SEN. HATCH: That's what the Katz versus U.S. case seemed to say, isn't it, that wiretapping to protect the security of the nation has been authorized by successive presidents. Is that correct?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: It is certainly the case that successive presidents, particularly during a time of war, have authorized warrantless searches.

SEN. HATCH: And you're relying on the Hamdi case as well, where a majority of the court basically authorized the president exceptional powers under the authorized use of military force as statute?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I wouldn't say they're exceptional powers. I think that they're traditional powers for the president under a time of war.

SEN. HATCH: I think that's fair. Okay. Then U.S. versus Truong. That was a 1983 (sic) case. U.S. --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes. Once again, the court finding that the president of the United States does have the inherent authority to engage in warrantless searches consistent with the Fourth Amendment for purposes of gathering foreign intelligence.

SEN. HATCH: That was the case after the enactment of the FISA law, right?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: It was the case after the enactment of FISA. But I think to be fair, I don't think the court did a rigorous analysis about how FISA affects the analysis, but there was a decision by the court that the president had the inherent authority.

SEN. HATCH: Yeah, that's the important part in the case, as far as I'm concerned.

U.S. versus Letenko (ph). It's a 1974 case before FISA. U.S. versus Brown, U.S. versus -- U.S. District Court in the so-called Keith case.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: The Keith case was where the court for the first time said that electronic surveillance -- it would be subject -- electronic surveillance for domestic security purposes is subject to the Fourth Amendment.

SEN. HATCH: Well, Haig versus Agee that matters -- that's a 1981 case again after FISA that matters intimately related to foreign policy and national security rarely are proper subjects for judicial intervention.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Let me make --

SEN. HATCH: That's a recognition where the president has to make some decisions, rights? ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Right. If I could just follow up, Senator, on my statement on the Keith case, where the court did say that electronic surveillance for purposes of domestic security would be subject to the warrant requirements under the Fourth Amendment -- the court expressly made clear that they were not talking about electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes. They were only talking about electronic surveillance for domestic security purposes.

SEN. HATCH: What about the (Prize ?) cases? They're very well- known cases, and -- culminating in the case that quotes the (Prize ?) cases in Campbell versus Clinton.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Again, there are a number of cases that recognizes the president's inherent constitutional authority, particularly in a time of war --

SEN. HATCH: Well, and the president's independent authority. Is that correct? That's what Campbell versus Clinton says.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: To engage in surveillance in order to protect our country.

SEN. HATCH: Well, in fact, there's the 2002 case, In re: Sealed Cases, right?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: In re: Sealed Cases, as I said in my statement --

SEN. HATCH: I mean, that's a case decided by the FISA Court of Review, the actual FISA Court, right?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: The FISA Court of Review was created by Congress to review the decisions by the FISA Court. In that decision in that case, the FISA Court of Review acknowledged that these cases by other circuit courts the president does have the inherent authority, and the FISA Court of Review said assuming that to be true, that FISA could not encroach upon the powers of the president.

SEN. HATCH: They couldn't encroach on the president's constitutional powers.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That's correct.

SEN. HATCH: So people who are wildly saying that the president is violating the law are ignoring all these cases that say that the -- that -- or at least imply that he has the inherent power to be able to do what he should to protect our nation during a time of war.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: And I want to emphasize, Senator, this is not a case of -- where we're saying FISA -- we're overriding FISA or we're ignoring FISA. Quite the contrary. We're interpreting the authorization to use military force as a statutory grant --

SEN. HATCH: You use FISA all the time, don't you?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: We -- FISA is an extremely important tool in fighting the war on terror. I know today there's going to be some discussion about whether or not we should amend FISA. I don't know that FISA needs to be amended per se, because when you think about it, FISA covers much more than international surveillance. It exists even in the peacetime. And so when you're talking about domestic surveillance during peacetime, I think the procedures of FISA, quite frankly, are quite reasonable. And so that's one of the dangers of trying to seek an amendment to FISA, is that you -- there are certain parts of FISA that think provide good protections. And to make an amendment to FISA in order to allow the activities that the president has authorized, I am concerned, will jeopardize this program.

SEN. HATCH: And may even encroach on the inherent powers of the president, right?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, sir.

SEN. HATCH: Well, let me just say this to you. As I view your arguments -- and we are faced with a war unlike any other war we've ever been in. We're faced with a war of international terrorists -- that's one reason we did the Patriot Act, was to bring our domestic criminal laws up or -- excuse me -- our international terrorism -- anti-terrorism laws up to the equivalent of domestic criminal laws.

And you're saying that -- and I have to say I find some solace in this -- you're saying that when Congress, through a joint resolution, authorized the use of military force, gave the president these wide powers that are much wider than the ordinary single-sentence declaration of war up through World War II, which was the last one, if I recall it correctly -- that that statute allowed you, coupled with inherent powers of the president, to be able to go after these terrorists before they hit us again.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: This is an example of Congress exercising its Article I powers to pass legislation, so the president, in exercising his inherent authorities under Article II, has all the authority that he needs to fight al Qaeda.

SEN. HATCH: Well, the authorized use is not -- of military force resolution, which was a joint resolution of both houses of Congress, declared that the nation faces, quote, "an unusual and extraordinary threat," unquote, and acknowledges that the president has authority under the Constitution to take action to deter and prevent acts of international terrorism against the United States, and provides that the president is authorized, quote, "to use all necessary and appropriate force," unquote, against those he determines are linked to the September 11th attacks.

Now, that sweeping language goes a lot further than the usual single-sentence declaration of war; right?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: It is a very broad authorization, which makes sense. I don't think anyone in those days and weeks, certainly not in the Congress, were thinking about cataloguing all those authorities that you wanted to give to the president. I think everyone expected the president of the United States to do everything he could to protect our country. And the Supreme Court has said that those words, "all necessary and appropriate force," means that the Congress has given to the president of the United States the authority to engage in all the activities that are fundamental and incident to waging war.

SEN. HATCH: So you're relying on an act of Congress, a joint resolution, you're relying on the inherent powers of the president to protect our borders and to protect us, and you're relying on the Fourth Amendment, which allows reasonable searches and seizures in the best interest of the American public. Is that a fair analysis?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That is a fair analysis, yes, sir.

SEN. HATCH: My time is up, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Hatch.

Senator Kennedy?

SEN. EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I think the final comments about all of us desiring to protect our country is something which is common. We certainly respect your strong dedication and commitment to that, Attorney General.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Thank you, Senator.

SEN. KENNEDY: And I think all of us remember the time of 9/11. I certainly do, being actually with Mrs. Bush just before her testimony on an education hearing. It's a moment that's emblazoned in all our minds.

Now, I want to approach this in a somewhat different way in the questioning. I'm very concerned about the whole issue and question, if you're not right legally. Now, you make a very strong case in your presentation here about the authority which you are acting on. You talk about the authorization by the Congress, you talk about inherent power, you talk about the president having the authority and the power to do this. But there is, of course, a very significant legal opinion to the contrary. There was within your department very important, thoughtful lawyers that were in the Department of Justice who have questioned it, constitutional authorities that have questioned it.

So we're taking, really, a risk that I think -- with national security -- which I think is unwise. We're sending the wrong message to those that are in the front lines of the NSA that maybe someday they may actually be prosecuted, criminally or civilly. We're sending a message to the courts that perhaps the materials that we're going to take from wire -- from let me just say from eavesdropping or signal intelligence may not be used in the courts, again, prosecuting al Qaeda, people we really want to go after, because it wasn't done legally. We're sending a message to the telephone companies that they may be under assault and attack as well. There are already some cases now brought by individuals against the telephone companies.

So that we have to get it right, because if we don't get it right, we're going to find that we have paid a very harsh price on it. Some of those toughest, meanest and cruelest members of al Qaeda may not -- may be able to use illegality in the court system to escape justice. Maybe or maybe not, but why take a chance?

Now, we were facing the issue of electronic surveillance at another time, in 1976 when we had Attorney General Ed Levi and President Ford, and they followed a much different course than you have followed. Ed Levi came and consulted with us. Members of this committee four -- went down and visited the Justice Department on four different times. The memoranda that we have from that period of time point out -- the Boushin (ph) memoranda, which are part of the record -- the concerns that the attorney general had about getting it right in terms of electronic surveillance; uncertainty in courts, validity of evidence, cooperation of the phone companies.

And in a series of memoranda that go to the president of the United States and discussions that were -- were actually held with the important -- with Henry Kissinger, Don Rumsfeld, Ed Levi, Brent Scowcroft, George Bush, lengthy discussions with others -- finally the attorney general said the main concern was whether this legislative initiative would succeed or whether, as some feared, the legislation which has actually passed would depart in objectionable ways, so that they were not sure about what Congress would do. But they dealt with the Congress and they got FISA.

Later it goes on to say, "Already the attorney general has found key members of the Senate Judiciary Committee receptive to the legislation." And then, finally, "The attorney general is strongly of the opinion that you" -- the president -- "should support the legislation as drafted. If you feel any hesitancy, I'll come by and brief you."

This is what we had 27 years ago -- an attorney general, they came up to the Judiciary Committee, have them come down and work out FISA, and it passed with one dissenting vote in the United States Senate. It might not have gotten it right, but it -- certainly for that period of time that it -- that it got it right.

And the question that I have for you is, why didn't you follow that kind of pathway, which was so successful at a different time? We had a Republican president, Republican attorney general. We're talking about electronic surveillance. And as you know from the FISA, there are very sensitive provisions that were included in there that were directed against foreign nationals that this committee was able to deal with and do it in a responsible way. Why -- why didn't you follow that -- that pattern?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, the short answer is -- is that we didn't think we needed to, quite frankly. I've tried to make clear today that we looked at this issue carefully, decided that -- that neither the Constitution nor FISA, which contemplated a new -- a new statute, would prohibit this kind of activity from going forward.

I might also say this is a little different time in terms of what existed in 1976. Of course, we are at war. And -- and we have briefed certain members of Congress, so it's not entirely true that we didn't reach out to the Congress and talk -- certain members of Congress -- and talk to them about this program, about what we were doing. SEN. KENNEDY: Well, the point I'd say, we were facing a nuclear threat. We've got terrorism now, but it was a nuclear threat then. The Cold War was in full flow at that time. It was a nuclear threat at that time.

And do you know what Attorney General Levi did? He took a day and a half to have outside constitutional authorities to come down and advise him on the questions of the constitutionality of the legislation. A day and a half.

Now, did you talk to any outside authorities? Not inside authorities that are going to give you, quite frankly, probably what you want to hear, but did you check any -- the reason I question on this, General, is because we've been through the Bybee amendment. We've been through torture amendments where you and the OLC and the White House counsel thought that those -- those -- the -- not amendments, memoranda -- but that the Bybee memoranda was just fine. And then we find out during the course of your hearings that it wasn't fine, and it was effectively repealed a year and a half after it was in -- in effect.

So it's against that kind of background about certainty, about your view about its legality and in-house review of the legality, some of us would have wondered, did you do or take the steps that Ed Levi, a Republican attorney general, on the same subject, was willing to do, to listen to outside constitutional authority? Because as we have seen subsequently, you've had difficulty in your own department, and you've had substantial difficulty with constitutional and others that might not believe that you're correct.

If it is correct, we haven't got a problem. If you're not correct, then it is a step back in terms of national security.

And my question to you is, looking at the national security issue, wouldn't we be in a stronger position if you'd come to the Congress and say let's get the kind of legislative authority that we need, rather than take a chance? Wouldn't our national security have been better defended if we didn't have any question as to the legality of this issue? Wouldn't the people that are in the frontlines of our national security be better protected and our court system better defended? And when we were able to get those al Qaeda individuals and they know they don't have any loopholes by appealing illegal eavesdropping, maybe then they begin to talk and try and make a deal; maybe then that enhances our national security as well.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Well, sir, you've said a lot, so I don't know -- (chuckles) --

SEN. KENNEDY: Yes, short time, but I've --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Let me just say, you're absolutely right, we've got to have a very clear message, and we cannot be wrong on this. I do not think that we are wrong on this.

Are we worried about the frontline people out at NSA? Of course we are. That is why the president, the day after the story ran in The New York Times, went out to the American people to reassure them this was not a situation where we had an agency running amuck; that he had authorized this activity, and it was very narrowly tailored.

In terms of whether or not are we concerned about activities that may jeopardize investigations or prosecutions? Absolutely we are. That's the last thing we want to do. We do not believe this program is -- we believe this program is lawful. We do not believe that prosecutions are going to be jeopardized as a result of this program. Obviously, we're in litigation now, so I don't want to say much more than that. But of course we ought to be operating in a way where we're doing what we need to do to protect our investigations and to protect our prosecutions. And I think that we're doing that.

SEN. KENNEDY: My time is just about up.

Thank you very much, General. SEN. SPECTER: I want to -- thank you very much, Senator Kennedy.

I want to acknowledge the presence in the audience of Ms. Debra Burlingame, who is the sister of Captain Charles F. Burlingame, the pilot on American Airlines Flight 77, which crashed into the Pentagon.

Attorney General Gonzales, would you like a break?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: If you're offering a break, Mr. Chairman.

(Laughter.)

SEN. SPECTER: Well, I'm not going to offer you one unless you want one.

(Laughter.)

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I'm fine, sir. I will defer to you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. : Take the break!

SEN. : Take the break!

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I'll take a break. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. SPECTER: Well, let's take a vote here! (Laughter.)

Ten minute break.

SEN. SCHUMER: Have you got the proxies?

(Recess.)

SEN. SPECTER: (In progress) -- the presence of Ms. Monica Gabrielle and Ms. Mindy Kleinburg, family members, husbands in the World Trade Center at the time of the 9/11 attack.

Mr. Attorney General, thank you for rejoining us. And we turn now to Senator Grassley.

SEN. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY (R-IA): I'm going to start -- thank you very much. I'm going to start with something that's just peripheral to the issues we're on, but it does deal with our national security, and it's the leak of this information to The New York Times. And I'm greatly concerned about this, and these leaks could be putting our nation's safety into serious jeopardy.

Could you tell us what is being done to investigate who leaked this national security information and whether the Department of Justice will initiate a prosecution of an individual leaking the information?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, we have confirmed that the department has initiated an investigation into possible crimes here, and I really -- consistent with department practice, I'm not going to talk much further than -- about our ongoing investigation. Obviously, we have to look at the evidence, and if the evidence shows that a crime has been committed, then obviously we'll have to make a decision about moving forward with the prosecution.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Well -- and I don't blame you for this, but I don't hear as much about public outcry about this leak as I did about Valerie Plame and the White House disclosures of her -- presumed disclosures of her identity of a CIA agent, and to me, that's a two- bit nothing compared to this sort of issue that we have before us of this information being leaked to the press.

And in the follow-up commentaries, reading the newspapers and TV, you get the impression that this is some sort of an LBJ-J. Edgar Hoover operation that's designed to skirt the law, to spy on domestic enemies, and I think you're making very clear the opposite -- that this is only concerned about the national security of the United States and that's where the focus should be.

But the constant repetition on the news media of the term "domestic spying," as opposed to spying on and electronic surveillance of somebody outside the United States, connected with an organization that has as their goal the killing of Americans or the threatening of America or the destruction that happened on September the 11th is entirely two different things. But when "domestic spying" is often used, you can understand, General, the people having outrage maybe at what's going on.

Also, for my colleagues on this committee, it seems to me that if we're doing our job right, we've got some problems, because let's just say the attorney general is wrong in the statutory authority and constitutional authority by which they proceeded to do what they're doing, and yet members of Congress was told about this program over a period of four years -- a few members of Congress were -- the appropriate ones were. And then, all of sudden it hits The New York Times, and all of a sudden when that story breaks, congressmen change their tune from the one sung in private for four years to outrage that this is going on.

So if Senator Grassley, who's not a member of that elite group that has to be concerned about oversight of foreign intelligence, knows about it and doesn't tell -- if I were a member and didn't tell my colleagues about it and then expressed that outrage, where have I been as a member of that group for the last four years? If something's wrong after The New York Times reported, there had to be something wrong before The New York Times reported it. And all of a sudden, I see members of Congress who had that responsibility -- if they really sincerely think it's wrong today -- that were caught not doing their job of congressional oversight as they should of, informing the other members of Congress that there's really something wrong that the president's doing here. So I think we in Congress have to do some -- some internal looking of whether or not we're doing our job as well as -- of oversight.

Now, I always want to remind people in the United States that what we're talking about here today is to make sure that September the 11th doesn't happen again, and somehow we tend to have short memories. We ought to remember that it happened in Madrid, it happened in London, it happened in Amman, it happened in a resort in Egypt, it happened in Bali twice, and it has happened here. It can happen again. And it seems to me that what you're trying to tell us is the president's determined to make sure that it doesn't happen in the United States again, and that's what their surveillance is all about. Yes?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, he is absolutely determined to do everything that he can under the Constitution and the laws of this country to prevent another September 11th from happening again.

SEN. GRASSLEY: And I think you're telling us that in the case of people giving some information on a telephone call, that it's very necessary to act with dispatch; that acting with dispatch or not can be a matter of life or death for Americans. ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Absolutely. If we get information that may lead us to other information about a terrorist operating in this country, we may not have a matter of days or weeks or months -- which is sometimes the case with respect to the FISA application -- but we may not have that much time to begin surveillance. And if we wait -- and again, FISA has been a wonderful tool and has been very effective in the war on terror, but there are certain circumstances where the requirements of FISA present challenges -- and if we wait, we may lose valuable information that may help us -- it may help us get information that might prevent another attack.

SEN. GRASSLEY: I had an opportunity to speak to you on the phone recently, and I asked you to come ready to give us some specific instances of when past presidents have ordered warrantless intelligence surveillance in the prosecution of a war, or to otherwise fulfill the commander in chief's duties. I think that as the American public hears examples of how Democrat presidents and Republican presidents alike have done similar things, they may begin to see this program in a different light, particularly in regard to the presidents' over 225 years' use of the exercise of the power of commander in chief.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I gave in my opening statement, Senator, examples where President Washington, President Lincoln, President Wilson, President Roosevelt have all authorized electronic surveillance of the enemy on a far broader scale, far broader -- without any kind of probable cause standard, all communications in and out of the country.

And so, for example, President Wilson in World War I, I mean, he relied upon -- he relied upon his constitutional authority, inherent constitutional authority and a use of force resolution, declaration of war, that -- very consistent with what we're dealing with today.

SEN. GRASSLEY: And December the 8th, '41, the day after Pearl Harbor, FDR ordered the FBI to intercept any communications between our country and any other country, whether it be by mail or any other sort of --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: President Roosevelt did authorize very broad surveillance of the enemy.

SEN. GRASSLEY: It's well established that the president has a number of inherent constitutional powers. Today's hearing, and the two that will follow, will give the Senate an opportunity to analyze the president's case on constitutionality.

When Moussaoui was arrested, the FBI couldn't look at his computer files and telephone contacts. Now, that's been changed so you can have that sort of communication now.

Could you tell us, in the Department of Justice white paper -- (audio break) -- including why the administration believes that its power in this regard is at its zenith. ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, sir. I'll try to, with the time remaining. Justice Jackson --

SEN. GRASSLEY: No, all I have to do is finish my question before the time's up.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Okay. (Chuckles.) Justice -- pardon me, Senator. Justice Jackson laid out a three-part test in terms of determining presidential power. The first part is when the president is exercising his authority with the concurrence, in essence, of Congress. We believe that's what is occurring here. We believe the authorization to use military force is such a concurrence by Congress for the president to engage in this kind of activity, and therefore we believe the president's power is at its zenith in this first category.

The second category is where the president is exercising his constitutional authority in the absence of any congressional action or -- and there Justice Jackson talked about being sort of in the zone of twilight and not -- and trying to ascertain where the limits are between presidential authority and congressional authority. That is not the case here.

The third part was where the president is acting in contravention -- not in contravention but in a way that's incompatible with congressional action. In that particular case, the president -- you look at the president -- constitutional authority minus whatever constitutional congressional authority Congress has.

And so the question is whether or not -- in which category we are in. We believe we're in the first category; that the Congress has, through the authorization to use military force, provided its support for presidential action.

If in fact that is not the case, then we're in the third category.

And I submit, Senator, that this case is very different from Youngstown, where we talked about the president of the United States taking over domestic industry. We're talking here about a core constitutional action by the president, long -- the long history of presidents -- engage in electronic surveillance of the enemy. And so is a much different situation.

And my judgment is, while these are always very hard cases, and they're all -- and there's very little precedent in this matter, I believe that even under the third part, that the president does have the constitutional authority. I will just remind the committee that Chairman Roberts just recently submitted a letter to the committee, and he himself opined that he also believes that if we were in the third category, that he believes that the president does -- would have the constitutional authority to engage in these kind of activities.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Grassley.

Without objection, we will admit into the record the letter from Senator Pat Roberts, chairman of the Intelligence Committee, to Senator Leahy and myself, dated February 3rd of this year.

Senator Biden.

SEN. JOSEPH BIDEN (D-DE): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I hope Chairman Roberts will see it his responsibility to also hold extensive hearings in the forum that is more appropriate, totally secret. Thus far, I'm told, he has intended on not holding any, which I find bordering on lacking any responsibility in terms of congressional oversight. But I hope he will do as you have done here.

General, there are two real issues here, in my view.

MORE .EOF I'm going to focus on one, and that is the president's reassurance as to what is exactly happening, for if, in fact, the only people being wiretapped or e-mails read are al Qaeda operatives contacting American citizens, I don't think you're going to find anybody in America saying, "Oh, my God, don't do that."

What's really at stake here is, the administration's made assertions in the past where their credibility has somewhat been questioned. And so it's not merely the constitutional reach you have; it is what is actually happening, what is actually going on.

I'm going to focus on that first, if I may. How will we know, General, when this war is over?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: (Pauses.) I presume the straightforward answer, Senator, is that when al Qaeda is destroyed and it no longer poses a threat to the United States. Whenever that may be, we know it's not today. We know we're still at war today. We know we'll probably be at war still tomorrow. And so we know it still continues today.

SEN. BIDEN: The truth is, there is no definition of when we're going to know whether we've won, because al Qaeda, as the president points out, has mutated into many other organizations that are not directly dealing with bin Laden and are free agents themselves. Is that correct?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: It is certainly true that there are a number of terrorist groups who share many of the same objectives of al Qaeda in terms of destroying America.

SEN. BIDEN: So as long as any of them are there, I assume you would assert you have this plenary authority.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Well, Senator, your -- obviously, if Congress were to take some kind of action and to say the president no longer has the authority to engage in electronic surveillance of the enemy, then I think that would put us into the third part of Judge -- Justice Jackson's three-part test. And that would present a much harder question as to whether or not the president has the authority. As I've already indicated in response to Senator Grassley, I believe that under those circumstances -- and again, it's a hard question, and it may be -- it may have been irresponsible for me to offer up an opinion, because I would like to have to study it. I would like the opportunity to study it. But I think the facts would present a much different case than what we had in Youngstown v. Sawyer.

SEN. BIDEN: Why, if you -- and I've read everything you've submitted, and I was here when FISA was written. I was a cosponsor. I was on the Intelligence Committee and on the Foreign Relations Committee. And as the ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I was charged by the Democratic leadership to be part of the small group to write the authorization for the use of force. So I've been involved in this. Doesn't mean I'm right, but I've been deeply involved.

As I understand your reasoning, I don't understand why you would limit your eavesdropping only to foreign conversations; in other words, al Qaeda communicating from Algeria -- I'm making it up -- or from France or Germany or wherever, to the United States. That's the assertion; it's only emanating from a foreign country. Correct?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, sir.

SEN. BIDEN: Why limit it to that?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Authorization of the program I'm talking about. Well, of course, that's a presidential decision. And I believe, Senator -- and I'm now (reporting?) to speak for the president -- but I believe it's because of trying to balance concerns that might arise that, in fact, the NSA was engaged in electronic surveillance with respect to domestic calls. And so there was a decision made that this would be -- this is the appropriate balance.

There may be some in America -- I suspect there are some in America -- who are saying, "Well, why aren't you -- if you've got reason to believe that you've got two members of al Qaeda talking to each other in America, by God, why aren't you listening to their conversations?" Again, this was a judgment made that this was the right balance between the security of our country and protecting the private interests of Americans.

SEN. BIDEN: Well, the president said to do everything under the law to prevent another 9/11. The communications that occurred within this country, not outside this country, which, in fact, brought about 9/11, would not be captured by the president's efforts here. Is he refusing to do it for public-relations reasons, for appearance reasons, or because he thinks he doesn't have the constitutional authority to do it?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I don't believe that it's a question of constitutional authority. That analysis, quite frankly, has not been conducted. It's not a question of public relations. In his judgment, it was the appropriate thing to do, given the circumstances that we find ourselves in.

SEN. BIDEN: Who determines what calls or e-mails are to be monitored?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: The decision as to which communications are to be surveiled are made by intelligence experts out at NSA. As I indicated, I believe, in response to an earlier question, these are individuals who are expert in al Qaeda aims, objectives, communications.

I've heard General Hayden say they are the best at what they do. They know about al Qaeda. And they would probably be in the best position, better than certainly any lawyer, in evaluating whether or not there is reasonable grounds to believe that this person is an agent or member of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization.

SEN. BIDEN: How many of them are there?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I do not know.

SEN. BIDEN: There's thousands of people who work for NSA. It would be useful for us to know. Are there two people? Five people? Twenty-five people? Two hundred and fifty people? A thousand people?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I don't know the exact number of people out at NSA who are working on this program. But as I indicated to you, the people that are making the decision about whether surveillance should occur are people that are experts with respect to al Qaeda.

SEN. BIDEN: Well, what are the guidelines? Are there any written guidelines they are bound by?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, there are guidelines. There are minimization procedures, as you know. There are minimization procedures for the work of NSA with respect to its collection activities under FISA, with respect to its collection activities under 12-EEE, Executive Order 12-EEE. There are additional minimization -- there are minimization requirements that are generally comparable with respect to this program.

I understand there's also a monthly sort of seniors' directors meeting, due-diligence meeting, out at NSA where they talk about how the program is done. They evaluate how the program is going and try to identify if there are any problems. And so they spend a great deal of time making sure the program is being authorized in a way that's consistent with the president's authorization.

SEN. BIDEN: By definition, you've acknowledged, though, the very minimization programs that exist under FISA, you're not bound by. You've acknowledged that you're not bound by FISA under this program. Therefore, the -- are you telling me the minimization programs that exist under FISA, as the way FISA is applied, are adhered to?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Okay, I'm sorry if I was confusing in my response. What I was meaning to say is that there are minimization requirements. Those minimization requirements are basically consistent with the minimization requirements that exist with respect to FISA if FISA were to apply.

SEN. BIDEN: Would it be any way compromising the program if you made available to the Intelligence Committee what those minimization procedures that are being followed are?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Well, of course, the minimization procedures themselves under 12-EEE, and I believe perhaps under the FISA court, are classified. I also believe they probably have been shared with the Intel Committee.

SEN. BIDEN: They have not, to the best of my knowledge. They have not been shared with the Intelligence Committee, to the best of my knowledge, unless you're talking about this very small group of the chairman and the ranking member.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: You mean -- I'm talking about the minimization procedures for 12-EEE and for FISA.

SEN. BIDEN: Let me be very precise. I have not heard of NSA saying to the Intelligence Committee, "We are binding ourselves as we engage in this activity under the minimization procedures of 12-EEE, as well as other statutes." I'm unaware that that's written down or stated anywhere or been presented to the Intelligence Committee. Can you assure us that has been done?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: No, sir, I can't assure you that.

SEN. BIDEN: Can you assure us, General, that you are fully, totally informed and confident that you know the absolute detail with which this program is being conducted? Can you assure us, you personally can assure us, that no one is being eavesdropped upon in the United States other than someone who has the communication that is emanating from foreign soil by a suspected terrorist, al Qaeda or otherwise? ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, I can't give you absolute assurance --

SEN. BIDEN: Who can?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: -- of the kind that you've asked for. Certainly General Hayden knows more about the operational details of this program. What I can give the American people assurance is that we have a number of safeguards in place so that we can say, with a high degree of confidence, or certainly of certainty, that what the president has authorized in connection with this program, that those procedures are being followed.

SEN. BIDEN: Mr. Chairman, my time is up. This is why the Intelligence Committee has a responsibility to be able to look at someone and have an absolute guaranteed assurance, under no circumstance is any American being eavesdropped upon unless it's coming from foreign soil and a suspected terrorist, and do it under oath and do it under penalty of law if they misrepresent it.

I'm not suggesting the attorney general can do that. We've got to find out who can do that.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Biden. Senator Leahy.

SEN. LEAHY: Mr. Chairman, just before Senator Biden's round, you put into the record the letter from Senator Roberts that was sent to the two of us concerning the authority. I want to place in the record a letter from Bruce Fein, formerly a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan administration, basically responding to Senator Roberts' letter. I mentioned earlier, Mr. Fein was very critical of this program. In fact, at that point, why don't I just put in -- I have a number of things here.

SEN. SPECTER: Without objection, the letter from Mr. Bruce Fein will be made a part of the record. And do you have other unanimous- consent requests?

SEN. LEAHY: For other material regarding this hearing, if I might put them all in the record.

SEN. SPECTER: Without objection, those materials will be made a part of the record. Senator Kyl.

SEN. JON KYL (R-AZ): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Attorney General. I think it's very interesting how the argument over this program has evolved in the last several weeks from initial concerns about the program itself now to some very different questions. And I think it's a good evolution, because I doubt, if we polled the members of this committee today, that there would be anybody who would vote against the conduct of this particular kind of surveillance.

There was then the suggestion that while the program is good, it's being conducted illegally. That was the charge, and I would submit a very serious charge, that the ranking member made earlier in his remarks.

It seems to me a little humility is called for by the members of this committee, especially before we accuse the president of committing a crime, which is what illegal activity is. If our hearings with now Justices Alito and Roberts demonstrated anything, I think it is that there are a lot of smart lawyers in Washington DC other than those who are sitting here on this committee.

And in that regard, I appreciate the last couple of rounds of questions that were asked by Senators Kennedy, Biden and Grassley, because they got more into specifics about how we might have better oversight.

Before I get into that, let me just ask four specific questions that I think you can answer very, very briefly. I'm reminded, by the way -- I told my staff, the very first time I saw a murder trial before I went to law school, I was absolutely persuaded, after the prosecution's summation, that this guy was guilty as could be. Then, after his lawyers argued, I was absolutely certain that he was innocent. And by the time the prosecutor finished, I was once again convinced that maybe he was guilty.

The bottom line being that with tough legal questions, good lawyers take both sides, and there are two sides to every question. And you shouldn't prejudge. And that's what I think happened with regard to this program. Before you and others in the administration explained the legal rationale for it, there were people jumping to conclusions about its illegality.

Now, I think you made four key points, and I just want to make sure that we got them right. Your first key point was that Article 2 of the U.S. Constitution has always been interpreted as allowing the president to do what's necessary to conduct war, and that includes surveillance of the enemy. Is that right?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, sir.

SEN. KYL: Secondly, that when Congress passed the authorization for military force on September 18th, 2001, we actually did two things in that resolution. First of all, we affirmed the president's constitutional authority that I just spoke of; and secondly, that we granted authority that included the words "all necessary and appropriate force."

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes.

SEN. KYL: And your point has been that that activity has always included surveillance of the enemy, and, in fact, that the U.S. -- excuse me -- that the FISA court itself has said that -- has commented on that inherent authority in a situation in which it involved the detention of an American citizen who was involved in terrorist activity.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That would be the Supreme Court, sir, not the FISA court.

SEN. KYL: The Supreme Court; I'm sorry.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, sir.

SEN. KYL: And that it is -- that also, your second point is that the statutory authorization is contemplated in the FISA language, except as authorized by statute.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That is correct. We are acting in a way that the president has authorized activities that are consistent with what FISA anticipated.

SEN. KYL: Right. The third point is, you talked a little bit about FISA and noted that, in your view, it was difficult to further discuss the point because you can't discuss the detail of the program itself, but that the 1978 FISA law is really not well-suited to the particular kind of program that's being conducted here, including the 72-hour provision of FISA. Is that correct?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That is correct. I don't want these hearings to conclude today with the notion that FISA has not been effective. And again, I think a lot of the safeguards, some of the procedures in FISA, make a lot of sense. When you talk about a peacetime situation, particularly in domestic surveillance -- and that's what -- FISA also covers that kind of activity.

And so when you're talking about amending FISA because FISA is broke, well, the procedures in FISA, under certain circumstances, I think, would seem quite reasonable.

SEN. KYL: And you continue to use FISA not only -- well, you continue to use FISA, including in regard to the war on terrorism.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Absolutely. SEN. KYL: The fourth key point was that you argued about the checks and balances in the program; the fact that it has to be reauthorized every 45 days by the president himself, that there has been extensive congressional briefing of the Democrat and Republican leaders and chairman and ranking members respectively of the Intelligence Committee, and that there is extensive IG review. Is that correct?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That is correct.

SEN. KYL: And the inspector general is what inspector general?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: This is the inspector general for the NSA.

SEN. KYL: Okay. In addition, you noted the two qualifications of the program, international communications involving al Qaeda or affiliated individuals.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That is correct, Senator.

SEN. KYL: And finally, you noted that this was as interpreted by the NSA professionals. Now, I thought there were two particularly interesting lines of inquiry, and one was Senator Biden's question about whether or not, if this program is really necessary, we shouldn't try to evaluate whether it should also be applied to calls from al Qaeda terrorist A to al Qaeda terrorist B, though they happen to be in the United States.

And it was my understanding you said that the analysis of that had not been conducted. Is that correct?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: The legal analysis as to whether or not that kind of surveillance -- we haven't done that kind of analysis because, of course, the president -- that's not what the president has authorized.

SEN. KYL: I understand that. But I would suggest that that analysis should be undertaken, because I think most Americans now appreciate that this is a very important program that might warn us of an impending attack. It could be that the attackers are already in the United States, and therefore it could involve communication within the United States.

Understanding the need to balance the potential intrusion on privacy of American citizens within the United States, you would want to have a very careful constitutional analysis. And certainly the president wouldn't want to authorize such an activity unless he felt that he was on very sound legal ground.

On the other hand, there is no less reason to do it than there is to intercept international communications with respect to a potential terrorist warning or attack. So I would submit that Senator Biden is correct and that this -- at least the inference was in his question that this study should be accomplished. I would think that it would -- that it should.

I also think that both he and Senator Grassley and Senator Kennedy, to some extent, talked about, "Well, what happens if we're wrong here? How can we be assured that there is no improper surveillance?" And in this regard, I would ask you to think about it. And if you care to comment right now, fine, but this might hit you cold. It seems to me that you might consider, either in the presidential directive and the execution of that or even potentially in congressional legislative authorization, some kind of after-action report, some kind of quarterly review or some other appropriate time frame, maybe every 45 days, whatever is appropriate, to the eight people who are currently briefed in the Congress on questions such as whether the program acted as it was intended, whether it appeared that somebody might have been surveiled who, under the guidelines, should not have been, and, if there ever were such a case, how it happened and what's done to ensure that it doesn't!

It seems to me that reporting on that kind of activity, including information about the guidelines to provide some additional insurance that it's being conducted properly, would be appropriately briefed to the members of Congress.

We do have an oversight responsibility, but we are not the only governmental entity with responsibility here. The president has critical responsibility. And I agree with those who say that should there be an attack and a review of all this activity is conducted, the president would be roundly criticized if he had a tool like this at his disposal and did not utilize it to protect the people of the United States of America.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Senator, I can tell you: I have not been present at all of the briefings with members of Congress, but in connection with those briefings where I was I was present, there was discussion about -- regarding some of the types of issues that you've just outlined. I'd be happy to take back your comments.

SEN. KYL: Thank you, Mr. Attorney General.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Kyl.

Senator Kohl.

SEN. HERB KOHL (D-WI): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Attorney General, the administration and the Congress and the courts share a common goal: to protect the American people. We all believe that as we face the long-term threat from terrorism, we must work together to ensure that the American people are safe. We in Congress have our role to play by writing the laws that protect Americans, and you have your role executing those laws, and of course, the courts have their role.

As part of this effort against terrorism, we have drafted many laws to give the administration the powers that it needs. And I'm hopeful that we can work together again to ensure that our laws are working, to protect the American people.

Mr. Attorney General, if terrorists are operating in this country, or if people in this country are communicating with terrorists, then of course we must collect whatever information that we have or that we can. To accomplish this, the administration had three options, as you know. First, you could have followed the current law, which most experts believe gives you all the authority you need to listen to these calls. Second, if you thought the law inadequate, you could have asked Congress to grant you additional authority. Or third, the course you followed: conduct warrantless spying outside current law and without new authorization.

If you had the two options that would have given you unquestionable authority to monitor these calls, and one whose legality was, at best, questionable, then why did you go for the most questionable one? Why not either follow the law or seek new laws?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Well, Senator, I agree with you: We are a nation of laws. And we do believe we are following the law, and we do believe that the Constitution allows the president of the United States to engage in this kind of surveillance.

We also believe that the authorization to use military force represents a supplemental grant of authority by the Congress to engage in this kind of surveillance, totally consistent with FISA. If you've studied carefully the white paper that we've submitted, we're not arguing that somehow FISA was amended and that we're somehow overwriting FISA. That is not what we're talking about here. We are acting in a manner consistent with FISA. That's what the FISA contemplates -- another statute.

The Congress passed another -- provided additional supplemental grant of authority, through the authorization to use military force. So I totally agree with what you're saying. We should be acting, particularly in a time of war. I think it is good to have the branches of government working together. It's good for the country. I believe that's what happened here. Congress exercised its Article I authorities to pass the authorization to use military force. You supplement that with the president's constitutional authority as commander in chief, and --

SEN. KOHL: Are you saying that there was never any debate within the administration at any level or Justice Department at any level about whether or not you were pursuing the right course?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Senator --

SEN. KOHL: If I understand it, there was debate.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Of course, there was a great deal of debate. Think about the --

SEN. KOHL: If there were debate --

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Of course there was debate, Senator. Think about -- if I may just finish this thought -- think about the issues that are implicated here: a very complicated Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act -- it's extremely complicated; the president's inherent authority under the Constitution as commander in chief; the Fourth Amendment; the interpretation of the authorization to use military force. You've got a program that's existed over four years. You have multiple lawyers looking at the legal analysis. Of course there -- this is what lawyers do. We disagree. We debate. We argue. At the end of the day this position represents the position of the executive branch on behalf of the president of the United States.

SEN. KOHL: Well, with all the debate we're going through today and leading up to today, it seems to me clear that there is a real question about the course you pursued -- that's why we're here today -- which would, it seems to me, justify asking the question, why did you take the third option? And of course, you've given your answer. But there are some of us that would question that answer.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Yes, sir.

SEN. KOHL: Mr. Attorney General, if applying to the secret FISA court is too burdensome, then would you agree to after-the-fact review by the FISA court and by Congress of the wiretaps used specifically in this program? At least this way we can ensure, going forward, that the authority will never be abused by this or any other president.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Sir, obviously, we want to ensure that there are no other abuses. The president has said we're happy to listen to your ideas about legislation. There is concern, however, that, of course, the legislative process may result -- first of all, of course, we believe the president already has the authority, and legislation is not necessary here. But the legislative process may result in restrictions on the president -- attempted restrictions on the president's inherent constitutional authority -- and may not -- he may not be able to protect the country in the way that he believes he has the authority to do under the Constitution.

And then finally, of course, the legislative process is one where it is pretty difficult to keep certain information confidential. Again, if we're talking about amending FISA, there are many aspects of FISA that make sense to me, that work well. Again, if you're talking about domestic surveillance during peace time, I think having the kind of restrictions that are in FISA make all the sense in the world.

So you're probably talking about a very narrowly tailored focused amendment in FISA -- and again, I'm not the expert on legislation, but we're talking potentially a very narrow focused amendment of FISA. And I think I'm concerned that that process will inform our enemies about what we're doing here, and how we're doing it. Subject to those concerns, of course, as the president said, we're happy to listen to your ideas.

SEN. KOHL: After the fact review by the FISA court -- you don't have any problem with that?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Again, Senator -- be happy to listen to what -- happy to consider it.

SEN. KOHL: Mr. Attorney General, is there anything that a president cannot do in a time of war in the name of protecting our country? We saw that the Justice Department changed its position on torture, but are there other limits on the president's power? Or can, in your opinion, the president assign to himself without an act of Congress any powers that he believes are necessary?
ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Well, of course, we're not talking about acting outside of an act of Congress. We think in this case the president has acted with an act of Congress. Of course, again, there are limits on the president of the United States. The Constitution serves as a limit of the president. The president's authorities under Article II as commander in chief are not limitless. Obviously Congress has a role to play in time of war. The Constitution says Congress can declare war. The Constitution says it is Congress to raise and support armies. The Constitution says it is Congre!

SEN. KOHL: If the administration investigates an American for ties to terrorism using this program and finds nothing -- and of course, news reports have indicated that this happens the vast majority of the time, then what is done with the information collected? Does the administration keep this information on file somewhere, dispose of? What happens to this information?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Well, let me tell you that every morning I was given an intelligence briefing out of the FBI. And there are numbers of possible threats in the United States -- many of them washed out, thank God. The fact that they washed out doesn't mean that we should stop our intelligence collection. Intelligence is not perfect.

In terms of what is actually done with that information, what I can say is -- again, I can't talk about specifics about it -- but information is collected, information is retained, and information is disseminated in a way to protect the privacy interests of all Americans.

SEN. KOHL: So you're saying the information, even if it turns out to be without any correctness, the information is retained?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Senator, I can't provide any more of an answer than the one I just gave, in terms of -- there are minimization requirements that exist. And we understand that we have an obligation to try to minimize intrusion into the privacy interests of Americans, and we endeavor to do that.

SEN. KOHL: Just to go back to what Senator Biden and then Senator Kyl referred to about al Qaeda -- to al Qaeda within the country: You are saying we do not get involved with those calls?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Not under the program about which I'm testifying; that's right. SEN. KOHL: You need to tell us a little bit more, because to those of us who are listening, that is incomprehensible. If you would go al Qaeda to al Qaeda outside the country, domestic to outside the country, but you would not intrude into al Qaeda to al Qaeda within the country -- you are very smart, so are we; and to those of us who are interacting here today, there is something that is unfathomable about that remark.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Well, Senator, we certainly endeavor to get that information in other ways, if we can. But that is not what the president --

SEN. KOHL: We need to have some logic, some sense, some clarity to this discussion.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: Senator, think about the reaction, the public reaction, which has arisen in some quarters about this program. If the president had authorized domestic surveillance as well, even though we're talking about al Qaeda to al Qaeda, I think the reaction would have been twice as great.

So the judgment was made that this was the appropriate line to draw in ensuring the security of our country and the protection of the privacy interests of Americans.

SEN. KOHL: I appreciate that. Before I turn it back -- yet the president has submitted, you know, with great justification, he's going to protect the American people, regardless. And if there is some criticism, he'll take the criticism.

And yet you're saying, al Qaeda to al Qaeda within the country is beyond the bounds?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: It is beyond the bounds of the program which I'm testifying about today.

SEN. KOHL: Thank you.

(Protester interrupts)

SEN. SPECTER: If you do not sit down immediately, you will be removed from the chamber.

Senator DeWine. Senator DeWine, that's your introduction.

SEN. SESSIONS: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to state for the record that you are not a fascist.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you for that reassurance, Senator Sessions.

Senator DeWine.

SEN. MIKE DEWINE (R-OH): Mr. Chairman, this issue has been raised several times by several members. My understanding is Senator Roberts, chairman of the intelligence committee, asked -- announced that there will be a closed hearing on February 9th with Attorney General Gonzalez as well as with General Hayden to cover this issue.

Mr. Attorney General, thank you very much for being with us today. We've had a lot of discussion, and I know we're going to continue to have discussion about this very serious constitutional issue, constitutional law issue. Let me tell you what I know, and what I truly believe. I truly believe that the American people expect the president of the United States, in a time of national emergency and peril, to take actions to protect them, even if those actions are not specifically authorized by statute. I think they expect no less, would want the president to do no less than that.

Second, though it is clear that there are serious legal and constitutional questions concerning whether the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness requirement for searches requires the president, after a period of time, after a program has been in place for a period of time, to come to the Congress for statutory authorizations to continue such actions.

Legal scholars, Mr. Attorney General, can and certainly are debating this issue. But what is not debatable is that, both from a constitutional as well as from a policy point of view, the president and the American people would be stronger -- this country would be stronger and the president would be stronger if he did so, if he did come to Congress for such specific statutory authorization.

There was a reason that President George H.W. Bush and President George W. Bush both came to the Congress prior to the respective wars in Iraq, even though some people argued, and we still argue today, that such resolutions weren't legally -- legally, constitutionally unnecessary.

Presidents are always stronger in the conduct of foreign affairs when Congress is on board. Statutory authorization and congressional oversight of this program would avoid what may be a very divisive, hurtful debate here in Congress. I truly believe it's in our national interest to resolve this matter as quickly as possible.

Mr. Attorney General, we need meaningful oversight by the intelligence committee, followed then by whatever statutory changes in the law might be appropriate.

Let me ask you, to follow on that statement, a question. What if Congress passed a law which just excluded FISA from any electronic surveillance of international communications where one part to the communications is a member of or affiliated with al Qaeda or a related terrorist group? And further, if we went on and provided that there would be normal oversight by both the House and the Senate intelligence committee -- not periodically, but the administration would report to the intelligence committees on the progress of that program. We obviously have the ability within the committee to keep such things classified; we do it all the time. What would be your reaction to that? Is that something that would be possible from your point of view?

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: I'll repeat what the president has said, and that is, to the extent the Congress wants to suggest legislation, obviously, we're here to listen to your ideas. I've already responded to an earlier question, talked about some of the concerns that we have.

Obviously, generally, most concerns can be addressed one way or the other. If they could legitimately be a concern, then obviously we would listen to your question, would listen and consider your ideas.

SEN. DEWINE: I appreciate that. I understand your legal position. You've made it very clear today, I think articulated it very well. The administration has articulated it. Obviously there are others who don't agree with your position. This is going to be a debate we're going to continue to have.

It just seems to me that some four years into this program this debate could be put aside if -- we ought to be able to find someway to be able to protect the American people but take care of whatever legal issues that some might find to be there. And I would look forward, frankly, to working with you on that.

Let me move, if I could, to what to me has been a troubling question about FISA, really unrelated to this program. You and I talked about this before. You talked today about how FISA is being used -- frankly being used more than it's been used in the past.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: The use of FISA is up 18 percent from 2004 to 2005.

SEN. DEWINE: Let me talk about something, though, that troubles me, and I've been talking and asking about this problem since 2004.

Let me give you a quote from 2004. Director Mueller of the FBI said, and I quote: "We still have some concerns, and we're addressing them with the Department of Justice. But there is still frustration out there in the field in certain areas where, because we had to prioritize, we cannot get certain requests for FISA as fast as perhaps we might have in the past.

My understanding, Mr. Attorney General, is, from recent information that I have, current information, that there are still a backlog, that there are still mechanical -- what I would call mechanical problems, both in the FISA court and at Justice. Could you just briefly address that? Because every time I see you I'm going to go back at this. Because I'm not saying it's your fault, but I just think it's something that, working together, we need to resolve. And this is something that I think Congress has to play a part in. If you don't have the money, if you don't have the resources, we cannot tolerate a backlog in FISA applications if it can be fixed mechanically.

ATTY GEN. GONZALEZ: I appreciate the opportunity to respond to that question, Senator. I would say that our staff at the Department of Justice -- these are the experts in the FISA process -- have, in essence, tripled since 2002. I think we all realized following the attacks of 9/11 that we needed to get more focused on board to help with the FISA applications.

It still takes too long, in my judgment, to get FISAs approved. I've described in my opening statement the process that's involved here. I've got -- FISA applications are often an inch thick, and it requires a sign-off by analysts at NSA, lawyers at NSA, lawyers at the department, and, finally, me, and then it's got to be approved by the FISA court. I've got to tell you, I was going to try to make this point in response to a question from the chairman.

The members of the FISA court are heroes, as far as I'm concerned. I mean, they're available day or night. They're working on weekends and holidays, because they want to make themselves available. They're killing themselves, quite frankly, making themselves available to be there to sign off on a FISA application, if it meets the requirements of the statute. But we still have some problems.

It is true that because of the procedures that are in FISA, it inherently is going to result in some kind of delay. And for that reason, the president made the determination that for certain very narrow circumstances, he's going to authorize a terrorist surveillance program. But we continue to work at it, and I know you're pretty interested in this, and I continue to -- I look forward to continuing to have discussions with you about it.

SEN. DEWINE: Well, I appreciate that, Mr. Attorney General. It is something that continues to trouble me. Putting aside the issue that we're here about today, FISA is a matter of national security, and I'm still hearing things that, frankly, disturb me.

And it's just a question of whether, you know, whether this can be sped up.

And some things are inherent, as you say, but I get the impression that part of the problem is not inherent and it could be fixed.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Well, one of the things that hopefully will happen soon is the creation of a new (national ?) security division. As you may know -- as you know, the Patriot Act has a provision in it which creates a new assistant attorney general for the (national ?) security division. We believe that division will assist in the streamlining of the FISA process.

SEN. DEWINE: Thank you, Mr. Attorney General.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator --

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator DeWine. Senator Feinstein.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Mr. Chairman --

SEN. : Mr. Chairman, I think the attorney general had a question.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I'm sorry. Could I make one point in response to Senator Kohl? I made this point, but I want to make sure that the committee understands this, in terms of domestic-to-domestic al Qaeda communications.

I said that we're using other authorities, and we are -- to the extent we can engage in intercepting al Qaeda's domestic-to-domestic calls, even under FISA, if we can do it, we're doing it. So I don't want the American people to believe that we're doing absolutely nothing about al Qaeda's domestic-to-domestic calls. The president made a determination, this is where the line's going to be, and so we operate within those boundaries. And so we -- we take advantage of the tools that are out there, and if -- FISA isn't always the most efficient way to deal with that, but if that's all we have, that's what we use. So I guess I want to make sure the American people understand that we're not simply ignoring domestic-to-domestic communications of al Qaeda. We're going after it.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Attorney General Gonzales, for that -- for that clarification. Senator Feinstein.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to make clear that, for me at least, this hearing isn't about whether our nation should aggressively combat terrorism. I think we all agree on that. And it's not about whether we should use sophisticated electronic surveillance to learn about terrorist plans, intentions, and capabilities. We all agree on that. And it's not about whether we should use those techniques inside the United States to guard against attacks. We all agree on that. But this administration is effectively saying, and the attorney general has said it today, it doesn't have to follow the law. And this, Mr. Attorney General, I believe is a very slippery slope. It's fraught with consequences.

The intelligence committees have not been briefed on the scope and nature of the program. They have not been able to explore what is a link or an affiliate to al Qaeda, or what minimization procedures are in place. We know nothing about the program, other than what we've read in the newspapers. And so it comes with huge shock, as Senator Leahy said, that the president of the United States, in Buffalo, New York, in 2004, would say, and I quote, "Any time you hear the United States government talking about wire tap, it requires -- a wire tap requires a court order. Nothing has changed, by the way. When we're talking about chasing down terrorists, we're talking about getting a court order before we do so."

Mr. Attorney General, in light of what you and the president have said in the past month, this statement appears to be false. Do you agree? ATTY GEN. GONZALES: No, I don't, Senator. In fact, I -- I take great issue with your suggestion that somehow the president of the United States was not being totally forthcoming with the American people. I have -- I have his statement, and in the sentence immediately before what you're talking about, he said, he was referring to roving wire taps, and so -- I think anyone who -- I think --

SEN. FEINSTEIN: So you're saying that statement only relates to roving wire taps --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, that was a -- discussion was about the Patriot Act and, right before he uttered those words that you referred to, he said, "Secondly, there are such things as roving wire taps. Now, by the way, any time you hear the United States government talk about wire taps, it requires -- a wire tap requires a court order." So as you know, the president is not a lawyer, but this was a discussion about the Patriot Act. This was a discussion about roving wire taps, and I think people -- some people are trying to take part of his statement out of context, and I think that's unfair.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Okay, sir, now let me move along. In October, 2002, at a public hearing of the Senate-House joint inquiry into NSA activities, the then-NSA director, General Michael Hayden, told me, quote, "If at times I seem indirect or incomplete, I hope that you and the public understand that I have discussed our operations fully and unreservedly in earlier closed sessions." As I mentioned, the Intelligence Committee has not been notified.

Let me ask you this: If the president determined that a truthful answer to questions posed by the Congress to you, including the questions I ask here today, would hinder his ability to function as commander-in-chief, does the authorization for use of military force or his asserted plenary powers authorize you to provide false or misleading answers to such questions?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Absolutely not, Senator. Of course not. Nothing would excuse --

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Thank you. Thank you; I just asked the question, a yes or no --

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: -- false statements before the Congress.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: All right. You have advanced what I think is a radical legal theory here today, the theory compels the conclusion that the president's power to defend the nation is unchecked by law; that he acts alone and according to his own discretion, and that the Congress's role, at best, is advisory. You say that the authorization for use of military force allows the president to circumvent the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and that if the AMUF (sic) doesn't, then the Constitution does. Senator Daschle has testified that when he was majority leader, the administration came to him shortly before the AUMF came to the floor and asked that the words "inside the United States" be added to the authorization, and that he said, Absolutely not, and it was withdrawn.

The question I have is, how do you interpret congressional intent from the passage of the AUMF, that it gave the administration the authority to order electronic surveillance of Americans, in contravention to the FISA law?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, it is not in contravention of the FISA law. We believe the authorization to use military force is the kind of congressional action that the FISA law anticipated. It has never been our position that we are -- that somehow the AUMF amended FISA. It's never been our position that somehow FISA h as been overridden. Quite the contrary; we believe that the president's authorizations are fully consistent with the provisions of FISA. In terms --

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Now, let me stop you just for a second.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: All right.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: I've read the FISA law. There are only two escape hatches. One is 15 days after a declaration of war, and the second is the 72-hour provision, which was actually amended by us in the Patriot Act from a lower number to 72 hours. Those are the only two escape hatches in FISA. What in FISA specifically, then, allows you to conduct electronic intelligence -- excuse me, electronic surveillance within America, on Americans?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I -- we -- I believe that it's section 109. That's where it talks about -- about persons not engaged in electronic surveillance under cover of law, except as authorized by statute. Now, I may not have it exactly right. We believe that that is the -- the provision in the statute which allows us to rely upon the authorization to use military force.

Now, you may say, well, I disagree with that construction. That may be so. There may be other constructions that may be fairly possible. We believe this is a fairly possible ruling of FISA, and as the Supreme Court has said, in terms of -- under the canon of constitutional avoidance, if you have two possible constructions with a statute and one would result in raising a constitutional issue, if the other interpretation is one that is fairly possible, that is the interpretation that must be applied. And if you reject our interpretation of FISA, Senator, then you have a situation where you've got an act of Congress' intention with the president's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief; and the Supreme Court has said, when that happens, you go with another interpretation, if it's a fair application, and that's what we've done here.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Could you check your citation? I just read 109, and I don't believe it says that, and we'll talk about that after lunch.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Okay. (Inaudible.)

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Let me go on and tell you why it's a slippery slope. Senator Kennedy asked you about first-class mail; has it been opened, and you declined answering. Let me ask this way. Has any other secret order or directive been issued by the president or any other senior administration official which authorizes conduct which would otherwise be prohibited by law? Yes or no will do.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, the president has not authorized any conduct, that I'm aware of, that is in contravention of law.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Has the president ever invoked this authority with respect to any activity other than NSA surveillance?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Again -- actually, I'm not sure how to answer that question.

The president has exercised his authority to authorize this very targeted surveillance to international communications of the enemy. So I'm sorry, your question is --

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Has the president ever invoked this authority with respect to any activity other than the program we're discussing, the NSA surveillance program?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, I am not comfortable going down the road of saying yes or no as to what the president has or has not authorized.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Okay, that's fine.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I'm here to -- okay.

SEN FEINSTEIN: That's fine. I just want to ask some others. If you don't want to answer them, don't answer them.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, ma'am.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Can the president suspend the application of the Posse Comitatus Act?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Of course, Senator, that is not what is at issue here.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: I understand that.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: This is not about law enforcement; it's about foreign intelligence.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: I'm asking a question. You choose not to answer it?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, ma'am.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Okay. Can the president suspend, in secret or otherwise, the application of Section 503 of the National Security Act, which states that no covert action may be conducted which is intended to influence United States political processes, public opinion, policies or media? In other words, can he engage in otherwise illegal propaganda? ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, let me respond to -- this is probably my response to all your questions of these kind of hypotheticals. The question is to whether or not can Congress pass the statute that is intentioned with a president's constitutional authority. Those are very, very difficult questions, and for me to answer those questions sort of off the cuff I think would not be responsible. I think that, again, I think that's --

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Okay, that's fine. I don't want to -- I don't want to argue with you. All I'm trying to say is this is a slippery slope. Once you do one, there are a whole series of actions that can be taken, and I suspect the temptations to take them are very great. And we are either a nation that practices our rule of law or we're not.

Has any Supreme Court case since FISA held that the president can wiretap Americans once Congress has passed a law forbidding this without warrant?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I think the only case that comes to mind that's really pertinent would be the 2002 case, In re: Sealed Case, by the FISA court of review, where the -- while the court did not decide this issue, the court acknowledged that every case that's considered this has found that the president has the inherent authority.

And assuming that to be true, that court said that FISA could not encroach upon those authorities, those constitutional inherent authorities.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: My time is up.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Feinstein.

Senator Sessions?

SEN. SESSIONS: Thank you, Attorney General Gonzales. I believe you've faithfully fulfilled your responsibility to give your best honest answers to the questions so far. I think they've been very effective. If people have listened, I think they will feel much better about the program that the president has authorized and that you are explaining because some of the news articles in particular gave the impression that there's widespread wiretapping of American citizens in domestic situations, and in every instance there's an international call. Most of us, by plain language, we understand international to be different from domestic, and the president has limited this to international calls in which one or more parties are connected to al Qaeda. Is that correct?

ATTY. GEN. GONZALES: Sir, the program that I'm talking about today, yes, is limited to international calls.

SEN. SESSIONS: And I'm sorry that there are those who would suggest that, in previous testimony, you may have not been truthful with the committee. I don't believe that's your reputation. I don't believe that's fair. I think you have a good answer to any of those charges.

And I also think it's unfortunate that we're in a position where when the president is talking about the Patriot Act, just like we talk about the Patriot Act throughout the debate on the Patriot Act, we insisted it did not authorize non-warrant wiretaps or searches. I mean, that's what we said about the Patriot Act because it didn't. So don't you think it's unfair to mix classified international surveillance issues with the Patriot Act debate?

ATTY. GEN. GONZALES: Well, sir, I don't want -- I don't know if it's my place to characterize whether it's fair or unfair. I do believe that there is a difference, certainly in practice and a difference recognizing the course between domestic surveillance and international surveillance.

SEN. SESSIONS: Well, I just want to -- I think it's important for us to remember the world is hearing this. And so we have people suggesting the attorney general of the United States and the president of the United States is deliberately lying, and it's not fair.

It's not accurate. It's not true. So I think that's important.

With regard to the briefing of Congress, the eight members that have been designated to receive highly secret information were briefed on this program, were they not, Attorney General Gonzales?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Sir, the -- from the outset, the bipartisan leadership of the Intel Committees have been briefed in great detail about this. And there have also in addition been fewer briefings with respect to the bipartisan congressional leadership.

SEN. SESSIONS: I would just note, then, of course there are eight that hold those positions, but since the beginning of the program, at least 15 individuals have been in and out of those positions, including Tom Daschle, Bob Graham, Dick Gephardt, who -- longer in Congress, but were presumably part of that process and were aware of it and participated in passing the FISA Act and believed that it was correct to go forward. I don't think they were hot-boxed or forced into this. I believe they weighed these issues based on what they thought the national interest was and what the law was, and they made their decision not to object to this program. And there's been no formal objection by any of those members to this program. And I think it's unfair to suggest the president there has acted in secret without informing key members of Congress about this highly classified program.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Senator, I can't -- of course I can't speak for the members of Congress, but to my knowledge, no one has raised -- no one has asserted the program should be stopped.

SEN. SESSIONS: Well, I thought about the Super Bowl. There's some reference to the security intensity around that event, that police and Secret Service and every available federal and, I guess, state agency that could be brought into that were intensely aware that there could be an attack on the Super Bowl or any other major public event like that. But Super Bowl would be a prime target, would you not agree, of the al Qaeda types.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Clearly, we would have concerns that events like the Super Bowl would be ones that would be attractive to al Qaeda.

SEN. SESSIONS: And intelligence is valuable to that. I mean, that's the key to it, and that's what we're trying to gather. And everybody understood after 9/11 that our failure was not in the capability to stop people, it was our capability to identify them. This program seems to me to be a step forward in our ability to identify them. And I believe as you've explained it, it's consistent with our law.

With regard to statutory construction and how we should construe it, people have made the point that it's a general principle that a specific statute might control over a general statute. But isn't it true that if a general statute clearly contemplates certain actions and they can't be effective without those actions, then it would overrule the more specific earlier statute?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Depending on the circumstances, that would certainly be true, Senator.

I might just also remind people when you talk about "general statutes" versus "specific statutes," this same argument was raised in connection with the Hamdi case. We had a specific statute that said no American citizen could be detained, except as otherwise authorized by statute. And the Supreme Court said that the authorization to use military force, even though it may have been characterized by some as a broad grant of authority, nonetheless, that was sufficient to override the prohibition in 4001(a).

SEN. SESSIONS: I think that's absolutely critical. I believe the Hamdi case is a pivotal authority here. After FISA, after the authorization of force on al Qaeda, an American citizen was detained without trial, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that since it was part of a military action in wartime, that that person could be held without trial as an incident to the authorization of force.

Would you not agree that listening in on a conversation is less intrusive than putting an American citizen in jail?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: I would -- it would certainly seem to me that it would be less intrusive.

Let me -- just for the record, the language that I keep referring to -- "fundamental incident of waging war" -- was from Justice O'Connor. It is part of plurality. And of course, Justice Thomas, in essence, would have -- felt the president had the inherent authority under the Constitution to detain an American citizen. So I just want to make sure that we're accurate in the way we describe the decisions by the court.

SEN. SESSIONS: Well, you've been very careful about those things and we appreciate that.

With regard to history, you've made reference to history. Isn't it true -- of course President Washington instructed his army to find ways to intercept letters from British operatives; that President Lincoln issued warrantless tapping of telegraph records -- telegraph communications during the Civil War to try to identify troop movements of the enemy. Is it true that President Wilson authorized the military to intercept all telephone and telegraph traffic going into and out of the United States?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That is correct.

SEN. SESSIONS: And that President Roosevelt instructed the government to use listening devices to learn the plans of spies in the United States, and that he gave the military the authority to access, without review, without warrant, all telecommunications, quote, "passing between the United States and any foreign country."

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That is correct, sir.

SEN. SESSIONS: So what I would say to my colleagues and to the American people is, under FISA and other standards that we're using today, we are far more restrained -- have far more restraints on our military and the executive branch than history has demonstrated. We have absolutely not -- we are not going hog wild restraining American liberties. In fact, the trend has been to provide more and more protections. And there can be a danger that we go too far in that and allow sleeper cells in this country to operate in a way that they're successful in killing American citizens that could have been intercepted and stopped.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Of course, Senator, we're doing everything we can to ensure that that doesn't happen.

SEN. SESSIONS: But when you do domestic -- well, I won't go into that.

I want to ask you this question about -- that President Clinton's administration ordered several warrantless searches on the home and property of an alleged spy, Aldrich Ames. Actually, he was convicted. Isn't that true? And it also authorized the warrantless search of the Mississippi home of a suspected terrorist financier. And the deputy attorney general, Jamie Gorelick, the second in command of the Clinton Department of Justice, said this, "The president has inherent authority to conduct warrantless physical searches for foreign intelligence purposes. And the rules and methodologies for criminal searches are inconsistent with the collection of foreign intelligence and would unduly frustrate the president in carrying out his foreign intelligence responsibilities." Are those comments relevant to the discussion we're having today?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: As I understand it, that was her testimony. I think there was an acknowledgement of the president's inherent constitutional authority. Now, of course some would rightly say that in response to that, FISA was changed to include physical searches. And so the question is -- again, that tees up, I think, a difficult constitutional issue whether or not -- can the Congress constitutionally restrict the ability of the president of the United States to engage in surveillance of the enemy during a time of war. And fortunately, I don't think we need to answer that question. I think in this case the Congress has authorized the president to use all necessary and appropriate force, which would include the electronic surveillance of the enemy.

SEN. SESSIONS: But Deputy Attorney General Gorelick, in the Clinton administration, defending these searches, she asserted it was a constitutional power of the president, and this was in a period of peace, not even in war. Isn't that correct?

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: That's correct.

SEN. SESSIONS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. SPECTER: Thank you, Senator Sessions.

We'll now take a luncheon break and we'll resume at 1:45.

ATTY GEN. GONZALES: Yes, sir.

END.

At Swearing-In Ceremony, President Bush Praises New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. "President George W. Bush on Monday said the U.S. Federal Reserve was seen as a symbol of policy-setting integrity around the world and said he was confident new Chairman Ben Bernanke will uphold its tradition. 'Since its creation in 1913, the Federal Reserve has helped bring stability and growth to our nation's economy,' Bush said at a ceremonial swearing-in for Bernanke at the Fed headquarters. ... 'The Fed's actions touch the lives of all Americans and the chairman of the Federal Reserve must be a leader of unquestionable credentials, sound judgment and impeccable character,' Bush said, adding, 'Ben Bernanke meets those high standards and he will be an outstanding chairman of the Federal Reserve.' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060206/pl_nm/economy_bernanke_bush_dc;_ylt=AobI_kwb2gQWt0jNvq5UD2sa.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTA5aHJvMDdwBHNlYwN5bmNhdA--> " ("Bush Says Fed Global Symbol Of Integrity," Reuters, 2/6/06)

The President Proposes A Budget To Fund National Priorities While Continuing Spending Restraint. "The Bush administration Monday proposed a $2.77 trillion budget for 2007 that would partly offset sizable increases in spending for national defense and homeland security with savings from Medicare and other domestic programs. It also projected this year's deficit at a record-high $423.2 billion. White House budget director Josh Bolten said the budget, which applies to the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, reflects President Bush's desire 'to focus on national priorities and tighten our belt elsewhere,' as well as 'give our troops and those who defend our security what they need.' <http://www.usatoday.com/printedition/news/20060207/1a_lede07.art.htm>

Bolten said the budget proposal maintains Bush's 'pro-growth' agenda by calling for permanent extensions of temporary tax cuts passed in 2001 and 2003. It also proposes to eliminate or reduce 141 programs 'that are not getting results.'" (David Jackson And Richard Wolf, "Bush's Budget Big On Security," USA Today, 2/7/06)

OMB Director Joshua Bolten Discusses The President's Commitment To Fiscal Discipline. DIRECTOR BOLTEN: "I think the President made the case well during his State Of The Union address when he pointed out that in a situation when we have major national priorities related to our national security, we need to fund those priorities and at the same time we need to tighten our belt elsewhere, and that belt-tightening needs to happen in a number of politically sensitive areas but we believe it can be done in a responsible way. Congress delivered last year on a similar kind of budget thanks to the leadership of Senator Gregg, whom you just had on, and others on the Hill. We think they can do it again." (Bloomberg TV's "Money And Politics," 2/6/06)

The Wall Street Journal Profiles The Pro-Growth Policies In The President's Proposed Budget. "President Bush called for a one-year stopgap measure to protect millions of taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax this year. In his $2.77 trillion budget plan unveiled yesterday, the president made few new proposals that affect individual taxpayers and investors. He renewed his appeals to Congress to kill the estate tax and create new tax-favored savings vehicles to encourage people to increase their savings. He also again urged Congress to make permanent the wide-ranging tax cuts enacted during his first term <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB113927520695066726.html?mod=todays_us_personal_journal> , including the rates on long-term capital gains and dividends, which are now set to expire at the end of 2008, and on personal income taxes, now set to expire after 2010. With midterm elections coming this fall, the president has a good chance of winning congressional approval for his one-year patch that would protect more taxpayers from the AMT. Congress also might be willing to approve a partial extension of the tax cuts on capital gains and dividends, analysts say." (Tom Herman, "How Bush's Budget Affects Your Taxes," The Wall Street Journal, 2/7/06)

Attorney General Gonzales Discusses The Importance Of The NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program. "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales warned the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday about the sensitive nature of President Bush's warrantless surveillance program aimed at capturing communications between terrorist plotters. 'Our enemy is listening,' he said during testimony before the committee <http://www.washingtontimes.com/national/20060207-123209-5564r.htm> . 'I cannot help but wonder if they aren't shaking their heads in amazement at the thought that anyone would imperil such a sensitive program by leaking its existence in the first place, and smiling at the prospect that we might now disclose even more or perhaps even unilaterally disarm ourselves of a key tool in the war on terror.'" (Charles Hurt, "'Enemy Is Listening,' Gonzales Warns," The Washington Times, 2/7/06)

Judiciary Committee Member Senator Orrin Hatch (R-UT) Says The NSA Program "Is Necessary To Protect Us From The Terrorists In This Country." SEN. HATCH: "The President takes a position as does his Attorney General, that when Congress passed the joint resolution authorizing the use of military force on all force necessary to protect us from terrorists, that he has the right to do warrantless terrorist surveillance. He also relies on the inherent powers of Article II of the Constitution and of course the reasonableness standard in the Fourth Amendment. And I believe that he does have the power to do this, but we're all concerned whether - we don't want to give any person unlimited power, we certainly want to make sure that if these powers are exercised, they're exercised with discretion and the Attorney General assures us that this is a very limited program. It has to be reauthorized every 45 days, it is necessary to protect us from the terrorists in this country, and I think he did a pretty good job of trying to explain that today." (MSNBC's "Hardball," 2/6/06)

Johns Hopkins University Professor Fouad Ajami Writes That The President's Effort To Promote Democracy In The Middle East Is Providing "A New Political Way." "The belligerence that was loose in the peninsula two or three years earlier appears milder now, as new ideas of tolerance struggle to take hold. This assertion by George W. Bush that despotism need not be the Arab destiny is about the only bond between the United States and the Arab world. In its optimism, this diplomacy of freedom recalls that brief moment after the Great War when Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points held out the promise of liberty to those Arab and Muslim lands. To be sure, there are the 'usual suspects' among the Arabs who are averse to the message and to the American messenger, and our pollsters and reporters know the way to them. But this crowd does not reflect the broader demand for a new political way. We have given tyranny the patience of decades. Surely we ought to be able to extend a measure of indulgence to freedom's meandering path.

The Morning Update

Today, the President and Mrs. Bush will attend the funeral of Coretta Scott King. Mrs. King was a remarkable and courageous woman, and a great civil rights leader. The Nation is grateful for the good life of Coretta Scott King and her lasting contributions to freedom and equality which have made America a better and more compassionate nation.

11:45 am: EST	THE PRESIDENT and Mrs. Bush attend the Homegoing Celebration for Mrs. Coretta Scott King New Birth Missionary Baptist Church | Lithonia, Georgia

From Today's Morning Headlines

At Swearing-In Ceremony, President Bush Praises New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. "President George W. Bush on Monday said the U.S. Federal Reserve was seen as a symbol of policy-setting integrity around the world and said he was confident new Chairman Ben Bernanke will uphold its tradition. 'Since its creation in 1913, the Federal Reserve has helped bring stability and growth to our nation's economy,' Bush said at a ceremonial swearing-in for Bernanke at the Fed headquarters. ... 'The Fed's actions touch the lives of all Americans and the chairman of the Federal Reserve must be a leader of unquestionable credentials, sound judgment and impeccable character,' Bush said, adding, 'Ben Bernanke meets those high standards and he will be an outstanding chairman of the Federal Reserve.'" ("Bush Says Fed Global Symbol Of Integrity," Reuters, 2/6/06)

The President Proposes A Budget To Fund National Priorities While Continuing Spending Restraint. "The Bush administration Monday proposed a $2.77 trillion budget for 2007 that would partly offset sizable increases in spending for national defense and homeland security with savings from Medicare and other domestic programs. It also projected this year's deficit at a record-high $423.2 billion. White House budget director Josh Bolten said the budget, which applies to the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, reflects President Bush's desire 'to focus on national priorities and tighten our belt elsewhere,' as well as 'give our troops and those who defend our security what they need.' Bolten said the budget proposal maintains Bush's 'pro-growth' agenda by calling for permanent extensions of temporary tax cuts passed in 2001 and 2003. It also proposes to eliminate or reduce 141 programs 'that are not getting results.'" (David Jackson And Richard Wolf, "Bush's Budget Big On Security," USA Today, 2/7/06)

OMB Director Joshua Bolten Discusses The President's Commitment To Fiscal Discipline. DIRECTOR BOLTEN: "I think the President made the case well during his State Of The Union address when he pointed out that in a situation when we have major national priorities related to our national security, we need to fund those priorities and at the same time we need to tighten our belt elsewhere, and that belt-tightening needs to happen in a number of politically sensitive areas but we believe it can be done in a responsible way. Congress delivered last year on a similar kind of budget thanks to the leadership of Senator Gregg, whom you just had on, and others on the Hill. We think they can do it again." (Bloomberg TV's "Money And Politics," 2/6/06)

The Wall Street Journal* Profiles The Pro-Growth Policies In The President's Proposed Budget. "President Bush called for a one-year stopgap measure to protect millions of taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax this year. In his $2.77 trillion budget plan unveiled yesterday, the president made few new proposals that affect individual taxpayers and investors. He renewed his appeals to Congress to kill the estate tax and create new tax-favored savings vehicles to encourage people to increase their savings. He also again urged Congress to make permanent the wide-ranging tax cuts enacted during his first term, including the rates on long-term capital gains and dividends, which are now set to expire at the end of 2008, and on personal income taxes, now set to expire after 2010. With midterm elections coming this fall, the president has a good chance of winning congressional approval for his one-year patch that would protect more taxpayers from the AMT. Congress also might be willing to approve a partial extension of the tax cuts on capital gains and dividends, analysts say." (Tom Herman, "How Bush's Budget Affects Your Taxes," The Wall Street Journal, 2/7/06)

Attorney General Gonzales Discusses The Importance Of The NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program. "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales warned the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday about the sensitive nature of President Bush's warrantless surveillance program aimed at capturing communications between terrorist plotters. 'Our enemy is listening,' he said during testimony before the committee. 'I cannot help but wonder if they aren't shaking their heads in amazement at the thought that anyone would imperil such a sensitive program by leaking its existence in the first place, and smiling at the prospect that we might now disclose even more or perhaps even unilaterally disarm ourselves of a key tool in the war on terror.'" (Charles Hurt, "'Enemy Is Listening,' Gonzales Warns," The Washington Times, 2/7/06)

Judiciary Committee Member Senator Orrin Hatch (R-UT) Says The NSA Program "Is Necessary To Protect Us From The Terrorists In This Country." SEN. HATCH: "The President takes a position as does his Attorney General, that when Congress passed the joint resolution authorizing the use of military force on all force necessary to protect us from terrorists, that he has the right to do warrantless terrorist surveillance. He also relies on the inherent powers of Article II of the Constitution and of course the reasonableness standard in the Fourth Amendment. And I believe that he does have the power to do this, but we're all concerned whether – we don't want to give any person unlimited power, we certainly want to make sure that if these powers are exercised, they're exercised with discretion and the Attorney General assures us that this is a very limited program. It has to be reauthorized every 45 days, it is necessary to protect us from the terrorists in this country, and I think he did a pretty good job of trying to explain that today." (MSNBC's "Hardball," 2/6/06)

Johns Hopkins University Professor Fouad Ajami Writes That The President's Effort To Promote Democracy In The Middle East Is Providing "A New Political Way." "The belligerence that was loose in the peninsula two or three years earlier appears milder now, as new ideas of tolerance struggle to take hold. This assertion by George W. Bush that despotism need not be the Arab destiny is about the only bond between the United States and the Arab world. In its optimism, this diplomacy of freedom recalls that brief moment after the Great War when Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points held out the promise of liberty to those Arab and Muslim lands. To be sure, there are the 'usual suspects' among the Arabs who are averse to the message and to the American messenger, and our pollsters and reporters know the way to them. But this crowd does not reflect the broader demand for a new political way. We have given tyranny the patience of decades. Surely we ought to be able to extend a measure of indulgence to freedom's meandering path." (Fouad Ajami, Op-Ed, "The Promise Of Liberty," The Wall Street Journal, 2/7/06)

Coalition Member El Salvador Reaffirms Commitment To Rebuilding Iraq. "The government said Monday it will send another contingent of 380 soldiers to Iraq, making it the country's sixth group to serve six-month rotations in the war-torn nation. 'There are still projects that must be carried out in Iraq,' said Defense Ministry spokesman Col. Jose Alas. 'We have to finish the work. The mission is to continue with the humanitarian work.' The Salvadorans are helping build water systems, rebuild schools and provide medical care in the Iraqi provincial city of Kut, about 100 miles southeast of Baghdad." Terrorist Surveillance Program

Legal Analysis

February 8 & 9, 2006

Section 2511(2)(f) of Title 18

"Nothing contained in this chapter or chapter 121 or 206 of this title, or section 705 of the Communications Act of 1934, shall be deemed to affect the acquisition by the United States Government of foreign intelligence information from international or foreign communications, or foreign intelligence activities conducted in accordance with otherwise applicable Federal law involving a foreign electronic communications system, utilizing a means other than electronic surveillance as defined in section 101 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, and procedures in this chapter or chapter 121 and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 shall be the exclusive means by which electronic surveillance, as defined in section 101 of such Act, and the interception of domestic wire, oral, and electronic communications may be conducted."

Section 109 of FISA

Section 109 of FISA prohibits any person from intentionally "engag[ing] . . . in electronic surveillance under color of law except as authorized by statute."

Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF)

Congress authorized the President to "use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks" of September 11th in order to prevent "any future acts of international terrorism against the United States."

AUMF Continued…

- The Supreme Court decision in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld concluded that detention of enemy combatants who fought against the United States as part of an organization "known to have supported" al Qaeda "is so fundamental and accepted an incident to war as to be an exercise of the 'necessary and appropriate force' Congress has authorized the President to use." 542 U.S. 507, 518 (2004).

- Section 4001(a) of Title 18 says "No citizen shall be imprisoned or otherwise detained by the United States except pursuant to an Act of Congress."

History of Presidential Surveillance Authorizations during Wartime

- President George Washington: Made frequent and effective use of secret intelligence, including the interception of mail from Britain to America during the Revolutionary War.
- President Abraham Lincoln: In the Civil War, telegraph wiretapping was common and provided important intelligence to both sides.
- President Woodrow Wilson: In World War I, the President ordered the interception of all cable communications between the United States and Europe; he inferred the authority to do so from the Constitution and from a general congressional authorization to use military force that did not mention anything about such surveillance. See Exec. Order No. 2604 (Apr. 28, 1917).
- President Franklin Roosevelt: The day after the attack on Pearl Harbor, President Roosevelt authorized the interception of all communications traffic into and out of the United States.

Canon of Constitutional Avoidance

It is well established that the first task of any interpreter faced with a statute that may present an unconstitutional infringement on the powers of the President is to determine whether the statute may be construed to avoid the constitutional difficulty. "[I]f an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, and where an alternative interpretation of the statute is 'fairly possible,' we are obligated to construe the statute to avoid such problems." INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 299-300 (2001) (citations omitted); Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 345-48 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). Moreover, the canon of constitutional avoidance has particular importance in the realm of national security, where the President's constitutional authority is at its highest. See Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527, 530 (1988); William N. Eskridge, Jr., Dynamic Statutory Interpretation 325 (1994) (describing "[s]uper-strong rule against congressional interference with the President's authority over foreign affairs and national security").

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Says Administration Has Legal Authority For NSA Surveillance Program. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) if President Bush is willing to work with Congress to settle the legal disputes about the domestic spying program. Cheney said, "We believe that we have all the legal authority we need. He indicated the other day he's willing to listen to ideas from the Congress, and certainly they have the right and the responsibility to suggest whatever they want to suggest. We'd have to make a decision as an Administration whether or not we think it would help and would enhance our capabilities. But as I say, we believe firmly that based on the Constitution, based on the authorization for the use of force Congress passed in the immediate aftermath of 9/11, that we have all the legal authority we need with respect to the NSA program." Cheney also said that the domestic surveillance program "has produced intelligence for us that has been very valuable in the global war on terror both in terms of saving lives and breaking up plots directed at the United States. It has been a very useful source of intelligence for us and we need to continue the program."

Fox News' Special Report (2/7, Angle) reported, "The Vice President says the Administration has looked at the legal questions and reached a firm conclusion." Cheney: We believe, firmly, that based on The Constitution, based on the authorization for the use of force Congress passed in the immediate aftermath of 9/11, that we have all the legal authority we need." Fox continued, "But a leading Democratic critic went on the floor of the Senate Tuesday afternoon to blast the program, the president and even his own colleagues." Sen. Russ Feingold "criticized Democrats, as well as Republicans, for applauding the president when he talked about the N.S.A. program during his State of the Union address."

Reuters (2/8, Holland) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "resisted bipartisan appeals for changes in a hotly disputed warrantless eavesdropping program, saying he believed 'we have all the legal authority we need.'" Still, Cheney "said Bush had indicated he was willing to listen to ideas from the U.S. Congress and that members of Congress certainly have the right to suggest changes."

The AP (2/8) reports Vice President Cheney "shrugged off congressional criticism of the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program Tuesday, suggesting some in the know who previously raised no objections were changing their tune. He also expressed little interest in working with Congress to settle legal disputes."

The New York Daily News (2/8, Meek) reports that as Vice President Cheney "launched a preemptive strike against a GOP insurrection on Capitol Hill, top sources from both parties made clear they weren't impressed with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' arguments on Monday that National Security Agency wiretapping inside the U.S. broke no laws." Senior Capitol Hill aides "told the Daily News they expect bipartisan legislation that might put the controversial NSA domestic spying programs under the scrutiny of the supersecret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court."

Cheney Responds To Graham Comments About Program. Cheney was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) about Sen. Lindsey Graham's comment that if the Administration uses the force resolution as a legal justification for the domestic surveillance program, when "this President or the next president comes and asks for a force resolution from Congress, there could be all kinds of exceptions." Cheney said, "I think people are straining here to try to find an issue to some extent. … Incident to the authorization of the use of force, military force, clearly I would expect would be a decision that that implies as well the ability to intercept the communications of the enemy. That's an inherent part of warfare. … Now, there may be suggestions from some that we need to have some additional authorization passed and we don't believe it's required, but as the president said the other day, we're perfectly willing to listen to suggestions from the Congress."

Wilson First Republican To Call For Full Congressional Investigation Of NSA Program. The New York Times (2/8, Lichtblau) reports Rep. Heather Wilson, "whose subcommittee oversees the National Security Agency," yesterday "broke ranks with the White House…and called for a full Congressional inquiry into the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program." Rep. Wilson, "chairwoman of the House Intelligence Subcommittee on Technical and Tactical Intelligence, said in an interview that she had 'serious concerns' about the surveillance program. By withholding information about its operations from many lawmakers, she said, the administration has deepened her apprehension about whom the agency is monitoring and why." The Times adds Wilson is the "first Republican on either the House's Intelligence Committee or the Senate's to call for a full Congressional investigation into the program."

Harman Says Full Intelligence Panel Should Be Briefed On Surveillance Program. Rep. Jane Harman, ranking member of the House Intelligence Committee, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/7), "Now that the existence of the program has been disclosed by the president in response to some leaks to The New York Times, I have had a chance to check with some real experts on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. I believe the entire program could be covered under FISA, and it is not. And I'm baffled why the administration is declaring that it has inherent power to do this, disregarding laws that Congress intended to be the exclusive means to eavesdrop on Americans." Harman added, "The way this should be done is now that the program has been disclosed and is going to be gone over in painstaking detail, at least by the Senate Judicial Committee -- bravo for Chairman Specter, whom I spoke to earlier today and congratulated -- the full Intelligence Committee should be briefed on all aspects of program. We should decide in closed session whether the program complies with the laws that we have enacted. If it does not -- and I'm saying I think it does and those laws should be followed -- if it does not in any way, we should either change the law or change the program."

McCain Says Gonzales Hearing Was "Very Helpful." Sen. John McCain said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/7), "I do believe that there are concerns about how far the government is going, not just on this issue, but on other issues. But you know, the -- the Democrat leaders as well as Republican Intelligence Committee were briefed on this program. And so that -- and I don't know what the program is, and frankly, I probably will never know. But we want to -- we've got to make sure -- there have been abuses in the past by previous administrations, both Democrat and Republican, and I think our job, which is a careful balancing act, is to protect national security, at the same time protect the rights of the individual and there's always that kind of tension. I think that hearing was very helpful yesterday in a variety of ways. We need to have this issue ventilated for the American people."

Senate Seen As Defending Congressional Power Vis-À-Vis Executive. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Chaddock) reports the Senate this week has "opened a broad - and often tense - dialogue with the Bush administration over the president's wartime powers. It's more than just a probe into who authorized what, when, and why in a recently disclosed domestic eavesdropping program. If the president is not checked, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle argue, then the constitutional balance of power could shift away from the Congress for at least a generation." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "I'm for the president's inherent authority to conduct the war, but not to neuter the other two branches." The Monitor adds that at the "root of congressional worries about the NSA surveillance case is the prospect that such broad interpretations of presidential powers could last well into the future. 'We could be in this war on terror for decades,' says Sen. Sam Brownback (R) of Kansas."

Ignatius Says Partisan Debate Over NSA Surveillance Misplaced. In his Washington Post column (2/8, A19), David Ignatius says, "As quickly as you can say the words 'Karl Rove,' the debate over the National Security Agency's anti-terrorist surveillance program is degenerating into a partisan squabble. Rather than seeking a compromise that would anchor the program in law, both the administration and its critics are pursuing absolutist agendas -- insisting on the primacy of security or liberty, rather than some reasonable balance of the two. This way lies disaster." A "stable, legal foundation for the NSA program can come by placing it under FISA jurisdiction, or by amending FISA, or perhaps by a judicial review that might support the administration's argument that Article II trumps FISA. Instead, we have none of the above."

Rivkin, Casey Say Congress Should Exercise Oversight Over NSA Program. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/8), David Rivkin and Lee Casey, alumni of the Bush 41 and Reagan Justice Departments, say, "Although enhanced congressional oversight of the NSA program may well be constitutionally permissible and even sensible as a policy matter, the requirement of a warrant for this type of surveillance would trench upon the president's constitutional power as commander in chief to monitor enemy communications in wartime." Even the NSA program's "fiercest foes don't claim that it was designed or administered for snooping on the president's 'enemies' or critics." Rivkin and Casey conclude, "In short, there is no obviously constitutional and practical means of subjecting NSA's al Qaeda surveillance program to regular judicial review. Instead, Congress must itself shoulder the responsibility. It might enact a new FISA that would fully bless the president's activities, but add enhanced oversight, involving more information sharing with more members of Congress, backed up by the threat to use its fiscal powers to de-fund the program if abuses arise."

NYTimes Says Gonzales Failed To Answer Senators' Questions. The New York Times (2/8) says in an editorial, "We thought President Bush's two recent Supreme Court nominees set new lows when it came to giving vague and meaningless answers to legitimate questions, but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made them look like models of openness when he testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday about domestic spying. Mr. Gonzales seems to have forgotten the promise he made to the same panel last year when it voted to promote him from White House counsel to attorney general: that he would serve the public interest and stop acting like a hired gun helping a client figure out how to evade the law."

More Commentary. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/8) editorializes, "Anyone who hoped that Monday's hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee would shed new light on whether the Bush administration is violating the law by conducting secret wiretaps on the international e-mails and telephone conversations of Americans was bound to have been sorely disappointed. Although he spent more than seven hours under sometimes sharp questioning, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales supplied virtually no new facts or insights that would help Americans make a more informed judgment about this important matter. One can only hope that Gonzales will be more forthcoming when, as expected, he comes to Capitol Hill to meet with the committee a second time."

The Providence Journal (2/8) editorializes, "U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales's testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee Monday about the National Security Agency's warrantless watching of U.S. citizens was not comforting. … In effect, he insisted that Article II of the Constitution lets the president ignore the legal duty to consult the two other branches of government in making such surveillance policies. … That al-Qaida poses perils must not be used as an excuse for ignoring the need to clearly follow the law. U.S. law, if followed, protects us from being victimized by U.S.

officials who might have reasons other than national security to invade privacy and obtain personal information about us."

In a column for the San Francisco Chronicle (2/8), Debra J. Saunders writes, "If anyone can show me that the National Security Agency, under order from President Bush or top aides, eavesdropped on Hillary Clinton or Ted Kennedy or some prominent partisan critic, I'll change my tune and see what this administration is doing as a threat to civil liberties. Until then, I can only see the attacks on an NSA surveillance program -- on Monday the Senate Judiciary Committee grilled Attorney General Alberto Gonzales over the program that allowed officials to mine information from international phone calls and the Internet -- as ill-conceived, partisan and dangerous. … Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chair, has pushed for the administration to ask the FISA court to review the NSA program. 'You think you're right, but there are a lot of people who think you're wrong,' Specter told Gonzales. 'What do you have to lose if you're right?' … The question should be: What does America have to lose? If FISA found against the NSA program, one would hope Congress would pass laws designed to give intelligence officials what they need -- with oversight to prevent abuses. But that may be asking too much."

The Portland Oregonian (2/8) editorializes, "Gonzales testified, in essence, that the Constitution and federal law give the president free rein to spy on people in this county, including American citizens, in the name of fighting terrorism. … Not even the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee buys that argument." The Oregonian adds, "Court-issued warrants, coupled with congressional oversight, are this country's time-tested safeguards. There's no evidence that such checks and balances contributed to the failure to prevent the 9/11 attacks, and there's no truth to the claim that they stand in the way of preventing future attacks. … In the political heat of Monday's hearing, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., claimed the Bush administration says it 'doesn't have to follow the law.' That's inaccurate. The president and his attorney general say they are following the law -- and, more to the point, they've decided what the law says. … All the more reason to support Specter's sensible call for a review by the FISA court."

In a piece posted on Slate.com (2/8), Slate senior editor Emily Bazelon writes, "Given the box Specter constructed for the hearings, what could be learned from them? Actually, the day was pretty instructive, not on the topics of spying or national security, but on the bizarre embrace into which the legislature and the executive have locked themselves since Sept. 11. Congress claims that it wants to exercise its war powers and help set rules for NSA spying—but in fact it's afraid to, for fear of appearing to undermine the president. And the Bush administration acts like it wants to undo the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act—but it fears the public uproar that amending the act would create." Bazelon adds, "The fuss over whether Gonzales should testify under oath seemed to be about the possibility, at least in Specter's mind, that the attorney general was about to say something that could get him into trouble for lying. Gonzales had been sworn in when he testified twice before, as have other Department of Justice officials. Today, though, Specter said such an oath was 'unwarranted' (though Gonzales had agreed to take it). … The Democrats wanted Gonzales sworn in. They made Specter take a roll-call vote, and he had to vote on behalf of two absent Republican senators to break a tie. … Everyone seemed to be rolling up their sleeves for a partisan square-off. … But then some of the Republicans changed their stance. They seemed more worried about a loss of senatorial power than about fighting with the Democrats. And that meant taking issue with Gonzales' theory of executive authority." Bazelon concludes, "How should FISA be amended? Where do you draw the line to protect civil liberties while allowing all the searches that could ever snare a potential terrorist? Those are hard questions—too hard for Congress, it seems. You have to hand it to Bush and Gonzales. They don't have much to work with, legally speaking. But they're playing the politics just right."

In a piece posted on washingtonpost.com (2/8), legal analyst Andrew Cohen writes, "There are remarkable similarities between what happened at Enron before its collapse in 2001 and what is happening now inside the executive branch as it prosecutes the legal war on terrorism. And it is only now, as the corporate fraud and conspiracy trial of Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay begins in Houston and as we approach the start of Congressional hearings into the White House's domestic surveillance program, that the patterns have emerged with real clarity." Cohen continues, "Federal prosecutors alleged in Houston last week that when Enron didn't like the profit numbers it was seeing from its business efforts, it simply changed the numbers through accounting and financial artifices, with the consent and at the direction of the men who led the company. … Likewise, when the Bush Administration didn't like the way its intelligence surveillance operations were going, it simply changed the rules through novel and as yet untested legal arguments, with the consent of the President and at the direction of his attorney general." Cohen adds, "Enron, we now know, didn't just immediately tumble off the cliff into illegal practices. It inched toward it. … Likewise, the Bush Administration didn't just start out on its current path toward legal and political confrontation (and perhaps constitutional violation) by rewriting surveillance law. The new program is just the latest example in a pattern of unilateral legal action by the White House. In 2002, remember, the White House and Justice Department rewrote the law on torture, implicitly and in some ways explicitly condoning conduct that most reasonable people would consider to be torture. That led us to Abu Ghraib as inexorably as Enron's crooked accounting led to its bankruptcy." Cohen concludes, "Enron's top executives thought they were the 'smartest guys in the room' but in the end, as the title of another Enron-related book goes, it was all just a 'conspiracy of fools.' Many Bush Administration's lawyers and leaders also give off a 'smartest guys in the room' aura, especially when they are interpreting the law in a way it hasn't been before. Whether they are fools, too, or we are, or both, remains unclear."

Lawyers File Suit On Behalf Of US Citizen Held In Iraq For Allegedly Helping Zarqawi. The New York Times (2/8, Lewis) reports attorneys representing Shawqi Ahmad Omar, a 44-year-old naturalized American citizen, "have been pressing a federal district judge to intervene in their client's case, saying that he had been arrested and held in Iraq for more than a year without being charged or given access to a lawyer." The Justice Department he is "a close associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi…and he may be guilty of war crimes," having "been captured…harboring an Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian foreign fighters" that said "Omar was plotting to kidnap foreigners from Baghdad hotels." The Justice Department also "argued that Mr. Omar was not in military custody, the basis under which his lawyers say a federal judge has jurisdiction over his case," but is "held by the Multi-National Force." Omar's lawyers requested that the judge "block any transfer of Mr. Omar to Iraqi government custody, which they said would be a ruse by the United States to avoid federal court jurisdiction."

Muslim Cleric Convicted By UK Jury, Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison. A jury in London on Tuesday convicted radical Muslim cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri on charges of soliciting murder and inciting violence in sermons at his Finsbury Park Mosque, which was attended by shoe-bomber Richard Reid and al Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui. Al-Masri was sentenced to seven years in prison.

The New York Times (2/8, Natta) reports, "The seven-year sentence means that Mr. Masri will most likely serve roughly three and a half years in prison. Under British law, he will not be eligible for extradition until he has completed his sentence here. Mr. Masri's defense lawyer, Edward Fitzgerald, said his client would 'strenuously contest' extradition to the United States." The AP (2/8, Panja) adds, "Authorities in Britain and the United States accuse al-Masri of being at the center of a web of terrorist activity," and "he has been charged in the United States on an 11-count indictment with trying to establish a terrorist training camp in Oregon, conspiring to take hostages in Yemen and facilitating terror training in Afghanistan." DOJ spokesman Bryan Sierra "said the United States 'stands ready to resume the extradition proceedings against Abu Hamza when British law allows.'" NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 4, :55, Williams) also noted, "American authorities are hoping to get him to the US to face trial."

The Financial Times (2/8, Tait, Burns) reports Justice Anthony Hughes said at the sentencing that al-Masri's "views had caused 'real danger to the lives of innocent people in different parts of the world' and helped created an atmosphere 'in which to kill has become regarded by some as...a moral and religious duty in pursuit of perceived justice.' The judge added: 'No one can now say what damage your words may have caused. No one can say whether your audience, present or wider, acted on your words'." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Daniszewski, Stobart) notes the "jury found Masri guilty of 11 charges: six of solicitation to murder; three of using threatening words and behavior with intent to foment racial hatred; one of possessing audiotapes intended to stir up racial hatred; and one for possessing an 'Encyclopedia of Afghani Jihad,' which prosecutors described as a terrorist manual and said was dedicated to Osama bin Laden. (One chapter listed likely terrorist targets such as the Statue of Liberty, the Eiffel Tower and Big Ben in London.)

The Washington Post (2/8, A12, Jordan) reports, "In a surprise announcement, Scotland Yard said after the verdict was announced that officers who raided Masri's Finsbury Park mosque in 2003 had seized guns for firing blanks, a stun gun, a gas mask, blank passports, hunting knives and other items. Officials said that information was not publicly disclosed in an effort not to prejudice the trial, which involved other charges. 'What place do these things have in a place of worship?' asked Peter Clarke, head of Scotland Yard's terrorist branch. Clarke told reporters he could only conclude that the items were for 'some form of training or training camps.'"

US Seeks Extradition Of Kassir From Czech Republic. The Czech news agency CTK (2/8) reports, "The Justice Ministry has received an official U.S. application for the extradition of Oussama Kassir, a Swede of Lebanese origin, who was detained in Prague on suspicion of terrorism, ministry spokesman Petr Dimun said. 'The application was immediately handed to the relevant state attorney's office. The admissibility of extradition will be assessed by court and the decision on the extradition will be made by the justice minister (Pavel Nemec),' Dimun said." CTK notes, "Kassir allegedly participated in building a training camp for Jihad in Oregon, USA. The trained Muslims were to move to Afghanistan."

German High Court Orders Alleged Al Qaeda Member Released Pending Appeal. The New York Times (2/8, Landler) reports the German Federal Constitutional Court on Tuesday ordered the release of Moroccan Mounir el-Motassadeq, "who had been convicted of belonging to a cell of Al Qaeda whose members included the Sept. 11 hijackers, pending an appeal of his case," in which "he was sentenced to seven years in prison." The constitutional court "ruled that the lower court had been wrong to put him jail, because he posed no greater risk of fleeing than during his first appeal. As a condition of his release, he is not allowed to leave Germany and must turn in his passport to authorities." Motassadeq "could still serve his sentence if an appeals court upholds the lower court's conviction."

Agence France-Presse (2/8) reports, "Motassadeq left the prison in the company of his lawyer on Tuesday evening, according to journalists at the scene." AFP adds, "He was found guilty in August in a retrial of belonging to a terrorist organization for plotting holy war with fellow Muslim extremists, including three of the September 11 suicide hijackers. … He was jailed for seven years but both the prosecution and the defense have appealed the sentence. … His lawyer Gerhard Strate told AFP he filed the suit demanding Motassadeq's release with the federal constitutional court in the southwestern city of Karlsruhe on the grounds that he had been held in custody during the year-long retrial."

Mueller Discusses Security, Counter-Terrorism With Moroccan King. Under the headline "No Country Or Agency Could Be Successful Without Cooperation, FBI Head," The Morocco Times (2/8, Rhanem) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller "said that no country or agency in the world can be successful without cooperation. 'Countries have to work closely together in an era of globalization and technology to exchange information to prevent attacks and criminals from from preying on our people,' he told Morocco Times. 'Therefore associations and friendships between our countries are exceptionally important,' he added. Mueller also said that the FBI has also addressed ways to cooperate with Moroccan security officials to exchange information in policing and fingerprints and DNA databases. The FBI head was received on Tuesday in Rabat by HM King Mohammed VI. 'I have discussed with King Mohammed VI the fact that the War on Terror addresses certainly those few individuals who would undertake terrorist attacks,' Mueller told Morocco Times. 'But this also means that we have to work with the social structure, developing jobs and opportunities that King Mohammed VI has in his vision over the last several years. My discussion indicated how it is important to compliment him on addressing these issues,' he stressed."

Agence France Presse (2/8) reports Mueller and King Mohammed "held talks…on security cooperation and the fight against terrorism, officials said. Also present at the meeting were the United States ambassador to Morocco, Thomas Riley, the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigations' (FBI) Rabat office, Lauren Anderson, Moroccan Interior Minister Mostafa Sahel and intelligence chiefs Hamidou Laanigri and Abdellatif Hammouchi."

US Officials Confirm FBI Passed Tip About London Bomber To UK Before Attack. The AP (2/8, Hays) reports, "U.S. officials confirmed reports on Tuesday that a terror informant arrested in 2004 identified one of the London transit system suicide bombers as a possible threat. But the officials said the tip was too vague to foil last year's deadly attack. The FBI passed on the warning about Mohammed Sidique Khan to British authorities before the bombings…according to two U.S. law enforcement officials based in New York. The informant, Mohammed Junaid Babar, identified Khan as a potential terrorist," but he "offered no specific information about a plot targeting the transit system." The AP notes, "Britain's Home Office and London's Metropolitan Police have refused to comment on Babar's claims about intelligence related to Khan, citing government policy not to discuss issues of security or intelligence." The UK's ITN (2/7) briefly reports yesterday's New York Daily News article which broke the story.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS, FBI Warn Of Prepaid Cell Phone Purchases By Terrorists. CNN's The Situation Room (2/7, Arena) reported, "The Department of Homeland Security and the FBI sent out a bulletin to law enforcement partners today. It basically says that there are some individuals who have made bulk purchases of prepaid cell phones who may have links to terrorist organizations. Now…buying these types of cell phones in bulk and reselling them at a higher price is big business on the black market. FBI analysts conclude that if terrorists are involved it's probably to raise money. It's also important to point out that cell phones have also been used by terrorists as improvised explosive devices, as we saw in the Madrid train attack. But the bulletin says that it's unlikely that these purchases have links to IED construction."

Security Screening Test Begins At New Jersey Rail Stations. The Washington Post (2/8, A6, Garcia) reports that at the PATH station in Jersey city, "Manhattan-bound commuters passed through metal detectors and shoved their briefcases and knapsacks through X-ray machines Tuesday in the first test of airport-style security in a rail system. Government screeners searched bags and scanned passengers for explosives, but unlike in airports, commuters did not have to remove their shoes or change and cell phones from their pockets. Officials hope the screening won't take more than a minute per passenger." DHS spokesman Larry Orluskie said the 30-day pilot project is intended "collect information on customer wait times and impact on operations. The idea is to not hinder people."

The New York Times (2/8, McGeehan) reports, "During rush hours, the screeners choose subjects at a predetermined rate, maybe every eighth passenger. At slower times, they may switch to screening all of them or all of those with larger bags, officials said. Riders who decline to participate in the test will be free to walk away unless one of the two Port Authority police officers standing by considers their behavior suspicious, said an official overseeing the test."

Port Association Chairman Urges More Support For Port Infrastructure, Security. Bernard Groseclose, president and CEO of the South Carolina State Ports Authority and chairman of the board of the American Association of Port Authorities, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (2/8) writes that "the US port industry is facing unprecedented challenges that should concern every American consumer, as well as the president and Congress. If unaddressed, these challenges could weaken the nation's supply chain and economic vitality. Port security remains a critical issue in this post-September 11 world." Groseclose states, "The release Monday of the president's fiscal 2007 budget presents a timely opportunity to reflect on the nation's commitment to port infrastructure and its security. … It is vital that the federal government uphold its end of the partnership with public port authorities and help ensure that America's ports remain both secure and efficient."

DHS Seeks Another $41.7 Million To Implement Pay System. The Washington Post (2/8, B2, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Department of Homeland Security is asking Congress for an extra $41.7 million in fiscal 2007 to continue setting up its new pay and personnel system, MaxHR, which will replace the GS system used across the government for decades. The increase, if approved, would bring total funding for MaxHR to $71.4 million. … The President's fiscal 2007 budget, released Monday, would allow Homeland Security to continue with the design of its market-based pay system, create a compensation committee and continue training supervisors and managers. … During fiscal 2007, Homeland Security officials expect to phase in pay-for-performance and market-based systems. The department's budget request seeks funding for 16 positions to administer the performance-based pay system. In addition, the budget request would finance two new positions to address hiring problems across the department. Federal managers, including Homeland Security officials, are increasingly complaining that hiring takes too long."

Leader Selected For 9/11 Museum. The New York Times (2/8, Pogrebin) reports Alice M. Greenwald has been chosen "to guide a much-disputed 9/11 museum into existence at ground zero." The initial reaction to Greenwald, an associate director for museum programs at the Holocaust Museum in Washington, "seemed positive. Monica Iken, founder of September's Mission, whose husband, Michael, died in the south tower of the World Trade Center, said yesterday that Ms. Greenwald 'has done an exemplary job at the Holocaust Museum.'"

FEMA's Overall Disaster Response Rated As "Adequate." The Washington Post (2/8, A17, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Despite the awful press, FEMA's overall 'disaster response' has been deemed 'adequate,' according to a new government Web site. The site -- http://www.expectmore.gov -- provides the public with assessments of how federal programs are operating. … Most everyone, with maybe one prominent exception, thinks that former FEMA director Michael ('Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job') Brown led a hurricane rescue effort that was itself a disaster. So if FEMA is 'adequate,' exactly what do you have to do to flunk? Turns out it is the lowest rating given for programs deemed to be 'performing.' The ratings are 'effective, moderately effective, or adequate,' the site explains. 'Adequate' means 'a program that needs to set more ambitious goals, achieve better results, improve accountability or strengthen its management practices.'"

Blanco Threatens To Block Energy Leases Unless Louisiana Gets Its "Fair Share." The New York Times (2/8, Rivlin) reports, "Seeking more money from Washington for hurricane relief, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco entered uncharted legal territory with a threat on Monday to block oil and gas leases worth hundreds of millions to the federal treasury unless the state received its 'fair share' of the revenues. 'It's time to play hardball, as I believe that's the only game Washington understands,' Ms. Blanco said Monday night as she opened the second special legislative session she has called since Hurricanes Katrina and Rita." However, "It remains to be seen whether the governor has the authority to block the leases. By statute, the Minerals Management Service, the agency in the Interior Department that oversees offshore leases, has to seek comment from the affected governors. It is not clear what occurs if a governor refuses to approve a pact."

Evacuees Protest End Of Hotel Payments. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 8, 1:45, Williams) reported, "There was a protest in New York City today. That's not usual but this is. The folks who were protesting were refugees from Hurricane Katrina. A number of them have been living for all these months in hotels throughout the city. Some people have been living at an airport hotel at New York's JFK airport. The protesters are all facing eviction starting tomorrow so today they gathered on the steps of New York City Hall, appealing for more time. FEMA for its part says the deadline to apply for an extension has passed but some of the protests insist they did apply in time but are tangled up in a bureaucratic mess."

The AP (2/7) reported, "The occupants of more than 4,500 government-paid hotel rooms were ordered to turn in their keys Tuesday, as the Federal Emergency Management Agency began cutting off money to pay for their stays. Far more people -- the occupants of at least 20,000 hotel rooms, many of which housed entire families -- were given extensions by FEMA until at least next week and possibly until March 1, said FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney. FEMA said it gave people every possible opportunity to request an extension." Meanwhile, "FEMA maintains that as many as 80 percent of those being forced to check out this week have made other living arrangements, ranging from trailers to receiving federal rent assistance to living with relatives." The AP noted, "In New York, around 50 protesters including both evacuees and activists gathered at the steps of City Hall to protest the evictions. In Oakland, Calif., demonstrators carrying signs and chanting 'Evict FEMA' tried to present an eviction notice to employees at a FEMA branch office." A similar version of the AP story ran in the Washington Times.

WAR NEWS:

Cheney Says 2005 Was Turning Point In Iraq. Vice President Dick Cheney said on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) last night, "I think we're making progress against the insurgency. I think we have been now. I think we'll look back several years from now and see that 2005 was really a turning point in the sense of the progress we made, both in terms of training Iraqi forces -- because we've not got a large number of Iraqis taking the lead various placed around the country, from a security and military standpoint -- but also because of the political milestones that were achieved, that -- from the elections in January of '05, the writing of the constitution, the ratification of that constitution in October, the national elections in December under the new constitution. I think those political milestones, every single one of which has been met, are vital in terms of our ultimate success in Iraq of establishing a democratically elected government and a security situation that the Iraqis themselves can handle."

Before Senate Panel, Rumsfeld Says It Will Take Decades To Build Iraqi Infrastructure. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/7, Pilgrim) reported, "Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld today went to Capitol Hill to give testimony about the war in Iraq and the Pentagon's budget." CNN (McIntyre) added, "Rumsfeld and his top generals once again found themselves defending a controversial plan to reorganize the National Guard and Army Reserves, insisting the shift would result in more combat forces, not less."

Reuters (2/8, Allen) reports Rumsfeld said "it will take decades to rebuild Iraq's infrastructure as senators charged the Bush administration had fumbled reconstruction efforts, slowing a US military withdrawal. … Contrary to forecasts of administration officials before the March 2003 invasion, Rumsfeld said, 'It's going to take decades' for Iraq 'to get the infrastructure back to where a modern country would have it.'" The senators also "questioned Pentagon officials on progress in training Iraqi forces, which the administration says is key for withdrawing U.S. troops."

The AP (2/8, Sidoti) reports "lawmakers of both parties" said the Administration "is falling short in its efforts to rebuild Iraq, increase oil production and spawn a new government that is representative of all factions there." Rumsfeld "heard from critics including panel Chairman John Warner, R-Va. The comments marked a continuation of bipartisan criticism the administration has received in recent months from members of Congress over its Iraq policies."

Knight Ridder (2/8, Brown) reports Rumsfeld also told senators yesterday "corruption and graft threaten to sink any progress that Iraq has made in trying to create a democracy, and U.S. military forces lack the expertise needed to build civilian government." Rumsfeld "discussed corruption, lack of basic services and the looming threat of civil war in Iraq with members of the committee. Although the hearing was not exclusively about the war, much of it focused on how far Iraq had to go before it has a stable, functioning government."

Warner Says Other Federal Agencies Not Doing Enough To Help Iraq Efforts. The Washington Times (2/8, Scarborough) reports Warner "said federal agencies are not doing everything they could to help the US military win in Iraq, prompting…Rumsfeld to suggest an overhaul of civilian departments to better fight Islamic terrorists. 'What we're not getting,' said…Warner, Virginia Republican,'"[are] the other elements of our government to bring to bear to conclude this conflict and perform the mission and bring our forces back.'" Warner "asked Mr. Rumsfeld: 'Do you agree or disagree with my view that we're not pulling together, all elements of our government, with equal force, as is the men and women of the armed forces?' Mr. Warner was airing what has primarily been debated behind closed doors in the Bush administration."

McCain Chastises Rumsfeld Over Supplementals. The Hill (2/8, Tiron) reports Sen. John McCain "accused the Bush administration yesterday of going around congressional authorizers to secure so-called 'emergency funding'" for military operations. At a hearing, McCain said to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "This year you are submitting the seventh emergency supplemental of some $50 billion coming to a total of some $400 billion in the last four years. I do not know how you call it an emergency anymore when you know you are going to have costs associated with the Iraq war." Rumsfeld "said he can go about funding the war 'either way,' meaning he would feel comfortable with funding the war through the regular budget or through supplemental funding."

Intelligence Agencies To Analyze Tape Of Saddam Meeting With Advisors. The New York Times (2/8) reports, "The chairman of the House Intelligence Committee has turned over to intelligence agencies 12 hours of audio recordings of Saddam Hussein meeting with top advisers, an aide to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan, said Tuesday." Hoekstra "believes the recordings may shed light on whether Mr. Hussein hid unconventional weapons before he was toppled in 2003, said the aide, Jamal D. Ware. The voice on the recordings has been confirmed by intelligence analysts as Mr. Hussein's, Mr. Ware said."

Four Marines, Sunni Leader Killed In Iraq Yesterday. The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 4, 2:05, Schieffer) reported "Four more US Marines were killed in action west of Baghdad. Bombings in the capital killed at least seven Iraqis and assassins gunned down a Sunni leader who worked with the Shiite-led government." ABC World

News Tonight (2/7, story 4, :10, Vargas) reported, "Three of the deaths occurred near the city of Hit, 85 miles from the capital."

Meanwhile, USA Today/AP (2/8) reports, "Gunmen assassinated a Sunni community leader Tuesday in the former extremist stronghold of Fallujah." Sheik Kamal Nazal, a Sunni preacher and chairman of the Fallujah city council, "was gunned down in a hail of bullets from two passing cars as he walked to work, police Chief Brig. Hudairi al-Janabi said. No group claimed responsibility for the killing." The Washington Post (2/8, A12, Finer) reports Nazal "ran for a seat in Iraq's parliament and worked closely with American forces policing Fallujah."

The New York Times (2/8, Worth) and Washington Times (2/8, Reid) also reports on the violence.

Shiite-Sunni Violence In Iraq On Upswing. The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 4, 2:05, Schieffer) reported "Around Iraq, Shiite versus Sunni violence is on the rise again." CBS (Dozier) added, "Kill one to frighten 1,000. Sunnis say it's simple, brutal and effective. It's being done to them by a shadowy force within the majority Shiite government." US diplomats and commanders "say the pace of killings has become so fast and furious Sunni leaders are threatening to walk out of a new government that hasn't even been formed yet. Shiite officials concede some in their ranks may be guilty but months of investigations have failed to yield a single arrest." Mowaffak Raubaie, Iraqi national security advisor: "There are so many sort of complaints and there's no smoke without fire." Dossier: "But so far no one from within any of the ministries?" Raubaie: "Well, we need the proof." Dossier: "Sunni politicians say they've provided proof time and again. Shiite officials insist these claims are exaggerated, and they say at least as many Shiites are being killed as Sunnis but Sunnis are seeing red. And they want payback."

UK Defense Secretary Says British Troops Could Leave Iraq. The Financial Times (2/8, Spiegel, Correspondent) reports, "John Reid, the UK defence secretary, on Tuesday night set out the conditions under which British troops would withdraw from Iraq, appearing to lower expectations of how peaceful the country would be when that withdrawal occurred." In a speech in which Reid "sought to 'set out in specific terms' his views on when UK forces could leave, the defence secretary said Iraq was likely to be still rife with violence and suffering from widespread shortages even when British troops departed." Although the speech "was not flagged as a major policy address and Mr Reid has given similarly sober assessments of Iraq's security in the past," the address was "his most specific and, in many regards, most pessimistic view of how Iraq would look after coalition troops withdraw."

The AP (2/8) reports Reid said that "if the months go well, they bring the day closer when the Iraqi people can finally take control of their own futures. That also means that the time is approaching when the coalition which is helping them achieve this can begin leaving Iraq." Reid "would not comment on numbers or dates, saying 'to do so would be to invite chaos.'" Britain "has about 8,000 soldiers in Iraq, most in or near the southern city of Basra."

Navy Reserve Commander Disputes Financial Problems For Activated Reservists. Dana Bienvenu, a commander in the United States Navy Reserve, writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (2/8), "That military reservists called to active duty are underpaid and that their families suffer severe financial hardships as a result of the war is repeated so often that I no longer even try to correct those who argue it as a matter of faith." Actually, "with base pay, housing allowance, imminent danger pay, family separation allowance, medical coverage for families at home and various specialty pay, all being tax free, few recalled soldiers and sailors face destructive hardships." Also, "increased federal legal protection (the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act signed by President Bush in 2003) actually allows activated members to shed financial responsibilities."

State Department Career Weapons Experts "Sidelined." Knight Ridder (2/8, Strobel) reports, "State Department officials appointed by President Bush have sidelined key career weapons experts and replaced them with less experienced political operatives who share the White House and Pentagon's distrust of international negotiations and treaties." The "reorganization of the department's arms control and international security bureaus" was intended "to help it better deal with 21st-century threats. Instead, it's thrown the agency into turmoil and produced an exodus of experts with decades of experience in nuclear arms, chemical weapons and related matters, according to 11 current and former officials and documents obtained by Knight Ridder." The reorganization "was conducted largely in secret by a panel of four political appointees."

1999 White House Report Said Iraq Retained Capacity TO Develop WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/8) excerpts an August 25, 1999 White House report on Iraq's development of WMD. The report stated, "As of December 1998, UNSCOM reporting provides an accurate assessment concerning Iraq's chemical programs as we understand them. … On discrepancies in the material balance of chemical munitions, Iraq continues its refusal to account for a falsely-reported expenditure of some 6,000 chemical munitions, for the disappearance of 550 artillery shells filled with mustard agent, and for an inaccurate accounting of R-400 aerial [chemical weapon] bombs. Concerning VX [gas], UNSCOM has stated that the amount of VX Iraq produced has yet to be verified and that Iraq has yet to admit to its weaponization of VX into missiles... The UNSCOM... reports note that in the biological weapons area, priority issues begin with Iraq's failure at a fundamental level to provide an accurate declaration of its [biological weapons] program; Iraq has submitted several declarations all found to be incomplete. Iraq has not accounted for materials and items that may have been used or acquired for such a program... Iraq retains the industrial capacity and knowledge base to develop [biological weapon] agents quickly."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling's Attorney Highlights "Experts Defense" At Enron Trial. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "The lead attorney for Jeffrey Skilling underscored the advice of experts and the imprecision of business affairs in federal court here yesterday as the defense continued to unfold for the former Enron Corp. president and his co-defendant, former Chairman Kenneth Lay." The Journal continues, "In a sometimes testy exchange in a second day of cross-examination, Mr. Skilling's attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, challenged the government's lead-off witness, former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig, about whether he had any basis for claiming that the company put out false or misleading information to the public. Under government questioning last week, Mr. Koenig said that Messrs. Skilling and Lay had taken part in putting out misinformation about Enron in the nearly two years before its collapse into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001. … Mr. Koenig himself has pleaded guilty to a felony for aiding and abetting securities fraud in Enron's public statements. He is cooperating with the government in hopes of reducing any prison sentence, which could be up to 10 years." The Journal adds, "In questioning yesterday, Mr. Petrocelli pushed the point that many accounting and legal experts reviewed Enron's public financial releases. For instance, the attorney presented Mr. Koenig with a document indicating that Enron's last-minute decision to increase reported earnings for the 1999 fourth quarter by a penny a share had been known to the company's outside accountants, Arthur Andersen. … Such an 'experts defense' argues that an executive can't be accused of lying if he is relying on the advice of outside experts, such as accountants, when making a statement about a company's finances. From the beginning of the giant Enron probe, prosecutors have worried about getting around this defense, say people familiar with the matter. To a large degree, the criminal charges that have been leveled against some 30 individuals in connection with Enron argue that key pieces of information were withheld from the outside experts -- thus removing the protection."

The Deal (2/8, Poole) reports, "The defense in the Enron Corp. fraud trial attempted Tuesday to demonstrate that two former executives did not try to hide anything at the one-time energy giant. … Daniel Petrocelli, former CEO Jeff Skilling's defense attorney, asked Mark Koenig, the former investor relations chief, if some of the things he did as part of his job were done at other companies. Koenig acknowledged that they were. … 'You're not suggesting these are illegal or improper'? Petrocelli asked. … 'No,' Koenig replied, then added, 'But there were false and misleading statements on earnings releases and conference calls.'" The Deal adds, "As for adjusting its earnings upward from 30 cents to 31 cents one quarter to meet Wall Street targets, Petrocelli asked if there was anything wrong with a company 'sharpening its pencil' to do that. … Koenig said there was, adding, 'He [chief accounting officer Rick Causey] said, 'Let me work on it and get it up by a penny." … Petrocelli objected, saying Koenig was 'going beyond' his questions, but the judge didn't rule and the questioning continued. … Petrocelli was able to get Koenig to admit that he erred in earlier testimony that Enron hadn't missed a Wall Street earnings consensus since 1997, when it did in fourth-quarter 1997."

USA Today (2/8, 2B, Farrell) also reports on the trial.

Humbled Rice To Take Stand. The New York Times (2/8, Barrionuevo) reports, "From fast cars to rugged adventure trips to $6.4 million in bonuses, Enron was a dream maker for Kenneth D. Rice. … While he was still in his 30's, Mr. Rice, a former Nebraska farm boy and high school jock, pocketed millions of dollars working for the Houston-based energy company. He lived life in the fast lane — literally — racing Ferraris and going on daredevil expeditions to southern Mexico and the Australian Outback with his onetime friend and mentor, Jeffrey K. Skilling, Enron's former chief executive. … But as early as Wednesday afternoon, a different Ken Rice will take the stand in the criminal trial of Mr. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, who was chief executive when Enron collapsed in late 2001. Mr. Rice will testify against Mr. Skilling, who once considered him one of his most loyal supporters in transforming Enron from a staid pipeline company into a cutting-edge trading company with big ambitions. Mr. Skilling helped make Mr. Rice a very wealthy man. His total compensation, including stock sales, in 2000 came to $47.3 million — more than his bosses, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, earned. Mr. Rice spent some of that money on sports cars, motorcycles and a Colorado vacation home. … But these days, Mr. Rice, 47, is a humbled government witness, having pleaded guilty in 2004 to one count of securities fraud for falsely promoting the troubled broadband division that he headed for two years. He faces up to 10 years in prison and is named in at least 32 pending civil lawsuits, with each of them having the potential to bankrupt him."

Lawsuit Challenges Constitutionality Of Key Sarbanes-Oxley Component. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Scannell, Mullins) reports that the Free Enterprise Fund, a Washington lobbying group, and the Nevada accounting firm Beckstead & Watts "are challenging the constitutionality of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, potentially opening the door for other efforts to roll back the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law" on the grounds that it "violates the appointments clause and separation of powers principles of the Constitution." Their legal team includes Kenneth Starr and ex-Justice Department official Viet Dinh. The lawsuit "comes as some lawmakers are trying to rally support for legislation that would weaken or roll back Sarbanes-Oxley," and also as "some groups, realizing they can't get rules and laws overturned, are turning to the courts to chip away at some recent reforms."

The AP (2/8, Gordon) reports, "Bitterly opposed to the sweeping anti-fraud law, they are challenging the board it established to oversee the accounting industry, arguing that it violates the Constitution's mandated separation of powers among the three branches of government." The AP adds, "The Free Enterprise Fund, an anti-tax group that seeks limited government, filed suit Tuesday in federal court in Washington against the accounting board, known as the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. … The anti-fraud law, known as the Sarbanes-Oxley Act for its congressional sponsors, could be invalidated if any of its sections is found unconstitutional. Opponents want it sent back to Congress for a revision. … Until now, the objections to the law have come mainly from publicly traded companies — especially smaller ones — focusing on one key section of it. They want an easing of its requirements for reporting on the strength of internal financial controls. … Federal regulators and lawmakers have been receptive to their complaints about the burden of complying, but the Sarbanes-Oxley law itself has not been called into question."

WSJournal Calls Lawsuit's Case "Compelling." The Wall Street Journal (2/8) editorializes, "What do you get when you cross corporate scandals with a panicked Congress in an election year? … Sarbanes-Oxley, a bad law that, as it turns out, may also be unconstitutional." The Journal calls the lawsuit a "compelling argument and one that, with any luck, may finally spur Congress to revisit a law that has arguably done more economic harm than the scandals that inspired it. … If we've learned anything about corporate crime in recent years, it is that determined scoundrels can find ways around any corporate governance rules. Most of the post-Enron prosecutions have been made" with pre-Sarbanes-Oxley laws.

Spitzer-Grasso Dispute Still Awaits Trial Date. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Lucchetti, Mcdonald) reports, "Having sparred for 20 months, New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, and former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso say they are ready to take their legal fight over Mr. Grasso's Big Board compensation to court." The Journal continues, "Today, trial-level New York State Supreme Court Judge Charles E. Ramos is expected to discuss progress with both sides of the civil matter and, according to lawyers involved, may revisit a topic he has only hinted at in past months: a trial date." The Journal adds, "Despite their public pronouncements, the litigants and others involved in the matter may benefit from further delay, and legal experts speculate the main event may never make it into court. … Mr. Spitzer has alleged that Mr. Grasso's $188 million compensation package was excessive under New York's not-for-profit law and that Mr. Grasso should return much of the money to the NYSE. Mr. Grasso has said he only took the money the Big Board directors offered him, and he has in turn sued the NYSE for money he says he is still owed. Kenneth Langone, a former Big Board director, was also named in Mr. Spitzer's lawsuit and has also criticized the attorney general's tactics. … One reason the case has proceeded so slowly is its complexity: Both sides have spent months gathering evidence, getting depositions from busy witnesses scattered around the world and doing other so-called discovery work. Neither side wants to rush into a trial without making sure its case is as solid as possible. … The case has also ballooned into a referendum on executive pay -- adding more spotlight pressure -- and Mr. Spitzer's campaign to become New York's next governor in a Nov. 7 election make a delay even more likely. Mr. Spitzer is the only announced Democrat in the race and is doing well in polls."

Senate Panel Looking Into Lobbying By Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Kopecki) reports, "A Senate committee has begun investigating whether government-chartered companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac may have improperly used their charitable foundations and other nonprofits to skirt campaign-finance laws and lobby Congress." The Senate Finance Committee probe "expands on the panel's inquiries into several charities tied to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who recently pleaded guilty to bribery and other charges in a broader public corruption probe, a Finance Committee aide said." The Committee "is examining whether executives at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have used their charitable foundations and other nonprofit groups to skirt lobbying-disclosure laws, while expanding their access to key members of Congress."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Murdered Philadelphia Witness Had Refused Offer Of Government Protection. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/8, Gambacorta Weichselbaum) reports, "Tyreese Allen was killed near a spot where he was shot two years ago" in a shooting incident in which his cousin was murdered. "Allen was prepared to cooperate with authorities and testify against his cousin's alleged killer, Kareem Glass. … So what was he doing in the same neighborhood where he was riddled with bullets once before? Family members said Allen insisted on staying in North Philadelphia, even after the district attorney's office offered him refuge over the summer in the Witness Relocation Program. 'Tyreese didn't want to leave his son and mother behind,' said a relative who said she was too frightened to have her name in the paper. … But officials said Allen could have taken his family with him." The Daily News notes, "The District Attorney's Office doesn't offer witness-protection services, but local witnesses can have access to the federal Witness Security Program, thanks to 'Step Up, Speak Up,' the city's partnership with the FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office that was launched last week. … The federal program gives witnesses new identities and new lives while covering all of the costs, provided they agree never to return to their old neighborhoods."

Four Businessmen Indicted In Philadelphia Corruption Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/8, Shiffman, Anastasia, 423K) reports, "A federal indictment issued yesterday charges that four businessmen tried to funnel $30,000 in campaign contributions to Mayor Street's 2003 reelection campaign to help secure a contract at Philadelphia International Airport. 'This was a blatant attempt to buy influence,' U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said. The four men are charged with defrauding the company they were working for -- Sky Sites Inc.," which "supplied indoor, back-lit advertising displays to airports. … The indictment accuses no public official of wrongdoing." The Philadelphia Daily News (2/8, Hinkelman) notes, "The individuals indicted yesterday were Joseph C. Moderski, 68, of Bryn Mawr; Terry F. Crockett, 61, of Center City; Eric M. Selby, 39, of Washington Grove, Md., and Joseph Evans, 50, of Oyster Bay, N.Y." The New York Daily News/AP (2/8, Loviglio) also reports on the indictments, focusing on the fact that Evans is from Long Island.

In a second story, The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/8, Anastasia, Shiffman, 423K) reports Moderski is "the quintessential Philadelphia deal maker -- the guy who knows a guy who knows a guy." He "appeared on the FBI's radar screen early in the government corruption probe, according to FBI documents. Even thought his public service apparently began and ended with his appointment as chairman of the Ice Skating Rink Advisory Board in Haverford Township in the late 1980s, he had for years been a friend of those with political clout. During the corruption investigation, he was recorded in wiretapped conversations with" Street adviser

Ron White, Imam Shamsud-din Ali, and airport deputy director James Tyrrell. During the Ali trial, "one lawyer asked the case's lead FBI agent, Jesse Coleman, if Moderski had been indicted. 'Not yet,' Coleman replied."

Defense Shows Jurors Photos Of Ryan's Modest Home. The AP (2/8, Robinson) reports, "The red brick home on a tree-shaded Kankakee street looks comfortable enough, but the century-old house where George Ryan has lived for the last four decades is no mansion. The jury at the former governor's racketeering and fraud trial got a photo tour of the place Tuesday from Nancy Smith, the soft-spoken caregiver who long looked after Ryan's mother-in-law. The images of Ryan's house…had that lived-in look and were in sharp contrast to what jurors have seen and heard of expense-paid Ryan vacations in Jamaica and Palm Springs as the guest of state vendors and others seeking favors. … Defense attorneys declined to say exactly why they wanted jurors to see the photos, but they certainly provided a humanizing glimpse of Ryan's home life. … But under cross-examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Laurie J. Barsella, Smith said the Ryans were often away from the Kankakee home even when they were not campaigning."

The Chicago Tribune (2/8, O'Connor, 643K) notes, "During opening statements to jurors in September, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, said the residence was Ryan's home for more than 40 years and his only major asset. In cross-examining Smith Tuesday, the prosecution noted that the Ryans also had an apartment on Wacker Drive in Chicago." The Tribune adds, "In other testimony Tuesday, a onetime press spokesman for former Cook County State's Atty. Jack O'Malley buttressed earlier testimony by O'Malley. Timothy Touhy testified he didn't recall Ryan cursing O'Malley after he passed on a suggestion on how to curb corruption when Ryan was secretary of state in 1992."

Judge Delays Tennessee Waltz Trial Until August. The AP (2/8) reports, "Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks' public corruption trial in the Tennessee Waltz investigation has been postponed to Aug. 7. Federal Judge Daniel Breen approved the delay Tuesday after defense lawyer Steven Farese said he needed more time to study government evidence against Hooks, including recordings of conversations made by FBI agents. … Farese also said Hooks has had trouble financing his defense and hiring lawyers' assistants to review the government recordings to make written transcripts." The AP notes, "The FBI's Tennessee Waltz investigation has led to federal corruption indictments against five current or former state lawmakers. "

Judge Continues To Balk At Prosecution Evidence In "Mafia Cops" Trial. Newsday (2/7, DeStefano) reports, "With the case against Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa due to go to trial on Feb. 21, Judge Jack B. Weinstein asked for more clarity on the charges and hinted that he could keep the government from using certain evidence at trial." On Monday, "Weinstein told prosecutors…during a court hearing that he was having trouble with their request to introduce evidence of uncharged crimes into the case. … 'The evidentiary rulings depend upon what I instructed you from the outset was a serious problem, and that is, connecting the Nevada events with what happened a decade before in New York City,' Weinstein told prosecutors Robert Henoch and Mitra Hormozi. 'So you better come in prepared to convince me on those points, because I'm prepared to rule [on the evidence], and those rulings may be decisive in the jury' verdict, although there's no necessity that my findings will be the same as the jury's,' said Weinstein."

US Will Not Seek Trial Testimony Of NYPD Detectives Who Broke Case. NY1.com (2/7) reports, "The former detectives credited with breaking the so-called 'mafia cops' case will not testify at the upcoming trial. Former NYPD detectives Thomas Dades and William Oldham were able to get a key informer to speak, which led to the charges against disgraced former police officers Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. However, the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's office said Tuesday it has decided not to use Dades and Oldham as witnesses. The news comes as the defense team works to uncover disciplinary action about Dades and Oldham which could hurt their credibility."

Ohio Executes Man For Raping, Murdering Two Women. The AP (2/8, McCarthy) reports, "Ohio on Tuesday executed a man convicted of raping and strangling two women during a five-month spree of assaults while he was on drugs." The AP continues, "Glenn L. Benner II, 43, died by injection at 10:15 a.m. at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility. … Benner admitted committing horrific crimes while under the influence of drugs." The AP adds, "He was convicted of kidnapping, raping and murdering Trina Bowser, 21, in 1986, leaving her body in the trunk of her car along a highway in Tallmadge, the town where they grew up across the street from each other. … A year earlier, he had strangling Cynthia Sedgwick, 26, of Cleveland Heights, in Cuyahoga Falls after a George Thorogood concert. … Benner refused to ask that his life be spared, saying the process does not consider whether a person changes in prison. He also turned down interview requests, saying he was doing so out of respect for the victims and their families."

Identity Thieves Frequently Target Children's Social Security Numbers. ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 9, 2:20, Gibson) reported a "new trend in identity theft" involves "stealing the Social Security numbers of babies. It is an insidious crime, because it can be years before the child grows up, applies for credit and then learns how much damage has been done to his or her credit." ABC (Harris) added, "While the thieves can be anyone with access to children's Social Security numbers -- health care workers, school officials -- two-thirds of children are victimized by people they know. And, like this woman, they often don't report in the crime because they don't want to get those people in trouble." One "possible solution is for the government to track every child's Social Security number and to investigate anytime anyone uses one of those numbers, at a bank or anywhere else, to get credit. Congress is working on a bill. For now, though, parents should closely guard their children's Social Security numbers."

Cuban Spying Case Fuels Long-Time Fears Of Florida Émigrés. The Miami Herald (2/8, Martin, 323K) reports, "Growing up in Miami, young Cuban Americans rolled their eyes whenever the older generation warned there were spies everywhere. … But over the years, proof poured in. The latest: alleged Cuban agents at Florida International University. The old-timers have felt vindicated every time a spy is discovered -- just because they were paranoid didn't mean spies weren't out to get them. But just how damaging have those spies been? Whatever intelligence they may have swiped, their greatest toll could be on the Cuban-American psyche. The 47 years of Castro's rule may have established a well-documented culture of fear and duplicity on the island -- but many say they look over their shoulders in Miami, too." The Herald adds, "Said Skip Brandon, former deputy assistant director of the FBI who specialized in counter-intelligence: 'On the one hand, we probably tended to give Fidel too much credit that he was behind everything, and on the other, maybe not enough. Many foreign intelligence agencies don't really worry about their émigré communities in the United States. Castro always did, and still does.'"

In a short companion piece, The Miami Herald (2/8, 323K) reports, "The recent arrests of Carlos and Elsa Alvarez…are hardly the only indication that Cuba performs the cloak-and-dagger routine in Miami. High-profile spy cases from the past include: July 1991: José Rafael Fernandez Brenes declares on Cuban television that he had been a spy for Fidel Castro…inside TV Martí. November 1992: Francisco Avila reveals he had been a double agent for the FBI and Cuba while serving as military chief for the Miami-based paramilitary group Alpha 66. … September 2000: The FBI arrests 10 South Floridians accused of spying for Cuba under the name La Red Avispa, or the Wasp Network. … September 2001: Ana Belén Montes, former senior analyst for the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, is charged with being a spy for Cuba" and "received a 25-year prison term."

New York Investigators Find New Evidence Of Music Industry Payola. The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 5, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "Government investigators have turned up new evidence of an old problem on the business side" of the music industry, "Payola." CBS (Mason) added, "New York state Attorney General Elliott Spitzer say record labels have been rewarding the radio stations that play their songs with bribes and cash. In an ongoing investigation, Spitzer has uncovered confidential records that reveal how the record companies pay for play. For a Jennifer Lopez song, a Sony promoter writes we bought 63 spins at a cost of $3600. Another record executive notes, two weeks ago it cost us over $4,000 to get the band Franz on. They were effectively buying space on the air. Sony and Warner music have already paid multimillion dollar fines and admitted their employees had used practices that were wrong and improper. Now the rest of the industry is under scrutiny, as the investigation moves in on the giant radio companies that control much of the air waves." That includes "the two largest radio chains. Infinity now called CBS Radio, and Clear Channel, which has some 1200 stations." In a statement, Clear Channel "says it has zero tolerance for pay for play. But Spitzer says the radio companies have played a major role."

Lawyer To Celebrities Is Subject Of Pellicano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Welkos) reports, "His name is nowhere in Monday's 60-page indictment of celebrity gumshoe and alleged wiretapper Anthony Pellicano. … But the shadow of 76-year-old lawyer Bertram Fields, who for years employed Pellicano as an investigator, looms over the case. Listed throughout the indictment are a host of alleged victims, including such prominent names as actor Sylvester Stallone and comic Garry Shandling, who battled with Fields' clients." The Times continues, "According to the federal indictment, Pellicano and his associates either allegedly wiretapped the victims, as with Stallone, or performed background checks on them, as with Shandling, using a database that is supposed to be restricted to law enforcement agencies. … The indictment alleges that Pellicano was trying to gain a tactical advantage for his clients by uncovering embarrassing information on their courtroom opponents." The Times adds, "Fields, whose hardball legal tactics have made him a favorite of many studios and celebrities, has denied knowledge of any illegal activity. Nonetheless, he remains a subject of the ongoing Pellicano investigation. … Fields, who has publicly acknowledged his status as a subject, issued a terse comment Monday. 'It's something I want to stay out of,' Fields said. 'I try to keep practicing law and not pay a lot of attention to it.' … Norman Levine, managing partner of the Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger and Kinsella firm where Fields is a partner, said that although some members of the firm used Pellicano as an investigator, 'if Mr. Pellicano engaged in any illegal activity, he did so without their or the firm's knowledge or authorization.' … Pellicano and his associates were charged with operating an illegal activity that sought information on a variety of key Hollywood figures, including top agents Kevin Huvane and Bryan Lourd of Creative Artists Agency, former New York Times entertainment journalist Bernard Weinraub, former Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch and actors Keith Carradine and Kevin Nealon."

Former Maryland Priest Sentenced For Sexual Abuse. The Baltimore Sun (2/8, Mcmenamin) reports, "For nearly 20 years, Thomas Roberts kept quiet, hiding the secret of sexual abuse by the high school chaplain he sought counseling from in 1987. … When another young man who had attended a different school came forward in 1993 with similar allegations against the priest, Roberts kept quiet still." The Sun continues, "Tuesday, as a Baltimore County judge prepared to sentence Jerome F. Toohey Jr. for the sexual abuse that occurred over three years, Roberts kept quiet no longer. … 'Father Jeff lived nearly 20 years in the freedom of my silence,' the 33-year-old former Calvert Hall College student told the judge. Turning to face Toohey, Roberts added, 'I'm old enough and strong enough now to fight for the young man you abused. Today, the balance of power has finally shifted, and the burden is completely yours.'" The Sun adds, "Toohey, 59, a former Roman Catholic priest and Calvert Hall College chaplain, was sentenced to 18 months in jail for sexually abusing Roberts after his mother asked the priest to counsel her then-14-year-old son, who was struggling with his parents' divorce and questions about his sexuality. … Baltimore County Circuit Judge John G. Turnbull II handed down a five-year sentence, suspending all but 18 months. He also recommended that Toohey be granted work release and directed him to serve 18 months of supervised probation after his release from the county detention center. … Known as 'Father Jeff,' Toohey has also worked as a chaplain to the deaf community and Baltimore police department and as an associate priest at St. John the Evangelist in Hydes."

CIA Employee Charged In Suburban Virginia Burglaries. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Jackman) reports that CIA employee George Dalmas III has been "charged with 17 burglaries in the McLean area." In a search of Dalmas' Falls Church home, police said "they found a stunning trove of cash, jewelry, antiques, license plates -- and bags filled with more than 1,000 women's undergarments.' The Post adds, "Dalmas is a 'mid-level administrative employee,' a CIA spokesman said yesterday, and he has been suspended without pay pending the outcome of the investigation. Some of the houses that were burglarized belonged to CIA employees, and Dalmas may have targeted them because he knew they wouldn't be home, said Fairfax Officer Richard Henry."

Nebraska Man Sentenced For Having Sex With 13-Year-Old Girlfriend. The New York Times (2/8, Ruethling) reports, "A 23-year-old Nebraska man who pleaded guilty to first-degree sexual assault last year for having sex with his 13-year-old girlfriend, whom he impregnated and later married, was sentenced to 18 to 30 months in prison yesterday." The Times continues, "The man, Matthew Koso, of Falls City, will be eligible for parole after nine months. He could have faced up to 50 years in prison. … 'We were stunned,' said Mr. Koso's mother, Peggy, of the sentence given by Judge Daniel E. Bryan Jr. of Richardson County District Court. 'We honestly thought that he would get probation.' … But Mrs. Koso said she was relieved that the sentence was not longer and added that she did not look at her son as a pedophile. … 'Matt has always said that he and Crystal knew that what they did was wrong according to the law, but that they love each other and want to spend their lives together,' she said. 'He's a young man who happened to fall in love with someone much younger than he is, and he did not use good judgment when it came to having a sexual relationship with her.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Koso and his wife, Crystal, began dating in 2003 when he was 20 and she was 12. They were married last May in Hiawatha, Kan., with their parents' consent. Their daughter, Samara, was born in August. … Nebraska's attorney general, Jon Bruning, who charged Mr. Koso in July, said he thought the sentence was fair."

US Recovers $9.3 Million In Illegal Sports Betting Investigation. WAOW-TV Wausau (2/7) reports on its Web site, "We have more information in the case involving a sports betting operation with connections to Wisconsin. Gold Medal Sports handled phone and Internet sports bets totaling hundreds of millions of dollars over five years. Authorities collected more than $9 million in the eight-year effort." The AP (2/6) noted, "Duane Pede and Jeff D'Ambrosia were convicted of violating federal laws against an offshore bookmaking operation in 2002 and of filing false income tax returns. … The two were sentenced to five years in prison and ordered to pay more than$5.1 million in fines and back taxes. … The announcement Friday by U.S. Attorney Stephen P. Sinnott marks the final collection of the outstanding debts. In a statement, Sinnott said the $9.3 million represents the largest amount of fines, forfeitures and back income taxes ever collected in Wisconsin's Western District." The Madison Capital Times (2/4, Callender) also reported, "The payment marks the largest combination of fines, forfeitures, and back taxes ever collected in the Western District of Wisconsin." The Times added, "The offshore betting operation was headquartered in Curacao," but Pede D'Ambrosia "also ran a publishing house in Nelsonville, Wis., that advertised the service in the U.S. according to federal prosecutors."

Four Florida Medical Professionals Indicted On Health-Care Fraud Charges. The Palm Beach Post (2/7, Spencer-Wendel) reports, "A multimillion-dollar insurance scam kept a pharmacist in a lavish lifestyle, a prominent psychiatrist and chiropractor with a flow of illicit cash, and a neurologist with his own stash of prescription drugs for personal use, according to a federal indictment unsealed Monday. Prosecutors have charged pharmacist Joseph Sutera, psychiatrist Eric Ressner and neurologist Agustin Castellanos, all of northern Palm Beach County, with conspiracy to commit health-care fraud. The investigation — conducted by federal agents since at least 2004 — also snared chiropractor Robert Catanese of Palm Beach Gardens." The Post notes, "According to the indictment, Sutera…submitted more than $17 million in claims over a four-year period, receiving $9.9 million. Most of the money was from fraudulent drug claims — prescriptions never made and never filled." Sutera "used the names of the doctors with their permission, according to federal prosecutors. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Carolyn Bell asked a federal judge Monday to require a $1 million bail for Sutera's release." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/7, Coté, 249K) also reports on the indictments.

Former Ohio Bank Manager To Plead Guilty To Embezzlement. The Columbus Dispatch (2/8, Mayhood) reports, "The former manager of a South Side bank has admitted she stole more than $1 million from the bank over five years." Carmen D. Torres Colston "has agreed to plead guilty to embezzlement" and "has already repaid U.S. Bank nearly half the $1.129 million she took." The Dispatch notes that "Colston falsified application documents and used the identities of others to procure loans, lines of credit and credit cards, said Fred Alverson, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office. Bank investigators became suspicious of her work and interviewed her. She admitted the thefts and the case was turned over to the FBI, according to court documents."

Debate Over Treatment Of Mentally Ill Blurred By Recent Killings. The New York Times (2/8, Archibold) reports, "Against the vivid backdrop of recent killings by mentally ill people, both sides in the national debate over whether mentally ill people who have not committed a crime can be forced into treatment are preparing for a showdown in the Legislature here." The Times continues, "New Mexico lawmakers are considering a bill, backed by Gov. Bill Richardson, that would make the state the 43rd with a law allowing family members, doctors or others to seek a court order forcing the mentally ill into outpatient treatment. Typically under the laws, if mentally ill people refuse the treatment, they can face confinement in a hospital." The Times adds, "Across the country, proponents have pushed the laws as a pragmatic approach to the mentally ill who fall through the cracks of the mental health system, particularly those who have committed no crime but could harm themselves or others as their sickness worsens. These mentally ill people often do not need to be in a hospital, but do need to stick to treatment, which could include medication, therapy or both. … 'We are talking about a small group of people who do not get help because they don't want help or know they need help,' Mary T. Zdanowicz, executive director of the Treatment Advocacy Center, based in Virginia, said in a break from lobbying lawmakers here. … But opponents say the laws infringe on the civil rights of the mentally ill, and they suggest that teams of social and psychiatric workers could accomplish the same thing with direct intervention on the streets. Critics also say that most states have not provided adequate money for the services needed by those forced into treatment."

CIVIL LAW:

Adelphia Bankruptcy Judge Denies Request To Appoint Special Examiner. The New York Law Journal (2/8, Lin) reports, "The judge presiding over the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of Adelphia Communications has denied a request to appoint a special examiner to determine whether Boies, Schiller & Flexner, which formerly represented the cable television company, violated the bankruptcy code by failing to disclose that some of its lawyers, including children of senior partner David Boies, were financially interested in litigation support companies the firm recommended to Adelphia." The Journal continues, "The company, which landed in bankruptcy in 2002 following allegations that its founding family, the Rigases, looted the company of hundreds of millions, asked Boies Schiller to resign as its special litigation counsel last August for failing to disclose those interests." The Journal adds, "The request for a special examiner, supported by the U.S. Trustee, Adelphia and its creditors' committee, was made in response to Boies Schiller's final request for fees in the case. … The firm is seeking almost $30 million for its work since June 2002, most of which has already been paid. … Adelphia and its creditors are hoping a probe will show that document management company Amici and copying company Echelon overcharged the estate, which was billed millions for their services. … Boies Schiller had objected to the appointment of an examiner on the grounds that Adelphia had previously bargained for a discount on document services, at which time it had determined fees were reasonable."

By 98-1 Margin, Senate Votes To Proceed With Asbestos Bill. The Washington Times (2/8, Ramstack) reports, "The Senate voted 98-1 yesterday to move forward with a bill to halt asbestos lawsuits and create a $140 billion trust fund for people sick from asbestos-related diseases." The bill now "will move to the floor for its first debate, expected to take place over the next two weeks. Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, voted against, while Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, did not vote." Despite its progress, "the bill faces stiff opposition."

The New York Times (2/8, Labaton) reports the vote "came after critics dropped their opposition when they realized that they did not have enough votes to block the debate." The asbestos measure "still faces formidable political obstacles even though it is a priority of Republican leaders in Congress and the White House." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Peterson) runs a similar story.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush Criticized At Funeral Service For Coretta Scott King. President Bush and three former presidents attended the funeral of Coretta Scott King yesterday. Much of the coverage this morning notes the political attacks on Bush and his policies from some of the speakers. For example, under the headline "Bush Gets An Earful At Coretta King's Funeral," the Los Angeles Times (2/8, Wallsten, Fausset) reports the event "turned into a rare, in-person rebuke of President Bush, with a succession of civil rights and political leaders assailing White House policies as evidence that the dream of social and racial equality pursued by King and her slain husband is far from reality." The Times adds, "The appearance by Bush, who decided over the weekend to rearrange his schedule and attend the service, came as his approval rating among blacks has slipped to the low single digits in some surveys -- a direct response, some strategists believe, to the government's failed response in the wake of Katrina."

Reuters (2/8, Jacobs, Zakaria) also reports "speakers seized" on Bush's presence "to attack his policies." Jimmy Carter, one of four presidents to speak, "took a jab at Bush's domestic eavesdropping program." He "drew spirited applause with comments on federal efforts to spy on the Kings decades ago. 'It was difficult for them personally with the civil liberties of both husband and wife violated, and they became the targets of secret government wiretapping and other surveillance,' Carter said." The Washington Times (2/8, Curl) reports, "Carter later said Hurricane Katrina was a clear sign that racism is still alive in America. … The crowd applauded lustily."

The AP (2/8, Pickler) says "both Bush and his father winced as they sat behind the pulpit and heard the Rev. Joseph Lowery, who co-founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference with Martin Luther King Jr., take several jabs at foreign and domestic policies. 'We know there were no weapons of mass destruction over there, but Coretta knew and we knew there are weapons of misdirection right down here,' Lowery said, complaining that were far too many in the US are living in poverty and without health care insurance. 'For war, billions more, but no more for the poor,' Lowery continued, a take-off of a lyric from the song 'A Time to Love' which drew a roaring standing ovation."

USA Today (2/8) titles one of its reports on the funeral "As Bush Listens, Speakers Aim Barbs At War, Spying," while a second story USA Today story (2/8, Copeland) says the event "felt like…a joyous, sometimes raucous, funny but rarely somber ceremony."

The Washington Post (2/8, A4, Fletcher) reports, "Bush all but ignored many black civil rights and political leaders during his first four years in office." Instead, "he focused on building inroads to African American leaders through the pastors of black evangelical churches and business leaders who were not identified with the traditional civil rights agenda." Bush "became the first president since Herbert Hoover to serve a full term without addressing the NAACP, which many acknowledge as the nation's leading civil rights organization. At the same time, Bush's relations with the Congressional Black Caucus were frosty, contributing to a growing gulf between the administration and black voters." But "in recent months, Bush has made an effort to forge relationships with leaders he once ignored."

The story was the lead on each of the networks. CBS ignored the political attacks on Bush altogether, while ABC and NBC gave a prominent mention to the Carter and Lowery remarks. The CBS Evening News (2/7, lead story, 4:25, Pitts) reported, "Four American Presidents, 14 US Senators and a host of preachers, poets and performers were among the nearly 10,000 mourners for Coretta Scott King. From prayers and scripture to the songs of the struggle." For "all this public adulation, Coretta Scott King guarded her privacy and her children with the same tenacity she put into her husband's legacy."

ABC World News Tonight (2/7, lead story, 4:00, Gibson) reported, "There are few people in this world who could bring presidents, senators, stars and thousands of Americans together in a single place. Coretta Scott King is one of them." It was "an extraordinary assemblage remembering the civil rights leader, the widow, the woman, the life of Coretta Scott King." At "one point, things got political." Lowery was then shown saying Mrs. King "deplored the terror inflicted by our smart bombs on missions way afar. We know, now, there were no weapons of mass destruction over there."

NBC Nightly News (2/7, lead story, 4:20, Savidge) reported Carter "said he could not have won office were it not for the changes the Kings and the civil rights movement brought," and "then said more needs to be done." Carter: "We only have to recall the color of the faces of those in Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi. Those who are most devastated by Katrina to know that they are not yet equal opportunities for all Americans." Lowery "shook the President's hand then scolded his foreign and domestic policies."

Bloomberg (2/8, Keil) reports Bush "honored Coretta Scott King as 'God's servant,' 'saying at the funeral for the widow of slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. that she was an example of strength and dignity who continued her husband's service in the cause of civil rights." CNN's The Situation Room (2/7, Blitzer) reported Bush said "he brought the 'sympathy of our nation with him.'" Bush: "By going forward with a strong and forgiving heart, Coretta Scott King not only secured her husband's legacy, she built her own."

The AP (2/8, Haines) reports, "Former President Clinton urged mourners to follow in her footsteps, honor her husband's sacrifice and help the couple's children fulfill their parents' legacy." Former President Bush said the "world is a kinder and gentler place because of Coretta Scott King." The New York Times (2/8, Dewan, Bumiller) says, "Of the four presidents, Mr. Clinton was the obvious favorite of the crowd. A huge cheer went up as he reached the open area near Mrs. King's coffin, and the crowd gave him a thunderous standing ovation when he approached the microphone with his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton."

The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Fears) notes "several high-profile -- and politically charged -- black figures, such at the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson and the Rev. Al Sharpton, were not accorded a place onstage." Still, adds the Times, "political tensions occasionally burst through the veneer of reconciliation." The Post goes on to mention the comments by Carter and Lowery.

Under the headline "Bushwhacked at King Funeral," Franck James wrote in the Chicago Tribune's website (2/7) reports, "For many people, a funeral probably seems an inappropriate time to criticize someone in attendance, especially if it happens to be the president of the United States." But "many Christian funerals are used by preachers to strike the conscience of those attending in order to create a come-to-Jesus moment where souls are won. Sometimes at such funerals, hard things are said. Coretta Scott King's funeral fit that bill." The Financial Times (2/8, Ward) also notes the "strong political undercurrent, with several speakers making veiled and in some cases open criticism of the Bush administration from a podium situated just feet from where the president sat."

Judge In Human Smuggling Trial Urges Deadlocked Jury To Continue Deliberating. The AP (2/8, Lozano) reports, "Jurors said they were deadlocked Tuesday on charges against three people accused in the nation's deadliest immigrant smuggling attempt, but the judge urged them to continue deliberating. The jury was expected to return Wednesday to begin a fourth day of deliberations." The AP continues, "The charges stem from the deaths of 19 immigrants in a locked, airtight trailer bound for Houston. Prosecutors say Victor Sanchez Rodriguez, 58; his wife, Emma Sapata Rodriguez, 59; and Rosa Sarrata Gonzalez, 51, were part of a ring that trucked more than 70 immigrants from South Texas to Houston in May 2003. … The immigrants began to succumb to heat and dehydration in the trailer during the trip and the driver, Tyrone Williams, abandoned the trailer at Victoria, about 100 miles from Houston. Seventeen died inside and two died later." The AP adds, "The three defendants were accused of hiding and transporting some of the immigrants before they were packed into the truck. Defense attorneys said their clients had no role in endangering the lives of the immigrants. … The defendants originally faced 58 counts of harboring and transporting illegal immigrants, but Gilmore dismissed most counts for lack of evidence."

FBI Reportedly Investigating Civil Rights Allegation Against Illinois Sheriff's Deputies. The Springfield State Journal-Register (2/7, Antonacci) reports, "The FBI reportedly is reviewing two methamphetamine arrests by the Sangamon County Sheriff's Office last summer to see if the arrestees' civil rights were violated. 'We've been notified there was an accusation made, and I can't talk about it,' Chief Deputy Sheriff Tony Sacco, who is a target of the accusation, said Monday. '(The FBI) called the sheriff about a week and a half ago and said they received a complaint, and I was the subject of an investigation into a civil rights violation.' Marshall Stone, supervisory special agent in the Springfield FBI office, said he could neither confirm nor deny the existence of any investigation of the sheriff's office." The Journal-Register notes, "According to the FBI Web site, the agency investigates all alleged violations of federal civil rights laws, the most common of which are complaints involving allegations of excessive use of force by law enforcement personnel. The Web site indicates 40 to 50 law enforcement personnel are convicted of the crime each year."

Georgia Bill Would Boost Pensions For Retired Black Atlanta Police Officers. A bill passed by the Georgia House would remedy an inequity in the pensions received by black police officers in Atlanta. ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 11, 2:30, Avila) reported former assistant chief Howard Baugh, a one-time neighbor of Martin Luther King, "saw plenty change in his police department. But one thing remained the same -- he was paid less than his white counterparts then. And even now, his pension is less, too." He was "the 12th black police officer to join the Atlanta force and the first to reach the rank of assistant chief. Despite more than 30 years of service, he and about 2,000 other Atlanta police officers, are victims of Jim Crow segregation laws that kept them out of a special police pension." Baugh: "The explanation was we're not taking blacks in at this particular time." Avila: "When he retired, until this day, Baugh received $710 a month less than white officers, that were allowed into that pension fund." Baugh

"says retirement equality would go a long way to erasing the painful memories and now, the Georgia House has passed a bill to do just that." Rep. Tyrone Brooks, Georgia Assoc. of Black Elected Officials: "It sends a message to the people of the nation and Georgia, that Georgia continues to move forward, to overcome the legacy of Jim Crow segregation."

Report Finds Many States Not In Election Law Compliance. The Boston Globe/AP (2/7, Abrams) reports, "With the midterm elections just nine months away, many states are lagging behind in meeting requirements under a 2002 election reform law that they modernize voting machines, create voter databases and establish ID systems, according to a report released Tuesday." The AP continues, "Controversies over the need for paper trails and the legality of ID requirements were among the reasons that states missed the Jan. 1 deadline for complying with the Help America Vote Act, said Electionline.org., a nonpartisan project that does analysis of election reform. … 'The lack of progress in nearly half of the states throws into doubt whether HAVA goals can be achieved in time for the November 2006 election,' the project's president, Doug Chapin, said in a statement." The AP adds, "HAVA was enacted in response to the disputed 2000 presidential election, and Chapin said that despite the glitches, the election system is undergoing significant change. Two years ago voters had never heard of voter-verified paper audit trails; now states are deciding whether to use them in recounts, and states that once debated the need for IDs are now debating whether IDs should be issued free of charge, he said."

Reuters (2/8) reports, "The report said nearly half of the states missed last month's federal deadline to implement changes required by the 2002 Help America Vote Act, which Congress passed to help restore confidence in the integrity of a process shaken by the drawn-out 2000 recount saga in Florida. The report, by the non-partisan Electionline.org project, said reforms have stalled across the country for a variety of reasons, including growing concerns about the reliability of electronic voting machines and about the legality of voter ID requirements."

Evangelical Group Seeks To Intervene In Air Force Suit. The Colorado Springs (CO) Gazette (2/8, Roeder) reports, "A Colorado Springs-based evangelical organization is expected to file court papers Wednesday asking to intervene in a lawsuit that charges the Air Force with religious intolerance." The Gazette continues, "The Air Force won't comment, but the National Association of Evangelicals says it has talked with government attorneys and is entering the case to defend the rights of evangelical chaplains. … 'We have been in collaboration with the Air Force attorneys working on this case,' said Kyle Fisk, executive administrator for the evangelical group. 'It is the policy of the Air Force to remain neutral when it comes to intervention, but we believe we are doing the Air Force a service.'" The Gazette adds, "Last fall, New Mexico resident Mikey Weinstein sued the Air Force, claiming non-Christian cadets at the Air Force Academy face discrimination from evangelical Christians. His suit, which was joined by four Air Force officers, asks for an outright ban on uninvited proselytizing and evangelism throughout the service. … On Tuesday, he said the intervention of the evangelical group, the second to ask to join on the Air Force's side, proves his point. … 'I am thunder-struck that a branch of government would collaborate with fundamentalist Christians to convert members of the armed forces to evangelical Christianity,' said Weinstein."

LA Mayor Backs Shielding Identity Of Officers In Shootings. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Helfand, Glover, Lait) reports, "Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa today expressed support for his police commissioner's controversial decision to withhold the names of officers involved in shootings, but vowed to review the matter." The Times continues, "Villaraigosa also said he was troubled by reports that the executive director of the commission urged the police union to threaten a lawsuit if the names were not withheld." The Times adds, "Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Police Commission sent mixed signals today about its new policy of withholding the names of officers involved in shootings, as it affirmed the policy adopted in secret last year with a formal, public vote. The panel's president, John Mack, defended the action, saying it was required by law." The Times notes, "The commission acted amid an outcry from critics who complained that the panel, whose mandate is to provide public oversight over the LAPD, was making it more difficult for the public to assess the actions of officers and was ending a policy that has governed the release of officers' identities for 25 years. … In Los Angeles, the Police Commission had released the names of officers involved in shootings since 1980, a practice embraced by the public after the controversial killing by LAPD officers of a South Los Angeles woman in 1979. Since then, the actions of LAPD officers involved in shootings have frequently been the object of intense public interest — although police officers have routinely objected to being identified. … The change in commission policy was made during a closed-door meeting Dec. 13. The five-member civilian panel, which functions much like a corporate board for the Police Department, sets standards and oversees operations in conjunction with Chief William J. Bratton."

Police Say Man In Massachusetts Gay Bar Attack Killed Himself. The New York Times/AP (2/8, Press) reports, "A teenager accused of two killings and a rampage at a gay bar fatally shot himself in the head in a gunfight with the police in Arkansas, the authorities said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The teenager, Jacob D. Robida, 18, turned the gun on himself on Saturday after fatally shooting a woman in his car, District Attorney Paul Walsh Jr. of Bristol said, citing an autopsy. The police had searched for Mr. Robida since Thursday, when, they said, he used a hatchet and handgun to wound three men at a gay bar in New Bedford, Mass. … Mr. Walsh said that the autopsy showed that Mr. Robida was killed by the gun used in the bar attack and that it also fired the bullet that killed the woman, Jennifer Rena Bailey, 33, whom Mr. Robida picked up in West Virginia after fleeing Massachusetts."

WPost Calls For Passage Of Virginia Gay Bias Measure. The Washington Post (2/8, A18) editorializes, "Virginia has come late to the idea that employees and job-seekers should not be discriminated against because they may be homosexual. Now it has a chance to embrace the obvious justice of that policy. It is crucial that the opportunity not be missed. Former governor Mark R. Warner, having ignored the subject for most of his term, issued an order in December, weeks before leaving office, prohibiting discrimination by state agencies in hiring and employment. Mr. Warner's successor, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, reaffirmed the policy on taking office last month. Now the General Assembly is considering legislation to codify that principled stance and extend it to local governments and school systems. It's as close to a no-brainer as legislation gets, but anti-gay legislators may still be able to kill it." The Post adds, "The legislation would simply do what nearly all of Virginia's largest corporate employers (Wal-Mart, Northrop Grumman, Food Lion) and universities (the University of Virginia, Virginia Tech, George Mason) have already done by adopting similar policies: that is, outlaw a particularly noxious form of bigotry whose day has quite definitely passed."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ To Probe Mittal-Arcelor Deal. The Wall Street Journal (2/8) reports, "The Justice Department is planning to investigate whether Mittal Steel Co.'s $24 billion hostile bid for chief rival Arcelor SA complies with antitrust law, a department official said. A tough U.S. investigation could delay the deal or force changes to eliminate overlapping product lines." The Journal continues, "The proposed merger of the world's largest steelmakers would lengthen Mittal's wide lead in producing steel for the U.S. auto industry and other big manufacturers. European antitrust officials have already said they would review the deal. Mittal is based in the Netherlands but is run from London. Arcelor is based in Luxembourg but is run from Paris. Mittal has an enormous market presence in the U.S., giving the Justice Department authority to review the deal if it proceeds. 'It's obviously something we'd look at,' the Justice official said." The Journal adds, "U.S. antitrust enforcers investigated Mittal's last acquisition but cleared it in December 2004 after a product-by-product review. The latest deal would give Mittal 11% of world crude-steel production, with much higher shares in some markets, analysts have said."

EU Official Seeks Debate On Mittal's Arcelor Bid. The AP (2/8, White) reports, "The European Parliament should discuss Mittal Steel Co.'s unsolicited 18.6 billion euros ($22.5 billion) bid for Luxembourg-based steelmaker Arcelor SA, the head of the Parliament said Tuesday after meeting with Mittal's CEO." The AP continues, "European Parliament President Josep Borrell said the Parliament should be a forum for major issues that affect the people and the economy of the European Union, even though it has no formal role in approving the offer. … 'I intend, with the support of all the interested parties, to promote this debate at the heart of our institution in the coming weeks,' he said. 'I am mindful of this offer and sensitive to the social concerns of employees of a large European industrial group, Arcelor, which has close to 80,000 people in the EU.'" The AP adds, "Borrell met with Lakshmi Mittal, chairman and chief executive of the world's largest steelmaker, at Mittal's request. Mittal has been trying to win support for his offer, which has been criticized by three European governments. … Borrell said in a statement that Mittal wanted to explain the takeover bid and its economic and social consequences. Borrell is also due to meet with the European Metalworkers' Federation this week and said he would also like to hear from Arcelor."

Settlement Of DOJ Suit Against West Virginia Hospital Pending. The Nashville Tennessean (2/8, Pack) reports, "The Justice Department has filed suit to force a West Virginia hospital to end a four-year-old agreement with HCA Inc. that the government says blocked HCA from developing a competing cardiac surgery program. … A settlement in the case is pending. HCA isn't named as a defendant." The Tennessean continues, "In a statement late Monday, Justice said its antitrust division has filed suit to force Charleston Area Medical Center Inc. to break its contract with the Nashville-based hospital chain, claiming the deal restricts competition and hurts patients. … 'Competition among hospitals results in lower prices, greater quality of care, and increased innovation for health care consumers,' Thomas Barnett, acting assistant attorney general in charge of Justice's antitrust division, said in a statement." The Tennessean adds, "Charleston Area Medical Center oversees the country's sixth largest cardiac surgery program. HCA owns and operates Raleigh General Hospital in Beckley, about 60 miles south of Charleston in Raleigh County. … According to the Justice Department, the Charleston hospital persuaded HCA to sign a deal in 2002 in which the hospital company agreed not to develop a heart surgery program in Beckley. … In return, Charleston Area Medical Center said it would support two unrelated HCA programs in other parts of the state, the government said. Justice claims the deal ensured that no hospital in the Beckley area would offer cardiac surgery services."

California Attorney Takes Aim At Realtors' Listing Services. The Contra Costa Times (2/8, Temple) reports, "David Barry has been a thorn in the side of Realtor associations for the last 25 years, but this year he aiming for the heart. … The San Francisco antitrust attorney, who has pursued more than a dozen lawsuits against Realtor groups, recently filed a ballot initiative with the California Attorney General calling for a statewide multiple listing service that would be open to the public." The Times adds, "An MLS is an index of homes for sale operated by regional Realtor groups, and ordinarily only updated by paying members. Barry asserts MLSs hand the associations monopoly control over the housing market, compelling Realtors to join, pay fees that are passed onto consumers, not compete with other members and charge fixed commission rates. … The U.S. Government Accountability Office supported this final point in a report late last year, which found that as a practice Realtors steer customers toward properties advertising standard fees. Similarly, the U.S. Department of Justice sued the National Association of Realtors last year over its policy of limiting Internet sites' access to MLSs, saying the restriction undercuts the ability of online and discount brokers to gain a foothold in the market. … Realtor groups, however, insist that real estate is highly competitive and commission rates already fluctuate."

Battle Over Computer Browsers Heating Up. CNET News (2/8, Krazit) reports, "Fighting for icon space on the desktop is so 2001. The new frontier on a virgin PC is the browser, and Internet companies like Google are jostling for space on the browsers of new PCs." CNET continues, "Dell and Google are evaluating a partnership in which the Google Toolbar, Google Desktop Search and a Google-designed Dell home page are included on new Dell PCs, a Dell representative confirmed. … The Wall Street Journal reported Tuesday that the companies are mulling a three-year partnership that could bring as much as $1 billion in revenue to the PC maker for letting Google install its software on Dell machines. The Dell representative declined to comment on the future of the relationship between the two companies. A Google representative confirmed the two companies were testing the search giant's products on new Dell PCs, but declined to comment further." CNET adds, "The browser, not the desktop, has become the most sought-after piece of real estate on a new PC, said Roger Kay, president of Endpoint Technologies Associates. Five years ago, PC companies were giddy over the prospect of renting space on their boxes' desktops to the highest bidder, after Microsoft's antitrust settlement with the U.S. Justice Department forced it to open up the Windows desktop to increased competition. … Companies such as America Online and CompuServe rushed to get prominent placement for their dial-up services on new PCs, but the move didn't pay off as they had hoped. PC users simply ignored icons they didn't wish to use, or used cleanup programs to remove all icons from their desktops or start menus, Kay said. However, just about every PC user who's connected to the Internet uses the browser at least once a day, and browser toolbars that contain useful utilities such as Google's search engine will grab a user's attention, he said."

Toshiba Expects Westinghouse Acquisition To Triple Sales By 2015. Bloomberg News (2/8, Alpeyev) reports, "Toshiba Corp., Japan's largest maker of nuclear power-plant equipment, said its Westinghouse Electric Co. acquisition will help triple sales of the business to as much as [$5.9 billion] by 2015." Toshiba's "stock has dropped 4.3 percent this week on concern President Atsutoshi Nishida would exhaust funds needed to invest in the company's bigger chip and liquid-crystal display businesses. Standard & Poor's and Moody's Investors Service said they may lower Toshiba's credit rating on concern the $5.4 billion acquisition will strain the company's finances. 'No decision has been made on the financing for the acquisition,' Nishida said today at a news conference in Tokyo. He said the company should be able to pay cash for Westinghouse, although he didn't rule out financing through equity markets." By buying "Westinghouse, Toshiba gets access to the pressurized water reactor technology preferred by China, which may spend as much as $54 billion in the next 15 years building nuclear plants."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Woods) reports, "The purchase would also allow Toshiba to sell pressurized-water reactors, a type of technology in which Westinghouse specializes and one that is more common globally than the boiling-water reactors Toshiba offers." The Journal adds, "Toshiba has said it expects to cover its investment in Westinghouse with its own cash, generating 300 billion yen in free cash flow over the next three years." But "some analysts and credit-rating agencies question Toshiba's strategy. Moody's Investors Service yesterday placed the company under review for a possible downgrade of its long-term debt rating. Yoshiharu Izumi, a senior industrial-electronics analyst at J.P. Morgan in Tokyo, said Toshiba may have less cash in the coming years as it may be forced to invest heavily to remain competitive in one of its key areas, the semiconductor business."

Toshiba Seeking Minority Stake Partners. Dow Jones Newswire (2/8, Ishibashi) reports, "Toshiba Corp. President and Chief Executive Atsutoshi Nishida said Wednesday that five to six firms have shown interest in taking stakes in Westinghouse Electric Co. Nishida also said at a press conference his company is not in talks with General Electric Co. regarding the US giant buying a stake in Westinghouse." Dow Jones adds, "Toshiba has said it would buy 100% of Westinghouse and retain a 51% stake in the company, selling the remaining minority stake to potential partners, including US and Japanese firms."

Boston Scientific Head Optimistic About Guidant Deal. The AP (2/8, Jewell) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. said Tuesday it's increasingly optimistic that it can quickly complete a $27 billion acquisition of troubled medical device maker Guidant Corp. while also fixing its own quality-control problems." The AP continues, "After reporting a higher fourth-quarter profit despite declining sales, Boston Scientific executives told analysts that the Guidant deal looks more appealing that it first did - in part because of a tax-law change Boston Scientific said Tuesday will cut its debt from the Guidant purchase by $900 million. … 'The more we see, the better we like it, and the more opportunity we think we have,' President and Chief Executive Jim Tobin said in a conference call." The AP adds, "Boston Scientific expects shareholder and antitrust approvals by the end of next month - a timeline some analysts have suggested is overly optimistic, especially since Boston Scientific received a quality-control warning from federal regulators on Jan. 25. The letter came hours after Guidant's management accepted Boston Scientific's buyout bid, ending a nearly two-month bidding war for Guidant with Johnson & Johnson. … Boston Scientific hopes to make the quality-control fixes the Food and Drug Administration is seeking by June. The company says that timeline likely wouldn't delay the agency's review of a new heart stent whose approval could be blocked if it isn't satisfied with Boston Scientific's progress."

