't know that anyone ever lost a race because of the deficit, but there is concern" that it could happen this time around, said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the former head of the National Republican Congressional Committee. "You can't just keep piling up debt."

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

For about an hour and a half yesterday, Republicans had a new tax-cut policy.

Addressing a group of credit-union officials in the morning, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow said that hurricane recovery spending would "push to the back burner" the GOP's plans to extend the tax cuts this year.

DOJ_NMG_0007246

But about 90 minutes later, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) held a news conference in his office and asserted that "we're not reexamining" the commitment to extend the tax cuts. "That's not an option," DeLay said, then, for emphasis, added: "Not an option."

Across the aisle and on the other side of the Capitol, Democrats were having similar difficulty staying on message. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) went to the Senate floor to announce his opposition to Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr., and to say that "senators should take notice" of the civil rights objections to the nominee.

But as those words were ringing through the chamber, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), was outside the cloakroom telling reporters that Reid "is speaking as an individual and as the senior senator from Nevada." The leader of the Democrats, Leahy said, is "not speaking for the caucus."

Katrina has washed away party discipline in Washington. With President Bush submerged -- a Gallup poll released yesterday showed that his support has actually fallen to 40 percent since his prime-time speech from Louisiana last week -- Republicans decided to stake out their own positions. And Democrats, with no obvious party leader, are quarreling over message and messenger.

The result: It's every man for himself in Washington. Nature may abhor a vacuum, but politics loves one.

The chairman of the House Republicans' campaign effort, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), told colleagues that they should drop plans for Social Security legislation this year. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) said Reynolds spoke only for himself.

Vice President Cheney said he sees no need for a "czar" to oversee the Katrina response. But Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said after meeting with administration figures yesterday: "I feel we need a czar, an administrator."

The message chaos in the governing party would seem to present an opportunity for the Democrats. But the opposition party is itself divided. Oppose Roberts? Pull out of Iraq? Repeal tax cuts? Democrats are split -- and leaderless.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean took a turn as party leader last week, comparing Roberts to DeLay and Bush aide Karl Rove. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has also vied to speak for the party, calling Bush "oblivious, in denial, dangerous."

On Sunday, former president Bill Clinton took his turn as party leader, attacking the Bush tax cuts. Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) and John Edwards, his former running mate, gave dueling auditions for party leader on Monday.

Yesterday, Reid took the party's reins. Apparently unable to settle on a theme for a morning news conference with Pelosi, the two leaders' news bulletin promised a smorgasbord: Katrina, the federal budget, judicial nominations and the Voting Rights Act.

In the afternoon, Reid held a session with reporters in which he acknowledged that his status as the party's Senate leader only goes so far. "Roberts will get plenty of votes" from Democrats, he said. Reid said he did not ask other Democrats to vote no because "you can only go to the well so many times."

As Reid abandoned hope of a party line on Roberts, Republicans down the hall were openly rebelling against the administration. After meeting with White House budget director Joshua B. Bolten, the GOP senators emerged decidedly off-message, demanding a recovery "czar" and criticizing Bush's spending habits.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) speculated that money will be saved because "we're going to be pulling troops out" of Iraq next year. Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) demanded "some idea" from the administration on Katrina spending, saying: "You'll spill more on the ground than you'll get to the trough."

DeLay, for his part, seemed to be paying the administration no attention at all. A week ago, at a time when Bush was saying "we're going to have to cut unnecessary spending" to pay for the Katrina response, DeLay said the House Republicans had cut just about everything there was to cut.

At his weekly news conference yesterday, when a reporter asked about future supplemental spending for Katrina, DeLay interrupted. "We don't know that there's going to be another supplemental," he said.

This seemed odd because Bolten had said two weeks earlier that he expected "a need for additional supplemental spending."

The reporter pressed, saying "we assume there is" going to be more Katrina spending.

"No," DeLay said, "we don't."

Katrina Clean-up Will 'hurt Bush Agenda' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 21, 2005

The need to focus on the damage and clean-up from Hurricane Katrina will delay other parts of the administration's economic agenda, John Snow, US Treasury secretary, admitted on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0007247

"It's taken over the national agenda and I think it will for a while," said Mr Snow said during remarks to the National Association of Federal Credit Unions in Washington. "I think it will push to the back burner some issues that otherwise would have been on the agenda now the estate tax, tax cut permanence, GSEs [government-sponsored enterprises] and other things."

Mr Snow also played down estimates that reconstruction work following Katrina, which struck the Gulf coast on August 29, would eventually cost taxpayers $200bn (£110bn, €165bn).

"Will the relief and reconstruction by costly? Of course it will," he said. "But I want to assure you that this administration. . . will not stray from our course of federal deficit reduction."

White House officials denied that Mr Snow's remarks meant Mr Bush was re-thinking his agenda. "The president has said the Katrina recovery effort will be the top priority," said Trent Duffy, White House spokesman. "The rest of his agenda is still important. A lot of tax relief does not expire this year, so there is no tremendous urgency. He will not raise taxes."

Scott Milburn, spokesman at the Office of Management and Budget, added: "We think tax cuts still need to be made permanent. That is key to preserving our economic expansion."

The comments come amid fierce political skirmishing over tax cuts, and concern from both Democrats and Republicans about how to pay for post-Katrina reconstruction. There are also continued concerns about the $62bn in immediate hurricane relief approved in two separate bills by Congress.

Newt Gingrich, former House speaker, said: "Congress has granted $61,000 per person [to hurricane victims] in the Gulf Coast from the two panic bills. Before they go charging off a cliff, they need to look at that."

Democrats have used the battle over hurricane spending to resist efforts to make the tax cuts permanent. Those concerns were echoed on Monday by a prominent Republican senator, George Voinovich of Ohio.

Yet many Republicans are eager to press ahead. When asked whether he would reconsider his stance on permanent tax cuts, Tom DeLay, House majority leader, said, "That is raising taxes and. . . that is not an option." Mr DeLay also warned that failing to make the tax cuts permanent could "pour cold water" on economic growth.

Conservative members of the House Republican Study Committee are also expected on Wednesday to launch "Operation Offset" a push designed to outline ideas for spending cuts and to reduce the federal debt "so that the reconstruction costs aren't passed on to our nation's children and grandchildren in an enormous debt burden", the group said.

Lawmakers Prepare Plans To Finance Storm Relief (New York Times)

By Carl Hulse

New York Times, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 - Conservative House Republicans plan to recommend on Wednesday more than $500 billion in savings over 10 years to compensate for the costs of Hurricane Katrina as lawmakers continue to struggle to develop a consensus on the fiscal approach to the disaster.

At the top of a partial list of the potential cuts being circulated on Tuesday were previously suggested ideas like delaying the start of the new Medicare prescription drug coverage for one year to save $31 billion and eliminating $25 billion in projects from the newly enacted transportation measure.

The list also proposed eliminating the Moon-Mars initiative that NASA announced on Monday, for $44 billion in savings; ending support for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, $4 billion; cutting taxpayer payments for the national political conventions and the presidential election campaign fund, $600 million; and charging federal employees for parking, $1.54 billion.

"What House conservatives will demonstrate through Operation Offset is that there is more than enough room in the federal budget to provide for the needs of the families affected by Katrina without raising taxes," said a House Republican aide who is working with lawmakers on the proposals and who insisted on anonymity because the package would not be made public until Wednesday.

The suggestions are certain to draw serious opposition from other lawmakers who consider those programs essential, illustrating the difficulty faced by the majority Republicans in finding acceptable ways to offset the hurricane costs.

Before the list was made public, Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the House majority leader, declared that delaying the Medicare plan was a nonstarter. Mr. DeLay also expressed skepticism that most lawmakers would want to revisit the transportation bill, saying he would be reluctant to sacrifice the projects that he won for his district in the Houston area.

"My earmarks are pretty important to building an economy in that region," Mr. DeLay said of the local projects he backed in the bill. A watchdog group said those items totaled more than $114 million.

Mr. DeLay said Republicans would press ahead this year with their planned tax cuts, though Treasury Secretary John W. Snow told a trade association on Tuesday that some tax measures might have to be delayed, including a repeal of the estate tax and the effort to make permanent some cuts instituted earlier in the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0007248

"I think it will push to the back burner some issues that otherwise would have been on the agenda now," Mr. Snow said in a speech to the National Association of Federal Credit Unions.

Senate Republicans met for more than an hour on Tuesday with Joshua B. Bolten, director of the Office of Management and Budget, to try to hash out an approach to hurricane-related spending, a problem that lawmakers acknowledge is among the most difficult they have faced.

Senators said they continued to press the White House to name a prominent individual to oversee the relief effort, creating a central contact point for the flow of money, as well as many legislative proposals.

In the House, Democratic leaders called for establishing a special commission to try to prevent fraud and abuse in spending on the recovery.

"We need to make sure that federal contracts are awarded based on confidence and integrity instead of cronyism and greed," Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California, said. "And at long last, we need to start putting the interests of the taxpayers ahead of the private contractor."

Senate Republican leaders promised to be diligent in overseeing the money, which they said was being spent more slowly than immediately after the storm. They said they would keep the deficit in mind.

Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said Congress needed "to make sure that that money is spent wisely, that it is spent with full accountability, that it is spent with fiscal responsibility and transparency."

There was a sharp split among Republicans. Some were more insistent on clearly defined cuts than others.

"There is no agreement to pay for this at all," Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, said. "Those of us who would like to pay for it are very much a minority within our caucus."

Mr. DeLay said estimates that the recovery and rebuilding effort could cost $200 billion or more were unfounded. Other lawmakers disputed that, saying none of the rebuilding costs have been considered, as the Louisiana delegation is preparing a multibillion-dollar aid request.

Republicans Split Over Paying For Hurricane Aid (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, September 21, 2005

Republicans in Congress are deeply split over whether to pay for the burgeoning costs of hurricane relief by cutting domestic programs or to simply add billions of dollars to the growing U.S. national debt, top lawmakers and congressional aides said on Tuesday.

"There's no agreement to pay for this at all. Those of us who would like to pay for it are very much a minority within our caucus," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, a New Hampshire Republican.

Congress has approved $62.3 billion in emergency aid following the death and destruction suffered along the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina slammed ashore last month.

Some early estimates pegged the ultimate federal cost of repairing infrastructure, homes, businesses and farms in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama at around $200 billion.

Last week, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay told reporters that "it is right to borrow to pay for it."

But with the Bush administration expected to ask for another round of emergency funds in coming weeks, conservative Republicans in the House and Senate are increasingly vocal about the need to offset costs with domestic spending cuts.

Revisiting the issue on Tuesday, DeLay said, "We are in the process of looking" at spending cuts that might help pay for the biggest federal disaster relief effort in history.

He added that tax increases "are not an option."

In the Senate, Gregg refused to rule out tax hikes, saying Congress must "look at all functions of the budget, including the revenue side."

He refused to say whether a revenue review could include consideration of tax increases, putting off extensions of Republican tax cuts already enacted or raising the wide range of government fees on businesses and individuals.

"I'm willing to look at a revenue solution and I'm not going to get too specific about it," Gregg said after leaving a meeting of Senate Republicans also attended by Vice President Dick Cheney.

If Republicans choose the spending-cut route, a tough fight is anticipated. Prominent Republicans, including Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) of Arizona, called for delaying next year's start of a Medicare prescription drug benefit for the elderly and cutting highway projects approved this summer.

DeLay called the Medicare postponement a "nonstarter" and noted President Bush had ruled out the idea. He said it would be difficult to reopen the highway legislation, which took two years to pass.

DOJ_NMG_0007249

Also on Tuesday, the Federal Reserve raised key interest rates for the 11th straight time and signaled more increases to come, saying Hurricane Katrina will provide only a temporary setback to economic growth.

That conclusion is at odds with the views of some House Republicans, including Speaker Dennis Hastert, who have voiced support for an economic stimulus they say is needed to counter any hits the economy could take because of the storm.

The liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities on Tuesday said such a package of tax cuts, which would likely help businesses and individuals not hit by the hurricane, would be "costly" and "ill-advised."

GOP Factions Vie Over Offset Plans (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 21, 2005

The debate over paying for the recovery from Hurricane Katrina continued Tuesday as various factions within the House GOP floated ideas for spending offsets and jockeyed for position.

Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) embraced the idea of finding spending offsets but declined to endorse any specific proposals, while the conservative Republican Study Committee met with GOP leaders to discuss their own plans and Republican moderates focused on strengthening oversight of the massive federal outlays that are already under way.

The RSC's meeting with the leadership Tuesday came as some leaders had grown concerned that the conservative group's high-profile push for spending offsets were making the party look bad.

In classic Washington, D.C., fashion, one leadership aide described the meeting as a "frank" discussion, during which the RSC lawmakers were told that the total costs for Katrina were still unclear and that it was a useless exercise to try to find offsets for more than the $62 billion Congress has already appropriated.

"We don't have a $200 billion supplemental request from the president," said the leadership aide, who noted that the meeting ended with a spirit of cooperation. "We need to take a hard look at the RSC's list [of offsets]. ... If we have the votes to pass them, we'll do them."

While the RSC's hand would be strengthened if the group could attract some moderate lawmakers to its cause, such outreach appears unlikely in this case.

Though the RSC and the centrist Tuesday Group have been able to work together occasionally in the past, particularly on budget process reform, the two GOP factions are singing from different songbooks on Katrina.

"A lot of the things the RSC wants to do, to the moderates, are unrealistic," said Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.), a leading Tuesday Group member.

Specifically, Castle and other moderate Members and aides said they would be unlikely to support the RSC proposal to delay implementation of the Medicare prescription drug bill for a year.

"I think that's more posturing than it is reality at this point," Castle said of the idea.

Instead, the Tuesday Group is primarily focused on implementing stringent oversight over the money Congress appropriates for Katrina. Many moderate lawmakers were in Chicago this past weekend to attend a Republican Main Street Partnership retreat, and those Members agreed to endorse a proposal by Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) to create a special inspector general to scrutinize Katrina spending.

But while the RSC has been vocal in staking out ground on the offsets issue, the Tuesday Group has been relatively quiet about its plans.

"We don't copy the RSC. We do our own thing," said Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), the co-chairman of the Tuesday Group.

Kirk suggested that the main difference between the two groups was stylistic, with the Tuesday Group preferring to work behind the scenes.

"The difference between us and the RSC is a lot less press releases," Kirk said. "I'm less interested in getting a lot of attention and more interested in getting the special IG."

The RSC will hold a press conference today to unveil the list of specific offset ideas the group shared with leadership Tuesday. Yet even within that conservative faction, the possibility remains that not every member will support all of the proposed spending cuts.

In an e-mail sent Monday to all RSC press secretaries, the office of the group's chairman, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), wrote: "We are coming up with a list of federal savings ... and are NOT asking all those who come to the press conference to endorse all the savings, but ARE SEEKING about 10 Members to specifically take ownership over one offset idea and speak to that at the press conference."

As the RSC trumpets its plan, DeLay has spent this week sharpening his own message about how to deal with the budgetary consequences of Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0007250

At his press briefing last week, DeLay sparked controversy by lauding the GOP's record of fiscal discipline and declaring an "ongoing victory" against government waste.

Following an outcry from his fellow conservatives, DeLay sought to clarify his remarks Tuesday as a he faced a barrage of questions from reporters seeking specific details on how the billions of dollars spent on Katrina might be offset.

While conceding that he spoke "inartfully" last week, DeLay reiterated his praise for the party's overall record of fiscal accomplishment, saying that "this Republican House has been focussed on fiscal responsibility and fiscal restraint" since the GOP took power in 1995.

And after saying last week that he was waiting for someone to bring him a list of realistic spending offsets, DeLay reiterated Tuesday his desire to find spending cuts, though he declined to address many specific ideas.

"There are programs all over the federal budget that are bloated or wasteful or inefficiently using the funds we provide them, and I'm very interested in identifying them," DeLay said.

While DeLay agrees in principle with his fellow conservatives about the importance of finding offsets, the Majority Leader was dismissive of the idea to delay the Medicare bill by a year.

"The president has already spoken on that, and it's a non-starter," DeLay said. Arguing that the Medicare bill was actually designed to save money in the long run anyway, DeLay said that "postponing a reform that is going to implement fiscal restraint doesn't make a whole lot of sense."

He was less clear in his views on another potential spending fix: reopening the highway bill to remove Member earmarks.

"It's still an option, and we're going to look at that [and] many others," DeLay said, though he later emphasized the economic importance of the highway bill and political difficulties that would be associated with revisiting it.

After Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that she would be willing to forgo her highway bill earmarks to help pay for Katrina, DeLay was asked if he would do the same.

"I don't know about that," DeLay said. "I would take a look at it. My earmarks are pretty important to building an economy in that region."

DeLay also criticized the idea of putting off extending President Bush's tax cuts and said that they remained on the agenda, saying that not extending the cuts would be the equivalent of raising taxes.

"Katrina tax hikes are not about Katrina; they're about tax hikes, and they are not an option," he said.

Recovery's Cost Forces Lawmakers To Reassess Pet Spending Projects (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Pressure is growing to help pay for Hurricane Katrina's costs by getting members of Congress to give up the pet spending projects they've inserted into legislation for their states or districts.

But some top lawmakers are decidedly unenthusiastic.

"Kiss my ear!" Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, told a Fairbanks newspaper reporter when asked whether he'd return the $223 million he'd "earmarked" for a bridge in the Alaskan outback. Young is chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee.

Earmarks are projects that have neither been requested by the administration nor deemed worthy by a congressional committee. Over the years they've become as prevalent as grease on a machine's gears. The 1991 transportation bill contained 538 earmarks. This year's had 4,373. Last year's catchall appropriations bill, which wrapped together seven of the 13 annual spending bills, contained 8,000 earmarks totaling $10 billion.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, scoffed at the suggestion that he give up his earmarks, saying highway projects in his district contributed to economic growth. One watchdog group estimated DeLay's total earmarks at $114.4 million over five years.

"My earmarks are pretty important to building an economy in that region," DeLay said. "What's good about the highway bill ... is it creates hundreds of thousands of jobs. It is an economic engine that drives the economy."

Still, as pressure grows to reduce Katrina's bite from the federal budget, many lawmakers are being forced to take a second look at their appetites for federal money.

In Bozeman, Mont., a citizens' group petitioned its congressional delegation to rescind the $4 million the city obtained for a parking garage and direct the money instead to Katrina's victims. Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., a leading conservative in the House of Representatives, said he'd give up his $16 million in highway-bill earmarks to help pay Katrina's costs.

DOJ_NMG_0007251

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who guided $130 million in special projects into the highway bill, said Tuesday that she'd give up her own earmarks to help the devastated region. Later, however, she amended her stance, saying she wouldn't give up a $50 million retrofitting project for the Golden Gate Bridge to protect the span from earthquakes.

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., railed against Republicans for inserting special spending projects that he said were "out of control." But when he was asked whether he'd give up his own $16 million in pet projects, Waxman replied: "How about everybody's earmarks? ... If you want to get rid of all the pork barrel projects, I'm for that."

Getting rid of earmarks alone would hardly make up for Katrina spending, however, which may total $200 billion before it's done. Highway bill earmarks total only $24.2 billion over five years. Even if they all were rescinded, that would save only $9.8 billion over five years because much of the money would go to states anyway under complicated allocation formulas.

Katrina's costs, however, clearly are fraying congressional relations, particularly within Republican ranks. Vice President Dick Cheney and White House Budget Director Joshua Bolten told Senate Republicans on Tuesday that the administration will seek more money for Katrina relief and reconstruction in mid-October. Congress already has approved almost $62 billion.

The Katrina discussion, held during a closed-door luncheon in the Capitol, prompted many Republicans to complain that the administration was too eager to spend money on the devastated region without providing adequate financial safeguards and recommending ways to pay the expense.

But several senators said no one recommended giving back his or her earmarks. And when Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., recommended a balanced package of spending cuts and revenue increases, he was met with stony silence.

Asked whether there were any alternative options worth pursuing to pay for Katrina, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., replied: "There aren't any. Everybody's mad."

A list of top earmarks, or "pork" projects, in this year's highway-spending bill compiled by Taxpayers for Common Sense, a budget watchdog group, is on the group's Web site at www.taxpayer.net/Transportation/safetealu/states.htm.