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Berkshire Hathaway's PacifiCorp Buy. Dow Jones (2/8) reports, "Berkshire Hathaway Inc. unit MidAmerican Energy Holdings Co. has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy PacifiCorp." Dow Jones continues, "The agency said Tuesday that it granted early termination Monday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … MidAmerican Energy announced its intention to buy PacifiCorp, a unit of ScottishPower PLC, in May 2005, in a deal valued at around $9.4 billion."

EU Regulators Probing Online Music Royalties. The AP (2/8) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators said Tuesday they were investigating the European agencies that collect royalties for musicians from Internet sites -- in parallel with other EU moves to open up the European market for online music." The AP continues, "The European Commission said it was concerned that the groups' contracts with composers -- organized strictly along national lines -- might violate rules on restrictive business practices and give national copyright agencies a de facto monopoly." The AP adds, "The International Confederation of Societies of Authors and Composers -- known as CISAC -- and its member agencies in EU countries collect royalty payments from broadcasters, night clubs or Internet sites. … The EU said it wanted to look at the membership rules that give authors only one choice of collecting society to pick up payments -- the one based in their own country. … Commercial users -- such as satellite or cable broadcasters and Internet sites -- who want to buy the rights have to get a license from each national society that only covers that country. … This is a complex and expensive process for online music sites aiming to sell songs across the European Union. Apple's iTunes, for example, has separate British, French and German sites with a different portfolio of music tracks. … The commission said that Europe-wide agreements guaranteed collecting societies a monopoly and prevents the emergence of new copyright collection agencies. CISAC and its members have two months to respond to the charges and may face fines if found guilty of breaking EU competition rules."

EnergySolutions To Acquire Duratek. The Washington Post (2/8, D4, ElBoghdady) reports, "Duratek Inc., a Columbia-based radioactive-waste disposal company, has agreed to sell itself to a privately held and relatively new firm in Utah in an all-cash deal valued at $326 million. If the deal closes as expected in the second quarter, EnergySolutions LLC will assume Duratek's debt and purchase its outstanding stock for $22 a share, a 26 percent premium over Monday's closing price." The Post adds, "EnergySolutions is the new name for Envirocare, a radioactive-waste disposal firm that was purchased last year by a group of private equity investors including Steve Creamer, a Utah businessman. Under its new management team, Envirocare acquired Scientech D&D last year and nuclear-cleanup company BNG America of Arlington last week. With BNG in its fold, Envirocare rebranded itself and adopted its new name, with Creamer as chief executive."

The Deseret Morning News (2/8, Bauman) reports, "Duratek bills itself as a provider of safe, secure disposal services for radioactive material. Its Web site notes that it has permits for disposal at Envirocare in Utah as well as other sites. The company provides services for commercial and government customers. EnergySolutions is to buy all outstanding shares of Duratek for $22 a share, a premium of 25.7 percent over the stock's price on Monday, according to Duratek. The deal requires the approval of Duratek's stockholders, but the boards of directors of each company have approved it." This "project has been in the works for three years, according to Steve Creamer, the Utahn who is president and CEO of EnergySolutions." Creamer said, "'We acquired some good, basic technology' involving reprocessing as carried out in the United Kingdom today," adding that as "America moves forward with reprocessing, he said he hopes EnergySolutions will be part of the effort. 'We believe that rather than Yucca Mountain or rather than PFS, we should be doing what the rest of the world has been doing,' Creamer said. That is, reprocessing fuel rods."

The Washington Business Journalll (2/8, Clabaugh) reports, "Environmental cleanup company Duratek has agreed to be acquired in a deal worth $396 million, including the assumption of debt. Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions will pay $22 a share for Columbia-based Duratek, a 26 percent premium over the closing price of Duratek stock Tuesday. The acquisition is subject to shareholder and regulatory approval. Duratek says its board will unanimously recommend approval of the acquisition to shareholders at a special meeting in the second quarter. If approved, the company expects the deal to close shortly thereafter. Duratek provides hazardous-waste removal services for nuclear power plants."

Platts (2/8, Tiernan) reports, "Nuclear material handling firm Duratek said Tuesday that it has signed a merger agreement with EnergySolutions, in which EnergySolutions will acquire Duratek for $396-mil ($22/share) in cash." Platts adds, "Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions provides nuclear waste management services and solutions to the nuclear energy industry. It is owned by a private investor group led by Lindsay Goldberg & Bessemer, Peterson Partners and Creamer Investments. Duratek said changing domestic and international markets for its services present opportunities for growth and challenges for the company and its investors."

The Baltimore Sun's (2/8, Cohn) "Business Buzz" page reports, "The acquirer, EnergySolutions, was created earlier this month from three entities involved in different aspects of the nuclear energy waste handling and disposal and technical services business. Duratek, the company said, would help it continue to grow."

UK Approves Boots-Alliance UniChem Merger. The AP (2/7) reports, "British antitrust regulators gave provisional approval Tuesday to the 7 billion pound ($12.2 billion) merger of drugstore chains Boots Group PLC and Alliance UniChem PLC." The AP continues, "The Office of Fair Trading said it would not refer the merger plan to the Competition Commission after the companies agreed to dispose of stores in 100 communities where the two businesses are dominant. … It had been feared that the loss of rivalry between Boots and UniChem pharmacies in certain areas would reduce choice for customers and lessen competition. … But the Office of Fair Trading said it was "satisfied" that undertakings offered by Boots and UniChem would address its concerns." The AP adds, "The merger, which has been driven by the need to tackle the growing threat of supermarket competition, will create a company -- Alliance Boots -- with annual sales of 13 billion pounds ($23 billion), 2,600 stores in Britain and 300 stores in continental Europe. … Boots, which began trading in 1849, has seen sales at its 1,400 pharmacies in Britain fall in recent years as supermarkets have aggressively targeted the toiletries and over-the-counter medicines markets."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge Denies Bail For Northwest Ecoterror Arson Suspect. The Eugene Register-Guard (2/7, Nolan) reports, "Family and friends scraped together $550,000 to post bail for the Springfield man charged with torching 35 sport utility vehicles at the Romania Truck Center in Eugene in 2001. But U.S. Magistrate Thomas Coffin denied Kevin M. Tubbs' request to be released on bail during a detention hearing Monday, despite letters from family and supporters who said Tubbs was neither violent nor dangerous. 'The risk of damage to the human beings that respond to a fire is significant and can't be ignored,' Coffin said." Tubbs "is charged with nine politically motivated arsons between 1996 and 2001, which caused a total of $11 million in damage. He is implicated but not charged in five others, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall said. The fires were later attributed to the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front." The AP (2/7) also reports on the ruling, drawing heavily on the Register-Guard story.

ALF Accuses UK Executives Of Being Rapists In Letter To Men's Neighbors. The (UK) Daily Independent (2/8, English) reports, "GlaxoSmithKline reacted with horror last night after two executives…became targets of a hate campaign by animal rights extremists. Letters sent to neighbours of the two have maliciously accused them of being rapists. The house of one was daubed with the words 'paedo scum'. The targets of the campaign are understood to be Sir Ian Prosser, a non-executive director, and Simon Bicknell, the company secretary. Franz Humer, of the drug maker Roche, is also understood to have been targeted. … The Animal Liberation Front has claimed responsibility for the campaign, which has seen scores of letters supposedly from a police officer sent to neighbours. Police are investigating what they say is a 'malicious campaign of intimidation'."

Oxford Enacts Stringent Security Measures In Response To ALF Threats. The Times of London (2/8, Woolcock) reports, "An unprecedented security crackdown is being mounted at Oxford University in the face of threats from animal rights extremists. Police have warned the university to tighten up its vetting checks on new staff, and college deans, who believe that attacks are inevitable, have ordered students to sign in night-time guests with gate porters." The Times notes that a new laboratory, currently under construction, "has become the main battleground in the fight between activists and those involved in animal research -- the Animal Liberation Front…recently announced that anyone associated with Oxford University, including students, was a legitimate target for attack. Security experts have reportedly been recruited to protect key workers at the site of the new laboratory."

86 Evangelical Leaders Back Global Warming Initiative. The New York Times (2/8, Goodstein) reports that 86 evangelical Christian leaders 'have decided to back a major initiative to fight global warming, saying 'millions of people could die in this century because of climate change, most of them our poorest global neighbors.' Among signers of the statement, which will be released in Washington on Wednesday, are the presidents of 39 evangelical colleges, leaders of aid groups and churches, like the Salvation Army, and pastors of megachurches, including Rick Warren, author of the best seller 'The Purpose-Driven Life.'" The statement "calls for federal legislation that would require reductions in carbon dioxide emissions through 'cost-effective, market-based mechanisms' -- a phrase lifted from a Senate resolution last year and one that could appeal to evangelicals, who tend to be pro-business. The statement, to be announced in Washington, is only the first stage of an 'Evangelical Climate Initiative' including television and radio spots in states with influential legislators, informational campaigns in churches, and educational events at Christian colleges."

MSHA To Issue Emergency Mine Safety Rules. USA Today (2/8, Frank) reports, "The Mine Safety and Health Administration said Tuesday it will require mine operators to place more oxygen supplies underground to give trapped workers a better chance of surviving a disaster. The emergency order, which will mandate several safety measures, comes after 18 mining deaths in West Virginia and Kentucky this year. … The new measures would require that miners receive more training in using breathing devices. The new regulations would also set a 15-minute deadline for mine operators to notify the agency of an accident. Current regulations require operators to tell MSHA of accidents 'immediately' but do not specify a time period."

The AP (2/8) reports, "The rules also require companies to make sure miners have 'lifelines' along primary and alternate escape routes. Those are guides, like ropes with reflective tape, that help steer miners toward the surface after an explosion that leaves a mine dark. David G. Dye, acting assistant secretary of labor for mine safety and health, said the emergency rules, a step the agency rarely takes, would better protect miners and help them safely evacuate in emergencies."

Alito, Roberts Face Challenge In Three Environmental Cases. The Legal Times (2/8, Mauro) reports, "The first time he takes the bench later this month, new Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito Jr. will face a baptism -- not by fire but by water." The Times continues, "Three cases challenging the scope of the Clean Water Act will be argued Feb. 21, testing themes of federalism and commerce clause power that were much at issue during Alito's confirmation hearings. The cases have environmentalists worried about how Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. will ultimately come down. … 'These are probably the most important environmental cases in a decade and will be an enormous test of the two new justices,' says Douglas Kendall of the Community Rights Counsel, which filed a brief in two of the cases." The Times adds, "Alito has plenty of reading to do; more than 50 briefs on the cases have flowed into the Court. After being sworn in officially at the Court, on Jan. 31 at a private ceremony, Alito settled into the chambers his predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, vacated last month in anticipation of retirement. His staff is still in flux, but he has already picked up two O'Connor law clerks, Benjamin Horwich and Alexander Volokh. Late Friday, Alito announced he would adopt the Court's 1993 policy on recusals in cases involving close relatives who are lawyers -- in Alito's case, sister Rosemary, a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham in Newark, N.J. … The environmental cases, more than any other coming soon, will spotlight issues that got Democrats upset during Alito's contentious hearings last month. In two of the cases, Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. United States Army Corps of Engineers, the issue is whether, under the commerce clause, the Clean Water Act protects certain wetlands that are adjacent to tributaries of navigable waters covered by the law. In the third case, S.D. Warren Co. v. Maine Board of Environmental Protection, the justices will decide whether the mere fact that a river flows through a dam produces a "discharge" that triggers federal jurisdiction under the act. … In all three cases, the Bush administration is arguing for a broad view that would preserve a 'landmark' law that is 'a permissible exercise of Congress' power,' in the words of Solicitor General Paul Clement, who will argue the cases himself."

Compromise May Be Near In Connecticut Eminent Domain Case. The New York Times (2/8, Yardley) reports, A handful of property owners in New London, Conn., who have resisted having their property taken by eminent domain even after the United States Supreme Court ruled last year that the taking was legal, could be allowed to stay on their land -- or at least very close to it -- under a plan approved by the City Council. … The proposal, approved by a 7-0 vote of the New London City Council on Monday, instructs the city's director of law, Thomas J. Londregan, to determine whether the site development plan could be revised so the half-dozen remaining property owners, scattered on two blocks, could be clustered on a single block, known throughout years of debate and court proceedings as 'Parcel 4A.' The idea would allow property owners to stay in the area, if not in precisely the same place. It would also free the surrounding area to make way for a planned 90-acre hotel, office and residential development. The city took the property in 2000 to make way for construction of the project, but it was paralyzed while property owners sued to keep their property and eventually took the case to the Supreme Court."

Friedman Criticizes Cheney For Opposing Conservation Efforts, Gas Taxes. In his New York Times column (2/8), Thomas Friedman says, "I've always thought Dick Cheney took national security seriously. I don't anymore. It seems that Mr. Cheney is so convinced that we have no choice but to be dependent on crude oil, so convinced that conservation is just some silly liberal hobby, that he will never seriously summon the country to kick its oil habit, never summon it to do anything great. Indeed, he seems determined to be a drag on any serious effort to make America energy-independent. He presents all this as a tough-guy 'realist' view of the world. But it's actually an ignorant and naïve view." The "global oil market is anything but free. It's controlled by the world's largest cartel — OPEC — which sets output, and thereby prices, according to the needs of some of the worst regimes in the world. By doing nothing, we are letting their needs determine the price and their treasuries reap all the profits." Friedman adds, "Also, why does Mr. Cheney have no problem influencing the market by lowering taxes to get consumers to spend, but he rejects raising gasoline taxes to get consumers to save energy — a fundamental national interest."

Hybrid Vehicles Said Not To Be Solution For Reducing Oil Consumption. In his New York Times column (2/8), David Leonhardt says President Bush "has taken the hybrid craze to a whole new level. To cure our addiction to oil, he said last week, we must invest in hybrid cars, hydrogen cars, even cars that run on wood chips and grass. Energy technology is having its big moment. Too bad the benefits of our new cult car have been so exaggerated." Hybrids have the "most overblown mileage ratings in the auto industry. In the government's road tests, which are conducted in a world without much traffic or any air-conditioning, the Prius gets 55 miles to the gallon. Consumer Reports says the car really goes 44 miles on a gallon of gas." And the "more time you spend looking at the economics of the hybrids, the less comfortable you get." But government policy "seems almost intended to undercut the benefits of efficient cars. In 1978, Congress set a minimum corporate average fuel economy, known as CAFE, for all carmakers." Each hybrid "becomes a free pass for its manufacturer to sell a few extra gas guzzlers."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four More Church Fires Reported In Alabama. The AP (2/8, Reeves) reports, "In a grimly familiar scene, four rural Alabama churches were found damaged or destroyed by fires Tuesday, less than a week after a string of five church fires that were ruled arson." The AP continues, "At three of the latest burned churches, the fires appeared to erupt in the sanctuary near the altar, according to church members and authorities, one of whom said two of the fires were found to be arson. … FBI acting assistant director Chip Burrus said investigators are working on the assumption that all nine of the Alabama church fires are linked. … 'Clearly there's a suspected link,' Burrus said in an interview with The Associated Press in Washington, D.C. 'I'm not prepared to talk about the evidence yet ... but common sense tells you there is a clear indication these fires are going to be linked.'" The AP notes, "Authorities have no suspects or motive, Burrus said." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, , 958K) adds that the ATF "plans to add 50 agents to the 50 it has at its command post in Alabama. The FBI, which has more than 10 agents in Alabama working on the arsons, is investigating the blazes as civil rights violations." Burrus "told Associated Press that his investigators were working on the assumption that the nine fires were linked."

The New York Times (2/8, Robertson) reports, "The four churches are all within an hour's drive of one another in a rural area of western Alabama, a few miles from the Mississippi border. Like the churches that were burned early Friday in Bibb County, in the central part of the state, they were Baptist. … But while four out of the five churches that burned in Bibb County had mainly white congregations, all the churches that burned yesterday had black congregations. … 'I think there's an obvious evidence link to the activities in Bibb County,' said Jim Cavanaugh, the special agent in charge of the investigation for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Mr. Cavanaugh said that whoever was setting the fires was probably familiar with the small, rural roads. … 'I do think they are pretty brazen,' he said. 'They feel like they've got free rein of these county roads.'"

White Churches Said To Be Most Frequent Targets. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Jonsson) reports, "Three torched churches were discovered in Alabama Tuesday - the latest in a string of suspected arsons that damaged five churches in Bibb County. … Investigators have not discovered any apparent motives. Four of the five churches in Bibb County - three of which burned to the ground - were white Baptist congregations. The other was black." The Monitor continues, "Nationally, such patterns are not unusual. Most arson targets are white congregations, whereas mosques and synagogues get hit in much smaller numbers. … In a country with more than 350,000 churches, motives are as varied as the denominations they target, experts say. According to the Insurance Information Institute, the top reasons for torching a church include the coverup of a burglary, vandalism, and revenge. Racism, insurance fraud, and thrill-seeking are less common. … In fact, church burnings are common. The nation sees 15 to 20 church arsons a week, scattered from Florida to California." The Monitor adds, "Nearly 1,000 churches burned between 1996 and 2000 nationwide, according to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives (ATF). Authorities nabbed about 100 suspects, a pace that has only decreased slightly. … Since the summer of 1996, when a spate of racially motivated Alabama church fires drew national attention, investigators are not much closer to knowing what fuels the church arsonist. Confessions range from the hateful to the mundane: In Suffolk County, Va., an 18-year-old pleaded guilty to torching St. Mary's Catholic Church in October 2005, after stealing a few hot dogs and some sacramental wine in the course of an inebriated evening."

Walters To Announce National Anti-Drug Strategy. USA Today (2/8, Leinwand) reports, "The White House Wednesday will announce a national anti-drug strategy that includes prodding more states to set up databases that can track people who get multiple prescriptions of frequently abused prescription drugs such as OxyContin and Vicodin. The strategy, to be announced in Denver today by White House drug czar John Walters, does not include any new programs, a reflection of how the tight federal budget is limiting anti-drug initiatives. Twenty-eight states have passed laws to set up prescription-drug registries, which are funded with a mix of federal and state money. President Bush's proposed budget for fiscal 2007 includes $9.9 million to help establish registries in more states, up from $7.4 million this year."

Appellate Court To Decide Florida Drug Trafficking, Pain Management Case. In the St .Petersburg (FL) Times (2/7), Colleen Jenkins writes, "For a man sentenced to 25 years in prison on drug trafficking charges, Richard Paey had a lot of powerful people on his side. Prosecutors, a judge and some jurors didn't think the chronic pain patient from Hudson should go to prison at all. So why, an associate appellate judge asked Tuesday, didn't authorities seek help rather than punishment for the wheelchair-bound man? We did, the state said. And Paey turned it down. Now three 2nd District Court of Appeal judges are left to decide whether a case that has drawn the interest of chronic pain advocates worldwide and was featured on 60 Minutes last month should ever have gotten this far. … At issue is a one-size-fits-all Florida law that labels anyone with more than an ounce of a controlled substance a drug trafficker, even if the person never deals. The Pasco County Sheriff's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration nabbed Paey after watching him buy more than 1,200 painkillers from different pharmacies between January and March 1997. Undated prescriptions from his New Jersey doctor and a copy machine gave Paey the ability to fake numerous prescriptions, which he used to obtain 800 pills of a painkiller made with oxycodone." Jenkins continues, "Paey…was frank about his use of pain medications. He said he developed a physical dependence on painkillers after a bad car wreck, failed back surgeries and a multiple sclerois diagnosis. As his tolerance of the medications grew, so did his need for larger amounts to combat his pain."

The AP (2/7) reports, "On Tuesday, as Paey's attorney tried to persuade the 2nd District Court of Appeal to throw out his 2004 drug trafficking convictions and mandatory 25-year sentence, advocates for chronic pain sufferers said the case illustrates flaws in the law and how people who are dependent on strong pain medication can get tangled up in the government's overzealous war on drugs. … His attorney, John P. Flannery, told the three-judge appellate panel that the 25-year mandatory sentence was cruel and unusual punishment. Further, Flannery said, the doctor lied on the witness stand and the prosecutor knew it. Flannery told the judges that Paey is now getting pain relief in prison, via a morphine drip. … The appeals court did not indicate when it would rule." The AP story also was published by the following

Track Star Marion Jones, Conte Settle Steroid Use Lawsuit. The AP (2/8) reports, "The convicted ringleader in the BALCO doping scandal settled a defamation lawsuit brought by track star Marion Jones over allegations that she used banned performance-enhancing drugs. Jones settled her $25 million suit in U.S. District Court [in San Francisco] Monday against Victor Conte, who's serving a four-month prison term for his role in the steroid scandal. Terms of the deal were not disclosed. … Jones said Conte, the founder the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative firm, had a vendetta against her and accused him of lying to try to destroy her career and reputation. Conte maintained his statements about Jones were accurate, and told The Associated Press when the case was filed that 'I look forward with all confidence to the court proceedings as I stand by everything I said.'"

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/7) reports, "The Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative owner alleged Jones was using the substances when she won five medals -- three of them gold -- at the 2000 Summer Olympics in Sydney."

Reuters (2/7) reports, "The former Olympic sprint champion sued Victor Conte for $25 million in 2004 after he claimed he supplied her with banned performance-enhancing drugs. She denied the charge and has never failed a doping test."

Suspected Drug Cartel Gunmen Storm Mexican Newspaper Office. Reuters (2/8) reports, "Gunmen thought to be working for a drug cartel shot and seriously wounded a reporter during a raid on a Mexican newspaper near the violent U.S.-Mexico border, reporters at the paper said on Tuesday. At least two hooded men burst into El Manana newspaper in Nuevo Laredo…late on Monday, tossing a grenade in the lobby and raking the newsroom with automatic weapons fire, they said. Night-shift reporter Jaime Orozco was shot four times as he tried to flee. He was hospitalized and listed in serious condition…editor Jose Garcia said. Some reporters were injured by flying glass and debris during the attack. … News reporting along the U.S.-Mexico border has long been dangerous, especially for columnists, editors and investigative reporters bold enough to name drug cartel operators and corrupt government officials."

Bolivia's Morales Wants US To Reconsider Anti-Drug Aid Cutback. The AP (2/8) reports, "President Evo Morales asked the United States on Tuesday to reconsider a proposed cut in anti-drug aid to Bolivia, and called on the world to strengthen drug-fighting alliances. Morales' appeal came a day after President Bush asked Congress to reduce anti-narcotics funding to Bolivia to $67 million $80 million. … Morales, who once promised to be "Washington's nightmare,' led the often-violent struggle against U.S.-backed coca eradication efforts over the past decade, and has promised to retool Bolivian coca policy. … Bush also proposed cuts in anti-narcotics aid to most countries that make up the Andean Counterdrug Initiative, including Brazil, Ecuador, Panama, Peru and Venezuela. Colombia is the only nation for which Bush has proposed a funding boost. U.S. funding for Bolivian anti-drug efforts has been declining since 2001, when it stood at $117 million. But the president's comments appeared to indicate he believed the budget proposal was a reprisal against him and his opposition to eradication. However, U.S. Ambassador David Greenlee said the cut was due solely to revised budget priorities in Washington."

Accused Drug Smuggler Surrenders To Colombian Government. According to Reuters (2/8), "The 'granddaddy' of Colombia's right-wing militias, who picked up a shotgun to protect his farm from Marxist rebels 29 years ago and now stands accused of drug smuggling, turned himself in to the government on Tuesday. The demobilization of Ramon Isaza and his 990-member force brings to about 22,290 the number of paramilitary fighters that have surrendered their arms in a government peace accord. Paramilitaries guilty of crimes such as massacres, torture and kidnapping face jail terms limited to eight years in exchange for laying down their weapons -- a deal criticized by human rights groups. Benefits under the law will be withheld from those who try to hide their crimes from government investigators, leaving them to face full jail terms."

California Law Would Have Barred Postal Worker From Purchasing Gun. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Blood) reports, "The postal worker who went on a deadly shooting rampage last week at a mail-sorting center legally bought the weapon in New Mexico even though she had a history of psychiatric problems that would have barred her from purchasing the gun in California, officials said." Jennifer San Marco "was committed briefly for psychiatric reasons in 2001. Because of that, under California law, she was automatically barred for five years from buying a gun, officials said. But New Mexico, where she moved in late 2003 or early 2004, relies on federal gun law and the federal instant background check for would-be buyers. And San Marco cleared the background check there." The AP adds that "the FBI declined to say if San Marco was in the National Instant Criminal Background Check System, citing privacy reasons."

IMMIGRATION:

US Continues To Probe Possibility Mexican Soldiers Involved In Border Incident. The Arizona Republic (2/7, Madden) reports, "The uniformed, heavily armed drug smugglers involved in a standoff last month with law enforcement agents along the U.S.-Mexico border could have been Mexican soldiers, even though the Mexican government blames drug cartels, Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar told a House panel Tuesday." Aguilar said that "the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement are looking into the case, and agents haven't ruled out involvement by Mexican military units," noting, however, "I do not want to leave the impression that our borders are under siege by government-of-Mexico entities." The Austin American-Statesman (2/7, Copp) adds that "the incident has increased border tensions, and in a packed hearing Tuesday chaired by U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul…American officials said the escalating violence is a national security problem. 'Whether these were Mexican military or cartels dressed up as military, neither scenario is good for this country,' said McCaul." The American-Statesman notes, "The State Department is working with the Mexican government to resolve the incident, and the FBI and Immigrations and Customs Enforcement are still investigating."

The Dallas Morning News (2/8, Mittelstadt) reports, "Texas border sheriffs pleaded Tuesday for more federal help to confront Mexican drug trafficking cartels that are arming themselves with more powerful weaponry and deploying tactics that pose an ever-greater danger to U.S. law enforcement." At the House hearing, "the sheriffs of El Paso and Hudspeth counties detailed deteriorating conditions in a region where rival cartels are locked in deadly competition." The Morning News notes, "An investigation by the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement is continuing" into the recent incident, but "Aguilar said the vast majority of the 144 incursions documented over the last five years were accidental. But the incidents are significantly concerning, he said, because each encounter has the potential to escalate into violence." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Timiraos, 958K) adds that Aguilar "told the lawmakers that the United States did not have proof that the individuals in military uniforms were Mexican soldiers, but added that nothing had been ruled out."

On Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/7), McCaul said, "We have had over 200 incursions by the Mexican military over the last decade. … Violence on the border is really getting to the point where we are in a crisis. … Whether you think they are military, whether you think they were cartels buying the military or cartels dressed up like military, they had 50-caliber weapons and Humvees. These pose a serious threat to law enforcement on the United States side. They are doing everything from throwing rocks on fire to taking shots at them. ... This is really getting out of control, and we need to do something about it."

Half Of "Granny Brigade" Attends Minuteman Rally In Washington. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Morello, Londoño, Klein, 744K) reports on Carmen Mercer's trip through the Washington D.C. area as she travels to a "Capitol Hill rally by the Minuteman Project." Mercer "has headed into the Arizona desert in her Chevrolet pickup" on many nights to patrol the border with another woman. "Locals call them the Granny Brigade." Following Mercer from the airport and around the D.C. area, the Post notes the foreign origins of several of the people she comes in contact with. "In the Washington region, where an estimated one in six residents is foreign-born, she would see a thousand faces of immigration during her visit."

Myerson Blames NAFTA For Increase In Illegal Immigration From Mexico. Harold Myerson in his column in the Washington Post (2/8, A19, 744K) writes, "With the number of immigrants illegally in the United States estimated at 11 million, the tensions between Americans and Mexicans -- chiefly, working-class Americans and working-class Mexicans -- are rising. And those are tensions that congressional Republicans, who don't look to have a lot of other issues they can run on this fall, are eager to stoke." Meyerson says the boom in illegal immigration is "not because we've let down our guard at the border…the border is more militarized now than it's ever been. The answer is actually simpler than that. In large part, it's NAFTA." For example NAFTA put Mexican farmers "in direct competition with incomparably more efficient U.S. agribusinesses. It proved to be no contest: From 1993 through 2002, at least 2 million Mexican farmers were driven off their land." Meyerson concludes, "So long as the global economy is designed, as NAFTA was, to keep workers powerless, Mexican desperation and American anger will only grow. Forget the fence. We need a new rulebook for the world."

Intel Chairman Calls For End To Quota System For H1-B Visas, Green Cards. The Financial Times (2/8, Nuttall) reports, "Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel, the world's largest semiconductor maker, called for comprehensive immigration reform to make the US more competitive, during a live question-and-answer session on FT.com. He "said the first step in simplifying the immigration process would be 'to replace the current arbitrary quota system with an open market type approach.' The US's H1-B visa allows foreign engineers and scientists to work on a temporary basis in the US but is capped at 65,000 a year." He "said demand was also greater than supply for green cards that allowed permanent employment, with the cap at 140,000 a year and long processing delays meaning individuals having to wait up to seven years to obtain one."

TAX:

Minnesota Tax Preparer Charged With Filing False Returns. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (2/8) reports, "The Internal Revenue Service filed suit Monday, accusing a St. Paul tax preparer of filing numerous false federal tax returns on behalf of recent immigrants that overstated their deductions and caused the IRS an estimated $8 million in tax losses." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The lawsuit seeks to bar Nash Sonibare, 46, from preparing additional federal tax returns. Sonibare is the sole shareholder of Liberty Financial Group Inc. … IRS officials estimated that Sonibare has prepared 3,373 federal income tax returns from 2002 to 2005 and that many of his customers are nursing assistants and licensed practical nurses who have immigrated to the United States from various African countries." The Pioneer Press adds, "Sonibare also is under criminal investigation by IRS agents and continued to prepare fraudulent tax returns even after being advised of the investigation, the suit contends. … He also continually has misrepresented to IRS agents that he is a certified public accountant, the suit said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Budget Faces Gauntlet Of Election-Year Politics. The AP (2/7, Taylor) writes President Bush' budget proposal "already faces dire prospects in Congress. It's a blueprint better suited for an odd-numbered year." In an "even-numbered" election year, lawmakers "don't like to vote for things like cuts to Medicare, food stamps, farm subsidies and education." Sen. Tom Harkin said, "I can't imagine the Republican Party…is going to allow this to come through this year in an election year." The President's budget proposal "is the most austere since the Reagan era as the president seeks to build upon his spending cut success of last year." Roll Call (2/8, Pierce) reports members of Congress are questioning President Bush's push for Medicare and Medicaid cuts in an election year. One "senior Senate Republican staffer" said, "It strikes me that [the White House] isn't thinking about the election at all. I can't quite figure out why they are going to make us jump off this cliff."

The Washington Times (2/8, Fagan) reports Bush Administration officials said the "proposal's tight rein on spending coupled with extending tax cuts are essential for continued economic growth, while Democrats attacked the measures as misplaced priorities that will harm the middle class." At a Senate hearing, Treasury Secretary John Snow said, "This budget would continue the economic policies that have brought prosperity to America." But Sen. Charles Schumer offered criticism, saying, "There are nearly $2 trillion in additional tax cuts, but most of it is geared to the very well-to-do…rather than the middle class that's finding it harder and harder to make ends meet." Reuters (2/7, Felsenthal) reports Schumer "and others, speaking at a hearing of the Senate Finance Committee, questioned why the administration has prioritized extending expiring tax breaks for dividends and capital gains instead of overhauling another tax provision, the alternative minimum tax, which is increasingly affecting middle income tax filers." The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Feldmann) says "the stark reality is that Bush is asking for budget savings from Medicare, education, transportation, and agriculture as he seeks to cut taxes. Can the administration pull it off? The answer goes to the core of different government philosophies of the two parties."

CQ (2/7, Dennis, Higa) reports Republicans "acknowledged they face a political challenge in an election year in gaining passage of a plan with cuts to domestic programs alongside new tax cuts and a further military buildup." Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg said he "would try to appease Sen. Arlen Specter," who has said he will "oppose a budget resolution if it contained what he called 'scandalous' cuts to health and education programs." OMB Director Joshua Bolten "also sounded open to compromise," saying, "The budget is the President's proposal and we understand that's all it is. We look forward to working with Sen. Specter, just like we do with all the members of the Appropriations committees, and especially the two chairmen."

Scandals Increase Chances For Earmark Reform. The New York Times (2/8, Hulse) reports that Washington corruption and lobbying scandals are "providing powerful ammunition to critics of earmarks. … With backing from President Bush" and new House Majority Leader John Boehner, there appears to be a real opportunity "to restrain the targeted spending and force disclosure of projects that have increasingly been quietly added to major legislation at the last minute. But it will not be easy." The Times says "winning money for projects back home is the driving passion of many lawmakers and is considered a bipartisan necessity for re-election."

The Hill (2/8, Young) reports that the cuts to health-related programs "are putting House GOP centrists on the hot seat just weeks after they were asked to make a tough vote on budget reconciliation" and following a year of potentially politically costly votes on issues like free trade. Now, Republican leaders may be in the position of "approaching stubborn members with a weaker arsenal. The movement to restrict earmarks will make it more difficult for proponents of budget cuts to sweeten the bills with money for the home districts of politically endangered members."

Democratic Maneuver Could Block Capital Gains, Dividend Tax Cuts. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, Mullins) reports Republicans "have run into a roadblock while working for a two-year extension of President Bush's 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends." Democrats may use a parliamentary move to "force Republicans to pare plans to extend the lower tax rates -- or raise taxes by as much as $30 billion to pay for them," since Senate rules "require that any legislation considered under the privileged budget procedures can't add to the deficit beyond the five-year budget window. Extending the 15% rates on capital gains and dividends would cost $30 billion beyond that window."

Budget Calls For Increased VA Fees. USA Today (2/8, Stone) reports that while Bush's budget calls for increased spending on medical care for veterans, under his plan the Veterans Affairs budget would "be covered in part by an enrollment fee and increasing drug co-payments for veterans who make above a certain amount of income." The increases" would have to be approved by Congress, and with past Bush budgets, Congress has refused under pressure from veterans groups." Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, "who chairs the panel overseeing the VA budget, said she will evaluate the latest request. But, she added, 'I have been consistent and adamant that we do not increase the financial burden on veterans.'"

Unions, Democrats Link HSA Expansion To Social Security Push. Under the headline "Dems Try To Do To HSAs What They Did To Social Security Plan," The Hill (2/8, Schor) reports "unions and congressional Democrats already have started invoking a political comparison to last year's Social Security privatization drive." House Ways and Means ranking Democrat Charles Rangel said, "It will go the same way Social Security [did]. He'll send it to the committee, we'll discuss it."

Budget Includes No Funding For Privacy, Civil Liberties Body. CQ (2/7, Starks) reports the budget does not include funding "for the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, even though President Bush has two nominations to the panel pending in the Senate. The failure to even note the existence of the board at a time when Bush is under fire for authorizing a secret domestic eavesdropping program did not go unnoticed by two of the board's biggest backers," Reps. Carolyn Maloney and Christopher Shays. In a joint statement, they said, "The bottom line is, with more authority must come more oversight, and money talks. To underscore our concern for civil liberties, we need a board that is up and running and has the teeth to do the job."

New York State Health Providers Fear Cuts. The New York Times (2/8, Hernandez) reports New York State's health care industry says it stands to lose $1.2 billion in funding, forcing "hospitals, nursing homes and home care providers to reduce services for elderly and disabled residents of the state."

NYC Public Projects In Line For Federal Funding. The New York Times (2/8, Lueck) reports, "Two of New York City's most ambitious public projects, the Second Avenue subway and a Long Island Rail Road extension to Grand Central Terminal, are in line to receive billions of dollars in federal aid." Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta said both projects "were on a list of 28 across the nation that would receive or be considered for financing" under Bush's budget.

LATimes Says Pentagon Should Not Be Exempt From Cuts. The Los Angeles Times (2/8) editorializes, 'A nation at war must make difficult choices and endure sacrifice. The soldiers who risk life and limb in Iraq carry the most obvious burden. But those in government must also do their part, by selecting wisely where to direct taxpayer money. At a time of belt-tightening throughout the federal government, including Medicare and several programs aimed at helping the poor, there is one corner of Washington where hard choices remain unknown: the Pentagon. The shocker in the $2.77-trillion budget proposed Monday by President Bush is that not one big-ticket Pentagon weapons program fell under the same knife that seems to be cutting the rest of us. … War requires courage, both on the battlefield and at home. By declaring 16% of the federal budget essentially off-limits, and by spending scores of billions on programs even the military suspects are wasteful, the president is showing a failure of nerve."

WPost Likes Science Funding, But Says Medical Science Should Not Be Neglected. The Washington Post (2/8, A18) editorializes, "Reaching for a domestic policy that would command easy bipartisan backing, the Bush administration has proposed an 'American Competitiveness Initiative.' The idea taps into a deep national neurosis about economic threats from abroad, especially from Asia: The current anxiety is focused on India and China, but it closely resembles the fear of Japan that floated a raft of paranoid bestsellers 20 years ago. Though the fears of American decline are exaggerated, the policy prescription that flows from them is sensible. Spending on science and math creates broad social benefits that exceed the gains likely to be captured by private financiers of research." But Bush's "reasonable enthusiasm for the physical sciences should not come at the expense of the biological sciences. After years of generous expansion, the National Institutes of Health are now facing budget cuts. The chief reason seems to be that Americans' fear of cancer has for the moment been eclipsed by an even stronger fear of foreign engineering prowess. This is a dumb trade-off."

Samuelson Sees Little Substance To Budget Debates. In his Washington Post (2/8, A19) column, Robert J. Samuelson writes, "Our annual budget debates…have increasingly become exercises in political theater. They certainly aren't intended to bridge the gap between Americans' huge appetite for government services and their fierce distaste for taxes. Someone has to choose -- higher taxes, lower spending or some combination. But American politicians are loath to choose. So we get an outpouring of partisan blab that does little to clarify. Instead, clever politicians of both parties devise self-serving delusions to justify their inaction. On the one hand we have the Bush Delusion: He says he's promoting lower taxes, but he's actually doing the opposite. … In the long run, tax levels reflect spending levels." The Democrats also "have their delusion. It's the Bill Clinton Delusion: that the Democrats are now the party of 'fiscal responsibility,' because Clinton engineered the first budget surpluses…since 1969. The reality is that those surpluses stemmed more from good luck than from Clinton's policies."

Business Leaders Launch Effort To Push Bush Competitiveness Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/7) reported in its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, "A coalition of business and academic leaders is launching a lobbying and media campaign to build support for President Bush's new plan to boost the competitiveness of American business. The campaign opens Thursday with ad buys in national print publications, and will be followed up with ad buys in other media and direct advocacy on Capitol Hill. The goal is 'to try to increase the awareness in Washington and Congress,' said Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel Corp. Barrett co-chairs the National Innovation Initiative Leadership Council, which is leading the campaign, with William Brody, president of Johns Hopkins University."

Some Question Goss Methods In Probe Of CIA Leaks To Media. ABC News (2/7, Ross, Esposito) in an exclusive on its web site titled "Is CIA Leak Probe a 'Witch Hunt'?" reports, "The director of the CIA has launched a major internal probe into media leaks about covert operations. In an agencywide e-mail, Porter Goss blamed 'a very small number of people' for leaks about secret CIA operations that, in his words, 'do damage to the credibility of the agency.'" In the e-mail Goss "warned that any CIA officer deemed suspect by the agency's Office of Security and its Counter Intelligence Center (which handles internal affairs) could be subjected to an unscheduled lie detector test. CIA personnel are subjected to polygraphs at regular intervals in their careers, but one former intelligence officer called the new warning a 'witch hunt.' Others said Goss' e-mail was narrowly focused and did not suggest agencywide, random lie detector tests." Goss also "told CIA employees there were ways other than talking to the news media to resolve any issues they had with classified CIA operations."

Abramoff Scandal Still Could Ensnare White House. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Cummings) reports the Abramoff scandal "still poses significant problems for the Bush White House." A court hearing "scheduled later this month may bring fresh attention to the case of former White House aide David Safavian, who is charged with lying in connection with a golf trip Mr. Abramoff arranged." Justice Department officials also "haven't closed their review of actions by former Interior Department official J. Steven Griles, who disputes claims that he favored Abramoff clients," and the "calls for the White House to release photos of Mr. Abramoff with the president -- and details of his contacts with presidential aides including Karl Rove -- haven't abated."

Bush To Address House GOP Retreat. The Hill (2/8, O'Connor) reports, "House Republicans will travel to Maryland's Eastern Shore tomorrow to hold a broad discussion on the future of their conference as members prepare for the upcoming midterm elections." President Bush "is scheduled to address the assembled members and staffers Friday afternoon at the Hyatt Regency Chesapeake Bay in Cambridge, Md." The Hill adds, "The focus of this year's retreat promises to be more about Congress than the White House, which is a marked departure from last year's gathering at the Greenbrier Resort in West Virginia, when the recently reelected president was poised to make dramatic reforms to Social Security."

Boehner Doesn't Want Luntz At Retreat. Roll Call (2/8, Pershing) reports, "The ascent last week of Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) to the Majority Leader post has put the agenda for the upcoming House GOP retreat somewhat in flux, but one thing is certain: Frank Luntz won't be there. The omnipresent Republican pollster was uninvited from the retreat -- scheduled for this Thursday through Saturday in Cambridge, Md. -- after Boehner adamantly told his colleagues at his first leadership meeting last Friday that he didn't want Luntz there. 'Boehner said he wasn't going if Luntz was going,' said a leadership source." Spokesmen for Boehner and the Republican Conference "both declined to discuss the issue, but multiple House GOP sources confirmed that Luntz was slated to attend the retreat until Boehner made his views known." A "love-hate divide" about Luntz "has at times split the Republican leadership." Boehner's predecessor, Rep. Tom DeLay, "is known to be an eager customer for Luntz's strategic advice, while Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his office have been described by leadership sources as less than enthusiastic about Luntz's work. It is not clear why Boehner would dislike Luntz's work enough to ban him from the retreat."

White House To Announce Plan To Expand Prescription Drug Registries. USA Today (2/8, Leinwand) reports the White House "today will announce a national anti-drug strategy that includes prodding more states to set up databases that can track people who get multiple prescriptions of frequently abused prescription drugs such as OxyContin and Vicodin." The strategy, "to be announced in Denver today by White House drug czar John Walters, does not include any new programs, a reflection of how the tight federal budget is limiting anti-drug initiatives." Twenty-eight states "have passed laws to set up prescription-drug registries, which are funded with a mix of federal and state money. President Bush's proposed budget for fiscal 2007 includes $9.9 million to help establish registries in more states, up from $7.4 million this year." The "impact of the existing registries is unclear; the first data measuring their effectiveness will not be available until next year. Walters, whose office provided a copy of the strategy to USA TODAY, is focusing on 20 states that do not have prescription-drug registries and whose legislatures meet this year, plus Washington, D.C."

Finance Committee Senators Debate Medicare Drug Plan In Op-Eds. The Hill today runs op-eds from four Finance Committee senators on Medicare prescription drug coverage. In his The Hill (2/8) piece, Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley writes, "We can't imagine modern medicine without prescription drugs. Soon we won't be able to imagine Medicare without prescription-drug coverage. … Millions of people now have financial help to manage pain, keep diseases from progressing or save their lives. This coverage was overdue and desperately needed. For many older Americans, prescription drugs were either expensive or out of reach altogether."

In his op-ed in The Hill (2/8), Sen. Jay Rockefeller writes, "After the administration cut deals and twisted arms to push the 2003 Medicare prescription-drug bill through Congress, President Bush has repeatedly touted the new program as a revolution in the way that America's seniors would receive their prescription drugs. Unfortunately, the implementation of the program, which began Jan. 1, has hardly been a revolution. The program has been rife with problems, causing many of our senior citizens to go without their life-saving prescription drugs. … I am hopeful that we can agree that there are real problems that need immediate legislative action."

In his The Hill (2/8) op-ed, Sen. John Kerry writes, "Affordable healthcare is not a privilege for the elected, the connected and the wealthy; it should be a right afforded to all Americans, regardless of their background or social standing. President Bush's prescription-drug program soundly rejects this principle, and we have to pass serious reforms now to repair this program before it becomes entrenched. Our goal should be nothing more and nothing less than assuring that a Medicare prescription-drug plan actually does what it's supposed to do: conveniently provide affordable prescription drugs to all seniors."

And Sen. Max Baucus writes in The Hill (2/8), "Medicare is a remarkable American success story. We must build on this success by ensuring that Medicare's new drug benefit is implemented correctly. In 2003, with my support, Congress passed the Medicare Modernization Act to establish drug benefits under Medicare. The legislation was not perfect, but its passage was a step in the right direction. The bill as written provides solid coverage for low-income Medicare beneficiaries. It gives stop-loss, catastrophic protection for all who enroll. Most important, the bill gets a benefit started. … It's critical that the Medicare drug benefit be implemented correctly and clearly so that it can become the latest in a long line of Medicare successes."

Congress Under Pressure To Create Enforcement Mechanism For New Ethics Rules. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Rogers) reports that as Congress "prepares to overhaul lobbying rules, there is growing pressure to create enforcement mechanisms so the proposed changes stick -- and are credible to voters." House and Senate Democrats have "introduced bills that would establish professional offices to audit disclosure reports filed by lobbyists. Critics say the same oversight should apply to similar filings by lawmakers, given the spotty investigative performance of congressional ethics committees." The issue "could prove a major test for new House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio), who has insisted that better disclosure -- overseen by the ethics committees -- is sufficient." But even as "scandals have beset the House in the past year, its Ethics Committee has been paralyzed politically by infighting. And historically, one of the weaknesses of the ethics enforcement process in Congress has been the panels' ability to initiate inquiries to see if there is probable cause for a fuller investigation." One option "promoted by Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) borrows from the model of an independent ethics commission set up in Kentucky after bribery scandals there in the early 1990s. In testimony today before the Senate Rules Committee, Mr. Obama will propose a nine-member Congressional Ethics Enforcement Commission, made up of outsiders but appointed by House and Senate leaders." A second option "calls for creating a professional 'Office of Public Integrity' to audit filings and assist the ethics committees in enforcing rules."

Morris Says Members Of Congress Should Take "Lieberman Pledge" On Ethics. In his column in The Hill (2/8), Dick Morris says Sen. Joseph Lieberman is saying members should not "wait for legislation or ethics rulings, just follow his example and voluntarily announce that you and your staff will not accept gifts, meals or travel from lobbyists or groups with interests before Congress." Lieberman, the "most ethical member of the Senate (this is not damning with faint praise!), is setting up the only way to avoid fallout from the Jack Abramoff scandal and get clean for election day." The Lieberman Pledge "will catch on. In the elections of 2006, insurgents will happily take the pledge (they have likely never even met a lobbyist or accepted a ham sandwich from one) and incumbents will be hard-pressed not to follow. Pledges have a way of being contagious."

Some Businesses May Profit From Boehner's Rise In House Leadership. The Hill (2/8, Snyder) reports Rep. John Boehner's "rise to the second highest post in the House could benefit a number of business interests he has supported in Congress. Backers of for-profit education, free-market farm policies, immigration guest-worker programs and pension reforms could all benefit from Boehner's victory, lobbyists say." Some things "are unlikely to change under his leadership. Committee chairmen will maintain discretion to craft bills under their purview, and Boehner's conservative political philosophy — lower taxes, fewer regulations — is in line with that of both Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.)."

Ornstein Says Boehner Needs To Fundamentally Change House Operations. In his Roll Call column (2/8), Norman Ornstein says the outcome of the House GOP leadership contest "is probably a good reflection of the collective desire of the House Republican Conference: Stand for change, but not too much change. Change obviously includes reforms that respond to the scandals on Capitol Hill, from former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) to ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff and many of those associated with him, which will almost certainly engulf several Members of Congress and top staffers." Transparency is "dandy, and disclosure is useful. But if all that happens here is more disclosure — and a bar on former Members going on the floor or into the gym, something already approved by the House — that will be a huge disappointment and a massive failure of responsibility by the majority." As Majority Leader, Boehner "needs to alter fundamentally the way the House operates. He needs to create a fair process — fair to Republican moderates, Republican conservatives and minority Democrats."

Boehner Election Unlikely To Win Thomas Another Term At Ways And Means. The Hill (2/8, Cusack, Young) reports Rep. John Boehner's "rise to majority leader could have important implications for Rep. Bill Thomas's political future, but what Thomas wants most and probably can't attain is a waiver to stay on as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee." Thomas (R-Calif.) "is in the last year of a six-year term as chairman of the powerful panel, and it is unclear what he will do in 2007." Sources "close to Thomas say he has several options, including heading the Budget Committee, joining President Bush's Cabinet, chairing a Ways and Means subcommittee or retiring." But, "asked of the chances of a waiver for Thomas to retain his gavel, a Republican lawmaker last year said, 'I've got a better chance to be pope.'"

Polls Show DeLay Trailing Likely Democratic Opponent. The Washington Times (2/8, McCaslin) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "It's Tom against Tom in Houston, where prominent lawyer Tom Campbell is out to topple politically (and legally) troubled incumbent Rep. Tom DeLay in the March 7 Republican primary. Local polling shows Mr. DeLay, the ousted House majority leader, trailing the likely Democratic opponent, his unfavorable ratings rising like hurricane floodwaters." Campbell "is preaching integrity and values as the antidote to DeLay-style bare-knuckle politics. He and his wife raised all five of their children in the Houston suburb of Sugar Land, once the heart of Mr. DeLay's turf."

In Boost For Reelection Bid, DeLay Expected To Claim Appropriations Seat. The Hill (2/8, Tiron) reports that in a move "that could help his reelection campaign, former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) is expected to be appointed to an Appropriations subcommittee today that has jurisdiction over spending for space programs." A source said DeLay "would reclaim his spot on the Appropriations Committee while taking seats on one subcommittee dealing with homeland security and another that funds NASA. Those assignments could boost the indicted lawmaker's campaign against former Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas)." DeLay's district, "which he helped redraw in 2004, includes NASA's Johnson Space Center. DeLay has been known to boost NASA's interests in the Houston area." If DeLay is "cleared of the charges brought by Texas prosecutor Ronnie Earle and defeats Lampson and Republicans maintain their majority, he could become the chairman of the Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee in 2007 when Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) will relinquish the gavel."

Democratic Leaders Say Party Is Missing Opportunities. Democratic leaders say their party is heading into the 2006 elections in a position weaker than they had hoped for. The New York Times (2/8, Nagourney, Stolberg) reports that the leaders are "stirring concern that they are letting pass an opportunity to exploit what they see as widespread Republican vulnerabilities. In interviews, senior Democrats said they were optimistic about significant gains in Congressional elections this fall, calling this the best political environment they have faced since President Bush took office. But Democrats described a growing sense that they had failed to take full advantage of the troubles that have plagued Mr. Bush and his party since the middle of last year, driving down the president's approval ratings, opening divisions among Republicans in Congress over policy and potentially putting control of the House and Senate into play in November." Senator Christopher J. Dodd said the health of the Democratic Party is "a lot worse than it should be," adding, "This has not been a very good two months. We seem to be losing our voice when it comes to the basic things people worry about."

Miller, Tauscher Want Ruling On Whether Pombo Aide Has Violated Rules. The Hill (2/8, Kaplan) reports California Democratic Reps. George Miller and Ellen Tauscher "asked the House Administration Committee last week to determine whether Rep. Richard Pombo's chief of staff has violated House rules." Steven Ding lives "in Stockton, Calif., which is in Pombo's district. Ding serves as chief of staff both in Pombo's personal office and for the House Resources Committee, which Pombo chairs. The committee pays Ding $150,000, and the personal office gives him an additional $100 each month." Reps. Miller and Tauscher "allege that Ding's arrangements violate three House rules. First, lawmakers cannot use their personal-office budgets — officially called the members' representational accounts (MRAs) — to pay for a committee's expenses and committees cannot subsidize expenses for a lawmaker's personal office. Second, if a staffer's job or "duty station" is in Washington, he cannot be reimbursed for commuting expenses." Finally, House rules state "that a lawmaker 'cannot retain an employee … who does not perform official duties commensurate with the compensation received for the offices of the employing authority.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Serrano) reports Duane Gibson, "a Washington lobbyist under federal scrutiny in the Jack Abramoff scandal, helped raise money for" Rep. Richard Pombo of California, "who championed legislation that would benefit Western mining interests that Gibson represented." Last year, Pombo, chairman of the House Resources Committee, "attached an amendment to a budget bill -- without hearings or floor debate -- that would have opened national forest and other public land to mining. The so-called Pombo provision passed the House, but was deleted from the bill in the Senate when several Western state senators and governors complained that it would endanger vast portions of federal land." Three months before Pombo "inserted the amendment, Gibson and his lobbying firm had a $1,000-a-head fundraiser for the congressman. Although the total raised at the July event is not known, Gibson contributed $1,000, and additional donations came from mining companies, including at least one that Gibson has represented." The fundraiser "and Pombo's action apparently broke no laws. But, as the Abramoff scandal continues to roil the capital, they reflect the symbiotic, cozy relationship between lobbyists and legislators that congressional leaders say they want to curb."

Senate Democrats Cut Ties With PAC Treasurer. Roll Call (2/8 , Newmyer) reports that Senate Democrats, in an effort to "clean up their own houses," are "cutting ties to a lobbyist serving as treasurer of their leadership political action committees. Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), Democratic Policy Committee Chairman Byron Dorgan (N.D.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (Mass.) are cutting ties to longtime appropriations lobbyist William Oldaker, who has served as treasurer for their leadership PACs. … Reid spokesman Jim Manley said the Minority Leader made the decision 'to err on the side of caution.'"

Burns Aide Leaving Amid Questions About Abramoff Ties. Roll Call (2/8, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Ryan Thomas, an aide to Sen. Conrad Burns (R), is leaving his post as the Montanan's top staffer on the Appropriations subcommittee on the Interior amid lingering questions about his role in helping clients of ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Thomas, who was not available for comment, was on the now-infamous January 2001 trip to the Super Bowl in Tampa with Abramoff, along with another Burns staffer, then-Chief of Staff Will Brooke. … James Pendleton, Burns' spokesman, confirmed that Thomas was leaving but had no knowledge of what his next job would be. Pendleton defended the work of Thomas, who was a staffer in Burns' personal office before moving over to the subcommittee when his boss became chairman." Roll Call adds that Thomas' exit "comes as Burns is taking lots of political heat from Montana Democrats eyeing that seat in November."

NTSB Sending Investigators To Fewer Fatal Plane Crashes. The Washington Post (2/8, A17, Goo) reports that the NTSB "is sending investigators to fewer and fewer fatal airplane crashes -- particularly those involving small planes. And that has safety experts worried. Last year, the agency's accident investigators showed up at 62 percent of all fatal plane crashes, compared with 75 percent of all fatal crashes in 2001, according to NTSB numbers. But data from the Federal Aviation Administration -- which is required to send an investigator to every accident and take note of whether the NTSB is on the scene -- indicate that NTSB investigators showed up less than half the time last year. The NTSB chafed at the FAA numbers, calling them inaccurate. After a back-and-forth between the agencies, the FAA backed down, acknowledging that its numbers may be unreliable." The trend "has alarmed former accident investigators."

Pentagon Program Offers Pre-Marital Advice To Soldiers. The Washington Post/AP (2/8, A17) reports, "They are the Pentagon's new 'rules of engagement': U.S. Army chaplains are trying to teach troops how to pick the right spouse, through a program called 'How to Avoid Marrying a Jerk.' The matchmaking advice comes as military family life is being stressed: Defense Department records show that more than 56,000 people in the Army -- active-duty, National Guard and reserve -- have divorced since the campaign in Afghanistan started in 2001. Officials partly blame long and repeated deployments that started after the invasion of Iraq in 2003 and stretched the service thin. Troops also are coming home with life-altering injuries." The program "advises the marriage-bound to study a partner's FACES -- family background, attitudes, compatibility, experiences in previous relationships and skills they would bring to the union. It teaches them to pace themselves with a RAM chart -- the Relationship Attachment Model, which basically says not to let your sexual involvement exceed your level of commitment or level of knowledge about the other person. … The program teaches troops not to cave in to the pressure of a ticking clock -- such as rushing to marry before shipping out for a deployment, or too soon after homecoming."

Wolfowitz Draws Fire For Appointing Former Administration Officials To World Bank Jobs. The Washington Post (2/8, D1, Blustein) reports on the controversy World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz has created by appointing Americans "with ties to the Bush administration" to key jobs. Their "roles have rekindled fears among the staff that Wolfowitz, the former U.S. deputy defense secretary, is bent on imposing a conservative agenda on the bank." Wolfowitz has "repeatedly sought to dispel such concerns since he became bank president in June. He has pledged his commitment to the bank's mission of alleviating poverty, and his unassuming manner has charmed many staffers who were averse to his role as a chief strategist of the U.S.-Iraq war." But after "months of seeming tranquillity, the bank is stewing with discontent over Wolfowitz's choice of several confidantes with administration or Republican connections to serve in key bank posts," such as Robin Cleveland, Kevin Kellems, and Suzanne Rich Folsom.

Realtors Predict Home Sales Will Slow In 2006. USA Today (2/8, Kirchhoff) reports US home sales "are expected to slow in 2006, though remaining near peak levels, the National Association of Realtors said Tuesday." Realtors' chief economist David Lereah "predicts existing home sales will dip 4.7% to 6.74 million units, while new home sales decline 8.5% to 1.17 million units. That would still be the third-best year on record."

Stock Markets Down On Housing Market Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, McKay) reports concerns "about the housing market sent stocks down modestly, despite several promising developments, including strong earnings at Walt Disney and a pullback in crude-oil prices." The "nervousness spread after home builder Toll Brothers reported that while revenue was solid in the fourth quarter, orders for new homes declined 29%. Because home values represent such a large share of many Americans' net worth, any sign of softness in that sector reverberates throughout the financial markets." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "fell 48.51 points, or 0.45%, to 10749.76." Other "stock benchmarks slipped fractionally. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index eased 10.24, or 0.8%, to 1254.78. The Nasdaq Composite edged down 13.84, or 0.6%, to 2244.96."

GM Announces Dividend, Benefit Cuts. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 5, 2:00, Williams) reported there was "a big announcement from struggling General Motors, which lost $8 billion last year alone. The company says it will cut white collar pension and healthcare benefits, cut its dividend and cut executive salaries. Officials say they can't reach their goals without sacrifice here. But does this mean blue collar workers are next?" NBC (Thompson) added, "CEO Rick Wagoner called today's cuts 'shared sacrifice' to speed GM's return to profitability." Wagoner: "I don't take these actions lightly. And don't take them without considering the impact of every single person affected." Thompson: "Those feeling the pain; shareholders. Their yearly dividend will shrink from $2 to $1. Outside board members, their compensation will be slashed by 50%. Current salaried workers their pensions will be restructured. And GM's top five executives will take pay cuts, including Wagoner whose $2.2 million salary will be cut in half."

Energy Stocks Expected To Remain Strong. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Lahart) reports that in early 2003, "most investors were cool to energy stocks -- a stance that was exactly wrong. In the three years since, the Dow Jones index of U.S. Oil & Gas stocks has more than doubled. Even after a big selloff yesterday, spurred by a government report that warm weather has slackened U.S. energy demand this winter, the index is up 7.4% so far this year." Unlike the "dot-com bubble of the late 1990s, the fundamental story on energy looks sound. Rising global demand -- particularly from the rapidly developing Chinese and Indian economies -- continues to push up against the world's ability to pump oil, says Tom Petrie of Denver energy investment bank Petrie Parkman."

PhRMA Defends Interactions Between Drug Makers, Doctors. In a USA Today (2/8) op-ed, Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) Senior Vice President Ken Johnson writes, "America's pharmaceutical research companies share a common goal of ensuring that physicians and those who prescribe medicines stay abreast of rapid advancements in treatment options. … The ultimate goal is to improve patient care. That is why nearly four years ago, PhRMA adopted the voluntary Code on Interactions with health care Professionals. These guidelines outline permitted activities so the independent judgment of health providers is not compromised. … We believe that pharmaceutical companies should not offer or provide anything to doctors that would interfere with the independence of their prescribing practices. The guidelines are thorough and strict. … Doctors make decisions based on the best information, and the PhRMA code helps to ensure that they get it -- with no strings attached."

USA Today Criticizes Freebies For Doctors. USA Today (2/8) editorializes, "For decades, pharmaceutical companies have showered physicians with meals, tickets to shows and sporting events, ski and beach vacations disguised as medical education seminars, and consulting 'jobs' for which doctors do no work. The companies aren't being charitable. They expect a return on their investment, namely that doctors prescribe their newest expensive pills. That's why an army of 88,000 pharmaceutical representatives, many of them young and beautiful, provides freebies to doctors and their staffs. … Drug companies support many educational programs and provide doctors with vital information about new products. But the gifts and unseemly practices taint the profession and undermine patients' trust. Doctors are sufficiently well-compensated that they can live without pharmaceutical freebies."

"Fetal Pain" Bills Advancing In State Legislatures. USA Today (2/8, Biskupic) reports, "A new front in the debate over abortion is emerging in legislatures across the nation. Abortion foes are gaining ground with proposals to require doctors to tell women seeking abortions that their fetuses might feel pain during the procedure. State 'fetal pain' bills began popping up last year in the wake of other statutes that have drawn attention to the interests of fetuses, including bans on a procedure that its critics call 'partial birth' abortion." USA adds, "Fetal pain bills were introduced in 19 states in 2005, and were passed in Arkansas, Georgia, Minnesota and Wisconsin. The Wisconsin bill was vetoed last month by Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle, who said it failed 'to reflect a consensus of medical opinion" and "intrudes on the doctor-patient relationship in a heavy-handed manner.' He cited a controversial report in the Journal of the American Medical Association that said there is no conclusive evidence of when a fetus first feels pain. Despite such questions, more fetal pain bills are advancing this year. Such bills have been passed by House members in Utah and Indiana and are headed to their Senates."

In a separate story, USA Today (2/8, Biskupic) adds that "most of the debates over abortion in state legislatures stem from abortion opponents' continuing push to emphasize the interests of fetuses and to create more hurdles for women seeking abortions. It's a strategy that has led to a range of restrictions on abortion and to proposals in 21 states aimed at requiring doctors to tell women seeking an abortion that their fetuses might feel pain during the procedure."

Potential New York Gubernatorial Candidate Offers Plan To Reduce Abortions. The New York Times (2/8, Lambert) reports, "Nassau County Executive Thomas R. Suozzi announced a plan on Tuesday intended to reduce abortions, calling the proposal a 'politically risky' step as he contemplates running for governor this year. Even as he was speaking, an abortion rights group issued a statement criticizing the plan. Mr. Suozzi's proposal would give nearly $1 million in county grants to groups including Planned Parenthood and Catholic Charities to promote birth control, adoption, housing for unwed mothers and abstinence. He proposes spending similar amounts in each of the next two years. … In an interview, Naral's president, Kelli Conlin, said, 'Mr. Suozzi is pandering in the worst possible way.'" The Times adds, "The clash had political overtones, since Naral previously endorsed Eliot Spitzer as the state attorney general, and is considering endorsing him for governor. Mr. Suozzi, meanwhile, is contemplating challenging him in the Democratic primary."

Retailer Group Sues To Strike Down Maryland's "Wal-Mart Law." The Virginia-based Retail Industry Leaders Association filed suit yesterday to strike down a Maryland law requiring Wal-Mart to pay more for employee health care, saying federal regulations don't permit states to set worker benefits. The Baltimore Sun (2/8, Green, Rosen) reports that the group, which counts Wal-Mart as a member, "says Maryland's Fair Share Health Act is illegal under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974. That law, known as ERISA, is designed in part to make sure that large employers are subjected to national standards for their benefit plans and not a tangle of conflicting state rules."

The AP (2/8) reports that the suit say the law illegally mandates "specific health care expenditures" and threatens "to take away the flexibility businesses need to deal with their employees."

The Washington Post (2/8, B4, Wagner) reports, "Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D) and Democratic leaders of the General Assembly expressed confidence yesterday that the law would withstand scrutiny. It requires private companies with more than 10,000 employees in Maryland to spend at least 8 percent of payroll on health benefits or make a contribution to the state's health insurance program for the poor. Of four known employers with that number of workers, Wal-Mart is the only one that has said it would be affected, and the legislation became known in Annapolis as 'the Wal-Mart bill.'"

Murray Says CEO Trying To Portray Wal-Mart As "A Force For Good." Alan Murray writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) that it is easy to depict Wal-Mart Chief Executive Lee Scott "as just another CEO saddled with a bad public-relations problem. His company has been accused of paying poverty-level wages, providing inadequate health-care coverage to employees, hiring illegal immigrants, destroying communities, driving jobs overseas, and, in a new book by Charles Fishman called 'The Wal-Mart Effect,' even polluting Chilean waters by buying salmon from crowded South American fish farms. Wal-Mart has become one of the great polarizing issues that divides American politics. … In response, Mr. Scott has had to become not just chief executive officer, but chief reputation officer. He spends at least half of his time, by his estimate, in a campaign to convince the world that Wal-Mart is a force for good."

Cheney Says Referring Iran To Security Council Was "The Right Step." Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) how dangerous the situation in Iran is right now. Cheney said, "We think it's dangerous and I think the international community believes that. We've seen the situation develop as they appear to be determined to develop their capacity to produce nuclear weapons. I think everybody also has had their level of concern increase because of the current leadership in Iran. The new president has made some pretty outrageous statements. Now the international community has come together, we had the vote in the International Atomic Energy Agency Board of Governors this past week to refer the matter to the U.N. Security Council. We think that's the right step."

Recapping Cheney's remarks on PBS, Reuters (2/8) adds, "Cheney rejected parallels between Iran and Iraq, which the United States invaded in 2003 in part because of the belief it had weapons of mass destruction." He "noted Tehran's rejection of a Russian plan to enrich uranium for a civilian reactor in Iran and then reclaim the spent fuel as a sign that Tehran wanted its 'own enrichment capacity to be able to go all the way to the levels required for a nuclear weapon. … So there doesn't seem to be any doubt of what their intentions are.'"

Administration More Convinced Of Iran's Nuclear Weapons Capability Than Intelligence Community. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Linzer) in an extensive front page story examining the US evidence of Iran's nuclear program reports that analysis by US and international experts is inconclusive as to Iran's progress and that Iran's nuclear weapon capability "remains as much as a decade away. … But whether Iran's leaders have reached that decision and what concrete progress the effort has made remain divisive questions among government analysts and U.N. inspectors." Meanwhile, "Bush administration officials, convinced that Iran has a weapons program, believe that the body of documentation is the nearest anyone can expect to 'smoking gun' evidence. But even in the U.S. government, the predominant interpretation is more complex." Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte's recent "carefully hedged assessment" that Iran "will likely have the capability to produce a nuclear weapon within the next decade" is "more conservative than views expressed by some policymakers. Some in the Bush administration have begun pushing back, suggesting that the CIA is demanding an unrealistically high standard of evidence before reaching conclusions that the White House believes are obvious." One senior Administration official said, "Taking into account the assessments made by the intelligence community, and others, I just don't have a lot of confidence in the assessments." The Los Angeles Times (2/8) also publishes a brief version of the Washington Post article Wednesday morning.

Expert Argues Military Strike Against Iran Could Succeed. Edward Luttwak, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic & International Studies, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) writes, "Many commentators argue that a pre-emptive air attack against Iran's nuclear installations is unfeasible. … There may well be other, perfectly valid reasons to oppose an attack on Iran's nuclear sites. But let's not pretend that such an attack has no chance of success. In fact, the odds are rather good." Luttwak argues, "Iran might need 100 buildings in good working order to make its bomb, but it is enough to demolish a few critical installations to delay its program for years -- and perhaps longer because it would become harder or impossible for Iran to buy the materials it bought when its efforts were still secret." A bombing strike targeting Iran's nuclear infrastructure "could all be done in a single night. One may hope that Iran's rulers will therefore accept a diplomatic solution rather than gamble all on wildly exaggerated calculations."

Administration Urged To Pursue Diplomacy With Iran Through Iraq. Roger Cohen in his "Globalist" column in the New York Times/IHT (2/8) writes, "The decision to report Iran to the United Nations Security Council over its nuclear weapons program represents a diplomatic success for the Bush administration, which showed unusual flexibility in coaxing Russia and China to back the move." The US and Iran "have been cooperating, albeit uneasily, at close quarters" in Iraq "and their interests converge in several respects. The possibility exists to leverage this convergence into dialogue." For example, "Adel Abdul Mahdi, a potential future prime minister from the most influential Shiite party, suggested he saw the possibility of mediating. 'When we meet American officials, we do not hide our friendship with Iran. Nor do we hide to Iran our interest in better relations with the U.S. There are interests here that can be developed.'"

NYTimes Says International Pressure Is Key. The New York Times (2/8) in an editorial writes that the IAEA referral of Iran to the Un Security Council "is a significant step in the right direction, and Washington deserves credit for agreeing to the modest and cosmetic compromises necessary to build such a broad diplomatic front. Tehran is now certain to use every conceivable ploy to try to shatter that hard-won unity. It should not be allowed to succeed." Continuing to apply concerted international pressure "would at least gain time -- time for energy conservation measures in the United States and elsewhere to lessen Iran's economic leverage, time for the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to be strengthened in ways that make it both more enforceable and more equitable, and time for Iran to elect a government that would be more amenable to reason and more willing to put the economic welfare of its people ahead of building nuclear bombs."

Bush Expresses "Solidarity" With Denmark In Face Of Muslim Protests. The AP (2/8) reports, "President Bush has called Denmark's prime minister to express 'our support and solidarity' in the wake of violence over the publication of caricatures of the prophet Muhammad." And State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "said American diplomats around the world had been directed to offer Denmark whatever assistance it might need to maintain its embassies."

AFP (2/8) adds, "Bush telephoned Rasmussen from his Air Force One presidential plane, and the two 'agreed that the way forward is through dialogue and tolerance, not violence,' said spokesman Scott McClellan." One Danish diplomat said, "Obviously this support from major countries lifts some of the pressure and soothes us, especially when it comes from the Americans and British, who slightly disappointed us earlier by their criticism and lack of solidarity."

Cheney Says Protests Unjustified. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 3, 1:45, Boettcher) reported, "Thousands marched in Pakistan, Indonesia, Iraq, and Iran to protest the caricatures of the prophet Mohammed published in Denmark and republished elsewhere in Europe." NBC quoted Vice President Cheney, who said, "It's appropriate for people to respect one another's religion but I don't believe that the printing of those cartoons justifies the violence that we've seen." Boettcher: "Even though the protests have been directed at European target, here in Iraq, US military commanders worry that if this crisis does not abate, American forces too will be a target."

Muslim Protests Over Controversial Cartoons Continue To Spread. ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 3, 2:10, Vargas) reported, "Fresh protest erupted across the Islamic world over the cartoons of the prophet Mohammed that many Muslims consider offensive. In Afghanistan, 3 were killed and 22 injured in a violent clash with NATO peacekeepers. Now, some Muslims are venting their rage by calling for the publication of offensive cartoons of their own." ABC (Watt) added, "This morning in Tehran, street protests. Today's targets, the Danish and Norwegian embassies."

The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 3, 2:05, Schieffer) reported, "57 Muslim countries today joined the United Nations and the European Union calling for an end to violent protest against those cartoons of the prophet Mohammed, but the violence went on and for a second day several protesters were killed. Now driving a wedge between some Muslim nations and some in Europe." CBS (Roth) added, "The insult to religion has become the excuse for a protest that's now burning on the fuel of anti-Western anger. And in Gaza or Syria or Iran, there's still plenty of that. In most of Europe though, even France with the continent's biggest Muslim population, the cartoons have caused controversy but hardly any confrontation. One exception was Britain where offended Muslims took their anger to the streets."

Protests May Threaten US Outreach To Muslim World. The Washington Post (2/8, A16, Kessler) reports, "The outrage over cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad poses a challenge for the United States at a time when the Bush administration is investing greater resources to reach out to the Muslim world." One US official said, "We're starting to see the American flag popping up with the Danish flag in protests. … This could be the beginning of a long misunderstanding between the West and East." Even prior to the protests, "U.S. officials monitoring Iranian media out of Dubai had begun to detect a nascent campaign to expose a perceived hypocrisy of American culture. The campaign would focus on gun violence…in a nation that is fighting a war against Islamic extremism and terrorism." Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy Karen Hughes "has been monitoring the situation and is involved in crafting the administration's response. … Thus far, the administration has tried to strike a balance that includes embrace of freedom of expression, displeasure at the cartoons, disgust at the violence and support for the Danish government. U.S. officials have also thrown barbs at Iran and Syria, which they accuse of inflaming the situation for cynical purposes."

The New York Times (2/8, Cowell) reports, "As the protests have spread, some Europeans have come to realize that relatively small Muslim minorities -- 3 percent in Britain, 4 percent in Denmark and around 5 percent in the European Union -- can wield power across the Islamic world." The protests "have set off a profound debate about freedom of expression and supposed double standards. And the spreading protest signified a hardening of extremes that left little room for moderation. 'The moderate Muslim has again been effectively silenced,' said Tabish Khair, professor of English at the University of Aarhus, Denmark." Recent terrorist attacks have "challenged governments and societies to distinguish between moderates and extremists." Meanwhile "there is a seething resentment among some Muslims that they are treated as second-class citizens and potential terrorists in lands that deny the importance of their faith, even though the number of Muslims in Europe totals 20 million, and possibly many more."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Rice-Oxley) reports, "The violence over cartoons satirizing the prophet Muhammad has highlighted often inconsistent rules in Europe governing free speech, tolerance, and the boundaries of public expression." The Monitor continues, "Muslims in particular charge that hate-speech laws are implemented unfairly. Many countries, they say, do not abide anti-Semitic outbursts, but will tolerate cartoons that to many Muslims are deeply offensive." The response from European leaders "has been to frown on those who reproduced images…while insisting that editors were within their legal rights to do so. Governments have refrained from apologizing to the Islamic community because they say publication is a matter for editors, not politicians. Muslim opinion, however, has not been appeased by this response."

Danish Leader Warns Of Growing Global Crisis Over Muslims Cartoons. Bloomberg (2/8, Brogger) quotes Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen saying, "We are facing a growing global crisis." Bloomberg adds, "Radicals and fundamentalists are pursuing their own agendas, he said."

European Diplomats Blame Islamic Regimes For Fanning Protests. The Financial Times (2/8, Turner, Khalaf, Smyth) reports, "The United Nations, the European Union and the Organisation of the Islamic Conference on Tuesday issued a joint appeal for an end to violence around the Muslim world." Yet "they also asserted that while that free speech was a right, it was one that entailed 'responsibility and discretion', and 'should respect the beliefs and tenets of all religions.'" And "as diplomatic efforts to calm tensions were stepped up, European diplomats cautioned against exaggerating the impact of the cartoon controversy. Disapproval of the caricatures, said diplomats, was being exploited by some regimes for political purposes. .... 'This is not the Muslim world jumping against western values. It is Iran, which is being sent to the UN Security Council over its nuclear programme. It is Syria because it reacts to policies that have been taken (against it) by the international community ... It is Afghanistan because the security situation there is fragile and deteriorating,' said a diplomat."

Demonstrators Attack Afghanistan NATO Base Over Danish Cartoons. The New York Times (2/8, Wafa, Gall) reports "NATO troops fired on demonstrators in northern Afghanistan on Tuesday in a second day of deadly protests here." In the town of Maimana "three protesters were killed and 22 injured," while "three Afghan police officers...and five Norwegian soldiers...were also injured." This marks "the first time NATO troops...had been attacked at their base by an angry crowd." Sayed Aslam Ziarati, the head of police security in Maimana, "blamed people he called terrorists for turning the demonstration into a violent one."

The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Witte) reports, "The most confrontational protest Tuesday occurred in the northern Afghan city of Meymaneh, where protesters threw stones and grenades at a NATO compound that primarily houses Norwegian soldiers doing reconstruction work. That protest and several others occurred in regions not usually associated with religious extremism or violence." And while other protests were in Afghanistan were peaceful, "violent demonstrations erupted in Kabul, where a small, angry mob grew quickly and as many as 1,000 men marched through the streets in search of Western targets to attack. During a rampage that lasted several hours, protesters trashed U.N. vehicles and threw stones at U.N. buildings, the U.S. Embassy compound, a NATO headquarters and private homes in a neighborhood popular among Westerners." They "tried to gain access to several heavily fortified compounds -- including the U.S. military base -- but were pushed back by security forces. They shouted slogans such as 'Down with the USA!' 'Down with Bush!' 'Down with the Jews!' 'Down with the Christians!' and 'Long live Islam!'"

Danish Aid Agency Expelled From Chechnya. The New York Times (2/8) reports, "The Danish Refugee Council, one of the largest aid organizations working in war-racked Chechnya and its neighboring republics, was expelled from Chechen territory on Tuesday, as anger spread yet further over Danish cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad." The Times adds, "Ramzan A. Kadyrov, acting prime minister of Chechnya and the head of President Vladimir V. Putin's political party in the region, said Monday that Chechnya would not admit 'anything that comes out of Denmark.'"

US Muslim Leaders Criticize Denmark. The Washington Times (2/8, Ward) reports, "American Muslim leaders say there is plenty of blame to go around in the uproar over the cartoons of the prophet Muhammad." They "have told European officials in Washington that the Danish government could have done a better job balancing free speech and respect for religious beliefs." Muslim Public Affairs Council national director Ahmed Younis "said his group organized a meeting Monday with the Danish ambassador to the United States 'to advise on the tone of the response of the Danish government and to offer opportunities for solutions.'"

Reaction In Saudi Arabia Mixed. The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Ambah) notes, "The controversy, one of the most intense in the Islamic world since the publication of Salman Rushdie's 'The Satanic Verses' in the 1980s, has provoked varied reactions here in the birthplace of Muhammad. Some Saudis have lauded the widespread reaction as Muslims' first unified stance in decades, a chance to flex their muscle and teach the West not to gratuitously offend their sensibilities. Others, like Barqah, say Muslims are reacting viscerally, not intelligently, and this, they say, goes against the very teachings of the prophet they are trying to defend."

Iranian Paper Solicits Cartoons Mocking Holocaust. The New York Times (2/8, Fathi) reports, "Iran's largest newspaper on Tuesday announced an international competition for Holocaust cartoons to retaliate against the publication of cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad in Danish newspapers last year." The daily newspaper Hamshahri "said it wanted to see whether freedom of expression extended to mocking the Holocaust." The newspaper said,

"The serious question for Muslims is whether the West extends freedom of expression to the crimes committed by the United States and Israel, or an event such as the Holocaust. … Or is its freedom only for insulting religious sanctities?"

ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 3, 2:10, Watts) reported, "And also a new twist -- the leading newspaper announced a competition: Who can draw the best cartoon lampooning the Holocaust." US reaction "was swift." Assistant Secretary of State Sean McCormack: "Any attempt to mock or in any way denigrate the horror that was the Holocaust is simply outrageous." Watt: "Moderate Muslims say this retaliation is offensive, but not blasphemous."

Editor Solicited Muslim Cartoons In Response To Reports Of Muslim Censorship. The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Sullivan) reports, "The global furor over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad can be traced to one day last September when newspaper editor Flemming Rose smelled a good story." Rose "said he'd read that museums in Sweden and London had recently removed artworks their staff deemed offensive to Muslims. A Danish comedian told him that he felt free to desecrate the Bible but that he'd be afraid to do the same to the Koran." He "suspected the art world was self-censoring out of fear of Islamic radicals. So he contacted 25 Danish newspaper cartoonists with a challenge: Draw Muhammad as you see him. Twelve responded, and the newspaper printed their submissions, including one that depicted Islam's holiest figure with a bomb in his turban."

Prophet's Image In Paintings Has Failed To Generate Controversy In Past. The Washington Times (2/8, Sands) reports, "Lost in the furor over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad is the fact that his likeness has long been portrayed in the collections of some of the world's greatest museums and libraries without exciting alarm or comment." Although "rare in the 1,400 years of Islamic art, depictions of Muhammad are found in the collections of such institutions as New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Bibliotheque Nationale de France in Paris and the Edinburgh University library." None has "aroused the anger seen in reaction to a set of satirical cartoons."

Similarly, Amir Taheri, the author of "L'Irak: Le Dessous Des Cartes" in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) notes, "The claim that the ban on depicting Muhammad and other prophets is an absolute principle of Islam is also refuted by history." And "Islamic ethics is based on 'limits and proportions,' which means that the answer to an offensive cartoon is a cartoon, not the burning of embassies or the kidnapping of people designated as the enemy. Islam rejects guilt by association. Just as Muslims should not blame all Westerners for the poor taste of a cartoonist who wanted to be offensive, those horrified by the spectacle of rent-a-mob sackings of embassies in the name of Islam should not blame all Muslims for what is an outburst of fascist energy."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (2/8, A18) editorializes, "The Taliban is probably behind violent demonstrations in Afghanistan. … And the Bush administration has rightly fingered the secular but cynical government of Syria for orchestrating the burning of embassies in Damascus and Beirut." Conflict "between Muslims and the West is the fondest ambition of al Qaeda, the Taliban and other terrorist organizations. … But it also is a convenient refuge for authoritarian regimes hoping to resist the rising pressure for political liberalization in the Middle East." The Post concludes, "The few heroes in this sordid episode reside not in continental newsrooms but in the Middle East. In Jordan…two editors bravely republished the offensive cartoons; they now face prosecution. In Iraq, the Shiite Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani condemned the Muslim inciters. It's not an accident that these Arab voices of reason are also leading proponents of democracy: They, more than anyone, are the ones deserving of the West's support."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8) in an editorial in its Opinion Asia section writes, "Violence surrounding the Danish cartoon scandal is now leaking into Asia, home to some of the world's most populous and diverse Muslim nations. Yet despite the disquieting reports, reasonable voices of moderation exist. That is, at least, encouraging. The discouraging bit comes when moderate Asian leaders shy away from the vigorous public debate needed to head off future flare-ups." The Journal faults Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi's and Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono's failure to support newspapers' right to publish controversial cartoons because "freedom of the press is paramount for a healthy democracy. … Just look at the radicalization of Muslims in China or Saudi Arabia for an example of how suppression breeds discontent. Malaysia and Indonesia, two young, Muslim-dominated democracies, can take a different path.

Syndicated columnist Kathleen Parker, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/8) writes, "What's clear is that East and West are not just cultures apart, but centuries, and that certain elements of the Muslim world would like to drag us back into the Dark Ages." And Western leaders "have been weak-spined when it comes to defending the principles of free expression that the artists in Denmark were exploring." As "President Bush and Clinton were feeling the pain of religious fanatics, marauders were burning Danish government buildings in Beirut, and Damascus, Syria, and promising Londoners a 9/11 of their own. Such are the fruits of appeasement." Parker states, "There is no equivalence between organized murder on behalf of a malignant social system and a half-dozen nerdy artists, speaking only for themselves, lampooning a fanatical religious sect whose members, by the way, specifically advance the delightful goal of exterminating millions of 'infidels.'"

Souheila al-Jadda, a journalist and member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/8) writes that "these provocative cartoon portrayals came as no surprise to many in the Islamic world. Protesters see this as a pattern of Western attacks against Islam and Muslims -- especially after reports of desecration of the Islamic holy book, the Quran, at the U.S. facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; the abuse of prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan; and the banning of the headscarf, hijab, in public schools in France. Muslims are asking themselves, what's next?" And although "Danish editors are free to publish such cartoons, Muslims are also free to express outrage. The republishing of the caricatures fueled even more anger because it was understood as a message from Europe that their protests, which are part and parcel of free expression, mean nothing." But "the ransacking of embassies and churches as well as the targeting of European nationals by demonstrators must be strongly condemned. These acts only serve to reinforce the very stereotypes Muslims are protesting."

Anne Applebaum in her column in the Washington Post (2/8, A19) writes, "Of course, some good may come out of this story, even in this country. If nothing else, this controversy should bring an end to that naive, charming and sadly incorrect American theory of international relations that 'the more we all learn about one another, the less we will fight.' Gradually, the Islamic world is learning that we don't respect religion in the same manner they do. Slowly, we are learning that they feel differently about the printed word, and the printed picture, from us. And somehow, I've got a feeling that this new knowledge will be not the beginning of understanding but the inspiration for more violence."

WTO Rules For US In Dispute Over GM Biotech Dispute. The New York Times (2/8, Pollack) reports, "The United States won a closely watched trade dispute yesterday when the World Trade Organization ruled that the European Union breached international rules by restricting imports of genetically modified crops and food made from them." The decision, which "was not made public but was discussed by federal trade officials," also "represents a victory for the agricultural biotechnology industry, which for years has been battling opposition to its products from consumers and governments in Europe and some other countries." Europe "could ignore the ruling and instead accept retaliatory tariffs on some of its exports to the United States."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Miller, Kilman) reports, "US officials said the finding against the EU sends an important warning to other parts of the world -- particularly nations in Africa and Asia -- against following the European lead in throwing up bans or partial bans against genetically modified crops." The US "has waged an intensive campaign to pry open the EU market, in large part because US biotechnology officials still hope Western Europe some day could be a rich market for their genetically modified seeds."

The Financial Times (2/8, Alden, Grant, Minder) reports the ruling was "castigated by environmental and consumer groups who charged the ruling was a blatant example of international trade rules running roughshod over democratic decisions aimed at protecting consumer health and safety." The Times adds, "A US trade official, briefing reporters on the confidential decision that was released to the countries involved in the dispute late yesterday, said: 'We're please with the outcome. We're not at the end of the road, but it's a significant milestone.'" USA Today (2/8, Weise) and Washington Post (2/8, D1, Gillis, Blustein) also report the story.

Sheriff Tells Congress Mexican Military Was Involved In Border Incident. The Washington Times (2/8, Dinan) reports Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West "and his deputy told Congress yesterday they had 'no doubt' that Mexican military crossed the US border in Texas on Jan. 23, even as Mexican officials announced they have concluded it was known drug traffickers instead." West said,

"There's no doubt in my mind there was Mexican military involvement. I've seen it too many times over the years." During a hearing yesterday before a House Homeland Security Committee's investigations subcommittee, "Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar and Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Elizabeth Whitaker said the federal government will wait for an investigation by the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement before drawing conclusions. Chief Aguilar said the number of incursions is decreasing. Asked what help Congress could provide, he said the executive branch is doing enough and he did 'not want to leave the impression our borders are besieged.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Timiraos) reports "Aguilar, told the lawmakers that the United States did not have proof that the individuals in military uniforms were Mexican soldiers, but added that nothing had been ruled out. 'If they weren't Mexican military, why is Mexico just sitting back and allowing this to happen?' said T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, a 10,500-member union of Border Patrol agents. He decried a 'culture of corruption' that allows cartels to operate freely along the border by bribing Mexican authorities." Meanwhile, "Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West warned that inaction could prompt even more daring raids by smugglers. 'It is just a matter of time that the drug cartels will wire their drug loads with explosives and, when caught by law enforcement personnel, detonate the load vehicle,' he said."

McCaul Says Mexican Incursions Into US Are "Out Of Control." Rep. Michael McCaul was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/7) if incursions into the US by the Mexican military is an escalating problem. McCaul said, "We have had over 200 incursions by the Mexican military over the last decade. … Violence on the border is really getting to the point where we are in a crisis. It really -- we talked to the five sheriffs, they testified before my committee. Whether you think they are military, whether you think they were cartels buying the military or cartels dressed up like military, they had 50-caliber weapons and Humvees. These pose a serious threat to law enforcement on the United States side. They are doing everything from throwing rocks on fire to taking shots at them. We have photographs of people on the other side of the border, Mexicans, literally shooting with their weapons. This is really getting out of control, and we need to do something about it."

Half Of "Granny Brigade" Attends Minuteman Rally In Washington. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Morello, Londoño, Klein) reports on Carmen Mercer's trip through the Washington D.C. area as she travels to a "Capitol Hill rally by the Minuteman Project." Mercer "has headed into the Arizona desert in her Chevrolet pickup" on many nights to patrol the border with another woman. "Locals call them the Granny Brigade." Following Mercer from the airport and around the D.C. area, the Post notes the foreign origins of several of the people she comes in contact with. "In the Washington region, where an estimated one in six residents is foreign-born, she would see a thousand faces of immigration during her visit."

Olmert Unveils Plan To Establish Israel-Palestine Borders. The New York Times (2/8, Myre) reports, "Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said in a television interview broadcast on Tuesday that he wanted to set the country's permanent borders, with Israel giving up significant parts of the West Bank but keeping the largest Jewish settlement blocs." Olmert "says a top priority would be establishing Israel's frontiers, with or without an agreement with the Palestinians." Olmert said, "The direction is clear: we are headed toward a separation from the Palestinians. … We will hold on to the main settlement blocs. But the borders we have in mind are not those Israel has today."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Ellingwood) notes it was Olmert's "latest effort to step out of Sharon's shadow and craft his own image, reintroducing himself to Israelis and the world at an exceedingly delicate moment." He "sidestepped the issue of whether he would push for additional unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank after Israel's pullout last summer from the Gaza Strip and four communities in the West Bank" and "expressed support for the U.S.-backed diplomatic blueprint known as the road map," yet "in outlining possible future boundaries that would exclude much of the West Bank, Olmert left open at least the possibility of additional pullbacks by Israel."

USA Today (2/8) in a brief article adds, "Olmert said Israel would retain a 'united Jerusalem,' a term understood as including the eastern part of the city where a large population of Arabs reside."

Hamas Leader Expected To Be Selected As Prime Minister. Reuters (2/8, Perry) reports, "A leader of the Islamist Hamas group said on Tuesday it was very likely that one of its members would become Palestinian prime minister." Asked if "a Hamas member would become the new prime minister, Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh told Reuters in Cairo: 'This is highly expected.' But it was too soon to talk about names, he said."

US, South Korea Discuss Free Trade Deal. The New York Times (2/8, Brooke) reports, "South Korean and American negotiators have started a one-year drive to draw up the United States' largest free trade accord since Nafta went into effect." For the US, "the temptation to win better access to the seventh-largest export market is expected to carry more weight than objections from auto and steel manufacturers." It is not clear "whether both countries can negotiate" the deal "before President Bush's fast-track trade negotiating authority expires next year" yet US ambassador to Japn Thomas Schieffer "recalled the pessimism expressed when President Bush and Prime Minister John Howard of Australia announced in 2003 that their two countries would negotiate a free trade pact in one year."

US Navy Destroyer Boarded Suspected Pirate Ship In Indian Ocean. The Washington Times (2/8, Halloran) reports, "The United States was striking a pre-emptive blow when it ordered a US Navy destroyer to detain and board a suspected pirate ship in the Indian Ocean last month, aiming to see that terrorists do not lash up with pirates in the Asia-Pacific region." The destroyer, the USS Winston S. Churchill, "was ordered to intercept the suspected pirate ship on Jan. 21 after the U.S. Central Command, from its forward headquarters in Bahrain in the Persian Gulf, was contacted by the International Maritime Bureau, based in Malaysia. The maritime bureau monitors piracy all over the world, but especially in Asia." The Times adds, "It took the US warship several hours of maneuvering and firing warning shots to get the smaller vessel to surrender. A Navy boarding party then confiscated a cache of small arms to disarm the ship before sending it on its way."

Polling Stations Jammed In Haitian Presidential Elections. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Dahlburg, Regnault) reports, "Haitians wearied by spiraling unrest and gang violence turned out in huge numbers Tuesday to choose a new president and parliament, and perhaps put their impoverished Caribbean homeland on the path to greater prosperity and peace." The Times adds "people in line were trampled by other would-be voters frantic to cast their ballot. According to local news reports, one person died of a heart attack, and another of asphyxia."

ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 5, :10, Vargas) reported "there were accusations of fraud in some poor neighborhoods. Haiti is the poorest country in the hemisphere. It has fallen into chaos lately." The Washington Post (2/8, A11, Roig-Franzia) reports the elections "unfurled chaotically Tuesday but turned peaceful and orderly toward evening." Voters "overwhelmed badly prepared polling places." USA Today (2/8, Harman) and New York Times (2/8, Thompson) also report the story.

Nepal To Vote For Local Officials Today. The New York Times/AP (2/8) reports, "The government ordered security forces on Tuesday to shoot anyone who tried to interfere with elections on Wednesday for mayors and local officials." The balloting "will be the first in seven years, but nearly all the major political parties are boycotting it, calling the vote a sham intended to legitimize King Gyanendra's rule." The AP adds, "Maoist insurgents have threatened to kill anyone who votes. Two candidates have been killed, prompting the government to take out life insurance policies worth up to $10,300 for the more than 2,000 candidates."

The Washington Post (2/8, A11, Lancaster) reports, "Barely a year after seizing absolute power, King Gyanendra is a monarch under siege -- shunned by former allies, struggling to contain a raging Maoist insurgency and confronting a new alliance between the rebels and mainstream political parties that dismiss as farce his plans for restoring democracy." The parties "are boycotting municipal elections scheduled for Wednesday, a step that in combination with Maoist threats has ensured that more than half of the 4,000-plus local seats will not even be contested. The Maoists are also enforcing a week-long general strike that has paralyzed normal life in cities and towns throughout the country." The Post adds, "So tenuous is the king's position that some Nepalese journalists and analysts have begun to speculate about the odds of a military coup, or perhaps a hurried departure by the royal family in the dead of night."

Report Details Increase In US Assistance To Fight AIDS. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Phillips) reports, "The U.S. provided life-extending drugs to nearly half-a-million AIDS patients in the developing world last year, marking a sharp increase in access to antiretroviral treatment, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa, according to a government report to be released today." The Journal notes, "Administration officials hope the report will spur Congress to meet Mr. Bush's new budget request and prompt other wealthy nations to increase their AIDS funding. 'People are alive today because the United States has turned its words into action,' wrote Randall Tobias, the administration's global AIDS coordinator."

Russia Seeks To Boost Credibility By Paying Off Debt, Becoming Donor. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Chazan) reports, "Flush with petrodollars, Russia…said it will pay off a big chunk of its sovereign debt ahead of schedule this year." That "will improve Russia's credibility as it takes up the rotating presidency of the G-8 and help deflect claims from some in the West that it is too small economically to be a member of the exclusive club." In addition, "Russia is also discussing the possibility of becoming a major donor to the International Development Association. … It also announced plans to forgive $668 million owed it by 16 of the world's highly indebted countries, most of them in Africa." It is "a huge turnaround for a country that barely eight years ago defaulted on its domestic debt and devalued the ruble. Russia is also far advanced in talks to join the World Trade Organization, with bilateral deals reached with most of its trading partners except the U.S."

Nigerian Military Leader Warns Of Continued Unrest As Election Approach. The Financial Times (2/8, Mahtani) reports, "The commander of Nigeria's military operation in the oil-rich Niger delta has warned of more unrest there as Africa's biggest oil producer and most populous nation heads towards national elections next year." Increased "ethnic and political tensions ahead of next month's national census and the 2007 elections are a worry for both multinational oil companies and Nigeria, which produces about 2.5m barrels of oil a day."

Scientists Describe Expedition To Study Rare Species. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Nakashima) in a front page story reports, "A team of scientists has discovered a lost world of rare plants, giant flowers and bizarre animals…on a mist-shrouded mountaintop in a remote province of Indonesia on New Guinea island." They "found more than 40 species new to science." Bruce Beehler, an ornithologist with Conservation International in Washington and the expedition's co-leader said, "I know the Bush administration is talking about going back to the moon and going to Mars. … But there are plenty of new things to look for right here, in our rain forests, in our oceans. There are whole worlds that are unknown to us."

Georgia Urged To Build Relations With West. Former Estonian Prime Minister Mart Laar in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) writes, "There are two main lessons Georgia can learn from" the energy disruptions from Russia. Georgia first "has to continue its integration with West." In addition "the crisis indicated that Georgia has to end its near total dependence on Russian energy sources." Georgia "needs the chance to restore its territorial integrity and find a peaceful solution for the problems of South Ossetia and Abkhazia. Russia's so-called 'peacekeeping' troops in these territories are not protecting the peace, but rather the pieces of the Russian empire. They must be sent home if the situation is to be normalized. Georgia can't be seen as just another little known country that is too far away from the Western world."

Columnist Blames NAFTA For Increase In Illegal Immigration From Mexico. Harold Myerson in his column in the Washington Post (2/8, A19) writes, "With the number of immigrants illegally in the United States estimated at 11 million, the tensions between Americans and Mexicans -- chiefly, working-class Americans and working-class Mexicans -- are rising. And those are tensions that congressional Republicans, who don't look to have a lot of other issues they can run on this fall, are eager to stoke." Meyerson says the boom in illegal immigration is "not because we've let down our guard at the border…the border is more militarized now than it's ever been. The answer is actually simpler than that. In large part, it's NAFTA." For example NAFTA put Mexican farmers "in direct competition with incomparably more efficient U.S. agribusinesses. It proved to be no contest: From 1993 through 2002, at least 2 million Mexican farmers were driven off their land." Meyerson concludes, "So long as the global economy is designed, as NAFTA was, to keep workers powerless, Mexican desperation and American anger will only grow. Forget the fence. We need a new rulebook for the world."

WSJournal Notes Recent Voinovich Support For Bolton. The Wall Street Journal (2/8) editorializes that after Sen. George Voinovich's recent praise of U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton, "We called the Senator's office to confirm he was talking about the same guy he had pilloried just eight months before. Lo, he was.

'He's doing a good job, I wouldn't say great,' says a Voinovich spokeswoman of Mr. Bolton. She adds that by 'following up' regularly with the Senator, Mr. Bolton's diplomatic skills appear to be getting better, particularly in building coalitions for U.N. reform." The Journal concludes, "No doubt Mr. Bolton is deeply grateful for the counsel of his newfound mentor. But we hope it's not rude to point out that perhaps Mr. Bolton is the same fellow he's always been, and with the same skills. Maybe Mr. Voinovich is the one who's learning on the job. In any case, we look forward to the Senator's 'aye' vote if the President renominates Mr. Bolton for confirmation by the full Senate next January."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Says Administration Has Legal Authority For NSA Surveillance Program. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) if President Bush is willing to work with Congress to settle the legal disputes about the domestic spying program. Cheney said, "We believe that we have all the legal authority we need. He indicated the other day he's willing to listen to ideas from the Congress, and certainly they have the right and the responsibility to suggest whatever they want to suggest. We'd have to make a decision as an Administration whether or not we think it would help and would enhance our capabilities. But as I say, we believe firmly that based on the Constitution, based on the authorization for the use of force Congress passed in the immediate aftermath of 9/11, that we have all the legal authority we need with respect to the NSA program." Cheney also said that the domestic surveillance program "has produced intelligence for us that has been very valuable in the global war on terror both in terms of saving lives and breaking up plots directed at the United States. It has been a very useful source of intelligence for us and we need to continue the program."

Fox News' Special Report (2/7, Angle) reported, "The Vice President says the Administration has looked at the legal questions and reached a firm conclusion." Cheney: We believe, firmly, that based on The Constitution, based on the authorization for the use of force Congress passed in the immediate aftermath of 9/11, that we have all the legal authority we need." Fox continued, "But a leading Democratic critic went on the floor of the Senate Tuesday afternoon to blast the program, the president and even his own colleagues." Sen. Russ Feingold "criticized Democrats, as well as Republicans, for applauding the president when he talked about the N.S.A. program during his State of the Union address."

Reuters (2/8, Holland) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "resisted bipartisan appeals for changes in a hotly disputed warrantless eavesdropping program, saying he believed 'we have all the legal authority we need.'" Still, Cheney "said Bush had indicated he was willing to listen to ideas from the U.S. Congress and that members of Congress certainly have the right to suggest changes."

The AP (2/8) reports Vice President Cheney "shrugged off congressional criticism of the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program Tuesday, suggesting some in the know who previously raised no objections were changing their tune. He also expressed little interest in working with Congress to settle legal disputes."

The New York Daily News (2/8, Meek) reports that as Vice President Cheney "launched a preemptive strike against a GOP insurrection on Capitol Hill, top sources from both parties made clear they weren't impressed with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' arguments on Monday that National Security Agency wiretapping inside the U.S. broke no laws." Senior Capitol Hill aides "told the Daily News they expect bipartisan legislation that might put the controversial NSA domestic spying programs under the scrutiny of the supersecret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court."

Cheney Responds To Graham Comments About Program. Cheney was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) about Sen. Lindsey Graham's comment that if the Administration uses the force resolution as a legal justification for the domestic surveillance program, when "this President or the next president comes and asks for a force resolution from Congress, there could be all kinds of exceptions." Cheney said, "I think people are straining here to try to find an issue to some extent. … Incident to the authorization of the use of force, military force, clearly I would expect would be a decision that that implies as well the ability to intercept the communications of the enemy. That's an inherent part of warfare. … Now, there may be suggestions from some that we need to have some additional authorization passed and we don't believe it's required, but as the president said the other day, we're perfectly willing to listen to suggestions from the Congress."

Wilson First Republican To Call For Full Congressional Investigation Of NSA Program. The New York Times (2/8, Lichtblau) reports Rep. Heather Wilson, "whose subcommittee oversees the National Security Agency," yesterday "broke ranks with the White House…and called for a full Congressional inquiry into the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program." Rep. Wilson, "chairwoman of the House Intelligence Subcommittee on Technical and Tactical Intelligence, said in an interview that she had 'serious concerns' about the surveillance program. By withholding information about its operations from many lawmakers, she said, the administration has deepened her apprehension about whom the agency is monitoring and why." The Times adds Wilson is the "first Republican on either the House's Intelligence Committee or the Senate's to call for a full Congressional investigation into the program."

Harman Says Full Intelligence Panel Should Be Briefed On Surveillance Program. Rep. Jane Harman, ranking member of the House Intelligence Committee, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/7), "Now that the existence of the program has been disclosed by the president in response to some leaks to The New York Times, I have had a chance to check with some real experts on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. I believe the entire program could be covered under FISA, and it is not. And I'm baffled why the administration is declaring that it has inherent power to do this, disregarding laws that Congress intended to be the exclusive means to eavesdrop on Americans." Harman added, "The way this should be done is now that the program has been disclosed and is going to be gone over in painstaking detail, at least by the Senate Judicial Committee -- bravo for Chairman Specter, whom I spoke to earlier today and congratulated -- the full Intelligence Committee should be briefed on all aspects of program. We should decide in closed session whether the program complies with the laws that we have enacted. If it does not -- and I'm saying I think it does and those laws should be followed -- if it does not in any way, we should either change the law or change the program."

McCain Says Gonzales Hearing Was "Very Helpful." Sen. John McCain said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/7), "I do believe that there are concerns about how far the government is going, not just on this issue, but on other issues. But you know, the -- the Democrat leaders as well as Republican Intelligence Committee were briefed on this program. And so that -- and I don't know what the program is, and frankly, I probably will never know. But we want to -- we've got to make sure -- there have been abuses in the past by previous administrations, both Democrat and Republican, and I think our job, which is a careful balancing act, is to protect national security, at the same time protect the rights of the individual and there's always that kind of tension. I think that hearing was very helpful yesterday in a variety of ways. We need to have this issue ventilated for the American people."

Senate Seen As Defending Congressional Power Vis-À-Vis Executive. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Chaddock) reports the Senate this week has "opened a broad - and often tense - dialogue with the Bush administration over the president's wartime powers. It's more than just a probe into who authorized what, when, and why in a recently disclosed domestic eavesdropping program. If the president is not checked, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle argue, then the constitutional balance of power could shift away from the Congress for at least a generation." Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "I'm for the president's inherent authority to conduct the war, but not to neuter the other two branches." The Monitor adds that at the "root of congressional worries about the NSA surveillance case is the prospect that such broad interpretations of presidential powers could last well into the future. 'We could be in this war on terror for decades,' says Sen. Sam Brownback (R) of Kansas."

Ignatius Says Partisan Debate Over NSA Surveillance Misplaced. In his Washington Post column (2/8, A19), David Ignatius says, "As quickly as you can say the words 'Karl Rove,' the debate over the National Security Agency's anti-terrorist surveillance program is degenerating into a partisan squabble. Rather than seeking a compromise that would anchor the program in law, both the administration and its critics are pursuing absolutist agendas -- insisting on the primacy of security or liberty, rather than some reasonable balance of the two. This way lies disaster." A "stable, legal foundation for the NSA program can come by placing it under FISA jurisdiction, or by amending FISA, or perhaps by a judicial review that might support the administration's argument that Article II trumps FISA. Instead, we have none of the above."

Rivkin, Casey Say Congress Should Exercise Oversight Over NSA Program. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/8), David Rivkin and Lee Casey, alumni of the Bush 41 and Reagan Justice Departments, say, "Although enhanced congressional oversight of the NSA program may well be constitutionally permissible and even sensible as a policy matter, the requirement of a warrant for this type of surveillance would trench upon the president's constitutional power as commander in chief to monitor enemy communications in wartime." Even the NSA program's "fiercest foes don't claim that it was designed or administered for snooping on the president's 'enemies' or critics." Rivkin and Casey conclude, "In short, there is no obviously constitutional and practical means of subjecting NSA's al Qaeda surveillance program to regular judicial review. Instead, Congress must itself shoulder the responsibility. It might enact a new FISA that would fully bless the president's activities, but add enhanced oversight, involving more information sharing with more members of Congress, backed up by the threat to use its fiscal powers to de-fund the program if abuses arise."

NYTimes Says Gonzales Failed To Answer Senators' Questions. The New York Times (2/8) says in an editorial, "We thought President Bush's two recent Supreme Court nominees set new lows when it came to giving vague and meaningless answers to legitimate questions, but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made them look like models of openness when he testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday about domestic spying. Mr. Gonzales seems to have forgotten the promise he made to the same panel last year when it voted to promote him from White House counsel to attorney general: that he would serve the public interest and stop acting like a hired gun helping a client figure out how to evade the law."

More Commentary. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/8) editorializes, "Anyone who hoped that Monday's hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee would shed new light on whether the Bush administration is violating the law by conducting secret wiretaps on the international e-mails and telephone conversations of Americans was bound to have been sorely disappointed. Although he spent more than seven hours under sometimes sharp questioning, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales supplied virtually no new facts or insights that would help Americans make a more informed judgment about this important matter. One can only hope that Gonzales will be more forthcoming when, as expected, he comes to Capitol Hill to meet with the committee a second time."

The Providence Journal (2/8) editorializes, "U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales's testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee Monday about the National Security Agency's warrantless watching of U.S. citizens was not comforting. … In effect, he insisted that Article II of the Constitution lets the president ignore the legal duty to consult the two other branches of government in making such surveillance policies. … That al-Qaida poses perils must not be used as an excuse for ignoring the need to clearly follow the law. U.S. law, if followed, protects us from being victimized by U.S. officials who might have reasons other than national security to invade privacy and obtain personal information about us."

In a column for the San Francisco Chronicle (2/8), Debra J. Saunders writes, "If anyone can show me that the National Security Agency, under order from President Bush or top aides, eavesdropped on Hillary Clinton or Ted Kennedy or some prominent partisan critic, I'll change my tune and see what this administration is doing as a threat to civil liberties. Until then, I can only see the attacks on an NSA surveillance program -- on Monday the Senate Judiciary Committee grilled Attorney General Alberto Gonzales over the program that allowed officials to mine information from international phone calls and the Internet -- as ill-conceived, partisan and dangerous. … Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chair, has pushed for the administration to ask the FISA court to review the NSA program. 'You think you're right, but there are a lot of people who think you're wrong,' Specter told Gonzales. 'What do you have to lose if you're right?' … The question should be: What does America have to lose? If FISA found against the NSA program, one would hope Congress would pass laws designed to give intelligence officials what they need -- with oversight to prevent abuses. But that may be asking too much."

The Portland Oregonian (2/8) editorializes, "Gonzales testified, in essence, that the Constitution and federal law give the president free rein to spy on people in this county, including American citizens, in the name of fighting terrorism. … Not even the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee buys that argument." The Oregonian adds, "Court-issued warrants, coupled with congressional oversight, are this country's time-tested safeguards. There's no evidence that such checks and balances contributed to the failure to prevent the 9/11 attacks, and there's no truth to the claim that they stand in the way of preventing future attacks. … In the political heat of Monday's hearing, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., claimed the Bush administration says it 'doesn't have to follow the law.' That's inaccurate. The president and his attorney general say they are following the law -- and, more to the point, they've decided what the law says. … All the more reason to support Specter's sensible call for a review by the FISA court."

In a piece posted on Slate.com (2/8), Slate senior editor Emily Bazelon writes, "Given the box Specter constructed for the hearings, what could be learned from them? Actually, the day was pretty instructive, not on the topics of spying or national security, but on the bizarre embrace into which the legislature and the executive have locked themselves since Sept. 11. Congress claims that it wants to exercise its war powers and help set rules for NSA spying—but in fact it's afraid to, for fear of appearing to undermine the president. And the Bush administration acts like it wants to undo the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act—but it fears the public uproar that amending the act would create." Bazelon adds, "The fuss over whether Gonzales should testify under oath seemed to be about the possibility, at least in Specter's mind, that the attorney general was about to say something that could get him into trouble for lying. Gonzales had been sworn in when he testified twice before, as have other Department of Justice officials. Today, though, Specter said such an oath was 'unwarranted' (though Gonzales had agreed to take it). … The Democrats wanted Gonzales sworn in. They made Specter take a roll-call vote, and he had to vote on behalf of two absent Republican senators to break a tie. … Everyone seemed to be rolling up their sleeves for a partisan square-off. … But then some of the Republicans changed their stance. They seemed more worried about a loss of senatorial power than about fighting with the Democrats. And that meant taking issue with Gonzales' theory of executive authority." Bazelon concludes, "How should FISA be amended? Where do you draw the line to protect civil liberties while allowing all the searches that could ever snare a potential terrorist? Those are hard questions—too hard for Congress, it seems. You have to hand it to Bush and Gonzales. They don't have much to work with, legally speaking. But they're playing the politics just right."

In a piece posted on washingtonpost.com (2/8), legal analyst Andrew Cohen writes, "There are remarkable similarities between what happened at Enron before its collapse in 2001 and what is happening now inside the executive branch as it prosecutes the legal war on terrorism.

And it is only now, as the corporate fraud and conspiracy trial of Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay begins in Houston and as we approach the start of Congressional hearings into the White House's domestic surveillance program, that the patterns have emerged with real clarity." Cohen continues, "Federal prosecutors alleged in Houston last week that when Enron didn't like the profit numbers it was seeing from its business efforts, it simply changed the numbers through accounting and financial artifices, with the consent and at the direction of the men who led the company. … Likewise, when the Bush Administration didn't like the way its intelligence surveillance operations were going, it simply changed the rules through novel and as yet untested legal arguments, with the consent of the President and at the direction of his attorney general." Cohen adds, "Enron, we now know, didn't just immediately tumble off the cliff into illegal practices. It inched toward it. … Likewise, the Bush Administration didn't just start out on its current path toward legal and political confrontation (and perhaps constitutional violation) by rewriting surveillance law. The new program is just the latest example in a pattern of unilateral legal action by the White House. In 2002, remember, the White House and Justice Department rewrote the law on torture, implicitly and in some ways explicitly condoning conduct that most reasonable people would consider to be torture. That led us to Abu Ghraib as inexorably as Enron's crooked accounting led to its bankruptcy." Cohen concludes, "Enron's top executives thought they were the 'smartest guys in the room' but in the end, as the title of another Enron-related book goes, it was all just a 'conspiracy of fools.' Many Bush Administration's lawyers and leaders also give off a 'smartest guys in the room' aura, especially when they are interpreting the law in a way it hasn't been before. Whether they are fools, too, or we are, or both, remains unclear."

Lawyers File Suit On Behalf Of US Citizen Held In Iraq For Allegedly Helping Zarqawi. The New York Times (2/8, Lewis) reports attorneys representing Shawqi Ahmad Omar, a 44-year-old naturalized American citizen, "have been pressing a federal district judge to intervene in their client's case, saying that he had been arrested and held in Iraq for more than a year without being charged or given access to a lawyer." The Justice Department he is "a close associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi…and he may be guilty of war crimes," having "been captured…harboring an Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian foreign fighters" that said "Omar was plotting to kidnap foreigners from Baghdad hotels." The Justice Department also "argued that Mr. Omar was not in military custody, the basis under which his lawyers say a federal judge has jurisdiction over his case," but is "held by the Multi-National Force." Omar's lawyers requested that the judge "block any transfer of Mr. Omar to Iraqi government custody, which they said would be a ruse by the United States to avoid federal court jurisdiction."

Muslim Cleric Convicted By UK Jury, Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison. A jury in London on Tuesday convicted radical Muslim cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri on charges of soliciting murder and inciting violence in sermons at his Finsbury Park Mosque, which was attended by shoe-bomber Richard Reid and al Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui. Al-Masri was sentenced to seven years in prison.

The New York Times (2/8, Natta) reports, "The seven-year sentence means that Mr. Masri will most likely serve roughly three and a half years in prison. Under British law, he will not be eligible for extradition until he has completed his sentence here. Mr. Masri's defense lawyer, Edward Fitzgerald, said his client would 'strenuously contest' extradition to the United States." The AP (2/8, Panja) adds, "Authorities in Britain and the United States accuse al-Masri of being at the center of a web of terrorist activity," and "he has been charged in the United States on an 11-count indictment with trying to establish a terrorist training camp in Oregon, conspiring to take hostages in Yemen and facilitating terror training in Afghanistan." DOJ spokesman Bryan Sierra "said the United States 'stands ready to resume the extradition proceedings against Abu Hamza when British law allows.'" NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 4, :55, Williams) also noted, "American authorities are hoping to get him to the US to face trial."

The Financial Times (2/8, Tait, Burns) reports Justice Anthony Hughes said at the sentencing that al-Masri's "views had caused 'real danger to the lives of innocent people in different parts of the world' and helped created an atmosphere 'in which to kill has become regarded by some as...a moral and religious duty in pursuit of perceived justice.' The judge added: 'No one can now say what damage your words may have caused. No one can say whether your audience, present or wider, acted on your words'." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Daniszewski, Stobart) notes the "jury found Masri guilty of 11 charges: six of solicitation to murder; three of using threatening words and behavior with intent to foment racial hatred; one of possessing audiotapes intended to stir up racial hatred; and one for possessing an 'Encyclopedia of Afghani Jihad,' which prosecutors described as a terrorist manual and said was dedicated to Osama bin Laden. (One chapter listed likely terrorist targets such as the Statue of Liberty, the Eiffel Tower and Big Ben in London.)

The Washington Post (2/8, A12, Jordan) reports, "In a surprise announcement, Scotland Yard said after the verdict was announced that officers who raided Masri's Finsbury Park mosque in 2003 had seized guns for firing blanks, a stun gun, a gas mask, blank passports, hunting knives and other items. Officials said that information was not publicly disclosed in an effort not to prejudice the trial, which involved other charges. 'What place do these things have in a place of worship?' asked Peter Clarke, head of Scotland Yard's terrorist branch. Clarke told reporters he could only conclude that the items were for 'some form of training or training camps.'"

US Seeks Extradition Of Kassir From Czech Republic. The Czech news agency CTK (2/8) reports, "The Justice Ministry has received an official U.S. application for the extradition of Oussama Kassir, a Swede of Lebanese origin, who was detained in Prague on suspicion of terrorism, ministry spokesman Petr Dimun said. 'The application was immediately handed to the relevant state attorney's office. The admissibility of extradition will be assessed by court and the decision on the extradition will be made by the justice minister (Pavel Nemec),' Dimun said." CTK notes, "Kassir allegedly participated in building a training camp for Jihad in Oregon, USA. The trained Muslims were to move to Afghanistan."

German High Court Orders Alleged Al Qaeda Member Released Pending Appeal. The New York Times (2/8, Landler) reports the German Federal Constitutional Court on Tuesday ordered the release of Moroccan Mounir el-Motassadeq, "who had been convicted of belonging to a cell of Al Qaeda whose members included the Sept. 11 hijackers, pending an appeal of his case," in which "he was sentenced to seven years in prison." The constitutional court "ruled that the lower court had been wrong to put him jail, because he posed no greater risk of fleeing than during his first appeal. As a condition of his release, he is not allowed to leave Germany and must turn in his passport to authorities." Motassadeq "could still serve his sentence if an appeals court upholds the lower court's conviction."

Agence France-Presse (2/8) reports, "Motassadeq left the prison in the company of his lawyer on Tuesday evening, according to journalists at the scene." AFP adds, "He was found guilty in August in a retrial of belonging to a terrorist organization for plotting holy war with fellow Muslim extremists, including three of the September 11 suicide hijackers. … He was jailed for seven years but both the prosecution and the defense have appealed the sentence. … His lawyer Gerhard Strate told AFP he filed the suit demanding Motassadeq's release with the federal constitutional court in the southwestern city of Karlsruhe on the grounds that he had been held in custody during the year-long retrial."

Mueller Discusses Security, Counter-Terrorism With Moroccan King. Under the headline "No Country Or Agency Could Be Successful Without Cooperation, FBI Head," The Morocco Times (2/8, Rhanem) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller "said that no country or agency in the world can be successful without cooperation. 'Countries have to work closely together in an era of globalization and technology to exchange information to prevent attacks and criminals from from preying on our people,' he told Morocco Times. 'Therefore associations and friendships between our countries are exceptionally important,' he added. Mueller also said that the FBI has also addressed ways to cooperate with Moroccan security officials to exchange information in policing and fingerprints and DNA databases. The FBI head was received on Tuesday in Rabat by HM King Mohammed VI. 'I have discussed with King Mohammed VI the fact that the War on Terror addresses certainly those few individuals who would undertake terrorist attacks,' Mueller told Morocco Times. 'But this also means that we have to work with the social structure, developing jobs and opportunities that King Mohammed VI has in his vision over the last several years. My discussion indicated how it is important to compliment him on addressing these issues,' he stressed."

Agence France Presse (2/8) reports Mueller and King Mohammed "held talks…on security cooperation and the fight against terrorism, officials said. Also present at the meeting were the United States ambassador to Morocco, Thomas Riley, the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigations' (FBI) Rabat office, Lauren Anderson, Moroccan Interior Minister Mostafa Sahel and intelligence chiefs Hamidou Laanigri and Abdellatif Hammouchi."

US Officials Confirm FBI Passed Tip About London Bomber To UK Before Attack. The AP (2/8, Hays) reports, "U.S. officials confirmed reports on Tuesday that a terror informant arrested in 2004 identified one of the London transit system suicide bombers as a possible threat. But the officials said the tip was too vague to foil last year's deadly attack. The FBI passed on the warning about Mohammed Sidique Khan to British authorities before the bombings…according to two U.S. law enforcement officials based in New York. The informant, Mohammed Junaid Babar, identified Khan as a potential terrorist," but he "offered no specific information about a plot targeting the transit system." The AP notes, "Britain's Home Office and London's Metropolitan Police have refused to comment on Babar's claims about intelligence related to Khan, citing government policy not to discuss issues of security or intelligence." The UK's ITN (2/7) briefly reports yesterday's New York Daily News article which broke the story.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS, FBI Warn Of Prepaid Cell Phone Purchases By Terrorists. CNN's The Situation Room (2/7, Arena) reported, "The Department of Homeland Security and the FBI sent out a bulletin to law enforcement partners today. It basically says that there are some individuals who have made bulk purchases of prepaid cell phones who may have links to terrorist organizations. Now…buying these types of cell phones in bulk and reselling them at a higher price is big business on the black market. FBI analysts conclude that if terrorists are involved it's probably to raise money. It's also important to point out that cell phones have also been used by terrorists as improvised explosive devices, as we saw in the Madrid train attack. But the bulletin says that it's unlikely that these purchases have links to IED construction."

Security Screening Test Begins At New Jersey Rail Stations. The Washington Post (2/8, A6, Garcia) reports that at the PATH station in Jersey city, "Manhattan-bound commuters passed through metal detectors and shoved their briefcases and knapsacks through X-ray machines Tuesday in the first test of airport-style security in a rail system. Government screeners searched bags and scanned passengers for explosives, but unlike in airports, commuters did not have to remove their shoes or change and cell phones from their pockets. Officials hope the screening won't take more than a minute per passenger." DHS spokesman Larry Orluskie said the 30-day pilot project is intended "collect information on customer wait times and impact on operations. The idea is to not hinder people."

The New York Times (2/8, McGeehan) reports, "During rush hours, the screeners choose subjects at a predetermined rate, maybe every eighth passenger. At slower times, they may switch to screening all of them or all of those with larger bags, officials said. Riders who decline to participate in the test will be free to walk away unless one of the two Port Authority police officers standing by considers their behavior suspicious, said an official overseeing the test."

Port Association Chairman Urges More Support For Port Infrastructure, Security. Bernard Groseclose, president and CEO of the South Carolina State Ports Authority and chairman of the board of the American Association of Port Authorities, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (2/8) writes that "the US port industry is facing unprecedented challenges that should concern every American consumer, as well as the president and Congress. If unaddressed, these challenges could weaken the nation's supply chain and economic vitality. Port security remains a critical issue in this post-September 11 world." Groseclose states, "The release Monday of the president's fiscal 2007 budget presents a timely opportunity to reflect on the nation's commitment to port infrastructure and its security. … It is vital that the federal government uphold its end of the partnership with public port authorities and help ensure that America's ports remain both secure and efficient."

DHS Seeks Another $41.7 Million To Implement Pay System. The Washington Post (2/8, B2, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Department of Homeland Security is asking Congress for an extra $41.7 million in fiscal 2007 to continue setting up its new pay and personnel system, MaxHR, which will replace the GS system used across the government for decades. The increase, if approved, would bring total funding for MaxHR to $71.4 million. … The President's fiscal 2007 budget, released Monday, would allow Homeland Security to continue with the design of its market-based pay system, create a compensation committee and continue training supervisors and managers. … During fiscal 2007, Homeland Security officials expect to phase in pay-for-performance and market-based systems. The department's budget request seeks funding for 16 positions to administer the performance-based pay system. In addition, the budget request would finance two new positions to address hiring problems across the department. Federal managers, including Homeland Security officials, are increasingly complaining that hiring takes too long."

Leader Selected For 9/11 Museum. The New York Times (2/8, Pogrebin) reports Alice M. Greenwald has been chosen "to guide a much-disputed 9/11 museum into existence at ground zero." The initial reaction to Greenwald, an associate director for museum programs at the Holocaust Museum in Washington, "seemed positive. Monica Iken, founder of September's Mission, whose husband, Michael, died in the south tower of the World Trade Center, said yesterday that Ms. Greenwald 'has done an exemplary job at the Holocaust Museum.'"

FEMA's Overall Disaster Response Rated As "Adequate." The Washington Post (2/8, A17, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Despite the awful press, FEMA's overall 'disaster response' has been deemed 'adequate,' according to a new government Web site. The site -- http://www.expectmore.gov -- provides the public with assessments of how federal programs are operating. … Most everyone, with maybe one prominent exception, thinks that former FEMA director Michael ('Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job') Brown led a hurricane rescue effort that was itself a disaster. So if FEMA is 'adequate,' exactly what do you have to do to flunk? Turns out it is the lowest rating given for programs deemed to be 'performing.' The ratings are 'effective, moderately effective, or adequate,' the site explains. 'Adequate' means 'a program that needs to set more ambitious goals, achieve better results, improve accountability or strengthen its management practices.'"

Blanco Threatens To Block Energy Leases Unless Louisiana Gets Its "Fair Share." The New York Times (2/8, Rivlin) reports, "Seeking more money from Washington for hurricane relief, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco entered uncharted legal territory with a threat on Monday to block oil and gas leases worth hundreds of millions to the federal treasury unless the state received its 'fair share' of the revenues. 'It's time to play hardball, as I believe that's the only game Washington understands,' Ms. Blanco said Monday night as she opened the second special legislative session she has called since Hurricanes Katrina and Rita." However, "It remains to be seen whether the governor has the authority to block the leases. By statute, the Minerals Management Service, the agency in the Interior Department that oversees offshore leases, has to seek comment from the affected governors. It is not clear what occurs if a governor refuses to approve a pact."

Evacuees Protest End Of Hotel Payments. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 8, 1:45, Williams) reported, "There was a protest in New York City today. That's not usual but this is. The folks who were protesting were refugees from Hurricane Katrina. A number of them have been living for all these months in hotels throughout the city. Some people have been living at an airport hotel at New York's JFK airport. The protesters are all facing eviction starting tomorrow so today they gathered on the steps of New York City Hall, appealing for more time. FEMA for its part says the deadline to apply for an extension has passed but some of the protests insist they did apply in time but are tangled up in a bureaucratic mess."

The AP (2/7) reported, "The occupants of more than 4,500 government-paid hotel rooms were ordered to turn in their keys Tuesday, as the Federal Emergency Management Agency began cutting off money to pay for their stays. Far more people -- the occupants of at least 20,000 hotel rooms, many of which housed entire families -- were given extensions by FEMA until at least next week and possibly until March 1, said FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney. FEMA said it gave people every possible opportunity to request an extension." Meanwhile, "FEMA maintains that as many as 80 percent of those being forced to check out this week have made other living arrangements, ranging from trailers to receiving federal rent assistance to living with relatives." The AP noted, "In New York, around 50 protesters including both evacuees and activists gathered at the steps of City Hall to protest the evictions. In Oakland, Calif., demonstrators carrying signs and chanting 'Evict FEMA' tried to present an eviction notice to employees at a FEMA branch office." A similar version of the AP story ran in the Washington Times.

WAR NEWS:

Cheney Says 2005 Was Turning Point In Iraq. Vice President Dick Cheney said on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) last night, "I think we're making progress against the insurgency. I think we have been now. I think we'll look back several years from now and see that 2005 was really a turning point in the sense of the progress we made, both in terms of training Iraqi forces -- because we've not got a large number of Iraqis taking the lead various placed around the country, from a security and military standpoint -- but also because of the political milestones that were achieved, that -- from the elections in January of '05, the writing of the constitution, the ratification of that constitution in October, the national elections in December under the new constitution. I think those political milestones, every single one of which has been met, are vital in terms of our ultimate success in Iraq of establishing a democratically elected government and a security situation that the Iraqis themselves can handle."

Before Senate Panel, Rumsfeld Says It Will Take Decades To Build Iraqi Infrastructure. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/7, Pilgrim) reported, "Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld today went to Capitol Hill to give testimony about the war in Iraq and the Pentagon's budget." CNN (McIntyre) added, "Rumsfeld and his top generals once again found themselves defending a controversial plan to reorganize the National Guard and Army Reserves, insisting the shift would result in more combat forces, not less."

Reuters (2/8, Allen) reports Rumsfeld said "it will take decades to rebuild Iraq's infrastructure as senators charged the Bush administration had fumbled reconstruction efforts, slowing a US military withdrawal. … Contrary to forecasts of administration officials before the March 2003 invasion, Rumsfeld said, 'It's going to take decades' for Iraq 'to get the infrastructure back to where a modern country would have it.'" The senators also "questioned Pentagon officials on progress in training Iraqi forces, which the administration says is key for withdrawing U.S. troops."

The AP (2/8, Sidoti) reports "lawmakers of both parties" said the Administration "is falling short in its efforts to rebuild Iraq, increase oil production and spawn a new government that is representative of all factions there." Rumsfeld "heard from critics including panel Chairman John Warner, R-Va. The comments marked a continuation of bipartisan criticism the administration has received in recent months from members of Congress over its Iraq policies."

Knight Ridder (2/8, Brown) reports Rumsfeld also told senators yesterday "corruption and graft threaten to sink any progress that Iraq has made in trying to create a democracy, and U.S. military forces lack the expertise needed to build civilian government." Rumsfeld "discussed corruption, lack of basic services and the looming threat of civil war in Iraq with members of the committee. Although the hearing was not exclusively about the war, much of it focused on how far Iraq had to go before it has a stable, functioning government."

Warner Says Other Federal Agencies Not Doing Enough To Help Iraq Efforts. The Washington Times (2/8, Scarborough) reports Warner "said federal agencies are not doing everything they could to help the US military win in Iraq, prompting…Rumsfeld to suggest an overhaul of civilian departments to better fight Islamic terrorists. 'What we're not getting,' said…Warner, Virginia Republican,'"[are] the other elements of our government to bring to bear to conclude this conflict and perform the mission and bring our forces back.'" Warner "asked Mr. Rumsfeld: 'Do you agree or disagree with my view that we're not pulling together, all elements of our government, with equal force, as is the men and women of the armed forces?' Mr. Warner was airing what has primarily been debated behind closed doors in the Bush administration."

McCain Chastises Rumsfeld Over Supplementals. The Hill (2/8, Tiron) reports Sen. John McCain "accused the Bush administration yesterday of going around congressional authorizers to secure so-called 'emergency funding'" for military operations. At a hearing, McCain said to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "This year you are submitting the seventh emergency supplemental of some $50 billion coming to a total of some $400 billion in the last four years. I do not know how you call it an emergency anymore when you know you are going to have costs associated with the Iraq war." Rumsfeld "said he can go about funding the war 'either way,' meaning he would feel comfortable with funding the war through the regular budget or through supplemental funding."

Intelligence Agencies To Analyze Tape Of Saddam Meeting With Advisors. The New York Times (2/8) reports, "The chairman of the House Intelligence Committee has turned over to intelligence agencies 12 hours of audio recordings of Saddam Hussein meeting with top advisers, an aide to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan, said Tuesday." Hoekstra "believes the recordings may shed light on whether Mr. Hussein hid unconventional weapons before he was toppled in 2003, said the aide, Jamal D. Ware. The voice on the recordings has been confirmed by intelligence analysts as Mr. Hussein's, Mr. Ware said."

Four Marines, Sunni Leader Killed In Iraq Yesterday. The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 4, 2:05, Schieffer) reported "Four more US Marines were killed in action west of Baghdad. Bombings in the capital killed at least seven Iraqis and assassins gunned down a Sunni leader who worked with the Shiite-led government." ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 4, :10, Vargas) reported, "Three of the deaths occurred near the city of Hit, 85 miles from the capital."

Meanwhile, USA Today/AP (2/8) reports, "Gunmen assassinated a Sunni community leader Tuesday in the former extremist stronghold of Fallujah." Sheik Kamal Nazal, a Sunni preacher and chairman of the Fallujah city council, "was gunned down in a hail of bullets from two passing cars as he walked to work, police Chief Brig. Hudairi al-Janabi said. No group claimed responsibility for the killing." The Washington Post (2/8, A12, Finer) reports Nazal "ran for a seat in Iraq's parliament and worked closely with American forces policing Fallujah."

The New York Times (2/8, Worth) and Washington Times (2/8, Reid) also reports on the violence.

Shiite-Sunni Violence In Iraq On Upswing. The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 4, 2:05, Schieffer) reported "Around Iraq, Shiite versus Sunni violence is on the rise again." CBS (Dozier) added, "Kill one to frighten 1,000. Sunnis say it's simple, brutal and effective. It's being done to them by a shadowy force within the majority Shiite government." US diplomats and commanders "say the pace of killings has become so fast and furious Sunni leaders are threatening to walk out of a new government that hasn't even been formed yet. Shiite officials concede some in their ranks may be guilty but months of investigations have failed to yield a single arrest." Mowaffak Raubaie, Iraqi national security advisor: "There are so many sort of complaints and there's no smoke without fire." Dossier: "But so far no one from within any of the ministries?" Raubaie: "Well, we need the proof." Dossier: "Sunni politicians say they've provided proof time and again. Shiite officials insist these claims are exaggerated, and they say at least as many Shiites are being killed as Sunnis but Sunnis are seeing red. And they want payback."

UK Defense Secretary Says British Troops Could Leave Iraq. The Financial Times (2/8, Spiegel, Correspondent) reports, "John Reid, the UK defence secretary, on Tuesday night set out the conditions under which British troops would withdraw from Iraq, appearing to lower expectations of how peaceful the country would be when that withdrawal occurred." In a speech in which Reid "sought to 'set out in specific terms' his views on when UK forces could leave, the defence secretary said Iraq was likely to be still rife with violence and suffering from widespread shortages even when British troops departed." Although the speech "was not flagged as a major policy address and Mr Reid has given similarly sober assessments of Iraq's security in the past," the address was "his most specific and, in many regards, most pessimistic view of how Iraq would look after coalition troops withdraw."

The AP (2/8) reports Reid said that "if the months go well, they bring the day closer when the Iraqi people can finally take control of their own futures. That also means that the time is approaching when the coalition which is helping them achieve this can begin leaving Iraq." Reid "would not comment on numbers or dates, saying 'to do so would be to invite chaos.'" Britain "has about 8,000 soldiers in Iraq, most in or near the southern city of Basra."

Navy Reserve Commander Disputes Financial Problems For Activated Reservists. Dana Bienvenu, a commander in the United States Navy Reserve, writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (2/8), "That military reservists called to active duty are underpaid and that their families suffer severe financial hardships as a result of the war is repeated so often that I no longer even try to correct those who argue it as a matter of faith." Actually, "with base pay, housing allowance, imminent danger pay, family separation allowance, medical coverage for families at home and various specialty pay, all being tax free, few recalled soldiers and sailors face destructive hardships." Also, "increased federal legal protection (the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act signed by President Bush in 2003) actually allows activated members to shed financial responsibilities."

State Department Career Weapons Experts "Sidelined." Knight Ridder (2/8, Strobel) reports, "State Department officials appointed by President Bush have sidelined key career weapons experts and replaced them with less experienced political operatives who share the White House and Pentagon's distrust of international negotiations and treaties." The "reorganization of the department's arms control and international security bureaus" was intended "to help it better deal with 21st-century threats. Instead, it's thrown the agency into turmoil and produced an exodus of experts with decades of experience in nuclear arms, chemical weapons and related matters, according to 11 current and former officials and documents obtained by Knight Ridder." The reorganization "was conducted largely in secret by a panel of four political appointees."

1999 White House Report Said Iraq Retained Capacity TO Develop WMD. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/8) excerpts an August 25, 1999 White House report on Iraq's development of WMD. The report stated, "As of December 1998, UNSCOM reporting provides an accurate assessment concerning Iraq's chemical programs as we understand them. … On discrepancies in the material balance of chemical munitions, Iraq continues its refusal to account for a falsely-reported expenditure of some 6,000 chemical munitions, for the disappearance of 550 artillery shells filled with mustard agent, and for an inaccurate accounting of R-400 aerial [chemical weapon] bombs. Concerning VX [gas], UNSCOM has stated that the amount of VX Iraq produced has yet to be verified and that Iraq has yet to admit to its weaponization of VX into missiles... The UNSCOM... reports note that in the biological weapons area, priority issues begin with Iraq's failure at a fundamental level to provide an accurate declaration of its [biological weapons] program; Iraq has submitted several declarations all found to be incomplete. Iraq has not accounted for materials and items that may have been used or acquired for such a program... Iraq retains the industrial capacity and knowledge base to develop [biological weapon] agents quickly."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling's Attorney Highlights "Experts Defense" At Enron Trial. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "The lead attorney for Jeffrey Skilling underscored the advice of experts and the imprecision of business affairs in federal court here yesterday as the defense continued to unfold for the former Enron Corp. president and his co-defendant, former Chairman Kenneth Lay." The Journal continues, "In a sometimes testy exchange in a second day of cross-examination, Mr. Skilling's attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, challenged the government's lead-off witness, former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig, about whether he had any basis for claiming that the company put out false or misleading information to the public. Under government questioning last week, Mr. Koenig said that Messrs. Skilling and Lay had taken part in putting out misinformation about Enron in the nearly two years before its collapse into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001. … Mr. Koenig himself has pleaded guilty to a felony for aiding and abetting securities fraud in Enron's public statements. He is cooperating with the government in hopes of reducing any prison sentence, which could be up to 10 years." The Journal adds, "In questioning yesterday, Mr. Petrocelli pushed the point that many accounting and legal experts reviewed Enron's public financial releases. For instance, the attorney presented Mr. Koenig with a document indicating that Enron's last-minute decision to increase reported earnings for the 1999 fourth quarter by a penny a share had been known to the company's outside accountants, Arthur Andersen. … Such an 'experts defense' argues that an executive can't be accused of lying if he is relying on the advice of outside experts, such as accountants, when making a statement about a company's finances. From the beginning of the giant Enron probe, prosecutors have worried about getting around this defense, say people familiar with the matter. To a large degree, the criminal charges that have been leveled against some 30 individuals in connection with Enron argue that key pieces of information were withheld from the outside experts -- thus removing the protection."

The Deal (2/8, Poole) reports, "The defense in the Enron Corp. fraud trial attempted Tuesday to demonstrate that two former executives did not try to hide anything at the one-time energy giant. … Daniel Petrocelli, former CEO Jeff Skilling's defense attorney, asked Mark Koenig, the former investor relations chief, if some of the things he did as part of his job were done at other companies. Koenig acknowledged that they were. … 'You're not suggesting these are illegal or improper'? Petrocelli asked. … 'No,' Koenig replied, then added, 'But there were false and misleading statements on earnings releases and conference calls.'" The Deal adds, "As for adjusting its earnings upward from 30 cents to 31 cents one quarter to meet Wall Street targets, Petrocelli asked if there was anything wrong with a company 'sharpening its pencil' to do that. … Koenig said there was, adding, 'He [chief accounting officer Rick Causey] said, 'Let me work on it and get it up by a penny." … Petrocelli objected, saying Koenig was 'going beyond' his questions, but the judge didn't rule and the questioning continued. … Petrocelli was able to get Koenig to admit that he erred in earlier testimony that Enron hadn't missed a Wall Street earnings consensus since 1997, when it did in fourth-quarter 1997."

USA Today (2/8, 2B, Farrell) also reports on the trial.

Humbled Rice To Take Stand. The New York Times (2/8, Barrionuevo) reports, "From fast cars to rugged adventure trips to $6.4 million in bonuses, Enron was a dream maker for Kenneth D. Rice. … While he was still in his 30's, Mr. Rice, a former Nebraska farm boy and high school jock, pocketed millions of dollars working for the Houston-based energy company. He lived life in the fast lane — literally — racing Ferraris and going on daredevil expeditions to southern Mexico and the Australian Outback with his onetime friend and mentor, Jeffrey K. Skilling, Enron's former chief executive. … But as early as Wednesday afternoon, a different Ken Rice will take the stand in the criminal trial of Mr. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, who was chief executive when Enron collapsed in late 2001. Mr. Rice will testify against Mr. Skilling, who once considered him one of his most loyal supporters in transforming Enron from a staid pipeline company into a cutting-edge trading company with big ambitions. Mr. Skilling helped make Mr. Rice a very wealthy man. His total compensation, including stock sales, in 2000 came to $47.3 million — more than his bosses, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, earned. Mr. Rice spent some of that money on sports cars, motorcycles and a Colorado vacation home. … But these days, Mr. Rice, 47, is a humbled government witness, having pleaded guilty in 2004 to one count of securities fraud for falsely promoting the troubled broadband division that he headed for two years. He faces up to 10 years in prison and is named in at least 32 pending civil lawsuits, with each of them having the potential to bankrupt him."

Lawsuit Challenges Constitutionality Of Key Sarbanes-Oxley Component. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Scannell, Mullins) reports that the Free Enterprise Fund, a Washington lobbying group, and the Nevada accounting firm Beckstead & Watts "are challenging the constitutionality of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, potentially opening the door for other efforts to roll back the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law" on the grounds that it "violates the appointments clause and separation of powers principles of the Constitution." Their legal team includes Kenneth Starr and ex-Justice Department official Viet Dinh. The lawsuit "comes as some lawmakers are trying to rally support for legislation that would weaken or roll back Sarbanes-Oxley," and also as "some groups, realizing they can't get rules and laws overturned, are turning to the courts to chip away at some recent reforms."

The AP (2/8, Gordon) reports, "Bitterly opposed to the sweeping anti-fraud law, they are challenging the board it established to oversee the accounting industry, arguing that it violates the Constitution's mandated separation of powers among the three branches of government." The AP adds, "The Free Enterprise Fund, an anti-tax group that seeks limited government, filed suit Tuesday in federal court in Washington against the accounting board, known as the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. … The anti-fraud law, known as the Sarbanes-Oxley Act for its congressional sponsors, could be invalidated if any of its sections is found unconstitutional. Opponents want it sent back to Congress for a revision. … Until now, the objections to the law have come mainly from publicly traded companies — especially smaller ones — focusing on one key section of it. They want an easing of its requirements for reporting on the strength of internal financial controls. … Federal regulators and lawmakers have been receptive to their complaints about the burden of complying, but the Sarbanes-Oxley law itself has not been called into question."

WSJournal Calls Lawsuit's Case "Compelling." The Wall Street Journal (2/8) editorializes, "What do you get when you cross corporate scandals with a panicked Congress in an election year? … Sarbanes-Oxley, a bad law that, as it turns out, may also be unconstitutional." The Journal calls the lawsuit a "compelling argument and one that, with any luck, may finally spur Congress to revisit a law that has arguably done more economic harm than the scandals that inspired it.

… If we've learned anything about corporate crime in recent years, it is that determined scoundrels can find ways around any corporate governance rules. Most of the post-Enron prosecutions have been made" with pre-Sarbanes-Oxley laws.

Spitzer-Grasso Dispute Still Awaits Trial Date. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Lucchetti, Mcdonald) reports, "Having sparred for 20 months, New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, and former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso say they are ready to take their legal fight over Mr. Grasso's Big Board compensation to court." The Journal continues, "Today, trial-level New York State Supreme Court Judge Charles E. Ramos is expected to discuss progress with both sides of the civil matter and, according to lawyers involved, may revisit a topic he has only hinted at in past months: a trial date." The Journal adds, "Despite their public pronouncements, the litigants and others involved in the matter may benefit from further delay, and legal experts speculate the main event may never make it into court. … Mr. Spitzer has alleged that Mr. Grasso's $188 million compensation package was excessive under New York's not-for-profit law and that Mr. Grasso should return much of the money to the NYSE. Mr. Grasso has said he only took the money the Big Board directors offered him, and he has in turn sued the NYSE for money he says he is still owed. Kenneth Langone, a former Big Board director, was also named in Mr. Spitzer's lawsuit and has also criticized the attorney general's tactics. … One reason the case has proceeded so slowly is its complexity: Both sides have spent months gathering evidence, getting depositions from busy witnesses scattered around the world and doing other so-called discovery work. Neither side wants to rush into a trial without making sure its case is as solid as possible. … The case has also ballooned into a referendum on executive pay -- adding more spotlight pressure -- and Mr. Spitzer's campaign to become New York's next governor in a Nov. 7 election make a delay even more likely. Mr. Spitzer is the only announced Democrat in the race and is doing well in polls."

Senate Panel Looking Into Lobbying By Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Kopecki) reports, "A Senate committee has begun investigating whether government-chartered companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac may have improperly used their charitable foundations and other nonprofits to skirt campaign-finance laws and lobby Congress." The Senate Finance Committee probe "expands on the panel's inquiries into several charities tied to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who recently pleaded guilty to bribery and other charges in a broader public corruption probe, a Finance Committee aide said." The Committee "is examining whether executives at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have used their charitable foundations and other nonprofit groups to skirt lobbying-disclosure laws, while expanding their access to key members of Congress."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Murdered Philadelphia Witness Had Refused Offer Of Government Protection. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/8, Gambacorta Weichselbaum) reports, "Tyreese Allen was killed near a spot where he was shot two years ago" in a shooting incident in which his cousin was murdered. "Allen was prepared to cooperate with authorities and testify against his cousin's alleged killer, Kareem Glass. … So what was he doing in the same neighborhood where he was riddled with bullets once before? Family members said Allen insisted on staying in North Philadelphia, even after the district attorney's office offered him refuge over the summer in the Witness Relocation Program. 'Tyreese didn't want to leave his son and mother behind,' said a relative who said she was too frightened to have her name in the paper. … But officials said Allen could have taken his family with him." The Daily News notes, "The District Attorney's Office doesn't offer witness-protection services, but local witnesses can have access to the federal Witness Security Program, thanks to 'Step Up, Speak Up,' the city's partnership with the FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office that was launched last week. … The federal program gives witnesses new identities and new lives while covering all of the costs, provided they agree never to return to their old neighborhoods."

Four Businessmen Indicted In Philadelphia Corruption Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/8, Shiffman, Anastasia, 423K) reports, "A federal indictment issued yesterday charges that four businessmen tried to funnel $30,000 in campaign contributions to Mayor Street's 2003 reelection campaign to help secure a contract at Philadelphia International Airport. 'This was a blatant attempt to buy influence,' U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said. The four men are charged with defrauding the company they were working for -- Sky Sites Inc.," which "supplied indoor, back-lit advertising displays to airports. … The indictment accuses no public official of wrongdoing." The Philadelphia Daily News (2/8, Hinkelman) notes, "The individuals indicted yesterday were Joseph C. Moderski, 68, of Bryn Mawr; Terry F. Crockett, 61, of Center City; Eric M. Selby, 39, of Washington Grove, Md., and Joseph Evans, 50, of Oyster Bay, N.Y." The New York Daily News/AP (2/8, Loviglio) also reports on the indictments, focusing on the fact that Evans is from Long Island.

In a second story, The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/8, Anastasia, Shiffman, 423K) reports Moderski is "the quintessential Philadelphia deal maker -- the guy who knows a guy who knows a guy." He "appeared on the FBI's radar screen early in the government corruption probe, according to FBI documents. Even thought his public service apparently began and ended with his appointment as chairman of the Ice Skating Rink Advisory Board in Haverford Township in the late 1980s, he had for years been a friend of those with political clout. During the corruption investigation, he was recorded in wiretapped conversations with" Street adviser Ron White, Imam Shamsud-din Ali, and airport deputy director James Tyrrell. During the Ali trial, "one lawyer asked the case's lead FBI agent, Jesse Coleman, if Moderski had been indicted. 'Not yet,' Coleman replied."

Defense Shows Jurors Photos Of Ryan's Modest Home. The AP (2/8, Robinson) reports, "The red brick home on a tree-shaded Kankakee street looks comfortable enough, but the century-old house where George Ryan has lived for the last four decades is no mansion. The jury at the former governor's racketeering and fraud trial got a photo tour of the place Tuesday from Nancy Smith, the soft-spoken caregiver who long looked after Ryan's mother-in-law. The images of Ryan's house…had that lived-in look and were in sharp contrast to what jurors have seen and heard of expense-paid Ryan vacations in Jamaica and Palm Springs as the guest of state vendors and others seeking favors. … Defense attorneys declined to say exactly why they wanted jurors to see the photos, but they certainly provided a humanizing glimpse of Ryan's home life. … But under cross-examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Laurie J. Barsella, Smith said the Ryans were often away from the Kankakee home even when they were not campaigning."

The Chicago Tribune (2/8, O'Connor, 643K) notes, "During opening statements to jurors in September, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, said the residence was Ryan's home for more than 40 years and his only major asset. In cross-examining Smith Tuesday, the prosecution noted that the Ryans also had an apartment on Wacker Drive in Chicago." The Tribune adds, "In other testimony Tuesday, a onetime press spokesman for former Cook County State's Atty. Jack O'Malley buttressed earlier testimony by O'Malley. Timothy Touhy testified he didn't recall Ryan cursing O'Malley after he passed on a suggestion on how to curb corruption when Ryan was secretary of state in 1992."

Judge Delays Tennessee Waltz Trial Until August. The AP (2/8) reports, "Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks' public corruption trial in the Tennessee Waltz investigation has been postponed to Aug. 7. Federal Judge Daniel Breen approved the delay Tuesday after defense lawyer Steven Farese said he needed more time to study government evidence against Hooks, including recordings of conversations made by FBI agents. … Farese also said Hooks has had trouble financing his defense and hiring lawyers' assistants to review the government recordings to make written transcripts." The AP notes, "The FBI's Tennessee Waltz investigation has led to federal corruption indictments against five current or former state lawmakers. "

Judge Continues To Balk At Prosecution Evidence In "Mafia Cops" Trial. Newsday (2/7, DeStefano) reports, "With the case against Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa due to go to trial on Feb. 21, Judge Jack B. Weinstein asked for more clarity on the charges and hinted that he could keep the government from using certain evidence at trial." On Monday, "Weinstein told prosecutors…during a court hearing that he was having trouble with their request to introduce evidence of uncharged crimes into the case. … 'The evidentiary rulings depend upon what I instructed you from the outset was a serious problem, and that is, connecting the Nevada events with what happened a decade before in New York City,' Weinstein told prosecutors Robert Henoch and Mitra Hormozi. 'So you better come in prepared to convince me on those points, because I'm prepared to rule [on the evidence], and those rulings may be decisive in the jury' verdict, although there's no necessity that my findings will be the same as the jury's,' said Weinstein."

US Will Not Seek Trial Testimony Of NYPD Detectives Who Broke Case. NY1.com (2/7) reports, "The former detectives credited with breaking the so-called 'mafia cops' case will not testify at the upcoming trial. Former NYPD detectives Thomas Dades and William Oldham were able to get a key informer to speak, which led to the charges against disgraced former police officers Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. However, the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's office said Tuesday it has decided not to use Dades and Oldham as witnesses. The news comes as the defense team works to uncover disciplinary action about Dades and Oldham which could hurt their credibility."

Ohio Executes Man For Raping, Murdering Two Women. The AP (2/8, McCarthy) reports, "Ohio on Tuesday executed a man convicted of raping and strangling two women during a five-month spree of assaults while he was on drugs." The AP continues, "Glenn L. Benner II, 43, died by injection at 10:15 a.m. at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility. … Benner admitted committing horrific crimes while under the influence of drugs." The AP adds, "He was convicted of kidnapping, raping and murdering Trina Bowser, 21, in 1986, leaving her body in the trunk of her car along a highway in Tallmadge, the town where they grew up across the street from each other. … A year earlier, he had strangling Cynthia Sedgwick, 26, of Cleveland Heights, in Cuyahoga Falls after a George Thorogood concert. …

Benner refused to ask that his life be spared, saying the process does not consider whether a person changes in prison. He also turned down interview requests, saying he was doing so out of respect for the victims and their families."

Identity Thieves Frequently Target Children's Social Security Numbers. ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 9, 2:20, Gibson) reported a "new trend in identity theft" involves "stealing the Social Security numbers of babies. It is an insidious crime, because it can be years before the child grows up, applies for credit and then learns how much damage has been done to his or her credit." ABC (Harris) added, "While the thieves can be anyone with access to children's Social Security numbers -- health care workers, school officials -- two-thirds of children are victimized by people they know. And, like this woman, they often don't report in the crime because they don't want to get those people in trouble." One "possible solution is for the government to track every child's Social Security number and to investigate anytime anyone uses one of those numbers, at a bank or anywhere else, to get credit. Congress is working on a bill. For now, though, parents should closely guard their children's Social Security numbers."

Cuban Spying Case Fuels Long-Time Fears Of Florida Émigrés. The Miami Herald (2/8, Martin, 323K) reports, "Growing up in Miami, young Cuban Americans rolled their eyes whenever the older generation warned there were spies everywhere. … But over the years, proof poured in. The latest: alleged Cuban agents at Florida International University. The old-timers have felt vindicated every time a spy is discovered -- just because they were paranoid didn't mean spies weren't out to get them. But just how damaging have those spies been? Whatever intelligence they may have swiped, their greatest toll could be on the Cuban-American psyche. The 47 years of Castro's rule may have established a well-documented culture of fear and duplicity on the island -- but many say they look over their shoulders in Miami, too." The Herald adds, "Said Skip Brandon, former deputy assistant director of the FBI who specialized in counter-intelligence: 'On the one hand, we probably tended to give Fidel too much credit that he was behind everything, and on the other, maybe not enough. Many foreign intelligence agencies don't really worry about their émigré communities in the United States. Castro always did, and still does.'"

In a short companion piece, The Miami Herald (2/8, 323K) reports, "The recent arrests of Carlos and Elsa Alvarez…are hardly the only indication that Cuba performs the cloak-and-dagger routine in Miami. High-profile spy cases from the past include: July 1991: José Rafael Fernandez Brenes declares on Cuban television that he had been a spy for Fidel Castro…inside TV Martí. November 1992: Francisco Avila reveals he had been a double agent for the FBI and Cuba while serving as military chief for the Miami-based paramilitary group Alpha 66. … September 2000: The FBI arrests 10 South Floridians accused of spying for Cuba under the name La Red Avispa, or the Wasp Network. … September 2001: Ana Belén Montes, former senior analyst for the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, is charged with being a spy for Cuba" and "received a 25-year prison term."

New York Investigators Find New Evidence Of Music Industry Payola. The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 5, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "Government investigators have turned up new evidence of an old problem on the business side" of the music industry, "Payola." CBS (Mason) added, "New York state Attorney General Elliott Spitzer say record labels have been rewarding the radio stations that play their songs with bribes and cash. In an ongoing investigation, Spitzer has uncovered confidential records that reveal how the record companies pay for play. For a Jennifer Lopez song, a Sony promoter writes we bought 63 spins at a cost of $3600. Another record executive notes, two weeks ago it cost us over $4,000 to get the band Franz on. They were effectively buying space on the air. Sony and Warner music have already paid multimillion dollar fines and admitted their employees had used practices that were wrong and improper. Now the rest of the industry is under scrutiny, as the investigation moves in on the giant radio companies that control much of the air waves." That includes "the two largest radio chains. Infinity now called CBS Radio, and Clear Channel, which has some 1200 stations." In a statement, Clear Channel "says it has zero tolerance for pay for play. But Spitzer says the radio companies have played a major role."

Lawyer To Celebrities Is Subject Of Pellicano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Welkos) reports, "His name is nowhere in Monday's 60-page indictment of celebrity gumshoe and alleged wiretapper Anthony Pellicano. … But the shadow of 76-year-old lawyer Bertram Fields, who for years employed Pellicano as an investigator, looms over the case. Listed throughout the indictment are a host of alleged victims, including such prominent names as actor Sylvester Stallone and comic Garry Shandling, who battled with Fields' clients." The Times continues, "According to the federal indictment, Pellicano and his associates either allegedly wiretapped the victims, as with Stallone, or performed background checks on them, as with Shandling, using a database that is supposed to be restricted to law enforcement agencies. … The indictment alleges that Pellicano was trying to gain a tactical advantage for his clients by uncovering embarrassing information on their courtroom opponents." The Times adds, "Fields, whose hardball legal tactics have made him a favorite of many studios and celebrities, has denied knowledge of any illegal activity. Nonetheless, he remains a subject of the ongoing Pellicano investigation. … Fields, who has publicly acknowledged his status as a subject, issued a terse comment Monday. 'It's something I want to stay out of,' Fields said. 'I try to keep practicing law and not pay a lot of attention to it.' … Norman Levine, managing partner of the Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger and Kinsella firm where Fields is a partner, said that although some members of the firm used Pellicano as an investigator, 'if Mr. Pellicano engaged in any illegal activity, he did so without their or the firm's knowledge or authorization.' … Pellicano and his associates were charged with operating an illegal activity that sought information on a variety of key Hollywood figures, including top agents Kevin Huvane and Bryan Lourd of Creative Artists Agency, former New York Times entertainment journalist Bernard Weinraub, former Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch and actors Keith Carradine and Kevin Nealon."

Former Maryland Priest Sentenced For Sexual Abuse. The Baltimore Sun (2/8, Mcmenamin) reports, "For nearly 20 years, Thomas Roberts kept quiet, hiding the secret of sexual abuse by the high school chaplain he sought counseling from in 1987. … When another young man who had attended a different school came forward in 1993 with similar allegations against the priest, Roberts kept quiet still." The Sun continues, "Tuesday, as a Baltimore County judge prepared to sentence Jerome F. Toohey Jr. for the sexual abuse that occurred over three years, Roberts kept quiet no longer. … 'Father Jeff lived nearly 20 years in the freedom of my silence,' the 33-year-old former Calvert Hall College student told the judge. Turning to face Toohey, Roberts added, 'I'm old enough and strong enough now to fight for the young man you abused. Today, the balance of power has finally shifted, and the burden is completely yours.'" The Sun adds, "Toohey, 59, a former Roman Catholic priest and Calvert Hall College chaplain, was sentenced to 18 months in jail for sexually abusing Roberts after his mother asked the priest to counsel her then-14-year-old son, who was struggling with his parents' divorce and questions about his sexuality. … Baltimore County Circuit Judge John G. Turnbull II handed down a five-year sentence, suspending all but 18 months. He also recommended that Toohey be granted work release and directed him to serve 18 months of supervised probation after his release from the county detention center. … Known as 'Father Jeff,' Toohey has also worked as a chaplain to the deaf community and Baltimore police department and as an associate priest at St. John the Evangelist in Hydes."

CIA Employee Charged In Suburban Virginia Burglaries. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Jackman) reports that CIA employee George Dalmas III has been "charged with 17 burglaries in the McLean area." In a search of Dalmas' Falls Church home, police said "they found a stunning trove of cash, jewelry, antiques, license plates -- and bags filled with more than 1,000 women's undergarments.' The Post adds, "Dalmas is a 'mid-level administrative employee,' a CIA spokesman said yesterday, and he has been suspended without pay pending the outcome of the investigation. Some of the houses that were burglarized belonged to CIA employees, and Dalmas may have targeted them because he knew they wouldn't be home, said Fairfax Officer Richard Henry."

Nebraska Man Sentenced For Having Sex With 13-Year-Old Girlfriend. The New York Times (2/8, Ruethling) reports, "A 23-year-old Nebraska man who pleaded guilty to first-degree sexual assault last year for having sex with his 13-year-old girlfriend, whom he impregnated and later married, was sentenced to 18 to 30 months in prison yesterday." The Times continues, "The man, Matthew Koso, of Falls City, will be eligible for parole after nine months. He could have faced up to 50 years in prison. … 'We were stunned,' said Mr. Koso's mother, Peggy, of the sentence given by Judge Daniel E. Bryan Jr. of Richardson County District Court. 'We honestly thought that he would get probation.' … But Mrs. Koso said she was relieved that the sentence was not longer and added that she did not look at her son as a pedophile. … 'Matt has always said that he and Crystal knew that what they did was wrong according to the law, but that they love each other and want to spend their lives together,' she said. 'He's a young man who happened to fall in love with someone much younger than he is, and he did not use good judgment when it came to having a sexual relationship with her.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Koso and his wife, Crystal, began dating in 2003 when he was 20 and she was 12. They were married last May in Hiawatha, Kan., with their parents' consent. Their daughter, Samara, was born in August. … Nebraska's attorney general, Jon Bruning, who charged Mr. Koso in July, said he thought the sentence was fair."

US Recovers $9.3 Million In Illegal Sports Betting Investigation. WAOW-TV Wausau (2/7) reports on its Web site, "We have more information in the case involving a sports betting operation with connections to Wisconsin. Gold Medal Sports handled phone and Internet sports bets totaling hundreds of millions of dollars over five years. Authorities collected more than $9 million in the eight-year effort." The AP (2/6) noted, "Duane Pede and Jeff D'Ambrosia were convicted of violating federal laws against an offshore bookmaking operation in 2002 and of filing false income tax returns. … The two were sentenced to five years in prison and ordered to pay more than$5.1 million in fines and back taxes. … The announcement Friday by U.S. Attorney Stephen P. Sinnott marks the final collection of the outstanding debts. In a statement, Sinnott said the $9.3 million represents the largest amount of fines, forfeitures and back income taxes ever collected in Wisconsin's Western District." The Madison Capital Times (2/4, Callender) also reported, "The payment marks the largest combination of fines, forfeitures, and back taxes ever collected in the Western District of Wisconsin." The Times added, "The offshore betting operation was headquartered in Curacao," but Pede D'Ambrosia "also ran a publishing house in Nelsonville, Wis., that advertised the service in the U.S. according to federal prosecutors."

Four Florida Medical Professionals Indicted On Health-Care Fraud Charges. The Palm Beach Post (2/7, Spencer-Wendel) reports, "A multimillion-dollar insurance scam kept a pharmacist in a lavish lifestyle, a prominent psychiatrist and chiropractor with a flow of illicit cash, and a neurologist with his own stash of prescription drugs for personal use, according to a federal indictment unsealed Monday. Prosecutors have charged pharmacist Joseph Sutera, psychiatrist Eric Ressner and neurologist Agustin Castellanos, all of northern Palm Beach County, with conspiracy to commit health-care fraud. The investigation — conducted by federal agents since at least 2004 — also snared chiropractor Robert Catanese of Palm Beach Gardens." The Post notes, "According to the indictment, Sutera…submitted more than $17 million in claims over a four-year period, receiving $9.9 million. Most of the money was from fraudulent drug claims — prescriptions never made and never filled." Sutera "used the names of the doctors with their permission, according to federal prosecutors. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Carolyn Bell asked a federal judge Monday to require a $1 million bail for Sutera's release." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/7, Coté, 249K) also reports on the indictments.

Former Ohio Bank Manager To Plead Guilty To Embezzlement. The Columbus Dispatch (2/8, Mayhood) reports, "The former manager of a South Side bank has admitted she stole more than $1 million from the bank over five years." Carmen D. Torres Colston "has agreed to plead guilty to embezzlement" and "has already repaid U.S. Bank nearly half the $1.129 million she took." The Dispatch notes that "Colston falsified application documents and used the identities of others to procure loans, lines of credit and credit cards, said Fred Alverson, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office. Bank investigators became suspicious of her work and interviewed her. She admitted the thefts and the case was turned over to the FBI, according to court documents."

Debate Over Treatment Of Mentally Ill Blurred By Recent Killings. The New York Times (2/8, Archibold) reports, "Against the vivid backdrop of recent killings by mentally ill people, both sides in the national debate over whether mentally ill people who have not committed a crime can be forced into treatment are preparing for a showdown in the Legislature here." The Times continues, "New Mexico lawmakers are considering a bill, backed by Gov. Bill Richardson, that would make the state the 43rd with a law allowing family members, doctors or others to seek a court order forcing the mentally ill into outpatient treatment. Typically under the laws, if mentally ill people refuse the treatment, they can face confinement in a hospital." The Times adds, "Across the country, proponents have pushed the laws as a pragmatic approach to the mentally ill who fall through the cracks of the mental health system, particularly those who have committed no crime but could harm themselves or others as their sickness worsens. These mentally ill people often do not need to be in a hospital, but do need to stick to treatment, which could include medication, therapy or both. … 'We are talking about a small group of people who do not get help because they don't want help or know they need help,' Mary T. Zdanowicz, executive director of the Treatment Advocacy Center, based in Virginia, said in a break from lobbying lawmakers here. … But opponents say the laws infringe on the civil rights of the mentally ill, and they suggest that teams of social and psychiatric workers could accomplish the same thing with direct intervention on the streets. Critics also say that most states have not provided adequate money for the services needed by those forced into treatment."

CIVIL LAW:

Adelphia Bankruptcy Judge Denies Request To Appoint Special Examiner. The New York Law Journal (2/8, Lin) reports, "The judge presiding over the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of Adelphia Communications has denied a request to appoint a special examiner to determine whether Boies, Schiller & Flexner, which formerly represented the cable television company, violated the bankruptcy code by failing to disclose that some of its lawyers, including children of senior partner David Boies, were financially interested in litigation support companies the firm recommended to Adelphia." The Journal continues, "The company, which landed in bankruptcy in 2002 following allegations that its founding family, the Rigases, looted the company of hundreds of millions, asked Boies Schiller to resign as its special litigation counsel last August for failing to disclose those interests." The Journal adds, "The request for a special examiner, supported by the U.S. Trustee, Adelphia and its creditors' committee, was made in response to Boies Schiller's final request for fees in the case. … The firm is seeking almost $30 million for its work since June 2002, most of which has already been paid. … Adelphia and its creditors are hoping a probe will show that document management company Amici and copying company Echelon overcharged the estate, which was billed millions for their services. … Boies Schiller had objected to the appointment of an examiner on the grounds that Adelphia had previously bargained for a discount on document services, at which time it had determined fees were reasonable."

By 98-1 Margin, Senate Votes To Proceed With Asbestos Bill. The Washington Times (2/8, Ramstack) reports, "The Senate voted 98-1 yesterday to move forward with a bill to halt asbestos lawsuits and create a $140 billion trust fund for people sick from asbestos-related diseases." The bill now "will move to the floor for its first debate, expected to take place over the next two weeks. Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, voted against, while Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, did not vote." Despite its progress, "the bill faces stiff opposition."

The New York Times (2/8, Labaton) reports the vote "came after critics dropped their opposition when they realized that they did not have enough votes to block the debate." The asbestos measure "still faces formidable political obstacles even though it is a priority of Republican leaders in Congress and the White House." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Peterson) runs a similar story.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush Criticized At Funeral Service For Coretta Scott King. President Bush and three former presidents attended the funeral of Coretta Scott King yesterday. Much of the coverage this morning notes the political attacks on Bush and his policies from some of the speakers. For example, under the headline "Bush Gets An Earful At Coretta King's Funeral," the Los Angeles Times (2/8, Wallsten, Fausset) reports the event "turned into a rare, in-person rebuke of President Bush, with a succession of civil rights and political leaders assailing White House policies as evidence that the dream of social and racial equality pursued by King and her slain husband is far from reality." The Times adds, "The appearance by Bush, who decided over the weekend to rearrange his schedule and attend the service, came as his approval rating among blacks has slipped to the low single digits in some surveys -- a direct response, some strategists believe, to the government's failed response in the wake of Katrina."

Reuters (2/8, Jacobs, Zakaria) also reports "speakers seized" on Bush's presence "to attack his policies." Jimmy Carter, one of four presidents to speak, "took a jab at Bush's domestic eavesdropping program." He "drew spirited applause with comments on federal efforts to spy on the Kings decades ago. 'It was difficult for them personally with the civil liberties of both husband and wife violated, and they became the targets of secret government wiretapping and other surveillance,' Carter said." The Washington Times (2/8, Curl) reports, "Carter later said Hurricane Katrina was a clear sign that racism is still alive in America. … The crowd applauded lustily."

The AP (2/8, Pickler) says "both Bush and his father winced as they sat behind the pulpit and heard the Rev. Joseph Lowery, who co-founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference with Martin Luther King Jr., take several jabs at foreign and domestic policies. 'We know there were no weapons of mass destruction over there, but Coretta knew and we knew there are weapons of misdirection right down here,' Lowery said, complaining that were far too many in the US are living in poverty and without health care insurance. 'For war, billions more, but no more for the poor,' Lowery continued, a take-off of a lyric from the song 'A Time to Love' which drew a roaring standing ovation."

USA Today (2/8) titles one of its reports on the funeral "As Bush Listens, Speakers Aim Barbs At War, Spying," while a second story USA Today story (2/8, Copeland) says the event "felt like…a joyous, sometimes raucous, funny but rarely somber ceremony."

The Washington Post (2/8, A4, Fletcher) reports, "Bush all but ignored many black civil rights and political leaders during his first four years in office." Instead, "he focused on building inroads to African American leaders through the pastors of black evangelical churches and business leaders who were not identified with the traditional civil rights agenda." Bush "became the first president since Herbert Hoover to serve a full term without addressing the NAACP, which many acknowledge as the nation's leading civil rights organization. At the same time, Bush's relations with the Congressional Black Caucus were frosty, contributing to a growing gulf between the administration and black voters." But "in recent months, Bush has made an effort to forge relationships with leaders he once ignored."

The story was the lead on each of the networks. CBS ignored the political attacks on Bush altogether, while ABC and NBC gave a prominent mention to the Carter and Lowery remarks. The CBS Evening News (2/7, lead story, 4:25, Pitts) reported, "Four American Presidents, 14 US Senators and a host of preachers, poets and performers were among the nearly 10,000 mourners for Coretta Scott King. From prayers and scripture to the songs of the struggle." For "all this public adulation, Coretta Scott King guarded her privacy and her children with the same tenacity she put into her husband's legacy."

ABC World News Tonight (2/7, lead story, 4:00, Gibson) reported, "There are few people in this world who could bring presidents, senators, stars and thousands of Americans together in a single place. Coretta Scott King is one of them." It was "an extraordinary assemblage remembering the civil rights leader, the widow, the woman, the life of Coretta Scott King." At "one point, things got political." Lowery was then shown saying Mrs. King "deplored the terror inflicted by our smart bombs on missions way afar. We know, now, there were no weapons of mass destruction over there."

NBC Nightly News (2/7, lead story, 4:20, Savidge) reported Carter "said he could not have won office were it not for the changes the Kings and the civil rights movement brought," and "then said more needs to be done." Carter: "We only have to recall the color of the faces of those in Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi. Those who are most devastated by Katrina to know that they are not yet equal opportunities for all Americans." Lowery "shook the President's hand then scolded his foreign and domestic policies."

Bloomberg (2/8, Keil) reports Bush "honored Coretta Scott King as 'God's servant,' 'saying at the funeral for the widow of slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. that she was an example of strength and dignity who continued her husband's service in the cause of civil rights." CNN's The Situation Room (2/7, Blitzer) reported Bush said "he brought the 'sympathy of our nation with him.'" Bush: "By going forward with a strong and forgiving heart, Coretta Scott King not only secured her husband's legacy, she built her own."

The AP (2/8, Haines) reports, "Former President Clinton urged mourners to follow in her footsteps, honor her husband's sacrifice and help the couple's children fulfill their parents' legacy." Former President Bush said the "world is a kinder and gentler place because of Coretta Scott King." The New York Times (2/8, Dewan, Bumiller) says, "Of the four presidents, Mr. Clinton was the obvious favorite of the crowd. A huge cheer went up as he reached the open area near Mrs. King's coffin, and the crowd gave him a thunderous standing ovation when he approached the microphone with his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton."

The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Fears) notes "several high-profile -- and politically charged -- black figures, such at the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson and the Rev. Al Sharpton, were not accorded a place onstage." Still, adds the Times, "political tensions occasionally burst through the veneer of reconciliation." The Post goes on to mention the comments by Carter and Lowery.

Under the headline "Bushwhacked at King Funeral," Franck James wrote in the Chicago Tribune's website (2/7) reports, "For many people, a funeral probably seems an inappropriate time to criticize someone in attendance, especially if it happens to be the president of the United States." But "many Christian funerals are used by preachers to strike the conscience of those attending in order to create a come-to-Jesus moment where souls are won. Sometimes at such funerals, hard things are said. Coretta Scott King's funeral fit that bill." The Financial Times (2/8, Ward) also notes the "strong political undercurrent, with several speakers making veiled and in some cases open criticism of the Bush administration from a podium situated just feet from where the president sat."

Judge In Human Smuggling Trial Urges Deadlocked Jury To Continue Deliberating. The AP (2/8, Lozano) reports, "Jurors said they were deadlocked Tuesday on charges against three people accused in the nation's deadliest immigrant smuggling attempt, but the judge urged them to continue deliberating. The jury was expected to return Wednesday to begin a fourth day of deliberations." The AP continues, "The charges stem from the deaths of 19 immigrants in a locked, airtight trailer bound for Houston. Prosecutors say Victor Sanchez Rodriguez, 58; his wife, Emma Sapata Rodriguez, 59; and Rosa Sarrata Gonzalez, 51, were part of a ring that trucked more than 70 immigrants from South Texas to Houston in May 2003. … The immigrants began to succumb to heat and dehydration in the trailer during the trip and the driver, Tyrone Williams, abandoned the trailer at Victoria, about 100 miles from Houston. Seventeen died inside and two died later." The AP adds, "The three defendants were accused of hiding and transporting some of the immigrants before they were packed into the truck. Defense attorneys said their clients had no role in endangering the lives of the immigrants. … The defendants originally faced 58 counts of harboring and transporting illegal immigrants, but Gilmore dismissed most counts for lack of evidence."

FBI Reportedly Investigating Civil Rights Allegation Against Illinois Sheriff's Deputies. The Springfield State Journal-Register (2/7, Antonacci) reports, "The FBI reportedly is reviewing two methamphetamine arrests by the Sangamon County Sheriff's Office last summer to see if the arrestees' civil rights were violated. 'We've been notified there was an accusation made, and I can't talk about it,' Chief Deputy Sheriff Tony Sacco, who is a target of the accusation, said Monday. '(The FBI) called the sheriff about a week and a half ago and said they received a complaint, and I was the subject of an investigation into a civil rights violation.' Marshall Stone, supervisory special agent in the Springfield FBI office, said he could neither confirm nor deny the existence of any investigation of the sheriff's office." The Journal-Register notes, "According to the FBI Web site, the agency investigates all alleged violations of federal civil rights laws, the most common of which are complaints involving allegations of excessive use of force by law enforcement personnel. The Web site indicates 40 to 50 law enforcement personnel are convicted of the crime each year."

Georgia Bill Would Boost Pensions For Retired Black Atlanta Police Officers. A bill passed by the Georgia House would remedy an inequity in the pensions received by black police officers in Atlanta. ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 11, 2:30, Avila) reported former assistant chief Howard Baugh, a one-time neighbor of Martin Luther King, "saw plenty change in his police department. But one thing remained the same -- he was paid less than his white counterparts then. And even now, his pension is less, too." He was "the 12th black police officer to join the Atlanta force and the first to reach the rank of assistant chief. Despite more than 30 years of service, he and about 2,000 other Atlanta police officers, are victims of Jim Crow segregation laws that kept them out of a special police pension." Baugh: "The explanation was we're not taking blacks in at this particular time." Avila: "When he retired, until this day, Baugh received $710 a month less than white officers, that were allowed into that pension fund." Baugh "says retirement equality would go a long way to erasing the painful memories and now, the Georgia House has passed a bill to do just that." Rep. Tyrone Brooks, Georgia Assoc. of Black Elected Officials: "It sends a message to the people of the nation and Georgia, that Georgia continues to move forward, to overcome the legacy of Jim Crow segregation."

Report Finds Many States Not In Election Law Compliance. The Boston Globe/AP (2/7, Abrams) reports, "With the midterm elections just nine months away, many states are lagging behind in meeting requirements under a 2002 election reform law that they modernize voting machines, create voter databases and establish ID systems, according to a report released Tuesday." The AP continues, "Controversies over the need for paper trails and the legality of ID requirements were among the reasons that states missed the Jan. 1 deadline for complying with the Help America Vote Act, said Electionline.org., a nonpartisan project that does analysis of election reform. … 'The lack of progress in nearly half of the states throws into doubt whether HAVA goals can be achieved in time for the November 2006 election,' the project's president, Doug Chapin, said in a statement." The AP adds, "HAVA was enacted in response to the disputed 2000 presidential election, and Chapin said that despite the glitches, the election system is undergoing significant change. Two years ago voters had never heard of voter-verified paper audit trails; now states are deciding whether to use them in recounts, and states that once debated the need for IDs are now debating whether IDs should be issued free of charge, he said."

Reuters (2/8) reports, "The report said nearly half of the states missed last month's federal deadline to implement changes required by the 2002 Help America Vote Act, which Congress passed to help restore confidence in the integrity of a process shaken by the drawn-out 2000 recount saga in Florida. The report, by the non-partisan Electionline.org project, said reforms have stalled across the country for a variety of reasons, including growing concerns about the reliability of electronic voting machines and about the legality of voter ID requirements."

Evangelical Group Seeks To Intervene In Air Force Suit. The Colorado Springs (CO) Gazette (2/8, Roeder) reports, "A Colorado Springs-based evangelical organization is expected to file court papers Wednesday asking to intervene in a lawsuit that charges the Air Force with religious intolerance." The Gazette continues, "The Air Force won't comment, but the National Association of Evangelicals says it has talked with government attorneys and is entering the case to defend the rights of evangelical chaplains. … 'We have been in collaboration with the Air Force attorneys working on this case,' said Kyle Fisk, executive administrator for the evangelical group. 'It is the policy of the Air Force to remain neutral when it comes to intervention, but we believe we are doing the Air Force a service.'" The Gazette adds, "Last fall, New Mexico resident Mikey Weinstein sued the Air Force, claiming non-Christian cadets at the Air Force Academy face discrimination from evangelical Christians. His suit, which was joined by four Air Force officers, asks for an outright ban on uninvited proselytizing and evangelism throughout the service. … On Tuesday, he said the intervention of the evangelical group, the second to ask to join on the Air Force's side, proves his point. … 'I am thunder-struck that a branch of government would collaborate with fundamentalist Christians to convert members of the armed forces to evangelical Christianity,' said Weinstein."

LA Mayor Backs Shielding Identity Of Officers In Shootings. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Helfand, Glover, Lait) reports, "Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa today expressed support for his police commissioner's controversial decision to withhold the names of officers involved in shootings, but vowed to review the matter." The Times continues, "Villaraigosa also said he was troubled by reports that the executive director of the commission urged the police union to threaten a lawsuit if the names were not withheld." The Times adds, "Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Police Commission sent mixed signals today about its new policy of withholding the names of officers involved in shootings, as it affirmed the policy adopted in secret last year with a formal, public vote. The panel's president, John Mack, defended the action, saying it was required by law." The Times notes, "The commission acted amid an outcry from critics who complained that the panel, whose mandate is to provide public oversight over the LAPD, was making it more difficult for the public to assess the actions of officers and was ending a policy that has governed the release of officers' identities for 25 years. … In Los Angeles, the Police Commission had released the names of officers involved in shootings since 1980, a practice embraced by the public after the controversial killing by LAPD officers of a South Los Angeles woman in 1979. Since then, the actions of LAPD officers involved in shootings have frequently been the object of intense public interest — although police officers have routinely objected to being identified. … The change in commission policy was made during a closed-door meeting Dec. 13. The five-member civilian panel, which functions much like a corporate board for the Police Department, sets standards and oversees operations in conjunction with Chief William J. Bratton."

Police Say Man In Massachusetts Gay Bar Attack Killed Himself. The New York Times/AP (2/8, Press) reports, "A teenager accused of two killings and a rampage at a gay bar fatally shot himself in the head in a gunfight with the police in Arkansas, the authorities said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The teenager, Jacob D. Robida, 18, turned the gun on himself on Saturday after fatally shooting a woman in his car, District Attorney Paul Walsh Jr. of Bristol said, citing an autopsy. The police had searched for Mr. Robida since Thursday, when, they said, he used a hatchet and handgun to wound three men at a gay bar in New Bedford, Mass. … Mr. Walsh said that the autopsy showed that Mr. Robida was killed by the gun used in the bar attack and that it also fired the bullet that killed the woman, Jennifer Rena Bailey, 33, whom Mr. Robida picked up in West Virginia after fleeing Massachusetts."

WPost Calls For Passage Of Virginia Gay Bias Measure. The Washington Post (2/8, A18) editorializes, "Virginia has come late to the idea that employees and job-seekers should not be discriminated against because they may be homosexual. Now it has a chance to embrace the obvious justice of that policy. It is crucial that the opportunity not be missed. Former governor Mark R. Warner, having ignored the subject for most of his term, issued an order in December, weeks before leaving office, prohibiting discrimination by state agencies in hiring and employment. Mr. Warner's successor, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, reaffirmed the policy on taking office last month. Now the General Assembly is considering legislation to codify that principled stance and extend it to local governments and school systems. It's as close to a no-brainer as legislation gets, but anti-gay legislators may still be able to kill it." The Post adds, "The legislation would simply do what nearly all of Virginia's largest corporate employers (Wal-Mart, Northrop Grumman, Food Lion) and universities (the University of Virginia, Virginia Tech, George Mason) have already done by adopting similar policies: that is, outlaw a particularly noxious form of bigotry whose day has quite definitely passed."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ To Probe Mittal-Arcelor Deal. The Wall Street Journal (2/8) reports, "The Justice Department is planning to investigate whether Mittal Steel Co.'s $24 billion hostile bid for chief rival Arcelor SA complies with antitrust law, a department official said. A tough U.S. investigation could delay the deal or force changes to eliminate overlapping product lines." The Journal continues, "The proposed merger of the world's largest steelmakers would lengthen Mittal's wide lead in producing steel for the U.S. auto industry and other big manufacturers. European antitrust officials have already said they would review the deal. Mittal is based in the Netherlands but is run from London. Arcelor is based in Luxembourg but is run from Paris. Mittal has an enormous market presence in the U.S., giving the Justice Department authority to review the deal if it proceeds. 'It's obviously something we'd look at,' the Justice official said." The Journal adds, "U.S. antitrust enforcers investigated Mittal's last acquisition but cleared it in December 2004 after a product-by-product review. The latest deal would give Mittal 11% of world crude-steel production, with much higher shares in some markets, analysts have said."

EU Official Seeks Debate On Mittal's Arcelor Bid. The AP (2/8, White) reports, "The European Parliament should discuss Mittal Steel Co.'s unsolicited 18.6 billion euros ($22.5 billion) bid for Luxembourg-based steelmaker Arcelor SA, the head of the Parliament said Tuesday after meeting with Mittal's CEO." The AP continues, "European Parliament President Josep Borrell said the Parliament should be a forum for major issues that affect the people and the economy of the European Union, even though it has no formal role in approving the offer. … 'I intend, with the support of all the interested parties, to promote this debate at the heart of our institution in the coming weeks,' he said. 'I am mindful of this offer and sensitive to the social concerns of employees of a large European industrial group, Arcelor, which has close to 80,000 people in the EU.'" The AP adds, "Borrell met with Lakshmi Mittal, chairman and chief executive of the world's largest steelmaker, at Mittal's request. Mittal has been trying to win support for his offer, which has been criticized by three European governments. … Borrell said in a statement that Mittal wanted to explain the takeover bid and its economic and social consequences. Borrell is also due to meet with the European Metalworkers' Federation this week and said he would also like to hear from Arcelor."

Settlement Of DOJ Suit Against West Virginia Hospital Pending. The Nashville Tennessean (2/8, Pack) reports, "The Justice Department has filed suit to force a West Virginia hospital to end a four-year-old agreement with HCA Inc. that the government says blocked HCA from developing a competing cardiac surgery program. … A settlement in the case is pending. HCA isn't named as a defendant." The Tennessean continues, "In a statement late Monday, Justice said its antitrust division has filed suit to force Charleston Area Medical Center Inc. to break its contract with the Nashville-based hospital chain, claiming the deal restricts competition and hurts patients. … 'Competition among hospitals results in lower prices, greater quality of care, and increased innovation for health care consumers,' Thomas Barnett, acting assistant attorney general in charge of Justice's antitrust division, said in a statement." The Tennessean adds, "Charleston Area Medical Center oversees the country's sixth largest cardiac surgery program. HCA owns and operates Raleigh General Hospital in Beckley, about 60 miles south of Charleston in Raleigh County. … According to the Justice Department, the Charleston hospital persuaded HCA to sign a deal in 2002 in which the hospital company agreed not to develop a heart surgery program in Beckley. … In return, Charleston Area Medical Center said it would support two unrelated HCA programs in other parts of the state, the government said. Justice claims the deal ensured that no hospital in the Beckley area would offer cardiac surgery services."

California Attorney Takes Aim At Realtors' Listing Services. The Contra Costa Times (2/8, Temple) reports, "David Barry has been a thorn in the side of Realtor associations for the last 25 years, but this year he aiming for the heart. … The San Francisco antitrust attorney, who has pursued more than a dozen lawsuits against Realtor groups, recently filed a ballot initiative with the California Attorney General calling for a statewide multiple listing service that would be open to the public." The Times adds, "An MLS is an index of homes for sale operated by regional Realtor groups, and ordinarily only updated by paying members. Barry asserts MLSs hand the associations monopoly control over the housing market, compelling Realtors to join, pay fees that are passed onto consumers, not compete with other members and charge fixed commission rates. … The U.S. Government Accountability Office supported this final point in a report late last year, which found that as a practice Realtors steer customers toward properties advertising standard fees. Similarly, the U.S. Department of Justice sued the National Association of Realtors last year over its policy of limiting Internet sites' access to MLSs, saying the restriction undercuts the ability of online and discount brokers to gain a foothold in the market. … Realtor groups, however, insist that real estate is highly competitive and commission rates already fluctuate."

Battle Over Computer Browsers Heating Up. CNET News (2/8, Krazit) reports, "Fighting for icon space on the desktop is so 2001. The new frontier on a virgin PC is the browser, and Internet companies like Google are jostling for space on the browsers of new PCs." CNET continues, "Dell and Google are evaluating a partnership in which the Google Toolbar, Google Desktop Search and a Google-designed Dell home page are included on new Dell PCs, a Dell representative confirmed. … The Wall Street Journal reported Tuesday that the companies are mulling a three-year partnership that could bring as much as $1 billion in revenue to the PC maker for letting Google install its software on Dell machines. The Dell representative declined to comment on the future of the relationship between the two companies. A Google representative confirmed the two companies were testing the search giant's products on new Dell PCs, but declined to comment further." CNET adds, "The browser, not the desktop, has become the most sought-after piece of real estate on a new PC, said Roger Kay, president of Endpoint Technologies Associates. Five years ago, PC companies were giddy over the prospect of renting space on their boxes' desktops to the highest bidder, after Microsoft's antitrust settlement with the U.S. Justice Department forced it to open up the Windows desktop to increased competition. … Companies such as America Online and CompuServe rushed to get prominent placement for their dial-up services on new PCs, but the move didn't pay off as they had hoped. PC users simply ignored icons they didn't wish to use, or used cleanup programs to remove all icons from their desktops or start menus, Kay said. However, just about every PC user who's connected to the Internet uses the browser at least once a day, and browser toolbars that contain useful utilities such as Google's search engine will grab a user's attention, he said."

Toshiba Expects Westinghouse Acquisition To Triple Sales By 2015. Bloomberg News (2/8, Alpeyev) reports, "Toshiba Corp., Japan's largest maker of nuclear power-plant equipment, said its Westinghouse Electric Co. acquisition will help triple sales of the business to as much as [$5.9 billion] by 2015." Toshiba's "stock has dropped 4.3 percent this week on concern President Atsutoshi Nishida would exhaust funds needed to invest in the company's bigger chip and liquid-crystal display businesses. Standard & Poor's and Moody's Investors Service said they may lower Toshiba's credit rating on concern the $5.4 billion acquisition will strain the company's finances. 'No decision has been made on the financing for the acquisition,' Nishida said today at a news conference in Tokyo. He said the company should be able to pay cash for Westinghouse, although he didn't rule out financing through equity markets." By buying "Westinghouse, Toshiba gets access to the pressurized water reactor technology preferred by China, which may spend as much as $54 billion in the next 15 years building nuclear plants."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Woods) reports, "The purchase would also allow Toshiba to sell pressurized-water reactors, a type of technology in which Westinghouse specializes and one that is more common globally than the boiling-water reactors Toshiba offers." The Journal adds, "Toshiba has said it expects to cover its investment in Westinghouse with its own cash, generating 300 billion yen in free cash flow over the next three years." But "some analysts and credit-rating agencies question Toshiba's strategy. Moody's Investors Service yesterday placed the company under review for a possible downgrade of its long-term debt rating. Yoshiharu Izumi, a senior industrial-electronics analyst at J.P. Morgan in Tokyo, said Toshiba may have less cash in the coming years as it may be forced to invest heavily to remain competitive in one of its key areas, the semiconductor business."

Toshiba Seeking Minority Stake Partners. Dow Jones Newswire (2/8, Ishibashi) reports, "Toshiba Corp. President and Chief Executive Atsutoshi Nishida said Wednesday that five to six firms have shown interest in taking stakes in Westinghouse Electric Co. Nishida also said at a press conference his company is not in talks with General Electric Co. regarding the US giant buying a stake in Westinghouse." Dow Jones adds, "Toshiba has said it would buy 100% of Westinghouse and retain a 51% stake in the company, selling the remaining minority stake to potential partners, including US and Japanese firms."

Boston Scientific Head Optimistic About Guidant Deal. The AP (2/8, Jewell) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. said Tuesday it's increasingly optimistic that it can quickly complete a $27 billion acquisition of troubled medical device maker Guidant Corp. while also fixing its own quality-control problems." The AP continues, "After reporting a higher fourth-quarter profit despite declining sales, Boston Scientific executives told analysts that the Guidant deal looks more appealing that it first did - in part because of a tax-law change Boston Scientific said Tuesday will cut its debt from the Guidant purchase by $900 million. … 'The more we see, the better we like it, and the more opportunity we think we have,' President and Chief Executive Jim Tobin said in a conference call." The AP adds, "Boston Scientific expects shareholder and antitrust approvals by the end of next month - a timeline some analysts have suggested is overly optimistic, especially since Boston Scientific received a quality-control warning from federal regulators on Jan. 25. The letter came hours after Guidant's management accepted Boston Scientific's buyout bid, ending a nearly two-month bidding war for Guidant with Johnson & Johnson. … Boston Scientific hopes to make the quality-control fixes the Food and Drug Administration is seeking by June. The company says that timeline likely wouldn't delay the agency's review of a new heart stent whose approval could be blocked if it isn't satisfied with Boston Scientific's progress."

FTC Gives Antitrust Nod To Berkshire Hathaway's PacifiCorp Buy. Dow Jones (2/8) reports, "Berkshire Hathaway Inc. unit MidAmerican Energy Holdings Co. has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy PacifiCorp." Dow Jones continues, "The agency said Tuesday that it granted early termination Monday of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … MidAmerican Energy announced its intention to buy PacifiCorp, a unit of ScottishPower PLC, in May 2005, in a deal valued at around $9.4 billion."

EU Regulators Probing Online Music Royalties. The AP (2/8) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators said Tuesday they were investigating the European agencies that collect royalties for musicians from Internet sites -- in parallel with other EU moves to open up the European market for online music." The AP continues, "The European Commission said it was concerned that the groups' contracts with composers -- organized strictly along national lines -- might violate rules on restrictive business practices and give national copyright agencies a de facto monopoly." The AP adds, "The International Confederation of Societies of Authors and Composers -- known as CISAC -- and its member agencies in EU countries collect royalty payments from broadcasters, night clubs or Internet sites. … The EU said it wanted to look at the membership rules that give authors only one choice of collecting society to pick up payments -- the one based in their own country. … Commercial users -- such as satellite or cable broadcasters and Internet sites -- who want to buy the rights have to get a license from each national society that only covers that country. … This is a complex and expensive process for online music sites aiming to sell songs across the European Union. Apple's iTunes, for example, has separate British, French and German sites with a different portfolio of music tracks. … The commission said that Europe-wide agreements guaranteed collecting societies a monopoly and prevents the emergence of new copyright collection agencies. CISAC and its members have two months to respond to the charges and may face fines if found guilty of breaking EU competition rules."

EnergySolutions To Acquire Duratek. The Washington Post (2/8, D4, ElBoghdady) reports, "Duratek Inc., a Columbia-based radioactive-waste disposal company, has agreed to sell itself to a privately held and relatively new firm in Utah in an all-cash deal valued at $326 million. If the deal closes as expected in the second quarter, EnergySolutions LLC will assume Duratek's debt and purchase its outstanding stock for $22 a share, a 26 percent premium over Monday's closing price." The Post adds, "EnergySolutions is the new name for Envirocare, a radioactive-waste disposal firm that was purchased last year by a group of private equity investors including Steve Creamer, a Utah businessman. Under its new management team, Envirocare acquired Scientech D&D last year and nuclear-cleanup company BNG America of Arlington last week. With BNG in its fold, Envirocare rebranded itself and adopted its new name, with Creamer as chief executive."

The Deseret Morning News (2/8, Bauman) reports, "Duratek bills itself as a provider of safe, secure disposal services for radioactive material. Its Web site notes that it has permits for disposal at Envirocare in Utah as well as other sites. The company provides services for commercial and government customers. EnergySolutions is to buy all outstanding shares of Duratek for $22 a share, a premium of 25.7 percent over the stock's price on Monday, according to Duratek. The deal requires the approval of Duratek's stockholders, but the boards of directors of each company have approved it." This "project has been in the works for three years, according to Steve Creamer, the Utahn who is president and CEO of EnergySolutions." Creamer said, "'We acquired some good, basic technology' involving reprocessing as carried out in the United Kingdom today," adding that as "America moves forward with reprocessing, he said he hopes EnergySolutions will be part of the effort. 'We believe that rather than Yucca Mountain or rather than PFS, we should be doing what the rest of the world has been doing,' Creamer said. That is, reprocessing fuel rods."

The Washington Business Journal (2/8, Clabaugh) reports, "Environmental cleanup company Duratek has agreed to be acquired in a deal worth $396 million, including the assumption of debt. Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions will pay $22 a share for Columbia-based Duratek, a 26 percent premium over the closing price of Duratek stock Tuesday. The acquisition is subject to shareholder and regulatory approval. Duratek says its board will unanimously recommend approval of the acquisition to shareholders at a special meeting in the second quarter. If approved, the company expects the deal to close shortly thereafter. Duratek provides hazardous-waste removal services for nuclear power plants."

Platts (2/8, Tiernan) reports, "Nuclear material handling firm Duratek said Tuesday that it has signed a merger agreement with EnergySolutions, in which EnergySolutions will acquire Duratek for $396-mil ($22/share) in cash." Platts adds, "Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions provides nuclear waste management services and solutions to the nuclear energy industry. It is owned by a private investor group led by Lindsay Goldberg & Bessemer, Peterson Partners and Creamer Investments. Duratek said changing domestic and international markets for its services present opportunities for growth and challenges for the company and its investors."

The Baltimore Sun's (2/8, Cohn) "Business Buzz" page reports, "The acquirer, EnergySolutions, was created earlier this month from three entities involved in different aspects of the nuclear energy waste handling and disposal and technical services business. Duratek, the company said, would help it continue to grow."

UK Approves Boots-Alliance UniChem Merger. The AP (2/7) reports, "British antitrust regulators gave provisional approval Tuesday to the 7 billion pound ($12.2 billion) merger of drugstore chains Boots Group PLC and Alliance UniChem PLC." The AP continues, "The Office of Fair Trading said it would not refer the merger plan to the Competition Commission after the companies agreed to dispose of stores in 100 communities where the two businesses are dominant. … It had been feared that the loss of rivalry between Boots and UniChem pharmacies in certain areas would reduce choice for customers and lessen competition. … But the Office of Fair Trading said it was "satisfied" that undertakings offered by Boots and UniChem would address its concerns." The AP adds, "The merger, which has been driven by the need to tackle the growing threat of supermarket competition, will create a company -- Alliance Boots -- with annual sales of 13 billion pounds ($23 billion), 2,600 stores in Britain and 300 stores in continental Europe. … Boots, which began trading in 1849, has seen sales at its 1,400 pharmacies in Britain fall in recent years as supermarkets have aggressively targeted the toiletries and over-the-counter medicines markets."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge Denies Bail For Northwest Ecoterror Arson Suspect. The Eugene Register-Guard (2/7, Nolan) reports, "Family and friends scraped together $550,000 to post bail for the Springfield man charged with torching 35 sport utility vehicles at the Romania Truck Center in Eugene in 2001. But U.S. Magistrate Thomas Coffin denied Kevin M. Tubbs' request to be released on bail during a detention hearing Monday, despite letters from family and supporters who said Tubbs was neither violent nor dangerous. 'The risk of damage to the human beings that respond to a fire is significant and can't be ignored,' Coffin said." Tubbs "is charged with nine politically motivated arsons between 1996 and 2001, which caused a total of $11 million in damage. He is implicated but not charged in five others, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall said. The fires were later attributed to the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front." The AP (2/7) also reports on the ruling, drawing heavily on the Register-Guard story.

ALF Accuses UK Executives Of Being Rapists In Letter To Men's Neighbors. The (UK) Daily Independent (2/8, English) reports, "GlaxoSmithKline reacted with horror last night after two executives…became targets of a hate campaign by animal rights extremists. Letters sent to neighbours of the two have maliciously accused them of being rapists. The house of one was daubed with the words 'paedo scum'. The targets of the campaign are understood to be Sir Ian Prosser, a non-executive director, and Simon Bicknell, the company secretary. Franz Humer, of the drug maker Roche, is also understood to have been targeted. … The Animal Liberation Front has claimed responsibility for the campaign, which has seen scores of letters supposedly from a police officer sent to neighbours. Police are investigating what they say is a 'malicious campaign of intimidation'."

Oxford Enacts Stringent Security Measures In Response To ALF Threats. The Times of London (2/8, Woolcock) reports, "An unprecedented security crackdown is being mounted at Oxford University in the face of threats from animal rights extremists. Police have warned the university to tighten up its vetting checks on new staff, and college deans, who believe that attacks are inevitable, have ordered students to sign in night-time guests with gate porters." The Times notes that a new laboratory, currently under construction, "has become the main battleground in the fight between activists and those involved in animal research -- the Animal Liberation Front…recently announced that anyone associated with Oxford University, including students, was a legitimate target for attack. Security experts have reportedly been recruited to protect key workers at the site of the new laboratory."

86 Evangelical Leaders Back Global Warming Initiative. The New York Times (2/8, Goodstein) reports that 86 evangelical Christian leaders 'have decided to back a major initiative to fight global warming, saying 'millions of people could die in this century because of climate change, most of them our poorest global neighbors.' Among signers of the statement, which will be released in Washington on Wednesday, are the presidents of 39 evangelical colleges, leaders of aid groups and churches, like the Salvation Army, and pastors of megachurches, including Rick Warren, author of the best seller 'The Purpose-Driven Life.'" The statement "calls for federal legislation that would require reductions in carbon dioxide emissions through 'cost-effective, market-based mechanisms' -- a phrase lifted from a Senate resolution last year and one that could appeal to evangelicals, who tend to be pro-business. The statement, to be announced in Washington, is only the first stage of an 'Evangelical Climate Initiative' including television and radio spots in states with influential legislators, informational campaigns in churches, and educational events at Christian colleges."

MSHA To Issue Emergency Mine Safety Rules. USA Today (2/8, Frank) reports, "The Mine Safety and Health Administration said Tuesday it will require mine operators to place more oxygen supplies underground to give trapped workers a better chance of surviving a disaster. The emergency order, which will mandate several safety measures, comes after 18 mining deaths in West Virginia and Kentucky this year. … The new measures would require that miners receive more training in using breathing devices. The new regulations would also set a 15-minute deadline for mine operators to notify the agency of an accident. Current regulations require operators to tell MSHA of accidents 'immediately' but do not specify a time period."

The AP (2/8) reports, "The rules also require companies to make sure miners have 'lifelines' along primary and alternate escape routes. Those are guides, like ropes with reflective tape, that help steer miners toward the surface after an explosion that leaves a mine dark. David G. Dye, acting assistant secretary of labor for mine safety and health, said the emergency rules, a step the agency rarely takes, would better protect miners and help them safely evacuate in emergencies."

Alito, Roberts Face Challenge In Three Environmental Cases. The Legal Times (2/8, Mauro) reports, "The first time he takes the bench later this month, new Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito Jr. will face a baptism -- not by fire but by water." The Times continues, "Three cases challenging the scope of the Clean Water Act will be argued Feb. 21, testing themes of federalism and commerce clause power that were much at issue during Alito's confirmation hearings. The cases have environmentalists worried about how Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. will ultimately come down. … 'These are probably the most important environmental cases in a decade and will be an enormous test of the two new justices,' says Douglas Kendall of the Community Rights Counsel, which filed a brief in two of the cases." The Times adds, "Alito has plenty of reading to do; more than 50 briefs on the cases have flowed into the Court. After being sworn in officially at the Court, on Jan. 31 at a private ceremony, Alito settled into the chambers his predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, vacated last month in anticipation of retirement. His staff is still in flux, but he has already picked up two O'Connor law clerks, Benjamin Horwich and Alexander Volokh. Late Friday, Alito announced he would adopt the Court's 1993 policy on recusals in cases involving close relatives who are lawyers -- in Alito's case, sister Rosemary, a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham in Newark, N.J. … The environmental cases, more than any other coming soon, will spotlight issues that got Democrats upset during Alito's contentious hearings last month. In two of the cases, Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. United States Army Corps of Engineers, the issue is whether, under the commerce clause, the Clean Water Act protects certain wetlands that are adjacent to tributaries of navigable waters covered by the law. In the third case, S.D. Warren Co. v. Maine Board of Environmental Protection, the justices will decide whether the mere fact that a river flows through a dam produces a "discharge" that triggers federal jurisdiction under the act. … In all three cases, the Bush administration is arguing for a broad view that would preserve a 'landmark' law that is 'a permissible exercise of Congress' power,' in the words of Solicitor General Paul Clement, who will argue the cases himself."

Compromise May Be Near In Connecticut Eminent Domain Case. The New York Times (2/8, Yardley) reports, A handful of property owners in New London, Conn., who have resisted having their property taken by eminent domain even after the United States Supreme Court ruled last year that the taking was legal, could be allowed to stay on their land -- or at least very close to it -- under a plan approved by the City Council. … The proposal, approved by a 7-0 vote of the New London City Council on Monday, instructs the city's director of law, Thomas J. Londregan, to determine whether the site development plan could be revised so the half-dozen remaining property owners, scattered on two blocks, could be clustered on a single block, known throughout years of debate and court proceedings as 'Parcel 4A.' The idea would allow property owners to stay in the area, if not in precisely the same place. It would also free the surrounding area to make way for a planned 90-acre hotel, office and residential development. The city took the property in 2000 to make way for construction of the project, but it was paralyzed while property owners sued to keep their property and eventually took the case to the Supreme Court."

Friedman Criticizes Cheney For Opposing Conservation Efforts, Gas Taxes. In his New York Times column (2/8), Thomas Friedman says, "I've always thought Dick Cheney took national security seriously. I don't anymore. It seems that Mr. Cheney is so convinced that we have no choice but to be dependent on crude oil, so convinced that conservation is just some silly liberal hobby, that he will never seriously summon the country to kick its oil habit, never summon it to do anything great. Indeed, he seems determined to be a drag on any serious effort to make America energy-independent. He presents all this as a tough-guy 'realist' view of the world. But it's actually an ignorant and naïve view." The "global oil market is anything but free. It's controlled by the world's largest cartel — OPEC — which sets output, and thereby prices, according to the needs of some of the worst regimes in the world. By doing nothing, we are letting their needs determine the price and their treasuries reap all the profits." Friedman adds, "Also, why does Mr. Cheney have no problem influencing the market by lowering taxes to get consumers to spend, but he rejects raising gasoline taxes to get consumers to save energy — a fundamental national interest."

Hybrid Vehicles Said Not To Be Solution For Reducing Oil Consumption. In his New York Times column (2/8), David Leonhardt says President Bush "has taken the hybrid craze to a whole new level. To cure our addiction to oil, he said last week, we must invest in hybrid cars, hydrogen cars, even cars that run on wood chips and grass. Energy technology is having its big moment. Too bad the benefits of our new cult car have been so exaggerated." Hybrids have the "most overblown mileage ratings in the auto industry. In the government's road tests, which are conducted in a world without much traffic or any air-conditioning, the Prius gets 55 miles to the gallon. Consumer Reports says the car really goes 44 miles on a gallon of gas." And the "more time you spend looking at the economics of the hybrids, the less comfortable you get." But government policy "seems almost intended to undercut the benefits of efficient cars. In 1978, Congress set a minimum corporate average fuel economy, known as CAFE, for all carmakers." Each hybrid "becomes a free pass for its manufacturer to sell a few extra gas guzzlers."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Four More Church Fires Reported In Alabama. The AP (2/8, Reeves) reports, "In a grimly familiar scene, four rural Alabama churches were found damaged or destroyed by fires Tuesday, less than a week after a string of five church fires that were ruled arson." The AP continues, "At three of the latest burned churches, the fires appeared to erupt in the sanctuary near the altar, according to church members and authorities, one of whom said two of the fires were found to be arson. … FBI acting assistant director Chip Burrus said investigators are working on the assumption that all nine of the Alabama church fires are linked. … 'Clearly there's a suspected link,' Burrus said in an interview with The Associated Press in Washington, D.C. 'I'm not prepared to talk about the evidence yet ... but common sense tells you there is a clear indication these fires are going to be linked.'" The AP notes, "Authorities have no suspects or motive, Burrus said." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, , 958K) adds that the ATF "plans to add 50 agents to the 50 it has at its command post in Alabama. The FBI, which has more than 10 agents in Alabama working on the arsons, is investigating the blazes as civil rights violations." Burrus "told Associated Press that his investigators were working on the assumption that the nine fires were linked."

The New York Times (2/8, Robertson) reports, "The four churches are all within an hour's drive of one another in a rural area of western Alabama, a few miles from the Mississippi border. Like the churches that were burned early Friday in Bibb County, in the central part of the state, they were Baptist. … But while four out of the five churches that burned in Bibb County had mainly white congregations, all the churches that burned yesterday had black congregations. … 'I think there's an obvious evidence link to the activities in Bibb County,' said Jim Cavanaugh, the special agent in charge of the investigation for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Mr. Cavanaugh said that whoever was setting the fires was probably familiar with the small, rural roads. … 'I do think they are pretty brazen,' he said. 'They feel like they've got free rein of these county roads.'"

White Churches Said To Be Most Frequent Targets. The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Jonsson) reports, "Three torched churches were discovered in Alabama Tuesday - the latest in a string of suspected arsons that damaged five churches in Bibb County. … Investigators have not discovered any apparent motives. Four of the five churches in Bibb County - three of which burned to the ground - were white Baptist congregations. The other was black." The Monitor continues, "Nationally, such patterns are not unusual. Most arson targets are white congregations, whereas mosques and synagogues get hit in much smaller numbers. … In a country with more than 350,000 churches, motives are as varied as the denominations they target, experts say. According to the Insurance Information Institute, the top reasons for torching a church include the coverup of a burglary, vandalism, and revenge. Racism, insurance fraud, and thrill-seeking are less common. … In fact, church burnings are common. The nation sees 15 to 20 church arsons a week, scattered from Florida to California." The Monitor adds, "Nearly 1,000 churches burned between 1996 and 2000 nationwide, according to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives (ATF). Authorities nabbed about 100 suspects, a pace that has only decreased slightly. … Since the summer of 1996, when a spate of racially motivated Alabama church fires drew national attention, investigators are not much closer to knowing what fuels the church arsonist. Confessions range from the hateful to the mundane: In Suffolk County, Va., an 18-year-old pleaded guilty to torching St. Mary's Catholic Church in October 2005, after stealing a few hot dogs and some sacramental wine in the course of an inebriated evening."

Walters To Announce National Anti-Drug Strategy. USA Today (2/8, Leinwand) reports, "The White House Wednesday will announce a national anti-drug strategy that includes prodding more states to set up databases that can track people who get multiple prescriptions of frequently abused prescription drugs such as OxyContin and Vicodin. The strategy, to be announced in Denver today by White House drug czar John Walters, does not include any new programs, a reflection of how the tight federal budget is limiting anti-drug initiatives. Twenty-eight states have passed laws to set up prescription-drug registries, which are funded with a mix of federal and state money. President Bush's proposed budget for fiscal 2007 includes $9.9 million to help establish registries in more states, up from $7.4 million this year."

Appellate Court To Decide Florida Drug Trafficking, Pain Management Case. In the St .Petersburg (FL) Times (2/7), Colleen Jenkins writes, "For a man sentenced to 25 years in prison on drug trafficking charges, Richard Paey had a lot of powerful people on his side. Prosecutors, a judge and some jurors didn't think the chronic pain patient from Hudson should go to prison at all. So why, an associate appellate judge asked Tuesday, didn't authorities seek help rather than punishment for the wheelchair-bound man? We did, the state said. And Paey turned it down. Now three 2nd District Court of Appeal judges are left to decide whether a case that has drawn the interest of chronic pain advocates worldwide and was featured on 60 Minutes last month should ever have gotten this far. … At issue is a one-size-fits-all Florida law that labels anyone with more than an ounce of a controlled substance a drug trafficker, even if the person never deals. The Pasco County Sheriff's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration nabbed Paey after watching him buy more than 1,200 painkillers from different pharmacies between January and March 1997. Undated prescriptions from his New Jersey doctor and a copy machine gave Paey the ability to fake numerous prescriptions, which he used to obtain 800 pills of a painkiller made with oxycodone." Jenkins continues, "Paey…was frank about his use of pain medications. He said he developed a physical dependence on painkillers after a bad car wreck, failed back surgeries and a multiple sclerois diagnosis. As his tolerance of the medications grew, so did his need for larger amounts to combat his pain."

The AP (2/7) reports, "On Tuesday, as Paey's attorney tried to persuade the 2nd District Court of Appeal to throw out his 2004 drug trafficking convictions and mandatory 25-year sentence, advocates for chronic pain sufferers said the case illustrates flaws in the law and how people who are dependent on strong pain medication can get tangled up in the government's overzealous war on drugs. … His attorney, John P. Flannery, told the three-judge appellate panel that the 25-year mandatory sentence was cruel and unusual punishment. Further, Flannery said, the doctor lied on the witness stand and the prosecutor knew it. Flannery told the judges that Paey is now getting pain relief in prison, via a morphine drip. … The appeals court did not indicate when it would rule." The AP story also was published by the following Florida newspapers: Sarasota Herald-Tribune, The Ledger, Gainesville Sun, and Bradenton Herald.

Track Star Marion Jones, Conte Settle Steroid Use Lawsuit. The AP (2/8) reports, "The convicted ringleader in the BALCO doping scandal settled a defamation lawsuit brought by track star Marion Jones over allegations that she used banned performance-enhancing drugs. Jones settled her $25 million suit in U.S. District Court [in San Francisco] Monday against Victor Conte, who's serving a four-month prison term for his role in the steroid scandal. Terms of the deal were not disclosed. … Jones said Conte, the founder the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative firm, had a vendetta against her and accused him of lying to try to destroy her career and reputation. Conte maintained his statements about Jones were accurate, and told The Associated Press when the case was filed that 'I look forward with all confidence to the court proceedings as I stand by everything I said.'"

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/7) reports, "The Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative owner alleged Jones was using the substances when she won five medals -- three of them gold -- at the 2000 Summer Olympics in Sydney."

Reuters (2/7) reports, "The former Olympic sprint champion sued Victor Conte for $25 million in 2004 after he claimed he supplied her with banned performance-enhancing drugs. She denied the charge and has never failed a doping test."

Suspected Drug Cartel Gunmen Storm Mexican Newspaper Office. Reuters (2/8) reports, "Gunmen thought to be working for a drug cartel shot and seriously wounded a reporter during a raid on a Mexican newspaper near the violent U.S.-Mexico border, reporters at the paper said on Tuesday. At least two hooded men burst into El Manana newspaper in Nuevo Laredo…late on Monday, tossing a grenade in the lobby and raking the newsroom with automatic weapons fire, they said. Night-shift reporter Jaime Orozco was shot four times as he tried to flee. He was hospitalized and listed in serious condition…editor Jose Garcia said. Some reporters were injured by flying glass and debris during the attack. … News reporting along the U.S.-Mexico border has long been dangerous, especially for columnists, editors and investigative reporters bold enough to name drug cartel operators and corrupt government officials."

Bolivia's Morales Wants US To Reconsider Anti-Drug Aid Cutback. The AP (2/8) reports, "President Evo Morales asked the United States on Tuesday to reconsider a proposed cut in anti-drug aid to Bolivia, and called on the world to strengthen drug-fighting alliances. Morales' appeal came a day after President Bush asked Congress to reduce anti-narcotics funding to Bolivia to $67 million $80 million. … Morales, who once promised to be "Washington's nightmare,' led the often-violent struggle against U.S.-backed coca eradication efforts over the past decade, and has promised to retool Bolivian coca policy. … Bush also proposed cuts in anti-narcotics aid to most countries that make up the Andean Counterdrug Initiative, including Brazil, Ecuador, Panama, Peru and Venezuela. Colombia is the only nation for which Bush has proposed a funding boost. U.S. funding for Bolivian anti-drug efforts has been declining since 2001, when it stood at $117 million. But the president's comments appeared to indicate he believed the budget proposal was a reprisal against him and his opposition to eradication. However, U.S. Ambassador David Greenlee said the cut was due solely to revised budget priorities in Washington."

Accused Drug Smuggler Surrenders To Colombian Government. According to Reuters (2/8), "The 'granddaddy' of Colombia's right-wing militias, who picked up a shotgun to protect his farm from Marxist rebels 29 years ago and now stands accused of drug smuggling, turned himself in to the government on Tuesday. The demobilization of Ramon Isaza and his 990-member force brings to about 22,290 the number of paramilitary fighters that have surrendered their arms in a government peace accord. Paramilitaries guilty of crimes such as massacres, torture and kidnapping face jail terms limited to eight years in exchange for laying down their weapons -- a deal criticized by human rights groups. Benefits under the law will be withheld from those who try to hide their crimes from government investigators, leaving them to face full jail terms."

California Law Would Have Barred Postal Worker From Purchasing Gun. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/8, Blood) reports, "The postal worker who went on a deadly shooting rampage last week at a mail-sorting center legally bought the weapon in New Mexico even though she had a history of psychiatric problems that would have barred her from purchasing the gun in California, officials said." Jennifer San Marco "was committed briefly for psychiatric reasons in 2001. Because of that, under California law, she was automatically barred for five years from buying a gun, officials said. But New Mexico, where she moved in late 2003 or early 2004, relies on federal gun law and the federal instant background check for would-be buyers. And San Marco cleared the background check there." The AP adds that "the FBI declined to say if San Marco was in the National Instant Criminal Background Check System, citing privacy reasons."

IMMIGRATION:

US Continues To Probe Possibility Mexican Soldiers Involved In Border Incident. The Arizona Republic (2/7, Madden) reports, "The uniformed, heavily armed drug smugglers involved in a standoff last month with law enforcement agents along the U.S.-Mexico border could have been Mexican soldiers, even though the Mexican government blames drug cartels, Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar told a House panel Tuesday." Aguilar said that "the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement are looking into the case, and agents haven't ruled out involvement by Mexican military units," noting, however, "I do not want to leave the impression that our borders are under siege by government-of-Mexico entities." The Austin American-Statesman (2/7, Copp) adds that "the incident has increased border tensions, and in a packed hearing Tuesday chaired by U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul…American officials said the escalating violence is a national security problem. 'Whether these were Mexican military or cartels dressed up as military, neither scenario is good for this country,' said McCaul." The American-Statesman notes, "The State Department is working with the Mexican government to resolve the incident, and the FBI and Immigrations and Customs Enforcement are still investigating."

The Dallas Morning News (2/8, Mittelstadt) reports, "Texas border sheriffs pleaded Tuesday for more federal help to confront Mexican drug trafficking cartels that are arming themselves with more powerful weaponry and deploying tactics that pose an ever-greater danger to U.S. law enforcement." At the House hearing, "the sheriffs of El Paso and Hudspeth counties detailed deteriorating conditions in a region where rival cartels are locked in deadly competition." The Morning News notes, "An investigation by the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement is continuing" into the recent incident, but "Aguilar said the vast majority of the 144 incursions documented over the last five years were accidental. But the incidents are significantly concerning, he said, because each encounter has the potential to escalate into violence." The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Timiraos, 958K) adds that Aguilar "told the lawmakers that the United States did not have proof that the individuals in military uniforms were Mexican soldiers, but added that nothing had been ruled out."

On Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/7), McCaul said, "We have had over 200 incursions by the Mexican military over the last decade. … Violence on the border is really getting to the point where we are in a crisis. … Whether you think they are military, whether you think they were cartels buying the military or cartels dressed up like military, they had 50-caliber weapons and Humvees. These pose a serious threat to law enforcement on the United States side. They are doing everything from throwing rocks on fire to taking shots at them. ... This is really getting out of control, and we need to do something about it."

Half Of "Granny Brigade" Attends Minuteman Rally In Washington. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Morello, Londoño, Klein, 744K) reports on Carmen Mercer's trip through the Washington D.C. area as she travels to a "Capitol Hill rally by the Minuteman Project." Mercer "has headed into the Arizona desert in her Chevrolet pickup" on many nights to patrol the border with another woman. "Locals call them the Granny Brigade." Following Mercer from the airport and around the D.C. area, the Post notes the foreign origins of several of the people she comes in contact with. "In the Washington region, where an estimated one in six residents is foreign-born, she would see a thousand faces of immigration during her visit."

Myerson Blames NAFTA For Increase In Illegal Immigration From Mexico. Harold Myerson in his column in the Washington Post (2/8, A19, 744K) writes, "With the number of immigrants illegally in the United States estimated at 11 million, the tensions between Americans and Mexicans -- chiefly, working-class Americans and working-class Mexicans -- are rising. And those are tensions that congressional Republicans, who don't look to have a lot of other issues they can run on this fall, are eager to stoke." Meyerson says the boom in illegal immigration is "not because we've let down our guard at the border…the border is more militarized now than it's ever been. The answer is actually simpler than that. In large part, it's NAFTA." For example NAFTA put Mexican farmers "in direct competition with incomparably more efficient U.S. agribusinesses. It proved to be no contest: From 1993 through 2002, at least 2 million Mexican farmers were driven off their land." Meyerson concludes, "So long as the global economy is designed, as NAFTA was, to keep workers powerless, Mexican desperation and American anger will only grow. Forget the fence. We need a new rulebook for the world."

Intel Chairman Calls For End To Quota System For H1-B Visas, Green Cards. The Financial Times (2/8, Nuttall) reports, "Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel, the world's largest semiconductor maker, called for comprehensive immigration reform to make the US more competitive, during a live question-and-answer session on FT.com. He "said the first step in simplifying the immigration process would be 'to replace the current arbitrary quota system with an open market type approach.' The US's H1-B visa allows foreign engineers and scientists to work on a temporary basis in the US but is capped at 65,000 a year." He "said demand was also greater than supply for green cards that allowed permanent employment, with the cap at 140,000 a year and long processing delays meaning individuals having to wait up to seven years to obtain one."

TAX:

Minnesota Tax Preparer Charged With Filing False Returns. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (2/8) reports, "The Internal Revenue Service filed suit Monday, accusing a St. Paul tax preparer of filing numerous false federal tax returns on behalf of recent immigrants that overstated their deductions and caused the IRS an estimated $8 million in tax losses." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The lawsuit seeks to bar Nash Sonibare, 46, from preparing additional federal tax returns. Sonibare is the sole shareholder of Liberty Financial Group Inc. … IRS officials estimated that Sonibare has prepared 3,373 federal income tax returns from 2002 to 2005 and that many of his customers are nursing assistants and licensed practical nurses who have immigrated to the United States from various African countries." The Pioneer Press adds, "Sonibare also is under criminal investigation by IRS agents and continued to prepare fraudulent tax returns even after being advised of the investigation, the suit contends. … He also continually has misrepresented to IRS agents that he is a certified public accountant, the suit said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Budget Faces Gauntlet Of Election-Year Politics. The AP (2/7, Taylor) writes President Bush' budget proposal "already faces dire prospects in Congress. It's a blueprint better suited for an odd-numbered year." In an "even-numbered" election year, lawmakers "don't like to vote for things like cuts to Medicare, food stamps, farm subsidies and education." Sen. Tom Harkin said, "I can't imagine the Republican Party…is going to allow this to come through this year in an election year." The President's budget proposal "is the most austere since the Reagan era as the president seeks to build upon his spending cut success of last year." Roll Call (2/8, Pierce) reports members of Congress are questioning President Bush's push for Medicare and Medicaid cuts in an election year. One "senior Senate Republican staffer" said, "It strikes me that [the White House] isn't thinking about the election at all. I can't quite figure out why they are going to make us jump off this cliff."

The Washington Times (2/8, Fagan) reports Bush Administration officials said the "proposal's tight rein on spending coupled with extending tax cuts are essential for continued economic growth, while Democrats attacked the measures as misplaced priorities that will harm the middle class." At a Senate hearing, Treasury Secretary John Snow said, "This budget would continue the economic policies that have brought prosperity to America." But Sen. Charles Schumer offered criticism, saying, "There are nearly $2 trillion in additional tax cuts, but most of it is geared to the very well-to-do…rather than the middle class that's finding it harder and harder to make ends meet." Reuters (2/7, Felsenthal) reports Schumer "and others, speaking at a hearing of the Senate Finance Committee, questioned why the administration has prioritized extending expiring tax breaks for dividends and capital gains instead of overhauling another tax provision, the alternative minimum tax, which is increasingly affecting middle income tax filers." The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Feldmann) says "the stark reality is that Bush is asking for budget savings from Medicare, education, transportation, and agriculture as he seeks to cut taxes. Can the administration pull it off? The answer goes to the core of different government philosophies of the two parties."

CQ (2/7, Dennis, Higa) reports Republicans "acknowledged they face a political challenge in an election year in gaining passage of a plan with cuts to domestic programs alongside new tax cuts and a further military buildup." Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg said he "would try to appease Sen. Arlen Specter," who has said he will "oppose a budget resolution if it contained what he called 'scandalous' cuts to health and education programs." OMB Director Joshua Bolten "also sounded open to compromise," saying, "The budget is the President's proposal and we understand that's all it is. We look forward to working with Sen. Specter, just like we do with all the members of the Appropriations committees, and especially the two chairmen."

Scandals Increase Chances For Earmark Reform. The New York Times (2/8, Hulse) reports that Washington corruption and lobbying scandals are "providing powerful ammunition to critics of earmarks. … With backing from President Bush" and new House Majority Leader John Boehner, there appears to be a real opportunity "to restrain the targeted spending and force disclosure of projects that have increasingly been quietly added to major legislation at the last minute. But it will not be easy." The Times says "winning money for projects back home is the driving passion of many lawmakers and is considered a bipartisan necessity for re-election."

The Hill (2/8, Young) reports that the cuts to health-related programs "are putting House GOP centrists on the hot seat just weeks after they were asked to make a tough vote on budget reconciliation" and following a year of potentially politically costly votes on issues like free trade. Now, Republican leaders may be in the position of "approaching stubborn members with a weaker arsenal. The movement to restrict earmarks will make it more difficult for proponents of budget cuts to sweeten the bills with money for the home districts of politically endangered members."

Democratic Maneuver Could Block Capital Gains, Dividend Tax Cuts. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/8, Mullins) reports Republicans "have run into a roadblock while working for a two-year extension of President Bush's 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends." Democrats may use a parliamentary move to "force Republicans to pare plans to extend the lower tax rates -- or raise taxes by as much as $30 billion to pay for them," since Senate rules "require that any legislation considered under the privileged budget procedures can't add to the deficit beyond the five-year budget window. Extending the 15% rates on capital gains and dividends would cost $30 billion beyond that window."

Budget Calls For Increased VA Fees. USA Today (2/8, Stone) reports that while Bush's budget calls for increased spending on medical care for veterans, under his plan the Veterans Affairs budget would "be covered in part by an enrollment fee and increasing drug co-payments for veterans who make above a certain amount of income." The increases" would have to be approved by Congress, and with past Bush budgets, Congress has refused under pressure from veterans groups." Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, "who chairs the panel overseeing the VA budget, said she will evaluate the latest request. But, she added, 'I have been consistent and adamant that we do not increase the financial burden on veterans.'"

Unions, Democrats Link HSA Expansion To Social Security Push. Under the headline "Dems Try To Do To HSAs What They Did To Social Security Plan," The Hill (2/8, Schor) reports "unions and congressional Democrats already have started invoking a political comparison to last year's Social Security privatization drive." House Ways and Means ranking Democrat Charles Rangel said, "It will go the same way Social Security [did]. He'll send it to the committee, we'll discuss it."

Budget Includes No Funding For Privacy, Civil Liberties Body. CQ (2/7, Starks) reports the budget does not include funding "for the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, even though President Bush has two nominations to the panel pending in the Senate. The failure to even note the existence of the board at a time when Bush is under fire for authorizing a secret domestic eavesdropping program did not go unnoticed by two of the board's biggest backers," Reps. Carolyn Maloney and Christopher Shays. In a joint statement, they said, "The bottom line is, with more authority must come more oversight, and money talks. To underscore our concern for civil liberties, we need a board that is up and running and has the teeth to do the job."

New York State Health Providers Fear Cuts. The New York Times (2/8, Hernandez) reports New York State's health care industry says it stands to lose $1.2 billion in funding, forcing "hospitals, nursing homes and home care providers to reduce services for elderly and disabled residents of the state."

NYC Public Projects In Line For Federal Funding. The New York Times (2/8, Lueck) reports, "Two of New York City's most ambitious public projects, the Second Avenue subway and a Long Island Rail Road extension to Grand Central Terminal, are in line to receive billions of dollars in federal aid." Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta said both projects "were on a list of 28 across the nation that would receive or be considered for financing" under Bush's budget.

LATimes Says Pentagon Should Not Be Exempt From Cuts. The Los Angeles Times (2/8) editorializes, 'A nation at war must make difficult choices and endure sacrifice. The soldiers who risk life and limb in Iraq carry the most obvious burden. But those in government must also do their part, by selecting wisely where to direct taxpayer money. At a time of belt-tightening throughout the federal government, including Medicare and several programs aimed at helping the poor, there is one corner of Washington where hard choices remain unknown: the Pentagon. The shocker in the $2.77-trillion budget proposed Monday by President Bush is that not one big-ticket Pentagon weapons program fell under the same knife that seems to be cutting the rest of us. … War requires courage, both on the battlefield and at home. By declaring 16% of the federal budget essentially off-limits, and by spending scores of billions on programs even the military suspects are wasteful, the president is showing a failure of nerve."

WPost Likes Science Funding, But Says Medical Science Should Not Be Neglected. The Washington Post (2/8, A18) editorializes, "Reaching for a domestic policy that would command easy bipartisan backing, the Bush administration has proposed an 'American Competitiveness Initiative.' The idea taps into a deep national neurosis about economic threats from abroad, especially from Asia: The current anxiety is focused on India and China, but it closely resembles the fear of Japan that floated a raft of paranoid bestsellers 20 years ago. Though the fears of American decline are exaggerated, the policy prescription that flows from them is sensible. Spending on science and math creates broad social benefits that exceed the gains likely to be captured by private financiers of research." But Bush's "reasonable enthusiasm for the physical sciences should not come at the expense of the biological sciences. After years of generous expansion, the National Institutes of Health are now facing budget cuts. The chief reason seems to be that Americans' fear of cancer has for the moment been eclipsed by an even stronger fear of foreign engineering prowess. This is a dumb trade-off."

Samuelson Sees Little Substance To Budget Debates. In his Washington Post (2/8, A19) column, Robert J. Samuelson writes, "Our annual budget debates…have increasingly become exercises in political theater. They certainly aren't intended to bridge the gap between Americans' huge appetite for government services and their fierce distaste for taxes. Someone has to choose -- higher taxes, lower spending or some combination. But American politicians are loath to choose. So we get an outpouring of partisan blab that does little to clarify. Instead, clever politicians of both parties devise self-serving delusions to justify their inaction. On the one hand we have the Bush Delusion: He says he's promoting lower taxes, but he's actually doing the opposite. … In the long run, tax levels reflect spending levels." The Democrats also "have their delusion. It's the Bill Clinton Delusion: that the Democrats are now the party of 'fiscal responsibility,' because Clinton engineered the first budget surpluses…since 1969. The reality is that those surpluses stemmed more from good luck than from Clinton's policies."

Business Leaders Launch Effort To Push Bush Competitiveness Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/7) reported in its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, "A coalition of business and academic leaders is launching a lobbying and media campaign to build support for President Bush's new plan to boost the competitiveness of American business. The campaign opens Thursday with ad buys in national print publications, and will be followed up with ad buys in other media and direct advocacy on Capitol Hill. The goal is 'to try to increase the awareness in Washington and Congress,' said Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel Corp. Barrett co-chairs the National Innovation Initiative Leadership Council, which is leading the campaign, with William Brody, president of Johns Hopkins University."

Some Question Goss Methods In Probe Of CIA Leaks To Media. ABC News (2/7, Ross, Esposito) in an exclusive on its web site titled "Is CIA Leak Probe a 'Witch Hunt'?" reports, "The director of the CIA has launched a major internal probe into media leaks about covert operations. In an agencywide e-mail, Porter Goss blamed 'a very small number of people' for leaks about secret CIA operations that, in his words, 'do damage to the credibility of the agency.'" In the e-mail Goss "warned that any CIA officer deemed suspect by the agency's Office of Security and its Counter Intelligence Center (which handles internal affairs) could be subjected to an unscheduled lie detector test. CIA personnel are subjected to polygraphs at regular intervals in their careers, but one former intelligence officer called the new warning a 'witch hunt.' Others said Goss' e-mail was narrowly focused and did not suggest agencywide, random lie detector tests." Goss also "told CIA employees there were ways other than talking to the news media to resolve any issues they had with classified CIA operations."

Abramoff Scandal Still Could Ensnare White House. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Cummings) reports the Abramoff scandal "still poses significant problems for the Bush White House." A court hearing "scheduled later this month may bring fresh attention to the case of former White House aide David Safavian, who is charged with lying in connection with a golf trip Mr. Abramoff arranged." Justice Department officials also "haven't closed their review of actions by former Interior Department official J. Steven Griles, who disputes claims that he favored Abramoff clients," and the "calls for the White House to release photos of Mr. Abramoff with the president -- and details of his contacts with presidential aides including Karl Rove -- haven't abated."

Bush To Address House GOP Retreat. The Hill (2/8, O'Connor) reports, "House Republicans will travel to Maryland's Eastern Shore tomorrow to hold a broad discussion on the future of their conference as members prepare for the upcoming midterm elections." President Bush "is scheduled to address the assembled members and staffers Friday afternoon at the Hyatt Regency Chesapeake Bay in Cambridge, Md." The Hill adds, "The focus of this year's retreat promises to be more about Congress than the White House, which is a marked departure from last year's gathering at the Greenbrier Resort in West Virginia, when the recently reelected president was poised to make dramatic reforms to Social Security."

Boehner Doesn't Want Luntz At Retreat. Roll Call (2/8, Pershing) reports, "The ascent last week of Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) to the Majority Leader post has put the agenda for the upcoming House GOP retreat somewhat in flux, but one thing is certain: Frank Luntz won't be there. The omnipresent Republican pollster was uninvited from the retreat -- scheduled for this Thursday through Saturday in Cambridge, Md. -- after Boehner adamantly told his colleagues at his first leadership meeting last Friday that he didn't want Luntz there. 'Boehner said he wasn't going if Luntz was going,' said a leadership source." Spokesmen for Boehner and the Republican Conference "both declined to discuss the issue, but multiple House GOP sources confirmed that Luntz was slated to attend the retreat until Boehner made his views known." A "love-hate divide" about Luntz "has at times split the Republican leadership." Boehner's predecessor, Rep. Tom DeLay, "is known to be an eager customer for Luntz's strategic advice, while Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his office have been described by leadership sources as less than enthusiastic about Luntz's work. It is not clear why Boehner would dislike Luntz's work enough to ban him from the retreat."

White House To Announce Plan To Expand Prescription Drug Registries. USA Today (2/8, Leinwand) reports the White House "today will announce a national anti-drug strategy that includes prodding more states to set up databases that can track people who get multiple prescriptions of frequently abused prescription drugs such as OxyContin and Vicodin." The strategy, "to be announced in Denver today by White House drug czar John Walters, does not include any new programs, a reflection of how the tight federal budget is limiting anti-drug initiatives." Twenty-eight states "have passed laws to set up prescription-drug registries, which are funded with a mix of federal and state money. President Bush's proposed budget for fiscal 2007 includes $9.9 million to help establish registries in more states, up from $7.4 million this year." The "impact of the existing registries is unclear; the first data measuring their effectiveness will not be available until next year. Walters, whose office provided a copy of the strategy to USA TODAY, is focusing on 20 states that do not have prescription-drug registries and whose legislatures meet this year, plus Washington, D.C."

Finance Committee Senators Debate Medicare Drug Plan In Op-Eds. The Hill today runs op-eds from four Finance Committee senators on Medicare prescription drug coverage. In his The Hill (2/8) piece, Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley writes, "We can't imagine modern medicine without prescription drugs. Soon we won't be able to imagine Medicare without prescription-drug coverage. … Millions of people now have financial help to manage pain, keep diseases from progressing or save their lives. This coverage was overdue and desperately needed. For many older Americans, prescription drugs were either expensive or out of reach altogether."

In his op-ed in The Hill (2/8), Sen. Jay Rockefeller writes, "After the administration cut deals and twisted arms to push the 2003 Medicare prescription-drug bill through Congress, President Bush has repeatedly touted the new program as a revolution in the way that America's seniors would receive their prescription drugs. Unfortunately, the implementation of the program, which began Jan. 1, has hardly been a revolution. The program has been rife with problems, causing many of our senior citizens to go without their life-saving prescription drugs. … I am hopeful that we can agree that there are real problems that need immediate legislative action."

In his The Hill (2/8) op-ed, Sen. John Kerry writes, "Affordable healthcare is not a privilege for the elected, the connected and the wealthy; it should be a right afforded to all Americans, regardless of their background or social standing. President Bush's prescription-drug program soundly rejects this principle, and we have to pass serious reforms now to repair this program before it becomes entrenched. Our goal should be nothing more and nothing less than assuring that a Medicare prescription-drug plan actually does what it's supposed to do: conveniently provide affordable prescription drugs to all seniors."

And Sen. Max Baucus writes in The Hill (2/8), "Medicare is a remarkable American success story. We must build on this success by ensuring that Medicare's new drug benefit is implemented correctly. In 2003, with my support, Congress passed the Medicare Modernization Act to establish drug benefits under Medicare. The legislation was not perfect, but its passage was a step in the right direction. The bill as written provides solid coverage for low-income Medicare beneficiaries. It gives stop-loss, catastrophic protection for all who enroll. Most important, the bill gets a benefit started. … It's critical that the Medicare drug benefit be implemented correctly and clearly so that it can become the latest in a long line of Medicare successes."

Congress Under Pressure To Create Enforcement Mechanism For New Ethics Rules. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Rogers) reports that as Congress "prepares to overhaul lobbying rules, there is growing pressure to create enforcement mechanisms so the proposed changes stick -- and are credible to voters." House and Senate Democrats have "introduced bills that would establish professional offices to audit disclosure reports filed by lobbyists. Critics say the same oversight should apply to similar filings by lawmakers, given the spotty investigative performance of congressional ethics committees." The issue "could prove a major test for new House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio), who has insisted that better disclosure -- overseen by the ethics committees -- is sufficient." But even as "scandals have beset the House in the past year, its Ethics Committee has been paralyzed politically by infighting. And historically, one of the weaknesses of the ethics enforcement process in Congress has been the panels' ability to initiate inquiries to see if there is probable cause for a fuller investigation." One option "promoted by Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) borrows from the model of an independent ethics commission set up in Kentucky after bribery scandals there in the early 1990s. In testimony today before the Senate Rules Committee, Mr.

Obama will propose a nine-member Congressional Ethics Enforcement Commission, made up of outsiders but appointed by House and Senate leaders." A second option "calls for creating a professional 'Office of Public Integrity' to audit filings and assist the ethics committees in enforcing rules."

Morris Says Members Of Congress Should Take "Lieberman Pledge" On Ethics. In his column in The Hill (2/8), Dick Morris says Sen. Joseph Lieberman is saying members should not "wait for legislation or ethics rulings, just follow his example and voluntarily announce that you and your staff will not accept gifts, meals or travel from lobbyists or groups with interests before Congress." Lieberman, the "most ethical member of the Senate (this is not damning with faint praise!), is setting up the only way to avoid fallout from the Jack Abramoff scandal and get clean for election day." The Lieberman Pledge "will catch on. In the elections of 2006, insurgents will happily take the pledge (they have likely never even met a lobbyist or accepted a ham sandwich from one) and incumbents will be hard-pressed not to follow. Pledges have a way of being contagious."

Some Businesses May Profit From Boehner's Rise In House Leadership. The Hill (2/8, Snyder) reports Rep. John Boehner's "rise to the second highest post in the House could benefit a number of business interests he has supported in Congress. Backers of for-profit education, free-market farm policies, immigration guest-worker programs and pension reforms could all benefit from Boehner's victory, lobbyists say." Some things "are unlikely to change under his leadership. Committee chairmen will maintain discretion to craft bills under their purview, and Boehner's conservative political philosophy — lower taxes, fewer regulations — is in line with that of both Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.)."

Ornstein Says Boehner Needs To Fundamentally Change House Operations. In his Roll Call column (2/8), Norman Ornstein says the outcome of the House GOP leadership contest "is probably a good reflection of the collective desire of the House Republican Conference: Stand for change, but not too much change. Change obviously includes reforms that respond to the scandals on Capitol Hill, from former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) to ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff and many of those associated with him, which will almost certainly engulf several Members of Congress and top staffers." Transparency is "dandy, and disclosure is useful. But if all that happens here is more disclosure — and a bar on former Members going on the floor or into the gym, something already approved by the House — that will be a huge disappointment and a massive failure of responsibility by the majority." As Majority Leader, Boehner "needs to alter fundamentally the way the House operates. He needs to create a fair process — fair to Republican moderates, Republican conservatives and minority Democrats."

Boehner Election Unlikely To Win Thomas Another Term At Ways And Means. The Hill (2/8, Cusack, Young) reports Rep. John Boehner's "rise to majority leader could have important implications for Rep. Bill Thomas's political future, but what Thomas wants most and probably can't attain is a waiver to stay on as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee." Thomas (R-Calif.) "is in the last year of a six-year term as chairman of the powerful panel, and it is unclear what he will do in 2007." Sources "close to Thomas say he has several options, including heading the Budget Committee, joining President Bush's Cabinet, chairing a Ways and Means subcommittee or retiring." But, "asked of the chances of a waiver for Thomas to retain his gavel, a Republican lawmaker last year said, 'I've got a better chance to be pope.'"

Polls Show DeLay Trailing Likely Democratic Opponent. The Washington Times (2/8, McCaslin) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "It's Tom against Tom in Houston, where prominent lawyer Tom Campbell is out to topple politically (and legally) troubled incumbent Rep. Tom DeLay in the March 7 Republican primary. Local polling shows Mr. DeLay, the ousted House majority leader, trailing the likely Democratic opponent, his unfavorable ratings rising like hurricane floodwaters." Campbell "is preaching integrity and values as the antidote to DeLay-style bare-knuckle politics. He and his wife raised all five of their children in the Houston suburb of Sugar Land, once the heart of Mr. DeLay's turf."

In Boost For Reelection Bid, DeLay Expected To Claim Appropriations Seat. The Hill (2/8, Tiron) reports that in a move "that could help his reelection campaign, former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) is expected to be appointed to an Appropriations subcommittee today that has jurisdiction over spending for space programs." A source said DeLay "would reclaim his spot on the Appropriations Committee while taking seats on one subcommittee dealing with homeland security and another that funds NASA. Those assignments could boost the indicted lawmaker's campaign against former Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas)." DeLay's district, "which he helped redraw in 2004, includes NASA's Johnson Space Center. DeLay has been known to boost NASA's interests in the Houston area." If DeLay is "cleared of the charges brought by Texas prosecutor Ronnie Earle and defeats Lampson and Republicans maintain their majority, he could become the chairman of the Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee in 2007 when Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) will relinquish the gavel."

heading into the 2006 elections in a position weaker than they had hoped for. The New York Times (2/8, Nagourney, Stolberg) reports that the leaders are "stirring concern that they are letting pass an opportunity to exploit what they see as widespread Republican vulnerabilities. In interviews, senior Democrats said they were optimistic about significant gains in Congressional elections this fall, calling this the best political environment they have faced since President Bush took office. But Democrats described a growing sense that they had failed to take full advantage of the troubles that have plagued Mr. Bush and his party since the middle of last year, driving down the president's approval ratings, opening divisions among Republicans in Congress over policy and potentially putting control of the House and Senate into play in November." Senator Christopher J. Dodd said the health of the Democratic Party is "a lot worse than it should be," adding, "This has not been a very good two months. We seem to be losing our voice when it comes to the basic things people worry about."

Miller, Tauscher Want Ruling On Whether Pombo Aide Has Violated Rules. The Hill (2/8, Kaplan) reports California Democratic Reps. George Miller and Ellen Tauscher "asked the House Administration Committee last week to determine whether Rep. Richard Pombo's chief of staff has violated House rules." Steven Ding lives "in Stockton, Calif., which is in Pombo's district. Ding serves as chief of staff both in Pombo's personal office and for the House Resources Committee, which Pombo chairs. The committee pays Ding $150,000, and the personal office gives him an additional $100 each month." Reps. Miller and Tauscher "allege that Ding's arrangements violate three House rules. First, lawmakers cannot use their personal-office budgets — officially called the members' representational accounts (MRAs) — to pay for a committee's expenses and committees cannot subsidize expenses for a lawmaker's personal office. Second, if a staffer's job or "duty station" is in Washington, he cannot be reimbursed for commuting expenses." Finally, House rules state "that a lawmaker 'cannot retain an employee … who does not perform official duties commensurate with the compensation received for the offices of the employing authority.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Serrano) reports Duane Gibson, "a Washington lobbyist under federal scrutiny in the Jack Abramoff scandal, helped raise money for" Rep. Richard Pombo of California, "who championed legislation that would benefit Western mining interests that Gibson represented." Last year, Pombo, chairman of the House Resources Committee, "attached an amendment to a budget bill -- without hearings or floor debate -- that would have opened national forest and other public land to mining. The so-called Pombo provision passed the House, but was deleted from the bill in the Senate when several Western state senators and governors complained that it would endanger vast portions of federal land." Three months before Pombo "inserted the amendment, Gibson and his lobbying firm had a $1,000-a-head fundraiser for the congressman. Although the total raised at the July event is not known, Gibson contributed $1,000, and additional donations came from mining companies, including at least one that Gibson has represented." The fundraiser "and Pombo's action apparently broke no laws. But, as the Abramoff scandal continues to roil the capital, they reflect the symbiotic, cozy relationship between lobbyists and legislators that congressional leaders say they want to curb."

Senate Democrats Cut Ties With PAC Treasurer. Roll Call (2/8 , Newmyer) reports that Senate Democrats, in an effort to "clean up their own houses," are "cutting ties to a lobbyist serving as treasurer of their leadership political action committees. Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), Democratic Policy Committee Chairman Byron Dorgan (N.D.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (Mass.) are cutting ties to longtime appropriations lobbyist William Oldaker, who has served as treasurer for their leadership PACs. … Reid spokesman Jim Manley said the Minority Leader made the decision 'to err on the side of caution.'"

Burns Aide Leaving Amid Questions About Abramoff Ties. Roll Call (2/8, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Ryan Thomas, an aide to Sen. Conrad Burns (R), is leaving his post as the Montanan's top staffer on the Appropriations subcommittee on the Interior amid lingering questions about his role in helping clients of ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Thomas, who was not available for comment, was on the now-infamous January 2001 trip to the Super Bowl in Tampa with Abramoff, along with another Burns staffer, then-Chief of Staff Will Brooke. … James Pendleton, Burns' spokesman, confirmed that Thomas was leaving but had no knowledge of what his next job would be. Pendleton defended the work of Thomas, who was a staffer in Burns' personal office before moving over to the subcommittee when his boss became chairman." Roll Call adds that Thomas' exit "comes as Burns is taking lots of political heat from Montana Democrats eyeing that seat in November."

NTSB Sending Investigators To Fewer Fatal Plane Crashes. The Washington Post (2/8, A17, Goo) reports that the NTSB "is sending investigators to fewer and fewer fatal airplane crashes -- particularly those involving small planes. And that has safety experts worried. Last year, the agency's accident investigators showed up at 62 percent of all fatal plane crashes, compared with 75 percent of all fatal crashes in 2001, according to NTSB numbers. But data from the Federal Aviation Administration -- which is required to send an investigator to every accident and take note of whether the NTSB is on the scene -- indicate that NTSB investigators showed up less than half the time last year. The NTSB chafed at the FAA numbers, calling them inaccurate. After a back-and-forth between the agencies, the FAA backed down, acknowledging that its numbers may be unreliable." The trend "has alarmed former accident investigators."

Pentagon Program Offers Pre-Marital Advice To Soldiers. The Washington Post/AP (2/8, A17) reports, "They are the Pentagon's new 'rules of engagement': U.S. Army chaplains are trying to teach troops how to pick the right spouse, through a program called 'How to Avoid Marrying a Jerk.' The matchmaking advice comes as military family life is being stressed: Defense Department records show that more than 56,000 people in the Army -- active-duty, National Guard and reserve -- have divorced since the campaign in Afghanistan started in 2001. Officials partly blame long and repeated deployments that started after the invasion of Iraq in 2003 and stretched the service thin. Troops also are coming home with life-altering injuries." The program "advises the marriage-bound to study a partner's FACES -- family background, attitudes, compatibility, experiences in previous relationships and skills they would bring to the union. It teaches them to pace themselves with a RAM chart -- the Relationship Attachment Model, which basically says not to let your sexual involvement exceed your level of commitment or level of knowledge about the other person. … The program teaches troops not to cave in to the pressure of a ticking clock -- such as rushing to marry before shipping out for a deployment, or too soon after homecoming."

Wolfowitz Draws Fire For Appointing Former Administration Officials To World Bank Jobs. The Washington Post (2/8, D1, Blustein) reports on the controversy World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz has created by appointing Americans "with ties to the Bush administration" to key jobs. Their "roles have rekindled fears among the staff that Wolfowitz, the former U.S. deputy defense secretary, is bent on imposing a conservative agenda on the bank." Wolfowitz has "repeatedly sought to dispel such concerns since he became bank president in June. He has pledged his commitment to the bank's mission of alleviating poverty, and his unassuming manner has charmed many staffers who were averse to his role as a chief strategist of the U.S.-Iraq war." But after "months of seeming tranquillity, the bank is stewing with discontent over Wolfowitz's choice of several confidantes with administration or Republican connections to serve in key bank posts," such as Robin Cleveland, Kevin Kellems, and Suzanne Rich Folsom.

Realtors Predict Home Sales Will Slow In 2006. USA Today (2/8, Kirchhoff) reports US home sales "are expected to slow in 2006, though remaining near peak levels, the National Association of Realtors said Tuesday." Realtors' chief economist David Lereah "predicts existing home sales will dip 4.7% to 6.74 million units, while new home sales decline 8.5% to 1.17 million units. That would still be the third-best year on record."

Stock Markets Down On Housing Market Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, McKay) reports concerns "about the housing market sent stocks down modestly, despite several promising developments, including strong earnings at Walt Disney and a pullback in crude-oil prices." The "nervousness spread after home builder Toll Brothers reported that while revenue was solid in the fourth quarter, orders for new homes declined 29%. Because home values represent such a large share of many Americans' net worth, any sign of softness in that sector reverberates throughout the financial markets." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "fell 48.51 points, or 0.45%, to 10749.76." Other "stock benchmarks slipped fractionally. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index eased 10.24, or 0.8%, to 1254.78. The Nasdaq Composite edged down 13.84, or 0.6%, to 2244.96."

GM Announces Dividend, Benefit Cuts. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 5, 2:00, Williams) reported there was "a big announcement from struggling General Motors, which lost $8 billion last year alone. The company says it will cut white collar pension and healthcare benefits, cut its dividend and cut executive salaries. Officials say they can't reach their goals without sacrifice here. But does this mean blue collar workers are next?" NBC (Thompson) added, "CEO Rick Wagoner called today's cuts 'shared sacrifice' to speed GM's return to profitability." Wagoner: "I don't take these actions lightly. And don't take them without considering the impact of every single person affected." Thompson: "Those feeling the pain; shareholders. Their yearly dividend will shrink from $2 to $1. Outside board members, their compensation will be slashed by 50%. Current salaried workers their pensions will be restructured. And GM's top five executives will take pay cuts, including Wagoner whose $2.2 million salary will be cut in half."

Energy Stocks Expected To Remain Strong. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Lahart) reports that in early 2003, "most investors were cool to energy stocks -- a stance that was exactly wrong. In the three years since, the Dow Jones index of U.S. Oil & Gas stocks has more than doubled. Even after a big selloff yesterday, spurred by a government report that warm weather has slackened U.S. energy demand this winter, the index is up 7.4% so far this year." Unlike the "dot-com bubble of the late 1990s, the fundamental story on energy looks sound. Rising global demand -- particularly from the rapidly developing Chinese and Indian economies -- continues to push up against the world's ability to pump oil, says Tom Petrie of Denver energy investment bank Petrie Parkman."

PhRMA Defends Interactions Between Drug Makers, Doctors. In a USA Today (2/8) op-ed, Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) Senior Vice President Ken Johnson writes, "America's pharmaceutical research companies share a common goal of ensuring that physicians and those who prescribe medicines stay abreast of rapid advancements in treatment options. … The ultimate goal is to improve patient care. That is why nearly four years ago, PhRMA adopted the voluntary Code on Interactions with health care Professionals. These guidelines outline permitted activities so the independent judgment of health providers is not compromised. … We believe that pharmaceutical companies should not offer or provide anything to doctors that would interfere with the independence of their prescribing practices. The guidelines are thorough and strict. … Doctors make decisions based on the best information, and the PhRMA code helps to ensure that they get it -- with no strings attached."

USA Today Criticizes Freebies For Doctors. USA Today (2/8) editorializes, "For decades, pharmaceutical companies have showered physicians with meals, tickets to shows and sporting events, ski and beach vacations disguised as medical education seminars, and consulting 'jobs' for which doctors do no work. The companies aren't being charitable. They expect a return on their investment, namely that doctors prescribe their newest expensive pills. That's why an army of 88,000 pharmaceutical representatives, many of them young and beautiful, provides freebies to doctors and their staffs. … Drug companies support many educational programs and provide doctors with vital information about new products. But the gifts and unseemly practices taint the profession and undermine patients' trust. Doctors are sufficiently well-compensated that they can live without pharmaceutical freebies."

"Fetal Pain" Bills Advancing In State Legislatures. USA Today (2/8, Biskupic) reports, "A new front in the debate over abortion is emerging in legislatures across the nation. Abortion foes are gaining ground with proposals to require doctors to tell women seeking abortions that their fetuses might feel pain during the procedure. State 'fetal pain' bills began popping up last year in the wake of other statutes that have drawn attention to the interests of fetuses, including bans on a procedure that its critics call 'partial birth' abortion." USA adds, "Fetal pain bills were introduced in 19 states in 2005, and were passed in Arkansas, Georgia, Minnesota and Wisconsin. The Wisconsin bill was vetoed last month by Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle, who said it failed 'to reflect a consensus of medical opinion" and "intrudes on the doctor-patient relationship in a heavy-handed manner.' He cited a controversial report in the Journal of the American Medical Association that said there is no conclusive evidence of when a fetus first feels pain. Despite such questions, more fetal pain bills are advancing this year. Such bills have been passed by House members in Utah and Indiana and are headed to their Senates."

In a separate story, USA Today (2/8, Biskupic) adds that "most of the debates over abortion in state legislatures stem from abortion opponents' continuing push to emphasize the interests of fetuses and to create more hurdles for women seeking abortions. It's a strategy that has led to a range of restrictions on abortion and to proposals in 21 states aimed at requiring doctors to tell women seeking an abortion that their fetuses might feel pain during the procedure."

Potential New York Gubernatorial Candidate Offers Plan To Reduce Abortions. The New York Times (2/8, Lambert) reports, "Nassau County Executive Thomas R. Suozzi announced a plan on Tuesday intended to reduce abortions, calling the proposal a 'politically risky' step as he contemplates running for governor this year. Even as he was speaking, an abortion rights group issued a statement criticizing the plan. Mr. Suozzi's proposal would give nearly $1 million in county grants to groups including Planned Parenthood and Catholic Charities to promote birth control, adoption, housing for unwed mothers and abstinence. He proposes spending similar amounts in each of the next two years. … In an interview, Naral's president, Kelli Conlin, said, 'Mr. Suozzi is pandering in the worst possible way.'" The Times adds, "The clash had political overtones, since Naral previously endorsed Eliot Spitzer as the state attorney general, and is considering endorsing him for governor. Mr. Suozzi, meanwhile, is contemplating challenging him in the Democratic primary."

Retailer Group Sues To Strike Down Maryland's "Wal-Mart Law." The Virginia-based Retail Industry Leaders Association filed suit yesterday to strike down a Maryland law requiring Wal-Mart to pay more for employee health care, saying federal regulations don't permit states to set worker benefits. The Baltimore Sun (2/8, Green, Rosen) reports that the group, which counts Wal-Mart as a member, "says Maryland's Fair Share Health Act is illegal under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974. That law, known as ERISA, is designed in part to make sure that large employers are subjected to national standards for their benefit plans and not a tangle of conflicting state rules."

The AP (2/8) reports that the suit say the law illegally mandates "specific health care expenditures" and threatens "to take away the flexibility businesses need to deal with their employees."

The Washington Post (2/8, B4, Wagner) reports, "Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D) and Democratic leaders of the General Assembly expressed confidence yesterday that the law would withstand scrutiny. It requires private companies with more than 10,000 employees in Maryland to spend at least 8 percent of payroll on health benefits or make a contribution to the state's health insurance program for the poor. Of four known employers with that number of workers, Wal-Mart is the only one that has said it would be affected, and the legislation became known in Annapolis as 'the Wal-Mart bill.'"

Murray Says CEO Trying To Portray Wal-Mart As "A Force For Good." Alan Murray writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) that it is easy to depict Wal-Mart Chief Executive Lee Scott "as just another CEO saddled with a bad public-relations problem. His company has been accused of paying poverty-level wages, providing inadequate health-care coverage to employees, hiring illegal immigrants, destroying communities, driving jobs overseas, and, in a new book by Charles Fishman called 'The Wal-Mart Effect,' even polluting Chilean waters by buying salmon from crowded South American fish farms. Wal-Mart has become one of the great polarizing issues that divides American politics. … In response, Mr. Scott has had to become not just chief executive officer, but chief reputation officer. He spends at least half of his time, by his estimate, in a campaign to convince the world that Wal-Mart is a force for good."

Cheney Says Referring Iran To Security Council Was "The Right Step." Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (2/7) how dangerous the situation in Iran is right now. Cheney said, "We think it's dangerous and I think the international community believes that. We've seen the situation develop as they appear to be determined to develop their capacity to produce nuclear weapons. I think everybody also has had their level of concern increase because of the current leadership in Iran. The new president has made some pretty outrageous statements. Now the international community has come together, we had the vote in the International Atomic Energy Agency Board of Governors this past week to refer the matter to the U.N. Security Council. We think that's the right step."

Recapping Cheney's remarks on PBS, Reuters (2/8) adds, "Cheney rejected parallels between Iran and Iraq, which the United States invaded in 2003 in part because of the belief it had weapons of mass destruction." He "noted Tehran's rejection of a Russian plan to enrich uranium for a civilian reactor in Iran and then reclaim the spent fuel as a sign that Tehran wanted its 'own enrichment capacity to be able to go all the way to the levels required for a nuclear weapon. … So there doesn't seem to be any doubt of what their intentions are.'"

Administration More Convinced Of Iran's Nuclear Weapons Capability Than Intelligence Community. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Linzer) in an extensive front page story examining the US evidence of Iran's nuclear program reports that analysis by US and international experts is inconclusive as to Iran's progress and that Iran's nuclear weapon capability "remains as much as a decade away. … But whether Iran's leaders have reached that decision and what concrete progress the effort has made remain divisive questions among government analysts and U.N. inspectors." Meanwhile, "Bush administration officials, convinced that Iran has a weapons program, believe that the body of documentation is the nearest anyone can expect to 'smoking gun' evidence. But even in the U.S. government, the predominant interpretation is more complex." Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte's recent "carefully hedged assessment" that Iran "will likely have the capability to produce a nuclear weapon within the next decade" is "more conservative than views expressed by some policymakers. Some in the Bush administration have begun pushing back, suggesting that the CIA is demanding an unrealistically high standard of evidence before reaching conclusions that the White House believes are obvious." One senior Administration official said, "Taking into account the assessments made by the intelligence community, and others, I just don't have a lot of confidence in the assessments." The Los Angeles Times (2/8) also publishes a brief version of the Washington Post article Wednesday morning.

Expert Argues Military Strike Against Iran Could Succeed. Edward Luttwak, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic & International Studies, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) writes, "Many commentators argue that a pre-emptive air attack against Iran's nuclear installations is unfeasible. … There may well be other, perfectly valid reasons to oppose an attack on Iran's nuclear sites. But let's not pretend that such an attack has no chance of success. In fact, the odds are rather good." Luttwak argues, "Iran might need 100 buildings in good working order to make its bomb, but it is enough to demolish a few critical installations to delay its program for years -- and perhaps longer because it would become harder or impossible for Iran to buy the materials it bought when its efforts were still secret." A bombing strike targeting Iran's nuclear infrastructure "could all be done in a single night. One may hope that Iran's rulers will therefore accept a diplomatic solution rather than gamble all on wildly exaggerated calculations."

Administration Urged To Pursue Diplomacy With Iran Through Iraq. Roger Cohen in his "Globalist" column in the New York Times/IHT (2/8) writes, "The decision to report Iran to the United Nations Security Council over its nuclear weapons program represents a diplomatic success for the Bush administration, which showed unusual flexibility in coaxing Russia and China to back the move." The US and Iran "have been cooperating, albeit uneasily, at close quarters" in Iraq "and their interests converge in several respects. The possibility exists to leverage this convergence into dialogue." For example, "Adel Abdul Mahdi, a potential future prime minister from the most influential Shiite party, suggested he saw the possibility of mediating. 'When we meet American officials, we do not hide our friendship with Iran. Nor do we hide to Iran our interest in better relations with the U.S. There are interests here that can be developed.'"

NYTimes Says International Pressure Is Key. The New York Times (2/8) in an editorial writes that the IAEA referral of Iran to the Un Security Council "is a significant step in the right direction, and Washington deserves credit for agreeing to the modest and cosmetic compromises necessary to build such a broad diplomatic front. Tehran is now certain to use every conceivable ploy to try to shatter that hard-won unity. It should not be allowed to succeed." Continuing to apply concerted international pressure "would at least gain time -- time for energy conservation measures in the United States and elsewhere to lessen Iran's economic leverage, time for the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to be strengthened in ways that make it both more enforceable and more equitable, and time for Iran to elect a government that would be more amenable to reason and more willing to put the economic welfare of its people ahead of building nuclear bombs."

Bush Expresses "Solidarity" With Denmark In Face Of Muslim Protests. The AP (2/8) reports, "President Bush has called Denmark's prime minister to express 'our support and solidarity' in the wake of violence over the publication of caricatures of the prophet Muhammad." And State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "said American diplomats around the world had been directed to offer Denmark whatever assistance it might need to maintain its embassies."

AFP (2/8) adds, "Bush telephoned Rasmussen from his Air Force One presidential plane, and the two 'agreed that the way forward is through dialogue and tolerance, not violence,' said spokesman Scott McClellan." One Danish diplomat said, "Obviously this support from major countries lifts some of the pressure and soothes us, especially when it comes from the Americans and British, who slightly disappointed us earlier by their criticism and lack of solidarity."

Cheney Says Protests Unjustified. NBC Nightly News (2/7, story 3, 1:45, Boettcher) reported, "Thousands marched in Pakistan, Indonesia, Iraq, and Iran to protest the caricatures of the prophet Mohammed published in Denmark and republished elsewhere in Europe." NBC quoted Vice President Cheney, who said, "It's appropriate for people to respect one another's religion but I don't believe that the printing of those cartoons justifies the violence that we've seen." Boettcher: "Even though the protests have been directed at European target, here in Iraq, US military commanders worry that if this crisis does not abate, American forces too will be a target."

Muslim Protests Over Controversial Cartoons Continue To Spread. ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 3, 2:10, Vargas) reported, "Fresh protest erupted across the Islamic world over the cartoons of the prophet Mohammed that many Muslims consider offensive. In Afghanistan, 3 were killed and 22 injured in a violent clash with NATO peacekeepers. Now, some Muslims are venting their rage by calling for the publication of offensive cartoons of their own." ABC (Watt) added, "This morning in Tehran, street protests. Today's targets, the Danish and Norwegian embassies."

The CBS Evening News (2/7, story 3, 2:05, Schieffer) reported, "57 Muslim countries today joined the United Nations and the European Union calling for an end to violent protest against those cartoons of the prophet Mohammed, but the violence went on and for a second day several protesters were killed. Now driving a wedge between some Muslim nations and some in Europe." CBS (Roth) added, "The insult to religion has become the excuse for a protest that's now burning on the fuel of anti-Western anger. And in Gaza or Syria or Iran, there's still plenty of that. In most of Europe though, even France with the continent's biggest Muslim population, the cartoons have caused controversy but hardly any confrontation. One exception was Britain where offended Muslims took their anger to the streets."

Protests May Threaten US Outreach To Muslim World. The Washington Post (2/8, A16, Kessler) reports, "The outrage over cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad poses a challenge for the United States at a time when the Bush administration is investing greater resources to reach out to the Muslim world." One US official said, "We're starting to see the American flag popping up with the Danish flag in protests. … This could be the beginning of a long misunderstanding between the West and East." Even prior to the protests, "U.S. officials monitoring Iranian media out of Dubai had begun to detect a nascent campaign to expose a perceived hypocrisy of American culture. The campaign would focus on gun violence…in a nation that is fighting a war against Islamic extremism and terrorism." Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy Karen Hughes "has been monitoring the situation and is involved in crafting the administration's response. … Thus far, the administration has tried to strike a balance that includes embrace of freedom of expression, displeasure at the cartoons, disgust at the violence and support for the Danish government. U.S. officials have also thrown barbs at Iran and Syria, which they accuse of inflaming the situation for cynical purposes."

The New York Times (2/8, Cowell) reports, "As the protests have spread, some Europeans have come to realize that relatively small Muslim minorities -- 3 percent in Britain, 4 percent in Denmark and around 5 percent in the European Union -- can wield power across the Islamic world." The protests "have set off a profound debate about freedom of expression and supposed double standards. And the spreading protest signified a hardening of extremes that left little room for moderation. 'The moderate Muslim has again been effectively silenced,' said Tabish Khair, professor of English at the University of Aarhus, Denmark." Recent terrorist attacks have "challenged governments and societies to distinguish between moderates and extremists." Meanwhile "there is a seething resentment among some Muslims that they are treated as second-class citizens and potential terrorists in lands that deny the importance of their faith, even though the number of Muslims in Europe totals 20 million, and possibly many more."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/8, Rice-Oxley) reports, "The violence over cartoons satirizing the prophet Muhammad has highlighted often inconsistent rules in Europe governing free speech, tolerance, and the boundaries of public expression." The Monitor continues, "Muslims in particular charge that hate-speech laws are implemented unfairly. Many countries, they say, do not abide anti-Semitic outbursts, but will tolerate cartoons that to many Muslims are deeply offensive." The response from European leaders "has been to frown on those who reproduced images…while insisting that editors were within their legal rights to do so. Governments have refrained from apologizing to the Islamic community because they say publication is a matter for editors, not politicians. Muslim opinion, however, has not been appeased by this response."

Danish Leader Warns Of Growing Global Crisis Over Muslims Cartoons. Bloomberg (2/8, Brogger) quotes Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen saying, "We are facing a growing global crisis." Bloomberg adds, "Radicals and fundamentalists are pursuing their own agendas, he said."

European Diplomats Blame Islamic Regimes For Fanning Protests. The Financial Times (2/8, Turner, Khalaf, Smyth) reports, "The United Nations, the European Union and the Organisation of the Islamic Conference on Tuesday issued a joint appeal for an end to violence around the Muslim world." Yet "they also asserted that while that free speech was a right, it was one that entailed 'responsibility and discretion', and 'should respect the beliefs and tenets of all religions.'" And "as diplomatic efforts to calm tensions were stepped up, European diplomats cautioned against exaggerating the impact of the cartoon controversy. Disapproval of the caricatures, said diplomats, was being exploited by some regimes for political purposes. …. 'This is not the Muslim world jumping against western values. It is Iran, which is being sent to the UN Security Council over its nuclear programme. It is Syria because it reacts to policies that have been taken (against it) by the international community … It is Afghanistan because the security situation there is fragile and deteriorating,' said a diplomat."

Demonstrators Attack Afghanistan NATO Base Over Danish Cartoons. The New York Times (2/8, Wafa, Gall) reports "NATO troops fired on demonstrators in northern Afghanistan on Tuesday in a second day of deadly protests here." In the town of Maimana "three protesters were killed and 22 injured," while "three Afghan police officers…and five Norwegian soldiers…were also injured." This marks "the first time NATO troops…had been attacked at their base by an angry crowd." Sayed Aslam Ziarati, the head of police security in Maimana, "blamed people he called terrorists for turning the demonstration into a violent one."

The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Witte) reports, "The most confrontational protest Tuesday occurred in the northern Afghan city of Meymaneh, where protesters threw stones and grenades at a NATO compound that primarily houses Norwegian soldiers doing reconstruction work. That protest and several others occurred in regions not usually associated with religious extremism or violence." And while other protests were in Afghanistan were peaceful, "violent demonstrations erupted in Kabul, where a small, angry mob grew quickly and as many as 1,000 men marched through the streets in search of Western targets to attack. During a rampage that lasted several hours, protesters trashed U.N. vehicles and threw stones at U.N. buildings, the U.S. Embassy compound, a NATO headquarters and private homes in a neighborhood popular among Westerners." They "tried to gain access to several heavily fortified compounds -- including the U.S. military base -- but were pushed back by security forces. They shouted slogans such as 'Down with the USA!' 'Down with Bush!' 'Down with the Jews!' 'Down with the Christians!' and 'Long live Islam!'"

Danish Aid Agency Expelled From Chechnya. The New York Times (2/8) reports, "The Danish Refugee Council, one of the largest aid organizations working in war-racked Chechnya and its neighboring republics, was expelled from Chechen territory on Tuesday, as anger spread yet further over Danish cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad." The Times adds, "Ramzan A. Kadyrov, acting prime minister of Chechnya and the head of President Vladimir V. Putin's political party in the region, said Monday that Chechnya would not admit 'anything that comes out of Denmark.'"

US Muslim Leaders Criticize Denmark. The Washington Times (2/8, Ward) reports, "American Muslim leaders say there is plenty of blame to go around in the uproar over the cartoons of the prophet Muhammad." They "have told European officials in Washington that the Danish government could have done a better job balancing free speech and respect for religious beliefs." Muslim Public Affairs Council national director Ahmed Younis "said his group organized a meeting Monday with the Danish ambassador to the United States 'to advise on the tone of the response of the Danish government and to offer opportunities for solutions.'"

Reaction In Saudi Arabia Mixed. The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Ambah) notes, "The controversy, one of the most intense in the Islamic world since the publication of Salman Rushdie's 'The Satanic Verses' in the 1980s, has provoked varied reactions here in the birthplace of Muhammad. Some Saudis have lauded the widespread reaction as Muslims' first unified stance in decades, a chance to flex their muscle and teach the West not to gratuitously offend their sensibilities. Others, like Barqah, say Muslims are reacting viscerally, not intelligently, and this, they say, goes against the very teachings of the prophet they are trying to defend."

Iranian Paper Solicits Cartoons Mocking Holocaust. The New York Times (2/8, Fathi) reports, "Iran's largest newspaper on Tuesday announced an international competition for Holocaust cartoons to retaliate against the publication of cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad in Danish newspapers last year." The daily newspaper Hamshahri "said it wanted to see whether freedom of expression extended to mocking the Holocaust." The newspaper said, "The serious question for Muslims is whether the West extends freedom of expression to the crimes committed by the United States and Israel, or an event such as the Holocaust. … Or is its freedom only for insulting religious sanctities?"

ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 3, 2:10, Watts) reported, "And also a new twist -- the leading newspaper announced a competition: Who can draw the best cartoon lampooning the Holocaust." US reaction "was swift." Assistant Secretary of State Sean McCormack: "Any attempt to mock or in any way denigrate the horror that was the Holocaust is simply outrageous." Watt: "Moderate Muslims say this retaliation is offensive, but not blasphemous."

Editor Solicited Muslim Cartoons In Response To Reports Of Muslim Censorship. The Washington Post (2/8, A15, Sullivan) reports, "The global furor over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad can be traced to one day last September when newspaper editor Flemming Rose smelled a good story." Rose "said he'd read that museums in Sweden and London had recently removed artworks their staff deemed offensive to Muslims. A Danish comedian told him that he felt free to desecrate the Bible but that he'd be afraid to do the same to the Koran." He "suspected the art world was self-censoring out of fear of Islamic radicals. So he contacted 25 Danish newspaper cartoonists with a challenge: Draw Muhammad as you see him. Twelve responded, and the newspaper printed their submissions, including one that depicted Islam's holiest figure with a bomb in his turban."

Prophet's Image In Paintings Has Failed To Generate Controversy In Past. The Washington Times (2/8, Sands) reports, "Lost in the furor over cartoons of the prophet Muhammad is the fact that his likeness has long been portrayed in the collections of some of the world's greatest museums and libraries without exciting alarm or comment." Although "rare in the 1,400 years of Islamic art, depictions of Muhammad are found in the collections of such institutions as New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Bibliotheque Nationale de France in Paris and the Edinburgh University library." None has "aroused the anger seen in reaction to a set of satirical cartoons."

Similarly, Amir Taheri, the author of "L'Irak: Le Dessous Des Cartes" in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) notes, "The claim that the ban on depicting Muhammad and other prophets is an absolute principle of Islam is also refuted by history." And "Islamic ethics is based on 'limits and proportions,' which means that the answer to an offensive cartoon is a cartoon, not the burning of embassies or the kidnapping of people designated as the enemy. Islam rejects guilt by association. Just as Muslims should not blame all Westerners for the poor taste of a cartoonist who wanted to be offensive, those horrified by the spectacle of rent-a-mob sackings of embassies in the name of Islam should not blame all Muslims for what is an outburst of fascist energy."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (2/8, A18) editorializes, "The Taliban is probably behind violent demonstrations in Afghanistan. … And the Bush administration has rightly fingered the secular but cynical government of Syria for orchestrating the burning of embassies in Damascus and Beirut." Conflict "between Muslims and the West is the fondest ambition of al Qaeda, the Taliban and other terrorist organizations. … But it also is a convenient refuge for authoritarian regimes hoping to resist the rising pressure for political liberalization in the Middle East." The Post concludes, "The few heroes in this sordid episode reside not in continental newsrooms but in the Middle East. In Jordan…two editors bravely republished the offensive cartoons; they now face prosecution. In Iraq, the Shiite Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani condemned the Muslim inciters. It's not an accident that these Arab voices of reason are also leading proponents of democracy: They, more than anyone, are the ones deserving of the West's support."

cartoon scandal is now leaking into Asia, home to some of the world's most populous and diverse Muslim nations. Yet despite the disquieting reports, reasonable voices of moderation exist. That is, at least, encouraging. The discouraging bit comes when moderate Asian leaders shy away from the vigorous public debate needed to head off future flare-ups." The Journal faults Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi's and Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono's failure to support newspapers' right to publish controversial cartoons because "freedom of the press is paramount for a healthy democracy. … Just look at the radicalization of Muslims in China or Saudi Arabia for an example of how suppression breeds discontent. Malaysia and Indonesia, two young, Muslim-dominated democracies, can take a different path.

Syndicated columnist Kathleen Parker, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/8) writes, "What's clear is that East and West are not just cultures apart, but centuries, and that certain elements of the Muslim world would like to drag us back into the Dark Ages." And Western leaders "have been weak-spined when it comes to defending the principles of free expression that the artists in Denmark were exploring." As "President Bush and Clinton were feeling the pain of religious fanatics, marauders were burning Danish government buildings in Beirut, and Damascus, Syria, and promising Londoners a 9/11 of their own. Such are the fruits of appeasement." Parker states, "There is no equivalence between organized murder on behalf of a malignant social system and a half-dozen nerdy artists, speaking only for themselves, lampooning a fanatical religious sect whose members, by the way, specifically advance the delightful goal of exterminating millions of 'infidels.'"

Souheila al-Jadda, a journalist and member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/8) writes that "these provocative cartoon portrayals came as no surprise to many in the Islamic world. Protesters see this as a pattern of Western attacks against Islam and Muslims -- especially after reports of desecration of the Islamic holy book, the Quran, at the U.S. facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; the abuse of prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan; and the banning of the headscarf, hijab, in public schools in France. Muslims are asking themselves, what's next?" And although "Danish editors are free to publish such cartoons, Muslims are also free to express outrage. The republishing of the caricatures fueled even more anger because it was understood as a message from Europe that their protests, which are part and parcel of free expression, mean nothing." But "the ransacking of embassies and churches as well as the targeting of European nationals by demonstrators must be strongly condemned. These acts only serve to reinforce the very stereotypes Muslims are protesting."

Anne Applebaum in her column in the Washington Post (2/8, A19) writes, "Of course, some good may come out of this story, even in this country. If nothing else, this controversy should bring an end to that naive, charming and sadly incorrect American theory of international relations that 'the more we all learn about one another, the less we will fight.' Gradually, the Islamic world is learning that we don't respect religion in the same manner they do. Slowly, we are learning that they feel differently about the printed word, and the printed picture, from us. And somehow, I've got a feeling that this new knowledge will be not the beginning of understanding but the inspiration for more violence."

WTO Rules For US In Dispute Over GM Biotech Dispute. The New York Times (2/8, Pollack) reports, "The United States won a closely watched trade dispute yesterday when the World Trade Organization ruled that the European Union breached international rules by restricting imports of genetically modified crops and food made from them." The decision, which "was not made public but was discussed by federal trade officials," also "represents a victory for the agricultural biotechnology industry, which for years has been battling opposition to its products from consumers and governments in Europe and some other countries." Europe "could ignore the ruling and instead accept retaliatory tariffs on some of its exports to the United States."

The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Miller, Kilman) reports, "US officials said the finding against the EU sends an important warning to other parts of the world -- particularly nations in Africa and Asia -- against following the European lead in throwing up bans or partial bans against genetically modified crops." The US "has waged an intensive campaign to pry open the EU market, in large part because US biotechnology officials still hope Western Europe some day could be a rich market for their genetically modified seeds."

The Financial Times (2/8, Alden, Grant, Minder) reports the ruling was "castigated by environmental and consumer groups who charged the ruling was a blatant example of international trade rules running roughshod over democratic decisions aimed at protecting consumer health and safety." The Times adds, "A US trade official, briefing reporters on the confidential decision that was released to the countries involved in the dispute late yesterday, said: 'We're please with the outcome. We're not at the end of the road, but it's a significant milestone.'" USA Today (2/8, Weise) and Washington Post (2/8, D1, Gillis, Blustein) also report the story.

Sheriff Tells Congress Mexican Military Was Involved In Border Incident. The Washington Times (2/8, Dinan) reports Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West "and his deputy told Congress yesterday they had 'no doubt' that Mexican military crossed the US border in Texas on Jan. 23, even as Mexican officials announced they have concluded it was known drug traffickers instead." West said, "There's no doubt in my mind there was Mexican military involvement. I've seen it too many times over the years." During a hearing yesterday before a House Homeland Security Committee's investigations subcommittee, "Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar and Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Elizabeth Whitaker said the federal government will wait for an investigation by the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement before drawing conclusions. Chief Aguilar said the number of incursions is decreasing. Asked what help Congress could provide, he said the executive branch is doing enough and he did 'not want to leave the impression our borders are besieged.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Timiraos) reports "Aguilar, told the lawmakers that the United States did not have proof that the individuals in military uniforms were Mexican soldiers, but added that nothing had been ruled out. 'If they weren't Mexican military, why is Mexico just sitting back and allowing this to happen?' said T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, a 10,500-member union of Border Patrol agents. He decried a 'culture of corruption' that allows cartels to operate freely along the border by bribing Mexican authorities." Meanwhile, "Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West warned that inaction could prompt even more daring raids by smugglers. 'It is just a matter of time that the drug cartels will wire their drug loads with explosives and, when caught by law enforcement personnel, detonate the load vehicle,' he said."

McCaul Says Mexican Incursions Into US Are "Out Of Control." Rep. Michael McCaul was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/7) if incursions into the US by the Mexican military is an escalating problem. McCaul said, "We have had over 200 incursions by the Mexican military over the last decade. … Violence on the border is really getting to the point where we are in a crisis. It really -- we talked to the five sheriffs, they testified before my committee. Whether you think they are military, whether you think they were cartels buying the military or cartels dressed up like military, they had 50-caliber weapons and Humvees. These pose a serious threat to law enforcement on the United States side. They are doing everything from throwing rocks on fire to taking shots at them. We have photographs of people on the other side of the border, Mexicans, literally shooting with their weapons. This is really getting out of control, and we need to do something about it."

Half Of "Granny Brigade" Attends Minuteman Rally In Washington. The Washington Post (2/8, B1, Morello, Londoño, Klein) reports on Carmen Mercer's trip through the Washington D.C. area as she travels to a "Capitol Hill rally by the Minuteman Project." Mercer "has headed into the Arizona desert in her Chevrolet pickup" on many nights to patrol the border with another woman. "Locals call them the Granny Brigade." Following Mercer from the airport and around the D.C. area, the Post notes the foreign origins of several of the people she comes in contact with. "In the Washington region, where an estimated one in six residents is foreign-born, she would see a thousand faces of immigration during her visit."

Olmert Unveils Plan To Establish Israel-Palestine Borders. The New York Times (2/8, Myre) reports, "Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said in a television interview broadcast on Tuesday that he wanted to set the country's permanent borders, with Israel giving up significant parts of the West Bank but keeping the largest Jewish settlement blocs." Olmert "says a top priority would be establishing Israel's frontiers, with or without an agreement with the Palestinians." Olmert said, "The direction is clear: we are headed toward a separation from the Palestinians. … We will hold on to the main settlement blocs. But the borders we have in mind are not those Israel has today."

The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Ellingwood) notes it was Olmert's "latest effort to step out of Sharon's shadow and craft his own image, reintroducing himself to Israelis and the world at an exceedingly delicate moment." He "sidestepped the issue of whether he would push for additional unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank after Israel's pullout last summer from the Gaza Strip and four communities in the West Bank" and "expressed support for the U.S.-backed diplomatic blueprint known as the road map," yet "in outlining possible future boundaries that would exclude much of the West Bank, Olmert left open at least the possibility of additional pullbacks by Israel."

USA Today (2/8) in a brief article adds, "Olmert said Israel would retain a 'united Jerusalem,' a term understood as including the eastern part of the city where a large population of Arabs reside."

Hamas Leader Expected To Be Selected As Prime Minister. Reuters (2/8, Perry) reports, "A leader of the Islamist Hamas group said on Tuesday it was very likely that one of its members would become Palestinian prime minister." Asked if "a Hamas member would become the new prime minister, Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh told Reuters in Cairo: 'This is highly expected.' But it was too soon to talk about names, he said."

US, South Korea Discuss Free Trade Deal. The New York Times (2/8, Brooke) reports, "South Korean and American negotiators have started a one-year drive to draw up the United States' largest free trade accord since Nafta went into effect." For the US, "the temptation to win better access to the seventh-largest export market is expected to carry more weight than objections from auto and steel manufacturers." It is not clear "whether both countries can negotiate" the deal "before President Bush's fast-track trade negotiating authority expires next year" yet US ambassador to Japn Thomas Schieffer "recalled the pessimism expressed when President Bush and Prime Minister John Howard of Australia announced in 2003 that their two countries would negotiate a free trade pact in one year."

US Navy Destroyer Boarded Suspected Pirate Ship In Indian Ocean. The Washington Times (2/8, Halloran) reports, "The United States was striking a pre-emptive blow when it ordered a US Navy destroyer to detain and board a suspected pirate ship in the Indian Ocean last month, aiming to see that terrorists do not lash up with pirates in the Asia-Pacific region." The destroyer, the USS Winston S. Churchill, "was ordered to intercept the suspected pirate ship on Jan. 21 after the U.S. Central Command, from its forward headquarters in Bahrain in the Persian Gulf, was contacted by the International Maritime Bureau, based in Malaysia. The maritime bureau monitors piracy all over the world, but especially in Asia." The Times adds, "It took the US warship several hours of maneuvering and firing warning shots to get the smaller vessel to surrender. A Navy boarding party then confiscated a cache of small arms to disarm the ship before sending it on its way."

Polling Stations Jammed In Haitian Presidential Elections. The Los Angeles Times (2/8, Dahlburg, Regnault) reports, "Haitians wearied by spiraling unrest and gang violence turned out in huge numbers Tuesday to choose a new president and parliament, and perhaps put their impoverished Caribbean homeland on the path to greater prosperity and peace." The Times adds "people in line were trampled by other would-be voters frantic to cast their ballot. According to local news reports, one person died of a heart attack, and another of asphyxia."

ABC World News Tonight (2/7, story 5, :10, Vargas) reported "there were accusations of fraud in some poor neighborhoods. Haiti is the poorest country in the hemisphere. It has fallen into chaos lately." The Washington Post (2/8, A11, Roig-Franzia) reports the elections "unfurled chaotically Tuesday but turned peaceful and orderly toward evening." Voters "overwhelmed badly prepared polling places." USA Today (2/8, Harman) and New York Times (2/8, Thompson) also report the story.

Nepal To Vote For Local Officials Today. The New York Times/AP (2/8) reports, "The government ordered security forces on Tuesday to shoot anyone who tried to interfere with elections on Wednesday for mayors and local officials." The balloting "will be the first in seven years, but nearly all the major political parties are boycotting it, calling the vote a sham intended to legitimize King Gyanendra's rule." The AP adds, "Maoist insurgents have threatened to kill anyone who votes. Two candidates have been killed, prompting the government to take out life insurance policies worth up to $10,300 for the more than 2,000 candidates."

The Washington Post (2/8, A11, Lancaster) reports, "Barely a year after seizing absolute power, King Gyanendra is a monarch under siege -- shunned by former allies, struggling to contain a raging Maoist insurgency and confronting a new alliance between the rebels and mainstream political parties that dismiss as farce his plans for restoring democracy." The parties "are boycotting municipal elections scheduled for Wednesday, a step that in combination with Maoist threats has ensured that more than half of the 4,000-plus local seats will not even be contested. The Maoists are also enforcing a week-long general strike that has paralyzed normal life in cities and towns throughout the country." The Post adds, "So tenuous is the king's position that some Nepalese journalists and analysts have begun to speculate about the odds of a military coup, or perhaps a hurried departure by the royal family in the dead of night."

Report Details Increase In US Assistance To Fight AIDS. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Phillips) reports, "The U.S. provided life-extending drugs to nearly half-a-million AIDS patients in the developing world last year, marking a sharp increase in access to antiretroviral treatment, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa, according to a government report to be released today." The Journal notes, "Administration officials hope the report will spur Congress to meet Mr. Bush's new budget request and prompt other wealthy nations to increase their AIDS funding. 'People are alive today because the United States has turned its words into action,' wrote Randall Tobias, the administration's global AIDS coordinator."

Russia Seeks To Boost Credibility By Paying Off Debt, Becoming Donor. The Wall Street Journal (2/8, Chazan) reports, "Flush with petrodollars, Russia…said it will pay off a big chunk of its sovereign debt ahead of schedule this year." That "will improve Russia's credibility as it takes up the rotating presidency of the G-8 and help deflect claims from some in the West that it is too small economically to be a member of the exclusive club." In addition, "Russia is also discussing the possibility of becoming a major donor to the International Development Association. … It also announced plans to forgive $668 million owed it by 16 of the world's highly indebted countries, most of them in Africa." It is "a huge turnaround for a country that barely eight years ago defaulted on its domestic debt and devalued the ruble. Russia is also far advanced in talks to join the World Trade Organization, with bilateral deals reached with most of its trading partners except the U.S."

Nigerian Military Leader Warns Of Continued Unrest As Election Approach. The Financial Times (2/8, Mahtani) reports, "The commander of Nigeria's military operation in the oil-rich Niger delta has warned of more unrest there as Africa's biggest oil producer and most populous nation heads towards national elections next year." Increased "ethnic and political tensions ahead of next month's national census and the 2007 elections are a worry for both multinational oil companies and Nigeria, which produces about 2.5m barrels of oil a day."

Scientists Describe Expedition To Study Rare Species. The Washington Post (2/8, A1, Nakashima) in a front page story reports, "A team of scientists has discovered a lost world of rare plants, giant flowers and bizarre animals…on a mist-shrouded mountaintop in a remote province of Indonesia on New Guinea island." They "found more than 40 species new to science." Bruce Beehler, an ornithologist with Conservation International in Washington and the expedition's co-leader said, "I know the Bush administration is talking about going back to the moon and going to Mars. … But there are plenty of new things to look for right here, in our rain forests, in our oceans. There are whole worlds that are unknown to us."

Georgia Urged To Build Relations With West. Former Estonian Prime Minister Mart Laar in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/8) writes, "There are two main lessons Georgia can learn from" the energy disruptions from Russia. Georgia first "has to continue its integration with West." In addition "the crisis indicated that Georgia has to end its near total dependence on Russian energy sources." Georgia "needs the chance to restore its territorial integrity and find a peaceful solution for the problems of South Ossetia and Abkhazia. Russia's so-called 'peacekeeping' troops in these territories are not protecting the peace, but rather the pieces of the Russian empire. They must be sent home if the situation is to be normalized. Georgia can't be seen as just another little known country that is too far away from the Western world."

Columnist Blames NAFTA For Increase In Illegal Immigration From Mexico. Harold Myerson in his column in the Washington Post (2/8, A19) writes, "With the number of immigrants illegally in the United States estimated at 11 million, the tensions between Americans and Mexicans -- chiefly, working-class Americans and working-class Mexicans -- are rising. And those are tensions that congressional Republicans, who don't look to have a lot of other issues they can run on this fall, are eager to stoke." Meyerson says the boom in illegal immigration is "not because we've let down our guard at the border…the border is more militarized now than it's ever been. The answer is actually simpler than that. In large part, it's NAFTA." For example NAFTA put Mexican farmers "in direct competition with incomparably more efficient U.S. agribusinesses. It proved to be no contest: From 1993 through 2002, at least 2 million Mexican farmers were driven off their land." Meyerson concludes, "So long as the global economy is designed, as NAFTA was, to keep workers powerless, Mexican desperation and American anger will only grow. Forget the fence. We need a new rulebook for the world."

WSJournal Notes Recent Voinovich Support For Bolton. The Wall Street Journal (2/8) editorializes that after Sen. George Voinovich's recent praise of U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton, "We called the Senator's office to confirm he was talking about the same guy he had pilloried just eight months before. Lo, he was. 'He's doing a good job, I wouldn't say great,' says a Voinovich spokeswoman of Mr. Bolton. She adds that by 'following up' regularly with the Senator, Mr. Bolton's diplomatic skills appear to be getting better, particularly in building coalitions for U.N. reform." The Journal concludes, "No doubt Mr. Bolton is deeply grateful for the counsel of his newfound mentor. But we hope it's not rude to point out that perhaps Mr. Bolton is the same fellow he's always been, and with the same skills. Maybe Mr. Voinovich is the one who's learning on the job. In any case, we look forward to the Senator's 'aye' vote if the President renominates Mr. Bolton for confirmation by the full Senate next January."

Judge Is Urged To Intervene For Detainee Held in Iraq

NEIL A. LEWIS

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 Lawyers for a 44-year-old naturalized American citizen have been pressing a federal district judge to intervene in their client's case, saying that he had been arrested and held in Iraq for more than a year without being charged or given access to a lawyer.

But the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l", in its first formal response, said on Tuesday that the prisoner, Shawqi

Ahmad Omar, was not a businessman who was in Iraq simply looking for construction contracts, as his lawyers assert. He is, department officials said in a brief, a close associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, and he may be guilty of war crimes.

In its papers, the officials said that Mr. Omar had been captured in Baghdad harboring an Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian foreign fighters who entered Iraq illegally and admitted that they went there to fight American forces.

The officials added that the Jordanians said that Mr. Omar was plotting to kidnap foreigners from Baghdad hotels, using his fluency in English gained during his years in the United States. The government said that when he was arrested, his house contained weapons and materials for making improvised bombs.

Mr. Omar's lawyers have asked Judge Ricardo M. Urbina to review his case, which they have asserted has resulted in wide-scale violations of the rights to which he is entitled as a United States citizen. They have also asked Judge Urbina to block any transfer of Mr. Omar to Iraqi government custody, which they said would be a ruse by the United States to avoid federal court jurisdiction.

The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" argued that Mr. Omar was not in military custody, the basis under which his lawyers say a federal judge has jurisdiction over his case. The officials asserted that he was held by the Multi-National Force, a coalition of 27 nations that is assisting Iraq at the request of the United Nations.

To support that argument, the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" included an affidavit from Maj. Gen. John D. Gardner, who describes himself as the commander of detainee operations for the multinational force. While there are, in fact, other nations represented in the military coalition in Iraq, the detention system run by the military in Baghdad is widely regarded as an essentially American-led system. General Gardner has been described regularly in news reports as commander of the American-managed detention system in Iraq.

Nonetheless, the case of Mr. Omar -- an American citizen arrested in Iraq by the military authorities -- presents a new situation for the courts, which are already grappling with several questions involving the conflict between national security interests and civil liberties. Courts have had to deal with issues involving American citizens arrested in the United States and Afghanistan and those held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, but Mr. Omar's case appears to be the first one before a federal court of an American citizen detained in Iraq.

Jonathan Hafetz of the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University, one of several American lawyers representing Mr. Omar, said before the government filing that "neither we nor his family know why he is being held." He added, "We're asking the court to provide him with the due process rights he is entitled to as an American citizen."

Mr. Hafetz said that Mr. Omar's wife had been told by American consular officials that her husband was to be transferred to Iraqi custody. "As an interim matter, we're trying to prevent any middle-of-the-night transfer to circumvent the federal court's jurisdiction," Mr. Hafetz said.

The lawsuit, which was filed against the secretary of the Army, is being brought in Mrs. Omar's name because her husband is unavailable to sign papers, the lawyers said.

The papers filed on Mrs. Omar's behalf say that her husband had gone to Iraq after the overthrow of Saddam Hussein in hope of obtaining contracts on reconstruction work. His lawyers say that Mr. Omar was born in Kuwait to Jordanian parents and he served in the Minnesota National Guard and became a citizen in 1986. The government said he retained his Jordanian citizenship as well.

Lawyer of the lost - The US won't release the Chinese Muslims being held illegally at Guantanamo Bay. Sabin Willett can't let them go either.

By Bella English, Globe Staff

Most weekday mornings find Sabin Willett on the commuter train, headed in from Natick to his job as a partner and bankruptcy lawyer at the white-shoe firm Bingham McCutchen. He often wears the corporate uniform: tailored suit, white shirt, power tie, and he frequently has his Sony Vaio laptop open, jabbing at the keys -- he's had three novels published, to good reviews, and a fourth ready to go.

There's another Sabin Willett, the one who wears khakis, sleeps in 12-buck-a-night digs, eats military mush in the chow hall, and dodges banana rats and turkey buzzards in the steamy heat of Guantanamo Bay. He is representing indigent clients being held there by the US government, volunteering his time after reading newspaper accounts of the men's detention. "Gitmo," he says, using the base's nickname, "was not only revolting, it was illegal." He found his way to the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, which steered him to the Uighur cases.

Like most Americans, Willett had never heard the word "Uighurs" -- he certainly couldn't spell it -- until he agreed to represent two of them. But he has quickly become an expert on the Chinese Muslims who "live in the part of the world that's always in the crease of the atlas when you open it up," as he puts it. He spent a recent week bunking in the Combined Bachelors' Quarters, visiting his clients on the base at the southern tip of Cuba. It was his fourth trip; during his first, in July, he found them in leg shackles chained to a bolt in the floor.

A tiny minority, the Uighurs (pronounced "WEE-gurs") have been oppressed by the Chinese government for decades. At least 15 of them are being held at Guantanamo. They're not terrorists; even the government agrees with that. They were simply in the wrong place at the wrong time -- Afghanistan and Pakistan in the weeks following Sept. 11, 2001, when American troops rounded up suspected terrorists and shipped them to the naval station. Willett's clients, he says, were waiting for visas en route to jobs in Turkey when the bombs began to fall.

The Uighurs are now in their fifth year of confinement, even though the US military has concluded that they are not "enemy combatants." In fact, a federal court in December found their imprisonment illegal. But US District Judge James Robertson in Washington, D.C., also said that he had no authority to release them, as they have nowhere to go.

"This indefinite imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay is unlawful," Robertson wrote. But he added: "The question in this case is whether the law gives me the power to do what I believe justice requires. The answer, I believe, is no." The judge said he could not order the men released into the United States because that would interfere with the immigration powers of the executive branch of government.

Which leaves them in geographical and legal limbo. They'd be persecuted if sent back to China, the Bush administration has refused to grant them asylum, and several countries have declined to accept them. Willett had asked for his clients to be sent to a small Uighur community outside of Washington, D.C., to no avail.

"It's heartbreaking from a legal perspective," says Willett, 48, who is appealing the decision. "It's a bizarre conclusion, to have a judge say the executive branch is acting illegally, but he can't do anything about it."

The sheer logistics of the case are frustrating, too. It took months for Willett to gain FBI clearance. Then he had to find an interpreter who speaks both English and Uighur. "There are like four of them in the world, and two of them are our translators," he says. And only one of the two has been fully cleared by the FBI to go to Guantanamo, which Willett's firm -- handling the cases pro bono -- pays for. Willett also had to convince the suspicious Uighurs that he was indeed their attorney and not a government interrogator. Although his law firm is representing 12 Uighurs, attorneys have been allowed to see only two of them, because of red tape. Willett says the government keeps finding ways to delay, and a court has yet to rule on motions made by his law firm that would clarify the process of legal representation.

A sharp contrastWillett's experience in Guantanamo stands in stark contrast to his Boston practice. On Guantanamo, it took nine months to get a ruling from a judge. In bankruptcy court, he says, he can get a hearing on a day's notice and a decision shortly after. "People are well prepared, judges are smart, things go quickly. And it's just financial matters."

Dan Glosband, a partner at Goodwin Procter, has opposed Willett on several cases. On one such case, Willett came up with what Glosband calls a "creative" theory for a particular business transaction and convinced the jury he was right. "He is very capable and very well prepared," Glosband says.

Robin Phelan, a partner in Haynes and Boone of Dallas, has been on the other side of the courtroom from Willett, too. "He's good, a smart guy, he knows what he's doing." But Phelan says he's most jealous of Willett's sonorous voice: "It's like he went to central casting and said, 'Make me a litigator.' Even when he's talking total BS, it sounds good."

After graduating magna cum laude from Harvard, Willett worked as a reporter for a year, covering crime at The Greenville News, a daily paper in South Carolina. He returned to Harvard Law School, graduating cum laude, and then moved to Concord, N.H., to practice law. Like Greenville, that didn't last, either.

"I wanted to be a country gentleman," he says. "It didn't work out, so I came back to Boston."

Willett has always had one cause or another. In 1979, he gave the senior Latin dissertation at Harvard, lambasting the raising of the legal drinking age from 18 to 21. Happy hour for students, he complained, had been reduced to "milk and cookies," and the "Conscript Fathers of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts . . . have worked to banish Bacchus from our shady yard" while their own cups "runneth over."

He and his wife, Marta, have six children: his four and her two. When he's not working or writing his novels, he spends a lot of time at swim meets, where, his daughter Claire says, he also lugs his laptop. Though he writes arcane law journal articles such as "Bankruptcy Trial Tactics" and "The Shallows of Deepening Insolvency," fiction is his passion. Sometimes on the train he is so engrossed in writing that he'll miss his stop.

The first book, "The Deal," he calls a "shameless Grisham knockoff." The second, "The Betrayal," was a political thriller. His third, published in 2003, was a departure. "Present Value" is a devastatingly funny satire about the rich and powerful, about misplaced values and a society almost umbilically tethered to BlackBerries.

"Plastic dopeheads. Always ready for a fix -- reaching for an electronic mainline the moment an aircraft door opened or a conference flagged. . . . The Berry must be read, always and everywhere. In a restaurant, for example. On the train. In the Little League dugout while Johnny was leaning in for the sign. During dinner at home. In the FastLane approaching the Newton tolls. In a theater. . . . The prospect of an electronic message was more immediate, more vital, more interesting than whatever the poor human being in the room was saying."

No, Willett does not own a BlackBerry.

A financial bankruptcy is the device he uses in "Present Value" to plumb the moral bankruptcy of overpriced attorneys, greedy businessmen, incompetent politicians, uncaring shrinks, snooty suburbs, and pretentious private schools, a world where people are measured by their paycheck, their car, and their accessories. "Even the kids have to have the $109 Patagonia backpack . . . while the $79.99 JanSport would do in a pinch."

Claire Willett, 18, served as an adviser on the name brands that pepper the novel. "He's kind of clueless in the fashion world," she says. "He wears clogs like chefs wear, and the bag he carries is kind of a mess."

No wimpy wingtips for Willett -- he even wears the clogs to court. "I get a lot of heat for them, but they are comfortable," he says.

The law of warIn October, Willett gave a speech on Guantanamo at the Boston University School of Law. His opening remarks could have been plucked from one of his novels: "The boots crunch across the gravel, and you hurry behind a young sailor. It is hot and so silent as to be a little eerie in this small, sterile camp, ringed by boxes with men in them. Nothing grows in here: no grass or flower or tree or even weed. You pass a cage, open to the sun, about 8 foot square, that contains a soccer ball, and which can't be someone's idea of an exercise yard -- can it?"

Though his normal daily bread is debtors and creditors, convertible debentures and vulture investors, he has taken a crash course in habeas corpus, the law of war, and the Geneva Conventions. He has studied the Army Field Manual and other cases in the war on terror. He has researched the Uighurs and their plight in China.

"I want my flag back," he told the BU students. "If we care about being a civilized people, then it is precisely in times of fear that we have to hold fastest to our rule of law."

At Guantanamo, there are strict rules. Willett can bring papers, without staples. When he leaves the base, he must turn over all his notes to the Navy to be checked for classified information. He brought one of his clients a DVD of his children, but there was no TV to play it on, no newspapers or magazines -- despite the government's promise to supply such items to the Uighurs. Anything Willett takes in, he must leave with, including pictures of his client's children.

After meeting with the two men recently, he reports that they are "frustrated, very lonely, missing their families, trying to be resolute." In an affidavit he filed with the US Court of Appeals on his most recent trip to Guantanamo, he observed "in the demeanor, tone and conversation of the Appellants a more depressed affect than I have seen in earlier meetings."

Willett minces no words when discussing his opinion of the Bush administration's actions regarding Guantanamo detainees. "Knuckleheads" is one. "An administration with confidence would have the guts to say of course mistakes are made during war," he says.

Terry Henry, the lead government attorney on the cases, would not comment on the Guantanamo detainees.

During a recent forum sponsored by the Boston Bar Association, Willett stressed that Americans don't know and don't care about Guantanamo. "It applies to some vague group of people we can't see, far away."

But surely some of the 500 prisoners at Guantanamo are indeed members of Al Qaeda? Willett acknowledges there may be terrorists and criminals there. "But who knows? Where are the prosecutions, four years later?"

As a satirist, Sabin Willett finds irony everywhere. His Uighur clients live in "Camp Iguana" at the base. "There are actually iguanas that go in and out," he says. "If you were to hit an iguana with your jeep, it would cost you $10,000 under the Endangered Species Act." His point? "The iguanas have rights at Camp Iguana. My clients don't."

Evangels want in on Air Force suit

By TOM ROEDER THE GAZETTE

A Colorado Springs-based evangelical organization is expected to file court papers today asking to intervene in a lawsuit that charges the Air Force with religious intolerance.

The Air Force won't comment, but the National Association of Evangelicals says it has talked with government attorneys and is entering the case to defend the rights of evangelical chaplains.

"We have been in collaboration with the Air Force attorneys working on this case," said Kyle Fisk, executive administrator for the evangelical group. "It is the policy of the Air Force to remain neutral when it comes to intervention, but we believe we are doing the Air Force a service."

Ted Haggard, pastor of New Life Church in Colorado Springs, is president of the association. He was out of town and unavailable for comment.

Last fall, New Mexico resident Mikey Weinstein sued the Air Force, saying non-Christian cadets at the Air Force Acade- my face discrimination from evangelical Christians. His suit, which was joined by four Air Force officers, asks for an outright ban on uninvited proselytizing and evangelism throughout the service.

Tuesday, he said the intervention of the evangelical group, the second to ask to join on the Air Force's side, proves his point.

"I am thunderstruck that a branch of government would collaborate with fundamentalist Christians to convert members of the armed forces to evangelical Christianity," said Weinstein.

Fisk said there was nothing inappropriate about his group's routine talks with government attorneys and said the Air Force hasn't endorsed its actions. He said there has been no collaboration between his group and the Air Force to push Christian views.

"We simply are defending all people's faith and their right to free expression with their faith," Fisk said.

Federal District Judge James Parker has yet to rule on a similar request for intervention by the Alliance Defense Fund, a Christian legal group that wants to intervene on behalf of an academy chaplain.

Arguments on Alliance's motion to intervene have not been scheduled.

The Air Force, in court papers, didn't take a position on that intervention, and its Justice Department attorney, Andrew Tannenbaum, declined comment Tuesday on the move by Haggard's group.

Legal experts say the Air Force would probably be better off without Haggard's intervention.

Having evangelicals intervene in the suit could turn it into a broader debate about the public behavior of evangelical Christians, said Alan Wolfe, director of The Boisi Center for Religion and American Public Life at Boston College.

Wolfe said the Air Force would likely prefer for the whole thing to be disposed of quietly.

"I would think that the Air Force would prefer that this would be handled through outside legal channels," he said.

John Witte Jr., director of the Law and Religion Program at Emory University in Atlanta, said although religious organizations often make their views known in church-state dust-ups through “friend of the court” briefs, it’s extremely rare for them to try to jump into the lawsuit itself.

“I would think their intervention would be resisted” by the Air Force, Witte said.

Court papers show the Air Force is focusing on getting Weinstein’s lawsuit dismissed. The service says Weinstein can’t prove he’s been hurt by religious tolerance policies at the school.

Fisk said that although his group is also pulling for a dismissal, it wants to be heard if the case goes to trial.

“This goes beyond one chaplain and one military service,” he said. “What’s going on is a systemic attack on religious expression in the United States military.”

He said because the National Association of Evangelicals is the sponsoring religion of many military chaplains, it has a right to be heard in the case.

“We believe that chaplains need to be represented,” he said.

Natural Ovens resolves label suit - FDA pressed case after finding discrepancy in nutritional information

By Charlie Mathews
Herald Times Reporter and the Associated Press

MILWAUKEE — Natural Ovens Bakery Inc. of Manitowoc has agreed to change labels on its breads, muffins and bagels following a U.S. Department of Justice lawsuit alleging they were misleading.

The suit said tests showed that Golden Crunch Carb Conscious Bread, Golden Crunch Bagels, Carrot Nut Muffins, Gourmet Dinner Rolls and Paul's Oats had incorrect levels listed for certain ingredients.

The bread label, for example, listed 3 grams of net carbohydrates, but it actually had 7 grams, according to the suit.

"It makes it sound like we've done a lot of bad things but we haven't," said Barb Stitt on Tuesday. She is the president of the company founded by her husband, Paul Stitt, in 1976.

"When you are dealing with whole grain natural products, it is difficult to have the measurements come out the same every time," Stitt said. "Nothing has been done that has harmed a single person."

The Food and Drug Administration inspected Natural Ovens in March and sampled eight products, according to the suit.

It said the agency gave the company a report with test results in April, but misleading claims still were on the products as of September.

The FDA also took Natural Ovens to task last year for marketing three foods with a "Pain Prevention Program" brochure, telling it the product claims made them subject to classification as new drugs that needed FDA approval.

The suit says Natural Ovens failed to heed the FDA's warnings and continued to promote the products with illegal claims.

"The stunning thing is there are junk foods out there that are loaded with corn syrup, contribute to diabetes and various things but that seems to be approved," Barb Stitt said.

"We are making all natural foods with no refined sugars, no trans fats, and no refined white flour," she said.

Stitt acknowledged the manufacturers of what she labeled as junk foods don't make claims their products are healthy.

"We weren't aware we were making any claims," she said. But information in Natural Ovens' newsletters, on its Web site and in books authored by the Stitts are considered to be part of label information by the FDA, Stitt said.

Chelle Blaszczyk, marketing manager for Natural Ovens, said the company worked out an agreement with the government to settle the suit. A consent decree was filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Milwaukee.

The company has hired a Washington, D.C., law firm to review all label claims for compliance with FDA regulations, and a laboratory in Minneapolis will do product analysis testing to make sure ingredient calculations are correct, Blaszczyk said.

Court backs asylum for sect supporter

Bob Egelko

A Bay Area woman who faced arrest in her native China for bringing in foreign newspaper articles critical of the government's treatment of the Falun Gong spiritual movement is eligible for political asylum, a federal appeals court ruled Tuesday.

Ling Zhou was not a member of the outlawed group, but would risk persecution if deported to China because she would be viewed as a supporter of "a perceived anti-governmental movement," said the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. In a 3-0 ruling, the court said her likely punishment would be "re-education through labor" and as much as three years in prison.

The ruling is important because the court recognized that "the persecution of Falun Gong extends to sympathizers and supporters," said Chung Phang, a lawyer for Zhou.

The Chinese Consulate did not respond to a request for comment. Falun Gong, which incorporates aspects of Eastern religions with meditation and breathing exercises, was banned by China in 1999 as a dangerous cult.

Zhou, who now lives in Fremont, had a supervisory job with a software company in the central Chinese city of Guangzhou in May 2000 when she met a former college classmate, Yung Su, who was a Falun Gong practitioner. At Su's request, the next time Zhou took one of her regular business trips to Singapore, she brought back about 20 newspaper articles attacking China's crackdown on Falun Gong, the court said.

Zhou left later that month on a trip to the United States and soon learned that police had been to her home and her parents' home, had summoned her brother for questioning and had arrested Su. Zhou has since learned that her mother was taken away by security officers about a year ago and has not resurfaced, Phang said.

She remained in the United States and applied for asylum, but was turned down by immigration\l "l" judges\l "l", who decided that she lacked credibility and that she faced criminal prosecution, not political persecution, if returned to China. The appeals court disagreed and said the Chinese government's opposition to Falun Gong and its supporters is political.

York manufacturer admits making false report in work for Army

John Beauge

The Patriot-News, Harrisburg, Pa.

Feb. 8--WILLIAMSPORT -- A York company has pleaded guilty in federal court to making false statements to the Army in 2001 about tests of air-conditioning units for Patriot missile shelters.

WEDJ/Three Cs Inc. entered the plea before U.S. Middle District Senior Judge James F. McClure Jr., who deferred sentencing until May. The government and WEDJ had agreed earlier that a $100,000 fine would be sufficient punishment.

Terms of the settlement of a companion civil suit, in which the government is seeking more than $4.6 million from WEDJ, should be filed with the court soon, McClure was told.

A document filed in conjunction with the guilty plea states that WEDJ proposes to pay the government $840,000 and return to the Army certain parts that were purchased for $170,404 as part of the contract to make the equipment.

Keith A. Zimmerman, the whistle-blower who alerted the government to what the company did, has indicated he plans to contest the settlement because he believes he should be rewarded monetarily, Assistant U.S\l "l". Attorney\l "l" Bruce Brandler said.

The criminal and civil cases relate to a 1998 contract WEDJ had with the Army to design, manufacture and deliver about 180 environmental-control units to cool Patriot missile shelters in the desert to prevent damage to computers.

The first six units failed tests conducted by the company, but the late Vincent Bertucci, then general manager at WEDJ, had others falsify documents to show they passed, Brandler said.

As a result of the false report that WEDJ certified and sent to the Army, three units were shipped and ultimately malfunctioned, the prosecutor said.

The Army had paid WEDJ $851,000 by the time it canceled the contract in June 2002, Brandler said. Of that, $500,000 was paid after the false report was submitted, he said.

George Cooper, 88, the vice president of WEDJ, agreed with Brandler's description of what occurred.

The civil suit claims WEDJ used reconditioned parts, falsified purchase orders and certificates of compliance and failed to document substitution of parts for those that failed during testing.

Besides WEDJ, other defendants named in the lawsuit are CEO Neil R. Tucker, United Cool Air Corp. of the same York address, chief engineer James Morrison and Bertucci.

Dear Secretary Rumsfeld:

I am writing to request that you release a detailed list of all contacts between officials in your agency and Jack Abramoff, his associates, and the clients he represented between January 20, 2001, and today. I also request an explanation of any changes in federal policy based on those contacts. This is not the first request seeking the release of these records, and the resistance to these requests is troubling to the American people.

As you are aware, Mr. Abramoff has recently pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion charges related to his attempts to influence federal government policy in both the Congress and the Executive Branch. The Justice Department is currently investigating this influence-peddling scandal. Published reports show that Bush Administration officials have met with Mr. Abramoff approximately 200 times.

I strongly believe that Members of Congress and all federal employees must be held to the highest ethical standards. As the Congress considers legislation to reform federal ethics laws, we must know the extent to which lobbyists like Mr. Abramoff affect federal policy in both the Congress and the Executive Branch. That is why, during the 2004 Presidential campaign, I released the names of lobbyists I met with during my time in the Senate.

As part of that process, it is critical for the Congress to know about each contact that Mr. Abramoff has had with officials in your agency and whether any of those contacts led to any changes in federal policy. This information will help determine what additional changes to our ethics laws are necessary to stop lobbyists and others from using undue and improper influence in their dealings with the federal government.

I am deeply disappointed that the Bush Administration has repeatedly failed to provide any substantive information regarding its interactions with Mr. Abramoff. Refusing to disclose this information is completely inconsistent with the high ethical

The Honorable Donald Rumsfeld

Dear Secretary Rumsfeld:

On Tuesday, we sent a letter to President Bush asking that he and officials within his Administration detail whatever contact they might have had with Jack Abramoff. Scott McClellan announced that the White House would not provide this information, despite earlier assurances. Therefore, we have no choice but to ask you these questions directly.

As we are sure you are aware, the Justice Department is currently investigating the web of corruption surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Even at this early stage of the investigation, concerns have been raised that Mr. Abramoff may have had undue and improper influence within the highest levels of the Bush Administration and even the White House itself. Such accusations serve to undermine the credibility of this Administration and our government at large -- even before any indictments or convictions. As a result, it is crucial that the American people know what role, if any, Mr. Abramoff played in the highest levels of our government.

As more and more Republican officials in and out of Congress are implicated in this scandal, it has become increasingly important that the record be cleared and that any contact you or others in the Administration have had with Mr. Abramoff be fully explained to the American people. For this reason, we urge you to publicly and immediately detail all of your personal contacts with Mr. Abramoff during your time with the Bush Administration. If you know of others in the Administration who have had such contacts, please disclose those contacts as well. Please also detail any official acts that have been undertaken on behalf of or at the request of Mr. Abramoff. Perhaps there are no contacts to reveal, no favors that have been given. We hope that is the case. But it is important to set the record straight, one way or the other.

Additionally, we believe is it imperative that you reveal any involvement in the "K Street Project," the initiative launched in recent years by Republicans close to this Administration who have worked hard to increase the ties between lobbyists like Jack Abramoff and Republican elected officials.

Subject: versions of the Graham amendment

[redacted]attached is the base Graham amendment filed on Nov. 10, number 2515, and the perfecting amendment filed the same day, number 2516, as they appeared in the record. The perfecting amendment makes only one change, adding a new sentence at the very end. Levin voted against the perfecting amendment adding the effective-date language. (Conveniently, the record of that vote appears in the record on the same page as amendment number 2516.)

If you want to get into deep leg history, the text and structure of the Graham amendment were borrowed from S.1088, a habeas reform package that Sen. Kyl introduced in May. (A copy is attached.) The "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction" language is borrowed from S.1088, as is the effective date language of "shall apply to cases pending on or after." S.1088 was not a pure jurisdiction ousting amendment - many of its parts simply create new standards, and are not jurisdictional in nature. Thus in S.1088, it was necessary to expressly apply the new standards to pending claims. Also, where S.1088 bars new claims, it is designed to force their dismissal or rejection, not to force litigants to reformulate the claims. You could argue that the original Graham amendment's language was borrowed from S.1088, but that upon further reflection it became clear to Graham and Kyl that S.1088's "applying to" language was not really appropriate for the Graham amendment for the reasons previously noted - i.e., there is no ambiguity about the effect of pure jurisdiction removal on pending claims, and Graham and Kyl wanted to effect reformulation of the pending claims, not their outright dismissal.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. The group that is working on the Kerry amendment, with the proposed Roberts-Rockefeller second degree, is working diligently, but it is important that we continue on the bill. At this time, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts be laid aside and that the Senator from South Carolina be recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KERRY. Reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Is it my understanding that upon the disposition of the next amendment, this will be the pending business?

Mr. WARNER. That can easily be arranged.

Mr. KERRY. Can we have that?

Mr. WARNER. I so ask.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order pending further action of the body.

Mr. WARNER. I yield the floor.

AMENDMENT NO. 2515

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 2515 which is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM], for himself, Mr. KYL, and Mr. CHAMBLISS, proposes an amendment numbered 2515.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: Relating to the review of the status of detainees of the United States Government)

At the end of subtitle G of title X, add the following:

SEC. ___. REVIEW OF STATUS OF DETAINEES.

(a) SUBMITTAL OF PROCEDURES FOR STATUS REVIEW OF DETAINEES AT GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA.—Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the congressional defense committees, and to the Committees on the Judiciary of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a report setting forth the procedures of the Combatant Status Review Tribunals and the noticed Administrative Review Boards in operation at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for determining the status of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay.

(b) PROCEDURES.—The procedures submitted to Congress pursuant to subsection (a) shall, with respect to proceedings beginning after the date of the submittal of such procedures under that subsection, ensure that—

(1) in making a determination of status of any detainee under such procedures, a Combatant Status Review Tribunal or Administrative Review Board may not consider statements derived from persons that, as determined by such Tribunal or Board, by the preponderance of the evidence, were obtained with undue coercion; and

(2) the Designated Civilian Official shall be an officer of the United States Government whose appointment to office was made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(c) REPORT ON MODIFICATION OF PROCEDURES.—The Secretary of Defense shall submit to the committees of Congress referred to in subsection (a) a report on any modification of the procedures submitted under subsection (a) not later than 30 days before the date on which such modifications go into effect.

(d) JUDICIAL REVIEW OF DETENTION OF ENEMY COMBATANTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 2241 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(e) No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien outside the United States (as that term is defined in section 101(a)(38) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(38)) who is detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.''.

(2) CERTAIN DECISIONS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of any decision of a Designated Civilian Official described in subsection (b)(2) that an alien is properly detained as an enemy combatant.

(B) LIMITATION ON CLAIMS.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit under this paragraph shall be limited to claims brought by or on behalf of an alien—

(i) who is, at the time a request for review by such court is filed, detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and

(ii) for whom a Combatant Status Review Tribunal has been conducted, pursuant to applicable procedures specified by the Secretary of Defense.

(C) SCOPE OF REVIEW.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on any claims with respect to an alien under this paragraph shall be limited to the consideration of whether the status determination of the Combatant Status Review Tribunal with regard to such alien was consistent with the procedures and standards specified by the Secretary of Defense for Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

(D) TERMINATION ON RELEASE FROM CUSTODY.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit with respect to the claims of an alien under this paragraph shall cease upon the release of such alien from the custody of the Department of Defense.

(3) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to any application or other action that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act. Paragraph (2) shall apply with respect to any claim regarding a decision covered by that paragraph that is pending on or after such date.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, will you notify me when I have used 15 minutes of the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will so notify the Senator.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, this whole debate we are having now with Senator KERRY, what we did with Senator MCCAIN's amendment earlier, and what I am trying to do, is a healthy debate about where we are going as a nation, how we prosecute the war on terror, and what kind of value set we are going to adopt.

One thing we need to understand as a nation and we need to understand in the Senate, in my opinion, is that the attack of 9/11 was an act of war. It was not a criminal enterprise. That is an important statement to make. Every Senator needs to understand in their own mind: Was 9/11 and were those who planned it and those who blew up the people in Jordan yesterday common criminals or are these people engaged in acts of terrorism and war? Let it be said clearly, in my opinion, that the United States is at war with al-Qaida and associate groups, and we have been since 9/11.

When a country such as the United States is at war, we have a rich tradition of following the law of armed conflict, of living up to the Geneva Conventions and all other international treaties that regulate the conduct of war. We have a moral imperative as a nation not to lose our way in fighting this war. Using tactics of one's enemy is no excuse in defeating one's enemy.

It is clear to me from Abu Ghraib backward, forward, and other things we know about that at times we have lost our way in fighting this war. What we are trying to do in a series of amendments is recapture the moral high ground and provide guidance to our troops. That is why Senator MCCAIN's amendment, which I cosponsored, is so important, and it passed by voice vote.

The McCain amendment requires standardization of interrogation techniques when it comes to people in our charge, not as criminal defendants but as enemy combatants, people detained on the battlefield, POWs. It requires the Army Field Manual, not the United States Code, to be changed in a way to give our troops the guidance they need as to what is in bounds and out of bounds when it comes to interrogating prisoners. It is important that we get good information. It is equally important that we not lose our value set in obtaining that information.

Senator MCCAIN has two things in his amendment that we desperately need. It standardizes interrogation techniques for the military, dealing with people who are part of this war, our enemies, and it also makes a statement to every other agency in the Government that you are going to treat people humanely if they are captured under your charge as part of fighting this war.

Guantanamo Bay is a place we have designated to take people off the battlefield and hold them, and the determinations that go on at Guantanamo Bay fall into two categories. Some can be prosecuted for violations of the law of war, not criminal violations in

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: Relating to the review of the status of detainees of the United States Government)

Strike all after the word SEC.

____. REVIEW OF STATUS OF DETAINEES.

(a) SUBMITTAL OF PROCEDURES FOR STATUS REVIEW OF DETAINEES AT GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA.—Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the congressional defense committees, and to the Committees on the Judiciary of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a report setting forth the procedures of the Combatant Status Review Tribunals and the noticed Administrative Review Boards in operation at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for determining the status of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay.

(b) PROCEDURES.—The procedures submitted to Congress pursuant to subsection (a) shall, with respect to proceedings beginning after the date of the submittal of such procedures under that subsection, ensure that—

(1) in making a determination of status of any detainee under such procedures, a Combatant Status Review Tribunal or Administrative Review Board may not consider statements derived from persons that, as determined by such Tribunal or Board, by the preponderance of the evidence, were obtained with undue coercion; and

(2) the Designated Civilian Official shall be an officer of the United States Government whose appointment to office was made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(c) REPORT ON MODIFICATION OF PROCEDURES.—The Secretary of Defense shall submit to the committees of Congress referred to in subsection (a) a report on any modification of the procedures submitted under subsection (a) not later than 30 days before the date on which such modifications go into effect.

(d) JUDICIAL REVIEW OF DETENTION OF ENEMY COMBATANTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 2241 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(e) No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien outside the United States (as that term is defined in section 101(a)(38) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(38)) who is detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.''.

(2) CERTAIN DECISIONS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of any decision of a Designated Civilian Official described in subsection (b)(2) that an alien is properly detained as an enemy combatant.

(B) LIMITATION ON CLAIMS.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit under this paragraph shall be limited to claims brought by or on behalf of an alien—

(i) who is, at the time a request for review by such court is filed, detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and

(ii) for whom a Combatant Status Review Tribunal has been conducted, pursuant to applicable procedures specified by the Secretary of Defense.

(C) SCOPE OF REVIEW.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on any claims with respect to an alien under this paragraph shall be limited to the consideration of whether the status determination of the Combatant Status Review Tribunal with regard to such alien was consistent with the procedures and standards specified by the Secretary of Defense for Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

(D) TERMINATION ON RELEASE FROM CUSTODY.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit with respect to the claims of an alien under this paragraph shall cease upon the release of such alien from the custody of the Department of Defense.

(3) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to any application or other action that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act. Paragraph (2) shall apply with respect to any claim regarding a decision covered by that paragraph that is pending on or after such date.

This section shall become effective 1 day after enactment.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Debate is equally divided on the amendment. Is there further debate?

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, let me speak briefly in opposition to this amendment.

This amendment contains a provision that I think is a very major mistake. It essentially denies all courts anywhere the right to consider any petition from any prisoner being held at Guantanamo Bay. In my view, it is contrary to the way the court decisions have come down already. It is an extraordinary step for this Congress to be taking as an amendment to the Defense bill. This is an issue that should be dealt with in the Judiciary Committee. Senator SPECTER has spoken against the amendment. Senator LEVIN has spoken against the amendment. Senator LEAHY has spoken against the amendment. It is something that requires hearings. It is a very important issue, and we should not be dealing with it here on a late evening on Thursday as part of this authorization bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, we need to standardize our interrogation techniques because we have lost our way. We need to make a statement we are not going to treat people poorly during our charge. For 200 years in the law of armed conflict, no nation has given an enemy combatant, a terrorist, al-Qaida member the ability to go into every Federal court in the United States and sue the people who are fighting the war for us. There are 160 habeas corpus petitions being filed against Guantanamo Bay detention.

Let me read what one of them is saying, a motion by a high-level al-Qaida detainee complaining about basic security procedures: Speed of mail delivery, medical treatment, seek an order to be transferred to the least onerous condition at Gitmo, and asking the court to order Gitmo to allow him to keep any books and reading material sent to him, and report to the court on his opportunities for exercise, communication, recreation, and worship.

The Nazis couldn't go to a Federal court when we had them in our charge as prisoners of war. Never in the history of armed conflict has this been allowed.

Let us stand up for our troops in a reasonable way, protect them from abuses, and protect them from the court suits filed by the people they are fighting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MCCONNELL. The following Senators were necessarily absent: the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. ALEXANDER), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. ENZI), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HAGEL), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SANTORUM), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. THOMAS).

Further, if present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. ALEXANDER) would have voted ''yea.''

Mr. DURBIN. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CORZINE) and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 42, as follows:

109TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. 1088

To establish streamlined procedures for collateral review of mixed petitions, amendments, and defaulted claims, and for other purposes.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

MAY 19, 2005

Mr. KYL introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

---

A BILL

To establish streamlined procedures for collateral review of mixed petitions, amendments, and defaulted claims, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; TABLE OF CONTENTS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Streamlined Procedures Act of 2005".

(b) TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents for this Act is as follows:

Sec. 1. Short title; table of contents.
Sec. 2. Mixed petitions.
Sec. 3. Amendments to petitions.
Sec. 4. Procedurally defaulted claims.
Sec. 5. Tolling of limitation period.

Sec. 6. Harmless error in sentencing.
Sec. 7. Unified review standard.
Sec. 8. Appeals.
Sec. 9. Capital cases.
Sec. 10. Clemency and pardon decisions.
Sec. 11. Ex parte funding requests.
Sec. 12. Crime victims' rights.
Sec. 13. Technical corrections.
Sec. 14. Application to pending cases.

SEC. 2. MIXED PETITIONS.

Section 2254(b) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1), by striking subparagraphs (A) and (B) and inserting the following:

''(A) the applicant—

''(i) has exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State by fairly presenting and arguing the specific Federal basis for each claim in the State courts; and

''(ii) has described in the application how the applicant has exhausted each claim in the State courts; or

''(B)(i) the application presents a claim for relief that would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2); and

''(ii) the denial of such relief is contrary to, or would entail an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.''; and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

"(4) Any unexhausted claim that does not qualify for consideration on the grounds described in this subsection shall be dismissed with prejudice.".

SEC. 3. AMENDMENTS TO PETITIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 2244 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(e)(1) An application for a writ of habeas corpus may be amended once as a matter of course before the earlier of the date on which an answer to the application is filed or the expiration of the 1-year period described in subsection (d).

"(2) Except as provided under paragraph (1), an application may not be amended to modify existing claims or to present additional claims, unless the modified or newly presented claims would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (b)(2).".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 2242 of title 28, United States Code, is amended in the third undesignated paragraph by striking "in the rules of procedure applicable to civil actions" and inserting "under section 2244(e)".

SEC. 4. PROCEDURALLY DEFAULTED CLAIMS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

DOJ_NMG_0013510

(1) by redesignating subsections (h) and (i) as subsections (i) and (j), respectively; and

(2) by adding after subsection (g) the following:

''(h)(1) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court with respect to any claim that was found by the State court to be procedurally barred, or any claim of ineffective assistance of counsel related to such claim, unless—

''(A) the claim would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2); or

''(B) the State, through counsel, expressly waives the provisions of this paragraph.

''(2)(A) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider any claim that the State court denies on the merits and on the ground that the claim was not properly raised under State procedural law, or any claim of ineffective assistance of counsel related to such claim, unless the claim would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2).

''(B) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider any claim that is otherwise subject to paragraph (1) and that was reviewed by the State court for plain error, fundamental error, or under a similarly

1 heightened standard of review, unless the claim would
2 qualify for consideration on the grounds described in sub-
3 section (e)(2).

4 ''(3) The State shall not be required to answer any
5 claim described in paragraph (1) or (2) unless the court
6 first determines that the claim would qualify for consider-
7 ation on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2).

8 ''(4) If a court determines that a State court order
9 denying relief on procedural grounds is ambiguous as to 10 which claims were found to be procedurally barred, the 11 court shall resolve any perceived ambiguity, if necessary,
12 by examining the full record in the State court.

13 ''(5) An application for a writ of habeas corpus on 14 behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment
15 of a State court shall not be granted with respect to any 16 claim under paragraph (1) or (2) unless the denial of such 17 relief is contrary to, or would entail an unreasonable appli-
18 cation of, clearly established Federal law, as determined
19 by the Supreme Court of the United States.''.

20 (b) LIMITATION.—Section 2244(d)(2) of title 28,
21 United States Code, as amended by section 3, is amended
22 by adding at the end the following: ''An application that 23 was otherwise improperly filed in State court shall not be 24 deemed to have been properly filed because the State court

exercises discretion in applying a rule or recognizes exceptions to that rule.''.

SEC. 5. TOLLING OF LIMITATION PERIOD.

Section 2244(d) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2), by striking ''judgment or''; and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

''(3) In this section, an application for State post-conviction or other collateral review—

''(A) is pending from the date on which the application is filed with a State court until the date on which the same State court rules on that application; and

''(B) is not pending during any period of time between the date on which a State court rules on that application and the date on which the application or a related application is filed, or is otherwise presented, for adjudication to such State court on rehearing authorized by State law or to a higher State court.

''(4) The period of limitation under paragraph (1) may be tolled, suspended, or extended only as provided under this subsection.''.

SEC. 6. HARMLESS ERROR IN SENTENCING.

Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, as amended by section 4, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(k) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider an application with respect to an error relating to the applicant's sentence or sentencing that has been found to be harmless or not prejudicial in State court proceedings, unless a determination that the error is not structural is contrary to clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.''.

SEC. 7. UNIFIED REVIEW STANDARD.

Section 107(c) of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (28 U.S.C. 2261 note) is amended by striking ''Chapter 154 of title 28, United States Code (as amended by subsection (a))'' and inserting ''This title and the amendments made by this title''.

SEC. 8. APPEALS.

(a) APPELLATE TIME LIMITS.—Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, as amended by sections 4 and 6, is further amended by adding at the end the following:

''(l) In review by a court of appeals of a district court's determination of an application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court, the following shall apply:

DOJ_NMG_0013514

"(1) A timely filed notice of appeal from an order issuing a writ of habeas corpus shall operate as a stay of that order, pending final disposition of the appeal.

"(2) A court of appeals shall decide the appeal from an order granting or denying a writ of habeas corpus—

"(A) not later than 300 days after the date on which the brief of the appellee is filed or, if no timely brief is filed, the date on which such brief is due; or

"(B) if a cross-appeal is filed, not later than 300 days after the date on which the appellant files a brief in response to the issues presented by the cross-appeal or, if no timely brief is filed, the date on which such brief is due.

"(3)(A) If a petition is filed for a panel rehearing or rehearing by the court of appeals en banc following a decision by a panel of a court of appeals under paragraph (2), the court of appeals shall decide whether to grant the petition not later than 90 days after the date on which the petition is filed, unless a response is required.

"(B) If a response to a petition is required under subparagraph (A), a court of appeals shall decide whether to grant the petition not later than 90 days after the date on which the response is filed or, if no timely response is filed, the date on which the response is due.

"(C) If a panel rehearing is granted, the panel shall make a determination of the appeal on rehearing not later than 120 days after the date on which the order granting a panel rehearing is entered. No second or successive petition for panel rehearing shall be allowed.

"(D) If rehearing en banc is granted, the court of appeals shall make a final determination of the appeal not later than 180 days after the date on which the order granting rehearing en banc is entered.

"(4) If a court of appeals fails to comply with the requirements of this subsection, the State may petition the Supreme Court, or a justice thereof, for a writ of mandamus to enforce the requirements of this subsection.

"(5) The time limitations in this subsection shall apply in all proceedings in a court of appeals on review of a district court's determination of an application for a writ of habeas corpus, including any such proceedings in a court of appeals following a remand by the Supreme Court for further proceedings.

''(6) In proceedings following remand in a court of appeals, the time limit specified in paragraph (2) shall begin on the date the remand is ordered if further briefing is not required in the court of appeals. If there is further briefing in the court of appeals, the time limit specified in paragraph (2) shall begin on the date on which a responsive brief is filed or, if no timely responsive brief is filed, from the date on which such brief is due.

''(7) The failure of a court to meet or comply with a time limitation under this subsection shall not be a ground for granting relief from a judgment of conviction or sentence, nor shall the time limitations under this subsection be construed to entitle a capital applicant to a stay of execution, to which the applicant would otherwise not be entitled, for the purpose of litigating any application or appeal.''.

(b) FINALITY OF DETERMINATION.—Section 2244(b)(3)(E) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking ''the subject of a petition'' and all that follows

1 and inserting the following: ''reheard in the court of ap-
2 peals or reviewed by writ of certiorari.''.

3 SEC. 9. CAPITAL CASES.

4 (a) SCOPE OF REVIEW.—Chapter 154 of title 28,
5 United States Code, is amended by striking section 2264
6 and inserting the following:

7 ''§ 2264. Scope of Federal review

8 ''(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection
9 (b), a court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction
10 to consider any claim relating to the judgment or sentence
11 in an application covered under this chapter.

12 ''(b) EXCEPTION.—A court, justice, or judge has ju-
13 risdiction to consider an application under this chapter
14 if—

15 ''(1) the applicant shows that the claim relies
16 on a new rule of constitutional law, made retroactive
17 to cases on collateral review by the Supreme Court,
18 that was previously unavailable; or

19 ''(2) both—

20 ''(A) the factual predicate for the claim
21 could not have been discovered previously
22 through the exercise of due diligence; and

23 ''(B) the facts underlying the claim, if 24 proven and viewed in light of the evidence as a
25 whole, would be sufficient to establish by clear

and convincing evidence that, but for constitutional error, no reasonable fact finder would have found the applicant guilty of the underlying offense.''.

(b) TIME LIMITS.—Section 2266(b)(1)(A) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking ''180 days'' and inserting ''15 months''.

(c) REVIEW BY ATTORNEY GENERAL.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 2261(b) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by striking ''(b) This chapter is applicable if a State establishes'' and inserting the following:

''(b) This chapter is applicable if—

''(1) the Attorney General of the United States certifies that a State has established'';

(B) in the first sentence, by striking the period at the end and inserting a semicolon;

(C) by striking ''The rule of court or statute must provide standards'' and inserting the following:

''(2) the court, statute, or other agency provides standards'';

(D) by striking the period at the end and inserting ''; and''; and

DOJ_NMG_0013519

(E) by adding at the end the following:

''(3) the order required under subsection (c) is entered on or after the effective date of the Attorney General's certification under section 2267.''.

(2) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Section 2265(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by striking ''(a) For purposes'' and inserting the following:

''(a)(1) For purposes'';

(B) by striking ''This chapter shall apply, as provided in this section, in relation to a State unitary review procedure if the State establishes'' and inserting the following:

''(2) This chapter shall apply, as provided in this section, in relation to a State unitary review procedure if—

''(A) the Attorney General of the United States certifies that a State has established'';

(C) by striking ''or by statute'' and inserting '', by statute, or by agency rule'';

(D) by striking the period after ''proceedings'' and inserting a semicolon;

(E) by striking ''The rule of court or statute must provide'' and inserting the following:

DOJ_NMG_0013520

"(B) the rule of the court, the statute, or the agency rule provides";

(F) by striking the period at the end and inserting "; and"; and

(G) by adding at the end the following:

"(C) the order required under subsection (b) is entered on or after the effective date of the Attorney General's certification under section 2267.".

(d) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—Chapter 154 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"§ 2267. Judicial Review

"(a) IN GENERAL.—If requested by the chief law enforcement officer of a State, the Attorney General of the United States shall determine whether the State has established a qualifying mechanism for the purpose of section 2261(b)(3) or 2265(a)(2)(C), and, if so, the date on which the mechanism was established. The date the mechanism was established shall be the effective date of the certification.

"(b) REGULATIONS.—The Attorney General shall promulgate regulations to implement the certification procedure under subsection (a).

"(c) REVIEW OF CERTIFICATION.—

DOJ_NMG_0013521

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The Attorney General's determination of whether to certify a State under this section is subject to review exclusively as provided under chapter 158.

"(2) VENUE.—The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction over matters under paragraph (1), subject to review by the Supreme Court under section 2350.

"(3) STANDARD OF REVIEW.—The Attorney General's determination of whether to certify a State under this section shall be conclusive unless manifestly contrary to the law and an abuse of discretion.".

(e) CLERICAL AMENDMENTS.—The table of sections for chapter 154 of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking the item related to section 2264 and inserting the following:

"2264. Scope of Federal review.";

and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

"2267. Judicial review.".

SEC. 10. CLEMENCY AND PARDON DECISIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 85 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

DOJ_NMG_0013522

"§ 1370. State clemency and pardon decisions

''(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided under subsection (b), and notwithstanding any other provision of law, no Federal court shall have jurisdiction to hear any cause or claim arising from the exercise of a State's executive clemency or pardon power, or the process or procedures used under such power.

''(b) EXCEPTION.—This section does not affect the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review any decision of the highest court of a State that involves a cause or claim arising from the exercise of a State's executive clemency or pardon power, or the process or procedures used under such power.''.

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for chapter 85 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''1370. State clemency and pardon decisions.''.

SEC. 11. EX PARTE FUNDING REQUESTS.

Section 408(q)(9) of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 848(q)(9)) is amended—

(1) by striking ''(9) Upon'' and inserting the following: ''(9) (A) Upon'';

(2) by striking the last two sentences and inserting the following: ''An application for services under this paragraph shall be decided by a judge other than the judge presiding over the post conviction proceeding under section 2254 or 2255 of Title 28, United States Code, seeking to vacate or set aside a death sentence. Any amounts authorized to be paid under this paragraph shall be disclosed to the public immediately.''; and

(3) by adding at the end the following:

''(B) No ex parte proceeding, communication, or request may be considered in a post-conviction action pursuant to this section, except to the extent necessary to protect any confidential-communications privilege between the defendant and post-conviction counsel. The court shall not grant an application for an ex parte proceeding, communication, or request unless the application has been served upon the respondent and the court has allowed the respondent a reasonable opportunity to answer the application. All proceedings, communications, or requests conducted pursuant to this section shall be transcribed and made a part of the record available for appellate review.''.

SEC. 12. CRIME VICTIMS' RIGHTS.

Section 3771(b) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: ''A crime victim shall also be afforded the rights established for crime victims by this section in a Federal habeas corpus proceeding arising out of a State conviction.''.

SEC. 13. TECHNICAL CORRECTIONS.

(a) APPEAL.—Section 2253(c)(1) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking ''circuit justice or judge'' and inserting ''district or circuit judge''.

(b) FEDERAL CUSTODY.—Section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by designating the 8 undesignated paragraphs as subsections (a) through (h), respectively.

SEC. 14. APPLICATION TO PENDING CASES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall apply to cases pending on and after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) TIME LIMITS.—In a case pending on the date of enactment of this Act, if the amendments made by this Act establish a time limit for taking certain action the period of which began on the date of an event that occurred prior to the date of enactment of this Act, the period of such time limit shall instead begin on the date of enactment of this Act.

[redacted] attached is the base Graham amendment filed on Nov. 10, number 2515, and the perfecting amendment filed the same day, number 2516, as they appeared in the record. The perfecting amendment makes only one change, adding a new sentence at the very end. Levin voted against the perfecting amendment adding the effective-date language. (Conveniently, the record of that vote appears in the record on the same page as amendment number 2516.)

If you want to get into deep leg history, the text and structure of the Graham amendment were borrowed from S.1088, a habeas reform package that Sen. Kyl introduced in May. (A copy is attached.) The "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction" language is borrowed from S.1088, as is the effective date language of "shall apply to cases pending on or after." S.1088 was not a pure jurisdiction ousting amendment – many of its parts simply create new standards, and are not jurisdictional in nature. Thus in S.1088, it was necessary to expressly apply the new standards to pending claims. Also, where S.1088 bars new claims, it is designed to force their dismissal or rejection, not to force litigants to reformulate the claims. You could argue that the original Graham amendment's language was borrowed from S.1088, but that upon further reflection it became clear to Graham and Kyl that S.1088's "applying to" language was not really appropriate for the Graham amendment for the reasons previously noted – i.e., there is no ambiguity about the effect of pure jurisdiction removal on pending claims, and Graham and Kyl wanted to effect reformulation of the pending claims, not their outright dismissal.

Washington wants Iraq to try US 'enemy combatant'

WASHINGTON, Feb 8, 2006 (AFP) - The United States wants to hand over to Baghdad for trial a detained US citizen suspected of links to Iraq Al-Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the man's lawyers said Wednesday.

Shawqi Omar, a Sunni Muslim with both US and Kuwaiti nationality, allegedly served as Zarqawi's personal emissary with different Iraqi insurgent groups, according to US documents released Wednesday.

Omar was detained by US forces in Iraq on October 29, 2004 and held without charge for 15 months.

In a document recently submitted to a federal court in Washington, the US government also alleged that Omar took part in staking out foreigners to be kidnapped and plotted with Zarqawi to undertake a chemical weapons attack.

Omar's lawyers Aziz Huq and Jonathan Hafetz told AFP that he arrived in Iraq in 2004 for business and lived with a ten year old son until he was detained in his Baghdad home.

In 2005 the lawyers contested his detention without charges. But on February 2, they were informed in an e-mailed document from a government\l "l" lawyer\l "l" that Omar was being handed over to Iraq's justice authorities.

"Mr Omar is currently in the custody of multinational force-Iraq and a determination was previously made to refer his case to the central criminal court of Iraq," the document said.

After his lawyers argued in court on February 3 that Omar could be tortured, Judge Ricardo Urbina delayed the transfer until a final ruling could be made in the days ahead.

U.S. Citizen May Be Handed Over to Iraqis

By MARK SHERMAN, Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_The U.S. government wants an Iraqi court to prosecute an American citizen who is being held in Iraq on suspicion that he is a senior operative of insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The man's lawyers said he is innocent and likely to be tortured if handed over.

The case is the first known instance in which the government has decided to allow an American to be tried in the new Iraqi legal system. At least four other U.S. citizens suspected of aiding the insurgency had been held in Iraq, the Pentagon has said.

Shawqi Omar, 44, who once served in the Minnesota National Guard, has been held since late 2004 in U.S.-run military prisons as an enemy combatant. He has not been charged with a crime or been given access to a lawyer, said Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer representing Omar's family in the United States.

The government said Omar, who also holds Jordanian citizenship, was harboring an Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian fighters at the time of his arrest and also had bomb-making materials. He is described in court papers as a relative of Zarqawi who was plotting to kidnap foreigners from Baghdad hotels.

Separately, Omar, Zarqawi and 11 others have been indicted by a Jordanian court on charges they plotted a chemical attack against Jordan's intelligence agency.

Omar's family said he is a businessman who was seeking reconstruction contracts in Iraq.

The family is asking a U.S. judge to step in and force the government to charge Omar with a crime and put him on trial in the United States, or release him. They also are seeking to prevent Omar's transfer to Iraqi custody, which they said would subject the Sunni Muslim to torture by Shiite-dominated authorities.

U.S. District Judge Ricardo Urbina last week issued an order in Washington temporarily blocking Omar's transfer to Iraqi custody. The order is set to expire Monday, but the family is asking the judge to extend it until he decides whether to order Omar to be returned to the United States.

The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" weighed in Tuesday, arguing that Urbina has no business intervening on Omar's behalf and denying that Omar is even in U.S. custody.