Highway Bill Earmarks Eyed For Storm Relief (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

The top House Democrat said yesterday she would give up some specific transportation projects in her San Francisco district to help pay for Hurricane Katrina, but Majority Leader Tom DeLay said he doesn't think cutting projects in his district is a good idea.

"The highway bill is an important part of building our economy," Mr. DeLay said. "You cannot have a strong economy unless you have a strong infrastructure."

Earmarks -- the specific spending projects members of Congress write into bills, which critics call "pork" -- have become a major focus of conservatives who want to cut spending to help pay for hurricane relief.

The highway bill contains about $24 billion in earmarks, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, put other lawmakers on the spot yesterday morning when she said she would give hers up.

"I certainly would give up earmarks to help the people in the region," Mrs. Pelosi said, adding that her constituents would be "proud" to sacrifice.

But by the afternoon she had backtracked, saying she wouldn't give up all of the $128.6 million going to her district. She said the $58.8 million slated to retrofit the Golden Gate Bridge to protect it from earthquakes is a safety issue too important to forgo.

"You have to judge what are your priorities. And the priority for us, I think, is clearly about we want to help the people of the region," Mrs. Pelosi said, adding that Congress should first stop tax cuts planned for later this year.

Hurricane spending has become a dominant issue in Washington with lawmakers promising to spend whatever is necessary to rebuild the Gulf Coast. Some Republicans have called for deep cuts to pay for the spending, but they appear to be a minority.

Members of Congress have estimated Katrina's costs to be between $150 billion and $225 billion, but Mr. DeLay said nobody knows for sure.

"Anybody throwing around this $200 billion figure, it would be nice for one of you all to ask them where they get it, because there is no such a figure," he said. Mr. DeLay said that's why Republicans have not presented a comprehensive plan to pay for Katrina.

"The point is that if you don't know the figure, you don't have a plan," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0007252

Mr. DeLay took heat from conservatives after telling reporters last week that the government should borrow money and add to the deficit to pay for Katrina. He specifically rejected cuts to the transportation bill, saying he hadn't seen any that would work.

Asked if that meant the government was running at peak efficiency, Mr. DeLay said, "Yes, after 11 years of Republican majority, we've pared it down pretty good."

But this week, he embraced cutting and said all options should be on the table.

"We are looking at every opportunity to save money and provide offsets for that that has already been authorized to be spent," Mr. DeLay said. "And we are continuing to look, while we are having oversight of how things are being spent."

He also said he did not mean to say there is no cutting room left in the budget.

"What I said was, fiscal restraint -- and I said it inartfully, I know -- I said it is an 'ongoing victory.' Ongoing is the operative word," Mr. DeLay said. "We are always involved in fiscal restraint and fiscal responsibility ever since we have been in the majority."

He at one point defended higher highway spending, arguing it creates jobs. But he also took credit for a two-year fight that cut about $90 billion out of the bill the Senate wanted.

"That was an incredible effort -- I think a laudable effort -- to keep the bank account as closed as possible in the highways," Mr. DeLay said.

He ruled out some conservatives' proposal to delay the Medicare prescription-drug benefit, set to kick in next year at a cost of $40 billion.

"That is a nonstarter," the Texas Republican said. "Medicare is a reform to save spending."

Gregg Open To Katrina Tax Increase (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 21, 2005

The chairman of the Senate Budget Committee refused to rule out increasing taxes yesterday as he and many of his GOP colleagues called for offsets to temper the effect of the next round of federal spending for disaster relief in the Gulf Coast.

“We’ve got two sides to the ledger,” said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). “I’m willing to look at a revenue solution … as part of a package.”

Though Gregg declined to specify or rule out any solution, there are limited options for generating revenue, many of which involve deferring expected tax cuts or increasing taxes in a targeted or across-the-board fashion.

Conservatives demanded accountability and offsets in the next package of spending for the recovery from Hurricane Katrina, but many of them, including House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), scoffed at tax increases.

“The so-called Katrina tax hikes are not about Katrina; they’re about tax hikes and will only serve to balloon the oversized, under-responsive emergency-management system that broke down three weeks ago in the wake of the hurricane,” DeLay said in a House floor speech, according to prepared remarks provided by his office.

Like DeLay, most Republicans who called for offsets focused solely on spending.

Many said they would like to see offsets in the form of reductions in government “waste, fraud and abuse.” Others called for increasing the amount Congress plans to cut from mandatory programs through budget reconciliation — currently $35 billion over five years — later in the year.

That could lead to funding Katrina recovery through more severe cuts to programs aimed at the poor and elderly. Medicare, Medicaid and food stamps are among the programs on the chopping block in a reconciliation process that was already pushed back after Katrina hit.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and others sharply criticized Republican budget priorities. “Even though Katrina took a price, and even though a mirror was placed in front of America that shows a face that we sometimes choose to ignore, the majority here in the Congress has still said that they will go forth with a budget that will give $70 billion in tax cuts to the wealthiest people in America,” she said.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) repeated his call for a commission to review government programs, similar to the one that closes and realigns military bases. Brownback introduced legislation in 2002 that would create such a panel, called the Commission on the Accountability and Review of Federal Agencies.

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) said tax increases could slow the economy, but he said he might support “rethinking” business incentives in the recently enacted energy law, a position he has long advocated. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), chairman of the Energy Committee, said there should have been more, not fewer, industry incentives.

There have also been many calls from both sides of the aisle to reopen the recently passed highway bill and cut some of the earmarks after congressional passage of $62.3 billion in emergency relief.

DOJ_NMG_0007253

DeLay was ambiguous about whether or not he favors reopening the bill. “Everything is an option if it makes sense,” he said.

He did say he would not request the repeal of highway projects in his own district after Pelosi volunteered cutting her own transportation projects to help foot the cleanup costs.

One Senate Republican aide pointed out that many of the suggestions for offsets are either unrealistic or would hardly make a dent in the spending. “It’s going to be very difficult to pay for this because of the size,” the aide said.

The White House on Monday rejected suggestions that implementation of the landmark Medicare prescription-drug law enacted in 2003 should be delayed to offset Katrina spending. Already, Congress has spent $62.3 billion on the recovery effort. But lawmakers are concerned that there has been little scrutiny in the first two relief packages.

All across the Capitol yesterday, lawmakers and aides discussed how to handle the next round of Katrina-related spending, which GOP aides say is not likely to be doled out until after an October recess.

Josh Bolten, the director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, met with Republican senators yesterday afternoon.

Republican leaders in the Senate are assessing how to arrive at a budget for future spending, the question of possible offsets and means of ensuring accountability for the money that they send to the Gulf Coast, according to a senior Senate Republican aide.

Only $14 billion of the money appropriated so far had been spent as of Monday night, the aide said.

House conservatives, led by Republican Study Committee Chairman Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), were expected to unveil a plan for offsetting Katrina spending today.

Foreign Investment Aids Cleanup, Despite Adding To U.S. Deficit (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

On Friday, as official Washington fretted over the potential fiscal calamity of Hurricane Katrina, the Treasury Department let Americans know where the money would come from to rebuild the Gulf Coast: foreign investors.

The latest Treasury report on foreign lending showed that investors abroad poured $101.4 billion into the United States in July alone -- a voracious clip -- to snap up stocks, bonds and everything else available. So while the federal government keeps spending and while tax cuts remain politically sacrosanct, continued foreign investment should help pick up the estimated $200 billion cleanup tab for Katrina and further postpone a final reckoning on the budget deficit.

"We know [Katrina] is an extraordinarily consequential event for the people and the region, but it's one the economy can weather," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, director of the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office. "The evidence is, we can finance this with borrowing. I don't see any evidence we couldn't do that."

Any debt must be paid back, with interest, so running up the deficit to reconstruct the Gulf region carries a cost, at least to future generations. Foreign holdings of U.S. government debt exceeded $2.03 trillion in July, meaning that every man, woman and child in the United States owes foreign investors $6,846.

Holtz-Eakin said Congress and President Bush face a choice on how to finance the recovery: raise taxes, cut spending or let foreigners pay. The decision will reveal much about the government's ability to set priorities in the face of far larger challenges, such as the baby boom's nearing retirement, Holtz-Eakin said.

Ever since record budget surpluses turned to yawning deficits, some economists have issued warnings of pending doom that have yet to come true. They predicted that foreign lenders would sour on U.S. government debt as the Treasury Department sold billions of bonds and notes each day. To keep those buyers happy, interest rates would have to rise substantially. Housing, cars and other items bought on credit would turn expensive, and the U.S. economy would slide into recession.

Despite such warnings, Congress and Bush cut taxes every year since 2001, and spending soared, largely to finance the war in Iraq but also to fund the largest expansion of Medicare since President Lyndon Johnson created the program in 1965, the most expensive transportation and public works bill in history, and now, the biggest domestic reconstruction effort ever.

Compared with the size of the economy, federal tax revenue has plunged, to 16.3 percent of the gross domestic product last year from 20.9 percent in 2000, before recovering to 17.5 percent of the GDP this year. Meanwhile, spending has climbed steadily, to an estimated 20.2 percent of the economy this year from 18.4 percent in 2000, and that CBO estimate came out before Katrina struck.

But economic disaster has not hit.

"These long-run worries, there's an element of truth to them, but I think frankly the fears are exaggerated," said James Glassman, senior U.S. economist at J.P. Morgan Chase.

DOJ_NMG_0007254

On the contrary, tax receipts, buoyed by a thriving corporate sector, set a single-day record last Thursday. The Treasury pulled in $71 billion that day, shattering the $61 billion record set June 15. And corporate tax receipts on Thursday -- $63 billion -- surpassed the total for any previous month on record. At 4.9 percent, the unemployment rate is the lowest since August 2001.

And interest rates have shrugged off Katrina. The small increase in rates in recent days stems mainly from inflation fears that predated the hurricane, said Steven Englander, chief currency strategist for North America at Barclays Capital in New York.

That seeming contradiction can be solved by looking abroad. Foreign holdings of U.S. government debt reached slightly more than $1 trillion in 2000 and have more than doubled since. Japan, long the nation's largest creditor, now holds $683 billion in U.S. government debt. China, which recently surpassed Britain as the United States' second largest lender, has seen its stake in the U.S. government more than triple, to $242 billion this summer from $71.4 billion in 2000.

And there does not seem to be much lessening of appetite. Foreign purchases of U.S. stocks and bonds have nearly doubled in the past four months. Asian nations appear intent on buying U.S. assets to prop up the value of the dollar and keep U.S. interest rates low, thus helping U.S. consumers buy their goods. And that Asian buying spree is financed by U.S. consumers who continue their spending on Asian goods. On top of the bill for that new flat-screen television, add the interest owed to Chinese and Japanese lenders.

The United States also remains blessed by its competition: Foreign investors, looking for a stable place to park their money, still see U.S. assets as far more attractive then European or Asian investment options.

Katrina will do nothing to shake that arrangement, said Michael P. Dooley, a senior adviser at Deutsche Bank in New York and an expert on currency markets.

And Katrina just is not as big as it sounds, most budget analysts agree. Currently, about $4.1 trillion in U.S. government debt is traded worldwide. So far, Congress has enacted $64.6 billion on Katrina-related legislation, and the Senate has approved additional legislation worth nearly $11 billion. Without doubt, $75.6 billion is a large amount, larger than the budgets of the Justice, Homeland Security and Energy departments combined. But borrowing $76 billion tomorrow would add a little more than 1 percent to the amount of federal debt already on the market.

Nevertheless, economists who have warned for years of the dangers of the deficit are not about to give up yet, "not on your life," said Stephen S. Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley and a leading deficit hawk. "Here we are taking on $150 [billion], $200 [billion], $300 billion in debt for Katrina at a time when we're doing Iraq, we're doing Afghanistan, and the national savings rate is at a record low for any leading nation in the history of the world," he said. "It will come back to haunt us."

House, Senate Agree On Hurricane Tax-Relief Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON -- House-Senate negotiators agreed on an estimated $6 billion tax-relief bill to expand deductions this year for Hurricane Katrina survivors and spur employment of low-income workers on the Gulf Coast.

The measure, expected to be sent to President Bush this week, would temporarily relax tax rules to encourage corporate cash donations and make it easier for displaced families to deduct storm losses and claim refunds on past taxes.

While the precise costs weren't available last night, estimates are that it could provide about $6.2 billion in tax relief for the next 24 months. Republicans are promising a second round of hurricane-related tax relief, but a Congressional Research Service report warned that such an approach often provides less help for low-income families with lower tax liability.

The final talks centered on two employer tax credits to encourage companies to hire hurricane survivors or keep employees on the payroll during this period of business interruption. House tax writers preferred to target these credits -- valued at as much as $2,400 a year -- at workers in the disaster area. The Senate approach was more to track survivors and help them find new jobs -- or temporary assignments with their old employers -- regardless of location.

The compromise gives preference to the hard-hit areas, such as New Orleans, but recognizes the need to help evacuees stabilize their lives as well. The existing Work Opportunity Tax Credit would be extended to Katrina survivors for two years if hired inside the disaster area and just through the end of 2005, if hired outside.

Similarly, the House agreed to a three-month experiment with a new Senate-backed employer credit intended to help distressed companies keep workers on their payrolls. The credit is limited to employers in the disaster area with fewer than 200 employees -- which would appear to exclude many of the larger casino operators along the Gulf. The House agreed to reconsider the idea as part of future tax legislation.

Wealthy small-business owners will benefit from a provision lifting the limit on how much a corporation can deduct -- as a percentage of taxable income -- for cash contributions to Katrina relief. Beyond Katrina, there is a short-term improvement in deductions for contributions of food and book inventories, and the bill opens the door for noncorporate taxpayers, such as a farm partnership, to participate in food deductions. The publishing industry failed to get one of its top priorities, allowing an inflated adjustment in the value of books donated.

Property owners stand to benefit most from provisions that make it easier to claim deductions on storm losses and that extend the time period for buying a replacement home or building before being subject to taxes. Casualty losses attributable to Katrina are made fully deductible regardless of whether the loss exceeds 10% of a taxpayer's adjusted gross income. Moreover, a taxpayer can carry back these deductions to apply them to 2004 taxes, yielding a refund on taxes paid.

For example, under current law, a person with an adjusted gross income of $40,000, who has lost a car valued at $5,000, can only deduct $1,000. A Katrina survivor could claim the full $5,000.

Tax writers say this will help persons of all incomes. A second provision allowing families to take money from retirement accounts without penalty would most benefit those with large holdings.

In The Gulf Zone (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

If we had our druthers, all of America would be an "opportunity zone," with low and flat-rate taxes and little of the regulation that can strangle economic development. But the battered Gulf Coast is a good place to start with these investment-friendly reconstruction incentives, and so Congress could (and probably will) do much worse than enact President Bush's Gulf Opportunity Zone.

The idea is to lure businesses back to the region through lower tax rates, incentives for new capital investment, and low-cost business loans and loan guarantees. So far the details are sketchy. But one promising magnet for capital is the small-business expensing plan, which allows firms to immediately deduct from their federal tax bill the first $100,000 of the cost of a new office, plant or equipment. We're typically against temporary tax incentives, but if anything warrants such a lift, the aftermath of Katrina does -- and especially as an alternative to the "Marshall Plan" for new federal spending via FEMA or a bureaucratic cousin that is already being proposed in Washington.

We only wish the tax incentives went further than what Mr. Bush has proposed. Why not allow the Gulf to operate as a laboratory for a flat tax, with an 18% rate and no taxes whatsoever on capital investment for businesses -- small and large? And if this works for New Orleans, as it has for so many of the former economically ravaged nations of East Europe, then make it the law of the land.

The Bush plan also provides an "urban homesteading" feature, whereby low-income families would be given a free plot of federal land in the ruined areas in exchange for a commitment to build a home there. It's a truism that people better maintain homes that are their own property. The plan also contains what amounts to a voucher for students uprooted by Katrina. They'd be able to use up to $7,500 for public, but also for private or religious, schools -- which has the teachers unions up in arms. Leave it to the National Educational Association to let its own monopoly interests trump the welfare of kids, even in the wake of a disaster.

The Office of Management and Budget is also compiling a list of onerous and anti-growth federal regulations that would be suspended in the hurricane region. This should include environmental rules and mandates that have closed down the oil refinery business in this critical national oil, gas and energy hub. And we're glad to see Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta reporting, in a letter to us on Monday, that highway reconstruction is already under way using bonus incentives to reward faster work.

The price tag for these proposals would be a tiny fraction of the cost of a federally directed welfare state/public works effort, which seems to be the choice of Democrats -- and too many Republicans. Congress has already appropriated $62 billion in federal aid and another $100 billion is in the works. That's all new spending, by the way; a better option would be to divert money from pork-barrel projects to Katrina relief. (See below.)

It was through a combination of local civic organizations and business investment that other proud American cities were rebuilt after other disasters. At least one-half of the structures in San Francisco were toppled or burned to the ground, and a quarter million Californians left homeless, by the Great Earthquake of 1906. Within three years the city was rebuilt without any FEMA aid, Small Business Administration loans or federal housing assistance.

Similarly the Chicago Fire of 1871 razed virtually every building in the entire downtown business district (save for the famous Water Tower), while scores of outlying neighborhoods were destroyed. As a recent report from the Foundation for Economic Education details: "Within two years this burned city had been almost completely rebuilt through private aid and initiative." The group that so heroically coordinated the entire relief effort, including housing 157,000 suddenly homeless people and employing tens of thousands of others, was the Chicago Relief and Aid Society.

It is precisely in this spirit of compassion, enterprise and business acumen that New Orleans should be restored to its past glory. Congressman Bobby Jindal, who represents a large slice of New Orleans and whose own home has been nearly destroyed, warns that now is not the time for a bidding war of spending between the two parties. Rather, he says, "We now have a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to let the free market policies that we know will work for New Orleans flourish." And if it works there, why not everywhere?

Sleight Of Budgeting (NYT)

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

The decision by Congressional leaders to delay action on their tax-and-spending bills was most welcome. The bills' broad outlines were drawn up pre-Katrina, and were objectionable even then: spending cuts totaling $35 billion over five years in programs for low- and moderate-income families, and $70 billion in new tax breaks, mostly for the most affluent families. Counting interest, the bills would increase the deficit by $40 billion over five years.

Post-Katrina, those plans would be scandalous, highlighting the skewed priorities that have put the country into a tight financial spot as it copes both with hurricane damage, and with the social and economic rifts that Katrina has exposed.

Unfortunately, it's increasingly unclear why Congress imposed the delay. (The deadlines were shifted into October and early November.) Initially, it appeared that lawmakers needed time to recast their priorities - away from budget cuts that would reduce the aid for hurricane victims and other needy Americans, and away from high-end tax cuts that would needlessly starve the Treasury at a time of mounting rebuilding costs.

Now, however, it appears that postponement may be only a tactical move to recast Katrina as the event that requires Congress to hack away at existing programs to pre-empt unacceptably large deficits from reconstruction spending. That's false.

Katrina cannot and should not be paid for by cutting government programs, unless the goal is to end up with a government that's even less effective than it was before Katrina. True, there's fat that Congress should trim. But even if members of Congress were willing to rescind the porkiest of the pork spending they approved in the highway bill passed last summer, doing that would raise about $24 billion.

That would be a nice offset for the estimated $200 billion price tag for Katrina, but hardly enough. Bigger cuts that have been suggested, like delaying the start of the Medicare drug coverage plan, are not workable, not to mention political nonstarters for President Bush and for Republican leaders.

What is needed most is more revenue, and that requires Congress to stop cutting taxes.

But Congress appears to be angling to proceed with business as usual while disguising what it is doing. If all goes according to plan, Congress will take up the spending-cut bill weeks before the tax-cut bill.

That would be the first time lawmakers had split such deficit-bloating legislation into two separate bills, raising the suspicion that they're trying to hide the fact that $35 billion in spending cuts, heartless and misguided as they are, would be used to help pay for the $70 billion in new tax breaks - not for deficit reduction and certainly not for Katrina.

The lawmakers' only responsible course of action is to give up on tax cuts, but they are balking. Wedded to tax cuts himself, President Bush cannot lead them where they need to go. It's up to the American people to push their representatives in the right direction.