Instead, the department said in court papers, Omar was captured by the U.S.-led multinational force in Iraq and remains in its custody. The multinational force is independent of the U.S. government, the department said.

In any event, Omar would not be handed over to the Iraqis unless he is convicted in an Iraqi court, the government said.

Hafetz, a lawyer at New York University's Brennan Center for Justice, said the government is resorting to a legal gimmick to keep Omar's case out of American courts. Prosecutors are arguing, "despite all appearances to the contrary, Mr. Omar is not really in U.S. custody," the Omar family's lawyers said Wednesday in a legal filing.

In July, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said five unnamed Americans, including one who also had Jordanian citizenship, were in U.S. military custody in Iraq. Whitman said then that the government had not decided whether their cases would be turned over to the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" or to the new Iraqi legal system, which has handled the prosecution of other foreign fighters who came to Iraq to fight the U.S.-led occupation and Iraqi government.

It is unclear what happened to the other Americans. Los Angeles filmmaker Cyrus Kar was released later in July without being charged after nearly two months in custody. An Iraqi expatriate who is a legal U.S. resident, Numan Adnan Al Kaby, was freed in September, but it is not known whether he was one of the five described by Whitman.

Last March, Matthew Waxman, the Pentagon's deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, said a panel of three U.S. officers had determined the Jordanian-American was an enemy combatant and was not entitled to prisoner-of-war status under the Geneva Convention. The description provided by Waxman and other officials matches Omar's biography as contained in the government's court papers.

In its filing Tuesday, the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" said the officers were part of the multinational force.

Omar became a U.S. citizen in 1986, two years after he served in the National Guard. Omar spent about 11 months in the Guard before being discharged in November 1984 without completing his training, said Shannon Purvis, a spokesperson for the Minnesota National Guard. Omar received an "uncharacterized discharge," meaning he was discharged for such things as health problems or poor performance, Purvis said.

3rd Circuit Limits Appeal of FDA Ban of Ephedrine

Shannon P. Duffy

In an ephedrine manufacturer's challenge to the Food and Drug Administration's decision to ban the substance, a federal appeals court has ruled that the litigation must be strictly limited to a review of the FDA's administrative record, and that the manufacturer therefore is not entitled to present its own expert witnesses nor to gather and present additional evidence.

The decision in NVE Inc. v. Department of Health and Human Services could have an immediate impact on similar cases around the country. Several court battles are under way to challenge the FDA's ban on sales of popular dietary supplements and weight loss aids after the active ingredient was linked to deaths among athletes.

In its April 2004 decision, the FDA prohibited all distribution of products containing ephedrine alkaloids, also known as "ephedra," saying it found them to be "adulterated" food that posed an "unreasonable risk" to consumers.

Three manufacturers quickly challenged the ban, filing lawsuits in New Jersey, Florida and Utah. In each case, the manufacturers accused the FDA of exceeding its powers as defined in the 1994 Dietary Supplement Health and Education Act.

Congress passed DSHEA after a long-running dispute with the FDA about how strictly dietary supplements should be regulated. Some members of Congress complained that the FDA was pursuing a heavy-handed enforcement agenda.

But the 3rd Circuit held that DSHEA "does not provide a private cause of action," and that the manufacturers' lawsuits are therefore governed by the deferential standards of the Administrative Procedures Act.

The FDA won the first round in the New Jersey case when U.S. District Judge Joel Pisano refused to issue an emergency injunction to lift the ban.

But Pisano also quickly realized that continuing litigation of the case would involve important procedural questions for which the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had offered little or no guidance. As a result, Pisano certified four questions for an immediate appeal.

Now the 3rd Circuit has answered "no" to three of the four: No, the party challenging an FDA decision may not "supplement the administrative record." No, the challenger may not "present expert affidavits and/or testimony." And no, the challenger may not "conduct discovery."

The final question was not yes-or-no in nature, but the 3rd Circuit's answer underscored its negative responses to the first three by holding that the trial judge must limit the case to a review of the FDA's proceedings and therefore cannot conduct a "trial de novo."

Writing for the court, U.S. Circuit Judge Marjorie O. Rendell found that Pisano had correctly held that the suit was governed by the Administrative Procures Act.

Under the APA, Rendell said, the court focuses only on the agency's actions and the plaintiff is therefore not entitled to discovery that would add to the administrative record.

But Rendell found that Pisano erred by holding that the DSHEA required that he give no deference to the FDA's factual and legal conclusions, and instead conduct a trial de novo.

Rendell, in an opinion joined by Judge Julio M. Fuentes and Leonard I. Garth, found that DSHEA's de novo provisions apply only in "enforcement actions" brought by the government, and not in private "rulemaking" actions such as NVE's.

The statute's use of the term "de novo" is also unusually limited, Rendell found, since it calls for courts to decide "issues" on a de novo basis, rather than to conduct "de novo review."

"This distinction is highly significant," Rendell wrote, "given that a court's function in an APA suit is always to review administrative action."

Lawyers for NVE argued that if a manufacturer is not entitled to a de novo review, the courts would be opening a "gaping loophole" that would effectively eviscerate DSHEA's de novo provision.

The FDA, they argued, would simply avoid de novo judicial review by issuing regulations on dietary supplements instead of bringing individual enforcement actions.

But Rendell found that such a claim called for a solution that the courts cannot provide.

"While we do not downplay the significance of this allegation, we cannot legislate to correct it, if that is in fact what is occurring here. If Congress perceives the agency's action to be an end-run around the standard it legislated for enforcement actions, surely it can amend DSHEA or the APA to remedy the situation," Rendell wrote.

NVE was represented in the appeal by attorney Walter F. Timpone of McElroy Deutsch Mulvaney & Carpenter in Morristown, N.J.

Justice Department attorney Christine N. Kohl argued the case for the government.

RIM unveils plan to keep BlackBerrys alive

By Susan Taylor

OTTAWA (Reuters) - Research In Motion <RIM.TO> <RIMM.O> on Thursday unveiled a plan that it says will let its addictive BlackBerry e-mail device work even if it loses a patent dispute, and said the workaround will prevent a shutdown of service in the United States.

In an announcement made as the clock ticked to a February 24 court hearing on patent holding company NTP Inc.'s request for an injunction to halt U.S. BlackBerry service, RIM also said it was still willing to negotiate a deal.

The Canadian technology company, whose black, blue or silver device is dubbed "CrackBerry" by many users, said it is has taken a "pragmatic and reasonable" stance in mediation.

But it called NTP's offer to license disputed technology "untenable" and offering only "illusory protection."

The high-stakes legal battle is heating up in advance of the February 24 hearing by U.S. District Judge James Spencer in Richmond, Va.

That could be the final step before Spencer decides whether to impose an injunction granting NTP's request -- potentially affecting more than 3 million subscribers.

The U.S. Justice Department has already argued against a shut-down, saying that NTP had not submitted enough evidence to show that government users could be exempted "without substantial hardship."

RIM's lawyers have said there was "exceptional public interest" in maintaining an uninterrupted service for government and national security officials.

NTP sued RIM for patent infringement in 2002 and won an injunction in 2003 to shut down the U.S. service.

That injunction was stayed pending appeals, and the court has issued a series of rulings since then, moving RIM shares like a yo-yo, depending on whether the rulings looked good or bad for the firm.

The stock climbed 3.4 percent before the bell on Thursday, adding $2.35 to $71.

RIM, which is based in Waterloo, Ontario, said it has developed and tested software workaround designs for all BlackBerry handsets operating in the United States.

"RIM's workaround provides a contingency for our customers and partners and a counterbalance to NTP's threats," said RIM co-chief executive Jim Balsillie.

"This will hopefully lead to more reasonable negotiations, since NTP risks losing all future royalties if the workaround is implemented."

RIM said it has filed applications for a patent for its workaround, part of a software update called BlackBerry Multi-Mode Edition.

The company said it will soon begin shipping handsets with the software update in a dormant mode. It will make the update available at www.blackberry.com/workaround at a later, but as yet unspecified, date.

RIM said the changes would require software updates, but the new system will deliver the same functions and performance.

It said a legal opinion from a patent law and workaround expert said its designs do not infringe on any of the NTP patent claims remaining in the lawsuit.

Raising the Stakes: Mahmoud Alafyouny's case is drawing attention that the feds are trying to fend off.

By DAN MALONE

The case of a Mesquite man accused by the federal government of supporting terrorism is heating up — on both sides. Federal prosecutors are increasing their efforts to deport Mahmoud Alafyouny — and to keep him under wraps until they can do so — while at the same time his story has caught the attention of national civil-rights and Arab-American groups as well as a network news program.

Alafyouny, who is married to a Department of Homeland Security screener at Dallas' Love Field, has been detained for the past 20 months at a West Texas prison while immigration officials have attempted to deport him. Last week, Alafyouny's lawyer, Joshua Turin, asked a federal judge to release his client, saying the accusation that he is dangerous is "nothing short of a cruel and pathetic lie.''

The government responded to Alafyouny's latest bid for freedom, however, by announcing it would attempt to speed up his deportation and by bringing in a U.S. Justice Department attorney from Washington who specializes in immigration-related terrorism cases to lead that effort.

Alafyouny's plight was first reported by Fort Worth Weekly last July. The government's case against him seems to hinge on a single, decades-old accusation — that as a teen-ager in Jordan 20 years ago he collected money and distributed handbills for the Palestinian Liberation Organization. The PLO or the Palestinian Authority have, according to Alafyouny's lawsuit and a recent Wall Street Journal article, received hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign aid from the very government that is now trying to deport him.

Yet Alafyouny's actions — under an obscure provision of the USA PATRIOT Act — are, according to the government, sufficient grounds on which to keep him locked up until it can toss him out of the country.

An official with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) informed Alafyouny in writing on Jan. 19 that the agency had "an obligation to protect the community from ... the threat of violence'' and that Alafyouny's "support for an organization that utilized and promoted terrorist violence leads me to believe that your release may pose a threat to the United States.''

Alafyouny came to the United States on a business visa in 1996, applied for political asylum in 1997, and was ordered deported in 1998. He subsequently married an American citizen, Rae Johnson, and the couple has been fighting his deportation ever since. He was arrested in the spring of 2004 after losing an appeal and has been imprisoned since then at the Rolling Plains Detention Center in Haskell.

In a strange twist, the government's case against Alafyouny is based on evidence that he voluntarily disclosed when he applied for political asylum, telling U.S, immigration officials that he feared persecution in Jordan because he had raised money for the PLO.

In a telephone conference among the attorneys, Turin said that Douglas E. Ginsburg, the Justice Department's terrorist-case specialist, revealed that the government is planning to ask the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals (where Alafyouny's appeal is being considered) to permit immigration officials to deport him before ruling on the merits of his case.

The government's refusal to release Alafyouny raises questions about whether officials might know something Alafyouny's family and supporters do not. If they do, however, they're not talking about it.

Ginsburg referred questions about the case to another Justice Department official, Charles S. Miller, who said this week he could not answer questions because of ongoing litigation. Carl Rusnok, a spokesman for ICE in Dallas, declined comment on the same grounds.

Alafyouny's attorney, meanwhile, questions why the government would detain him now after letting him remain free for seven years. In court papers, Turin said that immigration officials "never alleged that Alafyouny was dangerous during his many-years-old deportation proceedings; there is no, zero evidence in his voluminous administrative record or elsewhere that he is dangerous. He has no criminal history He has never failed to appear for an interview or hearing.''

The Weekly's initial story about Alafyouny generated interest among several civil-rights organizations, including the American Civil Liberties Union, which commissioned a documentary, Beyond the Patriot Act, about Alafyouny's plight. The program was originally broadcast on Link TV last year.

Judy Rabinovitz, of the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project in New York, said Alafyouny's detention "is a graphic example of how, in our pursuit of terrorists, we've swept common sense under the rug, as well as due process.

"No one denies that this country has a right to enact laws that keep out terrorists," she added. "But this law ... is so broad that it encompasses people like Mr. Alafyouny who are indisputably not terrorists and pose no danger to our national security."

The American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee also rallied behind Alafyouny. "This is a person who, to our knowledge, has no criminal history and has been a completely lawful person in the United States,'' said the league's Kareem Shora. "He has not engaged in anything even nearing suspicious behavior. There is absolutely no reason for this person to be continually held in detention from the information we have."

Aside from the fact that he doesn't believe Alafyouny is a danger to anyone, Turin also argued in court papers that he should be released because his continued detention is working a hardship on his family. The loss of Alafyouny's income led his wife to file for bankruptcy and forced a stepson to put college plans on hold. Two younger stepchildren are having trouble in school, a development that Turin blames on Alafyouny's forced absence from their lives.

Alafyouny's wife, whose day job as an airline security screener for the federal Transportation Security Administration puts her on the front line of the domestic war on terror, said she's been unable to get a straight answer from anyone about why her husband can't be released while his case is on appeal. If the government knows something about her husband that she doesn't, she said, they should reveal it or let him go.

"They're trying to turn this into something that it's not," Rae Alafyouny said. "I could never believe that he could do anything to anybody. He's so gentle and kind — he's just not capable of that.'' Besides, she said, the government has thoroughly investigated his background and found nothing. "They ran fingerprint checks on him. If there was anything, they would have found it."

Alafyouny's case has also caught the attention of the CBS Evening News. Jason Sickles, a producer in the network's Dallas office, said immigration officials have twice refused his request to interview Alafyouny. Sickles said ICE spokesman Rusnok told him "they could not facilitate an interview with an inmate who is involved in ongoing litigation.'' Sickles said he asked ICE to reconsider the decision. "I explained to them that Mr. Alafyouny wants to talk," Sickles said. "His family indicated that he wants to talk. We explained that other media have been able to talk to him in the past.''

ICE, however, would not budge. A second ICE official, who responded to his request for reconsideration, came back with the "same explanation as the first,'' Sickles said. "They said they can't or won't facilitate an interview with someone who has ongoing litigation."

Alafyouny is allowed to make collect calls from the privately run prison — and Sickles said he plans to interview him by phone. "We're disappointed we can't talk to him on camera. It's our medium, and it's important to be able to see a person.'' ICE's refusal to let him meet with Alafyouny face to face, he said, "is not going to keep us from doing the story.''

Why ICE would refuse to let a network news producer interview Alafyouny after having permitted two reporters from the Weekly to meet with him last year is not clear. Rabinovitz believes the government is afraid of the exposure a CBS news story would bring to the case.

"Virtually everyone who is detained by [federal immigration authorities] is involved in 'litigation' challenging their removal orders. If that was a sufficient basis to deny a face-to-face interview, then such interviews would never be allowed," she said. "The government is not allowed to selectively decide when to grant or deny press access. Seems to me that the government denied CBS access because it recognizes that if the public were to actually see Mr. Alafyouny on television and hear him speak, it would be obvious that he poses no risk to anyone, and they would be shocked at what our government is doing under the guise of protecting us against terrorism."

9/11 SUIT MAY BOOST PUSH FOR GREATER EPA DISASTER RESPONSE ROLE

A federal\l "l" court ruling last week allowing a class\l "l" action\l "l" suit against EPA to proceed over the agency's actions immediately after the 2001 terrorist attacks may bolster arguments that EPA is required to reduce environmental risks following disasters even when those threats fall outside its traditional authorities, such as widespread indoor health risks from Hurricane Katrina.

Most notably, environmentalists have long criticized EPA's assertion that it lacks statutory authority to regulate indoor air -- and therefore building interiors -- claiming the agency has broad authority under a host of environmental laws to require mitigation of health risks. Following last year's Gulf Coast hurricanes, activists criticized EPA for failing to conduct testing of risks in building interiors in the region as a result of flooding from Hurricane Katrina.

But in a situation that observers call analogous to the Katrina aftermath, a federal judge Feb. 2 harshly criticized EPA actions -- and those of former Administrator Christine Todd Whitman -- following the collapse of the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001.

"No reasonable person would have thought that telling thousands of people that it was safe to return to Lower Manhattan, while knowing that such return could pose long-term health risks and other dire consequences, was conduct sanctioned by our laws," writes Judge Deborah H. Batts of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York in the ruling.

One attorney involved with the 9/11 suit says similar suits against EPA for its response to Katrina are likely, and the arguments at play in the New York suit "definitely" apply to the Gulf Coast region.

In the class-action suit, Benzman, et al., v. Christine Todd Whitman, et al., residents of Lower Manhattan are charging that EPA actions in the wake of Sept. 11 -- including its public statements about health, decisions not to remediate building interiors, and delegation of cleanup responsibility for interiors in New York City -- violated constitutional rights to be free from bodily harm. The plaintiffs say federal environmental laws, presidential directives and federal response plans require greater EPA involvement during a disaster. Relevant documents are available on InsideEPA.com.

In its defense, EPA argued that the Stafford Act -- which governs disaster response -- bars review of federal "discretionary" functions, such as the decisions cited by the plaintiffs in the case. While the court largely agreed that the authorities cited by the plaintiffs did not mandate specific responses by EPA, the court nonetheless concluded that it did have jurisdiction over the plaintiffs' constitutional claims and the merits of the case required further review.

EPA, in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, has made similar claims about its limited statutory authority. For instance, in an interview with PBS's NewsHour last November, EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson said the agency lacked authority to test the interiors of homes contaminated by hurricane floodwaters.

"Well, first of all, the responsibility for testing within homes is not within the purview of EPA," Johnson said, according to a transcript of the interview. "And so EPA does not have any statutory responsibility for indoor air, for example. And issues such as mold are the responsibility of and advice and counsel from the Centers for Disease Control, Health & Human Services."

But an attorney with the Natural Resources Defense Council, Erik Olson, disputed Johnson's comments during the same program. "EPA has all sorts of authority if they want to use it to declare an imminent and substantial endangerment under most of its laws just to say it's really not safe for people to be here, we are going to bar people from re-entering, or we're going to order certain clamps or [require] certain activity to happen before people enter," Olson said. "EPA really has been unwilling to use those authorities."

Environmentalists have made similar arguments before Congress. In testimony before a House subcommittee in September 2005, Olson maintained, "EPA bears the lead responsibility for evaluating and acting to remedy environmental health threats" under a host of environmental laws, including the Clean Water Act, the Resource Conservation & Recovery Act, Superfund and the Oil Pollution Act.

"Unfortunately, EPA apparently has decided to 'punt' to local authorities the responsibility to protect citizens' health in the wake of the massive Katrina-related oil and hazardous chemical releases," Olson said at the hearing. "The agency has neither the legal nor the moral right to pass the buck in this way, particularly since local authorities are working under difficult conditions, with communication limitations, displaced staff and other unimaginable challenges."

Johnson, however, told the NewsHour that it was the job of state and local officials to make such safety decisions. "It's not the EPA's decision," he said. "It's the responsibility of the state and local officials to make the decision. You know they're the ones that made the decision to evacuate. They're the ones appropriately to make the decision to come back in."

In partially rejecting a motion-to-dismiss by the defendants, Judge Batts is allowing to proceed several of the 9/11 plaintiffs' legal arguments about why EPA was required to address building interiors. An attorney for the plaintiffs says there is little existing case law on the matter.

The plaintiffs argue that a variety of authorities required EPA to address health risks posed by contamination in building interiors in Lower Manhattan, including Superfund law and its regulatory blueprint, the National Contingency Plan; Presidential Decision Directive 62, a Clinton-era order that assigns EPA the lead responsibility for cleaning up buildings and other sites contaminated by terrorist attacks; and homeland security and other response plans related to terrorism.

In addition, the suit charges that EPA improperly delegated cleanup responsibility for interiors to the city of New York and failed to ensure the city's cleanup guidelines were protective enough. The suit is seeking damages, a medical monitoring program, and testing and cleanup of building interiors in Lower Manhattan.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs say the legal authorities cited in the case could apply to other scenarios as well. "I think we're correct in this position," one attorney says.

Observers also say the court's ruling could pressure the Bush administration to settle the case to avoid releasing potentially embarrassing White House communications documents. But if the agency settles, it could also be forced to conduct a more thorough cleanup than EPA has so far agreed to conduct following the 2001 attacks.

New York congressional Democrats say the decision validates their long-standing claims that EPA avoided federal responsibility for cleanup of the areas affected by the attacks and destruction of the World Trade Center.

The court denied motions to dismiss the case filed by both EPA and Whitman, allowing the suit to go forward to establish the merits of New York City residents' claims that Whitman and EPA violated the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. They claim EPA and Whitman endangered the public by issuing press releases that said it was safe for residents and workers to return to Lower Manhattan days after the attacks.

The court also will consider claims that EPA violated the Administrative Procedure Act by conducting a "voluntary cleanup program" that could be considered "arbitrary and capricious" by leaving many buildings contaminated.

But the court granted another former high-ranking EPA official, Marianne Lamont Horinko, her request to dismiss the same constitutional charges against her. Horinko served as waste chief under Whitman and also served as acting administrator for several months after Whitman left the agency.

The court also rejected a claim that could have compelled immediate cleanup action by EPA, as well as a claim filed under the Superfund law.

EPA has 45 days to appeal the decision.

An EPA spokesman declined to comment on the case, referring calls to the Department of Justice (DOJ). A DOJ spokesman says the case is under review and, "No determination has been made as to what the government is going to do."

Evangelical Christian group asks to intervene in lawsuit against Air Force Academy

By SUE MAJOR HOLMES, Associated Press Writer

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M._An evangelical group petitioned Wednesday to intervene in a lawsuit by an Air Force Academy graduate who alleges senior officers and cadets illegally impose Christianity on others at the school.

The National Association of Evangelicals, based in Colorado Springs, wants to intervene to help the Air Force fight the federal lawsuit filed last October.

Cadets, watchdog groups and a former academy chaplain have alleged religious intolerance is widespread at the Colorado Springs school.

The Air Force has declined to discuss the lawsuit in any detail.

However, last August it issued guidelines discouraging public prayer at official functions and urging commanders to be sensitive about personal expressions of religious faith.

In June, an Air Force task force found no overt religious discrimination but said it observed a lack of sensitivity among some and confusion over what's permitted in sharing one's faith.

Kyle Fisk, executive administrator for the evangelical group, called the lawsuit "an unprecedented attack on religious expression in the military" and said it seeks the military's "secularization."

The organization wants to protect the rights of military chaplains and soldiers who enter into religious discussions with fellow soldiers, he said Wednesday.

The group sought to intervene because interveners, unlike those granted friend-of-the-court status, have the right to introduce new facts in a case, Fisk said.

The chief plaintiff, Mikey Weinstein, who is Jewish, is a 1977 honors graduate of the academy. One of his sons graduated from the school in 2004; another currently is a junior.

He has said he's convinced academy leaders are nurturing a culture where evangelical Christians _ officers, cadets, chaplains, coaches and professors _ bully members of other faiths.

The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" on Dec. 23 and again in January asked U.S. District Judge James Parker to dismiss the lawsuit, repeating the position the Air Force has maintained since the lawsuit was filed _ that there is no official policy of proselytizing.

It also argues that Weinstein, of Albuquerque, and four co-plaintiffs _ also academy graduates _ cannot show that they have been harmed.

Opinion: Punishing Indians for wanting their money back

Louis Gray

Some old habits die hard. The Department of Interior just can't seem to help itself. First they lost billions of Indian trust funds and now because they refuse to settle or actually pay back what they lost, stole, and misused, they have decided to do what they do best: Punish the poor.

Quite simply, those people must have the heart of a lizard to continue to mistreat the people they are bound to serve. Hate your job but don't hurt the defenseless. Plans to cut social programs designed to alleviate the ravages of abject poverty are insensitive at best.

To blame the Cobell lawsuit for the multiple cuts in services is akin to blaming African Americans' lack of riches as the reason that ethnic group suffered so greatly from Katrina. It is the height of insensitivity.

If the BIA wants to cut funds from an irresponsible agency, they should look no further than the Office Special Trustee (OST), which has wasted more even federal dollars than FEMA. The fat and lazy should not thrive while hungry Native Americans go wanting.

Fortunately, there are those in Congress who agree and have tried to reign in OST when it requests more money. Congress will once again be called upon to do the right thing. Where else are the poor punished for seeking justice?

The Department of Interior can't manage our funds, they can't be trusted to operate their own Internet, they can't admit their wrongs, and they can't take care of the very people they obligated to serve. How much longer will thoughtful citizens allow the gang that can't shoot straight to continue bungling their responsibilities?

The Diamondback (University of Maryland Independent Student Paper)

Opinion: Recruitment hypocrisy

Anika Fontaine

Rumsfeld vs. FAIR is touted by some to be the gay rights case of the term. At question is the constitutionality of the Solomon Amendment, a federal law that punishes universities that do not allow military recruiters on their campuses by withdrawing federal funding.

Those who consider this an important gay rights case believe by declaring it unconstitutional for the military to force its way onto the campus, gay rights are being protected because university nondiscrimination policies are upheld. But this is in no way a gay rights case. By overturning the Solomon Amendment, gay rights are not directly affected for better or for worse. So, even if the Solomon Amendment is defeated, the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered community will gain nothing.

The case FAIR (Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights) makes is one for free speech. The military operates under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, barring all those who are openly not heterosexual (meaning gay, bisexual or transgendered). Several law schools, represented by FAIR, claim the Solomon Amendment violates their right to free speech and association, because hosting a military recruiter on the campus forces the school to carry military messages and indicate approval of the military's policies.

Their case isn't a very strong one. To say hosting a military recruiter is a form of speech is far-fetched. Those siding with the government argue no one would confuse the military's messages with the messages of the law schools. Besides, hosting a recruiter is more likely to be considered an action than a form of speech.

The military, however, has no need to force itself onto these campuses. The Department of Defense has actually called it unnecessary because there is no lack of interest in the positions for which they would be recruiting (think JAG lawyers). Yet, the administration says we are in a time of war and, therefore, it must be able to have equal access to campuses for recruitment. This seems to be about punishing the schools for speaking out against the very paranoid military.

Enough about free speech. If it's gay rights they want to protect, why aren't they going after the real problem — the "don't ask, don't tell" policy?

Don't ask, don't tell, don't pursue, don't harass. This policy, supposedly, protects "non-heterosexuals" from discrimination. But does it really work? The policy itself is discriminatory. By requiring these individuals keep their sexual orientation a secret and to refrain from any same-sex contact with sexual intent, they are reduced to lesser human beings. Openly discriminating against alternative sexual orientations breeds the homophobia, fear and anger that is so at home in the military.

According to the Human Rights Campaign, the number of discharges (as well as the related costs) have increased considerably since the "don't ask, don't tell" policy was established.

Also, even though the "don't tell" portion of the policy has been enforced, the other three parts have been widely ignored. There have been several cases of harassment, name-calling and physical assaults. A notable case involves a private being beaten to death after months of harassment at a domestic base. It turns out the commanding general, a Maj. Gen. Robert Clark, neglected to "provide [the] required training" on the policy.

Coincidentally, President Bush has twice attempted to promote this man to lieutenant general, the second highest rank in the Army.

To argue it is important to be able to recruit on all university campuses because we are in a time of war and, on the other hand, to turn away people from service because of their sexual orientation, is hypocritical! The military is letting the talent of many slip away. If we really are in need of military personnel, then allow all who wish to serve their country to do so.

I would guess that OLA would be tasked with preparing a response to such a letter from a Member of Congress. I haven't seen any similar letters come through here. It's not a FOIA request so doubt that the privacy office folks would be involved.

The Honorable Donald Rumsfeld
Secretary
U.S. Department of Defense
The Pentagon
Room 3E880
Washington, D.C. 20301

Dear Secretary Rumsfeld:

I am writing to request that you release a detailed list of all contacts between officials in your agency and Jack Abramoff, his associates, and the clients he represented between January 20, 2001, and today. I also request an explanation of any changes in federal policy based on those contacts. This is not the first request seeking the release of these records, and the resistance to these requests is troubling to the American people.

As you are aware, Mr. Abramoff has recently pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion charges related to his attempts to influence federal government policy in both the Congress and the Executive Branch. The Justice Department is currently investigating this influence-peddling scandal. Published reports show that Bush Administration officials have met with Mr. Abramoff approximately 200 times.

I strongly believe that Members of Congress and all federal employees must be held to the highest ethical standards. As the Congress considers legislation to reform federal ethics laws, we must know the extent to which lobbyists like Mr. Abramoff affect federal policy in both the Congress and the Executive Branch. That is why, during the 2004 Presidential campaign, I released the names of lobbyists I met with during my time in the Senate.

As part of that process, it is critical for the Congress to know about each contact that Mr. Abramoff has had with officials in your agency and whether any of those contacts led to any changes in federal policy. This information will help determine what additional changes to our ethics laws are necessary to stop lobbyists and others from using undue and improper influence in their dealings with the federal government.

I am deeply disappointed that the Bush Administration has repeatedly failed to provide any substantive information regarding its interactions with Mr. Abramoff. Refusing to disclose this information is completely inconsistent with the high ethical standards that the American people expect and deserve. I respectfully request that this information be made public immediately.

Thank you in advance for your consideration of this request.

The Honorable Donald Rumsfeld
Secretary
Department of Defense
1000 Defense
The Pentagon
Washington, D.C. 20301-1000

Dear Secretary Rumsfeld:

On Tuesday, we sent a letter to President Bush asking that he and officials within his Administration detail whatever contact they might have had with Jack Abramoff. Scott McClellan announced that the White House would not provide this information, despite earlier assurances. Therefore, we have no choice but to ask you these questions directly.

As we are sure you are aware, the Justice Department is currently investigating the web of corruption surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Even at this early stage of the investigation, concerns have been raised that Mr. Abramoff may have had undue and improper influence within the highest levels of the Bush Administration and even the White House itself. Such accusations serve to undermine the credibility of this Administration and our government at large -- even before any indictments or convictions. As a result, it is crucial that the American people know what role, if any, Mr. Abramoff played in the highest levels of our government.

As more and more Republican officials in and out of Congress are implicated in this scandal, it has become increasingly important that the record be cleared and that any contact you or others in the Administration have had with Mr. Abramoff be fully explained to the American people. For this reason, we urge you to publicly and immediately detail all of your personal contacts with Mr. Abramoff during your time with the Bush Administration. If you know of others in the Administration who have had such contacts, please disclose those contacts as well. Please also detail any official acts that have been undertaken on behalf of or at the request of Mr. Abramoff. Perhaps there are no contacts to reveal, no favors that have been given. We hope that is the case. But it is important to set the record straight, one way or the other.

Additionally, we believe is it imperative that you reveal any involvement in the "K Street Project," the initiative launched in recent years by Republicans close to this Administration who have worked hard to increase the ties between lobbyists like Jack Abramoff and Republican elected officials.

We urge you to respond to this letter and help shed some light on what has happened between Mr. Abramoff and this Administration. We look forward to your response.

Sincerely,

Harry Reid

In Case You Missed It ...

President Bush Discusses Progress In The War On Terror

THE PRESIDENT: "By standing together, the United States and our partners are striking real blows against the enemy. Since September the 11th, 2001, our coalition has captured or killed Al Qaeda managers and operatives in over two dozen countries. That includes many of Al Qaeda's operational commanders - the senior leaders responsible for day-to-day planning of terrorist activities across the globe. In November 2001, our coalition forces killed Mohammed Atef with an airstrike in Afghanistan. March 2003, his replacement - Khalid Shaikh Mohammed - was captured in Pakistan. May 2005, the man who took over for him - a terrorist named al-Libbi - was captured in South Asia. The terrorists are living under constant pressure, and this adds to our security. When terrorists spend their days working to avoid death or capture, it's harder for them to plan and execute new attacks on our country.

"By striking the terrorists where they live, we're protecting the American homeland. Since September the 11th, the United States and our coalition partners have disrupted a number of serious Al Qaeda terrorist plots, including plots to attack targets inside the United States. Let me give you an example. In the weeks after September the 11th, while Americans were still recovering from an unprecedented the weeks after September the 11th, while Americans were still recovering from an unprecedented strike on our homeland, Al Qaeda was already busy planning its next attack. We now know that in October 2001, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed - the mastermind of the September the 11th attacks - had already set in motion a plan to have terrorist operatives hijack an airplane using shoe bombs to breach the cockpit door and fly the plane into the tallest building on the West Coast. We believe the intended target was Liberty Tower in Los Angeles, California.

"Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on September the 11th, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed sought out young men from Southeast Asia whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion. To help carry out this plan, he tapped a terrorist named Hambali, one of the leaders of an Al Qaeda-affiliated group in Southeast Asia called "JI." JI terrorists were responsible for a series of deadly attacks in Southeast Asia and members of the group had trained with Al Qaeda. Hambali recruited several key operatives who had been training in Afghanistan. Once the operatives were recruited, they met with Osama bin Laden, and then began preparations for the West Coast attack.

"Their plot was derailed in early 2002, when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key Al Qaeda operative. Subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations made clear the intended target and how Al Qaeda hoped to execute it. This critical intelligence helped other allies capture the ringleaders and other known operatives who'd been recruited for this plot. The West Coast plot had been thwarted. Our efforts did not end there. In the summer of 2003, our partners in Southeast Asia conducted another successful manhunt that led to the capture of the terrorist Hambali.

"This West Coast plot shows, in the War on Terror, we face a relentless and determined enemy. It operates in many nations, so protecting our citizens requires unprecedented cooperation from many nations, as well.
It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot.
By working together, we took dangerous terrorists off the streets. By working together, we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland.

"Across the world, our coalition is pursuing the enemy with relentless determination. And because of these efforts, the terrorists are weakened and fractured. Yet they're still lethal. We cannot let the fact that America hadn't been attacked in four and a half years, since September the 11th, lull us into an illusion that the threats to our Nation have disappeared. They have not. Just last month, we heard Osama bin Laden declare his intention to attack America again. Our military, law enforcement, homeland security and intelligence professionals take those threats very seriously. And they are working around the clock day and night to protect us. We are safer for their efforts, but we're not yet safe. America remains at risk, so we must remain vigilant. We'll stay on the offensive. We will hunt down the terrorists. And we will never rest until this threat to the American people is removed."

Subject: Trafficking Report
Attachments: Appendix Case Summaries.wpd; AG Cover Letter.wpd

We have clearance from the WH on the trafficking report, which is great news. Since we are looking at a three-week printing schedule, we will have the report in plenty of time if we get it to the printers at the beginning of next week.

While the report was at the WH, we put together an appendix of case summaries that could be included in the report. This would illustrate the wide variety of trafficking cases that the Department prosecutes. The report already accomplishes this objective, but putting in the an appendix allows the reader to focus exclusively on the prosecutions. We are still making line edits to the appendix, but a draft is attached so that you have a feel for what it would look like. This is purely icing on the cake at this point, so I welcome your thoughts on its inclusion.

In addition, we have drafted an introductory letter from the AG, which would go at the beginning of the report. A draft of that letter is attached for your consideration.

Dear Reader,

Human trafficking is the enslavement of vulnerable persons forced into exploitative work situations. Traffickers are slave traders who treat people not with the dignity and respect that every human being deserves, but as commodities to be recruited, moved, and sold. Human trafficking victims often hail from impoverished nations. Their quest for a new beginning leads them to take chances on alluring work opportunities in the United States that all too often turn their dreams of a better life into nightmares of physical, emotional, and sexual abuse and humiliation. Of course, not all trafficking victims move across international borders. Many victims are Americans recruited from our nation's streets, and their plight is just as heartbreaking as those victims who hail from faraway lands.

In early 2002, at the beginning of his administration, President George W. Bush declared that human trafficking is a national security issue requiring a comprehensive and coordinated response by all federal agencies. He created mechanisms, such as the cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Person (now the Senior Policy Operating Group), to ensure that the federal government fully implements the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. The Department of Justice has aggressively carried out the President's directives, and has worked with governmental and non-governmental organizations, both here and abroad, to rescue, protect, and assist victims of sex, labor, and child sex trafficking. In addition, the Department has collaborated with its partners in other federal governmental agencies, state and local law enforcement agencies, and foreign governments to investigate, apprehend, and prosecute hundreds of traffickers. Indeed, since fiscal year 2001, federal investigators and prosecutors have charged and convicted record numbers of trafficking defendants.

This report presents a summary of the Department's accomplishments to halt human trafficking through aggressive, proactive investigations that reflect a victim-centered approach. As we explain in this report, victims are essential to the investigation, prosecution, and prevention of this appalling crime. Federally supported crime victim services and outreach programs are an integral part of our strategy. The Department has also energetically shared our victim-centered approach with foreign nations, and is supporting the active involvement of state and local government in our efforts. Since 2004, the Department has awarded more than $30 million to institute 32 multi-disciplinary anti-human trafficking task forces and nearly two dozen victim service providers in communities across the nation.

The Department has accomplished a great deal to implement the President's directives to abolish human trafficking, but we do not end here. We must continue to rescue victims, prosecute traffickers, and coordinate with our domestic and international partners to put an end to this heinous crime. It is my hope that this report will help further inform our nation's response to human trafficking by sharing the successes that we at the Department of Justice have thus far achieved in combating human trafficking.

Sincerely,

Alberto R. Gonzales

HUMAN TRAFFICKING CASES
Fiscal Years 2001 - 2005

The following are summaries of human trafficking cases prosecuted by the Department between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, many of which are discussed in this report, that highlight the factual variations found in these types of cases.

Fiscal Year 2001

United States v. Gasanov (Texas)

Two defendants, Sardar and Nadira Gasanov, a Russian couple, were convicted on March 15, 2002, of recruiting women from Uzbekistan into the United States under false pretenses, then forcing them to work in strip clubs and bars in El Paso, Texas, in order to pay back an alleged $300,000 smuggling fee. The victims were stripped of their passports, required to work seven days a week, and had their families in Uzbekistan threatened should they not comply with the Gasanovs' demands. On May 17, 2002, the defendants were sentenced to 5 years incarceration to be followed by 3 years supervised release, and they were ordered to pay approximately $516,000 in restitution.

United States v. Lee, et al. (Hawaii)

In United States v. Kil Soo Lee, the largest trafficking prosecution ever brought by the Department, the Civil Rights Division led a long and difficult investigation resulting in a 22-count indictment against five defendants charged with subjecting workers to involuntary servitude in a garment factory in American Samoa. Specifically, the indictment, filed in federal court in Hawaii, charged that the defendants brought over 250 Vietnamese and Chinese nationals, mostly young women, to work as sewing machine operators in a Daewoosa garment factory. The victims, some of whom were held for up to two years, were forced to work through extreme food deprivation, beatings and physical restraint. The victims were held in barracks on a guarded company compound, and were threatened with confiscation of their passports, deportation, economic bankruptcy, severe economic hardship to family members, false arrest, and a host of other consequences. One victim had an eye gouged out by a defendant who struck her with a jagged pipe in order to punish her for refusing to comply with the defendants' orders.

Two Samoan defendants, who conspired with Lee, previously pled guilty to charges of conspiracy and received sentences of 5 years and 10 months and 4 years and 9 months incarceration. On February 21, 2002, defendant Kil Soo Lee, the Korean owner of a sweatshop in the Territory of American Samoa, was convicted of conspiracy to violate the civil rights of the workers, eleven counts of involuntary servitude), one count of extortion and one count of money laundering. The other two defendants, his subordinates, were acquitted. On June 22, 2005, defendant Lee was sentenced to 40 years incarceration.

United States v. Ramos, et al. (Florida)

On June 27, 2002, three defendants, Jose, Juan, and Ramiro Ramos – two of whom operated a fruit harvesting business in Lake Placid, Florida – were convicted of conspiring to commit involuntary servitude, harboring illegal aliens and violating the Hobbs Act (which criminalizes extortion by the wrongful use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear) for illegally transporting Mexican citizens to Florida to work in their fields (charges against a fourth defendant were dismissed by the government). Upon their arrival, the workers were told that they owed money for their transport and they were not free to leave the employment until they had repaid the debt. The defendants created a climate of fear by threatening the workers with violence if they left; they subjected the victims to constant surveillance.. The defendants brutally beat a van driver and several of his employees in an effort to prevent them from taking workers away from the area. November 20, 2002, two of the three defendants, Ramiro and Juan Ramos, were sentenced to 12 years and 3 months imprisonment and ordered to pay $675 in restitution to certain victims and to forfeit certain property, under federal asset forfeiture laws, including vehicles, real property and over $3 million in proceeds because the jury that convicted them determined that the property was used in furtherance of the trafficking conspiracy or obtained as a result of the criminal trafficking enterprise. Additionally, defendant Jose Ramos was sentenced to 10 years and 3 months imprisonment and ordered to pay a $10,000 fine.

Following sentencing, however, the Supreme Court rendered its decision in Scheidler v. National Organization for Women, Inc., 537 U.S. 393 (2003), which held that actions which did not amount to "obtaining" property could not be the basis for a Hobbs Act violation. The defendants had been charged with and convicted of Hobbs Act violations, but the evidence did not show that the defendants obtained any property as a result of their actions. Therefore, the Hobbs Act convictions were vacated. On the government's motion, the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, dismissed those charges (the only ones pending against Jose Ramos) and remanded the case against Juan and Ramiro Ramos to the District Court for re-sentencing, where they received sentences of 15 years incarceration, fined $20,000 and ordered to pay $675 restitution on March 1 and May 3, 2004, respectively.

United States v. Satia and Nanji (Maryland)

Two defendants were convicted on December 20, 2001 of holding a teenage Cameroonian girl in involuntary servitude and illegally harboring her in their home to use her as their domestic servant. The defendants were convicted of involuntary servitude, conspiracy, and harboring the victim for their own financial benefit. The defendants recruited the 14-year-old female Cameroonian national to the United States with false promises of attending a school in the United States. Once the young girl arrived here, she was isolated in the defendants' home and forced through threats, sexual assaults, and physical abuse to work for them for several years as their personal servant. On March 27, 2002, the defendants were each sentenced to 9 years of incarceration and ordered to pay approximately $105,300 in restitution to the victim.

United States v. Virchenko, et al. (Alaska)

DOJ_NMG_0013563

On June 13, 2001, three defendants pled guilty to violating the Mann Act and related charges for their involvement in a scheme to traffic Russian women to Alaska. In December 2000, the group approached nine young female Russian folk dancers with the offer to perform in cultural festivals in the United States. The defendants also told the women that they might perform in exhibitions which would include partial nudity similar to the type of dancing done in Las Vegas shows. The defendants made these same representations on the women's United States visa applications. When the women arrived in Alaska, the defendants took their passports, visas, and return plane tickets to Russia and told the women that they must perform as nude dancers in two bars in Anchorage. The women were not permitted to talk to customers and were always accompanied by one or more of the defendants. In August and September, 2001, the defendants were sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 1 ½ to 3 years and 10 months of incarceration.

Fiscal Year 2002

United States v. Blackwell (Maryland)

After a three-week trial in June 2003, the defendants, Barbara Coleman-Blackwell and her husband, Kenneth Coleman, natives of Ghana, were convicted of conspiring to smuggle a woman from Ghana into the United States to work as an unpaid domestic servant and nanny for their child. After bringing their victim to the United States, the defendants isolated her, confiscated her passport, and repeatedly threatened her in order to keep her working in their home while also performing baby-sitting services for neighbors. The victim provided around-the-clock care for the defendants' child; cooked the family's meals; cleaned the home; did the laundry; and, at Coleman-Blackwell's insistence, performed such duties as removing Coleman-Blackwell's shoes at the end of the work day; cleaning between the defendant's toes; cleaning up Blackwell's vomit; and bringing Coleman-Blackwell a bowl of water at meal time to wash her hands. Defendant Coleman's mother, a powerful member of the Ghanaian Parliament, was also charged in the indictment, but has never faced trial because she returned to Ghana and has not been extradited, despite a request presented to the Government of Ghana by the Department of Justice.

United States v. Garcia, et al. (New York)

Six defendants were charged with conspiring to recruit young undocumented Mexican aliens from the Arizona border and transporting them to New York with false promises of good wages. They transported their victims to Albion, New York, where the traffickers forced them to work in agricultural fields for little or no pay and housed them in overcrowded and filthy conditions.

Prior to trial, the defendants challenged the constitutionality of the TVPA's criminalization of labor trafficking, codified at 18. U.S.C. § 1589, arguing that it was void for vagueness because it did not define terms such as "obtains," "threats of serious harm to or physical restraint," and " means of the abuse or threatened abuse of law or the legal process." The magistrate disagreed, finding that the terms used in the statute to define this criminal act were common words, likely to be understood by anyone, and that the statute ensured that prosecutors will only be successful in proving a case of labor trafficking if they can show that the trafficker knowingly committed the prohibited acts. In early December, 2004, the magistrate denied defense motions challenging the labor trafficking statute as unconstitutionally vague.

Subsequently, on December 2, 2004, Maria Garcia entered a guilty plea to charges of forced labor. Elias Botello, a co-defendant pled guilty to conspiring to commit forced labor and co-defendants Jose J. Garcia and Jose I. Garcia entered a guilty plea to harboring aliens. On May 26, 2005, Maria Garcia was sentenced to3 years and 10 months of incarceration, defendant Elias Botello was sentenced to 3 years and 1 month of incarceration, Jose J. Garcia was sentenced to 1 year and 2 months and defendant Jose I. Garcia was sentenced to 1 year probation. Two other co-defendants, Rogelio Espinoza and Sylvia Muñoz Rubio, are currently fugitives.

United States v. Jimenez-Calderon et al. (New Jersey)

Eight defendants were charged on September 26, 2002, with conspiring to lure and transport young Mexican girls into the United States under false pretenses, and then forcing them into prostitution, using physical violence and threats to maintain strict control over them. In September and October 2002, three defendants entered guilty pleas to sex trafficking by force, fraud and coercion. In January 2003, two additional defendants entered guilty pleas to sex trafficking and conspiring to sex trafficking, were subsequently sentenced to 17 ½ years of incarceration.

In September and October 2003, two of the defendants who pled guilty in 2002 were sentenced, respectively, to 44 months incarceration and 96 months incarceration. On June 9, 2004, the third defendant who pled guilty in 2002, was sentenced to 2 years and 3 months of incarceration and five years supervised release. These defendants were held jointly and severally liable, along with the previously-sentenced defendants, for the restitution owed to the victims. The Court further ordered the defendants to pay the victims $135,240.00 in restitution. One other defendant, who pled guilty in January 2003 to conspiring to obstruct justice, was subsequently sentenced to 1 year and four months incarceration. Two defendants remain in fugitive status.

As an offshoot of the original investigation, called Operation Sonic, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents in Newark, New Jersey, conducted Operation Supersonic. On August 7, 2003 they executed ten search warrants, arrested 50 undocumented aliens, and seized $27,000. These warrants were a result of a human smuggling investigation worked jointly with the New York Police Department and the United States Department of Labor. On October 21, 2003, defendant Pedro Garcia-Burgos pled guilty and was sentenced to 96 months imprisonment in the District of New York. On January 20, 2004, four additional subjects were charged for violations ranging from human smuggling to transportation in aid of a racketeering enterprise.

United States v. Lozoya (Texas)

Two defendants pled guilty to charges arising from their illegal transportation of a young Mexican woman into the United States to perform domestic work. The Mexican woman, along with her baby daughter, was held in a trailer where the family mistreated them; the family's failure to obtain medical assistance resulted in the death of the baby. The local United States

DOJ_NMG_0013565

Attorney's Office and the Civil Rights Division prosecuted the case; each defendant was sentenced on June 25, 2003 to15 years and 5 years of incarceration respectively.

United States v. Molina, et al. (Texas)

Nine defendants were charged with conspiring to smuggle and harbor illegal aliens from Honduras to Fort Worth, Texas, under false pretenses that they would be employed as waitresses in restaurants. Once in the United States, the victims were forced to work in bars entertaining men in order to pay off their smuggling and other debts. In September 2002, six of the nine defendants entered guilty pleas. Four defendants pled guilty to conspiring to smuggle and harbor illegal aliens, while one other defendant pled guilty to smuggling illegal aliens and another pled guilty to transporting illegal aliens. On January 3, 2003, these six defendants were sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 2 years and 3 months to 5 years and 3 months. Three remaining defendants are fugitives.

United States v. Trakhtenberg, et al. (New Jersey and New York)

Three defendants were charged with conspiring to commit forced labor, document fraud, and inducing aliens to unlawfully enter the United States for devising and carrying out a scheme to obtain the labor and services of Russian women. From the summer of 1999 through August 2002, the defendants induced more than 25 women to come from Russia to the United States using visa petition falsely claiming they were part of an exchange program with the University of Illinois at Chicago. Instead the women were forced to dance nude up to 10 hours a day, six days a week at strip clubs. In addition, the women's passports and return airline tickets were confiscated to make it difficult to force Russian women to dance in New Jersey strip clubs. and are awaiting sentencing. The victims were lured to the United States to perform cultural dance shows and with the promises of good pay and adequate housing accommodations. However, once in the United States, they were forced to perform in strip clubs and threatened that they would suffer serious harm and physical restraint if they did not perform.

On August 13, 2004, defendant Sergey Malchikov pled guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit forced labor, visa fraud, immigration violations, and extortion, and on July 21, 2005, he was sentenced to 3 years and 9 months of incarceration. Trakhtenberg was charged in two cases in connection with this case; one in District of New Jersey and the other in the Southern District of New York. In late 2004, defendant Trakhtenberg pled guilty to conspiring to commit forced labor, immigration offenses and visa fraud in the District of New Jersey where he was subsequently sentenced, in 2005, to 5 years of incarceration. He also pled guilty to conspiring to commit extortion for having threatened a victim's family in Russia with physical harm unless they paid money owed by the victim, who had escaped from prostitution in the Southern District of New York was subsequently, also in 2005, sentenced to 3 ½ years of incarceration to run concurrently with his earlier sentence of 5 years. Federal prosecutors also sought that Trakhtenberg pay restitution to his victims and forfeit assets gained in connection with this criminal enterprise. He was subsequently ordered to pay approximately $66,300 in restitution to four of his victims and ordered to forfeit $25,575. On January 2, 2006, the third defendant in this case, Viktoriya I'lina, pled guilty to conspiring to commit extortion and visa fraud and her sentencing is pending.

Fiscal Year 2003

United States v. Bradley and O'Dell (New Hampshire)

Two defendants, who operated a tree cutting business, were convicted of holding two Jamaican immigrants in conditions of forced labor and document servitude in Litchfield, New Hampshire. The defendants obtained workers from Jamaica by means of false promises of good work and pay. Once the workers arrived in New Hampshire, their visas and others documents were confiscated and the workers were paid substantially less than promised, were housed in deplorable conditions, were denied medical treatment, and were routinely threatened. On January 16, 2004, the defendants were sentenced to 5 years and 10 months of incarceration, fined $12,500 and ordered to pay $13,052 in restitution to their victims. Defendants appealed their sentence in light of the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005)(holding that federal sentencing guidelines are advisory rather than mandatory) and thus the trial judge had an opportunity to reconsider the defendants' sentences. On January 13, 2006, re-sentencing was held, and upon reconsideration, defendants Bradley and O'Dell received the same sentence as in January 2004.

United States v. Guzman, et al. (Georgia)

On January 30, 2003, four defendants, Samuel Mendez Romero, Noe Quetzal Mendez Guzman, Alejandro Mendez Ramos, and Jose Luis Lopez, were charged in a 20-count superseding indictment with conspiring to bring Mexican women to the United States to engage in prostitution. The defendants were charged with conspiracy, forced prostitution, immigration offenses, and Mann Act violations. In 2002, at least three victims were smuggled into the United States and housed in apartments in the Atlanta area. One of the defendants threatened to kill a victim and her family if the victim refused to engage in prostitution; repeatedly chastised her for not bringing in enough money; and, at one point, physically assaulted her. Each of the victims serviced up to 25 or more men per night and provided half of their income to the taxi drivers who transported the victims to the houses of prostitution. Most of the remaining money was turned over to the defendants.

On May 1, 2003, Samuel Mendez Romero pled guilty to conspiracy, and on July 30, 2003, he was sentenced to nearly 3 years of incarceration. The remaining three defendants – Noe Quetzal Mendez Guzman, Alejandro Mendez Ramos, and Jose Luis Lopez – are fugitives.

United States v. Maka (Hawaii)

The defendant, a landscape maintenance contractor and rock wall builder, was charged with with involuntary servitude, forced labor, document servitude and immigration offenses for transporting Tongan males to Hawaii where they were forced to work in his businesses to repay the transporting expenses. The victims were housed in shacks on the subject's pig farm and were required to work in excess of 12 hours a day, six days a week for approximately $60 to $100 per week. On December 14, 2004, following a month-long trial, defendant Maka was convicted on 34 counts and his sentencing is pending.

United States v. Reyes-Rojas, et al. (Georgia)

Three defendants were charged with conspiracy, sex trafficking, importing and harboring aliens for the purpose of prostitution, alien smuggling and interstate transportation of illegal aliens for smuggling young, illegal aliens from Mexico into the United States and forcing them into prostitution. The defendants seduced their victims and lured them to the United States with the promise of employment, long-term romance and marriage. Once the women were in Atlanta, the defendants used physical violence, threats, and psychological coercion to force their victims to have sex with numerous men every night. Two defendants pled guilty on May 6, 2004, and were sentenced on November 23, 2004. Juan Rojas pled guilty to two sex trafficking counts and was sentenced to 5 years and 11 months of incarceration. Jose Reyes Rojas pled guilty to one sex trafficking charge and was sentenced to 4 years and 9 months of incarceration. A third defendant is a fugitive.

United States v. Russell (California)

Bernard Lawrence Russell was indicted on December 3, 2003, on charges of traveling in foreign commerce with intent to engage in sex with a juvenile, production of child pornography, and possession with intent to import child pornography. Investigation by ICE revealed that Russell traveled to the Philippines on numerous occasions over a two-year period in order to engage in sexual acts with children and to produce child pornography for the purpose of importation into the United States. At least three Filipino children have been identified as Russell's victims. Russell pled guilty on April 22, 2005. Sentencing is pending.

United States v. Soto-Huarto, et al. (Texas)

Eight defendants were charged with maintaining trailers in Edinburg, Texas, as safe houses for illegal aliens newly arrived from the United States-Mexico border. Women aliens were kept at the trailers and were forced to cook, clean, and submit to rapes at the hands of the defendants. In February 2003, local law enforcement encountered two women who had been raped and left for dead as punishment following their attempted escape from the defendants. Agents of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement identified two additional female victims and rescued them. A joint Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement and Federal Bureau of Investigation initiative dismantled the trafficking operation and arrested the defendants. In April and July, 2003, four of the eight defendants entered guilty pleas to transporting aliens. On August 27, 2003, three other defendants entered guilty pleas; two to involuntary servitude charges and one to conspiring to commit involuntary servitude. One remaining defendant is currently in fugitive status. On January 29, 2004 five defendants were sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 4 months to 14 years incarceration and on January 30, 2004, one defendant was sentenced to more than 23 years of incarceration. Three of the 5 defendants were ordered to pay $11,532 in restitution to their victims.

United States v. Trisanti and Nasution (California)

Defendant Trisanti was charged with involuntary servitude and visa fraud, while both defendants were charged together with transportation of aliens. Between March 1996 and March 2003, two victims were trafficked into the United States from Indonesia and forced to work as domestic servants against their will by threats and physical violence. On March 25, 2004, defendant Trisanti pled guilty to involuntary servitude. On March 4, 2005, defendant Trisanti was sentenced to more than 3 ½ years incarceration. In the judge's final sentencing order, Trisanti was ordered to pay $205,289.85 in restitution to his victims. On May 10, 2004, defendant Nasution pled guilty to harboring an illegal alien and was subsequently sentenced to six months home detention and 3 years supervised release.

Fiscal Year 2004

United States v. Adaobi and George Udeozor (Maryland)

The defendants, husband and wife Nigerian nationals, were charged with smuggling a teenage girl from Nigeria into the United States, forcing her to work long hours at their home in Maryland and at the wife's medical practice, sexually assaulting and regularly beating her. The husband fled to Nigeria prior to trial and is being sought as a fugitive. The wife's month-long trial in 2004 resulted in her conviction for harboring-for-financial-gain and for conspiring to hold the girl in involuntary servitude. Her sentencing is pending.

United States v. Boehm, et. al. (Alaska)

On March 19, 2004, an 18-count federal indictment was returned against Josef F. Boehm charging him with conspiracy to commit sex trafficking of children, possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute, being a felon in possession of a firearm, and being an unlawful user in possession of a firearm and ammunition. A superseding indictment also charged three others with conspiracy to commit sex trafficking, sex trafficking of children, and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crack to persons under the age of 21. All four defendants are in federal custody. Boehm pleaded guilty on November 22, 2004 to child sex trafficking and to drug charges. As part of the plea agreement, he agreed to forfeit his residence and also to provide $1.2 million in a trust fund for the future benefit of the victims. Three defendants previously pleaded guilty. Sentencing for the defendants is pending.

United States v. Carreto, et al. (New York)

On April 5, 2005, defendants Josue Flores Carreto, Gerardo Flores Carreto, and Daniel Perez Alonso pled guilty, just prior to trial, to charges arising from forcing young Mexican women into prostitution in brothels throughout the New York City metropolitan area, including Queens and Brooklyn. The three defendants pled guilty to multiple counts of conspiring to engage in sex trafficking and conspiring to import aliens for immoral purposes, sex trafficking, attempted sex trafficking, forced labor, violating the Mann Act, importation of an alien for immoral purposes, and alien smuggling. Additionally, on November 12, 2004, co-defendant Edith Mosquera de

Flores pled guilty to conspiring to force the young Mexican women into prostitution; and co-defendants Eloy Carreto Reyes and Eliu Carreto Fernandez entered guilty pleas on November 16, and December 22, 2004, respectively, to one count of sex trafficking. Co-defendants Consuelo Carreto Valencia and Maria De Los Angeles Velasquez Reyes, who were also indicted on charges of conspiracy, sex trafficking, forced labor or services, and Mann Act and immigration-related offenses, are presently incarcerated in Mexico on Mexican federal charges related to their role in this human trafficking conspiracy. Sentencing of the convicted defendants is pending.

United States v. Clark (Washington)

Michael Clark was arrested in June 2003 in Cambodia for sexually abusing two Cambodian boys, ages 10 and 13. Clark was subsequently indicted in the United States on September 24, 2003, and charged with attempting to and engaging in illicit sexual conduct after travel in foreign commerce. The case is believed to be the first such prosecution under the new provisions of the PROTECT Act. Clark pled guilty on March 17, 2004 and was subsequently to 8 years and 1 month of incarceration.

United States v. Du Preez, et al. (Georgia)

Five defendants were charged with conspiracy, visa fraud, false statements, and immigration offenses in connection with a scheme to bring aliens from other countries, but most often South Africa, into the United States illegally and to provide them with employment at their granite and marble business. Once in the United States, the aliens resided in apartments leased by the granite company, and they were induced to provide labor for cash or for credit against the cost of their rent, furniture, utilities and visa applications. The defendants threatened to report the aliens' illegal status to the immigration officials as a means to keep the aliens under their employment. Between October 25 and November 8, 2005, all 5 defendants entered guilty pleas to conspiring to harbor aliens and sentencing is pending.

United States v. Gates and Heyward (Washington, DC)

Defendants Gary Gates and Tamisha Heyward were charged with multiple counts sex trafficking and violating the Mann Act. The defendants operated a sex-trafficking and Internet prostitution business from their home, at times using girls as young as 14 to perform sexual acts. Gates beat the women who disobeyed him, and he also sexually assaulted many of the women and provided drugs to support some of the women's addictions. Heyward was also charged with unlawful possession of a firearm while defendant Gates was charged with first degree child sexual, under the laws of the District of Columbia. In mid-2004, Heyward pled guilty to sex trafficking and Gates pled guilty to four counts of sex trafficking of children and one count of first degree child sexual abuse. On September 8, Gates was sentenced to 14 years and 10 months of incarceration, 5 years supervised release and fined $1,000. Heyward was sentenced to 9 years of incarceration, 5 years supervised release and fined $5,000.

United States v. Kang, et al. (New York)

DOJ_NMG_0013570

The Kangs, a Korean couple, lured Korean women to New York City with promises of good jobs as hostesses in the their nightclub, but subjected them to rapes and physical abuse, held them for repayment of a $10,000 debt, and attempted to force them into prostitution. On November 18, 2005, the Korean couple pled guilty to forced labor and Byungki Koo, a Department of Homeland Security federal air marshal, also pled guilty to attempting to force one of the victims to get on a flight to South Korea to keep her from testifying against the Kangs. In October 2005, other defendants pled guilty to alien smuggling, conspiring to obstruct justice, and obstruction of justice. Sentencing of all seven defendants is pending.

United States v. Mubang (Maryland)

Defendant Theresa Mubang was convicted after a jury trial in November on charges of involuntary servitude and harboring an alien. Between November 1996 and December 1998, an 11 year old Cameroonian national was allegedly forced to work against her will as a domestic servant after being brought into the United States illegally and under false pretenses. Once in the United States, the victim was forced to care for the defendant's two children and performed all the household chores without pay at her home in Chevy Chase, Maryland. The defendant forced the victim to comply by beating her with a broken metal broom stick and a cable cord, forbidding her from speaking of her conditions to anyone, forbidding her from leaving the house or opening the door to anyone, and interfering with her mail. Mubang fled the country soon after her conviction. On February 28, 2005, Mubang was sentenced in absentia to 17 ½ years of incarceration and is currently a fugitive.

United States v. Sims (Georgia)

Maurice Sims transported a 16-year-old girl from El Dorado, Arkansas, to Atlanta, Georgia, for purposes of prostitution. Along the route he beat and raped the girl. On February 4, 2004, a federal grand jury indicted Sims on six counts including kidnaping, violations of the TVPA, and transporting a minor in interstate commerce for criminal sexual activity. A superseding indictment was returned March 2, 2004, adding three counts of obstruction of justice. On September 2004 Sims was convicted of kidnaping, trafficking, transportation across state lines for criminal sexual purposes, and persuading an individual to travel interstate for a criminal sexual purpose. Sims was sentenced to life imprisonment in December of 2004. His co-defendant, who testified against Sims at trial, was sentenced to5 years imprisonment.

The Stormy Nights Case*: United States v. Parsons, United States v. Thomas, United States v. Washington, United States v. Williams and Southwell, United States v. White, United States v. Sutherland, United States v. Scott, United States v. Phillips* (Oklahoma)

Nine defendants in eight cases were indicted on charges arising from Stormy Nights, a child prostitution investigation. In mid-2004, five defendants pled guilty to various charges in connection with their criminal activity. Defendant Michael Wayne Thomas pled guilty to transporting a juvenile to Pennsylvania for purposes of prostitution on two occasions and to committing an act of violence in furtherance of a prostitution enterprise. Thomas was sentenced to 17 ½ years of incarceration. Jermaine Dion Washington pled guilty to transporting a juvenile to Denver for purposes of prostitution and was sentenced to nearly 9 years of incarceration. DeCory Williams and Tiffone Southwell pled guilty to transporting a juvenile to Miami for purposes of prostitution and they were sentenced to 10 years and 3 years and 5 months, respectively. Jacinto White pled guilty to interstate travel to Pennsylvania in furtherance of a prostitution enterprise and was sentenced to 6 months incarceration. On July 9, 2004, defendant Phillips entered a guilty plea to coercing a person under age 18 to engage in a sexual act was sentenced to 10 years and 5 months of incarceration. On August 10, 2004, Kelvin Scott pled guilty to transporting for immoral purposes, and was sentenced to 10 years of incarceration. On August 20, 2004, Greg Parsons pled guilty to transporting a person under age 18 with intent to engage in criminal sexual activity and was sentenced to 4 years and 10 months of incarceration. On January 11, 2005, Troy Sutherland was convicted on charges of child sex trafficking and his sentencing is pending.

Fiscal Year 2005

United States v. Babaev and United States v. Mammedov (New York)

In July 2005, Alex Babaev and Asgar Mammedov pled guilty to sex trafficking in connection with bringing young women from Azerbaijan into the United States to work as prostitutes in New York, between March 2003 and March 2004. In early 2006, Babaev was sentenced to 20 years of incarceration and Mammadov was sentenced in December, 2005, to 10 years of incarceration and ordered to pay $325,000 in restitution to his victims.

United States v. Kaufman (Kansas)

A thirty five count superseding indictment was returned charging defendants Arlan and Linda Kaufman with conspiracy, forced labor, and involuntary servitude, as well as several other violations including health care fraud, mail fraud, making a false representation and writing, obstructing a federal audit, and forfeiture. The defendants operated "The Kaufman House," a residential treatment group home for mentally ill adults. For nearly 20 years, beginning in 1986 and lasting through October 2004, the defendants engaged in a conspiracy and scheme to hold mentally ill residents in involuntary servitude and forced labor. The defendants forced the residents to engage in nudity and sexually explicit acts and perform acts of labor and services for the defendants' entertainment and benefit. On November 7, 2005, defendants Arlan and Linda Kaufman were convicted. Arlen Kaufman was sentenced to 30 years of incarceration and Linda Kaufman was sentenced to 7 years of incarceration.

United States v. Maksimenko and Aronov and United States v. Prokopenko and Bondarenko (Michigan)

Aleksandr Maksimenko and Michail Aronov were indicted in February 2005, on charges of forced labor. The defendants allegedly smuggled a Ukranian woman into the United States and then coerced her into working at bars dancing for customers in the Detroit area. The defendants allegedly sexually assaulted her as part of their scheme to intimidate her. On September 8, 2005, Aronov pled guilty to conspiring with others to compel Eastern Europeans to serve as exotic dancers through forced labor, trafficking, document servitude and obstruction of justice. Aronov also pled guilty to conspiring to illegally recruit, transport, and harbor the women as well as to launder proceeds arising from the compelled servitude as well as immigration crimes. Evgeny Prokopenko and Alesander Bondarenko pled guilty to visa fraud for their involvement in this scheme. Trial for defendant Maksimenko is currently being scheduled and sentencing of those defendants who pled guilty is pending.

United States v. Medrano, et al. (New Jersey)

Defendants Luisa Medrano, Noris Elvira Rosales Martinez, Ana Luz Rosales Martinez, Nancy Floridalma Rosales Martinez, Jose Dimas Magana, Lourdes Rosales Martinez, Zenia Zunilda Martinez, Jose Arnaldo Isaula-Meza, Elsa Consuelo Isaula-Meza, and Rosalba Ortiz were charged with conspiracy to commit forced labor and multiple counts of forced labor and alien smuggling. A superseding federal indictment added six additional defendants to the case. Beginning in April 2003, the defendants allegedly recruited Honduran women and girls to come to the United States with promises of restaurant jobs. Once the women were smuggled into the United States, they were brought to New Jersey, where the subjects confined them in safe houses, forced them to dance with men in bars, and encouraged them to engage in prostitution to pay of inflated smuggling debts. On November 16, 2005, defendant Xochil Nectalina Rosales Martinez entered a guilty plea to conspiring to commit forced labor for her involvement in this matter. Sentencing of Rosales Martinez is pending as is a trial of the other remaining defendants.

United States v. Okhotina (California)

Defendant Alana Okhotina was charged with sex trafficking by force, fraud or coercion, and trafficking into servitude by importation of an alien for immoral purposes alien smuggling and two counts of transportation into prostitution. In January 2003, the defendant smuggled her eighteen year old niece into the United States from Russia and forced her to work as a prostitute to repay her smuggling debt. The defendant threatened to kill the victim and her family if she did not comply. On December 6, 2005, Okhotina entered a guilty plea for trafficking into slavery. Okhotina's sentencing is pending.

United States v. Salazar, et al. (Texas)

Defendants Gerardo Salazar, Salvador Fernando Molina Garcia, Angel Moreno Salazar and Jose Luis Moreno Salazar were charged with conspiring to commit sex trafficking of young Mexican women and girls. Two additional defendants, Juan Carlos Salazar and Ivan Salazar, were charged in the superseding indictment with this same charge. The defendants allegedly lured young Mexican girls and women into the United States under false pretenses, then forced them into prostitution, using physical violence and threats to maintain strict control over them. On January 17, 2006, defendant Salvador Fernando Molina Garcia entered a guilty plea to conspiring to smuggle minor Mexican girls and young Mexican women into the United States.

United States v. Zavala and Ibanez (New York)

DOJ_NMG_0013573

On November 5, 2004, defendants Mariluz Zavala and Jorge Ibanez pled guilty to conspiracy to commit forced labor, document servitude, and to recruit, harbor, transport and house undocumented workers; engaging in extortionate credit transactions; transferring false alien registration cards. Between June 1, 1999, and June 21, 2004, Zavala and Ibanez orchestrated a scheme to illegally obtain visas for Peruvian aliens seeking to come into the United States. The defendants charged the aliens a smuggling fee ranging from $6,000 to $13,000. By confiscating their passports and threatening to turn them over to authorities, the defendants compelled the aliens to perform work for them and other employers. The defendants would keep most of their paychecks, leaving the aliens with approximately $50 or less per week on which to live and support their families. More than 60 Peruvian illegal aliens, including 13 children, who were living in cramped and squalid conditions, were granted continued presence and are receiving services through a non-governmental organization. As part of their guilty pleas, the defendants will forfeit a residence valued at $175,000 and bank accounts containing approximately $30,000 generated through their crimes. On November 9, 2005, Zavala was sentenced to 15 years of incarceration and the sentencing of Iabnez is pending.

HUMAN TRAFFICKING CASES
Pre-Fiscal Year 2001

The following are cases discussed in this report that were prosecuted by the Department prior to fiscal year 2001.

United States v. Cadena, et al., (Florida)

Sixteen defendants were involved in operating brothel houses in Florida and the Carolinas. The defendants recruited young women from Veracruz, Mexico -- some as young as 14 years of age -- to come to the United States with promises of good jobs as in waitresses, child and elder care, and landscaping. Upon their arrival, the victims were informed that they owed a smuggling debt and that they must work as prostitutes or risk harm to themselves or their families. The women were held in bondage in a series of trailer house brothels, where they were made to serve over 30 men a day. Those who attempted to escape and were caught were subjected to beatings, confinement, threats, and punitive rapes. Girls and women who became pregnant as a result of the sexual slavery were forced to have abortions.

On April 2, 1999, Rogerio Cadena, who had pleaded guilty to one count alleging Conspiracy Against Rights (the Thirteenth Amendment) and one count Use of Firearm in Commission of a Crime of Violence was sentenced to more than 15 years of incarceration, and ordered to pay $1,000,000 to the victims of this crime. On April 16, 1999, eight Cadena associates were sentenced to terms ranging from 4 years and 9 months to more than 24 years of incarceration. Rogerio Cadena and several of his co-defendants were also ordered to pay their victims $1,000,000. In September 2005, Jose Luis Cadena, another associate, was arrested in Mexico pursuant to an extradition request by the United States. In addition, one co-defendant was convicted of murder in state court as a result of the joint federal and state investigation, another was dismissed by the government, and one has died in Mexico of natural causes. Three other co-defendants remain fugitives as of January 2006.

United States v. Michael Allen Lee, et al. (Florida)

Defendant Michael Lee, an agricultural crew leader, targeted homeless African-Americans who were addicted to cocaine or alcohol in recruiting for agricultural laborers. The men were offered crack cocaine in exchange for work. These recruits were then housed in abhorrent conditions, cheated of pay, threatened with violence, physically abused, and kept working because of a revolving debt to Lee. Assisting Lee was defendant Billy Rankin, and Lee's "henchman," defendant William Smith. Rankin recruited homeless African-American men in Orlando for the Lee operation, and drove the laborers to and from the fields in unsafe vehicles. Smith acted as "enforcer" for Lee. In April 1997, Lee and Smith kidnaped victim George Williams and brutally beat him for leaving Lee's employ without satisfying the debt he owed. Michael Allen Lee pled guilty in February 2001 to felony civil rights conspiracy to violate the Thirteenth Amendment's prohibition against slavery. On August 15, 2001, Lee was sentenced to more than 4 years of incarceration. William Oscar Smith pled guilty in May 2001 to a felony charge of one count of conspiring to hold a person in involuntary servitude. In July 2001, Smith was sentenced to 4 years and 7 months of incarceration. In March 2001, Billy C. Rankin pled guilty to a misdemeanor count of conspiring to provide unsafe transportation to agricultural workers. On June 11, 2001, Rankin was sentenced to 4 months of incarceration.

United States v. Pipkins (Georgia)

In August 2004, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the 2001 convictions in United States v. Pipkins, 378 F. 3d 1281 (11th Cir. 2004), in which a gang of street pimps were convicted of Involuntary Servitude and Extortion for holding girls and women in a condition of forced prostitution from 1997 through 2001. The men persuaded underage females to prostitute for them by presenting a vision of ostentatious living, promising fame and fortune. They also enforced their rules brutally. Prostitutes endured beatings with belts, baseball bats, or "pimp sticks" (two coat hangers wrapped together). The pimps also punished the girls and women by kicking them, punching them, forcing them to lay naked on the floor and then have sex with another prostitute while others watched, or "trunking" them by locking them in the trunk of a car to teach them a lesson. Pipkins was sentenced to 30 years incarceration and his confederate Andrew Moore was sentenced to 40 years incarceration. The Eleventh Circuit upheld the use of the federal racketeering statute against the loose confederation of pimps, ruled that the evidence was sufficient to support a slavery conviction despite the victims' apparent freedom of movement (as their continued service was compelled through force and threats), and upheld the application of the criminal sexual abuse sentencing guideline to the case.

United States v. Reddy, et al. (California)

For over ten years, defendant Lakireddy Bali Reddy, a Berkeley, California, businessman, maintained a number of young girls and women for his sexual gratification and to work in his household and business enterprises. These victims were predominantly from families of lower castes and were brought into the United States by way of fraudulent employment offers or sham marriages. The case came to light upon the accidental death, by carbon monoxide poisoning, of a girl housed in one of Reddy's apartments and used by him as a concubine. Members of Reddy's family, notably his brother Jay and sister-in-law Annapurna Lakireddy, posed as relatives to assist in the fraudulent importation of these victims. On March 7, 2001, Lakireddy Bali Reddy pled guilty to violating two counts transportation of minors for immoral purposes, one count of conspiracy to bring aliens into the United States illegally and subscribing to a false tax return). On June 19, 2001, Reddy was sentenced to 8 years and 1 month of incarceration, and was ordered to pay $2,000,000 in restitution to four of his victims and be put on the registery of sex offenders. On March 7, 2001 Jay and Annapurna Lakireddy pled guilty to conspiring with Reddy to commit immigration fraud. On April 29, 2002 Jayaprakash Lakireddy was sentenced to 1 year and 1 day of incarceration and fined $30,000 and defendant Annapurna Lakireddy was sentenced to six months home detention and fined $2,000. On June 26, 2002, Vijay Kumar Lakireddy pled guilty today to conspiracy to commit visa fraud, stemming from his role in a large immigration fraud conspiracy and human trafficking operation. As part of his plea agreement, Mr. Lakireddy agreed that his sentence should be increased because the visa fraud was committed to effectuate another felony offense. The defendant also agreed that he would not dispute the government's characterization of the underlying felony offense as being that of involuntary servitude. On November 18, 2002, he was sentenced to 2 years incarceration and he was fined $40,000. In addition, he was held liable, jointly and severally with the main defendant, for $2,000,000 in restitution to the victims. On October 31, 2003, another son of the defendant pled guilty to conspiring to employ illegal aliens and on June 7, 2004, he was sentenced to 1 year home detention, 5 years probation, 300 hours of community service, and ordered to pay a $20,000 fine.

We have clearance from the WH on the trafficking report, which is great news. Since we are looking at a three-week printing schedule, we will have the report in plenty of time if we get it to the printers at the beginning of next week.

While the report was at the WH, we put together an appendix of case summaries that could be included in the report. This would illustrate the wide variety of trafficking cases that the Department prosecutes. The report already accomplishes this objective, but putting in the an appendix allows the reader to focus exclusively on the prosecutions. We are still making line edits to the appendix, but a draft is attached so that you have a feel for what it would look like. This is purely icing on the cake at this point, so I welcome your thoughts on its inclusion.

In addition, we have drafted an introductory letter from the AG, which would go at the beginning of the report. A draft of that letter is attached for your consideration.

Dear Secretary Rumsfeld:

I am writing to request that you release a detailed list of all contacts between officials in your agency and Jack Abramoff, his associates, and the clients he represented between January 20, 2001, and today. I also request an explanation of any changes in federal policy based on those contacts. This is not the first request seeking the release of these records, and the resistance to these requests is troubling to the American people.

As you are aware, Mr. Abramoff has recently pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion charges related to his attempts to influence federal government policy in both the Congress and the Executive Branch. The Justice Department is currently investigating this influence-peddling scandal. Published reports show that Bush Administration officials have met with Mr. Abramoff approximately 200 times.

I strongly believe that Members of Congress and all federal employees must be held to the highest ethical standards. As the Congress considers legislation to reform federal ethics laws, we must know the extent to which lobbyists like Mr. Abramoff affect federal policy in both the Congress and the Executive Branch. That is why, during the 2004 Presidential campaign, I released the names of lobbyists I met with during my time in the Senate.

As part of that process, it is critical for the Congress to know about each contact that Mr. Abramoff has had with officials in your agency and whether any of those contacts led to any changes in federal policy. This information will help determine what additional changes to our ethics laws are necessary to stop lobbyists and others from using undue and improper influence in their dealings with the federal government.

I am deeply disappointed that the Bush Administration has repeatedly failed to provide any substantive information regarding its interactions with Mr. Abramoff. Refusing to disclose this information is completely inconsistent with the high ethical standards that the American people expect and deserve. I respectfully request that this information be made public immediately.

Thank you in advance for your consideration of this request.

The Honorable Donald Rumsfeld
Secretary
Department of Defense
1000 Defense
The Pentagon
Washington, D.C. 20301-1000

Dear Secretary Rumsfeld:

On Tuesday, we sent a letter to President Bush asking that he and officials within his Administration detail whatever contact they might have had with Jack Abramoff. Scott McClellan announced that the White House would not provide this information, despite earlier assurances. Therefore, we have no choice but to ask you these questions directly.

As we are sure you are aware, the Justice Department is currently investigating the web of corruption surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Even at this early stage of the investigation, concerns have been raised that Mr. Abramoff may have had undue and improper influence within the highest levels of the Bush Administration and even the White House itself. Such accusations serve to undermine the credibility of this Administration and our government at large -- even before any indictments or convictions. As a result, it is crucial that the American people know what role, if any, Mr. Abramoff played in the highest levels of our government.

As more and more Republican officials in and out of Congress are implicated in this scandal, it has become increasingly important that the record be cleared and that any contact you or others in the Administration have had with Mr. Abramoff be fully explained to the American people. For this reason, we urge you to publicly and immediately detail all of your personal contacts with Mr. Abramoff during your time with the Bush Administration. If you know of others in the Administration who have had such contacts, please disclose those contacts as well. Please also detail any official acts that have been undertaken on behalf of or at the request of Mr. Abramoff. Perhaps there are no contacts to reveal, no favors that have been given. We hope that is the case. But it is important to set the record straight, one way or the other.

Additionally, we believe is it imperative that you reveal any involvement in the "K Street Project," the initiative launched in recent years by Republicans close to this Administration who have worked hard to increase the ties between lobbyists like Jack Abramoff and Republican elected officials.

[redacted] attached is the base Graham amendment filed on Nov. 10, number 2515, and the perfecting amendment filed the same day, number 2516, as they appeared in the record. The perfecting amendment makes only one change, adding a new sentence at the very end. Levin voted against the perfecting amendment adding the effective-date language. (Conveniently, the record of that vote appears in the record on the same page as amendment number 2516.)

If you want to get into deep leg history, the text and structure of the Graham amendment were borrowed from S.1088, a habeas reform package that Sen. Kyl introduced in May. (A copy is attached.) The "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction" language is borrowed from S.1088, as is the effective date language of "shall apply to cases pending on or after." S.1088 was not a pure jurisdiction ousting amendment - many of its parts simply create new standards, and are not jurisdictional in nature. Thus in S.1088, it was necessary to expressly apply the new standards to pending claims. Also, where S.1088 bars new claims, it is designed to force their dismissal or rejection, not to force litigants to reformulate the claims. You could argue that the original Graham amendment's language was borrowed from S.1088, but that upon further reflection it became clear to Graham and Kyl that S.1088's "applying to" language was not really appropriate for the Graham amendment for the reasons previously noted - i.e., there is no ambiguity about the effect of pure jurisdiction removal on pending claims, and Graham and Kyl wanted to effect reformulation of the pending claims, not their outright dismissal.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. The group that is working on the Kerry amendment, with the proposed Roberts-Rockefeller second degree, is working diligently, but it is important that we continue on the bill. At this time, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts be laid aside and that the Senator from South Carolina be recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KERRY. Reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Is it my understanding that upon the disposition of the next amendment, this will be the pending business?

Mr. WARNER. That can easily be arranged.

Mr. KERRY. Can we have that?

Mr. WARNER. I so ask.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order pending further action of the body.

Mr. WARNER. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 2515

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 2515 which is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM], for himself, Mr. KYL, and Mr. CHAMBLISS, proposes an amendment numbered 2515.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: Relating to the review of the status of detainees of the United States Government)

At the end of subtitle G of title X, add the following:

SEC. ____. REVIEW OF STATUS OF DETAINEES.

(a) SUBMITTAL OF PROCEDURES FOR STATUS REVIEW OF DETAINEES AT GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA.—Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the congressional defense committees, and to the Committees on the Judiciary of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a report setting forth the procedures of the Combatant Status Review Tribunals and the noticed Administrative Review Boards in operation at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for determining the status of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay.

(b) PROCEDURES.—The procedures submitted to Congress pursuant to subsection (a) shall, with respect to proceedings beginning after the date of the submittal of such procedures under that subsection, ensure that—

(1) in making a determination of status of any detainee under such procedures, a Combatant Status Review Tribunal or Administrative Review Board may not consider statements derived from persons that, as determined by such Tribunal or Board, by the preponderance of the evidence, were obtained with undue coercion; and

(2) the Designated Civilian Official shall be an officer of the United States Government whose appointment to office was made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(c) REPORT ON MODIFICATION OF PROCEDURES.—The Secretary of Defense shall submit to the committees of Congress referred to in subsection (a) a report on any modification of the procedures submitted under subsection (a) not later than 30 days before the date on which such modifications go into effect.

(d) JUDICIAL REVIEW OF DETENTION OF ENEMY COMBATANTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 2241 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(e) No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien outside the United States (as that term is defined in section 101(a)(38) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(38)) who is detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.''.

(2) CERTAIN DECISIONS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of any decision of a Designated Civilian Official described in subsection (b)(2) that an alien is properly detained as an enemy combatant.

(B) LIMITATION ON CLAIMS.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit under this paragraph shall be limited to claims brought by or on behalf of an alien—

(i) who is, at the time a request for review by such court is filed, detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and

(ii) for whom a Combatant Status Review Tribunal has been conducted, pursuant to applicable procedures specified by the Secretary of Defense.

(C) SCOPE OF REVIEW.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on any claims with respect to an alien under this paragraph shall be limited to the consideration of whether the status determination of the Combatant Status Review Tribunal with regard to such alien was consistent with the procedures and standards specified by the Secretary of Defense for Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

(D) TERMINATION ON RELEASE FROM CUSTODY.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit with respect to the claims of an alien under this paragraph shall cease upon the release of such alien from the custody of the Department of Defense.

(3) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to any application or other action that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act. Paragraph (2) shall apply with respect to any claim regarding a decision covered by that paragraph that is pending on or after such date.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, will you notify me when I have used 15 minutes of the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will so notify the Senator.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, this whole debate we are having now with Senator KERRY, what we did with Senator MCCAIN's amendment earlier, and what I am trying to do, is a healthy debate about where we are going as a nation, how we prosecute the war on terror, and what kind of value set we are going to adopt.

One thing we need to understand as a nation and we need to understand in the Senate, in my opinion, is that the attack of 9/11 was an act of war. It was not a criminal enterprise. That is an important statement to make. Every Senator needs to understand in their own mind: Was 9/11 and were those who planned it and those who blew up the people in Jordan yesterday common criminals or are these people engaged in acts of terrorism and war? Let it be said clearly, in my opinion, that the United States is at war with al-Qaida and associate groups, and we have been since 9/11.

When a country such as the United States is at war, we have a rich tradition of following the law of armed conflict, of living up to the Geneva Conventions and all other international treaties that regulate the conduct of war. We have a moral imperative as a nation not to lose our way in fighting this war. Using tactics of one's enemy is no excuse in defeating one's enemy.

It is clear to me from Abu Ghraib backward, forward, and other things we know about that at times we have lost our way in fighting this war. What we are trying to do in a series of amendments is recapture the moral high ground and provide guidance to our troops. That is why Senator MCCAIN's amendment, which I cosponsored, is so important, and it passed by voice vote.

The McCain amendment requires standardization of interrogation techniques when it comes to people in our charge, not as criminal defendants but as enemy combatants, people detained on the battlefield, POWs. It requires the Army Field Manual, not the United States Code, to be changed in a way to give our troops the guidance they need as to what is in bounds and out of bounds when it comes to interrogating prisoners. It is important that we get good information. It is equally important that we not lose our value set in obtaining that information.

Senator MCCAIN has two things in his amendment that we desperately need. It standardizes interrogation techniques for the military, dealing with people who are part of this war, our enemies, and it also makes a statement to every other agency in the Government that you are going to treat people humanely if they are captured under your charge as part of fighting this war.

Guantanamo Bay is a place we have designated to take people off the battlefield and hold them, and the determinations that go on at Guantanamo Bay fall into two categories. Some can be prosecuted for violations of the law of war, not criminal violations in

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: Relating to the review of the status of detainees of the United States Government)

Strike all after the word SEC.

____. REVIEW OF STATUS OF DETAINEES.

(a) SUBMITTAL OF PROCEDURES FOR STATUS REVIEW OF DETAINEES AT GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA.—Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the congressional defense committees, and to the Committees on the Judiciary of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a report setting forth the procedures of the Combatant Status Review Tribunals and the noticed Administrative Review Boards in operation at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for determining the status of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay.

(b) PROCEDURES.—The procedures submitted to Congress pursuant to subsection (a) shall, with respect to proceedings beginning after the date of the submittal of such procedures under that subsection, ensure that—

(1) in making a determination of status of any detainee under such procedures, a Combatant Status Review Tribunal or Administrative Review Board may not consider statements derived from persons that, as determined by such Tribunal or Board, by the preponderance of the evidence, were obtained with undue coercion; and

(2) the Designated Civilian Official shall be an officer of the United States Government whose appointment to office was made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(c) REPORT ON MODIFICATION OF PROCEDURES.—The Secretary of Defense shall submit to the committees of Congress referred to in subsection (a) a report on any modification of the procedures submitted under subsection (a) not later than 30 days before the date on which such modifications go into effect.

(d) JUDICIAL REVIEW OF DETENTION OF ENEMY COMBATANTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 2241 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(e) No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien outside the United States (as that term is defined in section 101(a)(38) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(38)) who is detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.''.

(2) CERTAIN DECISIONS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of any decision of a Designated Civilian Official described in subsection (b)(2) that an alien is properly detained as an enemy combatant.

(B) LIMITATION ON CLAIMS.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit under this paragraph shall be limited to claims brought by or on behalf of an alien—

(i) who is, at the time a request for review by such court is filed, detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and

(ii) for whom a Combatant Status Review Tribunal has been conducted, pursuant to applicable procedures specified by the Secretary of Defense.

(C) SCOPE OF REVIEW.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on any claims with respect to an alien under this paragraph shall be limited to the consideration of whether the status determination of the Combatant Status Review Tribunal with regard to such alien was consistent with the procedures and standards specified by the Secretary of Defense for Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

(D) TERMINATION ON RELEASE FROM CUSTODY.—The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit with respect to the claims of an alien under this paragraph shall cease upon the release of such alien from the custody of the Department of Defense.

(3) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply to any application or other action that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act. Paragraph (2) shall apply with respect to any claim regarding a decision covered by that paragraph that is pending on or after such date.

This section shall become effective 1 day after enactment.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Debate is equally divided on the amendment. Is there further debate?

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, let me speak briefly in opposition to this amendment.

This amendment contains a provision that I think is a very major mistake. It essentially denies all courts anywhere the right to consider any petition from any prisoner being held at Guantanamo Bay. In my view, it is contrary to the way the court decisions have come down already. It is an extraordinary step for this Congress to be taking as an amendment to the Defense bill. This is an issue that should be dealt with in the Judiciary Committee. Senator SPECTER has spoken against the amendment. Senator LEVIN has spoken against the amendment. Senator LEAHY has spoken against the amendment. It is something that requires hearings. It is a very important issue, and we should not be dealing with it here on a late evening on Thursday as part of this authorization bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, we need to standardize our interrogation techniques because we have lost our way. We need to make a statement we are not going to treat people poorly during our charge. For 200 years in the law of armed conflict, no nation has given an enemy combatant, a terrorist, al-Qaida member the ability to go into every Federal court in the United States and sue the people who are fighting the war for us. There are 160 habeas corpus petitions being filed against Guantanamo Bay detention.

Let me read what one of them is saying, a motion by a high-level al-Qaida detainee complaining about basic security procedures: Speed of mail delivery, medical treatment, seek an order to be transferred to the least onerous condition at Gitmo, and asking the court to order Gitmo to allow him to keep any books and reading material sent to him, and report to the court on his opportunities for exercise, communication, recreation, and worship.

The Nazis couldn't go to a Federal court when we had them in our charge as prisoners of war. Never in the history of armed conflict has this been allowed.

Let us stand up for our troops in a reasonable way, protect them from abuses, and protect them from the court suits filed by the people they are fighting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MCCONNELL. The following Senators were necessarily absent: the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. ALEXANDER), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. ENZI), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HAGEL), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SANTORUM), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. THOMAS).

Further, if present and voting, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. ALEXANDER) would have voted ''yea.''

Mr. DURBIN. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CORZINE) and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 42, as follows:

109TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

S. 1088

To establish streamlined procedures for collateral review of mixed petitions, amendments, and defaulted claims, and for other purposes.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

MAY 19, 2005

Mr. KYL introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

---

A BILL

To establish streamlined procedures for collateral review of mixed petitions, amendments, and defaulted claims, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; TABLE OF CONTENTS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the ''Streamlined Procedures Act of 2005''.

(b) TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents for this Act is as follows:

Sec. 1. Short title; table of contents.
Sec. 2. Mixed petitions.
Sec. 3. Amendments to petitions.
Sec. 4. Procedurally defaulted claims.
Sec. 5. Tolling of limitation period.

Sec. 6. Harmless error in sentencing.
Sec. 7. Unified review standard.
Sec. 8. Appeals.
Sec. 9. Capital cases.
Sec. 10. Clemency and pardon decisions.
Sec. 11. Ex parte funding requests.
Sec. 12. Crime victims' rights.
Sec. 13. Technical corrections.
Sec. 14. Application to pending cases.

SEC. 2. MIXED PETITIONS.

Section 2254(b) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1), by striking subparagraphs (A) and (B) and inserting the following:

''(A) the applicant—

''(i) has exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State by fairly presenting and arguing the specific Federal basis for each claim in the State courts; and

''(ii) has described in the application how the applicant has exhausted each claim in the State courts; or

''(B)(i) the application presents a claim for relief that would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2); and

''(ii) the denial of such relief is contrary to, or would entail an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.''; and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

DOJ_NMG_0013598

"(4) Any unexhausted claim that does not qualify for consideration on the grounds described in this subsection shall be dismissed with prejudice.".

SEC. 3. AMENDMENTS TO PETITIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 2244 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(e)(1) An application for a writ of habeas corpus may be amended once as a matter of course before the earlier of the date on which an answer to the application is filed or the expiration of the 1-year period described in subsection (d).

"(2) Except as provided under paragraph (1), an application may not be amended to modify existing claims or to present additional claims, unless the modified or newly presented claims would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (b)(2).".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 2242 of title 28, United States Code, is amended in the third undesignated paragraph by striking "in the rules of procedure applicable to civil actions" and inserting "under section 2244(e)".

SEC. 4. PROCEDURALLY DEFAULTED CLAIMS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

DOJ_NMG_0013599

(1) by redesignating subsections (h) and (i) as subsections (i) and (j), respectively; and

(2) by adding after subsection (g) the following:

''(h)(1) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court with respect to any claim that was found by the State court to be procedurally barred, or any claim of ineffective assistance of counsel related to such claim, unless—

''(A) the claim would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2); or

''(B) the State, through counsel, expressly waives the provisions of this paragraph.

''(2)(A) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider any claim that the State court denies on the merits and on the ground that the claim was not properly raised under State procedural law, or any claim of ineffective assistance of counsel related to such claim, unless the claim would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2).

''(B) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider any claim that is otherwise subject to paragraph (1) and that was reviewed by the State court for plain error, fundamental error, or under a similarly heightened standard of review, unless the claim would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2).

''(3) The State shall not be required to answer any claim described in paragraph (1) or (2) unless the court first determines that the claim would qualify for consideration on the grounds described in subsection (e)(2).

''(4) If a court determines that a State court order denying relief on procedural grounds is ambiguous as to which claims were found to be procedurally barred, the court shall resolve any perceived ambiguity, if necessary, by examining the full record in the State court.

''(5) An application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted with respect to any claim under paragraph (1) or (2) unless the denial of such relief is contrary to, or would entail an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.''.

(b) LIMITATION.—Section 2244(d)(2) of title 28, United States Code, as amended by section 3, is amended by adding at the end the following: ''An application that was otherwise improperly filed in State court shall not be deemed to have been properly filed because the State court exercises discretion in applying a rule or recognizes exceptions to that rule.''.

SEC. 5. TOLLING OF LIMITATION PERIOD.

Section 2244(d) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2), by striking ''judgment or''; and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

''(3) In this section, an application for State post-conviction or other collateral review—

''(A) is pending from the date on which the application is filed with a State court until the date on which the same State court rules on that application; and

''(B) is not pending during any period of time between the date on which a State court rules on that application and the date on which the application or a related application is filed, or is otherwise presented, for adjudication to such State court on rehearing authorized by State law or to a higher State court.

''(4) The period of limitation under paragraph (1) may be tolled, suspended, or extended only as provided under this subsection.''.

SEC. 6. HARMLESS ERROR IN SENTENCING.

Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, as amended by section 4, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''(k) A court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction to consider an application with respect to an error relating to the applicant's sentence or sentencing that has been found to be harmless or not prejudicial in State court proceedings, unless a determination that the error is not structural is contrary to clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.''.

SEC. 7. UNIFIED REVIEW STANDARD.

Section 107(c) of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (28 U.S.C. 2261 note) is amended by striking ''Chapter 154 of title 28, United States Code (as amended by subsection (a))'' and inserting ''This title and the amendments made by this title''.

SEC. 8. APPEALS.

(a) APPELLATE TIME LIMITS.—Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, as amended by sections 4 and 6, is further amended by adding at the end the following:

''(l) In review by a court of appeals of a district court's determination of an application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court, the following shall apply:

"(1) A timely filed notice of appeal from an order issuing a writ of habeas corpus shall operate as a stay of that order, pending final disposition of the appeal.

"(2) A court of appeals shall decide the appeal from an order granting or denying a writ of habeas corpus—

"(A) not later than 300 days after the date on which the brief of the appellee is filed or, if no timely brief is filed, the date on which such brief is due; or

"(B) if a cross-appeal is filed, not later than 300 days after the date on which the appellant files a brief in response to the issues presented by the cross-appeal or, if no timely brief is filed, the date on which such brief is due.

"(3)(A) If a petition is filed for a panel rehearing or rehearing by the court of appeals en banc following a decision by a panel of a court of appeals under paragraph (2), the court of appeals shall decide whether to grant the petition not later than 90 days after the date on which the petition is filed, unless a response is required.

application for a writ of habeas corpus, including any such proceedings in a court of appeals following a remand by the Supreme Court for further proceedings.

''(6) In proceedings following remand in a court of appeals, the time limit specified in paragraph (2) shall begin on the date the remand is ordered if further briefing is not required in the court of appeals. If there is further briefing in the court of appeals, the time limit specified in paragraph (2) shall begin on the date on which a responsive brief is filed or, if no timely responsive brief is filed, from the date on which such brief is due.

''(7) The failure of a court to meet or comply with a time limitation under this subsection shall not be a ground for granting relief from a judgment of conviction or sentence, nor shall the time limitations under this subsection be construed to entitle a capital applicant to a stay of execution, to which the applicant would otherwise not be entitled, for the purpose of litigating any application or appeal.''.

(b) FINALITY OF DETERMINATION.—Section 2244(b)(3)(E) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking ''the subject of a petition'' and all that follows

1 and inserting the following: ''reheard in the court of ap-
2 peals or reviewed by writ of certiorari.''.

3 SEC. 9. CAPITAL CASES.

4 (a) SCOPE OF REVIEW.—Chapter 154 of title 28,
5 United States Code, is amended by striking section 2264
6 and inserting the following:

7 ''§ 2264. Scope of Federal review

8 ''(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection
9 (b), a court, justice, or judge shall not have jurisdiction
10 to consider any claim relating to the judgment or sentence

and convincing evidence that, but for constitutional error, no reasonable fact finder would have found the applicant guilty of the underlying offense.''.

(b) TIME LIMITS.—Section 2266(b)(1)(A) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking ''180 days'' and inserting ''15 months''.

(c) REVIEW BY ATTORNEY GENERAL.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 2261(b) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by striking ''(b) This chapter is applicable if a State establishes'' and inserting the following:

''(b) This chapter is applicable if—

''(1) the Attorney General of the United States certifies that a State has established'';

(B) in the first sentence, by striking the period at the end and inserting a semicolon;

(C) by striking ''The rule of court or statute must provide standards'' and inserting the following:

''(2) the court, statute, or other agency provides standards'';

(D) by striking the period at the end and inserting ''; and''; and

DOJ_NMG_0013608

(E) by adding at the end the following:

''(3) the order required under subsection (c) is entered on or after the effective date of the Attorney General's certification under section 2267.''.

(2) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Section 2265(a) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by striking ''(a) For purposes'' and inserting the following:

''(a)(1) For purposes'';

(B) by striking ''This chapter shall apply, as provided in this section, in relation to a State unitary review procedure if the State establishes'' and inserting the following:

''(2) This chapter shall apply, as provided in this section, in relation to a State unitary review procedure if—

''(A) the Attorney General of the United States certifies that a State has established'';

(C) by striking ''or by statute'' and inserting '', by statute, or by agency rule'';

(D) by striking the period after ''proceedings'' and inserting a semicolon;

(E) by striking ''The rule of court or statute must provide'' and inserting the following:

DOJ_NMG_0013609

"(B) the rule of the court, the statute, or the agency rule provides";

(F) by striking the period at the end and inserting "; and"; and

(G) by adding at the end the following:

"(C) the order required under subsection (b) is entered on or after the effective date of the Attorney General's certification under section 2267.".

(d) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—Chapter 154 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"§ 2267. Judicial Review

"(a) IN GENERAL.—If requested by the chief law enforcement officer of a State, the Attorney General of the United States shall determine whether the State has established a qualifying mechanism for the purpose of section 2261(b)(3) or 2265(a)(2)(C), and, if so, the date on which the mechanism was established. The date the mechanism was established shall be the effective date of the certification.

"(b) REGULATIONS.—The Attorney General shall promulgate regulations to implement the certification procedure under subsection (a).

"(c) REVIEW OF CERTIFICATION.—

DOJ_NMG_0013610

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The Attorney General's determination of whether to certify a State under this section is subject to review exclusively as provided under chapter 158.

"(2) VENUE.—The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction over matters under paragraph (1), subject to review by the Supreme Court under section 2350.

"(3) STANDARD OF REVIEW.—The Attorney General's determination of whether to certify a State under this section shall be conclusive unless manifestly contrary to the law and an abuse of discretion.".

(e) CLERICAL AMENDMENTS.—The table of sections for chapter 154 of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking the item related to section 2264 and inserting the following:

"2264. Scope of Federal review.";

and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

"2267. Judicial review.".

SEC. 10. CLEMENCY AND PARDON DECISIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 85 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

DOJ_NMG_0013611

"§ 1370. State clemency and pardon decisions

''(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided under subsection (b), and notwithstanding any other provision of law, no Federal court shall have jurisdiction to hear any cause or claim arising from the exercise of a State's executive clemency or pardon power, or the process or procedures used under such power.

''(b) EXCEPTION.—This section does not affect the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review any decision of the highest court of a State that involves a cause or claim arising from the exercise of a State's executive clemency or pardon power, or the process or procedures used under such power.''.

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for chapter 85 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

''1370. State clemency and pardon decisions.''.

SEC. 11. EX PARTE FUNDING REQUESTS.

Section 408(q)(9) of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 848(q)(9)) is amended—

(1) by striking ''(9) Upon'' and inserting the following: ''(9) (A) Upon'';

(2) by striking the last two sentences and inserting the following: ''An application for services under this paragraph shall be decided by a judge other than the judge presiding over the post conviction proceeding under section 2254 or 2255 of Title 28, United States Code, seeking to vacate or set aside a death sentence. Any amounts authorized to be paid under this paragraph shall be disclosed to the public immediately.''; and

(3) by adding at the end the following:

''(B) No ex parte proceeding, communication, or request may be considered in a post-conviction action pursuant to this section, except to the extent necessary to protect any confidential-communications privilege between the defendant and post-conviction counsel. The court shall not grant an application for an ex parte proceeding, communication, or request unless the application has been served upon the respondent and the court has allowed the respondent a reasonable opportunity to answer the application. All proceedings, communications, or requests conducted pursuant to this section shall be transcribed and made a part of the record available for appellate review.''.

SEC. 12. CRIME VICTIMS' RIGHTS.

Section 3771(b) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: ''A crime victim shall also be afforded the rights established for crime victims by this section in a Federal habeas corpus proceeding arising out of a State conviction.''.

SEC. 13. TECHNICAL CORRECTIONS.

(a) APPEAL.—Section 2253(c)(1) of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking ''circuit justice or judge'' and inserting ''district or circuit judge''.

(b) FEDERAL CUSTODY.—Section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by designating the 8 undesignated paragraphs as subsections (a) through (h), respectively.

SEC. 14. APPLICATION TO PENDING CASES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall apply to cases pending on and after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) TIME LIMITS.—In a case pending on the date of enactment of this Act, if the amendments made by this Act establish a time limit for taking certain action the period of which began on the date of an event that occurred prior to the date of enactment of this Act, the period of such time limit shall instead begin on the date of enactment of this Act.

The perfecting amendment makes only one change, adding a new sentence at the very end. Levin voted against the perfecting amendment adding the effective-date language. (Conveniently, the record of that vote appears in the record on the same page as amendment number 2516.)

If you want to get into deep leg history, the text and structure of the Graham amendment were borrowed from S.1088, a habeas reform package that Sen. Kyl introduced in May. (A copy is attached.) The "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction" language is borrowed from S.1088, as is the effective date language of "shall apply to cases pending on or after." S.1088 was not a pure jurisdiction ousting amendment – many of its parts simply create new standards, and are not jurisdictional in nature. Thus in S.1088, it was necessary to expressly apply the new standards to pending claims. Also, where S.1088 bars new claims, it is designed to force their dismissal or rejection, not to force litigants to reformulate the claims. You could argue that the original Graham amendment's language was borrowed from S.1088, but that upon further reflection it became clear to Graham and Kyl that S.1088's "applying to" language was not really appropriate for the Graham amendment for the reasons previously noted – i.e., there is no ambiguity about the effect of pure jurisdiction removal on pending claims, and Graham and Kyl wanted to effect reformulation of the pending claims, not their outright dismissal.

Senator Kyl "made" the following statement on the floor of the U.S.
Senate today. It will eventually appear in the printed record for today, February 9. The final printed version will not be available online for several days, however. I will send that to you when it is available.

SENATOR KYL
ENEMY COMBATANTS

Mr. KYL: Mr. President, I rise today to introduce into the Record a letter that Senator Graham and I recently sent to the Attorney General, and to respond to misrepresentations that have been made in the press and by others regarding the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment to last year's Defense Authorization bill. The letter responds to similar misleading attacks that were made against the Justice Department at the beginning of this year. My office has received several inquiries about this letter, which was sent to the Attorney General on January 18. So that anyone interested in this matter might review the letter, I introduce it into the Record.

I ordinarily would not comment on the meaning of legislation that already has been enacted into law. In this case, however, there has been a considerable amount of post-enactment commentary by others on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Much of this commentary insinuates that the Administration and the backers of the amendment are violating an agreement with members of the minority by characterizing the amendment as governing pending litigation. Since the enactment of the Graham amendment last December, some critics have begun to paint a revisionist history of this legislation. In this new account, the Graham amendment supposedly was intentionally modified by the Senate so as not to affect pending litigation. Also in this version of events, Senators relied on representations that the amendment was modified to carve out pending litigation when they voted in favor of its final passage. This conspiracy theory is without foundation.

For those unfamiliar with the Graham amendment, the disputed provision in the legislation changes the federal habeas code by adding a subsection providing as follows: "Except as provided in section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." The amendment also provides that "[t]his section shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act." In addition, the amendment establishes substantive standards for limited judicial review of CSRT determinations and military-commission decisions, and provides that the paragraphs creating those review standards "shall apply with respect to any claim whose review is governed by one of such paragraphs and that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act."

Some critics now assert that nothing in the amendment prevents pre-enactment habeas actions from going forward in their previous form. For reasons explained in the letter to the Attorney General, I believe that such an interpretation is untenable. In addition to the points made in the letter, I would also add the following: the amendment states that the changes that it makes to the habeas code "shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act." If the current pack habeas cases are allowed to go forward in their current form, the law's provision that "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction" to hear those cases in that form will not be effective on the date of the law's enactment. Rather, the courts still would have jurisdiction over these cases after the date of enactment, and the law's all-encompassing jurisdictional bar would become effective only when the current litigation would exhaust itself – a date that likely would come only years in the future. Such a result would not be consistent with the requirement that the law's total jurisdictional prohibition "take effect of the date of the enactment of this Act."

Of those critics who argue that the amendment carves out pre-enactment habeas cases, I would simply ask, what part of "no court, justice or judge" do you not understand? How could this language possibly be more comprehensive? And how could any Senator possibly have been misled as to its effect?

Some of the recent criticism of the amendment in the press has taken a new tack. A few critics have begun to suggest that even if the legislative text of the Graham amendment does wipe out the pending habeas cases, Senators were affirmatively misled about this aspect of the final amendment. The allegation is that Senators were led to understand that the amendment that they were voting on would not affect pending cases. I have reviewed the legislative record from the days leading up to the vote on final passage of the Graham amendment, and find this suggestion wanting. Allow me to describe what was actually said about the original version of the amendment – the Graham/Kyl amendment – as well as the final version, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment, prior to their passage.

On November 10, Senator Levin stated with regard to the original Graham/Kyl amendment, "I read the language as to how broad it is. It eliminates explicitly any appeal: No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus, and that is the way an appeal goes to a court from one of these people. It is eliminated." (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Similarly, later that day, Senator Bingaman characterized the original Graham amendment as follows: "It essentially denies all courts anywhere the right to consider any petition from any prisoner being held at Guantanamo Bay." (151 Cong. Rec. S12667.) And later, on November 15, Senator Durbin said the following about the original Graham/Kyl amendment: "the amendment would eliminate habeas for detainees at Guantanamo Bay. * * * * It would strip Federal courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, of the right to hear any challenge to any practice at Guantanamo Bay, other than a one-time appeal to the D.C. Circuit * * *. It applies retroactively, and therefore also likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case, a pending challenge to the legality of the administration's military commissions." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.)

Thus from the beginning, Senators recognized and emphasized to their colleagues that the original Graham amendment's language was comprehensive. They also recognized and emphasized that the amendment barred pending cases from going forward, including the Hamdan case in the Supreme Court. These aspects of the original amendment not only were generally acknowledged, but were a point of controversy during the Senate debate.

Had the subsequent Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment departed from the original amendment by carving out pending cases, this would have been a momentous change. Aside from the fact that such a change would have gutted the amendment, it also would addressed one of the issues about which opposing Senators had expressed sharp concern. Surely, had such a change been made or even intended to be made, the fact would have been noted. Instead, it is the dog that did not bark.

First, neither Senator Graham nor I ever said anything in the days leading up to the final vote on the amendment that could possibly suggest to anyone that the modified amendment exempted pending cases. Senator Graham is the lead sponsor and I am an original cosponsor of the amendment that passed the Senate on November 10. We controlled the amendment. No one was in a better position than we were to describe what the amendment does and does not do. Had such a major change to the amendment been made, it is inconceivable that one of us would not at least have commented on it. No such comment or even the suggestion of such a change was made by either one of us.

Indeed, the few statements that Senator Graham did make prior to passage of Graham/Levin/Kyl that describe the amendment's reach tend to confirm that the amendment does not treat detainees differently based on when they filed their claims. For example, on the evening of November 14, when the final amendment was introduced, Senator Graham noted that "[i]nstead of having unlimited habeas corpus opportunities under the Constitution, we give every enemy combatant, all 500, a chance to go to Federal court, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia." (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.) "What we have done, working with Senators Levin, Kyl, and others, we have created that same type of appeals process for all military commission decisions." Ibid.

During that same evening, Senator Levin also commented on the new amendment. Although he said that the amendment did not "strip jurisdiction" from the courts, he made clear that he meant that jurisdiction remained in place because the pending cases – including challenges to military-commission decisions – could go forward as claims invoking the substantive review standards of the new amendment. Senator Levin stated: "What we have done in this amendment, we have said that the standards in the amendment will be applied in pending cases, but the amendment will not trip the courts of jurisdiction over those cases. For instance, the Supreme Court jurisdiction in Hamdan is not affected." (151 Cong. Rec. S12755.) Again, later: "what our amendment does, as soon as it is enacted and the enactment is effective, it provides that the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment." Ibid. And again: "because it would not strip courts of jurisdiction over these matters where they have taken jurisdiction, it does, again, apply the substantive law and assume that the courts would apply the substantive law if this amendment is agreed to." Ibid.

Whether the amendment, by barring one type of claim and authorizing another type to take its place, strips the courts of jurisdiction, is, to some extent, a matter of perspective. It is a question of whether the glass is half empty or half full. On the operative issue, however, Senator Levin's remarks on November 14 are consistent not only with my own and Senator Graham's characterization of the amendment (see, e.g. 151 Cong. Rec. S14263), but also with the interpretation now advanced by the Justice Department: that the current claims can go forward, but only as claims for review under the substantive standards created by the new the act.

It bears mention that the revised amendment's authorization of judicial review of military-commission decisions, though narrow and venue-restricted, was a substantial departure from the original amendment. As Senator Levin had emphasized on November 10, the original amendment "eliminates court review of the sentences of enemy combatants before these commissions." (151 Cong. Rec. S12664.) He stated that the amendment even "eliminates the appeal of a conviction that led to a capital offense." (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Under the original Graham amendment, no appeal of any kind would have been permitted from the military-commission verdict in the Hamdan case.

The revised amendment does allow limited appeals of final military-commission decisions. In fact, this change was described to Senators as the principal difference between the original and revised Graham amendments. Senator Levin noted on the morning of November 15, before the vote on Graham/Levin/Kyl:

> "The amendment which was approved last Thursday, which is the one now awaiting this amendment, would have provided for review only for status determinations and not of convictions by military commissions. * * * * One of the reasons I voted against the amendment last Thursday is that it did not provide for that direct judicial review of convictions by military commissions. That is the major change in the amendment before the Senate, the so-called Graham-Levin-Kyl amendment which is before the Senate. There are a number of other changes as well, but of all the changes, what this amendment does is add * * * a direct appeal for convictions by military commissions." (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.)

Other Senators speaking about the amendment prior to the final vote did not even view the detainee's glass as half full. On the morning of November 15, Senator Specter exhorted his colleagues to oppose the amendment, stating: "On the face of the Graham amendment, it * * * even takes away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) He later stated that the amendment would "strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees being held in U.S. custody as enemy combatants," (151 Cong. Rec. 12801), and reiterated that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment was an amendment "which on the face takes away jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States." Ibid. Senator Specter's remarks should at least have placed any Senator on inquiry notice that the final amendment might affect pending cases.

Finally, Senator Durbin also spoke about the final Graham amendment prior to the vote. As I mentioned earlier, on the morning of November 15, Senator Durbin expressed concern that the original Graham/Kyl amendment's jurisdictional bar would apply "retroactively," and that it "likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Almost immediately after these words, Senator Durbin also commented on the revised Graham amendment. He stated:

> "The Graham-Levin substitute amendment would somewhat improve the underlying amendment by expanding the scope of review in the D.C. Circuit Court to include whether CSRT's are legal, but not whether a particular detainee's detention is legal. It would also allow for post-conviction review of military > commission convictions. However, the amendment would still eliminate habeas review and overrule Rasul."

(151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Again, no suggestion was made that the new amendment might carve out pending cases, despite the Senator's expressed concern about retroactivity. The Senator gave no hint that he expected the new amendment to treat pending cases any differently than did the old amendment. Senator Durbin does not appear to have been misled about the effect of the final Graham amendment, not did he mislead anyone else.

To be sure, two statements that do appear in the record prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment both assert that the amendment would not "strip jurisdiction" – and both of these statements are unleavened by Senator Levin's accompanying clarification that pending cases would proceed under the substantive review standards of the new law. Both of these statements, however, appear to have been introduced into the record following the final vote – both refer to that vote in the past tense. Neither Senator thus could have misled other members about the effect of the amendment prior to the vote. Senator Kerry made clear in his statement that his remarks were made only after the November 15 vote: "Today, I voted in favor of Senator Bingaman's amendment No. 2523, because it would have preserved judicial review. * * * When the Bingaman amendment failed, I voted for a second-degree amendment." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Similarly, Senator Reid also emphasized that his statement did not precede the actual vote: "the Senate has voted to deny the availability of habeas corpus to individuals held by the United States at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. I rise to explain * * * my votes in favor of the Bingaman amendment and the Graham-Levin amendment earlier today." (151 Cong. Rec. S12802.) Neither of these statements was part of the information that was presented to Senators prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment.

To summarize, the legislative record is utterly devoid of any evidence that Senators were led to believe that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment would carve out pending cases. Prior to the vote, several Senators spoke of the original amendment's breadth and the fact that it would terminate pending cases. Senator Graham, drawing no distinction between pre- and post-enactment filers, stated that the revised amendment would apply a uniform standard to all 500 Guantanamo detainees. Senator Levin made clear that "the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment." Senator Specter pointedly warned that the final amendment would "strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees" and "even take[] away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States." Other members who condemned the original amendment for terminating pending cases gave no hint that they viewed the new amendment any differently. Quite simply, there is no evidence that anyone misled anyone else about the fact that the Graham amendment would only allow pending cases to go forward under the limited review standards of the new law.

On November 15, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment passed the Senate by a vote of 84-14. That same day, the entire Defense Authorization bill passed the Senate by unanimous consent and the Senate appointed conferees. One month later, on December 16, the House and Senate conferees agreed to file a conference report. In the days that followed, a new slew of statements were made in the Senate and even in the House commenting on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Many of these statements are simply the usual effort by the losers of legislative battles to rewrite legislative history. The majority of the Senators, for example, who announced in these statements that the Graham amendment was not intended to affect pending cases also were among the 14 Senators who voted against the final Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment. No one can seriously suggest that these members relied on any representations made by the backers of the amendment. And more importantly, given the marked disagreement between the statements that were made at this late stage about the effect of the amendment on pending cases, no one could justifiably have relied upon one view rather than another to learn what the amendment does. Rather, it is up to members to examine the actual language of the amendment.

I hope that this review of the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment will put to rest any accusation that members of Congress were misled about the amendment's impact on pending cases. Whether the amendment does in fact govern pending cases is another matter. For the reasons expressed here and in the January 18 letter to the Attorney General, I believe that it does so, but that, of course, is a matter for the courts to decide. In the event that the courts concur with my and Senator Graham's interpretation of the amendment, however, no member should be heard to complain that they were led to believe that the amendment would operate differently.

I ask unanimous consent that the following letter be printed in the RECORD.

Senator Kyl "made" the following statement on the floor of the U.S. Senate today. It will eventually appear in the printed record for today, February 9. The final printed version will not be available online for several days, however. I will send that to you when it is available.

SENATOR KYL
ENEMY COMBATANTS

Mr. KYL: Mr. President, I rise today to introduce into the Record a letter that Senator Graham and I recently sent to the Attorney General, and to respond to misrepresentations that have been made in the press and by others regarding the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment to last year's Defense Authorization bill. The letter responds to similar misleading attacks that were made against the Justice Department at the beginning of this year. My office has received several inquiries about this letter, which was sent to the Attorney General on January 18. So that anyone interested in this matter might review the letter, I introduce it into the Record.

I ordinarily would not comment on the meaning of legislation that already has been enacted into law. In this case, however, there has been a considerable amount of post-enactment commentary by others on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Much of this commentary insinuates that the Administration and the backers of the amendment are violating an agreement with members of the minority by characterizing the amendment as governing pending litigation. Since the enactment of the Graham amendment last December, some critics have begun to paint a revisionist history of this legislation. In this new account, the Graham amendment supposedly was intentionally modified by the Senate so as not to affect pending litigation. Also in this version of events, Senators relied on representations that the amendment was modified to carve out pending litigation when they voted in favor of its final passage. This conspiracy theory is without foundation.

For those unfamiliar with the Graham amendment, the disputed provision in the legislation changes the federal habeas code by adding a subsection providing as follows: "Except as provided in section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." The amendment also provides that "[t]his section shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act." In addition, the amendment establishes substantive standards for limited judicial review of CSRT determinations and military-commission decisions, and provides that the paragraphs creating those review standards "shall apply with respect to any claim whose review is governed by one of such paragraphs and that is pending on or after the date of the enactment of this Act."

Some critics now assert that nothing in the amendment prevents pre-enactment habeas actions from going forward in their previous form. For reasons explained in the letter to the Attorney General, I believe that such an interpretation is untenable. In addition to the points made in the letter, I would also add the following: the amendment states that the changes that it makes to the habeas code "shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act." If the current pack habeas cases are allowed to go forward in their current form, the law's provision that "no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction" to hear those cases in that form will not be effective on the date of the law's enactment. Rather, the courts still would have jurisdiction over these cases after the date of enactment, and the law's all-encompassing jurisdictional bar would become effective only when the current litigation would exhaust itself – a date that likely would come only years in the future. Such a result would not be consistent with the requirement that the law's total jurisdictional prohibition "take effect of the date of the enactment of this Act."

Of those critics who argue that the amendment carves out pre-enactment habeas cases, I would simply ask, what part of "no court, justice or judge" do you not understand? How could this language possibly be more comprehensive? And how could any Senator possibly have been misled as to its effect?

Some of the recent criticism of the amendment in the press has taken a new tack. A few critics have begun to suggest that even if the legislative text of the Graham amendment does wipe out the pending habeas cases, Senators were affirmatively misled about this aspect of the final amendment. The allegation is that Senators were led to understand that the amendment that they were voting on would not affect pending cases. I have reviewed the legislative record from the days leading up to the vote on final passage of the Graham amendment, and find this suggestion wanting. Allow me to describe what was actually said about the original version of the amendment – the Graham/Kyl amendment – as well as the final version, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment, prior to their passage.

On November 10, Senator Levin stated with regard to the original Graham/Kyl amendment, "I read the language as to how broad it is. It eliminates explicitly any appeal: No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus, and that is the way an appeal goes to a court from one of these people. It is eliminated." (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Similarly, later that day, Senator Bingaman characterized the original Graham amendment as follows: "It essentially denies all courts anywhere the right to consider any petition from any prisoner being held at Guantanamo Bay." (151 Cong. Rec. S12667.) And later, on November 15, Senator Durbin said the following about the original Graham/Kyl amendment: "the amendment would eliminate habeas for detainees at Guantanamo Bay. * * * * It would strip Federal courts, including the U.S. Supreme Court, of the right to hear any challenge to any practice at Guantanamo Bay, other than a one-time appeal to the D.C. Circuit * * *. It applies retroactively, and therefore also likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case, a pending challenge to the legality of the administration's military commissions." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.)

Thus from the beginning, Senators recognized and emphasized to their colleagues that the original Graham amendment's language was comprehensive. They also recognized and emphasized that the amendment barred pending cases from going forward, including the Hamdan case in the Supreme Court. These aspects of the original amendment not only were generally acknowledged, but were a point of controversy during the Senate debate.

Had the subsequent Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment departed from the original amendment by carving out pending cases, this would have been a momentous change. Aside from the fact that such a change would have gutted the amendment, it also would addressed one of the issues about which opposing Senators had expressed sharp concern. Surely, had such a change been made or even intended to be made, the fact would have been noted. Instead, it is the dog that did not bark.

First, neither Senator Graham nor I ever said anything in the days leading up to the final vote on the amendment that could possibly suggest to anyone that the modified amendment exempted pending cases. Senator Graham is the lead sponsor and I am an original cosponsor of the amendment that passed the Senate on November 10. We controlled the amendment. No one was in a better position than we were to describe what the amendment does and does not do. Had such a major change to the amendment been made, it is inconceivable that one of us would not at least have commented on it. No such comment or even the suggestion of such a change was made by either one of us.

Indeed, the few statements that Senator Graham did make prior to passage of Graham/Levin/Kyl that describe the amendment's reach tend to confirm that the amendment does not treat detainees differently based on when they filed their claims. For example, on the evening of November 14, when the final amendment was introduced, Senator Graham noted that "[i]nstead of having unlimited habeas corpus opportunities under the Constitution, we give every enemy combatant, all 500, a chance to go to Federal court, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia." (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.) "What we have done, working with Senators Levin, Kyl, and others, we have created that same type of appeals process for all military commission decisions." Ibid.

During that same evening, Senator Levin also commented on the new amendment. Although he said that the amendment did not "strip jurisdiction" from the courts, he made clear that he meant that jurisdiction remained in place because the pending cases – including challenges to military-commission decisions – could go forward as claims invoking the substantive review standards of the new amendment. Senator Levin stated: "What we have done in this amendment, we have said that the standards in the amendment will be applied in pending cases, but the amendment will not trip the courts of jurisdiction over those cases. For instance, the Supreme Court jurisdiction in Hamdan is not affected." (151 Cong. Rec. S12755.) Again, later: "what our amendment does, as soon as it is enacted and the enactment is effective, it provides that the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment." Ibid. And again: "because it would not strip courts of jurisdiction over these matters where they have taken jurisdiction, it does, again, apply the substantive law and assume that the courts would apply the substantive law if this amendment is agreed to." Ibid.

Whether the amendment, by barring one type of claim and authorizing another type to take its place, strips the courts of jurisdiction, is, to some extent, a matter of perspective. It is a question of whether the glass is half empty or half full. On the operative issue, however, Senator Levin's remarks on November 14 are consistent not only with my own and Senator Graham's characterization of the amendment (see, e.g. 151 Cong. Rec. S14263), but also with the interpretation now advanced by the Justice Department: that the current claims can go forward, but only as claims for review under the substantive standards created by the new the act.

It bears mention that the revised amendment's authorization of judicial review of military-commission decisions, though narrow and venue-restricted, was a substantial departure from the original amendment. As Senator Levin had emphasized on November 10, the original amendment "eliminates court review of the sentences of enemy combatants before these commissions." (151 Cong. Rec. S12664.) He stated that the amendment even "eliminates the appeal of a conviction that led to a capital offense." (151 Cong. Rec. S12665.) Under the original Graham amendment, no appeal of any kind would have been permitted from the military-commission verdict in the Hamdan case.

The revised amendment does allow limited appeals of final military-commission decisions. In fact, this change was described to Senators as the principal difference between the original and revised Graham amendments. Senator Levin noted on the morning of November 15, before the vote on Graham/Levin/Kyl:

> "The amendment which was approved last Thursday, which is the one now awaiting this amendment, would have provided for review only for status determinations and not of convictions by military commissions. * * * * One of the reasons I voted against the amendment last Thursday is that it did not provide for that direct judicial review of convictions by military commissions. That is the major change in the amendment before the Senate, the so-called Graham-Levin-Kyl amendment which is before the Senate. There are a number of other changes as well, but of all the changes, what this amendment does is add * * * a direct appeal for convictions by military commissions." (151 Cong. Rec. S12754.)

Other Senators speaking about the amendment prior to the final vote did not even view the detainee's glass as half full. On the morning of November 15, Senator Specter exhorted his colleagues to oppose the amendment, stating: "On the face of the Graham amendment, it * * * even takes away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) He later stated that the amendment would "strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees being held in U.S. custody as enemy combatants," (151 Cong. Rec. 12801), and reiterated that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment was an amendment "which on the face takes away jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States." Ibid. Senator Specter's remarks should at least have placed any Senator on inquiry notice that the final amendment might affect pending cases.

Finally, Senator Durbin also spoke about the final Graham amendment prior to the vote. As I mentioned earlier, on the morning of November 15, Senator Durbin expressed concern that the original Graham/Kyl amendment's jurisdictional bar would apply "retroactively," and that it "likely would prevent the Supreme Court from ruling on the merits of the Hamdan case." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Almost immediately after these words, Senator Durbin also commented on the revised Graham amendment. He stated:

> "The Graham-Levin substitute amendment would somewhat improve the underlying amendment by expanding the scope of review in the D.C. Circuit Court to include whether CSRT's are legal, but not whether a particular detainee's detention is legal. It would also allow for post-conviction review of military > commission convictions. However, the amendment would still eliminate habeas review and overrule Rasul."

(151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Again, no suggestion was made that the new amendment might carve out pending cases, despite the Senator's expressed concern about retroactivity. The Senator gave no hint that he expected the new amendment to treat pending cases any differently than did the old amendment. Senator Durbin does not appear to have been misled about the effect of the final Graham amendment, not did he mislead anyone else.

To be sure, two statements that do appear in the record prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment both assert that the amendment would not "strip jurisdiction" – and both of these statements are unleavened by Senator Levin's accompanying clarification that pending cases would proceed under the substantive review standards of the new law. Both of these statements, however, appear to have been introduced into the record following the final vote – both refer to that vote in the past tense. Neither Senator thus could have misled other members about the effect of the amendment prior to the vote. Senator Kerry made clear in his statement that his remarks were made only after the November 15 vote: "Today, I voted in favor of Senator Bingaman's amendment No. 2523, because it would have preserved judicial review. * * * When the Bingaman amendment failed, I voted for a second-degree amendment." (151 Cong. Rec. S12799.) Similarly, Senator Reid also emphasized that his statement did not precede the actual vote: "the Senate has voted to deny the availability of habeas corpus to individuals held by the United States at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. I rise to explain * * * my votes in favor of the Bingaman amendment and the Graham-Levin amendment earlier today." (151 Cong. Rec. S12802.) Neither of these statements was part of the information that was presented to Senators prior to the final vote on the Graham amendment.

To summarize, the legislative record is utterly devoid of any evidence that Senators were led to believe that the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment would carve out pending cases. Prior to the vote, several Senators spoke of the original amendment's breadth and the fact that it would terminate pending cases. Senator Graham, drawing no distinction between pre- and post-enactment filers, stated that the revised amendment would apply a uniform standard to all 500 Guantanamo detainees. Senator Levin made clear that "the standards we set forth in our amendment will be the substantive standards which we would expect would be applied in all cases, including cases which are pending as of the effective date of this amendment." Senator Specter pointedly warned that the final amendment would "strip Federal courts of the authority to consider a habeas petition from detainees" and "even take[] away jurisdiction from the Supreme Court of the United States." Other members who condemned the original amendment for terminating pending cases gave no hint that they viewed the new amendment any differently. Quite simply, there is no evidence that anyone misled anyone else about the fact that the Graham amendment would only allow pending cases to go forward under the limited review standards of the new law.

On November 15, the Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment passed the Senate by a vote of 84-14. That same day, the entire Defense Authorization bill passed the Senate by unanimous consent and the Senate appointed conferees. One month later, on December 16, the House and Senate conferees agreed to file a conference report. In the days that followed, a new slew of statements were made in the Senate and even in the House commenting on the meaning of the Graham amendment. Many of these statements are simply the usual effort by the losers of legislative battles to rewrite legislative history. The majority of the Senators, for example, who announced in these statements that the Graham amendment was not intended to affect pending cases also were among the 14 Senators who voted against the final Graham/Levin/Kyl amendment. No one can seriously suggest that these members relied on any representations made by the backers of the amendment. And more importantly, given the marked disagreement between the statements that were made at this late stage about the effect of the amendment on pending cases, no one could justifiably have relied upon one view rather than another to learn what the amendment does. Rather, it is up to members to examine the actual language of the amendment.

I hope that this review of the circumstances of the enactment of the Graham amendment will put to rest any accusation that members of Congress were misled about the amendment's impact on pending cases. Whether the amendment does in fact govern pending cases is another matter. For the reasons expressed here and in the January 18 letter to the Attorney General, I believe that it does so, but that, of course, is a matter for the courts to decide. In the event that the courts concur with my and Senator Graham's interpretation of the amendment, however, no member should be heard to complain that they were led to believe that the amendment would operate differently.

I ask unanimous consent that the following letter be printed in the RECORD.

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 51

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 52

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Says Domestic Spying Program Should Be A Political Issue. The Washington Post (2/10, A7, VandeHei) reports Vice President Cheney "suggested last night that the debate over spying on overseas communications to or from terrorism suspects should be a political issue in this year's congressional elections." Speaking at the annual CPAC convention, Cheney "said the debate over the National Security Agency surveillance program 'has clarified where all stand' on an issue that has drawn criticism from congressional Democrats and some Republicans." Cheney said, "And with an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security, and how we propose to defend the nation that all of us, Republicans and Democrats, love and are privileged to serve." The Post adds Cheney's "comments reflected the emerging GOP plan to make national security and terrorism the centerpiece of House and Senate elections," but they were the "closest a top White House official has come to calling for the NSA program to be a political matter."

The Washington Times (2/10, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Cheney, "who has issued repeated Shermanesque statements that he will not run for president in 2008, said last night that he may be rethinking his position. Almost." After a "crowd of hundreds gathered at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Northwest gave him a rousing standing ovation before his speech last night, the vice president was moved." Cheney said, "Getting a reception like that almost makes me want to run for office again." As the crowd "again erupted in applause, he cut them off -- 'Almost,' he said loudly, drawing laughter."

McCain Supports Increasing Congressional Oversight Of NSA Monitoring Program. Sen. John McCain on The Late Show With David Letterman (2/9) was asked about the NSA terrorist monitoring debate and whether

"any president" can "order wiretaps, and that's just fine?" McCain replied, "Apparently that was the position of the Attorney General but the good news is, seriously, that there's been, in the last 24, 48 hours, there's been a effort to engage and involve the Senate, and the House, and have briefings and get this issue shared with the right members of Congress. I remind you that right after September 11, there was a leak to the media that we were intercepting al Qaeda phone calls. And they shut down. That was a very serious breach of intelligence. And none of us want that to happen again, but Congress has to be briefed, at least key members of Congress, the key members of Congress of which I am not one."

Fox Poll Finds NSA Legislation Has Broad Support. Fox News' Special Report (2/9, Angle) reported, "The push for legislation" to validate the NSA terrorist monitoring program "has lots of support from Republicans and Democrats. The program itself remains popular with the public. In the latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll people were asked if the President should have the power to authorize electronic surveillance without warrants. 54% said yes. Only 40% said no."

Support For NSA Program Rises In AP Poll. The AP (2/10, Shrader) reports, "Bush's campaign to convince Americans that the government's eavesdropping program is essential to the war on terrorism has made an impact: Last month people disapproved, 56 percent to 42 percent. Now it's basically 50-50." Bush "has been particularly successful at making his case to core supporters, including Republicans, white evangelicals and suburban men. Support in each category grew more than 10 percentage points in the last month." The AP adds "public support for the program has grown with the White House's monthlong campaign of speeches and TV appearances to make its case that the monitoring is necessary. According to the AP-Ipsos poll, some 48 percent of Americans now support the administration's program. That's up from 42 percent last month. Half now say the administration should have to get a warrant to conduct eavesdropping, down from 56 percent one month ago. Support for the program grew by 9 percentage points among men, but it dropped 8 points -- to 30 percent -- in the Northeast. … Republican support for the program jumped 14 points to 82 percent. Independent support is up 17 points, to 53 percent. White evangelical support grew by 11 points, to 71 percent."

Former Iowa FBI Agent Warns Senate Probe Could Hurt NSA Program. KIMT-TV Mason City, IA (2/9) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "Former FBI agent Ralph Decker thinks wiretapping is not only legal, it's necessary. He says at least 50 attacks have been stopped by the FBI since September 11th. He thinks the Senate's investigation into the matter could be hurting the spying program." Decker: "I just hope the Senate wakes up because I know the trail of blood would lead right back to the Senate if something does happen and would they claim it? Probably not, knowing them." KIMT adds, "But supporters like Ralph will face an uphill battle since opponents of the wiretapping say spying on American citizens without warrants is not just illegal, it's a violation of their constitutional rights."

More Commentary On NSA Surveillance. Daniel Henninger writes in his Wall Street Journal column (2/10) reports, "Let's start with the one thing we know for sure about the Bush administration's program to listen to al Qaeda's phone calls into and out of the United States: It's dead. After all the publicity of the past two weeks, does anyone think that the boys working on plans for Boston Harbor, the Golden Gate Bridge or Chicago's Loop are still chatting by phone? If the purpose of the public exposure was to pull the plug on the pre-emptive surveillance program, mission accomplished. Be safe, Times Square."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K), "This week the Bush administration was finally forced out of its own pre-Sept. 11 worldview -- and, yes, you read that right. It happened because some brave Republicans stared the president down and said: Stop. Of course, it is the administration that is always accusing its opponents of pre-Sept. 11 thinking." But "for the past five years, President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Karl Rove have been willing to put the national unity required to fight terrorism in second place behind their goals of aggrandizing presidential power and winning elections. Can you get more pre-Sept. 11 than that?"

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) editorializes, "We'd like to thank the Washington Post for publishing a story yesterday that so quickly proved our editorial point of the same day about the folly of putting judges in control of national security decisions. That's what we call service. The front-page story reported that on rare occasion the Bush Administration has used information from the NSA's warrantless foreign-linked wiretaps to seek domestic wiretapping authority from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. This was said to have upset chief FISA judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, and the tenor of the story is that this is one more example of how the warrantless wiretaps are an abuse of power. But the better question is, Who elected Ms. Kollar-Kotelly? The story's real news is that Judge Kollar-Kotelly, and her predecessor Judge Royce Lamberth, took it upon themselves to erect a new 'wall' concerning how intelligence is to be used to protect America. … In any event, why is an unelected judge such as Ms. Kollar-Kotelly making these decisions?"

The Washington Post (2/10, A18, 744K) writes in an editorial that the Administration "would like the debate over its warrantless wiretapping program to divide neatly along partisan, and potentially electorally useful, lines. But some Republican legislators aren't with the program. Their responsible pressure has nudged the administration from its customary highhandedness. The resulting congressional briefings are a good first step, but a framework for real oversight of the surveillance program remains necessary. … Lawmakers don't seem to be deterred by the administration's coolness to a legislative solution -- and they shouldn't be."

More Commentary. The Sacramento Bee (2/10) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clearer than ever this week that the Bush administration is determined not only to continue warrantless electronic eavesdropping, but also to stonewall Congress and the public by saying 'trust us' over and over - and not much else. … Testifying Monday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales fell back on the argument that the president is responsible for protecting the country, and that the Constitution and Congress, in authorizing the president after 9/11 to use force against terrorist groups and states, give him the authority to do it as he sees fit. Even the most innocuous questions from senators elicited mostly platitudes, obfuscation and refusals to answer. Gonzales even said Congress is a full partner in combating terrorism. … 'In the arena of war,' he said, 'it is not true that the president works ... to the exclusion of Congress. Quite the contrary; our framers intended that, in a time of war, both branches of government have a role to play.' … Oh? Presumably that means Congress should be grateful for any scrap of information thrown its way. Key members of Congress - eight in all - have been briefed 'fully,' according to administration officials. But some of those briefed have said the information provided is sketchy and that security rules bar them from spelling out their objections. … Closed hearings could do much to reassure Congress, and indirectly the public, that the administration is not exceeding its mandate while wrapping itself in the flag of national security. If it does have all the authority it needs, then why isn't it willing to make its case to the branch of government charged with making the laws, declaring war and providing the funds to pay for it?"

In a column in the Sacramento Bee (2/10), Cal Thomas writes, "Democrats appeared not to accept Gonzales' testimony that the surveillance is being done legally, preferring to make political points rather than capture and defeat the enemy. … The danger in tinkering with intelligence gathering is that the tinkerers sometimes go too far. In its effort to curtail domestic eavesdropping and foreign spying 30 years ago, a Democratic Congress used the Church Committee findings on illegal domestic surveillance in a way that some analysts believe subsequently curtailed our effectiveness to obtain information vital to the nation's security." Thomas adds, "In his defense of the president's order to monitor limited communications between foreign terrorist suspects and people in the United States, Gonzales listed a number of presidents, Democratic and Republican, dating back to the 19th century, who had used far more invasive and widespread tactics to gather intelligence they believed crucial to defending the nation. … Should the United States be attacked again, the next congressional hearings (assuming Congress survives the attack) will focus on why more wasn't done to protect us. More is now being done and public opinion seems to be fine with it for now, complaints from liberal Democrats (and a few liberal Republicans) notwithstanding."

Goss Says Leaks Of Classified Information Compromise Security. Under the headline "Loose Lips Sink Spies, Porter Goss, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/10, 1.19M), "At the Central Intelligence Agency, we are more than holding our own in the global war on terrorism, but we are at risk of losing a key battle: the battle to protect our classified information. Judge Laurence Silberman, a chairman of President Bush's commission on weapons of mass destruction, said he was 'stunned' by the damage done to our critical intelligence assets by leaked information." The commission "reported last March that in monetary terms, unauthorized disclosures have cost America hundreds of millions of dollars; in security terms, of course, the cost has been much higher. Part of the problem is that the term 'whistleblower' has been misappropriated. The sharp distinction between a whistleblower and someone who breaks the law by willfully compromising classified information has been muddied." Goss adds that "those who choose to bypass the law and go straight to the press are not noble, honorable or patriotic. Nor are they whistleblowers. Instead they are committing a criminal act that potentially places American lives at risk. It is unconscionable to compromise national security information and then seek protection as a whistleblower to forestall punishment."

US Turns Over Three Detainees To Morocco In Wake Of Mueller Visit. Reuters (2/10) reports, "The United States has handed three suspected Islamic militants held at its Guantanamo Bay prison over to Morocco, Moroccan state media reported on Thursday. The three Moroccan men were being detained in Casablanca…for further questioning by an investigating judge, the official news agency MAP reported." Reuters notes, "The extradition was announced two days after U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation head Robert Mueller held talks with King Mohammed on security cooperation between Rabat and Washington. Mueller, who toured the North Africa region to cement the U.S. anti-terror drive, also met Morocco's top security chiefs. 'We knew very well that Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya are working together to fight terrorism,' Thursday's edition of the Moroccan daily al Maghribia quoted Mueller as saying. 'So we must follow up in building our friendly relations with them and create mechanisms to exchange information quickly to prevent new terrorism attacks,' he said."

PATRIOT ACT:

Senators Reach Deal On Patriot Act. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "Senate Republicans who had been blocking a long-term extension of the Patriot Act announced Thursday that an agreement reached with the White House could allow reauthorization of the anti-terrorism law. " At an afternoon news conference, Sen. John E. Sununu "said a bipartisan group of lawmakers had worked out changes in three areas where the legislators thought 'we could do better to protect civil liberties while providing law enforcement the tools it needs.'" White House spokesman Scott McClellan "hailed the agreement, saying that the administration was 'pleased that this important legislation is moving forward.'"

USA Today (2/10, Diamond, 2.31M) says "the compromise allows recipients of 'Section 215' subpoenas seeking business or library records related to a terrorism investigation to challenge in court a requirement that they not tell anyone." It also "scraps a provision that required recipients of "national security letters," which are issued without going before a judge, to provide the FBI with the name of any lawyer they consulted about it. A third element of the deal says traditional libraries may not be subject to FBI requests for information on research done by patrons."

The AP (2/10, Espo) reports, "While there was no immediate reaction from House Republicans, Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, one of the Senate negotiators, said he had been in close touch with the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis." Reaction from the Democrats "was divided. Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, second-ranking in the Democratic leadership, appeared at the GOP news conference. He said the compromise included 'significant progress' toward protecting basic liberties and that he planned to support the compromise." Sen. Harry Reid "said in a statement that the agreement among Republicans 'appears to be a step in the right direction.'" But Sen. Russell Feingold "threatened a filibuster."

The New York Times (2/10, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports the deal may "possibly clear the way for passage of the legislation, which has been bottled up in a dispute over civil liberties," while the Washington Post (2/10, A1, Babington, 744K) runs a story headlined "Patriot Act Compromise Clears Way For Senate Vote." The Washington Times (2/10, Hurt, 90K), however, says "the agreement involving White House officials and top congressional leaders doesn't guarantee approval because most Democrats are still on the record opposing the measure."

Bloomberg (2/10, Bliss) reports, "The measure would still have to pass the House. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner won't comment until he's reviewed details of the accord, said his spokesman, Jeff Lungren."

Reuters (2/10, Cowan) reports, "One change to the law accepted by Senate Republicans and the White House would allow individuals to challenge gag orders when they have been subpoenaed to produce sensitive information on library, medical, education or gun-related records. … Another change would clarify that traditional libraries would not be subjected to special subpoenas, which are not issued by judges, to gain records."

The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (2/10, Distaso) reports, "Sen. John Sununu was pleased with what he called important improvements in the anti-terrorism USA Patriot Act announced yesterday as a compromise between a key group of senators and the White House. … 'I think it's a good package and a step in the right direction and allows us to maintain a bipartisan consensus,' Sununu told the New Hampshire Union Leader in a telephone interview from Washington." The Leader adds, "Sununu announced the deal with the White House on Capitol Hill with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter and three other senators who had held out for changes they felt would protect the legal rights and attorney-client privacy privilege of individuals and businesses under investigation by law enforcement authorities. … Sununu and the other senators said they hope the agreement will clear the way for final passage of the Patriot Act, which has been stalled since December. Congress has extended the existing provisions twice, most recently until March 10."

Judge Allows E-Mail Monitoring Under Patriot Act. CNET News (2/10, McCullagh) reports, "As part of a grand jury investigation that's still secret, the Justice Department asked a federal magistrate judge to approve monitoring of an unnamed person's e-mail correspondents." CNET continues, "The request had a twist: Instead of asking to eavesdrop on the contents of the e-mail messages, which would require some evidence of wrongdoing, prosecutors instead requested the identities of the correspondents. Also included in the request was header information like date and time and Internet address--but not subject lines. … The federal magistrate judge balked and asked the Justice Department to submit an additional brief to demonstrate that such a request would be legal." CNET adds, "Instead, prosecutors asked (US District Judge Thomas) Hogan to step in. He reviewed the portion of federal law dealing with 'pen register' and 'trap and trace' devices--terms originating in the world of telephone wiretapping--and concluded it 'unambiguously' authorizes the e-mail surveillance request. … Though the language may be clumsy, Hogan said, the Patriot Act's amendments authorize that type of easily obtainable surveillance of e-mail. All that's required, he said, is that prosecutors claim the surveillance could conceivably be 'relevant' to an investigation."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Reveals New Details About 2002 Al Qaeda Plot Against Los Angeles Skyscraper. President Bush yesterday revealed the details of a 2002 al Qaeda plot to crash a jet into the Library Tower in Los Angeles, the tallest building west of the Mississippi. The general outlines of the plot had been publicly available previously, but the President disclosed newly-declassified information about the personal involvement of Osama bin Laden in the plot. The New York Times (2/10, Bumiller, Johnston, 1.19M) reports Bush and his counterterrorism adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend, "said that four extremists were recruited from Southeast Asia to carry out the plan, that their leader received training in shoe bombs and that all four had traveled to an undisclosed place after the Sept. 11 attacks to meet with Osama bin Laden and pledge their loyalty to Al Qaeda." Khalid Sheikh Mohammed "trained the leader of the group in building a shoe bomb, similar to the device recovered from Richard Reid, who had tried to set off a bomb in his shoe on an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001." Reuters (2/10, Zakaria) says, "The plot was disrupted with help from two countries in Southeast Asia and two countries in South Asia, Townsend said." On ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 2, 2:40, Thomas), Bush was shown saying, "Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on September the 11th, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed sought out young men from Southeast Asia whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion."

Much of the media coverage looks at the story from a political standpoint, with some suggesting the timing of the disclosure was intended to defuse the furor over the NSA surveillance program or to boost the Republican Party. Some print reports, in fact, carry quotes from anonymous "intelligence" and "law enforcement officials" who downplay the significance of the Los Angeles threat. For example, the Washington Post (2/10, A4, Baker, Eggen, 744K) reports "several US intelligence officials played down the relative importance of the alleged plot and attributed the timing of Bush's speech to politics. The officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to publicly criticize the White House, said there is deep disagreement within the intelligence community over the seriousness of the Library Tower scheme and whether it was ever much more than talk."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Wallsten, Meyer, 958K) reports the details disclosed by Bush "did little to counter skepticism from Democrats and some law enforcement officials who have questioned whether the reported scheme had ever been put into operation before it was thwarted. 'It didn't go,' said one US official familiar with the operational aspects of the war on terrorism. 'It didn't happen.'" The official "said he believed the Library Tower plot was one of many Al Qaeda operations that had not gone much past the conceptual stage. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity, saying that those familiar with the plot feared political retaliation for providing a different characterization of the plan than that of the president."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (2/9, lead story, 2:15, Williams) reported, "The White House says that it was just a coincidence that at this time when the President is under fire for a program of domestic eavesdropping and trying to renew the Patriot Act, he just happened to choose today as the day to talk about a planned terrorist incident in the US that was thwarted and thus never happened." NBC (O'Donnell) added, "The White House had talked generally about this plot before. But today spelled out what al Qaeda's Khalid Sheik Mohammed and this terror suspect Hambali, picked a cell of four operatives, avoiding any Arab recruits." The CBS Evening News (2/9, lead story, 6:35, Axelrod) also reported "today's speech…dovetails with a new White House effort to gain support for its warrantless wiretapping, reversing its refusal to brief Congress on the wiretaps."

ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 3, 1:05, Gibson) reported, "Democrats in Washington immediately began asking -- why is the President talking about this now?" ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "White House officials say the President wanted to emphasize this is a global problem that requires a global response. But Charlie, you know, there is a lot of politics at play here. Republicans hope this war on terror issue is going to be the key to have them keeping control of the House and the Senate in these 2006 mid-term elections. It worked for them in 2002 and 2004. Democrats know this is a serious threat. Yesterday, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton gave a major speech where she warned Democrats can't let Republicans play the fear card. Today, Senator Dianne Feinstein said the President's speech is old news, available on the open record."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/9, Bash) reported, "The vivid new description is part of a Bush effort to justify controversial tactics in fighting terror." CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Forsman) said, "It's a huge story and it's part of an overall message from the White House. … The overall message that for all that trouble since 9/11, the United States has been free of any major terrorist attack. And today, they were driving that home with details saying it hasn't been for want of trying."

Fox News' Special Report (2/9, Cameron) reported Sen. Diane Feinstein "seemed unconvinced of the importance or even existence of the West Coast plot." Feinstein, "I have never seen anything that indicated whether the second wave was bona fide or not. There has been rumors bandied about that it was, but I don't know candidly."

Participants in Fox News' Special Report's roundtable also looked at the politics of Bush's announcement. Morton Kondracke on Fox News' Special Report (2/9) said Bush's speech "was designed to in effect say the menace is there. We're dealing with it. We have dealt with it successfully. So trust me." Fred Barnes said, "It fits with his notion that the most important thing he can do as President is fight the war on terrorism. Also fits with the political interests of Republicans who would rather have terror be the issue than the big issue going into the 2006 mid-term election than say corruption or something like that." Mara Liasson remarked, "I think that this is the President trying to keep people focused on the number one issue for him." Meanwhile, Washington Post reporter Dana Milbank on MSNBC's Hardball (2/9), referring to the President's remarks on the terror threat, "It's something they didn't feel they needed to do before but now they want to do it to boost his ratings on the NSA surveillance program."

Knight Ridder (2/10, Hutcheson) says "the timing of his chilling disclosures…raised suspicion that his remarks were politically motivated. At the very moment that Bush was defending his aggressive approach to terrorism, two of his top advisers were trying to quell a revolt in Congress against his domestic eavesdropping program."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Grier, 61K) reports, "Headlines about possibly illegal eavesdropping activity authorized by the president, plus more bombings in Iraq and revelations about the slow pace of Iraqi reconstruction, have put the Bush team on the defensive this week. In revealing details about an alleged Al Qaeda plot to fly an airliner into a Los Angeles skyscraper, plus insisting that terrorists are weakened and on the run, Bush may be attempting to counter bad news."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Solomon, McKinnon, Rogers, 2.11M) also says "Bush's announcement came as both Republican and Democratic lawmakers are seeking better oversight and regulation of intelligence gathering, after concerns were raised about the National Security Agency's domestic-surveillance activities."

The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Silva, 643K) reports the White House "seemed to underscore both successes in the war on terror and the threat that terrorists still pose. 'We are not yet safe,' said Bush, flanked by paintings of colonial-era Minutemen in a speech delivered in a flag-lined hall of the National Guard Memorial Building in Washington." The Tribune adds, "Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, has told top Republicans that the party's fortunes this year rest on assuring Americans that Republicans are tough on terrorism. And some Democrats have accused the administration of exploiting fear."

Other reports say there is no indication that the NSA intercepts played any role in the intelligence that unraveled the plot. The CBS Evening News (2/9, lead story, 6:35, Axelrod) said "the White House won't go anywhere near this question of whether the eavesdropping program had anything to do with the foiling of this West Coast bomb plot. Won't go anywhere near it. But checking across the government today, we couldn't find one single US official to say that it had." The Washington Times (2/10, Sammon, 90K), however, reports Townsend said that "the US used 'all instruments of national power' to foil the plot."

CBS' Bob Schieffer, meanwhile, suggested that the key information about the plot was obtained through torture. The CBS Evening News (2/9, Stewart) reported, "As detailed as the President got in his speech, US counterterrorism officials got even more explicit with us after he spoke. How serious was Osama bin Laden about a second strike? Officials confirm the terrorist chief had personally set aside $50,000 of his dwindling fortune to bankroll it. And one of the four men recruited to carry it out was already a professionally trained pilot which theoretically put the plot on a fast track." CBS added, "All the indications we have are that they got this information not from any wiretap but from what they called the rigorous questioning of some al Qaeda detainees." CBS anchor Bob Schieffer responded, "Torture." Stewart: "Call it what you will, sir." Schieffer: "But not in this country, someplace else." Stewart: "No sir, in undisclosed locations, as they say."

USA Today (2/10, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports "Bush's revelation triggered a blast from Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who said he was surprised by Bush's announcement because the White House had not fully informed him in advance." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "My understanding was that we did reach out to officials in California and Los Angeles to let them know, I think it was yesterday." The AP (2/10, Riechmann) also reports Villaraigosa "complained he first learned of Bush's remarks while watching TV." He is quoted saying, "I'm amazed that the president would make this on national TV and not inform us of these details through the appropriate channels."

The New York Times (2/10, Broder, 1.19M) reports Villaraigosa "said that he had twice written to the White House to request a meeting with the president to discuss security threats to Los Angeles, but that he had received no response. 'I'm mayor of the second largest city in the country,' Mr. Villaraigosa said. 'I have tried to meet with the president at the White House on a number of occasions every time that I've gone to Washington, DC, to discuss specifically this issue of homeland security, and to no avail. Let's be clear about that.'" He also "said that the president's antiterrorism budget had shortchanged a number of potential targets, including Los Angeles."

Bias Against Counterintelligence Blamed For Vacancies In Top Positions. The Washington Times (2/10, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The most senior U.S. government counterintelligence official -- presidential appointee Michelle Van Cleave -- resigned last month after the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive" was incorporated into the DNI's office. "At the FBI, CIA and Pentagon, senior counterintelligence positions are held by acting officials," and the NSC "counterintelligence staff position has been downgraded. … Intelligence officials said the failure to fill the top posts is a sign of bias against counterspying by senior intelligence officials under DNI John Negroponte and at other agencies. It goes against the recommendations of a presidential commission that called improving efforts to counter foreign spying an urgent priority." The Times adds that "a senior U.S. intelligence official" said, "The administration has put out good words, but is showing by deed that counterintelligence is not a priority." However,

DNI spokesman Carl Kropf declared, "The DNI is confident that counterintelligence operations are being very effectively conducted across the intelligence community." Kropf "added that the selection process is active and that 'we anticipate that these vacancies will be filled expeditiously.'"

TSA Reportedly Dropping Secure Flight Program. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 2, 1:00, Williams) reported, "The folks who run airport security at the US have scrapped a program called Secure Flight that was supposed to check every domestic airline passenger's name against government watch lists. The reason it is being scrapped we're told after four years and $200 million, the TSA still hasn't figured out how the program would work. Civil libertarians strongly oppose Secure Flight, saying the program could grow into a massive domestic surveillance system all its own."

GAO Says Secure Flight "At Risk Of Failure." USA Today (2/10, Frank, 2.31M) reports the Government Accountability Office said yesterday that the "long-delayed kickoff of" the Transportation Security Administration's Secure Flight program "is 'at risk of failure' and faces an uncertain future." In a report, GAO "criticized post-9/11 efforts to implement the computerized program, which aims to check domestic airline passengers' names against terrorist watch lists and other databases. Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley told a Capitol Hill hearing that his agency is doing its own internal review of the program." Meanwhile, "Senators expressed frustration that the TSA has spent nearly three years and $144 million trying to improve on the current system, which has been criticized for mistakenly singling out innocent travelers as suspected terrorists. The agency is seeking an additional $40 million next year for Secure Flight."

The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) reports, "The newest version of the Transportation Security Administration's proposed system to check the names of airline passengers against terrorist watch lists could be vulnerable to hackers, the agency said on Thursday. The agency's chief, Kip Hawley, told a Senate committee that the long-delayed program, now called Secure Flight, will be delayed again. … At a hearing Thursday before the Senate Commerce Committee, Cathleen A. Berrick, an auditor with the Government Accountability Office, said in testimony that Secure Flight 'may not be adequately protected against unauthorized access and use or disruption.'"

TSA Seeks $10 Million To Combat Turnover. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (2/10, B2, Barr, 744K) reports, "The Transportation Security Administration has been hit by troubling turnover in its screener workforce. One in five full-time security screeners has been leaving the agency, according to the administration's new budget. Half of the part-time screeners have also departed. TSA is seeking $10 million in fiscal 2007 to address what the budget calls 'a high rate of attrition.' … Requests for extra money to deal with staff turnover are unusual, but agencies often try to solve the problem with the help of their Cabinet secretary or the Office of Personnel Management before going to Congress."

TSA Auctions Items Seized From Airline Passengers On eBay. The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 6, 1:00, Schieffer) reported, "If you do a lot of flying, you probably have seen airport security agents taking away all those items that are not allowed on planes." CBS (Orr) added, "It looks like an airport security junkyard. Littered with some of 30 million knives, scissors and tools confiscated at check points since 9/11. And believe it or not, frequent flyers, most of this junk is head for eBay." Mary Beth Ingram "runs the program for Pennsylvania, making $15,000 a month selling the loot from airports in Philadelphia, New York and Boston."

Officials Initially Suspected VX In Senate False Alarm. The Washington Post (2/10, A8, Sheridan, 744K) reports, "The evacuation at the Russell Senate Office Building on Wednesday night marked the biggest nerve-agent scare yet at the Capitol complex, with officials initially fearing that a deadly chemical substance might have been released in the building, authorities said yesterday." US Capitol Police Chief Terrance Gainer "declined to identify the agent that appeared to be indicated by the sensor. But the FBI and other agencies that assisted in the emergency response said they were told it was the VX nerve agent."

DHS, White House Were Warned Of Levee Failure On Night Of Katrina. The New York Times (2/10, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Bush administration officials said they had been caught by surprise when they were told on Tuesday, Aug. 30, that a levee had broken, allowing floodwaters to engulf New Orleans. But Congressional investigators have now learned that an eyewitness account of the flooding from a federal emergency official reached the Homeland Security Department's headquarters starting at 9:27 p.m. the day before, and the White House itself at midnight." In a "recently unearthed" e-mail to the chief of staff of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, sent Monday night at 9:27, FEMA warned that conditions "are far more serious than media reports are currently reflecting. Finding extensive flooding and more stranded people than they had thought -- also a number of fires." Former FEMA Director Michael D. Brown "said in a telephone interview Thursday that he personally notified the White House of this news that night, though he declined to identify the official he spoke to." The Times adds, "Investigators now have the documentation to pinpoint some of the fundamental errors and oversights that combined to produce what is universally agreed to be a flawed government response to the worst natural disaster in modern American history."

The New York Times (2/10, Lipton, 1.19M) provides a more in depth look at some of the documents, which it says "pinpoint some of the fundamental errors and oversights that combined to produce what is universally agreed to be a flawed government response to the worst natural disaster in modern United States history." The documentation provided indicates failures at all levels of government. For example, "An official from the United States Department of Health and Human Services, which is charged with helping evacuate medical patients from disaster areas, asked a Louisiana state health official two days before Katrina landed if the state needed help moving patients out of harms way. The state official turned down the offer." Meanwhile, "Reports that there were major breaks in the levees started on Monday morning, the day Katrina hit. But it would be nearly 24 hours before officials in the Bush administration, including President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, appeared to recognize the severity of what had happened."

Brown Says He Will Answer Questions About Communications During Katrina. The New York Times (2/10, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that though Brown "has declined to answer questions from Congress about his conversations during Hurricane Katrina with top Bush administration officials," he said Thursday "that his position had changed." Brown said, "I feel an obligation to answer any questions they put to me." He "will have that chance on Friday, when he is scheduled to testify to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which is nearing the end of a five-month inquiry on the hurricane. 'The public needs to know the entire picture of what was going on,' Mr. Brown said. … As of Thursday evening, Mr. Brown and his lawyer, Andrew W. Lester, said they had received no calls or letters from the White House urging Mr. Brown to remain silent. The testimony will make clear, Mr. Brown said, that senior administration officials, including President Bush, recognized the severity of the problem in New Orleans in the immediate aftermath of the storm."

The Washington Post (2/10, A7, Hsu, 744K) adds, "Brown could shed light on the White House's lack of awareness of events on the day of Katrina's landfall. Documents released by the Senate show that although the Homeland Security Operations Center reported at 6 p.m. Aug. 29 that no New Orleans levees had been breached, authorities received no fewer than 16 reports to the contrary before then."

Baker Touts Louisiana Recovery Plan. The day after the Washington Post ran an article titled, "The Big Easy? Now It's Limbo Land," Rep. Richard Baker, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/10, Baker, 2.31M) writes, "Louisiana's in limbo. Months after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita destroyed more than 200,000 homes and businesses, little progress has been made toward rebuilding. Nor will it if these properties languish in ruins for years." Baker continues, "Even individuals with resources to rebuild won't when their neighborhood remains decimated. The only answer: Restoring whole communities. To help, I have proposed the Louisiana Recovery Corp., which would purchase property from willing sellers, providing them financial stability to move forward and options to come home." Baker states, "Stronger levees, building codes and insurance requirements would ensure that government and Louisianans live up to their responsibilities and rebuild responsibly."

USA Today Says State, Local Plan Needed To Rebuild New Orleans. Meanwhile, USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) editorializes, "New Orleans and the surrounding area are devastated and need help. Americans want to provide it. But Congress is focused on a scheme that would serve neither the city nor the taxpayers well. Actually, it's less a plan than an exercise in thoughtless political spending — and further proof that Washington can't manage disaster relief." USA Today adds, "The Bush administration wisely opposes Baker's plan, but despite the passage of time, it hasn't proposed an alternative." USA Today states, "New Orleans needs a sound state and local rebuilding plan," rather than "an expensive federal bureaucracy."

SBA Seeks $1.1 Billion To Handle Disaster Loans. USA Today (2/10, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports, "The Small Business Administration, criticized for its slow pace in making disaster loans to victims of Hurricane Katrina, is asking Congress for an additional $1.1 billion in relief money. Though the agency has approved $4.1 billion in loans, most of them to owners of storm-damaged homes, it has paid out just $326 million of that amount." John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, said, "We've given them everything they've asked for. That should get them through it." However, "SBA spokesman Raul Cisneros defended the request, noting that Katrina is the most expensive disaster ever to hit the USA and that requests for additional money have been routine in previous disasters. 'We just don't know' how much such events will ultimately cost, he said."

US Seen As Having Lost Will To Rebuild Following Disasters. USA Today (2/10, Hampson, 2.31M) reports that following the Chicago fire of 1871, William Bross, an owner of the Chicago Tribune, had a message for Wall Street: The fire was not a disaster; it was an investment opportunity. … That was the attitude in Chicago in 1871. And in Galveston, Texas, after the hurricane of 1900; in San Francisco after the earthquake of 1906; at Pearl Harbor after the sneak attack in 1941." However, "In New York City, where terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center, and in New Orleans, where Katrina flooded most of the city, Americans are arguing over how, when and even whether to rebuild. The qualities we associate with recovery from disaster — urgency, unity, determination, imagination — have been eclipsed by indecision, delay and dissension." In a list of explanations for the change, USA Today adds, "New Orleans and Lower Manhattan were on the decline, not the rise." Meanwhile, "Rebuilding after natural disasters always has relied on private capital, not federal aid."

WAR NEWS:

Former CIA Officer Charges White House With "Cherry-Picking" Iraq Intelligence. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Pincus, 744K) reports Paul Pillar, CIA national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, "has accused the Bush administration of 'cherry-picking' intelligence on Iraq to justify a decision it had already reached to go to war, and of ignoring warnings that the country could easily fall into violence and chaos" after the fall of Saddam Hussein. In an upcoming issue of Foreign Affairs, Pillar writes, "It has become clear that official intelligence was not relied on in making even the most significant national security decisions, that intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions already made, that damaging ill will developed between [Bush] policymakers and intelligence officers, and that the intelligence community's own work was politicized." The Post calls it "one of the most severe indictments of White House actions by a former Bush official since Richard C. Clarke, a former National Security Council staff member, went public with his criticism of the administration's handling of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and its failure to deal with the terrorist threat beforehand."

United Iraqi Alliance Narrows List Of Premier Candidates To Two. USA Today (2/10, Jervis, 2.31M) reports the United Iraqi Alliance "has narrowed its field of prime minister candidates to two," Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi. Al-Jaafari "has been criticized as being ineffective during the past nine months as prime minister, said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. Al-Jaafari was not as assertive as his tough-talking predecessor, Ayad Allawi." But he "has gained experience in office and has distanced himself from religious Shiite leaders, Othman said." Mahdi "has a stronger personality capable of bringing different sides to the bargaining table, Othman said. However, he is faulted for being too close to Iraq's religious clerics and viewed warily by some because he once lived in Iran."

Iraqi Infrastructure Remains In Abysmal State. The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Prusher, Levinson, 61K) writes about Iraq's infrastructure woes, where "electricity -- along with water, sewage, and oil production -- has dropped below prewar levels." Before the US-led invasion, "Baghdad was receiving an average of at least 16 hours of power a day. Today, with insurgents targeting power plants and electrical lines on an almost daily basis, the city gets power just four hours each day on average." Iraq "was generating 4,500 megawatts before the US invasion. But by November of last year that generation capacity had dropped to 3,995 megawatts, well below the national demand of 7,000 megawatts." And according to Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction Stuart Bowen, "Iraq's water supply, sewer system, and electrical grid were worse off than once thought."

Iraq Experiencing Internet Boom. On the flip side, the New York Times (2/10, Worth, 1.19M) writes about the burgeoning Internet in Iraq. Three years ago, "the Internet was virtually unknown in Iraq. Today, Baghdad has dozens of Internet cafes like ShreifiNet, which consists of three sparely decorated rooms with a total of 34 computers and a satellite dish on the roof. Most of the cafes also transmit wireless services to home Internet users in the surrounding area for a monthly fee; in parts of central Baghdad there are about 20 overlapping wireless networks. The universal hunger to get online has made computer and Web services one of the few bright spots in Iraq's stagnant economy."

Terrorists Release Video Of Kidnapped US Reporter. A new video of kidnapped Christian Science Monitor freelancer Jill Carroll was shown on Kuwaiti TV today. The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 3, 2:00, Dozier) reported, "The best news we have tonight is that at least as of this last Monday which is the date Carroll gives in her video, she was alive and well and asking that everything possible be done for her release." Some "70 American officials in the hostage-working group are working around the clock to try to figure out who has got her. And Iraqi forces are staging raids almost every night trying to track her down. Her family has said that they are grateful that so many people are working to free her." ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 4, :25, Vargas) reported and NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 5, 1:00, Williams) reported the story in brief segments.

The New York Times/AP (2/10) reports, "The kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll appeared in a video shown Thursday on a private Kuwaiti television channel, appealing for her supporters to do whatever was necessary to win her release and saying, 'There is a very short time.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Daragahi, 958K) describing Carroll as appearing "healthy and composed" said she "punctuated her 22-second message, which she said was recorded on Feb. 2, with a note of urgency. 'There is a very short time,' she said. 'Please do it fast. That's all.'" The video "suggested that Carroll has not fallen into the hands of the most brutal category of kidnappers in Iraq, who have previously beheaded western hostages for political ends." Yet "it remains unclear what the kidnappers still demand in return for Carroll's release."

The Washington Post (2/10, A14, Hernandez, 744K) reports Carroll said "that she had sent one letter in her own hand and was sending another 'to prove I am with the mujaheddin,' Arabic for holy warriors." The Post adds, "The content of the letters Carroll spoke of is unknown. In the broadcast, the newscaster said that one letter Carroll had written would be handed over to authorities. The station said it would not broadcast the letter's contents, according to the Associated Press."

Progress Made In Training Afghan Army. The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Baldauf, 61K) reports, "Increasingly, coalition forces are turning over some of the training to Afghan sergeants like Reza. Fresh recruits learn the basics of how to take protective measures and launch counterattacks, skills that will help them hold their positions in a fight." The Afghan forces are not ready to act without support from international forces which "means that the international presence in Afghanistan will remain crucial for the foreseeable future." But "four years after the Taliban's ouster, there are growing expectations that the ANA will pick up more of the slack in defending the country and providing the sort of security that allows Afghans to trust in their own government and their future."

NATO Leaders Reiterate Commitment To Afghanistan After Protests Over Cartoons. Reuters (2/10, John, Dunham) reports, "NATO defense chiefs pledged on Thursday to expand alliance peacekeeping in Afghanistan despite attacks on their troops triggered by the storm over cartoons depicting the Prophet Mohammad." The NATO leaders "meeting in Italy agreed to check security measures in place for their 9,000-strong International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) mission in Afghanistan, but insisted its expansion to 16,000 troops this year would go ahead as planned."

Rumsfeld Favors NATO Lead On Afghan Security, But Says US To Lead Counterterror Mission. The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Burns) reports, "The United States favors NATO eventually taking full command of the international military effort to stabilize Afghanistan, but that will not include a separate American-led counterterrorism mission against al Qaeda, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday." Rumsfeld said he was "very comfortable" with NATO taking control of the security mission but "drew the line, however, at the counterterrorism mission, which is being performed mainly by U.S. special operations forces."

Violence Erupts In Pakistan, Afghanistan During Shiite Religious Holiday. The New York Times (2/10, Gall, Masood, 1.19M) reports, "Violence exploded in Pakistan and Afghanistan on Thursday during processions by Shiite Muslim worshipers observing the holy day of Ashura. A suicide bombing in northwestern Pakistan killed 23 people and wounded dozens more." And in "Afghanistan, fighting broke out between Shiite and Sunni Muslims during a procession of Shiite worshipers in Herat, the country's third-largest city. The fighting killed 6 people and wounded 120 others, said a senior military official." The Times notes, "Sectarian attacks, including suicide attacks on mosques, have occurred in Pakistan, but such a clash was unexpected in the traditionally tolerant Afghan city of Herat. The violence there was another blow in a country that has been struggling with increasing terrorist attacks, local insurgencies and angry demonstrations in recent days over the publication of satirical cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad."

The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Witte, 744K) reports, "Samina Ahmed, South Asia project director for the International Crisis Group, blamed the violence in Afghanistan and Pakistan on governments that have not done enough to curb Sunni groups that target their fellow Muslims. 'It's not just enough to take action against al Qaeda,' Ahmed said in a telephone interview from Pakistan. 'It's just as important to take the same kind of action against sectarian terrorists.'" Meanwhile, "President Hamid Karzai and religious leaders in Afghanistan appealed for calm, and a delegation of clerics was dispatched from Kabul on Thursday night to try to soothe tensions in Herat."

Holiday In Iraq Peaceful. The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Witte, 744K) also notes, "By contrast, not a single attack on Shiite worshipers marred the day in Iraq. Ashura was banned in Iraq during Saddam Hussein's reign. Since the observance was resumed in 2004, the holy day has been jolted by bombings that have killed hundreds." US military spokesman Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch "said the relative tranquility was 'a tribute to the Iraqi security forces.' He said Iraqi soldiers and police had imposed tight security throughout the country, particularly in Karbala, the focal point of the holy day. In a raid this week, Iraqi troops detained 19 suspects who were apparently planning to conduct suicide attacks on Ashura observances, Lynch said." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Daragahi, Boudreaux, 958K) runs a similar report.