To Rebuild New Orleans (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

After Hurricane Katrina flooded New Orleans, federal officials warned that the city could be underwater for three months or more. Instead, aided by hot sun and clear skies, the Army Corps of Engineers expects to have the streets of New Orleans pumped dry by the end of this week — provided, of course, that Hurricane Rita doesn't send the water right back over the city's weakened levees.

The pumps' progress led Mayor C. Ray Nagin to start the city's revival too early. On Sunday, Nagin invited residents of the Algiers neighborhood to return home, then rescinded the invitation the next day as Rita bore down on the Gulf of Mexico.

As this episode illustrates, it's time for officials on the Gulf Coast to shift from the pedal-to-the-metal urgency of the rescue efforts to the more deliberate pace of reconstruction. As important as it is to rebuild New Orleans and let evacuees return to their homes and jobs, it's even more critical to ensure that the rebuilt version of the Big Easy does not simply mimic the one Katrina laid to waste — a city ridden by poverty and unemployment, with the poorest residents living in the areas most vulnerable to flooding.

That kind of economic resuscitation will require both a willingness to try new approaches and an attention to history. This country has learned much in the last 40 years about how to revive a city (and, sadly, how not to). New Orleans, more than any city in the nation, can be the beneficiary of those lessons.

Government has three basic, interrelated tasks: rebuilding the city's infrastructure, reviving its economy and resettling its population.

DOJ_NMG_0007257

President Bush has pledged that Washington will cover the bulk of the cost of rebuilding New Orleans' roads, bridges, sewers and other public works. Because these are expensive projects that will consume most of Washington's Katrina relief budget, federal and state officials should look for ways to put private dollars to work — for example, by joining forces with private companies to share the cost of toll roads and bridges, then splitting the revenue.

The city's human infrastructure is badly in need of repairs too. Although the investment will take years to yield dividends, the city needs better schools to help residents climb out of poverty and make the city more attractive to employers. The private sector could play an important role here too, through efforts such as charter schools.

To revive New Orleans' economy, Bush has proposed creating "Gulf Opportunity Zones." Similar to the "enterprise zones" that have been declared across the country since the 1980s, these would offer about $2 billion worth of tax breaks and loan subsidies to businesses that build and equip offices in Katrina's wake.

Although some analysts are enthusiastic about enterprise zones, they may not be the best way to encourage New Orleans' recovery. In general, most new jobs emanate from new, small businesses, which don't benefit much from tax breaks because they don't have much taxable income. By contrast, the beneficiaries of enterprise zones often are established businesses that move their offices into the zone to lower their tax burden.

If the goal is to help the economy of New Orleans without siphoning jobs from other cities, policymakers need to find ways to help entrepreneurs create jobs there that residents can and want to fill. That means making it easier and more profitable for companies to create jobs for local residents, and making it easier for residents to do the work.

Education is obviously key to that effort, and so is housing. On the housing front, the administration plans to spend $5 billion to place evacuees in 300,000 mobile homes, trailers and other temporary structures. This plan has drawn flak from both sides of the political spectrum, and rightly so. The "temporary" enclaves isolate evacuees, rather than letting them resettle close to where they can find work. The better approach is to stick with vouchers that evacuees can use to rent housing in the communities of their choice.

Hundreds of thousands of homes were damaged by Katrina and subsequent flooding, and roughly half of the homeowners in New Orleans carried flood insurance. The rest, along with many of Katrina's other victims along the Gulf Coast, are left to haggle with their insurance companies over how much of their loss was caused by Katrina's winds, which would be covered by homeowner's insurance. The federal government can help both groups by offering adjusters assistance in calculating losses and mediators assistance in determining their cause.

For the city's poorest residents, the government should follow Baltimore's example and build low-rise, mixed-income developments that are proving more resistant to crime than the projects they replaced. Planners now have a better understanding of how to design low-income housing to discourage crime. They will have an opportunity in New Orleans to use what they've learned from the successes and failures of numerous American urban renewal projects.

Finally, as Congress and the administration open the federal spigot to aid the Gulf Coast, the public has the right to know exactly where its money is going — and the obligation to share the pain.

Taxpayers have put up more than $60 billion for the rescue and recovery effort so far, and may be asked to spend three times that amount on the Gulf Coast. The best protections against waste and misuse are to ensure that contractors compete for all the projects and publicly account for their spending.

At the same time, Congress should plan to pay off the massive spending on Katrina over the next few years rather than adding to the already burgeoning deficit. The burden should be spread broadly by cutting or postponing far-reaching programs; a good place to start would be the $25 billion that Congress recently authorized for lawmakers' pet highway projects across the country.

And it almost goes without saying that new tax cuts are simply unthinkable — at least until the federal budget has joined New Orleans in recovering from Katrina.

Cuts For Katrina (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Last week we suggested that cancellation of $25 billion in pork projects -- euphemistically known as "earmarks" -- in the recently passed Highway Bill would be a good first step to offset some of the cost of rebuilding the infrastructure in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast.

The idea of a pork-for-reconstruction swap had already been denounced as "moronic" by a spokesman for Don Young of Alaska, Chairman of the House Transportation Committee and proud father of the now-infamous $223 million "bridge to nowhere" near Ketchikan. Since then the White House and Congressional Republican leadership have been acting as if the cost of Katrina relief should have no impact on the course of an administration that has presided over the fastest growth in discretionary spending since Lyndon Johnson.

But thankfully, a grassroots Internet campaign and a handful of House GOP conservatives have refused to give up on the idea that spending cuts should be found to defray the estimated $200 billion federal price tag for hurricane relief. In the Senate, John McCain is proposing a similar pork-for-Katrina swap.

The Internet campaign picks up on the idea of revisiting the earmarks in the Highway Bill. A Web site called Porkbusters (www.truthlaidbear.com/porkbusters.php) helpfully lists these projects by state and directs readers to the appropriate Representatives and Senators to ask what they would cut. Around the country a flood of letters to local newspapers has echoed the theme.

And if revisiting the Highway Bill is too much to ask, how about a one-year moratorium on all non-defense earmarks for fiscal 2006? Rep. Ron Lewis (R., Kentucky) proposes just that in a "Dear Colleague" letter dated Monday. Other suggestions include across-the-board spending cuts at federal agencies of 2.5 cents on the dollar and delaying the introduction of the Medicare drug benefit by a year. We should be hearing more today when members of the House Republican Study Committee -- led by consistent spending hawks such as Mike Pence, Jeb Hensarling and Jeff Flake -- announce "Operation Offset" and a list of specific options to find savings in the budget.

White House flaks have been sending out emails claiming the new spending is mandated by a 1988 law called the Stafford Act. But the idea that somehow the government is on automatic pilot and that expenditures cannot be restrained by Congress or the President is irresponsible and even insidious. It is a basic principle of Constitutional law that no Congress can mandate expenditures by a future one. And while the Stafford Act does suggest that temporary infrastructure repair after major disasters is a federal responsibility, it does not justify why 41 states should receive Katrina aid and it certainly doesn't relieve Republicans of their fiscal duty to identify offsetting cuts.

The startling bottom line on Bush administration profligacy is this: At $22,000 per household, federal spending is at an inflation-adjusted post-World War II high and set to go still higher soon as the Baby Boomers start drawing Medicare and Social Security. Reforming those entitlements will be tough enough. And voters will have good reason not to want to entrust that task to a party that can't even admit the wastefulness of bridges to nowhere in the wake of the new century's worst hurricane.

Governors Ask For Inquiry On Oil Prices (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

CHICAGO, Sept. 20 - The governors of eight states sent a letter on Tuesday to President Bush and Congress calling for an investigation into profits made by oil companies after Hurricane Katrina and asking for legislation that would require the companies to refund to customers any profits deemed excess.

"When the wholesale price of gas went up by 60 cents almost overnight, oil companies were obviously using the most devastating natural disaster in our nation's history to reap a windfall at the expense of American consumers," said the letter, which was initiated by Gov. James E. Doyle of Wisconsin and was signed by governors from Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Montana, New Mexico, Oregon and Washington.

"To price-gouge consumers under normal circumstances is dishonest enough," the letter stated, "but to make money off the severe misfortune of others is downright immoral."

The letter cited an analysis by Donald A. Nichols, an economics professor at the University of Wisconsin at Madison, who reported that gas prices surged disproportionately compared with crude oil price increases. The price markup from crude oil to gasoline has almost tripled since the hurricane, the report said.

OPEC Drops Cartel Role And Says Pump All You Can (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

VIENNA, Sept. 20 - Oil prices slipped Tuesday on signs that the direction of Hurricane Rita was shifting away from America's energy heartland and OPEC formally agreed to lift all restrictions on its oil sales for the next three months, in a move aimed at further reassuring markets still on edge over the security of energy supplies.

On Monday, energy prices surged 7 percent, to $67 a barrel, on worries that Hurricane Rita was headed for the main oil-producing areas of the Gulf of Mexico. The latest predictions somewhat eased those fears but still suggested that the hurricane could affect offshore facilities and refineries along the coast of Texas. Another shift in the storm late Tuesday night pushed oil prices up in after-hours trading.

After OPEC's two-day meeting, Saudi Arabia, the largest and most influential member, rallied the oil-producing group to support its 18-month-long campaign to sell as much oil as consumers ask for.

Saudi Arabia, which always keeps some idle capacity to compensate for unexpected production shortages, has been pumping above its official production ceiling since May 2004.

OPEC's decision effectively freezes the group's two-decade quota system originally intended to prevent prices from dropping too low and instead legitimizes - at least temporarily - a production free-for-all intended to bring prices down. Even so, because of shortages in refining capacity in the United States, Ali al-Naimi, oil minister of Saudi Arabia, admitted there might be few takers for the oil, but he stressed the decision's psychological impact.

"OPEC went out of its way and offered all the spare capacity that it has, recognizing that maybe there is no demand, but offering it so that consumers can feel comfortable that the supply is there," said Mr. Naimi, the group's most influential representative.

OPEC has so far seemed powerless to rein in soaring prices, which have doubled since the beginning of 2004. Even so, some members like Iran and Venezuela, were reluctant to back the Saudi strategy. Both countries produce below their quota levels, but do not want to give the Saudis a freer hand.

Still, members of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries agreed to pledge all their remaining extra capacity to the market, saying they could supply an additional two million barrels of oil a day - amounting to 7 percent of the group's current output.

Mr. Naimi said OPEC's extra oil would be made available immediately - and without any discounts. "If the people don't want the crude, it is better for it to stay underground," he said during a 15-minutes interview with a handful of reporters after the meeting. Though they are now reaping record revenue, oil producers also recognize that excessively high prices could crimp demand. The foreign minister of Saudi Arabia, Prince Saud al-Faisal, said in New York on Tuesday that he would be happy to see oil prices fall to a level of $35 to $40 a barrel, but he cautioned that this "would not happen right now."

Hurricane Katrina, which struck the gulf's energy hub three weeks ago, curbed production from the offshore region and idled four major refineries along the coast, which amount to 5 percent of domestic capacity. Flooded after the storm, these plants will be out of commission until November at the earliest.

Saudi Arabia, which pumped 9.6 million barrels a day in September, has about 1.5 million barrels a day of extra capacity on call. It plans to increase its capacity by an additional 300,000 barrels a day, to a total of 11.3 million barrels, by next spring. More additions are planned through 2010 to bring the country's total capacity to 12.5 million barrels a day.

Other OPEC producers, like Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates and Nigeria, have 500,000 barrels a day of idle capacity. The group currently pumps 28.3 million barrels a day, excluding Iraq, or about a third of world production. With Iraq, whose exports are constrained by the insurgency, OPEC's 11 nations produce 30.2 million barrels a day.Facing criticism that it was not investing enough to add capacity, OPEC also outlined some long-term plans. These call for expanding capacity to 38 million barrels a day by 2010.

Mr. Naimi said he would be happy if buyers called for more supplies - and called OPEC's hand.

"Yes, yes, I hope they do," he said. "We'll make more money. All they have to do is test. We want to move this crude and sell it, if the price is right. We are businessmen after all."

Western governments coordinated the release of 60 million barrels of oil to make up for shortfalls after Hurricane Katrina. But only a fraction of that oil was actually bought by refiners who are struggling to make up for their losses. This makes it unlikely that OPEC will actually sell any more oil than it currently does. "OPEC has done the perfect P.R. move," said Roger Diwan, a managing director at PFC Energy. "It's a hands-down victory for OPEC in the political battle. No barrel of oil is actually involved here."

OPEC Suspends Its Output Quotas (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

VIENNA -- In a bid to reassure markets that its members are free to pump all the crude oil they can, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries yesterday suspended its output quotas for the fourth quarter.

Still, at a time when every oil producer except Saudi Arabia is producing flat-out, the move is unlikely to have much effect on world oil prices. OPEC ministers said the cartel could produce as much as two million barrels a day more of crude for consumers at market prices, but industry observers doubt that OPEC has anywhere near that much unused pumping capacity.

Observers instead watched Hurricane Rita, which is moving toward offshore oil and natural-gas production assets in the Gulf of Mexico that last month's Hurricane Katrina missed. The U.S. government reported that 58% of oil production and 35% of gas were shut off in the Gulf yesterday.

Industry watchers also worry about the potential for Rita to damage Houston-area refineries. The regions around Houston and New Orleans are the two biggest refinery centers in the U.S.; combined, the areas pump out one-third of the nation's gasoline. On New York futures markets, oil, natural gas and gasoline fell, but remained at elevated levels. (See related article.)

Saudi Arabia for more than a year has promised to produce extra oil to tame gyrating petroleum markets. But the International Energy Agency's chief, Claude Mandil, yesterday estimated that all of OPEC could pump between half and three-quarters of the two million barrels extra that the cartel's members claim.

Nor is this extra crude capacity likely to be tapped to any significant degree by refineries, unless there are new supply disruptions. Refineries already are working flat-out to meet rising world demand and can't process any more oil, especially the heavy-sulfur kind that OPEC has left.

"What OPEC has offered is short-term insurance to consumers on the crude-oil front," said Vera de Ladoucette, an analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates in Paris. "It removes any remaining doubt about OPEC's willingness to produce to its maximum capacity."

The cartel's members, including Saudi Arabia, the world's largest oil exporter, haven't in fact been constrained by output quotas since May of last year. During this time, Saudi Arabia's oil minister repeatedly has pledged to produce as much as the kingdom's capacity of 11 million barrels a day if customers want the oil. Yesterday, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi said the kingdom was producing about 9.6 million barrels a day this month, well in excess of its current quota of 9.1 million barrels a day.

As for discounting oil to push more supplies onto world markets to drive down the price, Mr. Naimi said: "Absolutely not. I don't want to bring it on the market unless the consumer wants it at the commercial rate."

Mr. Naimi also said the kingdom's oil-output capacity was likely to rise by 300,000 barrels a day to 11.3 million barrels next spring, when the kingdom brings on line a field called Haradh. Further output-capacity increases are scheduled for 2007, when more of Saudi Arabia's fast-track field developments are completed.

The Paris-based IEA has forecast that, after 2010, oil output outside OPEC will have peaked, leaving the world totally reliant on extra supplies from the cartel to fuel economic growth. In Russia, President Vladimir Putin has backed plans to offer tax holidays to companies developing new oil fields, after a top government official warned that the recent slowdown in oil-production growth could worsen next year.

In the early years of this decade, Russia was the main source of new crude oil on world markets, delivering annual production increases of more than 10% and rivaling Saudi Arabia as the world's largest producer. But the Kremlin's dismantling and partial nationalization last year of OAO Yukos, once the country's most dynamic producer, have combined with higher tax rates to cast a pall over the industry, and production so far this year is up only 1.3% from last year. Industry officials don't expect any significant recovery in output in the near future, since proposed tax changes are still months away from final approval, and new oil projects take years to develop.

By Masood Farivar and Katya Kazakina

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Oil prices dropped more than $1 a barrel but held on to most of Monday's sharp advance, as Hurricane Rita headed toward the Gulf Coast.

Projections made early yesterday that Rita would miss the Houston area refineries triggered a drop of more than $2 a barrel in oil prices. But prices recovered much of those losses as Rita strengthened to a Category 2 hurricane, with winds of 100 miles per hour and the pace of evacuations from offshore rigs picked up.

"The way this is going to enter, it's going to impact most of the Gulf," said Ted Falgout, the director of Port Fourchon, a major port servicing the offshore oil and gas industry. "You can't be leaving people in the path of the storm just because it's predicted to go to Texas."

Mr. Falgout's job as director of a port that handles workers and equipment moving to and from offshore rigs gives him a good perspective on the breadth of activity in the Gulf. Fourchon's significance has been augmented since Hurricane Katrina all but wiped out another important offshore services port in Venice, La.

Companies, including such oil majors Royal Dutch Shell PLC, BP PLC and Chevron Corp., began evacuating staff Monday. Murphy Oil Corp., Marathon Oil Corp. and Apache Corp. are also bringing workers back ashore.

Refineries in the Houston area, representing about 13% of total U.S. processing capacity, continued to operate normally as they began to respond to the storm threat by securing their facilities and developing operating plans.

At the New York Mercantile Exchange, the October crude contract ended $1.16 lower at $66.23. Petroleum products, which advanced more than 10% Monday, posted bigger losses but ended well off their intraday lows by 4 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0007261

October gasoline, up nearly 25 cents at one point Monday, closed at $1.9766 a gallon, down 6.61 cents on the day. October heating oil, up more than 20 cents Monday, ended at $2.0113, down 2.71 cents.

While worries about disruptions to energy infrastructure have eased a bit, forecasters and analysts warned that Rita's track and strength could change as it moves westward.

The pullback in prices came as the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, meeting in Vienna, decided to leave its official output target unchanged but to make some two million barrels a day in unused production capacity available as of Oct. 1.

Officials, expressing concern about the latest price rise, said the move to make all of the cartel's extra capacity available was meant to reassure consumers on supplies.

In other commodity markets:

COFFEE: Futures on the New York Board of Trade rose as funds exited previously established short positions amid rumors that some coffee stored in New Orleans will be decertified by Nybot officials after damage from Katrina. Buying interest was also fueled by concerns Rita could either inflict more damage to coffee stockpiles located in New Orleans or damage coffee stockpiles located in Houston. Coffee for September delivery rose 7.3 cents a pound, to 91.75 cents.

Bush Signs Katrina-related Flood Insurance Bill (REU-Y2)

Reuters, September 21, 2005

President George W. Bush on Tuesday signed legislation to increase the borrowing authority of the government's flood insurance program to $3.5 billion from $1.5 billion to pay claims from Hurricane Katrina.

The legislation increases the borrowing authority of the National Flood Insurance Program that is administered by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The program offers low-cost flood insurance to homeowners and small business owners in high-risk areas where it might otherwise not be available.

The program does not use government funds, but is allowed to borrow from the Treasury if necessary to pay claims.

Some analysts have expressed concern that the new borrowing authority was not enough and would have to be increased again to handle Katrina-related claims.

The National Flood Insurance Program pays up to $250,000 for residential buildings, and another $100,000 for contents that are lost. It also pays up to $500,000 for nonresidential buildings and $500,000 for their contents.

Bush also signed into law a bill to exclude federal financial assistance for flooding from being considered income, so that the recipient's eligibility for other government benefits would not be affected.

Flooding Victims To Get Funds Quicker (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 21, 2005

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is loosening the claims process for its flood-insurance program so Hurricane Katrina victims can get paid even if insurance adjusters can't get to the area.

The move comes as thousands of displaced homeowners and businesses cope with an impaired banking system and try to figure out how to pay for food, shelter and relocation.

“A lot of people don't even have homes,” says Michael Buckley, a FEMA deputy division director. “Rather than trying to agonize over the details” in clear cases of flood damage to homes and businesses, people will be able to get the temporary financial assistance they need, he says.

FEMA is urging the 100 private insurers that handle federal flood claims to advance $3,000 to policyholders from their coverage. FEMA also wants them to ease the requirement that policyholders provide flood loss proof through pictures or other documentation.

Insurance companies typically cover wind and wind-driven rain damage, but not flood losses. Insurers do, however, sell federal flood policies and service the claims for the federal government.