Wounded US Soldiers Face Long Path To Recovery. ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 7, 3:10, Vargas) reported, "A greater percentage of US forces are surviving war injuries than at any other time in history. Which means many more people are living with the lasting effects of war. We have devoted a lot of time on this broadcast to their struggles and their triumphs." ABC (Reynolds) added, "It has not been, nor will it ever be, easy for Sam Ross or B.J. Jackson. Two years ago, we met them they were struggling and they struggle still. Do you feel as though you've adjusted?" Sam Ross: "I'm adjusting. I'm not adjusted." B.J. Jackson: "It's a long, frustrating road. And it's painful." Reynolds: "But outwardly, B.J., whose legs were blown off in Iraq, takes his recovery literally in stride." Today, Jackson is "something of a celebrity as the point man for a veterans' group." Ross "came close to losing his life twice. First, when a bomb exploded in his face in Iraq, taking his left leg and his sight. And then a second time last May when the enormity of his loss almost led to suicide." Alienated "from his family, unhappy with his care, and living alone in his trailer. Then, a man named John Gonsalves called. Gonsalves runs 'Homes for Our Troops,' building house free of charge for severely disabled vets." To Sam, "it's more than a log cabin. Though he cannot see it, he says it feels like home and a better future."

US Improves Veterinary Care For Bomb Sniffing Dogs In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Kraul, 958K) reports Lt. Col. Randall Thompson is one of only "six clinical veterinary surgeons in the U.S. military" and now he "works to save the lives of some of the military's most valued assets: bombsniffing dogs that have been severely wounded in combat. He arrived here in October to open Iraq's first urgent surgical care ward for canines." Prior to his "arrival, injured dogs were shipped to a U.S. base in Germany or to the United States for emergency medical treatment. At best, seriously wounded dogs were out of commission for weeks; at worst, they died during transport to a faraway veterinary facility." But their "talent for sniffing out hidden explosive devices has become crucial to the war effort, so the command changed policy."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

AIG To Pay $1.6 Billion In Accounting Scandal. The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 4, :45, Schieffer) reported, "New York State Attorney General accused the insurance giant AIG of doing some creative cooking of its books to mislead investors and the government. Today AIG agreed to pay over $1.6 billion, that's $1,640 million to settle the allegations, getting a share of that money will be investor policyholders and 45 states."

DOJ Warns AIG About Settlement Compliance. The Financial Times (2/10, Parker) reports, "American International Group, the world's biggest insurance company, broke the law after entering into transactions that wrongly boosted its reserves and hid underwriting losses, US prosecutors said on Thursday." The Times continues, "The Department of Justice said AIG 'violated federal criminal law' in connection with misleading financial statements issued by the company. … If AIG or any of its employees fail to abide by settlements announced on Thursday with federal authorities, the Justice department warned it could prosecute the company. AIG agreed to pay $1.64bn to federal and state authorities to resolve allegations of accounting abuses and other impropriety. It represents one of the largest settlements involving a public company."

The AP2 (2/10, Powell) reports, "The deal…also requires the New York-based firm to adopt changes in its business practices that will ensure proper accounting procedures in the future. … AIG said in a statement that the settlement was approved by its board 'in the best interest of the company.' … The pact announced Thursday settles a civil lawsuit filed last May by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer with backing from the New York State Insurance Department and the U.S. Justice Department. The Securities and Exchange Commission, which also worked with Spitzer on the investigation, filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously."

Reuters (2/10) reports, "The settlement… ends a long-running investigation of the company, and was widely anticipated. … It does not resolve pending cases against former AIG chief executive Maurice 'Hank' Greenberg and former chief financial officer Howard Smith, who were forced out last spring. Both have denied any wrongdoing."

The New York Times (2/10, Morgenson) reports, "Apologizing for deceptive business practices extending as far back as two decades ago, American International Group, the global insurance giant, reached a $1.64 billion settlement yesterday with federal and state securities and insurance regulators. … The company also agreed to changes that would soften its historically combative approach to business, a trademark of its ousted chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Mcdonald, Pleven) reports, "The $1.64 billion toll is the biggest paid to regulators by any financial-services company in U.S. history. Additionally, the company said it will take a $1.1 billion after-tax charge to boost its reserves by $1.69 billion following an internal review."

USA Today (2/10, Smith) reports, "New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, whose inquiry into insurance industry sales and commission practices led to Greenberg and a wide range of alleged abuses, called AIG 'a solid company that didn't need to cheat. It finds itself in this position solely because some senior managers thought it was acceptable to deceive the investing public and regulators.' … Mark Schonfeld, director of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Northeast Regional Office, which joined the state's investigation, said, 'We have sought to balance AIG's historical misconduct — which was substantial — with its new approach to compliance and cooperation with regulators and law enforcement.'"

Bloomberg (2/10) reports, "The SEC's investigation of AIG began in 2001 with a probe of policies that mobile-phone distributor Brightpoint Inc. allegedly used to manipulate earnings. The agency continued to look at income-smoothing insurance and reinsurance after AIG paid $10 million to settle the Brightpoint case. More than a dozen companies have been subpoenaed by state and federal regulators."

NYTimes Says "Honest Corporate Environment" Key Goal Of AIG Settlement. The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) says in an editorial that after the "settlement yesterday between regulators and the insurance giant American International Group, a lot of attention focused on the dollars: $1.6 billion. It is an impressive figure. But the money should not obscure the higher goal of an honest corporate environment." The "difference between Enron and A.I.G. is that Enron was a house of cards, but A.I.G. was and still is, as New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, put it, 'a solid company that didn't need to cheat.'"

Lay Attorney Questions Enron Witness's Plea Bargain. The New York Times/Reuters (2/10) reports, "A lawyer for Jeffrey K. Skilling, a former chief executive of Enron, suggested Thursday that a crucial prosecution witness in the trial of Mr. Skilling and another former chief executive, Kenneth L. Lay, did not commit the crimes he admitted to under a plea deal with prosecutors. … The witness, Mark E. Koenig, Enron's former head of investor relations, is the first of several former Enron employees who are expected to testify against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay after striking deals with the government to avoid trials." Reuters continues, "Defense lawyers have said that many of the government's witnesses who reached deals were not guilty but buckled under pressure because they lacked the wherewithal to mount a defense at trial and feared they could face lengthy prison sentences if convicted. … Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, questioned Mr. Koenig about the plea deal, which could send him to prison for up to 10 years for aiding and abetting securities fraud, saying at one point: 'Don't you think this is pretty thin stuff?' … A visibly angry Mr. Koenig replied, 'I don't think it's thin, or else I wouldn't have pleaded guilty to it.'"

The Washington Post (2/10, D2, Johnson) reports, "Koenig…reminded jurors of previous testimony in which he described efforts by the company to meet or exceed Wall Street targets by two pennies in 2000, more than two weeks after the fiscal quarter closed. … 'Frankly, I was afraid these things would come back to me for years,' Koenig said of misleading statements he made to analysts about the health of one of Enron's units. He faces as much as 10 years in prison when he is sentenced."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Emshwiller, Mcwilliams) reports, "Mr. Ramsey asked whether Mr. Koenig had told a friend and former Enron colleague that he had done nothing wrong, or simply made a misstatement during a call with securities analysts. Mr. Koenig firmly denied that he made such comments. Mr. Ramsey hinted that he might call the friend to testify later in the case." The Journal notes, "The line of questioning begun yesterday by Mr. Ramsey is part of a broad defense of Enron's business practices being mounted by the legal teams for Messrs. Lay and Skilling. While Enron, in the more than four years since its December 2001 collapse, has become a synonym for corporate malfeasance, the Lay and Skilling defense teams are betting that they can convince the jury that Enron was a great company felled by an array of outside forces. Prosecutors counter that the two defendants led a years-long scheme to hide numerous problems at Enron, which finally collapsed when some of those problems became public."

USA Today (2/10, Farrell) reports, "The lawyer representing former Enron CEO Ken Lay finally got a chance to cross-examine the government's first witness Thursday, and whiffed. … Shortly after the lunch break at federal court here, attorney Mike Ramsey attacked the credibility of Mark Koenig. The former Enron investor relations chief has pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the prosecution of Lay and another former Enron CEO, Jeff Skilling, on charges of hiding the true state of Enron's financial health from investors in 2000 and 2001. … 'Isn't it true that after you pleaded guilty you told a very close friend and former co-worker that you were not guilty and committed no crime?' he asked. 'Haven't you admitted to Joanie Williamson, sir, that you were not guilty?' Koenig denied telling Williamson any such thing. Ramsey then threatened to have Williamson testify. 'So if she said that (on the stand), she'd be lying, perjuring herself?' Ramsey asked. 'That's right,' Koenig stated defiantly. … Ramsey dropped the subject and immediately began quizzing Koenig about several topics that have yet to be fully introduced through testimony. At each point, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake shut him down."

Bloomberg (2/10, Calkins) reports that Judge Lake "sustained prosecutors' objections to questions by Michael Ramsey, Lay's lead defense lawyer, about off-book partnerships former finance chief Andrew Fastow created to do Enron-related deals. Fastow has pleaded guilty to a fraud charge stemming from Enron's collapse. … Lake did allow Ramsey to cross-examine Mark Koenig, who ran Enron's investor communication unit, about whether Fastow's LJM partnerships caused concern among shareholders. Koenig is in his sixth day of testimony in the trial of former chairman Lay and former chief executive officer Skilling. … 'It was not something our competitors did,' Koenig said about the off-book partnerships. 'It was different, so we got questions about it.'"

The AP (2/10, Hays) reports that Koenig "acknowledged that founder Kenneth Lay had to jump back into nuts-and-bolts management of his company when he resumed the role of chief executive after Jeffrey Skilling resigned less than four months before Enron collapsed in December 2001. … 'He had to get more involved, yes,'… Koenig said in response to cross examination by… Ramsey in his sixth day on the witness stand. … 'He was involved before, but he took on a whole new duty,' Koenig said. Lay remained chairman of Enron throughout 2001, but he ceded the CEO position to Skilling in February that year. Skilling abruptly resigned six months later. … Lay's new duties included a hastily arranged conference call with Wall Street analysts on the day Enron announced Skilling's resignation in mid-August 2001, Koenig said. He said Enron was obligated to make executives available on the call to try to calm any market jitters sparked by the unexpected resignation." The AP notes, "Ramsey's questioning appeared to try to highlight what Lay claimed publicly when he was indicted in July 2004: Lay knew of no skullduggery, and was like a student cramming for an exam when his hand-picked successor as CEO quit."

Judge Declares Second Mistrial In Fraud Case Against Former Cendant Chairman. The New York Times (2/10, Stowe) reports, "For the second time, the fraud trial of Walter A. Forbes, the former chairman of the Cendant Corporation, ended in a mistrial after the jury announced on Thursday that it had failed to reach a unanimous verdict in its 27th day of deliberations." The Times continues, "The mistrial occurs as a similar accounting-fraud prosecution involving Enron is under way. In such complex cases, the jury can sift through hours of expert testimony about arcane financial procedures and the responsibilities of executives only to find itself unable to render a verdict." The Times adds, "Last July, another prosecution for accounting fraud ended in a mistrial in the case of five former executives with Enron Broadband Services when jurors found themselves deadlocked on most charges." Judge Alvin W. Thompson of Federal District Court in Hartford, CT, declared the mistrial after the jury reported further deliberations would be fruitless. The Times continues, "Mr. Forbes, who faced more than 20 years in prison if convicted, betrayed no emotion when the decision was announced but kept his eyes locked on the jury. Asked moments later if he had a statement, he replied, "None," and quickly left the courtroom, followed by his wife, Caryn, and other family members. … A spokesman for Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, said the government had not yet decided whether it would prosecute Mr. Forbes again."

The New York Times (2/10, Norris) reports, "Walter A. Forbes was paid more than $100 million as chairman and chief executive of the CUC Corporation. To hear him tell it, he did not do very much to earn the money. … Operations of the company, he testified at a trial where he faced charges of masterminding a fraud that cost investors billions, were left to others." The Times continues, "He admitted signing quarterly and annual financial statements that turned out to be fraudulent, but said he neither prepared nor read them. … 'We were a public company with thousands of employees, divisions all over the country and all over the world,' he testified. 'I don't think they would have expected me to be reading 10-Q's.' … It was a defense that worked at his first trial, when a jury convicted CUC's No. 2 official but was unable to reach a verdict on Mr. Forbes. And it has worked again. Yesterday, the jury in the second trial was dismissed after it, too, was unable to reach a verdict after 27 days of deliberations. … The jury foreman, Ken Premo, said afterward that he did not feel the accounting issues in the trial had been too complex and thought that Mr. Forbes was guilty. But, he added, 'I wouldn't say it was clear cut.' … If he had been convicted, Mr. Forbes would have faced more than 20 years in prison."

Judge OKs Bristol-Myers $185 Million Shareholder Suit Settlement. The AP (2/10, Agovino) reports, "Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. said Thursday that a judge gave preliminary approval for a proposed $185 million settlement to end a class action lawsuit that alleges the drugmaker artificially inflated its stock price by making false and misleading claims about an experimental heart drug." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler entered preliminary approval of a settlement for the case pending in the U.S. District Court in New Jersey, relating to the drug known as Vanlev, the company said. Vanlev was never approved." The AP adds, "Under the proposed settlement, Bristol-Myers Squibb will pay $185 million to create a settlement fund to pay the claims of certain investors who purchased Bristol-Myers Squibb common stock during the period from Oct. 19, 1999 through March 20, 2002. … Last month, Bristol-Myers announced it had reached a settlement with plaintiff lawyers and had established a reserve to settle the case. At that time, Thomas Dubbs, a plaintiffs lawyer in the case, said he hoped the settlement would act as a deterrent to other companies hiding damaging information."

Traders Seek To Limit Commodity Market Watchdog's Policing Authority. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports the Commodity Futures Trading Commission's "reputation as a toothless regulator has been changing. Spurred by complaints that natural-gas prices have driven up the cost of fertilizer and farming, Congress is working on legislation to allow the CFTC to expand its regulation of energy trading in the commodity and over-the-counter market." Some Wall Street traders, "concerned by a spate of energy-manipulation cases brought by the CFTC, are fighting back. They are working to water down the policing authority of the CFTC, thereby stalling legislation to reauthorize the agency, which has operated without a charter since Sept. 30."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Said "Superiors" Authorized Release Of Classified Information. Lewis "Scooter" Libby claimed he was authorized to release classified information by Bush Administration superiors, according to newly disclosed court documents. While some reports say attorneys for Vice President Cheney's ex-chief of staff are planning to defend Libby by claiming Cheney encouraged him to leak the classified information, the attorneys today denied this claim.

The National Journal (2/9, Waas) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, testified to a federal grand jury that he had been 'authorized' by Cheney and other White House 'superiors' in the summer of 2003 to disclose classified information to journalists to defend the Bush administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case to go to war with Iraq, according to attorneys familiar with the matter, and to court records." The Journal continues, "According to sources with firsthand knowledge, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war. … Libby specifically claimed that in one instance he had been authorized to divulge portions of a then-still highly classified National Intelligence Estimate regarding Saddam Hussein's purported efforts to develop nuclear weapons, according to correspondence recently filed in federal court by special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald." The Journal adds, "Beyond what was stated in the court paper, say people with firsthand knowledge of the matter, Libby also indicated what he will offer as a broad defense during his upcoming criminal trial: that Vice President Cheney and other senior Bush administration officials had earlier encouraged and authorized him to share classified information with journalists to build public support for going to war. Later, after the war began in 2003, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war. … Libby testified to the grand jury that he had been authorized to share parts of the NIE with journalists in the summer of 2003 as part of an effort to rebut charges then being made by former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson that the Bush administration had misrepresented intelligence information to make a public case for war."

The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer) called it "an embarrassing development for the Administration." CBS (Borger) added Libby "testified that his quote, 'superiors' authorized him to leak classified information to reporters. It's a clear arrow pointing to the Vice President." NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 3, 2:00, Williams) reported Libby "reportedly told a grand jury he had permission to leak classified information to reporters to defend the administration's prewar record." NBC (Myers) added that a recent letter from special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "showed that Libby told the grand jury that he disclosed the content of the national intelligence estimate to reporters in June and July 2003 and that he was authorized to disclose this information by his superiors. The letter does not specifically name the Vice President, but Cheney was Libby's boss."

The AP (2/9) reports, "In a Jan. 23 letter to Libby's lawyers, Fitzgerald said Libby also testified before the grand jury that he caused at least one other government official to discuss an intelligence estimate with reporters in July 2003. 'We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the [National Intelligence Estimate] to the press by his superiors,' Fitzgerald wrote." The New York Times (2/10, Lewis, 1.19M) reports the document shows that Libby "was actively engaged in the Bush administration's public relations effort to rebut complaints that there was little evidence to support the claim that Saddam Hussein possessed or sought weapons of mass destruction, which was used to justify the invasion of Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Schmitt, 958K) writes that the "revelation that leaks were authorized comes as the Bush administration has been quick to condemn others for failing to safeguard secrets since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Cheney has been among the most aggressive in lashing out against what officials have described as unauthorized leaks that have gravely hurt the country." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Squeo, McKinnon, 2.11M) notes that while Libby is "facing trial for lying to federal investigators and a grand jury," he "wasn't charged with leaking classified information." The Washington Post (2/10, A8, Leonnig) runs a similar story under the headline "Libby Testified He Was Told To Leak Data About Iraq."

Allegations Seen As Damaging To Cheney. David Gergen, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), said the allegations Libby was instructed by Cheney are "significant, if Libby testified that he was authorized by superiors, he was high up. He was the superior. And fingers are going to be pointing at the Vice President himself. We don't know whether he's saying the Vice President versus others. But it really does bring it smack in the middle of the White House now that there were people at the top level of the White House who were telling Mr. Libby to reveal highly classified information in order to rebut critics on the more in Iraq."

CNN legal analyst Jeffrey Toobin said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), "I think it's more of a political deal than a legal deal." Libby's "not charged with unauthorized disclosure of classified information, so this doesn't really help him directly with the charges against him. Politically, it raised a lot of unsettled questions. What right does the Vice President have to authorize anybody to release classified information?"

Former Deputy Independent Counsel Sol Wisenberg, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (2/9), said, "It's not even relevant to the specific charges. The Vice President cannot give you permission to declassify information. The Vice President can't give you permission to violate the National Intelligence Identities act. And the Vice President can't give you permission to go into the grand jury and lie."

Libby Defense Said To Be Similar To North's. Gergen, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), said, "Legally it does mean that Scooter Libby may be arguing as Oliver North did earlier, basically a lot of what he did was authorized by superiors. Therefore in the North case, legally he may be a lot closer to acquittal than having thought."

Abramoff Says He Met With Bush Many Times. The New York Times (2/10, Shenon, 1.19M) reports, "The disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff told a magazine editor in recent days that he had met with President Bush many times and was invited to the president's Texas ranch for a gathering of campaign contributors in 2003." Washingtonian's Kim Eisler said he "had received the information in e-mail messages from Mr. Abramoff, a major Republican fund-raiser who pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to bribe public officials. The messages suggest an effort by Mr. Abramoff to cast doubt on Mr. Bush's insistence that he does not recall the two of them meeting and that whatever contact they might have had was fleeting and for the purposes of a handshake and a picture."

The Washington Post (2/10, VandeHei, 744K) quotes one of the e-mails from Abramoff to Eisler: "[Bush] has one of the best memories of any politicians I have ever met. The guys saw me in almost a dozen settings, and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids." Eisler "confirmed the contents of the e-mail and said he recently provided portions of it to the liberal Web log ThinkProgress because he thought he was dealing with a fellow reporter. The blog posted the contents of the Abramoff-Eisler communication." Reuters (2/9) reports that while Eisler "confirmed their accuracy," he "did not intend them to become public."

Reid Acknowledges "Routine Contacts" With Abramoff Partners. The Washington Post (2/10, A8, Solomon, Theimer, 744K) reports Senate Minority Leader

Harry Reid wrote "at least four letters helpful to Indian tribes represented" by Abramoff, and Reid's staff "had frequent contact with the disgraced lobbyist's team about legislation." The activities, "detailed in previously unreported billing records and correspondence," took place "over three years as Reid…collected nearly $68,000 in political donations from Abramoff's firm, lobbying partners and clients." Reid's office "acknowledged having 'routine contacts' with Abramoff's lobbying partners."

McCain Defends Bush's Explanation For Abramoff Pictures. Sen. John McCain, on The Late Show With David Letterman (2/9), was asked about the Administration's explanation for Bush's appearance with Abramoff in pictures at fundraisers. He said, "It is plausible. Every fundraiser gets to have his picture taken. The President is right, he's probably had his picture taken with thousands of people. That's entirely plausible."

Editorial Blasts Removal Of Abramoff Prosecutor. The Buffalo News (2/10) editorializes, "Jack Abramoff prosecutor Noel Hillman may deserve the White House nomination he recently got for a federal judgeship in New Jersey, but the timing is suspicious and the probe into unethical and illegal activities in Washington will suffer." The News continues, "Hillman was chief of the Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity until the nomination caused him to step down. He was deeply involved in the federal probe of activities by super-lobbyist Abramoff and his colleagues, and sat in on the negotiations that led to plea deals in return for cooperation that could reveal which congressmen or agency officials took what in return for favors. Two years of experience are lost, just when the investigation zeros in on its most important targets. … Coincidence? Maybe, if you believe in such things. … Removing an aggressive prosecutor at this point will pass the sniff test only if the Justice Department finds an equally aggressive replacement - or the White House agrees to a special prosecutor. … The current investigation now is tainted, Hillman's experience already lost. … The present probe needs to gain momentum, not lose it - and that means a replacement prosecutor just as independent, aggressive and involved as Hillman, or more so. Otherwise, this nomination stinks."

New York Construction Executive Acquitted Of Paying Bribes To Union Officials. The New York Times (2/10, Preston, 1.19M) reports, "The president of a New York construction company, who was accused of doing a 'corrupt dance' with greedy union bosses, was acquitted yesterday in New York federal court of paying bribes to union officials." DeFoe Corporation President John Amicucci "was found not guilty of two counts of illegal labor payments after a two-week trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan. … Prosecutors did not present wiretap or other evidence to back up the claims of the union officials that they had been handed cash by Mr. Amicucci, and in return allowed him to fill the most expensive union supervisory jobs on his crews with workers who were paid less than union rates and who were lax in enforcing the rules." The Times adds, "By the end of the trial, it appeared that the union officials had done their best to corrupt Mr. Amicucci, and not the other way around." During the trial, defense attorney Gerald Shargel "brought out, under cross-examination" that key prosecution witnesses, union officials Joseph Rizzuto Sr. and his son Joseph Rizzuto Jr., "only mentioned Mr. Amicucci for the first time to F.B.I. agents months after they began cooperating with the government."

Defense Yet To Decide On Ryan Testimony At Trial. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "Decision day is nearing for former Gov. George Ryan and his lawyers on whether he takes the stand at his corruption trial. On Thursday, outside the presence of the jury, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, said he expects the defense case to wrap up by late next week unless Ryan or co-defendant Lawrence Warner testifies. … Webb has said that Ryan is likely to take the stand, but Thursday he indicated he hasn't made a final decision." The Tribune adds that in testimony for the defense Thursday, former high-ranking secretary of state official "defended a Joliet lease deal in 1995 as in the best interest of the state. Ryan is charged with steering the lease to Warner, who held a hidden ownership in a building…in Joliet and collected $387,500 in the 1990s." The AP (2/10, Robinson) also reports Webb said yesterday that the defense is yet to decide whether Ryan will testify.

At Campbell Trial, Water Executive Testifies About Paris Trip. WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/9, Carnes, King) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "Former Atlanta mayor Bill Campbell apologized to his wife Thursday" about his affair with TV anchor Marion Brooks and their trip to Paris. "Campbell's trip came after United Water won a $21 million contract to run the water system in the city of Atlanta. The company invited Campbell to visit its European headquarters." On Thursday at Campbell's corruption trial, "United Water executives testified that they spent $4,500 on Campbell's hotel suite, another $4,500 for a limousine. Witnesses told the jury that Campbell missed a scheduled tour of their waste water treatment plant, and during the four-day trip, spent 2½ hours talking business over lunch. … Campbell's lawyers questioned United Water's former president, David Sherman. 'Mayor Campbell never asked for a bribe, did he,' asked Campbell's attorney. Sherman answered, 'No.'"

Judge Rules Chicago Mob Boss Qualifies For Publicly-Funded Counsel. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Bush, 643K) reports US District Judge James Zagel "ruled Thursday that reputed mob boss Joey 'the Clown' Lombardo qualifies for free counsel and appointed two attorneys to represent him," but "Zagel added that he will revisit the decision if prosecutors show Lombardo…is hiding assets and can afford to pay for his own defense. Zagel approved prosecutors' request to examine the finances of Lombardo's ex-wife and two children to determine if he has access to a 1982 trust he set up for them. … In the meantime, attorneys Rick Halprin and Susan Shatz will represent Lombardo, Zagel ruled." The AP (2/10, Robinson) adds, "Prosecutors said in court papers that 'the FBI has obtained information that after the completion of his parole status on June 15, 2002, the defendant traveled to France for approximately 10 days, arriving in Paris on July 11, 2002, and continuing on to Nice. The defendant flew back to Chicago from France on July 21, 2002,' prosecutors said. 'The government respectfully submits that these facts including a 10-day trip abroad are not consistent with the need for a court-appointed lawyer.'"

US Attorney Adds Drug, Armed Robbery Charges Against "Mafia Cop." NY1 (2/9) reports on its Web site, "The laundry list of accusations against the so-called 'mafia cops' is growing ever longer with new charges of armed robbery and drug use. Former detective Stephen Caracappa and his partner Louis Eppolito already stand accused of eight mob-related murders. Now, the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office says Caracappa admitted using cocaine as an undercover narcotics officer. The person he allegedly told this to is expected to testify at this month's trial. Another witness will say the two held up delis for cash and that Eppolito asked him for money in order to bribe doctors into falsifying a heart condition."

Bank Robber Sentenced To Life For Shooting Chicago Police Officer. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Higgins, 643K) reports, "A former tax preparer who shot a Chicago police officer in the head and held the gravely wounded officer hostage for more than two hours was sentenced Thursday to life in prison plus 132 years." Daniel Salley "was convicted in October of 15 felony charges, including two counts of attempted murder, after a jury rejected his claim that he was the victim of a government conspiracy. Detective Joseph Airhart is "unable to speak, walk or swallow food." The Tribune adds, "When it was his turn to speak, Salley repeated his claims that the government was punishing him for the success of his tax business and that an FBI agent had shot Airhart during the raid. … Airhart, who was assigned to the FBI's fugitive task force, had volunteered to be part of a team sent to arrest Salley after Salley robbed a Southwest Side bank twice in one week, taking more than $250,000." The Chicago Sun-Times (2/10, Thomas) adds that Airhart "was a member of an FBI task force trying to arrest Salley in a series of bank robberies. Salley refused to allow medical treatment for Airhart, keeping federal and local police at bay for more than two hours before he was taken into custody. The AP (2/10, Brummer) notes US Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald "said his office was 'very gratified' by the sentence. … Salley, who acted as his own attorney, was convicted of illegally detaining, assaulting and attempting to murder Airhart, as well as assault and attempted murder of an FBI agent. He also was convicted on several firearms charges and two bank robbery charges."

Two Former New Jersey Officials Plead Guilty To Extortion In FBI Probe. The AP (2/10) reports, "Two former officials in Monmouth County pleaded guilty Thursday to extortion charges, part of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Operation Big Rig investigation." Former Neptune Township Deputy Mayor Richard Iadanza "admitted that he accepted $3,000 from a contractor in exchange for arranging work in Neptune, according to a statement from U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie," and Monmouth County Division of Transportation Operations Manager Joseph McCurnin "admitted he helped facilitate a $1,500 bribe from a demolition contractor to a Neptune Township official." The AP notes, "The two were among 11

then-sitting or former Monmouth County public officials arrested in the federal sting operation in February 2005. They were charged with extorting cash bribes and free work from a contractor who was cooperating with the FBI."

FCC Probing Radio Stations Over Payola Allegations. ABC News (2/9, Ross, Esposito, Walter) reports, "Hundreds of radio stations are under investigation by the Federal Communications Commission in the payola scandal rocking the music industry, ABC has learned. … 'The FCC staff is working with voluminous evidence right now. It's a complicated and wide-ranging investigation.' FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told ABC News in an exclusive interview. … 'This is potentially the most wide spread and flagrant violation of FCC rules in the history of American broadcasting,' Adelstein said. 'We've never seen evidence of such a systematic betrayal of the responsibility of broadcasters.'" ABC continues, "Payola -- or pay-for-play -- is a practice seemingly as old as the recording industry itself. In the past the money went to rogue disc jockeys in exchange for increasing the air play for individual songs and driving those songs to the top of the charts. In the modern version, the money goes to the bottom line of the radio stations and the conglomerates that own them, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … 'We have people in suits coming in with documents rather than cash payments under the table to a DJ,' Spitzer told ABC News Chief Investigative Correspondent Brian Ross." ABC adds, "Several of the largest radio conglomerates in America - the corporate owners of FM radio stations across the nation -- are within the scope of the FCC probe, which was triggered by the two year long pay-for-play investigation by Spitzer and was first reported on by ABC News. … A vigorous investigation by the FCC brings federal regulatory clout, and the specter of criminal prosecution by the Justice Department. … In addition to criminal prosecution any broadcaster in clear violation could face severe sanctions, and in the most blatant cases, the loss of their broadcast licenses, officials involved in the investigation have told ABC."

British Arrest Englishman Suspected Of Killing Wife, Daughter In Boston. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Muskal) reports that Neil Entwistle, "An Englishman wanted in the killing of his wife and baby daughter in their suburban home near Boston," has been "arrested this morning in" a London subway stations and is being "held pending an extradition hearing, perhaps as soon as Friday." Should he be "extradited, he will face murder and weapons charges in connection with the deaths of his wife, Rachel, 27, and their 9-month-old daughter, Lillian."

The Washington Post (2/10, A9, Fahrenthold) adds, "The charges against Neil Entwistle added a new twist to a case whose lurid elements -- failed Internet schemes, a mother and daughter shot side by side, and a police search that missed two bodies buried under bedclothes -- have generated intense interest on both sides of the Atlantic." Entwistle "spent much of the past three weeks at his parents' home in Worksop, England, dogged by British and U.S. media."

US Charges Taiwanese Citizen Of Role In China Jet, Missile Deal. Reuters (2/10, Christie, Eckert) reports, "A Taiwanese citizen was charged in the United States on Thursday with being a covert agent for Beijing, and accused together with a Frenchman of trying to illegally export an F-16 jet engine, Blackhawk helicopter engines and cruise missiles to China." Reuters continues, "U.S. prosecutors in Miami said a federal grand jury had returned a nine-count indictment against Ko-Suen Moo, of Taipei, and Maurice Serge Voros, of Paris. … The indictment alleged that the defendants violated the Arms Export Control Act by trying to export controlled items without a license to China, including the engines, the cruise missiles and air-to-air missiles, the prosecutors said." Reuters adds, "The case follows repeated U.S. expressions of concern about Beijing's strategic intentions as China increasingly pours proceeds from its rapidly expanding economy into its military. … Chinese war capabilities are growing at a pace expected to soon upset a delicate military balance between China and rival Taiwan, which relies on U.S. weaponry to defend itself. … 'This case highlights the national security threat posed when agents of a foreign government seek to illegally acquire and export American military weaponry,' said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. … 'We will continue to aggressively investigate and prosecute foreign agents whose motives and actions are, by definition, detrimental do the United States and our national security,' he said in a statement released by the Justice Department."

US Seizes Truckload Of Fake Olive Oil. The AP (2/9) reports, "More than a discerning palate has determined that thousands of cans of Hermes and San Giovanni brands of extra virgin olive oil weren't quite right. … The U.S. Food and Drug Administration tested the chemical composition of the oil and found it was really less expensive soybean oil, prompting Thursday's seizure. … The U.S. Marshals Service seized 22,700 gallons of oil, imported from Italy, at a trucking company warehouse in Clifton. … 'It is a whole lot of faux olive oil,' said Mike Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie." The AP adds, "The labels on the 3-liter tins in 4,855 cases said the contents were more expensive extra virgin olive oil or pomace olive oil. … Because olive oil is five to six times more expensive than soybean oil, the potential estimated profit is about $105,600, according to the FDA. … 'We will not permit New Jersey consumers to be defrauded,' Christie said in a statement."

Police Say Teenage Boys Were Forced To Rob Maryland Banks. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Klein) reports, "They are bank robbers who didn't want the cash, police say. The scared 14- and 15-year-olds were not looking for a thrill, either, when they walked into banks in suburban Maryland and handed tellers notes demanding money. … They had been snatched by gunmen, taken to the banks and forced by their captors to commit the crimes, according to Prince George's County police." The Post continues, "After the teenagers came out of the banks with the money, the gunmen made off with the take and left the stunned youths behind. … At least four recent bank robberies were committed by three teenagers who later told police they had robbed the banks against their will. Their stories are 'very credible,' said an investigator who did not want to be identified because the case is still open." The Post adds, "The most recent was on Wednesday, when a 14-year-old Landover youth was abducted and then forced to hold up a branch of Chevy Chase Bank in Bethesda, said FBI spokeswoman Michelle Crnkovich. … Police found him walking along Rockville Pike, stained by ink from an exploding dye pack, a device that banks attach to bundles of money to stain bank robbers, making them easier to spot. … The other three incidents occurred in Prince George's, two of them on Jan. 20 and one on Monday."

Former Louisiana Judge Sentenced In Bond Scheme. The AP (2/10, Sayre) reports, "A former (Louisiana) state judge who was tried for allegedly accepting bribes from a bail bonding company was sentenced Thursday to more than four years in federal prison for mail fraud." The AP continues, "Alan Green was accused of taking $20,000 in cash, golf trips and meals from the company in return for reducing the bonds of dangerous criminals to levels they could afford. That way, Bail Bonds Unlimited could collect hefty fees for guaranteeing their court appearances." The AP adds, "Green was convicted of a single charge of mail fraud after being tried on charges relating to the bribery allegations. The jury could not agree on the other charges: four more counts of mail fraud, one of mail fraud conspiracy and one of racketeering conspiracy. … Federal Judge Lance Africk told Green his conduct endangered citizens. 'Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a for-sale sign on your office,' Africk said. … Green apologized for 'impugning the integrity of the bench' but denied taking any bribes, saying he was manipulated through a friendship with an accountant for the company."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/10, Krupa, 257K) adds, "Before delivering a scathing rebuke of Green's exploitation of his post as an elected jurist and slapping him with a $50,000 fine, U.S. District Judge Lance Africk gave Green one last chance to admit that two $5,000 payments he got from the Gretna bail bonds firm were not 'off-the-books' campaign contributions, as Green testified in his June trial, but part of the web of bribery confirmed by nine defendants who have admitted to crimes in the seven-year probe. … 'They were not bribes, your honor, as far as I was told,' Green replied. 'At no time did I believe that they were, in fact, bribes.' Africk then took aim at Green, saying , "Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a 'For Sale' sign on your office and decided to purchase it in order to maximize its profits.'" The Times-Picayune notes, "Green was the 14th defendant to be nabbed by Wrinkled Robe and the only one to risk trial rather than ink a plea agreement with prosecutors."

Director Of Getty Trust Steps Down Under Pressure. The New York Times (2/10, Kennedy, Vogel) reports, "The president of the J. Paul Getty Trust in Los Angeles, one of the world's richest art institutions, resigned under pressure yesterday amid growing questions about his improper use of the trust's money." The Times continues, "The trust said that the president, Barry Munitz, whose travel and expense spending are under investigation by the California attorney general's office, would be required to repay the trust $250,000 and would not be given a severance package. The money was an estimate of what the trust felt Mr. Munitz owed because of perks, expenses and other costs that should not have been charged to the trust during his eight-year tenure, trust officials said. … 'It's more judgment than it is precise mathematics,' John H. Biggs, the board's chairman, said of the figure, adding that because the attorney general's investigation was continuing, he could provide few details about Mr. Munitz's departure and could not answer other questions about his practices. … He added, however, that 'as far as the Getty Trust is involved, Munitz has resolved these issues' with the payment of $250,000, and that the board did not believe Mr. Munitz did anything improper under the laws that govern nonprofit trusts. … 'He's still at risk that the A.G. may see it otherwise,' Mr. Biggs added, referring to the state attorney general, 'and there's no way that we as trustees can give him any assurance.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Munitz's departure represents a major reversal for one of the most powerful leaders in the art world, who controlled an institution with an endowment of more than $5 billion. The trust's board of trustees — many of whom are Mr. Munitz's friends and allies — had steadfastly stood by him, even as questions about his leadership and about other troubles at the trust mounted over the last several months."

Federal Banking Regulators Seek To Curb Mortgage Lending Abuses. The Washington Times (2/10, Hill, 90K) reports Federal banking agencies, "concerned about the potential for abuses in mortgage lending, are going after the worst practices in the industry." A directive "last month from the Federal Reserve and four other federal agencies targets the proliferation of loans offering interest-only payments for extended periods and adjustable-rate mortgages that offer the option of paying interest only, making a minimum payment each month or adding in principal. That includes about half of all mortgages made last year." Regulators say they "are particularly concerned that some loans not only do not pay down principal, like a traditional mortgage, but they also increase the amount of principal that a consumer must pay by as much as 100 percent through 'negative amortization.'"

Gretzky Recorded On Wiretaps Discussing Gambling Ring. In a story widely-distributed by Knight Ridder, The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/10, Moroz, 423K) reports, "State wiretaps caught hockey legend and NHL coach Wayne Gretzky talking about a sports gambling ring allegedly run by his assistant, former Flyer Rick Tocchet, two New Jersey law enforcement sources confirmed Thursday. As part of a probe into what state law enforcement officials have described as a nationwide, multimillion-dollar illegal bookmaking operation, investigators are looking into whether Gretzky…placed any bets through his wife, Janet Jones, the sources said on condition of anonymity." KRT notes, "Some law enforcement officials quietly predict that federal authorities will step in to investigate numerous possible violations of federal law. Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey, said the FBI had assisted state police 'concerning interstate aspects' of the investigation, but that federal involvement had been minimal so far." USA Today (2/10, Allen, 2.31M) reports Gretzky's wife, Janet Jones, "said Thursday that she never placed a wager on behalf of her husband…and Gretzky said he's 'done nothing wrong, nothing that has to do with betting.'" USA notes, "FBI spokesman Rich Kolko confirmed the bureau was asked Thursday to assist in the case." The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Santi, Mulvihill) also reports this story.

FBI-Led Utah Task Force Touts Identity Theft Investigations. Under the headline, "Task Force Run By FBI Unmasks Identity Thieves," The Salt Lake Tribune (2/10, Manson) reports that as identity theft "started to become more prevalent, authorities set up the Utah Identity Theft Task Force (ITTF), which operates as part of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force. Since its inception in November 2004, 'the task force has been a resounding success,' said Kathy Roberts, inspector in charge of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service's Denver division, which includes Utah. At a recent news conference in Salt Lake City, Roberts and other officials ticked off Utah ITTF statistics from the past 15 months -- 190 investigations launched; 1,366 victims of identity theft identified; about 150 indictments returned with convictions won in 127 of them so far; and more than 25 training sessions held on fraud prevention for law enforcement agencies, community groups and merchants." The Tribune adds, "Identity thieves run the gamut from individuals to members of street gangs to white collar criminals, according to Timothy Fuhrman, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office. Fuhrman and Paul Warner, who recently stepped down as U.S. attorney for Utah to become a federal magistrate, said many thieves are drug addicts trying to support their habit."

Former North Carolina Lawmaker Invokes Fifth Amendment About Campaign

Donations. The Winston-Salem (NC) Journal (2/10, Rice) reports, "Former state Rep. Michael Decker took the Fifth Amendment yesterday, citing his right against self-incrimination as he declined to testify about campaign donations he got from optometrists after he switched parties in 2003 to help optometrist Jim Black remain speaker of the House. … 'We have advised Rep. Decker ... to rest upon his Fifth Amendment rights,' David Freedman, Decker's attorney, told Larry Leake, the chairman of the State Board of Elections after Leake called on Decker to testify. The elections board is investigating possible illegal donations from optometrists and the video-poker industry to the Black and Decker campaigns. A federal grand jury is also investigating, and several optometrists said they have been interviewed by the FBI and U.S. Treasury agents." The Journal continues, "Although Black initially testified yesterday that he couldn't recall handling blank checks provided by his fellow optometrists, he later acknowledged to the elections board that he filled in Decker's campaign as the payee on at least three of the checks. … 'I don't remember seeing blank checks - unless they were in an envelope, sealed, with somebody's name on it,' Black said at first." The Journal adds, "Then Leake handed Black a copy of a $4,000 check made out to Decker's campaign from M. Scott Edwards of Murfreesboro, the treasurer of the N.C. Optometric Society, along with two $100 checks from Gary Roach, an optometrist from Morrisville. … Black acknowledged that it was his handwriting that designated Decker's campaign as the payee. But Black and his attorneys argued that the donations were not illegal under state law."

Texas Executes Man For Torture-Killing Of 19-Year-Old Girl. The AP (2/10, Graczyk) reports, "A paroled burglar who claimed he wanted to be a serial killer of minorities was executed Wednesday night for the torture-slaying eight years ago of a 19-year-old mentally impaired woman who once worked with him." The AP continues, "Robert Neville Jr., apologizing profusely, addressed his victim's mother by name as she and her two daughters stood close to the glass with their arms around each other. He expressed love to them. … 'I hope you can find it in yourselves to forgive me and I hope all this here will kind of settle your pain. And I hope the Lord will give you comfort and peace. I just want you to know I am very sorry for what I have done,' he said." The AP adds, "Neville, 31, was the third prisoner executed this year and the first of three over the next 15 days in the nation's most active capital punishment state. … Neville and a companion, Michael Wayne Hall, were condemned for the fatal shooting of Robinson, who was abducted as she rode her bike to work at a Dallas-area supermarket. She was taken to a remote area of Tarrant County where she was shot repeatedly with a pellet gun, then killed with shots from a .22-caliber rifle as she begged for her life. … Hall, 26, remains on death row. He does not have an execution date."

Supreme Court Puzzles Observers With Lethal Injection Decisions. The Washington Post (2/10, A3, Lane, 744K) reports that in the "past two weeks, the Supreme Court stopped two executions in Florida and allowed a lower court to halt another in Missouri -- but the justices allowed three other death sentences, in Texas and Indiana, to proceed." Though "not necessarily contradictory under the law," the court's decisions "have puzzled many on both sides of the debate over capital punishment because in each case the death-row inmate raised a similar issue: the legality of lethal injection as the means for execution." Douglas A. Berman, "an expert in criminal sentencing law at Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law," said, "I am sure the court is trying to apply some sort of sensible standard. But they need to do a heck of a lot better job explaining why." The Post adds the "probable explanation for the court's apparent zigzag is that a majority of the court is ready to consider only a relatively narrow issue related to lethal injection. But because the court generally does not reveal more than a bare minimum of information about how and why it chooses to take up any particular matter, lawyers have only been able to arrive at this educated guess after much litigation."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Judge Questions Viability Of New York City's Gun Litigation. The New York Law Journal (2/10, Perrotta) reports, "Two months after allowing New York City's lawsuit against the gun industry to proceed, a federal judge in Brooklyn suggested Wednesday the suit might be doomed by language in the appropriations bill passed by Congress last year." The Journal continues, "In a brief order, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein ordered the city to explain why its suit should not be dismissed in light of the new legislation, which bars the use of a federal database that tracks firearms as evidence in civil litigation." The Journal adds, "The Firearms Trace System database is central to the city's suit, which alleges that gun manufacturers sell excess weapons in cities and states with weak gun laws, knowing that unqualified buyers in New York will obtain the weapons through 'straw' purchases. … The city alleges that gun manufacturers know which dealers are selling weapons that are used in crimes, and it had intended to use the database to help prove its case. … Assistant Corporation Counsel Eric Proshansky, the city's lead attorney on the case, said the new legislation would force the city 'to prove this case in a manner that does not require trace data' -- a far more difficult task."

Cornyn Calls For Complete Rewrite Of Asbestos Bill. Reuters (2/9, Cornwell) reports, "A group of Republican senators on Thursday proposed completely rewriting an asbestos bill to allow lawsuits under strict medical criteria rather than create a $140 billion fund to pay victims of the mineral." The new approach was offered by Sen. John Cornyn, "who said he had 14 Republican co-sponsors and hoped to attract Democrats." The proposal "is similar to a bill introduced in the House that would allow asbestos lawsuits to go forward only if claimants met certain medical standards. He introduced the plan as an amendment to a bill that would halt asbestos lawsuits and create an industry-financed $140 billion fund to pay claims."

Meanwhile, the AP (2/9, Dalrymple) reports that the Senate voted 70-27 to reject an attempt "to keep asbestos cases in the courts, removing one obstacle to the creation of a $140 billion trust fund for paying victims and ending their lawsuits." CQ (2/9, Stern) reports "conservative Republicans" used the vote "to show their unease" with the legislation to establish the fund, putting "26 Republicans, joined by one Democrat, on record as opposing the trust fund concept. And with few Democrats backing the underlying bill, the vote also suggested the measure may ultimately fall short among Republicans as well."

WPost Lauds Asbestos Bill, Calls Reid Opposition "Reprehensible." The Washington Post (2/10, 744K) editorializes, "In a triumph of good sense and bipartisan cooperation, the Senate voted on Tuesday to go forward with a bill that would fix the broken asbestos litigation system. … Some amendment may be reasonable at the margins, but the bill's central idea -- to replace litigation with a $140 billion compensation fund to be financed by defendant companies and their insurers -- must be preserved. … The fact that the bill is being attacked from both directions suggests that its authors, Sens. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), have balanced competing interests in a reasonable manner. Unfortunately, the bill's critics are not always so reasonable. Sen. Harry M. Reid of Nevada, the Democratic minority leader, has complained, 'One would have to search long and hard to find a bill in my opinion as bad as this.' … But the truth is that the bill's main opponents are trial lawyers, who profit mightily from asbestos lawsuits and who constitute a powerful lobby in their own right. … For Mr. Reid to demean this effort in order to fire off campaign sound bites is reprehensible."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Arrests Former Maryland Police Officer Over Racist Threat Letters. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/10) reports, "The FBI on Thursday charged a former police officer with making racial, bomb and anthrax threats after he was fired by" Hagerstown, Md. "The threats began four months after Jeffrey S. Shifler was dismissed in November 2003 for falsifying payroll records, court records said." Shifler "was in custody, authorities said. He was expected to appear Friday in federal court in Baltimore." The AP adds, "Shifler made 14 anonymous phone calls and sent at least nine anonymous letters containing threats, insults or false crime reports, according to a court complaint. The threats targeted police employees and a black city council member, and such institutions as schools and public office buildings. Many letters were on photocopied Hagerstown Police Department letterhead, the complaint alleges."

EEOC Files Fewer Discrimination Charges For Third Straight Year. The AP (2/10) reports, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission filed fewer charges of discrimination against private employers last year for the third straight year." The AP continues, "Commission chair Cari M. Dominguez said the commission's prevention efforts through outreach and training might be responsible but added that other factors, like the economic slowdown, might also be involved. 'We are pleased to see that our proactive prevention efforts may be having an impact,' she said." The AP adds, "Commission field offices filed 75,428 charges in the 12 months ended Sept. 30, down from 79,432, 81,293 and 84,442 in fiscal years 2004, 2003 and 2002, respectively. The average complaint took 171 days to process in fiscal 2005. … During 2005, 77,352 discrimination complaints were resolved, 21.5 percent with a favorable outcome for the individual who complained, up from 19.5 percent the previous two years." The AP notes, "The commission obtained $380 million in compensation for those who complained of discrimination, including a record $271.6 million through mediation and other means short of going to court. … The type of complaints remained relatively unchanged from previous years: Allegations of racial discrimination remained the largest group, 26,740 charges accounting for 35.5 percent of all filings. … Sex discrimination accounted for 23,094 charges or 30.6 percent of all complaints; retaliation, 22,278 or 29.5 percent; age, 16,585 or 22 percent; disability, 14,893 or 19.7 percent; national origin, 8,035 or 10.7 percent; religion, 2,340 or 3.1 percent and equal pay, 970 or 1.3 percent. The total exceeds 100 percent because individuals may allege more than one kind of discrimination in a complaint."

Proposed Changes To New Orleans Bureaucracy Would Need DOJ Nod. The AP (2/9, Simpson) reports, "Hurricane Katrina created a chance to slash the city bureaucracy in New Orleans, which has two elected sheriffs, two elected clerks of court and two separate court systems, a legislative panel voted on Thursday." The AP continues, "The city's population has plummeted since the storm, giving critics the chance to streamline a system, stemming from the 19th century, which gives the city numerous elected positions long seen as redundant. Rep. Peppi Bruneau, a key supporter, urged colleagues to support the change, calling New Orleans' bureaucracy outmoded, time-consuming, antiquated and out of step with the rest of the country. … Without objection, a House judicial committee approved a bill that would combine the city's clerks and sheriffs offices, plus consolidate the city civil and criminal court systems. The bill, backed by Gov. Kathleen Blanco and sponsored by House Speaker Joe Salter, D-Florien, now moves to the House floor for debate." The AP adds, "Separate legislation is aimed at consolidating New Orleans' seven elected property tax assessors into one elected assessor post. That measure awaits debate in the House Ways and Means Committee. … Passage of Salter's bill came after Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, head of the Legislative Black Caucus, said race is one reason the state is moving to slash the number of the city's elected officials, most of whom are black. Many of New Orleans black residents remain displaced — living in other states because of hurricane damage — and Richmond questioned why lawmakers and Gov. Kathleen Blanco were pushing the consolidation now, while black voters are elsewhere, unable to voice concerns about the proposed changes. … Richmond noted that the U.S. Justice Department would need to approve the changes, because Louisiana remains restricted under the Voting Rights Act of 1965, imposed on states with ahistory of election discrimination against blacks."

One Dead, Dozens Injured IN Five Days Of Racial Rioting In Los Angeles Jails. The New York Times (2/10, Archibold) reports, "Five days of racial rioting have left one inmate dead and dozens injured at Los Angeles County jails as blacks and Latinos have taken their conflicts from the streets behind bars, the authorities said." The Times continues, "The latest occurred Thursday when 200 inmates at Pitchess Detention Center, a collection of jails in the northern fringes of the county where most of the violence has occurred, clashed briefly until deputies used tear gas to bring them under control. There were no reported injuries." The Times adds, "On Wednesday night, two dozen inmates were injured in a riot among 300 people that ended after teams of deputies fired rubber pellets. That riot, as well as those that took place Monday and Tuesday, was at the Pitchess center. … Since the worst of the rioting on Saturday, when a 43-year-old inmate was beaten to death, the sheriff's department has locked down all jails, suspending activities and privileges in the system — the nation's largest, with 21,000 inmates. … 'We are convinced it is traced back to an age-old gang war in South Los Angeles,' said Steve Whitmore, a spokesman for the Sheriff's Department. 'It is a small core group of people, and most of the inmates don't want to fight.' … Mr. Whitmore declined to elaborate on a motive for the violence, but members of the clergy and community advocates who met Thursday with inmates said they were told that a gang called the Mexican Mafia had ordered retaliation on black gang members who had apparently attacked Latino gang members in Los Angeles in a dispute involving drugs, turf or both."

Suit Targets Discriminatory Online Ads On Craigslist Website. The AP (2/10, Carpenter) reports, "A federal lawsuit accuses the online site Craigslist of violating fair housing laws by publishing discriminatory classified ads, reviving the question of what legal boundaries, if any, should exist for postings on the Internet. … But legal experts say the lawsuit against Craigslist, a fast-growing online network of classified ads and forums, faces an uphill battle because of laws in place to protect online service providers." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed by a Chicago fair housing group in U.S. District Court on Feb. 3, contends that Craigslist's Chicago site distributed more than 100 ads that violated the federal Fair Housing Act by excluding prospective buyers or tenants on the basis of race, gender or religion. … Among the housing ads cited as objectionable by the Chicago Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law Inc. were ones that read 'NO MINORITIES,' 'Requirements: Clean Godly Christian Male,' and 'Only Muslims apply.' … While it remained unclear Thursday if the suit is the first of its kind, it signifies a burgeoning effort by housing watchdog groups to extend to the Internet the same legal restrictions facing those that publish print classifieds."

Air Force Softens Rules On Religious Expression. The Washington Post (2/10, A5, Cooperman, 744K) reports the Air Force, "under pressure from evangelical Christian groups and members of Congress, softened its guidelines on religious expression yesterday to emphasize that superior officers may discuss their faith with subordinates and that chaplains will not be required to offer nonsectarian prayers." The guidelines "were first issued in late August after allegations that evangelical Christian commanders, coaches and cadets at the Air Force Academy had pressured cadets of other faiths." But evangelical groups, "such as the Colorado-based Focus on the Family, saw the guidelines as overly restrictive. They launched a nationwide petition drive, sounded alarms on Christian radio stations, and deluged the White House and Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne's office with e-mails calling the guidelines an infringement of the Constitution's guarantees of free speech and free exercise of religion."

California Police Kill Carjacker During Gun Battle. The Los Angeles Times (2/10) reports, "A chase and fierce gun battle between a shotgun-wielding carjacker and police ended early this morning when the suspect was cornered and shot dead in Venice." The Times continues, "Santa Monica police Chief James T. Butts said his officers acted 'valorously.' … 'It took a great deal of courage,' Butts said. 'This person has manifested the intent to kill you, and these officers chased him. That's what you expect of police officers in a free society.'" The Times adds, "The incident began in Santa Monica about 5:00 a.m., when a motorist stopped to help what he thought was a driver with car trouble. Instead, the suspect jumped out of a vehicle, pointed a shotgun at the would-be good Samaritan, and commandeered the car. The motorist was not injured. … Butts said officers stopped the car at 7th and California streets, where a gun battle broke out. The man, who has not been identified, fled in the carjacked auto. … About a half-mile later, with police pursuing, the suspect crashed the car in the 1300 block of Electric Avenue in Venice. When he ignored commands to surrender and pointed a shotgun at police, officers opened fire, Butts said."

Noonan Praises King Funeral As Example Of Free Speech. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/10), Peggy Noonan says Coretta Scott King's funeral "was wonderful -- spirited and moving, rousing and respectful, pugnacious and loving." The "old lions of the great American civil rights movement of the 20th century were there, and standing tall." There was "nothing prissy, nothing sissy about it. A former president, a softly gray-haired and chronically dyspeptic gentleman who seems to have judged the world to be just barely deserving of his presence, pointedly insulted a sitting president who was, in fact, sitting right behind him. The Clintons unveiled their 2008 campaign. A rhyming preacher, one of the old lions, a man of warmth and stature, freely used the occasion to verbally bop the sitting president on the head. So what? This was the authentic sound of a vibrant democracy doing its thing. It was the exact opposite of the frightened and prissy attitude that if you draw a picture I don't like, I'll have to kill you. It was: We do free speech here."

NYTimes Criticizes Pennsylvania GOP's Election Bills. The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) says in an editorial that Pennsylvania, "a swing state that will hold some critical elections this fall, is being barraged by legislation, championed by Republican lawmakers, that would raise voting barriers, especially for groups that tend to be Democratic. One measure would institute one of the most restrictive voter-identification laws in the nation, in a state that currently requires only first-time voters to prove their identities. Pennsylvanians -- who have been at the forefront of fairness in voting rights issues — should not allow partisanship to erase that legacy."

ANTITRUST:

Rivals Complain To DOJ About Microsoft's New Vista Software. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Delaney, Guth) reports, "The Justice Department said it has received complaints about Microsoft Corp.'s coming Windows Vista operating system, focusing in part on concerns over the introductory "first-boot" screens displayed on new personal computers and other aspects of the software." The Journal continues, "The government, in a status report on Microsoft's compliance with an antitrust settlement, said an unidentified company complained about the ability of PC makers to customize the initial process of booting up Vista. Some PC makers use those screens to offer broadband Internet access, antivirus and other PC-related services and software." The Journal adds, "The Wall Street Journal Tuesday reported that Hewlett-Packard Co. has tussled with Microsoft over the screens. The PC maker in recent months briefed the Justice Department on those concerns, a person familiar with the matter said. An H-P spokesman declined to comment. The report said that in addition to the first-boot process, 'several industry members' had expressed other unspecified concerns regarding Windows Vista, which Microsoft is expected to begin selling later this year. A Microsoft spokesman said it has worked closely with partners 'to make sure Windows Vista provides flexibility...while remaining faithful to the goal of putting users first.' … The complaints were disclosed as part of a regular monitoring by the Justice Department of Microsoft's compliance with its 2001 antitrust settlement with the federal government. The status report noted that Microsoft's recent decision to license elements of its server software was a 'constructive proposal' in addressing concerns of the plaintiffs in the antitrust settlement. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment further. … Separately, executives at search company Google Inc. asserted in an interview that Microsoft is using its influence over the browser-software market to push its MSN Web-search service to the disadvantage of rivals. Google objects to how Microsoft handles a default search-engine setting in its Internet Explorer 7 Web-browser software, which Microsoft considers part of Vista. A Google spokesman declined to say whether the company had discussed its concerns with the Justice Department."

RIM Plan Would Allow BlackBerry Service If It Loses Patent Fight. Reuters (2/9, Taylor) reports, "Research In Motion unveiled a plan on Thursday that it says will let its BlackBerry e-mail device work even if it loses a patent fight, and said the workaround will prevent a shutdown of service in the United States." Reuters continues, "In an announcement made as the clock ticked toward a February 24 court hearing on U.S. patent holding company NTP Inc.'s request for an injunction to halt U.S. BlackBerry service, RIM also said it was still willing to negotiate a deal. … NTP questioned why RIM simply didn't go ahead and make the software changes for the workaround and argued the BlackBerry maker was trying to bully it. One analyst described the announcement as part of a 'high stakes poker game.'" Reuters adds, "The Waterloo, Ontario-based technology company, whose addictive device has been dubbed the 'CrackBerry' by many users, said it is willing to 'generously compensate' NTP, but called NTP's offer to license disputed technology 'untenable.'" Reuters notes, "The legal battle is heating up ahead of a hearing that could be the final step before U.S. District Judge James Spencer decides whether to impose an injunction granting NTP's request -- potentially shutting off more than 3 million U.S. BlackBerry subscribers. … The U.S. Justice Department has argued against a shut-down, saying NTP has not submitted enough evidence to show government users could be exempted 'without substantial hardship.'"

The AP (2/10) reports, "Although there is currently no injunction in place in the patent litigation with NTP Inc., RIM said it developed the workaround software as a contingency to allow BlackBerry service to continue should the court declare an injunction. … NTP has convinced a federal jury that its patents were infringed by RIM and is asking a federal judge in Richmond, Va., to turn off the network. The judge has indicated he could decide on NTP's request following a hearing scheduled for Feb. 24. … The lawsuit against RIM has drawn objections from the U.S. government and big corporate users who rely on BlackBerry e-mail service."

Mittal Pledges To Honor Union Agreements In Arcelor Acquisition. The AP (2/10) reports, "Germany's biggest industrial union said it received assurances Thursday from Mittal Steel Co. that if it acquires rival Arcelor SA, no labor agreements would be affected." The AP continues, "Meanwhile, U.S. antitrust regulators are looking at Mittal's hostile bid for Arcelor, Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed Thursday." The AP adds, "Mittal Steel Europe Chief Executive Roeland Baan met with union deputy chairman Berthold Huber for several hours to address Mittal's euro18.6 billion (US$22.5 billion) bid for Luxembourg's Arcelor, IG Metall spokeswoman Ingrid Gier said. … Mittal employs approximately 1,600 workers in Germany, while Arcelor employs 14,000."

FCC Says Cable "A La Carte" Would Save Consumers Money. ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 9, 2:10, Gibson) reported, "Federal regulators issued a study that could lead to changes in the cable television industry and what comes into your home. Giving cable customers a chance to pick your channels, a system known as ala la carte pricing, could save consumers a bundle. Consumer groups cheered the findings. The cable industry did not." ABC (L. Stark) added, "More than a year ago, the FCC warned that so-called a la carte or buying individual channels would cost consumers more. But now, the agency says, consumers could pay 3% to 13% less for cable a la carte, with no increase in your monthly bill, if you select as many as 20 channels. Plenty of television viewing, they say, for most Americans -- who tend to watch only 17 out of the more than 100 channels they now get. Supporters say this is all about giving consumers more control over what comes in to the home."

CQ (2/9, Wolfe) reports the report "drew an immediate response on Capitol Hill and could spur lawmakers to consider a bill to create a la carte cable options." Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., "long an advocate for a la carte cable, announced Thursday that he will soon introduce a bill that would offer 'regulatory relief' as a carrot to cable providers who allow consumers the option of picking either a la carte or bundled channels."

Realtors Seek To Stop Bankers From Entering Real Estate Market. The Hill (2/10, Schor) reports, "Congress and the Bush administration are again getting caught in the crossfire of a long-standing turf war between the National Association of Realtors, which bills itself as the nation's biggest trade association, and the banking industry over whether banks can engage in real-estate activities." The Hill continues, "Federal regulators signed off late last year on several bids for real-estate development from large banking chains, alarming the Realtors and reinvigorating the group's push for a bill, co-sponsored by Reps. Ken Calvert (R-Calif.) and Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.), prohibiting banks from 'directly or indirectly' engaging in real-estate activities. Banking lobbyists dismiss the Realtors' claims that the regulators are gradually dismantling existing law. … 'This issue is totally phony. Banks for a long time have been able to own their own real estate,' said Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. 'The Realtors would like to think it's something new, but it's not.'" The Hill adds, "The Calvert-Kanjorski bill is hardly new to Capitol Hill, having snagged the support of a majority of the House in each of the past three Congresses. But banking lobbyists pushed back last year with a bill of their own that only needed two co-sponsors — House Financial Services Committee Chairman Mike Oxley (R-Ohio) and his ranking Democrat, Barney Frank (Mass.) — to make a splash. … With their bill stalled in both House and Senate committees, the Realtors now are aiming at the Bush administration in their vigorous lobbying efforts against banks involved in real estate. The group has promoted letters this month to new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, Treasury Secretary John Snow and leaders at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), which has jurisdiction over national banks, asking for a definitive exclusion of banks from the real-estate market. … In a unique twist, the Realtors also have chosen to side publicly with bankers in the fight to prevent retail behemoth Wal-Mart from opening an industrial loan corporation to conduct banking activities. Just as the Realtors fear banks encroaching on their business, bankers want Congress to keep commercial corporations off their turf."

Federal Judge Tosses Antitrust Suit Against Bengals, NFL. The AP (2/10, Kinney) reports, "A judge dismissed Hamilton County's federal antitrust lawsuit against the Cincinnati Bengals and the National Football League on Thursday because the suit was not filed within the four-year statute of limitations." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge S. Arthur Spiegel threw out the suit without getting to the merits of the county's argument that the Bengals misled taxpayers and officials by contending that they needed a new stadium to be profitable and might move if they didn't get one." The AP adds, "Hamilton County taxpayers approved a one-half-cent sales tax increase in 1996 to finance the $450 million Paul Brown Stadium. Commissioners signed a lease with the Bengals the following year. … The antitrust lawsuit was not filed until 2003, three years after the Bengals began using the stadium. … 'To be sure, the lease that Hamilton County enjoys with the Bengals is highly favorable - perhaps egregiously so - to the Bengals,' Spiegel wrote. … He said prior members of the board were aware of allegations that league and its teams wielded unlawful antitrust power to obtain favorable leases, but by not filing suit sooner the chance 'was lost to the passage of time.'"

South Korean Antitrust Regulators Question Intel Employees. The AP (2/10) reports, "Investigators from South Korea's antitrust watchdog questioned some employees at Intel Corp.'s local subsidiary this week as part of an inquiry that began last year, a company spokesman said Friday." The AP continues, "The Korean Fair Trade Commission 'made an unscheduled visit to our offices on Tuesday during normal business hours,' said Chuck Mulloy, legal affairs spokesman for Intel in Santa Clara, California. … 'This is part of an ongoing inquiry that we disclosed in June of 2005,' Mulloy said, adding it was 'not appropriate for us to talk about specifics.' Mulloy said the visit to Intel Korea marked the first time regulators had arrived unannounced."

Reuters (2/10, So-eui) reports, "South Korea, which fined Microsoft Corp. for antitrust violations in December, began investigating Intel in the middle of last year, following similar probes launched by Japan and the European Union. … Intel, the world's largest chipmaker, confirmed on Thursday that FTC officials paid an unscheduled visit to the Seoul office. … The officials talked to Intel staff and took away some documents as part of an ongoing probe, a spokeswoman for Intel Korea said. … 'It will take a while for us to reach a conclusion,' FTC spokesman Kim Joo-hyok said by telephone. … The watchdog had received a complaint that Intel was using its dominant position in South Korea to increase microprocessor sales, Kim said. He declined to say who filed the complaint."

Bloomberg (2/10, King) reports, "Intel is facing a U.S. antitrust lawsuit based on a complaint filed last June by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. European regulators investigating antitrust claims have also raided Intel offices, and Japan's Fair Trade Commission last year told the company to remove a clause from its contracts forcing PC makers to exclusively use its chips."

The San Jose Mercury News (2/10, Ackerman) reports, "Intel first disclosed the Korean inquiry in a regulatory filing in August, stating that Korean antitrust regulators began looking into its marketing and rebate programs in June. … Also in June, rival chip maker Advanced Micro Devices sued in federal court alleging that Intel provided secret and discriminatory discounts. … Today, AMD said in a statement that the 'dawn raids are part of an investigation into Intel's business dealings with four Korean PC makers.'"

Six Charged With Illegally Harvesting Leopard Sharks. The AP (2/10, Goodin) reports, "A church pastor, four men in the aquarium industry and a commercial fisherman have been accused of illegally catching and selling hundreds of juvenile leopard sharks." The AP continues, "An indictment Wednesday charged the men with selling 465 leopard sharks that were too small to harvest to pet distributors throughout the United States, and in The Netherlands and the United Kingdom." The AP adds, "The six defendants were arrested on Tuesday, when the indictment was unsealed. Two pleaded not guilty. The Associated Press was unable to reach the other four. They face maximum penalties of five years in prison, a $250,000 (â‚¬210,000) fine and possible requirement to pay restitution for each count, according to the U.S. Attorney's office. … Seven of the 19 baby leopard sharks confiscated during the two-year investigation died, the U.S. Attorney's office said. Three are on exhibit at the Monterey Bay Aquarium, and nine were returned to the wild in 2004."

Forest Service To Propose Sale Of 200,000 Acres To Fund Rural Schools. Knight Ridder (2/10, Borenstein) reports the National Forest Service will today unveil a plan to "sell up to 200,000 acres of national forest land in 'isolated parcels' ranging from a quarter of an acre to 200 acres, much of it in California." The sale is part of an effort "to raise $800 million over the next five years to pay for rural schools in 41 states, offsetting shrinking revenues from sale of timber from national forests. The Bureau of Land Management also plans to sell federal lands to raise an estimated $182 million over five years."

Interior Department Says Energy Companies Were Slow To Pay Royalties. The New York Times (2/10, Andrews, Romero, 1.19M) reports Interior Department documents show "more than three dozen energy companies fell nearly $500 million behind last year on royalty payments the federal government says they owed for oil and gas extracted from public territory." While "most of that money was later turned over after the government demanded payment, almost $60 million remains in dispute." The companies, "which included major producers like Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips, had claimed lucrative government incentives for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico even though the incentives were not supposed to be available if market prices climbed above certain 'threshold prices.'" The Interior Department, "in a report sent to lawmakers looking into the energy royalty program, identified 41 companies that incorrectly claimed about $493 million in 'royalty relief' during 2004, when prices for both oil and gas climbed to records. The Interior Department said that 38 of the 41 companies quickly paid $435 million in back royalties after it sent out warning letters in December, months after the money should have been paid." But "three companies — Kerr-McGee, Forest Oil and AGIP — continue to protest $58 million in additional payments."

Penalties For Coal Company Safety Violations Small Compared To Other Industries. USA Today (2/10, Frank, 2.31M) reports coal companies "pay some of the smallest fines of any industry for federal violations even as the nation tries to curb one of the deadliest periods in recent coal-mining history, a USA TODAY analysis found." The Federal Government "levied a larger fine — $550,000 — for the 2004 Super Bowl showing of Janet Jackson's breast than it did for the 2001 deaths of 13 Alabama miners in one of the deadliest mine disasters in a quarter-century. And the $435,000 fine against mine operator Jim Walter Resources was cut by a judge to $3,000." Federal law limits "fines to $60,000 for each violation of a mine health and safety standard." USA adds the Bush Administration "has said that higher fines are not as effective as forcing companies to close unsafe areas until they are fixed."

Panel Backs Administration Plan For Transporting Nuclear Waste. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Fialka, 2.11M) reports a panel "of scientists, engineers and other experts endorsed the Energy Department's plans to ship tens of thousands of tons of nuclear waste for disposal in Nevada, saying they pose 'no fundamental technical barriers' and relatively low and manageable risks." The panel was "organized by the National Research Council, an arm of the National Academy of Sciences," and its study was "the first major outside study of the government's plans for waste removal, which will take two decades and involve transportation routes through or near many population centers." The panel's report "gives a boost to administration proposals to spur nuclear power by moving spent nuclear-power-plant fuel from 70 sites in 31 states and to minimize waste-storage needs by reprocessing some elements from spent fuel. The Yucca Mountain disposal site, located 90 miles from Las Vegas, would also receive high-level nuclear-weapons waste from four government sites."

WSJournal Praises WTO Decision On Genetically Modified Food. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) editorializes, "Frankenstein is finally dead, or at least his political imitators are. That good news comes from the World Trade Organization, which struck a blow for science over scare-mongers by ruling this week against Europe's attempt to ban genetically modified food." The EU "can accurately say its review process for new GMOs, which is stricter and slower than that used in the U.S., wasn't struck down. However, the panel said a clear review process has to be in place, and one not based on junk science. That means no more moratoriums on approving new GMOs such as that imposed by Brussels from 1998 to 2003."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Handprint Could Be Key Evidence In Alabama Church Fire Probe. CNN.com (2/10, Dornin) reports, "Investigators looking into the fires at nine Baptist churches in Alabama over the past week are hoping a handprint left on one church's front door may help catch a perpetrator." CNN continues, "The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives would not indicate whether its agents were able to lift a readable fingerprint from the inside part of the front door at Dancy First Baptist Church, south of Aliceville in Pickens County. … Arsonists entered the church by kicking in a back door, then set a fire near the pulpit before trying to escape through the front door, authorities said. … However, the front door had a dead-bolt lock, and the arsonists had to exit through the back door, where police said they found a footprint that might have come from someone kicking the door." CNN adds, "Nine churches -- five with predominantly African-American congregations and four with predominantly white ones -- have been set ablaze in the past week in central and western Alabama. Nobody has been injured. … More than 100 ATF personnel, including special agents and forensic experts, are investigating the fires. A criminal and geographical profiler also has been called in. … The ATF has said witnesses have reported seeing a dark-colored SUV near some of the fires. But it is not clear if the vehicle is linked to the blazes."

The New York Times (2/10, Lyman) reports that "as investigators sift the rubble after nine church fires across rural Alabama in the last week, all suspected arsons, the evidence they are finding and the pattern of the attacks suggest that those behind the arsons were either locals or, at the very least, frequent-enough visitors to cherry-pick the most vulnerable and remote churches and drive the region's coal-dark roads at night with brazen efficiency." The Times continues, "Five churches, including Ashby Baptist, were set on fire just before dawn last Friday in rural Bibb County, about an hour south of Birmingham. They were all Baptist churches, four with predominantly white congregations and one with a black congregation. … Then, early Tuesday, four more churches — all Baptist and, this time, all black congregations — were hit on a long stretch of country highways in more rural counties along Alabama's western edge." The Times adds, "Although investigators say they have reached no firm conclusions about who might be behind the arsons, they point to strong similarities between the two strings of attacks. In both cases, the churches tended to be the most secluded; indeed, in Bibb County, the arsonists passed by several churches beside the highway to seek out those tucked deep into the pine woods."

Maryland Man Sentenced To 30 Years For Oxycontin Distribution. The Baltimore Sun (2/10, 296K) reports Oliver Clifton Hudson of Baltimore was sentenced Thursday "to 30 years in prison for distributing Oxycontin and engaging in health-care fraud." Hudson "and his co-defendant, Gregory Wayne Banks…were convicted in federal court Nov. 7. Both claimed to not be subject to the jurisdiction of the court and were removed from the courtroom after they refused to participate in the trial, according to court documents." Banks is scheduled for sentencing today. " The Sun notes, "The defendants sent 'runners' to various pharmacies with the prescriptions and made themselves available by telephone -- posing as health clinic officials -- to answer questions from pharmacy employees seeking verification for the prescriptions, officials said. … Once obtained, the oxycodone prescriptions were ultimately resold on the street. Officials said the defendants sold more than 41,000 oxycodone pills using this scheme.

Two San Diego City Employees Arrested, Accused Of Dealing Marijuana. The AP (2/9) reports that San Diego officials "have launched an investigation into illegal activity by city employees after two workers from the Park and Recreation Department were arrested on suspicion of drug possession and sales. The employees, who are brothers, were arrested Jan. 25 as part of a broader Drug Enforcement Administration Investigation, authorities said. They are accused of dealing marijuana out of a Park and Recreation vehicle and had been under surveillance."

Reporting Continues On The National Survey On Drug Use and Health. There was wide media coverage of the survey results, with more than 200 news outlets publishing stories on the results in their newspapers and/or posting them on their Web sites. For example, The AP (2/10, Matthews) reports, "In a reversal of past trends, teenage girls are trying marijuana, alcohol and cigarettes at higher rates than boys, the White House drug czar said Thursday. The findings from a new government analysis come even as teen drug use is declining overall. The National Survey on Drug Use and Health, released by John Walters, the national drug policy director, indicates 1.5 million girls ages 12 to 17 started drinking alcohol in 2004, the most recent year for which data is available. That compares with 1.28 million boys. … 'This is the first time that we've recorded this kind of relationship between boys' and girls' drug use,' said Walters. 'In the past, boys have had higher rates of use _ and significantly higher rates of use at certain times in the past.' Overall illicit drug use among youths 12 to 17 has declined 19 percent since 2001, according to the survey. 'In order to drive it down further, we have to deal with today's substance abuse reality, and today's reality is, girls have been using at higher rates than boys in critical areas,' Walters said. More than 100 news outlets used the AP story, including CBS News, FOX News, MSNBC, Forbes, The Washington Post, San Diego Union-Tribune, Houston Chronicle, Miami Herald, Baltimore Sun, Boston Globe, Knoxville Tennessee News Sentinel, and China's China Daily.

Reuters (2/9) writes, "More girls than boys are becoming first-time users of alcohol, cigarettes and marijuana, reversing previous trends, the U.S. drug czar said in a report released on Thursday. 'Girls have become users at rates that exceed boys or equal boys now, which never used to be the case,' John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a telephone interview. … Walters said there were several reasons why girls might turn more to drugs and alcohol than boys. 'They are more likely to be influenced by peer pressure, even when they have been told and accepted that these behaviors are risky for them,' Walters said. 'They are twice as likely to be victims of depression. They report that when they use, that they do that to improve their moods.'"

The Washington Times (2/10, Wetzstein) reports, "Young men and women are abusing tobacco, alcohol and drugs at the same rate, according a report released yesterday that urged parents to get more involved in the lives of their teenage children. 'The gender gap has closed. Girls are smoking, drinking and using drugs equal to boys,' said Susan Foster, vice president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (CASA) at Columbia University and lead author of a new book on women and substance abuse. … A separate report released yesterday in New York City by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) and Seventeen magazine said teenage girls now match teenage boys in illicit drug and alcohol use, surpass them in cigarette and prescription drug use, and are more likely than boys to start using illicit substances. 'Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol and cigarettes. But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using,' White House drug czar John P. Walters said yesterday. … Parental disapproval of tobacco, alcohol and drugs is a strong influence on teens, as is parental monitoring of teens and their friends, said the ONDCP, which offers parents and community leaders a wealth of anti-drug materials."

UPI (2/10) reports, "Experts say that teenage girls are more likely than boys to use drugs and alcohol to escape from family problems and other pressures in their lives. They also may take up smoking to help keep their weight down."

ABC News (2/9) reports on its Web site, "First lady Laura Bush has spearheaded an initiative to steer boys away from gangs, crime and drugs. She felt the program was needed because, she said, because we have 'shifted our gaze away from boys for the last several decades.' A White House report released [Thursday] on drug use among youths suggests that we need to keep a closer eye on girls as well. The report reveals that in 2004, the most recent year studied, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol — 173,000 more than the number of boys who started drinking."

AFP (2/10) writes, "Atoosa Rubenstein, editor in chief of Seventeen magazine, which cooperated with the White House initiative, said young girls were becoming more independent and starting to make decisions about their future. 'Combine this new responsibility with all the stress and pressures in their lives and the result, unfortunately, can be substance abuse,' she said."

LiveScience.com (2/9) writes, "Contrary to popular belief, more girls are new substance abusers. In 2004, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol, 730,000 girls started smoking, and 675,000 started using marijuana, according to the 2004 National Survey on Drug Use and Health. … 'Over the last few years, we have seen overall drug use decrease among teens—boys and girls. But the trends of substance use among our adolescent girls are alarming,' said ONDCP Director John P. Walters. … Marijuana is the drug of choice for girls; they prefer it over cocaine, heroin, Ecstasy, and all other illicit drugs combined, according to ONDCP."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/10) reports, "A report by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy released Thursday notes that young females across the country tend to use alcohol or drugs to lose weight, improve their mood, increase their confidence, cope with problems and lose their inhibitions. The report also said more girls than boys are starting to drink and smoke cigarettes and marijuana."

US Skeleton Racer Seeks Olympic Eligibility Following Positive Drug Test. The AP (2/10, Withers) reports, "U.S. skeleton racer Zach Lund's hopes of competing in the Olympics now rest in the hands of a special arbitration court. The Court of Arbitration for Sport is expected to rule Friday on whether Lund should be allowed to race in the Turin Games after testing positive for finasteride — an ingredient in a hair-restoration product that also can be used as a steroid-masking agent. Lund insists he tested positive because he was taking an baldness-fighting drug. Lund spent more than three hours Thursday at a hearing with the CAS. The men's skeleton competition is scheduled to begin next week. Lund was publicly warned but not suspended by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency on Jan. 23 after the positive test. But last week, the World Anti-Doping Agency filed an appeal with the CAS over Lund's Olympic eligibility."

Duke University Changes Drug-Testing Policies. The AP (2/10) reports student athletes at Duke

University who test positive for steroids "will have to sit out of competition for a year, while a second offense will result in lost eligibility, the school announced Thursday. The changes come after allegations last spring of steroid use by former baseball players. Bill Hillier, who compiled a 121-214 record in six years, resigned as coach a month after two former Duke players told the university newspaper they used steroids while playing for the school. Those players and others have said Hillier suggested that they use steroids. Hillier has denied the allegations. The new policy goes into place immediately. Evidence of blood doping or masking agents and refusal to take or attempts to manipulate a test are treated as positive tests."

Durham, North Carolina's Herald Sun (2/10) writes, "The school's new drug policy differentiates between performance-enhancing drugs and other substances banned by the NCAA -- so-called 'street drugs' -- by imposing harsher penalties for student-athletes who test positive for steroids and the like. The previous policy treated all banned substances the same, calling for counseling, treatment and further evaluation for a first offense, a suspension for at least half the season for a second offense and a permanent ban from competition for a third offense."

The Charlotte (NC) Observer (2/9) reports, "The University of North Carolina strengthened its steroid policy in October, requiring permanent dismissal for athletes testing positive for anabolic steroids. Duke's policy provides a second chance for steroid offenders. 'We are an educational institution,' said Duke law professor James E. Coleman Jr., who chaired Duke's committee. 'We felt it was appropriate to give a student who tested positive for a steroid a second chance to learn from and recover from the error, if possible.'"

ATF Busts Moonshine Still In Georgia. The Clayton (GA) Tribune (2/9, Spurney) reports, "Federal agents from the U.S. Forest Service and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms raided a moonshine still Feb. 2 off Muscadine Lane in eastern Rabun County." The Tribune continues, "The still, on Forest Service land in the Pool Creek community, had been under surveillance for nearly two months. No arrests have been made, though Rabun County sheriff's deputies and Georgia Department of Revenue agents helped execute warrants at three local residences." The Tribune adds, "Authorities released few details about the still's operation, including the names of potential suspects. The investigation is ongoing. … 'Suffice it to say, the suspects have been under surveillance with our operation,' said ATF spokesman Marc Jackson. … 'It was estimated that up until our enforcement action on it, that this suspected still was suspected of producing 45-70 gallons per cycle,' Jackson added. The still had yielded about seven cycles since Dec. 8. … The still was estimated to hold 750 gallons of mash. It was tucked away off Forest Service Road 517. Liquor was transported from the site in a 55-gallon barrel to another location where it was transferred to jars. Its operators had built a makeshift road through the woods, apparently on an old logging roadbed. The liquor was distilled through an old radiator."

New Jersey Man Sentenced In Pennsylvania Arson-For-Hire Case. The Bucks County (PA) Courier-Times (2/9, Yanoshak) reports, "A New Jersey man was sentenced to five years in federal prison Wednesday for hiring two men to torch the Morrisville (PA) restaurant across the street from what used to be his pizzeria." The Courier-Times continues, "From his own family to the man whose deli-restaurant was damaged by Molotov cocktails, many in U.S. District Court posed the same question to Alessandro 'Alex' Tramo: 'What were you thinking?' … Tramo's answer: He wasn't." The Courier-Times adds, "The abuse of prescription drugs had clouded his judgment, he told U.S. District Court Judge Anita Brody, whose sentence of five years was the mandatory minimum. … 'I forever regret having anything to do with this incident,' he told the court as his wife, Lisa, sat in the audience and wiped away tears. … Tramo pleaded guilty to hiring the men to burn Ben's Deli and Restaurant on Dec. 2, 2000. The 3:45 a.m. fire was brought under control in about 20 minutes and seriously damaged the landmark cafeteria-style eatery. … An investigation by Morrisville and Bucks County fire marshals and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms resulted in an indictment against Tramo, 34, of Bordentown; Bruce Armstrong, 35, of Trenton; and William Anderson, 39, of Morrisville. … Tramo, who then owned Anthony's 4 Pizza, hired the two to eliminate Ben's as a competitor, the investigators determined. … Armstrong and Anderson pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against Tramo. After that, Tramo pleaded guilty to arson and criminal conspiracy to commit arson."

IMMIGRATION:

Noting Rise In Border Violence, Chertoff Says US Will Not Tolerate Attacks On Agents. The Washington Times (2/10, Seper, 90K) reports, "Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, concerned about rising border violence, said yesterday nearly $1 billion in next year's proposed $42.7 billion department budget will be used for new US Border Patrol agents, upgraded electronic security measures, and more fences, roads, and detention beds." During a Washington press conference, Chertoff said, "There has been an over-100 percent increase in the last fiscal year in border violence aimed at our Border Patrol agents." Chertoff added, "We are not going to tolerate this kind of behavior." The secretary said "much of the border violence has been the result of increased enforcement efforts by the US government, but that the department was committed to securing the nation's borders as part of the strategy that 'involves not only apprehensions at the border, but detention, removal and more vigorous work site enforcement.'"

Cornyn Says Immigration Is National Security Issue. The Washington Times (2/10, McCain, 90K) reports, "Immigration should be treated as a national security issue, Sen. John Cornyn yesterday told a gathering of conservative activists. 'The federal government needs to obtain operational security of our borders,' the Texas Republican said in a speech to the 33rd annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington." Cornyn "said human traffickers, drug smugglers and criminal gangs from Brazil, China and other countries are 'using Mexico as a point of entry into the United States.'" He "drew applause when he said he would push for a Senate bill to provide 'a comprehensive solution' to US immigration problems 'that does not include amnesty.'"

DHS IG Finds Companies Using L-1 Visas To Get Around H-1B Quotas. The Washington Times (2/10, Dinan, 90K) reports that the temporary L-1 visa, which is "used particularly by foreign technology workers, is being abused by companies looking to get around protections for American workers, according to a new government report." The L-1 visa "is intended for foreign companies who want to transfer managerial employees or workers with 'specialized knowledge' temporarily to the United States." However, while "Congress has capped the number of workers who can come under the H-1B visa category each year at 65,000," it "has not placed limits on the L-1 visa, which applies to workers with specialized knowledge." The Department of Homeland Security's inspector general has "found that it is difficult for adjudicators at US Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to determine what constitutes a manager, particularly because companies vary in size and organization. Adjudicators also have to rely on a company's claims about its own operations, a worker's status at the time of the petition and how a worker will be used in the United States."

LATimes Criticizes Bush Border Budget Proposals. Under the headline "Bipolar Border Budgeting," the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 958K) editorializes, "Throwing money at a problem doesn't solve it. Knee-jerk reactions don't help, either. When it comes to illegal immigration, the Bush administration, apparently unable to decide which approach it prefers, has opted for both. But spending more on border enforcement will do little to curb illegal immigration and may even distract attention from better solutions to the problem." Though President Bush emphasized Border Patrol spending in this week's budge, "Over the last 10 years, such spending has increased by many times, yet illegal immigration continues to climb. A more sensible step would be a guest-worker program that makes temporary workers legal and reduces people smuggling, along with the risks and related crimes that go with it." The Times adds, "The other disappointment in the president's budget is that he continued his annual practice of ignoring states' requests for reimbursement for jailing illegal immigrants."

Opt-Outs May Jeopardize KPMG Tax-Shelter Settlement. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Koppel) reports, "A federal judge postponed a proposed $225 million class-action settlement with accounting firm KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP in a tax-shelter lawsuit. … The order, issued yesterday, came in response to a motion by KPMG in federal court in Newark, N.J., to revise the settlement because potential members opted out of the deal. The postponement was reported in the New York Times. … 'This settlement could be in jeopardy,' said attorney Edmundo Ramirez, whose client was one of 284 potential members of the KPMG class. Mr. Ramirez said his client rejected the original settlement, considering it 'a sweetheart deal for KPMG.'" The Journal adds, "In an interview, attorney Melvyn Weiss, a partner at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP and the lead lawyer for the plaintiffs in the case, said the parties may reduce the original settlement amount, but he believed an accord could still be reached in about a month. Milberg Weiss filed the suit last year, claiming KPMG sold fraudulent tax shelters. KPMG has admitted wrongdoing and agreed to pay the U.S. $456 million in restitution. … As originally proposed, the settlement would have awarded $195 million to purchasers of allegedly fraudulent tax shelters sold by KPMG. Milberg Weiss and other class counsel stood to earn $30 million from the settlement. If the plaintiffs' recovery is reduced in a new settlement, the plaintiffs' lawyers would also earn less, Mr. Weiss said."

SCOTUS To Hear Challenge To Corporate Tax Breaks. The National Law Journal (2/10, Coyle) reports, "In North Carolina this spring, a state court will take up a constitutional challenge to $242 million in state tax breaks given by state officials to Dell Inc. to build a plant in Winston-Salem. In Minnesota, another suit is pending attacking the validity of two multimillion-dollar tax-incentive programs to attract and keep businesses in special zones in that state." The Journal continues, "The North Carolina and Minnesota suits are among a number percolating around the country that have been inspired largely by a federal appellate decision in 2004 that struck down Ohio's investment tax credit -- a sacred tool of state economic competition." The Journal adds, "The Ohio case, which involved a $280 million tax incentive plan for DaimlerChrysler Corp.'s expansion in that state, is now before the U.S. Supreme Court, which is scheduled to hear arguments on March 1. DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, No. 04-1704; Wilkins v. Cuno, No. 04-1724. … The case has raised to a high profile a long-running debate over the constitutionality of state tax incentives under the so-called dormant or negative commerce clause, which prohibits states from acting in a way that interferes with interstate commerce, as well as a debate over the effectiveness of tax incentives as an economic-development tool. … Business and government officials predict 'dire ramifications' if states lose the ability to offer these incentives and businesses lose the ability to use them. … They note that one study reported last year that more than 330 statutory income or franchise tax credits and incentives are offered by 46 states."

Mack Says Tax Overhaul Will Be Harder If Delayed. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that former Sen. Connie Mack, "'disappointed' that presidential advisory group he headed isn't producing action, cautions the issue will become 'more difficult' to push as president's term continues. Absence of tax overhaul in Bush's State of the Union address is seen as sign of Treasury Secretary Snow's lack of clout."

WSJournal Pleased Rhode Island Democrats Are Considering Flat Tax. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "Let's hope James Carville, Robert Rubin, Nancy Pelosi and other national Democrats are all sitting down for this one: The Rhode Island legislature is considering a flat tax, and the proposal comes from its majority Democrats." Democratic leaders "proposed an optional flat rate income tax of 5.5% as an alternative to the current 'progressive' tax schedule, which imposes rates ranging from 3.75% to 9.9% for the highest earners. The flat tax is part of a more comprehensive reform plan that would also include a sales tax holiday weekend in August and a full week of relief on 'energy efficient' items in March 2007 from the state's 7% sales tax." What's "going on here? Have the state's liberals all taken Art Laffer happy pills? The answer is tax competition, and the discovery that Rhode Island's high tax burden is damaging its economy."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Submits List Of Proposed Program Cuts To Congress. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Calmes, 2.11M) reports President Bush "sent Congress his list of 141 programs to be killed or reduced to achieve almost $15 billion in savings, and almost half are three-time losers -- cuts he proposed for fiscal years 2004, 2005 and 2006, only to be ignored by Congress each time. The total savings are less than 4% of the current year's projected deficit." But if "the third time wasn't a charm, the fourth probably won't be either, congressional staffers say." Of the 91 programs targeted for complete elimination, "40 are making their fourth annual appearance on the list. Of 50 to be reduced, 20 are perennials." USA Today (2/10, Wolf, 2.31M) also writes that most of the programs Bush wants to cut or eliminate "are survivors of past Bush hit lists," and the total amount that would be saved is "small compared with the big ones in the budget: the skyrocketing costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, Bush's effort to boost spending on defense and homeland security, and the cost of making his tax cuts permanent."

Among the proposed eliminations: a "program that provides poor seniors with vegetables, peanut butter and other nutritious foods," according to the AP (2/9); the "$255 Social Security death benefit," according to CQ (2/9, Schuler); and the "public housing reconstruction program known as HOPE VI," also according to CQ (2/9, Wayne). Meanwhile, Reuters (2/9, Doggett) reports Democrats "slammed" a proposal "to cut funds for a government program that helps poor people weatherize their homes."

Both Parties Reluctant To Enact Spending Reductions. Reuters (2/9, Bohan) reports the White House "defended reductions in programs from veterans healthcare to housing on Thursday as it sought to persuade a reluctant Congress" to make the cuts. The proposals "have gotten a wary reception in Congress, with Democrats lashing out at Bush for pushing tax cuts for the rich while reducing programs for the poor and middle class," and even "prominent members of Bush's Republican party criticized his budget." House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis "complained about 'fees and gimmicks,' which he said the White House knows Congress will again reject, but give Bush leeway to propose spending increases in favored areas such as defense." House Majority Leader John Boehner is among the skeptics, CQ (2/9, Ota) reports, giving "lukewarm support Thursday for President Bush's plan to slice $71 billion from Medicare and other entitlement programs. 'We have to build a budget together,' Boehner said during the first day of a House GOP retreat. 'I don't want to put things on the table or off the table.'"

Senate, House Pass Typo Fix For Spending Cut Bill. Reuters (2/9) reports, "The Senate and House have passed legislation aimed at ending confusion over a $39-billion spending-cut bill signed into law by President Bush on Wednesday, which varied slightly from the final version passed by the House. The two chambers passed the fix late on Wednesday, hours after the technical problem was discovered and the bill was enacted into law with Bush's signature. The problem stemmed from a typographical error written into the contentious bill as it bounced back and forth from the House and Senate since December."

Huckabee Says Congress Cutting Deficit By Boosting States' Medicaid Costs. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that National Governors Association Mike Huckabee of Arkansas "hits Congress for trimming deficit 'on the backs of the states' with proposals to increase state cost-sharing on Medicaid. Arkansas' Republican governor, a 2008 White House hopeful, says states instead need more flexibility to experiment with approaches to reining in Medicaid costs."

Krugman Criticizes "Artificial Shortsightedness" Of Bush Budgeting Practices. In his New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "At this point we've had six years to grow accustomed to Bush budget chicanery. … What still amazes me, however, is the sheer childishness of the administration's denials and deceptions. Consider the case of the vanishing future. … Clinton-era budgets offered 10-year projections of spending and revenues. But the Bush administration slashed the budget horizon to five years. This artificial shortsightedness greatly aided the campaign to make the 2001 tax cut permanent because it hid the costs: since budget analyses no longer covered the years after 2010, the revenue losses from extending the tax cut became invisible. … At this point the administration's budget strategy seems to be simply to ignore reality."

Neuharth Blames Iraq Costs For Swelling Budget. In his USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) column, Al Neuharth writes, "President Bush submitted a budget to Congress this week that is so big, most of us just shrug it off without thinking about what it means to us individually. Think about this: The $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year starting in October breaks down to an average of $9,293.62 for everyone in the USA. The latest budget request for Iraq of about $96 billion brings the cost of that war to $322 billion, an average of $1,080.34 per person. … Bush simply can't convince me on continuing the cost in Iraq -- in dollars and, more important, in precious lives -- for a war that he never should have started."

Pentagon Budget Proposal Would Increase Weapons Spending. The Washington Post (2/10, Merle, 744K) reports the defense industry was largely "relieved" by the Pentagon budget proposal, which "would increase spending on weapons to $84.2 billion, $8 billion more than this year, and includes $1.7 billion for unmanned aerial vehicles, an increase of about 3 percent, to begin buying 322 of the pilotless planes over the next five years." The "proposed 7 percent increase in the budget for weapons procurement and research and development is twice that expected by Troy Lahr, a defense analyst at investment bank

Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. 'And we were among the more bullish,' said Lahr."

Defense Savings Plan Likely To Face Challenges. CQ (2/9, Donnelly, Plummer) reports lawmakers "are expected to challenge President Bush's proposal for defense savings because the plan, worth more than $50 billion over the next five years, entails significant reductions in uniformed personnel to support massive increases in weapons purchases and rising health care bills. Lawmakers in recent weeks have protested personnel cuts and threatened to add money for the troops back into the budget."

NYTimes Criticizes Pentagon Budget Priorities. The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) editorializes, "It's amazing how Donald Rumsfeld's Defense Department can produce a $439 billion spending plan and still skimp on the one thing the American military desperately needs: expanded ground forces so the weakened and cannibalized Army can meet the requirements of Iraq without hurting its ability to respond to other threats. While the Pentagon intends to increase pay and recruitment bonuses, no part of its nearly 7 percent budget increase is aimed at raising overall troop strength. Instead, a large chunk of this nearly $30 billion bonanza goes to buying more new weapons and postponing overdue cuts in wasteful Air Force and Navy projects unrelated to fighting terrorism. … The military contractors are doing just fine. It's the troops in Iraq who need help from Washington."

Bush Domestic Policy Adviser Resigns. The AP (2/9) reports President Bush's domestic policy adviser Claude Allen "has resigned to spend more time with his family." Allen "has been working for the administration since Bush's first year in office -- first as the No. 2 official at the Health and Human Services Department, and for the last year as domestic policy adviser in the White House." He "did not respond to inquiries asking about his departure or future job plans."

Insiders Say Card, McClellan And Others Are Not Planning To Leave. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/9) reported White House and Administration insiders "are playing down rumors that Chief of Staff Andy Card, spokesman Scott McClellan and other top Bush aides are considering leaving the West Wing this spring. The latest reports are being fed by expectations that Treasury Secretary John Snow will retire this spring and that Bush would put Card, a former Transportation secretary, into the post." But top aides and Administration officials this week, "however, said it appears that no staff changes are underway or even planned and that the feeling inside is that the top aides, including Card and McClellan, will remain on the job at least through the midterm elections -- and possibly until the end of the President's second term. Indeed, two insiders said that Card has been leading pep talks for staffers, telling them that they have a job of 'high honor' and to stay focused on continuing to 'build on the President's agenda.'" Said one insider, "There is no hint that anybody is going anywhere. They're building the legacy" for President Bush.

House Members Show Support For Bush Competitiveness Initiative. The AP (2/9, Crutsinger) reports President Bush's "plan to boost the competitiveness of U.S. industry through innovation won support from members of Congress Thursday, although Democrats criticized the initiative for slashing some education programs to pay for more spending on math and science." Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez "won widespread support from members of the House Government Reform Committee for Bush's 'American Competitiveness Initiative,' one of the biggest new programs in the budget Bush sent to Congress on Monday." The initiative "would double government funding for basic research in the physical sciences, train thousands of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development," at a cost of $136 billion over 10 years.

The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "The education piece of Mr. Bush's plan seems relatively small -- $380 million in fiscal 2007 -- but it is getting most of the attention. From that, $90 million would go to boost the ranks of students taking Advanced Placement and International Baccalaureate classes in math, science, and foreign languages by training 70,000 additional teachers in those subject areas in high-poverty high schools." The plan "aims to boost the number of students taking AP math and science exams from 380,000 today to 1.5 million in 2012."

Gutierrez To Promote Bush Competitiveness Initiative In North Carolina. The Raleigh News & Observer (2/10) in its "Morning Briefing" column reports, "North Carolina likes to think of itself as a hotbed of innovation. Apparently, the Bush administration is keying in on that reputation." The News & Observer continues, "For the second time in a week, a senior Bush adviser will visit the state to discuss the president's 'American Competitiveness Initiative.' Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez…this morning will meet with business and education leaders at IBM's Research Triangle Park campus to promote the stronger focus on technological and scientific innovation." The "initiative is meant to increase competitiveness with other nations. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow touted the effort in Kannapolis last week."

Bush To Address House GOP Retreat Today. Reuters (2/9, Ferraro) reports House Republicans "rocked by an ethics scandal" are meeting at a hotel in "secluded" Cambridge, Maryland, for a three-day retreat. New House Majority Leader John Boehner said the retreat "would allow a 'period of renewal,' but gave no hint whether he could quickly unite his 231-member caucus on lobbying reform." President Bush will address the group today. The Washington Times (2/10, Dinan, 90K) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman spoke to the GOP caucus on Thursday, saying Democrats "are failing to capitalize on Republican ethics questions ahead of difficult midterm congressional elections in November." While according to Mehlman politics is "supposed to be a zero-sum situation: If one party is doing poorly, the other does well," Republican "travails have not helped Democrats, he said. 'The law of political physics is being defied by Nancy Pelosi, Howard Dean and Harry Reid,' he said."

House GOP Members To Raise Election Year Needs With Leaders. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Republicans speak up to House leaders about election-year needs. Format for this weekend's retreat in Maryland is 'unstructured,' says Ohio Rep. Pryce, who chairs Republican conference. Newly elected Majority Leader Boehner calls these 'times of renewal.'" House Democrats "press Boehner to open legislative process while banning lobbyists' gifts. But House reform timetable slips, while McCain presses Senate effort to change spending 'earmarks.'"

McCain Leads Senate Effort To Curtail Earmarks. The AP (2/10, Abrams) reports, "Ten senators led by Sen. John McCain took on the Senate's much maligned practice of inserting individual members' special projects, often without the knowledge of their colleagues, into larger spending bills. The 'Pork-Barrel Reduction Act,' introduced Thursday by eight Republicans and two Democrats, is the latest in a rash of proposals promoting ways to restore integrity to the political process in the wake of lobbying and ethics scandals." The bill "would allow senators to raise points of order against special projects, or earmarks, that are attached to spending bills without having been approved by the relevant committee. Under the procedure, which also applies to policy changes embedded in spending bills, 60 votes would be needed to override the point of order and keep the provision in the bill."

CQ (2/9, Higa) reports that while McCain's bill "has bipartisan sponsorship from eight Republicans and Democrats, including Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Evan Bayh of Indiana, its prospects for reaching the floor are uncertain. It has been referred to the Senate Rules Committee, chaired by Trent Lott, R-Miss., who introduced his own earmark proposal with Dianne Feinstein" last week. Lott's measure "has fewer cosponsors, but the mix of Republicans and Democrats is more balanced than McCain's and includes Rules panel members Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Christopher J. Dodd."

Coburn Says Earmark Reform Crucial To Ending "Culture Of Corruption." In a Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) op-ed, Sen. Tom Coburn writes, "John McCain and I recently delivered a letter to our colleagues announcing our intention to challenge every individual earmark on the floor of the Senate. Many senators, staff and reporters have asked if we are serious. The answer is yes. I am convinced that forcing hundreds or, if necessary, thousands of votes to strike individual earmarks is the only way to produce meaningful results for American taxpayers. Bringing the Senate to a standstill for as long as it takes would be a small price to pay for shutting down what Jack Abramoff described as Congress's 'earmark favor factory.' … As Congress confronts its culture of corruption and our enormous fiscal challenges, it's time to 'just say no' to earmarks."

Top Official At Corporation For Public Broadcasting Announces Resignation. The New York Times (2/10, Labaton, Jensen, 1.19M) reports, "The top television executive at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting announced on Thursday that he would be stepping down. This is the latest in a string of departures of officials and consultants who played central roles in an effort by conservatives to bring what they viewed as more balance to public television and radio." The executive, Michael Pack, "controlled a $70 million production budget and was described by the official who hired him as a conservative

Republican." He "chose to resign after Patricia S. Harrison, the corporation's new president, forced him to decide between renewing his employment contract and exercising a soon-to-expire option that gives him $500,000 to produce a documentary."

Deutsch Denies Lying About Resume, Calls Hansen Politically Motivated. The New York Times (2/10, Revkin, 1.19M) reports, "George C. Deutsch, the young NASA press aide who resigned on Tuesday amid claims that he had tried to keep the agency's top climate scientist from speaking publicly about global warming, defended himself publicly yesterday. Speaking to a Texas radio station and then to The New York Times, Mr. Deutsch said the scientist, James E. Hansen, exaggerated the threat of warming and tried to cast the Bush administration's response to it as inadequate. Mr. Deutsch also denied lying about having a college degree and trying to inject religion into some NASA Web presentations. 'I have never been told to censor science, to squelch anything or to insert religion into any issue,' he told the radio reporter, Brian Cain. Parts of that interview were posted on the Web site of WTAW-AM, in College Station (wtaw.com), where Mr. Deutsch attended Texas A&M University until he joined President Bush's campaign in 2004. After seeing a transcript of some of the criticisms, Dr. Hansen said, 'This is so wacky that it deserves little response.'" In an interview with the Times, "Mr. Deutsch said he had written the résumé in anticipation of graduating. … 'As a result, it may appear misleading to some. However, I was up front with NASA about my undergraduate status when they hired me.'"

The AP (2/10) reports in a widely published story, "A staffer who resigned from NASA after he was accused of restricting access to a noted climate scientist said Thursday he was targeted because of his political ties. George C. Deutsch, 24, resigned from the agency's public relations department earlier this week. 'What you do have is hearsay coming from a handful of people who have clear partisan ties and they are really coming after me as a Bush appointee,' he told radio station WTAW. 'I was an easy target. I was low-hanging fruit.'"

NASA, Hansen Say Deutsch Charges Untrue. Under the headline "'Culture War' At NASA?" the Houston Chronicle (2/10, Carreau, 581K) reports that Deutsch "directed much of his wrath at James Hansen... 'What is going on at NASA and throughout the federal government is a culture war,' Deutsch said in a statement from his Washington-area home. 'I quickly learned one thing: Dr. Hansen and his supporters have a very partisan agenda and ties reaching to the top of the Democratic Party.' In a telephone interview, Deutsch accused the space agency of too often showcasing Hansen as its expert on global warming, passing over other scientists whose views were not as alarming." The story adds, "On Thursday, both Hansen… and NASA challenged the allegations by Deutsch. 'I have no idea where he got that idea. It would be the opposite of our credo about presenting all sides of a problem,' Hansen wrote in an e-mail in response to the charge he tried to suppress opposing views. … Hansen's views on global warming were not favored over others, said Dean Acosta, chief spokesman for NASA administrator Michael Griffin. 'I can tell you categorically that is not happening,' said Acosta."

USA Today Says Bush Needs To Take Cue From NASA Flap. USA Today (2/10, 12A, 2.31M) editorializes, "That a low-level bureaucrat could overrule a prestigious scientist says worlds about how the administration balances politics against science. Further evidence can be found at the Food and Drug Administration, which has stifled overwhelming evidence that the 'morning-after pill' is safe and effective. It blocked over-the-counter sales — a transparent payoff to abortion opponents. Global warming is a good place to begin altering that facts-be-damned approach. … Ignoring the impact of climate change is getting difficult: Federal officials are considering declaring the polar bear a threatened species because rising Arctic temperatures are melting the ice pack that's their home. Now that scientific fact has spoken louder than ideology at NASA, perhaps the same can happen at the White House."

More Commentary. In his column on the Washington Post (2/10, A17, 744K), Al Kamen reports, "Deutsch did attend the Texas University and did some writing for the Battalion, the student paper. In an opinion piece in 2003 when New York Times reporter Jayson Blair was unmasked as a fabricator, Deutsch wrote: 'Blair's decisions and actions lacked ethics and integrity. As a reporter, he cared only about himself and furthering his career at the expense of the truth. Unclear if Deutsch plans to re-enroll to finish his degree."

In an editorial titled "Earth to NASA," the Spokane (WA) Spokesman-Review (2/10) argues, "The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is the latest battleground in the war between science and politics. First, the agency's public information office was accused of censoring its scientists' findings on global warming. Then it imposed itself on the origins-of-the-universe debate." The paper describes the controversy around George Deutsch and concludes, "We're guessing Deutsch was motivated by more than just science, but that's just a theory. Deutsch was dumped on Tuesday for lying on his resume. We hope NASA administrators can see that there was a bigger problem."

NAS Accepts Congressional Request To Referee Warming Dispute. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B4, Regalado, 2.11M) reports, "Seeking to resolve a scientific dispute that has taken on a rancorous political edge, the National Academy of Sciences said it had agreed to a request from Congress to assess how well researchers understand the history of temperatures on earth. The study by the academy, an independent advisory body based in Washington, will focus on the 'hockey stick,' a chart of past temperatures that critics say is inaccurate. … The controversy took a sharp political turn in July when Rep. Joe Barton (R., Texas), head of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, launched a probe into the work of three climate specialists who generated the graph, including Michael Mann, now a professor at Pennsylvania State University. Mr. Barton's inquiry drew a rebuke from several scientific societies as well as fellow Republican Sherwood Boehlert of New York, chairman of the House Committee on Science, who called it a blatant effort to intimidate global-warming researchers. After Mr. Barton didn't respond to an offer to jointly bring the issue to the National Academy, Mr. Boehlert independently asked for a review in November, science committee chief of staff David Goldston said."

VA Has Declined Health Care To More Than 250,000 High-Income Veterans. The Washington Post (2/10, A17, 744K) reports that it has been three years since then-Secretary Anthony Principi said the Department of Veterans Affairs would be suspending health care enrollment "for some higher-income veterans who did not have injuries or illnesses related to their military service. The move to exclude 'Priority 8' veterans was unpopular, but Principi said it was necessary to prevent the VA medical system from being swamped by the rising number of veterans who were eligible for care. … More than a quarter-million 'Priority 8' veterans who tried to sign up for VA health care coverage between January 2003 and October 2005 were turned away because of the new effort to rein in costs," and as many as 10 million of the 16.9 million veterans not enrolled in the VA health care system are Priority 8 veterans, the VA says.

Specter Statements On Swearing Witnesses Contrasted. In a "Verbatim" item, the Washington Post (2/10, A17, 744K) contrasts Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter's statement on declining to put Attorney General Alberto Gonzales under oath this week -- "It is my judgment that it is unnecessary to swear the witness" -- with a Specter statement from April 2005: "During my stewardship here, I'm going to put everybody under oath when we have testimony, as we do on confirmation hearings."

Allen Urges Withholding Lawmaker Paychecks. The AP (2/10, Taylor) reports, "A potential GOP presidential candidate has come up with a familiar way to cater to conservative core voters -- bashing Congress." Virginia Sen. George Allen, "a darling of conservatives, says lawmakers' paychecks should be withheld if they don't pass spending bills on time." He "says that would solve the problem of larding spending into end-of-session bills that sometimes pass without anybody reading them."

Administration Contributing To Growth Of "Faith Based" Social Services. In the Chicago Tribune's "The Swamp" blog (2/8), Mark Silva writes, "For all the hoopla surrounding cuts in Medicare and Medicaid spending, a quieter revolution is taking place in Washington: The advancement of 'faith-based' social services." As President Bush "signed a significant budget-cutting bill today with an audience of congressional leaders in the East Room of the White House, he signed into law protections for religious groups that spend federal money on the social services that they deliver." Legal protection "for many federally financed private groups to hire people of their choosing already had been provided by the Welfare Reform Act of 1996 signed by President Clinton. In the reauthorization of that act, Congress has extended that authority for programs operating under the $17-billion Temporary Assistance to Needy Families through 2010 and also has extended this 'Charitable Choice' authority to his new Marriage and Fatherhood Program." Bush "signed all of this into law today as he approved a Deficit Reduction Act that will rein in the growth of Medicare and Medicaid. The choice provisions were added to the bill."

Senate Confirms Ameriquest Founder As Ambassador To The Netherlands. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Peterson, 958K) reports the Senate confirmed Ameriquest founder Roland Arnall as US ambassador to the Netherlands on an "uncontested" voice vote 16 days after Ameriquest "agreed to pay $325 million to settle allegations of unfair lending practices by regulators in 49 states and the District of Columbia." The vote "brought a peaceful end to a divisive, three-month confirmation process, in which Democrats led by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) had insisted that Ameriquest resolve the allegations against it before they would confirm Arnall."

OTHER NEWS:

Weekly Jobless Claims At Lowest Level In Six Years. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) reports, "A closely watched barometer of joblessness fell to its lowest reading in nearly six years, offering further proof that so far this year the labor market is improving along with the economy." The Labor Department "said the number of workers filing initial unemployment claims last week was 277,000, a figure that pushed the more telling four-week moving average of jobless claims down to 276,500, its lowest level since April 2000." The claims data "provide the latest bit of evidence that strong economic activity is improving conditions for workers."

Stocks Mixed. USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) reports, "Stocks were mostly higher Thursday as a six-year low in unemployment claims and strong corporate earnings encouraged investors. However, the momentum sagged in late-afternoon trading as uncertainty about the economy resurfaced. While weekly first-time jobless claims rose slightly, Wall Street was encouraged that the Labor Department said the four-week moving average fell to its lowest since April 2000." The Dow Jones industrial average "rose 24.73 points to 10,883.35 after gaining 108.86 points Wednesday. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 1.87 points to 1263.78, and the Nasdaq composite dropped 11.11 points to 2255.87." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Patterson, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

Economists Worry Bernanke Could Raise Fed Funds Rate Too High. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Annett, 2.11M) reports economists have "some advice for Ben Bernanke as he takes over at the Federal Reserve: establish your credibility as an inflation fighter. But, at the same time, they have concern that he could take that effort too far." When asked "in the latest WSJ.com forecasting survey which mistake Mr. Bernanke is more likely to make -- raising rates too much or not enough -- three-quarters of economists said he is more likely to lift rates too high." The "challenge is especially acute now. Soaring energy prices have nudged up inflation pressures at the same time the Fed has been steadily lifting rates. Now, Mr. Bernanke must pick the right time to stop the increases." On average, the "economists expect the federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks, to be 4.75% by June and to remain at that level through year-end. That suggests the Bernanke Fed would raise the funds rate from its current 4.5% and then halt the string of increases embarked upon in June 2004, when the funds rate sat at a 46-year low of 1%."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Bernanke faces pressure to answer deficit questions in next week's congressional testimony. 'He ultimately will have to speak out on serious things that affect the economy,' says Senate Banking Chairman Shelby. 'If he doesn't, there will be a void.' With Fed nominees Kroszner and Warsh headed for confirmation, open market committee should be back to full strength at March 27-28 meeting for first time in a year."

Greenspan Draws Fire For Remarks On Economy. The Financial Times (2/10, Beales, Hughes, Balls) reports that "barely a week after leaving the US Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan has been reminded how tricky life can be in the private sector for a man revered as the world's greatest former central banker." Greenspan's "comments at a Wall Street dinner on Tuesday rippled through currency and bond market trading rooms on Thursday, drawing comment not just on what he did - or maybe didn't - say but whether he should have said anything at all." The remarks, "during a talk for bankers and top hedge fund clients of Lehman Brothers, were interpreted as relatively hawkish on the US interest rate outlook, and contributed to a modest rise in the dollar and a decline in Treasury prices." Some observers suggested Greenspan "would have done better to defer his appearances at least until next week when Ben Bernanke, the new chairman, is due to present the central bank's twice-yearly monetary policy report to the US Congress for the first time."

Attorneys Said To Be Biggest Purchasers Of Cell Phone Records. The National Law Journal

(2/10, Baldas) reports, "The sale of cell phone records over the Internet -- a hot topic that recently spurred litigation, legislation and a federal investigation -- has more than a few lawyers nervous." The Journal continues, "Attorneys are among the top customers of the controversial Web sites, according to private investigators, privacy advocates and Web site operators who sell the phone records. … 'Let's put it this way, the legal profession is keeping it alive,' said Rob Douglas, a former private eye turned security consultant who has helped the Federal Trade Commission investigate and prosecute online operators that sell phone records. … 'I've investigated them with the federal government and in private lawsuits ... and in every single case, the overwhelming majority of users of these companies are attorneys,' Douglas said." The Journal adds, "These attorneys include divorce lawyers, who want to know who feuding spouses are talking to; business lawyers, who want to know who their clients' competitors are talking to; and employment lawyers, who want to know if employees are selling any trade secrets. … The online data industry has come under intense scrutiny in recent months, triggering private lawsuits and federal and state investigations."

Conservatives Face Questions About Future Course. The New York Times (2/10, Nagourney, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) writes that "despite the triumph of placing two conservatives on the Supreme Court within four months, leaders of the conservative movement these days seem less celebratory than divided." Conservatives "face internal rifts over polarizing issues and are dogged by a sense that a Republican-led Congress and a Republican president are not taking the nation in the proper direction on some critical matters." Those "fissures were evident" as the Conservative Political Action Conference convened in Washington, with leaders expressing "concern about the loyalty of elected Republicans in Washington to the conservative agenda, complained about the growth of spending in Mr. Bush's latest budget and said they were uncertain, at a time when Congressional Republicans are squirming under the glare of a corruption inquiry, of the future of the movement."

Gingrich Says US Again Looking To Conservatives For Leadership. In a Washington Times (2/10, 90K) op-ed, Newt Gingrich writes, "For over three decades now, American history has been written on the right. The crossroads confronted by conservatives have been America's crossroads, and the path forward charted by conservatives has consistently been the path of the nation. Today, America, and therefore conservatives too -- stand at another crossroads, with another set of historic choices that will determine whether we leave our children and grandchildren a country as safe, prosperous and free as the country our parents and grandparents fought and worked to give us. Throughout the 1970s, Ronald Reagan argued that the choice faced by Americans was not between left and right but between up and down -- down toward 'the totalitarianism of the ant heap' or up toward 'that shining city on a hill.' In the 1990s, conservatives again spoke to the hopes of a broad majority of Americans. … Twice before we've stood at the crossroads, and twice before conservatives have led the way forward to greater safety, prosperity and freedom for all Americans. Today, the stakes are higher than ever before. Our fellow Americans are once again looking to conservatives and asking this question: What are you doing to win the future?"

Sheehan Won't Challenge Feinstein. Reuters (2/10) reports, "Cindy Sheehan, the anti-Iraq war activist whose son was killed in the conflict there, put an end to speculation on Thursday that she would launch a long-shot bid to become a US senator from California." Sheehan, speaking in front of San Francisco City Hall," said she would not run for the office." The AP (2/10) quotes Sheehan saying, "I think I'm more effective on the outside than on the inside."

Steele Criticized For Comparing Stem Cell Research, Nazi Experiments. The Baltimore Sun (2/10, Skalka, 296K) reports that in a discussion of "his position on embryonic stem cell research with Baltimore Jewish leaders yesterday, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said he is 'concerned about the destruction of human life' and made a comparison between the controversial science and experiments done on Jews during the Holocaust." Steele, speaking to a Baltimore Jewish Council board meeting, said, "You of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool. I know that as well in my community, out of our experience with slavery, and so I'm very cautious when people say this is the best new thing, this is going to save lives." The Sun adds Steele's remarks, "which followed a well-received speech about his trip to Israel in November, came in response to a board member's question about Steele's stance on embryonic stem cell research. His answer stunned many in the audience."

Democrats To Pay Homage To Steele During Black History Month Events. The Washington Times (2/10, Miller, 90K) reports, "The Maryland Democratic Party has been relentless in criticizing…Steele in his run for U.S. Senate, but party officials say that won't stop them from paying homage to the conservative Republican during Black History Month. 'Michael Steele is an important figure in African-American history in Maryland. There is no question about it,' said Derek Walker, executive director of the state Democratic Party. 'We should be proud of the achievements of African-Americans, regardless of what party they are from or what their background is,' he said." Steele, "the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, will be celebrated Monday as part of the state Democratic Party's campaign to honor a black Marylander each day this month, Mr. Walker said."

Unions Gave To 48 Maryland Legislators Before Wal-Mart Vote. The Washington Post (2/10, B5, Wagner, Marimow, 744K) reports two labor unions "pushing for legislation that could expand Wal-Mart's health benefits made campaign contributions to 48 members of the Maryland General Assembly in the month before the high-profile vote." The contributions, "totaling more than $36,000 in the run-up to the January vote, came to more than a quarter of the state's legislators from affiliates of the Service Employees International Union and the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, according to analysis of campaign finance reports filed last month." Bobbie Walton of Common Cause Maryland said, "They were obviously trying to get somebody's attention." The Post adds Wal-Mart "retained as many as a dozen Annapolis lobbyists for the fight, which drew national attention, and tried to sway public opinion through radio and newspaper ads." But in "the weeks before the override vote, Wal-Mart made only seven direct political contributions to lawmakers, one of which was returned, according to Maryland State Board of Elections records."

LATimes Promotes Circumcision To Prevent AIDS Spread. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, 958K) says in an editorial that President Bush has been "a reliable ally in the global fight against AIDS, proposing to increase federal funding to about $4 billion next year. With so much at stake, efficiency is vital, and according to a growing body of research, one procedure that is relatively inexpensive and can drastically reduce the transmission of AIDS is male circumcision. Last fall, the first rigorous trial on the subject conducted in South Africa found that circumcised men are 60% less likely to contract HIV."

Putin May Break With US, EU And Welcome Hamas Visit. The New York Times (2/10, McLean, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Pulling away from an agreed American and European policy, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia said Thursday that he was considering inviting the newly victorious leaders of the radical Palestinian Islamic group Hamas to Moscow to discuss solutions to the conflict in the Middle East." Putin said, "Preserving our contacts with Hamas, we are willing in the near future to invite the authorities of Hamas to Moscow to carry out talks." And "Hamas responded favorably on Thursday. 'If we receive an official invitation to visit Russia, we will visit Russia,' said Ismail Haniya, a senior Hamas leader." One "senior State Department official said that the administration was surprised and irritated by Mr. Putin's remarks, but that Russia had assured the United States that there would not be any senior-level contacts with Hamas. Asked about Mr. Putin's statement, the official said, 'Frankly, it doesn't help.'" Although "Putin seemed to catch the Bush administration and some others by surprise, it was not the first time he had voiced such an opinion. In a news conference late last month, after the Palestinian elections, he said Russia had 'never regarded Hamas as a terrorist organization,' and did not rule out financial aid for a Hamas-led government."

The Washington Post (2/10, A15, Wilson, 744K) says Putin's invitation signaled "the first crack in diplomatic efforts to isolate the radical Islamic group as it prepares to form the next Palestinian cabinet." The Post adds, "U.S. officials were caught off guard by Putin's comments and sought clarification from Russian officials." U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs David Welch "noted to reporters that Russia was a member of the quartet and had agreed to the group's stance toward Hamas." Welch said, "These are the principles that were clearly articulated now several times by the quartet and again with Russian participation and agreement. … We would expect that any meeting that occurs with any Palestinian representative, including Hamas, would emphasize these principles."

The Washington Times/Reuters (2/10, Croft) notes, "State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington that the Bush administration has 'contacted the Russian government about what their intentions are.'"

McCormack said, "If there are any contacts between the Russian government and Hamas, we would expect that they would send that very clear message, both in public and private, that is contained in the Quartet statement."

Prosecution Seeks Death Penalty For Beslan Terrorist. The New York Times (2/10, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "A senior prosecutor on Thursday asked a court in southern Russia to sentence to death the only attacker known to have survived the siege of Middle School No. 1 in Beslan in September 2004. The request rekindles a contentious debate in Russia over capital punishment." Deputy prosecutor general Nikolai Shepel "said the gravity of the terrorist siege, which ended with the deaths of 331 hostages, warranted a penalty of death, despite a government moratorium on executions that has been in place since 1996." Shepel's "appeal came only two days after President Vladimir V. Putin reiterated his personal opposition to the death penalty but said he would move cautiously in seeking its final abolition by the Parliament -- years after Russia committed to doing so."

G-8 Meeting Overshadowed By Concerns About Russian Democracy, Energy. The Washington Times (2/10, Mainville, 90K) reports, "A meeting of the Group of Eight finance ministers beginning today threatens to be overshadowed by tensions over President Vladimir Putin's record on democracy and Russia's reliability as an energy supplier." Topics like "Energy security, education, efforts to fight infectious diseases and debt relief for poor countries are all on the agenda. But the tone has been set by Washington's public questioning of Russia's fitness to lead the group and Moscow's prickly response." And recently senior U.S. officials said "they believe Russia is using its control of Soviet-era pipelines to hold down purchase prices in Central Asia while skimming huge profits through corrupt middlemen."

Tax Snafu Halts Russian Vodka Production. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Chazan, 2.11M) reports, "There was an eerie silence last week at ZAO Veda's vodka distillery, one of Russia's biggest. For the first time in its 10-year history, the plant stopped production. Bored workers kept busy by scrubbing down machinery with Ajax." Russia's "entire vodka industry ground to a halt, thanks to a Siberia-size bureaucratic snafu over a new tax on alcohol."

Rice Realignment Expands US Presence In India, China. The Washington Post (2/10, A17, Graham, Kessler, 744K) reports, "China and India have emerged as the big winners -- and Russia and Germany as the top losers -- in the first round of a broad restructuring of U.S. diplomatic posts ordered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." The Post notes, "Of 61 positions slated for elimination in the initial batch, 10 will fall in Russia and seven in Germany. U.S. embassies in several other countries -- Belgium, Poland, Italy, Spain, Ukraine, Japan and Brazil -- will lose two or three posts. All told, 38 of the cuts will come in European nations." Meanwhile, "of 74 new U.S. diplomatic positions, China will get 15, including a dozen at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. India ranks second with 12 new posts, seven of them in New Delhi. And Indonesia is third with five new slots in Jakarta. Other countries that are to receive at least three more U.S. diplomatic slots include Nigeria, Israel, Lebanon, Vietnam, Tajikistan, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela and Nicaragua."

McCain Applauds Bush's Handling Of International Crises. Sen. John McCain said on The Late Show With David Letterman (2/9), "I would say that the biggest challenge we've faced in a long time…is this Iranian nuclear threat. If they acquire weapons -- nuclear weapons, they've said repeatedly they want to exterminate the state of Israel. They will destabilize the Middle East, and we've got a very, very serious challenge on our hands." Asked how the Administration was handling the negotiations with Iran as well as problems over energy with Russia and Venezuela, McCain said, "I think president Bush and Condi Rice are doing a very good job in handling these crises now. I really do."

US Keeping Response To Arab Cartoon Controversy "Low Key." NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 4, 1:50, Mitchell) reported the US "is accusing Iran and Syria of fanning the protests." Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman: "Things like burning down embassies don't happen by accident in Damascus." Mitchell: "State Department official Karen Hughes is in charge of rebutting anti-American propaganda. Hughes last fall:" Hughes: "We have to be more effective, rapid and nimble in responding to rumors and outright lies and misinformation." A State Department war room "is monitoring how Arab media, including blogs, are reporting the cartoon crisis." US officials "say they are deliberately keeping their response low-key to avoid further inflaming the Muslim world."

Danish Prime Minister Defends Bush Administration Response. The New York Times (2/10, Vinocur, Bilefsky, 1.19M) reports Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen tried to shield the Bush administration and some of Denmark's partners in NATO from accusations that they had been tardy and overcautious in coming to Denmark's defense in the crisis, which he attributed more to attempts by Iran and Syria to cause diversions in the Middle East than to a few satirical cartoons." He "declined to criticize the Bush administration about its cautious defense of an ally. President Bush referred to his solidarity with Denmark for the first time on Wednesday, after five days of rioting in the Middle East against Danish interests." Rasmussen said, "I have never doubted that Bush would stand up for Denmark. … He values faithfulness and loyalty. I was not surprised he decided to call me and express support."

Rasmussen Accuses Iran, Syria Of Fomenting Protests. The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Sullivan, 744K) reports Rasmussen "said Thursday that the governments of Iran and Syria had intentionally inflamed Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad to distract attention from their own diplomatic crises." His statement "echoed" recent remarks made by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. He also said he "was pleased with Bush's recent statements condemning violence against Danish diplomatic missions." The Administration's position "on the situation have shifted. Initially, the administration condemned the cartoons as offensive, but now Bush and other officials are stressing their opposition to the widespread violence. Rasmussen said the administration's initial stance on the cartoons 'caused some public debate in Denmark, whether it could be considered a support or not. … We do realize that this is also a balance for the United States.'"

Annan Dismisses Accusation Syria, Iran Behind Protests. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Farley, 958K) reports, "When asked about claims this week by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Syria and Iran had inflamed the controversy and incited protests," Secretary-General Kofi Annan "told reporters that he had 'no evidence to that effect.'"

Annan Chastises Newspapers For Continuing To Print Muslim Cartoons. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Farley, 958K) reports Annan also "chastised newspapers Thursday that continue to publish cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad in the face of the religious controversy the drawings have ignited." Annan said, "This does not mean that I am against freedom of speech, or freedom of the press. … But as I have indicated in the past, freedom of speech is not a license. It does entail exercising responsibility and judgment."

Bush To Proceed With Trip To Pakistan Despite Protests. AFP (2/10) reports, "The White House…insisted US President George W. Bush would go ahead with his planned trip to Pakistan in March despite widespread outrage over the cartoons there. Protesters burned his effigy Wednesday."

First Lady Urges Muslims To Stop Violence. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 4, 1:50, Mitchell) reported that at the Vatican, Laura Bush "discussed the crisis with the Pope." Laura Bush: "I hope that every government, including the governments of the Middle East, will speak out and call for an end to the violence."

ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 6, :20, Vargas) reported, "First Lady Laura Bush is in Italy with her daughter, Barbara, on their way to the Olympics, which start tomorrow. They stopped off at the Vatican today for an audience with Pope Benedict XVI. After exchanging gifts, Mrs. Bush said the Pope expressed concern about violence in the Muslim world over the cartoons of the prophet Muhammad and called for peace and tolerance."

Fox News' Special Report (2/9, Henneberg) reported the First Lady "says it is not necessary for Muslims to get their point across they that were offended." After meeting with Pope Benedict Fist Lady Laura Bush said, "I know that Muslims are offended with these cartoons. And I understand their offense. On the other hand, I don't think violence is the answer. I think it's that everyone around the world needs to speak out and say, let's stop the violence." Reuters (2/10, Holland) and the AP (2/10, Winfield) also report on the First Lady's visit with the Pope.

Hamas Leader Calls For Calm. AFP (2/10) reports, "The radical Palestinian group Hamas joined voices for calm in the international furore sparked by cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed." Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal said Hamas "is prepared to play a role in calming the situation between the Islamic world and Western countries on condition that these countries commit themselves to putting an end to attacks against the feelings of Muslims." Meshaal's conciliatory tone came a day after he warned the Western press was 'playing with fire' by publishing the cartoons which have led to riots around the world."

Hezbollah Leader Encourages Muslims To Protest. CNN's The Situation Room (2/9) reported that in Beirut, "Hezbollah's leader urges Muslims to protest more. Let Condoleezza Rice shut up, he says. As well as Bush and all world tyrants. We're a nation that will not forgive or stay silent. A no-compromise stand from a militant Muslim leader with an influential voice setting his own conditions."

Italians Consider Additional Security Precautions In Response To Muslim Protests. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Williams, 744K) in a front page story on Italian security preparations for the Winter Olympics reports in response to the Muslim protests "Interior Minister Giuseppe Pisanu, Italy's top official for civilian police and the intelligence corps, called an emergency meeting of security officials Monday regarding possible new threats. Pisanu said the riots and protests in the Middle East, Central Asia and Far East countries have been 'carried out coldly with political ends. We mustn't forget that Islamic extremism is an essentially political movement that cynically uses religious values.'" But he also said that "homegrown violence is the most likely problem for the Olympics. 'For the Olympics I fear the rising aggressiveness of anti-globalization protesters, anarchists and all the domestic subversion movements that are pursuing the Olympic spotlight.'" Recently "Italian authorities have deported about 30 Islamic militants they said were inciting violence. … The Italians rely on wiretapping to keep tabs on terrorist suspects and their supporters. Officials say they have 2,000 people under close watch."

Kinsley Says Administration Not Defending Free Speech. Michael Kinsley in his column in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K) writes, "The shameful American position on all this is boilerplate endorsement of free expression combined with denunciation of the cartoons as an 'unacceptable' insult. When three protesters died this week in a confrontation at a U.S. military base in Afghanistan, an American spokesman there said that Afghans 'should judge us on what we're doing here, not on what some cartoonist is doing somewhere else.' But the limits of free expression cannot be set by the sensitivities of people who don't believe in it. How can President Bush continue to ask young Americans to sacrifice their lives for freedom in the Muslim world, if he won't even defend freedom verbally when forces from that world are suppressing it in our own?"

Krauthammer Criticizes "Moderates" For Not Standing Up To Protestors. Charles Krauthammer in his column in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K) writes, "The mob has turned this into a test case for freedom of speech in the West. The German, French and Italian newspapers that republished these cartoons did so not to inform but to defy -- to declare that they will not be intimidated by the mob." The protests "are instruments of intimidation, reminders of van Gogh's fate. The Islamic 'moderates' are the mob's agents and interpreters, warning us not to do this again. And the Western 'moderates' are their terrified collaborators who say: Don't worry, we won't. It's those Danes. We're clean. Spare us. Please."

Muslim Outrage Compared To Racial Sensitivities In US. David Ignatius in his column in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K) compares the Muslim outrage with racial sensitivities in the US, in particular when "you think about American reactions to a word we hesitate even to write for fear of giving offense, calling it instead the 'n-word.'" In response to the Muslim protests, Ignatius thinks "of the American civil rights movement. In the space of my lifetime, America has gone from a country of brutal racism and outright segregation to a place where black folks and white folks pretty much get along." Ignatius concludes, "I want to believe that Muslims and the West are in that kind of transition. We're in the rage phase -- the part of the story where black folks are torching cities, white governors are sending in the National Guard and the problems seem insoluble. But if people keep their heads, we will eventually pass from this crazy moment into a different one where a genuine reconciliation is possible."

International Commentary. In a sampling of opinion from international newspapers on the Muslim protests, USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) reports that in Afghanistan Arman-e Melli writes, "The Muslim and Mojahed people of Afghanistan have the right to demonstrate and make the Western press realize that freedom of speech does not mean insulting the sacred beliefs of other religions. Looking at developments in the country, it is clear that the enemies of our people have exploited the religious beliefs of our people. They have changed the peaceful process of demonstrations into a violent one." Meanwhile, Politiken, in Copenhagen writes, "The acts of violence arise from the internal tensions in Muslim societies; they show the desperation of people who see the world's cultural and economic development passing them by. The escalation of the crisis does not therefore have anything to do with Danish newspaper cartoons, and there is nothing that Denmark could have done to halt this development."

Iranians Said To Blame UK For "Much Of What Goes Wrong." The New York Times (2/10, Slackman, 1.19M) reports, "The idea that Britain is behind much of what goes wrong in Iran is not just a conspiracy theory but also a prism through which to view events. Indeed, America -- the Great Satan itself -- is often portrayed as merely a hapless, muscle-bound child manipulated by smarter, craftier, more deceitful forces in London." And although "many Iranians are adept at poking fun at their Brit-fixation, the prevailing view also serves to complicate already tense relations between London and Tehran over such matters as the Iranian nuclear program. One Western diplomat…said Iranians often raised the specter of 'historical inequities' with Britain in diplomatic meetings." For example, while Western nations were pushing to refer Iran to "the United Nations Security Council for its nuclear activities, Iranian officials accused the British of some recent bombings and deadly plane crashes in Iran."

US Basketball Players In Iran Keep Low Profile. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Vick, 744K) reports, "About 20 Americans play hoops for a living in Iran. They nurture pro careers that might not exist in the States, navigate a culture that offers precious few diversions in public -- though a lot more behind closed doors -- and, as much as possible, avoid politics. Iran is at the center of international concern for its nuclear ambitions and has remained notorious to the United States since 1979, when student radicals took over the U.S. Embassy in a siege that lasted 444 days. But for offshore ballplayers working for a paycheck, Iran is just another stop on an international circuit that quietly counterbalances the NBA's burgeoning import of players from Croatia, Congo and China, to name just the C's."

Iran Seen As Vulnerable To Ethnic Divisions If Attacked. Edward Luttwak, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 958K) writes that the theory that attacking Iran will lead to increased public support for its leaders is flawed because Iran "is not a nation-state but rather a multinational empire dominated by Persians, much as the Soviet Union was once dominated by Russians. Except that in this case, the Persians only account for just over half the population of Iran (making them a smaller proportion than the Russians were even in the final days of the Soviet Union)."

Rift Increasing Between US, Venezuela. The Washington Post (2/10, A14, Constable, 744K) reports, "After an especially ugly week in the hostile relationship between the Bush administration and the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Venezuela's envoy here tried yesterday to salvage some civility, saying his country sought 'mature and rational relations' with Washington and would remain a 'reliable' source of energy to all foreign customers, including the United States." In response, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "responded in kind," saying "Washington was 'open to a good relationship with Venezuela' and hoped for a 'positive one.'" He "said that the two countries were cooperating in the fight against drugs and that the administration was prepared to work with governments across the political spectrum, including those with 'left-of-center' views." Yet "the exchange did little to dispel a growing sense among officials and analysts that the current political breach between Caracas and Washington…is becoming potentially irreparable."

"Populist Leaders" Seek To Create Counterweight To US Power. The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "Some might call it the axle of anti-American populism. With linchpins in Tehran on one end and Caracas on the other, a new brand of international populism is rising by fanning flames of division between Western powers and the 'powerless' of the developing world." Leaders like Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez "are winning points at home by striking a nationalist and anti-American pose. Their method: Use the international stage to rail against what they see as a disconnect between the values espoused by the world's sole superpower and its actions." But in addition to "all their heated rhetoric, the two leaders have a vision for the world, one that seeks to end the 'sole superpower' reality. Beyond simply opposing America's robust exercise of power -- a sentiment increasingly found in the developing world, especially -- their aim is to join political forces to provide a significant counterweight in the international arena." And according to Thomas Carothers, an expert on democracy and rule of law at Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, "Russia's Vladimir Putin also belongs on the list," of those leaders.

Preval Expected To Win Haitian Election. The New York Times (2/10, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "Unofficial electoral results that had been carried in by mules, trucks and helicopters from polling centers across the country appeared Thursday to give an early lead to René Préval, a former president considered a champion of the poor masses and a thorn in the side of the elite." Early returns indicate "that Mr. Préval had won 61 percent of the 15 percent of the votes tabulated from the election Tuesday, including 67 percent of the votes counted so far in the department that includes Port-au-Prince." Although "several of his opponents quietly began to move toward conceding, others cautioned that it was still too early to declare a winner, and the political hostilities that have kept this country near the brink of anarchy lingered in the air." A top "objective of Mr. Préval's government, one of his advisers said, would be to attract more investment from the United States. In the last decade, the adviser said, United States investment in Haiti was less than $10 million, the amount invested in a single year in the neighboring Dominican Republic."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Harman, 61K) reports, "International election monitoring groups have said…that, despite minor irregularities, there was no credible evidence of widespread fraud. 'Having been on the ground in Haiti observing the preparations and the elections, I would say it was a reasonably fair election,' Knowlson Gift, Trinidad's Foreign Minister, told The Associated Press."

Polish Prime Minister Proposes Energy Security Treaty. Polish Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz in an op-ed in the Financial Times (2/10) writes that in response to recent energy disruptions "I want to propose to our partners from the EU and the Nato alliance a treaty on energy security." It "could follow formulas contained in the 1949 Washington Treaty, an agreement that allowed for effective transatlantic co-operation, or provisions of the modified Treaty of Brussels that established the Western European Union in 1948." Marcinkiewicz concludes, "Our president is raising this issue today in Washington and I will shortly present an initiative that expands on this idea. … I am convinced that the latest – unprecedented – curtailment of natural gas supplies to the EU, in one of the harshest winters of recent years, created a sufficient predicament to encourage bold and firm action. An energy security treaty would give us ways and means to provide stability and security that we all wish for."

Friedman Says Bush Energy Policy Endangering World. Thomas Friedman in his column in the New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) writes that "if the Arab world starts to go nuclear, then you will see the crumbling of the whole global nuclear nonproliferation regime." And "with so many nuclear powers, particularly in its primary oil-producing region," the world will "only be a more dangerous and unstable place, compared with the post-cold-war world." For the US, "its leadership task has shifted. If the Bush team continues to let Dick Cheney set its oil policy -- one that will keep America dependent on crude oil -- the post-cold-war democracy movement that was unleashed by the fall of the Berlin Wall will be either aborted, diluted or reversed. If regimes like those in Iran, Venezuela, Syria, Burma, Sudan and Nigeria have the benefit of 10 years of $60-a-barrel oil, whatever democratic tide President Bush thinks he is unleashing will be stymied. The worst regimes in the world will have the most power to support the most regressive political and religious trends." Friedman states, "That's why we need an urgent national effort, starting with a gasoline tax, to move the U.S. economy onto a path of more fuel-efficient cars and renewable energy. If we do it, everyone will follow."

Chinese Monopolies Increasingly Violate US Antitrust Laws. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Wilke, Chen, 2.11M) reports, "As China becomes ever more dominant in manufacturing, its ability to dictate the prices of industrial and consumer products is steadily rising. As a result, Chinese manufacturers are increasingly running afoul of Western antitrust law in products from vitamin C to a mineral used in steel production. These legal struggles could become another point of tension in the U.S.-China relationship, which has been tested by disagreements over matters from textile tariffs to the trade deficit." The Journal notes, "Monopolies remain active in parts of China's economy, even though price-fixing was formally outlawed in 1998. A sweeping new antimonopoly law is being drafted in Beijing. Its adoption has been slowed by squabbling among Chinese government agencies forced to give up the ability to set prices. It isn't clear if the new law would bar price collusion in the vitamin market."

Yahoo Under Fire For Aiding China In Crackdown On Dissenters. ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 5, Vargas) reported, "The Internet giant Yahoo! was facing fierce criticism from human rights advocates tonight. Like its rivals Microsoft and Google, Yahoo! was hungry to do business in China, the world's second largest Internet market. But that means playing by China's rules. For the second time, now, Yahoo! was accused of helping China prosecute Chinese Internet users for exercising free speech." ABC (Tapper) added, "Chinese journalist Shi Tao anonymously e-mailed to pro-democracy Websites examples of press censorship, including government instructions on how to cover the anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre. According to court papers, Yahoo! helped the government trace that e-mail to Shi Tao's computer. He was sentenced to ten years in prison." Another dissident, Li Zhi, "is in prison for exposing Chinese government corruption on a message board. Yahoo! is accused of helping the government identify him, too." Chinese dissidents "in the US expressed outrage." Harry Wu, Chinese dissident: "It's a dirty business. It costs people life. The money is built on their people suffering and blood." Tapper: "Next week, a congressional subcommittee will demand answers." Rep. Christopher Smith: "Profits don't trump human rights. And, unfortunately, they seem to be doing that."

Loss Of Glaciers Said To Be Caused By Global Warming. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 9, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Just before we left the United States for Italy we learned that January was the warmest January ever in all the recorded history of the US and suddenly now, in this region, global warming is a hot issue as well." NBC (Maceda) added, "They are like the jewels of the Alps, the glaciers, thousands of years old. These majestic rivers of ice span the European continent and have been the pillars of its ski industry. Providing year-round skiing in resorts like Val Senales, in the Italian alps. Until now. Global warming, climatologists say, is melting these glaciers. And not slowly. The glaciers, some warn, will all but disappear in 50 years. Already, melting permafrost is threatening glacier ski stations and lifts leaving resort official in a critical race against the elements. And it's a way of life. 80% of those Italian villagers depend on the Senales glacier for freshwater, grazing land for livestock and tourism. So over the summer, something revolutionary was rolled out. Giant strips of white fleece, the size of football fields. An Austrian and Swiss experiment, the polyethylene foil acts like a giant picnic cooler, keeping the sun out and the cold in. And it works. Wrapped glaciers lost just a fraction of their mass. Some even grew. But wrapping a whole glacier? Hardly. At that whopping $70,000 a sheet, only the most vulnerable parts of ski runs can be covered."

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 45

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 45

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Says Domestic Spying Program Should Be A Political Issue. The Washington Post (2/10, A7, VandeHei) reports Vice President Cheney "suggested last night that the debate over spying on overseas communications to or from terrorism suspects should be a political issue in this year's congressional elections." Speaking at the annual CPAC convention, Cheney "said the debate over the National Security Agency surveillance program 'has clarified where all stand' on an issue that has drawn criticism from congressional Democrats and some Republicans." Cheney said, "And with an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security, and how we propose to defend the nation that all of us, Republicans and Democrats, love and are privileged to serve." The Post adds Cheney's "comments reflected the emerging GOP plan to make national security and terrorism the centerpiece of House and Senate elections," but they were the "closest a top White House official has come to calling for the NSA program to be a political matter."

The Washington Times (2/10, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Cheney, "who has issued repeated Shermanesque statements that he will not run for president in 2008, said last night that he may be rethinking his position. Almost." After a "crowd of hundreds gathered at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Northwest gave him a rousing standing ovation before his speech last night, the vice president was moved." Cheney said, "Getting a reception like that almost makes me want to run for office again." As the crowd "again erupted in applause, he cut them off -- 'Almost,' he said loudly, drawing laughter."

McCain Supports Increasing Congressional Oversight Of NSA Monitoring Program. Sen. John McCain on The Late Show With David Letterman (2/9) was asked about the NSA terrorist monitoring debate and whether "any president" can "order wiretaps, and that's just fine?" McCain replied, "Apparently that was the position of the Attorney General but the good news is, seriously, that there's been, in the last 24, 48 hours, there's been a effort to engage and involve the Senate, and the House, and have briefings and get this issue shared with the right members of Congress. I remind you that right after September 11, there was a leak to the media that we were intercepting al Qaeda phone calls. And they shut down. That was a very serious breach of intelligence. And none of us want that to happen again, but Congress has to be briefed, at least key members of Congress, the key members of Congress of which I am not one."

Fox Poll Finds NSA Legislation Has Broad Support. Fox News' Special Report (2/9, Angle) reported, "The push for legislation" to validate the NSA terrorist monitoring program "has lots of support from Republicans and Democrats. The program itself remains popular with the public. In the latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll people were asked if the President should have the power to authorize electronic surveillance without warrants. 54% said yes. Only 40% said no."

Support For NSA Program Rises In AP Poll. The AP (2/10, Shrader) reports, "Bush's campaign to convince Americans that the government's eavesdropping program is essential to the war on terrorism has made an impact: Last month people disapproved, 56 percent to 42 percent. Now it's basically 50-50." Bush "has been particularly successful at making his case to core supporters, including Republicans, white evangelicals and suburban men. Support in each category grew more than 10 percentage points in the last month." The AP adds "public support for the program has grown with the White House's monthlong campaign of speeches and TV appearances to make its case that the monitoring is necessary. According to the AP-Ipsos poll, some 48 percent of Americans now support the administration's program. That's up from 42 percent last month. Half now say the administration should have to get a warrant to conduct eavesdropping, down from 56 percent one month ago. Support for the program grew by 9 percentage points among men, but it dropped 8 points -- to 30 percent -- in the Northeast. … Republican support for the program jumped 14 points to 82 percent. Independent support is up 17 points, to 53 percent. White evangelical support grew by 11 points, to 71 percent."

Former Iowa FBI Agent Warns Senate Probe Could Hurt NSA Program. KIMT-TV Mason City, IA (2/9) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "Former FBI agent Ralph Decker thinks wiretapping is not only legal, it's necessary. He says at least 50 attacks have been stopped by the FBI since September 11th. He thinks the Senate's investigation into the matter could be hurting the spying program." Decker: "I just hope the Senate wakes up because I know the trail of blood would lead right back to the Senate if something does happen and would they claim it? Probably not, knowing them." KIMT adds, "But supporters like Ralph will face an uphill battle since opponents of the wiretapping say spying on American citizens without warrants is not just illegal, it's a violation of their constitutional rights."

More Commentary On NSA Surveillance. Daniel Henninger writes in his Wall Street Journal column (2/10) reports, "Let's start with the one thing we know for sure about the Bush administration's program to listen to al Qaeda's phone calls into and out of the United States: It's dead. After all the publicity of the past two weeks, does anyone think that the boys working on plans for Boston Harbor, the Golden Gate Bridge or Chicago's Loop are still chatting by phone? If the purpose of the public exposure was to pull the plug on the pre-emptive surveillance program, mission accomplished. Be safe, Times Square."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K), "This week the Bush administration was finally forced out of its own pre-Sept. 11 worldview -- and, yes, you read that right. It happened because some brave Republicans stared the president down and said: Stop. Of course, it is the administration that is always accusing its opponents of pre-Sept. 11 thinking." But "for the past five years, President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Karl Rove have been willing to put the national unity required to fight terrorism in second place behind their goals of aggrandizing presidential power and winning elections. Can you get more pre-Sept. 11 than that?"

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) editorializes, "We'd like to thank the Washington Post for publishing a story yesterday that so quickly proved our editorial point of the same day about the folly of putting judges in control of national security decisions. That's what we call service. The front-page story reported that on rare occasion the Bush Administration has used information from the NSA's warrantless foreign-linked wiretaps to seek domestic wiretapping authority from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. This was said to have upset chief FISA judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, and the tenor of the story is that this is one more example of how the warrantless wiretaps are an abuse of power. But the better question is, Who elected Ms. Kollar-Kotelly? The story's real news is that Judge Kollar-Kotelly, and her predecessor Judge Royce Lamberth, took it upon themselves to erect a new 'wall' concerning how intelligence is to be used to protect America. … In any event, why is an unelected judge such as Ms. Kollar-Kotelly making these decisions?"

The Washington Post (2/10, A18, 744K) writes in an editorial that the Administration "would like the debate over its warrantless wiretapping program to divide neatly along partisan, and potentially electorally useful, lines. But some Republican legislators aren't with the program. Their responsible pressure has nudged the administration from its customary highhandedness. The resulting congressional briefings are a good first step, but a framework for real oversight of the surveillance program remains necessary. … Lawmakers don't seem to be deterred by the administration's coolness to a legislative solution -- and they shouldn't be."

More Commentary. The Sacramento Bee (2/10) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clearer than ever this week that the Bush administration is determined not only to continue warrantless electronic eavesdropping, but also to stonewall Congress and the public by saying 'trust us' over and over - and not much else. … Testifying Monday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales fell back on the argument that the president is responsible for protecting the country, and that the Constitution and Congress, in authorizing the president after 9/11 to use force against terrorist groups and states, give him the authority to do it as he sees fit. Even the most innocuous questions from senators elicited mostly platitudes, obfuscation and refusals to answer. Gonzales even said Congress is a full partner in combating terrorism. … 'In the arena of war,' he said, 'it is not true that the president works ... to the exclusion of Congress. Quite the contrary; our framers intended that, in a time of war, both branches of government have a role to play.' … Oh? Presumably that means Congress should be grateful for any scrap of information thrown its way. Key members of Congress - eight in all - have been briefed 'fully,' according to administration officials. But some of those briefed have said the information provided is sketchy and that security rules bar them from spelling out their objections. … Closed hearings could do much to reassure Congress, and indirectly the public, that the administration is not exceeding its mandate while wrapping itself in the flag of national security. If it does have all the authority it needs, then why isn't it willing to make its case to the branch of government charged with making the laws, declaring war and providing the funds to pay for it?"

In a column in the Sacramento Bee (2/10), Cal Thomas writes, "Democrats appeared not to accept Gonzales' testimony that the surveillance is being done legally, preferring to make political points rather than capture and defeat the enemy. … The danger in tinkering with intelligence gathering is that the tinkerers sometimes go too far. In its effort to curtail domestic eavesdropping and foreign spying 30 years ago, a Democratic Congress used the Church Committee findings on illegal domestic surveillance in a way that some analysts believe subsequently curtailed our effectiveness to obtain information vital to the nation's security." Thomas adds, "In his defense of the president's order to monitor limited communications between foreign terrorist suspects and people in the United States, Gonzales listed a number of presidents, Democratic and Republican, dating back to the 19th century, who had used far more invasive and widespread tactics to gather intelligence they believed crucial to defending the nation. … Should the United States be attacked again, the next congressional hearings (assuming Congress survives the attack) will focus on why more wasn't done to protect us. More is now being done and public opinion seems to be fine with it for now, complaints from liberal Democrats (and a few liberal Republicans) notwithstanding."

Goss Says Leaks Of Classified Information Compromise Security. Under the headline "Loose Lips Sink Spies, Porter Goss, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/10, 1.19M), "At the Central Intelligence Agency, we are more than holding our own in the global war on terrorism, but we are at risk of losing a key battle: the battle to protect our classified information. Judge Laurence Silberman, a chairman of President Bush's commission on weapons of mass destruction, said he was 'stunned' by the damage done to our critical intelligence assets by leaked information." The commission "reported last March that in monetary terms, unauthorized disclosures have cost America hundreds of millions of dollars; in security terms, of course, the cost has been much higher. Part of the problem is that the term 'whistleblower' has been misappropriated. The sharp distinction between a whistleblower and someone who breaks the law by willfully compromising classified information has been muddied." Goss adds that "those who choose to bypass the law and go straight to the press are not noble, honorable or patriotic. Nor are they whistleblowers. Instead they are committing a criminal act that potentially places American lives at risk. It is unconscionable to compromise national security information and then seek protection as a whistleblower to forestall punishment."

US Turns Over Three Detainees To Morocco In Wake Of Mueller Visit. Reuters (2/10) reports, "The United States has handed three suspected Islamic militants held at its Guantanamo Bay prison over to Morocco, Moroccan state media reported on Thursday. The three Moroccan men were being detained in Casablanca…for further questioning by an investigating judge, the official news agency MAP reported." Reuters notes, "The extradition was announced two days after U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation head Robert Mueller held talks with King Mohammed on security cooperation between Rabat and Washington. Mueller, who toured the North Africa region to cement the U.S. anti-terror drive, also met Morocco's top security chiefs. 'We knew very well that Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya are working together to fight terrorism,' Thursday's edition of the Moroccan daily al Maghribia quoted Mueller as saying. 'So we must follow up in building our friendly relations with them and create mechanisms to exchange information quickly to prevent new terrorism attacks,' he said."

PATRIOT ACT:

Senators Reach Deal On Patriot Act. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "Senate Republicans who had been blocking a long-term extension of the Patriot Act announced Thursday that an agreement reached with the White House could allow reauthorization of the anti-terrorism law. " At an afternoon news conference, Sen. John E. Sununu "said a bipartisan group of lawmakers had worked out changes in three areas where the legislators thought 'we could do better to protect civil liberties while providing law enforcement the tools it needs.'" White House spokesman Scott McClellan "hailed the agreement, saying that the administration was 'pleased that this important legislation is moving forward.'"

USA Today (2/10, Diamond, 2.31M) says "the compromise allows recipients of 'Section 215' subpoenas seeking business or library records related to a terrorism investigation to challenge in court a requirement that they not tell anyone." It also "scraps a provision that required recipients of "national security letters," which are issued without going before a judge, to provide the FBI with the name of any lawyer they consulted about it. A third element of the deal says traditional libraries may not be subject to FBI requests for information on research done by patrons."

The AP (2/10, Espo) reports, "While there was no immediate reaction from House Republicans, Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, one of the Senate negotiators, said he had been in close touch with the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis." Reaction from the Democrats "was divided. Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, second-ranking in the Democratic leadership, appeared at the GOP news conference. He said the compromise included 'significant progress' toward protecting basic liberties and that he planned to support the compromise." Sen. Harry Reid "said in a statement that the agreement among Republicans 'appears to be a step in the right direction.'" But Sen. Russell Feingold "threatened a filibuster."

The New York Times (2/10, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports the deal may "possibly clear the way for passage of the legislation, which has been bottled up in a dispute over civil liberties," while the Washington Post (2/10, A1, Babington, 744K) runs a story headlined "Patriot Act Compromise Clears Way For Senate Vote." The Washington Times (2/10, Hurt, 90K), however, says "the agreement involving White House officials and top congressional leaders doesn't guarantee approval because most Democrats are still on the record opposing the measure."

Bloomberg (2/10, Bliss) reports, "The measure would still have to pass the House. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner won't comment until he's reviewed details of the accord, said his spokesman, Jeff Lungren."

Reuters (2/10, Cowan) reports, "One change to the law accepted by Senate Republicans and the White House would allow individuals to challenge gag orders when they have been subpoenaed to produce sensitive information on library, medical, education or gun-related records. … Another change would clarify that traditional libraries would not be subjected to special subpoenas, which are not issued by judges, to gain records."

The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (2/10, Distaso) reports, "Sen. John Sununu was pleased with what he called important improvements in the anti-terrorism USA Patriot Act announced yesterday as a compromise between a key group of senators and the White House. … 'I think it's a good package and a step in the right direction and allows us to maintain a bipartisan consensus,' Sununu told the New Hampshire Union Leader in a telephone interview from Washington." The Leader adds, "Sununu announced the deal with the White House on Capitol Hill with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter and three other senators who had held out for changes they felt would protect the legal rights and attorney-client privacy privilege of individuals and businesses under investigation by law enforcement authorities. … Sununu and the other senators said they hope the agreement will clear the way for final passage of the Patriot Act, which has been stalled since December. Congress has extended the existing provisions twice, most recently until March 10."

Judge Allows E-Mail Monitoring Under Patriot Act. CNET News (2/10, McCullagh) reports, "As part of a grand jury investigation that's still secret, the Justice Department asked a federal magistrate judge to approve monitoring of an unnamed person's e-mail correspondents." CNET continues, "The request had a twist: Instead of asking to eavesdrop on the contents of the e-mail messages, which would require some evidence of wrongdoing, prosecutors instead requested the identities of the correspondents. Also included in the request was header information like date and time and Internet address--but not subject lines. … The federal magistrate judge balked and asked the Justice Department to submit an additional brief to demonstrate that such a request would be legal." CNET adds, "Instead, prosecutors asked (US District Judge Thomas) Hogan to step in. He reviewed the portion of federal law dealing with 'pen register' and 'trap and trace' devices--terms originating in the world of telephone wiretapping--and concluded it 'unambiguously' authorizes the e-mail surveillance request. … Though the language may be clumsy, Hogan said, the Patriot Act's amendments authorize that type of easily obtainable surveillance of e-mail. All that's required, he said, is that prosecutors claim the surveillance could conceivably be 'relevant' to an investigation."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Reveals New Details About 2002 Al Qaeda Plot Against Los Angeles Skyscraper. President Bush yesterday revealed the details of a 2002 al Qaeda plot to crash a jet into the Library Tower in Los Angeles, the tallest building west of the Mississippi. The general outlines of the plot had been publicly available previously, but the President disclosed newly-declassified information about the personal involvement of Osama bin Laden in the plot. The New York Times (2/10, Bumiller, Johnston, 1.19M) reports Bush and his counterterrorism adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend, "said that four extremists were recruited from Southeast Asia to carry out the plan, that their leader received training in shoe bombs and that all four had traveled to an undisclosed place after the Sept. 11 attacks to meet with Osama bin Laden and pledge their loyalty to Al Qaeda." Khalid Sheikh Mohammed "trained the leader of the group in building a shoe bomb, similar to the device recovered from Richard Reid, who had tried to set off a bomb in his shoe on an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001." Reuters (2/10, Zakaria) says, "The plot was disrupted with help from two countries in Southeast Asia and two countries in South Asia, Townsend said." On ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 2, 2:40, Thomas), Bush was shown saying, "Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on September the 11th, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed sought out young men from Southeast Asia whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion."

Much of the media coverage looks at the story from a political standpoint, with some suggesting the timing of the disclosure was intended to defuse the furor over the NSA surveillance program or to boost the Republican Party. Some print reports, in fact, carry quotes from anonymous "intelligence" and "law enforcement officials" who downplay the significance of the Los Angeles threat. For example, the Washington Post (2/10, A4, Baker, Eggen, 744K) reports "several US intelligence officials played down the relative importance of the alleged plot and attributed the timing of Bush's speech to politics. The officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to publicly criticize the White House, said there is deep disagreement within the intelligence community over the seriousness of the Library Tower scheme and whether it was ever much more than talk."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Wallsten, Meyer, 958K) reports the details disclosed by Bush "did little to counter skepticism from Democrats and some law enforcement officials who have questioned whether the reported scheme had ever been put into operation before it was thwarted. 'It didn't go,' said one US official familiar with the operational aspects of the war on terrorism. 'It didn't happen.'" The official "said he believed the Library Tower plot was one of many Al Qaeda operations that had not gone much past the conceptual stage. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity, saying that those familiar with the plot feared political retaliation for providing a different characterization of the plan than that of the president."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (2/9, lead story, 2:15, Williams) reported, "The White House says that it was just a coincidence that at this time when the President is under fire for a program of domestic eavesdropping and trying to renew the Patriot Act, he just happened to choose today as the day to talk about a planned terrorist incident in the US that was thwarted and thus never happened." NBC (O'Donnell) added, "The White House had talked generally about this plot before. But today spelled out what al Qaeda's Khalid Sheik Mohammed and this terror suspect Hambali, picked a cell of four operatives, avoiding any Arab recruits." The CBS Evening News (2/9, lead story, 6:35, Axelrod) also reported "today's speech…dovetails with a new White House effort to gain support for its warrantless wiretapping, reversing its refusal to brief Congress on the wiretaps."

ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 3, 1:05, Gibson) reported, "Democrats in Washington immediately began asking -- why is the President talking about this now?" ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "White House officials say the President wanted to emphasize this is a global problem that requires a global response. But Charlie, you know, there is a lot of politics at play here. Republicans hope this war on terror issue is going to be the key to have them keeping control of the House and the Senate in these 2006 mid-term elections. It worked for them in 2002 and 2004. Democrats know this is a serious threat. Yesterday, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton gave a major speech where she warned Democrats can't let Republicans play the fear card. Today, Senator Dianne Feinstein said the President's speech is old news, available on the open record."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/9, Bash) reported, "The vivid new description is part of a Bush effort to justify controversial tactics in fighting terror." CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Forsman) said, "It's a huge story and it's part of an overall message from the White House. … The overall message that for all that trouble since 9/11, the United States has been free of any major terrorist attack. And today, they were driving that home with details saying it hasn't been for want of trying."

Fox News' Special Report (2/9, Cameron) reported Sen. Diane Feinstein "seemed unconvinced of the importance or even existence of the West Coast plot." Feinstein, "I have never seen anything that indicated whether the second wave was bona fide or not. There has been rumors bandied about that it was, but I don't know candidly."

Participants in Fox News' Special Report's roundtable also looked at the politics of Bush's announcement. Morton Kondracke on Fox News' Special Report (2/9) said Bush's speech "was designed to in effect say the menace is there. We're dealing with it. We have dealt with it successfully. So trust me." Fred Barnes said, "It fits with his notion that the most important thing he can do as President is fight the war on terrorism. Also fits with the political interests of Republicans who would rather have terror be the issue than the big issue going into the 2006 mid-term election than say corruption or something like that." Mara Liasson remarked, "I think that this is the President trying to keep people focused on the number one issue for him." Meanwhile, Washington Post reporter Dana Milbank on MSNBC's Hardball (2/9), referring to the President's remarks on the terror threat, "It's something they didn't feel they needed to do before but now they want to do it to boost his ratings on the NSA surveillance program."

Knight Ridder (2/10, Hutcheson) says "the timing of his chilling disclosures…raised suspicion that his remarks were politically motivated. At the very moment that Bush was defending his aggressive approach to terrorism, two of his top advisers were trying to quell a revolt in Congress against his domestic eavesdropping program."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Grier, 61K) reports, "Headlines about possibly illegal eavesdropping activity authorized by the president, plus more bombings in Iraq and revelations about the slow pace of Iraqi reconstruction, have put the Bush team on the defensive this week. In revealing details about an alleged Al Qaeda plot to fly an airliner into a Los Angeles skyscraper, plus insisting that terrorists are weakened and on the run, Bush may be attempting to counter bad news."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Solomon, McKinnon, Rogers, 2.11M) also says "Bush's announcement came as both Republican and Democratic lawmakers are seeking better oversight and regulation of intelligence gathering, after concerns were raised about the National Security Agency's domestic-surveillance activities."

The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Silva, 643K) reports the White House "seemed to underscore both successes in the war on terror and the threat that terrorists still pose. 'We are not yet safe,' said Bush, flanked by paintings of colonial-era Minutemen in a speech delivered in a flag-lined hall of the National Guard Memorial Building in Washington." The Tribune adds, "Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, has told top Republicans that the party's fortunes this year rest on assuring Americans that Republicans are tough on terrorism. And some Democrats have accused the administration of exploiting fear."

Other reports say there is no indication that the NSA intercepts played any role in the intelligence that unraveled the plot. The CBS Evening News (2/9, lead story, 6:35, Axelrod) said "the White House won't go anywhere near this question of whether the eavesdropping program had anything to do with the foiling of this West Coast bomb plot. Won't go anywhere near it. But checking across the government today, we couldn't find one single US official to say that it had." The Washington Times (2/10, Sammon, 90K), however, reports Townsend said that "the US used 'all instruments of national power' to foil the plot."

CBS' Bob Schieffer, meanwhile, suggested that the key information about the plot was obtained through torture. The CBS Evening News (2/9, Stewart) reported, "As detailed as the President got in his speech, US counterterrorism officials got even more explicit with us after he spoke. How serious was Osama bin Laden about a second strike? Officials confirm the terrorist chief had personally set aside $50,000 of his dwindling fortune to bankroll it. And one of the four men recruited to carry it out was already a professionally trained pilot which theoretically put the plot on a fast track." CBS added, "All the indications we have are that they got this information not from any wiretap but from what they called the rigorous questioning of some al Qaeda detainees." CBS anchor Bob Schieffer responded, "Torture." Stewart: "Call it what you will, sir." Schieffer: "But not in this country, someplace else." Stewart: "No sir, in undisclosed locations, as they say."

USA Today (2/10, Jackson, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports "Bush's revelation triggered a blast from Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who said he was surprised by Bush's announcement because the White House had not fully informed him in advance." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "My understanding was that we did reach out to officials in California and Los Angeles to let them know, I think it was yesterday." The AP (2/10, Riechmann) also reports Villaraigosa "complained he first learned of Bush's remarks while watching TV." He is quoted saying, "I'm amazed that the president would make this on national TV and not inform us of these details through the appropriate channels."

The New York Times (2/10, Broder, 1.19M) reports Villaraigosa "said that he had twice written to the White House to request a meeting with the president to discuss security threats to Los Angeles, but that he had received no response. 'I'm mayor of the second largest city in the country,' Mr. Villaraigosa said. 'I have tried to meet with the president at the White House on a number of occasions every time that I've gone to Washington, DC, to discuss specifically this issue of homeland security, and to no avail. Let's be clear about that.'" He also "said that the president's antiterrorism budget had shortchanged a number of potential targets, including Los Angeles."

Bias Against Counterintelligence Blamed For Vacancies In Top Positions. The Washington Times (2/10, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The most senior U.S. government counterintelligence official -- presidential appointee Michelle Van Cleave -- resigned last month after the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive" was incorporated into the DNI's office. "At the FBI, CIA and Pentagon, senior counterintelligence positions are held by acting officials," and the NSC "counterintelligence staff position has been downgraded. … Intelligence officials said the failure to fill the top posts is a sign of bias against counterspying by senior intelligence officials under DNI John Negroponte and at other agencies. It goes against the recommendations of a presidential commission that called improving efforts to counter foreign spying an urgent priority." The Times adds that "a senior U.S. intelligence official" said, "The administration has put out good words, but is showing by deed that counterintelligence is not a priority." However, DNI spokesman Carl Kropf declared, "The DNI is confident that counterintelligence operations are being very effectively conducted across the intelligence community." Kropf "added that the selection process is active and that 'we anticipate that these vacancies will be filled expeditiously.'"

TSA Reportedly Dropping Secure Flight Program. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 2, 1:00, Williams) reported, "The folks who run airport security at the US have scrapped a program called Secure Flight that was supposed to check every domestic airline passenger's name against government watch lists. The reason it is being scrapped we're told after four years and $200 million, the TSA still hasn't figured out how the program would work. Civil libertarians strongly oppose Secure Flight, saying the program could grow into a massive domestic surveillance system all its own."

GAO Says Secure Flight "At Risk Of Failure." USA Today (2/10, Frank, 2.31M) reports the Government Accountability Office said yesterday that the "long-delayed kickoff of" the Transportation Security Administration's Secure Flight program "is 'at risk of failure' and faces an uncertain future." In a report, GAO "criticized post-9/11 efforts to implement the computerized program, which aims to check domestic airline passengers' names against terrorist watch lists and other databases. Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley told a Capitol Hill hearing that his agency is doing its own internal review of the program." Meanwhile, "Senators expressed frustration that the TSA has spent nearly three years and $144 million trying to improve on the current system, which has been criticized for mistakenly singling out innocent travelers as suspected terrorists. The agency is seeking an additional $40 million next year for Secure Flight."

The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) reports, "The newest version of the Transportation Security Administration's proposed system to check the names of airline passengers against terrorist watch lists could be vulnerable to hackers, the agency said on Thursday. The agency's chief, Kip Hawley, told a Senate committee that the long-delayed program, now called Secure Flight, will be delayed again. … At a hearing Thursday before the Senate Commerce Committee, Cathleen A. Berrick, an auditor with the Government Accountability Office, said in testimony that Secure Flight 'may not be adequately protected against unauthorized access and use or disruption.'"

TSA Seeks $10 Million To Combat Turnover. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (2/10, B2, Barr, 744K) reports, "The Transportation Security Administration has been hit by troubling turnover in its screener workforce. One in five full-time security screeners has been leaving the agency, according to the administration's new budget. Half of the part-time screeners have also departed. TSA is seeking $10 million in fiscal 2007 to address what the budget calls 'a high rate of attrition.' … Requests for extra money to deal with staff turnover are unusual, but agencies often try to solve the problem with the help of their Cabinet secretary or the Office of Personnel Management before going to Congress."

TSA Auctions Items Seized From Airline Passengers On eBay. The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 6, 1:00, Schieffer) reported, "If you do a lot of flying, you probably have seen airport security agents taking away all those items that are not allowed on planes." CBS (Orr) added, "It looks like an airport security junkyard. Littered with some of 30 million knives, scissors and tools confiscated at check points since 9/11. And believe it or not, frequent flyers, most of this junk is head for eBay." Mary Beth Ingram "runs the program for Pennsylvania, making $15,000 a month selling the loot from airports in Philadelphia, New York and Boston."

Officials Initially Suspected VX In Senate False Alarm. The Washington Post (2/10, A8, Sheridan, 744K) reports, "The evacuation at the Russell Senate Office Building on Wednesday night marked the biggest nerve-agent scare yet at the Capitol complex, with officials initially fearing that a deadly chemical substance might have been released in the building, authorities said yesterday." US Capitol Police Chief Terrance Gainer "declined to identify the agent that appeared to be indicated by the sensor. But the FBI and other agencies that assisted in the emergency response said they were told it was the VX nerve agent."

DHS, White House Were Warned Of Levee Failure On Night Of Katrina. The New York Times (2/10, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Bush administration officials said they had been caught by surprise when they were told on Tuesday, Aug. 30, that a levee had broken, allowing floodwaters to engulf New Orleans. But Congressional investigators have now learned that an eyewitness account of the flooding from a federal emergency official reached the Homeland Security Department's headquarters starting at 9:27 p.m. the day before, and the White House itself at midnight." In a "recently unearthed" e-mail to the chief of staff of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, sent Monday night at 9:27, FEMA warned that conditions "are far more serious than media reports are currently reflecting. Finding extensive flooding and more stranded people than they had thought -- also a number of fires." Former FEMA Director Michael D. Brown "said in a telephone interview Thursday that he personally notified the White House of this news that night, though he declined to identify the official he spoke to." The Times adds, "Investigators now have the documentation to pinpoint some of the fundamental errors and oversights that combined to produce what is universally agreed to be a flawed government response to the worst natural disaster in modern American history."

The New York Times (2/10, Lipton, 1.19M) provides a more in depth look at some of the documents, which it says "pinpoint some of the fundamental errors and oversights that combined to produce what is universally agreed to be a flawed government response to the worst natural disaster in modern United States history." The documentation provided indicates failures at all levels of government. For example, "An official from the United States Department of Health and Human Services, which is charged with helping evacuate medical patients from disaster areas, asked a Louisiana state health official two days before Katrina landed if the state needed help moving patients out of harms way. The state official turned down the offer." Meanwhile, "Reports that there were major breaks in the levees started on Monday morning, the day Katrina hit. But it would be nearly 24 hours before officials in the Bush administration, including President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, appeared to recognize the severity of what had happened."

Brown Says He Will Answer Questions About Communications During Katrina. The New York Times (2/10, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that though Brown "has declined to answer questions from Congress about his conversations during Hurricane Katrina with top Bush administration officials," he said Thursday "that his position had changed." Brown said, "I feel an obligation to answer any questions they put to me." He "will have that chance on Friday, when he is scheduled to testify to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which is nearing the end of a five-month inquiry on the hurricane. 'The public needs to know the entire picture of what was going on,' Mr. Brown said. … As of Thursday evening, Mr. Brown and his lawyer, Andrew W. Lester, said they had received no calls or letters from the White House urging Mr. Brown to remain silent. The testimony will make clear, Mr. Brown said, that senior administration officials, including President Bush, recognized the severity of the problem in New Orleans in the immediate aftermath of the storm."

The Washington Post (2/10, A7, Hsu, 744K) adds, "Brown could shed light on the White House's lack of awareness of events on the day of Katrina's landfall. Documents released by the Senate show that although the Homeland Security Operations Center reported at 6 p.m. Aug. 29 that no New Orleans levees had been breached, authorities received no fewer than 16 reports to the contrary before then."

Baker Touts Louisiana Recovery Plan. The day after the Washington Post ran an article titled, "The Big Easy? Now It's Limbo Land," Rep. Richard Baker, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/10, Baker, 2.31M) writes, "Louisiana's in limbo. Months after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita destroyed more than 200,000 homes and businesses, little progress has been made toward rebuilding. Nor will it if these properties languish in ruins for years." Baker continues, "Even individuals with resources to rebuild won't when their neighborhood remains decimated. The only answer: Restoring whole communities. To help, I have proposed the Louisiana Recovery Corp., which would purchase property from willing sellers, providing them financial stability to move forward and options to come home." Baker states, "Stronger levees, building codes and insurance requirements would ensure that government and Louisianans live up to their responsibilities and rebuild responsibly."

USA Today Says State, Local Plan Needed To Rebuild New Orleans. Meanwhile, USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) editorializes, "New Orleans and the surrounding area are devastated and need help. Americans want to provide it. But Congress is focused on a scheme that would serve neither the city nor the taxpayers well. Actually, it's less a plan than an exercise in thoughtless political spending — and further proof that Washington can't manage disaster relief." USA Today adds, "The Bush administration wisely opposes Baker's plan, but despite the passage of time, it hasn't proposed an alternative." USA Today states, "New Orleans needs a sound state and local rebuilding plan," rather than "an expensive federal bureaucracy."

SBA Seeks $1.1 Billion To Handle Disaster Loans. USA Today (2/10, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports, "The Small Business Administration, criticized for its slow pace in making disaster loans to victims of Hurricane Katrina, is asking Congress for an additional $1.1 billion in relief money. Though the agency has approved $4.1 billion in loans, most of them to owners of storm-damaged homes, it has paid out just $326 million of that amount." John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, said, "We've given them everything they've asked for. That should get them through it." However, "SBA spokesman Raul Cisneros defended the request, noting that Katrina is the most expensive disaster ever to hit the USA and that requests for additional money have been routine in previous disasters. 'We just don't know' how much such events will ultimately cost, he said."

US Seen As Having Lost Will To Rebuild Following Disasters. USA Today (2/10, Hampson, 2.31M) reports that following the Chicago fire of 1871, William Bross, an owner of the Chicago Tribune, had a message for Wall Street: The fire was not a disaster; it was an investment opportunity. … That was the attitude in Chicago in 1871. And in Galveston, Texas, after the hurricane of 1900; in San Francisco after the earthquake of 1906; at Pearl Harbor after the sneak attack in 1941." However, "In New York City, where terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center, and in New Orleans, where Katrina flooded most of the city, Americans are arguing over how, when and even whether to rebuild. The qualities we associate with recovery from disaster — urgency, unity, determination, imagination — have been eclipsed by indecision, delay and dissension." In a list of explanations for the change, USA Today adds, "New Orleans and Lower Manhattan were on the decline, not the rise." Meanwhile, "Rebuilding after natural disasters always has relied on private capital, not federal aid."

WAR NEWS:

Former CIA Officer Charges White House With "Cherry-Picking" Iraq Intelligence. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Pincus, 744K) reports Paul Pillar, CIA national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, "has accused the Bush administration of 'cherry-picking' intelligence on Iraq to justify a decision it had already reached to go to war, and of ignoring warnings that the country could easily fall into violence and chaos" after the fall of Saddam Hussein. In an upcoming issue of Foreign Affairs, Pillar writes, "It has become clear that official intelligence was not relied on in making even the most significant national security decisions, that intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions already made, that damaging ill will developed between [Bush] policymakers and intelligence officers, and that the intelligence community's own work was politicized." The Post calls it "one of the most severe indictments of White House actions by a former Bush official since Richard C. Clarke, a former National Security Council staff member, went public with his criticism of the administration's handling of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and its failure to deal with the terrorist threat beforehand."

United Iraqi Alliance Narrows List Of Premier Candidates To Two. USA Today (2/10, Jervis, 2.31M) reports the United Iraqi Alliance "has narrowed its field of prime minister candidates to two," Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi. Al-Jaafari "has been criticized as being ineffective during the past nine months as prime minister, said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. Al-Jaafari was not as assertive as his tough-talking predecessor, Ayad Allawi." But he "has gained experience in office and has distanced himself from religious Shiite leaders, Othman said." Mahdi "has a stronger personality capable of bringing different sides to the bargaining table, Othman said. However, he is faulted for being too close to Iraq's religious clerics and viewed warily by some because he once lived in Iran."

Iraqi Infrastructure Remains In Abysmal State. The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Prusher, Levinson, 61K) writes about Iraq's infrastructure woes, where "electricity -- along with water, sewage, and oil production -- has dropped below prewar levels." Before the US-led invasion, "Baghdad was receiving an average of at least 16 hours of power a day. Today, with insurgents targeting power plants and electrical lines on an almost daily basis, the city gets power just four hours each day on average." Iraq "was generating 4,500 megawatts before the US invasion. But by November of last year that generation capacity had dropped to 3,995 megawatts, well below the national demand of 7,000 megawatts." And according to Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction Stuart Bowen, "Iraq's water supply, sewer system, and electrical grid were worse off than once thought."

Iraq Experiencing Internet Boom. On the flip side, the New York Times (2/10, Worth, 1.19M) writes about the burgeoning Internet in Iraq. Three years ago, "the Internet was virtually unknown in Iraq. Today, Baghdad has dozens of Internet cafes like ShreifiNet, which consists of three sparely decorated rooms with a total of 34 computers and a satellite dish on the roof. Most of the cafes also transmit wireless services to home Internet users in the surrounding area for a monthly fee; in parts of central Baghdad there are about 20 overlapping wireless networks. The universal hunger to get online has made computer and Web services one of the few bright spots in Iraq's stagnant economy."

Terrorists Release Video Of Kidnapped US Reporter. A new video of kidnapped Christian Science Monitor freelancer Jill Carroll was shown on Kuwaiti TV today. The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 3, 2:00, Dozier) reported, "The best news we have tonight is that at least as of this last Monday which is the date Carroll gives in her video, she was alive and well and asking that everything possible be done for her release." Some "70 American officials in the hostage-working group are working around the clock to try to figure out who has got her. And Iraqi forces are staging raids almost every night trying to track her down. Her family has said that they are grateful that so many people are working to free her." ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 4, :25, Vargas) reported and NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 5, 1:00, Williams) reported the story in brief segments.

The New York Times/AP (2/10) reports, "The kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll appeared in a video shown Thursday on a private Kuwaiti television channel, appealing for her supporters to do whatever was necessary to win her release and saying, 'There is a very short time.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Daragahi, 958K) describing Carroll as appearing "healthy and composed" said she "punctuated her 22-second message, which she said was recorded on Feb. 2, with a note of urgency. 'There is a very short time,' she said. 'Please do it fast. That's all.'" The video "suggested that Carroll has not fallen into the hands of the most brutal category of kidnappers in Iraq, who have previously beheaded western hostages for political ends." Yet "it remains unclear what the kidnappers still demand in return for Carroll's release."

The Washington Post (2/10, A14, Hernandez, 744K) reports Carroll said "that she had sent one letter in her own hand and was sending another 'to prove I am with the mujaheddin,' Arabic for holy warriors." The Post adds, "The content of the letters Carroll spoke of is unknown. In the broadcast, the newscaster said that one letter Carroll had written would be handed over to authorities. The station said it would not broadcast the letter's contents, according to the Associated Press."

Progress Made In Training Afghan Army. The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Baldauf, 61K) reports, "Increasingly, coalition forces are turning over some of the training to Afghan sergeants like Reza. Fresh recruits learn the basics of how to take protective measures and launch counterattacks, skills that will help them hold their positions in a fight." The Afghan forces are not ready to act without support from international forces which "means that the international presence in Afghanistan will remain crucial for the foreseeable future." But "four years after the Taliban's ouster, there are growing expectations that the ANA will pick up more of the slack in defending the country and providing the sort of security that allows Afghans to trust in their own government and their future."

NATO Leaders Reiterate Commitment To Afghanistan After Protests Over Cartoons. Reuters (2/10, John, Dunham) reports, "NATO defense chiefs pledged on Thursday to expand alliance peacekeeping in Afghanistan despite attacks on their troops triggered by the storm over cartoons depicting the Prophet Mohammad." The NATO leaders "meeting in Italy agreed to check security measures in place for their 9,000-strong International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) mission in Afghanistan, but insisted its expansion to 16,000 troops this year would go ahead as planned."

Rumsfeld Favors NATO Lead On Afghan Security, But Says US To Lead Counterterror Mission. The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Burns) reports, "The United States favors NATO eventually taking full command of the international military effort to stabilize Afghanistan, but that will not include a separate American-led counterterrorism mission against al Qaeda, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday." Rumsfeld said he was "very comfortable" with NATO taking control of the security mission but "drew the line, however, at the counterterrorism mission, which is being performed mainly by U.S. special operations forces."

Violence Erupts In Pakistan, Afghanistan During Shiite Religious Holiday. The New York Times (2/10, Gall, Masood, 1.19M) reports, "Violence exploded in Pakistan and Afghanistan on Thursday during processions by Shiite Muslim worshipers observing the holy day of Ashura. A suicide bombing in northwestern Pakistan killed 23 people and wounded dozens more." And in "Afghanistan, fighting broke out between Shiite and Sunni Muslims during a procession of Shiite worshipers in Herat, the country's third-largest city. The fighting killed 6 people and wounded 120 others, said a senior military official." The Times notes, "Sectarian attacks, including suicide attacks on mosques, have occurred in Pakistan, but such a clash was unexpected in the traditionally tolerant Afghan city of Herat. The violence there was another blow in a country that has been struggling with increasing terrorist attacks, local insurgencies and angry demonstrations in recent days over the publication of satirical cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad."

The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Witte, 744K) reports, "Samina Ahmed, South Asia project director for the International Crisis Group, blamed the violence in Afghanistan and Pakistan on governments that have not done enough to curb Sunni groups that target their fellow Muslims. 'It's not just enough to take action against al Qaeda,' Ahmed said in a telephone interview from Pakistan. 'It's just as important to take the same kind of action against sectarian terrorists.'" Meanwhile, "President Hamid Karzai and religious leaders in Afghanistan appealed for calm, and a delegation of clerics was dispatched from Kabul on Thursday night to try to soothe tensions in Herat."

Holiday In Iraq Peaceful. The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Witte, 744K) also notes, "By contrast, not a single attack on Shiite worshipers marred the day in Iraq. Ashura was banned in Iraq during Saddam Hussein's reign. Since the observance was resumed in 2004, the holy day has been jolted by bombings that have killed hundreds." US military spokesman Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch "said the relative tranquility was 'a tribute to the Iraqi security forces.' He said Iraqi soldiers and police had imposed tight security throughout the country, particularly in Karbala, the focal point of the holy day. In a raid this week, Iraqi troops detained 19 suspects who were apparently planning to conduct suicide attacks on Ashura observances, Lynch said." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Daragahi, Boudreaux, 958K) runs a similar report.

Wounded US Soldiers Face Long Path To Recovery. ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 7, 3:10, Vargas) reported, "A greater percentage of US forces are surviving war injuries than at any other time in history. Which means many more people are living with the lasting effects of war. We have devoted a lot of time on this broadcast to their struggles and their triumphs." ABC (Reynolds) added, "It has not been, nor will it ever be, easy for Sam Ross or B.J. Jackson. Two years ago, we met them they were struggling and they struggle still. Do you feel as though you've adjusted?" Sam Ross: "I'm adjusting. I'm not adjusted." B.J. Jackson: "It's a long, frustrating road. And it's painful." Reynolds: "But outwardly, B.J., whose legs were blown off in Iraq, takes his recovery literally in stride." Today, Jackson is "something of a celebrity as the point man for a veterans' group." Ross "came close to losing his life twice. First, when a bomb exploded in his face in Iraq, taking his left leg and his sight. And then a second time last May when the enormity of his loss almost led to suicide." Alienated "from his family, unhappy with his care, and living alone in his trailer. Then, a man named John Gonsalves called. Gonsalves runs 'Homes for Our Troops,' building house free of charge for severely disabled vets." To Sam, "it's more than a log cabin. Though he cannot see it, he says it feels like home and a better future."

US Improves Veterinary Care For Bomb Sniffing Dogs In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Kraul, 958K) reports Lt. Col. Randall Thompson is one of only "six clinical veterinary surgeons in the U.S. military" and now he "works to save the lives of some of the military's most valued assets: bombsniffing dogs that have been severely wounded in combat. He arrived here in October to open Iraq's first urgent surgical care ward for canines." Prior to his "arrival, injured dogs were shipped to a U.S. base in Germany or to the United States for emergency medical treatment. At best, seriously wounded dogs were out of commission for weeks; at worst, they died during transport to a faraway veterinary facility." But their "talent for sniffing out hidden explosive devices has become crucial to the war effort, so the command changed policy."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

AIG To Pay $1.6 Billion In Accounting Scandal.

The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 4, :45, Schieffer) reported, "New York State Attorney General accused the insurance giant AIG of doing some creative cooking of its books to mislead investors and the government. Today AIG agreed to pay over $1.6 billion, that's $1,640 million to settle the allegations, getting a share of that money will be investor policyholders and 45 states."

DOJ Warns AIG About Settlement Compliance. The Financial Times (2/10, Parker) reports, "American International Group, the world's biggest insurance company, broke the law after entering into transactions that wrongly boosted its reserves and hid underwriting losses, US prosecutors said on Thursday." The Times continues, "The Department of Justice said AIG 'violated federal criminal law' in connection with misleading financial statements issued by the company. … If AIG or any of its employees fail to abide by settlements announced on Thursday with federal authorities, the Justice department warned it could prosecute the company. AIG agreed to pay $1.64bn to federal and state authorities to resolve allegations of accounting abuses and other impropriety. It represents one of the largest settlements involving a public company."

The AP2 (2/10, Powell) reports, "The deal…also requires the New York-based firm to adopt changes in its business practices that will ensure proper accounting procedures in the future. … AIG said in a statement that the settlement was approved by its board 'in the best interest of the company.' … The pact announced Thursday settles a civil lawsuit filed last May by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer with backing from the New York State Insurance Department and the U.S. Justice Department. The Securities and Exchange Commission, which also worked with Spitzer on the investigation, filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously."

Reuters (2/10) reports, "The settlement… ends a long-running investigation of the company, and was widely anticipated. … It does not resolve pending cases against former AIG chief executive Maurice 'Hank' Greenberg and former chief financial officer Howard Smith, who were forced out last spring. Both have denied any wrongdoing."

The New York Times (2/10, Morgenson) reports, "Apologizing for deceptive business practices extending as far back as two decades ago, American International Group, the global insurance giant, reached a $1.64 billion settlement yesterday with federal and state securities and insurance regulators. … The company also agreed to changes that would soften its historically combative approach to business, a trademark of its ousted chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Mcdonald, Pleven) reports, "The $1.64 billion toll is the biggest paid to regulators by any financial-services company in U.S. history. Additionally, the company said it will take a $1.1 billion after-tax charge to boost its reserves by $1.69 billion following an internal review."

USA Today (2/10, Smith) reports, "New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, whose inquiry into insurance industry sales and commission practices led to Greenberg and a wide range of alleged abuses, called AIG 'a solid company that didn't need to cheat. It finds itself in this position solely because some senior managers thought it was acceptable to deceive the investing public and regulators.' … Mark Schonfeld, director of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Northeast Regional Office, which joined the state's investigation, said, 'We have sought to balance AIG's historical misconduct — which was substantial — with its new approach to compliance and cooperation with regulators and law enforcement.'"

Bloomberg (2/10) reports, "The SEC's investigation of AIG began in 2001 with a probe of policies that mobile-phone distributor Brightpoint Inc. allegedly used to manipulate earnings. The agency continued to look at income-smoothing insurance and reinsurance after AIG paid $10 million to settle the Brightpoint case. More than a dozen companies have been subpoenaed by state and federal regulators."

NYTimes Says "Honest Corporate Environment" Key Goal Of AIG Settlement. The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) says in an editorial that after the "settlement yesterday between regulators and the insurance giant American International Group, a lot of attention focused on the dollars: $1.6 billion. It is an impressive figure. But the money should not obscure the higher goal of an honest corporate environment." The "difference between Enron and A.I.G. is that Enron was a house of cards, but A.I.G. was and still is, as New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, put it, 'a solid company that didn't need to cheat.'"

Lay Attorney Questions Enron Witness's Plea Bargain.

The New York Times/Reuters (2/10) reports, "A lawyer for Jeffrey K. Skilling, a former chief executive of Enron, suggested Thursday that a crucial prosecution witness in the trial of Mr. Skilling and another former chief executive, Kenneth L. Lay, did not commit the crimes he admitted to under a plea deal with prosecutors. … The witness, Mark E. Koenig, Enron's former head of investor relations, is the first of several former Enron employees who are expected to testify against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay after striking deals with the government to avoid trials." Reuters continues, "Defense lawyers have said that many of the government's witnesses who reached deals were not guilty but buckled under pressure because they lacked the wherewithal to mount a defense at trial and feared they could face lengthy prison sentences if convicted. … Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, questioned Mr. Koenig about the plea deal, which could send him to prison for up to 10 years for aiding and abetting securities fraud, saying at one point: 'Don't you think this is pretty thin stuff?' … A visibly angry Mr. Koenig replied, 'I don't think it's thin, or else I wouldn't have pleaded guilty to it.'"

The Washington Post (2/10, D2, Johnson) reports, "Koenig…reminded jurors of previous testimony in which he described efforts by the company to meet or exceed Wall Street targets by two pennies in 2000, more than two weeks after the fiscal quarter closed. … 'Frankly, I was afraid these things would come back to me for years,' Koenig said of misleading statements he made to analysts about the health of one of Enron's units. He faces as much as 10 years in prison when he is sentenced."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Emshwiller, Mcwilliams) reports, "Mr. Ramsey asked whether Mr. Koenig had told a friend and former Enron colleague that he had done nothing wrong, or simply made a misstatement during a call with securities analysts. Mr. Koenig firmly denied that he made such comments. Mr. Ramsey hinted that he might call the friend to testify later in the case." The Journal notes, "The line of questioning begun yesterday by Mr. Ramsey is part of a broad defense of Enron's business practices being mounted by the legal teams for Messrs. Lay and Skilling. While Enron, in the more than four years since its December 2001 collapse, has become a synonym for corporate malfeasance, the Lay and Skilling defense teams are betting that they can convince the jury that Enron was a great company felled by an array of outside forces. Prosecutors counter that the two defendants led a years-long scheme to hide numerous problems at Enron, which finally collapsed when some of those problems became public."

USA Today (2/10, Farrell) reports, "The lawyer representing former Enron CEO Ken Lay finally got a chance to cross-examine the government's first witness Thursday, and whiffed. … Shortly after the lunch break at federal court here, attorney Mike Ramsey attacked the credibility of Mark Koenig. The former Enron investor relations chief has pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the prosecution of Lay and another former Enron CEO, Jeff Skilling, on charges of hiding the true state of Enron's financial health from investors in 2000 and 2001. … 'Isn't it true that after you pleaded guilty you told a very close friend and former co-worker that you were not guilty and committed no crime?' he asked. 'Haven't you admitted to Joanie Williamson, sir, that you were not guilty?' Koenig denied telling Williamson any such thing. Ramsey then threatened to have Williamson testify. 'So if she said that (on the stand), she'd be lying, perjuring herself?' Ramsey asked. 'That's right,' Koenig stated defiantly. … Ramsey dropped the subject and immediately began quizzing Koenig about several topics that have yet to be fully introduced through testimony. At each point, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake shut him down."

Bloomberg (2/10, Calkins) reports that Judge Lake "sustained prosecutors' objections to questions by Michael Ramsey, Lay's lead defense lawyer, about off-book partnerships former finance chief Andrew Fastow created to do Enron-related deals. Fastow has pleaded guilty to a fraud charge stemming from Enron's collapse. … Lake did allow Ramsey to cross-examine Mark Koenig, who ran Enron's investor communication unit, about whether Fastow's LJM partnerships caused concern among shareholders. Koenig is in his sixth day of testimony in the trial of former chairman Lay and former chief executive officer Skilling. … 'It was not something our competitors did,' Koenig said about the off-book partnerships. 'It was different, so we got questions about it.'"

The AP (2/10, Hays) reports that Koenig "acknowledged that founder Kenneth Lay had to jump back into nuts-and-bolts management of his company when he resumed the role of chief executive after Jeffrey Skilling resigned less than four months before Enron collapsed in December 2001. … 'He had to get more involved, yes,'… Koenig said in response to cross examination by… Ramsey in his sixth day on the witness stand. … 'He was involved before, but he took on a whole new duty,' Koenig said. Lay remained chairman of Enron throughout 2001, but he ceded the CEO position to Skilling in February that year. Skilling abruptly resigned six months later. … Lay's new duties included a hastily arranged conference call with Wall Street analysts on the day Enron announced Skilling's resignation in mid-August 2001, Koenig said. He said Enron was obligated to make executives available on the call to try to calm any market jitters sparked by the unexpected resignation." The AP notes, "Ramsey's questioning appeared to try to highlight what Lay claimed publicly when he was indicted in July 2004: Lay knew of no skullduggery, and was like a student cramming for an exam when his hand-picked successor as CEO quit."

Judge Declares Second Mistrial In Fraud Case Against Former Cendant Chairman. The New York Times (2/10, Stowe) reports, "For the second time, the fraud trial of Walter A. Forbes, the former chairman of the Cendant Corporation, ended in a mistrial after the jury announced on Thursday that it had failed to reach a unanimous verdict in its 27th day of deliberations." The Times continues, "The mistrial occurs as a similar accounting-fraud prosecution involving Enron is under way. In such complex cases, the jury can sift through hours of expert testimony about arcane financial procedures and the responsibilities of executives only to find itself unable to render a verdict." The Times adds, "Last July, another prosecution for accounting fraud ended in a mistrial in the case of five former executives with Enron Broadband Services when jurors found themselves deadlocked on most charges." Judge Alvin W. Thompson of Federal District Court in Hartford, CT, declared the mistrial after the jury reported further deliberations would be fruitless. The Times continues, "Mr. Forbes, who faced more than 20 years in prison if convicted, betrayed no emotion when the decision was announced but kept his eyes locked on the jury. Asked moments later if he had a statement, he replied, "None," and quickly left the courtroom, followed by his wife, Caryn, and other family members. … A spokesman for Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, said the government had not yet decided whether it would prosecute Mr. Forbes again."

The New York Times (2/10, Norris) reports, "Walter A. Forbes was paid more than $100 million as chairman and chief executive of the CUC Corporation. To hear him tell it, he did not do very much to earn the money. … Operations of the company, he testified at a trial where he faced charges of masterminding a fraud that cost investors billions, were left to others." The Times continues, "He admitted signing quarterly and annual financial statements that turned out to be fraudulent, but said he neither prepared nor read them. … 'We were a public company with thousands of employees, divisions all over the country and all over the world,' he testified. 'I don't think they would have expected me to be reading 10-Q's.' … It was a defense that worked at his first trial, when a jury convicted CUC's No. 2 official but was unable to reach a verdict on Mr. Forbes. And it has worked again. Yesterday, the jury in the second trial was dismissed after it, too, was unable to reach a verdict after 27 days of deliberations. … The jury foreman, Ken Premo, said afterward that he did not feel the accounting issues in the trial had been too complex and thought that Mr. Forbes was guilty. But, he added, 'I wouldn't say it was clear cut.' … If he had been convicted, Mr. Forbes would have faced more than 20 years in prison."

Judge OKs Bristol-Myers $185 Million Shareholder Suit Settlement. The AP (2/10, Agovino) reports, "Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. said Thursday that a judge gave preliminary approval for a proposed $185 million settlement to end a class action lawsuit that alleges the drugmaker artificially inflated its stock price by making false and misleading claims about an experimental heart drug." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler entered preliminary approval of a settlement for the case pending in the U.S. District Court in New Jersey, relating to the drug known as Vanlev, the company said. Vanlev was never approved." The AP adds, "Under the proposed settlement, Bristol-Myers Squibb will pay $185 million to create a settlement fund to pay the claims of certain investors who purchased Bristol-Myers Squibb common stock during the period from Oct. 19, 1999 through March 20, 2002. … Last month, Bristol-Myers announced it had reached a settlement with plaintiff lawyers and had established a reserve to settle the case. At that time, Thomas Dubbs, a plaintiffs lawyer in the case, said he hoped the settlement would act as a deterrent to other companies hiding damaging information."

Traders Seek To Limit Commodity Market Watchdog's Policing Authority. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports the Commodity Futures Trading Commission's "reputation as a toothless regulator has been changing. Spurred by complaints that natural-gas prices have driven up the cost of fertilizer and farming, Congress is working on legislation to allow the CFTC to expand its regulation of energy trading in the commodity and over-the-counter market." Some Wall Street traders, "concerned by a spate of energy-manipulation cases brought by the CFTC, are fighting back. They are working to water down the policing authority of the CFTC, thereby stalling legislation to reauthorize the agency, which has operated without a charter since Sept. 30."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Said "Superiors" Authorized Release Of Classified Information. Lewis "Scooter" Libby claimed he was authorized to release classified information by Bush Administration superiors, according to newly disclosed court documents. While some reports say attorneys for Vice President Cheney's ex-chief of staff are planning to defend Libby by claiming Cheney encouraged him to leak the classified information, the attorneys today denied this claim.

The National Journal (2/9, Waas) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, testified to a federal grand jury that he had been 'authorized' by Cheney and other White House 'superiors' in the summer of 2003 to disclose classified information to journalists to defend the Bush administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case to go to war with Iraq, according to attorneys familiar with the matter, and to court records." The Journal continues, "According to sources with firsthand knowledge, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war. … Libby specifically claimed that in one instance he had been authorized to divulge portions of a then-still highly classified National Intelligence Estimate regarding Saddam Hussein's purported efforts to develop nuclear weapons, according to correspondence recently filed in federal court by special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald." The Journal adds, "Beyond what was stated in the court paper, say people with firsthand knowledge of the matter, Libby also indicated what he will offer as a broad defense during his upcoming criminal trial: that Vice President Cheney and other senior Bush administration officials had earlier encouraged and authorized him to share classified information with journalists to build public support for going to war. Later, after the war began in 2003, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war. … Libby testified to the grand jury that he had been authorized to share parts of the NIE with journalists in the summer of 2003 as part of an effort to rebut charges then being made by former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson that the Bush administration had misrepresented intelligence information to make a public case for war."

The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 2, 2:00, Schieffer) called it "an embarrassing development for the Administration." CBS (Borger) added Libby "testified that his quote, 'superiors' authorized him to leak classified information to reporters. It's a clear arrow pointing to the Vice President." NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 3, 2:00, Williams) reported Libby "reportedly told a grand jury he had permission to leak classified information to reporters to defend the administration's prewar record." NBC (Myers) added that a recent letter from special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "showed that Libby told the grand jury that he disclosed the content of the national intelligence estimate to reporters in June and July 2003 and that he was authorized to disclose this information by his superiors. The letter does not specifically name the Vice President, but Cheney was Libby's boss."

The AP (2/9) reports, "In a Jan. 23 letter to Libby's lawyers, Fitzgerald said Libby also testified before the grand jury that he caused at least one other government official to discuss an intelligence estimate with reporters in July 2003. 'We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the [National Intelligence Estimate] to the press by his superiors,' Fitzgerald wrote." The New York Times (2/10, Lewis, 1.19M) reports the document shows that Libby "was actively engaged in the Bush administration's public relations effort to rebut complaints that there was little evidence to support the claim that Saddam Hussein possessed or sought weapons of mass destruction, which was used to justify the invasion of Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Schmitt, 958K) writes that the "revelation that leaks were authorized comes as the Bush administration has been quick to condemn others for failing to safeguard secrets since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Cheney has been among the most aggressive in lashing out against what officials have described as unauthorized leaks that have gravely hurt the country." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Squeo, McKinnon, 2.11M) notes that while Libby is "facing trial for lying to federal investigators and a grand jury," he "wasn't charged with leaking classified information." The Washington Post (2/10, A8, Leonnig) runs a similar story under the headline "Libby Testified He Was Told To Leak Data About Iraq."

The AP (2/9) reports, "In a Jan. 23 letter to Libby's lawyers, Fitzgerald said Libby also testified before the grand jury that he caused at least one other government official to discuss an intelligence estimate with reporters in July 2003. 'We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the [National Intelligence Estimate] to the press by his superiors,' Fitzgerald wrote." The New York Times (2/10, Lewis, 1.19M) reports the document shows that Libby "was actively engaged in the Bush administration's public relations effort to rebut complaints that there was little evidence to support the claim that Saddam Hussein possessed or sought weapons of mass destruction, which was used to justify the invasion of Iraq."

The Washington Post (2/10, A8, Leonnig) runs a similar story under the headline "Libby Testified He Was Told To Leak Data About Iraq."

Allegations Seen As Damaging To Cheney. David Gergen, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), said the allegations Libby was instructed by Cheney are "significant, if Libby testified that he was authorized by superiors, he was high up. He was the superior. And fingers are going to be pointing at the Vice President himself. We don't know whether he's saying the Vice President versus others. But it really does bring it smack in the middle of the White House now that there were people at the top level of the White House who were telling Mr. Libby to reveal highly classified information in order to rebut critics on the more in Iraq."

CNN legal analyst Jeffrey Toobin said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), "I think it's more of a political deal than a legal deal." Libby's "not charged with unauthorized disclosure of classified information, so this doesn't really help him directly with the charges against him. Politically, it raised a lot of unsettled questions. What right does the Vice President have to authorize anybody to release classified information?"

Former Deputy Independent Counsel Sol Wisenberg, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (2/9), said, "It's not even relevant to the specific charges. The Vice President cannot give you permission to declassify information. The Vice President can't give you permission to violate the National Intelligence Identities act. And the Vice President can't give you permission to go into the grand jury and lie."

Libby Defense Said To Be Similar To North's. Gergen, appearing on CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), said, "Legally it does mean that Scooter Libby may be arguing as Oliver North did earlier, basically a lot of what he did was authorized by superiors. Therefore in the North case, legally he may be a lot closer to acquittal than having thought."

Abramoff Says He Met With Bush Many Times.

The New York Times (2/10, Shenon, 1.19M) reports, "The disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff told a magazine editor in recent days that he had met with President Bush many times and was invited to the president's Texas ranch for a gathering of campaign contributors in 2003." Washingtonian's Kim Eisler said he "had received the information in e-mail messages from Mr. Abramoff, a major Republican fund-raiser who pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to bribe public officials. The messages suggest an effort by Mr. Abramoff to cast doubt on Mr. Bush's insistence that he does not recall the two of them meeting and that whatever contact they might have had was fleeting and for the purposes of a handshake and a picture."

The Washington Post (2/10, VandeHei, 744K) quotes one of the e-mails from Abramoff to Eisler: "[Bush] has one of the best memories of any politicians I have ever met. The guys saw me in almost a dozen settings, and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids." Eisler "confirmed the contents of the e-mail and said he recently provided portions of it to the liberal Web log ThinkProgress because he thought he was dealing with a fellow reporter. The blog posted the contents of the Abramoff-Eisler communication." Reuters (2/9) reports that while Eisler "confirmed their accuracy," he "did not intend them to become public."

Reid Acknowledges "Routine Contacts" With Abramoff Partners. The Washington Post (2/10, A8, Solomon, Theimer, 744K) reports Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid wrote "at least four letters helpful to Indian tribes represented" by Abramoff, and Reid's staff "had frequent contact with the disgraced lobbyist's team about legislation." The activities, "detailed in previously unreported billing records and correspondence," took place "over three years as Reid…collected nearly $68,000 in political donations from Abramoff's firm, lobbying partners and clients." Reid's office "acknowledged having 'routine contacts' with Abramoff's lobbying partners."

McCain Defends Bush's Explanation For Abramoff Pictures. Sen. John McCain, on The Late Show With David Letterman (2/9), was asked about the Administration's explanation for Bush's appearance with Abramoff in pictures at fundraisers. He said, "It is plausible. Every fundraiser gets to have his picture taken. The President is right, he's probably had his picture taken with thousands of people. That's entirely plausible."

Editorial Blasts Removal Of Abramoff Prosecutor. The Buffalo News (2/10) editorializes, "Jack Abramoff prosecutor Noel Hillman may deserve the White House nomination he recently got for a federal judgeship in New Jersey, but the timing is suspicious and the probe into unethical and illegal activities in Washington will suffer." The News continues, "Hillman was chief of the Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity until the nomination caused him to step down. He was deeply involved in the federal probe of activities by super-lobbyist Abramoff and his colleagues, and sat in on the negotiations that led to plea deals in return for cooperation that could reveal which congressmen or agency officials took what in return for favors. Two years of experience are lost, just when the investigation zeros in on its most important targets. … Coincidence? Maybe, if you believe in such things. … Removing an aggressive prosecutor at this point will pass the sniff test only if the Justice Department finds an equally aggressive replacement - or the White House agrees to a special prosecutor. … The current investigation now is tainted, Hillman's experience already lost. … The present probe needs to gain momentum, not lose it - and that means a replacement prosecutor just as independent, aggressive and involved as Hillman, or more so. Otherwise, this nomination stinks."

New York Construction Executive Acquitted Of Paying Bribes To Union Officials.

The New York Times (2/10, Preston, 1.19M) reports, "The president of a New York construction company, who was accused of doing a 'corrupt dance' with greedy union bosses, was acquitted yesterday in New York federal court of paying bribes to union officials." DeFoe Corporation President John Amicucci "was found not guilty of two counts of illegal labor payments after a two-week trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan. … Prosecutors did not present wiretap or other evidence to back up the claims of the union officials that they had been handed cash by Mr. Amicucci, and in return allowed him to fill the most expensive union supervisory jobs on his crews with workers who were paid less than union rates and who were lax in enforcing the rules." The Times adds, "By the end of the trial, it appeared that the union officials had done their best to corrupt Mr. Amicucci, and not the other way around." During the trial, defense attorney Gerald Shargel "brought out, under cross-examination" that key prosecution witnesses, union officials Joseph Rizzuto Sr. and his son Joseph Rizzuto Jr., "only mentioned Mr. Amicucci for the first time to F.B.I. agents months after they began cooperating with the government."

Defense Yet To Decide On Ryan Testimony At Trial. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "Decision day is nearing for former Gov. George Ryan and his lawyers on whether he takes the stand at his corruption trial. On Thursday, outside the presence of the jury, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, said he expects the defense case to wrap up by late next week unless Ryan or co-defendant Lawrence Warner testifies. … Webb has said that Ryan is likely to take the stand, but Thursday he indicated he hasn't made a final decision." The Tribune adds that in testimony for the defense Thursday, former high-ranking secretary of state official "defended a Joliet lease deal in 1995 as in the best interest of the state. Ryan is charged with steering the lease to Warner, who held a hidden ownership in a building…in Joliet and collected $387,500 in the 1990s." The AP (2/10, Robinson) also reports Webb said yesterday that the defense is yet to decide whether Ryan will testify.

At Campbell Trial, Water Executive Testifies About Paris Trip. WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/9, Carnes, King) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday, "Former Atlanta mayor Bill Campbell apologized to his wife Thursday" about his affair with TV anchor Marion Brooks and their trip to Paris. "Campbell's trip came after United Water won a $21 million contract to run the water system in the city of Atlanta. The company invited Campbell to visit its European headquarters." On Thursday at Campbell's corruption trial, "United Water executives testified that they spent $4,500 on Campbell's hotel suite, another $4,500 for a limousine. Witnesses told the jury that Campbell missed a scheduled tour of their waste water treatment plant, and during the four-day trip, spent 2½ hours talking business over lunch. … Campbell's lawyers questioned United Water's former president, David Sherman. 'Mayor Campbell never asked for a bribe, did he,' asked Campbell's attorney. Sherman answered, 'No.'"

Judge Rules Chicago Mob Boss Qualifies For Publicly-Funded Counsel. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Bush, 643K) reports US District Judge James Zagel "ruled Thursday that reputed mob boss Joey 'the Clown' Lombardo qualifies for free counsel and appointed two attorneys to represent him," but "Zagel added that he will revisit the decision if prosecutors show Lombardo…is hiding assets and can afford to pay for his own defense. Zagel approved prosecutors' request to examine the finances of Lombardo's ex-wife and two children to determine if he has access to a 1982 trust he set up for them. … In the meantime, attorneys Rick Halprin and Susan Shatz will represent Lombardo, Zagel ruled." The AP (2/10, Robinson) adds, "Prosecutors said in court papers that 'the FBI has obtained information that after the completion of his parole status on June 15, 2002, the defendant traveled to France for approximately 10 days, arriving in Paris on July 11, 2002, and continuing on to Nice. The defendant flew back to Chicago from France on July 21, 2002,' prosecutors said. 'The government respectfully submits that these facts including a 10-day trip abroad are not consistent with the need for a court-appointed lawyer.'"

US Attorney Adds Drug, Armed Robbery Charges Against "Mafia Cop." NY1 (2/9) reports on its Web site, "The laundry list of accusations against the so-called 'mafia cops' is growing ever longer with new charges of armed robbery and drug use. Former detective Stephen Caracappa and his partner Louis Eppolito already stand accused of eight mob-related murders. Now, the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office says Caracappa admitted using cocaine as an undercover narcotics officer. The person he allegedly told this to is expected to testify at this month's trial. Another witness will say the two held up delis for cash and that Eppolito asked him for money in order to bribe doctors into falsifying a heart condition."

Bank Robber Sentenced To Life For Shooting Chicago Police Officer. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Higgins, 643K) reports, "A former tax preparer who shot a Chicago police officer in the head and held the gravely wounded officer hostage for more than two hours was sentenced Thursday to life in prison plus 132 years." Daniel Salley "was convicted in October of 15 felony charges, including two counts of attempted murder, after a jury rejected his claim that he was the victim of a government conspiracy. Detective Joseph Airhart is "unable to speak, walk or swallow food." The Tribune adds, "When it was his turn to speak, Salley repeated his claims that the government was punishing him for the success of his tax business and that an FBI agent had shot Airhart during the raid. … Airhart, who was assigned to the FBI's fugitive task force, had volunteered to be part of a team sent to arrest Salley after Salley robbed a Southwest Side bank twice in one week, taking more than $250,000." The Chicago Sun-Times (2/10, Thomas) adds that Airhart "was a member of an FBI task force trying to arrest Salley in a series of bank robberies. Salley refused to allow medical treatment for Airhart, keeping federal and local police at bay for more than two hours before he was taken into custody. The AP (2/10, Brummer) notes US Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald "said his office was 'very gratified' by the sentence. … Salley, who acted as his own attorney, was convicted of illegally detaining, assaulting and attempting to murder Airhart, as well as assault and attempted murder of an FBI agent. He also was convicted on several firearms charges and two bank robbery charges."

Two Former New Jersey Officials Plead Guilty To Extortion In FBI Probe. The AP (2/10) reports, "Two former officials in Monmouth County pleaded guilty Thursday to extortion charges, part of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Operation Big Rig investigation." Former Neptune Township Deputy Mayor Richard Iadanza "admitted that he accepted $3,000 from a contractor in exchange for arranging work in Neptune, according to a statement from U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie," and Monmouth County Division of Transportation Operations Manager Joseph McCurnin "admitted he helped facilitate a $1,500 bribe from a demolition contractor to a Neptune Township official." The AP notes, "The two were among 11 then-sitting or former Monmouth County public officials arrested in the federal sting operation in February 2005. They were charged with extorting cash bribes and free work from a contractor who was cooperating with the FBI."

FCC Probing Radio Stations Over Payola Allegations. ABC News (2/9, Ross, Esposito, Walter) reports, "Hundreds of radio stations are under investigation by the Federal Communications Commission in the payola scandal rocking the music industry, ABC has learned. … 'The FCC staff is working with voluminous evidence right now. It's a complicated and wide-ranging investigation.' FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told ABC News in an exclusive interview. … 'This is potentially the most wide spread and flagrant violation of FCC rules in the history of American broadcasting,' Adelstein said. 'We've never seen evidence of such a systematic betrayal of the responsibility of broadcasters.'" ABC continues, "Payola -- or pay-for-play -- is a practice seemingly as old as the recording industry itself. In the past the money went to rogue disc jockeys in exchange for increasing the air play for individual songs and driving those songs to the top of the charts. In the modern version, the money goes to the bottom line of the radio stations and the conglomerates that own them, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … 'We have people in suits coming in with documents rather than cash payments under the table to a DJ,' Spitzer told ABC News Chief Investigative Correspondent Brian Ross." ABC adds, "Several of the largest radio conglomerates in America - the corporate owners of FM radio stations across the nation -- are within the scope of the FCC probe, which was triggered by the two year long pay-for-play investigation by Spitzer and was first reported on by ABC News. … A vigorous investigation by the FCC brings federal regulatory clout, and the specter of criminal prosecution by the Justice Department. … In addition to criminal prosecution any broadcaster in clear violation could face severe sanctions, and in the most blatant cases, the loss of their broadcast licenses, officials involved in the investigation have told ABC."

British Arrest Englishman Suspected Of Killing Wife, Daughter In Boston. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Muskal) reports that Neil Entwistle, "An Englishman wanted in the killing of his wife and baby daughter in their suburban home near Boston," has been "arrested this morning in" a London subway stations and is being "held pending an extradition hearing, perhaps as soon as Friday." Should he be "extradited, he will face murder and weapons charges in connection with the deaths of his wife, Rachel, 27, and their 9-month-old daughter, Lillian."

The Washington Post (2/10, A9, Fahrenthold) adds, "The charges against Neil Entwistle added a new twist to a case whose lurid elements -- failed Internet schemes, a mother and daughter shot side by side, and a police search that missed two bodies buried under bedclothes -- have generated intense interest on both sides of the Atlantic." Entwistle "spent much of the past three weeks at his parents' home in Worksop, England, dogged by British and U.S. media."

US Charges Taiwanese Citizen Of Role In China Jet, Missile Deal. Reuters (2/10, Christie, Eckert) reports, "A Taiwanese citizen was charged in the United States on Thursday with being a covert agent for Beijing, and accused together with a Frenchman of trying to illegally export an F-16 jet engine, Blackhawk helicopter engines and cruise missiles to China." Reuters continues, "U.S. prosecutors in Miami said a federal grand jury had returned a nine-count indictment against Ko-Suen Moo, of Taipei, and Maurice Serge Voros, of Paris. … The indictment alleged that the defendants violated the Arms Export Control Act by trying to export controlled items without a license to China, including the engines, the cruise missiles and air-to-air missiles, the prosecutors said." Reuters adds, "The case follows repeated U.S. expressions of concern about Beijing's strategic intentions as China increasingly pours proceeds from its rapidly expanding economy into its military. … Chinese war capabilities are growing at a pace expected to soon upset a delicate military balance between China and rival Taiwan, which relies on U.S. weaponry to defend itself. … 'This case highlights the national security threat posed when agents of a foreign government seek to illegally acquire and export American military weaponry,' said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. … 'We will continue to aggressively investigate and prosecute foreign agents whose motives and actions are, by definition, detrimental do the United States and our national security,' he said in a statement released by the Justice Department."

US Seizes Truckload Of Fake Olive Oil. The AP (2/9) reports, "More than a discerning palate has determined that thousands of cans of Hermes and San Giovanni brands of extra virgin olive oil weren't quite right. … The U.S. Food and Drug Administration tested the chemical composition of the oil and found it was really less expensive soybean oil, prompting Thursday's seizure. … The U.S. Marshals Service seized 22,700 gallons of oil, imported from Italy, at a trucking company warehouse in Clifton. … 'It is a whole lot of faux olive oil,' said Mike Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie." The AP adds, "The labels on the 3-liter tins in 4,855 cases said the contents were more expensive extra virgin olive oil or pomace olive oil. … Because olive oil is five to six times more expensive than soybean oil, the potential estimated profit is about $105,600, according to the FDA. … 'We will not permit New Jersey consumers to be defrauded,' Christie said in a statement."

Police Say Teenage Boys Were Forced To Rob Maryland Banks. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Klein) reports, "They are bank robbers who didn't want the cash, police say. The scared 14- and 15-year-olds were not looking for a thrill, either, when they walked into banks in suburban Maryland and handed tellers notes demanding money. … They had been snatched by gunmen, taken to the banks and forced by their captors to commit the crimes, according to Prince George's County police." The Post continues, "After the teenagers came out of the banks with the money, the gunmen made off with the take and left the stunned youths behind. … At least four recent bank robberies were committed by three teenagers who later told police they had robbed the banks against their will. Their stories are 'very credible,' said an investigator who did not want to be identified because the case is still open." The Post adds, "The most recent was on Wednesday, when a 14-year-old Landover youth was abducted and then forced to hold up a branch of Chevy Chase Bank in Bethesda, said FBI spokeswoman Michelle Crnkovich. … Police found him walking along Rockville Pike, stained by ink from an exploding dye pack, a device that banks attach to bundles of money to stain bank robbers, making them easier to spot. … The other three incidents occurred in Prince George's, two of them on Jan. 20 and one on Monday."

Former Louisiana Judge Sentenced In Bond Scheme. The AP (2/10, Sayre) reports, "A former (Louisiana) state judge who was tried for allegedly accepting bribes from a bail bonding company was sentenced Thursday to more than four years in federal prison for mail fraud." The AP continues, "Alan Green was accused of taking $20,000 in cash, golf trips and meals from the company in return for reducing the bonds of dangerous criminals to levels they could afford. That way, Bail Bonds Unlimited could collect hefty fees for guaranteeing their court appearances." The AP adds, "Green was convicted of a single charge of mail fraud after being tried on charges relating to the bribery allegations. The jury could not agree on the other charges: four more counts of mail fraud, one of mail fraud conspiracy and one of racketeering conspiracy. … Federal Judge Lance Africk told Green his conduct endangered citizens. 'Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a for-sale sign on your office,' Africk said. … Green apologized for 'impugning the integrity of the bench' but denied taking any bribes, saying he was manipulated through a friendship with an accountant for the company."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/10, Krupa, 257K) adds, "Before delivering a scathing rebuke of Green's exploitation of his post as an elected jurist and slapping him with a $50,000 fine, U.S. District Judge Lance Africk gave Green one last chance to admit that two $5,000 payments he got from the Gretna bail bonds firm were not 'off-the-books' campaign contributions, as Green testified in his June trial, but part of the web of bribery confirmed by nine defendants who have admitted to crimes in the seven-year probe. … 'They were not bribes, your honor, as far as I was told,' Green replied. 'At no time did I believe that they were, in fact, bribes.' Africk then took aim at Green, saying , "Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a 'For Sale' sign on your office and decided to purchase it in order to maximize its profits.'" The Times-Picayune notes, "Green was the 14th defendant to be nabbed by Wrinkled Robe and the only one to risk trial rather than ink a plea agreement with prosecutors."

Director Of Getty Trust Steps Down Under Pressure. The New York Times (2/10, Kennedy, Vogel) reports, "The president of the J. Paul Getty Trust in Los Angeles, one of the world's richest art institutions, resigned under pressure yesterday amid growing questions about his improper use of the trust's money." The Times continues, "The trust said that the president, Barry Munitz, whose travel and expense spending are under investigation by the California attorney general's office, would be required to repay the trust $250,000 and would not be given a severance package. The money was an estimate of what the trust felt

Mr. Munitz owed because of perks, expenses and other costs that should not have been charged to the trust during his eight-year tenure, trust officials said. … 'It's more judgment than it is precise mathematics,' John H. Biggs, the board's chairman, said of the figure, adding that because the attorney general's investigation was continuing, he could provide few details about Mr. Munitz's departure and could not answer other questions about his practices. … He added, however, that 'as far as the Getty Trust is involved, Munitz has resolved these issues' with the payment of $250,000, and that the board did not believe Mr. Munitz did anything improper under the laws that govern nonprofit trusts. … 'He's still at risk that the A.G. may see it otherwise,' Mr. Biggs added, referring to the state attorney general, 'and there's no way that we as trustees can give him any assurance.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Munitz's departure represents a major reversal for one of the most powerful leaders in the art world, who controlled an institution with an endowment of more than $5 billion. The trust's board of trustees — many of whom are Mr. Munitz's friends and allies — had steadfastly stood by him, even as questions about his leadership and about other troubles at the trust mounted over the last several months."

Federal Banking Regulators Seek To Curb Mortgage Lending Abuses. The Washington Times (2/10, Hill, 90K) reports Federal banking agencies, "concerned about the potential for abuses in mortgage lending, are going after the worst practices in the industry." A directive "last month from the Federal Reserve and four other federal agencies targets the proliferation of loans offering interest-only payments for extended periods and adjustable-rate mortgages that offer the option of paying interest only, making a minimum payment each month or adding in principal. That includes about half of all mortgages made last year." Regulators say they "are particularly concerned that some loans not only do not pay down principal, like a traditional mortgage, but they also increase the amount of principal that a consumer must pay by as much as 100 percent through 'negative amortization.'"

Gretzky Recorded On Wiretaps Discussing Gambling Ring. In a story widely-distributed by Knight Ridder, The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/10, Moroz, 423K) reports, "State wiretaps caught hockey legend and NHL coach Wayne Gretzky talking about a sports gambling ring allegedly run by his assistant, former Flyer Rick Tocchet, two New Jersey law enforcement sources confirmed Thursday. As part of a probe into what state law enforcement officials have described as a nationwide, multimillion-dollar illegal bookmaking operation, investigators are looking into whether Gretzky…placed any bets through his wife, Janet Jones, the sources said on condition of anonymity." KRT notes, "Some law enforcement officials quietly predict that federal authorities will step in to investigate numerous possible violations of federal law. Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey, said the FBI had assisted state police 'concerning interstate aspects' of the investigation, but that federal involvement had been minimal so far." USA Today (2/10, Allen, 2.31M) reports Gretzky's wife, Janet Jones, "said Thursday that she never placed a wager on behalf of her husband…and Gretzky said he's 'done nothing wrong, nothing that has to do with betting.'" USA notes, "FBI spokesman Rich Kolko confirmed the bureau was asked Thursday to assist in the case." The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Santi, Mulvihill) also reports this story.

FBI-Led Utah Task Force Touts Identity Theft Investigations. Under the headline, "Task Force Run By FBI Unmasks Identity Thieves," The Salt Lake Tribune (2/10, Manson) reports that as identity theft "started to become more prevalent, authorities set up the Utah Identity Theft Task Force (ITTF), which operates as part of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force. Since its inception in November 2004, 'the task force has been a resounding success,' said Kathy Roberts, inspector in charge of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service's Denver division, which includes Utah. At a recent news conference in Salt Lake City, Roberts and other officials ticked off Utah ITTF statistics from the past 15 months -- 190 investigations launched; 1,366 victims of identity theft identified; about 150 indictments returned with convictions won in 127 of them so far; and more than 25 training sessions held on fraud prevention for law enforcement agencies, community groups and merchants." The Tribune adds, "Identity thieves run the gamut from individuals to members of street gangs to white collar criminals, according to Timothy Fuhrman, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office. Fuhrman and Paul Warner, who recently stepped down as U.S. attorney for Utah to become a federal magistrate, said many thieves are drug addicts trying to support their habit."

Former North Carolina Lawmaker Invokes Fifth Amendment About Campaign Donations. The Winston-Salem (NC) Journal (2/10, Rice) reports, "Former state Rep. Michael Decker took the Fifth Amendment yesterday, citing his right against self-incrimination as he declined to testify about campaign donations he got from optometrists after he switched parties in 2003 to help optometrist Jim Black remain speaker of the House. … 'We have advised Rep. Decker ... to rest upon his Fifth Amendment rights,' David Freedman, Decker's attorney, told Larry Leake, the chairman of the State Board of Elections after Leake called on Decker to testify. The elections board is investigating possible illegal donations from optometrists and the video-poker industry to the Black and Decker campaigns. A federal grand jury is also investigating, and several optometrists said they have been interviewed by the FBI and U.S. Treasury agents." The Journal continues, "Although Black initially testified yesterday that he couldn't recall handling blank checks provided by his fellow optometrists, he later acknowledged to the elections board that he filled in Decker's campaign as the payee on at least three of the checks. … 'I don't remember seeing blank checks - unless they were in an envelope, sealed, with somebody's name on it,' Black said at first." The Journal adds, "Then Leake handed Black a copy of a $4,000 check made out to Decker's campaign from M. Scott Edwards of Murfreesboro, the treasurer of the N.C. Optometric Society, along with two $100 checks from Gary Roach, an optometrist from Morrisville. … Black acknowledged that it was his handwriting that designated Decker's campaign as the payee. But Black and his attorneys argued that the donations were not illegal under state law."

Texas Executes Man For Torture-Killing Of 19-Year-Old Girl. The AP (2/10, Graczyk) reports, "A paroled burglar who claimed he wanted to be a serial killer of minorities was executed Wednesday night for the torture-slaying eight years ago of a 19-year-old mentally impaired woman who once worked with him." The AP continues, "Robert Neville Jr., apologizing profusely, addressed his victim's mother by name as she and her two daughters stood close to the glass with their arms around each other. He expressed love to them. … 'I hope you can find it in yourselves to forgive me and I hope all this here will kind of settle your pain. And I hope the Lord will give you comfort and peace. I just want you to know I am very sorry for what I have done,' he said." The AP adds, "Neville, 31, was the third prisoner executed this year and the first of three over the next 15 days in the nation's most active capital punishment state. … Neville and a companion, Michael Wayne Hall, were condemned for the fatal shooting of Robinson, who was abducted as she rode her bike to work at a Dallas-area supermarket. She was taken to a remote area of Tarrant County where she was shot repeatedly with a pellet gun, then killed with shots from a .22-caliber rifle as she begged for her life. … Hall, 26, remains on death row. He does not have an execution date."

Supreme Court Puzzles Observers With Lethal Injection Decisions. The Washington Post (2/10, A3, Lane, 744K) reports that in the "past two weeks, the Supreme Court stopped two executions in Florida and allowed a lower court to halt another in Missouri -- but the justices allowed three other death sentences, in Texas and Indiana, to proceed." Though "not necessarily contradictory under the law," the court's decisions "have puzzled many on both sides of the debate over capital punishment because in each case the death-row inmate raised a similar issue: the legality of lethal injection as the means for execution." Douglas A. Berman, "an expert in criminal sentencing law at Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law," said, "I am sure the court is trying to apply some sort of sensible standard. But they need to do a heck of a lot better job explaining why." The Post adds the "probable explanation for the court's apparent zigzag is that a majority of the court is ready to consider only a relatively narrow issue related to lethal injection. But because the court generally does not reveal more than a bare minimum of information about how and why it chooses to take up any particular matter, lawyers have only been able to arrive at this educated guess after much litigation."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Judge Questions Viability Of New York City's Gun Litigation. The New York Law Journal (2/10, Perrotta) reports, "Two months after allowing New York City's lawsuit against the gun industry to proceed, a federal judge in Brooklyn suggested Wednesday the suit might be doomed by language in the appropriations bill passed by Congress last year." The Journal continues, "In a brief order, Eastern District of New York Judge Jack B. Weinstein ordered the city to explain why its suit should not be dismissed in light of the new legislation, which bars the use of a federal database that tracks firearms as evidence in civil litigation." The Journal adds, "The Firearms Trace System database is central to the city's suit, which alleges that gun manufacturers sell excess weapons in cities and states with weak gun laws, knowing that unqualified buyers in New York will obtain the weapons through 'straw' purchases. … The city alleges that gun manufacturers know which dealers are selling weapons that are used in crimes, and it had intended to use the database to help prove its case. … Assistant Corporation Counsel Eric Proshansky, the city's lead attorney on the case, said the new legislation would force the city 'to prove this case in a manner that does not require trace data' -- a far more difficult task."

Cornyn Calls For Complete Rewrite Of Asbestos Bill. Reuters (2/9, Cornwell) reports, "A group of Republican senators on Thursday proposed completely rewriting an asbestos bill to allow lawsuits under strict medical criteria rather than create a $140 billion fund to pay victims of the mineral." The new approach was offered by Sen. John Cornyn, "who said he had 14 Republican co-sponsors and hoped to attract Democrats." The proposal "is similar to a bill introduced in the House that would allow asbestos lawsuits to go forward only if claimants met certain medical standards.

He introduced the plan as an amendment to a bill that would halt asbestos lawsuits and create an industry-financed $140 billion fund to pay claims."

Meanwhile, the AP (2/9, Dalrymple) reports that the Senate voted 70-27 to reject an attempt "to keep asbestos cases in the courts, removing one obstacle to the creation of a $140 billion trust fund for paying victims and ending their lawsuits." CQ (2/9, Stern) reports "conservative Republicans" used the vote "to show their unease" with the legislation to establish the fund, putting "26 Republicans, joined by one Democrat, on record as opposing the trust fund concept. And with few Democrats backing the underlying bill, the vote also suggested the measure may ultimately fall short among Republicans as well."

WPost Lauds Asbestos Bill, Calls Reid Opposition "Reprehensible." The Washington Post (2/10, 744K) editorializes, "In a triumph of good sense and bipartisan cooperation, the Senate voted on Tuesday to go forward with a bill that would fix the broken asbestos litigation system. … Some amendment may be reasonable at the margins, but the bill's central idea -- to replace litigation with a $140 billion compensation fund to be financed by defendant companies and their insurers -- must be preserved. … The fact that the bill is being attacked from both directions suggests that its authors, Sens. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), have balanced competing interests in a reasonable manner. Unfortunately, the bill's critics are not always so reasonable. Sen. Harry M. Reid of Nevada, the Democratic minority leader, has complained, 'One would have to search long and hard to find a bill in my opinion as bad as this.' … But the truth is that the bill's main opponents are trial lawyers, who profit mightily from asbestos lawsuits and who constitute a powerful lobby in their own right. … For Mr. Reid to demean this effort in order to fire off campaign sound bites is reprehensible."

FBI Arrests Former Maryland Police Officer Over Racist Threat Letters. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/10) reports, "The FBI on Thursday charged a former police officer with making racial, bomb and anthrax threats after he was fired by" Hagerstown, Md. "The threats began four months after Jeffrey S. Shifler was dismissed in November 2003 for falsifying payroll records, court records said." Shifler "was in custody, authorities said. He was expected to appear Friday in federal court in Baltimore." The AP adds, "Shifler made 14 anonymous phone calls and sent at least nine anonymous letters containing threats, insults or false crime reports, according to a court complaint. The threats targeted police employees and a black city council member, and such institutions as schools and public office buildings. Many letters were on photocopied Hagerstown Police Department letterhead, the complaint alleges."

EEOC Files Fewer Discrimination Charges For Third Straight Year. The AP (2/10) reports, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission filed fewer charges of discrimination against private employers last year for the third straight year." The AP continues, "Commission chair Cari M. Dominguez said the commission's prevention efforts through outreach and training might be responsible but added that other factors, like the economic slowdown, might also be involved. 'We are pleased to see that our proactive prevention efforts may be having an impact,' she said." The AP adds, "Commission field offices filed 75,428 charges in the 12 months ended Sept. 30, down from 79,432, 81,293 and 84,442 in fiscal years 2004, 2003 and 2002, respectively. The average complaint took 171 days to process in fiscal 2005. … During 2005, 77,352 discrimination complaints were resolved, 21.5 percent with a favorable outcome for the individual who complained, up from 19.5 percent the previous two years." The AP notes, "The commission obtained $380 million in compensation for those who complained of discrimination, including a record $271.6 million through mediation and other means short of going to court. … The type of complaints remained relatively unchanged from previous years: Allegations of racial discrimination remained the largest group, 26,740 charges accounting for 35.5 percent of all filings. … Sex discrimination accounted for 23,094 charges or 30.6 percent of all complaints; retaliation, 22,278 or 29.5 percent; age, 16,585 or 22 percent; disability, 14,893 or 19.7 percent; national origin, 8,035 or 10.7 percent; religion, 2,340 or 3.1 percent and equal pay, 970 or 1.3 percent. The total exceeds 100 percent because individuals may allege more than one kind of discrimination in a complaint."

Proposed Changes To New Orleans Bureaucracy Would Need DOJ Nod. The AP (2/9, Simpson) reports, "Hurricane Katrina created a chance to slash the city bureaucracy in New Orleans, which has two elected sheriffs, two elected clerks of court and two separate court systems, a legislative panel voted on Thursday." The AP continues, "The city's population has plummeted since the storm, giving critics the chance to streamline a system, stemming from the 19th century, which gives the city numerous elected positions long seen as redundant. Rep. Peppi Bruneau, a key supporter, urged colleagues to support the change, calling New Orleans' bureaucracy outmoded, time-consuming, antiquated and out of step with the rest of the country. … Without objection, a House judicial committee approved a bill that would combine the city's clerks and sheriffs offices, plus consolidate the city civil and criminal court systems. The bill, backed by Gov. Kathleen Blanco and sponsored by House Speaker Joe Salter, D-Florien, now moves to the House floor for debate." The AP adds, "Separate legislation is aimed at consolidating New Orleans' seven elected property tax assessors into one elected assessor post. That measure awaits debate in the House Ways and Means Committee. … Passage of Salter's bill came after Rep. Cedric Richmond, D-New Orleans, head of the Legislative Black Caucus, said race is one reason the state is moving to slash the number of the city's elected officials, most of whom are black. Many of New Orleans black residents remain displaced — living in other states because of hurricane damage — and Richmond questioned why lawmakers and Gov. Kathleen Blanco were pushing the consolidation now, while black voters are elsewhere, unable to voice concerns about the proposed changes. … Richmond noted that the U.S. Justice Department would need to approve the changes, because Louisiana remains restricted under the Voting Rights Act of 1965, imposed on states with ahistory of election discrimination against blacks."

One Dead, Dozens Injured IN Five Days Of Racial Rioting In Los Angeles Jails. The New York Times (2/10, Archibold) reports, "Five days of racial rioting have left one inmate dead and dozens injured at Los Angeles County jails as blacks and Latinos have taken their conflicts from the streets behind bars, the authorities said." The Times continues, "The latest occurred Thursday when 200 inmates at Pitchess Detention Center, a collection of jails in the northern fringes of the county where most of the violence has occurred, clashed briefly until deputies used tear gas to bring them under control. There were no reported injuries." The Times adds, "On Wednesday night, two dozen inmates were injured in a riot among 300 people that ended after teams of deputies fired rubber pellets. That riot, as well as those that took place Monday and Tuesday, was at the Pitchess center. … Since the worst of the rioting on Saturday, when a 43-year-old inmate was beaten to death, the sheriff's department has locked down all jails, suspending activities and privileges in the system — the nation's largest, with 21,000 inmates. … 'We are convinced it is traced back to an age-old gang war in South Los Angeles,' said Steve Whitmore, a spokesman for the Sheriff's Department. 'It is a small core group of people, and most of the inmates don't want to fight.' … Mr. Whitmore declined to elaborate on a motive for the violence, but members of the clergy and community advocates who met Thursday with inmates said they were told that a gang called the Mexican Mafia had ordered retaliation on black gang members who had apparently attacked Latino gang members in Los Angeles in a dispute involving drugs, turf or both."

Suit Targets Discriminatory Online Ads On Craigslist Website. The AP (2/10, Carpenter) reports, "A federal lawsuit accuses the online site Craigslist of violating fair housing laws by publishing discriminatory classified ads, reviving the question of what legal boundaries, if any, should exist for postings on the Internet. … But legal experts say the lawsuit against Craigslist, a fast-growing online network of classified ads and forums, faces an uphill battle because of laws in place to protect online service providers." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed by a Chicago fair housing group in U.S. District Court on Feb. 3, contends that Craigslist's Chicago site distributed more than 100 ads that violated the federal Fair Housing Act by excluding prospective buyers or tenants on the basis of race, gender or religion. … Among the housing ads cited as objectionable by the Chicago Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law Inc. were ones that read 'NO MINORITIES,' 'Requirements: Clean Godly Christian Male,' and 'Only Muslims apply.' … While it remained unclear Thursday if the suit is the first of its kind, it signifies a burgeoning effort by housing watchdog groups to extend to the Internet the same legal restrictions facing those that publish print classifieds."

Air Force Softens Rules On Religious Expression. The Washington Post (2/10, A5, Cooperman, 744K) reports the Air Force, "under pressure from evangelical Christian groups and members of Congress, softened its guidelines on religious expression yesterday to emphasize that superior officers may discuss their faith with subordinates and that chaplains will not be required to offer nonsectarian prayers." The guidelines "were first issued in late August after allegations that evangelical Christian commanders, coaches and cadets at the Air Force Academy had pressured cadets of other faiths." But evangelical groups, "such as the Colorado-based Focus on the Family, saw the guidelines as overly restrictive. They launched a nationwide petition drive, sounded alarms on Christian radio stations, and deluged the White House and Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne's office with e-mails calling the guidelines an infringement of the Constitution's guarantees of free speech and free exercise of religion."

California Police Kill Carjacker During Gun Battle. The Los Angeles Times (2/10) reports, "A chase and fierce gun battle between a shotgun-wielding carjacker and police ended early this morning when the suspect was cornered and shot dead in Venice." The Times continues, "Santa Monica police Chief James T. Butts said his officers acted 'valorously.' … 'It took a great deal of courage,' Butts said. 'This person has manifested the intent to kill you, and these officers chased him. That's what you expect of police officers in a free society.'" The Times adds, "The incident began in Santa Monica about 5:00 a.m., when a motorist stopped to help what he thought was a driver with car trouble. Instead, the suspect jumped out of a vehicle, pointed a shotgun at the would-be good Samaritan, and commandeered the car. The motorist was not injured. … Butts said officers stopped the car at 7th and California streets, where a gun battle broke out. The man, who has not been identified, fled in the carjacked auto. … About a half-mile later, with police pursuing, the suspect crashed the car in the 1300 block of Electric Avenue in Venice. When he ignored commands to surrender and pointed a shotgun at police, officers opened fire, Butts said."

Noonan Praises King Funeral As Example Of Free Speech. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/10), Peggy Noonan says Coretta Scott King's funeral "was wonderful -- spirited and moving, rousing and respectful, pugnacious and loving." The "old lions of the great American civil rights movement of the 20th century were there, and standing tall." There was "nothing prissy, nothing sissy about it. A former president, a softly gray-haired and chronically dyspeptic gentleman who seems to have judged the world to be just barely deserving of his presence, pointedly insulted a sitting president who was, in fact, sitting right behind him. The Clintons unveiled their 2008 campaign. A rhyming preacher, one of the old lions, a man of warmth and stature, freely used the occasion to verbally bop the sitting president on the head. So what? This was the authentic sound of a vibrant democracy doing its thing. It was the exact opposite of the frightened and prissy attitude that if you draw a picture I don't like, I'll have to kill you. It was: We do free speech here."

NYTimes Criticizes Pennsylvania GOP's Election Bills. The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) says in an editorial that Pennsylvania, "a swing state that will hold some critical elections this fall, is being barraged by legislation, championed by Republican lawmakers, that would raise voting barriers, especially for groups that tend to be Democratic. One measure would institute one of the most restrictive voter-identification laws in the nation, in a state that currently requires only first-time voters to prove their identities. Pennsylvanians -- who have been at the forefront of fairness in voting rights issues — should not allow partisanship to erase that legacy."

ANTITRUST:

Rivals Complain To DOJ About Microsoft's New Vista Software. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Delaney, Guth) reports, "The Justice Department said it has received complaints about Microsoft Corp.'s coming Windows Vista operating system, focusing in part on concerns over the introductory "first-boot" screens displayed on new personal computers and other aspects of the software." The Journal continues, "The government, in a status report on Microsoft's compliance with an antitrust settlement, said an unidentified company complained about the ability of PC makers to customize the initial process of booting up Vista. Some PC makers use those screens to offer broadband Internet access, antivirus and other PC-related services and software." The Journal adds, "The Wall Street Journal Tuesday reported that Hewlett-Packard Co. has tussled with Microsoft over the screens. The PC maker in recent months briefed the Justice Department on those concerns, a person familiar with the matter said. An H-P spokesman declined to comment. The report said that in addition to the first-boot process, 'several industry members' had expressed other unspecified concerns regarding Windows Vista, which Microsoft is expected to begin selling later this year. A Microsoft spokesman said it has worked closely with partners 'to make sure Windows Vista provides flexibility...while remaining faithful to the goal of putting users first.' … The complaints were disclosed as part of a regular monitoring by the Justice Department of Microsoft's compliance with its 2001 antitrust settlement with the federal government. The status report noted that Microsoft's recent decision to license elements of its server software was a 'constructive proposal' in addressing concerns of the plaintiffs in the antitrust settlement. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment further. … Separately, executives at search company Google Inc. asserted in an interview that Microsoft is using its influence over the browser-software market to push its MSN Web-search service to the disadvantage of rivals. Google objects to how Microsoft handles a default search-engine setting in its Internet Explorer 7 Web-browser software, which Microsoft considers part of Vista. A Google spokesman declined to say whether the company had discussed its concerns with the Justice Department."

RIM Plan Would Allow BlackBerry Service If It Loses Patent Fight. Reuters (2/9, Taylor) reports, "Research In Motion unveiled a plan on Thursday that it says will let its BlackBerry e-mail device work even if it loses a patent fight, and said the workaround will prevent a shutdown of service in the United States." Reuters continues, "In an announcement made as the clock ticked toward a February 24 court hearing on U.S. patent holding company NTP Inc.'s request for an injunction to halt U.S. BlackBerry service, RIM also said it was still willing to negotiate a deal. … NTP questioned why RIM simply didn't go ahead and make the software changes for the workaround and argued the BlackBerry maker was trying to bully it. One analyst described the announcement as part of a 'high stakes poker game.'" Reuters adds, "The Waterloo, Ontario-based technology company, whose addictive device has been dubbed the 'CrackBerry' by many users, said it is willing to 'generously compensate' NTP, but called NTP's offer to license disputed technology 'untenable.'" Reuters notes, "The legal battle is heating up ahead of a hearing that could be the final step before U.S. District Judge James Spencer decides whether to impose an injunction granting NTP's request -- potentially shutting off more than 3 million U.S. BlackBerry subscribers. … The U.S. Justice Department has argued against a shut-down, saying NTP has not submitted enough evidence to show government users could be exempted 'without substantial hardship.'"

The AP (2/10) reports, "Although there is currently no injunction in place in the patent litigation with NTP Inc., RIM said it developed the workaround software as a contingency to allow BlackBerry service to continue should the court declare an injunction. … NTP has convinced a federal jury that its patents were infringed by RIM and is asking a federal judge in Richmond, Va., to turn off the network. The judge has indicated he could decide on NTP's request following a hearing scheduled for Feb. 24. … The lawsuit against RIM has drawn objections from the U.S. government and big corporate users who rely on BlackBerry e-mail service."

Mittal Pledges To Honor Union Agreements In Arcelor Acquisition. The AP (2/10) reports, "Germany's biggest industrial union said it received assurances Thursday from Mittal Steel Co. that if it acquires rival Arcelor SA, no labor agreements would be affected." The AP continues, "Meanwhile, U.S. antitrust regulators are looking at Mittal's hostile bid for Arcelor, Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed Thursday." The AP adds, "Mittal Steel Europe Chief Executive Roeland Baan met with union deputy chairman Berthold Huber for several hours to address Mittal's euro18.6 billion (US$22.5 billion) bid for Luxembourg's Arcelor, IG Metall spokeswoman Ingrid Gier said. … Mittal employs approximately 1,600 workers in Germany, while Arcelor employs 14,000."

FCC Says Cable "A La Carte" Would Save Consumers Money. ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 9, 2:10, Gibson) reported, "Federal regulators issued a study that could lead to changes in the cable television industry and what comes into your home. Giving cable customers a chance to pick your channels, a system known as ala la carte pricing, could save consumers a bundle. Consumer groups cheered the findings. The cable industry did not." ABC (L. Stark) added, "More than a year ago, the FCC warned that so-called a la carte or buying individual channels would cost consumers more. But now, the agency says, consumers could pay 3% to 13% less for cable a la carte, with no increase in your monthly bill, if you select as many as 20 channels. Plenty of television viewing, they say, for most Americans -- who tend to watch only 17 out of the more than 100 channels they now get. Supporters say this is all about giving consumers more control over what comes in to the home."

CQ (2/9, Wolfe) reports the report "drew an immediate response on Capitol Hill and could spur lawmakers to consider a bill to create a la carte cable options." Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., "long an advocate for a la carte cable, announced Thursday that he will soon introduce a bill that would offer 'regulatory relief' as a carrot to cable providers who allow consumers the option of picking either a la carte or bundled channels."

Realtors Seek To Stop Bankers From Entering Real Estate Market. The Hill (2/10, Schor) reports, "Congress and the Bush administration are again getting caught in the crossfire of a long-standing turf war between the National Association of Realtors, which bills itself as the nation's biggest trade association, and the banking industry over whether banks can engage in real-estate activities." The Hill continues, "Federal regulators signed off late last year on several bids for real-estate development from large banking chains, alarming the Realtors and reinvigorating the group's push for a bill, co-sponsored by Reps. Ken Calvert (R-Calif.) and Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.), prohibiting banks from 'directly or indirectly' engaging in real-estate activities. Banking lobbyists dismiss the Realtors' claims that the regulators are gradually dismantling existing law. … 'This issue is totally phony. Banks for a long time have been able to own their own real estate,' said Ed Yingling, president of the American Bankers Association. 'The Realtors would like to think it's something new, but it's not.'" The Hill adds, "The Calvert-Kanjorski bill is hardly new to Capitol Hill, having snagged the support of a majority of the House in each of the past three Congresses. But banking lobbyists pushed back last year with a bill of their own that only needed two co-sponsors — House Financial Services Committee Chairman Mike Oxley (R-Ohio) and his ranking Democrat, Barney Frank (Mass.) — to make a splash. … With their bill stalled in both House and Senate committees, the Realtors now are aiming at the Bush administration in their vigorous lobbying efforts against banks involved in real estate. The group has promoted letters this month to new Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, Treasury Secretary John Snow and leaders at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), which has jurisdiction over national banks, asking for a definitive exclusion of banks from the real-estate market. … In a unique twist, the Realtors also have chosen to side publicly with bankers in the fight to prevent retail behemoth Wal-Mart from opening an industrial loan corporation to conduct banking activities. Just as the Realtors fear banks encroaching on their business, bankers want Congress to keep commercial corporations off their turf."

Federal Judge Tosses Antitrust Suit Against Bengals, NFL. The AP (2/10, Kinney) reports, "A judge dismissed Hamilton County's federal antitrust lawsuit against the Cincinnati Bengals and the National Football League on Thursday because the suit was not filed within the four-year statute of limitations." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge S. Arthur Spiegel threw out the suit without getting to the merits of the county's argument that the Bengals misled taxpayers and officials by contending that they needed a new stadium to be profitable and might move if they didn't get one." The AP adds, "Hamilton County taxpayers approved a one-half-cent sales tax increase in 1996 to finance the $450 million Paul Brown Stadium. Commissioners signed a lease with the Bengals the following year. … The antitrust lawsuit was not filed until 2003, three years after the Bengals began using the stadium. … 'To be sure, the lease that Hamilton County enjoys with the Bengals is highly favorable - perhaps egregiously so - to the Bengals,' Spiegel wrote. … He said prior members of the board were aware of allegations that league and its teams wielded unlawful antitrust power to obtain favorable leases, but by not filing suit sooner the chance 'was lost to the passage of time.'"

South Korean Antitrust Regulators Question Intel Employees. The AP (2/10) reports, "Investigators from South Korea's antitrust watchdog questioned some employees at Intel Corp.'s local subsidiary this week as part of an inquiry that began last year, a company spokesman said Friday." The AP continues, "The Korean Fair Trade Commission 'made an unscheduled visit to our offices on Tuesday during normal business hours,' said Chuck Mulloy, legal affairs spokesman for Intel in Santa Clara, California. … 'This is part of an ongoing inquiry that we disclosed in June of 2005,' Mulloy said, adding it was 'not appropriate for us to talk about specifics.' Mulloy said the visit to Intel Korea marked the first time regulators had arrived unannounced."

Reuters (2/10, So-eui) reports, "South Korea, which fined Microsoft Corp. for antitrust violations in December, began investigating Intel in the middle of last year, following similar probes launched by Japan and the European Union. … Intel, the world's largest chipmaker, confirmed on Thursday that FTC officials paid an unscheduled visit to the Seoul office. … The officials talked to Intel staff and took away some documents as part of an ongoing probe, a spokeswoman for Intel Korea said. … 'It will take a while for us to reach a conclusion,' FTC spokesman Kim Joo-hyok said by telephone. … The watchdog had received a complaint that Intel was using its dominant position in South Korea to increase microprocessor sales, Kim said. He declined to say who filed the complaint."

Bloomberg (2/10, King) reports, "Intel is facing a U.S. antitrust lawsuit based on a complaint filed last June by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. European regulators investigating antitrust claims have also raided Intel offices, and Japan's Fair Trade Commission last year told the company to remove a clause from its contracts forcing PC makers to exclusively use its chips."

The San Jose Mercury News (2/10, Ackerman) reports, "Intel first disclosed the Korean inquiry in a regulatory filing in August, stating that Korean antitrust regulators began looking into its marketing and rebate programs in June. … Also in June, rival chip maker Advanced Micro Devices sued in federal court alleging that Intel provided secret and discriminatory discounts. … Today, AMD said in a statement that the 'dawn raids are part of an investigation into Intel's business dealings with four Korean PC makers.'"

Six Charged With Illegally Harvesting Leopard Sharks. The AP (2/10, Goodin) reports, "A church pastor, four men in the aquarium industry and a commercial fisherman have been accused of illegally catching and selling hundreds of juvenile leopard sharks." The AP continues, "An indictment Wednesday charged the men with selling 465 leopard sharks that were too small to harvest to pet distributors throughout the United States, and in The Netherlands and the United Kingdom." The AP adds, "The six defendants were arrested on Tuesday, when the indictment was unsealed. Two pleaded not guilty. The Associated Press was unable to reach the other four. They face maximum penalties of five years in prison, a $250,000 (â‚¬210,000) fine and possible requirement to pay restitution for each count, according to the U.S. Attorney's office. … Seven of the 19 baby leopard sharks confiscated during the two-year investigation died, the U.S. Attorney's office said. Three are on exhibit at the Monterey Bay Aquarium, and nine were returned to the wild in 2004."

Forest Service To Propose Sale Of 200,000 Acres To Fund Rural Schools. Knight Ridder (2/10, Borenstein) reports the National Forest Service will today unveil a plan to "sell up to 200,000 acres of national forest land in 'isolated parcels' ranging from a quarter of an acre to 200 acres, much of it in California." The sale is part of an effort "to raise $800 million over the next five years to pay for rural schools in 41 states, offsetting shrinking revenues from sale of timber from national forests. The Bureau of Land Management also plans to sell federal lands to raise an estimated $182 million over five years."

Interior Department Says Energy Companies Were Slow To Pay Royalties. The New York Times (2/10, Andrews, Romero, 1.19M) reports Interior Department documents show "more than three dozen energy companies fell nearly $500 million behind last year on royalty payments the federal government says they owed for oil and gas extracted from public territory." While "most of that money was later turned over after the government demanded payment, almost $60 million remains in dispute." The companies, "which included major producers like Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips, had claimed lucrative government incentives for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico even though the incentives were not supposed to be available if market prices climbed above certain 'threshold prices.'" The Interior Department, "in a report sent to lawmakers looking into the energy royalty program, identified 41 companies that incorrectly claimed about $493 million in 'royalty relief' during 2004, when prices for both oil and gas climbed to records. The Interior Department said that 38 of the 41 companies quickly paid $435 million in back royalties after it sent out warning letters in December, months after the money should have been paid." But "three companies — Kerr-McGee, Forest Oil and AGIP — continue to protest $58 million in additional payments."

Penalties For Coal Company Safety Violations Small Compared To Other Industries. USA Today (2/10, Frank, 2.31M) reports coal companies "pay some of the smallest fines of any industry for federal violations even as the nation tries to curb one of the deadliest periods in recent coal-mining history, a USA TODAY analysis found." The Federal Government "levied a larger fine — $550,000 — for the 2004 Super Bowl showing of Janet Jackson's breast than it did for the 2001 deaths of 13 Alabama miners in one of the deadliest mine disasters in a quarter-century. And the $435,000 fine against mine operator Jim Walter Resources was cut by a judge to $3,000." Federal law limits "fines to $60,000 for each violation of a mine health and safety standard." USA adds the Bush Administration "has said that higher fines are not as effective as forcing companies to close unsafe areas until they are fixed."

Panel Backs Administration Plan For Transporting Nuclear Waste. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Fialka, 2.11M) reports a panel "of scientists, engineers and other experts endorsed the Energy Department's plans to ship tens of thousands of tons of nuclear waste for disposal in Nevada, saying they pose 'no fundamental technical barriers' and relatively low and manageable risks." The panel was "organized by the National Research Council, an arm of the National Academy of Sciences," and its study was "the first major outside study of the government's plans for waste removal, which will take two decades and involve transportation routes through or near many population centers." The panel's report "gives a boost to administration proposals to spur nuclear power by moving spent nuclear-power-plant fuel from 70 sites in 31 states and to minimize waste-storage needs by reprocessing some elements from spent fuel. The Yucca Mountain disposal site, located 90 miles from Las Vegas, would also receive high-level nuclear-weapons waste from four government sites."

WSJournal Praises WTO Decision On Genetically Modified Food. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) editorializes, "Frankenstein is finally dead, or at least his political imitators are. That good news comes from the World Trade Organization, which struck a blow for science over scare-mongers by ruling this week against Europe's attempt to ban genetically modified food." The EU "can accurately say its review process for new GMOs, which is stricter and slower than that used in the U.S., wasn't struck down. However, the panel said a clear review process has to be in place, and one not based on junk science. That means no more moratoriums on approving new GMOs such as that imposed by Brussels from 1998 to 2003."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Handprint Could Be Key Evidence In Alabama Church Fire Probe. CNN.com (2/10, Dornin) reports, "Investigators looking into the fires at nine Baptist churches in Alabama over the past week are hoping a handprint left on one church's front door may help catch a perpetrator." CNN continues, "The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives would not indicate whether its agents were able to lift a readable fingerprint from the inside part of the front door at Dancy First Baptist Church, south of Aliceville in Pickens County. … Arsonists entered the church by kicking in a back door, then set a fire near the pulpit before trying to escape through the front door, authorities said. … However, the front door had a dead-bolt lock, and the arsonists had to exit through the back door, where police said they found a footprint that might have come from someone kicking the door." CNN adds, "Nine churches -- five with predominantly African-American congregations and four with predominantly white ones -- have been set ablaze in the past week in central and western Alabama. Nobody has been injured. … More than 100 ATF personnel, including special agents and forensic experts, are investigating the fires. A criminal and geographical profiler also has been called in. … The ATF has said witnesses have reported seeing a dark-colored SUV near some of the fires. But it is not clear if the vehicle is linked to the blazes."

DOJ_NMG_0013722

The New York Times (2/10, Lyman) reports that "as investigators sift the rubble after nine church fires across rural Alabama in the last week, all suspected arsons, the evidence they are finding and the pattern of the attacks suggest that those behind the arsons were either locals or, at the very least, frequent-enough visitors to cherry-pick the most vulnerable and remote churches and drive the region's coal-dark roads at night with brazen efficiency." The Times continues, "Five churches, including Ashby Baptist, were set on fire just before dawn last Friday in rural Bibb County, about an hour south of Birmingham. They were all Baptist churches, four with predominantly white congregations and one with a black congregation. … Then, early Tuesday, four more churches — all Baptist and, this time, all black congregations — were hit on a long stretch of country highways in more rural counties along Alabama's western edge." The Times adds, "Although investigators say they have reached no firm conclusions about who might be behind the arsons, they point to strong similarities between the two strings of attacks. In both cases, the churches tended to be the most secluded; indeed, in Bibb County, the arsonists passed by several churches beside the highway to seek out those tucked deep into the pine woods."

Maryland Man Sentenced To 30 Years For Oxycontin Distribution. The Baltimore Sun (2/10, 296K) reports Oliver Clifton Hudson of Baltimore was sentenced Thursday "to 30 years in prison for distributing Oxycontin and engaging in health-care fraud." Hudson "and his co-defendant, Gregory Wayne Banks…were convicted in federal court Nov. 7. Both claimed to not be subject to the jurisdiction of the court and were removed from the courtroom after they refused to participate in the trial, according to court documents." Banks is scheduled for sentencing today. " The Sun notes, "The defendants sent 'runners' to various pharmacies with the prescriptions and made themselves available by telephone -- posing as health clinic officials -- to answer questions from pharmacy employees seeking verification for the prescriptions, officials said. … Once obtained, the oxycodone prescriptions were ultimately resold on the street. Officials said the defendants sold more than 41,000 oxycodone pills using this scheme.

Two San Diego City Employees Arrested, Accused Of Dealing Marijuana. The AP (2/9) reports that San Diego officials "have launched an investigation into illegal activity by city employees after two workers from the Park and Recreation Department were arrested on suspicion of drug possession and sales. The employees, who are brothers, were arrested Jan. 25 as part of a broader Drug Enforcement Administration Investigation, authorities said. They are accused of dealing marijuana out of a Park and Recreation vehicle and had been under surveillance."

Reporting Continues On The National Survey On Drug Use and Health. There was wide media coverage of the survey results, with more than 200 news outlets publishing stories on the results in their newspapers and/or posting them on their Web sites. For example, The AP (2/10, Matthews) reports, "In a reversal of past trends, teenage girls are trying marijuana, alcohol and cigarettes at higher rates than boys, the White House drug czar said Thursday. The findings from a new government analysis come even as teen drug use is declining overall. The National Survey on Drug Use and Health, released by John Walters, the national drug policy director, indicates 1.5 million girls ages 12 to 17 started drinking alcohol in 2004, the most recent year for which data is available. That compares with 1.28 million boys. … 'This is the first time that we've recorded this kind of relationship between boys' and girls' drug use,' said Walters. 'In the past, boys have had higher rates of use _ and significantly higher rates of use at certain times in the past.' Overall illicit drug use among youths 12 to 17 has declined 19 percent since 2001, according to the survey. 'In order to drive it down further, we have to deal with today's substance abuse reality, and today's reality is, girls have been using at higher rates than boys in critical areas,' Walters said. More than 100 news outlets used the AP story, including CBS News, FOX News, MSNBC, Forbes, The Washington Post, San Diego Union-Tribune, Houston Chronicle, Miami Herald, Baltimore Sun, Boston Globe, Knoxville Tennessee News Sentinel, and China's China Daily.

Reuters (2/9) writes, "More girls than boys are becoming first-time users of alcohol, cigarettes and marijuana, reversing previous trends, the U.S. drug czar said in a report released on Thursday. 'Girls have become users at rates that exceed boys or equal boys now, which never used to be the case,' John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a telephone interview. … Walters said there were several reasons why girls might turn more to drugs and alcohol than boys. 'They are more likely to be influenced by peer pressure, even when they have been told and accepted that these behaviors are risky for them,' Walters said. 'They are twice as likely to be victims of depression. They report that when they use, that they do that to improve their moods.'"

The Washington Times (2/10, Wetzstein) reports, "Young men and women are abusing tobacco, alcohol and drugs at the same rate, according a report released yesterday that urged parents to get more involved in the lives of their teenage children. 'The gender gap has closed. Girls are smoking, drinking and using drugs equal to boys,' said Susan

Foster, vice president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse (CASA) at Columbia University and lead author of a new book on women and substance abuse. … A separate report released yesterday in New York City by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) and Seventeen magazine said teenage girls now match teenage boys in illicit drug and alcohol use, surpass them in cigarette and prescription drug use, and are more likely than boys to start using illicit substances. 'Girls are telling us that they understand the risks associated with drugs, alcohol and cigarettes. But that doesn't appear to be stopping them from using,' White House drug czar John P. Walters said yesterday. … Parental disapproval of tobacco, alcohol and drugs is a strong influence on teens, as is parental monitoring of teens and their friends, said the ONDCP, which offers parents and community leaders a wealth of anti-drug materials."

UPI (2/10) reports, "Experts say that teenage girls are more likely than boys to use drugs and alcohol to escape from family problems and other pressures in their lives. They also may take up smoking to help keep their weight down."

ABC News (2/9) reports on its Web site, "First lady Laura Bush has spearheaded an initiative to steer boys away from gangs, crime and drugs. She felt the program was needed because, she said, because we have 'shifted our gaze away from boys for the last several decades.' A White House report released [Thursday] on drug use among youths suggests that we need to keep a closer eye on girls as well. The report reveals that in 2004, the most recent year studied, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol — 173,000 more than the number of boys who started drinking."

AFP (2/10) writes, "Atoosa Rubenstein, editor in chief of Seventeen magazine, which cooperated with the White House initiative, said young girls were becoming more independent and starting to make decisions about their future. 'Combine this new responsibility with all the stress and pressures in their lives and the result, unfortunately, can be substance abuse,' she said."

LiveScience.com (2/9) writes, "Contrary to popular belief, more girls are new substance abusers. In 2004, 1.5 million girls started using alcohol, 730,000 girls started smoking, and 675,000 started using marijuana, according to the 2004 National Survey on Drug Use and Health. … 'Over the last few years, we have seen overall drug use decrease among teens—boys and girls. But the trends of substance use among our adolescent girls are alarming,' said ONDCP Director John P. Walters. … Marijuana is the drug of choice for girls; they prefer it over cocaine, heroin, Ecstasy, and all other illicit drugs combined, according to ONDCP."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/10) reports, "A report by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy released Thursday notes that young females across the country tend to use alcohol or drugs to lose weight, improve their mood, increase their confidence, cope with problems and lose their inhibitions. The report also said more girls than boys are starting to drink and smoke cigarettes and marijuana."

US Skeleton Racer Seeks Olympic Eligibility Following Positive Drug Test. The AP (2/10, Withers) reports, "U.S. skeleton racer Zach Lund's hopes of competing in the Olympics now rest in the hands of a special arbitration court. The Court of Arbitration for Sport is expected to rule Friday on whether Lund should be allowed to race in the Turin Games after testing positive for finasteride — an ingredient in a hair-restoration product that also can be used as a steroid-masking agent. Lund insists he tested positive because he was taking an baldness-fighting drug. Lund spent more than three hours Thursday at a hearing with the CAS. The men's skeleton competition is scheduled to begin next week. Lund was publicly warned but not suspended by the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency on Jan. 23 after the positive test. But last week, the World Anti-Doping Agency filed an appeal with the CAS over Lund's Olympic eligibility."

Duke University Changes Drug-Testing Policies. The AP (2/10) reports student athletes at Duke University who test positive for steroids "will have to sit out of competition for a year, while a second offense will result in lost eligibility, the school announced Thursday. The changes come after allegations last spring of steroid use by former baseball players. Bill Hillier, who compiled a 121-214 record in six years, resigned as coach a month after two former Duke players told the university newspaper they used steroids while playing for the school. Those players and others have said Hillier suggested that they use steroids. Hillier has denied the allegations. The new policy goes into place immediately. Evidence of blood doping or masking agents and refusal to take or attempts to manipulate a test are treated as positive tests."

Durham, North Carolina's Herald Sun (2/10) writes, "The school's new drug policy differentiates between performance-enhancing drugs and other substances banned by the NCAA -- so-called 'street drugs' -- by imposing harsher penalties for student-athletes who test positive for steroids and the like. The previous policy treated all banned substances the same, calling for counseling, treatment and further evaluation for a first offense, a suspension for at least half the season for a second offense and a permanent ban from competition for a third offense."

The Charlotte (NC) Observer (2/9) reports, "The University of North Carolina strengthened its steroid policy in October, requiring permanent dismissal for athletes testing positive for anabolic steroids. Duke's policy provides a second chance for steroid offenders. 'We are an educational institution,' said Duke law professor James E. Coleman Jr., who chaired Duke's committee. 'We felt it was appropriate to give a student who tested positive for a steroid a second chance to learn from and recover from the error, if possible.'"

ATF Busts Moonshine Still In Georgia. The Clayton (GA) Tribune (2/9, Spurney) reports, "Federal agents from the U.S. Forest Service and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms raided a moonshine still Feb. 2 off Muscadine Lane in eastern Rabun County." The Tribune continues, "The still, on Forest Service land in the Pool Creek community, had been under surveillance for nearly two months. No arrests have been made, though Rabun County sheriff's deputies and Georgia Department of Revenue agents helped execute warrants at three local residences." The Tribune adds, "Authorities released few details about the still's operation, including the names of potential suspects. The investigation is ongoing. … 'Suffice it to say, the suspects have been under surveillance with our operation,' said ATF spokesman Marc Jackson. … 'It was estimated that up until our enforcement action on it, that this suspected still was suspected of producing 45-70 gallons per cycle,' Jackson added. The still had yielded about seven cycles since Dec. 8. … The still was estimated to hold 750 gallons of mash. It was tucked away off Forest Service Road 517. Liquor was transported from the site in a 55-gallon barrel to another location where it was transferred to jars. Its operators had built a makeshift road through the woods, apparently on an old logging roadbed. The liquor was distilled through an old radiator."

New Jersey Man Sentenced In Pennsylvania Arson-For-Hire Case. The Bucks County (PA) Courier-Times (2/9, Yanoshak) reports, "A New Jersey man was sentenced to five years in federal prison Wednesday for hiring two men to torch the Morrisville (PA) restaurant across the street from what used to be his pizzeria." The Courier-Times continues, "From his own family to the man whose deli-restaurant was damaged by Molotov cocktails, many in U.S. District Court posed the same question to Alessandro 'Alex' Tramo: 'What were you thinking?' … Tramo's answer: He wasn't." The Courier-Times adds, "The abuse of prescription drugs had clouded his judgment, he told U.S. District Court Judge Anita Brody, whose sentence of five years was the mandatory minimum. … 'I forever regret having anything to do with this incident,' he told the court as his wife, Lisa, sat in the audience and wiped away tears. … Tramo pleaded guilty to hiring the men to burn Ben's Deli and Restaurant on Dec. 2, 2000. The 3:45 a.m. fire was brought under control in about 20 minutes and seriously damaged the landmark cafeteria-style eatery. … An investigation by Morrisville and Bucks County fire marshals and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms resulted in an indictment against Tramo, 34, of Bordentown; Bruce Armstrong, 35, of Trenton; and William Anderson, 39, of Morrisville. … Tramo, who then owned Anthony's 4 Pizza, hired the two to eliminate Ben's as a competitor, the investigators determined. … Armstrong and Anderson pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against Tramo. After that, Tramo pleaded guilty to arson and criminal conspiracy to commit arson."

IMMIGRATION:

Noting Rise In Border Violence, Chertoff Says US Will Not Tolerate Attacks On Agents. The Washington Times (2/10, Seper, 90K) reports, "Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, concerned about rising border violence, said yesterday nearly $1 billion in next year's proposed $42.7 billion department budget will be used for new US Border Patrol agents, upgraded electronic security measures, and more fences, roads, and detention beds." During a Washington press conference, Chertoff said, "There has been an over-100 percent increase in the last fiscal year in border violence aimed at our Border Patrol agents." Chertoff added, "We are not going to tolerate this kind of behavior." The secretary said "much of the border violence has been the result of increased enforcement efforts by the US government, but that the department was committed to securing the nation's borders as part of the strategy that 'involves not only apprehensions at the border, but detention, removal and more vigorous work site enforcement.'"

Cornyn Says Immigration Is National Security Issue. The Washington Times (2/10, McCain, 90K) reports, "Immigration should be treated as a national security issue, Sen. John Cornyn yesterday told a gathering of conservative activists. 'The federal government needs to obtain operational security of our borders,' the Texas Republican said in a speech to the 33rd annual Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington." Cornyn "said human traffickers, drug smugglers and criminal gangs from Brazil, China and other countries are 'using Mexico as a point of entry into the United States.'" He "drew applause when he said he would push for a Senate bill to provide 'a comprehensive solution' to US immigration problems 'that does not include amnesty.'"

DHS IG Finds Companies Using L-1 Visas To Get Around H-1B Quotas. The Washington Times (2/10, Dinan, 90K) reports that the temporary L-1 visa, which is "used particularly by foreign technology workers, is being abused by companies looking to get around protections for American workers, according to a new government report." The L-1 visa "is intended for foreign companies who want to transfer managerial employees or workers with 'specialized knowledge' temporarily to the United States." However, while "Congress has capped the number of workers who can come under the H-1B visa category each year at 65,000," it "has not placed limits on the L-1 visa, which applies to workers with specialized knowledge." The Department of Homeland Security's inspector general has "found that it is difficult for adjudicators at US Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to determine what constitutes a manager, particularly because companies vary in size and organization. Adjudicators also have to rely on a company's claims about its own operations, a worker's status at the time of the petition and how a worker will be used in the United States."

LATimes Criticizes Bush Border Budget Proposals. Under the headline "Bipolar Border Budgeting," the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 958K) editorializes, "Throwing money at a problem doesn't solve it. Knee-jerk reactions don't help, either. When it comes to illegal immigration, the Bush administration, apparently unable to decide which approach it prefers, has opted for both. But spending more on border enforcement will do little to curb illegal immigration and may even distract attention from better solutions to the problem." Though President Bush emphasized Border Patrol spending in this week's budge, "Over the last 10 years, such spending has increased by many times, yet illegal immigration continues to climb. A more sensible step would be a guest-worker program that makes temporary workers legal and reduces people smuggling, along with the risks and related crimes that go with it." The Times adds, "The other disappointment in the president's budget is that he continued his annual practice of ignoring states' requests for reimbursement for jailing illegal immigrants."

Opt-Outs May Jeopardize KPMG Tax-Shelter Settlement. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Koppel) reports, "A federal judge postponed a proposed $225 million class-action settlement with accounting firm KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP in a tax-shelter lawsuit. … The order, issued yesterday, came in response to a motion by KPMG in federal court in Newark, N.J., to revise the settlement because potential members opted out of the deal. The postponement was reported in the New York Times. … 'This settlement could be in jeopardy,' said attorney Edmundo Ramirez, whose client was one of 284 potential members of the KPMG class. Mr. Ramirez said his client rejected the original settlement, considering it 'a sweetheart deal for KPMG.'" The Journal adds, "In an interview, attorney Melvyn Weiss, a partner at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP and the lead lawyer for the plaintiffs in the case, said the parties may reduce the original settlement amount, but he believed an accord could still be reached in about a month. Milberg Weiss filed the suit last year, claiming KPMG sold fraudulent tax shelters. KPMG has admitted wrongdoing and agreed to pay the U.S. $456 million in restitution. … As originally proposed, the settlement would have awarded $195 million to purchasers of allegedly fraudulent tax shelters sold by KPMG. Milberg Weiss and other class counsel stood to earn $30 million from the settlement. If the plaintiffs' recovery is reduced in a new settlement, the plaintiffs' lawyers would also earn less, Mr. Weiss said."

SCOTUS To Hear Challenge To Corporate Tax Breaks. The National Law Journal (2/10, Coyle) reports, "In North Carolina this spring, a state court will take up a constitutional challenge to $242 million in state tax breaks given by state officials to Dell Inc. to build a plant in Winston-Salem. In Minnesota, another suit is pending attacking the validity of two multimillion-dollar tax-incentive programs to attract and keep businesses in special zones in that state." The Journal continues, "The North Carolina and Minnesota suits are among a number percolating around the country that have been inspired largely by a federal appellate decision in 2004 that struck down Ohio's investment tax credit -- a sacred tool of state economic competition." The Journal adds, "The Ohio case, which involved a $280 million tax incentive plan for DaimlerChrysler Corp.'s expansion in that state, is now before the U.S. Supreme Court, which is scheduled to hear arguments on March 1. DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, No. 04-1704; Wilkins v. Cuno, No. 04-1724. … The case has raised to a high profile a long-running debate over the constitutionality of state tax incentives under the so-called dormant or negative commerce clause, which prohibits states from acting in a way that interferes with interstate commerce, as well as a debate over the effectiveness of tax incentives as an economic-development tool. … Business and government officials predict 'dire ramifications' if states lose the ability to offer these incentives and businesses lose the ability to use them. … They note that one study reported last year that more than 330 statutory income or franchise tax credits and incentives are offered by 46 states."

Mack Says Tax Overhaul Will Be Harder If Delayed. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that former Sen. Connie Mack, "'disappointed' that presidential advisory group he headed isn't producing action, cautions the issue will become 'more difficult' to push as president's term continues. Absence of tax overhaul in Bush's State of the Union address is seen as sign of Treasury Secretary Snow's lack of clout."

WSJournal Pleased Rhode Island Democrats Are Considering Flat Tax. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "Let's hope James Carville, Robert Rubin, Nancy Pelosi and other national Democrats are all sitting down for this one: The Rhode Island legislature is considering a flat tax, and the proposal comes from its majority Democrats." Democratic leaders "proposed an optional flat rate income tax of 5.5% as an alternative to the current 'progressive' tax schedule, which imposes rates ranging from 3.75% to 9.9% for the highest earners. The flat tax is part of a more comprehensive reform plan that would also include a sales tax holiday weekend in August and a full week of relief on 'energy efficient' items in March 2007 from the state's 7% sales tax." What's "going on here? Have the state's liberals all taken Art Laffer happy pills? The answer is tax competition, and the discovery that Rhode Island's high tax burden is damaging its economy."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Submits List Of Proposed Program Cuts To Congress. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Calmes, 2.11M) reports President Bush "sent Congress his list of 141 programs to be killed or reduced to achieve almost $15 billion in savings, and almost half are three-time losers -- cuts he proposed for fiscal years 2004, 2005 and 2006, only to be ignored by Congress each time. The total savings are less than 4% of the current year's projected deficit." But if "the third time wasn't a charm, the fourth probably won't be either, congressional staffers say." Of the 91 programs targeted for complete elimination, "40 are making their fourth annual appearance on the list. Of 50 to be reduced, 20 are perennials." USA Today (2/10, Wolf, 2.31M) also writes that most of the programs Bush wants to cut or eliminate "are survivors of past Bush hit lists," and the total amount that would be saved is "small compared with the big ones in the budget: the skyrocketing costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security, Bush's effort to boost spending on defense and homeland security, and the cost of making his tax cuts permanent."

Among the proposed eliminations: a "program that provides poor seniors with vegetables, peanut butter and other nutritious foods," according to the AP (2/9); the "$255 Social Security death benefit," according to CQ (2/9, Schuler); and the "public housing reconstruction program known as HOPE VI," also according to CQ (2/9, Wayne). Meanwhile, Reuters (2/9, Doggett) reports Democrats "slammed" a proposal "to cut funds for a government program that helps poor people weatherize their homes."

Both Parties Reluctant To Enact Spending Reductions. Reuters (2/9, Bohan) reports the White House "defended reductions in programs from veterans healthcare to housing on Thursday as it sought to persuade a reluctant Congress" to make the cuts. The proposals "have gotten a wary reception in Congress, with Democrats lashing out at Bush for pushing tax cuts for the rich while reducing programs for the poor and middle class," and even "prominent members of Bush's Republican party criticized his budget." House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis "complained about 'fees and gimmicks,' which he said the White House knows Congress will again reject, but give Bush leeway to propose spending increases in favored areas such as defense." House Majority Leader John Boehner is among the skeptics, CQ (2/9, Ota) reports, giving "lukewarm support Thursday for President Bush's plan to slice $71 billion from Medicare and other entitlement programs. 'We have to build a budget together,' Boehner said during the first day of a House GOP retreat. 'I don't want to put things on the table or off the table.'"

Senate, House Pass Typo Fix For Spending Cut Bill. Reuters (2/9) reports, "The Senate and House have passed legislation aimed at ending confusion over a $39-billion spending-cut bill signed into law by President Bush on Wednesday, which varied slightly from the final version passed by the House. The two chambers passed the fix late on Wednesday, hours after the technical problem was discovered and the bill was enacted into law with Bush's signature. The problem stemmed from a typographical error written into the contentious bill as it bounced back and forth from the House and Senate since December."

Huckabee Says Congress Cutting Deficit By Boosting States' Medicaid Costs. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that National Governors Association Mike Huckabee of Arkansas "hits Congress for trimming deficit 'on the backs of the states' with proposals to increase state cost-sharing on Medicaid. Arkansas' Republican governor, a 2008 White House hopeful, says states instead need more flexibility to experiment with approaches to reining in Medicaid costs."

Krugman Criticizes "Artificial Shortsightedness" Of Bush Budgeting Practices. In his New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "At this point we've had six years to grow accustomed to Bush budget chicanery. … What still amazes me, however, is the sheer childishness of the administration's denials and deceptions. Consider the case of the vanishing future. … Clinton-era budgets offered 10-year projections of spending and revenues. But the Bush administration slashed the budget horizon to five years. This artificial shortsightedness greatly aided the campaign to make the 2001 tax cut permanent because it hid the costs: since budget analyses no longer covered the years after 2010, the revenue losses from extending the tax cut became invisible. … At this point the administration's budget strategy seems to be simply to ignore reality."

Neuharth Blames Iraq Costs For Swelling Budget. In his USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) column, Al Neuharth writes, "President Bush submitted a budget to Congress this week that is so big, most of us just shrug it off without thinking about what it means to us individually. Think about this: The $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year starting in October breaks down to an average of $9,293.62 for everyone in the USA. The latest budget request for Iraq of about $96 billion brings the cost of that war to $322 billion, an average of $1,080.34 per person. … Bush simply can't convince me on continuing the cost in Iraq -- in dollars and, more important, in precious lives -- for a war that he never should have started."

Pentagon Budget Proposal Would Increase Weapons Spending. The Washington Post (2/10, Merle, 744K) reports the defense industry was largely "relieved" by the Pentagon budget proposal, which "would increase spending on weapons to $84.2 billion, $8 billion more than this year, and includes $1.7 billion for unmanned aerial vehicles, an increase of about 3 percent, to begin buying 322 of the pilotless planes over the next five years." The "proposed 7 percent increase in the budget for weapons procurement and research and development is twice that expected by Troy Lahr, a defense analyst at investment bank Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. 'And we were among the more bullish,' said Lahr."

Defense Savings Plan Likely To Face Challenges. CQ (2/9, Donnelly, Plummer) reports lawmakers "are expected to challenge President Bush's proposal for defense savings because the plan, worth more than $50 billion over the next five years, entails significant reductions in uniformed personnel to support massive increases in weapons purchases and rising health care bills. Lawmakers in recent weeks have protested personnel cuts and threatened to add money for the troops back into the budget."

NYTimes Criticizes Pentagon Budget Priorities. The New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) editorializes, "It's amazing how Donald Rumsfeld's Defense Department can produce a $439 billion spending plan and still skimp on the one thing the American military desperately needs: expanded ground forces so the weakened and cannibalized Army can meet the requirements of Iraq without hurting its ability to respond to other threats. While the Pentagon intends to increase pay and recruitment bonuses, no part of its nearly 7 percent budget increase is aimed at raising overall troop strength. Instead, a large chunk of this nearly $30 billion bonanza goes to buying more new weapons and postponing overdue cuts in wasteful Air Force and Navy projects unrelated to fighting terrorism. … The military contractors are doing just fine. It's the troops in Iraq who need help from Washington."

Bush Domestic Policy Adviser Resigns. The AP (2/9) reports President Bush's domestic policy adviser Claude Allen "has resigned to spend more time with his family." Allen "has been working for the administration since Bush's first year in office -- first as the No. 2 official at the Health and Human Services Department, and for the last year as domestic policy adviser in the White House." He "did not respond to inquiries asking about his departure or future job plans."

Insiders Say Card, McClellan And Others Are Not Planning To Leave. The White House Bulletin/US News (2/9) reported White House and Administration insiders "are playing down rumors that Chief of Staff Andy Card, spokesman Scott McClellan and other top Bush aides are considering leaving the West Wing this spring. The latest reports are being fed by expectations that Treasury Secretary John Snow will retire this spring and that Bush would put Card, a former Transportation secretary, into the post." But top aides and Administration officials this week, "however, said it appears that no staff changes are underway or even planned and that the feeling inside is that the top aides, including Card and McClellan, will remain on the job at least through the midterm elections -- and possibly until the end of the President's second term. Indeed, two insiders said that Card has been leading pep talks for staffers, telling them that they have a job of 'high honor' and to stay focused on continuing to 'build on the President's agenda.'" Said one insider, "There is no hint that anybody is going anywhere. They're building the legacy" for President Bush.

House Members Show Support For Bush Competitiveness Initiative. The AP (2/9, Crutsinger) reports President Bush's "plan to boost the competitiveness of U.S. industry through innovation won support from members of Congress Thursday, although Democrats criticized the initiative for slashing some education programs to pay for more spending on math and science." Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez "won widespread support from members of the House Government Reform Committee for Bush's 'American Competitiveness Initiative,' one of the biggest new programs in the budget Bush sent to Congress on Monday." The initiative "would double government funding for basic research in the physical sciences, train thousands of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development," at a cost of $136 billion over 10 years.

The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "The education piece of Mr. Bush's plan seems relatively small -- $380 million in fiscal 2007 -- but it is getting most of the attention. From that, $90 million would go to boost the ranks of students taking Advanced Placement and International Baccalaureate classes in math, science, and foreign languages by training 70,000 additional teachers in those subject areas in high-poverty high schools." The plan "aims to boost the number of students taking AP math and science exams from 380,000 today to 1.5 million in 2012."

Gutierrez To Promote Bush Competitiveness Initiative In North Carolina. The Raleigh News & Observer (2/10) in its "Morning Briefing" column reports, "North Carolina likes to think of itself as a hotbed of innovation. Apparently, the Bush administration is keying in on that reputation." The News & Observer continues, "For the second time in a week, a senior Bush adviser will visit the state to discuss the president's 'American Competitiveness Initiative.' Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez…this morning will meet with business and education leaders at IBM's Research Triangle Park campus to promote the stronger focus on technological and scientific innovation." The "initiative is meant to increase competitiveness with other nations. Treasury Secretary John W. Snow touted the effort in Kannapolis last week."

Bush To Address House GOP Retreat Today. Reuters (2/9, Ferraro) reports House Republicans "rocked by an ethics scandal" are meeting at a hotel in "secluded" Cambridge, Maryland, for a three-day retreat. New House Majority Leader John Boehner said the retreat "would allow a 'period of renewal,' but gave no hint whether he could quickly unite his 231-member caucus on lobbying reform." President Bush will address the group today. The Washington Times (2/10, Dinan, 90K) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman spoke to the GOP caucus on Thursday, saying Democrats "are failing to capitalize on Republican ethics questions ahead of difficult midterm congressional elections in November." While according to Mehlman politics is "supposed to be a zero-sum situation: If one party is doing poorly, the other does well," Republican "travails have not helped Democrats, he said. 'The law of political physics is being defied by Nancy Pelosi, Howard Dean and Harry Reid,' he said."

House GOP Members To Raise Election Year Needs With Leaders. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Republicans speak up to House leaders about election-year needs. Format for this weekend's retreat in Maryland is 'unstructured,' says Ohio Rep. Pryce, who chairs Republican conference. Newly elected Majority Leader Boehner calls these 'times of renewal.'" House Democrats "press Boehner to open legislative process while banning lobbyists' gifts. But House reform timetable slips, while McCain presses Senate effort to change spending 'earmarks.'"

McCain Leads Senate Effort To Curtail Earmarks. The AP (2/10, Abrams) reports, "Ten senators led by Sen. John McCain took on the Senate's much maligned practice of inserting individual members' special projects, often without the knowledge of their colleagues, into larger spending bills. The 'Pork-Barrel Reduction Act,' introduced Thursday by eight Republicans and two Democrats, is the latest in a rash of proposals promoting ways to restore integrity to the political process in the wake of lobbying and ethics scandals." The bill "would allow senators to raise points of order against special projects, or earmarks, that are attached to spending bills without having been approved by the relevant committee. Under the procedure, which also applies to policy changes embedded in spending bills, 60 votes would be needed to override the point of order and keep the provision in the bill."

CQ (2/9, Higa) reports that while McCain's bill "has bipartisan sponsorship from eight Republicans and Democrats, including Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Evan Bayh of Indiana, its prospects for reaching the floor are uncertain. It has been referred to the Senate Rules Committee, chaired by Trent Lott, R-Miss., who introduced his own earmark proposal with Dianne Feinstein" last week. Lott's measure "has fewer cosponsors, but the mix of Republicans and Democrats is more balanced than McCain's and includes Rules panel members Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Christopher J. Dodd."

Coburn Says Earmark Reform Crucial To Ending "Culture Of Corruption." In a Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) op-ed, Sen. Tom Coburn writes, "John McCain and I recently delivered a letter to our colleagues announcing our intention to challenge every individual earmark on the floor of the Senate. Many senators, staff and reporters have asked if we are serious. The answer is yes. I am convinced that forcing hundreds or, if necessary, thousands of votes to strike individual earmarks is the only way to produce meaningful results for American taxpayers. Bringing the Senate to a standstill for as long as it takes would be a small price to pay for shutting down what Jack Abramoff described as Congress's 'earmark favor factory.' … As Congress confronts its culture of corruption and our enormous fiscal challenges, it's time to 'just say no' to earmarks."

Top Official At Corporation For Public Broadcasting Announces Resignation. The New York Times (2/10, Labaton, Jensen, 1.19M) reports, "The top television executive at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting announced on Thursday that he would be stepping down. This is the latest in a string of departures of officials and consultants who played central roles in an effort by conservatives to bring what they viewed as more balance to public television and radio." The executive, Michael Pack, "controlled a $70 million production budget and was described by the official who hired him as a conservative Republican." He "chose to resign after Patricia S. Harrison, the corporation's new president, forced him to decide between renewing his employment contract and exercising a soon-to-expire option that gives him $500,000 to produce a documentary."

Deutsch Denies Lying About Resume, Calls Hansen Politically Motivated. The New York Times (2/10, Revkin, 1.19M) reports, "George C. Deutsch, the young NASA press aide who resigned on Tuesday amid claims that he had tried to keep the agency's top climate scientist from speaking publicly about global warming, defended himself publicly yesterday. Speaking to a Texas radio station and then to The New York Times, Mr. Deutsch said the scientist, James E. Hansen, exaggerated the threat of warming and tried to cast the Bush administration's response to it as inadequate. Mr. Deutsch also denied lying about having a college degree and trying to inject religion into some NASA Web presentations. 'I have never been told to censor science, to squelch anything or to insert religion into any issue,' he told the radio reporter, Brian Cain. Parts of that interview were posted on the Web site of WTAW-AM, in College Station (wtaw.com), where Mr. Deutsch attended Texas A&M University until he joined President Bush's campaign in 2004. After seeing a transcript of some of the criticisms, Dr. Hansen said, 'This is so wacky that it deserves little response.'" In an interview with the Times, "Mr. Deutsch said he had written the résumé in anticipation of graduating. … 'As a result, it may appear misleading to some. However, I was up front with NASA about my undergraduate status when they hired me.'"

The AP (2/10) reports in a widely published story, "A staffer who resigned from NASA after he was accused of restricting access to a noted climate scientist said Thursday he was targeted because of his political ties. George C. Deutsch, 24, resigned from the agency's public relations department earlier this week. 'What you do have is hearsay coming from a handful of people who have clear partisan ties and they are really coming after me as a Bush appointee,' he told radio station WTAW. 'I was an easy target. I was low-hanging fruit.'"

NASA, Hansen Say Deutsch Charges Untrue. Under the headline "'Culture War' At NASA?" the Houston Chronicle (2/10, Carreau, 581K) reports that Deutsch "directed much of his wrath at James Hansen... 'What is going on at NASA and throughout the federal government is a culture war,' Deutsch said in a statement from his Washington-area home. 'I quickly learned one thing: Dr. Hansen and his supporters have a very partisan agenda and ties reaching to the top of the Democratic Party.' In a telephone interview, Deutsch accused the space agency of too often showcasing Hansen as its expert on global warming, passing over other scientists whose views were not as alarming." The story adds, "On Thursday, both Hansen… and NASA challenged the allegations by Deutsch. 'I have no idea where he got that idea. It would be the opposite of our credo about presenting all sides of a problem,' Hansen wrote in an e-mail in response to the charge he tried to suppress opposing views. … Hansen's views on global warming were not favored over others, said Dean Acosta, chief spokesman for NASA administrator Michael Griffin. 'I can tell you categorically that is not happening,' said Acosta."

USA Today Says Bush Needs To Take Cue From NASA Flap. USA Today (2/10, 12A, 2.31M) editorializes, "That a low-level bureaucrat could overrule a prestigious scientist says worlds about how the administration balances politics against science. Further evidence can be found at the Food and Drug Administration, which has stifled overwhelming evidence that the 'morning-after pill' is safe and effective. It blocked over-the-counter sales — a transparent payoff to abortion opponents. Global warming is a good place to begin altering that facts-be-damned approach. … Ignoring the impact of climate change is getting difficult: Federal officials are considering declaring the polar bear a threatened species because rising Arctic temperatures are melting the ice pack that's their home. Now that scientific fact has spoken louder than ideology at NASA, perhaps the same can happen at the White House."

More Commentary. In his column on the Washington Post (2/10, A17, 744K), Al Kamen reports, "Deutsch did attend the Texas University and did some writing for the Battalion, the student paper. In an opinion piece in 2003 when New York Times reporter Jayson Blair was unmasked as a fabricator, Deutsch wrote: 'Blair's decisions and actions lacked ethics and integrity. As a reporter, he cared only about himself and furthering his career at the expense of the truth. Unclear if Deutsch plans to re-enroll to finish his degree."

In an editorial titled "Earth to NASA," the Spokane (WA) Spokesman-Review (2/10) argues, "The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is the latest battleground in the war between science and politics. First, the agency's public information office was accused of censoring its scientists' findings on global warming. Then it imposed itself on the origins-of-the-universe debate." The paper describes the controversy around George Deutsch and concludes, "We're guessing Deutsch was motivated by more than just science, but that's just a theory. Deutsch was dumped on Tuesday for lying on his resume. We hope NASA administrators can see that there was a bigger problem."

NAS Accepts Congressional Request To Referee Warming Dispute. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B4, Regalado, 2.11M) reports, "Seeking to resolve a scientific dispute that has taken on a rancorous political edge, the National Academy of Sciences said it had agreed to a request from Congress to assess how well researchers understand the history of temperatures on earth. The study by the academy, an independent advisory body based in Washington, will focus on the 'hockey stick,' a chart of past temperatures that critics say is inaccurate. … The controversy took a sharp political turn in July when Rep. Joe Barton (R., Texas), head of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, launched a probe into the work of three climate specialists who generated the graph, including Michael Mann, now a professor at Pennsylvania State University. Mr. Barton's inquiry drew a rebuke from several scientific societies as well as fellow Republican Sherwood Boehlert of New York, chairman of the House Committee on Science, who called it a blatant effort to intimidate global-warming researchers. After Mr. Barton didn't respond to an offer to jointly bring the issue to the National Academy, Mr. Boehlert independently asked for a review in November, science committee chief of staff David Goldston said."

VA Has Declined Health Care To More Than 250,000 High-Income Veterans. The Washington Post (2/10, A17, 744K) reports that it has been three years since then-Secretary Anthony Principi said the Department of Veterans Affairs would be suspending health care enrollment "for some higher-income veterans who did not have injuries or illnesses related to their military service. The move to exclude 'Priority 8' veterans was unpopular, but Principi said it was necessary to prevent the VA medical system from being swamped by the rising number of veterans who were eligible for care. … More than a quarter-million 'Priority 8' veterans who tried to sign up for VA health care coverage between January 2003 and October 2005 were turned away because of the new effort to rein in costs," and as many as 10 million of the 16.9 million veterans not enrolled in the VA health care system are Priority 8 veterans, the VA says.

Specter Statements On Swearing Witnesses Contrasted. In a "Verbatim" item, the Washington Post (2/10, A17, 744K) contrasts Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter's statement on declining to put Attorney General Alberto Gonzales under oath this week -- "It is my judgment that it is unnecessary to swear the witness" -- with a Specter statement from April 2005: "During my stewardship here, I'm going to put everybody under oath when we have testimony, as we do on confirmation hearings."

Allen Urges Withholding Lawmaker Paychecks. The AP (2/10, Taylor) reports, "A potential GOP presidential candidate has come up with a familiar way to cater to conservative core voters -- bashing Congress." Virginia Sen. George Allen, "a darling of conservatives, says lawmakers' paychecks should be withheld if they don't pass spending bills on time." He "says that would solve the problem of larding spending into end-of-session bills that sometimes pass without anybody reading them."

Administration Contributing To Growth Of "Faith Based" Social Services. In the Chicago Tribune's "The Swamp" blog (2/8), Mark Silva writes, "For all the hoopla surrounding cuts in Medicare and Medicaid spending, a quieter revolution is taking place in Washington: The advancement of 'faith-based' social services." As President Bush "signed a significant budget-cutting bill today with an audience of congressional leaders in the East Room of the White House, he signed into law protections for religious groups that spend federal money on the social services that they deliver." Legal protection "for many federally financed private groups to hire people of their choosing already had been provided by the Welfare Reform Act of 1996 signed by President Clinton. In the reauthorization of that act, Congress has extended that authority for programs operating under the $17-billion Temporary Assistance to Needy Families through 2010 and also has extended this 'Charitable Choice' authority to his new Marriage and Fatherhood Program." Bush "signed all of this into law today as he approved a Deficit Reduction Act that will rein in the growth of Medicare and Medicaid. The choice provisions were added to the bill."

Senate Confirms Ameriquest Founder As Ambassador To The Netherlands. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Peterson, 958K) reports the Senate confirmed Ameriquest founder Roland Arnall as US ambassador to the Netherlands on an "uncontested" voice vote 16 days after Ameriquest "agreed to pay $325 million to settle allegations of unfair lending practices by regulators in 49 states and the District of Columbia." The vote "brought a peaceful end to a divisive, three-month confirmation process, in which Democrats led by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) had insisted that Ameriquest resolve the allegations against it before they would confirm Arnall."

Weekly Jobless Claims At Lowest Level In Six Years. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, 2.11M) reports, "A closely watched barometer of joblessness fell to its lowest reading in nearly six years, offering further proof that so far this year the labor market is improving along with the economy." The Labor Department "said the number of workers filing initial unemployment claims last week was 277,000, a figure that pushed the more telling four-week moving average of jobless claims down to 276,500, its lowest level since April 2000." The claims data "provide the latest bit of evidence that strong economic activity is improving conditions for workers."

Stocks Mixed. USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) reports, "Stocks were mostly higher Thursday as a six-year low in unemployment claims and strong corporate earnings encouraged investors. However, the momentum sagged in late-afternoon trading as uncertainty about the economy resurfaced. While weekly first-time jobless claims rose slightly, Wall Street was encouraged that the Labor Department said the four-week moving average fell to its lowest since April 2000." The Dow Jones industrial average "rose 24.73 points to 10,883.35 after gaining 108.86 points Wednesday. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 1.87 points to 1263.78, and the Nasdaq composite dropped 11.11 points to 2255.87." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Patterson, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

Economists Worry Bernanke Could Raise Fed Funds Rate Too High. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Annett, 2.11M) reports economists have "some advice for Ben Bernanke as he takes over at the Federal Reserve: establish your credibility as an inflation fighter. But, at the same time, they have concern that he could take that effort too far." When asked "in the latest WSJ.com forecasting survey which mistake Mr. Bernanke is more likely to make -- raising rates too much or not enough -- three-quarters of economists said he is more likely to lift rates too high." The "challenge is especially acute now. Soaring energy prices have nudged up inflation pressures at the same time the Fed has been steadily lifting rates. Now, Mr. Bernanke must pick the right time to stop the increases." On average, the "economists expect the federal-funds rate, charged on overnight loans between banks, to be 4.75% by June and to remain at that level through year-end. That suggests the Bernanke Fed would raise the funds rate from its current 4.5% and then halt the string of increases embarked upon in June 2004, when the funds rate sat at a 46-year low of 1%."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Bernanke faces pressure to answer deficit questions in next week's congressional testimony. 'He ultimately will have to speak out on serious things that affect the economy,' says Senate Banking Chairman Shelby. 'If he doesn't, there will be a void.' With Fed nominees Kroszner and Warsh headed for confirmation, open market committee should be back to full strength at March 27-28 meeting for first time in a year."

Greenspan Draws Fire For Remarks On Economy. The Financial Times (2/10, Beales, Hughes, Balls) reports that "barely a week after leaving the US Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan has been reminded how tricky life can be in the private sector for a man revered as the world's greatest former central banker." Greenspan's "comments at a Wall Street dinner on Tuesday rippled through currency and bond market trading rooms on Thursday, drawing comment not just on what he did - or maybe didn't - say but whether he should have said anything at all." The remarks, "during a talk for bankers and top hedge fund clients of Lehman Brothers, were interpreted as relatively hawkish on the US interest rate outlook, and contributed to a modest rise in the dollar and a decline in Treasury prices." Some observers suggested Greenspan "would have done better to defer his appearances at least until next week when Ben Bernanke, the new chairman, is due to present the central bank's twice-yearly monetary policy report to the US Congress for the first time."

Attorneys Said To Be Biggest Purchasers Of Cell Phone Records. The National Law Journal (2/10, Baldas) reports, "The sale of cell phone records over the Internet -- a hot topic that recently spurred litigation, legislation and a federal investigation -- has more than a few lawyers nervous." The Journal continues, "Attorneys are among the top customers of the controversial Web sites, according to private investigators, privacy advocates and Web site operators who sell the phone records. … 'Let's put it this way, the legal profession is keeping it alive,' said Rob Douglas, a former private eye turned security consultant who has helped the Federal Trade Commission investigate and prosecute online operators that sell phone records. … 'I've investigated them with the federal government and in private lawsuits ... and in every single case, the overwhelming majority of users of these companies are attorneys,' Douglas said." The Journal adds, "These attorneys include divorce lawyers, who want to know who feuding spouses are talking to; business lawyers, who want to know who their clients' competitors are talking to; and employment lawyers, who want to know if employees are selling any trade secrets. … The online data industry has come under intense scrutiny in recent months, triggering private lawsuits and federal and state investigations."

Conservatives Face Questions About Future Course. The New York Times (2/10, Nagourney, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) writes that "despite the triumph of placing two conservatives on the Supreme Court within four months, leaders of the conservative movement these days seem less celebratory than divided." Conservatives "face internal rifts over polarizing issues and are dogged by a sense that a Republican-led Congress and a Republican president are not taking the nation in the proper direction on some critical matters." Those "fissures were evident" as the Conservative Political Action Conference convened in Washington, with leaders expressing "concern about the loyalty of elected Republicans in Washington to the conservative agenda, complained about the growth of spending in Mr. Bush's latest budget and said they were uncertain, at a time when Congressional Republicans are squirming under the glare of a corruption inquiry, of the future of the movement."

Gingrich Says US Again Looking To Conservatives For Leadership. In a Washington Times (2/10, 90K) op-ed, Newt Gingrich writes, "For over three decades now, American history has been written on the right. The crossroads confronted by conservatives have been America's crossroads, and the path forward charted by conservatives has consistently been the path of the nation. Today, America, and therefore conservatives too -- stand at another crossroads, with another set of historic choices that will determine whether we leave our children and grandchildren a country as safe, prosperous and free as the country our parents and grandparents fought and worked to give us. Throughout the 1970s, Ronald Reagan argued that the choice faced by Americans was not between left and right but between up and down -- down toward 'the totalitarianism of the ant heap' or up toward 'that shining city on a hill.' In the 1990s, conservatives again spoke to the hopes of a broad majority of Americans. … Twice before we've stood at the crossroads, and twice before conservatives have led the way forward to greater safety, prosperity and freedom for all Americans. Today, the stakes are higher than ever before. Our fellow Americans are once again looking to conservatives and asking this question: What are you doing to win the future?"

Sheehan Won't Challenge Feinstein. Reuters (2/10) reports, "Cindy Sheehan, the anti-Iraq war activist whose son was killed in the conflict there, put an end to speculation on Thursday that she would launch a long-shot bid to become a US senator from California." Sheehan, speaking in front of San Francisco City Hall," said she would not run for the office." The AP (2/10) quotes Sheehan saying, "I think I'm more effective on the outside than on the inside."

Steele Criticized For Comparing Stem Cell Research, Nazi Experiments. The Baltimore Sun (2/10, Skalka, 296K) reports that in a discussion of "his position on embryonic stem cell research with Baltimore Jewish leaders yesterday, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele said he is 'concerned about the destruction of human life' and made a comparison between the controversial science and experiments done on Jews during the Holocaust." Steele, speaking to a Baltimore Jewish Council board meeting, said, "You of all folks know what happens when people decide they want to experiment on human beings, when they want to take your life and use it as a tool. I know that as well in my community, out of our experience with slavery, and so I'm very cautious when people say this is the best new thing, this is going to save lives." The Sun adds Steele's remarks, "which followed a well-received speech about his trip to Israel in November, came in response to a board member's question about Steele's stance on embryonic stem cell research. His answer stunned many in the audience."

Democrats To Pay Homage To Steele During Black History Month Events. The Washington Times (2/10, Miller, 90K) reports, "The Maryland Democratic Party has been relentless in criticizing…Steele in his run for U.S. Senate, but party officials say that won't stop them from paying homage to the conservative Republican during Black History Month. 'Michael Steele is an important figure in African-American history in Maryland. There is no question about it,' said Derek Walker, executive director of the state Democratic Party. 'We should be proud of the achievements of African-Americans, regardless of what party they are from or what their background is,' he said." Steele, "the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, will be celebrated Monday as part of the state Democratic Party's campaign to honor a black Marylander each day this month, Mr. Walker said."

Unions Gave To 48 Maryland Legislators Before Wal-Mart Vote. The Washington Post (2/10, B5, Wagner, Marimow, 744K) reports two labor unions "pushing for legislation that could expand Wal-Mart's health benefits made campaign contributions to 48 members of the Maryland General Assembly in the month before the high-profile vote." The contributions, "totaling more than $36,000 in the run-up to the January vote, came to more than a quarter of the state's legislators from affiliates of the Service Employees International Union and the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, according to analysis of campaign finance reports filed last month." Bobbie Walton of Common Cause Maryland said, "They were obviously trying to get somebody's attention." The Post adds Wal-Mart "retained as many as a dozen Annapolis lobbyists for the fight, which drew national attention, and tried to sway public opinion through radio and newspaper ads." But in "the weeks before the override vote, Wal-Mart made only seven direct political contributions to lawmakers, one of which was returned, according to Maryland State Board of Elections records."

LATimes Promotes Circumcision To Prevent AIDS Spread. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, 958K) says in an editorial that President Bush has been "a reliable ally in the global fight against AIDS, proposing to increase federal funding to about $4 billion next year. With so much at stake, efficiency is vital, and according to a growing body of research, one procedure that is relatively inexpensive and can drastically reduce the transmission of AIDS is male circumcision. Last fall, the first rigorous trial on the subject conducted in South Africa found that circumcised men are 60% less likely to contract HIV."

Putin May Break With US, EU And Welcome Hamas Visit. The New York Times (2/10, McLean, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Pulling away from an agreed American and European policy, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia said Thursday that he was considering inviting the newly victorious leaders of the radical Palestinian Islamic group Hamas to Moscow to discuss solutions to the conflict in the Middle East." Putin said, "Preserving our contacts with Hamas, we are willing in the near future to invite the authorities of Hamas to Moscow to carry out talks." And "Hamas responded favorably on Thursday. 'If we receive an official invitation to visit Russia, we will visit Russia,' said Ismail Haniya, a senior Hamas leader." One "senior State Department official said that the administration was surprised and irritated by Mr. Putin's remarks, but that Russia had assured the United States that there would not be any senior-level contacts with Hamas. Asked about Mr. Putin's statement, the official said, 'Frankly, it doesn't help.'" Although "Putin seemed to catch the Bush administration and some others by surprise, it was not the first time he had voiced such an opinion. In a news conference late last month, after the Palestinian elections, he said Russia had 'never regarded Hamas as a terrorist organization,' and did not rule out financial aid for a Hamas-led government."

The Washington Post (2/10, A15, Wilson, 744K) says Putin's invitation signaled "the first crack in diplomatic efforts to isolate the radical Islamic group as it prepares to form the next Palestinian cabinet." The Post adds, "U.S. officials were caught off guard by Putin's comments and sought clarification from Russian officials." U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs David Welch "noted to reporters that Russia was a member of the quartet and had agreed to the group's stance toward Hamas." Welch said, "These are the principles that were clearly articulated now several times by the quartet and again with Russian participation and agreement. … We would expect that any meeting that occurs with any Palestinian representative, including Hamas, would emphasize these principles."

The Washington Times/Reuters (2/10, Croft) notes, "State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington that the Bush administration has 'contacted the Russian government about what their intentions are.'" McCormack said, "If there are any contacts between the Russian government and Hamas, we would expect that they would send that very clear message, both in public and private, that is contained in the Quartet statement."

Prosecution Seeks Death Penalty For Beslan Terrorist. The New York Times (2/10, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "A senior prosecutor on Thursday asked a court in southern Russia to sentence to death the only attacker known to have survived the siege of Middle School No. 1 in Beslan in September 2004. The request rekindles a contentious debate in Russia over capital punishment." Deputy prosecutor general Nikolai Shepel "said the gravity of the terrorist siege, which ended with the deaths of 331 hostages, warranted a penalty of death, despite a government moratorium on executions that has been in place since 1996." Shepel's "appeal came only two days after President Vladimir V. Putin reiterated his personal opposition to the death penalty but said he would move cautiously in seeking its final abolition by the Parliament -- years after Russia committed to doing so."

G-8 Meeting Overshadowed By Concerns About Russian Democracy, Energy. The Washington Times (2/10, Mainville, 90K) reports, "A meeting of the Group of Eight finance ministers beginning today threatens to be overshadowed by tensions over President Vladimir Putin's record on democracy and Russia's reliability as an energy supplier." Topics like "Energy security, education, efforts to fight infectious diseases and debt relief for poor countries are all on the agenda. But the tone has been set by Washington's public questioning of Russia's fitness to lead the group and Moscow's prickly response." And recently senior U.S. officials said "they believe Russia is using its control of Soviet-era pipelines to hold down purchase prices in Central Asia while skimming huge profits through corrupt middlemen."

Tax Snafu Halts Russian Vodka Production. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Chazan, 2.11M) reports, "There was an eerie silence last week at ZAO Veda's vodka distillery, one of Russia's biggest. For the first time in its 10-year history, the plant stopped production. Bored workers kept busy by scrubbing down machinery with Ajax." Russia's "entire vodka industry ground to a halt, thanks to a Siberia-size bureaucratic snafu over a new tax on alcohol."

Rice Realignment Expands US Presence In India, China. The Washington Post (2/10, A17, Graham, Kessler, 744K) reports, "China and India have emerged as the big winners -- and Russia and Germany as the top losers -- in the first round of a broad restructuring of U.S. diplomatic posts ordered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." The Post notes, "Of 61 positions slated for elimination in the initial batch, 10 will fall in Russia and seven in Germany. U.S. embassies in several other countries -- Belgium, Poland, Italy, Spain, Ukraine, Japan and Brazil -- will lose two or three posts. All told, 38 of the cuts will come in European nations." Meanwhile, "of 74 new U.S. diplomatic positions, China will get 15, including a dozen at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. India ranks second with 12 new posts, seven of them in New Delhi. And Indonesia is third with five new slots in Jakarta. Other countries that are to receive at least three more U.S.

diplomatic slots include Nigeria, Israel, Lebanon, Vietnam, Tajikistan, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela and Nicaragua."

McCain Applauds Bush's Handling Of International Crises. Sen. John McCain said on The Late Show With David Letterman (2/9), "I would say that the biggest challenge we've faced in a long time…is this Iranian nuclear threat. If they acquire weapons -- nuclear weapons, they've said repeatedly they want to exterminate the state of Israel. They will destabilize the Middle East, and we've got a very, very serious challenge on our hands." Asked how the Administration was handling the negotiations with Iran as well as problems over energy with Russia and Venezuela, McCain said, "I think president Bush and Condi Rice are doing a very good job in handling these crises now. I really do."

US Keeping Response To Arab Cartoon Controversy "Low Key." NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 4, 1:50, Mitchell) reported the US "is accusing Iran and Syria of fanning the protests." Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman: "Things like burning down embassies don't happen by accident in Damascus." Mitchell: "State Department official Karen Hughes is in charge of rebutting anti-American propaganda. Hughes last fall:" Hughes: "We have to be more effective, rapid and nimble in responding to rumors and outright lies and misinformation." A State Department war room "is monitoring how Arab media, including blogs, are reporting the cartoon crisis." US officials "say they are deliberately keeping their response low-key to avoid further inflaming the Muslim world."

Danish Prime Minister Defends Bush Administration Response. The New York Times (2/10, Vinocur, Bilefsky, 1.19M) reports Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen tried to shield the Bush administration and some of Denmark's partners in NATO from accusations that they had been tardy and overcautious in coming to Denmark's defense in the crisis, which he attributed more to attempts by Iran and Syria to cause diversions in the Middle East than to a few satirical cartoons." He "declined to criticize the Bush administration about its cautious defense of an ally. President Bush referred to his solidarity with Denmark for the first time on Wednesday, after five days of rioting in the Middle East against Danish interests." Rasmussen said, "I have never doubted that Bush would stand up for Denmark. … He values faithfulness and loyalty. I was not surprised he decided to call me and express support."

Rasmussen Accuses Iran, Syria Of Fomenting Protests. The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Sullivan, 744K) reports Rasmussen "said Thursday that the governments of Iran and Syria had intentionally inflamed Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad to distract attention from their own diplomatic crises." His statement "echoed" recent remarks made by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. He also said he "was pleased with Bush's recent statements condemning violence against Danish diplomatic missions." The Administration's position "on the situation have shifted. Initially, the administration condemned the cartoons as offensive, but now Bush and other officials are stressing their opposition to the widespread violence. Rasmussen said the administration's initial stance on the cartoons 'caused some public debate in Denmark, whether it could be considered a support or not. … We do realize that this is also a balance for the United States.'"

Annan Dismisses Accusation Syria, Iran Behind Protests. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Farley, 958K) reports, "When asked about claims this week by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Syria and Iran had inflamed the controversy and incited protests," Secretary-General Kofi Annan "told reporters that he had 'no evidence to that effect.'"

Annan Chastises Newspapers For Continuing To Print Muslim Cartoons. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Farley, 958K) reports Annan also "chastised newspapers Thursday that continue to publish cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad in the face of the religious controversy the drawings have ignited." Annan said, "This does not mean that I am against freedom of speech, or freedom of the press. … But as I have indicated in the past, freedom of speech is not a license. It does entail exercising responsibility and judgment."

Bush To Proceed With Trip To Pakistan Despite Protests. AFP (2/10) reports, "The White House…insisted US President George W. Bush would go ahead with his planned trip to Pakistan in March despite widespread outrage over the cartoons there. Protesters burned his effigy Wednesday."

First Lady Urges Muslims To Stop Violence. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 4, 1:50, Mitchell) reported that at the Vatican, Laura Bush "discussed the crisis with the Pope." Laura Bush: "I hope that every government, including the governments of the Middle East, will speak out and call for an end to the violence."

ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 6, :20, Vargas) reported, "First Lady Laura Bush is in Italy with her daughter, Barbara, on their way to the Olympics, which start tomorrow. They stopped off at the Vatican today for an audience with Pope Benedict XVI. After exchanging gifts, Mrs. Bush said the Pope expressed concern about violence in the Muslim world over the cartoons of the prophet Muhammad and called for peace and tolerance."

Fox News' Special Report (2/9, Henneberg) reported the First Lady "says it is not necessary for Muslims to get their point across they that were offended." After meeting with

Pope Benedict Fist Lady Laura Bush said, "I know that Muslims are offended with these cartoons. And I understand their offense. On the other hand, I don't think violence is the answer. I think it's that everyone around the world needs to speak out and say, let's stop the violence." Reuters (2/10, Holland) and the AP (2/10, Winfield) also report on the First Lady's visit with the Pope.

Hamas Leader Calls For Calm. AFP (2/10) reports, "The radical Palestinian group Hamas joined voices for calm in the international furore sparked by cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed." Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal said Hamas "is prepared to play a role in calming the situation between the Islamic world and Western countries on condition that these countries commit themselves to putting an end to attacks against the feelings of Muslims." Meshaal's conciliatory tone came a day after he warned the Western press was 'playing with fire' by publishing the cartoons which have led to riots around the world."

Hezbollah Leader Encourages Muslims To Protest. CNN's The Situation Room (2/9) reported that in Beirut, "Hezbollah's leader urges Muslims to protest more. Let Condoleezza Rice shut up, he says. As well as Bush and all world tyrants. We're a nation that will not forgive or stay silent. A no-compromise stand from a militant Muslim leader with an influential voice setting his own conditions."

Italians Consider Additional Security Precautions In Response To Muslim Protests. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Williams, 744K) in a front page story on Italian security preparations for the Winter Olympics reports in response to the Muslim protests "Interior Minister Giuseppe Pisanu, Italy's top official for civilian police and the intelligence corps, called an emergency meeting of security officials Monday regarding possible new threats. Pisanu said the riots and protests in the Middle East, Central Asia and Far East countries have been 'carried out coldly with political ends. We mustn't forget that Islamic extremism is an essentially political movement that cynically uses religious values.'" But he also said that "homegrown violence is the most likely problem for the Olympics. 'For the Olympics I fear the rising aggressiveness of anti-globalization protesters, anarchists and all the domestic subversion movements that are pursuing the Olympic spotlight.'" Recently "Italian authorities have deported about 30 Islamic militants they said were inciting violence. … The Italians rely on wiretapping to keep tabs on terrorist suspects and their supporters. Officials say they have 2,000 people under close watch."

Kinsley Says Administration Not Defending Free Speech. Michael Kinsley in his column in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K) writes, "The shameful American position on all this is boilerplate endorsement of free expression combined with denunciation of the cartoons as an 'unacceptable' insult. When three protesters died this week in a confrontation at a U.S. military base in Afghanistan, an American spokesman there said that Afghans 'should judge us on what we're doing here, not on what some cartoonist is doing somewhere else.' But the limits of free expression cannot be set by the sensitivities of people who don't believe in it. How can President Bush continue to ask young Americans to sacrifice their lives for freedom in the Muslim world, if he won't even defend freedom verbally when forces from that world are suppressing it in our own?"

Krauthammer Criticizes "Moderates" For Not Standing Up To Protestors. Charles Krauthammer in his column in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K) writes, "The mob has turned this into a test case for freedom of speech in the West. The German, French and Italian newspapers that republished these cartoons did so not to inform but to defy -- to declare that they will not be intimidated by the mob." The protests "are instruments of intimidation, reminders of van Gogh's fate. The Islamic 'moderates' are the mob's agents and interpreters, warning us not to do this again. And the Western 'moderates' are their terrified collaborators who say: Don't worry, we won't. It's those Danes. We're clean. Spare us. Please."

Muslim Outrage Compared To Racial Sensitivities In US. David Ignatius in his column in the Washington Post (2/10, A19, 744K) compares the Muslim outrage with racial sensitivities in the US, in particular when "you think about American reactions to a word we hesitate even to write for fear of giving offense, calling it instead the 'n-word.'" In response to the Muslim protests, Ignatius thinks "of the American civil rights movement. In the space of my lifetime, America has gone from a country of brutal racism and outright segregation to a place where black folks and white folks pretty much get along." Ignatius concludes, "I want to believe that Muslims and the West are in that kind of transition. We're in the rage phase -- the part of the story where black folks are torching cities, white governors are sending in the National Guard and the problems seem insoluble. But if people keep their heads, we will eventually pass from this crazy moment into a different one where a genuine reconciliation is possible."

International Commentary. In a sampling of opinion from international newspapers on the Muslim protests, USA Today (2/10, 2.31M) reports that in Afghanistan Arman-e Melli writes, "The Muslim and Mojahed people of Afghanistan have the right to demonstrate and make the Western press realize that freedom of speech does not mean insulting the sacred beliefs of other religions. Looking at developments in the country, it is clear that the enemies of our people have exploited the religious beliefs of our people. They have changed the peaceful process of demonstrations into a violent one." Meanwhile, Politiken, in Copenhagen writes, "The acts of violence arise from the internal tensions in Muslim societies; they show the desperation of people who see the world's cultural and economic development passing them by. The escalation of the crisis does not therefore have anything to do with Danish newspaper cartoons, and there is nothing that Denmark could have done to halt this development."

Iranians Said To Blame UK For "Much Of What Goes Wrong." The New York Times (2/10, Slackman, 1.19M) reports, "The idea that Britain is behind much of what goes wrong in Iran is not just a conspiracy theory but also a prism through which to view events. Indeed, America -- the Great Satan itself -- is often portrayed as merely a hapless, muscle-bound child manipulated by smarter, craftier, more deceitful forces in London." And although "many Iranians are adept at poking fun at their Brit-fixation, the prevailing view also serves to complicate already tense relations between London and Tehran over such matters as the Iranian nuclear program. One Western diplomat…said Iranians often raised the specter of 'historical inequities' with Britain in diplomatic meetings." For example, while Western nations were pushing to refer Iran to "the United Nations Security Council for its nuclear activities, Iranian officials accused the British of some recent bombings and deadly plane crashes in Iran."

US Basketball Players In Iran Keep Low Profile. The Washington Post (2/10, A1, Vick, 744K) reports, "About 20 Americans play hoops for a living in Iran. They nurture pro careers that might not exist in the States, navigate a culture that offers precious few diversions in public -- though a lot more behind closed doors -- and, as much as possible, avoid politics. Iran is at the center of international concern for its nuclear ambitions and has remained notorious to the United States since 1979, when student radicals took over the U.S. Embassy in a siege that lasted 444 days. But for offshore ballplayers working for a paycheck, Iran is just another stop on an international circuit that quietly counterbalances the NBA's burgeoning import of players from Croatia, Congo and China, to name just the C's."

Iran Seen As Vulnerable To Ethnic Divisions If Attacked. Edward Luttwak, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 958K) writes that the theory that attacking Iran will lead to increased public support for its leaders is flawed because Iran "is not a nation-state but rather a multinational empire dominated by Persians, much as the Soviet Union was once dominated by Russians. Except that in this case, the Persians only account for just over half the population of Iran (making them a smaller proportion than the Russians were even in the final days of the Soviet Union)."

Rift Increasing Between US, Venezuela. The Washington Post (2/10, A14, Constable, 744K) reports, "After an especially ugly week in the hostile relationship between the Bush administration and the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Venezuela's envoy here tried yesterday to salvage some civility, saying his country sought 'mature and rational relations' with Washington and would remain a 'reliable' source of energy to all foreign customers, including the United States." In response, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "responded in kind," saying "Washington was 'open to a good relationship with Venezuela' and hoped for a 'positive one.'" He "said that the two countries were cooperating in the fight against drugs and that the administration was prepared to work with governments across the political spectrum, including those with 'left-of-center' views." Yet "the exchange did little to dispel a growing sense among officials and analysts that the current political breach between Caracas and Washington…is becoming potentially irreparable."

"Populist Leaders" Seek To Create Counterweight To US Power. The Christian Science Monitor (2/10, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "Some might call it the axle of anti-American populism. With linchpins in Tehran on one end and Caracas on the other, a new brand of international populism is rising by fanning flames of division between Western powers and the 'powerless' of the developing world." Leaders like Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez "are winning points at home by striking a nationalist and anti-American pose. Their method: Use the international stage to rail against what they see as a disconnect between the values espoused by the world's sole superpower and its actions." But in addition to "all their heated rhetoric, the two leaders have a vision for the world, one that seeks to end the 'sole superpower' reality. Beyond simply opposing America's robust exercise of power -- a sentiment increasingly found in the developing world, especially -- their aim is to join political forces to provide a significant counterweight in the international arena." And according to Thomas Carothers, an expert on democracy and rule of law at Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, "Russia's Vladimir Putin also belongs on the list," of those leaders.

Preval Expected To Win Haitian Election. The New York Times (2/10, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "Unofficial electoral results that had been carried in by mules, trucks and helicopters from polling centers across the country appeared Thursday to give an early lead to René Préval, a former president considered a champion of the poor masses and a thorn in the side of the elite." Early returns indicate "that Mr. Préval had won 61 percent of the 15 percent of the votes tabulated from the election Tuesday, including 67 percent of the votes counted so far in the department that includes Port-au-Prince." Although "several of his opponents quietly began to move toward conceding, others cautioned that it was still too early to declare a winner, and the political hostilities that have kept this country near the brink of anarchy lingered in the air." A top "objective of Mr. Préval's government, one of his advisers said, would be to attract more investment from the United States. In the last decade, the adviser said, United States investment in Haiti was less than $10 million, the amount invested in a single year in the neighboring Dominican Republic."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Harman, 61K) reports, "International election monitoring groups have said…that, despite minor irregularities, there was no credible evidence of widespread fraud. 'Having been on the ground in Haiti observing the preparations and the elections, I would say it was a reasonably fair election,' Knowlson Gift, Trinidad's Foreign Minister, told The Associated Press."

Polish Prime Minister Proposes Energy Security Treaty. Polish Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz in an op-ed in the Financial Times (2/10) writes that in response to recent energy disruptions "I want to propose to our partners from the EU and the Nato alliance a treaty on energy security." It "could follow formulas contained in the 1949 Washington Treaty, an agreement that allowed for effective transatlantic co-operation, or provisions of the modified Treaty of Brussels that established the Western European Union in 1948." Marcinkiewicz concludes, "Our president is raising this issue today in Washington and I will shortly present an initiative that expands on this idea. … I am convinced that the latest – unprecedented – curtailment of natural gas supplies to the EU, in one of the harshest winters of recent years, created a sufficient predicament to encourage bold and firm action. An energy security treaty would give us ways and means to provide stability and security that we all wish for."

Friedman Says Bush Energy Policy Endangering World. Thomas Friedman in his column in the New York Times (2/10, 1.19M) writes that "if the Arab world starts to go nuclear, then you will see the crumbling of the whole global nuclear nonproliferation regime." And "with so many nuclear powers, particularly in its primary oil-producing region," the world will "only be a more dangerous and unstable place, compared with the post-cold-war world." For the US, "its leadership task has shifted. If the Bush team continues to let Dick Cheney set its oil policy -- one that will keep America dependent on crude oil -- the post-cold-war democracy movement that was unleashed by the fall of the Berlin Wall will be either aborted, diluted or reversed. If regimes like those in Iran, Venezuela, Syria, Burma, Sudan and Nigeria have the benefit of 10 years of $60-a-barrel oil, whatever democratic tide President Bush thinks he is unleashing will be stymied. The worst regimes in the world will have the most power to support the most regressive political and religious trends." Friedman states, "That's why we need an urgent national effort, starting with a gasoline tax, to move the U.S. economy onto a path of more fuel-efficient cars and renewable energy. If we do it, everyone will follow."

Chinese Monopolies Increasingly Violate US Antitrust Laws. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Wilke, Chen, 2.11M) reports, "As China becomes ever more dominant in manufacturing, its ability to dictate the prices of industrial and consumer products is steadily rising. As a result, Chinese manufacturers are increasingly running afoul of Western antitrust law in products from vitamin C to a mineral used in steel production. These legal struggles could become another point of tension in the U.S.-China relationship, which has been tested by disagreements over matters from textile tariffs to the trade deficit." The Journal notes, "Monopolies remain active in parts of China's economy, even though price-fixing was formally outlawed in 1998. A sweeping new antimonopoly law is being drafted in Beijing. Its adoption has been slowed by squabbling among Chinese government agencies forced to give up the ability to set prices. It isn't clear if the new law would bar price collusion in the vitamin market."

Yahoo Under Fire For Aiding China In Crackdown On Dissenters. ABC World News Tonight (2/9, story 5, Vargas) reported, "The Internet giant Yahoo! was facing fierce criticism from human rights advocates tonight. Like its rivals Microsoft and Google, Yahoo! was hungry to do business in China, the world's second largest Internet market. But that means playing by China's rules. For the second time, now, Yahoo! was accused of helping China prosecute Chinese Internet users for exercising free speech." ABC (Tapper) added, "Chinese journalist Shi Tao anonymously e-mailed to pro-democracy Websites examples of press censorship, including government instructions on how to cover the anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre. According to court papers, Yahoo! helped the government trace that e-mail to Shi Tao's computer. He was sentenced to ten years in prison." Another dissident, Li Zhi, "is in prison for exposing Chinese government corruption on a message board. Yahoo! is accused of helping the government identify him, too." Chinese dissidents "in the US expressed outrage." Harry Wu, Chinese dissident: "It's a dirty business. It costs people life. The money is built on their people suffering and blood." Tapper: "Next week, a congressional subcommittee will demand answers." Rep. Christopher Smith: "Profits don't trump human rights. And, unfortunately, they seem to be doing that."

Loss Of Glaciers Said To Be Caused By Global Warming. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 9, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Just before we left the United States for Italy we learned that January was the warmest January ever in all the recorded history of the US and suddenly now, in this region, global warming is a hot issue as well." NBC (Maceda) added, "They are like the jewels of the Alps, the glaciers, thousands of years old. These majestic rivers of ice span the European continent and have been the pillars of its ski industry. Providing year-round skiing in resorts like Val Senales, in the Italian alps. Until now. Global warming, climatologists say, is melting these glaciers. And not slowly. The glaciers, some warn, will all but disappear in 50 years. Already, melting permafrost is threatening glacier ski stations and lifts leaving resort official in a critical race against the elements. And it's a way of life. 80% of those Italian villagers depend on the Senales glacier for freshwater, grazing land for livestock and tourism. So over the summer, something revolutionary was rolled out. Giant strips of white fleece, the size of football fields. An Austrian and Swiss experiment, the polyethylene foil acts like a giant picnic cooler, keeping the sun out and the cold in. And it works. Wrapped glaciers lost just a fraction of their mass. Some even grew. But wrapping a whole glacier? Hardly. At that whopping $70,000 a sheet, only the most vulnerable parts of ski runs can be covered."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Says NSA Spying Should Be An Election Issue (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Vice President Cheney suggested last night that the debate over spying on overseas communications to or from terrorism suspects should be a political issue in this year's congressional elections.

Speaking to Republicans gathered for the annual CPAC convention, Cheney said the debate over the National Security Agency surveillance program "has clarified where all stand" on an issue that has drawn criticism from congressional Democrats and some Republicans.

"And with an important election coming up, people need to know just how we view the most critical questions of national security, and how we propose to defend the nation that all of us, Republicans and Democrats, love and are privileged to serve," Cheney said.

His comments reflected the emerging GOP plan to make national security and terrorism the centerpiece of House and Senate elections. White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove telegraphed the strategy last month when he told a Republican audience that "we are dealing with two parties that have fundamentally different views on national security."

Cheney's comments were the closest a top White House official has come to calling for the NSA program to be a political matter.

Democrats have criticized the White House for politicizing national security issues such as the USA Patriot Act and NSA surveillance.

Its unclear whether the GOP strategy will work, however.

In a new Associated Press poll, about half of those surveyed favored the wiretap program. In the same poll last month, 56 percent opposed it. White House officials privately argue that President Bush's greatest political strength is the same one that helped Republicans in the last two elections: fighting terrorism.

In recent weeks, Bush has shifted his public focus away from Iraq and trained it on winning public support for the program. Some Democrats argue that Bush is breaking the law by spying on people in the United States without a warrant and without congressional or judicial oversight. Bush contends that the Constitution and the 2001 congressional war resolution give him the authority to take such steps to track down terrorism suspects.

"Some in Washington are yielding to the temptation to downplay the threat and to back away from the business at hand," Cheney said. "That mind-set may be comforting, but it is dangerous."

Dean's latest line

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, in criticizing government eavesdropping on domestic phone calls involving terror suspects overseas, likened President Bush to the leader of Iran.

"All we ask is that we not turn into a country like Iran, where the president can do anything he wants," Mr. Dean said yesterday on ABC's "Good Morning America."

The Republican National Committee immediately fired back at Mr. Dean.

"Chairman Dean's outrageous comparison today between the United States and Iran is reckless and wrong," RNC spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said. "By equating the United States of America to an oppressive regime that promotes anti-Semitism, suppresses women and restricts free speech, Howard Dean continues to lower the bar for political discourse in this country. The question for Democrats is, do they stand beside their party chairman and his latest wild-eyed attack?"

DOJ_NMG_0013747

Scandalous behavior

"Mark Antony in his famous funeral oration in Shakespeare's 'Julius Caesar' says that he came not to praise Caesar, but to bury him. This week, at the funeral for the widow of Dr. Martin Luther King, two of the speakers, Jimmy Carter and Rev. Joseph Lowery, might have opened their remarks by saying that they came not to bury Coretta Scott King, but to bash [President] Bush, which is exactly what they proceeded to do," Lee Harris writes at www.tcsdaily.com.

"They exploited a solemn occasion in order to take cheap pot shots at the president, keenly aware that their remarks would be broadcast around the world, and into many American classrooms," the writer said.

"Of course, both Carter and Lowery were also aware that the target of their attack, George W. Bush, was sitting right behind them. Had he not been present on the occasion, their Bush-bashing would have only been an affront to good taste.

"But because Bush had come there to honor the memory of Coretta Scott King, and not to engage in a debate with his political opponents, the attacks on him crossed the boundaries of mere bad taste, and became low blows. They were deliberately attacking a man who they knew could not, under the circumstances, defend himself against their assault. Their aim was quite obvious — to embarrass and humiliate Bush in the full knowledge that there was not a thing Bush could decently do about it.

"The president, for example, could not do what most people, including myself, would have done. He could not jump up and simply walk out — that would have created a scandal. Therefore, he had no choice but to sit there and take it. He was hopelessly trapped, and was entirely at the mercy of his assailants — and they knew it. He had to behave like the president, even when a former president, Mr. Carter, was behaving like a cad."

Cheney rethinks?

Vice President Dick Cheney, who has issued repeated Shermanesque statements that he will not run for president in 2008, said last night that he may be rethinking his position.

Almost.

After a crowd of hundreds gathered at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Northwest gave him a rousing standing ovation before his speech last night, the vice president was moved.

"Getting a reception like that almost makes me want to run for office again," he said with a wry smile.

As the crowd again erupted in applause, he cut them off — "Almost," he said loudly, drawing laughter.

The vice president gave the Republican rank and file the same message his boss, President Bush, has for the past few months — extend the tax cuts, renew the USA Patriot Act and stay the course in Iraq.

Taking a dig at the more liberal Massachusetts senator, Mr. Cheney said U.S. troops have received "mixed signals out of Washington."

"They have at times been unfairly criticized, as when John Kerry said on national television that American soldiers were, quote, terrorizing Iraqi women and children in their homes." The crowd booed lustily.

But he said that under Mr. Bush's leadership, "We are in this fight to win, and we are winning."

For those in Washington who say the war in Iraq is a distraction, he said: "Which part of the war on terror do they consider worth fighting?"

Surveillance poll

President Bush's campaign to convince Americans that the government's terrorist surveillance program is essential to national security has had an effect: Last month, people disapproved, 56 percent to 42 percent. Now it's basically tied.

In the poll of 1,000 adults taken from Monday to Wednesday, 50 percent said the administration "should be required to get a warrant" before monitoring Americans' communications involving terror suspects. Forty-eight percent said officials "should be allowed to monitor without a warrant." The two-point gap is less than the poll's margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

Mr. Bush has been particularly successful at making his case to core supporters, including Republicans, white evangelicals and suburban men. Support in each category grew more than 10 percentage points in the past month, the Associated Press reports.

Land of the free

It's all about the freebies for hundreds of activists attending this week's Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Northwest.

Conference attendees get a canvas tote bag full of goodies, including a 2006 calendar from the National Taxpayers Union, mints from TV Watch and a pink toy pig from Americans for Limited Government.

The Young America's Foundation booth was doing brisk business with a "buy one, get one free" deal on posters. Those who bought YAF's eye-catching Ann Coulter poster could have their free pick of a Ronald Reagan poster or a President Bush poster.

Meanwhile, at the booth of Nashville-based publisher Nelson Current, author Joel Miller was giving away T-shirts to promote his new book, which was subtitled, "How Big Government Puts the Squeeze on America's Families, Finances and Freedom."

For some reason, Mr. Miller's T-shirts were especially popular with ladies at CPAC. Maybe it's because the shirts are hot pink. But it also might have something to do with the book title, boldly displayed on the front of the T-shirts: "Size Matters."

No-go

Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan said yesterday that she will not run for the U.S. Senate against Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, Reuters news agency reports.

Mrs. Sheehan, speaking in front of San Francisco City Hall, said, "If I thought that running for Senate would bring our young people home more quickly, I would do it in a minute, but I am not convinced that that would do so."

Mrs. Sheehan in recent weeks had expressed interest in challenging Mrs. Feinstein, who does not favor an immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

Poll: Surveillance Wins Some More Backers (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP2, February 10, 2006

President Bush's campaign to convince Americans that the government's eavesdropping program is essential to the war on terrorism has made an impact: Last month people disapproved, 56 percent to 42 percent. Now it's basically 50-50.

Bush has been particularly successful at making his case to core supporters, including Republicans, white evangelicals and suburban men. Support in each category grew more than 10 percentage points in the last month.

The AP-Ipsos poll findings came as the White House relented and provided some new details to the House and Senate Intelligence Committees about the program. At Bush's direction, the National Security Agency has been monitoring communications between people overseas and in the U.S. when links to terrorism are suspected.

However, Senate Democrats left their three-hour session Thursday frustrated about the level of information they received from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Gen. Michael Hayden, the nation's No. 2 intelligence official.

"Where we really wanted hard information that was important to us — to give us the size of the scope and the reach and the depth — they were not forthcoming," said West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, the intelligence panel's top Democrat. "And what that did was take good people who were willing ... to have an open mind about all of this, and push them the other direction."

The irritation stood in contrast to some Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee. That panel's top Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (news, bio, voting record) of California, left a separate briefing on Wednesday cautiously saying she saw a thaw after weeks of White House insistence that it would not brief the congressional committees on the program's details. Under the initial plan, the briefing was only supposed to cover legal issues, but members said they also got some operational information.

It was unclear why the White House suddenly was willing to share more information with lawmakers. When asked what changed, Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said: "Meaningful dialogue." He would not elaborate.

The debate over the program has turned intensely political in recent days. A growing cadre of Republicans has joined Democrats in raising fundamental questions about the program. Although the White House has argued the president has all the authority he needs to order the surveillance, calls for legislation have grown.

As part of an upcoming bill, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he wants the secretive Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to review the program and determine if it is constitutional.

Using a different approach, Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, said changes in U.S. law are necessary to give the White House the statutory authority it needs to conduct the monitoring — and end the controversy.

Bush's spokesman Scott McClellan said the White House will listen to lawmakers' ideas on legislation, but the president has indicated he would resist any move that would compromise the program. "There is a high bar to overcome on such ideas," McClellan said.

Some lawmakers see Roberts as key to any changes. He said the legislative work should be the jurisdiction of his committee, if "there is any necessity" for a bill. He was noncommittal about whether there would be future briefings on the program, saying, "We'll see."

The intelligence committee's Democrats and at least two Republicans have called for inquiries into the program. Thursday's session "doesn't excuse the need for genuine accountability," said Sen. Ron Wyden (news, bio, voting record), D-Ore., a committee member.

Two senators are looking outside the Bush administration for information. Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., wrote a letter Thursday to the major telecommunications companies — AT&T Inc., Sprint Nextel Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc. — asking if they have cooperated with the government monitoring.

As congressional debate continues, public support for the program has grown with the White House's monthlong campaign of speeches and TV appearances to make its case that the monitoring is necessary. According to the AP-Ipsos poll, some 48 percent of Americans now support the administration's program. That's up from 42 percent last month.

Half now say the administration should have to get a warrant to conduct eavesdropping, down from 56 percent one month ago. Support for the program grew by 9 percentage points among men, but it dropped 8 points — to 30 percent — in the Northeast.

Some noteworthy trends from Bush's political base:

_Fifty-eight percent of suburban men support the program, up 13 percentage points.

_Fifty-six percent of Southerners support the program, up 12 points.

_Republican support for the program jumped 14 points to 82 percent. Independent support is up 17 points, to 53 percent.

_White evangelical support grew by 11 points, to 71 percent.

Former FBI Agent Ralph Decker Thinks Wiretapping Is Not Only Legal, It's Necessary. (KIMT)

KIMT-TV, February 10, 2006

He says at least 50-attacks have been stopped by the FBI since September 11th.

He thinks the senate's investigation into the matter, could be hurting the spying program.

Ralph Decker tells KIMT NewsChannel Three," I just hope the senate wakes up because I know the trail of blood would lead right back to the senate if something does happen and would they claim it? Probably not knowing them."

But supporters like Ralph will face an uphill battle since opponents of the wiretapping say spying on American citizens without warrants is not just illegal, it's a violation of their constitutional rights.

If Al Qaeda Phones Tell Them We Can't Take The Call (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

Let's start with the one thing we know for sure about the Bush administration's program to listen to al Qaeda's phone calls into and out of the United States: It's dead.

After all the publicity of the past two weeks, does anyone think that the boys working on plans for Boston Harbor, the Golden Gate Bridge or Chicago's Loop are still chatting by phone? If the purpose of the public exposure was to pull the plug on the pre-emptive surveillance program, mission accomplished. Be safe, Times Square.

At the least, al Qaeda's operatives in Yemen, Iraq, Pakistan, Hamburg and the U.S. will hold off phoning in the next mass-murder plan until the U.S. Senate finishes deliberating Arlen Specter's proposal to legislatively order up an opinion from the judges on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, est. 1978, as to whether the antiterrorist wiretap program violates the law that created their jobs.

This passage appears on the second page of the 9/11 Commission's 567-page report, On Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States: "We learned that the institutions charged with protecting our borders, civil aviation and national security did not understand how grave this threat could be, and did not adjust their policies, plans and practices to deter or defeat it. . . . We learned of the pervasive problems of managing and sharing information across a large and unwieldy government [my emphasis] that had been built in a different era to confront different dangers."

And those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it. Having watched one passenger-filled airliner fly into a skyscraper on a peaceful morning in lower Manhattan more than four years ago, I'd just as soon not repeat the experience. If the question on the table is whether it is legal for the executive branch to listen without warrants to phone calls between people who repeatedly chant "Death to America," then I guess I'm for declaring it respectful of our laws and getting on with it.

But insofar as the surveillance program has been rendered moot, let's by all means pull over to the side of the road and have a long national conversation about it. (But don't send your thoughts to Sen. Specter via the Postal Service, as his Web site contains the following Important Notice: "Security restrictions now cause considerable delay in processing postal mail sent to Senate offices.")

The issues at the center of this dispute are in fact intellectually interesting, having to do with separation of powers, legal rules versus legal discretion, and competing interpretations of the Fourth Amendment and Article II of the Constitution.

But let us here consider something that tends to fall outside legal considerations -- effective management. On Tuesday, Vice President Cheney said, "You can't take 535 members of Congress and tell them everything and protect the nation's secrets." Mr. Cheney was reflecting the view, which arose at the time of the Founding Fathers, that foreign policy was disorganized under the Articles of Confederation and belonged under a strong executive. A primary reason for calling the Constitutional Convention of 1787 was the mess Congress had made of managing foreign policy.

Then later in the week GOP Rep. Heather Wilson suddenly became famous for presumably dissenting from the White House line and demanding a "complete review" of the surveillance program. Rep. Wilson, who chairs a House intelligence oversight subcommittee, is rightly regarded as one of the House's savvier and more serious members on national security issues. But . . .

Rep. Wilson is in a neck-and-neck re-election fight back in her New Mexico district with state Attorney General Patricia Madrid. Rep. Wilson is under pressure because her district is heavily Democratic; the opposition's primary line of attack has been that Rep. Wilson isn't sufficiently "independent" of the Bush White House. Right after her highly publicized NSA declaration this week, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee got out a statement that "Rep. Wilson is now and has always been a rubber stamp for the policies of the Bush-Cheney administration."

What this means is that the local politics of Albuquerque is now setting national security policy. Why them? Why not accord the same overweighted political status to the Third District in North Carolina, which happens to house Camp Lejeune? The primary argument against letting Albuquerque set national security policy through Rep. Wilson's political problems back home is found in that earlier statement from the 9/11 Commission: You simply cannot disperse policy formation in this area across all branches of government in the guise of checks and balances and then expect efficient management in, say, stopping terrorists. Nor can you present the paperwork required to satisfy "probable cause" before a FISA judge prior to every proposed antiterror wiretap and not risk flipping the competition's outcome in favor of the terrorists.

Historically, the proper path for working out these national security disputes hasn't been Sen. Specter's preposterous appeal to let some judge design the nation's antiterror policy but rather through informal political negotiation between the executive branch and Congress. That only works, though, if the presidency has someone who will negotiate in good faith. Who's that? Hillary Clinton, already on the campaign trail in front of the UAW Wednesday, contributed: "You cannot explain to me why we have not captured or killed the tallest man in Afghanistan." Well for starters, he's probably not making phone calls.

At the Judiciary Committee hearings Monday, Sen. Leahy announced: "Mr. Attorney General, in America, our America, nobody is above the law, not even the president of the United States." Got it. But here's the bottom line on the surveillance program. It was going to work, and help lessen the chance of another atrocity in our America, only if it stayed secret. The odds of it staying secret would diminish as its existence spread through the Congress and judicial system. Now it is public, and its utility is about zero. What's left is the legal issue of whether it violated FISA. We can only look forward to the answer.