The majority of home and business owners don't have federal flood coverage. Only 34% of homeowners and 23% of businesses in the affected areas have it, FEMA estimates. The policies pay a maximum of $250,000 for damage to a home and $100,000 for damage to contents. Businesses get up to $500,000 each for property and content damage.

FEMA expects to shell out significantly more in Katrina-related flood losses than the record $2 billion payout for 2004's four hurricanes, Buckley says.

FEMA is not mandating the $3,000 payments, but many insurers are expected to provide them. Companies are “doing everything they can to get rid of red tape and bureaucracy,” says Julie Rochman, spokeswoman for the American Insurance Association.

DOJ_NMG_0007262

Travelers started advancing policyholders $3,000 from their flood-content coverage a few days after Katrina hit.

"We took a bit of a chance" because FEMA hadn't given guidance at that time, says Ed Charlebois, a Travelers vice president. But, "obviously, these folks had been devastated by what happened."

State Farm and Allstate also have been advancing funds if policyholders have coverage for flood damage to contents. Separately, many insurers are providing two weeks' worth of living expenses under homeowner policies to those who have been evacuated.

Homeowners insurance typically pays for expenses, including food and lodging, if the government calls for an evacuation due to hurricane winds or if wind damage makes a house unlivable.

Flood insurance, however, does not pay for those costs, so money doled out on those policies will be deducted from the total coverage amount.

Rethinking Flood Insurance (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

Like a rickety house that was already falling down, the federal flood insurance program has been destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. The theory of the program is that people who choose to live in areas prone to flooding should pay for that risk by buying insurance; they should not expect taxpayers around the country to rescue them from their own recklessness. But the truth is that, after a disaster like Katrina, the federal government will bail everybody out whether they are insured or not; it's humanly and politically unthinkable to do otherwise. Because the likelihood of a federal rescue is so strong, there never was much incentive to buy insurance. The huge federal effort after Katrina will undermine the program further.

The first response must be to make flood insurance compulsory, as auto insurance is. Currently, homeowners have to buy flood insurance if they live in a flood-prone area and they have a mortgage through a federally regulated or insured lender. But other mortgage providers escape this requirement; besides, people who own their homes outright are free to go uninsured, and many who buy insurance as a condition of their mortgage let the coverage lapse later. As a result, fewer than half of the homes in New Orleans had coverage, and the rate in Mississippi was much lower. To improve this situation, Congress needs to mandate coverage for everyone and then come up with a mechanism to enforce compliance. Regulators could oblige insurers that offer homeowners' policies to bundle flood insurance into their protection against fire, theft and so on. Or public authorities could collect flood insurance premiums at the same time they collect property taxes.

The second response must be to price flood insurance properly. In a vain attempt to persuade homeowners to buy coverage, the current system is subsidized; this allows people to build houses in exposed locations and then collect a federal check when the inevitable occurs, sometimes repeatedly. By pricing flood insurance accurately, the government would create price signals that would drive housing development to higher, drier land. Those who remain determined to live below sea level or on the beach -- or developers who put up low-income rental units in these places -- would pay the full cost of their preference. In some areas that have acute shortages of safe land -- New Orleans being one -- this may inflict hardship on the poor. But the best way to address that is to offer means-tested subsidies in a few jurisdictions, not to offer subsidies to rich and poor alike all over the nation.

Compulsory, fully priced insurance would in theory achieve the best of all worlds: It would ensure flood victims of compensation, it would protect taxpayers and it would deter risky construction. But in the real world the purchase of insurance policies will be less than complete, and accurate pricing of insurance risks would require inspecting every beach house to determine the quality of its flood precautions -- which is not likely to be practical. It may therefore be necessary to reinforce the federal construction standards in areas prone to flooding. If the feds are expected to come to the rescue in the event of a flood, it's reasonable to ask that zoning rules limit this liability.

How You Pay For People To Build In Flood Zones (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Katrina was a devastating storm; Rita may well become one. But it is misleading to call such hurricanes natural disasters. (Related: Opposing view)

Storms become disasters only if they hit population centers. Otherwise, they're of interest mainly to scientists and weather buffs but are like the proverbial tree that falls in the forest to the rest of us.

These days, however, there isn't much chance a major hurricane could come ashore in the USA and not become a disaster: 54% of Americans live within 50 miles of a shoreline, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. By 2025, three-quarters of the country is projected to live in such communities.

This unprecedented march to the sea has been abetted by unwise government policies that encourage living along the coast. Principal among them: the National Flood Insurance Program.

Started in 1968, federal flood insurance subsidizes development in coastal areas and other regions subject to flooding by offering insurance at bargain rates underwritten by the government.

As of last year, about 4.6 million policies were in effect with an average annual premium of $438. These premiums are nowhere near enough to cover the program's losses. Earlier this month, Congress authorized the program to borrow $3.5 billion for Katrina-related payments, an amount most experts believe is just the beginning and few believe will be repaid by property owners.

The program not only brings big government into an area better left to private enterprise, it also achieves the opposite of its goal. By lowering the cost of maintaining a home on flood-prone lands, it increases the populations in these areas. That in turn leads to more, and more costly, disasters.

According to the Heinz Center for Science, Economics and the Environment, a non-partisan think tank, development density in flood-prone areas has grown dramatically since the advent of federal flood insurance. Before its enactment, lands subject to flooding were 25% less densely developed on average than comparable land not subject to flooding. Since then, the figure has closed to 15%.

Other problems with the program:

·Passing the buck. Private insurers have an incentive to claim that most hurricane damage is caused by storm surges (which are covered by the federal flood insurance) rather than by winds (which private insurers cover). Mississippi is investigating claims that some adjusters pressured homeowners in Katrina's path to sign waivers saying that their homes were destroyed by water.

· Lack of long-term planning. The government makes little or no attempt to quantify the financial risk it is exposed to through its insurance program, which provides more than three-quarters of a trillion dollars in coverage. That makes it difficult for the public to debate what should be done to protect coastal communities.

The government does, to be sure, have a vital role to play in identifying flood-prone areas. But the actual issuance of policies should be left to the private sector.

True, that would lead to higher premiums because private insurers can't run to Congress for money to cover their losses. But then why should taxpayers in Kansas subsidize insurance for people who live in Florida? And why should those Kansans — or anyone, for that matter — want to underwrite a system that each year helps put more people and property in harm's way?

After 37 years, it's time to recognize federal flood insurance for what it is: a disaster.

Premiums Offset Costs (USAT)

By Richard Baker

USA Today, September 21, 2005

In response to Hurricane Katrina, Congress has unanimously passed legislation I helped introduce, which will allow the National Flood Insurance Program (NFIP) to borrow up to $3.5 billion a year from the U.S. Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $1.5 billion. If this sounds like part of a massive federal taxpayer-funded recovery of the Gulf Coast region, it's not. On the contrary, this is one of the few expenditures in which the taxpayers will not have to contribute. (Related: Our view)

All claims under the NFIP are paid using premiums of policyholders, not taxpayer revenue, and the funds the NFIP borrows from the Treasury must be repaid, with interest. Far from being a subsidy, the NFIP is just about the only federal disaster program in which the victims pay in advance to pick up the tab for the recovery of their losses.

To give an example, in 2001 Tropical Storm Allison, the costliest at the time, produced damages estimated at $5 billion, nearly all of it from flooding in the Houston area. As a result, 2001 saw the highest expenditure in the NFIP's history, with claims exceeding $1.4 billion — or, put another way, about a third of the damages were met not by taxpayers but by NFIP premiums. These losses were more than covered because premiums collected that year exceeded $1.7 billion.

Given this history, and knowing the federal expenditures for disaster relief mandated by law, does anyone doubt that taxpayer resources will pour into Katrina-stricken communities? Why, then, would anyone complain about a program that reduces the taxpayer burden, and actually works according to an old-fashioned concept whereby those who might be impacted pay a premium to fund recovery from the next disaster?

Before the creation of the NFIP, flood-plain management never existed. Today, every community that participates must develop flood-control plans and take steps to mitigate repetitive-loss properties. The more a community does, the better its residents' premiums. According to NFIP's statistics, flood damage is reduced by nearly $1 billion a year through partnerships with communities, the insurance industry and lenders. Every $3 paid in claims saves $1 in disaster assistance payments. And finally, buildings constructed to NFIP standards suffer approximately 80% less damage annually than those that are not.

The question isn't why we need the NFIP. The real question is why it's not used more.

Back To Trent Lott's House (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

"Out of the rubbles of Trent Lott's house -- he's lost his entire house -- there's going to be a fantastic house. And I'm looking forward to sitting on the porch."

-- George W. Bush, Sept. 2

Now that a suitable interval has passed, perhaps it's time to return to the question of Sen. Trent Lott's house. What interests me is not the now-tired question of whether the president ought to have promised to rebuild the Mississippi senator's family home on the Pascagoula beachfront before mentioning the lost homes of thousands of much poorer, less notorious people. What interests me is why his house was built on the beach in the first place.

At first glance, the answer appears simple. Although I haven't had the pleasure of visiting the senator's home, it's pretty safe to guess that he wanted to live by the water because it's psychologically soothing and aesthetically pleasing. It's quieter too, having seagulls instead of neighbors. It's nicer to sit on the porch.

But it's also true that many people build houses along the water because it makes economic sense to do so. Houses or apartments with ocean views command higher prices. Beachfront property owners can demand higher rents. Beachside businesses -- casinos, hotels, restaurants -- spin money. And, best of all, the risks of owning beachfront property -- risks from floods, hurricanes and erosion -- are covered by other people. Federally subsidized flood insurance programs and state-subsidized beach "re-nourishment" programs ensure that taxpayers -- rich, poor, local, national -- pay for damage to property built close to the water. To put it differently, Lott's house was on the beach because you and I paid for it.

Barring an unforeseen dose of political sanity, we're about to subsidize the reconstruction and even the expansion of more susceptible beachfront communities too. Leave aside New Orleans for a moment, with its special history and its peculiar geography. Focus instead on the rest of the Gulf Coast, much of which was wiped out no less thoroughly. Just like other hurricane-prone, flood-prone, erosion-prone parts of the country -- the Florida Keys, the Outer Banks, the Texas and California coasts -- the Gulf Coast recently has experienced an extraordinary building boom. In 2003 approximately 153 million people lived in U.S. coastal counties, an increase of 33 million people since 1980. By 2008, 7 million more will probably have moved there, too.

As a result of this success, beach developers tend to be disproportionately wealthy and politically influential, and therefore unusually good at fighting zoning laws and grabbing subsidies. Even after Hurricane Andrew forced Florida to establish stricter building codes, the owners of hot Florida Panhandle real estate managed to get a raft of exemptions for their region. One North Carolina beach community, Emerald Isle, has collected millions of dollars in state and federal money to combat erosion -- even though some 80 percent of Emerald Isle's new artificial beach is privately owned and inaccessible to the public, which paid for it. As The Post's Michael Grunwald recently pointed out, Lott himself used his political clout to force an Army engineer out of his job after the man had the temerity to suggest that Mississippi stop building casinos along the flood-prone coast. Twenty of those casinos were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, and the 16,000 people who worked in them have lost their jobs and probably their homes as well.

The pattern doesn't hold across the country, away from the ocean: Entire towns happily moved uphill after catastrophic flooding in the Midwest in the 1990s, when the government paid them to leave. But with a few exceptions, coastal victims of hurricanes and floods have not only refused to move inland, they've also used post-disaster government funding to build more and higher buildings, with fewer restrictions then ever before.

To reverse this trend, politicians would have to do a lot more than write checks and come up with neat new names for old housing programs. Instead, they would have to force coastal property owners to pay the real cost of the risk they incur by building in dangerous places. They would not only have to stop subsidizing flood insurance, they also would have to require developers to pay heavier taxes and higher insurance premiums. They would have to alter incentives in order to encourage building farther inland. They would have to enforce stricter building codes. In barrier islands and other truly unstable places, zoning laws should prevent any new construction at all.

Such proposals would, of course, be the kiss of death for almost any politician. After all, they go against two important American principles: property owners' right to build what they want, and the government's obligation to bail them out afterward. Those are the principles supported by the rugged inhabitants of Denver and Los Angeles, who build houses ever closer to forests that periodically burn, and those are the principles supported by the denizens of seaside Pascagoula. At least when President Bush finally gets around to drinking his alcohol-free mint julep on Lott's new porch, we can hope that he raises a glass to those of us who made it all possible.

First Lady Tackles Poverty, Race Issues (AJC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Laura Bush, former inner-city teacher, says Hurricane Katrina could have a silver lining if it forces the nation to respond "in a different way" to difficult poverty and racial problems.

"A large percentage of our population probably doesn't realize what inner cities are really like and has looked away from that," Bush told The Associated Press in an interview Tuesday.

The first lady sat down in the White House's Map Room to promote this weekend's National Book Festival, a daylong event on the National Mall that she has put on in concert with the Library of Congress for five years — a tradition she started as first lady of Texas.

But she readily allowed the brief interview to range beyond books to more difficult issues like Katrina and the Supreme Court vacancy now before President Bush. With her popularity in polls twice that of her husband's, which is stuck at a record-low level, Mrs. Bush often plays the president's chief defender and puts a smiling, trusted face on administration policies.

Mrs. Bush has been to the Gulf Coast four times, once alongside her husband, and has held events around Washington devoted to the hurricane response. Her husband, beset with criticism about the government's initial response to Katrina, traveled to the region for a fifth time Tuesday and is returning again this weekend.

"He has to. That's his job," Mrs. Bush said matter-of-factly. "That's what happens when you run for president. You don't know what might happen like this."

Then, in a wifely endorsement, she said, "Fortunately he is really strong and so I'm confident that he'll be able to sustain the level of attention that he'll have to — and not just to that, also to the war in Iraq, to foreign policy and to all the other issues that are on the desk of the president of the United States."

With her husband called upon — and promising — to take bold new action on racial inequities in the wake of the storm, Mrs. Bush held up the 2002 No Child Left Behind education law as the signature example of how the Bush administration has been fighting poverty from the start. White House aides say the law is fueling higher achievement levels, particularly for poor and minority students — though there is little data yet to prove that such a new law deserves all the credit for recent gains in narrowing the achievement gap between younger whites and minorities.

But she said she also hopes for a broader national discussion of poverty and race. "I think it's really important for us to talk about it in a different way," said Mrs. Bush, who over three decades ago taught elementary students at an inner-city school in Houston and was a school librarian in a poor Austin neighborhood.

Without offering specifics, she urged policymakers to tackle not only improving education so that poor and minority children have a leg up in life, but increasing the amount of affordable housing stock and the jobs available to those who most need them. She pressed for job training programs, whether through the government or unions or corporations.

"Because of the devastation on the coast, there will be a neighborhood and a housing discussion that'll be possible that really was not possible before," she said. "And then the employment piece of it is also very, very important. ... If a large number of people can come out with skills that they didn't have before, that will be one silver lining."

She pleaded with Americans who have been so generous and focused not to turn away from the staggering need in the Gulf Coast before the job is done.

"That's going to be the hard part for everyone, and that is to sustain the amount of help that evacuees are getting to do the long, long hard work that's going to be required," Mrs. Bush said. "It's particularly hard for Americans, because we're so impatient and we think that everything ought to be fixed yesterday."

As for the book festival, it has added a Katrina focus this year by prominently featuring "Book Relief," a joint project between the Library of Congress and the nonprofit First Book that hopes to deliver 5 million books — up from 100,000 gathered so far — to storm evacuees, libraries and schools whose collections were wiped out.

The first lady repeated her desire to see her husband nominate a woman to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whose retirement will leave Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the Supreme Court's sole female, and said "there are qualified women that are in the pool" of potential nominees being considered.

"It's important to have women in those jobs, just like I think it's important for women to be in every field in our country," she said.

But she hedged on whether the president would heed her wishes.

"Whether it's a woman or a man, I know they'll be highly qualified," she said.

Politics, Priorities Stand In Way Of National War On Poverty (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0007266

By Jill Lawrence
USA Today, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON — Hurricane Katrina brought poor people directly into American living rooms. Then, amid the images of hardship, the Census Bureau said poverty had risen for the fourth straight year.

Is the nation at a crossroads, about to experience a dramatic shift in its politics and priorities?

Hurricane Katrina has sparked hopes and calls for a new national resolve to end poverty. But the public may not be mobilized for such a crusade.

Two-thirds of those in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll this month said the country is not spending enough to fight poverty. Yet such sentiment cannot be attributed to Katrina; 69% said the same thing more than a year ago in a University of Chicago Poll.

Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster, says his pre- and post-Katrina surveys show voter priorities are unchanged. Asked what would most influence their vote for Congress next year, their top issues are Iraq, terrorism and jobs.

Even assuming the public would support a national war on poverty, many analysts say it's not likely to happen. One reason is the cost of Gulf Coast recovery, combined with the expense of the Iraq war and President Bush's drive for more tax cuts. "Yes, Katrina has shined a light on poverty," says Sheila Zedlewski, director of the Income and Benefits Policy Center at the Urban Institute. "But we have a competing problem and that is the federal deficit," which the White House estimated to be $333 billion this year.

Another problem is the divide between liberals and conservatives on how to fight poverty. More government programs or more run by churches? Direct help or tax cuts?

"We all want to solve poverty," says Donald Devine, vice chairman of the American Conservative Union. "The question is, will we do it the way we did it in 1932, or have we learned something since then?"

The New Deal looks pretty good to some Democrats. Former vice presidential nominee John Edwards, director of the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina, praised three Depression-era programs this week and proposed a job creation program for the Gulf Coast. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., wants a Gulf Coast Redevelopment Authority modeled on the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Bush's plan includes tax incentives for business, vouchers to help displaced parents pay for private and parochial schools, relaxed environmental regulations and suspension of a requirement that federal contractors pay workers prevailing local wages. All are part of a long-standing GOP agenda.

Calls for a more expansive fight against poverty are coming from many quarters. First lady Laura Bush told the Associated Press she hopes Katrina helps the country respond "in a different way" to poverty and racial problems. "A large percentage of our population probably doesn't realize what inner cities are really like and has looked away from that," she said Tuesday.

Most of those calling for broad-based action are Democrats or clergy. "We can no longer be a nation that overlooks the poor and the suffering," T.D. Jakes, pastor of a Dallas megachurch, said at a memorial service for Katrina victims.

Edwards, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry are among the Democrats pressing to turn Katrina into a pivotal moment. "Will we be satisfied to only do the immediate: care for the victims and rebuild the city?" Kerry, his party's 2004 presidential nominee, asked Monday in a speech at Brown University. "Or will we be inspired to tackle … the societal injustice that left so many of the least fortunate waiting and praying on those rooftops?"

Charlie Cook, publisher of a political report, says Republicans "need to soften some of their hard edges or run the risk of losing their majorities" in the House and Senate. They would be smart, he says, to talk broadly about fighting poverty.

Zedlewski says Katrina has revealed "a fragmented safety net" with many separate programs and sets of rules. It's so difficult to navigate that there may be bipartisan support for streamlining, she says: "People on both sides of the aisle would like to see this support system work better than it does."

Such consequences would be modest compared with those from the 1911 Triangle Shirtwaist factory fire that led to workplace reforms and the modern labor movement, and the 1927 Mississippi River flood that prompted a government response foreshadowing the New Deal.

But some leaders say even a discussion with no immediate results would be better than the pre-Katrina silence. Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa says his city has the highest poverty rate in the country. "I'm amazed at how little the issue of poverty is raised in the Congress," he says. "Hurricane Katrina is an opportunity for us to engage in that debate."

Rita Nears Category 4 (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook
USA Today, September 21, 2005

MIAMI — Hurricane Rita was forecast to strengthen tonight into a major storm as powerful as Hurricane Katrina, after brushing past the Florida Keys on Tuesday.

Rita's growing strength and its westward track prompted evacuations in Texas, the scrambling of National Guard troops and a dash in Louisiana to shore up levees.

The National Hurricane Center said Rita, with winds above 100 mph, is likely to become a Category 3 hurricane this morning with winds of at least 111 mph. It is then predicted to quickly become a Category 4 with winds of at least 131 mph as it gains strength from the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico, hurricane center specialist Stacy Stewart said. Katrina was a Category 4 storm with winds of 145 mph when it hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

“If Rita goes on to become a Category 4 and remains a Category 4 when it makes landfall, you could have a similar disaster to Katrina,” Stewart said. “People need to take this storm very, very, very seriously.”

Rita was on track to hit Texas by Friday. Galveston County, Texas, ordered an evacuation starting tonight of tens of thousands of residents in coastal island communities. School buses were lined up to ferry those without cars. Gov. Rick Perry ordered 1,200 Texas National Guardsmen on relief duty in Louisiana to return home.

In New Orleans, the Army Corps of Engineers raced to patch levees damaged by Katrina. There was a small chance Rita could swerve toward Louisiana, according to the hurricane center.

“The protection is very tenuous at best,” corps official Dave Wurtzel said of the levees.

The federal government was pouring resources into the region to ensure a rapid response. Helicopters were on standby to carry in water, food and other supplies. The Federal Emergency Management Agency readied aircraft and buses for evacuations. Rescue teams and truckloads of ice, water and prepared meals were being sent to areas in Rita's path.

The warship USS Bataan, laden with hospital supplies and doctors, was shadowing the storm. President Bush received a briefing aboard the USS Iwo Jima, docked in New Orleans. He discussed plans for “what we pray is not a devastating storm.”

Rita ran just south of the Florida Keys on Tuesday. Water and sand washed over some roads.

Gulf Coast Braces As Hurricane Rita Gains Strength (LAT)

By John-thor Dahlburg And Maria L. Laganga
The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2005

FLORIDA KEYS — An intensifying Hurricane Rita gave people here a soaking and a scare today, as the storm roared through this group of isles and islets toward the Gulf Coast.

Though it was unlikely that Rita would directly hit the Keys, there was concern that it would pick up energy and become a serious threat to the Gulf Coast, which is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

"If this is all it is, we have been lucky again," said Monroe County Sheriff Richard Roth. "We've dodged another bullet."

Rita, a Category 2 hurricane with winds of more than 100 mph, is about 50 miles south of Key West and about 65 miles northeast of Havana, Cuba, according to the National Hurricane Center. It was moving toward the Gulf of Mexico, where it was expected to pick up energy from the warm waters and most likely hit Texas by the end of the week.

Some of the storm's effects could be felt as soon as Thursday in New Orleans, slammed when Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29.

According to the Hurricane Center, Rita was moving west at 15 mph, with rainfall in the Keys between 6 to 8 inches. A storm surge of 2 to 4 feet could bring flooding along the Florida coast.

As it moved south of Key West, the archipelago's largest city, the storm whipped up a chocolate-colored surf that poured onto the Overseas Highway, which is only foot above sea level in places, and is the only road link to the mainland United States. The surf left a thick matt of brownish seaweed on the road, along with coconuts and the occasional float torn from a lobster pot.

Sheriff Roth said his deputies and firefighters had been called in to evacuate 12 people who had hunkered down in their trailer park in Islamorada.

Roth estimated that 40,000 people, about half of the year-round population in this popular tourist and fishing destination, had heeded the wish of authorities that they evacuate.

Though proverbially relaxed about the vagaries of tropical weather, many Conchs, as Keys natives are known, had been spooked by the images of flooding and other devastation caused by Katrina, Roth said

"They were quick to leave this time," Roth said, though they had only one day to evacuate.

One factor in the Key's favor was Rita's brisk forward motion, which gave it less time to linger and cause harm with its waves, wind and rain.

DOJ_NMG_0007268

"The more it sits here and stalls, the more damage it does," said Sharon Harrold, a director at the Monroe County sheriff's office. "We like them to move fast. In and out."

As Rita, the third hurricane to strike the United States this year, began to batter the keys, authorities warned residents to stay off the road and hole up in a safe place.

By midday, officials said Highway 1 was flooded in at least eight locations and for all practical purposes cut off from the rest of the county. "The whole Keys, US 1 is impassible," Harrold said, at the county emergency operation center in Marathon, about 45 miles northeast of Key West.

At fire stations throughout the Keys, the red and black flags heralding the coming of the hurricane snapped in the increasingly fierce winds.

The seas around the islands were whipped into a brownish jade color, in places seawater and tossing waves slopped onto roads carrying crabs that then scampered across the asphalt. Palm trees flailed their fronds against a battleship grey sky and the air carried a strong smell of brine.

Though Florida faced four hurricanes last year and three so far in 2005, Roth, the sheriff for the Keys, said the response by authorities was becoming more finally honed with each ordeal.

Florida authorities, he said, had already stockpiled water, ice, gasoline, diesel fuel and other relief supplies at staging areas from Homestead north to Palm Beach. They were just waiting for Rita's winds to die down to bring in whatever was needed.

"I have never seen staging like I have seen in this storm," Roth said. "It's amazing what's available to us — helicopters, Humvees, the National Guard."

On Ohio Key, a trailer park lay partially under water. Further to the south on Big Pine Key, which is home to a federally protected species of deer, no bigger than dogs, the deer preserve was partially flooded. On Big Pine Key Rita's gust were powerful enough to push an SUV around on the road.

Elsewhere in the lower Keys, residents worried about storm surge parked their cars on the highest ground available — the shoulder of US 1, turning the berms of the Overseas Highway into what looked like a large used car lot.

On Big Coppitt Key Rita's winds were powerful enough to tear one of the hurricane warning flags from the fire station's flagpole and carry it away.

In Key West, the southernmost city in the continental United States, closer to Havana than Miami, Rita pushed the foaming surf over the beachfront road on the south side of the island, inundating the road with 4 inches of water and depositing scores of natural sponges, wrested from the seabed.

The raging surf foamed with plumes 6 feet high as it dashed against the sea wall. In Key West's business and tourists district many traffic lights were knocked out, neighborhoods reported power losses and streets were littered with downed palm fronds, tree branches and green coconuts. Duvall Street, the main drag for cruise ship passenger and other tourists, was practically deserted, its storefronts covered with plywood sheets or steel storm shutters.

"We are tired of hurricanes. We are moving to Alaska," was the message painted on the boards protecting one trattoria.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush ordered 2,400 Florida National Guard Troops to active duty, and alerted 2,000 for possible activation.

Homestead Air Force Base and Patrick Air Force Base have been designated as FEMA mobilization centers, from which supplies and equipment will be ferried to the areas affected by the storm. The Pentagon has also put eight helicopters from Patrick Air Force Base on alert to conduct search and rescue missions.

With the storm moving into the Gulf of Mexico, the Pentagon has decided to move the five ships deployed for Joint Task Force Katrina out of Rita's path. The ships that will sail east are the Tortuga, the Comfort, the Iwo Jima, the Shreveport and the Grapple.

In expectation of Rita making landfall in Texas, Gov. Rick Perry today ordered 1,100 Texas National Guard troops aiding relief efforts in Louisiana back to their home state. Perry has authorized the activation of up to 5,000 Texas Guardsmen.

Officials of Galveston, Texas — nearly 900 miles from Key West — have already asked residents to leave voluntarily. Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco urged everyone in the southwest part of her state to prepare to evacuate.

Officials said Rita might reach Category 3, or even Category 4, status before it hits coastal Texas.

In coastal Galveston, officials made plans to evacuate the city's 58,000 residents. In 1900, a hurricane with estimated winds of 135 mph made landfall at Galveston, inundating the Texas resort city with a 20-foot storm surge and killing at least 6,000 people.

Since then, a 17-foot-high seawall has been erected at Galveston, but officials still worried about a tidal surge.

As Texas braced for Hurricane Rita, men, women and children who had been evacuated from Louisiana to shelters in Houston after Hurricane Katrina began to pack their belongings for yet another move.

DOJ_NMG_0007269

Officials plan to close down the shelter at the Reliant Center -- Houston's largest temporary facility for Katrina evacuees -- and transfer people to Ft. Chaffee, Ark., in advance of Rita.

The center this morning was a buzz of stress and activity, as reluctant evacuees prepared to leave yet again, heading to their fourth shelter in three states since surviving Katrina.

Many of the 976 evacuees who remained at the Reliant Center began their journeys at the Superdome in New Orleans, were airlifted to Houston's Astrodome, then shifted to the Reliant Center shelter when the Astrodome closed.

"I'm tired, I'm tired," said Darrell Lewis, 41, as he waited, resigned, on a folding chair outside the shelter for a bus to Ellington Field and an eventual plane to Arkansas. "I just want to settle down, go someplace and stay there and get my life back together. I been in three places already, and now I'm going to Arkansas."

Some of remaining evacuees at the Reliant Center have balked at being airlifted to yet another state and have made plans to move in with relatives or find other housing.

Carol Ben, 62, waited outside of the massive shelter with a friend for "somebody to come and get me. I'm going to Dallas, hopefully to my son or daughter's house.

"We were going to leave Saturday, but we have to leave early," Ben said. "It's a problem all the way around. It looks like it's following us."

FEMA Rushes To Help After Rita (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), already stretched thin from recovery efforts for Hurricane Katrina, is scrambling to prepare for an equally disastrous hurricane forecast to reach Category 4 strength by this afternoon.

FEMA and state officials began preparation efforts Monday for the first impact of Hurricane Rita in the Florida Keys, racing hundred of trucks with ice, water and military Meals Ready to Eat (MREs) rations to pre-staging sites, and dispatched multiple emergency teams to provide medical care and search and rescue services.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush mobilized 2,400 National Guardsmen and put another 2,000 guardsmen on alert Sunday, evacuated all hospitals and nursing-home patients in Monroe County and issued a mandatory evacuation of Key West before closing the bridge to the island at midnight Monday.

Six Black Hawk helicopters and one Chinook were on standby in West Palm Beach, and out-of-state choppers were staged to respond to Hurricane Rita victims.

"The great work being done locally and with support from the state and federal officials, we've responded to this storm, I think, in a way that Floridians can be proud," Mr. Bush said at a press conference yesterday.

R. David Paulison, acting FEMA director, said state evacuation efforts were thorough, and he expects the same cooperation with Texas.

"I've been on the phone with [Mr. Bush] on a regular basis. He is very pleased with the job we've done. Florida, like Texas, has an outstanding emergency management system, and they're easy to work with," Mr. Paulison said.

As Rita grew from a tropical storm to a Category 2 hurricane on a path toward Texas and Louisiana, FEMA began relocating more than 8,000 Katrina evacuees who were sheltered in Texas to other locations, while rounding up water and food for new shelters.

Meanwhile, FEMA officials set up staging areas in Texas with 90 truckloads of water and ice and eight trucks full of MREs, and dispatched 18 urban search-and-rescue task forces and disaster medical assistance teams.

"Texas also has an outstanding emergency management system. They are well prepared," Mr. Paulison said. "They are ready for the hurricane. They know it's not going to be easy, but they're ready to go."

Texas Gov. Rick Perry will begin mandatory evacuations today in Galveston, Corpus Christi, Houston and San Antonio and has recalled the Texas National Guard from Louisiana along with other emergency personnel and equipment. Forecasters currently predict Rita will make landfall near Galveston, a city that was leveled by a hurricane 105 years ago this month.

"For the past three weeks, our emergency personnel have been assisting our neighbors devastated by Hurricane Katrina, and over the last year our state has heightened preparations for dealing with a catastrophic storm. While we continue to hope that day never comes, Texas must be ready if it does," Mr. Perry said.

FEMA officials are in place at Texas' operation center, which went on full-alert status today with 34 state agencies on site round-the-clock, a spokeswoman for the governor told the Houston Chronicle.

"FEMA has already been part of this. They have offered whatever support we need," Perry spokeswoman Kathy Walt said. Texas is not Louisiana. You won't see that breakdown occurring here."

Texas Pulls Katrina Relief Crews To Aid In New Storm (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

Texas state officials pulled back emergency workers from Hurricane Katrina relief operations, and businesses and residents began battening down in advance of the second hurricane in a month to take aim at the Gulf Coast.

The National Hurricane Center predicted Hurricane Rita, which strengthened yesterday to a Category 2 with winds of about 100 miles an hour, will make landfall along the Texas coast, though the storm also could turn toward Louisiana. Forecasters expect Rita to continue strengthening before striking Texas as early as Friday night. (See the hurricane center's strike-probability map.)

Texas Gov. Rick Perry recalled a contingent of 1,000 Texas National Guard members from Louisiana and announced plans to redeploy them alongside 5,000 state emergency workers for possible water rescue operations.

In Houston, officials were emptying two huge shelters that were set up four weeks ago to house New Orleans residents fleeing Hurricane Katrina. The two shelters harbored about 30,000 people at the height of the Katrina evacuations, but only 1,200 remained yesterday morning.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency arranged for 10 chartered jets to fly as many as 1,700 people out of the region. Shelter occupants were requested to relocate to Fort Chaffee, Ark. Those who didn't want to leave Texas were being asked to find temporary housing elsewhere.

"Our major concern is to get them out of harm's way," said Gloria Roemer, a spokesman for Harris County Judge Robert Eckels. "We cannot have them here in this arena; it's not safe here," she said. Once the two shelters are closed, personnel will be directed to prepare for Hurricane Rita.

In Louisiana, federal, state and local officials said they are prepared to evacuate residents quickly if Rita threatens the battered state. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said the federal government has provided 500 buses to empty the city of holdouts still there. Starting today, residents and business owners trying to return to assess the damage to their property will be turned back at checkpoints into New Orleans.

Brigadier General Robert Crear of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers warned that the city's levee system was "almost completely destroyed" by Katrina and likely could withstand a storm surge of only five to 10 feet in some locations. Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco said officials are "praying that it dissipates. ... This state can barely stand what happened after Katrina."

In Galveston, an island city 50 miles south of Houston that is no stranger to hurricanes, officials called for nearly 60,000 residents to evacuate inland and closed schools for the week. Galveston hotels and rental cottages were asking visitors to leave the island, and residents were boarding up vacation homes.

Evacuees were directed to Red Cross shelters in Huntsville, Texas, 115 miles north. University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston, the island's largest hospital, said it was drawing up plans for an orderly evacuation of patients, if needed, today or tomorrow.

Rita Is Gaining Force In The Gulf (WP)

By Sam Coates And Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

KEY WEST, Fla., Sept. 20 -- Hurricane Rita slapped at Key West on Tuesday before strengthening in the Gulf of Mexico, where it appeared to be veering away from New Orleans, but still forced the evacuation of 7,000 of Louisiana's Katrina evacuees from Texas.

Forecasters expect Rita to swell on Wednesday into a Category 4 monster, carrying 131-mph winds, as it gains strength from the warm Gulf waters and spins westward toward an anticipated landfall early Saturday near Galveston, Tex. The storm's sudden burst of power after it passed 50 miles south of Key West, and the possibility that its track could change, sent ripples of anxiety across hundreds of miles of the Gulf Coast, much of it still in the early stages of recovery from Katrina three weeks ago.

President Bush signed an emergency declaration for Florida, which allowed federal relief help to be prepositioned. He also said that he had spoken with Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) about storm preparations.

"All up and down this coastline, people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm," Bush said.

Perry activated 5,000 members of the Texas National Guard. Military leaders prepared to rush the USS Iwo Jima, which has served as a floating command post in New Orleans, and several other naval vessels out to sea to better ride out the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0007271

Emergency workers began plans to open shelters in central Texas, and the mayor of Galveston issued a voluntary evacuation order, which could be followed by a mandatory order on Wednesday.

The scramble to prepare for Rita's next landfall swung into motion even before the storm toppled trees and electrical lines with 90-mph gusts in Key West. But there were no reports of injuries, only isolated flooding. The damage was far less than feared from a storm so fearsome that nearly half of Key West's residents evacuated -- far more than the usual 25 percent on an island famous for its nonchalance in the face of hurricane threats.

"We are very fortunate," Key West Mayor Jimmy Weekley said.

Key West's apparent fortune did little to ease anxiety as the storm grew more powerful Tuesday. New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin, who has delayed plans to let residents return, urged those who are still in the city to leave once again. Two busloads of residents followed his advice. But hundreds ignored him.

In the Gentilly neighborhood of New Orleans, where neck-high floodwaters from Hurricane Katrina have now receded, the National Guard was warning a handful of homeowners who had sneaked into the city to check on their houses that it was time to get out again.

"We are not forcing them, but we will do anything to convince them to get out of here," said Sgt. Timothy Eagle of the Oregon National Guard, who cruised the neighborhood in a Humvee. "We don't want to come back for the body."

Perhaps the worst off, at least psychologically, are the thousands of Katrina evacuees in Texas who are now being "re-traumatized" by a second evacuation.

"You can imagine what's going on in people's minds who lost virtually everything," said Howard B. Smith, associate dean of the College of Education and Counseling at South Dakota State University and coordinator of Red Cross mental health services.

A few evacuees began boarding planes bound for Fort Chaffee in Arkansas, a state that will accept 4,000 displaced residents, while an additional 3,000 will be going to Tennessee. One thousand may be going to Nebraska. But some evacuees were unwilling to be uprooted again.

Perry urged residents to fill their vehicles with gasoline, gather personal and financial records, stock up on a three-month supply of needed medications and emergency provisions such as flashlights, water and nonperishable food; and find places to stay inland.

Advance work in Louisiana, where levees are still being repaired and 40 percent of the pumps in New Orleans still do not work, included the staging of 500 buses in case the storm edged toward the city, addressing a lack of transportation that left the city with no choice but to house tens of thousands of people in squalor at the Louisiana Superdome and the convention center in the days after Katrina.

"We're learning as we go," Nagin said.

Nagin, whose plan to let residents return to the city was sternly criticized by Bush and by the administration's point man for New Orleans recovery, Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, went for a show of unity at a news briefing on Tuesday, presenting Allen with a T-shirt that read "I love New Orleans." He also hugged Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D), who declared a state of emergency as Rita entered the Gulf.

Nagin said he might begin reconsidering when to restart his plan to repopulate the city on Friday if Rita does not hit Louisiana. But he refused to discuss a timetable after meeting with Bush, who made his fifth trip to New Orleans on Tuesday, and Allen, who has cautioned that the city is still unsafe.

Now that the storm is deep into the gulf, the party can continue in Key West, where Bill Piercenall, who works in a restaurant and lives downtown, spent the hours before the storm "feet up" drinking beer.

"I'm just surprised there aren't more drag queens," said L.A. Meyers, working in the 801 bar, the only drinking establishment open on Duval Street, the main road in downtown Key West. "They love to come out during hurricanes."

The arrival of Rita on Key West is getting forecasters closer to the possibility of a notable quirk. An international committee of the World Meteorological Organization has preselected storm names for decades, first using only female names, then alternating male and female names since 1979.

But there is a finite number of preselected names -- 21 -- each summer, and after Rita, only four are left this year: Stan, Tammy, Vince and Wilma. If that list is exhausted, the meteorological group will have to revert to a backup plan: naming storms using the Greek alphabet, beginning with alpha, beta and gamma.

Bush Concerned Rita May Hit Damaged Gulf (KCS)

By Nedra Pickler

The Kansas City Star, September 21, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0007272

NEW ORLEANS - President Bush kept a worried watch Tuesday on "what we pray is not a devastating storm" - Hurricane Rita - as he flew over miles of flattened homes and mud-caked neighborhoods hit by Hurricane Katrina.

Bush received a briefing about Rita aboard the USS Iwo Jima, which is docked near downtown New Orleans, as the hurricane lashed the Florida Keys and caused new anxiety among Katrina victims in Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama.

In a ship mess hall, the president held a videoconference with three federal officials: Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, the National Hurricane Center's deputy director, Ed Rappaport, and a Federal Emergency Management Agency official.

The officials said Rita was projected to strengthen to a Category 3 hurricane that would hit the upper to middle part of the Texas coast by the weekend and could create tropical storm conditions - or, much less likely, hurricane-force winds - in southeastern Louisiana.

"We're watching very closely, of course, its track," Bush said later at a Folgers coffee plant in Louisiana that recently restarted operations. "All up and down the coastline people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm."

Eager to show hands-on leadership after being criticized for a slow response to Katrina, Bush signed an emergency declaration for Florida, spoke with Texas Gov. Rick Perry about planning for the storm's landfall, and said military outfits are being removed from New Orleans to be out of Rita's path and ready to help with recovery.