Changing Winds On Surveillance (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

This week the Bush administration was finally forced out of its own pre-Sept. 11 worldview -- and, yes, you read that right. It happened because some brave Republicans stared the president down and said: Stop.

Of course, it is the administration that is always accusing its opponents of pre-Sept. 11 thinking. But for the past five years, President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Karl Rove have been willing to put the national unity required to fight terrorism in second place behind their goals of aggrandizing presidential power and winning elections. Can you get more pre-Sept. 11 than that?

Instead of seeking broad agreement on the measures required for our nation's safety, they preferred to pick fights designed to make the Democrats look soft and to claim the president could do pretty much anything he wanted.

That's why the White House made sure that Rove trumpeted the surveillance issue before the Republican National Committee last month. A president who cared more about national security than politics wouldn't send out his top political lieutenant to make sure everyone knew that the GOP planned to use a matter of such grave importance to bash Democrats.

And it's why Cheney, when asked this week by Jim Lehrer if Bush was willing to work with Congress on the issue, barely entertained the question. "We believe, Jim, that we have all the legal authority we need," Cheney replied immediately. Congress could make any suggestions it wanted, but -- I add the italics to underscore the point -- the White House would ignore whatever it chose to ignore. " We'd have to make a decision as an administration whether or not we think it would help and would enhance our capabilities."

Translation -- Cheney to Congress: Buzz off.

But this time some important members of the president's own party -- led by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter -- decided that enough is enough. As stewards of Congress's constitutional authority, they could not stand by while the president claimed the power to decide for himself what the law said and whether he needed to follow it without any concern for what those meddlesome members of Congress or judges might say.

And it's wonderful to see what a few brave politicians can achieve. Yesterday, the administration agreed to brief the Senate intelligence committee on the program after having offered a similar briefing to the comparable House committee the day before.

It was a small crack in the wall, and Specter and his allies will have to remain vigilant. Still, until this week, the White House had flatly refused to offer such briefings. The winds are changing.

What's heartening is how broad the Republican dissent from the administration has been -- a sign that many Republicans have calculated that they'll be better off in this fall's elections if they do their jobs, even if this means challenging Bush and Cheney.

Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), who faces a tough reelection battle and has shown streaks of independence in the past, demanded the briefings for reasons straight out of a good civics textbook. "The checks and balances in our system of government are very important," she said, noting that our "constitutional structure has kept us safe and free and the strongest country in the world for a very long time." Yes, let's wave a flag for this Air Force veteran.

Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who also is up for reelection, said that "this country would be stronger and the president would be stronger" if Bush accepted the idea that Congress might actually have a role in lawmaking on the surveillance issue.

And Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said the administration was making a "very dangerous" argument in claiming that it got the authority to wiretap without supervision when Congress passed its use-of-force resolution against terrorism. Graham said he never envisioned that he was giving Bush -- or "any other president" -- "carte blanche" on surveillance.

Focus for a moment on Graham's reference to "any other president." It's instructive to imagine what Republicans in Congress (let alone Rush Limbaugh or Bill O'Reilly) would say if a President Hillary Rodham Clinton were to claim the far-reaching authority Bush and Cheney say they have. Is there any doubt that the entire Republican Party would -- to cite a recent comment by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman -- "have a lot of anger" and denounce Clinton for arrogance, overreaching and power lust?

"The president should have all the tools he needs to fight terrorism," Specter said, "but we also want to maintain our civil liberties." Now there is a perfect expression of patriotic, post-Sept. 11 thinking.

President Kollar-Kotelly (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

We'd like to thank the Washington Post for publishing a story yesterday that so quickly proved our editorial point of the same day about the folly of putting judges in control of national security decisions. That's what we call service.

The front-page story reported that on rare occasion the Bush Administration has used information from the NSA's warrantless foreign-linked wiretaps to seek domestic wiretapping authority from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. This was said to have upset chief FISA judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, and the tenor of the story is that this is one more example of how the warrantless wiretaps are an abuse of power. But the better question is, Who elected Ms. Kollar-Kotelly?

The story's real news is that Judge Kollar-Kotelly, and her predecessor Judge Royce Lamberth, took it upon themselves to erect a new "wall" concerning how intelligence is to be used to protect America. They decided that pertinent information gleaned from a warrantless wiretap should never be used later to justify a domestic warrant. But why not? If a tip gathered from an e mail from Pakistan leads to suspicion about an American-based contact, what's wrong with using that news to get a legal warrant to track that suspect in the U.S.? It might even prevent a domestic attack.

In any event, why is an unelected judge such as Ms. Kollar-Kotelly making these decisions? Under the Constitution, those calls ought to be made by the President, who swears to defend the U.S. and can be held accountable by the voters if he fails. Under the current FISA court process, Judge Kollar-Kotelly answers essentially to no one.

GOP Senator Arlen Specter is saying he wants to write legislation putting even more power in the hands of FISA judges. This isn't merely unconstitutional. As the Post story shows, in a world of WMD and fast-moving transnational terrorists, it's dangerous.

Another Set Of Eyes (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

THE BUSH administration would like the debate over its warrantless wiretapping program to divide neatly a long partisan, and potentially electorally useful, lines. But some Republican legislators aren't with the program. Their responsible pressure has nudged the administration from its customary highhandedness. The resulting congressional briefings are a good first step, but a framework for real oversight of the surveillance program remains necessary.

When Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday, Republican senators -- Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio), Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) -- expressed discomfort with the administration's end run around the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). Then Rep. Heather A. Wilson

(R-N.M.), who chairs a House intelligence subcommittee that oversees the National Security Agency, called for a full congressional investigation into the eavesdropping. She'd been trying in vain to get information from the administration about the program since it was revealed in December. After her public statement, the administration wisely, if belatedly, agreed to brief House and Senate intelligence panels not just with a rehash of its unconvincing legal arguments but with actual details about the surveillance.

This is a promising reversal but not enough. Lawmakers beyond the "Gang of Eight" congressional leaders and intelligence committee chairs need to know what the surveillance program entails. But it is even more important to try to put in place a mechanism -- beyond the executive branch monitoring itself -- to make certain the surveillance stays within constitutional boundaries.

The administration is not exactly embracing the notion of congressional involvement here -- but it is also not slamming the door as firmly as it has in some confrontations. Questioned by PBS's Jim Lehrer on Tuesday, Vice President Cheney said a legislative fix was both unnecessary and potentially counterproductive. "We believe firmly . . . that we have all the legal authority we need," Mr. Cheney said, adding, "I don't think it would necessarily be in the interests of the country" to have new legislation. Still, he said of Congress, "if you've got suggestions, we're happy to listen to them."

Lawmakers don't seem to be deterred by the administration's coolness to a legislative solution -- and they shouldn't be. Mr. Specter is drafting legislation that would call on the court that oversees the administration of FISA to determine the constitutionality of the surveillance program. Ms. Wilson and other lawmakers have raised the possibility of rewriting the FISA statute to accommodate new technological realities.

Mr. Brownback urged the administration to recognize the importance of having "another set of eyes also looking at this surveillance technique." The administration ought to take his advice.

Editorial: Stonewalled (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, February 10, 2006

Bush team keeps Congress in the dark

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clearer than ever this week that the Bush administration is determined not only to continue warrantless electronic eavesdropping, but also to stonewall Congress and the public by saying "trust us" over and over - and not much else.

Testifying Monday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales fell back on the argument that the president is responsible for protecting the country, and that the Constitution and Congress, in authorizing the president after 9/11 to use force against terrorist groups and states, give him the authority to do it as he sees fit. Even the most innocuous questions from senators elicited mostly platitudes, obfuscation and refusals to answer. Gonzales even said Congress is a full partner in combating terrorism.

"In the arena of war," he said, "it is not true that the president works ... to the exclusion of Congress. Quite the contrary; our framers intended that, in a time of war, both branches of government have a role to play."

Oh? Presumably that means Congress should be grateful for any scrap of information thrown its way. Key members of Congress - eight in all - have been briefed "fully," according to administration officials. But some of those briefed have said the information provided is sketchy and that security rules bar them from spelling out their objections.

Gonzales, President Bush and others have said the program, run by the National Security Agency, is limited in nature, affecting only a modest number of Americans at the U.S. end of international phone calls and e-mails. But other sources, including unnamed sources involved in the program, have said the Federal Bureau of Investigation has been inundated with information producing no useful leads.

The frustration in Congress is bipartisan. At least four of 10 GOP members of the Judiciary Committee - including Chairman Arlen Specter - have challenged official assertions of unfettered authority. So, now, has Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, who chairs a subcommittee of the House Intelligence Committee. She has called for the full Intelligence Committee to conduct an inquiry. But so far that seems unlikely.

What does seem likely is growing mutual mistrust between the administration and its supporters in Congress and those in both parties who feel, justifiably, that the president has essentially dealt Congress out of the anti-terrorist campaign. Vice President Dick Cheney made that point clearly in an interview this week, saying, "We have all the authority we need" and that a public debate "could alert al-Qaida to tactics used" by U.S. officials.

Nonsense. Closed hearings could do much to reassure Congress, and indirectly the public, that the administration is not exceeding its mandate while wrapping itself in the flag of national security. If it does have all the authority it needs, then why isn't it willing to make its case to the branch of government charged with making the laws, declaring war and providing the funds to pay for it?

Cal Thomas: In A Dither On Security (SACBEE)

By Cal Thomas

The Sacramento Bee, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013754

"The critical question before the committee was to determine how the fundamental liberties of the people can be maintained in the course of the government's effort to protect their security. The delicate balance between these basic goals of our system of government is often difficult to strike, but it can, and must, be achieved."

That is not a statement from a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which last Monday heard testimony from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales about the Bush administration's efforts to monitor the conversations of terrorist suspects. It is from the introduction to the 1976 "Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities," sometimes referred to as the Church Committee after its chairman, Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho.

The New York Times recalled those "glorious" (for the left) days by reprinting a picture of Church talking to reporters during the 1975 hearings into the misuse of intelligence gathering by the Nixon administration. Though Nixon used government agencies to spy on his domestic political enemies, the Times wants its readers to believe that what the Bush administration is doing by monitoring phone calls and other communications between terrorist suspects outside the country, and those inside, is similar behavior.

What the newspaper fails to acknowledge is that the findings of the Church Committee led to the dismantling of many useful intelligence-gathering operations, thus limiting our ability to gather precisely the type of intelligence that would have been useful in stopping 9/11.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee denied they are trying to write a bill of rights for terrorists. Sen. Patrick Leahy, R-Vt., assured his colleagues and those watching C-SPAN, which carried the hearing live, that he wants to do everything possible to find terrorists before they kill more of us. He just wants to make sure it is done "legally."

Democrats appeared not to accept Gonzales' testimony that the surveillance is being done legally, preferring to make political points rather than capture and defeat the enemy.

The danger in tinkering with intelligence gathering is that the tinkerers sometimes go too far. In its effort to curtail domestic eavesdropping and foreign spying 30 years ago, a Democratic Congress used the Church Committee findings on illegal domestic surveillance in a way that some analysts believe subsequently curtailed our effectiveness to obtain information vital to the nation's security.

The CIA came to rely more on satellites and other technologies and less on human intelligence. The result was fewer people who spoke the languages of the countries in which they operated and the consequence of that has been a reduced ability to gather information that could only be obtained on the ground.

Politicians, egged on by the crusading media (who were feeling especially self-righteous after "bringing down" President Nixon), resembled constitutional fundamentalists. Today's left quotes the text of the Constitution as if it means what it says on searches and seizures, though when it comes to behavior the left wishes to condone, the Constitution morphs into a "living document" in constant need of updating to suit the times.

Which is it? Liberals in the 1970s began suggesting that virtually all American spying is unconstitutional. Soviet and Chinese spies were to be expected, but we shouldn't "be like them." A similar double standard exists today in much of the big media and among certain liberal politicians of both parties. The enemy does what it wants without restraint. We put shackles on ourselves and are shocked when those without any attack us. Then we ask, "What went wrong?"

In his defense of the president's order to monitor limited communications between foreign terrorist suspects and people in the United States, Gonzales listed a number of presidents, Democratic and Republican, dating back to the 19th century, who had used far more invasive and widespread tactics to gather intelligence they believed crucial to defending the nation.

Should the United States be attacked again, the next congressional hearings (assuming Congress survives the attack) will focus on why more wasn't done to protect us. More is now being done and public opinion seems to be fine with it for now, complaints from liberal Democrats (and a few liberal Republicans) notwithstanding.

Loose Lips Sink Spies (NYT)

By Porter Goss

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

Washington

AT the Central Intelligence Agency, we are more than holding our own in the global war on terrorism, but we are at risk of losing a key battle: the battle to protect our classified information.

Judge Laurence Silberman, a chairman of President Bush's commission on weapons of mass destruction, said he was "stunned" by the damage done to our critical intelligence assets by leaked information. The commission reported last March that in monetary terms, unauthorized disclosures have cost America hundreds of millions of dollars; in security terms, of course, the cost has been much higher. Part of the problem is that the term "whistleblower" has been misappropriated. The sharp distinction between a whistleblower and someone who breaks the law by willfully compromising classified information has been muddied.

As a member of Congress in 1998, I sponsored the Intelligence Community Whistleblower Protection Act to ensure that current or former employees could petition Congress, after raising concerns within their respective agency, consistent with the need to protect classified information.

Exercising one's rights under this act is an appropriate and responsible way to bring questionable practices to the attention of those in Congress charged with oversight of intelligence agencies. And it works. Government employees have used statutory procedures — including internal channels at their agencies — on countless occasions to correct abuses without risk of retribution and while protecting information critical to our national defense.

On the other hand, those who choose to bypass the law and go straight to the press are not noble, honorable or patriotic. Nor are they whistleblowers. Instead they are committing a criminal act that potentially places American lives at risk. It is unconscionable to compromise national security information and then seek protection as a whistleblower to forestall punishment.

Today America is confronting an enemy intent on brutal murder. Without the capacity to gain intelligence on terrorist organizations through clandestine sources and methods, we and our allies are left vulnerable to the horrors of homicidal fanaticism.

The C.I.A. has put many terrorists out of action since 9/11. In our pursuit of the enemy, we accept the unique responsibility we bear as officers of a clandestine service serving an open, constitutional society. But we also know that unauthorized disclosure of classified intelligence inhibits our ability to carry out our mission and protect the nation.

Revelations of intelligence successes or failures, whether accurate or not, can aid Al Qaeda and its global affiliates in many ways. A leak is invaluable to them, even if it only, say, prematurely confirms whether one of their associates is dead or alive. They can gain much more: these disclosures can tip the terrorists to new technologies we use, our operational tactics, and the identities of brave men and women who risk their lives to assist us.

Such leaks also cause our intelligence partners around the globe to question our professionalism and credibility. Too many of my counterparts from other countries have told me, "You Americans can't keep a secret." And because of the number of recent news reports discussing our relationships with other intelligence services, some of these critical partners have even informed the C.I.A. that they are reconsidering their participation in some of our most important antiterrorism ventures. They fear that exposure of their cooperation could subject their citizens to terrorist retaliation.

Last month, a news article in this newspaper described a "secret meeting" to discuss "highly classified" techniques to detect efforts by other countries to build nuclear weapons. This information was attributed to unnamed intelligence officials who "spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the effort's secrecy." Whether accurate or not, this is a direct acknowledgment that these unnamed officials apparently know the importance of secrecy.

Recently, I noticed renewed debate in the news media over press reports in 1998 that Osama bin Laden's satellite phone was being tracked by United States intelligence officials. In the recent debate, it was taken for granted that the original reports did not hurt our national security efforts, and any suggestions that they did cause damage were dismissed as urban myth. But the reality is that the revelation of the phone tracking was, without question, one of the most egregious examples of an unauthorized criminal disclosure of classified national defense information in recent years. It served no public interest. Ultimately, the bin Laden phone went silent.

I take seriously my agency's responsibility to protect our national security. Unauthorized disclosures undermine our efforts and abuse the trust of the people we are sworn to protect. Since becoming director, I have filed criminal reports with the Department of Justice because of such compromises. That department is committed to working with us to investigate these cases aggressively. In addition, I have instituted measures within the agency to further safeguard the integrity of classified data.

Our enemies cannot match the creativity, expertise, technical genius and tradecraft that the C.I.A. brings to bear in this war. Criminal disclosures of national security information, however, can erase much of that advantage. The terrorists gain an edge when they keep their secrets and we don't keep ours.

US Sends 3 Guantanamo Prisoners Home To Morocco (REU)

Reuters, February 9, 2006

RABAT (Reuters) - The United States has handed three suspected Islamic militants held at its Guantanamo Bay prison over to Morocco, Moroccan state media reported on Thursday.

The three Moroccan men were being detained in Casablanca, Morocco's financial capital, for further questioning by an investigating judge, the official news agency MAP reported.

MAP gave no further details and Moroccan security officials were not immediately available for comment.

The extradition was announced two days after U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation head Robert Mueller held talks with King Mohammed on security cooperation between Rabat and Washington.

Mueller, who toured the North Africa region to cement the U.S. anti-terror drive, also met Morocco's top security chiefs.

"We knew very well that Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya are working together to fight terrorism," Thursday's edition of the Moroccan daily al Maghribia quoted Mueller as saying.

"So we must follow up in building our friendly relations with them and create mechanisms to exchange information quickly to prevent new terrorism attacks," he said.

Morocco, a staunch U.S. ally in the region, has been clamping down on suspected cells of Islamic radicals since 2003, when multiple suicide bombings in Casablanca killed 45 people and shocked the normally peaceful country.

The United States sent five Moroccan detainees home from Guantanamo in 2004, but the five have since been in and out of detention and questioning by police over their suspected links with radical Islamist cells.

Local lawyers and rights groups say more than 20 Moroccans are still held prison by Guanatanamo.

Morocco's main independent human rights group, the Moroccan Human Rights Association (AMDH), urged Moroccans to take to the streets in Rabat on Sunday to protest against expanded security cooperation with the United States.

"The protest will express the Moroccan people's opposition to integrate Morocco in the U.S. military and security plans under the disguise of opposition to terrorism. Such cooperation threatens Morocco's security and independence," the AMDH said in statement.

U.S. military authorities in Afghanistan on Thursday released seven men who had been detained at Guantanamo Bay.

PATRIOT ACT:

Senate Republicans Announce Deal For Renewal Of Patriot Act (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

The compromise focuses on subpoena powers. Democrats are split.

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans who had been blocking a long-term extension of the Patriot Act announced Thursday that an agreement reached with the White House could allow reauthorization of the anti-terrorism law.

At an afternoon news conference, Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said a bipartisan group of lawmakers had worked out changes in three areas where the legislators thought "we could do better to protect civil liberties while providing law enforcement the tools it needs."

DOJ_NMG_0013757

White House spokesman Scott McClellan hailed the agreement, saying that the administration was "pleased that this important legislation is moving forward."

Though some Democrats expressed support for the changes, others were critical, raising the prospect that a two-month filibuster of the act could continue.

"The few minor changes that the White House agreed to do not address the major problems with the Patriot Act that a bipartisan coalition has been trying to fix for the past several years," said Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis). "I will continue to strongly oppose and use every option at my disposal to stop any reauthorization of the Patriot Act that does not protect the rights and freedoms of law-abiding Americans."

Enacted shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the Patriot Act broke down barriers between intelligence agencies and law enforcement, giving each new powers to collect information. Lawmakers and civil liberties groups objected to provisions that included secret wiretaps and searches, saying they allowed the government to intrude too easily and too far into citizens' lives.

When the Patriot Act expired at the end of 2005, Congress resorted to passing short-term extensions while negotiations over its reauthorization took place.

Sununu made his announcement accompanied by Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.). Although the lawmakers acknowledged that they did not get everything they wanted, they said the compromise was an improvement over the version that emerged after House and Senate negotiators met in conference in November.

Those negotiations produced legislation that would have made permanent 14 of the Patriot Act's 16 provisions, prompting opponents to charge that the conference bill failed "to protect innocent people from unnecessary and intrusive government surveillance" and to fight against the act's reauthorization.

The changes announced Thursday focus largely on Section 215 orders, known as National Security Letters, a powerful type of subpoena that comes with a gag order forbidding recipients to say they have received it.

Lawmakers also reached a compromise on the act's so-called "library provision," which requires libraries, businesses or medical offices to hand over individual records to law enforcement officials.

One change, Sununu said, establishes that libraries functioning in their traditional role will no longer be subject to National Security Letters. He said the definition "traditional role" included lending digital books and providing patrons with access to the Internet.

Libraries that act as an Internet service provider, instead of simply giving people access to the Internet, would still be subject to National Security Letters.

Critics pointed out that in other respects, little has changed.

"This deal does not prevent the government from obtaining the library, medical and other sensitive business records of people with no link to suspected terrorists," Feingold said in a statement. "The records just have to be 'relevant' to a terrorist investigation, which is not adequate protection against a fishing expedition."

The negotiated changes also remove a requirement that recipients of a National Security Letter give the FBI the name of any attorney they consult about the subpoena. And, for the first time, recipients of the letters will be allowed to challenge the gag order that accompanies them, though they can only do that after a year has passed.

"We've always said that you ought to allow citizens to appeal that [gag order] before a judge," said Sununu. "We suggested a 90-day waiting period. This has a one-year waiting period, but it's important to have the process and the principle in place."

In order to successfully challenge a gag order, recipients of a National Security Letter would have to prove the government acted in bad faith.

Craig emphasized that the provisions concerning the National Security Letters would expire after four years unless they were renewed. "We've been most concerned about [Section] 215. We don't believe the protections are there the way they need to be," he said.

Craig said that there would be no additional changes, and that he was optimistic that the compromise version could pass.

DOJ_NMG_0013758

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said she would support the agreement, telling reporters outside the Senate chamber: "I'm going to vote for it. There are three changes, they are substantive changes…. I think it's important to get this done, and there is a four-year sunset, so we'll be able to watch it closely."

President Bush has vigorously defended the Patriot Act and the administration's domestic spying program, declaring during his Jan. 31 State of the Union address that "the enemy has not lost the desire or capability to attack us."

The Senate announcement came a few hours after Bush generally defended the administration's surveillance efforts. In a speech at the National Guard Memorial Building, the president said that his anti-terrorism strategy helped foil a 2002 terrorist plot to attack Los Angeles.

Senators Make Compromises On Patriot Act (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

A bipartisan group of senators reached agreement Thursday with the White House on disputed provisions of the USA Patriot Act, increasing the chances the anti-terrorism law, held up because of civil liberties concerns, will be renewed.

The compromise allows recipients of "Section 215" subpoenas seeking business or library records related to a terrorism investigation to challenge in court a requirement that they not tell anyone.

The compromise also scraps a provision that required recipients of "national security letters," which are issued without going before a judge, to provide the FBI with the name of any lawyer they consulted about it. A third element of the deal says traditional libraries may not be subject to FBI requests for information on research done by patrons.

The deal — reached by Republican Sens. Larry Craig of Idaho, John Sununu of New Hampshire and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska with Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. — moves the Senate to within a few votes of overcoming a filibuster that blocked renewal of the bill. Still uncertain, though, is whether the House will accept the compromise. The current version of the Patriot Act expires March 10.

Senate bill would curbpractice of 'earmarks'

Ten senators, led by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., introduced the Pork-Barrel Reduction Act. It's the latest of several proposals aimed at ending "earmarks," the special-interest projects that members of Congress insert into legislation just before final passage.

The measure would require that earmarks be described in detail and the sponsor identified, and any member could eliminate an earmark unless it is upheld by 60 votes in the 100-member chamber.

Sheehan won't challengeFeinstein in primary

Peace activist Cindy Sheehan said she won't run against Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., in the Democratic primary, even though she thinks Feinstein has not done enough to oppose the war.

"I think I'm more effective on the outside than on the inside," said Sheehan, whose 24-year-old son, Casey, was killed in Iraq in 2004.

Agreement Reached On Patriot Act Changes (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, February 10, 2006

A band of Senate Republican holdouts reached agreement Thursday with the White House on changes in the Patriot Act designed to clear the way for passage of anti-terror legislation stalled in a dispute over civil liberties.

Sen. John Sununu (news, bio, voting record), R-N.H. said the changes, quickly endorsed by at least one leading Democrat, would better "protect civil liberties even as we give law enforcement important tools to conduct terrorism investigation."

The White House embraced the deal even before Sununu and several other senators outlined it.

Presidential spokesman Scott McClellan said the agreement would "continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn't compromise our national security priorities."

"We're pleased that this important legislation is moving forward," he said.

The compromise focused on three areas:

_giving recipients of subpoenas for information in terrorist investigations the right to challenge a requirement that they refrain from telling anyone.

_eliminating a requirement that an individual provide the FBI with the name of a lawyer consulted about a National Security Letter, which is a secret request for records.

_clarifying that most libraries are not subject to demands in those letters for information about suspected terrorists.

While there was no immediate reaction from House Republicans, Sen. Larry Craig (news, bio, voting record), R-Idaho, one of the Senate negotiators, said he had been in close touch with the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis.

Reaction from the Democrats was divided.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, second-ranking in the Democratic leadership, appeared at the GOP news conference. He said the compromise included "significant progress" toward protecting basic liberties and that he planned to support the compromise.

The party's leader, Sen. Harry Reid (news, bio, voting record) of Nevada, said in a statement that the agreement among Republicans "appears to be a step in the right direction."

But Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., threatened a filibuster.

The senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary committee, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, criticized the White House. At the same time, his office left open the possibility he would support the measure.

The law originally was passed within days of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the administration says it has been an important weapon in the government's arsenal for tracking suspected terrorists.

Renewal of the law was blocked last year when critics said its provisions shortchanged civil liberties, particularly in the cases of individuals who were not suspected of terrorist activities themselves, but might have had innocent dealings with suspects.

Also at issue was concern over the government's ability to demand information from libraries.

As a result of the deadlock, lawmakers decided to extend the old law temporarily, a short-term solution that left the administration and many in Congress unhappy.

The current extension expires March 10.

Republicans said that with the changes, the chance would be remote that any library would have to turn over information.

But Democrats said the same provision made explicit that some libraries could be forced to turn over information, adding that existing law is vague on the subject.

Other than Sununu, the Senate Republicans who had defied the president's wishes on the Patriot Act last December were Craig, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

The changes were worked out over several weeks in discussions that involved the lawmakers and White House counsel Harriet Miers, according to one Republican familiar with the efforts.

Officials who discussed the issue did so on condition of anonymity, saying they did not want to pre-empt a formal announcement.

On Dec. 16, the Senate voted 52-47 to move to a final vote on the legislation, which deals specifically with 16 provisions in the act that Congress wanted reviewed and renewed by the end of last year. That was eight votes short of the 60 needed to end the filibuster.

Key Democratic And G.O.P. Senators Are In Accord On Extending Patriot Act (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — Four recalcitrant Senate Republicans said Thursday that they had reached agreement with the White House on the broad antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act, and two leading Democrats said they would now support the bill. The moves possibly clear the way for passage of the legislation, which has been bottled up in a dispute over civil liberties.

DOJ_NMG_0013760

The Republicans, led by Senator John E. Sununu of New Hampshire, joined with Democrats last year in a filibuster that blocked the revised bill. Their deal involved three changes that, they said, would place greater restraints on the government's latitude in obtaining personal information like library records and business transactions.

"This is an accommodation that I think we can be proud of," said another of the four senators, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, adding that the changes to the bill "makes it relevant, makes it realistic, makes it workable and protects both our rights and our national security interests."

The deal focused on three particular areas. The new measure would give recipients of subpoenas the right to challenge an accompanying judicial order not to discuss the case publicly, though they would have to wait one year. In the meantime, they would have to comply with the subpoena. That would prevent the F.B.I. from demanding the names of lawyers consulted by people who receive secret government requests for information and prevent most libraries from being subject to those requests.

Critics said the changes were cosmetic.

"A few insignificant changes just doesn't cut it," Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said in a statement. "I cannot support this deal, and I will do everything I can to stop it."

The administration would still have the power to obtain information about terror suspects who use libraries to gain access to the Internet by seeking that information not directly from libraries, but from their Internet service providers.

"This agreement clarifies crucial national security tools without weakening them and provides additional civil liberties protections," said a spokesman for the Justice Department, Brian Roehrkasse.

With the White House and Senate Republicans in accord, the bill is likely to be approved by the House. The question now is whether enough Democrats will support the compromise to give Republicans, who have 55 seats in the Senate, the 60 votes necessary to put it up for a vote. Two Democrats supported the earlier measure and another two, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Dianne E. Feinstein of California, said they would support the latest version. "It is a substantial improvement," Ms. Feinstein said. "There are three basic changes. They are specific. They do improve the bill. I think it's important to get this done."

As the fight over the Patriot Act has played out over the last several months, the original law, passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, has been extended to March 10. The bill, which greatly expanded the government's surveillance and investigative powers, has since its passage provoked intense debate about the balance between protecting national security and civil liberties.

The original bill included 16 provisions that were scheduled to expire at the end of 2005. The Senate and House passed differing measures to make those provisions permanent. But when the competing bills were reconciled into a new version, Mr. Sununu, Mr. Hagel and the two other Republicans, Larry E. Craig of Idaho and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, balked, forcing the temporary extension and prodding Mr. Sununu into negotiations with the White House.

Passage would make several major components of the act permanent.

The compromise does not, however, address one of their chief complaints, that the revised bill would allow the government to obtain private records of Americans with just loose connections to a terrorism investigation. Mr. Sununu and the others had originally insisted that the government prove a direct connection. In its current version, the bill simply says the records have to be relevant to a terrorism investigation, a standard that Ms. Feingold said was "not adequate protection against a fishing expedition."

Mr. Durbin, the lone Democrat to appear with Mr. Sununu and the others at a news conference on the compromise, disagreed, saying, "As Senator Sununu has said, we've made progress here, significant progress, progress that moves us in the right direction, protecting basic civil liberties at a time when we are dealing with a war on terrorism."

Patriot Act Compromise Clears Way For Senate Vote (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Efforts to extend the USA Patriot Act cleared a major hurdle yesterday when the White House and key senators agreed to revisions that are virtually certain to secure Senate passage and likely to win House approval, congressional leaders said.

The law -- passed in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks and scheduled to lapse in key areas last year -- makes it easier for federal agents to secretly tap phones, obtain library and bank records, and search the homes of suspected terrorists. Several

Democrats said the compromise announced yesterday lacks important civil liberties safeguards, and even the Republican negotiators said they had to yield to the administration on several points.

But with virtually all 55 GOP senators now on board, and Democrats joining them, the plan appears to have enough support to overcome the Senate filibuster that has thwarted a four-year renewal of the statute for months. Senators said they think the White House will be able to coax the Republican-controlled House to agree as well, even though House leaders have complained that senators' demands had weakened the measure.

"It was a bipartisan group of us that really believed we could do better . . . to protect civil liberties even as we gave law enforcement important tools to conduct terrorism investigations," Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) told reporters. He said that he and his fellow negotiators had to make more concessions to the administration than they wanted to, but that Congress will monitor the law's application over the coming years and perhaps revise it.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), one of several Democrats who agreed to back the compromise yesterday, said "it falls far short" of the bill that was passed by the Senate last year but rejected by the House. "But if you measure it against the original Patriot Act . . . we've made progress" toward "protecting basic civil liberties at a time when we are dealing with the war on terrorism," Durbin said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called the compromise "a step in the right direction."

The proposal would restrict federal agents' access to library records, one of the Patriot Act's most contentious provisions. A form of secret subpoena known as a National Security Letter could no longer be used to obtain records from libraries that function "in their traditional capacity, including providing basic Internet access," Sununu and others said in a statement. But libraries that are "Internet service providers" would remain subject to the letters, Durbin said.

The Senate proposal would no longer require National Security Letter recipients to tell the FBI the identity of their lawyers.

The compromise bill also addresses "Section 215 subpoenas," which are granted by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court. Recipients of such subpoenas originally were forbidden to tell anyone about the action. The proposed Senate measure would allow them to challenge the "gag order" after one year, rather than the 90-day wait in earlier legislation.

Sununu said the administration insisted on the longer waiting period. "You now have a process to challenge the gag order," he said, defending the concession. "That didn't exist before."

Sununu said he and his allies were disappointed that the compromise does not require agents to "show a connection to a suspected terrorist or spy" before obtaining a Section 215 subpoena. Instead, a FISA judge would have to agree that there are reasonable grounds to believe the items being sought are relevant to an investigation into terrorism.

Several liberals condemned the bill. "I am gravely disappointed in this so-called deal," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.). "The White House agreed to only a few minor changes" that "do not address the major problems," he said, adding: "We've come too far and fought too hard to agree to reauthorize the Patriot Act without fixing those problems."

But Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the Senate compromise "maintains the tools necessary to fight terrorism while further strengthening safeguards to protect civil liberties."

"We are hopeful that the Congress will now move forward to renew the Patriot Act," he said.

In a related area yesterday, several Democrats said the administration must do more to explain and justify the domestic surveillance program conducted by the National Security Agency.

"If they came with the idea that this is going to stop an investigation on the part of the Senate intelligence committee, they were wrong," committee Vice Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) told reporters after a closed briefing by two top administration officials. "There were certain kinds of questions which could easily have been answered but weren't. . . . Where we really wanted hard information that was important to us, that gave us the size and the scope and the reach and the depth" of the program," he said, "they were not forthcoming."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said after the briefing: "For the life of me, I don't understand why the administration won't say, 'Sure, you have a right to look at this. We'd like to explain it.' "

GOP Reaches Patriot Act Deal (WT)

By Charles Hurt

DOJ_NMG_0013762

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

Four Republican senators reached a deal yesterday to drop their opposition to the renewal of the USA Patriot Act, hailed by the White House as crucial in the war against terrorists.

But the agreement involving White House officials and top congressional leaders doesn't guarantee approval because most Democrats are still on the record opposing the measure.

Republican Sens. John E. Sununu of New Hampshire, Larry E. Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska had opposed the reauthorization because they said it lacked the appropriate civil liberties protections.

"America's civil liberty protections are a model to the world," the four Republicans said in a joint statement yesterday. "We should always strive to balance protection of these freedoms with the essential needs of law enforcement. The substantive, and at times, emotional debate concerning Patriot Act reauthorization reflects the importance of enabling law enforcement to investigate terrorists without sacrificing these rights."

Under the deal, civil liberties protections have been added regarding the issuance of secret national security subpoenas and federal searches of library records.

"The changes announced today by Senator Sununu strengthen civil liberties protections without hindering the core anti-terrorism safeguards in the Patriot Act," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican. "I expect swift adoption of these changes and the Patriot Act conference report."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, said the modifications should clear the way for passage.

"It appears -- and I say 'appears' because nothing is ever certain in the United States Senate until the final votes are cast -- that we have come to an agreement, at least within the Senate, on modifications for the Patriot Act so that it can be renewed," he said yesterday.

Once the new provisions are added, the bill must again be approved by both chambers. The new bill is expected to get easy approval from the House, but faces stiff opposition from Senate Democrats.

In December, the four Republicans joined Democrats in filibustering reauthorization of current law, which now expires in March.

With the four Republicans on board, a filibuster would become an all-Democrat move -- a prospect that Republicans relish because polls show that voters don't trust Democrats on national security. As of yesterday, the new bill remained one vote shy of breaking the filibuster.

But the deal gained at least two key Democrat supporters yesterday in Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, both members of the Judiciary Committee.

"It is a substantial improvement," Mrs. Feinstein said of the new version. "I think it's important to get this done. And there is a four-year sunset, so we will be able to watch it closely."

Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, signaled optimism as well.

"I commend my Republican colleagues for working hard to make the Patriot Act better," he said after the agreement was announced. "Democrats strongly believe we must have all necessary tools to fight terrorism, but we want checks and balances to ensure that these expansive powers are not abused. The deal reached by my Republican colleagues appears to be a step in the right direction."

Praise from Democrats was not unanimous. Sen. Russell D. Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat who led opposition to the bill, said the alterations are "a few small changes" and he would continue to oppose the bill.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking minority member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, was disappointed, too. "A bipartisan coalition in the Senate made a valiant stand to make clear that security and liberty are not mutually exclusive values in America," he said. "We can and we should have both. But White House naysaying and partisanship have obstructed this from becoming the better bill that it should be, and that is deeply regrettable."

Republicans, Durbin, Bush Reach Accord On Patriot Act (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Jeff Bliss

DOJ_NMG_0013763

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Republicans in the U.S. Senate and the Bush administration agreed to changes in the USA Patriot Act that they say will allow its renewal.

The deal was endorsed by Richard Durbin, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called the accord ``a step in the right direction."

The anti-terrorism law, passed in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, expired in December and its renewal has been stalled by concerns among Democrats and some Republicans over the law's effect on civil liberties.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania said the compromises reached will enable passage. ``It appears, and I say appears because nothing is ever certain in the United States Senate until the final votes are cast, that we have come to an agreement," he told reporters in Washington today.

The measure would still have to pass the House. House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner won't comment until he's reviewed details of the accord, said his spokesman, Jeff Lungren.

Senator John Sununu of New Hampshire, who helped negotiate the accord, said compromises were struck on three major issues.

Compromises

Companies will now be able to challenge a gag order against discussing an FBI demand for information a year after the request is made, Sununu said. In addition, those who received so-called National Security Letters from the FBI asking for information won't have to disclose the names of the lawyers they consult, as is required currently, he said.

Finally, records of libraries performing their traditional duties will no longer be subject to search by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Sununu said.

The Patriot Act expanded the FBI's authority to demand business records, use roving wiretaps and share information with intelligence agents to pursue suspected terrorists. The Bush administration says it's been essential to tracking suspected terrorists. Critics say the law allows abuse of civil liberties.

The law expired Dec. 31 and has twice been extended for one month to give lawmakers time to settle differences.

Specter and Sununu were joined at a press conference announcing the agreement by Republican Senators Larry Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, all of whom had reservations about the Patriot Act.

Durbin's Support

Durbin, a member of the Judiciary Committee, also was there to announce his support. ``I don't speak for my caucus as I stand here," he told reporters. ``I speak for myself" in supporting the agreement.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan announced the Bush administration's support earlier. ``We believe an agreement has been reached that will continue to build on the civil liberties protections that are in place," he said at a news briefing. ``We are pleased it appears this important legislation is moving forward."

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, made clear that he's not satisfied with the accord.

``White House nay-saying and partisanship obstructed this from becoming the better bill that it should be, and that is deeply regrettable," Leahy said in a statement.

Senator Russell Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat, said he opposes the agreement and would try to block the measure's passage with a filibuster, a parliamentary tactic that allows for unlimited debate.

Sununu said he now counts 58 votes to support the measure - - two short of the number needed to block a filibuster -- and is confident he'll pick up enough additional votes ``on both sides of the aisle" to ``be able to pass the Senate."

Senate Republicans Craft Patriot Act Deal (REU)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Senate Republicans reached a deal with the White House on Thursday that would likely clear the way for renewing the USA Patriot Act, a key element of President Bush's war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0013764

While some Democrats were quick to portray the deal as failing to address civil liberties concerns adequately, several Republicans and Democrats who had earlier balked at renewing the law gave their support now that some revisions had been accepted by the White House.

First enacted after the September 11 attacks, the Patriot Act expanded law enforcement authorities' ability to conduct wiretaps and secret searches and share information.

Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the deal appeared to be "a step in the right direction."

The Republican accord would make permanent a number of key provisions of the act that are set to expire March 10.

"It is much less likely that a filibuster would be sustained under these circumstances," said Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, who is in the Democratic leadership and intends to vote for the new compromise.

One change to the law accepted by Senate Republicans and the White House would allow individuals to challenge gag orders when they have been subpoenaed to produce sensitive information on library, medical, education or gun-related records.

Another change would clarify that traditional libraries would not be subjected to special subpoenas, which are not issued by judges, to gain records.

A group of Republican and Democratic senators combined in December to stage a Patriot Act renewal filibuster, a procedural move that blocked a vote on the bill.

Since then, Congress approved short-term extensions of the law.

"White House nay-saying and partisanship have obstructed this from becoming the better bill that it should be and that is deeply regrettable," said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan countered that the agreement that has been reached "will continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn't compromise our national security priorities within this legislation."

Sen. Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat who led efforts for revisions, said the Republican proposal had only had "minor changes" that do "not address the major problems with the Patriot Act." He called the Republican-backed version a "one-sided 'deal'" and "unacceptable."

But Feingold had worked closely with Republican Sen. John Sununu of New Hampshire, who on Thursday said he would support the new language.

Sununu on Thursday acknowledged the new compromise had "places where we could do better." He said a bipartisan group of senators would work on such concerns over the long term.

Civil liberties experts have criticized the law for making it too easy for the government to obtain individuals' private records, including medical and library records.

The fight over the Patriot Act comes as Bush is under attack from Democrats for conducting domestic surveillance without warrants.

Patriot Act Gets OK From Sununu (MANUL)

By JOHN DISTASO, Senior Political Reporter

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, February 10, 2006

Sen. John Sununu was pleased with what he called important improvements in the anti-terrorism USA Patriot Act announced yesterday as a compromise between a key group of senators and the White House.

“I think it’s a good package and a step in the right direction and allows us to maintain a bipartisan consensus,” Sununu told the New Hampshire Union Leader in a telephone interview from Washington.

Sununu announced the deal with the White House on Capitol Hill with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter and three other senators who had held out for changes they felt would protect the legal rights and attorney-client privacy privilege of individuals and businesses under investigation by law enforcement authorities.

Sununu and the other senators said they hope the agreement will clear the way for final passage of the Patriot Act, which has been stalled since December. Congress has extended the existing provisions twice, most recently until March 10.

DOJ_NMG_0013765

Sununu and fellow Republicans Larry Craig of Idaho, Lisa Murkowski of Arkansas and Charles Hagel of Nebraska joined with Democrats last year to block the bill.

The New Hampshire Republican said yesterday he is confident the changes will secure the necessary 60 votes to ensure any future effort to block passage will be overridden.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the changes "continue to build upon the civil liberties protections that are in place but do so in a way that doesn't compromise our national security priorities."

"We're pleased that this important legislation is moving forward," he said.

There was no immediate reaction from House Republicans, although several GOP officials told The Associated Press key lawmakers had been informed of the proposed changes.

Sununu said he and President George W. Bush discussed the issue briefly aboard Air Force One when he accompanied the President to and from New Hampshire on Wednesday for Bush's Manchester speech.

He said Bush "asked if we were making progress and if I thought we'd be able to agree to something, and I did indicate to him that we were making progress and that I wanted to get bipartisan support."

Sununu said that since House and Senate leaders initially worked on a conference report, "there were 18 changes and 15 were the work of our coalition."

Since the Senate voted down the conference report late last year, "we have since negotiated three improvements," he announced yesterday.

One section of the bill allows federal agents to issue, with no judicial approval, National Security Letters, which require an individual or business to produce records if the government believes they are relevant to a national security investigation.

Another part of the bill, section 215, allows a special judge acting under the Federal Intelligence Surveillance Act to be asked by law enforcement authorities to issue a subpoena for virtually anything that may be related to an intelligence investigation.

Both "215" subpoena and National Security Letters are now accompanied by "gag orders" that forbid someone who receives either document from telling anyone except his attorney that he has received it.

If the recipient does tell an attorney, he is required to inform the FBI and provide the bureau with the attorney's name. That requirement was stricken from the bill in the compromise, Sununu said.

"That, to me, is a big issue because it carried the risk that we would discourage people from seeking legal counsel," Sununu said.

A change announced yesterday for the first time allows a judge to overturn the "gag order" on 215 subpoenas if the judge finds no reason to believe disclosure would endanger national security or interfere with a criminal or counter-terrorism investigation.

But if top Justice Department officials certify that disclosure would endanger national security or interfere with diplomatic relations, their decision would be final, unless a judge finds their decision was made in bad faith.

The compromise also clarifies that a library acting in its "traditional role" would not be subject to a National Security Letter. But Sununu said a library could still be subject to a 215 subpoena, which would require a court order.

Sununu wanted to heighten the standard for issuing 215 subpoenas to require the government to show a connection to a specific spy or terrorist.

"We did not get improvement on the 215 standard, but I think it's a good package and a step in the right direction," he said.

A GOP agreement would put Senate Democrats in a politically difficult position of deciding whether to renew their filibuster on an issue of national security — an area where polling shows them trailing Bush and the Republicans, The Associated Press reported.

Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., opposed the agreement outright, while Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., opposed it but stopped short of joining in Feingold's threat to renew a filibuster, the AP reported.

Police Blotter: Patriot Act E-mail Spying Approved (CNET)

DOJ_NMG_0013766

By Declan McCullagh, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 10, 2006

"Police blotter" is a weekly report on the intersection of technology and the law.

What: The Justice Department asks a judge to approve Patriot Act e-mail monitoring without any evidence of criminal behavior.

When: Decided Feb. 2, 2006 by U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan in Washington, D.C.

Outcome: E-mail surveillance approved.

What happened: As part of a grand jury investigation that's still secret, the Justice Department asked a federal magistrate judge to approve monitoring of an unnamed person's e-mail correspondents.

The request had a twist: Instead of asking to eavesdrop on the contents of the e-mail messages, which would require some evidence of wrongdoing, prosecutors instead requested the identities of the correspondents. Also included in the request was header information like date and time and Internet address--but not subject lines.

The federal magistrate judge balked and asked the Justice Department to submit an additional brief to demonstrate that such a request would be legal.

Instead, prosecutors asked Judge Hogan to step in. He reviewed the portion of federal law dealing with "pen register" and "trap and trace" devices--terms originating in the world of telephone wiretapping--and concluded it "unambiguously" authorizes the e-mail surveillance request.

Though the language may be clumsy, Hogan said, the Patriot Act's amendments authorize that type of easily obtainable surveillance of e-mail. All that's required, he said, is that prosecutors claim the surveillance could conceivably be "relevant" to an investigation.

Excerpt from the court's opinion:

"In 2001, Congress enacted the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001 (the "USA Patriot Act"), Section 216 of which explicitly amended the authorities relating to pen registers and trap and trace devices...by expanding the definitions of these devices to include "processes" to obtain information about "electronic communication."

"Commenting on the very language that was finally enacted in Section 216 of the USA Patriot Act, several members of Congress highlighted the fact that the amendments would bring the state of the law in line with current technology by making pen registers and trap and trace devices applicable to the Internet and--more to the point--e-mail.

"For example, a section-by-section analysis of the bill that Representative John Conyers included in the record before the final House vote, which contains the same language that was finally enacted by Congress, states that Section 216 "extends the pen/trap provisions so they apply not just to telephone communications but also to Internet traffic."

"In addition, Senator Jon Kyl, who is currently Chairman of the United States Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Terrorism, Technology & Homeland Security, noted that the same language in the Senate version of the bill "would codify current case law that holds that pen/trap orders apply to modern communication technologies such as e-mail and the Internet, in addition to traditional phone lines."

"The Congressional Research Service also published a legal analysis of the USA Patriot Act that states that the Act "permits pen register and trap and trace orders for electronic communications (e.g., e-mail)."

"The plain language of the statute makes clear that pen registers and trap and trace devices may be processes used to obtain information about e-mail communications. The statute's history confirms this interpretation and there is no support for a contrary result."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Gives New Details Of 2002 Qaeda Plot To Attack Los Angeles (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And David Johnston

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013767

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — President Bush offered new information on Thursday about what he said was a foiled plot by Al Qaeda in 2002 to fly a hijacked airplane into the tallest building west of the Mississippi, the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles, as he sought to make the case for his record on national security.

Although the administration made public the Los Angeles plot in general terms four months ago, Mr. Bush, in a speech to the National Guard Association, disclosed more specific details, including what he said was the planned use of a "shoe bomb" by hijackers to breach the airplane's cockpit door and take over the controls.

In addition, Mr. Bush and one of his counterterrorism advisers said that four extremists were recruited from Southeast Asia to carry out the plan, that their leader received training in shoe bombs and that all four had traveled to an undisclosed place after the Sept. 11 attacks to meet with Osama bin Laden and pledge their loyalty to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Bush and White House officials gave no reason for releasing details of a plot that they first disclosed last October. But Mr. Bush's speech came at a time when Republicans are intent on establishing their record on national security as the pre-eminent issue in the 2006 midterm elections, and when the president is facing questions from members of both parties about a secret eavesdropping program that he describes as pivotal to the war on terrorism.

In his speech, Mr. Bush said the plot had been "derailed in early 2002, when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key Al Qaeda operative." He added that "subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations made clear the intended target and how Al Qaeda hoped to execute it."

Mr. Bush and his counterterrorism adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend, made no claim on Thursday that the eavesdropping program, conducted by the National Security Agency, had helped to foil the 2002 plot. But in a conference call with reporters, Ms. Townsend did not rule out the program as a factor in discovering the plan.

"We use all available sources and methods in the intelligence community, but we have to protect them," Ms. Townsend said. "So I'm not going to talk about what ones we did or didn't use in this particular case."

She added that the Los Angeles plot had grown out of the Sept. 11 attacks. As described in the staff report by the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who is said to be the mastermind behind them, had originally envisioned an elaborate plan with 10 planes that would attack the East and West Coasts simultaneously on Sept. 11, 2001. But Mr. bin Laden rejected the plan, the report said, because of its difficulty.

"It was bin Laden who decided that it should just focus on the East Coast, and the West Coast should be held in abeyance until there was a follow-on attack," Ms. Townsend told reporters. "It's our understanding now that it was too difficult to get enough operatives for both the East and West Coast plots at the same time."

Weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks, Ms. Townsend said, Mr. Mohammed turned his attention to the West Coast and to recruits from Southeast Asia affiliated with Jemaah Islamiyah, a Qaeda offshoot with roots in Indonesia.

Working with another terror figure, Riduan Isamuddin, better known as Hambali, Mr. Mohammed recruited a cell leader and three other men in October 2001, Ms. Townsend said. Mr. Mohammed trained the leader of the group in building a shoe bomb, similar to the device recovered from Richard Reid, who had tried to set off a bomb in his shoe on an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001.

Significantly, each of the four men, whom Ms. Townsend would not identify, were found to have traveled to Afghanistan to meet with Mr. bin Laden in the months after the Sept. 11 attacks. Each pledged loyalty to him, she said. Such pledges were a significant gesture in the bin Laden network and usually a prerequisite to carrying out an attack.

Ms. Townsend said that American counterterrorism officials, working with four other regional governments, which she would not identify, arrested the cell leader and three others in February 2002. The plot was effectively extinguished.

Several American counterterrorism officials said Thursday that, at the time the plot was broken up in early 2002, the authorities believed that they had disrupted an active terrorist planning effort, but that they possessed only fragmentary evidence and were unsure whether the threat was significant.

Only later did they conclude that the plot was genuine and potentially serious. The outline of the plot became clear, the officials said, primarily through the interrogations of captured Qaeda figures like Mr. Mohammed, who was apprehended in March 2003, and Hambali, captured in August 2003.

In Los Angeles, the office of Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa said that the White House on Wednesday had given them a heads up about the president's disclosure but said that the mayor was not personally informed.

"I would have expected a direct call from the White House," the mayor said at an afternoon news conference.

In his remarks, Mr. Bush referred to the West Coast target as "the Liberty Tower," but White House officials said he had meant to say Library Tower, the name of the U.S. Bank Tower in 2002. The building, completed in 1989, is 1,018 feet tall and was "destroyed" by alien invaders in the 1996 movie "Independence Day."

Bush Signs Deficit Reduction Act (REU)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - U.S. President George W. Bush disclosed new details on Thursday of a thwarted al Qaeda plot to use shoe bombs to hijack a plane and fly it into a Los Angeles building, as he sought to justify his tactics in fighting terrorism.

With critics questioning the legality of his authorisation of a domestic spying program, Bush used newly declassified details of a previously revealed plot to show that the threat of terrorism has not abated.

"America remains at risk, so we must remain vigilant," Bush said.

He said that in early 2002 the United States and its allies disrupted a plot to use bombs hidden in shoes to breach the cockpit door of an airplane and fly it into the tallest building in Los Angeles.

But he got the name of the building wrong, saying the "intended target was Liberty Tower." He meant Library Tower, now the US Bank Tower, that at 1,017 feet (310 metres) high is the tallest building in the United States west of the Mississippi River.

The Bush administration last October had cited the plan to attack West Coast targets using hijacked planes as among 10 disrupted al Qaeda plots.

Bush gave a more detailed account on Thursday, saying that in October 2001, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the operational mastermind of the September 11 attacks that year, set in motion a plot for another attack inside the United States.

"Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on September 11, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed sought out young men from Southeast Asia whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion," he said.

Mohammed worked with a man known as Hambali, the leader of an al Qaeda-affiliated group in Southeast Asia, who recruited a cell of four operatives, the White House said. Mohammed trained the cell leader in the shoe bomb technique and they met al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan in October 2001, said Frances Townsend, homeland security and counterterrorism adviser to Bush.

The West Coast plot initially was to have been part of the September 11 attack, but bin Laden decided to focus on the East Coast because it was too difficult to get operatives for both, she said.

She said authorities did not know specific details of the planned attack such as its timing or the flight.

"We knew they were going to fly a commercial airliner into the tallest building in California," Townsend said. "And it was an analytic judgement by the intelligence community that that meant the Library Tower."

The plot was disrupted with help from two countries in Southeast Asia and two countries in South Asia, Townsend said.

Bush has been fighting criticism from Democrats and some Republicans over his decision to authorise the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without court warrants inside the United States on international e-mails and phone calls of people with suspected ties to terrorism.

He has called it a necessary tool for fighting terrorism and preventing another attack on the United States.

Townsend would not comment on whether the eavesdropping program helped in foiling the West Coast plot or capturing the plotters.

The cell leader was arrested in February 2002 and the other three operatives were also caught, but Townsend declined to identify the three or the countries where they were captured.

Mohammed was captured in Pakistan in March 2003, and Hambali was caught in Thailand in August 2003.

Bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahri, believed by U.S. officials to be hiding in the border region of Afghanistan and Pakistan, have so far eluded the U.S. manhunt.

DOJ_NMG_0013769

Townsend said it was unclear whether the West Coast plot had any connection to "shoebomber" Richard Reid.

Reid failed in an attempt to blow up an American Airlines plane from Paris to Miami in December 2001 after passengers and crew tackled him as he tried to ignite explosives in his shoe. Reid was sentenced to life imprisonment by a U.S. court in January 2003.

"I've never seen anything that indicated whether the second wave was bonafide or not. There's been rumours bandied about that it was, but I don't know," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee, said of the hijacked plane plot.

Bush Details 2002 Plot To Attack L.A. Tower (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Intelligence Officials Play Down Importance of Case, Attribute Remarks to Politics

President Bush, under pressure from Congress, defended his campaign against terrorism yesterday, offering for the first time a vivid account of a foiled al Qaeda plot to strike the United States after Sept. 11, 2001, by crashing a hijacked commercial airliner into a Los Angeles skyscraper.

Bush said four Southeast Asians who met with Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan in October 2001 were taught how to use shoe bombs to blow open a cockpit door and steer a plane into the Library Tower, the tallest building on the West Coast. The four were captured by Asian authorities before they could execute the plan, he said.

Declaring that "America remains at risk," Bush cited the episode as an example of international cooperation against terrorism, and cautioned against complacency. "We cannot let the fact that America hasn't been attacked in four and a half years since September 11, 2001, lull us into the illusion that the threats to our nation have disappeared. They have not."

The reported West Coast plot had been disclosed before but never in as much detail. The president's speech came on the same day as a Senate hearing into the Bush-ordered warrantless surveillance of telephone calls and e-mail by Americans and their contacts overseas, but aides said his comments were not related to the dispute over the program.

White House officials, who were unwilling to publicly disclose details of the alleged plot as recently as last fall, said they decided in the past three weeks to declassify the case so that Bush could have an example to provide the public.

But several U.S. intelligence officials played down the relative importance of the alleged plot and attributed the timing of Bush's speech to politics. The officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to publicly criticize the White House, said there is deep disagreement within the intelligence community over the seriousness of the Library Tower scheme and whether it was ever much more than talk.

One intelligence official said nothing has changed to precipitate the release of more information on the case. The official attributed the move to the administration's desire to justify its efforts in the face of criticism of the domestic surveillance program, which has no connection to the incident.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorism specialist who heads the Washington office of Rand Corp., said Bush's account adds some interesting detail to the Library Tower episode. But he said it still leaves key questions about the case unanswered.

"It doesn't really give us any more indication of whether this was a plot that was derailed or preempted, or a plot that was more in the realm of an idle daydream," Hoffman said.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate intelligence committee, mocked the idea of raising the alleged Library Tower plot. "Maybe they're tired of talking about [the] Brooklyn Bridge and they're trying to find a different edifice of some sort," he said, referring to another alleged terrorist plot that some have said was inflated by the government.

But Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's chief counterterrorism adviser, told reporters that "there is no question in my mind that this is a disruption. It's not about credit; it's about protecting the American people. And the American people are absolutely safer as a result of these arrests."

Bush first alluded to the incident in a speech in October when he said the United States and its allies had thwarted 10 serious planned al Qaeda attacks since Sept. 11, 2001. A White House list released at the time referred to a plot to fly a hijacked plane into an unspecified West Coast city in 2002. Citing unnamed sources, news organizations reported that the target was the Library Tower, since renamed the U.S. Bank Tower, and that the plot's author was Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the architect of the Sept. 11 attacks who was captured in 2003.

Mohammed's original plan for Sept. 11, as presented to bin Laden in 1998 or 1999, called for hijacking 10 jetliners on both coasts, according to interrogations of Mohammed cited by the commission that investigated the 2001 attacks. U.S. officials concluded that bin Laden had instructed Mohammed to initially focus on the East Coast because it was too difficult to recruit enough operatives to seize 10 planes. After the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center were knocked down, Mohammed set about putting his West Coast plan in motion.

Speaking at the National Guard Memorial Building yesterday, Bush offered a fuller account of what ensued, and the White House later provided a briefing to elaborate. In this account, Mohammed deputized Hambali, head of the affiliated Southeast Asian group Jemaah Islamiya, to set up a West Coast attack, and they put together a four-man cell. Asians were chosen, Bush said, on the theory that they would draw less suspicion.

The four Asians traveled to Afghanistan to meet with bin Laden in October 2001 just as U.S. forces were hunting al Qaeda, officials said. After swearing loyalty to the al Qaeda leader, the four reportedly returned to Asia to train in the use of shoe bombs like those later found on Richard Reid, who was convicted of trying to take down an airliner over the Atlantic in December 2001.

But the cell leader was captured by authorities in a Southeast Asian country in February 2002, and the three others were later detained, as well. The officials said four Asian countries were involved but would not identify them.

Bush mistakenly identified the target as the "Liberty Tower," and aides later corrected him.

"As the West Coast plot shows," Bush said, "in the war on terror, we face a relentless and determined enemy that operates in many nations, so protecting our citizens requires unprecedented cooperation from many nations."

Bush Gives New Details About Old Report Of L.A. Terror Plot (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — With pressure mounting on the White House to more fully explain its anti-terrorism strategy, President Bush offered new details Thursday of a reported plot against downtown Los Angeles as evidence of success in foiling attacks.

Federal officials had revealed two years ago that they believed Al Qaeda operatives, in a West Coast follow-up to the Sept. 11 attacks, had planned to hijack an airliner and crash it into what was then called the Library Tower.

But Bush, offering new specifics in a speech designed to boost support for his national security policies, said Thursday that the terrorist operatives planned to use "shoe bombs to breach the cockpit door." He said Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed had recruited and trained young Asian men to carry out the plot because suspicions of Arabs were running high, but that the plan was derailed when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key Al Qaeda operative.

Bush did not name the nation or the operative, but his decision to reveal even the most incremental details of the reported plot underscored the effort the White House has undertaken recently to defend its anti-terrorism policies.

The details did little to counter skepticism from Democrats and some law enforcement officials who have questioned whether the reported scheme had ever been put into operation before it was thwarted.

"It didn't go," said one U.S. official familiar with the operational aspects of the war on terrorism. "It didn't happen."

The official said he believed the Library Tower plot was one of many Al Qaeda operations that had not gone much past the conceptual stage. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity, saying that those familiar with the plot feared political retaliation for providing a different characterization of the plan than that of the president.

Bush's chief domestic security advisor, Frances Townsend, said the plotters had described their target only as the tallest building on the West Coast, and that it was the "analytic judgment" of the U.S. intelligence community that they intended to strike the Library Tower.

Bush misspoke when making a similar point: "We believe the intended target was Liberty Tower in Los Angeles," he said. The building was renamed in 2003 and is now known as the U.S. Bank Tower.

DOJ_NMG_0013771

Bush first mentioned the Los Angeles plot in a speech in October, when he listed 10 post-Sept. 11 schemes that had been disrupted. At the time, he gave few details.

In his speech Thursday to the National Guard Assn., the president cited the reported plan as evidence of the ongoing danger of terrorism and of the success of his anti-terrorism strategy.

"As the West Coast plot shows, in the war on terror we face a relentless and determined enemy that operates in many nations — so protecting our citizens requires unprecedented cooperation from many nations as well," Bush said. "By working together, we took dangerous terrorists off the streets. By working together, we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland."

Bush did not link the foiling of the plot to his controversial program of warrantless wiretaps conducted on certain international communications by the National Security Agency. But his remarks came as ongoing criticism of the spy program from lawmakers, including some Republicans, has appeared to force the administration to reverse course and provide more detailed information about the surveillance to congressional intelligence committees.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said he was stunned that Bush revealed details of the reported terrorist plot without first relaying the information to city officials. Villaraigosa said local authorities had heard some of the new information Wednesday from California domestic security officials, but not the specifics mentioned by Bush in his address, which was carried nationally on cable television.

"I would have expected a direct call from the White House," said Villaraigosa, a Democrat, during a City Hall news conference. "We should have been aware of all the details much before today. We did not know all of the facts."

The mayor sought to reassure residents that Los Angeles was safe. He said the police and fire departments had taken precautions at high-rise buildings, including the one singled out by Bush. Villaraigosa said police had specifically evaluated security and evacuation plans at the U.S. Bank Tower.

"There is no imminent threat to Los Angeles," the mayor said, flanked by police and fire officials.

Critics on Thursday accused Bush of reaching far back into time as part of a public relations ploy to maintain focus on his battle against terrorism, an issue that continued to win him public approval. Bush's chief political strategist, Karl Rove, said last month that Republicans in this year's elections would seek ways to paint Democrats as exhibiting a pre-Sept. 11 mentality, while programs such as the warrantless surveillance showed the president's toughness.

Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks) described Bush's speech as a political stunt meant to draw attention from the mounting criticisms of the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program and other questions about administration tactics.

"I can't think of a governmental reason to disclose these details at this time to the general public. Clearly, the goal was to create headlines," said Sherman, who monitors security matters as the ranking Democrat on the House subcommittee on international terrorism and nonproliferation.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said he "didn't find [Bush's comments] very helpful … from a professional point of view."

When news of the reported plot surfaced two years ago, some counter-terrorism officials treated it with skepticism. By contrast, Bush on Thursday cast the foiling of the plot as a significant development that underscored the danger and persistence of Al Qaeda.

Townsend, the White House domestic security advisor, said after Bush's speech that the so-called West Coast plot was initially designed as part of the Sept. 11 attacks.

But she said Osama bin Laden determined that the two-coast plan was too ambitious and scaled it back. Mohammed then began preparations for a "follow-on" attack on the West Coast, Townsend said, reiterating the findings of the Sept. 11 commission.

"It's our understanding now that it was too difficult to get enough operatives for both the East and West Coast plots at the same time," Townsend said.

Townsend said the cell leader of the reported Los Angeles plot and three other operatives went to Afghanistan, where they met with Bin Laden and swore an "oath of loyalty" to him before returning to Asia, where they continued to work for an operative named Hambali, the chief of operations for an Al Qaeda affiliate group in South Asia.

The reported scheme ended in 2002 with four arrests in Southeast Asia, she said. Four U.S. allies in Asia played a role in disrupting the plot, she said, refusing to name the countries.

Mohammed was arrested in Pakistan in March 2003. Hambali was captured in August 2003.

In defending Bush's claim that the plot was foiled, Townsend said: "There is no question in my mind that this is a disruption…. And the American people are absolutely safer as a result of these arrests."

Bush Provides Details Of 2002 Terrorist Plot Aimed At Los Angeles (MERCN)

By Ron Hutcheson

The San Jose Mercury News, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - The plot envisioned a ghastly replay of the attack that brought down the World Trade Center, only this time the terrorists wanted to crash a plane into the tallest building in Los Angeles. The plan unraveled in early 2002 with the arrest of one of the ringleaders, but President Bush provided new details about it Thursday in defending his handling of the war on terrorism.

The timing of his chilling disclosures, four years after the plot was discovered and four months after he first discussed the broad outlines of the scheme, raised suspicion that his remarks were politically motivated. At the very moment that Bush was defending his aggressive approach to terrorism, two of his top advisers were trying to quell a revolt in Congress against his domestic eavesdropping program.

Bowing to bipartisan pressure, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Gen. Michael Hayden, the deputy director of national intelligence, gave a closed-door briefing on the surveillance program to members of the Senate Intelligence Committee. The warrantless surveillance, which the president authorized without congressional or court approval shortly after the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, targets communications between suspected terrorists overseas and their contacts in the United States.

The session, conducted a day after a similar briefing for members of the House Intelligence Committee, failed to resolve doubts about the program's legality. Committee Democrats and at least one Republican, Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio, said they wanted more information.

"If they came with the idea that this was going to stop an investigation on the part of the Senate Intelligence Committee, they were wrong," Sen. John "Jay" Rockefeller of West Virginia, the top Democrat on the panel, said after the meeting.

Bush and his advisers said the Los Angeles plot illustrated the need to move swiftly against any suspicious activity.

"It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot," the president told members of the National Guard Association. "By working together, we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland."

As described by Bush and Frances Townsend, his top counterterrorism adviser, the plot grew out of early planning for the Sept. 11 attacks, when al-Qaida leaders considered simultaneous assaults on both coasts. They scrapped that idea but quickly began work on an encore attack on the 73-story Library Tower, a gleaming, granite-and-glass edifice now known as the US Bank Tower. (In the 1996 movie "Independence Day," aliens destroy the 1,018-foot-tall building.)

"We now know that in October 2001, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed - the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks - had already set in motion a plan to have terrorist operatives hijack an airplane using shoe bombs to breach the cockpit door," Bush said.

According to administration officials, Mohammed, fearing that Arab terrorists would generate suspicion, recruited a four-man terrorist cell through Jemaah Islamiyah, an Islamic terrorist group in Indonesia. The four operatives were sent to Afghanistan, where they pledged their loyalty to al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden in an oath known as a biat.

Townsend said intelligence officials weren't sure whether the meeting occurred shortly before or sometime after the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, which sent bin Laden into hiding. Also unclear is how close the plotters were to executing their scheme when the cell leader was arrested in an undisclosed country in February 2002. Townsend refused to discuss whether electronic surveillance played any role.

Townsend said all four cell members were currently in custody, but she declined to identify them, to say where they were arrested or to disclose where they are being held. The plotters didn't include Richard Reid, the would-be shoe bomber who was arrested in December 2001 on a flight from Paris to Miami.

Although Reid had been trained in the same bombing technique that the plotters planned to use, intelligence officials don't know whether Reid had any contact with them, Townsend said.

In a conference call with reporters, Townsend took issue with suggestions that the White House had released new details about the plot to help deal with the controversy over domestic eavesdropping. Bush first mentioned the Los Angeles plot in vague terms in a speech last October as one of the administration's successes in the war on terrorism.

"The problem is you can't share these details when you have operational leads," she said. "It takes time."

Bush Details Terror Plot (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - Bush to US: It's still a dangerous world out there, but we're making progress in rounding up the bad guys.

In essence, that may be the message that President Bush and other administration officials are trying to convey this week as they defend White House actions in the war in terror.

Headlines about possibly illegal eavesdropping activity authorized by the president, plus more bombings in Iraq and revelations about the slow pace of Iraqi reconstruction, have put the Bush team on the defensive this week. In revealing details about an alleged Al Qaeda plot to fly an airliner into a Los Angeles skyscraper, plus insisting that terrorists are weakened and on the run, Bush may be attempting to counter bad news.

"The timing of this clearly has to do with politics ... but that doesn't mean the [L.A. plot] isn't true," says Lorenzo Vidino, a terrorism expert at the Fletcher School at Tufts University.

In a speech Thursday at the National Guard Memorial Building in Washington, President Bush said that the US and its allies had thwarted a plot to use shoe bombs to blow open the cockpit door of an airliner, hijack it, and fly it into the tallest building on the US West coast.

Bush called this target the "Liberty Building," but its name in 2001 was the "Library Tower," and it has since been renamed the US Bank Tower.

Khalid Sheik Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, was behind the L.A. plot, said Bush. The Al Qaeda operative began planning it in October 2001.

Mr. Mohammed's co-conspirator in this plot was Hambali, also known as Riduan Isamuddin, thought to be the operations chief of Southeast Asia's largest Al Qaeda-related group, Jemaah Islamiyah. Hambali's job was to recruit Asian hijackers, who were likely to attract less attention from law enforcement authorities than Arabs. He recruited four operatives for the cell, whose leader was personally trained by Mohammed in shoebombing, according to a Department of Homeland Security briefing given after the president's speech. The operatives met with Osama bin Laden before going back to Asia.

Bush said that the plan unravelled when a key Southeast Asian nation arrested one of the operatives. He did not say who this operative was, or which nation nabbed him.

"Subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations made clear the intended target and how Al Qaeda hoped to execute it," said Bush. "This critical intelligence helped other allies capture the ringleaders and other known operatives who'd been recruited for this effort."

Hambali was captured by Indonesian authorities in 2003. Mohammed was captured in Pakistan that same year.

Bush has referred to the Library Tower plot before, but only in vague terms. In an address last October, he said the US and its allies had foiled at least 10 serious Al Qaeda plots, including plans for a Sept. 11-like attack on both coasts.

Thursday's revelations provide a fuller picture and add details, says Mr. Vidino, author of the book "Al Qaeda in Europe."

The plot Bush outlined made sense, considering that Mohammed had long been interested in a second wave of attacks, and had previously cooperated with Southeast Asian Al Qaeda adherents. Two of the Sept. 11 hijackers entered the US on the West Coast, with help from Hambali, says Vidino.

Al Qaeda has also long wanted to attack California, as well as other targets scattered throughout the United States. Khalid Sheik Mohammed "wanted to scare the entire country," says Vidino.

The White House would not say whether the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless eavesdropping program played any role in uncovering the West Coast plot.

Bush's speech came as the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, announced he is writing legislation intended to force the administration to defend the legality of the eavesdropping in court.

Bush Gives Details Of Foiled Plot By Al Qaeda To Attack Los Angeles (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon, John D. McKinnon And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, seeking to increase public support for his counterterrorism policies, took the unusual step of detailing what he said was one of his administration's greatest unheralded successes: breaking up a 2002 al Qaeda plot to strike Los Angeles.

The foiled plot, he said, would have sent a hijacked airplane into the tallest building in Los Angeles, the Library Tower.

Mr. Bush's announcement came as both Republican and Democratic lawmakers are seeking better oversight and regulation of intelligence gathering, after concerns were raised about the National Security Agency's domestic-surveillance activities. After weeks of uncertainty, House Republicans are beginning to embrace legislation to update 30-year-old laws on foreign-intelligence eavesdropping, but without challenging the legal underpinnings of Mr. Bush's wiretap program, according to Intelligence Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R., Mich.)

At the same time, the White House agreed to compromises to win the 60 votes required in the Senate to cut off debate on reauthorization of the Patriot Act. "I can't at this point calculate how a filibuster can prevail," said Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill) who endorsed the changes together with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Cal.) and four Republicans led by Sen. John Sununu (R., N.H.).

In his speech yesterday, President Bush, said the planned attack in Los Angeles involved a four-man Southeast Asian terrorist cell. Acting on the direct order of al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, the cell was dispatched to use shoe bombs to help hijack a Los Angeles-bound plane. But close cooperation between the U.S. and a number of unnamed overseas partners resulted in their arrests beginning in February 2002, President Bush said.

"As the West Coast plot shows, in the war on terror, we face a relentless and determined enemy," Mr. Bush told a gathering of National Guardsmen in Washington. "It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot."

The president didn't cite the NSA's warrantless wiretap program, but his top aides stressed that sharply criticized counterterrorism techniques, such as domestic surveillance and extensive interrogations of alleged al Qaeda members, are necessary.

Some counterterrorism experts were skeptical, questioning whether the Los Angeles plot was even close to operational in 2002, particularly as U.S. forces were attacking al Qaeda strongholds in Afghanistan. They also said some aspects of the plan to hit the Library Tower were disclosed in a report released by the 9/11 Commission in June 2004.

"I really, really would question the White House's assertion that it thwarted a second 9/11," said Zachary Abuza, an associate professor at Simmons College in Boston who wrote a 2003 book on Jemaah Islamiyah, al Qaeda's Southeast Asia affiliate. "I've never, ever heard that this [plot] was operational."

As for legislation updating the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, House Republicans said they aren't attempting to legitimize the administration's NSA wiretapping program. For the most part, they -- like the White House -- believe the administration has all the legal authority it needs now. Still, they didn't foreclose the possibility that some of the controversial NSA eavesdropping could be done under an updated law.

FISA, the current law, was passed in the 1970s, before the digital revolution that has transformed the telecommunications industry -- and intercept techniques. Bush administration officials complain the FISA process, geared for a different time, is cumbersome.

"There is a legitimate concern that FISA needs to be updated from its current form just because of the changes in technology," Rep. Hoekstra said. "But not as applies to our activities versus al Qaeda."

DOJ_NMG_0013775

Last night, House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner didn't have any comment on the Patriot Act compromises in the Senate, but people close to the Wisconsin Republican said he would be open to the proposals if they prove sufficient to end the almost two-month impasse.

Despite continued grumbling from liberals, that appears all but certain, and Sen. Durbin credited Sen. Sununu with persuading the White House to give some ground. The changes do more to guarantee judicial review of gag rules governing certain subpoenas issued under the Patriot Act to obtain records. In addition, protections are added to shield traditional libraries from surveillance.

It remains a tangled process to enact these provisions alongside the underlying bill, but a test vote in the Senate could come as early as next week.

Bush Details Foiled Terror Plot Targeting L.A. (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Facing challenges to his domestic surveillance program and difficult negotiations over renewal of the Patriot Act, President Bush on Thursday emphasized new details of a previously foiled plot to strike a high-rise in Los Angeles as he defended aggressive tactics to combat terrorism.

In revealing facts about the aborted 2002 plan to slam a hijacked airliner into the tallest building in Los Angeles—in a West Coast sequel to Sept. 11—the White House seemed to underscore both successes in the war on terror and the threat that terrorists still pose.

"We are not yet safe," said Bush, flanked by paintings of colonial-era Minutemen in a speech delivered in a flag-lined hall of the National Guard Memorial Building in Washington.

This is not the first time Bush has cited the West Coast plot. He mentioned it among several other instances of averted attacks when he sought in October to confront growing opposition to the war in Iraq, a point at which his own job-approval ratings were nearing their nadir.

This time the White House released details about four unnamed Asian terrorists recruited by the Al Qaeda mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks to commandeer an airliner with shoe bombs and attack the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles.

The White House disclosure came at the height of congressional negotiations over renewal of the controversial USA Patriot Act. Republican and Democratic leaders announced Thursday that they have agreed to an extension..

The White House declined to say whether the National Security Agency surveillance that Bush repeatedly has authorized without court orders since Sept. 11 played any role in uncovering the West Coast plot or arresting the leader of the Asian cell in 2002 and thus thwarting it.

But invoking that plot followed a pattern for the president, who has often talked about the possibility of more terror attacks, a message echoed by other administration officials.

Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, has told top Republicans that the party's fortunes this year rest on assuring Americans that Republicans are tough on terrorism.

And some Democrats have accused the administration of exploiting fear.

"Two weeks ago, Karl Rove ... was telling the National Republican Committee, 'Here's your game plan, folks, here's how you're going to win—we're going to win by getting everybody scared again,'" Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), told the United Auto Workers this week. "This crowd [says], 'All we've got is fear and we are going to keep playing the fear card.'"

The administration is under growing congressional pressure to more fully explain its rationale for the eavesdropping program.

"If they came with the idea that this is going to stop an investigation on the part of the Senate Intelligence Committee, they were wrong," said Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.), vice chairman of the committee, emerging from a briefing on surveillance Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0013776

The president, and later his homeland security adviser Fran Townsend, offered a more complete narrative of the planned attack on Los Angeles:

Al Qaeda wanted to carry out simultaneous attacks on the East and West Coasts of the U.S. Osama bin Laden, the Al Qaeda leader who has evaded capture to this day, decided to delay the West Coast assault for "a follow-up attack." Khalid Sheik Mohammed, mastermind of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, started planning the Los Angeles attack in October 2001 with Riduan Isamuddin, known as Hambali, chief of a related terrorist group, Jemaah Islamiyah.

To avoid arousing suspicion after the Sept. 11 hijackings carried out by Arab terrorists, Hambali recruited four terrorists from Southeast Asia. Mohammed trained the leader of a four-man cell in the use of shoe bombs for a plot to breach the pilot's door of an airliner.

The four terrorists traveled to Afghanistan in October 2001 to meet with bin Laden. But, with the help of intelligence services in four unnamed South Asian nations, the cell leader was arrested in February 2002, foiling the plot. The other three were also caught. In addition, Mohammed was captured in March 2003, and Hambali was arrested in August 2003.

Asked why Bush is offering more details of a four-year-old event now, Townsend said, "The president is always looking for opportunities to share with the American people the details and the texture of the ongoing war on terror."

Plot To Hit Los Angeles Tower Foiled, Bush Says (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

President Bush yesterday revealed newly declassified details of a foiled plot to ram a hijacked airplane into a Los Angeles skyscraper in 2002.

Mr. Bush did not say whether the al Qaeda plan was thwarted with the help of telephone intercepts, which have come under fierce fire by Democrats and which he repeatedly has rebutted in recent days while seeking to shore up support for the war on terrorism.

But Fran Townsend, his homeland security adviser, said later that the U.S. used "all instruments of national power" to foil the plot. Although the president alluded to the episode in October, he did not give a detailed description until yesterday.

"We now know that in October 2001, Khalid Sheikh Muhammad -- the mastermind of the September 11 attacks -- had already set in motion a plan to have terrorist operatives hijack an airplane using shoe bombs to breach the cockpit door, and fly the plane into the tallest building on the West Coast," Mr. Bush said in a speech at the National Guard Building.

He was referring to the Library Tower -- since renamed the U.S. Bank Tower -- a revelation that angered Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa.

"I'm amazed that the president would make this [announcement] on national TV and not inform us of these details through the appropriate channels," the Democrat told the AP. "I don't expect a call from the president -- but somebody."

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said the administration was not trying to blindside local authorities.

"My understanding was that we did reach out to officials in California and Los Angeles to let them know -- I think it was yesterday -- that the president would be talking about this," he said. "And the word I heard was there is great appreciation for the notification that we provided."

Other Democrats questioned the timing of yesterday's disclosure about the Los Angeles plot, saying the president was trying to shift attention away from his domestic surveillance program.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Gen. Michael Hayden, principal deputy director of national intelligence, gave theSenate Select Committee on Intelligence a closed-door briefing on the program yesterday.

White House officials said terrorists initially planned to attack Los Angeles as part of the September 11 offensive, but al Qaeda could not recruit enough terrorists. So, they decided to stage a separate attack while the U.S. still was reeling from the events of September 11.

"Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on September the 11th, Khalid Sheikh Muhammad sought out young men from Southeast Asia -- whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion," Mr. Bush said. "To help carry out this plan, he tapped a terrorist named Hambali, one of the leaders of an al Qaeda affiliated group in Southeast Asia called J.I."

Hambali, the reputed operations chief of Indonesia-based Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), trained three other terrorists in Asia before taking them to Afghanistan, where they swore loyalty to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. The four-person "cell" then returned to Asia for additional training.

"Their plot was derailed in early 2002, when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key al Qaeda operative," said Mr. Bush, who did not identify the nation. "Subsequent debriefings and other intelligence operations made clear the intended target and how al Qaeda hoped to execute it.

"This critical intelligence helped other allies capture the ringleaders and other known operatives who had been recruited for this plot," he said. "The West Coast plot had been thwarted."

Mrs. Townsend said "the cell leader was arrested in February of 2002." Authorities arrested Muhammad in March 2003 and Hambali in August 2003.

Neither Mrs. Townsend nor Mr. McClellan would name the arresting Asian country.

Bush Details Purported Plot To Hit L.A. President: Southeast Asian Men Were To Fly Jet Into City's Tallest Building (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush gave new details Thursday of how the government foiled purported plans by al-Qaeda to attack the tallest building on the West Coast in 2002.

The scheme involved specially recruited Southeast Asian hijackers who planned to fly an airliner into the 73-story Library Tower in Los Angeles, Bush said in a speech to the National Guard Association.

“Since Sept. 11, the United States and our coalition partners have disrupted a number of serious al-Qaeda terrorist plots, including plots to attack targets inside the United States,” Bush said.

Frances Townsend, counterterrorism adviser to the president, declined to say whether the investigation involved the National Security Agency surveillance program that has drawn criticism for using wiretaps without court order.

Townsend said Bush discussed the investigation to remind Americans the threat is still there and highlight the level of international cooperation needed to fight terrorism.

“The terrorists are weakened and fractured, yet they're still lethal,” Bush said. “We cannot let the fact that America hasn't been attacked in 4½ years … lull us into the illusion that the threats to our nation have disappeared. They have not.”

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said after the speech that Bush still has failed to lay out a comprehensive counterterrorism plan. He cited the Sept. 11 Commission's poor ratings of the administration's homeland security plans.

“This White House has committed a series of national security mistakes that have made America less secure,” Reid said.

Bush said Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks captured in 2003, planned to have operatives use shoe bombs to enter the cockpit and hijack a commercial airliner that would be flown into the California building.

Rather than use Arab hijackers as in the 2001 attacks, the plan was to use Southeast Asian men because they “would not arouse as much suspicion,” Bush said.

Bush mentioned the alleged plot last October when he listed 10 planned terrorist attacks that had been thwarted. He did not provide details of those plots, although news organizations later described an attempt on the Library Tower, perhaps best known as one of the targets in the 1996 alien invasion movie Independence Day. Also known as the U.S. Bank Tower, the Library Tower is North America's tallest building west of Chicago.

Townsend would not disclose how many suspects were arrested, which countries they were from, where they are today or which nations helped foil the plot.

Bush's revelation triggered a blast from Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who said he was surprised by Bush's announcement because the White House had not fully informed him in advance. White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, “My understanding was that we did reach out to officials in California and Los Angeles to let them know, I think it was yesterday.”

Bush: U.S. Surveillance Helped Stop Attack (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0013778

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, February 10, 2006

Under fire for eavesdropping on Americans, President Bush said Thursday that spy work stretching from the U.S. to Asia helped thwart terrorists plotting to use shoe bombs to hijack an airliner and crash it into the tallest skyscraper on the West Coast.

"It took the combined efforts of several countries to break up this plot," Bush said. "By working together we stopped a catastrophic attack on our homeland."

Some information about the foiled attack was disclosed last year, but Bush offered more details to highlight international cooperation in fighting terrorists. He did not say whether information about the West Coast plot was collected by his administration's program to monitor — without court warrants — some calls to the U.S. from terror suspects overseas.

The White House said that issue was not the point of the speech, but the president and his advisers have been vigorously defending the legality of the program, which has been questioned by both Democratic and Republican lawmakers.

After weeks of insisting that divulging details of the monitoring program would hinder intelligence gathering, the White House relented Wednesday and began briefing some additional lawmakers.

Meanwhile, the president's monthlong campaign to convince Americans the government's eavesdropping program is essential to the war on terrorism appears to be making an impact.

In a new AP-Ipsos poll, 48 percent now support wiretapping without a warrant in cases of suspected communications with terrorists, up from 42 percent last month. Half say the administration should have to get a warrant, down from 56 percent. Men in particular have come around to Bush's view over the last month, the poll suggested.

On Capitol Hill Thursday, four Senate Republican holdouts reached agreement with the White House on minor changes in the Patriot Act, hoping to clear the way for renewal of anti-terror legislation that Bush says is essential in the fight against terrorists.

In his speech, at the National Guard Memorial Building, Bush said Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the reputed mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, began planning the West Coast operation in October 2001. One of Mohammed's key planners was a man known as Hambali, the alleged operations chief of the terrorist group Jemaah Islamiyah, which is affiliated with al-Qaida.

"Rather than use Arab hijackers as he had on Sept. 11, Khalid Sheik Mohammed sought out young men from Southeast Asia — whom he believed would not arouse as much suspicion," Bush said.

In Los Angeles, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa complained he first learned of Bush's remarks while watching TV.

"I'm amazed that the president would make this on national TV and not inform us of these details through the appropriate channels," said the mayor, a Democrat.

Bush press secretary Scott McClellan said that the White House did reach out before the speech to officials in California and that there was appreciation for the notification.

As the plot was described, the hijackers were to use shoe bombs to blow open the cockpit door of a commercial jetliner, take control of the plane and crash it into the Library Tower in Los Angeles, a 73-story building since renamed the US Bank Tower. In his remarks, Bush inadvertently referred to the site as "Liberty Tower."

The president said the plot was derailed when a Southeast Asian nation arrested a key al-Qaida operative. Bush did not name the country or the operative.

Frances Fragos Townsend, assistant to the president for homeland security and counterterrorism, said Mohammed, working with Hambali in Asia, recruited four members of the terrorist cell and trained its leader in how to use shoe bombs.

Townsend said it was not clear whether there was any connection between the West Coast plot and shoe bomber Richard Reid, who tried to blow up a trans-Atlantic flight in December 2001. After that, the Transportation Security Administration began asking passengers to take off their shoes for inspection.

The Sept. 11 attacks originally were planned to include both the East and West coasts. "It was bin Laden who decided that it should just focus on the East Coast, and that the West Coast should be held in abeyance ... as a follow-on attack," Townsend said. "It's our understanding now that it was too difficult to get enough operatives for both the East and West Coast plots at the same time."

She said all four of the West Coast planners went to Afghanistan in October 2001 and met with Osama bin Laden.

DOJ_NMG_0013779

Townsend said all four members of the cell have been apprehended. She declined to disclose their names or say where they were being held. She also would not identify the two South Asia and two Southeast Asian nations that helped foil the attack.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Bush's speech failed to lay out a comprehensive strategy to fight terrorists.

"As is too often the case with this president, the rhetoric does not match the reality," Reid said. "The fact is this White House has committed a series of national security mistakes that have made America less secure."

A Distinctive Shape, And An Inviting Target (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 9 — The U.S. Bank Tower here, the city's tallest building, has long been presumed to be an inviting target for terrorists. Rising 1,018 feet from Bunker Hill in downtown Los Angeles, the gleaming I. M. Pei-designed building is the most distinctive shape in the skyline and the tallest office building west of Chicago.

President Bush said on Thursday that the 72-story building, known as the Library Tower until U.S. Bancorp acquired naming rights in 2003, was to have been the target of a follow-up attack by Al Qaeda after the terrorist strikes of Sept. 11, 2001.

Officials have discussed the alleged plot numerous times in recent years as an example of terrorist actions that might have been foiled by government vigilance, but Mr. Bush offered new details.

Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa complained at a news conference on Thursday that he had not been called directly by the White House, learning of the new information on the alleged plot only from state officials and staff members.

The White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, said federal officials had passed along the new information to the authorities in Los Angeles and Sacramento, telling them that Mr. Bush would discuss it on Thursday.

Mayor Villaraigosa, a Democrat, said that he had twice written to the White House to request a meeting with the president to discuss security threats to Los Angeles, but that he had received no response.

"I'm mayor of the second largest city in the country," Mr. Villaraigosa said. "I have tried to meet with the president at the White House on a number of occasions every time that I've gone to Washington, D.C., to discuss specifically this issue of homeland security, and to no avail. Let's be clear about that."

He also said that the president's antiterrorism budget had shortchanged a number of potential targets, including Los Angeles.

"Given the known terrorist plots against our city, I firmly believe that Los Angeles deserves a greater share of that funding," the mayor said.

Mr. Bush mistakenly referred to the building in his remarks Thursday as Liberty Tower; the White House later corrected the error.

Chief William J. Bratton of the Los Angeles Police Department said in an interview that he had been aware of threats to the skyscraper since he took over as chief in 2002. He said he had devoted significant counterterrorism resources to the building and to Los Angeles International Airport, another potential target, because Al Qaeda is known to carefully research its targets and to try to strike more than once, as it did at the World Trade Center.

He said he was working with federal and local law enforcement officials on a program, Operation Archangel, to identify critical sites around the country that might be targets for terrorist attack and to design methods to defend them.

Mr. Bratton was in Washington on Thursday with other big-city police chiefs for a brief White House meeting with Mr. Bush that he characterized as "mostly a photo op."

The bank tower opened in 1989 and has nearly 1.4 million square feet of rentable space. It was designed to withstand an 8.3 magnitude earthquake, but not an alien invasion. It was the first building destroyed by space invaders in the 1996 film "Independence Day."

Counterintelligence Posts Vacant (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013780

The top ranks of government counterintelligence agencies are empty due to resignations and retirements amid a dispute over the role of counterspying, U.S. intelligence officials say.

The most senior U.S. government counterintelligence official -- presidential appointee Michelle Van Cleave -- resigned last month after the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive (NCIX), which she headed, was made part of the new Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI).

At the FBI, CIA and Pentagon, senior counterintelligence positions are held by acting officials. At the White House, the National Security Council (NSC) counterintelligence staff position has been downgraded. In the past, it was held by an FBI counterspy. Heidi Avery, the current NSC counterintelligence director, is not an FBI agent.

Intelligence officials said the failure to fill the top posts is a sign of bias against counterspying by senior intelligence officials under DNI John Negroponte and at other agencies.

It goes against the recommendations of a presidential commission that called improving efforts to counter foreign spying an urgent priority.

The Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction stated last year that "while our enemies are executing what amounts to a global intelligence war against the United States, we have failed to meet the challenge."

It said counterspying efforts "have remained fractured, myopic, and only marginally effective."

Former FBI Counterintelligence Chief Dave Szady, who left Jan. 27 for a private-sector job, said in a recent interview that the threat from foreign spies "is worse now than it was in the Cold War." An FBI official said FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III has identified spying by China as the most serious foreign intelligence threat.

Mr. Szady has not been replaced. The acting counterspy chief is Tim Bereznay, a veteran special agent.

"At a time of maximum need for counterintelligence, the administration has put out good words, but is showing by deed that counterintelligence is not a priority," said a senior U.S. intelligence official.

The official said those within the intelligence bureaucracy have "resisted counterintelligence reform for a decade."

"The DNI is confident that counterintelligence operations are being very effectively conducted across the intelligence community," DNI spokesman Carl Kropf said. He added that the selection process is active and that "we anticipate that these vacancies will be filled expeditiously."

Miss Van Cleave left as NCIX director last month. She was instrumental in setting a new national counterintelligence strategy approved by President Bush that called for conducting offensive counterintelligence activities and using counterintelligence techniques to go after terrorists.

The leading candidate to replace Miss Van Cleave is Paul J. Redmond, a former CIA counterintelligence chief who helped uncover CIA turncoat Aldrich Ames, a KGB mole in the agency.

Intelligence officials said one problem with beefing up counterintelligence is that senior officials within Mr. Negroponte's office are opposed to giving counterintelligence more clout and independence.

In particular, the current DNI mission manager for collection, Mary Margaret Graham, who left as head of counterintelligence at the CIA last year, regards counterintelligence as a support function.

Counterintelligence "needs to remain a strategic mission rather than a support activity," a second intelligence official said. "We have to stay ahead of foreign intelligence services that are out there going after our secrets."

Counterspies must comprehend and take action against foreign spies who are attacking the government to steal secrets, not simply how they interfere with U.S. spying efforts.

At the Pentagon, Carol A. Haave, deputy undersecretary of defense for counterintelligence and security, left in November, and no replacement has been named, although an acting official is in place.

A CIA spokesman declined to say whether the National Counterintelligence Center director is acting or permanent.

When reached by telephone in California, Miss Van Cleave said she left her NCIX job because she had accomplished many initial reforms.

"I am confident that the contributions that the NCIX team has made will be a solid foundation for Director of National Intelligence to carry forward," she said.

TSA Criticized For Delay In New Passenger-screening Program Secure Flight Is 'at Risk Of Failure,' Investigators Say (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, February 10, 2006

The government's long-delayed kickoff of a program to improve background checks of airline passengers is "at risk of failure" and faces an uncertain future, congressional investigators said Thursday.

A report by the Government Accountability Office (GAO), Congress' investigative arm, criticized post-9/11 efforts to implement the computerized program, which aims to check domestic airline passengers' names against terrorist watch lists and other databases.

Transportation Security Administration chief Kip Hawley told a Capitol Hill hearing that his agency is doing its own internal review of the program, called Secure Flight.

He said he didn't want to rush development of the TSA program.

"This is the time to ensure that Secure Flight's security, operational and privacy foundation is solid," Hawley told the Senate Commerce Committee.

"My priority is that we do it right, not just that we do it quickly," he said.

Senators expressed frustration that the TSA has spent nearly three years and $144 million trying to improve on the current system, which has been criticized for mistakenly singling out innocent travelers as suspected terrorists.

The agency is seeking an additional $40 million next year for Secure Flight.

"Do something," Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., told Hawley. "Quit fumbling around with it."

A law enacted in December 2004 requires the TSA to take over background checks currently done by airlines.

The TSA would check passengers' names against comprehensive terrorist databases instead of the incomplete, declassified watch lists given to airlines.

Travelers making plane reservations would be asked for their full names and birth dates to help verify identities.

The agency had hoped to start Secure Flight last April.

The new GAO report says the TSA "has not yet produced an updated schedule" of when Secure Flight will begin.

The report criticized TSA for not following its own plans to develop Secure Flight. That resulted in "ad hoc" and "out of sequence" planning that's left it unclear when the program will begin, how much it will cost and how it will help security, the GAO says.

"Without clarification," the report says, "the program is at risk of failure."

Investigators also warned that the TSA hasn't taken adequate steps to protect "sensitive information" being gathered for Secure Flight from hackers.

Previous audits have criticized the TSA for mishandling passenger data.

A probe in 2004 found that the TSA improperly stored 100 million commercial data records containing personal information on passengers after the agency said no data storage would occur.

Hawley, the TSA chief, said Secure Flight would "be built from a strong privacy foundation as a starting point as opposed to building it and then adding privacy."

He called the GAO report "fair criticism" and said his agency's own internal review found many similar problems, which were being corrected.

Passenger Check May Be Vulnerable (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The newest version of the Transportation Security Administration's proposed system to check the names of airline passengers against terrorist watch lists could be vulnerable to hackers, the agency said on Thursday.

The agency's chief, Kip Hawley, told a Senate committee that the long-delayed program, now called Secure Flight, will be delayed again.

DOJ_NMG_0013782

The program is supposed to take over from the airlines the job of checking passenger names against a "watch list." The idea is to reduce the number of cases in which people with names similar to those on the watch list are prevented from boarding planes, but civil libertarians say it would violate passengers' privacy.

The agency has been working on the program for about four years and has spent at least $140 million.

At a hearing Thursday before the Senate Commerce Committee, Cathleen A. Berrick, an auditor with the Government Accountability Office, said in testimony that Secure Flight "may not be adequately protected against unauthorized access and use or disruption."

Mr. Hawley said his agency's technology office had identified many of the same problems.

Even before the hearing, there was no target date for turning the system on.

In Unusual Request, TSA Seeks $10 Million To Address High Turnover (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

The Transportation Security Administration has been hit by troubling turnover in its screener workforce. One in five full-time security screeners has been leaving the agency, according to the administration's new budget. Half of the part-time screeners have also departed.

TSA is seeking $10 million in fiscal 2007 to address what the budget calls "a high rate of attrition." The money would be used to offer extra pay, bonuses, retention allowances, college credit reimbursements and other incentives, the budget request said.

The turnover, TSA said, has driven up recruitment and training costs as the agency constantly replaces screeners who quit.

Requests for extra money to deal with staff turnover are unusual, but agencies often try to solve the problem with the help of their Cabinet secretary or the Office of Personnel Management before going to Congress.

TSA, to some extent, is not a typical federal agency. It hired more than 50,000 employees in 2002, when Congress moved to strengthen aviation safety after terrorists hijacked jetliners and slammed them into the Pentagon and World Trade Center. Concerned about the agency's size, Congress moved a year later to cut the TSA workforce.

As TSA coped with budget and management startup pains, many passenger screeners complained that managers did not listen to their suggestions, did not provide adequate training and sometimes put them at risk of injury in handling heavy luggage.

TSA's budget also asks Congress to provide $20 million to fund workers compensation payments owed to the Labor Department.

Darrin Kayser , a TSA spokesman, said the agency is working to reduce injuries. A new case management initiative has reduced the number of lost workdays from 45 per injury to 11 per injury, he said.

TSA also is trying to provide opportunities for screeners to move up in the agency or elsewhere in government, Kayser said. They have been reclassified as law enforcement officers (transportation security officer) and positions are being set aside for entry into the federal air marshal program, he said.

The agency has established an advisory council so that security screeners can provide feedback to senior TSA leaders and help develop ways of improving morale, Kayser said.

"We did have a lot of challenges, and do appreciate the patience of the workforce," he said. "We are working very hard to address issues that still exist."Postal Point Person?

The White House point person on legislation to overhaul the U.S. Postal Service, Claude A. Allen , head of the domestic policy council, resigned Wednesday, leaving the Bush administration to look for a presidential adviser to help broker a compromise bill.

On a voice vote yesterday, the Senate approved a bill sponsored by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.). The House last summer passed similar legislation, backed by Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.). The Senate and House will create a joint panel to iron out differences in the two versions.

The Postal Service board of governors opposes the overhaul, saying the bills would impose "numerous burdensome provisions." The White House opposes any bill that would increase the federal deficit.

DOJ_NMG_0013783

Postal lobbyists said leading contenders to replace Allen on postal issues were Roger Kodat , a deputy assistant treasury secretary; Dan Blair , deputy director at OPM, and Jess Sharp , a White House domestic policy official.

The White House said Allen had put in long hours over five years in the administration and wanted to spend more time with his family. "We will be working to name a replacement for Claude as soon as possible," said Erin Healy , a White House spokeswoman.

In a statement yesterday, Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) said the House and Senate bills would "protect postal employees' right to collective bargaining and employee benefits."Talk Shows

Sensor On Hill First Suggested VX Nerve Agent (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

The evacuation at the Russell Senate Office Building on Wednesday night marked the biggest nerve-agent scare yet at the Capitol complex, with officials initially fearing that a deadly chemical substance might have been released in the building, authorities said yesterday.

Terrance W. Gainer, chief of the U.S. Capitol Police, said the initial reading from a sensor in the building "bore a striking resemblance to a nerve agent." Further tests, however, were negative. The alarm prompted the evacuation of about 200 people, including at least eight senators, to an underground garage, where they were held for about three hours.

Exposure to an amount of nerve agent as small as a drop can cause death within minutes or hours. Gainer declined to identify the agent that appeared to be indicated by the sensor. But the FBI and other agencies that assisted in the emergency response said they were told it was the VX nerve agent.

Officials still were trying to determine yesterday what prompted the alarm. One possibility, Gainer said, was treated lumber that had been brought into the building recently. It could have contained harmless amounts of chemicals that activated the sensors.

"The experts will be doing a lot more analysis of what the heck it is," Gainer said.

Legislators who were evacuated to the nearby Senate parking garage applauded Capitol Police officers for their handling of the alarm, saying they were calm and provided frequent information.

"The police were very, very professional," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). "And you've got to admire them. They go into these buildings, and they don't know what's in there."

Gainer said his force was "100 percent more prepared" than it had been for the crisis brought on by the anthrax mailings to the Capitol in 2001, which killed two postal employees in Washington. Still, he said, his officers were studying Wednesday night's incident to see how they could improve. Among the glitches: Five people, including journalists and staff members, were discovered in the building well after police thought it was cleared, Gainer said.

"I'm trying to ascertain whether we failed to get the message to them, or they failed to heed our message," he said.

The five included two members of an ABC News camera crew, said Emily Lenzner, a spokeswoman for the organization. She said they had been storing equipment in the attic.

"These guys didn't hear a thing," she said.

Sensors placed throughout the Capitol complex occasionally have produced false alarms. Experts working with Capitol Police check the chemical "signatures" picked up by the sensors and often find that they match those of such familiar products as cleaning sprays or paint thinner.

What caused the concerns Wednesday night, Gainer said, was that the chemical signature looked very much like that of a nerve agent. "This was a unique one to us," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0013784

Shortly after 6:30 p.m., alarms mounted in Senate offices started beeping loudly, as Capitol Police officers announced the evacuation. E-mails issuing the order were sent to staffers' hand-held communicators.

Senators and staffers described the evacuation as orderly.

"There was no running for the door or anything like that," said Coy Knobel, press secretary to Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), both of whom were in the building.

Knobel said the alarms in the hallway outside his office did not appear to be working. However, Gainer said he knew of only one hallway where the public-address message was garbled. "Even if they didn't pick up the electronics, our officers went through the old-fashioned way" to ensure that everyone left the building, he said.

Capitol Police officers decided to take the building's occupants to the Senate garage across Delaware Avenue NE in order to isolate them, Gainer said. But it was quickly obvious that no one in the crowd was showing symptoms of significant nerve-agent exposure, which include vomiting, involuntary defecation, paralysis of the respiratory muscles, unconsciousness and seizures.

Still, Capitol Police officers called in assistance from the D.C. fire department, which set up red, yellow and blue decontamination tents outside the Russell building in case they were needed.

White House Knew Of Levee's Failure On Night Of Storm (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Bush administration officials said they had been caught by surprise when they were told on Tuesday, Aug. 30, that a levee had broken, allowing floodwaters to engulf New Orleans.

But Congressional investigators have now learned that an eyewitness account of the flooding from a federal emergency official reached the Homeland Security Department's headquarters starting at 9:27 p.m. the day before, and the White House itself at midnight.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency official, Marty Bahamonde, first heard of a major levee breach Monday morning. By late Monday afternoon, Mr. Bahamonde had hitched a ride on a Coast Guard helicopter over the breach at the 17th Street Canal to confirm the extensive flooding. He then telephoned his report to FEMA headquarters in Washington, which notified the Homeland Security Department.

"FYI from FEMA," said an e-mail message from the agency's public affairs staff describing the helicopter flight, sent Monday night at 9:27 to the chief of staff of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and recently unearthed by investigators. Conditions, the message said, "are far more serious than media reports are currently reflecting. Finding extensive flooding and more stranded people than they had thought — also a number of fires."

Michael D. Brown, who was the director of FEMA until he resigned under pressure on Sept. 12, said in a telephone interview Thursday that he personally notified the White House of this news that night, though he declined to identify the official he spoke to.

White House officials have confirmed to Congressional investigators that the report of the levee break arrived there at midnight, and Trent Duffy, the White House spokesman, acknowledged as much in an interview this week, though he said it was surrounded with conflicting reports.

But the alert did not seem to register. Even the next morning, President Bush, on vacation in Texas, was feeling relieved that New Orleans had "dodged the bullet," he later recalled. Mr. Chertoff, similarly confident, flew Tuesday to Atlanta for a briefing on avian flu. With power out from the high winds and movement limited, even news reporters in New Orleans remained unaware of the full extent of the levee breaches until Tuesday.

The federal government let out a sigh of relief when in fact it should have been sounding an "all hands on deck" alarm, the investigators have found.

This chain of events, along with dozens of other critical flashpoints in the Hurricane Katrina saga, has for the first time been laid out in detail following five months of work by two Congressional committees that have assembled nearly 800,000 pages of documents, testimony and interviews from more than 250 witnesses. Investigators now have the documentation to pinpoint some of the fundamental errors and oversights that combined to produce what is universally agreed to be a flawed government response to the worst natural disaster in modern American history.

On Friday, Mr. Brown, the former FEMA director, is scheduled to testify before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. He is expected to confirm that he notified the White House on that Monday, the day the hurricane hit, that the levee had given way, the city was flooding and his crews were overwhelmed.

"There is no question in my mind that at the highest levels of the White House they understood how grave the situation was," Mr. Brown said in the interview.

The problem, he said, was the handicapping of FEMA when it was turned into a division of the Homeland Security Department in 2003.

"The real story is with this new structure," he said. "Why weren't more things done, or what prevented or delayed Mike Brown from being able to do what he would have done and did do in any other disaster?"

Although Mr. Bahamonde said in October that he had notified Mr. Brown that Monday, it was not known until recently what Mr. Brown or the Homeland Security Department did with that information, or when the White House was told.

Missteps at All Levels

It has been known since the earliest days of the storm that all levels of government — from the White House to the Department of Homeland Security to the Louisiana Capitol to New Orleans City Hall — were unprepared, uncommunicative and phlegmatic in protecting Gulf Coast residents from the floodwaters and their aftermath. But an examination of the latest evidence by The New York Times shines a new light on the key players involved in the important turning points: what they said, what they did and what they did not do, all of which will soon be written up in the committees' investigative reports.

Among the findings that emerge in the mass of documents and testimony were these:

¶Federal officials knew long before the storm showed up on the radar that 100,000 people in New Orleans had no way to escape a major hurricane on their own and that the city had finished only 10 percent of a plan for how to evacuate its largely poor, African-American population.

¶Mr. Chertoff failed to name a principal federal official to oversee the response before the hurricane arrived, an omission a top Pentagon official acknowledged to investigators complicated the coordination of the response. His department also did not plan enough to prevent a conflict over which agency should be in charge of law enforcement support. And Mr. Chertoff was either poorly informed about the levee break or did not recognize the significance of the initial report about it, investigators said.

¶The Louisiana transportation secretary, Johnny B. Bradberry, who had legal responsibility for the evacuation of thousands of people in nursing homes and hospitals, admitted bluntly to investigators, "We put no plans in place to do any of this."

¶Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans at first directed his staff to prepare a mandatory evacuation of his city on Saturday, two days before the storm hit, but he testified that he had not done so that day while he and other city officials struggled to decide if they should exempt hospitals and hotels from the order. The mandatory evacuation occurred on Sunday, and the delay exacerbated the difficulty in moving people away from the storm.

¶The New Orleans Police Department unit assigned to the rescue effort, despite many years' worth of flood warnings and requests for money, had just three small boats and no food, water or fuel to supply its emergency workers.

¶Investigators could find no evidence that food and water supplies were formally ordered for the Convention Center, where more than 10,000 evacuees had assembled, until days after the city had decided to open it as a backup emergency shelter. FEMA had planned to have 360,000 ready-to-eat meals delivered to the city and 15 trucks of water in advance of the storm. But only 40,000 meals and five trucks of water had arrived.

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, chairman of the special House committee investigating the hurricane response, said the only government agency that performed well was the National Weather Service, which correctly predicted the force of the storm. But no one heeded the message, he said.

"The president is still at his ranch, the vice president is still fly-fishing in Wyoming, the president's chief of staff is in Maine," Mr. Davis said. "In retrospect, don't you think it would have been better to pull together? They should have had better leadership. It is disengagement."

DOJ_NMG_0013786

One of the greatest mysteries for both the House and Senate committees has been why it took so long, even after Mr. Bahamonde filed his urgent report on the Monday the storm hit, for federal officials to appreciate that the levee had broken and that New Orleans was flooding.

Eyewitness to Devastation

As his helicopter approached the site, Mr. Bahamonde testified in October, there was no mistaking what had happened: large sections of the levee had fallen over, leaving the section of the city on the collapsed side entirely submerged, but the neighborhood on the other side relatively dry. He snapped a picture of the scene with a small camera.

"The situation is only going to get worse," he said he warned Mr. Brown, then the FEMA director, whom he called about 8 p.m. Monday Eastern time to report on his helicopter tour.

"Thank you," he said Mr. Brown replied. "I am now going to call the White House."

Citing restrictions placed on him by his lawyers, Mr. Brown declined to tell House investigators during testimony if he had actually made that call. White House aides have urged administration officials not to discuss any conversations with the president or his top advisors and declined to release e-mail messages sent among Mr. Bush's senior advisors.

But investigators have found the e-mail message referring to Mr. Bahamonde's helicopter survey that was sent to John F. Wood, chief of staff to Secretary Chertoff at 9:27 p.m. They have also found a summary of Mr. Bahamonde's observations that was issued at 10:30 p.m. and an 11:05 p.m. e-mail message to Michael Jackson, the deputy secretary of homeland security. Each message describes in detail the extensive flooding that was taking place in New Orleans after the levee collapse.

Given this chain of events, investigators have repeatedly questioned why Mr. Bush and Mr. Chertoff stated in the days after the storm that the levee break did not happen until Tuesday, as they made an effort to explain why they initially thought the storm had passed without the catastrophe that some had feared.

"The hurricane started to depart the area on Monday, and then Tuesday morning the levee broke and the water started to flood into New Orleans," Mr. Chertoff said on CBS's "Face the Nation" on Sunday, Sept. 4, the weekend after the hurricane hit.

Mr. Chertoff and White House officials have said that they were referring to official confirmation that the levee had broken, which they say they received Tuesday morning from the Army Corps of Engineers. They also say there were conflicting reports all day Monday about whether a breach had occurred and noted that they were not alone in failing to recognize the growing catastrophe.

Mr. Duffy, the White House spokesman, said it would not have made much difference even if the White House had realized the significance of the midnight report. "Like it or not, you cannot fix a levee overnight, or in an hour, or even six hours," he said.

But Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, said it was obvious to her in retrospect that Mr. Chertoff, perhaps in deference to Mr. Brown's authority, was not paying close enough attention to the events in New Orleans and that the federal response to the disaster may have been slowed as a result.

"Secretary Chertoff was too disengaged from the process," Ms. Collins said in an interview.

Compounding the problem, once Mr. Chertoff learned of the levee break on Tuesday, he could not reach Mr. Brown, his top emergency response official, for an entire day because Mr. Brown was on helicopter tours of the damage.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the ranking Democrat on the homeland security committee, said the government confusion reminded him of the period surrounding the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

"Information was in different places, in that case prior to the attack," Mr. Lieberman said, "and it wasn't reaching the key decision makers in a coordinated way for them to take action."

Russ Knocke, a homeland security spokesman, said that although Mr. Chertoff had been "intensely involved in monitoring the storm" he had not actually been told about the report of the levee breach until Tuesday, after he arrived in Atlanta.

"No one is satisfied with the response in the early days," Mr. Knocke said.

But he rejected criticism by Senator Collins and others that Mr. Chertoff was disengaged.

"He was not informed of it," Mr. Knocke said. "It is certainly a breakdown. And through an after-action process, that is something we will address."

DOJ_NMG_0013787

The day before the hurricane made landfall, the Homeland Security Department issued a report predicting that it could lead to a levee breach that could submerge New Orleans for months and leave 100,000 people stranded. Yet despite these warnings, state, federal and local officials acknowledged to investigators that there was no coordinated effort before the storm arrived to evacuate nursing homes and hospitals or others in the urban population without cars.

Focus on Highway Plan

Mr. Bradberry, the state transportation secretary, told an investigator that he had focused on improving the highway evacuation plan for the general public with cars and had not attended to his responsibility to remove people from hospitals and nursing homes. The state even turned down an offer for patient evacuation assistance from the federal government.

In fact, the city was desperately in need of help. And this failure would have deadly consequences. Only 21 of the 60 or so nursing homes were cleared of residents before the storm struck. Dozens of lives were lost in hospitals and nursing homes.

One reason the city was unable to help itself, investigators said, is that it never bought the basic equipment needed to respond to the long-predicted catastrophe. The Fire Department had asked for inflatable boats and generators, as well as an emergency food supply, but none were provided, a department official told investigators.

Timothy P. Bayard, a police narcotics commander assigned to lead a water rescue effort, said that with just three boats, not counting the two it commandeered and almost no working radios, his small team spent much of its time initially just trying to rescue detectives who themselves were trapped by rising water.

The investigators also determined that the federal Department of Transportation was not asked until Wednesday to provide buses to evacuate the Superdome and the convention center, meaning that evacuees sat there for perhaps two more days longer than necessary.

Mr. Brown acknowledged to investigators that he wished, in retrospect, that he had moved much earlier to turn over major aspects of the response effort to the Department of Defense. It was not until the middle of the week, he said, that he asked the military to take over the delivery and distribution of water, food and ice.

"In hindsight I should have done it right then," Mr. Brown told the House, referring to the Sunday before the storm hit.

But investigators have concluded that the federal government, even when it saw this dire warning from the National Weather Service, did not act as if he knew this most basic reality: local authorities would not be able to fend for themselves. Here is an excerpt of the federal statement of the local incapacity to fend for itself and the weather forecast just before Katrina landed.

On Sunday, Aug. 28, at noon, federal and state officials, including President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff participated in a teleconference call to discuss the approaching storm. Mr. Max Mayfield, the director of the National Hurricane Center provided some dire warnings. Mr. Chertoff asked FEMA director Michael Brown if there was anything he needed. Mr. Bush prayed for no loss of life. And Mr. Brown asked Col. Jeff Smith, Deputy Director of the Louisiana Department of Homeland Security, if he needed any assistance.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, observed: "The initial evacuation from New Orleans in advance of the storm went relatively well. Approximately 1 million people left the greater New Orleans area in a much more efficient and orderly manner than in hurricane evacuations of years past. Then, so to speak, the wheels came off. Those without access to transportation out of the region found themselves stranded high and dry, but only in the figurative sense. Among those left behind were thousands of elderly, disabled and disadvantaged residents." Mr. Bradberry was interviewed by a Senate investigator.

In July 2005, at an emergency planning session sponsored by FEMA, state and local officials discussed evacuation planning for a possible hurricane in the region, which all parties recognized could cause thousands, if not tens of thousands of deaths. At the meeting, there was a consensus that they were far from ready, as only about 10 percent of the planning was finished for how they would evacuate the estimated 100,000 people in the area that did not have cars or other means of getting out of the city.

Without an organized plan to evacuate nursing homes before Katrina landed, 36 nursing homes failed to heed mandatory evacuation orders. City hospitals also did not evacuate. But city officials acknowledged during the investigation that they did not realize that many hospitals had their back up generators in areas that could be flooded. That meant that they too were often without electricity after the storm and flood.

Reports that there were major breaks in the levees started on Monday morning, the day Katrina hit. News of his report, and helicopter flights he took to confirm the levee breach, reached the White House and the office of the Homeland Security secretary by Monday evening or late Monday night. In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans Police Captain Timothy P. He introduced the report to investigators by saying: "The New Orleans Office of Emergency Preparedness failed. They did not prepare themselves, nor did they manage the city agencies responsible for conducting emergency response to the disaster. Their function was to coordinate with state, federal and other local agencies, to enlist logistical assistance. We did not coordinate with any state, local or federal agencies. We were not prepared logistically. Most importantly, we relocated evacuees to two locations where there was no food, water or portable restrooms. We did not implement the pre-existing plan. We did not utilize buses that would have allowed us to transport mass quantities of evacuees expeditiously. We did not have food, water or fuel for the emergency workers. We did not have a back up communication system. We had no portable radio towers or repeaters that would have enabled us to communicate. The other mistakes have been mentioned previously." The National Guard, which is made up of troops under the command of individual states, ultimately had at least 30,000 troops assigned to Louisiana to help with the response to Hurricane Katrina. Ex-FEMA Chief, In Reversal, To Answer Questions On Storm (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013790

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — For months, Michael D. Brown, former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, has declined to answer questions from Congress about his conversations during Hurricane Katrina with top Bush administration officials. But in an interview on Thursday, he said that his position had changed.

Now that he is a private citizen, he said, "I feel an obligation to answer any questions they put to me."

Mr. Brown will have that chance on Friday, when he is scheduled to testify to the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which is nearing the end of a five-month inquiry on the hurricane.

"The public needs to know the entire picture of what was going on," Mr. Brown said.

Mr. Brown's lawyer, in a letter sent Monday to Harriet E. Miers, the White House counsel, wrote that "unless there is specific direction otherwise by the president" that "Mr. Brown will testify, if asked, about particular communications he had" with White House officials and others in the executive branch.

As of Thursday evening, Mr. Brown and his lawyer, Andrew W. Lester, said they had received no calls or letters from the White House urging Mr. Brown to remain silent.

The testimony will make clear, Mr. Brown said, that senior administration officials, including President Bush, recognized the severity of the problem in New Orleans in the immediate aftermath of the storm. But changes in the organization of FEMA and the powers of the director of the agency after it became part of the Homeland Security Department, Mr. Brown said, prevented him from effectively leading the response.

The administration has declined House and Senate investigators' requests to turn over e-mail messages and other correspondence from top White House officials involved in the hurricane response. Mr. Bush, asked last month whether Mr. Brown should testify about his White House discussions, seemed to urge him to not do so.

A White House spokesman, Trent Duffy, said he had nothing to add to that comment.

Mr. Brown, who has a permanent residence in Colorado but continues to live here, has formed a disaster-relief consultancy. He would not name clients but said he had signed up a number of companies, including firms that sell communications equipment and work on rebuilding on the Gulf Coast.

Former FEMA Director To Testify About Katrina (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Michael D. Brown, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, was rebuffed in his request for a claim of executive privilege and plans to testify to a Senate panel today about his calls and e-mails to President Bush and top White House aides in the Hurricane Katrina crisis, Brown's lawyer said yesterday.

White House Counsel Harriet Miers declined to offer Brown a legal defense for declining to testify or respond to a Feb. 6 letter advising that without such protection Brown "intends to answer all questions fully, completely and accurately," said Brown's lawyer, Andrew W. Lester.

Lester wrote that Brown will testify if asked about communications with Bush, Vice President Cheney, Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr., Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Deputy Chief of Staff Joseph Hagin, domestic policy adviser Claude A. Allen and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley.

As the federal official in charge of the disaster before he resigned, Brown is "between a rock and a hard place," his lawyer said. "On the one hand he desires to answer fully any and all questions the Committee may have," Lester wrote. "On the other hand the President's statements indicate concern that the President be able to 'get unvarnished advice from [his] advisors.' "

House and Senate investigative committees have battled the White House over its refusal to make available top aides and their correspondence from the response to the storm. Instead, the White House has provided 15,000 pages of records and briefings by a deputy White House homeland security adviser.

Bush spokesman Trent Duffy declined to comment on Brown's letter. But Duffy noted a Jan. 26 news conference in which Bush, while declining to cite Brown by name, defended "people who give me advice" from being forced to disclose such conversations, citing a "chilling effect on future advisers."

DOJ_NMG_0013791

In testimony to a House committee in September, Brown did not discuss such conversations on the advice of counsel, although he estimated that he communicated with the White House "30 times" during the weekend before Katrina made landfall on Monday, Aug. 29. That included "several" calls to Bush to help speed evacuations by Louisiana and New Orleans leaders.

Yesterday, Lester said that Brown "is planning to testify by answering all questions."

Brown could shed light on the White House's lack of awareness of events on the day of Katrina's landfall. Documents released by the Senate show that although the Homeland Security Operations Center reported at 6 p.m. Aug. 29 that no New Orleans levees had been breached, authorities received no fewer than 16 reports to the contrary before then.

Beginning at 8:30 a.m. Aug. 29, levee breaks were reported by sources including New Orleans and Louisiana homeland security officials, the Transportation Security Administration, the National Weather Service, FEMA officials, White House Homeland Security Council and Homeland Security Department "spot reports," the Army Corps of Engineers, the Coast Guard, and the American Red Cross.

Neighborhoods At Stake (USAT)

By Richard Baker

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Louisiana's in limbo. Months after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita destroyed more than 200,000 homes and businesses, little progress has been made toward rebuilding. Nor will it if these properties languish in ruins for years. Think about that: American ruins.

Thousands face paying mortgages on homes lost or accepting foreclosure and losing still more. The private sector is held back by a broken market: Even individuals with resources to rebuild won't when their neighborhood remains decimated. The only answer: Restoring whole communities.

To help, I have proposed the Louisiana Recovery Corp., which would purchase property from willing sellers, providing them financial stability to move forward and options to come home. By clearing title and reconditioning land, the LRC would open the door for the private sector, following local plans, to finance rebuilding, with proceeds from land sales returned to taxpayers.

At an average payment of 60% of $200,000, covering every property would cost $24 billion, but if only half were recovered through resale, the overall cost would be $12 billion. That's a major investment, but consider: In nearly six months, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has spent more than $8 billion on Gulf Coast "housing," for such things as trailers, motels and cruise ships. While helpful, these "temporary" arrangements aren't solutions. For 50% more over 10 years, the LRC would allow people to make long-term housing plans, while laying a path to rebuild a vast portion of a vital state. Isn't this a better way?

To say assisting Louisiana's floodplain is unwise closes the door on whole parishes and New Orleans itself, and overlooks that many were inadequately insured because they had relied on levees built by the federal government. Stronger levees, building codes and insurance requirements would ensure that government and Louisianans live up to their responsibilities and rebuild responsibly.

Offering philosophical objections but no workable alternative does nothing to address the reality. If there's a fairer, more effective and fiscally responsible plan, I'd like to hear it. But as it is, the LRC enjoys broad support across ideological lines. A fair hearing and an up-or-down vote is all we ask.

Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., chairs a subcommittee of the House Financial Services Committee.

Rebuild Louisiana, But Not By Creating Federal Money Pit (USAT)

USA Today, February 10, 2006

They call it the "devastation tour," and sadly for New Orleans, it delivers everything the label implies.

The three-hour bus excursion, offered since last month by Gray Line New Orleans, takes visitors through the ruins that once were graceful neighborhoods in one of the nation's fabled cities. Now, nearly six months after Hurricane Katrina struck, the tour shows ghostly shells of homes, upended trees and roof-high water marks — the brownish calling cards left by flooding. Unseen are the smashed lives the waters also leftbehind.

DOJ_NMG_0013792

New Orleans and the surrounding area are devastated and need help. Americans want to provide it. But Congress is focused on a scheme that would serve neither the city nor the taxpayers well. Actually, it's less a plan than an exercise in thoughtless political spending — and further proof that Washington can't manage disaster relief.

Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., proposes creating a new federal bureaucracy, the Louisiana Recovery Corp. (LRC), to buy damaged properties, repackage them and sell them for redevelopment. Baker's plan is gaining traction in Congress and plaudits in Louisiana. At first glance, it appears promising. But look deeper, and costly flaws appear:

• Unknown price tag. The plan would allow the new corporation to borrow up to $30 billion from the U.S. Treasury, but there's no limit on how much could ultimately be spent to set up and run this entity. And no hard figures on how much taxpayers might hope to recoup.

• No guarantee. The LRC would buy homes from sellers for at least 60% of their fair market value before Katrina struck — an interesting, if expensive, goal. But the land would be acquired in disconnected chunks. There's no provision for emptying flood-prone areas and scant help for homeowners who want to rebuild safely, not sell.

• Questionable recipients. Baker's plan would reward lenders by paying them as much as 60% of outstanding mortgages. This would apply even to lenders who failed to fulfill federal requirements that homes in designated flood plains be insured as a condition of getting a mortgage. Taxpayers shouldn't be forced to bail out lenders who took such risks. Doing so would encourage cavalier practices in the future.

• Dangerous precedent. Though the New Orleans flood was an unparalleled disaster, this vast new program would lead homeowners to expect similar aid in the next catastrophe. The poorly run National Flood Insurance Program is nearly bankrupt after Katrina; this is no time to create a bureaucracy with an open checkbook.

The Bush administration wisely opposes Baker's plan, but despite the passage of time, it hasn't proposed an alternative.

Katrina's victims merit help to restore their lives, and New Orleans needs help in rebuilding. That requires substantial aid from the federal government, which contributed to the disaster when its levees failed.

Even so, aid programs that lack accountability to taxpayers or a clear plan for rebuilding would make matters worse. Nor should the federal government usurp local responsibility and control. New Orleans needs a sound state and local rebuilding plan. Neither the City Council nor the state has adopted one. That, not an expensive federal bureaucracy, is the first building block toward putting the "devastation tour" out of business.

SBA Seeking More Money From Congress Some Lawmakers Criticize Agency For 'lack Of Leadership' In Handling Katrina Relief Funds (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Small Business Administration, criticized for its slow pace in making disaster loans to victims of Hurricane Katrina, is asking Congress for an additional $1.1 billion in relief money.

Though the agency has approved $4.1 billion in loans, most of them to owners of storm-damaged homes, it has paid out just $326 million of that amount.

The agency received an emergency infusion of $441 million in December for disaster loans and got permission last week to transfer $100 million into the loan program from other accounts.

"We have concerns about how they got to this reported crisis," said John Scofield, a spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee, which along with its Senate counterpart controls federal spending. "We've given them everything they've asked for. That should get them through it."

Rep. Nydia Velzquez, D-N.Y., the top Democrat on the House Small Business Committee and an agency critic, said the SBA has "been wrong with the numbers. It proves the lack of leadership and mismanagement."

SBA spokesman Raul Cisneros defended the request, noting that Katrina is the most expensive disaster ever to hit the USA and that requests for additional money have been routine in previous disasters. "We just don't know" how much such events will ultimately cost, he said.

The $1.1 billion in requested new money — part of an upcoming $18 billion Bush administration request for Katrina relief — will fund an additional $6.8 billion in disaster loans, Cisneros said. The $1.1 billion represents the federal subsidy involved in making the loans, or the ultimate cost to the government once the loan is repaid.

The SBA projects it ultimately will approve nearly $12.4 billion in loans by Sept. 30, the end of the 2006 fiscal year for Katrina and for Hurricanes Rita and Wilma. The requested $1.1 billion would allow those loans to be fully funded, the agency said.

In the five months since Katrina struck, SBA has received 373,495 disaster loan applications and has approved 59,398 of them. An additional 165,263 remain to be processed. The rest were denied or withdrawn.

The agency has come under harsh criticism from Velzquez and other lawmakers on Capitol Hill, as well as some of its own employees, for its handling of the crisis.

In other news, 28 government entities, from local Louisiana parishes to the White House, reported that New Orleans levees were breached Aug. 29, the day Katrina hit, the Associated Press said Thursday.

A timeline of e-mails, situation updates and weather reports, pieced together by Senate Democrats, indicates the Bush administration knew as early as 8:30 a.m. ET about levee failures that would ultimately lead to massive flooding of the city and its surrounding parishes.

White House spokesman Trent Duffy said President Bush and his top aides were fully aware about the massive flooding — and less concerned whether it was caused by levee breaches, overtopped levees or failed pumps, all three of which were being reported at the time.

"We knew there was flooding, and that's why the No. 1 effort in those early hours was on search and rescue, and saving life and limb," Duffy said.

Has USA Lost Drive To Rebuild After Tragedies? Nation Usually Quick To Rebound, But Confusion Slowing Process In New Orleans, At Ground Zero (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Less than 72 hours after fire destroyed a third of Chicago, including his own family's new town house on Michigan Avenue, a civic booster named William Bross boarded a train to New York.

Bross, an owner of the Chicago Tribune, had a message for Wall Street: The fire was not a disaster; it was an investment opportunity. "What she has been in the past, she must become in the future," he said of his home town, "and a hundredfold more."

That was the attitude in Chicago in 1871. And in Galveston, Texas, after the hurricane of 1900; in San Francisco after the earthquake of 1906; at Pearl Harbor after the sneak attack in 1941.

It's the American attitude: We always spring up off the mat, always rebuild bigger and better.

At least until now. In New York City, where terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center, and in New Orleans, where Katrina flooded most of the city, Americans are arguing over how, when and even whether to rebuild.

The qualities we associate with recovery from disaster — urgency, unity, determination, imagination — have been eclipsed by indecision, delay and dissension.

"Rebuilding quickly is part of our self-identity, but we're getting more cynical about what we're capable of," says Christine Rosen, a business school professor at the University of California-Berkeley who has studied urban disasters.

To some, it's a disturbing change. "Great nations rebuild," says Douglas Brinkley, a historian at New Orleans' Tulane University. He blames the dithering in Lower Manhattan and his own city on a failure of political leadership.

"If we had the will in 1947 to rebuild the capitals of Europe, why don't we have the will in 2006 to rebuild the capital city of the Mississippi (River)?" he asks. "Most Americans are oblivious to what's happening, because no one is standing in the bully pulpit to tell them."

It's been only five months since the hurricane, but Brinkley sees little sign of the comeback spirit that sprang from the ruins of Chicago, San Francisco and Galveston.

DOJ_NMG_0013794

At Ground Zero, there's still a gaping hole where the Trade Center stood. More than four years have passed without a consensus as to what should fill it, observes Brent Glass, director of the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History.

He adds: “I don't know if there's an analogy for that in American history.”

These cities rebuilt, each with little federal aid:

•Chicago: After the Great Fire destroyed 18,000 buildings and left 100,000 homeless (one in three residents), rebuilding in the “Burnt District” began almost immediately. Debris was pushed into Lake Michigan as landfill for a bigger city. The size of the central business district doubled, and taller buildings were constructed.

•San Francisco: The earthquake started fires that destroyed about three quarters of the city and left 300,000 homeless — half the population. City leaders began rebuilding immediately, abandoning for the sake of speed a master plan to beautify the city.

•Galveston: The year after the hurricane wrecked much of Galveston Island, a county referendum on a bond issue for a seawall passed by better than 9-to-1. The entire city was raised by more than 15 feet.

Times change.

In New York, the city, the state, the Port Authority, the Trade Center leaseholder, relatives of 9/11 victims, neighborhood residents and business owners are still bickering over what will rise at Ground Zero.

Although a memorial has been designed, little else is settled. Plans for two museums fell apart amid complaints that their exhibits might dishonor the dead. The Freedom Tower, planned to be the world's tallest building, was redesigned because of security concerns and will not be finished until the next decade, if at all.

It's still early to rebuild in New Orleans, but the prospect of recovery is clouded by squabbling over who's responsible for what happened and by confusion over who's responsible for what will happen.

The leading rebuilding proposal, which gives the most flood-prone sections from four months to a year to attract a critical mass of residents or be condemned, has divided the city. It also counts on at least $17 billion more than the federal government has pledged.

Whatever the city's plan, many residents have said they won't return unless Washington promises to improve the levees to withstand a Category 5 hurricane. That might cost more than $32 billion — 10 times what the president has promised for levees.

There's another variable — the new federal flood maps for the city. When issued, the maps may mean that many people who want to return won't be able to because of higher insurance and building costs.

Why does America seem to rebuild and rebound differently today than it has in the past?

•New Orleans and Lower Manhattan were on the decline, not the rise.

Chicago in 1871, Galveston in 1900 and San Francisco in 1906 had something more powerful than fire, flood or earthquake: location. The first was poised between the industrial Northeast and the agricultural Midwest. The second was Texas' major port on the Gulf of Mexico. The third was the economic capital of the West and gateway to the Pacific Ocean.

In contrast, New Orleans' population had dropped from 600,000 in 1960 to 450,000. It had a slew of problems, from high crime to low elevation. “New Orleans was slowly sinking, literally and figuratively, well before Katrina,” says Lawrence Vale, head of MIT's urban planning department.

Similarly, on Sept. 11, 2001, Lower Manhattan was in the commercial doldrums, mostly because it lacked Midtown's parking and commuter rail links. The market for office space was glutted.

Four years later, little has changed. No. 7 World Trade Center — an office tower next to Ground Zero that also was destroyed and has now been rebuilt — is scheduled to open in April, but only 300,000 of its 1.7 million square feet have been leased.

•Rebuilding after natural disasters always has relied on private capital, not federal aid.

Although Eastern money was wary of San Francisco after the quake, Western investors stepped up to rebuild the city.

Now, with Washington still prosecuting a war and facing a $400 billion-a-year deficit, economics trumps politics: “No matter what the government does, who's going to invest?” asks George Friedman, president of Stratfor, a private intelligence and analysis service.

DOJ_NMG_0013795

Given tight government finances and investor reluctance, New Orleans "just doesn't have the economic muscle to come back as it was," says Mary Comerio, a UC-Berkeley expert in disaster recovery.

•Rebuilding then wasn't as smooth as it looks now.

Chicago and San Francisco weren't rebuilt without delays and problems. Chicago started fast, but construction stalled after the financial panic of 1873. San Francisco took about nine years to come all the way back. "There was no 'golden age' of rebuilding," says Glass, the museum director. "They had the same controversies then that we have now."

•Haste made waste.

After great 19th-century fires devastated cities such as Boston and Baltimore, proposed reforms — wider streets, tighter building codes, better water service — were compromised by the drive to rebuild quickly.

Post-quake San Francisco hurriedly pushed debris into the bay, where it became a weak base for the city's Marina district, which suffered some of the heaviest damage during a 1989 quake. Chicago suffered another devastating fire in 1874, partly because the city did not improve water pressure and install more hydrants.

Today, those kinds of memories help explain the reluctance in New Orleans to rebuild in low-lying areas and the concern in New York that new skyscrapers at Ground Zero might be vulnerable to another attack.

•There's more to rebuild now — at higher cost.

Chicago before the fire had no electricity or phone service, few paved streets and little indoor plumbing. The fire largely spared its rail lines and stockyards.

New Orleans faces a much bigger rebuilding job. Carl Smith, a Northwestern University professor who has studied the Chicago fire, says he's "astonished" by the devastation of Katrina. In 2006 dollars, the fire caused about $3.2 billion in property damage. Katrina caused about $40 billion in insured losses alone.

•We listen to our own rhetoric.

"We will rebuild!" elected officials crowed in unison after 9/11 and Katrina. Many cited heroic precedents such as Chicago and San Francisco. But House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., received criticism when he suggested it might not be prudent to rebuild New Orleans.

The rhetoric "is part of the problem," Berkeley's Comerio says. "It's heresy to say that we don't need all this new office space in Lower Manhattan or that some parts of New Orleans can't be resettled," she says. "It's reality, but in American terms it's defeatist."

As for timing, Friedman, the intelligence analyst, says Americans should give themselves a break: "A major city was destroyed in August. Now it's (February). Americans are prodigious rebuilders, but we're also a nation that demands instant gratification."

WAR NEWS:

Ex-CIA Official Faults Use Of Data On Iraq (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Intelligence 'Misused' to Justify War, He Says

The former CIA official who coordinated U.S. intelligence on the Middle East until last year has accused the Bush administration of "cherry-picking" intelligence on Iraq to justify a decision it had already reached to go to war, and of ignoring warnings that the country could easily fall into violence and chaos after an invasion to overthrow Saddam Hussein.

Paul R. Pillar, who was the national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia from 2000 to 2005, acknowledges the U.S. intelligence agencies' mistakes in concluding that Hussein's government possessed weapons of mass destruction. But he said those misjudgments did not drive the administration's decision to invade.

"Official intelligence on Iraqi weapons programs was flawed, but even with its flaws, it was not what led to the war," Pillar wrote in the upcoming issue of the journal Foreign Affairs. Instead, he asserted, the administration "went to war without requesting -- and evidently without being influenced by -- any strategic-level intelligence assessments on any aspect of Iraq."

"It has become clear that official intelligence was not relied on in making even the most significant national security decisions, that intelligence was misused publicly to justify decisions already made, that damaging ill will developed between [Bush] policymakers and intelligence officers, and that the intelligence community's own work was politicized," Pillar wrote.

Pillar's critique is one of the most severe indictments of White House actions by a former Bush official since Richard C. Clarke, a former National Security Council staff member, went public with his criticism of the administration's handling of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and its failure to deal with the terrorist threat beforehand.

It is also the first time that such a senior intelligence officer has so directly and publicly condemned the administration's handling of intelligence.

Pillar, retired after 28 years at the CIA, was an influential behind-the-scenes player and was considered the agency's leading counterterrorism analyst. By the end of his career, he was responsible for coordinating assessments on Iraq from all 15 agencies in the intelligence community. He is now a professor in security studies at Georgetown University.

White House officials did not respond to a request to comment for this article. They have vehemently denied accusations that the administration manipulated intelligence to generate public support for the war.

"Our statements about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein were based on the aggregation of intelligence from a number of sources and represented the collective view of the intelligence community," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said in a White House briefing in November. "Those judgments were shared by Republicans and Democrats alike."

Republicans and Democrats in Congress continue to argue over whether, or how, to investigate accusations the administration manipulated prewar intelligence.

Yesterday, the Senate Republican Policy Committee issued a statement to counter what it described as "the continuing Iraq pre-war intelligence myths," including charges that Bush " 'misused' intelligence to justify the war." Writing that it was perfectly reasonable for the president to rely on the intelligence he was given, the paper concluded, "it is actually the critics who are misleading the American people."

In his article, Pillar said he believes that the "politicization" of intelligence on Iraq occurred "subtly" and in many forms, but almost never resulted from a policymaker directly asking an analyst to reshape his or her results. "Such attempts are rare," he writes, "and when they do occur . . . are almost always unsuccessful."

Instead, he describes a process in which the White House helped frame intelligence results by repeatedly posing questions aimed at bolstering its arguments about Iraq.

The Bush administration, Pillar wrote, "repeatedly called on the intelligence community to uncover more material that would contribute to the case for war," including information on the "supposed connection" between Hussein and al Qaeda, which analysts had discounted. "Feeding the administration's voracious appetite for material on the Saddam-al Qaeda link consumed an enormous amount of time and attention."

The result of the requests, and public statements by the president, Vice President Cheney and others, led analysts and managers to conclude the United States was heading for war well before the March 2003 invasion, Pillar asserted.

They thus knew, he wrote, that senior policymakers "would frown on or ignore analysis that called into question a decision to go to war and welcome analysis that supported such a decision. . . . [They] felt a strong wind consistently blowing in one direction. The desire to bend with such a wind is natural and strong, even if unconscious."

Pillar wrote that the prewar intelligence asserted Hussein's "weapons capacities," but he said the "broad view" within the United States and overseas "was that Saddam was being kept 'in his box' " by U.N. sanctions, and that the best way to deal with him was through "an aggressive inspections program to supplement sanctions already in place."

"If the entire body of official intelligence analysis on Iraq had a policy implication," Pillar wrote, "it was to avoid war -- or, if war was going to be launched, to prepare for a messy aftermath."

Pillar describes for the first time that the intelligence community did assessments before the invasion that, he wrote, indicated a postwar Iraq "would not provide fertile ground for democracy" and would need "a Marshall Plan-type effort" to restore its economy despite its oil revenue. It also foresaw Sunnis and Shiites fighting for power.

DOJ_NMG_0013797

Pillar wrote that the intelligence community "anticipated that a foreign occupying force would itself be the target of resentment and attacks -- including guerrilla warfare -- unless it established security and put Iraq on the road to prosperity in the first few weeks or months after the fall of Saddam."

In an interview, Pillar said the prewar assessments "were not crystal-balling, but in them we were laying out the challenges that would face us depending on decisions that were made."

Pillar wrote that the first request he received from a Bush policymaker for an assessment of post-invasion Iraq was "not until a year into the war."

That assessment, completed in August 2004, warned that the insurgency in Iraq could evolve into a guerrilla war or civil war. It was leaked to the media in September in the midst of the presidential campaign, and Bush, who had told voters that the mission in Iraq was going well, described the assessment to reporters as "just guessing."

Shortly thereafter, Pillar was identified in a column by Robert D. Novak as having prepared the assessment and having given a speech critical of Bush's Iraq policy at a private dinner in California. The column fed the White House's view that the CIA was in effect working against the Bush administration, and that Pillar was part of that. A columnist in the Washington Times in October 2004 called him "a longstanding intellectual opponent of the policy options chosen by President Bush to fight terrorism."

Leaked information "encouraged some administration supporters to charge intelligence officers (including me) with trying to sabotage the president's policies," Pillar wrote. One effect of that, he said, was to limit challenges to consensus views on matters such as the Iraqi weapons program.

When asked why he did not quit given his concerns, Pillar said in the interview that he was doing "other worthwhile work in the nation's interest" and never thought of resigning over the issue.

Pillar suggests that the CIA and other intelligence agencies, now under Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, remain within the executive branch but "be given greater independence."

The model he cites is the Federal Reserve, overseen by governors who serve fixed terms. That, he said, would reduce "both the politicization of the intelligence community's own work and the public misuse of intelligence by policymakers."

Two Shiite Alliance Contenders Vie For Prime Minister Job In Iraq (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's largest political alliance has narrowed its field of prime minister candidates to two.

The top candidates are Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Adel Abdul Mahdi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, said Basam Ridha, an al-Jaafari adviser.

Al-Jaafari, who belongs to the Dawa Party, a Shiite religious organization that resisted Saddam Hussein's regime, has been criticized as being ineffective during the past nine months as prime minister, said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. Al-Jaafari was not as assertive as his tough-talking predecessor, Ayad Allawi.

However, al-Jaafari has gained experience in office and has distanced himself from religious Shiite leaders, Othman said. Al-Jaafari lived in England for much of the two decades he lived in exile.

Mahdi, a high-ranking member of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, has a stronger personality capable of bringing different sides to the bargaining table, Othman said. However, he is faulted for being too close to Iraq's religious clerics and viewed warily by some because he once lived in Iran, Othman said.

The United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite coalition that won the largest number of seats in parliamentary elections Dec. 15, will attempt to name its choice by Saturday.

The Independent Electoral Commission is to release officially certified election results today, clearing the way for the parliament to be seated. The legislature will then begin forming a government.

The Shiite alliance won 128 of parliament's 275 seats. Since the alliance fell short of a majority, it will need to form a coalition with other groups to form a government.

DOJ_NMG_0013798

The United States encourages an inclusive government as a crucial step in deflating Iraq's insurgency and stabilizing the country. The new prime minister will lead efforts to form a government that includes Shiite and Sunni Arabs, Kurds and Christians.

In a statement in December, Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq, urged Iraq's different parties to form a unity government. “Iraq's political parties and their leaders must come together to reinforce their commitment to democratic principles and national unity,” he said.

The Sunnis, who once dominated Iraq's government, now are behind much of the insurgency battling U.S. and Iraqi forces. Sunnis are seeking a larger role in the new government.

“The key issue is what kind of government will form,” said Hassan Bazzad, professor of International Relations at Baghdad University. “Forming a real national unity government will have the strongest impact on the situation in Iraq.”

After election results are formally announced, the new parliament will convene and vote on a president and two vice presidents, known as the presidential council. The presidential council will then announce its choice for prime minister, taken from the Shiite alliance, and assign ministers. The serious negotiations are expected to take place behind closed doors, Othman said.

The jobs of heading the Defense and Interior ministries are critical, since those officials control the security forces. Khalilzad has said the security ministries should go to people without ties to sectarian groups or militias.

Othman said the Shiite alliance will try to agree on a prime minister nominee before Saturday. If not, the group will have to vote on it, a step that could divide the tentative alliance of different Shiite groups, he said.

Key to the selection could be Muqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric whose followers clashed with U.S. forces twice in 2004.

Al-Sadr supporters won about 30 seats within the alliance bloc. It's not clear which candidate al-Sadr will support, Ridha said.

Iraqis Cope With Life Without Lights (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher And Charles Levinson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD - Younes Abbas Shamari is a carpenter with an open-air shop on Baghdad's Zawiya Street, which means he depends on electricity for most of what he does: sawing, drilling, sanding. These days, however, he rarely works, as the electricity is off more than it's on.

His workshop sits on a commercial strip in a relatively calm area in the central part of the city. Many small businesses here are in need of electricity to function, but Mr. Shamari estimates he gets just two hours of electricity for every four there is none. And that's twice the Baghdad average, this being one of the capital's more upscale neighborhoods.

Thanks largely to deteriorating security, electricity - along with water, sewage, and oil production - has dropped below prewar levels. Before the invasion, for example, Baghdad was receiving an average of at least 16 hours of power a day. Today, with insurgents targeting power plants and electrical lines on an almost daily basis, the city gets power just four hours each day on average.

"It's not enough to pay for the rent on my shop," says Shamari, whose salary supports an extended family of 13 in Diyala, outside Baghdad. "The rent is almost higher than whatever income I get from my work." He acknowledges that before the war, electricity wasn't nonstop, but it was available when he worked.

Iraq was generating 4,500 megawatts before the US invasion. But by November of last year that generation capacity had dropped to 3,995 megawatts, well below the national demand of 7,000 megawatts, according to a January report by the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. Production has slumped despite the $3 billion - of $18.4 billion authorized for Iraq reconstruction - the US has set aside for electricity projects.

Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, testified Wednesday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that Iraq would need much more than the $56 billion estimated by the World Bank and UN in 2003 to rebuild Iraq. He didn't give a new figure.

Mr. Bowen told the committee that Iraq's water supply, sewer system, and electrical grid were worse off than once thought.

When fuel was still cheaper than water, before the government cut subsidies in December, Shamari made up for the lack of power with a gas-powered generator. But with the price of fuel now three to five times what it was just three months ago, that's no longer an option.

"How is Iraq supposed to make an economic recovery if businesses don't have basic necessities like electricity?" asks Humam al-Shamaa, an economics professor at Baghdad University. "And the lack of electricity affects security, too, because the streets aren't lighted after sundown and so businesses close earlier than normal."

US officials, though, point out that while power in Baghdad is slumping, supply has increased elsewhere in Iraq. "Now [electricity] is being distributed in a much more egalitarian manner," says Dawn Liberi, head of the Iraq office of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID).

Bowen seconded that claim at Wednesday's hearing. He said the power supply outside Baghdad was the one area of improvement since the war began.

Ms. Liberi does find a silver lining in Baghdad's current electricity situation. Iraqi incomes are on the rise, she says, which is ramping up the consumption of air conditioners, refrigerators, washing machines, and other electricity-hungry consumer goods. "It's very difficult to meet demand, because it's rising much faster than supply," she says.

Liberi also offers another explanation US officials frequently cite when discussing reconstruction shortfalls: Iraqi government disregard for free-market principles and the continuation of state subsidies.

Shamari, for example, pays 4,000 Iraqi dinars a month for electricity, about $2.75. One regular household user says he pays 450 dinars for three months of usage - about 40 cents.

It's a key factor in Iraq's electricity problem, says Liberi. Under Saddam Hussein most people received electricity as a virtual state gift, paying symbolic prices that were out of touch with international rates. After Mr. Hussein, she says, Iraq has yet to adjust, with most people still paying very little. As a result, Iraqis have little incentive to conserve.

US officials have repeatedly argued that the elimination of state subsidies will free up cash for much needed reconstruction projects. Others, however, worry that such belt-tightening measures could lead to social unrest at a time when stability tops the agenda.

But as long as insurgents continue to strike Iraq's power grid, reconstruction remains a perilous endeavor. The insurgency has caused the US to reroute reconstruction money to security. Of the estimated $270 billion spent, $15 billion has gone to nonsecurity items, Liberi says.

And there are few encouraging signs that this trend will change. In fact, a recent report by the US Government Accountability Office, says insurgent attacks are on the increase. There were 2,500 attacks in December 2005, up from just 1,000 the previous March, the report finds.

"We have had increased [electricity] generation, but we have very limited transmission around the country, because the transmission lines keep getting hit," says Liberi.

Shamari, the carpenter, agrees that the situation is getting worse. Power shortage aside, business is down in general because, as the economy suffers, he says, fewer people are getting married. Newlyweds seeking to furnish their new homes are his main clients. Shamari used to get four major orders a month, he says, and now he gets only one.

He pushes a small power saw through a plank of wood and speaks sadly through the sawdust spray. "I'm thinking of just selling my business."

Danger? Drabness? No Date? Iraqis Find An Outlet Online (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Feb. 9 — On a recent rainy afternoon, Ahmad Nader Ali sat in a booth at the ShreifiNet Cafe, sending instant messages to his brother who lives in Finland on one screen window and his fiancée, Nour, on another. A tiny Web camera sat atop the computer, beaming live images of him to Nour's home screen across Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0013800

"Because of the situation, I'm not able to go and see her often," said Mr. Ali, a confident 20-year-old with slicked-back hair who runs a men's clothing store. "Everybody does it like this."

Nearby, partially hidden by wood-paneled booths, were a dozen other young men staring intently at their screens, most chatting simultaneously on three or four different e-mail accounts. All of them were paying 1,500 dinars an hour — about a dollar — to escape the gray confines of Baghdad's blasted walls for a while. Two heavyset men sat on a black faux-leather couch by the door, keeping a watchful eye on the street.

Three years ago, the Internet was virtually unknown in Iraq. Today, Baghdad has dozens of Internet cafes like ShreifiNet, which consists of three sparely decorated rooms with a total of 34 computers and a satellite dish on the roof. Most of the cafes also transmit wireless services to home Internet users in the surrounding area for a monthly fee; in parts of central Baghdad there are about 20 overlapping wireless networks.

The universal hunger to get online has made computer and Web services one of the few bright spots in Iraq's stagnant economy. On Sinaa Street, the two-lane thoroughfare in central Baghdad lined with computer and software stores, business is brisk. Companies that install wireless networks and satellite dishes are also thriving, despite the irritation caused by frequent power failures. So are many Internet cafes.

"I have to work to persuade people to come to my clothes shop," Mr. Ali said. "But you don't need to advertise to tempt customers to come in here."

Few people on earth have more incentive to communicate online (and indoors) than Iraqis, who risk their lives every time they go out for a quart of milk. The Internet can also be a way to get around the rising Islamization of everyday life. Young people caught flirting on the street even in Baghdad are sometimes chastised or even beaten by self-proclaimed Islamists, but no one can stop them on the Web. "If you look at the chat rooms, it is mostly young guys and girls," Mr. Ali said.

But Islamists and insurgents have their own uses for the Web. Diatribes against the American presence, along with detailed bomb-making instructions and tributes to the latest suicide bombers, appear regularly on Iraqi chat rooms and Web sites.

The total number of people using the Internet, like most Iraqi statistics, is partly guesswork. There are 215,000 subscribers on the state-owned Internet company, but that does not include the Internet cafe users, who are probably far more numerous, said Eva Wohn, a legal adviser to Iraq's Communications Ministry on telecommunications issues.

After their long isolation, young Iraqis are quickly erasing their technological gap with the West. In some ways they are even further along. Thanks to the absence of piracy laws here, many Iraqis use software that is not yet in common use in the United States. The new Microsoft Vista operating system, for instance, scheduled to be introduced for commercial use in late 2006, is already widely used here.

Large numbers of Iraqis can be found on the dozens of Arabic chat rooms listed on Yahoo Messenger, a popular platform for instant messaging. There are dozens of Iraqi Web logs, ranging from political sites, to forums for young people seeking spouses, to "hashasha" (www.7shasha.com), a comic site whose name means "hashish smokers." Angry sectarian conversations often break out, especially in Arab Chat Room 12, which is popular with Iraqi Shiites (the number signifies the 12 great imams of Shiite Islam).

Like many Internet cafe users, Mr. Ali has no access at home. He lives in Doura, a dangerous area where there are almost no Internet cafes and few wireless networks. He could get service on a land line, but he works long hours and prefers to do all his e-mailing at ShreifiNet, which is not far from his clothing store.

That calculus has been good for Ramzi al-Shreifi, 32, the owner of ShreifiNet. He took over the lease of his two-story building just off Karrada Street from a travel agency in the fall of 2003 and renovated it, painting the two columns out front bright yellow. A Kurdish company installed a satellite dish on the roof, charging him $2,600 a month for his service. He also mounted wireless transmission equipment, and now has 25 home customers, paying $50 each to use his signal. In the past year, his gross income has grown by half, to about $6,000 a month, Mr. Shreifi said, a tidy sum by Iraqi retail standards.

"It would have been more, but there is competition," he added.

There are about 15 Internet cafes in Inner Karrada, a busy commercial area that is one of Baghdad's safer neighborhoods, Mr. Shreifi said. His cafe is open until 10 p.m., and would stay open all night if not for the curfew imposed by the Iraqi government, he said. He has been luckier than many Baghdad business owners: no robberies, no violence.

DOJ_NMG_0013801

Mr. Shreifi has plans to expand. There are hundreds of people in the area who would like to get wireless service. The problem, he said, is that there are no rules governing the Internet: anyone with enough money for a satellite can transmit to whomever he or she like, and some do not require passwords so that many people can log on free. Mr. Shreifi also suspects that his signal is sometimes affected by American military officials in the Green Zone who may be jamming frequencies used by insurgents. Still, by Baghdad standards, it is a good living.

"Most days this place is almost full," Mr. Shreifi said.

Kidnapped U.S. Journalist Pleads, 'Just Do Whatever They Want' (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

KUWAIT, Feb. 9 (AP) — The kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll appeared in a video shown Thursday on a private Kuwaiti television channel, appealing for her supporters to do whatever was necessary to win her release and saying, "There is a very short time."

Ms. Carroll was shown in the black-and-white video wearing an Islamic head scarf and sitting on a chair in front of a wall with a large floral design. She spoke to the camera in a firm voice without weeping, as she had done on a previous video.

"I am here," she said. "I am fine. Please just do whatever they want, give them whatever they want as quickly as possible."

Ms. Carroll said that she was speaking on Feb. 2. "There is a very short time," she said. "Please do it fast. That's all."

The 22-second video was broadcast on Al Rai TV, a private Kuwaiti channel. The video was delivered to Al Rai's Baghdad office and was shown in its entirety, said Hani al-Srougi, an editor at the station. He said it was accompanied by a letter written by Ms. Carroll.

The newscaster said the station would give the letter to authorities but did not specify whether he meant Kuwaiti or American officials.

In Baghdad, Dennis Culkin, a spokesman for the United States Embassy, said American officials did not comment on such tapes before they had been authenticated.

Armed men abducted Ms. Carroll, a 28-year-old freelance journalist, on Jan. 7 in Baghdad. The kidnappers set a deadline of Jan. 20 and threatened to kill Ms. Carroll if their demands were not met.

Kidnapped U.S. Reporter Appears In New Video (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Looking healthy and composed, the American reporter kidnapped in Iraq last month appeared on a new videotape aired on an Arab-language television channel today, urging supporters to do whatever necessary to obtain her release.

Jill Carroll, the 28-year-old Christian Science Monitor freelancer captured by an unknown armed group in Baghdad on Jan. 7 as she left the offices of a Sunni Arab politician, asked an unnamed third party to quickly comply with the kidnappers' demands.

"I am here," said Carroll, a Michigan native who first arrived in Iraq shortly after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion and stayed through the insurgency.

"I am fine. Please just do whatever they want, give them whatever they want as quickly as possible."

She punctuated her 22-second message, which she said was recorded on Feb. 2, with a note of urgency. "There is a very short time," she said. "Please do it fast. That's all."

The tape, with references to ongoing negotiations, suggested that Carroll has not fallen into the hands of the most brutal category of kidnappers in Iraq, who have previously beheaded western hostages for political ends.

Still, it remains unclear what the kidnappers still demand in return for Carroll's release. In a tape that aired Jan. 30, Carroll called for the release of all female prisoners being held by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

U.S. Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch told reporters today that American and Iraqi officials plan to release about 450 prisoners from detention centers sometime next week. He said he did not know whether any of them were women.

U.S. military officials say insurgents have turned to kidnapping for ransom to fund operations and have detected a slight rise in the number of kidnappings reported to Iraqi crime hotlines in the past few weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0013802

"We're watching closely trends and we are concerned about the number of kidnappings we're seeing," said Lynch. "A lot of them are conducted by criminal gangs."

Today's video was broadcast on the privately owned Al Rai, a Kuwaiti satellite channel known more for entertainment than news. It showed Carroll wearing a greenish head scarf and sitting or standing before a pink backdrop, with a flower-like design.

In the video, Carroll made reference to an apparent earlier communication between her abductors and negotiators, saying the latest video was made to confirm a letter she had apparently sent to prove she was with the mujahedin, a reference to the Sunni Arab insurgency.

"I sent you a letter written by my hand, but you wanted more evidence," she said in the tape.

Western news agencies quoted officials from Al Rai saying the tape was delivered to the television station earlier today.

In New Video, Abducted U.S. Reporter Pleads For Quick Action (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 -- In the third video of her to be aired since she was abducted here last month, American journalist Jill Carroll asked that authorities meet her captors' demands "as quickly as possible" because "there is a very short time."

The 22-second video, which appeared on the private Kuwaiti television station al-Rai on Thursday night, showed Carroll wearing a Muslim veil and sitting before a tapestry depicting a large flower. In a composed voice, she said that the video was being filmed on Feb. 2 and that she had sent one letter in her own hand and was sending another "to prove I am with the mujaheddin," Arabic for holy warriors.

"I'm here. I'm fine," she says. "Please just do whatever they want. Give them whatever they want as quickly as possible. There is a very short time. Please do it fast. That is all."

Carroll, 28, a freelance journalist working for the Christian Science Monitor, was kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7 by gunmen who also killed her interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32. Ten days later, her captors, who call themselves the Vengeance Brigades, released a video in which they threatened to kill her in three days unless U.S. authorities released all female detainees in Iraq. A second video, aired on Jan. 30, showed Carroll in a head scarf, sobbing.

Both videos showed Carroll speaking, but neither had sound. The video that aired Thursday had sound but did not include the Vengeance Brigades' logo.

The content of the letters Carroll spoke of is unknown. In the broadcast, the newscaster said that one letter Carroll had written would be handed over to authorities. The station said it would not broadcast the letter's contents, according to the Associated Press.

The editor of the Christian Science Monitor, Richard Bergenheim, said in a statement: "It is always difficult to see someone speaking under coercion and under these circumstances. We are seeking more information about the letter that Jill refers to in the video. We remain in constant contact with Jill's family and are still doing everything possible to obtain Jill's release."

Carroll's family said they were "hopeful and grateful to all those working on Jill's behalf."

A 'Half Full' Afghan Army (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, February 10, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Sgt. Mohammad Reza walks silently on a ridge, watching his platoon conduct a reconnaissance patrol in a gully below. His men are all recent recruits. Some are former militia fighters who have seen many battles but little professional training. Others are as green as the helmets on their head.

"They don't know about organized war, they just know about guerrilla warfare," says Sergeant Reza, himself a former militiaman from Bamian Province.

Increasingly, coalition forces are turning over some of the training to Afghan sergeants like Reza. Fresh recruits learn the basics of how to take protective measures and launch counterattacks, skills that will help them hold their positions in a fight.

How well they absorb these lesson will be crucial for Afghanistan's ability to stand on its own two feet. Now half-way toward the goal of a 70,000-man force, the Afghan National Army is reaching a crucial testing period: The US military is preparing to draw down its forces in Afghanistan, NATO forces are moving in, and security conditions along the southern border with Pakistan are worsening.

"Those who are in the military know how difficult it is to make an army self-sufficient, and the Afghan National Army has just been formed, so it will take some work," says Gen. Zaher Azimi, a Ministry of Defense spokesman. "If we are fighting alongside foreign forces, we have the capability to fight against guerrillas, but we can't do it alone."

That means that the international presence in Afghanistan will remain crucial for the foreseeable future. The growing number of ANA brigades in the volatile south will soon by joined by NATO forces who are rotating in to take over the responsibility for Afghanistan's security after the US military draws down 3,000 of its troops this spring.

US, French, British, Rumanian, and even Mongolian trainers will continue to train ANA troops at the Kabul Military Training Center (KMTC), just outside Kabul, and a growing number of Afghan officers will enter military exchange programs at military bases in the US and other coalition countries.

Yet four years after the Taliban's ouster, there are growing expectations that the ANA will pick up more of the slack in defending the country and providing the sort of security that allows Afghans to trust in their own government and their future.

"The fortunate thing about Afghans is that they have a feeling that our army is able to defend the country at a high level of proficiency," says Gen. Rahmatullah Raufi, the corps commander in Kandahar. "But when we talk of defending our country on our own, I confess, we can't do it ourselves. We are a poor country."

Eighty percent of the soldiers in his corps are illiterate, General Raufi says. Fifty percent of the officers are illiterate. Only 20 percent of his soldiers have a professional knowledge of how to serve in an army; the rest are former militia fighters or young recruits. "No one will tell you this, but even if the president sahib asks me, I will tell him this myself.

While the ANA appears to be on course in reaching its goal of a 70,000-man army by 2009, the army also realizes that it needs to improve the quality of its soldiers rather than merely put warm bodies out into uniform.

"Previously, there was a need to produce large numbers of soldiers, but now we focus on quality instead of quantity," says Brig. Gen. Mohammad Amin Wardak, commander of the training center in Kabul.

At first, ANA soldiers were given a brisk two-month course and then sent out to face Taliban insurgents. But now, the training at KMTC is 15 weeks long, including six weeks of basic training, and the rest in Advanced Infantry Training, where soldiers will be given specialities, from rifleman to artillery to more elite commando duty.

Upon graduation, ANA soldiers earn $70 a month, double the median monthly income nationwide. Officers earn more, depending on their rank.

Sgt. Steve Bromfield, a Canadian military trainer from the 2nd Field Engineer Regiment, is just ending a six month stint guiding the live-fire exercises at KMTC. He says the recruits he trains are eager to learn. In two weeks, he helps break some bad habits from former militia fighters like spraying gunfire instead of making every shot count. "Like everyone, if you give them bullets, they want to shoot," he laughs. "It's the same in the Canadian Army."

Up on a plateau, the first platoon of Afghan soldiers are advancing, team by team toward a target, firing their Kalashnikovs at paper targets. Down below in a dry streambed, a second platoon runs into position, and climbs up a ridge to attack the paper enemy on its flank. Behind, a reserve platoon forms a defensive circle, and prepares to respond to any enemy counterattack.

"This is the most vulnerable time for a platoon," says Sgt. Maj. Rick Dumas, a Canadian trainer, enjoying the moment. "They're getting tired, they are consolidating their forces, preparing for a counterattack."

Behind Sergeant Dumas, some overeager Afghans from the reserve platoon rush through a group of foreign trainers and journalists with their guns at the ready, before being called back by their sergeant.

While the ANA generally enjoys a good local reputation, some Afghans criticize Army leadership for packing the ranks with members of some ethnic groups, and not others.

"I don't want to call this army the Afghan National Army," said Najibullah Kabuli, a parliamentarian during an impassioned outburst in the lower house last week. "I want to call it the Army of National Rivalries. They are asking for exact numbers of Tajiks, exact numbers of Pashtuns."

ANA officials counter that ethnicity is not a criteria for selecting foot soldiers, although there is an attempt to maintain an ethnic balance among officers to reflect the country's ethnic mix.

DOJ_NMG_0013804

General Raufi says ethnicity is just one of those issues that will take time to sort out in Afghanistan. "A national army should serve the people, not one ethnic group, not one person, or one province," he says. "Your army is almost 250 years old. Maybe you had those problems in your country's history too."

NATO Renews Afghan Commitment After Cartoon Storm (REU-Y2)

By Mark John And Will Dunham

Reuters, February 10, 2006

NATO defense chiefs pledged on Thursday to expand alliance peacekeeping in Afghanistan despite attacks on their troops triggered by the storm over cartoons depicting the Prophet Mohammad.

Protesters angered by the cartoons tried to storm a NATO base housing Norwegian troops on Tuesday in one of the worst outbreaks of violence prompted by the controversy. Afghan police opened fire, killing four.

Defense ministers meeting in Italy agreed to check security measures in place for their 9,000-strong International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) mission in Afghanistan, but insisted its expansion to 16,000 troops this year would go ahead as planned.

"There is full commitment to take forward the ISAF expansion to the south this summer. That commitment will not waver," NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer told a news briefing after a first day of talks in the Sicilian resort of Taormina.

"The key words today were solidarity ... but also the need for dialogue, respect for others and the need for de-escalation," he added. NATO ministers will meet counterparts from Israel and six Arab countries on Friday for long-scheduled talks on defense reform that will nonetheless touch on the cartoons controversy.

British troops in Afghanistan were rushed to the northwest city of Maymana on Tuesday to secure the airfield after crowds attacked a NATO base of Norwegian troops with guns and grenades.

The Norwegians fired teargas while NATO F-16 jets flew over Maymana in a show of force before the violence died down.

Aside from calling for new checks on whether existing ISAF security measures were sufficient, ministers agreed the events showed the urgent need for well-trained Afghan security forces.

"The force protection worked, but there was a feeling we want to ensure that we are well prepared. There was an emphasis on training the Afghans," said one observer at the talks.

DENMARK STICKS TO MISSION

The upsurge in tension comes as NATO readies to expand ISAF -- already in the north, west and the capital Kabul -- to the more volatile southern Afghanistan and ultimately the east.

NATO would then manage all international peacekeeping in the country, allowing the larger U.S.-led coalition to reduce troop numbers and focus on hunting the Taliban and al Qaeda remnants seen as behind the insurgency.

"That's the plan. And they're en route toward that," U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told reporters traveling with him to the meeting.

Rumsfeld gave no fixed timetable for when NATO was expected to take over peacekeeping in the east, saying only that the plan was for it to happen "at some point either this year or next."

U.S. and NATO officials have in the past expressed firm hopes that ISAF would take over all peacekeeping by end-2006.

But the move to the south, which was initially intended for early 2006, is now seen some time in the middle of the year after hesitation among some allies to come forward with troops.

After much debate, Dutch lawmakers finally voted this month in favor of sending up to 1,400 troops to Afghanistan to join the deployment into the south. Britain and Canada are the two other main contributors, taking ISAF strength up to 15,000.

Denmark -- a focus of protests because a Danish newspaper published the cartoons first -- is to contribute some 300 troops to the expansion. De Hoop Scheffer said there had been no discussion in Taormina of it pulling out of the mission.

Asked if he thought the row over the cartoons complicated NATO's plans, British Defense Secretary John Reid replied: "No. Naturally we regret it. We are there to help the Afghan people."

Rumsfeld Backs NATO Taking Over Operations (WT/AP)

By Robert Burns

The Washington Times, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013805

TAORMINA, Italy -- The United States favors NATO eventually taking full command of the international military effort to stabilize Afghanistan, but that will not include a separate American-led counterterrorism mission against al Qaeda, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday.

Mr. Rumsfeld arrived in this Sicilian seaside resort to attend two days of talks with North Atlantic Treaty Organization defense ministers, who are committed to expanding the alliance's military mission in Afghanistan.

NATO is expected to take over the security mission in southern Afghanistan by this summer, and Mr. Rumsfeld said he supported the goal of eventually having NATO in charge of the coalition effort across the country.

"I'm very comfortable with it," he told reporters aboard his plane en route from Washington.

He drew the line, however, at the counterterrorism mission, which is being performed mainly by U.S. special operations forces such as Army Special Forces and Navy SEAL commandos.

They have been searching for al Qaeda fighters since the early days of the U.S. invasion in 2001, when al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden fled into the mountainous Tora Bora area and then possibly into neighboring Pakistan.

NATO has been extending its security forces into northern and western Afghanistan to help provide enough security to enable humanitarian and reconstruction projects to proceed. It also has helped train the Afghan national army, but it has left much of the direct combat action to American forces.

Some NATO members have chosen to contribute to the peacekeeping mission in Kosovo instead of Afghanistan, where the dangers are greater. Mr. Rumsfeld said that in light of those choices, he would like to see U.S. peacekeepers in Kosovo be withdrawn faster than those of other allied nations.

"We would kind of like to see if it's possible for us to have a somewhat disproportionate reduction when the reductions take place," he said.

The United States has about 1,700 peacekeeping troops in Kosovo.

Mr. Rumsfeld said he would meet separately today with his Russian counterpart, Sergei Ivanov. Russia is not a NATO member but holds regular talks with the alliance through a NATO-Russia Council set up in 2002.

The U.S. government has been critical of Russia's willingness to assist Iran in its nuclear program, and last fall Russia signed a new agreement to sell short-range surface-to-air missiles to Iran.

Mr. Rumsfeld said he expected the issue of Iran's nuclear program to arise during the NATO conference, but that it was primarily a matter for allied diplomats, not defense chiefs.

Sectarian Strife Kills 31 In Pakistan And 6 In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Salman Masood

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

LASHKAR GAH, Afghanistan, Feb. 9 — Violence exploded in Pakistan and Afghanistan on Thursday during processions by Shiite Muslim worshipers observing the holy day of Ashura. A suicide bombing in northwestern Pakistan killed 23 people and wounded dozens more.

After the bombing, in the town of Hangu, angry Shiites rampaged through the streets, setting fire to stores, government buildings and vehicles. By the end of the day the death toll had grown to 31, local officials said.

In western Afghanistan, fighting broke out between Shiite and Sunni Muslims during a procession of Shiite worshipers in Herat, the country's third-largest city. The fighting killed 6 people and wounded 120 others, said a senior military official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter.

Sectarian attacks, including suicide attacks on mosques, have occurred in Pakistan, but such a clash was unexpected in the traditionally tolerant Afghan city of Herat. The violence there was another blow in a country that has been struggling with increasing terrorist attacks, local insurgencies and angry demonstrations in recent days over the publication of satirical cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

Pakistani troops moved into Hangu, which is 125 miles southwest of the capital, Islamabad, after the bombing and the rampage.

DOJ_NMG_0013806

"There was panic everywhere," The Associated Press quoted a witness, Muhammad Jamil, 25, as saying. "Some people rushed to the injured and dead bodies. Others went to houses and took out weapons and knives and kerosene oil and started setting fire to shops, destroying everything."

There were unconfirmed reports that angry Shiites had fired on a vehicle, killing four people. News accounts reported a thick layer of smoke hanging above the town as the violence intensified.

Leading Shiite and Sunni religious leaders condemned the attack as an attempt to create chaos in Pakistan. No one had claimed responsibility for the attack by Thursday evening, but Sheik Rashid Ahmed, the information minister, confirmed in a telephone interview that a suicide bomber had carried out the attack.

"This was a blast," he said. "It was a suicide bomber." He would not say who he thought was behind the attack. "Such things take time," he said of the investigation.

Riffat Pasha, the police chief of North-West Frontier Province, told local news organizations: "This is an act of terrorism. There were elaborate security arrangements, but it is difficult to prevent such suicide attacks."