The White House said Bush had named Frances Fragos Townsend, his in-house homeland security adviser, to lead an administration investigation of "what went wrong and what went right" in the sluggish federal response to Katrina. The appointment of Townsend, a former federal prosecutor with a reputation as a tough adversary, is unlikely to satisfy Democrats on Capitol Hill who are demanding a fully independent investigation.

Bush said he was pleased that New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin suspended his plan to allow as many as a third of the city's residents to return. He said positive steps are being taken.

"What you're beginning to see is a revitalized economy," Bush said, standing before 110 trailers set up for Folgers employees who lost their homes. "Progress is being made."

Bush began the day in Gulfport, Miss., where he dropped in on the first meeting of Gov. Haley Barbour's Commission on Recovery, Rebuilding and Renewal, applauding their "can-do spirit" and pledging to help clean up the devastated Gulf Coast. He flew along the coast over mile after mile of destroyed homes.

"There is no doubt in my mind that out of the rubble and out of the huge heaps of timber that used to be homes, a better Mississippi will emerge," Bush told the local government and business leaders gathered in an air-conditioned tent set up in a hurricane-damaged outlet shopping center.

The president told them he had heard their complaints about bureaucratic hurdles for trash removal, saying he was personally making calls to cut through red tape and people in the area will soon see results.

"There was a level of frustration, as there should have been," he said. "We'll get the debris removed."

Barbour told Bush that local officials need the federal government's help to rebuild the area's infrastructure and make Mississippi's hurricane zone "the most attractive place in America for private investment."

"I'm confident that we'll get the resources because y'all have been so generous and good to us. But we want you to know that we're going to try to help you know what to give us," Barbour said to laughter.

Jim Barksdale, chairman of Barbour's commission, told the president and other attendees that they only have themselves to blame if reconstruction isn't successful. "You folks are like the pig at a ham and egg breakfast," he said. "You are committed."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan acknowledged that some of Mississippi's more rural areas still are waiting for federal help that has been focused in New Orleans and other larger population centers.

After Bush returned to Washington, the White House issued a statement saying Bush had signed into law legislation that allows the National Flood Insurance Program to borrow up to $3.5 billion a year from the Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $1.5 billion. He also signed into law a measure that excludes federal assistance for mitigating flood damage from being considered income when determining a person's eligibility for other federal benefit programs.

Another Storm Could Renew Flooding (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The Army Corps of Engineers sped repairs to the pumps and levees guarding this crippled city Tuesday, but another hurricane or heavy rains almost certainly would cause new flooding, according to corps officials and engineering and storm experts.

Three weeks after Hurricane Katrina breached levees and flood barriers and inundated large sections of New Orleans, the corps is closely watching the path of Hurricane Rita, which buffeted the Florida Keys Tuesday and moved into the Gulf of Mexico.

"We're not in a position to go through a tropical storm without reflooding a lot of areas that were just drained," says Paul Kemp, a professor at Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center.

Rita's projected path takes it toward possible landfall Friday on the Texas coast. If that happens, Rita's high winds and storm surge will largely skirt New Orleans, said Lee Butler, an engineering consultant and former corps engineer who has studied New Orleans' levees. "There shouldn't be that much pressure on New Orleans if the storm stays to the west of Galveston," Butler said.

As Rita strengthens, the corps is filling hundreds of sandbags, moving pumps into vulnerable areas and adding dirt and rock to low spots on levees to strengthen New Orleans' defenses against flooding, said Col. Duane Gapinski, who commands the agency's effort to rebuild the levees.

That combination should protect the city against a storm surge of 5 feet or higher, Gapinski said.

The corps also plans to build temporary steel dams across two canals near Lake Pontchartrain where breaches occurred after Katrina struck.

But parts of New Orleans lie below sea level and almost certainly would flood again if Rita shifts course and hits the region. Here are the area's major flood weaknesses, according to the corps:

·The city's system of pumps, which was knocked out by Katrina, is operating at less than half normal capacity. A preliminary corps study predicted a storm that dumped 9 inches of rain would produce pools of water 2 to 4 feet deep in the lowest lying areas. Even 3 inches would flood some areas again, said Brig. Gen. Robert Crear of the corps.

·Five major breaches that led to flooding in New Orleans during Katrina have been repaired, but the protective barriers are 5 to 10 feet lower than they were before Katrina. The corps plans to dam two canals near Lake Pontchartrain to protect levees there. But there is no such protection near the city's Ninth Ward, which was heavily flooded by Katrina.

·St. Bernard Parish, a community east of New Orleans that was severely flooded by Katrina, could be vulnerable if Rita pushes water toward it from the Gulf. Much of a 10-mile stretch of levees designed to protect the parish was leveled by Katrina's storm surge.

Rita Threatens New Orleans' Damaged Levees (WT/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- The Army Corps of Engineers raced to mend New Orleans' fractured levee system yesterday, and residents were forced to decide yet again whether to stay or go as a new hurricane threatened the city.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and other officials strongly urged people along the Louisiana coast to be prepared to evacuate and said nearly 500 buses stood ready.

"The protection is very tenuous at best," said Dave Wurtzel, the Army Corps official responsible for repairing the 17th Street Canal levee, whose huge breach during Hurricane Katrina caused the worst of the floods that soaked the city.

The new threat was Hurricane Rita, which strengthened into a 100-mph Category 2 storm as it barreled past the Florida Keys into the Gulf of Mexico.

"We are praying that the hurricane dissipates or that it weakens," said Mrs. Blanco, who declared a state of emergency. "This state can barely stand what happened to it."

The storm was projected to cross the Gulf and hit Texas by the end of the week. But a slight turn to the right was possible, and engineers warned that even a glancing blow to New Orleans and as little as 3 inches of rain could swamp the city's levees as early as tomorrow.

In anticipation of Rita, the Corps drove a massive metal barrier across the 17th Street Canal bed to prevent a storm surge from Lake Pontchartrain from swamping New Orleans again. Although engineers have left a large opening in the wall to allow floodwater to continue to be pumped back into the lake, it will have to be closed quickly if the storm threatens.

"This is what we're going to have to rely on to protect this canal and this part of the city," Mr. Wurtzel said.

Government engineers and private contractors also worked round-the-clock across New Orleans to repair the damage to the system of pumps, concrete flood walls, earthen berms and canals that protect the city.

In addition, the Corps had 800 giant sandbags weighing 6,000 to 15,000 pounds on hand, and had ordered 2,500 more to shore up low spots and plug any new breaches. It was also putting pumps and other materials where they might be needed.

"If New Orleans was directly affected by a Category 1, I would be concerned -- I would pull my people out," said David Pezza, the top geotechnical engineer for the Army Corps. "These levees are greatly compromised."

Mixed Signals Add New Level Of Aggravation (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

DOJ_NMG_0007274

USA Today, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Frazzled and frustrated residents prepared Tuesday for the possibility of another hurricane, saying they're sick of mixed signals from federal, state and local leaders about whether to stay or go.

"I'm just tired," Shandried Baxter, 30, said as she waited for her clothes to dry at one of the few operating coin laundries in the city. "If we have to leave, we have to leave," she added with a shrug.

Mayor Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said they would like to see everyone evacuate: the residents who stayed in the city after Hurricane Katrina hit three weeks ago, as well as those who returned at the mayor's suggestion on Monday to the Algiers section of the city.

The National Hurricane Center projected that Rita would strike Texas at the end of the week, which gave Louisiana officials hope that their state would be bypassed.

"Today I feel better about Rita, and I'm not as prone to do a hard, mandatory evacuation," Nagin told reporters after meeting with President Bush and other federal officials. "But I want to leave that open as an option."

Nagin said he will "start to shut the city down" today if Rita remains a serious threat. He estimated that about 500 residents remained in the city, as well as hundreds of emergency, relief and reconstruction workers. The estimate seemed low, as hundreds, if not thousands, of people could be seen in the Algiers area on Tuesday.

Some of the military forces in New Orleans moved out of the city to be ready for action if Rita hits.

Police, meanwhile, turned away many residents trying to return. Nagin said authorities would begin strict enforcement today of a dusk-to-dawn curfew. Buses were provided at the city's convention center for anyone who wanted to leave, and two buses of evacuees left Tuesday, Nagin said.

"That's not your business," he said, adding later: "Don't start panic here. … Let's not get stuck on the last storm. Don't get stuck on stupid, reporters."

Blanco said state officials were working to find housing for people still staying in shelters after Katrina. All of the shelters in the state south of Interstate 10, which runs through New Orleans, would be closed, she said.

"We want people to move out of shelters, because shelter life is not a good way of life," she said.

Many residents of the Algiers neighborhood, which Nagin had urged residents to return to Monday, said they didn't know what to believe. "It doesn't make sense. First he orders us back, then he tells us to leave," Arthur Lawrence Brown Sr., 73, said of the mayor.

Brown sat in a folding chair on his stoop. Like many residents, he vowed not to leave. "I didn't go the first time. I won't go the second time," said Brown, an Army veteran of the Korean War. "If the Lord wants me, I'll be right here."

Others said they will leave if Rita does threaten New Orleans. One was Marcia Toca, 36, who said she would flee if necessary. But she said she didn't want to leave her neighborhood too quickly because authorities were not letting people re-enter the Algiers area.

"We're stuck here," Toca said. "It's like a prison. It's very frustrating. We came back in to get started rebuilding, and then they stopped us again."

Residents Leave Gulf Coast Area As Storm Grows (NYT)

By William Yardley And Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 - Hurricane Rita brushed past Key West on Tuesday and was forecast to strengthen into a major hurricane later in the week, prompting residents and rescuers to begin evacuating this feeble city, as well as parts of Louisiana and Texas.

From the tip of the Florida peninsula to Galveston, Tex., thousands left their homes or made plans to, including many who had already fled once, from Hurricane Katrina, and were living in shelters and temporary housing. In Houston, officials moved evacuees from New Orleans out of the Reliant Arena and sent many of them on to Arkansas.

In Louisiana, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco asked President Bush on Tuesday to declare a state of emergency for her battered state as it prepares for Hurricane Rita. She requested $10 million in assistance.

Churning undiminished toward the warm and wide Gulf of Mexico, Hurricane Rita could strengthen to Category 4 intensity as it approaches Texas later this week, said Colin McAdie, a meteorologist at the National Hurricane Center in Miami. Hurricane Katrina was a Category 4 storm when it devastated parts of the coasts of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama on Aug. 29.

Mr. McAdie said western Louisiana could also bear the brunt of the storm depending on changes in steering currents.

"It's better not to nail it down too precisely," he said. "Over the next day or so we'll have a better idea."

DOJ_NMG_0007275

The threat of a new storm aligned federal and local authorities in Louisiana, at least publicly, after weeks of tension over the response to Hurricane Katrina.

President Bush, who had visited Mississippi earlier, attended a briefing in New Orleans. Later in the day, Mr. Bush signed legislation to increase the borrowing authority of the government's flood insurance program to $3.5 billion from $1.5 billion to pay claims from Hurricane Katrina.

"All up and down this coastline people are now preparing for what is anticipated to be yet another significant storm," the president said. He said Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen would remain in charge of the federal effort in Louisiana and Mississippi and that "we've got another admiral who is now being stationed in Texas, to coordinate the relief response."

Mr. Bush also praised the New Orleans mayor, C. Ray Nagin, who decided Monday to suspend a staggered reopening of parts of the city.

"He made a wise decision to say to people, be cautious about returning here, because a rain of any amount could cause these levees to break again," the president said.

The mayor, prickly a day earlier under pressure from the president and Admiral Allen to delay the return of residents into parts of the city, gave the admiral a T-shirt at a news conference on Tuesday outside City Hall, where generators still supply power and most key operations have moved across the street to the battered Hyatt Hotel.

Mr. Nagin said the words on the T-shirt read: "I love New Orleans."

The official death toll in Louisiana remained at 736. In Mississippi, 219 people died from the storm.

The Associated Press reported that a 72-year-old man, John Lyons, had been found alive in his home in New Orleans. Mr. Lyons's wife, Leola, also 72, was found dead.

In the city, mostly empty of residents but with its physical core still vulnerable, the possibility of heavy rain and a storm surge prompted officials to make emergency efforts to bolster its weakened levee system, station 500 buses on its outskirts to evacuate remaining residents and establish a military hospital at the convention center, which just weeks ago was the scene of violence and desperation for thousands of trapped evacuees from Hurricane Katrina.

In Florida, Hurricane Rita lashed Key West as it passed about 50 miles south of the island on Tuesday afternoon, flooding roads, yards and beaches through much of the Keys but not inflicting the severe damage many had feared. Late Tuesday night, it bordered on Category 3 strength as it moved into the Gulf of Mexico, with sustained winds near 110 miles per hour.

The Lower and Middle Keys were cut off from the rest of Florida for most of the day after Route 1 closed because of flooding. A quarter-mile section of the highway on Lower Matecumbe Key was closed because of a storm surge. Law enforcement officials said the roads were strewn with debris, although that did not stop the curious from driving. A few bars and restaurants stayed opened and drew restless crowds.

"We were not asked to close, and we won't close until we are," said Michael Pastore, a bartender at Don's Place, a Key West bar that opened at 7 a.m. on Tuesday.

By late afternoon, about 24,000 homes and businesses in Monroe, Miami-Dade, Broward and Palm Beach counties had no electricity far fewer than when Hurricane Katrina hit South Florida on Aug. 26, killing 11. In Miami, which suffered only rain squalls, tame winds and minor flooding, officials said government offices and schools would reopen Wednesday.

Gov. Jeb Bush said that 2,400 National Guard troops had been mobilized and 2,000 more were on alert in case the storm the seventh to hit Florida in 13 months - proved devastating. Hospitals and nursing homes in the Keys, eager to avoid the mistakes of New Orleans, evacuated their patients on Monday.

In New Orleans, Mr. Nagin said perhaps as few several hundred people were still living in the city's most vulnerable areas, in addition to the thousands of military and emergency workers who had come to help it recover. Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honoré, who is leading military efforts in the recovery, emphasized that evacuees taken to the convention center would be quickly transported out of town.

"We're not going back into that convention center and Superdome business," he said, alluding to the days of televised despair when tens of thousands of mostly poor black residents were trapped by floodwaters in the two buildings.

Two busloads of residents were evacuated from the convention center on Tuesday, the mayor said.

The mayor said officials would be more aggressive in pushing for evacuation on Wednesday if the storm turns toward the city, but he said they would not force people from their homes. General Honoré said about 14,000 troops in the region would move into shelters capable of withstanding Category 5 storms, the strongest measured on the Saffir-Simpson scale.

The city's weakened levee system could be breached by a storm surge as low as five feet, said Brig. Gen. Robert Crear of the Army Corps of Engineers. The Corps, which has used sandbags, stones and concrete to seal breaches in several levees, does not expect the levees to be fully repaired until June 1, the start of the 2006 hurricane season.

General Crear said canals with repaired levees were being blocked at Lake Pontchartrain, to prevent pressure from building on the levees. In addition to storm damage, he said that the levees may have been damaged by barges that broke lose during Hurricane Katrina but that he was not certain.

"We had barges sitting on top of levees," he said. "We had barges sitting on the other side of levees. We don't know yet. We have not done the forensics yet."

The state continued to grapple with the costs of the destruction from Hurricane Katrina. The governor announced that she had signed an order freezing the state budget in anticipation of a loss of $750 million to $1 billion in state revenues from the effects of thee hurricanes. That order, signed Monday night, includes a hiring freeze for state agencies and is intended to save $30 million to $50 million in spending, she said, adding that it "will be the first of many."

Officials in Galveston called for a voluntary evacuation before Hurricane Rita emerged into the gulf.

Mr. Bush said Tuesday that he had also spoken to Gov. Rick Perry of Texas "on the planning for what we pray is not a devastating storm - but there's one coming."

R. David Paulison, the acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said in Washington on Tuesday that 45 truckloads of water, 45 truckloads of ice and 8 truckloads of ready-to-eat meals were being staged in Texas in advance of the storm. Nine urban search and rescue teams and nine disaster medical assistance teams also are to arrive.

The agency, still facing criticism for its response to Hurricane Katrina, has more search and rescue teams available in Texas than it did along the Gulf Coast in the advance of Hurricane Katrina.

The Texas National Guard has also started withdrawing troops from Louisiana to prepare for landfall by Hurricane Rita, Louisiana National Guard officials said.

About 1,000 Texas troops were recalled, Lt. Michael Odie said. Along Interstate 10, convoys of military trucks drove west, some with handwritten signs with "Katrina" crossed out and "Rita" written beside the words "Texas Bound."

Evacuees Of One Storm Flee Another In Texas (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 20 - Hurricane Rita prompted a mandatory evacuation of this city's public shelters on Tuesday, emptying them as quickly as they had filled just three weeks ago and sending still-dazed survivors of Hurricane Katrina packing off to Arkansas, to the bus terminal, to the airport and, for some who considered themselves lucky, to paid and furnished apartments here in the Houston area.

Clustered in the hot sun and with all they had salvaged spilling from black garbage bags, shopping carts and suitcases tied with cords, evacuees set to leave one of the shelters, at Reliant Arena, seemed largely resigned to this new flight, although there were some flashes of temper.

Leading a circle of 10 with hands clasped in prayer as buses and taxicabs filled around them, Johnny Jeremiah, minister of the Pleasant Grove Missionary Baptist Church here, intoned, "God, this day, right now, this place, with this foolishness going on, we need you."

City and county officials, who had moved a vast bureaucracy to house more than 27,000 survivors in four public shelters quickly after the New Orleans disaster, said none of those now leaving the shelters would be put in housing that could be at risk from the approaching storm. But they said they might have to relocate people who had earlier been placed at hotels and motels in low-lying areas.

With the new storm's path uncertain, Galveston, which still bears scars from the great hurricane of September 1900 - the nation's deadliest disaster, with at least 6,000 killed - ordered a mandatory evacuation to begin at 6 p.m. Wednesday. Mayor Bill White of Houston said that this city of two million would make its own decision Wednesday and that as much as half the population could be called upon to evacuate.

In recent days, the dwindling thousands of storm survivors who had been sheltered in the Astrodome and Reliant Arena, as well as the adjacent Reliant Center exhibition hall and the George R. Brown Convention Center, were concentrated largely in the arena, which was finally emptied Tuesday night.

For the last hundreds in the arena, the day was particularly trying. Families sat on bundles of possessions like war refugees. Pregnant women and the injured waited in wheelchairs. Red Cross volunteers weaved through the throngs, passing out cold water and pastries.

With her month-old daughter asleep in a stroller, Monique Davis scooped up diapers that had spilled over the ground. Nearby lay a trash bag with stuffed animals poking out. A boy rocked solemnly on a wooden hobbyhorse.

About 500 people who had applied for apartments and been promised them lined up for buses and taxicabs to get there. Others boarded tour buses to Ellington Field for flights to new shelter at Fort Chaffee, Ark. - some chose to make the entire trip by bus - or to George Bush Intercontinental Airport, where Continental Airlines was offering free tickets out. Still others got rides to the Greyhound terminal, where free tickets also awaited.

Steve Freeman, an oyster shucker with an injured leg infected from walking through floodwaters, said he planned to take up Continental on the free flight to reach Norfolk, Va., where he heard there were lots of oysters. But he was suspicious of the official motives for the evacuation.

"They've been trying to get us out early," Mr. Freeman said. "We're the working people. They don't want us here."

Paul Horton, driver of a produce truck, said he would use his airline ticket to fly to Atlanta to join his wife and two children, who had evacuated there with a neighbor. He has been separated from them since the hurricane, Mr. Horton said, when they got out after the water reached chest-high. He was later rescued and evacuated by bus to Dallas, then Arizona, Arkansas and finally the Reliant sports and entertainment complex in Houston.

Rohonor R. Randall, in a wheelchair with a bandaged foot ailing from exposure to polluted water, said she was bound for Fort Chaffee, but by bus.

"I'm not afraid of planes, I just like to be on the ground," Ms. Randall said.

She called for her newfound friend, the Rev. Hugh Hairston, pastor of Loveland Church in Ontario, Calif., a leader of a group of volunteer clerics called Operation Compassion. He offered a prayer for her foot.

Ms. Randall gripped his hand and said: "You never know where life leads you. Life changes in an instant, like God is showing you life is valuable."

Rita Evacuees From Keys Play It Safe (USAT)

By Kelly Whiteside

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Some longtime residents leave path of a storm for the 1st time

MIAMI — About 350 evacuees from the Florida Keys spread sleeping bags, blankets and flattened cardboard boxes across the hallways of Florida International University on Tuesday as they sought haven from Hurricane Rita.

Many of them boarded city buses in Key West on Monday evening and arrived three hours later at this makeshift Red Cross shelter to wait out the storm. They left home because of the images of Hurricane Katrina and the fear that Rita might do the same.

“I didn't want to get caught in what those people got caught in with Katrina,” said Yvonne Dixon-Mahoney, a corrections officer from Big Pine Key. “Seeing people on their roofs, with the water rising and all the chaos in New Orleans, I thought we'd better go.”

Longtime residents of the Keys said it was the first time they had evacuated their homes for a hurricane. Tourists and all 78,000 residents in the low-lying Keys were ordered to leave on Monday.

Mary Smyth from Austin was visiting friends in Key West. Now she was worried if Rita, headed into the Gulf of Mexico for the Texas coast, would allow her to get home.

William Laney, visiting from Fort Lauderdale, learned about the storm while watching pro football on Sunday and a scroll about the mandatory evacuation spread across the TV screen in his hotel room. Unable to drive because of two recent knee replacement surgeries, he took the bus and went to the shelter.

At the earth sciences department at FIU, the scene was a stark contrast to the experiences of those who weathered Hurricane Katrina. Though Rita developed into a Category 2 storm with winds of 100 mph as it passed the Keys on Tuesday afternoon, there was only a light rain and a firm breeze here in west Miami-Dade County.

The greater Miami area, home to more than 2.2 million people, was under a hurricane warning Tuesday. That was lifted after the storm passed.

Wind and rain buffeted the northern Keys, but Isis Majeska has seen worse.

“If I go out onto my porch, I don't even see leaves down,” said Majeska, 46, who works for the Monroe County court system. “It's just not that bad a storm.”

Those who took shelter on the third floor of the Charles E. Perry Building on FIU's campus included homeless people, vacationers, office workers, store managers and retirees.

Evacuees slept on tile floors in the hallways or upright in classroom desks. One mother of five swept the floor of an opened classroom that had become a play area for children.

A television without reception was suspended in a corner. “We asked for DVDs, but there weren't any,” said Dominique Atkins, who then walked to the Walgreens and bought bingo games and coloring books for her two children.

DOJ_NMG_0007278

There was air conditioning and electricity, and the mood was generally upbeat. The Red Cross delivered a steady supply of water and three meals a day.

Judy Garmas cradled her 3-week-old son, Rene, already a veteran of two hurricanes, in her right arm as she sat beneath a map of “Tectonic Lithofacies of Appalachian Orogen” and talked about a different type of earth science. “We live in a trailer, and I didn't want to get caught, not with the baby,” she said. “He was only 2 days old when Katrina hit.”

The Garmas family lives in Sweetwater, southwest of Miami, but drove to the shelter to join her sister's family, who evacuated from Key West. By 3 p.m., they were packing their blue stroller, diaper bag and blankets once they received word there was no damage to their trailer. An hour later, they were gone.

As Rita Picks Up Steam, It's Deja Vu All Over Again For U.S. Energy Industry (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

WASHINGTON - Hurricane Rita threatens serious damage this week to the energy infrastructure in and around the Gulf of Mexico and could send fuel prices skyrocketing anew.

Oil companies battened down offshore oil rigs and platforms Tuesday in the central and western Gulf and evacuated offshore personnel.

"All of the operators and drilling contractors are taking extra precautions for Rita because they've seen what can happen after Katrina," said David Kent, an owner and editor of the Houston-based Web site Rigzone.com, focused on the offshore oil industry. "I think it's a matter of getting out of Dodge right now."

On Tuesday the Web site, a favorite of energy analysts, warned that Rita threatens the most productive area of deepwater oil rigs and platforms.

Rita was upgraded to a Category 2 hurricane Tuesday and is forecast to become Category 4 on Wednesday - with winds from 131 to 155 mph - as it heads toward the Texas coastline. It could make landfall Friday.

Texas is the country's largest oil producer, accounting for 20 percent of national production. Much of it comes from offshore activities coordinated through Houston, America's energy capital.

The state boasts 26 refineries, or about a quarter of the nation's refining. At least 14 are located on or near the Gulf Coast. They turn oil into gasoline or distillates for home heating. Most are built on higher ground in and around Houston, and most are further inland than refineries damaged by Katrina. Even if Houston dodges a direct hit, Rita could force precautionary shutdowns that could severely impact the availability of gasoline.

That could drive gasoline prices up sharply. Most U.S. refineries have been running full throttle to make up for the four major refineries idled by Katrina. Those refineries, three in Louisiana and one in Mississippi, have a combined capacity to convert 659,000 barrels of crude oil per day.

If Rita crosses the Houston area, all eyes will be on ExxonMobil's refinery in Baytown, the nation's largest, with a production capacity of 557,000 barrels a day. Baytown's city manager, Gary Jackson, said he's in close contact with the industry.

"We know they are monitoring just as we are. There will be some critical times with decisions ahead," he said. "Those final calls will be their calls, each on an individual plant-by-plant basis."

Rita's uncertain path drove global oil prices up by more than $4 a barrel Monday, the largest one-day jump ever. Oil prices tapered off Tuesday, closing down a dollar at $66.23 on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"Judging by what the market has done and speaking for myself, I am very nervous indeed," said Bart Melek, a senior economist and energy analyst at BMO Nesbitt Burns in Toronto, a division of the Bank of Montreal.

The world's oil supply is stretched to near capacity. Katrina knocked out almost 5 percent of U.S. oil production, and Rita threatens more damage. Add to that volatile mix growing civil unrest in Nigeria, the fifth-largest oil supplier to the United States, and it all adds up to more fuel-price volatility in the days ahead.

"It's not going to take very much to move it up. God forbid that something happened in the Middle East," Melek said. "There isn't physical spare capacity, there just isn't."

Colonial Pipeline Co. operates the nation's largest pipeline, which originates in Houston. Katrina knocked out the utilities that provide the power to push gasoline through pipes that supply much of the U.S. East Coast. At company headquarters in Alpharetta, Ga., there is understandable concern.

"We're still in a wait-and-watch mode. We're monitoring it carefully," said Steve Baker, a company spokesman.

A lesson from Katrina: Colonial will pre-position portable diesel generators on tractor-trailer rigs if necessary to try to keep its pipelines flowing in case of power outages.

"If the storm goes west of Houston, there's likely to be no impact on us or the power grid," Baker said hopefully.

DOJ_NMG_0007279

Chevron, Royal Dutch Shell, ExxonMobil and British Petroleum all announced evacuations of manned oil platforms and rigs days before projected landfall. Some energy analysts believe that's an ominous admission that Rita threatens more destruction.

"They're pretty good about predicting these things," said Craig Smith, an energy expert and author of the forthcoming book "Black Gold Stranglehold," which examines fuel prices. "We hope it peters out, but if it has any strength and hits platforms or turns toward New Orleans, we cannot afford another hurricane right now. We just can't afford it. You're seeing that nervousness in the markets."

Gulf Oil Platforms Hunker Down For Rita (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 21, 2005

Still reeling from Hurricane Katrina, the battered Gulf of Mexico energy industry girded Tuesday for its second potentially devastating storm in a month.

Crews evacuated offshore oil platforms ahead of the approaching Hurricane Rita and its 100-mile-per-hour winds. The storm is expected to intensify as it crosses the Gulf of Mexico, home to 29% of domestic U.S. oil production, and could batter energy facilities Katrina left untouched.

"What wasn't hit by Katrina is being targeted by Rita. The market is taking the storm very seriously," says Agbeli Ameko of First Enercast Financial, an energy forecasting firm in Denver.

After rising $4 a barrel Monday, the biggest one-day jump ever, oil markets calmed Tuesday. Light, sweet crude for October delivery fell $1.16 to $66.23 a barrel in New York trading.

The latest storm could jolt prices if it slams into critical refineries on the Texas coast. Thanks to Katrina, four refineries representing about 5% of U.S. capacity already are closed for "an extended period," the Energy Department says.

With oil and gas markets already stretched tight, any further loss of capacity from Rita could send prices at the pump back up.

Texas is home to 26 refineries, which account for 27% of domestic refining capacity. Major refineries belonging to BP, Valero, Marathon Oil, Citgo, ExxonMobil, Royal Dutch Shell and ConocoPhillips lie in a coastal arc stretching north and south from Houston.

Some experts say the industry could rebound faster from Rita than it has from Katrina. Coastal refineries in Texas are guarded by barrier islands and thus are not as vulnerable to heavy flood damage as those in Louisiana and Mississippi.

"I'm not convinced it's going to have the lasting effect Katrina has," says Mark Routt, an analyst at Energy Security Analysis of Wakefield, Mass. "… A lot more capacity could go down, but it'll come back sooner. It's better protected."

Across the Gulf Tuesday, workers headed for dry land. Transocean, a major offshore drilling contractor, was expected by the end of Tuesday to have evacuated 500 workers from three moored rigs. About 725 workers remain on seven maneuvering rigs. "They move like ships. As the storm dictates, they'll move out of the way," says spokesman Guy Cantwell.

Katrina's legacy, however, continues to be felt. Offshore Logistics' Venice, La., helicopter facility was heavily damaged and left submerged after a protective levee failed under Katrina's assault.

This week, operating from the firm's other sites, Offshore's roughly 150 helicopters have been busy shuttling crews to safety from installations far from land.

With relief workers and evacuees filling hotels in the region, it's hard to find lodging for oil crews. Later this week, Offshore will start flying its choppers out of danger.

"We're going to be battening down our hatches," spokesman Joe Baj says.

Utility Tallies Fiscal Toll (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 21 (AP) - Faced with the costs of rebuilding its Gulf Coast utility systems devastated by Hurricane Katrina, Entergy said Tuesday that it would consider bankruptcy protection for its New Orleans unit.

Entergy, whose Entergy New Orleans unit has lost up to an estimated 130,000 customers because of the hurricane, estimates the unit's storm-related costs at $325 million to $475 million.

Entergy also said Tuesday that it planned to pursue various avenues for recovering costs from the storm, including insurance reimbursements, potential federal relief and "existing or new rate mechanisms."

Blanco Pushes FEMA For Hotel Rooms (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0007280

By Thomas Frank
USA Today, September 21, 2005

Louisiana's governor asked the federal government Tuesday to move tens of thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees out of shelters and into hotels.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco's request comes after state officials said it could take months to prepare trailers and other temporary housing for evacuees. Blanco wants the Federal Emergency Management Agency to pay for hotel rooms for 90 days for each individual or family.

"It's just not moving fast enough," said Jerry Jones, the governor's director of facility planning. "We don't want to just warehouse these people. We want them to be in a place where they can thrive and get back to normalcy."

Ron Sherman, FEMA's housing coordinator in Louisiana, said the idea could work and vowed to review it. FEMA currently pays for thousands of evacuees to stay in hotels for up to 60 days. The American Red Cross is paying hotel bills for thousands of others.

If accepted, Blanco's recommendation would allow displaced Louisianians living in shelters in their state or elsewhere to move to hotels identified by FEMA. It is unclear how many people would be eligible for hotel stays. Nearly 100,000 people are staying in 1,042 shelters in 26 states and the District of Columbia, according to FEMA.

Montine McNulty, executive director of the Arkansas Hospitality Association, called the plan "workable" and said many local hotels had rented rooms to evacuees for six months. "This is an especially good time because for many of the resort areas; it's sort of a down period," McNulty said.

Arkansas has 7,992 evacuees in shelters, the most of any state not damaged by Katrina. Texas had 13,182 shelter residents Monday but was planning to move 7,000 to Arkansas and Tennessee to keep them safe from Hurricane Rita.

Blanco's hotel request reflects the state's growing concern that Louisianians staying in out-of-state shelters will find permanent housing in the communities where they are sheltered.

People would be more likely to move back to Louisiana if they could stay in hotels for 90 days and then be able to occupy a trailer in their home state, said Jones, the governor's aide. "This buys us some time. … We want to entice them to come back home," he said.

Sherren Bartheleny, 49, sitting on a plastic chair outside a shelter in downtown Baton Rouge, said she was skeptical of the governor's plan because she fears it will take much longer than 90 days for the government to find appropriate housing for evacuees.

"If [Blanco] can put me in a trailer back in Plaquemines Parish after 90 days, I'll go to a hotel," said Bartheleny, whose home was destroyed. "I want a written statement from the governor."

Experts Say Faulty Levees Caused Much Of Flooding (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Susan B. Glasser
The Washington Post, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 -- Louisiana's top hurricane experts have rejected the official explanations for the floodwall collapses that inundated much of New Orleans, concluding that Hurricane Katrina's storm surges were much smaller than authorities have suggested and that the city's flood- protection system should have kept most of the city dry.

The Army Corps of Engineers has said that Katrina was just too massive for a system that was not intended to protect the city from a storm greater than a Category 3 hurricane, and that the floodwall failures near Lake Pontchartrain were caused by extraordinary surges that overtopped the walls.

But with the help of complex computer models and stark visual evidence, scientists and engineers at Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center have concluded that Katrina's surges did not come close to overtopping those barriers. That would make faulty design, inadequate construction or some combination of the two the likely cause of the breaching of the floodwalls along the 17th Street and London Avenue canals -- and the flooding of most of New Orleans.

In the weeks since Katrina drowned this low-lying city, there has been an intense focus on the chaotic government response to the flood. But Ivor van Heerden, the Hurricane Center's deputy director, said the real scandal of Katrina is the "catastrophic structural failure" of barriers that should have handled the hurricane with relative ease.

"We are absolutely convinced that those floodwalls were never overtopped," said van Heerden, who also runs LSU's Center for the Study of Public Health Impacts of Hurricanes.

In an interview Tuesday, Corps spokesman Paul Johnston said the agency still believes that storm surges overtopped the concrete floodwalls near the lake, then undermined the earthen levees on which they were perched, setting the stage for the breaches that emptied the lake into the city.

DOJ_NMG_0007281

Johnston said the Corps intends to launch an investigation to make sure it is correct about that scenario. But he emphasized that Katrina was a Category 4 hurricane when it smashed into the Gulf Coast, whereas Congress authorized the Corps to protect New Orleans against a storm only up to Category 3. "The event exceeded the design," Johnston said.

The center's researchers agree that Katrina's initial surge from the southeast overwhelmed floodwalls along the New Orleans Industrial Canal, flooding the city's Lower Ninth Ward as well as St. Bernard Parish. They believe that a little-used Army Corps navigation canal known as the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet helped amplify that surge, although they acknowledge that this surge was larger than the system was designed to control.

But the researchers have strong evidence that Katrina's subsequent surge from the north was several feet shy of the height that would have been necessary to overtop the 17th Street and London Avenue floodwalls. It was the failures of those floodwalls that emptied the lake into the rest of the city, filling most of New Orleans like a soup bowl.

On a tour Tuesday, researchers showed numerous indications that Katrina's surge was not as tall as the lakefront's protections. They showed a "debris line" that indicates the top height of Katrina's waves was at least four feet below the crest of Lake Pontchartrain's levees. They also pointed out how the breached floodwalls near the lake showed no signs of overtopping -- no splattering of mud, no drip lines and no erosion at their bases. They contended that the pattern of destruction behind the breaches was consistent with a localized "pressure burst," rather than widespread overtopping.

The center has also completed a computerized "hindcast" of Katrina, which has confirmed the evidence before their eyes. Their model indicates that most of the surge around the lake and its nearby canals was less than 11 feet above sea level, and that none of it should have been greater than 13 feet. The Army Corps's flood-protection system for New Orleans was designed to handle surges of more than 14 feet above sea level.

"This should not have been a big deal for these floodwalls," said oceanographer G. Paul Kemp, a hurricane expert who runs LSU's Natural Systems Modeling Laboratory. "It should have been a modest challenge. There's no way this should have exceeded the capacity."

The center's researchers said it is too early to say whether the breaches were caused by poor design, faulty construction or some combination. But van Heerden said the floodwalls at issue -- massive concrete slabs mounted on steel sheet pilings -- looked more like the sound barriers found on major highways. He also suggested that the slabs should have been interlocked, and that the canals they were supposed to protect should have had floodgates to keep out water from the lake.

Former representative Bob Livingston (R-La.), who helped lead the charge for Corps projects in Louisiana when he chaired the House Appropriations Committee, noted that the earthen levees along Lake Pontchartrain had all held, while the concrete floodwalls had failed. He was especially concerned about the 17th Street barrier, saying it "shouldn't have broken."

"I don't know if it's bad construction or bad design, but whoever the contractor is has a problem," said Livingston, now a lobbyist on Capitol Hill.

Former senator J. Bennett Johnston (D-La.) said he remembers numerous briefings from Corps officials about the danger of a hurricane overtopping the New Orleans levees. But he said he never envisioned a scenario like this one. "This came as a surprise," he said.

The Corps has not identified the contractors who built the floodgates that failed; Paul Johnston said there will be a full investigation into the breaches.

Congress authorizes flood- control projects -- after receiving recommendations from the Corps -- and the Corps oversees their design and construction.

John M. Barry -- who criticized the Corps in "Rising Tide," a history of the Mississippi River flood of 1927 -- said that if Katrina did not exceed the design capacity of the New Orleans levees, the federal government may bear ultimate responsibility for this disaster.

"If this is true, then the loss of life and the devastation in much of New Orleans is no more a natural disaster than a surgeon killing a patient by failing to suture an artery would be a natural death," Barry said. "And that surgeon would be culpable."

Design Flaws Seen In New Orleans Flood Walls (NYT)

By Christopher Drew And Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20 - Along the Mississippi River and Lake Pontchartrain, great earthen levees were ample to hold off much of the surging water propelled by Hurricane Katrina.

But concrete flood walls installed over the last several decades along the drainage and barge canals cutting into New Orleans were built in a way that by Army Corps of Engineers standards left them potentially unstable in a flood, according to government documents and interviews. The walls collapsed in several places during the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0007282

A corps engineering manual cautions that such flood walls "rarely exceed" seven feet because they can lose stability as waters rise. But some of the New Orleans canal walls rose as high as 11 feet above dirt berms in which they were anchored.

As a result of federal budget constraints, the walls were never tested for their ability to withstand the cascades of lake water that rushed up to, or over, their tops as storm waves pulsed through the canals on Aug. 29, corps and local officials say.

Hurricane Katrina was the first serious test of the flood walls, said Stevan Spencer, chief engineer for the Orleans Levee District, and it "just overwhelmed the system."

Since the storm, corps officials have said that there is a simple explanation for the devastation: Hurricane Katrina was a Category 4 storm and Congress authorized a flood control system to handle only a Category 3 storm. "Anything above that, all bets are off," said Al Naomi, a senior project manager in the corps's New Orleans district.

But federal meteorologists say that New Orleans did not get the full brunt of the storm, because its strongest winds passed dozens of miles east of the city. While a formal analysis of the storm's strength and surges will take months, the National Hurricane Center said the sustained winds over Lake Pontchartrain reached only 95 miles per hour, while Category 3 storms are defined by sustained winds of 111 to 130 m.p.h.

This raises a series of questions about how the walls that failed were designed and constructed, as well as whether the soil in some spots was too weak to hold them. Investigations by federal engineers and outside experts are just now beginning.

One factor could be height, said Robert G. Bea, a former corps engineer and professor at the University of California, Berkeley, who is part of a National Science Foundation inquiry into the flood controls failures. The higher the wall, Professor Bea said, the greater the risk it could tip under the ever greater pressure of rising waters.

The 2000 edition of the Army Corps of Engineers manual "Design and Construction of Levees" says that the height of flood walls built on levees is an important factor in their ability to withstand a flood. For that reason, the manual says walls like those used in New Orleans "rarely exceed" seven feet. But on two of the three canals where breaks occurred - the 17th Street and London Avenue canals - the concrete sections rise 11 feet above the dirt berms.

Each wall resembles a row of teeth set in a jaw. Individual slabs are anchored to a continuous steel sheet buried in the dirt, giving the wall its strength. Above a short foundation, the slabs are linked only by rubbery gaskets that allow the concrete to expand and contract without cracking.