Pakistan has been troubled by tensions between the Shiite minority and the Deobandi sect, a puritanical branch of Sunni Islam to which some of the country's jihadist political factions belong. Violence between the two groups has killed more than 1,200 people in the last 15 years. Sunnis make up 77 percent of the country's population of 150 million, and Shiites 20 percent.

In Afghanistan the procession of hundreds of Shiites in Herat commemorating the martyrdom of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad, turned violent, with Sunnis and Shiites fighting with sticks, stones and knives, and then guns and grenades. Dr. Abdul Jalil, who was on duty at the city's main civilian hospital, said the staff had treated wounds from shootings, stabbing and beatings.

By the end of the afternoon the main Shiite mosque in the northern part of the city and nearby shops were on fire, said Muhammad Rafiq Shahir, leader of a group of socially minded professionals called the Experts Council. He said he had seen a Shiite throw a grenade into a crowd, wounding about 15 people.

Mr. Shahir, a Sunni, blamed the government for setting the stage for violence by appointing a Shiite last year as governor of Herat Province, which has a Sunni majority. Tensions remain between ethnic groups in Afghanistan from years of factional fighting.

The governor, who is known to have close ties to Iran, had aggravated the latent tensions, Mr. Shahir contended, in part by allowing a larger procession for Ashura this year than usual. Mr. Shahir also accused Shiites of provocations, saying some of them entered the main Sunni mosque wearing shoes last year, and he accused Shiites of a knife attack against the son of a Sunni cleric on Wednesday.

Afghan soldiers and police officers were deployed, and by evening the city was calm, said Gen. Zaher Azimi, the Defense Ministry spokesman. The Afghan government sent a delegation from the capital, Kabul, to negotiate, headed by a former governor of Herat, the powerful Tajik commander Ismail Khan, who was ousted from office in 2004.

Shiites Targeted On Deadly Holy Day (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 9 -- At least 34 people were killed and more than 130 injured Thursday in Afghanistan and Pakistan in sectarian violence that coincided with a Muslim holy day especially revered among Shiites.

In Iraq, the observance of the Ashura holiday was made remarkable by the absence of violence for the first time since the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein.

The day's deadliest attacks occurred in Pakistan's North-West Frontier province, where hundreds of Shiites in the town of Hangu had turned out to participate in a procession marking Ashura, which commemorates the martyrdom in 680 of Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad. Before sermons by local clerics could begin, at least one suicide bomber, who may have been disguised as a mourner, detonated his explosives, killing at least 27 people and wounding about 30, said an Interior Ministry official, Brig. Javed Cheema.

Later in the day, it was reported that gunmen had opened fire on a bus just outside the town, killing four.

"This was a blatant act of terrorism," Cheema said in a telephone interview from Islamabad. He noted that no group had asserted responsibility but that sectarian tensions have historically been high in the region. In the past few years, Shiites in Pakistan -- who are a minority -- have been the victims of frequent attacks thought to have been perpetrated by Sunni Muslim groups.

In Afghanistan, where about 80 percent of the population is Sunni and instances of sectarian violence are far less common, at least three people were killed and more than 100 injured when a clash erupted between Shiites and Sunnis in the western city of Herat.

Herat's police chief, Mohammed Ayoub Salangi, said the fight began when approximately 300 young Sunni demonstrators entered a Shiite mosque and accused worshipers gathered for Ashura services of burning a piece of cloth emblazoned with the name of Islam's second caliph, Umar, an important figure in the Sunni faith.

A brawl ensued, with both sides using sticks, rocks and guns. Grenades were also reportedly thrown.

Two hundred Afghan troops were deployed, and security forces fired shots into the air in a bid to quell the violence.

Salangi said authorities were investigating how the Sunni demonstrators were able to organize so quickly. "There must be the hands of others behind this," he said.

Samina Ahmed, South Asia project director for the International Crisis Group, blamed the violence in Afghanistan and Pakistan on governments that have not done enough to curb Sunni groups that target their fellow Muslims. "It's not just enough to take action against al Qaeda," Ahmed said in a telephone interview from Pakistan. "It's just as important to take the same kind of action against sectarian terrorists."

Ahmed noted that while there have been more sectarian attacks in Pakistan than in Afghanistan in recent years, the Hazara ethnic group -- which is predominantly Shiite -- has faced persecution in Afghanistan for centuries. "It's nothing new for Afghanistan," she said. "It's always under the surface."

President Hamid Karzai and religious leaders in Afghanistan appealed for calm, and a delegation of clerics was dispatched from Kabul on Thursday night to try to soothe tensions in Herat.

"Our God is the same. Our Koran is the same. And our religion is the same," said Mulwi Enayatullah Balegh, a Sunni leader who delivers sermons at one of Kabul's largest mosques. "There are some minor differences to be discussed with the Shias, but they are not things that can be resolved through this kind of fighting."

The sectarian violence came after three consecutive days of deadly riots in Afghanistan arising from the publication in European newspapers of cartoons of the prophet Muhammad. But the cartoon uproar was not thought to have played a direct role in Thursday's violence in Herat.

There were no reported demonstrations related to the cartoons in Afghanistan on Thursday, a day after religious leaders called for an end to the protests, saying they were being hijacked by extremists.

However, security in the capital, Kabul, was especially tight, and authorities here were bracing for the possibility of more protests Friday.

By contrast, not a single attack on Shiite worshipers marred the day in Iraq. Ashura was banned in Iraq during Saddam Hussein's reign. Since the observance was resumed in 2004, the holy day has been jolted by bombings that have killed hundreds.

In 2005, suicide bombers killed at least 60 people in the streets and in Shiite mosques. The year before, attacks killed at least 170 people. The only attack reported Thursday was a suicide car bombing in New Ubaydi, in Sunni-dominated western Iraq, which killed three Iraqi civilians and two Iraqi soldiers.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, the spokesman for U.S. military in Iraq, said the relative tranquility was "a tribute to the Iraqi security forces." He said Iraqi soldiers and police had imposed tight security throughout the country, particularly in Karbala, the focal point of the holy day. In a raid this week, Iraqi troops detained 19 suspects who were apparently planning to conduct suicide attacks on Ashura observances, Lynch said.

In Karbala, the provincial governor, Aqeel Khazaly, said that the government had forbidden outside vehicles to enter the city and that the streets were covered by "very strict" security consisting of public order police, special police commandos and Iraqi army soldiers.

"This was a great accomplishment and a triumph over terrorists and terrorism," said Ali Kassim, a fisherman from the southeastern town of Amarah who had made the pilgrimage to Karbala.

Peace Prevails In Iraq As Shiites Observe Holy Day (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

Unlike in previous years marred by bombings, pilgrims throng shrines across the country in relative calm. U.S. cites improved security.

BAGHDAD — For the first time since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi Shiites on Thursday marked their most important religious holiday without suffering a terrorist attack.

Waving red, green and yellow flags and some beating themselves with chains, members of Iraq's majority Shiite community gathered around major shrines for Ashura, which commemorates the martyrdom of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad. As many as 2 million Shiite pilgrims from Iraq and abroad crowded the city of Karbala, where Hussein is buried, security officials reported.

Suicide bombers killed 180 people in 2004, and 50 people last year, despite heightened security. Observation of the holiday was suppressed under Saddam Hussein, a Sunni Muslim.

A U.S. military official attributed the relatively peaceful proceedings to better-trained Iraqi security forces; Sunni Arab leaders said insurgents refrained from attacks for fear of sabotaging negotiations for power-sharing in the new government. Sunni Arabs won a combined 55 parliamentary seats in the Dec. 15 elections, whereas the Shiite-dominated United Iraqi Alliance captured 128 of the 275 seats.

Pilgrims marched carrying gold-domed replicas of the shrines, beating drums and chanting slogans in memory of Hussein. He was killed in the 7th century on the plains near Karbala by the Caliph Yazid in a succession battle that split Muslims into the Sunni and Shiite sects.

"By God, we will never forget you, Hussein!" the pilgrims chanted, as they swarmed the streets surrounding the shrines in Karbala, Najaf and Baghdad.

Pilgrims walked for days to Karbala, eating rice and taking shelter in tents set up along the route by well-wishers. Costumed men on horseback staged elaborate reenactments of Hussein's martyrdom in passion plays called taziyas. Fervent mourners beat themselves, some striking their heads with swords and drawing blood.

"Hussein is a symbol for us," said Mohammed Mehdi Rubayie, 33, a restaurant worker in the northern Baghdad suburb of Kadhimiya, home of an important Shiite shrine. "He fought for our religion, and he fought against oppression."

The Shiite-led government kept electricity on 24 hours a day in Najaf and Karbala for pilgrims, who arrived from Iran, Pakistan and Afghanistan as well as other parts of Iraq. One pilgrim was reported killed Thursday afternoon in a shooting in western Baghdad.

A suicide bombing last month in Karbala killed dozens, raising sectarian tensions and hurting the bargaining position of the minority Sunni Arabs, who lead the insurgency. A Sunni tribal leader said rebels had agreed to halt attacks during Ashura.

"The activities of the resistance are at a halt now until we have a unity government," Osama Jadan, a leader of a western Iraqi tribe, said. "That's the information we have from the resistance."

U.S. officials said improved Iraqi security forces played a role in diminishing violence. U.S. and Iraqi forces raided a village southeast of Baghdad this week where insurgents were allegedly preparing to attack Ashura pilgrims. A spokesman for the border police in Najaf said his men caught a Turkish national who reportedly confessed that he and other foreigners were trying to sneak into Iraq to stage attacks during Ashura.

In Baghdad, U.S. military spokesman Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said the experiences of 2004 and 2005 had taught Iraqi forces to impose vehicle bans and establish multiple security cordons around shrines in Karbala, Najaf and Kadhimiya.

DOJ_NMG_0013809

"You think like the enemy," Lynch told reporters when asked about the relative calm this year. "The Iraqi government did detailed planning and preparation for Ashura." Still, he acknowledged that the number of insurgent attacks nationwide had not declined precipitously.

U.S. officials announced Thursday that a suicide bomber had killed two Iraqi soldiers and three civilians Wednesday at a joint U.S.-Iraqi checkpoint near the village of New Ubaidi.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, tensions rose over the killing Tuesday of several civilians by contract security guards stationed at a U.S. army base. American and Iraqi officials said they were conducting a joint investigation into the deaths.

The guards, working for the State Department, opened fire from two GMC sport utility vehicles, killing two Kurdish men in separate cars and wounding a third at a traffic circle north of Kirkuk, said Maj. Gen. Shirko Shakir, the city's police chief.

The number and nationality of the guards involved and the name of their company were not disclosed. Lt. Col. James Johnson, commander of the 2nd Battalion, 327th Infantry Regiment, said the guards were "under our control" while the investigation proceeded. In a written statement, he called the shooting "regrettable." The regiment is part of the Army's 101st Airborne Division, which is responsible for security in Kirkuk.

Angry relatives buried the two men and demanded that the killers be punished. Several Iraqi politicians demanded abolition of a law that grants immunity from prosecution to American and allied forces and private contractors working for them.

"There was nothing going on at the time of the shooting that could justify it," said Imad Hameed Ibrahim, whose uncle, Nizam Qadir, 25, was killed at the wheel of his taxi. "These foreigners do not care about the lives of Iraqis."

Odds Of Survival Improve For The U.S. Military's Best Friends (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

Bomb-sniffing dogs are now vital to the Iraq war effort, and the Army has improved its medical care for those severely wounded in combat.

BAGHDAD — Lt. Col. Randall Thompson knows his life has gone to the dogs. But that's probably a good thing for the Army, the canine corps and for him.

One of only six clinical veterinary surgeons in the U.S. military, Thompson works to save the lives of some of the military's most valued assets: bombsniffing dogs that have been severely wounded in combat. He arrived here in October to open Iraq's first urgent surgical care ward for canines.

Before Thompson's arrival, injured dogs were shipped to a U.S. base in Germany or to the United States for emergency medical treatment. At best, seriously wounded dogs were out of commission for weeks; at worst, they died during transport to a faraway veterinary facility.

The dogs' talent for sniffing out hidden explosive devices has become crucial to the war effort, so the command changed policy.

"It reached a buildup of dogs here and a concern level that said we had to do something to support these animals the best way possible," said Thompson, 46, a native of Savannah, Ga. Quicker medical care means the dogs return to duty sooner, he said. "Every day that we can keep a dog out on the line working is another day that a soldier or Marine is going to live because the dog was doing its job."

By uncovering tons of explosives that insurgents could otherwise use against coalition soldiers, the dogs have saved countless lives, said Col. Arnaldo Claudio, who as 18th Airborne Corps provost marshal commands all military police and dog handlers in Iraq. He declined to disclose the precise number of war dogs here.

"The dogs weren't needed as much when [the war] started. But the threat has changed," he said, referring to insurgents' increasing use of hidden, remote-controlled bombs often fashioned from mortar and artillery shells and detonated by cellphones and pagers. The bombs cause the majority of casualties suffered by U.S.-led forces in Iraq.

Claudio said a bomb-sniffing dog probably saved his life in August when it alerted him and a handler to a roadside bomb at a traffic stop in northern Baghdad.

"We got out of there and the bomb exploded a few minutes later," Claudio said.

But the dogs and their handlers sometimes pay a steep price. Four-year-old Flapeur was receiving treatment at Thompson's clinic last month. The Belgian Malinois had taken a piece of shrapnel through the chest in a suicide bombing in the Sunni Triangle city of Ramadi days before. He was on crowd-control duty with two other dogs and their handlers when the bomber struck a line of police recruits.

Flapeur's handler, a Marine whom the military declined to identify, was also seriously wounded, as was a second handler. Both were airlifted to Germany for medical treatment. The third handler, Marine Sgt. Adam Cann, was killed in the bombing.

Flapeur and the other injured dogs were taken by helicopter to Baghdad's combat support hospital, just as severely wounded soldiers or Marines would be.

"We would never fly a dog in front of a human casualty. But when there isn't someone ahead of them, we'll fly them," Thompson said.

He and other vets narrowly saved Flapeur, the most severely wounded of the three canines, from dying of shock, blood loss and a collapsed lung. Had the bombing happened before Thompson's arrival, Flapeur almost certainly would have died.

Although the wound left a nasty-looking hole in his chest, Flapeur was alert and friendly after his treatment. He is expected to be back on duty in three months, as is his handler.

Cann's dog, Bruno, will go through training again with a new handler. The third dog, Kevin, is expected back on duty as soon as his handler recovers.

A professed dog lover, Thompson says caring for man's best friend is one of the military's best jobs. "How many of your other friends listen to you attentively, don't talk back and are always glad to be in your company?" Thompson said. He has owned dogs, mostly German shepherds, since he can remember, he said. He and his wife have a Labrador retriever and a Cairn terrier.

Most of the dogs used in bomb-detection operations are either German shepherds or Belgian Malinois; they have been trained to detect explosives and to chase down and detain suspects, Thompson said. Just the sight of them usually deters unruly crowds, however.

"It's the only weapon system we have that you can change your mind on after squeezing the trigger," Thompson said.

The military dogs here were bought almost exclusively in Europe, where the canines are bred for detection and tracking skills. Then they are sent to Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio for training. Each dog goes through a six-month course to learn how to sense a dozen or more explosives and weapons.

Dogs that complete the training emerge "more reliable than any chip or software, high-tech machine or robot," Claudio said.

The training leaves the dogs with an uncanny ability to detect bombs whether underground, behind walls and aboard passing vehicles. The Air Force distributes dogs to all five branches of the armed forces and to the Transportation Security Administration.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, demand for dogs skyrocketed. Lackland now trains 300 animals a year, 40% more than before the attacks. But there still aren't enough to go around, said Tim Ori, director of operations at the 341st Training Squadron, the unit at Lackland that oversees dog and handler training.

"It is a challenge to fill the demand," said Air Force Capt. Greg Blaylock, an operations officer with the squadron. Dogs average eight years in active duty, and usually "they retire by being adopted out to former military working dog handlers," he said.

Thompson says he is thrilled to be here, both because of his love for dogs and because he has wanted to be near a combat zone ever since he joined the Army at 23 after getting his veterinary degree at University of Georgia. Later, the Army sent him for a three-year surgical residency at North Carolina State's veterinary school.

He was turned down for duty in Somalia and Operation Desert Storm, partly because his skills were needed elsewhere.

"I was frustrated about not getting proximity to a battlefield," Thompson said. "Now I don't think there is a more important job for a veterinarian anywhere in the Army than they one I have here right now."

DoJ Warns AIG To Comply With Settlement (FT)

By Andrew Parker

Financial Times, February 10, 2006

American International Group, the world's biggest insurance company, broke the law after entering into transactions that wrongly boosted its reserves and hid underwriting losses, US prosecutors said on Thursday.

The Department of Justice said AIG "violated federal criminal law" in connection with misleading financial statements issued by the company.

If AIG or any of its employees fail to abide by settlements announced on Thursday with federal authorities, the Justice department warned it could prosecute the company. AIG agreed to pay $1.64bn to federal and state authorities to resolve allegations of accounting abuses and other impropriety. It represents one of the largest settlements involving a public company.

The Justice department said AIG improperly boosted its reserves by $500m in 2000 and 2001 through "sham transactions" with General Re, the reinsurance subsidiary of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway group.

Although it did not name the individuals who orchestrated the transactions, the Justice department said "high-level executives" at AIG were involved.

It also said AIG hid $200m of underwriting losses in 2000 by improperly converting them into "investment losses" and transferring them to Capco, an offshore reinsurance company.

Under an agreement between AIG and the Justice department, the company accepted responsibility for the actions of its employees in the General Re and Capco transactions.

The Justice department said given AIG's co-operation with its investigation into alleged wrongdoing, and the company's commitment to a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission, it would not prosecute for the transactions with General Re and Capco.

However, the Justice department added: "AIG understands and agrees that if AIG or any of its employees, officers and directors fail to comply with, or violate, any provision of this agreement, the department can prosecute AIG for crimes committed by and through its employees related to the AIG/General Re or Capco transactions."

AIG will pay $25m under its agreement with the Justice department, which last week issued criminal charges against one former executive at the company. AIG will pay $800m to the SEC following its investigation into alleged accounting abuses at the company. AIG neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations of wrongdoing.

AIG will pay $819m to state authorities to cover alleged bid rigging and under payment of taxes. Martin Sullivan, AIG's chief executive, said the settlements were "a major step forward".

AIG To Pay $1.64 Billion To Settle Charges (AP-Y2)

By Eileen Alt Powell, Ap Business Writer

AP2, February 10, 2006

American International Group Inc., one of the world's largest insurance companies, has agreed to pay $1.64 billion to resolve allegations that it used deceptive accounting practices to mislead investors and regulatory agencies.

The deal — believed to be the biggest concluded by regulators with a single company — also requires the New York-based firm to adopt changes in its business practices that will ensure proper accounting procedures in the future.

AIG said in a statement that the settlement was approved by its board "in the best interest of the company."

The pact announced Thursday settles a civil lawsuit filed last May by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer with backing from the New York State Insurance Department and the U.S. Justice Department. The Securities and Exchange Commission, which also worked with Spitzer on the investigation, filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously.

The settlement does not cover Maurice "Hank" Greenberg, the company's former chairman and chief executive who was named in the suit but who has pledged to fight it in court.

While acknowledging the civil misconduct and facing a huge fine, AIG at the same time escapes the threat that a criminal case could have been brought.

DOJ_NMG_0013812

The Justice Department said that AIG's agreement spares the company criminal prosecution in exchange for its cooperation with the ongoing federal criminal investigation.

Shareholders welcomed the announcement, sending AIG shares up 74 cents, or 1.1 percent, to close at $67.12 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange.

AIG said that under the settlement it will pay $800 million for investors who were deceived by AIG's accounting tactics, including a $100 million penalty to the SEC. In addition, it will pay $375 million to AIG policyholders, $344 million to states harmed by AIG's practices from 1986 to 1995 involving state workers' compensation funds, and fines of $100 million to the state of New York and $25 million to the U.S. Justice Department.

AIG said it would take a $1.15 billion after-tax charge in its upcoming fourth-quarter earnings report to cover the settlement. It also announced that it would take a $1.1 billion after-tax charge to increase its reserves to reflect the completion of a recently concluded internal risk study.

AIG said that as part of the deal, it also has agreed "to retain for a period of three years an independent consultant who will conduct a review" of the company's accounting and internal controls.

Donald Light, senior insurance analyst with Celent, a Boston-based research and consulting company, said the settlement "means AIG's board and management is off the hook for anything worse ... such as a criminal case."

He added: "They're paying a lot of money for that, but AIG is huge and this amounts to less than 2 percent of shareholders' equity."

Spitzer told The Associated Press in an interview, "This is a company that didn't have to cheat. But once they began, they found it hard to stop. And like an addict, they grew dependent on financial gamesmanship that could ultimately destroy the company."

He said that the new business practices AIG was adopting would improve the market for property and casualty insurance in the United States by creating "a new level of transparency in the market that all consumers will benefit from.

The SEC's enforcement director, Linda Thomsen, noted that the investigation looked at the entire industry and centered on misuse of specialized insurance vehicles, such as reinsurance.

"While this settlement concludes our investigation of AIG, our investigation continues with respect to others who may have participated in AIG's securities-laws violations," she said.

The settlement with AIG exceeds many of the fines the SEC imposed following a wave of corporate scandals in 2002, including civil fines and restitution of $750 million for WorldCom Inc., $715 million for Adelphia Communications Corp. and $300 million for Time Warner Inc.

It also surpasses the $850 million settlement Spitzer reached last year with New York-based Marsh & McLennan Companies Inc., the nation's largest property and casualty brokerage, over allegations of bid rigging and price fixing as well as hidden commissions.

AIG was among the companies that allegedly participated in the bid-rigging scheme, and four former AIG executives were among 20 insurance executives and officers who have pleaded guilty to charges, Spitzer's office said.

Besides naming AIG, Spitzer's suit alleged that Greenberg and former chief financial officer, Howard I. Smith, orchestrated the scheme.

Greenberg, who resigned from AIG in March, has repeatedly insisted that he followed proper accounting procedures during his 38 years at the helm of AIG. Smith, too, has denied wrongdoing, and neither of the men was involved in the negotiations with the SEC and Spitzer.

In a statement issued late Thursday, Greenberg's spokesman Howard Opinsky said a "white paper" issued by Greenberg's legal team last sumer "debunked many of the allegations" of the regulators. He added: "The suggestion in the attorney general's public comments that Mr. Greenberg may have been involved in any wrongdoing is false. We are confident that when the debate moves from the newspaper to the courts, Mr. Greenberg will be vindicated."

The accounting scandal centered on transactions that AIG under Greenberg concluded with Berkshire Hathaway's General Re. insurance group.

DOJ_NMG_0013813

In its filing, the SEC said the $500 million transactions in 2000 and 2001 "were designed to inflate falsely AIG's loss reserves ... in order to quell analyst criticism that AIG's reserves had been declining."

Three former Gen Re executives and one former AIG executive were indicted last week in connection with the deceptive accounting scheme.

Greenberg was replaced as chief executive by Martin Sullivan, who oversaw the restatement of AIG's earnings back to 2000. The revisions knocked some $2 billion off shareholders' equity and nearly $4 billion off its profits.

Sullivan said in a statement Thursday that the settlement marked "a major step forward in resolving the legal and regulatory issues facing AIG." He said the company was "committed to business practices that provide transparency and fairness in the insurance market."

AIG Settles Fraud Charges For $1.64 Bln (REU)

Reuters, February 10, 2006

NEW YORK (Reuters) - American International Group Inc. <AIG.N>, the world's largest insurer by market value, on Thursday agreed to pay $1.64 billion (941 million pounds) to settle charges of fraud, bid-rigging and improper accounting, the biggest regulatory settlement by a single company in U.S. history.

The settlement with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and State Insurance Superintendent Howard Mills, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department ends a long-running investigation of the company, and was widely anticipated.

It does not resolve pending cases against former AIG chief executive Maurice "Hank" Greenberg and former chief financial officer Howard Smith, who were forced out last spring. Both have denied any wrongdoing.

"AIG today is a better company for all that we have been through," said Martin Sullivan, who replaced Greenberg as chief executive.

The company will take a $1.15 billion after-tax charge for the fourth quarter of 2005 for the settlement. It also said it "regrets and apologises" for its conduct, and said providing incorrect information to investors and regulators was "wrong."

In settling, Spitzer pointed the finger directly at Greenberg, who built AIG over nearly four decades, and Smith.

"There are some who continue to deny there was any wrongdoing at the company," the attorney general said in an interview in New York City. "I think the facts are overwhelming in establishing that -- from the highest levels of AIG -- there was an intent to misrepresent its financial condition."

A spokesman for Greenberg maintained that any suggestion the former CEO was involved in wrongdoing is false. A lawyer for Smith could not immediately be reached for comment.

SPITZER PRAISES NEW MANAGEMENT

Spitzer said AIG's new management has done a "spectacular" job of cooperating with investigators and instituting reforms.

The settlement tops the $850 million that Marsh & McLennan Cos. <MMC.N>, the insurance broker once run by Greenberg's son Jeffrey, agreed to pay to resolve bid-rigging accusations by Spitzer. It also tops the $750 million penalty that the SEC imposed against WorldCom Inc. for accounting fraud.

"This settlement removes the largest cloud overhanging the company," said Rob Haines, an analyst with CreditSights.

AIG shares rose 74 cents, or 1.1 percent, to close at $67.12. The shares have risen 34 percent from their 52-week low set last April 29, but remain 8 percent below their level about a year ago, before the company disclosed receiving subpoenas from Spitzer and the SEC.

DOJ_NMG_0013814

AIG will pay $800 million to a fund for investors deceived by its false financial statements, including a $100 million SEC penalty.

Policyholders harmed by bid-rigging will receive $375 million. Another $344 million will go to states harmed by AIG's understating of workers' compensation premiums. New York fined AIG $100 million, and the Justice Department fined it $25 million.

AIG agreed not to pay contingent commissions for certain types of insurance, and said it will support legislation to end them. Such commissions involve brokers and insurers rewarding each other for steering business.

The penalties, along with a higher reserve for property and casualty losses, will reduce AIG's book value by less than 3 percent, UBS AG insurance analyst Andrew Kligerman said.

AIG also agreed to retain an independent consultant for three years to review internal controls and practices. Sullivan said naming a consultant is a "top priority" for the company.

Separately, AIG said it will take a $1.1 billion fourth-quarter charge to increase its loss reserves, and expects $550 million of charges and insurance losses for catastrophes including Hurricanes Katrina and Wilma.

On the conference call, AIG said it plans to report 2005 results on or before March 16.

A.I.G. Apologizes And Agrees To $1.64 Billion Settlement (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

Apologizing for deceptive business practices extending as far back as two decades ago, American International Group, the global insurance giant, reached a $1.64 billion settlement yesterday with federal and state securities and insurance regulators.

The company also agreed to changes that would soften its historically combative approach to business, a trademark of its ousted chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg.

Under the settlement, reached with the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the New York attorney general's office and the New York State Insurance Department, A.I.G. acknowledged that it had deceived the investing public and regulators.

The settlement resolved allegations that A.I.G. had participated in bid-rigging schemes and paid insurance brokers to steer business its way, used fraudulent insurance transactions to bolster the quality and quantity of its earnings and underreported to state insurance departments the amounts of workers' compensation premiums it had collected, on which it owed taxes.

In its apology, A.I.G. said: "Providing incorrect information to the investing public and regulators was wrong and is against the values of our current leadership and employees."

The company said it was committed to business practices "that provide transparency and fairness in the insurance markets."

Both the settlement and the apology are a clear repudiation of the company's practices under Mr. Greenberg, its longtime chief executive who ruled A.I.G. with an iron hand and often battled openly with regulators.

Mr. Greenberg, who was removed by A.I.G.'s board last March, remains under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department and faces a lawsuit by the New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer.

"This settlement is a complete and total vindication of everything we said from Day 1, despite significant pushback from others," Mr. Spitzer said in an interview. "It sends an important message that this kind of gamesmanship won't be tolerated; we don't care who you are or what company you're running."

Under the terms of the settlement, A.I.G. will pay $200 million in fines and penalties and put $1.5 billion into three funds to benefit victims of the company's deceptions.

One fund, totaling $800 million, will be available to investors who lost money in A.I.G. stock after its accounting irregularities were disclosed. Another $375 million fund will repay former customers who may have paid too much to buy A.I.G.'s insurance policies. A third fund, with $343 million, will go to the states that A.I.G. cheated by underpayment of taxes relating to workers' compensation premiums earned in those states.

DOJ_NMG_0013815

S.E.C. officials said the settlement was important because it will deliver meaningful monetary relief to those harmed by A.I.G.'s conduct.

"While this settlement concludes our investigation of A.I.G., our investigation continues with respect to others who may have participated in A.I.G.'s securities law violations," said Linda C. Thomsen, director of enforcement at the commission.

A.I.G. is also paying $25 million to the United States government to resolve criminal liability arising from its accounting missteps. The company will also cooperate with the Justice Department in its continuing criminal investigation.

A.I.G. has been cooperating with the federal and state investigators since last March, when Mr. Greenberg left the company. Last year, it restated its financial results for five years beginning in 2000, stating that improper accounting during that period had inflated the company's earnings by more than $3 billion.

"These settlements are a major step forward in resolving the legal and regulatory issues facing A.I.G.," Martin J. Sullivan, the company's chief executive, said in a statement. "We have already implemented a wide range of improvements in our accounting, financial reporting and corporate governance, and will continue to make enhancements in these areas."

After taxes, A.I.G. will pay $1.15 billion under the settlement.

A spokesman for Mr. Greenberg issued this statement: "We have already debunked many of the allegations settled today by A.I.G. in a white paper issued last summer. The suggestion in the attorney general's public comments that Mr. Greenberg may have been involved in any wrongdoing is false. We are confident that when the debate moves from the newspaper to the courts, Mr. Greenberg will be vindicated."

Shares of A.I.G. rose 74 cents yesterday, or 1.1 percent, to $67.12.

Yesterday's settlement grew out of two separate inquiries, one in New York and another in Washington. The bid-rigging practices were turned up by Mr. Spitzer's office in a 2004 investigation into insurance brokers who act as middlemen between the corporations that buy insurance and the companies that sell policies. Guilty pleas by officials at Marsh Inc., a unit of Marsh & McLennan, and other insurance brokers led investigators to A.I.G.

In Washington, the S.E.C. uncovered an insurance product sold by A.I.G., known as finite-loss coverage, which seemed designed to help the companies that bought it hide profit shortfalls. In 2003, A.I.G. paid $10 million to settle a lawsuit filed by the S.E.C. over the insurer's sale of finite insurance to Brightpoint Inc., a cellphone distributor in Indiana.

The insurance, which the S.E.C. said A.I.G. had developed "for the specific purpose of helping issuers to report false financial information to the public," helped Brightpoint conceal $11.9 million in losses in 1998.

Investigators soon discovered that finite insurance was also central to a manipulation of A.I.G.'s own results. They uncovered insurance deals the company struck with General Re in late 2000 and early 2001 that were intended to add $500 million in phony loss reserves to A.I.G.'s balance sheet.

Insurance analysts had voiced concern over A.I.G.'s declining reserves in the third quarter, putting pressure on the company's stock; to address the analysts' concerns, A.I.G. bolstered its reserves artificially through the General Re deal.

Last week, federal prosecutors in Virginia charged three former officials of General Re and a former A.I.G. executive with fraud and conspiracy related to the fraudulent transactions.

Under the terms of the settlement, A.I.G. agreed to a raft of reforms. It will soon disclose commissions it pays to insurance brokers on its Web site, create companywide standards of conduct regarding those commissions, and train employees in business ethics, professional obligations, conflicts of interest and recordkeeping procedures. A.I.G. also agreed to hire a consultant to examine its internal controls over financial reporting; regulatory, legal and compliance policies; and adequacy of whistle-blower procedures.

The agreement also stated that the consultant hired by A.I.G. will issue a report to the S.E.C., the New York attorney general, the New York State Insurance Department and A.I.G.'s board recommending best practices for the company to adopt. The consultant will remain on the job for three years.

A.I.G. will also provide New York's superintendent of insurance with a report detailing the reinsurance contracts it has struck with other insurers. Such policies must contain risk transfer if the companies buying them are to receive preferred insurance accounting; where such a risk transfer is not evident, A.I.G. must supply appropriate documentation.

DOJ_NMG_0013816

The settlement requires A.I.G. to cooperate on all examinations and regulatory requests. A.I.G. will cooperate with the New York attorney general in his continuing investigation into the insurance industry and former A.I.G. employees.

AIG Accord May Lighten Its Wallet, But The Stock May Be Poised To Gain (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald And Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

American International Group Inc. has to write a $1.64 billion check to U.S. regulators and add even more than that to its reserves. But the mammoth insurer's stock might be a bargain.

To some, that may smack of classic up-is-down Wall Street logic. After all, an investigation of the firm's accounting last spring triggered civil-fraud charges from New York authorities, the ouster of iconic Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg and a restatement of five years of financial results.

The New York insurer -- the world's largest by market value with a more than $172 billion market capitalization -- closed this chapter with yesterday's deal with U.S. and federal authorities, who mainly alleged that in recent years improper accounting smoothed actual profit, not that the insurer created those gains. The $1.64 billion toll is the biggest paid to regulators by any financial-services company in U.S. history. Additionally, the company said it will take a $1.1 billion after-tax charge to boost its reserves by $1.69 billion following an internal review.

American International Group's size makes the twin hits lighter than they would be for most insurers -- profit neared $11.5 billion in the year ended Sept. 30. In 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange, AIG's shares were up 74 cents to $67.12.

Those investors who gobbled up shares yesterday likely got it right. Why? Bulls argue that in coming years, AIG shareholders will likely benefit from rising profit and a share price that trades at a higher multiple of that profit, now that investors know the company's accounting issues are put to bed.

"I think the issues that have dogged them are past and there's a lot of value here," says Jeff Arricale, an analyst at portfolio manager T. Rowe Price in Baltimore, which holds AIG stock in several portfolios. "It's a franchise that should be able to generate consistent, double-digit earnings growth for a long time. Everyone talks about that, but few companies do it."

An insurer makes money by selling policies and investing the premiums that customers pay. If premiums tend to outpace the claims it has to pay out and the company earns decent returns on its investments, profit rises. Sharp underwriting acumen also lowers the insurer's borrowing costs -- a big chunk of its overhead -- which creates a positive cycle.

Thanks to savvy management and enviable, double-digit profit growth, AIG's shares have risen nearly 190% during the past decade, almost lapping the return on the S&P 500-stock index, which is up 99% during the period.

The drivers of that success, aside from Mr. Greenberg, are intact. Earnings have risen steadily over the few quarters under new CEO Martin J. Sullivan. A 51-year-old who has worked at the firm since he was a teenager, Mr. Sullivan took the reins from Mr. Greenberg, 80, in March.

In many ways, Mr. Sullivan is left to implement a growth strategy that Mr. Greenberg and some of his departed lieutenants honed over more than three decades. For years, Mr. Greenberg forged ties in emerging foreign markets such as China and Vietnam. In many of these markets, AIG is way ahead of other U.S. companies, offering consumer lending, asset-management, plane-leasing and other noninsurance services.

Chris Winans, a spokesman for AIG, said that generally the company's life and nonlife-insurance businesses in foreign markets are healthy and expanding, and at a faster rate than in the domestic market.

AIG is in a position to benefit because people are getting wealthier in developing markets, but also from people spending an increasing percentage of their mounting wealth on insurance, which is seen as a safe investment. Investors and analysts have long been bullish on those operations and that feeling didn't exit with Mr. Greenberg, who still has eyes on some of AIG's turf through two private-equity funds he still controls.

"It still looks like it's all systems go for AIG," says Dreyfus Neenan, a stock analyst who covers the company for Chicago researcher Morningstar Inc. Mr. Neenan has AIG valued at $80 a share.

DOJ_NMG_0013817

Broadly, analysts have targeted 13% annual earnings growth over the next five years and 18 of the 23 analysts following the stock rate it a "buy" or "outperform," according to Thomson Financial. Despite that forecast, however, AIG's shares look cheap.

Today, the stock trades at about 12 times its projected profit for 2006, about 25% lower than the average stock in the S&P 500. Historically, the stock has traded closer to, and often higher than, a market multiple.

T. Rowe Price's Mr. Arricale notes that if AIG earns roughly $6.20 a share next year, as analysts expect, and trades at just 13.5 times those earnings -- still a 10% discount to the market's historical valuation -- the stock would be fairly valued at more than $80.

Of course, there are worries that could keep that from happening.

Andrew Kligerman, a stock analyst with UBS Securities LLC, sees a range of challenges, including the competitive pressures that come with operating in some mature markets and the need to retain talent. While AIG is a good company, Mr. Kligerman says, whether it will outperform the industry is "the question mark." His target price for the shares is $67. Mr. Kligerman has a "neutral" rating on the stock and AIG has been a UBS client in the past 12 months.

And despite Mr. Sullivan's long tenure with the company, the CEO is still in a "show-me" situation. "Management has handled all this pretty well," says David Dreman, chairman and chief investment officer at Dreman Value Management, a more than $13 billion money manager in Jersey City, N.J.

The firm bought shares roughly a year ago and expects earnings growth of 10% or more. At the same time, Mr. Dreman says, they are waiting to gauge new management's effectiveness this year before adding to the position.

AIG Agrees To Pay $1.64B Fraud Fine Biggest Penalty Ever On A U.S. Company (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, February 10, 2006

Insurance giant American International Group settled sweeping state and federal fraud probes Thursday by agreeing to pay $1.64 billion in fines and restitution, twice the highest penalty previously imposed on a U.S. company.

But the cost to AIG's reputation cut deeper. The company said an independent consultant's review had uncovered a $1.7 billion deficiency in its underwriting loss reserves, half related to its previously underestimated exposure to environmental and asbestos claims.

All told, AIG will record nearly $2.3 billion in after-tax charges to its fourth-quarter 2005 earnings. That comes atop a $1.3 billion reduction to its previously reported 2004 earnings last year, amid government investigations and the forced resignation of former chairman and CEO Maurice Greenberg.

New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, whose inquiry into insurance industry sales and commission practices led to Greenberg and a wide range of alleged abuses, called AIG “a solid company that didn't need to cheat. It finds itself in this position solely because some senior managers thought it was acceptable to deceive the investing public and regulators.”

Mark Schonfeld, director of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Northeast Regional Office, which joined the state's investigation, said, “We have sought to balance AIG's historical misconduct — which was substantial — with its new approach to compliance and cooperation with regulators and law enforcement.”

However, Greenberg spokesman Howard Opinsky said many of the regulators' allegations previously had been “debunked” in a report by the former CEO's legal defense team last year that termed the company's financial restatements “exaggerated and unnecessary” and argued that Greenberg, now 80, had relied on trusted advisers.

Insurance rating company A.M. Best said the latest reversals of fortune compromised the capital levels of AIG's domestic brokerage group, which “were not considered robust before and therefore provided little cushion for the restated earnings and reserve charge.”

“It's a big amount of money even for a huge company like AIG to have to pay out,” said Celent insurance analyst Donald Light.

The settlement dwarfs the $850 million Spitzer's office levied last year against insurance brokerage Marsh & McLennan in connection with the bid-rigging scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0013818

Greenberg and former CFO Howard Smith still face civil fraud charges in New York state court. And another former AIG executive, Christian Milton, faces a criminal charge related to the company's past dealings with Berkshire Hathaway subsidiary General Re.

AIG To Pay $1.64 Billion To End State, Federal Probes (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurer, agreed to pay $1.64 billion to resolve allegations it misled investors, faked bids, and cheated workers- compensation programs.

The settlements with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department include fines and restitution to investors, policyholders and state funds, AIG said in a statement today. The company, which didn't admit or deny any wrongdoing, will pay $800 million in its accord with the SEC, a record for the agency.

The agreement concludes probes dating as far back as 2001 and widens the split between New York-based AIG and ousted Chief Executive Maurice ``Hank" Greenberg, who ran the company for 38 years. AIG's auditors blamed Greenberg for skirting internal controls to alter the company's books, fueling separate accounting fraud allegations against the former CEO.

``The fact that these material misstatements were orchestrated from the very top of the company is clearly demonstrated," Spitzer said before speaking at a New York Law School event in Manhattan today. The settlement ``will send AIG off on a better trajectory."

The company's shares rose 74 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $67.12 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Martin Sullivan, the former chief operating officer who replaced Greenberg in March, had promised to settle the probes, helping the company record two-thirds of the $59 billion in market value it lost between February and April.

Reserve Increase

AIG, which restated $3.9 billion of past earnings last year, also today agreed to hire a consultant to monitor its internal controls and financial reporting for three years. Greenberg, 80, has called much of the restatement unnecessary and pledged to fight Spitzer's suit at trial.

AIG separately said it will increase reserves for asbestos and other claims at a cost of $1.1 billion in the fourth quarter. The reserve and settlement costs total $2.25 billion in the quarter, after taxes.

``These settlements are a major step forward in resolving the legal and regulatory issues facing AIG," Sullivan, 51, said in the statement. ``We have already implemented a wide range of improvements in our accounting, financial reporting and corporate governance, and will continue to make enhancements."

AIG will pay $800 million to investors hurt by the alleged misstatements, $375 million to policyholders who may have been cheated by fake insurance bids and $343 million to 50 state workers compensation funds. The company will also pay a $100 million fine to Spitzer and a $25 million penalty to the Justice Department.

Buying Opportunity

The SEC's biggest settlement before today was with WorldCom Inc., which paid $750 million in 2003 to resolve fraud allegations. Spitzer's record with a single company is $850 million to end bid-rigging accusations against Marsh & McLennan Cos., the insurance broker once run by Greenberg's son, Jeffrey.

A $1.6 billion payment equals about 16 percent of what AIG earned in the first nine months of 2005. It costs about 42 cents in per-share earnings and reduces AIG's net worth by about 1.2 percent, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. analyst Thomas Cholnoky said before the agreements were announced. He has an ``outperform" rating on the stock.

``Eliot Spitzer and his focus on AIG presented investors with a great gift to buy the franchise cheaply," said Keith Wirtz, chief investment officer at Fifth Third Asset Management, which holds 1.5 million AIG shares. ``We accumulated the stock in the $40's when this cloud surfaced. Now we think the earnings power of this company suggests to us it may be an $80 stock."

General Re

AIG, which lowered 2000 to 2004 net income by 10 percent in the restatement, is resolving Spitzer's May 2005 lawsuit and an SEC complaint filed today in conjunction with the agreement. At the core of the SEC's case is a reinsurance transaction with a unit of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. that inflated AIG's reported reserves for claims by $500 million.

DOJ_NMG_0013819

According to guilty pleas from two former executives of Berkshire's General Re, Greenberg initiated the deal with former General Re CEO Ronald Ferguson in late 2000 because he wanted to appease analysts who were concerned about AIG's reserve levels.

Ferguson and Christian Milton, AIG's former head of reinsurance, were among four indicted on federal charges of conspiring to distort AIG's finances last week. In today's agreement, AIG pledged to cooperate with the Justice Department's investigation of that deal.

Spitzer's suit also said the company used sham reinsurance contracts with offshore entities to hide underwriting losses. AIG had originally reported $3.73 billion in property and casualty underwriting income during the five-year period. After restating, the company showed a $206 million underwriting loss.

Bid-Rigging

The settlement resolves Spitzer's allegations that the company understated premiums to reduce its payments to state funds that finance a portion of benefits for injured workers.

AIG's accord separately clears a 15-month inquiry into price-fixing with insurance brokers including Marsh & McLennan. At least 17 people, including four AIG employees, have pleaded guilty in connection with the investigation. Spitzer's October 2004 suit against Marsh & McLennan accused it of soliciting fake bids from AIG and other insurers that paid hidden fees.

The SEC's investigation of AIG began in 2001 with a probe of policies that mobile-phone distributor Brightpoint Inc. allegedly used to manipulate earnings. The agency continued to look at income-smoothing insurance and reinsurance after AIG paid $10 million to settle the Brightpoint case. More than a dozen companies have been subpoenaed by state and federal regulators.

The SEC today credited AIG for changing its approach to dealing with regulators and cooperating fully in the agency's most recent investigation.

``Just a year ago, facing its third SEC investigation in as many years, AIG was on a path to disaster," Andrew Calamari, an SEC official in New York, said today. ``We are very encouraged that the company has now chosen a different path."

The Cleanup Continues (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

It's not about the money. After the settlement yesterday between regulators and the insurance giant American International Group, a lot of attention focused on the dollars: $1.6 billion. It is an impressive figure. But the money should not obscure the higher goal of an honest corporate environment.

Smart investors look at a company's balance sheet, its assets and liabilities, its sales and its profit before deciding whether to sink their savings into its stock. They assume that the corporation is telling the truth and operating within the law before taking a leap of faith by purchasing its shares. A.I.G. employees betrayed that trust in numerous ways, misleading investors and policyholders alike.

According to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York attorney general's office, A.I.G. engaged in bid-rigging, fraud and improper accounting. Like many companies in this era of corporate scandals, the fraud was meant to make the company look better than it really was.

A.I.G. engaged in what regulators describe as sham transactions to inflate its reserves by $500 million. Why go to all that trouble? According to the S.E.C., the company did it to "quell analyst criticism."

Rather than focusing on the long-term health of their businesses, too many executives worry about share prices and analysts' reactions. Equity markets are an important concern, but they are fickle, unpredictable and secondary. It's the bottom line, stupid.

In Houston, a jury is hearing testimony about a much bigger sham in the trial of the former bosses of Enron, Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling. Enron executives showed a similar obsession with financial analysts. The former head of investor relations described for the court how Enron, an energy company, would fudge quarterly results if earnings came in even a single penny short of outside expectations.

These targets are like point spreads for sports gamblers. Whatever they sell, companies should concentrate on business and leave the odds-makers to play their games.

The difference between Enron and A.I.G. is that Enron was a house of cards, but A.I.G. was and still is, as New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, put it, "a solid company that didn't need to cheat." A.I.G. appears to be back on track, with a new management team and approval from regulators for its cooperation. Let's hope they don't call it a day with the fat check and let others, including the company's former chief executive and chairman, Maurice Greenberg, off the hook.

Enron Witness's Plea Bargain Is Questioned By The Defense (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON, Feb. 9 (Reuters) — A lawyer for Jeffrey K. Skilling, a former chief executive of Enron, suggested Thursday that a crucial prosecution witness in the trial of Mr. Skilling and another former chief executive, Kenneth L. Lay, did not commit the crimes he admitted to under a plea deal with prosecutors.

The witness, Mark E. Koenig, Enron's former head of investor relations, is the first of several former Enron employees who are expected to testify against Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay after striking deals with the government to avoid trials.

Defense lawyers have said that many of the government's witnesses who reached deals were not guilty but buckled under pressure because they lacked the wherewithal to mount a defense at trial and feared they could face lengthy prison sentences if convicted.

Mr. Skilling's lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, questioned Mr. Koenig about the plea deal, which could send him to prison for up to 10 years for aiding and abetting securities fraud, saying at one point: "Don't you think this is pretty thin stuff?"

A visibly angry Mr. Koenig replied, "I don't think it's thin, or else I wouldn't have pleaded guilty to it."

Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are charged with conspiracy and fraud and are accused of trying to hide the company's poor financial state as it plunged toward bankruptcy in December 2001.

Mr. Skilling also faces insider trading charges.

Mr. Koenig, in six days on the witness stand in Federal District Court, has said he and other top executives at Enron misled investors and analysts about revenue and conspired to inflate profits to impress Wall Street.

In his plea agreement, Mr. Koenig admitted to misrepresenting transactions three times on conference calls with financial analysts in 2001, although he later recanted one of those episodes.

Mr. Lay's lawyer, Michael Ramsey, took up the attack where Mr. Petrocelli left off, asking Mr. Koenig whether he had told a friend he was not guilty of any crimes.

"Isn't it true, Mark, you told a very close friend and former co-worker that you were not guilty and did not commit a crime?" Mr. Ramsey asked.

"That's not true," Mr. Koenig replied.

Former Enron Investor Relations Chief Defends Guilty Plea (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Witnesses Were Intimidated Into Deals, Defense Says

HOUSTON, Feb. 9 -- Defense lawyers attacked the guilty plea of a former Enron Corp. executive Thursday, calling the deal "pretty thin stuff" in an effort to advance their argument that witnesses had been intimidated into cooperating with the government.

But in his sixth day of testimony against former chairman Kenneth L. Lay and chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, the company's onetime investor relations chief soundly rejected the idea.

"I don't think it's thin, or I wouldn't have pled guilty to it," Mark E. Koenig said of his August 2004 plea to a single count of aiding and abetting securities fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0013821

Without prompting, Koenig then reminded jurors of previous testimony in which he described efforts by the company to meet or exceed Wall Street targets by two pennies in 2000, more than two weeks after the fiscal quarter closed.

"Frankly, I was afraid these things would come back to me for years," Koenig said of misleading statements he made to analysts about the health of one of Enron's units. He faces as much as 10 years in prison when he is sentenced.

The exchanges punctuated another long day in which the eight-woman, four-man jury heard audiotapes and videotapes of stock analyst calls and employee meetings in which Skilling and Lay gave largely optimistic assessments of Enron's finances in the months before its filing for bankruptcy protection.

Both defendants argue that the company collapsed in a "panic" and that the vast majority of 16 former executives who pleaded guilty did so to preserve money for their families and to escape long prison sentences. Skilling and Lay, who say they are not guilty, could spend the rest of their lives in prison if they are convicted on fraud and conspiracy charges.

Michael Ramsey, lead defense lawyer for Lay, urged Koenig to answer only the questions he was asked. Ramsey confronted the witness about statements he allegedly made to a close friend and former Enron employee who Ramsey said indicated that Koenig did not think he had engaged in wrongdoing at Enron. Koenig called the woman, who is not on the defense witness list, a "dear friend" but said the account was wrong. Defense lawyers could later seek to call her to rebut his testimony.

Ramsey spent most of the afternoon seeking to explore "clues relative to the sudden death of Enron." But U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III affirmed most objections by Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn H. Ruemmler and headed Ramsey away from that line of questioning.

"I'm allowing you to question this witness," the judge told Ramsey. "I'm not allowing you to argue your case in the guise of questioning this witness."

Ramsey gained more ground when he attempted to portray Lay as less focused on details and more on leading the company's "public relations, politically oriented, diplomatically oriented" efforts before returning as chief executive upon Skilling's abrupt August 2001 departure. Lay moved in high-level political circles, meeting with Vice President Cheney about energy policy and conversing at least twice with presidential adviser Karl Rove, according to a 2001 analyst call the jury heard Thursday afternoon.

Ramsey said Lay had to "re-immerse himself" in the day-to-day operations at Enron.

Late in the day, the judge pronounced one line of questioning "a waste of time" and urged the defense to move on to other topics. Koenig is expected to return to the witness stand for most of Monday. The trial will last at least four months.

Lay's Lawyer Argues That Panic In Market Sank Enron, Not Fraud (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Gary Mcwilliams

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON -- Nearly two weeks into the criminal trial of his client, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay, defense attorney Michael Ramsey began his questioning of the government's first witness with a jab, then turned to pounding home the defense's argument that Enron collapsed because of a market panic rather than fraud.

Mr. Ramsey sharply challenged former Enron investor-relations chief Mark Koenig on whether he actually believed that he was guilty of the Enron-related crime he pleaded guilty to in 2004. Mr. Koenig has a cooperation agreement with the government in hopes of reducing his sentence. He is the first witness in the criminal fraud and conspiracy trial under way here against Mr. Lay and former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling.

Mr. Ramsey asked whether Mr. Koenig had told a friend and former Enron colleague that he had done nothing wrong, or simply made a misstatement during a call with securities analysts. Mr. Koenig firmly denied that he made such comments. Mr. Ramsey hinted that he might call the friend to testify later in the case.

The line of questioning begun yesterday by Mr. Ramsey is part of a broad defense of Enron's business practices being mounted by the legal teams for Messrs. Lay and Skilling. While Enron, in the more than four years since its December 2001 collapse, has become a synonym for corporate malfeasance, the Lay and Skilling defense teams are betting that they can convince the jury that Enron was a great company felled by an array of outside forces. Prosecutors counter that the two defendants led a years-long scheme to hide numerous problems at Enron, which finally collapsed when some of those problems became public.

Although the first government witness, Mr. Koenig, took the stand in the middle of last week, Mr. Ramsey didn't begin questioning him until yesterday afternoon. Prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler took a little over two days to question Mr. Koenig, who claimed that Messrs. Lay and Skilling took part with him in making false or misleading statements to the public on a variety of matters about Enron.

Following Ms. Ruemmler, Mr. Skilling's lead counsel, Daniel Petrocelli, cross-examined Mr. Koenig for some three days, during which time the attorney repeatedly tried to emphasize the complexity of Enron's operations and the limited knowledge Mr. Koenig had of those activities. Mr. Petrocelli claimed that Mr. Koenig's knowledge was so limited that things he said were improper really weren't.

Mr. Ramsey then turned to matters beginning in August 2001, when Mr. Skilling unexpectedly quit and Mr. Lay assumed his duties. He began questioning Mr. Koenig regarding outside partnerships, known as LJM1 and LJM2, that had done large amounts of business with Enron and had been run by the company's chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow. "LJM was going to turn out to be a real big deal in 2001," Mr. Ramsey said.

In his opening argument last week, Mr. Ramsey argued that articles in The Wall Street Journal in the fall of 2001 raising questions about the LJM operation helped spark the market "panic" that sank Enron. Yesterday, Mr. Ramsey suggested that the Enron-LJM relationship was proper, but that the Journal treated it as "scandalous."

Mr. Ramsey also began going through various problems Enron had in August 2001, including political and business headaches from the California electricity crisis and the impact of a troubled power project in India. Such concerns, Mr. Ramsey said, were "pulling down the price of Enron stock" in the summer of 2001, making the company more vulnerable to the turmoil that later arose.

Cross-examination of Mr. Koenig is scheduled to resume Monday.

Lay's Attorney Hits Snags In Dealings With Witness (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON — The lawyer representing former Enron CEO Ken Lay finally got a chance to cross-examine the government's first witness Thursday, and whiffed.

Shortly after the lunch break at federal court here, attorney Mike Ramsey attacked the credibility of Mark Koenig. The former Enron investor relations chief has pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the prosecution of Lay and another former Enron CEO, Jeff Skilling, on charges of hiding the true state of Enron's financial health from investors in 2000 and 2001.

“Isn't it true that after you pleaded guilty you told a very close friend and former co-worker that you were not guilty and committed no crime?” he asked. “Haven't you admitted to Joanie Williamson, sir, that you were not guilty?” Koenig denied telling Williamson any such thing. Ramsey then threatened to have Williamson testify. “So if she said that (on the stand), she'd be lying, perjuring herself?” Ramsey asked. “That's right,” Koenig stated defiantly.

Ramsey dropped the subject and immediately began quizzing Koenig about several topics that have yet to be fully introduced through testimony. At each point, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake shut him down.

When Ramsey tried to get Koenig to talk about private partnerships formed by former CFO Andrew Fastow, dubbed LJM1 and LJM2, Lake curtailed him. When Ramsey tried to get Koenig to talk about threats made against Lay by the attorney general of California about allegations of price-gouging, Lake again urged him to move on, sustaining a government objection by saying, “Go ahead and ask your next question.”

Finally, when Ramsey wanted Koenig to agree with his point that the meltdown of tech stocks in 2001 supported Lay's statements that Enron Broadband was in tough straits, Lake seemed to lose his patience. “This is an undue waste of our time,” he said.

Earlier Thursday, Skilling lawyer Dan Petrocelli asked Koenig about his decision to plead guilty to one count of aiding and abetting securities fraud in 2004. Although Koenig admitted in the agreement that he misled investors on numerous occasions, he cited three instances in particular where he made false statements to investors. “Don't you think this is pretty thin stuff?” Petrocelli asked. “I didn't think it was thin, or I wouldn't have pleaded guilty,” Koenig said.

In their opening arguments, Petrocelli and Ramsey both declared that there was no criminal conspiracy at Enron, and that many of those who pleaded guilty, such as Koenig, had been forced to do so rather than face worse charges at a criminal trial.

Koenig's cross-examination continues today. If it finishes, prosecutors plan to call Ken Rice, former CEO of Enron Broadband Services, as their next witness.

Enron Judge Stops Lay's Lawyer's Bid To Focus Trial On Fastow (BLOOM)

By Jef Feeley Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, February 10, 2006

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- The federal judge presiding over the fraud trial of former Enron Corp. top executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling stopped a bid by Lay's lawyer to shift the focus of the trial onto the misdeeds of an Enron subordinate.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in Houston sustained prosecutors' objections to questions by Michael Ramsey, Lay's lead defense lawyer, about off-book partnerships former finance chief Andrew Fastow created to do Enron-related deals. Fastow has pleaded guilty to a fraud charge stemming from Enron's collapse.

Lake did allow Ramsey to cross-examine Mark Koenig, who ran Enron's investor communication unit, about whether Fastow's LJM partnerships caused concern among shareholders. Koenig is in his sixth day of testimony in the trial of former chairman Lay and former chief executive officer Skilling.

``It was not something our competitors did," Koenig said about the off-book partnerships. ``It was different, so we got questions about it."

Prosecutors contend Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, used the partnerships to help hide billions in Enron's debt and losses to pump up the company's earnings. The government contends the accounting fraud led to the collapses of what was once the U.S.'s seventh-largest company by sales.

Enron had more than $68 billion in market value before it filed for bankruptcy in December 2001, wiping out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds almost overnight. Investors suing over the company's collapse claim accounting fraud led to at least $25 billion in losses.

Normal Practices

Skilling's and Lay's defense lawyers argue the two men engaged in normal corporate practices and that neither conspired to mislead investors or Enron workers who sank millions in retirement funds into the company's stock.

Prosecutors told jurors in opening arguments Jan. 31 they'd focus on Skilling's and Lay's lies and deceptions rather than company's complex financial and accounting transactions.

Defense lawyers have sought to frustrate the government's efforts by questioning Koenig extensively about the specifics of sophisticated financing deals and the operations of Fastow's partnerships.

Fastow created the LJM partnerships, named for his wife and sons, in 1999 to buy poorly performing assets from Enron or invest in the company's deals. He's alleged to have reaped at least $25 million in fees from the partnership's Enron-related deals while still serving as the company's CFO.

Fastow E-Mail

Skilling's and Lay's defense team has painted Fastow as a ``crook" who hid the fees he received from Enron-related deals from his bosses and the company's board. They've also said Fastow's partnerships were blessed by the company's lawyers, accountants and directors, and disclosed in Enron's securities filings.

Ramsey questioned Koenig today about an e-mail he received from Fastow in August 2001 indicating that he was no longer involved in the partnership. That obviated the need to disclose any further deals to investors.

``At the time you got the e-mail, did you have any reason to believe Mr. Fastow was a dishonest person?" Ramsey asked. ``At the time, no," Koenig said.

DOJ_NMG_0013824

Lake barred Ramsey from asking Koenig whether he'd learned that Fastow said the partnership's future Enron-related deals didn't have to be disclosed because he'd sold his interest in it. Ramsey said Fastow had sold LJM to former Enron executive Michael Kopper and ``was splitting profits with him."

Conflicting Interests

Kopper, who'd worked under Fastow in Enron's finance department and took over as LJM2's general manager in July 2001, has also pleaded guilty to an Enron-related fraud charge.

Outside investors who sank more than $387 million into the partnership sued Kopper in state court in Delaware in 2001 to oust him as head of the entity.

They argued he had conflicting interests in connection with Enron-related deals and wrongfully collected $6 million in management fees. A judge removed Kopper in March 2002.

During cross-examination earlier today, Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's main defense lawyer, noted that Koenig had made a mistake when he detailed his wrongdoing as part of his guilty plea.

Koenig pleaded guilty in August 2004 to a single count of aiding and abetting securities fraud in connection with Enron's collapse. He's facing a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison. Prosecutors could ask a judge to cut his sentence for his cooperation in the Skilling and Lay case.

Wrong Lie

Koenig originally told prosecutors he'd lied to investors about why some Enron's retail energy division's functions were shifted to the company's trading unit.

Prosecutors contend the functions were moved as part of an effort to hide losses in that unit. Koenig said he downplayed the reasons for the move to investment analysts during a July 2001 conference call.

The former Enron executive said while reviewing transcripts of the call years later, he discovered it was actually Skilling who'd told analysts on the call that the functions were moved ``to get some more efficiency." He alerted prosecutors to the mistake and they changed the documentation on his plea.

Petrocelli questioned why Koenig would plead guilty to something he didn't do.

``I pled guilty to aiding and abetting securities fraud," Koenig said. He added that his wrongdoing included more than one statement on a conference call. ``I don't think it's thin or I wouldn't have pled guilty to it."

Skilling's and Lay's lawyers are seeking to persuade jurors that prosecutors coerced lower-level executives like Koenig into pleading guilty to crimes they didn't commit with the threat of lengthy prison terms.

Lay is charged with seven counts of fraud and conspiracy, plus four counts of bank fraud that will be tried separately after his first trial. Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading.

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, No. 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Witness: Lay Took On New Duties At Enron (AP)

By KRISTEN HAYS, AP Business Writer

AP, February 10, 2006

HOUSTON -- Enron Corp.'s former investor-relations chief on Thursday acknowledged that founder Kenneth Lay had to jump back into nuts-and-bolts management of his company when he resumed the role of chief executive after Jeffrey Skilling resigned less than four months before Enron collapsed in December 2001.

"He had to get more involved, yes," Mark Koenig said in response to cross examination by lead Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey in his sixth day on the witness stand. Koenig is the government's first witness in the fraud and conspiracy trial of his former bosses.

"He was involved before, but he took on a whole new duty," Koenig said. Lay remained chairman of Enron throughout 2001, but he ceded the CEO position to Skilling in February that year. Skilling abruptly resigned six months later.

Lay's new duties included a hastily arranged conference call with Wall Street analysts on the day Enron announced Skilling's resignation in mid-August 2001, Koenig said. He said Enron was obligated to make executives available on the call to try to calm any market jitters sparked by the unexpected resignation.

DOJ_NMG_0013825

Ramsey's questioning appeared to try to highlight what Lay claimed publicly when he was indicted in July 2004: Lay knew of no skullduggery, and was like a student cramming for an exam when his hand-picked successor as CEO quit.

"We think the company's on solid footing," Lay told analysts on the August 2001 conference call played in court for the jury. On the same call, Skilling tried to reassure analysts that his departure was "purely a personal decision" and he stressed that it had nothing to do with Enron.

Ramsey said he expected to finish questioning Koenig on Monday, when the trial will resume.

At times, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake shut down Ramsey's efforts to delve into issues that weren't covered first when prosecutors questioned Koenig. Court rules limit cross examination to areas touched on in direct examination.

In one instance, Ramsey sought to question Koenig about a comment about Lay by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer to the Wall Street Journal in early 2001, the second year the state suffered through a power crunch that led to rolling blackouts and astronomical utility bills. Neither Lay nor Skilling are charged with manipulating California's power market, but three former Enron traders have pleaded guilty to doing so.

"Do you know of personal threats made against Mr. Lay by the attorney general of California?" Ramsey asked, his voice raised.

When a prosecutor objected, Lake cut Ramsey off. "I don't know of any threats against Mr. Lay that came up on direct," the judge said.

Lockyer told the Journal in May 2000, "I would love to personally escort Lay to an 8 by 10 cell that he could share with a tattooed dude who says, 'Hi my name is Spike, honey.'"

Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli, before he wrapped up three days of cross examination, sought to show how Skilling discussed bad news with analysts in conference calls earlier in 2001. Those discussions included the meltdown of the telecom industry in 2001 as Enron pushed its venture into broadband and bandwidth trading. The downturn siphoned potential bandwidth trading partners, he said.

The broadband unit never earned a profit and filed for bankruptcy protection alongside its parent in December 2001. Prosecutors contend Lay and Skilling hid bad news as they painted a falsely rosy picture of Enron.

"You understand in conference calls, you have to be careful and cautious in how the questions are answered?" Petrocelli asked.

"You want to be accurate, yes," Koenig replied.

Koenig is among 16 ex-Enron executives who have cut plea deals with prosecutors. He pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud for lying to investors about Enron's finances. As head of investor relations, he was the company's chief liaison to Wall Street.

He told jurors Thursday he isn't proud of his actions.

"I was frankly afraid these things would come back to me for years," Koenig said.

The defense teams have suggested to jurors that Koenig and other ex-Enron executives pleaded guilty to crimes they didn't commit out of fear of lengthy prison terms or pressure from prosecutors.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, collapsed amid revelations of billions of dollars hidden debt and inflated profits.

Both face decades in prison if convicted. Both sold millions of dollars in stock before Enron went bankrupt, but only Skilling faces allegations of improper stock sales.

Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors for allegedly conspiring to fool investors into believing Enron was healthy. Lay faces seven counts of fraud and conspiracy for perpetuating the alleged ruse after Skilling quit.

Both say no fraud occurred at Enron other than a few executives skimming money, and they are innocent of any wrongdoing.

A Second Mistrial Is Declared In Fraud Case Against The Former Chairman Of Cendant (NYT)

By Stacey Stowe

DOJ_NMG_0013826

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

HARTFORD, Feb. 9 — For the second time, the fraud trial of Walter A. Forbes, the former chairman of the Cendant Corporation, ended in a mistrial after the jury announced on Thursday that it had failed to reach a unanimous verdict in its 27th day of deliberations.

The mistrial occurs as a similar accounting-fraud prosecution involving Enron is under way. In such complex cases, the jury can sift through hours of expert testimony about arcane financial procedures and the responsibilities of executives only to find itself unable to render a verdict.

Last July, another prosecution for accounting fraud ended in a mistrial in the case of five former executives with Enron Broadband Services when jurors found themselves deadlocked on most charges.

"My understanding of your note is that you've reached the point where you believe that further deliberations would not be beneficial," Judge Alvin W. Thompson of Federal District Court in Hartford said Thursday. "Is that correct?"

"It is, your honor," said the jury foreman, Ken Premo.

"Then I declare a mistrial," Judge Thompson said.

Mr. Forbes, who faced more than 20 years in prison if convicted, betrayed no emotion when the decision was announced but kept his eyes locked on the jury. Asked moments later if he had a statement, he replied, "None," and quickly left the courtroom, followed by his wife, Caryn, and other family members. His lawyers also declined to comment.

A spokesman for Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, said the government had not yet decided whether it would prosecute Mr. Forbes again.

"We're keeping our options open," said the spokesman, Michael Drewniak. At the end of court on Thursday, Judge Thompson scheduled a conference call on Monday with prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Mr. Forbes, 63, of New Canaan, Conn., was charged with conspiracy and securities fraud and with submitting false reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission. Prosecutors said he inflated income at CUC International, which merged in 1997 with HFS Inc., to form Cendant, a real estate and travel services company. The stock lost almost half of its value in one day when, three months after the merger, Cendant disclosed evidence of accounting irregularities.

The case against Mr. Forbes relied on testimony from former financial executives of CUC who pleaded guilty to fraud charges and testified that their superiors participated in the manipulation. Throughout the 24-day trial, Mr. Forbes's lawyers portrayed him as a visionary who relied on accountants to handle the workaday aspects of business.

The Cendant case also resulted in the largest payment to settle a lawsuit brought by shareholders who lost money in a fraud. Cendant paid $2.85 billion to settle, while its auditor, Ernst & Young, paid $335 million. Before it was eclipsed by WorldCom and Enron, the Cendant case was the largest accounting fraud in America. Company shareholders lost $19 billion after it was disclosed in 1998.

John C. Coffee, a professor at Columbia University School of Law, said a second mistrial in the Cendant case was "an ominous signal for the Enron case" and a cautionary tale about the difficulties of trying cases that involve complex and often befuddling accounting procedures.

"There's a great deal of difficulty about teaching the jury the equivalent of an intermediate college course in accounting," he said, adding that prosecutors would have been better served by focusing on the most vivid examples of criminal behavior.

But at least one juror did not feel the accounting issues were too complex. Mr. Premo, the jury foreman and a maintenance technician who lives in Windsor Locks, Conn., said, "I was able to sort it out." He described the deliberations as "cordial."

Citing a directive from Judge Thompson that jurors provide only their own opinions and not comment on the actions or opinions of fellow jurors at the end of the trial, he said, "I would have convicted."

"I wouldn't say it was clear cut. I really had to look at the facts. My opinion was based more on the actions of a C.E.O. and the lack of actions of a C.E.O."

Although the jury deliberated for 27 days, some of those were half days and many were not consecutive as Judge Thompson accommodated various requests for absences or early departures. On Tuesday, Judge Thompson dismissed a juror after he admitted that he had researched Cendant. By law, jurors can consider only court testimony in their deliberations.

The jury did not meet on Wednesday. On Thursday morning, rather than appoint an alternate, Judge Thompson directed the 11-member jury to continue its work. Less than one hour later, the jury foreman sent a note saying he believed that the jury was unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

Barry Simon, one of Mr. Forbes's defense lawyers, asked for a mistrial but Michael Martinez, one of two prosecutors trying the case, said the note was "somewhat equivocal," and asked Judge Thompson to direct the jurors to continue working despite a possible deadlock.

Judge Thompson had told the jury once before, on Jan. 5, to continue its work when the jury claimed it could not reach a unanimous decision on the 12th day of deliberations. On Thursday, he declared a mistrial after he confirmed that the jury was indeed deadlocked.

In January 2005, the first attempt to prosecute Mr. Forbes, a 1968 graduate of Harvard Business School, also ended in a mistrial when, after hearing seven months of testimony, the jury deadlocked on all charges against him after 33 days.

A co-defendant in that trial, E. Kirk Shelton, 50, former vice chairman of Cendant, was convicted on all 12 counts of conspiracy, securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud. He was sentenced to 10 years in prison but is appealing his conviction.

In The Cendant Trial, Ignorance Was An Excuse (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

Walter A. Forbes was paid more than $100 million as chairman and chief executive of the CUC Corporation. To hear him tell it, he did not do very much to earn the money.

Operations of the company, he testified at a trial where he faced charges of masterminding a fraud that cost investors billions, were left to others.

He admitted signing quarterly and annual financial statements that turned out to be fraudulent, but said he neither prepared nor read them.

"We were a public company with thousands of employees, divisions all over the country and all over the world," he testified. "I don't think they would have expected me to be reading 10-Q's."

It was a defense that worked at his first trial, when a jury convicted CUC's No. 2 official but was unable to reach a verdict on Mr. Forbes. And it has worked again. Yesterday, the jury in the second trial was dismissed after it, too, was unable to reach a verdict after 27 days of deliberations. [Page C6.]

The jury foreman, Ken Premo, said afterward that he did not feel the accounting issues in the trial had been too complex and thought that Mr. Forbes was guilty. But, he added, "I wouldn't say it was clear cut."

If he had been convicted, Mr. Forbes would have faced more than 20 years in prison. A spokesman for Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for the New Jersey district, said the government had not yet decided whether it would prosecute Mr. Forbes a third time.

The fraud was discovered after CUC merged with another company, HFS, to form the Cendant Corporation, with holdings that included Avis car rental and Century 21 real estate. When the fraud was discovered in 1998, it was called the largest accounting fraud in American history — and investors lost $19 billion when Cendant's stock fell in the wake of the disclosure. But the company subsequently lost the title as Enron and WorldCom collapsed in scandal.

The fact pattern at Cendant would prove to be similar to the later rush of accounting fraud cases. The chief financial officer first denied anything was wrong, then confessed and agreed to testify against his boss. But orders to falsify books, if they were given, were given orally and documents were scarce.

In the WorldCom trial, the jury believed the chief financial officer and convicted Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive. At HealthSouth, the jury chose not to believe a series of financial officers and acquitted Richard M. Scrushy, the former chief executive.

Now, two former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, are on trial in Houston, with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, expected to be a star prosecution witness. The strategy chosen by lawyers for the former Enron bosses is radically different, arguing that there really were no crimes and that the company failed because negative publicity caused a loss of confidence.

In the Forbes trial, Cosmo Corigliano, the former chief financial officer, testified that the books were cooked for years at Mr. Forbes's direction, and that every quarter he and Mr. Forbes discussed how much money would be taken from inflated reserves and used to increase profits to meet targets. Over the three-year period covered in the indictment, $250 million was thus added to profits.

Mr. Forbes denied that the conversations took place, and he also said he had never seen the "cheat sheets" that Mr. Corigliano said were shown to him each quarter, detailing how much the profits were being inflated.

Mr. Forbes, who has an M.B.A. degree from Harvard, as well as bachelor's and master's degrees in journalism from Northwestern University, testified he knew little of accounting and never paid any attention to how the profit figures were compiled.

To some extent, the case came down to a "he said, he said" battle between the men. Brandon Sullivan, Mr. Forbes's lawyer, branded Mr. Corigliano a liar and said there had to be at least a reasonable doubt whether he was telling the truth.

But the prosecution pointed to other inconsistencies in the testimony. Steven Kernkraut, an analyst from Bear Stearns, testified that he had held discussions with Mr. Forbes regarding how merger reserves were set, and why the reserve for one merger was increased months after it was completed.

Mr. Forbes said that was wrong. "I never had a conversation with him after the deal was announced" regarding the reserves, he testified.

He also denied testimony from Mike Monaco, the HFS chief financial officer, that Mr. Forbes had fought to keep Ernst & Young as the auditor of CUC's books after the merger, even proposing that the company have two auditors.

Mr. Forbes said he never heard of such an idea, although he acknowledged that he was at a meeting whose minutes said the idea was discussed and rejected. Ernst had failed to spot the fraud, and the prosecution claimed Mr. Forbes wanted to keep the firm because he thought it could continue to be fooled.

Although the charges at the trial covered just three years, Mr. Corigliano told the court, when he pleaded guilty in 2000, that the fraud had been going on since the early 1980's, when he joined the company from Ernst & Whinney, a predecessor of Ernst & Young.

An accounting official, who said he followed Mr. Corigliano's orders to cook books, said he had followed similar orders from Mr. Corigliano's predecessor, Stuart Bell, who left the company in 1995. Mr. Bell, who was not charged with any crime, did not testify.

In describing his own role at CUC, Mr. Forbes said he was a visionary who mapped strategy and guided the company into mergers that enabled it to grow. But even there, he said, he avoided the details.

"I knew it was a strategic fit," he said in discussing one large acquisition, "but I never actually visited the company or met the principals."

Mr. Forbes said he was "stunned and shocked" when he first heard there were problems with the books. But he soon agreed to step down as chairman in return for a $47 million severance package that he promised to return to the company if he were convicted of a crime.

He quickly transferred many of his assets to his wife, but said he did not remember a warning from his lawyer that such an action would be viewed by prosecutors as an admission of guilt. At his first trial, he said the lawyer advised him there was nothing wrong with the transfer. At the second trial, the lawyer denied telling him that.

Those contradictions did not bother all the jurors, at least not enough to produce a conviction. Unless the government is willing to force a third trial, Mr. Forbes will have prevailed with his defense of not having any idea what was happening at the company he ran, just as Mr. Scrushy did.

Preliminary Approval Given To Bristol-Myers' $185M Shareholder Settlement (LAW/AP)

By Theresa Agovino, The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013829

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. said Thursday that a judge gave preliminary approval for a proposed $185 million settlement to end a class action lawsuit that alleges the drugmaker artificially inflated its stock price by making false and misleading claims about an experimental heart drug.

U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler entered preliminary approval of a settlement for the case pending in the U.S. District Court in New Jersey, relating to the drug known as Vanlev, the company said. Vanlev was never approved.

Under the proposed settlement, Bristol-Myers Squibb will pay $185 million to create a settlement fund to pay the claims of certain investors who purchased Bristol-Myers Squibb common stock during the period from Oct. 19, 1999 through March 20, 2002.

Last month, Bristol-Myers announced it had reached a settlement with plaintiff lawyers and had established a reserve to settle the case. At that time, Thomas Dubbs, a plaintiffs lawyer in the case, said he hoped the settlement would act as a deterrent to other companies hiding damaging information.

The settlement also includes provisions regarding the company's commitment to the public disclosure of the results of certain clinical trials and the registration of trials on an appropriate publicly accessible database.

The shareholders' lawsuit alleges that company executives praised Vanlev as a potential blockbuster despite knowing it had potentially severe side effects as early as 1996.

But on April 19, 2000, Bristol-Myers announced it was withdrawing its application for approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration because of side effects. The stock fell 39 percent, according to the suit.

In July 2000, Bristol-Myers said it would test Vanlev at lower doses, where the problem of side effects didn't seem as severe. The complaint alleges that there were still problems at the lower doses and that Bristol-Myers didn't announce it to the market until March 20, 2002, sending the stock down more than 15 percent.

The company said it agreed to the settlement without any admission of wrongdoing.

The court has set another hearing in the case for May 11.

Futures Traders Resist Tighter Oversight Plan (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Commodity Futures Trading Commission's reputation as a toothless regulator has been changing. Spurred by complaints that natural-gas prices have driven up the cost of fertilizer and farming, Congress is working on legislation to allow the CFTC to expand its regulation of energy trading in the commodity and over-the-counter market.

Some Wall Street traders, concerned by a spate of energy-manipulation cases brought by the CFTC, are fighting back. They are working to water down the policing authority of the CFTC, thereby stalling legislation to reauthorize the agency, which has operated without a charter since Sept. 30.

By law, the CFTC must be reauthorized every five years. There isn't much pressure to pass legislation before the charter expires because the agency's operating budget continues to be funded. However, every five years, various interests use the reauthorization legislation to strengthen or weaken the CFTC.

The CFTC was created in 1974 to oversee futures and options trading in agricultural and mineral contracts on commodity exchanges, such as the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Wall Street regularly has succeeded in limiting its regulatory oversight. In late 1998, after the near-collapse of hedge fund Long-Term Capital Management, the then-chairwoman of the agency suggested that the CFTC should consider some regulation of derivatives contracts. Financial institutions, though, used their lobbying clout to get Congress to pass a bill in 2000 that exempted OTC derivatives -- and specifically energy transactions -- from most regulatory oversight. (The CFTC retained some authority to investigate wrongdoing in the market.)

This time around, energy users complain that shortages of natural gas have created a market dominated by speculators who manipulate prices.

Leading the effort is the American Public Gas Association, which represents gas utilities, and the Industrial Energy Consumers of America, which represents gas-consuming industries such as manufacturers and fertilizer producers.

DOJ_NMG_0013830

Late last year, the House passed its version of the CFTC reauthorization bill with a last-minute amendment to help the regulator investigate natural-gas price manipulation on the OTC markets. In these markets, traders at banks, hedge funds and money management firms privately arrange transactions among themselves by phone or computer. Most natural-gas trading occurs over the counter.

The provision, by Rep. Sam Graves (R., Mo.) and Rep. John Barrow (D., Ga.), charges the CFTC with preventing and detecting manipulation of natural-gas markets, outlines more record-keeping requirements and increases the penalties for violations.

Mr. Graves said the measure stemmed from complaints by agriculture groups that natural-gas prices had driven up the costs of fertilizer and farming. Mild winter weather has spared consumers from steeper price increases.

State officials also are getting in the act. Utah Republican Gov. Jon Huntsman has called on federal agencies to probe the gas market and determine if prices are being manipulated. Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly has sought to end what he describes as legal market manipulation of natural-gas prices in the state.

Scrutiny of energy markets rose after electricity traders at Enron Corp. and other companies fleeced California residents of hundreds of millions of dollars in 2002 by contriving power shortages. That triggered an energy-industry probe by the CFTC, which found widespread price manipulation. Nearly $300 million in fines has resulted from its investigation of about 55 energy companies -- with 27 companies and 23 individuals charged with either false-data reporting or attempted market manipulation.

John Damgard, president of the Futures Industry Association, which represents commodity exchanges, futures traders and banks, said the CFTC -- which has fewer than 500 employees and an annual budget of $97 million this year -- has no business investigating commodity scams. Federal prosecutors should be responsible for filing criminal cases against violators, he said.

Financial firms have taken note of the CFTC's pursuit of energy fraud in the OTC market. Energy users point to the slew of cases as evidence that the CFTC must have OTC policing powers.

Gregory Mocek, the CFTC enforcement director, said because trades on exchanges and over the counter are interdependent, each energy-enforcement case brought by the agency included violations that occurred on the OTC market.

Supporters of more oversight fear the financial-services lobby will not only kill the natural-gas provision in the House bill but may go further and try to water down the CFTC's existing enforcement authority.

"We'll do whatever we have to do to make sure (the natural-gas provision) won't pass," said Robert Pickel, executive director of the International Swaps and Derivatives Association.

The opposition -- led by the futures and derivatives trade groups, the Bond Market Association and the Securities Industry Association -- has focused its lobbying on senators on both sides of the aisle, CFTC commissioners and staff, and Treasury and Federal Reserve officials. They argue that giving the CFTC more oversight authority on the OTC market would cause an exodus of U.S. trading business to less-regulated foreign markets.

"It's a cruel hoax that giving the CFTC more regulatory power will bring down the prices of natural gas and gasoline," Mr. Damgard said.

The dispute has bottled up legislation in the Senate, where the leadership has said it won't schedule a vote until there is enough agreement on a CFTC bill to assure passage.

The final arbiter likely will be a group of presidential advisers that includes the chiefs of the Federal Reserve, Treasury Department, Securities and Exchange Commission and CFTC. In letters to members of Congress, the Fed and Treasury have raised objections to any such regulation of OTC transactions, based on fears that it could cause "legal uncertainty" and breed lawsuits that could disrupt the market.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cheney 'Authorized' Libby To Leak Classified Information (NATJOUR)

By Murray Waas, National Journal

National Journal, February 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0013831

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, testified to a federal grand jury that he had been "authorized" by Cheney and other White House "superiors" in the summer of 2003 to disclose classified information to journalists to defend the Bush administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case to go to war with Iraq, according to attorneys familiar with the matter, and to court records.

According to sources with firsthand knowledge, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war.

Libby specifically claimed that in one instance he had been authorized to divulge portions of a then-still highly classified National Intelligence Estimate regarding Saddam Hussein's purported efforts to develop nuclear weapons, according to correspondence recently filed in federal court by special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald.

Beyond what was stated in the court paper, say people with firsthand knowledge of the matter, Libby also indicated what he will offer as a broad defense during his upcoming criminal trial: that Vice President Cheney and other senior Bush administration officials had earlier encouraged and authorized him to share classified information with journalists to build public support for going to war. Later, after the war began in 2003, Cheney authorized Libby to release additional classified information, including details of the NIE, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence in making the case for war.

Previous coverage of the CIA leak investigation from Murray Waas

Libby testified to the grand jury that he had been authorized to share parts of the NIE with journalists in the summer of 2003 as part of an effort to rebut charges then being made by former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson that the Bush administration had misrepresented intelligence information to make a public case for war.

Wilson had been sent on a CIA-sponsored mission to investigate allegations that the African nation of Niger had sold uranium to Iraq to develop a nuclear weapon. Despite the fact that Wilson reported back that the information was most likely baseless, it was still used in the President's 2003 State of the Union speech to make the case for war.

But besides sharing details of the NIE with reporters during the effort to rebut Wilson, Libby is also accused of telling journalists that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, had worked for the CIA. Libby and other Bush administration officials believed that if Plame played a role in the selection of her husband for the Niger mission, that fact might discredit him.

A federal grand jury indicted Libby on October 28, 2005, on five counts of making false statements, perjury, and obstruction of justice, alleging that he concealed his role in leaking information about Plame to the media. He resigned his positions as chief of staff and national security adviser to Cheney the same day. Libby has never claimed that Cheney encouraged him to disclose information about Plame to the media.

In a January 23 letter, related to discovery issues for Libby's upcoming trial, Fitzgerald wrote to Libby's attorneys: "Mr. Libby testified in the grand jury that he had contact with reporters in which he disclosed the content of the National Intelligence Estimate ("NIE") … in the course of his interaction with reporters in June and July 2003.… We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors."

Although it is not known if Cheney had told the special prosecutor that he had authorized Libby to leak classified information to reporters, Dan Richman, a professor of law at Fordham University and a former federal prosecutor for the Southern District of New York, said, "One certainly would not expect Libby, as part of his defense, to claim some sort of clear authorization from Cheney where none existed, because that would clearly risk the government's calling Cheney to rebut that claim."

The public correspondence does not mention the identities of the "superiors" who authorized the leaking of the classified information, but people with firsthand knowledge of the matter identified one of them as Cheney. Libby also testified that he worked closely with then-Deputy National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove in deciding what information to leak to the press to build public support for the war, and later, postwar, to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence.

In the correspondence, Fitzgerald also asserted that Libby testified that he had met with then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller on July 8, 2003, with the "purpose" of intending "to transmit information" to her "concerning the NIE."

That particular meeting has been key to Fitzgerald's investigation because the special prosecutor alleges that Libby lied both to the FBI and to his federal grand jury by saying that he had not discussed Plame with Miller on that date, when in fact he did tell her of Plame's work for the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0013832

In an account of her grand jury testimony, Miller has written that Libby discussed the NIE with her: "Mr. Libby also cited a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, produced by American intelligence agencies in October 2002 … which he said had firmly concluded that Iraq was seeking uranium." Portions of the NIE were later declassified, but the material in it related to Niger was still classified at the time.

Libby, through a spokesperson, declined to comment, and the vice president, through a spokesperson, also declined to comment for this story.

The new disclosure that Libby has claimed that the vice president and others in the White House had authorized him to release information to make the case to go to war, and later to defend the administration's use of prewar intelligence, is significant for several reasons. First, it significantly adds to a mounting body of information that Cheney played a central and personal role in directing efforts to counter claims by Wilson and other administration critics that the Bush administration had misused intelligence information to go to war with Iraq.

Second, it raises additional questions about Libby's motives in concealing his role in leaking Plame's name to the press, if he was in fact more broadly authorized by Cheney and others to rebut former Ambassador Wilson's charges. The federal grand jury indictment of Libby alleges that he had lied to the FBI and the federal grand jury by claiming that when he provided information to reporters about Plame's CIA employment, he was only passing along what he understood to be unverified gossip that he had heard from other journalists.

Instead, the indictment charges that Libby had in fact learned of Plame's CIA status from at least four government officials, Cheney among them, and from classified documents. Indeed, much of Libby's earliest and most detailed information regarding Plame's CIA employment came directly from the vice president, according to information in Libby's grand jury indictment. "On or about June 12, 2003," the indictment stated, "Libby was advised by the Vice President of the United States that Wilson's wife worked at the Central Intelligence Agency in the Counterproliferation Division."

Libby testified that Cheney told him about Plame "in an off sort of, curiosity sort of, fashion," according to other information recently unsealed in federal court. Not long after that date, Libby, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, and a third administration official began to tell reporters that Plame had worked at the CIA, and that she had been responsible for sending her husband to Niger.

Finally, the new information indicates that Libby is likely to pursue a defense during his trial that he was broadly "authorized" by Cheney and other "superiors" to defend the Bush administration in making the case to go to war. Libby does not, however, appear to be claiming that he was acting specifically on Cheney's behalf in disclosing information about Plame to the press.

Libby's legal strategy in asserting that Cheney and other Bush administration officials authorized activities related to the underlying allegations of criminal conduct leveled against him, without approving of or encouraging him to engage in the specific misconduct, is reminiscent of the defense strategy used by Oliver North, who was a National Security Council official in the Reagan administration.

North, a Marine lieutenant colonel assigned to the National Security Council, implemented the Reagan administration's efforts to covertly send arms to Iran in exchange for the release of American hostages held in the Middle East, and to covertly fund and provide military assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras at a time when federal law prohibited such activities. Later, it was discovered that North and other Reagan administration officials had diverted funds they had received from the Iranian arms sales to covertly fund the Contras.

If Libby's defense adopts strategies used by North, it might be in part because the strategies largely worked for North and in part because Libby's defense team has quietly retained John D. Cline, who was a defense attorney for North. Cline, a San-Francisco partner at the Jones Day law firm, has specialized in the use of classified information in defending clients charged with wrongdoing in national security cases.

Among his detractors, Cline is what is known as a "graymail" specialist-an attorney who, critics say, purposely makes onerous demands on the federal government to disclose classified information in the course of defending his clients, in an effort to force the government to dismiss the charges. Although Cline declined to be interviewed for this story, he has said that the use of classified information is necessary in assuring that defendants are accorded due process and receive fair trials.

In the Libby case, Cline has frustrated prosecutors by demanding, as part of pretrial discovery, more than 10 months of the President's Daily Brief, or PDBs, the president's morning intelligence briefing. The reports are among the most highly classified documents in government, not only because they often contain sensitive intelligence and methods, but also because they indicate what the president and policy makers consider to be the most pressing national security threats. In the past, the Bush administration has defied bipartisan requests from the Intelligence committees in Congress to turn over PDBs for review.

After Cline demanded the PDBs, Fitzgerald wrote to him on January 9 that the prosecutor's office has only "received a very discrete amount of material relating to PDBs" and "never requested copies of PDBs" themselves, in part because "they are extraordinarily sensitive documents which are usually highly classified." Moreover, Fitzgerald wrote, only a relatively small number of PDB pages included reference to Wilson's trip to Niger.

But Cline has insisted that it is imperative for his client's defense to be able to review the PDBs because part of Libby's defense is that he may have had a faulty memory regarding conversations he had with government officials and reporters regarding Plame, in that he had so many other pressing issues to consider every day as chief of staff and national security adviser to the vice president.

In a January 31 court filing, attorneys for Libby argued: "Mr. Libby will show that, in the constant rush of more pressing matters, any errors he made in FBI interviews or grand jury testimony, months after the conversations, were the result of confusion, mistake, faulty memory, rather than a willful intent to deceive."

In the North case, the Iran-Contra independent counsel, Lawrence Walsh, was forced to dismiss many of the central charges against North, including the most serious ones-that North defrauded taxpayers by diverting proceeds from arms sales to Iran to finance the Nicaraguan Contras-because intelligence agencies and the Reagan administration refused to declassify documents necessary for a trial on those charges.

Walsh and many of his deputies believed that the Reagan Justice Department refused to declassify documents necessary to try North because officials were personally sympathetic to him. A North trial would also have politically embarrassed the Reagan administration, and a North conviction might have led to charges against higher officials.

In court filings, Walsh said that much of what intelligence agencies and the Reagan administration had refused to declassify had long before been published in the media or made public in some other way.

"It was a backdoor way of shutting us down," said one former Iran-Contra prosecutor, who spoke only on the condition that his name not be used, because his current position as a private attorney requires frequent dealings with attorneys who were on the other side of the North case at the time. "It was a cover-up by means of an administrative action, and it was an effective cover-up at that."

The former prosecutor added: "The intelligence agencies do not declassify things on the pretext that they are protecting state secrets, but the truth is that we were investigating and prosecuting their own. The same was true for the Reagan administration. Cline was particularly adept at working the system."

Is it possible that a prosecution of Libby might be impeded or even derailed entirely by the refusal of the Bush White House or its Justice Department to declassify information that might be necessary to try Libby? "Under the current statute, it may well be the attorney general's call-or whomever he designates-to ultimately decide what should be declassified, and what might not be, in the Libby case," said Michael Bromwich, a former associate Iran-Contra independent counsel and a former Justice Department inspector general.

William Treanor, the dean of Fordham University's Law School, and also a former associate Iran-contra special counsel, said that it is less likely that the Bush administration would challenge Fitzgerald as former administrations did with special prosecutors. Walsh, dealing with the Reagan and elder Bush administrations, and Whitewater independent counsel Kenneth Starr, dealing with the Clinton administration, often alleged that political appointees in the Justice Department worked purposely to undermine their investigations.

"Walsh and Starr were not appointed by an attorney general," Treanor said, noting that Walsh, Starr, and earlier special prosecutors had been appointed by a three-judge federal panel instead of by the Justice Department. Currently, he pointed out, special prosecutors are appointed by the attorney general or their designate.

"With Walsh or Starr, the president and his supporters could more easily argue that a prosecutor was overzealous or irresponsible, because there had been a three-judge panel that appointed him," Treanor said. "With Fitzgerald, you have a prosecutor who was appointed by the deputy attorney general [at the direction of the attorney general]. The administration almost has to stand behind him because this is someone they selected themselves. It is harder to criticize someone you yourself put into play."

There are other reasons why it might prove difficult to undercut Fitzgerald, including outstanding questions about the role that Cheney and others in the Bush administration played in the effort to discredit Wilson, and the fact that Cheney is still the point man in defending the White House's use of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

And the new disclosure, that Libby is alleging that Cheney and other Bush administration officials "authorized" him to disclose classified information as a means to counter charges that the administration misused prewar intelligence, might also make it difficult for this administration to refuse to declassify information for Libby's trial.

But a Libby defense strategy asserting that he released classified information or took other actions as broadly authorized by Cheney might have other advantages, if the North case is any guide. At North's trial, the counts on which the jury acquitted him tended to be those involving actions that appeared to be authorized by superiors. He was found guilty of three felonies on which the evidence indicated that he was acting on his own initiative or for his own financial benefit.

"It was a memorable and powerful moment when North told the jury that he was 'a pawn in a chess game played by giants,'" Treanor said.

The claims by North that his activities had been broadly authorized by higher-ups, including even the president, also worked to his advantage when he was sentenced. Despite the fact that North had been convicted of three felonies and that Iran-Contra prosecutors argued before sentencing that letting North off with "only a slap on the wrist … would send exactly the wrong message … [only] 15 years after Watergate," he was sentenced to only probation, a fine, and community service.

North's trial judge, U.S. District Court Judge Gerhard Gesell, took note that the jury had acquitted North of criminal charges mainly where it appeared that his conduct might have been authorized by higher authorities: "Observing that many others involved in the events were escaping without censure or with prosecutorial promises of leniency or immunities, [the jury] used their common sense. And they gave you the benefit of a reasonable doubt."

Explaining his own leniency in sentencing the former NSC aide, Gesell told North: "I do not believe you were a leader at all, but really a low-ranking subordinate to carry out initiatives of a few cynical superiors. You came to be a point man in a very complex power play developed by higher-ups."

Later, North's convictions were overturned on appeal because of concerns that some of the evidence used against him during his trial might have been derived from his testimony before the House-Senate Iran-Contra investigating committee. North had been given immunity for that testimony.

But most outside legal observers say that Libby, because he was himself such a high-ranking official, will most likely face a much more difficult time than North did in arguing that, in some of his activities, he was just carrying out orders from Cheney or other senior White House officials.

"A defendant can make a claim that he is just a victim of Washington politics or doing the bidding for someone else," said Richman, the former prosecutor, "But there may be limits to a jury's sympathy when that defendant himself was so high-ranking. Given Libby's position in the White House, the jury is less likely to view him as a sacrificial lamb than as a sacrificial ram."

Libby: White House 'Superiors' Authorized Leaks (AP)

The Associated Press, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — A former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney told a federal grand jury that his superiors authorized him to give secret information to reporters as part of the Bush administration's defense of intelligence used to justify invading Iraq, according to court papers.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said in documents filed last month that he plans to introduce evidence that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, disclosed to reporters the contents of a classified National Intelligence Estimate in the summer of 2003.

The NIE is a report prepared by the head of the nation's intelligence operations for high-level government officials, up to and including the president. Portions of NIEs are sometimes declassified and made public. It is unclear whether that happened in this instance.

In a Jan. 23 letter to Libby's lawyers, Fitzgerald said Libby also testified before the grand jury that he caused at least one other government official to discuss an intelligence estimate with reporters in July 2003.

"We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors," Fitzgerald wrote.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan refused to comment. "Our policy is that we are not going to discuss this when it's an ongoing legal proceeding," he said.

William Jeffress, Libby's lawyer, said, "There is no truth at all" to suggestions that Libby would try to shift blame to his superiors as a defense against the charges.

Libby, 55, was indicted late last year on charges that he lied to FBI agents and the grand jury about how he learned CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity and when he subsequently told reporters. He is not charged with leaking classified information from an intelligence estimate report.

Plame's identity was published in July 2003 by columnist Robert Novak after her husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, accused the administration of twisting intelligence about Iraq's efforts to buy uranium in Niger. The year before, the CIA had sent Wilson to Niger to determine the accuracy of the uranium reports.

Wilson's revelations cast doubt on President Bush's claim in his 2003 State of the Union address that Iraq was trying to develop a nuclear bomb and had sought to buy uranium in Africa as one of the administration's key justifications for going to war in Iraq.

On Thursday, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said Cheney should take responsibility if he authorized Libby to share classified information with reporters.

"These charges, if true, represent a new low in the already sordid case of partisan interests being placed above national security," Kennedy said. "The vice president's vindictiveness in defending the misguided war in Iraq is obvious. If he used classified information to defend it, he should be prepared to take full responsibility."

In the summer of 2003, White House officials — including Libby — were frustrated that the media were incorrectly reporting that Cheney had sent Wilson to Niger and had received a report of his findings in Africa before the war in Iraq had begun.

In an effort to counter those reports, Libby and other White House officials sought information from the CIA regarding Wilson and how his trip to Niger came about, according to court records.

Fitzgerald, in his letter to Libby's lawyers, said he plans to use Libby's grand jury testimony to support evidence pertaining to the White House aide's meeting with former New York Times reporter Judith Miller.

During the meeting with Miller on July 8, Libby also discussed Plame, Fitzgerald said. "Our anticipated basis for offering such evidence is that such facts are inextricably intertwined with the narrative of the events of spring 2003, as Libby's testimony itself makes plain," the prosecutor wrote.

Miller spent 85 days in jail for refusing to discuss her source.

Ex-Cheney Aide Testified Leak Was Ordered, Prosecutor Says (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, told a grand jury that he was authorized by his "superiors" to disclose classified information to reporters about Iraq's weapons capability in June and July 2003, according to a document filed by a federal prosecutor.

The document shows that Mr. Libby, known as Scooter, was actively engaged in the Bush administration's public relations effort to rebut complaints that there was little evidence to support the claim that Saddam Hussein possessed or sought weapons of mass destruction, which was used to justify the invasion of Iraq.

The document is part of the prosecutors' case against Mr. Libby, who has been indicted on charges that he lied about his role in exposing the identity of a C.I.A. operative to journalists.

The prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, said in a letter to Mr. Libby's lawyers last month that Mr. Libby had testified before the grand jury that "he had contacts with reporters in which he disclosed the content of the National Intelligence Estimate ('NIE')," that discussed Iraq's nuclear weapons capability. "We also note that it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors."

Mr. Libby was indicted on five counts of perjury and obstruction of justice last October in what Mr. Fitzgerald has charged was a willful misleading of investigators about his role in exposing Valerie Wilson as an officer of the Central Intelligence Agency. Ms. Wilson is the wife of Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador who had accused the administration of twisting intelligence about Iraq's efforts to buy uranium from the government of Niger.

Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed in a column by Robert D. Novak in July 2003, just after Mr. Wilson wrote an Op-Ed column in The New York Times saying he had investigated the Niger claim and found little evidence to support it. Mr. Wilson charged that destroying his wife's undercover status was a way to discredit him and his assertions.

The prosecutor's note of Jan. 23 does not, however, make any reference to Mr. Libby's involvement in the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity. It seems, rather, to be part of an effort by the prosecutor to demonstrate that Mr. Libby was engaged in using secret information to press the administration's case at the same time that Ms. Wilson's identity was leaked to reporters.

The letter was first reported Thursday by the National Journal, which said its sources had identified that one of the superiors was Mr. Cheney.

The National Intelligence Estimate, which was done in October 2002, said that Iraq "will probably have a nuclear weapon during this decade," but it included some dissenting views. The report was classified.

But amid doubts about the rationale for the invasion of Iraq some of which were attributable to Mr. Wilson's Op-Ed article, the administration declassified the report on July 18.

Mr. Fitzgerald said in his letter that Mr. Libby discussed the contents of the classified report in a July 8 meeting — 10 days before it was declassified — with Judith Miller, then a reporter at The Times. Ms. Miller, who spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify in the leak case, has told the grand jury that Mr. Libby told her about Ms. Wilson at the same meeting.

Mr. Fitzgerald said that Mr. Libby's testimony showed how Ms. Wilson's status was disclosed. "Our anticipated basis for offering such evidence is that such facts are inextricably intertwined with the narrative of the events of spring, 2003, as Libby's testimony itself makes plain," he wrote.

Mr. Libby's lawyers have already suggested they will mount a defense in which they will not challenge the charge that he made misstatements about how he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity and whether he shared that information with reporters. They have said that any statements he made to investigators that might have been untrue were the result of his preoccupation with many serious matters of national security at the time.

Libby Says 'Superiors' Authorized Leaks (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby has told a federal grand jury that his "superiors" authorized him to leak highly sensitive intelligence to journalists, including a New York Times reporter he allegedly tipped off to the name of an undercover CIA operative.

The revelation is contained in a Jan. 23 letter from Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald to lawyers for Libby, who was indicted in late October in connection with the leak of the operative's name. In the letter, Fitzgerald recounts testimony in which Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff admitted circulating portions of the National Intelligence Estimate to reporters in June and July 2003.

"It is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the [National Intelligence Estimate] to the press by his superiors," Fitzgerald wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0013837

The letter did not identify those superiors. The National Journal reported on its website Thursday that Cheney, who was Libby's direct boss at the time, had authorized the disclosures.

The revelation that leaks were authorized comes as the Bush administration has been quick to condemn others for failing to safeguard secrets since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Cheney has been among the most aggressive in lashing out against what officials have described as unauthorized leaks that have gravely hurt the country.

In a speech Thursday evening at the Conservative Political Action Conference, Cheney made no reference to the report of Libby's testimony.

But he renewed his sharp criticism of the leak that led to December reports in the New York Times that the National Security Agency was monitoring communications, without court warrants, between people in the U.S. and suspected Al Qaeda operatives outside the country.

"The terrorist surveillance program was highly classified, and information about it was improperly given to the news media," the vice president said.

Noting that Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales had appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday, Cheney added: "As the attorney general pointed out this week, it's easy to imagine America's enemies shaking their heads in amazement that anyone would disclose this information, thereby giving notice to those enemies and [endangering] national security, putting our citizens at risk. But that is what happened."

The surveillance program, he said, has helped prevent attacks and "remains essential" to U.S. security.

Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's press secretary, referred questions about the Libby letter to Fitzgerald's office. She declined to discuss whether Cheney had been involved with the leaks, saying only, "We continue to cooperate fully with the investigation." A spokesman for Fitzgerald declined to comment.

In late December, the Justice Department launched an aggressive leak investigation into media reports about the domestic surveillance program. In another case, the CIA is believed to have asked Justice Department officials to probe the sources of a Washington Post report last year that the agency was operating a secret prison system for terrorist suspects in Europe.

The National Intelligence Estimates are reports that are meant to convey a consensus view in the intelligence community on issues confronting policymakers. Portions of the documents are sometimes made public.

Fitzgerald's letter did not specify which National Intelligence Estimate Libby shared with reporters or whether it was classified, and Fitzgerald has not charged Libby with disclosing classified information. Fitzgerald said in the letter that he intended to introduce the testimony at Libby's trial, set for January 2007, as part of establishing a "narrative of the events" rather than to show that a crime was committed.

Fitzgerald wrote in the correspondence, which was part of a defense motion filed Jan. 31, that Libby had testified that he caused at least one other government official to discuss an intelligence estimate with reporters in July 2003.

One such report, produced in October 2002, was a foundation of the administration's flawed case for going to war in Iraq. It asserted that Saddam Hussein had chemical and biological weapons and was rebuilding his nuclear program. Cheney was among the most ardent administration proponents of that viewpoint, although a report by the Senate Intelligence Committee subsequently found that none of the claims were backed up by evidence.

Libby, 55, was indicted on charges of obstruction of justice, making false statements and perjury. Prosecutors contend that he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury about how he learned the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame.

The unmasking of Plame, in a July 2003 article by columnist Robert Novak, has been linked to the administration's rationale for going to war in Iraq. In 2002, at the request of the CIA, Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, traveled to Niger to investigate allegations that Hussein had sought to purchase uranium there. In a New York Times op-ed article published eight days before Novak's column appeared, Wilson accused the administration of twisting intelligence about Iraq's nuclear capabilities.

Wilson's concerns, which had surfaced anonymously earlier that spring, were a source of frustration and irritation for Cheney and other officials.

Libby and Karl Rove, Bush's chief political strategist, have acknowledged speaking with reporters about Plame in the days before Novak's column was published. Libby testified that he first learned of Plame's identity from Tim Russert of NBC News, but

Fitzgerald charged that the former aide had lied and that he had learned her identity independently and spread it around. Among the people who told Libby that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA was Cheney, the indictment of Libby alleges.

Fitzgerald said in his Jan. 23 letter that Libby testified that he met with Judith Miller of the New York Times on July 8, 2003, to transmit information about the intelligence estimate. Fitzgerald has separately alleged that at the same interview, Libby advised Miller of his belief that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

Miller, who spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify about her interviews with Libby, has written that Fitzgerald asked her whether Libby had indicated that Cheney had authorized the conversations or was even aware of them.

"The answer was no," Miller wrote.

Libby Testifies Superiors Approved Secret-Data Leak (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo And John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has informed attorneys for former Vice Presidential Chief of Staff I. Lewis Libby that Mr. Libby said he was authorized "by his superiors" to leak classified information in mid-2003 as part of the Bush administration's defense of the war in Iraq.

In a Jan. 23 letter, released as part of a court filing by Mr. Libby's defense team, Mr. Fitzpatrick discusses Mr. Libby leaking parts of what is known as the National Intelligence Estimate to reporters. It specifically states that Mr. Libby testified to the grand jury that he discussed material in the classified document with reporters. In the letter, Mr. Fitzgerald goes on to say, "it is our understanding that Mr. Libby testified that he was authorized to disclose information about the NIE to the press by his superiors."

Mr. Libby, facing trial for lying to federal investigators and a grand jury in a federal probe into whether administration officials purposely blew the cover of covert Central Intelligence Agency official Valerie Plame, wasn't charged with leaking classified information.

Ms. Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, had publicly and privately rebuked the administration's reasoning for the war in Iraq.

But the disclosure that Mr. Libby told a grand jury that he was authorized by his superiors, possibly including Vice President Dick Cheney, to reveal secret information to the press is embarrassing for the White House. President Bush initially insisted he would fire anyone involved in leaking the CIA operative's name and his administration has prided itself on controlling information. Mr. Bush has called for an investigation into which administration officials leaked information related to the classified warrantless wiretapping program he launched after Sept. 11; the Justice Department is investigating.

Mr. Libby's legal team quickly shot down any notion that blaming Mr. Cheney would be part of their client's defense. "There is no truth at all to the story that Mr. Libby's lawyers have advised the court or the special counsel that he will raise a defense based on authorization by superiors," said William Jeffress, one of Mr. Libby's attorneys.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan declined to comment on the Fitzgerald letter. Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman referred questions to the special prosecutor's office, as she has done previously, and noted that the vice president's office is cooperating in the probe.

Libby Testified He Was Told To Leak Data About Iraq (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff testified that his bosses instructed him to leak information to reporters from a high-level intelligence report that suggested Iraq was trying to obtain weapons of mass destruction, according to court records in the CIA leak case.

Cheney was one of the "superiors" I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby said had authorized him to make the disclosures, according to sources familiar with the investigation into Libby's discussions with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

But it is unclear whether Cheney instructed his former top aide to release classified information, because parts of the National Intelligence Estimate were previously declassified.

DOJ_NMG_0013839

The disclosure in a legal document written by special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald demonstrates one way in which Cheney was involved in responding to public allegations by Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, that the administration had exaggerated questionable intelligence to justify war with Iraq.

In a letter written in January and released in court papers filed by Libby's defense Monday, Fitzgerald wrote that Libby testified that his "superiors" authorized him to disclose information from the National Intelligence Estimate to reporters in the summer of 2003.

The National Journal first reported on its Web site yesterday that Cheney had provided the authorization.

The intelligence estimate is a classified report prepared by intelligence officers for high-level government officials, and some parts are regularly declassified in a summary and available to the public.

Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride declined to comment on Cheney's role in Libby's discussions of the intelligence estimate, referring calls to Fitzgerald's office. Fitzgerald's spokesman has declined to comment on the prosecutor's investigation and filings.

Libby was indicted in October on charges of obstruction of justice, perjury and making false statements in the course of the investigation. Fitzgerald has been trying to determine since January 2004 whether administration officials knowingly disclosed Plame's identity to reporters to discredit Wilson's allegations, a possible violation of law.

Plame's name first appeared in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak in July 2003, eight days after her husband publicly accused the administration of relying on questionable information about Iraq's weapons program to justify the war.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said the new information about Libby's testimony exposes a possible hypocrisy within the Bush administration as it seeks to punish those who leak politically embarrassing information about secret CIA prisons and warrantless spying, but encourages leaks that aid the administration's political strategy.

"These charges, if true, represent a new low in the already sordid case of partisan interests being placed above national security," Kennedy said in a statement. "The Vice President's vindictiveness in defending the misguided war in Iraq is obvious."

Larry Johnson, a former intelligence officer and colleague of Plame's who has been critical of the administration's campaign against Wilson, said the Libby testimony helps prove that top executive branch officials were working to discredit an administration critic.

"This was not some rogue operation, but was directed at the highest levels, and specifically by Dick Cheney," Johnson said. "Libby was definitely a man with a mission, but a man who was given a mission."

E-Mail Notes Say Lobbyist Met President Many Times (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff told a magazine editor in recent days that he had met with President Bush many times and was invited to the president's Texas ranch for a gathering of campaign contributors in 2003, the editor said Thursday.

The journalist, Kim Eisler, national editor of Washingtonian magazine, said in an interview that he had received the information in e-mail messages from Mr. Abramoff, a major Republican fund-raiser who pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to bribe public officials. The messages suggest an effort by Mr. Abramoff to cast doubt on Mr. Bush's insistence that he does not recall the two of them meeting and that whatever contact they might have had was fleeting and for the purposes of a handshake and a picture.

In one message, Mr. Abramoff is reported as saying that Mr. Bush had "one of the best memories of any politician I have ever met" and that he "saw me in almost a dozen settings and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids." It added: "Perhaps he has forgotten everything. Who knows."

An Abramoff defense spokesman, Andrew Blum, said he could not comment on the e-mail messages or confirm their authenticity.

Mr. Eisler said he had been in contact with Mr. Abramoff since interviewing him six years ago for research for a book Mr. Eisler was writing about Indian reservation gambling; Mr. Abramoff's most lucrative lobbying clients were Indian casinos.

DOJ_NMG_0013840

Parts of the messages became public this week, Mr. Eisler said, after he shared them with a writer for a political Web site, thinkprogress .org, without realizing that the Web site would make them public. The portions of e-mail messages posted on the site do not provide details of any meetings between Mr. Bush and Mr. Abramoff and do not refer to the substance of any conversations between them except for pleasantries about their families.

"I considered them confidential e-mails, and it was a slip on my part to release a portion of them," Mr. Eisler said.

The White House has tried to distance itself from Mr. Abramoff, and at a news conference last month, Mr. Bush said that while he might have had photographs taken with the lobbyist, "I don't know him." He added, "I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy."

The White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, was asked about Mr. Abramoff's e-mail messages on Thursday and said, "I think what the president says still stands: Mr. Abramoff is someone who was involved in wrongdoing, he has acknowledged that himself."

According to the messages, Mr. Abramoff wrote that he was invited to Mr. Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex., in 2003 for a gathering of fund-raisers but was unable to attend because he does not travel on the Jewish Sabbath.

"I would have had to travel on Saturday (Shabbos)," he wrote. "Yes, I was invited, during the 2004 campaign. It was Saturday Aug. 9, 2003 at the ranch in Crawford."

Mr. Abramoff wrote that Mr. Bush "has one of the best memories of any politician I have ever met" and that his memory was one of Mr. Bush's "trademarks, though of course he can't recall that he has a great memory!"

Mr. Eisler said that Mr. Abramoff had told him details of the conversations between the lobbyist and his wife and Mr. Bush and Laura Bush, including discussions of the fact that both couples had twins.

Lobbyist Told Reporter Of Nearly A Dozen Contacts With Bush (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

President Bush met lobbyist Jack Abramoff almost a dozen times over the past five years and invited him to Crawford, Tex., in the summer of 2003, according to an e-mail Abramoff wrote to a reporter last month.

Bush "has one of the best memories of any politicians I have ever met," Abramoff wrote to Kim Eisler of Washingtonian magazine. "The guys saw me in almost a dozen settings, and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids."

In an interview last night, Eisler confirmed the contents of the e-mail and said he recently provided portions of it to the liberal Web log ThinkProgress because he thought he was dealing with a fellow reporter. The blog posted the contents of the Abramoff-Eisler communication.

In the e-mail, Abramoff scoffs at Bush's public statements that he does not recall ever meeting the disgraced lobbyist and former top Bush fundraiser. "Of course he can't recall that he has a great memory!" Abramoff wrote. Eisler, an editor for Washingtonian, said in the interview that the lobbyist was the source of his exclusive report last month that at least five photographs of Bush with Abramoff exist. Abramoff showed him the pictures, Eisler said. Abramoff has told others he will not release them publicly.

Bush has said he does not recall ever meeting Abramoff or posing for pictures with the Republican lobbyist at official events or parties. The White House has refused to release the pictures or detail Abramoff's contacts with top White House officials over the past five years.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said yesterday that "what the president said still stands."

"Mr. Abramoff is someone who was involved in wrongdoing," McClellan said. "He acknowledged that himself. He is being brought to account." Abramoff would not comment last night.

Abramoff pleaded guilty last month in a bribery and corruption scandal that has rocked the Republican Party and threatened the political and professional careers of several lawmakers and aides. No evidence has emerged that Bush or his top White House aides did anything improper to aid Abramoff or his clients, according to people familiar with the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0013841

Several lower-level administration officials, however, have been caught up in the scandal, including the top procurement official. The federal probe is expected to zero in on Abramoff's dealing with the Interior Department as it unfolds in the coming months.

In mentioning the invitation to Texas in 2003, Abramoff was apparently referring to a private barbecue Bush hosted for his biggest fundraisers at the Broken Spoke Ranch, down the road from the president's rustic compound near Crawford, on Aug. 9 of that year. About 350 Republicans who had raised at least $50,000 each for Bush were invited.

Abramoff was member of the exclusive group of top Bush fundraisers known as Pioneers, each of whom raised $100,000 or more for Bush. So it would not have been unusual for him to be invited to the barbecue. McClellan said that the photographs are no different from thousands Bush takes each year with visitors, supporters and even reporters and that it would not be unusual for the president to not recall meeting Abramoff.

"Perhaps he has forgotten everything," Abramoff wrote in the e-mail. "Who knows?" Eisler said Abramoff did not grant him permission to release the contents of their e-mail and Abramoff is upset that Eisler did. Eisler, who described himself as sympathetic to Abramoff's situation, was trying to show the ThinkProgress reporter that Abramoff was not exaggerating his relationship with Bush.

Eisler said he has known Abramoff for years and considers the level of vilification "out of proportion."

Abramoff Says He Met Bush "almost A Dozen" Times (REU)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, February 10, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Jack Abramoff said in correspondence made public on Thursday that President Bush met him "almost a dozen" times, disputing White House claims Bush did not know the former lobbyist at the center of a corruption scandal.

"The guy saw me in almost a dozen settings, and joked with me about a bunch of things, including details of my kids. Perhaps he has forgotten everything, who knows," Abramoff wrote in an e-mail to Kim Eisler, national editor for the Washingtonian magazine.

Abramoff added that Bush also once invited him to his Texas ranch.

The messages were made public by the American Progress Action Fund, a liberal activist group. Eisler confirmed their accuracy to Reuters but said he did not intend them to become public.

"They reflect the feeling of frustration he has not just with Bush but with all these guys claiming they didn't know him," said Eisler, who knew Abramoff through a book he wrote about the Pequot Indian tribe.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges in early January and is cooperating with prosecutors in a corruption probe that could implicate lawmakers and officials across Washington.

Bush has said he never had a discussion with Abramoff and does not remember having his picture taken with him.

The White House has said Abramoff attended three Hanukkah receptions at the White House.

Eisler said he had seen five photographs of Abramoff with Bush, none taken at Hanukkah parties.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said on Thursday that the revelations did not prove Bush knew him well.

"I think as the president also indicated, he's taken at least five photos with many people in this room at the annual holiday reception. And so I think you need to put this in context," McClellan said.

Abramoff spokesman Andrew Blum declined to comment.

Abramoff raised more than $100,000 for Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, a feat that won him an invitation to Bush's ranch in August 2003, the National Journal reported at the time.

"I was invited during the 2004 campaign," Abramoff told Eisler.

Abramoff said he did not make the trip because as an Orthodox Jew he cannot travel on Saturdays.

In the wake of Abramoff's indictment, the Bush-Cheney campaign said it would donate to charity $6,000 in contributions made by Abramoff or his clients, but not the money he helped raise.

The White House has acknowledged he participated in a few staff-level meetings at the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0013842

Although the Abramoff scandal has mostly focused attention so far on prominent House Republicans, including former Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas, at least two Bush administration officials have been implicated.

David Safavian, a former White House budget official, has been charged with lying and obstructing investigations into his 2002 golf outing to Scotland with Abramoff.

Stephen Griles, the former No. 2 official at the Interior Department, has come under scrutiny after allegations he tried to block a casino at Abramoff's request.

Abramoff Team And Reid's Office Had Frequent Contact, Records Show (WP)

By John Solomon And Sharon Theimer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid wrote at least four letters helpful to Indian tribes represented by Jack Abramoff, and Reid's staff had frequent contact with the disgraced lobbyist's team about legislation.

The activities -- detailed in previously unreported billing records and correspondence -- occurred over three years as Reid (D-Nev.) collected nearly $68,000 in political donations from Abramoff's firm, lobbying partners and clients.

Reid's office yesterday acknowledged having "routine contacts" with Abramoff's lobbying partners. Reid intervened on government matters in ways that Abramoff's tribal clients might have deemed helpful, once opposing legislation on the Senate floor and four times sending letters pressing the Bush administration on tribal issues. Reid collected donations around the time of each action.

Abramoff's firm also hired one of Reid's top legislative aides as a lobbyist. The aide later helped throw a fundraiser for Reid at Abramoff's firm that raised money from several of Abramoff's lobbying partners.

A Reid spokesman said none of the senator's actions were affected by donations or done for Abramoff. "All the actions that Senator Reid took were consistent with his long-held beliefs, such as not letting tribal casinos expand beyond reservations, and were taken to defend the interests of Nevada constituents," spokesman Jim Manley said.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to fraud and bribery and is helping prosecutors investigate the conduct of lawmakers, congressional aides and administration officials his team used to lobby.

Abramoff spokesman Andrew Blum declined to comment on the Reid contacts.

Reid has assailed Republicans' ties to Abramoff while refusing to return any of his own donations. He argues there is no need to return the money. "Senator Reid never met Jack Abramoff and never has taken contributions from him, and efforts to drag him into this are going to fail," Manley said.

Although Abramoff never donated personally to Reid, the lobbyist did instruct one tribe, the Louisiana Coushattas, to send $5,000 to Reid's tax-exempt political group, the Searchlight Leadership Fund, in 2002. Reid was Democratic whip at the time.

Abramoff sent a list to the tribe titled "Coushatta Requests" recommending donations to campaigns or groups for 50 lawmakers. Alongside Reid's name, Abramoff wrote, "5,000 (Searchlight Leadership Fund) Senate Majority Whip."

About the same time, Reid sent a letter to the Interior Department helpful to the tribe, records show. His March 5, 2002, letter pressed the agency to reject a casino proposed by a potential rival to the Coushattas, the Jena Band of Choctaw Indians. Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) also signed the letter.

Reid also officially opposed new tribal casinos in California and Michigan, where Abramoff had tribal clients with casinos.

Reid and Ensign recently wrote the Senate Ethics Committee to say their letter had nothing to do with Abramoff or the donation and instead reflected their interest in protecting Las Vegas's gambling establishments.

"As senators for the state with the largest nontribal gaming industry in the nation, we have long opposed the growth of off-reservation tribal gaming throughout the United States," Ensign and Reid wrote. Reid authored the law legalizing casinos on reservations, and he has long argued it does not allow tribal gambling off reservations.

Abramoff's group had earlier contacts with Reid's office over the Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. territory and one of Abramoff's highest paying clients. In 2001, records show, Abramoff's lobbying partners billed for nearly two dozen phone contacts or meetings with Reid's office, mostly to discuss Democratic legislation that would have gradually applied the U.S. minimum wage to the islands. Republicans wanted to keep the islands exempt.

Reid, along with his Senate counsel, Jim Ryan, met with Abramoff deputy Ronald Platt on June 5, 2001, "to discuss timing on minimum wage bill," according to a bill that Greenberg Traurig, Abramoff's firm, sent the Marianas. Three weeks before the meeting, Greenberg Traurig's political action committee donated $1,000 to Reid's Senate reelection committee. Three weeks after the meeting, Platt himself donated $1,000 to Reid.

Manley said Reid's official calendar does not list a meeting on June 5, 2001, with Platt, but he also said he could not say for sure the contact did not occur. Manley confirmed Platt had regular contacts with Reid's office, calling them part of the "routine checking in" by lobbyists who work Capitol Hill.

As for the timing of donations, Manley said, "There is no connection. This is just a typical part of lawful fundraising."

Platt and a fellow lobbyist also reported a contact on May 30, 2001, with Edward P. Ayoob, Reid's legislative counsel. Within a year, Ayoob had left Reid's office to work for Abramoff's firm, registering to lobby for the islands as well as several tribes. Manley confirmed Ayoob had subsequent lobbying contacts with Reid's office.

Editorial: Curious Move In Abramoff Case (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, February 10, 2006

If you believe in coincidence, then taking prosecutor off investigation makes sense

Jack Abramoff prosecutor Noel Hillman may deserve the White House nomination he recently got for a federal judgeship in New Jersey, but the timing is suspicious and the probe into unethical and illegal activities in Washington will suffer.

Hillman was chief of the Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity until the nomination caused him to step down. He was deeply involved in the federal probe of activities by super-lobbyist Abramoff and his colleagues, and sat in on the negotiations that led to plea deals in return for cooperation that could reveal which congressmen or agency officials took what in return for favors. Two years of experience are lost, just when the investigation zeros in on its most important targets.

Coincidence? Maybe, if you believe in such things. The selection process, according to the Justice Department, started a year ago. Hillman was part of a batch of nominations to judgeships that needed to be filled, and he wants the job. But this probe now is venturing deeply into Congress - and most notably its Republicans, although a few Democrats also received campaign donations from Abramoff clients. It's also looking hard into the Bush administration bureaucracy. Removing an aggressive prosecutor at this point will pass the sniff test only if the Justice Department finds an equally aggressive replacement - or the White House agrees to a special prosecutor.

The current investigation now is tainted, Hillman's experience already lost. The challenge the government faces is to enact meaningful ethics reforms that tighten the rules and end limits on complaints and internal investigations. But it's not enough to hold officials more accountable to their own houses of Congress in future cases. The present probe needs to gain momentum, not lose it - and that means a replacement prosecutor just as independent, aggressive and involved as Hillman, or more so. Otherwise, this nomination stinks.

Head Of Construction Company Is Acquitted Of Bribing Union (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, February 10, 2006

The president of a New York construction company, who was accused of doing a "corrupt dance" with greedy union bosses, was acquitted yesterday in New York federal court of paying bribes to union officials.

John Amicucci, 54, the president of DeFoe Corporation, was found not guilty of two counts of illegal labor payments after a two-week trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Mr. Amicucci had been charged with making secret cash payments to officials of Local 14 of the International Union of Operating Engineers so they would cut corners and ignore contract violations to help DeFoe increase its profits.

But the main government witnesses in the trial were five officials from the union, including Joseph Rizzuto Sr., a former general manager, and his son Joseph Rizzuto Jr., both of whom have pleaded guilty in the same courthouse to accepting bribes.

Prosecutors did not present wiretap or other evidence to back up the claims of the union officials that they had been handed cash by Mr. Amicucci, and in return allowed him to fill the most expensive union supervisory jobs on his crews with workers who were paid less than union rates and who were lax in enforcing the rules.

In one instance, government evidence showed, Mr. Amicucci gave himself a key supervisory job.

During his closing arguments on Tuesday, Mr. Amicucci's lawyer, Gerald L. Shargel, had the jurors laughing as he ridiculed a cheap tote bag and a watch that the prosecutors had presented to prove that the union officials received gifts from Mr. Amicucci. Mr. Shargel showed that Mr. Amicucci and his company had handed out dozens of the bags and watches as Christmas gifts to employees and friends.

By the end of the trial, it appeared that the union officials had done their best to corrupt Mr. Amicucci, and not the other way around. Local 14 represents workers who drive cranes, backhoes and other heavy equipment on construction sites. Mr. Shargel brought out, under cross-examination, that the two Rizzutos had only mentioned Mr. Amicucci for the first time to F.B.I. agents months after they began cooperating with the government.

Jurors who spoke with Mr. Shargel after the trial said they thought the government's case was too weak for a conviction, the lawyer said.

DeFoe is a familiar name to New York drivers. The company carried out a $240 million contract on the Bruckner Expressway in the Bronx and also did major work on the Gowanus Expressway in Brooklyn.

This was not Mr. Amicucci's first brush with the law. He was convicted of federal tax evasion charges in 1990. In a 1993 case, DeFoe admitted in court that it had made "illegal payments" to a minority construction workers' group that was trying to extort money from the company.

Ryan Defense's Decision Day Nears (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

Decision day is nearing for former Gov. George Ryan and his lawyers on whether he takes the stand at his corruption trial.

On Thursday, outside the presence of the jury, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, said he expects the defense case to wrap up by late next week unless Ryan or co-defendant Lawrence Warner testifies.

That means Ryan or Warner could begin testifying by Thursday.

Webb has said that Ryan is likely to take the stand, but Thursday he indicated he hasn't made a final decision. Warner's lawyers haven't divulged their strategy.

The marathon trial began in September.

On Thursday, in the defense's fourth full day of testimony, a former high-ranking official at the secretary of state's office while it was headed by Ryan defended a Joliet lease deal in 1995 as in the best interest of the state.

Ryan is charged with steering the lease to Warner, who held a hidden ownership in a building at 605 Maple Rd. in Joliet and collected $387,500 in the 1990s.

Thomas Cuculich, who was chief deputy director of the office's physical services department, testified Thursday he didn't know of Warner's ownership interest "until the Tribune printed it in 1999 or 2000."

Cuculich said Scott Fawell, Ryan's chief of staff, directed him to check out the Maple Road property, but Cuculich said he didn't think the fix was in at the time. Fawell suggested that other properties be looked at in the Joliet area as well, Cuculich said.

Though Cuculich had no experience in real estate, he said, Fawell eventually asked him to call Warner and negotiate a lease on the Joliet building. Cuculich said he thought Warner was a broker in the deal.

Warner asked that a standard clause allowing the state to terminate the contract in 90 days be removed because he could be stuck paying for up-front renovation costs to the building, Cuculich said.

Cuculich said that he found the request "fair" but that it was Fawell who decided to take out the termination clause.

On cross-examination, Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick Collins brought out that the owners of the Joliet building actually were paid a higher rent than they had initially proposed themselves.

The secretary of state's office also agreed to pay for janitorial service, lawn care and snow removal, expenses usually covered by the landlord. Cuculich said he had objected to that but was overruled by Fawell.

Cuculich conceded that in an appearance before the grand jury, he swore Fawell had never asked him to look at other properties besides the Joliet building.

But on Thursday, he said he believed a memo written after the lease had been signed was accurate when it stated that a thorough market survey had been done.

Collins questioned Cuculich's independence at the time, asking him a couple of times if he had been a loyal member of the Ryan administration then.

Cuculich bristled at the questioning, saying, "I considered myself a good employee and yes, I think I was a team player, but not in any negative connotation at all."

After Ryan's election as governor, Cuculich was appointed to head the Illinois State Toll Highway Authority.

Fawell testified at the trial that Ryan directed him to help Warner secure the Joliet lease deal. Fawell said he feared the news media would uncover Warner's link to the property and questioned Warner to make sure his financial involvement was concealed.

In other testimony Thursday, a vice president of a realty company that owns a Springfield office complex disputed Fawell's claim that he artificially brought the price down on a secretary of state lease at the property by adding unusable space to the total square footage.

Thomas Bernacchi of Towne Realty, which owns Lincoln Towers, testified he included the unusable space in the square footage without consulting with the secretary of state's office.

Ryan is accused of moving the office's securities department to Lincoln Towers in 1995 to benefit longtime friend Ron Swanson, a broker for Towne. Fawell testified that the move took place even though he thought the asking price was too high.

But Bernacchi said that two other state agencies leased space at Lincoln Towers and paid comparable rates.

Ryan May Take The Witness Stand Next Week (AP)

By MIKE ROBINSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, February 10, 2006

George Ryan may take the witness stand in his own defense as early as next week, the former governor's defense attorney told his racketeering and fraud trial Thursday.

"I will make the decision at the time," defense attorney Dan K. Webb told U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer, leaving himself the option of keeping Ryan off the witness stand.

Webb also said as the trial headed toward the end of its 19th week that if Ryan and co-defendant Larry Warner take the witness stand, they would be the final defense witnesses.

Pallmeyer told jurors that the long trial is coming to an end and that she would not be drawing up a work schedule for the month of March because one might not be needed.

If Ryan were convicted, he might face a stiffer sentence if prosecutors could prove to Pallmeyer that he lied under oath while on the stand.

Ryan, 71, and Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count federal indictment with racketeering, fraud and other offenses. They say that nothing they did was illegal.

On Wednesday, Pallmeyer warned defense attorneys not to try to turn the trial into a showcase for his opposition to the death penalty when they call character witnesses next week.

Ryan's lawyers say character witnesses, such as Sister Helen Prejean, head of the Washington-based National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, may be called next week.

Prejean's book about capital punishment, "Dead Man Walking," became a major movie.

Pallmeyer already has ruled that Ryan's campaign against the death penalty is irrelevant to federal charges that as secretary of state and governor he steered state contracts and leases to friends and got free vacations and gifts in exchange.

Pallmeyer on Wednesday made it plain she hasn't changed her mind and that Ryan's character witnesses will not be allowed to turn her courtroom into a capital punishment debate.

"I don't want this to be a back door way of inviting the jurors to speculate on whether Mr. Ryan's position on the death penalty is a good thing," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0013846

Before leaving office in January 2003, Ryan commuted the death sentences of 167 inmates to life in prison and pardoned four others, declaring the state's capital justice system "haunted by the demon of error." Three years earlier he halted all executions in Illinois over fears that a flawed system had led to the wrongful convictions of 13 death row inmates.

Ryan's actions have made an improbable hero, at least among capital punishment opponents, of the husky-voiced, white-haired Republican from downstate Kankakee. He also is a former pharmacist known for most of his career as a master of political horse trading in the legislative caucus rooms.

Defense attorneys would like it if that popularity would prove catching to the jurors.

Prosecutors said Wednesday that if Ryan's defense team uses their character witnesses to slip in testimony about the death penalty, the government should be able to tell jurors about the November 1994 Wisconsin expressway disaster that killed six children.

The expressway accident occurred when the family van was struck by a part from a truck driven by an unqualified driver who is believed to have gotten his drivers license through bribery.

Pallmeyer said Wednesday that testimony about the six children of the Rev. Scott and Janet Willis is "so prejudicial and inflammatory that it must not find its way into this case."

Meanwhile, two retired state employees who had recommended awarding a $25.8 million computer contract to IBM testified Wednesday they felt no pressure from lobbyists in reaching their decision.

Defense witnesses John Anderson and Bruce Taylor, who sat on a committee that urged Ryan to pick IBM over rival Honeywell Bull, said they based their decision solely on the merits.

Among other things, the IBM system cost $3 million less, was available a year earlier and was more compatible with the systems used by other state agencies, they said.

Under cross examination, Anderson said he had not known that Warner stood to make $1 million off the IBM contract.

Campbell To Wife: "I'm Sorry" (WXIA-TV)

By Jerry Carnes

WXIA-TV, February 10, 2006

Former Atlanta mayor Bill Campbell apologized to his wife Thursday. The apology comes on the heels of testimony in Campbell's corruption trial in federal court about a trip to Paris with another woman.

Campbell's trip came after United Water won a $21 million contract to run the water system in the city of Atlanta. The company invited Campbell to visit its European headquarters.

United Water executives testified that they spent $4,500 on Campbell's hotel suite, another $4,500 for a limousine. Witnesses told the jury that Campbell missed a scheduled tour of their waste water treatment plant, and during the four-day trip, spent 2½ hours talking business over lunch.

"We said from the beginning, the mayor was in Paris on business. And as we heard today, he had meetings with the CEO of a multi-billion dollar corporation," Campbell lawyer Billy Taylor said.

The mayor did spend time with a woman other than his wife. Former Atlanta television anchor Marion Brooks testified she was with Campbell in that hotel room, and touring Paris.

"While it's a private matter," Campbell said. "I want to publicly apologize to my wife. She has supported me with grace and dignity for 28 years."

Campbell's lawyers questioned United Water's former president, David Sherman.

"Mayor Campbell never asked for a bribe, did he," asked Campbell's attorney.

Sherman answered, "No."

"He never asked you or your company to do anything illegal, did he," the lawyer asked.

"That's correct," Sherman said.

The government will contend that Campbell should have disclosed the trip to the public, but didn't.

The trial is set to take Friday off, and will resume on Monday.

Judge Gives 'Clown' Legal Counsel (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

A federal judge ruled Thursday that reputed mob boss Joey "the Clown" Lombardo qualifies for free counsel and appointed two attorneys to represent him.

But U.S. District Judge James Zagel added that he will revisit the decision if prosecutors show Lombardo, 77, is hiding assets and can afford to pay for his own defense.

Zagel approved prosecutors' request to examine the finances of Lombardo's ex-wife and two children to determine if he has access to a 1982 trust he set up for them.

"The government is free to investigate to its heart's content that trust, the trustees and its affairs," Zagel told prosecutors. "I don't believe Mr. Lombardo is in a position to object to any questions you have."

In the meantime, attorneys Rick Halprin and Susan Shatz will represent Lombardo, Zagel ruled.

Halprin, a veteran defense attorney, long has represented Lombardo in criminal matters.

Lombardo and 11 other men are charged with running a racketeering conspiracy that prosecutors say was supported through murder and extortion.

An indictment against the men charges them with involvement in 18 Outfit-related murders. Lombardo is charged only in the 1974 slaying of Bensenville businessman Daniel Seifert.

Before his murder, Seifert was scheduled to testify against Lombardo in a Teamsters pension-fraud trial.

Zagel's ruling comes a day after prosecutors revealed that Lombardo was carrying $3,000 when captured in January.

They also questioned the legitimacy of Lombardo's 1992 divorce from his wife, Marion.

"There's some question whether the dissolution of the marriage is itself a sham," Assistant U.S. Atty. Mitchell Mars said.

Prosecutors contend Lombardo lived with his ex-wife on West Ohio Street until he fled from a racketeering and extortion indictment in April.

They also noted that in 2003, she sold three pieces of property in Florida for more than $4.5 million.

Zagel said that because Lombardo has said he has no access to that money and no claim to the 1982 trust, he cannot object to the government's investigation.

In the meantime, he is entitled to free representation, Zagel said.

"If, as a result of that investigation, you can make a case there's been a bad-faith transfer of assets there, I can remedy that," Zagel said.

Joey The Clown Too Broke To Pay His Lawyers? Feds Are Scoffing (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, February 10, 2006

CHICAGO - Lawyers for Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo got permission Thursday to collect their fees from the government, while federal prosecutors got the green light to do whatever it takes to prove that the reputed mob boss isn't as broke as he claims to be.

Lombardo, 77, who claims he can't pay his lawyers because he has no money, appeared in court in an orange prison jumpsuit, wore his usual puzzled expression and said nothing.

U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel granted defense attorney Rick Halprin and an associate permission to represent Lombardo at public expense but said he might change his mind if federal prosecutors can prove that there has been "a fraud or a bad-faith exchange of assets."

"The government is free to investigate to its heart's content," Zagel said.

Prosecutors noted that Lombardo was carrying $3,000 in cash the night of Jan. 13 when an FBI organized-crime squad caught him in a suburban Elmwood Park alley after eight months on the run.

Lombardo is among 14 reputed mob figures charged in April 2005 with a racketeering conspiracy that included plotting at least 18 murders as far back as 1970.

DOJ_NMG_0013848

When agents went to arrest him on that charge, Lombardo had vanished and immediately became the target of a high-profile manhunt.

Lombardo claims to have had no income since May 2005.

He was convicted and sent to prison along with former International Brotherhood of Teamsters President Roy Lee Williams in a 1982 bribery-conspiracy case.

Prosecutors said in court papers that "the FBI has obtained information that after the completion of his parole status on June 15, 2002, the defendant traveled to France for approximately 10 days, arriving in Paris on July 11, 2002, and continuing on to Nice."

"The defendant flew back to Chicago from France on July 21, 2002," prosecutors said. "The government respectfully submits that these facts including a 10-day trip abroad are not consistent with the need for a court-appointed lawyer."

Prosecutors said that after being indicted in the 1982 case Lombardo transferred "substantial assets" to a trust that benefits his children, Joseph and Joanne, "in an apparent attempt to put funds beyond the reach of the government." His ex-wife, Marion, is the trustee.

Prosecutors said Marion Lombardo appears to have sold three parcels in Florida held by the MJJ Trust for more than $4.5 million in 2003. They said there is a May 1992 dissolution of marriage record but that it appears the Lombardos lived together until the latest indictment.

They said two warranty deeds recording the sale of the Florida property referred to Marion Lombardo as "a married woman."

Halprin scoffed at the government's claims, telling Zagel that the assets had been placed in "an irrevocable trust" for Lombardo's family. He said that if the government thinks Lombardo has money prosecutors should prove it.

He did acknowledge that the trust might revert to Lombardo if his wife, son and daughter all died. But he said that considering his client's age, "That is worth about the same as 5,000 shares of Enron stock."

New Allegations Filed Against So-Called "Mob Cops" (NY1)

NY1, February 10, 2006

The laundry list of accusations against the so-called "mafia cops" is growing ever longer with new charges of armed robbery and drug use.

Former detective Stephen Caracappa and his partner Louis Eppolito already stand accused of eight mob-related murders. Now, the Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office says Caracappa admitted using cocaine as an undercover narcotics officer.

The person he allegedly told this to is expected to testify at this month's trial. Another witness will say the two held up delis for cash and that Eppolito asked him for money in order to bribe doctors into falsifying a heart condition. Both Eppolito and Caracappa have pleaded not guilty.

Man Sentenced For Shooting Cop, Holding Him Hostage (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2006

A former tax preparer who shot a Chicago police officer in the head and held the gravely wounded officer hostage for more than two hours was sentenced Thursday to life in prison plus 132 years.

Daniel Salley, 45, was convicted in October of 15 felony charges, including two counts of attempted murder, after a jury rejected his claim that he was the victim of a government conspiracy.

Detective Joseph Airhart was shot as he rushed into a South Loop apartment in 2001 to arrest Salley on bank robbery charges. The shooting left Airhart, a 19-year police veteran, unable to speak, walk or swallow food, his two sisters and brother said in court Thursday.

Airhart's sister Denise narrated a videotape that showed her brother lying in bed with a ventilator tube attached to his throat and a feeding tube leading to his stomach.

DOJ_NMG_0013849

"Salley, I hope you never see the light of day or set foot outside again," Denise Airhart said as more than 70 spectators, including many law enforcement officers who worked with Airhart, looked on.

"This crime, the shooting of this man, tore the heart out of the Chicago police," said Robert Milan, first assistant to Cook County State's Atty. Dick Devine.

U.S. District Judge Wayne Andersen sentenced Salley to life in prison without the possibility of parole for taking Airhart hostage. The additional 132 years on other charges would not have any practical effect unless the life sentence were overturned, prosecutors said.

Salley, who acted as his own attorney Thursday as he did during his trial, showed little emotion as the wounded police officer's colleagues and family members spoke. He looked down at legal papers, sometimes jotting notes.

When it was his turn to speak, Salley repeated his claims that the government was punishing him for the success of his tax business and that an FBI agent had shot Airhart during the raid.

"There is punishment that's coming for everybody who is working for this government," Salley said.

Members of Airhart's family declined to comment after the hearing, but they hugged one another and Airhart's law enforcement colleagues after the sentence was announced.

Airhart, who was assigned to the FBI's fugitive task force, had volunteered to be part of a team sent to arrest Salley after Salley robbed a Southwest Side bank twice in one week, taking more than $250,000.

After Salley shot Airhart, he forced other officers to back off by threatening to kill Airhart if they approached him. Salley surrendered after police granted his request to talk to a television reporter.

In the videotape, Airhart did not make eye contact with the camera and barely moved, except for flinching his jaw and twitching his arm slightly.

Denise Airhart broke into tears as she described her brother's role in the family. "He always protected me," she said. "He protected all of us."

News Bank Robber Gets Life Plus 132 Years (CHIST)

By MONIFA THOMAS, Staff Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, February 10, 2006

A former tax consultant was sentenced Thursday to life in prison -- plus an additional 132 years -- for shooting a Chicago Police detective in the head and then holding the wounded officer hostage for hours.

Daniel E. Salley was convicted last October of shooting Detective Joseph Airhart in a South Side apartment in August 2001. Airhart, who was then 45 years old, was a member of an FBI task force trying to arrest Salley in a series of bank robberies.

Salley refused to allow medical treatment for Airhart, keeping federal and local police at bay for more than two hours before he was taken into custody.

The shooting left Airhart with severe brain injuries, and he is unable to walk, feed himself or breathe without the assistance of a ventilator, his sister testified before U.S. District Judge Wayne Andersen on Thursday.

The courtroom was packed with relatives, members of the Chicago Police Department and other law enforcement agents. They watched as Airhart's younger sister, Denise Airhart, narrated a video taken of the detective last month. It showed Airhart lying on a specially made air mattress, barely moving.

"My family was destroyed, Salley, by the blatant attempt you made to murder my brother," Denise Airhart said, stopping at times to cry while Salley calmly scribbled notes on a pad.

"In an instant, Salley, you took away a promising and productive future."

Claimed FBI agent fired shot

She asked that Salley "never see the light of day nor set foot outside again."

Airhart's two other siblings and his former partner on the police force also spoke to the court, describing the 19-year officer as an adventurous, dependable family man who was robbed of his life.

Salley, who represented himself during trial, maintained his innocence, saying an FBI agent was the one who shot Airhart.

He told the Airharts he understood their grief, but also said, "God knows what happened in that room. I believe that the truth is going to come out."

Salley showed little emotion as Andersen sentenced him to life in prison on the hostage charge plus an additional 132 years on six weapons charges, five of which carry mandatory sentences of 25 years.

The sentences for eight other felony counts Salley was convicted of, including attempted murder and bank robbery, are to be served concurrently with the life sentence, Andersen ruled.

Salley admitted during his trial to twice robbing the same bank and being armed with an arsenal of weapons when Airhart and others came to arrest him.

He told jurors the government had been spying on him.

Airhart's family declined to speak to reporters. After the hearing, relatives stood in a circle and prayed.

Bank Robber Who Shot Officer Gets Life (CHIST)

By DAVID BRUMMER, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, February 10, 2006

A bank robber who shot a police detective and then held the wounded officer hostage was sentenced to life in prison Thursday.

Police and prosecutors praised the sentence imposed on Daniel Salley in the August 2001 shooting that left Chicago police detective Joseph Airhart with a crippling brain injury.

"We're very pleased that Mr. Salley won't be allowed to set foot on the streets and commit this sort of crime again," Chicago police Deputy Superintendent Charles L. Williams said.

Patrick Fitzgerald, U.S. attorney for northern Illinois, said his office was "very gratified" by the sentence. "It's an end to a very sad chapter for Joe Airhart," Fitzgerald said.

Four months after a federal jury convicted Salley of all 15 counts he faced, Judge Wayne Anderson gave Salley life in prison for taking Airhart hostage and 132 years on the other charges. The judge also ordered him to pay more than $3 million to cover Airhart's medical costs and lost wages by the family.

Salley, who acted as his own attorney, was convicted of illegally detaining, assaulting and attempting to murder Airhart, as well as assault and attempted murder of an FBI agent. He also was convicted on several firearms charges and two bank robbery charges.

Throughout the trial and sentencing, Salley maintained he did not shoot Airhart. Prosecutors pointed out that he amassed an arsenal of handguns, rifles and knives.

"I'm concerned if you were free, you would feel the need to get weapons and hurt people," Anderson said Thursday.

Minutes before he was sentenced, Salley railed against the government, compared himself to U.S. soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan and said he was "training to kill."

"I grieve for Mr. Airhart as well," Salley said. "God knows my heart. God knows I didn't mean to hurt him."

Airhart's three siblings and his former partner spoke at the hearing and pleaded for a maximum sentence.

Denise Airhart narrated a month-old video that showed a bedridden brother who's unable to speak. Machines and tubes have helped him breathe and eat since a January 2003 seizure related to the shooting, she said.

"I hope you never see the light of day," a sobbing Denise Airhart told Salley.

After the courtroom cleared, Airhart's family stayed to hold hands in a circle. They declined to speak with reporters.

During the trial, the former tax preparer admitted to twice robbing the same bank in 2001 and being armed when Airhart and others came to his girlfriend's apartment to arrest him.

Prosecutors alleged Salley shot Airhart then held him hostage for more than two hours, refusing to allow him medical treatment.

He told jurors the government had been spying on him and his tax business.

Salley, whom a judge found mentally unfit to stand trial in 2003, was eventually found competent for trial a year later after several psychiatric exams.

Two Former Officials Plead Guilty In Monmouth Corruption Case (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, February 10, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) _ Two former officials in Monmouth County pleaded guilty Thursday to extortion charges, part of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Operation Big Rig investigation.

Richard Iadanza, 50, a former deputy mayor of Neptune Township, admitted that he accepted $3,000 from a contractor in exchange for arranging work in Neptune, according to a statement from U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

Joseph McCurnin, 64, an operations manager at the Monmouth County Division of Transportation, admitted he helped facilitate a $1,500 bribe from a demolition contractor to a Neptune Township official.

Extortion carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. No sentencing dates were set for either man.

The two were among 11 then-sitting or former Monmouth County public officials arrested in the federal sting operation in February 2005. They were charged with extorting cash bribes and free work from a contractor who was cooperating with the FBI.

100's Of Radio Stations Cited In Payola Probe (ABC)

By BRIAN ROSS, RICHARD ESPOSITO & VIC WALTER

ABC News, February 9, 2006

FCC Commissioner Alleges 'Systematic Betrayal of the Responsibility of Broadcasters'

Hundreds of radio stations are under investigation by the Federal Communications Commission in the payola scandal rocking the music industry, ABC has learned.

"The FCC staff is working with voluminous evidence right now. It's a complicated and wide-ranging investigation." FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein told ABC News in an exclusive interview.

"This is potentially the most wide spread and flagrant violation of FCC rules in the history of American broadcasting," Adelstein said. "We've never seen evidence of such a systematic betrayal of the responsibility of broadcasters."

Payola -- or pay-for-play -- is a practice seemingly as old as the recording industry itself. In the past the money went to rogue disc jockeys in exchange for increasing the air play for individual songs and driving those songs to the top of the charts. In the modern version, the money goes to the bottom line of the radio stations and the conglomerates that own them, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

"We have people in suits coming in with documents rather than cash payments under the table to a DJ," Spitzer told ABC News Chief Investigative Correspondent Brian Ross.

Several of the largest radio conglomerates in America -- the corporate owners of FM radio stations across the nation -- are within the scope of the FCC probe, which was triggered by the two year long pay-for-play investigation by Spitzer and was first reported on by ABC News.

A vigorous investigation by the FCC brings federal regulatory clout, and the specter of criminal prosecution by the Justice Department.

Paid to Play Songs by J.Lo, John Mayer and Possibly Others

In addition to criminal prosecution any broadcaster in clear violation could face severe sanctions, and in the most blatant cases, the loss of their broadcast licenses, officials involved in the investigation have told ABC.

"I can't believe that radio stations are putting their licenses at risk. It seems to me they thought the FCC was asleep and they shot someone in front of the policemen. The policeman is obligated to act when evidence is so clear," Adelstein said.

Spitzer said record company documents obtained in the investigation of Sony BMG and Warner, both of which have settled with the attorney general, revealed payments for songs that became major hits, including Jennifer Lopez's "I'm Real" and John Mayer's "Daughters."

Other artists whose songs are named in the Spitzer documents include Jessica Simpson, Celine Dion, Maroon 5, Good Charlotte, Franz Ferdinand, Switchfoot, Michelle Branch, and R.E.M. The record companies allegedly paid radio stations to increase airplay of those artists' songs.

That money allegedly came in many forms; directly from the record companies, through "Indie" promoters or in promotional considerations that lowered stations' overheads.

Adelstein said that the New York attorney general has shared mountains of information with the FCC and has identified specific documents and e-mails that seem to clearly implicate some of the companies controlling much music radio in the United States.

"The FCC has received an unbelievable amount of evidence from Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that there appears to be widespread and flagrant violation of FCC rules regarding payola, (including) undisclosed promotions by radio broadcasters. And we need to find out who did it, basically prosecute any violations to the fullest extent of the law," Adelstein said.

Adelstein spoke to ABC News after reading ABC's disclosure of the shift of Spitzer's probe from record companies to broadcasters. He has been in regular contact with Spitzer.

"When anything is aired that is paid for without being disclosed to the public it is a clear violation of FCC rules," he said.

"We have a responsibility to get to the bottom of this & It's important that the FCC does its job and not let the states do it for us," Adelstein added.

Spitzer has been critical of the FCC's approach to the issue of payola.

"I would be the first to acknowledge that I would like to see the FCC more directly involved in addressing what is very clearly a payola scandal that has run rife through the industry. They have failed to do so and we have reached out to them,' said Spitzer.

The FCC originally started a probe into the payola scandal in August 2005, after Spitzer disclosed his investigation of record companies including Warner Music Group, Sony BMG, EMI and Universal. At that time, Adelstein called for the FCC to aggressively investigate. By November 2005 he was calling for the FCC to bring the probe to a swift and satisfactory conclusion. Now he admits the FCC needs to devote more resources to the probe. "We need to devote significant resources [to investigating this aspect] and I'm not sure we are doing that yet," Adelstein added.

"Based on the evidence we have seen some of the radio conglomerates clearly are participating and knowledge of this and orchestration of this came from the very top," Spitzer told ABC.

"Now since it is up to the FCC -- not me -- whether or not to strip them of their licenses. I will leave that decision to the FCC. But certainly the behavior has been unethical, improper illegal and a sanction of some severity should be imposed," said Spitzer.

Adelstein told ABC News that "at this stage in the investigation it's not clear what the appropriate sanctions are because we're still looking into it, seeing if there are violations and, if there are, if they are systemic and go to the corporate offices."

Adelstein did say that the potential sanctions could be severe.

"While it's highly unusual for the FCC to pull licenses on first violation, depending on the severity that is one option that is available to us. These are criminal matters as well."

"If we do find evidence of criminal violations its incumbent on us to refer this to the Department of Justice for criminal prosecutions."

Man Charged With Killing Wife, Daughter In Boston (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2006

An Englishman wanted in the killing of his wife and baby daughter in their suburban home near Boston was arrested this morning in London, officials said.

Neil Entwistle, 27, was taken into custody without incident in a London subway station and was held pending an extradition hearing, perhaps as soon as Friday, British authorities said.

If extradited, he will face murder and weapons charges in connection with the deaths of his wife, Rachel, 27, and their 9-month-old daughter, Lillian. They were found shot to death Jan. 22, tangled in the bedding in the family home in Hopkinton, Mass.

The dead woman's family was "confident this day would come and the case would be solved," family spokesman Joe Flaherty told reporters today. The family was saddened and shocked by the deaths of their relatives, he said, and the arrest of a person "the family trusted."

DOJ_NMG_0013853

The family knew investigators "would unravel what happened here and that somebody would be arrested and brought to justice," Flaherty said.

Because of the nature of the crime, the age of the child and Entwistle's abrupt departure to his native Britain, the case has been getting extensive coverage on cable television news shows.

Middlesex Dist. Atty. Martha Coakley told a televised news conference that officials surmise that Entwistle meant to kill himself after murdering his family, but changed his mind. The motive could have been financial difficulties, she said.

Coakley said Entwistle used his father-in-law's handgun to shoot his wife and daughter on the morning of Jan. 20. The next morning, Entwistle bought a one-way ticket and fled to London. He did not return for the family funerals.

Before he boarded the flight, Entwistle brought the .22-caliber handgun back to his father-in-law's house in Carver, Mass., Coakley said.

"We have forensic information that links it both to him and to Rachel, and we know Rachel had not used that gun," Coakley said.

It was Rachel Entwistle's mother who called authorities when she couldn't contact her daughter. Police went to the Entwistles' home on Jan. 21 but didn't see anything wrong. After a missing person report was filed, police visited the home again, and discovered the bodies amid piles of bedding, Coakley said.

As is common in murder cases, Entwistle was immediately considered a person of interest, a step below suspect. State officials flew to London late last month to interview Entwistle, who was at his family's home in Worksop, England.

Entwistle was an unemployed computer entrepreneur who met Rachel in 1999 at the University of York, where she spent a year studying abroad. They married in 2003 and stayed in England until last year.

The family had rented the home in Hopkinton some two weeks before the murders.

In a statement, London authorities said Entwistle was arrested on a provisional extradition warrant issued by Bow Street Magistrates Court.

"The warrant alleges that on or before" Jan. 22, Entwistle "murdered Rachel Entwistle … and he murdered Lillian Entwistle. Mr. Entwistle is now in custody at a London police station and will be brought before Bow Street Magistrates Court in due course."

British Man Charged In Deaths Of American Wife, Daughter (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 9 -- A British man whose wife and infant daughter were discovered fatally shot in a Boston suburb last month, a day after he had abruptly left the country, was arrested on murder charges Thursday in London, authorities said.

The charges against Neil Entwistle added a new twist to a case whose lurid elements -- failed Internet schemes, a mother and daughter shot side by side, and a police search that missed two bodies buried under bedclothes -- have generated intense interest on both sides of the Atlantic.

In announcing the arrest, Middlesex County District Attorney Martha Coakley said that Entwistle, mired in debt, may have initially planned to kill himself after shooting his wife and daughter Jan. 20.

"We believe possibly that this was intended to be a murder-suicide," Coakley said at a news conference, adding: "Obviously, the murder was effected, the suicide was not."

Entwistle, 27, has spent much of the past three weeks at his parents' home in Worksop, England, dogged by British and U.S. media. Coakley said Entwistle was visiting friends in London on Thursday when he was arrested by British police at the Royal Oak train station.

He faces extradition proceedings to return him to Massachusetts.

In a statement Thursday, family members of Entwistle's wife, Rachel, said they were saddened by the arrest.

"Neil was a trusted husband and father, and it is incomprehensible how that love and trust was betrayed," the statement said, according to the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0013854

Entwistle and his wife met while studying at Britain's University of York in 1999 and were married in 2003, the AP reported. They moved into their rented home in the suburb of Hopkinton, Mass., a few days before the killings.

By that time, Coakley said, Entwistle was facing debt he had accumulated in Britain, plus a series of Internet ventures had produced little income.

Coakley said Entwistle used a .22-caliber handgun he had taken from his father-in-law to shoot his wife, 27, in the head, and then shoot their 9-month-old daughter, Lillian, in the abdomen. At the time of the shootings, Coakley said, both victims were lying on a bed and wearing "sleepwear," but she said it was unclear whether they were awake or asleep.

Later that day, Entwistle surreptitiously returned the gun to his in-laws' home in another Boston suburb, Coakley said.

The next morning, Jan. 21, Coakley said, he used a one-way ticket to fly to London.

The bodies were not discovered until more than 24 hours after Entwistle departed, after Hopkinton police and family friends had done separate walk-throughs in the house and noticed nothing amiss. The bodies were apparently there the whole time, Coakley said, but were concealed by a large pile of bedding. "It just looked like an unmade bed," Coakley said. Police discovered the bodies when they made another search on the evening of Jan. 22.

US Charges Taiwanese Over China Jet, Missile Deal (REU-Y2)

By Michael Christie And Paul Eckert

Reuters, February 10, 2006

A Taiwanese citizen was charged in the United States on Thursday with being a covert agent for Beijing, and accused together with a Frenchman of trying to illegally export an F-16 jet engine, Blackhawk helicopter engines and cruise missiles to China.

U.S. prosecutors in Miami said a federal grand jury had returned a nine-count indictment against Ko-Suen Moo, of Taipei, and Maurice Serge Voros, of Paris.

The indictment alleged that the defendants violated the Arms Export Control Act by trying to export controlled items without a license to China, including the engines, the cruise missiles and air-to-air missiles, the prosecutors said.

The case follows repeated U.S. expressions of concern about Beijing's strategic intentions as China increasingly pours proceeds from its rapidly expanding economy into its military.

Chinese war capabilities are growing at a pace expected to soon upset a delicate military balance between China and rival Taiwan, which relies on U.S. weaponry to defend itself.

"This case highlights the national security threat posed when agents of a foreign government seek to illegally acquire and export American military weaponry," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta.

"We will continue to aggressively investigate and prosecute foreign agents whose motives and actions are, by definition, detrimental do the United States and our national security," he said in a statement released by the Justice Department.

RISING CHINA CONCERNS

A Pentagon spokesman refused to comment specifically on the Miami case, saying it was a Justice Department matter.

But he added: "We are aware that there are continuing efforts on the part of China to obtain U.S. technology," Navy Lt. Cmdr. Greg Hicks told Reuters in Washington.

A spokesman for the Chinese embassy in Washington was not immediately available for comment.

A spokesman for Taiwan, which has an unofficial economic office in the U.S. capital in the absence of formal diplomatic ties with the United States, declined to comment.

Taiwan and China split in 1949 after a civil war brought the communists to power on the mainland. Beijing has vowed to attack if Taiwan formally declares statehood -- a fight that could embroil the United States as Taiwan's traditional backer.

Last week, the Pentagon, in a new long-range strategy blueprint, called China the rising power with the greatest potential to compete militarily with the United States. The strategy calls for new long-range weapons and a greater U.S. naval presence in the Pacific.

Moo was also charged with being a covert agent of the People's Republic of China, and with bribery, obstruction of justice and money laundering for offering $500,000, through an intermediary, to be released.

DOJ_NMG_0013855

Moo had been detained but Voros remained at large, prosecutors said. The defendants face up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

According to the indictment, Moo traveled to the United States on two occasions and actually inspected an F-16 aircraft engine. The engine was to be flown to an airstrip in China.

"In the post-9/11 world, keeping sensitive U.S. military components from falling into the wrong hands has never been more important," Jesus Torres, Special Agent in Charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Miami, said in a statement.

Feds Seize Truckload Of Fake Olive Oil (AP)

AP, February 9, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) - More than a discerning palate has determined that thousands of cans of Hermes and San Giovanni brands of extra virgin olive oil weren't quite right.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration tested the chemical composition of the oil and found it was really less expensive soybean oil, prompting Thursday's seizure.

The U.S. Marshals Service seized 22,700 gallons of oil, imported from Italy, at a trucking company warehouse in Clifton.

"It is a whole lot of faux olive oil," said Mike Drewniak, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

The labels on the 3-liter tins in 4,855 cases said the contents were more expensive extra virgin olive oil or pomace olive oil.

Because olive oil is five to six times more expensive than soybean oil, the potential estimated profit is about $105,600, according to the FDA.

"We will not permit New Jersey consumers to be defrauded," Christie said in a statement.

The tainted oil includes Hermes' brand of extra virgin olive oil and pomace oil and San Giovanni's brand of extra virgin oil. The cans remain at the warehouse in Clifton under a state-ordered embargo.

Teen Boys Abducted, Forced To Rob Md. Banks, Police Say (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, February 10, 2006

They are bank robbers who didn't want the cash, police say. The scared 14- and 15-year-olds were not looking for a thrill, either, when they walked into banks in suburban Maryland and handed tellers notes demanding money.

They had been snatched by gunmen, taken to the banks and forced by their captors to commit the crimes, according to Prince George's County police.

After the teenagers came out of the banks with the money, the gunmen made off with the take and left the stunned youths behind.

At least four recent bank robberies were committed by three teenagers who later told police they had robbed the banks against their will. Their stories are "very credible," said an investigator who did not want to be identified because the case is still open.

The most recent was on Wednesday, when a 14-year-old Landover youth was abducted and then forced to hold up a branch of Chevy Chase Bank in Bethesda, said FBI spokeswoman Michelle Crnkovich.

Police found him walking along Rockville Pike, stained by ink from an exploding dye pack, a device that banks attach to bundles of money to stain bank robbers, making them easier to spot.

The other three incidents occurred in Prince George's, two of them on Jan. 20 and one on Monday.

"These kids were frightened," Crnkovich said. "There are absolute parallels in these cases."

None of the teenagers was physically hurt, police said.

The FBI is working with Prince George's and Montgomery County police on the cases. The agencies have "promising leads," Crnkovich said.

Prince George's police consider the youths to be victims, and they were not arrested, said Cpl. Debbi Carlson, a police spokeswoman. The 14-year-old in the Bethesda bank case was taken into custody by Montgomery police but was not charged with a crime. Instead, he was released to his parents.

DOJ_NMG_0013856

"I've been a cop for 17 years, and this is the first time I've heard of a kid that young robbing banks," said Lt. Eric Burnett, spokesman for Montgomery police.

Police did not identify any of the teenagers and would not say who wrote the notes used in the robberies. They did not disclose what the notes said.

Prince George's police Lt. Sean Carney, commander of the department's robbery section, cautioned parents yesterday to always know where their children are. He also said children should walk or travel with friends or relatives.

"People need to take steps to protect themselves," Carney said. "Be aware of your surroundings. Be aware of your children's travel routes. Tell neighbors to keep their eyes out."

The first Prince George's kidnapping and robbery began at 4 p.m. Jan. 20 in the 7400 block of Barlowe Road, two blocks from police headquarters in the Palmer Park neighborhood.

Two men approached a 15-year-old, saying they had a weapon and would hurt him if he did not follow their orders. They took him several blocks to a Wachovia Bank in the 7700 block of Landover Road and forced him to pass a note to the teller demanding money, police said.

They then went to a SunTrust Bank in the 8200 block of Ardwick-Ardmore Road, next to an entrance ramp for Route 50, and forced him to rob that bank, police said.

The men fled, and the teenager ran to a nearby business and called police.

The second abduction occurred at 6 p.m. Monday, when a man with a gun approached a teenager on a Metrobus. Police would not say where the bus was heading or where it was when the incident occurred.

The gunman said he'd hurt the youth if he didn't follow the man's orders, according to police.

He took the youth to a SunTrust bank in the 7700 block of Riverdale Road and told him to pass a note to the teller demanding money, which the youth did. After the teenager handed over the money, the man ran off with it.

Bank employees called police and gave a description of the teenager who had robbed the bank. Patrol officers quickly spotted the youth and stopped him. He explained what had happened, police said.

In the Montgomery case, the teenager robbed a Chevy Chase Bank at 7501 Wisconsin Ave. in Bethesda about 4:20 p.m. He was taken into custody shortly after 5 p.m. when patrol officers who had heard the suspect's description spotted him on Rockville Pike.

Burnett said detectives don't believe he participated in the robberies in Prince George's.

The youth, who was not identified, was released to his parents last night after being questioned by detectives at police headquarters in Rockville.

Police have descriptions of two men possibly involved in the Prince George's cases but do not have surveillance images of them from the recent robberies because they did not enter the banks with the teenagers, Crnkovich said.

But one or both might have been involved in a late December robbery of a Wachovia bank, and there might be surveillance images from that heist, she said.

Employees at the Wachovia, SunTrust and Chevy Chase banks that were robbed declined to comment yesterday. Corporate spokesmen for the banks said only that they were cooperating with law enforcement officials.

One of the men, who might have been involved in both Prince George's cases, is described as 6 feet tall, about 20 years old and of dark complexion. He had a moustache and a light growth of hair on his chin and was wearing a gray sweat jacket, bluejeans and black Jordan tennis shoes.

Another man, who might have been involved in the Jan. 20 incident, is described as 16 years old and about 5 feet 8 inches tall with cornrows. He was wearing a No. 3 Allen Iverson Philadelphia 76ers jersey, police said.

Carney appealed to the public for information. "No matter how insignificant it may seem, we need to know everything the public knows about this," he said.

Anyone who has information about these cases is asked to call 866-411-TIPS.

Ex-La. Judge Gets Prison In Bond Scheme (FINDLAW/AP)

By Alan Sayre, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0013857

AP, February 10, 2006

(AP) - NEW ORLEANS-A former state judge who was tried for allegedly accepting bribes from a bail bonding company was sentenced Thursday to more than four years in federal prison for mail fraud.

Alan Green was accused of taking $20,000 in cash, golf trips and meals from the company in return for reducing the bonds of dangerous criminals to levels they could afford. That way, Bail Bonds Unlimited could collect hefty fees for guaranteeing their court appearances.

Green was convicted of a single charge of mail fraud after being tried on charges relating to the bribery allegations. The jury could not agree on the other charges: four more counts of mail fraud, one of mail fraud conspiracy and one of racketeering conspiracy.

Federal Judge Lance Africk told Green his conduct endangered citizens. "Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a for-sale sign on your office," Africk said.

Green apologized for "impugning the integrity of the bench" but denied taking any bribes, saying he was manipulated through a friendship with an accountant for the company.

Green served on the state district court in the New Orleans suburb of Jefferson Parish until his conviction last year. He was the 14th defendant convicted in the FBI's investigation of courthouse corruption in the parish.

Green Sentenced To 51 Months (NOTP)

By Michelle Krupa, West Bank bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 10, 2006

Defiant to the end of prosecutors' claim that $10,000 in cash payments that he received from Bail Bonds Unlimited were not bribes, former state Judge Alan Green was sentenced to 51 months in prison Thursday in New Orleans' federal court, becoming the second judge to wind up behind bars in the Jefferson Parish courthouse corruption scandal.

Before delivering a scathing rebuke of Green's exploitation of his post as an elected jurist and slapping him with a $50,000 fine, U.S. District Judge Lance Africk gave Green one last chance to admit that two $5,000 payments he got from the Gretna bail bonds firm were not "off-the-books" campaign contributions, as Green testified in his June trial, but part of the web of bribery confirmed by nine defendants who have admitted to crimes in the seven-year probe.

"Do you still contend that the two $5,000 contributions were not bribes?" Africk asked Green.

"They were not bribes, your honor, as far as I was told," Green replied. "At no time did I believe that they were, in fact, bribes."

Africk then took aim at Green, assailing his refusal to realize, even in retrospect that, the cash, gifts and meals that Bail Bonds Unlimited executives Louis and Lori Marcotte and accountant Norman Bowley showered upon him did not trigger his favorable treatment of the bond house, which included reducing or splitting bonds for violent arrestees at the specific request of the Marcottes and Bowley.

"Bail Bonds Unlimited saw a 'For Sale' sign on your office and decided to purchase it in order to maximize its profits," Africk said. "I find this sentencing to be one of the most distasteful things I have ever had to face in more than 15 years on the bench. You had all the promise in the world, and you were a role model in the community. It is beyond sad that it has to come to this."

After Africk handed down the punishment, Green declined comment other than to say that his "faith in God would carry me through." Several of his relatives, including his wife and mother, were present in the courtroom.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who attended the proceeding along with about 75 observers, said after the hearing that he was insulted by Green's lack of willingness to take responsibility for the bribery that was a component of the single count of mail fraud for which jurors found Green guilty. The jury hung on six other charges, including one under the potent Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization act, or RICO.

"Of course, I'm offended," Letten said. "Anyone with a single brain cell will understand that in the face of ... (wiretapped) conversations that showed the context in which these payments transpired that these cash payments were clearly bribes.

"For Alan Green to stand before God, country and a federal judge and assert that his conduct was not bribery is something that flies in the face of common sense and, as (chief prosecutor) Mike Magner said, made his skin crawl," Letten added.

Green, who faced a maximum 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, apologized during the hearing for "impugning the integrity of the court in Jefferson Parish."

"I unwittingly and unintentionally placed myself in a situation where I was manipulated by the bail bond company," Green said. "Today I stand before you as many people have stood before me. I've always expected them to be accountable to my court, ... and I am prepared to accept whatever sentence you deem is appropriate."

That punishment was elevated beyond the 33 to 41 months recommended by the court's probation office because Africk agreed with prosecutors' argument that Green lied on the witness stand when he maintained his assertion that the cash he took from Bail Bonds Unlimited, plus $800 in cash from Gretna lawyer W.J. LeBlanc, were not bribes but campaign contributions, even though they far surpassed donation limits in state law.

Africk said Green, who spent six years as a prosecutor before becoming a judge in 1992, was "too smart" not to realize the bribery.

Indeed, Green's lead defense attorney, Frank DeSalvo, told Africk that he begged his client after the jury verdict to "just say (the payments) were bribes" in an attempt to earn leniency. But Green refused, saying that admission would have been a boldfaced lie, DeSalvo said.

In suggesting to Africk that Green should go to prison for as long as 87 months based on federal guidelines, Magner implored the court not to consider as "a ceiling" the 46-month sentence of Ronald Bodenheimer, the only other judge to be sent to jail in the ongoing Operation Wrinkled Robe investigation.

Bodenheimer "accepted responsibility for his wrongdoing;" entered a plea deal with prosecutors, avoiding an expensive trial; and provided crucial information during at least 10 debriefing sessions that led directly to the indictment and subsequent plea deals of the Marcottes, who ultimately admitted orchestrating the corruption scheme, Magner said.

But DeSalvo said Bodenheimer only pleaded guilty because he "folded under the pressure" of the government's continuing probe. Bodenheimer also admitted to other crimes, DeSalvo said, including conspiring to plant drugs on a critic of his business and rigging the child custody case of millionaire restaurateur Al Copeland, which was assigned to his court.

"To compare Judge Green to Judge Bodenheimer would be like comparing a sinner to the devil," he said.