Hassan S. Mashriqui, an engineering professor at Louisiana State University and an expert on storm surges, said the segmented nature of the walls could be an additional problem, since any weak point could cause a catastrophic failure.

"Since they're not tied together you get a little bit of a gap and that's what water needs to make it fail," Dr. Mashriqui said.

Other questions surround the walls' design, known as an "I-wall" for its slim cross section that fits easily into densely developed areas.

The corps manual for flood control construction suggests a different design for walls higher than seven feet - walls shaped like an inverted T, with the horizontal section buried in the dirt for extra stability.

But that option was never considered, corps engineers said, because "T walls" were more expensive, required a broad base of dense soil for support and were not necessarily stronger.

The corps and local levee authorities also never tested whether the chosen I-wall design could survive if water flowed over the top and cascaded onto dirt embankments below.

Corps officials said they were proscribed from considering stronger wall designs for the canals both by the tight quarters and by federal law, which requires that they seek and study only the level of flood control authorized by Congress.

"Our hands are tied as to looking at higher-level events," Mr. Naomi said.

Mr. Naomi said that the recommendations in the flood control engineering manual were "general guidance," and that conditions at a particular site could justify deviations.

He defended the walls, saying: "The flood walls have functioned over the years very successfully and without incident. The design works. It has worked in other locales. And will likely continue to be used as long as you do not subject it to pressures that it was not designed to handle."

The broken walls, which were long seen as a second choice to earthen levees, are testament to 40 years of fiscal and political compromises made by elected officials, from local levee boards to Congress and several presidential administrations, as they balanced costs and environmental concerns with the need to protect a city that lies largely below sea level and is still subsiding.

Ever since Hurricane Betsy flooded parts of New Orleans in 1965, the federal government has financed a hurricane defense system designed to guard against an equivalent storm.

But as the threat of a more intense hurricane became better understood in recent years, government financing for flood prevention in New Orleans did not keep pace with a growing alarm among many local residents, scientists and even the corps's own engineers.

DOJ_NMG_0007283

Standing next to the shattered remains of one of the concrete walls last week, Cynthia Hedge-Morrell, a New Orleans councilwoman, said, "In my opinion, they were playing Russian roulette with people's lives."

"Do you realize that if those walls had held, we'd have just had a little cleaning job?" said Ms. Hedge-Morrell, whose district between downtown and the lakefront was covered with 10 feet of water from the breaks of flood walls. "We would not have this massive loss of life and destruction."

On Tuesday, streams of dump trucks hurriedly dumped loads of gravel into the breaches in New Orleans's flood defenses, in case Hurricane Rita shifts toward here later this week.

In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, a surge from Lake Pontchartrain poured into the main parts of the city through breaks on the walls lining the 17th Street and London Avenue canals, which normally carry runoff pumped out of the city into the lake. A separate surge from the Gulf of Mexico overwhelmed the walls along the Industrial Canal, inundating the Lower Ninth Ward. Officials say that break may have been caused by a barge that broke loose from its moorings.

When the hurricane hit, the only earthen levees that failed in a way that produced substantial flooding were on the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, a man-made ship canal east of the city. These levees, which were not as high as those on the river or Lake Pontchartrain, let in the floodwaters that ravaged eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish.

A surge from Lake Pontchartrain was the catastrophic situation that the corps had been guarding against since Hurricane Betsy 40 years ago. Initially, the corps wanted to build a giant barrier to keep water from the Gulf of Mexico from reaching Lake Pontchartrain and flooding the canals.

That project was delayed by lawsuits from environmental groups that contended the corps had failed to study ecological effects. By the late 1970's, the corps abandoned that approach and began raising levees along the lake and the Mississippi and adding flood walls on the canals.

In the mid-1990's, engineering professors at Louisiana State began publicizing computer models that showed how a Category 5 storm could kill tens of thousands of people and flood the French Quarter. Corps officials in Louisiana pushed local officials to help seek more money from Congress, both to finish existing upgrades and to start bolstering the city against bigger threats.

Joseph Suhayda, who was one of the Louisiana State professors, said corps officials privately urged him to "raise the consciousness" about the dire threats.

But upgrading the flood control system never became a major priority for corps officials in Washington, local and federal officials say.

Corps veterans said it was not surprising that federal engineers did not issue more vocal warnings.

"I don't think it was culturally in the system for the corps to say 'this is crazy,' " said William F. Marcuson III, the former director of the Waterways Experiment Station for the corps in Vicksburg, Miss., and president-elect of the American Society of Civil Engineers.

"The corps works for Congress," Mr. Marcuson said, "and when the boss says design for a Category 3 storm, culturally the corps is not going to go back and say this is wrong."

Investigations into how the walls failed are just now beginning. Col. Richard Wagenaar, commander of the corps district in New Orleans, said the soil behind the flood walls could have been weakened after they were topped by the storm surge, or the walls could have simply given way as the water - and the pressure - mounted against them.

Indeed, as several engineers said, while a dirt levee of similar height might eventually be topped as well, and possibly eroded, only the walls were vulnerable to a sudden collapse.

The determination of how the walls fell will bear on how officials decide to remake the flood control system.

Max Hearn, executive director of the Orleans Levee District, said that if the federal government was now ready to pay for Category 5 protection, it seemed unlikely that the flood wall system could be upgraded to that level.

But Mr. Hearn said the only answer might be the construction of flood gates designed to limit a hurricane surge in Lake Pontchartrain - the same idea that was considered and dropped in the 1970's.

Damaged Levees Offer New Orleans Little Flood Protection, Corps Says (KRT)

By Pete Carey

Knight Ridder, September 21, 2005

Hurricane Katrina so weakened New Orleans' 350-mile levee system that it probably can't protect the city from flooding even in a relatively minor storm, officials with the Army Corps of Engineers said.

While workers have closed most of the breaches that allowed the city to flood after Katrina, none of the burst levees has been returned to its pre-flood height, corps officials said. Many other sections of the levee have washed away or have eroded enough that even a small rise in the surrounding waters would spill into the city.

DOJ_NMG_0007284

The damage to the levees is particularly worrisome as Hurricane Rita approaches the Gulf Coast. Engineers were working feverishly Tuesday to close gaps.

One break remains open on the 17th Street Canal and two are still open along the London Avenue canals, spokeswoman Dana Finney said. Corps engineers dropped 80 10,000-pound sandbags into the breaches Tuesday in an effort to close them.

Walls along both canals are so damaged, however, that corps officials decided to prepare to seal the canals' entrances to Lake Pontchartrain temporarily - even though such a move would render them useless in carrying out their designated purpose, draining water from the city into the lake. A decision on whether to take the final steps to close the canals will be made at noon Wednesday.

"London Avenue has got significant structural problems, we know that," said Col. Richard P. Wagenaar, the corps's New Orleans district commander. "That's why we're closing it off."

Corps officials said recovery efforts were likely to be delayed in St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes by a decision to close levee breaks there that had been made to help drain those areas. St. Bernard Parish has been pumped nearly dry.

Computer modeling suggests that parts of the city and nearby parishes could be endangered even without a direct hit from Rita, Finney said.

In a statement Sunday, Brig Gen. Robert Crear, the commander of the corps's Katrina recovery task force, said the system in its current state "does not ensure that the city will be protected against storms or hurricanes." He warned that people in the city would be at risk.

Tuesday, Crear said he thought the levees might be able to handle a storm surge of up to 5 feet, far less than the 17 feet that Katrina brought. He said there was no way the levee system could be repaired before Rita hits and that the goal was to make repairs in time for next year's hurricane season, which begins June 1.

Any new flooding probably would slow down repair operations, said David Pezza, a corps engineering-construction specialist. "I have to say we would have to anticipate a delay," Pezza said, "but our goals are still June 2006."

Officials have noted that new flooding would primarily threaten areas that already were damaged in the floods from Katrina.

In its statement Sunday, corps officials offered a grim assessment of the levee system: Only one of six levees cited was deemed in good shape; the others were likely to flood in a storm.

Joseph Suhayada, retired director of the Louisiana Water Resources Research Institute at Louisiana State University, said some breaches had been filled only to 3 or 4 feet above the level of Lake Pontchartrain, although they were still being built up. They might reach 5 feet of protection soon, "which is not much of a storm."

The corps has stocked 800 huge sandbags to close any new levee breaches and has ordered 2,500 more.

Even heavy rain would be a threat. "With anywhere from 2 to 3 inches of rain, we will get some locations that could have potentially 2 to 3 feet of water," Wagenaar said.

"Hopefully, there won't be too much rain," Wagenaar said.

Supersizing The Levees (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery and Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Three weeks after Hurricane Katrina ripped siding off the three-story building where Ben White owns a hair salon, he was still sweeping away a mess of brown leaves and hair-spritzer nozzles. But one of the battered building's best features was intact: a panoramic view of Lake Pontchartrain.

Even that could change as federal and state officials dust off dormant plans to fortify the system of levees and flood walls in and around New Orleans that proved too weak to withstand Katrina. While none of the options being considered is anywhere close to approval, the floodwaters that inundated the city have boosted the odds that between five and 10 feet could eventually be added to the height of the levees that now generally rise 13 to 18 feet.

Floodwaters are receding in New Orleans, but larger levees may threaten land and homes near the 17th Street Canal.

Besides costing billions of dollars, bolstering the line of defense against future hurricanes would likely send swarms of bulldozers into swank neighborhoods, threaten environmentally vulnerable marshes and trigger lawsuits from homeowners whose property would have to be seized to make room for the supersize levees. Raising the height of the levees to 25 feet or higher could also block views of the lake and require engineers to widen the base of the dirt structures by 100 feet or more.

"It would be disappointing to lose the view," says Mr. White, whose salon is in the Bucktown section of Metairie, just west of New Orleans. But he adds that he "wouldn't be against something that was good for the community."

The city's current flood-control system was designed to handle up to a Category 3 hurricane. Katrina, with winds as strong as 145 miles an hour, was a Category 4. Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which builds most levees and other flood-control systems, say that, from a scientific and engineering standpoint, a levee system can be built that would safeguard the city from even the most powerful hurricanes. "There's no question...we could build to protect against a Category 5 storm," says Don Basham, chief of engineering at Army Corps headquarters in Washington.

A 2002 preliminary study by the Army Corps' New Orleans district of whether the hurricane-protection system around New Orleans should be upgraded included the option of raising levees, and engineers say some could approach 30 feet. It would require protective gates to be built where the canals empty into Lake Pontchartrain, but no changes are likely to be needed in the concrete flood walls along the canals.

Another option drawing renewed attention would steer an estimated $3 billion to the Army Corps to build and reinforce a 35-mile section of levees east of New Orleans, including massive gates in two channels linking Lake Pontchartrain with Lake Borgne and the Gulf of Mexico, plus a third gate at the junction of two man-made waterways that are popular shipping lanes. The gates would be closed as hurricanes approach to block storm surges from flooding the city and neighboring communities, as they did when Katrina barreled through.

It can take decades to study and fund major flood-control projects, partly because state and local governments are required to share the costs. Louisiana officials now contend that protecting New Orleans is so urgent that the federal government should pay for the entire job and that the process for reviewing, designing and constructing stronger levees should be streamlined.

The Louisiana Department of Natural Resources has asked the state's members of Congress to request $18.2 billion in federal funds for a variety of hurricane-protection projects and $14 billion to help restore wetlands that serve as a buffer zone against hurricanes.

So far, state officials are studying a version of the so-called barrier plan east of New Orleans, which would extend levees beyond Slidell, a city on the northern shore of Lake Pontchartrain that was also devastated. But that could harm marshy areas by restricting the natural movement of water. A plan with similar elements was abandoned in the 1970s after environmentalists and fishermen launched a legal attack, and fierce opposition could resurface regardless of how well the new levees would shield New Orleans from floods. The earlier plan also was designed to protect from a Category 3 storm, the corps says.

Randy Hanchey, Louisiana's deputy secretary of natural resources, says state officials are urgently studying the barrier option but haven't decided exactly where the levees and gates would be located. Army Corps officials haven't recommended a specific plan yet. "We'll be looking to the Corps for guidance and working with state and local officials on rebuilding not only New Orleans but its flood-control protection," said Scott Milburn, a spokesman for the White House Office of Management and Budget.

Raising the city's levees, typically grassy mounds where residents used to stroll and enjoy the view of Lake Pontchartrain, could consume precious real estate. One neighborhood that could be affected by new flood control measures is Lakeview, a mostly middle class and upper middle class enclave where housing prices were rising fast before Katrina. Some homes in a nearby neighborhood closer to the lake were valued at as much as $1 million.

The Lakefront Campus of the University of New Orleans on the London Street Canal is still threatened.

It's impossible to tell how much anything is worth now. Along the 17th Street Canal wall, which separates New Orleans from Jefferson Parish and was breached during the hurricane, military vehicles and heavy trucks are kicking up clouds of dust as they repair the flood wall. The homes of families that lived along the canal are strewn with debris from floodwaters that rose near the top of their front doors.

The destruction could make it easier for government officials to use eminent domain to buy out homeowners on sites needed for levee-enlargement projects. But under most eminent-domain laws, compensation is based on assessed value when the purchase is proposed, meaning that New Orleans homeowners would likely get far less than they would have before the storm.

"The whole question of fair market value is going to be very murky," says John McIlwain, a senior resident fellow at the Urban Land Institute in Washington, adding that he expects "a significant amount of litigation."

Jim Wright, who lives in the Lakeshore neighborhood, doubts that many of those who lived on the canals will ever move back now that they know protective flood walls can be breached. "I can't imagine anyone would want to have that time bomb in their backyard," he says.

But Arthur Sterbcow, president of Latter & Blum, a large residential real-estate firm in Louisiana, predicts that affected residents will welcome the added protection -- and that property values will rise as a result.

Katrina's Children Find New Schools, And Fears (NYT)

DAVE SCHRANDT is in charge of registering homeless children for the Cypress-Fairbanks school district, and when he really gets cranked up, he can fill out the six forms to enroll a hurricane evacuee in 15 minutes.

"O.K., Tyrone, you get free breakfast, free lunch, free school supplies, and you'll start tomorrow," he said, madly checking off boxes one day last week. Tyrone Edwards, 16, and Emma Collins, his grandmother, from St. Bernard Parish, La., barely had time to nod before another box was checked.

"Address?" Mr. Schrandt asked, and not waiting, he wrote "8350 Highway 6N," the address of the shelter at Copperfield Church.

Mr. Schrandt asked what kind of math Tyrone was taking back home, and when all the boy could answer was "Math 3," Mr. Schrandt guessed it was probably Algebra II, wrote that in, then put a question mark beside "science," since Tyrone knew he was taking a science, but not which one.

"Special ed?" Mr. Schrandt said, jumping to the next question.

"He had both special ed and the regular," Mrs. Collins said.

"Almost done," said Mr. Schrandt, who asked if Tyrone needed clothes. Mrs. Collins said Tyrone's bag was left behind when they were helicoptered out of the flood, so Mr. Schrandt made notes on Tyrone's pants size (28-30 waist), shirt size (large) and shoe size (11).

"Biggest shoes I've had so far were 18's," Mr. Schrandt said. "So that's it. We're done." And the next morning, before 7, a bus pulled up to the church for Tyrone, one of 1,910 Katrina kids who have enrolled in this suburban district, which includes a small part of Houston and northwest Harris County.

While much of the federal response to Katrina has been its own epic disaster, a rare bright light is the McKinney-Vento Act, federal legislation passed in 2002 to ensure that homeless children are quickly enrolled in school. The law requires that every school district in America have a homeless liaison worker like Mr. Schrandt; that children are registered immediately, even those without records; and that transportation is provided.

Barbara Duffield, policy director of the National Association for the Education of Homeless Children, said she was hearing from as far away as Alaska that the enrollment of the 370,000 displaced children has generally been swift and good hearted.

"It's almost like the three years since the law was passed were a rehearsal for Katrina," she said. "Districts were ready. We're seeing school officials take, not just the letter of the law, but the spirit of the law to heart." And Texas, which has enrolled the most evacuees, 44,812, "gets the gold star," she said.

At Owens Elementary here there is a room called the Closet, stocked with clothing donations that are organized by size, so flood families can shop free for what they need. Each new child is assigned a classroom buddy, a playground buddy, a cafeteria buddy and a bus buddy, so instantly they have four new friends.

In the teachers' lunchroom at Danish Elementary there is a Star of Hope Tree. The stars list evacuee families' needs; teachers pick off a star and shop for the items. "My 15-year-old got three pairs of pants, four to five brand- new shirts," said Judith Howard, a mother of five, who is living doubled up with her sister's family.

There was so little red tape enrolling that New Orleans parents like Barbara Varnado and Latanya Hawkins did not even know the name of their children's new district; they thought they were in Houston city schools.

That is the good news. The hard news on relocation is just emerging. From visits to several schools and shelters in this district of 85,000, the third largest in the state, it is clear that a major task lies ahead, teaching and counseling the newcomers. Principals and teachers say many seem to be behind local students academically and to be traumatized.

At Owens (41 evacuees) and Danish (31), teachers have just begun assessing the new students, and are finding many with significant academic gaps. This is not surprising. The schools here are in their sixth week; New Orleans children had been in school a week when the hurricane hit and are beginning here just as the local students finish midterm exams.

They have been transplanted to a state with an intensive test-driven curriculum that they have not been prepared for. And they have come from an urban district considered one of the worst and poorest in the nation to a middle- to upper-class high-achieving suburban district. "We're recommending a lot for extra tutoring," said Laura Barrett, the Owens principal.

Add to that the effect of the horrors that many have seen. Sadie Woodard, head of counseling for the district, is having every new child interviewed individually and using retired counselors to run weekly support groups. "I have five or six - they have this look, it just breaks your heart, the fear in their eyes," Ms. Barrett said.

At Owens, several have fallen asleep during reading and music and on the soft pillows in the library. A lot still live in church shelters, crowded hotel rooms and doubled up in homes with relatives. The other day, Ms. Barrett carried out a 4-year old prekindergarten girl who was snoring and being sent home for rest. "We tell them it's O.K., they're not in trouble, they can put their heads down," Ms. Barrett said. "They just need a nap."

Aisha Brown's first-grade daughter, India, was sent "home" from Adam Elementary to the Cypress Bible Church shelter to get some sleep. "She hasn't been right since the storm," Ms. Brown said. "India saw everything."

Ms. Brown's three children were saved from the rising waters when the parents emptied their refrigerator, broke off the door and floated them six blocks to a bridge. "India saw people falling off the bridge and drowning, screaming for help. She saw shooting at the Superdome." The mother said that when they finally got on an evacuation bus, "India asked me, 'Is there going to be shooting on the bus, too?' "

At the church shelter, the mother said, people have been extraordinarily kind, but India remains fearful. "She sleepwalks and cries, hollering for me," she said. As parishioners filed into the church hall last week, India was briefly separated from her parents. "I found her under a table crying," said the mother.

LAST week, at 7:30 Monday morning, Brandon Hart paced the lobby of the Hampton Inn where he was living, eager for the school bus to arrive. He said he loved his new middle school, Labay; it was better than his New Orleans school. "I want to stay here," he said. "I used to live in a bad neighborhood. It's better out here. It's quiet. And I'm on the football team. I'm going to my first practice today. They told me I was going to start at tight end. They seen me play on the playground. I'm pretty good."

The next morning, back in the lobby he looked miserable. "I couldn't practice," he said. "They're getting ready for the game. They said it would be too confusing for everyone. They said I had to wait a few days." By Saturday night, the family had checked out and was heading to Baton Rouge, La., to try resettling there. The volatility is reflected in the numbers. Last week, there were 1,910 Katrina children enrolled in Cypress-Fairbanks district; Monday, it was 1,632.

At Cypress Falls High, the principal gathered the 95 Katrina children to welcome them and urged that they join clubs to integrate more quickly into the school. But Reyna Turcios, 16, who came from New Orleans with her aunt and three cousins after their apartment was destroyed, said she did not think she would join anything. "I don't want to get in there and do all the stuff and get so happy and then leave again," she said. "I don't like being here in Houston. I miss my friends, my school, my teachers. It seems impossible, but I wish we could go back and have our own life."
